It has been further insisted, that a recaptor acquires no other right than what the captor had; inferring that as the British captor could not have procured a condemnation (as appears by the acquittal of Admiral Rodney) neither can an American recaptor make this vessel legal prize; that the British captain should be considered as a pirate, and that the law is, that goods taken by pirates, and again retaken from them, shall be restored to the former owner; that if it should be objected, that most of the real consignees of this cargo are not inhabitants of Dominica, and therefore not within the capitulation; it is answered, that article the ninth extends the operation of this capitulation to absent inhabitants, even such as are in the service of the king of Great Britain having property in the island, whose business may be transacted by attorneys; and that if the attorney is an inhabitant, and signed the capitulation, it is the same thing in effect as if the principal had done it. And lastly, that although no express authority can be produced to prove directly that allies in war are bound by the capitulations, conventions, and treaties of each other, reciprocally; yet a striking analogy may be found in the case of ransom. That it cannot be denied, but that if a French vessel takes a prize and ransoms her for a limited time, the ransom bill would protect the property from capture and condemnation by the Americans. If, therefore, the act of an individual captain of a French privateer can screen the property of an enemy from an ally, much more should the solemn capitulation of a French general with the whole inhabitants of a captured island bind the same ally.

To this it has been replied: that the ship Resolution and her cargo were found in the possession of the enemy, who held the same by force as their property for more than twenty-four hours, which brings the case strictly within the ordinance of congress of February last, which excludes any claims of former owners after a possession of twenty-four hours by the enemy: that we have no business to inquire by what right the enemy became possessed; it is sufficient for us that we found it there: that the doctrine respecting pirates does not apply, because the British, as a sovereign nation, has an undoubted right to wage war, and to take prizes, which pirates have not: that if any subject of a sovereign power takes unlawfully, let him or his prince answer the wrong, the captors at war with them being altogether blameless, whose right to take from an enemy cannot be doubted: that it appears evidently by the letters and other exhibits in this cause, that this cargo is in fact British property, and not the property of the inhabitants of Dominica; and although consigned to merchants in Amsterdam, the net proceeds were to be remitted to merchants in London, and other parts of the British dominion: that it is absurd and untrue to suppose that the benefits of the capitulation were designed to extend to London merchants who had never been inhabitants of the island of Dominica, and who are and will remain British subjects, aiding, by their wealth and influence, in the war against France and her allies: that the capitulation included only real inhabitants, either present on the island, or absent on business at the time, and placed them in a state of perfect neutrality with respect to the war; a character which can by no means be applied to the real consignees of this cargo: that if the effects of this capitulation were to be thus extended, France would have obtained a conquest which can produce nothing but expense, trouble, and loss to her, but will tend to strengthen and enrich the enemy; and that it would be, for the present, the interest of Great Britain to surrender all her West India islands upon the same terms.

It has been further urged by the counsel for the libellants, that allies are not mutually bound by every ex parte treaty or convention: that consent is necessary to include one in the engagement made by the other; as for instance, in a truce or cessation of hostilities: that France does not deem herself so bound, is evident from her conduct with respect to Bermuda and the Bahama Islands, whose property congress have exempted from capture and condemnation by Americans; yet their vessels are confiscated in the French courts of admiralty: and that this exemption, granted by congress to Bermudians, runs strictly parallel with the terms granted by the French general to the people of Dominica, so far as allies in war were to be affected by such treaties. That the law respecting ransoms cannot apply to the present case, because, if, after our ally has made a capture, and discharged the prize on a promised ransom, we should violate the ransom bill, we should in fact plunder our friend of his actually acquired property; and it is for this reason that allies are bound by ransom bills: that this case coming precisely within the ordinance of congress respecting twenty-four hours' possession by the enemy, this court is bound to decree according to that ordinance, and hath no power to judge how far its operation may, or may not, under particular circumstances, affect the terms of our alliance with France, the true limits of which are only to be ascertained by the sovereignty of the states, and are not submitted to the determination of this court. That, as to the passport subscribed by Monsieur Du Challeau, he did it as a matter of course in consequence of the depositions annexed to the bills of lading, which were taken by the British judge of the island, and who might probably be in the interest of the parties; or, at least, that it was done with the official negligence too usual in passing customhouse papers. It was further suggested, that the manifest variance between the bills of lading, with their depositions annexed, and the private letters of advice found on board; the direct fraud manifest in some of those letters, and the mysterious complexion of others, are alone sufficient to justify a condemnation of this property; double papers and fraudulent clearances being legal cause of confiscation. In short, that this whole business appears to be a mercantile scheme concerted between British merchants and Brandlight and Sons, of Amsterdam, in conjunction with the shippers at Dominica, to impose on the French governor, and to derive an unfair advantage from the liberal terms of the capitulation: that, if this property is to be deemed neutral, the true doctrine is, if a neutral voluntarily puts his property on board an enemy's ship, he does at his own risk; but if an enemy unjustly takes neutral property, and the same is retaken, the remedy is against the enemy who did the wrong, and not against the recaptor who only did his duty; that it is true, that the passport of Governor Du Challeau recommends this vessel to pass unmolested by the friends of France, but does not say she shall not be taken from the enemy in case she should fall into their hands: that if the inhabitants of Dominica, in their present situation, be considered either as French or as British subjects, still the recapture is good; if French, then the property (supposing it to belong to the shippers) having been more than twenty-four hours in the possession of the enemy, is prize to the recaptor by the marine ordinances of France and America; if British, it belonged to the enemy, and is therefore prize. And lastly, that this capitulation should not be construed to extend further than the protection of property upon the island, and within its ports and harbours, but cannot reasonably be expected to insure safety on the high seas in the midst of a raging war.

This cause, so far as it respects the cargo of the ship Resolution, rests principally on one question, viz. whether the United States by their alliance with France, are, or are not to be considered as parties in the capitulation made by the Marquis De Bouillé with the inhabitants of Dominica. No authority has been produced, and I believe that none can be, to shew that allies are mutually bound in all cases. It is manifest, that it is not generally so understood; because it is usual in forming treaties of alliance to insert special clauses specifying those cases, wherein the promises and engagements of the one shall bind the other: for it would be a very dangerous doctrine that should bind sovereign powers in engagements to which they had neither expressly nor implicitly given consent, or that one ally should necessarily become a party in the conventions which the generals and officers of the other may, under particular straits and circumstances, make with the common enemy, unless the ally be mentioned in the convention, and the terms thereof be afterwards acceded to by him. Thus, in the case of Dominica, had Governor Stuart, when he surrendered the island to the Marquis De Bouillé expected that the United States should be bound by the terms of the capitulation, he would have made this one of the articles, and not entrusted so important a point to a speculative question, how far one ally may or may not be virtually bound by the engagements of the other. This, however, he has not done, either because it would imply an acknowledgment of the sovereignty of the United States, or because he deemed the objects of the capitulation to be limited to property within the island. Be this as it may, the British could not reasonably complain that the French had violated the articles of the capitulation, should the Americans take the goods of the inhabitants of Dominica found upon the high seas, because such an assurance made no part of the stipulation. "If he who can and ought to have explained himself clearly and plainly, has not done it, it is the worse for him; he cannot be allowed to introduce subsequent restrictions which he has not expressed." Vatt. Law Nat. bk. 2, c. 17, § 174. But whatever doubts there may be of the right of Americans to take the property of the people of Dominica under the present circumstances, there can be none of taking British property, wherever found, without any danger of impairing the friendship of our good ally. And from a scrutiny of the papers found on board this vessel, there is strong reason to believe that this cargo, however artificially covered, is, in fact British property.

As to the general doctrine respecting allies, the case of Bermudas is, I think, strong in point. The vessels of that island were by congress exempted from capture by Americans, and yet the French made prize of them whenever they could; nor was it ever suggested that they had thereby violated the faith of the alliance. Had the British expected, or France desired, that the United States should be parties in the capitulation of Dominica, it cannot be doubted, but that this would have been made one of the terms of that capitulation, or that France would, before this, have signified her desire to congress, and that congress would have instructed the masters of privateers as to this matter. Having made no national agreement to spare the property of the people of Dominica, when found on the high seas, much less are we bound to rescue it from the hands of an enemy at our risk and expense, in order to restore it, salvage free, to their use. This would be to put them on a better footing than our own merchants, whose property, after twenty-four hours' possession by the enemy, would be confiscated to the recaptor, whereas it is contended that no confiscation whatever should pass on the property of the people of Dominica. Being fully satisfied as to this general point, it renders a minute display of the striking contradictions between the bills of lading and letters of advice, and other papers found on board this vessel, the less necessary. Many of them are manifestly fraudulent; and although the property is carefully wrapped in neutral covers, the net proceeds appear to be finally intended for subjects of Great Britain, residing at London, or elsewhere.

With respect to the king of England's proclamation, I conceive that it is founded on partial, not on general grounds. Were it not that this, with four or five other Dutch vessels were at this time to sail from Dominica, freighted with the property of British merchants, it is more than probable that this proclamation had never been published.

I adjudge that the cargo of the ship Resolution be condemned as lawful prize to the libellants; and that the ship Resolution, with her tackle, apparel and furniture be restored to Brandlight and Sons, merchants of Amsterdam.

NOTE. The claimants appealed from this decree; and, after long argument, the judges of appeal reversed the decree, so far as the same respected the condemnation of the cargo, which they fully acquitted, upon the shippers paying freight to the owners of the ship. [2 Dall. (2 U. S.) 1.] There was afterwards a rehearing of this cause before the court of appeal, on a suggestion of new testimony having been found amongst some papers taken in a ship (the Ersten) bound from Ostend to Dominica; but the court adhered to their judgment; except only as to some part of the cargo, which was condemned on account of irregularities in the bills of lading, and letters of advice, respecting those particular articles. MILLER v. SMITH et al.

[4 Ban. & A. 314;[1] 16 O. G. 313.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. May, 1870.

PATENTS—CLAIM—INFRINGEMENT—PADLOCKS.

Upon the construction given by the court to the second claim of the patent granted to James W. Lyon, for improvement in padlocks, dated April 22d, 1862, and numbered 35,030, the defendants held not to have infringed.

[This was a bill by Nathan G. Miller against Friend W. Smith and others for an injunction to restrain the alleged infringement of certain letters patent.]

Charles E. Mitchell and Benjamin F. Thurston, for complainant.

Rodney Mason, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, based upon the alleged infringement of letters patent [No. 35,030] which were granted to James W. Lyon, on April 22d, 1862, for an improvement in padlocks. The patent was assigned to the plaintiff on March 18th, 1874. The device, which is alleged to be an infringement, is used upon the post-office street letter-boxes in various cities of the country, and is manufactured by the defendants under a contract with the United States government, and was patented December 23d, 1873. It was adopted by the post-office department after a competitive trial, and is a secure and successful lock. There is no evidence that the plaintiff's lock has ever been manufactured, and there is satisfactory evidence that it is an unsafe lock. The patent was purchased after the plaintiff knew that the defendants had obtained their contract.

The specification of the plaintiff's patent states as follows: "The first part of my invention consists in combining with the shackle two separate and independent sets of tumbler-catches—one set to lock the heel, and the other set to lock the front or staple of the shackle—the two sets being so arranged and so adapted to each other, substantially as hereinafter described, that both sets are released from the shackle by the direct action of the key lifting the several tumblers of each set, in the usual manner of actuating tumblers, by a key, and without the employment of other intervening mechanism, between the key and either end of the shackle, than the tumbler-catches, which are each so constructed and so arranged and adapted to each other in the combination as to perform the function of a catch or bolt, a tumbler, and a detector, the whole performing the office, and affording the security of a double series of tumbler catches. The second part of my invention" (which is the part claimed to have been infringed) "consists in providing against the release of the tumbler-catches from the heel of the shackle by the action of a key, other than the proper key or a duplicate thereof, by the relative arrangement of the grooves g, in the dogs or tumbler catches a, with the pins of flanges b on the part d, projecting from the heel of the shackle, whereby they act in combination with each other as guards or detectors against attempts to open the lock with a key or other instrument which will move the tumblers a to a greater or less distance than the proper key." The second claim is as follows: "I claim in combination, the grooves g, in the dogs a, and the flanges or pins on the projecting part of the heel of the shackle, substantially as and for the purpose described."

If the second claim is for a combination of gated tumblers, called grooves in the patent, which must be moved to a definite distance before the lock can be unlocked, with a stump or projection mounted upon the heel of a shackle, extending below the point of suspension of the shackle, on the opposite side of the pivot from the nose, these parts being so arranged that the ends of the tumblers nearest the stump are in such location, with respect to the stump on the heel, that the parts of the tumblers in which there are no gates will directly resist any attempt to open the shackle until the tumblers are so moved that the gates come directly opposite the stump, then the defendants infringe. In other words, if the plaintiff's patent is broad enough to include any projection upon the heel of a shackle, extending downward below the pin on which the shackle vibrates, and acting in combination with grooved or slotted tumblers, so as to enter the slots of the tumblers when the tumblers are acted upon by the proper key, then it includes the defendants' lock.

But I think that the second claim of the plaintiff's patent is for the particular mechanism therein specified. Padlocks, locking either with single or double acting tumblers or levers or slides, and locking either at the heel or nose of the shackle, or by means of a stump or projection extending from the heel engaging with gated tumblers (the term "heel" including that portion of the shackle which is at all times within the case), are old, and, so far as the principle of operation is concerned, it is not material to which part of the bolt or shackle, within the case, the tumbler is applied. In the present state of lock-making an inventor can hardly obtain an exclusive right to the location of his mechanism upon any particular part of the bolt or shackle.

The invention of the plaintiff's assignor, which is mentioned in the second claim, did not consist in placing a stump or pin upon an extension of the heel of the shackle below the point of suspension of the shackle upon its pivot, but it consisted in the manner of the construction of the flanges or pins upon the projection which together answered the purposes of a stump, and in the manner in which it engaged with the tumblers. This invention was one of narrow limits. His padlock had two parallel plates having grooves upon their inner and opposed faces or slots, and a projection extending below the pivot on the heel of the shackle, on which were flanges or pins, which, bearing against the ends of the plates or tumblers, prevented the shackle from being turned until the tumblers were so turned by the key that the flanges or pins were in opposition to the grooves or slots, when the shackle could be turned, the end of the projection passing between the plates, as the grooves or slots received the flanges or pins.

The lock of the defendants, as shown in their patent, has a long curved L-shaped arm extending from the heel of the shackle below the point of suspension of the shackle upon its pivot. A key, inserted in the key-hole which opens in the bottom of the case, is brought to bear upon a set of slotted loosely-pivoted tumblers resting upon each other, raising them until their slots come into line with each other and directly opposite the end of the arm of the shackle which had rested against the shoulders of the tumblers, and is then caused to enter the slots. There is no infringement. Let the bill be dismissed.

SALE — AGREEMENT TO RESCIND — REDELIVERY — MITIGATION OF DAMAGES — REPRESENTATIONS — QUALITY.

1. Where a sale is made of goods and they are delivered, and an agreement is afterwards made to rescind the contract, the contract is not completely rescinded until a re-delivery of the goods.

2. In an action for goods sold, the defendant may give in evidence, in mitigation of the damages, that the goods were of a quality inferior to what they were represented to be at the sale.

[Cited in Harrington v. Stratton, 22 Pick. 512. Cited in brief in Hyatt v. Boyle, 5 Gill & J. 118.]

Assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. Plea, the general issue. At the trial it was proved, that the defendant [Caleb Smith] in March last purchased of Messrs. Athearn and Williams, commission merchants of Boston, who were the consignees and agents of the plaintiff, 100 kegs of Miller's No. 3 tobacco, at eleven and a half cents per pound, at six months' credit, amounting in the whole to $795.80; under an express representation, that the tobacco was as good as Messrs. Athearn and Williams had before sold to the defendant of Miller's No. 3 tobacco, and as good as the defendant had previously bought of a Mr. Reed. The tobacco was delivered accordingly; and sometime afterwards the defendant complained, that the quality of the tobacco was greatly inferior to what it was represented to be. Messrs. Athearn and Williams, upon this complaint, being satisfied, that the tobacco was not as good as they supposed it to be, and as they had represented it to be, offered to take it back again, which offer was accepted by the defendant. But before the actual return, Messrs. Athearn and Williams, having communicated the facts to the plaintiff [Hugh R. Miller], the latter utterly refused to rescind the bargain or receive the tobacco back again, upon the ground that No. 3 tobacco was always known to be of the most inferior quality, and never sold under a warranty. The defendant sent the tobacco to Boston, but Messrs. Athearn and Williams, under the orders of their principal, refused to receive it; and it was then sold at public auction by the defendant for the benefit of whomsoever it might concern, and the nett sales amounted to $405.69. The defendant at the trial insisted upon two points. 1st. That the original contract of sale was rescinded, and therefore the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in an action for goods sold and delivered. 2dly. That if the sale was a subsisting contract, still the plaintiff was not entitled to recover more than the price, at which the tobacco sold at auction. The plaintiff on the other hand insisted, 1st. That the contract of sale never was rescinded. 2dly. That in this action the plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price of the tobacco without any deduction; and, that if the defendant was entitled to any allowance for the supposed misrepresentation, it must be sought in a cross action, founded upon the original representation.

G. Sullivan, for plaintiff.
Webster & Curtis, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. There is no pretence in this case, that the representation was fraudulent. It was made, as all parties agree, innocently, under a misapprehension of the state of the tobacco, which had not been examined by the consignees. I think, that the consignees had authority to make the representation, and that the plaintiff is bound by it. When the plaintiff sent the tobacco to the consignees for sale, there was an implied authority to represent the article to be, what it was marked and described to be. The representation of the consignees went no farther than this, that the tobacco was as good as Miller's No. 3 had previously been. Now, in point of fact, the tobacco was very inferior in quality to what Miller's No. 3 usually was. And certainly if that be so, the defendant has sustained an injury by the misrepresentation, and he is entitled to a recompense, however innocently it may have been made.

As to the points of law raised in the case, I am clearly of opinion, that the contract was not rescinded. There was an agreement to rescind, which was never carried into effect, but was stopped by the plaintiff's interference; and as the tobacco was never received back, the original contract remained valid. To constitute an actual rescission of the contract, there should have been a re-delivery of the goods. Until that is done, the agreement to rescind is in fieri.

The other point presents no pressing difficulty. Where goods are sold as of a certain quality, and they turn out to be of an inferior quality, the defendant may, in an action for goods sold and delivered, give the facts in evidence to reduce the damages; for the plaintiff is entitled to recover no more than the real value of his goods. The authorities directly support this doctrine; and there is neither reason nor justice in straining after technical objections to overthrow it. Vide Crowninshield v. Robinson [Case No. 3,451]. The auction sale is not, however, conclusive upon the plaintiff, as to the value of the tobacco. The true rule for the jury is, to deduct from the original price the real difference in value between this and the common Miller's No. 3 tobacco; and in making their estimate, they will weigh all the evidence, and give the plaintiff, what is his just due, making all deductions.

Verdict for the plaintiff, $596.85.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — BOND — INTERLINEATION —CONSENT—KNOWLEDGE—RELEASE.

1. Debt on bond given by the defendant and others to the plaintiff, as collector of direct taxes and internal duties.

2. A surety cannot at law or in equity be bound further than by the very terms of his contract, and if the principal and the obligee change the terms of it without his consent, the surety is discharged.

[Cited in brief in Field v. Brokaw, 148 Ill. 658, 37 N. E. 80. Cited in Hunt v. Smith, 17 Wend. 180: Palmer v. Yarrington, 1 Ohio St. 260; Bank of Steubenville v. Carrol, 5 Ohio, 215. Distinguished in Dunham v. Downer, 31 Vt. 259.]

3. Where an interlineation had been made in a bond after its execution, without the knowledge of the surety, by which additional duties were to be performed by the collector, the surety could not be held responsible for those duties, stated in the bond before the interlineation; and the bond was entirely void.

[This was an action by Ephraim Miller against Thomas Stewart.]

Before WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, and PENNINGTON, District Judge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court upon demurrers to the fourth and fifth pleas. The declaration is upon a bond executed by the defendant and others to the plaintiff, collector of the direct taxes and internal duties for the fifth collection district of New Jersey. The condition recites, that the plaintiff, collector as aforesaid, hath, by virtue of authority vested in him by the laws of the United States, appointed S. C. Ustick (one of the obligors) deputy collector of direct taxes and internal duties in the fifth collection district of New Jersey, for the townships of Nottingham, Chesterfield, Mansfield, Springfield, New Hanover, Washington, Little Egg Harbour, and Burlington, in the county of Burlington, and then proceeds, "that if the aforesaid Ustick has discharged, and shall continue truly and faithfully to discharge the duties of said appointment, according to law, and shall faithfully collect and pay according to law all moneys assessed upon the said townships, then, &c." This bond bears date the 4th of January, 1814, and the breach in the declaration is, "that after the making of the bond, to wit, on the 31st of December, 1817, the said Ustick, as deputy collector aforesaid, collected of internal duties and taxes assessed on the several townships in the condition aforementioned, the sum of $2595; which said sum, on the day and year last mentioned, according to law, and the condition aforesaid, ought to have been paid to the plaintiff, but which is still in arrear and unpaid, contrary, &c."

The fourth plea to this declaration, after admitting the appointment of the said Ustick, under the hand and seal of the plaintiff, to be deputy collector as set forth in the condition of the bond, and that the defendant, at the request of the said Ustick, did, as one of his sureties, execute the said bond, proceeds to state that the plaintiff, after the execution of the said appointment, so as aforesaid made, of the said Ustick, and after the execution of the said bond, viz. on the same day, and before the said Ustick had acted under the same, did, with the assent of the said Ustick, alter the said appointment so as aforesaid made, by inserting or causing to be interlined therein, "Willingborough," making it by such interlineation, an appointment for the said township of Willingborough, in the county of Burlington aforesaid, which interlineation and change was made without the knowledge, privity, or consent of the said defendant; and further, that the said Ustick did accept to act and account under the said appointment so altered, and hath continually ever since so acted and accounted as the plaintiff's deputy for the said township of Willingborough, and the eight townships mentioned in the condition of the said bond, under the said altered or new appointment, for which cause, &c. the defendant is discharged from any liability, &c.

The fifth plea, after admitting, as in the fourth plea, and also that Ustick might, on the 31st of December, 1817, have been in arrears for collections made by him to the amount stated in the declaration, proceeds to state, that at the time of the appointment so as aforesaid made, and until the said 31st of December, 1817, it was by law required of the said Ustick to transmit to the plaintiff, at the expiration of every month after he commenced his collections, a statement of the collections by him made during the month, and to pay over quarterly the moneys by him collected, and to complete the collection of all sums assigned to him for collection, pay over the same, and render his final account to the plaintiff, within six months from the time he received the collection lists, and in failure of his so doing, the plaintiff was by law empowered to remove said Ustick from his said office, and immediately to sue for and recover the arrearages for which he was liable. The plea then proceeds to state that though Ustick did not, at any time, from the said 4th of January, 1814, account and pay over in the manner prescribed by law, yet the plaintiff did not remove him from his said office, nor prosecute him for his defaults, and for the arrearages due from him, nor give notice to the defendant of such his defaults, but fraudulently and negligently, and in violation of his duty, permitted him to continue in office, and during all the time to the commencement of this suit, the plaintiff did fraudulently and unlawfully conceal from the defendant the defaults of said Ustick, and his being so in arrear. The plea then alleges the insolvency of Ustick and the other sureties, and concludes, by reason of all which, &c. the said defendant is discharged.

The question which arises upon the fourth plea is, whether the alteration made in the appointment of Ustick, after the execution of the bond, and without the knowledge or consent of the defendant, discharges him from his obligation? The ground work of this plea is, not that the obligation on which this action is brought, ceased to be the deed of the defendant, because of the alteration made in the appointment of Ustick; but that the contract of guarantee into which the defendant had entered, having been changed by the obligee and the principal in the bond without his consent, he is, by such change, discharged from his obligation for the official conduct of the principal.

No principle of law is better settled at this day, than that a surety cannot, either at law or in equity, be bound farther than he is so by the very terms of his undertaking, and that if the parties to the original contract think proper to change the terms of such contract without the consent of the surety, (which unquestionably they have a right to do) the surety is discharged. The reason of this rule is obvious. The surety is not bound by the contract as it was entered into by him, because that contract, being afterwards altered by the principal parties to it, it is no longer the same, but a different contract, for the performance of which the surety came under no obligation. Neither is he bound by the contract in its altered form, because he is no party to it. It cannot be split into parts, without the consent of the surety, so as to be his contract to a certain extent, and not his contract for the residue of it. Neither is it of any consequence that the alteration in the contract is trivial, nor even that it is for the advantage of the surety. For if the obligee, by a subsequent agreement with his debtor, the principal obligor, agree with him to enlarge the time stipulated in the bond for payment or performance, even for a day, and upon the terms of the principal paying off a part of the debt immediately, or giving additional security, both of which considerations are manifestly advantageous to the surety by diminishing his responsibility; still, if such agreement receive not the sanction of the surety, he is discharged upon the ground that the terms of the contract to which he was bound, being changed without his consent, it is a different contract from that which he engaged to guaranty, and consequently not his contract. "Non haec in foedera veni," is an answer in the mouth of surety; from which the obligee can never extricate his case, however innocently, and by whatever kind intentions to all parties he may have been actuated.

With these principles in view, I come to their application to the present case; and the main inquiry must be into the legal effect of the interlineation stated in this plea, and acknowledged by the demurrer to have been made without the consent of the defendant. The appointment of Ustick was incorporated into, and became part of the condition of this bond. Ustick is there stated to be a deputy collector, duly appointed by the collector and obligee, for eight townships distinctly described; and the defendant undertook that the said Ustick should faithfully discharge the duties of his said appointment according to law and should faithfully collect and pay, according to law, all moneys assessed upon those townships. The contract, then, in effect, was, that the defendant should guaranty the good conduct of an officer, then clothed with powers and duties defined and circumscribed within a specified sphere, in which he might legitimately act as such officer. The principal parties to that contract afterwards agreed to enlarge the sphere of action of that officer, and to change the appointment recited in the condition of the bond, in such manner as to constitute him a deputy collector for nine townships; and this was effected by an interlineation in the original appointment. It is true that the same individual may be a collector for eight townships, and also for an additional township; but is he the same officer? I think not. His official designation, his duties and his responsibilities are different in the two appointments. If the plaintiff, before or after the execution of this bond, had appointed Ustick his deputy for as many other townships as he thought proper, the defendant could raise no objection on that ground to invalidate his obligation, because such appointments formed no part of his contract, and Ustick would have been not less the officer to which that contract referred. But when he ceases to be the same officer as the condition of the bond designated him, by a change of the instrument of appointment to which that bond refers, and all that without the consent of the surety; how can it be contended that the contract continues to be the same that it was at the time it was entered into? If Ustick had been appointed by a separate instrument a deputy collector for the ninth township, it must be admitted that he would have held two distinct offices; and the collector might well have required of him new securities, on account of his new office. The only difference between this case and the one supposed is, that in the former he has but one instrument and appointment, and in the latter he would have two; but this only shows that his character is essentially changed by the alteration made in the original appointment.

There is another view of this question which still remains to be taken. The law of the United States requires that the deputy collector should be appointed by an instrument under the hand and seal of the collector, and it sufficiently appears by the pleadings in this case, that Ustick was so appointed. What is the legal effect of the alteration made in the original appointment which the deputy collector afterwards accepted and acted under? It amounted, I think, to a surrender of the first appointment, and the making and delivery of a new deed of appointment. It is laid down in Co. Litt. 232, that if the feoffee grant the deed to the feoffor, though by parol, such grant is good, and that both the deed and property belong to the feoffor. In the case of Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 103, it was decided that a re-acknowledged deed is good, and takes effect from the time of the re-acknowledgment; that the estate was vested in the grantee whilst he held the deed, the evidence of his title; but that when he surrendered the deed to the grantor, his legal estate ceased, and the grantor was at liberty to grant the same to him, or to any other person, and that he might either destroy the deed and make a new one, or, by re-delivering it, give it force as a new deed from that time. A deed once executed and delivered cannot be altered by the grantor, and yet retain its validity, except upon the supposition of its having been surrendered by the grantee to the grantor and of a new delivery after the alteration has been made. But the surrender and re-delivery of the deed, and more especially if the terms of it have been changed by consent of the parties to it, constitutes it to all intents and purposes a new deed. If this be so, it is then most clear that the contract of the defendant as surety for Ustick, under the appointment recited in the condition of his bond, had nothing to operate upon, after that appointment was changed.

It has been contended by the plaintiff's counsel, that no inconvenience can result to the defendant by the change made in the appointment of Ustick, because the declaration confines the plaintiff's demand to the taxes and duties collected by him in the eight townships to which he was originally appointed. This argument is specious and has the imposing appearance of a compromise fairly offered, to get rid of a legal objection to the plaintiff's demand. But it affords no answer to that objection, which is, that the defendant's contract has been changed without his consent, and that he ceases to be bound by it. If the defendant had become surety for the performance, by Ustick, of certain articles of agreement, and those parties had afterwards thought proper to strike out some of the articles, or to add others; it would be no answer to the defendant's plea that the contract was not the same of which he had guarantied the performance, to say that the breaches laid in the declaration were confined to the original articles.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the fourth plea is a legal bar to the plaintiff's demand, and that the demurrer must be overruled. It is unnecessary to give any opinion on the fifth plea.

PENNINGTON, District Judge. I am perfectly satisfied that the justice of this case is with the plaintiff; I must therefore require some strong authority to induce me to sweep his right from under him. There are some contradictory sayings in the books respecting the effect of alterations in deeds; (but the best authorities lay it down, that an alteration in a deed by the consent of the parties does not destroy it, even if the alteration is in a material part.) 4 Com. Dig. 169, tit. "Fact," and Woolley v. Constant, 4 Johns. 54. Mr. Justice Thompson, in delivering his opinion in this last case, cites a case from Moore, K. B. 547, to this effect, viz. a bond was given containing a recital of a former bond or recognizance, against which the one in question was taken by way of indemnity. The former bond was recited with a blank for the Christian name and addition of the obligee, and this blank was afterwards filled up. In a suit on the bond of indemnity this matter was specially pleaded, and the plaintiff replied that the blank was filled up by the assent of the obligor, and on demurrer judgment was given for the plaintiff. This, and the case of Woolley v. Constant, in point of principle, are the same as the case under consideration. The instrument appointing Ustick a deputy, is not void by the alteration. As to its having been surrendered and re-delivered, as suggested by one of the counsel for the defendant, it appears to me not to be founded in fact; the plea does not say so, and I cannot think myself called upon to presume it. If the alteration affected the rights of the defendant, or increased his responsibility, it would alter the case; but his liability is not increased; he stands in the precise situation as if no alteration had been made; and it appears to me that he comes with an ill grace, to lay hold of an indulgence given to his friend, as the means of shaking off a solemn responsibility which he had voluntarily put himself under to benefit him. If sureties are favoured, they are not discharged from their legal obligations. I confess that it gives me pain, to differ in opinion with the learned judge presiding in this court; but I am bound to deliver such an opinion as my conscience and judgment point out to me. I must therefore say that I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment.

Judge PENNINGTON having dissented, and the court being divided in opinion, the case was adjourned to the supreme court.

The certificate of the supreme court was in favour of the defendant. 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 680.

MILLER v. SULLIVAN.

GUARDIAN AND WARD—NEBRASKA—SPECIAL STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—GUARDIAN'S SALES.

1. The legislation of the state of Nebraska, as respects sales of real estate by guardians, considered, and the principles of Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319, adopted and applied.

2. The special five years statute of limitations for the protection of the rights of a purchaser of land at a guardian's sale, is available to the holder of the title thus acquired, even though the sale by the guardian might not be good if it had been attacked within the five years.

[Cited in Seward v. Didier, 16 Neb. 64, 20 N. W. 12.]

There is no controversy over the chain of title of the plaintiff [Mary F. Miller], it being from the United States to Touisant Kenseller—a half-breed Indian—from him to William Miller, and from Miller to the plaintiff. The title of the defendant [Julia Sullivan] is one acquired by virtue of proceedings had in the probate court of Richardson county, Nebraska, upon application of the guardian of the patentee, who was a minor. The material questions in the case relate to the validity of the guardian's sale of the land, and the effect of the five years statute of limitations in respect of such sales. The records of the probate court, at and before the time when the sale was made by the guardian, were loosely and imperfectly kept. The then probate judge testifies that the county furnished him no record books, and he kept the appointments, orders, and proceedings in his court on sheets, put away in envelopes. The original appointment of the guardian, and that he took the oath required by law, appear on the files of the probate court, and by recitals in the license of February 10th, 1862. The bond required of a guardian on his appointment, was given and approved, and is still extant, and is substantially in the form required by law. The petition of the guardian, in 1864, to sell the land now in controversy, duly sworn to, and containing all the essential requirements of the statute, is still on the files of the probate court. A bond of the guardian, not dated, and not appearing to be approved, reciting the license to sell, is also on the files of that court. No report of sale, under the petition and license of 1864, is on file in the probate court. The then probate judge testified that the bond was approved; that the sale by the guardian was reported to and approved by him, and that the land sold for its full value. The guardian's deed, dated January 10th, 1865, recites a sale of the land in controversy, September 5th, 1864, after notice in a public newspaper. The guardian was the father of the ward. No notice of the application of the guardian for license to sell was served upon the father, he being the guardian and next of kin, or on the minor, nor upon any other person; but the aunts of the minor, who seem to have been supposed to be his next of kin, or part of his next of kin, were of age, and authorized an attorney to appear for them, and he did so appear in the probate court, and "waived notice to bring in the next of kin." The statute then in force on the subject of guardian sales (section 7), required "that, upon the presentation of this petition (to sell), the court shall thereupon make an order, directing the next of kin of the ward, and all persons interested in the estate, to appear," etc. Section 8 provided: "A copy of such order shall be personally served on the next of kin of such ward, and all persons interested in the estate. * * *" In section 42 of the succeeding chapter, the legislature uses this language: "All those who are next of kin, and heirs, apparent or presumptive, of the ward, shall be considered as interested in the estate." When personal notice of the time and place is required to be given, they (the next of kin and heirs apparent) shall be notified as persons interested, according to the provisions respecting similar sales by executors and administrators, which provisions are that it must be personally, by publication, or assented to in writing, by "all persons interested in the estate." Section 23 of the guardian's act under consideration, provides that the sale shall not be avoided on account of irregularity in the proceedings: provided, it shall appear (1) that a guardian was licensed to make the sale by a probate judge of competent jurisdiction; (2) that he gave bond; (3) that he took the oath; (4) that he gave notice of the time and place of sale, as prescribed by law; (5) that the premises were sold, accordingly, at public auction, and are held by one who purchased in good faith. The statute of Nebraska also provides: "No action for the recovery of any real estate sold by a guardian * * * shall be maintained by the ward, or by any person claiming under him, unless it be commenced within five years after the termination of the guardianship, excepting," etc. Territorial Laws Neb. 1861, p. 68, § 22; Gen. St. Neb. p. 287, § 63. The land in question was purchased at the guardian's sale in good faith, and the defendant and those under whom he claims have been in actual possession of it ever since. It was unimproved when sold by the guardian, and has been improved by the purchaser from the guardian. This suit was not brought within five years after the minor attained his majority, which, of course, terminated his guardianship. A jury was waived, and the cause was submitted to the court upon evidence which showed the foregoing facts.

Mr. Ambrose, for plaintiff.

Mr. Manderson and Mr. Martin, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This case presents questions of great importance. I have considered them deliberately, but shall dispose of them briefly.

The statute of Nebraska did not require notice of the application of the guardian for license to sell to be served upon the minor or ward, but only "on the next of kin, and all persons interested in the estate."

If we consider as proved the facts testified to by the probate judge in connection with what is shown by the records of the probate court, the most serious defect alleged to exist in the sale arises out of the want of service of notice upon the next of kin and others interested in the estate. The guardian was duly appointed, took the required oath, gave bond, filed a petition to sell; the aunts of the minor authorized an attorney to appear for them and waive notice, which he did; a license to sell was granted, a bond was given and approved, and a sale was made in good faith and confirmed, and a guardian's deed executed and possession taken under the sale, and maintained ever since.

Guided by the views of the supreme court of the United States, I doubt very much whether, under the Nebraska statute, the application of a guardian for a license to sell should be regarded as an adversary proceeding as against the "next of kin and all persons interested in the estate" of the ward. Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319; Thompson v. Tolmie, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 157; Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 303; Good v. Norley, 28 Iowa, 188, and cases cited on page 208. The supreme court of Nebraska has never held otherwise upon this statute. But whatever may be the true view on this point, I am of the opinion that the five years limitation provided by the statute of Nebraska, in respect of sales by guardians, will protect the sale in question. The sale was made by a guardian duly appointed, and who duly qualified; a petition for a sale was presented and granted; a bond was given; the sale was made at public auction after the prescribed notice had been published. If the father was the next of kin, he of course had notice, being the guardian, and the aunts of the minor authorized an attorney to appear for them, and he did so appear and waive notice. Possession was taken under the sale, and more than five years elapsed after the minor attained his majority before this suit was brought. I am of opinion that the five years limitation statute applies to such a sale and protects the purchaser.

Such a purchaser can avail himself of the bar afforded by the statute, without showing a sale which would have been valid if it had been attacked within the five years. Holmes v. Beal, 9 Cush. 223; Norton v. Norton, 5 Cush. 524; Arnold v. Sabin, 1 Cush. 525; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 627; Howard v. Moore, 2 Mich. 226; Coon v. Fry, 6 Mich. 506; Pursley v. Hayes, 22 Iowa, 35; Good v. Norley, 28 Iowa, 188; Boyles v. Boyles, 37 Iowa, 592; Dolton v. Nelson [Case No. 3,976].

I stand by my opinion in Good v. Norley, 28 Iowa, 188, 206. The case might be different—I do not say it would be—if no possession had been taken and maintained under the purchase for more than five years after the termination of the guardianship. It might be different if one had assumed to make a sale as guardian, who had never been appointed guardian or licensed to make the sale. But we need not consider such supposed cases.

Upon the actual case before us, we think the statutory bar is effectual, and that the defendant is entitled to judgment. This is a wise statute, doubly wise in a new country, for reasons which fully appear in this case. It would be robbed of its virtue if it was confined to cases where the sale was valid, for such sales do not need the protection of such a statute. "They that are whole need no physician." Judgment for the defendant.

MILLER v. WASHINGTON.

[2 Hayw. & H. 241.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 16, 1857.

CONSTRUCTION OF CITY CHARTER—DEFINITION OF "OCCUR," "HAPPEN"—APPOINTMENT DURING RECESS OF BOARD OF ALDERMEN.

1. There is no difference in the meaning of the word "occur" in the charter of the city of Washington and the word "happen" in the constitution of the United States.

2. The clause in the charter of the city of Washington, referring to the nominations to be made by the mayor, and confirmed by the board of aldermen, was modeled after the constitution of the United States, and was intended to accomplish the same object.

3. A party rejected by the board of aldermen, on the mayor's nomination, cannot be reappointed by the mayor in the recess of the same board, to the same office from which he was rejected by the board.

This was an action of debt [by Aaron W. Miller against the mayor, etc., of Washington] on the following bill:

"Corporation of Washington. To A. W. Miller, M. D., Dr. For 5 months service as physician to Washington City Asylum and Small-Pox Hospital, from July 1st to November 30th, inclusive, at $50.00 per month. $250.

"Washington City, Dec. 15, 1856."

The plaintiff is one of the officers appointed by the present mayor (M. B. Magruder) after rejection by the board of aldermen, and now claims compensation for his services as physician to the alms house, at the rate fixed by law, during the period he has rendered such services, under temporary appointment by the mayor, "to expire at the end of the next ensuing session of the board of aldermen." (The corporation attorney, Mr. Carlisle, having given an opinion to the board of aldermen, affirming the power of the mayor to reappoint temporarily under such circumstances.)

W. H. Davidge, for plaintiff.

J. M. Carlisle, for the corporation.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge. By the case agreed it appears that the plaintiff was duly appointed physician of the city asylum and hospital by the mayor of Washington, which appointment was so made to fill a vacancy occurring in the recess of the board of aldermen; that the plaintiff qualified according to law, and discharged the duties legally appertaining to that office; that at the ensuing session of the board of aldermen, the plaintiff was nominated by the mayor to the board of aldermen for said office, to which nomination the board refused to consent, by which I understand, and it is admitted in the argument of the case agreed, he was rejected by the board of aldermen; that from time to time after the adjournment of said board sine die, and to the day of meeting regularly fixed by law, the plaintiff has been reappointed and has from time to time duly qualified, and at each meeting of the board (that is to say, separate and distinct sessions as fixed by law) has been nominated, but said nomination has not been consented to, (that is to say, has been rejected by the board of aldermen;) and there is due the plaintiff, who has faithfully discharged the duties of said office, the amount claimed in the account filed, if the mayor had the right from time to time to so appoint as aforesaid. It is further agreed, that any ordinance of the corporation touching the subject-matter of this suit shall be considered as making a part of the case agreed, and may be read in evidence at the hearing. The charter of 1820, which rules this case, (the charter of 1848 making certain officers elective by the people, not applying to this officer) in its second section says: "He (the mayor) shall nominate, and with the consent of the board of aldermen, appoint to all offices under the corporation (except commissioners of election) and may remove any such officer from office at his will and pleasure. He shall appoint persons to fill up all vacancies, which may occur during the recess of the board of aldermen, to hold such appointment until the end of their ensuing session." And in the fourth section of the same charter of 1820: "And each board shall meet at the council chamber on the second Monday of June next, for the dispatch of business, at 10 o'clock in the morning, and at the same hour on the second Monday of June in every year thereafter, and at such other time as the two boards may by law direct." The two boards, therefore, by their own ordinance, were, under this charter enabled, besides the annual session, to appoint and fix as many other sessions as they saw fit, and as the public interests required, and they exercised this power in the passage of the ordinance of the 3d of June, 1853 (see section 4). This 4th section makes in addition to the 2d Monday of June, each and every Monday from the 4th Monday in June to the last Monday in May, inclusive, the beginning of a distinct stated session. That is, therefore, a recess, in the meaning of the charter of 1820, between the stated sessions from Monday to Monday, whenever the board adjourns sine die, leaving the time of its reassembling to be as prescribed by ordinance.

The counsel for the plaintiff claim that the acts of the mayor, set forth in the case agreed, in continuing to reappoint the plaintiff to the office he now fills, after repeated rejections by the board of aldermen, are lawful exercises of power by the mayor under the city charter, and that the plaintiff is entitled to the salary appertaining to the office by law; that a vacancy having occurred in the recess of the board of aldermen, the first appointment was covered by the authority in the charter; that this first appointment, and the commission issued to the plaintiff, conferred on him the office to the end of the then next ensuing session of the board of aldermen; that his nomination by the mayor and rejection by the board of aldermen at that session did not terminate his office, but that it continued till the end of said session, and that when the board adjourned without day for that session a new vacancy occurred, which the mayor had authority to fill, and so on, session after session, under like circumstances, during the pleasure of the mayor. It is plain, if this is the true construction of the city charter, there is no check in the board of aldermen on the mayor's power of appointment to office. They hold their control by sufferance only, and at the mayor's will. It is said the enactment in the city charter herein cited is in substance the same with the provision in the constitution of the United States, on the same subject of appointments to office, and that several attorney generals of the United States have asserted doctrines, in construing the federal constitution, in harmony with the pretensions of the plaintiff in this case. Const. U. S. art. 2, sec. 2. The only difference in the two provisions, as to filling vacancies, is that in the city charter the power is to fill vacancies which may "occur" in the recess, and in the constitution of the United States, to fill the vacancies which may "happen" in the recess. In both the appointments are to continue till the end of the next session. There may be a difference in the meaning of the words "occur" and "happen," but I shall indulge in no verbal criticism, but treat the two provisions as in substance the same. I do not doubt that the city charter in this particular was modelled after the constitution of the United States, and was intended to accomplish, as to office, the same objects. Upon a careful examination of the opinions of the attorney generals, Mr. Wirt, Mr. Taney, Mr. Legare and Mr. Mason, it will be found they do not warrant the pretentions of the plaintiff. The case before Mr. Wirt, October 22d, 1823, was this: General Swartwout's commission as navy agent at New York, expired during the session of the senate. The president's nomination of another person at the same session of the senate, to fill that vacancy was not acted upon, and the senate adjourned, leaving the office vacant. The question before him was the power of the president under such circumstances to fill it.

Mr. Wirt says: 1 Op. Atty. Gen. 631: "Had the vacancy first occurred during the recess of the senate, no doubt would have arisen as to the president's power to fill it. The doubt arises from the circumstance of its having first occurred during the session of the senate. But the expression used by the constitution is 'happen;' all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the senate. The most natural sense of this term is 'to chance, to fall out, to make place by accident.' But the expression seems not perfectly clear. It may mean 'happen to take place;' that is, 'to originate' under which sense the president would not have the power to fill the vacancy. It may mean, also, without violence to the sense, 'happen to exist;' under which sense the president would have the right to fill it by his temporary commission. Which of these two senses is to be preferred? The first seems to me most accordant with the letter of the constitution; the second, most accordant with its reason and spirit." He adopts the latter as most consistent with the spirit of the constitution, and resulting from the necessity of keeping the offices of the government filled. Again he says (page 632): "Put the case of a vacancy occurring in an office held in a distant part of the country on the last day of the senate's session; before the vacancy is made known to the president the senate rises. The office may be an important one; the vacancy may paralyze a whole line of action in some essential branch of our internal police; the public interests may imperiously demand that it shall be immediately filled; but the vacancy may happen to occur during the session of the senate, and if the president's power is to be limited to such vacancies only, as in the case put, must continue, however ruinous the consequences may be to the public. Cases of this character might be easily multiplied; and it would seem to me highly desirable to avoid a construction which would produce effects so extensively pernicious, if it can be done with a just respect to the language of the constitution. Now, if we interpret the word 'happen' as being merely equivalent to 'happen to exist' (as I think we may legitimately do) then all vacancies which, from any casualty, happen to exist at a time when the senate cannot be consulted as to filling them, may be temporarily filled by the president; and the whole purpose of the constitution is completely accomplished. The casualty which has prevented the co-operation of the senate may be such as in the case hypothetically stated above. It may arise from various other causes; the falling of the building in which they hold their sessions; a sudden and destructive pestilence disabling or destroying a quorum of that body; such an invasion of the enemy as renders their reassembling elsewhere impracticable or inexpedient; and a thousand other causes which cannot be foreseen. It may arise, too, from their rejecting a nomination by the president in the last hour of their session, and inadvertently rising before a renomination can be made. In all these cases there is no guilt, either on the part of the senate or the president; but, by some casualty, the vacancy happens to continue and to exist in the recess; and the public good, nay even the safety of the nation, may require it to be filled."

Mr. Wirt affirmed the power of the president to fill the vacancy in the recess of the senate. The facts in Gwinn's Case, 2 Op. Atty. Gen. 525. July 19, 1832, are thus stated by him: "After the adjournment of congress, on the 3rd of March, 1831, and before their meeting in December of the same year, a vacancy occurred in the above named office of register, and Sam'l Gwinn was appointed to fill it. During the late session of congress he was regularly nominated to the senate, and rejected by them. The president having afterwards received strong testimonials in his favor from the state of Mississippi, and being requested by one of the senators from that state to renominate him, his name was again sent to the senate, with the additional recommendations which had been forwarded to the president. The second nomination was made on the 11th of June, last. It was considered on the 10th of July, and laid on the table. And on the 16th of July, the last day of the session, the following resolution was moved and considered: 'Resolved, that the president of the United States be informed that it is not the intention of the senate to take any proceeding on the renomination of Sam'l Gwinn, to be register of the land office at Mount Salus, in Mississippi, during the present session.' This resolution was ordered to lie on the table; and the senate adjourned without taking any further order in the matter. In this state of things, can the president, during the recess, appoint Mr. Gwinn, or any one else to the office before mentioned?"

Mr. Taney adopted Mr. Wirt's interpretation of the constitution as to vacancies happening to exist in the recess, and decided that the president could fill the vacancy. In the course of his opinion he says (page 528): "It was intended to provide for those vacancies which might arise from accident, and the contingencies to which human affairs must always be liable. And if it falls out that, from death, inadvertence, or mistake, an office required by law to be filled is, in the recess, found to be vacant, then a vacancy has happened during the recess, and the president may fill it. This appears to be the common sense and natural import of the words used. They mean the same thing as if the constitution had said, 'If there happen to be any vacancies during the recess.' The framers of the constitution had provided for filling the offices, with the concurrence of the senate; but, foreseeing that, from the various casualties to which human concerns are exposed, vacancies would be found during the recess, they give power to fill them, until an opportunity can be afforded of bringing the appointments before the senate; and they use words which denote the character of the vacancies which they foresee may occur, and for which they are providing. He may fill up vacancies which 'happen' during the recess. But vacancies are not designedly to be kept open by the president until the recess, for the purpose of avoiding the control of the senate. And the word 'happen' is used to describe the class and kind of vacancies, and not the particular time at which they took place. I might suggest another case, showing that the restricted construction contended for, cannot be the one contemplated by the framers of the constitution. Suppose a nomination made to a vacant office, and confirmed by the senate; the office is not filled until the person appointed accepts. Suppose he refuses to accept, and his refusal is not known until after the adjournment; in such a case, the original vacancy would remain unfilled; and as it took place during the session, and not after the adjournment, the president could not fill it. It cannot be imagined that such cases were intended to be excepted out of the power granted to him. It has been said that this power, if possessed by the president, may be so used as to defeat the intention of the constitution, and exclude the senate from all share in appointments. The answer to such an objection appears to be a plain one. If the president willfully abuses a power given to him, the constitution has a remedy. In this case the senate have had a full opportunity of acting, but have not acted, and have held the nomination under advisement, and left it to fall vacant as soon as they adjourned. They must be supposed to have had sufficient reasons for keeping the nomination in their power, and suspending their action upon it. The president could not nominate another person for the same office until this was disposed of, and was either withdrawn by him or finally acted on by the senate. And as the senate have had an opportunity of acting, but have determined to suspend their decision, I cannot see how an appointment now made by the president can be supposed to interfere with the rights of the senate. There is nothing in the case that can be construed into a desire to avoid their constitutional control." Can it be truly said in this case, after the repeated rejections and re-appointments of the same individual by the mayor of Washington, there was no desire to interfere with the rights of the aldermen, or to avoid the control secured to them in the city charter?

The case before Mr. Legare, Oct. 22, 1841, as assumed by him was (3 Op. Atty. Gen. 674): "A vacancy having occurred during a recess, the president had filled it up by a temporary appointment under the clause of the constitution in question; then after the meeting of the senate he made another appointment, which was not acted on by the senate; and so, the office being now vacant, the question is, has the president power to fill it up again by granting a commission which shall expire at the end of the next session of the senate." And Mr. Legare held the president could fill it again. "I say it has 'happened,' for if any stress is laid on the peculiar use of the word as implying something fortuitous and unexpected, the presumption must be that the omission to confirm the nomination was a mere oversight." And again (page 675): "But if it has taken no order upon the president's nomination; if it has left a chasm quo ad hoc in the power or executing the law, and that, too, contrary to the commands of the law itself, the respect which the law acknowledges and challenges from that august body would require us to presume that the omission was a mere accidental one. The people, however, were wisely jealous of this great power of appointing the agents of the executive department, and chose to restrain its discretion by requiring it in all cases to nominate, but only in case it had the concurrence of the senate to appoint. But as it might be easily foreseen that to allow the execution of the law to depend altogether upon the discussions or movements of a deliberate assembly would bring with it all the evils of a plural executive, and lead to perpetual interruptions of the whole course of public affairs, and even to most dangerous interregna in the executive powers essential to the order and defence of society, the convention very wisely provided against the possibility of such evils, by enabling and requiring the president to keep full every office of the government during a recess of the senate, when his advisers could not be consulted; not only so, but, making allowance for the tardiness and uncertainties inseparable from debates and proceedings of all deliberate bodies, they extended this indispensable authority to the last moment of the session. My opinion is, that the same overruling necessity which applied to the original vacancy applies to the second one, created by an omission of the senate to act on a nomination. That body has only a negative and secondary agency in appointment to office. It has no share of the executive power, properly so called, that is, active, discretionary executive power; it simply controls the head of that department in the choice of its agents."

Attorney General Mason's opinion of the 13th of August, 1846, was founded upon the following case (4 Op. Atty Gen. 523): "During the year 1845, in the recess of congress, this (the office of postmaster, at Buffalo, New York) office being vacant, an appointment was made, and a commission granted, to expire at the end of the session of the senate next ensuing. During the late session of the senate, a person was nominated for permanent appointment according to law. The senate rejected the nomination on Saturday, the 8th of August, instant. On the 10th another nomination was made, on which the senate made no decision. The executive appointment made during the recess expired at the end of the session, and the question is, can any appointment be now made to supply the vacancy?" In the course of his opinion Mr. Mason says (page 525): "In the case of Amos Binney, as in Swartwout's, the commission expired during the session of the senate; the nominations were not acted upon, and after the adjournment of the senate President Adams filled the vacancy by an executive appointment. From the commencement of the government it is believed that a power has been exercised, which would appear to be inconsistent with a construction of the section of the constitution which would confine the meaning of the word 'happen,' to the time at which the office is in fact vacated. In cases where an officer dies during the session of the senate, but notice of his death is not received until after adjournment, it has always been filled as a vacancy happening during a recess of the senate." Again he says (page 526): "It is doing no violence to the language of the constitution, to maintain that this vacancy happening from the inaction of the senate on the nomination made, is within the meaning of the section quoted, and may be filled by an executive appointment. I am not disposed to enlarge the powers of the president, by narrowing the wholesome restraints imposed by the constitution. But that instrument invests him with powers in good faith, and sufficient to enable him, by their exercise, to acquit himself of his duties to the public. The constitution, as a general proposition, gives to the president the power of appointment; to guard against its improper exercise the concurrence of the senate is made necessary. But, for the reason above stated, authority is given him to make temporary appointments; this power depends on the happening of vacancies when the senate is not in session. It is no disrespect to the senate to suppose that their failure to act on this nomination was accidental; nor is it an unauthorized conclusion, that in view of the construction established by the opinion referred to, the senate were aware that the president had power to avert any public mischief caused by this omission on their part; but, whatever may have been the cause, the vacancy did happen to exist when their session ended, and it is entirely within the objects with which the qualified power was given to exercise it in this case. I have not stated the arguments as fully as I would have done if the question had not been so elaborately discussed in the opinions of my predecessors to which I have referred. Whatever may be the estimate of that construction, by which the vacancies in Swartwout's and Binney's cases, occurring during the session, and not filled at the end of the session, I concur with Mr. Taney[2] and Mr. Legare, that when the office is lawfully filled until the session is closed, and happens to be vacant at that time, by reason of the inaction of the senate on the nomination of the president, it may be filled by an executive appointment. I cannot perceive that it is unsafe to adopt a construction which has been so long given, and to follow precedents so long established, especially in a case where there has been no desire to avoid the controlling action of the senate, and where public considerations so imperiously require that the power shall be exercised."

It is thus seen that all these legal functionaries of the government, who have asserted the power of the president to fill vacancies existing, after a session of the senate has intervened since the vacancies originated, have done so in cases, and only in cases where the senate failed to act on the nominations duly made to that body and adjourned, leaving the office vacant. Mr. Wirt, it is true, asserts the same power in the case of a rejection in the closing hours of the senate, and rising inadvertently before another nomination could be made, but even he does not say that the rejected nominee is competent to fill the vacant place under the president's power to make another temporary appointment. It cannot be denied by any one who reads the clauses of the city charter herein cited, that congress meant to confer on the aldermen some control over the mayor in appointments to office, and it is admitted in the agreement that this is so as to permanent appointments, but not as to temporary appointments to fill vacancies. Judge Story, in his Commentaries, in treating of the powers in the federal constitution to appoint to office and to fill vacancies thus speaks (3 Story, Const. 1833, § 1524): "It would not, therefore, be a wise course to omit any precaution, which at the same time that it should give to the president a power over the appointments of those who are in conjunction with himself to execute the laws, should also interpose a salutary check upon its abuse, acting by way of preventive as well as of remedy. Happily, this difficult task has been achieved by the constitution. The president is to nominate, and thereby has the sole power to select for office; but his nomination cannot confer office, unless approved by a majority of the senate. His responsibility and theirs is thus complete and distinct. He can never be compelled to yield to their appointment of a man unfit for office; and, on the other hand, they may withhold their advice and consent from any candidate, who in their judgment does not possess the qualification for office. Thus no serious abuse of power can take place without the co-operation of two co-ordinate branches of the government, acting in distinct spheres. And in case of rejection, the most that can be said is that he had not the first choice. He will still have a wide range of selection; and his responsibility to present another candidate, entirely qualified for the office, will be complete and unquestionable." In section 1551 he says: "The propriety of this grant (that is to fill vacancies in the recess) is so obvious that it can require no elucidation. There was but one of two courses to be adopted; either, that the senate should be perpetually in session, in order to provide for the appointment of officers; or that the president should be authorized to make temporary appointments during the recess, which should expire, when the senate should have had an opportunity to act on the subject. The former course would have been at once burdensome to the senate, and expensive to the public. The latter combines convenience, promptitude of action, and general security." Section 1553: "By 'vacancies' they understood to be meant vacancies occurring from death, resignation, promotion, or removal. The word 'happen' had relation to some casualty not provided for by law."

In this case there is no casualty; the rejection is an event contemplated by law and provided for by law. The chief power of the mayor, in the city charter over appointments to office, is to nominate, and with the consent of the aldermen, to appoint. The lesser or subordinate power is to fill vacancies in their recess, when the aldermen cannot be consulted, and in that event the appointment is temporary, only to last till the end of the next session of the aldermen. But if the doctrine of the plaintiff's counsel is true, the check of the aldermen is a delusion, and their authority in approving or rejecting appointments is abrogated. The mayor, under the lesser power to make temporary appointments in the recess of the co-ordinate branch of the city government, draws to himself the whole control over the city officers, and keeps in office permanently, or at least during his own entire term of office, a public officer over and over again rejected by the aldermen, and in defiance of their rejection. The minor power absorbs the major, and the charter, which certainly meant to invest in the aldermen some control and check upon the mayor in filling the city offices, is to that extent repealed. In section 1502, Story says: "A power given by the constitution cannot be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers given in the same instrument. It must be construed, therefore, in subordination to it, and cannot supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions; each is equally obligatory, and of paramount authority within its scope, and no one embraces a right to annihilate any other." This principle of construction commends itself for its common sense, and is universal in its application to the true interpretation of all delegated powers, and in fact all written instruments. Such construction must be given to the city charter as will preserve all its provisions, and maintain the just authority both of the mayor and the board of aldermen. An officer rejected by the board of aldermen on the mayor's nomination cannot, I think, be re-appointed by the mayor in the recess of the same board. It must be presumed the aldermen acted in good faith, and believe the officer unfit for the station; at all events they have so determined. If they have abused their power they are answerable to the people who elected them. The charter gave them authority to act on the nomination and to reject it. The charter required the mayor to consult them in the appointment, and they have given their advice. The assent of both is required to invest the appointee with the office, and the aldermen have refused their assent and rejected the appointee. By the charter, although the aldermen cannot say who shall fill the vacant office, they have a right to say who shall not fill it, and in the case of Dr. Miller they have said he shall not. After Dr. Miller's first rejection, and after the adjournment of the aldermen, conceding Mr. Wirt's doctrine to be sound, that a vacancy still exists, or that a new vacancy has arisen, the mayor cannot reappoint the rejected appointee. In the language of Judge Story, he cannot have "his first choice," but he still has "a wide range of selection;" and the aldermen have assumed the responsibility to their constituents of limiting the range of his selection. Even Mr. Wirt does not intimate that a rejected nominee could be reappointed by the president in the recess of the senate. He plants himself upon the inaction of the senate; so do Chief Justice Taney, Mr. Legare and Mr. Mason. They all speak of cases where the senate has adjourned, without final action on the president's nomination. It is true in the case of Gwinn there was a rejection, but at the same session of the senate there was a renomination upon additional recommendations of character and the request of one of the senators of Mississippi, and the senate adjourned without acting on the renomination, and the chief justice relies on this inaction.

The case before us is not the case of a renomination at the same session of the aldermen on additional testimonials of character, a proceeding altogether proper and due to the confirming body, but the case of repeated rejections of the same nominee, at separate and distinct sessions of the aldermen, followed by repeated and renewed and continuing reappointments of the same rejected nominee up to the bringing of this suit, in which the plaintiff claims compensation for his services in said office. It seems strange to speak of a vacancy, by repeated rejections of the same nominee as a casualty, a happening by chance, which is supposed, and perhaps truly, by the learned attorney general referred to, to be the case where the senate has adjourned without action on the president's nominations, and so a vacancy "happening to exist," in the recess of the senate; the word "happen" in the constitution being constrained by Mr. Wirt to mean "happen to exist." A vacancy by rejection of a nominee, it would seem, is not a casualty, but an event contemplated by law, by the nomination of some other fit person; and, unless the rejecting body adjourns so suddenly that the executive has no time to make a new nomination, it cannot be justly said, even upon the principle of Mr. Wirt's opinion, that a vacancy has happened, or happened to exist, by chance, in the recess. Even where this last mentioned case occurs, by the sudden rising of the confirming body without notice to the executive, the rejected nominee, for the reasons I have urged, cannot be reappointed in the recess. If he can, the minor power to fill vacancies subverts to the greater power to nominate, and with the consent of the aldermen, to appoint. He is excluded from the range of the executive selection, or the power and check of the senate in the one case, and the board of aldermen in the other is utterly gone.

I cannot acquiesce in any such construction of the city charter, or the constitution of the United States, to which it is likened, nor do I see any warrant for such construction of the constitution of the United States, in the opinions of any of the attorney generals of the United States, referred to in the argument. Dr. Miller, I think, after the determination of the first session of the board of aldermen, at which he was rejected, ceased to be lawfully in office, and the judgment of the court on the case agreed, must be for the defendants.

NOTE. The following rules were adopted March 25, 1857, by the court, in compliance with the provisions of an act of congress on the subject passed at the last session: "Three terms of this court shall be held in every year, commencing on the respective days following, viz: On the third Monday of October, on the third Monday of January and on the first Monday of May. The first term under this rule shall be held on the third day of October next."

MILLER v. The W. G. HEWES.

[1 Woods, 363.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Texas. May Term, 1870.

COLLISION—NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES—FOR WHAT ALLOWED.

1. It is no defense to a libel to recover damages resulting from a collision to say that nothing could be done at the moment to prevent it, if it could have been avoided by reasonable precautions or ordinary foresight.

2. Article 14 of the sailing regulations applied.

3. When a steamer through its own fault collided with a skiff in which were the libellant and his son, whereby the son was drowned and the libellant so seriously injured as to confine him to his bed for seven weeks, and render him unfit for labor until the date of the decree and partially disable him for life, and the skiff was broken, the court allowed as damages the necessary cost of repairs to the skiff with compensation for the loss of its use while undergoing repairs, the cost of the cure of libellant, also a sum of money as compensation for his sufferings, also a sum equal to the amount of such wages as the libellant with the aid of his son could have earned up to the time of the decree, and compensation for his permanent partial disability. The latter was arrived at by the present allowance of a sum equal to the amount of such income as the ordinary labor of libellant would produce for one-third of the period of his expectation of life according to the mortality tables.

W. P. Ballinger, T. M. Jack, M. F. Mott, and G. P. Finlay, for libellant.

F. H. Merriman and L. A. Thompson, for claimant.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. James Miller sues the steamer W. G. Hewes, and her master George E. Tripp, for damages in a case of collision, and the case appears to be as follows: On the 17th of February, 1868, about one o'clock, p. m., the day being clear, the libellant, with his son, was in a skiff, used as an oyster boat, in Matagorda Bay, at Indianola, just starting out for the Big Bayou to gather oysters. The steamer W. G. Hewes was at the same time leaving her wharf at Indianola for her trip to Galveston, loaded pretty well down (her captain says about 8½ feet) with the usual Texan cargo of cattle, hides, etc., and with passengers. The steamer was aground at her wharf, lying with her stern outward, and was obliged, first, to back out of her berth for some distance and then turn to the left, eastwardly, in a circular direction, until she was brought to her course, which was in a southeasterly direction. She then started on her way, in the general direction of the skiff. The wind, what little there was, had been ahead, and the skiff, it seems, was obliged to tack, but at this time she lay becalmed, from a quarter to half a mile from the wharf, and was drifting a little towards the shore. The libellant and his son, seeing the steamer starting, got their oars out to pull. The steamer, having started on her course, was now approaching the skiff at the rate of seven or eight knots an hour. The libellant, watching her, perceived, when she was about 200 yards from him, that she was making in the direction of the skiff, and fearing he would be run down, called out as loudly as he could: "For God's sake, stop the steamer, I can't get out of the way." Several passengers, on board the steamer, at the same time saw the danger the skiff was in, and the man on the lookout at her bow, or some other person there, called out to the pilot: "Stop the boat, there's a little boat right ahead." A voice, from the pilot house, answered: "D——n the little boat." The bell, however, was rung, to stop the steamer, and the captain says her engine was stopped; but her way could not be checked, and she struck the skiff. Previous to the collision several persons called to those in the skiff to jump overboard. The boy did so, and was drowned. The libellant remained in the skiff, which was much damaged, and filled with water and sank. The libellant himself was so much injured by the wheel of the steamer, that he was rendered helpless. He was picked up by a boat, sent from the steamer, and handed over to another boat which had put out from shore, and was taken home. The physician who attended him, says that two ribs were broken on his right side, and all his ribs on the left side from the seventh down; and that he suffered a very severe rupture which renders a bandage necessary to keep his stomach and bowels from protruding, and which is not likely ever to be healed. The libellant suffered much pain; was confined to his bed for many weeks; and has become forever disabled from doing any hard work.

The captain of the steamer, to account for the collision, says that the steamer suddenly and unavoidably sheered to the right, and would not obey her helm. That the cause of this sheer was the low state of the water at the time—such that, with the draft the steamer had, her keel was in the mud; that it is impossible to steer a vessel under such circumstances. That this is always the case when the vessel's bottom is near the bottom of the water. That he took the route he did, on this occasion, because of the lowness of the water; if the water had not been so low, the usual route would have been on the other side of a certain wreck, which was farther from the shore and farther from the position of the skiff.

This sheer of the steamer, which the captain calls "an abrupt and unavoidable sheer," is the only serious excuse offered for running down the skiff, and is the substantial defense on which the respondents rely. And yet, strange to say, this ground was not alleged in the original answer, sworn to by the captain; but is set up at the present trial, by way of amendment to the answer. Besides, it is an accident which the captain of the steamer, according to his own account, had reason to expect would happen. He says, himself, that these sudden sheers, and the disobedience of the vessel to the helm, always occur when the vessel's bottom is in contact with the mud —which he, of course, knew to be the case with his steamer at the time. How, then, if he knew this from his previous experience, can he set it up as an excuse? Ought he not to have guarded against this danger when about to overtake a small and helpless vessel lying becalmed, and unable to get out of his way? It seems to me that it was his duty to have slackened his speed, so that if he could not control his vessel's course, he might have controlled her motion. The sixteenth article of the sailing regulations, adopted by congress, by act of 29th of April, 1864, has a strong bearing on this question. It is as follows: "Every steamship, when approaching another ship, so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse." 13 Stat. 58. Certainly the approach of the steamer towards the skiff, in this case, did involve risk of collision, if, as the captain says, he had reason to expect that he could not depend on his helm to govern the course of his vessel. This made it absolutely his duty, in approaching another vessel, to avoid such a speed as would prevent him from stopping and backing in case a sudden sheer should render it necessary. The skiff was easily discernible. She was seen, not only by passengers on the steamer, but by persons on the wharf, long before the danger became imminent.

I cannot bring my mind to any other conclusion, than that the collision was caused by the fault of the steamer.

The question of damage is next to be considered. In the first place the amount of injury to the skiff required $75 to put her in repair, besides the time she was unfit for use. I will, therefore, allow $100 on that account. The physician's bill for attending the libellant was $300. That will also be allowed. The libellant's injuries were very severe and he suffered much pain, being confined to his bed for seven weeks. Such suffering cannot well be estimated at a money value. I shall allow the libellant $500 on this account. The value of his time from the period of the accident to the present, according to his statement (which is uncontradicted), would have been $4 a day including the aid given by his son. That is what he says he made at his ordinary employment. His injuries have rendered him unable to make more than 25 to 50 cents per day; and even this pittance is produced by the aid of his little children. I shall allow him $2 a day, making some allowance for sickness and slack work. For two years and three months this would amount to $1,400. These sums, in the aggregate, amount to $2,300.

Besides this, the libellant is entitled to compensation for being disabled for life. There is no fixed and settled rule for estimating the value of this injury. It depends on so many contingencies, that it is a thing of very difficult adjustment. A compensation based on a table of mortality would not be an accurate one, because a fixed sum of money, less than such a calculation would call for, received now, with the ability to invest and improve it at use, and also with ability to pursue some light business or trade, would enable the libellant to do better for his family, and lay up more for their use at his death than he would probably have done had he remained in health and in the pursuit of his ordinary employment. He is now forty-five years of age. The tables of mortality would indicate his expectation of life to be something near twenty-five years. Suppose he lived that period, the latter years would be feeble and inefficient. The present allowance of an aggregate sum, equal to the amount of an income such as his ordinary employment would produce for one-third of that time, would probably be more nearly equitable than the exact present value of such an income for life. Supposing, therefore, he could have annually realized, by said occupation, the sum of $700, after having deducted the value of his son's services, this sum in eight years would amount to $5,600, which, with the sum of $2,300, before allowed, would make in round numbers, $8,000—exactly the amount decreed by the district court.

On the whole, therefore my opinion is, that the decree of that court should be affirmed, and that a decree for $8,000, besides costs, should be entered in favor of the libellant against the steamer, her tackle, furniture, etc.

See The Merrimac, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 203, decided in 1871, where the United States supreme court announces substantially the same rule as that stated in the first head note of this case.

MILLER v. WHEATON et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 41.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1812.

BAIL—CIVIL CASE—AFFIDAVIT.

Affidavit to hold to bail.

F. S. Key, for Briscoe, moved to enter his appearance for this defendant without bail. The plaintiff had filed, as his cause of action, a promissory note of Wheaton, and an affidavit by an indifferent witness that Briscoe acknowledged to him that he was a partner with Wheaton in the transaction and equally liable for the debt.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) held it to be sufficient to hold Briscoe to bail.

MILLER v. YOUNG.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 53.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1812.

DEEDS—INTER SE—WARRANTY—DEPOSITION—NOTICE—MAGISTRATE'S CERTIFICATE.

1. The statute of Virginia against conveying pretensed titles does not vacate the deed, as between the parties.

2. If the creditor accepts a deed of land in payment of the debt, it is a bar to an action for the debt; and, if the title be defective, the creditor must look to his warranty.

3. In taking a deposition under the act of congress, it is not necessary that the party or the magistrate should give notice to the adverse party or his attorney, if neither be within one hundred miles of the place of caption; nor that the magistrate should certify that he was not of counsel for either of the parties, nor interested in the event of the suit.

[Cited in Stewart v. Townsend, 41 Fed. 123.]

Indebitatus assumpsit for goods sold and delivered. The defence was that the defendant paid the debt by a deed of land in Kentucky, with general warranty, which the plaintiff received in payment. To this the plaintiff replied that the title was bad; that the defendant never had possession of the land, and had no title.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Taylor, for plaintiff, contended that the deed was void under the Virginia act of 6th of December, 1786, against conveying pretensed titles, which was in force in Kentucky, and did not destroy the original cause of action for goods sold; and if not void under that statute, yet, as the defendant had no title, it was no payment, and the plaintiff had a right to recover in this action. Moses v. MacFerlan, 2 Burrows, 1012; Dutricht v. Melchor, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 428; Cochran v. Cummings, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 250.

C. Lee and E. J. Lee, contra. The deed was executed, delivered and accepted, and contained a warranty of title upon which the plaintiff may have his remedy; and whenever a party has a remedy upon a sealed instrument, he is bound to resort to it. Preston v. Young, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 239; Toussaint v. Martinnant, 2 Term R. 105; Weaver v. Bentley, 1 N. Y. Term R. [Caines] 49; Sugd. Vend. 175; Hunt v. Silk, 5 East, 449; Lindon v. Hooper, Cowp. 414. The statute against pretensed titles, if in force in Kentucky, does not vacate the deed. Duval v. Bibb, 3 Call, 362. The plaintiff ought to have returned the deed, and reconveyed the property before he brought this suit. Pollard v. Dwight, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 421.

On the trial, C. Lee, for defendant, objected to a deposition taken on behalf of the plaintiff, that notice was not given to the defendant, although neither the defendant nor his attorney was within one hundred miles of the place of caption; and contended that the statute only dispenses with notice by the magistrate, not by the party. It does not say that the deposition, in such case, may be taken without notice—and the party is as much bound, in justice, to give notice when taking a deposition under the act of congress, as under a dedimus.

THE COURT, however (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), without hearing the other side, overruled the objection.

E. J. Lee, for the defendant, also objected to the deposition that the magistrate had not certified that he was not of counsel for either party, nor interested in the event of the cause.

But THE COURT overruled this objection also.

The parties agreed that judgment should be rendered for the plaintiff upon certain terms.

THE COURT, however (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), had made up their opinion, that the statute against pretensed titles did not vacate the deed; and that the agreement to settle the account, being executed by a deed with general warranty, which was accepted by the plaintiff, the transaction was closed and could not be disaffirmed; and that the plaintiff must resort to his warranty.

PATENTS—REISSUE—PRESUMPTION AS TO COMMISSIONER—MERIT—UTILITY.

1. The presumption of law is that the commissioner of patents has done his duty in granting a reissue thoroughly, faithfully and properly, and the question is not open for re-examination, except on the ground of fraud.

2. If there be any merit or utility in an invention, it entitles the inventor to a patent, although such merit or utility be slight, and the grant by the patent office is prima facie evidence of such merit or utility.

[Cited in Strobridge v. Lindsay, 2 Fed. 695.]

3. Reissued letters patent No. 6,662, granted to F. C. Miller, September 28th, 1875, for improvement in cigar molds, held valid.

[2] [This suit was brought [by the Miller & Peters Manufacturing Company against Napoleon Du Brul] upon reissued letters patent [No. 6,662] granted Frederick C. Miller, September 28, 1875, as a reissue of letters patent [No. 155,806] granted the same October 13, 1874, for improvement in cigar molds. The alleged invention related to cigar molds, which consists of an upper and lower half; the lower half being provided with sockets and the other half with corresponding matrices attached to rigid backing and intended to fit into the sockets of the lower half. The original patent contained one claim only, which was for a certain plug of wood placed in the socket of the lower half, and designed to prevent the splitting of them in that socket. This plug of wood in the lower socket was the only improvement referred to in the statement of the invention in the original specifications as being the inventions of the patentee. The description of the molds in which this plug was used, taken in connection with the drawings and model, showed a certain flange upon the basis of the matrices of the upper half of the mold. These flanges, however, were provided for an entirely different purpose from that designed to be answered by the plugs in the lower half of the plug, and sustained no relation to such plugs. The patent was reissued with the two claims recited in the opinion, the subject matter of which was these two flanges. It appeared in evidence that cigar molds known as the "Old German mold," had been in common use in this country many years prior to the alleged invention. These molds were constructed of wood, the same materials used by complainant, with small sockets used in the lower half of the mold, and separate matrix or matrices in sections of one each, attached to rigid backing by glue or nails, or both, forming the upper half-mold. They differ from the complainant's, so far as the point here in controversy is concerned only in backing the flanges at the base of the matrices of the upper-half mold. It was claimed by the complainant that these flanges somewhat facilitated the construction of the mold. Registration was secured in the old German mold by the laying the cups of the upper half-mold in the sockets of the lower, then applying glue to the back of the cups, afterwards placing the rigid backing board upon them. The cups would adhere to this backing, and being withdrawn in their proper position, could then be nailed or riveted firmly to the backing board. Complainant claimed that by the use of this flange the matrix was retained in position in the lower socket while receiving the glue, and until the glue was dried, thus securing more perfect registration and cheapening the cost of the mold. Among the patents set up as anticipation aside from the "Old German mold," were patents granted the defendant himself, May 16th, 1871, and May 9th, 1871, and the patent granted Maguire May 6th, 1873, all for improvement in cigar molds.

[It was also shown in the evidence that the defendant had, as early as 1870 and 1871, manufactured and sold cigar molds, having the matrices made in sections of four each with the flange at their base like the flange claimed by the complainant, and used with the corresponding lower-half. The patent to defendant of May 16th, 1861, showed the mold with the matrices made in sections of four or five each, also provided with these flanges. The several sections were shown in this patent connected by rabbit joints between the matrices. The patent described in the mold was made preferably of iron or sheet metal, but stated that any material might be used. Wood was shown to be the material common in use for that purpose for that time. It also stated that the matrices might be made in sections of one or more each. That patent to Maguire showed similar matrices attached to a similar backing by glue, and with flanges extending from matrix to matrix, but made in a single section, that is the matrices of the entire molding connected by their flanges without division between the flanges. The defendant denies the validity of the issue, and the novelty and the patentability of the alleged invention. He admitted that he had made cigar molds with flanges in some respects resembling those shown in the reissued patent, but claimed that he did so under and in accordance with the patents granted to himself in 1871, and subsequently he denied that he used any other feature of the alleged invention. It was also specially insisted upon by the defendant at the hearing, that as complainant's alleged invention consisted, at most, only in adding the flanges to the bases of the cups, or matrices, which were otherwise used precisely as in the old German mold, and as he had described and shown and used such flanges upon the bases of matrices, when made in sections of four each, as early as 1871, and had in his patent also stated that they might be made in sections of one each, which would make the same as the complainant's, he had a right to proceed under his patent of 1871, to make the molds there shown with the matrices divided into sections of one each. It was also insisted that as the claims were not limited to the cups when made in sections of one each, the defendant's patent of 1871 and the molds made by him at that time, even if used without the suggestion as to dividing them into sections of one each, each mold would be a complete anticipation; also, that the Maguire mold would be a complete anticipation of the claims, and that if the claims were limited to the mold when the matrices were in sections of one each, it requires no invention to divide up the Maguire into sections of one each, precisely as the "old German mold" has been divided. It was also insisted that, as the only merit claimed for the flanges was in the process of construction, and not in the completed mold, where it performed no functions other than was performed by the backing of the old German mold, the patent should have been for the machine as completed; that the claim was not capable of that construction, and that, if so construed, there was no evidence that the defendant used the process of construction in which the complainant claimed to get some advantage from the flange. It also appeared in evidence that the defendant's patent of 1871 had been reissued with claims for those flanges.] [2]

Wood & Boyd, for complainant.
Hatch & Parkinson, for defendant.

SWAYNE, Circuit Justice. This is a suit brought on reissued letters patent for improvement in cigar-molds, granted F. C. Miller, September 28th, 1875, as a reissue of letters patent originally granted same, October 13th, 1874. The bill charges the infringement of the first and second claims, which are as follows: "1. The series of cups, e, which are constructed with flanges e' and attached to a suitable backing, substantially as and for the purposes specified. 2. The movable half-mold, composed of a series of cups, e, which are constructed with the flanges e' and attached to a backing, in combination with the stationary half-mold, having a corresponding series of sockets, d', substantially as and for the purpose specified."

The defences relied on are: 1. That the reissue is broader than the original, and not for the same invention. 2. Want of novelty. 3. Want of patentable invention. As to the validity of the reissue, it is delegated, by the act of congress upon the subject, to the commissioner of patents, carefully to examine the question whether the patentee is entitled to a reissue, and to decide according to the result of that examination. The presumption of law is, according to the authorities, that the commissioner has done his duty thoroughly, faithfully, and properly, and has arrived at a conclusion in accordance with his action. The question is not open for re-examination, except on the ground of fraud. Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 84; Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 796; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516, and other cases. The presumption is, that everything is correct and valid touching the reissue. I have found nothing in this case sufficient to open up the question for re-examination. I need not remark further on the subject.

On looking through the patents which have been introduced on the part of the defendant, and examining the models which show the invention, we find nothing that exactly anticipates said invention. In this connection it is proper to read a part of the specification: "The plungers or cups of the upper or movable half-mold are formed separately, and subsequently secured to the backing, while in the sockets in the lower or stationary half-mold, in order to obtain a perfect register between the cups and the sockets, heretofore the cups have been made of the same width, or nearly so, from top to bottom—that is to say, the width at the top at a particular point would be the same, or nearly so, as the width at the bottom at this same point, and the face of the backing to which they are attached, checked their further entrance into the sockets, by bringing up against the top of the socket-board By reason of this construction of the cups, it was exceedingly difficult to secure the backing to it without injuring the cups or the surfaces of the sockets by forcing the cups too far into the socket, and, in case the cups were secured by gluing, either their backing would glue onto the top of the socket-board, or else it had to be withdrawn before the cups had been previously secured. To avoid these difficulties is the object of the first part of my invention, which consists in providing the plungers or cups with laterally projecting flanges, by means of which they are supported on the top of the socket-piece while in the sockets, so that the backing may be brought down upon them with any requisite force to secure them without danger of injuring the molds proper, and which also serve to form a space between their backing and the socket-board, so that, in gluing, the backing may be held clamped to the cups for any length of time necessary to make a permanent and reliable connection."

Then, after referring to another feature not here in controversy, the patentee proceeds in describing this invention: "The cups e are made singly and separate from the backboard a, for the reason that it is very difficult and very expensive to make them of one piece, and at the same time make the whole set or series fit accurately to the corresponding female sockets underneath, while, by making them singly, I make them cheaply, and then, by laying them one by one into the female sockets d', and while in such position, gluing or otherwise uniting the backboard a to them, I secure a fitting and correspondence of the two sets of sockets or cups that is absolutely unattainable in any other manner. Not only this, but if one of the cups e be accidentally broken, I can at once and in an inexpensive manner, replace; while if the cups were in one piece, and then one of the cups were to be broken, the whole series would become practically worthless. In furtherance of this object, I make each cup e with flanges or shoulders e', which gives each cup the broadest possible base to stand on, yet leaves space between the cups for the attainment of the nice adjustment, with reference to the socket d', which I have spoken of. The grain of the wood of these cups runs, by preference, in the direction of their length, and transversely of the length of backboard a. When the shoulders e' fit down upon the socket-board d, as shown in Fig. 2, the spaces between the faces of the sockets d' and cups e are circular in cross-section, and fitted to give the proper cylindrical shape to the cigars. Further, the flanges e' e' on the cups enable me to make the molds properly rounded in cross-section, without altering the depth of either the male or female cups, by simply making the male cups with thinner or thicker edges, as the case may require."

In the flanges attached to each upper cup, at the bottom of the upper cup, required to be separate and distinct from the others, and the flanges required to be distinct from the backing-board, and attached to it in the manner described, I find what I do not in any other case. There is no description in any patent of exactly the same thing. There is to be found in no mold which has been produced by the defendant, exactly the same thing. In several instances, there has been a very near approach to the alleged invention of the plaintiff, but in no instance has the mark been quite hit. It is neither claimed nor proved that any mold was ever made or used exactly as described in the complainant's patent. The variations in several instances are exceedingly small, but they are sufficiently marked to leave a distinction between them and the requirements and description of the complainant's invention, as set forth in his patent.

The case turns entirely on the complainant's flanges. For the reasons which I give, I have come to the conclusion that his invention belongs to him, as inventor, and that it has the requisite novelty. So far, I think, his case stands on firm ground. Then comes up the question of patentability. I have no hesitation in saying that upon the argument it seemed to me that there was no sufficient novelty and merit. Single cups, attached to a backing, having been invented before, it seemed to me, that the point beyond this prior invention, which the complainant has reached, was not sufficient to sustain a patent. In this aspect of the case I thought there was no novelty. It is proved, that small as these flanges are, inconsequent as they seem, little bearing as they have upon the question, there is some merit, some utility. If that be so, that, united with the novelty which has been found to exist, and which is established in the proof, small as that merit is, it entitled the complainant to a patent, in the judgment of the commissioner of patents, in the judgment of the patent office, and it entitles him to the judgment of this court upon that point. If this be so, the patent seems to be supported, and the complainant is entitled to the benefit. We have no authority to measure the degree of merit in the case in this connection. The action of the patent office is prima facie proof to that effect. The testimony in the record bears upon the proof and sustains the judgment of the patent office, if this were material. The testimony of Miller is full to this effect, and, in my judgment, it has not been effectively contradicted. The testimony of Peters, of the complainant corporation, is less cogent, but substantially to the same effect. The testimony of Tietig and of Heintz bears somewhat in the same direction, but with less force.

Now, this general reflection strikes me as very material to the solution of any doubts upon the subject, and the idea has had great weight with me in coming to the conclusion which I have reached, and with very considerable hesitation, for the time, of the correctness of my judgment. There can be no doubt that, in the distinct conception of the patent, complainant has done what was not done before. One or two persons have suggested that the proper cups can be made single and separate from the others, or connected with them—the cups being made in sections consisting of one, two or more, and the last patent of Du Brul contains, perhaps what may be called the flange, but that flange is inside. I examined the model, and came to that conclusion. Here the flange regulates the depths, and that is set out in the patent. This flange attached, when properly connected, regulates the depth to which it can be pressed, and that makes the peculiar mold in which lies the merit of the alleged invention.

But, departing from the details, it may be assumed, I think, from the proof, that nobody had found or described, or insisted on Miller's particular configuration of these molds. Why should not others let his alleged invention alone? They can use anything that preceded it—the old German mold; any of those covered by the Du Brul patents. They can use anything in relation to which evidence has been given, and which anticipated the alleged invention of the complainant. Now, if his was so worthless or wanting in originality, so immaterial, as it is claimed, why should not they let it alone?

The conclusion I have here reached in sustaining the patent only requires that this should be done. It does not interfere with the use of any of these inventions, which really seem to be better than his, and all which antedate his. His invention, such as it is, worth much or little, belongs to him, and, under the patent, he is entitled to the exclusive manufacture of it. I am, therefore, constrained to come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to the injunction.

Charles E. Mitchell and J. L. S. Roberts, for complainants.

B. F. Thurston and Livingston Scott, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The plaintiffs are the owners of the reissued patent No. 6,350, dated March 23d, 1875, granted to them upon an invention of Charles H. Stockbridge, their assignor. The original patent [No. 62,232], dated February 19th, 1867, is not in evidence. I understand that the specification was identical with that of the reissue, with the exception of the claim.

The invention relates to an improvement in the stocks or braces for bits and other tools. The specification and drawings show a socket with the usual rectangular cavity for receiving the shank of the tool. Upon the outside of the socket is a screw. A nut, sleeve or shell screws on to the socket, and beyond the screw is a continuation of the nut, which contains two dogs pivoted near the base or mouth of the nut, one on each side, and having the ends nearest the socket free to move inward. The end of the socket nearest the nut consists of an annular cam or inverted hollow cone. When the dogs touch the walls of this cam, they are forced inward and come under the shoulder of the shank of the tool which has been placed in the socket, and help to hold it fast. The defendant says that the dogs are intended to act merely as chocks or wedges to engage the shoulder of the tool and prevent its being pulled out, while the plaintiffs insist that the dogs grasp or gripe the round part of the tool and hold it by the force of the gripe as well as by chocking the shoulder, and that their holding power does not depend upon their being directly under the shoulder. The specification is somewhat uncertain upon this point. In one place, it speaks of the "grasping ends" of the dogs, and, in another, of the tool as being locked or fastened in the socket because the ends of the jaws come under the shoulders of the shank of the bit and prevent its withdrawal. I am satisfied that the dogs do or may act, in fact, as grasping devices. Both experts speak of them as such, and the model or specimen, which is admitted to be made after the pattern of the specification, will operate in that way. The plaintiffs must have the advantage of the fact, in the decision of the questions which depend upon it.

Before the time of Stockbridge's invention, Draper and Parker had taken out patent No. 48,763, upon an invention of W. W. Draper, and it is understood that the defendant now owns this patent. The bit-brace of Draper consisted of a socket provided with a screw, and next above the socket—that is, nearer the hand of the operator—was a cone. A nut was adapted to screw on to the socket, and on each side of the middle of the nut, outside of it, were loosely pivoted, by their middle, two pieces of iron, which may be called "dogs" or "jaws," much longer than the nut, and which met, or might meet or nearly meet, below the lower end of the nut. When the nut was screwed upon the socket, the upper ends of the dogs or jaws were forced apart by passing over the cone, and thus the lower ends were forced together and surrounded the tool just below the shoulder, and held it in place. A question was raised concerning this invention, precisely like that in respect to Stockbridge's—whether the jaws can grasp the tool, or only act on the shoulder. Here, again, I am of opinion that the jaws are capable of grasping some tools, and might, without invention, be made to grasp a great variety of sizes of tools, and, therefore, this invention of Draper would anticipate that of Stockbridge, if the claim of the latter should be broadly construed. The claim of Stockbridge is: "The combination of the socket F, having cams b b, and a nut, B, provided with dogs C C, substantially as and for the purposes set forth." The cams here referred to are sections of the annular cam.

It is admitted by the plaintiffs that, in the existing state of the art, his claim must be limited to substantially such a nut or other elements as are described. The defendant admits that he may claim something, but only on the theory that his dogs or jaws serve to chock the shoulder of the tool inserted in the socket. If construed to extend to jaws which grasp the tool, he says it is anticipated by Draper. The defendant has organized, on the inside of a nut or sleeve, a pair of grasping-jaws which work like those of Draper, and has patented this form of brace. The question, therefore, is a very material one, whether, since Stockbridge's patent is held by me to be for grasping as well as chocking contrivance, it is valid. Mere change in the form and proportions of a known instrument or machine, however great, will often be held to be merely colorable or unessential. The inquiry is whether that indescribable quality called invention has been employed in making the change. The Stockbridge brace appears to be more compact, more convenient to handle, and altogether better for use in the ordinary work for which it is designed than that of Draper, and the change is so great, especially in the nut or sleeve, that it cannot, in my opinion, be called a mere constructive modification. The plaintiffs may, therefore, claim such a nut as Stockbridge describes, with the grasping dogs or jaws placed inside the nut or sleeve and forced into their final position by the annular incline, called in the patent the "cams b b."

The defendant has reversed the action of the cone or incline at the end of the socket so as to press apart the upper end of the dogs, and thus to force together their lower ends. This seems to me to be a formal or colorable variation, or, if that expression is too strong, an obvious change of construction, not affecting the combination in its essence. Although the jaws, by themselves considered, are the invention of Draper, they cannot be substituted for the dogs or jaws of Stockbridge on the inside of his nut or sleeve, without infringing his combination. This depends upon the simple but material question of fact, whether Stockbridge's dogs act as grasping-jaws, which I have already said I find them to be.

Decree for complainants.

PATENTS—REISSUE—BRACE FOR TOOLS.

1. The invention set forth in reissued letters patent granted to the Miller's Falls Manufacturing Company, November 29th, 1870, for an improvement in instruments for operating tools, such as augers, bits, &c., the shanks of which are of variable sizes (the original patent having been granted to James M. Horton, July 8th, 1862,) defined.

2. The invention set forth in letters patent granted to Charles H. Amidon, January 14th, 1868, for an improvement in bit-stocks, defined.

3. The claims of the patents construed, and the patents held to be valid.

4. The construction of devices which infringe the patents, set forth.

[These were suits by the Miller's Falls Company against W. A. Ives & Co. to restrain the infringement of letters patent No. 35,856, granted to J. M. Horton, July 8, 1862 (reissued No. 4,187, November 29, 1870), and No. 73,279, granted to C. H. Amidon, January 14, 1868.]

Charles E. Mitchell, for plaintiffs.

Benjamin F. Thurston, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. These are two bills in equity, each of which is brought to restrain the defendant corporation from an alleged infringement of letters patent granted to James M. Horton, on July 8th, 1862, and reissued for the second time to the Miller's Falls Manufacturing Company, on November 29th, 1870, and also from an infringement of letters patent granted to Charles H. Amidon, on the 14th of January, 1868. Each patent is now owned by the plaintiffs. The Horton patent was for an improvement in instruments for operating tools, such as augers, bits, &c., the shanks of which are of variable sizes. The Amidon patent was for an improvement in bit-stocks. The infringement complained of in the first suit was the making and selling by the defendants of bit-braces, known in the market as the "Ives Brace" and the "Ives Novelty." The second suit was brought to restrain the defendants from making the "Centennial" and the "Centennial Novelty" braces, the manufacture of which last named tools was commenced after the first suit had been brought. The two bills of complaint may be treated as substantially one action. The principal defence as against the Horton patent is non-infringement, and as against the Amidon patent is want of novelty.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge; reprinted in 2 Ban. & A. 574; and here republished by permission.]

The Horton device was an auger handle, provided with a metal band, called in the patent a barrel, around its centre, the lower portion of which barrel is formed into a projecting cylinder or socket, recessed or slotted upon its opposite sides. The recesses receive two jaws, the ends of which are curved so as to lie loosely in the recesses, and act as hinges upon which the jaws swing. Along the centre axis of the cylinder there is a rectangular tapering bore, large enough to receive the shank of the boring tool. A revolving nut, which forces the jaws together, is fitted upon the screw threads which are cut upon the periphery of the cylindrical portion of the cylinder. When the nut is near the handle, the lower parts of the jaws swing upon their hinged parts, so as to receive the shank of the tool to be used. When the nut is screwed up, the curved ends of the jaws enclose the shoulder of the auger shank.

swivelled head, and at the other the clamping mechanism which is the subject of the invention. The end of the stock which receives the shank, and is called the foot, is cylindrical, and has a male screw thread cut upon its outer surface. A slot is cut vertically through the foot, and within this slot rest the jaws which seize and hold the shank. At the bottom of the slot is bored a cylindrical cavity with an enlarging orifice. A thimble or nut is constructed with a female screw thread corresponding at its lower portion with the thread on the foot, while the upper part is protuberant and contracted towards the mouth at the upper end. This nut screws upon the foot, and forces the jaws upon the shank. These jaws are in thickness suitable to fill loosely the slot. Their lower ends are attached to each other by a curved wire, which is rigidly set in one part, and projects loosely through the other part. The upper and lower ends of the jaws are bevelled, so that they may be forced together by the in-[Drawiugs of patent No. 35,856, granted July 8, 1862, to J. M. Horton, published from the records of the United States patent office.]

The claims are: "(1) The combination of the barrel A, provided with a socket C, jaws B and D and nut N, working on a screw for holding a boring tool, substantially in the manner described and specified. (2) The socket C of the barrel A, having cavities b b, in combination with the jaws B D having curved ends to fit therein, to allow the necessary lateral movement in the socket without falling out, substantially as described and specified."

The Amidon brace consists, as described in the patent, "first, in the construction and use of two jaws, which conform to the taper of the bit shank, and are forced equally upon said shank at both ends, by a screw nut or other device; second, in the special construction of the end of the bit stock to hold said jaws and retain them always in place; third, in the formation of the groove in the edge of each jaw, so that the shoulders of the bit shank are enclosed, and the accidental withdrawal of the bit prevented;" and, fourth, in a particular not material to the present case. The bit stock has at one end the ordinary clined surfaces of the nut and the cavity at the bottom of the slot, when the nut is screwed upon the foot. In the opposing surfaces of the jaws are formed grooves, which, when the jaws are in position, form a recess of square section. This recess is made tapering, so as to correspond with the taper of the bit shank, and is largest at the outer end, so that the shoulders of the bit shank may be enclosed within the jaws and the removal of the bit be prevented, except by relaxing the pressure of the jaws. As the jaws are loosely connected at the lower ends by the wire, they may either move apart, as on a pivot at that end, or they may be moved bodily away from each other, so as to accommodate a bit shank of any size or taper.

The three claims which are material to this case are: "(1) In combination with the jaws G, G, or their equivalents, constructed to move away from or towards each other in the manner described, so that they may conform to the taper of the bit-shank, the screw thimble F, or its equivalent, to force the said jaws upon said shank, as and for the purpose set forth. (2) The jaws G, G, constructed with the groove, formed substantially as set forth, so as to enclose the taper sides and the shoulders of the shank, as and for the purpose described. (3) The cavity D, formed with a bevelled orifice, as shown, in combination with the jaws G, G, constructed with correspondingly bevelled ends, as and for the purpose shown and described."

The Ives brace is substantially like the Amidon. The Novelty brace differs from the Ives mainly in the fact that, in the thimble, the threaded portion is separated from the swell portion, and the nose or head of the thimble is attached fixedly to the socket. The lower portion of the thimble revolves towards the foot, and, by its revolution, produces the same effect as if the whole thimble revolved.

1. As to the character of the Horton invention, and the construction of the Horton patent. Devices for holding tools or articles which have shanks of variable sizes and tapers were known prior to the date of the Horton patent, and consisted broadly of clamping jaws and a nut which caused the jaws to effect a gripe upon the tool to be held. Thus, the clamp described in the Mechanics' Magazine (volume 14, p. 116) consisted of two jaws, with a recess in them to hold whatever was placed therein. The jaws are forced together by a dome-headed nut acting upon their noses. The "Stever Chuck" had a slotted socket with a screw thread, and two jaws, which clamp the tool by a screw nut or sleeve acting upon the jaws. The "Meriden Cutlery Chuck" had a slotted socket, with a round tapering bore at the bottom of the chuck, and two jaws forced together by a collar or sleeve, which moves forward upon the socket without any screw-thread, and is retained in its place by friction. The D. H. Chamberlain awl holder, patented in 1854, which will be more particularly considered hereafter, has a socket, and a dome-headed nut moving upon the screw on the socket, which nut acts upon two jaws, which approach each other and grasp the shank of an awl or other similar instrument.

The peculiar features of the Horton handle consisted in combining with the handle or stock of a boring tool, a slotted cylinder, provided with a rectangular tapering bore for holding firmly the shank of a boring tool, and hinged jaws working in the slot, having the necessary lateral movement to receive, without displacement, variable sizes of tools, and a nut moving on the screw thread upon the circumference of the cylinder, which nut clamps the jaws together so as to hold the shank. The shank is held firmly in place by the tapering bore and by the jaws which seize the angular portion of the bit, and serve not only to draw out the auger from the wood, but also help to prevent the auger shank from being twisted in its place as the bit enters the wood. The nut wedges the swinging jaws against the edges of the shank of the tool, and binds the projecting noses of the jaws against the upper end of the shank, so as to hold the tool firmly in position as it advances in the wood, and so as to draw it back as it is endeavored to be pulled out. Neither of the pre-existing devices had this combination of barrel, slotted socket with threaded outer surface, tapering bore, hinged jaws and nut. It is not claimed by the learned expert of the defendants that the Horton invention was antedated by any of the devices placed in evidence. The patent was for a handle of a boring tool having these described elements in combination, which several elements are formed substantially as described in the specification. The first claim was for the entire combination of the several elements. The second claim omitted the encircling nut, and made prominent the shape of the jaws by which lateral movement was permitted in the socket, without the jaws falling out.

2. The next question is whether the Ives and the Novelty braces infringe the Horton patent. These braces, which are substantially a reproduction of the Amidon brace, are manifestly an improvement upon the Horton invention, but have its leading features. These features, in the defendants' braces, are a threaded and slotted cylinder, which loosely holds a pair of movable jaws pivoted at the foot, or secured by a projection at the bottom of the slot, and enclosing a bit shank which they are made to clamp firmly by the action of an encircling nut, which is forced upon the shank at both ends, and closes the noses of the jaws over the top of the shank, so that the tool is held and retained in its proper position. The tapering bore of the Horton patent is transferred, in the defendants' braces, to the faces of the jaws, and becomes the tapering grooves which enclose the shank as the jaws are pressed against it by the action of the nut or thimble. The defendants insist that the jaws of the Ives braces and of the Horton patent are not the same, because they say that the only office of the Horton jaws is to prevent the auger bit from being withdrawn from the handle, and are a substitute for the nut or rivet which secures the handle of an old-fashioned auger, while the Ives jaws gripe the shank and prevent its turning around in the handle. But, the Horton jaws do not merely hold the auger bit in the handle. They also resist any tendency to turn around or to be twisted in the handle. Arguing upon this idea, that the office of the jaws in the two devices is different, the defendants easily prove that the respective jaws are radically different from each other, and that the grooved jaws of the Amidon bit holder, which grasp the shank so that it cannot turn, perform a different office from the jaws of the Horton handle, which, they say, serve merely to withdraw the auger bit; but, the premises being unsatisfactory, I am of opinion that the conclusion is also untenable. The principle of the Horton invention is reproduced in the Amidon and the defendants' bit stock, and, while that principle is developed so as to make a more perfect instrument, it is developed in substantially the same way, and by the same general mechanical means. The lateral movement which is mentioned in the second claim of the Horton patent, is produced, in the Novelty brace, by the jaws being loosely pivoted together in the bottom or foot of the cylinder, instead of swinging in recesses or cavities of the cylinder, as in the Horton patent, and is produced, in the Ives brace, by the movement of the jaws in a projection substantially similar to the arrangement in the Horton cylinder. The hinge-like movement of the jaws is substantially alike in each brace.

3. Is the Amidon patent invalid for want of novelty? That the Ives and Novelty braces infringe the Amidon patent, is not practically denied, and the principal question which remains as to these two braces is the validity of the patent. The Amidon bit stock is an improvement upon the Horton handle, and it becomes important to ascertain wherein the improvements consist. They are found in the shape of the jaws, and of the nut or thimble, and in the cavity at the bottom of the socket. These jaws are bevelled at the upper and lower ends, so that they are forced together by the surfaces of the thimble and of the cavity at the foot of the cylinder. The grooves of the jaws are so tapered as to fit the edges and shoulders of the shank, and the protuberant portion of the sleeve gives the jaws such a capacity of movement that they can take in a bit shank beyond the end of its shoulder, and the jaws will conform to the shape of the shank. The bevel of the jaws at their upper and lower ends, whereby the jaws are forced together, and the taper of the grooves in the jaws, are the peculiar and distinguishing features of the jaws. The protuberant swell of the thimble, whereby the jaws have greater capacity of adjustment to the taper and shoulder of the bit shank, and the contracting mouth of the thimble, which draws the noses of the jaws together over the top of the shank, are the peculiar features of the thimble. The recess at the bottom of the slot, formed with a bevelled orifice, has its office to force the lower ends of the jaws together, as they are forced by the pressure of the thimble against the walls of the cavity. In the peculiar formation of these parts of the combination consist the patentable features of the Amidon patent.

The question of novelty depends materially upon the construction which is given to the patent and to its first claim, which is as follows: "In combination with the jaws G, G, or their equivalents, constructed to move away from or toward each other in the manner described, so that they may conform to the taper of the bit shank, the screw thimble F, or its equivalent, to force the said jaws upon said shank, as and for the purpose set forth." If this claim means the jaws G, G, or any jaws constructed so as to move away from or towards each other, in the general manner described, so that they may conform to the taper of a bit shank, in combination with the screw thimble F, or any thimble which forces the jaws upon the shank, the claimed invention was probably well known. Such a construction would limit the patentable part of the invention to the third claim, and would make it consist of the recess at the bottom of the slot in combination with bevelled jaws; but such a construction is not in accordance with the actual invention or with the specification. The peculiarities of the jaws G, G, are minutely described, and stress is laid upon the peculiar shape of the jaws, which evidently constituted, in the mind of the patentee, the distinctive feature of his invention. The protuberance and convergence of the screw thimble are described, though the same prominence is not given to the thimble as to the jaws. The first claim specifies the peculiarly shaped jaws G, G, or jaws which are substantially formed like the jaws G, G, in the following particulars, viz., which are constructed to loosely fill the slot, and so that they may move apart on a pivot, or may be moved bodily away from or towards each other in the described manner, and thus conform to the taper of different bit shanks, in combination with the peculiarly shaped screw thimble F, or a thimble which is so constructed as to allow, by its protuberance, the range of movement of the jaws which thimble F permits, and also to bind the heels and noses of the jaws upon the shank. This claim has special reference to jaws pivoted and bevelled, which have the range of movement between the laterally supporting walls of a slotted cylinder which the jaws G, G, have, in combination with the encircling thimble, which, by its protuberant shape, also gives the jaws their capacity of movement, and, by its convergence, clamps the noses of the jaws. The grooves are particularly specified in the second claim, which is for the peculiarly shaped jaws G, G, with tapered and grooved faces. The third claim is for the cavity D, in the bottom of the slot, with a bevelled orifice, in combination with the jaws G, G, which combination permits a lateral movement of the jaws within the cylinder, and the closing of the heels of the jaws within the cylinder, and the closing of the heels of the jaws when acted upon by the thimble.

This statement of the invention and this construction of the patent excludes from the consideration of anticipatory devices, the Stackpole brace of 1862, the Stackpole patent of 1867, the Goodell brace, and the Bartholomew brace of 1867. The jaws of neither of these braces have tapering ends or noses which are closed over the shoulders of the bit shank, and which are acted upon by a protuberant and convergent sleeve or thimble. These devices were not, however, mainly relied upon by the defendants, who chiefly urged, as an anticipatory invention, the Dexter H. Chamberlain awl holder, patented in 1854. This tool is a useful one for holding the shanks of awls, or other similar small tools, but could not be relied upon to endure the strain and twist which necessarily comes upon an auger or bit, whose radially cutting edges are forced by successive revolutions into the wood. The tool consists of a pair of clamps, each one of which is cylindrical upon the outside. The upper and lower ends are conical, which ends are cut off and do not run to a point. Through the centre of the inside of each one of the clamps, is cut a triangular groove from top to bottom, so that, when the clamps are placed together, the triangles face each other, and make a uniform, straight, square groove throughout the extent of the clamps or jaws. These jaws enclose the shank of an awl, and are screwed together and kept in place by a dome-shaped screw nut. These jaws are not like the Amidon jaws, loosely placed in a slotted socket, to give lateral motion, nor are they so constructed as to accommodate themselves to bit shanks of varying taper, nor is the dome-shape sleeve the equivalent of the protuberant and converging sleeve of the Amidon patent. In brief, the Chamberlain holder has neither the movable nor tapered jaws, nor the thimble, of the Amidon stock.

On February 16th, 1871, the plaintiffs, or their predecessors, licensed the defendants to make two thousand braces of their patent, No. 111,649, dated February 7th, 1871, for a royalty of ten per cent. on the net prices for which the defendants sold the braces. They did not manufacture the precise invention represented in their patent, but made a quantity of the braces known as the "Ives Brace," and which are made according to the Amidon patent. I have not seen the Ives patent, and therefore do not understand precisely the difference between the two articles, but understand, from the testimony of the defendants' expert, that there is less capacity of lateral movement in the jaws at the foot of the brace in the Ives patent, than in the Amidon, and that the elder patent is broader than the Ives patent. The defendants were licensed only to make the article which was shown in their patent. On December 30th, 1875, the defendants, by agreement, submitted to a preliminary injunction against manufacturing the Ives brace, and conceded that it was an infringement of the Amidon patent, without conceding any other questions in the case, in regard to other braces. It was further agreed, that, in any accounting, the defendants shall account for all Ives braces, in accordance with the terms of said agreement of February 11th, 1871. Upon this state of facts, I think that the Ives brace is not protected by the license, and it is also true that the plaintiffs have agreed that the infringement is to be paid for as if it was so protected.

The questions in regard to the Centennial and Centennial Novelty braces only remain. These two braces differ from the Ives and the Novelty mainly in this, that the jaws are attached to the side walls of the bevelled cavity in the foot, and that these side walls move on a pivot towards each other, when operated upon by the screw thimble, and so pinch the jaws together. This accomplishes the same result, in substantially the same way in which it is accomplished in the Amidon patent, where the heels of the jaws are forced together in the bevelled orifice by the screw thimble acting directly upon the jaws, or, as it is expressed in the patent, the jaws are "forced together by the inclined surfaces of the thimble F and the cavity D, when the said thimble is screwed on the foot." It is not material whether the walls of the orifice pinch the jaws, or the jaws are pinched against the walls. These two braces, differing from the other braces of the defendants only in the particular which has been named, infringe also the third claim of the Amidon patent, and, equally with the other braces, infringe the first and second claims of that patent, and also of the Horton patent.

There should be a decree for an injunction against the four braces of the defendants, and for an accounting.

COPYRIGHT—MUSIC—STATUTORY PENALTY FOR INFRINGEMENT—INTENTION.

[The publisher of a newspaper who printed therein a piece of music which had been copyrighted is liable for the statutory penalty for infringement of one dollar per sheet, although he knew nothing of the copyright, and copied the music from another newspaper.]

The plaintiff [William E. Millett] obtained a copyright for a piece of music called "The Cot Beneath the Hill, a Ballad.—Poetry by James F. Otis, Esq.," and now seeks to recover the penalty, as provided by statute, of one dollar per sheet for violation thereof. He charges that [William E.] Snowden, in the June number of the Ladies' Companion, published such piece of music, &c. The defendant proved that the music had been copied from a Boston paper by the young man having charge of that department in the Ladies' Companion, and that neither said young man nor Mr. Snowden knew of its being copyrighted, and that the music was changed in a trifling degree from the original. He also offered to prove that the words to which the music was set never belonged to plaintiff, and that he (defendant) had no intention of infringing the copyright.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

THE COURT, in its charge, stated that intention could not be taken into view. If a copyright has been invaded, whether the party knew it was copyrighted or not, he is liable to the penalty. As to its being different from the original, in music, as in writing, the omission of a word or line or paragraph could not change it so as to avoid the statute. The poetry, in this instance, could not affect the result, as the copyright was for the music. A defendant is at liberty to show that the work copyrighted was not original with plaintiff, or that it was an abbreviation or alteration, and the jury could determine whether it was calculated to infringe the copyright or not. In cases of patents, the jury is at liberty to assess damages, but not in violation of copyright. The penalty in the latter is fixed by law. The jury, if they consider that defendant has republished without leave obtained in writing from plaintiff, must proceed to ascertain the number of sheets proved to have been sold, or offered for sale (not the number printed), and return a verdict of one dollar for each sheet so sold or offered to be sold.

Verdict for plaintiff, $625.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—POLICY OF INSURANCE—PAYMENT.

1. The declarations of an agent for the defendant, by whose orders the plaintiffs had made insurance for the benefit of the defendant, were not admitted to prove the liability of the defendant for the premium.

2. The policy of insurance, without other proof of the payment of the premium, is not evidence of its payment.

This was an action on the case, to recover a premium of insurance paid by plaintiffs [Millick & Burger] for defendant [Peterson] on a policy effected on the Phoenix, the property of defendant, in an insurance office at New-York. The order for insurance was given by W. Wiseman, without mentioning the defendant; and the policy stated W. Wiseman as the person insured. Evidence was given to prove that Wiseman acted as the agent of the defendant, in ordering the insurance. Wiseman sent to the plaintiff his note for the premium, as usual, payable in twelve months; but before the note became due, Wiseman failed. The plaintiff, understanding that the insurance was made for the defendant, procured from Wiseman the defendant's letter, ordering him to have it effected; and got him to add on the foot of it, the order he had given to the plaintiff. A witness was examined, who stated sundry conversations he had had with Wiseman respecting this business; and was about stating that Wiseman told him the defendant would pay the debt.

THE COURT thought this improper evidence. Wiseman was the defendant's agent only to effect the policy. His declarations that defendant would pay, are not evidence in the cause. It was proved by a witness, that it is the constant custom to retain the policy until the premium is paid, or a note with a good endorser given, and then it is delivered out.

Mr. Hallowell, for plaintiff, argued to the jury, that the printed acknowledgment in the policy that the premium was paid, is prima facie evidence of the fact. This, together with the circumstance of the plaintiff's being in possession of the policy which he could not be unless he had paid the premium, is sufficient to establish the fact.

THE COURT expressed an opinion, that better evidence could be given of the payment of the premium. That inferior evidence ought not to be left to the jury, when it appeared that there existed better in the power of the plaintiff. If he has paid the note he gave for the premium, he ought to produce it, or prove it to have been paid by other evidence. But on recommendation of the court, a juror was withdrawn.

NOTE. The insurer may recover the premium, notwithstanding the formal receipt in the policy, which is not inserted as conclusive evidence, but to preclude the necessity of proving it in case of loss. 1 Marsh. Ins. 240.

SEAMEN—WAGES—AGREEMENT NOT IN WRITING—STATUTORY PROVISION—TUG BOATS—PREVIOUS WAGES—EVIDENCE—BOOK OF PAYMENTS.

1. The act of July 20, 1790 [1 Stat. 131], for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, providing that if an agreement in writing be not made, &c., with seamen, they shall be entitled to the highest rate of wages that shall have been paid for a similar voyage within three months preceding the shipping, does not apply to seamen upon tug boats. [Cited in Worth v. Steamboat Lioness No. 2, 3 Fed. 925.]

2. Where a seaman was proved to have served the year previous for a particular rate of wages, and shipped with no agreed rate; Held, that in the absence of contrary proof, the last year's wages would be presumed right, and taken as the measure of wages for the present.

3. A book of original entries, kept by the captain of the propeller, who was also part owner, is inadmissible to prove cash payments, there being no other proof of these payments.

[This was a proceeding in admiralty by Thomas Milligan against the propeller B. F. Bruce for wages due the plaintiff for services rendered.]

Jerome & Swift, for libelant.
Towle, Hunt & Newberry, for respondents.

WILKINS, District Judge. Libel for mariner's wages as engineer of the propeller, employed as a tug boat from the mouth of the river Detroit to Port Huron. The libelant claims at the rate of $70 per month, the highest rate of wages given to engineers. The answer does not deny that he was employed as engineer, but alleges his incompetency to act in that capacity, and that, in consequence of his incapacity and ignorance the propeller suffered great damage, which, as a pecuniary loss, covers more than the wages to which he would be entitled. The libelant alleges that he was employed as engineer, at no particular rate of wages, and that, as no agreement was made in writing, he is entitled, by the act of 1790, to the highest wages paid for such services. The law cited does not apply to this case, the propeller not being engaged in foreign commerce. The libelant has attached to his bill an account stated, claiming $70 per month, for six months and twenty-eight days, and giving credit for sundry payments, amounting, in all, to $68, specifically enumerated, item by item. The answer responds that the claimant is ignorant of the actual time the said libelant worked, and leaves him to the proof of the same. The proofs are, that the libelant went on board of the propeller on the 10th of February last, and left on the 28th of August; and that the vessel commenced running on the 1st of May: that he was engaged about forty-seven days in February and March in fitting up the engine and preparing it for use in the approaching season: that he had served the previous season as engineer, and was continued in that capacity, and that he had got the last year the sum of $45 per month. The court will allow now no more than that sum, and will allow him at that rate from the 10th of February, the period fixed by the witness Donevan as the time when he commenced his labor as engineer. He was acting in that relation when he was thus employed, and in the absence of satisfactory proof to the contrary, or that he was working by the day, the court must allow the usual wages per month, which he received the seasons previous. A book has been introduced in evidence, as a book of original entries, kept by the captain, showing that the libelant commenced "fitting out" on the 7th of February, and that the boat commenced running on the 1st of May. This book exhibits certain cash payments made by the captain, who is part owner of the vessel, which are not admitted by the libelant. These charges are inadmissible, there being no other proof of these payments. To admit such evidence as conclusive against the mariner would subject seamen to great injustice. There is no necessity existing why the old rule should be modified in this respect. Cash payments should be accompanied by corresponding receipts; and where a seaman cannot write, his mark should be taken in the presence of the witness. To adjudge otherwise, would make the party interested competent proof of payment. Moreover, in this case the entries are not of such a character as to entitle them to implicit credit. The libel specif ically set forth the payments made, and the answer should as specifically have denied the exhibit, and directed attention to the other payments if they actually existed. Otherwise, we are called upon to reject the positive oath of the libelant, and admit the statement of the respondent without oath.

The court, therefore, decree that the libelant shall be paid for six months and twenty-eight days, at the rate of $45 per month, amounting to $308.48, deducting therefrom the payments which he has admitted in his libel, of $68, with the $16 admitted on trial to Mr. Towle, making in all a credit of $84, and adjudicating the balance at $222.48. The cash paid by Mr. Carey was neither proved nor admitted.

As to the tender alleged, the court is of opinion that no legal tender was proved; $45 per month was offered to the proctor, but leaving the time still a subject of controversy. A positive sum, covering the whole controversy, should have been offered.

Decree for $222.48, with costs.

MILLIGAN & DICKSON et al.

[Pet. C. C. 433.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1817.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT — POWER OF ATTORNEY — PENNSYLVANIA ACT—EVIDENCE OF EXECUTION.

1. A deed for land, made under a power of attorney acknowledged before a mayor or other chief magistrate of a city, instead of being proved before him by the witnesses, and certified by him under the public seal, is evidence under the common law of Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the act of 1705.

2. The provisions of the act of 1705, apply to a power of attorney, proved by the attesting witnesses, but they do not exclude other evidence of the execution of such power.

[See Case No. 9,604.]

[Cited in brief in Garrett v. Crosson, 32 Pa. St. 376.]

This cause, which had been removed into the supreme court, upon a division in the opinion of the judges, as to the admissibility of the power of attorney from Christie to Milligan, was sent back to this court, under an agreement of the parties, that this should be the single question to be decided. It came on now, to be again tried, when the plaintiff examined a number of witnesses, including lawyers, conveyancers, and a clerk in the office of the master of rolls, and for recording of deeds; all of whom concurred in proving, that the universal practice of this state has been, to make conveyances under powers of attorney, acknowledged before a mayor, or other chief magistrate or officer of the city, &c. where such power was executed, and certified under the common or public seal of the said city, in like manner as if the same had been proved by the attesting witnesses. That powers of attorney thus certified, have uniformly been admitted to be recorded in this state, copies whereof have always been given in evidence; and that an objection to such evidence, never was heard of, until it was made on the first trial of this case. That an immense portion of the landed property in this state, is held under deeds executed by the attorneys of the proprietors and others, in virtue of powers, acknowledged and certified as this was.

Some of the witnesses stated it as their opinion, from an examination of the records, and from their recollection of the deeds which had been drawn in their respective offices, that a very great majority of the powers of attorney for conveying real property in this state, have been of this description. That the most eminent lawyers and conveyancers in the state, had uniformly acted in conformity with this opinion. The evidence of some of the witnesses, traced their knowledge of this practice as far back as fifty or sixty years ago; at which time, they found the practice established and in use in the offices in which they entered as apprentices or assistants. The testimony of the witnesses, as to this practice or usage, its antiquity, uniformity, and extent, was uncontroverted. Only one witness was examined by the defendants' counsel, namely, Mr. Chief Justice Tilghman, who stated, that he had received powers of attorney from Andrew Allen, in London, chief justice of this state, before the Revolution, and from other members of that family, for the sale of their real property in this state, all of which were acknowledged and certified like the present. This was in the year 1809. That, after examining the act of 1705, he returned those powers to his constituents, and directed them to have them proved before the mayor or magistrate. But, the chief justice stated nothing, in opposition to the practice proved by the other witnesses. He further stated, that although the law requires the certificate of the magistrate of the proof of deeds before him, to be authenticated under the common or public seal of the city, yet a long usage of certifying the proof without such seal, had grown up, and had received the sanction of the supreme court of the state, on the ground of such usage.

The plaintiff proved the loss of the original power of attorney; the paper now offered in evidence, was a copy of the exemplification of the power, from the office for recording deeds, where the exemplification was recorded. [Davey v. Turner] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 11; [Lloyd v. Taylor] Id. 17; [Morris v. Vanderen] Id. 66.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. When this cause was formerly tried, the only question which I could judicially decide, was, whether under the words of the act of 1705, a power of attorney acknowledged before the mayor or chief magistrate of a city, and certified under the public or common seal, could be given in evidence. That act declares, that all sales or conveyances of lands thereafter to be made, by virtue of any letters of attorney, duly executed, and expressly giving a power to sell lands or other estates, certified to have been proved by two or more of the witnesses thereunto, before any mayor or chief magistrate of a city, &c. under the common seal, &c., or proved in Pennsylvania before any justice of the peace, by one or more of the witnesses thereto, &c. shall be good and effectual in law, to all intents and purposes, whatsoever, as if the said constituent had by his deed conveyed the same.

Upon the construction of this law, it appeared to me there could scarcely be two opinions. It allowed powers of attorney, proved as the law directs, by the attesting witnesses, to be given in evidence; but it did not extend the same privilege to powers acknowledged by the party. The former case, therefore, was no longer open to the common law objection, that a deed must be proved upon the trial of a cause in which it is offered, by the attesting witnesses, if they can be produced, subject to the legal exceptions and qualifications of the rule. The latter case was left exposed to the full operation of that principle, as it was not provided for by this statute. There was no testimony given of a practice and usage like that which has been proved in this case. It is true, Judge Peters stated to me the general understanding of legal and other men, upon this subject, substantially, as he has now testified. But no proof of such a practice was given, so that I could act judicially upon it, or to enable the supreme court to judge how far such practice had controlled or affected the principle of the common law. I could not therefore, give any other opinion than the one I did, which was unfavourable to this evidence.

This trial presents a perfectly new case, upon the evidence which has been given.

It is contended by the defendants' counsel, that no practice or usage can repeal or control an express statute; and that for this reason the cases of Davey v. Turner, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 11, and the lessee of Lloyd v. Taylor, Id. 17, in which it was decided, that a feme covert had legally parted with her estate by being privily examined without a fine being levied, and even by the mere joining her husband in the deed, are no authority in this case; because, the long and uniform practice, which, by those decisions, sanctions this mode of disposing of her estate, violated no statute of this state, but merely a rule of the common law, which required a fine to be levied, in order to bind the estate of a feme covert. Now, admit for a moment, that a usage, however ancient, cannot control or vary the plain interpretation of a statute; still it is obvious, that the error of the argument consists in supposing that the usage set up in this case, is at variance with the provisions of the act of 1705. That act provides merely for the case of powers of attorney, proved by the attesting witness, but it does not exclude other modes of proof. It does not declare that the acknowledgment of the party shall not be sufficient, or that the certificate of the magistrate shall be sufficient to authenticate the instrument in no instance, but where the execution of it is proved by the witnesses thereto. All that can be said is, that the acknowledgment before the magistrate is not provided for; and therefore, upon common law rules, the certificate of the acknowledgment could not be received as evidence of the execution. Here, then, the practice, coeval, it is probable, with the act of 1705, and certainly extending beyond the memory of man, steps in and supplies the omission in the law to provide for the case. This practice originated, no doubt, in the opinion, that the acknowledgment of a deed is equivalent to proof by witnesses, and that, therefore, it was within the equity of the statute. This opinion became practically embodied into the land titles of this state; insomuch that we find, as far back as the recollection of the oldest witness, who has been examined extends, foreign powers of attorney were certified upon the acknowledgment of the party who gave them, and that this mode of proving the execution was much more practised than the other. What is this, then, but a usage or common law of the state, controlling the common law of England; supplying an omission in the statute law of the state, not violating any one of its provisions? In this view of the subject, then, it is plain that the cases cited from 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] have settled a principle which is strictly applicable to this case.

The witnesses who have been examined as to the usage asserted in this case, do not recollect that this question has ever been directly decided in the courts of this state; if it had, I presume it would not now be contested. But, I would ask, what stronger evidence can we have that the usage has become incorporated into the law of this state, than the uniform admission of deeds, executed under powers of attorney so acknowledged and certified as evidence of their execution, by all the courts, without an objection having been made, either at the bar or on the bench? If the objection was never taken, it must have been because the law was understood to be too plain to be controverted.

This usage, then, forms one of the great and essential land marks of real property in this state; and if the titles depending upon it are to be uprooted at this day, I will not be the judge to commence this work of devastation. Never was there a case where the principle communis error facit jus, was more strictly, and necessarily applicable.

It is therefore the opinion of the court, that the evidence which has been offered ought to go to the jury; and if, upon the evidence which has been given, they are satisfied that the usage as I have stated it, has been proved, their verdict ought to be for the plaintiff.

Verdict for plaintiff.

Case No. 9,604.

MILLIGAN v. DICKSON et al.

[2 Wash. C. C. 258; Pet. C. C. 433, note.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1808.

EJECTMENT—PUBLIC LAND—PLAINTIFF'S TITLE—PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY—RIGHT OF ENTRY.

The plaintiff claimed under a warrant and survey in 1769; but produced no proof of the payment of the purchase money to the proprietors or to the state. Such a title is not sufficient to recover in ejectment, as it does not give a right of entry.

The title of the plaintiff [the lessee of Milligan] was as follows: On the 1st of April, 1769, a special application, (No. 39,) for three hundred acres, was made for John Campbell, at Ligonier, near the fort on the Conemaugh, and a small creek running into the same, joining Samuel Duncan, called "M'Gee's Hunting Cabin." On the 5th of June a survey was returned, in pursuance of order No. 39, dated the 24th of May, 1769, for John Campbell, situated near the fort on the Conemaugh, and on a small creek called "M'Gee's Run," at his hunting cabin. The surveyor states, that "at the time of making the survey, T. Armstrong made pretensions to the land, under an order No. 64, but the special order, on which I returned the survey, was not then come to hand." Campbell died; and his widow and administratrix, by order of the orphan's court, legally sold the above land to James Christie, in 1773, which she regularly conveyed to him. In 1796, Robert Milligan was appointed attorney in fact by Christie, to sell this land, and in the year 1800, he sold and conveyed it to the lessor of the plaintiff. It appeared in evidence, that when Christie purchased the land, in 1773, he placed upon it a servant man and his wife, indentured for five years, in order to retain the possession, and take care of the land. The servant man died before the expiration of the five years, and his widow married one Hadabaugh who continued to live on the land, without paying rent, till about six years ago, when he left it, and the defendants [Dickson and others] took possession. In 1796, Hadabaugh came to the attorney of Christie, in order to buy this land, and offered as much for it as it was afterwards sold for, but it was not then accepted. The defendants claimed under a lottery order, dated April 3d, 1769, No. 64, for three hundred acres, on the forks of the Conemaugh and M'Gee's run, to include a spring. The defendants proved a settlement, near twelve months prior to April, 1769; in March of that year, Campbell disseized him, and made improvements, and continued to hold it, before and after his survey. It was proved that the land in question is fifteen miles from Ligonier, and that there was no fort at all on the Conemaugh in 1769, nor does the land join Samuel Duncan; in all other respects, the survey fits the order of April 1st, 1769. It was also proved, that no such order as the one recited in the survey of May 24th, 1769, was to be found on the books of the land office, or amongst the papers. That of the 1st of April, was found duly recorded. It did not appear, that either of the parties had paid any thing to the state for this land. The power of attorney from Christie to Milligan, or rather an exemplificatilon of it, was certified by the lord provost and chief magistrate of Edinburgh, to have been acknowledged by Christie before him, and was certified under the city seal.

This was objected to, by Dallas for defendant, because it is only an exemplification, and there is no proof that the original is lost; and it is certified, as having been merely acknowledged, whereas the act of assembly, passed in 1705, declares, that "letters of attorney, the execution whereof shall have been proved by two of the witnesses thereto, before any mayor or chief magistrate of any city, &c. where the same was made, and certified under the public seal of such city, &c., shall be good; and all deeds for lands, made by virtue of powers so proved and certified, shall be effectual." This power is not proved, but is acknowledged, and therefore it is not authenticated under the law.

Tilghman, for plaintiff, admitted that the words of the law were against him, but contended, that the uniform practice in this state had been otherwise, and that powers, proved and certified as this is, have without objection been regularly admitted.

PETERS, District Judge, was for admitting the evidence upon the principle that communis error facit jus.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, contra. The law is plain. I know nothing of a contrary practice. The court being divided, the evidence was admitted.

Dallas offered a paper, signed Richard Wallace, proved to be in the handwriting (except the signature) of Kennedy, secretary of the land office, purporting to be the application of John Campbell of April 1st 1769, but differing from it. The original is lost, and Kennedy is dead.

THE COURT thought it improper to admit the evidence, against a certified copy of the application, from the records of the land office.

The objections to the plaintiff's recovery were—First; that the survey is not a location of the application of April 1st, 1769, as it refers to an application differing in date—is not at Ligonier, nor near to any fort—and does not adjoin Samuel Duncan. Second; the lessor of the plaintiff, having only a survey, without payment of the consideration to the proprietors or to the state, has not obtained a legal title to authorize a recovery in ejectment. Third; the plaintiff has not a right of entry by possession, because it does not appear that those who held the possession, held under Christie; nor did they pay rent; which were necessary, in order to make their possession the possession of Christie. Run. Eject. 15, 58, 60, 292, 289; 2 Bac. Abr. 423; 2 Strange, 1128; 1 Wils. 176.

The plaintiff insisted upon an uninterrupted possession from 1769, till about six years ago, when the defendants gained it; but if otherwise, the plaintiff may recover, upon priority of possession, against a disseizor. Cro. Eliz. 438, V.

The other points were also controverted.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Whether the survey for Campbell does or does not fit the application, is a question of some difficulty, but you may discharge your minds from this subject, since the plaintiff places his chief reliance upon his possessory title; and if that will not support him, he cannot recover in the present action upon his paper title, for that does not give him a legal title. The question, then, for your consideration, is, whether the plaintiff has shown a right of entry? From 1769 to 1778, it is clear, that the premises were in the possession of Campbell, under whom the lessor claims; or of Christie, by his servants. It does not appear that Hadabaugh paid rent to Christie; nor, from any positive declarations from him, whether he held under or adversely to Christie. Whether you will consider his offer, in 1796, to purchase the land, and his subsequent abandonment of it, as evidence of the former, or not, is the question. If you are of opinion that he held under Christie, then it is unimportant whether he paid rent or not; and in that case, you should find for the plaintiff. If you think that he held in opposition to the title of Christie, then your verdict should be for the defendants, since an order and survey, without payment of the consideration, does not give a legal right of entry.

Verdict for defendants.

[NOTE. The case was removed to the supreme court upon a division of opinion of the judges as to the admissibility of the power of attorney from Christie to Milligan, but the case was sent back under an agreement of the parties that this single question should be decided. Evidence was introduced as to the practice in the state. There was a verdict for the plaintiffs. Case No. 9,603.]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May, 1871.

ARMY AND NAVY—MILITARY COMMISSIONS—WHEN UNCONSTITUTIONAL—LIABILITY OF MEMBERS—LIMITATION OF ACTION—DAMAGES.

1. Military commissions and their acts, in the trial of persons not in the military service, during the late civil war, in states where the courts were undisturbed, were unconstitutional.

2. The members of such commissions, and officers of the United States army, are liable for arrest and imprisonment ordered by them in such states, even though ratified and approved by the executive department of the government.

3. They are also liable for imprisonment suffered beyond their jurisdiction, if such imprisonment was the natural and necessary result of the sentence pronounced by them.

4. The limitation imposed by the act of congress of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 756], was within the power of congress, and binding upon state tribunals.

5. The defendants are not liable for any acts, nor any portion of the term of imprisonment, prior to two years before the commencement of the action: the statute begins to run notwithstanding that the imprisonment was a continued act.

6. It seems that an act of congress would not be complete justification, if the trial by a military commission was forbidden by the constitution.

7. The damages to be allowed should be compensatory, and not exemplary or punitive.

8. The action of military commissions, and duties of army officers, commented on.

This was an action of trespass, by Lambin P. Milligan, for an alleged wrongful arrest and imprisonment. The principal facts which gave rise to the controversy were undisputed. On the 5th of October, 1864, during the Rebellion, the plaintiff was a citizen of Indiana, residing in the county of Huntington, and not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States. General Hovey, one of the defendants, was the military commander of the district of Indiana, duly appointed by the president. On that day General Hovey, as such commander, ordered an officer and some soldiers to proceed to Huntington and arrest the plaintiff. He was accordingly arrested at his house there and brought to Indianapolis, and confined in prison. He was shortly after tried before a military commission on certain charges brought against him for conspiring against the government, affording aid and comfort to the enemy, inciting insurrection, disloyal practices, and violation of the usages of war. The commission convicted him and sentenced him to be hanged. His imprisonment was continued under this sentence at Indianapolis till the 2d day of June, 1865, when, a commutation having been made in the sentence by the president, General Hovey ordered the plaintiff to be removed to the penitentiary of Ohio, at Columbus, in compliance with instructions from the war department, where he remained till the 10th of April, 1866, when he was liberated. In the meantime, on the 10th of May, 1865, the plaintiff had made application to this court for a writ of habeas corpus, upon which the opinions of the judges were divided, and the questions certified to the supreme court, under the act of congress of April 29th, 1802. That court, after elaborate argument and consideration, held that the military commission had no jurisdiction to try and sentence the petitioner, and ordered the writ to issue according to the prayer of the petitioner, and that he be discharged from custody. Ex parte Milligan, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 2. It was for these acts thus done by General Hovey as military commander, by other defendants as members of the military commission, and by others as having some agency in his arrest, trial and imprisonment, that the action was brought, although the plaintiff simply set them out as a wrongful arrest and imprisonment, without stating the reasons which influenced the defendants. The defendants pleaded: (1) not guilty; (2) that the arrest and imprisonment grew out of the plaintiff's participation in the offenses charged against him before the military commission; that he was guilty thereof, and that the defendants were acting as officers in the army of the United States, under the authority of the president, without malice, and with no more force than necessary; (3) that for all acts done prior to the 13th of March, 1866, the limitation of two years prescribed by the seventh section of the habeas corpus act of congress of March 3, 1863, applies, the suit having been brought on the 13th of March, 1868; and the defendants say as to the imprisonment after March 13, 1866, they are not guilty.

T. A. Hendricks, for plaintiff.

J. W. Gordon and Benjamin Harrison, for defendants.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge (charging jury). The agency of most of the defendants in the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff is not seriously controverted. The arrest was made on the order of General Hovey, and by him he was held for military trial.

The defendants Spooner, Dehart, Bennett, Murray, and Williams, were members of the military commission that tried and convicted him, and it was in consequence of their action that he was still retained in prison. If they had acquitted him it is a fair inference he would have been released, unless, indeed, other charges were preferred against him. This being the case on the part of the plaintiff, we now proceed to consider the defense.

However it may have been before the arrest and trial, there is no doubt that the acts of General Hovey and his brother officers, in the seizure, trial and sentence of the plaintiff, were ratified and approved by the executive department of the government. The legislation of congress has also been to the same effect. Act March 3, 1863, § 4 (12 Stat. 756); Act May 11, 1866, § 1 (14 Stat. 46); Act March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 432); 3 Davis' Supp. Ind. St. 570.

The first question, therefore, is whether this constitutes a good defense. The supreme court of the United States decided upon the facts then before it that the action of the military commission in the trial and sentence of the plaintiff was null and void. [Ex parte Milligan] 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 2. The court also decided that in the trial and sentence the constitutional rights of the plaintiff were invaded; that is, the act done was prohibited by the constitution of the United States. A majority of the court held that even congress could not authorize the act. If an act is prohibited by the constitution, and it is beyond the power of congress to authorize it, then it may be said the wrong done by the act is not subject to complete indemnity by congress, because then the prohibition of the constitution to protect private rights would be without effect. Id. 136. As the minority of the judges of the supreme court in the Milligan Case held that the trial and sentence might have been legal if congress had authorized military commissions, then I think it is fairly to be inferred that in their opinion congress could give indemnity for the same, although the trial was illegal at the time for want of an act of congress. I have preferred to rule, for the purposes of this trial, that an act of congress would not be a complete justification if the military trial was forbidden by the constitution.

This question is undoubtedly of great importance, and it has been reserved for future consideration. It is for this reason that the second defense is placed on the ground that there was martial law, suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and war and military operations in Indiana at the time of arrest. Under the present ruling of the court, proof of this last averment is essential to the validity of the defense. In the case presented to the supreme court it was assumed that there was at the time no war in Indiana, and it was declared that no usage of war could sanction a military trial there for any offense of a citizen not connected with the military service. But in this case the defendants have been permitted to aver and give evidence touching a state of war before, at and after the arrest of the plaintiff. Under what condition of affairs would the law have given validity to the commission that tried the plaintiff? This question is answered by the supreme court of the United States in the case so often referred to. These are some of the principles stated by that court: "Martial law cannot arise from a threatened invasion. The necessity must be actual and present; the invasion real, such as effectually closes the courts and deposes the civil administration."

"There are occasions when martial law can be properly applied. If in foreign invasion or civil war the courts are actually closed, and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theatre of active military operations where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority thus overthrown. * * * As necessity creates the rule, so it limits its duration, for if this (military) government is continued after the courts are reinstated, it is a gross usurpation of power. Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction; it is also confined to the locality of actual war."

Does the evidence before the jury bring this case within the conditions named? We know judicially, and therefore it is proved, that the federal courts of Indiana were open during the time the events occurred which have given rise to this controversy. Cases, both civil and criminal, were tried, and rights of person and property determined. A part of the state had been invaded in July, 1863, but that had passed away. There were occasional disturbances, the draft was sometimes opposed, the arrest of deserters resisted, rendering necessary the aid of soldiers. A few were killed in these collisions, but the civil administration of the state was in full vigor. It was not impossible to administer criminal justice according to law in the federal courts. A single instance only is specified where military assistance was required to enforce the process of the federal court, and that was merely preventive. It is impossible to doubt that if the facts as established now had been before the supreme court of the United States in the Case of Milligan, the result would have been the same. It is claimed that there was a great conspiracy pervading the state, having for its end a revolution, civil and military, in the interest of the enemies of the government. But, in fact, a few only were arrested and tried before the military commission, and it cannot admit of question that the plaintiff could have been taken by civil officers before the courts, and there tried for any offenses of which he had been guilty.

I do not wish to withdraw from your consideration the facts on which you are to decide, but if the case of Ex parte Milligan, reported in 4 Wall. [supra], is to stand as the rule of his trial before the military commission and the test of its validity, then I am impelled to say that no fair construction of the evidence presented to you has changed that rule, or protected with the forms of constitutional law that which the supreme court then pronounced null and void.

It is insisted that the act of congress of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 755), in relation to the writ of habeas corpus, recognized the authority of the military to arrest and to hold the plaintiff in custody until a grand jury met, and that did not occur till May, 1865. If General Hovey and those whom he obeyed had followed the directions of that act, it is probable no controversy would have arisen upon the subject. The act of 1863 intended that a man in the condition of Milligan, a citizen of the state, not connected with the land or naval service, should be tried by the civil courts; that his alleged offenses should be investigated by a grand jury, and, if indicted, that he should be tried before the civil courts of the United States, with a jury to settle disputed facts, and a judge to expound the law. But it is too clear for debate, that the act of congress of 1863 was not considered as ruling the case. Those who ordered and confirmed the trial of the plaintiff by military commission claimed and exercised the power as a law of the army above and beyond the authority of the civil courts. If it be conceded, therefore, that he could have been taken by a company of soldiers instead of by the process of a civil court, those who made the arrest should, in good faith, have submitted to the law of 1863, and brought the plaintiff before the proper court on the charges made against him. The military trial, sentence, and subsequent imprisonment of the plaintiff find, therefore, no justification in the act of 1863.

The third defense, which may have a great influence in the case, is the statute of limitations of 1863 (12 Stat. 757). The seventh section of that statute declares that no suit or prosecution, civil or criminal, shall be maintained for any arrest or imprisonment made or other trespasses or wrongs committed at any time during the Rebellion, by virtue or under color of any authority derived from or exercised by or under the president of the United States, or by or under any act of congress, unless the same shall be commenced within two years next after the arrest, imprisonment, trespass or wrongs complained of.

At the time this statute was passed we were engaged in a great civil war. In such a war, perhaps, more than any other, under the influence of the passions created by the conflict, and the zeal of even the officers and soldiers who combatted for the maintenance of the government, it was foreseen that private rights, both of person and property, might be invaded; that wrongs might be committed for which, under the constitution and laws, the person committing them might be called to answer before the courts of the country. If we concede that there might be wrongs for which there could not be absolute indemnity, still it was but an act of justice to those thus subject to prosecutions to declare that remedies should be sought for through the courts within a certain time, provided it were not so short as, in effect, to destroy the remedy itself. The acts for which actions were to be brought within a limited time were those done under the authority of the chief magistrate of the nation—the commander-in-chief of its armies. I cannot doubt, therefore, that it was competent for congress to enact that all such actions should be commenced within a reasonable time after the wrong was committed. The limitation prescribed by congress was two years, thus giving ample opportunity for the enforcement of any rights created or protected by the constitution or laws. It has always been decided that this is a matter resting with the legislature, and the only question is whether the limitation is within the control of congress, this action having been originally brought in one of the courts of the state. But states might take different views of the subject, and in some, where rebellious sentiments were paramount, the legislatures might leave such actions against the agents of the government without limitation. There must, therefore, be an authority coextensive with the nation which could create a uniform rule, and to congress only is such power given from the nature of the case. Even if it be true that the states may be able, subject to certain qualifications, to create rules for their own courts, which is not here intended to be questioned, yet, in the absence of any such binding rules, the legislation of congress, in the cases named, must be a law to a state as well as to a federal court. I think, therefore, that the statute of limitation of 1863 is obligatory in this case.

The action was commenced on the 13th of March, 1868. Two years would go back to the 13th of March, 1866. The plaintiff was released on the 10th April, 1866, and whatever may be said of his ability to commence a suit prior to that time, afterwards his power was complete. He waited till the 13th of March, 1868. It is said that the imprisonment was one continued act, and consequently that two years not having passed from its termination to the commencement of the suit, the action included the whole term, notwithstanding a part of the imprisonment occurred more than two years before; but it seems to me that the act of congress was intended to say to any one who delayed his action it should be at his own risk. There is no saving in the statute, for imprisonment or any other cause. It was the design that whatever was done by way of suit should be done quickly, and not to leave officers and soldiers at a distant day to be harassed by litigation. In any event, therefore, the defendants would not be liable for any acts done prior to March 13, 1866. Are General Hovey and the officers of the military court responsible for any portion of the imprisonment in Ohio? The facts bearing on this part of the case are not disputed. The plaintiff, after the commutation of his sentence, and while the federal court and its grand jury were in session in this district, by order of General Hovey, was on the 2d of June, 1865, sent to the penitentiary of Ohio, at Columbus, and there received by the warden. General Hovey made this order pursuant to instructions from the president, and, therefore, can claim the same exemption as for previous action, and no more. The members of the military court had no further agency in his transfer and imprisonment in Ohio than what grew out of the trial and sentence, and the only question is whether that was not the necessary and natural result of the sentence pronounced on the plaintiff. On the theory that the military court had jurisdiction of the case, the president could order the sentence to be carried into execution, or commute it. Whatever, therefore, was done to the plaintiff in Ohio was in consequence of his trial and conviction by the military commission; and if that fail as a justification to those who gave the instructions to General Hovey, it must also fail to those through whose action or instrumentality the transfer to Ohio was made.

The only remaining question, if the jury shall find a verdict for the plaintiff, is, what amount of compensation shall be allowed. That rests exclusively with the jury. At the same time a few remarks by the court on this point may not be out of place. It is conceded by the plaintiff's counsel that the damages should be only compensatory, and not exemplary or punitive.

The principal defendants were officers in the army, acting under the president of the United States and his military subordinates. The members of the military commission were detailed as such by their official superior. All were of a profession where obedience was exacted as a rule of their conduct. It was at a crisis when much alarm was felt by the public. For the purpose of showing the reasons for their action, evidence has been introduced by the defendants tending to prove that there was a conspiracy of some persons, the aim of which was aid and comfort to the rebels, and hostility to the government. There was in Indiana, in 1863, a secret society known as the "Sons of Liberty." There can be no doubt that some of the members of that society—how many does not appear—were engaged in a treasonable design against the government, and that their purpose was to involve the whole of the society, if possible; if not, then all whom they could influence in that design. The military authorities here at the time had knowledge of this scheme, and under the belief that it was indispensable to thwart it at once, arrested some of the supposed leaders, and among the rest the plaintiff. Under the convictions produced by this state of things the defendants arrested, tried and condemned the plaintiff upon the evidence before them. Whether the evidence or what might have been produced would have warranted his conviction before a civil court need not be decided. It is clear that the defendants were performing what they considered a military duty.

It should also be borne in mind that the conduct of the defendants in relation to the plaintiff was approved by those whose judgment and opinion they would regard with the greatest respect—the highest officers of the nation. All the circumstances should be regarded in weighing the acts of the defendants. If you should believe there is any evidence connecting the plaintiff with a conspiracy against the government, though it would not justify his trial by a military commission, yet it would undoubtedly affect your conclusions upon the question of damages; so, too, if you should believe the acts of the defendants were done without sufficient excuse, and the plaintiff was an innocent man.

As the court reviews the law and evidence the plaintiff can recover damages only for the imprisonment from the 13th March, 1866—for that he is entitled to compensation. That would include certainly any pecuniary loss thereby sustained, as well directly as indirectly. If you believe there is no evidence connecting the defendants, Zumro and Bratton, with the imprisonment of the plaintiff, then as to them you will find a verdict of not guilty.

It will be observed that the charge of the court has been rather an exposition of the law than a commentary on the facts, and that has necessarily been so. The material facts are not in controversy, and the question is, what is the law upon these facts? The facts in dispute the court leaves to you. The law you will take from the court. I commend the case to your careful, candid, and intelligent consideration.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with nominal damages.

MILLIGAN v. MAYNE.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 210.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1820.

DEEDS—WHEN ACKNOWLEDGED—RECORDATION—CERTIFICATE OF CLERK—EVIDENCE—RECEIPT.

1. A deed of land in Maryland, acknowledged by the grantor, before two justices of the peace of the county in Maryland in which the grantor then resided, not being the county in which the land laid, is not properly recorded under the act of 1766 (chapter 14), unless there were indorsed on the deed a certificate of the clerk of the county under the seal of the court that the two justices were, at the time, justices of the peace of that county, and such certificate recorded with the deed.

2. A receipt at the bottom of a collector's certificate of a tax-sale, to which certificate there is a subscribing witness, may be given in evidence, without proving the certificate of sale by the subscribing witness.

3. The receipts of the collector are not evidence upon proof of his handwriting if he be within the jurisdiction of the court, and not a party in the cause.

Trespass quare clausum fregit.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent,) decided, under the Maryland Act 1766 (chapter 14), that when a deed of land in Maryland is acknowledged before two justices of the peace in the county where the grantor resides (not being the county in which the land lies) such deed is not properly recorded, unless there were indorsed on the deed, a certificate of the clerk of the county, under the seal of the court, that the two justices were, at the time, justices of the peace of that county, and such certificate recorded with the deed.

On the trial, the plaintiff's counsel, Mr. Jones, offered in evidence a receipt signed by the defendant at the bottom of a certificate of sale signed and sealed by Joseph Bromley, collector of taxes, which receipt purported that the defendant had received from Stephen McDade, under whom the plaintiff claimed title, the amount of taxes for which the lot had been sold by Bromley to the defendant according to the terms of the sale. To the collector's certificate there was a subscribing witness, who was not present. The receipt was dated some months after the collector's certificate. The plaintiff proved the defendant's handwriting to the receipt.

THE COURT permitted it to be given in evidence, but refused to admit the collector's receipts in evidence upon proof of his handwriting, he himself being within the jurisdiction of the court.

MILLIGAN & HIGGINS GLUE CO. v. UPTON.

[1 Ban. & A. 497; 4 Cliff. 237; 6 O. G. 837; Merw. Pat. Inv. 267.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1874.[2]

PATENTS — REISSUE — JURISDICTION OF COMMISSIONER—NOVELTY—INVENTION—COMMINUTED GLUE.

1. Jurisdiction to reissue patents is vested in the commissioner, and his decision, upon an application for a reissue, is final and conclusive, and not re-examinable in a suit for infringement, in the circuit court, unless it is apparent, upon the face of the patent, that the commissioner has exceeded his authority, or there is such a repugnancy, between the old and the new patent, that it must be held, as matter of legal construction, that the new patent is not for the same invention as was embraced and secured in the original.

2. The principles, governing the awarding and granting of reissues of patents, examined.

3. Articles of manufacture may be new in a commercial sense, when they are not new in the sense of the patent law; and the mere reduction of an article of bulk, to one of a smaller size, is not, in general, the subject of a patent as a new manufacture, unless the properties of the article are improved by the introduction of some new ingredients, or by the subtraction of one or more of the ingredients of the original article, by which the new product is improved and made more useful.

4. The rule that new articles of commerce are not patentable as new manufactures, unless it appears, that the production of the new article involved the exercise of invention or discovery, beyond what was necessary to construct the apparatus for its manufacture or production, reaffirmed, and the authorities, sustaining it, examined and approved.

5. A reissued patent, claimed comminuted glue as a new article of manufacture. The patented glue was made by cutting or rasping the common commercial glue, so that its large flakes were reduced to small particles. The mechanism, by which this result was accomplished, was not claimed in the patent. The advantages of the patented glue, over the glue in its commercial form, were said to be: 1st, that the particles of the glue being smaller, presented a greater surface to the soluble action of water, and thereby insured its more speedy solution; 2d, that the patented glue could be more conveniently put up in small packages, for domestic use and for the retail trade, than the glue in flakes, and with less danger of loss. Unimpeached proof was exhibited in the record, showing that flake or commercial glue had been ground into small particles, long before the alleged invention, and that the glue comminuted by this and other means than those described in the specification, is as readily dissolved and prepared for practical use, as the patented glue: Held, that the reduction of the glue as manufactured in flakes, to small particles, as described in the specification of the complainant's patent, does not involve the exercise of invention or discovery, without which, the product of the described process or apparatus, cannot be regarded as a patentable improvement.

[Bill in equity for the infringement of reissued letters-patent No. 4,072, July 12, 1870, for improvement in the manufacture of glue. Complainants charged infringement, and prayed for an account of all such gains and profits as the respondent (George Upton) has thereby made, and for an injunction. Respondent denied the charge of infringement, and set up several other defences upon the merits, as follows: 1. That the original patent was not the proper subject of a surrender, as it was neither inoperative nor invalid, and that it was not lawfully reissued, as the reissued patent was not for the same invention as was the original patent. 2. That the alleged improvement was not, at the date of the assumed invention thereof, the proper subject of invention, nor a novelty proper to be secured by the grant of valid letters-patent. 3. That the alleged invention, before the alleged making or discovery thereof, was known to and used by the several persons named in the answer, and was described in the several mechanical and scientific works therein mentioned. 4. That neither the patentee nor the complainants ever used or employed the pro-

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. 1. Patentees, whenever their patent is inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, or by reason of the patentee claiming as his own invention more than he had a right to claim, as new, may surrender such patent, if the error arose by inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention; and, in that event, it is made the duty of the commissioner, on payment of the duty required by law, to cause a new patent to be issued to the patentee for the same invention, and in accordance with the corrected specification. 16 Stat. 206.

Neither reissued nor extended patents can be abrogated by an infringer, in a suit against him to recover damages for unlawfully making, using or selling a patented invention, upon the ground that the letters patent were procured by fraud in prosecuting the application for the same before the commissioner. Jurisdiction to reissue patents, is vested in the commissioner, and his decision, in such an application, is final and conclusive, and not re-examinable in a suit in the circuit court, unless it is apparent, upon the face of the patent, that the commissioner has exceeded his authority, or that there is such a repugnancy between the old and the new patent, that it must be held, as matter of legal construction, that the new patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent. Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516. Power to surrender patents, for the purposes suggested in the act of congress, implies that the specification may be corrected, to cure the defect and to supply the deficiency; but interpolations, in a reissued patent, of new features, or ingredients, or devices, which were neither described, suggested nor substantially indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model, are not allowed. Battin v. Taggert, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 74; O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 62; Sickles v. Evans [Case No. 12,839]; Cahart v. Austin [Id. 2,288]. Nor is parol testimony admissible, in an application for a reissue, to enlarge the scope and nature of the invention, beyond what was described, suggested or substantially indicated in the original specification, drawings or patent office model, as the purpose of a surrender and reissue is not to introduce new features, ingredients nor devices into the patent, but to render effectual the actual invention for which the original patent should have been granted. Whether a reissued patent is, or is not, for the same invention as the surrendered original, cannot be satisfactorily determined, without a comparison of the two, as the decision must necessarily depend very largely upon the question, whether the specification and drawings of the reissued patent are, or are not, substantially the same as those of the original; and, if not, whether the changes or alterations are, or are not, greater than the act of congress, granting the power of surrender and reissue, allows.

Attention will first be called to the original patent, in the specification of which, the patentee states that, he has invented a new and useful article of manufacture, which he therein denominates instantaneous glue. He then points out certain objections to the glue of commerce found in the market at that date, as follows: (1) That a long time is required to prepare the glue for use, first by soaking it in cold water, and afterward in heating it in a hot-water bath. (2) That the glue, when thus prepared, is still often imperfectly dissolved. (3) That dry glue and gelatine, prepared in that way, are frequently rendered unfit for adhesive or dietetic purposes, or for any domestic use. (4) That it is difficult to make up small packages of such glue for retail, as the flakes have sharp angular edges, and would cut the wrappers, occasioning much waste of time and stock. His invention, as he states, obviates all those objections to the common glue, and consists in an article of glue which does not require to be prepared for solution by soaking; that it can be dissolved in large quantities, so as to be ready for mechanical use in less than five minutes, and in small quantities, for domestic use, in less than one minute; and can be put up in small packages, by machinery, or by hand, of uniform size and of regular form and weight, similar to those in which ground spices and other like articles are put up for domestic use, and to be sold by retail merchants. Its whole substance, and all of the ingredients of the patented glue, are the same as the common glue, nor does the patentee set up any different pretence. But he does state that, the patented product is superior to the glue of commerce, in that it has an appearance more pleasing to the eye; and that glues of the same grade, if subjected to his process, have apparently a whiter color, and are, therefore, more marketable, and will bring a higher price. Minute description is then given of the process of making the patented glue, and of the mechanical means employed to accomplish the object, which consists, as represented in the specifications, of a hopper, into which is mounted two sawrolls, resting in suitable bearings, and running as indicated in drawings, and are propelled by power-pulleys, gears or other suitable mechanism. Particular description is also given of certain devices, such as are shown in the drawings, to crush the flakes of glue deposited in the hopper, and of other devices to prevent the contents of the hopper from falling out through the openings between the saws, and to prevent the saws from fouling by means of any foreign matter during their revolution. Flakes of glue, of the ordinary kind, are put into the hopper, and, by the rotation of the toothed saw-rolls, the flakes of glue are crushed into small and quite uniform pieces, about half the size of a barley-corn. Figure 3 of the drawings also shows another apparatus, which is a finer cutting machine, to which, as the representation is, the coarse product of the prior machine is subsequently to be subjected. Briefly described, it also consists of a hopper, to be used to receive the product of the prior operation, in the lower part of which run two rasping-rolls, by the rotation of which, in connection with the ancillary-described devices, the glue stock is cut as fine as required, when the new product passes off to a receptacle beneath the machine. Separate description of the different devices is given, which shows, beyond all doubt, that the fine cutting, as there represented, is done by rasping-rolls, or rolls with rasping faces. Conclusive support of that theory is derived from the description given of the particles composing the product of the second apparatus, which is, that they are of a "curved, scale-like form, which renders the rasped glue a loose, light, open. incompact mass," and of a character to remain so, until quite dissolved.

What the patentee claimed, in that patent, is "instantaneous glue," in which claim he expressly includes gelatinous or grutinous substances, called glue, produced by the process of disintegrational fine cutting, akin to rasping, by which the particles are made thin, scale-like, curling, and are thoroughly fractured, so that they form a loose, incompact mass, readily permeable to and solvent in, hot water. Alterations, consisting of omissions, and, in some cases, of additions, as well as obvious change of phraseology, are unmistakably noticeable in the specifications of the reissued patent, as compared with the specification of the original patent; but, inasmuch, as the legal purpose of a surrender and reissue, is, that a patent, which was before inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient specification, may be replaced by one which is operative and valid, it becomes necessary to look with care into the nature and scope of the actual alterations made in any given case, before deciding whether they are such as are allowable under the power conferred by the act of congress, or whether they are such that it must be held that the invention, secured by the reissued patent, is not the same as that embodied in the surrendered patent. Mere changes of phraseology will not be noticed, as it may be assumed that they are not of a character to affect the rights of the parties in the case. Material omissions and additions will be noticed, of which the following are the most important: (1) Two passages in the specification of the original patent are entirely omitted in the reissue patent, as follows: (a.) That "the form of each tooth" (referring to the teeth in the rasping-rolls of the fine cutting machine), "should be such as to give to each particle of glue cut off, a curved, scale-like form, which renders the rasped glue a loose, light, open, incompact mass," etc. (b.) That passage preceding the technical claim, in which the patentee states that what he desires to secure by letters patent is any of the gelatinous or glutinous substances commonly called glue, produced by the process of disintegrational fine cutting, akin to rasping, by which the particles are made thin, scale-like, curling, and are thoroughly fractured, so that they form a loose incompact mass, readily permeable to, and solvent in, hot water. (2) Important words are also omitted in several other parts of the specification, such as "fine cut," "fine cutting," and the words "cut" and "cutting" in several places, when used to describe the action of the rasping machine, or the second apparatus to cut finer the product of the first described operation. (3) Additions, suited to support a corresponding theory, are also made in the claim and in the disclaimer of the reissued patent. "Comminuted" is substituted for "instantaneous," in the claims, as the prefix of "glue"; but the change in the disclaimer is much greater, as the language employed tends strongly to support the theory that the patentee, instead of regarding his means or apparatus as one designed to reduce the flakes of glue by a rasping process, intends to claim for it the function of a crushing machine, which is evidenced by the fact that he omits the introductory sentence of the disclaimer of the original specification, in which he describes his process as one akin to rasping, and also, from the language of the disclaimer itself, as exhibited in the reissued patent. Material alterations are also made in the body of the new specification, as compared with the old, of which the following is, perhaps, the most material. "My invention," says the patentee in the original patent, "consists in an article of glue, which does not require to be prepared for solution by soaking;" but, in the reissued patent, he says, it consists of glue comminuted to small particles of practically uniform size, as distinguished from the glue in angular flakes, hitherto known.

Based upon these, and other differences between the two patents, it is insisted by the respondent, that they show that the issued patent is not for the same invention as that secured by the original patent; and it must be admitted that the changes made, including omissions and additions, tend pretty strongly to support the proposition. But the question of construction is still open, which must first be determined, before any conclusion can be formed, whether the invention described in the reissued patent is or is not substantially the same as that secured by the original patent. Alterations of the kind may or may not have the effect to change the character of the invention, as matter of legal construction; and, if they do introduce new features into the improvement, and materially enlarge the scope and operation of the patent, beyond what was described, suggested, or substantially indicated in the original specifications, drawings, or patent office model, it follows, that the defence that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as the original, must prevail, and it becomes the duty of the court to declare the reissued patent void.

Courts of justice will avoid such a result, if they can reasonably do so, by a liberal application of the maxim, that letters patent are to receive a liberal construction, and, if practicable, to be so interpreted as to uphold and not to destroy the right of the inventor. Turrill v. Railroad, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 491; Ames v. Howard [Case No. 326]; Blanchard v. Sprague [Id. 1,518]. Slight changes will not sustain such a defence, nor will the court, in any case, declare the patent void on that account, if by the true construction of the two instruments, each being taken as a whole, the invention, secured by a reissued patent, is not substantially different from that embodied in the original patent.

Flakes of glue, reduced to small particles, may be called "comminuted glue," whether the change is effected by breaking, pounding, rasping or grinding, or by any other known means of pulverizing or of reducing the common flakes to small particles, so that there is not necessarily any substantial repugnance between the claims of the respective specifications. Exactly the same description is given of the apparatus or machinery, and the process used, or represented as used, in making the alleged new manufacture, in the new patent, as in the old; and the description there given, taken as a whole, is equally full, to show that, the new manufacture, as described in both specifications, is the product of the rasping or fine cutting machine, to the action of which, the coarse stock, so called, is subjected, after it is discharged from the first described apparatus; which alleged new manufacture consists of particles of glue, first broken from flakes, into what is called coarse stock, and then rasped or cut from the coarse stock by the rasping or fine cutting machine, which latter product is minutely described, in the specification of the original patent, as particles of glue of a curved, scale-like form, constituting a loose, light, open, incompact mass, which, during the course of solution, will remain thus loose, light, open, and incompact, until quite dissolved. Taken as a whole, it is quite clear, that the patentee, in the original patent, never intended to claim, as his invention, anything, except the glue produced, as therein described, by the process of disintegrational fine cutting, akin to rasping, by which the particles are made thin, scale-like, and curling, so that they will form a loose, incompact mass, readily permeable to, and solvent in, hot water. Nothing more than that is either described or suggested in the original patent, nor is anything more substantially indicated, either in the drawings or the samples of the alleged new manufacture sent to the patent office, at the time he applied for a patent. More than that, he did not pretend to claim, nor would the patent have been valid if more had been granted, as the specification, filed, would not have been a compliance with the terms of the act of congress, which require the applicant for a patent to file in the patent office a written description of the invention and of the manner and process of making and using the same, in such full, clear, concise and exact terms, as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it appertains, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make and use the patented improvement. Expressions undoubtedly, are contained in the specification of the reissued patent, which indicate, pretty strongly, an intent to give it a broader scope and effect; but it is a sufficient answer to everything of the kind to say, that the apparatus and process described for making and using the alleged new manufacture are precisely the same in the reissued patent, as in the specification of the original patent, and it is plain, as anything in the principles of mechanics can be, that the described process and apparatus are not suited to produce any other product, than that for which the original patent was granted. Attempts are now made, in argument, to expand the reissued patent, so as to cover the product of glue flakes when reduced to small particles, whether the reduction is effected by breaking the flakes, or by pounding, rasping or grinding the same, or by any other known means of reducing the ordinary glue flakes from their usual size and form to small particles, in order that the mass of particles may be more readily soluble in water, and be more conveniently put up in small packages for the retail trade. Sufficient has already been remarked to show that such a theory cannot be sustained, as the description of the apparatus and process of making and using the alleged new manufacture, is repugnant to any such conclusion. Strong support to the opposite conclusion, is also derived, from the description of the product or alleged new manufacture, as twice given in the specification of the original patent. Confirmation of the same view, of a conclusive nature, if any more be needed, is also found in the disclaimer, contained in the specification of the reissued patent, in which the patentee states, that he does not claim the mechanism or process by which his alleged new article of manufacture is produced, and in which he admits, in express terms, that other means of crushing or reducing the glue flakes may be used to manufacture the alleged new article, without infringing his alleged invention, which, is entirely obvious, unless the whole description of his process and apparatus, as given, both in the original and reissued patents, be altogether rejected, as without meaning. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, as the case should be, I am of the opinion, that the defence, that the reissued patent is not for the same invention as the original patent, is not sustained; but that conclusion, it must be understood, is based upon the theory, that the reissued patent, when properly construed and defined, covers only the alleged new manufacture produced by the process and apparatus described in the specification of both patents.

2. All the other defences set up in the answer are still open, and the respondent contends, in the second place, that the supposed improvement is not the proper subject of invention, and that it was not a novelty, at that date, which could properly be secured by the grant of valid letters patent. Persons who invent or discover new and useful manufactures, are as much entitled to patents, as those who invent or discover new and useful arts, machinery, or compositions of matter; but the right to a patent for such an invention or discovery, is subject to the same conditions, as are annexed by law to the right to a patent for any one of the other classes; consequently, the manufacture must be new and useful, and it must be one not before known or used by others in this country, and one not before patented nor previously described in any printed publication in this or any other country, nor have been in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to the application for a patent. Instruments of this kind usually contain allegations averring a compliance with those several conditions, but all such allegations are open to review by the courts, when properly presented as a defence. Patents in certain cases may, doubtless, be granted, both for the manufacture, and for the process or method of producing the same, if both are new and useful; and no doubt is entertained, that the two inventions or discoveries may be secured by separate patents, or that they may both be included in the same original patent, if made the subject of separate and distinct claims. Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co. [Case No. 5 583]; Providence Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 796. Articles of manufacture may be new, in the commercial sense, when they are not new, in the sense of the patent law, as, in the case of the reduction of a substance from a larger to a smaller size, where the properties remain the same, as they were, before the reduction was effected. Old substances may be converted into new ones by being compounded with other ingredients, where such other ingredients have the effect to render the compound more effective or efficacious, or to change the properties of the original substance, if the compound produced, involves the exercise of invention or discovery, and is both new and useful. New composition of matter is expressly embraced in the category of patentable improvements, and the very term implies, that the product differs materially in its properties from what was previously in common use; but the mere reduction of an article of bulk to one of a smaller size, is not, in general, the subject of a patent as a new manufacture, unless the properties of the article are improved by the introduction of some new ingredients, or by the subtraction of one or more of the ingredients of the original article, by which the new product is improved and made more useful.

Ground gypsum, or plaster, is comparatively a new article of commerce, but it was never patentable as a new manufacture, as wheat and other grain were ground at a much earlier period in the history of civilization. Refined sugar was formerly put up and sold in the lump, or in loaves. Since that time, the refined sugar is pulverized and sold, in the market, in that form. Such pulverized sugar is comparatively a new article of commerce, but it was never patentable as a new manufacture, as, at the time it was introduced, it was matter of common knowledge that it could be pulverized in the mortar, or by other well known means in common use. Spices are now ground, instead of being pounded in the mortar, and in that form they are sold for general use. Such an article is comparatively new, in the commercial sense, but was never patentable, as the ground spice possesses no different properties from the unground spice, or such as is pounded in a mortar, or from that which is comminuted by any process.

Machines for grinding gypsum, spices or coffee, or for pulverizing refined sugar, if new and useful, may be the proper subjects of valid letters patent, but the article of commerce produced by such machines was never patentable, as the grinding did not produce any change in the properties of the unground article, nor did the work of grinding involve the exercise of any invention or discovery, beyond what was necessary in preparing the apparatus to accomplish the work. Small manufactures of iron, such as nails, were formerly, within the memory of man, made from iron in the bar, by heating the bar in a forge and by drawing the iron out into a rod, on the anvil, by the hammer and sledge, or by first cutting the heated bar into rods by means of a chisel. Subsequently, rolling machines were constructed, by which the bars of iron were flattened, and machinery was also devised, by which the flattened bars were cut into strips, called nail rods. Nail rods immediately became an article of commerce; but the article was never patentable as a new manufacture, as its properties were not changed, and it was matter of common knowledge, that similar rods had, for a long period. been made in the manner already described.

Two principal suggestions are made, to show that the comminuted glue may be patentable, as a new manufacture: (1) That the mass of particles are more soluble, when wanted for practical use, than the glue in flakes, as purchased in the market before the flakes are subjected to the patented process. (2) That the patented product may be more conveniently put up in small packages for domestic use and for the retail trade, than the glue in flakes, and with less danger of loss. Grant all that, still the suggestions are not sufficient to show that the comminuted glue is patentable, as a new manufacture, as the properties of the glue, in flakes, are not improved, and for the reason, that the change, effected by the described process, does not involve the exercise of any invention or discovery. Refined sugar, when pulverized, is more readily soluble in water, than when in the lump or loaf, and it is a matter of common knowledge, that small particles of any soluble substance are more readily dissolved in liquids, than large lumps or loaves of the same substance. Like many other substances, glue, when comminuted into small particles, whether the operation is effected by breaking, pounding, rasping, grating or grinding, is more readily soluble in water, than when the attempt is made to dissolve it in the flakes or other large bodies. Common experience is sufficient to verify that proposition, and the remark applies, with equal truth and potency, to many other articles, such as salt, refined sugar, gypsum, alum, camphor, gums of various kinds, and to many other substances in common use. Small particles present comparatively a larger proportion of surface to the liquid, into which they are put, than more bulky ones, in consequence of which, the substance, if permeable to liquids and soluble, will be more readily dissolved. Beyond doubt, glue, comminuted, is more readily soluble than glue in flakes, but the admission affords no support to the theory that comminuted glue is patentable, as the fact, that small particles of soluble substances are more readily dissolved in liquids than larger ones, is matter of common knowledge, and has been known for ages, whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Mere additional convenience in packing the comminuted article, as compared with the flake glue, proves nothing to support the theory of the complainant, as the fact has been matter of common knowledge for centuries. Much aid is derived in the investigation of the matters in controversy in the case, from the recent decisions of the patent office. Patents of the kind, it seems, were formerly granted without much consideration or scrutiny; but the recent decisions of the office, afford evidence of a more thorough and rigid investigation, and they appear to recognize, fully, the well-founded distinction between a new article of commerce, and a new manufacture, in the sense of the patent law, and, appear to fully comprehend the rule, that new articles of commerce are not patentable, as new manufactures, unless it appears, in the given case, that the production of the new article, involved the exercise of invention or discovery, beyond what was necessary to construct the apparatus for its manufacture or production. Six years ago, Commissioner Fisher, adopted that rule in a well-considered opinion, which it appears the patent office, for the most part, has since followed. Ex parte Ackerson, Com. Dec. 1869, p. 75. Commissioner Leggett applied the same rule in Ex parte Chatillon, 2 O. G. 115, in which he says, that invention is an essential prerequisite to a patent; and, it appears, that he rejected the application in the case, upon the ground that the applicant had simply substituted one device for another, without overcoming any obstacle, or making any discovery, or manifesting any invention. Acting Commissioner Thacher, also ruled in the same way, in a case which came before him, and in the course of his opinion, he censures the practice of granting patents, in such cases, where there is no invention, and pronounces it a fraud upon the public, to be condemned in the strongest terms. Bates v. Seeger, 2 O. G. 493. Views equally explicit, are expressed by Commissioner Leggett, in a more recent case. Ex parte Jerome, 3 O. G. 64. Great reliance was placed, in that case, by the applicant, upon the words "new article of manufacture," as sufficient to show, that the alleged improvement was patentable; but the commissioner decided, that those words will not have any such effect, and, he accordingly rejected the application. Repeated rulings, to that effect, have been made in the patent office, within the last two or three years, of which the following are referred to as examples: Ex parte Adams, 3 O. G. 150, where, it is pointedly stated, that the same rules apply, in determining the patentability of an article of manufacture, as in any other case, and that, in such a case, there must be evidence of novelty, and of invention. Proof of novelty and of invention, were also required in the case Ex parte Wattles, 3 O. G. 291, and the applicant failing to produce such proof, his application was refused. Ex parte Leggett, 2 O. G. 199; Ex parte Baxter, Id. 470; Ex parte Beach, 3 O. G. 607.

Circuit judges, in this and other circuits, have made similar decisions, as will be seen from the following brief summary: Judge Shepley ruled expressly, in the case of Draper v. Hudson [Case No. 4,069], that a patent, for an article of manufacture, cannot be sustained, on the ground that it was fabricated by new and improved machinery; on the contrary, that the manufacture must be a new and improved thing in itself, possessing novelty of its own, independent of the devices, processes, or arts, by which it was produced. Precisely the same conclusion was reached, by the judges of the circuit court for the second circuit, after full argument. Sawyer v. Bixby [Id. 12,398]. What the patentee claimed, in that case, was a new article of manufacture, called a package or case, which, when made with distributing holes, and filled, was cemented with wax or by wafers. Infringement was admitted, but the respondents set up as a defence, that the alleged invention was not, within the requirement of the patent law, an art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, and, therefore, that it was not a thing for which a patent could lawfully be granted, as, at most, the patentee had only devised means, by which he could secure a larger sale of a given article, without having changed the article itself, or given it any additional value; and the circuit judge sustained the defence, upon the ground that the production of the article did not involve the exercise of any invention. Nothing short of invention or discovery, will support a patent for a manufacture, any more than for an art, machine or composition of matter, as is clearly illustrated in another case, decided in this circuit, Merrill v. Yeomans [Id. 9,472], where the circuit judge says, that a patentee, who has invented a process in the arts, whereby an article of manufacture is produced, new in kind, and not before known, may separately claim, and patent, both the art and the manufacture, if both are new and useful in the sense of the patent law; and, it is doubtless true, if the thing be new, in and of itself, it is patentable as a new manufacture, and that the patent would be infringed by the unlicensed construction or use of the product, though produced by other means than those described in the specifications of the patent. Inventions of the kind, are rare, as it much more frequently happens, that the process is inseparable from the product, so that the patentee cannot claim the product, if produced by hand tools or by other means substantially different from those employed by the inventor or discoverer. Patentees, in the former case, may claim the new product without qualification, but, in the latter, they should claim the product, only when made by the described means or their equivalent, as the process inheres in the manufacture, and constitutes an element of the invention. Neither claim, however, would be valid, unless supported by proof of invention or discovery, for which proposition, there is abundant authority in the decisions of the supreme court, and in the decisions of English courts. Hotchkiss v. Greenwood, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 265; Phillips v. Page, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 167; Jones v. Morehead, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 162; Stimpson v. Woodman, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 121; Knight v. Railroad [Case No. 7,882]; Bean v. Smallwood [Id. 1,173]; Winans v. Railroad [Id. 17,858]; Hicks v. Kelsey, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 673; Union Paper Collar Co. v. Van Deusen [Case No. 14,395]; Langdon v. De Groot [Id. 8,059]; Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 175.

Apply the principle of these cases to the case before the court, and it is clear, that the patent cannot be sustained, as neither the process nor the means of effecting the result, nor the apparatus or its mode of operation, are new or different from what had long been known to those skilled in the art, nor does the operation of comminuting the glue in flakes have the slightest effect to change the properties of the substance, in any respect whatever. Comminuted glue, differs in no respect, from the ordinary glue of commerce from which it is manufactured, except in the degree of its fragmentary condition, as appears by the great body of the evidence in the case. Other substances, of various kinds, it must be conceded, have been mechanically reduced in size, in like manner; and, inasmuch as such articles, or some of them, bear a close resemblance to glue in flakes, which is unchanged in any of its properties, I am of the opinion, that the reduction of the glue, as manufactured in flakes, to small particles, as described in the specifications of the complainant's patent, does not involve the exercise of invention or discovery, without which, it is clear, the product of the described process or apparatus, cannot be regarded as a patentable improvement. Abundant support to that proposition is found in the English decisions, as well as in the decisions made in this country. Penn v. Bibby, 2 Ch. App. 136; Harwood v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 11 H. L. Cas. 667; Jordan v. Moore, L. R. 1 C. P. 635; Kay v. Marshall, 8 Clark & F. 261; Bush v. Fox, 5 H. L. Cas. 716; Ralston v. Smith, 11 H. L. Cas. 255; Tetley v. Easton, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 740; Horton v. Mabon, 12 C. B. (N. S.) 452; Ormson v. Clarke, 13 C. B. (N. S.) 340; Id. 14 C. B. (N. S.) 490; Parkes v. Stevens, 5 Ch. App. 39; Id. L. R. 8 Eq. 368; Patent Bottle Envelope Co. v. Seymer, 5 C. B. (N. S.) 173; White v. Toms, 17 Law T. (N. S.) 349; Losh v. Hague, 1 Webst. Pat. Cas. 208; Saunders v. Aston, 3 Barn. & Adol. 885. Support to the opposite view, it is supposed by the complainant, is drawn from the following cases: Winans v. Denmead, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 343; Young v. Fernie, 10 Law T. (N. S.) 864; Pennsylvania Salt Manuf'g Co. v. Gugenheim [Case No. 10,954]; Davis v. Palmer [Id. 3,645]; Le Roy v. Tatham, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 175, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 137.

But the court is of the opinion, that no one of these cases supports the theory of the complainant, as it satisfactorily appears, in this case, that flake glue, comminuted by other means than those described in the specification, is as readily dissolved and prepared for practical use as when the flake glue is comminuted by the patented process, and, that the ground glue may, with equal convenience, be put up in small packages, for the retail trade. Proof of the most convincing character, is exhibited in the record, showing that flake glue had been ground into small particles at a much earlier period of time, than the date of the alleged invention described in the original patent; and several parcels of the ground product, together with the machines in which the product was ground, were introduced in evidence, which show, to a demonstration, that, if glue comminuted by grinding is substantially the same product as glue comminuted by the apparatus described in the said specification, the patentee was not the original and first inventor of the patented improvement. But, in the view taken of the case, it will not be necessary to decide that issue in the pleadings, nor whether flake glue, when ground, is substantially the same as flake glue comminuted by the apparatus described in the patent in suit, or substantially different, as will, presently, more fully appear; nor is it necessary to discuss either the third or the fourth propositions submitted by the respondents, as the court is of the opinion, that the complainant fails to show that it is entitled to a decree, for two reasons, other than those submitted in those propositions: (1) Because, the product of the process or apparatus described in the complainant's patent, was not patentable, as the production of it did not, in the sense of the patent law, involve the exercise of any invention or discovery. (2) Because, if the patented product, and the product manufactured by the respondents are substantially the same, then the original patentee was not the original and first inventor of the improvement, as flake glue was ground at a much earlier period than the date of the alleged invention; and, if the patented product is substantially different from the product manufactured by the respondents, then, it is clear, that the charge of infringement is not proved. Testimony was introduced by the complainant, to show that the ordinary glue of commerce is too moist to be conveniently ground, unless it is first dried, and that the process of drying it injures the quality of the article; but the court is of the opinion, that the suggestion is not entitled to weight, as it is a matter of common knowledge that no such difficulty arises, except with the newly-manufactured article, if the glue is deposited and kept from moisture. Grain and corn, in early fall, contain too much moisture for grinding, but they may be sun-dried for the purpose, and no doubt is entertained, that newly-manufactured glue may be dried sufficiently for grinding, without injury, in the same way. Bill dismissed with costs.

[The case was taken by the plaintiffs, on appeal, to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. 97 U. S. 3.]

SALVAGE—UNMANAGEABLE VESSEL—TOWAGE—HANGING RUDDER.

[Towing an unmanageable vessel into smooth water and there hanging her rudder, thus making it possible to navigate her, is salvage service.]

[This was a libel by Joseph Bethel and others against the brig Millinocket for salvage services rendered by the sloop America.]

S. R. Mallory, for libelants.

Wm. R. Hackley, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. It appears from the libel, answer and proof in this case that the brig Millinocket, Harper, master, while on a voyage from Havana to New York, on the morning of the 11th inst. struck upon that part of the Florida Reef known as the "American Shoal," distant about 18 miles from this port, where she remained about two hours. During the time she thumped off her rudder and her false keel, wore off a considerable portion of her keel, started her stempost and forefoot, and chafed some of her plank nearly through, and she began to leak considerably. She then came off the reef and was anchored by the master. She parted her chain and the captain let go another anchor, which held her until the arrival of the libellant Bethel in the sloop America, she having discovered the brig ashore early in the morning with her ensign flying at that time union down, made sail for her, and on his arrival offered his assistance to Captain Harper. Before the arrival of Captain Bethel, Captain Harper had made several efforts to hang his rudder, but the sea was so rough that he found it impossible to do so. He employed Bethel in the first instance to pilot him into Key West, and six of his men to aid at the pumps. The brig was got under way and the attempt made to steer and navigate her by means of her sails, but it was found upon the experiments being made that the brig would neither stay nor wear and was unmanageable, owing, as the master supposed, to the injury she had sustained in her keel and forefoot. The master says that it was impossible for him to have hung the rudder either where the brig lay when she first came off the reef or anywhere in the Gulf, into which she was driven on account of the sea. The wind too blew fresh from the north, driving the brig further out into the Gulf Stream towards the Cuba shore. Finding that he could neither hang the brig's rudder nor navigate her without, he engaged Bethel to place his sloop ahead and to tow him into Key West, or inside the reef. This Bethel did. He towed the brig inside the reef into smooth water, anchored her, and sent down divers, who succeeded in hanging the rudder, after which she was navigated into this port. Bethel now libels for salvage for himself, owners and crew. It is impossible to say that the services of Bethel and his crew do not far exceed in value and in real merit mere pilot service. The facts of the case render it by no means improbable that his services have been the means of saving the vessel and cargo from total loss. The master of the brig admits that he could neither have hung his rudder nor navigated his vessel without it while the sea and wind remained as rough and strong as they were during that time, and it is in evidence that the wind continued from that time to blow equally fresh from the north for more than a week. No other means of bringing the brig into a safe port, under the circumstances, have been suggested to the court, and none other than the means adopted now occur to my mind—that of towing her in by the sloop America. If these facts be so, and there is no reason to doubt them, the brig and cargo were in real peril of total loss, and the services of Bethel have been the means of saving them. In regard to the amount of salvage that ought to be allowed little need be said. I have so often discussed such questions from this place, and the great leading principles and motives which govern me in fixing the amounts of salvage in different cases that come before this court are so well understood by the wreckers and others interested on this coast, that I do not deem it necessary at this time to say anything upon this point. The brig and cargo have been appraised at $21,233.80, including duties. These have not been accurately ascertained, nor is it necessary that they should be, for all the purposes of this decision. I think it may fairly be considered that the brig and cargo are worth, exclusive of duties, $15,000. Fifteen per cent. of this sum, or $2,250, I think is a reasonable salvage to be allowed the salvors. This sum, when divided among the salvors, will not make the share of each unreasonably large.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the libellants have, recover and receive in full compensation for their services rendered the brig Millinocket and cargo, as alleged by them in their libel, the sum of twenty-two hundred and fifty dollars and their costs of suit, and that upon the payment thereof to the marshal he restore said brig and cargo to the master thereof, for and on account of whom it may concern.

PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT OF COMBINATION CLAIMS—MANUFACTURE OF PARTS—JURY DISCHARGED.

[The manufacture and sale of pipes, elbows, and sheets of iron, capable of being used in making up certain parts of a combination apparatus, with the intention that they should be so used, is not an infringement, where such pipes, etc., are not useless except in the combined apparatus, but, on the contrary, are adapted for general use for numerous other valuable purposes. Wallace v. Holmes, Case No. 1,700, distinguished.]

[This was an action at law to recover damages for the alleged infringement of plaintiff's patent by Schofield & Co.]

T. S. Flournoy and M. M. Tredway, for plaintiff.

R. W. Peatross, for defendants.

HUGHES, District Judge (charging jury). The question here is not whether the invention under consideration is novel and whether the plaintiff's patent for it is valid and sustainable under the judicial ordeal. It is simply whether the defendants have infringed it. We all sympathize with Mr. Millner, and would be glad to see him richly rewarded for the time and trouble and study he may have devoted to the subject of this controversy. But what we are called to consider is a question of law. The law is very liberal towards inventors, and congress has done much to encourage and stimulate inventions; it has provided for the issuing of letters-patent for their protection and the possessor of a patent right is made a monopolist as to the article or commodity described in his letters-patent. But it is also due to the general public that protection should be afforded to merchants and manufacturers in their business and trade. It is not shown in the evidence that defendants have done more than manufacture and sell pipes, elbows, and sheets of iron of a sort capable of being used in making up in part the tobacco-curing apparatus claimed to have been invented by the plaintiff, and with the intention that they should be so used. The plaintiff's invention consists of short double furnaces in front of the tobacco house; of two or more flues entering the building from these outside furnaces; of a common flue in the back part of the building connecting the other flues; of a return flue leading from the latter to front of the building and discharging into a chimney outside in front; of cut-offs and valves in the flues, for regulating the heat; and of pans on the flues for holding water in evaporation. The complete apparatus is elaborate, and is doubtless a valuable invention. It consists, however, not of any newly invented material or form of material, but only of a combination of materials in general use. The flues were made of large stove-piping, not of a peculiar manufacture; and the invention consists in combining this large piping into flues and a chimney, and connecting with them the furnaces, valves and pans described in the plaintiff's patent. It is not pretended that the defendants make and sell either the furnaces or the valves, or the pans. It is not pretended that they make all the parts of the apparatus invented by the plaintiff. It is not pretended that besides furnishing piping, elbows and sheet iron suitable for the flues intended to be put up, they put them up for planters in combination with each other, and with furnaces, valves and pans as invented by the plaintiff. All that is pretended is, that the defendants made and sold some of the materials and parts of the plaintiff's apparatus in form suitable to be used in the construction of his tobacco-curer, expecting them to be so used.

Now, the general principle is well settled that the making and selling of the separate materials for a patented combination is not an infringement of the rights of its inventor. The cases of Prouty v. Ruggles, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 336; Byam v. Farr [Case No. 2,264]; Foster v. Moore [Id. 4,978]; Vance v. Campbell, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 427; Eanes v. Godfrey, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 78,—and numerous subsequent decisions settle that point. True, there is an obvious exception to this general rule. If two or more persons conspire, one to make one part of a patented combination, and another another part, with the intention that the parts should be afterwards put together—this is an infringement. But in order to render one who makes and sells parts of a patented combination liable for infringement, the parts manufactured must be useless in any other machine, and they must be sold and manufactured with the understanding or intention that the remaining parts are to be supplied by another, and the whole then combined for use. Such is the doctrine of the leading case of Wallace v. Holmes [Case No. 17,100], which was the case of a lamp-burner, wholly useless unless combined with the glass chimney intended to be used with it. Now it cannot be pretended that the piping, elbows and sheet-iron which were made and sold by the defendants here were useless except when combined with short furnaces, valves and pans in the combination invented by the plaintiff. They are articles in very general use for numerous valuable purposes other than in the Millner tobacco-curer. It would be too violent an interference with trade and the rights of merchants and manufacturers, to confine the right of making and selling such articles to the plaintiff and his agents; and so if the jury on the evidence before them in this case should find a verdict for the plaintiff, I should feel constrained to set the verdict aside. It is useless for the trial to proceed further.

The verdict of the jury was then written, finding for the defendants, and signed by the foreman. After which it was entered as having been so found by instruction of the court.

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1874.

BANKRUPTCY—NOTICE OF SECOND MEETING—DECLARING DIVIDEND.

1. The notice of the second meeting of creditors, under the 27th section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)], and the order (form No. 28), is to be sent to all known creditors, whether they have proved their debts or not.

2. At such meeting, when due notice has been given, the whole fund in the hands of the assignee may be distributed, less the necessary amount for expenses and contingencies, unless good cause is shown to the contrary.

In this case, Welsh Brothers, who were named as creditors in the schedules of the bankrupt [William Mills], and to whom notice had been sent as directed by the warrant, failed to prove their debt before the second meeting of creditors. No notice of such meeting was sent to them. At the second meeting a dividend was to be declared. The assignee desired that a portion of the estate should be reserved to provide for the claim of Welsh Brothers, in case it should be proved before the third meeting. The creditors present at such meeting objected to such reservation, and the register decided that it was not a proper case for such a reservation. On request of the assignee, he certified the question to the court.

By I. T. WILLIAMS, Register:

[2] [I, the undersigned register, in charge of the above-entitled matter, do hereby certify that on the 19th day of October, 1874, at an adjourned second meeting of creditors, a majority in number and amount of all the creditors who had proved their claims against said estate being present, and having voted a dividend of seventy-five per cent. upon the claims so proved, thereby dividing about the sum of nine thousand six hundred and thirty-two dollars and ninety cents, and leaving in the hands of the assignee only about the sum of two thousand dollars, Mr. Scott, of counsel for the assignee, objected to such distribution of said assets—claiming that, as it appeared from the schedules filed by the bankrupt, and the proceedings herein, that debts of said bankrupt amounting to about twenty thousand dollars had not been proven, it was not competent at a second meeting to distribute a greater proportion of the assets, or pay a larger percentage than the fund in hand would be sufficient to pay upon all debts set forth in the said schedules, whether proven or not. I overruled the objection, and proceeded to order the dividend pursuant to said vote. But upon application of Mr. Scott, and with the consent of the creditors present, I directed that the dividend warrants should not be delivered till the foregoing question should be decided by the district judge. Wherefore I now certify the question aforesaid, to wit: Is it competent under the provisions of the 27th section of the act, at a second meeting of creditors to dispose of the funds to creditors who have proved their claims, without leaving in the hands of the assignee a sum sufficient to pay a similar percentage upon claims set forth in the schedules of the bankrupt, but which have not been proved, and thereby put it out of the power of the assignee to make a similar dividend upon such unproved claims in case they should be proved before the third meeting?

[The force of the precedent, should the objection prevail, would be to the effect, that in all cases in which a dividend meeting was held under the 27th section of the act, it would be the duty of the register to set apart a certain amount or portion of the assets in the hands of the assignee and ready for distribution, sufficient to pay a similar percentage upon all claims mentioned in the bankrupt's schedules which had not been proven. If this had been the intent of the act, I think it would have been more clearly expressed. The language of section 27 is as follows: "At such meeting, the majority in value of the creditors present shall determine whether any, and what part of the net proceeds of the estate, after deducting and retaining a sum sufficient to provide for all undetermined claims, which, by reason of the distant residence of the creditor, or for other sufficient reason, have not been proved, and for other expenses and contingencies, shall be divided among the creditors, etc." No doubt is entertained that it is the duty of the register to so deduct and retain in the hands of the assignee a sum sufficient to provide for undetermined claims, when in controversy, and for unproven claims when it shall be made to appear probable that, by reason of the distance, or for any other good cause, they have not been proved. That this should be done in a proper case by the register, without the vote, and perhaps in spite of the expressed wishes of the creditors present, is clear from the fact that it is the duty of the court, and not of the creditors, to guard the rights of the absent, nor could the act reasonably be construed to permit the creditors present, by their vote, to divide among themselves the entire fund, to the wrong and injury of such absent creditors as by reason of distance, or for other good cause, had been unable to prove or otherwise establish their claims—especially as the act provides, in effect (section 28), that moneys so paid over to creditors shall not be recalled for the purpose of paying claims of those who should thereafter prove or otherwise establish their claims. The provision above referred to in section 28, seems to interpret the provision above quoted from section 27. It is as follows: "No dividend already declared shall be disturbed by reason of debts being subsequently proved, but the creditors proving such debts shall be entitled to a dividend equal to those already received by the other creditors before any further payment is made to the latter." If section 27 requires the court at the second meeting to retain a sum sufficient to pay an equal amount upon all debts mentioned in the bankrupt's schedules, the exigency referred to in the 28th section, above quoted, could never arise; and hence this provision would be altogether nugatory. This would be construing the act in the very teeth of well-settled principles of judicial interpretation. On the other hand, the provisions of the two sections taken together, indicate, with sufficient clearness, that the whole fund in the hands of the assignee—less such sum as should be retained for expenses and contingencies—should, unless good cause be shown, be distributed at the second meeting. But the case before me does not, in my judgment, come within the rule above suggested. The presumption is, that Messrs. Welsh Brothers, the creditors referred to by the counsel for the assignee, received the notice sent them by the marshal on the 30th day of August, 1873—nothing to the contrary is shown or suggested—as well as the notice of the said adjourned second meeting, which was duly mailed to them at their residence on the 8th day of September, 1874; at all events they have had all such notices as the act provides for. To adjudge this insufficient (without any cause shown) would be to impeach the provisions of the act.][2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The 27th section of the act provides that the second meeting of creditors, which is the one held in this case, shall be, "a general meeting of the creditors, of which due notice shall be given." The order for the second meeting of the creditors, prescribed by form No. 28, directs that the assignee shall give notice of the meeting, "by sending written or printed notices by mail, post paid, of the time and place of said meeting, to all known creditors of said bankrupt," and shall also publish notice of the time and place of said meeting. The notice to be given by mail is not confined to a notice to be sent to all creditors who have proved their debts. Notices must be sent by mail to all known creditors. Creditors who have proved their debts are not all the creditors who are known creditors. Many creditors refrain from proving their debts until they learn that there is to be a dividend, and that information ordinarily comes when notice of a second meeting comes. The claim of Welsh Brothers, at the amount of $21,024.46, is set forth in the bankrupt's schedules. They are, therefore, known creditors, and entitled to notice of the second meeting, to be given to them by mail, in order that they may prove their debt. Such notice would naturally be notice to them that there was to be a dividend. I understand the certificate of the register to import that no notice has been sent to them by mail, of the time and place of the second meeting. Because of this defect the second meeting is irregular, and it must be adjourned until the defect can be remedied by sending notice to them, and giving them a sufficient time and proper opportunity to prove their debt.

In accordance with this decision, the adjourned second meeting was held, of which due notice was sent to Welsh Brothers, who, however, did not prove their claim. The creditors thereupon, at the adjourned meeting, voted a dividend of seventy-five per cent. on the debts proved. The assignee objected to this distribution of the assets, claiming that it was not competent, at the second meeting to pay a larger percentage than the fund in hand would be sufficient to pay on all the debts, whether proven or not.

The register overruled the objection, holding that, under the 27th and 28th sections of the bankruptcy act, the whole fund in the hands of the assignee should be distributed at the second meeting, less such sum as should be retained for expenses and contingencies, unless good cause were shown to the contrary, and that here no such cause was shown. On request of the assignee, the question was certified to the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur in the conclusion of the register.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—DECEASE OF ONE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. B. & M. were partners in business under the firm-name of B. & Co. B. died, and after his death M. carried on the business with the consent of B.'s administrators, the property and assets of the firm remaining in his possession and under his control. He was subsequently adjudged a bankrupt, and an assignee was appointed who took charge of the property. Held, that the creditors were entitled to be paid pro rata out of the funds in the hands of the assignee without regard to the fact whether the debts were contracted before or after the death of B.

[Cited in Vetterlein v. Barnes, 6 Fed. 705.]

2. M. was carrying on business on his sole account, having converted the property of his deceased partner to his own use with the knowledge and consent of B.'s administrators.

3. The fact that a creditor may have recourse to the estate of B. for any unpaid balance, does not affect his right to an equal participation in the fund in the hands of the assignee.

4. The administrators may prove in bankruptcy against the estate of M. for any claim they may have, for the interest of B. in the copartnership.

By I. T. WILLIAMS, Register:

I, the undersigned register, in charge of the above entitled matter, do hereby certify and report, pursuant to the order of this honorable court made in this matter, bearing date the 5th day of May, 1874, that I have been attended by counsel for the respective parties, to wit: by Mr. Abbott and Mr. Hodges, for James Bown and Elizabeth M. Mills, and by Mr. Lewis, for Elizabeth Anne Bate, Mary E. Denike, and Thomas Henry Bate. That I have taken all the testimony offered by each and all of said parties, which said testimony is herewith handed up. I am of opinion that the business of the late firm of Thomas H. Bate & Co. was not continued or carried on after the death of said Bate, in March, 1870, by the said [William] Mills, jointly with the administrator and administratrix, or by the legal representatives of the said Bate. The evidence does not satisfy me that there was any contract of copartnership, either expressed or implied, entered into between those parties. The property of the firm was permitted to remain in the possession of Mills, the surviving partner, who, although he continued to carry on the business in the name of the late firm, used and disposed of the property as if it had been his individual property, until it had so far changed its character or become confused with goods acquired by him after the decease of Bate, as to render it inseparable therefrom. It is not necessary here to decide what may be the rights of the administrator and administratrix of Bate in the premises upon an accounting with the surviving partner or otherwise. It is clear that creditors whose debts were contracted in the course of the business since the death of Bate, are entitled to be paid out of the funds in the hands of the assignee. It is equally clear that debts contracted by the firm prior to the death of Bate, are alike entitled to be paid out of this fund. But were it otherwise—were it true, as it is contended, that after the decease of Bate, his administrator and administratrix entered into a contract of copartnership with Mills, and put in all the property that had come to them from the estate of Bate, and had carried on that business jointly with Mills up to the time of the bankruptcy, it is not perceived how that would change the result. It could not in that case be doubted that moneys which had come to the hands of the assignee from the sale of the assets of the firm, would be liable for all the debts contracted in the business since the commencement of the copartnership between the administrator and administratrix and Mills. It is true that in that case it would be necessary to adjudge the other members of the firm—the administrator and administratrix—bankrupt, in order to get jurisdiction over their interests in the partnership property. But the whole partnership property would nevertheless then, as now, be subject to the payment of the partnership debts contracted since the commencement of such partnership. It would also, in like manner, be subject—in equity—to the debts contracted by the firm of Thomas H. Bate & Co. before the death of said Bate, for it is the same property now, in equity, that it was during the life of Bate, when such debts were contracted; the administrator and administratrix having added nothing to it. But I base my opinion upon the former ground, and hold that Mills has been, since the death of Bate, carrying on business on his sole account. He has converted the property of his deceased partner to his own use; but this has been with the knowledge and consent of the administrator and administratrix, so that the liability of Mills to the administrator and administratrix for this property, or rather the claim of the administrator and administratrix against him for the interest of the intestate in the partnership property, would sound in contract and not in tort—thus vesting in Mills, at law, the entire title to all the partnership property of the late firm of Thomas H. Bate & Co. If, then, the entire assets in the hands of the assignee pertain to the separate estate of the bankrupt Mills, and the estate of Mills as surviving partner of the late firm of Thomas H. Bate & Co. has contributed nothing to this fund, it is clear that it is subject to distribution among the creditors of Mills of an equal degree. It is not material whether the debts proven against this estate are owing by Mills alone, or by Mills jointly with the estate of Thomas H. Bate—in either case Mills is liable for the whole of such claims—and the fact that a creditor may have recourse to the estate of Bate for any unpaid balance, does not affect his right to an equal participation in the fund, in the present state of the case. Should such creditor, after receiving a proportion of his claim from the assets of Mills, afterward receive the balance, or any part of the balance, of his claim from the estate of Bate, that would be his good fortune, and the individual creditors of Mills could not be heard to complain of it, as the assignee would have the usual right of joint debtors to claim from that estate a contribution, in case the creditor should have got more than the half part of his claim out of the estate in bankruptcy, which sum so received, by way of contribution, would come into the fund in bankruptcy for distribution among the creditors. Nor can the creditors who have established claims against the late firm of Thomas H. Bate & Co. claim any preference over the creditors of the individual estate of Mills, as the late firm has contributed nothing toward the fund in the hands of the assignee; the bankrupt Mills, having acquired a legal title to all the interest Bate had in the copartnership property at the time of his death, must be considered to have contributed this whole fund from his personal estate. Whatever claim the administrator and administratrix may have against Mills for the interest of Bate so acquired, they are at liberty to prove in bankruptcy and participate in the dividend.

The testimony of Mills and others going to establish what counsel have called a continuation of the partnership after the death of Bate, has not been overlooked, nor is any distrust intended to be thrown upon the good faith of Mills. But a close analysis of this testimony will show that he had conceived the impossible thing of a partnership with a dead man. I don't understand him to mean to testify that he was in partnership with the administrator and administratrix personally. He seems to think that with their consent he could continue the partnership with his deceased partner. But it is obvious that no such partnership could by any legal possibility exist.

Having come to the conclusion that all the claims for which Mills is liable—whether individually or jointly with the estate of Bate—are payable ratably in their statutory order out of the funds in the hands of the assignee, I proceeded to examine the respective claims, pursuant to the directions of the order aforesaid. Touching the claims referred to in the petition, being the only disputed claims, I see no good reason to doubt the validity and justness of the claim of James Bown for two thousand six hundred and nine dollars and fifty-two cents, and interest up to the day of the adjudication of bankruptcy. It is a claim that accrued after the death of Bate, for which Mills only is liable, and it is properly proven in bankruptcy. The claim of Elizabeth M. Mills, the wife of the bankrupt, for one thousand and fifty-seven dollars and three cents, and interest up to the day of the adjudication of bankruptcy, is properly proven, and there is no evidence that should invalidate it or throw any suspicion upon its justness. It accrued after the death of Bate, and it is a claim against Mills alone. The claims of Mary E. Denike and Thomas Henry Bate for two thousand nine hundred and fifty-seven dollars and forty-one cents each, and interest up to the day of the adjudication of bankruptcy, rest upon a joint judgment in their favor against Mills as surviving partner of Thomas H. Bate & Co. The claims accrued during the lifetime of Bate, and were prosecuted to judgment after his death. These claims are properly proven, and I see nothing in the testimony or proceedings before me that should invalidate or cast suspicion upon them. The claim of Elizabeth Anne Bate, widow of the said Thomas H. Bate, deceased, for three thousand two hundred and sixty-two dollars and thirty-seven cents, and interest up to the day of the adjudication of bankruptcy, has been attacked by other creditors and considerable suspicion has been thrown upon it by the testimony. It is claimed to have accrued in 1861 or 1862, during the existence of the firm of T. H. Bate & Co., from a loan of money made by her to the firm through the agency of the executor of her father's estate. This attack is made principally by the counsel for Mrs. Mills, who was also solicitor for the bankrupt, who filed the schedules in bankruptcy which specify this claim among the liabilities of the bankrupt. Mills, when upon the stand, is not interrogated concerning this claim by either counsel. It appears that prior to the bankruptcy, to wit, in July, 1873, a judgment in the supreme court of this state was obtained by default against Mills alone for this claim, which judgment was, after the first proof thereof had been filed in bankruptcy by an ex parte order of that court, amended so as to be now against Mills as surviving partner, etc. If this claim be invalid, there must have been collusion between Mrs. Bate and the bankrupt as long ago as July, 1873. But there is no proof before me of any such collusion, and the testimony as well as all the proceedings before me render any such collusion quite improbable. I am therefore of opinion that her claim should be sustained and allowed, and that she should be paid ratably out of the fund.

The whole amount of the assets that have come to the hands of the assignee, appears to be fourteen thousand five hundred and thirty-six dollars and fifty-seven cents ($14,536.57), all of which I am of opinion are the individual assets of William Mills. I therefore recommend the entry of an order accordingly.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Let an order be entered according to the recommendation of the register.

Case No. 9,612.

In re MILLS.

[17 N. B. R. 472.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 6, 1878.

BANKRUPTCY—RECEIVER OF CREDITOR—RIGHT TO PROVE DEBT—DEPOSITION.

A receiver of the property of a creditor of the bankrupt is an assignee of the debt due to such creditor and may prove it in the bankruptcy proceedings; but the proof must be supported by the deposition required by general order No. 34. The deposition may, in the first instance, be ex parte, as in form No. 22.

Hearing upon petition for re-examination of proof of B. Reilly, receiver. The assignee claims the examination of the original creditor. The receiver declares himself ready to submit to an examination. The assignee contends that the original creditor is the person to whom the bankrupt [William Mills] owed the debt at the time of the adjudication. The assignee claims, secondly, that the proof should be supported by the deposition of the original creditor under rule 34. The receiver holds that the claim, having been transferred to him by operation of law, is not within rule 34. The assignee also contends that Reilly, receiver, is not entitled by law to prove the debt in this bankruptcy. It is admitted that the original claimant resides in England. The assignee moves to expunge the claim. The register asks if there is any objection to his making such order as he may see fit in the matter. Mr. Whitney declines to answer, upon the ground that the register has no authority to require an issue till he decides the claim should be expunged, and that the question of the register is not pertinent until his ruling is made. The assignee objects to the register making any order except to expunge or diminish the claim. The register says he will reserve his decision.

By J. W. LITTLE, Register:

I think, in the re-examination of the claim filed by Reilly, receiver, in the above matter, that the motion that I should require the original claimant to present himself for examination or cross-examination by the assignee should be denied. And, further, I do not think this is a case where a deposition should be required by owner of claim at time of commencement of proceedings, according to G. O. No. 34.

W. F. Scott, for assignee.

Mr. Whitney, for receiver.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. I think that Reilly, as receiver, is an assignee of the debt, and as such assignee may prove it. But, as it was assigned before proof, the proof must, and to make it receivable at all, be supported by the deposition required in general order No. 34. The deposition may in the first instance be ex parte, as in form No. 22. The proof was irregular because not supported by such deposition, and should on that ground be expunged.

[This was a bill in equity before the superior court of Hartford county, Connecticut, by Elihu Mills against Samuel J. Chapman and wife, to set aside as in fraud of creditors an alleged conveyance of certain real property by Chapman to his wife. The cause was removed to this court, and respondents Chapman and wife filed their bill to set aside an execution levied upon said real property in satisfaction of a judgment at law in the said superior court.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. On July 23, 1866, Elihu Mills, of Bloomfield, in the county of Hartford, in this state, brought a suit before the superior court for said Hartford county against Samuel J. Chapman, now of Springfield, in the state of Massachusetts, upon a note of said Chapman to the order of G. F. Filley, dated July 19, 1859, for the sum of $700, payable on demand, with interest, and endorsed by the said Filley to the said Mills. Upon this suit the real estate in said Bloomfield, hereafter described, standing in the name of Jennette F. Chapman, wife of said Samuel J. Chapman, was attached as the property of the defendant. On Nov. 15, 1870, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff for the sum of $1,175.53 damages and $175.26 costs, to be recovered only against the property which had been attached. Execution was issued upon this judgment and levied upon said real estate, and the same was set off to said Mills in part satisfaction of said execution. The value of said land is $1,200. Said Mills thereafter brought his bill in equity against said Chapman and wife before the superior court for Hartford county, alleging in substance that said real estate was purchased in fact by said Samuel J. Chapman, being insolvent, and was conveyed to his wife in fraud of his creditors, and was as against his creditors the proper estate of the husband, and praying that the title to said land should be vested by proper decree in the said Mills, the execution creditor, who had obtained a valid title thereto by virtue of the levy of said execution. This bill was served July 11, 1873, and was removed to this court. On July 23, 1873, Samuel J. Chapman and wife brought their bill in equity before this court, alleging that said property was the proper estate of said Jennette F., that the levy of said execution created a cloud upon her valid title, and praying that the cloud created thereby might be removed by decree of this court. Both suits have been heard at the same time by agreement. On April 10, 1858, J. Seymour Brown, as executor, conveyed to the said Jennette F. Chapman, for the sum of $900, then paid to said grantor, a piece of land in said Bloomfield, containing 14 acres, bounded north on land of T. B. Filley, east on land of Anson Porter, south on land of Eli Brown, and west partly on land of said Jennette F. and partly on the highway, which piece adjoined and partly surrounded other land which she previously owned. At the time of the purchase, Mrs. Chapman was desirous that it should be purchased, as it adjoined her own land, and intended to have the title and control of the whole land in her own name. At this time Samuel J. Chapman was in business in Chicopee, was pecuniarily embarrassed, and shortly thereafter failed. Seven hundred dollars of the $900 which were paid to the grantor for the land were borrowed of William H. Chapman, a brother of Samuel J. Chapman, upon his and his wife's joint note. It did not appear from what source the other $200 were paid. The $700 note was paid in May, 1865, by Jennette F. Chapman, from her sole and separate estate. The money, note, and bonds which went to pay this $700 note were obtained by Mrs. Chapman from personal property which she obtained by inheritance from her father and mother, who died respectively in 1856 and 186–. The bulk of her property came from her father's estate. This property was never taken possession of by Samuel J. Chapman as husband or as trustee for his wife. He never assumed any control of his wife's personal estate, or of the dividends thereon, but all his interest and title thereto was by clear and unequivocal acts voluntarily given and relinquished to his wife, and became her sole and separate estate. I do not find that this land was purchased in fact by the husband at the time of the execution of the deed, and settled upon his wife to defraud existing or future creditors, or that the conveyance to the wife was to delay, hinder, and defraud creditors of the husband. There were suspicious circumstances at the time the purchase was effected, and subsequently thereto, which, if they could have been fortified by more proof, might have brought me to the conclusion that the property was in fact purchased by the husband and settled upon the wife in fraud of present and future creditors, and that the signature by the wife of said $700 note was a mere security to her brother-in-law for the payment of his debt. But, in view of all the facts, I cannot find affirmatively such a conclusion, and therefore find that the material allegation in the bill of Elihu Mills is not true. The result is that the record title of the land, which was and is in Jennette F. Chapman, is not found to have been invalid as against the creditors of her husband. The statutes of the state of Connecticut in regard to the property of married women are hereby made part of this finding. The bill of Elihu Mills is dismissed, without costs. Let there be a decree without costs, upon the bill of Samuel J. Chapman and wife that Elihu Mills execute a quitclaim deed of said premises to said Jennette F. Chapman.

District Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1860.

COLLISION — LYING AT WHARF — PRESUMPTION — ORDINARY CARE—PROPER SKILL AND CARE—PROXIMATE CAUSE OF INJURY.

1. Where damage is done by a boat in motion to one lying at a wharf, the presumption of wrong is against the moving boat, and to avoid liability it must appear that the greatest caution and vigilance were observed.

[Cited in The Scotia, 10 Fed. 687.]

2. Ordinary care under such circumstances will not protect the boat which commits the injury from responsibility.

3. No inference of negligence can be deduced from the fact that a steamboat lying at a wharf has a loaded barge alongside of her.

4. It is a paramount law of navigation that collisions are always to be avoided when it is practicable to do so, and the fact that one boat is in fault, will not justify another in the infliction of an injury that could have been avoided by the observance of proper skill and care.

5. In determining the question of fault with the view to the ascertainment of liability for an injury, the proximate cause of the injury must be regarded.

[Cited in Pope v. Seckworth, 47 Fed. 832.]

[This was a libel by James W. Mills and others against the steamboat Nathaniel Holmes, for damages sustained in a collision alleged to have been due to the negligence of the respondents.]

Lincoln, Smith & Warnock, for libellants.

E. Mills, for respondents.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This suit is prosecuted by the libellants, the owners of the steamboat Cuba, against the owners of the steamboat Nathaniel Holmes, to recover damages for a collision, caused as alleged by the sole fault of those having charge of the Holmes. It is not the usual case of an injury produced by colliding boats in motion, in which truth is often buried deep in a mass of conflicting evidence, and in which it is a hopeless task to ascertain where the fault lies. There is, in fact, very little difficulty in coming to a conclusion upon the evidence, and the main duty of the court is to determine the legal liability of the respondents upon the state of facts as proved. In this aspect of the case, it will not be necessary to notice specially the allegations of the parties in their pleadings, or to attempt an analysis of the great mass of depositions which have been submitted by the parties.

The material facts involved in the case, and which it may be assumed are substantially proved by the evidence, are that about nine o'clock in the evening of December 4, 1856, the Cuba, a stern-wheel boat, then one of a line of packets running between Louisville and Nashville, in an upward trip, reached the landing at Smithland, on the Ohio river, a short distance below the mouth of the Cumberland, and was lying at the wharf-boat, its bow being on a line with the upper end of the wharf-boat, in the act of receiving freight for Nashville and other points on the Cumberland. A barge laden with coal, belonging to the owners of the Cuba, was lashed to the outer or larboard side of the steamer and in close proximity to it. The wharf-boat was two hundred and thirty-seven feet in length, and the Cuba with its wheel about one hundred and seventy feet, thus leaving an unoccupied space at the lower portion of the wharf-boat, including a gangway, of about sixty-seven feet. The Cumberland river was at a high stage and there was sufficient depth of water along the whole line of the larboard side of the wharf-boat to enable a steamer of the largest size to land without danger of getting aground. It was a clear starlight night, the wind blowing somewhat fresh, but not with such violence as to render navigation difficult or dangerous. There were lights on the wharf-boat, and also the usual lights on the Cuba. The steamer Holmes in passing up the Ohio between ten and twelve o'clock in the night mentioned, had occasion to land at Smithland for the purpose of putting out some passengers. The object of the pilot or master was to bring the Holmes in contact with the barge lying alongside of the Cuba, and thus enable the passengers to get ashore. In this attempt the bow of the Holmes first struck the barge, but was carried out into the stream by the action of the current or some other cause and swung round, and the boat was again brought "head on" against the barge. The passengers were landed and the Holmes proceeded immediately up the river.

It appears very satisfactorily from the testimony, that some pieces of timber or scantling, which had formed a part of the frame work of a flat-boat some five or six feet in length, had been carried by the current and were lodged under the larboard guard of the Cuba and at a right angle with it, and were thus lying between the steamer and the barge. By the force of the blow of the Holmes in striking the barge, the ends of these timbers or scantling, which were some four or five inches square, were driven with such force against the hull of the Cuba that they penetrated the planks, which were two and a half inches in thickness, thereby making three separate holes or openings between the knuckle keelson and the binding streaks and the upright ribs or timbers of the hull of the boat. Through these openings the water entered freely and with great force.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The proof establishes the fact, that all reasonable efforts were made by the officers and crew of the Cuba to stop the inflow of the water, but in this they were unsuccessful. And the boat, having broken the lines by which it was made fast to the shore, floated from the wharf, and sunk in deep water some distance below. The cargo of the Cuba, it seems, was nearly all transferred to the barge before the boat sunk, and what remained in the boat was reclaimed without material injury. There is, therefore, no claim in this action for damages in the loss of cargo. The boat was raised some time after the collision at an expense of $2,800, and was subsequently sold for $3,630, leaving to the owners, after deducting incidental expenses, the sum of $534. They claim as damages the value of the boat at the time of the injury, subject to the deduction of the net proceeds of sale. The answer of the respondents denies that there was any fault or negligence in landing the Holmes, and affirms that they were in no way responsible for the injury sustained by the Cuba. The outline of the case, thus briefly presented, is sufficient to indicate the only points for the decision of the court. That a serious injury has been sustained by the libellants there can be no doubt; and the inquiry is whether the law applied to the facts will give redress for such injury.

The Cuba, at the time this injury was inflicted in the prosecution of its lawful business, was lying in its proper place at the Smithland wharf. And the decisions are numerous to the effect, that where damage is done by a boat in motion to one thus at rest, the presumption of wrong is against the moving boat; and to avoid liability it must appear that the greatest caution and vigilance was observed. Ordinary care under such circumstances will not protect the boat which commits the injury from responsibility. This principle is well illustrated in the case of Culbertson v. Shaw, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 385. The action was brought to recover the value of a flat-boat and its cargo lost by a steamer coming in collision with it. The flat-boat was moored at the shore in a proper place when the injury was inflicted. The supreme court held, that the steamer was liable for the damage. Judge McLean, who delivered the opinion of the court, says: "When a steamer is about to enter a harbor, great caution is required. There being no usage as to an open way, the vigilance is thrown upon the entering vessel. Ordinary care under such circumstances will not excuse a steamer for a wrong done. A vessel tied to the shore is helpless. No movement can be made by it to avoid an entering boat; therefore the whole responsibility rests on such boat." In the case of Vantine v. The Lake [Case No. 16,878], Judge Grier held, "that a vessel which moves alongside of another at a wharf or elsewhere, becomes responsible to the other for all injuries resulting from her proximity, which human skill or precaution could have guarded against."

Judge Parsons, in his treatise on Maritime Law, recently published, says: "If a ship at anchor and one in motion come into collision, the presumption is that it is the fault of the ship in motion, unless the anchored vessel was where she should not have been. The rule of law would seem to be the same where a vessel aground is run into." 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 201. And in the case of The Lochlibo, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 310, Dr. Lushington says: "As the Lochlibo ran into a vessel (at anchor), which was incapable of helping herself, it is her duty to prove, in order to exonerate her from blame, that the collision arose from circumstances which it was utterly out of her power to prevent, or that it was the fault of the pilot on board, or that it arose from the default of those on board the Aberfoyle." There are numerous other cases and authorities in support of the doctrine stated, which it is unnecessary specially to notice. I pass, therefore, to the inquiry, whether the present case falls within the operation of this principle; in other words, was every possible precaution used by those in charge of the respondents' boat to avoid a collision.

That the Holmes was in fault, under the circumstances of the case, in attempting a landing against the barge of the Cuba, seems to admit of no doubt. As before stated, there was an unoccupied space of sixty-seven feet in the lower part of the wharf-boat, within which a landing could have been effected by the Holmes without the danger of coming in collision with the Cuba or the barge attached to it. There is some evidence to the effect that it was proper and according to the usages of navigation for the Holmes to land at the barge for the purpose of discharging passengers, but the weight of the evidence is, that it was not only practicable, but safer to have landed on the wharf-boat. There was ample room for this purpose, and there is not the remotest probability that any injury would have resulted if this course had been pursued. That it was practicable, as well as safe, is proved by the fact that the steamer Winnifrede came up immediately after the Holmes, and made a landing on the wharf-boat without difficulty and without injury. But the Holmes was guilty of a still more inexcusable fault in not observing due care and caution in the manner in which the landing was effected. On this point, much testimony has been taken by the parties, and there is some apparent conflict in their statements. The witnesses for the libellants state strongly and without hesitation, that the Holmes in landing struck the barge with unusual force. A large proportion of these witnesses were either passengers on the Cuba, or employed on the wharf-boat, having no connection with the Cuba, and with the most favorable opportunity of knowing the character of the landing made by the Holmes. There is no ground for the supposition that these witnesses were under any mistake as to the facts to which they have testified, or that they have not stated those facts with fairness and candor. Nor does it follow, as a necessary inference, that the witnesses for the respondents who state that the landing of the Holmes was not with unusual force have corruptly falsified the facts. They were on the moving boat at the time, and the shock of the collision would not be so sensibly felt by them as by those who were on the boat which received the blow. But apart from the evidence of the witnesses referred to, as to the landing of the Holmes, there are other facts showing conclusively the great force with which that boat struck the barge of the Cuba. It is in evidence that the lower end of one of the fenders on the Cuba was broken off by the force of the blow, and, moreover, that several of the stanchions of the Holmes were shattered. But more conclusive still is the fact before referred to, that the timbers or scantlings were driven through the planks of the Cuba. No supposition is reconcilable with this result, than that the Holmes came against the Cuba's barge with very unusual force. Nor can the conclusion be avoided, that there was a want of caution and vigilance in making the landing, that throws upon the Holmes the responsibility resulting from the collision.

An attempt has been made by the respondents to prove negligence or want of due caution on the part of the Cuba, to protect them from liability. But the evidence fails entirely to sustain this point. It is insisted that the Cuba was in fault in having a loaded barge alongside at the Smithland wharf. The proof, however, does not show that this was a violation of any of the usages of navigation; nor can the court see anything in the fact from which any inference of negligence can be deduced. The respondents also insist that the libellants' boat was not provided with a sufficient number of fenders for protection against collision, and other accidents of that character. The proof is not clear that the Cuba had more than three fenders on the larboard side, at the time of the collision, but in this connection it is proved that fenders are not regarded as necessary on boats navigating the Cumberland river. This, however, can not be viewed as material in this case, as fenders are used for the protection of the guards of the boat, and are of no avail for the protection of that part of the hull of a steamer in which the injury in question was sustained. Equally unavailing is the defense set up, that the Cuba was deficient in strength to meet the perils of the navigation in which it was employed. The evidence, however, is, that the boat had been thoroughly overhauled and repaired a few weeks only before the collision, and was then as staunch and sound as boats of the same class usually are in that trade.

But the defenses indicated, if fully sustained by the facts, are not available to the respondents in this action. It is a paramount law of navigation, that collisions are always to be avoided when it is practicable to do so; and the fact that one boat is in fault will not justify another in the infliction of an injury that could have been avoided by the observance of proper skill and care. The Cuba was entitled to protection from a wrongful act on the part of the Holmes, even if fault or negligence could be imputed to the former. If it be conceded that the barge was improperly at the side of the Cuba, or that there was a deficiency of fenders, or that the boat was weak and frail in its structure, no one or all of these facts would afford a justification for the wrong-doing of the Holmes. The law is well settled that in determining the question of fault with a view to the ascertainment of liability for an injury, the proximate cause of the injury must be regarded. And, in this case, if that proximate cause is found in the improper attempt of the Holmes to land at the Cuba's barge, instead of the wharf-boat, or the inexcusable violence with which it was landed agains the barge, the respondents are not shielded from liability by proof of negligence or fault on the part of the other boat which had no connection with the act which produced the injury. The law on this subject is well stated by the supreme court of Vermont in the case of Trow v. Central R. Co., 24 Vt. 487, in these words: "Therefore, if there be negligence on the part of the plaintiff, yet, if at the time when the injury was committed, it might have been avoided by the defendant in the exercise of reasonable care and prudence, an action will lie for the injury." There are many other cases which sustain this view of the law, to which I will merely refer, without specially noticing them. 27 Mo. 95; 4 Ohio St. 476; 3 Ohio St. 195.

Upon the whole, I can see nothing in the facts or the law of this case to shield the respondents from liability for the injury sustained by the libellants in the loss of their boat. There was certainly great fault, if not positive recklessness in the landing made by the Holmes, which was the immediate cause of the injury. And it is equally clear, that no negligence is attributable to the Cuba, which can justify the misconduct of the other boat, or which calls for a division of the damages on the ground of mutual fault. The weight of the testimony on that point shows the value of the Cuba to have been $10,000. The net proceeds of the sale of the boat being deducted from this sum, a decree will be entered for the balance, with interest at six per cent. from December 4, 1856.

MILLS et al. v. SMITH.

[4 Biss. 442.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. May, 1865.[2]

EJECTMENT—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—RECITALS—NOTICE.

1. A party can protect himself as a bona fide purchaser, either by showing payment by himself without notice, or that he took through some bona fide purchaser without notice.

2. A recital in a recorded deed, the grantor in which had no record title to the property, does not operate as constructive notice; it is different where the party sees or has actual notice of such recital.

Action of ejectment for land in Cook county.

J. H. Knowlton, for plaintiff.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). The land in controversy was patented originally to Zeba Parmlee. The plaintiffs claim title by a deed from Zeba Parmlee to Edwin A. Lacey in February, 1837, which deed, however, has never been recorded. It is shown by the evidence that the land descended to Andrew H. Lacey as the heir of Edwin A. Lacey, and he devised the property to one of the plaintiffs, Flora M. Mills, wife of Josiah M. Mills. This is the title of the plaintiff, and, independent of all questions connected with the recording laws, of course it would be a valid title.

The defendant's title consists of a deed from Zeba Parmlee to James Lombard, dated the 14th of August, 1854, and recorded the 28th of that month and year, and a deed from James Lombard to defendant, dated December 7, 1855. The deed from Parmlee to Lacey not being recorded at the time that the deed was made by Parmlee to Lombard, the first question to be determined is, was Lombard a purchaser protected by the recording laws?

They provide that every deed shall take effect from the time it is filed for record, as against subsequent purchasers without notice. This deed from Parmlee to Lacey not having been recorded in August, 1854, the first question to determine is, was James Lombard, the grantee in this deed, a purchaser without notice of the previous conveyance made to E. A. Lacey, and did he pay for the land without knowledge of the existence of the previous transfer?

You will bear in mind that as Benjamin Lombard was the agent of James Lombard in the purchase, notice to Benjamin is notice to James Lombard, because notice to the agent is notice to the principal. It is necessary that Benjamin Lombard should have had notice of the previous conveyance, or of some fact which satisfied him that there had been a valid transfer of the land, or a valid incumbrance,—some fact sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry; in other words, there must have been good faith on his part when he made the purchase.

If he was a purchaser in good faith, then it makes no difference whether [Nathaniel] Smith was or not, because his purchase would protect Smith, the latter having purchased from him. But if he was not a purchaser in good faith, the next question is, did Smith purchase in good faith? and the same rule is applicable substantially to him as to Benjamin Lombard, the agent of James Lombard. It is necessary that he should have purchased the land and paid the money for it without knowledge of this previous deed. If he knew of the existence of this deed, or had knowledge of any fact which would satisfy a prudent man or put him upon inquiry that there was a valid sale made to Edwin A. Lacey before he paid the purchase money, then he could not be considered a purchaser in good faith.

But it is contended on the part of the plaintiff that as there was a deed from Zeba Parmlee to Andrew H. Lacey on record on the 25th of November, 1854, and as that recited that he had made a conveyance or transfer of the land to E. A. Lacey many years before, it was constructive notice to the defendant of the conveyance.

I am not prepared to admit that as a rule of law. If he had read this deed or the record of it, or had seen it,—if, in other words, he had actual notice;—then, of course, he would be bound by it; but I hardly think that the fact that it was simply on record, though he never saw it, would be constructive notice to him so as to prevent him from being a bona fide purchaser. At the time this deed was made Mr. Parmlee really had no title to the land, even upon the record, because the deed to James Lombard was recorded the 28th of August, 1854, before the deed was made to A. H. Lacey, and it would be a hard rule, it seems to me, to hold that a recital in a deed attempting to convey land, which a man had no right to convey should operate as constructive notice to a third party. I do not understand any of the cases have gone thus far; therefore, the court will instruct you that it was necessary that Mr. Smith should have had actual notice of the previous deed, or of some fact which would satisfy a prudent man that there had been a transfer of the land, before he paid the purchase money, bearing in mind that the defendant can protect himself either by showing that Lombard is a bona fide purchaser without notice, or that he himself is a bona fide purchaser without notice.

NOTE. MILLS v. WILSON

[2 Cranch, C. C. 216.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1820.

ATTACHMENT—AFFIDAVIT—NOTE INDORSED—PRODUCTION OF NOTE.

Upon an attachment, issued by a justice of the peace, under the Virginia act of 26th December, 1792 (section 6), if the plaintiff's claim arise, in part, upon a note of the defendant, taken up by the plaintiff, who was the indorser, the plaintiff's own affidavit is not sufficient evidence of the debt, without producing the note.

This was an attachment issued by a justice of the peace, under the act of Virginia of the 26th of December, 1792 (section 6). The plaintiff [W. N. Mills] offered his own oath as to the debt, stating that it arose, in part, upon the defendant's note, which had been indorsed by the plaintiff, and by him taken up; but did not produce the note. His affidavit stated that the defendant [William Wilson] was indebted to him in, at least, the sum of $1,000.

THE COURT (nem. con.) required the plaintiff to produce further evidence of his claim, not being satisfied with the affidavit.

STATUTES—REPEAL—REPEAL OF REPEALING ACT—SPECIAL ACT—CONTRACTS—PROHIBITED BY LAW—REMEDY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—EX POST FACTO—RECOVERY—SEVERAL DEFENDANTS—EX DELICTO—EX CONTRACTU.

1. An act, in so far as it is repugnant to a prior act, repeals it.

[Cited in State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 131, 18 S. E. 470.]

2. But the repeal of the last act, does not give vitality to the first act.

3. An express statute declares the repeal of the repealing act, shall not give force to the act repealed.

4. And this statute applies equally to repealed acts, whether repealed expressly or by a subsequent and repugnant act.

5. A contract growing out of an illegal transaction, or which is connected therewith, cannot be enforced.

6. The repeal of a prohibitory act does not make valid contracts entered into against law.

[Cited in Banchor v. Mansel, 47 Me. 62; Nichols v. Poulson, 6 Ohio, 309.]

7. But the legislature may give a remedy on a contract founded on a valuable consideration, where no remedy exists.

8. It may not only remove the prohibition, but where justice and good conscience require, suit may be authorised.

9. Such a law does not impair the obligation of the contract—is not an ex post facto law, nor does it in any respect conflict with the federal constitution.

10. That such a law is special is no more objectionable than every special law which gives corporate powers to an association of individuals.

11. In an action of tort, a recovery may be had against a part of the defendants.

12. But in an action ex contractu, the recovery must be against all or none.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought under the statute against the defendants as stockholders of the Washington Library Association, which was engaged in unlawful banking. Four thousand dollars of the notes in circulation, issued by said institution, and held as collateral security for the payment of three thousand dollars, were given in evidence. Also the following bill of exchange: "$3000.00 Gentlemen, Cincinnati, August 5th, 1840. Sixty days after date pay to the order of E. L. Jones, cashier, three thousand dollars, and charge to account of your ob't ser't. John Phillips. Directed to Messrs. Sylvester & Co. Indorsed, E. L. Jones, cashier, G. J. Slocum."

By the 9th section of the act to prohibit the issuing and circulating of unauthorised bank paper, passed 27th January, 1816 [Laws 1816, p. 10], it is declared, "that all bonds, bills, notes, or written contracts, given to an unauthorised bank, or given to any person or persons, for the use of such bank, &c. shall be void," &c. The 10th section provides, "that every stockholder, shareholder, or partner, hereafter interested in any such bank, shall be jointly and severally answerable, in their individual capacity, for the whole amount of the bonds, bills, notes and contracts of such bank," &c. The 12th section authorises suit and judgment against any part or the whole of the persons interested in the bank. By the 23d section of the act of 28th January, 1824 [Laws 1824, p. 358], it is provided, "that no action shall be brought upon any notes or bills, hereafter issued by any bank, banker, or bankers, intended for circulation, or upon any note, &c. made payable to the bank, unless such bank, &c. shall be incorporated, &c. but that all such notes shall be held and taken in all courts as absolutely void." The 8th section of the act of the 23d of March, 1840 [38 Ohio Laws, p. 117], repeals so much of the above section, "as prohibits actions to be brought upon any notes or bills, issued after the passage of said act, by any bank, &c. unless it shall be incorporated, &c., and which declares that such notes shall be void." So far as the act of 1824 was repugnant to that of 1816, it was repealed. The repugnancy consists in the latter act taking away the right of action given against the stockholders, &c. by the act of 1816. And the question here arises whether the repeal of the act of 1824 revives that part of the act of 1816 which was repealed by it.

By a general act, passed 14th of February, 1809 [Laws 1809, p. 162], it is provided, "that whenever a law shall be repealed, which repealed a former law, the former law shall not thereby be revived unless specially provided for." This provision, it is contended, applies only to laws expressly repealed, and not to an appeal by the repugnancy of the latter act. That the repugnancy does not repeal, but suspends the prior act, which is restored to its full vigor on the repeal of the repugnant act. This distinction seems not to be sustained. Whether the repeal be express or by reason of a repugnant act, subsequently passed, cannot be material in regard to this question. If the repealing act be repealed, it cannot, under the statute cited, give life to the act first repealed. So much of the act of 1824 as prohibited actions on the notes or bills of unauthorised banks, and which declares such notes and bills void, having been repealed by the act of 1840, and such repeal not having given vitality to such parts of the act of 1816 which were repugnant to the act of 1824, we must construe the act of 1816 as it now stands. In this view, sections 11, 12, 13 and 14, of the act of 1816, which regulate suits against the stockholders of an unincorporated bank by the bill-holders, are repealed; and we are to inquire whether, under other sections of the act, the bill-holders, or the holder of the bill of exchange, set out in the declaration, can maintain an action.

There is no express prohibition of an action by the bill-holders; but the act inflicts a penalty for issuing such bills, and for receiving or offering them in payment. This makes the whole transaction unlawful, and this is a fatal objection to the action. If the contract arises out of an illegal act, or is connected therewith, there can be no recovery upon it. Looking only to the act of 1816, the bank organization was against law, the issuing of the notes was prohibited under a penalty, and the receiving and offering such bills in payment subjects an individual to a penalty. Now every step taken in the creation and circulation of these notes or bills, was unlawful, and consequently no action can be brought on them. The act of 1816 was a public act, and the plaintiffs, when they received the bills in question, had notice that they were created and put in circulation in violation of law. The same objection applies to the bill of exchange. The act of the 23d of March, 1840, repealed the act establishing "The Washington Library Association," and in the second section of the repealing act, enacted "that each and every stockholder in, or member of, said company, is hereby declared to be jointly and individually liable for all bills, notes or other property issued or outstanding against said company; and also for any other liability or debt of said company. And the said company is vested with power to collect and receive such assets and valid claims as it may hold against any individual or company, in order to close up and settle the affairs of said company, but for no other purpose whatever."

The effect of this act is now to be considered. Whether the legislature had the power to repeal the charter of "The Library Association," is not necessarily involved in this inquiry. Nor can the decision of it, either way, materially affect the question between the parties on the record. But the charter involved private interests, although the power of banking might not have been given, which no act of the legislature could divest. Such interests are as well secured, and on the same principle, as a deed secures to the grantee a title to his land. If there was an abuse of the charter, by which it became liable to forfeiture, the inquiry should have been made, and the forfeiture enforced by a judicial procedure. But, if that part of the act which purports to repeal the charter, be unconstitutional and void, it does in no respect affect the validity of the second section of the act. An act may be void in part and good in part. Where a contract is made in express violation of law, a repeal of the prohibitory act does not impart validity to the contract. But this principle does not apply to the case under consideration.

The bill of exchange bears date the 5th of August, 1840, and at that time the notes or bills of the bank were received by the plaintiffs. The dates of those bills are not material, as the dates do not show the time they were put into circulation. This transaction took place five months after the act giving a remedy to the creditors of the association, in order to close its business. Now the bill of exchange may have been given to close the concerns of the bank, within the meaning of the act. A large amount of the bills of the institution being in the hands of the plaintiffs, they took the bill of exchange, and retained the notes of the institution as collateral security. Had the legislature power to make this provision? It will be observed that, in the act of 1816, the organization of the bank and the issuing of the bills were expressly prohibited, and a penalty was annexed for doing any of the prohibited acts; still, in the same law, a remedy was given against the stockholders by the bill-holders. That the prohibitory parts of the act, above referred to, took away all legal remedy against the bank on its bills has been decided; and yet, no one has doubted that the remedy given on these bills in the subsequent sections was effectual. Had these provisions been contained in separate acts, it is not perceived that a different effect could have been given to them. They must have been construed as the act of 1816 was construed. Indeed this is a general principle. All laws on the same subject shall be considered, so far as effect can be given to them, as one law. The negotiation between the parties before us took place several months after the remedy was given to and against the bank, and unless the contrary be made to appear, the court will presume that it is within the policy of the act. Such appears to have been its character. The argument that the law only embraced outstanding notes and debts of the company, at the time of its passage, is not sustainable, as the giving of a new note or bill may be as necessary in winding up the business of the bank as the payment, in cash, of an old debt.

At the time the contract was made with the plaintiffs, the disabilities of the bank were removed, and a power was given to it to collect its debts, and all its creditors were authorised to bring suit against it; and the members of the company were declared to be jointly liable. This is placing the bank, for the purpose of closing its business, on the legal ground it would have stood on, had there been no legal inhibition to its organization and business. That this law will operate upon all subsequent transactions, there can be no doubt, and no objection in principle is perceived to giving effect to it on all the open transactions of the bank.

Admit that the mere repeal of a prohibitory law would not give force to a contract made void by such law, yet it does not follow that the legislature may not remove a prohibition, and authorise a recovery, on a valuable consideration. The legislature cannot make contracts for individuals, and they cannot impose an obligation which does not equitably arise out of the transaction. But they may give a remedy where there is none, and where in good conscience there should be one. A remedy being general, applies to previous as well as subsequent cases.

In Matthewson v. Saterlee, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 407, speaking of a statute, the court say: "It is said to be retrospective. Be it so; but retrospective laws which do not impair the obligation of contracts, or partake of the character of ex post facto laws, are not condemned nor forbidden by any part of the constitution. The courts in Pennsylvania having decided that the relation of landlord and tenant did not exist under certain titles, the legislature passed a law that such relation should exist under those titles, and the court held the law valid and carried it into effect. The case being removed by a writ of error, from the supreme court of Pennsylvania to the supreme court of the United States, the judgment was affirmed. The "Washington Library Association," having assumed banking powers, issued its bills, which circulated as bank paper. Every principle of justice would hold the association liable to pay these bills; and by the common law, the holders of the bills could, by an action at law, recover from the association their amount. But the statute declared unauthorised banking unlawful, and consequently no action could be sustained on these bills. But the act of 1840 provides expressly that the holders of these bills may maintain an action on them. And if this can be done, each member of the association is responsible, the same as in an ordinary co-partnership. Every one must pronounce this remedy a just one, and it is clear that it does in no sense conflict with the constitution of the United States. The same rule applies, and with equal force, in behalf of the bank and against its debtors. We think, therefore, that on this ground the action is sustainable on debts contracted prior to the act of 1840. But, the court, in sustaining this action, need not decide this point. The contract on which this suit is founded was long after the act of 1840, giving this remedy.

The above views were given to the jury, who found for the plaintiffs, against a part of the defendants.

On a subsequent day of the term, a motion in arrest of judgment was made on two grounds: (1) Because it does not appear from the declaration that the plaintiffs are aliens. (2) Because the verdict is against a part only of the defendants.

The plaintiffs, in their declaration, state that they are subjects of the queen of Great Britain and Ireland. This, we think, is a sufficient averment. If the plaintiffs are subjects, as averred, they are aliens. And the act of 1789 declares, that the circuit court shall have jurisdiction where the matter in dispute exceeds five hundred dollars, "where an alien is a party," &c. An alien means nothing more than a citizen or subject of a foreign state. An alien is defined to be by Bouvier, "one born out of the United States, who has not since been naturalized under the constitution and laws."

As to the second ground, in actions of tort, a jury may find a part of the defendants guilty, and the others not guilty. And the same rule may apply in an action founded on a statute, with special provisions to that effect.

It was held in Govett v. Radnidge, 3 East, 62, that where the defendants so negligently conducted themselves in the loading, &c., that the hogshead was damaged, the gist of the action was the tort, and not the contract out of which it arose; and therefore, that on the plea of not guilty, the two being acquitted, judgment might be had against the third, who was found guilty. This case seems to be brought into doubt, if not overruled, in the case of Weall v. King, 12 East, 452. A different decision was given in Powell v. Layton, 2 Bos. & P. (N. R.) 365, and in Max v. Roberts, Id. 454.

In actions ex contractu against several, it must appear on the face of the pleadings that their contract was joint, and that fact must be proved on the trial. 1 Chit. Pl. 50. This is otherwise against a common carrier and executors. If one executor plead plene administravit, the plaintiff may recover against the other. 1 Saund. 207a, 207b, note. Where by bankruptcy one of the defendants is discharged, and he plead it, it will not defeat the action, but the plaintiff may enter a nolle prosequi as to him, and go on against the others. But this cannot be done in case of an infant or feme covert. 1 Chit. Pl. 50. But if the special counts in the declaration could, under the special provisions of the statute, authorise a recovery against a part of the defendants; yet it is clear that the verdict cannot be sustained under the general count. This count is for money had and received, consequently the proof and finding of the jury must correspond with the joint liability set out in this count.

The jury have found generally only against a part of the defendants, and on such a finding the judgment cannot be entered, but must be arrested. In Bac. Abr. tit. "Verdict," L. it is said: "If part of the issue which is sensible, be insufficient in law, and the verdict be a general one, it is bad; for the court cannot in such a case but intend that part of the damages were given for a matter insufficient in law."

After the business of the court was closed, but, before the minutes were signed, an application was made to the judges, out of court, and a brief furnished, to amend the verdict, so as to apply to the good counts; but the motion being made too late, was not taken up and considered.

SEAMEN—WAGES—COPARTNERSHIP.

[A contract to sail a vessel in copartnership for a share of the earnings affords no remedy in rem for wages.]

[This was a libel for wages by John Milne against the sloop John Cook.]

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This cause being heard upon the proofs and allegations of the parties, and the premises having been duly considered, and it appearing to the court that the libellant and the owner of the said vessel agreed to sail the said vessel in copartnership for equal shares of her earnings, and that the said agreement was not afterwards revoked or substituted by a contract of hiring with the libellant on wages, and it being considered by the court that the violation of the said agreement of copartnership by the owner of the said vessel, and transferring possession of her to another party, does not give the libellant a right of action in rem against the said vessel for such breach of contract, it is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said libel be dismissed with costs to be taxed.

[2 Paine, 429.] [1]

Circuit Court, New York.[2]

SHIPPING—PENAL ACTION—NEGLECTING TO REPORT PASSENGERS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—STATE POLICE REGULATIONS.

1. The act of New York of February 11, 1824 [Laws 1824, p. 27], imposing penalties for neglecting to report passengers brought from foreign countries into the port of New York, contemplates two distinct offences: the one where the vessel comes directly from the foreign country to New York, or circuitously, having touched at some other port in the United States; the other, where the passengers have been landed at some other place, or put on board some other vessel, with the intention of proceeding to the city of New York; and a count embracing the whole of the first branch of the act is not in the alternative.

2. The foregoing law is not unconstitutional. It relates to the internal police of the state, and is, therefore, properly within the scope of state legislation. Neither does it conflict with any existing act of congress.

[This was a suit by the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York against George Milne.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. This is an action to recover certain penalties given by a statute of the state of New York, passed in the year 1824, concerning passengers in vessels brought from foreign countries into the port of New York, and founded on the neglect to report his passengers, according to the provisions of the act.

The declaration contains two counts: The first is special, setting out the act and its provisions so far as it relates to this case, and averring the facts which are supposed to bring the case within the act. The main objection relied upon to the form of this count, is, that the offence is laid in the alternative. This objection we think not well founded. The objection seems to be founded on a mistaken view of the act. The act contemplates two distinct offences: the one where the vessel arrives with the passengers in the port of New York, and the other is where the passengers have been landed at some other place, or put on board some other vessel, with the intention of proceeding to the city of New York. Under the first branch of the act, the penalty is incurred by coming directly from the foreign country to New York, or circuitously, having touched at some other port in the United States. The offence alleged to have been committed in this case, falls under this first branch of the act; and the manner in which the offence is alleged, is not in the alternative, looking to one or the other of two offences. The offence is the coming into the port of New York, and whether directly from the foreign port, or circuitously, by the way of some other port in the United States, is immaterial.

The second count is according to the form prescribed by the late revision of the laws of this state, and we see no objection to it. But the great objection relied upon is, that the act is unconstitutional, on the ground of its interfering with powers of congress to regulate commerce. A full answer to this objection is contained in the doctrine of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Wilson v. Black Bird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 252. This act does not conflict with any existing act of congress; and if should be admitted that the subject of this law comes under the cognizance of the general government under the power to regulate commerce, until that power is exercised it does not conflict with state legislation. But we think the subject-matter of this law is properly within the scope of state legislation; it relates entirely to the internal police of the state, and falls within that class of subjects which the supreme court says in Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 203, forms a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within a state not surrendered to the general government, viz., inspection laws, quarantine laws of every description, and laws regulating the internal commerce of a state; also, to regulate its own police.

[NOTE. This case was taken to the supreme court on certificate of division of opinion, the following point being certified for the decision of the supreme court: "That the act of the legislature of New York, mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration, assuming to regulate trade and commerce between the port of New York and foreign ports, is unconstitutional and void." Opinions were filed by Mr. Justice Barbour and Mr. Justice Thompson, Mr. Justice Story filing a dissenting opinion. The conclusion of the court was that so much of the section of the act of the legislature of New York as applies to the breaches assigned in the declaration does not assume to regulate commerce between the port of New York and foreign ports, and that so much of said section is constitutional. 11 Pet. Circuit Court, N. D. Florida. March Term, 1875.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—MUNICIPAL BONDS IN AID OF—LEGISLATIVE ACT—CONSENT OF VOTERS—REPEAL OF MUNICIPAL CHARTER—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. Where an act of the legislature authorized the mayor and aldermen of a city, "with the consent of a majority of the corporation comprising said city," to subscribe money to any railroad leading from the city, and to borrow money to pay the same: Held, that there was thereby conferred upon the municipal officers power to issue bonds to pay the subscription.

2. Under authority of such a law, the mayor and aldermen of the city of Pensacola subscribed a large sum to aid the construction of a railroad from the city of Pensacola, and, in payment thereof, issued negotiable bonds payable to bearer in twenty years, which, on their face, stated that they were issued in conformity with the law. In a suit brought by an innocent holder for value on the coupons belonging to said bonds, it was held to be no defense to the action; that at the election to obtain the "consent of a majority of the corporation comprising said city" to such subscription, only a minority of the citizens voted; nor that the question submitted to the citizens was whether the subscription should be made to construct a railroad from Pensacola to Montgomery, and the subscription was actually made to construct a railroad from Pensacola to the state line.

3. A construction of a law which would impute to the legislature a design to perpetrate an unconscionable and barefaced fraud ought to be avoided, if it can be fairly and reasonably done.

4. This rule applied to the acts of the legislature of Florida providing for the incorporation of cities and towns, approved August 6, 1868, and February 4, 1869.

[Approved in Broughton v. Pensacola, 93 U. S. 270.]

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

5. It is not within the power of a legislature, by a repeal of the charter of a municipal corporation, to invade the rights of its creditors and cancel its indebtedness. Such legislation impairs the obligation of contracts and is unconstitutional.

[Cited in State v. Natal (La.) 1 South. 926; Bates v. Gregory, 89 Cal. 397, 26 Pac. 894.]

This cause was heard upon demurrer to the pleas. The action was brought to recover the amount due on a large number of interest coupons attached to bonds issued by the city of Pensacola. The following is a copy of one of the bonds: "Issued in conformity with the 2d section of an act amendatory of an act to amend the act incorporating the city of Pensacola, passed by the legislature of the state, December 29, 1852, and approved by the governor, January 3, 1853. City of Pensacola, State of Florida: Know all men by these presents, that the city of Pensacola is indebted to the Alabama & Florida Railroad Company of Florida, or bearer, in the sum of five hundred dollars; which sum, the said city engages to pay in current money of the United States at the office of the city treasurer, to the said Alabama & Florida Railroad Company of Florida, or bearer, in twenty years from the date hereof, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semiannually on the first day of July and the first day of January in each year, on the delivery of the interest coupons attached, in the city of New York, at such bank as the treasurer of the city of Pensacola shall direct. Pensacola, January 1, 1858. Francis B. Bobé, Mayor. F. E. de la Rua, Treasurer." The following is a copy of one of the coupons sued on: "$17.50. City of Pensacola. $17.50. City Bond No. 38, for $500. Interest coupon for seventeen $^{50}/_{100}$ dollars, due in New York, July 1, 1872. No. 29. F. E. de la Rua, Treasurer." The other bonds are of the same tenor save as to letter and number; and the coupons, save as to number and date of payment.

The plaintiff averred that, as the administrator of Willis J. Milner, he was the owner and bearer of one hundred and eight of these bonds, and of interest coupons cut therefrom and past maturity, which amounted to $36,662.50, and for this amount he asked judgment.

The second section of the act, approved January 3, 1853, referred to upon the face of the bonds as the authority for their issue, is as follows:

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that the mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Pensacola, with the consent of a majority of the corporation composing said city, be and they are hereby authorized to subscribe in the name of the city of Pensacola any amount of money which they may deem necessary to any plankroad or railroad leading from the city of Pensacola; and for the purpose of procuring the amount of subscription, the said city of Pensacola shall have power to borrow the same and shall have power to impose a tax on real estate in said city at a rate not exceeding two per centum on the assessed value of such property."

Pensacola was incorporated as a town by a special but public act of the legislature, passed in 1839. By another special act, passed in 1836, it was incorporated as the city of Pensacola. Prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1868, all the cities and towns of the state were incorporated by special act. The constitution of 1868, provided (article 4, § 21) that "the legislature shall establish a uniform system of county, township and municipal government." To carry out, as it is presumed, this provision of the constitution, an act was passed by the legislature, and approved August 6, 1868, entitled "An act to provide for the incorporation of cities and towns, and to establish a uniform system of municipal government in this state." [Laws 1868, p. 111.] This act provided that the male inhabitants of any hamlet, village, or town in the state, not less than one hundred in number, might establish for themselves, a municipal government, with corporate powers and privileges under the provisions of the act. It then proceeded to declare how such municipal governments might be organized, and what should be their powers and liabilities; in short, to provide for a general system of municipal government. Section 30 of the act was as follows: "That all the powers and privileges conferred in and by this act may be exercised by any city or town within the limits of this state heretofore incorporated; and it shall be lawful for any previously incorporated city or town to reorganize their municipal government under the provisions thereof by a voluntary surrender of their charters and privileges, and by an organization under this act; and upon a failure on the part of any incorporated town or city to accept the provisions of this act within six months after its approval, all the acts vesting such city or town with power are hereby repealed."

Afterwards the legislature passed an act, which was approved February 4, 1869 [Laws 1869, p. 22], having the same title as the act just referred to, and having in view the same general purpose. The 30th section of this act is identical with the 30th section of the act of August 6, 1868, save that nine months instead of six months were prescribed as the time within which cities and towns were to accept the provisions of the act; and in default of which, all acts vesting such city or town with corporate power were repealed. The act approved February 4, 1869, repealed the act of August 6, 1868.

It appears from the pleas that the city of Pensacola, within six months after the passage of the act of 1868, surrendered its original charter and privileges, and reorganized its municipal government under that act. But that city failed to surrender its charter and privileges within nine months after the approval of the act of 1869, and to reorganize under that act, but that the same city of Pensacola with the same territorial limits, immediately after the expiration of said nine months, organized under the provisions of the first six sections of the act of 1869, which prescribe how the inhabitants of any hamlet, village, or town in the state, not less than fifty in number, may establish for themselves a municipal government.

On the 3d of February, 1870, the following act of the legislature was approved and became a law [Laws 1870, p. 41]:

"An Act Relating to Cities.

"Whereas, the legislature of this state, by the passage of an act entitled an act to provide for the incorporation of cities and towns, and to establish a uniform system of municipal government in this state, approved February 4, 1869, did not intend said act to affect the organization of any city or town made under or by virtue of an act entitled an act to provide for the incorporation of cities and towns, and to establish a uniform system of municipal government in this state, approved August 4, 1868; therefore the people of the state of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, do enact as follows:

"Section 1. That all acts, doings, and proceedings made and had, or hereafter to be made and had, by any mayor, board of councilmen, or any other city officer in any city of this state, organized in pursuance of an act entitled an act to provide for the incorporation of cities and towns, and to establish a uniform system of municipal government in this state, approved August 4, 1868, and while in the performance of their duties under said organization, are hereby declared legal and valid."

H. A. Herbert and E. A. Perry, for plaintiff.

A. E. Maxwell and G. A. Stanley, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The defendant pleads the general issue and six special pleas, which, however, set up but two substantial defenses to the action.

The first of these special defenses is in effect as follows: That the authority to incur the indebtedness for which the bonds were issued was dependent upon the consent of a majority of the corporation composing said city, and that at the election held to decide whether the city would incur said indebtedness, only ninety-five votes were cast, which was not a majority of said corporation; and the question submitted to the voters was whether the city should subscribe to the stock of a railroad leading from Pensacola to Montgomery, in the state of Alabama, and not to a railroad leading from Pensacola to the Alabama state line. The plea which sets up this defense fails to present one of the questions which the pleader intended to present, by neglecting to aver that the subscription stock was actually made in a company which was only authorized to build, and only did build a railroad from Pensacola to the Alabama state line. We will, however, consider the plea as if such averment were made. The evident meaning of the second section of the act approved January 8, 1853, above quoted, is that the city of Pensacola may, upon a condition therein named, subscribe to the capital stock of any plankroad leading from the city of Pensacola, and may borrow the money to pay the amount of its subscription, and may levy a tax on the real estate of the city to pay the sum so borrowed, principal and interest. The authority given by this enactment is ample to cover the acts done by the mayor and aldermen of the city. They subscribed the stock in a railroad leading from Pensacola, and, to raise the money to pay for it, issued the bonds, a portion of which are in controversy in this action.

The power to borrow money conferred upon a municipal corporation implies the power to issue bonds and interest coupons on which to negotiate the loan. Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 654. But the defendant insists that a majority of the voters of the city did not vote for the subscription of money to the railroad, and that the railroad in behalf of which the vote was taken was a road leading from Pensacola to Montgomery, and not a road from Pensacola to the Alabama state line. Do these facts constitute a defense to these bonds and coupons in the hands of a bona fide holder? The authorities are adverse.

"When a corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority, and they are no more liable to be impeached for any infirmity in the hands of such a holder than any other commercial paper." See Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 203, and numerous cases there cited. See, also, Moran v. Miami Co., 2 Black [67 U. S.] 722; Mercer Co. v. Hacket, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Van Hostrup v. Madison City, Id. 291; Meyer v. Muscatine, Id. 384; Mygatt v. Green Bay [Case No. 9,998]; Seeling v. City of Racine [Id. 12,631]; Supervisors v. Schenck, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 772.

In the case of Commissioners of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 545, it was held that "when the bonds on their face import a compliance with the law under which they were issued, the purchaser is not bound to look further. The decision of the board of commissioners may not be conclusive in a direct proceeding to inquire into the facts before the rights and interests of other parties had attached; but after the authority has been executed, the stock subscribed, and the bonds issued and in the hands of innocent holders, it would be too late, even in a direct proceeding, to call it in question."

The case of Marsh v. Fulton Co., 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 676, is relied on to support the defense under consideration. All that was decided in that case was, that where the commissioners of a county are authorized to subscribe to the capital stock of a particular corporate body, that does not authorize a subscription to the stock of another corporation, and that the bonds issued to pay for such stock are issued without authority, and are therefore void. That is not this case. Here the city was authorized to subscribe to any plankroad or railroad leading from the city of Pensacola. The pleas show that the subscription was made to such a railroad. The subscription was therefore covered by the authority of the law. If there was any informality in the election by which the consent of the citizens of Pensacola was to be obtained to the subscription, that brings the case precisely within the authorities above cited. I am of opinion, therefore, that the defense under consideration is no answer to the action.

The defense mainly relied on is the second. This may be thus stated: After the bonds and coupons named in the declaration were issued by the city of Pensacola, the charter under which it was organized was repealed, and the municipal body known as the city of Pensacola ceased to exist, and the present city of Pensacola was organized under another law, and is a distinct and different municipal corporation from that which issued the bonds. Therefore, the present city of Pensacola is not liable on these bonds and coupons. In other words, it is claimed that the city of Pensacola, as a municipal corporation, ceased to exist, by its failure to adopt the provisions of the act of February 4, 1869, within nine months after the approval of that act; that as a consequence, all the debts and obligations incurred by the city prior to February 4, 1869, were canceled and destroyed; and that the present city of Pensacola having been organized under the act of 1869, though by the same inhabitants, and covering the same territory, and with substantially the same powers, is relieved of any obligation to pay the debts of the city incurred prior to February 4, 1869. The legislation which produces such effects ought to be clear and explicit. To ascribe a purpose to accomplish such results, to the legislature of Florida, would be to charge it with an attempt to perpetrate a most unconscionable and barefaced fraud. I do not believe that the legislature of Florida had any such purpose, or that its legislation, fairly construed, can have any such result. A construction of the law which sustains such a purpose ought to be avoided, if it can be fairly and reasonably done, consistently with the terms of the act.

A careful reading of the acts of 1868 and 1869 shows that the purpose of those acts was not to destroy the municipal corporations already existing in the state, but to carry out the requirements of the constitution by establishing a uniform system of municipal government in the state, and to rehabilitate the existing municipal bodies with new and uniform privileges and powers. The language of section 30 of both the acts carries this idea: "All the powers and privileges conferred in and by this act may be exercised by any city or town within the limits of this state heretofore incorporated." Had the section stopped here, there could be no pretense that its effect was to create new corporate entities. But it proceeds to declare that "it shall be lawful for any previously incorporated city or town to reorganize their municipal government under the provisions thereof, by a voluntary surrender of their charters and privileges, and by an organization under this act." This clause provides for the "reorganization," not the destruction, of municipal corporations. It does not provide for a new corporate entity. If it did, it would follow that every time a city or town received a new charter, it became a new corporate body, which is not the case. Mayor, etc., of Colchester v. Seaber, 3 Burrows, 1866. The language of the section thus far seems to recognize the continued and unbroken life of the cities and towns reorganized under the act. The last clause of the section which, upon a failure of an incorporated town or city to accept the provisions of the act within nine months, repeals the acts vesting such city or town with corporate powers, does not necessarily destroy the corporate existence of such city or town.

Dillon, in his learned work on Municipal Corporations, says (volume 1, § 116): "Where the functions of an old corporation are suspended, or where the corporation by loss of all its members, or of an integral part, is dissolved as to certain purposes, it may be revived by a new charter, and the rights of the old corporation granted over to the same or a new set of corporators, who in such case take all the rights and are subject to all the liabilities of the old corporation of which it is but a continuation." The text is sustained by the citation of the following, among other authorities: Rex v. Pasmore, 3 Term R. 199, 247; Reg. v. Ballivos, 1 P. Wms. 207; Mayor, etc., of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 383. My construction of the latter part of section 30 is, that it provided merely for a suspension of the powers of the municipal corporations failing to reorganize under the act, and not for a dissolution of the corporation itself.

As soon, therefore, as the city of Pensacola organized under the first six sections of the act, it was simply the assumption by the city of the new powers and privileges which the act conferred, and was not the creation of a new corporation. That it was not the purpose of the legislature to give the effect to the act of 1869, claimed by defendant, is apparent from the enactment of the legislature of Florida, approved February 3, 1870, entitled "An act relating to cities," and copied at large in the statement of the case. I am of opinion, therefore, that the failure of the city to reorganize under the act of 1869, within nine months after its passage, did not put an end to the corporate existence of the city of Pensacola, and that its subsequent reorganization under the first six sections of the act did not create a new, but was merely the rehabilitation of an old corporate body.

But conceding that the effect of the acts of August 6, 1868, and February 4, 1869, and of the failure of the city of Pensacola to reorganize under the latter act, was what the defendant claims, and that it was the purpose of the legislature to accomplish that result, the question remains, was it competent for the legislature to destroy a municipal corporation, or to put it in its power to destroy itself, so as to cancel and wipe out its debts and liabilities?

It was held by Judge Story, in Mumma v. Potomac Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 281, that a private corporation might be dissolved by the legislature, or by judicial sentence, and that such dissolution did not impair the obligation of a contract any more than the death of an individual impairs the obligation of his contract. He placed this view on two grounds: (1) Because the obligation survives and the creditors may enforce their claims against any property belonging to the corporation; and (2) because every creditor is presumed to contract with reference to the possibility of the dissolution of the corporate body. The case is different with a municipal corporation. The main, and in most cases the only source from which creditors of a municipal corporation can expect to receive payment of their claims is found in the power of taxation. The dissolution of the corporation of course puts an end to its power of taxation, and renders the collection of debts owing by it an impossibility.

Now, in the case of these bonds, the act which authorized the indebtedness for which they were issued also provided for the levy of a tax to pay the indebtedness. That provision for taxation was as much a part of the contract between the city of Pensacola and the bondholder as if it had been inserted in the body of the bond. A repeal of the tax provision would have impaired the obligation of the contract, and would have been a violation of the constitution of the United States.

In the case of Von Hoffman v. Quincy, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 535, the result of the decision of the court was, that when a statute authorized a municipal corporation to issue bonds and to exercise the power of local taxation to pay them, and persons have bought and paid value for bonds issued accordingly, the power of taxation thus given is a contract within the meaning of the constitution, and cannot be withdrawn until the contract is satisfied. The state and the corporation in such cases are equally bound. See, also, Butz v. Muscatine, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 583; Welch v. St. Genevieve [Case No. 17,372]; U. S. v. Treasurer of Muscatine Co. [Id. 16,538]. If the legislature cannot take from a municipal corporation the power of taxation conferred contemporaneously with the power to borrow money, and for the purpose of repaying the money borrowed, it would seem to follow a fortiori that it could not utterly destroy the municipal corporation which had issued the bonds on the faith of a law authorizing taxation to pay them; thus, not only repealing the power of taxation, but leaving no corporate entity in existence against which suit might be brought. How the obligation of a contract, made by a municipal corporation for the payment of money, could be more effectually impaired, it is difficult to conceive.

Upon this question, Dillon, in his work on Municipal Corporations (volume 1, § 114), says: "As respects creditors of a municipal corporation, their rights are protected from legislative invasion by the constitution of the United States, and no repeal of a charter of a municipal corporation can so dissolve it as to impair the obligation of the contract, or, it may probably be safely added, preclude the creditor from recovering his debt." In support of this view the learned author cites the following authorities: Cooley, Const. Lim. 290, 292; Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 312; Thompson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 327; Havemeyer v. Iowa Co., Id. 294; 2 Kent, Comm. 307, note; Board of Com'rs of Tippecanoe Co. v. Cox, 6 Ind. 403; Coulter v. Robertson, 24 Miss. 278; State v. Common Council of City of Madison, 15 Wis. 30; Blake v. Portsmouth & C. R. R., 39 N. H. 435.

My conclusion is, therefore, that no legislation of the state of Florida could so destroy the city of Pensacola as to relieve it from the obligation to pay the bonds issued by it; that the present city of Pensacola is the same corporate body as that by which the bonds were issued, reorganized and clothed with a new charter, and with new powers and privileges, it is true, but still the same municipal corporation, and liable to pay the bonds and coupons in controversy in this suit. Any other conclusion would produce the most monstrous results. It would put it in the power of every city and town in Florida to cancel all its indebtedness incurred prior to February 4, 1869, amounting to many hundred thousand dollars, and to set their creditors at defiance. It would enable every city which receives a new charter to repudiate all indebtedness contracted under its old one, and leave the holders of its bonds utterly without remedy. In my judgment, neither of the defenses set up by the special pleas is good in law.

The demurrer to the pleas must, therefore, be sustained.

MILNOR v. NEW JERSEY R. CO. et al. SHARDLOW v. SAME. BIGELOW v. SAME. MILNOR v. NEWARK PLANK ROAD CO. et al. SHARDLOW v. SAME.

[6 Am. Law Reg. 6; 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) Append. 782; 16 Lawy. Ed. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. Append. 1.]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. Sept. 22, 1857.[1]

BRIDGES—NAVIGABLE RIVER—POWER TO ENJOIN—ACT OF LEGISLATURE—EXCLUSIVE PRIVILEGE—EMINENT DOMAIN—CHANGING DIRECTION AND POSITION.

1. A court of the United States has no jurisdiction to restrain by injunction the erection of a bridge over a navigable river lying wholly within the limits of a particular state, where such erection is authorized by the legislature of the state, though a port of entry has been created by congress above the bridge. Dicta in Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co. [Case No. 3,845], overruled; and in Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co. 13 How. [54 U. S.] 579, explained.

[Cited in Woodman v. Kilbourn Manuf'g Co., Case No. 17,978; Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co., Id. 12,852; Same v. Troy & W. T. Bridge Co., Id. 12,853; Miller v. New York, Id. 9,585.]

2. Construction of acts of the legislature of New Jersey with regard to the proprietors of the bridges over the rivers Passaic and Hackensack, and the agreements made thereunder with respect to these rivers.

3. If such acts and agreements give to the corporation a franchise or exclusive privilege of taking toll, and erecting a bridge on these rivers, that franchise or privilege may be taken by the legislature of the state, under its right of eminent domain, on providing compensation.

4. Such franchise or exclusive privilege, if it exists, is vested in the corporation at large and not in the individual members, and may be waived or relinquished by the action of a majority of the corporators.

5. The mere establishment of a particular line of road, and erection of a bridge in a particular location, in a town, by a railroad company, after a controversy with the inhabitants with respect thereto, does not amount to a contract so as to preclude the company, after a lapse of time, from changing the direction of their line and the position of the bridge.

These were several bills in equity, [by Charles E. Milnor against the New Jersey Railroad Company and others; William L. Shardlow against the same; David Bigelow against the same; Charles E. Milnor against the Newark Plank Road Company and others and William L. Shardlow against the same,] for injunctions and other relief, upon the facts and for the purposes set forth in the opinion below. Interlocutory injunctions had been granted, and is now upon final hearing.

[2] [The constitution gives to congress power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states." With this clause in force, as the supreme law of the land, Milnor and others, citizens of New York, and owning wharves in the city of Newark, New Jersey, but not navigators, pilots or anything of that sort, filed their bills in the circuit court of the state just named to restrain the New Jersey Railroad Company and others from erecting two certain bridges over the Passaic, one in the city of Newark, at a point called the "Commercial Dock," the other at a point about two and a half miles below the wharves of the town. This company's road forms a link in the chain of roads which connect New York with Philadelphia, and so the North and South. The company had been for many years running its trains over a bridge at the upper end of the town; but in crossing the river at that point they were obliged to make their road describe a curve, much in the shape of an S, carrying it, moreover, through populous parts of the city, and causing as they said, delays and dangers. The purpose of the new bridges was, therefore, to shorten and straighten the road.

[The bridges in controversy were authorized to be erected by statute of the state of New Jersey. They were required by this statute to have pivot-draws, leaving two passages of sixty-five feet each for the passage of vessels navigating the river. As to their effects on the navigation, the complainants brought a large number of wharf owners, captains of sloops, schooners, and of little steamboats, who gave it as their "opinion," that the bridges could not be erected without obstructing the navigation by the detention of ice, and by causing bars and shoals in the river, and without subjecting sailing vessels, especially, to a detention for a change of tide and wind, or for daylight and to inconveniences and hazards generally; while it would probably subject wharf property above the bridges to a depreciation of from twenty-five to fifty per cent., break up a system of tow-boats that had got established in that river, and raise the price of freights; since "you can't get no man to go through these bridges without extra pay; they all have such a dread of bridges, which, if there are currents, frequently break sails and rigging, and sometimes injure their hulls." But the case did not thus strike everybody. The railroad company proved, or brought witnesses to prove that "not only would the proposed bridge offer no material obstruction to navigation, but by replacing the present bridge at Centre street, would actually improve the general navigation of the river, and enhance the general value of wharf property on the river, and by effecting the removal of the railroad track now running in rear of the intermediate wharves, would result in very little, if any, damage to any of them." As respected the advantages to the railroad, and the improved safety to travellers, while the complainants admitted that the road was a great thoroughfare, and that crossing on the old bridge obliged the trains to make a curve, they denied that the curve caused delay or danger to the road, or that any new track was necessary. They showed that the road had been very profitable, making for years dividends of not less than ten to fifteen per cent. while, on the subject of accident, they cited the report of the directors to the stock-holders for 1853 and 1854, in the former of which the directors say, with a spirit of piety which left no doubt that they spoke the truth: "It is a subject for thankfulness and praise to the Almighty Governor of the Universe, that on the 21st anniversary, the board are enabled to announce the fact, that although—including commuters and others—more than 13,000,000 of persons have been transported on the road, no person within the cars has suffered in life or limb." While in the latter they continue in the same strain of gratitude and sense of obligation: "The exemption from serious accidents which has attended the operations of the company during the past year is cause of sincere thankfulness. The gratifying record that no person transported on the road has been injured in life or limb, while in the cars, is still true, though the whole number of passengers since the opening of the road exceeds 15,000,000. Such favorable results, while they entitle those having charge of the condition of the road and the running of the trains to high commendation for their vigilance and care, also increase our obligations to a kind, protecting providence. No doubt is entertained that the net earnings will be ample for the cash dividend of ten per cent. per annum, and a handsome surplus applicable to such construction as shall increase the value and usefulness of our work."

[For the complainants: The case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 519, governs this. In that case the bridge company, under authority from the legislature of Virginia, undertook to erect a bridge over the Ohio at Wheeling. The Ohio at this point was wholly in her own state. She erected the bridge. When erected it did not destroy the navigation at all, though it impeded it somewhat, rendering it less free. The state of Pennsylvania, having large canals and railways terminating on the Ohio, and which she represented, had been built with direct reference to free navigation of that river, filed her bill to abate the bridge as a nuisance. Her allegation was, indeed, that the bridge had been built "under color of an act of the legislature of Virginia, but in direct violation of its terms." The legislature of Virginia, however, passed at once an act declaring that the bridge as constructed was constructed "in conformity with the intent and meaning of the charter." The bridge as erected existed therefore, under the authority of the state. It was constructed under skilful engineers, and no otherwise impeded navigation probably than any bridge in any large river generally impedes navigation; rendering it less free. Most steamers with stiff smoke-pipes would have been able to pass as it was; any steamer with flexible pipes—pipes on hinges—could certainly have done so. The court, however, declared that the bridge was a nuisance, and directed it to be abated, unless so raised and altered as to leave the navigation wholly free. Yet this bridge was a connecting bond of a great highway; it was, itself, a highway, at once intra-territorial, and leading to intercourse between the states. But the fact that it was below a port of entry, Pittsburgh, was fatal to it.

[McLean, J., giving the opinion of the court, in which he places reliance on the fact that the bridge was erected below a port of entry, says: "The fact that the bridge constitutes a nuisance is ascertained by measurement. If obstruction exists, it is a nuisance. An indictment at common law could not be sustained in the federal courts by the United States against the bridge as a nuisance, as no such procedure has been authorized by congress; but a proceeding on the ground of a private and irreparable injury may be sustained against it by an individual or a corporation. Such a proceeding is common to the federal courts, and also to the courts of the state. The injury makes the obstruction a private nuisance to the injured party; and the doctrine of nuisance applies to the case where the jurisdiction is made out, the same as in a public prosecution. * * * The powers of a court of chancery are as well adapted, and as effectual for relief in the case of a private nuisance, as in either of the cases named." In Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co. [Case No. 3,845], which was a bill to enjoin a bridge below Philadelphia, over the Schuylkill, a river much smaller and shallower than this—like it, wholly in one state—far more than it, in its history the subject of regulation by the state in which it lies—a stream eminent for the finny tribes which haunt the sedge and ooze, but not whitened in its muddy sloth by sails of commerce—a stream bridged everywhere at the city—in regard to which congress may be said never to have legislated—Greer, J., granted an injunction to stay a bridge about to be erected under the authority of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania. The court there said: "The jurisdiction in cases like the present has been fully considered and decided in State v. Wheeling Bridge [13 How. (54 U. S.) 519]. The court is not at liberty, even if so disposed, to disregard the authority of that case. It is there decided that although the courts of the United States cannot punish by indictment the erection of a nuisance on our public rivers, erected by authority of a state, yet that, as courts of chancery, they may interfere at the instance of an individual or corporation who are likely to suffer some special injury, and prohibit by injunction the erection of nuisances to the navigation of the great navigable rivers leading to the ports of entry within a state." And the court even went out of its way to add, on the authority of the Wheeling Bridge Case, that the commerce on the Schuylkill below the port of Philadelphia was entitled to as much protection as that of the Ohio, Mississippi, Delaware, or the Hudson.

[For the defendants: Granting to the Wheeling Bridge Case [supra] the fullest weight, it is no precedent for this. The jurisdiction there exercised was invoked upon the proposition that "the river Ohio is a highway of commerce, regulated by congress." That river is an enormous river, forms the boundary of six states, and is navigable through them and four other states for a thousand miles. State laws had not regulated it at any time, except to make it free, while it had been regulated by congress in every way. By the ordinance of 1787, its waters had been declared to be common highways, and forever "free." Virginia had, in 1789, when desiring that Kentucky should be admitted into the Union, declared that its navigation should be "free and common to all citizens of the United States," to which act congress assented; and it thenceforth became a compact between Virginia and all other states. Successive appropriations were made by congress for the removal of obstructions to its navigation; and, finally, when Virginia applied in four several instances—1836, '37, '38, and '43—for the passage of a law to authorize the construction of a bridge at Wheeling, she met in each case with refusal. We refer to these facts being public ones. The "regulation" by congress had, therefore, been made, as we have said, "in every way"—by what that body did, and by what it prevented—made affirmatively, and made negatively. Now as respects the Passaic, in the first place its character and geographical position are wholly different from that of the Ohio. It is a very small stream; it rises, flows, and discharges itself within one state—a small one. No question can arise from its flowing through or past any other state. Then, no regulation of congress worth naming has ever touched it, while the state in which it lies, and whose river it is, has exercised an early and continued control over it.

[The remarks about nuisance made by McLean, J., in giving the opinion of the court, are extra-judicial. They have tended perhaps to mislead the professional mind; certainly, they were unnecessary to the decision of the cause, and if meant to be applied to the case of a bridge authorized by statute, and built according to the statute, are not well founded in law. The fact that a bridge is below a port of entry does not necessarily make it a nuisance; nor was that the point adjudged in the Wheeling Bridge Case. The case before the court bears far greater, and indeed a close, analogy to Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Company, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 257. Blackbird creek was "one of those many creeks passing through a deep level marsh adjoining the Delaware, up which the tide flows for some distance." Under incorporation from the state of Delaware, certain persons to increase the value of property along its banks, and to improve the health of the region by draining the marsh, erected a dam. This dam Wilson broke down; and on trespass brought against him by the company, the question was, whether the authorization of the dam was void as repugnant to the constitution, the counsel for the company arguing that it came in conflict with the power of the United States "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states." The court held, unanimously, that it was not repugnant to the constitution. Marshall, C. J., giving his opinion, says: "The value of property on the banks of the creek must be enhanced by excluding the water from the marsh, and the health of the inhabitants probably improved. Measures calculated to produce these objects, provided they do not come into collision with the powers of the general government, are undoubtedly within those which are reserved to the states. But the measure authorized by this act stops a navigable creek, and must be supposed to abridge the rights of those who have been accustomed to use it; but this abridgment, unless it comes in conflict with the constitution, or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of the state and its citizens, of which this court can take no cognizance. If congress had passed any act which bore upon the case, any act in execution of the power to regulate commerce, the object of which was to control state legislation over those small navigable creeks into which the tide flows, and which abound throughout the lower country of the Middle and Southern states, we should not feel much difficulty in saying that a state law coming in conflict with such an act would be void; but congress has passed no such act. We do not think that the act can, under all the circumstances of the case, be considered as repugnant to the power to regulate commerce in its dormant state, or as being in conflict with any law passed on the subject." This great chief justice does here admit that it is not every obstruction of every navigable stream by the state, nor even the complete stoppage by it of some navigable streams, which will constitute an interference with the constitutional power of congress to regulate commerce. He speaks of the matter as a relative question, and says, that, "under all the circumstances of the case," the act of the state could not be considered as such an interference. This relative character of this class of questions is what we maintain. He admits, impliedly, too, that it is not every act of congress legislating about a stream which will be a regulation of commerce in regard to it. "Had congress passed an act the object of which was to control state legislation over these small navigable creeks, such an act," he says, "would have made the state legislation void." We invoke, then, his high authority. When Mr. Burke, on the out break of the French Revolution, was charged, for some expressions which he uttered, with deserting Whig politics, after showing, as he did, that the expressions used by him were nearly identical with many found in the writings of the great Whig statesman of the Revolution of 1688, he said, that he did not desire to be thought "a better Whig than Lord Somers." Nor do we—happy if we can rightly follow him—desire to assert the powers of the federal government further than they were asserted by John Marshall. We say, as he did, that the question is one of circumstances—circumstances which every wise judge, as every practical statesman must regard, and in some degree be governed by. Here is a river, on the one hand, having a commerce not vast; and there, too, on the other hand, is a road which is the great line of communication between Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington and all the South—a road which has a greater travel upon it perhaps than any road of the world, and which, somewhere, must cross this stream. A principle of law designed to protect commerce between the states must not be so construed as practically grievously to injure it.

[In Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co., cited on the other side [supra], and much misunderstood, this court (Grier, J.) said: "At common law every obstruction, however small, to the free navigation of a public river might, in strictness, be styled a nuisance; but the application of this definition to every bridge over every creek where the tide ebbs and flows, or which a chance sloop might occasionally visit, would be absurd, and highly injurious to public interests. Intercourse by means of turnpikes, canals, railroads, and bridges is a public necessity. A railroad constructed by the authority of a state is often many thousand times more beneficial to the interests of commerce than the unlimited freedom of navigation over unimportant inlets, creeks, or bays, or remote portions of a harbor. It would be unreasonable to insist that the millions who travel on them should be subjected to great delay or annoyance for the convenience of a few sloops or fishing-smacks. Where bridges are constructed with draws or openings for the passage of masted vessels, and high enough to permit others to pass under, if possible, the occasional delay of such vessels for a short time may be a trifling inconvenience in comparison with the public benefit of the bridge. In every investigation of this kind, the question is relative, not absolute. Whether a certain erection be a nuisance must depend upon the peculiar circumstances of each case. When the trade of the channel is of great amount and importance, and that across is trifling, the same rule cannot apply as to a case where the conditions are contrary. If a steam ferry can amply accommodate those who cross the stream, and a bridge with a draw would inflict an injury on commerce, and tax the public by increased freight, there is no sufficient reason why a bridge should be erected because it will be more profitable stock than steamboat or towboat, or better accommodate some small neighborhood or neck of land. The city of Boston is situated on a peninsula. No public necessity could well exist which would justify a bridge compelling all the commerce of her port to pass through a draw, while it might be very reasonable that vessels passing from one part of the port or harbor to another should be compelled to submit to some inconvenience for the sake of a bridge erected for one of the great railroads, so important to the prosperity and wealth of the city. It would be an abuse of the term to call the Schuylkill dam a nuisance because it is below tide water, and converts a few miles of useless sloop navigation into a canal which, under the name of the Schuylkill Navigation Company, annually adds millions to the wealth of the city and state, and whose commerce constitutes the staple of this western portion of the port of Philadelphia. Nor is it any appreciable injury to the commerce of the port that vessels with high masts cannot pass the Market Street bridge. Ample space for those vessels still remains at the wharves below. The great staple of this Western port is coal, and this bridge is built of such a height as not to interfere with the passage of the steamtugs and canal-boats engaged in transporting it. The city of Philadelphia now extends across the Schuylkill, and such a bridge (a great thoroughfare across it at the connecting points), is a public necessity. The same may possibly be said of the Gray's Ferry bridge (far lower down the stream), over which the railroad to Baltimore passes. Vessels with masts, and steamboats with high chimneys, are no doubt put to considerable inconvenience in passing the draw; but the bridge is so built that the immense trade in coal can pass by it without interruption." And the court acted in perfect conformity to these principles when, in order to prevent an outlay while points of law and fact were yet contested, and in the interests, therefore, of all parties to the controversy, it granted a preliminary injunction to stay a bridge far down on the Schuylkill river—almost indeed, as it enters the Delaware—the effect of whose erection the city of Philadelphia, by its select and common councils, represented would be greatly to injure it and the whole line of wharves of the Schuylkill river, without any corresponding public benefit whatever. The judge indeed, in that case, misreading apparently, as the court's adjudication in the Wheeling Bridge Case, the expression (dicta simply) of McLean, J., to which we have referred, may have assumed that federal authority was interfered with where it was not, and have expressed itself too strongly in support of a right of final injunction over such a stream. But the final injunction was never granted; and of what avail are such expressions as are cited on the other side, made, as the court declared, but as it has not been noted, contrary to its "desire"; and to guard against "unnecessary fears excited"?—expressions never acted on, but the reverse, and which must be taken merely as an illustration of the way in which, when supporting against a powerful argument at the bar a decree which he is about to make, a judge will sometimes press with strength and earnestness, with all the power of statement and illustration, which he possesses, a doctrine which he seeks to establish, and will go almost as far in one direction as counsel have gone in another, responding to extremes by exuberance. He does not then overlay his opinion by all the limitations, and qualifications, and restrictions which he would use were he inditing an academic lecture. Such expressions are natural, and comprehensible as well, to all except to those who cannot see that they were used responsively, and argumentatively, and hypothetically, and by way of illustration, and to exclude conclusions in a matter not requiring action upon them; and that some qualification and limitation of them when action is required and when all the conditions of the problem may be reversed, argues no inconsistency of principle, but, contrariwise, may be the most intelligent form of principles' assertion.

[Reply: Blackbird creek bore no resemblance to the Passaic. It was a mere sluice, up and down which the Delaware estuated. There was no port of entry at its head. It had few or no inhabitants but those such as its name indicates, and no commerce of any kind. The case cited and relating to it does not apply.][2]

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The object of these five several bills is to obtain injunctions prohibiting the erection of certain bridges over the Passaic river. One of these is proposed to be erected at a point called the "Commercial Dock," in the city of Newark, by the New Jersey Railroad & Transportation Company; the other, by the Newark Plank Road Company, near the mouth of the Passaic river and some two and a half miles below the wharves of the port of Newark. The erection of these bridges is authorized by the legislature of New Jersey. They are required to have pivot draws, leaving two passages of sixty-five feet each for the passage of vessels navigating the river or harbor. The first of these bridges is required in order to avoid certain curves in the railroad where it passes through Newark, and to make it straight; the other, to accommodate the large and increasing commerce between the cities of New York and Newark, on the plank road connecting the lower end of Newark with Jersey City. It will not be necessary to a proper consideration of the several questions affecting the decision of these cases, to give an abstract either of the pleadings or the testimony. Where opinions are received in evidence, there can be no restraint as to quantity. Such testimony is always affected by the feelings, prejudices and interests of the witnesses, and is of course contradictory. A skipper will pronounce every bridge a nuisance, while travelers on plank or railroads will not think it proper that their persons or property should be subject to delay, or risk of destruction, to avoid an inconvenience or slight impediment to sloops and schooners; owners of wharves or docks who may apprehend that their interests may be affected by a change of location of a bridge, are unanimous in their opinion that public improvement had better be arrested than that their interests should be affected. In this conflict of testimony and discordant opinion, we shall not stop to make any invidious comparisons as to the credibility of the witnesses, but assume such facts as we believe to be proven, without attempting to vindicate the propriety of our assertions.

1. The first of the three great questions so ably discusssed by the learned counsel in these cases, is briefly and lucidly stated in the following propositions, which complainants have endeavored to establish: First. That the Passaic river is a public highway of commerce, which under the constitution of the United States has been regulated by congress. Second. That the free navigation of the Passaic river as a common highway having been established by regulation of congress, and by compact between the states, it cannot lawfully be obstructed by force of any state authority or legislation. Third. The bridges proposed to be erected by the New Jersey Railroad Company and Plank Road Company will be each an obstruction to the free navigation of the Passaic river, and public nuisances. Consequently this court will enjoin their erection, on complaint of any injured party.

So far as these propositions involve the facts of the case, we find them to be as follows: The Passaic is a river having its springs and its outlet wholly within the state of New Jersey. Though a small and narrow river it is navigable for sloops, schooners, and the smaller classes of steamboats as far as the tide flows, some miles above Newark; at the upper end, and above this city there are several bridges, with small draws, and difficult to pass. These were all erected by authority of the state, and one of them more than fifty years ago. The city of Newark has been made a port of entry by act of congress [and the United States had surveyed the channel, built two light-houses, "fog-lights," spar-buoys, &c.];[3] has some little foreign commerce, and some with ports of other states. Being in fact but a manufacturing suburb of New York, much the larger portion of her commerce is with that city, and carried on the rail and plank roads connecting them. That the proposed bridges will in some measure cause an obstruction to the navigation of the river, and some inconvenience to vessels passing the draws, is certainly true. Every bridge may be said to be an obstruction in the channel of a river, but it is not necessarily a nuisance. Bridges are highways as necessary to the commerce and intercourse of the public as rivers. That which the public convenience imperatively demands, cannot be called a public nuisance because it causes some inconvenience or affects the private interests of a few individuals. Now, if every bridge over a navigable river be not necessarily a nuisance, but may be erected for the public benefit, without being considered in law or in fact a nuisance, though certainly an inconvenience affecting the navigation of the river, the question recurs, who is to judge of this necessity? Who shall say what shall be the height of a pier, the width of a draw, and how it shall be erected, managed and controlled? Is this a matter of judicial discretion or legislative enactment? Can that be a nuisance which is authorized by law? Does a state lose the great police power of regulating her own highways and bridges over her own rivers, because the tide may flow therein, or as soon as they become a highway to a port of entry within her own borders? In the course of seventy years' practical construction of the constitution, no act of congress is to be found regulating such erections, or assuming to license a bridge, over such a river wholly within the jurisdiction of a state (if we except the doubtful precedent of the Cumberland road), and during all this time states have assumed and exercised this power. If we now deny it to the states, where do we find any authority in the constitution or acts of congress for assuming it ourselves? These are questions which must be resolved before this court can constitute itself "arbiter pontium," and assume the power of deciding where and when the public necessity demands a bridge, what is a sufficient draw, or how much inconvenience to navigation will constitute a nuisance.

The complainants in these several bills, in order to show jurisdiction in the court, have stated themselves to be citizens of the state of New York. Their right to a remedy in the courts of the United States is not asserted, on account of the subject matter of the controversy, nor do they allege any peculiar jurisdiction as given to us by any act of congress; but rest upon their personal right as citizens of another state to sue in this tribunal. It is very apparent, also, that the complainants, if not introduced as mere John Does or nominal parties (while those really contending are used as witnesses) are at least volunteers in the controversy, "post litem motam," who have bought the right to an expected injury for the luxury of the litigation. Without stopping to laud this exhibition of public spirit by citizens of a neighboring state, it is plain by their own showing, that they can demand no other remedy from this court than would be administered by the tribunals of the state of New Jersey in a suit between her own citizens. A citizen of New York who purchases wharves in Newark or owns a vessel navigating to that port has no greater right than the citizen of New Jersey. A court of chancery in New Jersey would not interfere with the course of public improvements authorized by the state, at the instance of a wharf owner on the suggestion that a change in the location of a bridge would cause a depreciation in the value of his property. This is not a result, for which (if the court can give any remedy at all,) it will interfere by injunction. The court has no power to arrest the course of public improvements, on account of their effects upon the value of property, appreciating it in one place and depreciating it in another. If special damage occurs to an individual, the law gives him a remedy. But he cannot recover either in a court of law or equity, special damage as for a common nuisance, if the erection complained of be not a nuisance. A bridge authorized by the state of New Jersey cannot be treated as a nuisance under the laws of New Jersey. That the police power of a state includes the regulation of highways and bridges within its boundaries, has never been questioned. If the legislature have declared that bridges erected with draws of certain dimensions will not so impede the commerce of the river, as to be injurious or become a public nuisance, where can the courts of New Jersey find any authority for overruling, reversing or nullifying legislative acts on a subject matter over which it has exclusive jurisdiction? Admitting, for the sake of argument, that congress, in the exercise of the commercial power, may regulate the height of bridges on a public river in a state below a port of entry, or may forbid their erection altogether, they have never yet assumed the exercise of such a power, nor have they by any legislative act conferred this power on the courts. The bridges will not be nuisances by the law of New Jersey. The United States has no common law offences, and has passed no statute declaring such an erection to be a nuisance. If so, a court cannot interfere by arbitrary decree either to restrain the erection of a bridge or to define its form and proportions. It is plain that these are subjects of legislative not judicial discretion. It is a power which has always heretofore been exercised by state legislatures over rivers wholly within their jurisdiction, and where the rights of citizens of other states to navigate the river are not injured, for the sake of some special benefit to the citizens of the state exercising the power.

But it has been contended, on the authority of a dictum of my own, in Devoe v. Penrose Ferry Bridge Co. [Case No. 3,845], "that the supreme court have decided in the case of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 579, that although the courts of the United States cannot punish by indictment the erection of a nuisance on our public rivers, erected by authority of a state, yet that as courts of chancery they may interfere at the instance of an individual or corporation who are likely to suffer some special injury, and prohibit by injunction the erection of nuisances to the navigation of the great navigable rivers leading to the ports of entry within a state." It is true that this doctrine was enunciated as a corollary from the Wheeling Bridge Case, on a motion for an interlocutory injunction against a bridge over a stream wholly within the territory and jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. On such motions I have always refused to hear and definitely decide the great points of a case. If there be a prima facie or even doubtful case shown, it is the interest of both parties that the interlocutory injunction should issue, and that the defendants should not expend large sums in erections which may possibly be treated hereafter by the court as nuisances. In the cases now before us, the same course was pursued; but after the full argument of this question on final hearing, and a most careful consideration of it, I feel bound to acknowledge that the dictum I have just quoted from the report of the Case of the Penrose Ferry Bridge Company is not supported by the decisions of the supreme court in the Wheeling Bridge Case. It is true that such an inference might be drawn from a hasty or superficial examination of the opinion of the court as delivered in that case. But the point now to be considered, was not in that case, and could not, therefore, have been decided. No judge in vindicating the judgment of the court, can deliver maxims of universal application, in every sentence, or oracles which may be read in two ways, one applicable to the case before him, and the other not. To sever the arguments of a judge from the facts of the case to which he refers, will often lead to very erroneous conclusions. The fact that Pittsburg has been made a port of entry may have been mentioned as an additional or cumulative reason why Virginia should not be allowed to license a nuisance on the Ohio, below that city. But the question whether the power to regulate bridges over navigable rivers wholly within the bounds of a state, could be exercised by it below a port of entry, and whether the establishment of such a port did ipso facto divest the state of such a power was not in that case, and therefore not decided. This assertion will be fully vindicated by a careful examination of the record in that case.

1. It must be noted as a circumstance of that case, that although the state of Pennsylvania in her corporate capacity was complainant, and "propter dignitatem" entitled to sue in the supreme court of the United States; yet, that when the bill was filed, the same complaint might have been sustained in the circuit court of the United States, or the bridge might have been prostrated as a nuisance by indictment in the proper state court of Virginia. The bill charged that the bridge proposed to be erected was in utter disregard of the license granted by its charter, which carefully forbid the least interference with the navigation of the Ohio. On the facts charged and proved, a court of chancery of Virginia, would have been bound to enjoin the erection of so palpable a nuisance to the navigation. The case therefore presented every fact necessary to give the court jurisdiction—a party having a right to sue in the court—a nuisance proposed to be erected without the sanction either of Virginia or the United States, and great special damage to the plaintiff.

2. During the pendency of this suit, the legislature of Virginia saw proper to come to the assistance of their corporation, in the unequal contest, and at its suggestion enacted that the bridge proposed to be built contrary to the license granted to the corporation, was according to it, and not therefore to be considered as a nuisance by the laws of Virginia—notwithstanding that the bridge was without a draw and for many days in the year would wholly obstruct the passage of steamboats.

3. This legislation of Virginia being pleaded as a bar to further action of the court in the case, necessarily raised these questions. Could Virginia license or authorize a nuisance on a public river, which rose in Pennsylvania, and passed along the border of Virginia, and which by compact between the states was declared to be "free and common to all the citizens of the United States?" If Virginia could authorize any obstruction at all to the channel navigation, she could stop it altogether, and divert the whole commerce of that great river from the state of Pennsylvania, and compel it to seek its outlet by the railroads and other public improvements of Virginia. If she had the sovereign right over this boundary river claimed by her, there could be no measure to her power. She would have the same right to stop its navigation altogether, as to stop it ten days in a year. If the plea was admitted, Virginia could make Wheeling the head of navigation on the Ohio, and Kentucky might do the same at Louisville, having the same right over the whole river which Virginia can claim. This plea therefore presented not only a great question of international law, but whether rights secured to the people of the United States, by compact made before the constitution, were held at the mercy or caprice of every or any of the states, to which the river was a boundary. The decision of the court denied this right. The plea being insufficient as a defense, of course the complainant was entitled to a decree prostrating the bridge, which had been erected pendente lite. But to mitigate the apparent hardship of such a decree, if executed unconditionally, the court in the exercise of a merciful discretion, granted a stay of execution on condition that the bridge should be raised to a certain height or have a draw put in it which would permit boats to pass at all stages of the navigation. From this modification of the decree no inference can be drawn, that the courts of the United States claim authority to regulate bridges below ports of entry, and treat all state legislation in such cases as unconstitutional and void.

It is abundantly evident from this statement, that the supreme court, in denying the right of Virginia to exercise this absolute control, over the Ohio river, and in deciding that as a riparian proprietor she was not entitled, either by the compact or by constitutional law, to obstruct the commerce of a supra-riparian state, had before them questions not involved in these cases and which cannot affect their decision. The Passaic river, though navigable for a few miles within the state of New Jersey, and therefore a public river, belongs wholly to that state; it is no highway to other states, no commerce passes thereon from states below the bridge to states above. Being the property of the state, and no other state having any title to interfere with her absolute dominion, she alone can regulate the harbors, wharves, ferries, or bridges, in or over it. Congress has the exclusive power to regulate commerce, but that has never been construed to include the means by which commerce is carried on within a state. Canals, turnpikes, bridges and railroads are as necessary to the commerce between and through the several states, as rivers. Yet congress has never pretended to regulate them. When a city is made a port of entry, congress does not thereby assume to regulate its harbor, or detract from the sovereign rights before exercised by each state over her own public rivers. Congress may establish post offices and post roads; but this does not affect or control the absolute power of a state over its highways and bridges. If a state does not desire the accommodation of mails at certain places, and will not make roads and bridges on which to transport them, congress cannot compel it to do so, or require it to receive favors by compulsion. Constituting a town or city a port of entry, is an act for the convenience and benefit of such place, and its commerce; but for the sake of this benefit the constitution does not require the state to surrender her control over the harbor, or the highways leading to it, either by land or water, provided all citizens of the United States enjoy the same privileges which are enjoyed by her own.

Whether a bridge over the Passaic will injuriously affect the harbor of Newark, is a question which the people of New Jersey can best determine, and have a right to determine for themselves. If the bridges be an inconvenience to sloops and schooners navigating their port, it is no more so to others than to them. I see no reason why the state of New Jersey, in the exercise of her absolute sovereignty over the river, may not stop it up altogether, and establish the harbor and wharves of Newark at the mouth of the river. It would affect the rights of no other state. It would still be a port of entry, if congress chose to continue it so. Such action would not be in conflict with any power vested in congress. A state may, in the exercise of its reserved powers, incidentally affect subjects entrusted to congress without any necessary collision. All railroads, canals, harbors or bridges necessarily affect the commerce not only within a state, but between the states. Congress, by conferring the privilege of a port of entry upon a town or city, does not come in conflict with the police power of a state exercised in bridging her own rivers below such port. If the power to make a town a port of entry includes the right to regulate the means by which its commerce is carried on, why does it not extend to its turnpikes, railroads and canals, to land as well as water? Assuming the right (which I neither affirm or deny) of congress to regulate bridges over navigable rivers below ports of entry, yet not having done so, the courts cannot assume to themselves such a power. There is no act of congress or rule of law which courts could apply to such a case. It is possible that courts might exercise this discretionary power as judiciously as a legislative body, yet the praise of being "a good judge" could hardly be given to one who would endeavor to "enlarge his jurisdiction" by the assumption, or rather usurpation, of such an undefined and discretionary power. The police power to make bridges over the public rivers is as absolutely and exclusively vested in a state as the commercial power is in congress; and no question can arise as to which is bound to give way, when exercised over the same subject matter, till a case of actual collision occurs. This is all that was decided in the case of Wilson v. Blackbird Creek, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 257. That case has been the subject of much comment, and some misconstruction. It was never intended as a retraction or modification of any thing decided in Gibbons v. Ogden [9 Wheat. (22 U. S.) 1], or to deny the exclusive power of congress to regulate commerce. Nor does the Wheeling Bridge Case at all conflict with either. The case of Wilson v. Blackbird Creek [supra], governs this—while it has nothing in common with that of the Wheeling bridge.

The view taken by the court of this point dispenses with the necessity of an expression of opinion on the questions on which so much testimony has been accumulated, what is the proper width of draws on bridges over the Passaic? How far the public necessity requires them? What is the comparative value of the commerce passing over or under them? What the amount of inconvenience such draws may be to the navigation, and whether it is for the public interest that this should be encountered rather than the greater one consequent on the want of such bridges? and finally, the comparative merits of curved and straight lines in the construction of railroads. These questions have all been ruled by the legislature of New Jersey, having (as we believe) the sole jurisdiction in the matter. They have used their discretion in a matter properly submitted to them, and this court has neither the power to decide, nor the disposition to say, that it has been injudiciously exercised.

II. The second great question in this case is not affected by the conditions of the first. The court has undoubted jurisdiction to administer the relief here sought, if the complainants have shown themselves entitled to it. It is charged that the corporation called the "Proprietors of the Bridges over the Rivers Passaic and Hackensack" have a right to bridge these rivers "exclusive of all other persons whatsoever, in such manner as that no other bridge can be erected within said limits until the expiration of 99 years from the date of said original act (1790), without the consent of said proprietors." It is contended, also, that a majority of the stockholders cannot by law surrender or release this exclusive privilege or franchise, and that any law assuming to take away or authorizing any invasion of such franchise, impairs the obligation of the original and fundamental contract with and between the stockholders, and is therefore unconstitutional and void; and as a consequence, this court having jurisdiction of the parties, is bound to protect their franchise from invasion, on the complaint of any individual stockholder.

In order to a clear understanding of this point, it will be necessary to give a brief, but, nevertheless, a somewhat tedious history of the legislative and other transactions connected with it. Previous to the year 1790, the Passaic and Hackensack rivers had been crossed by means of ferries only. In that year the legislature of New Jersey passed an act "for building bridges over the Passaic, Hackensack," &c. As this act is somewhat anomalous in its provisions, and subject to misconstruction, it will be necessary to notice some of its provisions. The first section nominates certain commissioners, "who are authorized to put in execution the several services intended by this act." They are required to view the ground from Newark to Powles Hook, and fix upon the most suitable and convenient site for a bridge, and are authorized to erect, or cause to be erected, a bridge over each of these rivers. The bridges must have a draw of 24 feet, lamps, &c. After having agreed upon the sites of the bridges, they are required to lay out the roads to them. If the bridge be fixed at the ferry, the commissioners were to pay for the ferry rights; they were authorized also, at their discretion, to contract and agree with any person or persons who would undertake to build such bridges for the tolls allowed by the act; and for so many years, and upon such conditions as, in the discretion of the commissioners, should seem expedient. This agreement must be reduced to writing, signed and sealed by the parties thereto, and recorded, "and to be binding on the parties contracting as well as the state of New Jersey, and as effectual as if the same and every part, covenant and condition thereof had been particularly and expressly set forth and enacted in this law." The 15th section enacts "that it shall not be lawful for any person whatsoever, to erect or cause to be erected any other bridge or bridges over or across the said river Passaic, between its mouth and second river, &c." In February, 1793, these commissioners entered into a contract, by indenture, with some thirty other gentlemen, reciting their powers under the above act. By this deed they "demised, granted, and to farm let" the said bridges to be erected "as hereinafter declared, over said rivers, together with all tolls appertaining thereto." "To have and to hold the said bridges, with their respective tolls and profits, hereinbefore mentioned, &c., for a term of 97 years. In 1794 the stockholders in this company are constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of the "Proprietors of the Bridges over the Rivers Passaic and Hackensack." In 1832, "the act to incorporate the New Jersey Railroad Company" was passed. As the proprietors of the bridges had claimed the sole right to build bridges over the Passaic and Hackensack on the proposed route of the railroad, the legislature, with a laudable regard for private rights, authorized the railroad company to purchase turnpike roads and bridges on the route, or any and all the shares of the capital stock of such roads and bridges. The stockholders were to be paid the par value of their stock, or have railroad stock to the same amount. As the stockholders in the bridge company were probably the persons most interested in obtaining the railroad charter, the act did not make it compulsory on the stockholders to accept the value of their stock in money, or railroad stock, but left it to the two corporations to arrange the matter among themselves. No difficulty appears to have been apprehended, as the railroad was authorized to purchase the stock, and thereby control the other corporations, and more especially as the wealthy and respectable men who owned the stock of the first were those most deeply interested in the last. The act, while it contemplated that the railroad corporation should have the control of both the turnpikes and bridges, did not permit the smaller corporations to be absorbed or annihilated by the greater, but ordained that the roads and bridges should be preserved and governed by the provisions of their respective charters. Accordingly, in November, 1832, the railroad corporation entered into an agreement with the "proprietors of the bridges," reciting the authority conferred on the railroad, and that the parties had agreed upon the terms of sale of the stock of the bridge company; and stipulating that the railroad pay to the stockholders of the bridge company $150 for every share of their stock. It provided that the stockholders electing to receive payment for their stock according to this agreement, should show their assent before the first of January following, and might elect to receive money or railroad stock to same amount, reserving their "franchise privileges" as before held, and reserving also "all grants or privileges theretofore made by way of commutation." The reservations were made to meet the exigency of the proviso to the 10th section of the act of incorporation of the railroad company —"That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair any reversionary interest or vested rights which the state or any incorporated company or individual may possess in virtue of an act for building bridges, &c., passed in 1790," &c. By this agreement the railroad is permitted either to use the old bridge or erect another along side, but so as not to obstruct, hinder, or interrupt the travel over the old bridge. In pursuance of their act of incorporation and of their agreement, the railroad bought some 930 of the 1,000 shares into which the stock of the "proprietors of the bridges," &c., was divided, at the price of $150 for each share of $100. They erected a railroad bridge at the end of Centre street, which has been used for upwards of twenty years. As a new bridge is now found necessary, and as the position of the old one requires sharp curves of the railroad through the streets of the city, which are not only inconvenient but dangerous, a supplement to the act incorporating the railroad was passed on the 3d of April, 1855, authorizing the construction of the bridge at Commercial Dock, and the removal of the old one at Centre street, and of the railroad track connected therewith. It requires the new bridge to have two draws, each at least 65 feet wide, on which a light must be kept at night, and a careful person to open the draws for free passage of vessels, with the same provision as to reversionary interests as is found in the 10th section of the original act. It requires also the consent of the "proprietors of bridges," &c., in writing, under the corporate seal, and that the giving of such consent shall not, except as to the said bridge so consented to, be construed, held, or deemed in any manner to strengthen or impair any rights or privileges which the said "proprietors may possess."

It is not worth while, for the purposes of this case, to inquire whether the "proprietors of the bridges," &c., can claim any franchise of greater extent than that contained and accurately defined in their written agreement with the commissioners. It clearly does not confer on them a right to build any other bridges than the two described and specified, or take tolls therefrom. They cannot be said therefore to have a monopoly for building of bridges within the boundaries specified in the act. The instrument called a lease or agreement defines the rights and the extent of the franchise granted to the company; and it may well be doubted whether the provisions of the 15th section, which are wholly omitted from their charter, can be invoked as any part of their franchise. Nevertheless, as the legislature of New Jersey seem to have treated this section as in the nature of a covenant by the state not to permit other bridges to be erected which might injure the value of the franchise conferred on the "proprietors" by the commissioners without the consent of the corporation, we shall treat it as such—at best it is no more. If the proprietors had the sole right to build bridges and take tolls, their whole franchise might have been condemned by the legislature under their right of eminent domain. A title to a franchise is of no higher quality than a title to land. Such indiscreet contracts by a legislature cannot paralyze the arm of government and stop the progress of improvement for a century. The legislature without attempting to define their rights or compelling them to renounce them for a proper consideration have merely suggested a very easy mode of getting over the difficulty. The railroad is authorized to purchase out the whole stock and franchise of the bridge company, by paying the full value thereof. Those stockholders who did not choose to accept such terms know well the purpose and object of this transaction was to give to the railroad corporation the control of this claim to a monopoly, whatever might be its validity or extent, without a destruction of the other corporate privileges and faculties. An acquiescence for more than twenty years in the exercise of this right by the railroad will hardly leave room to question it now, even if a majority of the stockholders should now be disposed to do so. But the parties now objecting, do not seem absolutely to deny the right of the railroad company to have a bridge over the Passaic somewhere, provided it be built so as to suit the private interest of certain wharf owners. Their franchise to receive tolls and pass free on their own bridge will not be impaired by the change. Nor is there any evidence that the value of the bridge stock will be in any manner affected thereby. When the legislature have decided that the public interests require the change of location of the track of a railroad, or a bridge connected with it, a court cannot be called on to enjoin such a change because it will cause a depreciation of property adjoining it, nor can members of the bridge corporation in this case call for the intervention of the court to protect them against the acts of the majority of the corporators, unless for some abuse of power, to the injury of the corporate privileges or property of the minority. It is no part of the corporate franchise of the proprietors, &c., that any of its stockholders who may chance to be wharf owners, shall wield their corporate privileges to enhance the value of their wharves. This change of the position of the railroad bridge is authorized by law. It has the consent of the "proprietors," given in the manner pointed out by law, under the seal of the corporation. In giving this assent the corporation was acting within the scope of its powers, and in a case where the will of the majority must necessarily govern, when lawfully expressed. This is not a case where a majority of the stockholders are employing the common fund for the accomplishment of a purpose not within the scope of the institution. The majority must decide what is proper compensation for any real or supposed injury to their franchise of toll, which may result from the change of position of this railroad bridge. If it be part of their franchise to license other bridges, such a franchise can only be exercised by the corporation under their common seal and at the will of a majority. But it is plain that another bridge erected without legislative authority might have been treated as a nuisance, for whatever may have been considered the nature of the supposed monopoly, neither the law, nor their own lease, authorized them to build another bridge, or to give a valid license to others. The legislature admit that they are bound by contract not to authorize another bridge; but on the principle of "volenti non fit injuria" they have directed the railroad to obtain the consent of the corporation with whom this contract was made; whether this covenant was made with them originally as partners or corporators, can make no difference in the case. In neither case can a single individual by his negative vote control the majority of the body, or compel it to give or refuse its consent as may suit the interest of an individual or a minority. This supposed franchise of forbidding the legislature from licensing a bridge over these rivers seems to have been a puzzle for the learned lawyers of the state for half a century past; and, as it is claimed by a large number of highly respectable, influential and wealthy men, it has been treated with great reverence by the legislature, and the more so, as the lawyers could not agree in defining what it was. Some have fancied it an incorporeal hereditament in each stockholder, which cannot be affected by the act of another, having the quality of a polypus; and though divided into one thousand parts or pieces, each one became a unit, or distinct whole; others have treated it as a right of common, in which "quilibet totum habet et nihil habet," an indivisible unit of which, if a man has not the whole, he has nothing—and consequently a majority cannot dispose of it. But we do not think it necessary to search the lumber garret of obsolete law, in order to give a show of profound legal learning to an absurd conclusion. The provisos in the different acts of legislature, which have been invoked as conferring this power of obstruction on each one of one thousand partners or stockholders, make no new grant of power or franchise, and clearly refer to other valuable privileges, without being open to such misconstruction. Having, then, such evidence of the consent of the corporation as is required by law, we cannot say it is insufficient. The allegations in the bill, of irregularity or fraud in the election of the officers of the corporation, and obtaining the act giving such consent, even if sufficiently pleaded, have not been proved, and require no further notice. I am of opinion, therefore, on this point of the case, that the complainants have shown no legal right as stockholders of the corporation of "proprietors," &c., to interfere and overrule the act of the corporation. Nor have they alleged or shown such an improper use of the common property of the corporation, or such deviation from its original purpose, or abuse of the trusts confided to it, as will entitle them to the interference of a court of equity.

The third and last question for consideration, is, whether the railroad company has, by any valid contract, covenanted or agreed with the complainant, or those under whom they claim as assignees, that the railroad bridge over the Passaic shall be forever fixed at Centre street, so that the company cannot, even with consent of the legislature, and for their own and the public benefit, change the location of the bridge, shorten their road, and avoid difficult and dangerous curves. As we have already seen, the question of the expediency or necessity for this change of route on the road, is one not submitted to the judgment or discretion of the court. If the legislature has authorized it, the railroad have a right to proceed, unless bound by contract to maintain their bridge where it at present stands. The answer denies the existence of any such contract. Assuming that a contract which is to have the effect of forever restraining the improvement of this road at this point can be proved by parol, those who aver it, must be held to clear, consistent, and undoubted evidence, as to the parties, the consideration and the precise terms of such contract. Have we such proof?

Without wishing to make any remarks which may appear offensive to any of the highly respectable witnesses who have given such contradictory accounts of the transaction, it is too plain to be overlooked, that much of this conflict arises from the examination of persons as witnesses who are the real parties in interest. The transfer made post litem motam in order to constitute the complainant a party to the suit, is a veil too transparent to conceal the real parties to the litigation. But waiving this objection to the testimony of certain witnesses, as also any invidious comparison of the credibility of very respectable men, I must say that there is not such clear evidence of a contract, its consideration, its parties or its terms, as would justify a court in decreeing its specific execution. It appears that originally the railroad company had purchased the Commercial Dock property, with the view of erecting their bridge there. As the town of Newark was then built, the railroad would pass along its lower boundary. At this time railroads were an untried experiment. It was a popular notion that it would be of great advantage to a town or city to have a railroad pass through its most frequented streets, that it would advance the value of property on the streets through which it passed, and increase their commerce; and that curves in a railroad were preferable to straight lines, being much more graceful and no less useful. From the prevalence of these notions, the popular feeling became much excited; and the more so, that certain individuals of wealth and influence, who owned wharves on the river, had shrewdly discovered that it would add considerably to the value of their property, if the railroad instead of crossing below it, could be bent round behind it, and crossing above, create an obstruction to the navigation of the river above their wharves. Public meetings were held, exhorting, entreating, and advising the railroad directors.—Suits were brought by lotholders in the name of the attorney general, threatening them with injunctions. Some wanted one thing, some another, and the result is perhaps best described in the graphic language of one of the witnesses: "I can only say, that according to my recollection now, there was much confusion and conflict of wishes among all the parties, and I don't know how many parties I could count up. I know there were sharp speeches and feelings exhibited, as much so as upon any thing I ever saw in this town, and to my view at the present moment, they were like two dogs that had been quarreling, until they got tired and left off, and there was a sort of a common consent to abandon the conflict, and not to keep the progress of the work from going on, by a general assent of making the bridge, where it is now. The location of the bridge was the result, but that there was any contract or agreement that was to be final and conclusive and not to be revoked, I know no such arrangement as that. There was a cessation of the conflict and the work went on." The directors, desirous of conciliating the people of Newark, and expediting the completion of their road, yielded to the pressure, and passed the following resolution, which had the effect of allaying the excitement. It is dated on the 24th of September, 1834, and is as follows: "Whereas, considerable diversity of opinion has prevailed among the citizens of Newark relative to the location of the railroad bridge across the Passaic river, and the location mentioned in the annexed resolution having been agreed upon as a mutual accommodation of conflicting interests, and with a view to the settlement of all matters of controversy; now, therefore, be it resolved, unanimously, that the railroad bridge be located across the Passaic river at the north end of the dock owned by Moses Dodd, with a draw of forty-five feet in width; provided that the right of way from the westerly termination of said bridge to the entrance of the avenue on Market street can be obtained on reasonable terms; and provided also, that the owners of property on the above mentioned part of the route of the railroad shall agree that the company may use any moving power thereon which they shall deem proper." And on the 26th of December, the following resolution was passed: "Whereas, it is desirable that the bridge across the Passaic river be definitely located, and whereas further delay, in order that all difficulties may be removed, is not deemed expedient, therefore, resolved, that the bridge across the Passaic river be, and the same is, hereby definitely located, immediately north of the dock lately owned by Moses Dodd." These resolutions of the board, for the purpose of proposing an accommodation of conflicting interests and putting an end to the controversy, seem to have brought the dispute to a close, and received general acquiescence. But these documents exhibit no contract, binding the corporation never to change the location of the road and bridge under any change of circumstances. They accordingly retained the Commercial Dock property, which was originally purchased for the purpose of a bridge. This proposition and resolution of the board was for the sake of peace. Those without had conflicting interests—they were bound to no conditions, they gave no consideration, except "ceasing to quarrel when they got tired." Even the parties who had brought suits to frighten the directors where not bound to withdraw them. The directors exercised their own discretion under the circumstances. But time, which changes all things, has produced a great change in the circumstances.—Newark has become a great city. Locomotives moving at a velocity of forty miles an hour, which were then considered but the dream of the projectors, are now established facts. Curves have given way to straight lines, and the notion that railroad cars darting through the most frequented streets of a city are neither a convenience nor a benefit, has become obsolete. The conflicting interests which inexperience and ignorance had originally produced, need no longer to be propitiated for the sake of peace. The people of Newark no longer object to having the bridge located where it was originally intended to place it, and the people of New Jersey, by their legislature, have determined that it would be beneficial to the public to have the old bridge, with its narrow and troublesome draws, taken away, a new one erected below with larger and better draws, and that the railroad should pass through the city by the shortest route—by a straight line, and not with short curves. The complainants have shown no contract made by themselves with the railroad company, nor have they shown any covenant running with the land on which they as assignees are entitled to a remedy at law, or relief in equity.

Having thus disposed of the three great points so ably discussed by the learned counsel, the minor issues of fact or law have become immaterial, and need no further notice.

Let a decree be entered in each of these cases dismissing the bill, with costs.

[These cases were taken on appeal to the supreme court, where, the court being equally divided, the judgment of the circuit court was in consequence affirmed. See 24 How. (65 U. S.) Append. 1.]

MILTENBERGER et al. v. PHILLIPS.

[2 Woods, 115.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEES — SUIT TO RECOVER COUNSEL FEES PAID—LIMITATION.

A suit brought by the assignees in bankruptcy of a bank, to recover money paid as counsel fees by persons acting without authority, as commissioners for the liquidation of the bank under the state law, is barred unless brought within two years from the time the cause of action therefor accrued in favor of the assignees.

[Cited in Walker v. Towner, Case No. 17,089.]

[This was a suit by Miltenberger and Norton against Edward Phillips.]

Heard upon peremptory exception to the plaintiff's petition.

Thomas Hunton, for plaintiffs.

Edward Phillips, in pro. per.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The petition was filed on the 2d of April, 1875, and alleges that on the 2d of June, 1871, the plaintiffs were appointed assignees in bankruptcy of the Bank of Louisiana, and were thereby entitled to possess and administer all the assets which were of the bank on the date of the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, which was on the 20th of May, 1869. The petition further alleges that on and before the 20th of April, 1870, the defendant received, as counsel fees, various sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to a large sum, which were assets of the bank, and were paid to him by certain persons pretending to act as commissioners of the bank, under authority of a court of the state of Louisiana, but in fact without any authority whatever. The purpose of the suit is to recover back the sums so paid to Phillips, as having been illegally paid. The defendant Phillips excepts peremptorily to the petition, among other grounds, because the action is barred by the two years limitation provided in section 5057, Revised Code, which declares that "no suit, either at law or in equity, shall be maintainable in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest touching any property or rights of property transferable to, or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee." The money sued for was received by the defendant before the assignees were appointed, and more than two years transpired between this appointment and the bringing of this action. Therefore, if the section just quoted applies to cases like this, the action is barred. In my judgment it does apply, not only in terms but in spirit. In a recent case decided by the supreme court of the United States, Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 342, it was held that the section under consideration was "a statute of limitation. It is precisely like other statutes of limitation, and applies to all judicial contests between the assignees and other persons touching the property or rights of property transferable to or vested in the assignee where the interests are adverse, and have so existed for more than two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against the assignee." This authority, it seems to me, is decisive of this case. See, also, Norton v. De la Villebeauve [Case No. 10,350]. This action is barred, and cannot be maintained, and the exception setting up the bar is sustained. It is unnecessary to notice the other grounds of exception.

District Court, D. Oregon. 1875.

BANKRUPTCY — CREDITORS NOT ON SCHEDULE — ELECTION OF ASSIGNEE—POSTPONEMENT.

At the first meeting of creditors in the case of voluntary bankrupt, proofs of certain claims against the estate were presented, but the names of the alleged creditors did not appear on the bankrupt's schedule. Held, that the circumstance was sufficient to raise a doubt as to the validity of such claims within the meaning of section 5083 of the Revised Statutes, and ordered that the proofs be postponed until after the election of an assignee.

In bankruptcy.

M. W. Fecheimer, for the motion.

Joseph Simon, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. On June 19, 1875, Elijah Milwain was adjudged a bankrupt in this court, upon his own petition. At the first meeting of creditors, on July 6, the creditors Hotaling & Co., and Goldsmith and Loewenberg, moved to postpone the proofs of the claims of Greene, Carleton and Keith, whereupon the question, "Shall this motion be allowed?" was certified by the register to the judge for decision. As appears from the statement of the register, the grounds of the motion are that the names of these alleged creditors do not appear on the bankrupt's schedule, and their alleged claims appear to be based upon running accounts, the items of which are not stated. Section 5085 of the Revised Statutes provides: that "when a claim is presented for proof before the election of the assignee, and the judge or register entertains doubts of its validity or of the right of the creditor to prove it, and is of opinion that such validity or right ought to be investigated by the assignee, he may postpone the proof of the claim until the assignee is chosen."

The claim of Keith is for merchandise sold and delivered at different times specified, between May 6, 1871, and June 15, 1875, amounting to nine hundred and ninety-seven dollars and twenty-four cents, upon which the credits amount to nine hundred and twenty-eight dollars and fifty-two cents, leaving a balance in favor of Keith of sixty-eight dollars and seventy-two cents. Carleton's claim is for merchandise sold and delivered between April 27 and September 20, 1874, amounting to two hundred and twenty-eight dollars, with a credit of one hundred and sixty-four dollars and fifty-six cents, leaving a balance of sixty-three dollars and forty-two cents. Greene's claim is stated to be for merchandise and money loaned between November 1, 1872, and June 15, 1875, amounting to one thousand one hundred and ninety-eight dollars and fifty-eight cents, with a credit of two hundred and fifty-three dollars and seven cents, leaving a balance of nine hundred and forty-five dollars and fifty-one cents.

Under these circumstances I think there is good reason to doubt the validity of these claims. Section 5015 of the Revised Statutes requires the bankrupt to annex to his petition a schedule of his debts, containing the names of all his creditors and the nature of their demands, which schedule must be verified by his oath. The schedule in this case is silent as to these alleged creditors or their claims. In effect the bankrupt has thereby declared that he owes them nothing. It was his interest to speak the truth in the premises, for otherwise he might be denied his discharge, besides being liable criminally. True, he may have omitted these names from the schedule by mistake, and that may hereafter be shown. But there is no presumption that the schedule is incorrect in this particular, but the contrary.

In opposition to the oath of the bankrupt is the oath of each of these alleged creditors to their claims. They swear that their debts are valid and subsisting demands against the estate of the bankrupt. So far it is oath against oath, and that itself is sufficient to raise the doubt contemplated by the statute. But these creditors are interested witnesses. Their interest is to establish their claims. But the interest of the bankrupt in the matter, so far as he has any, is on the side of the truth. The affidavit of the bankrupt, and any one of these creditors, is of equal weight as evidence, except so far as the circumstances under which they testify tend to affect their credibility. As has been said, the affidavit of Milwain is that of a disinterested party, at least, while those in support of these claims are made by interested parties.

Again, it is a material circumstance to be considered in this connection, that these claims are based upon open accounts, running through some years, which are not stated in items. Keith's claim, it is true, is stated in particulars, so far as the date of each article is concerned, but the nature of the article itself is not mentioned or specified otherwise than as "merchandise." But that is no specification of the article sold. For all the information conveyed by that word, the article might as well have been styled "sundries." But in the other two claims, there is neither a specification of the nature of the articles sold nor the dates of their delivery.

Notwithstanding these objections, these claims may be valid and entitled to be proved. But the circumstances being sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt as to their validity, the proofs may be postponed until an assignee has had an opportunity to examine them.

MILWARD v. McSAUL

[8 Betts, D. C. MS. 71.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 24, 1846.

COURTS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—UNITED STATES CONSUL AT FOREIGN PORT.

[A federal district court has no jurisdiction under Const. U. S. art. 2, § 2, or Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 9 (1 Stat. 76), or otherwise, merely because one party is a United States consul at a foreign port.]

[This was an action on the case by Joseph M. Milward against Enos McSaul, Jr., for false imprisonment. Heard on demurrer to the declaration.]

W. C. Barrett, for plaintiff.
F. R. Sherman, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. This action is prosecuted against the defendant for a false imprisonment and other injuries committed by him, at Laguina, he then being consul of the United States at that port. The special causes of demurrer assigned are that the declaration sets forth no cause showing that the defendant had jurisdiction as consul of the subject matter which is made the gravamen of the action and that accordingly case cannot be maintained, whatever wrong the plaintiff may have sustained by means of his arrest and imprisonment. The points discussed in the written argument have relation to the form of action brought, and the necessity of averring facts showing the subject matter within the jurisdiction of the defendant. But there is a paramount difficulty in the case, which is raised by the general demurrer and must be disposed of by the court, although it has not been discussed by the counsel. This is a common law action brought in the district court upon the assumption that Const. U. S. art. 2, § 2, declaring that the judicial powers of the United States, shall extend to "all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls," and section 9 of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, enacting that the United States district courts shall have jurisdiction, exclusively of the courts of the several states, of all suits against consuls, &c., &c., apply as well to persons holding the appointment of consuls under the authority of the United States as to consuls of foreign governments, resident within the United States. Most manifestly this is not so. A consul has no official character in his own country. He is no more than a private citizen in view of the laws of his own government, and is clothed with a privilege only in respect to the foreign nations where he represents his government and exercises his consular functions. This must be clearly so on the principles which originate and guaranty his privilege. 1 Kent, Comm. 41–45; 3 Story, Const. Law, 1652–1655. It results necessarily from the fact that he acquires no official character within the jurisdiction of our laws. That character is communicated to him on his recognition by the foreign government to which he is delegated and continues only with the exercise of his functions there.

Without considering the point raised as to the frame of the pleadings, or other special questions presented by the arguments, I am bound to declare that this court has no jurisdiction in a personal action at common law, sued against a consul of the United States. Judgment must be rendered, accordingly, for the defendant on the demurrer.

Case No. 9,625.

The MILWAUKEE.

[2 Biss. 509;[1] 4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 147.]

District Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April, 1871.

COLLISION—SPEED—FOG WHISTLE.

1. Seven or eight miles an hour is not a proper rate of speed for a steamboat having barges in tow, at a dangerous point on the Mississippi river.

2. Steamboats on the Mississippi river are in fault for neglecting the rule for the government of pilots, which requires steamboats running in a fog to sound the steam whistle at intervals not exceeding two minutes.

This was a libel by the Security Insurance Company, insurer, against the steamboats Milwaukee and Imperial, to recover the value of 5,521 bushels of wheat, shipped at St. Paul, Minn., by John Robson on barges in tow of the steamer Imperial, and lost by collision with the steamer Milwaukee. The wheat was to be delivered in good order at the port of Dunleith, in the state of Illinois, "unavoidable dangers of the river and fire only excepted."

Emmons & Van Dyke, for libellants.
John W. & A. L. Cary, for respondents.

MILLER, District Judge. The Imperial, with her barges, was compelled to make a landing at Brownsville, about twelve miles below La Crosse, and remain there over night, on account of a fog. On the morning of the 13th of September they left that port and proceeded down the river for about two miles, to Coon slough, where the Minnesota shore makes a sharp projecting point, causing the river to cross to the Wisconsin shore. By reason of this bend the channel beyond the point cannot be seen until the point is passed. The pilot discovered a fog hanging over the point in the slough.

The steamboat Milwaukee was on a trip from Dubuque up to St. Paul. On the 13th of September, early in the morning, the weather being thick and foggy, the steamboat laid up near the elbow of Coon slough. About eight o'clock in the morning, the fog having cleared away somewhat, she proceeded on her voyage. For some distance there was some fog, then the river became comparatively clear of fog, and the pilot could see from half to three-quarters of a mile ahead, except when intercepted by an occasional bank of fog. And as the steamboat Milwaukee approached the bend in the river she discovered a bank of fog resting over the river, about 150 or 200 yards ahead; and at about the same time she discovered the steamboat Imperial with three barges in tow, emerging from the bank of fog, on her course down the river. The steamboat Milwaukee struck the starboard side of the starboard barge, the Robert C. Rodgers, causing the cargo of wheat to be lost in about eight feet of water.

The libel and answer both aver that their respective boats were running slowly and cautiously, on account of a fog hanging over the river. The fog was partially lifted where the sun reached it, but in the shade it still hung over the river. The evidence is, that both boats were running about seven or eight miles an hour, which I consider much too high a rate of speed in that state of the weather, and particularly at that difficult point of navigation.

Rule seven, for the regulation of pilots on rivers, requires the pilot of a steamer running in a fog, or thick weather, to sound his steam whistle at intervals not exceeding two minutes. It is apparent from the evidence that the Imperial had not sounded her whistle within several minutes before the collision. And it is certain that for some time before seeing the fog bank, the Milwaukee did not sound her whistle. If the required signals had been given, it is highly probable that the boats would have avoided the collision. Stopping their respective engines while running into each other was too late. I consider that both steamboats are in fault, for running at too high a rate of speed while the river was not clear of fog, and for not blowing their steam whistles every two minutes, as required by the rules.

Reference is made to a commissioner to ascertain the amounts to be decreed.

The MILWAUKEE.

[Brown, Adm. 313.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. June, 1871.

COLLISION — STEAMERS MEETING END ON—RULE OF SUPERVISING INSPECTORS—SPEED.

1. It is not enough that steamers navigating a narrow channel are in charge of officers whose general competency is unquestioned; they should have a pilot on board acquainted with the particular channel, and the want of such pilot is prima facie a fault.

2. The absence of a lookout is not material, if the officer of the deck is in full possession of all the information a lookout could give him in time to avoid a collision.

[Cited in The Kallisto, Case No. 7,600. Approved in The George Murray, 22 Fed. 122.]

3. Rule 1 of the supervising inspectors (1865) cannot be construed to authorize one steamer to dictate to another a departure from the rule prescribed by article 13. The rule, however, may be sustained as an authority for an ascending vessel to propose to a descending vessel to depart from the requirements of the article, and for the descending vessel to accept such proposition, and to make such a departure, when thus mutually agreed upon, binding and valid.

[Cited in U. S. v. Miller, 26 Fed. 97.]

4. It is incumbent upon the vessel claiming the protection of the rule and a departure from the statutory requirement to show: (1) That a proposition to depart from the statute was made by her by means of the signals prescribed by rule 1, and in due season for the other vessel to receive the proposition and act upon it with safety. (2) That the other vessel heard and understood the proposition thus made. (3) That the other vessel accepted the proposition.

[Approved in The Mary Shaw, 6 Fed. 923. Cited in The Garden City, 19 Fed. 533; The Frostburg, 25 Fed. 452. Approved in The Clarion, 27 Fed. 130. Cited in The John King, 1 C. C. A. 319, 49 Fed. 472.]

5. There is no general obligation upon vessels navigating rivers to keep to the right of the centre of the channel, and no such custom proven to exist upon St. Clair flats.

6. The testimony of the officers and crew of each vessel, as to the number of whistles blown upon their own vessel, is to be believed in preference to that of an equal number of witnesses upon the other vessel.

[Cited in The Cherokee, 15 Fed. 121.]

7. Risk of collision begins the moment the two vessels have approached so near that a collision might be brought about by any departure from the rules of navigation, and continues up to the moment when they have so far progressed that no such result could ensue. Under such circumstances, vessels should adopt such a rate of speed as to be at all times under ready and complete control until the risk is passed.

[Cited in The Grand Republic, 16 Fed. 429.]

8. A steamer descending a channel 850 feet wide at 14½ miles an hour, and another ascending at 8½ miles, both condemned for too great speed under the circumstances.

9. Whether the relative duty of the steamships to slacken speed under article 16 (when they are approaching each other so as to involve risk of collision), attaches the same moment the duty to port attaches under article 13 (when they are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision), considered and discussed.

[Cited in The Free State, Case No. 5,090; The Manitoba, Id. 9,029.]

The collision occurred at about 6 o'clock in the evening, on the 23d day of November, 1866, in the St. Clair river, just above the flats, and in what is known as the Southeast Reach of the South Pass of that river. The Lac la Belle was a steam propeller, and of large size, being about 1,200 tons burden, and was engaged in the Lake Superior trade; and at the time of the collision was bound down on a voyage from Lake Superior ports to Cleveland, in the state of Ohio. The Milwaukee was a side-wheel steamboat, of great strength and power, and was engaged in carrying freight and passengers across Lake Michigan, between the ports of Grand Haven, in the state of Michigan, and Milwaukee, in the state of Wisconsin. She had been to Detroit for repairs, and at the time of the collision was bound up on her return to Milwaukee. The Milwaukee hit the Lac la Belle on her port side, just abaft the fore-chains, at an angle of about 45 degrees from the stern, cutting her very nearly in two, and sinking her in about two minutes. The weather was fine, and it was a good night to see. This South Pass of the St. Clair river, above mentioned, is a crooked channel, although between the two bends constituting the "Reach" spoken of, and in which the collision occurred, the channel is nearly straight. The width of the channel, for some distance above and below the place of collision, varies from 450 feet above to 1,000 feet below, and within those limits there is always an ample depth of water for the largest vessels navigating the lakes. At the place of collision the navigable channel is about 850 feet wide, and the collision occurred within not to exceed 75 feet of the extreme northerly or American bank. The course of the river, from a considerable distance above the place of collision, is at first south southwest, and when it reaches a point a little over half a mile above the place of collision, it makes a sudden bend to the westward, which latter course it keeps until, at a point about half a mile below the place of collision, when it makes a sudden bend to about northwest. These two bends are from a mile to a mile and a quarter apart, and between them the channel is nearly straight, with a slight indentation or curve, however, in the north bank to the northward, at just about the point where the collision occurred. Approaching vessels in the day time, and their lights in a good night to see, are in plain sight of each other across the low and marshy lands and shoal water within these bends, and for a considerable distance both above and below the bends. The proofs showed that both vessels were keeping nearer the American channel bank (which was the port hand bank to the Milwaukee and the starboard hand bank to the Lac la Belle), than to the Canadian bank; that the Milwaukee turned the lower bend a little before the Lac la Belle turned the upper bend, but so nearly at the same time as to be practically simultaneous; that the lights of each vessel were first made from the other before either had turned the respective bends in the river, and, of course, the lights of the Lac la Belle then made from the Milwaukee were the green or starboard light and the white light, and the lights of the Milwaukee then made from the Lac la Belle were the red or port light and the white light; that when each so made the other's lights, they must have been about two miles apart, and when each turned the respective bends in the river, which, as we have seen, was nearly simultaneous, they were from a mile to a mile and a quarter apart, and were approaching each other at nearly or quite full speed—that of the Lac la Belle being about 14½ miles an hour, with the current (which at this point is 2½ miles an hour) added, and that of the Milwaukee being about 8½ miles an hour, with the current deducted, making the aggregate speed with which the two were approaching each other by the land about 23 miles an hour, or one mile in 2 minutes and 36 seconds; that these rates of speed were fully maintained by each until collision was inevitable, when the Milwaukee's engine was stopped and reversed, but not in time to produce any perceptible effect upon her speed before the collision occurred.

How the two vessels approached each other, what signals were given by each, and some other facts involved in the case, are stated in the opinion of the court.

The faults specifically charged in the libel against the Milwaukee were: 1. That she had no sufficient and competent officers and crew acquainted with the channel and navigation of the St. Clair river, and at their appropriate and proper places. 2. That they did not answer the signals of Lac la Belle and keep to the right hand side of the river, as both the law and good seamanship require; but, on the contrary, turned to the left, and attempted to pass to the left and to the westward of the said Lac la Belle, contrary to law and good seamanship. 3. Other faults, etc., unknown to libellants, but known to the officers and crew of the Milwaukee, which, when discovered, it was prayed might be inserted in the libel.

The faults specifically charged in the cross-libel against the Lac la Belle were, in the words of the libel: 1. "That said propeller was coming at full speed and showing her green and white lights, and as if to pass on the starboard hand side of the said steamboat. That while so running, and when the said propeller had approached quite close, suddenly she appeared to be swinging to starboard, as if under an order to port, and appeared to be attempting to pass across the bow, and on the port hand side of said steamboat, but on attempting to do so, she was made to run against and collide with the said steamboat Milwaukee." 2. "That although the master of the said steamboat had given his proper signals indicating which side he would pass, and had received an answer to said signal, and when the said propeller had commenced swinging to starboard, as aforesaid, and across the bows of the steamboat, the said master immediately stopped and backed his said steamboat, but so short was the distance between the said propeller and said steamboat, and so great was the speed of said propeller, that the said propeller came on and collided with the said steamboat as aforesaid."

The libellants against the Milwaukee laid their damages at the sum of $167,000, and the libellants against the Lac la Belle at the sum of $6,000.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The first charge of fault against the Milwaukee is, substantially, not that her officers and crew were generally incompetent, but that they were unacquainted with the channel and navigation of the particular waters in which the collision occurred, and that they were not at their proper places. As an independent or abstract proposition, I think it is clearly proven that the officers and crew of the Milwaukee had but very little experimental knowledge of that channel. And I think the proofs upon this point are such as to justify the court in holding that their knowledge in this respect was inadequate to the navigation of the difficult passes of the St. Clair river, especially in the night, and that such want of knowledge was sufficient, prima facie, to constitute a fault. Here was a large steamboat of great strength and power, to be navigated in the night time through a channel full of tortuous and narrow passages, difficult of navigation even in the day time, and requiring the highest degree of experimental as well as theoretical knowledge of those passages for safe navigation through them. When we add to this the fact that these difficult passages lie right in, and in fact constitute a part of the great highway of the entire commerce of the great Northwestern Lakes, and are consequently literally filled with vessels passing and repassing, both night and day, Captain Trowel's attempt to take his vessel through, without an experienced pilot, however competent he may be to navigate the open waters, certainly seems like the very height of presumption, and was an act deserving a stern rebuke, if nothing more.

But the question, after all, is, was this want of knowledge on the part of the officers and crew of the Milwaukee the cause of, or did it contribute to the collision? The theory advanced on the part of the libellants against the Milwaukee is, that when the lights of the Lac la Belle were first made from the Milwaukee, Captain Trowel's want of knowledge of the bends in the river between the two vessels, the lights made being the green and white, led him to the conclusion that the Lac la Belle was crossing the Milwaukee's course, instead of meeting her, and that she would naturally pass to his starboard; and it was assumed that it was this misapprehension that resulted in the collision. The assumed fact upon which this theory is based is, that Captain Trowel did not know of the existence of the bends in the channel. If this fact were sustained by the proofs, or if it were left without direct proofs, to be inferred from Captain Trowel's general want of acquaintance with the channel, the theory might have some plausibility. But, unfortunately for the theory advanced, what proof there is as to that fact is decidedly the other way. In the first place, Captain Trowel swears substantially that he was aware of those bends, and in the next place he must of course have been made aware of the existence of them when the two vessels had turned them, which was in time, with correct management, to have avoided a collision; and finally, the signal given on board the Milwaukee, whether it was a single or a double blast of the whistle, was a signal given only when meeting, showing clearly that Captain Trowel understood at that time that they were meeting and not crossing. I think, therefore, that the theory advanced is rebutted by the facts proven. I shall have occasion, however, to allude to this subject again in connection with another branch of the case. The only charge made under the other division of the first charge of fault is that the Milwaukee had no lookout. It clearly appears, however, that the captain who was in charge of the navigation of the Milwaukee saw the Lac la Belle's lights and was in full possession of all the information that a lookout could have given him, in ample time to have avoided a collision. It is, therefore, immaterial to inquire into the fact whether there was a lookout or not. The second charge of fault against the Milwaukee is, substantially, that she did not keep to the right, but turned to the left, and that this was contrary to law and good seamanship.

The specific regulations, statutory and otherwise, involved in this charge of fault, are articles 13, 14 and 18 of the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60, 61), which were then in force, and rule 1 of the rules adopted by the board of supervising inspectors, October 17th, 1865, also then in force, which articles and rule are as follows: "Art. 13. If two ships under steam are meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other. Art. 14. If two ships under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other." "Art. 18. Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course," etc. "Rule 1. When steamers are approaching each other, the signal for passing shall be one sound of the steam whistle to keep to the right, and two sounds of the steam whistle to keep to the left. These signals to be made first by the ascending steamer. If the dangers of navigation, darkness of the night, narrowness of the channel, or any other cause, render it necessary for the descending boat to take the other side, she can do so by making the necessary signals, and the ascending boat must govern herself accordingly. These signals to be observed by all steamers, either day or night." The manoeuvring of the vessels which resulted in the collision commenced when each turned the respective bends in the river. This manoeuvring on the part of the Milwaukee, was a starboarding, and running in toward the American channel bank, and on the part of the Lac la Belle, a porting, and running in towards the same bank; so that, as has been before stated, the collision occurred within 75 feet of that bank, and that, too, in a channel which at that point was at least 850 feet wide, and at that time unobstructed. It seems incredible that vessels commanded by competent and intelligent officers should have thus collided in such a channel, and upon such a night. Surely, a grave responsibility rests somewhere, and I think we shall find it resulted in large part from a misapprehension, or at least a misapplication of the articles and rules above quoted.

It is contended on behalf of the Milwaukee that she gave the signals, viz.: two sounds of her steam whistle, prescribed by rule 1, for passing to the left, and that she was therefore right in passing to the left as she did. It is also contended that the Lac la Belle responded by two sounds of her steam whistle, and that, therefore, for a still stronger reason, the Milwaukee was entitled to do as she did.

On behalf of the Lac la Belle it is contended that rule 1 is in conflict with the articles of the statute above quoted, as applied to the facts of this case, and, therefore, affords no protection to the Milwaukee for starboarding and attempting to pass to the left as she did.

The fact that the Lac la Belle responded as alleged is also disputed and the contrary is contended. So far as the rule was in conflict with the act, it was undoubtedly of no effect; and it was so in conflict so far as it might be construed to authorize one vessel, whether ascending or descending, to dictate to the other a departure from any rule prescribed by the act. The rule may, however, be sustained (and I think this is the only effect that can be given to it), as an authority for an ascending vessel to propose to a descending vessel to depart from the requirements of the act, and for the descending vessel to accept such proposition, and to make such a departure when thus mutually agreed upon binding and valid. In such case, and no other, the rule was a protection to a steam vessel departing from a statutory requirement.

In this view of the subject the burden is upon the vessel claiming the protection of the rule and against any departure from the statutory requirement, to prove all the following facts: 1. That a proposition to depart from the statute was made by her by means of the signals prescribed by rule 1, and in due season for the other vessel to receive the proposition and act upon it with safety. 2. That the other vessel heard and understood the proposition thus made. 3. That the other vessel accepted the proposition.

And these facts must be made out by clear and satisfactory proofs. They must not be left to inference. The statute in question is one of vital importance for the protection of life and property upon the waters, and it will not do to hold a party blameless for a departure from its plain provisions, upon a plea of an agreement or license to do so, except where such agreement or license is admitted, or is made out beyond all reasonable doubt by clear and satisfactory proof. Where the agreement is denied, and the evidence is conflicting and contradictory, and does not clearly preponderate in favor of such agreement, the statute must govern, and the responsibility of parties must be determined accordingly. In this case it is all the same whether the vessels were approaching each other end on, or nearly end on, and so within article 13, or crossing, and so within article 14; for, in either case, the Milwaukee departed from the statutory requirements, to justify which she must prove an agreement authorizing her to do so. If they were meeting end on, or nearly end on, it was the statutory duty of both, under article 13, to port, which the Milwaukee did not do, but on the contrary, starboarded. If they were crossing, they were doing so on such courses that the Lac la Belle had the Milwaukee on her (the Lac la Belle's) starboard side, and under article 14 it was the statutory duty of the Lac la Belle to keep out of the way of the Milwaukee (which she had the right to do by taking either side of the latter), and under article 18 it was the statutory duty of the Milwaukee to keep her course, which she did not do, but starboarded.

I find, however, from the proofs that, as matter of fact, the two vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on, within the meaning of article 13. That they were so meeting, and in such a manner as to involve risk of collision, is evident from the following considerations:

1. From the nearness of their respective courses to the American channel bank. Each vessel was keeping the American channel bank comparatively close aboard, and was running by it instead of by the compass. When the Milwaukee turned the lower bend, she was, by the estimates of those on watch on her at the time, about 200 feet from the shore, and circumstances seem to warrant that the estimate is very nearly correct. When the Lac la Belle turned the upper bend, she was, in the opinion of those on watch on board of her at the time, not beyond the center of the channel, but in fact between that and the American channel bank, and the circumstances seem to warrant that this estimate is also very nearly correct. As we have seen, the channel at this point was not to exceed 450 feet wide. At all events, it was not to exceed 500 feet so that, allowing the widest latitude, the Lac la Belle was not to exceed 250 feet from the American channel bank at this point. Between these two points (and as we have before seen, the two vessels were at these points at practically the same moment of time), the general courses of the two would be on straight lines, which lines, from the above data, could not be more than 50 feet apart, and might be, and probably were, less than that. The two vessels were then from a mile to a mile and a quarter distant from each other. By actual measurement it will be found that at this stage they could have varied but a very small fraction, not to exceed one-tenth of a point from dead ahead of each other. Even if we place the Lac la Belle within 100 feet of the extreme opposite bank, they would not vary more than one-third of a point from dead ahead. This is certainly as nearly end on as vessels usually approach each other. At all events, it is far within the definition which has been given by the courts of what is "end on or nearly end on," within the meaning of article 13. It can make no difference, in this connection, that the lights of the Lac la Belle, first seen from the Milwaukee, were the green and white lights only This would necessarily be the case until the Lac la Belle had turned the upper bend. In determining how vessels are approaching each other in narrow, tortuous channels like the one here in question, their general course in the channel must alone be considered, and not the course they may be on by the compass at any particular time while pursuing the windings and turnings of the channel. It is too late, however, to claim that Trowel was misled, by any such appearance of the lights of the Lac la Belle, into the supposition that she was crossing the course of the Milwaukee, because the signal he gave and the manoeuvres he made are both inconsistent with such supposition. If the Lac la Belle had been crossing the course of the Milwaukee, and Capt. Trowel had so understood, then any signal to turn to the right or to the left would have been uncalled for and unnecessary, and, of course, would not have been given; he would have simply kept his course as required by article 18.

It is proper, perhaps, to remark here that I do not subscribe to the doctrine advanced on behalf of the libellants against the Milwaukee, that vessels navigating rivers must, in all cases, when meeting, keep to the right of the center of the navigable channel. I know of no such law in this country, and there is no such custom in the navigation of the channel in question. Vessels navigating rivers in this country, like vehicles in a highway, may use any part of the channel they may see fit, observing, however, in all cases when meeting or passing other vessels, the ordinary rules of navigation.

2. That the two vessels were so meeting—end on, or nearly end on—so as to involve risk of collision, is clear from the evident understanding on the part of each at the time, else why the signals and the manoeuvres by each? If there was no risk of collision, there was certainly no necessity and no excuse for any signal by either to go to the right or to the left, nor for the Milwaukee's starboarding as she did, or the Lac la Belle's porting as she did. The fact that each gave a signal intended to be given only in case of risk of collision, and that each changed her course with intent to avoid a collision, makes it clear that in the judgment of each there was such risk. Articles 13, 14, and 18, and rule 1, have no operation except in case of risk of collision. But independently of this, the idea that there was no risk of a collision is fully exploded by the fact that there was a collision.

I find, therefore, as matter of fact, that the two vessels were meeting end on, or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, and hence that the case falls primarily under article 13, which requires each to put her helm to port so as to pass on the port side of the other. The proofs show that the Lac la Belle did so put her helm to port, while the Milwaukee put hers to starboard, and that the collision was brought about solely by these joint manoeuvres. I have also found, as matter of law, as before stated, that the Milwaukee having thus departed from the statutory rule, she is prima facie in fault, and that the burden is upon her to show that an agreement was entered into under rule 1 for such departure, and that to this end it was necessary for her to prove: 1. That she gave the proper signal, viz., two blasts of her steam whistle, proposing such departure, and in due season; 2. That such signal was heard and understood; and 3. That the proposition was accepted by the Lac la Belle.

As to the first proposition, there is a conflict between the testimony of the officers and crew of the Lac la Belle and those of the Milwaukee, as to what signal was heard by the former, and what was actually given by the latter. The testimony of those on board the Milwaukee is all agreed that the signal actually given by her was two blasts, and from their better means of knowledge as to what was done on board their own vessel, under a well-known and recognized rule for weighing conflicting testimony in cases of this sort, it must be held as proven that two blasts of the whistle were given by the Milwaukee, and that they were given so as to indicate the desire and proposition on her part to depart from the statutory requirement of article 13, and to pass to the left, as provided in rule 1, instead of to the right, as provided by said article.

In the view I shall take of the two remaining propositions, which I shall now proceed to consider, it is unnecessary to discuss the question whether the signal so made by the Milwaukee was made in due season. In point of fact, the signal was given at about the time the two vessels turned the respective bends in the river, and, consequently, when they were a mile to a mile and a quarter, or, in point of time, two minutes and a half apart. This would, no doubt, be in season under ordinary circumstances, but in consideration of the speed of the Milwaukee—11 miles through the water, and eight and a half by the land—which, under the circumstances that it was in the night time and in a narrow and crooked channel, of which the officers and crew in charge had comparatively no practical knowledge, was, to say the least, extraordinary, and also in consideration of the further fact that the approaching steamer's lights had been in sight for some time previous, and that it must have been evident to those in charge of the navigation of the Milwaukee that the other vessel was so approaching, also at a high rate of speed, it might be contended with much plausibility that the Milwaukee's signal ought to have been given sooner than it was. But without deciding that point, I pass to the consideration of the two remaining propositions, viz.: Whether the Milwaukee's signal was heard and understood by the Lac la Belle, and whether the proposition thus made was accepted by her. In this connection it must be borne in mind that the burden was upon the Milwaukee to maintain both these propositions. In departing from the statutory regulations, she assumed the entire risk of her signal being heard and understood by the approaching vessel, and of herself hearing and understanding the reply. The St. John [Case No. 12,224]; The Atlas [Id. 633]; The Washington [Id. 17,220].

Here again the testimony of the officers and crews of the respective vessels, as to what was actually done upon the one and heard and understood upon the other, is in direct conflict the one with the other. We might stop right here, and say that the witnesses standing in the main on an equal footing as to credibility, and disagreeing as to the main facts, the propositions are not proved; that under the rule heretofore laid down, the proof taken as a whole is not of that clear and satisfactory character necessary to make out a justification for the Milwaukee's departure from the statutory requirement. But this is unnecessary. Applying the same rule as was applied above to the testimony of the officers and crew of the Milwaukee as to what signal was actually given on board of her, to the testimony of the officers and crew of the Lac la Belle, as to what signal was heard on board the latter, and what signal was given by her, the evidence is overwhelmingly preponderating that the signal of the Milwaukee was actually heard and understood on the Lac la Belle as one blast of the steam whistle, instead of two, and that the signals given by the Lac la Belle were signals of one blast only, although repeated, thus clearly showing that the signal of the Milwaukee was not correctly heard and understood by the Lac la Belle, and that the proposition of the former to depart from the statutory rule was not accepted by the latter.

It was contended, on behalf of the Milwaukee, that, her whistle being a very loud one, if she gave two sounds, two must have been heard on the Lac la Belle. This is an inference merely; of course it is not conclusive as against positive, unimpeached testimony as to what was in fact heard, although it might, and no doubt would, be controlling in the absence of such testimony. The proof shows that the signal of the Lac la Belle was repeated, and it was contended on behalf of the Milwaukee that the two sounds of the steam whistle thus given were given so nearly together in point of time as, in fact, to constitute but one signal of two sounds within the meaning of rule 1; or, at least, that the one followed the other so closely as to justify the Milwaukee in assuming, as she did, that they constituted but one signal, and as such indicated an acceptance by the Lac la Belle of the Milwaukee's proposition to go to the left. By the proofs there can be no doubt that the two sounds given by the Lac la Belle were intended for separate signals, each as a signal to adhere to the statutory rule, to keep to the right. Yet, if they were given in such a manner as, in fact, to constitute but one signal of two sounds, the Lac la Belle must be held to respond accordingly, regardless of her intentions. It is not sufficient that they were so near together as to create a doubt merely as to which was meant, because in that case the Milwaukee had different duties to perform under other rules (2d and 10th rules of October 17th, 1865), which duties there is no pretense of her having performed. The two sounds meant by rule 1, as a signal, are well understood by all steam navigators, and in fact by all persons at all accustomed to hearing that signal given, to be two sounds in quick succession, constituting a sort of double sound or blast. The witnesses on the part of the Lac la Belle, the mate who gave the sounds, and a large number of the officers and crew who heard them, are fully agreed that the sounds were not of that double character. Estimates of time I place but little reliance upon. But we are not left to rely upon such estimates alone. Many of the witnesses tell us what they were doing, where they went, etc., between the two sounds, showing clearly that a considerable time must have elapsed, and amply sufficient to deprive the two sounds of the character claimed, and to show that the second sound was really such as was intended by the mate of the Lac la Belle then on watch, viz.: a repetition of the former signal of one sound to go to the right. This conclusion is strengthened by the testimony of Durling, the professional pilot of the St. Clair flats, who was listening to the sounds for a purpose connected with his professional employment, and who had no part or interest whatever in the affairs or navigation of either vessel.

I find therefore that the Milwaukee has failed to justify her departure from the statutory rule to port, and that therefore in this respect she was in fault.

I think the Milwaukee was also in fault in respect to her speed. Article 16 of the act of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 61), provides as follows: "Every steamship, when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed, or, if necessary, stop and reverse," etc. This rule is but a re-enactment of what was the law before, and the law so re-enacted is but the embodiment of the dictates of common prudence. Under it a steam vessel is not permitted to approach another vessel, whether propelled by steam or otherwise, whether meeting or overtaking, so near that a collision is inevitable, or even dangerous, before taking the prescribed precaution. Risk of collision is sufficient to bring such steamer under the rule, and there is always risk of collision in case of vessels meeting or passing in a crooked and comparatively narrow channel like the one here under consideration. This the Milwaukee did not do, although she saw the Lac la Belle long before they came together. But, on the contrary, she was kept at quite or nearly her full speed up to but a moment before the collision, when her engine was stopped and reversed, but too late, and of course to no purpose. This excessive speed on the part of the Milwaukee was all the more reckless and inexcusable, and makes the fault all the graver and more reprehensible, for the reason that, as we have seen, her officers and crew were unacquainted with the channel, and for the further reason that such speed was entirely unnecessary. She was going against the current, and nothing like her rate of speed was necessary for steerage way. It is, of course, impossible to lay down any precise rule as to just what rate of speed steam vessels shall adopt under such circumstances; but it is perfectly safe to say that they should adopt such a rate of speed as to be at all times under ready and complete control until the risk is fully passed, and this is certainly not the 11-knot speed of the Milwaukee, if we take it through the water, or her 8½-knot speed, if we take it by the land. But I shall notice this subject of speed further when considering the charge of excessive speed made against the Lac la Belle, which I shall now proceed to do.

The faults charged against the Lac la Belle, briefly stated, are substantially: 1. A sudden and unexpected change of course to starboard. This charge is fully disposed of in favor of the Lac la Belle in what has already been said. 2. Excessive speed. The speed of the Lac la Belle, as we have seen, was about twelve miles an hour through the water, and about fourteen and a half miles by the land. That of the Milwaukee was about eleven miles through the water and about eight and a half by the land. The Lac la Belle was moving with the current, and therefore not so readily controlled or so easily stopped as the Milwaukee, which was moving against the current. She was aware of the approach of the Milwaukee in ample time to have adopted the precautions dictated by article 16 above quoted, as well as by common prudence, by checking her speed so as to be under ready control. The same risk of collision, and the obligations thereby imposed, were upon her as were upon the Milwaukee. And yet we find her dashing down the current at nearly or quite her greatest rate of speed—a rate of speed, too, which is nearly, if not quite, equal to that of the fastest steamers navigating the Great Lakes, and keeping up that rate of speed with all the risk and danger fair before her, without check or diminution, up to the very moment of collision. If we may recognize degrees of fault in such cases, the fault of the Lac la Belle in this respect, notwithstanding the greater familiarity of her officers and crew with the channel, was even greater than that of the Milwaukee. It was claimed that the obligation to check did not attach to the Lac la Belle, because but for the mistake of the Milwaukee in starboarding when she ought to have ported, there was no danger of collision—that the Lac la Belle had a right to assume that the Milwaukee would obey the law, and if she had done so there would have been no collision, notwithstanding the excessive speed complained of. This doctrine, carried to its ultimate results, would avoid all rules having for their object the enforcement of precautionary measures for prevention of collisions, and would recognize the right of a vessel, herself technically obeying the rules, unnecessarily to run another down, which, accidentally or otherwise, might come in her way in consequence of some non-observance of those rules, neither of which results would for a moment be recognized as law by the learned advocates who advanced the doctrine stated.

Conceding, however, all that is claimed, the Lac la Belle was still in fault for not slackening her speed. The moment the Milwaukee starboarded and showed her green light to the Lac la Belle, there was danger of collision. This occurred, as we have seen, when they were a mile or a mile and a quarter apart. It then, if not before, certainly became the duty of the Lac la Belle to slacken speed. I think, however, it is open to discussion under article 16 whether the obligation of a steamship approaching another vessel to slacken speed does not attach the moment risk of collision is involved, and whether, under that article, it is allowable for such ship to wait to see if there is absolutely danger of collision before doing so. Danger of collision is, of course, included in risk of collision, but it is not all there is of it. There is never danger of collision other than by inevitable or inscrutable accident, where all fully and completely obey the law. Danger of collision begins only when one vessel or the other begins to depart from the rules established by law. Risk of collision begins the very moment when the two vessels have approached so near each other and upon such courses, that by a departure from the rules of navigation, whether from want of good seamanship, accident, mistake, misapprehension of signals, or otherwise, a collision might be brought about. It is true, that, prima facie, each has a right to assume that the other will obey the law. But this does not justify either in shutting his eyes to what the other may actually do, or in omitting to do what he can to avoid an accident, made imminent by the acts of the other. I say the right above spoken of is prima facie merely, because it is well known that departures from the law not only may, but do, take place, and often. Risk of collision may be said to begin the moment the two vessels have approached so near that a collision might be brought about by any such departure, and continues up to the moment when they have so far progressed that no such result could ensue. The Nichols, 7 Wall [74 U. S.] 663. The language of article 13, prescribing the condition in this regard, in which the helm of each shall be put to port, and that of article 16, prescribing the conditions under which they shall slacken speed, is precisely the same "so as to involve risk of collision." From this it would seem to follow that the obligation to slacken speed attaches the moment the obligation to port attaches, and that the former obligation continues while the latter continues—or, in other words, that the obligation to slacken speed under article 16 always co-exists with the obligation to port under article 13. The doctrine here asserted is forcibly illustrated by the case now under consideration. No one will contend for a moment that Capt. Trowel, of the Milwaukee, intended to disobey the law, but, on the contrary, I think, all must concede that he intended to obey it. He evidently misconceived his legal rights, and probably misapprehended the signals of the Lac la Belle, which misconception and misapprehension, and his consequent starboarding instead of porting, as we have seen, was the primary cause of the collision. The Milwaukee is held in fault in this respect, not because Capt. Trowel's departure from the law was willful or intentional, but simply because it was unauthorized. Such misconception of law and misapprehension of fact are occurring upon the waters daily and nightly, and it is to them that the great bulk of collisions is to be attributed, and the risk of collisions from these causes constitutes by far the larger portion of the risks of navigation growing out of collisions; and, I think it may be assumed that when risk of collision is spoken of in the law, it includes this risk as one of its principal elements. But as we have already seen, it is not necessary to go to that extent in this case.

It cannot be successfully claimed on either side that the failure to slacken speed did not contribute to the collision. The aggregate of the speed of the two was about twenty-two miles an hour, or one mile in a little over two minutes and a half. If the speed of each had been slackened to even one-half what it was (and I think it ought to have been slackened more than that), each would have been afforded an opportunity to fully comprehend the mistake which had been made, and to provide against it. It is fair to presume that if this had been done we should not now be considering one of the most, if not the most calamitous and deplorable collisions ever recorded as happening upon the Great Lakes and their connecting waters.

I find, therefore, that the collision was caused primarily by the unauthorized departure of the Milwaukee from the statutory rule prescribed by article 13 of the act of 1864, requiring each vessel, in the situation in which the two then were, to put her helm to port so as to pass on the port side of the other, and that a contributing cause of the collision, and without which it is fair to presume it would not have occurred, notwithstanding such primary cause, was the gross and inexcusable failure on the part of each vessel, and more especially the Lac la Belle, to slacken speed as required by article 16. It results, therefore, both vessels being in fault, that there must be a division of damages.

The importance of this case not only to the parties immediately interested in respect to the amount involved in dollars and cents, but also to the interests of commerce and navigation in respect to the principles involved, has led me into a close and careful scrutiny and consideration of the facts in the case, and of the able and exhaustive arguments and briefs of the learned advocates on both sides, from which I have derived much aid in my investigations—such a scrutiny and consideration as those interests, both private and public, seemed to demand. I have been led also into a somewhat extended elucidation of my conclusions, thereby the more thoroughly to test their correctness, and also in order that if either party, or both, feeling aggrieved by my conclusions, shall desire a review, the appellate court may have before it my reasons in full, and be thus enabled the more readily to judge of their soundness or unsoundness. Decree for a division of damages.

SHIPPING — JETTISON — GENERAL AVERAGE — ON DECK.

1. Goods laden on deck with consent of the shipper under a bill of lading excepting "dangers of navigation," and necessarily jettisoned, do not make a case for general average.

[Approved in Wood v. The Sallie C. Morton, Case No. 17,958. Criticised in The William Gillum, Id. 17,693; The Watchful, Id. 17,250. Disapproved in Wood v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 1 Fed. 240.]

2. The fact that the shipment on deck was sought by the master for the purpose of trimming his vessel, held not to be material.

Libel for contribution for loss by jettison of a quantity of pig lead, shipped on board this schooner at the port of Racine, in the state of Wisconsin, to be transported to the port of Buffalo, in the state of New York. By the bill of lading, the pigs of lead were shipped on deck, in good condition, to be delivered in like good order, the dangers of navigation excepted. The schooner was laden with wheat in bulk.

MILLER, District Judge. [Libellants shipped on board this schooner at the port of Racine, in the state of Wisconsin, divers pigs of lead to be transported to the port of Buffalo, in the state of New York. By the bill of lading the pigs of lead were shipped on deck, in good condition, to be delivered in like good order, the dangers of navigation excepted. The schooner was laden with wheat in bulk. It is alleged in the libel, that at the time the lead was received on board, the vessel was so badly stevedored, that she was not in a proper condition to safely take it on deck, or to safely transport it according to the tenor or effect of the bill of lading, or to safely and securely hold and carry the under-deck cargo. And that the vessel being in an unseaworthy condition, set sail on her intended voyage with the lead on board. And, by reason of the vessel not being well trimmed, and not in condition to resist the ordinary perils of the sea by reason of said improper trimming, and not by any embarrassment or danger caused by the lead being on deck, the officers and crew of the vessel jettisoned the lead from off the deck into the waters of Lake Michigan, whereby the lead became wholly lost, and was not delivered according to the tenor and effect of the bill of lading. Libellants demand strict proof whether the jettison was made necessary by a peril of the sea, or from improper stowage of the under-deck cargo. And if jettison were made necessary by a peril of the sea, then by the custom and course of the admiralty and maritime laws, they claim that the loss is a case of general average loss. Claimants in their answer confess the shipment of the lead, and they urge that the vessel being tight, staunch and strong, and well manned, equipped, and having a cargo of 14,700 bushels of wheat in her hold, sufficiently and properly stowed and secured, and forty tons of pig lead shipped on deck, pursuant to the bill of lading, left the port of Racine, bound for the port of Buffalo, and while on the voyage on Lake Michigan, she encountered a severe gale, labored hard, shipping much water on deck, filling herself, and rendering it necessary to knock away the bulwarks to free her, and the gale increasing, it became necessary for the preservation of the vessel, and of the lives and officers of the crew, and for the safety of the whole, the officers, on consultation, determined to jettison a portion of the lead, and thereupon they jettisoned about 838 pigs, and on arriving at Buffalo, the whole cargo was delivered, except the pigs of lead jettisoned. It is also averred that the cargo under deck was not a full cargo, and was so known to the agent of the shippers, and the lead was shipped on deck at the request of said agent. The answer further alleges that the loss so occurred by a peril of the sea, is not a general average loss, nor is the same to be contributed for in general average.] [2]

It is agreed between the advocates of the parties that the storm was of force and violence sufficient to render the jettison necessary. The proof sustains the allegation that the master solicited the lead for the purpose of trimming his vessel. The proof does not establish a custom to ship lead on deck. That has been done in several instances for the purpose of trimming grain bearing vessels, but to establish a custom derogating from the general law, it is not enough to prove that the act has been frequently done. It must be proven to be so generally known and recognized, that a fair presumption arises that the parties in entering into their engagement, do it with reference to the custom, and tacitly agree that their rights and responsibilities shall be determined by it. This case does not rest on custom, there being an express agreement between the freighter and the master of the vessel, that the lead should be stowed on deck.

The question presented for the consideration of the court is, is the loss of the lead by the jettison a general average loss? The general cargo having been delivered at the port of destination, upon payment of the freight, the demand is against the vessel alone for her proportional contribution. Under the view taken of the point presented, I will not consider whether this libel can be maintained against this vessel, after delivery of the cargo.

It appears that the master having ascertained that his vessel was not trimmed, applied to the agent of the owner of the lead, to ship it on deck, for the purpose of trimming the vessel for the voyage, and thereby rendering her sea-worthy. From this fact negligence is not chargeable to the master, in respect to putting the vessel in trim. The jettison was rendered necessary by a peril of the sea, for the safety of the vessel and cargo, and was a loss by the peril of the sea.

It is a general and an ancient rule of the law of shipping that goods shall not be carried on deck. Reasons for this rule are, that goods placed on deck are more liable to be lost by being swept overboard, and to damage by water, and endanger both ship and cargo, as the weight is put far from the hold, and thereby makes the vessel less stable and less manageable, and more apt to labor in a heavy sea. And it encumbers the deck and embarrasses the crew in working a sail vessel, and perhaps the common safety sometimes may not require jettison if lading were not on deck to bring the dangers on the vessel, or contribute to enhance them.

The rule is also a general rule, that goods laden on deck and jettisoned are not contributed for, and such is particularly the rule when goods are laden on deck by consent of the shipper. I have had this matter under consideration in former cases, and must dispense with reference to the very numerous cases affirming this rule. Maritime orders and rules, both ancient and modern, recognize the distinction between cargoes placed on deck with consent of the freighter, and cargoes under deck. They do not give a recourse against the master, the vessel, or the owner. The admiralty courts of England and America have almost uniformly treated the owner of goods on deck with his consent, as not having a claim on the master, in case of jettison, although bound to contribute.

This being a proceeding against a sail vessel, I shall not enter upon the consideration of some modern judgments against vessels propelled by steam. The case of Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 100, is referred to as a leading case of binding authority. The ship Hornet was libelled for non-delivery of two steam boilers and chimneys shipped at New York, on deck by special agreement, and consigned to libellants in San Francisco. It being discovered on the voyage, that the ship could not be navigated with safety in a storm, the deck load was thrown overboard. The facts in the case show that the jettison was justifiable, and the loss occasioned by the peril of the sea. The court says "This bill of lading declares that the property is to go on deck. It excepts perils of the seas. The exception must be construed with reference to the particular adventure, which the contract of the affreightment shows was contemplated by the parties. Under this bill of lading, the question is, not what in other circumstances could be deemed a peril of the sea, but what is to be deemed such when operating on this vessel, with this deck load. If a very burdensome cargo like iron is taken on board, and heavy weather met with, and jettison made, it would not be a ground of claim against the owner that the weather encountered would not have been sufficient to justify a jettison, if the cargo had been cotton. And when this freighter consented to place on the deck of this ship his boilers and chimneys, weighing upwards of thirty tons, not distributed about the deck, but lying in a small space, must he not be taken to have known that their necessary effect might be to embarrass the sailing of a ship in a gale of wind, and cause her to labor in a heavy sea?" The libel was dismissed. In this case libellants having shipped on deck eleven hundred and sixty pigs of lead weighing about forty tons, they consented that the vessel might thereby be rendered less manageable, and more liable to labor in a storm, and they, and not the vessel, must bear the loss of a portion of the deck load by the necessary jettison.

It is contended that in equity the vessel should contribute for the loss, as the deck load was used in putting her in trim for sea. That is begging the question. I cannot enter into consideration of the inducement to the contract of the parties.

The libel will be dismissed.

NOTE. See The Wellington [Case No. 17,384], and cases there referred to.

The general rule that there is no contribution for goods laden on deck is held in The Paragon [Id. 10,708]; Lennox v. United Ins. Co., 3 Johns. Cas. 178; Johnston v. Crane, 1 Kerr, 356; Wolcott v. Eagle Ins. Co., 4 Pick. 429; Cram v. Aiken, 13 Me. 229; Taunton Copper Co. v. Merchants' Ins. Co., 22 Pick. 108.

In Barber v. Brace, 3 Conn. 13, it is held that a parol agreement that goods may be stowed on deck, made after the delivery of the bill of lading, is a good defense to a loss occasioned by such stowage. But when it is customary to carry a certain class of goods on deck the rule has been relaxed. Gould v. Oliver, 4 Bing. N. C. 676; Brown v. Cornwell, 1 Root, 60; Rogers v. Mechanics' Ins. Co. [Case No. 12,016]; Toledo, etc., Ins. Co. v. Speares, 16 Ind. 52. And in Milward v. Hibbert, 2 Gale & D. 142, the owners of pig lead loaded on deck, having been allowed contribution in general average on showing a usage so to carry, the ship-owner recovered against the underwriters; and Denman, C. J., reviewing the English authorities, says that they fall far short of the rule that owner of deck cargo can in no case recover in general average.

A distinction has also been made between sail vessels and steamers, the distinction going to the reason of the rule. Hurley v. Milward, 1 Jones & C. 224; Gillett v. Ellis, 11 Ill. 579; Harris v. Moody, 4 Bosw. 210, approved by the court of appeals in 30 N. Y. 266; Merchants' & Manufacturers' Ins. Co. v. Shillito, 15 Ohio St. 559.

The supreme court have entirely settled the rule that a clean bill of lading imports a contract that the goods shall be stowed under deck, and that parol evidence that they were to be stowed on deck, is inadmissible. The Delaware, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 579. This was a case of jettison of pig iron, and the court expressly limit their decision to the case where no usage or custom of a particular trade is shown sanctioning a stowage on deck, no proof of such usage having been introduced in that case.

SALVAGE — CONSORTS — ACCEPTANCE OF SERVICE — RECONSIDERATION.

[After wrecking vessels have consorted together to save the cargo and materials of a stranded ship filled with water, which are amply sufficient for that purpose, a vessel subsequently arriving is not entitled to come into the consortship, nor are the wreckers or master obliged to accept the services of her steam pump where clearly it could not save the ship. The master may also reconsider his determination to employ the pump.]

[This was a libel in rem by John W. Roberts and others against the cargo and materials of the bark Mimi for salvage.]

Winer Bethel, for libelant.
S. J. Douglas, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. Nine wrecking vessels had arrived at the wreck, and had consorted together to save cargo and materials, when the Eliza Catherine, carrying a steam pump, being the tenth vessel, also arrived, and tendered her assistance. The vessel was at the time full of water, and, according to the master's statement, had filled in about twenty minutes after striking the reef. About fourteen feet of the extreme afterpart of her keel was started off, and turned partially out, and also four or five feet of the garboard streak was torn off. The master of the ship at first consented to take the assistance of the pump, and his determination of this point, according to the views of the wreckers, entitled the Eliza Catherine herself to come into the consortship; and it was accordingly so understood. The master, however, a few moments afterwards, upon examining the bottom of the ship, with a water glass, changed his mind, and determined, that he would not take the assistance of the pump. The wreckers then determined that the Catherine should not come into the consortship; they having vessels and men enough without her to save the cargo and materials.

It is the duty of the wreckers to employ all reasonable means, with the master's consent, to save the ship as well as the cargo; and if there was a reasonable doubt whether the pump, in the present case, would have freed the vessel, if tried, it was their duty to advise the master to try it, and to have assisted at once in getting the pump on board. The employment of the pump would not necessarily let the vessel that carried it into the general consortship; but the pump and vessel would be compensated for the services which the pump actually rendered. In the present case, I do not think that there is room to entertain a reasonable doubt that the ship was so far broken and bilged as that the pump could not have freed the vessel. Consequently there was no obligation on the part of the wreckers either to employ the pump or advise its employment.

Second. The determination of the master to employ the pump being the consideration of the supposed agreement of consortship, a change of his determination caused a failure of the consideration, and avoided the contract.

Third. That, under the circumstances, the Eliza Catherine was rightfully excluded as a salvor from the general consortship.

The following decree was entered:

This bark, laden with cotton from Galveston to Amsterdam, was lost on Pickles reef. Nine wrecking vessels, carrying in all one hundred men, saved a portion of the cargo and materials, valued $41,281. Referring to the libel and answer for the facts of the case: It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the libellants have and recover in full compensation for their services the sum of thirteen thousand four hundred and twenty dollars, in full compensation for their services in saving the said cargo and materials, and that upon the payment thereof, and the costs and expenses of this suit, the wharfage, storage, labor bills, and other charges, the marshal restore said cargo to the master of the said bark, for and on account of whom it may concern; that the said salvage be divided among the salvors by allotting to the first consortship the sum of ten thousand eight hundred and twenty nine dollars, and to the second consortship the sum of two thousand five hundred and ninety one dollars.

WITNESS—NEGRO—COMPETENCY—PRESUMPTION.

1. A free black man, born of a white woman, is a competent witness against a white man.

2. Evidence that a black man has, for many years, publicly acted as a free man, and been generally reputed to be free, rebuts the presumption of slavery arising from color, and is evidence that he was born of a white woman.

Slander. Charles Cavender, a black man, was admitted to testify for the plaintiff, after witnesses had been examined by the court on oath, and testified that Charles had acted publicly for eleven years as a free man, and was generally reputed as such.

DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, said that persons born free, that is, descended from a white woman, were not, in Maryland, held to be negroes; and were permitted to testify against white persons. And although color is prima facie evidence of slavery, yet the fact that the witness had, for a long time, publicly acted as free, turned the presumption the other way, and was prima facie evidence that he was born of a white woman.

MINER v. HARBECK.

[1 Abb. Adm. 546.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1849.

SEAMEN —WAGES — DISCHARGE BY CONSUL — ENTRIES HOW MADE.

Where a United States consul in a foreign port discharges a seaman without payment of three months' wages, (under 5 Stat. 395, § 1), the discharge will not avail the owner as a defence to a suit for the two months' wages, which by the provisions of the act accrue to the seaman, unless the consul makes an official entry of his act both upon the list of the crew and upon the shipping articles. These entries must be made by the consul personally.

This was a libel in personam by Lewis Miner against William H. Harbeck to recover wages as seaman.

BETTS, District Judge. The libellant shipped at this port on July 8, 1848, on board the brig Susan, on a voyage to the south of Europe, thence to one or more ports in South America, and thence to such other ports or places as the master might direct, for a term not exceeding twelve calendar months. The ship went to Lisbon, and thence to Rio Janeiro, when the captain chartered her to the coast of Africa, and back to Rio Janeiro.

On December 21, 1848, the libellant (with others of the crew) was there discharged at his own request and by consent of the master, and his wages were paid him in full to that day; and the same day he shipped on board the bark Elvira Harbeck, owned by the same persons, for the United States.

There is no ground of claim in the case other than for three months' wages because of the discharge at Rio Janeiro. The libellant left the brig from choice, and the respondent had no agency in his discharge other than the assent of the master to it. It was not procured or suggested by him. The libellant can maintain no claim for wages to the time of his return to the United States, because his term of service had not then expired, and he would have been bound to offer to remain with the brig to the end of twelve months. The equity of his claim, therefore, clearly rests on the effect of his discharge according to the provisions of the statute.

By section 3 of the act of February 28, 1803 (2 Stat. 203), the discharge of a seaman abroad by his own consent, subjects the master to the payment of three months' wages, two of which enure to the benefit of the seaman himself. The act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 395, § 6), so far varied this regulation as to authorize a discharge, on mutual consent of the master and mariner, by a consul abroad, without payment of the three months' wages. if the consul thinks it expedient not to require such payment.

But the discharge is of no efficacy unless the consul makes an official entry thereof upon the list of the crew and the shipping articles. 5 Stat. 395, § 7. This formality was not observed in the present case. The master testifies that the discharge was authorized and made by the consul, but only one certificate, that to the crew list, was given, and that was executed by a deputy, and not by the consul personally.[1]

This is not a compliance with the conditions of the statute, and, therefore, cannot avail the owner as a legal defence to the action. The defect is merely technical, for the proof is uncontradicted that the consul acted personally in the matter, that the libellant desired his discharge and accepted his pay, and that the consul fully approved the arrangement.

Still, under the circumstances, the libellant is in law entitled to recover the two months' wages demanded, the allotment of them to seamen on such discharges not being specially for their benefit, but in furtherance of the national policy of deterring masters of vessels from leaving seamen abroad. He is, however, equitably bound to account for his earnings on board the Elvira Harbeck, and if they equal the $36 payable at Rio Janeiro, they will extinguish his demand, and must be applied to its satisfaction. He may accordingly, at his option, have a reference to ascertain the amount of wages paid him by the latter vessel, and if it was less than $36, take a decree against the respondent for the balance.

Decree accordingly.

Mr. Stanbery, for plaintiff.

Mr. Swayne, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This ejectment is brought to recover lot 240 in Columbus, which is claimed by the plaintiff under a tax title. Several transcripts from the county auditor, and auditor of state, were given in evidence, showing the tax charged on the above lot for the years 1841 and 1842; the returns of the same as delinquent, and afterward as forfeited to the state, with the penalty and interest charged, and also the sale of the lot by the state, and the deed given to the purchaser. A deed from the purchaser to the lessor of the plaintiff was also in evidence. The defendant, as assignee of Nehemiah Gregory, the late owner of the lot, a bankrupt, raised several objections to the title, some of which will be now considered. And first, it is objected that the delinquent list of 1841 was not signed and sworn to by the county treasurer, as required by the statute. By the act of 23d March, 1840, the county auditor is required, between the first Monday in June and the 15th day of August, in each year, to make out a duplicate of the taxes assessed in his county, in the manner therein prescribed. This duplicate he is required to deliver to the county treasurer, who is collector of the tax. The 27th section of the same act requires the auditor to "take from the duplicate, after the period for collection has elapsed, previously put into the hands of the treasurer for collection, a list of all such taxes as such treasurer shall have been unable to collect, therein describing the property on which such delinquent taxes are charged, as the same are described in such duplicate, and shall note thereon, in a marginal column, the several reasons assigned by such treasurer why such taxes could not be collected; and such list shall be signed by the treasurer, who shall testify to the correctness thereof, under oath or affirmation, to be administered by the auditor." The original record, kept by the county auditor, being produced in evidence, shows neither the signing, it is alleged, nor the oath which is required. In the record there is a "return of taxes delinquent for the county of Franklin, for the year 1841," including taxes on both real and personal property. Then follows a statement of a settlement between the county auditor and treasurer, required by the above section, to which is affixed the following: "I, William Long, treasurer and collector of taxes for Franklin county, do solemnly swear that the foregoing list of delinquencies, to the best of my knowledge and belief, are truly stated, and that the reasons for returning such taxes delinquent, as stated therein, do, as I verily believe, truly exist." Signed, "William Long, Treasurer and Collector for Franklin County." This is, clearly, neither an oath nor an affirmation, as required by the statue. It is merely the certificate of the treasurer and collector, no oath having, in fact, been administered, as appears from the record. The formal words, "I do solemnly swear," introduced into the certificate, are without effect. The signature, I think, may be considered as a signing within the statute. The objection that the settlement intervenes between the signature and the "list of delinquencies," seems to have but little force. A transcript from the county auditor of the above duplicate, contains the oath of the treasurer of the county, as required by the statute. But, in this respect, the transcript can not be received as evidence, as it differs from the record. The county auditor is required to make a record of the return of the delinquent lands, by the treasurer and collector of the county; and this record, or a certified copy of it, only, is evidence. Parol evidence is not admissible, to supply a defect in the record. This well-established rule can admit of no relaxation.

Was the oath of the county treasurer and collector, to the return of delinquent lands, essential to the validity of the tax title? In Harmon v. Stockwell, 9 Ohio, 93, the court say: "The statute (2 Chase, 1106, § 30) requires in terms, that the list of delinquent lands returned to the county auditor during the years 1821, 1822, and 1823, shall be attested by such collector on oath." The oath in that case, not having been administered by proper authority, the court held "that the return of the collector was not under the securities and sanctions which the law required, and that the omission was fatal to a title held under such strict principles as a tax sale;" and in Thompson v. Gotham, 9 Ohio, 175, the court said: "In order to sustain a title under a sale for taxes, it is not sufficient to produce the collector's deed; there must be evidence to show that the tax has been levied, that the steps required by law to authorize a sale, have been taken, and that the person making the deed had power to make it."

In the case of Winder v. Sterling, 7 Ohio, 192, the collector returned the delinquent list in the same manner as the collector in the case under consideration; and that return was sustained by the court, on the ground that the legislature had prescribed the form which had been literally followed up by the collector. That form was prescribed by the act of 1825, which was repealed long before the return now in question was made. I should be inclined to think, however, if the act of 1825 were still in force, that an oath was necessary. The form of the oath was given in that act; and because the name of the officer who was to administer the oath was not stated in the form, the court ruled that no oath was necessary—in other words, that the form, and not the substance, was all that the legislature required. The act requiring the oath or affirmation of the treasurer and collector, now in force, is substantially the same as the act under which the decision above cited, of Harmon v. Stockwell, was made. Of course, that decision must rule the present case.

Whether a greater degree of strictness of procedure is required before the forfeiture of lands than afterward, need not be decided in this case. Until the land forfeited by the state shall be sold, the owner has a right to redeem it; the right, therefore, vested in the state, is not absolute.

Several other grounds were assumed in the defense; but, as the above point is decisive as to this suit, it is not necessary now to decide the other objections to the title.

As to the objection that the duplicates, made out at the auditor of state's office for the county auditor, do not appear to have been certified, I doubt whether it is sustainable. Whenever an officer is specially required to certify, his certificate is essential to the validity of the document. But, in cases where he is not so required, his certificate may not be necessary. Where the signature of the auditor of state is necessary, I doubt whether it can be affixed by a deputy. In the absence of the auditor, the chief clerk is expressly authorized to act, by the statute; but this provision is limited to the person who holds the office of chief clerk.

Judgment of not guilty.

MINGE v. GILMOUR.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 383;[1] 1 Car. Law Repos. 34.]

Circuit Court, D. North Carolina. June Term, 1798.

REAL PROPERTY — BARGAIN AND SALE DEED — WHAT PASSES BY—ESTATE TAIL—HOW BARRED —EX POST FACTO LAWS—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION—POWERS OF COURTS.

1. A deed of bargain and sale only passes such estate as the grantor has and can rightfully convey.

2. The issue in tail, with assets, are barred by their ancestor's deed of bargain and sale with warranty; and where other land descends liable to a charge, it is assets pro tanto.

3. An ex post facto law is one which punishes as a crime an act done before its passage, which, when committed, was not so punishable. The term does not apply to acts of a civil nature.

4. The judiciary, as a co-ordinate branch of the government, may declare a statute to be void if repugnant to the constitution; but where laws within the general scope of the authority of the legislature are passed, the courts cannot declare the same void because, in their opinion, they are contrary to principles of natural justice.

The jury found a special verdict, the substance of which is that John Minge, the grandfather of the lessor of the plaintiff, was seized in fee of the premises described in the declaration; that being so seized, he duly made his last will and testament on the 26th of November, in the year 1760; that the said John Minge departed this life in the year 1772, and his son David, the devisee, became seized of an estate tail on the said lands; that David, the son of John, being so seized and in possession of the said lands, executed a deed of bargain and sale on the 15th of February, 1779, to Charles Gilmour and William Hendric, containing the following clause of warranty: "And the said David Minge, for himself, his heirs and administrators, the aforesaid piece or parcel of land, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, doth by these presents secure, and forever defend from the lawful claim or demand of any person or persons whatsoever, unto the said Gilmour and Hendric, their heirs and assigns; in testimony whereof, the said David Minge hath hereunto set his hand and seal the day and year above written"; that he afterwards, on the 15th of May, 1779, duly made his last will and testament, with a codicil annexed of the date of the 28th February, 1781, by which he devised land to John Minge which, at the time of his decease, was of greater value than the land conveyed to Gilmour and Hendric. They also find that the consideration money expressed in the deed had been paid. They pray the advice of the court, etc. The plaintiff claimed as heir in tail to David Minge.

Taylor & Badger, for plaintiff.
Davie & Baker, for defendant.

Before IREDELL, Circuit Justice, and SITGREAVES, District Judge.

IREDELL, Circuit Justice. I cannot refrain from expressing my high satisfaction in having heard this cause so ably and perspicuously argued on both sides; and which alone, in a case of so much novelty in some respects, and intricacy in others, could have enabled me to form an opinion so early. The title of the lessor of the plaintiff (independent of that of the defendant) is prima facie clear under a tenancy in tail; the father, who was tenant in tail in possession, having died, and he as his eldest son, as such entitled to enter. The defense is grounded on two points:— 1. A denial of the right of entry of the lessor of the plaintiff, which if well founded effectually destroys this remedy by ejectment; since, if the lessor of the plaintiff had no right to enter, he had no right to make the lease confessed by the common rule; and without such lease, either actual or confessed, the action cannot be maintained. 2. A denial of his title altogether, independent of the remedy now used for asserting it; which, if well founded, shows that the lessor of the plaintiff has no title upon which he could recover in any form of action.

To prove the first point, the defendant's counsel produce a deed of David Minge, the father of the lessor of the plaintiff, and who was the tenant in tail in possession, dated the 15th February, 1779, conveying the premises in fee with warranty to Charles Gilmour and William Hendric, under whom the defendant claims. This, it is alleged, bars the entry of the son, for these reasons: 1. Because such a deed, under the act of assembly of North Carolina passed in the year 1715, (chapter 38, § 6), is to be deemed equal to a feoffment in fee with livery, which it is admitted would create a discontinuance, and drive the issue to his formedon. [The section relied on in the act of assembly is as follows: "All deeds or conveyances of lands, tenements or hereditaments, goods or chattels, which are already passed and registered, or which shall be registered within one year after the ratification of this act, for which a good and valuable consideration has been actually and bona fide paid, shall be good and available in law and equity to the purchasers and their heirs and all others claiming by, for or under them, in as full and ample a manner to all intents and purposes as if such title had been made either by fine, common recovery, livery of seizin, attornment, or any other ways used and practiced within the kingdom of Great Britain."][2] 2. Because, if this deed is not to be deemed a feoffment, it is at least a bargain and sale; and a bargain and sale, in fee with warranty, by the tenant in tail in possession, does, in itself, with or without assets, create a discontinuance, and consequently take away the entry of the issue. 3. Because an act of assembly passed in 1734 (which will be more particularly considered presently), if it does not bar the title, takes away all remedy by action or entry; and therefore whatever right may subsist in the lessor of the plaintiff, the courts are not permitted to give effect to it.

With respect to the first reason (that under the act of assembly of 1715 the deed ought to be deemed to have the same effect as a feoffment with livery and seizin). I do not think the act of assembly ought to have any such operation. If it had been necessary to convey the land at all, that a feoffment should have been made use of, the livery would have been dispensed with, together with any words of form that had been omitted, and public proof and registration be considered as a substitution of one kind, and a better kind of notoriety for another and a worse, because a feoffment at the present day, differently from the solemnities in former times, may be executed with livery in secret; though at the same time it is to be observed that even in that case, as our act requires all conveyances of land to be registered, such a feoffment must be registered; otherwise even an actual feoffment and livery itself would not be sufficient. In this respect, I conceive the law of this state differs from that of England. But when a conveyance has sufficient form to convey a rightful estate, it appears to me utterly unjustifiable to apply words in an act of the legislature which are calculated to give effect to a rightful conveyance imperfectly executed, in such a manner as to convert, by necessary construction, a rightful estate into a wrongful one; as in this instance, when the deed can operate as a bargain and sale (which is held to convey only what may lawfully pass), to say it shall operate as a feoffment, in order that it may work a discontinuance; for whatever legal effect a discontinuance may have, still it implies some wrong in the person who creates it. Thus, in strictness of law, and laying aside for the present all consideration of the indulgences granted to attempts to unfetter estates tail, it was the duty of the ancestor to preserve the right of possession for the heir, and not to deprive him of it by alienating that right to another, to his prejudice. We ought not, therefore, at any rate to say, in the present instance, when the ancestor's deed was sufficient to pass a rightful estate, that it shall be held to pass a wrongful one, unless upon the face of the deed there was clear evidence to show that the latter was his intention. But there is no such evidence in this case, for surely there is nothing on the face of this deed to warrant us in saying that the deed was designed as a deed of feoffment, and therefore that it shall operate (under this act) as a deed of feoffment would do, accompanied with actual livery.

The second reason (that this deed, operating as a bargain and sale in fee with warranty by tenant in tail in possession, does in itself, with or without assets, create a discontinuance), I am clear is well founded. The following authorities on the subject appear to me to be decisive (Litt. Ten. §§ 598–601; Co. Litt. 328; Gill. Ten. 112), placing a bargain and sale and a release on the same footing. And the reason, I conceive, why the warranty creates a discontinuance in the case of bargain and sale with warranty annexed, is this: It is a principle that when an estate to which a warranty is annexed is defeated, the warranty is good. Litt. Ten. 741. By the bargain and sale in this case, the bargainee had an estate called a base fee, determinable on the entry of the issue in tail. If there had been no warranty, the entry of the issue (speaking generally, and independent of the particular circumstances of this case) would have destroyed the estate altogether. If, therefore, notwithstanding the warranty, the entry of the issue was lawful, by his entry the estate to which the warranty was annexed would be defeated, and consequently the warranty itself destroyed. But in order to prevent this consequence, and to make the bargainee bar the issue if he can, by showing assets descended from the ancestor, the issue is not allowed to enter, and by that means ipso facto determine the estate, but he is driven to his formedon; in which case, the estate still subsisting until judgment is given against him, the warranty may be pleaded; and then the judgment will be given either for the demandant or tenant, as assets shall be made to appear or otherwise.

Being of opinion that for this reason the lessor of the plaintiff had no title to enter, it is unnecessary to say anything as to the remaining reason alleged; and this, indeed, would be alone sufficient to entitle the defendants to our judgment. But as in every case, and especially one so important as the present, it is more desirable to decide on the intrinsic merits of a title than merely on the form of bringing it before the court, I shall proceed to investigate the real merits of the defendant's title independent of any form.

The title of the defendant is grounded upon the deed of the tenant in tail, David Minge, which I mentioned before, dated and executed the 15th of February, 1779, and conveying the premises in fee to Charles Gilmour and William Hendric, under which the defendant claims. This deed, as the defendant alleges, hath defeated the title of the lessor of the plaintiff, in one of two ways. Either—1. By the operation of the deed as a bargain and sale, with warranty and assets descending on the issue in tail, the present lessor of the plaintiff. Or, 2. By the act of the assembly of this state of April, 1784, c. 22.

With regard to the first, it is clear and is admitted that if assets to sufficient value have descended on the lessor of the plaintiff, he is barred; the reason of which is to prevent circuity of action, because the warranty binds him to fulfil the warranty of his ancestor, if he hath assets to that purpose; and if he recovered in this action he would be immediately possessed of assets, and of course liable to an action in respect of them. But it is objected that in this instance the heir is not liable in respect of assets,—1. Because the land descended liable to a charge. 2. Because the heir did not take in quality of heir, but as devisee. As to the first reason, the law seems to be that notwithstanding a charge, if it doth not exhaust the whole assets, the heir shall be liable in respect to the overplus, which he undoubtedly takes as heir. Though the law appears formerly to have been held otherwise, yet probably that was owing to the uncertainty in many cases of ascertaining whether a charge would exhaust the whole assets or not, and a particular decision unwarily crept into a general principle. Later decisions seem to have placed this on a proper footing by declaring that where the charge is plainly less than the value of the whole land, the overplus shall be assets. The assets in the present instance are expressly found to be sufficient beyond the charges to which the estate is liable; and therefore this objection is of no avail. But I have serious doubts whether, at the time of the death of the ancestor (which is the true time for considering the liability of the heir), he did not take as devisee, and not as heir; in which case he seems not to be liable; though, possibly, if they have in Virginia a statute like that in England concerning fraudulent devisees, he might, even under those circumstances, be deemed liable. I know not how the fact as to the Virginia law is; and therefore, as well as because the inference is altogether a new suggestion, which would demand much consideration before it ought to be established, I consider this point of the case, it being uncertain whether he takes as heir or devisee, too doubtful to ground an opinion upon it.

I therefore proceed to the next inquiry—whether he is barred by the act of assembly? I admit, as strongly as any man can assert, that if this act of assembly is plainly unwarranted by the constitution, it is totally void as being passed without authority, the authority of the legislature being, in certain cases, restricted by a superior power which must of course be obeyed. The constitution is a law of the land, as well as an act of assembly, with this difference: that the former is a supreme law, paramount to all acts of assembly, and unrepealable by any. As in case there is a dispute whether one act of assembly is in force or another, the judges must decide this, and when the latter law is inconsistent with a former, say the latter is in force, because it has repealed the former, having authority to repeal it. So when the constitution says one thing and an act of assembly another, the judges must say the former law is in force and not the latter, because the former is a supreme law unrepealable and uncontrolable by the authority which enacted the latter.

The act in question has been contended to be unconstitutional, because it has been suggested that it is in violation of the following parts of the constitution of this state: The twelfth, fourteenth, and twenty-fourth sections of the bill of rights, which is declared to be a part of the constitution.

The twelfth section is as follows: "That no freeman ought to be taken, imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold liberties or privileges, or outlawed or exiled, or in any manner destroyed or deprived of his life, liberty, or property, but by the law of the land." This I believe is taken from Magna Charta, and simply means, as I understand it, that there shall be no violation of the laws of the land. This provision, in the barbarous and ignorant times in which Magna Charta was enacted, might be proper to restrain the excesses of arbitrary and unprincipled kings and nobles, who were every day trampling on the law; more especially as, even in more settled times, a dispensing power was alleged by many to be a part of the prerogative of the crown. In the present era of improved knowledge of law and liberty, it seems scarcely to have been necessary, though no principle is of higher importance; because no one would have the effrontery to contend that he had a right to violate the law. It is a part of the constitution, however, that must be sacredly observed; and I trust it is a principle that would have been equally respected if it had formed no part of it. If the law of the land does not in this case authorize judgment to be given for the defendant, in the opinion of this court, it will undoubtedly not be given.

The fourteenth section is in the following words: "That in all controversies at law respecting property the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the best securities of the rights of the people, and ought to remain sacred and inviolable." The expression here is rather indefinite, but at the utmost it can only mean that in all cases where trial by jury formerly took place such should be the mode of trial in future. To apply that to this case: In ejectments formerly, on the issue of not guilty, the trial was by jury; so it has been in this instance. The constitution, therefore, in this particular has been exactly observed.

The following are the words of the twenty-fourth section: "That retrospective laws punishing facts committed before the existence of such laws, and by them only declared criminal, are oppressive, unjust, and incompatible with liberty. Wherefore no ex post facto law ought to be made." This, from the construction of the whole clause, evidently relates to punishment by subsequent acts for things innocently done at the time, or then punishable in a different manner. The clause considers the words "ex post facto," as I conceive, to have that meaning; otherwise the conclusion is too large for the premises. In a great case now depending in the supreme court of the United States, argued last February, on the meaning of ex post facto laws, in the sense of the constitution of the United States, numerous and strong authorities were adduced to show that the expression "ex post facto" technically had that meaning. A majority of the judges appeared to be convinced of it, but upon the doubt of one the case was not decided. There are strong reasons why the expression should be confined to criminal and not to civil cases. No principle can ever justify the punishment of an innocent man; and a man is certainly innocent who violates no law in being. Neither can it ever be justified to punish a man not entirely innocent, in a different manner from the punishment prescribed and pointed out to him at the time his offense is committed. These are first principles of natural justice, a deviation from which will generally be found as impolitic as it is unjust. But in times of violent faction or confusion of any kind, men are often prompted, if they can, to destroy their adversaries under the color of the law. The numerous acts of attainder in England, and other arbitrary parliamentary punishments, show how necessary it was for a wise people, forming a constitution for themselves, to guard against tyrannies like these; but there not only is little reason to apprehend a legislative interference for the sake of unjustly transferring property from one man to another, but a constitutional provision to that effect would be found extremely difficult without interfering with some of the most necessary principles of legislation. A few instances will be sufficient to show this: 1. As to the roads. It is absolutely necessary in every country that there should be a power of laying out public roads. This of course must be done under the direction of the legislature. Suppose, in the opinion of the legislature, a particular road ought to be laid out; but one or two individuals who own land through which it must pass will not consent to part with any of it for that purpose. Are the public to suffer for want of such a road, or may not the legislature order the land they have occasion to make use of to be valued, and appropriate it accordingly, after paying or tendering the value? 2. In the case of fortifications. The erection of such in particular places might be indispensable for the safety of the country in defending it against a foreign enemy. Ought the possibility of such defense to be liable to be defeated by the caprice or disaffection of a single individual, or the legislature to cause the fortifications to be erected, taking the proper care to compensate the individual to the full value of the property and for any consequential injury arising from the loss of it? 3. So also in the case of light-houses. It is certainly the duty of every country, not only for the safety of its own citizens, but from motives of general humanity to all others, to erect light-houses on such parts of the coast where dangers to navigation may be imminent without such assistance. How defective would be that policy which should deprive a legislature of so useful a power, to the loss, possibly, of many innocent lives! 4. So also when it is deemed necessary to impose taxes. Is anything more common than to direct a distress upon the property of an individual, if his taxes are not paid, and if unpaid within a limited time, that the property either real or personal, as the case may be, shall be sold in order to raise the money? These are obvious instances, to which others might easily be added to show that a legislature would be deprived of some of its most essential and important powers, if its authority was so restricted that it could not take away property from individuals, in any instance, without the owners' personal consent, directly given for that purpose, even for objects of the utmost public concern, and after the greatest care to prevent any injury to the individual. It would therefore have been very unwise if the constitution had restricted the legislature in any such instance; and this consideration, combined with the little probability of such a power being abused, is a strong additional reason why the words "ex post facto" should be confined to criminal cases only, especially when there not only are no words that require a contrary construction, but the words themselves plainly point out the construction I have given.

It is, however, further urged by the counsel for the plaintiff that this act is contrary to natural justice, and therefore void. Some respectable authorities do, indeed, countenance such a doctrine—that an act against natural justice is void. Others maintain a different one, with at least an equal claim to respect. Under these circumstances, I can only consult my own reason; and I confess I think no court is authorized to say that an act is absolutely void merely because, in the opinion of the court, it is contrary to natural justice.

Two principles appear to me to be clear: If an act be unconstitutional, it is void. If it be constitutional, it is valid. In the latter case it must be admitted that the legislature have exercised a trust confided to them by the people. In doing so they necessarily are left to their own discretion, and it is to be presumed they will have a due regard to justice in all their conduct. It is, however, I conceive, left to them so far without control; and if they abuse their trust in the execution of an acknowledged power, they are indeed responsible, in the only way in which a legislature can be responsible, for not exercising their authority properly; but still, having exercised an authority confided to them, their act is legal in the same manner as a judgment given by this court would be, in a case confessedly within its jurisdiction, however erroneous the principles may be on which the court decided. The words "against natural justice" are very loose terms, upon which very wise and upright members of the legislature and judges might differ in opinion. If they did, whose opinion is properly to be regarded—those to whom the authority of passing such an act is given, or a court to whom no authority, in this respect, necessarily results? This case is surely different from an unconstitutional act which the courts must certainly declare to be void, because passed without any authority whatever. The constitution, by saying that the legislature shall have authority in certain cases, but shall not have in others, as plainly declares everything valid done in pursuance of the first provision, as everything void that is done in contradiction of the last; and it may surely be inferred that if, in addition to other restrictions on the legislative power, such a restriction as that in question was intended, so as to leave it to the courts, in all instances, to say whether an act was agreeable to natural justice or not, this restriction would have been inserted, together with others. All courts, indeed, as being bound to give the most reasonable construction to acts of the legislature, will, in construing an act, do it as consistently with their notions of natural justice (if there appears any incompatibility) as the words and context will admit; it being most probable that, by such construction, the true design of the legislature will be pursued; but, if the words are too plain to admit of more than one construction, and the provisions be not inconsistent with any articles of the constitution, I am of opinion, for the reason I have given, that no court has authority to say the act is void because in their opinion it is not agreeable to the principles of natural justice.

Admitting, however, that this is a ground upon which a court has authority to decide, I am of opinion that this act is not contrary to the principles of natural justice. We are to recollect that, for many centuries in England the establishment of perpetuities in landed estates has been deemed a great grievance. An estate tail, in particular, created by the statute de donis (which is undoubtedly a perpetuity, because by possibility it may last forever), has been considered a dangerous support of a high aristocratic interest attended with numerous evils both public and private, so much so that though the statute has never been directly repealed, yet successful evasions of it have been practiced, and some of them with the direct sanction of the legislature itself. If this act, therefore, has been in such discredit even in England, where there exists a government consisting of king, lords, and commons, of course a great aristocratical interest, nothwithstanding which it has been deemed too aristocratical even for them, well might it excite the jealousy and precaution of the representatives of the people of this state, assembled to establish a republican form of government, founded on the basis of political equality among all the citizens, and to which any aristocratical devices must be particularly detrimental. This subject, therefore, did not escape the attention of the convention who framed the constitution of this state; but they made the following provisions concerning it: 1. In the bill of rights (section 23): "That perpetuities and monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free state, and ought not to be allowed." In the constitution (section 43): "That the future legislature of this state shall regulate entails in such a manner as to prevent perpetuities." It may well be conceived that in the very critical period in which this convention sat, and considering the other important business they had to do, they had not sufficient leisure to attend to this subject, so as to make a provision for it in all its proper details. They therefore directed a future legislature to do it; but, by the anxiety they showed on the subject (declaring perpetuities and monopolies contrary to the genius of a free state, and directing the legislature in the manner above expressed), they showed their opinion of the existence of the evil, their earnest desire to remedy it, and that it was of a kind which in their opinion required the sanction of the constitution itself, and might not safely be confided altogether to legislative discretion to provide a remedy or not. It may therefore justly be considered that the legislature had the authority of the convention as to this object devolved on them, and consequently, that when the law passed which they were directed to enact, it should have the same effect as if the provisions in it had formed part of the constitution itself. The provision in the constitution would otherwise be nugatory and idle, since, had that said nothing on the subject, the legislature might undoubtedly have regulated entails as they pleased.

It is a known principle of law, in any ordinary case, that when any estate is created by virtue of a power, the party to whom it is conveyed shall be deemed to hold the estate under the power, and not simply under the conveyance itself. We know it is an invariable principle of equity (whose object it professedly is to decide on the principles of natural justice, when no express law interferes), that what ought to have been done shall be regarded as done. As estates of this nature are declared by the bill of rights to be contrary to the genius of a free people, and that they ought not to be allowed, and the legislature are directed by the constitution to regulate entails in such a manner as to prevent perpetuities, if either the difficulty of the case, the interference of other business, or the wilful neglect of the legislature occasioned a postponement of the remedy which it was the duty of the legislature to provide, it cannot be unreasonable to say, that when the provision was made, it should guard against any intermediate evils (if any had occurred), which had accrued contrary to the true intent and meaning of the constitution, in which the whole people had an interest, and the benefits of which they were entitled to, without the legislature being at liberty to withhold them. Upon a great scale the legislature may be considered as trustees, the people as the persons for whose benefit the trust was created. Ought they, therefore, to suffer any injury by any delay in the execution of the trust? They certainly ought not, if it were in the power of the trustees to prevent it. In this case, I conceive, the legislature, at the time they executed this authority, were to consider whether the evils which had happened in the mean time (if any had happened) required a retrospective remedy in order to defeat any mischief which a delay contrary to the intent of the constitution had occasioned or not. If it appeared to them that such a remedy was proper, to give the constitution its full effect, I conceive they not only had authority, but it was their duty to provide it; the whole regulation on this subject being by the constitution itself left to their discretion. If no such remedy appeared necessary they might make an ordinary act, to take place in every particular in future; but they viewed it in the former light, and their decision, of course, must be submitted to. The persons to be affected by this act who resided in the state, and were citizens of it, might derive more benefit from their share of the public property occasioned by the remedy against so great an evil, than loss by being deprived of a particular estate derived from so obnoxious a source. They, at any rate, partake equally of the benefits of the constitution with others who were parties to it, and consequently liable to all its advantages and disadvantages. Persons who are not resident in the state, but as citizens of other states are permitted to hold lands in it, though in some respects differently circumstanced, cannot expect to hold their titles upon a different footing from citizens themselves, and may possibly, in some particular instances, be compensated for the loss of one estate by the superior value of others, if they hold such, derived from the general influence of wise precautions for the public benefit. In a state of society properly regulated it must frequently happen that private and publis interests in some degree interfere with each other. In such cases is it not unavoidable, and agreeable to the very principle on which all governments are formed, that the former should yield to the latter? Yet, clear as this principle is, and necessary as in many cases it is that it should be enforced, many, from injudicious notions of liberty, speak of the rights of each individual as if he subsisted in a state of nature unconnected with any other mortal in the universe, and deriving no benefits from a well-constituted society, which are more than an ample compensation for any accidental sacrifice which the pubilc interest may occasionally require of a subordinate private advantage to a superior public good. These are considerations upon the supposition that the rights of the lessor of the plaintiff subsisted in full force under the statute de donis until the act of assembly in question was made. That, however, may well be doubted because there seem at least plausible reasons for suggesting that it was altogether taken away by the constitution, or at least by the act of assembly of April, 1778, c. 5. It will be immaterial to consider the effect of the former, because if the latter was not operative enough for the purpose, the former undoubtedly was not; and if the latter was, it was sufficiently early to establish the title of the defendant on this ground.

The provisions of the act in question, so far as they concern this subject, are as follows: "Whereas doubts may arise upon the revolution in government, whether any and what laws continue in force here: For prevention of which, be it enacted," etc., "that all such statutes and such parts of the common law as were heretofore in force and use within this territory, and all the acts of the late general assemblies thereof, or so much of the said statutes, common law, and acts of assembly as are not destructive of, repugnant to, or inconsistent with the freedom and independence of this state, and of the government therein established, and which have not been otherwise provided for in the whole or in part, not abrogated, repealed, expired, or become obsolete, are hereby declared to be in full force within this state." Though these words are altogether in the affirmative, they imply a negative because the act was expressly made to remove doubts "whether any and what laws" were in force, and of course to exclude from the construction of being in force all not specified. If, therefore, the statute de donis be not one of those intended by the legislature to be in force, it remained no longer in force after this act was made, even had it been so till then. Whatever doubt might have existed otherwise, yet the words of the bill of rights and the constitution themselves show that, in the opinion of those who framed them, this act was deemed inconsistent with the freedom and independence of this state. This act, therefore, was not one of those declared to be in force, and consequently, if no exception is to be made of this case in particular, it is to be deemed abrogated, at least from that time. There being special provision in the constitution concerning entails, any act on this subject might be deemed impliedly excepted from these general words if such estates then in being were to be entirely destroyed by it; but if they were not, the only effect such a construction could have would be to reduce them to their common law condition, that is, to make them fees conditional, by taking off the restraint of alienation which the statute de donis imposed, and which restraint constituted the whole danger from them which the constitution contemplated. If this view of the subject be proper, then, as this act was passed in April, 1778, when David Minge was alive, instead of holding an estate tail, as before, he held an estate called a fee conditional one, the property of which undoubtedly was, as he had then issue born capable of inheriting the estate, to alien the estate as he thought proper. His alienation, accordingly, to Gilmour and Hendric, under the deed of the 15th February, 1779, is (upon this ground) a complete bar to the lessor of the plaintiff, independent of all other circumstances in the case. I do not, however, confidently rely upon this principle; but whatever doubt may be entertained on that part of the case, I am clear in the former reasons I have urged, showing that the title of the lessor of the plaintiff (if he ever had any) was constitutionally taken away by the conjoint operation of the constitution and the act of assembly passed in pursuance of its express authority; and therefore that he must fail in this case as well for want of title as from pursuing an improper remedy.

I am althorized to say my Brother SITGREAVES [District Judge] concurs in this opinion; the consequence is that there must be judgment for the defendant.

JUSTICE OF PEACE—APPEAL—CASE TRIED DE NOVO.

Upon an appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace, the cause is to be tried de novo.

THE COURT said that the appeal suspended the judgment below, and the cause must be tried de novo, as if no judgment had been rendered.

PRIZE—VIOLATING BLOCKADE—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. Vessel and cargo condemned for an attempt to violate the blockade.

2. The court will take judicial notice of the fact that the shipper at Nassau, a neutral port, of a cargo captured as prize, for an alleged attempt to violate the blockade, is a person who is shown by the records of the court to have been actively engaged in trading to and from the blockaded ports of the enemy.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. A libel was filed in this suit March 2, 1863. The warrant of attachment and the monition issued thereon were returned by the marshal as duly served, on the 24th of the same month. A default was ordered therein by the court, and the ship's papers, with the proofs in preparatorio, and the proceedings in the suit, were, on the same day, submitted to the court for adjudication. The libel alleges the capture of the vessel and cargo by the United States steamer Victoria, on the 18th of February last, at sea, near Beacon Inlet, off the coast of North Carolina, and that the vessel and cargo are subject to condemnation and forfeiture as prize of war, and sent to this port for adjudication for that cause. There was found on board of the vessel, when seized, a certificate of British registry of the vessel, at the port of Quebec, to Thomas Norris, of that place, as owner, bearing date October 10, 1853. There are frequent changes of the command of the vessel indorsed on the registry, down to the date of

[2] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

November 20, 1860. The vessel had on board a clearance from the port of Nassau, for New York, dated February 10, 1863; bills of lading and invoices of the cargo, principally salt, shipped by Adderly & Co., of the same date, shipment and destination; also a letter of advice of like date, from the shippers to Messrs. Thomas & Holmes, of New York. No other papers relating to the voyage were produced from the vessel. The master, the mate, the cook and one seaman were examined as witnesses in preparatorio, on the 2d and 3d days of March instant. The master says that he was put in command of the vessel and cargo at Nassau, by Adderly & Co., residing there; that she was captured about twenty miles southeast of Wilmington, N. C.; that the master and crew (nine in number) were hired at Nassau about the middle of February last; that the lading was salt, copperas and drugs; that the voyage was to commence at Nassau, and end at New York; that he knew of no other destination; that he knew that Wilmington had been blockaded; that when he left Nassau, he supposed it was in possession of the United States; that it was under blockade at the time the vessel was captured; and that when the vessel was arrested she was steering westerly, towards the land, the wind being northeasterly. The mate says the vessel was captured about five miles from land, which was in sight; that he told the master the vessel was near land, but she was kept standing in; that he knew of the war and the blockade of Wilmington, but does not know what information the captain had; that the course of the vessel was altered when the steamer was first discovered; that she then went about again, and stood inshore, and then the master and crew abandoned her; that the captain ordered the vessel to be headed to the shore before he took to the boat; that he (the witness) does not believe the captain was bound on an honest voyage to New York, but believes he intended to run the vessel ashore and go on shore himself; that the captain ordered the wheelman to steer her for the shore; and that he (the witness) believes that the captain intended to run the blockade on this voyage. The cook states that the capture was made between seven and eight o'clock a. m., about five miles off shore, between Wilmington and Cape Fear, and that he knew that the coast was under blockade at the time.

This testimony presents the case of an English vessel procured for the alleged voyage by a house at Nassau, N. P., which house has been notoriously engaged with great activity, since the blockade has been imposed on the coasts of the Carolinas, in trading to and from the enemy ports in that vicinity, in violation of the blockade. That fact has been established by floods of evidence, so that the court cannot avoid judicially noticing its existence, any more than it can the proximity of that house and of its managers to the blockaded ports. The Apollon, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 374; Peyroux v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 342. They took the direction of this vessel, which had been previously registered in the province of Canada, and officered, manned, laded, and despatched her, without any documentary title to her or her service, and put her upon a voyage from Nassau to New York with a cargo brought from Canada to Nassau, passing by New York and specially adapted to the markets and wants of the rebels, and containing nothing which appears to be of any particular demand or attraction in the New York market. They furnished no evidence of the circumstances and necessity of the voyage performed. They ran the vessel and cargo directly from Nassau across to Wilmington and she was arrested heading in shore, between Cape Fear and Wilmington. No log-book or memorandum is found noting the course of the navigation or the cause of it. When pursued by the capturing vessel the master and crew of the prize abandoned her in a boat, and attempted to make the shore themselves and to have the vessel also run into the territory of the enemy. The mate testifies his belief that the vessel came on the coast with the intention of running the blockade. This is clearly the language and import of the whole transaction; and I am satisfied that the vessel was, when captured, navigated with the intention of violating the blockade, and is lawful prize of war. Decree accordingly.

CONTRACTS—BY TELEGRAPH—ACCEPTANCE—WHEN COMPLETE.

1. In "contracts by telegraph" the same rule as to acceptance prevails as in contracts by mail; the contract is completed when an acceptance of the proposition is deposited for transmission in the telegraph office.

[Approved in Haas v. Myers, 111 Ill. 424, 426.]

2. In case of a proposition by telegraph for the sale of certain goods, the market for which was subject to sudden and great fluctuations, an immediate answer should be returned, and an acceptance of such proposition telegraphed after a delay of twenty-four hours from the time of its receipt was not an acceptance within a reasonable time, and did not operate to complete the contract.

This action was removed from the state court and a trial by jury waived. The plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $2,151.50, with interest from September 20, 1875—a balance claimed to be due for oil sold to the defendant. The defendant, in its answer, alleges that on August 3d, 1875, a contract was entered into between the parties, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell and deliver to the defendant, at the city of St. Louis, during the said month of August, twelve thousand four hundred and fifty (12,450) gallons of linseed oil for the price of fifty-eight (58) cents per gallon, and that the plaintiff has neglected and refused to deliver the oil according to the contract; that the market value of oil after August 3d and during the month was not less than seventy (70) cents per gallon, and therefore claims a set-off or counter-claim to plaintiff's cause of action. The reply of the plaintiff denies that any contract was entered into between it and defendant.

The plaintiff resided at Minneapolis, Minnesota, and the defendant was the resident agent of the plaintiff, at St. Louis, Missouri. The contract is alleged to have been made by telegraph.

The plaintiff sent the following dispatch to the defendant: "Minneapolis, July 29, 1875. To Alex. Easton, Secretary Collier White Lead Company, St. Louis, Missouri: Account of sales not enclosed in yours of 27th. Please wire us best offer for round lot named by you—one hundred barrels shipped. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company."

The following answer was received: "St. Louis, Mo., July 30, 1875. To the Minnesota Linseed Oil Company: Three hundred barrels fifty-five cents here, thirty days, no commission, August delivery. Answer. Collier Company."

The following reply was returned: "Minneapolis, July 31, 1875. Will accept fifty-eight cents (58c), on terms named in your telegram. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company."

This dispatch was transmitted Saturday, July 31, 1875, at 9:15 p. m., and was not delivered to the defendant in St. Louis, until Monday morning, August 2, between eight and nine o'clock.

On Tuesday, August 3, at 8:53 a. m., the following dispatch was deposited for transmission in the telegraph office: "St. Louis, Mo., August 3, 1875. To Minnesota Linseed Oil Company, Minneapolis: Offer accepted—ship three hundred barrels as soon as possible. Collier Company."

The following telegrams passed between the parties after the last one was deposited in the office at St. Louis: "Minneapolis, August 3, 1875. To Collier Company, St. Louis: We must withdraw our offer wired July 31st. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company."

Answered: "St. Louis, August 3, 1875. Minnesota Linseed Oil Company: Sale effected before your request to withdraw was received. When will you ship? Collier Company."

It appeared that the market was very much unsettled, and that the price of oil was subject to sudden fluctuations during the month previous and at the time of this negotiation, varying from day to day, and ranging between fifty-five and seventy-five cents per gallon. It is urged by the defendant that the dispatch of Tuesday, August 3d, 1875, accepting the offer of the plaintiff transmitted July 31st, and delivered Monday morning, August 2d, concluded a contract for the sale of the twelve thousand four hundred and fifty gallons of oil. The plaintiff, on the contrary, claims, 1st, that the dispatch accepting the proposition made July 31st, was not received until after the offer had been withdrawn; 2d, that the acceptance of the offer was not in due time; that the delay was unreasonable, and therefore no contract was completed.

Young & Newel, for plaintiff.
Geo. L. & Chas. E. Otis, for defendant.

NELSON, District Judge. It is well settled by the authorities in this country, and sustained by the later English decisions, that there is no difference in the rules governing the negotiation of contracts by correspondence through the post-office and by telegraph, and a contract is concluded when an acceptance of a proposition is deposited in the telegraph office for transmission. See 14 Am. Law Reg. 401, "Contracts by Telegraph," article by Judge Redfield, and authorities cited; also, Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307.

The reason for this rule is well stated in Adams v. Lindsell, 1 Barn. & Ald. 681. The negotiation in that case was by post. The court said: "That if a bargain could not be closed by letter before the answer was received, no contract could be completed through the medium of the post-office; that if the one party was not bound by his offer when it was accepted (that is, at the time the letter of acceptance is deposited in the mail), then the other party ought not to be bound until after they had received a notification that the answer had been received and assented to, and that so it might go on ad infinitum." See, also, 5. Pa. St. 339; 11 N. Y. 441; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103; 48 N. H. 14; 8 C. B. 225. In the case at bar the delivery of the message at the telegraph office signified the acceptance of the offer. If any contract was entered into, the meeting of minds was at 8:53 of the clock, on Tuesday morning, August 3d, and the subsequent dispatches are out of the case. 1 Pars. Cont. 482, 483.

This rule is not strenuously dissented from on the argument, and it is substantially admitted that the acceptance of an offer by letter or by telegraph completes the contract, when such acceptance is put in the proper and usual way of being communicated by the agency employed to carry it; and that when an offer is made by telegraph, an acceptance by telegraph takes effect when the dispatch containing the acceptance is deposited for transmission in the telegraph office, and not when it is received by the other party. Conceding this, there remains only one question to decide, which will determine the issues: Was the acceptance of defendant deposited in the telegraph office Tuesday, August 3d, within a reasonable time, so as to consummate a contract binding upon the plaintiff?

It is undoubtedly the rule that when a proposition is made under the circumstances in this case, an acceptance concludes the contract if the offer is still open, and the mutual consent necessary to convert the offer of one party into a binding contract by the acceptance of the other is established, if such acceptance is within a reasonable time after the offer was received.

The better opinion is, that what is, or is not, a reasonable time, must depend upon the circumstances attending the negotiation, and the character of the subject matter of the contract, and in no better way can the intention of the parties be determined. If the negotiation is in respect to an article stable in price, there is not so much reason for an immediate acceptance of the offer, and the same rule would not apply as in a case where the negotiation related to an article subject to sudden and great fluctuations in the market.

The rule in regard to the length of the time an offer shall continue, and when an acceptance completes the contract, is laid down in Parsons on Contracts (volume 1, p. 482). He says: "It may be said that whether the offer be made for a time certain or not, the intention or understanding of the parties is to govern. * * * If no definite time is stated, then the inquiry as to a reasonable time resolves itself into an inquiry as to what time it is rational to suppose the parties contemplated; and the law will decide this to be that time which as rational men they ought to have understood each other to have had in mind." Applying this rule, it seems clear that the intention of the plaintiff, in making the offer by telegraph, to sell an article which fluctuates so much in price, must have been upon the understanding that the acceptance, if at all, should be immediate, and as soon after the receipt of the offer as would give a fair opportunity for consideration. The delay here was too long, and manifestly unjust to the plaintiff, for it afforded the defendant an opportunity to take advantage of a change in the market, and accept or refuse the offer as would best subserve its interests.

Judgment will be entered in favor of the plaintiff for the amount claimed. The counter-claim is denied. Judgment accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1875.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—LOCAL INFLUENCE AND PREJUDICE — WHO MAY MAKE AFFIDAVIT — FINAL TRIAL—TIME OF APPLICATION FOR REMOVAL.

1. The act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 558], as to the removal of suits from the state to the federal court, although technically repealed by the Revised Statutes, is therein substantially reenacted, and a party on complying with its provisions is entitled to a removal of the cause.

[Cited in Crane v. Reeder, Case No. 3,356.]

2. The president, and perhaps, the general manager of a railway company, is prima facie entitled to make the required affidavit in such a case.

[Cited in Mix v. Andes Ins. Co., 74 N. Y. 56.]

3. Such application may be made after a new trial on the merits has been granted and before the new trial has been commenced.

[Cited in McCallon v. Waterman, Case No. 8,675.]

The plaintiff [John Minnett] brought his action in the state district court; and after a trial upon its merits and a verdict in his favor, the court, upon the defendant's motion, granted a new trial, for reasons, as stated, that "said verdict is not justified by the evidence and is contrary to law." The defendant on February 13th, 1875, presented a petition for the removal of the case to the United States circuit court, embodying the substance of the language of the third subdivision of section 639, page 113, Rev. St. U. S., except that it states that there has been "no final hearing or trial of the cause." The proper security was offered, and the affidavits of the president of the company defendant, and its general manager, were made and filed at the time of filing the petition. The defendant's attorney, after these steps had been taken, served a notice upon the attorneys for the plaintiff of a motion before the state district court for the removal of the suit. In this notice he states that the defendant has filed the affidavit provided for by an act of congress approved March 2d, 1867. The motion came before the court, and after counsel for the plaintiff and defendant had been heard, the removal was ordered February 23d, 1875. The plaintiff now moves before this court for an order remanding the suit, for the reasons: 1. Because said cause was sought to be removed under Act 1867, c. 196, which act was not in force at the date of the presentation of the petition for said removal, and of the order granted thereon. 2. Because the petition, affidavit and bond presented to the state court were not drawn, executed or approved under or by virtue of any law of the United States in such case provided, in force and effect at said date. 3. Because no removal can or could be had of said cause after a trial thereof upon the merits. Other reasons were urged, but they are substantially embodied in those above given.

E. C. Palmer, for the motion.
Gordon E. Cole, contra.

NELSON, District Judge. 1. If the defendant complied with the law in force at the time it presented the petition, affidavits and security, it was entitled to have the suit removed, and the judge of the state court had no discretion in the premises. The petition makes no allusion to any particular act of congress, but states that the petitioner is a citizen of the state of Wisconsin, and the plaintiff a citizen of the state of Minnesota; alleges the amount sought to be recovered sufficiently large to give the federal court jurisdiction, and in terms embraces all that is set forth and necessary to be done under the third subdivision of section 639, Rev. St.

These statutes embrace all the laws in force December 1, 1873, as revised and consolidated; and section 639 contains all the provisions of the several previous acts relating to the removal of suits from the state to the federal court. The only change made is in the act of 1867, by transposition of the words in the phrase, "at any time before the final hearing or trial," so as to read, "at any time before the trial or final hearing."

The notice of the motion which was served upon the plaintiff's attorney states that the removal is demanded under the act of 1867, which was technically repealed at the time the defendant presented its petition. The right of removal, however, does not depend upon the contents of the notice of the motion for removal; and the state court, as before stated, could not withhold the removal if the existing law in regard to the petition, affidavits, and security was complied with. This court is also bound to retain jurisdiction of the suit under such circumstances.

2. In my opinion, the allegation in the petition, that there has been no final hearing or trial of the cause, is a compliance, substantially, with the third subdivision of section 639, which gives the right of removal at any time before "the trial or final hearing;" and corporations being within its purview, any proper officer—particularly the president, who is the head of the organization—could make the requisite affidavit.

3. The other question necessary to be determined is whether, there having been a trial upon the merits, the defendant is entitled to a removal of the action, a new trial having been granted. The statute requires the petition to be filed before "the trial or final hearing of the cause;" and it is urged that a trial on the merits prevents the removal of the case. "The trial" mentioned in the act, in my opinion, means, not "one trial," or "a trial," but a determination of the rights of the parties forever. When a new trial was granted, the suit was in the same position that it would have been had no trial taken place; the first trial had been erroneous—it had not been in accordance with the law, and there had been no such examination of the rights involved as was contemplated by congress in using the word "trial." Again "the trial" mentioned in the act means a final investigation of the rights involved in the court of original jurisdiction.

The terms "the trial," and "final hearing" are used by congress as having a relative connection—a reciprocal meaning—the former applicable to actions at law, and the latter to equity cases. The word "suit" embraces actions at law as well as equity cases, and the conjunction "or" connecting the words "the trial" and "final hearing" is used, as it often is, where it is sought to give an explanation or definition of the same thing in different words. Such must be the true construction of the law, for it is hardly probable that a distinction would be made between actions at law and equity causes, which would present a strange anomaly as suggested by Mr. Justice Swayne in Insurance Co. v. Dunn, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 225, that "in equity cases a final hearing only could take away the right of removal, while any trial, however interlocutory in its character, should have the same effect in an action at law." To avoid this the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, in Galpin v. Critchlow [112 Mass. 339], construing the law of 1867, which used the language "before the final hearing or trial," said the "'trial' appropriately designates a trial by jury of an issue which will determine the facts in an action at law, and 'final hearing,' in contradistinction to hearings upon interlocutory matters, the hearing of the cause upon its merits by a judge sitting in equity."

The supreme judicial court of New Hampshire, in Whittier v. Hartford Ins. Co. [55 N. H. 141], agree to the judgment in the Massachusetts case, and consider the reasoning in that applicable to the law as it appears in section 639, par. 3. With great respect for these courts, I cannot agree to their interpretation of the statute. In equity practice the term "hearing" has a well defined meaning, viz: "that stage or proceedings in an equity cause which corresponds to a trial of a cause at law; the hearing of counsel upon the pleadings and proofs." The qualifying adjective "final" makes this "hearing" one that absolutely ends the matter in dispute, and is explanatory of the words "the trial." This case is certainly within the spirit of the law, and in my opinion within its letter. The motion to remand is denied. Motion denied.

NOTE. Subsequently another ground was taken before the circuit judge, on which to remand the cause, viz: that the Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Company was a domestic corporation of Minnesota, but on examing the pleadings and the legislation of the state applicable to the question the court overruled the objection, referring to the case of Williams v. SALVAGE—DETENTION OF PROPERTY BY SALVORS—COSTS.

The ship P. fell in with the brig M. about 175 miles from New York. The brig had lost her masts, but had rigged jury masts, and was making progress towards New York, her destination. The P. took her in tow and towed her till near Sandy Hook, when a tug took her to New York, where she arrived five days after she was taken in tow. Part of her chain having been left on board of the P., was demanded of her, but the master of the P. refused to give it up, saying they should hold it till the salvage was settled. The value of the brig, freight and cargo, was $18,500. Held, that the service was not towage merely, but salvage; that $2,250 was a proper amount to be awarded, and that the libellants should not recover costs because of the refusal to deliver up the chain, such costs to be paid by the owners, unless the refusal was shown to have been without the knowledge of the owners, and, in that case, by the master.

[Cited in The Col. Adams, 19 Fed. 796; The Marie Anne, 48 Fed. 748.]

This was a libel by the owners and the master and crew of the ship Pacific to recover salvage for services rendered to the Minnie Miller. The Pacific fell in with the Minnie Miller about 175 miles from New York, dismasted and in distress. Both vessels were bound to New York. The ship took hold of the brig and towed her nearly to Sandy Hook, the service occupying five days. The brig's answer to the libel denied that the service was a salvage service, stating that, though she had lost her masts, yet jury masts had been rigged, by means of which the brig was prosecuting, and could have prosecuted, her voyage, and was not in distress. It was claimed, on behalf of the brig, that the brig was only bound to pay for towage, which she was willing to pay. The value of the brig, freight and cargo was $18 500. It appeared in evidence that a part of the brig's chain, which had been used in towing her, was left on board the Pacific and was brought by her to New York. A demand was made for the chain, but it was not given up, the master of the Pacific saying that they would keep it till the salvage was determined.

James K. Hill, for libellants.

W. A. Darling, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The facts proved in this action disclose a case of salvage service rendered by the ship Pacific to the brig Minnie Miller; and a proper reward to be paid therefor by the brig, her freight and cargo, I judge to be the sum of $2,250, the same to be borne by the brig, her freight, and the cargo, in proportion to their respective values. I give the libellants no costs because of the circumstances attending the detention of the brig's chain by the ship after a demand made therefor Courts of admiralty are always careful to see that in any case of salvage a proper reward is paid therefor, and they are not only willing but competent to protect salvors in their rights. There is, therefore, seldom, if ever, any excuse for the use of pressure of any kind to secure or even hasten a proper adjustment of the salvor's claim.

In the present instance there was no necessity for retaining possession of the chain, and it should have been promptly returned to the brig, instead of which it was detained, with the notice that it would be held till the salvage was settled, and it is still so held.

To mark my disapproval of such action, I refuse costs, and direct that, in apportioning the salvage, the libellants' costs be charged to the owner of the ship, unless it be made to appear that the captain detained the chain without the knowledge of the owner, in which case the master must bear the costs.

COLLISION—STEAMBOAT AND VESSEL—SPEED.

1. Where a tug coming into the channel of the Kill von Kull, above Staten Island, with a schooner in tow, met a steamboat coming from Newark Bay, and exchanged signals with her, but a collision ensued between the steamboat and the tow: Held, that the steamboat was in fault, for not getting to the east side of the channel, after exchanging signals with the tug showing that the latter was to go on the west side.

2. The tug was not in fault for keeping up her speed under the circumstances, nor the schooner in fault for not failing to cast off the hawser.

H. B. Whitbeck, for the steamboat.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover for damages done to the schooner Gillan, by being run into by the steamboat Minnie R. Childs, on August 1st, 1874, in the Kills. The schooner was being towed by the tug-boat R. P. Noble, upon a hawser some eighty feet in length, and was bound towards New York. The Minnie R. Childs was bound in the opposite direction, on a trip from Newark to Coney Island. The time of the collision was about 10 o'clock in the morning. The weather was clear, the tide flood, and there were no other vessels to interfere with the navigation. The place of the collision was between the stake-light and the lower end of the middle ground in the channel that runs from opposite Elizabethport, and between the middle ground and the Staten Island shore, where there was abundant room for vessels like these to pass in safety. The libellant charges fault upon both the steamboats. Each steamboat charges the other with being the sole cause of the collision, and the Minnie R. Childs charges fault upon the schooner.

Upon an examination of the voluminous testimony taken in the case, I deem it entirely clear that no fault can be imputed to the schooner. The fault suggested (which, by the way, is not made to appear in any pleading), is that she omitted to cast off the tow hawser when it was seen that the Minnie R. Childs was likely to strike her. But that manoeuvre would have been of doubtful propriety, to be thought of only at the last moment, and the failure to adopt it in the extremity is not a fault. It seems also to be apparent that there was no fault in the management of the tug. She turned the point of the middle ground as close as she could do with safety, and from that time until the collision, was bearing as strongly as she could for the west side of the channel, which extends about a half a mile from the point of the middle ground to the stake-light. She blew two whistles to indicate her intention to take the west side, as soon as the Minnie R. Childs appeared at the stake-light, which whistle was replied to by two whistles of the Childs, and the evidence is that those whistles were in accordance with the universal custom of boats passing up that channel on flood tide. I see nothing improper in the movements of the tug. The weight of evidence is that it is usual for boats going up in such trips to take the west side. The testimony is that any other course would have been dangerous, and it is conceded that her choice of the west side was acquiesced in by the Childs at once, for she answered by two whistles the two whistles of the tug. It is true the tug kept up her speed until the moment of the collision, but that was the only effort she could make to avoid the collision, and it was calculated to accomplish the end. From the time of exchanging signals until the accident, the Noble kept to starboard as much as possible, and she was close to the west side of the channel when the vessels struck.

The pilot of the Childs says he was close on the bar himself, not more than twenty-five yards from it, at the collision. It seems clear then that the collision must be attributed to the fault of the Childs, in that she did not keep further to east and so as to pass the tow to west in accordance with the signals that had been exchanged. The pilot of the Childs testifies that he saw the tug when she began to turn the lower part of the middle ground and at once gave one whistle; that the tug answered immediately with two whistles to which he replied with two whistles. This testimony shows conclusively that the Childs acquiesced in the course chosen, that she expected to take the east side and that the tow would take the west side. But for some reason the Childs failed to get over to the east side as is shown by the positions of the vessels at the collision. Under the circumstances it was the duty of the Childs to get over to the east side, so as to pass in safety, or if she could not do that to stop and allow the tow to pass her to port, as it would have done if the Childs had stopped before coming up to the tow. The pilot of the Childs says that he did not ring to stop until the Noble was just lapping the bow of the Childs.

It was suggested in the argument that the Childs in such shallow muddy water would not steer well, and that this is the reason for the failure to get over to east. If such be the fact it does not avail to relieve the Childs from responsibility for damage caused thereby. If she could not be steered she should have been stopped. There must be a decree in favor of the libellant against the Childs, and the libel as against the Noble must be dismissed with costs. Let a reference be had to ascertain the amount of the damage.

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1879.

MARITIME LIEN—DOMESTIC VESSEL—MATERIALS—PRIORITIES.

1. Materials were furnished in the state of New York to a vessel owned in the state, by three parties, F., D. & M. Specifications of lien were filed, as required by the statute of New York, first by F., second by M., and third by D. A few days after D. had filed his specification of lien, he filed a libel against the vessel to enforce his lien and the vessel was seized under the process. F. next filed a libel against her, and lastly M. filed a libel also. The vessel being sold and the proceeds not being sufficient to pay all the claims, the question of priority was brought before the court. Held, that the order of the filing of the specifications did not determine the order of the attaching of the liens.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and Benj. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The rule that claims should be paid in the order of the filing of the libels was too well settled to be disturbed in this district, notwithstanding the authorities elsewhere in favor of a payment pro rata.

In admiralty.

N. A. Halbert, for Delamater.
D. McMahon, for Fairbanks.
R. D. Benedict, for McCurdy.

CHOATE, District Judge. The libellants in these three several suits have furnished supplies and materials to the steamboat Minnie R. Childs, a domestic vessel, and their libels were severally filed to enforce liens therefor under the statute of the state of New York. The first libel filed was that of Delamater, June 26, 1879, the second that of Fairbanks, June 28, 1879, and the third that of McCurdy, July 1, 1879. The processes were issued and attachments of the vessel thereupon were made in the same order of time. The vessel has been sold and the proceeds are not sufficient to pay in full the amounts found due to the several libellants by their decrees, and the question is how the proceeds shall be distributed.

The statute of New York (Act April 24, 1862 [Laws 1862, p. 956]) provides that "whenever a debt amounting to fifty dollars or upwards as to a sea-going or ocean-bound vessel, or amounting to fifteen dollars or upwards, as to any other vessel, shall be contracted by the master, owner, &c., of any ship or vessel or the agent of either of them within this state for either of the following purposes, (enumerating them) such debt shall be a lien upon such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and shall be preferred to all other liens thereon, except mariners' wages." Section 2d provides that, "such debt shall cease to be a lien at the expiration of six months after the said debt was contracted, unless at the time when said six months shall expire, such ship or vessel shall be absent from the port at which such debt was contracted, in which case the said lien shall continue until the expiration of ten days after such ship or vessel shall next return to said port; and in all cases such debt shall cease to be a lien upon such ship or vessel, whenever such ship or vessel shall leave the port at which such debt was contracted, unless the person having such lien shall within twelve days after such departure cause to be drawn up and filed specifications of such lien," &c. The act directs that these specifications are to be filed in the clerk's office of the county in which the debt was contracted. It also provided machinery for the enforcement of the lien by the issue of a warrant to the sheriff of the county and subsequent proceedings in the state courts resulting in the sale of the vessel. By section 19 it was provided that "upon the distribution of such proceeds the various claims exhibited, which are found to be subsisting liens upon such vessel or the proceeds thereof, according to the provisions of this act, shall, with their respective costs, expenses and allowances, be ordered to be paid out of such proceeds, in the order of the delivery of the respective warrants to the sheriff."

It is insisted on behalf of the libellants Fairbanks and McCurdy that the claims should be paid in the order in which the specifications were filed; that the special provisions of the act relating to the order of distribution are not binding on this court; that they cannot be applied because there are no warrants issued to the sheriff; and that the liens are created by the filing of the specifications and the claims thereby become, in the order in which they are filed, liens against the vessel, each subsequent lienor taking an interest subject to such prior liens as have already attached by virtue of the act. It is further insisted by the libellant McCurdy, that if this is not the proper rule in this case, yet that the rule that has been followed in this district of distributing proceeds among libellants of the same class in the order in which their libels were filed is erroneous and that the true rule is that the proceeds should be distributed pro rata without regard to the time of filing the libels.

In this case the specifications were filed by Fairbanks, June 14, 1879, by McCurdy, June 16, 1879, and by Delamater, June 17, 1879. I see no ground whatever for the claim that the filing of the specification creates the lien, or that it first attaches to the vessel upon such filing. On the contrary, the statute is explicit that the lien exists before the filing of the specification, and upon the contracting of the debt. The filing is made necessary simply to prevent the lien already existing from being discharged. It has been held that the lien given by such a statute is held subject to the limitations contained in the statute as to its duration. The Edith, 94 U. S. 518, 522.

In respect to those parts of the statute which provide a remedy in rem in the state court and direct the distribution of the proceeds with reference to the order in which the warrants issue to the sheriff, it seems to me that they are not to be regarded as limitations upon the duration of the lien or conditions of its enjoyment. They cannot be literally applied, since there are and can be no such warrants issued. It seems to me that they fail altogether, and can have no application since the entire remedial machinery provided has been held to be unconstitutional and void. The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 580. Nevertheless, the liens declared by the statute, with what may properly be regarded as the limitations and conditions attached thereto, remain and are enforceable in this court. It is argued on behalf of the libellant Delamater that the issue of the process of this court is so far analogous to the warrant to the sheriff provided for by the act, that this part of the act is still controlling and applies to the process of this court under which the vessel is arrested. That provision may have been adopted to conform the remedies of lienors to those of lienors whose claims were enforceable in the admiralty court. Very probably this is so. And yet it seems to me that this is not one of the conditions attached to the lien itself as an essential part of it, but that it has to do with the remedy only. The same section defines the costs to be paid in the same order of priority to be the costs allowed in suits at law by the laws of the state. This is certainly not of the essence of the lien, nor controlling in this court.

It is still insisted on behalf of the libellant McCurdy that the ordinary rule of the admiralty court, which distributes the proceeds in the order in which the libels were filed, ought not to be applied here because the reason on which it rests does not apply. It is argued that the rule is based on the principle that the first libellant has the preference because he takes the first measure to enforce his claim, and that here the filing of the specification is the first act towards enforcing the claim. There seems to be no force in this suggestion, since the filing of a specification is not a measure taken for the enforcing of the lien or claim, but simply to keep it from expiring by lapse of time.

The lien given by the state statute is in effect only a right to have the vessel applied to satisfy the debt, a right similar in its nature to a maritime lien, and must be enforced as such. The rule giving priority to the lienors in the order in which their libels are filed is too well established in this district to be now questioned in this court, notwithstanding the very considerable weight of authority in favor of a different distribution. The Globe [Case No. 5,483]; The Triumph [Id. 14,182]. See The America [Id. 288]; The Fanny [Id. 4,638]. The proceeds should be distributed among the libellants in the order in which their libels were filed.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1873.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—ARREST UNDER STATE PROCESS—POOR DEBTORS—INJUNCTION.

1. Where a debtor has been arrested on execution of a state court, and has claimed the benefit of the provisions of the state law for the relief of poor debtors, before proceedings in bankruptcy, the circuit court will not enjoin the creditor from proceeding under his execution.

2. An arrest on execution before the arrested debtor's petition in bankruptcy, is not avoided by adjudication of his bankruptcy.

3. The filing by an execution creditor, after adjudication of the bankruptcy of the debtor, of charges of fraud in opposition to the discharge of the debtor, under the Massachusetts law for the relief of poor debtors, cannot be considered a suit at law or in equity to be stayed under the twenty-first section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)].

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.

[This was a bill in equity by Michael G. Minon against William T. Van Nostrand and others. From a decree of the district court dismissing the bill (Case No. 9,642) an appeal was taken to this court.]

C. R. Train and J. O. Teele, for appellant.

Burbank & Lund, for appellee.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The appellant was arrested on the third day of November, 1869, on an execution which issued on a judgment recovered against him in favor of the defendants, in the superior court for Suffolk county, on the fifteenth day of October, 1869. The debtor was taken before a commissioner of insolvency, and entered into a recognizance in due form of law, with sureties, conditioned as follows: "That said judgment debtor, Michael G. Minon, within thirty days from the day of his arrest, as above (in said recognizance) mentioned, will deliver himself up for examination before some magistrate authorized to act, giving notice of the time and place thereof in the manner provided by law, and appear at the time and place fixed for his examination, and from time to time until the same is concluded, and not depart without leave of the magistrate, making no default at any time fixed for his examination, and abide the final order of the magistrate thereon."

The appellant, subsequently desiring to take the oath for the relief of poor debtors, as provided by the laws of Massachusetts, made application to David H. Coolidge, a commissioner of insolvency; and a time and place was fixed for his examination, and the debtor and creditors appeared before the commissioner. The examination of the debtor was commenced, and the proceedings were continued from time to time to the twenty-fifth day of March, 1870. On the fourteenth day of February, 1870, the debtor filed his petition in bankruptcy, and on the sixteenth day of February he was duly adjudged a bankrupt. On the 25th of March he appeared before the commissioner of insolvency. Charges of fraud were filed by the creditors. The bankrupt proved the fact of his bankruptcy, and the proceedings thereon, and prayed that further proceedings under the execution be stayed, and he be released from his arrest, and allowed to go thereof without day. This prayer was denied by the commissioner. The bankrupt subsequently filed in the district court his petition for a writ of injunction against further proceedings by the creditors before the commissioner under the execution and the recognizance, and for his release from that arrest. The district court dismissed the petition, and the case is brought before this court by appeal.

The recognizance having been taken before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, the sureties could only be discharged by a performance of the conditions of the recognizance. While the arrest continues, all other means to obtain payment of the judgment are suspended. When an arrest has been made upon an execution, and the debtor has claimed the provisions of the state law for relief, prior to his application in bankruptcy, the circuit court will not enjoin the creditor from proceeding with his execution. Craggin v. Bailey, 23 Me. 104. The arrest is not avoided by the bankruptcy. The proceedings under the recognizance were instituted at the debtor's instance. The filing of the charges of fraud was only a proceeding incidental to the previous proceedings instituted by him, in the nature of an answer or plea in bar to the debtor's application. Parker v. Page, 4 Gray, 533. Such filing of charges of fraud cannot be treated as a suit at law or in equity to be stayed under the twenty-first section of the bankrupt act.

Decree affirmed.

Bill in equity. The facts of this case as alleged in the bill and admitted in the answer, were these: In October, 1869, the respondents [William T. Van Nostrand and others] recovered judgment and execution against the plaintiff [Michael G. Minon] in the superior court of the county of Suffolk. The plaintiff was arrested on the execution in November, and gave a recognizance before Mr. Coolidge, a magistrate duly authorized to act in the premises, to appear within thirty days thereafter for his examination under the laws of the commonwealth for the relief of poor debtors. He did so appear, and the examination was begun, and was afterwards continued from time to time, and was not concluded at the time of the hearing in this case. On the fourteenth day of February, 1870, the plaintiff was duly adjudged a bankrupt, and an assignee of his estate has been chosen and qualified. On the twenty-fifth day of March, the plaintiff again appeared before Mr. Coolidge, according to the tenor of his recognizance, and after proving to the satisfaction of the magistrate the fact of his bankruptcy, and the proceedings therein, prayed that all further action under the execution be stayed until the question of his discharge should be terminated in this court; and this being denied, prayed to be discharged from his arrest, which was likewise denied. The present respondents afterwards on the same day filed with said Coolidge charges of fraud against the plaintiff under the statute of the commonwealth, when the above-mentioned prayers were renewed and again denied; and the case has been continued to the present time. [It is further alleged that the charges of fraud are only cognizable in this court sitting in bankruptcy, and] [3] the bill prayed for an injunction restraining the respondents from proceeding further under the execution and recognizance, and that the plaintiff be suffered to go thereof without day and without further molestation, and for general relief. [The case has been conducted with great courtesy on both sides, and with a view of obtaining either here or on appeal a binding adjudication of the law upon the important points involved.] [3]

LOWELL, District Judge. I have already more than once decided that a debtor who is under arrest at the time his petition in bankruptcy is filed, cannot be relieved on habeas corpus. I came to this conclusion with reluctance; but it seemed to be the necessary construction of section 26, and the rule 27 of the supreme court, founded upon it, that the benefit of the writ was only for bankrupts arrested after they became such, —and I have not changed that opinion. [It may be that congress hesitated to interfere with a consummated arrest under the apprehension that the debt might thereby be discharged and not be revived if the bankrupt should fail to obtain his discharge in bankruptcy, or it may be that the case was overlooked.] [3] However I may regret the fact, a bankrupt seems to be left under such circumstances, to the operation of the laws of the state. Now the law of Massachusetts is very peculiar. It professes to abolish imprisonment for debt, but really does so only in case the defendant shows his poverty, and besides, comes within its definition of a fair and honest debtor. In respect to poverty and even to property concealed or conveyed on a secret trust for the debtor's benefit, it would seem that all such inquiries have, after bankruptcy, devolved upon the assignee, who is bound to prosecute them for the general benefit of creditors, including the judgment creditor, and that all examination which is for the advantage of the latter only ought to be dispensed with. This was always my view of the operation of the insolvent law of Massachusetts, but I have no power to require the state magistrate to adopt it, and to admit the debtor to the benefit of the oath. This want of power is admitted, but the plaintiff's contention is, that the specific charges of fraud which the statute of the state authorizes the judgment creditor to make, and which if duly alleged and proved, not only prevent the release of the debtor, but may subject him to punishment, are a new suit or proceeding against him which should be stayed to await the result of the proceedings in bankruptcy. By the law of the state charges of fraud, some of which may concern only the relations of the two parties to the suit, may be made by the creditor, in writing, pending the examination before the magistrate, and thereupon the defendant is to plead to them, and the case proceeds before the magistrate like a suit at law, with a right of appeal and of an ultimate jury trial. If final judgment is against the defendant he may be sentenced to the house of correction for one year, or to jail for six months, and shall lose all benefit of the law for the relief of poor debtors. This anomalous law has been decided to be constitutional and to be of a mixed character, mainly civil, but partly criminal. Gen. St. c. 124, §§ 10, 31–34; Chamberlain v. Hoogs, 1 Gray, 172; Parker v. Page, 4 Gray, 533; Stockwell v. Silloway, 100 Mass. 298. No public prosecution is provided for, and it seems to result from the whole tenor of the act that the defendant may end the case at any time before sentence by paying the debt and costs. Indeed his recognizance in case of appeal is to surrender himself within thirty days after final judgment, or pay the debt. The whole proceeding therefore appears to be framed with the view of giving the creditor an extraordinary hold upon a debtor whom he supposes to be fraudulent, but with whose conduct public justice has no particular concern.

I do not mean to be understood as throwing any doubt on the propriety of the decision which upholds the constitutionality of the law. The only question for me is whether the filing of such charges by a judgment creditor is a new suit which ought to be stayed under section 21 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)], which prohibits a creditor whose debt is provable under the act from prosecuting to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor, against the bankrupt, and requires "any such suit or proceeding" to be stayed to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge. It is argued with much force that "any such suit or proceeding" includes something more than any suit at law or in equity, and will cover any legal mode of enforcing payment of a provable debt. And I am very much inclined to think that this is so, and that a creditor who should undertake to prosecute a proceeding in admiralty or to seize on execution after-acquired property of the bankrupt, would be within the scope, as he clearly would be within the mischief of this section. If this be so, no creditor holding a provable debt can prosecute any proceeding for its recovery pending the bankruptcy. But the difficulty here is that all the original action is on the part of the debtor. He was under arrest before the proceedings, and the law has seen fit to provide that he shall not be released from such an arrest by habeas corpus. It seems to me to follow that equity cannot relieve him, because equity, in such a case, follows the law, and never undertakes to relieve against lawful arrests. Then the debtor applies for the benefit of the state law, and that unfortunately gives relief only in certain cases. If the debtor can show a compliance with that law he is discharged, otherwise not. And the charges of fraud, though declared to be a sort of suit at law and ordered to be conducted accordingly, are incidental, not to the recovery of the debt, but to the attempt of the debtor to take the benefit of the statute. They are, say the supreme court of Massachusetts, "intended to be used as an answer or plea in bar to the debtor's application for the benefit of the act. . . . No such charges can be made as an independent distinct substantive process against the debtor. They are only incidental to the previous proceedings commenced by him to obtain his release from confinement." Parker v. Page, 4 Gray, 533. If this be the true nature of these charges, it is not a suit or proceeding to recover a debt, but a counter plea to prevent the release of the person of the debtor lawfully in arrest, and I cannot hold that it ought to be stayed, because I should thereby give the debtor the benefits of the Massachusetts act, without its disadvantages, and be in effect saying that the creditor might oppose his taking the oath, if he would do it in a way which should be entirely agreeable to the debtor. The bankrupt having before his bankruptcy given a recognizance to take the poor debtor's oath, or surrender; and the arrest not being avoided by the bankruptcy, I have no right to avoid it indirectly by requiring the proceedings under it, and which are instituted at the debtor's instance, to be conducted in any particular manner, or to be stayed in part, for his further advantage. The filing of the charges does not appear to be a suit or proceeding for the recovery of the debt, more than would be the renewal of the execution, or the charging in execution, or any other matter incident to the lawful arrest. This is the whole gist of the case.

I do not say that the magistrate ought not to admit him to take the oath notwithstanding the charges. I have no right to meddle with this. There appears to be some reason to suppose that the justices of the circuit court may entertain a different opinion upon this question, and I need not say that I shall cheerfully acquiesce in any rule they may lay down. Until they have decided the point I must act upon my own carefully considered opinion. The answer of the defendants brings up the whole merits of the case, and my decision is intended to be final in this court, so as to allow of an appeal. Bill dismissed.

Case No. 9,643.

Ex parte MINOR.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 404.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

JUSTICE OF PEACE—CAPIAS—WARRANT OF ARREST—BEFORE JUDGMENT.

A justice of the peace in Alexandria county has no power to issue a capias ad respondendum, or warrant of arrest, for a small debt, before judgment.

Upon the return of the habeas corpus directed to Leonard Adams, a constable of the county of Alexandria, it appeared that Mr. Minor was in his custody under a warrant of arrest, or capias ad respondendum, issued by Adam Lynn, Esq., a justice of the peace of that county, directed to the said Leonard Adams, commanding him to take into his custody the body of the said Thomas Jefferson Minor, and him safely keep, so that he should have him before him or some other justice of the peace for that county, on the 5th day of June, 1823, to answer to Broders, Evans & Co. in a plea of trespass on the case for one dollar due by account. This precept was dated the 5th of June, 1823. By the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801 [2 Stat. 103], the laws of Virginia were continued in force in the county of Alexandria, as they then existed; and it was enacted that the justices of the peace, to be appointed under that act, should, in all matters civil and criminal, have all the powers vested in, and should perform all the duties required of, justices of the peace as individual magistrates, by the laws thus continued in force therein; and should have cognizance of personal demands to the value of twenty dollars, exclusive of costs. By the act of the assembly of Virginia of the 16th of January, 1801, the justices of the peace, as individual magistrates, were forbidden to issue even an execution against the body of the debtor, and a fortiori, a capias ad respondendum. This law was one of the adopted laws under the act of congress of the 27th of February, 1801 [2 Stat. 103], and continued in force in the county of Alexandria until the act of congress of the 1st of March, 1823 [3 Stat. 743], extending the jurisdiction of the justices of the peace in the recovery of debts to the amount of fifty dollars, which they are "to try, hear, and determine," and "to give judgment" "in the same manner and under the same rules and regulations, to all intents and purposes," as they were then "authorized and empowered to do when the debt and damages did not exceed the sum of twenty dollars, exclusive of costs." This act of March 1, 1823, does not designate the process by which the defendant is to be brought before the magistrate, but leaves it as it was before.

THE COURT, upon this view of the case, ordered Mr. Minor to be discharged from the custody of the constable.

SEAMEN—WAGES—NOT EARNING FREIGHT—MASTER'S CERTIFICATE.

Wages decreed upon the captain's certificate that they were due, though the vessel was in port, not earning freight. Such certificate the best evidence, no articles being produced.

This is a suit for seamen's wages, and a certificate of the captain is produced, in which he acknowledges the amount due. It is objected, that these seamen [Marcus Minors and others] had assisted the captain to carry the vessel out of her course. That these wages accrued in port, when the vessel was earning no freight, and was in the custody of the marshal. That all wages due up to the time of the vessel's arrival had been paid.

BY THE COURT. The only question is whether the owners of the vessel are answerable for the act of the captain in this instance. I think they are. Captain Dillingham was master of the vessel at her arrival here, on the 27th February last. On the 10th April the marshal took charge of the vessel, by order from this court. On the 1st of June following she was discharged from his custody. The actors in this cause continued on board the whole time, considering themselves bound to do so. They demand wages from 1st March to 1st June; and the captain certifies their right to them. They can produce no higher evidence, for they cannot compel the production of the articles; nor have the other parties brought them forward. Let the marshal sell this ship, or so much as may be necessary, and let these wages be paid, with costs of suit.

CORPORATIONS—TAXATION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—COMMERCE BETWEEN STATES.

1. A circuit court has jurisdiction of a suit by a citizen of another state against a corporation created by the state in which the court is held; notwithstanding the corporation also holds charters from other states.

[Cited in Howard v. American Dairy, etc., Co., Case No. 6,753.]

2. A state, acting through its legislature, may denude itself, by a contract, of power to impose taxes upon a corporation. But such exemption must be conferred expressly, or must appear by clear and necessary implication from the legislative act; it cannot be favored by presumption or intendment.

3. The payment by a corporation, to the government of the state, of a bonus for granting a charter of incorporation, does not protect the grantee of the franchise from all taxation, except such as the state has reserved a right to impose in the charter itself.

4. A tax upon the ordinary and lawful means of transportation is really a tax upon the thing carried; hence, a state law imposing a tax upon locomotives, passenger and freight cars, &c., being not merely a police regulation, but an expedient for raising revenue, involves a tax upon the passengers and freight transported, and is unconstitutional as interfering with commerce between the states.

In equity.

STRONG, Circuit Justice. The complainant is a citizen of the state of Massachusetts, and a stockholder of the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company, a body corporate of the state of Delaware, under the laws of that state. The defendants are the said company, and two other citizens of Delaware, one, the treasurer of the state, and the other, collector of state taxes. The facts of the case, out of which title to equitable relief is claimed to arise, are these:

By an act of assembly of the state of Delaware, passed 1832 [Laws Del. p. 107], and a supplement thereto, a corporation named the Wilmington and Susquehanna Railroad Company was created, with power to build and maintain a railroad from the boundary line of Pennsylvania and Delaware to the city of Wilmington, and thence to the line of the state of Delaware towards the Susquehanna, in the direction of Baltimore. The act provided that the company should pay annually into the treasury of the state a tax of eight per cent. on all dividends which might exceed six per centum on the capital stock actually paid in. This provision was subsequently repealed; and it was enacted that the company should pay annually into the treasury of the state a tax of one-quarter of one per cent. on the capital stock of four hundred thousand dollars. Under an act of assembly of the state of Maryland, enacted in 1831 [Laws 1831–32, c. 296, § 19], and under its supplements, another railroad company was created, called "The Delaware and Maryland Railroad Company," with power to construct and maintain a railroad from some point on the Delaware and Maryland line, to some point on the Susquehanna river: and it was provided in the act, that the shares of the capital stock of the company "should be exempt from the imposition of any tax or burden by the states assenting to said act, except upon that portion of the permanent and fixed works of said company which might be within the state of Maryland." About the same time (namely, in the year 1831), under an enactment of the legislature of Maryland, another company was chartered, called "The Baltimore and Port Deposit Railroad Company," with power to construct and maintain a railroad from Baltimore to Port Deposit, which is on the Susquehanna river. And in the same year (1831), the legislature of Pennsylvania authorized the incorporation of a company called "The Philadelphia and Delaware County Railroad Company," with power to construct a railroad from Philadelphia along or near to the route of the Baltimore post road, to the Delaware state line. The name of this company was subsequently changed to that of "The Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company." All the companies were organized, and their roads formed a complete line between the cities of Philadelphia and Baltimore, needing only a bridge across the Susquehanna, which was subsequently built by the consolidated company, at a cost of about one million and a half dollars.

It was doubtless the intention of the several legislatures to provide for a continuous line between the two cities. Subsequently, under the authority of legislative acts of the states of Maryland and Delaware, passed in 1835, the Wilmington and Susquehanna Railroad Company and the Delaware and Maryland Railroad Company were consolidated under the corporate name of the former, and became one body politic or corporate, the capital stock of the two companies being united. The act of assembly of the state of Delaware authorizing the consolidation, enacted that the holders of the stock of the united companies should hold, possess, and enjoy, all the property, rights, and privileges, and exercise all the powers granted and vested in the said railroad companies, or either of them, by it or any other law or laws of Delaware or Maryland. A similar act was passed by the legislature of Maryland. Thus the four companies became reduced in number to three. A further consolidation then took place. In the year 1838, the three companies, under legislative provisions of the three states named, were united and merged into each other, thus becoming one body corporate, with a common stock, and having as the corporate name, "The Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company." The act of the legislature of Delaware, under which this consolidation was effected, declared that "the respective companies shall constitute one company, and be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities which each and all of them possess, have, and enjoy, under and by virtue of their respective charters." The words of the Maryland act were, "that the said body corporate so formed shall be entitled within this state, to all the powers, privileges, and advantages, now belonging to the two first above named corporations;" those whose road lay within Delaware and Maryland.

Such was the origin, and such are the rights of the corporation defendants, so far as they need now be stated. The company have completed, and now maintain a continuous railroad route from Philadelphia to Baltimore, through parts of the three states named. Its capital stock consists of one hundred and eighty-six thousand and eighty-eight shares, fully paid, each of the par value of fifty dollars, although at its formation it had only forty-five thousand shares. Of these less than two thousand were held by citizens or residents of Delaware, on June 30, 1869. The entire length of the railroad is ninety-nine and seventy-six-hundredths miles, of which only twenty-three and three-hundredths miles are in the state of Delaware, and the value of the property locally situated in that state, is much less than twenty-three-ninety-ninths of the whole. Much the larger portion of the locomotives, passenger and freight cars, and trucks, belonging to the company, were used during the year 1869 for the purpose of transporting persons and freight in and by a continuous course of transportation, through, from, and into the state of Delaware, and very few were used exclusively within the state.

By an act of assembly of the state of Delaware, passed April 8, 1869 [Rev. Code Del. 1874, p. 41], the legislature imposed upon every railroad and every canal company, incorporated by or under any law of the state, and doing business therein, in addition to other taxes then imposed by law, a tax of one-fourth of one per cent. of the actual cash value of every share of the capital stock of such company, directing the tax to be paid to the state treasurer on the first day of the next following July, and on the first day of July in each and every year thereafter. The president and treasurer of every such company was required to furnish to the state treasurer, every year, a statement of the number of shares of the company, with an appraisement thereof, verified by his oath or affirmation, on the first of each July, and forthwith to pay the amount of the tax. It was provided, however, in the act, that where the line of railroad or canal belonging to any company liable to the tax, lay partly in the state of Delaware and partly in an adjoining state or states, such company should be required to pay the tax on such number of the shares of its capital stock as should be in that proportion to the whole number of shares of such stock, which the length of such railroad or canal within the limits of the state should bear to the entire length of such railroad or canal. By section 5 of the act, it was enacted, that if the president or treasurer of any company liable to the tax, should neglect or refuse to furnish the statement above described for a period of ten days after it was required to be furnished, the state treasurer should notify an assessor to assess the tax, and issue a warrant to a collector of state taxes to collect the same.

Section 1 of the same act imposed another tax upon the same class of companies, with similar provisions for its ascertainment and collection. It was a tax of three per centum upon the net earnings or income received by such a railroad or canal company, from all sources during the preceding year, with a proviso like that contained in section 4 already mentioned. This tax was required to be returned and paid on the first day of January in each year, or within thirty days thereafter.

Section 3 of the same act imposed yet another tax, with similar provisions for its return and collection. It enacted that every railroad company incorporated by the state, and doing business therein, should, on the first day of January in each year thereafter, within thirty days from such time, pay to the state treasurer a tax of one hundred dollars, for the use, in the said state of Delaware, of each locomotive belonging in whole or in part to such company, and at any time during the preceding year used by said company within the state of Delaware, and twenty-five dollars for the use in the state of each passenger car, belonging in whole or in part to such company, and at any time during the preceding year used by said company within the state, and ten dollars for the use in the state of each freight car of every description, and each truck belonging to such company, and at any time within the preceding year used by said company within the state. Section 6 of the act enacted that in case of default in paying any of the said taxes, a penalty of ten per cent. thereon should be added by the collector, and collected with the tax.

The complainant charges that all the taxes are illegal; that they are imposed in violation of the rights conferred upon the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company by its charter, and that they are forbidden by the constitution of the United States. On November 25, 1869, he inquired of the company whether they intended to protect his interests as a stockholder by resisting the collection of the tax; and stated that, as it was illegal, protection against it should be provided for. In response to his inquiries, the board of directors resolved, that while they protested against the illegality of the tax, they declined to take the responsibility of interfering to prevent its collection, leaving the stockholders at liberty to assert their rights as they might think proper. The complainant then filed this bill, praying that it may be decreed the corporation is not bound to pay the said taxes, or any of them, and that the act of the Delaware legislature, so far as it imposes them, and provides for their assessment and collection, is unconstitutional and void. The bill also prays an injunction upon the company against furnishing the statements required by the act, or paying the taxes, and upon the other defendants against taking steps for their collection.

At the argument it was queried whether the case was within the jurisdiction of the court, and whether, if it was, the case presented was a proper one for equitable cognizance. Upon these points I have no doubt. The complainant is a citizen of Massachusetts, and the corporation defendants are a corporation that owe their life to the state of Delaware, citizens, therefore, of the state, within the meaning of the judiciary act. True, they are also a corporation of Pennsylvania and of Maryland, but they are not the less on that account a corporation of Delaware. They have been sued in the circuit court of the United States at least twice before, and the fact that they are a corporation of three states has not been considered an objection to federal jurisdiction. The other two defendants are citizens of Delaware. And that the court has equitable jurisdiction of such a case as the present is not open to denial. That it has, repeated decisions show, and such has been the determination of the supreme court. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331. It was also submitted at the argument, with some hesitation, that the act of the Delaware legislature, passed April 8, 1869, was not intended to apply to this railroad company. As I have no doubt that it was, I pass this by, and come directly to the great question of the case: Is the act unconstitutional, so far as it imposes the taxes mentioned in it upon the corporation defendants?

The argument on behalf of the complainant is, that in the charter of the company there is an express exemption from liability to the imposition of any such taxes, and that the charter being a contract with the state, the act of assembly of 1869 is in conflict with the provisions of the constitution that inhibit the states from passing any law impairing the obligation of contracts. If it be the fact that the charter contains such an exemption, it must be admitted that the consequence mentioned follows, for it is too late to deny that the charter is a contract between the state and the company, and (however well it might be doubted, if it were an open question), it must be conceded that a state, acting through its legislature, may, by contract, in whole or in part, denude itself of power to impose taxes upon a corporation created by it. True, this is a step towards self-destruction, and one would think no state constitution gives such power to its legislatures. Yet it has more than once been decided; and many contracts made by states with corporations, that their property shall be exempt from taxation, in whole or in part, for limited periods or permanently, have been enforced. See cases collected in Home of the Friendless v. Rouse, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 430.

But I do not think the charter of this company contains any express exemption from liability to such taxation as the state of Delaware is now attempting to enforce. What is relied upon by the complainant in support of his assumption that the company is thus exempted, is section 19 of the Maryland act, incorporating the Delaware and Maryland Railroad Company. By that section, that company was declared to be exempt from the imposition of any tax or burden, by the states assenting to the law, except upon that portion of the permanent and fixed works of said company which may lie within the state of Maryland; and it was further declared, that any tax which should thereafter be levied upon said section, should not exceed the rate of any general tax which might at the same time be imposed upon similar real or personal property of the state, for state purposes. And when, by its act of July 24, 1835, the Delaware legislature consented to the consolidation of that corporation with its own company, "The Wilmington and Susquehanna Railroad Company," under the corporate name of the latter, it was enacted in the first section that the holders of the stock of the said railroad companies so united, as provided for, "shall hold, possess, and enjoy, all the property, rights, and privileges, and exercise all the powers granted to and vested in the said railroad companies, or either of them" by that act, or by any other law or laws of Delaware or Maryland. So a prior act passed in 1833, whereby the Wilmington and Susquehanna Railroad Company was authorized to form a union with such companies as then were or might thereafter be incorporated in the states of Pennsylvania and Maryland, for the purpose of constructing railroads in said states, so that the capital stock of said companies should constitute a common stock, enacted that the respective companies should "constitute one company, and be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities which each and all of them possess, have, and enjoy, under and by virtue of their respective charters." Hence it was argued, that because the Delaware and Maryland company was expressly exempted from any taxation, except upon its fixed and permanent property lying within the state of Maryland, the consolidated company, namely, this defendant corporation, is entitled to the same exemption in the state of Delaware.

To this I cannot assent. The argument, I think, misapprehends the statutes upon which it is built. True, the present company possesses all the rights and immunities which each of its constituents enjoyed before their consolidation. But what were those rights and immunities? Unquestionably they were only such as could be conferred by the states that created the corporation. The legislature of Maryland could not confer upon the corporations created by it any rights in Delaware; nor could it confer upon them any immunity from taxation upon their property within the state of Delaware—I mean any immunity from Delaware taxation; and it made no attempt to do so. Section 19 of the act of 1835 refers to exemption from Maryland taxation, and to no greater. That was the right, the privilege, the immunity, possessed by the Delaware and Maryland Railroad Company, and that right or immunity belongs now to the consolidated company. The language of the act authorizing a union of the companies is not that they shall, when united, have all the rights and immunities in this state, which each of them has in the state by which it was chartered. The purpose was not to extend any of the powers or privileges possessed by the several companies, but to give them, as they were, collectively to the united company. In other words, it was intended that the consolidated company might exercise, within Maryland, the rights of the Maryland corporations, and enjoy their privileges, and, within Pennsylvania, possess the rights and privileges of the former Pennsylvania company. Such I understand to have been the construction adopted by the supreme court in Philadelphia & W. R. Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 376. The act of Maryland which authorized the two companies of that state to unite with the companies of the other states, enacted that the new corporation—that is, the consolidated one—should be entitled, within that state, to all the powers and privileges and advantages, then belonging to the two Maryland corporations. In commenting upon this, Chief Justice Taney remarks as follows: "Now as these companies held their corporate privileges under different charters, the evident meaning of this provision is, that whatever privileges and advantages either of them possessed, should in like manner be held and possessed by the new company, to the extent of the road they had respectively occupied before the union; that it should stand in their place and possess the powers, rights, and privileges they had severally enjoyed in the portions of the road which had previously belonged to them." I hold, therefore, that there is in the charter of the present defendant corporation, no express exemption from liability to taxation by the state of Delaware.

And I can find nothing in any of the legislative acts relative to this company (viz: acts that gave it its existence), which, in my opinion, would justify me in holding it impliedly exempt from such taxation. Any implication, to have such an effect, must be a necessary one; every presumption is against it. The right to tax all property of natural and artificial persons within a state is an attribute of state sovereignty. Conceding now, as I must, in view of past decisions, that it may be partially surrendered, it must still be ruled that as the right is essential to the existence of the body politic, nothing less than that which is equivalent to an express surrender of it, by a binding contract, will avail to enable any person or corporation successfully to assert an exemption from liability to its exercise. Without attempting to cite even a tithe of the cases in which this principle has been asserted, I mention two: Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 503; Railroad Co. v. Maryland, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 376.

What is relied upon by the complainants as raising an implication of exemption are the following provisions of the acts already mentioned. By the Delaware act of June 18, 1832, which incorporated the Wilmington and Susquehanna Railroad Company, the capital stock was defined to be four hundred thousand dollars, and the company was required to pay annually into the treasury of the state a tax of eight per cent. on all dividends which might exceed six per cent. on the capital stock actually paid in. By the supplement to this act, passed July 24, 1836, this provision respecting a tax on dividends was repealed, and it was enacted that the company should pay annually into the treasury of the state a tax of one-quarter of one per cent. on the capital stock thereof, of four hundred thousand dollars, the tax to be paid semi-annually. By a further supplement, passed June 27, 1836, the company was authorized to increase its capital stock to an extent not exceeding three hundred thousand dollars, with a proviso that the right of taxing the said sum when it should become a part of the capital stock should be reserved to the legislature. As all the privileges and immunities of this company have devolved upon the now existing company, it is argued that the stipulation that the Wilmington and Susquehanna Company should pay a tax of one-quarter of one per cent. on its capital of four hundred thousand dollars amounts to a contract that it shall not be liable to further taxation; and that, consequently, the present defendant corporation is protected to that extent.

To this I cannot accede. The act of 1835 does not declare that no other taxation shall be imposed, or that the power of the state is exhausted; nor is such the necessary implication from what was said. Certainly it is not to be inferred from the imposition of a tax that no additional tax shall be laid; and I cannot perceive that it makes any difference whether the tax is imposed by general law, or reserved in a contract obtained from the state. All persons dealing with the state are presumed to know the character of the party with whom they are dealing; and, if they are obtaining a grant of a franchise, that the grant is always construed strictly against the grantee. In Com. v. Easton Bank, 10 Pa. St. 442, it was decided, that a bank which had been chartered under a general law that prescribed the payment of a specified tax on its dividends, was subject to a later general law increasing the rate of taxation, and that the later law, as applied to the bank was constitutional.

I agree that the reservation in the act of 1836, of a right to tax the additional stock authorized, tends to awaken suspicion that the legislature had some doubts whether, without the reservation, any tax could be imposed additional to that spoken of in the act of 1835. But this is not enough to overcome the presumption that there was no intention in either act to destroy the right of the state to prescribe such taxation as its necessities might require.

It has been argued that when a charter has been granted to a company, and a bonus has been exacted for it, the franchises and property of the company cannot be taxed any further than is provided in the charter, because, if I understand the argument correctly, the company is a purchaser of its rights in such a case. If this were so, the argument does not apply to the case in hand, for no bonus was exacted from this company. It cannot be said that the tax laid of one-quarter of one per cent. was in any proper sense a stipulation for a bonus. But I do not agree that a company which has paid a bonus for its charter, is thereby freed from liability to taxation. There is no reason that will bear examination for any such doctrine. If there is a bonus paid, it is only a part of the price paid for the franchise granted. It is measurably the consideration for the state's contract. But every charter to an improvement company is based upon a consideration given, or to be given, by the grantee. If it were not so it would not be a contract. It may not be a pecuniary consideration paid into the state treasury. It may be money expended for a public use, the construction of a highway, or something in which the public has an interest. What matters it then, that the payment of a bonus makes the grantee of a franchise a purchaser, when all grantees of corporate franchises are purchasers? There is a consideration given in all cases. The quantum of the consideration is quite immaterial. The grantee of land from a state is commonly a purchaser for a consideration paid. He holds his title by contract. No one ever doubted that he takes the land subject to taxation. Why should it be otherwise with the grantee of a franchise? Land is no more property than a franchise. This has often been decided. Both are subject to the right of eminent domain. Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 507; 17 Conn. 454; 3 Paige, 45. Both in grants of land and in grants of franchises, the subjects of the grant are understood to be held under the government, not against it, and, of course, they are subordinate to the powers of the government, except so far as those powers have been unmistakably relinquished.

And I do not find that the authorities sustain the doctrine that the payment of a bonus for a charter protects the grantee of a franchise from all taxation, except such as the state has reserved in the charter itself a right to impose. Ohio Bank Cases, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 369, and 18 How. [59 U. S.] 331, certainly decide no such thing. In those cases it appeared there had been an express exemption, and what would have been the effect of a bonus paid was not considered. What was decided in Jefferson Branch Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 436, was, that the charter of a bank is a franchise not taxable as such, if a price has been paid for it, which the legislature has accepted, with the declaration that it is to be in lieu of all other taxation. On the other hand, in Bank of Pennsylvania v. Com., 19 Pa. St. 144, where it appeared that by the charter of a bank it had been required to pay a very large bonus, it was, nevertheless, subject to an increased tax subsequently imposed. It was ruled that the bank acquired no privilege, exemption, or immunity, under its charter, except what was given expressly and unequivocally; that corporate privileges are never implied; that the legislature can only disarm the state of any portion of the sovereign power which belongs to her, by words showing that to be her intention so plainly that they cannot be misunderstood; that the taxing power is an incident of the state's sovereignty, and that the state does not lose it by granting a charter which says nothing on the subject. This was said of a charter that exacted a bonus of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The case of Gordon v. Appeal Tax Court, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 133, has been called to my attention. It must be admitted that Mr. Justice Wayne, who delivered the opinion of the court, seems to have thought the acceptance of a proffered bank charter, which requires the payment of a bonus, constitutes a contract that binds the state not to impose any further tax upon the franchise granted, though not interfering with the right to tax the capital stock of the company. In answer to the question, "Why, when bought, the franchise, as it becomes property, may not be taxed as land is, which has been bought from the state?" he said, "The reason is that every one buys land subject in his own apprehension to the great law of necessity that we must contribute from it and all of our property, something to maintain the state; but as to a franchise for banking, when bought, the price is paid for the use of the privilege while it lasts, and any tax upon it would be substantially an addition to the price." I confess that I do not feel the force of this attempted distinction. I do not see why, if a tax is an addition to the price in one case, it is not in the other. The truth is, it is in neither; for the purchaser in neither case has bought anything more than a right to enjoy the subject of the grant subordinately to the constitutional claims of the government. That is all that is meant by property held in civil society. But the remarks of Mr. Justice Wayne upon the subject were obiter dicta. The thing decided in the cause was that the state of Maryland could not impose a tax, not upon the bank either for its franchise or its capital, but upon its stockholders for the shares held by them individually, the charter of the bank having been granted in consideration of a bonus paid, and containing an express stipulation that the faith of the state was pledged not to impose upon the bank any further tax or burden during the continuance of its charter under the act.

My attention has been directed to no case which maintains the doctrine for which the complainants contend. It is sustained neither by reason nor authority. If, therefore, it be true (which I do not concede) that the clause in the Delaware act of assembly, passed July 24, 1835, which imposed on the Wilmington and Susquehanna Railroad Company a tax of one-quarter of one per cent. on its capital stock, was the exaction of a bonus, it does not, in my opinion, deprive the state of the power to levy upon the corporation defendant in this case additional taxes.

I come, then, to the conclusion that there is nothing in the act of assembly of April 8, 1869, so far as it imposes upon the company an additional tax of one-fourth of one per cent. on the cash value of its capital stock, and a tax of three per cent. on its net earnings, that is in conflict with the constitutional inhibition that no state shall pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts. With the fairness of such taxation I have nothing to do. The question before me is exclusively one of legislative power, and I think the legislature has not thus far transcended its legitimate authority.

The remaining question is attended with more difficulty. I refer to the legality of the tax imposed by section 3 of the act. That section exacts from the company the payment every year of a tax of one hundred dollars for the use in the state of each locomotive, owned in whole or in part by the company, and at any time during the preceding year used by the company, within the state. A similar tax, though less in amount, is imposed for the use in the state of each passenger, freight, and truck car; for the use of the rolling stock generally. This is not a tax upon the property of the company, nor upon its franchise generally. It is not a tax upon the locomotives or the cars. It is called a tax upon their use in the state; but it seems to be rather a license fee exacted for the privilege of using rolling stock. Can such a burden be imposed? I have said the franchise can be taxed as property, and that the property acquired or held under it is taxable; but it may be doubted whether such an exaction as this can be regarded as a tax either on the franchise or on the property of the company. Can the state, after having granted to the complainants the right to run locomotives in and through its territory freely, and also the right to use all the ordinary means of conveying freight and passengers, compel the payment of license fees for the use of those ordinary means of transportation, and that not for police purposes? Can it say to the grantees of this franchise, "True, you have purchased the right to use locomotives and cars; but if you use them you shall pay an additional price"? And is not a license fee thus exacted an additional price? I do not propose, however, to answer these questions or to decide that such an exaction is or is not an impairing of the obligation of the contract between the company and the state, for, in my opinion, the law of the state that attempts to impose this tax or duty is invalid for other reasons.

In the statement of facts to which the parties have agreed, I find the following. It is agreed "that much the larger portion of the locomotive engines, passenger cars, freight cars, and trucks, belonging to the Philadelphia, Wilmington, and Baltimore Railroad Company, were used during the year 1869 (the year for which this tax is attempted to be collected), on the aforesaid main line of railroad of the said company, extending from the city of Philadelphia, in the state of Pennsylvania, through the state of Delaware to the city of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, and for the purpose of transporting persons and property in and by a continuous course of transportation through, from, and into the said state of Delaware; that a number of engines, passenger and freight cars, and trucks, were used during the said year, on the main line from Philadelphia to a point about a mile beyond Wilmington, and thence on the line of railroad known as the 'Peninsular Line,' extending through Delaware and a part of the eastern shore of Maryland to Christfield, and the several branches therefrom, and that very few of either the engines, cars, or trucks, of the said company, were used exclusively within the state of Delaware during the year 1869."

It is, therefore, admitted, that the tax or license fee is laid upon the use of the locomotives, cars, &c., mainly employed in transporting persons or property through the state from other states, or into it, or out of it. Such an imposition is, in my opinion, a regulation of commerce between states. It is a prescription that passengers and merchandise shall not be carried through the state except upon certain conditions. If the tax can be imposed at all, it may be to any extent. It has often been said that when a right to tax exists it is unlimited by anything but the discretion of the legislature that imposes it. This, of course, is to be understood as applying only to cases where the state has not by contract restricted its power. Said Chief Justice Marshall, in McCullough v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 316: "An unlimited power to tax involves necessarily a power to destroy, because there is a limit beyond which no institution and no property can bear taxation. A question of constitutional power can hardly be made to depend on a question of more or less. If the states may tax, they have no limit but their discretion, and the bank must, therefore, depend on the discretion of the state for its existence." If this is so, the power to tax the use of all means or instruments of conveyance of persons or property through the state is the same as a power to prevent such use entirely. There is only a difference in the extent of its exercise.

Now, I think it can hardly be maintained that a law, declaring that merchandise and passengers shall not be carried on a public highway by locomotives or cars, from Philadelphia through the state of Delaware into Maryland, would not be a manifest regulation of inter-state commerce, quite as truly such as was the embargo of 1807 a regulation of foreign commerce. And if the enactment of such a law would be beyond the constitutional power of a state, the act of the Delaware legislature, of which the plaintiffs complain, must be equally so, for it differs only in degree. And it is not the less a commercial regulation, because it does not discriminate between transportation exclusively domestic and that which extends into other states. If a state chooses to exact conditions for allowing the passage or carriage of persons or freight through it into another state, the nature of the exaction cannot be changed by adding to it similar conditions for allowing transportation wholly within the state. I need hardly say, that a tax upon the ordinary and lawful means of transportation is practically a tax upon the thing transported.

Holding, then, as I do, that the Delaware statute of April 8, 1869, was an attempted regulation of commerce among the states, I come next to the question whether it was beyond the power of the state to make. I shall not enter at large upon a discussion of the much debated question, how far the power given to congress by the constitution to regulate commerce among the states is exclusive. Certain it is, that in the earlier decisions of the supreme court it was said to be unlimited, and so exclusively vested in congress that no part of it can be exercised by a state, except the power to regulate commerce completely internal; that is, entirely within a single state. Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1; and the Passenger Cases, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 283.

I am aware that it has often been argued, and sometimes intimated in decisions, that so far as congress has not legislated on the subject, the states may regulate commerce, at least internal commerce. Of this I remark in passing, that if they can, it is difficult to see why they may not add regulations to foreign commerce beyond those made by congress, for the power over both is vested in the federal legislature by the same words. But I apprehend it will be found on examination that the cases that have sustained state laws alleged to have been regulations of inter-state commerce have been those that related to bridges or dams across streams wholly within a state, or other kindred subjects—things only in a restricted sense commercial subjects. Wilson v. Blackbird Creek Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 250; Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 713. They are exceptional. The subjects are such as in the last mentioned case it is said "can be best regulated by rules and provisions suggested by the varying circumstances of different localities, and limited in their operation to such localities respectively." But, without pursuing this subject further, it may safely be said that none of them are like the present. They admit, and some of them assert, that wherever subjects of the power to regulate commerce are in their nature national, or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may justly be said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by congress. Surely passage and transportation through a state are of this nature. If not, it is unfortunate. It is of national importance that in regard to such subjects there should be but one regulating power, for if one state can directly tax persons and property passing through it, or indirectly, by taxing the use of means of transportation, every other may; thus commercial intercourse between states remote from each other may be destroyed. The produce of Western states may be effectually excluded from Eastern markets; for though it might bear the imposition of a tax by one state, it would be crushed under the weight of many.

I have already protracted this opinion to such a length that I do not feel justified in referring to many of the decided cases. In Almy v. California, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 169, it was ruled by the supreme court that a law of the state imposing a stamp duty upon bills of lading for gold or silver transported from that state to any port or place out of the state, was substantially a tax upon the transportation itself, and was unconstitutional. It is true the decision was rested on the ground that it was a tax upon exports; and, subsequently, in Woodruff v. Parham, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 123, the court denied the correctness of the reasons given for the decision; but they said at the same time the case was well decided for another reason, viz: that such a tax was a regulation of commerce—a tax imposed upon the transportation of goods from one state to another, over the high seas, in conflict with that freedom of transit of goods and persons between one state and another, which is within the rule laid down in Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 35, and with the authority of congress to regulate commerce among the states. In the very recent case of Crandall v. Nevada, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 35, it was held that a special tax imposed by the state on railroad and stage companies for every passenger carried out of the state by them, was a tax on the passenger for the privilege of passing through the state by ordinary modes of travel, and not simply a tax on the business of the companies. Hence it was ruled that the power of a state to impose such a tax is inconsistent with rights conferred by the constitution on the federal government and on the people, and consequently that no state can lay such a tax. The majority of the court, indeed, declined to put their decision upon the ground that the tax was a regulation of inter-state commerce, and as such, beyond the reach of the state, but all the judges agreed that the state law was unconstitutional and void. The chief justice and Mr. Justice Clifford thought the judgment should have been placed exclusively on the ground that the act of the state legislature was inconsistent with the power conferred upon congress to regulate commerce among the several states, and I do not understand that the other members of the court held decisively that it was not thus inconsistent. The case, in any view of it, decides that a state cannot directly or indirectly tax persons for passing through or out of it. That is enough for the case I have before me. The Delaware statute of April, 1869, does indirectly levy a tax upon both persons and property for transit through the state, into it, and out of it. It is, therefore, in my opinion, so far in conflict with the constitution of the United States.

I shall, therefore, enjoin against any steps for the assessment, collection, or payment of the tax prescribed by section 21 of the act of April 8, 1869, namely, the tax for the use of locomotives, passenger cars, freight cars, and trucks, and I shall refuse the injunction prayed for to prevent the collection and payment of the tax prescribed by section 15, upon the actual cash value of every share of the capital stock of the company defendant, and I shall also refuse an injunction against the collection and payment of the tax prescribed by section 20 upon the net earnings or increase of the company.

Decree accordingly.

MINTURN v. LARUE et al.

[1 McAll. 370.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. July Term, 1858.[2]

FERRY—STATUTORY RIGHT—POWERS BY IMPLICATION—MONOPOLY.

1. Equity will protect by injunction a statutory right, where the title of complainant is free from doubt.

2. Where the legislature has granted the franchise of constructing and keeping a ferry, no powers will be construed to have been given by implication, unless of a direct character. None not so derived will be conceded, except by the express language of the law.

3. A monopoly will never be awarded except by implication of a most direct and immediate character, and as necessarily annexed to powers expressly granted.

[Cited in State v. Black River Phosphate Co., 32 Fla. 82, 13 South. 648.]

The bill in this case was filed praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants [Larue and others] from infringing upon an alleged exclusive franchise of the complainant in a ferry between the town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco.

Hoge & Wilson and E. W. F. Sloan, for complainant.

Gregory Yale and Crockett, Baldwin & Crittenden, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. The bill in this case is exhibited in behalf of Edward Minturn, a citizen of the state of New York, who alleges himself to be the proprietor of a ferry established across the Bay of San Francisco, with its termini at the town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco. The bill prays for an injunction against the defendants, who, it is alleged, are infringing the exclusive privileges which complainant claims to hold in the said ferry. A motion is made upon the bill and affidavits filed by both parties, for the issue of the writ prayed for. In the affidavits of both parties are introduced matters collateral to the merits, and which cannot be subjects of legitimate consideration in the discussion of this case. Instead of being distinct affirmations or denials of facts material to the issue, they are argumentative, denunciatory, and partake more of the character of written discussions, than of sworn statements of facts constituting the true merits of the cause. Perhaps the appropriate course would have been for the court to have suppressed them as tending to introduce confusion, and constitute a dangerous precedent in the practice of a court of chancery. But as neither party moved for their suppression, content with calling the attention of the court to the character of these documents, it was agreed by both parties that the affidavits should be read; the propriety of the admission of them, or portions of them, discussed on the final argument of the motion, and the disposition of them left to the court. Now, there is a large proportion of these documents the court feels bound to discard from its consideration. Whether the charter of the town of Oakland was obtained by fraudulent practices from the legislature of this state? Whether the ordinance of the trustees of the town of Oakland, passed for the establishment of the ferry, was the result of conspiracy? Whether the contract between the town of Oakland and Carpentier, the assignor of complainant, was the offspring of fraudulent connivance? Whether the ferry has been so grossly mismanaged as to constitute an imposition on the public? Whether the proprietorship of the ferry has been a source of profit or not? Whether all good citizens demand that the monopoly of complainant should be arrested? Whether public opinion among the citizens of Oakland emphatically requires it to be done? These matters, and all akin to them, which have been embodied in the affidavits, or directly intimated in them, must be disregarded, and this case decided by an application of well-settled legal principles to the issue made. The complainant asks for the extraordinary interposition of this court for the protection of what he considers a legal statutory right; and if given, it must be by the application of principles, independent of all other considerations. He claims as assignee of one Charles Minturn, himself the assignee of one Edward R. Carpentier, who is the alleged grantee of the ferry from the town of Oakland.

The defendants, independently of the defects alleged by them to exist in the title of the complainant, set up by way of defense, a claim under a direct transfer to them of the premises in dispute, from the town of Oakland, subsequent in date to the assignment to complainant by Charles Minturn. They also set up as a defense, the fact, that the steamer they are running has been duly licensed and enrolled for the coasting trade, under the laws of the United States, and as such is entitled to navigate the waters of the Bay of San Francisco. In the view the court entertains of this case, it will be unnecessary to investigate the character of this latter defense. The complainant Minturn, contends that the documentary title exhibited, vested in him an exclusive privilege to the ferry for the term of twenty years from the date of the contract between the town of Oakland and the said Carpentier. That such contract, under which he claims, vested in him such an interest as excludes any one from the right to run a boat on the route between the city of San Francisco and the town of Oakland, and concludes the town of Oakland from conferring on any one the right to do so during the period of time said contract shall exist. He further contends, that he has exhibited a prima-facie case, and that it entitles him to an injunction; that the court will not look to the extent and validity of the complainant's title, but postpone the consideration of them to a future stage of the case. There is a class of cases where the court will, although not satisfied with, but entertaining doubt as to the complainant's title, grant an injunction forthwith, before answer. But this is done to prevent irreparable mischief. Where the injury sought to be enjoined, is the transfer of negotiable paper by an irresponsible party; a destructive trespass to the inheritance; the repetition of a nuisance, or the commission of some act not reparable in damages, the court ex necessitate will order an injunction to keep the parties in statu quo until its doubts have been removed by the facts elicited in the future investigation of the cause. This is not such a case. The title of the complainant is set forth in his documentary proof; and all the materials for its investigation by ascertaining their legal effect, are before the court. It involves no inquiry into complicated facts. It depends alone upon the construction of the charter which gave it birth. Why should the court decline to pass upon it, but postpone the investigation into the construction of it, intermediately enjoining the adverse party from running their boat?

The complainant asks for an injunction to enjoin from the alleged infringement of what he claims to be his statutory right. Now, the power of this court to interpose, depends upon the fact that his right is clear and without doubt, his possession actual, and when his legal title is not put in doubt. 1 Johns. Ch. 611. In Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 Johns. 585, Chancellor Kent says, "Injunctions are always granted to secure the enjoyment of statute privileges of which the party is in the actual possession, unless the right be doubtful." The same doctrine, that before the court will interfere by injunction the right of the complainant should be free from doubt, is enunciated by Savage, C. J., in North River Steamboat Co. v. Livingston, 3 Cow. 755. It may be therefore assumed that the right of the complainant must be legal, clear, and beyond reasonable doubt. The question, then, into its validity and extent becomes not only a necessary but preliminary inquiry to the issue of an injunction.

Now, the source of complainant's title is to be found in the charter of the town of Oakland. He claims under assignment from Edward B. Carpentier, grantee of that town. No interest could pass from the latter to its grantee save what was vested in it by its charter, and none other could pass from it to the grantee under whom complainant claims, whatever may be the terms of the instrument executed by them. As to the character of this interest it must be that of a vested interest, or property; or it is a franchise; or lastly, it may be termed, as characterized by one of the solicitors for the complainant, "a legislative power." The decisions of the New York courts upon the interest conveyed to the city of New York in the ferries which cluster around it, are based upon the transfers made of them to it by the old charter of the British crown, and the legislature, from time to time, of the state of New York. These transfers are alienations containing all the operative words of conveyance known to deeds transferring the fee in real estate; and their legal effect is fixed by well settled principles. Those New York decisions can, therefore, afford no proper guide in the construction of the Oakland charter. In fact it was not contended in the argument that any property in the ferry was vested in the town of Oakland by its charter, as was the case in New York. One of the solicitors for complainant contended that although no property was conveyed, a franchise was transferred; and the other affirmed that something more than a franchise passed, and termed it a "legislative power." The court considers it a mere naked, incorporeal right. It is created by law; exists only in contemplation of law. It is invisible, intangible, and incapable of a physical possession, and depends on the law for its protection. 2 Gray, 27. But whatever be the interest that passed, its nature and extent must be ascertained in order to see if the title of complainant be so free from doubt as to authorize the court to interfere by injunction. The charter of Oakland is a public grant for the establishment and regulation of ferries across navigable streams, is a subject within the control of government, and is not matter of private right. In the construction of such a grant, designed by the sovereign power making it to be a general benefit and accommodation to the public, the rule is, that if the meaning of the words be doubtful they shall be taken most strongly against the grantee and for the government, and therefore should not be extended by implication beyond the natural and obvious meaning of the words, and if these do not support the right claimed, it must fall. Mills v. St. Clair Co., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 569. In such a grant nothing passes but what is granted in clear and explicit terms. And neither the right of taxation, nor any other power of sovereignty which the community have an interest in preserving undiminished, will be held by the court to be surrendered unless the intention to surrender is manifested by words too plain to be mistaken. Ohio Life Ins. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 435. In Beaty v. Lessee of Knowler, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 168, the court say, "That a corporation is strictly limited to the exercise of those powers which are specifically conferred on it, will not be denied."

In the Charles River Bridge Case, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 548, it is said "when" a corporation alleges that a state has surrendered for seventy years its power of improvement and public accommodation in a great and important line of travel, along which a vast number of its citizens must daily pass, the community have a right to insist in the language of this court above quoted "that its abandonment ought not to be presumed in a case in which the deliberate purpose of the state to abandon it does not appear." In that case the principle was applied to the charter given, to the proprietors of a bridge, by the state of Massachusetts. The court say in relation to the charter, "It is in the usual form, and the privileges such as are commonly given to corporations of that kind. It confers on them the ordinary faculties of a corporation for the purpose of building the bridge, and establishes certain rates of toll which the company are authorized to take. . . . There is no exclusive privilege to them. . . . No engagement from the state that another shall not be erected; and no undertaking not to sanction competition, nor to make improvements that may diminish the amount of its income. Upon all these subjects the charter is silent, and nothing is said in it about a line of travel, so much insisted on in the argument, in which they are to have exclusive privileges. No words are used from which an intention to grant any of these rights can be inferred. If the plaintiff is entitled to them it must be implied simply from the nature of the grant, and cannot be inferred from the words by which the grant is made. . . . All the franchises and rights of property enumerated in the charter, and there mentioned to have been granted to it, remain unimpaired. But its income is destroyed by the Warren bridge, which, being free, draws off the passengers and property which would have gone over it and renders their franchise of no value. This is the gist of the complaint. . . . In order, then, to entitle themselves to relief, it is necessary to show that the legislature contracted not to do the act of which they complain, and that they impaired, in other words violated, that contract by the erection of the Warren bridge." The court then proceed to decide that no contract of the kind arose out of the words of the charter, and consequently by the erection of the Warren bridge no violation of any contract made with the proprietors of the existing bridge had taken place. [Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 549.

The case of Fanning v. Gregoire, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 524, is an instructive one on this point. The complainant stated that he had been authorized by an act of the state legislature, framed in 1838, to establish and keep a ferry for the term of twenty years, and that by the terms of the act it was provided that no court or board of commissioners should authorize any other person to keep a ferry within the limits; and the bill prayed for an injunction against the defendants. These latter defended on the ground, that under a contract made with the city of Dubuque, within the limits of which the ferries were situated, they (the contract bearing date in 1832) were running their boat, which did not interfere with the right of the plaintiff other than such interference as is the necessary result of a fair competition. It was contended by complainant that the privilege conferred on him was exclusive; that the right had been given to him and his heirs for twenty years; that an ordinary license is not granted to a man and his heirs; that it was provided in the act "that no court or board of county commissioners shall authorize any other person (unless as is hereinafter provided by this act) to keep a ferry within the limits of the town of Dubuque." In reply to all this the court decided that the grant to complainant was not exclusive. As to the last suggestion of complainant the court say, "The prohibition on a court and the board of county commissioners to grant a license for another ferry, it is urged would show an intent to make the grant exclusive. And that the reason for this might be found in the alleged fact that when the ferry was first established a considerable expenditure was required and little or no profit was realized for some years." But all the judges present, except one, held that the grant was not intended to be exclusive. In that case the court below had refused the injunction and dismissed the petition, and the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court. [Fanning v. Gregoire] 16 How. [57 U. S.] 533.

The case of Thacher v. Dartmouth Bridge, 18 Pick. 501, is a strong illustration of this doctrine. The act of incorporation under which defendants were authorized to erect their bridge did not provide any mode of ascertaining or paying the damage which any individual owner of land might sustain by the appropriation of his property. It was urged by defendants that without the exercise of such power the bridge could not be erected. But the court considered the consent of owners might be obtained by gift or purchase; at all events it would not give the power by implication. It deemed that where the legislature, in the exercise of high sovereign power, intended to confer such a power upon a corporation, they do it in express terms, or by necessary implication. It is not to be presumed that such a power is intended to be granted unless the intent to do so can be clearly discovered in the act itself. In the present case there is no such power in terms, and we think there is none by implication. Id.; [Fanning v. Gregoire] 16 How. [57 U. S.] 534.

The foregoing authorities establish the canons of construction that must be applied to the charter of Oakland.

As to its language. The clause in it on which complainant relies gives to the trustees of Oakland power to do many things, and among them power "to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate and keep in repair all streets, roads, bridges, ferries, public grounds and places, wharves, docks, piers, sewers, wells and alleys, and to authorize the construction of the same; and with a view to facilitate the construction of wharves and other improvements, the lands lying within the limits aforesaid between high tide and the channel, are hereby granted and released to said town." The first observation to be made on this charter may be embodied, mutatis mutandis, in the language of the supreme court of the United States, in the case already cited [Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 545. It (the charter) confers on them the ordinary facilities for the purpose of constructing a ferry. There is no exclusive privilege which they are entitled to bestow. There is no engagement from the state, that another ferry should not be erected. Nor is there an undertaking not to sanction competition, nor to make improvements that may diminish the amount of the income of any ferry that might be constructed. Upon all these subjects, the charter is silent. If the plaintiff is entitled to them, it must be implied from the nature of the grant, and cannot be implied from the words by which the grant is made. All the franchises, and rights of property in the charter mentioned, is the right of constructing ferries, and still remain. But its income is destroyed, or diminished, by the additional facilities afforded by defendants, for transportation and travel. This is the gist of the complaint. In order to entitle plaintiff to relief, it is necessary to show that the legislature in this charter contracted not to do the act he complained of, or that the town of Oakland was authorized to make the contract; or, in other words, that the contract has been violated. The foregoing language of the supreme court, U. S. (with slight alterations), settles the principle that the complainant can only obtain relief on a contract; that none such arose out of the words of the act of the legislature, and it could not be raised by implication from the nature of a public grant. But again, the manner in which the legislature uses terms of conveyance, shows that they had an understanding of their legal effect. When they propose to convey certain lands described, they indicate their intention by using the operating words of "grant and release;" when they propose to confer certain municipal franchises, they state simply that the power to exercise them is conferred upon the town.

It is urged, that the delegation of a power to make, regulate, and construct ferries, gives an implied power to create exclusive privileges; and it is pressed as a reason for this implication, that at the first construction of the ferry, it demanded a large expenditure, and was for a long time a source of little profit. We have seen that in a public grant, no inference can be made from the supposed nature of the grant, and that if the right of plaintiff is not sustained by clear and obvious words, in the language of Chancellor Kent, "without doubt," the right must fall. A similar argument as to original cost was raised in the case of Fanning v. Gregoire, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 524, and was not deemed entitled to consideration. When the ordinary power of constructing ferries across the navigable waters of the bay, in any direction from Oakland, was conferred on its authorities, it would be a violation of the rules of construction of public grants, to decide that the legislature intended to confer their whole power upon the corporation, and thus preclude themselves from all future opportunities of public improvement. It cannot be considered that the power to grant exclusive privileges to an individual, for nearly a quarter of a century, is to be regarded as belonging to the town by implication. This would be a most extraordinary construction, when we regard the uniform policy of this state, from the earliest law regulating ferries, as manifested upon the statute-book. Anterior to 1855, the regulation of ferries was confided to the courts of sessions. The supreme court of this state having decided that the law conferring the power upon those tribunals was unconstitutional, the legislature committed the power to supervisors.

It is contended that the laws prior to 1855 being unconstitutional, the grant to the town of Oakland cannot be considered as made in subordination to those general laws, and is free from their restrictions. This may be true; still, when we look to the character of these laws, they stand on the statute-book, and serve to show the restrictive and cautious policy of the legislature in relation to ferries. They were only authorized to be established for a short period of time, under various restrictions; and, in no instance did the legislature exclude themselves from establishing additional ones, when public convenience should require it. This uniform policy of our legislature is to be kept in view, when the question arises whether, in the absence of express words and obvious natural language, it is to be presumed to have departed from such policy, and to have bestowed on the town of Oakland the right to grant exclusive privileges, and thus preclude all future intervention on the part of the legislature, even over waters navigable to the ocean. The legislature could not have supposed they had done so when, in less than twelve months afterwards, they passed an act in relation to ferries, in which they repealed the second section of the act creating public ferries, passed 18th March, 1850, as applied to certain bays (among them that of San Francisco), within the limits of the state or their shores, and repealing so much of said section as could be so construed; and enacting that the navigation of said bays, and the transportation of freight or passengers across, through, and over the same, should be free and exempt from the restriction of any ferry-laws now in force in this state. That the legislature had the right to keep the navigation of the bay within the limits of the state, and the transportation across them free and exempt from the restriction of any ferry-laws in force, we think cannot be doubted. For this court to interpose by an injunction to restrain parties from navigating across the Bay of San Francisco, on the ground that they were infringing upon the exclusive privileges of a ferry, in the face of a statute of the state which declares that such bay shall be exempt from all ferry restriction, would be an improper exercise of power.

It is urged that, admitting it was in the power of the legislature to alter, modify, or take back the administrative-legislative power conferred by the charter, still, when private rights have issued out of the exercise of such power by the town of Oakland, they cannot be affected by the repealing action of the legislature. This view assumes that the contract between the town of Oakland and Carpentier, did invest him with a property in the ferry, and legally transferred to him an exclusive right for twenty years. The authorities cited, and the reasoning predicated upon them, tend to show that nothing but a legislative or administrative power was transferred, and that limited to the ordinary construction of a ferry, not authorizing the authorities of Oakland to give a monopoly of it to any one. Such contract, therefore, could not pass such exclusive privileges to a private individual as would paralyze any future action of the legislature. That private rights might arise from the legitimate exercise, by the town of Oakland, of its corporate privileges, there is no doubt; and the repeal of those privileges by the legislature might not affect those rights. To illustrate, the charter gives to the town of Oakland the power of selling or otherwise disposing of its common property. In the exercise of that corporate right, private rights might arise, and a subsequent repeal by the legislature of the corporate privileges of the town, would not defeat the previously vested private rights of the individual. So far from such right having vested in Carpentier, under the contract between him and the town of Oakland, even if the latter had made a grant of the ferry with covenants for the exclusive enjoyment of the franchise granted, this would not have restricted them from exercising the power conferred on them by the charter to construct additional ferries. Such authority was vested in them as trustees for the public, and cannot be restrained by the covenant of the city. In constructing ferries, the authorities of Oakland were acting under a statute in the exercise of which the public had an interest. The city of Oakland was not the owner of the ferry, nor of an exclusive franchise; and although it may have granted it with a covenant for quiet enjoyment, and might be responsible on such covenant to the grantee, still, such covenant could not restrain the authorities of Oakland from exercising their judgment in creating additional ferries, as in their opinion the public interest should require. In re Fay, 15 Pick. 252. But the contract between the town of Oakland and Carpentier, must be deemed a fraud upon the law, and a complete evasion of its policy and object. A public trust was confided to the authorities of Oakland, to be executed by them as agents of the public. It was not in their power to denude themselves of the trust. It was not their "common property," and, by the charter, could not be sold or disposed of. It was a public trust, to be exercised by them as agents of the community, which they could not discard so as to prevent their successors from establishing additional ferries required by the public convenience. By the contract they granted, sold, released, and conveyed to an individual, his successors and assigns, exclusively, for the space of twenty years, the right to keep and run a public ferry or ferries, so as to demand and receive compensation therefor, between the town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco, and between the said town and any other place, together with all and singular the ferry-rights, privileges, and franchises, which now are or may hereafter be held and owned by said town. By such contract the then authorities of Oakland attempted to convert a public trust to private and individual use, and to place for twenty years under the exclusive control of an individual and his assigns, all, even future, means of ferry communication across the navigable waters from Oakland to any other place. Such never was the intention of the legislature. Such an act, it was not in the power of the authorities of Oakland to do, and such a transaction a court of equity cannot sustain. This tribunal could not interpose by the extraordinary process of an injunction to support rights derived from such a source; and maintain a title, which so far from being free from doubt, was executed under a contract in fraud of the law under which it professes to be executed; and to sustain restrictions over the navigable waters of this state, which the legislature has declared shall be exempt from all such restrictions.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The bill in this case is filed for an injunction to restrain the defendants from interfering with the privilege or franchise of the complainant in a ferry from the town of Oakland to this city, of which he claims to be the exclusive owner for a term of years. This franchise is alleged to have been conferred on the complainant by an ordinance, and contract pursuant thereto, made by the trustees of Oakland, in the year 185–. The authority of the trustees to make the ordinance and contract is derived from the act of the legislature, passed May 4, 1852. Under the supposed authority of this act, a contract was made by the trustees, granting to the assignor of the complainant the privilege, claimed to be exclusive, of keeping and running all ferries between the town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco and elsewhere. It is not denied that the defendants are running a ferry-boat between this city and the town of San Antonio, touching at Oakland; nor that the profits and business of the complainants are seriously affected thereby. It is urged that the court should not at this stage of the cause, determine its whole merits, but that the injunction should be granted if the complainant has made out a prima-facie case. But it is well settled that injunctions will not be granted to secure the enjoyment of a statutory privilege, unless the right be clear. 3 Cow. 755; 1 Johns. Ch. 611.

In cases where an injunction is prayed to restrain an act which, if committed, will work irreparable mischief, it will be granted ex necessitate, even in doubtful cases, as the only means of keeping the parties in statu quo, and preventing the final decree from being abortive. Such are, the cases of the threatened destruction of heir-looms or works of art, or objects having a pretium affectionis —like family portraits, &c., or the publication of private letters, or the erecting of nuisances calculated to work irreparable mischief, &c. In all such cases, it is clear that if the court, by refusing the injunction, permits the act to be done, its subsequent decree granting the injunction would be but a brutum fulmen. But when an exclusive privilege under a statute is claimed, and the court is asked to forbid the commission of an act, otherwise lawful, because it interferes with the exclusive privilege claimed, the legal right of the complainant must be clear. It is said that in this case the court should interfere because the trespasses on the complainant are continuous and cannot be estimated in damages. But the damage to the defendants, if they are prevented from running their boat until their cause is heard, are equally unsusceptible of calculation, and may be far greater than the complainant can sustain by the competition. The court should therefore be fully satisfied that the right exists before, by its injunction, it will cause to the defendants an injury quite as irreparable, and perhaps more extensive, than that apprehended by the complainant.

The supposed authority of the trustees to make the ordinance and contract relied on by complainant, is contained in the third section of the act to incorporate the town of Oakland, passed May 4th, 1854. This section provides "that the board of trustees shall have power to make such by-laws and ordinances as they may deem fit, proper, and necessary; to regulate, improve, sell, or otherwise dispose of the common property; to prevent and extinguish fires; to lay out, make, open, widen, regulate, and keep in repair, all streets, roads, bridges, ferries, public places and grounds, wharves, docks, piers, slips, sewers, wells, and alleys, and to authorize the construction of the same; and with a view to facilitate the construction of wharves, and other improvements, the lands lying within the limits aforesaid, between high tide and ship-channel, are hereby granted and released to said town." It is not claimed that the foregoing provisions constituted a grant to the town of Oakland, of all ferries from that town, as property. It is urged, however, that they amount to a delegation to the trustees of all the legislative and sovereign power possessed by the state over the subject of ferries from that town. That in the exercise of that power, the trustees could make any contract, and confer any rights with regard to ferries, they might deem proper, and that having done so, the rights thereby conferred, vested, and remain indefeasible, either by the trustees or the state, except in the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The first question to be considered is, what were the nature and extent of the authority conferred upon the trustees by the act above cited? The only words in the clause which can be construed to confer the powers supposed, are the words "make" and "authorize the construction of." It is evident that most of the empowering words in the phrase do not apply to all the objects in reference to which the powers are to be exercised. For instance: the word "open" cannot refer to "ferries," nor the word "widen" to "wells." The words "lay out," evidently refer to "streets," "roads," "public places," and "grounds;" and the words "authorize the construction," have obviously a more specific reference to the docks, wharves, bridges, and sewers mentioned, than to the public places and grounds, or to the ferries. It is clear, therefore, that the various empowering words in the phrase must be construed distributively, reddendo singula singulis; and they must be distributed among the objects mentioned, in such a way as to give, with respect to each, only those powers which would naturally be conferred upon a municipal corporation, with reference to such objects. To apply the word "make" to "ferries," and to construe it as conferring the absolute right of leasing indefinitely, or granting the franchise for all ferries from the town to any individual, would seem a forced interpretation, suggested rather by the desire to find in the act the authority sought for, than by the natural construction of the phrase itself. If "make" were the only word which could apply to ferries, or if "ferries" were the only word which would satisfy and give effect to the word "make," the construction contended for would be more plausible. But the word "regulate" not only can be applied to ferries, but it is sufficient to confer all the authority with respect to them, which would naturally and appropriately be given to a municipal corporation, from whom a grant of the franchise in property is withheld; while the word "make" has a similar operation if applied to the bridges, wharves, piers, docks, sewers, wells, &c. To make "ferries" is certainly an unusual and awkward expression. The more appropriate phrase would obviously be "to establish ferries;" and had the extensive powers with regard to them which are now claimed, been intended to be conferred, it is hardly possible that the legislature would have omitted in specific terms to grant and enumerate them. The construction contended for assumes that while the legislature withheld the grant of the franchise from the corporation as property, it nevertheless intended to give them full power to grant the exclusive franchise as property to any individual; to be assigned or sold by him at pleasure, and capable of being owned by a foreigner or a citizen of another state; and all this by the force of the word "make," which is wrested from its natural application to other objects, and made to refer to ferries by an ingenious and forced construction. The words "authorize the construction of" cannot be appealed to as conferring the powers attempted to be exercised in this case. Whatever propriety there might be in the phrase "construct a ferry," the power to do so can hardly be deemed a power to grant or lease an exclusive franchise and privilege of establishing it, especially when such franchise is not conferred upon the donee of the power to construct; and in this case the power is not given to "construct," but to "authorize the construction of ferries," if, indeed, it refers to ferries at all. It is, therefore, merely a power to permit, or to allow them to be constructed. It would surely be an unwarrantable latitude of construction, to hold that a power to permit the construction of a ferry, unaccompanied by a grant of the franchise, authorized the absolute grant of an exclusive franchise to any one the party empowered to permit might see fit to give it. But, for the reasons before assigned, I think the words "authorize the construction of" apply to wharves, docks, piers, bridges, &c., and not to ferries; with reference to which they are obviously inappropriate.

But assuming that the words "make" and "authorize the construction of" apply to ferries, the question recurs, whether the trustees were authorized by the power thus given, to confer the right now claimed. The ordinance under which the contract with Edward R. Carpentier was made, provides that "the trustees, &c., do hereby make, open, widen, lay out, grant, create, ordain, establish, and regulate a public ferry between the said town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco, to be called the 'Oakland Ferry'; and they do hereby bargain and contract with Edward R. Carpentier, his heirs, agents, and assigns, to run said ferry for the period of twenty years, according to the terms of this ordinance, either as a separate ferry, or in connection with, or continuance of, the one already established and used between said town and said city, hereby granting, selling, and releasing and conveying to the said Carpentier, and to his successors in interest and assigns, exclusively, for the said period of twenty years, the right to keep and run a public ferry, or public ferries, so as to demand and receive compensation therefor, between the said town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco, or between the said town of Oakland and any other place; together with all and singular the ferry-rights, privileges, and franchises, which now are or may hereafter be owned by said town." The contract made in pursuance of this ordinance is in substantially the same language. Admitting that so much of this ordinance as purports to establish, create, and make a public ferry between Oakland and San Francisco is a valid exercise of the power conferred on the trustees, we are next to inquire whether the grant and the subsequent contract was also within the power of the trustees. It will be seen that the trustees in express terms convey and grant for twenty years, to Carpentier and his successors exclusively, the right of running and keeping a ferry or ferries between Oakland and San Francisco, and between Oakland and any other place, and they undertake to convey to him "all the ferry-rights, privileges, and franchises which now are or may hereafter be owned by said town." It is not contended that the town of Oakland was the owner of any exclusive ferry-franchise whatever. The grant, therefore, of the ferry-franchises owned by the town would, of course, pass for nothing. As to the grant of all ferry-franchises which might thereafter be owned by it, no observations are necessary; but it is said that the trustees, in the exercise of their power to establish ferries, had incidentally and as the appropriate means of establishing them, the right to release them to individuals. It is not necessary to inquire into the authority of the corporation to establish a particular ferry, and to lease it to an individual. The right they have attempted to convey to Carpentier was not a lease of a particular ferry between a certain point in the town of Oakland and the city of San Francisco, but the exclusive right to keep and run a ferry or ferries between Oakland or any other place. They thus abdicated and renounced the exercise of all the powers with respect to ferries with which they were entrusted, except that of "regulating." For the power to establish other ferries could be of no avail, so long as Carpentier retained the exclusive right to run and keep them. It would perhaps be difficult to find, in the history of municipal corporations another instance of so extraordinary a grant. It was not only not an exercise of any power they may have possessed to establish ferries, but it was, in effect, the surrender of the whole power to establish them, and it amounted to an agreement that no ferry should be established from Oakland to any place whatever, unless by the permission of the person to whom they had given the exclusive right to run them. It seems to me that the legality of this grant cannot for a moment be supposed. The authority vested in the board was conferred upon them as trustees for the public, to be exercised for the public good. They had not only the right, but it was their duty, and that of their successors, to exercise the power of establishing ferries, as agents and trustees of the public, whenever the public good might require.

The power to establish ferries, if it existed at all, was a continuing power and duty, which existed in every board of trustees for the time being; and no covenant by one board not to exercise it, or for the exclusive enjoyment of the franchise by an individual, could prohibit or restrain their successors from exercising the powers vested in them by the statute to establish and license other ferries required by public convenience and necessity. In re Fay, 15 Pick. 243. But to ascertain more certainly the intention of the law, and the nature and extent of the powers conferred upon the trustees, the legislation of the state with regard to ferries must be considered. By the act of March, 1850 [Laws Cal. 1850-51, p. 758], all persons were forbidden to keep ferries without a license, except for their own use, or that of their families. The courts of sessions were empowered to establish ferries across bays, creeks, or sloughs, bounding or within their respective counties, as they might deem necessary, and were authorized to issue a license to keep a public ferry to any suitable person applying therefor, for a term not to exceed one year, on the fulfillment by the applicant of certain pre-requisites. They could also license and establish additional ferries within less than two miles from a regularly established ferry, when necessary for public convenience, and on notice to the proprietor of such previously established ferry. The act further provides for the establishment of ferries on private property, for the occupation of ground at either end of the ferry, and for the publication of a notice of the application for a ferry. It also prescribes the duties and privileges of ferrymen, and provides for the rates of ferriage, revoking licenses, and for the penalties to be imposed for a refusal to transport persons or property. All these provisions were of a general character, and applied to all the counties of the state. They were evidently designed to provide by general law for the establishment of ferries, for conferring the franchise in suitable cases, with proper checks and securities, and with the express reservation of the right to confer a similar franchise upon persons other than the proprietor of the first-established ferry, whenever it might be deemed necessary or advantageous to the public. The same provisions, in substance, remain as part of the general law of this state to the present day, except that it having been determined that under the constitution of this state the courts of sessions could not exercise the functions assigned to them by the act, the same powers, in substance, were, by the act of 1855, vested in the boards of supervisors.

On the 14th of April, 1853 [Laws 1850–53, p. 763], an act was passed, declaring that the 2d section of the act creating and regulating public ferries, should not be construed to apply to the bays of San Pablo, Suisun, San Francisco, or Monterey; and the navigation of said bays, and the transportation of freight or passengers over, across or through the same, was declared to be free and exempt from the restriction of any ferry-laws then in force in the state. These provisions have been repeated, in substance, in all the succeeding ferry-laws passed on the subject. It will not be disputed that these laws indicate and establish the settled policy of this state, with regard to public ferries: that it was intended to confer the franchise, for a limited time, on persons found to be suitable, and with certain privileges, checks, securities, and penalties, carefully provided by law; that such privileges were not to be exclusive, but other ferries could be established, contiguous to any established ferry, whenever deemed necessary; and that the state was to derive a revenue from the issuing of the licenses. The law of 1853, and subsequent enactments to the same effect, show that the great arms of the sea therein mentioned, were not regarded as fit for the establishment of any ferries whatever, but that their navigation and the transportation of freight and passengers, across, through, and over them, were to be left free and exempt from the restrictions of any ferry-laws in force in this state. Such being the settled policy and law of this state, with regard to public ferries, and with reference to the bays mentioned, it is not to be presumed, without the clearest evidence of a contrary intention, that the legislature intended to confer upon the trustees of a small town in the Bay of San Francisco, the power to grant an exclusive privilege to establish ferries across the most important of those bodies of water the navigation of which was, the next year, declared free and exempt from all ferry-laws.

If the general ferry-law, under which no exclusive rights could be acquired, nor licenses granted for more than a year, was deemed unfit to be applied to the Bay of San Francisco, the inference is irresistible, that it could not have been the intention only one year previously, to confer upon the trustees of a town an unlimited power to grant exclusive privileges, for any period, with reference to the same waters, to any individual they might choose. It is admitted that the law by which the power claimed was conferred, might at any time have been repealed. Had the legislature, when, in 1853, it declared the bays mentioned to be exempt from the operation of all ferry-laws, and the navigation over and across them to be free, supposed that the trustees of Oakland were empowered to grant an exclusive right to an individual to establish ferries to the most important city of the state, they would surely not have omitted to revoke the powers, and repeal the law by which they were conferred.

The question we have been considering, is purely one of construction; and even if the language of the act were more doubtful, yet when read by the light of the previous and immediately subsequent legislation of the state, its true interpretation would seem to be unmistakable. But, it is said that the power to establish a ferry imports ex vi termini, a power to confer exclusive rights in the ferry so established; that without such rights it would not be a ferry in the legal sense of the term. But on this point, the case of Fanning v. Gregoire, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 524, is decisive. In that case, Fanning claimed under a direct grant from the legislature, authorizing him to keep a ferry at the town of Dubuque, across the Mississippi river, for the term of twenty years. This he accordingly established. Subsequently, the state conferred upon the city-council of Dubuque, power to license and establish public ferries across the Mississippi; and under the power a license was granted. On a suit by Fanning against the licensee, it was held that his franchise was not exclusive, but that the legislature had a right to license other ferries. It is clear that if a direct grant to an individual, of authority to establish and keep a ferry at a particular place does not vest in him an exclusive franchise, the grant to a municipal corporation of power to establish ferries does not authorize them to bestow exclusive privileges. If the term "ferry" in the grant to Fanning did not impart any exclusive franchise, it cannot have that meaning in the act incorporating Oakland. It can surely make no difference whether the state is supposed to have duly surrendered to an individual its power of improvement and accommodation in a great and important line of public travel, or whether it is supposed to have authorized a municipal corporation to surrender it; in either case "its abandonment ought not to be presumed, where the deliberate purpose of the state to abandon it does not appear." [Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge] 11 Pet. [26 U. S.] 549.

It is urged that, even if the town of Oakland or the state had power to license other ferries, yet the right of complainant to the exclusive enjoyment of the ferry on the particular ferry-ways established by him ought to be protected. But in the case above referred to, no such distinction appears to have been taken. The right claimed was, like this,—an exclusive right to run a ferry from a certain town across the Mississippi for twenty years. The infringement complained of was the licensing and establishment of another from the same town across the same river. The court decided that the franchise claimed was not exclusive, and that the establishment of the second ferry was legal. It is nowhere suggested that the second licensee could not run his boat from any part of the town of Dubuque, and even from the same wharf as that used by the first licensee. 2dly. The privilege attempted to be granted in this case, was not the privilege of keeping and running a ferry from any specified dock or wharf in the town of Oakland to any other point across the bay. It was the right to keep and run a ferry or ferries from the town of Oakland generally to any place whatever. Whether, if the trustees had established a ferry from a certain wharf, and leased the same to an individual, his rights in such ferry would have been exclusive, it is not necessary to inquire; for the right granted was the exclusive right to run "a ferry or ferries" from the town of Oakland to any place, with all the ferry-rights, privileges. and franchises then owned or thereafter to be owned by the town.

But admitting, for the sake of argument, not only that the trustees were empowered to establish ferries, but that the legislature intended to confer upon them powers to grant to an individual the exclusive franchise for any period, of running and keeping the ferries so established, such a construction affords an argument almost irresistible, that those powers could only have been conferred with regard to ferries wholly within the corporate limits. Within those limits is the creek San Antonio, which can only be crossed by bridges or boats. If, then, the power to grant the franchise in property was intended to be conferred, it is surely more reasonable, and more in accordance with every rule relating to the construction of grants of this description, to construe it as referring to ferries across waters wholly within the corporate limits, than to suppose it to extend to ferries across a bay the navigation of which was, in less than a year afterwards, declared free and open to all. With reference to the streets, docks, wharves, and sewers, this limitation is necessarily understood. Why not with regard to ferries, if the power to grant the franchise was intended to be given? The ferry from Oakland to this city affords the principal, if not the only means of convenient access to the commercial centre and chief seaport of the state, not only to the citizens of Oakland, but to the inhabitants of a considerable district; and the possession of an exclusive franchise of running and keeping all ferries between Oakland and this city, gives to the possessor the practical control of the means of communication. Can it be supposed that the legislature intended to give the power to grant such a right to the corporate authorities of a town situated at one terminus of the ferry, and to take away or render nugatory the rights of the county at the other terminus to license ferries across the water forming their common boundary? That this right existed in both counties under the law of 1851, is clear. But the privileges conferred by the license under the ferry-laws, are limited, and not exclusive in the person obtaining the license. To suppose then that the power contended for was conferred upon the trustees of Oakland, we must suppose that the powers given to every county on the Bay of San Francisco, between which and Oakland a ferry might be established, were revoked and the general ferry-laws on that subject repealed by implication. And this by force of the word "make," which we are asked first to apply to ferries, and then to construe as has been explained. It may be said that the question is not now as to the right of other counties to license ferries under the general ferry-laws. This is true. But the question is as to the exclusive right of the complainant to a ferry between Oakland and this city—as against the defendants; and in construing the law under which his alleged rights are claimed, it is of importance to show that the power to confer such rights was incompatible with the then existing laws conferring powers over ferries to other counties, and could only have been given by repealing pro tanto those laws; as also that it was incompatible with subsequent laws, by which all power to establish ferries over the waters in question was taken away. It has not seemed to me necessary to refer on this point to the general rules relating to the construction of grants of this kind. It is not denied that grants of privileges, franchises, etc., are to be strictly construed, and that nothing is to be taken by intendment. It is claimed, however, that this is a delegation of legislative authority, and not a grant of a franchise, and that therefore a different rule must be applied. I confess myself unable to see the propriety of this distinction in the present case. The state is the sovereign from whom the power is derived, whether it is supposed to have granted directly to a corporation the exclusive franchise as property, as was done in the case of the city of New York, or to have granted to the corporation power to make an exclusive grant of the franchise to an individual; in either case, the rules of construction must be the same. It can surely make no difference whether the corporation is the direct grantee of the franchise, or the donee of a power to make a grant of it and receive the consideration.

Many other questions were raised and argued at the hearing, which it is unnecessary to discuss. On the whole, I think, 1st. That it is at least doubtful whether the act incorporating the town of Oakland, gave to the trustees any other power with regard to ferries than that of regulating them. 2d. That if the power to establish ferries was conferred, such power was held by them as a public trust, to be exercised by them and their successors when the public good might require. They had, therefore, no authority to confer upon any individual the exclusive right to keep and run a ferry or ferries, between Oakland and San Francisco, still less such a right with regard to ferries "between Oakland and any other place." 3d. That if such powers were intended to be given the trustees, they could only have referred to ferries across waters wholly within the corporate limits of the town. 4th. That under any possible view of the case, the right of the complainant is doubtful; and that, therefore, the injunction ought not now to be granted.

MINTURN v. SMITH.

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 14, 1874.

TAXATION—TAX TITLE—VOID—CLOUD ON TITLE—INJUNCTION.

1. The general statute authorizes a tax collector for state and county taxes to execute a deed upon a tax sale, and further provides that such deed shall be prima facie evidence of certain facts recited therein, and conclusive evidence of the regularity of the proceedings in all other respects. A subsequent statute provides that a town tax in a certain town shall be assessed and collected at the same time, and in the same manner as provided by said general act, and confers upon the town treasurer all the powers exercised by the tax collector of the state and county taxes under the general act, but makes no provision as to the effect of the tax deed executed by the town treasurer. Held, that such deed will not be prima facie evidence of the regularity of the prior proceedings.

2. A void tax deed which the statute does not make prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment and sale, does not cast a cloud upon the title.

3. An injunction will not be granted to restrain the collection of a tax, where the deed issued upon a sale for taxes would not cloud the title.

[This was a motion for an injunction by Edward Minturn against Thomas A. Smith to restrain the collection of certain taxes.]

W. W. Crane, for complainant.

George W. Tyler, for defendant.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and SAWYER, Circuit Judge.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The question in this case is, whether a deed issued by the treasurer of the town of Alameda upon a sale for town taxes under the act of 1872 [Laws 1871–72, p. 276] to incorporate the town of Alameda, would be prima facie evidence of title, and would, therefore, cast a cloud upon the title. Section 7 of the act is as follows:

"The annual tax authorized by this act to be levied by the board of trustees, shall be levied, assessed and collected at the same time, and in the same manner, as is or may be by law provided for the levying and collecting state and county taxes within the county of Alameda, the treasurer being hereby vested with the same powers to make collections for taxes as is, or shall be, conferred upon tax collectors for the collection of state and county taxes within said county."

This is the only provision of the act affecting the question. The general provisions of the Political Code relating to the collection of state and county taxes, have no application except so far as they are made applicable by said section seven. The general statute is made applicable, so far as the mode, manner, and time of assessing and collecting the tax is concerned, and the treasurer, with respect to the town tax, is vested with all the powers that are conferred upon tax collectors of state and county taxes by the Political Code, but it goes no further. The town treasurer may sell for town taxes legally levied, and execute a deed in pursuance of such sale, because the tax collector of state and county taxes may do so. The power of the treasurer is spent when he has executed the deed.

Section 7 does not say what the effect of that deed shall be. It does not provide that it shall have any other effect than ordinary deeds executed by public officers upon tax sales. The general act does not stop with authorizing the tax collector to execute the deed prescribed, but goes on in sections 3786 and 3787, to provide, that the deed so executed by the tax collector shall be prima facie evidence of title in the grantee as to certain enumerated particulars, and conclusive evidence as to all others. This is something outside and beyond the powers of the tax collector. It is intended to change a rule of evidence—to shift the burden of proof as to the regularity of the proceedings resulting in the tax deed from the claimant under, to the party claiming against, the tax deed.

The act under which the tax in question is levied, stops short of the effect of the deed as an instrument of evidence. It says nothing about its effect, but ends with the powers of the treasurer. Without such provision the deed can only have the effect of ordinary tax deeds. The act must be strictly construed, as it assumes to divest title to land in invitum. That such is the rule, is clear from the principal authority cited by complainant, Sibley v. Smith, 2 Mich. 487. In that case the statute, besides the provision that the officers should proceed in the same manner and exercise the same powers as the officers under the general act, adds, "and in all respects, with the like effect." It was upon this clause alone that the title was sustained. See, also, 1 Blackf. 336; Blackw. Tax Titles, 449 et seq., and cases cited. We do not think the deed which the treasurer is authorized to issue, would have the same effect as evidence as a deed executed by the tax collector under the general law. It would not be prima facie evidence of title, and consequently would not cast a cloud upon the title. This is settled by numerous decisions in this state. Huntington v. Central Pacific R. Co. [Case No. 6,911], and cases cited. There is, therefore, no ground for an injunction.

NEW TRIAL—IMMATERIAL ERROR—DETINUE—RECOVERY—VALUE—HOW INSTRUCTIONS UNDERSTOOD BY JURY.

1. Although the court may err in instructions to the jury, yet if it is apparent that justice has been done, a new trial should not be granted.

2. In detinue, the value of the article sued for is a secondary object, and even if excessive, as assessed by the jury, it is doubtful if a party can complain of it, as he may discharge the judgment by the restoration of the property.

3. Affidavits of jurors cannot be received, to show how the instructions of the court were understood.

Appeal from Hempstead circuit court.

[This was an action of detinue by Ephraim Mirick against Andrew Hemphill.]

Before ESKRIDGE and CROSS, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case comes up, by appeal, from the Hempstead circuit court. The plaintiff brought an action of detinue to recover an obligation on Soher, Goodman & Co., for the proceeds of fourteen bales of cotton, to be received of John Bradley, and obtained a judgment for the same, if to be had, if not, the value thereof, estimated by the jury at four hundred and eighteen dollars and six cents, together with the costs of suit. The defendant afterwards moved the court for a new trial, which motion was overruled, and he excepted, setting out the evidence on the part of the plaintiff, and the instructions given to the jury.

Three grounds are relied upon for the reversal of the judgment. 1st, that the court instructed the jury contrary to law; 2d, that the defendant held the obligation as bailee, and no demand was proven to have been made previous to the institution of the suit; and 3d, that the court refused to hear, on the motion for a new trial, the affidavits of several of the jurors, setting forth their understanding of the instructions which influenced their verdict.

The instructions, to which the first objection relates, were in substance, that if the jury found for the plaintiff, they ought to find for him the obligation, if to be had; if not the value thereof, and the criterion in ascertaining it, would be the value of fourteen bales of cotton in New Orleans, at the time specified in the sale bill of Soher, Goodman & Co., set out in the bill of exceptions, and that in estimating the fourteen bales of cotton, all the evidence ought to be taken into consideration. The sale bill referred to, is an account of the sale of fourteen bales of cotton, for A. Hemphill, received of John Bradley, by Soher, Goodman & Co., in New Orleans, in May, 1830, amounting to the sum of four hundred and eighteen dollars and six cents, after deducting all charges for freight, storage, and expenses. If these instructions are objectionable, it is only in that portion which relates to the criterion by which the jury was directed to be governed, in finding the value of the obligation. It was, doubtless, going too far, on the part of the court, to instruct that the criterion in estimating the value of the obligation, would be the value of the fourteen bales, sold in New Orleans, by Soher, Goodman & Co., there being no evidence showing that the cotton mentioned in the obligation was required to be sold there, or that it was actually sold at that place. It is very apparent that no injustice was done the defendant in consequence of it, as the testimony set out in the bill of exceptions, shows conclusively that the jury was fully warranted in assuming the criterion to which they were referred by the court. The defendant, therefore, having sustained no injury on account of the instructions objected to, the court rightfully overruled the motion for a new trial, so far as predicated upon misdirection to the jury. There is another view of the first ground relied upon by the defendant for the reversal of the judgment, that we think, deserves consideration. The action is detinue, and although it was the duty of the jury to assess the value of the obligation, that value is a secondary object, and not recoverable, but upon the contingency of the obligation not being restored. Whatever, then, may have been the value of the obligation, assessed by the jury, the defendant can discharge it by its restoration. See the case of Thompson v. Porter, 4 Bibb, 72. He is not by the finding of an improper or excessive value, inevitably subjected to injury. He might restore the obligation. The second ground, namely, that a special request was necessary before the institution of the suit, if tenable at all, is fully met by the testimony, as a demand is proven to have been made.

The third, and last, which relates to the refusal of the court to hear the affidavits of several of the jurors as to their understanding of the instructions, is not tenable. 2 Tidd, Prac. 817; 5 Burrows, 2667. We are of opinion, therefore, that the circuit court properly refused a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

The MISPAH.

[5 Reporter, 519.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Delaware. April 1, 1878.

SHIPPING—AFFREIGHTMENT—OBLIGATION TO SIGN BILLS OF LADING—DEMURRAGE—CHARTER PARTY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. A charter party stipulating that demurrage shall be paid day by day, and that the master shall sign bills of lading, requires the master to sign bills, although demurrage may be at the time due and unpaid.

2. In an action on the contract to compel the signing of bills the libellant can recover only the actual expense incurred and rendered necessary by the master's refusal.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Delaware.]

The bark Mispah was chartered by Wright & Co., to be loaded with a cargo of grain at Philadelphia for Belfast. The charter party provided inter alia for thirty-two running lay-days at the first-named port, and demurrage at the rate of 16 pounds per day thereafter, payable day by day, the master to sign bills of lading as requested without prejudice to the charter, the charterer's responsibility to and on the shipment of the cargo, the vessel to have a lien for freight and demurrage. The charterers consumed the lay-days in loading, and in three days in addition; for two of these days they paid demurrage, but refused, though without denying liability, to pay for the third. At that time there were in board 40,000 bushels of grain for which no bill of lading had been signed, and the master refused to sign unless the charterers would pay the demurrage or indorse the amount due on the bills. This not being done, and after notice, the master sailed with the cargo and without signing the bills. The vessel being beyond the jurisdiction of the court at Philadelphia, an attachment was obtained from the district court for Delaware, and under it the vessel was arrested in Delaware Bay. The master then, under an interlocutory order, signed the bills and gave security. The libellants were awarded by the court for the breach of charter $225 for the actual expense of the attachment and arrest (tug hire, &c.), and in addition exemplary damages, making the whole award $500. The respondent appealed.

J. Warren Coulston, for appellant.

The master was justified in sailing as he did. He would have lost the demurrage if he had signed the bills, as requested, and they had passed to an innocent purchaser. Kay, Shipm. 325, and cases cited. The manifest sufficiently showed the cargo he was to deliver. Ben. Adm. 286. In no case can the decree for exemplary damages be sustained.

H. G. Ward and Henry Flanders, contra.

The master was guilty of trespass in carrying away the goods without giving a bill of lading, and the exemplary damages were properly given. Bennett v. Lockwood, 20 Wend. 222; Miller v. Garling, 12 How. Prac. 203. He was bound to sign the bills, and had no lien at the port of lading. Francesco v. Massey, L. R. 8 Exch. 101; Kish v. Cory, L. R. 10 Q. B. 553; Christoffersen v. Hansen, L. R. 7 Q. B. 509; Pedersen v. Lotinga, 5 Wkly. Rep. 290; French v. Gerber, 1 C. P. Div. 739.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. I think the court below was right in holding that charterers were in culpable default in refusing to pay the demurrage confessedly due the master, or to make such an indorsement on the bills of lading as would evince his right to enforce his lien upon the cargo for it at the port of discharge. I am also of opinion that the master mistook his remedy for this wrong; that when he sailed from the port of Philadelphia without first signing proper bills of lading, he violated the charter party, and that the vessel is liable for the damages directly resulting from this unwarranted departure. But the method adopted in the assessment of damages was clearly erroneous. The master was in no sense a trespasser. He was lawfully in possession of the cargo in pursuance of the charter party, and his liability occurred solely from his breach of one of its stipulations, which required him to sign bills of lading before sailing. It was therefore simply a cause of contract, and is properly exclusively so treated in the libel. Even then, if the master's conduct had been attended by circumstances of aggravation, which would in an action of trespass justify the imposition of exemplary damages under the form of libel, the libellants are entitled to compensatory damages merely, and these are to be measured by the expenses incurred in pursuing the vessel and asserting their right to the fulfilment of the charter party. The expenses thus incurred are shown to amount to $225, and for this sum there must be a decree —— with the costs of the suit in the district court ——, the costs of this court to be paid by libellants.

COLLISION—STEAMBOAT AND SMALL BOAT—RIGHT OF WAY—PLEADING.

1. A man in a small boat saw a steamboat approaching him, two or three hundred feet away. He alleged that the steamboat came on without slacking speed and struck his boat before he had time to get out of the way; and he filed a libel to recover for the damage to the boat. Held, that, on this libel, which conceded the obligation of the small boat to get out of the way of the steamboat, if she had time, the question was whether she did have time.

2. As the libel stated that the steamboat was two or three hundred feet away when she was seen, the small boat did have time to get out of the way, and the libel must be dismissed.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This action is brought to recover for the destruction of a small boat which was crushed between a canal-boat, lying alongside the Columbia dock, and the propeller Missisquoi. The statement of the libel is, that the propeller was seen approaching when 200 or 300 feet distant, and then was hailed, but that she came on without slacking her speed and struck the small boat before the man in the boat had time to get the boat out of the way.

Upon this libel, which concedes the obligation of the small boat to get out of the way of the approaching tug, if given time to do so, the question is whether the libellant did have time to pull his boat out of the way of the propeller, after the propeller was seen by him to be approaching. The weight of the evidence is that he had such time. Indeed, this may be said to appear on the face of the libel, as it is quite manifest that a small boat with a man in it could be pulled the few feet necessary to take her out of the danger of being crushed between the boats, sooner than the propeller would move the 200 or 300 feet she is stated in the libel to have been distant, when seen and hailed by the libellant. The libel is dismissed with costs.

SALVAGE.

[Libel in rem by Grayham I. Lester and others against the cargo and materials of the American steamship Mississippi.]

L. W. Bethel, for libelants.

McKINNEY, District Judge. The allegation and proofs in this case having been fully heard and understood, and deliberation had, and the value of that portion of the cargo saved by the first set of salvors having been fixed at the sum of $175,000 by agreement of the parties, including the portion sold by the marshal for the sum of $27,662.28, for the purpose of determining the salvage thereon; and that a portion of said cargo saved by the second set of salvors has been sold by the marshal for the sum of $1,521.35, and the remainder thereof appraised under an order of court at the sum of $2,820.30, making in the aggregate the sum of $4,341.85,—

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the libelants have and recover in full compensation for their salvage services, rendered to the cargo of the steamship Mississippi twenty per cent. of the net value of that portion saved by them, as set forth in their libel, to be ascertained, by deducting from the sum of one hundred and seventy five thousand dollars, the agreed value thereof, the proper proportion of the costs and expenses, of this suit, and other expenses properly chargeable thereon, to be taxed and allowed by the court; and that the petitioners John Lowe and others have and recover for their services fifty per cent of the net value of that portion of the cargo saved by them, as set forth in their petition, to be ascertained in the same manner: the shares of the master and crew of the schooner Isabel to be forfeited for the use and benefit of the owners and insurers of the property.

LOCKE, District Judge. The allegations and proofs in these several causes by libel or petition having been fully heard and understood, and mature deliberation had thereupon, and it appearing that the services for which salvage is claimed, in each libel or petition, have been rendered to the cargo of the same vessel, and are of the same nature and character, it is ordered that the several cases be joined and for the purpose of awarding and decreeing salvage considered as one; and the property saved having been partly sold and partly appraised, the part sold for twenty-six hundred and eighty-one 46/100 dollars ($2,681.46), and the portion appraised at twenty-three thousand seven hundred and sixty-four 89/100 dollars ($23,764.89), and no objection having been made to said sale or appraisement, that said sale be confirmed and appraisement adopted for the purpose of determining salvage. And that the libellants and petitioners are entitled to recover, in full compensation for their services, thirty per cent. of the net value of the property saved in an undamaged condition, including 21 crates of crockery, 7 cases clay pipes, 687 boxes of tin, and 38 bales of cotton domestics; forty per cent. of the net value of the cotton ties saved from the orlop deck, namely, the 1,724 bundles, saved by the Harriet Maria, and 1,260 bundles saved by the Competitor; and fifty per cent. of the net value of the cases of merchandise so badly damaged as to be sold, and all the cotton ties, hoop iron, bars of steel, and other property saved from the lower hold, most of which was saved by diving; the net value of the property sold to be ascertained by deducting from the amount of proceeds of that sold the duties and a proper proportion of all costs and expenses of the suit, wharfage, storage, labor bills, landing and storing commissions, and all other charges incurred; of the property appraised, by deducting from the appraised value, the proper proportion of all costs and expenses, wharfage, storage, labor bills, landing, storing, and reshipping commissions, and all other charges incurred, excepting the respondents' proctor fee for defending. And whereas there may be some charges incurred to be borne by the vessel and cargo jointly, which would be taxed in proportion to the value of the property saved were both values known, that one-half of such charges should be taxed as against the property saved in proportion to the several values.

The court further ordered that whereas it had been reported and brought to the notice of the court that sundry boxes and cases were brought into port by the schooner Explorer in a damaged condition, and certain portions of their contents had been taken therefrom, that the master of said schooner Explorer, and all others interested in salvage earned by said schooner, appear at a day named, to show cause why the salvage earned by said vessel and crew be not forfeited.

5. A proceeding against a ship, in rem, is, in some sense, her bankruptcy proceeding.

In admiralty.

B. F. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Goodrich & Wheeler, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem instituted in behalf of the United States against the steamer "Missouri," to recover the sum of $2,998.00, for which sum it is claimed that this steamer is holden to the United States under the laws thereof.

The averments of the libel are, that, at a certain specified time, certain goods, wares and merchandise, which are particularly described, were imported and brought into the United States from a foreign port in this vessel, which were not included in her manifest, contrary to the act of congress passed March 2, 1799, and which belonged to or were consigned to the master, mate, officers and crew of said vessel; that the value of said merchandise was $2,998, and, by reason of the premises, and by force of the statute in such case made and provided, the said vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, became liable to the United States for the payment of the sum of $2,998, as a penalty. Wherefore it was prayed that process in rem issue against said vessel, her tackle, apparel and furniture, to enforce the payment of said penalty, and that the vessel might be arrested, and the said penalty pronounced for by the court, and the vessel condemned and sold to pay the same. Under this libel the usual process in rem, according to the course of the admiralty, was issued against the vessel, by virtue of which she was duly seized in waters within the jurisdiction of this court, whereupon the claimants duly appeared and filed their claim, and at the same time excepted to the libel—which exceptions are now to be disposed of.

The question raised as to the jurisdiction is first to be considered. A statement of the provisions of law under which this libel is filed, is necessary to show the precise questions which the case presents.

The act of March 2, 1799, § 24 (1 Stat. 646), which is referred to in the libel, provides as follows: "If any goods, wares and merchandise shall be imported or brought into the United States in any ship or vessel whatever belonging in the whole or in part to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants of the United States, from any foreign port or place, without having a manifest or manifests on board, agreeably to the directions in the foregoing section, or which shall not be included or described therein or shall not agree therewith: in every such case the master or other person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall forfeit and pay a sum of money equal to the value of such goods not included in such manifest or manifests."

Subsequently it was by statute enacted (see Act July 18, 1866, § 8, 14 Stat. 180): "That in any case where a vessel, or owner, or master, or manager of a vessel shall be subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States, such vessel shall be holden for the payment of such penalty, and may be seized and proceeded against summarily, by libel, to recover such penalty, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offence."

Under these two provisions of law it is here contended, on the part of the government, that, by reason of the facts set forth in the libel, a lien has been created upon this steamer for the sum of $2,998, which lien may be enforced by ordinary proceedings in rem upon the instance side of the court, and that such proceedings may be taken in any district where the vessel may be found, without previous seizure thereof—all which propositions the claimants deny.

The act of July 18, 1866, under which this libel is filed, is an instance of incorporating into the revenue laws that marked feature of the maritime law which treats a ship as a person, and makes her personally responsible for the acts of those who own or control her. Such legislation is but the offspring of that necessity, out of which sprang the rule of the maritime law. It was long ago found necessary, in order to regulate the business and conduct of ships, which wander everywhere and are the efficient agents both for good and evil of persons often entirely unknown or impossible to be found, as between man and man, to charge the ship—which is always known and can always be found—not only with the contracts but the torts of her master and her owners.

This same necessity has been felt in respect to the dealings of the ship master and ship owner with the government, and accordingly the act of 1866, in order to secure obedience to the revenue laws, causes the unlawful acts of the ship master and ship owner to charge the ship herself with the penalties prescribed for the violation of those laws.

The legal effect of this statute, therefore, taken in connection with the act of March 2, 1799, is to cause the unlawful transportation of cargo by the master, contrary to the act of March 2, 1799, to charge the ship with the penalty there prescribed, in the same manner as, according to the maritime law, a violation of the sailing rules by the master, which causes a collision, charges the ship with the damages ensuing.

In construing such a statute, milder, as it is, than many statutes, it should be borne in mind, that it is a revenue law, and, like all revenue laws, to be so construed as effectually to accomplish the intention of the legislature, and not, necessarily, with great strictness in favor of the defendant. Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 210.

Let it be noticed, then, that the act does not declare a forfeiture, but simply creates a charge upon the ship, and that the case made by the libel is not one of seizure, but of lien.

Property forfeited to the government may be seized, but I am not aware that a seizure is ever permitted, except when the title to the property has changed, by operation of law. A seizure is an assertion of title in the government, and the subsequent proceedings in court are proceedings to try the title so asserted. When the object of such a seizure is a ship, the subsequent proceeding is, in substance, a petitory suit, and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. The act, therefore, would not support a seizure, for it does not order a forfeiture.

But, it is said, this cannot be so, because the act expressly provides for a seizure, when it declares that the ship "may be seized, and proceeded against summarily, by libel." The word "seized," as here used, cannot, however, be considered as referring to a revenue seizure, but to that seizure by the marshal, under the process of the court, which forms part of every proceeding in rem, in the admiralty. So construed, the provision for a seizure and summary hearing, upon a libel, is simply a statutory averment of the jurisdiction of the district courts, to enforce the lien, which the act creates, according to the course of the admiralty. This construction of the act is, certainly, reasonable, while to hold that the word "seizure," as used, was intended to authorize an assertion of title to property not forfeited, but simply subject to a lien, perhaps insignificant in amount, would be to give to the statute a strange and harsh effect. My opinion, therefore, is, the objection to the libel, that it does not aver a seizure within the district, must fail. No such averment is necessary, because no prior seizure could be legally made, in a case like this.

The case being, then, simply a proceeding to enforce a lien, the next question is, whether it is a civil case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It might be deemed a sufficient answer to this question, to say, that the act, when it declares that the proceeding against the ship shall be by libel, clearly intended to declare the cases under it to be cases of admiralty jurisdiction. But if this be not so, or if a doubt be entertained as to the competency of the legislature to require a proceeding according to the course of the admiralty, in a case not within the constitutional provision, I hold the present case to be within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, and for two reasons.

One reason—to my own mind entirely satisfactory—is, that it is a proceeding to enforce a lien upon a ship. A ship is never free from liens. From her cradle on the stocks, to her grave in the sand, she is always, to a greater or less degree, encumbered by those charges which attach to her, under the rules of the maritime law. These liens are necessities of her existence and usefulness as a ship. They are to the ship what credit is to the merchant. Without them, she must lie by the wall; by means of them, she plows the sea. A proceeding to enforce any lien upon a ship, by her sale—which is the only method of enforcing a lien—must, if injustice is to be avoided, call in question all the liens upon her, and must, accordingly, involve an adjudication upon liens created by the maritime law, and exclusively maritime in their nature. It would seem, therefore, that it might well be held, for this reason, if for no other, that all such proceedings should be taken in that court to which the determination of maritime questions more especially belongs.

And all such proceedings should be held to be within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, for the further reason that the proceeding in rem of the admiralty is the only proceeding, known to the law, which is competent to determine the rights which are liable to be involved by any attempt to enforce a lien upon a ship.

An illustration, such as might be presented any day, will serve to show the correctness of this proposition. Suppose, then, the case of a lien upon a ship, to the extent of her value, under this act of 1866, and that the ship proves to have been heavily bottomried abroad, and, on the voyage home, to have sustained a collision, by which a ship, equal to her in value, has been sunk. Of course, upon arrival, she owes a considerable sum to her crew, and her cargo turns out damaged by the disaster. If, in such a case, the lien of the government is to be enforced by a suit at law, who is to be the defendant? Do you say, the owners? They have no interest to defend, until they have successfully disputed both the bottomry and the collision demands. If you say, the bond-holder, his interest depends upon the validity of his bond, and the invalidity of the collision demand; and that, in turn, can only be recognized after it appears that the cause of the collision was faulty navigation of the vessel proceeded against; and what, in such a suit, is to become of the sailors, and of the demands of the numerous freighters?

To such a state of facts—and I have supposed no unreasonable case—a suit at law is inadequate. In all such cases, the proceeding in rem of the admiralty, to which all the world are parties—a proceeding which is, in some sense, the ship's bankrupt proceeding, whereby she is discharged of all her debts, and her value distributed among her creditors—a proceeding, of which the supreme court, in the case of The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 427, say: "The distinguishing and characteristic feature of a proceeding in admiralty is, that the vessel or thing proceeded against is itself seized, and impleaded defendant, and judged, and sentenced accordingly," —such a proceeding, I say, is a necessity, if injustice is to be avoided. By means of that most sensible and useful of legal proceedings, the conflicting demands of the government, of the bondholder, of the owner, of the crew and of the freighters in the case supposed, are all easily adjudicated and disposed of at once—perhaps even the ship meanwhile earning a sum equal to them all, to the advantage of her owners, and the benefit of mankind.

My own opinion, therefore, is, that a sufficient reason for sustaining the jurisdiction of the admiralty in a case like this is to be found in the nature of the thing to be proceeded against—namely, a ship.

But a second reason can be given, and that is, that the subject-matter, which is the foundation of the charge upon the ship, is clearly maritime in its character, and therefore within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States. The lien which is sought to be enforced arises, under the statute, out of an alleged unlawful importation of cargo by this ship. This is as clearly a "water transaction"—to use the words of Chief Justice Marshall—as the exportation of cargo, and in the case of The Vengeance, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 297, the jurisdiction was sustained upon the sole ground that the exportation of cargo in a ship was a water transaction. Such matters have indeed long been conceded to be within the lawful jurisdiction of the admiralty. Godol. 43.

If, then, the subject-matter out of which the lien arises be maritime, the lien, although created by statute, may be enforced in the admiralty. The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 522.

Because of the subject-matter, therefore, I hold the present proceeding to be a case within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States.

Nor do I see any difficulties, in the way of enforcing the act of July, 1866, in accordance with these views, such as seem to have occurred to the minds of some, in considering the effect of similar provisions in the passenger laws. The provision of the act which requires the proceeding to be by libel in the admiralty, would doubtless be held to import that the lien is to be treated according to the principles and rules of the admiralty, which are ample to prevent injustice and also to protect commerce.

Again, it is objected to this libel that it fails to show jurisdiction in this court, inasmuch as the libel does not show that jurisdiction of a criminal prosecution for the illegal importation of the cargo in question is in the district court of this district, while the act of 1866 declares that the proceedings against the vessel shall be "in the district court having jurisdiction of the offence."

If it were necessary, controlling reasons could be assigned against holding the word offence, as here used, to refer to the criminal act of the master or owner, but I understand it to be conceded that this cargo was brought from a foreign port to the city of New York by way of Sandy Hook, and an amendment of the libel to correspond with the facts will therefore obviate the necessity of determining this point in this case. The offence, created by the 24th section of the act of March 2d, 1799, is complete when the goods are brought within the limits of a port of entry,—U. S. v. Ten Thousand Cigars [Case No. 16,450]; and all cargoes brought from sea by Sandy Hook to the port of entry of New York, first arrive at such port within the limits of the Eastern district of New York. Under any construction, this court would accordingly have jurisdiction. Furthermore, I apprehend that the provision of the act of February 25th, 1865, which confers upon this court concurrent jurisdiction with the Southern district of New York over all seizures and matters made or done in the waters of the harbor of New York, would cover the case.

There remains to consider one other objection to this libel, which is, that it contains no averment of a prior judgment against the master for the penalty now sought to be recovered against the vessel. Upon this question my opinion is, that, under the act of 1866, proceedings like the present may be taken against the vessel in the absence of any proceedings against the master or owner.

The obvious intention of the act was to enable the government to enforce the revenue laws by a prompt seizure and prosecution of the vessel, in case of a violation of them. It therefore declares that, when the master or owner incurs a penalty, the vessel may be seized and proceeded against summarily. If a forfeiture had been declared, any previous proceedings against the master would not have been suggested; and a forfeiture, to be followed by instant seizure without prior proceedings against any one, is frequently declared for the act of the master. Thus the act of March 2, 1799, forfeits the vessel, for the unloading of cargo before arrival at place of discharge, and also for the unloading without permit, or otherwise than in open day. The act of June 27, 1864, forfeits the vessel, for unloading except in presence of an inspector, and for a refusal of the person in charge to deliver the key. The act of July 18th, 1866, forfeits the vessel, for failure of the master to report at the first port all goods bought for use of the vessel in British provinces. The act of 28th March, 1826, forfeits the vessel, for neglect of the master to deliver his manifest.

In place of instant forfeiture of the whole vessel, the act of 1866 creates a lien, which is by far the milder form of punishment, and, if so construed as to render it as effective as possible, it will still be much less vigorous than many laws. It is easy, therefore, to say that the words, "holden for the payment of such penalty," used in this act, are intended to create an original liability on the part of the ship for a penalty equal to that imposed upon the master or owner, and that the words, "seized and proceeded against summarily," preclude the idea of delay, and import that the proceeding may follow the unlawful act, and rest upon that alone—thus adopting the rule of the maritime law, that a ship may be treated as a person, and "judged and sentenced accordingly." The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 427; The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 14.

And it will be found that great difficulties attend any other construction of the act for if it be held that the ship becomes chargeable by the unlawful act when committed, but can only be proceeded against at the termination of proceedings against the master or owner, which may be commenced at any time within five years, a most dangerous class of secret liens upon ships will be created, to the great detriment of commerce, with but little, if any, advantage to the government; while if it be held that, under the act, the vessel first became chargeable upon the rendition of a judgment against the master or owner, the ship would become first chargeable long after the transaction, when she might meanwhile have been sold to innocent parties, or encumbered by liens to her full value, or removed to foreign parts.

A further objection to the latter construction seems to me also entitled to great weight, namely, that, under it, the owners and other parties interested in the ship would be debarred from the right to contest the question of liability for the penalty. A judgment against the ship master, in an action where he would be the only defendant, and of which no others would have notice, would be conclusive of the liability of the ship. I cannot believe that such was the intention of the legislature.

On the other hand, it may be said, that, under the construction here sought to be given to the act, the proceeding against the ship would often be a proceeding to collect an uncertain sum, inasmuch as many of the penalties imposed for violations of the revenue laws are, within certain limits, left to the discretion of the court which tries the offender.

To which the sufficient answer is, that the same discretion can as well be exercised in the proceeding in rem against the ship, as in the proceeding in personam against the master. Proceedings in rem, for sums uncertain and dependent on the judicial discretion, are common proceedings in the admiralty, as, for instance, actions for salvage, personal injuries, and the like.

The considerations, which I have thus endeavored to present, seem to me to lead forcibly to the conclusion to which I have arrived, that, under the act of 1866, taken in connection with the 24th section of the act of March 2, 1799, the facts alleged to exist in the present case are sufficient to create a lien upon this steamer for the amount of the penalty claimed, which may be enforced by a proceeding in admiralty in this court, without proof of a prior seizure of the vessel or of a prior judgment against the master for such penalty.

Let an order be entered over-ruling the exceptions, and requiring the claimants to answer within one week, unless further time be granted.

[At a subsequent hearing, a decree was entered against the vessel for a penalty of $2,342, and costs. Case No. 9,653. This was affirmed upon appeal to the circuit court. Id. 15,785.]

1. On the arrival of a steamer from Havana at the port of New York, several lots of cigars, no one of which lots consisted of as many as three thousand, or had any shipping marks on them, were found in different parts of the vessel. No permits were obtained by any one for the landing of any of these lots, and they were not on the manifest, and were not returned by the officers as landed with the cargo: Held, that, as no entry of cigars of less than three thousand in a single package can be made (14 Stat. 328), and as all goods on the manifest must be designated by a shipping mark (1 Stat. 644), none of these goods could have been intended to be on the manifest, and all must have been intended to be landed, and the steamer was, therefore, liable for the penalty of the value of the goods, under the 8th section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 180).

2. Goods are imported and brought into the United States, when brought within the limits of a port of entry with the intention of unlading them there.

3. A paper, purporting on its face to be the manifest of the steamer, was proved to have been produced from the usual place of deposit in the custom house for ships' manifests, and it was proved that no other manifest for the voyage was on file, but no other proof of the genuineness of the paper was offered: Held, that the paper was admissible in evidence.

4. It was proved that certain other lots of cigars were brought to the store-room of the seizure department of the custom house, as seized goods, and the reports of the seizure, required by the regulation, and produced from the files of the department, stated that these lots had been found on the steamer. No such lots of cigars appeared on the manifest: Held, that this evidence was not sufficient evidence of the importation of the goods in the vessel to shift the burden of proof to the claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem, wherein, under the provisions of the act of July 18, 1866, § 8 (14 Stat. 180), it is sought to charge the steamship Missouri with the amount of certain penalties, to which it is claimed the master of that vessel has become subject, by reason of the importing or bringing into the United States from a foreign port, in that vessel, certain quantities of cigars, which were not included in or described in the manifest, as required by the act of March 2, 1799, § 24 (1 Stat. 646). The main questions of law, upon which the right to maintain this action depends, have been determined, so far as this court is concerned, in disposing of the exceptions which were taken to the libel [Case No. 9,652], and will not be again referred to. The only question now presented is, as to the sufficiency of the evidence introduced by the government to show that the cigars described in the libel were imported into the United States from a foreign port, in this steamer, without being included in the ship's manifest.

The proofs show, that the Missouri arrived in the port of New York, on the 1st of October, 1868, from Havana, and proceeded, by way of the Narrows, to pier 4, North river, where she lay until October 8th. She came directly from Havana to this port, and such goods as were brought in her, were imported and brought into the United States when brought within the limits of a port of entry, with the intention of unlading them there, U. S. v. 10,000 Cigars [Case No. 16,450], and cases cited.

After the arrival of the steamer at the pier, as the evidence shows, eleven different lots of cigars were found stowed away in different parts of the vessel, some in the coal bunker, some in a closet, some in the forecastle, some concealed among the cargo amidships, and some in the lower hold, no one of which lots contained as many as 3,000, or had any shipping marks upon them. No permits were obtained by any one for the landing of any one of these lots, and none of them were returned by the officer as landed with the cargo. According to the act of July 28, 1866, § 1 (14 Stat. 328), no entry of cigars of less than 3,000 in a single package can be made, and according to the act of March 2, 1799, § 23 (1 Stat. 644), all goods upon the manifest must be designated by a shipping mark. None of these goods could, therefore, have been intended to be upon the manifest, and all must have been intended to be landed.

The facts above stated are proved by the witnesses who seized the cigars, and by the production of the officer's return, in which none of these lots appear, and, in addition, the manifest of the vessel is produced from the files of the custom house, in which none of these cigars were described or alluded to. Objection is made to the introduction of the manifest, upon the ground that its genuineness is not proved. But the document produced is proved to have been produced from the usual place of deposit, in the custom house, for ship-manifests. It purports, on its face, to be this steamer's manifest for the voyage in question, and it is proved that no other manifest for the voyage is on file. The law required the vessel to have a manifest, and that the master should deliver it to the collector of customs, and, being produced from the custody of the collector, under such circumstances, the place of its deposit is sufficient to warrant its introduction in evidence. U. S. v. Johns, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 415; Catlett v. Pacific Ins. Co. [Case No. 2,517]; Buckley v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 251.

There are three other lots of cigars mentioned in the information, and known in this proceeding as lots 12, 13 and 14, in regard to which the only evidence tending to show that they were imported in this vessel, is the fact that, at the time this steamer was here, they were brought to the store-room of the seizure department of the custom house, as seized goods, and the regular reports of their seizure, required by the regulation, produced from the files, state that the cigars named were found on this steamer, in places described, immediately after her arrival on this voyage.

This evidence, coupled with the absence of any such packages from the manifest, and the officers' return of the cargo, it has been insisted, is sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the claimants. But this cannot be so. The facts proved furnish no evidence which will warrant the inference that the three lots of goods were brought into this port in this steamer. The value of the various lots, as to which I have found the evidence to be sufficient, is $2,342, and the statute fixes the penalty at the value of the property. For that amount the steamer must be, therefore, held liable, and a decree against her for that amount, with costs, will be entered.

[This cause was taken into the circuit court on an appeal, where the discussion on the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 180), and the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 646), resulted in the concurrence of the presiding judge with the opinion delivered in the district court. Case No. 15,785.]

Case No. 9,654.

The MISSOURI.

[1 Spr. 260; 18 Law Rep. 38.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1854.

SALVAGE — FRAUDULENT CONSPIRACY — WHO AFFECTED BY THE FRAUD — CONCEALED PROPERTY.

A vessel had been saved from going to pieces on the rocks, with the aid of the master and crew of another vessel, and was subsequently stranded. While the property on board was in the process of transportation to the other vessel, with their aid, and was still in danger, the masters of the two vessels engaged in a fraudulent conspiracy to appropriate to their own use a portion of the property saved. Part was afterwards remitted to the owners. The master of the salving vessel brought a part to a home port, and concealed it. It was subsequently discovered by other persons, and seized on a libel, in behalf of the owners and crew of the salving vessel, for salvage: Held, that the fraudulent conduct of the master did not defeat their claim; that they were entitled to salvage, both on the property concealed, and on that remitted, and had a lien on the former for the salvage due on both.

[Cited in U. S. v. Stone, 8 Fed. 250.]

This was a libel [against A. T. Leach and others] in behalf of the owners and crew of the ship Sterling, of Salem, Henry C. Pitman, master, for salvage on a large amount of specie, and some other property, taken, and alleged to have been saved, from the barque Missouri, of New York, Samuel N. Dixey, master, when wrecked on the coast of Sumatra. The master and first and second mates of the Sterling were not parties to the libel. In October, 1850, the Missouri and Sterling were lying together in Rigas Bay, waiting to take in cargoes of pepper; each with a large amount, (the Missouri about $24,000,) of specie on board. In the afternoon of October 31st, the Missouri got under way to leave the bay, but was taken aback, at the entrance of the harbor, by a head wind, and let go her anchor. The next morning she was riding with one anchor, very near a high rocky bluff, and as the libellants' witnesses testified, with a heavy sea running, and a gale blowing on shore. Captain Pitman came on board about 10 a. m., and remained a half hour, or an hour, and then left, after making an arrangement that Dixey should hoist a signal, in case he wished to get under way. In the afternoon, about 4 o'clock, the Missouri still riding with one anchor, a signal was hoisted, and Pitman, with four men, came to the Missouri. Just before he reached her, the cable parted; another anchor was let go, but the cable of that also parted. Pitman and his men assisted in making sail on the vessel. She weathered the point, and came into a bight between two rocky bluffs, with a sandy beach about half a mile long, the wind and sea setting in upon the beach. They attempted to tack, but, owing to the chains under foot, she missed stays. The kedge was thrown out, but came home, and she went stern on, upon the beach. A large amount of specie was removed to the Sterling that night; and, either the night of the wreck, as the claimants contended, or the next morning, as the libellants admitted, while the alleged salvors, or some of them, were still engaged in saving articles from the wreck, Pitman and Dixey agreed to appropriate about two-thirds of the specie to their own use, and to restore about one-third to the owners, reporting to them that the Malays had stolen the remainder; part of which the libellants contended the Malays did actually take. No attempt was made to get the Missouri off, at any time. The Sterling proceeded to Analaboo, where Dixey procured another vessel, which he manned with his crew, and sailed for Penang, taking with him part of the specie, and part he left on board the Sterling, in charge of Captain Pitman. After their separation, Dixey remitted to his owners, in New York, by bills of exchange, the sum of $7,355.18. Pitman completed his cargo, and arrived at Holmes' Hole in the winter of 1851. When there, he went on shore and secretly buried in the sand a large amount of specie. Subsequently, Pitman and Dixey were indicted for stealing and plundering from the Missouri, on the coast of Sumatra. Dixey pleaded guilty, and Pitman was tried and convicted, at the March term of this court, A. D. 1852. Before this, information having been obtained in regard to the burial of the money, a reward was offered, and about $7,500 was discovered near Holmes' Hole, brought to Boston, and placed in the custody of the court. Against this specie, the present libel was filed. On the trial of the present case, a great deal of evidence was introduced, bearing upon the conduct of Pitman and Dixey, in regard to the management of the vessel and the disposition of the specie, the danger incurred from the Malays, the probability that any of the specie fell into their hands, the burial of the money at Holmes' Hole, the expense and trouble incurred in recovering it, and other matters. This evidence it is not necessary to give in detail. The conclusions of fact, reached by the court, appear in the opinion.

R. H. Dana, Jr., for libellants. This argument is not reported, as the points and authorities will be found sufficiently referred to in the opinion of the court.

Rufus Choate and Geo. S. Hale, for claimants, suggested that there were circumstances in the case, which gave rise to the suspicion that the Missouri might have been purposely wrecked, and as to this, referred to the authorities cited to the other points. No salvage is recoverable, because the loss was occasioned by the negligence of Pitman, agent of the owners of the Sterling. The Duke of Manchester, 4 Notes of Cas. 575; Shersby v. Hibbert, 5 Notes of Cas. 470; The Neptune, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 297. The negligence which will defeat a claim for salvage, is not necessarily gross negligence, but ordinary negligence, for a person of the experience and occupation of the alleged salvors. The Cape Packet, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 125; The Dygden, 1 Notes of Cas. 115. No claim for salvage can be entertained, because the specie was taken from the Missouri animo furandi. No title to property, or right to compensation, can be acquired for any one by a violation of the law. "Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. Jus ex injuria non oritur. Non debeo melioris conditionis esse quam auctor meus, a quo jus in me transit." Broom, Leg. Max. 571. An attachment, effected by illegally breaking the defendant's door is invalid. Ilsley v. Nichols, 12 Pick. 270. A common carrier has no lien on goods unlawfully put into his hands and transported. Robinson v. Baker, 5 Cush. 144.

By the general principles of salvage, the act on which the claim is founded must be lawful. Talbot v. Seeman, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 3, 28; The Alerta, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 359, 367; The Bee [Case No. 1,219]; The Florence, 20 Eng. Law & Eq. 607, 616; The Barefoot, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 661; Clarke v. The Dodge Healy [Case No. 2,849]; Rowe v. The Brig [Id. 12,093]; The Adventure, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 221, 227; The Fleece, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 279; The Blenden-Hall, 1 Dod. 414. And see Laws Oleron, art. 25, in 1 Pet. Adm. Append. 39. The right to salvage is founded on enlarged principles of public policy, as a reward to noble conduct. It is designed to encourage honesty, and discourage fraud. The Boston [Case No. 1,673]; Talbot v. Seeman, supra; The Emulous [Id. 4,480]; The Henry Ewbank [Id. 6,376]. But where the act, without which there is no salvage, is in itself a gross crime, these principles forbid a reward.

It is everywhere admitted, that embezzlement, or gross misconduct, forfeits a vested claim for salvage, as against the guilty party. What, then, is the ground of the owners' claim to salvage, independent of the guilty master? Admitting that an embezzlement by him, subsequent to the vesting of a salvage claim by meritorious acts, might not affect their right, still, when the act of crime is inseparable from the salvage service, and the disposition made of the property saved is designed to carry out a felonious purpose, the nature of the act defeats any claim for salvage; or, to speak more correctly, no claim for salvage can arise. Here the libel alleges, that this salvage service was the removal to the Sterling, and previous acts of the salvors. But this removal was larceny; it was a felonious trespass. What, then, is the foundation of the owners' claim? The early English authorities do not seem inclined to favor it. It has been said, "The master and crew are, in strict language, the only salvors;" that "in former times, before the introduction of steam vessels," the claim of owners was only "incidentally" entertained. Cases where the ship herself rendered considerable service, were considered as a sort of exception. Dr. Lushington says, the owners of a steam vessel "may come in and make a claim, as owners of the vessel, incidental to the claim of the master and crew." The Beulah, 2 Notes of Cas. 61; The San Bernardo, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 178; The Vine, 2 Hagg. Adm. 1; The Salacia, Id. 264; The Charlotte, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 72, 6 Notes of Cas. 281; The Two Friends, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 349. Thus, we contend, their claim is recognized, as derivative and incidental, arising from, and depending on, the master's act. The crew may stand on a different footing from the owners. They labor with their hands; they incur personal hazard, and their claim may be considered as original and independent, and, therefore, be not affected by a fraud, like that here committed, while that of the owners is defeated by it.

Here it has been held by Story, J., that the master has an implied authority from the owners to save property. The Nathaniel Hooper [Case No. 10,032]. And the same judge says: "A salvage crew cannot, by any shuffling, or management, deprive the owners of their right to share in the salvage. They must take or lose in common with the latter." The Henry Ewbank, supra, 419. See The Robert, 3 C. Rob. Adm. 202. And in The Britain, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 40, it is held, that the master may bind his owners, by an agreement to do salvage service, for a specified sum. Salvage service, then, is in the course of his employment, and the owner is responsible for acts done in the course of such employment, though wilful and malicious, criminal and not authorized. Dias v. The Revenge [Case No. 3,877]; Ralston v. The State Rights [Id. 11,540]; Die Fire Damer, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 358. The act, whatever it is, is the foundation of their claim. "Qui sentit commodum sentire debet et onus." Adopting the act, they adopt its consequences, and such ratification is equivalent to a previous authority. Broom Leg. Max. 553, 557, 679. Would the owners have a claim for salvage if Pitman and Dixey had wilfully cast the Missouri away, with the design, which it is admitted they formed and attempted to carry out afterwards, of appropriating a part not designated to themselves? The specie would be in as much danger, and the owners as innocent, as now. But it would be an outrage on every principle of justice and sound policy, to permit a felon to recommend himself to his employers, and afford a motive to them to protect him against his crime; by securing a large reward for them, by that crime, and to enforce, by the aid of a court of justice, compensation for an act which is part of a scheme in defiance of all justice. Gross negligence of salvors, pending the salvage, forfeits the owners' claim for previous meritorious services. The Duke of Manchester, supra. Why not larceny of the property saved? In the cases of The Florence, and The Barefoot, the owners' claim was held to be forfeited, or prevented, by the alleged acts of the master and crew, if proved.

The Rising Sun [Case No. 11,858], cited by libellants, was purely a case of subsequent embezzlement, i. e., subsequent to meritorious acts, by which, it may perhaps be said, the claim for salvage had vested. It does not appear, as a matter of fact, in The Boston [Id. 1,673], or Mason v. The Blaireau, cited by the libellants, that the embezzlement was committed before the property saved reached a place of safety. In The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240, it was held immaterial, whether it was committed before or after reaching the port of Baltimore, as to the question then before the court; but Judge Marshall said: "The fact must have occurred before he parted with the possession acquired by the act, on the merit of which his claim for salvage is founded." There can be no claim for salvage on the money remitted. The felonious taking applied to the whole sum, and infected the whole transaction. The remitting was part of the fraud, designed to assist in concealing it; furthermore, the remedy for salvage on that is only by a libel in personam against the owners, to whom it has been delivered. Lewis v. The Elizabeth & Jane [Case No. 8,321]; Brevoor v. The Fair American [Id. 1,847]; The Nicolai Heinrich, 22 Eng. Law & Eq. 617. And for the salvage, if any, due on this, there is no lien on the rest. When this specie was taken out by the claimants, they entered into a stipulation to pay the sum decreed by the court, as salvage. On what? Only on the specie for which they stipulated. If salvage on $15,000 can be decreed here, when $7,500 have been seized on the libel, the stipulators might be held to pay more than the value of the property libelled, which can never be intended. And see The Ooster Eems, cited in The Two Friends, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 271, 284, note; The Progress, 1 Edw. Adm. 210; The North Carolina, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 40; Cutler v. Rae, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 729. There is no right to salvage on the specie found at Holmes' Hole. It is well settled, that salvage is only due on property actually saved, however meritorious the services of the salvors. The Dodge Healey, supra; The Ranger, 3 Notes of Cas. 590. And when the salvors, having performed salvage services, abandon the property, they forfeit their claim. The India, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 406. This specie was abandoned,—not restored to the owners, but abstracted from them, and concealed. The true salvors are those who dug it up on the island. It was recovered solely by their exertions, and those of the claimants, without any assistance from any one of the libellants, and if the whole matter had been left to them, it would never have been recovered. If any salvage is given here, it must be small. There was no deviation, no risk, no loss of time, little labor; and a large deduction must be made for the expenses incurred by the claimants in recovering the specie, and for the articles not restored.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, delivered his opinion, in substance, as follows:

There is no doubt that the Missouri and cargo were in peril, at the time referred to, and in a condition to be the subjects of salvage service; and that the libellants rendered a salvage service, in taking from the vessel a large quantity of specie, a great part of which has come to the possession of the claimants. The safety of this specie is owing to voluntary exertions of the seamen of the Sterling, and to the use of the Sterling herself. But the claimants insist, that there are facts here which defeat this claim; that there was a fraudulent conspiracy by the masters of the two vessels to embezzle part, at least, of the money. It is not denied that there was a conspiracy and actual embezzlement; but it is contended by the libellants, that those only who participated in the fraud should suffer for it, and that the innocent should not bear the penalty. The research and learning of the counsel have produced no case, where the courts have gone further than to inflict that punishment on the guilty; none where they have gone so far as to decide that others, not personally implicated in the offence, shall forfeit their right. Two cases are relied upon: The Florence, and The Barefoot. In the former, there was no misconduct, and no forfeiture. In the latter, the vessel having been sunk on the coast, several small vessels from the shore interfered, and obstructed the owners of the cargo, in their endeavors to save it. The owners of these vessels did not assert their innocence, and it was not even suggested that the wrongful interference was without their assent.

But it is insisted that the circumstances of this case go beyond any which have as yet been reported, on the ground that the act here performed, on which the libellants' claim was founded, was fraudulent in its inception.

It is urged that it is not a case of subsequent embezzlement, but of a fraudulent conspiracy in the beginning, that the property should be originally taken for a fraudulent purpose; that, as Captain Pitman had the control of the Sterling and her crew, and intended by his acts to commit a fraud, the owners and crew, as well as himself, can claim only through a fraud, which the law does not allow. And this, certainly, deserves consideration. I think it clear, and, indeed, it is not distinctly contended otherwise, that there was no fraud, or misconduct, previous to the stranding. The proof is, that the skill and labor of Pitman and his men assisted materially in saving the vessel from total destruction. There is no ground to presume that any fraud was conceived, until after the vessel was wrecked upon the beach. But the salvage service had been previously commenced, by saving the vessel and cargo from total loss upon the rocks. With respect to the time of the conspiracy, the evidence shows that after the stranding of the Missouri, and before the removal of the specie, while it was in preparation for removal, the appropriation of it to their own use was suggested by Dixey to Pitman; and the latter testifies that the only objection he made, was the danger of discovery. I am satisfied, that, although at that time there was no settled plan, as to the division of the money, yet that the proposition was so far entertained that Captain Pitman acceded to measures designed to conceal the real quantity of specie, and to a misrepresentation of the quantity, which would be a means of deceiving others. I cannot but consider their whole conduct as intended, at the time, to place themselves in a position to take advantage of any opportunity to appropriate the specie; and that Pitman was willing to wait and see if it could be done, and, if so, to join in the crime. I think his intention was to keep the course of proceeding in his own power; and that must affect his conduct, so as to give it the character of a fraudulent transaction on his part, from the time of the first suggestion by Dixey.

Therefore, so far as the facts are concerned, I find that before the specie was fully transferred, and while it was in process of transportation, there was a fraudulent conspiracy designed to be carried into effect, if means could be found for concealment, and that the parties did subsequently carry it into effect.

I shall now consider the two different funds to which this claim relates.

First, as to the sum of $9,000, which it is said the parties intended to restore to the owners. That was taken from the Sterling by Dixey, and the greater part of it transmitted to them. That was originally saved, avowedly, for the owners, and came to their use; but it is insisted, that no salvage is due on that because it was contaminated by the general fraudulent intent. But shall that defeat the claim of the crew and owner? Why should the crew be deprived of their reward? It is said, because the master entered into a fraudulent conspiracy. But it is not pretended, that they participated in it. What is their condition? The vessel was stranded. They went on board, rescued the specie, transported it to the Sterling, and delivered it to the agent of the owners. This was the service of the crew, aided by the vessel.

A claim for salvage rests on two grounds,—individual justice and public policy. Why should the crew be deprived of it, on either ground? Their services were faithfully rendered, and on the ground of private justice, their claim is the same as in any other case. As to public policy, that policy generally favors the preservation of property. It is for the interest of mankind that the fruits of human labor should be preserved. It is the policy, too, of every country, that its own property should be preserved. Its preservation is beneficial, into whatever hands it falls; but the original owner must not be divested of more than that policy requires. The books state, in detail, various elements to be taken into consideration, in determining the amount to be paid to those who have rendered a salvage service, but I have nowhere seen a satisfactory general principle laid down. I think the true principle of the salvage reward is, to give a sufficient inducement to render the service promptly, perseveringly, and honestly. And in some cases, as on a dangerous coast, to offer sufficient inducements to competent persons to keep themselves in a state of preparation to afford relief, and to be watchful in the discovery of objects requiring it. This accords both with public policy and the true interest of the owners.

It must be remembered, that salvage is a contingent compensation. And the law should afford an inducement to exertion, where it is as yet unknown whether any reward will be secured. Without this, there will be nothing but motives of humanity operating upon the mind.

Sometimes great exertions are made, and great hazard and loss incurred, without success, and public policy requires that such a promise of reward should be held out, in case of success, that all those in a situation and competent to render relief, shall be eager to do so, from the mere hope of gain; for example, that the sailor, who alone sees from the mast-head a vessel in distress, or the master, who descries her at a distance, with a telescope, shall not be tempted to pass her by, but shall have a prospect of pecuniary advantage, which may prompt his efforts.

Why, then, deprive the seamen of their reward, because another man has acted with an improper purpose? If, indeed, his fraud is so carried out, that the property is not restored, they lose that reward; but that is because their efforts are not ultimately successful.

There is, however, a technical argument, that they claim through the master, and under him. But salvage service is voluntary. The master has no authority to compel seamen to engage in it. I do not mean to say that they may not be bound to act under his orders, if they engage in the service; but the service itself is voluntary.

Further, the salvage service did not begin with the removal of specie. It began when they went on board, and assisted in making sail on the Missouri, to weather the point. There was a salvage service in thus relieving the vessel and cargo from the imminent peril of going on the rocks,—continued by saving the cargo and part of the appurtenances of the vessel.

This was, undoubtedly, in aid of the Missouri's crew, but that is unimportant. Dixey continued to be master, so long as they remained on board of the Missouri. The only thing that can be said to vary this from other cases, is, that possession continued in Dixey, until they got on board the Sterling. Then the possession was in Pitman and his crew; because Pitman was in command, and Dixey was under his control. If Dixey was assigned, as it is argued, a particular part of the cabin, and the specie placed in his charge, still I do not think that changes the legal or equitable aspect of the case.

The salvage service was honestly performed by the crew, and then the property was intrusted by them, as perhaps they were obliged to intrust it, since they could not control it on board of the Sterling, to the custody of Pitman.

As to the right of the owners of the Sterling, it is argued by the claimants that, in the cases where salvage was allowed to the owner, but forfeited by the guilty party, the embezzlement took place after the property had reached a place of safety. I do not find that question raised in the cases, and do not see why the cases cited by the libellants' counsel do not cover this point. See Mason v. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240; The Boston [Case No. 1,673]; The Rising Sun [Id. 11,858]. In all these cases, the embezzlement was while the property was in the care and custody of the salvors. There is no difference in principle between embezzlement before and after the property has been brought to a place of safety, and while still in the possession and control of the salvors. But it is contended that the master is the agent of the owners, and that they claim through his fraud, which the law will not permit. But is it so? What had the owners to do with the fraud? Nothing. It was not authorized by them. The truth is, the acts of Pitman were as well a fraud on the owners of the Sterling, as on those of the Missouri, and intended to deprive them of their share of the salvage. Why should the owners of one vessel say to those of the other, your agent conspired with my agent to commit a fraud, and you shall lose by it for my benefit. But I do not rest the decision on this alone. There is no real distinction between this and the other cases.

It is said that the whole claim is through Pitman. How so? He had the power to use their property, but it does not set up, or sanction, his fraud, for them to claim a salvage reward for such use. There was an original service by the owners, as much as by the mariners. Their ship was used; the time of the crew, paid for by them, and their provisions, were used. The whole service was co-ordinate. The men could not act without the ship, nor the ship without the men. The right to salvage accrues from the use of the vessel.

In the early English decisions, the courts seem reluctant to acknowledge the rights of owners, and in some cases have magnified the claims of the master, at their expense, attributing to him the whole merit of the use of the vessel, without considering whether it was by the authority or assent of the owners, or not; but the true view is, to regard him as being permitted by the owners to use their property. If he does so, and loses their vessel, it is their loss, and he is not called upon to make it good. The owners consent to, and authorize the salvage of the property, but not that he should secrete or embezzle it. That is not his agency, and when he does that, it is without their sanction. It is a matter of public policy, to hold out to them an inducement to permit the master to use their vessel. If they should instruct him not to save property, he would be bound by their orders. And they will so instruct him, if the law does not give them, not only a full indemnity, but an additional pecuniary reward.

Now the probability of the reward is an element to be weighed, as well as the amount; but by the doctrine now contended for,' in addition to the ordinary contingencies of salvage service, they must run the risk of the master's honesty.

As to the $9,000, my opinion is, that the owners are entitled to salvage on that amount, or on so much of it as was restored.

With respect to the portion recovered, at Holmes' Hole, I have had more difficulty. That did not come to the owners' use, by the mere act of the salvors. It was concealed on board of the Sterling; was separated from the rest, with the knowledge of Pitman only; brought to Holmes' Hole, and there buried; and has come to the owners' hands by other means. And the question is, whether the right to salvage is lost. I have reflected on this, and have come to the conclusion that it is not. To sustain a claim for salvage, the property must be saved, the salvors must contribute to its safety, and the property must come to the owners' use, or within their reach. Here, the property was saved from impending peril, and has come to the use of the owners. To be sure, the salvors have not personally delivered it. The captain has embezzled it, or at least attempted to do so, and endeavored to deprive them of it. He did not succeed; and it is now in the hands of the claimants. The merit of the owners and seamen is the same, as if no fraud had been attempted by the master. Had Pitman succeeded in his fraudulent attempt, no salvage would have been due; because the property would never have reached its owners. As an illustration, suppose a ship, with treasure on board, is sunk on the other side of the globe, and a vessel is fitted out, proceeds to the spot, and with risk and labor succeeds in obtaining it, and then puts it on board of a third vessel, to be brought home, and on the passage, the master and crew of the latter vessel attempt to embezzle it, but unsuccessfully, and it finally comes to the hands of the owners; shall the original salvors be deprived of their reward? I see no principle of justice, or policy, which requires it.

I think the libellants are entitled to salvage on the $7,500. On the question, whether there is a lien on each part for the whole salvage, I have no doubt. Where the whole property belongs to the same person, there is no reason for saying to the salvors, if you permit any portion of it to go beyond the reach of process, you shall lose your lien upon the residue, for the salvage on such portion. Such a rule would be inconvenient to both parties.

It is for the interest of the owners, that no more of the property should be withheld from them than is necessary for the security of the salvor.

The circumstance that a portion of the specie was separated from the rest, and remitted to the owners by Dixey, their master, can make no difference. The lien for salvage in no degree depends on possession. It is true, that Judge Peters, in Brevoor v. The Fair American [Case No. 1,847]; and after him, Judge Woodbury, Packard v. The Louisa [Id. 10,652],—held the contrary; but they were under a mistake. An admiralty lien is a privilege, a jus in re, perfect where there never has been possession, or where it has been lost or relinquished. To this familiar and well-established doctrine, the lien for freight is an exception, but that for salvage is not.

In determining the amount of salvage to be awarded, it is to be borne in mind, that there was no deviation, or detention, of the Sterling, which could affect her insurance, or delay her voyage; as she was at her anchorage, waiting for the pepper crop, and the services of the crew were of short duration, and attended with no particular hazard.

The amount on which salvage is to be given is $15,103.91. It appears that all but six of the crew have been settled with. I award to the owners of the Sterling $600; to each of her seamen, who was on board the Missouri when she went ashore, $88; to each of her other seamen $53. It appears that $18 was paid to each of them by Captain Dixey, at Analaboo, and receipts taken, expressed to be in full for labor and services. It is contended, that this is a bar to their recovery. Upon all the testimony, I do not think it can be so treated. But the $18 must be deducted from the salvage decreed to each man.

Decree accordingly.

[1 Blatchf. 354.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1848.

AFFREIGHTMENT—RETURN TO SHIPPING PORT—SALE OF CARGO—AUTHORITY OF MASTER.

1. A., by his agents, chartered a vessel for a voyage from New-York to Havre, the freight to be payable on the arrival and discharge of the cargo at Havre. The vessel sailed, but encountered a storm and sprang aleak, and put back to New-York. The cargo was discharged, and, on a survey, was found to be so much damaged by salt water, that it would not bear transportation, nor would its shipment have been safe for the vessel or crew. A.'s agents refused to interfere with it, and the master sold it at auction. In an action by A. for the nett proceeds: Held, that the owner of the vessel was not entitled to retain anything for freight.

2. Whether the underwriters would be liable for the freight, quere.

3. In cases of necessity happening during a voyage, the master is, by law, created the agent for the benefit of all concerned, and his acts done under such circumstances, in the exercise of a sound discretion, are binding upon all parties in interest.

[Cited in The Ann D. Richardson, Case No. 410. Distinguished in Moore v. Hill, 38 Fed. 334.]

4. The voluntary acceptance of the cargo by the shipper at an intermediate port would have the effect to charge him with a ratable portion of the freight.

5. But, where the port of distress and of acceptance of the cargo is the port of shipment, and no part of the voyage has been performed, the shipper ought not to pay freight.

6. Where the voyage is broken up, no more for the benefit of the cargo than for the benefit of the ship owner, and the shipper has derived no benefit under his contract, he ought not to pay any freight.

[Cited in The Ann D. Richardson, Case No. 410.]

7. The master having failed to deliver the cargo according to the bill of lading, and there having been no waiver of performance by the shipper at the port of distress, the owner of the vessel is not entitled to freight, notwithstanding the damaged state of the cargo justified its sale by the master at the port of distress.

[Distinguished in Leckie v. Sears, 109 Mass. 428.]

8. The agency of the master on behalf of the shipper at the port of distress, arising out of the necessities occasioned by the disaster, is limited to the sale of the cargo.

This was an action to recover a sum of money in the defendant's hands, under the following circumstances. The plaintiff shipped a cargo of flour, wheat and corn in bulk, hides, &c., from New-York to Havre, under a charter party, entered into on the 19th of December, 1846, by his agents, and the defendant as agent of the owners of the barque Dana, the freight to be payable on the arrival and discharge of the cargo at the port of delivery. The bills of lading bore date the 16th and 23rd of January, 1847. The plaintiff resided in France and the cargo was purchased and shipped by the house of Marret & Robert of New-York, his agents for that purpose. The vessel sailed on the 27th of January, and, after being out a few days, was overtaken by a violent storm, which crippled her and caused her to spring aleak, so that, notwithstanding a portion of the cargo was thrown overboard, the damage to her was so serious that the captain was obliged to put back to New-York, where he arrived on the 10th of February. It became necessary to discharge the remaining cargo for the purpose of repairing the vessel, and, on a survey, the cargo was found to be so much damaged by the salt water, that it would not bear transportation, nor, in its condition, would the shipment have been safe for the vessel or crew. The shippers, Marret & Robert, refused to interfere, having no authority from the plaintiff except to purchase and ship the goods; and the master, under the circumstances, deemed it best, for the interest of all parties concerned, to sell the cargo at public auction. It was sold accordingly, the nett proceeds amounting to $15,789.12. The purchasers, at considerable labor and expense, dried portions of the wheat, so that it was afterwards sold for full price. The greater part, however, was sold as damaged and at inferior prices. The freight upon the cargo, according to the charter party, amounted to $6,344.50. The ship was repaired, and sailed with a new cargo on the 16th of March, on a voyage to Belfast, Ireland; the freight far exceeding that which would have been earned under the charter to Havre. The defendant, as agent of the ship owners, received the nett proceeds of the sales of the damaged cargo, to recover which this action was brought. The defendant claimed a deduction of the whole amount of the freight under the charter party. A verdict was taken for the plaintiff, for the full amount of the nett proceeds, subject to the opinion of the court.

Francis B. Cutting, for plaintiff.
Daniel Lord, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I have looked into all the cases in the books upon this question, both English and American, and am satisfied that the weight of authority is decidedly against the allowance of any freight, under the circumstances of this case, as between the owner and the shipper. Whether the underwriters would be liable for the freight under their policy, it is not necessary to determine. The same conclusion must also be arrived at on principle. By the contract of the parties, the freight was not to be payable until the arrival and discharge of the cargo at the port of delivery. No part of the contract has been performed. There has been no default on the part of the shipper, nor has he done any act dispensing with performance. There is no doubt, that where the cargo is so much damaged that to proceed with the voyage will endanger the safety of the ship or render the cargo worthless, it is the duty of the master to land and sell it at the port of necessity, in the absence of instructions from the shipper, even though it may have been in a condition to be carried in specie to the port of destination and there landed. In cases of necessity happening during the voyage, the master is, by law, created the agent for the benefit of all concerned, and his acts done under such circumstances, in the exercise of a sound discretion, are binding upon all parties in interest. But the question still arises, whether, in such cases, the shipper is to be subjected to the payment of freight. The voluntary acceptance of the cargo by the shipper at an intermediate port, will, it is admitted, have the effect to charge him with a ratable portion of the freight. But there is no authority for subjecting him to freight, where the port of distress and of acceptance of the cargo is the port of shipment, and where no part of the voyage has been performed. In several such cases, freight has been denied. What seems decisive of this case, and of the class of cases to which it belongs, is, that admitting the master to be the agent, at the port of distress, of all parties interested, and that he has acted bona fide and for the benefit of all concerned, in the sale of the damaged cargo, yet, inasmuch as the goods were in a condition that would endanger the safety of the ship and the lives of the crew, if they were carried forward, it cannot be said that the voyage was broken up for the benefit of the cargo any more than for the benefit of the ship-owners. Independently of any duty that the master owed to the cargo under the existing calamity, the interest of his owners dictated the breaking up of the voyage; and, it being broken up under those circumstances and for that cause, and the shipper having derived no benefit under his contract, it is difficult to find any principle, legal or equitable, that would subject him to any part of the freight. Judgment for plaintiff.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—PART OF FIRM PETITIONING.

1. A firm, originally composed of three members, was dissolved by the withdrawal of one. The two remaining members, constituting a new firm, subsequently filed their petition in bankruptcy. Upon objection being made by the member of the firm who had withdrawn, it was held, that the court has jurisdiction of the petition of the two parties, though the firm may have been composed of three.

[Explained in Re Wallace, Case No. 17,095.]

[2. Cited in Re Redmond, Case No. 11,632, to the point that a conveyance by one partner of his individual property, although an act of bankruptcy as against him, will not sustain a proceeding in bankruptcy as against the firm, even though such conveyance was made with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud firm creditors, or with a view to give a preference to a firm creditor. In such case this proceeding must be against such partner alone.]

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

LOWELL, District Judge. The bankrupts were partners in trade under the firm name of Mitchell & Moulton, before November, 1868, and contracted debts which are yet unpaid. In that month they made a new firm by joining with them one George W. Duncan, under the style of Mitchell, Moulton & Co. The firm lasted about two months, when Duncan retired and assigned all his interest in the joint business and effects to Mitchell & Moulton, and they undertook to pay all the joint debts and save Duncan harmless therefrom; and they gave him a mortgage for one thousand dollars on the machinery and fixtures of the late firm, as security for the performance of this undertaking. Mitchell & Moulton continued to be associated together until they lately filed their joint petition in bankruptcy in the usual form as copartners. Their schedules show debts of the first firm of Mitchell & Moulton, and debts of the second firm of Mitchell, Moulton & Co., and none of the last firm. The only joint assets are the machinery and fixtures, valued at three thousand dollars, and mortgaged to Duncan, as before noticed, for one thousand dollars. George W. Duncan appeared before the register and objected to his proceeding with the cause; and the register has certified the facts to me, and a brief has been submitted in support of the objections. The point taken is that the court has no jurisdiction of a petition by two partners of a firm of three. I suppose the register had grave doubts of the jurisdiction, or he would not have certified the case to me. It was not a question arising in the course of the proceedings, but a suggestion by an amicus curiae going to defeat the suit entirely; and as such, proper enough to be certified on the responsibility of the register. It is the first time I ever heard that a member of a firm cannot commit a separate act of bankruptcy and become bankrupt without joining his copartners, which appears to be the substance of the objection intended to be taken. But that point does not really arise here, because the bankrupts were partners under the firm of Mitchell & Moulton, and as such have the right to file a joint petition. If they were likewise partners with Duncan in another firm, and he shall apply to have that firm adjudged bankrupt, I suppose the court would have power to consolidate the suits, if expedient, or in some other appropriate way to arrange that the greatest convenience to creditors should be arrived at with the least expense. He has not done this, and does not even allege that he is bankrupt. As regards the injustice that it is said the creditors of Mitchell, Moulton & Co. will suffer if these proceedings are carried on, I am entirely unable to discover it. The rights of all classes of creditors are the same under all forms of proceedings; and, in fact, these creditors appear to have a substantial advantage, because they are secured to the extent of one thousand dollars, which amounts to about fifty per cent. of their debts. The cause is to proceed forthwith before the register.

BANKRUPTCY—LIEN ON STOCK—WAIVER.

A party who has a lien for pasturing stock by the statute of the state, waives and abandons such lien by voluntarily surrendering up the possession of the property and allowing it to be sold without claiming any lien thereon at the time. The estate of the bankrupt, however, is liable for the keeping of the stock from the commencement of bankruptcy proceedings up to the date of its surrender.

[Cited in Re Harlow, Case No. 6,070.]

According to the laws of Maine (Act 1872), an agistor of cattle has a lien for pasturing stock which may be enforced by the court, on petition of the agistor, after commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy by or against the owner of the cattle, but it may be lost or abandoned by a voluntary surrender of the stock to the assignee. An agistor kept cattle of the bankrupt [J. C. Mitchell] for pasturing during the summer and fall months, and for some time after the proceedings in bankruptcy, and delivered them to the assignee, without claiming a lien for the pasturage, who sold them at public auction. Held, that he had lost or waived his lien as agistor by voluntarily surrendering to the assignee the cattle, and by allowing them to be sold by him as unencumbered property belonging to the bankrupt's estate, and that the keeping the property after institution of bankruptcy proceedings is an equitable lien for which the estate is liable. This is a petition of Wiley, who claimed that he had a lien on certain cattle of the bankrupt, under the laws of Maine, (Act 187), as an agistor for pasturage of the stock during the summer and fall months, and for a period of time after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, viz.: October 17th, 1872. The assignee took the cattle and sold them as unencumbered, December 31st, following, Wiley voluntarily surrendering his possession and making no claim of his lien at the time. Wiley now prays the court to adjudge his claim to be a lien or privity under the laws of Maine.

Peters & Wilson, for Wiley.

H. C. Goodenow, assignee pro se.

FOX, District Judge. Upon the application of Moses C. Wiley, of Bangor, in the county of Penobscot and state of Maine, asking to be paid his lien as an agistor, etc., it is adjudged, under act of 1872, the petitioner had a lien for pasturing the stock, but "it is founded on the possession of the property and is lost or waived when possession is voluntarily abandoned," says Howard, J., in Miller v. Marston, 35 Me. 154, and as the petitioner voluntarily surrendered this property to the assignee, and allowed it to be sold by him as belonging to the estate and unencumbered, I do not think his lien continued, but he must be deemed to have waived and abandoned it. The estate is liable for the keeping of the property from the date of the institution of proceedings in bankruptcy.

TAXATION — BANKRUPTCY — FUNDS IN HANDS OF ASSIGNEE.

The funds in the hands of the assignee may be taxed by the state.

The city of Boston assessed a tax of one thousand five hundred and fifty three dollars and twenty one cents upon the assignees of Mitchell, Green & Stevens, for the personal estate of the bankrupts in their possession, or under their control, on the 1st of May, 1876, the beginning of the fiscal year. The assignees denied the right of the city to assess them, and the case was submitted to the court upon agreed facts, under a petition by the collector of the city to order the assignees to draw their warrant for the amount of the tax. The assignees had made return of the property to the assessors under protest, so that there was no dispute about the quality or amount. It consisted in part of money, and, in a larger part, of a stock of goods. The stock was sold by the assignees on the 3d of May, in pursuance of an arrangement made before the first day of the month, and the proceeds were divided among the creditors at once, long before the assessment was actually made, or notice given that it would be made; but there was enough money of the estate remaining to pay the tax, if it is properly and legally assessed upon them.

E. P. Nettleton, for petitioner.

J. Wilder May, for assignees.

LOWELL, District Judge. The first ground taken by the assignees is, that they are officers of the court; that the funds in their hands are in the custody of the law, and, therefore, not to be disturbed or interfered with by any action on behalf of the state. An able opinion to this purport has been given by one of the registers. In re Booth [Case No. 1,645]. I cannot subscribe to that opinion. I can see no interference or obstruction of the court, or of the law in taxing, to the owner thereof, any fund that may happen to be in whole or partly in the registry of the court, or under its direction, as was the case with the money here, provided there is no attempt to affix upon it a lien, or in some way to disturb the actual custody of the fund. Such an assessment is merely an official declaration that the owner of the fund should pay his share of the public burdens. I do not know why a ship in the hands of the marshal should escape taxation to the owner, though, undoubtedly, it will be free from levy or seizure as long as it remains in his official possession. If the state undertook to tax an assignee in bankruptcy as such, that is, to tax his office and franchise, his right to exercise a function under the laws of the United States, or in any mode to discriminate against an assignee, or against the estate of a bankrupt, very different considerations might arise.

It is said the assignee is an officer of the court; and so he is, in a certain sense, and so is every attorney who practices in the court; and this will protect them from taxation as such officers, but not necessarily in respect to funds which they are to administer for private persons, though their administration should be under the control of the court. The law of Massachusetts for levying taxes does not undertake to act upon personal property in rem, but merely upon the owner. An assignee is an officer of court, and much more, as I shall have occasion to show.

2. I have examined with great care the law of taxation. Gen. St. c. 2, passim. I should be glad to find there an exemption of assignees who had so promptly and faithfully executed their trust that, while they were appointed in April, they had realized and distributed a great part of the assets long before any assessment was actually made upon them; but I have searched in vain. Section 2 provides that all property, real and personal, of the inhabitants of the state, shall be taxed unless expressly exempted. Section 5 provides what property shall be exempted, and does not mention bankrupts or insolvents, or their estates or assignees.

Section 10 provides that all personal estate shall be assessed to the owner in the city or town of which he shall be an inhabitant on the first day of May, with numerous exceptions as to the place, and some as to the person—such as that, under some circumstances, the legal owners shall be assessed, and, under others, the equitable owner—but none which makes any exemptions not included in section 5, and none which affect this case in any direct way, though the section clearly shows that all trustees are intended to be included in the word "owner," unless otherwise provided for.

The remaining question is, whether the assignees were the owners of this property. This closely resembles the question already answered, and the remarks I am about to make are to be taken as applicable to both points. If assignees are mere agents of the court, and the fund is one in court, there might be reason to say that it was without a definite owner who could be ascertained and assessed, but there is no doubt that assignees are trustees, with great powers and large discretion. They have the legal title and control of the property as fully as the bankrupt had, and it has been repeatedly decided that statutes, or rules having the binding power of statutes, which regulate the administration of their trust, such, for example, as require them not to sell by private contract, or not to bring action or suit without an order of court or a consent of creditors, are merely directory, so that a neglect of them will form no valid objection to a title and no defense to an action or suit. I am of opinion, therefore, that the assignees were the owners of this property on the 1st of May, and that the assessment was properly made before then, and that they should pay the tax. Order accordingly.

PATENTS—LICENSE—ESTOPPEL—CERTAINTY—ADVERSE PATENT—EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION AND ENJOYMENT—BARE HOLDING OF PATENT.

1. The mere taking a license does not estop the licensee denying the validity of a patent.

2. In order to establish a right by estoppel, the instrument in support of the estoppel must be precise and certain, and must cover a range as wide as the effect sought to be given to it.

3. Upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, the defendant justified his acts under an outstanding adverse patent, which however was alleged to have been irregularly issued. Held, that the court would not ignore the rights of parties under such instrument, because there may have been some irregularity in its issue, and assume it to be a nullity.

4. Where there has been no adjudication as to the validity of a patent under which a party claims, such party must show that he has had exclusive possession and enjoyment for some time before a preliminary injunction will be granted in his favor.

5. The possession and enjoyment of a patent, which will justify a court in granting a preliminary injunction, previous to a trial at law establishing the validity of the patent, must be something more than the mere holding of the parchment, or muniment of title, or experimenting with the patented article. If it is a machine or tool it must be brought into use; if a process, it must be put in execution; if a composition of matter or patented article, it must be put on sale. This is the true doctrine both in England and in this country.

6. The bare holding of a patent and an infringement alone constitute no complete ground of relief, at least by preliminary injunction.

BILL OF EXCHANGE—PROTEST FOR NON-ACCEPTANCE—WHEN ACCEPTED BILL PAYABLE—MEANING OF PAYABLE AT SIGHT.

1. When, upon a bill payable at so many days after sight, the holder presents the bill for acceptance, and elects to consider what passes on such presentment, as a non-acceptance, (although in strictness he might have otherwise acted,) and protests the bill for non-acceptance, he is bound by such election as to all the other parties in the bill, and must give due notice to them of the dishonor accordingly, otherwise they will be discharged. And a subsequent acceptance by the drawee on the next day will not be sufficient to charge the drawer, in case no such notice is given, and the drawee fails before the day of payment.

[Cited in brief in First Nat. Bank of Burlington v. Hatch, 78 Mo. 15.]

2. A bill drawn payable at five days after sight, and accepted on the first day of a month, is payable on the ninth of the same month, the day of the acceptance being excluded, and the three days of grace allowed; a demand on the eighth and protest for non-payment on that day, is too early, and therefore void.

[Cited in Edgar v. Greer, 8 Iowa, 395. Distinguished in Lawson v. Farmers' Bank of Salem, 1 Ohio St. 214.]

3. A bill, payable at five days after sight, is presented for acceptance on the 30th of September, but not in fact accepted until the 1st of October, the acceptance takes effect only from that day, and does not relate back to the time of presentment on the preceding day. A bill, payable at so many days after sight, means so many days after legal sight, that is, so many days after the acceptance, for that is the sight, to which the bill refers.

This was an action on a bill of exchange drawn by P. P. F. Degrand, the defendant, in Boston, on George P. Stevenson, of Baltimore, in favor of Alexander Mitchell, the plaintiff, of the same place. The tenor of the bill was as follows.

"$1000. Boston, 26th Sept., 1816. At five days sight please pay to the order of Alexander Mitchell, Esq. one thousand dollars in bills of the Bank of the City of Baltimore, which please to charge with or without further advice to your friend and obedient servant, P. P. F. Degrand.

"George P. Stevenson, Esq., Baltimore."

On the 30th of September, it was presented for acceptance at the counting-house of the drawee, by John C. Conner, the clerk of the plaintiff; the drawee was then absent on military duty, but his clerk requested it might be left, saying Mr. Stevenson would accept it, when he returned. The bill was left, and immediately protested by the plaintiff for non-acceptance. On the following day John C. Conner called again at the counting-room of the drawee, and met him coming out. Mr. Stevenson told him that he was much engaged at the moment, but would accept, and send the bill to Mr. Mitchell in the course of the day. No notice was given to the drawee of the protest for non-acceptance before the 8th of October, on which day the bill was protested for non-payment, the drawee having failed before that time. On the 12th of the same month a Mr. Stanton, who was the plaintiff's agent for this purpose, called upon the defendant for payment, which he refused on the ground of not having received due notice of the protest for non-acceptance. The bill and protest were afterwards remitted to Mr. Stanton in a letter dated the 12th of October.

Shaw & Williams, for defendant, contended: First. That there was no acceptance of the bill by the drawee on the 30th of September. That there was no evidence, that Dugan, the clerk of Stevenson, had any authority to accept it; that his saying that it would be accepted, could only be considered as his opinion of what Stevenson would do. That there was nothing therefore in the present case, which could amount to an acceptance, either by the clerk or Mr. Stevenson, and that the holder himself was of the same opinion fully appeared from his having caused the bill to be protested on the same day. Sayer v. Kitchen, 1 Esp. 209; Orr v. Maginnis, 7 East, 359; Sproat v. Matthews, 1 Durn. & E. [1 Term R.] 182. Secondly. That if the circumstances, which took place on the 30th of September, did not amount to an acceptance, but on the contrary were considered in the light of a non-acceptance, and a protest made accordingly by the plaintiff, then no subsequent arrangement between the holder and drawee could so alter the case, as to affect the rights of the drawee, and change the non-acceptance into an acceptance, or in any degree release the holder from the obligation of duly notifying the defendant of the previous non-acceptance. Bentinck v. Dorrein, 6 East, 199. Thirdly. That even should the subsequent acceptance by the drawee be considered as annulling the previous non-acceptance, and rendering notice of it to the drawer unnecessary, still the defendant would not be liable, inasmuch as it appeared from the facts, that the drawee was called upon for payment a day before the bill became due; for if the acceptance was on the 1st of October, the only day, on which there could be any pretence of one, the bill would be due on the ninth, whereas it was presented for payment, and protested on the 8th of October. Wiffen v. Roberts, 1 Esp. 261. Fourthly. That there was not in fact any legal acceptance of the bill by the drawee at any time. He merely told the clerk of the holder that he would accept it, whereas the acceptance ought to have been in writing.

Prescott & Gallison, for plaintiff, argued, that notice of the protest for non-acceptance was not in this case necessary, because before there was an opportunity of notifying the defendant, the bill was accepted by the drawee, and the previous non-acceptance rendered void. That the holder had a right to consider the circumstances attending the presentment of the bill on the 30th of September as a non-acceptance, or not, as he pleased, and that although he had the precaution to have the bill protested, he was not concluded by it from taking advantage of a subsequent acceptance if made within a reasonable time. Sproat v. Matthews, 1 Term R. 182; Bentinck v. Dorrein, 6 East, 200. Secondly. That as to the presentment for payment being made too early, it was not the case, because the acceptance must be considered as referring back to the day of the first presentment of the bill, which was on the 30th of September. Beawes (1st Ed.) p. 447, § 252. Thirdly. That the verbal acceptance of Mr. Stevenson, by saying he would accept the bill, was sufficient to satisfy the law, without any acceptance in writing. Clarke v. Cock, 4 East, 57; 5 East, 510; Wynne v. Raikes, 5 East, 515; Lumley v. Palmer, 2 Strange, 1000; Pierson v. Dunlop, Cowp. 571; Bayley. Bills, 44.

In the course of the cause the counsel for the defendant called upon Mr. Stanton for a letter, which he received from the plaintiff, in order to prove, that the plaintiff himself never thought, that there was any acceptance in this case; and that he only now advanced it for the purpose of charging the drawer. Mr. Stanton stated, that the letter was destroyed by his clerk; and the clerk upon being questioned said, that he received it from Mr. Stanton with some other letters, which he was directed to destroy, and, as he supposed, for the purpose of keeping them out of the way.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is an action on a bill of exchange, brought by the payee against the drawer. The bill was payable five days after sight; and was presented at the counting-room of the drawee for acceptance on the 30th of September. No acceptance was then made, the drawee being absent on military duty, and his clerk expressing only an opinion, that it would be accepted by the drawee. I do not say, that under these circumstances the holder was bound to treat what passed between him and the clerk, as a non-acceptance of the bill. On the contrary he might properly have waited until the next day, as a reasonable time to ascertain the intentions of the drawee, and such delay could not have been deemed laches on his part. But he elected to consider the bill as dishonored on the 30th of September, and protested it accordingly for non-acceptance. And the question now is, whether, as to all the other parties to the bill, he is not bound by that act; and I am very clear that he is. When a bill is once dishonored, the holder is bound to give notice, by the next practicable mail, to the parties, whom he means to charge for the default. Lenox v. Roberts, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 377. By the legal construction of the contract they have a right to such notice, and the omission to give it, with due and seasonable diligence, discharges them from every legal liability upon the bill. No such notice was given in this case, and therefore the drawee was absolved from all liability. But it is said that on the 1st of October, and before the mail for Boston was closed on that day, the drawee accepted the bill, and thereby notice became unnecessary. Assuming that the evidence in this case clearly shows an acceptance, still in my judgment it does not change the previous legal predicament of the parties. When once a bill is dishonored, the right of the other parties to notice immediately and absolutely attaches, and no subsequent acts between the holder and drawee can vary that right. Whatever is afterwards done by the holder is at his own peril, and cannot change the responsibility of others. A holder cannot elect to treat a bill as dishonored, and afterwards as duly honored. The consequences of such a doctrine would be the most mischievous to the commercial world; and I have no difficulty in holding it not to be law.

But supposing this point were doubtful, there is another, which is decisive against the plaintiff. The acceptance, if any, was certainly not made before the 1st day of October; and upon that supposition the bill being payable five days after sight, was payable on the ninth and not on the eighth day of October; payment was therefore demanded a day before the bill became due. To avoid this conclusion, it is argued, that the acceptance may be considered as relating back to the 30th of September, when the bill was first presented. But neither of these grounds can be maintained. The doctrine of relation cannot apply to cases of this nature. The acceptance or non-acceptance of a bill is a single act, taking effect from the time when done, and having no retroactive operation. How can it be possible to say, that this bill was accepted on the 30th of September, when the party has expressly protested it for non-acceptance on that day? There is as little foundation for the other suggestion. A bill, payable in so many days after sight, means after so many days legal sight. Now, it is not merely the fact of having seen the bill, or known of its existence, that constitutes a presentment to the drawee in legal contemplation. It must be presented to him for acceptance, and the time of the bill begins to run, not from the mere presentment, but from the presentment and acceptance. If the acceptance be general, it is in legal construction an agreement to pay in so many days after the acceptance, for that is the sight, which the drawee admits and refers to. A different doctrine is supposed by Mr. Justice Bayley (Bayley, Bills, 67. But see Id. 53) to be asserted by Beawes (1 Beawes, Bills Exch., Ed. 8vo. 1795, p. 455, § 252); and if it be so (which is not admitted), I should not incline to uphold his authority against that of Marius (Marius, Bills, 19), who holds the doctrine I have asserted, and which I think stands sustained upon principle, as well as authority.

Plaintiff non-suited.

NOTE. Upon examination it will be found that Beawes does not assert the position contended for. His language is, "If bills are made payable at some days after sight, their acceptance is dated on the day they are presented, and from thence the days of their running are counted." Beawes, Bills Exch. (Ed. 1795) p. 455, § 252. This language is not free from all ambiguity; but its true meaning seems to be, that the acceptance is the time, from which the running of the days of a bill, payable at so many days after sight, is to be computed, which is in effect the same as the doctrine of Marius. The doctrine of Marius is recognised in Chit. Bills, pp. 195, 277; Com. Dig. "Merchant," F, 7. Campbell v. French, 6 Term R. 200, 212; Poth. de Change, pt. 1, c. 1, § 2, art. 13; Code de Comm. lib. 1, tit. 8, art. 131. See, also, Bayley, Bills, 53.

MITCHELL v. GREAT WORKS MILLING & MANUF'G CO.

[2 Story, 648.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Oct. Term, 1843.

CREDITOR'S BILL—ACCOUNT—CONCURRENT JURISDICTION — BANKRUPTCY — ENTIRE SETTLEMENT AND DISTRIBUTION—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—AUTHORITY TO ENACT BANKRUPT LAW.

1. Certain persons associated themselves together, under the name of the "Wilson Mill Privilege," and appointed A. and B. as their agents and attorneys, who took charge of their property, and erected buildings, and made improvements, and advanced money; afterwards, they obtained a charter and incorporation as "The Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company," and voted to settle all the accounts of the agents, and ratified their proceedings, and continued A. as their agent; but no settlement of the agents' accounts was ever made; and the present bill being brought by their assignee, it was held, that it was a proper case for the interposition of a court of equity.

2. In matters of account courts of equity possess a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law, in most, if not in all cases, and where the case is one wherein a court of law could not afford an adequate redress, it is proper for the interposition of a court of equity.

3. Under the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9 [5 Stat. 440], the circuit and district courts have full jurisdiction in equity, in respect to all cases arising in bankruptcy, to do all which is necessary and proper to accomplish the entire settlement and distribution of the bankrupt's estate, whether the proceedings be formal or summary.

4. Congress have a complete constitutional authority to enact a bankrupt act, giving to the district and circuit courts full jurisdiction in law and equity.

5. Congress has no right to require, that the state courts shall entertain suits for the objects and purposes to be carried into effect by the bankrupt act.

Bill in equity. The bill was brought by Nathaniel Mitchell, of Portland, assignee in bankruptcy of Seth Paine, Jr., and John L. Meserve, both of said Portland, formerly partners under the name and firm of Paine & Meserve, against the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company. It sets forth, that Enoch Paine, Josiah S. Little, Seth Paine, Junior, and John L. Meserve, all of Portland, and state of Maine, and Joseph B. Hervey, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, having, before the time hereinafter mentioned, formed themselves into a voluntary association, and being then and there the owners of certain real estate in the county of Penobscot, known as the "Wilson Mill Privileges," did, on the twenty-second day of June, 1835, by an agreement in writing between themselves, duly signed and sealed, appoint Seth Paine, Junior, and John L. Meserve aforesaid, to be their agents and attorneys, to act on the matters aforesaid, on behalf of all of said parties, a copy of which said agreement is annexed, and made part of the bill. That on the twenty-seventh of July, 1835, Joseph W. Hale, Francis B. Todd, and Nathaniel F. Deering, all of Portland, became the purchasers of one undivided twelfth part each of the aforesaid property, and that Edmund L. D. Breton, at Bangor, on the seventh of August, 1835, also became the purchaser of one undivided twelfth part of the said property, and that the said Hale, Todd, Deering, and Breton, by a writing to that effect, under their hands on the back of said agreement, consented and agreed to be bound by the said agreement in the same manner as if they had been originally parties thereunto; and the said Paine and Meserve having been duly appointed, as above set forth, the agents and attorneys for the Wilson Mill Privilege Association, took upon themselves that trust, and continued in that capacity until the dissolution of said association, and that they went on to the property, and caused extensive improvements to be made, and buildings to be erected thereon, in pursuance of the instructions, and in carrying out the intentions of the members of said association; during the progress of which improvements, the said Paine and Meserve were at great personal expense, and laid out and advanced large sums of money, for the benefit of said association; in consequence whereof the said association became greatly indebted to the said Paine and Meserve. And that the said association ratified and confirmed the said actings and doings of said Paine and Meserve. That they petitioned the legislature of the state of Maine for an act of incorporation, which was granted in 1831, incorporating Enoch Paine, Nathaniel F. Deering, E. M. Wildredge, John L. Meserve, Joseph W. Hale, Joseph B. Hervey, Josiah S. Little, Francis B. Todd, and their associates, being the associates aforesaid, owners of said Wilson Mill Privileges, by the name of the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, and that the said Paine and others, the associates aforesaid, accepted the charter of incorporation, and transferred and conveyed all their interest in the property of the association to the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, which last mentioned company accepted the transfer, and in consideration thereof, they undertook and promised to pay, meet, or adjust, all the debts and liabilities of said voluntary association; and that afterwards, at an adjourned meeting of the stockholders of the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, held on the twenty-third day of May then next, it was voted, that the directors be authorized to settle all the accounts of the agents and attorney of the proprietors, and that the doings and contracts of the attorney of the proprietors be hereby ratified and confirmed, the said proprietors being said associates, and the proprietors of the Wilson Mill Privileges, and designated in said vote as proprietors, in contradistinction to the stockholders, as such, in the said corporation; that, at a directors' meeting of the directors of the said corporation, held the twenty-fourth day of May, 1836, it was "voted, that Mr. Seth Paine, Jr., be requested to proceed to the establishment of the company, and, in behalf of the directors, to assume the agency and direction of the business of the company, and report his doings to the directors." And that, in pursuance of this vote and authority, the said Paine continued to act in the capacity of agent for said company, and, in the discharge of the duties of said office, laid out, and advanced, and expended large sums of money for the benefit of the said corporation; in consequence whereof the said corporation became greatly indebted to the said Paine. That in the month of September, 1837, there was an attempt made to settle the account between Seth Paine, Jr. and the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, and, at the same time, Paine and Meserve presented their account against the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, which account was not disputed; but a certain amount due from the said Paine and Meserve was allowed towards payment of it. And that, afterwards, another attempt was made at settlement; but the parties did not make any adjustment at that time, nor have the said Paine and Meserve, nor the said Paine, been able to obtain a settlement to this time; although the said Paine and Meserve have been ready, and frequently solicited an adjustment; but that the corporation have delayed and refused, from time to time, to make any such settlement, and still refuses so to do. And, although the said Seth Paine, Jr. was constituted the agent of the said corporation, yet the said Paine being, in fact, in company with the said Meserve, and acting, as well for said Meserve as for himself, the said Paine, in all his acts, making advances, and superintending, and directing the business of said company, agreeably to said vote of May 24th, 1836, acted as a member of and for the joint interest of said firm. And that all sums of money, due, on account of such agency, and such disbursements and expenditures of said Paine, are in fact, in equity, and good conscience, due to said Paine and Meserve. And that there is, in fact, due to said Paine and Meserve, on a fair and equitable adjustment of accounts, from said corporation, a large sum of money, to wit, 2,310 dollars, with interest thereon. All which actings and doings of the said Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, in their own behalf and on behalf of the Wilson Mill Privileges Association, are contrary to equity and good conscience, and tend to the manifest wrong and injury of the plaintiffs in the premises. In consideration whereof, and forasmuch as the plaintiff is remediless in the premises in and by the strict rules of the common law, and cannot have adequate relief save in a court of equity, where matters of this and the like nature are properly cognizable and relievable, the plaintiff prays for a writ of subpoena in due form of law, directed to the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company and to the proper officers of said corporation, or in such other manner as this honorable court shall direct, thereby commanding the said corporation, by its proper officers, or in such manner as this court shall direct, to appear before your honors at a certain day, then and there to answer the premises, and to stand and abide such order and decree therein as shall be agreeable to equity, and good conscience.

To this bill a demurrer was filed, and the cause was argued upon the demurrer by W. Pitt Fessenden, for the company.

Wm. P. Preble, for plaintiff.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Two objections have been taken, on the part of the defendants: (1) That the matter of the bill, although for an account, is completely remediable at law, and, therefore, not the fit subject matter of a bill in equity. (2) That the circuit court has not jurisdiction in this case in bankruptcy under the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9). In the judgment of this court, neither objection is maintainable; and I will shortly proceed to state the reasons of this determination. As to the first objection, it is certainly true, that, in matters of account, courts of equity possess a concurrent jurisdiction, in most if not in all cases, with courts of law. In the present case, taking the statements of the bill to be true, which we must upon the demurrer, it seems to us not only clear, that it is a case fit for the interposition of a court of equity, but that it is emphatically so, as one where a court of law could not render any justice in the matter; or, if any, it must be a very crippled and imperfect redress. It is, indeed, impossible to read the bill and not to feel, that some of the claims there set up, considering the complications and changes of interests of the parties, cannot be adequately examined or properly disposed of except in a court of equity. But the more material consideration is that, which respects the jurisdiction of this court to maintain the bill under the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9), as it is a case, which would not otherwise fall within its general jurisdiction. At the threshold of the argument, we are met with the suggestion, that when the act was before congress, the opposite doctrine was then maintained in the house of representatives, and it was confidently stated, that no such jurisdiction was conferred by the act, as is now insisted on. What passes in congress upon the discussion of a bill can hardly become a matter of strict judicial inquiry; and if it were, it could scarcely be affirmed, that the opinions of a few members, expressed either way, are to be considered as the judgment of the whole house, or even of a majority. But, in truth, little reliance can or ought to be placed upon such sources of interpretation of a statute. The questions can be, and rarely are, there debated upon strictly legal grounds, with a full mastery of the subject and of the just rules of interpretation. The arguments are generally of a mixed character, addressed by way of objection, or of support, rather with a view to carry or defeat a bill, than with the strictness of a judicial decision. But if the house entertained one construction of the language of the bill, non constat, that the same opinion was entertained either by the senate or by the president; and their opinions are certainly, in a matter of the sanction of laws, entitled to as great weight as the other branch. But in truth, courts of justice are not at liberty to look at considerations of this sort. We are bound to interpret the act as we find it, and to make such an interpretation as its language and its apparent objects require. We must take it to be true, that the legislature intend precisely what they say, and to the extent which the provisions of the act require, for the purpose of securing their just operation and effect. Any other course would deliver over the court to interminable doubts and difficulties; and we should be compelled to guess what was the law, from the loose commentaries of different debates, instead of the precise enactments of the statute. Nor have there been wanting illustrious instances of great minds, which, after they had, as legislators, or commentators, reposed upon a short and hasty opinion, have deliberately withdrawn from their first impressions, when they came upon the judgment seat to re-examine the statute or law in its full bearings.

Passing from these considerations, which have been drawn from us by the suggestions at the bar, let us look at the actual provisions of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9). And here, in order to ascertain the jurisdiction of the circuit court, we must first examine what is the jurisdiction given to the district court. The 6th section of the act declares: "That the district court in every district shall have jurisdiction in all matters and proceedings in bankruptcy, arising under this act, and any other act, which may hereafter be passed on the subject of bankruptcy; the said jurisdiction to be exercised summarily, in the nature of summary proceedings in equity." And then, not by way of restriction, but of explanation, if not of enlargement of the objects of this jurisdiction, it proceeds to declare: "And the jurisdiction hereby conferred on the district court shall extend to all cases and controversies in bankruptcy, arising between the bankrupt and any creditor or creditors, who shall claim any debt or demand under the bankruptcy; to all such creditor and creditors, and the assignee of the estate, whether in office or removed; to all cases and controversies between such assignee and the bankrupt; and to all acts, matters, and things to be done under and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution and settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy." Now, it seems to us, impossible to doubt, that the object of these clauses, which are sufficiently broad and comprehensive for the purpose of giving the district court complete jurisdiction to accomplish, of itself, all the purposes of the act, and to enable it, independently of any other jurisdiction, to begin, continue, and end, all such proceedings as might be necessary and proper, in an equitable view, to accomplish the entire settlement and final distribution of the bankrupt's estate. To us it seems perfectly clear, that congress possess a complete constitutional authority to enact such a law for such an object; for the judicial power, by the constitution, extends "to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution and the laws and treaties made, or which shall be made under their authority;" and further, congress are authorised by the constitution, "to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." The judicial power has, in this respect, under the constitution, always been construed to be co-extensive with the legislative powers, upon the plain ground, that the constitution meant to provide ample means to accomplish its own ends by its own courts. Now, looking to the many objects and purposes of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9), it would seem strange, that congress should not have provided all the necessary and proper means to accomplish all its purposes. It is clear, that congress has no right to require, that the state courts shall entertain suits for such objects and purposes. The states, in providing their own judicial tribunals, have a right to limit, control, and restrict their judicial functions, and jurisdiction, according to their own mere pleasure. They may refuse to allow suits to be brought there "arising under the laws of the United States" for many just reasons; first that congress are bound to provide such tribunals for themselves; secondly, that state courts are not subject to the legislation of congress as to their jurisdiction; thirdly, that it may most materially interfere with the convenience of their own courts, and the rights of their own citizens, and be attended with great expense to the state, as well as great delays in the administration of justice, to allow their courts to be crowded with suits, arising under the laws of the United States; and fourthly, as in the present case, that it would involve the state courts in almost endless examinations and discussions of the principles and bearings of the bankrupt law, confessedly a system novel in our jurisprudence, intricate in its details, and involving questions exceedingly complicated and difficult in its practical operation. Suppose, upon considerations of this sort, any state legislature should prohibit its own courts from taking cognizance of any causes arising under the bankrupt act, no one could doubt, that it was a perfectly constitutional exercise of authority, and not justly to be complained of, as a want of comity or of justice. A due regard of a state to its own rights, and its duties to its own citizens, might require such a course, in order to prevent oppressive delays, and obstructions in the actual administration of home justice; and, at all events, might justify it in preferring such claims to those, belonging appropriately to the national jurisdiction. Besides all these considerations, there is one, which cannot but be deemed of paramount importance in the administration of a system of bankruptcy. It is uniformity, promptitude, regularity, and efficiency in carrying into effect all its provisions. The courts, which are to administer such a system, must possess not only jurisdiction at law, but in equity; not only a right to proceed in a formal way, but to act summarily; not only to hold regular terms, but to be always open; not only to be bound to act, but to be governed by uniform rules and principles of interpretation and action, at least, as far, as from the diversity of human judgments, such uniformity of rules, principles, and proceedings, can be looked for in practice. But what can be expected from a hundred of state courts, organized upon no uniform system, governed by no uniform jurisprudence, and in their jurisdiction and modes of proceeding, admitting of almost endless diversities of practice and action? So far from any system of bankruptcy being capable of any uniformity of action throughout the United States, under such circumstances, it would be in no two states, perhaps in no two tribunals of the same state, the same. And if every decision in a state tribunal was to be subject to the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court of the United States, instead of the proceedings in bankruptcy being completed, as the act of 1841 (chapter 9, § 10) manifestly contemplates, within two years from their commencement, a half century might elapse before such a consummation.

Now, it is precisely because considerations of this sort could not be supposed to escape the notice of congress, but must have pervaded the whole purposes of legislation on the subject of bankruptcy, that we should be utterly surprised, if adequate provisions were not made in the act of 1841 (chapter 9) to carry the entire system into effect, through the instrumentality of the courts of the United States, over which congress possess a complete authority, subject to no foreign control, or government, or obstruction. It was not necessary to say, that the courts of the United States should possess exclusive jurisdiction. It was only necessary to say, that they should possess full jurisdiction, and to leave to the state courts the exercise of any concurrent jurisdiction, which they could or might rightfully maintain. In this way, it would naturally follow, that after a little experience in the workings of the system, with the aid of some amendments by congress, the courts of the United States would soon attain punctuality, uniformity, and promptitude, in administering the system, so as to accomplish in the fullest manner all the ends of private, as well as of public justice.

Now, as it seems to us, this very object was designed to be attained, and can be attained, by the provisions of the 6th section of act of 1841 (chapter 9), already cited, if we give to the words their natural, and appropriate meaning, and infuse into them no subtleties, or doubts, or refinements, grounded upon the supposed intentions of congress, or upon technical doctrines, or upon particular local policy. If ever there can be a case for the application of a liberal interpretation of an act from its apparent objects, as well as from the argument ab inconvenienti, it seems to us, that this is the very case which will most forcibly illustrate its propriety and cogency. Let us look for a moment at some of the provisions of the act to see, what the courts, sitting in bankruptcy, are required to do. We have already seen, by the 10th section of the act of 1841, that it is required, "That all the proceedings in bankruptcy in each case shall, if practicable, be finally adjusted, settled and brought to a close by the court within two years after the decree declaring the bankruptcy." How is this to be done, unless the court possesses jurisdiction, co-extensive with all the subject matters in bankruptcy, to enforce and adjust all claims? How can this be enforced, if the entire jurisdiction to collect debts, and to settle controversies in bankruptcy, belongs exclusively to the state courts? What control can the courts of the United States, sitting in bankruptcy, exercise over the state courts to regulate, or to speed their proceedings? Besides, the same section of the act declares: "That, in order to insure a speedy settlement and close of the proceedings in each case of bankruptcy, it shall be the duty of the court to order and direct a collection of the assets, and a reduction of the same to money, and a distribution thereof, at as early periods as practicable, consistently with a due regard to the interests of the creditors." Now, here the end is required of the court; and can it reasonably be doubted, that the means are also given to the court to accomplish it? Construe the clause in the 6th section of the act of 1841, where it extends the jurisdiction of the district courts "to all acts, matters, and things to be done under, and in virtue of the bankruptcy, until the final distribution, and the settlement of the estate of the bankrupt, and the close of the proceedings in bankruptcy," to include the jurisdiction to entertain suits to adjust all adverse claims, and to collect all outstanding debts (as its terms are sufficiently comprehensive to include), and we have exactly such a jurisdiction, commensurate to the end. Construe it otherwise, and the court sitting in bankruptcy is left crippled and maimed; and we require it to move onward, when it it chained to the earth.

These are some of the grounds, which satisfy our minds, that congress did not intend to leave the bankrupt system, for its practical operation, or success, or efficiency, to the good pleasure, or discretion of the states, or to their voluntary and gratuitous efforts to enforce or sustain it. Congress meant to provide a system capable of entire self-execution by the national tribunals, without the assistance or co-operation of the states, if the parties interested should choose to rely upon the national arm. The jurisdiction given to the district courts is, as we construe it, ample for all such purposes; and we see no reason, why the general language, in which it is given, should be restricted, so as to defeat a single purpose of the act.

Such then being in our judgment the jurisdiction given by the act of 1841 (chapter 9) to the district courts, we are next led to the consideration of the jurisdiction of the circuit court; and if, as we think, the district court would have complete jurisdiction of the present case, we think that there can be no doubt that this court also possesses it under the 8th section of the bankrupt act of 1841 (chapter 9). That section declares: "That the circuit court within and for the district, where the decree of bankruptcy is passed, shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the district court of the same district of all suits at law and in equity, which may and shall be brought by any assignee of the bankrupt against any person or persons claiming an adverse interest, or by such persons against such assignee, touching any property or rights of property of said bankrupt, transferable to or vested in such assignee." Now, there cannot be a doubt, that a debt claimed by and due to the bankrupt from any person is "a right of property" in the bankrupt. Every chose in action is a right of property, assignable in equity, if not at law (see Gray v. Bennett, 3 Metc. [Mass.] 522, 531); and it is clearly assignable under the bankrupt act; for that act declares (section 3) that upon the decree in bankruptcy, "All the property and rights of property, of every name and nature, real, personal, or mixed, of every bankrupt, &c., shall be deemed vested by force of the same decree in the assignee," &c.; and the assignee, is by the same section vested with full power and authority to sue for the same, as fully, to all intents and purposes, as the bankrupt himself might at the time of his bankruptcy. The debtor in every such case is necessarily in the sense of the act an adverse party; if he were not, he would pay the debt or claim; and his very resistance of it, upon suit brought, shows him to be, in form as well as in fact, an adverse party. So that, upon the plain terms and import of the section, the jurisdiction of the circuit court would become unquestionable in the present case. And, indeed, as it is a concurrent jurisdiction with the district court (designed doubtless to aid that court in cases of grave doubt and difficulty), it also shows, that this very class of cases was deemed to be within the jurisdiction of the district court, by and in virtue of the 6th section of the act already referred to. Each section reflects a strong light upon the other, and establishes the intention of congress to be, that its own courts should possess a plenary jurisdiction over all cases and controversies, connected with and growing out of any bankruptcy. See same point, Ex parte City Bank of New Orleans, 3 How. [44 U. S. 292].

Upon the whole, our opinion is, that the demurrer should be overruled.

MITCHELL v. KELSEY et al.

[N. Y. Times, July 18, 1862.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1862.

PRACTICE—REFERENCE—EVIDENCE—RECOUPMENT.

[1. An amended order, entered by consent, after defendant's default, referring the cause to a commissioner to ascertain the amount, "if any," due libelant, operates only to remove the defendants' default so as to permit him to contest libelant's claim; and the parties cannot by consent give the commissioner jurisdiction of matters set up in the answer, unless they extend to payment or satisfaction of libelant's claim.]

[2. Where libelant's claim is referred to a commissioner, his report is not objectionable in omitting a detail of allowances on which it is founded, unless defendant has demanded a specification of such allowance.]

[This was a libel by Andrew C. Mitchell against Charles Kelsey and others, owners of the bark Philena.]

BETTS, District Judge. This cause is brought into court as one of civil and maritime jurisdiction, in which a warrant of attachment was prayed against the defendants with a claim of foreign attachment. Such process was issued in October term, 1853, and was returned in the same term by the marshal, "personally served on Charles Kelsey, one of the defendants, others not found." No steps are shown to have been taken to bring the other respondents, who were joint owners of the vessel, into court. The libel is filed in the name of an assignor of the former master of the vessel, and demands $6,632.82, with interest from Sept. 10, 1853, for wages earned, advances and payments made by the master, on a voyage from this port to California, on the liability of the vessel and owners. The answer takes direct issue upon the allegations of the libel, charging the liability of the defendants, and also charges misconduct of the master on the voyage, his wrongful deviation therefrom, and other acts to the loss and prejudice of the defendants in his management of their business, and demands large damages. The averments of the answer are not stated more particularly, because they are not legally brought in review by the present form of the proceedings. The case proceeded dilatorily in court to April term, 1855, when the proctors for the libelant moved the default of the defendants on the calendar notice for non-appearance thereon, and for the usual interlocutory order which was granted, that the cause be referred to a commissioner of the court, to ascertain and compute the amount due to the libelant, and to report thereon to the court, &c. In August term, 1856, by written consent between the parties, the above order of reference was amended to read as follows: "This cause being called in its order on the calendar, ordered that it be referred to a commissioner, to ascertain and report the amount, if any, due the libelants." Both orders were obtained and entered in court when the late Judge Ingersoll presided therein, and if anything was intended to be granted or reserved between the parties out of the language of the orders themselves, it cannot now be made available further than implied waivers of mere irregularities in practice. Such had already occurred.

It appears on the commissioner's minutes of the hearing before him that it had commenced and been proceeded upon in October, 1855, and thenceforward continued under the amended reference as if that order had opened the whole controversy in favor of the defendants as well as the libelants. So, also, the course of procedure of both parties indicates that the commissioner was to investigate and report finally on the claims of every description raised by the answer against the master, (or libelant,) yet that fact nowhere appears in the order of reference, or the report of the commissioner in his minutes of the hearing before him, which is returned to the court as composing the evidence on the hearing. The reference was protracted before the commission until February, 1860, on the 27th of which day it was signed by the commissioner, but not filed by the libelant until the 15th of May, 1861. To render the proceedings more confused and incongruous, the defendant filed his exceptions to the commissioner's report, Nov. 10, 1860, nearly nine months after it was signed, and six months before it was filed in court, at which time the proctor for the libelant obtained an order that the case be placed upon the calendar for argument upon the exceptions at the same term. The argument was not, in fact, called on until April term, 1861. The whole course of procedure, from the initiation of the suit to the final hearing evinces a singular disregard of regular practice in such mode of action, and marked remissness and indifference of all parties concerned in the controversy, to the progress of the cause or the manner in which it was conducted or supported on either side. This is probably attributable to repeated change of proctors and advocates on the one side or the other, as the case was in the hands of skillful and experienced counsel. The cause, when put upon hearing in April term last, was orally discussed in court between the counsel for three days; who then proposed to give the court a clearer understanding of the subject by submitting all the depositions in writing, vouchers and other documents, together with written briefs and arguments. Those written points, briefs and arguments, covered more than one hundred pages of foolscap manuscript, but failed to elucidate the matters brought into question, so as to render the clear right and justness of the case, on the part of either litigant, satisfactorily plain or convincing to the court, and they leave the cause to be determined rather upon technical rules than the manifest legal or equitable title on the evidence rendered.

1. The writ was instituted in the name of a third party, who shows no priority of interest in the original contract between the defendants and his assignor; and being a near relative of the assignor, and coming into the controversy long after the cause of action accrued, it is at least equivocal upon the proofs whether he is not in the suit a speculator or volunteer, without having parted with valuable consideration for the assignment. 2. Capt. Swain, in whom all the interest in fact and in the origin of the claim in suit was vested, and against whom all the liabilities set up in the defence rested, was the main witness on the reference, and upon whose evidence the report of the commissioner must have been essentially founded. He was examined as a witness orally before the commissioner in October, 1855, and in December afterwards, de bene esse, before the commissioner, and it nowhere appears that objection was then or afterwards taken to his competency to testify in the case. 3. The exceptions point out no particular error in fact or law committed by the commissioner. 4. The argument assumes throughout that the reference imposed authority upon the commissioner to hear and determine in place of the court, the entire merits on the issues in the pleadings. Such exercise of power by the commissioner would be manifestly irregular unless expressly given him by the court. No other matter was before the commissioner under the default and order of reference, than the money demand stated in the libel. It appears to me that the course pursued on this hearing substantially overlooks the case which the court can only regard. The order of reference embraced nothing more than an inquiry into the state of the captain's account for wages due and money paid or supplies furnished by him for the owners. The default of the defendant in court legally excluded him from denying that such indebtedness existed, and the inquiry was legitimately directed to the ascertainment of the quantum of that debt alone. The report of the commissioner meets that inquiry by stating the balance due the master. There the authority of the commissioner ends under the order.

Whatever interest goes with the principal as a legal incident is not matter of fact for the commissioner to find and report. That report is not exceptionable in omitting a detail of allowances upon which it is founded.

The defendant should have demanded such specification if it was his right and important to him, and in omitting so to do, the court must acquiesce in that side of the report. Indeed, his exception would be fatal if directly falsifying the report unless it pointed to particulars which had been objected to on the hearing and were, notwithstanding the objection, allowed by the commissioner. The question would then legitimately arise and could be decided by the court, whether an error had been committed by the commissioner. The commissioner under this reference, had no authority to inquire into and pass upon any charges or allegations set up in the answer against the master in recoupment or otherwise, whether in relation to money or property or the acts or omissions of the master on the voyage, unless such doings or things so alleged were chargeable against the master and acquired by him in payment or satisfaction of the debt due him. If within the authority of the court so to refer the whole subject of the litigation to the commissioner, it was not done by these orders. The issues made by the pleadings were not per se proper subjects of reference. They should have been passed upon by the court, and the legal rights of the parties be fixed by direct decree. The default of the defendant withdrew in law the defence pleaded by him, and left the libelant entitled to a reference for the purpose only to obtain an adjustment of his account. The amendment in August term, 1856, to the original order, no way enlarged the former one. It would operate only to remove the defendants' default and permit him to contest the truth of the libelant's account before the commissioner. This has not been done either by impeaching any particulars allowed in the account, or afterwards calling upon the commissioner to give in a specification of these items and their offering to disprove them before the court upon exceptions or on re-reference. There is an error on the face of the report which the defendant is entitled to have rectified. The libel avers no liquidated debt or amount stated, and the report itself demonstrates that the amount charged was not a true balance due, and rejected nearly two-thirds of the face of it. The commissioner reports $1,683.50 interest on the balance of account allowed the libelant. This is erroneous. The account was unliquidated between the parties, and would remain so and not entitled to carry interest until judgment of the court upon the report of the referee was rendered.

Judgment must accordingly be rendered against the exceptions and in favor of the libelant on the report for $2,691.08, with costs.

[NOTE. The case came again before the court at a subsequent date, when the libelants moved to confirm the commissioner's report, and to modify the order of the court, which disallowed a certain sum for interest on the amount due. The motion was denied. Case No. 9,664.]

[This was a libel by Andrew C. Mitchell against Charles Kelsey and others, owners of the bark Philena. The case was referred to the commissioner. Exceptions were taken to the commissioner's report. These exceptions were overruled. Case No. 9,663. It is now heard upon libelant's motion to confirm the report as a whole.]

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for the motion.

Benedict, Burr & Benedict, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. This was an action brought by the master of a vessel to recover for his services on the vessel as master, miscellaneous supplies furnished by him for necessities, and an indefinite claim of commissions thereon. The suit was not commenced until a lapse of some years, and it did not appear that any of the charges, except for the wages, rested on any particular contract. The interlocutory decree was made directing a reference to a commissioner to ascertain the amount due. Upon the coming in of the report, the defendant excepted to various items, and among them to $1,683 allowed as interest. Upon the hearing of the exceptions the court disallowed this latter sum, and the libelants now moved for a modification of the order, and that they be allowed to recover the whole amount reported.

Held, that under the circumstances of this case the court would not allow the interest, and the motion to confirm the report as to that item must be denied.

In equity. This cause [against Lippincott & Co.] was heard for final decree upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts.

A. R. Manning and Percy Walker, for complainant.

T. N. McCartney and M. E. McCartney, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. On the 19th of March, 1866, there was conveyed to the complainant, who was a feme covert, by a deed of that date, certain real estate in the city of Mobile. The deed in the granting clause purported to convey the premises to the said Nannie C. Mitchell, her heirs and assigns forever. The habendum et tenendum clause was as follows: "To have and to hold the above granted and bargained premises unto the said Nannie C. Mitchell, her heirs and assigns, to the sole and proper use, benefit and behoof of the said Nannie C. Mitchell, her heirs and assigns forever." On the 17th of February, 1869, the complainant jointly with her husband, executed a mortgage on this property to the defendants. The mortgage was not to secure any debt of the complainant, but was to secure one for which her husband expected to become liable. The mortgage contained a power of sale, and the debt secured thereby not having been paid in full, the defendants advertised the premises for sale. This bill was filed for a perpetual injunction to restrain the defendants from selling the property under the mortgage. The claim of the bill is that the premises were the separate property of the complainant as a married woman, and that under the laws and jurisprudence of this state, she could not incumber her separate estate for her husband's debts, and that her mortgage for that purpose is absolutely void.

The "married woman's law," as it is called, was passed in 1850, and is found in the Revised Code (section 2371 et seq.). Section 2371 declares that "all property of the wife held by her previous to the marriage, or which she may become entitled to after the marriage, in any manner, is the separate estate of the wife, and is not subject to the payment of the debts of the husband." The complainant claims that under this provision of the law, as now construed by the supreme court of the state, the mortgage upon her property was absolutely void for want of power in her to incumber it for the debt of her husband.

The defendants claim that under the decision of the supreme court of the state, construing the "married woman's law," the estate a feme covert might acquire, as at common law, was not interfered with by this act. So that after the passage of this act, a married woman in this state might hold two kinds of separate estate, each governed by different laws. One was called her separate estate under contract or deed, and the other her separate estate under statute, or statutory separate estate; that the distinction was, that if she held by a deed which used words of such significance as to exclude the marital rights of the husband, the deed itself gave her a separate estate, and the rules of the common law governing such an estate applied; but if the conveyance under which she held used no such words, or the estate came to her by descent, then she held it as separate estate under the Code, and the rules of law governing such an estate were laid down by the Code; that when the estate was a separate estate by deed or contract the wife might, as at common law, incumber it for her husband's debts, by mortgage properly executed. The defendants claim that this construction of the law was maintained by the supreme court of the state until after the execution of the mortgage to them by complainant; that under the law as so construed, her estate was a separate estate by deed, and she might well incumber it for her husband's debts. They cite Cowles v. Morgan, 34 Ala. 535; Paulk v. Wolfe, Id. 541; Gunter v. Williams, 40 Ala. 561; Nun v. Givhan, 45 Ala. 375. It is however conceded by the defendants, that since the date of this mortgage the supreme court of the state has adopted a different construction of section 2371 of the Revised Code, and that they now hold that there is no distinction between the two sorts of separate estates; that both are governed by the Code, and that in no case can a married woman mortgage her separate estate, however acquired or held, for her husband's debts. But the defendants insist that this court is not bound to follow these later adjudications, but should adhere to the law as construed by the court at the time the contract was made. In my judgment, this claim of the defendants is not well founded.

The mortgage to the defendants, as above stated, bears date the 19th of February, 1869. In January, 1869, the supreme court of the state decided the case of Bibb v. Pope, reported in 43 Ala. 190. In that case it appeared that on August 10, 1860, there was conveyed to Mrs. Evelyn Pope, who was then intermarried with Augustus Pope, the premises in controversy "to have and to hold the same to her, her heirs and assigns, to her use and behoof forever." On the 6th of April, 1866, Pope, the husband, borrowed $10,000 of the plaintiff Bibb, for which he gave his bill of exchange, and he and his wife executed to Bibb a mortgage, with power of sale on the premises, to secure the payment of the same. Pope failed to pay the bill at maturity and Bibb advertised the property for sale. Thereupon Mrs. Pope, by her next friend, filed her bill for a perpetual injunction to restrain the sale, claiming that the mortgage was void. I have been thus particular in the statement of this case that it may appear how nearly it resembles in its facts the case at bar.

In deciding the case, the court said: "The only question discussed at the bar was whether Mrs. Pope was bound by said mortgage, and whether her statutory separate estate was liable to be sold under it to pay her husband's debts. This question has not heretofore been settled by any decision of this court." The court then decides that if the sale of the separate estate of the wife to pay the husband's debts was permitted, the whole purpose of the law, so far as it protects the wife's separate estate, would be defeated, and that the wife had no power to mortgage her separate estate for her husband's debts. Conceding that the decision of the supreme court of the state had been as claimed by defendants up to the case of Bibb v. Pope, it is clear that the rule was broken over by this case and a different one adopted. And this decision was made before the date of the mortgage. The ruling in this case has since been adhered to by the court. Cowles v. Marks, 47 Ala. 620; Ellett v. Wade, Id. 464; Denechaud v. Berry, 48 Ala. 591. But suppose, as claimed by the defendants, the rulings had been, as stated by them, until after the delivery of the mortgage and the construction of the law had then been changed, which construction ought this court to follow? The defendants say that we are bound to enforce the law according to the construction given it at the date of the mortgage. In support of this position, they cite the case of Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 206, in which the supreme court of the United States says: "The sound and true rule is, that if the contract when made was valid, by the laws of the state, as then expounded by all departments of the government and administered in its courts of justice, its validity and obligation cannot be impaired by any subsequent action of the legislature or decision of its courts altering the construction of the law." Also Havemeyer v. Iowa City, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 303; Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 678; Ohio Life Ins. Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 432.

It is to be observed that the case of 16 How. was the case of a contract made by the state, and the court held that the rules of interpretation which required the federal to follow the state courts in the construction of the laws of the state "were confined to ordinary acts of legislation, and did not extend to the contracts of the state, although they should be made in the form of law." The cases in 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] and 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] concerned the interpretation of laws upon which the validity of bonds issued by municipal and political corporations depended. On the other hand, in the case of Suydam v. Williamson, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 427, the supreme court of the United States held that when any principle of law establishing a rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by the supreme court that would be applied by the state tribunals. In this case the supreme court, following a change in the decisions of the supreme court of New York, reversed its own decision in Williamson v. Berry, 8 How. [49 U. S.] 495, "although property had been bought and sold upon the faith of the opinion there delivered and the judgment pronounced by this court." So in the earlier case of Jackson v. Chew, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 162, the court said: "The inquiry is very much narrowed by applying the rule which has uniformly governed this court, that when any principle of law establishing a rule of real property has been settled in the state courts, the same rule will be applied by this court as by the state tribunals." So also in Beauregard v. New Orleans, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 497, the court says: "The constitution of this court requires it to follow the laws of the several states whenever they properly apply, and the habit of the court has been to defer to the decisions of their judicial tribunals upon questions arising out of the common law of the state, especially when applied to the title to lands. Upon cases like the present, the relation of courts of the United States to a state is the same as that of her own tribunals. They administer the laws of the state, and to fulfill that duty, they must find them as they exist in the habits of the people and in the exposition of their constituted authorities. Without this, the peculiar organization of the judicial tribunals of the states and the Union would be productive of the greatest mischiefs and confusion." In League v. Egery, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 264, the supreme court of the United States reversed its own decision, made in Arguello v. U. S., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 539, to the effect that the colonization regulations of Mexico of 1824 and 1828 did not prohibit the settlement of the littoral or coast leagues by natives under the authority of the governor of California and without the consent of the central government of Mexico. This was done without re-examining that opinion or making any attempt to account for or reconcile the differences, because the supreme court had found that a contrary opinion had prevailed in the courts of Texas, and had become a rule of property there. That the decisions of the state courts touching the title to lands are to be treated as binding authorities in the courts of the United States is held in the following cases: Polk v. Wendal, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 87; Rundle v. Delaware Canal Co., 14 How. [55 U. S.] 93; Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 119; Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 152; Ross v. Barland, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 655; McKeen v. Delancy, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 22. The settled construction of a state statute is considered as a part of the statute. Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 767; Nesmith v. Sheldon, Id. 812; Van Renssalear v. Kearney, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 297; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 504; Green v. James [Case No. 5,766]; Woolsey v. Dodge [Id. 18,032]; Thompson v. Phillips [Id. 13,974]. In construing the statutes of a state, infinite mischief would ensue should the federal courts observe a different rule from that which has been long established in a state. McKeen v. Delancy, supra. In cases depending upon the statutes of a state, and more especially those respecting the titles to land, the federal courts observe the construction of the state, when that construction is settled or can be ascertained. Polk v. Wendal, supra. The supreme court uniformly acts under a desire to conform its decisions to the state courts upon local laws forming rules of property. Mutual Assur. Soc. v. Watts, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 279. The supreme court holds in the highest respect decisions of state courts upon local laws forming rules of property. Shipp v. Miller, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 316. When the construction of the statute of the state relates to real property, and has been settled by any judicial decision of the state where the land lies, the supreme court, upon the principles uniformly adopted by it, will recognize the decision as a part of the local law. Gardner v. Collins, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 58. In construing local statutes respecting real property, the courts of the Union are governed by the decisions of state tribunals. Thatcher v. Powell, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 119. The construction given to a statute of a state by the highest judicial tribunal of such state is regarded as a part of the statute, and is as binding upon the courts of the United States as the text. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 603, and cases there cited. If the highest judicial tribunal of a state adopt new views as to the proper construction of such a statute, and reverse its former decisions, the federal courts will follow the latest settled adjudication. U. S. v. Morrison, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 124; Green v. Neil's Lessee, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 291; Leffingwell v. Warren, supra.

The question whether a mortgage of real estate is valid or not is certainly a question touching real property. The case at bar, therefore, falls within the decisions cited. The rule, established by the earlier decisions of the supreme court, is recognized in the case of Olcott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 678, cited by the defendants, in which Mr. Justice Strong, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is undoubtedly true, in general, that this court does follow the decisions of the highest courts of the states respecting local questions peculiar to themselves, or respecting the construction of their own constitution and laws. But it must be kept in mind that it is only decisions upon local questions, those which are peculiar to the several states, or adjudications upon the meaning of the constitution or statutes of a state which the federal courts adopt as rules for their judgments." Do not the adjudications of the supreme court of Alabama, construing the statute of the state regulating the rights of married women and the validity of mortgages executed by them upon their real estate, fall within the class of cases mentioned by Judge Strong, where the federal courts are bound to follow the state decisions? If the rule is ever to be applied to any case, it seems to me the construction of the "married woman's law" is a proper case for its application. The conclusion must therefore be that the mortgage of the complainant was void and the defendants ought to be restrained from proceeding under it to subject the mortgaged premises to sale. Decree accordingly.

Case No. 9,666.

MITCHELL v. McKIBBIN.

[29 Leg. Int. 412; 8 N. B. R. 548; 21 Pittsb. Leg. J. 77.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov., 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—EQUITY OF REDEMPTION — DEFEASIBLE CONVEYANCE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS —SUIT BY ASSIGNEE.

1. The defendant, owning the lease, good-will, fixtures, furniture, and other contents, &c., of a profitable hotel, sold the same to his two sons, for a price equal to three-fifths only of the value, on a long credit payable in deferred instalments, bearing interest; and it was, at the same time, agreed between them that, on default in payment, the premises should, at the defendant's request, be reconveyed. Under this agreement his right of resumption was a mere security for the price, the transaction being the same, in effect, as if he had, on transferring the property and possession, received a mortgage from the sons for the price.

2. The form of words used was, in this respect, immaterial. An express provision that, in the event of default, the property should revest absolutely, without any equity of redemption, would not have been valid so as to debar the right of redemption, or foreclose it in advance.

3. If an exception from this rule were admissible, as between seller and buyer, in peculiar cases, the exception could not be admitted where the debt is of less amount than the value of the security, and the right of resumption is unilateral at the creditor's option, and is indefinitely protracted.

4. If this were otherwise the right of absolute resumption would not be exercisable on the debtor's insolvency, in derogation of the right of his other creditors to the benefit of the surplus in value, or equity or redemption.

5. After the purchase by the sons, the business of the hotel was continued by them in partnership, with great profit: but, through causes wholly extrinsic, they became, long after the last instalment of the price fell due, insolvent. This was three years and four months after their purchase. They had not paid to the defendant, any part of the price; and were, on other accounts, both as partners, and each separately, indebted to him. On learning the state of their affairs, he demanded a return of the property; whereupon they, in professed execution of their former agreement, and in extinction of their debt for the price with its interest, made a retransfer to him. This retransfer was, in form, absolute. It was, in effect likewise, absolute, as between the parties to it.

6. Therefore, as against the sons themselves, it determined their equity of redemption, which had, until then, continued.

7. As against their creditors proceeding adversarily, the retransfer was wholly invalid, even as to the unpaid price, unless the actual and apparent possession was resumed, and retained by the defendant.

8. His resumption of the hotel was published in two daily newspapers of local general circulation; his name was substituted for the names of the sons on the register of guests, and at the heads of the bills rendered; new books of account, &c., were opened in his name; and the actual receipts and disbursements were by him. This, although one of the sons remained there, as a superintendent of the business, in the service of the defendant, was not an insufficient resumption and retention of possession by the defendant, if as full actual and apparent control as the nature of the subject reasonably admitted of, was fairly exercised by him. 14 P. F. Smith [64 Pa. St.] 352.

9. Although there was such a change of the possession sufficient as against creditors proceeding adversarily, yet the retransfer, having been made by the sons when insolvent, was invalid, as against such creditors, to such extent as the consideration may have, in part, been not valuable, but voluntary.

10. The property, when retransferred, was of considerably greater value than the debt for the price of the original sale, with interest. The consideration of the retransfer was not valuable, but voluntary, as to such excess in value.

11. In the absence of actual, as distinguished from constructive or legal fraud, the fact that a material part of the consideration was thus voluntary, did not preclude the defendant, so far as it was valuable, from asserting title under the retransfer, as against creditors proceeding adversarily.

12. He was entitled therefore, to retain the property, even as against such creditors, until he should receive payment in full of the debt for the price and interest, though as between the debtors and himself, it had been extinguished by his acceptance of the retransfer.

13. But, as the debtors were, at the time of the retransfer, insolvent, the property, subject to the defendant's right of repayment, was recoverable at the suit of such creditors, in equity; and so soon as he should be repaid in full, immediate possession was recoverable by such creditors under proper proceedings at law or in equity.

14. The defendant retained the property for some time, receiving from it profits of large amount, after which he sold out for a price exceeding considerably the amount of the original price with interest. The price at which he thus finally disposed of the property was a single entire consideration, unapportioned between the good will and the corporeal moveable effects. These effects and the good will were of about equal value. The amount of clear profits received by him since the retransfer, together with the value of the good will when the final disposition was made, exceeded the amount of the price of the original sale with interest. Two days before the defendant thus sold out, but more than six months after the retransfer, the survivor of the sons commenced, in this court, proceedings under which he was voluntarily adjudged a bankrupt; after which, the plaintiff, in the due course of these proceedings, became the assignee in bankruptcy; and subsequently sued the defendant in trover to recover the value of the corporeal effects. If the retransfer had otherwise been valid against creditors, and had been made invalid by the bankrupt law alone, the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy was here too late to enable the plaintiff, as assignee in bankruptcy, to set aside the defendant's title.

15. But the assignee in bankruptcy, representing the general body of the creditors, may sue adversarily on their behalf—where the bankrupt himself could not—to annul, or set aside, any act which, under the general law of debtor and creditor, is, in whole or in part, void or voidable as against creditors.

16. Whatever has been either actually or constructively fraudulent is thus void or voidable.

17. As to "all the property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors," the title of the plaintiff, as assignee, under the 14th section of the bankrupt act of the 2d of March, 1867 [14 Stat. 522], "related back" to the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy. Therefore, if he could otherwise maintain the action, the defendant, who had not then disposed of the effects in question, could not apply the proceeds of the subsequent disposal of them in payment of any other demand which he may have had against the sons.

18. In the present action of trover the plaintiff could not recover more, in damages, than the value of the corporeal effects; nor could he recover to the amount of their value, unless they had been wrongfully converted by the defendant to his own use after the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

19. The only such conversion was the sale by which he finally disposed of the good will and the corporeal effects, together, for a single price. This would not have been such a conversion, if his relations had not then been adversary. The good will and corporeal effects could not have been sold separately without a sacrifice of each; and, as the debt rightfully secured to him was in part unpaid, the disposal of the whole together, by a single act, in order to effectuate the security, would not have been wrongful. In that case, the plaintiff's only recourse would have been for the surplus of the proceeds, for which he could not have sued in trover.

20. But if the defendant's possession of the whole was with assertion of exclusive right in himself, it was an adverse possession; and, if he sold with an existing intent and purpose to appropriate the whole avails to his own exclusive benefit, the sale, as made, was, it seems, a conversion such that the action of trover might be maintainable.

This was an action of trover, at the suit of James T. Mitchell, assignee in bankruptcy of Jeremiah McKibbin, surviving partner of the late firm of Jeremiah & William C. McKibbin, against their father Chambers McKibben, to recover the value of certain furniture and other effects in the Merchants' Hotel, in the city of Philadelphia.

Diehl & Archer, for plaintiff.

Sellers & Biddle, for defendant.

CADWALADER, District Judge (charging jury). The articles of agreement of 11th June, 1868, state that on February 1st, 1865, Chambers McKibbin was the owner of the lease and good will of the Merchants' Hotel, and of its furniture and fixtures of all kinds, its bed and table linen, carriages and horses, and generally of its arrangements and appurtenances of every nature, for the transaction of the business of hotel keeping. At that time, February 1st, 1865, he was desirous of relinquishing the business in favor of his two sons, Jeremiah and William C. McKibbin. He deposes that the hotel was of the clear yearly value of from $15,000 to $20,000, and was worth $50,000 to a stranger, but that he was willing to dispose of it to them for $30,000, and to receive payment out of the future profits, because they were his sons, and had been concerned with him in the business and in building up its good will and character, and also because he hoped that certain debts which they owed him might, if they prospered, be repaid. The sale was made accordingly for $30,000, payable in six instalments, of $5,000 each, one in twenty days, and the other five, which were to bear interest, in six, twelve, eighteen, twenty-four, and thirty months, respectively. For each of the six instalments they gave to him their promissory notes. Except these notes there was no writing executed. But the subsequent articles state that it was agreed at the time of the sale that, in the event of default in payment of the notes, the premises should, at his request, be reconveyed. He testifies to an express understanding, that if anything happened that they could not pay, they were to return the property to him; and Mr. Joseph McKibbin testifies, that in the event of their failure to pay their father, for his protection the agreement was, that the property should be retransferred. Jeremiah McKibbin also deposes, that there was an understanding of the same effect as that mentioned in the articles. We may therefore understand what occurred as having been expressed in the language of the subsequent articles.

Jeremiah and William C. McKibbin carried on the business from February 1st, 1865, till 11th or 16th of June, 1868. In this time, say three years and four and a-half months, the cash receipts were $665,802; and the whole expenditures, including rent, $537,691; the profits being $128,111,—more than $38,000 yearly, and about $3,200 monthly; but Jeremiah McKibbin thinks that the business of the last year was not so good by about 20 per cent. as that of the former period, so that for the last year we may assume that they were not less than $30,000. Of the profits, amounting to $128,111, Jeremiah McKibbin drew out $51,403, and William C. McKibbin $57,219; together, $108,622,—leaving between $19,000 and $20,000, nominally at least, in the concern, ($19,489.) They had, however, incurred other liabilities, not on the books, nor arising from the business of the hotel, to a considerable amount; they had not paid to their father a cent on account of the $30,000 purchase money, for which he held their notes; and they were each on separate account indebted to him in a large sum.

Here, I may observe, that their father's title to the property in dispute in this case cannot be in any wise benefited or improved by reason of any debt of either of them to him, except the notes for $30,000. The jury may dismiss from their minds every other debt to him. The father, in June, 1868, received information of their embarrassments; and learned from themselves that the information was true. He then demanded the return of the hotel property; and they agreed, as he says, to give it back. The articles of agreement of June, 1868, which I have already mentioned more than once, were accordingly prepared and executed, containing a brief recital of what had occurred in 1865, stating that the whole purchase-money remained due and unpaid, and, in consideration of the surrender of the promissory notes, and of the debts which they represented, and in pursuance of the agreement and understanding made at the time of the original purchase, purporting to sell and transfer to him the lease of the Merchants' Hotel premises, then held by them, together with the good will, fixtures and appurtenances of the business then transacted in the hotel, and all and singular the furniture, bed and table linen, crockery ware, cutlery, horses and carriages, and generally all things for the transaction of the business of hotel keeping, to them belonging, and then to said premises and the business there transacted pertaining. This was, in form, an absolute transfer. What it was, in effect, as between the parties, and as against creditors, will be considered hereafter.

Mr. McKibbin, the father, conducted the business of the hotel until the 24th of May, 1869, between eleven and twelve months. What his receipts were, during this time, beyond the expenses, we do not know precisely. The bookkeeper could not tell, for a reason which the jury will recollect. Mr. McKibbin himself says, that the hotel was worth from $15,000 to $20,000 clear value every year. Jeremiah McKibbin testifies indistinctly. We know that the profits in the time of him and his brother had averaged $38,000. He says: "After the retransfer the business fell off about twenty per cent. I don't know, the books are here. I think the last year we were there the profits fell off about twenty per cent." Perhaps he means there was a two-fold falling off, first of twenty per cent. in their own last year, and again of twenty per cent. after the retransfer, say first to $30,000, and afterwards to $24,000. The lowest amount, on the father's own evidence, was not less than $15,000. On the 24th of May, 1869, he sold out the concern for $42,000. How much of this was the value of the furniture, and how much of the good will, is not precisely shown. The purchaser says, about half each, $21,000 furniture, and $21,000 good will. The furniture had been constantly insured, we are told, for $30,000; and therefore its value in the hotel was probably greater than $21,000. The purchaser seems to have made his estimate upon some notion of removing the furniture. His valuation, though it may seem low, is, however, perhaps the safest estimate that we have in the evidence. But the whole subject of value is peculiarly one for the jury. William C. McKibbin died on the 3d of Oct., 1869; and on the 22d of May, 1869, two days before the elder Mr. McKibbin sold out, Jeremiah McKibbin, as surviving partner of J. and W. C. McKibbin filed his petition as a voluntary bankrupt. The title of the plaintiff, as assignee in bankruptcy, has relation to that day, that is to say, takes effect from the 22d of May, 1869. Representing the adversary rights of the general body of the creditors, he alleges that the sale by Mr. McKibbin on the 24th of May, 1869, was a wrongful conversion or disposition of the furniture and effects mentioned in the declaration to Mr. McKibbin's own use.

On behalf of the defendant I am requested to charge you:

1. That the transfer of June 11th, 1868, being more than six months previous to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy was not an act of bankruptcy. This proposition is affirmed.

2. That the transfer of June 11th, 1868, being valid by the laws of Pennsylvania, even though it preferred a creditor, the plaintiff in this case cannot recover unless the bankrupt has a beneficial interest in the goods, notwithstanding said transfer. This proposition is affirmed absolutely on the question of preference; and is otherwise affirmed throughout, except as it may be qualified, if the jury, under instructions hereafter to be given, shall find that the transfer, though absolute as against the debtors, was, under the general law of debtor and creditor, invalid as against creditors proceeding adversarily.

3. That if, at the time of said transfer, the defendant was a creditor of the bankrupt firm to an amount exceeding the value of the articles transferred, said transfer was valid, and the verdict should be for the defendant. This proposition is affirmed, if the value of the articles did not materially exceed the amount of the notes for $30,000, with interest.

4. That a transfer of the goods and chattels in 1868, vested the title and possession in the defendant legally, and the plaintiff cannot recover in a case founded on a tortious conversion. This proposition is affirmed, except so far as it may be qualified hereafter in the course of the charge to the jury.

5. That inasmuch as the plaintiff has in certain counts declared on a tortious conversion, and in other counts that there was a transfer in fraud of the bankrupt act, the verdict must be for the defendant. On this point the court instructs the jury that their verdict cannot, upon the evidence, be for the plaintiff upon any count of the declaration except the third;[2] and further than this, refuses to give the instruction requested.

6. If the jury believe that the transfer of the property to Chambers McKibbin, was an honest transaction, made in pursuance of the original agreement to make such transfer in case of non-payment, and for a bona fide consideration, the verdict must be for the defendant. This proposition is affirmed except so far as it may be qualified through the distinction between actual, and legal or constructive fraud, which will be explained hereafter.[3]

If the assignee in bankruptcy, who is here plaintiff, had no better right than J. and W. C. McKibbin, or no better right than Jeremiah McKibbin, as the surviving partner, the present action could not be sustained. But an assignee in bankruptcy may, in two respects, be able to sustain adversary proceedings where the bankrupt himself could not have done so if there had been no bankruptcy. In one of these respects, the assignee can sue to annul, set aside, or avoid acts which the bankrupt law makes void or voidable. In the other respect, he can sue to avoid or annul, or set aside, any act which, under the general law of debtor and creditor, is void or voidable as against creditors. In the present case, there has not been any act which the bankrupt law makes void or voidable, unless it would be so under the general law of debtor and creditor. But under the general law, the assignee represents the general body of the creditors; and may sue adversarily where the bankrupt himself could not. So far as may be necessary to annul or set aside, any act, in whole or in part, actually or constructively fraudulent as against the creditors, the assignee thus represents them. I say actually or constructively fraudulent, because there may be acts which would be perfectly justifiable on the part of a person who is not insolvent, but are fraudulent, as against creditors, when they have been done by an insolvent or an embarrassed person.

A great deal of the evidence on both sides bore upon the question, whether, upon the retransfer by the sons to the father, there had been a sufficient change of possession. As against creditors, a change of a debtor's ownership, without a change of the possession, does not protect moveable property against his creditors. But the law does not, in this respect, exact what is impossible. If such change as the nature of the subject admits of is fairly made, nothing more is, in general, required. In the present case, if the jury find, that, according to this rule, there was a sufficient change of possession in fact, the court cannot say that it was insufficient in law. On the contrary, the court cannot perceive that anything which ought to have been done was omitted. There was a public advertisement in the newspapers. The title or heading in the register was changed, and the bill heads were changed. Nothing more could be done, unless a circular notice were sent to all persons who had previously dealt with the hotel or its proprietors. The business of a hotel does not seem to be such as to require such a notice, or even to admit of it. But the question is wholly for the jury. It is true that Jeremiah McKibbin remained in the hotel; and he may have been the apparent and actual superintendent of the business. But the supreme court of the state has decided, that this may consist with an assumption of actual and apparent control by the new proprietor; and it is for the jury to determine whether the actual and apparent possession and control were not in Chambers McKibbin. If the case depended upon this question, I should not expect a verdict for the plaintiff.

[2] This third count alleged property in the plaintiff and a conversion by the defendant to his own use. A date was erroneous, but being stated under a videlicet, the error was immaterial.

[3] These points were stated and answered by the judge at the outset of the charge. The six propositions, and the answers, are transposed because they will be more intelligible here to a reader who was not present at the trial.

The remaining inquiry is upon the effect of what was done between the father and the sons to deprive the creditors of the sons of the surplus value of the lease, good will, business and contents of the hotel above the amount of the six notes for together $30,000, and the interest on them which made this debt about $36,000. If you find the question of possession in the father's favor, as I assume that you will, I see no difficulty in his right to receive full reimbursement of this amount out of the property.

The other questions are, first, whether, upon the merits, he was the absolute owner of the property, so as to have a right, as against creditors, to keep the surplus for his own use; and secondly, a technical question, whether, if the merits are with the plaintiff, he can recover in the present form of action.

In considering the first point, it may be premised that the defendant, as between himself and his sons, had a right to this surplus, not under the sale or arrangement of 1865—though this, perhaps, may be immaterial—but, under the retransfer of 1868, which was, in form, absolute. If the sons had not been insolvent, or embarrassed, when the retransfer of 1868 was made, they could have done as they pleased with what was their own. But persons who are insolvent, or embarrassed with debts which they cannot pay, cannot bargain with one creditor so as to defeat any just right of other creditors. This proposition, as it will be applied hereafter, does not depend upon the bankrupt law, but upon the general law of debtor and creditor.

We may now go back to the original sale of February 1, 1865, in order to determine what were the defendant's rights under it. The most favorable view of the case which he can reasonably ask you to take is, that he may stand, in all respects, on the same footing as if he were not the father of the debtors, or in any relation of consanguinity to them. That he should stand, as against creditors of the sons, on any better footing, would shock every man's moral sense of propriety. But he should not stand on a worse footing than any other person who had made just such a contract with them on the 1st of February, 1865. He deposes, in effect, that the sale was made to them for three-fifths only of the then value of the property. He says that it was worth $50,000 to a stranger; but for the reasons which he states, he let them have it for $30,000. The subsequent articles, which all three of the parties executed, recite that in the event of default in payment of the notes, it was agreed that upon his request the premises should be reconveyed. This important contract was verbal. If written it might have been expressed as follows: Chambers McKibbin, proprietor of the lease, good will and fixtures, and furniture and effects of all kinds of the Merchants' Hotel, the same being of the value of $50,000, in consideration of his natural love and affection for his sons, Jeremiah and William C. McKibbin, and of thirty thousand dollars payable in six instalments, for which they have given him their promissory notes, each for $5,000, one of them payable in twenty days, and the other five payable with interest, in six, twelve, eighteen, twenty-four and thirty months, respectively, and for divers other good causes and considerations him thereunto moving, sells and transfers the same to them; and it is agreed, that in the event of a default in payment of the said notes, the said premises shall, at the request of the said Chambers McKibbin, be reconveyed. Now, such an agreement would be the most natural and proper and honest that, with the motives of the elder Mr. McKibbin, could have been executed. And if there had been a writing it would probably have been expressed as I have supposed it, except that the words of the value of $50,000, would probably not have been inserted. But though not inserted, the value would have been provable upon the question which we are about to consider; and, if material to the question, would have been of the same effect as if inserted. To simplify the question, I have therefore supposed it inserted, taking the defendant's own estimate of the then value. The legal or equitable effect would have been the same if the value inserted was $42,000, or any other amount in material excess of the consideration.

This excess in value simplifies the question, what was the effect of the agreement that in case of default, the premises were, upon the seller's request, to be reconveyed. The meaning and effect of such an agreement was that he was to retain them as a security for the $30,000, with interest, just as if they were mortgaged to him, and that if default should be made, he might, upon request, insist upon having possession of the premises restored to him, to hold them as a security till paid, or to be sold in order to effectuate the security. But he could not enforce the literal execution of the agreement to reconvey, in the sense of excluding the debtors from a right to redeem the premises. He might, after a reasonable notice to the debtors, have sold for the payment of the $30,000, with interest; and the debtors would then have received the surplus. Whether he could have sold without the decree of a court, is an unimportant inquiry. So, it is not important to inquire whether he could have obtained a judicial decree limiting the time within which they might redeem. It is not necessary to answer every question as what he might have done without the consent of the debtors. It suffices to state what he could not have done. He could not have arbitrarily taken the law into his own hands, and compelled an absolute retransfer, according to the literal meaning of the words. He could no more have done so than the payment of the pound of flesh could be enforced literally by Shylock. This may be explained by considering the nature of a mortgage, not that of a pledge distinctively so called, nor the very peculiar case of stoppage in transitu, which has been supposed and argued by counsel. Whether there would have been any difference in the case of a pledge, it is not necessary to inquire. I do not know that there would be. But let us consider the case of a mortgage properly so called. When I say "properly so called," I do not refer particularly to any form of conveyance. I mean simply a security for a debt, where the debtor, and not the creditor, has possession of the property which constitutes the security, till default, and where, upon default, the creditor may take possession. When such a security is written, the form of the writing is unimportant. Sometimes the form is wholly different from the effect. My house may be worth $5,000. I may borrow $500 for a year on the security of the house, and mortgage it to the creditor. The ordinary form of the transaction is, that I give my bond in $1,000, conditioned to pay the $500 with interest; and I convey the house to the creditor to be held by him forever, provided that if I pay him the $500, with interest, within the year, the conveyance shall be null and void, and in that case I shall have back my house; or the mortgage may expressly provide that it shall be reconveyed to me. Here I may continue in possession of the house till I make default, though the mortgage purports on its face to convey the house at once to the creditor. If I make default, he may demand possession; and I must give it up. But if he takes possession, though the mortgage says that it is absolutely his house, in consequence of my default, yet it continues to be my house, though I have made the default; and he holds the possession of it only as a security for his $500 with his interest. As soon as he has received that amount from the rents or profits of the house, he must surrender the possession to me. Ordinarily, a creditor would not embarrass himself by taking possession, but prefers instituting proceedings to compel a sale of the house. This is ordinarily a sale by the sheriff under legal proceedings. But the mortgage may contain a power enabling the creditor to sell, and then legal proceedings may be dispensed with. But whether he sells, or the sheriff sells, he gets only his $500 with interest; and if the sale is for $5,000, or for any less sum, he gets no more, and I get the rest of the money, less costs. I get this money, as proceeds of the sale of my house, and not of his house, though, according to the words of the mortgage, it has been his house all the time.

Now, it is unimportant what may have been the form of the writing, if it was intended as a security for money. And it is a settled rule that the debtor cannot, at the time of the mortgage, make a contract relinquishing, or one which will bind him to forfeit or lose, his right to have the property back, or to redeem it, on payment of the debt with interest. If he could bind himself by such a contract, there would be no limit to extortion except that of the rapacity of the creditor; and the debtor and creditor between them, could cut off all other creditors from any recourse to the surplus value of mortgaged property.

Gentlemen, I said a little while ago that no contract can be made at the time of a mortgage by which the debtor can so give up his right to redeem that he will lose it. And here I will read a passage from Butler's Notes to Coke upon Littleton, because they are the catechism of young lawyers and a safe text for old lawyers; and because the passage states a most familiar and elementary proposition. Butl. Co. Litt. 205a, note 1; "As to what constitutes a mortgage;—no particular words or form of conveyance are necessary for this purpose. It may be laid down as a general rule, and subject to very few exceptions, that wherever a conveyance or assignment of an estate is originally intended as a security for money, whether this intention appear from the deed itself, or by any other instrument, it is always considered in equity as a mortgage, and redeemable, even though there is an express agreement of the parties that it shall not be redeemable, or that the right of redemption shall be confined to a particular time, or to a particular description of persons." In one of the cases which he cites (1 Vern. 8) the register's book contains a declaration of Lord Nottingham, that certain deeds, "being but a security, the same could not be extinguished by any covenant or agreement at the time of making the mortgage." This has never been disputed; and it is not now disputed here. But in order to find out what is disputed, it is sometimes necessary to state what is indisputable. Thus far, there is no dispute.

Where the transaction is a sale, and the purchase money is to be secured in whole or in part, upon the property sold, there may be two writings, one of them a transfer, and the other a mortgage,—or the instrument making the transfer may reserve or declare the security. In the latter case, one writing answers the purpose of both, and has the same effect as in the case of a writing made between these parties in the form which I have supposed. We may take the case of a writing made on the 1st of February, 1865, in the words in which the articles of the 11th of June, 1868, recite the agreement of the 1st of February, 1865, to have been made. If the agreement was, that the defendant should be secured upon the premises for the payment of his notes, with interest, the effect of this agreement was not such as to give him any different right than if the security had been in the form of a mortgage.

But it has been very ingeniously argued, that there may be a sale of such a kind that the whole consideration or price may be secured by a provision which will so take effect, that, if default is made in payment, the parties are remitted to their former relations, the property revested in the seller, and the debt for the price extinct. I will not say that there cannot be such a case. There may be exceptions from the general rule; and I will not say that there may not be just such an exception as the argument suggests, though I have some difficulty in admitting it, except where the sale has been a conditional one of such a kind as to prevent, suspend or qualify the vesting of the property in the purchaser. But, supposing that the case may be possible, in the abstract, the present is not one of the kind. The right of resumption was here in the creditor alone, without any reciprocity. This brought the case within the general reason of a mortgage. If this difficulty could be overcome, there was another one of a more serious kind. This was, that the consideration was materially less than the full value of the property. In such a case it is of the essence of the transaction that it should be deemed a mortgage.[4] If it be said that the surplus value was a conditional gift from the father to the sons, or from the creditor to those who became his debtors for the price, the objections are, first, that such is not the apparent effect of the contract, and, secondly, that such a contract, as it is said to have been carried into effect, could not have taken effect so as to impair the rights of other creditors. A sale of a subject of commercial business cannot be so made as thus to give, as to two-fifths of the value, an indefinite prospective exemption from liability to creditors. A stranger cannot do it; and of course a father cannot. He cannot give to his sons property to enable them to engage in commercial business, and exempt any part of the property, or any part of its value, from future liability to other creditors. So far as a creditor's own interest is concerned he may indulge his debtors; but he cannot so indulge them as to make two-fifths of the value of the subject of a transfer to them exempt from liability to demands of other creditors. If this were, in any case, doubtful, the exemption certainly could not be indefinitely protracted in duration, as was here attempted. The prospective immunity would be contrary to the nature of the ownership of such a subject. If the equity of redemption could otherwise have been bargained away, as between parties, such a bargain would be of no effect as against other future creditors.

The question of the defendant's alleged absolute ownership is thus reduced to a single point. It depends upon the effect of the articles of the 11th of June, 1868. I have already said that, as between the parties, these articles did vest the absolute ownership in the defendant; and that if the adversary rights of creditors were not in question he could have held the property from that time, as against the sons; and, of course, he could have kept the proceeds of sale, though they might have exceeded the amount of the debt secured. The simple reason is, that—except as against creditors—parties of full age can, as far as their own interest is concerned, do as they may please. But these two gentlemen, the sons, were then, as counsel on both sides concede, insolvent, at all events very much embarrassed, sufficiently so not to be the absolute masters of their property as between themselves and their creditors; because, gentlemen, a man who is indebted, and unable to pay, cannot, as against his creditors, part with his property, under the name of a sale, at an under-value, so as to give away the surplus value, to a father, a son, a friend, or a favored creditor.

It has been argued by counsel, with great zeal and ability, that we may here avoid meeting this question. Why any body should wish to avoid it I do not see. But the argument is, that because the debt of the sons for the price amounted, with the accrued interest, to $36,000, and the defendant finally sold out for $42,000, the difference being, it is said, only $6,000, therefore, this might be considered as equivalent to a seller's taking back the thing sold at a price about equal to the value, and that the question of the materiality of a difference of $6,000 might therefore be left for you, gentlemen of the jury, to speculate upon, as to the general honesty of the whole transaction. So I understand the argument. But gentlemen, recollect that we are considering the question of honesty, not speculatively as between near relations, but practically as to adversary creditors. I do not understand the reasoning upon the immateriality of a difference of $6,000, if it, in truth, were the whole difference. The amount is not, in itself, small. The dividend upon it might keep a creditor from starving. Nor is a sixth of the amount of the debt with interest an addition proportionally small.

[4] The Pennsylvania authorities on the whole subject are reviewed in Thompson v. Hanson, 29 Leg. Int. (March 22, 1872,) 93, and in the note to a fuller report of the same case, in 20 Am. Law Reg. (11 N. S.) 680, 690.

I do not think that you will be readily disposed to think it so. But if you were disposed to view the argument more favorably, I do not think the facts warrant even the statement of the proposition. Mr. McKibbin, when he finally sold out, had already kept this property for almost a year. He had, in this period, according to the evidence, received from it at least $15,000 before he sold. The profits for the year, according to some of the evidence, may have been $24,000, or more. They were, according to his own lowest figure, $15,000. He said, as you will recollect, that the yearly value was never less than $15,000 or $20,000. Now he could, as I have already intimated, after a reasonable notice to redeem or perhaps without any such notice, have sold out sooner than he did. Had he done so, he would have been accountable for a less amount of accrued income, in reduction of the debt. Yet he did not choose to sell sooner. He kept the property until he had received, say $15,000, if you so find. Therefore it is not, as the argument supposes, $6,000 only which he asks to retain over and above his own debt, as against the general creditors. He asks to retain against them in addition to the full amount of his own debt, a year's income in addition to the $6,000. Therefore, if the proposition could otherwise be considered more favorably than I can view it, the facts do not sustain its applicability.

Let us now apply the principles which have been stated. Mr. McKibbin the elder being entitled to the repossession of this hotel for the security of a debt of $30,000, with, say $6,000 interest, making it $36,000, repossesses himself; and having, while repossessed, received a clear income from it of, say at least $15,000, sells for $42,000 more, making at least $57,000. If he is entitled, as I think he is, to retain the $36,000, he has in hand $21,000 more, which, so far as I can see, does not equitably belong to him in any way. I do not impute bad motives to any body. But these gentlemen have taken a wrong and arbitrary view of the subject which is against the just rights of the creditors.

I said, in an earlier stage of my remarks, that any other debt of the sons, or of either of them, to Mr. McKibbin, than the $30,000, with interest, had nothing to do with this case, and should be excluded by the jury from consideration. He says, indeed, that each of them was indebted to him when he sold the hotel to them, and that his expectation then was that if they prospered in the business, they might pay to him those former debts. But there never was any contract which attached those debts to the property. As to any further debts which they may have owed him, when they made the retransfer, he may naturally have supposed likewise that he would be able to retain the surplus avails of the hotel property towards these debts. If so, there was nothing censurable in his motives. But the contract then made was in writing; and it contained nothing appropriating the hotel property to secure any such other debt. Through the intervention of the bankruptcy, it afterwards became impossible for him to set off any such other debt, in any way against the surplus avails. It will be recollected that the title of the assignee in bankruptcy attached, by relation, two days before any sale was made. Until the property was turned into money, there could be no right of retention, or set-off, legal or equitable.

(Under this head, the judge made some remarks upon a supposition that these other debts were all separately contracted by the sons, and were not partnership debts. This part of the charge is omitted because it was afterwards agreed by the counsel, and stated by the judge to the jury, that the sons were, in June, 1868, when the retransfer was made, heavily indebted to the defendant on joint as well as on separate account.)

I repeat that Mr. McKibbin's right of retention was limited to the $30,000 with interest, the amount of the six notes which, as between the sons and himself, were, according to the writing of June, 1868, surrendered.

To recapitulate: The question as to the change of possession, I have left to you, intimating my own impression of the sufficiency of the change. If you find, on this point, in favor of the defendant, it follows that he was entitled to retain, for his own use, the amount of these notes, $30,000 with interest, notwithstanding their extinction as a debt between himself and the sons. Upon the other question, it is for you to determine the value, whether $21,000 more or less, of what he has received and disposed of above the amount of $30,000 with interest. If the plaintiff representing, as he does, the creditors, can sustain their just rights in the present form of action, he is entitled to your verdict for this excess in value. I have no more to say upon the merits of the case.

A point of serious difficulty remains for consideration, upon the technical objection which is made to the action, in its present form. The question whether it could be supported had caused me a good deal of thought before Mr. Biddle's very able argument on the subject. I will now decide the question provisionally, reserving it for fuller consideration hereafter. In the meantime you will act upon my present opinion.

It is to be regretted that the plaintiff has proceeded at law instead of suing in equity. In a court of equity, it would not have required more than a few minutes to state the propositions which it has taken me an hour to explain to the jury. All questions of actual or constructive fraud, as well as questions of account, &c., could have been settled in such a court, or before its master, without any technical embarrassment. But the jurisdiction at law, though less convenient, is, to a certain extent, concurrent; and the plaintiff has invoked its exercise. In the present form of action he cannot recover more than the value of the furniture and other corporeal moveable effects. He could not recover in this action the profits received by the defendant or any part of them, or the value of the good will, if the defendant was liable to any extent under either of these heads. Therefore, though you should believe that the defendant has received more than the value of the furniture and other corporeal effects over and above the amount of the debt, you cannot find a verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the excess. Whether you can find in his favor as to the corporeal effects, depends technically upon another question. This question is, whether the defendant has wrongfully converted them to his own use. Unless he has done so, the plaintiff cannot recover at all. Then what is such a wrongful conversion by the defendant? If, having received clear profits to the amount of $15,000 and more, he had sold the lease and good will separately for $21,000, and had afterward disposed of the corporeal effects for $21,000, this question would have been attended with no difficulty. The debt would then have been paid in full before the disposal of the corporeal effects; and the disposal of them would have been a wrongful conversion. But the good will and corporeal effects were disposed of together for a single price; and there was no apportionment of this consideration, that is to say, there was no sale of the good will at a certain price, and of the corporeal effects for the rest of the consideration. Here the defendant's counsel, with great ingenuity and perfect fairness, argues thus: He says that the subjects of the sale, the good will, and the corporeal effects, were properly sold together, and that they could not have been sold separately without a sacrifice of each. The defendant, in order to render the security available to the best advantage, had a right to sell them together; nay, could not properly have sold otherwise, because to sever them would have injured the sale of each. The argument, then, is that the disposal as made, was not a wrongful act, and consequently not a wrongful conversion to his own use. This is very fair logic. But it may admit of an answer. I think that the argument does not cover the whole of the technical question. The part omitted arises from the adversary relation of the defendant; and is a proposition upon which the question of conversion has, if I am not mistaken, very often depended. Every person who is in possession of property, claiming an exclusive right in himself to the whole of it, has a possession which is adverse against every one else. The defendant's possession being thus wholly adverse to the plaintiff's rights, the proposition is that the defendant made the lumping sale in question for a purpose wholly adverse. This he did if he made it with an existing intent to appropriate the whole avails to his own exclusive use. On this point, all the evidence, in which his subsequent acts and omissions might, if it were necessary, be included, shows, beyond dispute, that his only purpose was appropriation of the whole for his own benefit. If so, the sale was, I think, a wrongful conversion of the furniture and other corporeal effects to his own use. If the good will and corporeal effects were, as Mr. Maugle testifies, of equal value, each worth $21,000, and the defendant made no distinct appropriation of either, I think that, as he could not retain both, the plaintiff might elect for which he would sue; and that this action was an election, the conversion having occurred before the suit, and after the time to which the plaintiff's title related. (As to the right of an assignee in bankruptcy to sue in trover for a conversion occurring before his appointment, but after the time to which his title had relation, the judge referred the counsel to Garland v. Carlisle, in the English house of lords,—4 Clark & F, 693,—and the authorities reviewed in that case).

According to my present opinion, there is no technical obstacle to prevent the plaintiff's recovery of the value of the corporeal effects, as damages for this conversion. The point, however, is reserved, as I have stated. This will not embarrass the jury, who will understand that it is decided, so far as they are concerned, in the plaintiff's favor. If you find for the plaintiff to the extent of this value, taking either Mr. Maugles's estimate of $21,000, or any other estimate that you may think more conformable to the evidence, your verdict will be for the plaintiff on the third count of the declaration, and for the defendant on the other counts. You may add interest for three years and a half, if you think it right, not in the ordinary sense of interest, but as a reasonable measure of damages for the detention.

The jury, not agreeing, were discharged, the judge telling them that they had made a mistake in not finding a verdict. The following are understood to have been his reasons for discharging the jury: The issues in the cases reported in 14 P. F. Smith [64 Pa. St.] 352, were upon sheriff's rules of interpleader. The levies had been made in September, 1868, on the same furniture, &c., which is the subject of the present action, under executions against J. & W. C. McKibbin. Their father, the present defendant, was the claimant. The levies were thus made eight months before he disposed of the property, and at a time when the greater part of the debt to him for the original price was unpaid. His right to retain the property till he should be paid, was thus unquestionable, as against the execution creditors, unless there had been either actual fraud, or insufficient change of possession. The only contention therefore, under those issues, was upon those two questions, the first, of actual fraud, the second of constructive fraud on the point of possession. In the present case it was evident that the parties on each side came to the trial prepared for the contestation of the same two questions only, and principally the question of possession. But another question of constructive fraud had, in the meantime, arisen upon the defendant's adverse claim of more than a security for the debt. The latter question was apparently overlooked at the trial, until suggested from the bench as necessarily presented by the evidence. Until a late stage of the trial, the plaintiff's contention was upon the two former questions only; and the evidence on that side had apparently been adduced for its bearing on them only.

The evidence of the amounts of the defendant's receipts and expenditures, while he was in possession, was therefore indistinct; as was likewise the proof as to the value of the corporeal effects. The excess of the apparent amount of actual profits above the defendant's estimate of the former annual value, seemed also to require explanation. It might perhaps be conjectured that the difference arose in whole or in part, from his deducting a reasonable allowance for the time and services of himself and members of his family which did not appear upon the books of account. But this could only be a matter of conjecture. If these considerations had been out of the question, the judge, on being informed of the jury's difficulty in agreeing, might probably have directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff—subject to the point reserved—for the value, without interest, of the corporeal effects, according to the lowest estimate in the testimony—unless the plaintiff had objected to such a direction.

SEAMEN—WAGES—SECOND MATE—INCOMPETENCY—MIDSHIPMAN ON FURLOUGH.

1. The second mate's wages disputed, because he was not a perfect seaman.

[2. Cited in Sherwood v. McIntosh, Case No. 12,778, to the point that if the master finds upon trial that there is on the part of the man either a want of fidelity, or a want of capacity which disqualifies him from the service, he will be justified in putting him upon a different duty. And in such a case the master will also be justified in making a reasonable deduction in the wages.]

[3. Cited in The Exchange, Case No. 4,594, and in Allen v. Hallet, Id. 223, to the point that emergencies arising during a voyage may render it necessary to displace a mariner from the situation for which he is shipped, and to allot him other services on board.]

[4. Cited in brief in Knee v. American Steamship Co., Case No. 7,877, to the point that one who is advanced to a position on shipboard having a higher rate of pay attached is entitled to this higher rate, notwithstanding he signed articles for a lower rate.]

The contract for wages in this case was not denied, but proof was adduced to shew that the complainant was incompetent, and did not understand perfectly the duty of a mariner.—Yet it appeared, that he had fulfilled all the duties commonly required from a second officer, about two weeks excepted, when he was sick. At the end of this period the master intermitted his office of second mate, and turned him before the mast. It appeared from circumstances, that the captain was personally acquainted with the complainant [George Mitchell] before the contract. It was in proof that he was a midshipman in the service of the United States, on furlough, and had acted in that capacity during several cruizes.

BY THE COURT. The true ground of all such enquiries is, whether or not, there has been fraud and imposition practised? If this fact is made out, the contract is not binding on the party deceived. This is a principle in both the common and maritime laws. If one ships as an officer, or mariner, and either expressly or impliedly, professes himself a mariner capable of thoroughly executing the contract, and it turns out otherwise, this court is in the constant habit of denying wages on the claim entirely; or allowing a quantum meruit, according to circumstances. The proof of such false professions must be made out, and the fraudulent conduct designated, in some satisfactory way. In the case before me it is my belief, that the master was acquainted with the capacity of the complainant, as to seamanship; and that no fraud was practised. He made the engagement under a knowledge of the true state of the complainant's nautical abilities, or deficiencies. I am neither desirous, or accustomed to decide on other than such as appear to me legal principles. Where these justify me, I will take every fit occasion to encourage our midshipmen (having leave of the executive so to do) to enter into the merchant service, as a laudable mode of perfecting themselves in seamanship, instead of dissipating and wasting their time. I have always considered our navy a great school, among its other benefits, for teaching young men of education and respectable connexions, nautical knowledge. Although they may not be perfectly competent in all the drudgery and details of seamanship, they may, and very many do, acquire a sufficient knowledge to qualify them for commands in merchant ships. Other qualifications than those of mere seamanship, are required in those who act as officers in ships. I have had too frequent opportunities of perceiving, that many of those who are capable before the mast, are miserably incompetent on the quarter deck. Qualities, not commonly discovered by mere seamen, are here indispensably called forth. However desirable it may be, that an officer shall have gone through every grade of the occupation to which he is devoted, it often happens that those who have not practically or manually acquired their knowledge of all the duties of mariners, are among the most intelligent and trustworthy masters and officers of ships. How far these general remarks apply to the complainant, I will not undertake to decide. This seems to have been his first essay in a merchant vessel, and the master was willing to join in the experiment. After a trial for four months it appears that the captain thought himself justifiable in displacing his second mate; and occasionally putting the carpenter in his berth. No testimony is offered to shew the impropriety of this conduct. It appears that the complainant, thereafter, performed the duty of an ordinary seaman. I therefore decree, that he be paid according to contract, for four months, the time he served as second mate; and thereafter as an ordinary seaman, for the residue of the voyage.

Case No. 9,668.

MITCHELL v. PRATT.

[Taney, 448.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1841.

ADMIRALTY—MARITIME TORT—ASSAULT AND BATTERY—ACQUITTANCE—REASONABLE SATISFACTION.

1. A paper, purporting to be a receipt by a seaman to the master of his vessel, for twenty-five cents, "for assault and battery, in full of all dues and demands," with a witness's name to it, and on which are two wafer seals (in the absence of proof that either of the seals is that of the person giving the receipt), cannot operate as a release, in the technical sense of that word, as known to the common law.

2. Such receipt may operate as an acquittance, given upon the compromise and settlement of an unliquidated and disputed claim for damages for the assault, if the settlement was fairly made, when the seaman was free from improper influence, and had an opportunity of exercising his free and deliberate judgment.

3. But in order to entitle it to support, it must appear to be a reasonable satisfaction, or, at least, the contrary must not appear.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This is an appeal from the decree of the district court, dismissing a libel filed by the appellant to recover damages from the appellee for an assault and battery. The appellant shipped as a seaman on board the schooner David Pratt, whereof Timothy Pratt was master, on the 9th of September 1840, at Portland, for a voyage to Turk's Island, and one more port in the West Indies, if required by the master, and back to the United States, and to Portland, if required by the master. It appears, that on the voyage to Turk's Island, the master, without any justifiable cause, struck the libellant a severe blow on the head, with an iron-bound water-bucket, which broke to pieces by the force of the blow, and afterwards beat him with a broom-stick, until he broke that also, and then with his fists. The schooner made the voyage to Turk's Island, and returned from thence to the port of Baltimore, where the libellant was discharged by the master, at his own request. At the time of his discharge, he received the balance due him for his wages, which were paid him in the cabin of the vessel, in the presence of the mate, and he signed the printed receipt endorsed on the shipping articles, which contains the usual release of all demands for assault and battery or imprisonment, and every other matter whatever.

It is stated by the mate, Barzillai Curtis, examined as a witness for the respondent, that after this receipt was signed, the master said to the libellant, that there was some little difficulty between them, and that he would give him twenty-five cents to settle it, which he took, and receipted the paper filed by the respondent, which he (the mate) witnessed. The receipt produced is in the following words:

"Baltimore, Oct. 27, 1840. Received of T. Pratt, twenty-five cents for assault and battery, in full for all dues and demands.

"Peter X Mickell. [Seal.]
mark

"Witness:—Barzillai Curtis. [Seal.]"

This receipt, it appears by the testimony of the mate, was signed about ten minutes after the wages had been paid and the receipt given on the shipping articles; that there was nothing said particularly about the assault and battery, at the time; that the respondent said he would give him twenty-five cents to satisfy him, but that there was no compulsion, and that he need not sign the receipt and take the money unless he pleased. Another seaman, named Jesse White, is said to have been present at the settlement, but he has not been called as a witness by either party.

This is the case upon the evidence, and it is very clear, that an assault and battery was committed by the master upon the libellant, and that the blow inflicted and the weapon used were altogether unjustifiable. This, indeed, is not controverted in the argument; the defence relied upon, is the settlement and receipt above mentioned; and it is insisted upon the part of the respondent, that this settlement and receipt is a full answer to the libellant's demand.

It is evident, that the paper in question, cannot operate as a release, in the technical sense of that word, as known to the common law; for, although there are two wafer seals upon the paper, there is no proof that either of them is the seal of the libellant, or that either of them was on the paper at the time it was executed. It must be remembered, that the proof offered, is by the subscribing witness, who was called by the respondent to prove the execution of the paper; he says, that the libellant "receipted the paper," and this is all the proof he gives of its execution; not a word is said in relation to the sealing of the instrument; nor anything said from which it can be inferred that it was sealed by the seaman. Moreover, it contains no words of release; nor any words that can be construed as such.

The court, however, does not understand that the paper is relied on as a release, in the common law sense of the word, but as an acquittance given upon the compromise and settlement of an unliquidated and disputed claim for damages for the assault. And I do not doubt that, if this settlement was fairly made, when the seaman was free from improper influence, and had an opportunity of exercising his free and deliberate judgment, it ought to be supported; but in order to entitle it to support, it must (in the language of the court, in the case of Cumber v. Wane, 1 Strange, 426), "appear to be a reasonable satisfaction, or, at least, the contrary must not appear." And in this view of the matter, it is of no importance whether this paper be regarded as a release, or merely as a receipt, for it certainly cannot be supported, in either case, if it appears to have been obtained unfairly, or by improper influence.

It appears to the court, that there are insuperable objections to this paper, as a bar to the seaman's suit. In the first place, the amount stated to have been given in satisfaction, is obviously and grossly inadequate, and does not approach at all to a reasonable satisfaction; and in the second place, the paper was obtained under circumstances in which the sailor was evidently within the reach of undue influences, which he could hardly be expected to resist.

The sum given as an award and satisfaction, is merely a nominal one, and could have formed no real consideration in the mind of the parties; and upon principles of justice, this receipt has nothing more to recommend it, as a discharge to the respondent, than the usual printed receipt and release endorsed on the shipping articles. Yet, that acquittance, although it contains express words of release, is not held to be sufficient to discharge the master from damages for an assault and battery or imprisonment, without some further proof; because the relations which have been existing between the parties, the power of withholding the seaman's wages, and his inability, in general, to read and comprehend the legal effect of such instruments, give great advantages to the master over him, and bring just suspicion upon any contract of settlement and compromise between them, which, upon the face of it, shall show that the seaman was legally and equitably entitled to more than he received.

Now, the receipt in question is not only liable to the same objections with the printed acquittance above mentioned, but to a greater and more serious one. In ordinary cases, when the printed acquittance is signed, the voyage is ended, and the seaman entitled to his discharge, and he is, at least, free from the apprehension of personal ill-treatment by the master. It is true, that in this case, also, the libel states the voyage to be ended; but this is the error of the pleader; and according to the shipping articles, the seamen were not entitled to their wages here, if the master chose to require them to proceed from this place to Portland.

The case, then, upon the receipt relied on, is this. The libellant requests his discharge here, as proved by the mate (the master being at liberty to discharge him or not, as he pleases); the seaman is thereupon taken to the cabin and receives the balance of his wages, in the presence of the master and mate, to whose authority he has been accustomed to submit; and at the same interview, when he does not appear to have received any written or other discharge, which released him from the shipping articles, and when it was still in the master's power to compel him to continue with the vessel to Portland, he is desired to sign another paper, by which he relinquishes his claim for damages for a severe and unjustifiable battery, upon terms so utterly unjust to him, that it is impossible to believe that he could have assented to them, if he had felt himself entirely free, and understood the meaning of the paper. He was told, indeed, there was no compulsion, and that he need not sign the paper unless he pleased. But what would have been the consequences, if he had determined not to sign it? The seaman must have felt that his request to be discharged here, might, in that event, not be complied with, and that the master might compel him to perform the voyage to Portland. He was, at all events, in the power of the master in this respect, and he was not free and upon equal ground with him until he had received a legal and irrevocable discharge, and had left the vessel.

It does not appear that any discharge was given before the receipt was signed; he was on board the schooner and in the master's power, and the sum paid is so grossly inadequate, that the court is satisfied the acquittance must have been given under a sense of coercion, if the seaman understood its contents; and it cannot, under such circumstances, be supported as a bar to his claim.

The decree of the district court must, therefore, be reversed, and the court will award the libellant thirty dollars damages; but no costs in the circuit or district courts can be given, under the act of congress, as the damages recovered are under fifty dollars in this court.

Circuit Court, D. Tennessee. Sept. Term, 1830.

PUBLIC LANDS—ENTRY AND SURVEY—ERRORS—FRAUD—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. The land law of North Carolina, under which the land titles in Tennessee principally originated, is different from the Virginia law.

2. An entry must be surveyed in a square or oblong, if no form be expressed in the entry.

3. Errors in the survey should be corrected in a reasonable time.

4. A fraudulent title may be protected by the statute of limitations, from the time the fraud was discovered. And on the same principle may lapse of time be relied on. There is no reason why the statute should not begin to run from the time the fraud is discovered.

[Cited in Carr v. Hilton, Case No. 2,437; Tyler v. Angevine, Id. 14,306; Bailey v. Glover, 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 348.]

[Cited in Wear v. Skinner, 46 Ind. 266.]

5. It is important that the facts, on which the fraud depends, should be investigated whilst they are within the recollection of witnesses.

6. Courts in England and in this country are more favorable now than formerly to the policy of the statute of limitations. It tends to the peace of society. Courts in England, in some modern cases, have regretted that they are bound by former adjudications, in many instances, to give little weight to the policy of statutes of limitations, which are properly denominated statutes of repose.

[This was a suit by David Mitchell against John Thompson and Sampson Williams for the possession of certain real property.]

Mr. Gibbs, for complainant.

Mr. Anderson, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The complainant states in his bill, which was filed the 15th of June, 1824, that being entitled to a right of pre-emption, on the 17th of July, 1794, he entered six hundred and forty acres of land, lying on Brown's creek, adjoining a conditional line between the heirs of Roger Tapp and the complainant on the lower side; then running up the creek to adjoin a conditional line made with Samuel Barton by Roger Tapp, in behalf of the complainant; thence, as the law directs, so as to include his spring and improvement; that this entry was assigned to Joseph Erwin, who afterwards reconveyed it to the complainant. That, the 22d of October, 1791, Sampson Williams, knowing that the complainant had made the entry aforesaid, and the situation thereof, made an entry including about two hundred acres of the land covered by complainant's entry, and the 17th of April, 1793, obtained a grant therefor. That, being a deputy surveyor, the defendant Williams, on the 10th of December, 1792, made a survey of complainant's entry, and fraudulently, for the purpose of securing to himself a part of the land entered by the complainant, made the survey in such way as to exclude a part of the land covered by his entry, and extended it on land which had been appropriated by others. On this survey a grant was obtained. The bill further states, that Sampson Williams, two or three years before the filing of the bill, conveyed the land granted to him to John Thompson, one of the defendants, for little or no consideration, and who had full notice of the fraud before he received the conveyance. A decree for so much of the land granted to Williams as is included in complainant's entry is prayed for. In his answer, Thompson denies all knowledge of the fraud, and alleges that he purchased the land for two hundred and eighty-five dollars, a low price, on account of an interference of a survey of Thomas Thompson's pre-emption, and of the entry of one Davis. Williams also denies all fraud, and says that complainant and Erwin were present, and directed the survey. He says, from the thick growth of cane at that early day, it was difficult to make surveys accurately. Both defendants rely on the statute of limitations, length of time, &c. As stated in the bill, the entry of Mitchell was made on the 17th of July, 1784. It was transferred to Erwin on the 20th of December, 1785; and surveyed by Sampson Williams on the 29th of November, 1792. On this survey, one grant was issued on the 26th of June, 1793, for 401½ acres, and another for 582½ acres, dated June the 26th, 1793. The 20th of August, 1794, Erwin conveyed the 401½ acres to the complainant, and the 8th of February, 1811, by his attorney, conveyed the other tract. Sampson Williams' entry was made on the 22d of October, 1791, and surveyed October the 15th, 1792. The grant was issued the 27th of April, 1793.

The testimony is very voluminous. A great number of depositions have been read, a part to prove facts pertinent to the case; and a part to impeach the credibility of witnesses. In the discussion several points were made, and the facts in support of them respectively were adverted to; and also the principles of law which were deemed applicable to each. The last ground assumed in the defence is, that, under the circumstances of the case, the relief prayed for in the bill is barred by the lapse of time. This point will be first examined. The complainant contends that his entry was fraudulently surveyed, by Williams the defendant, in such a way as to include the quantity, by interfering with older entries, and so as not to interfere with the junior entry which he had made. The claim of the complainant rests exclusively on the assignment of the right which Erwin is supposed to have had, to have the original entry accurately surveyed after it had been carried into grant, as above stated. The land law requires the surveyor to survey entries according to their priorities in date, either in a square or oblong figure. By the construction given the acts, under which such titles are acquired, in this state, the surveyor is not subject to the control of the enterer, further than his wishes may have been expressed in the calls of the entry. The surveyor is to act according to his own discretion in making the survey, with the single exception of a case where a conventional line has been agreed upon by persons where lands adjoin. The statute of 1796 provides a special mode by which the mistakes of a surveyor, in platting or making out certificates to the secretary's office, &c. may be corrected; but there seems to be no statutory provision for correcting the survey after the grant has been issued. An entry gives a right to the enterer, and if the form of the entry be not given in its calls, nor elder rights control it, the discretion of the surveyor must be exercised in giving the survey a square or oblong figure. If a subsequent entry be made which covers a part of the first, the elder entry may be surveyed without reference to the other, although it may have been surveyed and carried into grant. In such a case, it has been held that the elder entry may be surveyed in an oblong form, at the discretion of the surveyor, although a square figure might not interfere with the junior entry and survey. The surveyor is a public officer, and his mistakes, it is said, are not to prejudice the enterer; but it seems no where to be decided, that these mistakes may be corrected at any future time, after the emanation of the grant, by the aid of a court of chancery.

A court would undoubtedly take cognizance of the right of an enterer, if his entry had never been surveyed, on a caveat being filed to prevent an emanation of a grant for the same land, under a junior entry. And there may be cases in which the grantee, under a junior entry, has been decreed to convey his right to the elder enterer who held the superior equity. Although the mode of making entries under the land law of Virginia, as construed by the courts of Kentucky, is different from the land law of North Carolina, under which titles were acquired in Tennessee, yet no strong reason is perceived why the effect of a survey should be different. In both cases the surveyor is a public officer, whose duties are prescribed by law. Under the Virginia law it has been ruled frequently, that the survey of an entry fixes its limits, which cannot, afterwards, be altered to the prejudice of rights subsequently acquired. In the case of Galt v. Galloway, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 340, the supreme court say, "When an entry is surveyed, its boundaries are designated, and nothing can be more reasonable and just than that these shall limit the claim of the locator. To permit him to vary his lines so as to affect, injuriously, the rights of others, subsequently acquired, would be unjust." Until an entry shall be surveyed, unless its calls prescribe the form, a subsequent enterer cannot tell whether the survey will be executed in a square or oblong; and, consequently, he can acquire no rights which shall control the surveyor in running the elder entry. But if the elder entry has been surveyed, is it not notice to subsequent enterers of the limits of the entry. It is not the duty of every enterer to see that the survey has been accurately made; and if the surveyor, either through mistake or design, should disregard prior entries, and fix the boundaries so as to interfere with a paramount right, is he not bound within a reasonable time, to have the error corrected in any mode authorized by law? As there seems to be no provision in the statute on the subject, I doubt whether, afterwards the survey can be altered, to the prejudice of a junior right, so as to conform more strictly to the calls of the entry. It is believed that no court has decided that this may be done under the Virginia land law; and on this point no important distinction is perceived between the land law of North Carolina, and that of Virginia. Under the former law, the enterer, in many instances, purchased his land of the state at a fixed price, and under the Virginia act, locations were made on account of rights granted for military services. In both cases the right to enter land was given for a valuable consideration. If an error of the surveyor could be corrected at any future period, would it not produce great uncertainty in land titles? Although the legal form has been given to the survey, and it has been carried into grant, yet if it interfere with elder rights under this doctrine, the enterer may claim the right of re-surveying the entry, so as to include the number of acres called for, and avoid any conflict with superior equities. And this, too, in defiance of rights subsequently acquired. This would introduce a degree of uncertainty in land titles, in this state, against which there could be no effectual protection but the statute of limitations. No matter how long the elder entry had been surveyed, patented, and occupied by the claimant; no subsequent enterer or his assignee who was not sheltered by the statute of limitations, would be safe if any part of his land could be covered by a legal construction of the first entry. It may have been surveyed in an oblong, which causes an interference with a paramount claim, when a square figure would avoid this interference. This latter figure, according to this doctrine, may be given to the survey, at any future period to the destruction of junior entries.

This doctrine would seem to be fraught with too much injustice, to bona fide claimants, to be sanctioned; and it is believed that no decision has sustained it. A reasonable diligence, at least, should be imposed upon the elder enterer, to correct the errors of the survey after the grant shall have issued.

The complainant's counsel do not rely so much upon this doctrine as sustaining their right to a decree, as they do on the fraud which was committed by Samuel Williams, in making the survey. He interfered, it is contended, with the elder entries, with the express view of securing to himself the residue of the vacant land, and which ought to have been covered by Mitchell's survey. It is understood, then, that the fraud is the principal ground relied on by the complainants. At the time of the survey Erwin was the owner of Mitchell's entry; so that if a fraud were committed by Williams in making the survey, it was committed against Erwin and not Mitchell. He had long before sold to Erwin all his interest in the entry. In 1794, Erwin conveyed to Mitchell the 401½ acres, about which there is no dispute; but it was not until 1811, that the right growing out of this fraud was assigned. More than eighteen years had elapsed, from the time this alleged fraud was committed before the right of action was assigned to Mitchell. As no reference was made to this right, when the land was re-conveyed to Mitchell, it cannot be considered as appendant to that conveyance. It was an attempt to transfer a distinct and substantial right, and might as well have been invested in a stranger as in Mitchell. There is nothing then in Mitchell having been the first enterer, or the grantee of the 401½ acres, which gives any validity to his claim, under the assignment of 1811, that might not have been claimed under an assignment to any other individual. No injury had been done to the rights of Mitchell in making the survey. He is a volunteer purchaser and, perhaps, a speculator in the right set up. And he was a purchaser with a full knowledge of all the facts. It is impossible to suppose from the nature of the right asserted, that he could have been ignorant of the circumstances under which it originated. Had the bill been filed by Erwin, against whom the alleged fraud was committed, and whose interests were prejudiced by it, there would have been equitable considerations, which, if not inapplicable to the case, as now presented, are at least, far less forcible. We deem it unnecessary to investigate the nature of this right, for the purpose of ascertaining whether it is such an interest as can be transferred, so as to give a right of action to the assignee. There are other lights, in which the merits of the case may be considered. More than thirty years had elapsed from the time this survey was executed, until the filing of this bill. But it is said that the statute of limitations does not begin to run, nor the lapse of time in such a case, until the fraud is discovered. This is, as it regards the operation of the statute, a correct rule of law. At what time was this fraud discovered. Could Erwin, who lived in the neighborhood of the land, at the time it was surveyed, and for many years afterwards, have remained ignorant of it. The facts were before him, and he must have seen them, unless he closed his eyes against them. If he had notice or might have discovered the fraud, by the most ordinary diligence, is he not justly responsible for all the consequences of negligence. He might have traced the surveys of the adjoining tracts, and ascertained the dates of their respective entries, and the corners called for. Under all circumstances the law imposes an ordinary degree of vigilance, for the protection of rights. Can Mitchell set up any greater right, under this judgment. If the equity of the assignee should be considered equal to that of the assignor, about which doubts are entertained, it is clear that it cannot be greater. The assignment cannot be assimilated to a conveyance of land, by a fraudulent holder, to a purchaser without notice, and for a valuable consideration.

For several years past the courts both in England and in this country, have given a more favorable consideration to the statutes of limitations than formerly. The slightest pretext was once considered sufficient to take a case out of the statute; and in many modern decisions, the courts of England have regretted that they were bound to decide, by the force of prior adjudications, in violation of the policy of those statutes. The salutary effect of this policy is seen and acknowledged, and courts now endeavor to promote it. These statutes by withholding the remedy, after a limited period, impose reasonable diligence in the assertion of rights. They promote peace and harmony in society. By closing the door of litigation, they give security and confidence to the occupant, and his labor is cheerfully bestowed in the improvement of his estate. His domestic comforts are enlarged by the reflection, that he will enjoy the fruits of his industry. The principle of law founded upon lapse of time when judiciously applied, has the same salutary effect upon society. It may require a less degree of diligence than is required by the statute of limitations, in general, but the policy is the same. The statute of limitations may be set up in defence, in behalf of a claim founded in fraud, if a knowledge of the facts, which constitute the fraud were possessed by the adverse claimant. In neglecting to prosecute, he is presumed to acquiesce in the fraud; and after the statute has run the law will not aid him. This principle applies with equal, if not greater force to a claim which has lain dormant more than thirty years.

The facts relied on to show the fraud, in the case under consideration, except the fraud charged against Williams in making the chinkapin corner, were known or might have been known to Erwin, in 1792, when the survey was executed. He takes no step to correct the error, or obtain relief from the alleged fraud. If Williams were guilty of fraud he was liable to an action for damages. From the year 1792 until 1811, a period of more than eighteen years, this right of action, or interest in the entry, arising from the alleged fraud of the defendant Williams remained in Erwin. But it seems he did not assert his right in any form; and it was not until the further lapse of nearly fourteen years, after the assignment, that the first step was taken by Mitchell to prosecute this suit. How are these delays to be accounted for? Mitchell it is said, is a resident of North Carolina. But did he not understand the nature of the right which was assigned to him by Erwin. He must have understood it, unless indeed the assignment was made to him without his knowledge. In the case of Townshend v. Townshend, 1 Brown, Ch. 551, the court on a possession of thirty years, by the defendants, presumed that the settlement, under which the complainant claimed was voluntary, and dismissed the bill. And in the case of Andrew v. Wrigley, 4 Brown, Ch. 125, where an executor had sold the testator's term specifically devised, under strong circumstances of fraud, Lord Thurlow refused relief from the lapse of time, although his decision would have been different, if an earlier application had been made. The same principle was recognized in the case of Morse v. Royal, 12 Ves. 373, and also in Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 88. In the case of Bonney v. Ridgard, 1 Cox, Ch. 145, relief was refused from the lapse of time, though from the face of the assignment, fraud was apparent. And in a later case of Blennerhassett v. Day, 2 Ball & B. 104, it was decided, that "where the facts constituting fraud are in the knowledge of the party, and he lies by for twenty-five years, he cannot get relief." This doctrine is illustrated with great ability, by Lord Reddesdale, in Hovenden v. Lord Annesley, 2 Schoales & L. 608. In Peck [Tenn.] 30, an able and learned opinion is given, by the supreme court of this state in the case of Porter's Lessee v. Cocke, in which it is decided that fraud not being an exception in the statute of limitations, a deed, fraudulent against creditors, with possession, will constitute a bar. Where no interest has been paid, and the mortgagee has been in possession of the mortgaged premises for twenty years, and no special circumstances being shown, the mortgagor is barred from the equity of redemption. And also where the mortgagor has remained in possession for the same term, without the payment of interest or on such acknowledgment that the mortgage is still existing, he may rely on the lapse of time, against a bill to foreclose, and the court will presume the money paid. [Hughes v. Edwards] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 489.

In these cases lapse of time is considered as operating by way of evidence, to show payment or satisfaction of the demand. There is no reason why the statute should not run in a case of fraud, after it comes to the knowledge of the party, as in any other case. It is important that the facts which constitute the fraud, should be investigated while they may be within the recollection of witnesses; and while the party implicated may be able to explain the circumstances. For this reason, even in cases of fraud, courts of chancery feel themselves bound by the statute. The spirit and policy of the statute are regarded, the same in chancery as at law. But, in the case under consideration, the fraud charged in the bill is denied by the answers; and Thompson insists that he is an innocent purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice. He purchased the land in dispute, paid the consideration, and received a conveyance about two years before the commencement of this suit. The consideration paid for this land is admitted to be inadequate, but it is alleged it was sold below its value, on account of the interfering claims of Thomas Thompson and one Davis. Sampson Williams, in his answer, denies all knowledge of interfering rights elder than Mitchell's when he made the survey. If the north-west cornor of Thomas Thompson's pre-emption should be established at the chinkapin oak as claimed by him, and Williams had knowledge of the fact; or if he did not in fact make that corner, or know that it was fraudulently made, there would be no sufficient ground to sustain the allegation of fraud. Duffield and Ellis swear that this corner was made in 1787 by Sampson Williams and Thomas Thompson, which is two years after Thompson's pre-emption is stated to have been surveyed. But both of these witnesses have been discredited, at least so far, as to render their statements under oath questionable; and in this particular they are positively contradicted by the oath of Thomas Thompson. Jason Thompson states that in 1789, Sampson Williams was at the red bud and white oak corner, but his credibility is impeached. Several witnesses of great respectability, and who have been long acquainted with the survey of Thompson, believe that the tree named is the north-west corner of Thompson's survey. Buchanan, an experienced surveyor and a man of high respectability, states that he marked Thompson's north-west corner, and that Mitchell's survey could not have been otherwise surveyed than it was, without interfering with the adjacent tracts. That the witness was usually directed by the owner in making surveys, where the calls of the entry were vague. Sampson Williams, it appears, lived six or seven miles from Mitchell's entry when he surveyed it, and was but little acquainted with the lines in the neighborhood, and had been a surveyor but a short time.

In making the survey, Thompson states that the surveyor acted under the direction of Matherall and himself. The cane was thick, so that it was extremely difficult to ascertain distances accurately, and great danger was apprehended from the Indians.

The above facts go very far to rebut the inferences of fraud, which are drawn from the facts of the case. They at least render the fraud charged extremely doubtful. If Buchanan, after tracing the lines and ascertaining the connections of the different entries, at this day, is able to say that Mitchell's survey was accurately and properly run, doubt may well exist whether, under the embarrassing circumstances which existed at the time Williams made the survey, there is sufficient ground to charge him with fraud. But it is contended that the entry of Williams shows he had a knowledge of the interfering claims. That entry calls to begin "at a black oak and mulberry, south corner of Thomas Thompson's pre-emption, running west and north, to include the vacant land between said Thompson's pre-emption, the heirs of Nicholas Gentry's pre-emption, and east and north to include the surplus land within the bounds of said Thompson's pre-emption." The act of 1787 authorizes an entry of the surplus land, as above described. The call for the black oak and mulberry, the south-west corner of Thompson's pre-emption, and the other calls of the entry, do not necessarily show that Williams was acquainted with the boundaries of Gentry's, Barton's and Tapp's claims, which interpose with the survey of Mitchell's entry. Believing that there would be surplus land in Thompson's pre-emption, he wished to cover it by his entry.

Under all the circumstances of the case, it does not appear that the charge of fraud is sustained; but if it were the lapse of time and knowledge of the facts possessed by Erwin would bring the case within the decisions referred to. The defendant, Thompson, is a purchaser without a knowledge of the circumstances which constitute the fraud if it exist; and the right set up by the complainant came into his possession by purchase with a knowledge of the facts. The land claimed by Thompson has been possessed more than twenty years, and valuable improvements have been made on it. Can a court of chancery in such a case give the relief prayed for. The right asserted by the complainant, was stale when he purchased it, and he has, to use a common expression, slept on it. If, under the circumstances, this was a doubtful right, when it was assigned to the complainant, it is much more so now. If the objection of staleness could then have been urged against it, the same objection must now be insuperable. Forty years have nearly elapsed since this survey was executed, and more than thirty years before the complainant's bill was filed. The repose of society seems to require that more diligence should be used in the investigation of controverted rights, than has been shown in this case. It is enough to settle the disputes of the present generation, without looking into the dormant transactions of the past. The bill must be dismissed at the costs of the complainant.

NON-NEGOTIABLE NOTES—RIGHT OF ASSIGNEE TO SUE IN HIS OWN NAME—FORM OF ASSIGNMENT—JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS—CURRENCY ACT.

1. In Pennsylvania the assignee of a note not under seal containing a warrant to confer judgment may sue in his own name.

2. No particular form of assignment is necessary; it is sufficient that the intent to assign appear.

3. In cases under the national currency act [13 Stat. 99], the circuit courts have jurisdiction of all actions brought by or against any national banking association established in the district for which the court is held, without regard to the citizenship of the parties or the amount involved in the case.

In this case judgment had been entered on a note not under seal containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment. The note was made by the defendant to the order of Mitchell and by him assigned to the First National Bank of Butler. The defendant took a rule to set aside the judgment for want of jurisdiction.

[The following is an exact copy of the note and endorsement on which the action in Mitchell v. Walker [Case No. 9,670], in the circuit court of the United States for the Western district, was brought:

A. N. Sutton and W. S. Purviance, for the rule.

Miller, McBride, and C. McCandless, contra.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: Under the Pennsylvania decisions the instrument in suit is a non-negotiable promissory note. Such instruments are not assignable at common law and hence are suable only in the name of the original payee. The state statute of May 28, 1715, provides for the "assignment of bonds, specialties, and notes in writing," and that the assignee thereof may maintain suit in his own name. Under the first section of the act any form expressive of the intent of the assignor to vest the ownership of the instrument in the assignee would effectuate its intent, but the eighth section requires a seal and attestation by two witnesses of "bonds and specialties," while the assignment of "notes in writing" is not restricted by any prescribed formula. The note here was duly assigned so as to enable the First National Bank to bring suit in its own name. Can such suit be maintained in this court, both parties being citizens of Pennsylvania? Under the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], it is clear it could not [both because the legal parties are not citizens of different states, and because the assignor of the note in suit could not maintain it on account of his residence in this district.] [3] But the national currency act seems to have abrogated the conditions of that act so far as they may affect national banks organized under the currency act. That act (section 57) gives to the circuit courts original jurisdiction "of all suits by or against any banking association established in the district for which the court is held under any law providing for national banking associations." This is reënacted by Rev. St. c. 7. The enactment was not necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the circuit courts of suits by and against banking associations, because as separate bodies they might sue and be sued in such courts under the judiciary act when the conditions prescribed by that act existed. That was manifestly not its object. But it is an unconditional grant of jurisdiction of all suits by or against national banks to the circuit court of the district in which such banks are established, and is limited to these courts. Hence the more reasonable hypothesis is that it was intended to enable national banks to sue and be sued in the circuit courts of their several districts alone, irrespective of the conditions as to the amount in controversy and the citizenships of the parties which are imposed upon the right by the judiciary act. So it has been held in several cases where suits were instituted by national banks as indorsees of commercial paper. The note in this case is not negotiable, but although in most of their characteristic qualities the instruments are unlike, and the legal effect of their transfer is in some respect different, yet what reason is there for a discriminating application of the statutory provision, where the right to sue in his own name by an assignee or indorsee is just as full and complete in the one case as in the other. The terms of the statute embrace all suits alike, and their fair import is that of all suits which a national bank may rightfully institute in its own name the circuit court of the district in which it is established may entertain jurisdiction. Motion to set aside denied, and leave given plaintiff to amend by striking out the name of "Alexander Mitchell, for use," [so that the First National Bank shall stand as the legal plaintiff on the record.] [3]

MITCHELL v. WILSON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 92.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May, 1827.

REPLEVIN—NO APPEARANCE—EXCUSE—NEGLECT OF DEFENDANT'S COUNSEL—DISCONTINUANCE.

1. If the defendant in replevin does not appear at the return of the writ, and the plaintiff takes no step to obtain an appearance at that term, the cause is discontinued, and the clerk will not bring it forward upon the docket of the next term, and the court will not reinstate the cause at the subsequent term, although the defendant's attorney make affidavit that he was employed by the defendant to appear for him at the preceding term, and promised and intended so to do, and thought he had done so, but finds his appearance was not entered, and presumes it was because he had forgotten to give the order to the clerk; and although the defendant make oath that, before the sitting of the last court he went to the clerk's office, and informed one of the clerks that he should defend the said suit, and that Mr. Key was his attorney.

2. After the discontinuance of the replevin, the goods are no longer in the custody of the law, and the defendant is not guilty of a contempt in taking possession of them.

pear at the last term (to which term the writ was returnable), and the plaintiff [Thomas L. Mitchell] took no step to obtain an appearance; no continuance was entered or ordered, and the clerk did not bring the cause forward upon the docket of this term, considering it as discontinued; and of that opinion was THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent). It did not appear to be the misprision of the clerk. The court had decided the point in some previous cases.

Mr. Key moved the court to reinstate the cause and to order it to be brought forward upon the docket of the present term, and made affidavit that he was employed by the defendant to appear for him in the suit, at the last term, and promised, and intended to do so, and thought he had done so, but finds that his appearance was not entered; and presumes it arose from his forgetting to give the order to the clerk. The defendant Wilson also made affidavit that before the sitting of the last court, he went to the clerk's office and informed one of the clerks that he should defend the said suit and that Mr. Key was his attorney.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), refused to reinstate the cause.

Mr. Coxe, for plaintiff, moved for an attachment of contempt against the defendant, for having since the last term taken possession of the replevied goods.

But THE COURT refused; being of opinion that when the action of replevin was discontinued, the goods were no longer in the custody of the law.

MITCHELL v. WILSON.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 242.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1827.

DEED—GRANTING CLAUSE—HABENDUM—DEED OF SLAVE—POSSESSION—EVIDENCE OF TITLE—REPLEVIN—POSSESSION TAKEN BY DEFENDANT.

1. Whatever may be the words of grant in a deed, it is the office of the habendum, to limit and confine them, and to ascertain the commencement and duration of the estate created or conveyed by the deed.

2. A deed of bargain and sale was made, (and duly acknowledged and recorded,) by J. W. to his brother T. W., of a negro woman named Bet, and her increase, and a negro boy named Patrick, "from and after the date hereof," "with this reserve, that they are to remain with J. W. my father, who is to hold and have the entire use and benefit of them during his life, and at his decease my said brother Thomas, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, to take, hold and possess them ever after; to have, and to hold, the said negro woman Bet, and her increase, as aforesaid, and negro boy Patrick, (from and ever after the decease of my father, as aforesaid,) unto my said brother Thomas Wilson, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, with general warranty from and after the decease of my father, as aforesaid." T. W. died in the lifetime of the father. Held, that neither T. W. nor the father took any thing by the deed.

3. The possession of a slave for twenty years, is primâ facie evidence of a good title in a plaintiff in replevin, against everybody who does not show a better.

4. If a replevin be discontinued, the defendant is not guilty of a contempt, in taking possession of the goods, they being no longer in the custody of the law.

Replevin for a negro woman named Mahala. This cause, which was discontinued at December term, 1826, for want of the defendant's appearance, was by consent of the parties, at May term, 1827 [Case No. 9,671], reinstated, with a mutual release of errors, and it was agreed that upon a motion for the return of the property, the whole merits of the cause should be decided. The motion to return the property was accordingly made.

Mr. Coxe and Mr. Ashton, for plaintiff in replevin.

Mr. Key, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent). This is an action of replevin, brought on the 15th of May, 1826, by Thomas L. Mitchell, against William Wilson, administrator of Thomas Wilson, for a female slave, named Mahala, about twenty-one years of age. Mahala was the daughter of Bet. On the 20th of July, 1787, Joseph Wilson, son of Lancelot, made a bill of sale of his slave Bet, then about six years old, and three other slaves, to his son Joseph Wilson, Junior, and his heirs and assigns, in consideration of £105 paid by him to, or for his father. This bill of sale was recorded on the 7th of August, 1787, but was never acknowledged. Joseph Wilson, Junior, was then about twenty-seven years old, had a wife and family, and lived in the same house with his father, who delivered the slaves to him, and who was an intemperate man, and in embarrassed circumstances, and for whom his son had paid debts to the amount of £105. The slaves remained in the joint family of the father and son until the father and son moved into separate houses in the same neighborhood, when the slaves, excepting Bet, remained with the son, but were often in the service of the father. Bet lived with the father, and was an idiot, lame, and worthless. On the 31st of December, 1801, Joseph Wilson, Jr., made a bill of sale, under seal, in consideration of £25, to his brother, Thomas Wilson, of Bet, then said to be about twenty-three years of age, "and all her increase, from and after the date hereof, and her son, a negro boy named Patrick, about eighteen months old; with this reserve, that they are to remain with Joseph Wilson, my father, who is to hold and have the entire use and benefit of them during his life, and, at his decease, my said brother, Thomas Wilson, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, to take, hold, and possess them ever after: To have and to hold the said negro woman, Bet, and her increase, as aforesaid, and negro boy, Patrick, (from and after the decease of my father, as aforesaid,) unto my said brother, Thomas Wilson, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns," with general warranty, "from and after the decease of my father, as aforesaid." This bill of sale was, on the day of its date, acknowledged before a justice of the peace in Prince George's county, and enrolled on the 2d of January, 1802. Bet continued in the possession of the father. In the spring of 1805, however, she was found, with her child, Mahala, then from six to nine months old, living in the family of Thomas L. Mitchell, the plaintiff, whose wife was the daughter of the said Joseph Wilson, of Lancelot, and sister of Joseph Wilson, Jr. Mahala continued in the possession of Thomas L. Mitchell, from that time until two or three days before this writ of replevin was issued; when the defendant, William Wilson, son of Thomas, having then recently taken letters of administration in this District, on the estate of Thomas Wilson, who died about the year 1805, probably before the birth of Mahala, and certainly several years before the death of his father, Joseph Wilson, of Lancelot, seized upon Mahala, and claimed her as part of his father's estate; in consequence of which seizure, Thomas L. Mitchell obtained this writ of replevin. On the 1st of February, 1806, Joseph Wilson, of Lancelot, by deed of bargain and sale, duly acknowledged and recorded, conveyed to Thomas L. Mitchell and his wife the slave Mahala, and all her posterity, she then being and remaining in their possession. Bet was always in possession of Wilson, the father, or of Thomas L. Mitchell, from the time of the separation of the families of the said Wilson and his son, Joseph, until the death of Wilson, the father, about fifteen years ago. Neither Bet nor Mahala was ever in the possession of Thomas Wilson, who lived in Ann Arundel county. Wilson, the father, and his son Joseph, lived in Prince George's county, near Bladensburgh. It does not appear how many children were left by Thomas Wilson nor of what age. If he died in 1805, the youngest must be now at least twenty-one years old. This is a motion by the defendant for a return of the property replevied; and it is agreed that the court shall, upon that motion, decide the whole merits of the case, without a jury.

On the part of the defendant it is contended that, by the deed of 1787, from the father to his son Joseph, the legal title of Bet was transferred to the son; and that, by his deed of 1801, it was conveyed to his brother, Thomas Wilson, and that Mahala, whether born before or after the death of Thomas Wilson, became part of his estate, which has never yet been legally distributed or settled. The possession having always been in Mitchell, the burden of proof is upon the defendant to show a better title. It seemed to be admitted by Mr. Wilson, in his testimony, that the possession of Bet always remained in his father until his death. But if the deed of 1787 were bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, that circumstance did not prevent the operation of the deed. The title was transferred to his son. Act Md. 1729, c. 8, § 5, for the relief of creditors against secret sales, does not make void the sale against any person claiming under the vendor; and Supplementary Act 1763, c. 13, applies only to gifts, not to bona fide sales. The fact of its being a bona fide sale, for valuable consideration, depends principally upon the testimony of the witness, the vendee, and the averment in the deed itself. He swears positively and unequivocally, that he paid upwards of £100 of his father's debts, and that such payment was the consideration of the deed. His testimony is corroborated by that of other witnesses, who have spoken of the embarrassed situation and bad management of the father, and, by the fact that the creditors of the father have never pursued this property in the hands of the son. An attempt has been made to discredit the general reputation of the witness for veracity; but, upon the whole, we think his credit is sustained, although there seemed to be a strong bias in favor of the defendant. We take the fact, therefore, to be, that the deed of 1787 was bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, and transferred the legal title in Bet to Joseph Wilson, the son. It is not so clear what was the effect and operation of the deed of 1801, from Joseph, the son, to his brother, Thomas. It purports to be for a valuable consideration, and bona fide, and is duly acknowledged and recorded; but did it pass a present interest to Thomas Wilson? It purports to bargain and sell the negro woman, Bet, "and all her increase, from and after the date hereof," and the negro boy, Patrick, "with the reserve, that they are to remain with Joseph Wilson, my father, who is to hold and have the entire use and benefit of them during his life, and at his decease my said brother, Thomas Wilson, his heirs," &c., "to take, hold, and possess them ever after: To have and to hold the said negro Bet and her increase, as aforesaid, and negro boy, Patrick, (from and ever after the decease of my father, as aforesaid,) unto my said brother, Thomas, his heirs," &c. Whatever may be the words of grant in a deed, it is the office of the habendum to limit and confine them, and to ascertain the commencement and duration of the estate created, or conveyed by the deed. Here, in the very terms of the grant, there is a reserve of the possession and entire use and benefit of them to the father, during his life; and it was uncertain whether Thomas would survive him, and, in fact, he did not. And it is further said, in the terms of the grant, that "at his," the father's, "decease," the brother was "to take, hold, and possess them." If he could not take, hold, or possess them, nor have any use or benefit of them during his father's life, and he died before his father, did any thing vest in him by the deed? But the habendum is decisive. He was to have and to hold after the decease of his father. The estate was not to commence until the death of his father. He died before his father, and therefore the estate never did commence. Nothing ever passed from Joseph Wilson, Jr., by that deed. It created no estate in his father, because his father was not a party, and because there are no words of grant, or habendum, to the father. Thomas cannot be considered as holding the legal estate as trustee for the father, because the legal estate never vested in Thomas. It remained in Joseph Wilson, Jr.; and the contest must now be between his legal title and the possession of Mitchell, for the father having no legal title, could convey none, by his deed of 1806, to Mitchell, after the death of Thomas. The question remaining is, whether the long possession of Mitchell is a bar to the legal title of Joseph Wilson, Jr. Upon that point we should like to hear an argument.

At the adjourned October session of May term, 1827, the point was argued by Mr. Key, for the defendant, and by Mr. Jones and Mr. Ashton, for the plaintiff.

Mr. Key contended that the possession of a chattel does not give title. The statute of limitations is only a bar to the remedy, not to the right. It does not destroy the cause of action. If it destroyed the right, it would not be necessary to plead it. It might be given in evidence on the general issue. 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] Append. 466; Quantock v. England, 5 Burrows, 2628; Hodsden v. Harridge, 2 Saund. 63; Ballantyne, 188, 267. The only cases opposed to this principle are the Virginia cases, in which it has been decided that five years' possession of a negro gives good title against all the world. But they depend upon the peculiar statutes of frauds of Virginia, in respect to the transfer of negroes. They are a peculiar kind of estate, being neither chattels nor lands. They were formerly considered as real estate, subject to dower and curtesy; but in 1792 the legislature of Virginia enacted that they should be no longer real estate. The cases do not say that possession of any other chattel gives title. Newby v. Blakey, 3 Hen. & M. 57; Elam v. Bass' Ex'r, 4 Munf. 301; Garth v. Barksdale, 5 Munf. 101; Gay v. Moseley, 2 Munf. 545; St. Va. 1792, c. 103, § 49; Old Rev. Code, p. 192; 1705, c. 3. In 1725, they were exempted from execution for debt; and, in 1758, they could be only transferred by deed, or will, like lands. Old Va. Justice, 318; Taylor v. Horde, 1 Burrows, 119. Entry is necessary to maintain ejectment. Runn. Eject. 99. By the Maryland acts of February, 1777, c. 15, § 7, and 1780, c. 5, § 14, and Appendix 1782, c. 55, § 5, exceptions to the act of limitations may be given in evidence, on a general replication to the plea of limitations. In England, twenty years' possession of land gives good title, because the statute takes away the right of entry after that time, not merely the legal remedy; so that the statute of limitations need not be pleaded in ejectment. This case is to be decided according to the law of Maryland; and in Smith v. Williamson, 1 Har. & J. 147, it was decided that, in replevin, the statute of limitations must be pleaded; because it only goes to the remedy, not to the right.

Mr. Coxe and Mr. Ashton, contrâ. The court has decided that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant has a documentary title. The question, then, is, whether twenty years' possession of the slave is a good title for a plaintiff in replevin? The object of the statute of limitations is, to protect the possession under a title supposed to be good. It was founded upon great principles, and upon like principles has been expounded by the courts; and they have applied its principles to analogous cases, not embraced in the letter of the act. Thus, set-off may be objected to on the trial, if barred by the statute of limitations. Ballantyne, 94. When a party can plead it, he must; but when he cannot plead it he may give it in evidence. In trespass, as well as in ejectment, twenty years' possession gives good title. The same reason applies to chattels; and the same reason which applies to negroes, is applicable to any other chattel. Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 371; Brent v. Chapman, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 358. The supreme court did not rely on the statute of frauds of Virginia, but on the statute of limitations. This is a motion for a return of the property, with an agreement that the court may decide upon the whole merits of the case. If, then, the plaintiff could, in any way, plead the statute of limitations, it will be considered by the court as pleaded. While Mitchell had the possession, he had a good title, of which he could not be deprived by any legal process, or remedy; and there is no legal right without a remedy. Under the agreement in this suit, the plaintiff cannot be prevented from availing himself of the protection of the statute of limitations.

Mr. Key, in reply. If the act of limitations went to the right, it would be unconstitutional, because it would impair the obligation of the contract. The statute does not say, that the owner shall not retake his property, after the lapse of the three years which bars his action. A man who loses his goods, or whose slave runs away, may lawfully take peaceable possession of them wherever he can find them, and then holds them in all his original right.

THE COURT took time to consider until this term, and on the 2d of January, 1828, CRANCH, Chief Judge, delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of replevin for a female slave named Mahala. Upon a motion for a return of the slave to the defendant, this court, at the last term, (May, 1827,) was of opinion that the legal title was not in the defendant, and it appeared that the slave never was in the possession of the defendant's intestate, nor of the defendant, except for two or three days before the writ of replevin was issued, when the defendant, claiming title as administrator of Thomas Wilson, took possession of her. There was no evidence of title in the plaintiff, except that he had been in possession of her, claiming title, ever since she was six or nine months old, when she and her mother Bet, were seen by the witness in the possession of the plaintiff; and the probability was, that Mahala was born in his possession, his wife being the daughter of Joseph Wilson, of Lancelot, the former owner of Bet, who was a crippled and worthless idiot.

The court, on examination of the evidence upon the motion for a return of the slave, was of opinion that the documentary legal title of Bet, at the time of the birth of Mahala, was in Joseph Wilson, Junior, the son of Joseph Wilson, of Lancelot, and requested an argument upon the question whether the long possession of the plaintiff, Thomas L. Mitchell, either gave, or was evidence of, such a title as would enable the plaintiff to maintain replevin against the present defendant, William Wilson, the administrator of Thomas. That argument was heard at the adjourned session of May term, in October. It was contended for the plaintiff, that such a possession as would have been a good bar to an action of detinue constituted a valid title against everybody. On the other hand, it was said, for the defendant, that there was no limitation against a man's taking possession of his goods and chattels. That the statute of limitations was a bar only to the action, not to the right. That it was not like the possession of lands, for in that case, the statute takes away the right of entry, without which the action of ejectment cannot be maintained. That in ejectment, it is not necessary to plead the statute, because the plaintiff must show a right of entry, as a part of his title to recover; but in mere personal actions, it is necessary to plead it, because it is only a bar to the remedy. That in Maryland it has been decided, that in replevin, the statute must be specially pleaded. Smith v. Williamson, 1 Har. & J. 147. That the cases in Virginia, in which it has been decided, that five years' possession of a slave gives a substantive title to a plaintiff in detinue, were cases under the peculiar statute of frauds of that state, where slaves were, for a long time, considered as real estate.

In reply to which, it was said, for the plaintiff, that the supreme court of the United States, in the case of McIver v. Ragan, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 29, said, that "the statute of limitations is intended, not for the punishment of those who neglect to assert their rights by suit, but for the protection of those, who have remained in possession, under color of a title believed to be good." That such is emphatically the case, in the present instance. That the principles of the statute have been found to be so beneficial, that courts, both of law and equity, have extended them to analogous cases, not embraced by the letter of the statute; and although courts of law have decided, that it must be pleaded where it can be pleaded, yet, where, it cannot be pleaded, they have permitted it to be given in evidence, as in the case of a set-off barred by the statute, &c. That the principle of the rule, that twenty years' possession of lands gives a substantive title upon which a plaintiff in ejectment may recover, applies equally to the case of personal chattels; and has been so applied by the court of appeals, in Virginia, in the case of Newby v. Blakey, 3 Hen. & M. 57, and by the supreme court of the United States in the cases of Brent v. Chapman, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 358, and Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 371. That although there were cases of slaves, yet the principle, the reason, and the law, upon which those cases were decided, are equally applicable to chattels of any other description. These cases were not decided upon the statute of frauds, but upon the statute of limitations, as clearly appears from a remark of the supreme court, in its opinion in the case of Shelby v. Guy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 374, where the judge observes, that "the dates and facts do not bring the case within the operation of the statute of frauds of 1785." These cases and principles seem to me to be decisive of the present question.

It is not necessary, in this case, to decide that the possession of the plaintiff gives him a good title against all the world. It is sufficient in this action, and against this defendant, who has no title or right of possession, that it is prima facie evidence of title, and is sufficient against everybody who does not show a better. It having been agreed, that the court should, upon this motion for a return of the property, decide the whole merits of the cause, I am of opinion that the defendant ought to confess judgment for one cent damages and costs.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

5. A. and B. being engaged, in 1839, in the manufacture of cutlery, borrowed of C. a sum of money, payable in four years, with interest semi-annually, and on the same day gave him a deed of all the machinery in their manufactory, with all the tools and implements of every kind thereunto belonging and appertaining, together with all the tools and machinery for the use of the said manufactory, which they might at any time purchase for four years from that date, and also all the stock, which they might manufacture or purchase during the said four years. On the 26th of August, 1842, A. and B. filed their petition to be declared bankrupts, and subsequently were so declared, and an assignee was appointed. On July 16th, 1842, for breach of the conditions of the mortgage, the agent of C. took possession of the property, including the machinery, &c. which were in the possession of the factory when the mortgage was made, and also machinery, tools, and stock in trade, which had been made and purchased after the execution of the mortgage. On petition of the assignee in bankruptcy of A. and B. for an order of court authorizing him to take possession, it was held that the mortgage and the possession taken on July 16th, 1842, constituted such a lien in favor of the mortgagee to the property acquired subsequent to the time of executing the mortgage, as is protected under the provision in the second section of the bankrupt act [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)].

This was a petition of Mitchell, assignee of George and David N. Ropes, praying for an order of court, authorizing him to take possession of certain property in the possession of Neal Dow, one of the respondents, and alleged to belong to the estate of the bankrupts. The facts were these; in 1839, the Messrs. Ropes were engaged in the manufacture of cutlery in Westbrook, and on the first of December of that year, borrowed of Jeremiah Winslow, of Havre, in the kingdom of France, $15,000, payable in four years, with interest semi-annually, and on the same day made and executed a deed, conveying to Winslow "all and singular all the machinery of every kind, which is in and belonging to our cutlery manufactory at Saccarappa, in Westbrook, with all the tools and implements of every kind thereunto belonging and appertaining, together with all the tools and machinery for the use of said manufactory, which we may at any time purchase for four years from this date, and also all the stock which we may manufacture or purchase during said four years. To have and to hold, &c." (with covenants of title and warranty, &c.) "Provided, nevertheless, that if the Ropeses paid to Winslow, within four years, the principal sum borrowed, with interest, semi-annually, then the deed, with certain notes of hand given to secure the same, to be void. Provided, also, until default of or in the payment of said sums of money, or of some part thereof, or of the interest therefor, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the preceding proviso, it shall and may be lawful to and for the said George and David N. Ropes, their heirs and assigns, quietly and peaceably, to hold and enjoy, all and singular the premises hereby granted, and to secure and take the rents and profits therefor, to and for their own use and benefit, without denial or interruption of or by the said Jeremiah, his heirs or assigns, or any other person or persons claiming by or under him." This deed was duly recorded in the records of the town of Westbrook, pursuant to the provision of the law of the state. On the 12th of July, 1842, the bankrupts stopped payment, and on the 26th of August, filed their petition to take the benefit of the bankrupt law, and were duly declared bankrupts by a decree of the court, on the 25th of October, 1842. On the 16th of July, 1842, the interest on the notes being in arrear and unpaid, Nathan Winslow, as the agent of Jeremiah, who was then absent from the country, took possession of the property, and on the —— of October, before the filing of the petition of the assignee of the Ropeses, sold the property to Neal Dow. The bankrupts continued their business up to the 12th of July last, when they stopped payment, and in the property on hand on the 16th of July, when the agent of Winslow took possession for breach of the conditions of the mortgage, were included the machinery and tools, which were in the factory, and in possession of the bankrupts, when the deed was executed, and also, other machinery, tools, and stock in trade, which had been made and purchased after the execution of the deed.

The case came on to be heard in the district court, on a petition and answer, and the district judge ordered the following questions, arising on the facts stated in the petition and answer, to be adjourned into the circuit court for a final decision. [Case unreported.]

1. Whether the deed of mortgage executed by George and David N. Ropes, on the first of December, 1839, together with possession, taken July 16th, 1842, by N. Winslow as agent of Jeremiah Winslow, created such a lien in favor of the mortgagee, on the machinery, tools and stock in trade, acquired by the mortgagors, either by purchase or otherwise, and put into the factory subsequent to the time of executing the mortgage deed, as is protected under the proviso in the second section of the bankrupt law.

2. Whether, admitting, that as between the mortgagor and mortgagee, the stipulations of the contract might be a good and sufficient authority for the mortgagee to take possession of, and apply the subsequently acquired machinery, tools and stock, to the payment of the debt, such stipulations in a deed of mortgage do protect such property from other creditors of the mortgagor.

The case was argued at this term by Mr. Preble, for the assignee, and by Mr. Fox, for the respondent.

Mr. Preble, after citing and relying upon Goodenow v. Dunn, decided by the supreme court of Maine, and not then reported (since reported in 21 Me. 86), and upon Winslow v. Merchants' Ins. Co., decided by the supreme court of Massachusetts, and not then reported (since reported in 4 Metc. 306), but of both of which manuscript copies were produced, referred to the cases of Sumner v. Hamlet, 12 Pick. 76, and Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497, and Leslie v. Guthrie, 1 Bing. N. C. 697; and contended, that they were all distinguishable from the present case. In Sumner v. Hamlet, the goods were in esse, and were selected and set apart, as security for the creditor. In Macomber v. Parker, the lessees, the creditors, were in possession of the brickyard, where the bricks were made, and held by them as security for advances made to their debtor, who was employed to make and sell the bricks upon certain terms, and to account for the proceeds to the creditors. In Leslie v. Guthrie, the assignment was of the freight for a then contemplated voyage of the ship, and was in the course of being earned. But it was clear, that the freight of a ship could not be permanently and indefinitely separated from the ship itself. Robinson v. Macdonnell, 5 Maule & S. 228. The present case is different from all these cases. Here the mortgage is not only of property now in esse, but of future property, which should come into the factory for four years, and the present and future stock purchased for the factory, within the same period. Yet the mortgagors were to hold and enjoy all the mortgaged premises, and to take the rents and profits thereof, present and future, for their own use and benefit, until there should be a breach of the condition. This gave the mortgagors a complete power and dominion over the whole mortgaged property, and is inconsistent with the assumed rights of the mortgagee, and cannot, in point of law, be valid. How can the mortgagee have a right to the manufactured stock, when the mortgagors have full right to sell it, from time to time, for their own use? Even if stipulations of this sort were valid between the parties, they could not be binding as to creditors, and certainly not in bankruptcy against the assignee. It would be against the policy of the bankrupt act to give effect to such transactions. The mortgage may be good as to the machinery and stock, existing at the time of its execution, but not as to future stock or future machinery.

Mr. Fox, for respondent, argued, that the assignment was valid throughout.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Two questions are presented for the consideration of the court. (1). Whether the present mortgage created a valid lien, in favor of the mortgagee, upon the machinery, tools, and stock in trade, acquired by the mortgagors, and put into the factory after the execution of the mortgage, within the true intent and meaning of the proviso in the second section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9. (2). Whether, admitting the stipulations of the mortgage might, as against the mortgagor, be a good and sufficient authority to the mortgagee to take possession of, and apply the subsequently acquired machinery, tools, and stock, to the payment of the debt due to him, the mortgage is good, so as to protect the property against the claims of the other creditors of the bankrupts.

The proviso of the bankrupt act, above alluded to, is in the following words: "And provided, also, that nothing in this act contained, shall be construed to annul, destroy or impair any lawful rights of married women, or any liens, mortgages or other securities on property, real or personal, which may be valid by the laws of the states respectively, and which are not inconsistent with the provisions of the second and fifth sections of this act." I am not aware, that the present mortgage has been contended to be inconsistent with any thing contained in any section of the act. It was executed long before the bankrupt act was in existence; and there is no pretence to say, that it is designedly fraudulent, or that the mortgagee has waived any of his rights under the mortgage.

The present is a mortgage of personal property, and has been duly recorded according to the act of 1839, c. 390, of the state of Maine, (which is substantially in the same language as the act of Massachusetts on the same subject,) and no objection arises on this head. The question, therefore, in effect, resolves itself into this, whether the mortgage, quoad future machinery, tools, and stock in trade, is a valid mortgage or lien, by the laws of the state of Maine, as between the parties themselves, and also as between the mortgagee and the creditors of the mortgagors. If it be valid, either at law or in equity, (it is wholly immaterial which,) then the decision must be in favor of the respondent; otherwise, it must be in favor of the assignee.

It is material here to state, that the present is not a controversy between a first and second mortgagee, as to property acquired and in esse after the execution of the first mortgage, and before the time of the execution of the second mortgage, both the mortgagees being bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration, and the second mortgagee having no notice of the prior encumbrance. That might, at law, present a very different question, and is precisely that which is understood to have been decided in the case of Winslow v. Merchants' Ins. Co. in Massachusetts. Neither is this a controversy between a mortgagee of a thing in building (as, for example, a ship in building) before it is completed, and a subsequent attaching creditor, or a subsequent purchaser, after it is completed, which seems to have been the important point in Goodenow v. Dunn, and Bonsey v. Amee, 8 Pick. 236, and which might, also, at law, admit of very different considerations. The present is a question between the assignee of a bankrupt, acting for the benefit of all the creditors, and the mortgagee, claiming title under his mortgage; and it arises upon a petition, partaking of the character of a summary proceeding in equity, and not in a suit at the common law, or governed by its principles. Now, it is most material to bear in mind, under this aspect of the case, that it is a well-established doctrine, that (except in cases of fraud) assignees in bankruptcy take only such rights and interests as the bankrupt himself had, and could himself claim and assert at the time of his bankruptcy; and, consequently, they are affected with all the equities, which would affect the bankrupt himself, if he were asserting those rights and interests. This was expressly laid down by Lord Hardwicke in Brown v. Heathcote, 1 Atk. 160, 162, where he said: "The ground, that the court go upon, is this, that assignees of bankrupts, though they are trustees for the creditors, yet stand in the place of the bankrupt, and they can take in no better manner than he could. Therefore, assignments of choses in action for a valuable consideration, have been held good against such assignees." The same doctrine was recognised by his lordship, in Jewson v. Moulson, 2 Atk. 417, 420. Sir William Grant (M. R.), in Mitford v. Mitford, 9 Ves. 87, 100, said:

"I have always understood the assignments from the commissioners, like any other assignment by operation of law, passed his (the bankrupt's) rights, precisely in the same plight and condition as he possessed them. Even where a complete title vests in them, and there is no notice of any equity affecting it, they take subject to whatever equity the bankrupt was liable to. This shows, that they are not considered purchasers for a valuable consideration, in the proper sense of the words. Indeed, a distinction has been constantly taken between them and a particular assignee for a valuable consideration; and the former are placed in the same class as voluntary assignees and personal representatives." The same doctrine was held by Lord Thurlow in Worrall v. Marlar, reported in Mr. Coxe's note to 1 P. Wms. 459. It has ever since been firmly adhered to (see Parker v. Muggridge [Case No. 10,743]; 1 Cooke, Bankr. Law, 4th Ed., 1799, pp. 267–270, c. 7, § 2; 1 Deac. Bankr., Ed. 1827, pp. 320, 321, c. 10, § 3; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1229, 1411), and has been fully recognized at law, in cases of bankruptcy (Lord Chief Justice Willes, in Scott v. Surman, Willes, 402, and the reporter's note; Gladstone v. Hadwen, 1 Maule & S. 517, 526; Com. Dig. "Bankrupt," D, 19; Leslie v. Guthrie, 1 Bing. N. C. 697; Carvalho v. Burn, 4 Barn. & Adol. 382, 393; Meyer v. Sharpe, 5 Taunt. 74; Simond v. Hibbert, 1 Russ. & M. 719).

It may be admitted to be true, what, indeed, seems to be the result of the authorities cited at the bar, as well as of others equally entitled to respect, that to make a grant or assignment valid at law, the thing, which is the subject of it, must have an existence, actual or potential, at the time of such grant or assignment; and that a mere possibility is not assignable (Wood & Foster's Case, 1 Leon. 42; Grantham v. Hawley, Hob. 132; Robinson v. Macdonnell, 5 Maule & S. 228; Com. Dig. "Assignment," c. 3; Id. "Grant," D); although, perhaps, the doctrine may require some qualifications under special circumstances, as for example, in cases of the assignment of freight in the course of earning at the time of the assignment, as is shown in the case of Leslie v. Guthrie, 1 Bing. N. C. 697, 708, 709. But this admission will carry us but a very little way in the present case. For here the true question is, not whether the assignment of the property to be acquired in futuro, is good at law, but whether it is good in equity; for if it be, then, independently of any fraud (which is not pretended), as the assignee can take only what the bankrupt had a title to, subject to all equities, it follows, as a matter of course, that the petitioner (the assignee) has no claim, on which he can found himself for relief under his petition. So that the question is, in reality, narrowed down to the mere consideration of this, whether the present mortgage as to the future machinery, tools, and stock in trade, to be put into the factory (for there is no controversy as to those in esse at the time of the assignment), is valid or not against the mortgagor.

Upon the best consideration, which I am able to give the subject, I think it is good and valid. Courts of equity do not, like courts of law, confine themselves to the giving of effect to assignments of rights and interests, which are absolutely fixed and in esse. On the contrary, they support assignments, not only of choses in action, but of contingent interests and expectancies, and also of things, which have no present actual or potential existence, but rest in mere possibility only. In respect to the latter, it is true, that the assignment can have no positive operation to transfer, in presenti, property in things not in esse; but it operates by way of present contract, to take effect and attach to the things assigned, when and as soon as they come in esse; and it may be enforced as such a contract in rem, in equity. Lord Hardwicke, in Wright v. Wright, 1 Ves. Sr. 409, 411, expressly recognised this doctrine; and said, that an assignment of a contingent interest or possibility of an inheritance was equally allowable with an assignment of a possibility of a personal thing or chattel real. And he added: "An assignment always operates by way of agreement or contract, amounting in the consideration of this court, to this, that one agrees with another to transfer, and make good that right or interest, which is made good here by way of agreement." In the very case, then before him, he admitted, that the assignor had no immediate claim or demand, but a mere possibility in the property assigned, and that it was well assigned by the word "claim," which well described it, in presenti and in futuro. He also relied on the case of Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wms. 182, which (he said) was an agreement on marriage to settle all such lands as came to the party by descent or otherwise from his father; and it was carried into effect by the court, notwithstanding an expectancy of an heir at law is less than a possibility;[2] and Hobson v. Trevor, Id. 191, was fully to the same effect. In Carleton v. Leighton, 3 Mer. 667, Lord Eldon is said to have held, that the expectancy of an heir, presumptive or apparent, was not an interest or possibility, nor was capable of being made the subject of assignment or contract. But there is some reason to doubt the accuracy of the language as to assignment or contract; for he is reported immediately to have added, that the cases cited

[2] The case of Beckley v. Newland, 2 P. Wms. 182, was not exactly as stated by Lord Hardwicke. But it was an agreement between two survivors, who had married two sisters, to divide equally between them whatever should be left to them by the father of their wives. But the principle was the same. The case of Hobson v. Trevor, Id. 191, was that probably in Lord Hardwicke's mind. See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1040b, and note.

(referring to the cases of Beckley v. Newland, and Hobson v. Trevor,) were cases of covenant to settle or assign property, which should fall to the covenantor; where the interest, which passed by the covenant, was not an interest in the land, but a right under the contract. This is strictly true, but still the contract was obligatory and sufficient to enforce a specific performance thereof. In the case of Carleton v. Leighton, the sole question was, whether the mere expectancy of an heir, who became bankrupt, passed by the assignment of the commissioners. Lord Eldon held, that it did not; for it was not an interest or even a possibility in the land. It seems clear, that the language of Lord Eldon ought to receive some modification from other language used by him on other occasions. Thus, in Lord Dursley v. Fitzhardinge, 6 Ves. 260, 261, he expressly admitted, that an heir or the next of kin might enter into contracts with respect to their expectations and possibilities, the evidence upon which they might perpetuate; for the law would frame an interest in respect of the contract. Again, In re The Warre, 8 Price, 269, note, in reference to the doctrine of Lord Ellenborough in Robinson v. Macdonnell, 5 Maule & S. 228, Lord Eldon said, that he should find it extremely difficult to say, that the freight of a future voyage might not become the subject of an equitable agreement, as well as a first intended non-existing voyage, if the effect of the assignment were not to separate the freight and earnings forever from the ship itself, but only to separate it for the temporary purpose of securing a debt, and operating only upon that separation of title, till that debt should be paid. Again, in Curtis v. Auber, 1 Jac. & W. 526, 532, where an assignment was made of the present and future earnings of a ship, Lord Eldon supported it, and said: "In one case I think it was held, that although you might assign the wool then growing on the backs of the sheep, you could not assign the future fleeces. See Grantham v. Hawley, Hob. 132. See 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. (2d Ed.) 549. But still it was a good equitable assignment, and rendered the future earnings liable to equity."

The same doctrine was maintained by Mr. Vice-Chancellor Shadwell in Douglas v. Russell, 4 Sim. 524; and his decree was afterwards affirmed by the Lord Chancellor (1 Mylne & K. 488), upon appeal, as to an assignment of freight earned and to be earned on an outward and homeward voyage, then about to be undertaken. And it was acted upon and supported in a like assignment of freight to be earned on a particular voyage in the case of Leslie v. Guthrie, 1 Bing. N. Cas. 697, 708, 709, where the whole subject was argued at large, in a suit of the assignees under a bankruptcy.

But the latest case, and certainly one of the most important and satisfactory in its reasoning, as well as its conclusion, is that of Langton v. Horton, 1 Hare, 549, before Mr. Vice Chancellor Wigram. There, a deed of assignment by way of mortgage was made of a whale ship and her tackle and appurtenances, and all oil and head matter and other cargo, which might be caught and brought home in the ship on and from her then present voyage; and the question arose between an execution creditor of the assignor, and the assignee, whether the assignment was good as to the future cargo obtained in the voyage after the assignment. The learned vice chancellor decided, that it was. Upon that occasion he said; "Is it true, then, that a subject to be acquired after the date of a contract, cannot, in equity, be claimed by a purchaser for value under that contract? It is impossible to doubt, for some purposes at least, that, by contract, an interest in a thing not in existence at the time of the contract may, in equity, become the property of a purchaser for value. The course to be taken by such purchaser to perfect his title, I do not now advert to; but cases recognising the general proposition are of common occurrence. A tenant, for example, contracts that particular things, which shall be on the property when the term of his occupation expires, shall be the property of the lessor at a certain price, or at a price to be determined in a certain manner. This, in fact, is a contract to sell property not then belonging to the vendor, and a court of equity will enforce such contracts, where they are founded on valuable consideration, and justice requires, that the contract should be specifically performed. The same doctrine is applied in important cases of contracts relating to mines, where the lessee has agreed to leave engines and machinery not annexed to the freehold which shall be on the property at the expiration of the lease, to be paid for at a valuation. The contract applies, in terms, to implements, which shall be there at the time specified; and here neither construction nor decision has confined it to those articles, which were on the property at the time the lease was granted. But it is not necessary, that I should refer to such cases as these; for Lord Eldon, in the case of The Warre, 8 Price, 269, note, and in Curtis v. Auber, 1 Jac. & W. 526, has decided all, that is necessary to dispose of the present argument. Admitting that those cases are not specifically, and in terms, like the principal case, they are not of the less authority for the present purpose; for they remove the difficulty, which has been raised in argument, and decide that non-existing property may be the subject of valid assignment. I will suppose the case of the owner of a ship, which is going out in ballast, proposing to borrow of another party a sum of £5,000 to pay the crew and furnish an outfit; and agreeing that, in consideration of the loan, the homeward cargo should be consigned to the party advancing the money. It cannot reasonably be denied, in the face of the authorities I have just referred to, that a court of equity, upon a contract so framed, would hold, that the party advancing the money was, as against the owner, entitled to claim the homeward cargo. And if a party may contract for the consignment of a homeward cargo, I cannot see, why he may not contract with the owner of a ship engaged in the South Sea fisheries, that the fruit of the voyage, the whales taken, or the oil obtained, shall be his security for the amount of his advances. I cannot, without going in opposition to many authorities, which have been cited, throw any doubt upon the point, that Birnie, the contracting party, would be bound by the assignment to the plaintiffs."

Now, it seems to me, that this reasoning is exceedingly cogent and striking; and it stands upon grounds entirely satisfactory and conclusive upon the whole subject. What, then, is there to distinguish the case before the court from this reasoning? I confess myself unable to perceive any. It seems to me a clear result of all the authorities, that wherever the parties, by their contract, intended to create a positive lien or charge, either upon real or upon personal property, whether then owned by the assignor or contractor, or not, or if personal property, whether it is then in esse or not, it attaches in equity as a lien or charge upon the particular property, as soon as the assignor or contractor acquires a title thereto, against the latter, and all persons asserting a claim thereto, under him, either voluntarily, or with notice, or in bankruptcy. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1231, and the authorities there cited; Cross, Liens, pp. 187, 188, 191, 192, c. 12; Prebble v. Boghurst, 1 Swanst. 309; Needham v. Smith, 4 Russ. 318; Randall v. Willis, 5 Ves. 262, 274, 275; Simond v. Hibbert, 1 Russ. & M. 719.

But, then, it is argued, that here the possession of the property was during the whole period of four years to remain in the mortgagors, and they were to take the rents and profits thereof for their own benefit. Nay, that they had the power to dispose of the stock in trade and the other property by sale, and thus they acquired and retained the full dominion over the same during that period which is inconsistent with the nature and objects of such a mortgage, and against the policy of the law. In short, that as to creditors, it operates a virtual constructive fraud upon their rights. As to the possession and use of the property, and taking the rents and profits thereof, there is nothing in that part of the objection, which will invalidate the mortgage. Nothing is more common in mortgages of real estate than an agreement, that the mortgagor shall take the rents and profits until breach of the condition thereof. And as to chattels, there is as little question, that, where a mortgage or a lien is created on chattels by contract, it is entirely competent for the parties to agree that the possession and use thereof shall be retained by the mortgagor until the breach of the condition, or by the debtor until the creditor shall assert his rights against it as a security for the debt. Even in cases of bankruptcy, a qualified possession of the property by the debtor will not oust the creditor of his rights, as leaving the property in the order and disposition of the debtor under the statute of 21 Jac. I. c. 19, §§ 10, 11, or the statute of 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 72. That was expressly held in Crowfoot v. London Dock Co., 2 Cromp. & M. 637, where the possession of the debtor was not exclusive, but was mixed up with that of the creditor, the property (steam engines and other apparatus,) being employed by the debtor in operations, conducted by the company, the possession of the debtor being in pursuance of an arrangement, under which he had a right of user for the purposes of the contract. The case of Hawthorn v. Newcastle & N. S. Ry. Co., reported in Cross, Liens, Append. 408, carried the doctrine a step farther; and decided, that a covenant in a contract to build a bridge for the company, made by the builders, that the company should have a lien upon the machines, implements, and materials of the builders, in or upon the land or grounds, where the bridge was to be built, as a security for the completion of the works, was good in favor of the company, in the case of the bankruptcy of the builders, as a lien, in the nature of a shifting lien, upon such materials, as happened for the time being to lie upon the actual line of the railway, or upon the adjacent land in possession of the company. Under the statute of Maine for the recording of mortgages of personal property (Act 1839, c. 390), where the mortgage is recorded, it is valid, without possession of the property mortgaged being delivered to the mortgagee; and a stipulation, that it shall remain in possession of the mortgagor until breach of the condition, has been upheld as within the true spirit and intendment of the act. Forbes v. Parker, 16 Pick. 462; Rev. St. Me. (Ed. 1841) p. 558, c. 125, § 32; Abbott v. Goodwin, 20 Me. 408.

Then, as to the supposed right of sale, of the stock in trade and other mortgaged property. Admitting it to exist, and to be fairly deducible from the language of the instrument (which certainly is not a strained construction of its apparent object and intent), that right, conceded by the mortgagee, is not inconsistent with the validity of the mortgage; for still the proceeds, or other equivalent property may be substituted for it, and if the parties consent to such an arrangement, there seems no legal objection to it. The case of Abbott v. Goodwin, 20 Me. 408, manifestly proceeds upon this ground. In that case, it was expressly decided, that if the mortgagor should, under a stipulation in the mortgage, giving him that authority, sell the goods mortgaged, and with the proceeds should purchase other goods, the latter goods would represent the first, and be substituted for them; and would be, equally with the first, subject to the lien of the mortgagee. Now, in effect, precisely what the court thus decided to be the result of law, is provided for by the agreement of the parties in the present mortgage. Macomber v. Parker, 14 Pick. 497, affirms the same doctrine; and both proceed upon principles analogous to those held in Hawthorn v. Newcastle & N. S. Ry. Co., already cited.

This objection, then, falls to the ground, and leaves the case stripped of every other consideration, except the argument, that the mortgage is a virtual fraud upon the other creditors, and is against the policy of the law, and, therefore, cannot be protected against the claims of the other creditors, however it might stand valid as between the parties themselves. And this, in effect, is the remaining point arising upon the second question propounded at the hearing. Now, if the considerations already suggested are sound, they seem to dispose of this part of the controversy. There is no pretense of any fraud, either actual or constructive, intended by the mortgagor and mortgagee. So far as their intentions are concerned, they were upright, and honest, and correct. The mortgage was recorded, and there is no ground to suggest any intentional concealment. The possession of the property by the mortgagors, and the power to use it and dispose of it, was not only consistent with the deed, but was positively avowed and provided for by it. The creditors, therefore, were not allured by any false colors or false credit held out to mislead them. Now, I am not aware of any policy of the law, or of any principle of law, which makes any conveyance of this sort invalid as to creditors, if they have full notice, or may have full notice of it by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Indeed, the law makes the registration of the deed constructive notice of its contents to all persons; since it was required to be registered, and was registered in conformity to law. What ground is there, then, to assert, that the conveyance was against the policy of the law? The phrase itself is somewhat indefinite, and in its actual application here, is difficult to be grasped and comprehended. I profess, that I am not able to perceive any; and, as far as authorities go, they point the other way. Besides; the assignees here stand before the court affected with all the equities of the original debtors; and the creditors here assert their rights through and under the assignee and not by any paramount title.

In every view, therefore, which I am able to take of the case, it seems to me, that the claim of the assignee is not maintainable, and that his petition ought to be dismissed.

Under all the circumstances, as the questions are of a somewhat novel character, I incline to think, that the respondents ought not to be allowed their costs; and that the costs of the assignee should be a charge on the bankrupts' estate. But this is a matter for the consideration of the district judge.

I shall, accordingly, direct a certificate to be sent to the district court, answering both the questions adjourned into this court in the affirmative.

Case No. 9,674.

In re MITTELDORFER et al.

[Chase, 276; [1] 3 N. B. R. 39 (Quarto, 9).]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—DECISION OF ASSIGNEE—REVERSAL—NOTICE—CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATE REPRESENTED BY BANKRUPT.

1. Assignees in bankruptcy of a firm sent back to the register for additional proof of a certain claim of M., proved by the oath of a member of the firm as trustee of the claimant. On application to the district judge by the counsel of the trustee it was ordered that dividend on the claim be paid.

2. The assignee had no notice of the application, and petitioned the circuit court to review the case, and to reverse the said order.

3. The district court has power upon petition of the contesting creditor, to reverse the decision of an assignee rejecting his claim, but the mode of proceeding must be regular, and the assignee should have opportunity to answer and contest the claim; order of the district court reversed.

4. Semble: That a member of a bankrupt firm can not represent claims against the estate.

Unto the Honorable Salmon P. Chase, Chief Justice of the United States of America, &c.: The petition of Andrew Rutherglen, of the city of Richmond, one of the assignees of Mitteldorfer & Co., bankrupts, respectfully showeth:

That on this date (March 30, 1869), his honor Judge Underwood, was pleased to issue an order in the following terms:

"United States District Court, District of Virginia, Clerk's Office, Alexandria, Virginia, March 30, 1869. In the matter of Moses Mitteldorfer, Bankrupt. In Bankruptcy. On February 20, 1869, an order having been made in this cause directing the payment by Messrs. Rutherglen and Kent, the assignees, to Moses Mitteldorfer, the trustee to Mrs. Marcus, the wife of Jonas Marcus, of the dividend proven by her said trustee to which she is entitled, in common with the other creditors, unless within thirty days the said assignees should show cause why such dividend should not be paid, and no steps having been taken by said assignees in this wise, that order is now made final, and the assignees are hereby directed to pay the said dividend at once to the said trustee, Moses Mitteldorfer. Jno. C. Underwood, Dist. Judge.

"A true copy. Teste. Ed. J. Underwood, Dist. Clerk."

That your petitioner feels himself aggrieved by said order, and, therefore, prays that it be reviewed by your honor, and that upon this review your honor may be pleased to reverse the same, or to alter, vary, or do otherwise in the premises as the circumstances set forth in the following statement of facts and reasons may warrant:

Statement of facts: 1. Of this date (September 24, 1867), the firm of Mitteldorfer & Co. (the partners whereof being Moses Mitteldorfer, Charles Mitteldorfer, and Jonas Marcus) was in a state of hopeless insolvency, and notwithstanding their perfect knowledge of this fact, they determined to "struggle on" in business, evidently for the purpose of getting certain properties of Moses Mitteldorfer's disposed of in fraud of the firm's creditors, and said properties were so sold and to the persons as follows: First, September 26, 1867, a lot and house to Julius Straus, a son-in-law of the said Moses Mitteldorfer, for two thousand six hundred dollars. Second, November 25, 1867, a lot and house to David Mitteldorfer, a son-in-law of Moses, for two thousand dollars. Third, lots and houses on Navy Hill and Third street, to L. Straus, for twelve thousand five hundred dollars. 2. Of this date (January 13, 1868), after further attempts for a period of four months by Mitteldorfer & Co. to effect a compromise with their creditors, Messrs. Lathrop, Ludington & Co. of New York, to whom the bankrupts were indebted in the sum of ten thousand four hundred and seventy-three dollars and five cents, filed a petition in the bankruptcy court of the city of Richmond, praying the court to adjudicate the said Mitteldorfer & Co. bankrupts. 3. Of this date (January 23, 1868), the said firm was adjudged bankrupts by his honor, Judge Underwood, accordingly. 4. Of this date (January 25, 1868), the case was referred to Mr. Register Bond for further action. 5. Of this date (February 26, 1868), the usual warrant to the marshal as messenger, was issued by Mr. Register Bond; said warrant was returned executed on March 2, 1868. 6. Of this date (March 20, 1868), Andrew Rutherglen and Horace L. Kent, were appointed assignees in said bankruptcy, and on the following day notified their acceptance of said appointment. 7. Of this date (March 24, 1868), the assignees having obtained possession of the premises, stock in trade, and books and papers of the bankrupts in so far as surrendered by them, your petitioner made up an inventory of said books and papers accordingly. 8. That in the course of his investigations of said books and papers, your petitioner found that several books, indispensable to the assignees in their examination of the bankrupts' affairs, had been concealed or destroyed, and although repeatedly applied for, and threats made of enforcing the 44th section of the act against the bankrupts, no surrender of said books has been made. 9. That your petitioner of this date (September 28, 1868), proceeded to examine the proofs and claims of creditors filed with the register, and in consequence of absence of Ledger A (one of the concealed or destroyed books), your petitioner had to pass over claims or pretended claims, chiefly among Moses Mitteldorfer's own family and personal friends, amounting to twenty-five thousand two hundred and seventy-five dollars and one cent, until the production of said Ledger A. 10. That among these claims (in suspense) is the one made by the bankrupt, Moses Mitteldorfer, as trustee for his daughter, the wife of his partner, Jonas Marcus, for six thousand eight hundred and forty dollars. This claim your petitioner is satisfied is fraudulent, and will on the production of Ledger A prove it to be so. 11. That of this date (February 18, 1869), an order in the following terms was served upon your petitioner (but no copy of such order was ever served on his colleague, Mr. H. L. Kent): "The within named assignees are hereby ordered to comply with the prayer of the within petitioner, or show cause for their failure to do so, forthwith, before the district judge. (Signed) Jno. C. Underwood, District Judge. Feb. 18, 1869." No copy of the "within petition" was ever exhibited to, or served either upon your petitioner or his colleague, Mr. Kent. It is said to have been at the instance of Mrs. Rosalie Marcus, but for some cause it has never been filed in the clerk's office. 12. That your petitioner at once obtempered said order by appearing before the district judge, and averred and plead that the claim was one that could not be sustained until the production of the concealed or destroyed Ledger A; that his honor fixed the following Saturday, February 20, 1869, to hear parties thereon. 13. That on February 20, 1869, as fixed, your petitioner attended the district judge in chambers, along with counsel for the claimant; parties having been fully heard, his honor indicated an opinion that he would issue an order requiring the assignees, within thirty days thereafter, to adduce their evidence why the claim should not be sustained. 14. That of this date (February 20, 1869), being the last day of term, and his honor much pressed with business of the court, requested your petitioner to draw such an order as would meet his views of the case; this your petitioner had done, but on presenting it for his honor's signature, he said he would require to make an alteration which, when made, he would leave with Mr. Hunter in the clerk's office. The same evening your petitioner called at the clerk's office for the order, but found it had not been left; he proceeded to the Spotswood and saw the judge, who stated that he had not been able to overtake a number of little things, this order among them, but in a few days it would be sent from Alexandria. Your petitioner repeatedly applied at the clerk's office for the said order, but the invariable reply was, that none such had ever been received. On March 22, petitioner saw the judge, personally, at Alexandria on the subject, who promised that it would be transmitted to Richmond by the middle of that week. 15. That your petitioner

(of this date April 9, 1869) received with no little surprise the imperative order, by Judge Underwood, dated March 30, 1869, declaring the order of February 26, 1869, final, an order which your petitioner had troubled himself so much to obtain, and which neither of the assignees in this bankruptcy ever saw or had served upon them, and which required them forthwith to pay to the bankrupt, Moses Mitteldorfer, as trustee for his daughter, Mrs. Marcus, the sum of one thousand three hundred and sixty-eight dollars, of the money of Mitteldorfer & Co., creditors, without any proof in support of the claim except the oath of the said Moses Mitteldorfer, bankrupt, who was incompetent to make such proof of debt even had proof of it existed. 16. From the preceding statement of facts and following reasons, your petitioner respectfully submits that the order by Judge Underwood, of March 30, 1869, be recalled, and the assignees allowed a proof of their averments in the premises.

Reasons: 1. Because the petitioner and Mr. H. L. Kent are assignees of Mitteldorfer & Co. as a company, and not of Moses Mitteldorfer in his individual capacity. 2. Because the funds in the possession of the said assignees are the moneys recovered from the assets of Mitteldorfer & Co., and can only be applied in payment of the company's debts. 3. Because the pretended claim of the bankrupt Moses Mitteldorfer, as trustee for Mrs. Rosalie Marcus is fraudulent, and his oath, which has been sustained by the district court as the ground for issuing the order of March 30, 1869, is not only no proof of debt of itself, but it is illegal and incompetent in respect of the said Moses Mitteldorfer's bankruptcy. 4. Because, were the claim of Mrs. Marcus a just and valid claim against Mitteldorfer & Co., the proof in her favor could only be made by the assignees in bankruptcy of Moses Mitteldorfer, unless the court had made a new appointment of trustee to Mrs. Rosalie Marcus, which in this case it has not done. 5. Because in the absence of Ledger A, fraudulently concealed or destroyed by the bankrupts, Moses Mitteldorfer, Charles Mitteldorfer, and Jonas Marcus, the individual partners thereof, have rendered themselves amenable to the penal section of the bankrupt act, which provides that to "part with, conceal, or destroy, alter, mutilate, or falsify, or cause to be concealed, destroyed, altered, mutilated, or falsified, any book, deed, document, or writing relating thereto, or remove or cause to be removed, the same or any part thereof out of the district, or otherwise dispose of any part thereof, with intent to prevent it from coming into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy, or to hinder, impede, or delay either of them in recovering or receiving the same, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment with or without hard labor, for a term not exceeding three years." 6. Because the bankrupts have removed, concealed, or destroyed Ledger A, for the purpose of hindering, impeding, and delaying your petitioner in his investigations into the affairs of their said firm, and more especially as regards the pretended Marcus transaction. Your petitioner avers, and will on the production of the said Ledger A, prove, that for their purpose of carrying through this fraudulent claim the books of the firm of Mitteldorfer & Co. have been falsified. 7. Because the proceedings in the district court in this case are irregular and inapt, in respect that the order of February 18, 1869, was issued on the mere petition (it is said) of Mrs. Rosalie Marcus, coupled with certain ex parte statements of her counsel, but who has proved no debt against Mitteldorfer & Co., and said petition is unknown in the proceedings. 8. Because, that on such an application being made, your petitioner avers that the duty of the judge was to order service of said petition upon the assignees, requiring them within a specified time to file answers thereto, but instead of order and form, a series of irregularities go on, ending in the issuing of orders which are not obeyed, because they never reach the parties on whom by order of the court they ought to be served. Assignees are bound to protect creditors at all hazards, and in the present case they would have been derelict in their duty, had they not resisted the payment to an undischarged bankrupt of this sum of one thousand three hundred and sixty-eight dollars of the creditor's money without one tittle of evidence that the firm was in any way responsible for such claim beyond the oath of Moses Mitteldorfer, wholly unsupported by any evidence whatever, and which oath clearly proves his own malfeasance as trustee to his daughter, and for which he is alone responsible.

In respect to the foregoing facts and reasons, your petitioner respectfully craves that your honor will be pleased to recall the entire proceedings, and of new, order the petition of Mrs. Rosalie Marcus to be served upon the assignees of Mitteldorfer & Co., and ordain them within a reasonable time to file their answers thereto, remitting the case to Mr. Register Bond to take the evidence of parties and report, or do otherwise in the premises as to your honor may seem proper. In respect whereof, Andrew Rutherglen, for Petitioner.

Mr. Rutherglen, for petitioner.
L. H. Chandler, for respondent.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. It appears in this case, that Moses Mitteldorfer, one of the bankrupts, filed with the register a claim in behalf of Rosalie Marcus for six thousand eight hundred and forty dollars. This claim proved by the oath of Mitteldorfer, was referred together with the others against the estate of the bankrupts by Register Bond, to the assignees, Andrew Rutherglen and Horace L. Kent. Upon examination, some of the claims were allowed, and others rejected. The claim of Mitteldorfer, in behalf of Mrs. Marcus, was among the rejected claims, and with the others, was returned to the register for further proof if any could be made.

In this state of facts, a petition was presented to the district judge, for an order directing the assignees to pay a dividend on this claim to Mitteldorfer as trustee, equivalent to that paid on the admitted claims. This dividend was 20 per cent. on six thousand eight hundred and forty dollars, and amounted to one thousand three hundred and sixty-eight dollars. The first order to this effect was made on February 20, 1869. This order not having been complied with by the assignees, a peremptory order was made on March 30, 1869, reciting the original order, and requiring a compliance with it.

The object of this petition is to obtain a revision and reversal of these orders. The act, in the 22nd and 23rd sections, requires that the proof of claims be made before the register, or commissioner, and transmitted to the assignee, who is to examine the same and compare it with books and accounts of the bankrupts, and register the names of the creditors who have proved their claims.

This seems to have been done in the bankruptcy under consideration. The claim of Mitteldorfer as trustee for Mrs. Marcus, was sworn to before the register, and transmitted to the assignees, and upon examination rejected by them and returned to the register to be held for further proof. No further proof in this claim seems to have been offered, but Mitteldorfer presented his petition directly to the district judge for the orders referred to.

It does not appear that due notice of this petition was given to the assignees, or that opportunity was given them to contest the claim.

It is not doubted that the district court has power, upon the petition of any creditor whose debt has been rejected, to revise the decision of the assignee rejecting. But the mode of proceeding in the present case seems to me to have been irregular. The assignees should have an opportunity to answer the petition and contest the claim, and if upon consideration the court had determined that it should be allowed, an order should have been made requiring the assignees to place it upon the list of admitted claims, and to pay dividend accordingly. It does not appear to me clear that one of the bankrupts should be allowed to represent any claim against the estate; but I leave this matter for the present to the consideration of the district judge.

The order complained of will be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings.

Case No. 9,675.

In re MITTELDORFER.

Ex parte ROWLAND.

[Chase, 288; [1] 3 N. B. R. 1 (Quarto, 1).]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. 1869.

BANKRUPTCY — EXPENSES IN SECURING ADJUDICATION—REIMBURSEMENT—REASONABLENESS OF CLAIM.

1. When one or more creditors petition for and procure an adjudication of bankruptcy against a debtor, they may on motion be reimbursed their reasonable expenses.

[Approved in Re New York Mail S. S. Co., Case No. 10,208. Cited in Re Mead, Id. 9,364. Criticised in Russell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 445.]

2. The fund is the fruit of the diligence of such creditors, and it would be manifestly unjust to compel them to bear alone the expenses incurred for the benefit of all.

3. Whenever a claim for reasonable expenses so incurred is made and admitted by the assignee, an order should be made by the district judge for its payment.

This was a petition under the second section of the bankrupt act, for the review of an order of the district judge allowing a claim for expenses incurred by the petitioning creditor, in procuring the adjudication of bankruptcy in this case. These parties, Moses and Charles Mitteldorfer, were adjudicated bankrupts upon the petition of Messrs. Lathrop, Ludington & Co. of New York, creditors, and assignees were duly chosen and qualified and took possession of the assets. S. S. Rowland, styling himself attorney, and purporting to act for and at the instance of a majority of the creditors, submitted a bill of expenses and disbursements made on their behalf. The items were as follows:

Deposit fee	$ 50 00
Keeper's fee in charge of store to February 1	70 00
Marshal's fee taking inventory	185 00
Insurance on stock goods	40 00
Expenses and services in attending trial and adjudication of bankruptcy	220 00
Attending meeting of creditors, and representing majority in number and amount in electing assignees.	150 00
Trial and examination of bankrupts during three weeks	490 00
Paid E. Y. Cannon, extra counsel	250 00
	$1,455 00

Mr. Rowland swore before Register Bond, that the said disbursements and expenses had been necessarily and actually incurred and paid by him in the said proceedings in bankruptcy. Register Bond endorsed his opinion on the bill that it should be paid before any general distribution of the assets, and the district judge approved and allowed the same by order of the court. The assignees refused to pay the said bill, whereupon the district judge made an order stating that it "appeared to the satisfaction of the court that the costs and disbursements incurred in the proceedings in this matter have been duly taxed before the register in bankruptcy and certified to this court, and that an order allowing the same has been duly entered and served upon one of the assignees, and it further appearing, by the affidavit of S. S. Rowland, that the said assignee disregards the said order and denies the authority of the court in respect to the same," and directing the assignees in bankruptcy "forthwith upon the service of the order to draw their warrant or check upon the funds of said estate in their hands, for the sum of fourteen hundred and fifty-five dollars, negotiable and payable to the order of Lathrop, Ludington & Co.," and deliver the same to H. G. Bond, register. The assignees thereupon petitioned the circuit court averring that the said orders were erroneous, and asking that the same may be reviewed and reversed for the reasons: (1) Because there has never been a taxation of the costs in the said cause. Such a taxation was demanded by one of your petitioners in behalf of himself and his co-assignee, and it was refused by the register, H. G. Bond, Esq. (2) Because what is pretended to be a taxation of costs, is nothing more than the account of the said S. S. Rowland, endorsed with the written opinion of the register in bankruptcy that it ought to be paid before any general distribution of the fund. (3) Because the said account is unsupported by any vouchers. (4) Because no opportunity was allowed to your petitioners to contest the items of said claim, it having been presented to the register in bankruptcy and irregularly endorsed by him, was ordered by the district court to be paid without having been referred to your petitioners for examination. (5) Because the said account is upon its face extortionate and unjust, the major part of said claim being for services as counsel, that is to say the sum of eleven hundred and ten dollars, of which eight hundred and sixty dollars are for the legal services rendered by the said Rowland, the remaining two hundred and fifty being for the services of E. Y. Cannon, Esq., a regular practicing attorney in the said court. (6) Because the said Rowland, while he pretends to be an attorney, is in truth and in fact as your petitioners are informed and believe a regular employee in the house of Lathrop, Ludington & Co., at a regular annual salary. He is certainly not a regular practicing attorney in this city, and has never paid the license tax required by the state of Virginia and city of Richmond to be paid by all practicing attorneys. (7) Because the services of one regular practicing attorney were quite sufficient for all the purposes of the case, and the fee said to have been paid by said Rowland to E. Y. Cannon, Esq., was ample remuneration for the necessary legal services. (8) Because the money pretended to have been paid by the said Rowland, was in truth and in fact paid by his employers, and this "bill of costs" is but another attempt upon the part of the said Rowland to secure for his employers an undue share in the proceeds of the bankrupt's effects. (9) Because the said Rowland being regularly in the employ of said Lathrop, Ludington & Co., was required by them as their employee to do what he now pretends to charge for as counsel, and if other creditors agreed to unite with his employers in the proceeding and requested the said Rowland to act for them, it is the duty of such creditors to contribute their rateable proportion out of their private funds, to pay him; they certainly have no right to require that other creditors, who neither employed Mr. Rowland nor desired his services, should be required to contribute to pay him (or his employers) anything, much less the unnecessary, extravagant, and extortionate claim for legal services said to have been rendered by him at the request of a majority of the creditors. So far as the proper charge for the services of Mr. Cannon, who was regarded as the counsel in this case, and other proper items in the account have been paid by Messrs. Lathrop, Ludington & Co., there of course will be no objection to refunding them, when proper vouchers are produced by them; but it would be monstrous that one fourteenth of the whole assets should be absorbed by this "bill of expenses," and thus increase the dividend of Lathrop, Ludington & Co., and diminish that of every other creditor in the cause.

Thomas P. August, for petitioner.

L. H. Chandler and H. G. Bond, for respondent.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This is a petition for a revision of the allowance by the register in bankruptcy, and confirmed by the district court, allowing a certain compensation as counsel to S. S. Rowland, for services in procuring the adjudication of the bankruptcy. The claim of Rowland, who styles himself attorney, was presented to Register Bond, purporting to be an account of expenses and disbursements in behalf, and at the instance of a majority of the creditors. It amounted to one thousand four hundred and fifty five dollars, including a counsel fee of two hundred and fifty dollars, paid to E. Y. Cannon, Esq. The account was sworn to by Rowland, and received the endorsement of the register to the effect that he should be paid before any general distribution of the funds, and was afterwards, on May 5, allowed by the district court. Afterwards, on October 28, 1868, the district court made an order, reciting, among other things, that it appeared to the satisfaction of the court that the costs and disbursements incurred in the proceedings had been duly taxed before the register in bankruptcy, and certified to this court, and that the order allowing the same had been duly entered, and served upon one of the assignees, and that it further appeared by the affidavit of S. S. Rowland, that the assignee disregarded the order, and denied the authority of the court in respect to it; and thereupon the court ordered the assignee forthwith to pay the sum by warrant, or check upon the funds of the estate for the sum of one thousand four hundred and fifty dollars, negotiable and payable to the order of Lathrop, Ludington & Co., and deliver the same to Register Bond, if sufficient funds belonging to the estate of the bankrupts were in the hands of the assignee.

The petitioners claim that the orders were erroneous, and ask that they be reversed. They insist that there has been no taxation of costs in this case, that what has been called a taxation of costs is nothing but the account of Rowland, with the opinion of Register Bond endorsed upon it that it should be paid before any general distribution of the funds; that the account is unsupported by any vouchers; and that it had not been sent to them for their examination and report; and that no opportunity to contest the items of the claim had been afforded to the petitioners; that the account itself is exorbitant and unjust, a great part of the claim, that is to say, one thousand one hundred and ten dollars being for services as counsel; of which eight hundred and sixty dollars are for legal services rendered by Rowland, the remaining two hundred and fifty dollars for the services of E. Y. Cannon, Esq., attorney, Richmond; that Rowland was not an attorney, but an employee of Lathrop, Ludington & Co. at a regular annual salary; that the money pretended to be paid by Rowland was in fact paid by his employers; and that the bill of costs is but an attempt on their part to secure an undue share in the proceeds of the bankrupt's effects.

There can be no doubt where one or more creditors petition for, and procure an adjudication of bankruptcy against a debtor, they may on motion be reimbursed for their reasonable expenses. The fund is the fruit of the diligence of such creditors, and it would be manifestly unjust to compel them to bear alone the expenses incurred for the benefit of all. Such was the opinion of Judge Benedict, in Re Schwab [Case No. 12,498]. In his opinion the judge cites the opinions of other district judges to the same effect.

It is clear, therefore, that all reasonable expenses incurred by Lathrop, Ludington & Co., as the petitioning creditors in this case, should be allowed to them, and it will be proper when their claim is made and admitted, that an order should be made to this effect by the district judge. The assignees, however, complain that the allowance made is excessive, and I am inclined to think, with reason; certainly an opportunity must be afforded them to contest the items of the claim.

I shall, therefore, reverse the orders made in the district court, and the case will be referred back to that court with instructions to allow the petitioning creditors to file a claim for the expenses incurred by them, and to allow such sum as shall appear just and reasonable in the circumstances, having due regard to the interests of the other creditors. In re Williams [Case No. 17,704], per Judge Bryan; In re Jaffray [Id. 7,170], per Judge Lowell.

[NOTE. The case was heard at the same term of the court upon petition of the assignees for review of order of district court ordering the assignees to pay certain money over to Moses Mitteldorfer, trustee. Case No. 9,674.]

Case No. 9,676.

MITTLEBURGER v. STANTON.

[3 West. Law Month. 246.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. 1860.

INJUNCTION — PRELIMINARY — ANSWER FILED DENYING EQUITY OF BILL—ENGLISH RULE—EXCEPTIONS.

1. A preliminary injunction, staying proceedings in an action at law, or staying the collection by execution, of a judgment recovered at law, will be dissolved, upon the coming in of an answer denying the whole facts alleged as constituting the equity of the bill.

2. Such is the English rule, and it seems to extend to all cases. But it seems that in this country an exception may be allowed, where the dissolution of the injunction may subject the party obtaining it to irreparable damages, or in certain cases where the party enjoined has not the requisite responsibility to meet the damages that may be occasioned by his being allowed to proceed.

[This was a bill in equity by William Mittleburger against Erastus H. Stanton.]

Hovey & Prentiss, for complainant.
Adams & Canfield, for defendant.

WILLSON, District Judge. This is a motion to dissolve a preliminary injunction, heretofore granted to stay proceedings at law. The bill sets forth, among other things, that, on the 1st day of July, 1857, the complainant purchased of the defendant one-eighth of a co-partnership interest in the Hammondsville Mining Company, for a consideration of thirty-five hundred dollars; that he paid, at the time of purchase, fifteen hundred dollars in cash, and executed and delivered his two several promissory notes for the residue, each bearing date June 1, 1857; one for $1,106.98, payable in four months, and the other, payable in ten months, for $1,058.98. That the first of said notes was sued and a judgment obtained upon it on the law side of this court; that a suit has also been commenced by the defendant, in the same court, for the recovery of the amount appearing to be due upon the other of said notes, which suit is now pending. It is averred in the bill, that the complainant was induced to make this purchase by the false and fraudulent representations of the defendant, and that he was thereby deceived and became greatly defrauded in various particulars, which are specifically set forth in the bill.

The complainant seeks, by this proceeding, to have the contract of the purchase set aside and annulled by reason of the alleged fraud; to obtain a decree for the restoration of the $1,500, paid as aforesaid; and to have the judgment upon the first note declared inoperative, and the second note cancelled and delivered up to him. The defendant has filed his answer, duly verified by his oath, denying all the equities of the bill; and also denying the specific allegations of fraud which it contains. He now comes and files this motion for a dissolution of the preliminary injunction. It is rule of practice well settled by the court of chancery in England, that when a preliminary injunction has been granted to stay proceedings at law, and an answer is filed denying all the equities of the bill, the injunction will ordinarily be dissolved, on the motion of the defendant, as a matter of course. Nor is there any distinction between the injunction staying the execution and staying trial. In the former case, the chancellor requires a full discovery before he will decide that the proceedings shall not be further staid; in the latter, a full answer is equally necessary; and there is no distinction as to the rules for ascertaining whether the answer is or is not complete. Those rules, securing a full discovery, are just as applicable to the one case as to the other, and are universal in their application. In Earnshaw v. Thornhill, 18 Ves. 485, Lord Eldon said, that "among the numerous cases that had occurred of injunctions extended to stay trials, he did not recollect, either in the books or in practice, a single instance of an application to dissolve an injunction, so far as it restrains the trial, separating that from an application to dissolve it generally." And so in this case, if the injunction is dissolved at all, the order must extend, as well to the case where the respondent has obtained judgment, as to the suit now pending, in which no trial has been had.

In the absence of specific rules prescribed by the supreme court of the United States, or by the circuit court itself, this court, in all matters of practice, is governed by the established usages of the English court of chancery. It is well settled, in England, that if a plea to the whole bill be allowed, the claimant may move for a dissolution of the injunction; because a plea, allowed, is to be considered as having the effect of a full answer. The defendant is not compelled to wait until he has proved his plea; he is entitled to a dissolution of the injunction as soon as the chancellor has decided that the plea, if true, is a good defence to the action. Hence, the English courts, by parity of reasoning, have held, that if the respondent sets up his defence by answer instead of by plea, he is equally entitled to a dissolution of the injunction, upon the court being satisfied that the matter set up in the answer, if true, would constitute a good defence. In all the English authorities, there can be found only a single case that contravenes this doctrine. That is the case of Allen v. Crobcroft, in Barnad. Ch. 373. That book, says the reporter, in the case of Zouch v. Woolston, 2 Burrows, 1142, Lord Mansfield absolutely forbids citing, for the reason that it would mislead those who were put upon reading it.

In Poor v. Carleton [Case No. 11,272], Mr. Justice Story admits, that in cases of special injunctions, if the whole merits are satisfactorily denied by the answer, the injunction is ordinarily dissolved. But he says there are exceptions to the doctrine; and that these exceptions are fairly resolvable into the principle of irreparable mischief; such as cases of asserted waste, or of asserted mismanagement of partnership concerns, of asserted violations of copy-rights, or patent rights. But he concedes that the doctrine obtains in England as laid down by the lord chancellor in Clapham v. White, 8 Ves. 36, where it is said, that if the answer denies all the circumstances upon which the equity is founded, the universal practice, (as to the purpose of dissolving the injunction,) is, to give full credit to the answer; and that is carried so far, that, with few exceptions, though five hundred affidavits were filed, not only by the complainant but by many witnesses, not one could be read as to this purpose. No irreparable mischief can result from dissolving the injunction in this case. The bill contains no averment of the insolvency of the defendant, nor is it apparent that the plaintiff will be remediless in case the prayer of his bill is granted on the final hearing.

It is, therefore ordered that the preliminary injunction heretofore granted in this case be dissolved.

NOTE. The principle of this case seems equally applicable to a preliminary injunction order, granted under the Code of Civil Procedure.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Aug. 29, 1859.

PATENTS—LATER INVENTOR—MORE DURABLE PRODUCT—DELAY—NOTICE OF CLAIM.

[1. Priority of invention entitling the inventor to a patent is not affected by the fact that a later inventor first perfected machines for manufacturing the patented product.]

[2. The fact that a subsequent equivalent invention makes a more durable product will not affect the question of priority.]

[3. An inventor is not prejudiced by a delay in applying for a patent where he is diligently experimenting as to other forms of the same invention, and machinery to perfect it, especially as against one having notice of his claim.]

Appeal from the decision of the commissioner of patents, refusing to grant a patent to [Garry J.] Mix, for his invention, of an improvement in the construction of iron spoons, and awarding priority of invention to R. B. Perkins.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The application by appellant for a patent is dated February 15, 1858, and filed February 22. He states his claim: "First. The method substantially as therein described of making the handles of iron spoons. Second. Forming a tongue D, upon the bowl blank, and corresponding recess or inlet D, upon the handle or vice versa, substantially as and for the purpose therein set forth." The first clause of this specification was afterwards stricken out by an amendment. He states particularly various modes by which to unite the bowl to the handle, and amongst them the one for which he claims the patent in this case. This, I think, is substantially the same with the description of the invention for which a patent was granted to Perkins, bearing date October 27, 1857, the peculiar features of which the examiner states to be "consisting of beveling the V or other shaped tongue, and turning over the lips of the recess which is formed to receive said tongue, the closing of the joint being effected by a rivet, struck by a drop and die, and finished by turning." The report further states that "this interference has been asked for by Mix to enable him to prove invention in making spoons in the manner set forth, and upon which invention he believes he has suffered from infringement at the hands of Perkins." He proceeds to state what he conceives to be the testimony. He says: "According to the testimony, E. I. Bull, machinist for Mix, made dies for a spoon having a V shaped tongue sometime during the last half of May, 1857, using as a pattern a spoon made by Marcy, another witness, in December, 1856. A cavity in the end of the handle received a tongue formed on the bowl of the spoon, the two being secured by riveting and soldering. But few spoons were made by these dies, the manufacture of them being abandoned, for others having no tongue, nor corresponding cavity. These latter were found to be defective, and the original plan was again resorted to for supplying the market. Also, according to the testimony, Perkins directed his machinist H. W. Cook, about the last of March or first of April, 1857 (subsequently proven to be April 8) to prepare dies for making similar spoons. The dies were finished about May 1st, and spoons were immediately made from them to the extent of several hundred gross. The dies made by Cook were different from those above mentioned. They provided for the ordinary V tongue and corresponding cavity, but at the same time beveled the edge of the tongue to admit of the closing over of the edges of the recess or cavity in the handles. In the manufacture of the spoons a drop and die were found necessary to effect this closing over in connection with the riveting. This difference between the dies and manufacture is testified to by Marcy, one of the witnesses on the part of Mix. Three peculiar features are secured to Perkins in his patent above referred to. From all the above it is inferred that Perkins was the first to make spoons in the peculiar manner described in his patent; and so far is now as before fully entitled to its use and benefit. In so far also as the application of Mix describes and claims the features peculiar to Perkins' patent it is rejected without prejudice to any remaining matter of novelty which may be contained therein." His report was adopted and confirmed and priority of invention adjudged to Perkins by the commissioner, and the application of Mix, so far as it conflicts with the patent of Perkins, rejected.

To this decision six reasons of appeal were filed by the appellant. They are thought specially to cover all the grounds of objection raised by said report, and will be substantially considered, and therefore are not particularly stated. In the commissioner's reply to the reasons an allusion is made to the application of Mix dated Oct. 27th, 1857, in which case it is said with respect to the V shaped joint in itself that a decision on that occasion was acquiesced in by Mix, who conceded that these were well known metallurgic processes, and a claim to them was withdrawn, &c. He says: "It is all important to remember the distinction between the invention of Mix and Perkins. In Mix's application the edges of the joint both of the bowl and the handle were square, being fastened together by a rivet, some solder and the stroke of a die-press. The corresponding edges of the joint in Perkins' invention were beveled, or undercut, so as to make a dovetailed joint, the tongue of the one part being inserted in a corresponding groove in the other. In Mix's patent there is this defect, that a strain applied to bowl and handle simultaneously would easily separate them by loosening both solder and rivet, but in Perkins' the addition of the dovetail joint enables it to bear such a strain without injury, &c."

In this state of the case, all the papers were duly laid before me, and after due notice of the time and place of hearing being given to the parties, arguments in writing by their respective attorneys were filed, and the case submitted. The first question is as to the proof of the invention on the part of Mix, the appellant. He relies principally on three witnesses, John J. Marcy, E. Y. Bull, and William Mix. Marcy was the machinist. He says that he had been in the employ of Mix, for three years; that the first iron spoon ever made, to his knowledge, with the handle made of iron wire was made by witness in the first part of December, 1856; that he made it by the direction of said Garry I. Mix; that the spoon as made by him in December, 1856, was made as follows: One end of the handle, viz. the one taken hold of by the hand, was swaged into its form by a drop and die and the other, viz. the one attached to the bowl was formed by forging and filing and by other tools. At the end was a cavity in the handle of the spoon fitted to receive a tongue formed on the bowl of the spoon, which dovetailed under the iron of the handle of the spoon. The bowl of the spoon was like the ordinary spoon, the tongue came from the back part of the bowl and ran up about half an inch into the handle, and fitted into it and was riveted on, and then soldered. One end of the spoon, he says, to which he refers, was made by a drop and die, and one end by hand. The witness says, that he made a die for forming the handle of spoons like the one he had described sometime in the month of May, 1857. He thinks about the middle of the month, he commenced it, and Mr. Bull finished the work. The dies which he made at that time left a cavity to receive the tongue of the bowl of the spoon, and also made two rivets from the wire, leaving them solid, forming a part of the handle. Witness also states that he made a die in March, 1857, in all other respects resembling the spoon described by him except with no handle to receive the tongue, and no tongue upon the bowl.

William Mix, in his deposition, states in substance the same facts, in describing the spoon made in the early part of December, 1856. Bull, the other witness, testifies that the iron spoon was made by Mix in the month of December, 1856, as stated by him, that "the bowl was made with a tongue from three-eighths to half an inch long which fitted into a cavity in the handle, the handle being made with a brace, and also with a cavity to receive the tongue of the bowl. The handle of the spoon was riveted to the bowl, but I don't know whether it was soldered or brazed. The metal of the handle closed over the end of the tongue projecting from the bowl," &c.

The commissioner supposes that the testimony of Bull does not sustain that of the two other witnesses Marcy and Mix, but shows a fatal discrepancy and unsoundness, and that this is offered to be explained away by Mix, &c. Neither of these witnesses state expressly whether it was the square edged joint or the beveled edge. Whether however they are or are not substantially alike it is not of importance to decide. I do not understand that it is denied. Two of them, Marcy and Mix, prove that the handle of the spoon was fitted to receive a tongue formed on the bowl of the spoon which dovetailed under the iron of the handle of the spoon; and the other that "the metal of the handle closed over the end of the tongue, projecting from the bowl." I cannot discover any substantial discrepancy, between these witnesses. I understand the words used by the two witnesses as applicable to the point of fact about which they were testifying. The only sensible meaning which can be given I think is, that the metal of the handle closed over the tongue in agreement with which the other witnesses say, that it thus dovetailed. I cannot conceive of a fastening or jointing that could be stronger, or even so strong,—an equivalent of course for any other, used by the appellee.

Why then is not this invention of appellant discovered in December, 1856, substantially identical with that of the appellee, which was not discovered until sometime in May, 1857, several months after? As to the testimony on the subject of the comparative strength of the spoon (if relevant), I do not think it sufficient to set aside the positive proof by these witnesses of the invention as proved.

If the proof shows that the appellant was the original and first discoverer of the invention involved in the issue in this case, has he lost his right to claim the same by abandonment? To sustain this ground a number of authorities are referred to by the counsel for the appellee in his argument. The application of this doctrine of abandonment depends upon the circumstances of each case, and implies laches on the part of the original inventor. All the cases cited will appear to turn on such principles. The specific grounds upon which the abandonment is supposed to appear are not clearly stated. As before noticed, the commissioner has stated that an application was made in the year 1857, in which case one of the claims of appellant was withdrawn, and a certain concession made as to the novelty, that is, that the V shaped joint in itself was well known, &c. There can be nothing conclusive in this act. This, however, is a very different thing from the claim set up and proved in this case. If such a claim was made he had certainly a right to withdraw it and reform it to meet the truth of his case without prejudice. As to the ground of want of diligence, the proof is that the appellee had early notice of the claim of the appellant, and that he meant to apply for a patent, and although the circumstances are that though for a short time he suspended the use of this particular mode, he was experimenting diligently, and at length discovered that a suitable die would perfect this mode of making spoons, which he accordingly had made and used in connection therewith, and shortly afterwards made the application in the present case. He was certainly entitled to a reasonable time to experiment and perfect his invention. It seems, then, that he has been rather unfortunate than negligent in making his application for a patent.

My opinion therefore is that the decision of the commissioner is erroneous, that priority of invention ought to have been awarded to the appellant and a patent granted to him accordingly.

MIZNER et al. v. VAUGHN. LAMB v. SAME. SQUIRES v. SAME.

[2 Sawy. 269;[1] 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 10.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Nov. 18, 1872.

GRANTS—OREGON DONATION ACT—SETTLEMENT—CHILDREN OF SETTLER—DEATH BEFORE PATENT ISSUED—LIMITATION.

1. A settler on the public lands under the donation act (9 Stat. 477), had a present grant by force and operation of such act from the date of his settlement, unless such settlement preceded in point of time the passage of the act, in which case the grant took effect from the date thereof, and not before.

[Cited in Wythe v. Haskell, Case No. 18,118; Bear v. Luse, Id. 1,179.]

2. Where a settler under section 4 of said act dies intestate, after complying with the act, and before the issue of patent, his estate in the land terminates, and the remainder at once vests in his children, by purchase as the donees of the United States, and not by descent as the heirs of such settler.

3. A settler under said act is seized, at the date of his settlement, of a conditional fee in the land settled upon, and thereafter his right to the possession is not barred by lapse of time, unless it appears that the party claiming the benefit of such bar, either by himself or in connection with others with whom he is in privity, has actually occupied the premises adversely to the title of such settler, continuously for the period of twenty years subsequent to such seizin.

4. The title of such settler does not take effect by relation, prior to the passage of the donation act.

On September 26, 1870, the plaintiff [Lansing B.] Mizner commenced separate actions to recover possession of an undivided three fifths of lots two and eight in block fifteen, lots one and three in block five, and the south one half of lot four in block two, in the city of Portland, against thirteen persons then in the actual occupation of certain parts and parcels of said lots and half lot respectively. The occupants having answered that they were in possession only as the tenants of the defendant [George W.] Vaughn, on application of said Vaughn, an order was made admitting him to defend said action in place of said tenants, and that the same be consolidated. On May 17, 1872, the defendant answered as follows: (1) Denying that the plaintiff had any legal estate in the premises, or right to the possession thereof. (2) That the action was barred by the statute of limitations, because neither the plaintiff, nor those under whom he claims, were seized or possessed of the premises in controversy within twenty years before the commencement of this action. (3) The pendency of a suit and cross-suit in equity in this court, between the defendant and the grantors of the plaintiff concerning a partition and the right and title to the same property. On motion of plaintiff, the third defense was stricken out as being irrelevant and immaterial, and because, if a defense at all, being matter in abatement of the action, it could not be joined with a plea to the action, it could not be joined with a plea to the merits. Afterwards, the plaintiff replied to the plea of the statute of limitations, and in pursuance of the stipulation of the parties, the cause was tried by the court without a jury, on June 12. On the same date, the plaintiffs—Lamb and Squires—commenced separate actions against the same persons to recover the possession of an undivided one tenth each of the same premises. In these actions, Vaughn was also admitted to defend, and the same issues were made as in the action brought by Mizner, and by stipulation of the parties the three were tried together. On the trial it was agreed that either party might use as evidence, if otherwise competent, any pleading, exhibit or deposition in the suit and cross-suit in equity—decided March 28, 1872, in this court concerning the same property, entitled Lamb v. Vaughn [Case No. 8,023].

W. Lair Hill and E. C. Bronaugh, for plaintiffs.

Erasmus D. Shattuck and Theodore Burmester, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. Practically, it is admitted that the plaintiffs have the legal title to the premises, and are entitled to recover the possession of them, unless their right to maintain these actions is barred by the statute of limitations. The evidence establishes the following facts: On September 22, 1848, Francis W. Pettygrove abandoned the land claim embracing the lots in controversy, and Daniel H. Lownsdale settled thereon, and after the passage of the donation act of September 27, 1850, namely on March 11, 1852, he made his notification of such settlement in the proper land office, and otherwise complied with the provisions of said act, and died intestate thereon, and before the issue of the patent, on May 4, 1862, leaving children, Mary E. Cooper, James P. O., and Millard O. Lownsdale and Ruth A. Semple, and children of his deceased daughter Sarah, the plaintiffs Lamb and Squires.

The patent certificate showing compliance by Daniel H. with the conditions of residence and cultivation required by the donation act issued to the deceased on October 17, 1860, and the patent on June 6, 1865. Prior to the settlement of Daniel H., the land claim described in the patent was occupied by F. W. Pettygrove and Benjamin Stark, who held the bare possession under the laws of the provisional government, but without any claim of right to, or interest in, the soil, which then belonged to the United States.

During this occupancy said Pettygrove and Stark sold and quitclaimed the lots in controversy, except lot 2 in block 15, and south ½ of lot 4 in block 2, as follows: Lots 1 and 2 in block 5 to Thomas Stephens, on March 8, 1849; lot 3 in block 5 to Albert E. Wilson, on March 8, 1849; lot 8 in block 15 to Hugh D. O'Bryant, on March 13, 1847.

A deed was offered in evidence, but rejected for want of proof from one Geer to Atwood for lot 2 in block 15, dated January 25, 1846, and a witness testifies that Geer purchased of Pettygrove; and that he purchased of Atwood, and was in possession in September, 1848, and March, 1849; but there is no evidence to connect the defendant Vaughn with either the alleged purchase from Pettygrove, or deed to Atwood.

Vaughn testifies that he purchased south ½ of lot 4 in block 2, in 1855, of James Anderson, and that he had improved it in 1861, and occupied it since the purchase. He also states that before purchasing he conversed with Daniel H., who told him that the lot was in the Pettygrove title or tract, which consisted of 15 or 16 blocks that Pettygrove had laid off into town lots during his occupation of the land, and that he had given a bond to make title when he got one from the United States.

Lot 1 in block 5 is the only part of the premises to which the defendant proves a paper title back to Pettygrove, but when, if ever, he entered into actual possession of it does not appear; neither does it appear whether his immediate grantor, Thomas Stephens, was in possession at the time of the deed to him or not.

The law arising upon these facts is in the main well settled in this court, and need not be more than stated here. Daniel H. being in the occupancy of this land when the donation act passed, and having subsequently proven his compliance with the law, became the owner in fee of the premises from September 27, 1850, by virtue of the grant contained in section 4 of such donation act (9 Stat. 497), subject to the contingency that if he died before patent issued and intestate, his estate terminated, and the remainder should vest in his children in equal parts. Fields v. Squires [Case No. 4,776]; Lamb v. Starr [Id. 8,022].

This contingency actually happened, and on May 4, 1862, the four children of Daniel H. became the owners in fee of the premises, as the direct donees of the United States, and not as the heirs of their father. This being so, the plaintiff Mizner, and his grantors, Lownsdale, Cooper and Semple, at the commencement of this action, had been seized of the premises within twenty or even ten years, and therefore he is not barred from maintaining it for the possession. In other words, the cause of action did not arise until after the death of Daniel H. and the vesting of the remainder in his children.

But, from this construction of the act, it necessarily follows, that neither Lamb nor Squires took any interest in the remainder, the same being limited by the act to the children of Daniel H. They are not his children, but the children of his daughter, who died before him, and therefore before the remainder vested. Neither can they take an interest in such remainder as his heirs, because although the act limits the estate to the "children or heirs" of the deceased settler, it does not grant it to both children and heirs if these terms should include different persons, as in this case. The natural and most reasonable meaning of the phrase is, to the children first, and in default of those, to whoever may constitute the legal heirs of the deceased. Lamb v. Starr [Id. 8,021]. As to these plaintiffs, then, the finding of the court must be that they are not the legal owners of one fifth each of the premises, or any other portion thereof, and therefore judgment must be given against them; while the plaintiff Mizner is entitled to recover a three fourth interest instead of a three fifth.

But it is contended for the defendant that Daniel H. died seized of an estate of inheritance in the premises, which thereupon descended to his children as his heirs, and that, therefore, neither they nor their grantee, Mizner, can maintain this action, unless he could if living. If the premises are correct, the conclusion follows. Let it be assumed, then, for the present, that the children of Daniel H. took as his heirs and not as donees of the United States—or, in other words, that he died seized of an estate of inheritance, could he, if living, have maintained this action? Counsel for the defendant admit that he could, being the owner of the legal estate, unless he would be barred by the statute of limitations.

This question involves the inquiry, when did the title vest in Daniel H., and thereby give him a cause and right of action against an adverse occupant; and what is the nature and effect of the occupancy of the premises as shown on behalf of the defendant? It is the settled law of this court, until otherwise determined by a superior, that a settler under the donation act had a present grant by force and operation of such act from the date of his settlement, unless such settlement preceded in point of time the passage of the act, in which case the grant took effect from the date thereof, and not before. Fields v. Squires [Case No. 4,776]. This being so, Daniel H., if living, might have maintained this action, even admitting that the defendant by himself, or those with whom he is in privity of possession, had been in the continuous, open and adverse possession of the premises from the date of the grant by the United States to Daniel H., up to the commencement of this action, because he would have been seized at the date of such grant, which was within twenty years prior to the bringing of the action.

In Doswell v. De La Lanza, 20 How. (61 U. S.] 32, the defendants were in possession of the premises in controversy, without title, prior to the seizin of the plaintiff, and the court said that "in regard to him, they cannot be considered as having ejected him by their entry, his legal title not having then accrued."

The defendant entered without title, and has never acquired any, and unless there has been a continuous adverse occupation of the premises for twenty years by him, or those with whom he is in privity, the plea of the statue of limitations cannot be upheld. It is urged, however, that for the purpose of preventing a recovery in this case, and protecting the defendant in his possession, the court ought to hold that the title of Daniel H. took effect by relation from the date of his settlement in 1848.

The insuperable objection to this proposition is, that the occupation of Daniel H. was not commenced under the act making the grant, and, prior to its passage, had no relation to it whatever. Fields v. Squires, supra. In Gibson v. Choteau, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 101, Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The doctrine of relation is a fiction of law adopted by the courts solely for the purpose of justice, and is only applied for the security and protection of persons who stand in some privity with the party that initiated proceedings for the land, and acquired the equitable claim or right to the title."

Now, if the defendant had entered under Daniel H., or claimed an interest in or right to the land, in pursuance of some contract made with the latter while he was in the occupation of the premises, there would be some propriety in holding that the grant to Daniel H. took effect by relation from the commencement of such occupation, if that were necessary to protect the defendant's rights under such entry or contract. But in the case at bar, the application of the fiction of relation would work an injustice rather than otherwise. The defense is simply an adverse possession for twenty years. There is no privity between the parties to this action. Vaughn and those under whom he claims are strangers to Daniel H. and his title. So far as he and his children are concerned, they are and always were mere intruders upon the premises.

As was said by the court, Sawyer, C. J., in the opinion in the equity suit above mentioned: "There is no direct contract relating to these lots, either verbal or written, upon any consideration moving between the parties, Lownsdale and complainant Vaughn, or any of the latter's grantors. * * * He (Lownsdale) never purchased the lots, and never had or claimed any interest in them, till he acquired an interest under the said donation act. It was, therefore, a matter of no concern to him what use was made of them by the parties in possession, before he himself acquired any rights therein, and he had no occasion to object to, or interfere with, the action of the possessor, or the claimants under Pettygrove." [Lamb v. Vaughn, Case No. 8,023.]

But it is not admitted that Vaughn's possession has any of the elements necessary to make it a bar to this action, even if the grant to Daniel H. were held to take effect by relation from September 22, 1848, the date of his occupation.

In the first place, he is not shown to have any privity with any one that ever was upon or about the premises, either by deed or actual possession, except Stephens, as to lot one in block five. In that instance the evidence shows that Vaughn obtained a deed from Stephens, the grantee of Pettygrove and Stark, on September 26, 1856. But admitting that Stephens occupied the lot adversely to Daniel H. for some years after the grant to the latter, there is no evidence as to the character or even the fact of Vaughn's possession.

As to lot three in block five, there is no direct evidence that the defendant ever had possession of it, or that he is connected by deed with Pettygrove. A deed, dated September 24, 1858, for this lot, executed by Thomas Smith as guardian of his minor son, A. C. Smith, the grantee of Albert E. Wilson, aforesaid, to the defendant, was offered in evidence, but not admitted, for want of authority in the guardian to make the sale. So it is probable that the defendant's claim to this lot does not go back farther than that date.

Lot 8 in block 5 was attempted to be conveyed to defendant on February 17, 1857, by Gilbert and Rockwell, the successors in deed to Hugh O'Bryant, Pettygrove's grantee, by Pomeroy, as their attorney in fact; but no authority to Pomeroy being shown, the deed was not admitted. There is no testimony to show that the defendant ever actually occupied the lot, and his claim to it probably commenced at the date of this supposed deed from G. and R., and grew out of it.

Lot 2 in block 15 is not shown to have ever been claimed or occupied by the defendant, and there is no proof that he is the successor by deed or possession of Pettygrove or his grantees. The south ½ of lot 4 in block 2, on which there are valuable improvements, was purchased of Anderson in 1855, but how long prior thereto, and under whom or what circumstances he occupied it, does not appear. The defendant testifies that he has been in actual possession since the purchase from Anderson, but makes no proof that he is the successor by deed or possession of Pettygrove or his grantees.

As to the claim under which the defendant occupied the lot, it may reasonably be inferred from his deposition and the statements in his cross-bill aforesaid, that he regarded Daniel H. as the legal owner of the property, but expected to get a title from him in pursuance of a certain bond given by Daniel H. to Pettygrove upon the abandonment of the land claim by the latter; and it is probable that all the other lots in controversy were claimed under the same circumstances and expectation.

Upon the evidence, then, there is no ground to maintain that Vaughn or any one with whom he is in privity either by deed or possession, taken separately or together, had occupied any of these premises in any manner continuously for twenty years before the commencement of this action, unless it be lot 1 in block 5, and in that case, admitting all that is claimed for the defendant, the possession of himself and predecessors could not be held adverse to the title of Daniel H. before it came to him from the United States by the passage of the donation act on September 27, 1850.

The defendant in the actions by Lamb and Squires is entitled to judgment that they take nothing by said actions and for costs; and the plaintiff, Mizner, is entitled to judgment for the possession of an undivided three fourths of the premises, and for costs.

Case No. 9,679.

The M. K. RAWLEY.

[2 Lowell, 447; [1] 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 49; 3 Cent. Law J. 56.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1875.

CHARTER-PARTY — BILL OF LADING — VENDOR'S RIGHTS—DUTY OF MASTER—COMPULSION.

1. A shipper of goods has the right to have the bill of lading made to his own order; and, if the master has been instructed by the charterers not to sign such a bill, his only alternative is to reject the goods. He is not entitled to keep the goods and refuse to give such a bill.

2. Though the vendor of goods may be bound by his contract with the vendee to ship them to the order of the vendee, the master of the ship chartered by the vendee must take the delivery in such manner as the shipper makes it, or reject the goods altogether.

3. Where a master made his bill of lading to the order of the shipper, and the shipper, by his possession of the bill, induced the owners and consignees of the goods to accept and pay a draft, quaere, whether this acceptance and payment were made under compulsion, and whether the amount of the draft could be recovered of the master, even if he were not justified in signing a bill of lading in that form.

This libel was filed by Messrs. Moseley, Wheelwright, & Co., of Boston, charterers of the schooner M. K. Rawley, against that vessel, for an alleged breach of the charter-party. The case for the libellants was, that they took up the schooner for a voyage from Port Royal, South Carolina, to Brunswick, Maine, and agreed to furnish a full cargo of hard pine lumber, at an agreed rate of freight; that the libellants were bound to furnish the lumber with despatch at Brunswick, and ordered the cargo of Mr. Hudgins, a manufacturer of lumber, in Charleston, at twenty dollars per thousand, free on board. They alleged that Hudgins, with whom they had a running account, was indebted to them for the full value of this cargo, or that they had advanced such value to him. Hudgins shipped a part of the lumber, and took a bill of lading to his own order, which he indorsed to a third person as security for a draft on the libellants for $1,000; which the libellants accepted and paid. Thereupon the libellants procured the brokers who had negotiated the charter to write a letter to the master, of which the material parts are these: "Your charterers, Messrs. Moseley, Wheelwright, & Co., wish us to write you not to sign any bill of lading, except it reads to Moseley, Wheelwright, & Co.; they do not want it to order. They say if the shipper will not furnish bill of lading to them, go off without one, and they will hold you harmless. They do not care to have you say that you are acting upon their advice." When the letter was received, most of the cargo had been delivered; but the second bill of lading had not been presented, and the master requested Hudgins to make it to the libellants, which he declined to do, and threatened the master that he would not let him leave the port unless he signed a bill of lading, as before; which the master then did. Then Hudgins telegraphed the libellants that he had procured a bill of lading to his own order, and should indorse it to some one else, unless the libellants would consent to accept a draft; they replied that they would accept to a moderate amount, and he drew for $1,650, which they paid. The damages sought to be recovered of the ship were the amount of the draft of $1,650, which the libellants alleged that they were forced to accept and pay in order to obtain possession of the cargo; the bill of lading having been indorsed by Hudgins to a bank in Boston, as security for the draft. The answer asserted the claimants' ignorance of the state of accounts between the shipper and the libellants, and averred that the master was bound and obliged to give the bill of lading in the form demanded by the shipper. It was understood that Hudgins denied that the state of the account was such that the cargo had been fully paid for; but for the purpose of a preliminary hearing it was admitted that the libellants' view of the account was the true one, the right being reserved to take evidence upon that point afterwards, if necessary.

J. C. Dodge, for libellants.
I. T. Drew, for claimants.

LOWELL, District Judge. The libellants contend that the lumber was delivered to them when it was sent on board the ship which they had chartered to transport it. If this is so, their next point is sound, that the vendor had no right to revoke his acts and reassert a dominion which he had once parted with. Ogle v. Atkinson, 5 Taunt. 759;

Stanton v. Eager, 16 Pick. 467; Bolin v. Huffnagle, 1 Rawle, 9.

A vendor, however, may make a conditional delivery, by which he does not divest himself of the control of the property, but makes the carrier his own agent. Mitchel v. Ede, 11 Adol. & E. 888; Wait v. Baker, 2 Exch. 1; Ellershaw v. Magniac, 6 Exch. 570, note. A delivery at the wharf is an incomplete act, ambiguous in itself, and to be explained by the vendor at the time, or before the shipment is finished. In this case the act was explained not only by what followed, but by what had gone before, because in shipping a former part of the same cargo the shipper had demanded and received a bill of lading in his own name.

The simplest mode of stating the rights of the parties is, that however strongly one may be bound to convey his property to another, the title does not pass until the owner chooses to pass it, or until a court of equity compels him to do so; and, therefore, if, against all reason and right, he insists on retaining the possession, until the transit is ended, he does retain it. The only alternative for the master in this case was to refuse to receive the goods on these terms. But this is not what the libellants wished, nor is their complaint that he failed to reject the cargo. They were not willing to pay dead freight; and therefore required him to do what he had no right to do, promising to hold him harmless. He had no right to receive the goods on any other terms than those on which they were offered: he must accept or reject. If Hudgins had been a mere agent to forward the goods, the libellants might have revoked his agency; but a vendor, even if paid, is not a mere agent.

The question has been lately decided in favor of the master in the court of exchequer in England, by two judges against one; and it seems to me that the opinion of the majority is sound, for the reasons already given. The case was a very hard one for the buyers of the goods, but the principles that must decide it were considered too strong for the equities of the case. Kreeft v. Thompson, L. R. 10 Exch. 274. In that case the master had not been notified by the charterers what sort of bill of lading he was expected to sign, further than the charter-party itself might inform him. But this is immaterial; because the decision turned upon the right of the shipper to dictate the terms upon which he would deliver his goods, which would be the same though the charterers themselves had been present. They could not have accepted in part and rejected in part.

But if we grant that the property had once passed to the charterers, can the master be held to pay as damages for delivering the bill of lading a sum of money which the libellants have paid to the shipper? The latter could not by obtaining such a document revest the property in himself, or transfer a good title to one claiming under him, even in good faith. Ogle v. Atkinson, 5 Taunt. 759; Stanton v. Eager, 16 Pick. 467; Kreeft v. Thompson, L. R. 10 Exch. 274. The bill of lading, then, would be waste paper as against the libellants, though it might give the shipper the means of deceiving others. Where, then, was the legal compulsion upon the libellants to accept the draft? If Hudgins had retained actual possession of the cargo, the payment would have been compulsory; but if he had only a paper title which was worthless, can it be so considered? A slight duress or obstruction might be enough, as between the party exacting the payment and him who makes it, to deprive the payment of its voluntary character, and to warrant an action of assumpsit to recover it back. The question is, whether a third person has not a somewhat different position; whether, if the master was wrong in giving this bill of lading, he should be held liable for damages which are not the legal and natural consequences of his act.

Those natural consequences would seem to be the possible injury to third persons, who should advance money on the bill of lading in ignorance of its invalidity; and I am not at all prepared to say that a master might not be liable in tort, in some cases, for damage of that character. So far as the shipper is concerned, the master is presumed to know that his bill of lading cannot avail against the true owner, though for any expense or trouble to which the latter might be put to vindicate his title there might be a liability. None such were suffered in this case; the libellants yielded to a demand which could not be enforced; wisely, perhaps, but still not under a strict necessity. As, however, I consider the first point a clear one against the libellants, I do not decide this. Libel dismissed with costs.

DAMAGES—MARITIME TORT—TOW-BOAT AND TOW.

1. Where a tug was employed to take a schooner out of a slip from alongside another vessel, and the men on the schooner gave no directions as to the mode or time of taking her out, and, in taking her out, her stay caught the yard-arm of the other vessel, and her topmast was carried away: Held, that the tug was bound to adopt a method of taking the schooner out without injury.

2. The method selected was manifestly hazardous, and the tug was liable for the damages occasioned by her want of success.

the schooner Edward Reed by reason of her topmast rigging catching the yard-arm of the steamer England, while she was being towed from alongside that steamer by the steam tug M. M. Caleb.

The steamer was lying upon the north side of pier 47, nearly up to the bulkhead, and the schooner was lying alongside, bow in, and nearly up to an elevator which was lying at the bulkhead.

The wind was blowing heavily from the N. W., the tide was ebb, and slack in the slip. The tug, as it appears, undertook to transport the schooner from the position above described to a position on the lower side of the pier, and for that purpose made fast a line to the schooner's bow, which was carried aft on the schooner, and held by a slip at the larboard quarter. The tug then started the schooner astern by the hawser, but as the schooner moved aft, her stay caught in the yardarm of the steamer, and, before she could be stopped, the topmast was carried away and other damage done to the rigging.

The evidence does not show that any action of the schooner contributed to the accident; the men on board of her gave no directions as to the mode of fastening or as to the mode or time of taking the schooner out. All this was determined on by those on the tug, who saw the position of the schooner, and were bound to select a method of taking her from the side of the steamer without injury.

The method selected of taking her out by a stern line was manifestly attended with risk of carrying away the masts, if the schooner swung at all, as she was quite certain to do under the action of the tug.

Having adopted a hazardous method of performing the duty, the tug must be held responsible for the damages arising from the failure of success. Proper care on her part, would, in my opinion, have enabled her to remove the schooner in safety, heavy as the wind was.

Let the decree be for the libellants, with a reference to ascertain the amount.

DAMAGES—MARITIME TORT—TOW-BOAT AND TOW.

A boat in tow of a steamtug was run on shore by reason of the breaking of the rudder-chain of the tug-boat. The chain was worn out and insufficient, and this was known to the owner of the tug when the boat was taken in tow. Held, that, to tow the boat while having such a rudder-chain was negligence, and that the tow-boat was liable for the damage.

Scudder & Carter, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. It is clear upon the evidence that the libellant's vessel, while being towed by the steam tug Caleb, was run on shore by reason of the breaking of the rudder-chain of the tug. It is equally clear that the breaking of the rudder-chain was owing to a palpable defect in the chain itself. The tug's rudder-chain was worn out and insufficient, and this was known to the claimant at the time the libellant's vessel was taken in tow. It was manifest negligence to attempt to tow the libellant's boat with such a chain, and the tug is accordingly responsible for the damages which ensued. Decree for the libellants, with an order of reference.

SEAMAN'S WAGES—JURISDICTION—TENDER—COSTS.

1. D. was hired as deck hand on a tug, at $30 a month, as he claimed. The tug sank at a pier but was raised again, and, after she was raised, he worked on board, in repairing her. Afterwards, filed a libel against her to recover wages for the whole time. The claimants deposited in court $24.50 to meet his claim, besides costs, amounting, in all, to $63.82, claiming that he was only entitled to $20: Held, that D. was entitled to recover $15, for half a month's wages.

2. The court had no jurisdiction in respect to his claim for services after the boat sank.

[Cited in Tarleton v. Mallory, Case No. 13,753.]

3. The libelant could withdraw $15 out of the $63.82 and the rest of it must be returned to the claimants, and the libellant must pay the claimant's costs.

This was a libel by Edward J. Dunn, for seaman's wages. The libellant alleged that he was hired as deck hand on the tug, on November 18th, 1876, at $30 a month and found, that he served on board as such till November 29th, when the tug sank at a pier, and that she was raised on December 9th, when he went aboard again and served till January 13th, 1877. He claimed to recover $93.75. The owners of the tug alleged that the libellant's wages were but $20 a month; that he was discharged when the boat sank; that, after she was raised, he did some work on board, in repairing her, &c., but not as a seaman; that of this part of his claim the court had no jurisdiction; and that there was but $24.50 due him for all his services. This sum, with costs, amounting to $63.50, in all, they deposited in court.

Robertson & Robertson, for libellant.
Owen & Gray, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libellant is entitled, I think, to half a month's wages at $30 a month. I think the sinking of the boat put an end to the contract for his services as a deck hand, and that this court has no jurisdiction in respect of the services he rendered after the boat sank and after she was raised. I, therefore award, to the libellant $15. The claimants deposited in court $24.50, to meet the claim made in this suit, exclusive of costs. As the libellant refused to accept that sum, I cannot award costs to the libellant. Therefore, I cannot allow the libellant or his proctors to withdraw the amount deposited for costs. The $24.50 was deposited under the protest that the court could not take cognizance of any claim for services after the vessel sank, and the costs were deposited as costs proper to go to the libellant only in case the court held him entitled to as much as $24.50 for his claim. Out of the $63.82 in court the libellant may withdraw $15, and he must pay the fees of the marshal and clerk. The rest of the $63.82 will be returned to the claimants, and they must have costs against the libellant.

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 25, 1873.[2]

ADMIRALTY—MARITIME TORTS—NEGLIGENCE—TUG BOAT AND TOW—RUDDER CHAIN—TOTAL LOSS—FREIGHT.

1. A steamtug was towing two schooners lashed alongside of her, through Hell Gate. One of them, laden with coal, on freight, struck the rocks, and sank. The tug, being sued for such loss, set up in defence, the arising of a violent wind, and the failure of the schooner that sank to anchor, when directed to, and the breaking of the rudder chain of the tug, and that the accident was inevitable. The libel specified no particular negligence in the tug, but alleged her negligence, generally, as causing the loss: Held, that the breaking of the rudder chain was the immediate cause of the disaster, that no excuse was shown, in respect of the violence of the wind, and that the tug was liable, the rudder chain having broken from an imperfection which might have been, and ought to have been, known.

[Cited in Bust v. Cornell Steam-boat Co., 24 Fed. 190; The Bordentown, 40 Fed. 686.]

2. The libellant sold the wreck. She was repaired by the purchaser. The actual time spent, in removing and repairing her, was thirty-one days. The commissioner, in the district court, reported, as damages, the cost of removing and repairing her, and the gross freight on the coal, for her whole voyage, and interest on those items, and an allowance for the value of the use of the vessel, during the thirty-one days, which he denominated "demurrage." Exceptions, by the claimant, to the allowance of the whole freight, and of the "demurrage," were overruled by the district court. The allowance of the entire freight, not deducting anything for the time and expense incident to the completion of the voyage, was made by the commissioner, as a set-off for the time which he supposed the libellant would have consumed in arranging to raise and repair the vessel, if he had not sold her: Held, that it was correct, not to allow as for a total loss, and not to allow the value of the vessel, less the proceeds of sale, and that, therefore, it was proper to allow for the loss of the use of vessel, while she was being removed and repaired.

3. It not appearing what became of the coal, except that it was saved, the allowance of the full freight, on the principle of such set-off, was erroneous, because conjectural; and the claimant, if he desired, should be allowed to elect, whether to enquire into the disposition of the coal, and into the actual loss of freight money, (the libellant being permitted to open the question of "demurrage," with a view to increase its amount,) or to waive such enquiry and the exception as to the allowance for freight money, in which latter case, the decree below would be affirmed, with interest, without costs of appeal.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Eastern district of New York.]

In admiralty.

Franklin A. Wilcox, for libellants.
James C. Carter, for claimant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The libel herein alleges an undertaking by the master of the steamtug M. M. Caleb, on the 22d of November, 1870, to safely tow and pilot the schooner Baltimore, (belonging to the libellants, and then at anchor in the harbor of New York) through Hell Gate to Riker's Island; that the service was begun, and the tug, with the schooner on her port side and another on her starboard, had reached a place known as "Negro Point," when it was discovered that the Baltimore was ashore on the rocks; that, after some time, she was got off, and the tug proceeded on, and had reached a point about off the sunken marsh, on Ward's Island, when it was discovered that the Baltimore was ashore on the rocks at that point; that the master of the tug immediately threw off the lashings, saying that the tug was itself aground, and he could render no assistance; that the Baltimore settled upon the rocks, and was so broken and damaged that she became a total wreck; that she still lies there, sunken, and her fragments will not produce the sum of five hundred dollars; that, at the time the libellants' vessel was controlled by, and under the management of, the said tug and those navigating her; that the master of the tug, instead of safely towing and piloting the said vessel, as he undertook to do, so negligently and carelessly behaved, in the premises, as to cause said damages; and that the said damages are, in no way, the fault of, nor were they caused by, the libellants, or their agents, but "were solely the fault of, and caused by, the negligent acts of those navigating the said tug M. M. Caleb." The libel also states, that the Baltimore had on board a cargo of coal, received at Philadelphia, to be transported to Boston, for an agreed freight, amounting to six hundred and eighteen $^{80}/_{100}$ dollars; that the Baltimore was of the value of six thousand five hundred dollars; and that the damages are the sum of six thousand dollars, for the vessel, besides the loss of the said freight, amounting to six thousand six hundred and eighteen $^{80}/_{100}$ dollars, besides interest.

The answer admits that the steamtug agreed to render her services in towing the Baltimore through Hell Gate, and took her in tow for that purpose. It alleges the commencement of a violent wind from the east, when opposite Astoria, which continually increased; that, when opposite Negro Point, the tug was unable to tow the two vessels, with the wind and tide as they then were, and her master requested both of the schooners to anchor; that those on board the starboard vessel did so, but those on the Baltimore neglected to comply with the request; that the anchor of the one schooner would not hold the tow, and they drifted towards the shore, till the Baltimore touched bottom; that the tug then separated from both, took the other vessel to a place of safety, then returned, drew off the Baltimore, and was proceeding with her towards a safe anchorage, when the rudder chain on the port side of the tug parted, and the tug became thereby unmanageable, and both drifted upon the sunken marsh on Randall's Island; that the disaster was not caused by any careless, negligent, or unseamanlike act or conduct of those on board of the tug, or any of them, or because of any weakness or unseaworthiness in her, or by any means which it was possible for those on board of her to prevent; but, that the same was caused, solely, by the negligent, improper, and unseamanlike conduct of those on board of said schooner Baltimore, in omitting to cast her anchors when requested to do so by those on board the tug, and by inevitable accident.

In the district court, the libellants had a decree for their damages [Case No. 9,681], and it appeared, on an inquiry into the amount, that the libellants sold the wreck, on the recommendation of the port wardens, after they had made an official survey thereof, and she brought the sum of seven hundred and thirty dollars, at public auction. She was taken off the rocks by the purchasers, her coal was taken out, and she was again sold. The purchasers at this second sale repaired her. The time actually spent in her removal, and in the actual making of repairs, was ascertained to be thirty-one days. The commissioner reported, as damages, the cost of removing her from the rocks, the cost of making the repairs, (including towage to the place of repair,) the whole amount of freight, above stated, and interest on these items, and, also, an allowance for the value of the use of the vessel during the thirty-one days actually spent in her removal and repairs, which he denominated demurrage. On exceptions to the allowance of the whole freight, and to the allowance thus called demurrage, the district court overruled the exceptions. From the decree thereupon this appeal is taken.

The ground upon which the decision proceeded in the court below as appears by the opinion of the district judge, was, that the breaking of the rudder chain of the tug was the cause of the wrecking of the schooner; that the breaking of that chain was owing to a palpable defect in the chain itself, the same being worn, weak, and insufficient; that this was known to the claimant, when he took the libellants' schooner in tow; and that it was manifest negligence to attempt to tow the libellants' schooner with such a chain.

In the report of the damages, the commissioner gives a reason for allowing to the libellants the full freight money, as follows: "As to demurrage, I take into account only the time when the work of raising the vessel, and of making the repairs at Lissenden's yard, was actually being proceeded with, namely, thirty-one days. Some additional time would, of necessity, have been consumed in arranging for this work, if the libellants had undertaken to raise and repair the vessel, and, to offset, I have allowed the entire freight, without any deduction for the time and expense which would have been incident to the completion of the voyage."

The facts upon which the conclusion of the court below was based are, I think, clearly established by the evidence. Even taking the narrative given in the answer of the claimant herein, the breaking of the rudder chain was the immediate cause of the disaster; and it is, also, plain, I think, that the wind which the tug encountered was not of such unusual or extraordinary violence as to excuse her. It was not an exigency which ordinary care and prudence did not require her to be prepared to meet, before she assumed the duty of conducting two other vessels through a difficult and dangerous passage such as Hell Gate; and, moreover, there is great force in the argument of the libellants, that if the gale was of so extraordinary a character as to form any excuse to her, then it was negligence and improper management in her not to seek shelter and safety before entering that channel, which she might easily have done. I think, also, the proof establishes that the chain was worn, weak, and insufficient for the service; and that the master of the tug had such knowledge of its condition as makes him chargeable with negligence in relying upon it. Besides, it was his duty to know it, when the defect was apparent on inspection, as it is proved it was. The claimant, however, insists, that, as this defect in the chain was not specified in the libel as a cause of the disaster, the evidence on that subject should be disregarded. The charge of negligence is, in the libel, very general. I think, that, if the libel had been excepted to, for want of proper specifications, such exception would have been sustained, and, had it been made specific without mention of the use of an insufficient rudder chain, the case of McKinlay v. Morrish, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 343, would have gone very far to sustain the position of the counsel for the claimant here. But, even then, the neglect of the tug to come to anchor below would have been a serious hindrance to the exoneration of the tug.

The proof fails, wholly, to establish the only defences which are set up in the answer. The accident was not inevitable. Any attempt to urge that is met, at once, by the admission, that the rudder chain broke, and by the proof of its imperfection. The charge of negligence in the schooner rests solely on the statement that she was requested to anchor and neglected to do so. The proof makes it doubtful whether any such request was made, or attempted to be communicated to the Baltimore, and it shows, at least, that no such request was heard or understood by those on board the Baltimore.

The amount awarded for damages to the schooner was properly ascertained without reference to the value of the vessel, or the price for which the wreck was sold. There was no sufficient, proper evidence which would justify the libellants in claiming for a total loss; and, not having appealed from the decree, the libellants are concluded upon that question. On the other hand, the claimant not having excepted to the mode of ascertainment, nor to the amount allowed, it is not open to him to object thereto, on the appeal. In fact, as the amount is much less than would be awarded on the basis of a total loss, or a loss of the value of the vessel, less the proceeds of sale, it was not for the interest of the claimant to object thereto. The mode of ascertainment was, however, upon the evidence, correct, and it is material so to declare, because it bears upon the exception to the allowance for the use of the vessel during the time necessary for her removal from the rocks, and for the repairing of her injuries. Having been, in fact, removed and repaired, it was just to hold, that the vessel bound to make indemnity for the injury was in no worse condition than if the libellants had removed and repaired her; and, on the other hand, if the offending tug was not liable for the full value of the vessel, less the proceeds of the sale, then, surely, to ascertain their loss, it was competent to show the necessary cost of removing and repairing; and this, whether it was done or not, and by whomsoever done, was, at least, a just measure of the damage to the vessel, sustained by the injury. Hence, the enquiry on this point properly proceeded as if the libellants had themselves removed and repaired the vessel, and the fact of a sale became wholly immaterial. It necessarily follows, that an allowance for the loss of the use of the vessel during the time reasonably necessary for such removal and repairs, became a proper element in the assessment of the loss. Denying to the libellants the value of the vessel, they could not otherwise be indemnified. The exception to such allowance was, therefore, properly overruled.

The claimant also excepted to the allowance of the full freight which would have been earned by the completion of the voyage and the delivery of her cargo; and, on that subject, there is some embarrassment. The proofs do not show what became of the cargo. It was proved, that the coal was taken out of the schooner, but what was done with it does not appear. Did the owners of the cargo accept it, when taken out of the schooner, and so become liable for freight pro rata itineris? Or, did the libellants send on the cargo by some other vessel, and so become entitled to full freight? Or, was the cargo detained until after the schooner was removed and repaired, and (treating the libellants, as between them and the owners of the tug, as still having the control of the schooner,) might they have reladen the cargo, and proceeded on the voyage, and made delivery thereof, and received full freight? Upon these questions, no information is furnished, by the proofs. I greatly doubt, that further enquiry on this subject will be of any benefit to the claimants of the tug; but, I fail to see the propriety of what seems, in the report of the commissioner, a conjecture, that what he might properly have allowed as further necessary time of detention for preparation for removing the schooner, is equal to any sum which could have been saved out of the freight money, by sending or carrying the coal to Boston, and that there might be a set-off based on that conjecture. There was no such proof. Non constat that the libellants did not receive freight. Non constat that they did not send on the cargo, as, I think, it was their duty to do, if practicable, and receive therefor full freight, in which case their necessary expenses of sending and delivering would represent their loss of freight. While, therefore, I am of opinion that the decree below was correct, in all respects, except in the matter of this set-off, I am compelled to say, that, if the claimant desires a further enquiry into the actual disposition made of the cargo, and into the saving which the libellants did make, or, in the due discharge of their duty might have made, out of the freight money, (permitting the libellants, at the same time, to open the question of allowance in the nature of demurrage,) he may have a reference to the commissioner, to ascertain the further facts, and to determine thereupon the actual loss of freight by the disaster, and whether any and how much further loss is due to the greater time of detention for repairs, if any competent proof can be given showing that the allowance already made is not adequate. If the claimant should not desire such a reference, and shall, within twenty days, file his waiver thereof, and of his exception in respect to the allowance for freight, then, let the libellants have a decree for the amount awarded by the decree appealed from, with interest, without costs of this appeal. If no such waiver is filed, let an order of reference be entered. A preliminary or interlocutory order, in conformity with these directions, may be entered.

Case No. 9,684.

The M. M. CHASE.

[2 Hask. 270.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Oct., 1878.

COLLISION — CLOSE-HAULED — RULE 16 — DUTY TO PORT HELM—STARBOARD TACK—LOOKOUT—WITNESS—TESTIMONY MANIFESTLY UNTRUE.

1. The testimony of the respective owners of colliding vessels being manifestly untrue, the court considered the testimony of a competent witness, who saw the collision from the land, the most reliable evidence.

2. Colliding vessels, sailing with a north wind, one a course east by north within seven points of the wind, and the other west by north two points free, are neither close-hauled.

3. Vessels so sailing approaching each other end on and in danger of collision, one upon the port tack and the other upon the starboard tack, should, under rule 16, both seasonably port their helms.

4. Those in charge of vessels so approaching each other have a right to presume that rule 16 will be seasonably complied with; and if one vessel puts her helm aport soon enough to avoid a collision if the other should do the same at the same time, she is blameless; and if a collision ensue, for failure to so port the helm, the vessel failing to do it would be in fault, and liable for the damages.

5. If vessels approaching in opposite directions on courses diverging two points, neither being close-hauled, are not governed by rule 16, the vessel on the port tack must keep clear of the vessel on the starboard tack.

6. A lookout must be kept to apprise the man at the helm of approaching vessels.

This was a libel in rem by the master and owners of the Emma B. Shaw against the M. M. Chase for damages from collision of the two vessels, occasioned by fault of the Chase. The owners of the Chase filed their answer, denying any fault on the part of the Chase, and the cause was heard upon libel, answer, and proofs.

George F. Holmes and A. A. Strout, for libelants.

Geo. E. Bird and William W. Thomas, for claimants.

FOX, District Judge. This libel is instituted against the schooner, M. M. Chase, of Portland, by the master and owners of the schooner, Emma B. Shaw, of Philadelphia, to recover for damages sustained by the Emma B. Shaw, from a collision with the M. M. Chase, on the morning of February 19, 1878, which took place at the western entrance of the Vineyard Sound, between the lightship and Cuttyhunk island.

The Emma B. Shaw was a schooner of two hundred and forty-eight tons, loaded with ice, bound from Boothbay to Philadelphia. The M. M. Chase was bound from Virginia to Portland, with a cargo of oysters.

The libel alleges that the course of the Emma B. Shaw at time of collision, was west-northwest, and that she was on her starboard tack, close-hauled, with the wind north by west; and that the M. M. Chase was seen two or three miles off, on a course of east by north with free wind.

The answer admits that the M. M. Chase was sailing on a course east by north, but avers that the wind was north-northeast to northeast by north, and that she was on her port tack close-hauled; that the Emma B. Shaw was first seen on the starboard bow of the M. M. Chase, about a half-mile distant, sailing on a course west-southwest, with the wind free, and that the Emma B. Shaw afterwards changed her course to the northwest, and thereby occasioned this collision.

The master and mate of the Emma B. Shaw, in their depositions, fully sustain all the allegations in the libel; and on the other hand, the testimony of the master, mate, and one of the seamen of the M. M. Chase, corroborates the allegations in the answer. Each side has also produced the testimony of a witness from the island of Cuttyhunk.

Albert F. Church, a pilot, who is the son-in-law of Mr. Smith, the light-keeper, testifies in his deposition that he was on the island that morning watching for a vessel which he expected to pilot through the sound; that he saw both the schooners from where he stood previous to the collision; that he did not see them when they were together, but saw them after the collision; that the wind was about north by west, a good wholesale breeze, and so continued through the morning; that the Chase was on her port tack, heading about east by north, but for a portion of the time she was obscured from his sight by a barn. He says, "Her sheets were off some, cannot tell exactly how much, but so that I could notice them distinctly; she was not close-hauled, but was running free with her boom about one third of the way off, as I should judge. About half an hour after seeing the M. M. Chase, I saw the top of the Emma B. Shaw sail across the hollow in the island; she came out by, so that I could see her hull in twenty or thirty minutes; she was then on her starboard tack, was not close-hauled, heading about west as near as I could judge; the vessels then were two or three miles apart; she afterwards luffed up into the wind, trimmed off and was headed north by west as near as I could tell; she was close-hauled, sharp to the wind, heading west-northwest as near as I could tell; I should judge the vessels were about a mile or more apart; the two vessels were within an eighth of a mile of each other when I last saw them before the collision."

On cross examination, he says, "The true course for a vessel through the sound and bound to Philadelphia is about west by south; the wind was quite steady that morning; it very likely blew by flaws, as far eastward as north. I did not look at any compass, there was a vane in sight; I did not look at the vessels after they were within a mile of each other, because I stepped into the house to do something or other. If the Emma B. Shaw had kept on the course she was on when I first saw her, the collision would not probably have occurred."

S. Austin Smith, the keeper of Cuttyhunk light, was called by claimants, and testified that at about 6.40 on morning of February nineteenth, "I went up into the lantern of the lighthouse and saw the M. M. Chase coming in on a course of east by north. I saw the collision. The vessels were about S. S. W. from the lighthouse at the time; the wind was due north, veering round to N. N. E.; the two vessels came nearly end on, and I watched them, fearing a collision; they were neither of them close-hauled; they both held their course, the Emma B. Shaw being a little southerly until a moment before the collision, and then the E. B. Shaw put her helm hard to port and came under the bow of the M. M. Chase, and the collision occurred almost immediately; the M. M. Chase did not change her course. I noticed the course of the wind at the time of the collision, which took place about a mile from me. The sun was up and as clear a day as ever was. Saw the man at the wheel of the M. M. Chase exerting himself to bring her up into the wind. If the E. B. Shaw had starboarded her helm, the vessels would have gone clear. The wind, at the time, varied from N. N. E. to N. by W. at lighthouse. The E. B. Shaw would have passed to the north of the lightship, I think. She changed her course a little after she opened by the bluff of the island, and steered a little more to the north. My attention was fixed on the vessels, as I expected a collision; they were two hundred to two hundred and fifty feet apart when the E. B. Shaw ported her helm. If both vessels had held their course, think a collision would have occurred. After leaving Tarpaulin cove, the course of the E. B. Shaw, with wind north, would have been about west by south, to pass near the lightship. I suppose she may have kept on to north of that, when I saw her, to go north of lightship. She may have kept up to north of west, say a point, a point and a half."

In the present case, as in most others of a similar character, there is an irreconcilable conflict in the testimony of those on board the respective vessels upon material points, upon which the court has not the charity to believe that the differences are wholly owing to errors of judgment. The officers and crew of colliding vessels most usually are quite ready to exonerate themselves from blame by statements, which upon careful examination and comparison with the testimony of disinterested spectators, if to be had, are generally shown to be gross perversion of the facts as they actually occurred.

In this case, all of the evidence is in deposition, excepting that of Smith, the lighthouse-keeper; and the court, not having had the other witnesses before it, has not had the opportunity of seeing them, and, from their appearance, forming its own judgment as to what extent they may have designedly misrepresented the state of the wind and other matters at the time of the collision. It is sufficient to say, that this testimony, on one side or the other, is most manifestly untrue; and in the opinion of the court this remark is not applicable exclusively to the witnesses on either side; but on both sides, the facts have been so much perverted by them, that the court is not inclined to consume any time in attempting to discern if either approximates to the truth, or which side is farthest therefrom. Mr. Smith, the keeper of Cuttyhunk light, was produced as a witness at the hearing, and while he manifested some peculiarities as a witness, the court was impressed with his truthfulness, and is of opinion that he intended to give a correct statement of what occurred when the collision took place. He has followed the sea forty years; been fourteen years keeper of the light; has had charge of one of the coast life-stations; and is manifestly a man of experience in maritime matters, and of standing character.

He says, he watched the vessels until the collision occurred, fearing from their respective courses, as they were nearly end on, that they would collide. He swears that they were only a mile distant from him, and that he noticed the wind at the time, and it was due north, varying by spells from N. by W. to N. N. E. Smith was up in the lantern of the lighthouse with a clear unobstructed view through the light of plate glass, and with a vane before him, and with his experience of fourteen years in that office, could not but have known the exact course of the wind. Church, his son-in-law, was on the ground, and represents the wind as about N. by W. He is not positive and precise upon this point, while Smith is; and it may be that, at the moment that Church noticed the wind, it may have been in the direction stated by him; but the court is inclined to accept the statements of Smith upon this point, on account of his exactness upon a matter, in respect to which, if observed by him as he says, he could not be mistaken.

The testimony by deposition of these pilots has been taken by claimants, and they say that, on the morning of the collision, they were in the vicinity of Gay Head, and that the wind then was north-northeast. It is not improbable that such was the course of the wind further up the sound, as the testimony tends to show that the wind frequently hauls more to east of north after passing the northern entrance of the sound; so that, with the wind north at Cuttyhunk, it might be two or three points to the eastward when near Gay Head. Upon the whole case, my judgment is, that the wind was north where the collision occurred, and if so, the M. M. Chase, being on a course of east by north, as is admitted by both sides, was sailing within seven points of the wind, which gave her a free course, and she could not have been closehauled.

Mr. Smith swears that neither vessel was close-hauled; and whether this was so or not must depend on the course of the E. B. Shaw with a northerly wind. I am inclined to the opinion that, after she passed the bluff on Cuttyhunk, she at first was on a westerly course, which was changed, as Church says, soon afterwards more northerly; and this statement of Church finds corroboration in the testimony of Smith, who thinks that, after passing the bluff, she hauled more northerly, intending to go inside of the lightship, which, according to Smith's statement, would give her a course one to one and one-half points north of west, say about west by north, which I am inclined to think was the course she was on just previous to the collision.

With a north wind, sailing west by north, the Emma B. Shaw must have been two points free; and I therefore find that neither vessel was close-hauled. I am aware that Church says the Emma B. Shaw was close-hauled, and he gives the course when he saw her as about N., N. W.; but he does not pretend to be exact; and I prefer to rely on Smith's testimony, which is positive, that neither vessel was close-hauled. This view draws some strength from the fact that the two vessels were so approaching each other that Smith feared a collision would take place. This might be with one sailing E. by north and the other W. by N., which were within two points of directly opposite courses; but, if the divergency was much greater, it could never have occurred to Smith that they might come together.

Neither vessel being close-hauled, but one so sailing on a port tack, and the other on her starboard tack, what was required of each vessel? If the case is to be considered as within rule 16, applicable to vessels meeting end on or nearly end on, the helms of both should be put to port. The M. M. Chase did nothing but hold her course, so that she clearly violated this rule. The Emma B. Shaw ported her helm; but it is claimed that it was not seasonably done; that she hailed the M. M. Chase, and received no reply, and therefore she should have understood that those on board of the M. M. Chase were not aware of her approach, and that the Emma B. Shaw should have, at once, under rule 24, taken such measures as were necessary to avoid the collision.

It is sufficient answer, in the opinion of the court, that those on board of the Emma B. Shaw must have known that the Chase had a man at the helm whose duty it was to comply with the rules so long established, and that those in charge of the Emma B. Shaw had a right to act on the presumption that these rules would be obeyed. If such had been the case, and the helm of the M. M. Chase had been ported at the same time as the Emma B. Shaw's, both vessels would have passed without contact as, in the short time remaining, the course of the Emma B. Shaw, by this movement, was changed nearly to right angle, as she was struck amidships, nearly head on, by the M. M. Chase.

In this view, the fault was entirely that of the M. M. Chase; and while the Emma B. Shaw was somewhat dilatory in her change of course, it would have been successful, if the other vessel had done the same at the same time.

The answer alleges that the course of the Emma B. Shaw was about west-southwest, which would bring the two vessels end on, and require from the M. M. Chase a compliance with rule 16, as neither vessel was close-hauled. On her own admissions, the M. M. Chase was in fault; and it does not appear that the conduct of the Emma B. Shaw was so in violation of the rules, as to render her accountable for the damages incurred.

It is not yet absolutely decided, so far as the court is advised, that two vessels, approaching in opposite directions on courses diverging two points, are to be governed in their movements by rule 16. See The Manitoba [Case No. 9,029]. Doubts have certainly been suggested, in some cases, that in such position the vessels are not to be deemed as meeting end on, or nearly end on; but rather that they come within rule 17, which requires of two sail vessels, when crossing so as to involve risk of collision, if they have the wind on different sides, that the vessel with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the vessel with the wind on the starboard side; except when the vessel with the wind on the port side is close-hauled and the other vessel free, in which case, the latter vessel should keep out of the way.

Neither being close-hauled, it was the duty of the M. M. Chase, as she was on her port tack, to keep out of the way of the Emma B. Shaw, she being on her starboard tack. The M. M. Chase, it is conceded, did nothing; and the Emma B. Shaw held her course as she was required to do until the collision was imminent. Within a moment of the collision, as Smith says, she then ported her helm, her helmsman having a right to presume that the approaching vessel would do the same, as it would bring her more before the wind and allow her to pass, and in that way "keep out of the way of the other vessel."

If the Emma B. Shaw had pursued a different course and starboarded her helm, and the M. M. Chase had ported hers, then a collision must have been inevitable, and the M. M. Chase might have well been held chargeable for the consequences. On the contrary, she did what it was her duty to do, attempted to get away from the M. M. Chase when it was evident that the two vessels would come together, unless something was done to prevent it, acting on the presumption, that the M. M. Chase would endeavor to accomplish, in the easiest way, the same purpose; this she failed to do. She was, moreover, in fault for want of a proper lookout, who should sooner have discovered the other vessel and notified the man at the helm of her approach, and must be held accountable to the Emma B. Shaw for the damages so occasioned by her neglect. Decree for libelants.

The M. M. HAMILTON.

[1 Hask. 489.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1873.

COLLISION—WIND FREE—FACTS TO BE STATED IN LIBEL—LIGHTS—LOOKOUT.

1. A vessel sailing with the wind free must take proper measures to avoid collision with a vessel close-hauled. The latter must hold her course.

[See The Argus, Case No. 521.]

2. In cases of collision, a libel should narrate the particular facts and circumstances that cause the disaster; and an omission to so allege a material fact is strong evidence of its falsity.

3. A neglect to show lights and have a lookout as required by law prejudice the offending party with courts of admiralty.

In admiralty. Libel in rem in a cause of collision, heard on libel, claim, answer and proofs.

Sewall C. Strout and Bion Bradbury, for libellant.

Thomas B. Reed, for respondents.

FOX, District Judge. This libel is promoted by the master in behalf of himself and the owners of the schooner Addison Gilbert, of Gloucester, against the sloop M. M. Hamilton of Portland, to recover the value of the schooner and her outfits, totally lost in a collision between these two vessels off the entrance of Portsmouth harbor on the morning of the 7th of January, between one and two o'clock. About half past twelve, the schooner left her wharf in Portsmouth, destined for the shore fishery, without any lights. She ran down by Fort Constitution, and after one o'clock, a watch of two men was set, and orders were then given by the master to put up the lights. Lee was ordered on the lookout as he swears, and Boon to the wheel. The master went below. Russell went to the forecastle for the lights, lighted them, had the green light fixed, he says, in its proper place in the starboard rigging, was in the act of climbing into the port rigging with the red light, when he perceived a vessel on their lee bow, standing towards them about fifty yards off. He dropped the red light and ran aft shouting to the vessel, which was the sloop M. M. Hamilton, to keep off; but instead of complying, as he says, she luffed up, and struck them on the port side just forward of the main rigging.

It is admitted that the wind was from northwest to northwest by north, that it was a clear cold night, the moon having set just after midnight, and that the course of the schooner, after she passed Fort Constitution, was nearly south. The lookout Lee says, that when he first saw the sloop she was making a westerly course, but that in a very short time, he again looked, and she was then heading northeast, about two points on the schooner's weather bow; that he did not notice her when she tacked, his attention being attracted by the movements of Russell in putting up the lights, nor did he give any notice to the man at the helm, that the sloop was near by. Boon, who was at the helm, says that he discovered the sloop, she being on the starboard bow, making towards their starboard cathead and standing north-northeast, the schooner standing south; that he at once called the captain from below, who came immediately on deck, without hat or boots, and put the helm to port, which caused the schooner to luff.

The sloop is of 110 tons, was from Boston bound to Portland, loaded with railroad iron, and was making for Portsmouth for a harbor, being badly covered with ice; after she had reached near to Whale Back Island, she stood to the westward, and when about half way across the channel, discovered the schooner nearly up to Fort Constitution without lights, but the mate of sloop, who was then acting as master, the captain not being on board, supposed the schooner was then standing out to sea. The distance from the fort to Whale Back Island is about one mile, and it is about half that distance across from the island to the west shore. The sloop ran out her westerly tack as far as it was deemed prudent, and then stood about on the easterly tack, and laid her course about north-northeast. The mate says, he saw the schooner after the sloop tacked about three points on the sloop's lee bow, and if both vessels had held their course, they would have passed 100 yards apart in safety; that the next he saw was the schooner's bowsprit pass by the sloop's to windward, and thereupon his lookout cried, "hard up," which he did as soon as possible; that the two vessels immediately came together, the sloop not having a headway of more than two knots.

It is not controverted by the libellant that the schooner was sailing with the wind free, and that the sloop was close-hauled, and that by the 12th article of the rules adopted by act of congress in 1864 [13 Stat. 60] it was the schooner's duty to take proper measures to avoid collision, and the sloop was bound to keep her course. It is therefore attempted to establish on the part of the libellant, that the schooner was justified in luffing, and that instead of holding her course the sloop also luffed, and by so doing occasioned the disaster. There is no dispute as to the law of the case, and the only question of fact in controversy is whether the sloop luffed, and upon this there is the usual conflict. All of the crew of the schooner, who were on deck at the time, admit that she luffed, but they assert that the sloop also luffed, which latter assertion is denied by all of the crew of the sloop.

By the 23d admiralty rule of the supreme court of the United States, it is required that the libel shall pronounce and articulate in distinct articles the various allegations of facts upon which the libellant relies in support of his suit, so that the defendant may be enabled to answer distinctly and separately the several matters contained in each article.

In Quinn v. The Transport [Case No. 11,516], an exception was taken to the libel, and the court, Benedict, J., says: "The libellant in a collision case has contented himself with simply stating a bare cause of action, and has omitted the full and frank narrative of the material circumstances attending the accident, which the general practice of the admiralty requires in cases of this description. * * * I am unable to see why the circumstances as thus seen should not be set forth for the information of the court, and to save labor in proving facts about which there may be no dispute, as well in this as in any case. The reason of the rule, which is applied in all ordinary cases of collision, would seem to exist in full force in these triangular cases, in which above all others the need of a full statement of the facts is felt. To make these cases exceptions to the general rule as claimed would be to permit the parties to come to trial without any preliminary statement from either party, which would be of any assistance to the court, or would apprise the parties most in interest of the facts which they are called on to meet."

In the present case at the time and locality of the collision the libel states "that there was a fresh breeze from the northwest," the schooner's course being south; that "the man at the wheel, who was on the lookout," discovered a strange sail about three points on the weather bow of the schooner, approaching in a direction north by east on the wind about 150 yards distant, and southwesterly from the schooner; that immediately the schooner's wheel was put hard to port to bring her up into the wind and allow the approaching vessel to pass to leeward; that the schooner's helm remained in that position until the collision, and that the vessel was the sloop, which struck the schooner forward of the main rigging, cutting her down so that she filled; that after the sloop was first seen by the schooner, it was impossible for the schooner to have done anything more than she did to avoid the collision, the night being clear; that the schooner could have been seen by those on board the sloop at a sufficient distance for her to have avoided the collision if any one had been at the wheel of said sloop, or proper attempt had been made to keep her clear, said sloop being on the wind; that the collision was caused wholly by the negligence and want of care of the sloop.

This is the whole statement contained in the libel relating to the collision and its cause, and it is quite extraordinary that while it does assert that the schooner's helm was put to port, and she came up into the wind, it no where charges that the sloop did any thing of the kind. It is not any where suggested (as the learned counsel frankly admitted in reply to an inquiry from the court) that the sloop luffed or changed her course in any degree; on the contrary, the plain inference from the charge against her as it stands in the libel is, that she did nothing but hold her course, as the allegation is "that the sloop could have avoided the collision, if any one had been at the wheel of the sloop, or proper attempts made to keep her clear." The negligence and fault of the sloop is, that no one was at the wheel to change her course, and instead of her crossing and getting in the way of the schooner, the complaint is, that she took no steps to get out of her way. Her alleged sin is that of omission, instead of commission, as is now attempted to be maintained.

In my opinion, no one acquainted with navigation could possibly gather from this libel, that the cause of complaint was the sloop's luffing; on the contrary, I think it would be understood that the claim was, that the sloop was bound to take measures to keep out of the way of the schooner, as much as the schooner was to keep out of the way of the sloop; that the schooner did her part by luffing, but that the sloop took no measures to accomplish it. The theory on which this libel was drawn, if the libellant had any clear notion on the subject, I think was, that when the vessels came in sight of each other, they were approaching so nearly end on, that it was the duty of the sloop to port and not to hold her course. The averment in the libel, that the schooner was sailing south and the sloop northeast within one point would tend to confirm this view, as under those courses, it may be that each vessel is bound ordinarily to keep out of the other's way; and I apprehend that this idea was not abandoned, until it was found that the direction of the sloop was not such as to render obligatory upon her the duty of changing her course, and then the attempt was made to charge the sloop, as is now claimed.

The libel should contain a narrative of the facts and circumstances attending the collision for the information of the court, as well as of the adverse party. The respondents must be given to understand the facts which they are called upon to answer; and certainly they were not in this libel required to justify the luffing of the sloop at the time of the collision. I consider the entire omission from the libel of any suggestion, that the sloop by luffing occasioned the collision, most cogent and conclusive evidence, that when this libel was drawn by his proctor, and the facts as they occurred here related by the master and stated in the libel as the material circumstances attending the accident, and by which the sloop had become accountable, he must have known that the sloop did not luff; for if she had so manifestly violated the rules of navigation, the libel would have openly explicitly charged her with so doing, as the ground for her liability.

Between these two vessels, I hold the responsibility of avoiding the danger rested upon the schooner. I have no question, if the master when he came on deck, had held his course instead of luffing, the vessels would have passed without injury. The course adopted by the schooner was taken too late to escape the disaster. It contributed to or rather occasioned it; and the sloop is not shown to have been in any way negligent or managed so as to render her accountable.

Before concluding this opinion, the court feels called upon to remark upon the gross negligence on the part of the schooner in not complying with the provisions of law, both as to lights and a competent watch. Her lights were not brought on deck until she was well past the fort, and then only one of them had been in place before the collision. It may be that Pat Lee had been assigned to duty on the lookout forward, although the libel charges, that Boon, who had the helm, was on the lookout; but it is quite certain that Lee was negligent and inefficient, not informing the helmsman that the sloop was near by, although he swears that he saw her on her westerly tack. He paid no regard to her subsequent movements, and did not notice her when she came about, nor until she was close by on her easterly tack, his attention being attracted by the movements of Russell in putting up the lights, instead of watching neighboring vessels. Such neglect to comply with the requirements of law, as to lights and competent lookout, will be visited most severely on the offending party by courts of admiralty in any case where it shall occasion the disaster. Libel dismissed with costs.

Case No. 9,686.

MOAN v. WILMARTH et al.

[3 Woodb. & M. 399.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1847.

ARREST—IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—BENEFIT OF INSOLVENT LAW—PRACTICE IN FEDERAL COURT.

1. If a debtor, after being sued in this court, takes the benefit of the insolvent laws of Massachusetts, he is entitled under the acts of congress, as to imprisonment for debt, to have execution issue against his property alone.

2. The body of private debtors, when they are sued in the courts of the United States, is imprisoned or not, on execution, according to the laws and policy of each state where the execution issues, while that of debtors to the United States is governed by the uniform and fixed laws of congress.

This was assumpsit on a promissory note, running from the defendants [George L. Wilmarth and others], citizens of this state, to the plaintiff [Augustus R. Moan], a citizen of New York. The action was brought February 19, 1846, and the defendants proposed to be defaulted, having since gone into insolvency under the laws of Massachusetts, and were defaulted and then moved the court that in issuing execution, it should go, not against their bodies, but only their estate.

Mr. Eldridge, for plaintiff.

Mr. Morton, for defendants.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The motion in this case is founded on the acts of congress of February 28, 1839, and January 14, 1841 (5 Stat. 321, 410). The first act abolishes imprisonment under process from the courts of the United States in any state where "imprisonment for debt has been abolished," and if in any state imprisonment is allowed under certain restrictions, the same shall be adopted in the courts of the United States. The last act is "supplemental" to the former, and merely declares that the former "shall be so construed as to abolish imprisonment for debt on process issuing out of any court of the United States, in all cases whatever, where by the laws of the state in which the said court shall be held, imprisonment for debt has been and shall hereafter be abolished." There is no difference between these two statutes in respect to the point now raised, except that the first one applied only to imprisonment in states where it had then, viz., in 1839, been abolished, whereas, the second act applies to all states where it had since been abolished up to 1841, or might afterwards be abolished. The plaintiff contends that neither of them was meant to refer to any state where abolition of imprisonment for debt had not been introduced generally or in all cases, whereas in Massachusetts it has been applied only to cases of insolvents who have surrendered all their property under her insolvent system. There, in such cases only, and none others, are they to be discharged "from arrest and imprisonment in any suit or proceeding" for their previous debts. St. 1838, c. 163. But a part of the first act of congress seems studiously provided to reach such a case, as it provides that "where by the laws of the states imprisonment for debt shall be allowed, under certain conditions and restrictions, the same conditions and restrictions shall be applicable to the process issuing out of the courts of the United States." 5 Stat. 321. Now this provision remaining, as it does, unaffected by the last act of congress, the design of this last being only to include states passing laws to abolish imprisonment for debt after 1839, it follows that an abolition of imprisonment, as in Massachusetts, where property has been surrendered, is one of those abolitions under certain "conditions and restrictions," which we are required to conform to, as much as when the abolition is total. The reason for conforming to it also applies quite as strongly in one case as in the other, because the design of congress is to follow the action of the states on this subject, whether partial or general, and in no case to continue to imprison debtors in suits between individuals in any state, unless those states continue to do it, forbearing where they forbear, and to their extent. Congress adopted, as it well might, other and fixed rules as to imprisonment for its own debtors. See cases and acts. But for private debtors, wisely left them to the policy of their own respective states. This is also in analogy to the original adoption of state forms in writs, executions, &c. These are to remain as they were in 1792 in each state, however diverse, unless changed by the supreme court or congress by subsequent provisions. And these in the circuit courts of the United States differed then as the processes differed in different states in the same manner as the abolition of imprisonment. 1 Stat. 275; [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1; Craig's Case [Case No. 3,325]; [Ross v. Duval] 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 45; [Amis v. Smith] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 303. This course accords, too, with the rule of decision under the judiciary act [1 Stat. 73] between private suitors in the courts of the United States, changing in each state, where state legislation changes, and being different in each, if the laws in each differ. See U. S. v. Ames [Case No. 14,441]; Clark v. Sohier [Id. 2,835], and cases there cited.

The great object in all these instances, is to mould the administration of the laws and the effects of it in the courts of the United States, to those in the state courts respectively, except when the constitution or laws of the United States for wise reasons make different provisions in a few special cases. Congress thus allows individuals to have their rights settled on like principles in both courts, but by a tribunal supposed in theory to be more impartial when the action is between a citizen and a nonresident or foreigner, and is brought in the courts of the United States. Bradly v. Currier [Case No. 1,777], Mass. Dist., 1848. By conforming to the laws in each state on all these topics, collision and jealousy are avoided. The conclusion on this question is strengthened by the circumstance that all constructions ought to lean in favor of personal liberty in cases of mere civil indebtedness, where no violence, fraud or crime have been practiced. 1 Tidd, Prac. 546. Finally, the state court of Massachusetts has recently in Bristol county decided that the case of these defendants is one entitled to the privilege of having their bodies exempt from arrest on execution under the state laws, and have thus removed any ground for the idea that in yielding such an exemption here, we do not conform to the state law and its judicial interpretation in its own tribunals, so far as regards the rights of these defendants under them. Let the motion be complied with.

Case No. 9,687.

MOCKBEE et al. v. UPPERMAN et al.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 535.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1839.

TAXATION—TAX TITLE—INFANT'S LAND—RIGHT TO REDEEM.

Infants whose property has been sold for taxes due to the corporation of Washington, have a right to redeem at any time within one year after they have arrived at full age.

Bill in equity by [Eliza Ellen Mockbee and others against Anna Maria Upperman and the heirs of Benjamin B. Myers] to redeem property in Washington sold for taxes, and to cancel the deed made by the corporation of Washington to the purchaser at the tax-sale; or to obtain a reconveyance of the property to the infants. The complainants were the mother and two infant children; who claimed the south half of lot No. 9, in the square No. 293, in Washington, under a deed from James N. Edmonston to the mother in trust for the two children during their joint lives and the life of the survivor of them, with remainder to the mother in fee. The property was assessed in the name of Sarah Edmonston and Benjamin B. Myers; and more than two years' taxes being due thereon, it was advertised as their property and sold in June, 1832, by the collector to the said Benjamin B. Myers, who paid the amount of the taxes due thereon, namely.

($17.78,) but died without obtaining a deed from the mayor of Washington, according to the provisions of the charter; who on the 8th of July, 1834, made a deed to "the heirs of Benjamin B. Myers, deceased," without naming them. By the tenth section of the charter of 1820, it is provided, "that minors, mortgagees, or others having equitable interests in real property, which property shall be sold for taxes as aforesaid, shall be allowed one year after such minors coming to, or being of, full age, or after such mortgagees, and others having equitable interests, obtaining the possession of, or a decree for the sale of, such property, to redeem the property, so sold, from the purchaser or purchasers, his, her, or their assigns, on paying the amount of purchase-money so paid therefor, with ten per cent. interest thereon as aforesaid, and all the taxes that have been paid thereon by the purchaser or his assigns, between the day of sale and the period of such redemption, with ten per cent. interest on the amount of such taxes, and also the full value of the improvements which may have been made or erected on such property by the purchaser or his assigns, while the same was in his or their possession."

One of the children had arrived at full age when the bill was filed, but the year had not elapsed which was allowed for redemption. The other child was still under age.

THE COURT was of opinion that they were in time to redeem, and decreed accordingly.

[2 Paine, 103.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May Term, 1827.

COURTS — FEDERAL JURISDICTION — CITIZENSHIP — JUDICIARY ACT.

1. The 11th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 78] confines the jurisdiction of the circuit courts on the ground of citizenship to cases where the suit is between a citizen of a state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state; and although the constitution gives a broader extent to the judicial power, the actual jurisdiction of the circuit courts is governed by the judiciary act.

[Cited in Wills v. Home Ins. Co., 28 Iowa, 546.]

2. Nor do the subsequent clauses of the 11th section as to the defendant's arrest, &c., enlarge the jurisdiction.

3. Therefore, where a citizen of New York and a citizen of Georgia sued a citizen of Massachusetts, in New York, where he was arrested, it was held, that the court had not jurisdiction.

At law.

On the argument, R. Sedgwick, for plaintiffs, made the following points: I. The act of congress ought, if possible, to be so construed as to confer the whole jurisdiction authorized by the constitution. II. All the clauses of the eleventh section of the judiciary act, taken together, should be so construed as to effect this object. III. The third clause of the act was intended to prevent writs being served in one district and returnable in another. The fourth clause was intended to authorize a trial between citizens of different states, wherever or in whatever district the defendant might be arrested. IV. If such be not the construction of the fourth clause, it means nothing. If such be the construction, it follows that each of the plaintiffs had a right to sue defendant in New York.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The single question in this case is whether this court has jurisdiction of the cause. One of the plaintiffs is alleged to be a citizen of the state of Georgia, and the other a citizen of New York; and the defendant is avowed to be a citizen of Massachusetts, but arrested, of course, in the state of New York.[2] By the constitution of the United States, the judicial power is declared to extend, among other cases, "to controversies between citizens of different states." By the judiciary act of 1789 (eleventh section), jurisdiction is given to the circuit court when the suit is "between a citizen of a state where the suit is brought and a citizen of another state." It will be perceived, therefore, that although by the constitution, the judicial power is declared to extend generally to controversies between citizens of different states, the judiciary act of '89, in parcelling out that jurisdiction, is not so broad as to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, but extends it only to a suit between a citizen of the state where it is brought and a citizen of another state; and the courts of the United States have always considered their jurisdiction governed by the act of congress, although perhaps the constitution would admit of a broader interpretation.

It was decided very early (1806), by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Strawbridge v. Curtis, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 267, that when the plaintiffs or defendants are numerous, or consisting of more than one person each, one must be capable of suing or being sued in the circuit court, in order to give the court jurisdiction; and this has been the uniform doctrine of the court ever since. To test the present case by that rule, each of the plaintiffs was not competent to sue the defendant in this court. The citizen of Georgia could not sue the defendant, who is a citizen of Massachusetts, in this court, because neither party would be a citizen of the state where the suit is brought; and if all the plaintiffs must be capable of suing him, it follows, as matter of course, that one who could not sue him, being united with another who could, will not give this court jurisdiction. But the plaintiff, to sustain the jurisdiction of the court, relies upon the subsequent provision in the same eleventh section of the act, which declares, that no person shall be arrested in one district for trial in another, in any civil action, in any district or circuit court; and no suit shall be brought against an inhabitant of the United States by any original process in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ. This part of the section is certainly not entirely free from obscurity. The general object, undoubtedly, is to guard against a person being arrested in one district and taken into another district for trial, and anything more than this would seem to be no more than affirming what would be the rule of law independent of the statute. But, whatever may be the construction, there is no reason to suppose it was intended to enlarge the jurisdiction of the circuit court as limited by the first branch of the section, and extend it to cases where neither party was a citizen of the state where the suit is brought. This would be repugnant to the express terms of the first part of the section, and would, in effect, be by implication repealing by subsequent words in the section, the positive and express antecedent provision, which would be a violation of every sound rule of interpreting statutes. We are, accordingly, of opinion that this court has not jurisdiction of the cause, and that judgment must be entered for the defendant.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

[2] The act of congress of September 24, 1789, provides that the circuit courts of the United States shall have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum of five hundred dollars: 1. When the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners: 2. When an alien is a party: 3. When the suit is between a citizen of the state where the suit is brought, and a citizen of another state.

NOTE. The right of exclusive legislation or jurisdiction within the limits of any of the states, can be acquired by the United States only by purchase of territory from the states, for the purpose and in the mode prescribed by the constitution of the United States. People v. Godfrey, 17 Johns. 225. A state court has no jurisdiction of criminal offences against the United States, nor of the penal laws of the United States; nor can such jurisdiction be conferred by act of congress. U. S. v. Lathrop, Id. 4. Therefore, an action for a penalty incurred for selling spirituous liquors without a license, contrary to the act of congress of August 2, 1813 (Cong. 13, Sess. 1, c. 38 [3 Stat. 72, c. 39]), cannot be brought into the supreme court of this state. Id. The act of congress of the 17th of April, 1800 (volume 5 [Smith's Ed.] 88 [2 Stat. 37]), declares, that whenever any patent right shall be infringed, the party offending shall forfeit a sum equal to three times the actual damages sustained, "which sum shall be recovered by action on the case, founded on the act, &c., in the circuit court of the United States, having jurisdiction thereof." Parsons v. Barnard, 7 Johns. 144. The act of congress of 21st February, 1793 (volume 2 [Folwell's Ed.] 203 [1 Stat. 318]). also declares, that, in certain cases, when judgment shall be rendered for the defendant, the patent shall be declared void. Id. As the judicial power of the United States extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the laws of the United States, and as the act of congress, on the subject of patent rights, has declared that the suit for the infringement of them shall be brought in the circuit court of the United States, and gives the court power, in such cases, to declare the patent void, the state courts have, of course, no jurisdiction in the cases; and judgment must be rendered for the defendant. Id. The supreme court of the United States has not exclusive jurisdiction of a suit brought by a state against the citizen of another state; but such suit may be prosecuted in a state court. Delafield v. State, 2 Hill, 159. It may be questioned, it seems, whether the federal courts have any jurisdiction whatever of suits prosecuted by a state, except in the single instance where the parties on both sides are states. Id. The constitution of the United States has not, by its own force, divested the state courts of any of their former jurisdiction. Id. A mere grant of jurisdiction to a particular court, without words of exclusion as to other courts previously possessing the like powers will only have the effect of constituting the former a court of concurrent jurisdiction with the latter. Id. It seems, where the supreme court of the United States has original, it cannot exercise appellate jurisdiction, unless the circumstances be such that jurisdiction depends on the nature of the cause as well as the character of the party. Id. An attachment against a non-resident debtor is a suit within the meaning of the judiciary act of the United States, giving exclusive jurisdiction of all suits against consuls to the district court of the United States. In re Aycinena, 1 Sandf. 690. An affidavit or suggestion, if uncontradicted, is sufficient for the officer issuing such attachment, to discharge the same, and without costs. Id. The majority of the court, although they refused the allowance of a habeas corpus to bring up a soldier of the United States, thought it necessary to disclaim having jurisdiction, in any case, where the imprisonment or restraint was under color of the authority of the United States. In re Ferguson, 9 Johns. 239. Thompson, J., observed, "The Case of Roberts [2 Hall, Law J. 192], referred to by the chief justice, seems to be the only one where this question has received a judicial decision; and although in that case, the habeas corpus was denied, yet Nicholson, C. J., said there might be cases in which it would be the duty of the state courts to interfere. The immediate object of the habeas corpus is to liberate the party from an illegal restraint. The allowance of it does not necessarily draw after it an inquiry into any offence, committed either by the party imprisoned, or by him who assumes the right of restraint." Id. He added also: The state courts must have the power, in many cases, to determine upon the extent and operation of the laws of congress. As in the case now before us, if a civil suit should be brought for false imprisonment, the legality of the enlistment, under the act of congress, would probably be involved, and must be determined collaterally. And this is the only inquiry upon the habeas corpus. Id. The objections, however, stated by the chief justice, against the jurisdiction of this court, are entitled to great consideration, and as the allowance of the writ, in term time, rests in sound legal discretion, and as the party may have relief by application to one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States, or of the district court for this district, whose jurisdiction in the case is unquestionable, I think the application ought to be denied. Id. Consent will take away error, but neither that nor confession will give jurisdiction. Coffin v. Tracy, 3 Caines, 129. And this applies to consent in creating a tribunal as well as to consent in submitting a matter to a subsisting tribunal, which the law has excluded from its cognizance. Germond v. People, 1 Hill, 343. The circuit court of the United States is a court of general jurisdiction: the only limitation is as to the parties who can litigate there; but when a cause is depending in that court it is to be presumed to be regularly there. If necessary, however, to show jurisdiction, an averment that the parties are citizens of the separate states, obviates the objection. Griswold v. Sedgwick, 1 Wend. 126. Bonds given for duties to the United States, may be sued in the state courts, which have concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of the United States, of all suits at common law, where the United States are plaintiffs. U. S. v. Dodge, 14 Johns. 95.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 658.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1840.

EXECUTORS — LEGACY OVERPAID — REMEDY — DEVISES — CHILDREN — WHEN IN ESSE — LAPSED LEGACY — PER STIRPES — ABSENCE FOR OVER SEVEN YEARS.

1. If the executors, inadvertently, pay to some of the legatees more than their shares of the residuum, and to others of the legatees less than their shares, and the estate is not sufficient to make good the deficiency, the executors must suffer the loss, or look for reimbursement to the legatees who have been over-paid.

2. If property be devised to the children of A. B. to be divided among them, when they arrive at the age of maturity, the established rule of construction is, that all the children then living, (that is, when the eldest shall have arrived at the age of twenty-one,) shall come in for their share, whether born before or after the death of the testator.

3. The shares of those who have died in the mean time, will have lapsed into the general residuum, to be divided among the survivors; and the children born in the mean time, become entitled to their equal shares with the other children.

4. If one die after the eldest arrived at the age of twenty-one and before actual distribution, his share goes to his next of kin, and does not lapse into the residuum.

5. A person who has not been heard of for more than seven years, will be presumed to have died at the end of the seven years.

6. When the devise is directly to the children of the testator's brother and sister, the devisees take per capita, and not per stirpes.

Bill in equity by some of the legatees of Joseph Varden, against the executors and the other legatees. The bill was filed on the 30th of November, 1836, and charges, 1. That Joseph Varden, after bequeathing $1,000 to Bishop Neale, in his will made on the 7th, and proved on the 9th of October, 1809, says, "Item, I leave all my other property, both real and personal, to be equally divided among the children of my brother, Richard Varden, and my sister, Henrietta Mickum, when they arrive at the age of maturity, that is, twenty-one years old; and I hereby appoint Mr. William Brent and Daniel Brent, of Washington city, executors of this my last will and testament, to see the same carried into effect." 2. That Richard Varden, at the death of the testator, had four children, namely, the complainant, Elizabeth Moffit, widow of Robert Moffit, and the complainant, Matilda Ann Moffit, wife of the complainant, John Moffit; John Varden who had been absent the last six years, and had not been heard from; and Joseph Varden, a minor, about nineteen years old (at the filing of the bill); and Richard Varden, "born after the death of the testator." That the testator's sister, Henrietta, at the time of his death had two sons, Samuel Mickum, and William Mickum. 3. That the executors took possession of the whole estate, real and personal, rents, issues, and profits, and have from time to time paid various sums of money for the support and maintenance and education of the devisees, but the fair proportion to which the complainants are entitled has not been paid to them. 4. That the complainants, and several of the other devisees, are of full age, and entitled to demand and receive their respective shares. 5. They pray for an account, &c., and that the real estate may be sold by a trustee, &c. Richard Varden, the infant, answers by guardian that he has been informed and believes, that he was born about three weeks after the death of the testator, and insists upon his right to a share of his uncle's estate under the will. Joseph Varden, on the 4th of December, 1828, being of full age, answered, and consented to the sale of the real estate, and admits the facts stated in the bill, and that his brother Richard is entitled to an equal share of the estate. He states that his brother John went to sea, more than eight years ago, and has not since been heard of. Samuel Mickum answers for himself, and as trustee of Wm. P. Mickum, and admits the facts stated in the bill, in relation to the families of Richard Varden and Henrietta Mickum. He states that he has received less than his share, but is opposed to the sale of the real estate, at this time, (1829,) because it would not then sell for its value. He denies the right of Richard Varden, to any share of the estate, not being in esse at the death of the testator, but born perhaps five or six months afterwards. He states that John Varden left Alexandria, as a sailor, on a foreign voyage, in November, 1819, and has never since been heard of except in the early part of 1820, by the master of the vessel in which he sailed, who reported that John had left him in the port to which they were bound. That if John died under age, this defendant claims a proportion of the share which would have fallen to him. That as trustee for Wm. P. Mickum under the insolvent law, he claims his share of the estate. The executors, (June 7, 1828,) answer, and admit the facts concerning the family of Varden stated in the bill, and that they took possession of the real and personal estate, as executors and trustees under the will, from which they have realized a considerable sum of money, all of which, and more, they have expended in the support and education of the devisees, in keeping the houses in repair, and in the payment of debts, and the legacy of $1,000 to the bishop; and they refer to their accounts settled in the orphans' court, and exhibit an abstract of payments made by them for the benefit of the devisees, (Exhibit A) amounting to more than $8,000. They say they have no objection to the sale of the real estate, and pray to be reimbursed out of the proceeds thereof, whatever may be found due to them for their advances. On the 16th of January, 1830, the usual notice to absent defendants having been published, as to John Varden, the bill was taken for confessed against him, and the papers in the cause were referred to the auditor, to audit and state the account of the executors, and report the sums paid by them to the devisees respectively. On the 8th of January, 1833, the auditor reported a balance due to the executors of $637.52. That the whole amount advanced by them to the devisees was $8,044.90; the equal proportion of which to each of the seven devisees, including John and Richard Varden, is $1,149.27¼. That the following devisees have received more than their respective proportions, the sums annexed to their names, namely: Joseph Varden, $158.47½; Richard Varden, $301.10½; William P. Mickum, $463.54½,—$923.12½. And that the following have received less than their respective proportions, namely: John Varden, $318.41; Elizabeth Moffit, $453.71¾; Matilda Moffit, $92.64¾; Samuel Mickum, $58.34½,—$923.12. The auditor suggests, in his report, that the sum of $923.12, which has been overpaid to some of the devisees, and the sum of $637.52, advanced by the executors, should be paid out of the sales of the land. The auditor states the objection, made by Samuel Mickum, to the claim of Richard Varden to a share of the estate, and suggests that John Varden may now be considered as dead, and that his share should go to his brothers and sisters, as his next of kin; and should not, as a lapsed legacy, fall into the residuum devised to all the children of the testator's brother and sister. On the 28th of March, 1833, the cause was set for hearing, by consent, upon the bill, answers, exhibits, replication, auditor's report, and other proceedings, and the same having been heard, the court, on the 29th of March, 1833, decreed a sale of the real estate mentioned in the bill. On the 27th of January, 1837, the trustee reported the sales made in 1833 and 1836, amounting to $721.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The cause is now submitted for final decree. No exception is taken to the balance of $637.52, reported by the auditor, as due to the executors for advances made by them to the devisees; nor to the principle assumed by the auditor, that those who have received less than their share of those advances should be compensated out of the proceeds of the sales of the land; and that the balance due to the executors should be reimbursed out of the same proceeds, if they should be sufficient to pay both; that is, to put those, who have received less than their share of the advances, upon a par with those who have received more than their share, and also to pay the balance due to the executors. It appears by the report that it will require $923.12, to put all the devisees upon a par as to the advances made by the executors, which, added to the balance of $637.52, due to the executors, makes the sum of $1,560.64, to be raised by sales of the land, to do justice to all parties. But the sales produced only $721; and the question is, how is that money to be applied. Shall the executors receive it and apply it to the settlement of the balance due to them, and leave the deficient devisees to get their money from those who have received more than their shares; or shall those deficient receive it and compel the executors to resort to the devisees who have been overpaid? If those deficient devisees should sue the executors for the balance of their legacies, or proportion of the sales of the real estate, would it be a good defence for the executors to say that they had overpaid the other devisees? If the deficient devisees should bring a suit against the other devisees to compel them to refund the surplus which they have received, could they recover? Have not the executors made these advances and over-payments in their own wrong? And should they not have taken security to refund? I am inclined to think that the proceeds of the sales of the land should be applied to the equalization of the devisees; and that the executors must look to those devisees who have been overpaid to get back their money. Then, if the proceeds of the sales of the lands are to be divided among the devisees, it becomes necessary to ascertain who they are; and this presents the question, whether Richard Varden, who was born after the death of the testator, was entitled to an equal share with the other children. I am of opinion that he was. He was in ventre sa mere, at the death of the testator; and if the devise had been to all the children living at the testator's death, he would have been a legal devisee. See Clarke v. Blake, 2 Ves. Jr. 673; 3 Brown, Ch. 320, 2 H. Bl. 379; and the cases collected in 8 Com. Dig. Append. 425, 426, 1 Am. Ed. by Day, § 5. But by this will the property is to be equally divided among the children "when they arrive at the age of maturity." In such case the legacies do not vest in possession until the eldest of the children arrives at the age of maturity; that is, twenty-one years of age; and in such cases the established rule of construction is, that all the children then living, (that is, when the eldest shall have arrived at the age of maturity,) shall come in for their share, whether born before or after the death of the testator. See Barrington v. Tristram, 6 Ves. 345, and the cases in 8 Com. Dig. 425, 426; Titcomb v. Butler, 3 Sim. 417; and Balm v. Balm, Id. 492.

The reason of this rule is, that when one of the legatees becomes entitled to receive his share, it is necessary to ascertain the whole number of legatees among whom the estate is to be divided. The shares of those who have died in the mean time, will, I apprehend, have lapsed into the general residuum, to be divided among the survivors; and the children born in the mean time become entitled to their equal shares with the other children. The time when the eldest of the children arrived at the age of maturity is not ascertained in these proceedings, nor the precise time of the birth of Richard Varden. He states, in his answer, that he has been informed and believes that he was born about three weeks after the death of the testator, who died on the day of the date of the will, or on the next day; for the will was made on the 7th and was proved on the 10th of October, 1809; so that unless one of the legatees came of age within three weeks after the death of the testator, Richard was entitled to his share. The time of the death of John is not ascertained. If he died before the eldest of the children came of age, his share lapsed into the residuum. If he died after, his share vested in him, and goes to his next of kin, in equal degree. He went to sea in 1819, and had not been heard of since the beginning of the year 1820. In analogy to the statute of bigamy, the presumption of death arises if seven years have elapsed since the party has been heard of; so that it may be presumed that he died in the beginning of the year 1827. The bill in this case was filed November 30, 1826, and states that the complainants, and several of the other legatees, were then of full age; so that there is a strong presumption that John's legacy vested before his death; and that it should go to his next of kin, namely, his brothers and sisters. The devise in this case, being directly to the children of the testator's brother and sister, the devisees take per capita, and not per stirpes; and each is entitled to an equal share.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, concurred in the result of this opinion, but thought the legacies vested in possession in the legatees at the death of the testator, and not when the eldest child came of age. THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent.

Case No. 9,690.

MOFFITT v. GAAR et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 610; 1 Bond, 315; 7 Pittsb. Leg. J. 346.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April, 1860.[2]

PATENTS — HOW RIGHTS ACQUIRED — SURRENDER FOR REISSUE—INFRINGEMENT BEFORE REISSUE.

1. An inventor has no legal rights or immunities under a patent, except such as are conferred by the statute. With whatever solemnity or observance of legal form it may have issued, if wanting in any substantial statutory requisite, it is a nullity.

2. The surrender of a patent for reissue is equivalent to a distinct admission made in the most solemn form, that the patent has no validity in the sense of entitling the patentee to an action for its infringement.

[Cited in Brown v. Hinkley, Case No. 2,012; Burrell v. Hackley, 35 Fed. 834.]

3. The statute gives no right of action for an infringement occurring under the original and void patent, and before the reissue of the new patent.

Letters patent of the United States were granted to John R. Moffitt November 30, 1852 [No. 9,432], for an "improvement in grain separators." This patent was surrendered and reissued to him March 23, 1858 [No. 540]. Suit was brought against the defendants [Abraham Gaar, John M. Gaar, and William G. Scott], March 22, 1859, to recover damages for the infringement of the reissued patent. After the bringing of the suit, and before the rule day for plea, the plaintiff surrendered his patent for the purpose of obtaining a second reissue. Thereupon the defendants set up, by way of plea, "that since the commencement of this action, and before the 17th day of May, 1859, to-wit: on the —— day of ——, the said John R. Moffitt surrendered to the United States the patent before that time issued to him, and for the alleged infringement of which this suit is brought, and this he is ready to verify," etc. This plea was filed October 25, 1859. To this the plaintiff demurred, claiming: first, that a plea of surrender only, was not sufficient, that it did not appear that the patent was surrendered for reissue or for any cause that rendered it void: and, second, that the reissue of a patent did not necessarily admit the invalidity of the original, and that suits upon such original, pending at the time of the surrender, might be maintained.

G. M. Lee and S. S. Fisher, for plaintiff.

N. C. McLean and H. Stanbery, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This suit is brought for an alleged infringement of the exclusive right of the plaintiff to an improvement in grain separators, or threshing machines, secured to him by patent. The declaration avers that a patent issued to the plaintiff on November 30, 1852, which was afterward surrendered by him, and reissued on March 23, 1858. The infringement alleged is, that subsequently to the reissue of the patent, the defendants constructed a large number of the separators, or machines, on the improved plan of the plaintiff's improvement, and in violation of his right.

[1] [Reported by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq.; reprinted in 1 Bond, 315; and here republished by permission.]

The defendants, in their plea, set up as an answer to the plainiiff's claim, that since the commencement of this action he has again surrendered his patent to the United States. To this plea the plaintiff has filed a general demurrer; and the question which it presents is, whether an action can be maintained for an infringement of a patent which has been surrendered under a provision of the statute authorizing that procedure.

In the argument of the demurrer, no case was referred to in which the perecise point before the court has been judicially determined. It is believed there is no such reported case, and we are left, therefore, without the light of any direct authority bearing upon it.

The inquiry is not, whether a surrendered patent is for all purposes to be regarded as a nullity, but whether the patentee has a remedy for its infringement. The thirteenth section of the patent act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 122], provides, "That whenever any patent which has heretofore been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall be inoperative or invalid, by reason of a defective or insufficient description, or by reason of the patentee claiming in his specification as his own invention, more than he had a right to claim as new, if the error has or shall have arisen by inadvertency, accident or mistake, and without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, it shall be lawful for the commissioner, upon the surrender to him of such patent, and the payment of the further duty of fifteen dollars, to cause a new patent to be issued to the said inventor for the same invention, for the residue of the period then unexpired, for which the original patent was granted, in accordance with the patentee's corrected description and specification."

It is also provided in the same section, "that the patent so reissued, together with the corrected description and specification, shall have the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions hereafter commenced for causes subsequently accruing, as though the same had been originally filed in such corrected form before the issuing of the original patent."

It is an undoubted truth, that an inventor has no legal rights or immunities under a patent, except such as are conferred by the statute. With whatever solemnity or observance of legal form it may have issued, if wanting in any substantial statutory requisite it is a nullity. And such defect is always available as a defense in a suit for an infringement. By the sixth section of the act just referred to, every inventor, before he is entitled to a patent, is required to describe his invention or improvement "in such full, clear and exact terms," that its precise character, and the manner of its use and application, may be known. And where the invention consists in an improvement, or new and useful application of something before known, he must carefully distinguish between what is old, and what he claims as his invention. And it is every day's practice in judicial trials, to declare patents void for a failure to comply with statutory requirements.

In the liberal and benignant spirit in which our patent system has been conceived and carried out, the thirteenth section of the act of 1836, gives to the patentee a right to correct his description or specification, when its imperfection has resulted from inadvertency, accident, or mistake. This is effected by a surrender of his patent, and obtaining a new patent upon an amended specification. By this means he is protected from some of the effects of his error, and secured in the enjoyment of all his rights as an inventor, after the emanation of the new or corrected patent. But the statute gives no right of action for an infringement occurring under the void patent, and before the reissue of the new patent. In the present case, the grounds on which the old patent was surrendered, and a reissue authorized, are not before the court. But the court must presume that they were such as, by the language of the thirteenth section, authorized the surrender of the old patent, and the granting of a new one. The only condition on which this can be done, is that the original patent is "inoperative or invalid" by reason of a failure to comply with the requirements of the statute. The proceeding is, therefore, equivalent to a distinct admission made in the most solemn form, that the patent has no validity in the sense of entitling the patentee to an action for its infringement. The new patent can be operative only from its date, as affording the patentee a remedy for an infringement. The statute expressly negatives the idea that it was intended to give a retrospective operation to the new patent, and entitle the patentee to an action for an infringement previously accruing. It was, doubtless, competent for the legislature to have declared that the new patent should have this effect, but the language used imports the opposite intention. The statute provides, in express terms, that the reissued patent "shall have the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions hereafter commenced for causes subsequently accruing, as though the same had been originally filed in such corrected form, before the issuing of the original patent." Now, the allegation of the plea in this case is, that after the cause of action accrued, and after the commencement of this action the plaintiff surrendered his patent. The demurrer admits the truth of this averment. The claim of the plaintiff, then, is based on infringement occurring under the old patent, and not for a cause of action accruing after the date of the reissued patent. Clearly the statute affords no remedy for such an infringement. Any other construction of the statute would result in the absurdity of conferring on the patentee, as the result of the surrender of what he admits to be an invalid patent, rights and immunities which he could not claim without such surrender. In other words, the legal effect of the reissued patent would be to give force and vitality to the original patent, in the face of the admission of the patentee that it was inoperative and invalid. This may be illustrated by supposing that the patentee had made no surrender, but had chosen to rest his rights on the original patent. Is it not clear, that there could have been no recovery in that case for an infringement? The patentee would have been met with the unanswerable objection, that the patent was invalid, from a fatal omission to comply with the requisition of the statute. And there can be no pretense for claiming, that by the surrender of the old patent, and the emanation of a second one, the patentee, as to infringements occurring under the original patent, is placed in a better situation, than if there had been no surrender and reissue.

In any aspect of this question, we are clearly of the opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover, and that the demurrer to the plea must be overruled.

Case No. 9,691.

MOFFITT v. ROGERS et al.

[4 Ban. & A. 225.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1879.[2]

PATENTS—MACHINE FOR FORMING SHOE COUNTERS—PATENTABILITY.

1. The invention patented to the complainant, May 21st, 1872, numbered 127,090, for forming heel stiffeners or counters, by means of two rollers, is not infringed by a machine, for similar purposes, patented to Louis Coté, which operates with one roller working in a stationary mould.

2. The question of the patentability of defendant's invention, as affected by the practicability of his machine when compared with the complainant's, considered.

[This was a bill in equity by John R. Moffitt against Samuel B. Rogers, Stephen Moore, and Homer Rogers, for the infringement of reissued letters patent No. 6,162, granted to complainant December 8, 1874, the original letters patent No. 127,090 having been granted May 21, 1872.]

E. F. Hodges and J. E. Maynadier, for complainant.

Chauncey Smith and T. L. Wakefield, for defendants.

LOWELL, Circuit Judge. The complainant obtained a patent in 1872, for an improvement in heel stiffeners or counters for boots and shoes. In his specification he describes a roller, shaped like the heel of a boot or shoe, set on a swing frame, and having a reciprocating or continuous rotary motion. This roller he calls a "former," and beneath it he places a roller having a profile the converse of, and conforming to, that of the "former." The mode of making a counter, as described, is, to place a piece of leather of suitable size and shape (usually called in the record a counter blank) centrally upon the "former," which is then brought down by a treadle, and the leather is rubbed or rolled, between the upper and lower rollers, as long as may be necessary to give it the shape of a counter. Two additional or auxiliary rollers are shown in one of the drawings, and are mentioned in the specification.

The defendants work under a patent granted to one Coté in 1874, in which a machine is described consisting of a spherical or spheroidal roller or head, rotating concentrically upon a shaft, in combination with a stationary mould, made concave in conformity with the head; the patent says that the head may be grooved to facilitate its grasp of the leather. The leather is drawn through, between the head and the mould, by the revolution of the head.

The Coté machine turns out counters of a spherical contour; but they are found to be useful, though they require to be brought to the exact shape of a heel by another operation. This machine has gone into use, and has proved of great advantage to the manufacturers, and the question to be decided is, which of the parties really invented the Coté machine?

The plaintiff is right, I think, in his contention that the Coté machine makes counters by rolling and rubbing, and not by moulding, and, therefore, the machine, as described, have a similar mode of operation. But the defendants insist that the Moffitt machine was not a practical working device, and would never have developed the utility of Coté's machine, and that the latter is not a mere modification or improvement of Moffitt's, but the first actual operative invention. There is no doubt that Moffitt had the idea of a machine to make counters by rolling and rubbing, as distinguished from moulding. He described a machine which he supposed would accomplish this result, but had not, at that time, proved it by experiment. About the time that Coté's patent came out, Moffitt made experiments, and built machines. It seems probable that Coté intended and expected to avoid the Moffitt patent, and that Moffitt intended and expected, by his reissue, to cover the Coté machine. And the question is, which has succeeded?

[2] [Affirmed in 106 U. S. 423, 1 Sup. Ct. 70.]

Upon the evidence, I find the real meritorious invention was Coté's. The plaintiff had the idea, but had not reduced it to practice so as to be able to describe a machine, which any person skilled in the art might construct, and make satisfactory counters. It is true, that if, instead of the roller or rollers of Moffitt, you make a stationary mould, so called, though it does not operate like a mould, corresponding to the forming roller, and if you crease or roughen the roller so that it will pull the leather through this stationary mould, you have the Coté machine, which is a very powerful and thoroughly working device; but it seems to require something more than ordinary mechanical skill to pass from one to the other, and without some such changes, the rollers of Moffitt will not make merchantable counters, as a practical every-day business, in a machine such as he describes. From this point of view the difference between a heel-shaped roller and a spherical one, though apparently slight, is not unimportant. The attempt of Moffitt was to make a perfect counter by one operation. A heel-shaped roller would do this, if it did anything satisfactorily; while a spherical roller makes an unfinished counter, which, to be sure, turns out to be of practical utility, because it works so rapidly and efficiently that the artisan can afford to apply another machine or operation to bring it to exact shape. The perfect counter has not yet been made, practically, by one operation. The counter which is nearly made is Coté's.

Finding these facts to be so, I must either construe the claims of the plaintiff's reissued patent to include only a machine with rollers, or hold them void as claiming more than he has described. Either way the defendants must prevail.

Bill dismissed with costs.

TUG AND TOW—CHOICE OF COURSES—NEGLIGENCE.

Where several courses are open to the master of a tug-boat in an emergency, and damage results to a boat in tow from the course which he chooses to adopt: Held, that, to warrant an action against the tug, for negligence in taking such course, clear proof must be given that the course taken was manifestly the most dangerous.

[Cited in The James P. Donaldson, 19 Fed. 266; The Allie & Evie, 24 Fed. 749; The Wilhelm, 47 Fed. 93; The Battler, 62 Fed. 614.]

In admiralty.

R. H. Huntley, for libellant.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The tow-boat Mohawk, while engaged in taking a tow of eleven canal-boats from Port Johnson to the East river, after turning the buoy at Robbins' Reef, encountered a wind which raised so heavy a sea as to make it unsafe to attempt to continue her course across the bay against the tide, and she thereupon bore away for the shelter of the breakwater at Gowanus. As the tow was about turning the end of the breakwater, and before reaching still water, some of the canal-boats sunk, and among them, one loaded with coal belonging to the libellant, who now brings this action to recover its value from the tow-boat. The negligence charged is that the tow-boat had taken too large a tow, and, because of insufficient power to do otherwise, took a course for Gowanus, whereby she improperly imperiled the canal-boats and caused the loss of the libellants' coal.

Upon the proofs, I am of the opinion that the wind and sea which this tow encountered was no more than might reasonably be anticipated at this season of the year, in the locality in question. I am further of the opinion that the obligation is upon owners of tow-boats, towing in this locality, to limit the size of their tows to the capacity of the boats to move the tows with reasonable dispatch to the safest shelter at hand, in case of meeting a wind too heavy to permit the tow to keep on across the bay against the wind.

For a tow situated as this one was, several courses are open. She may turn back into the Kills, or go down to Quarantine, or keep up along the Jersey shore, or bear away before the wind for Gowanus breakwater. The latter course was selected by the Mohawk. It is made evident by the proofs that, with a tow of eleven boats, no other course was possible for her, owing to her inability to move such a tow against the wind and tide. But it is not shown by a clear preponderance of evidence that any of the other courses above indicated as open for a boat so situated involved less danger to the tow than the one selected by this boat.

Upon the evidence produced in this cause, I am unable to decide that the course which this boat pursued is not as safe a proceeding as either of the others.

The master of a tow situated like the present should not be held guilty of negligence in selecting one of several courses open in such an emergency, unless it be made to appear, by a clear preponderance of evidence, that he selected a course manifestly more dangerous than the others. In the absence of a clear weight of evidence to that effect, I must hold that the negligence charged has not been proved against the tow-boat, and the libel must be dismissed.

This decision was affirmed by the circuit court on appeal; [case unreported.]

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF SPECIAL AUTHORITY—WHERE ESTABLISHED.

Case No. 9,695.

MOHR et al. v. MANIERRE.

[7 Biss. 419;[1] 9 Chi. Leg. News, 270.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. April 4, 1877.[2]

REAL PROPERTY—SALE OF LUNATIC'S ESTATE—CONFLICT OF LAWS—COLLATERAL ENQUIRY.

1. In Wisconsin, where a proper case is made in a petition to the county court, for a license to sell the estate of a lunatic, the power of the court is set in motion and it has jurisdiction of the case; and the fact that the court had decided erroneously as to notice, etc., cannot collaterally affect the rights of a bona fide purchaser under the sale decreed by the court.

2. As to general principles of law the federal court has the right to follow its own views, and is not bound by the decisions of the state courts. [Cited in Marshall v. Wabash R. Co., 46 Fed. 271.]

3. Where the jurisdiction of a court of special authority appears upon the record, its action and decision can no more be collaterally inquired into than can the action and decision of a court that has authority over all questions and controversies.

Ejectment for the recovery of about thirteen acres of land on the borders of Lake Geneva, in Walworth county. The land belonged to Mathias Mohr, against whom a commission of lunacy was obtained, and a guardian having been appointed under the laws of this state, application was made to the county court of Walworth county, for the sale of the land, for the support of the lunatic or to pay his debts. A sale was accordingly made of this and other tracts of land, and the defendant [Anna Manierre] claims under the sale. The plaintiff Mohr, having recovered his reason, and the commission of lunacy being revoked, and he having in the meantime transferred an undivided interest in the property to Mr. Cotzhausen, brought this action of ejectment, on the assumption that the proceedings in the county court of Walworth county, which resulted in a sale of the land, were illegal, and that no title passed.

Cotzhausen, Sylvester & Scheiber, for plaintiffs.

S. U. Pinney, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. Of course the question turns upon the validity of the sale made by the guardian of the lunatic. If that were invalid, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The petition which asked for the action of the court, was not strictly in compliance with the statute, the allegations not being so full as the statute seemed to require; and perhaps there might be some doubt, if it were a new question, whether or not the allegations of the petition were sufficient. But the decisions, both state and federal, seem to agree that a petition such as was filed in this case was sufficient to set the court in action; in other words, to show that the court was called upon to proceed in the way pointed out in the statute to obtain the necessary means from the sale of the land for the payment of debts or the support of the lunatic. And as to this very petition, in a case that went up to the supreme court of the state upon a sale of a portion of the property which took place at the same time as that under which the defendant claims, that court says: "The petition may be defective in some particulars, but it is sufficient in substance to call into exercise the power of the court." Mohr v. Tulip, 40 Wis. 76. It was, therefore, so far as the petition is concerned, sufficient to give jurisdiction to the court. This is the effect, also, of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, in two cases that went up from this state. Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 319; and Comstock v. Crawford, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 396. And although they were cases decided under the territorial laws, the principles involved were substantially the same. And in those cases, the supreme court of the United States held, that it was the petition that gave jurisdiction to the court, and set its machinery in motion, and that, if upon the face of the petition it appears that the objects which the law had in view in such cases were clearly set forth, that was sufficient. So there is a concurrence of opinion both in the federal and in the state courts that the petition was sufficient. The law of Wisconsin applies substantially the same conditions to the sale of the real estate of lunatics, as to decedents.

[2] [Affirmed in 101 U. S. 417.]

We come to another question, where there is a difference of opinion between the federal and state courts, upon this point; the statute required a certain notice to be given of the time and place for hearing the petition, and it seems the requisite notice was not given. The state court holds that was in the nature of process to bring the parties before the court, and was jurisdictional; that unless the notice which was required by the statute was given, the court had no jurisdiction to act, and therefore, all proceedings before it were void. The supreme court of the United States takes a different view, and holds in the cases referred to, that the proceeding to sell real estate in such circumstances, is one in rem and that there are no adversary parties. The manner in which the precedent was established in this state, as I understand, was this: A case was decided by a circuit judge, (it being understood that the case would go to the supreme court of the state,) in a somewhat informal manner. A similar point in principle arose in that case, and it was held that the adjudication of the probate court did not foreclose the party in a collateral proceeding. That case went to the supreme court of this state. Sitzman v. Pacquette, 13 Wis. 292.

The circuit judge, having in the meantime become one of the judges of the supreme court, did not sit in the case, and it was submitted to two judges. The judges differed in opinion on the case, and so the judgment of the court below stood affirmed; and this has been the foundation of a rule, which we must consider as established in the supreme court of the state, that it is a question of jurisdiction—namely: whether proper notice had been given for the hearing; because, in accordance with the principle decided in the first case, they have proceeded in other cases referred to in Mohr v. Tulip, 40 Wis. 66; in the last case though, Salter v. Hilgen, Id. 363, the court cites with approval, the language of Dixon, C. J., in Tallman v. McCarty, 11 Wis. 401, as follows; "No order which a court is empowered, under any circumstances, in the course of a proceeding over which it has jurisdiction to make, can be treated as a nullity, merely because it was made improvidently, or in a manner not warranted by law or the previous state of the case. The only question in such a case is, had the court or tribunal the power, under any circumstances, to make the order or perform the act? If this be answered in the affirmative, then its decision upon those circumstances becomes final and conclusive, until reversed by a direct proceeding for that purpose. In the case before us, it was for the circuit court to determine, in the first instance, when and how the authority, with which it was invested to direct a sale, should be exercised; and if, in so doing, it committed an error, no matter how egregious, whether in the construction of the statute, or otherwise, still the order was valid until reversed on appeal. It was a mere error or irregularity which could only be taken advantage of by appeal, but cannot be inquired into in this proceeding."

This is in harmony with the ruling of the supreme court of the United States in the two cases referred to. In the original case of Sitzman v. Pacquette, supra, where an opinion was given by Judge Paine, that the decision of the court below was correct, he seemed disinclined to follow the rule of the supreme court of the United States in Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, supra, and held it should not apply to that case. Judge Cole gave an opinion to the effect that the decision in Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, ought to rule that case. It is difficult to understand that there is any difference in principle to affect the validity of the sale in the two cases.

I think that the doctrine established in the case of Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, followed by the decision of the case of Comstock v. Crawford [supra], is founded upon the clearest principles of justice and of equity. It is this: That when, in a case like this, a court has jurisdiction by the filing of a proper statement of a case before it, to proceed and adjudicate upon the case, and has so done, that wherever a decree or judgment there entered comes up collaterally, the decision of the court is conclusive upon the rights of parties. In other words, where it is a question, whether or not there was proper notice in conformity with the law, and the court has decided that there was, and has adjudicated upon that assumption, or upon the sufficiency of any proof on which it acted in the case; collaterally, the decision of the court must be considered as conclusive. So that when a man seeks to purchase real property, and the title depends upon the adjudication of a court of competent jurisdiction, he need not look further than the decree and the sale under it; he is not bound to follow every step which may have occurred in the course of the proceeding to see whether this or that fact exists, or this or that technicality has been complied with.

The only question is, had the court jurisdiction of the case? This was the rule laid down in Grignon's Lessee v. Astor. It is founded, as I think, upon the plainest principles of right. This was followed in the case of Comstock v. Crawford, although the decisions of the supreme court of this state, which laid down a different rule, were there cited by counsel, and it cannot be doubted that the supreme court of the United States dissented from the opinion of Judge Paine in Sitzman v. Pacquette. See 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 403, 404.

Now if the question is, whether or not a court has jurisdiction of a case, must we follow the decisions of the supreme court of this state, when those decisions are contrary to the decisions of the supreme court of the United States? For instance, the supreme court of this state has said that whether or not due notice was given, was a question of jurisdiction. The supreme court of the United States has said that it is not a question of jurisdiction, and has clearly stated in Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, what constitutes jurisdiction in a court. I think we must follow the rule laid down by the supreme court of the United States, and especially when that court has had before it a case, going up from this state, where these decisions were cited and considered. Although one was under the territorial law and the other under the state law, the principles involved in the cases were precisely the same, and if these cases were decided rightly in the supreme court of the state, and the federal courts were bound by them, then the supreme court of the United States ought not to have decided Comstock v. Crawford as it did.

I am fully aware of the very serious consequences growing out of a difference between the federal and state courts, and especially in deciding any question affecting the right to real estate. The rule would be undoubtedly different in the state court, from that which we lay down here, following the decision of the supreme court of the United States. But if we examine Grignon's Lessee v. Astor, and Comstock v. Crawford, it will be found that this court cannot hold this sale invalid without reversing the opinion of the supreme court in each of these cases, and saying that as the supreme court of this state has decided differently, we must follow the decision.

I admit it seems rather difficult to lay down any absolute rule as to where the highest court of the state is to be our guide, but this, I think, has been established by the supreme court of the United States, that as to a general principle of law, the federal court has the right to follow its own views of the law and is not bound by the decision of the state court. Now what shall constitute jurisdiction in a court is a general principle of law, and, as I understand, the supreme court of the United States would hold in this case that the county court of Walworth county had jurisdiction of the case. It makes no difference that the county court of Walworth county was a court of a particular jurisdiction, that is, jurisdiction over particular subjects.

Its action and its decision, within its province, were just as binding as though it had general jurisdiction over all subjects and controversies. This is a universal rule.

Those courts whose decisions were considered in the two cases referred to, were courts of a particular jurisdiction, and yet the supreme court of the United States held they were conclusive.

On these principles, therefore, the judgment of the court will have to be in favor of the defendant in this case, on the ground that a judgment of the county court of Walworth county having ordered a sale of the property of a lunatic, and the presumption being that all the requisites of the law had been complied with as found by that court; that the sale was made, and reported to the court and confirmed, we must hold the title under the sale to be valid. And it will be recollected that the defect here is not one included in section 62 of chapter 94 of the Revised Statutes of Wisconsin, or section 23 of chapter 93 (if that applies), 2 Taylor, 1178 and 1193, provided we are correct that the court had jurisdiction. The license to sell was given. A bond was duly approved. The oath was taken. Notice of the time and place of sale was given as prescribed. The property was sold, and the sale confirmed by the court to a person who purchased in good faith.

It is not material, as I understand, that a portion of the property was the homestead; this property was no part of the homestead, and because it may be that a portion of the property sold, ought not to have been sold, it would have no effect upon this particular part of the property. Neither is there any evidence on the face of the record of the case in the county court, from which fraud is established, so as to connect the purchaser with it and thereby prevent him from being a purchaser in good faith.

MOIR v. The DUBUQUE.

[3 Chi. Leg. News, 145; 4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 84.]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Jan. 17, 1871.

CONFLICT OF LAWS — ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION — STATE STATUTE — LIEN CREATED THEREBY.

1. The remedy by proceedings in rem, given to the state courts by the watercraft law of Michigan, is an exercise of admiralty jurisdiction, and in conflict with the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], and therefore void.

2. These proceedings being the only ones authorized for the enforcement of the liens provided for by the act, and being illegal, the liens themselves fall with the remedy, and are also void.

3. Maritime liens cannot be created by state statute.

[Cited in The Kate Tremaine, Case No. 7,622.]

4. The power of a state to pass laws effecting vessels fully considered, and various authorities cited and reviewed.

The claim of George Moir, as set up in his petition, and proven at the hearing, is for services in repairing the machinery of the vessel, as follows:

1868. April 1, to 10 days' repairing machinery @ $3	$ 30 00
1869. March 1, to 58 days' repairing machinery	174 00
	$204 00

These repairs were furnished at Detroit, the home port of the vessel, and a lien on account of them is claimed, not by the maritime law, but by the laws of the state of Michigan. Laws Mich. 1864, p. 107; Laws Mich. 1865, p. 672; Laws Mich. 1867, p. 112. This claim is opposed by the Second National Bank of Detroit, intervening for its interests as mortgagee, on several grounds set forth in its exceptions and answer, the only one of which material to be stated for the purposes of this decision, is substantially that the said state laws of Michigan, purporting to create a lien in favor of such claim for repairs in the home port, are invalid.

A. Russell, for petitioner, George Moir.

H. B. Browne, for claimant, the Second National Bank.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. The following points are well established, and are not disputed in this case: That a lien upon the vessel must at some time have existed in favor of the petitioner's claim, to entitle him to participate in the proceeds of the vessel; that the repairs constituting the basis of the claim, having been furnished in the home port of the vessel, no lien exists by the maritime law, and therefore that the claim of lien is based solely on the statutes of Michigan above cited, commonly called "the Watercraft Laws." The act upon which this claim of lien is based, was passed in 1864. Laws Mich. 1864, p. 107. Section 1 repeals a previous act upon the same subject. (In previous act and amendments thereto, see 2 Comp. Laws Mich. 1313.) Section 2 as amended in 1867 (Laws 1867, p. 112), so far as it relates to this case, provides that: "Every water craft of above five tons burthen, used, or intended to be used, in navigating the waters of this state, shall be subject to a lien thereon. First. For all debts contracted by the owner or part owner, master, clerk, agent or steward of such craft, * * * on account of work done * * * by mechanics, tradesmen or others in or about the * * * repairing, fitting, furnishing or equipping such craft." The residue of the act, with a few exceptions, which will be hereafter noticed, is devoted to prescribing the procedure for enforcing the lien created by section two. The process and proceedings are in rem, against the vessel by name, and in close analogy to the process and proceedings in the federal admiralty courts. It is unnecessary to recite these portions of the act, as there is no dispute as to their character.

In 1844, the supreme court of the United States adopted a rule in admiralty (rule 12), authorizing process in rem, against "domestic ships, where, by the local law, a lien is given to material men for supplies, repairs, or other necessaries." In December term, 1858, rule 12 was amended so as to take from the admiralty courts the process in rem in such cases, for the reason expressly stated by the court in Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 251, that such right had been assumed upon the authority of a lien given by state laws, and that such assumption had its foundation in an error which originated in that court in the case of The Gen. Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 439. Since the alteration of rule 12, in 1858, it has been uniformly held by the supreme court of the United States, in a large number of cases, and may now be considered as settled law, that all state laws conferring admiralty jurisdiction upon the federal courts or upon state courts, or in any manner authorizing proceedings in rem against domestic vessels as in admiralty, for the enforcement of maritime liens, are in direct conflict with section 9 of the judiciary act of 1789, and therefore null and void. See Maguire v. Card, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 248, 251; The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 522; The Hine v. Trevor, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 555; The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 624; also The Josephine, 39 N. Y. 22.

In The Hine v. Trevor, an exception was made in favor of such state laws, of cases arising on the lakes and their connecting waters; which exception was founded exclusively on the act of congress of February 26th, 1845 [5 Stat. 726], by which concurrent jurisdiction in such cases was expressly conferred upon the state courts. But in the same case it was decided that state statutes which attempt to confer upon state courts a remedy for marine torts and marine contracts, by proceedings strictly in rem in all cases not covered by the act of 1845, were void, because they were in conflict with the act of 1789. That decision, as to all cases of marine torts and marine contracts not arising on the lakes and their connecting waters has not been in any manner changed or affected, but it is the law to-day. Not so, however, as to the excepted class of cases. The Hine v. Trevor, was decided in 1866. In 1868, the supreme court, in the case of The Eagle, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 25, held that the act of February 26th, 1845, must be regarded as obsolete and of no effect, with the exception of the clause which gives to either party the right of trial by jury, when requested, and that the district courts must be regarded as having conferred upon them a general jurisdiction in admiralty upon the lakes and the waters connecting them, by the 9th section of the original act of 1789. This of course wipes out the exception made in The Hine v. Trevor in favor of cases of marine torts and contracts arising on the lakes and connecting waters, and makes the rule there laid down invalidating state statutes, which confer upon state courts a remedy by proceedings strictly in rem applicable to all cases alike. Since the case of The Eagle, therefore, it must be regarded as settled law that all state statutes which attempt to confer upon state courts a remedy for marine torts and contracts by proceedings strictly in rem in all cases are void and of no effect. The learned counsel for the petitioner has called the attention of the court to an ingenious attempt which has been made to draw a distinction in favor of such state statutes between cases in which a lien existed by the maritime laws, and those in which it did not exist, and to deduce therefrom the conclusion that while state statutes cannot confer upon state courts the right to proceed in rem in the former class of cases, it may in the latter. (See 4 Am. Law Rev. 664–670. And the learned counselor argued from this, that as no lien attached by the maritime law to a contract for repairs in the home port, therefore the state statute of Michigan conferring upon the state court jurisdiction to enforce such contract by proceedings strictly in rem, is not in conflict with the act of 1789, and is therefore valid. The supreme court has not yet had occasion to speak authoritatively upon this question. All the cases which have been before that court involving the validity of these state statutes, have been cases in which a lien existed by the maritime law. I think, however, that the distinction thus attempted to be drawn is founded in a misconception of the true meaning and scope of the jurisdictional clause of the 9th section of the act of 1789. That clause is as follows: "And shall also have exclusive original cognizance of all civil cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction * * * saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it." 1 Stat. 76.

It will be observed that the exclusiveness of the jurisdiction is made to depend upon the "cause," and not upon the question of lien in any sense whatever. Jurisdiction attaches to the cause, the contract, the claim, without any reference whatever to whether there is or is not a lien. The question of lien becomes important only when we come to consider the remedy, and the proceedings to enforce it. If there be no lien, the remedy is enforced by proceedings in personam alone. If there be a lien, then either in personam or in rem. The saving clause is of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it. Now the common law is competent to give the remedy by proceedings in personam, but not in rem. But the proceedings in rem can take place only where there is a lien. Therefore if the cause of action be maritime in its character, and there be a lien upon the vessel, the remedy to enforce the lien must be sought in the admiralty alone, because the common law not being competent to give this remedy, it is not included in the reservation, and the jurisdiction of admiralty is exclusive. No matter how the lien arises, whether it attaches by the maritime law, or is created by statute. In either case it is a mere incident to the cause or claim, and if that be maritime in its character, then the lien is a maritime lien, and the exclusive jurisdiction of admiralty attaches.

The contract or claim in this case is for repairs, and clearly constitutes a cause of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. Dunl. Adm. Prac. 41–43; The Josephine, 39 N. Y. 22; De Lovio v. Boit [Case No. 3,776]; The Gen. Smith, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438; Ramsay v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611; Andrews v. Wall, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 568, 573; The St. Lawrence, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 529; 12th Adm. Rule as amended in 1858. This case therefore so far as the validity of the procedure part of the statute of Michigan in question is involved, is fully covered by the cases cited, and on the authority of those cases, as well as on principle, I hold that so far as that statute confers upon the state courts jurisdiction of proceedings in rem to enforce a lien for repairs as in this case, or for any contract, claim or cause of action, maritime in its character, it is in conflict with the 9th section of the judiciary act of 1789, and is void.

The question as to the validity of a state law conferring such jurisdiction upon state courts in cases other than those above specified, depends upon other and different considerations. But as that question is not involved in this case, I shall refrain from discussing it in this connection. What has been said of course has no relation to proceedings upon executions, or even attachments, authorized by state statutes against boats and vessels, in suits where there is a personal defendant or to proceedings to enforce liens created by any such statute, according to the cause of the common law; but has relation solely to suits and proceedings in which the vessel is proceeded against as the offending thing according to the course of the maritime law. I have said this much in regard to the remedy prescribed by the statute of Michigan in question, on account of the bearing that the question of its validity is deemed to have upon the main question in the case which I shall now proceed to consider. That question is as follows: Does the lien created by section 2 of the statute of Michigan of 1864 (Laws 1864, p. 107, amended in 1867,—Laws 1867, p. 112) remain, notwithstanding that the only remedy prescribed by the statute for the enforcement of the lien, has failed and cannot be resorted to? The statute of 1864 is substantially a re-enactment with some additions, of the statute repealed by section 1, with the exception that in the former statute no provision was made for a hearing and adjudication by the court of uncontested claims, but the vessel was authorized to be sold, and the proceeds distributed in a summary manner, unless released on bond being given. In a suit brought upon a bond which had been given for the discharge of the vessel seized under that statute, the supreme court of Michigan held that the provision of the statute authorizing a sale of the vessel without trial and judgment, was in violation of that provision of the state constitution that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due processoof law." Parsons v. Russell, 11 Mich. 113. But what is more important to the present consideration is, that the majority of the court held, virtually, in that case that because of the failure of that one important feature of the remedy provided, the whole act failed. The court did not say this in so many words, but the conclusion they arrived at cannot be explained on any other hypothesis, and Judge Manning, in his dissenting opinion, so understood it.

I might be justified in stopping here and resting my decision upon that time-honored custom of the federal courts to accept the decision of a state court of last resort, giving construction to a state law or state constitution, as final, and say, the supreme court of Michigan having decided that in a former statute in which the lien and the remedy therein provided, bore the same relations to each other as the lien and the remedy bear to each other in the present statute, the remedy having failed for unconstitutionality, the whole statute is void; therefore, the remedy in the present statute having failed for a similar reason, the present statute is also void. But I do not choose to rest my decision on so important a question, on that basis alone. Aside from the case of Parsons v. Russell, the attention of the court was called to but two cases, (and I believe there are no others reported) in which the distinct question here under consideration was in any way involved. The first of these cases was that of The St. Joseph [Case No. 12,229], in the Western district of Michigan. In that case, this question was not presented. It seems to have been taken for granted by counsel and court that the lien existed, and the only question considered and adjudicated, was that of priority as between such lien, and the previously recorded mortgage. The other case was that of In re Scott [Id. 12,517], in bankruptcy, in the Northern district of Ohio, in which state there is a statute similar to the one here under consideration. The contest in that case was also between state lien-holders and mortgagees; and although the distinct question here under consideration was ably presented by the counsel for the mortgagees (whose printed argument is before me) the learned judge who made the decision, did not in his opinion as published, enter into a discussion of the question, or give any expression of his views upon it, any further than to hold in general terms, that the state of Ohio having by her statutes declared that the class of claims then in question should be liens, and should at once attach upon the property at the time of the creation of the debt, that court, as a bankruptcy court, recognized those statutes, and would be governed by them so far as possible in the distribution of the proceeds of property sold, and in the hands of the assignee. Therefore, aside from the case of Parsons v. Russell, the question under consideration, viz: "Whether the lien remains the remedy prescribed by the statute creating it for its enforcement, having failed," may be considered an open question, unenlightened by any former adjudication, and unembarrassed by any conflicting judicial opinions. To that question we will now direct our attention. The lien provided for by the statute was unknown to the common law, or to equity jurisprudence. It is solely the creature of the statute. It was a new right conferred upon a creditor. Where a right originally exists at common law, and a new remedy is given by statute without any negative, the party has his election, either to sue at common law, or proceed under the statute. But where a new right is created by statute, and a specific remedy provided for its enforcement, the remedy is confined to that given by the statute. Sedg. St. Const. 93, 94, and cases there cited.

We see then that if the lien remains at all, it is by virtue of the naked declaration of the right of lien contained in section 2 of the act, without any provision whatever in the statute, or recognized process for its enforcement, unless, as was contended on the argument equity will reach out and enforce it by its process and decrees. It may be seriously questioned whether the legislative intent having been declared as to the remedy, all other remedies are not excluded, and, that remedy failing, whether any remedy whatever remains, even in equity. "Expressio unius, est exclusio alterius." The question whether or not an equitable remedy exists, comes in question here, however, only incidentally; and aside from the consideration above stated, it depends primarily, upon the same question involved in the assertion of the right to participate in surplus proceeds here under consideration, viz. whether, that part of the statute providing a remedy for the enforcement of the lien being void, the part providing for the lien itself is valid. A statute may no doubt be good in part, and bad in part. This depends wholly upon the relations of the different parts to, their connection with, and dependency upon, each other. Judge Cooley, in his recent work on Constitutional Limitations, lays down the rule in this respect, as gathered from the numerous authorities cited by him, and I think with entire correctness. I cannot do better than to quote his language. He says: "Where, therefore, a part of a statute is unconstitutional, that fact does not authorize the courts to declare the remainder void also, unless the provisions are connected in subject matter, depending on each other, operating together for the same purpose, or otherwise so connected together in meaning, that it cannot be presumed the legislature would have passed the one without the other. * * * If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed wholly independent of that which is rejected, it must be sustained. * * * If a statute attempts to accomplish two or more objects, and is void as to one, it may still be in every respect complete and valid as to the other. But if its purpose is to accomplish a single object only, and some of its provisions are void, the whole must fall unless sufficient remains to effect the object without aid of the invalid portion. And if they are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently; then, if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional or connected, must fall with them." See Cooley, Const. Lim., 177–179, and the cases there cited, particularly Warren v. Mayor, etc., of Charlestown, 2 Gray, 99; State v. Com'rs of Terry Co., 5 Ohio St. 507; Slauson v. City of Racine, 13 Wis. 398.

Let us apply this rule to the statute under consideration.

First. Section 2 of the act, in which a lien is provided for, does not declare when the lien shall attach, (differing in this respect from the Ohio statute, under which the Case of Dwight Scott, cited above, was decided, that statute declaring that the lien shall attach at once on the creation of the debt,) and we are therefore left to inference, or to other provisions of the act to ascertain when the lien was intended to attach. Section 2 simply provides that certain specified "water craft" "shall be subject to a lien thereon," for certain specified debts. Section 3 provides that "any person claiming to have any such lien, may file a complaint, etc." Section 12 provides that all liens, "which shall not be filed hereunder, before sale under decree or judgment, as hereinafter provided, shall cease." And section 45 provides that such lien shall not be enforced as against bona fide purchasers without notice, after one year from the time the same accrued, unless complaint shall have been filed within that period. It seems to me that these provisions admit of but one rational construction, and that is, that by the operation of section 2, the creation of the debt conferred upon the creditor the right to obtain a lien by complying with the other provisions of the statute in relation to filing of complaint, etc. This right to obtain a lien thus accruing on the creation of the debt, was inchoate merely, and could become complete only by filing the same in the proper court, in the form of a complaint under section 3, setting up the facts upon which the party's claim to have a lien is based. If I am right in this construction, then it is clear that the right of a lien, under section 2, was made so dependent upon the void portions of the statute for its full and complete existence and exercise, that it cannot be sustained under the rule above laid down.

Second. Section 33 fixes the order and priority in which all claims, filed before sale, shall be paid; and section 34 does the same thing as to claims filed against surplus proceeds. Section 45 fixes certain limitations as to proceedings under the act, and is in the following words: "Liens may be enforced under this act at any time within six years from their origin: provided, that no lien shall be enforced against a water-craft in the hands of a bona fide purchaser without notice, unless the complaint to enforce the same shall have been filed in the proper courts, in the county where the party claiming the lien resides, within one year from the time when the same accrued." These provisions depend for their validity upon, are, in fact, a part of the proceedings prescribed for the enforcement of the lien, and of course fall with those proceedings. If these provisions had been independent, such might not have been the effect, but it will be observed that the preference prescribed is dependent upon, or at least can be applied only in case of a sale of the vessel under the act, and that the limitations prescribed are confined to proceedings to enforce liens under the act. These provisions, therefore, can have no general application, and no application whatever, other than in proceedings under the act, and those proceedings being void, these provisions can have no application whatever. Can it be presumed that the legislature would have passed section 2, providing for liens, without fixing the order of preference in which such liens should be paid as expressed in sections 33 and 34, or prescribing the limitations of proceedings to enforce the same as expressed in section 45? Clearly not. To enforce section 2 without the qualifications and restrictions of sections 33, 34, and 45, as it must be enforced if at all, in view of the fact that those sections are void and of no effect, would be to enforce that which the legislature did not enact. It is clear to my mind, therefore, that section 2, and the other sections named, are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole; and that those other provisions being void, no effect can be given to section 2.

Third. Maritime liens cannot be created by state statutes. The Belfast, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 644. By the maritime law, no lien exists for repairs furnished in the home port; and so as to several others of the matters provided for in the state statute here under consideration. The contract for repairs, however, as we have already seen, is a maritime contract, and, as such, the admiralty courts have and entertain jurisdiction to enforce it, in personam. The contract being maritime in its character, if congress were to enact that a lien should attach on account of it, can there be any doubt that the lien thus created would be a maritime lien, and as such enforceable in the admiralty, in rem, the same and in the same manner, as in case of a lien for repairs finished in a foreign port? I think clearly not. Now, when we once recognize the existence of a lien, on account of such contract, it can make no difference by what authority it was created, whether federal or state, it is a maritime lien all the same. A lien, in any case, is but an incident, and of course takes its character from the debt or contract, and the debt or contract being maritime, the lien is maritime also, by whatever authority created. In order to arrive at the effect and true intent of the statute, we must look at it as a whole, just as it came from the hands of the legislature, and, so doing, we see, in addition to the fact that the contract is maritime in its character, that the lien created is invested with all the attributes of a maritime lien. The statute treats the vessel as the offending thing, to be proceeded against and condemned by name, not to be reached through a personal defendant, and to the extent of his interest merely, as in the case of a common law remedy, but by process purely in rem, and without any reference to the extent of the interest of the owners or persons with whom the contract was made; a process known only to courts exercising admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and applicable only to maritime liens.

If, therefore, the lien declared by section 2 is recognized as valid, it must be so recognized as a maritime lien, and, if so recognized, then jurisdiction for its enforcement in the admiralty cannot be refused, which is a recognition of the right of a state legislature to confer jurisdiction upon the federal courts, a power which no one will contend belongs to such legislature, under the present state of decision in the supreme court of the United States. The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 184. It is true, the supreme court did at one time authorize the enforcement of such liens in the district courts (see rule 12), but this authority was afterwards taken away (see rule 12, as amended in 1858), and it was subsequently declared by the court (see The St. Lawrence, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 530) that the state lien "was enforced, not as a right which the court was bound to carry into execution upon the application of the party, but as a discretionary power which the court might lawfully exercise for the purposes of justice, where it did not involve controversies beyond the limits of admiralty jurisdiction." Section 2 declaring a lien, and the remaining portions of the statute under consideration, have therefore such an intimate mutual relation to and connection with each other, as to stamp the lien created by section 2 as a maritime lien, a lien which a state legislature has no power to create. I do not wish to be understood as expressing an opinion that a state possesses no power or authority, as between her own citizens, and in relation to property within her jurisdiction, to declare what shall and what shall not constitute liens, and to prescribe remedies for the enforcement of them, through a personal defendant or otherwise so long as such liens and remedies do not go beyond the spirit of the reservation contained in the 9th section of the judiciary act of 1789, "saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it," and do not invade the domain of admiralty jurisdiction.

Having arrived at the conclusions above stated, a consideration of the other questions raised becomes unnecessary. The petition must be dismissed.

[5 Blatchf. 274; [2] 2 Int. Rev. Rec. 157.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 27, 1865.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—ACTION TO RECOVER BACK—PROTEST—UNASCERTAINED AND ESTIMATED DUTIES—FINAL LIQUIDATION.

1. The act of February 26th, 1845 (5 Stat. 727,) requiring a written protest against the payment of duties, in order to sustain an action against the collector, to recover them back, applies to the payment of unascertained and estimated duties, which are to be afterwards liquidated, and the protest may be made at the time of the final liquidation.

2. The fact that the collector exacts duties in violation of instructions, does not supply the want of a protest.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

This was an action against [Hiram Barney] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an alleged excess of duties paid by the plaintiffs [George Moke and others], but not under protest, on the importation of certain merchandise which was subject to duty by weight, under the act of March 2d, 1861 (12 Stat. 178). At the time of the entry, the duties were estimated on a given number of pounds, as shown by the entry, and the amount thus estimated was paid and a permit granted to land the goods, with the usual directions to the government weigher to weigh the selected packages. The goods were weighed and reported with the customary allowance for tare, but no allowance for draft. This occurred at the final liquidation of the duties, and after the secretary of the treasury had issued his circular of March 21st, 1861, instructing the officers of customs that allowances on account of tare and draft would be governed by the 58th and 59th sections of the act of March 2d, 1799 (1 Stat. 671, 672).

George T. Curtis, for plaintiffs.

E. Delafield Smith, Dist. Atty., and Mr. Lowrey, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The only question presented in the case is—are the plaintiffs entitled to recover the excess of duties, not having protested at or before the final liquidation of them? This court has decided (Napier v. Barney [Case No. 10,009]) that, under the 58th and 59th sections of the act of March 2d, 1799, the merchant is entitled to allowances or deductions for both tare and draft, on articles the duties on which are to be ascertained by weight.

The act of February 26th, 1845 (5 Stat. 727), which revived the right of action against the collector to recover back an excess of duties paid, which right had been taken away by the 2d section of the act of March 3d, 1839 (5 Stat. 348) as interpreted by the supreme court, in Cary v. Curtis, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 236, contains this provision: "nor shall any action be maintained against any collector, to recover the amount of duties so paid under protest, unless the said protest was made in writing, and signed by the claimant, at or before the payment of said duties, setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection to the payment thereof." A previous clause in the section had declared, that nothing in the act of 1839 should take away, or be construed to take away, or impair, the right of any person, who had paid, or should thereafter pay, money, as and for duties, under protest, in order to obtain his goods, to maintain an action against the collector to recover back duties not authorised or payable by law. The construction that has been uniformly given to this act of 1845, since it became a law, is, that to entitle the merchant to a suit against the collector to recover back duties illegally exacted, there must not only be a protest made against the payment at or before the payment, but it must be in writing, and in the form, substantially, that is prescribed by the statute. The question before us is, whether or not the facts stated and agreed upon in this case take it out of this construction of the act of 1845, no protest in writing having been made.

One ground taken by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, to exempt this case from the protest required by the act, is, that the act does not apply to the case of the payment to the collector of "unascertained duties," which are payments in gross, on an estimate as to amount, and where the merchant, on a final liquidation, will be entitled by law to allowances or deductions, which do not depend on the rate of duty charged, but on the ascertainment of the quantity of the article subject to duty; that, in this class of payments, no question of law is, in general, supposed to arise between the merchant and the government; that the other class of payments, "for duties paid under protest against the rate or amount of duties charged," comprehends payments where the merchant claims that the rate has been illegally levied; and that, in this class, a protest is required, in order to give notice of the illegality of the assessment. This distinction is supposed to have been recognized and acted on by the court in the case of Cary v. Curtis, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 236, in expounding the act of 1839, and to have been carried into the statute of 1845. I cannot yield assent to this view. On the contrary, the payment of "unascertained duties" by the merchant, in order to obtain the permit to land his goods, is made without reference to the nature or character of the questions that may arise before the appraisers, measurers, or weighers, or the collector, and affords time to those officers to ascertain the quality, quantity, weight, or measure, and also the rate or amount of duty to be paid, while, at the same time, the merchant acquires possession of the bulk of his shipment and entry, and may deal with the goods as his own. This payment is but preliminary and indefinite, a sum in gross and by estimate, intended to be large enough to cover the actual legal amount of duty, when ascertained. The ascertainment of the duty is subsequently made, in conformity with the report of the proper custom-house officers, the money in hand is applied, and any balance found, on liquidation, over and above the legal duties, is refunded to the merchant. When this practice was first introduced at the customs, there was some embarrassment as to the time when the protest should be made, and more especially since the act of 1845, requiring it to be made in writing; but it was finally agreed, and such has been the practice since, that if the protest was made at the time of the final liquidation and refunding of the balance, it was in time.

The reference to the two classes of duties, in the act of 1839, to wit, the payment of

"unascertained duties," and of duties paid under protest, and the direction that they should be placed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, and kept and disposed of as other moneys paid for duties, and the enactment itself, grew out of large and repeated defalcations by collectors, which it was difficult, if not impossible, for the government to prevent, on account of the conditions of these funds. The payment of "unascertained duties" had the effect to keep, at all times, large masses of money in the hands of the collectors, of which no return was made to the secretary of the treasury till the final liquidation of the duties. Many hundreds of thousands of dollars of this fund were constantly in the possession of the collector, and were sometimes used by him for his own private purposes. In the other class, duties paid under protest, the collector claimed the right to detain them while in litigation, as he was personally responsible for the amount, if ultimately decided to be illegally exacted, and this afforded him an opportunity to use them in the meantime. This act of 1839 struck at the root of the evil, by requiring the collector to pay the moneys into the treasury, the same as in the case of all other duties. The great design of the act was to prevent these frauds and defalcations, and it effectually accomplished it. Under the decision of the court in Cary v. Curtis [supra], the collector was no more liable to suit for "unascertained duties" paid over to the treasury, than in the case of duties paid under protest. Both stood upon the same footing, and were governed by the same principle.

The other ground urged by the learned counsel, to take the case out of the act of 1845, is, that the excess of duties paid to the collector by reason of the refusal to make the proper abatement for draft, was in direct violation of the instructions of the secretary of the treasury. This ground is plausible, and would seem not destitute of principle, because the payment is an exaction in violation of the duty of the officer, who was bound to obey his superior. But the answer is, that there is no such exception in the act of 1845, and, also, that the provision is positive and explicit—"nor shall any action be maintained against any collector, to recover the amount of duties so paid under protest, unless the said protest was made in writing, &c., setting forth distinctly and specifically the grounds of objection, &c." The instructions of the secretary would have been good ground of protest against the payment of the duty. The omission must be attributed to the neglect of the merchant rather than to the law. I am satisfied, therefore, that there is no well-grounded distinction in the act of 1839, or in the judgment of the court in Cary v. Curtis, or in the act of 1845, as it respects the necessity of a written protest under the latter act, between the payment of "unascertained duties" and of duties paid under protest; that a protest must be made, in both cases, in order to give a right of action against the collector; that such has been the established construction of the act of 1845, and the practice under it, in this court, since it went into operation.

Actions have been maintained against the collector without protest, but they were cases not falling within the act, such as the case of Ogden v. Maxwell [Case No. 10,458], to recover back fees illegally exacted for constructive permits to land passengers, and the case of Hunt v. Schell [unreported], to recover back money paid by mistake, for duties which had already been paid. The act of 1845 applies to the payment of duties, and not to fees or money paid by mistake. Judgment must be rendered for the defendant.

BANKRUPTCY—VALUE OF PREMISES—FORECLOSURE SALE—WAIVER—TAXES AND ASSESSMENTS—PROOF OF DEBT.

1. After an adjudication of bankruptcy, a suit was brought in a state court to foreclose two mortgages on real estate, which had been made by the bankrupt. The suit was commenced without obtaining the leave of the bankruptcy court. The bankrupt and his wife and the assignee in bankruptcy were made parties defendant and were served with process. The bankrupt and his wife made default. The assignee appeared and answered, but afterwards withdrew his answer, on a stipulation that he should receive notice of sale under the decree of foreclosure. The decree of foreclosure was made and the assignee received notice of the sale, as stipulated, and he himself advertised the sale, and, at the sale, the premises were bought by the mortgagee. The mortgagee then applied to this court for an order that the purchase price, less the expenses of the suit and the sale, be taken to be the ascertained value of the premises, under the provisions of section 5075 of the Revised Statutes, and be the amount to be deducted from the claim of the mortgagee against the estate of the mortgagor. He also applied for an order directing the assignee to pay in full a certain tax and assessment and water rate on the mortgaged premises. The tax was laid and the assessment made before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, while the bankrupt owned the premises, and the water tax was laid while they were occupied by the assignee in bankruptcy. No applications had been made by the authorities of the state for their payment, and the mortgagee had not put in any proof of such claims: Held, that the provision of section 5075 of the Revised Statutes, that the property covered by a mortgage shall be sold in such manner as the bankruptcy court shall direct, is a provision for the benefit and protection of the unsecured creditors represented by the assignee, and he may, for himself and them, waive it.

[Cited in Bradley v. Adams Express Co., 3 Fed. 897.]

2. The action of the assignee amounted to a waiver of such provision, in this case.

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 9,700.]

3. The water tax should be paid in full by the assignee, as a part of the proper expense of his administration of the estate.

4. The tax and assessment should also be paid by the assignee in full.

5. No formal proof of debt in respect to such claims was needed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The executor of Douglas Sloane petitions for an order that the sum of $21,100, bid for the mortgaged premises, on sales of them under decrees of foreclosure made in two suits in the state court, less the expenses of the suits and of the sales, be taken as, and declared to be, the ascertained value of the premises, under the provisions of section 5075 of the Revised Statutes, and be the amount to be deducted from the claims of such executor against the estate of the bankrupt, William Moller, who was the mortgagor, on the bonds to secure which the mortgages, two in number, were given, in the same manner as though said sales had been made under the order of this court. The bonds were executed in January, 1875. One of them was conditioned to pay $13,000 and the other $8,578.94. Their full amount, with interest from August 1st, 1875, became due. One of them was secured by a mortgage on one piece of land, and the other by a mortgage on another piece of land. The adjudication of bankruptcy herein was made November 20th, 1875. On the 7th of March, 1876, the executor, without having first obtained the leave of this court for the purpose, brought suits in the state court to foreclose the mortgages, making the bankrupt and his wife and the assignee in bankruptcy parties defendant to the suits, and duly serving them with process. The bankrupt and his wife made default. The assignee in bankruptcy appeared in the suits and put in an answer in each suit, but afterwards withdrew the answers, by stipulation, with the reservation that notices of sales under the decrees of foreclosure, if the same should be made, should be given to him. Decrees of foreclosure were rendered on the 16th of June, 1876, which directed that the mortgaged premises should be sold at public auction, under the direction of a referee. The sales were duly advertised, and due notice of the same was given to the assignee, and he himself further advertised the sales in certain newspapers. The sales took place and the premises were purchased by the executor for $21,100.

It is provided by section 5075 of the Revised Statutes, that, when a creditor has a mortgage of real property of the bankrupt, he shall be admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt, after deducting the value of such property, "to be ascertained by agreement between him and the assignee, or by a sale thereof, to be made in such manner as the court shall direct, or the creditor may release or convey his claim to the assignee upon such property and be admitted to prove his whole debt;" that "if the value of the property exceeds the sum for which it is so held as security, the assignee may release to the creditor the bankrupt's right of redemption therein, on receiving such excess, or he may sell the property subject to the claim of the creditor thereon;" that "in either case, the assignee and creditor respectively shall execute all deeds and writings necessary or proper to consummate the transaction;" and that, "if the property is not so sold or released and delivered up, the creditor shall not be allowed to prove any part of his debt." In opposition to the application, it is contended, for the assignee in bankruptcy, that the value of the mortgaged premises has not been ascertained by agreement between him and the creditor, and that there has not been a sale of them made in such manner as this court has directed, and that, therefore, the creditor cannot be allowed to prove any part of his debt; that the creditor has chosen to rely upon his security, and has abandoned all right to prove any debt for a deficiency in the value of the security, because he instituted his foreclosure suits without the leave of this court first obtained and after the adjudication in bankruptcy; and that he cannot be heard to make this application, because, prior to making it, he had not proved his claim in this court, either as a secured claim, or otherwise.

A court of bankruptcy is a court of equity. The assignee in bankruptcy represents the creditors. As between the creditors other than this executor, such creditors have been represented by the assignee and have been heard through him and have acted through him. He was duly made a party to the foreclosure suits and appeared in them, and put in answers, which he then withdrew, stipulating only that he should have notice of any sales to be made under decrees of foreclosure which might be entered in the suits. He had thus a full opportunity to set up by answer any defence he had, whether alleged want of jurisdiction in the state court, or otherwise. He made no application to this court to enjoin the creditor from disposing of the property of the bankrupt by sales under the decrees or to stay proceedings in the suits. It is not alleged that there was any misfeasance or irregularity in the proceedings of the creditor, or that the premises did not produce on the sales as much as they ought to have produced on any sale made at the time. Under these circumstances, the assignee must be held to have assented to and acquiesced in the sales, and to be estopped from questioning them. The value of the premises has been substantially, and to all intents and purposes, ascertained by agreement between the creditor and the assignee, within the meaning of section 5075. The assignee voluntarily submitted to have the premises sold under the decrees of the state court. The provision of section 5075, that the property covered by a mortgage shall be sold in such manner as the bankruptcy court shall direct, is a provision for the benefit and protection of the unsecured creditors represented by the assignee, and he may, for himself and for them, waive such benefit and permit the property to be sold in a suit in the state court, by regular proceedings of foreclosure, and its value to be thus ascertained. He does make such waiver, if he, with full notice, acts as the assignee in this case acted. The state court had prima facie jurisdiction to foreclosure the mortgages, even though the foreclosure suits were commenced after the adjudication in bankruptcy. The assignee virtually assented, by his conduct, to the proceedings in the state courts, and it is too late now for him to object to them, especially in this collateral way. Mays v. Fritton, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 414; Doe v. Childress, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 642; Scott v. Kelly, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 57; Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521.

The executor also applies to this court for a direction to the assignee to pay in full certain taxes and assessments and Croton water rents upon the said mortgaged premises, as preferred debts to be paid in full, under the third subdivision of section 5101 of the Revised Statutes, on the ground that they are taxes and assessments made under the laws of the state of New York. In 1875, and before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, a tax of $470.40, under the laws of that state, became payable by the bankrupt as owner of the mortgaged premises, being the annual tax for the year 1875. This tax was assessed and laid upon the bankrupt as the owner of the mortgaged premises. In March, 1875, and before the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, and while the bankrupt owned the mortgaged premises, an assessment under the laws of New York, for constructing a sewer, was made upon the bankrupt as the owner of said premises, for the sum of $41.84. On the 1st of May, 1876, and after the adjudication of bankruptcy herein, and while the premises were owned and occupied by the assignee in bankruptcy, a water tax of $31, to be collected from the owner or occupant of said premises, became due under the laws of New York. By the laws of New York these taxes and assessments are made liens on the premises, prior to the liens of the mortgages, and the executor will be obliged to pay the same before he can obtain a clear title to the premises under the foreclosure sales. The assignee has funds enough to pay these taxes and assessments in full. In opposition to this application, it is contended, for the assignee, that such taxes and assessments are a lien on the premises; that the premises are first liable for such taxes; that the mortgages were taken, subject to the right to impose the taxes and assessments on the premises; that the executor is not entitled to assert such priority in the absence of any application by the authorities of the state for the payment of such taxes and assessments out of the personal assets of the bankrupt; and that the executor has not put in a proof of this claim.

Although, for the protection of the state and to give it security for the collection of taxes and assessments, they are made liens on the premises in respect of which they are levied and made, and which are owned by the person against whom they are assessed, yet, under the laws of New York, they are personal debts of the person against whom, as owner of the premises, they are assessed. The owner of lands is assessed for the lands he owns, and the tax is imposed upon him personally, and can be collected from his property. It is, therefore, a personal debt due from him to the state for a tax or assessment. If the tax or assessment in this case be not paid, and the land be sold by the state to pay it, the sale will be a sale to satisfy a liability of the bankrupt. Rundell v. Lakey, 40 N. Y. 513. As the bankrupt failed to discharge this liability, and as such liability can now be discharged only by a sale of the premises, unless discharged by the assignee in full, and as such liability is made by section 5101 a preferred claim, and as the premises have passed into the hands of the executor, it is entirely reasonable and proper that such liability should be discharged by the assignee in full, in exoneration of the premises and of the executor. If, instead of being sold under the decrees of foreclosure, the premises had been sold by the assignee, the purchaser would have had a right to call upon the assignee to pay these taxes and assessments in full, under the facts in this case. The water tax ought to be paid in full by the assignee, as a part of the proper expenses of his administration of the estate.

As to the objection, that the claims have not been proved, there is no claim in respect to the taxes and assessments which needs any proof of debt, inasmuch as it does not appear that the executor has paid the taxes and assessments; and in respect to the claim for a deficiency on the sale of the mortgaged premises, it will be sufficient if the claim be proved when the amount of it shall be definitely fixed.

The applications must, both of them, be granted, but, if it be necessary to have a reference to ascertain exact amounts, one may be had.

[The decision in this case was affirmed in the circuit court upon appeal by the assignee. Case No. 9,700.]

BANKRUPTCY — FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE AFTER ADJUDICATION—JURISDICTION OF STATE COURT—PROOF OF DEBT FOR DEFICIENCY — PRIORITY — TAXES.

1. A creditor of a bankrupt, after the adjudication in bankruptcy, brought a suit in a state court for the foreclosure of a mortgage made to him by the bankrupt, and made the assignee in bankruptcy a party defendant to the suit, without obtaining the permission or direction of the bankruptcy court to bring such suit: Held, that the state court had authority to entertain the suit; that its prosecution was not a contempt of the authority of the bankruptcy court; and that the proceedings in it were not void.

In bankruptcy.

William H. Scott, for assignee in bankruptcy.

John E. Parsons, Edmund Coffin, Jr., and Jacob F. Miller, for creditors.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. An adjudication of bankruptcy was had against William Moller, George H. Moller and William F. Moller, on the 20th of November, 1875, upon a petition of their creditors, filed October 28th, 1875, in the district court of the Southern district of New York. William A. Booth, having been elected assignee, received an assignment of the bankrupts' property on the 13th of December, 1875. In the course of his administration of the estates of the bankrupts, questions arose which were presented to the district court [Case No. 9,699.] Its determination being adverse to the positions taken by the assignee, he has brought the questions before this court by six appeals; and, either as appeals, or as applications for the exercise of the superintending jurisdiction of the circuit court, they are properly before the court for determination.

In four of the cases, the creditors, who were mortgagees of one or more of the bankrupts, commenced suit for the foreclosure of their respective mortgages in the state courts, after the adjudication in bankruptcy, and made the assignee in bankruptcy a party defendant, without obtaining any leave or direction of the district court in bankruptcy, permitting or directing the bringing of such suit. It is claimed, on the part of the assignee, that the state courts had no authority to entertain these suits, that their prosecution was a contempt of the authority of the bankruptcy court, and that the proceedings are void. These positions are not consistent with the provisions of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. Section 5056 of the Revised Statutes imposes the only condition which is required by the bankrupt act, in terms, to be performed before suing an assignee in bankruptcy, and that is, that twenty days' notice shall be given him before suit for anything done by him as such assignee. But it is not necessary or suitable that the question should, in this court, be examined as an open one, since the supreme court of the United States has decided it. In Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521, 525, the court says: "The opinion seems to have been quite prevalent in many quarters at one time, that, the moment a man is declared bankrupt, the district court which has so adjudged draws to itself by that act not only all control of the bankrupt's property and credits, but that no one can litigate with the assignee contested rights in any other court, except in so far as the circuit courts have concurrent jurisdiction, and that other courts can proceed no further in suits of which they had at that time full cognizance; and it was a prevalent practice to bring any person who contested with the assignee any matter growing out of disputed rights of property or of contracts, into the bankrupt court, by the service of a rule to show cause and to dispose of their rights in a summary way. This court has steadily set its face against this view. The debtor of a bankrupt, or the man who contests the right to real or personal property with him, loses none of those rights by the bankruptcy of his adversary. The same courts remain open to him in such contests, and the statute has not divested those courts of jurisdiction in such actions. If it has, for certain classes of actions, conferred a jurisdiction for the benefit of the assignee, in the circuit and district courts of the United States, it is concurrent with and does not divest that of the state courts." In the particular case, the bankruptcy occurred after the commencement of the suit, and the decision might, in terms, have been limited to that special state of facts; but the court chose to put it upon the broader grounds which it has expressed, and which apply equally to cases where the bankruptcy precedes the suit in a state court. The views of the supreme court of the United States upon this subject were further explained in Burbank v. Bigelow, 92 U. S. 179. In that case, the complainant filed a bill for an account against one Edmond B. Bigelow, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana. Shortly before the filing of this bill Bigelow had been adjudicated a bankrupt in the district court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, but his assignment was not made until three days after the filing of the bill. No reasons were assigned in the circuit court, showing the grounds upon which it dismissed the bill; but the supreme court of the United States understood the dismissal to have proceeded on the ground that the controversy belonged exclusively to the bankruptcy court in Wisconsin, as an incident to the bankruptcy of Edmond B. Bigelow. After the assignee's appointment, Bigelow answered on the merits, and then an amended and supplemental bill was filed, making the assignee in bankruptcy a party, who subsequently appeared, and having, by order of the court, been subrogated to the rights of Bigelow, filed an answer adopting the defence previously set up by the bankrupt. The assignee afterwards filed another answer, claiming that the district court of Wisconsin alone had jurisdiction. Upon this case the supreme court, after asserting the jurisdiction of the circuit court, under section 4979 of the Revised Statutes, proceeds to show, that, without reference to the jurisdiction conferred by that section, the circuit court had jurisdiction to maintain the suit. The argument is, that, when the state courts have jurisdiction, the circuit courts of the United States have it also, if the proper citizenship of the parties exists; and that, as such citizenship existed in the case before the court, and as it was within the jurisdiction of a state court, a circuit court of the United States also had jurisdiction. In regard to the point of state jurisdiction the court says: "We recently held, in the case of Eyster v. Gaff [supra], that the bankrupt law has not deprived the state courts of jurisdiction over suits brought to decide rights of property between the bankrupt, or his assignee, and third persons; and, whenever the state courts have jurisdiction, the circuit courts of the United States have it, if the proper citizenship of the parties exists. In the case last referred to, a suit to foreclose a mortgage was commenced before the mortgagor went into bankruptcy; but the decree was not rendered until after that event and the appointment of an assignee. We decided that the validity of the suit or of the decree was not affected by the intervening bankruptcy; that the assignee might or might not be made a party; and, whether he was or not, he was equally bound with any other party acquiring an interest pendente lite."

The principle of these cases derives confirmation, if that be necessary, from the cases of Norton v. Switzer, 93 U. S. 355, and Claflin v. Houseman, Id. 130. I entertain no doubt, therefore, that the general proposition on which the appellant in these cases relies is unfounded, and that the state courts had jurisdiction to maintain the several actions which were instituted to foreclose the mortgages involved in them. No question is presented as to the power of the district court to enjoin the prosecution of any of those suits, if, in its judgment, that course had been deemed conducive to justice. Such an injunction was asked for in only two of the cases and was denied in each. The grounds of these applications do not appear upon the appeal papers, and no question was made in respect to them, at the bar.

In the next place, it is claimed, on the part of the appellant, that the district court had not power to allow the mortgage creditors to prove for a deficiency in four of the cases in which no preliminary permission to institute the foreclosure suits had been obtained from the district court. The appellant's position is based upon the provisions of section 5075 of the Revised Statutes, which enacts, that a mortgage creditor of the bankrupt shall be admitted as a creditor only for the balance of the debt, after deducting the value of the mortgaged property, to be ascertained by agreement between him and the assignee, or by a sale thereof, to be made in such manner as the court shall direct; or the creditor may release or convey his claim to the assignee upon such property, and be admitted to prove his whole debt. It then provides, that, "if the value of the property exceeds the sum for which it is so held as security, the assignee may release to the creditor the bankrupt's right of redemption therein, on receiving such excess; or he may sell the property subject to the claim of the creditor thereon; and, in either case, the assignee and creditor, respectively, shall execute all deeds and writings necessary or proper to consummate the transaction." It then enacts, that, "if the property is not so sold or released and delivered up, the creditor shall not be allowed to prove any part of his debt." Upon this section, it must be observed, in the first place, that the secured creditor may proceed, without the order or the sanction of the bankrupt court, to realize his security; and, in the second place, that, with the sanction of the court or of the assignee, he may avail himself of the full value of his security, and be admitted as a creditor for the deficiency. The statute is not modal in its provisions, but substantial. It does not concern itself with the order of time in which the business shall be transacted, but with the fact that the court approves, or the assignee agrees.

In four of the cases before the court, which are in the papers respectively designated as the Fifth Avenue, Westchester, Sugar-House, and Sloane Cases, the circumstances are slightly different, though, in each, dower rights or other incumbrances existed, which made a title under the decree of a court of general jurisdiction more marketable than any that could be given under the direction of the bankrupt court alone.

In the Fifth Avenue Case, the assignee was made a party defendant, but did not answer, and a decree was regularly passed by the state court, and a sale was had, in which the creditor, being the highest bidder, became the purchaser. He then, without attempting to take possession, applied to the court in bankruptcy, averring that he had bid the full value of the property, asking the sanction of the court, and offering to submit to a resale of the clear title, and to convey accordingly, if the bankruptcy court should so order. In answer to this application, it was not shown that the full value had not been bid for the property, nor was any ground taken in opposition, except the somewhat inconsistent legal grounds, that the proceedings in the state courts were inoperative, and that, having taken them, the creditor ought not to be allowed to prove for the deficiency. The court refused to sustain either of these grounds, sanctioned the sale which had taken place and permitted the creditor to prove for the deficiency. This decision is supported by the case of In re Iron Mountain Co. [Case No. 7,065], before Judge Woodruff, in all points except as to deficiency. In regard to that, Judge Woodruff remarks, at the close of his opinion, that, by electing to pursue the mortgaged premises, the claimants of the lien would deprive themselves of any right to prove their debt for the deficiency. This remark was not necessary to the decision of the cause, and was not, probably, intended to refer to anything but a final election not to submit to the authority of the bankruptcy court, in ascertaining the value of the property.

The Westchester Case did not differ greatly from that which has just been considered. The assignee answered in the state court, setting up, in substance, the alleged want of jurisdiction and was beaten in that court. He had also previously applied to the district court to enjoin the further prosecution of the suit, and this application was denied. These circumstances do not serve to take the case out of the rule previously stated.

In the Sugar-House Case, after the suit in the state court was ready for a decree, the assignee being a party, and having applied to the district court for an injunction, which was denied, the creditor applied to the district court to order a sale and to fix the deficiency, and this was granted, and correctly granted, unless what has been already said in this opinion is completely erroneous.

In the Sloane Case the assignee was made a party defendant, answered the bill in the state court, then, by stipulation, withdrew his answer, reserving the right to special notice of the sale, received such notice, and himself also advertised the sale. In respect to this part of the case, the circumstances of which are particularly discussed in the opinion of Judge Blatchford, in the district court,—In re Moller [Case No. 9,699],—I think it unnecessary to add anything.

The Sloane Case, as well as those of Gerdes and of Cooper, present questions in respect to the payment of taxes, assessments and water rates by the assignee, as debts entitled to priority in payment, under section 5101 of the Revised Statutes, sub-division third. These questions are amply discussed in the opinion of Judge Blatchford, and are disposed of in accordance with my understanding of the law. In both branches of the Sloane Case, and in the Gerdes and Cooper Cases, that opinion is adopted by this court. The orders appealed from are affirmed, with costs.

TOWAGE — LIABILITY FOR NEGLIGENCE—RUNNING BRIDGE—BILL OF LADING—DANGERS OF NAVIGATION—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. A steamboat with loaded barges in tow descending the Mississippi river about night-fall, the general bent of the weather being tempestuous, is in fault for running bridge piers; and the fact that the wrecking of a barge by collision with a pier was caused by a gust of wind does not relieve the liability.

2. The carrier, in order to avail himself of the exceptions of "dangers of navigation," must show due diligence and proper care to avoid the accident, and that it was unavoidable.

3. The burden of proof for this purpose is upon the carrier.

This was a libel by the Home Insurance Company, insurer, against the steamboat Mollie Mohler, to recover the value of 700 bags of wheat, shipped on the 12th day of May, 1866, at Mankato on the Minnesota river, on the barge Erickson, in tow of the steamer, to be delivered at St. Paul in good order, "dangers of fire and navigation only excepted." The wheat, having been damaged and lost to the owner, was surrendered to the company. Negligence, carelessness and unskillfulness of the master and crew of the boat were alleged in the libel, and denied in the answer.

MILLER, District Judge. It is confessed in the answer that the barge in tow of the steamboat was sunk in the Mississippi river, whereby the wheat was lost to its owner. And it is alleged in the answer, that the steamboat and barge proceeded on their voyage without accident until they reached the port of St. Peter, where they took in tow another barge called Eclipse, loaded with wheat, and then proceeded to the port of Belle Plains, where they took in tow another small barge called the Banty, also loaded with wheat. They proceeded without interruption or accident until on the 14th May, at about eight o'clock in the evening, when they reached a point in the Mississippi river about two miles above St. Paul, where there were several stone piers erected for the purpose of a railroad bridge across said river. The answer further states that just before they reached the piers, and while proceeding with due care and caution, the steamboat and barges being in the widest and best channel of the river, and the master and his mariners and servants being respectively in their proper places, a strong gust or gale of wind coming from a southerly direction suddenly arose and struck the steamboat and barges with great force and violence, so much so as to change their course, notwithstanding the best efforts of the master and mariners to keep them in their course. The wind, with the current of the river, which sets towards the middle of the piers, drove the steamboat and barges towards the middle pier, and in spite of the best efforts of the master and crew, the barge Eclipse struck the middle pier with great violence, which stove a hole in its side, by reason whereof it filled with water and sunk immediately; that the jar caused by the striking of the barge Eclipse against the pier, and the consequent sudden stoppage of the steamboat and barges and the swift current of the river, caused the barge Erickson to careen and fill with water, and sink.

It appears from the evidence, that the barge Eclipse was on the larboard side of the steamboat, the Erickson on the starboard side of the boat, and the Banty also on the starboard side, at the stern of the Erickson, following right after. The steamboat was 125 feet in length, 23 feet beam, had two engines and two boilers and stern wheel; and was staunch and able to handle the barges. The barges were not overloaded, were sufficient for the trade, and in good handling order. The boat and barges arrived at Mendota, the junction of the Minnesota and Mississippi rivers, about an hour before sundown on the 14th of May. The wind blowing hard that afternoon they remained at that port for it to lull, so that they might run the bridge piers at that place.

The wind having lulled so as to enable them to run those piers, they put out for St. Paul about sundown. The wind being southeasterly on the Mississippi river, they passed down on the right hand side of the river for about five miles, under the lee of continuous high bluffs, when they crossed over to the other side about the ferry landing, half a mile above the bridge piers, where the accident occurred, and there they encountered a high wind blowing in squalls or gusts. The water clear across the river was ten feet deep. They could have landed between the ferry and the cove, more than a quarter of a mile above the piers. There was no difficulty in making a landing near the ferry. The wind was blowing hard in gusts or squalls from the south-east, and continued so until the collision took place. They made no effort to land, but proceeded towards the piers, claiming the privilege of a descending boat to pass an ascending boat on the starboard side, in her efforts to run the piers. They made no effort to back, or head to the shore, doing nothing but to run the piers against the gusts or squalls of wind, stricking broad-side, about eight o'clock at night.

The distance between the piers was 165 feet and the breadth of the steamboat and tow was 65 feet. There cannot be fault found in the attempt to run the piers within this space, nor in the management of the boat at the time, nor with the conduct of the master and crew, as they all seem to have been at their respective posts of duty. The fault lies in not making a landing on discovering the boisterous state of the weather while crossing the river to the left hand bank, where there were two landing places, or putting back. The event cannot sanction the excuse of a sudden gust of wind as the cause of the collision. The master was admonished half a mile above, to secure his boat and tow by turning back or effecting a landing, and not to attempt running the piers at nightfall, while the general bent of the weather was tempestuous and boisterous.

It is incumbent on the master, in order to bring himself within the exception in the bill of lading, "of dangers of navigation," to prove that due diligence and proper skill were used to avoid the accident, and that it was unavoidable. The carrier must satisfy the court that there was no default on his part, and that every reasonable effort was made to avoid the accident. The burden of proof is on him to bring himself within the exception. When a collision or loss occurs, in the absence of fault on the part of the carrier, under circumstances beyond his control from vis major, as from storm, or waves, or reflex of the tide, or lightning, he is not held liable even on a clean bill of lading. In the case of The Lady Pike [Case No. 7,985], the boat towing three loaded barges down stream, on approaching the same bridge piers as in this case, too closely to back or stop, one of the barges was driven against a pier by a sudden and unanticipated gust of wind. I decreed that the carrier was not liable for the loss of the cargo of the damaged barge. In that case the accident could not be avoided. In this case the master was admonished in time by the boisterous and tempestuous state of the weather not to run the piers, but to make a landing or put back, either of which he could have done nearly half a mile above the piers. In the opinion in the case of The Lady Pike [supra], I remark: "If the piers had been approached under a high wind, the boat should be condemned for unskillfulness of the officers; but there was a calm until the approach to the piers was too close to admit of avoiding the effect of an unanticipated and sudden gust of wind." See, also, Amies v. Stevens, 1 Strange, 128. The collision with the pier was the result of recklessness on the part of the master, and the decree must be for the libellant.

[NOTE. The claimants of the Mollie Mohler, upon appeal, took the case into the circuit court, where the decree of this court was affirmed. Case unreported. Upon further appeal the case was taken to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed. 21 Wall. (88 U. S.) 230.]

Case No. 9,702.

MOLSON et al. v. HAWLEY.

[1 Blatchf. 409.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1849.

BILLS AND NOTES — ACCOMMODATION PAPER — HOLDER WITH NOTICE—GIVEN FOR PRIOR DEBT—AMOUNT RECOVERABLE.

1. Where a promissory note was endorsed by H., without restriction, for the accommodation of T., and was applied by T. to the payment and satisfaction of a note of like amount held by M. against T., then due and unpaid: Held, that M. could recover against H. on the note, although M. when he received the note knew that it was accommodation paper.

[Cited in brief in Faulkner v. Faulkner, 73 Mo. 335.]

2. Especially could M. recover, where the prior note held by him was a note endorsed by H., on which H. stood at the time charged as endorser.

3. Where a note was endorsed by H., without restriction, for the accommodation of T., and was applied as security for the payment of a subsisting account due from T. to M.: Held, that M. could recover against H. on the note, whether M. when he took the note knew or did not know that it was accommodation paper.

[Cited in Thatcher v. West River Nat. Bank, 19 Mich. 202.]

4. In such case, the amount recoverable on the note is prima facie the amount shown to have been due on the account at the time the note was taken by M., although no settlement or liquidation of the account is proved.

5. And, where M.'s agent, prior to the taking of the note, presented to T. an account current between T. and M., and the agent and T., after examining the account, concluded upon the amount then due to M.: Held, that the testimony of the agent to those facts, without the production of the account current, was competent and prima facie sufficient evidence, to show that the amount so concluded upon was due on the account at the time M. took the note.

Assumpsit, by endorsees against endorser, on two promissory notes, tried before Conkling, J., in 1836. The notes were both of them dated Rochester, June 10th, 1834, made by Thorn & Frink, payable at the United States Branch Bank, New-York, to the order of Jesse Hawley and endorsed by him, one for $2000, payable four months after date, and the other for $1500, payable three months after date. The notes were endorsed by Hawley for the accommodation and benefit of the makers, without restriction, and were passed by them into the hands of an agent of the plaintiffs [John Molson, Jr., and George Davies]. At the time the defendent endorsed the $2000 note, the plaintiffs held a note of a like amount made by Thorn & Frink and endorsed by the defendant, which was due and unpaid, and on which he had been duly charged as endorser. The plaintiffs took the last $2000 note in payment and satisfaction of the prior one. The $1500 note was taken by the plaintiffs' agent as security for the payment of a balance of account due from Thorn & Frink to the plaintiffs. The agent received the notes on the day of their date, and knew at the time that Hawley's endorsements were for the accommodation of Thorn & Frink. It appeared, on the trial, that there had been business transactions between the plaintiffs, who resided at Montreal, and Thorn & Frink, from 1831 to 1834, the latter shipping produce to the former for sale; and the plaintiffs gave evidence to show that a balance greater than the amount of the notes was due them from Thorn & Frink at the time their agent received the notes, although it did not appear that there had been any settlement or liquidation of the account, other than the one hereafter mentioned. The plaintiffs' agent testified that he went to Rochester in February, 1834, to obtain property or security from Thorn & Frink, and took with him an account current between the latter and the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs then proposed to give in evidence the declaration of Thorn & Frink as to the amount then due to the plaintiffs. This was objected to on the ground that Thorn & Frink were competent witnesses and should be produced. But the court decided that if the plaintiffs' agent went into an accounting with Thorn & Frink, and ascertained and settled any balance in that way, it was competent to prove the fact by the agent. He then testified that Thorn & Frink and himself examined the account and came to the conclusion that about the sum of $8400 was then due to the plaintiffs. The defendant objected to the reception of the testimony, on the grounds that the account current alluded to should be produced and that the evidence did not tend to prove any accounting.

At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant's counsel requested the court to charge the jury, that if they believed from the testimony that the defendant was an accommodation endorser for Thorn & Frink of the notes in question, and that the plaintiffs took the notes from the makers either in payment of or as security for a pre-existing debt, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. The court refused so to charge and the defendant's counsel excepted. The defendant's counsel also requested the court to charge the jury, that if the defendant was an accommodation endorser of the notes for the benefit of the makers, and the plaintiffs received the notes from the makers as security for any balance that might be due them from the makers upon a settlement of their account, then the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover without showing a balance due upon a legal liquidation or settlement of such account. But the court instructed the jury that if they should be of opinion that there was any balance due from Thorn & Frink to the plaintiffs at the time the agent of the plaintiffs received the notes, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover such balance against the defendant upon the notes, although there had been no settlement or liquidation of the account between the plaintiffs and Thorn & Frink; but that it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to prove that such a balance was in fact due, and that their right of recovery was limited to the amount, not exceeding the amount of the notes, of the balance so proved. To this charge the defendant's counsel excepted. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, and the defendant now moved for a new trial, on a bill of exceptions.

William Curtis Noyes, for plaintiffs.
Samuel Stevens, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. Inasmuch as the $2000 note was endorsed by the defendant, without restriction, for the benefit of the makers, and was applied by them to the payment and satisfaction of a note of similar amount held by the plaintiffs against the makers, then due and unpaid, it was available in the plaintiffs' hands, notwithstanding it was accommodation paper and that fact was known to their agent at the time he thus received and applied it. Especially was that note available in the plaintiffs' hands, as it was applied to the payment and satisfaction of a like note of the makers endorsed by the defendant, and upon which he stood at the time charged as endorser. For aught that appears, the prior note was a valid security in the plaintiffs' hands, and the payment of it obligatory upon the defendant. Its application, therefore, was but the payment of the defendant's own note.

The $1500 note was available in the plaintiffs' hands, as it was endorsed without restriction, and applied to the payment or security for payment of a subsisting account due from the makers to the plaintiffs; and this, whether the plaintiffs or their agent knew or did not know that it was accommodation paper. The proof that the makers were indebted to the plaintiffs to the amount of the two notes, was competent and prima facie sufficient. New trial denied.

MOLYNEAUX v. MARSH.

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1871.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY — DECREE — SATISFACTION — EXECUTION—HOW ARRESTED—SEVERAL DEFENDANTS—EFFECT OF COMPROMISE WITH SOME—BILL OF DISCOVERY—COSTS.

1. If a decree be satisfied, the execution should be arrested on motion, without a new bill.

2. When a decree is rendered against several defendants, a compromise by complainant, with some, as to their portion of the debt, does not release the other defendants.

3. If a creditor chooses to take fifty per cent. on the dollar from some of his debtors, no promise made to them will compel him to accept payment at a similar rate from others.

4. Where several persons are liable for the same debt, each one is entitled to know what amount of money the creditor has received; and for such purpose may cite the creditor to a discovery, by complying with the rules in such cases. Should the creditor refuse to make the disclosure, he will be liable to the costs of a bill of discovery.

In equity. Heard upon motion for injunction.

A. R. Lawton, for complainant.
Wm. Daugherty, for defendant.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. On the 20th day of May, 1871, the defendants obtained against the complainant and others, a decree in this court, declaring that they, the defendants, were judgment creditors of the Merchants' & Planters' Bank of Savannah to the amount in the aggregate of $435,000, and had exhausted their remedies at law, and that the now complainant and the other defendants in that case were stockholders of said bank and had in their hands, respectively, portions of the capital stock of the same unpaid, in the proportion and amounts named in the decree, amounting in the aggregate to $631,642, of which the estate of Edmund Molyneaux, represented by the complainant as administrator, held $96,480, and it was by said decree ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the complainants in said former suit (the defendants in this suit) should have and recover of the defendants in that suit, so much of the aforesaid several sums of money in their hands, respectively, as would pay off and discharge the demands of the complainants therein, and that execution should issue accordingly; and as to the estate of the said Molyneaux, it was ordered and decreed, that execution should issue, to be levied upon the goods and chattels, lands and tenements in the hands of the said administrator to be administered. The complainants in such former suit have sued out an execution against the Molyneaux estate as directed in the decree, and the marshal has levied on a house in Savannah belonging to the estate. The present bill is filed to obtain, and the application is for an injunction to prevent the sale of the property levied on, to arrest further proceedings on said decree, and to administer all the affairs of the bank through the medium of the receiver heretofore appointed.

The question of referring the claims of the complainants in the former suit to the administration of the receiver was one of the issues fully discussed and determined in that suit, and it was held that the complainants were entitled to proceed in the manner which they had adopted, and that the fund against which they were proceeding, to wit, the unpaid stock, was not in the receiver's hands, but was liable to be subjected to the payment of the judgments obtained by those complainants. According to the views of the court and the terms of the decree, the complainants were entitled to issue executions against each and all of the defendants without any other restrictions than these, namely: that no greater sum should be levied on the property of any defendant than the amount of unpaid stock, which, by the decree, was found to be in his hands, and that no greater sum in the aggregate should be raised from the property of all the defendants than the amount due the complainants; such were the rights of the parties at the rendition of the decree. The question now is, whether, since the decree, the complainants in that case have done anything to curtail their rights, and subject themselves to the relief now prayed against them. If their claims have been paid and satisfied, the execution ought certainly to be arrested. But that could and should be done on motion without a new bill. It is not pretended, however, that the claims have been paid. The bill complains that the complainants in the former suit have taken an inequitable course, by receiving fifty per cent. of the amount of their stock from some of the defendants, and agreeing to demand no more from them until all the stockholders shall have paid a similar proportion, and by refusing to make a similar arrangement with the complainant in the present suit. However capricious and partial this conduct may appear, it is not a legal ground of defense to the execution. The complainant is only required to pay the amount found in his hands by the decree. The bill, however, alleges that the complainants in the former suit, by their agents, proposed and agreed to make a similar arrangement of fifty per cent. with all the defendants. But it does not allege that any such agreement was made with the complainant in this suit, nor that he parted with any consideration in consequence of any such proposition, and from the answer it is apparent that, at most, the agents and solicitors of the complainants in the former suit told some of the parties with whom they did make such arrangement, that they would do the same with others that might come into it. Surely such a declaration as this could not create a binding obligation to such other persons. It could, at most, only affect the validity of the arrangement made with those to whom the declaration was made. But I do not imagine that it could even have that effect. It is totally unlike the case of a debtor making a composition with his creditors. In that case, the consent of one creditor to the composition is a consideration for the consent of the others, so that all are bound thereby. But this is a case of a creditor dealing with his debtors. If he chooses to take fifty cents on a dollar from ninety and nine of them, no promise made to them will obligate him to take that proportion from the one hundredth, and for the plain reason that none of the ninety and nine give up any consideration which they were not legally bound to pay. The bill further alleges, and it is admitted by the answers, that the complainants in the former suit have also made similar arrangements with, and received money from, stockholders who were not parties to that suit. This, surely, cannot injure the complainant, but must, pro tanto, benefit him, for it tends to lighten the burden which the decree has cast upon his shoulders. As to the allegation, that these transactions have been privately made so that the complainant cannot know what amount of money the defendants have received; it is sufficient to say, that the case is not different from all other cases where several persons are liable for the same debt; each one is always entitled to know what money the creditor has received, and if he has any doubt on the subject, he may always cite the creditor to a discovery, by complying with the rules in such cases. In the present case the bill does not allege, and the answers do not disclose, that the claims or any considerable portion of them have been paid. The complainant is, undoubtedly, at all times entitled to a full and frank disclosure of the amounts which the defendants may have received, and if they refuse to make such disclosure they will be liable for the costs of a bill of discovery, but nothing of that kind, even, is alleged. In all these respects, therefore, the bill is without foundation, and this is the sum and substance of its allegations.

A fact is disclosed, however, by the answers, which has given me some embarrassment. It appears that the solicitors of the complainants in the former suit, in making the beforementioned arrangements or compromises with the defendants therein (as well as with other stockholders), have made them for the equal benefit of the said complainants, and of all other billholders whom they represent, of whom there appear to be several. These outside billholders have received $42,500 of the $113,500 which have been collected. I cannot precisely see where the said complainants get authority to do this. The decree of the court, subjecting the unpaid stock to the payment of the judgment creditors, at whose instance it was obtained, and making it a trust fund in the hands of the stockholders for that purpose was not made for the benefit of creditors at large. Whether billholders or others, creditors at large cannot reach that fund, and the court will not reach it for them. The defendants, by suffering creditors at large to share with them the proceeds of this fund, which the court has enabled them to lay their hands on for their own benefit alone, must at least be accountable for the amount so appropriated. It seems to me they must account for the whole amount of $113,500, which has been collected from this source, and any other amount which they may hereafter collect in the same manner. But as this amount, when credited on the decree, does not relieve the complainant from any part of his burthen, the injunction must be denied, but without costs.

The MONADNOCK.

[5 Ben. 357;[1] 5 Am. Law T. Rep. 89; 15 Int. Rev. Rec. 33.]

District Court, E. D. New York. Nov., 1871.

SEAMAN'S WAGES—LIEN ON FREIGHT—ADVANCES BY MASTER—SEIZURE OF CARGO—PRACTICE—BILL OF LADING—ACT OF JULY 20, 1846.

1. Where cargo is arrested in admiralty in respect of the freight due for its transportation, the ordinary course is for the owner of the cargo to pay into the registry of the court any freight, acknowledged to be due, and thus obtain a release of his property from the custody of the marshal, and a discharge of his liability for the freight.

2. Freighters cannot be compelled to give bail for the value of cargo so arrested, and have no right, under ordinary circumstances, to give bail for freight which they acknowledge to be due.

3. Parties, claiming an interest in freight money, so paid into the registry, should file their claim and set up their rights by answer.

4. A canal-boat, being at Buffalo, her master and owner, A., employed a commission merchant, B., to find a freight for her, and B. made a contract with the firm of S. & B. for the transportation to New York, on the boat, of a cargo of lumber, which they had sold to S. & S. Thereupon B. signed a bill of lading, as master of the boat, for the cargo, which bill provided that the freight, when earned, was to be paid to J. & Co. in New York. The next day A., as master, signed another bill of lading, describing B. as agent of the shippers, and containing a memorandum signed by B. that $656 47 had been advanced to the captain, and directing J. & Co. to pay to the captain the balance of freight, and hold the advance subject to B.'s draft. The $656 47 had been advanced to A. by B. as a commission merchant, including his commissions, and for his security the freight was made payable to J. & Co. A. also drew a draft on J. & Co. for $25, which was also paid on the same security. The canal-boat having performed the voyage, a libel for wages was filed, on behalf of the crew of the canal-boat, against the freight money, and the cargo was arrested. S. & S., J. & Co., and B. claimed the cargo, and bonded it on the usual stipulation for value, and filed a joint answer, averring that S. & S. owned the cargo, and J. & Co. and B. the freight money, by reason of the advances made by them, and that any lien for the libellants' wages could only be enforced against the amount due to A. after deducting the advances. A. also filed a petition, as co-libellant, to recover advances made by him for navigating the boat. Held, that although the proper course of practice had not been pursued in the case, yet as no objection had been taken, the court would dispose of the questions raised, except that of jurisdiction, which would be held for further argument.

5. The bill of lading signed by B. must be held to be the contract under which the cargo was carried, and the lien of the crew on the freight money for their wages would not be affected by the assumption by B. of the character of master, with the assent of A.

6. The advance by B. to A. was not an advance payment of freight, nor was the advance by J. & Co. to him.

7. The pledge of the freight to J. & Co. by A. could not displace the lien with which the law charges freight money for the wages of the crew.

8. The act of congress of July 20, 1846 (9 Stat. 38), did not exempt freight money of a canal-boat from being arrested in a suit for wages.

9. A. could not claim a priority to J. & Co. either for his wages or for advances made by him.

[This was a libel for seaman's wages by Donald McDonald against the freight money of the canal-boat Monadnock.]

A. Nash, for libellants.

C. Van Santvoord, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The question of jurisdiction which this case presents will be reserved, to be decided when the same shall have been fully argued by counsel, with reference to the effect of the recent decisions of the supreme court, and the other questions of the case will be now disposed of, upon the assumption that the case is within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. Before considering those questions, I notice a peculiarity in the mode of procedure adopted. The action is brought to enforce a lien for wages upon the freight money due the boat "Monadnock" for the transportation of a cargo of lumber. Upon the filing of the libel, process was issued requiring the marshal to arrest the lumber described in the libel. The lumber was accordingly seized, and was subsequently discharged from custody upon the usual stipulation for value given by the claimants.

The claim filed was a joint claim, made by the firm of Steinway & Sons, the firm of Geo. Jennison & Co., and B. F. Bruce; and these claimants filed a joint answer, which sets forth that Steinway & Sons are the owners and consignees of the lumber, and that it is subject to the payment of freight, according to a bill of lading annexed; that B. F. Bruce and Geo. Jennison & Co. are the owners of the freight money, by reason of advances made by them on, and in payment of, said freight, in advance, at Buffalo and in transit, which advances, and the mode of making the same, are particularly described. The answer then denies any knowledge respecting the earning of the wages set forth in the libel, and avers that, if the court has jurisdiction to enforce the claims of the libellants against the freight, it can rightfully do so only to the amount which shall appear to be due the master or owner of the boat, after deducting the advances referred to.

The master and owner of the boat do not interpose any defence, and have made no claim to the freight money, and the case has been heard without objection upon the pleadings above mentioned. Upon this method of procedure, I remark, that when cargo is arrested in respect to the freight due for its transportation, the ordinary course is for the owner of the cargo to pay into the registry any freight acknowledged to be due, and thus obtain a release of his property from the custody of the marshal, and a discharge of his liability for the freight so paid. Freighters cannot be compelled to give bail for the value of a cargo seized only in respect to freight, nor forced to incur a liability for the cost of defending a suit in which they have no interest; and they have no right, under ordinary circumstances, to give bail for freight which they acknowledge to be due. Coote, Adm. pp. 14, 24; The Lady Durham, 3 Hagg. Adm. 200; The Riby Grove, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 59; The Victor, 1 Lush. 72.

The proper course here would have been for Steinway & Sons to have paid into the registry the freight which they admit they owe upon this cargo, and thus retire from the controversy; or if they desire first to dispute the jurisdiction of the court, they could do so by special plea to the jurisdiction, and apply for leave to receive the cargo upon a stipulation to hold the freight, subject to the decision of the court upon such plea.

As to the other claimants, upon the payment of the freight into the registry, they should have filed their respective claims, showing their interest therein, and set up their rights by answer. I am aware that there are cases in the books which allude to a different procedure from the one indicated, but I have thought proper to state what I conceive to be the better practice. I am not called on to interfere with the mode of procedure which has been adopted, because no objection has been taken to it; and the case has been tried upon pleadings, which both sides have treated as properly raising the points which have been discussed by the advocates.

Upon the evidence introduced as bearing upon the issues, no question has been made as to the services set forth in the libel. They are proved to have been rendered, as alleged. Nor has it been contended that a lien for such services does not attach to any freight, earned by means of those services, which remains due and payable to the master. But it is contended that certain payments of money, proved to have been made to the master and owner, were in legal effect payments of freight in advance, and that the balance only can be held subject to a lien for the wages in question. The circumstances attending the payments are as follows:

The boat being at Buffalo, and desiring a cargo, B. F. Bruce, who was a commission merchant, was employed by the master and owner to find a freight for her. Bruce, acting as agent for the boat, negotiated a contract with the firm of Scater & Belton, for the transportation to New York of a cargo of lumber, which they had sold to Steinway & Sons, deliverable in New York. That contract was set out in a bill of lading, which bears date August 9th, and which provides that the freight, when earned, is to be paid by Steinway & Sons to George Jennison & Co., in New York. The bill of lading untruly described Bruce as the master of the boat, and was signed by Bruce in that capacity, instead of by the real master, whose name was Arthur, under the supposition, doubtless, that the shippers thus obtained the additional guaranty of Bruce for the due transportation and delivery of the cargo. Such a misstatement of fact, in a bill of lading, is said to be usual in this trade. If so, it is not to be approved, and if effectual for any purpose, does not touch the rights of the libellants here. The assumption by the broker of the character of master, with the knowledge and assent of the master and owner of the boat, did not change the liability of the boat for the transportation of the cargo, or the liability of Steinway & Sons to the boat for the freight, as provided in the bill of lading, of August 9th, or affect the lien of the libellants upon that freight. This bill of lading I incline to consider as the contract under which this cargo was transported, and according to which alone the freight proceeded against is payable.

But the answer sets up, and the evidence shows that there was another bill of lading, dated the day after the one already referred to, which is similar to the first one, except that it describes B. F. Bruce as the agent of the shippers, and makes no allusion to Scater & Belton, the real shippers, and it is signed by Arthur, the master of the boat. This bill of lading also contains the following memorandum: "Advance to captain, $656 47. On delivery, Geo. Jennison & Co. will pay captain balance of freight, holding my advance subject to my draft. B. F. Bruce." If this bill of lading can be considered as the contract under which the freight in question was earned by the boat, still it can have no effect as against the crew to make Bruce the shipper, or to give to the advances made by him the legal character of advances of freight, for the fact remains clearly proven by the evidence, that Bruce was not the freighter or the agent of the freighters, and made no advances of his money on the security of the freight to be earned. According to the evidence, Bruce, as a commission merchant, and not otherwise, advanced $656 47, including his commissions, and for his security the whole freight money was made payable to his correspondent, Geo. Jennison & Co., in New York, on whom he drew for that amount, and by whom not only his draft, but the subsequent draft of the master for $25, was paid upon the security of the provision, which was in both bills of lading, that the freight was to be collected by them alone. Jennison & Co. have no more advanced freight than Bruce, for they have never owed the freight, but expect to collect it of Steinway & Sons, the freighters, under the authority given by the bill of lading, and when collected to repay their advances out of it, and account to the master for the balance.

Under this view of the case, it is obvious that the question here is simply one of priority between Geo. Jennison & Co., and the crew; and the answer is clear. The pledge of the freight to Geo. Jennison & Co. may be entirely valid, so far as it was possible for the master and owner of the boat to pledge the freight; but the law charges freight money with a lien for the wages of the crew, which the master or owner cannot displace by any pledge made to secure advances to him. Freight, from the inception of the voyage, is charged with a hypothecatory interest in favor of the crew for their wages, and all assignments by the master or owners are subject thereto.

I should here remark, that I do not intend to say whether or not, in a navigation so peculiar as this, there may not be expenses, such as canal tolls for instance, which, from their nature, and the circumstances of the case, should be held to be a charge upon the freight in preference to the wages of the crew. If navigation of this description is to come within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, the principles of the law administered by courts of admiralty, will be found to be sufficient to protect that navigation, and enable it to be conducted as its exigencies and the interest of commerce shall require. Here no difficulty arises from the fact, that part of the sums advanced was applied to pay expenses peculiar to this navigation, inasmuch as the freight is sufficient to pay the wages of the crew after deducting those expenses.

The proposition of the answer therefore, that the demands of the libellants can be enforced only to the extent of the balance of freight, after deducting the amount of the advances made in Buffalo, is held untenable; and the libellants if they are entitled to maintain the action at all in this court, must be held entitled to be paid out of the freight, in preference to the claimants.

A second ground of defence, urged in behalf of the claimants, is that this freight is not liable to be proceeded against for wages, because exempted by the act of congress, of July 20th, 1846 (9 Stat. 38). The statute referred to is not set up in the answer as a bar to the action, nor alluded to therein; but its construction and effect having been argued by the advocates, I treat it as having been pleaded. This statute, if it could be construed so as to exempt canal-boats from seizure while being navigated, either during a voyage or during the season of navigation on the canals, would have no other than a beneficial effect. But treated as affording unlimited exemption to the boats described, its effect would be to cast adrift in the port of New York, at the close of navigation in each year, a very considerable number of needy men, defrauded of their wages for a longer or shorter period, by the irresponsible masters, who leave their boats here for the winter, and depart for their homes without paying the crew. The men thus oppressed, are of a class as much in need of the protection of a court of admiralty, as those seamen who follow the high seas; and I doubt not, that if the act could be so construed as to afford opportunity to apply the rules of the maritime law, in respect to the liens for wages, to boats of this class, much injustice would be prevented, and that an improvement in the character and responsibility of those who command these boats would follow, to the advantage of commerce and the state. I do not intend however to intimate at this time any opinion, as to the effect to be given to the statute in question, upon proceedings against the boats themselves, inasmuch as the present case relates solely to freight. If the act does not cover the freight, it is not material to this controversy, except in so far as it admits that navigation of this character is within the jurisdiction of the admiralty. In my opinion, the act in question does not include the freight within its exemption. The provision at the close of the first section, which is relied on, is of a character to warrant a court of admiralty, in refusing to extend it beyond the import of the words used; and there is no word in the act which covers freight money.

It is contended, that freight is appurtenant to the vessel, and therefore necessarily included with the vessel. But although freight money has been said to be appurtenant to the vessel, it is not an appurtenance in such sense that it always follows the condition of the vessel, or is always included when the vessel is named. Freight money is often proceeded against, when the vessel is not touched. It may be proceeded against when the vessel is lost. It is in some cases, as in that of masters' wages, subject to liens from which the vessel is exempt. It is the well known and natural fund for the payment of wages, and should not be held to be exempted from the charge by any other than an express provision of law. To limit the effect of the statute to the boats described in it, does not interfere with the accomplishment of the object of the provision in question, which relates to the remedy, and was intended to prevent the use of the summary process of the admiralty to stop, in the canal, boats there being drawn by horses. At least it is confined by its terms to boats so navigated, and the difficulties of navigation resulting from seizures of that class of boats would seem to be the evil, which the provisions in the statute sought to obviate.

My conclusion, therefore, upon this branch of the case is, that the act of July, 1846, has no effect to exempt the freight in question from being proceeded against, in this action for the wages of the crew. There is besides the claim of the crew for their wages, a claim of the master, who has filed his petition to be made co-libellant, and who seeks to enforce a lien against this freight, for a balance due him for advances made by him towards navigating the boat. In regard to this claim, it is sufficient to say, that the master, by the memorandum upon the bill of lading signed by him, acknowledged the receipt of $656 47, upon security of the freight; and both bills of lading made the freight payable to Jennison & Co. to render the security effectual, with authority to them to deduct the advances made. He also afterwards drew from Jennison & Co. $25, on the same security. As against a claim, secured to be paid out of this fund, by the assignment of the master himself, the master can make no claim to preference, either for wages due him, or advances made by him.

The demand of the master will therefore be disallowed. Having thus disposed of all the defences, except that based on the want of jurisdiction, I direct that the cause be reargued upon that point.

Case No. 9,705.

MONCE et al. v. ADAMS.

[12 Blatchf. 1; 1 Ban. & A. 126; 7 O. G. 177.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. April Term, 1874.

PATENTS—TOOL FOR CUTTING GLASS—ANGLE OF CUT TO SURFACE—SPECIFICATION—AMBIGUITY.

1. The invention covered by the letters patent granted to Samuel G. Monce, June 8th, 1869, for an "improved tool for cutting glass," the claims of which are, "(1) The cutter, A, constructed substantially as shown and described, and for the purposes set forth; (2) the combination of the cutter, A, frame, B, and handle, C, substantially as and for the purposes described," consists, so far as the revolving steel cutter is concerned, in the fact that its sides are made parallel and then bevelled towards each other at an angle of about 45° to the axis of the cutter, so as to meet about midway between the same, in a cutting edge, and to be at right angles to each other.

2. The value of a diamond, for cutting glass, depends not merely on its hardness, but on the fact that its surfaces are curved, the meeting of any two of them presenting a curvilinear edge, and that the diamond is so placed that the line of the intended cut is a tangent to this edge, near to its extremity, and that the two surfaces of the diamond laterally adjacent are equally inclined to the surface of the glass, and the cutting edges are at right angles to each other.

3. The conditions necessary to form a glazier's diamond are found in the invention of the patent. The patent is valid.

4. The cutter of the patent was not anticipated by a cutter for cutting glass, made of hardened steel, which made a cut at an angle of 45° to the surface of the glass, the cutter of the patent making the cut at a right angle to such surface.

5. The cutter of the patent was the first successful substitute for the glazier's diamond.

6. The specification of the patent is not ambiguous, in saying, merely, that the cutter is to be "hardened," and in not saying what degree of hardness is to be given to it.

[This was a bill by Samuel G. Monce and Rollin J. Ives against Benjamin F. Adams for an injunction and an account. The plaintiffs pray that the defendant be restrained from further infringement of letters patent No. 91,150, granted to S. G. Monce, June 8, 1869.]

Charles E. Mitchell, for plaintiffs.

W. Edgar Simonds, for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The complainants are the owners of a patent for an alleged new and useful "improved tool for cutting glass," and have brought their bill against the defendant, alleging an infringement by the latter, and praying for an injunction and an account. The patent was granted to Samuel G. Monce, one of the complainants, on the 8th of June, 1869. The defence contained in the answer, and chiefly relied upon, is a denial that said Monce was the first inventor of the patented article. It is also alleged, that the description of the invention set forth in the specification is incomplete and ambiguous.

The patented article was designed to be an economical and effective substitute for a glazier's diamond, in the cutting of glass. The alleged invention is thus described in the specification: "My invention consists in the use or employment of a revolving steel roller, the periphery of which roller is bevelled on both sides, so as to form a cutting edge, and is fitted to revolve in a suitable frame, and attached to a handle for operating the same. The cutter is made from steel, and is turned smooth and round, and afterwards hardened. The sides are parallel, or nearly so, for a short distance, and then bevelled towards each other, so as to meet about midway between the same, thus forming the point or cutting edge. The bevelled portion of the sides should be at an angle of about forty-five degrees to the axis of the cutter, and, consequently, will be at near right angles to each other. It is not necessary that the angles of the bevelled sides should be at exactly right angles to each other, but near that angle, or a very little more obtuse, the cutter is found to operate to the best advantage. The cutter can be fitted to revolve upon a pin, or on solid journals at each end, which latter mode I prefer, and show the same in drawings. The frame, near one end, is provided with bearings for the journals, which journals should be a little shorter than the thickness of the sides of the frame, in order that, when the sides are placed against a straight edge or other gauge, the end of the journal shall not come in contact with such gauge. The handle, C, can be of any desired form, and secured to the frame in any proper manner. I construct said handle like the handle ordinarily used for a diamond tool. * * * By my invention I produce a tool for cutting glass, which is equally convenient in use as an ordinary diamond, and can be sold at a large profit, for one-tenth of the usual cost of a diamond." The claim is as follows: "I do not claim simply a revolving cutter, but what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is: (1) The cutter, A, constructed substantially as shown and described, and for the purposes set forth. (2) The combination of the cutter, A, frame, B, and handle, C, substantially as and for the purposes described."

The drawings attached to the specification show that the instrument is a tiny steel revolving cutter or wheel, made as described in the specification, attached to a frame and handle, the whole resembling very much the glazier's diamond ordinarily in use. It is clearly proved that this instrument is exceedingly well adapted to the purpose for which it was designed; that very large quantities have been sold at a cheap rate; that it has superseded the use of all other steel glass-cutters; and that it is an efficient and useful tool, while previous inventions have been failures. A glazier's diamond is sold at from $3.50 to $5.00, while this article is sold at fifty cents or less. The use of a tool for glass-cutting is thus brought within the reach of every householder. It is admitted, that the invention does not consist of a revolving cutter; and it is obvious that it does not consist in a revolving cutter of a high degree or hardness, for, "hardened" steel cutters had been known previously to the date of the patent. The invention, then, so far as the cutter is concerned, must consist in its form—in the fact that the sides are made parallel, and then bevelled towards each other at an angle of about forty-five degrees to the axis of the cutter, so as to meet about midway between the same, in a cutting edge. The sides, at the cutting edge, will, consequently, if they are at an angle of forty-five degrees to the axis of rotation, be at right angles to each other. As has been said, the object of the patentee was to make an economical substitute for the glazier's diamond, which should, if possible, possess the requisites which experience had shown were best adapted to successful glass-cutting.

In order to determine whether the utility and success of this invention depends upon any peculiarities in the form of the cutter, it is desirable to ascertain upon what depends the efficiency of the diamond. While almost any diamond will scratch or tear the surface of glass, it is a fact that the value and efficiency of a diamond to be used for the cutting or severing of glass, depends not merely on the hardness, but upon the form, of the cutting surface. Other gems than the diamond will successfully cut glass, provided they can be shaped into forms similar to those of the diamonds used for this purpose. Dr. Wollaston, in the Philosophical Transactions for 1816, thus explains the peculiarities required for the glazier's diamond: "In the natural diamond, there is this peculiarity, in those modifications of the crystals that are chosen for this purpose, that the surfaces are, in general, all curved, and, consequently, the meeting of any two of them presents a curvilinear edge. If the diamond is so placed, that the line of the intended cut is a tangent to this edge, near to its extremity, and if the two surfaces of the diamond laterally adjacent be equally inclined to the surface of the glass, then the conditions necessary for effecting a cut are complied with. The curvature is not considerable, and, consequently, the limits of inclination are very confined. If the handle be too much or too little elevated, the one extremity of the curve will be made to bear irregularly upon the glass, and will plough a ragged groove, by pressure of its point. But, on the contrary, when the contact is duly formed, a simple fissure is effected, as if by lateral pressure of the adjacent surfaces of the diamond, diverted equally to each side. The effects of inequality in the lateral inclination of the faces of the diamond to the surface of the glass are different according to the degree of inequality. If the difference be very small, the cut may still be clean, but, as the fissure is then not at right angles to the surface, the subsequent fracture is found inclined accordingly. When an attempt is made to cut with an inclination that deviates still more from the perpendicular, the glass is found superficially flawed out on that side to which the greater pressure was diverted, and the cut completely fails."

Again, from the testimony given in this case it appears, that it is necessary, for practical use, as a glass-cutter, that the sides of the instrument should be bevelled towards each other at about a right angle, for two reasons: 1st. A more acute angle would not be sufficiently durable. 2d. Experience has shown that, in order to cut glass successfully, the cutting edges of the tool, whether of a diamond or of any other cutter, must be at a right angle to each other. This fact is also asserted by the authorities upon the subject. The reason why such an angle is necessary does not seem to be clearly explained. Hence, the requisites of the form of a tool best adapted to glass-cutting, are three-fold: 1st. The cutting edge should be curvilinear. 2d. The cutting edges should be at right angles to each other. 3d. The two surfaces of the diamond which are adjacent to the cutting edge should be equally inclined to the surface of the glass. The cutter should also be so placed in its frame as most easily to bring the cut which is to be made at right angles with the surface of the glass.

Recurring, now, to the alleged invention, the sides of the cutter are made parallel and then bevelled towards each other at an angle of about forty-five degrees to the axis of the cutter, so as to meet about midway, in a cutting edge. The conditions necessary to form a glazier's diamond are thus complied with; for, by making the two sides of the cutter parallel for a short distance, and then bevelling them towards each other at an angle of forty-five degrees to the axis of rotation, till they meet, "the two surfaces" of the cutting instrument, "laterally adjacent, are equally inclined to the surface of the glass." The frame being attached to the cutter in the precise way in which the handle is attached to the diamond, the inclination of the cut will naturally be at right angles to the surface of the glass, and the lateral pressure of the adjacent surface of the cutter is "diverted equally to each side." Furthermore, the sides, at the cutting edge, being at or near an angle of forty-five degrees to the axis of rotation, will be at or near an angle of ninety degrees to each other.

Having thus ascertained wherein the peculiarity of the cutter consists, is this form a new invention of the patentee, or has it been anticipated by others? The respondent claims that this alleged invention is an instance of double use—the mere application of an old device to a new purpose. He introduces the patents of Charles Wilson, of March 13th, 1847, and April 10th, 1849, of Joseph E. Stanwood, of April 26th, 1859, and of A. H. Hook, of September 13th, 1864, to show, not only that the use of steel cutters for cutting hard substances was well known, but that the cutter in each of these patents was of a similar form with the one in the Monce patent.

The first patent to Charles Wilson was for a mode of cutting stone or other like material, by means of a revolving cutter, operating in a described manner, and was particularly designed for the smoothing and finishing of grindstones. Whether the knives in Wilson's machine are able to cut glass or not is unknown. In either event, the particular form or shape of the knives or cutters was not a part of Wilson's machine, and, whether they were or were not accidentally bevelled at an angle of forty-five degrees, was an unrecognized circumstance, of no value or importance to his discovery.

The second patent of Wilson is entirely immaterial to the present case.

The patent of Stanwood was for a revolving cutter, so operating upon gas or iron pipe, secured in place by a clamp or jaw, as to cut the pipe. Sometimes, one of the cutters, detached from the heavy frame in which it is placed, will cut or tear glass. Ordinarily, however, an instrument intended for cutting pipe cannot be successfully used upon glass. The requisites for successful pipe-cutting are very different from those for successful glass-cutting, and, consequently, it is only in exceptional cases that a gas-pipe cutter can be used upon glass. Such a cutter could never be made a practical substitute for a diamond. But, in this, as in the first Wilson patent, the invention which is the distinctive feature of the Monce patent is unknown and unrecognized. In the Stanwood device, the sides of the cutter may or may not be bevelled towards each other at a particular angle. The angles vary in different specimens of the article, sometimes exceeding, and sometimes being under, forty-five degrees.

The Hook patent is for a paper-cutter. It is sufficient to say, that one of its sides is at right angles to the axis of rotation.

The respondent also introduced the cutter attached to a book-binders' machine for cutting pasteboard, and claims that it has long been in use, and will cut glass. The pasteboard cutters exhibited upon the trial, did not cut glass readily or easily. The truth probably is, that such a cutter of unusual hardness will also sever glass, but those ordinarily and usually made will not answer this purpose. The sides of the pasteboard cutter are, apparently, but slightly inclined towards each other.

Thus far, the well known principle relied upon by the respondent is inapplicable to the present case, inasmuch as it is untrue, that the distinctive feature of the patented article was used as a part of the cutters previously existing. The alleged invention of Monce was neither a part of the invention of previous patentees, nor was it a part of their machines, unless by accident, and, lastly, the cutters in their machines will not practically perform the office of this cutter, to wit: the cutting of glass for glaziers' purposes. The peculiarity in the form of this cutter has accomplished an effect not before produced, that is, has made a successful glass-cutter.

The respondent also claims, that the alleged invention had been previously anticipated, in every particular, by the patent of O. M. Pike, of December 29th, 1868, and by the harness-leather cutter used and produced by the witness Septimus C. Stokes.

Pike's patent was for a glass-cutter. His cutter was a small rod of hardened steel, turning, near one end, upon two friction wheels, and, at the other end, in a hardened steel socket in a thumbscrew. The object of the thumbscrew, the friction wheels and the steel socket was to make the friction on the cutter as little as possible. When the instrument is used, the end of the cutter is placed upon the surface of the glass, and the side of the frame drawn along the straight edge or pattern. The instrument is so made that, in order to bring the point of the cutter in contact with the surface of the glass, so as to cut, the cutter must be placed upon the glass at an angle of forty-five degrees. This article has not proved practically a success, and, by recurring to the quotation heretofore made from Dr. Wollaston, it is not difficult to understand the cause of the failure. The fissure should be made at right angles with the surface, otherwise, if the cut deviates much from the perpendicular, "the glass is found superficially flawed out on that side to which the greater pressure was diverted, and the cut completely fails." As the Pike tool must be held at an angle of forty-five degrees to the glass, the cut is made at an angle of forty-five degrees, instead of being at right angles, to the surface. The cut becomes a sidewise or slanting cut, and, the greater pressure being constantly directed upon one side, the instrument is unevenly worn, and, in a short time, loses its cutting power. The defect in the Pike instrument is remedied in the Monce patent, by making the cutter a wheel instead of a revolving rod. The wheel can then be placed upon the end of the handle, like the handle of an ordinary diamond, instead of at the side of a frame, and can be placed upon the glass so that the lateral pressure of the two sides of the cutter upon the surface will be equal, and, consequently, the cut will be at right angles, and not slanting, to the surface.

The Stokes cutter was originally for cutting leather. It was purchased in 1861 by the owner, who was then a saloon keeper, and used, at first, for cutting newspapers into cigar lighters. Stokes discovered that it would cut glass, and has occasionly used it for that purpose since, for his own convenience or amusement. The wheel was evidently, at one time, much larger than it is now, and has been worn to the present edge by use. The wheel is of great hardness, and will, when ground to a sharp edge, cut glass. That it can be uniformly used for a glass-cutter is not claimed. That such an instrument could not be made practically available in the market and by householders, as a glass-cutter, is obvious.

The result is, that the respondent has, in my judgment, failed to show that the alleged invention has been anticipated either by a prior patent or by prior use.

There is another fact in this case not unworthy of mention. The small and inexpensive tool which is the subject of controversy has proved to be of great utility, and has achieved success. The energy and research of the respondent and of his counsel has not discovered a successful substitute for the glaziers' diamond, other than the patented article. It has confessedly superseded all prior inventions. Under these circumstances, the language of the court in Stanley Works v. Sargent [Case No. 13,289], is not inappropriate: "Utility is not an infallible test of originality. To be new, in the sense of the act, it must be produced of original thought or inventive skill, and not a mere formal and mechanical change of what was old and well known. But, the effect produced by a change is often an appropriate, though not a controlling, consideration, in determining the character of the change itself."

The respondent also insists that the patent is void for ambiguity, both in the specification and in the claims: 1st. Because the specification does not state what degree of hardness is to be given to the cutter. It simply says "hardened." As has been before remarked, the patent was not for a hardened revolving cutter. That was a well known invention. As the term "hardened," among mechanics, implies that it shall be made as hard as can ordinarily be done, and not tempered, it was not necessary for the patentee to set forth in his specification more particularly the degree of hardness to be given to the cutting instrument.

2d. It is claimed that the specification is ambiguous, in that it does not point out what is old, and specify what is new, in the alleged invention. In the claim, the patentee expressly disclaims a revolving cutter, but does claim a cutter constructed substantially as shown and described, and for the purposes set forth. This claim has reference to the shape, form and angles of the cutter—to the particular construction and peculiar shape of his cutter, which adapted it to the purposes of a glass-cutter. He did not intend to claim, and did not, in my judgment, claim, a hardened roller, or a cutter brought to any particular degree of hardness.

I see no force in the other criticisms upon the ambiguity of the specification, which seems to me to be as exact and accurate as the nature of the subject will permit.

No question is made in regard to the fact of infringement by the respondent. He has made and sold an exact imitation of the plaintiffs' invention.

An injunction must, therefore, issue, and a reference be made to a master to take and state an account.

[For another case in which this patent was held invalid, see Monce v. Woodworth, Case No. 9,706.]

Case No. 9,706.

MONCE v. WOODWORTH.

[4 Ban. & A. 307;[1] 19 O. G. 998.]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May 8, 1879.

PATENTS—TOOL FOR CUTTING GLASS—NOVELTY—PUBLIC USE AND SALE.

Letters patent No. 91,150, granted to Samuel G. Monce, June 8th, 1869, for a "tool for cutting glass," held void for want of novelty, the invention having been in public use and on sale more than two years prior to his application for the patent.

[1] [Reported by Hubert A. Banning, Esq., and Henry Arden, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[This was a bill by Samuel G. Monce against Frank R. Woodworth to restrain the infringement of certain letters patent.]

Barnard & Mitchell, for complainant.
Pike & Blodgett, for defendant.

CLARK, District Judge. Two questions are presented in this case by the pleadings and the proofs, for the consideration of the court: first, the question of novelty in the complainant's invention, and, second, the question of infringement by the defendant. I have considered only the first of these, because I am satisfied, upon the evidence offered, that it is decisive of the case.

The complainant alleges in his bill that he is "a true and original inventor or discoverer of a new and useful improved tool for cutting glass," which said invention was not known or used by others before his invention or discovery thereof, and that letters patent therefor were granted to him on the 8th day of June, 1869, and that the defendant has infringed this patent.

The defendant in his answer denies that the complainant "is the original or first inventor or discoverer of the alleged invention described in said letters patent, or that the said letters are valid," and alleges that said invention, and substantial and material parts thereof, either separately or combined together as in complainant's patent, were, long prior to the grant and date of said patent, known to and used by various persons named in the answer, and amendments thereto.

The invention of the complainant "consists in the use or employment of a revolving steel roller, the periphery of which roller is bevelled on both sides, so as to form a cutting edge, and is fitted to revolve in a suitable frame, and attached to a handle for operating the same. The cutter is made from steel, and is turned smooth and round, and afterwards hardened. The sides are parallel, or nearly so, for a short distance, and then bevelled towards each other so as to meet about midway between the same, thus forming the point or cutting edge. The bevelled portion of the sides should be at an angle of about forty-five degrees to the axis of the cutter, and, consequently, will be at near right angles to each other. It is not necessary that the angles of the bevelled sides should be at exactly right angles to each other, but, near that angle, or a very little more obtuse, the cutter is found to operate to the best advantage. The cutter can be fitted to revolve upon a pin, or on solid journals at each end. * * * The frame, near one end, is provided with bearings for the journals, which journals should be a little shorter than the thickness of the sides of the frame in order that, when the sides are placed against a straight edge or other gauge, the end of the journal shall not come in contact with such gauge. The handle, C, can be of any desired form, and secured to the frame in any proper manner. I construct said handle like the handle ordinarily used for a diamond tool. * * * By my invention I produce a tool for cutting glass, which is equally convenient in use as an ordinary diamond, and can be sold at a large profit, for one-tenth of the usual cost of a diamond." The claim made by the complainant is as follows: "I do not claim simply a revolving cutter, but what I claim as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is, 1. The cutter, A, constructed substantially as shown and described, and for the purposes set forth; 2. The combination of the cutter A, frame B, and handle C, substantially as and for the purposes described." The drawings attached to the complainant's specification show very clearly the invention described.

This invention, thus described and claimed by the complainant, and patented to him by letters patent, June 8th, 1869, the defendant says was not the invention of the complainant, nor was it then new, but was known and used by various persons long before—that is, the complainant was not the first inventor, as he must have been to sustain his patent. Colt v. Massachusetts Arms Co. [Case No. 3,030].

To sustain his allegation, the defendant introduces a deposition of one Charles L. Morison, who says that in the winter of 1860 and 1861 he was in the business of a photographer at Warren, New Hampshire; that he went there soon after Thanksgiving in 1860, and remained there until after the breaking out of the Rebellion in April, 1861, when he enlisted in the Fourteenth Massachusetts, and afterward in the Tenth New Hampshire Volunteers, and was mustered out June 26th, 1865; that, while he was at Warren, in the winter of 1860 and 1861, he purchased a tool for cutting glass; that he used it at Warren, and, occasionally, after he came back from the army, in 1865, until he purchased a diamond.

This tool is produced, and is found to embody, substantially and fully, the complainant's invention, and to be adapted to and used for the same purpose. It has the rotary disk with bevelled sides and cutting-edge, the pin on which the disk revolves, the frame within which it is held, and the handle with which it is operated, all combined. This purchase and use was in 1860 or 1861, eight years before the date of the patent to the complainant. The time of the purchase is fixed by the place where the purchaser then was, and his enlistment in the Union army, which he would not be likely to misremember, and the character of the tool, by its production and admission, and he says that the person of whom he bought it had more of them. This evidence, if believed, is sufficient to make it quite probable that the complainant was not the original inventor of the tool claimed by him, and that it was not new at the time of his application for a patent, but that it had been in public use years before.

But this witness further testifies, that, while he was at Warren, in the winter of 1860 and 1861, he went twice to Haverhill, to a photographer by the name of Herbert, to get glass for his business, cutting glass there with the same cutter, and that he distinctly remembers seeing a similar tool at Mr. Herbert's gallery. This Mr. Herbert was then out of health, and his wife assisted him in his work in the gallery. Mr. Herbert is now dead, but Mrs. Herbert is still living, and her deposition has been taken in this case by the defendant. She testifies that she was married to her husband in September, 1857; that he was then a photographer at Haverhill, New Hampshire, and that he continued his business there until September, 1865; that her husband was out of health, and that she went into his gallery in the spring of 1859, and was there until the business was closed in 1865, and that she learned the business as thoroughly as she could, to help her husband. She testifies further that she was acquainted with Mr. C. L. Morison, who was at Warren in the spring of 1861; that he came to the gallery of her husband to get some glass; that they had none of the size he wanted, and he cut it for himself, with a tool which he had with him. This tool she identifies, and says her husband then had a similar one, which they used in their gallery for cutting glass. The two tools were so similar that she marked that of her husband with the letters "H. F. H.," and the other with the letter "M.," she thinks. This last is annexed to her deposition, (defendant's Exhibit M,) and has upon it some marks which may have been put there by her, but they are not very legible. The tool which was used in their gallery, marked "H. F. H.," went with the sale of their gallery, and she has not seen it since. Here, then, are two of these tools for cutting glass, both seen by Mr. Morison and by Mrs. Herbert, one produced and identified by both, and the other similar, and the time of their use fixed as early as 1861. About this there would seem to be no room for mistake, unless the witnesses are wilfully false.

Again, Morison says, that after his discharge from the army, in 1865, he again commenced the business of a photographer, at Haverhill, New Hampshire, and occasionally used the tool, which he purchased in the winter of 1860 and 1861. Morris S. Lamprey, another witness, says that he knew Morison in the army, and that, after their discharge, he visited him at Haverhill, and that while there he was in his photograph-gallery and was shown a tool for cutting glass, and saw glass cut with it. He says it went with a wheel, and was similar to defendant's Exhibit M, (the tool which Morison purchased in 1860–'61), wheel set in wood similar to this. Should think this might be it, but could not swear to it; could not swear to the length of handle. Says he stood near, watching the process, and afterward the tool was held up near his eyes, and the cutter rolled with the finger. Now, this witness does not swear positively to the identity of the tool; but he does swear that it was similar to the one annexed to the deposition of Mrs. Herbert (Exhibit M), and as Morison swears that this is the only tool of the kind he ever had, it makes it quite certain this was the tool which he saw.

Warren S. Hill, an expert, called as a witness by defendant, says that the rotary cutter in Exhibit M is the same, in kind and form, as that described in letters patent to the plaintiff, No. 91,150. So says another expert, Edward H. Johnson. Indeed, there can be no doubt the tool described in the complainant's letters patent No. 91,150 and the one purchased by Morison in the winter of 1860 and 1861, are substantially similar in form, material, construction and use. This, I think, was conceded in the argument.

So far, there would seem to be very little, if any, doubt, that in the winter of 1860 and 1861, Charles L. Morison purchased a tool embodying the complainant's invention, constructed substantially in the same way, and used for the same purpose. It would also seem very probable that Henry F. Herbert had a similar tool, used for the same purpose, at the same time, and up to 1865. If so, the complainant's case must fail, because he was not the original inventor. Rich v. Lippincott [Case No. 11,758].

But the case does not rest solely upon this evidence. Milo Bailey, another witness called by the defendant, testifies that he is a trader at Haverhill, New Hampshire, at Haverhill Corner; that he traded at the Oliverian Village in that town from 1860 to 1867, and in 1867 removed to the Corner. He says that while trading at the Oliverian Village in 1865, latter part, or 1866, he purchased some rotary glass-cutters, either three or six of a peddler; that he has one of them now, which he annexes to his deposition, marked "O"; that he sold the others, one to Michael Carlton, Jr.; that these cutters were for cutting glass, and that he used the one retained by him for cutting glass, and that he so used it at the Oliverian Village before he moved thence, in 1867. This was two years or thereabouts before the granting of the patent to the plaintiff, in 1869. He says, he recollects the fact of having the tool before he moved from the Oliverian Village; that he kept it in the money-drawer, and used it to cut glass when he had not the size to suit a customer; that was what he bought and used it for.

Charles K. Carlton, being called as a witness, says that his father, Michael Carlton, Jr., purchased a rotary glass-cutter of Milo Bailey in the spring or summer of 1867; that he stood beside him when he purchased it; and it has since been in his father's or his own possession, and was bought to cut glass with, and has been so used, and for nothing else. He says it was purchased when Mr. Bailey first moved to Haverhill Corner, and when the store was entirely new, newly repaired. He says this tool had upon it a label or paper, on which was printed "carbonized disk," which he removed at or about the time of the taking of his deposition. This tool is produced, marked "P," and is identical in appearance with the one marked "O," and the two are identical in construction with the one purchased and produced by Mr. Morison. Here, then, are three tools shown, which are claimed and proved to have been purchased and used prior to the granting of the complainant's patent, and one of them several years.

To overcome this testimony of the defendant, the complainant offers the testimony of George Henry, who says he has been engaged in the manufacture of the carbonized-disk glass-cutter; that he commenced in the latter part of 1869, and continued somewhat over two or three years. At first he disposed of them to persons "coming along," "happening in," but the greater part to one man, a Mr. Brooks; and that, in all, he manufactured some sixty or seventy thousand of them. Upon being shown the tools exhibited by the defendant, marked "M," "O," "P," he says he thinks or believes he made them at his shop, and gives his reason for such belief, that the brasses are driven in in the same way, and pinned in the same way, and that the general style is altogether the same. There was no mark upon them but the paper label.

Charles Brooks, another witness, called by the complainant, states that he had bought and sold the carbonized-disk cutter made by Mr. Henry for three or four years; that the amount of his trade was, in all, seven or eight thousand dollars. Upon being shown the tools marked "M," "O," "P," he says he should say they were similar to the tools made by Mr. Henry, and that they were a part of the tools made by him, in his belief.

Neither of these two witnesses, however, swear positively that Henry made these tools. There is no certain, sure mark upon them, beyond a general similarity, and the paper label, which seems to have been on one of them. Now, if they could identify them as made by Mr. Henry, would the testimony of those two witnesses overbear the testimony of the defendant's witnesses, fixing the time and reciting the circumstances with the particularity that they do?

There are other witnesses called, to whom I have not alluded, because I have found nothing in their testimony which could have changed the probabilities of the case, or the balance of testimony. The letters patent to the plaintiff are prima facie evidence of the novelty of the invention, and the burden of proof is upon the defendant to overcome this evidence, and in this case I think he has done it.

Case No. 9,707.

MONCURE et al. v. DERMOTT.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 445.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1838.[2]

USURY—SALE OF BOND—SURETY—BONA FIDES—CLOAK TO EVADE STATUTE—ESTOPPEL—ASSIGNOR OF BOND—WAIVER—TRIAL—RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE.

1. A covenant absolutely to pay a usurious debt directly to the lender, is not a covenant simply to indemnify the surety, although delivered to the surety, but is a security for the usurious debt to the lender, especially if the instrument, upon its face, does not purport to be a covenant to the surety, but an undertaking to pay the debt directly to the lender of the money.

2. A covenant to pay an usurious debt to the creditor is void, under the statute of Virginia, although delivered to the surety, who was ignorant of the usury; it being a security for the usurious debt, and the surety who innocently pays the debt, cannot, upon that instrument, recover from the debtor money thus paid.

3. An assignor of a bond is not estopped to deny its validity in law.

4. Although the affirmative of the issue be upon the defendant in an action of covenant, yet as the plaintiffs must prove damages sustained by the breach of the covenant, they have the right to open and close the argument before the jury.

[Cited in brief in Murray v. Mason, Case No. 9,966.]

5. If the cause of action be usurious, no waiver of the objection by the defendant, in pais, will avail the plaintiff.

6. If a man in Virginia, bona fide, buy a bond at such a discount that the lawful interest upon the bond will produce him 12 per cent. per annum upon the purchase-money, it is not usury; but if he intended it only as a cloak under which to evade the statute, it is usury.

7. If there be no loan of money secured by the bond, and it be purchased bona fide, the transaction is not usurious, although purchased at such a discount as enables the purchaser to obtain an interest of 12 per cent. per annum upon the purchase-money, and although the bond was made to raise money upon, if the purchaser was ignorant of that fact.

8. If the instrument upon which the suit is brought, be a security for the usurious debt, it is void by the statute, and the plaintiffs cannot recover upon it the money which they, as executors of the surety, paid in satisfaction of such usurious debt; although, when they paid it, they were ignorant of the usury; and it was not necessary that the defendant should have informed them of the usury, and instructed them not to pay it, before they paid it.

9. What facts may be inferred from other facts, is a question of law. And from certain facts the jury may infer, that a certain transaction is substantially a loan, although it may appear to have been made in the form and name of a sale of a bond.

This was an action of covenant [by Richard C. L. Moncure and Walter T. Conway] upon the following instrument: "Whereas Mary James has executed her bond or note, dated the 28th of November, 1828, payable to me, on demand, for the sum of $2,620, which said bond or note was merely loaned to me for the purpose of raising money upon; and whereas I have, since the execution of the said bond or note, as aforesaid, assigned it to Philip Alexander, of Fredericksburg, for value received of him, I do, therefore, hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay and discharge the said bond or note, with all interest that may accrue thereon, when the same shall become due and payable. Given under my hand and seal this 12th day of August, 1829. Anne R. Dermott. (L. S.)"

The "bond or note" mentioned in the above instrument was as follows: "$2,620. On demand I bind myself, my heirs, executors, and administrators, to pay to Anne R. Dermott, her executors, administrators, or assigns, the sum of two thousand six hundred and twenty dollars, for value received, with interest from the date hereof. Given under my hand and seal this 28th day of November, 1828. Mary James. (Seal.)"

Upon which was the following indorsement: "I assign the within to Philip Alexander for value received this 1st day of December, 1828. Anne R. Dermott."

It appeared in evidence that the following payments on account of this "note or bond" were made by Miss Dermott (the defendant) namely, 19th April, 1831, $180. December 27th, 1831, $200. February 7th, 1832, $225, and on May 8th, 1832, $395. And the following payments were made by the plaintiffs, namely, December 6th, 1833, $600. December 28th, 1833, $1,346.52; and December 31st, 1833, $435.55 in full. That this "bond or note" was made to raise money upon to pay a debt due by the defendant to Thomas Poultney & Son of Baltimore, upon the following obligation, namely: "We, Mary James, Anne R. Dermott, William C. Beale, and John Moncure, of the county of Stafford, and Thomas Sedden of the town of Fredericksburg, do hereby promise and bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators jointly and severally, to pay to Thomas Poultney & Son of Baltimore, their executors, administrators, or assigns, the just and full sum of three thousand six hundred and thirty-three dollars and sixty-one cents on or before the 23d day of November, 1828, as witness our hands and seals this 31st day of March, 1826. Mary James. (Seal.) Anne R. Dermott. (Seal.) Wm. C. Beale. (Seal.) John Moncure. (Seal.) Thomas Sedden. (Seal.) Attest: J. M. Conway; as to Mary James and Anne R. Dermott."

On that instrument was the following indorsement:

Paid by T. Sedden, on account of Robert James	$ 629 20
Check on United States Bank at Washington	628 33
Paid by P. Alexander	2,340 00
	$3,597 53
Balance due T. Sedden, for which he has a note of J. Moncure's	36 09
	$3,633 62

Thomas Poultney & Son, pay Thomas Sedden, Esq., cash, or order. Evan Poultney.

That on the same 31st of March, 1826, the said Mary James, (of the county of Stafford,) conveyed in trust to Arthur A. Morson, to secure and indemnify the three sureties Beale, Moncure, and Sedden, against their liability upon that note, about five hundred acres of land and thirteen slaves, in Stafford county, with power to sell the same if the debt should not be paid by Miss James or Miss Dermott. That as early as March 14th, 1828, Mr. John Moncure, in behalf of Miss Dermott, applied to Mr. Philip Alexander, of Fredericksburg, to obtain from him money to pay off this debt to Poultney & Son, and that Mr. Alexander finally determined that he would give $2,200 for a bond to be given by Miss James, payable in five years, for $3,400; but he would require a deed of trust from her (Miss James) of her land and slaves; and that the balance which would be due to Poultney & Son over and above the $2,200 to be placed in his (Alexander's) hands so that he might pay the debt to Poultney & Son and get a release of the deed of trust already given to Mr. Morson to secure the sureties Beale, Moncure, and Sedden, and take a new deed of trust for his security. That Miss James was the defendant's aunt, and the defendant either lived with her, or near her, at the time the negotiation was going on with Mr. Alexander about raising the money, and was in habits of intimacy with her. That Miss James and Mr. Alexander were well acquainted with each other. That the money to be raised was solely to pay off the debt to Poultney & Son, for which Miss James was bound as principal, and had given a deed of trust upon her land and slaves. That on the 8th of December, 1828, the said Mary James conveyed her land and slaves to John Moncure in trust to secure to Mr. Alexander the payment of her bond on the 1st of December, 1830. That on the 24th of November, 1828, (four days before the date of Miss James's bond) Mr. Alexander, in a letter to Mr. John Moncure, who was conducting the negotiation on the part of the defendant, says, "and as the profit on the transaction in which I am about to engage will be small, I will have nothing to do with it unless every thing is clear and perfectly indisputable." He then makes particular inquiry as to Miss James's title to the land and slaves; and says, "it is absolutely necessary that I should have all this information before I engage in the transaction. There is now but little time left to obtain it; perhaps too little. If I pay the $2,350 on Wednesday, it must be with the distinct understanding that, if the business be not arranged to my entire satisfaction, that Mr. Sedden, Mr. Beale, and yourself refund me the money I pay; which will leave you all precisely in the situation you would be placed if I had nothing to do with the business." "I cannot pay the money on Wednesday, without having a distinct understanding with Mr. S., Mr. B., and yourself as to the repayment of the money I pay in case the business shall not be arranged to my satisfaction." And in the postscript he says, "you entirely misunderstood my views, if you supposed I was willing to purchase paper to produce me twelve per cent. on the money paid at the end of five years. My view was that it should, upon the money advanced, produce me annually twelve per cent. You will find, upon a calculation, that the sum I advanced, by compounding the interest at the end of each year, will not produce to me more than about eight per cent. Now it can hardly be expected that I would advance money and wait five years upon a security somewhat doubtful, and at last to receive only eight per cent., or a little over common bank interest paid each sixty days and compounded. I am willing to enter into the transaction if I can realize what were my views, twelve per cent. upon the money annually." The defendant also produced in evidence a letter dated November 25th, 1828, from Miss James to Mr. P. Alexander, in which she says, "my niece Miss Anne R. Dermott informs me she contemplates selling and assigning to you my bond for $2,880, dated the 22d of this month, and payable on demand. I am anxious to obtain time for the payment of the same; and propose, should you take the assignment, to place the debt upon a footing of perfect safety if you will grant the time I wish, say five years from the date of the bond, by conveying to a trustee of your own selection, land and slaves amply sufficient to secure both the principal and interest of the debt to be paid at the expiration of the five years from the date of the note. If you take an assignment of the note and accede to my proposition, I hereby bind myself, my heirs, executors and administrators, to execute a deed of trust when tendered to me, on the following property; namely, all my lands in the county of Stafford and my slaves," (naming them.) "The property is at present under a lien to secure Mr. Moncure, Mr. Beale, and Mr. Sedden as my securities to Mr. Poultney of Baltimore; but these gentlemen will release the property, or, if they think proper, give you the benefit of the lien."

And the following letter from Mr. Alexander to Miss James, dated, "Fredericksburg, 28th November, 1828": "Dear Madam—I received your letter this morning, and am willing to take the bond, provided you will agree to pay me five hundred dollars annually, and the balance at the expiration of the five years, and upon the debts being made perfectly secure. Yours, respectfully, P. Alexander."

It appeared in evidence that the negotiation for the money had been going on from the 14th of March to the 28th of November, between Mr. Alexander and Mr. John Moncure, as the friend and agent of Miss Dermott. That in every application of Mr. Moncure to Mr. Alexander to advance money, he avoided saying any thing to him in relation to the note or bond of Miss James being executed for the purpose of raising money upon it for the defendant, because he believed that if he did, Mr. A. would have declined making any arrangement whatever to advance the money required by the defendant. But in every application made to Mr. A. by Mr. M. on the occasion, he called on Mr. A. to know what he would give for Miss James's note to the defendant for a certain sum. That the objection to letting Mr. Alexander know that the bond sold to him was a loan to the defendant, was this: he (Mr. M.) believed, from his knowledge of Mr. A. and of his business transactions, that if he informed him that the note or bond was a loan, he would have declined making the advance for it which he did. That the bond of Miss James to the defendant, was made to raise money upon to pay off the debt to Poultney & Son, for which Miss James, and her lands and slaves, were bound; and was a loan to the defendant for that purpose, and was made to suit Mr. Alexander's views, and in pursuance of the agreement made with him by the defendant through her friend Mr. Moncure. There was also evidence tending to show that Miss James knew the purpose for which the bond was given, and the nature of the transaction with Mr. Alexander by which the money was raised. There was no evidence that the defendant informed the plaintiff of it, or warned them not to pay the money; nor that they gave notice to the defendant that they were about to pay it. That from the defendant's several payments on account of the bond, and her silence, the plaintiffs were justified in supposing that she had no objection to their paying it in full.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Swann, for defendants contended that the transaction with Mr. Alexander was usurious, and that the covenant of the defendant to pay that usurious debt directly to Mr. Alexander, was a security for the debt, and was void under the statute of Virginia, which enacts that all "covenants" "for the payment of money lent, on which a higher interest is reserved or taken than is allowed" by the statute, "shall be utterly void." It is not a covenant to indemnify Miss James; but a covenant to pay the debt due upon Miss James's bond, assigned by the defendant to Mr. Alexander. The pretence of its being a sale of the bond, is a mere cloak for the usury. Mr. Alexander insisted upon having twelve per cent. per annum for his money, and prescribed the security which should be given, namely, Miss James's bond and deed of trust. The bargain was made before the bond was drawn and executed; and the bond was made to conform to Mr. Alexander's "views."

Mr. Key and Mr. Dunlop, contra, contended that the covenant was in legal effect a covenant of indemnity only. Although Miss

James is not named as a party to the covenant, and nothing is said about indemnifying her, yet, as it was delivered to her, and as the payment of the money to Mr. Alexander would in effect be equivalent to indemnification, the legal construction of the instrument is that it is a contract of indemnity. Miss James was an innocent surety. There is no evidence she knew of the usury when she gave her bond. The statute of usury does not reach an indemnifying bond. Carter v. Cutting, 5 Munf. 237–239; Rice v. Mather, 3 Wend. 62; Robinson v. May, Cro. Eliz. 588; Button v. Downham, Id. 643. Noy, 73; Ford v. Keith, 1 Mass. 139. But the debt to Alexander was not usurious. He had a legal right to purchase the bond at any discount. Hansbrough v. Baylor, 2 Munf. 36; Taylor v. Bruce, Gilmer, 42; Whitworth v. Adams, 5 Rand. 377; Parker v. Rochester, 4 Johns. Ch. 329. The defendant is estopped to deny the validity of Miss James's bond. Rainsford v. Smith, Dyer, 196a, pl. 41; 5 Wheel. Abr. 106; 8 Cow. 102; Miller v. Stewart, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 702–704; De Wolf v. Johns, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 367.

Mr. Jones and Mr. Swann, in reply. Miss James was bound in the sealed note to Poultney & Son, and made her bond to raise money upon it to pay that note. She was an original party to the usury, and the money was raised for her benefit, as well as that of the defendant. She had given her obligation to indemnify three of the five obligors in that sealed note, all of whom were jointly and severally bound to Poultney & Son. In that note Miss James signs as principal and in her obligation to indemnify the three sureties she calls it her debt and makes herself the principal debtor. The defendant bound herself absolutely to pay the usurious debt directly to Alexander. In the cases cited from Cro. Eliz. the contract was to indemnify the surety from suits on account of the usurious bond; and the reason given for the judgment in those cases is, "for that the surety, by intendment, cannot know of the corrupt contract, to plead it in avoidance of the bond; wherefore the principal ought to take care thereof." But in the present case Miss James had knowledge of the usury. The money was raised as much for her use as for that of the defendant. The covenant of the defendant is not to indemnify, but to pay the original debt. The cases of indemnity, therefore, do not apply. In the case of Dowman v. Butter, Noy, 73, which was "on a counter bond to save harmless" Walmesly said, "the plaintiff shall recover. For that counter bond was made bona fide, and perhaps the surety was not conusant of the usurious contract, and then, he cannot, nor ought to plead that; as if error had been in the first suit; yet the surety shall recover upon the counter bond, although that he takes no advantage of the error. So if the surety had been an infant, and had not pleaded nonage. And that counter bonds mentioned in the statute 13 Eliz. are intended for payment of money to him that lent the money; and not between him that borrows and the surety." "Note, the saving harmless is the substance of the counter bond."

The covenant of the defendant to pay the debt to Mr. Alexander was an additional security to him for the usurious debt. The defendant, if liable at all, was liable, although Miss James or her executors had never paid a cent of the debt, and they might have recovered of her the whole amount for the benefit of Mr. Alexander. Miss James might have avoided her own bond by the plea of usury, and yet recovered the whole debt from the defendant. If the plaintiffs knew that it was a debt due by the defendant, they were bound to inquire of her whether it was due, or whether she had any defence; and if they paid it without such inquiry, they paid it in their own wrong, and are now lending themselves to Mr. Alexander to enable him to recover of the defendant a debt which they could not recover from Miss James. In the present case the breach of covenant assigned is, that the defendant did not pay the debt to Mr. Alexander; not that she did not indemnify Miss James. A bond to indemnify against an usurious contract may be good, but a bond to pay the usurious debt is void, whether the obligor knew that it was usurious or not. In the case from Mass. Rep. the plaintiff had no knowledge of the usury when he indorsed the note, and the notice given to him afterwards and before he paid the money, was only a notice that there was usury, but not of the particulars, so as to enable him to plead the usury and maintain his plea; and there was no instruction not to pay it. But here all the parties were concerned in the usurious contract, with full notice of all the circumstances. In Carter v. Cuting, Mr. Lee, the executor, was not warned not to pay the debt; he paid it; but the court refused to allow the payment in his administration account, and he had to repay it to the heirs of Carter. Ord, Usury, 123, 125; Potkins's Case, 3 Leon. 63; Dowman v. Butter, Noy, 73. The defendant is not estopped to deny the legal validity of the bond, or any other matter of law.

On the trial, the counsel for the plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that it is not competent for the defendant in this action to deny, by plea or otherwise, the validity of the note of 28th November, 1828, recited in the covenant on which this suit is brought; and that she is estopped from setting up, in this action, any alleged usury, as affecting the validity of said note."

Which instruction, THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to give.

The counsel of the plaintiffs then prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in this action, the sums which the jury are satisfied, from the evidence, were paid by the plaintiffs to Philip Alexander, on the bond dated 28th

November, 1828, unless the defendant proves to the jury that before such payments, the plaintiffs were notified that the bond of 28th November, 1828, was tainted with usury, and instructed to dispute the same."

Which instructions, THE COURT also refused; principally because they were of opinion, that the contract of the defendant was not a contract for indemnity, but an absolute obligation to pay the bond assigned to Philip Alexander, and that if that bond was usurious, this bond of the defendant to pay it was also usurious and void. See Story, Confl. Laws, 206.

The plaintiff's counsel then prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if they should believe, from the evidence, that the note of Mary James to the defendant, assigned by her to Alexander, dated 28th November, 1828, was made on an usurious agreement entered into between said defendant and said Alexander, but that the plaintiffs had no knowledge of such usury at the time they were called upon to pay the balance due on the note, nor at any time before, and paid the same under a belief that the same was bona fide due, and without any knowledge that there was any objection to the validity of said note, and without any notification or communication from the defendant, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover."

Which instruction, THE COURT also refused.

Whereupon the plaintiff's counsel prayed the court to give the jury the same instruction, with this addition: "Unless the jury should be satisfied from the evidence, that the said Mary James knew of the said usurious agreement under which the said note was given and assigned as aforesaid."

But THE COURT still refused to give the said instruction, so amended.

Whereupon the counsel of the plaintiffs prayed the court to instruct the jury, as in the former prayer, to the words "communication from the defendant," inclusive, with the following addition, to wit: "And if the jury believe from the evidence, that the defendant waived and abandoned all objection to the validity of said note, and assented that the same should be considered as a valid and legal obligation, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover; and it is competent for the jury to infer such waiver and assent, if they shall believe, from the evidence, that the defendant, after obtaining the said money, made payments of interest as the same became due, and expressed her desire and intention to pay the said note, and her anxiety to save her aunt's property from sale, under the said deed of trust."

But THE COURT still refused to give the instruction, as thus further amended.

The plaintiff's counsel then prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if they believe from the evidence, that there was no loan of money from Alexander to the defendant, secured by the bond of the 28th of November, 1828, but that the said bond was bona fide purchased by said Alexander of the defendant, at a discount exceeding the legal rate of interest, the said Alexander not knowing, when he purchased the said bond, that the same was loaned by the said Mary James to the defendant solely to raise money on, the transaction is not usurious, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, in this action, the moneys paid by them to Alexander on said bond."

Which instruction, THE COURT gave, as prayed.

The plaintiff's counsel further prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that if, from the evidence, they should believe that Philip Alexander, when he paid the money, and took the note as aforesaid, intended to buy the said note for the amount given on it, not knowing that the note was made by Miss James to the defendant, in order to raise money on it, and did not mean, by disguising the advance under the form of a purchase, to evade the statute of usury; then such purchase was lawful."

Which instruction, also, THE COURT gave, as prayed.

Whereupon the defendant's counsel moved the court to instruct the jury, as follows, to wit: "That if the jury find and believe from the evidence aforesaid, that for several months before the execution and assignment of the bond or note mentioned and described in the covenant upon which this suit is brought, there were such negotiations and propositions pending between said John Moncure, (acting in behalf of defendant,) and Philip Alexander, as are mentioned and set forth in said affidavits of Moncure and Alexander, and in the papers and exhibits therein referred to; that the true and genuine nature and object of such negotiations and propositions, and of the successive arrangements and understandings resulting from them, as really contemplated by both parties, were, that said Alexander should make an advance of money to defendant, upon a future bond or note of said Mary James, payable to defendant, and by her to be assigned to said Alexander, under the name and form of a sale of such bond or note, at a discount above the legal rate of interest; that discount from the amount of such bond or note should be so adjusted as that the difference between the full amount of the bond or note, and the sum advanced on it, should be equivalent to an interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum on the sum actually advanced, for the time of forbearance to be given on such bond or note. That all the said preliminary negotiations, propositions, and arrangements, were just before the execution and assignment of the bond or note referred to in the covenant set forth in the plaintiff's declaration, (such bond or note being the same note under seal, or bill obligatory above given in evidence by plaintiffs with the said covenant, and annexed to the said original affidavit of said John Mon-cure as aforesaid,) terminated in an arrangement so modifying the before-pending propositions and arrangements aforesaid, as that said Alexander should immediately advance the defendant two thousand three hundred and forty dollars, and that defendant should assign to him a note or bond thereafter to be drawn and executed by said Mary James, for such amount as should make the difference between the sum so advanced and the sum to be ultimately received by him for the principal and interest of such bond or note, equivalent to an interest of twelve per cent. per annum on the sum so advanced, according to the principal on which said Alexander, in his aforesaid letter (B 1,) to said Moncure, insisted that the profits of the transaction should be calculated and secured, and that the payment of such bond or note should be collaterally secured by a deed in trust of the land and slaves of said Mary James. That the said Alexander, in pursuance and execution of such arrangement and understanding, did advance the two thousand three hundred and forty dollars to defendant, or for her use. That the said Mary James, in the pursuance and execution of the same arrangement and understanding on her part, did, afterwards, on the 28th day of November, 1828, execute and deliver the said note under seal, or bill obligatory of that date, and, afterwards, on the 10th December, 1828, duly execute and deliver to said J. Moncure and P. Alexander the said deed in trust, bearing that date, as above given in evidence by defendant, and annexed to the said cross-examination of said Moncure, and marked (D 2); and that the defendant, in the pursuance and execution of said arrangement and understanding, did assign the said bill obligatory to said Alexander, immediately on the execution of the same by said Mary James. That the amount of said securities, and the time with which the said Mary James was indulged, by said deed in trust, for payment, were knowingly and designedly calculated and adjusted by and between said Alexander and said Moncure, in behalf of defendant, so as to produce, in the end, a yearly interest of twelve per cent. on the sum advanced, during such time of indulgence: and that the principal and interest secured by the said instruments, were intended and designed, by both said parties, to amount, and did, in fact, amount, to greatly more than the sum so advanced, with legal interest for such time of indulgence as aforesaid; and did, in fact, substantially secure to said Alexander a yearly interest of twelve per cent. on the sum so advanced by him. Then the jury, if they find such facts as aforesaid satisfactorily proved, and fairly deducible from the evidence aforesaid, may properly infer from such facts, and fairly presume, that the transaction was substantially a loan, within the meaning of the statute against usury; notwithstanding it may appear to have been made in the form and name of a sale of the said Mary James's bond or note; and then the jury may, from the same facts and circumstances, if proved and deduced as aforesaid, also properly infer, and will presume, that the sum of money deducted and retained by the said Alexander from the nominal amount of said bond or note, was substantially usurious interest under another name, for the forbearance of the money so lent or advanced."

Which instruction, THE COURT gave as prayed.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, contended for the right to open and close the argument to the jury, as the defendant held the affirmative of the issue; and cited Archbold's Civil Practice, 169, 170; Goodtitle v. Braham, 4 Term R. 497.

But inasmuch as the plaintiffs were to prove damages sustained by the breach of the covenant, THE COURT decided that they had a right to open and conclude the argument to the jury.

After the cause had been argued to the jury by Mr. Dunlop, for plaintiffs, and by Mr. Swann and Mr. Jones, for defendant, Mr. Jones moved the court to instruct the jury (in explanation of the fourth and fifth instructions prayed by the plaintiff's counsel, and given by the court) as follows: "That if the said note was both drawn and dated after a distinct understanding and agreement had been entered into with the said Alexander to take an assignment of such a note thereafter contingently to be drawn, at a discount exceeding the legal rate of interest, and the said Alexander knew, at the time he took the note, that it had been drawn and assigned for the specific purpose of carrying out the said previous understanding and agreement with him; or if it was understood and known by him, throughout all the preliminary negotiations which led to the final arrangement, that they had reference to a contingent note thereafter to be drawn and assigned for such specific purpose, and that such note was to be framed conformable to such final arrangement when it came to be concluded on between the parties; then it is to be presumed he had sufficient knowledge of the purpose for which said note was drawn by Mary James, within the meaning of the said fourth and fifth instructions, to affect him with the consequences of such knowledge; that is to say, that such knowledge of the specific purpose and object of the parties to the note, was sufficient notice that such were the only purpose and object, and that the bond or note was for no other consideration, if such be, in truth, the fact."

Which instruction THE COURT refused to give; saying that the matter was proper to be left to the jury, to draw such inferences as they should be satisfied ought to be drawn from the evidence in that respect.

Mr. Key, for plaintiffs, then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should be satisfied, by all the evidence in the cause, that it was a loan at usurious interest, under cover of a sale, the contract was usurious and void; but if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that it was a sale and purchase of the bond of Mary James, then it was not usurious.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, agreed to the instruction, with an addition, saying, in effect, that if the jury found the facts to be as stated in his former prayer, it was a loan, and not a sale.

Mr. Key accepted and agreed to this modification of the instruction.

Verdict for the defendant.

Both parties took bills of exception. The plaintiffs carried the cause to the supreme court of the United States by writ of error, where the judgment of this court was reversed, and a venire de novo awarded, at January term, 1839. 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 345.

COLLISION—ON INLAND CANAL—JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of the admiralty court over cases of collision upon inland canals upheld upon authority.

[Cited in Malony v. City of Milwaukee, 1 Fed. 612.]

A collision occurred on the Delaware and Raritan canal, in the state of New Jersey, between the steam barge Monitor and the canal boat Estelle, whereby the latter was sunk. She belonged in New York, and a libel was filed to recover for the damages. The answer of the owners of the Monitor sets up the want of jurisdiction of the admiralty courts over such cases occurring upon canals.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellant.

Benedict, Taft & Benedict, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action to recover the damages caused by a collision that occurred between the steam barge Monitor and the canal barge Estelle, about twelve miles west of New Brunswick on the Delaware and Raritan canal. Upon the evidence I am of the opinion that the collision was caused by the negligence of the steam barge.

The main question of the case is one of jurisdiction. In behalf of the defence it is contended that the admiralty has no jurisdiction of a collision occurring on any canal, while the libellant insists that such a thoroughfare as the Delaware and Raritan canal can be no other than navigable water, and so within the jurisdiction. This precise question has never been decided by the supreme court of the United States, although it cannot be denied that general expressions have been used by that court which afford support to the claim of jurisdiction. It is conceded, however, that there are several adjudged cases in other courts, that if followed would support this libel. But it has been earnestly requested by both sides that in the absence of authority controlling this court, the question be examined and determined in this case upon principle, and to that end I have been furnished all the assistance that can be derived from an exhaustive argument of the whole question by the advocates. In view of this request the case has been held, in the hope that some intermission of pressing business might occur in which justice to these arguments could be attempted to be done in the opinion of the court. But it is manifest that the case can be no longer delayed from this purpose without injustice to the libellant, and I therefore feel impelled to follow the cases where a similar question has arisen, without attempting at this time to set forth my own views.

Decree for libellant, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount of damages.

MARITIME LIEN—SUPPLIES—VESSEL LEAVING PORT.

The departure of a steamboat, running between New York and Stuyvesant-on-the-Hudson, from New York on her daily trip is a "leaving of the port," within the language of the statute of New York of 1862, c. 482, in relation to liens on domestic vessels; and specifications of lien must be filed within twelve days from such departure, to make the lien valid.

In admiralty.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a libel for supplies furnished to the Monitor, in July and August, 1876. She made daily trips between New York and Stuyvesant, on the Hudson river, during the summer and until the 15th of November. Specifications of the claim were filed November 17th, 1876, in the office of the county clerk of the county of New York. The supplies were charged the vessel and owners, and in fact the libellant relied on the credit of the vessel. A lien is claimed, first, by the general maritime law, and secondly, by the New York statute of [April 24] 1862, c. 482, § 2 [Laws 1862, p. 956]. The case of The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 558, is conclusive against the general maritime lien. The state statute provides that the lien shall cease "whenever such ship or vessel shall leave the port at which such debt was contracted, unless the person having such lien shall, within twelve days after such departure, cause to be drawn up and filed specifications, etc." It is argued that the proper construction of the statute as applied to a steamboat running between one place and another within the district, is that the "departure" intended is the final departure from the port, and not her departure on her daily trip. I think the language will not admit of this construction. The words "shall leave the port" are unambiguous. They do not mean "shall leave the jurisdiction" or "the district." The vessel undoubtedly left the port of New York every day after these supplies were furnished. The specifications were not filed within twelve days thereafter. Therefore, the lien ceased. This construction was put upon the similar provision of the Revised Statutes of New York in Veltman v. Thompson, 3 N. Y. 438. Libel dismissed with costs.

COLLISION—VESSEL AT DOCK—TUG WITH TOW.

1. A canal-boat moored at a certain dock by the order of the harbor-master is lawfully there, even though it be at a narrow place in the river.

2. A tug with a tow must maneuver cautiously and prudently; and suction of the water from a passing vessel is one of those natural incidents which she must guard against.

In admiralty.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The canal-boat Preston, which the libellant owned, was, at the time of the collision, at the dock below the tunnel passage, as it is called, in the Chicago river, at Washington street, or was in the act of getting to the dock. On the part of the libellant's witnesses it is asserted that the canal-boat was at the dock below the tunnel passage. On the part of the defense several of the witnesses state that the canal-boat was in the passage when the Monitor, having in tow the bark John Bell, came up the river, and the John Bell came in collision with the canal-boat.

Whichever hypothesis be true,—whether she was in or below the passage moored at the dock,—I think that the libellant is entitled to recover, because the canal-boat had a right to pass down through the tunnel passage, and it had a right to be moored at the dock, because the harbor-master had given express instructions for mooring the canal-boat at that place; therefore, the canal-boat was in a lawful position, or acting lawfully, and it was the duty of the Monitor to avoid coming in collision. If the canal-boat was in the passage they should have held up entirely, or should have gone so slowly as to have rendered the collision of no consequence; or if she was at the dock, of course it was the duty of the Monitor to avoid the collision.

Which is liable? I confess that I have not seen anything in the evidence to satisfy me that there was any fault on the part of the John Bell. Taking the proof as it is, she followed the Monitor in tow. The collision might have been the result, as it is claimed, of the suction of the water forced by the passage of the Bell; but that is one of those natural incidents which the tug was bound to guard against just as much as anything else in such a narrow passage, and it is a lesson which these tugs must learn if this court can teach it to them,—that they, in going through these dangerous, critical places, must use greater precautions than they do; and there is nothing that will teach them except compelling them to pay. It was clear to those who had charge of the tug that there was a canal-boat there. It was in open daylight. There was nothing to prevent them from seeing what was there, and instead of taking care to guard against it, they rushed headlong at an ordinary rate of speed, and let the weakest take care of herself. That is a rule that will not do in such a narrow thoroughfare as the Chicago river, and especially when they were tunnelling the river. The tugs must be more careful. It is not a question whether they will get through with a tow and be ready five, ten, or fifteen minutes sooner to take another, but when they are engaged in their business they must do it carefully, cautiously, and prudently, with regard to the rights of others. I have no doubt of the liability of the tug. Decree for libellant.

COLLISION—JOINT NEGLIGENCE OF TWO VESSELS—DIVISION OF DAMAGES—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

1. Where a vessel was injured by the joint negligence of another vessel and a tug, the damage should be apportioned between them.

2. In estimating the damages, the expense of repairing the mast, and demurrage for the time lost, should be allowed.

3. The mast, as repaired, having stood the remainder of the season, and it not appearing but what it would have continued serviceable, the expense of putting in a new mast during the next winter cannot be recovered.

In admiralty. This was a libel filed by John Prindeville, as owner of the barque Major Anderson, against the tug Monitor and the brig Hill, for damages caused by a collision in Chicago harbor.

Waite & Clarke, for libellant.
Spafford & McDaid, for respondent.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The substantial facts in this case, as they appear from the pleadings and proofs, are, that on the morning of the 21st of April, 1869, the barque Major Anderson, belonging to the libellant, was lying in the Chicago river, moored outside of two other vessels which were moored to the dock. Immediately below the Anderson the brig Hill lay moored outside of another vessel which was also moored to the dock. The tug Monitor came alongside the Hill and made fast to her, for the purpose of towing the Hill to some other point up the stream. A strong current was running in the river at the time. In order to get into the open channel, it was necessary to work the Hill outside of the Anderson, and in attempting to do so, and while she was in tow of the tug, the bowsprit of the Hill became entangled in the mizzen-lift of the Anderson, and produced such a strain upon the rigging of the Anderson as to fracture the mizzen-mast near the deck. This result was unquestionably produced, as shown by the testimony, by the combined unskillful management of those in charge of the tug, and those in charge of the Hill. It seems there was a line run from the timber-heads of the Hill to the dock, which should have been rendered off, or allowed to run free as soon as the Hill was in control of the tug; but instead of doing so the men on the Hill held said line taut, whereby the Hill was drawn forward and upstream, instead of following the tug in a diagonal or direct line across or toward the center of the stream until she was outside the Anderson, as was manifestly intended. The evidence shows that those in charge of the tug were careless or negligent in not noticing the course the Hill was taking, and in keeping the force of the tug applied after the Hill's bowsprit became entangled in the rigging of the Anderson, although they were notified of the trouble, and ought to have slacked up.

I therefore find no difficulty in determining that the damage to the Anderson should be borne jointly by the Hill and the tug. The libellant claims as damages, first the cost of fishing the mast, which was $58; second, demurrage for one day while the mast was being repaired, $100; third, the cost of a new mast which was put in during the following winter, $385.

The only serious difficulty I have met with in the case is in fixing the amount of damages to which the libellant is justly entitled under the circumstances. The evidence shows that the mast was not broken off, but was cracked or strained to such an extent as to render it unsafe for service in the estimation of all who saw it, and it was properly fixed at the expense of $58 and one day's delay, so that it seems for all practical purposes to have been as useful as it was before the injury. It may not have been as symmetrical, but it evidently was as serviceable. It is claimed on the part of the libellants that they were entitled to a new mast in place of the old one thus broken by the carelessness of the respondents, and this might possibly be true if the old mast had been rendered entirely worthless, so that it was impossible to repair it and make it fit for service. But the proof shows that by fishing it did good service during the entire season, and there is no evidence but what it would have continued as serviceable for the remainder of the life of the vessel. There is also considerable evidence on the part of the respondents tending to show that this mast was weak and rotten at the time it received the injury. Some of the witnesses who examined it directly after the accident noticed rotten and decayed spots in it, and others who examined it the next winter, after it was taken out of the hull, testify to its showing a very considerable condition of decay.

The rule of compensation, where the damage can be repaired, is to make the injured part, as nearly as possible, as good as it was before the injury occurred; and applying that rule to this case, it seems to me the respondents ought not to be mulcted in the cost of the new mast. The old mast, when repaired, served all the purposes that it did before the injury. The vessel was eight or nine years old, and all her wood work must therefore have been somewhat impaired and weakened by service and decay; especially does the proof show that condition of things to have existed in reference to this injured mast, as it certainly broke or cracked on very slight provocation, and I do not think it would be equitable to give the libellant the cost of the new mast. If he has seen fit to take out the damaged or fished mast, and throw it away as a total loss, and replace it with a new one, he must do so at his own cost. There was no malice, or such gross carelessness shown in the case as entitles the libellant to exemplary or punitive damages. He is only entitled to be made good, and was substantially so by the fishing of the old mast.

This view of the case is fully sustained by the supreme court, in Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 35; Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 111; The Granite State, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 314.

A decree will therefore be entered finding both the tug and brig at fault, and jointly and severally liable for the damages, and fixing the damages at one hundred and fifty-eight dollars, being the cost of repairing the injured mast and one day's demurrage. No interest is allowed, as the proof shows respondents to have been at all times willing to pay the actual damage. But as no tender was made, the libellant will have his decree for costs.

SEAMEN—WAGES—MASTER—MARITIME LIEN—ADVANCES FOR BOARD OF CREW AND SUPPLIES.

1. The contract of the captain of a vessel for his services is a personal contract, and he has no maritime lien for his compensation as such.

2. His claims for advances for board of crew and purchase of supplies may, however, be allowed out of proceeds in the registry.

In admiralty.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The hearing in this case came on for the purpose of determining what disposition should be made of a balance of proceeds remaining in the registry of the court. The steamer has been sold, the claims of the libellants and some others paid in full, and there is a remnant of some five or six hundred dollars left in the registry.

The captain of the steamer filed a claim amounting to $1,379 for wages as captain, and some small expenditures. There are also claims filed by material and supply men to the amount of about $900. It is objected by the material and supply men that their claims should be satisfied out of these proceeds before there is any satisfaction of the captain's claim. I am clear, on consulting the authorities, that such is the case. The objection to the payment of the captain, either pro rata, or as a first claim out of the proceeds of this steamer, I think is well taken.

The law clearly seems to contemplate the contract by the captain for his services as a personal contract with the owner of the vessel. He can file no libel; he has no lien upon the vessel for his wages or his services, although he has a lien, perhaps, for expenditures, or materials, or supplies, when in a foreign port, but for his wages as captain he has no lien, cannot libel the vessel, and cannot enforce it in rem. If there should be a sum left in the registry after payment of all liens, I am inclined to think that the captain, being a creditor of the owner, might intervene to be paid out of this fund, not because of his lien, but because he is a creditor and entitled by proper proceedings to his payment out of any funds belonging to the owner, his debtor; but certainly he has no lien as against material and supply men, who have at least a statutory lien.

I, however, find in the account filed by the captain, that he paid $53.50 board of crew and $23.85 for supplies of the boat. These items being proven, he will be entitled to the amount of those items, $79.35, or rather, to his pro rata, with the other claimants.

For a full discussion of the master's lien, and collection of authorities, see 2 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 24, 25, and notes.

PATENTS—EGG-BEATERS—NOVELTY—INFRINGEMENT.

The second claim of the reissued patent granted to Edwin P. Monroe, October 16, 1860, for a new and improved egg-beater, is for "the beaters, I and J, revolved in opposite directions by suitable mechanism, substantially as set forth." The Monroe beaters revolve concentrically. The defendant made and sold beaters under the patent granted to Turner Williams and E. D. Goodrich, dated May 31, 1870, numbered 103,811. These latter consist of two beaters revolved in opposite directions, the axes being some distance apart. Held, that the manufacture and sale of the Williams & Goodrich beaters did not infringe complainant's patent.

strain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 23,694, granted to the complainant April 19, 1859.]

James B. Robb, for complainant.

B. R. Curtis and T. W. Clarke, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Complainant alleges that defendant infringes the invention secured to him by letters patent, reissue No. 1,062, dated October 16, 1860, for a new and improved egg-beater. Defendant, under license from the patentees, was making and selling egg-beaters, under and in conformity to letters patent of the United States, granted to Turner Williams and E. D. Goodrich, assignees of Turner Williams, dated May 31, 1870, and numbered 103,811.

The beater described in complainant's patent, consists of a frame, to be clamped to a table or other support, with two concentric beaters, which are, by suitable gearing, revolved in opposite directions. The vessel containing the eggs to be beaten, is held up to the beaters, which project downward from the frame, so that the beaters will be immersed in the matters to be beaten. By turning the crank, the beaters are revolved concentrically, in opposite directions. In the Monroe patent, the first claim, is for, in combination with a rotary egg-beater, an arm having at one end bearings for the journals to rotate in, and at the other a clamping device for the purpose of securing the beater to the table with its shaft or bearing in a vertical line, as set forth. It is not contended that defendant infringes this claim. The second claim is for "the beaters, I and J, revolved in opposite directions by suitable mechanism, substantially as set forth." The Monroe beaters revolve in opposite directions, and the beaters in the Turner Williams patent also revolve in opposite directions. Here their resemblance begins and ends. The Monroe beaters revolve concentrically. The axes of the beaters in the Williams machine are at some distance apart, and the orbits described by the revolution of the blades of the beaters intersect each other. The currents produced in the matter to be beaten, are entirely different. In the Monroe beater, the fluid material tends to arrange itself mainly in two concentric layers, which are carried around in opposite directions by the beaters, the centrifugal force tending to accumulate the material around the circumference of the vessel. In defendant's beater, this action does not take place, for the reason that the orbits of the blades intersect at two points in their circumference. After the blade of one beater has passed through the material, another beater, moving in an opposite direction, passes through the same material, obliterating the track made by the other, and so on alternately. There are other obvious and important differences, in the mode of operation of the beaters, which render it too clear to admit of any doubt, that the invention described in the Turner Williams patent is not an infringement of the patent to Monroe. Bill dismissed.

master, one Alleyne, had taken her on shares, that is, under a contract with the owner to divide the earnings. A part of the agreement was, that Alleyne should victual and man her. This agreement was known to the libellant when he furnished the provisions. It is admitted by the learned counsel for the claimants that a lien would have been created by these supplies, if the libellant had been ignorant of the contract between the general owner and the master. But it is contended, that with knowledge that the master was to victual and man the vessel, it would be a fraud on the general owners to create an incumbrance upon her for provisions, and that Nickerson was bound to look to the master alone. If credit had in fact been given exclusively to the master, then the right to a lien would have been waived, and none would have existed; but such was not the fact. There is no doubt that the provisions were furnished on the credit of the vessel also. In order to see whether a lien was created in this case, we must look to the general authority of the master, and the reasons on which it is founded. He has power to hypothecate the vessel in other than the home port for necessary supplies, or to create a lien upon her therefor; and this power is given in order that he may pursue the voyage. It is deemed for the benefit of the owners, that such a right should exist, that the certainty of holding the ship therefor, without the necessity of inquiring into the state of the title, or the ability of the owners, should give the greatest facility for obtaining these necessaries.

I am not aware of any case in which the state of the title has in any degree affected this right; and I think it would impair the usefulness of the rule, to introduce any such modification of it. It will be less plain and certain, and would not adequately accomplish the object of the law, in giving the best security, as the highest inducement to persons abroad, to furnish the necessary supplies. I should fear that owners themselves would be the sufferers from any diminution of the certainty of this security.

In the case now before the court, the general owners were directly interested in the success of the voyage. Their profits or compensation for the use of the vessel depended on its prosecution. I am satisfied, that it was competent for the master to obtain these supplies upon the credit of the vessel, and that a lien was created thereby. Decree for the libellant.

SEAMAN'S WAGES — VESSEL SAILED ON SHARES — KNOWLEDGE OF LIBELLANT.

1. The fact that the master of a vessel sails her "on shares" does not deprive a seaman hired by him of his lien on the vessel for his wages, unless it was also a part of the seaman's contract that his service was to be rendered on the personal credit of the master and not on the credit of the ship.

In admiralty.

S. B. Caldwell, for libellant.

H. H. Benjamin, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon exceptions to the answer. The action is in rem to enforce a lien in behalf of a seaman for his wages. The answer admits that the libellant performed services as cook on board the vessel proceeded against, during the period charged in the libel, and that he was hired by the master of the vessel at the rate of wages stated in the libel.

The defence set up is, that during all the time the libellant served on board, the vessel was chartered by or let and hired to the master, and was entirely under the control and management of the master under a contract of charter or hiring made between the master and the owner of the vessel, whereby it was agreed that the vessel should be run, victualled and manned by the master on shares, all of which was known to the libellant.

It will be noticed that in this defence it is not averred that the libellant contracted to render the service in question upon the sole and personal credit of the master. The averment simply is that the vessel was sailed by the master on shares, and that the seaman knew that fact. These two facts do not constitute a defence to the action.

As I understand the law, an agreement between the master of a vessel and the owners thereof, whereby the vessel is to be sailed by the master on shares and be under the exclusive control and management of the master, although it may constitute the master owner, pro hac vice, and prevent him from binding the owner personally, does not deprive the master of the power to bind the vessel for the services of the crew, nor affect his contract with the seaman, unless it appears to be a part of such contract that the service is to be rendered upon the personal credit of the master, and not upon the credit of the ship. In the absence of such an agreement by the seaman, the contract of the master for the service of the seaman on board the ship creates a lien thereon in favor of the seaman.

The fact that it is known to the seaman that the vessel is sailed by the master on shares by itself alone is not sufficient to raise a presumption that the seaman agreed for a personal credit. Hiring by the seaman upon the credit of the ship with knowledge of a contract between the master and the owner for the sailing of the vessel on shares, involves no inconsistency, because such a contract between the master and owner does not affect the master's power to bind the ship for the services of the crew. The master may undoubtedly so contract with a seaman as to deprive the seaman of a lien upon the ship, and the fact that the seaman knows that the vessel is to be run on shares is a material circumstance in an effort to show such to have been the contract; but the circumstance does not by itself prove the existence of such a contract nor warrant the conclusion that it was intended to waive a lien upon the ship.

This understanding of the law is supported by the following cases: Says Sprague, J.: "Supposing the libellants to be seamen employed in maritime service, they have a lien on the vessel whether she be sailed on shares or not. Their knowing that she was so sailed can make no difference." The Canton [Case No. 2,388].

Says McKeon, J.: "It is too well settled to admit of controversy that the lien of seamen for their wages is not affected by a contract between the master and owners in reference to the sailing of the vessel on shares." The Galloway C. Morris [Case No. 5,204].

Says Lowell, J.: "No case has ever yet decided that seamen hired by a charterer lose their lien." Flaherty v. Doane [Case No. 4,849]. See Skolfield v. Potter [Id. 12,925]; Webb v. Peirce [Id. 7,320].

The case of The Bambard [Case No. 831] proceeded upon this understanding of the law. In that case the libel was dismissed upon the ground that there were facts which showed that the agreement was to perform the service upon the personal credit of the master, and that the seaman had settled with the master upon that understanding of his agreement.

If it be the case, which I doubt, that a different understanding of the law from that indicated prevails in the Southern district of New York, the cases I have above referred to support the view which has hitherto prevailed in this district and show the weight of authority to be upon that side of the question.

This view of the case renders it unnecessary to consider the effect of section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. There must be a decree in favor of the libellant, for the amount claimed.

SHIPPING — PUBLIC REGULATIONS — FRAUDULENT REGISTER—FORFEITURE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. An American register was obtained for a British vessel, under the act of December 23, 1852 (10 Stat. 149), on the statement that she had been wrecked off Cape May, which statement was false, and that repairs to an amount exceeding her previous value, had been put on her, a forged receipt for the payment of such repairs being exhibited. This American register was used by the person claiming to be owner, and he afterwards sold the vessel to a bona fide purchaser: Held, that the vessel was forfeited to the United States, by virtue of the 27th section of the act of December 31, 1792 (1 Stat. 298).

2. This forfeiture was not defeated by a sale to a bona fide purchaser.

In admiralty.

B. F. Tracy, for the United States.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke and J. M. Guiteau, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The evidence in this case establishes the following facts, to wit: That in the month of September, 1869, an American register was obtained for the British brig W. B. Forest, under the act of the 23d of December, 1852, by means of the false and fraudulent statement, that the brig had been wrecked off Cape May, within the waters of the United States, then brought to this port and sold for $975, and repaired to the amount of $3,825. These statements, upon which an American register was issued to her, under the name of the brig Monte Christo, have been proved to be pure fabrications without foundation in fact. The vessel was repaired to the amount stated during that season, by Messrs. C. & R. Poillon, whose bill was falsely stated to have been paid, and a forged receipt exhibited as evidence of the payment, but she was never wrecked as stated, and her repairs did not equal three fourths of the cost of the vessel when repaired. At the time of this fraud, the person claiming to be the owner of the vessel was one Jno. W. Currier; and the evidence discloses plainly, that the fraud was perpetrated with his knowledge, connivance, and procurement. In September, 1869, this American register, to the benefit of which the vessel was not entitled, was used by the vessel, with the knowledge of Currier, who took the oath of ownership and dispatched her on a voyage under it. The vessel thereupon became forfeited to the government, by virtue of the statute of December 31, 1792, § 27, which declares, "that if any certificate of registry or record, shall be fraudulently or knowingly used for any ship or vessel, not then actually entitled to the benefit thereof, according to the true intent of this act, such ship or vessel shall be forfeited to the United States, with her tackle, apparel and furniture." 1 Stat. 298.

The forfeiture created by this statute, as well as by the act of July 18, 1866 [14 Stat. 184], under which the evidence also brings this case, is absolute; and in such case it is well settled that the forfeiture, is not defeated by a sale to a bona fide purchaser. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the evidence offered to show that the claimant Franklin was a bona fide purchaser of the vessel, or to determine whether either he or the master, who has contracted to buy her, are chargeable with knowledge of the fraudulent character of the register under which the vessel has been sailed. There must therefore be a decree condemning the vessel.

[The case was subsequently heard upon the question of the distribution of the informer's share of the proceeds of forfeiture. Case No. 9,720.]

Case No. 9,720.

The MONTE CHRISTO.

[6 Ben. 327; 17 Int. Rev. Rec. 31.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. Jan., 1873.

SHIPPING—PUBLIC REGULATIONS—DISTRIBUTION OF INFORMER'S SHARE—FRAUDULENT REGISTER.

1. The act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 184), is not an act relating to the customs, within the meaning of the act of March 2, 1867 (Id. 546).

2. The proceeds of a forfeiture under that act are to be paid directly by the court, one-half to the collector of the port, for the use of the United States, one-fourth to the informer, if any, and one-twelfth each to the collector, surveyor and naval officer.

In admiralty.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The question here presented by the district attorney does not appear to have ever arisen in any reported case, nor can I ascertain that it has ever been brought under consideration in the practice of any of the departments of the government.

It arises as follows: The brig Monte Christo has been condemned by this court as forfeited to the United States, under the 24th section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 184), which provides: "And be it further enacted, that if any certificate of registry, enrolment, or license, or other record or document granted in lieu thereof to any vessel, shall be knowingly and fraudulently obtained or used for any vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof, such vessel, with her tackle, apparel and furniture, shall be liable to forfeiture." [Case No. 9,719.]

The proceeds of this forfeiture being in the registry of the court, an informer made claim to be entitled to the informer's share, namely, one-fourth of the proceeds. No question was made as to the right of an informer to this portion, and it has been determined that the person claiming is, in fact, the informer. Whereupon I am required to determine whether the various parties entitled to share in these proceeds can lawfully receive payment of their share directly from the registry of the court. Former decisions have left this question one of procedure merely. U. S. v. George [Id. 15,197]. By whomsoever the fund is distributed, the portions are to be the same, and the same parties are entitled thereto.

It is first to be considered whether the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 546), is applicable here; for if so, these proceeds, after deducting the charges and expenses, must be transferred to the treasury of the United States, to be thereafter distributed by the secretary of the treasury, in accordance with the order of distribution. The act of March 2, 1867, is confined, by its terms, to proceeds of forfeitures incurred under "the provisions of the laws relating to the customs," and it can have no application here, unless the 24th section of the act of July 18, 1866, be regarded as a provision of law relating to the customs. I do not see that the section should be so regarded. It relates solely to the use of fraudulent certificates of registry, enrolment, or license of ships and vessels, and would naturally be described as a provision of law relating to the registry or enrolment of ships and vessels, which is a well known class of statutes, in some instances certainly, treated as distinct from the laws relating to the customs. As, for instance, in the 11th section of the very act under which this forfeiture has been incurred, where the phraseology is, "acts relating to the customs, or the registry, enrolling or licensing of vessels." This distinction may well be supposed to have been in view in drafting the act of 1867; and, in the absence of any reason for including the 24th section of the act of July 18, 1866, within the description of laws to which the act of 1867 is applicable by its terms, I conclude that the proceeds of a forfeiture incurred under section 24 of the act of 1866 are not within the scope of that act. We turn then, and naturally, to the provisions in section 31 of the act of July 18, 1866, under which act this forfeiture was incurred, where it is provided that all forfeitures by virtue of that act shall be disposed of and applied "as provided in section 91 of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 697]." This section 91 provides for the shares into which forfeitures are to be divided, and declares the parties entitled thereto, according to which one moiety is to be received by the collector, for the use of the United States, and the other half is to be divided between, and paid in equal portions to, the collector, naval officer and surveyor, unless there be an informer, in which case one-half the latter moiety must be given to such informer. That the collector is to receive the moiety going to the United States, is indicated by the words of the section, and a payment to the collector, to the naval officer, and to the surveyor of their respective shares is mentioned; but no provision is made for any payment into the treasury, nor for any payment of the fund in gross to the collector.

The words of the section, taken apart from any other section, afford no authority for a payment of the fund to the collector or into the treasury; and, that such a payment was not contemplated by the act, is indicated by the fact that, while section 90 of the act of 1799 does provide for a payment of the fund in gross, less costs and charges, to the collector, all reference to that section is omitted in the 31st section of the act of 1866, and only section 91 mentioned; which section, while it fixes the shares, does not, as has been said, authorize any payment thereof to any but the parties entitled thereto, save only that one moiety is to be received by the collector for the use of the United States.

I arrive at the conclusion that the parties are entitled to payment directly from the registry of the court, the more readily, because no reason has been suggested for sending the fund through the hands of various officers, none of whom, under the law, have any discretion as to its application, or derive any advantage from its disbursement. No duties or other charges are to be deducted from it, and nothing whatever, that I can imagine, would be gained from a different construction of the law, while much unnecessary delay and labor would be caused thereby to all the parties entitled to the fund.

My determination, therefore, is that no statute authorizes a payment of this fund otherwise than to the parties entitled thereto by law, and that the only lawful disposition of the fund which can be made by the court is to pay one moiety to the collector of the port, for the use of the United States, one-fourth to the informer, and one-twelfth to the collector, for his own use, one-twelfth to the surveyor, and one-twelfth to the naval officer.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 22, 1855.

CARRIERS — BILL OF LADING — RESHIPMENT — LIABILITY OF INTERMEDIATE CARRIER — AFFREIGHTMENT — CHARGES — ADVANCES.

1. Where A., at Oswego, shipped flour to B. at New York, through the canal, subject to charges for freight through Lake Ontario, and chargeable with specified freight from Oswego to New York, and wrote on the bill of lading, "Pay charges to C. on safe delivery," and D., a canal forwarder at Oswego, receipted the bill of lading thus, "Received in good order for C.," and C., a forwarder from Albany to New York, receiver the flour at Albany in apparent good order, and paid the charges for freight through Lake Ontario, and the freight from Oswego to Albany, and carried the flour to New York, and delivered it to B., and it appeared that the flour had been damaged by wet before it arrived at Albany: Held, that, as C. had no interest in, or connection with either the lake or the canal navigation, and merely received the flour at Albany and transported it to New York, he was not answerable for either the carrier on the lake or on the canal, and was not responsible for the damage to the flour.

[Cited in The New Hampshire, 21 Fed. 927.]

2. C. was entitled to recover from B. the charges which he paid at Albany, when he received the flour, it appearing that the advance was made according to the established usage in shipping goods from Oswego to New York.

[Cited in Knight v. Providence & W. R. Co., 13 R. I. 576.]

3. Such advance became chargeable on the goods the same as the freight from Albany to New York, and the whole claim became an entirety, capable of being enforced by C., by a libel against B., in the district court.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in personam, filed in the district court [by George Monteith and others against Charles Kirkpatrick], to recover freight and charges for the transportation of 850 barrels of flour from a port in Canada through Lake Ontario and the canal to Albany, and thence to New York. After a decree in the district court in favor of the libellants, the respondent appealed to this court.

Erastus C. Benedict, for libellants.
Ammiel J. Willard, for respondent.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. Perry & Van Dyck, of Oswego, shipped the flour in question in this case, to John Wilmot, in care of the defendant, at New York, subject to charges for freight through Lake Ontario, which were $132 13, and chargeable with 43 cents per barrel, freight from Oswego to New York. They wrote on the face of the bill of lading, "Pay charges to Albany Canal Line, on safe delivery." Franklin & Austin, of Oswego, forwarders on the canal, receipted the bill of lading, as follows: "Received the above in good order, for Albany Canal Line." The flour was received at Albany in apparently good order by the libellants, owners of "The Albany Canal Line," who paid the Oswego charges, $132 13, and the freight thence to Albany, (included in the 43 cents per barrel), transported the flour to New York, and delivered it to the defendant. "The Albany Canal Line" is a transportation line from Albany to New York. On an inspection of the flour, after its arrival and delivery at New York, it was found to have been damaged by wetting, fifty cents per barrel. But this damage occurred previously to its arrival at Albany.

The respondent seeks to abate the amount of charges and freight claimed by the libellants, by deducting this damage to the flour. There could be no objection to this, if the libellants are responsible for the damage claimed. The difficulty is, that it does not appear, from any proofs in the case, that they are answerable for either the carrier on the lake or on the canal, under one or the other of whose charge the damage must have happened. The libellants had no interest in, or connection with, either the lake or the canal navigation. They simply received the flour at Albany, and transported it upon their line, from that place to New York. It is true that Franklin & Austin, the forwarders on the canal at Oswego, were in the habit of favoring the line of the libellants in the transportation of goods. But they do not appear to have been under any obligations to do so—certainly not from any partnership arrangements existing between the parties. The libellants, therefore, not being responsible for the damage, it was properly disallowed by the court below.

Another ground of defence is, that the libellants are not entitled to recover the charges paid by them at Albany, when they received the goods to be transported on their line. But the case shows that this advance was made according to the established usage of the shipping of goods from the port of Oswego to New York. The contract of shipment must, therefore, be construed with reference to, and in subordination to this usage. The right to recover the charges, stands upon the same footing as the right to the freight from Albany to New York.

It is also objected that the district court had no jurisdiction of the case, so far as related to these charges, as a portion of them were for the shipment of the flour on the canal. These charges were for freight on Lake Ontario, as well as upon the canal. As we have seen, according to the usage of the business, the contract of shipment with the respondent implied an undertaking to repay those charges, when advanced by the libellants; and they became thereby chargeable upon the goods shipped, the same as the freight from Albany to New York. The contract, therefore, as respected the whole amount claimed by the libellants, was, in judgment of law, an entirety, not severable, and contains all the essential elements of a maritime contract. The shipment of the goods to which it related, began and ended upon waters within the admiralty jurisdiction. I am inclined, therefore, to think that this ground of defence is not well taken, and that the decree below was right, and should be affirmed.

MONTEJO et al. v. OWEN et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 15, 1877.

JUDGMENT—PRACTICE AT LAW—EQUITABLE DEFENCES.

1. M. brought an action at law, in this court, on a judgment recovered by him against O., in another court. O., by answer, set up a variety of matters which were not defences at common law against the judgment, but which were claimed to give O. an equitable right to prevent the enforcement of the judgment. On demurrer to the answer: Held, that the demurrer must be sustained.

2. Section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States does not authorize such an answer to be put in, in an action at law.

[Cited in Doe v. Roe, 31 Fed. 99; Church v. Spiegelburg, Id. 602; Herklotz v. Chase, 32 Fed. 433; Wood v. Consolidated Electric Light Co., 36 Fed. 539.]

[This was an action by Francisco J. Montejo and others against Thomas J. Owen and others. The plaintiffs demur to answer of defendants.]

Granville P. Hawes, for plaintiffs.

Frederic R. Coudert, for defendants.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. This case comes up on a demurrer by the plaintiffs to the answer of the defendants. The action is upon a judgment rendered by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, in favor of the present plaintiffs against the present defendants. The answer sets up a variety of matters which are not defences at common law against the judgment, but which are claimed to give the defendants an equitable right to prevent the enforcement of the judgment. These matters the defendants insist are available to them as a defence in this suit, by force of section 914 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That section prescribes, that, "the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding, in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts, shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time, in like causes, in the courts of record of the state within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding."

It must be assumed, that, in a suit upon a judgment, brought in a court of the state of New York, the defence set up in the answer in this suit would be available by way of answer, if sufficient in substance to entitle the party to relief against the judgment. Such is the known and established law of procedure in the state of New York, introduced by sections 69, 150 and 167 of its Code of Procedure. The first of these abolishes the distinction between actions at law and suits in equity, and the forms of all such actions and suits theretofore existing, and declares, that thereafter there shall be, in that state, but one form of action. The next section cited enacts, that the defendant may set forth, by answer, as many defences and counter-claims as he may have, whether they be such as had been theretofore legal or equitable, or both. The last section named enacts, that the plaintiff may unite in the same complaint several causes of action, whether they be such as had been theretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both, under certain specified conditions. These sections of the Code deal with claims legal and equitable, and defences legal and equitable, set up by answer, and counterclaims of both characters. In pursuance of the policy thus indicated, section 274 of such Code provides, that judgment may be given for or against one or more of several plaintiffs, and for or against one or more of several defendants, and it may determine the ultimate rights of the parties as between themselves, and it may grant to the defendant any affirmative relief to which he may be entitled. It is, of course, obvious, that this system, while it undertakes to provide for the means of administering indiscriminately legal and equitable remedies, in substance, founded upon legal and equitable rights, completely ignores all the former schemes of procedure founded on the recognition of their differences. Now, from the purview of section 914 of the United States Revised Statutes, which is already set forth, equity and admiralty causes are completely excluded, in terms. That section does not relate to them, except to effect such exclusion. The jurisprudence of the United States has recognized this distinction in numerous cases, as one of substance, as well as of form and procedure. Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 212; Bennett v. Butterworth, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 669; McFaul v. Ramsey, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 523; Jones v. McMasters, Id. 8, 22; Fenn v. Holme, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 481; Thompson v. Railroad Co., 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 134. In the last case cited, Mr. Justice Davis says, giving the opinion of the court: "The constitution of the United States and the acts of congress recognize and establish the distinction between law and equity. The remedies in the courts of the United States are, at common law or in equity, not according to the practice of state courts, but according to the principles of common law and equity, as distinguished and defined in that country from which we derive our knowledge of these principles. And, although the forms of proceedings and practice in the state courts shall have been adopted in the circuit courts of the United States, yet the adoption of the state practice must not be understood as confounding the principles of law and equity, nor as authorizing legal and equitable claims to be blended together in one suit." In the case of Bennett v. Butterworth, above cited, Chief Justice Taney said: "The constitution of the United States, in creating and defining the judicial power of the general government, establishes this distinction between law and equity; and a party who claims a legal title must proceed at law, and may, undoubtedly, proceed according to the forms of practice, in such cases, in the state court. But, if the claim is an equitable one, he must proceed according to the rules which this court has prescribed, regulating proceedings in equity in the courts of the United States."

That these discriminations between legal and equitable rights and suits are substantial, in the jurisprudence of the United States, is further apparent from provisions of the statute law, as well as from the decisions of the courts. Under section 721 of the Revised Statutes, the laws of the several states, with certain exceptions, must be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply; while, on the other hand, the law of equity, in the courts of the United States, is one and the same in every state, not dependent upon local law. "Wherever a case in equity may arise and be determined, under the judicial power of the United States, the same principles of equity must be applied to it, and it is for the courts of the United States, and for the supreme court, in the last resort, to decide what those principles are, and to apply such of them to each particular case, as they may find justly applicable thereto." Neves v. Scott, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 268. Nor are the statutes silent as to the forms and modes of procedure in suits in equity. Section 913 of the Revised Statutes declares, that they shall be according to the principles, rules and usages which belong to courts of equity, except as modified by statute, or rules made in pursuance of statute, or by the supreme court. That court has, accordingly, prescribed a body of rules regulating, very largely and comprehensively, the practice in equity.

It is claimed, that, inasmuch as the present action is one to enforce a judgment, and, therefore, not an equity cause, the procedure is to be conformed to that of the state courts, upon such a cause of action; and that, as those courts allow an equitable right to set aside or restrain the execution of such a judgment, by way of answer, the courts of the United States must conform to that rule. But, this is a mere confusion of names. This so-called defence is an affirmative equitable right to the relief asked. It, under the cases and statutes cited, is to be administered under the equitable principles, and according to the equitable procedure, of the courts of the United States. In that respect, the procedure cannot be conformed to the state practice without overthrowing the whole scheme for the administration of equity in the courts of the United States. The action is at common law. The defence is, substantially, an action in equity, and it cannot, because it assumes the guise of an answer or defence under the state law, escape from the control of the laws of the United States as to the modes of enforcing equitable rights. The demurrer must be sustained, and judgment given for the plaintiffs, with leave to the defendants to amend, on payment of costs, within twenty days.

Case No. 9,723.

MONTELL v. UNITED STATES.

[Taney, 24.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. April Term, 1840.

SHIPPING—PUBLIC REGULATIONS—BOND TO RETURN CREW—VESSEL SOLD IN FOREIGN PORT.

1. The bond given to the United States, under the act of congress passed 28th February, 1803, § 1 [2 Stat. 203], by the master of a vessel bound to a foreign port, conditioned for the return of the crew to the United States, does not embrace the case of a vessel sold in a foreign port, and which does not return to the United States.

2. The bond does not extend to cases where the seaman is lawfully separated from the ship, or is separated from her without the fault of the master or owner. It applies to those cases only where the vessel returns to a port of the United States; to cases where the seamen continue subject to the lawful authority of the master, and where it was in his power to bring them home.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.]

This suit was instituted by the United States in the district court, on the 4th of November 1839, against Francis T. Montell, the plaintiff in error, and John B. Corner, on the following bond: "Know all men by these presents, that we, John B. Corner, of Baltimore in the state of Maryland, master or commander of the schooner called the Elvira, now lying in the district of Baltimore, and F. T. Montell, in the city of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, are held and firmly bound unto the United States of America, in the full and just sum of four hundred dollars, money of the United States; to which payment well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, jointly and severally, our joint and several heirs, executors and administrators, firmly by these presents. Sealed with our seals, and dated this 10th day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine. Whereas, the above bounden John B. Corner hath delivered to the collector of the customs of the district of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland, a verified list containing, as far as he can ascertain them, the names, places of birth, residence and description of the persons who compose the company of the said schooner called the Elvira, now lying in the said district, of which he is at present master or commander, of which list the said collector has delivered to the said J. B. Corner a certified copy. Now the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the said John B. Corner shall exhibit the aforesaid certified copy of the said list, to the first boarding officer at the first port in the United States at which he shall arrive on his return thereto, and then and there also produce the persons named therein to the said boarding officer, except any of the persons contained in the said list who may be discharged in a foreign country, with the consent of the consul, vice-consul, commercial agent, or vice-commercial agent there residing, signified in writing under his hand, may arrive as aforesaid, with other persons composing the crew as aforesaid, and who may have died or absconded, or may have been forcibly impressed into other services, of which satisfactory proof shall be then also exhibited to the said last-mentioned collector, then and in such case, the said obligation shall be void and of no effect, otherwise it shall abide and remain in full force and virtue. John B. Corner. (Seal.) Francis T. Montell. (Seal.) Sealed and delivered in the presence of H. Ring."

1st Exception. The plaintiffs to support the issues on their part, offered in evidence the following bond (being the same above set forth), the due execution of which was admitted, and likewise offered in evidence the certified list of the crew of the schooner Elvira, sworn to by the master of said schooner, on the 9th day of May, 1839 (and embodied in said exception), and further proved by Hamilton Ring, that he is an officer in the custom-house at Baltimore, and has charge of the marine papers, such as reports, returns of registers, certificates of foreign consuls and commercial agents, and that no report of the master of the Elvira, in regard to the seamen mentioned in the certified list inserted in the exception, has been made to said custom-house; he further proved, that since the clearing of the said schooner Elvira, he has seen at Baltimore, John B. Corner, the master of said schooner, but that the return of said schooner has never been reported at the custom-house at Baltimore, nor does he know that said schooner has returned to any other port in the United States; whereupon, defendant, by his counsel, prayed the court to instruct the jury: That the evidence offered by the United States in this case does not bring the defendant within the condition of the bond exhibited in evidence, and that the plaintiffs cannot, therefore, recover. Which prayer was rejected; the court (Heath, J.) believing a prima facie case was made out in proof; that the case was within the first section of the act of 1803; and that it was not necessary for the government to prove the negative, that the vessel was not sold. To this opinion, and the rejection of said prayer, the defendant, by his counsel, excepted.

2d Exception. After the evidence offered by the plaintiffs, detailed in the first bill of exceptions on the part of the defendant, and which is to be considered as incorporated in this, the defendant's second bill of exceptions, the defendant offered in evidence the following consular certificate: "Consulate of the United States of America: Havana. I, John A. Smith, vice-consul of the United States of America, do hereby certify that John B. Corner, master of the schooner Elvira, produced and discharged, according to law, the following persons, whose names are on the list of the crew, as citizens of the United States, to wit: Joel Pomeroy, Charles Smith, Oliver Greenleaf and James Mitchell. And the appearer having produced to me the contract with the seamen, it appeared that they had agreed to go the voyage from Baltimore, to receive, each, twenty-five dollars advance, and two dollars per month wages; on questioning them, they answered, it was their agreement. In testimony whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix my seal of office, at Havana, this 28th day of May A. D. 1839, and of the Independence of the United States the 63d. J. A. Smith. [Seal.]" Which was admitted to be signed and sealed by the vice-consul of the United States, at Havana, and was presented to the collector of the port of Baltimore. It was stated and admitted that the crew of the schooner Elvira were discharged at Havana. Whereupon the district attorney moved the court for its opinion and direction to the jury, that the said certificate affords no defence to this action. 1. Because Patrick Poinsen was not accounted for. 2. Because it does not appear thereby that Rossiter B. Wade, whose name appears first on the crew list, heretofore given in evidence by the plaintiffs, and who was discharged in Havana, was discharged in the Havana with the consent of the consul or vice-consul, nor that extra wages had been paid to him, or on his account. 3. Because the contract for wages, as set forth in the said certificate, is contrary to the policy of the act of congress. Which prayer the court granted, and instructed the jury, that Poinsen, being a foreigner, was not embraced by the law; that the name of the said Rossiter B. Wade, discharged in the Havana, ought to have been accounted for in the certificate of the discharge of the crew; that the first section of the act of congress covered him, as one of the crew; and that the failure to obtain the vice-consul's certificate of his discharge, was a failure to comply with the provisions of the law, and the defendant is liable on his bond. The court instructed the jury, upon the whole, that the evidence offered was no defence to this action. Whereupon the defendant, by his counsel, called William Frick, the collector, and asked him whether he had not seen the said Wade in the city of Baltimore, and at the custom-house in said port, after his sailing in said vessel. To the competency of which testimony the district attorney objected, and the court sustained the objection, and rejected the testimony; whereupon the defendant, by his counsel, prayed leave to except to said opinion, and directions of the court, and each of them. The verdict and judgment of the district court being against him, the defendant sued out this writ of error.

St. George W. Teackle and John Nelson, for plaintiff in error.

Nathaniel Williams, for defendant in error.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. This case is brought here by a writ of error to the district court. The suit was brought by the United States against Montell, upon a bond taken under the act of congress of February 28, 1803 (2 Stat. 203), for the return of the crew of the steamer Elvira, of Baltimore.

The first section of this act directs that before a clearance be granted to any vessel bound on a foreign voyage, the master shall deliver to the collector a list of the ship's company, and the collector shall deliver to him a certified copy of the said list; and that he shall enter into a bond that he shall exhibit the said certified copy to the first boarding officer, at the first port of the United States at which he shall arrive on his return thereto, and at the same time produce the persons named therein to the boarding officer; whose duty it is to examine the men, with such list, and report to the collector as mentioned in the said section.

The third section of the same act provides, that whenever a vessel belonging to an American citizen shall be sold in a foreign country, and her company discharged, or where a seaman is discharged, with his own consent, in a foreign country, the captain shall pay into the hands of the American consul, residing at the place of discharge, three months' wages, over and above the wages due such seaman, two-thirds of which shall be paid to the seaman, upon his engagement on board of any vessel, to return to the United States; the remaining third to be retained, to form a fund for the relief of destitute American seamen in foreign parts.

It is unnecessary to state in detail the contents of the different exceptions, which were taken in the district court. The judgment of that court was in favor of the United States for the penalty of the bond; and the point on which the case turned will be better understood, by stating the material facts, as they appear upon the whole record, without referring particularly to the different exceptions, in which they are inserted.

It appears from the record, that the schooner Elvira, an American vessel, owned in Baltimore, cleared from this port for Havana, in the island of Cuba, about the tenth of May 1839. Montell, a merchant of this city, was the owner of the vessel, and John B. Corner, of the same place, the master for the voyage. On the day the schooner sailed, Corner delivered to the collector the crew-list, as directed by the act of congress above mentioned, and received the certified copy on the same day; and at the same time, he entered into the bond prescribed by the first section of the act of congress; in this bond, Montell, the owner, who is the plaintiff in error, was the security. The Elvira never returned to this country. The master returned in another vessel, some time before this suit was brought; and at the trial in the district court, the certificate of the American consul was produced, showing the discharge of all the crew at Havana, except Rossiter B. Wade, who went out as mate of the vessel.

It has been insisted on the part of the United States, that there is sufficient evidence on the record to show that the Elvira was sold at Havana, and that the crew were there discharged; and the district attorney contends that the bond of the master is forfeited: first, because he did not exhibit the crew-list to the first officer of the customs, who boarded the vessel, in which he returned to the United States, and account to him for the crew; secondly, because it does not appear that the three months' wages of the mate, Rossiter B. Wade, was paid to the consul.

I doubt very much whether it sufficiently appears, as contended for by the district attorney, that the Elvira was sold at Havana. But the chief point in controversy is, whether the bond embraces the case of a vessel sold in a foreign port, and which does not return to the United States; and as this point has been argued, I shall treat the case as if that fact appeared in the record, in order to decide the question upon which both parties wish for the opinion of the court.

Assuming then that the vessel was sold, the case presented, is precisely the one provided for in the 3d section of the law above referred to. The American owner may, if he thinks proper, always sell his ship in a foreign port; and if he does sell, he may discharge the crew; and in such a case, it does not require the assent of the consul to justify the discharge. The captain is bound to pay into the hands of the consul, the three months' wages as before mentioned, and the seaman is entitled to two-thirds of it, as soon as he has engaged a passage in another vessel, to return to the United States; but the captain has no power to compel him to return; he has no longer any authority over him, when he is lawfully discharged; indeed, he has nothing to do with him; for even the two months' wages are not to be paid to the seaman by the captain, but by the American consul; and it is at the option of the seaman to return or not. It would be most unreasonable, in such a case, to forfeit the captain's bond, if the seaman did not return; and it would require very plain words to satisfy the court that the legislature could have intended to make such a provision.

But it is very evident that the bond does not extend to cases where the seaman is lawfully separated from the ship; or separated from the ship without the fault of the master or owner. The bond applies to those cases only where the vessel returns to a port of the United States; to cases where the seamen continued subject to the lawful authority of the master, and where it was in his power to bring them home. The words of the first section apply only to cases of this description; they imply that the master is still in command of the vessel in which he returns, and that the seamen are on board, and subject to his authority. Thus, the provisions of this section imply, that the boarding officer will make known to him his official character, and will call on him to produce the crew-list, and to produce the men also; yet he cannot be called on to produce the crew, unless he is still in the exercise of authority over them, and exercises it in the vessel where he is himself found; for the boarding officer is required to examine the crew, with the crew-list produced; everything required to be done, presupposes the captain to have returned in command of the same vessel in which he sailed. And even if the vessel returns without the seaman, he is not liable to the penalty of the bond, under the provisions of the first section, provided the seaman was discharged with the consent of the consul; nor is he answerable, where he dies or absconds, or is forcibly impressed in another service. Now, if the bond is not forfeited, where the seaman is discharged, with the consent of the consul, how can it be considered as forfeited, where the seaman is lawfully discharged, upon the sale of the vessel, without the consul's consent? The two cases are in principle the same, and they are both expressly placed on the same footing in the third section, and the same provision is there made for each of these classes of cases.

But it seems to be supposed that the bond is forfeited, even where the seamen are lawfully discharged, unless the three months' wages are paid to the consul. The court think otherwise: the cases where seamen may be lawfully discharged, are provided for in the third section, and there is no reference in that section to the bond directed to be given by the master. The condition of the bond is prescribed in the first section, and it certainly can embrace no cases, beyond those enumerated in the law; and the payment of the three months' wages, where the vessel is sold, or where the seaman is discharged with the consul's consent, is not mentioned in the condition of the bond, as directed in the act of congress, and consequently is not intended to be secured by it.

The two sections of the law, before mentioned, apply to different cases; the first provides for the cases where the vessel returns to the United States; the third provides for cases where she is sold abroad. They are both intended to guard the seamen, who are always friendless and unprotected, in foreign ports, from the injustice and despotism of the captain; and also to preserve them, as far as possible, for the service of our own marine. Therefore, when the vessel returns, the captain is compelled to bring home his crew with him, unless he can show that they were separated from the ship, in some one of the modes pointed out in the first section; and the bond is intended to accomplish this object; but it was not the policy of the United States to prevent our ship-owners from selling their vessels in foreign ports; and it would have been a virtual prohibition of sale, if they had been compelled, notwithstanding a sale, to bring home the crew. The third section, therefore, provided for the cases of sales in foreign ports, and instead of compelling the captain to bring home the crew, it compels him to furnish the consul with the means of sending them home, if they are willing to come, and tempts them to return by refusing them the money, until they have engaged a passage to the United States. But the bond prescribed in the first section, was not intended to cover the cases mentioned in the third; there is nothing, in any part of the law, from which such an intention can be inferred.

If, therefore, the vessel was sold abroad, the bond in question does not apply to the case; no suit can be maintained on it, unless the Elvira has returned to the United States. It is admitted that she has not returned. The United States, therefore, can have no cause of action on the bond; and it is unnecessary to inquire whether Rossiter B. Wade was or was not discharged, or was or was not paid his three months' wages; because there can be no breach of the condition of the bond, and, consequently, no cause of action upon it, if the Elvira has not returned to the United States.

Some other questions were argued at the bar; but it is unnecessary to express an opinion upon them, as the points, above decided, dispose of the case. The judgment of the district court is, therefore, reversed.

[NOTE. Suit was brought by the United States against the master, Francis T. Montell, and his sureties, upon another bond, given for the proper return of the ship's register. Judgment was had upon this bond in the district court, and the money, $1,200, was paid into court. The collector of customs thereupon filed his petition in the district court, praying that a moiety of the sum recovered be paid to him and to the naval officer and surveyor, under the act of congress relative to penalties and forfeitures. The district court dismissed the petition, but was reversed by the circuit court upon appeal by the petitioners. Case No. 15,798.]

[1 Int. Rev. Rec. 125.]

District Court, D. New York. 1865.

SHIPPING — JOINT OWNERSHIP — PARTNERSHIP — BILL OF LADING—MASTER'S FRAUD—LIABILITY OF VESSEL.

[1. On a libel against a vessel and her master, who was a part owner, by the assignee of a fraudulent bill of lading issued by him, where there is no allegation of joint ownership in the vessel and her business by the intervening part owners, there can be no recovery against them and their interest in the vessel.]

[2. Common ownership in a vessel does not create a common-law partnership; and an individual part owner has no power, because of such relation to the others, to bind them in relation to matters extra the necessary preservation of the property itself.]

[3. The master cannot subject a ship in rem, much less the co-owners, to a responsibility for safe carriage or delivery of cargo not actually laden on board for transportation in the lawful employment of the vessel.]

[4. A master, being a part owner in a vessel, who issues a fraudulent bill of lading, is liable in damages to an assignee thereof in good faith who made advances thereon, which damages may be recovered against the vessel to the extent of his interest therein.]

[This was a libel in rem by Francis T. Montell and others against the schooner William H. Rutan, and in personam against her master, Charles C. Rose, for damages for the nonperformance of a bill of lading.]

The bill of lading was executed by Rose, the master of the vessel, at Alexandria, Va., on September 30, 1857, by which he acknowledges the shipment on the vessel by Charles Howard, Jr., of 3,000 bushels of wheat and 1,000 bushels of corn, and which was to be delivered at New York to the shipper or his assigns. The libellants alleged that they advanced on this bill of lading the sum of $4,200, and it was assigned to them, and that on the arrival of the vessel at New York they demanded the wheat and corn, but the vessel failed to deliver more than 150 bushels of wheat and 1,000 bushels of corn, and they demanded judgment for the value of the cargo not delivered, against the vessel and the master, whom they alleged to be one of the owners thereof. Process was issued against the vessel, and also against Rose, with a clause of foreign attachment against his property, under which the vessel was seized, and personal service was made upon Rose. Rose never appeared in the action. But William Sprague and others, "intervening for their interest in the schooner," appeared and defended the action, denying that the master was part owner, and setting up that the bill of lading was false and fraudulent; that the wheat mentioned in it was never shipped on board her, except 150 bushels, which was duly delivered. And they proved on the trial the correctness of their allegation as to the bill of lading. The libellants claimed on the trial that the master, as part owner, was in law the copartner of the other owners in this affreightment contract, and that they and the vessel were accordingly liable to them on it.

Beebe, Dean & Donohue, for libellants.
Benedict, Burr & Benedict, for claimant.

HELD BY THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge): That there is no allegation in the pleadings that the claimant's interest was that of a joint ownership in the vessel and her business, nor is the action brought against them individually, nor is any charge made against them of a common liability under the bill of lading. That the state of the pleadings, accordingly, does not authorize the description of relief sought for. That the law does not stamp upon a common ownership of vessels the character of a common-law partnership. Individual part owners have no power because of such connection with other owners to bind their fellows, aside of and beyond the necessary and regular uses of the vessels themselves. They do not acquire with their interest in that class of property an agency over it to implicate the responsibility of their co-owners, in relation to matters extra the necessary preservation of the property itself. Story, Ag. 42; Story, Partn. 650; Fland. Shipp. 378; Pars. Mar. Law, 334; 3 Kent, Comm. 151; Abb. Shipp. 137. That a cardinal restriction which applies to this case is that a master cannot subject a ship in rem, much less his co-owners, to a responsibility for safe carriage or delivery of cargo not actually laden on board of it for transportation in the lawful employment of the vessel. This principle is too firmly rooted in the doctrines of commercial jurisprudence to be now subject to question in this country or in England. The Freeman, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 182; Vandewater v. Mills, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 82; Story, Ag. § 456; Grant v. Norway, 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 337; Coleman v. Riches, 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 323. That as the libellants prove, by the testimony of the master himself, that he executed the bill of lading with knowledge that the wheat was not on board at the time, the bill of lading was nugatory and fraudulent, as to the vessel and all her co-owners, except the master himself. That, on the evidence, the master was interested in the vessel. That the interest of the claimants in the vessel is not so disclosed by the pleadings as to be affected by the result of the prosecution. That the decree can act on the vessel itself, in no way beyond the clear ownership of the master, and within the allegations of the libel of proofs. That the libellants are entitled to a decree against the master for their damages by reason of the breach of the bill of lading executed by him.

Ordered, therefore, that they recover that amount against him, and that it be referred to a commissioner to ascertain the amount; that the commissioner report also the value of the vessel and the time she was arrested in this suit, or the amount for which she was bonded and the value of the master's interest in her, and that, on the coming in of the report, the libellants have leave to claim the appropriation towards the damages of the value of such individual interest of the master in the vessel as may be decreed to be vested in him and legally allowable towards the satisfaction of the damages.

MONTFORD v. HUNT.

[3 Wash. C. C. 28.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1811.

RES JUDICATA—ESTOPPEL—BILL FOR RELIEF FROM JUDGMENT—EFFECT OF FORMER SUIT.

The plaintiff had filed a bill on the equity side of the circuit court of Georgia, against the defendant, in which he sought relief from a judgment obtained against him upon a promissory note drawn by him, claiming that the amount of the note had been paid by the endorser, against whom a suit had been instituted in a state court in Pennsylvania; and who, having been taken in execution under a capias ad satisfaciendum, gave the plaintiff certain securities, (afterwards found of no value,) and was then discharged from the execution. The bill was dismissed in Georgia; and the plaintiff having paid to the defendant the amount of the judgment, instituted this suit to recover the sum paid by him, on the ground, that the discharge of the endorser from execution, was a satisfaction of the debt. Held, that the decree of the circuit court of Georgia, was conclusive on the plaintiff; the same facts, as those now relied upon, having been before that court, or which might have been submitted by the plaintiff in the bill, to the consideration of the court, at the time of the proceeding.

[Cited in Draper v. Gorman, 8 Leigh, 646.]

The case was as follows: The defendant recovered a judgment against the plaintiff in the circuit court for the district of Georgia, upon a promissory note given by Gibson to Young, endorsed by Young to the plaintiff, and by the plaintiff to the defendant. At the same time, the defendant commenced an action in the state court of Pennsylvania against Young; recovered a judgment, and issued a capias ad satisfaciendum; upon which Young was taken, and afterwards discharged by the defendant from custody, upon giving to the defendant certain securities, which, however, produced no actual satisfaction of any part of the debt. The plaintiff filed a bill, on the equity side of the circuit court of Georgia, stating that the defendant had received satisfaction of his debt from Young, and obtained an injunction to the judgment at law. The discharge of Young, out of execution, was not known to the plaintiff, nor set forth in his bill; nor is it stated in the defendant's answer, but was fully proved by the deposition of Mr. Duponceau, taken in the cause. The injunction was dissolved on motion, and the cause coming on to be heard, the court decreed that the judgment obtained by the defendant at law, against the plaintiff, had not been satisfied, and dismissed the bill. From this decree, Montford appealed to the supreme court of the United States, but not prosecuting the same, it was dismissed. Having paid to the defendant, the amount of the judgment obtained against him in the circuit court of Georgia, the plaintiff brought this action to recover it back, as money had and received; upon the ground, that the discharge of Young out of execution by the defendant, was a satisfaction of the debt, in like manner, as if Young had paid the money; and besides, that the securities assigned by Young to the defendant, should be considered as a satisfaction, though afterwards given up. It appears, that the whole subject, as urged by the plaintiff in this case, was in evidence before the circuit court of Georgia, in the equity suit.

Mr. Dallas and J. R. Ingersoll, for plaintiff, contended—1. That the discharge of Young, out of execution, was equivalent to satisfaction by a prior endorser, and consequently, that the payment by the plaintiff to the defendant, was so much money received to his use, which the defendant could not conscientiously retain. 2. That the decree on the equity side of the circuit court for the district of Georgia, was not conclusive, not being a case within the first section of the fourth article of the constitution; and if it is open to examination, it will appear that the court mistook the law. 3. If these points be established, then, upon the case of Moses v. M'Farlain [unreported], an action at law will lie, to recover money, erroneously paid under the judgment at law.

The court stopped Mr. Ingersoll, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The case is too clear to admit of an argument. Even if an action for money had and received, would lie, to recover back money paid under a judgment unreversed and in full force, which the court by no means admits; still, the plaintiff has selected another remedy, and another jurisdiction to try his right; and the question now submitted to this jury, is in all its parts the very same which was brought before the equity side of the circuit court for the district of Georgia, where it received a final decision. If the plaintiff, from ignorance of facts, did not state his case properly in his bill, the deposition of Mr. Duponceau contained a full disclosure of all the facts necessary for him to know, and he might then have amended his bill, if he had thought it necessary. If the circuit court erred in the opinion on which the decree was founded, the plaintiff had his remedy by appeal, which he first took, and then abandoned. This decree, then, is conclusive between these parties; for it would be a strange anomaly in the jurisprudence of this country, if the judgment of a state court, should be conclusive in every other state, and yet, that the judgment of a circuit court, sitting in one state, should be considered as a foreign judgment in another state, and examinable before a circuit court sitting there, or before a court of that state. Plaintiff agreed to be called.—Nonsuit.

BANKRUPTCY—PAYMENT OF FEES OF BANKRUPT'S ATTORNEY BY ASSIGNEE.

Where, in involutary bankruptcy proceedings, the attorney for the bankrupt petitioned the court for the payment of his bill for services in the matter, out of the funds in the hands of the assignee, and the register certified that such services had saved the estate considerable expense, and recommended the payment of the bill: Held, that, if the assignee should, in writing, approve of the payment, on the grounds set forth, an order would be made allowing the payment.

In this case, which was a proceeding in involuntary bankruptcy, the attorney for the bankrupt [Henry B. Montgomery] presented to the court a petition for the payment of his bill for services renuered in the matter, setting forth that, by his advice, the bankrupt had not opposed the proceedings, whereby a long litigation was saved to the creditors; that he spent much time in preparing the schedules of the bankrupt's debts and property; that, by his advice, property which had been transferred by the bankrupt, had been surrendered to the assignee, to the amount of some $6,000; that the bankrupt had no property; and that the attorney would be unpaid for his services, unless his bill was paid out of the moneys in the hands of the assignee. He prayed for an order directing such payment. Accompanying the petition was a certificate of the register, as follows: "I think that the services and advice of Mr. Olney has saved the estate, in the above matter, considerable expense, and expedited the conversion of the estate into money; and, if consistent with the practice in like cases, I would recommend the payment of the above bill out of the funds in the hands of the assignee."

[To the Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge of the District Court for the Southern District of New York: The petition of Jas. B. Olney, attorney and counselor at law, shows that a petition in bankruptcy was filed in this court against Henry B. Montgomery, claiming that said Montgomery, by a sale to Baldwin Griffin, violated provisions of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and asked that he be adjudicated a bankrupt. Your petitioner further shows that Henry B. Montgomery and Sylvester B. Sage were co-partners, and in 1868. Sage sold out to Montgomery, and the firm was dissolved; but the partnership was in fact insolvent on the last days of December, 1868. Sage was declared bankrupt. Montgomery sold his property, real and personal, to his father, Thomas Montgomery, and Baldwin Griffin, his brother-in-law, to secure them for moneys advanced to him by them. It was of this transfer that Montgomery's creditors complained, and a petition was filed in this court as aforesaid. Your petitioner further shows that by his counsel and advice all the property transferred by said Montgomery to his father and Griffin, both real and personal, was at once surrendered, given up, and transferred to the assignee without any trouble, expense, or hindrance on the part of the bankrupt or his friends, and the assignee has taken possession of the same and turned the same into money, and realized from the sale thereof some six thousand dollars, as your petitioner is informed and believes true, and the said amount is now in his hands awaiting distribution. Your petitioner further shows that said bankrupt has voluntarily surrendered all his property to the said assignee, and that he is to-day not worth one dollar, and has no means with which to pay the petitioner's fees and expenses as counsel, and which services are rendered necessary therein; and that by reason of the counsel, advice, services, fees, and expenses so made and incurred, and rendered by said petitioner to and for said Montgomery, as stated in the schedule hereto annexed, there has been actually saved to said estate and the creditors the sum of five hundred dollars, and your petitioner will go unpaid and unrewarded for his services and expenses, unless the same be paid out of the moneys in the hands of the assignee. Your petitioner further says that the services and expenses set forth in the annexed bill are true and correct, and the charges reasonable, and that your petitioner has had no pay therefor. Your petitioner, therefore, asks that an order may be granted allowing to him the amount of said bill from the moneys in the hands of the assignee. Jas. B. Olney.

BANKRUPTCY—INDIVIDUAL AND PARTNERSHIP ASSETS.

One member of a firm bought out the other, taking the notes and books of the firm, and agreeing to pay the debts of the firm, and he continued the business for fourteen months, replenishing the stock, mingling old and new, and selling from either indifferently, so that it was impossible to tell which were the firm's goods. He was then adjudicated a bankrupt, and the stock was sold by the assignee as his goods: Held, that the proceeds in the hands of the assignee were to be held to be the individual estate of the bankrupt, and to be subject to the payment of his individual debts, before they could be applied to the payment of the debts of the firm.

The register [Theodore B. Gates] certified to the court a question, as to the class of creditors who were first entitled to dividends.

[2] [From 3 N. B. R. 137 (Quarto 35).]

The question arose on the following facts: Up to November 23d, 1867, the bankrupt and Sylvester B. Sage were copartners in business, under the name and style of Montgomery & Sage, at Prattsville, in Greene county, as country merchants. On the day named, Sage sold out his interest in the store to Montgomery. The agreement contained this clause: "Also, that the said Henry B. Montgomery take the notes and books of the firm of Montgomery & Sage, and collect the same as far as can be, and, with the proceeds of the same, pay all the liabilities of the firm of Montgomery & Sage, which is this day dissolved, by mutual consent. But if there proves to be a deficiency, or not enough to pay the debts, the remainder is to be paid equally by both parties, and, in case there proves to be an overplus, or more than enough to pay the liabilities, then the balance is to be equally divided between both parties." On the 5th of January, 1869, Sage was adjudicated a bankrupt, on his own petition, and, about one month afterwards, Montgomery was adjudicated a bankrupt, upon the petition of certain of his creditors. Montgomery had continued the mercantile business as successor to Montgomery & Sage, and had, from time to time, replenished the stock of goods, mingling old and new together, and selling from either indifferently, so that it was impossible to tell which were the goods of Montgomery & Sage, and which were the goods of Montgomery alone. Moreover, the entire stock had been sold by the assignee of Montgomery as Montgomery's goods. The register gave his opinion, that the assets in the hands of the assignee should be regarded as belonging to Montgomery's individual estate, and liable, in the first instance, to the payment of Montgomery's individual debts in full, before any portion could be applied to the payment of the debts of Montgomery & Sage.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur with the register in his conclusion.

BANKRUPTCY — FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE — SURRENDER BY PREFERRED CREDITOR — RIGHT TO PROVE DEBT.

Where a creditor, who had received property from a bankrupt, in preference over other creditors, contrary to the 39th section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)], had surrendered it to the assignee: Held, that, under the 23d section of the act, he could prove his debt against the estate.

[This case was formerly heard upon application of James B. Olney, attorney for the bankrupt, to be paid counsel fees. The application was allowed. Case No. 9,726.]

[2][This is a case of involuntary bankruptcy. Richard P. Burhaus, the assignee in this matter, applied for an order for the examination of Baldwin Griffin, a supposed creditor of the above-named bankrupt, who had proved and filed his claim against the above bankrupt. An order was duly issued on such application, and the said Griffin appeared before the undersigned and submitted to such examination. It appeared, on the examination, that the bankrupt had been a merchant at Prattsville, in Greene county, and that on the 9th day of January, 1869, he executed a bill of sale to Griffin of all the goods in the store and of the books of account of said Montgomery against his customers. The stipulated consideration was nine thousand dollars, from which was to be deducted two thousand one hundred and sixty-eight dollars and forty cents, alleged to be due from Montgomery to Griffin, and the residue was to be paid on various notes and other debts of Montgomery, some twenty-three in number, and which are set out in the bill of sale. Griffin is a brother-in-law of Montgomery, and had been a clerk in his store, and the evidence leaves no doubt upon my mind but that Griffin knew at the time he accepted the bill of sale and the property therein specified, that Montgomery was insolvent, and that this sale was designed to give him, Griffin, and the creditors mentioned in the bill of sale, a preference over the other creditors of said Montgomery. This transaction constituted one of the grounds upon which Montgomery was adjudicated a bankrupt. Griffin voluntarily surrendered to the assignee the property and accounts which he had received under the bill of sale.

[On this state of facts the solicitor for the assignee moved to strike out the claim proved by Baldwin Griffin, and that such claim be disallowed on the ground that Henry B. Montgomery, the bankrupt, being insolvent, or in contemplation of insolvency, on or about the 9th day of January, 1869, made a sale of his goods, chattels, property and estate to the said Baldwin Griffin, of great value, to wit: of the value of nine thousand dollars, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or one or more persons who might become liable for him as indorsers or security, in fraud of the act of congress to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, passed March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517]. That said Montgomery was, by reason of said sale, among other things, afterwards, and on or about the 20th day of February, 1869, duly declared a bankrupt in and by the United States district court for the Southern district of New York, on the petition of one or more of his creditors, and that the said Baldwin Griffin, at the time of such transfer, had reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on said act was intended, or that said Montgomery was insolvent. Also that said Griffin, since said Montgomery was declared bankrupt as aforesaid, has surrendered to the assignee the property conveyed under said transfer, and accounted for the property sold by him and money collected by him, being part of said property and estate conveyed to him by said Montgomery, thereby acknowledging that said transfer was made to him, with knowledge on his part that a fraud was intended on said act, or with like knowledge that said Montgomery was, at the time of said transfer, insolvent, and that, for the causes aforesaid, said Griffin is not permitted to prove or have allowed his said claim.

[In answer to this motion, the solicitor for Mr. Griffin makes the following points: First. "There is no proof that Mr. Griffin had any reasonable cause to believe that, on taking such payment or conveyance, a fraud on the bankrupt law was intended. Nor is there any proof that he had reasonable cause to believe that Montgomery was insolvent." Second. "It appears from the evidence and from the motion now pending, that Griffin has surrendered to the assignee all property, money, benefit and advantage received by him under the preference or transfer before alluded to, and that he is, therefore, entitled to prove his claim in any view of the case, in accordance with the provisions of section 23 of the bankrupt law." Third. "The motion is too late after the claim has actually been proven."] [2]

By THEODORE B. GATES, Register:

[2] [I think the decision of this question depends upon the construction that shall be given to the latter clause of section 39 of the bankrupt act. Standing by itself, it seems to prohibit the proof of a debt in such a case as the one under consideration. But section 22 provides that if a person shall accept a preference, having reasonable cause, etc., he may nevertheless prove his claim, and receive dividends, if he surrenders to the assignee all property, etc., received by him under such preference. There have been a few decisions of questions involving a construction of these provisions of the bankrupt law, and they have proceeded upon different theories and have arrived at different conclusions upon almost identical facts. I have, therefore, sought to have the intention of the author of the law, and have received from the Honorable Thomas A. Jenckes, M. C., a letter, of which the following is a copy: "Washington, December 8, 1869. Theodore B. Gates, Esq. Dear Sir: —The last clause of the 39th section of the bankrupt act was intended to apply to cases in which the assignee was compelled to resort to legal process to recover the property, by defending which suit the creditor, who claimed to retain the property, would make himself party to the bankrupt's fraud, if any. I do not see that it is inconsistent with the provisions of the 23d section, by which a creditor, holding any of the bankrupt's property, can remove the stain of fraud by surrendering the property, and disclaiming all intent to become a party to the bankrupt's fraudulent proceedings. I think Judge Fox, of Maine, and Judge Field, of New Jersey, have given opinions to this effect upon these clauses. Respectfully yours, T. A. Jenckes." I adopt this construction, and recommend that an order be entered denying the motion of the assignee's solicitor.] [3]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The construction given by the register to the 23d and 39th sections of the act is the correct one, and the motion of the assignee should be denied.

lars; and he also proved, at the same time, a debt of the same amount against said bankrupt, as a member of the late firm of Montgomery & Sage. On the application of the assignee in this matter, an order had been granted requiring the said James B. Olney to appear before the undersigned on or about the 6th day of October last past, and submit to an examination in regard to his said claim. Sundry other creditors were also ordered to appear at the same time and be examined as to their several claims. The said James B. Olney was in attendance as solicitor of one or more of such creditors, and the proceedings were, from time to time, adjourned until the day above-named, before the case of said James B. Olney was taken up. Said Olney was then examined by the solicitor for the assignee on his own claim, and moved upon his own evidence, and upon an affidavit, for leave to amend his proof of claim. This was objected to by the solicitor for the assignee upon the grounds: First. It is too late. The original proof of claim having been made on the 28th day of May, 1869, and no application for amendment having heretofore been made. Second. Also upon the ground that an order upon him to testify in regard to this claim having been made prior to the 6th day of October, 1869, and there having been two or more meetings since that time, and no application having been made prior to this time, it is now too late for the register to entertain the motion to amend, and especially after testimony has been given in the case. I respectfully submit the question thus presented for the decision of his honor the district judge.

[I think the amendments should be allowed if amendments of proofs of debts are permissible under the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. Section 22 regulates the mode of proving debts, and provides that the court may, on application of the assignee, or any creditor, or of the bankrupt, or on its own motion, examine the bankrupt upon oath, or any person tendering, or who has made proof of claims concerning the debt sought to be proved, and shall reject all claims not duly proved, etc. Under this section it has been held that the court has, at all times, full control of all proofs of debts and the right to entertain objections to the validity of the debts or the proofs thereof. In re Patterson [Case No. 10,815]; In re Jones [Id. 7,447]. It is the policy and purpose of the law to do equal and exact justice between the estate of the bankrupt and creditors, and this provision should be construed to confer upon the court ample power to investigate a claim at any stage of the proceedings, and to make any correction equity and justice demand; not only to reduce the amount if it is too large, but also to increase it if, through inadvertence, it is smaller than by right it should be. Questions of amendment address themselves to the equitable consideration of the court, and great discretion is exercised in disposing of them. In Re Brand [Id. 1,809], it was held that a creditor who had inadvertently prejudiced his rights by making proof in an improper form, should be allowed to withdraw it, and amend or resubmit it in proper form. See section 1, Bankrupt Act. When proof is defective, a party will not only be allowed, but will be required, to amend it. In re Lowere [Case No. 8,577]; In re Myrick [Id. 9,999]. I think, therefore, an order should be entered in this matter, allowing the creditor to file supplemental proof of claim corresponding with the facts set forth in his affidavit.] [3]

[2] [Jonathan B. Cowles, a supposed creditor of the above-named bankrupt, filed proof of a contingent claim against the said bankrupt on the 24th day of March, 1869. The claim is based upon a note made by [Henry B.] Montgomery on the 24th day of December, 1868, for five hundred dollars, indorsed by said Cowles, and at the time of the proof, held by the Farmers' National Bank of Catskill, where it had been discounted. The assignee in this matter obtained an order for the examination of said Cowles, and his evidence, on such examination, having been taken, the following facts seem to be established by the evidence, namely: On January 8, 1869, Montgomery made his note for five hundred dollars, payable to his own order three months after date, at the Farmers' National Bank, Catskill; the note was indorsed by H. B. Montgomery, Baldwin Griffin, and J. B. Cowles, in the order stated. That note existed and was owned by the Farmers' National Bank of Catskill, where Montgomery was adjudicated a bankrupt, and where said Cowles proved his claim thereon. The note subsequently fell due, and was protested for non-payment. On the 19th day of July, 1869, five months after Montgomery was adjudicated a bankrupt, a new note was again, for the same amount, made by Montgomery, and payable three months after date to the order of Baldwin Griffin, at the Farmers' National Bank. This note was indorsed by Baldwin Griffin, J. B. Cowles, and A. C. Cowles, and was used to take up the first-named note. This second note was protested for non-payment, and on the 19th day of October, 1869, another note was made for four hundred and fifty dollars, signed by Baldwin Griffin, to the order of J. B. Cowles, and indorsed by J. B. Cowles and A. C. Cowles, Montgomery's name not appearing on the paper. This note, together with fifty dollars in money advanced by J. B. Cowles, was used to pay the second note. [Case No. 9,726.] This last note will fall due on the 20th of January, 1870. Upon the evidence in the case the solicitor for the assignee moved to strike out Cowles' proof of claim upon the ground, First. The claimant being second indorser, and only liable upon Griffin's failure to pay, is not entitled to prove the claim.

[I think that Mr. Cowles would have been entitled to prove his claim upon the original note under the 6th clause of section 19 of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 525)], by way of security against the possible irresponsibility of any of the parties personally liable, and then his right to share in the dividends would depend upon his having paid any or all of the note. But the real difficulty in the way of Mr. Cowles proving a debt upon the note seems to me to grow out of transactions subsequent to the maturity of the first note, which is doubtless the one Mr. Cowles based his proof upon, although he makes a mistake as to the date of it. From the moment a debtor is adjudicated a bankrupt, he is effectually separated from his estate and his contracts. These pass to the assignee, who becomes the trustee of the estate for the benefit of the creditors. The bankrupt may, after his adjudication, make new contracts and acquire property which his former bankruptcy does not affect, and which his creditors (if he is finally discharged) cannot reach. See cases cited at note 6, p. 53, Bump, Bankr. (2d Ed.). If, then, a creditor of the bankrupt shall, after the adjudication, accept a new obligation from the bankrupt in substitution of the debt existing at the time of the filing of the petition, he relinquishes his claim upon the estate of the bankrupt, and must look to his debtor alone for payment of his demand. In this case, Montgomery's note for five hundred dollars, indorsed by Griffin and Cowles, would have been provable by either Griffin, or Cowles, or by the bank, against the estate, and was so proven by Cowles; but subsequently the bankrupt and all the parties to this note agree to make a new note, with which to pay the old and overdue note at the bank. The bank accepts the new note, and surrenders the old. The original debt was thereby extinguished, and the liability ceased to be a proper claim upon the estate of the bankrupt. The discharge of Montgomery will not release him from this debt, and whoever finally pays this note may maintain an action against Montgomery for it upon showing the facts herein recited. Section 19 of the bankrupt act provides "that all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future day, * * * may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt." But the debt must continue to exist in the exact condition in which it was when the debtor was adjudicated a bankrupt. If he and his creditor bargain about it, after that time, and give it any essential modification, they detach it from the beneficial operation of the law, and carry it over to the new estate in which the debtor has been placed by the adjudication of bankruptcy. In re Williams [Case No. 17,705] it was held that when a judgment is rendered after the proceedings in bankruptcy upon a debt which existed before that time, neither the debt nor the judgment is provable. The debt is merged in the judgment, and the judgment did not exist at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy.

[I am of the opinion that the proof of debt filed by Jonathan B. Cowles should be stricken out, and that no dividends should be paid upon it.] [2]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The decision of the register is correct.

It was then heard upon the question of the priorities of creditors. Id. 9,727.]

James B. Olney, solicitor for Thomas Montgomery, a supposed creditor of the above-named bankrupt, moved on affidavit, for leave to amend the proof of the claim of said Thomas Montgomery. The solicitor for the assignee objected to granting such leave, and stated the following ground of objection: 1st. That the application comes too late; that the proof of claim was made on the 24th day of March, 1869, by J. B. Olney, attorney for Thomas Montgomery, on two notes set out in the proof, of seven hundred and eight dollars, each dated October 19, 1853, with indorsements thereon to July, 1864, amounting in the aggregate to nearly two thousand dollars. That by the affidavit of Henry B. Montgomery, he acted as the agent of his father, in bringing and placing in the hands of said J. B. Olney the notes in question, when by the facts as stated by him and his father, he must have known that these notes had been satisfied by the giving of a note of nine hundred and sixteen dollars in 1864; and that no claim has been made, that there was an error in the proof, until it was discovered that the notes of Montgomery and Griffin could not receive a dividend until the claims against H. B. Montgomery were satisfied; and the counsel for the assignee also objects to the amendment upon the ground that the matter above set forth in the last objection shows bad faith; also upon the ground that it appears by proof of claim of Amelia Griffin (wife of Baldwin Griffin, and daughter of Thomas Montgomery), that on the third of November, 1864, Henry B. Montgomery gave Thomas Montgomery his due bill for one hundred and sixty-two dollars and seventy-one cents on settlement. The solicitor for Thomas Montgomery objects to proof of claim of Amelia Griffin being used on this motion, on the ground that it has no bearing on the motion.

By THEODORE B. GATES, Register:

The facts in the case are as follows: Proof was made by James B. Olney, as attorney for Thomas Montgomery, on the 24th of March, 1869, upon three several notes, amounting in the aggregate to one thousand eight hundred and forty-five dollars and twenty-nine cents, which, with five hundred and fifty-four dollars and seventy-one cents interest, the creditor claims to be entitled to receive dividends upon. Two of these notes are for the sum of seven hundred and eight dollars each, and bear date October 19, 1853, and are made by Montgomery and Griffin. They are both payable to B. P. Cowles, or order, one nine months, and the other one year after date. The notes were not indorsed by the payee. The first note is dated April 1st, 1859, for four hundred and twenty-nine dollars and twenty-nine cents, payable one year after date, to Thomas Montgomery, or bearer, and is signed by Henry B. Montgomery. About this note there is no question. Indorsements for interest are made from time to time, on these several notes, down to the 1st of July, 1864, but no part of the principal of either appears to have been paid. The two notes, dated October 19, 1853, were given on account of the sale of certain merchandise (not for money lent, as stated by the proof), by said Cowles to Montgomery and Griffin, who were then copartners, but who dissolved in the fall of 1854. Montgomery purchased the stock, and assumed the debts. Thomas Montgomery is the father of the bankrupt, and Griffin and Cowles were sons-in-law of Thomas. Cowles died, leaving his property, including these notes, to his widow, as part of his personal estate. Soon after the widow died, and these notes went to Thomas Montgomery, the present owner. Henry B. Montgomery swears that he had a settlement with his father in the fall of 1864, of all matters between them except the note of four hundred and twenty-nine dollars and twenty-one cents, and found a balance of nine hundred and sixteen dollars due to his father, and gave him a new note therefor, signed by himself alone, and this he thinks was in November, 1864. That the old notes were not taken up, because his father desired to preserve them a short time, and hold them as memoranda of the settlement, and that deponent has neglected to take them and cancel the same. Henry B. Montgomery was his father's messenger to bring these notes with a power of attorney, to Catskill, and placed them in the hands of his father's lawyer, to be proved in this matter. Indeed, he selected these notes from among the papers of his father, and delivered them to the attorney. Montgomery says he supposed the nine hundred and sixteen dollars was among them. It is a little curious that he did not examine these papers sufficiently to know whether they were the seven hundred and eight dollar or nine hundred and sixteen dollar notes, and it can hardly be credited that he should have picked out not only notes wrong in amount, but also in number, and carried them thirty-seven miles, and placed them in the hands of his father's attorney for proof, and never have discovered his error. But further on in Montgomery's affidavit, he says: That deponent, in the haste and confusion attendant upon the hearing (the first meeting of creditors), did not think of the note of nine hundred and sixteen dollars above referred to, and not until he had seen his father on his return home, did he remember the circumstances of the transaction. He then looked for the nine hundred and sixteen dollar note, but was not able to find it, nor has it been found. The affidavits of Griffin and Olney are not material to the real question involved, except to show that neither Thomas nor Henry B. Montgomery gave any intimation to either of them from March 24th, when the notes were proved, to October 18th, that there was any error in the proof. The claim proven by Amelia M. Griffin is properly in evidence in this matter, and should be considered in connection with this question. It may throw some light upon the subject, and, if so, the court should avail itself of it. That proof is upon a promissory note in the words and figures following: "$162.71. Prattsville, November 3, 1864. Due Thomas Montgomery, on settlement, one hundred and sixty-two dollars and seventy-one cents, with interest. H. B. Montgomery." The proof states that this note was given on a settlement between the parties to it. By reference to the indorsement on the first seven hundred and eight dollar note, I find the following: "Received, November 4, 1864, on the within, interest up to July 1, 1864," and on the other a like indorsement, but dated November 3d, 1864.

I cannot reconcile all these circumstances with the statement of Henry B. Montgomery, that he gave a new note for the balance due on the two old ones. If that had really taken place, why should his father have retained the old notes? The reason given by Henry B. Montgomery is entirely unsatisfactory to my mind. The new note was all the "memorandum" his father required or could have wanted. If he had really given a new note in November, 1864, why should the payment of interest up to July have been indorsed on the old notes on November 1, 1864? If there was a settlement and a new note given in November, 1864, as Henry swears, for nine hundred and sixteen dollars, why should the above note, dated on the 3d of that month, for one hundred and sixty-two dollars and seventy-one cents, "on settlement," have been given? and why should the old notes of Montgomery & Griffin have been proved, if there was a note of Henry B. Montgomery's substituted for them? I think Mr. Montgomery is confused in his recollection of these matters, and that he is entirely mistaken as to the nine hundred and sixteen dollar note. If such a note was given, there seems to have been no consideration for it. The original notes were not surrendered, but were kept until this application was made to amend the proof. Considering the evidence which has been submitted upon this application, with a view to do exact justice between Thomas Montgomery and the other creditor of his son, Henry B. Montgomery, I am constrained to recommend that the application for leave to amend the proof of claim of Thomas Montgomery be denied.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The proper course by which to obtain the relief sought by the alleged creditor is not by an amendment of the proof of debt. The amendment sought relates to a new and different claim from any one of those embraced in the existing proof of debt. The proper course is for the creditor to prove his newly-discovered debt independently. Then an investigation in regard to it can be had, on the application of the assignee, and also an investigation in regard to the two seven hundred and eight dollar notes, and the due bill for one hundred and sixty-two dollars and seventy-one cents, and the claims which ought to be rejected can be determined on the examination and cross-examination, as witnesses, of the alleged creditor himself and the bankrupt, and Mr. and Mrs. Griffin, and all others who know anything of the facts. For these reasons the leave to amend the proof of debt is denied. The clerk will certify this decision to the register, Theodore B. Gates, Esq.

Case No. 9,732.

In re MONTGOMERY.

[12 N. B. R. 321;[1] 2 Cent. Law J. 440.]

District Court, D. Indiana. May 4, 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—AMENDED ACT—PREFERENCES ATTACKED PRIOR TO DECEMBER 1, 1873 — MORTGAGE GIVEN BEFORE PASSAGE OF AMENDED ACT.

1. The amendatory act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 178], does not apply to preferences and conveyances which are attacked in the course of proceedings in bankruptcy begun prior to December 1, A. D. 1873, and within two years after the commencement thereof.

2. The provision in section 11 of the amendment, which enacts that nothing contained in section 35 of the original act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534)] shall be construed to invalidate any security taken in good faith at the time of making a loan, is only declaratory of what the law was before the passage of the amendment. Before the original act was amended, a mortgage given to secure a loan made at the time, in good faith, was valid, even though the mortgagor was insolvent at the time of executing the same, and the party making the loan had knowledge of the fact.

In 1871, Henry Monyhan loaned the bankrupt [Milton Montgomery] three hundred dollars, and took his note therefor. This debt was unpaid in March, 1873, when Monyhan loaned the bankrupt two hundred dollars more, for which the bankrupt executed another note, and promised to secure the whole debt by the execution of a mortgage on his real estate. He did not return with the mortgage at the appointed time, and Monyhan brought suit against him. Pending this suit, the bankrupt brought a mortgage to Monyhan at Lancaster, on April 10, 1873, which was considered defective. Monyhan and the bankrupt then went together to Salem, where, at the office of Prow, who was Monyhan's attorney, on April 11, 1873, the bankrupt executed and delivered his note to Monyhan for one thousand dollars, and a mortgage, to secure the payment of this note, and another for five hundred dollars, which was executed at the same time, but was not delivered. This note for one thousand dollars was in lieu of the two notes for three hundred dollars, and two hundred dollars, which were then surrendered to the bankrupt. The difference between the aggregate amount of these notes and accrued interest, and one thousand dollars, was at this time loaned the bankrupt by Monyhan. The remainder of the fifteen hundred dollars was never loaned the bankrupt. The bankrupt was insolvent at the time, and had been so for some time previous. His property was encumbered by liens, suits were pending against him in the courts, he was not paying his debts, and in the community where he lived he was generally reputed to be in failing circumstances and insolvent. On July 24, 1873, a petition in bankruptcy was filed against him, and adjudication of bankruptcy was subsequently had thereon. On October 3, 1873, Monyhan proved his debt against the estate of the bankrupt, claiming the mortgage aforesaid as security therefor. Exceptions thereto were filed August 18, 1874, by James Reynolds and George H. Smith, who are creditors of said bankrupt, and whose debts have been duly proven against his estate in bankruptcy, and a re-examination of the claim of Monyhan was had, in the course of which the foregoing facts were elicited.

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

By Mr. Register BUTLER:

The bankrupt law provides that the transfer of property by an insolvent debtor, within a specified period of time before the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by or against him, and under other circumstances which are also specified in the law, is fraudulent and void. The transfer becomes absolutely void upon the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and may be subsequently set aside as such at the instance of the assignee. The only limitation imposed by the law upon suits for this purpose, is that contained in section 2, which provides that they shall be brought within two years after the cause of action accrues. The cause of action accrues with the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. Sections 14 and 38. These provisions, which govern suits by assignees to set aside fraudulent conveyances, are substantially applicable to proceedings by an assignee or a creditor who has proved his debt under section 22 of the law, and rule 34 of the supreme court (United States), to have the court reject claims which are alleged to be "founded in fraud, illegality, or mistake," when the alleged fraud or illegality consists in the assertion of a security for a debt which has been obtained in violation of them. If then, the mortgage executed by the bankrupt in this case to Monyhan, on the 12th of April, A. D. 1873, and claimed by the latter in his proof of debt against the estate of the bankrupt as security therefor, was void under the law as it existed on the 24th of July, A. D. 1873, when the petition in bankruptcy was filed, these creditors, Reynolds and Smith, acquired then a right to have it set aside as such, which they are at liberty to assert at any time within two years afterwards, unless they are divested of it by the amendatory act of June 22, A. D. 1874. Section 10 of the amendatory act substitutes the period of two months where it was four months, and the period of three months where it was six months, in section 35 of the original act, as the time within which a conveyance, violated in other respects, may be rendered absolutely void by the filing of a petition in bankruptcy by or against the person who has made the same; and suspends the operation of the act in the one case for two months and in the other case for three months after its passage. It was evidently the intention of congress, as revealed by the context of the amendment and its relation to the amended law, that these provisions should apply only to conveyances which should be attacked in the course of proceedings in bankruptcy, begun after the expiration of these periods of time. They obviously do not refer to proceedings in bankruptcy begun previous to their expiration. Section 11 of the amendment supplies the word "knowing," where "reasonable cause to believe" was understood in section 35 of the original act, and prohibits such a construction of this section as would invalidate a bona fide security for a contemporaneous loan, besides making some additional verbal changes, which it is unimportant to consider here.

It is a well settled principle of law, that a statute is to be so construed as to give it a prospective operation only, unless the intention of the legislature to make it retroactive is clearly and unambiguously expressed, or necessarily implied [Harvey v. Tyler] 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 347; [McEwen v. Den] 24 How. [65 U. S.] 244; [U. S. v. Heath] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 413. There is nothing in the terms of these sections of the amendment, which indicates an intention on the part of its framers, to have them apply to cases begun before its passage, or from which such an intention is necessarily inferred, and in the absence of any positive expression or necessary implication to this effect, they must be considered as prospective only. The language employed in other sections of the amendatory act, and especially in section 17, by which the provisions of that section are made expressly applicable to "cases of bankruptcy now pending, or to be hereafter pending," etc., seems to denote that the general provisions of the act were not intended to apply to cases pending at the time of its passage. Confirmatory of this view is the clause in section 12, by which its provisions are made retroactive as to cases of involuntary bankruptcy begun since December 1, 1873. Here the intention of the legislature is clearly expressed, and it is reasonable to presume that had a like intention existed with reference to other sections, it would have been expressed with legal clearness. This section, as well as section 11, makes actual knowledge by the person to whom a conveyance is made, of an intended fraud on the bankrupt law, one of the essentials of a fraudulent conveyance, and extends the application of its provisions to all involuntary cases begun since December 1, 1873. It thus excludes any construction which would bring within its purview involuntary cases commenced before that time. Such was the opinion of Hopkins, J., in Hamlin v. Pettibone [Case No. 5,995]. This being an involuntary case, which was begun prior to December 1, 1873, section 12 is consequently inapplicable to it. The principles of construction which have been here applied to the interpretation of sections 10, 11, and 12 of the amendment, have been fully approved in the consideration of other sections thereof. Section 9, which modifies the conditions of discharge, as they existed in the original act, was held, in Re Perkins [Case No. 10,983], to apply only to cases begun after its passage. Such, also, was the opinion of Blatchford, J., in Re Francke [Id. 5,046]. Moreover, the construction which was given section 9 in Re Perkins, supra, has been already adopted by this court, and, for this reason, the question under present discussion may be regarded as virtually settled in this district; for the application to other sections of the amendment, of the principles on which that decision was based, must result in giving them the construction which is claimed for them.

The case of Singer v. Sloan [Case No. 12,899], which is cited by counsel for Monyhan, is not in point, as the petition in bankruptcy against Towle was filed since December 1, 1873. The court especially says that "it is not necessary, for the purposes of this demurrer, to decide whether cases brought, or acts done prior to said December, are to be controlled by the amendment. To avoid all doubt as to the views of the court, it is now held that said section 11 of the act of 1874 controls all cases brought since December 1, 1873." This case was decided by the district court for the Eastern district of Missouri. The circuit court for that district had already decided, in Re King [Case No. 7,781], that section 9 of the amendment applies to pending cases, and the district court in the case cited, says, "The same reasoning which produced those rulings (i. e., in Re King, supra), would exact the construction now given." The converse of this proposition is equally true, and where, as in this district, the court has held that section 9 does not apply to pending cases, it may be said that the precedent "exacts" a like construction of the sections affecting fraudulent conveyances. If these sections are held to apply to cases of the kind under consideration, vested rights are thereby destroyed, and contracts are made good which were absolutely void before their enactment. Proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy are very frequently instituted for the purpose of recovering property fraudulently conveyed, and compelling an equal division of it among all creditors. One of the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition against the bankrupt in this case, is the mortgage to Monyhan, which is in controversy. In Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 450, Mr. Justice Field speaking for the court, it was held that when a right arises under, or is given by a statute, and "it has been so far perfected that nothing remains to be done by the party asserting it, the repeal of the statute does not affect it or an action for its enforcement. It has become a vested right which stands independent of the statute." This case being therefore governed by the law in existence when the petition in bankruptcy was filed, it remains to be ascertained whether, upon the facts adduced in evidence, the mortgage claimed by Monyhan as security for his debt, is in violation of it. It was executed within the four months preceding the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. It is conceded that the bankrupt was insolvent when it was executed. The legal effect of the mortgage was to give Monyhan a preference over other creditors as to part of his debt, and to prevent the distribution of the mortgaged property under the bankrupt law and defeat the operation thereof, and the bankrupt must, therefore, be presumed to have intended these results of his acts.

The only other point to be determined is whether or not Monyhan had reasonable cause to believe the bankrupt was insolvent, and that the mortgage was in fraud of the bankrupt law. The evidence shows that such a state of "facts and circumstances were known to Monyhan as clearly ought to have put him, as a prudent man, upon inquiry." Buchanan v. Smith, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 277. He might have ascertained the insolvency of the bankrupt by reasonable inquiry, and he must, therefore, be held to have had reasonable cause to believe that the bankrupt was insolvent. Id. These were matters of common notoriety and of public record, and there were proceedings in the courts which Monyhan personally, or by his attorney (with whose knowledge he is chargeable), must be presumed to have known, which were in fact sufficient of themselves to afford reasonable cause for this belief. The mortgage itself, under all the circumstances of its execution, was out of "the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor," and, as such, was "prima facie evidence of fraud." Section 35. Commenting on this provision of the law, Hall, J., said, in Graham v. Stark [Case No.

5,676], "This prima facie evidence is present to any creditor who accepts a security in any case to which the provision is applicable; and unless the creditor has evidence sufficient to repeal this legal presumption, he has reasonable cause to believe that the security is fraudulent and void under the bankrupt act."

For the foregoing reasons, it is the opinion of the register that the mortgage in controversy is fraudulent and void under the provisions of the bankrupt law applicable thereto, and that the exceptions to the proof of debt of Monyhan ought to be sustained.

John H. Butler, for creditors Reynolds and Smith.

Francis Wilson, for Henry Monyhan.

GRESHAM, District Judge. In 1871 Monyhan loaned the bankrupt three hundred dollars. About the 1st of March, 1873, Monyhan let the bankrupt have two hundred dollars more, and took his note, the latter at the same time agreeing to give a mortgage on his real estate to secure the payment of this note and other loans to be made in the future. The bankrupt failing to return with a mortgage as soon after the loan of the two hundred dollars as he had agreed to, Monyhan placed the two notes, given for the two loans, in the hands of Prow, an attorney at Salem, and suit was brought on them. On the 10th of April, suit having already been brought on the two notes, the bankrupt returned to Monyhan with a mortgage, which the latter refused to take, because he believed the same was defective in form. On the next day, April 11, Monyhan and the bankrupt went to Prow's office, where the mortgage in controversy was executed and delivered, the notes for the two hundred and three hundred dollar loans destroyed, and Monyhan loaned the bankrupt an additional sum, viz.: the difference between the two notes destroyed and interest, and one thousand dollars. For the purposes of this opinion, no further statement of the facts is necessary. The agreement to give a mortgage at the time the two hundred dollars was loaned was binding, and Monyhan might have enforced the same against the bankrupt. In equity the case stands as if the mortgage had been executed at the time of the loan. That part of section 11 of the supplemental act of June 22, 1874, which provides that nothing contained in section 35 of the original act shall be construed to invalidate any security taken in good faith at the time of making a loan, was only declaratory of what the law was before the passage of the amendment. Before the original act was amended, a mortgage given to secure a loan made at the time in good faith, was valid, even though the mortgagor was insolvent at the time of executing the same, and the party making the loan had knowledge of the fact. It is clear that at the time the mortgage was executed and delivered at Prow's office, and the last money was advanced, and at the time the two hundred dollars was loaned, the bankrupt was insolvent, and from all the evidence, I am unable to escape the conclusion that Monyhan had knowledge of this fact, but I do not think Monyhan is shown to have acted in bad faith within the meaning of the statute, in taking the mortgage, so far as it covered the money advanced at the time of its execution, and the two hundred dollars loaned with a promise of security as stated. The exceptions are overruled and disallowed as to all of the claim, except the three hundred dollars loaned in 1871. In all other respects the opinion and finding of the register are approved.

The MONTGOMERY v. The BETSEY.

[1 Gall. 416.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1813.

APPEAL—ABANDONMENT BY APPELLANT—AFFIRMATION—PRIZE CASE.

If, in a prize cause, the claimant appeal and desert his appeal, the circuit court may affirm the decree of the district court, with costs.

[This was a libel by the privateer Montgomery (Holton J. Breed, commander) against the schooner Betsey (William Young, late master).]

On trial of this cause in the district court on a prize allegation, one George Moreton claimed $500, part of the cargo of the said schooner, as his property; and after a full hearing, the judge rejected the claim and decreed the same money good and lawful prize to the captors, from which decree the claimant interposed an appeal to this court, and, having failed to enter or prosecute his appeal, Pitman, Jun., for the captors, by petition, prayed the court to affirm the decree of the court below, with costs.

Cummings, Sprague, and Pitman, for captors.

STORY, Circuit Justice. As by the 21st section of the judiciary act of 24th September, 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 83], appeals from the district court must be prosecuted at the next circuit court held after pronouncing the decree, it is clear that this appeal must be pronounced to be deserted. The only question is whether the principal cause shall be remitted to the district court for final proceedings, or the decree shall be affirmed in this court. On examination of the authorities and consideration of the peculiar organization of this court, I am satisfied that on a failure of the appellant to enter and prosecute his appeal, the appeal may be pronounced to be deserted, and the principal cause remitted to the court below for final proceedings; and in such case the taxation of the costs may be retained in the circuit court, or directed to be made in the court below; or the appellant may produce the record and have the principal cause retained here, and, upon a hearing ex parte, claim an affirmation of the original decree, with costs. The appellant may therefore elect to proceed as he may deem most for his interest. I understand that an affirmation of the decree, in cases like the present, has been an unquestionable practice of this court.

Decree affirmed, with costs.

MONTGOMERY v. BEVANS et al.

[1 Sawy. 653; 4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 202.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Aug. 26, 1871.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—VAN NESS ORDINANCE—GRANT BY ALCALDE — ATTEMPT TO REVOKE — GRANT TO ONE DECEASED—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—ABSENCE—PRESUMPTION OF DEATH.

1. An alcalde of the pueblo of San Francisco, in 1846, had no authority to revoke a grant once made by him and delivered, or to mutiliate its record. A mutilation of a record by him did not operate to divest a title already passed to the grantee.

2. When a party has been absent seven years without being heard of, the presumption of law then arises that he is dead. But when a party is once shown to be alive, the presumption of law is that he continues alive until his death is proved, or the rule of law applies by which such death is presumed to have occurred, that is, at the end of seven years. This presumption of life is received in the absence of any countervailing testimony, as conclusive of the fact establishing it for the purpose of determining the rights of parties as fully as the most positive proof. The only exception to the operation of this presumption is when it conflicts with the presumption of innocence, in which case the latter prevails.

[Criticised in People v. Feilen, 58 Cal. 224.]

3. The presumption of the continuance of life rebutted in this case by evidence tending to show that the absent party met his death soon after his disappearance.

4. A grant of land in the pueblo of San Francisco, by an alcalde in 1846 to a person deceased, was void.

5. The city of San Francisco presented her claim for confirmation to the board of land commissioners created under the act of congress of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631]; the board confirmed the claim to a portion of the land, and rejected it for the balance; an appeal was taken by the city from this decision to the district court of the United States; the case was then transferred to the circuit court of the United States for the district of California; and by that court a decree was rendered May 18, 1865, confirming the claim of the city to four square leagues of land, subject to certain reservations and exceptions therein mentioned. From this decree an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the United States, and whilst the case was pending there, congress passed the act of March 8, 1866 [13 Stat. 332], "to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco," by which act all the right and title of the United States, to the land situated within the corporate limits of the city, confirmed by the decree of the circuit court, were relinquished and granted to the city, and the claim of the city to the land was confirmed, subject, however, to the reservations and exceptions designated in the decree, and upon certain trusts as to the disposition of the land: Held, that by this act the government determined the conditions upon which the claim of the city should be recognized and confirmed, and that the title of the city, therefore, rests upon the decree of the circuit court, as modified by the act of congress—that is, her title is that which is recognized and established by the decree as thus modified. The decree must be read precisely as if the conditions prescribed in the act of congress had been inserted in the decree by the court.

[Cited in San Francisco v. U. S., Case No. 12,316.]

6. The claim of the city of San Francisco, as successor of the pueblo, to her municipal lands, was founded upon the general laws of Mexico, by which pueblos, or towns, once established and officially recognized, were entitled for their benefit, and the benefit of their inhabitants, to the use of lands embracing the site of such pueblos, or towns, and of adjoining lands within certain limits. No assignment of these lands having been made to the pueblo under the former government, the claim or right of the city was an imperfect one, requiring recognition and confirmation in the mode prescribed by congress, like other claims to property of an imperfect character derived from Spanish and Mexican authorities.

7. By the fifth section of the act of congress of July 1, 1864 [14 Stat. 4], "To expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California," all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the limits of the city, as defined by its charter of 1851, were granted to the city for the uses and purposes specified in the Van Ness Ordinance, subject to certain exceptions designated. These exceptions consisted of all sites or other parcels of land which had been, or were then, occupied by the United States for military, naval, or other public uses, or such other sites or parcels as might thereafter be designated by the president within one year after the rendition to the general land office by the surveyor-general of an approved plat of the exterior limits of the city, as recognized by the section, in connection with the lines of the public surveys: Held, that the exception from the grant of such parcels as might be subsequently designated by the president, did not defeat the entire grant; and that if the exception were not void for repugnancy, the title of the United States to the lands specified must be regarded as having passed by the act to the city with a right in the United States to resume the title to parcels upon the designation of the president within a specified period.

[Cited in Harris v. McGovern, 99 U. S. 166.]

8. The adverse interest of the government to the lands within the corporate limits of 1851 being released by the act of July 1, 1864, the titles conferred by the Van Ness Ordinance became perfect legal titles. The act operated upon such titles as effectually as a patent would have done, and the right reserved to the United States did not affect the perfect character of those titles.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 4 Am. Law T. Rep. U. S. Cts. 202, contains only a partial report.]

[Cited in Ohm v. San Francisco, 92 Cal. 455, 28 Pac. 585.]

9. The sixth section of the state statute of limitations of 1863, providing in substance that parties claiming real property under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments, or the authorities thereof, which had not been finally confirmed by the United States, or its legally constituted authorities, shall be limited to five years after its passage, within which to bring an action for the recovery of the property or its possession, but if the title had been thus finally confirmed, the parties shall be subject to the same limitations as though they derived their title from any other source, that is, shall have five years from such final confirmation, is invalid so far as it applies to actions for the recovery of real property founded upon titles derived from Mexican or Spanish authorities, perfected after its passage, either by act of congress or by judicial decree, survey and patent, and that, as to titles thus perfected, the ordinary period of limitation must be allowed from the date of their consummation, which exists with reference to actions on complete titles from other sources.

[Cited in Le Roy v. Carroll, Case No. 8,266; Henshaw v. Bissell, 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 270.]

10. The act of congress of March 3, 1851, passed in execution of the obligation of the United States, under the stipulations of the treaty by which California was ceded, to protect the holders of titles derived from Mexican or Spanish authorities, is not subject to any constitutional objection, so far as it applies to titles of an imperfect character; that is, to titles which require further action of the political department of the government to render them perfect; and the action of the government under this act, and the rights of possession and enjoyment which the title perfected thereby gives, cannot be defeated or impaired by any state legislation.

This was an action for the possession of a fifty-vara lot situated within the limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined by its charter of 1851; and was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, by stipulation of the parties. The plaintiff [John B. Montgomery] asserted title to the demanded premises, under an alleged grant to his son, John E. Montgomery, issued by Alcalde Washington A. Bartlett, bearing date on the first day of December, 1846. The defendants [Thomas P. Bevans and others] claimed under a grant issued to Andrew J. Grayson by Alcalde Edwin Bryant on the twenty-sixth day of February, 1847.

It was admitted by the parties, that San Francisco was, in 1846, a Mexican pueblo, claiming title to four square leagues of land, embracing the tract upon which the present city of San Francisco is situated; that in December of that year, the above named Washington A. Bartlett was alcalde or chief magistrate of that pueblo; and that in February, 1847, Edwin Bryant was his successor as such alcalde. It was also admitted, that the city of San Francisco, as successor of the pueblo, asserted a claim for the four square leagues of land, and presented her claim for the same for confirmation to the board of land commissioners, created under the act of congress of March 3, 1851; that such proceedings were had in the prosecution of that claim, that on the eighteenth day of May, 1865, it was confirmed by a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the district of California, to the extent of the four square leagues. From the decree of the circuit court an appeal was taken to the supreme court of the United States, and whilst the appeal was pending, congress passed the act of March 8, 1866, which is given below. The appeal was accordingly dismissed on stipulation of the attorney-general. Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 337; Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 379. The record of the proceedings in the case was presented in evidence and reference was made to it on the trial. No official survey of the tract confirmed by the decree of the circuit court has ever been approved by the commissioner of the general land office, or by the secretary of the interior. It was also admitted that the premises in controversy were within the limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined by its charter of 1851, and within the description of lands covered by the ordinance of the city called the "Van Ness Ordinance," adopted by the common council and ratified by the legislature of the state, March 11, 1858. Grayson, the grantee of the grant from Alcalde Bryant, went into immediate possession under his grant, and either he, or parties tracing title through him, have been in the uninterrupted possession of the premises, asserting ownership of the same under the grant ever since. The alleged grant to Montgomery was not produced, but the plaintiff, who is the father of the grantee, and whose deposition was taken under a commission in Pennsylvania, testified that a document of that character was delivered to him for his son in December, 1846. He was at the time a captain in the navy of the United States, in command of the sloop of war Portsmouth, lying in the harbor of San Francisco; and his statement was that the alleged grant was brought by a messenger from Alcalde Bartlett on board the Portsmouth, and delivered to him for his son, who had, about a fortnight before, sailed up the Sacramento; that the messenger brought, at the same time, three grants, one for himself, and one for each of his two sons, and delivered them all to him, the two latter to keep for his sons; and that afterwards, as he was leaving the port of San Francisco, he sent the grant for John E. Montgomery on shore to the alcalde to be kept for the grantee, as he did not expect to see him there again. It was admitted that this document could not be found among the papers of Alcalde Bartlett, or among the papers he left with his successor in office, although diligent search had been made for it.

In connection with the testimony the plaintiff offered a defaced record of the alleged grant, found in the book kept by Alcalde Bartlett, in which a record was made of grants issued by him. The record was in the form of a certificate of the alcalde over his signature, that on the first day of December, 1846, he had, by virtue of the authority vested in him, granted the lot in question to John E. Montgomery, his heirs and assigns, and had put the grantee in full and quiet possession of the same. The signature of the alcalde is erased by lines drawn over it, but is plainly legible through the lines, and across the record the following words are written: "This title not given out in consequence of the loss of the petitioner before he could have done so. Feb. 1847. Wash. A. Bartlett, Chief Magistrate." The following is a copy of this document, the erasions and endorsement, being as above stated: "Lot No. one hundred thirteen (113), granted to John E. Montgomery. Chief Magistrate's Office, Yerba Buena. This is to certify that on the first (1st) day of December, A. D. 1846, I, Washn. A. Bartlett, alcalde or chief magistrate of San Francisco, by virtue of the authority of my office, granted, ceded, conveyed and confirmed unto John E. Montgomery, now resident in the district, the lot No. one hundred thirteen in the town of Yerba Buena, said lot being fifty Spanish varas square, and gave the said John E. Montgomery, his heirs and assigns, a full and valid title to said lot No. one hundred thirteen (113), under the form and conditions set forth in the title and recorded in this register, and that I put the said John E. Montgomery in full and quiet possession of said lot No. one hundred thirteen (113), and record the same for his security. Washn. A. Bartlett. Liber 'A' of Original Grants, page 201." The testimony of experts skilled in detecting resemblances and differences in handwriting was then taken, and from that testimony as well as from an inspection of the writings, it was clear that the lines over the signature and the writing across the record, were made by the same pen and with the same ink, and hence the court was of opinion that they were both made at the same time; that is, at the date of the latter, in February, 1847; and being also of opinion that there was no authority in the alcalde to revoke a grant once made, or to mutilate its record, admitted the record in evidence against the objection of the defendants.

It also appeared in evidence, that, besides the Portsmouth, the United States sloop of war, Warren, was, in November, 1846, lying in the harbor of San Francisco; and about the middle of that month, a launch from the Warren sailed from the harbor for Sutter's Fort, a place on the River Sacramento at a distance of about one hundred and twenty miles from San Francisco. The launch was manned by ten seamen, and was commanded by William H. Montgomery, a midshipman, and sailing-master on board the Warren. John E. Montgomery, brother of William, accompanied the launch. Both of the Montgomerys were sons of Captain Montgomery. It was generally understood at the time, on board the Warren, that the launch was sent with money to pay the troops of the United States stationed at Sutter's Fort. The voyage between San Francisco and Sutter's Fort was often made at that time in a single day. An ordinary voyage by sail from San Francisco to the fort and back did not occupy over four or five days. The launch was propelled by both sails and oars. From the time it sailed, no intelligence had ever been received of it, or of its officers, or of any of its men. About ten days after its departure, not hearing of it, Captain Montgomery became uneasy at its absence, and sent out several boats in search of it and of his sons and the men who sailed with them, and these boats were kept on the search for about two weeks. No trace was ever found of launch, officers or men, nor has any intelligence of its or their fate ever been received since. Captain Montgomery sailed with the Portsmouth from the port of San Francisco on the fifth or sixth of December, 1846. There was testimony taken as to the manner in which alcaldes in San Francisco, in 1846 and 1847, made grants of lots in the pueblo, but this is sufficiently shown in the opinion of the court. John E. Montgomery was never married, and never made any will, and by the law of California, the father takes the estate of a child dying intestate without issue.

The following is the fifth section of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, entitled "An act to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California" (13 Stat. 332): "Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, that all the right and title of the United States to lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined in the act incorporating said city, passed by the legislature of the state of California on the fifteenth of April, one thousand eighteen hundred and fifty-one, are hereby relinquished and granted to the said city and its successors, for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinances of said city, ratified by an act of the legislature of the said state, approved on the eleventh of March, eighteen hundred and fifty-eight, entitled 'An act concerning the city of San Francisco, and to ratify and confirm certain ordinances of the common council of said city,' there being excepted from this relinquishment and grant all sites or other parcels of lands which have been, or now are, occupied by the United States for military, naval, or other public uses, or such other sites or parcels as may hereafter be designated by the president of the United States, within one year after the rendition to the general land office, by the surveyor-general, of an approved plat of the exterior limits of San Francisco, as recognized in this section, in connection with the lines of the public surveys: And provided, that the relinquishment and grant by this act shall in no manner interfere with or prejudice any bona fide claims of others, whether asserted adversely under rights derived from Spain, Mexico or laws of the United States, nor preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof." Under the clause of this act authorizing the president to designate other sites or parcels of land besides those previously or then occupied by the United States for military, naval or other public uses, he designated on the twelfth of October, 1866, the island of Yerba Buena, or Goat Island, for military uses. No other sites or parcels have ever been designated by him under the above act.

The following is the act of congress of March 8, 1866, entitled "An act to quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco" (14 Stat. 4): "Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled: That all the right and title of the United States to the land situated within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, in the state of California, confirmed to the city of San Francisco by the decree of the circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of California, entered on the eighteenth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-five, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the said city of San Francisco and its successors; and the claim of the said city to said land is hereby confirmed, subject, however, to the reservations and exceptions designated in said decree, and upon the following trusts, namely, that all the said land, not heretofore granted to said city, shall be disposed of and conveyed by said city to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof, by themselves or tenants, on the passage of this act, in such quantities and upon such terms and conditions as the legislature of the state of California may prescribe, except such parcels thereof as may be reserved and set apart by ordinance of said city for public uses: provided, however, that the relinquishment and grant by this act shall not interfere with or prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land or any part thereof, whether derived from Spain, Mexico or the United States, or preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof."

FIELD, Circuit Justice. There was no authority in the alcalde to revoke a grant once made and delivered, or to mutilate its record. Neither an attempted revocation nor a mutilation of a record could operate to divest a title already passed to the grantee. If the grantee were living at the date of the grant, and thus capable of taking the title, a question which I shall hereafter consider at length, the power of the alcalde over the property was exhausted when the grant was delivered; and the record of the fact was not subject to subsequent alteration by him.

It may be proper to observe here that I do not assent to the doctrine asserted by counsel, that the record in the book of the alcalde is the grant, and that the title to the premises passed to the grantee when the signature of that officer was affixed to it. The record does not purport to be a grant of itself; it contains no words of present transfer. It only purports to declare the fact that a grant had already been made. It is undoubtedly primary evidence of that fact, but it is manifest that the alcalde did not consider this entry as the operative instrument which passed the title, but only as record evidence of his official act. The book shows on its face, and it also appears from the testimony in the case as to the mode of procedure pursued by the alcalde in making grants, that another document than the record was deemed essential to the transfer of the title, in other words, that the document intended for the grantee was considered as the grant.

I am aware of the decision of the supreme court of this state, in Donner v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 500, and have read with much interest the very able and learned opinion of Mr. Justice Sanderson in that case; and I am not prepared to question the general soundness of the views there expressed, when applied to grants made by Mexican alcaldes acting under the laws of Mexico, and adopting the forms and modes of procedure prescribed by them. But it is a matter perfectly notorious that the alcaldes in the Pueblo of San Francisco, appointed shortly after the conquest by the military or naval authorities having command of the district, knew little of Mexican or Spanish law, and less of the modes of procedure prescribed by them for the alienation of lands. They were informed, and this information was the substance of their learning on the subject, that alcaldes under the Mexican law possessed authority to make grants of town lots upon petition; and they proceeded to exercise the authority without any knowledge of the limitations upon its exercise imposed by that law, and in utter disregard of its forms and modes of procedure. The power they asserted they claimed under the law of Mexico, but in its exercise they followed the mode which was in accordance with the system of conveyancing with which they were familiar. Whether the departure from the Mexican mode affected in any respect the validity of the exercise of the power, is a question which has no practical importance. The legislation of the state and of the United States has vested in the holders of these grants, within the charter limits of 1851, an indefeasible estate, whatever the imperfection which attended their previous title.

But it is important in many cases to inquire into the modes of procedure adopted by the alcaldes in order to give the effect they intended to the record of their official acts. In the present case there was a delivery of the grant and the mutilation of the record was subsequently made. The present case is, in this respect, distinguished from the cases which have come under consideration by the supreme court of this state.

The testimony of the plaintiff which proves the delivery of the grant, also proves the death of the grantee, or rather proves that he has not been heard from since the fifteenth of November, 1846, and the law presumes the death of a person who has not been heard from for the period of seven years. The plaintiff claims the premises as the heir of the grantee, and relies upon the presumption of law as to the grantee's death to establish his case. And, at the same time, he relies upon what he insists is a presumption of law of equal force, that the grantee having been shown to be alive on the fifteenth of November, 1846, continued alive until the lapse of seven years, when the presumption of death arose. The counsel for the defendants, on the other hand, contend that there is no presumption of the continuance of life during this period of seven years, and that the plaintiff, asserting that the grantee was alive on the first day of December, 1846, as he must do to give efficacy to the grant of the alcalde, is bound to prove the fact; and failing to do so, his claim of title falls to the ground. The argument upon which this position is based is substantially this: The presumption of death arises from the lapse of time since the party has been heard from; for it is considered extraordinary if he was alive that he should not be heard of during this period. Now, if he is to be presumed to be alive up to the last day but one of the seven years, there is nothing extraordinary in his not having been heard of on the last day, and the previous lapse of time during which he was not heard of becomes immaterial by reason of the assumption that he was living so lately. Language similar to this is found in the opinion of the exchequer chamber in the case of Nepean v. Knight, 2 Mees. & W. 895, and hence counsel argue that there is no presumption in favor of the continuance of life during the penumbra, or death period, of seven years, for if such presumption prevailed for one day after disappearance proved, it would necessarily prevail for six years and three hundred and sixty-four days, and the whole basis upon which the presumption of death rests would become absurd. The cases of Doe v. Nepean [5 Barn. & Adol. 86], decided by the court of king's bench, of Nepean v. Knight, mentioned above, decided by the exchequer chamber, and the case of In re Phene's Trusts, recently decided by the court of appeal in chancery, in England [5 Ch. App. 139], are cited in support of this position.

In Doe v. Nepean, 5 Barn. & Adol. 86, the lessor of the plaintiff claimed the premises in controversy by title accruing on the death of one Matthew Knight, who left England for America in 1806, and was not heard of after 1807. The action was brought in 1832, and the question at the trial was whether the action was barred by the statute which limited the entry of a person into lands to twenty years after title accrued. It was admitted that Knight must be presumed to have died, more than seven years having elapsed since he was heard of, and if that presumption were referable to the time when the last intelligence was received of him, 1807, the action was brought too late; but if it arose only when seven years had elapsed from the receipt of such intelligence the action was in time. The judge before whom the case was tried was of opinion that the presumption of death only arose at the expiration of the period of seven years, or in other words the presumption of life continued until that time, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move for a nonsuit. After argument upon the motion, the court of the king's bench held that the lessor of the plaintiff who gave no other evidence of Knight's death than his absence, failed to establish that his death took place within twenty years before the action was brought. Mr. Chief Justice Denman, in giving the opinion of the court, observed that though absence of a person for seven years without being heard of naturally led the mind to believe he was dead at the end of that period, it raised no inference as to the exact time of his death, and still less that death took place at the end of seven years.

In the case of Nepean v. Knight, 2 Mees. & W. 895, which was another action of ejectment, for the same premises, the same question was considered by the exchequer chamber and after elaborate argument, the doctrine laid down in Doe v. Nepean was approved, the court observing, in its opinion, that when nothing is heard of a person for seven years, it is a matter of complete uncertainty at what point of time in those seven years he died, and that of all the points of time, the last day is the most improbable and inconsistent with the ground of presuming the fact of death. And yet, in the opinion both of the king's bench, in Doe v. Nepean, and of the exchequer chamber, in this case, it is stated that the law presumes that a person once shown to be alive continues so until the contrary be shown, and that for this reason the onus of establishing the death of Knight rested upon the lessor of the plaintiff. The presumption of the continuance of life, thus stated, is inconsistent with the conclusions reached in both cases. If the presumption of life exists until death is shown, it is difficult to perceive why it should not continue when death is not shown, until the period is reached at which the law has fixed as the commencement of a different presumption. Clearly there is no rule or principle which can limit its continuance at any period within the seven years, if it be admitted to exist at all.

In the case of In re Phene's Trusts, 5 Ch. App. 139, the court of appeal in chancery held, after elaborate consideration, that the time at which a person died within the seven years was not a matter of presumption, but of proof; also that there was no presumption in favor of the continuance of life after the disappearance of the party, and that the onus of proving the death of the party at any particular time within that period, lay upon the person who claimed a right resting upon the establishment of either of these facts.

In that case it appeared that one Francis Phene had died in January, 1861, having, by his will, bequeathed the residue of his estate to his nephews and nieces in equal shares. Nicholas Phene Mill was one of his nephews, and the share to which he would have been entitled, if living, was paid into court, because it was uncertain whether he survived the testator. In 1869, letters of administration were granted to his brother, who presented a petition for the payment of the fund to him. It appeared in evidence that he left his parents' home in England, and went to America in August, 1853, and was last heard of in June, 1860. Vice-Chancellor James, to whom the petition was presented, granted its prayer, holding in deference to three previous decisions of Vice-Chancellor Kindersly and one of Vice-Chancellor Malins, that the deceased must be presumed to have survived the testator, upon the general doctrine that continuance of life once shown to exist is presumed until death is proved, or at least for a reasonable period after disappearance; but as he dissented from the decisions, he directed the fund to be retained in court until the respondents had an opportunity to bring the matter before the court of appeal.

The decision of Vice-Chancellor Kindersly proceeded upon the presumption of the continuance of life for a reasonable period after the party is shown to have been in existence; but Vice-Chancellor Malins extended the presumption of the continuance of life to the expiration of the seven years. In Re Benham's Trust, L. R. 4 Eq. 416, the doctrine held by these judges was overruled, and if the opinion of the court of appeals contains a correct exposition of the law of England, and we are bound to presume that it does in the absence of any decision of the house of lords on the subject, that law supports the position of the counsel for the defendants in this case, that the onus rests on the plaintiff of showing that John E. Montgomery, who disappeared on the fifteenth of November, 1846, and of whom no intelligence has since been received, was alive on the first day of December, 1846, when the grant of the alcalde was made.

But the law as thus declared in England is different from the law which obtains in this country, so far as it relates to the presumption of the continuance of life. Here, as in England, the law presumes that a person who has not been heard of for seven years is dead, but here the law, differing in this respect from the law of England, presumes that a party once shown to be alive continues alive until his death is proved, or the rule of law applies by which death is presumed to have occurred, that is, at the end of seven years. And the presumption of life is received, in the absence of any countervailing testimony, as conclusive of the fact, establishing it for the purpose of determining the rights of parties as fully as the most positive proof. The only exception to the operation of this presumption is when it conflicts with the presumption of innocence, in which case the latter prevails.

This rule is much more convenient in its application, and works greater justice than the doctrine which obtains in England, according to the decision in Re Phene's Trusts. that the existence of life at any particular time within the seven years, when the fact becomes material, must be affirmatively proved. In numerous cases such proof can never be made, and property must often remain undistributed, or be distributed among the contestants not according to any settled principle, but according as one or the other happens to be the moving party in court. Take this case by way of illustration: A man goes to sea on the first of January, 1860, and is never heard of again; his father makes his will and dies on the first of July of the same year, leaving him a portion of his property, and the residue to a distant relative. If persons claiming under the missing man apply for the legacy to him, they must fail, for they cannot prove that he survived the testator. On the other hand, if the residuary legatee applies for the property on the ground that the legacy to the missing man has lapsed, he must fail, for he cannot prove that the missing man died before the testator, and the proof of his death in such case would be essential to the establishment of the applicant's right.

Nor is this rule as to the presumption of the continuance of life up to the end of the seven years, justly subject to the criticism of counsel, that it renders absurd the whole basis on which the presumption of death rests. There must be some period when the presumption of the continuance of life ceases and the presumption of death supervenes; and as in all cases where the existence of a presumption arising from the lapse of time is limited by a fixed period, it is difficult to assign any valid reason why one presumption should cease at the particular time designated, rather than at some other period, and a different presumption arise, except that it is important that some time, when the change takes place should be permanently established.

It would be difficult to assign any other reason than this for the presumption which obtains in some states, that a debt is paid, upon which no action has been brought, after the lapse of six years; and that it is unpaid up to the last hour of the sixth year. The presumption of payment arising from the lapse of time without action, it might be said with equal propriety, as in the present case with respect to the presumption of life to the end of the seventh year, that if the presumption of non-payment extends up to the end of the sixth year, it renders absurd the whole basis upon which the presumption of payment rests. So it would be difficult to give any sufficient reason for admitting in evidence a deed thirty years old without other proof of its execution than what is apparent on its face, and at the same time refusing admission to a deed except upon full proof of its execution, which has existed thirty years less one day—except that it is important that the period should be fixed at which the presumption arises which supersedes the necessity of direct proof.

But it is unnecessary to pursue the subject further. I am of opinion that the plaintiff could rely, in the first instance, upon the presumption of law as to the continuance of life to establish the fact that John E. Montgomery was alive on the first day of December, 1846, when the grant of the alcalde was issued. This leaves the plaintiff with a prima facie case of recovery.

We turn now to the consideration of the affirmative positions of the defendants. They contend that the evidence in the case rebuts the presumption of the continuance of life, and warrants the inference that the alleged grantee died previous to the first of December, 1846, and that the action is barred by the statute of limitations.

It appears from the evidence that about the middle of November, 1846, a launch from the United States sloop-of-war, Warren, a vessel then lying in the harbor of San Francisco, and, with the Portsmouth, under the command of Captain Montgomery, sailed from the harbor with ten seamen and two officers for Sutter's Fort on the Sacramento river. The two sons of Captain Montgomery were on the launch—William H. Montgomery, a midshipman and sailing-master on the sloop, Warren, had the command of it; John E. Montgomery, who was clerk of Captain Montgomery on board the Portsmouth, accompanied his brother. It was understood at the time on board the Warren that the launch was sent with money to pay troops of the United States. Sutter's Fort is distant from the harbor of San Francisco about one hundred and twenty miles, and the voyage between the two places is often made in a single day. An ordinary voyage from San Francisco to the fort and back would not occupy over four or five days. The launch in this case was propelled both by sail and by oars. From the time it sailed, no intelligence has ever been received of it, or of either of the officers, or of any of the men who accompanied it. About ten days after its departure, Captain Montgomery became uneasy at its absence, and sent out several boats in search of his sons and the men who sailed with them, and these boats were kept on the search for about two weeks, but no trace could be found of the launch or men. Of their fate absolute ignorance has existed to this day, now nearly a quarter of a century since their disappearance. Captain Montgomery himself left the port of San Francisco with the Portsmouth on the fifth or sixth of December following.

Now it appears to me that there are only two inferences which can be drawn from these facts, when considered with reference to the character and positions of the men and officers: One is, that they died during the period within which they should have returned to San Francisco; the other is, that they deserted from the service. The latter inference cannot be entertained for several reasons: First, desertion is the highest, and with cowardice, the basest of offences which can be committed by men in the naval service; it has never, it is believed, been charged upon a naval officer of the United States; it can never, therefore, be accepted as an explanation of any act of his, except upon the clearest proof. Second, if the case had been one only of desertion, and not of death, it is highly improbable that no intelligence should have been received of any of the men during the long period which has since elapsed. Besides, with respect to the sons of Captain Montgomery, the natural effect of relationship must have led them to break the silence of years, and to seek communication with their father.

The theory of desertion would require us to believe that officers and men conspired to commit the basest of crimes, beside larceny of the public funds in their custody, and that for nearly a quarter of a century they have not only kept to themselves the secret of their crime, but have so secluded themselves, twelve in number, from observation, that no intelligence respecting any of them has reached the public.

If desertion cannot be received as a reasonable explanation of their conduct, then death must be inferred. Death is the only fact which reconciles their conduct with the presumption of innocence, and with the ordinary conduct which officers and men of the navy pursue while in the public service. It is the sole fact which satisfactorily explains, according to the common experience and knowledge of men, which are proper grounds for judgment, the failure of the officers and men to return to San Francisco, and the absolute silence of the world since respecting them.

My mind is thus led irresistibly from the evidence to the conclusion, that the officers and crew on board the launch perished on the voyage to Sacramento, within a few days after their departure from San Francisco. They probably perished in the Bay of San Pablo, or the Bay of Suisun. If the accident which occasioned their death had occurred in the Sacramento river, it is probable that some of the men would have succeeded, from the narrowness of the stream, in reaching the shore; and probably some trace of the launch would have been discovered.

Finding, as I do, that John E. Montgomery died before the first of December, 1846, the conclusion follows, that the grant of Alcalde Bartlett, intended for him, was inoperative to pass the title.

A grant to a person deceased, is void. The instrument must be issued to a person in being, or it will be as invalid as if made to a fictitious party. The position of the plaintiff's counsel, that if the grantee were dead at the date of grant, his heir-at-law took the title, is not tenable. The case of Landes v. Brant, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 373, cited in support of this position, is an authority against it. In that case, Clamorgan, the patentee, had died in 1814, and the patent issued in 1845. The supreme court said that, according to the common law, the patent was void for want of a grantee, but that the defect was cured by the act of congress of May 20, 1836 [5 Stat. 31], declaring: "That in all cases where patents for public lands have been or may hereafter be issued, in pursuance of any law of the United States, to a person who had died, or who shall hereafter die before the date of such patent, the title to the land designated therein shall inure to and become vested in the heirs, devisees and assigns of such deceased patentee, as if the patent had issued to the deceased person during life." This act, of course, had no application to grants issued by alcaldes in the pueblo of San Francisco, whose authority never extended to the alienation of any public lands, but only to lands belonging to the pueblo.

But, independently of the death of John E. Montgomery, before the first of December, 1846, the defendants have a perfect defense to the action, under the statute of limitations. The sixth section of that statute, as passed in 1850, provided that no action for the recovery of real property or its possession, should be maintained, unless the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor or grantor, was seized or possessed of the premises within five years before the commencement of the action. In April, 1855, this section was amended by the addition of a proviso, declaring that an action might be maintained by a party claiming real property or its possession under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican government, or the authorities thereof, if the action was commenced within five years from the time of the final confirmation of such title by the government of the United States, or its legally constituted authorities. In April, 1863, the section was restored to its original language, but a new section was enacted which, after providing that the time which had already run under the previous act, should be computed as a portion of the time prescribed as a limitation in the new act, declares "that any person claiming real property or the possession thereof, or any right or interest therein under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments, or the authorities thereof, which shall not have been finally confirmed by the government of the United States, or its legally constituted authorities, more than five years before the passage of this act, may have five years after the passage of this act in which to commence his action for the recovery of such real property, or the possession thereof, or any right or interest therein, or for rents or profits out of the same, or to make his defense to an action founded upon the title thereto; and provided, further, that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to extend or enlarge the time for commencing actions for the recovery of real estate, or the possession thereof, under title derived from Spanish or Mexican governments, in a case where final confirmation has already been had, other than is now allowed under the act to which this act is amendatory."

By this last act, as I understand it, parties claiming real property under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments, or the authorities thereof, which had not been finally confirmed by the government of the United States, or its legally constituted authorities, were limited to five years after its passage within which to bring an action for the recovery of the property or its possession, but if the title had been thus finally confirmed, the parties were subject to the same limitations as though they derived their title from any other source. This construction of the act is in accordance with a recent decision of the supreme court of this state in the case of Mayor, etc., of City of San Jose v. Trimble [41 Cal. 536].

Final confirmation as defined in the act, is deemed to be the patent of the United States, or the final determination of the official survey of the land under the act of congress of June 14, 1860 [12 Stat. 33]. The effect of this statute upon the action of the plaintiff is obvious. He claims the premises in controversy under title derived from the Mexican government, not directly by immediate grant, but indirectly through the action of the alcalde. That officer only had authority to alienate lands belonging to the pueblo; and the pueblo derived its claim and interest in its municipal lands under the general laws of Mexico. Its title was derived in the strictest sense of the terms, from the Mexican government. That title, although finally confirmed in fact by the decree of the circuit court of the United States, entered in the case of San Francisco v. U. S. [Case No. 12,316], on the eighteenth day of May, 1865, and the legislation of congress upon the claim of the city has not been finally confirmed within the meaning of the act of 1863. No patent has been issued to the city upon the decree of confirmation, and the official survey has not been finally determined under the act of congress of June 14, 1860. The case of the plaintiff falls, therefore, directly within the provision which requires the action to be brought within five years after the passage of the act.[2]

Before leaving this subject it may be proper to say a few words further upon the source of title to the land within the limits of the pueblo of San Francisco, as described in the decree of the circuit court of the United States, as there is much difference of opinion on the subject between counsel.

The city of San Francisco, as successor of the pueblo, asserted title to four square leagues of land, embracing the site of the present city, and presented her claim for the same to the board of land commissioners, created under the act of March 3, 1851. The board confirmed the claim to a portion of the land, and rejected it for the balance. The city, not satisfied with this determination, prosecuted an appeal from the decision to the district court of the United States. From that court the case was transferred to the circuit court, and by this latter tribunal the claim of the city was confirmed to the extent of four square leagues, and on the eighteenth of May, 1865, the decree was entered. In the prosecution of the case it was not contended by the counsel of the city that any specific grant of land had ever been made or issued to her by Spain or Mexico. Her claim to the four square leagues was founded upon the general laws of Mexico, by which pueblos, or towns, once established and officially recognized, were entitled for their benefit, and the benefit of their inhabitants, to the use of lands embracing the site of such pueblos, or towns, and of adjoining lands within certain limits. "This right," as was said by the supreme court in Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 336, and repeated in Grisar v. McDowell, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 372, "appears to have been common to the cities and towns of Spain from an early period in her history, and was recognized in the laws and ordinances for the settlement and government of her colonies on this continent. The same general system of laws for the establishment and government of pueblos and the assignment to them of lands, that prevailed in Spain, was continued in Mexico, with but little variation, after her separation from the mother country. These laws provided for the assignment to the pueblos, for their use and the use of their inhabitants, of land not exceeding in extent four square leagues."

Upon these laws as already stated, the city rested her claim. As no assignment of lands was made to the pueblo under the former government, the claim or right of the city was an imperfect one, requiring recognition and confirmation in the mode prescribed by congress, like other claims to property of an imperfect character derived from Spanish or Mexican authorities.

From the decree of the circuit court of the United States an appeal was taken to the supreme court; and whilst the case was pending there, congress passed the act of March 8, 1866, "To quiet the title to certain lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco." By this act, all the right and title of the United States, to the land situated within the corporate limits of the city, confirmed by the decree of the circuit court, were relinquished and granted to the city, and the claim of the city to the land was confirmed, subject, however, to the reservations and exceptions designated in the decree, and upon certain trusts as to the disposition of the land. "By this act," said the supreme court in Grisar v. McDowell [supra] "the government has expressed its precise will with respect to the claim of the city of San Francisco to her lands, as it was then recognized by the circuit court of the United States. In the execution of its treaty obligations with respect to property claimed under Mexican laws, the government may adopt such modes of procedure as it may deem expedient. It may act directly by legislation upon the claims preferred, or it may provide a special board for their determination, or it may require their submission to the ordinary tribunals. It is the sole judge of the propriety of the mode, and having the plenary power of confirmation, it may annex any conditions to the confirmation of a claim resting upon an imperfect right, which it may choose. It may declare the action of the special board final; it may make it subject to appeal; it may require the appeal to go through one or more courts, and it may arrest the action of the board or courts at any stage."

"The act of March 3, 1851, is a general law applying to all cases, but the act of March 8, 1866, referring specially to the confirmation of the claim to land in San Francisco, withdrew that claim, as it then stood, from further consideration of the courts under the provisions of the general act. It disposed of the city claim and determined the conditions upon which it should be recognized and confirmed. The title of the city, therefore, rests upon the decree of the circuit court, as modified by the act of congress."

By the statement that the title of the city rests upon the decree of the court, is meant that her title is that which is recognized and established by the decree. The decree must be read precisely as if the conditions prescribed in the act of congress had been inserted in the decree by the court. No one would have doubted, if that had been done, that the title was Mexican in its origin, and to be treated like other imperfect Mexican titles when confirmed by authority of the United States.

It only remains to add that judgment must be entered for the defendants. If special findings are desired, the counsel for the plaintiff will prepare them and present them to me upon notice to the counsel of the adverse parties, for settlement; otherwise a general finding will be filed.

Motion for New Trial.

The plaintiff's attorney moved for a new trial, before Mr. Justice Field, on the ground of newly discovered evidence, and alleged error in the finding of the court, and in its ruling upon the statute of limitations. The court denied the motion immediately after the argument, but stated that perhaps its opinion on the statute of limitations might require some explanation or modification; and if satisfied upon further consideration that such was the case, it would file a supplemental opinion on that point, but that its finding as to the death of the grantee at the time the grant was issued remaining, the judgment must stand as rendered, whatever qualification might be made in the opinion upon the statute of limitations.

Subsequently the following opinion was filed:

FIELD, Circuit Justice. When the motion for a new trial was argued, the views expressed in the opinion of the court upon the effect of the state statute of limitations of 1863, and particularly as to the time it began to run against the right of action of the plaintiff, were earnestly combatted by counsel. It was contended by them, that the statute only began to run from the passage of the act of congress of March 8, 1866, and that the legal title to the premises until then was in the United States. Whilst unable to agree with counsel in this position, I was so much impressed with their argument that I was induced to reconsider the opinion, and must now qualify in some particulars its conclusions.

The sixth section of the statute of limitations of 1863, as stated, provided, in substance, that parties claiming real property under title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments, or the authorities thereof, which had not been finally confirmed by the United States, or its legally constituted authorities, should be limited to five years after its passage, within which to bring an action for the recovery of the property or its possession, but if the title had been thus finally confirmed, the parties should be subject to the same limitations as though they derived their title from any other source, that is, they should have five years from such final confirmation. The statute, in another section, declared that by final confirmation was meant the patent of the United States, or the final determination of the official survey of the land under the act of congress of June 14, 1860. As no final confirmation, within the meaning of the statute, that is, as no patent had been issued to the city and no official survey had been made, the attention of the court was drawn only to the provision of the statute for the commencement of actions within five years after its passage. It did not then occur to the court, and was not suggested by counsel, that in consequence of the legislation of congress by the acts of July 1, 1864, and of March 8, 1866, no patent would ever issue to the city under the decree of confirmation, and that the act of June 14, 1860, had been repealed. But such is undoubtedly the case. The act of June 14, 1860, was repealed on the first of July, 1864; and it is not the practice of the land department of the United States, and there is no occasion for such practice, to issue patents for land granted by direct act of congress. A patent necessarily rests for its validity upon the legislation of congress, and if the provisions of such legislation are complied with—and it is itself presumptive evidence of the fact—it passes all the title of the United States to the premises designated. A grant by direct act of congress differs only from a patent, in that it passes the title without any intermediate steps from the sovereign proprietor, whereas the patent is only issued through the action of subordinate officers. If any difference could exist in the grade of the two conveyances, the preference would fall to the legislative grant, as proceeding more immediately than the patent from the original source of title. But in truth, there is no such difference; both pass the title of the grantor to the extent designated.

Now, by the fifth section of the act of congress of July 1, 1864, "to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California" (13 Stat. 332), all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the limits of the city, as defined by its charter of 1851, were granted to the city for the uses and purposes specified in the Van Ness Ordinance, subject to certain exceptions. These exceptions consisted of all sites or other parcels of land which had been or were then occupied by the United States for military, naval, or other public uses, or such other sites or parcels as might thereafter be designated by the president within one year after the rendition to the general land office by the surveyor-general of an approved plat of the exterior limits of the city, as recognized by the section, that is, as defined by the charter of 1851, in connection with the lines of the public surveys.

It is contended by counsel that the exception from the grant of such parcels as might be subsequently designated by the president, defeated the entire grant. Their position is that the act is void for repugnancy, because, to use their own language, it begins by granting all, and ends by reserving all to the grantor. But this position is clearly untenable. The grant is general, of all the lands within the limits of the charter of 1851, and the exception is of such sites or parcels of these lands as are or have been occupied by the United States, or may be designated by the president for particular uses. The power of future designation does not in terms extend so as to cover the whole grant, but only to parcels of the same. If the language of the exception would authorize, as supposed by counsel, the designation of one parcel after another until all the land granted was taken, it would not follow that the grant itself would fail, but only that the exception would be void for repugnancy. If the grant were between private parties it is possible that the exception would be regarded as void, either for uncertainty or repugnancy. The grant in such case would be taken most strongly against the grantor. But the grant here being a legislative grant, it is the duty of the court to give effect so far as possible to the intent of the legislature, if that can be ascertained, without reference to the technical rules which would control the construction of a private grant. I am, therefore, of opinion that the right of the government to designate through the president, within a limited time, parcels of land for public uses, could be maintained. It is not to be presumed that the president would exercise the right so as to defeat the general purpose of the grant, which was to quiet the title of possessors of lots in the city under the Van Ness Ordinance. In this view the title of the United States to all the lands within the charter limits of 1851, should be regarded as having passed by the act to the city with a right in the United States to resume the title to parcels of these lands, upon the designation of the president within a specified period. But, if I am mistaken in this view, the exception should be regarded as void, and the titles as having passed at once without any right in the United States subsequently to resume the title to any parcels. It is of no practical consequence in this case which construction is adopted, for no parcel within the limits of the city, lying on the peninsula west of the bay, was ever designated by the president, and the power of designation on the peninsula was released by the act of March 8, 1866, in pursuance of which the claim of the city was finally confirmed. The only designation ever made was that of the island of Yerba Buena, which is situated in the bay.

Now, though the title of the city, as stated in the previous opinion, is Mexican in its origin and was recognized and established by the decree of the circuit court of the United States, as modified by the act of congress of March 8, 1866, yet all adverse interest of the government to the lands within the corporate limits of 1851 being released by the act of July 1, 1864, the titles conferred by the Van Ness Ordinance became perfect legal titles. The act operated upon such titles as effectually as a patent would have done. The contingent right reserved to the United States did not affect the perfect character of those titles, any more than a like right of the United States to take property for public uses upon compensation affects the title of such property. There is good reason, therefore, for the position of counsel of the defendants, that the statute of limitations of 1863 began to run against the right of action of the plaintiff on the first of July, 1864, if it be held that the statute did not run from its passage.

The statute allows, as already stated, five years after its passage for the commencement of an action, provided the title has not been previously perfected by final confirmation; if thus perfected, then five years from such confirmation. It does not contemplate the case of a final confirmation subsequently made, or, rather, it gives no force to such subsequent confirmation, and herein lies the defect of the statute. It is not competent for state legislation to impair the rights of the claimant flowing from subsequent confirmation.

Upon the acquisition of California the obligation devolved upon the United States to protect the inhabitants of the territory in their property. This obligation was recognized by express stipulations of the treaty. The obligation being political in its character could be discharged, as I have often had occasion to observe in this court, and when a member of the supreme court of the state, in such manner and on such terms as the government might deem appropriate. By the act of March 3, 1851, the government determined the conditions upon which it would discharge this obligation to holders of titles from Mexican or Spanish authorities. It there established a tribunal for the consideration of all claims to land by virtue of such titles, and required their presentation before it for investigation within a prescribed period, with such evidence, documentary or otherwise, as the holders might possess; appointed law officers to appear and contest their validity; allowed appeals from the decisions of the tribunal to the courts of the United States, and provided officers to survey and measure off the lands when the claims to them were finally adjudged to be valid.

On the one hand the claimant was compelled by this act, on pain of forfeiting his land, to present his claim to it before the tribunal thus created, and was subjected to numerous and expensive proceedings to establish its justice and validity. On the other hand the government promised the claimant that if on the prescribed investigation and consideration by that tribunal, and the courts of the United States on appeal, his claim was found to be valid, it would take such action as would render his title perfect, and give to him such evidence of ownership as would assure to him its possession and enjoyment. This legislation was not subject to any constitutional objection, so far as it applied to titles of an imperfect character; that is, to titles which required further action of the political department of the government to render them perfect. The precise point was adjudged by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Beard v. Federey, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 478–490, where language respecting claims to land in California, derived from Spanish or Mexican authorities, the obligation with reference to such claims devolved upon the United States upon the cession of the country, and the character and effect of the act of congress of March 3, 1851, is used, similar to that which is expressed and repeated, so often as to become almost trite, in numerous decisions of the supreme court of this state.

The act of March 3, 1851, being constitutional, it is not within the legislative competency of the state to interfere with and defeat its operation. This follows necessarily from the sovereign and supreme authority of the United States over all matters connected with the treaty and the enforcement of obligations incurred thereby.

The statute of limitations of 1863, so far as it fixes a period after its passage within which actions must be brought for the recovery of real property claimed under titles of Mexican or Spanish origin, may not perhaps be open to any just objection where the titles are imperfect in their character and are unconfirmed. But to give effect to the statute so as to cut off or limit to the period designated after its passage, the right of action upon those titles, when subsequently confirmed and perfected, would be to defeat in many instances the legislation of congress, and render it subordinate to the action of the state.

Many of the grants, as is well known, from Mexican and Spanish authorities, were for specific quantities of land lying within exterior boundaries embracing a greater quantity. They usually contained a clause providing for official segregation of the quantity designated, with a reservation of the surplus for the benefit of the nation. They were, notwithstanding this, accompanied with conditions of cultivation and occupancy, either expressed in the grants or annexed by force of law, and a compliance with them was essential to avoid a possible denouncement and forfeiture of the land. The grantees were therefore obliged to take possession, and their right of possession necessarily extended to the entire tract. They could not set apart for themselves any particular portion of the general tract equal, in their judgment, or according to their measurement, to the quantity specified. The authority to make a segregation, remained before the cession of the country with the former government, and since the cession has remained with the new government. The grantees were, therefore, interested to protect from injury and waste the entire tract, and to improve it, and, until official segregation, third persons could not interfere with this right to the possession of the whole. Until then, as was said in Cornwall v. Culver, 16 Cal. 429, no individual could complain, much less could he be permitted to determine in advance that any particular locality would fall within the supposed surplus, and therefore justify its forcible seizure and detention by himself. "If one person," to use the language of the court in that case, "could in this way appropriate a particular parcel to himself, all persons could do so; and thus the grantee, who is the donee of the government, would be stripped of its bounty for the benefit of those who were not in its contemplation, and were never intended to be the recipients of its favors."

Such being the rights of grantees until official segregation, the courts of this state have with strict justice given effect to them by sustaining actions of ejectment, until such segregation for the entire tract within the exterior boundaries. Much hardship has, in numerous cases, been the result of actions of this character. Many grantees throughout the country, probably the majority of them, have, therefore, from this consideration or to avoid the expenses of litigation, refrained from enforcing their rights in this respect. Now, if the statute of 1863 could be upheld when applied to actions upon titles confirmed subsequently to its passage, this absurd result would follow, if the confirmation were had more than five years afterwards, namely, that grantees would be barred from recovering the limited quantity to which they were ultimately found entitled after confirmation and survey, because they had not previously sued for and recovered a greater quantity. The grantees in that case would be required to sue, before confirmation, for more than they would be ultimately entitled to have set apart to them, and more than the former government intended to grant to them, or be barred of all right of action for the quantity actually intended and finally assigned to them.

It is evident that the state courts are incompetent to determine finally upon the rights of parties claiming by imperfect titles of Mexican or Spanish origin before their confirmation. A suit founded upon such title might be defeated by a ruling of a state court, that the grant was invalid because issued without authority, or was forged, or abandoned, or because its conditions were not complied with, and yet if the grant should be adjudged valid in the proceedings before the board of commissioners created under the act of March 3, 1851, and the tribunals of the United States on appeal from its decision, and a patent be issued, the judgment of the state court would not be a bar to a new action upon the patent. And the reason is obvious; until the government has discharged its obligations under the treaty with respect to such titles, the state court can only look into the evidence respecting them for the purpose of determining the right of their holder to present possession. It can pass no judgment which will impair the ultimate determination of the appropriate federal tribunals respecting their validity.

If an adverse judgment by a state court upon the unconfirmed title would not bar an action upon the confirmed title, it must necessarily follow that the absence of any action upon the title before confirmation cannot be effectual as a bar to an action after confirmation.

It would seem from the argument of counsel, that the difficulty experienced by them upon the subject under consideration, has arisen from the idea that its determination depends upon the character of the title derived from Mexican or Spanish authorities as equitable or legal. But its determination does not depend upon this distinction. Equitable titles, so called, are strictly mere claims upon the government for titles, and are founded upon some service rendered or other consideration given to the government, or promise by it. They constitute no estate in the land, and, unless accompanied with the right of possession, do not authorize any action for the recovery of the land. Grants in California from Mexican or Spanish authorities conferred something more than mere equitable titles, as thus understood; they passed to the grantees a present and immediate interest in the premises designated; they conferred a legal title, though generally, for want either of departmental approval or official segregation, one which was imperfect in its character. The question in all cases of this kind, is not whether the title is equitable or legal, but whether it is perfect or imperfect. If imperfect, it is under the control of the government of the United States, and any regulations which that government may prescribe for the purpose of protecting and perfecting it. The action of that government, and the right of possession and enjoyment which perfected title gives, cannot be defeated or in any respect impaired by state legislation. As against the perfected title, the state statute of limitations can only begin to run from the date of the consummation of the title.

In the present case the act of July 1, 1864, as already stated, operated upon the premises designated in perfecting the title as effectually as a patent of the United States. It is no objection to the efficacy of the act that it was passed in advance of the period when a patent would ordinarily have been issued, and thus rendered a patent unnecessary.

It follows from the views expressed that the sixth section of the state statute of 1863 is invalid so far as it applies to actions for the recovery of real property founded upon titles derived from Mexican or Spanish authorities, perfected after its passage, either by act of congress or by judicial decree, survey and patent, and that, as to titles thus perfected, the ordinary period of limitation must be allowed from the date of their consummation which exists with reference to actions on complete title from other sources.

It follows, also, that the statute in the present case began to run against the right of action of the plaintiff on the first of July, 1864, and not on the eighteenth of May, 1863. The former opinion must, therefore, be modified in accordance with these views.

MONTGOMERY et al. v. The T. P. LEATHERS.

[Newb. 421.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. Nov., 1852.

SALVAGE—ACTUAL SAVING NECESSARY—SURRENDER BY MASTER—RIGHT OF PILOT TO PARTICIPATE—DERELICT—RATE OF SALVAGE—BY WHAT GOVERNED.

1. To constitute a derelict in the sense of maritime law, it is necessary that the thing be found deserted or abandoned upon the seas, whether it arose from accident, or necessity, or voluntary dereliction.

[Cited in Williams v. The Jenny Lind, Case No. 17,723.]

2. The abandonment of a steamboat by the master, to the care and protection of the master and crew of another steamboat for the purpose of procuring assistance and safety, is not a case of derelict.

3. In questions of salvage, no distinction can be made between the boat and cargo, both being subject to the same rule of law.

[Cited in The Queen of the Pacific, 18 Fed. 701.]

4. A salvage compensation can be awarded only to persons by whose agency and assistance the vessel or cargo may be saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss; and salvage will not be allowed unless the property be saved in fact by the parties who make the claim. Intentions, however good, and exertions even though they be perilous and heroic, are not sufficient to sustain a claim for salvage.

[Cited in The Williams, Case No. 17,710.]

5. The drawing a boat off when aground, is a common act of courtesy among steamboats, for which no claim for salvage is ever asserted.

6. The surrender of the imperiled boat by its master, to the care and protection of the master and crew of the steamer Robb, virtually dissolved the contract between the surrendered boat and its pilot, and the pilot by important services subsequently rendered beyond the line of his duty, as such, is entitled to claim as one of the salvors.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

7. The rate of salvage is not governed by the mere extent of labor. The value of the property saved, the degree of hazard in which it is placed, the enterprise, intrepidity and danger of the service, and the policy of a liberal allowance for timely interposition of maritime assistance, all conspire to increase the amount of the salvage. When the value of the property is small and the hazard great, the allowance is in greater proportion; on the other hand, when the value is large and the services highly meritorious, the proportion is diminished.

[This was a libel by Edward Montgomery and others against the steamboat T. P. Leathers and cargo, for salvage.]

Mr. Benjamin, for salvors.
Mr. Durant, for respondent.

McCALEB, District Judge. The libelants in this case claim a salvage compensation for services rendered in saving from loss by fire, the steamboat T. P. Leathers. It appears from the evidence, that the steamboat James Robb, while prosecuting her voyage from this port to that of Louisville, Kentucky, on the 13th of June last, discovered the Leathers on fire, at College Point, about sixty miles above this city. The discovery was made about two o'clock in the morning. The Robb, upon being hailed by the Leathers, went to her assistance, and found her in a very dangerous situation; the fire was in her hold, and all efforts to extinguish the flames had proved ineffectual; she had been run hard ashore on a sand bank, with a view to save the lives of those on board; she had been scuttled by boring into her a number of large auger holes, for the purpose of extinguishing the fire. All the steam and water from her boilers had been exhausted by being discharged into her hold; by this means the flames were at first partially subdued, but again broke out as fiercely as before; she had already obtained the assistance of the steamboat St. Charles, which had vainly endeavored to pull her off the sand bank and extinguish the fire. When the Robb arrived, the flames had made such progress as to render inevitable the destruction of the Leathers and that portion of the cargo which had not been removed by the St. Charles. The Leathers was commanded by Captain J. F. Leathers, but when the fire broke out, he requested his older and more experienced brother, who was on board as a passenger, to take command. This request was complied with, and the latter had the control of the burning boat when the Robb arrived. With the assistance of his brother, he was engaged in doing all that skill, experience and energy could accomplish, with the means at his disposal, in rescuing the boat and cargo from impending peril. At his request, the Robb, aided by the St. Charles, hauled the Leathers off the sand bank. She took on board the passengers, and a large portion of the cargo from the deck of the Leathers, which had not been previously taken off by the St. Charles. She pumped the boilers of the Leathers, which were empty, full of water, and after giving all the assistance she could for about four hours, was on the eve of leaving the Leathers and prosecuting her voyage to Louisville, when the captain of the Leathers requested Captain Montgomery not to leave, as it was perfectly apparent the boat must inevitably be destroyed without the superior equipments of the Robb, to aid in putting out the fire. The testimony of Captain Leathers shows that he had no hopes whatever of being able to save the boat without that aid which the Robb only could render. He therefore came to the conclusion to abandon the burning boat to Captain Montgomery, of the Robb, that he might do with her whatever he might deem expedient, with a view to her final safety.

Captain Montgomery thereupon took possession of the Leathers, and with all the means and machinery of the Robb, resorted to every device which skill and ingenuity could suggest to save her. It may be proper here to remark, that the Robb is the only boat on the Mississippi provided with an extra steam engine to furnish steam and water for extinguishing fires. This engine, with its boiler, the main engine and its boilers, and the small engine called the doctor, on the Robb, were all fitted up with extra pipes leading into the hold of the Leathers. The two main engines of the Leathers and her doctor, were also fitted up with similar pipes, which were made to lead into her hold. Steam was then raised in the boilers on both boats, and an unremitted discharge of steam and water kept up. By this means, the flames were in a great measure subdued, but not entirely extinguished. The heat in the hold was so intense, and the smoke so suffocating, as to render it impossible for any one to go below. It was deemed advisable, therefore, to fill the hold with water as the only means of entirely putting out the fire. The Leathers was then towed by the Robb from College Point, where she had been stranded, to Valcour Aime's plantation, six miles lower down the river, to a sand bank where there was about six feet of water. While the boat, however, was proceeding down the river to the point here designated, it was found that the current of air created by her motion had the effect of driving back from the hatches the steam and smoke; and Captain Montgomery determined, though at considerable hazard of his life, to take a hose and descend into the hold, that he might thus be enabled more effectually to direct a stream of water upon the burning cargo. He was urgently warned not to do so by the officers of the Leathers, who informed him that there were barrels of turpentine in the hold; and notwithstanding the peril he incurred, he called for volunteers to aid him in the accomplishment of his purpose, and followed by James Dean, the pilot of the Robb, James F. Smith, her first clerk, James K. Moody, second clerk, Marshall Johnson, her first engineer, and Chas. Pierce, pilot of the Leathers, descended into the hold with a hose in his hand, while Dean was provided with another. They were thus enabled, with the assistance of the other men, Smith and Johnson, Moody and Pierce, to direct a perpetual stream of water upon those articles of merchandise which were actually blazing. They were thus enabled by constant exertions for several hours, to extinguish the flames entirely, and save the boat and that portion of the cargo not already taken on board the Robb. The gallantry and intrepidity displayed by Captain Montgomery and his associates, will be fully appreciated by a reference to the fact disclosed by the evidence, that some of the barrels containing turpentine were on fire, and had their hoops burnt off. The water in the hold of the Leathers was then pumped out, the freight which had been taken from her on board the Robb was returned to her, and after about thirteen hours of unremitted labor, the Robb continued her voyage to Louisville, in charge of her mate, while Captain Montgomery took command of the Leathers, and brought her down in safety to this port.

The facts here detailed, and the testimony of the witnesses not particularly referred to, are such as to justify the court in regarding the services of the salvors as in the highest degree meritorious. It cannot be denied that almost all those ingredients of a salvage service, which in the opinion of a court of admiralty, enhance the claim for compensation, were strongly presented on the trial of this cause. The danger to the property rescued was imminent. The testimony of Captain Leathers shows clearly that it would inevitably have been destroyed but for the timely assistance of the salvors. In the conduct of Captain Montgomery were displayed all those qualities of skill, energy, intrepidity and gallantry, which ever have and ever will, appeal most strongly to the equitable consideration of courts in awarding a salvage compensation. The same qualities were exhibited, though not to the same extent, by those who promptly responded to his call for volunteers, and faithfully executed his orders. The proctors for the respondents have with commendable liberality, admitted that the services performed by the salvors were of a highly meritorious character, and that a liberal remuneration should be awarded. They have, however, very properly contended, that this is not a case of a derelict, as that term is understood in the maritime law, and however much I may feel inclined to regard with favor the services of these salvors, it is my duty to adhere as closely as possible to the well established principles of law. I cannot give to the case any other character than that which the law has given it. If it could be considered as a case of derelict, I should perhaps have little hesitation in decreeing the usual proportion of a moiety. But a glance at the law will show, that it would be a deviation from all precedent thus to regard it.

To constitute a derelict in the sense of the maritime law, it is necessary that the thing be found deserted or abandoned upon the seas, whether it arose from accident or necessity, or voluntary dereliction. Sir William Scott, in the case of The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 37, declared that a legal derelict is, properly, where there has been an abandonment at sea by the master or crew, without hope of recovery. With the view, for which the words "without hope of recovery," are introduced, viz: to distinguish a temporary absence from a permanent abandonment, it might, perhaps, have been more proper to have said, an abandonment without the intention of returning, since the spes recuperandi might exist even though the abandonment were without such intention. In another case, that of The Jonge Johannes, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 263, the same learned judge seems to have entertained an opinion, that if a vessel be captured, and afterwards abandoned by her captor, it is not properly a case of derelict; because neither the owner nor those who were in possession as his agents, have committed any act of dereliction. So that in this view, to constitute a derelict, there must be a voluntary abandonment by the master and crew. But this opinion, as appears from later cases (The Lord Nelson, Edw. 79, and The Blenden-Hall, 1 Dod. 414), has been silently retracted; and certainly it is not the recognized doctrine in this country. Sir Leoline Jenkins has given a true definition in its most broad and accurate sense, when he says "derelicts are boats or other vessels forsaken or found on the seas without any person in them." Works of Sir L. Jenkins, vol. 1, p. 89. It is true that the civil law attached a very different sense to the term; for a thing was not a derelict in that law unless the owner voluntarily abandoned it without any further claim of property in it. "Pro derelicto antem habetur quod dominus ea mente abjecerit, al id in numero rerum suarum esse nolit." Just. Inst. lib. 2, p. 681, § 46. And, therefore, a thing cast overboard in a storm to lighten a vessel, was not esteemed a derelict. Rowe v. The Brig [Case No. 12,093].

In the case now under consideration, the boat on fire was found in possession of her captain and crew, who never left her at any moment from the commencement of the danger until the final extinguishment of the flames. It is true that Captain Leathers abandoned her to the possession of Captain Montgomery, under the conviction that nothing could be effectually done for her safety, without the admirable equipments of the Robb. But such an abandonment can, in no just or legal sense, be considered as sufficient to satisfy us in regarding the boat as a derelict—that is deserted by her captain and crew sine animo revertendi. A case of the total abandonment of a vessel upon the Mississippi must very rarely occur, especially where, as in this instance, she is stranded near the shore. The inducements to seek safety by the desertion of a ship in flames on the high seas, or driven about in a helpless condition by storms, or wrecked on the coast of the sea, can never exist on our public navigable rivers. Being satisfied that this is not a case of derelict, I shall, instead of a moiety, award one-third of the proceeds of the property saved to the salvors, to be distributed as hereafter directed.

The position assumed by the proctors of the claimants of a portion of the cargo, that a distinction should be drawn by the court between the boat and cargo, cannot be recognized as the correct rule, in cases of this nature. I know no precedent for the establishment of such a rule, and the learned proctors have referred to no authority in support of their position. The reason advanced for the distinction, which it is contended should be drawn, is the fact that less exertion and risk were necessary in saving that portion of the cargo which was placed upon the deck of the Leathers. There is scarcely a case of salvage that ever came before a court of admiralty, in which this distinction would not have been applicable; and yet, we find the uniform rule to be, to consider the service performed in rescuing the vessel and cargo, as one general salvage service, to be compensated by awarding a certain quantum of the proceeds of the whole property. I have searched with diligence for authorities upon this point, and the only case I have discovered, is that of The Vesta, decided by Sir Christopher Robinson. 2 Hagg. Adm. 195. The decision was given upon an appeal from the commissioners, and although the learned judge confirms the action of these commissioners for satisfactory reasons, he is clear in the expression of an opinion adverse to the principle contended for by the proctors in this case. He maintains, that it is not a correct principle in determining the amount of salvage, to give specific proportions of different parts of the property saved as of the ship and cargo, and the different parts of the cargo. Such a rule is inconvenient in itself, and must lead to error, unless checked by proper attention to the adequacy of the remuneration so assigned, according to the circumstances of the particular case. The more usual and better rule is, to make a valuation on the whole property. "Suppose," says the judge, in illustration of his views on this point, "a casket of jewels on board, and which might be saved with great facility; it could not, in such case, be contended that the salvors would only be entitled to a small gratuity for carrying it on shore. To uphold such a notion would lead to preferences in saving one part of a cargo before another." I shall, therefore, adhere to the usual rule, and decree compensation out of the whole proceeds of boat and cargo; and shall do so with greater satisfaction, because it appears from the testimony of Captain Leathers, that there existed the strongest apprehensions that the deck of the burning boat would fall in, and the cargo on the deck could only be saved by directing a constant stream of water into the hold, by the operations of the engine and hose of the Robb.

I come now to consider the claim of the St. Charles to be considered as a salvor; and I shall proceed to state as briefly as possible, the reasons why, in my judgment, the claim cannot be admitted. A salvage compensation can be awarded only to persons by whose agency and assistance the vessel or cargo may be saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss, as in cases of shipwreck, derelict or recapture. It is well settled, that unless the property be saved in fact, by those who claim as salvors, salvage will not be allowed, be their intentions however good, and their exertions however heroic and perilous. Clarke v. The Dodge Healy [Case No. 2,849]. The evidence shows that a large portion of the cargo on deck, was taken on board of the St. Charles. But by an agreement between Captain Leathers and Captain Applegate, commanding the St. Charles, that portion of the cargo was transported by her to its place of destination, and her captain and owners were to be compensated by receiving the freight which was chargeable thereon. This freight was doubtless received. Whether it has been or not, it is certain that no claim for salvage has or could now be asserted against that portion of her cargo. It can hardly be contended that the Leathers and the balance of the cargo were saved when the St. Charles left her. The testimony of Captain Leathers on this point, is too explicit to admit of a doubt. The St. Charles aided the Robb in drawing the Leathers off the sand bar; but we are told by the pilot of the Leathers, that the power of the Robb was sufficient without her. Besides, the drawing a boat off when aground, is a common act of courtesy among steamboats, for which no claim for salvage is ever asserted. If the services of the Robb had extended no farther than this simple and usual act of courtesy, it is hardly probable that she would have asserted any claim for salvage compensation. But she persevered unto the end. She not only rendered the services alluded to by the witnesses, but it was by those services that the property against which she has filed her libel was actually saved from impending peril. I am of opinion that the St. Charles has already been amply compensated by the amount of freight she has received upon that portion of the cargo which by agreement with Captain Leathers—an agreement which seems at the time to have been perfectly satisfactory to both parties—she was to carry to its point of destination.

The proctors for the claimants of a portion of the cargo, have urged upon the court the propriety of decreeing salvage to the crew of the Robb. I cannot perceive upon what ground their clients are interested in securing to the crew their customary proportion of the compensation awarded, except upon the supposition that as that proportion has not been claimed, it will enure to the benefit of the claimants. But if by the evidence the crew were placed before the court as salvors, I should feel it my duty to have their proportion retained in the registry, subject to their orders, and in no event would I feel myself authorized to order it into the hands of the claimants. The evidence, however, does not justify the court, in this instance, in considering the crew as salvors. They have asserted no claim as such, and the fair presumption is, that, not having performed any service beyond the ordinary line of their duty, they have no demand to make beyond their ordinary wages. If, indeed, the court could feel itself called upon to award to them a compensation, the amount would necessarily be about the proportion of stipulated wages, which, for about thirteen hours, would be too insignificant to be taken into account in a case like this. I have felt it to be a sacred duty to guard the rights of the crew in all cases in which they could at all be regarded as salvors. And in the case to which the proctor has referred, I refused to award to the owners of the tow-boat the amount of salvage compensation which was justly demanded by the crew, under the belief that they would eventually claim as salvors, and because I was convinced their claims had not been properly presented by those whose duty it was to protect their rights. The only persons who now appear before the court as salvors, are Captain Montgomery, the men whose names have already been mentioned, and Hamilton Smith and Isaac Darrimore, the mate and carpenter. These two last did not descend into the hold of the Leathers, but rendered prompt and efficient assistance in executing orders above, and especially in cutting holes in the deck. They incurred no real danger, but were active and useful in their appropriate sphere. Charles Pierce, although a pilot on the burning boat, is clearly entitled to be regarded as a salvor. His original contract with the boat, on which he was employed, was virtually dissolved by the surrender of the boat into the possession of Captain Montgomery; and there seems to be no doubt that he performed important services beyond the line of his ordinary duty. I shall, therefore, place him upon an equality with James S. Smith, Marshall Johnson and James K. Moody. After Captain Montgomery, the real dux facti—the strong prevailing mind that led throughout the enterprise—I consider the pilot of the Robb, James Dean, as first entitled to the favorable consideration of the court. He was the first to respond to the call of Captain Montgomery for volunteers, and to follow him into the hold. He also had charge of a hose, and amid the intense heat and suffocating smoke, continued, with great fortitude and energy, to discharge his duty until the flames were finally extinguished.

Since the decision of Lord Stowell in the case of The Raikes [1 Hagg. Adm. 246] it has become customary with courts of admiralty to award a liberal compensation to the owners of steam vessels to induce them to embark in a salvage enterprise and thus enlist their powerful and efficient aid in rescuing life and property from impending peril. The case now under consideration is one in which a higher proportion than one-third should be awarded to the owners of the salving boat. The superior engine of the Robb and her other excellent and extensive equipments, all so admirably adapted to the service in which she was employed, will, I think, justify me in deviating from the ordinary rule of one-third, and giving to her owners one-half of the salvage compensation awarded. It should also be remembered, in further justification of this rule, that her exertions to save the property in this instance worked a forfeiture of her insurance. As already intimated, I shall decree one-third of the proceeds of the boat and cargo saved free of all expenses and charges, as the aggregate of salvage compensation; and of this one-half having been decreed to the owners of the Robb, I shall divide the other half into thirty shares, of $250 each. I give—

To Captain Montgomery	12	shares
James Dean, pilot	4	"
James S. Smith	3	"
Marshall Johnson	3	"
James K. Moody	3	"
Charles Pierce	3	"
Hamilton Smith	1	"
Isaac Darrimore	1	"
	30	shares

Thirty shares of $250 each, are equal to $7,500. The whole value of the property saved has been estimated at $45,000. The owners of the Robb will receive the other half of the third allowed, viz: $7,500.

In making this decree, I have endeavored to give what I consider, under all the circumstances of the case, a liberal reward to the salvors, and at the same time protect the rights of the unfortunate owners. It is well established that the amount of salvage rests in the sound discretion of the court. The rate is not governed by the mere extent of labor, but is a result from the combination of various considerations. The value of the property saved, the degree of hazard in which it is placed, the enterprise, intrepidity and danger of the service, and the policy of a liberal allowance for the timely interposition of marine assistance, all conspire to heighten the amount. Where the value of the property is small, and the hazard is great, the allowance is always in greater proportion. On the other hand, where the value is large, and services are highly meritorious, the proportion is diminished.

Admiralty Court, Pennsylvania. 1780.[2]

SHIPPING—VESSEL CHARTERED—RIGHT OF OWNERS TO DISCHARGE MASTER—MASTER'S REMEDY.

1. Owners of a vessel which they have chartered to others, may dismiss the master they have appointed before the completion of the voyage, (although he has signed bills of lading for the cargo, and shipped his mariners,) without the owners shewing sufficient cause for such dismission.

[Cited in Parsons v. Terry, Case No. 10,782; Clayton v. The Eliza B. Emory, 4 Fed. 344.]

[Quoted in Ward v. Ruckman, 36 N. Y. 37.]

2. In cases of real injury the master must apply to the laws of his country for redress.

[Cited in Parsons v. Terry, Case No. 10,782.]

[Quoted in Ward v. Ruckman, 36 N. Y. 37.]

Wharton, and others, owners of the ship General Greene, had chartered her to certain merchants for a particular voyage, and appointed Montgomery master for that voyage. The ship had cleared out at the naval office, and was on the point of sailing, when a sudden frost filled the Delaware with ice, and fixed her in the port of Philadelphia. During the winter some differences arose between the owners and master. The consequence of which was, that the owners, by a letter of dismission, discharged Montgomery from their service, and put another master on board. Whereupon Montgomery libelled against the owners in the admiralty to compel them to fulfil their contract with him. The question was, whether owners could dismiss the master they had appointed before the completion of the voyage, after he had signed bills of lading for the cargo, and shipped his mariners, without the owners shewing sufficient cause for such dismission. And it was contended, that the master, from the time of his appointment, has the sole command of the ship vested in him, and cannot be displaced without committing some offence sufficient to forfeit his rights and justify a dismission. That after signing bills of lading, he becomes answerable to the freighters for the delivery of the cargo, and that the owners cannot by their act exonerate him from this charge, whilst the bills of lading signed with his hand, remain in the possession of the freighters: that the libellant, considering himself as engaged for this voyage, had neglected to seek for any other appointment; and that the owners discharging him at this time, was an injury which the court ought in justice to redress by compelling them to reinstate him in his office.

In behalf of the respondents it was urged, that the owners of a ship have, and ought to have, a right to remove the master at pleasure; because their interests are so deeply concerned in the appointment, that they are answerable not only for his imprudent conduct, but are bound by contracts he may legally make on account of the concern: that if, after their choice of a master, his appointment should be deemed irrevocable for the voyage, unless some gross offence can be proved, the owners will be at the mercy of the master, who, by his weak or wicked conduct, may bring them to ruin. That if when the owners have dismissed the master, the court should undertake to reinstate him, contrary to their judgment and inclination, and so force him upon them, the court and not the owners, ought to be answerable to the freighters for any consequences that may ensue: that neither the charter-party, shipping articles, or bills of lading, prohibit a change of the master, as the contracts made with him are made in his official and not in his personal capacity: that the master is in fact the representative of the owners, and not himself personally bound, neither is he answerable for the conduct of his successor: that in case an action should be brought against him for a breach of contract on the bills of lading, he might plead his dismission by the owners, and it would be good in law: that the subordinate officers are appointed by the master of a ship, and if they should misbehave, or prove insufficient or unsafe, the owners have no remedy but by the removal of the master: that if owners are bound by the appointment of a master to continue him for the voyage, the master ought also to be bound to perform the voyage, even against his interest or inclination; but if, in case of the master's refusal, the owners should libel against him in the admiralty, the court could give no redress, because the court cannot award damages, neither can it compel the master to a specific performance of his contract, from the nature of the service: that the master's appointment is, and ought to be during pleasure only: that the same power which appoints can remove: that if a master suffers injury by an unreasonable dismission, he may have his remedy at common law where ample recompense in damages will be made to him: and finally, that whatever inconveniences may arise to masters being subjected to the caprice of owners of vessels, much greater would arise to the owners, should they be compelled to retain in their service masters once appointed, however contrary to their judgment or interest; and that no instance can be produced of a master being thus forced upon the owners of a ship by any court whatever.

To which, counsel for the libellant replied: That this cause came properly before the court of admiralty: that where a court hath the right to take cognizance of an injury, it follows necessarily that it can give redress: that if the court cannot award damages, it can order a specific performance of the contract: that the court can compel the master to such performance; and if he refuses, can attach his person, and oblige him to give security for the completion of his contract; and, therefore, the jurisdiction is competent: that it would be unjust to send the master to common law for redress, on the owner's breach of contract, as the owners may fail and be unable to pay damages, and therefore the ship ought to be his certain and proper security: that all contracts ought to be sacred and mutual, being founded on reciprocity; and it would be absurd to allege, that the master is bound on his part, and the owners not bound on theirs: that a master engaged for a voyage, is like a servant indented for a certain time; and that the engagement or indenture cannot be dissolved, during the terms, but by mutual consent: that, this vessel was chartered to the freighter, who acquired by the charter-party a temporary property in her, and the owners had nothing to do with her for the time, the ship being under the same circumstances with a house leased for a term: that after the charter-party is signed, and the goods laden on board, the owners cannot discharge the master at their pleasure; as his good character and abilities might have been the inducement which led the freighter to make choice of that ship in preference: and, lastly, that if no instance can be found of a master's being forced upon the owners of a ship, neither can any authority be produced, giving the owners the arbitrary power of dismissing the master at pleasure, and without assigning sufficient cause.

[2] [Affirmed in 1 Dall. (1 U. S.) 49.]

HOPKINSON, J. After having carefully considered the arguments advanced, and the authorities cited in this cause, it appears to me unnecessary to pursue the whole tract of argument that hath been taken on this occasion. The decision of the cause rests solely on the nature of the contract between the owners of a ship and the captain they employ. And the terms or substance of such a contract is, in my opinion this, viz. If the master well and faithfully performs the duties of his station, the owners, on their part, are bound to pay the stipulated wages, and allow him all the customary privileges of his office. But it does not seem to be any part of the contract, that a master once engaged, shall be master for the voyage at all events. This might be extremely injurious to owners, on account of the very extensive powers a master hath over their property. And however hard it may appear that the master should be subject to the caprice of his owners in this respect, he must consider it as one of the unavoidable inconveniences of his occupation, and in cases of real injury apply to the laws of his country for redress. Much greater would the danger be to owners of vessels, and indeed to commerce in general, if the appointment of a master should be irrevocable for the voyage. Whatever good opinion an owner may have of the master, at the time of his appointment, he may find sufficient reason afterwards to change his mind, and yet not be able to produce legal proof of his defection or inability. Fidelity or infidelity before a service performed, is a matter of opinion only, and it would be an unreasonable hardship to compel an owner to continue what was originally a voluntary trust in the hands of a person of whom he may have found subsequent reasons to believe that he may prove either unfaithful or unskilful, although he may not be able to charge him with any positive offence: but I cannot see how this court can interfere to any effect. If the court should decree that the owners shall receive the libellant on board, as master for the voyage contracted for; have not the owners a power to sell their ship, to lay her up, or totally change the voyage, and so evade the decree? Or, if a master should refuse to go the voyage for which he engaged, can this court compel a specific performance of the duties of his office? The remedy in both cases must be in damages for a breach of contract, to which the common law is most competent. Let the bill be dismissed.

The libellant appealed from this judgment, and the cause was again fully argued before the judges of the high court of errors and appeals; but the libel was finally dismissed. [1 Dall. (1 U. S.) 49.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1867.[2]

COLLISION—FOG—BOTH VESSELS IN FAULT—WITNESSES.

1. There is a fog at night, within the meaning of the act of 29th April, 1864 [13 Stat. 60], requiring a horn to be sounded by sailing vessels, whenever the weather is so thick that the horn would be heard farther than the ordinary signal lights of the vessel could be clearly distinguished.

2. Where a steamer was running at least eight knots an hour on a calm foggy night and came suddenly on a schooner a little on the starboard bow, held, on the opinion of experts, that the steamer should have starboarded her helm, and having had time to do so was in fault for porting, and the damages were decreed to be divided, though the schooner was in fault for not sounding a fog-horn.

3. There is no objection to one party in a collision cause calling as witnesses persons who were on board the vessel of the other party.

Libel for damage caused the schooner Phoebe by the steamer Monticello, on the night of March 11, 1867, about twenty-six miles to the southward and eastward of Cape Lookout. The witnesses for the libellants deposed that they saw the mast-head and starboard side-lights of the steamer at a few minutes after ten o'clock, at a distance which they estimated at a mile, and about two points forward of their port beam. The crew of the schooner hailed the steamer, but she kept her course until close to the schooner, when an order was heard to port the helm, but they observed no change of course, and the claimants' steamer struck the schooner near the port fore-rigging and cut her down. The crew were saved by the steamer. It appeared that the schooner was close-hauled on the port tack, with a wind that barely gave her steerage way. The steamer was bound down the coast in a south-westerly direction, and was running at least eight knots, with one lookout near the bows. The lookout saw the red light of the schooner very near him and a little on his starboard bow, and reported to the mate on the bridge, who gave the order to port, which was obeyed, and the schooner had swung off to starboard one and a half or two points before she struck the Phoebe. Concerning the amount of haze or fog the evidence was conflicting.

C. T. & T. H. Russell, for libellants.

The steamer was going too fast. The place was a thoroughfare for ships and vessels of all kinds, and eight miles an hour was excessive speed: The Bay State, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 89; The St. Charles, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 108. There should have been a lookout on each bow on a vessel of this size. When the schooner was discovered the wrong order was given.

J. C. Dodge, for claimants.

The fault lies entirely with the schooner for not sounding a fog-horn. When we came suddenly upon her we did right, or if not, it was so late that we should be excused, the first fault having been on the other side.

LOWELL, District Judge. I am fully satisfied that whatever may be the truth in relation to the other matters, the steamer was in fault in porting her helm. The experts on both sides agree that the order should have been to starboard. It is said to be a general rule of navigation that when the vessel which is bound to give way sees a light close at hand on the port bow or directly ahead the helm should be put to port, but if on the starboard bow, the helm should be starboarded. Whether this be a general rule or not, it is manifestly a true rule for a case like this, where the red light of a sailing vessel is seen in a calm by a steamer going at least eight knots, because to clear her bows the steamer will require but a slight change, comparatively of only one point, as the experts say, to clear the steamer on that side, while it required three points on the other, the speed of the schooner counting for very little under the circumstances. I am fully satisfied, from all the evidence, that the steamer would have avoided the hull and probably even the head-gear of the Phoebe, if the mate had not unfortunately given the order to port, and insisted upon it, when some one, who, for aught he knew, he says, was the master, cried out to starboard. Nor can I find that the emergency was so sudden and extreme as to excuse such a mistake. The order to port which was heard on board the schooner was evidently the second order, which the mate says he gave very peremptorily when he heard some one crying to starboard, and it did not even then appear to the master of the schooner too late, if only the proper command had been given. From a consideration of what passed on board both vessels, and of the change of course which actually took place, I am convinced that there was ample time for this steamer, which was a quick steering vessel, to get out of the way, after seeing the schooner's signal.

It is said on behalf of the steamer, as showing fault on the other side, that the night was very thick and foggy, so that the lights of the schooner could be seen for only a few hundred feet, and that the schooner should have sounded a fog-horn, as required by the statute of April 29, 1864 (13 Stat. 60), c. 69, art. 10, which enacts that whenever there is a fog, the fog signals shall be carried and used.

The libellants contend that there was no such fog as is here referred to. They admit a haze, mist, or smoke, as it is variously termed by their witnesses, but say that the ordinary lights of a vessel could be seen a mile off. The claimants' witnesses represent a very much denser fog than this, and think a few hundred feet are the extent of the range of such lights at that time.

What is a fog such as the statute intends? Is it every haze, by day or night, of whatever density? To give the statute a reasonable interpretation we must suppose that its intent is to give to approaching vessels a warning which the fog would otherwise deprive them of. By day there must be fog enough to shut out the view of the sails or hull, or by night of the lights, within the range of the horn, whistle, or bell. It means that a safeguard of practical utility under the circumstances, should be provided. If it be entirely plain, upon the evidence, that the ordinary signals are sufficient and more efficacious than the horn could be, the horn will not be required. But a serious doubt upon this point must weigh against the vessel failing to comply with the statute. I do not consider it to be enough to aver and prove that the lights might be seen in time to avoid serious danger; but where it is evident that the fog signal could not have been so useful as the ordinary signal, it need not be used. Thus if the lights could be plainly and easily made out at a mile, and the fog-horn could not be heard at a third or a quarter of that distance, I cannot suppose that such a state of the atmosphere would amount to a fog in the sense of the law. It is to guard against some danger which the fog would or might cause, and from which the horn might possibly guard, that it is to be blown.

Before considering the state of the weather, I may dispose of one defence set up by the schooner, that her hail was equivalent to the horn. The evidence does not satisfy me that the fact is so, and it would require very strong evidence to outweigh the expressed legislative opinion that the other signal is the better.

Coming to the question of fact, it is found that the schooner's men, with a rather suspicious unanimity, give it as their opinion that a vessel's lights could be seen a mile off; and that they did see the steamer's lights at that distance. The estimates which sailors make of time and distance on such occasions are notoriously untrustworthy, not so much from any wilful misstatement, as from the great difficulty of arriving at satisfactory conclusions in their own minds, as well as an inability to express their precise meaning. The same witness will often give these measurements differently in different parts of his evidence. Looking carefully at what they did on board the schooner, I am unable to account for the six or seven minutes which would elapse before the steamer could make a mile. They began to shout very soon after they saw the other vessel, and yet two of the men who were roused by the shouts had not reached the deck when the vessels came together. They think they shouted for a considerable time, but they were not heard on board the steamer until about the time the light was seen, and then they were heard without difficulty on that calm night, and the steamer's second order to port was heard by them. On a clear night the steamer's mast-head light ought to be visible at a distance of at least five miles, if she had the regulation lights, as it is proved she had; but it appears to have broken upon the schooner's crew suddenly, three of them seeing it at once, and one likening it to a star, at the distance which they now estimate at a mile. I think that estimate may probably be influenced by the suspense and anxiety which made the time seem very long before their hail was observed. It is a very delicate and difficult task to decide such a question as this upon written testimony; and I have endeavored to bring it to the test of the various circumstances given in evidence. One of these, appealed to on both sides, is the distance at which the lights of the steamer were actually seen, after the collision, by the men on the wreck; but I have not been able to satisfy myself what that distance was. I can only say that I do not think it is proved to have been any thing like a mile.

There are three witnesses who stand in a peculiar relation to the case. They are steamer's men, called and examined on behalf of the schooner. The fact that they are used on that side has been severely commented upon, and some remarks of Dr. Lushington were read, in which that learned judge disparages affidavits taken from the hostile camp, as he expresses it. Any thing like tampering with witnesses would deserve and would receive the sternest reprehension of the court, but the case shows nothing of that sort; and it is to be remembered that we are not presented with ex parte affidavits, as in the case cited, but with full examination and cross-examination which develop the history of their engagement as witnesses and show nothing improper. These three witnesses give their evidence with moderation and with no obvious bias, and I am disposed to rely a good deal upon their statement of the weather. They all say that it was foggy. In their estimates of how far the running lights of a vessel could be seen they differ, and had evidently not concerted their answers; one says two hundred and fifty yards; one, twice the steamer's length, which would be some thing over two hundred yards; the third gives two estimates, the largest of which is a quarter of a mile. The best judgment I have been able to form upon all the evidence is, that there was a fog, which, though not as dense as many others, was enough so to render the sounding of the fog-horn a proper precaution. Upon the evidence, such a signal might probably, on a calm night like this, have been heard on board the steamer at the distance of half a mile, and I am not satisfied that with ordinary vigilance the schooner's lights would have been clearly distinguishable at that distance. This opinion is founded upon the direct statements of the steamer's crew, but especially of those three whom the libellants called; and upon the facts that the lights of neither vessel were seen at any considerable distance from the other, that the fog was a sea fog from the north-east, and the other circumstances above referred to.

Both parties were in fault, and it is impossible to say that either fault was the sole cause of the collision. Damages to be divided.

This decree was affirmed on appeal, October term, 1870; and upon the question of fault in the steamer, the court added to the reasons given in the district court, that she had no right to go so fast in a fog as to be unable to stop or reverse, if necessary, within the time shown to have been at her command in this case. [This was a libel for salvage by John H. Geiger and others against the brig Montserat and cargo.]

Miner Bethel, for libellants.

S. I. Douglas, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. The libel, answer and proofs, in the case show that this brig laden with a cargo of tobacco, flour and staves, was aground on a rocky bottom, at the northwestern end of the Marquis Keys, in a dangerous situation, lying in 9 feet of water, drawing 11 feet; that the libellants, 23 in number, in three vessels, hearing, at this place, through the master, who arrived here in his boat, of the brig's disaster, proceeded to her, and found her in the situation described. They were employed by the master to assist in relieving her. The libellants carried out a heavy anchor astern, lightened the brig of between 50 and 60 tons weight of the cargo, and heaved her off the bottom, and brought her to this port. They were employed in this service three days. The brig has been appraised at $700, and the cargo at $18,000, making the total value of vessel and cargo $18,700. Under the circumstances, I think that one sixth of the value, or $3,116, is a reasonable salvage, $3,000 of which is to be paid by the cargo, and $116 by the vessel. This sum will make the men's shares a little less than $50.

There are other features in the history of this case to which it is necessary to advert. It appears from the bills of lading, that the cargo consists of 102 hhds. of tobacco, shipped at New Orleans by Messrs. Castillo and Harispe, and consigned to Don Jose Ayarza, in Bilboa, Spain; 200 bbls. flour, shipped by the same, consigned to B. Beguirie & Co., Bordeaux, France; 13,200 staves, shipped by Paul Inge Fils & Co., consigned to order; and one corn-sheller, shipped by J. M. Basnaldo & Co. consigned to Don Pablo De Epulza in Bilbca. From the testimony of the mate, corroborated by that of the master, it further appears that the brig sailed on her voyage from New Orleans, on the 23rd of last March; that the second day out, the vessel began to leak (the master says during a heavy S. E. gale), which induced the master, on the remonstrance of the crew to make for the nearest port. It further appears from the testimony of the mate, fully corroborated by that of the master, that when within 18 miles of this port, in good weather, in the day time, with land in plain sight, and with a fair wind to keep off the shore and to come to this place, the brig was pointed towards the land, and run aground, in the place where the libellants found her. She was run aground, the master says, to save the cargo. It does not appear that the vessel leaked much while ashore, and probably not much injured while aground, as the weather was good; nor does it appear that she leaked much, if any, while being brought into this port, in charge of the libellants. The libellants do not allege that she leaked, or that they had occasion to pump her, which they would have been likely to aver had the fact been so in order to enhance the value of their services; nor does it appear, that she has leaked since her arrival in port more than vessels usually do. The cargo has been unladen, and the bottom tier of the hhds. of tobacco is found to have been slightly wetted, on the under side. Surveyors appointed by the court to examine and report the condition and value of the vessel report that they find the forward ends of her deck plank under the quick work decayed; quick work in many places decayed; quick work at break of deck, the ends of the plank, decayed; her top throughout chafed, and seams open; deck worn out, and from appearance leaks badly. On boring her, on both sides, near the floor heads, they found the timbers somewhat decayed, but generally good for a vessel of her age; her tree-nails throughout much decayed; and her fastenings rusted out; chain bolts very much worn and rusted. They report, that they do not consider her seaworthy, or in condition to carry a cargo to any port, coastwise or foreign, without large repairs; that her present value is $700; and that it would cost $3,000 to put her in a condition to carry a cargo to a foreign port; and that she would not sell, when repaired, for the cost of repairs. The surveyors did not see the bottom of the vessel, and do not appear to have made any report upon any injuries she may have sustained while aground.

Upon this statement of facts, it seems impossible to conceive that this master did not know that, at the time he took this cargo in and sailed from New Orleans, the vessel was in an unfit and unseaworthy condition to carry her cargo to its port of destination; but, however unseaworthy the vessel was, it does not appear to have leaked so badly as to have made it necessary to run the vessel aground, within 18 miles of this port, in good weather, and with a fair wind into port, in order to save the cargo. According to the master's account he must have sailed some four or five hundred miles after the leak commenced before she was run ashore, during all which time he kept the leak down.

The question arises, what disposition ought the court to make of the brig and cargo? They have both been attached by the marshal, and are in custody of the court, on libel for salvage. The master claims them virtuti officii for and on account of whom it may concern, and there is no person before the court to controvert his claim. He is competent in law, as the agent of whoever may be concerned, to make the claim. In ordinary cases, the property or its proceeds, upon satisfaction of the demand for which it was arrested, is restored to the claimants by order of the court, granted as a matter of course. But it is not restored without such order, unless by the marshal, under the act of the 3rd of March 1847 [9 Stat. 181]. To say nothing touching the restoration of the vessel, the owner of which appointed the master, and resides in this country, and has an opportunity to take any measures he may think proper to protect his own interests, is it the duty of the court, in the present case, and under the facts stated, and at the present time, to make an order to restore the cargo to the master, without imposing such conditions as will afford some assurance that the owners or underwriters will, in the end, probably receive it? I think it is not its duty to make such order. On the contrary, I think it is its duty, in the exercise of a sound discretion for the furtherance of justice, to postpone making any order for the delivery of this cargo to the master, until the owners in Spain and France have had full time allowed them to intervene in the cause in person, or by a special agent, and present their bills of lading, and claim their goods, unless the master shall choose to charter another vessel, and reship the goods direct to the original port of destination, which I think it is his duty to do, if he can procure a vessel in this port or in Narana on reasonable terms.

Upon payment of the salvage and expenses, which can be raised upon a respondentia bond, and upon a reshipment of the goods, and bills of lading being signed by the new master to deliver them, in Bilboa and Bordeaux, to the consignees, the order of restitution may be made and the custody of the marshal be withdrawn. Otherwise, I think the cargo should remain in store, and the owners advised of the facts; or if it is likely to deteriorate much in value on account of its being detained in store several months, in this climate, I think it should be sold, and the proceeds retained in the registry of the court to await the orders of the consignees or owners upon the production of their bills of lading. ADMIRALTY — PRIZE CAPTURE — SALE BY CAPTOR ON LAND.

Sale on land in the ports of the United States cannot be prevented by their courts of admiralty, in cases of lawful capture on the high seas, by French privateers duly commissioned.

[This was a libel by Benjamin Moodie, British consul, against the ship Amity and Isaac Hammond.]

BEE, District Judge. This case is one of a new impression. The libel admits the capture of the Amity on the high seas, by a vessel under the flag of the French republic. There is no allegation that this vessel has been fitted, or her force increased within the United States, contrary to the laws of neutrality. It is not alleged that the prize was captured within the jurisdictional limits of the United States. Upon these grounds alone has this court assumed jurisdiction, in cases of capture by French privateers, where the prizes have been brought infra praesidia of this country. In all other cases the 17th article of the treaty with France is conclusive upon the subject of their prizes brought into our ports; and the point has been fully settled by several appeals to the supreme court of this country. The only allegation in the libel, on which to found a claim for the interference of the court, is a sale of the prize on land, as being contrary to the 24th article of the treaty with Great Britain. In support of this it is contended that by the 9th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 76], this court has jurisdiction in all cases arising on the high seas, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. That the original capture having been on the high seas, the court has cognizance of the original question, and, therefore of all its consequences; of which this intended sale is one. That the third article of the constitution of the United States extends the judicial power to all cases arising under treaties made, or to be made. This court has cognizance of all such points of admiralty and maritime nature, provided they may be judged of by any court of the United States.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

But the treaty with France excludes all jurisdiction on our part, in cases like the present. The commission under which this prize was made, has been exhibited in court, as that treaty provides. It is unobjectionable; and the two grounds before mentioned have not, nor can be, taken. I have, therefore, no authority over the original question in this cause, and none over any of its consequences. As to the cases from Dougl. 582, 583, they do not apply here. I am clearly of opinion that this court has no jurisdiction in this instance; and I dismiss the libel with costs.

NEUTRALITY LAWS—EQUIPMENT—WHAT EVIDENCE TO BE FIRST TAKEN.

1. What equipments in our ports amount to a breach of neutrality.

[Criticised in Stoughton v. Taylor, Case No. 13,502.]

2. Evidence to acquit or condemn must in the first instance come from the vessel taken, the persons on board, and the examination on oath of the master and other officers.

In admiralty.

BEE, District Judge. The cause before the court, and in which I am now about to pronounce my decree, is a cause of considerable importance, as well with respect to the circumstances of the case, as the value of the property. It will not be necessary for me to recite at length the whole of the pleadings, and arguments that have been adduced. The facts stated in the libel, are partly admitted, and partly denied. The capture of the Betty Carthcart, on the high seas, out of the jurisdictional limits of the United States, and the property of the vessel and cargo as belonging to British subjects, are admitted on all hands. It is admitted also, that at the time of the arrival of the Citizen of Marseilles, in Philadelphia, she was an armed ship, and had a commission to cruize against the enemies of France. An exception was taken to the commission on two grounds: 1. That all the commissions issued by Santhonax and Polverel, had been recalled. 2. That the certificate from Mr. Petry, the consul at Philadelphia, was only conditional. The only points, then, which it is necessary for me to investigate, are: 1. Whether the force of this vessel was increased and augmented within the limits of the United States. 2. Whether such increase is a breach of the laws of neutrality and nations: and 3. What is required by the laws of neutrality in such cases, or whether the 17th article of the treaty is a suspension thereof as to the United States.

On the first part, viz. whether the force of the Citizen of Marseilles was increased and augmented within the United States. A number of witnesses have been examined, and a variety of other evidences adduced. The proofs in this cause have been very properly divided by one of the counsel, into four classes or sets. I will, therefore, consider them in that order also: The proofs which relate to the vessel at Cape François, before she sailed for Philadelphia. 2. Those which relate to her whilst at Philadelphia. 3. Those after she left the city, and previous to her going to sea. 4. Those immediately after she got to sea.

To the first point, Mr. Boisseau only speaks of her as an armed vessel generally, to the month of June 1793, but does not specify any particulars. W. Charrie, who was on board two days, about this period, speaks of her as an armed vessel, with ten ports on each side, and guns in them, and also as having guns in her hold—but no particular number. These are the only witnesses to this point.

If we proceed now to her appearance at Philadelphia, we find a contrariety of evidence. General Stewart, in his letter to the collector, 3d of September, 1794, mentions her as having at her arrival sixteen nine, and ten six pounders; but he does not say whether they were mounted or not. He says she will only mount twelve guns at going out, and carry the others in her hold. In his letter to the secretary at war, dated the 14th October, 1794, he refers to the above, and also states the different reports of Mr. Milnor, one of the deputy inspectors of the port, to him. The first, on the 30th of September, 1793. He adds, that the ship arrived last autumn, with sixteen nine, and ten six pounders, but will only mount twelve guns, which she brought in that situation—the others she is to carry in her hold. On the 14th of October, General Stewart visited her again, and says he finds no addition to the armament, she was reported, and had, on her arrival, viz. ten six pounders on her main deck, and two on her quarter deck, and the rest of the guns in the hold. No new ports had been opened since her arrival. General Stewart does not say who reported her thus on her arrival. It could not be Mr. Milnor, for he, on the 14th of October, in his report, says, "Having examined the ship called the Citizen of Marseilles, on her arrival in port, I again examined her this day, and find no addition to her armament, &c." The same number of guns are mentioned, that she had on her arrival. His other certificate which appears from General Stewart's letter to be dated on the 30th of September, 1793, and made to him, of the then actual armament of the ship that day, the day of her arrival—says—"boarded the privateer ship the Citizen of Marseilles, commanded by Planche, twelve six pounders mounted and three not mounted, with other warlike apparatus—forty-six men." By comparing the dates and extracts in this exhibit, it plainly appears there is some mistake amongst the officers at that port. Mr. Milnor, on the 30th of September, 1793, the day she arrived, boarded her, and says she had twelve six pounders mounted, and three not mounted: he also visited her on the 14th of October 1794, and found no addition to her armament, the same number of guns being mounted. This evidence from the report of the officers of the port, clearly proves, that the ship, on her arrival, had only twelve guns mounted—how many others there were on board not mounted, must be left to the officers to settle, as I cannot do it from the evidence adduced. Mr. Harrison also fixed to ten on her main deck, and two or four on her quarter deck. Michael Williams says, she had but five of a side on her main deck, and two on her quarter deck. John Grenion, who sailed in the vessel from the Cape to Philadelphia, says she had only five of a side on the main deck, and one on each side on the quarter deck, and that there were no more port holes open than guns. Captain Montgomery, of the revenue cutter, who saw her at a distance at her first arrival, supposed her to have ten ports of a side, but whether all real, or some painted, he could not say. From the whole of this evidence, then, it clearly appears to me, that the ship, at her arrival, had only twelve guns mounted, and none in her hold. If we now advert to the number of ports which were open either at her arrival, or at her leaving the port of Philadelphia; we find she had the same number as of guns mounted. All the evidences who were near her, swear positively, that there were none abaft the main chains—though several say the ports were framed within, but planked over on the outside. Harrison's evidence is conclusive—because he mentions his application to the governor for permission to open more ports, which was refused; and Captain Chabert's reply that he did not wish to go contrary to the laws of the country, and that as he had carpenters of his own, he could open them elsewhere, and at another place, is fully sufficient to fix this point.

The third class of evidence, is such as relates to the vessel after her leaving the city, and previous to her proceeding to sea. And from a careful revision of this it does appear, that a number of ports were opened, and guns mounted in the river Delaware. Quin swears positively to fourteen. Powel says there were three carpenters at work to cut the ports through, and fit them—himself, Stevenson and another; and that each took one for a day's work. It could not therefore take more than five days to effect this, and from the latter end of October to the 4th of November, there was sufficient time to complete it. The evidence of these two witnesses has been impeached in several particulars, but it really appears to me, that there are so many proofs and circumstances stated, that corroborate their testimony to most of the points they speak of, that there is not sufficient ground for me to repel the evidence they have given in toto. The witnesses who prove the increase of force in the river, are Quin, who says she mounted twenty-eight guns—Captain Montgomery says twenty-six or twenty-eight. Mr. Kevan says, a whole tier fore and aft. All then speak of the vessel down the river, and before she went to sea.

The fourth and last class is that relative to her, immediately after her going to sea. One of the counsel for the claimant objected to the testimony of all the witnesses on board the prize, as being interested, and of course incompetent, but he could not be serious in this, because the constant uniform practice of the civil law courts has been to admit such evidence to certain points. In Collectanea Juridica (page 135), is the famous case so often resorted to as fixing the law. In this case, it is expressly laid down, that the evidence to acquit or condemn, must, in the first instance, come from the vessel taken, the persons on board, and the examination on oath of the master and other officers. The evidence they all give is reducible to two points. 1st. The appearance and force of the ship both as to guns and men. 2d. The intelligence obtained from the crew. As to the last, I think little attention should be paid to the chit chat on board one of these privateers; and very frequently the witnesses do not understand the language they hear spoken, and report from second hand: but they certainly are competent witnesses as to the number of guns and crew that were on board at the time of the capture; and in this they all agree, that she mounted twenty-eight guns, when she took the Den Onzekeren, out of which she took two guns to make thirty, and several of them say, she could mount thirty-four guns, having ports cut for that number. Captain Raymon Sanchez, captain of the brig Dichoso, taken on the 6th of November, two days after the vessel left the Delaware, says she mounted twenty-eight. Lemuel Janson, of the Den Onzekeren, says she mounted twenty-eight guns. Jacob Vix, a sailor on board the Dutch ship, says the same. John Hallrick, seaman on board the Betty Carthcart, says the same. Charles M'Donald, mate of this ship, says she had twenty-eight guns on the 11th of November, when they took him. Hans Evertson, mate of the Den Onzekeren, taken the 16th of November, says she had then twenty-eight guns mounted. Adrianus Pappagaay, the doctor of the Dutch ship, says she had twenty-eight guns. Here then is such concurrent testimony of the increased force of this vessel, that it is impossible not to admit it; and if admitted, it carries with it the most unequivocal proof that the ship the Citizen of Marseilles, did increase her force of guns mounted, and prepared for use within the territory of the United States:—There was no positive proof as to the new gun carriages being actually carried on board; neither was there any of their being on board when she first arrived. Mr. Harrison mentions the repairing of some, and where old ones were rotten the replacing them. If this was solely for those guns that were actually mounted at her arrival, I see nothing against it. It could not be called an augmentation of her force—neither is there any evidence sufficient to convince my mind that the crew of the Citizen of Marseilles, at her going out was increased, or if increased, in any way that could be said to infringe our neutrality. Though some of the evidences say they were not all native Frenchmen from their language, yet they all agree that the strength of the crew were so, the others were a mixture, there is no proof of any one American citizen being on board, unless Quin was; as to other nations, I know of no right we have to control their seamen. The 27th article of our treaty with Holland [8 Stat. 48], which, by the 3d article of the treaty with France [Id. 14], in my opinion is confirmed to them also, admits the carrying away seamen or other natives or inhabitants of the respective nations on board of any of their vessels, whether of merchandise or war.

From a careful review of the evidence produced in this cause, it appears clearly to me that the ship Citizen of Marseilles, at her arrival in Philadelphia, mounted only twelve guns, and had others, but the precise number is not ascertained, in her hold: that at the time of her leaving the river, she had twenty-six or twenty-eight mounted: that Captain Chabert having been refused permission to open new ports in Philadelphia, and declaring he did not wish to infringe the laws, and having afterwards done so within the territories of the United States, could not and does not plead ignorance as an excuse. Whatever he did was with his eyes open, and being forewarned, he must abide the consequences.

It remains now for me to inquire into the law arising from the foregoing facts, and the power and duty of this court thereupon. There cannot be a doubt that if a prosecution was instituted against Captain Chabert, or any of the persons concerned in increasing, augmenting, or procuring to be increased or augmented, the force of the vessel, under the act of June 5, 1794 [1 Stat. 383], but that a conviction must follow. There a penalty of fine and imprisonment is declared, as a punishment for a breach of the sovereignty and neutrality of the United States, and this by a municipal law of our own: but what does the law of nations require further? I have in the course of the last summer, delivered my opinion on this question so fully in this court, that I need only now repeat some part of the law then laid down. In the case of Janson v. Talbot [unreported], I stated that this court, by the law of nations, has jurisdiction over captures made by foreign vessels of war, of the vessels of any other nation, with whom they are at war, provided such vessels were equipped here, in breach of our sovereignty and neutrality, and the prizes are brought infra praesidia of this country. By the law of nations, no foreign power, its subjects or citizens, has any right to erect castles, enlist troops, or equip vessels of war in the territory or ports of another. Such acts are breaches of neutrality, and may be punished by seizing the persons and property of the offenders. Vessels of war so equipped, are illegal ab origine, and no prizes they make will be legal as to the offended power, if brought infra praesidia. The seizure and restoration of such prizes are what the laws of neutrality justly claim. You must either permit both parties to equip in your ports, or neither. Should either equip without your consent, the least you can do, is to divest them of the prizes they may have thus illegally taken, and restore them to the other party, or else permit them to equip also. This cause and this decree were submitted to the circuit court in October last, and there affirmed. An appeal to the supreme court is still undetermined,[2] but until this opinion is overruled by that tribunal, I hold myself bound to consider it as a law. I gave a like decision lately, in the case of British Consul v. The Nancy [Case No. 1,898], from a full conviction that the principles I laid down formerly, were founded on the rules of propriety and the law of nations.

NEUTRALITY LAWS—EQUIPMENT OF WAR VESSEL—REPAIRING.

Equipment for war in a neutral port does not take place merely by alteration of two ports in repairing the waist of a vessel previously armed.

In admiralty.

BEE, District Judge. The cause now before the court is briefly this. The schooner Port-de-Paix, duly commissioned by General Laveaux, and owned altogether by Frenchmen, captured on the 27th of January last (1795) on the high seas, without the jurisdictional limits of the United States, the ship Brothers, belonging to a subject of his Britannic majesty. The prize, upon her arrival in this port, was, with her cargo, libelled by the British consul, Mr. [Benjamin] Moodie; who, among other causes, alleges that the privateer was originally fitted out in the port of Charleston, or augmented in her warlike

2 [Since reported in 3 Dall. (3 U. S.) 133.]

force, contrary to the act of congress and law of neutrality and nations. He, therefore, claims restitution of the captured vessel. The claimants on oath deny that the privateer was originally fitted, armed, or manned within any of the ports of the United States; or that she received therein any augmentation or addition, solely applicable to purposes of war. They produce a copy of their commission from General Laveaux, and plead the 17th article of the treaty with France in bar to the interference of this court in this cause. Several exhibits have been filed to shew that the captured vessel and cargo are British property; and one exhibit proves that the privateer was formerly an armed vessel in the service of the king of Spain, and then mounted eighteen guns. That she was captured by the Montagne French privateer and brought as prize into this port, from whence she afterwards departed with fewer guns than she had on her coming in. After which she was commissioned and manned at Port-de-Paix. It was agreed between the parties, the pleadings being completed, that the evidence taken by me in this court in November last, in the case of The Courier [Case No. 3,283] captured by the same privateer and libelled here, should be received as evidence in this cause also. I have already, by my decree in the case of The Courier, declared my opinion of this privateer; but have reconsidered the evidence with great care. Messrs. Wallace, Libby, Williams, Carpenter, Weyman, and the collector, all agree that she was a complete privateer when she first arrived here. She had then fourteen guns on her main deck, two cohorns forward, and swivels on her quarter deck. They also agree that she received no augmentation of force here. She had been much injured in her engagement with La Montagne, and was compelled to take off her quarter deck. She then went to sea, returned dismasted, and took a new mast. But none of the witnesses saw any additional equipments. Ingram, who worked on her says, she had her quarter deck taken down, her waist repaired, and two ports cut therein. That she was an armed vessel when she arrived, and was repaired as a privateer. The question then is wholly as to the cutting of two new ports, when her waist was repaired. This arises out of Ingram's testimony, which is at variance with that of Williams, Libby, and Carpenter, and positively contradicted by the oath of the claimants, who swear that the repairs she received in this port were necessary to her safety and sailing, but not at all applicable to war. They say that she actually went to sea with fewer guns than she had when she arrived as prize. Admitting then, for the sake of reconciling Ingram's testimony with that of all the other witnesses, and with this oath of the claimants, that two of her ports in the waist were altered, this will not amount to any additional equipments; nor can it be considered as a breach of neutrality. If a prosecution had been instituted under the act of the 5th of June, 1794 [1 Stat. 383], no forfeiture could have been adjudged for so trifling an alteration. Upon the whole, I retain my former opinion, and that upon mature deliberation. I therefore admit the relevancy of the plea in bar, and decree that the libel be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 9,744.

MOODIE v. The HARRIET.

[Bee, 128.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1798.

SALVAGE—RECAPTURE—RANSOMED SHIP—PORT OF DESTINATION.

Salvage allowed upon recapture of a ransomed ship; the ransom bill declaring that the sum agreed upon therein should only be payable upon the arrival of the vessel at her port of destination, where she never arrived.

This is a suit instituted [by Benjamin Moodie] for salvage in recapturing the brig Harriet on the high seas on the 26th of October, 1798. It appears, from the pleadings and proofs before the court, that this brig belonged to Tunno and Cox, and Miller and Robertson, merchants of this city. That she sailed on the 8th day of October last from a Spanish port on the south side of the island of Cuba, bound to the Havanna. That, two days after, she was taken, in sight of the island, by a French privateer called the Betsey; another privateer being in company. That these privateers, finding the brig had no cargo on board, were preparing to set her on fire; whereupon the captain (Lightbourne) proposed to ransom her. This being agreed to, he drew an order, on a house in the Havanna, for two thousand dollars, the sum fixed; which order was payable upon the arrival of the brig at the Havanna, and was in nature of a ransom bill. Upon signature of this paper, the vessel was suffered to proceed on her voyage, Captain Lightbourne being detained on board one of the privateers as a hostage. A Frenchman, as prizemaster, and two American seamen were sent on board from the capturing vessels; but they did not interfere in the management of the vessel, leaving this wholly to the mate, who took the command, and made the usual entries in the logbook. Some days after this they fell in with an American armed brig, who, finding that the Harriet had been taken and ransomed, left her. Sixteen days after her first capture (26th of October) she was met with by a British privateer, of New-Providence, who took possession of her as a recaptured vessel, put on board a prizemaster and crew, and ordered her to the port of Nassau. They endeavoured to reach that place, but, being prevented by bad weather and contrary winds, proceeded to Charleston, and arrived here on the 19th November last.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Thomas Bee, District Judge.]

BEE, District Judge. The only question for the court to decide is, whether, under the circumstances of this case, the actors are entitled to any, and what, salvage. It is contended on the part of the owners, that, if the vessels had been carried into a British port, no salvage would have been allowed, because she had been previously ransomed, and the ransom bill not recovered. The argument appeared, at first, to have weight; but, upon looking into cases partly resembling this, and considering the nature of the ransom bill produced in the cause, I think the inference will not hold. The ransom bill in this case expresses that two thousand dollars shall be paid upon the arrival of the brig at the Havanna. But the recapture prevented her arrival there; of course, the obligation became void: and, though they had the captain as a hostage, yet no suit could have been maintained on that bill, in any civilized country; because the event in which alone the payment was expressed to be due, never took place. What prevented it? The recapture by the British privateer. This saved the ransom to the owners. And the French captor seems to have been of that opinion, for the hostage was discharged, and the ransom bill with him.

It was contended that, if the brig had arrived at the Havanna, she would have been restored, on the ground of having been taken within the jurisdictional limits of the island. This might have been the case; but the consideration, I believe, would not have availed, if she had been carried into a British port. They would have in that event, considered nothing more than the original capture by their enemy, and subsequent recapture by their subjects. And if this court should go into an investigation of the point relied on, it would involve the question of prize, or no prize. But it is laid down in Doug. 627, that though the contract of ransom happen to be connected, in point of time, with the capture as prize, it does not necessarily arise out of it, but is, in truth, a mere simple contract of sale between individuals, who at the time, and for the purpose, of contract are not considered as being the subjects of hostile nations: on which principle was decided the case, in 3 Burrows, of Record and Bettingham. There, though war still subsisted, and though the hostage had died in captivity, the action was maintained by an alien enemy against a subject of Great Britain; and this decree, Lord Mansfield says, was notorious over all Europe. But though this be law where the ransom bill is not recaptured, yet the case in Douglas, resting chiefly upon the authority of Valin, and other foreign writers, proves clearly that the recapture of the ransom bill puts an end to the claim of the first captor. In the case before me, the vessel, on the safe arrival of which at the Havanna, the ransom bill was due, has been recaptured. This is certainly equivalent to a recapture of the bill itself, and clearly extinguishes the claim of the original captors. So far the recaptors are entitled to salvage.

The remaining part of the question is what the amount of that salvage shall be. From several decrees of British admiralty courts during the present contest, I find that one eighth has been a usual allowance to captors. In the case of the money taken out of the Grand Sachem, the admiralty court at Antigua decreed restitution to the original owners, upon proof of property; and reserved an eighth for salvage to the recaptors. This proportion is also observed by the court of admiralty in England, as appears from Doug. 624.

Upon the strength of these authorities, which seem to me fully applicable to the case before me, I decree to the recaptors one eighth, amounting to two hundred and fifty dollars, with costs of suit.

PATENTS—SEVERAL IMPROVEMENTS IN ONE PATENT—SUMMARY—INFRINGEMENT OF PART.

1. Where a patent is for several improvements in a machine, and each improvement is summed up in the patent as the invention of the patentee, he is bound by his summary, and if any one of the improvements is found not to be new, his patent is void.

Case [against Jonathan Fiske and others] for an infringement of certain patent rights, granted to the plaintiff [Paul Moody]. There were two counts on two distinct patents in the declaration, but the first was the only one relied on at the trial, being on a patent for "an improvement on the double speeder for roping cotton," &c. The cause was tried on the general issue. The patent was dated the 3d of April, 1819, and the specification annexed to it, contained a very minute description of the double speeder as improved by the plaintiff, under distinct articles. In the first article the plaintiff states, "The first part of my invention is a new position of the rollers," which he then proceeds to describe. In the sixteenth article the plaintiff sums up his improvements in the following terms: "The above description exhibits all my improvements in the roping machine for roping cotton, whether called a double speeder or by any other name. The parts which I claim as new, and as my invention, are the following: 1st. The position of the rollers. 2d. The two upper cones with all the mechanism, and motions connected with or dependent on them. 3d. The method of moving the belt on the lower cones, and that of communicating motion from the lower driven cone to the spindles, and all the mechanism and method of communicating motion from the upper driven cone to the arbors or axes of the perpetual or endless screws and perpendicular racks, which raise and lower the spindle rail; but I do not claim the said racks and screws, as these as well as the common heart wheels have each before been, or may be used, for the same purpose, and either may be applied to my improvement. 5th. The method and machinery by which the said motion of the spindle rail is changed from an ascending to a descending movement, and the manner of connecting the same with the wagon carriage. 6th. The said wagon, wagon carriage, gallows frame, catch wheels, the cycloid or cycloidal cam, slides, lever, and pully shaft, which raise the belts on the upper cones, and all the similar parts which raise the belts on the lower cones (except the cycloid or cycloidal cam) with all the parts, movements and mechanism connected with the same. 7th. The flier tubes and methods of applying and using the same. 8th. The rotary motion of the cams, and the intermediate gear work and machinery which produces it." The seventeenth article then proceeds: "The machine referred to, and from which the description of my improved double speeder is made, as above set forth, has twenty spindles, and produces roping of a convenient size and twist, for being afterwards spun into a certain kind of thread or yarn, but I also contemplate the nature and principles of my said invention, as applicable to any machine for the like purpose, whether it has more or less spindles, or made to give a greater or less degree of twist. And I do not consider my said invention as confined to any particular form, position, kind of material, degree of velocity, shape, magnitude, or position of the several parts, but the same may be applied to any machine made of iron, brass, copper, or other suitable metal or material; and all the parts above described and set forth, may be extremely varied to obtain the object for which similar machines have been, are, or may be, used or employed. The position of the rollers, which I consider as an important improvement, may be applied to any machine for spinning as well as for roping. and I have applied it to an improved spinning and filling frame, a description and drawing of which I have prepared for procuring a patent."

The defence at the trial turned mainly on two points: 1st. That the machines used by the defendants were not identical with those of the plaintiff. 2d. That part of the improvements claimed by the plaintiff were known before, and so the patent was broader than the invention, and void. The counsel for the defendants contended on these points, following the enumeration of the improvements in the 16th article of the patent: 1st. That the position of the rollers was not new. 2d. That the plaintiff had no right to the two upper cones, they not being his invention. And as to the machinery connected with them, it was not used by the defendants. 3d. That the method of moving the belt of the lower cones, and the mechanism connected with it, were not used by the defendants. 4th. That the method of communicating motion from the upper driven cone to the arbors or axes, of the perpetual or endless screws, and perpendicular racks, &c. were not used by the defendants. The same answer was given to the 5th, 6th, and 7th improvement, specified in the 16th article. 8th. That the rotary motion of the cones and the intermediate gear work and machinery, were not new. The proof in the cause being very strong, that the position of the rollers was not new, two questions arose: 1st. Whether the plaintiff was concluded by the summing up in his patent, from contending, that the position of the rollers was not a substantial part of his invention, or was not per se patentable. 2d. If not so precluded, and if the patent was not void, whether the defendants were not liable in this action, if they used any one of the plaintiff's improvements, although the proof should be satisfactory that they did not use all the improvements.

Gordon & Webster, for plaintiff.
G. Sullivan, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon the last point there has hitherto been considerable difficulty in my mind. But after a good deal of reflection on it, I have come to the result, that where the plaintiff claims, as in this case, several distinct and independent improvements in the same machine, and procures a patent for them in the aggregate, he is entitled to recover against any person who shall use any one of the improvements so patented, notwithstanding there has been no violation of the other improvements. In such a case, the patent goes for the whole of the improvements, and if each be new, and be claimed distinctly in the patent, as such, there does not seem any good reason why the party who pirates any part of the invention, should not be liable in damages. Take the case of a copy right. It has never been supposed, that in order to maintain an action, the whole book should be pirated. It has been adjudged sufficient, if a considerable part of the book be pirated, so that such part be that of which the plaintiff is truly and substantially the author. Cary v. Longman, 1 East, 358, and cases there cited. To be sure, a mere extract would not be piracy; but if the substance of the work be taken, or so large a portion of it as makes it a substitute for the original, and materially injures the literary property of the author, it has been thought to be actionable. Roworth v. Wilkes, 1 Camp. 94. There is no doubt, that by the law of England, a party who pirates any part of the invention of the patentee, is liable in damages, notwithstanding he has not violated the whole. I say pirates any part of the invention, for any person may lawfully use any machinery, combined with the patentee's invention, which he does not claim as new, or which, if so claimed, has been previously known and used. This is the doctrine in Bovill v. Moore, 2 Marsh. 211; Davies, Pat. Cas. 361, which was an action for the violation of a patent "for a machine for the manufactury of bobbin lace or twist net, similar to, and resembling the Buckinghamshire lace net, and French lace net, as made by the hand with bobbins on pillows." Lord Chief Justice Gibbs there said, "We must consider what the patent proposes to give to the patentee, and what privileges he would possess under the patent. Now the patentee is entitled to the sole use of this machine, and whoever imitates it, either in whole or in part, is subject to an action at the suit of the patentee." The defendants had used the invention in part, but obtained a verdict upon the ground that the plaintiff had not invented the whole machine, but had only made improvements in it, the combination having existed up to a certain point before, and therefore his patent was void as covering more than his invention. It may be, that the decisions have turned upon the peculiar language of the English patents, for in all the precedents which I have seen, the patent gives the exclusive right of the whole invention, and prohibits all other persons, "directly and indirectly, to make, use, or put in practice, the said invention, or any part of the same, &c. or in any wise to counterfeit, imitate, or resemble the same, or make or cause to be made, any addition thereto, or subtraction from the same." See forms in Coll. Pat. 54, 57; Davies, Pat. Cas. 27, 30. But as no such intimation is given in the reports, I incline to believe that the doctrine stands upon the general principles of law, that he who has the exclusive right to the whole of a thing, has the same right to all the parts which the general right legally includes, that is, (in cases like the present) to all the parts which he has invented.

The principal difficulty that arises, is in the application of the doctrine; and that may in most cases be removed, by considering the nature and extent of the patent, or rather of the thing invented and patented. Where the patent goes for the whole of a machine as a new invention, and the machine is in its structure substantially new, any person who pirates a part of the machine, substantially new in its structure, deprives the inventor so far of his exclusive right in his invention, and may in a great measure destroy the value of the patent. Where the patent is for several distinct improvements in an existing machine, or for an improved machine, incorporating several distinct improvements, which are clearly specified, then if a person pirates one of the improvements, he violates the exclusive right of the patentee, for the patent is as broad as the invention, and the invention covers all the improvements; and it is a wrong done to the patentee to deprive him of his exclusive right in any of his improvements. Where a patent is for a new combination of existing machinery, or machines, and does not specify or claim any improvements or invention, except the combination, unless that combination is substantially violated, the patentee is not entitled to any remedy, although parts of the machinery are used by another, because the patent, by its terms, stands upon the combination only. In such a case, proof that the machines, or any part of their structure existed before, forms no objection to the patent, unless the combination has existed before, for the reason, that the invention is limited to the combination. And yet if the combination itself be not wholly new, but up to a certain point has existed before, and the patentee claims the whole combination as new, instead of his own improvements only, as by taking out a patent for the whole machine, doubtless his patent is void, for it exceeds his invention. Bovill v. Moore, 2 Marsh. 211; Davies, Pat. Cas. 361, 398, 404, 411. But if there be different and distinct improvements constituting parts of the combination, which are specified as such in the patent and specification, and any one of them be pirated, the same rule seems to apply as in other cases where part of an invention is pirated, for the patent then shows that the invention is not limited to the mere combination, but includes the particular improvements specified. It is often a serious difficulty from the obscure language of the specification, to ascertain what is the nature and extent of the invention claimed by the patentee. Whether his patent be valid or not, must materially depend upon the accuracy and distinctness with which the invention is stated. But in all cases where the patentee claims any thing as his own invention, in his specification, courts of law cannot reject the claim; and if included in the patent, and found not to be new, the patent is void, however small or unimportant such asserted invention may be. This leads me to the first point made at the bar; as to which, it appears to me clear, both upon principle and authority, that where a patentee in his specification states and sums up the particulars of his invention, and his patent covers them, he is confined to such summary; and he cannot afterwards be permitted to sustain his patent by showing that some part which he claims in his summing up as his invention, though not in fact his invention, is of slight value or importance in his patent. Rex v. Cutler, 1 Starkie, 354; Davies, Pat. Cas. 398, 404; Bovill v. Moore, 2 Marsh. 211. His patent covers it, and if it be not new, the patent must be void. Here the plaintiff claims a particular position of machinery as his invention, and it clearly appears in evidence that the position is not new. It has existed before, not in machines exactly like the present, but in machines applied to analogous purposes, viz. in machines for roping cotton; and applied for the same purpose as the plaintiff applies them. Without doubt he supposed that he was the first inventor, but that was his mistake, and will not help the case. The objection therefore is fatal.

I wish it to be understood in this opinion, that though several distinct improvements in one machine may be united in one patent, it does not follow that several improvements in two different machines, having distinct and independent operations, can be so included. Much less that the same patent may be for a combination of different machines, and for distinct improvements in each.

The plaintiff upon this intimation agreed to take a verdict against him, declaring his patent void, that he might obtain a new patent. Verdict for defendants.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 303.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term. 1837.

SLAVERY—REMOVAL INTO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—SALE WITHIN THREE YEARS—SUIT FOR FREEDOM.

An officer of the United States, being the bona fide owner of a slave in Fortress Munroe, a place within the United States, but not within the jurisdiction of any one of the states, and removing thence with his family to the city of Washington in the District of Columbia, to reside therein, and bringing his slave with him, cannot lawfully sell such slave within three years after such removal and importation; and such slave, by such importation and sale, becomes free.

Petition for freedom.

Mr. Bradley, for defendant [Azariah Fuller] prayed the court to instruct the jury that if, from the evidence, they shall be of opinion that Andrew B. McLean was the bona fide owner of the petitioner [the negress Sally Moody] and, while such bona fide owner, resided as an officer of, and in the employment of the United States, for a series of years, at Fortress Munroe, within the territory of the United States, and not within the limits of any state of this Union, and brought her from the said territory into the District of Columbia, with his family, when he removed here to reside; then, although the jury shall further find that the petitioner was sold within three years after such removal into the said district, she is not entitled to her freedom under such removal and sale, unless they shall further find that such residence at said Fortress Munroe was intended to defeat or avoid the law prohibiting the importation of slaves.

Mr. Dermott, for petitioner.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to give the instruction.

PATENTS — ABDOMINAL SUPPORTERS — LICENSE—REPUDIATION BY LICENSEE—PURCHASE WITH NOTICE.

1. A patent for abdominal supporters, intended to sustain the viscera of well formed persons, will not be held void for want of novelty, upon the testimony of a physician, that, prior to the complainant's invention, he had made several supporters, of which no specimens are produced, "of the same general character," for deformed patients; each being peculiar and special in its construction, and made with a view to the particular deformity of the patient for whom it was intended.

2. A licensee who has elected to put an end to his license, and denies the validity of the patent, and refuses to recognize any title in the patentee, will not afterwards, when the validity of the patent has been sustained, be permitted to set up the license from the patentee as a defense to the action.

[Cited in Cohn v. National Rubber Co., Case No. 2,968; White v. Lee, 3 Fed. 224.]

3. One who purchases patented articles from a licensee, with knowledge of his having repudiated his contract with the patentee, will be liable for the sale of such articles, as well as for the sale of those he makes afterwards.

Chauncey Smith and W. W. Swan, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Defendant is charged with the infringement of letters patent reissue numbered 2,165, granted to Sarah A. Moody, for improvements in corsets and abdominal supporters. The invention consists in certain improvements, and changes in the form and construction of corsets, to fit them to perform the function of supporting the abdomen in cases in which an artificial support is required. When adjusted according to the specifications in the patent, the operation of the improved supporters is to lift and support the abdominal viscera, transferring the strain from the abdominal muscles to the base of the spinal column and hips, and relieving the pelvic viscera from abnormal pressure. The utility of the invention is proved by the testimony of eminent surgeons, and of distinguished physicians of both sexes. The exhibits introduced to establish the fact of an anticipation of the complainant's invention fail to support the defence of want of novelty set up in the answer. The one most nearly resembling the invention of the complainant is exhibit No. 6, produced by Dr. Charles H. Spring. This, he testifies, was made for and worn by a patient of his "about five or six years since." This was after the date of complainant's invention. He says this was "of the same general character" as those made by him for the past ten or eleven years. But when we consider the fact that the witness had given special attention to diseases and deformities of the spine, and that each corset made under his direction was peculiar and special in its construction, and made with a view to the particular deformity of the patient in each case, it would not be safe to treat a patent as invalid upon testimony no more definite than that which speaks of those contrivances of an earlier date, of which no specimens are exhibited, as being of the same general character as exhibit No. 6. Some of the witnesses consider the invention described in the specification of the patent to be of the same general character as that described in the specifications of the patent to Elizabeth Adams. Yet a careful reading of the two will show that there is no similarity, much less identity, in what is claimed as invention in the two patents. Exhibit No. 6 itself is also proved to be applicable only to deformities, and, if applied to a fully developed or well-formed person, would not extend low enough to have any elevating or supporting force to counteract the pressure of the abdominal viscera. This exhibit, like all the contrivances made under Dr. Spring's direction, had for its primary function the support of an enfeebled, diseased, and deformed spine. The support given in any case to the abdominal viscera was merely auxiliary and secondary. The other exhibits offered in evidence fail to sustain this branch of the defence, for reasons clearly and fully stated in the testimony of the expert witnesses, especially in that of Dr. Newton.

Exhibits A and B, representing the corsets sold by the defendant, are clearly within the description in the complainant's patent. Without going over in detail the relations between the complainant and the defendant Taber, and also the Boston Corset Skirt Company, which was originally, and prior to the failure of the company, a licensee of the complainant, it is sufficient in this case to say, that, although the company could have availed itself of the right to sell the supporters on hand at the expiration of the contract, by paying the license fee according to the terms of the contract, the company elected to repudiate any rights or liabilities under the contract, and to determine the contract relations absolutely. This it did by its letter of October 19th, 1869, in which the company say to the complainant: "In order that there may be no misunderstanding in the future, we hereby give you notice that we understand the contract to be at an end, and we shall not therefore account to you for any profits we may derive from the manufacture and sale of abdominal supporters after October 10th, 1869."

The company could not be permitted thus to put an end to the contract, and deny the validity of the patent, and refuse to recognize any title in the patentee, and, afterwards, when the validity of the patent is sustained, to set up a license from the patentee to vend those on hand after October 19th, the date of the letter. The defendant bought the balance on hand, at the time of the failure of the company, of the corsets manufactured under the patent, with full knowledge of complainant's rights; and for the sale of these, and all made and sold by him like exhibits A and B, he must be held to have infringed, and be liable to account for the profits.

In bankruptcy.

Alexander Blumenstiel, for assignee.

Richard S. Newcombe, for bankrupts.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. This is a petition by the assignee of the bankrupts to review and reverse an order of the district court, made November 25th, 1876, denying the prayer of the petition of the same petitioner, presented to the district court on the 8th of December, 1875. This petition asked that the bankrupts might be ordered to pay over certain moneys alleged to be in their hands, and might be attached and punished for contempt, if they did not obey such order. An order was made upon this petition, to which the bankrupts had filed an answer, referring it to one of the registers to take proofs upon the issues raised by the answer of the bankrupts, in respect to the moneys alleged to be in their hands. Upon this order voluminous proofs were taken, and reported to the district court. Upon those proofs the parties were heard, and, on the 10th of June, 1876, an order was made, reciting that the bankrupts had received, between the 1st of January, 1874, and the 16th of July, 1874, the day of their failure, from the assets of their firm, Joseph Mooney, $7,147 05, and Isaac Mooney, $8,421, that neither of them had accounted for such sum received by him, and requiring each of them to show, on oath, what he did with the money, and fully account for the same; and it was referred to the same register to take the proofs and report the testimony, with his opinion. A voluminous examination was reported by the register, with his opinion, that each of the bankrupts had in his hands, at the time of the filing of the creditors' petition for the adjudication of bankruptcy, the sum of $3.300, and advising their commitment as for contempt, in not paying the same to the assignee. Upon the presentation of this report to the district court, the order was made which is now under review.

I have carefully examined this mass of testimony, and I do not see any ground for fixing any particular sum of money as being unaccounted for by the bankrupts. According to their testimony it was all expended before the filing of the petition against them. The account which they have given of the way in which the money was spent was undoubtedly subject to criticism, and was not calculated fully to satisfy the judgment, but did leave suspicions behind it as to its entire truthfulness. It has, however, been passed upon by the district judge, who has not felt himself able to pronounce that the bankrupts have not complied with the order of the court, by making all the disclosure which is in their power. It certainly may be true, that they have told all they are able to tell; and it is not claimed that any further examination is likely to yield any further results. The bankrupts have answered all the questions put to them. If their answers are true, they have obeyed the order of the court. The district court has not felt it to be its judicial duty to declare them untrue, and to proceed to punish the bankrupts on that basis. In reviewing a decision of the district court, on a question of fact, and, especially, upon one of this nature, it is for the petitioner to satisfy the court that a wrong decision has been arrived at. Coggeshall v. Potter [Case No. 2,955]. The proposition to be made out must be, that a reasonable man would not be able to give credit to the relation given by the bankrupts, but would be satisfied of its substantial untruth. It would require a very clear case to make that out, in the face of a decision of the district judge sustaining the bankrupts' story, or, putting it at the lowest, not discrediting their story, so as to feel it right to act judicially on the basis of its wilful falsity. As the question is stated by Judge Drummond in Re Salkey [Id. 12,254],—did it or did it not satisfactorily appear, that the bankrupts had not made a full disclosure?—and to this question the district court has answered in the negative. With this decision it seems to me my duty to concur, unless I am satisfied that the district judge ought clearly to have decided the other way. The case of In re Salkey [Cases Nos. 12,253 and 12,254] was much stronger than this before the court. The district judge, in that case, held the bankrupts not to have made a full disclosure and committed them. Eight months before their failure, they had bought goods to the amount of $35,000, had not paid for them, and had left only $6,000 worth, at their own valuation. They gave no account whatever, as to what had become of them. Yet, Judge Drummond, when the bankrupts were brought before him on habeas corpus, thought it proper, while holding that the power of the district court was complete, and that there was no relief to be given on habeas corpus, to send the parties back before the register who had charge of the case, in order that, upon their further examination, he might report whether the bankrupts had made a full disclosure of what they knew. The English cases which were cited (In re Bradbury, 14 C. B. 15; Ex parte Nowlan, 6 Term R. 118; Rex v. Perrot, 2 Burrows, 1122, 1215; and Ex parte Lord, 16 Mees. & W. 462) are founded upon statutes conferring expressly the power upon the commissioners, if, in their opinion, the examination of the bankrupt is unsatisfactory, to commit him. I do not think our statute is as broad as the English statutes, and, therefore, the decisions founded upon them are not entirely safe guides as to the powers to be exercised under our statute. The application to this court, upon review, to reverse the order of the district court in this matter, made and entered November 25th, 1876, is, therefore, denied, and the clerk will certify this order to the district court.

BANKRUPTCY—SPECIFICATIONS OF OBJECTIONS TO DISCHARGE—FRAUD.

1. Where specifications of objection to a bankrupt's discharge had been filed, and the creditors then moved for leave to take testimony, which motion was opposed, on the ground that the ground of objection alleged was an assignment made by the firm, of which the bankrupt was then a member, before the passage of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and consequently not within the meaning of the twenty-ninth section of the act: Held, that the specifications not only alleged such assignment, and that it was fraudulent, but also alleged that the property had remained in the possession of some of the assignors ever since the assignment, and that this was done with the knowledge and assent of the bankrupt.

2. The court would not, on such a motion, pass upon the question whether such a state of facts, if proved, would amount to a fraud under the twenty-ninth section of the act.

3. Leave to take evidence would be granted.

This was a voluntary proceeding in bankruptcy instituted by Chauncey W. Moore, who was a member of the firm of C. W. & J. T. Moore & Co. Certain creditors, opposing the discharge of this bankrupt, filed specifications of the grounds of their opposition, and thereupon, on notice to the bankrupt, moved for a trial and for leave to take testimony. The motion was opposed, on the part of the bankrupt, upon the ground that the grounds of opposition set forth in the specifications consisted of an alleged fraudulent assignment, by the firm of C. W. & J. T. Moore & Co., in 1861, long before the passage of the bankruptcy act, and, consequently, not within the meaning of the twenty-ninth section, which, it was contended, was limited to transactions since the passage of the act.

BENEDICT, District Judge. It is unnecessary now to express any opinion upon the bare proposition, whether the words "fraudulent payment, gift, transfer, conveyance, or assignment of any part of his property," in the twenty-ninth section, are to be construed as if limited by the words, "contrary to the provisions of this act," or "since the passage of this act," elsewhere used in the section, inasmuch as the specifications in this case appear to me to raise a somewhat different question.

These specifications not only aver a fraudulent assignment, made in 1861, with the intent to enable the assignors to retain the control and disposition of a large amount of property pretended to be assigned, but they go further, and aver that this property has ever since been in the charge and custody, or under the control of the assignors, or some of them; that no dividend or other distribution of this property has ever been made to the creditors under the assignment; that one of the members of the firm now has in his hands, or under his control, a large amount of property and assets, pretended to have been included in that assignment, and that this disposition, detention, and custody of the property is with the knowledge, consent, and connivance of the petitioner now before the court.

Whether such a state of facts, if proved, would not amount to a fraud within the meaning of the twenty-ninth section, which should defeat a discharge, is a question which I am not inclined to pass on finally by denying a motion like the present. Leave will accordingly be given to take proofs in support of these averments.

The present motion also includes an application to amend the sixth specification, which, it is conceded, is not sufficiently specific. The permission will be given, as the opposition, in this case, is manifestly made in good faith, and the rules governing the specifications could not be considered as settled. The motion is accordingly granted.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—PETITION BY PART OF FIRM—NOTICE.

1. One or more partners may file their petition in bankruptcy without making the others parties, but notice of the pendency of the proceedings must be given to the other partners.

2. The petition must pray that the firm be declared bankrupt.

By LINCOLN CLARK, Register: On the 29th day of December, 1868, Rufus E. Moore

and James T. Kelly filed their petition in this court, praying for the benefit of the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517]. A certified copy of their petition and schedules have been sent down to me as register, and also an order of the court to proceed in the matter. The petition sets forth that the petitioners were co-partners with one Mrs. Hatch. It states that the members of said co-partnership owe debts, etc., and are unable to pay all their debts in full; that they are willing to surrender, etc., in the usual form. The petitioners then pray that this petition may be taken as the separate and individual petition of each of them respectively, if in the judgment of the court they are not entitled to make application for their discharge under the bankrupt act jointly. What kind of application is this? Is it an application to have the firm declared bankrupt, or is it to have the petitioners declared bankrupt? My understanding is that the firm cannot be declared bankrupt unless all the members of it join in the application, or unless the petition is so framed as to give the outstanding party an opportunity to deny the fact of bankruptcy. In the present case the petition is in form neither the one nor the other. Section 36 of the act. Also, see rule 18 of the supreme court. In view of this rule it may be well to ask, how can a third party be said to refuse to join when, as yet, it may be that he has no knowledge of the proceeding? And is it competent to give a notice of the proceeding when it is not shaped for that purpose; in other words, where the petitioners do not ask to have the firm declared bankrupt? In re Winkens [Case No. 17,875]. The debts of the firm are very considerable. So far as the schedule shows, there are no firm assets, except what may be found in a deed of assignment made by the co-partners in May, 1868. Should the property named in that assignment come to the hands of the assignee in bankruptcy, there would be assets. But I cannot regard this as a proceeding to have the firm declared bankrupt. If it were such, the outstanding partner might be able to show that it was not bankrupt. I think the petition might be so amended as to make it an application to have the firm declared bankrupt, but I cannot see how a third party can be brought in for that purpose when the petition is not properly framed to that end. If it is not a proceeding to have the firm declared bankrupt, can it be declared competent to have the petitioners individually so adjudged? I cannot see how it can be so regarded. Individuals can join only on the fact of joint interest and according to form prescribed. In other cases the proceeding should be individual. I am of opinion that the petition should be so amended as to make it a proceeding to have the firm declared bankrupt, or that it should be dismissed. My views in the matter differing from those of Messrs. Wilson & Storrs, counsel for petitioners, and it being one of importance in practice, I send it up to the court for determination.

Isaac G. Wilson, for petitioners.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. I think it would be proper for the petition to state that an application has been made to the other co-partner to join in the petition, and if this were done, then the consequence might follow which is implied by rule 18. But there is nothing, as I see, in the bankrupt law, to prevent one partner from making his application for a discharge under the law from his individual debts, and from his debts as a co-partner of the firm. It seems to be desirable that the non-joining partner should know that the application is made, leaving it optional with him to come in if he pleases, or take any action he may choose. This petition does not state any thing about a refusal.

It seems to me that all has been done that the law requires when you have given notice to the other partner, and now it is optional with her whether she will come in or not. If she does not choose to come in, the court will go on and make its decree, and discharge these men both as members of the firm and individually. Of course the result would be that the firm would have to be declared bankrupt. The law does not require, nor does the rule—and in fact, the law seems to be otherwise—that before a member of a firm can be discharged under the bankrupt law, he must request the other members of the firm also to apply. The rule seems to give the option to that member of the firm who does not apply, to join in the application, and declares what the consequences shall be of a non-joinder.

I think you have brought yourself within this rule. It seems to me the only thing is that the other co-partner ought to be brought in as I stated. I think she ought to be notified in order that she may take such steps as she may be advised. That can be done certainly as well by a supplemental or subsequent act, as in the original petition. In stating that these are members of a firm of which she as a partner is one, it seems to me the petition does all that is required to be done. I think the proper course would be for an entry to be made of the fact that she has been notified of the pendency of the proceeding. Of course the petition must be amended and ask that the firm be declared bankrupt.

NOTE. Notice of the filing of the petition must be given to the non-joining partners before adjudication of bankruptcy can be made. In re Lewis [Case No. 8,311]; In re Prankard [Id. 11,366]. Where one partner has asked for the benefit of the bankrupt act, the firm must, of necessity, be declared bankrupt. In re Grady [Id. 5,654]; In re Greenfield [Id. 5,772]. Unless the firm is declared bankrupt no member can be discharged from his firm debts. In re Little [Id. 8,390]; In re Bidwell [Id. 1,392]; In re Grady [Id. 5,654]. But if there are no firm assets the rule is otherwise. In re Winkens [Id. 17,875]; In re Abbe [Id. 4].

District Court, D. Maine. Feb., 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—FRAUD—CONCEALMENT OF PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

1. The discharge of a bankrupt is not prevented by transactions prior to the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

2. A specification in bar of a bankrupt's discharge, stating that he concealed the title to land, is not sustained by proof of his omitting an equity of redemption from his schedule of assets.

3. Such specification, charging that the bankrupt willfully and knowingly swore falsely in his examinations, to be effectual, must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.

4. Evidence of verbal admissions is both unreliable and dangerous.

[Cited in Re Goold, Case No. 5,604.]

In bankruptcy. Petition by bankrupt [Luther S. Moore,] for his discharge. Creditors specified objections thereto: I. That he fraudulently conveyed his property for the purpose of concealing it, and to prevent its attachment. II. That he concealed his title to land. III. That he concealed his promissory note. IV. That he concealed the "Laconia property." V. That in his examination before the register, he willfully and knowingly swore falsly in regard to the keeping of books of account.

Josiah H. Drummond and Woodbury Davis, for petitioner.

Almon A. Strout and George F. Shepley, for objecting creditors.

FOX, District Judge. A very protracted examination has been had of the bankrupt by the assignee before Mr. Register Fessenden. It appears that the bankrupt failed on the 31st day of August, A. D. 1863, and filed his petition in this court to be adjudged a bankrupt on the day the bankrupt act took effect. At the time of his failure he was owing about $60,000, more than $40,000 of which was due to the banks in this city and the county of York, for loans made to him on his paper, purporting to be indorsed by Jeremiah M. Mason.

The bankrupt has for many years been in the practice of the law at Limerick, in the county of York, and also extensively engaged in the purchase and sale of real estate. His homestead farm, upon which he had made very costly expenditures and improvements, was mortgaged by him, on the 28th day of August, 1863, to his brother-in-law, H. P. Storer of Portland, to secure the payment to him, in eight years, of Moore's note for $10,000.

The first specification charges that this mortgage was fraudulently given for the purpose of concealing the property, and to prevent its attachment, and that the bankrupt, at the time of filing his petition, was the owner of this estate. The evidence, in my opinion, not only fails to prove such to have been the condition of this estate, but rather establishes beyond question, that at the time this mortgage was executed, Moore was indebted to Storer to the amount of $2,000, which debt was then cancelled, and $8,000 was paid in cash to Moore by Storer at the time, or within a few days afterwards, and the note and mortgage for this sum were then given by Moore to Storer, the whole amount of which still remains unpaid.

It must be remembered that this transaction took place in 1863, prior to the passage of the bankrupt act, and although I am well satisfied that the bankrupt at the time of his giving this mortgage was well aware of his insolvency, and intended to secure and prefer the debt to Storer, and place his estate beyond the reach of his creditors, acts which are now prohibited by the bankrupt act, and which would deprive him of his discharge if committed subsequently to the passage of this act, yet, it is quite clear, the bankrupt law cannot be made to have a retroactive effect, and punish a party, by refusing him a discharge for acts committed by him prior to the passage of the law. A fraudulent preference or transfer of a debtor's property, by the act, is made an offence, for which the punishment prescribed by the act is, a failure to obtain his discharge. To thus punish a party, the offence for which the punishment is inflicted must have been committed since the passage of, and in violation of a law then in force. Such was the decision in this district in Clark's Case [Case No. 2,795a], in July last, and it has been repeatedly so decided in other districts, and with much force by Field, J., in Rosenfield's Case [Id. 12,058], where he held, that neither a fraudulent conveyance made, nor a fraudulent preference given before the passage of the bankrupt act, is good ground upon which to oppose a discharge; and a specification, alleging such a conveyance or preference, should be stricken out on motion.

The second specification charges the bankrupt with a concealment of his interest in the Gilpatrick lot by a conveyance, made by Gilpatrick to Lorenzo Moore, the brother of the bankrupt, for the use and benefit of the bankrupt. The bankrupt conveyed this lot in the spring of 1863 to Gilpatrick by an absolute deed, which was intended as security for the payment of $1,760, due from Moore to Gilpatrick. A bond of defeasance was at the time executed by Gilpatrick to Moore, as appears from the examination of the bankrupt. Gilpatrick also received from Moore his notes for the amount due, one of which was paid from the proceeds of a sale of a portion of the property, and the other two were paid before their maturity, in May, 1865, by the bankrupt, with money, as he swears, belonging to his brother Lorenzo, and Gilpatrick thereupon released the bond to Lorenzo.

The deposition of Lorenzo Moore was read by the orators at the hearing; he testifies that after studying law with his brother, he went to Independence, Iowa, there practiced his profession, and was also engaged in speculations in real estate, occasionally remitted to his brother money for investment, and finally in 1864, returned back, having accumulated about $12,000; that in 1865 he was at his father's house in Newfield, saw his brother quite frequently, his brother was then indebted to him in the sum of $1,500 or $1,600 for borrowed money for which he held Luther's note, and for which he afterwards took some property of Gilpatrick in payment; that Luther held Gilpatrick's bond for the conveyance of this property, and he gave up to Luther his note and received from Gilpatrick his deed in payment, authorized Luther to make this arrangement a few days before it was made; that the deed is dated May 1, 1865, and has been in his own possession ever since the 3d or 4th of the month; that the consideration of this conveyance was the surrender of the note for $1,500, he held against Luther; that he gave the note to Luther, and Luther paid him the balance in cash beyond the $1,500 allowed Gilpatrick, and that he has received rent of the Gilpatrick lot since.

There is nothing cotradictory of this testimony presented by the creditors. It fully corroborates the bankrupt's statement, and establishes the fact that Lorenzo paid for the transfer from Gilpatrick. This transfer was however in its legal effect, an assignment of a mortgage; for by the laws of Maine, the conveyance to Gilpatrick with a bond of defeasance executed at the same time by him constituted a mortgage security for the amount of Moore's liability to him, so that, at the time of the filing of the petition by the bankrupt, he held an equity of redemption of the estate, and was entitled to redeem it from his brother on payment of the balance due; this equity nowhere appears upon the schedules annexed to his petition in bankruptcy.

The specification does not accuse the bankrupt of concealing an equity of redemption in the estate, but it charges the concealment of a parcel of land, being the same premises conveyed to Jacob Gilpatrick of the value of $2,000, by causing a conveyance of the same land to be made to the brother of the bankrupt, "he the said bankrupt falsely pretending, that said Lorenzo advanced the money to purchase said land, and that said Lorenzo was and is the true owner thereof, when in truth and in fact the said bankrupt is the true owner of said land, and ever has been the true owner of the same since said conveyance to Lorenzo Moore, and advanced the money to pay the incumbrance on the same, and to obtain the title to the same, and the said Lorenzo Moore, holds said real estate for said Luther S. Moore, whereby the said Luther S. Moore concealed the same, and still conceals the same and the money paid therefor, with the intent to defraud his creditors, and to prevent the attachment and seizure on execution of said real estate, and to prevent its coming into the hands of the assignee in bankruptcy, and has omitted the same from his schedules annexed to his petition in bankruptcy, although he was the owner of the same, contrary to the said bankrupt act."

This is the entire specification touching this estate, and it will be observed, it is based upon the ground that the bankrupt was the owner of the entire estate, and had paid his own money to relieve the incumbrances upon it, and was fraudulently using the name of Lorenzo to conceal the bankrupt's interest in this property, which belonged to him absolutely. This was the charge the bankrupt was called upon to meet, by the specification, a fraudulent concealment of an entire, an absolute title to the Gilpatrick lot, and not an equity of redemption; and this charge is disproved entirely by the evidence produced by the opposing creditors.

It was claimed at the argument that the bankrupt had concealed his interest in this equity, and for this cause should be refused a discharge. It is a sufficient reply to this, that a concealment of the equity, as I have shown, is not set forth in any of the specifications as a reason for opposing his discharge, and of course should not be thus first presented at the hearing, without an opportunity for the bankrupt to defend against it. The equity is not mentioned on the schedules of assets, but it was clearly and fully disclosed by the bankrupt in his examination, as he states, he received the bond from Gilpatrick. Whether this right to redeem is of any real value is quite uncertain; the amount secured to Gilpatrick at the time of the conveyance in 1863 was $1,760; $500 of the principal with interest was paid by a sale of a portion of the estate, and the balance remains unpaid. The only testimony, as to the value of the property, is from the bankrupt, who estimated it to be worth at the time of the conveyance about $1,800, and from Gilpatrick who thought its then fair cash value was $2,200; it is doubtful whether the property is now worth the amount of the incumbrance.

To preclude a bankrupt's discharge by a concealment of his property, it must have been willful concealment, designedly done by him, and not merely an accidental omission to set forth his interest in the property. In the present case, all the facts were disclosed by the bankrupt himself, and upon all the evidence in the case, it is not at all clear to me, that there was any real value or interest in the estate to be concealed by him; but I think the schedule is defective, and should be amended, setting forth the equity in the Gilpatrick lot, that the same may be disposed of by the assignee, if anything can be realized therefrom.

The third specification charges the concealment of a note, signed by one I. G. Harmon, payable to Calvin Moore, the note being the property of the bankrupt. I do not think this charge is sustained by the evidence. The bankrupt does not appear to have had any right or interest in the Harmon note. The fourth specification relates to the Laconia Stand, and charges the bankrupt with concealing this estate, by causing a conveyance of the same to be made to, and remain in, Lorenzo Moore, the bankrupt falsely pretending that Lorenzo paid for the property, when in fact, the bankrupt was the owner of it, and purchased and paid for the same with his own money, and caused a conveyance to be made to Lorenzo for the sole purpose of concealing the same.

The facts respecting this estate are somewhat complicated; but I understand that Leander Boothby was once the owner of the estate, encumbered by mortgages which were about becoming foreclosed; that in 1860 he applied to Wm. Bean to lend him money to redeem the estate, and an arrangement was made by which the title was conveyed by Leander Boothby to his wife, who received $700 from Bean, she giving him a warranty deed of the estate, and he at the same time giving to her a bond to reconvey the estate to her within three years, on payment of the loan with heavy interest. This loan was applied to the discharge of the incumbrance. The business was done at the bankrupt's office. In June, 1863, a claim was made by the bankrupt, in behalf of Flanders & Co., on this estate by virtue of an alleged prior attachment. Bean was notified of this claim, and becoming somewhat alarmed, proposed to Moore to convey to him the interest he had in the property, on payment of the amount he had loaned, $700, losing his interest for three years, which he says was to be nearly $200. Moore accepted the proposal, and received from Bean, in the fall of 1863, a bond running to Lorenzo Moore, binding Bean to convey the estate if it was not redeemed, and if redeemed to pay over the amount received. Moore paid Bean $400 in cash, and offered him a draft or something or other for $300, as Bean says, "which he considered as good as cash when he could get to a bank with it," but upon which he claimed of Moore a discount of nine per cent. to make it cash. Moore declined to pay the nine per cent. and went out of his office with it, and soon returned with $300, which he paid to Bean. At the time the bond was made, Bean testifies that Moore said, "You know why I take this in Lorenzo's name." The title had never passed from Bean to Lorenzo Moore, and the estate was not redeemed by the Boothbys, they denying the validity of Bean's claim on the ground, as I understand, that the conveyance made by Mrs. Boothby to Bean was not valid under the laws of Maine at that time, the property having originally been the estate of her husband, and he not having joined in the conveyance to Bean. The title to the estate is now in litigation before the supreme court of this state, in an action brought in Bean's name for benefit of Lorenzo Moore against Mrs. Boothby for possession of the premises.

Boothby and his wife were produced as witnesses by the creditors; he testified that "In the spring of 1867, the bankrupt was at our house and then stated, that he had paid out $700, and he wanted that amount out of the property, but would give in the interest, that he was making a loss at that rate; my wife said, she did not see how he was the loser, if Lorenzo Moore owned the property; he replied, the money was his, the money he paid for that stand was his own property, and he could not afford to lose it and that he never thought we would cheat him out of that amount of money, he said we should be much better off than he would, as he had lost the interest of his money, whilst we had received the rents; he said, he had paid Bean $700 for his title to the property."

Mrs. Boothby's version of this conversation is, that "Moore said he wanted us to pay $700 he had paid to Bean, he said the money was his and he was poor and was not able to lose it, said we should be doing better than he did, as we were receiving the rents, and he was getting nothing, besides losing the interest of his money, do not remember about Lorenzo's title being mentioned."

The bankrupt in his examination states that he paid Bean $700 for his interest in the estate, and took a bond for the conveyance of the same to Lorenzo Moore, the money which he used being Lorenzo's, and the draft of $300 testified to by Bean, being a draft for that sum which he had received from Lorenzo, drawn by a banker at Independence, Iowa, in favor of Lorenzo Moore, on a bank in Boston or New York, the money from which draft he paid over to Bean. He admits having a conversation with Boothby and wife, and in that conversation may have said, "I had paid Bean the $700 and could not afford to lose it," or words to that effect, but that in the entire conversation he was speaking and acting in behalf of his brother; that Bean's testimony was correct, excepting that he had no recollection of using the words "You know why I take this bond in Lorenzo's name."

Lorenzo Moore testified that "In 1863 I sent home to Luther $700, or $800, in three drafts from Independence, Iowa, the money being sent to him to invest for me; that in 1863 Luther did invest for me $700 in the Laconia property, whilst I was in Iowa; I instructed him to invest it for me if he saw a chance to make money, and I would share the profits with him. When I came back he told me, he had invested it in the Laconia property; has invested other monies for me, and we had divided the profits, about $300 on Chas. Boothby's place, and something over $100 on the Mill's lot.

The bankrupt's statement as to the Laconia stand is in all respects sustained by that of his brother, and I think also derives some support from Bean's testimony, as to the $300 draft offered to him by Luther, at the time of giving the bond. On the other hand, there is the testimony of Boothby and wife as to the alleged admissions of the bankrupt claiming an interest in the property, and that the $700 paid to Bean was his own money.

In my opinion, verbal admissions are the most dangerous and unreliable testimony which can be produced to a court of justice, and but very little reliance should be put upon them, when presented from interested witnesses, under circumstances similar to these in the present case. They consist of a mere repetition of statements made long since, and depend entirely upon the honesty, intelligence, and recollection of the witnesses, and in all cases, after a considerable lapse of time, when a witness undertakes to rehearse, from his recollection alone, the exact language and expressions of a party, I am but little inclined to yield a ready credence to its entire correctness; an unintentional change of a few words may give a meaning to the statement entirely different from what the party actually did say.

In the present case, these two witnesses do not entirely agree in their recollection of the conversation. Boothby states that his wife said she did not see how he, Luther, was a loser, if Lorenzo Moore owned the property; whilst the wife says she does not recollect about Lorenzo's title being mentioned. If the wife had made such a remark, it seems to me she would have been more likely to remember it than any other part of the conversation, as it was her idea, and the most important, in my view, of anything testified to by either witness.

The position, assumed by these witnesses in their defence of the suit, brought against them in Bean's name for the recovery of the estate, I admit, is not without its effect on my mind, and has greatly diminished the respect and confidence which I might otherwise entertain for them, and the credence which I might have given their testimony. They stand before me in hostility to the Moores, are defendants in a suit for the recovery of this estate, putting a defence upon the strict law, that the husband did not join in the conveyance with his wife, notwithstanding he was a party to the agreement, present when it was made, acted throughout as agent for his wife, and received from Bean his money, all parties implicitly believing that Bean by the deed acquired a valid security on the estate for his loan. Instead of paying back the money without interest, the use of which they had enjoyed for more than three years, and which amount they admit Moore was willing to accept, they see fit to defend on this strict technicality, the non-joinder of the husband in the deed.

It may be, that under the laws of Maine, this defence will prevail; but it does not commend to my consideration very favorably those who are endeavoring to profit by it; and they should not expect any tribunal to place any great reliance on their statements as to the admissions of their opponents touching the title to the estate in question.

I should fear that parties entertaining such loose notions of what is right, honest and honorable, could not always be depended upon when called to testify as witnesses, and I should feel great reluctance in deciding this matter against the bankrupt upon their evidence, even if entirely uncontradicted; but as the case now stands, upon all the testimony in relation to the Laconia land, I have no question that the money advanced to Bean was Lorenzo Moore's property, and the bond for the conveyance from him was properly taken in the name of Lorenzo Moore, and that the bankrupt acquired thereby no interest in this estate. The money advanced to Bean having been the property of Lorenzo Moore, the most satisfactory reason is shown for taking the bond in his name, and we have no occasion for indulging in loose conjectures for other reasons, if the bankrupt did make the remarks testified to by Bean.

I have never entertained any question as to the judgment which should be rendered upon the specifications already adverted to, but there is one still remaining for my decision, upon which there is a very considerable conflict of evidence. I have repeatedly read all the testimony applicable to this objection, but have been unable to reconcile the statements of all the witnesses, or to feel such absolute confidence and trust in the conclusion arrived at by me, as I could have desired.

The fifth specification charges the bankrupt with having on his examination before the register willfully and knowingly sworn falsely, viz: "that since Feb. 22, 1858, he kept no cash book, and no written account in any shape of any receipts or expenditures from that date, except receipts on the files of said bankrupt, and loose memoranda of money borrowed or had for the time being, when in truth and in fact, he had kept a cash book and cash account since that date." Such is the statement, repeatedly given by the bankrupt in his written examination, and its materiality is not denied by his counsel.

The charge therefore is that of willful falsehood, and is a question of fact submitted to me, for my decision, involving a trial of the bankrupt for the crime of perjury. The consequences being of such extreme importance, in determining the question, I must be governed by the rules of law regulating the trial of an indictment for perjury. The creditors should satisfy my mind beyond a reasonable doubt, that this bankrupt has intentionally and willfully given false testimony in relation to this matter.

It is undisputed, that prior to Feb. 22, 1858, the bankrupt did keep what he terms cash books, showing, in part, his receipts and payments of money from January 1, 1848. Four of these books have been produced and carefully examined by me. The bankrupt states that he abandoned his practice of keeping such books in February, 1858, on account of manifold errors and omissions. Some of the testimony on the part of the creditors is in my opinion easily explained, whilst other portions must depend on the intelligence, character and memory of the witnesses, and their relations to the bankrupt, as it is direct, positive and unqualified, as to the fact that the bankrupt did, subsequently to Feb., 1858, keep such books.

The evidence on the part of the bankrupt, and especially that gathered from his books, does certainly throw great doubt and uncertainty over the proof offered by the opposing creditors, and leads me to the conclusion that there may have been some mistakes, or failure of memory, on the part of their witnesses. I am not convinced that the bankrupt did keep a cash book, or cash accounts, during the time charged in the specifications. I am left in doubt from all the testimony, but am the rather inclined to believe that the statements of the bankrupts in relation to this matter are correct. Discharge granted.

While interest on bonds does not ordinarily begin to run until the relation of debtor and creditor is created by the transfer and delivery thereof, yet it is competent for the maker, upon transferring the bonds as collateral security, to agree that interest should be computed from their date according to their tenor, and that such interest should stand as security for a loan made expressly on the faith of it.]

[2. No objection can be made to such a pledge of the interest by persons who received other bonds of the same class several years after their date, for they must be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have acted upon the assumption that the rest of the bonds of that series were outstanding for interest as well as principal, according to their face and tenor.]

[3. An assignee in bankruptcy held to have the right to set up the defense of usury as against a creditor of the estate; and held, further, that the bankrupt was a competent witness, notwithstanding the death of such creditor, whose claim was presented by his executors.]

On the first day of December, 1870, the bankrupt [Thomas Moore] executed a mortgage in favor of William Floyd, trustee, to secure the payment of twenty bonds, bearing interest, each for the sum of $5,500. These bonds were used by the bankrupt in lieu of an endorser, each being pledged as collateral for a promissory note of the same amount, which note was renewed every four months, and the discount paid with each renewal. At the time of the bankruptcy, all of the notes were outstanding, and all of the bonds held as collateral thereto. John I. House held four of the bonds as security for four notes. He also held a draft for $5,485.50, for which the bankrupt was liable, and to secure the payment of which the bankrupt gave him a paper, dated March 22d, 1877, pledging the accrued interest to the amount of $5 000. House contended that he was entitled in respect of this claim to participate in the distribution of the fund. The fund was less than the face value of the mortgage. The register held that each bond was entitled to one-twentieth of the fund, and as the four bonds held by Mr. House did not draw sufficient of the fund to pay in full the notes for which they were held as collateral, there was nothing to which the special interest pledged could apply. The fund must first go to pay the notes for which the mortgage bonds were pledged, and if any surplus were left, arising out of the four bonds held by House after paying his four notes, it would be applied to the draft held by him. In 1867 the bankrupt conveyed the same property to Moore and Pollock, receiving from them a mortgage, securing the payment of fifteen notes, each for $10,000. One of these was assigned by the bankrupt, August 10th, 1867, to Henry McCullough, as collateral security for a note for $10,000, made by the bankrupt. This assignment was not recorded until after the bankruptcy, July 3, 1877. Moore and Pollock reconveyed to the bankrupt, February 28th, 1868, and other assignments of parts of their mortgage were either re-assigned or satisfied, and on the 11th of May, 1875, the bankrupt entered a formal satisfaction in full. McCullough having died, his executors claimed to have priority over the creditors under the later mortgage of the bankrupt. The assignee set up the defence of usury, and the bankrupt was examined as a witness. The register held that the McCullough claim is good against the bankrupt, but must be postponed until the creditors under the later mortgage of the bankrupt have been paid in full; that the assignee has a right to set up the defence of usury, and that the bankrupt is a competent witness, notwithstanding the death of McCullough. To the several findings and rulings of the register, exceptions were filed, and after argument, were overruled in the district court.

tion, which was adopted by the register and approved by the court below, was erroneous. It is undoubtedly true, as a general rule, that no interest accrues upon a note or bond until the relation of debtor and creditor is created by the transfer and delivery of such note or bond by the maker to another, for a sufficient consideration; and this is so for the reason that such is the constructive import of the contract between the maker and holder of such instrument. But it is none the less certain that the maker of a note may make himself liable for interest apparently accrued upon it, where he expressly stipulates to become so for a lawful consideration. It was altogether competent then for the bankrupt and John I. House to agree that the interest upon the bonds transferred to the latter as collateral security should be computed from their date according to their tenor, and that the whole or a part of such interest should stand as a security for a loan made expressly upon the faith of it. Nor have the holders of the other bonds of the same class any equity to gainsay such an arrangement, because, as such bonds were hypothecated to them several years after date, they must be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to have acted upon the assumption that the bonds not held by them were outstanding for interest as well as principal, according to their face tenor.

The proper method, then, of determining the value of the collateral securities, is to compute the interest upon all of them from the date of their last hypothecation to the time of distribution, and to add to the amount of the securities held by John I. House the interest which had accrued upon them before the date of their hypothecation, and, as the fund for distribution is insufficient to pay in full the debts for which the collaterals were pledged, to apportion it among the creditors upon the basis of the value, thus ascertained, of the securities hypothecated to them respectively.

In regard to the exceptions filed in behalf of the estate of McCullough, I deem it necessary to say that they were properly overruled by the court below.

The order of the district court confirming the report of the register is, therefore, reversed, and the cause is remanded to that court with directions to cause distribution to be made of the fund in the hands of the assignee among the creditors entitled to it in conformity with the method herein indicated.

TAXATION—TAX TITLES—REQUIREMENTS OF STATUTE—NOTICE OF SALE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

1. In selling lands for taxes, the requirement of the statute must be complied with. And this especially applies to the giving of notice of sale.

[Cited in Cahoon v. Coe, 57 N. H. 596; Thurston v. Miller, 10 R. I. 360.]

2. A deed for land sold for taxes, which, upon its face, shows that legal notice of the sale was not given, is void. Such a deed can not avail a person who sets up a defense under the statute of limitations.

[Cited in Shoat v. Walker, 6 Kan. 68.]

[This was an action of ejectment by Joshua J. Moore against James Brown, Alfred Brown, Harmon Hogan, and Joseph Froward.]

Williams & Butterfield, for plaintiff.

Logan & Lincoln, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an ejectment for the south half of section 35, town 12, range 1, in Warren county, of this state. Patent to Amos Davenport for the land. Deed from him to Dewy. This deed was objected to, because the acknowledgment is defective. The person taking the acknowledgment does not certify that the person making it was known to him. Rev. St. Ill. 1845, p. 106, it is provided that a deed for land in Illinois, executed in any other state, "in conformity with the laws of such state," shall be good to convey real estate in Illinois. The deed objected to was executed in Vermont, and the law of that state, it is believed, does not require, as in New York, and in some other states, the person taking the acknowledgment to certify that the one who makes it is known to him. Dewy conveyed to Cole, and he to the plaintiff.

The defendants admit themselves to be in possession, and they set up in defense a sale of the premises for the taxes of 1821 and 1822, on the 9th of December, 1823. The act of the state requires the taxes to be paid on or before the 1st of October, annually, and if not so paid, the auditor is required to have the lands published three weeks, the last publication to be sixty days before the sale. The act of 1835 limits a suit to seven years after adverse possession. It is not denied, but admitted, that the land was sold for taxes before the expiration of the time required by the law, before it should be sold, and the question arises, whether under such a title, the occupant can set up the statute of limitations. It must be admitted, that to entitle an occupant to plead the statute, he need not have an effective deed. This would dispense with the statute, for it is only beneficial to the tenant when his title is not paramount to that of the plaintiff. But here the question is, whether a deed void upon its face, can enable an individual to avail himself of the statute.

A strict construction has uniformly been given to tax titles. It is necessary that, at least the requisites of the law, through which an individual is divested of his title, should be substantially complied with. We see the necessity of this rule, in the case under consideration. Three hundred and twenty acres of land have been sold for less than twenty dollars. If such sacrifices can be made, where there is a departure from the requirements of the law, there is no safety to the owners of real estate in Illinois, especially if they be non-residents. But this rule should not be so technical as to render a sale for taxes of no value. It is the duty of the land holder, resident or non-resident, to contribute his proportion to the revenues of the state, by which public improvements are made, and the value of the property of the people is greatly enhanced. And every non-resident who fails to pay his taxes should be made to suffer for a disregard of his own interest, as well as the interest of the state. But there is often difficulty in procuring faithful agents. If sales for taxes were made with more care, and a stricter observance of the law, it would give a higher value to those sales, and fewer sacrifices would be made.

We suppose that the deed before us is void upon its face. The law requires a notice to be given, before the sale, which the face of this deed shows has not been given; it is therefore void, and can afford no protection, under the act of limitations. Verdict for plaintiff. On suggestion of the counsel, the above question was certified to the supreme court, as to the validity of the deed.

[This case went to the supreme court on a certificate of division in opinion between the judges of this court. It was decided in the supreme court that the deed was void, and therefore inadmissible as evidence; Mr. Chief Justice Taney, Mr. Justice Catron, and Mr. Justice Grier dissented. 11 How. (52 U. S.) 414.]

MOORE et al. v. The CARIBON.[1]

District Court, S. D. Florida. Dec., 1880.

SALVAGE—NATURE OF SERVICES—COMPENSATION.

[Two of the libellants boarded a bark flying a signal of distress off Tortugas light, and found that the master and part of the crew had died of the fever, and the rest were sick, but one man being fit for duty. They piloted her to a comparatively safe anchorage, where food and assistance could be obtained, though not such as the condition of the sick required. Four days later, two pilot boats arrived, put a crew of six men on board, and brought her into port. Held, that the services of the first two libellants were salvage services, requiring liberal compensation, and that the services of the others was a continuing salvage service, of less merit, but entitled to a reasonable reward.]

[This was a libel by Moore and Keys and C. P. Williams and others against the bark Caribon to recover compensation for salvage services.]

W. C. Maloney, Jr., and G. B. Patterson, for libellants.

L. W. Bethel, for respondent.

LOCKE, District Judge. This vessel was discovered by two of the libellants, one light keeper at Tortugas, some eight or ten miles from that place, with a signal of distress flying. The master and two men had died during the voyage, and the rest of the crew, with one exception, were sick with the Chagres fever. The mate, who was in command, although partially recovered, was still suffering; and there was but one person on board fit for duty. The two original libellants, Moore and Keys, went on board, assisted what they could, and the next day piloted the bark into a channel, where she came to anchor in a comparatively protected place, but not a part of the harbor or one of complete security; yet it was where they could lie at anchor, and obtain assistance and nourishment from parties at Fort Jefferson. Four days after being brought in, two pilot boats, with the second libellants, arrived from Key West, their entire crews consisting of thirteen men, who all assisted in getting under way, put a crew of six on board, and brought her to that port. She had neither been pumped, nor had her decks washed down, for twenty-five days; and this the salvor crew attended to.

When first discovered and boarded by libellant Moore, this vessel was in distress, and required assistance. She was in the vicinity of dangerous navigation, a season of the year when severe weather might at any time be expected, with a disabled crew; yet the danger was not imminent, nor the services such as would justify a large compensation. Had she not been boarded by Moore, she might have continued her course, and made Key West or reached the pilot grounds of that port with no more disaster than had been encountered for the twenty-five days previous; yet the risk was continuous, and the crew so utterly unable to render such service as any hour might require that she could not be considered in a seaworthy or safe condition. When brought to anchor by Moore, although temporarily in a place of comparative safety, it cannot be said that a salvage service had been completed. The vessel was not where medical assistance or such nourishment and attendance as was required by the sick could be procured; nor could hospital accommodations be provided and a new crew obtained. She may have been temporarily safe, but she was not put into a position where she could continue her voyage or earn money for her owners. Further aid was necessary, and this was provided by the second libellants from the pilot boats. This being a continuing service, on account of these facts, and that at no time between the boarding of the first libellants and the final anchoring in Key West could the vessel be said to be in a state of safety and in such a place as her needs required, the compensation should be considered as joint.

The number of salvors interested in the second libel is no measure of the necessities of the case, nor can it be used to increase a compensation. It was stated by one of the witnesses that, although five or six men could very well work the vessel, it took the entire fourteen employed to get up the anchor. I do not doubt but what the entire number were employed at that service, but that the condition of the windlass or weight of the anchor was such that it required nearly twice as many to weigh it as comprised the original crew I cannot accept. The locality where the vessel was discovered, in immediate proximity to a harbor, which she had reached without assistance, goes far to show she might have gone on and ultimately found safety without assistance. The fact that the mate had not been able to take a sight so as to calculate his whereabouts for over three weeks shows plainly past dangers; but having made land, and therefore ascertained his locality, it cannot be considered as showing present or future ones, so as to enhance an award.

Of the individual salvors, the first libellant Moore rendered the most valuable service, and should be most liberally compensated. There is no evidence as to what part was taken by Keys, but he went on board, and it is presumed rendered what assistance was required of him, although he may be, as alleged, but a boy.

Taking all the facts into consideration, I think five hundred dollars will be a fair compensation for the entire service, of which libellant Moore will receive seventy-five and Keys twenty-five dollars, and the remaining four hundred be divided between the pilot boats and crews according to the rules for dividing pilotage in ordinary cases.

The decree will follow accordingly.

Case No. 9,754.

MOORE v. The CHARLES MORGAN.

[3 Cin. Law Bul. 42.]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. 1878.

SALE—WARRANTY—MACHINE MADE FOR PARTICULAR PURPOSE—WELL KNOWN AND ASCERTAINED MACHINE.

Where a machine ordered and sold is a known and ascertained article, the purchaser is liable whether it answers the purpose for which it was intended or not. But where it is not a known and ascertained article, but it is a specific chattel ordered and made to perform a certain purpose, the law implies a warranty that it shall be fit for the purpose for which it was intended. The mechanic making the machine may, however, relieve himself from such warranty by a specific contract not to be responsible for the adaptability of the machine for the intended purpose.

In admiralty.

Henry Hooper and F. W. Moore, for libellant.

Coppock & Caldwell, for defendant.

SWING, District Judge. The libellant, [Arthur G.] Moore, sues the steamboat, Charles Morgan, for machinery, viz.: a steam condenser, supplied at the request of the master, and upon the credit of the boat, and claims the sum of $2,333. Captain Stein, the master and owner, sets up as a defense, that Moore induced him to purchase a certain apparatus, called a "steam condenser;" that he held himself out as a skillful mechanic and that the condenser would answer the purpose for which it was made; that the machine was a new mechanical contrivance, called "the condenser," to be connected with the engines and boilers, and would cause a great saving of fuel, and enable the boat to run with lower pressure of steam; that relying upon these representations, he entered into an agreement with the libellant for the construction of said "condenser," for which he was to pay what the labor and materials would fairly be worth; that Moore constructed the machine, and represented that the same was built in a workmanlike manner, and would accomplish the purpose for which it was made; that on trial it was found to be constructed in such an unworkmanlike manner, that it would not, and did not, answer the purpose for which it was constructed, and was utterly worthless; that it was constantly giving way, breaking, causing detentions, and endangering the other machinery of the boat; and that he was finally compelled to remove it, on account of the inferior materials, defects, and want of skill in its construction. The condenser was an utter failure and of no value. The libellant had concealed the fact that he was not using proper skill and materials, and thereby perpetrated a fraud upon him, and induced him (the claimant) to pay a thousand dollars, for which he asks judgment. This is the state of the pleadings between the two parties. The proof shows that the condenser and apparatus was furnished the boat, and that the materials and labor in it were reasonably worth $3,333.60; that libellant had been paid upon the same the sum of $1,000, and that the balance is still due thereon. Of course, if the proof sustains the allegations of the claimant, he is still entitled to a decree. The general facts are these: Jones, Leathers & Pauley, patentees of a condensing engine, which they represent as a machine of great merit, were very anxious to introduce it upon the boats of the Western waters. For this purpose they prevailed upon Capt. Stein, an old steamboatman, whose reputation as a navigator was very high, to adopt the machine and place it upon his new boat. Moore, the libellant, was a machinist, manufacturing machinery for steamboats, having no connection with the patentees, or interest in the patent.

This is the position of the three parties when they undertook to make the arrangement, out of which this difficulty originated. The original and incipient steps were as follows: Witness Thorp says, that Leathers, one of the patentees, solicited him to use his influence with Capt. Stein to have him put a condenser on his boat, and that if it failed, it should cost him nothing. Leathers himself says, that he induced Stein to put it on, and that he made the arrangements for that purpose with Stein. The letters in the case also show an effort upon the part of the patentees to induce Capt. Stein to enter into this contract. The letter of Pauley, which Leathers says was written under his direction, states: "Captain Stein and myself had a talk Saturday, and we have come to the conclusion that it would be best for you to go down with Stein, if you possibly can make the trip, that is to Vicksburg. He wants the condensers, and he wants you (Moore) to build them. Capt. Leathers and myself will guarantee them." Now as to the agreement, Moore says that he told Capt. Stein, in the presence of McFarland, the engineer, that he took no responsibility whatever in regard to the working of the machine, and he gives the following as the understanding between the parties: First—He was to build the machine. Second—That Capt. Stein was to pay him for it. Third—That Capt Leathers was to assist Stein in payment, either by negotiating his paper, or giving time. McFarland corroborates Moore in assuming no responsibility whatever in regard to the working of the machine, the conversation having taken place in his presence. Nor does Capt. Stein contradict this in terms. He insists from time to time that Leathers should be responsible to Moore for the balance of this money. He goes so far as to cause Moore to draw a check upon Leathers. And when suit is about to be brought, he urges, "Wait until I can see Leathers. Leathers ought to be responsible for this." According to the view which I take of the testimony, Captain Stein evidently had that idea, that these patentees, who had more interest in the thing than anybody else, who had everything at stake in its success, who selected the most prudent captain upon the entire river to introduce this wonderful invention of theirs, by placing it upon his new boat which he was then constructing, were responsible for its success. What duty does the law impose upon each? It will not be denied that when a mechanic undertakes to perform any work, or to furnish any materials, he is required to do it in a skillful and workmanlike manner; that the materials must be proper and suitable for the purpose. If he undertake to make an article for a specific purpose, it must be reasonably fit and suited for that purpose. Was the mechanical labor performed in a skillful and workmanlike manner?

Testimony clearly shows that the workmanship was good, and that the materials furnished were up to the standard. He is a machinist of good reputation, and was on that very account selected by the patentees. Ross, McFarland and Goode, the engineer of the boat, all testify to the good character of the work. It is true, Jones and Stein both claim that the workmanship was inferior; but then Stein is no machinist, and Jones in a previous letter made no specific objections to the machinery. The law, however, requires, that he who undertakes to make a particular article, for a specific purpose, shall make that particular article fit for the uses and purposes for which it was constructed; but it is also a well known proposition in law that the machinist may by a specific contract release himself from this responsibility. This Moore claims he had done, by refusing to guarantee it. It appears that the machine was simply an experiment. Out of the hundreds of boats navigating the Western waters only three have adopted it. No wonder that Moore, who had never manufactured the machine, refused to take the responsibility. The patentees claimed that the machine was so valuable that there "was millions in it." The machine was an utter failure; it failed to answer the purpose required of it. But as Moore made it at Captain Stein's instance, and as Moore refused to guarantee it, the law imposes the duty of paying for it upon Captain Stein. The patentees are the only men who guaranteed it. They said that Stein should not lose anything if it was a failure; that if it did not perform its office, Stein should pay nothing for it. And how, in the face of all these letters of theirs, they can say that they have nothing to do with it, is very strange to me. Now what is the law upon this state of facts? Broom, Leg. Max. 776, 777, states: "Accordingly, where an agreement is for a specific chattel, in its then state, there is no implied warranty of its fitness or merchantable quality; but if a person is employed to make a specific chattel, there the law implies a contract on his part that it shall be fit for the purpose for which it is ordinarily used." Such, I said, would be the law in this case, if the party who made it was not protected by a specific contract which he made, that he would assume no such responsibility. But this doctrine is laid down by Broom, and is recognized in Benj. Sales, 479; Chit. Cont. 391; and Strong, Sales, 371, as modified in Broom, Leg. Max. 661, where he says: "A marked distinction will at once be noticed between the cases falling within the class just noticed" (which is the class I have alluded to) "and those in which it has been held that, where a warranty or contract of sale has reference to a certain specific chattel the purchaser will be liable for the price agreed upon, on proof that the particular chattel specified has been duly sent according to the order, and will not be permitted to engraft any additional terms upon the contract. If, for instance a two-color printing machine, being a known and ascertained article, has been ordered by the defendant, he cannot excuse himself from liability to pay for it by saying that the article in question does not answer his purpose, because the sole undertaking, in this case, on the part of the vendor, was to supply the particular article ordered, and that undertaking has been performed by him. If, on the other hand, the article ordered by the defendant were not a known and ascertained article, as if he had merely ordered, and plaintiff had agreed to supply, a machine for printing two colors, the defendant would not be liable, unless the instrument were reasonably fit for the purpose for which it was ordered. In Benjamin on Sales (section 56) he says: "A mistake by the buyer in supposing that the article bought by him will answer a certain purpose for which it turns out to be unavailable, is not a mistake as to the subject-matter of the contract, but is a collateral fact, and affords no ground for pretending that he did not assent to the bargain, whatever may be his right afterward to rescind it if the vendor warranted its adaptability to the intended purpose." And in Story on Sales (section 372): "Thus, where the plaintiff was the patentee and manufacturer of a patent machine for printing two colors, and the defendant, having seen one of the machines on the plaintiff's premises, ordered one, the plaintiff in a written memorandum undertaking to make 'a two-color printing machine on my patent principle' —and in an action for the price, defendant excuses himself from liability on the ground that the machine had been found useless for printing in two colors. It was held that if the machine described was a known and ascertained article, ordered by the defendant, he was liable whether it answered the purpose or not; but that if it were not a known and ascertained article, and the plaintiff merely agreed to supply a machine for printing in two colors, the defendant was not liable unless the instrument was reasonably fit for such a purpose." This doctrine is very clearly laid down in Ollivant v. Bayley, 5 Q. B. 288; Chanter v. Hopkins, 4 Mees. & W. 399; Prideaux v. Bunnett, 1 C. B. (N. S.) 613, where the authorities are cited on this question.

Here, in this case, a known patentable article is purchased, and the machinist undertakes to supply it in accordance with the plans furnished to him. If it operates, all well and good. The law requires him to construct it according to the well-recognized plan. If he fail to do this, and the machine does not operate on that account, he loses his money. It appears that at the request of the patentees and Captain Stein, he, Moore, goes to New Orleans and Memphis to inspect the working of a similar machine on board the Natchez. The patentees furnish the plans, and one of them testifies that these plans were correct drawings of the condenser upon the Natchez. Moore says, that the machine he built was in exact accordance with the plans furnished to him except as to the position of the condenser. There is no proof that this change caused the failure of the machine. If he undertook to make any changes, and these changes were the cause of the failure, he would have to stand the loss. In such a case Captain Stein could rely upon the judgment of the mechanic, and if the proof showed that the attempted improvement led to the failure, the mechanic was responsible. But there is no proof that the breaking of the valves, or failure of this machine, was owing to any change made by Moore in the plans.

There is, however, one significant fact in the case, which has an important bearing on the conclusion to which we have come. There is a letter of Jones, one of the patentees, written after the failure of the steam condenser, in which he says: "It is true that the drawings were handed to you (Moore) by Pauley, and I presume that he mentioned to you that the valves must be balanced, and that the drawings in this respect must be modified." And then goes on to say that they intend making improvements in the plans until they are perfect. Here is an admission that these plans furnished to Moore are incorrect, and now when the machine fails, they attempt to shield themselves upon the pretense that it was not properly constructed. What were the defects of the plans, or the cause of the failure of the machine, does not appear. Moore and Goode, the engineer of the boat, are positive that the result was produced by a too great pressure of steam. The great fact, however, remains, that Moore made the machine according to the plans furnished by the patentees, and that these plans were wrong. In the construction of a defined machine he has fully complied with what the law requires. It is hard upon Capt. Stein. Had the patentees been before the court, Capt. Stein could have called upon them to fulfill their guarantee. As it is, a decree must be rendered for the libellant for the balance due upon his account, $2,333.

MOORE v. CONNECTICUT MUT. LIFE INS. CO.

[1 Flip. 363; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 319; 3 Ins. Law J. 444; 4 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 138.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. April, 7–12, 1874.

LIFE INSURANCE—SUICIDE PROVIDED AGAINST—THE LAW ON THAT SUBJECT.

1. The policy had this clause in it: "If the assured shall die by his own hand," etc., "this policy shall be void and of no effect." Held, that

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 1 Am. Law T. Rep. (N. S.) 319, contains only a partial report.]

"suicide" and "die by his own hand," mean, in general terms, the same thing.

2. In a suicide sanity is always presumed, and insanity must be proven, by one claiming exemption on that account. Nor is suicide evidence of insanity in itself alone.

[Wolff v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co., Case No 17,929.]

3. The presumption of fact, in such case, is that the person "died by his or her own hand," in the sense of the policy. The plaintiff must show the contrary.

4. Every degree of insanity will not exempt a person from the consequences of an act. There must be more than error of judgment. There must be mental disorder.

5. In order to render the defendant liable the mind of the party assured must have been so far deranged as to be incapable of rational judgment in regard to the act of self destruction. The plaintiff must prove that the assured was moved by an insane impulse which he could not resist, or that his powers of reason were so far overthrown as that he could not exercise them in reference to the act of self destruction.

6. "General nature, consequence and effect of the act," are words not restricted to the act of taking his life, but to the result of it. They refer to the accomplished act of suicide.

At law.

C. I. Walker and A. Pond, for plaintiff.

A. B. Maynard and G. V. N. Lothrop, for defendant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge (charging jury). This suit is brought by Lottie A. Moore, the wife of Everett W. Moore, to recover the amount of a policy issued by defendant to her on the life of her late husband, for $5,000. The contract itself is not disputed, but there is a clause in it that raises the whole question in this case, and that clause is as follows: "If the assured shall die by his own hand," etc., "this policy shall be void and of no effect."

That the assured took his own life there is no dispute. The simple question is whether the circumstances under which he took his own life are such as to bring the case within that provision of the policy, that is, was it within the sense of the words "die by his own hand," as these words were used in the policy?

These words, "die by his own hand," mean the same as suicide, in general terms. That was decided in the case of Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 591, which has been laid before you here, and it has been seen all the way through in the argument of this case, and from the books which have been read, that the discussion of this very clause, and the words similar to it, proceed upon the same principles and upon the same general considerations as suicide; and, consequently, I call your attention in the first place to the definition of suicide as bearing upon the question here under consideration, and I will read that from 4 Bl. Comm. 189. Suicide was placed so long ago as the time when Blackstone wrote, and still stands there by the English law, and also so far recognized and provided for or against in this country, as felonious homicide. It is placed in the same category as murder. I read from Blackstone as follows:

"Felonious homicide is an act of a very different nature from the former," (that is, of excusable homicide,) "being the killing of a human creature of any age or sex without justification or excuse. This must be done either by killing one's self or another man."

"Self murder—the pretended heroism, but real cowardice of the stoic philosophers, who destroyed themselves to avoid the ills which they had not the fortitude to endure—though the attempting it seems to be countenanced by the civil law, yet was punished by the Athenian law with the cutting off the hand which committed the desperate deed. And also the law of England wisely and religiously considers that no man hath a power to destroy life but by commission from God, the author of it; and, as the suicide is guilty of a double offense, one spiritual, in evading the prerogative of the Almighty, and rushing into his immediate presence uncalled for; the other temporal, against the king, who hath an interest in the preservation of all his subjects; the law has, therefore, ranked this among the highest crimes, making it a peculiar species of felony—a felony committed on one's self; and this admits of accessories before the fact, as well as other felonies, for if one persuades another to kill himself, and he does so, the adviser is guilty of murder."

Now comes the definition of suicide, which I desire to call your particular attention to: "A felo de se, therefore, is he who deliberately puts an end to his own existence, or commits any unlawful, malicious act, the consequence of which is his own death, as if attempting to kill another he runs upon his antagonist's sword, or shooting at another the gun bursts and kills himself. The party must be of years of discretion and in his senses, else it is no crime."

That this party was of years of discretion there is no dispute. The only dispute in this case is as to his being in his senses when he committed the act. In regard to this, sanity is presumed. All persons are presumed to be sane until the contrary is proven. Insanity must always be proven by the party claiming an exemption on account of it. The fact of suicide is not of itself evidence of insanity. That, however, is not disputed, and I need not stop to discuss it to any length whatever.

This covers the first and second of defendant's requests to charge, which I will here read for the purpose of disposing of them.

The defendant requests the court to charge the jury: 1st—"It being admitted that the assured, Everett W. Moore, destroyed his own life, it is a presumption in fact that he "died by his own hand," and in the sense of the policy, and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show that he came to his death under such circumstances as makes the defendant liable upon the policy." This is correct, and I so charge you. 2d—"There is no presumption arising from the act of self destruction that it was the result of insanity, and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to prove that at the time of the death of the said Everett W. Moore, he was insane to such a degree that the defendant is liable upon the policy."

This is simply the proposition that I have already stated, with, however, perhaps a very little qualification. The charge, as I give it to you is, that suicide is not of itself evidence of insanity, standing alone by itself; and the burden is upon the plaintiff in this case to show that insanity existed, and that it was of such a nature and degree as to make the company liable. I will, therefore, next call your attention to the degree of insanity that will not or that will excuse or exempt the party from the provision in the policy.

First, it is not every degree of insanity that will exempt the party taking his own life from the consequences of the act. A person may from anger, jealousy, shame, pride, dread of exposure, fear of coming to poverty, or the desire to escape from the ills of life be considered in a certain sense insane; but these alone are not enough to exempt him from the consequences of self destruction, where he committed the act deliberately and intelligently.

In regard to this it is sufficient to explain that an error of judgment as to the commission of the act is not sufficient to exempt the party—a mere error of judgment, for we may say that all men, perhaps, who decide to take their own lives, when they do it deliberately and intelligently, commit an error of judgment. That is not sufficient to exempt them.

Mental disorder, amounting to insanity, must appear in order to exempt the party. But while these causes, which I have named, are not sufficient alone (such as anger, dread of exposure, a desire to escape from the ills of life, etc.), to exempt the party from the consequences of suicide, there undoubtedly may be circumstances under which these operating together with other circumstances upon the mind, may produce a disorder of the mind. And that is for the jury to determine in every case. Where they have produced a disorder of the mind, then it is that which you are to consider, and not the mere peculiar causes which produced it. And in this connection, I will notice the third, fourth, and fifth of the defendant's requests, and the plaintiff's first request.

The plaintiff requests the court to charge the jury: "That if the death of the deceased was not his voluntary, intelligent act, he did not die by his own hand within the meaning of the policy." That is correct as a general principle, and I so charge you.

The defendant's third request is as follows: "If the assured, being in possession of his reasoning faculties, and from shame, pride, a dread of exposure, or a desire to escape from the ills of life, intentionally took his own life, there can be no recovery." This I have already explained to you.

The fourth request is: "If the assured was embarrassed in his business, or had drawn checks without having any funds upon which to draw, or had committed forgeries and exposure was imminent, or was in a distressed state of mind from this or some other cause, and for any or all of these reasons he formed a determination to take his own life, because, in the exercise of his usual reasoning faculties, he preferred death to life, then the company is not liable." This is undoubtedly correct, and I so charge you. If for these reasons he took his own life in the exercise of his usual reasoning faculties, then the company is not liable.

5th—"It is not every kind or degree of insanity that will so far excuse the act of self-destruction as to make the company liable." I have already covered this in my charge. I merely read these now for the purpose of disposing of them.

Thus far there is no great difficulty in applying the law to any given case, or to this case. You will next proceed to the question of the degree of insanity that will excuse. Here the difficulty, in cases of this kind, begins, and your real burdens in this case commence. The court can aid you but little in this respect, further than to lay down the general principles by which you are to be governed. These have been well defined by the highest court of adjudicature in this country, by whose decision this court and the jury must be governed. They are well set forth in the requests of the respective counsel.

I will now read the sixth and seventh requests of defendant's counsel, which are as follows: 6th—"To have this effect—that is, that insanity shall have the effect to excuse the act—the mind must be so far deranged as to have made the deceased incapable of using a rational judgment in regard to the act of self-destruction." This is correct, and I so charge you.

7th—"To make the defendant liable, the plaintiff must prove either, first, that the assured was impelled by an insane impulse which the reason that was left him did not enable him to resist; or, secondly, that his reasoning powers were so far overthrown that he could not exercise them on the act which he was about to do." This request is correct law, and I so charge you.

The plaintiff's second request virtually covers the same ground, and I will simply read it for the purpose of showing that fact, and for the purpose of disposing of it: "If the deceased was impelled to the act by an insane impulse which the reason that was left him did not enable him to resist, or if his reasoning powers were so far overthrown by his mental condition that he could not exercise his reasoning faculties in the act he was about to do, the company is liable." This is correct, and I so charge you.

I will now dispose of plaintiff's third request, as to which there is some dispute between counsel. The request is as follows: "If the death was caused by the voluntary act of the deceased, he knowing and intending that his death would be the result of his act, and when his reasoning faculties were so far impaired that he was not able to understand the moral character, general nature, consequences and effects, of the act he was about to commit; or, if he was impelled thereto by an insane impulse which he had not the power to resist, such death was not within the contemplation of the parties to the contract, and the insurer is liable."

The last part of the request is included in the second request, and it can be just as well stricken out, and I will leave it out for the purpose of perspicuity in considering this particular request. I will read it again, leaving out that last clause: "If the death was caused," etc., "when his reasoning faculties were so impaired that he was not able to understand the moral character, the general nature, consequence and effect of the act he was about to commit, the company is liable."

That is the request which the court has been asked to give. The criticism upon this request by defendant's counsel is, in the first place, that, although so declared by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Life Ins. Co. v. Terry [15 Wall. (82 U. S.) 580], it was merely dictum—that it was not included in the points presented to the court for decision, and consequently is not binding upon this court, and that it is not good law. If that declaration of the supreme court was within the question presented, it is absolutely binding upon this court and upon you. We will, therefore, first consider that question.

I think the learned court of appeals of New York, which has made the same criticism on the decision of the supreme court (Van Zandt v. Mutual Ben. Life Ins. Co., 55 N. Y. 169), and the learned counsel in this case have overlooked one peculiar feature of the case of Life Ins. Co. v. Terry [supra], and that is the refusal of the court below to charge as requested. This precise question was presented in the request to charge, which the court refused to give, and the charge which was given by the court below must be read in connection with and in the light of the requests which had been made and refused, and that request presenting this exact question of the moral character of the act, and of moral insanity, in my opinion was clearly and fully before the supreme court. For the purpose of sustaining that position, I will read the request which was refused, and in response to which the charge was given which was given.

The second request on the part of the defendant was: "That if the jury believe, from the evidence, that the said self-destruction of said George Terry was intended by him, he having sufficient capacity at the time to understand the nature of the act he was about to commit, and the consequence which would result from it, then in that case it was wholly immaterial that he was impelled thereto by insane impulse which impaired his sense of moral responsibility, and rendered him to a certain extent irresponsible for his action," thus presenting the exact question upon which the supreme court passed, and which is embodied in the plaintiff's third request.

It is true, the court below did not include in express terms in the charge given this moral responsibility or of moral insanity, but the terms used in the charge which was given are broad enough to include that; and in view of the fact that the court had been requested to charge otherwise, and then using expressions which are broad enough to include that, it is fair to presume that it was so included, and that the jury so understood.

The language of the charge as given was as follows: "If he was impelled to the act by an insane impulse which the reason that was left him did not enable him to resist, or if his reasoning powers were so far overthrown by his mental condition that he could not exercise his reasoning faculties in the act he was about to do, the company is liable." This charge must be read in the light of the request which had been refused, and which expressly included the question of moral insanity.

I therefore hold that the question was disposed of finally by the supreme court in a manner absolutely binding upon this court. I therefore give the plaintiff's third request as stated. These words, "general nature, consequence and effect of the act," have been somewhat criticised, and I deem it my duty to make a few remarks in regard to them, as they are used in that decision. They do not refer to the act, in my opinion, by which the deceased took his life. They are broader than that; they refer to the entire act—not only the act by which he took his life, but the result of it; that is, they cover the "suicide," the accomplished fact, and that is what is referred to as the "general nature, consequence and effect of the act"—that is, the general nature of the suicide, of the murder committed upon one's self, the enormity and effect of it, otherwise it would be inconsistent with what precedes; because, if it was his voluntary act, he knowing and intending that his death would be the result, then it would be a simple absurdity to put the question to you, whether, under these circumstances, if he did not understand the general nature and consequences of the act, the company would be liable. That would be, I say, absurd. These words then, have a broader meaning, and cover the entire accomplished fact—the act of suicide.

In this view of the case, gentlemen of the jury, it is entirely unnecessary for me to detain you with any remarks or considerations, growing out of my own views or opinions as to the correctness of the law as established by the supreme court, and which has just been given you as contained in the plaintiff's third request. I will, therefore, pass it with a single remark, that a considerable time ago, after that case of Life Ins. Co. v. Terry had been decided in the court below, but before it was decided by the supreme court, I had occasion to pass upon the same question in the case of Wolff v. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. [see Case No. 17,929], and then decided as I now find myself enabled to decide, and my views have not changed upon that subject since that time.

Although I find it nowhere distinctly so stated, yet from the discussions upon the subject, I gather that these defenses, as they may be called, to the crime of suicide, are placed upon the same ground so far as this question of the moral character of the act is concerned, as defenses for murder. It has always been held that a person killing another when so insane as not to be capable of judging between right and wrong, should not be convicted of murder. What I mean is, the principle is the same, although the standard or degree may be different. This is virtually so stated in Life Ins. Co. v. Terry, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 591. This ability to judge between right and wrong, refers to a principle of the human mind. It does not depend at all upon what a man's religious belief may be, or whether he has any or has not. It does not depend upon whether he believes in a God and a future state, or the contrary. It refers to that principle which is planted in every human breast—that sense of right and wrong which exists in the mind of the disciples of Buddha or of Confucius, or of the followers of Mahomet or of Christ, and in the mind of him who believes in none of them. It is that sense of right and wrong that we all feel and realize and understand. It is true that sense is stronger in some persons than in others, but it is that to which reference is had in this connection.

The defendant's eighth request I will now consider.

Counsel for Defendant.—That is virtually passed upon by your honor; it is simply refused, as I understand it.

The Court.—Very well, that is all that need be said on that subject. Defendant's eighth request was as follows: "That the evidence in this case does not tend to show that degree of insanity on the part of the assured which excuses the act of self-destruction, and justifies the jury in rendering a verdict for the plaintiff; therefore the verdict must be for the defendant."

Gentlemen of the jury, I have done about all that I can do in this case, and have made these questions as clear as they can be made with the ability I have; and if it is not clear in your minds what your duty is, it rests in the difficulty of making it so more than in the efforts which have been made by the counsel on both sides, and by the court. The propositions of law that have been stated to you are such as there is no dispute about between counsel, with the exception of the last, and that has been determined by the supreme court, and we must obey. This case, gentlemen of the jury, rests upon presumptions entirely; that is to say, it rests upon the conclusions which you are to draw as to the existence of a certain fact from the proof of the existence of other facts. For insanity and the degree of it are not susceptible of positive proof in a case like this. There are instances in which it may be proven with a great degree of certainty by positive proof, such as in the case of a raving maniac; but here it rests upon presumptions entirely, and your decision of the case depends upon the conclusions which you shall draw as to the fact of sanity or insanity from the facts proven. You start out with the presumption of sanity. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to prove the contrary. If the plaintiff has sustained that burden, and has so proven to your satisfaction, then she may be entitled to recover at your hands. If she has not, then the defendant is entitled to your verdict.

The first question for you to determine is, Do the presumptions arising from the facts proven overcome the presumption of sanity? The truest test is whether the facts proven, from which you are asked to find insanity, are inconsistent with sanity. If they are so inconsistent with the exercise of sound mind that you cannot reasonably attribute such facts thereto, then they are evidence of insanity, but not otherwise.

Now there is a great range of indications as to soundness or unsoundness of mind, all the way from the ravings of the maniac, which are patent to the eye and the ear, down to the retiring melancholic, who seeks to conceal the worm which is gnawing at his mental vitality. These indications, I say, range all the way between these; and here is where the difficulty exists in coming to a correct conclusion as to what facts do indicate; but it is peculiarly and entirely and exclusively within your province, and I leave it to you without even rehearsing the facts or in any manner deciding them.

Evidence is that which carries conviction to the mind. You are to look at all the facts which have been proven, and to bring to bear upon them your best judgment aided by your experience and observations in life, and considerations to which you have access, without, however, going outside of the proofs in the case, and decide for yourselves whether, in the first place, Everett W. Moore, at the time he took his own life, was sane or insane. Secondly, if you shall find that he was insane, then whether under the charge that has been already given, he was so insane as to excuse or exempt him and this plaintiff from the consequences of the prohibition or disability in the policy. I recommend to you in your consideration to adopt that order: First, the question of insanity in general terms—was he insane? If you decide that he was not insane, then, of course, that is the end of it, and your verdict must be for the defendant. If you shall decide that he was insane, you must go then a step further, and inquire whether his insanity was of that degree and kind that you are satisfied that he was driven by an irresistible impulse to commit the act, or that he was incapable of exercising his reasoning powers as to the moral character, general effect and consequences of taking his own life. If, after finding that he was insane, you shall come to the conclusion that he was thus insane, the plaintiff is entitled to recover at your hands; otherwise not. If your verdict shall be for the plaintiff it will be for $5,000, and interest from the 30th day of December, 1873, to and including the present date.

Counsel for Defendant.—I desire, growing out of what your honor has said, to make another request: "That the mere fact that the assured did not fully understand and appreciate the moral character of the act of self-destruction, does not so far excuse the act as to make the defendant liable."

The Court.—I cannot see how this varies in any manner the charge as already given, and I therefore refuse this request, with the simple addition that the jury are to take this refusal into consideration, in connection with the charge which has already been given upon this subject.

The jury, after consideration, returned a verdict for plaintiff.

Defendant excepted to refusal of the court to charge as requested in eighth request, and the last request made above. Exception was also taken to the court ruling out the testimony offered by defendant of certain witnesses who had testified as to conduct of deceased prior to his death, and on which they had formed no opinion as to his sanity or insanity, but had, since his death formed an opinion. They were asked to state what this last opinion was, which was objected to as being incompetent and irrelevant and the objection was sustained by the court.

NOTE. "If he shall die by suicide" or "by his own hand," the self-destruction is voluntary, and the meaning is the same. See 7 Heisk. 567; 21 Pa. St. 466; 4 Hill, 74; 44 E. C. L. 336; 4 Allen, 96; [Life Ins. Co. v. Terry]; 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 591; 54 Me. 224. Mental insanity has been defined to be, where a person has not mind of sufficient strength to understand the physical act about to be committed, and moral insanity is where he cannot distinguish between right and wrong. Should the insanity be of either kind, the policy is not protected against by the words "suicide" or "dying by hand." See Terry v. Life Ins. Co. [Case No. 13,839], and 6 Bush, 268. For a further discussion as to the law bearing upon the questions raised in this case, see Equitable Life Assur. Soc. v. Patterson, 41 Ga. 338; Cooper v. Mutual Ins. Co., 102 Mass. 227; Minick v. MOORE v. The C. P. MOREY.

[8 Reporter, 583;[1] 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 359.]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. August 21, 1879.

ADMIRALTY — NEGLIGENCE — DUTY OF VESSEL IN TOW TO FURNISH PROPER LINE.

Where a tug took in tow a schooner, and the tow line was frozen and stiff, and the tug asked for a better line, but no other was furnished by the schooner: Held, that the tug was not liable for any damages resulting to the schooner from the line slipping off the tow post.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern District of New York.]

In admiralty.

Wm. A. Moore and George B. Hibbard, for libellant.

J. A. Hathaway and Albertus Perry, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The only negligence charged in the libel against the tug is, that the master and crew of the tug either recklessly threw off the line of the schooner from the tow post of the tug or carelessly permitted it to slip off while the schooner was in peril and danger of loss should her line be permitted to slip off the tow post of the tug. It is set up in the answer in defence that the captain and crew of the schooner undertook to furnish the tug with a sufficient tow line to tow the vessel into the harbor; that while the schooner was disabled and the current running out of the river and harbor and a heavy sea was rolling and a strong wind was blowing, all of which was well known to the crew of the schooner, her captain and crew neglected and refused to furnish to the tug a dry and suitable line for such purposes; but, on the contrary, furnished the tug with an improper and insufficient line for such purpose, for the reason that the line so furnished was wet and frozen and was covered with ice and was stiff and unyielding, and it was impossible for the captain and crew of the tug to make it fast or keep it from slipping on the post used for the purpose of fastening said tow line to; and that the crew made every effort that lay in their power to fasten and secure said line and prevent it from slipping and getting loose from said post, but were unable to prevent it from slipping and getting detached from said post. The district judge, in his decision, found that the slipping of the line was not owing to any negligence on the part of the tug, but arose from the fact that the line was frozen to such an extent that it could not be securely fastened; that notice of this fact was given by the crew of the tug to the crew of the schooner before the service was undertaken; that the crew of the tug gave their best efforts to the service, and that the tug fulfilled every requirement incumbent upon it for the safe performance of its duty. The same conclusions are arrived at in the findings made by this court. Under the circumstances of this case, the contract between the parties was only that the tug should do her best with the frozen line. She was tendered a frozen line; she asked for a better one; she was told that that was the only one there was, and she was substantially told to do the best she could with it; she did the best she could with it, and there her duty terminated. It was not her duty to have a better line, or an unfrozen line, or to see that the line was in a different condition from its actual condition. Any duty incumbent upon her in that regard was discharged by her objections distinctly made to the frozen line, out of which arose the contract that the tug should do the best that could be done with the use of the frozen line. Libel dismissed.

[1 Hayw. & H. 161.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. 7, 1843.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—PROPERTY RENTED FOR ANOTHER—LIABILITY.

Where a party agreed to rent certain premises and pay the rent for another, he will be liable for the rent without occupying the premises.

[This was an action by James Moore, Sr., against William T. Dove.]

J. Hellen, for plaintiff.

Jos. H. Bradley, for defendant.

This suit was brought for a year's rent of premises owned by the plaintiff. The declaration contained two counts. The first count alleged that the defendant occupied, possessed and enjoyed the said premises, and promised to pay the said rent. The second count that he, the defendant, promised to pay to the plaintiff for the premises, as much as the premises were worth, for the use and occupation and possession of said premises; and that he, the defendant, has not paid any part of the rent due. The plea of the defendant was non-assumpsit. Issue was joined, and the jury brought in a verdict for the plaintiff for $92.12. The defendant, by his attorney, moved for a new trial: Because the action was brought for the use and occupation of a tenement, and the only proof offered was that the defendant agreed to rent the same and pay the said rent for another person, and not for his own use, and that he never did occupy the same himself. The defendant, through his attorney, objected to the admissibility of said evidence in this action, but THE COURT overruled the objection, and instructed the jury if they believe the evidence the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Motion for new trial overruled and judgment entered on the verdict.

The court will not compel the opposite party to produce depositions taken by consent, nor enforce the private agreements of counsel, but will see that parties are not entrapped by such agreements.

Assault and battery.

Mr. Youngs, for defendant, stated to the court that the plaintiff had, by consent of defendant's counsel, taken the deposition of Mrs. Hodge and Mrs. May, and he now called upon the plaintiff to produce them, and prayed the court to compel the plaintiff to produce them. But THE COURT refused, there being no consent entered on record, and the court cannot undertake to enforce the private agreements of counsel, they must depend upon the honor of each other. The court will not suffer a party to be entrapped by such agreements. Verdict for the plaintiff, one cent.

MOORE et al. v. FOSTER et al.

[Chase, 222.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1868.

REBELLION—NOTE DRAWN WITHIN CONFEDERATE STATES—ACCEPTED IN SATISFACTION OF DEBT.

1. Any draft, bill, or note drawn in the Confederate States, or in any state, under the proclamation of the president declared in insurrection, or in any part of them (except such part as was permanently and absolutely under the control of the forces of the United States), upon any person or persons in the Federal lines, was absolutely void as to the maker and all other parties thereto, and was not to be received in payment or satisfaction of any debt due to a citizen of a state adhering to the government.

2. When such a draft has been received, the jury must be satisfied upon good evidence that it was accepted in satisfaction of the debt.

In 1860, Foster & Moore of Norfolk, owed Moore & Brother of Baltimore, nine hundred and twenty dollars, due by negotiable notes, which fell due during the occupation of Norfolk by the Confederate army. After the evacuation of that city, Moore & Brother came to Norfolk, and Foster & Moore agreed to pay the amount of their liabilities to them in Virginia money, i. e., the bills of Virginia banks. Foster & Moore then bought a draft for one thousand dollars, drawn by the Bank of Windsor, N. C., on the Bank of Portsmouth, Va. This draft was endorsed by Maury & Co., Smith of Norfolk, and other responsible parties, and made payable to the order of Moore & Brother, to whom it was sent. They neglected to have the draft presented, and some two months afterward the Bank of Portsmouth ran its assets into the Confederate lines. They held the draft until 1867, and it was never paid. Under these circumstances, Moore & Brother brought suit upon the original notes, and tendered the draft back to Foster & Moore, who refused to receive it.

Gilmer & Son, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Guigon and John Howard, for defendants.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, instructed the jury as follows: 1st. That any draft, bill, or note drawn in the Confederate States, or in any state under the proclamation of the president declared in insurrection, or in any part of them (except such part as was permanently and absolutely under the control of the forces of the United States), upon any person or persons in the Federal lines, was void as to the maker and all other parties thereto, and was not to be received in payment of any debt when due to a citizen of any state adhering to the government; but there being a question as to whether the Bank of Windsor was, at the time this draft was drawn, in the Federal or Confederate lines, that question was for the jury to determine. 2nd. That the jury must be satisfied that the plaintiffs accepted this draft in satisfaction of the debt due them, upon good evidence.

The jury failed to agree.

[Hempst. 536.] [1]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SALE UNDER EXECUTION—APPRAISING PROPERTY—CONTRACTS MADE BEFORE PASSAGE OF LAW.

1. A state law, providing that a sale shall not be made of property under execution unless it will bring two thirds of the valuation affixed to it by three householders, is unconstitutional and void, as to contracts made before its passage. McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 608.

2. But such a law is valid as to contracts made after its passage, because the laws in existence at the time are necessarily referred to, and form a part of the contract, as effectually as if incorporated in it.

3. Motion to quash appraisement, overruled.

[Action by Alexander D. Moore against Absalom Fowler, Felix G. Secrest, Lewis Snapp, and William Brown, Jr.] Motion to quash appraisement, and the return of the marshal on execution.

George C. Watkins and J. M. Curran, for plaintiff.

A. Fowler, for himself and other defendants.

JOHNSON, District Judge. In the case of McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 608, the supreme court of the United States have established the doctrine, that a state law, providing that a sale shall not be made of property levied on under an execution, unless it will bring two thirds of its valuation, according to the opinion of three householders, is unconstitutional and void. My opinion was different. U. S. v. Conway [Case No. 14,849]. But the rule established by the supreme court is the law of this court, and to which I shall always cheerfully conform, whatever may be my own views. But the court expressly limit and restrict the operation of this principle to contracts made before the passage of the law, and declare it inapplicable to contracts made after its passage, upon the ground that the laws in existence when the contract is made are necessarily referred to and form a part of the contract, as the measure of the obligation to perform it by the one party, and the rights acquired by the other. Was the contract in the present case made prior, or posterior to the appraisement act of 1840? The writing obligatory, upon which the action is founded, bears date on the 16th of August, 1844, and consequently was made subsequent to the passage of the act, and is subject to its provisions. Acts 1840, pp. 58, 59. It is contended, however, that this latter contract grew out of a prior one made by the defendant Fowler, before the passage of the act of 1840, and that the date of the original contract is to be considered as the time of making the contract upon which the judgment is based in this suit. I cannot accede to this position. The original contract, on which the first judgment rests, was entered into jointly by Robert Crittenden and Absalom Fowler. The contract upon which the judgment rests in this case was entered into and made jointly by Absalom Fowler, Felix Secrest, Lewis Snapp, and John Brown. The three latter persons were not parties to the original contract, and, as far as they are concerned, it is undoubtedly a new contract; and if it is a new contract as to them, it is equally so as to Fowler; it being an entirety, and not in its nature divisible. Motion overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. Nov. Term, 1854.[2]

REAL PROPERTY—FRAUDULENT TRANSFERS—BILL TO SET ASIDE—STATUTE OF LIMITATION—TIME WHEN FRAUD DISCOVERED—WILL—EVIDENCE.

1. Under the laws of Rhode Island, a will of lands cannot be admitted as evidence of a devise, until it has been duly probated by the decree of a court having jurisdiction to admit it to probate.

2. To avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, set up in the answer, upon the ground of a concealed fraud, the bill must allege that the fraud was discovered within twenty years, and must show when and how it was discovered; and the evidence must satisfactorily support these averments.

[Cited in Martin v. Smith, Case No. 9,164; Baldwin v. Raplee, Id. 801; Re Dole, Id. 3,965.]

3. The statute of limitations bars equitable relief founded on a good legal title fraudulently suppressed or destroyed, in twenty years after the discovery of the fraud, in analogy to the statute bar operating in courts of law; for a court of equity will not relieve against fraud, after the lapse of such a time since its discovery, as would have barred the title at law, if no fraud had existed.

[Cited in brief in Butler v. Lawson, 72 Mo. 244; Kansas Pac. Ry. Co. v. McCormick, 20 Kan. 111.]

[This was a bill by Elizabeth Moore against Ray Greene and Benjamin W. Hawkins to set aside certain titles on the ground of fraud.]

Mr. Randall, for complainant.

Tillinghast & Bradley, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a suit in equity. The bill states that John Manton, of Johnston, in the state of Rhode Island, died in the year 1767, leaving a will duly executed, to pass his lands, whereby he devised them to his two granddaughters, Lydia and Betsy Waterman, children of his then deceased daughter Anna, wife of Benjamin Waterman; that Betsy Waterman intermarried with Daniel Carpenter, and the complainant is her daughter and sole surviving heir. The bill further states, that at the time of his decease, John Manton left two other daughters, one the wife of Joshua Greene, and the other, the wife of Ephraim Pearce; and that the testator's three sons-in-law, conspiring together to defraud the two grandchildren of the lands devised to them, procured, by fraud, the town council, which then had jurisdiction over the probate of wills, to refuse probate of Manton's will, and thereupon to appoint an administrator. That, in further pursuance of their fraudulent design, they proceeded to, and did make partition by deed among themselves, in severalty, of all Manton's lands, and then procured the administrator of Manton, under a license from the general assembly of the province, to sell the lands to pay fictitious debts of Manton, which they pretended were due to some of them, and so obtained colorable titles to the lands in severalty, under which it is alleged the defendants now claim some of those lands which the bill seeks to recover. The defendant, Ray Greene, answers, that he holds by descent from his father, and purchase from other heirs of his father, certain lands, formerly belonging to Manton, purchased by his grandfather of the administrator of Manton, and devised by his grandfather to his father. He denies all knowledge or information of the fraud charged in the bill; avers, upon information and belief, that his grandfather's purchase was legal and fair; and sets up the possession of his grandfather, of his father, and of himself, for a period of upwards of eighty years, and the statute of Rhode Island for quieting possessions, in bar of the bill. The other defendant, Hawkins, while he does not admit that the lands held by him were ever lands of Manton, sets forth his title thereto by purchase, and also relies on the possession of himself and of those under whom he claims, and upon the same statute for quieting possessions, as a bar. He also denies all knowledge or information of the fraud alleged in the bill.

[1] [Reported by Hon. B. R. Curtis, Circuit Justice.]

The complainant presents two titles. The first by devise to her mother, whose heir she is by the alleged will of John Manton, of one moiety of his lands. The second by descent to her mother from John Manton, one of whose heirs she was, being one of the two children of his deceased daughter.

The first of these titles it is not possible to sustain. This court can give no effect to a will of lands in Rhode Island, until it has been duly proved by the competent authority empowered to allow wills, and admit them to probate. Tompkins v. Tompkins [Case No. 14,091]; Mathewson v. Sprague [Id. 9,278]. See Gaines v. Chew, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 646, and cases there cited. But if it were otherwise, there is no competent evidence in this case to show what the will of Manton was. The will itself is not produced, nor is there one witness examined in the cause who ever saw it, or can speak to any part of its contents. All there is upon the record on this subject, are certain traditions existing in the neighborhood, that Manton's will gave his lands to these two grandchildren. Manifestly, this is wholly insufficient, and the title by devise must be at once laid aside.

The other title by descent seems to be made out in proof, so far as respects the pedigree; and the first question is, assuming that the lands held by the defendants belonged to Manton at his decease, whether the bar of the statute of limitations can be got over. Before considering this question, it is proper to state, that it has not been insisted, nor could it be, consistently with what appears on the face of the bill, that the complainant is not within the statute, because the alleged frauds had been kept concealed, so that the complainant, or those under whom she claims, had only discovered them within twenty years. For the bill alleges, that as early as 1797, these alleged frauds were fully investigated in the course of a trial of an action brought by other heirs of Manton, and that that suit was brought in consequence of inquiries made by the complainant and the plaintiffs in that suit. And the bill also avers, that from the death of John Manton, in 1767, up to the year 1824, renewed and continual claims have been made by the heirs of Lydia and Betsy Waterman, of whom the plaintiff is one, for their portions of Manton's lands, as his rightful heirs at law, upon all persons in possession. It does not say, in terms, that those continual claims were founded on the frauds charged in this bill; but as no other ground of claim is therein suggested, the fair conclusion is, that during all this period, the frauds alleged have been known and insisted on. It is true, the bill alleges that the complainant was ignorant, until some time not specified, that Manton died seized of part of these lands, being those situate in the town of Gloucester; but as the public records of the town showed the fact, and as she did become apprised of it as soon as she caused them to be examined, and as the fact of his dying so seized, did not affect her title to relief, but only introduced another tract of land to which the same relief might be extended, it does not seem to be material, if she has recently made this discovery. But there is no proof that it is a recent discovery; and after a litigation which, according to the bill, has lasted since 1767, concerning the title of Manton's lands, there is no presumption that the complainant had not notice of what appeared on the public registry of titles of the town, where Manton was known to her, at one time, to have had extensive possessions. The bill does contain an averment, that ten years have not elapsed, since the discovery of the frauds of the sons-in-law and administrator of Manton; but it not only fails to show when and how it was discovered,—Stearns v. Page, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 829; Fisher v. Boody [Case No. 4,814],—but the averment is inconsistent with the other statements in the bill already detailed. I am of opinion therefore, that this case stands nakedly, upon the statute of limitations, the bill not averring such concealment and ignorance of the alleged fraud, as to avoid the bar, if one exists upon the facts. For it is settled that the statute of limitations is applied by a court of equity to a case of fraud, after the expiration of twenty years from its discovery by the party defrauded. And it is equally clear, that if the complainant would avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, he must show by his bill the grounds of such avoidance. In Stearns v. Page, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 829, Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, speaking of charges of fraud where much time had elapsed, says, "And especially must there be distinct averments as to the time when the fraud was discovered, and what the discovery is, so that the court may see, whether by the exercise of ordinary diligence, the discovery might not have been before made." In Carr v. Hilton [Case No. 2,437], this court held, that to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, the complainant must not only allege his ignorance of the fraud, but must show when and how it was discovered, and offer satisfactory evidence of the truth of these averments. These positions are deducible from settled rules of pleading. If a bill contains no sufficient matter to avoid the bar of the statute of limitations, the defendant may plead what is called a pure plea of that statute; and unless the complainant amends his bill, and inserts what he relies on as a reply to the statute, his suit is at an end. But if he does so amend, and avers infancy, coverture, or ignorance of fraud, he must support these averments, if they are denied, or he still fails to remove the bar. And as this bill does not contain any satisfactory statement, as to when or how the alleged fraud was discovered, and the case is entirely bare of evidence to show these facts, and the fraud is denied by the answers, the court cannot treat this as a case of secret fraud, discovered by the complainant within twenty years.

That those under whom the defendants claim, acquired an actual and open seizin in 1767, under deeds purporting to convey the fee-simple of the land, is shown by the bill. It details, with particularity, the different partition deeds, and deeds from Manton's administrator, charges them to be tainted with fraud, and avers, "whereby the said Lydia and Betsy Waterman, while infants, and their heirs were and have been wrongfully and unjustly defrauded, and ever since fraudulently kept out of possession of their rightful shares, proportions, and inheritances of, in, and to the large real estates of their maternal grandparent." Taking the averments of the bill together, they amount to this; that the three sons-in-law of Manton, entered, in 1767, under deeds conveying the lands in fee, and have ever since claimed by themselves or their heirs or grantees, to own the lands, and have kept out of possession the complainant, and all others claiming under the two granddaughters. It cannot be questioned therefore, that there is a bar from lapse of time, unless there is some mode of avoiding it. The complainant's counsel has urged several modes; the first is, that the statute of limitations of Rhode Island requires twenty years "uninterrupted quiet, peaceable, and actual seizin and possession," and it is urged, that inasmuch as suits were from time to time brought by persons who claimed under the same title as the complainant, against persons under whom these respondents claim, those suits stopped the running of the statute, though they were not for the same tracts of land sued for in this action, and though all of them finally terminated, against the title relied on by the complainant, and in favor of the title under which the respondents claim. Perhaps it is a sufficient answer to this position to say, that the earliest of these proceedings alleged in the bill was not commenced until December, 1795, twenty-eight years after the adverse possession was begun. But in addition to this, the institution of a suit to recover lands, in which the plaintiff fails, does not interrupt the quiet, peaceable, and actual possession and seizin of the defendant, even where that suit is between the same parties, and for the same land afterwards in contestation; nor does it tend to show that the title or possession of the party seized is defective. On the contrary the more his right is questioned, and the oftener he maintains it successfully, the stronger is the presumption that he is lawfully in possession, and the more clearly and notoriously is his possession adverse and effectual. It would be singular indeed, if the complainant could be assisted to set aside the bar of the statute, by showing that third persons had made repeated attempts to set up the title on which she relies, and had failed in those attempts. It is true, the bill charges that they did recover some verdicts, which were set aside, or appealed from, or reviewed, so that no final judgment was rendered thereon; and it attributes these failures to causes, which being disrespectful to the courts and judges of the state of Rhode Island, should hardly have been stated, without some evidence to support them; and I find no such evidence on the record.

My opinion is, that there was the necessary seizin and possession to constitute a bar, unless the complainant can bring the case within the proviso of the statute, by showing some disability. The facts upon this point are, that the seizin of those under whom the respondents claim, began in 1767. In 1777, Betsy Waterman, the complainant's mother, became of age, and her title would become barred in 1787. Why was not her title then barred? The complainant's counsel makes several answers.

That she was then under coverture. But it is settled that cumulative disabilities cannot be allowed. A party can avail himself only of the disability which existed when the title was acquired. There are many decisions that if an infant marry, her right of action is barred when the time allowed to her, as an infant, has expired, although she may then be under coverture. But it is enough to refer to the decision of the supreme court in Mercer's Lessee v. Selden, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 37.

It is also argued that her right was suspended because her husband had an estate by the courtesy in the land. This is not so; for an actual seizin is necessary to create such an estate, and it does not appear that her husband ever entered. Mercer's Lessee v. Selden, supra. Another ground is that Betsy Waterman died before the expiration of ten years, allowed to her, after she became of age. This fact is not averred in the bill, and it has already been stated, that if the complainant desired to avoid the bar of the statute, by bringing her case within any saving in the proviso, it was necessary to plead the facts upon which such exemption is claimed. But if this defect did not exist, the proof fails to show that she died as early as 1787. The only evidence exhibited to the court, on this point, is the testimony of Thaddeus Spencer, who says he never knew the complainant's mother, she must have died many years ago; and Benjamin Thornton, who says he cannot tell when she died,—he don't know how old the complainant was when her mother died, but always understood it was in her infancy, when she was quite young. Now the proof is, that the complainant was about twenty years of age when she was married, in 1804; if so she was born in 1784. Certainly this is not sufficient to show that her mother in fact died as early as 1787. If she died in 1788, the complainant was then only in the fourth year of her age, which might be called in her infancy, when she was quite young, as Thornton heard she was. From whom he heard it, or when; whether the tradition came from sources which would make it evidence, even as to a matter respecting which tradition or reputation is admissible, does not appear. Mima Queen v. Hepburn, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 295. It falls far short of proving the fact of her death before 1788, with that certainty which is necessary, to let the complainant in, to overturn a possession of upwards of eighty years' duration. But if this were otherwise, the case of the complainant would not be relieved from the bar. The proviso in the statute of Rhode Island includes only "persons under age, non compos mentis, feme covert, or those imprisoned, or those beyond the limits of the United States, they bringing their suit therefor, within ten years next after such impediment is removed." I consider the true exposition of this statute to be that it is only persons to whom the right first comes, and who are then under disability, who are within the saving clause; and that when the statute has once begun to run, it runs over all subsequent disabilities; and, consequently, if Betsy Waterman died before the expiration of the ten years allowed to her after she became of age, no new period of ten years was allowed to her infant heir, the complainant, and a fortiori, that the complainant was not allowed till her full age; and a multo fortiori, not another period of ten years to be added thereto. Many of the authorities on this subject are collected in Ang. Lim. 519 et seq., and notes. But even if this were otherwise, the complainant became of age in 1805, her ten years expired in 1815, and the bill was filed in 1851. Here also the supposed life-estate of her father was relied on, as a reason why she was not bound to sue. But, as already shown, he had no life-estate, for the want of actual seizin.

It is also insisted that Benjamin Waterman was the guardian of the complainant's mother, and therefore must be considered as holding the lands which he purchased from the administrator of Manton, as her trustee, and so neither he, nor any one claiming under him, can set up the statute of limitations. To this the case of Mercer's Lessee v. Selden, already referred to, affords an answer. In that case, Selden was the statute guardian of his children, under one of whom the plaintiffs claimed, in right of the descent to that child from its mother. Selden took a conveyance of the land, from a third person, and held possession. When his title was questioned he set up the statute of limitations; and the supreme court of the United States decided it was a legal bar. This is in conformity with repeated decisions of that court. Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 535; [Society v. Town of Pawlet] 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 506; Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 53; Bradstreet v. Huntington, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 440; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 177.

The complainant also relies on her absence from the state. But the rule against cumulative disabilities applies, for her mother was in the state when her right is said to have accrued, and died here; and the complainant was here when her supposed right accrued, and did not remove to New York, until 1795, and of course could not, by then going out of the state, suspend the running of the statute. Besides, whatever may have been the ancient statute of Rhode Island, the present law of limitations does not save the rights of absent persons, unless out of the United States; and it is the existing law which must govern the remedy.

On the whole, I am of opinion, that the statute of limitations affords a complete bar to this bill; and considering that the transactions charged to be fraudulent, occurred upwards of eighty-six years ago; that not only every person in any way connected with these transactions, but all who could possibly have had any knowledge of them, are long since dead; that they grew out of the settlement of an estate at a time when, from the state of the country, and the habits of the people, there was great inaccuracy in such proceedings, and still greater negligence in preserving the evidences of what was done; that it would be impossible to investigate these charges with a reasonable hope of arriving at the truth; and that the bill seeks to disturb possessions after descents, purchases, and family settlements, which have run through three generations. I think it must be admitted that the case affords a striking exemplification of the wisdom of that statute which forbids further inquiry.

BANKRUPTCY — PETITION NOT SUBSCRIBED — INCURABLE DEFECT.

When in an involuntary case the petitioners failed to subscribe the affidavit to the petition, held, the petition was defective, inasmuch as the forms prescribed by the supreme court required the affidavit and petition to be subscribed by petitioners. Defect incurable, since petition was not a petition in propria forma, such as could be amended.

[Cited in Hunt v. Pooke, Case No. 6,896.]

This was a case of involuntary bankruptcy [in the matter of Moore & Bro. against Harley.] The petition was regularly subscribed and sworn to, and the register who took the affidavit of the petitioners had signed his name in due form. But the petitioners had not subscribed the affidavit to the petition. Thereupon the respondent demurred to the petition, alleging that the petitioners had not by their petition made such a case as entitled them to have the respondent declared a bankrupt, within the provisions of the act of congress entitled, "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517]. Upon the hearing the demurrer was sustained, and the petition dismissed with costs. It was held that the petition was defective, inasmuch as the forms prescribed by the supreme court require that the affidavit as well as the petition should be subscribed by the petitioners, and that the defect was incurable, since the petition was not a petition in propria forma, such as could be amended.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION — ADOPTED CHILD — WILL.

An adopted child cannot inherit property in this District, unless by will.

Appeal from the orphans' court.

[Petitioner claimed that] Thos. Moore, deceased, was the petitioner's father, and in proof thereof produced his indentures of apprenticeship, in which he was described as the son of Thomas Moore, and many witnesses testified to the fact of Thomas Moore speaking of, and acknowledging him as his son. The appellee, Mary Hoffman, the sister of the deceased, denied that the said Richard H. Moore was the son of the said Thomas Moore, or that he ever had a child, and therefore claimed, as next of kin, to be entitled to the administration of the estate of Thos. Moore, and produced proof that the wife of said Thomas Moore was never delivered of a child, and that Richard H. Moore was the son of another woman, delivered at the house of said Thomas Moore and abandoned by her, and by said Thomas Moore adopted.

The following is the decision of Wm. F. Purcell, judge of the orphans' court.

"I have examined the evidence in this case with care, as well as the laws referred to by the counsel, Messrs. Carrington and Wallach, for the parties, and decide that Richard H. Moore, the petitioner, is not the legitimate child of the deceased, but was raised by him and adopted as his son. The law in such cases does not allow such persons to inherit property unless it be willed to them, according to the statute in such cases made and provided. The petition of said Moore is therefore dismissed, and the next of kin of the deceased applying for the same will be appointed."

Carrington & Davidge, for appellant.
Bradley & Wallach, for appellee.

On appeal to the circuit court the case was fully argued by counsel. THE COURT affirmed the decision of the orphans' court, and decided that Mrs. Hoffman had the right to the estate as next of kin to Thomas Moore.

others] for injunction and relief. On motion, on the bill, for a temporary injunction.

Mr. Carr, for plaintiffs.
Mr. Henderson and others, for defendants.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This is a bill by stockholders of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad Company against the state auditor and various counties and municipalities along the main line of the road, and along the Cameron & Kansas City Branch, to restrain the collection of various taxes—state, county, school, and municipal—amounting to several hundred thousand dollars. Upon an examination of the bill, and consideration of the arguments of counsel, the following are the conclusions to which I am brought:

1. So far as the bill rests upon the proposition that section 3 of the act of September 20th, 1852, makes the mode of ascertaining the value of the road and property of the company (viz.: by the sworn statement of the president of the company), a legislative contract which cannot be altered by subsequent legislative provision, my opinion is that the proposition is unsound. The supreme court of Missouri has expressly so decided in Missouri v. Hannibal & St. Joe R. Co. [60 Mo. 143], and in the case of Livingston Co. v. Hannibal & St. Joe R. Co. [Id. 516], at the May term, 1875. That court there approves and follows the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Bailey v. Maguire, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 215.

I am inclined to think that it is impossible to make any solid distinction between the Bailey Case and the present case, as respects the point under consideration. By the supreme court of Missouri it is held that, under the above-mentioned section 3 of the act of September 20th, 1852, the property of this railroad company is exempt from taxation for county purposes, but not from taxation for municipal, school, or other local purposes. Livingston Co. v. Hannibal & St. Joe R. Co. (May term, 1875), and prior cases there cited. This view I adopt and follow. But as respects Clay and Clinton counties, situated on the so-called branch, my opinion is that they are not within the operation of the said section 3 of the act of 1852, and other statutes applicable to the subject.

2. So far as the bill in this case asks to enjoin suits already brought and now pending in the state courts, to enforce the collection of any of the taxes complained of, it is sufficient to remark that an express statute of the United States has prohibited such interference, since the act of March 2, 1793, reenacted in section 720 of the Revised Statutes.

3. So far as the bill seeks to enjoin the taxes for 1874, by reason of the alleged illegal action of the board of equalization under the act of March 15, 1875 (Laws 1875, p. 113). my opinion is that the bill presents no sufficient grounds for the allowance of the writ of injunction. By that act the state board was made an assessing as well as an equalizing body.

4. But, as to the taxes for 1873, the bill makes just such a case as was made in several cases in this court in respect of the taxes for that year against the Iron Mountain and other companies, and where this court (Miller, Dillon, and Treat, JJ., concurring) made an order for the allowance of an injunction on the companies paying to the proper officers by a short day the amount of taxes which would be due on the basis of the valuations fixed by the county courts. If such payment was made, we would enjoin the excess pending the determination of the question. If not made, the injunction would be denied. Parmley v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. [Case No. 10,768]; Paul v. Pacific R. R. [Id. 10,845]. A similar order will be made in the case as respects the taxes for 1873.

The injunction may also go against the collection of any county taxes by the defendants, or any of them, except on the branch road. In view of the allegations of the bill as to retrospective taxation for all the years from 1860 to 1871, inclusive, and the mode by which, and the basis on which, as alleged, the valuation was determined, I think the case made is such as to justify the allowance of a temporary injunction as to the collection of such taxes, not to interfere, however, with suits already brought to enforce them. Counsel must understand that we never have interfered, and do not intend to interfere, with suits actually depending in the state tribunals, Ordered accordingly.

MOORE v. HOUGH.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 561.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1825.

JUSTICES OF PEACE—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—SEVERAL NOTES GIVEN FOR AN ENTIRE DEBT.

If an entire debt of $250, be settled by the debtor's giving his five several promissory notes for $50 each, payable at different times; each note is within the jurisdiction of a justice of the peace; and if all the notes have become payable he may issue his five separate warrants, and render judgment against the debtor in each case.

Appeal from the judgment of a justice of the peace in five several cases.

The appellant [Alexander Moore], being indebted to the appellee [George S. Hough] in the sum of $250, gave his five several promissory notes to the appellee, payable at different periods. When they had all become payable he obtained from a justice of the peace five separate warrants, upon which the appellant was arrested, and judgment was rendered against him in each case; from which judgments he appealed to this court.

Mr. Fendall and Mr. Mason, for appellant, contended that the splitting up the debt in this way, was a fraud upon the law, and that as the notes were all due and payable and constituted but one debt, the justice of the peace had not jurisdiction. The words of the act of March 1, 1823 [3 Stat. 743], giving jurisdiction to the justice are, "where the real debt and damages do not exceed the sum of fifty dollars." Here the real debt exceeds that sum, consequently the justice had not jurisdiction of the case.

Mr. Fendall cited Anon., 1 Vent. 65; and Girling v. Alders, Id. 73; Clerk v. Andrews, 1 Show. 11; Girling v. Aldas, 2 Keb. 617; Thompson v. Shepherd, 9 Johns. 262; Cazenove v. Darrell [Case No. 2,539], in this court at November term, 1823.

But THE COURT affirmed the judgments. CRANCH, Chief Judge, would have looked further into the cases, but the other judges seeming to be clearly against the appellant, he acquiesced.

MOORE v. JACOBS.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 312.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1833.

SLAVERY—IMPORTATION INTO DISTRICT—RUNAWAY NEGRO.

A female slave, owned in Alexandria, D. C., is removed with her owner to Maryland to reside; she runs away from her owner in Maryland and comes to Alexandria; her owner in Maryland, sells her (running) to a resident of Alexandria. This escape of the slave into Alexandria, was not a voluntary importation into Alexandria; and the sale was not such a sale as could give her a right to freedom under the Maryland law of 1796, c. 67.

Petition for freedom. The petitioner [the negress Clara Moore] was owned by Mr. Mills, in Alexandria, D. C., who removed to Maryland to reside, and settle there, and took the petitioner with him. She ran away and returned to Alexandria. While there, her owner in Maryland, sold her ("running") to the respondent, Thomas Jacobs.

Mr. Neale, for petitioner, contended that the sale within three years after the removal gave her a right to freedom, under the third section of the Maryland act of 1796, c. 67.

Mr. Taylor, contrá. There was no sale in Maryland within the meaning and intent of that act. The slave was not then in Maryland, but in Alexandria.

Mr. Neale, in reply, referred to the case of Delilah v. Jacobs [Case No. 3,773], in this court at the last term.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the slave was lawfully imported into Maryland; and that her escape to Alexandria was not a voluntary importation into Alexandria county; and that the sale in Alexandria, after such escape, was not such a sale as could give the petitioner a right to freedom under the Maryland act of 1796, c. 67.

Case No. 9,768.

MOORE v. JONES et al.

[23 Vt. 739.]

District Court, D. Vermont. Oct. Term, 1848.

BANKRUPTCY—RIGHT OF ASSIGNEE TO JUDGMENT RECOVERED BY BANKRUPT—REMEDIAL STATUTE—ACTION TO RECOVER USURY PAID—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT—EXPENSES OF ATTORNEY OF BANKRUPT.

1. Whenever a judgment is recovered for a debt, or claim, due to a bankrupt and belonging to his assignee, whether by the bankrupt himself or by a third person in his right, the assignee is entitled to the money recovered by such judgment; and if the judgment recovered have not been paid, a court of equity may arrest the payment of it to the bankrupt, or the one who sues on his right, and order the money paid to the assignee.

2. There is a distinction between an action given by statute to the party aggrieved, and an action given to any one who will sue,—the former being remedial, and the latter penal.

3. Under the statute of Vermont, which gives to one paying usurious interest the right to recover back, by action of assumpsit, the amount so paid, the excess of interest paid becomes money in the hands of the creditor belonging to the debtor, and recoverable as money had and received to his use; and an absolute and perfect interest therein vests in the debtor, existing anterior to the bringing of an action, and not a mere inchoate right, dependent on his suing, or on any other personal act, to be by him performed.

4. And the right to recover back money so paid is a right vested in property, or, in the words and sense of the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], a "right of property," which passes to and vests in the assignee under the bankruptcy.

5. And if the bankrupt, after the decree of bankruptcy, have brought such action in his own name in the state court, and obtained a judgment, without his bankruptcy being pleaded by the defendant in bar of the recovery, the district court of the United States have power, upon petition brought by the assignee, while the judgment remains unpaid, to so far interfere with the judgment, as to order the amount paid to the assignee.

6. And it is no objection to this power being exercised by the district court within one district, that the decree of bankruptcy and the proceedings under it were had in the district court within another district.

7. But if the assignee asks the interposition of the equity powers of the court, to give him the benefit of the judgment recovered by the bankrupt, he must take it, if he would have it, subject, not only to such charges in the suit at law as were legally taxable and recoverable as costs, but also to all other reasonable charges and expenses incurred in obtaining the judgment.

8. But charges for services rendered by the attorney of the bankrupt, in the suit at law, in opposing a motion there preferred by the assignee to be allowed to enter and prosecute the claim, do not come within this principle, and cannot be allowed as a charge against the fund.

9. And if the attorney is made a defendant in the proceedings in this court, as it is proper he should be, and the fund, by interlocutory decree of the court, is allowed to be paid to him, subject to the future order of the court, and the ultimate decree of the court be, that he pay the money to the assignee, he will be allowed to retain, in addition to the amount allowed for the charges and expenses incurred in prosecuting the suit at law, all his necessary actual charges and expenses in this proceeding, but not fees for his services as counsel in defending it; but, if he have himself acted as his own counsel in this proceeding, he will be allowed costs, as between party and party.

This was a petition addressed to the equity jurisdiction of the court under the bankrupt act, and set forth the following facts. [Samuel W.] Jones, one of the respondents, was declared a bankrupt, on his own application, by the district court of the United States in the Northern district of New York, and [Amasa C.] Moore, the petitioner here, was appointed his assignee. After Jones had obtained his certificate of discharge, an action for money had and received was commenced in his name, by his direction, or consent, in the state court in Vermont, against the respondent Austin, on a claim or cause of action which had accrued to Jones prior to his bankruptcy, but which he had omitted to insert in his schedule of property accompanying his application to be declared a bankrupt, and of which the assignees had no knowledge. Austin, the defendant in the action, did not plead the bankruptcy of Jones in bar of a recovery, and a judgment was recovered against him in the county court, which was ultimately affirmed in the supreme court. The petition, after stating the above facts, claimed the money recovered in the judgment as assets belonging to Moore, as assignee of Jones, and prayed, that it might be decreed to be paid to him for the benefit of the creditors under the bankruptcy. It was alleged on the part of the respondents, that the claim on which the judgment was recovered, was for illegal interest received by Austin of Jones in violation of the statute of Vermont on the subject of interest, and therefore was a claim of such a nature, that it did not go to the assignee of Jones on his bankruptcy. A sale and transfer of the claim by Jones before his bankruptcy were also alleged. With these additional statements, the facts set forth in the petition were admitted. A temporary injunction was granted on filing the petition, prohibiting the payment of the money to Jones, but allowing the judgment debtor to pay it into the hands of Mr. Linsley, the attorney of Jones, and also one of the respondents, to be held by him subject to the future order of the court.

S. H. Hodges, for petitioner.

C. Linsley, for respondents.

PRENTISS, District Judge. There can be no doubt, that whenever a judgment is recovered for a debt or claim due to a bankrupt and belonging to his assignee, whether by the bankrupt himself, or by a third person in his right, the assignee is entitled to the money recovered by such judgment. It has been often determined, that where an uncertificated bankrupt sues and obtains judgment, as he may do unless his assignees interfere, for a debt accrued to him subsequent to the bankruptcy, and is paid the amount of the judgment, or where a creditor, after an act of bankruptcy, attaches a debt due the bankrupt, obtains judgment therefor against the debtor, and thereupon receives the amount of the debt attached, the assignees may recover of the bankrupt in the one case, and of the creditor in the other, the money so respectively recovered by them. Surely, in either case, where the judgment recovered has not been paid, a court of equity may arrest the payment of it to the bankrupt, or the creditor, and order the money paid over to the assignees. The principal question in the present case therefore is, whether the claim, on which the judgment was recovered against Austin in the state court, being a claim for money paid by Jones for usurious interest, passed to and vested in the assignee of the latter under his bankruptcy. If it did, it is quite clear, that the petitioner, as such assignee, is, in equity, entitled to the money contained in the judgment, and that it ought to be paid over to him. In the case of Brandon v. Pate, 2 H. Bl. 308, it was held, that the assignees of a bankrupt might recover money lost by the bankrupt at play, in an action of debt against the winner, on the statute 9 Anne, c. 14, although by the statute the action was limited to the loser himself within three months, and after that to a common informer. The only question made in the case was, whether under the statute there was any debt or vested interest existing in the loser of the money until he brought his action. The argument on the part of the defendant was, that the action being given to the loser for a limited time only, and then to a common informer, no debt vested in the loser, any more than in the common informer, until action brought. But Rooke, J., said, there was a clear distinction between remedial and penal acts,—that in the former a debt is due to the party grieved before the commencement of the action, but not in the latter; and upon that distinction, as well as upon other considerations of weight, judgment was given for the plaintiffs. In Brandon v. Sands, 2 Ves. Jr. 514, a case involving the same general question, it was again urged, that no debt existed in the loser of money at play, until he brought his action, and consequently that the right of action given by the statute was strictly personal in him. But the lord chancellor said, he had no doubt upon the case; that nothing was so clear, as that where a statute gives an action to the party grieved, there is an interest vested in him; that the limiting the time is to let in the penal action by the common informer; but that while the action rests in the party injured, it is a vested interest in him, which on his bankruptcy passes to his assignees. In Carter v. Abbott, 1 Barn. & C. 444, a more modern case of an action on the statute for money lost by the bankrupt at play, although a recovery was strenuously contested on other grounds, the right of the assignees to sue was not even questioned. The principle thus asserted was recognized and acted upon by the supreme court of this state as long ago as when I had the honor of being a member of it. In delivering the opinion of the court in Hubbell v. Gale, 3 Vt. 266, I put the decision expressly upon the distinction, now found to be so fully sustained by adjudged cases directly in point, between an action given by statute to the party aggrieved, and an action given to any one who will sue,—considering and treating the former as remedial, and the latter as penal. If the right of the assignees to sue and recover was sustainable in the cases which have been adverted to, there would seem to be little or no question as to the right of the assignees in the present case. The statute regulating the rate of interest in this state (Rev. St. § 366) contains two distinct provisions on the subject. In one, it is enacted, that no person shall take for the forbearance of money, a greater rate of interest than six per cent. per annum. In the other, it is declared, that whenever a greater rate of interest has been paid, the person paying the same may recover back the amount so paid above the legal interest, with interest thereon from the time of payment, in an action of assumpsit, declaring for money had and received, or for goods sold and delivered, as the case may be. The right of action is not given, first for a certain time to the party paying the usurious interest, and then to any one who will sue, but is given wholly and only to the party paying, —thus distinguishing the case in that particular from the cases which have been cited. The excess of interest paid, being taken in violation of the prohibitory clause of the statute, is recoverable back, with interest thereon from the time of payment, in an action of indebitatus assumpsit in common form, subject to the same limitation, and no other, as actions of assumpsit in general. Whether money so paid be treated as a debt due, as so much money owing the party paying it, or simply as money exacted and held from him without right and against law, can make no difference in the result of this case. According to the provisions of the statute, which in substance, as far as concerns the remedy, is merely in affirmance of the common law, the excess of interest paid was money in the hands of Austin belonging to Jones, and recoverable as money had and received to his use. An absolute and perfect interest was vested in him, existing anterior to the bringing of an action,—not a mere inchoate right, dependent on his suing, or on any other personal act by him performed.

By the bankrupt act, "all property, and rights of property of every name and nature," whether in possession or in action, are made the subject of assignment, and pass to and vest in the assignee. While the act does not extend to rights of a mere personal nature, as claims for damages arising out of a breach of promise to marry, or out of personal torts and injuries, it comprehends every right and interest, and every right of action, founded in or growing out of property. Money exacted by way of interest beyond the rate prescribed, is property unlawfully and wrongfully taken from the party paying it, and the right to recover it back is a right founded in property, or, in the words and sense of the bankrupt law, a "right of property." It is no more a right personal to the party himself, especially when given to and vested in him absolutely, than the right to recover back money obtained by fraud, or money wrongfully and illegally extorted in any other way. Whether Jones could or could not, after his bankruptcy, under any circumstances, have a right to maintain an action in his own name to recover the money in the hands of Austin, or, in other words, whether his bankruptcy might or might not have been pleaded in bar of a recovery by him, is a point not essential to be determined. In either case, whether the bankruptcy might or might not have been so pleaded, or whether the judgment recovered by Jones would or would not be a protection to Austin against a suit by the assignee, the latter would have a remedy against Jones, if he had received the money, and, as he had not received it, is entitled to have, what is virtually the same thing, the benefit of the judgment recovered by him. It may be observed, however, that the right of the assignee was undoubtedly absolute and exclusive, so that Jones had no right of action whatever to recover the money. In England, it is true, as has been already intimated, an uncertificated bankrupt may maintain an action in his own name for property acquired by him, or upon causes of action that have accrued to him, subsequent to the bankruptcy. His right in such case, is good against all the world but his assignees; and unless they interpose, and require a delivery of the property or payment of the money to them, the bankruptcy cannot be set up in bar of the action. But this doctrine prevails, under the English system, only in the particular class of cases mentioned,—a class unknown here,—and is applicable to no other class. Here, as we have already seen, a bankrupt, by the decree of bankruptcy, is divested of all his property and rights of property of every name and nature, and the same, whether in possession or in action, are, by force of the decree, ipso facto, by operation of law, vested absolutely in his assignee. A recovery of the money in the hands of Austin, by Jones, might therefore have been prevented by pleading his bankruptcy in bar of the action brought by him; and it was by reason of such a plea not being interposed, that he obtained judgment for that which belonged to the assignee, and to which he himself had no right. If there had been, as was alleged and has been attempted to be shown, a bona fide transfer of the claim against Austin, by Jones, before his bankruptcy, it would not have passed to his assignee. In such case, the assignee would have had no right to the claim, unless, indeed, the transfer were made in contemplation of bankruptcy, but the person entitled to the claim under the transfer might properly sue and recover upon it for his own use and benefit, in the name of Jones. The evidence to make out a transfer is very weak,—too weak, at any rate, to prevail against the fact, which is fully established, that the person, to whom the transfer is alleged to have been made, was used as a witness on the part of Jones in the suit in which the judgment was recovered, and swore, that he had no interest whatever in the event of the suit. The existence of the supposed transfer is utterly irreconcilable with this solemn denial of all right and interest in the subject matter of the suit, and cannot be admitted without imputing to the person said to have received it wilful and corrupt false swearing, and the commission of a most aggravated fraud upon the administration of justice. The court, acting on the declaration made by him under oath, admitted him as a witness; and on his testimony and that of others, the judgment was recovered. Under such circumstances, it might be worthy of consideration, in a case calling for a decision of the question, and not dependent on the right as it existed in fact at the time of the bankruptcy, whether he would not be conclusively bound by the declaration he had made, and estopped to assert any right in himself in opposition to it.

On the merits of the case, it appears to be evident, that the assignee is entitled to relief, and as to the power and right of this court, in ordinary cases under the bankrupt act, to interfere, as far as is here required, with a judgment and execution of the state court, the case of Christy v. City Bank of New Orleans, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292, is an authority quite decisive. The doctrine laid down in that case fully sustains the exercise of the power. The principal difficulty attending the question of jurisdiction arises out of the particular circumstances of the case. Jones was decreed a bankrupt, not in this court, but in the district court of the Northern district of New York; and the question is, whether, that being the case, this court can take jurisdiction of the matter in controversy, or, indeed, of any matter arising under or growing out of the bankruptcy, the court having no equity jurisdiction whatever, except what is given it by the bankrupt act. In Ex parte Martin [Case No. 9,149], it was held, that the equity jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States, under the bankrupt act, was not confined to cases of bankruptcy originally arising and pending in the particular court where the relief is sought. It was considered, that as cases of bankruptcy, originally instituted and pending in one district, might apply to reach persons and property situate in other districts, and require auxiliary proceedings in such districts to perfect and accomplish the objects of the act, the intention of congress was, that the district courts in every district should be mutually auxiliary to each other for such purposes and proceedings. This decision comes from a quarter, which entitles it to great respect; and the question being clear as to the right of the assignee to relief on the merits, it may well be held, on the authority of the case referred to, that this court is competent to grant the relief.

The only questions, which remain to be considered, are questions arising upon exceptions filed to the report of the commissioner, to whom a reference was ordered to ascertain and report the amount of the expenses incurred in the prosecution of the suit, in which the judgment in question was recovered, and to state the nature and character of the expenses.

It appears, that after judgment was rendered in the county court, and while the cause was pending in the supreme court, the assignee, becoming in the mean time apprised of its pendency, applied to the court, by motion, for leave to enter and prosecute the suit for the benefit of the creditors under the bankruptcy. Mr. Linsley, as attorney and counsel for Jones, resisted the motion; and the court, upon the ground that the suit was not pending at the time of the bankruptcy, but was commenced afterwards, overruled and dismissed the motion. The commissioner has allowed Mr. Linsley for his services as counsel in opposing that motion; and to this allowance exception is taken. The order of reference to a commissioner did not proceed upon the ground of a lien, as usually allowed to an attorney by courts of law and equity, but upon the more enlarged ground, that as the assignee comes in and asks the interposition of the equity powers of the court to give him the benefit of the judgment recovered by Jones, he must take it, if he would have it, subject, not only to such charges as were legally taxable and recoverable as costs, but also to all other reasonable charges and expenses incurred in obtaining the judgment. To such charges, the assignee, in the ordinary course, would have been subjected, if he had himself commenced and carried on the suit in his own name; and to that extent, Mr. Linsley, the attorney and counsel in the suit, has an equitable claim on the judgment as against him. But services rendered in opposing the motion of the assignee for leave to enter and prosecute, which was a collateral proceeding, forming no part of the principal suit, but presenting a question between the assignee and Jones only as to the control of the suit, do not come within the principle adopted. Mr. Linsley opposed the motion in behalf of Jones, and with full knowledge of the right of the assignee, of which the motion itself was notice. If the assignee mistook the proper form of enforcing his right, and his motion was not sustainable in point of law, all he could be liable to would be legal taxable costs on the motion. That is all that a party who has a right, but misconceives his remedy, is ever subject to. The assignee has a clear equitable right to the fruits of the judgment, which any court of general equity jurisdiction might enforce; and services rendered, not in recovering the judgment, nor in any way conducive to that end, but in a collateral proceeding, and in hostility to the right of the assignee, can form no charge on the judgment, in equity, as against him.

The commissioner has farther allowed Mr. Linsley for services as counsel in defending this petition, to which exception is also taken. It is quite obvious, that in allowing for these services the commissioner exceeded his authority. He was confined, by the order of reference, to services performed, and expenses incurred, in the suit in which the judgment was obtained. Mr. Linsley is a party to this petition, and if he is entitled to any remuneration for being brought into court, it must be in the way and in the form of costs. He was made a party. not only because he had a claim on the judgment for services as attorney in obtaining it, but also because he had the control of the execution, and might, unless enjoined, receive and pay over the money to Jones. It is usual to give costs to a trustee, where there is a fund in his hands, notwithstanding the decree is against him,—sometimes only common costs, but generally all necessary actual charges and expenses in addition. If the rule extended beyond actual charges and expenses, a party who is a professional man, and performs the duties of counsel himself, might be tempted to raise questions and protract the suit for the sake of professional profit. The principle applicable to the case of a trustee seems to be applicable to the case of Mr. Linsley; for he is a mere holder of the money, and it is a matter of indifference to him, whether he pays it over to the assignee, or to Jones. If he had employed and paid counsel, there would be no hesitation in allowing him for expenses so paid. If he has incurred no such or other expenditure, it is difficult to see how, according to any well recognized rule of practice, he can be allowed costs otherwise than as between party and party. Such costs, with the sum he is entitled to on the report of the commissioner, as modified, Mr. Linsley will be allowed to retain out of the money received by him on the judgment; and a decree will be entered, that the balance of the fund in his hands, as reported and thus adjusted, be paid to the assignee.

NOTE. The case of Hubbell v. Gale, 3 Vt. 266, referred to in the above opinion, was an action brought by a third person on a former statute of this state against usury. Among the observations made by Prentiss, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, are the following: "The first section of the statute prohibits the taking of more than six per cent. interest, and the taking of more is an offense against the statute. The second section gives to the person paying the usury the liberty, within one year, to sue for and recover it back; and on his neglect, any other person is authorized, within one year thereafter, to sue for and recover the same. As it respects the party paying the usury, the action is like an action on a contract to recover a debt already due, and is clearly not of a penal nature. The party has a right, on common law principles, to recover back the money, and the statute saves the right to him for one year; but if he does not avail himself of his right within that time, then the amount of the usury is given, as a forfeiture, to any one who will sue for the same. The statute is partly remedial, and partly penal;—remedial, as to the right given to the party paying to recover back the money, and penal, as to the right given to any other person to sue for it on his neglect. Where a statute gives an action to a stranger to recover a forfeiture, he is a common informer, and the action a penal action; though it is otherwise, where the statute gives damages, either single or accumulative, to the party aggrieved."

MOORE et al. v. JONES et al.

[3 Woods. 53;[1] 2 Nat. Bank. Cas. (Browne) 144.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1877.

BANKS — LIABILITY OF STOCKHOLDER — STOCK TAKEN AS SECURITY.

A person who allows a transfer to be made to him upon the books of a national bank of shares of stock therein, even though such transfer is made solely as security for a debt due the transferee, becomes individually liable for all contracts and engagements of the bank to the extent prescribed by the currency act [12 Stat. 665].

[Cited in Florida Land & Imp. Co. v. Merrill, 2 C. C. A. 629, 52 Fed. 80; Id., 8 C. C. A. 444, 60 Fed. 21.]

[Cited in Keyser v. Hitz, 2 D. C. 477.]

In equity. Heard on demurrer to the bill. The bill was filed by Robert Moore and Thomas Janney against C. M. Jones and F. F. Case, the latter as receiver of the First National Bank of New Orleans, and alleged in substance that in the year 1866, and before and after that time, the complainants were commercial partners under the name of Moore & Janney; that on December 22, 1866, the defendant C. M. Jones was indebted to complainants, as such partners, in the sum of sixty-five hundred dollars, to secure which he, on the date last named, pledged to complainants sixty-five shares of the capital stock of said national bank, then owned by him, and, to make said pledge effectual, the said Jones delivered to complainants the certificates of stock which had been issued to him by the bank. The bill further alleged that the complainants never were the owners of said stock, and that they had no right or interest therein except as pledgees in the manner and for the consideration aforesaid; that the said pledge was perfect by the delivery of the certificates of stock, but that, in ignorance of their legal rights, they had said shares of stock transferred to them on the books of the bank, under the erroneous belief that such transfer was necessary to the validity of said pledge, and that said transfer was made on the 22d day of December, 1866, before the failure of said bank to redeem its circulating notes, and before the appointment of said receiver. The bill claimed that the transfer on the books of the bank of the stock was unnecessary to invest the complainants with a privilege on said shares, and that, notwithstanding the transfer, Jones continued to be the actual owner of the shares and was alone liable to the obligations imposed by law upon shareholders in national banks. It was further alleged that the receiver, the said bank having failed to redeem its circulating notes and having been put in liquidation by the comptroller of the currency, had commenced an action at law against complainants to enforce against them the individual liability provided by the currency act against the holders of shares in national banks. The averment was, that if any ground existed for said action against the shareholders of the bank, the action should be against the said C. M. Jones, who was the real owner of the stock, and not against complainants; that the said defense of complainants could not be made at law, and that the aid of a court of equity was necessary to their complete and adequate protection. The bill therefore prayed that said receiver might be enjoined from further prosecuting said suit at law against complainants; that said C. M. Jones might be decreed to be the owner of said stock, and that the transfer thereof to the complainants might be declared to have been made in error and be corrected so as to exhibit the said C. M. Jones as the owner thereof; and that it might be decreed that the complainants are not individually liable thereon. To this bill the defendant F. F. Case, receiver, interposed a demurrer, on the ground that the bill did not make a case for equitable relief.

John Finney and Henry C. Miller, for complainants.

John D. Rouse, for the receiver.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The demurrer is well taken. The currency act (Rev. St. § 5139) declares that "the capital stock of each association shall be divided into shares of one hundred dollars each and be deemed personal property, and shall be transferable on the books of the association in such manner as may be prescribed in the by-laws or articles of association. Every person becoming a shareholder by such transfer shall, in proportion to his shares, succeed to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder of said shares." Now, according to the averments of the bill, Moore & Janney became the transferees of the stock of Jones by transfer on the books of the association. According to the terms of the act such transfer made them stockholders and subjected them to all the rights and liabilities of the prior holder of the shares, among which is that shareholders shall be held individually responsible equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all contracts and engagements of such association to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares. So far as the bank and the public were concerned, Moore & Janney were the owners of the stock. They were entitled to vote the stock at stockholders' meetings, to draw dividends, and to transfer the stock to whom they pleased. The public were advised by the list of stockholders kept in the office where the business of the bank was transacted (see Rev. St. § 5210) that Moore & Janney were shareholders to the amount of sixty-five shares. By appearing on the stock book of the bank and upon the list of shareholders required to be posted in the business room of the bank, they assumed the liability of shareholders. Neither the bank nor the public were required to take notice of the private understanding between Moore & Janney and the person from whose name the stock had been transferred. The individual liability falls upon the person who appears on the stock book of the bank by transfer to him to be the owner of the stock. The law organizing the banks seems to place it there. To allow one who, by inspection of the stock book, appears to be a shareholder who has allowed himself to be held out by the bank to the public as a shareholder, to set up secret arrangements between himself and the real owner as a defense to his individual liability for the debts of the bank, would be to make of no avail the individual liability clause of the currency act. "It is well settled that one to whom stock has been transferred in pledge or as collateral security for money loaned, and who appears on the register of the corporation as the owner of the stock is, in the event of the insolvency of the corporation, chargeable as a stockholder for the benefit of creditors." Thomp. Stockh. § 223; Adderly v. Storm, 6 Hill, 624; Rosevelt v. Brown, 11 N. Y. 148; In re Empire City Bank, 18 N. Y. 199, 223; Holyoke Bank v. Burnham, 11 Cush. 183; Magruder v. Colston, 44 Md. 349; Crease v. Babcock, 10 Metc. [Mass.] 525, 545; Wheelock v. Kost, 77 Ill. 296; Pullman v. Upton, 96 U. S. 328. Moore & Janney, so far as the bank and the public were concerned, were to all intents and purposes shareholders and individually liable as such. The demurrer to the bill must be sustained.

MOORE v. MITCHELL.

[2 Woods, 483.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Alabama. Dec. Term, 1874.[2]

TRUSTS — SEPARATE ACCOUNT BY TRUSTEE — PAYMENTS RECEIVED IN CONFEDERATE MONEY — UNDERSTANDING WITH TESTATOR CREATING TRUST.

1. A trustee who keeps no separate account of the trust fund, but mixes it with his own money, renders himself liable to account for it in case of loss.

2. A trustee having received the trust funds in good money, and loaned them out, afterwards received in repayment of the loan at par, Confederate treasury notes which were worth only thirty cents on the dollar, and which afterwards became worthless in his hands. Held, that he was not entitled to a credit for the amount unless he could show that he received the depreciated paper upon actual compulsion.

3. The trustee could not, under these circumstances, save himself from liability to account for the trust fund by offering to show that there was a parol understanding between the testator, from whose estate the trust fund came, and himself, whereby he agreed to manage the business of the trust with the same care as his own, and to make no charge for his services as trustee.

4. Where there is a prayer for general relief, a court of equity may afford such relief as the averments of the bill and the proofs warrant, although the complainant may not be entitled to the relief specifically prayed for.

In equity. Heard for final decree on the pleadings and evidence. The facts were as follows: By the last will and testament of James Mitchell, deceased, late of Sumpter county, Alabama, which was executed on September 29, 1855, the defendant, Daniel Mitchell, was made trustee for the complainant, Catharine Moore. There were devised to him in trust for said Catharine two slaves which he was authorized to hire or sell, and he was directed to pay to her during the lifetime of her husband either the hire or the interest of the money obtained from a sale of the slaves. The defendant was also entrusted by the will with the distributive share of the complainant in the testator's estate, and directed to pay her the interest thereon during the lifetime of the husband. On the death of her husband, the defendant was directed to pay to complainant the corpus of the trust fund committed to his hands by the provisions of the will. In February, 1856, the defendant, as authorized by the will, sold the slaves and obtained therefor $1,375. On August 31, 1857, the defendant received the distributive share of complainant in the estate of James Mitchell, amounting to $1,150. The defendant loaned out the trust fund on interest. He testified in regard to its management as follows: "I kept no separate account of the trust funds after they came into my hands; I accounted for the annual interest to the agent of complainant, and was ready to pay over the principal in the event of the death of complainant's husband, which was the time fixed by the will for me to pay her the corpus of the estate. I thought that was all I was required to do, and therefore kept no separate and distinct account of the trust fund, and cannot give the dates of the loans and other particulars inquired about. All the trust funds were put together and treated in the same way, and when necessary, I put some of my own funds with the trust funds to make out the sum a borrower might want. I kept no separate account of the trust fund and cannot furnish any." The last loan of the trust funds was made by defendant to one Simmons Harrison. To the trust funds the defendant added about $1,500 of his own money, making the loan about $4,000. In March, 1863, the representatives of the estate of Harrison, the borrower, tendered defendant in payment of the debt Confederate treasury notes, which were at that time worth at the rate of three and a half dollars for one of gold. The defendant accepted the notes in payment. He did not invest them in property of any kind, nor loan them again, but as he says, retained them till the close of the war. He has never rendered, or offered to render, any account of his trust, nor does he produce or has he ever exhibited to complainant the Confederate treasury notes which he says he received from Harrison's estate in payment.

The purpose and prayer of the complainant's bill was that the trust created by the will of the late James Mitchell in her favor might be established, and an account taken of what was due complainant by reason thereof; that the trustee might be removed and decreed to pay to complainant whatever might be found due to her on account of said trust, and that she might have such other and further relief as it may appear to the court she was entitled to. The defendant claimed by way of defense that by a verbal understanding with his father, the testator, had just before his death, he undertook to manage the trust as he managed his own business, and without any compensation; that he did so manage the trust estate; that he was compelled to receive Confederate money for the trust funds loaned to one Simmons Harrison; that at the same time, he received the same kind of currency for a debt due to himself from the estate of Harrison; that having received such funds, he found it impossible to invest them or loan them, and they became worthless on his hands as a consequence of the late war. The proof to sus-tain the defense, that the Confederate treasury notes were received in payment of the debt due the trust estate by compulsion, consisted of the depositions of the defendant himself and of James M. Winston and Jonathan Bliss. On this point the defendant testified: "If I had refused to receive the Confederate money for a debt of any kind, I would have incurred the strong condemnation of my neighbors and friends, and would have been looked upon as a disloyal and suspicious character, and might have been subject to serious annoyance and injury in my person and property. To have refused to receive this money from the representative of a Confederate soldier, killed in battle, would have subjected me to the additional odium of trying to make money out of the widow and orphans of a dead soldier, and of using my money to oppress them. The bare suspicion of such an attempt on my part would have brought down on me the contempt of every one, and could not have been done without risk of personal injury." James M. Winston testified that in 1863, Confederate currency was the only money in circulation in Alabama; "but I do not know," he says, "that the money was imposed on the people by irresistible force by the late Confederate government. Said currency was made current as dollars in the county of Sumpter, where defendant resided, by the irresistible force of public opinion. If a creditor had refused Confederate money when tendered, he would have been subject to great reproach and denunciation; but I cannot say how far it might have been carried. It would have been regarded as a stab at the Confederacy, and as disloyalty to it and to the independence of the Confederate States." Jonathan Bliss testified: "I cannot say that Confederate currency was ever imposed upon the people of Alabama by irresistible force of the Confederate government directly applied. The force compelling the circulation of Confederate money was a compound one, made up in part of the action and influence of the Confederate government, its officers and friends, in part by the action and influence of the state government and officers, in part by the necessities of life, and largely by the public voice and demand; and by the further fact that there were in some places combinations of men acting as committees of vigilance, claiming to supervise and deal with obnoxious individuals considered disloyal to the Confederate cause. In 1863, a refusal of Confederate money would have subjected the party to much reproach and indignity, and unless he was fortified by strong personal position, to degrees of violence and outrage." On cross examination, this witness testified in answer to the question whether he knew any persons who refused to take trust money in Confederate notes and were not mobbed or murdered: "I refused to take it in such cases as long as I could, but finally felt constrained to yield as to interest, and in some cases when I thought there was danger of the debtor becoming insolvent, as to the principal."

R. H. Smith and R. I. Smith, for complainant.

William Boyles and G. Y. Overall, for defendant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The complainant bases her claim for relief substantially on two grounds: 1. That the defendant did not keep the trust estate separate from his own, but mingled it with his own money, and thereby made himself the debtor of complainant and liable to pay absolutely the trust money with interest. 2. That the defendant was not justified in receiving Confederate money worth less than thirty cents on the dollar, and then retaining that without investment until it became entirely worthless.

As to the first ground, it is obvious to remark that the evidence of the defendant himself shows that he treated the trust fund as his own, and mingled it with his own. He kept no account and could render no account. He cannot state at what rate of interest the trust money was loaned, and with the exception of Simmons Harrison, he does not name any person to whom it was loaned. When the loan was returned to him in Confederate money by the representatives of Harrison, he makes no pretense of keeping the funds separate from his own. In fact they had before that time been mingled with his own, so as to be indistinguishable. It seems evident from defendant's own testimony that he thought he would discharge his trust by paying over to complainant the interest yearly, and then upon the death of her husband, paying over to her the principal. He therefore kept no account of the trust funds, but mixed and loaned them with his own. It does not appear that he ever took a note payable to himself as trustee, or that the evidences of debt received by him for the loan of trust funds had any ear mark by which to distinguish them from his own. In fact he states distinctly that he mixed his own funds with the trust funds in making his loans. A trustee is not permitted to so treat the trust property. When he does so, he becomes debtor to the trust, and if there is a loss, it is his loss and not the loss of the trust estate.

It has been held that where the subject of a trust is money, the trustee, in making a deposit of it in the bank, should be careful to do it to the account of the trust estate and not to his own account; for should he deposit it to his own account, he would render himself liable for it on the failure of the bank. Wren v. Kirton, 11 Ves. 377; In re Stafford, 11 Barb. 353; McAllister v. Com., 30 Pa. St. 536. If the trustee deposits the trust funds in his own name, he thus mixes them with his own private funds which always renders him liable in case of loss. Lupton v. White, 15 Ves. 432; Chedworth v. Edwards, 8 Ves. 46; Duke of Leeds v. Earl of Amherst, 20 Beav. 239; Fellows v. Mitchell, 1 P. Wms.

81; Trustees of Auburn Seminary v. Kellogg, 16 N. Y. 83; Spear v. Tinkham, 2 Barb. Ch. 211; Stanley's Appeal, 8 Pa. St. 431.

2. But suppose the defendant had kept the trust funds distinct from his own, that he had loaned them separately and taken evidence of debt to show that the money loaned belonged to the trust, was he justified under the circumstances detailed in the evidence in receiving repayment of the loan in Confederate notes? When Harrison's representatives paid up the money borrowed by their intestate in March, 1863, Confederate notes were worth less than thirty cents on the dollar, according to the statement of the answer. According to the same authority, it was impossible to invest them in any permanent or valuable property. A trustee who lends good money and receives it back in such a pretense for a currency ought to be able to show good reason for so doing. No stress of public opinion, no odium or unpopularity arising from a refusal to take such currency would justify him in thus dissipating the trust estate. Nothing but compulsion would justify a trustee in such a course. Horn v. Lockhart, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 581.

There was no law of the Confederate States obliging the defendant to receive Confederate treasury notes. They were not even made a legal tender. No law of the state of Alabama compelled the defendant to receive such currency. And the testimony fails to satisfy me that a trustee, refusing to receive funds of the trust estate in such a depreciated currency, would have been subjected to any injury of person or property, and nothing short of such compulsion would have justified the trustee in thus administering the trust estate.

The defendant claims, however, that by a verbal understanding with his father, the testator, he agreed to receive no compensation for his discharge of the duties of the trust, and that he was to manage the business of the trust with the same care as he did his own, and that having done that, he is discharged from liability, notwithstanding the loss. In reply to this, it is sufficient to say that the trust is created by will, and cannot be modified by verbal understanding had between the trustee and the testator. Nor does the fact that the trustee agreed to manage the trust without compensation relieve him from the consequences of his mismanagement. Under the will by which the trust was created, the defendant was entitled to compensation. He cannot relieve himself from liability for mismanagement by now saying that he did not charge or expect compensation.

Finally, it is insisted that under the will by which the trust is created, the trust money was to be kept in the hands of the trustee until the death of the husband of the complainant, and then paid over to complainant, that the bill prays, among other things, that the trust fund be paid over to complainant, her said husband being still in life; that this prayer is contrary to the terms of the trust, and ought not to be granted, and that no other relief than that prayed for can be administered, even though there is a prayer for general relief. I cannot yield assent to this proposition. "The usual course is for the plaintiff, in this part of his bill, to make a special prayer for the particular relief to which he thinks himself entitled, and then to conclude with a prayer of general relief at the discretion of the court. The latter can never be properly or safely omitted, because if the plaintiff should mistake the relief to which he is entitled in his special prayer, the court may yet afford him the relief to which he has a right under the prayer of general relief, provided it is such relief as is agreeable to the case made by the bill." Story, Eq. Pl. § 40, and cases there cited.

My conclusion is, therefore, that there should be a decree for complainant, establishing the trust, removing the trustee, and decreeing him to pay over the trust fund with interest, to a suitable person to be appointed trustee in his stead, and referring the cause to a master to ascertain and report the amount of the trust fund, including the interest, which has not been already paid by the trustee.

[3 McLean, 383.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1844.

DEEDS—ILLINOIS STATUTE—HOW EXECUTED OUT OF STATE—DEPOSITION—TAKEN BEFORE MAYOR.

1. Under the act of 1831, in Illinois, a deed will convey land in that state, if executed according to the law of the state where it is made.

2. A statute may make good the defective acknowledgment of deeds.

3. It operates as a rule of evidence, as regards the execution of the instrument.

4. A deposition before a mayor of a city, under the act of congress, is sufficiently certified, "as taken in pursuance of the act," though it be not stated that the witness was cautioned.

[This was an action of ejectment by Moore against Nelson & Ashworth.]

Mr. Butterfield, for plaintiff.

Logan & Baker, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an ejectment to recover the possession of one hundred and sixty acres of land. Patent to Patrick Cain, dated 6th October, 1817; a deed from him to Patrick Benson, dated 17th May,

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

1819. This deed was executed in New York. The eleventh section of the act of Illinois, of the 24th of January, 1831, provides that a deed made out of the state, "the acknowledgment thereof having been made in the manner hereinafter directed, before any judge or justice of the peace of the proper county, in which such deed may have been made and executed, and certified under the seal of such county by the proper officer, shall be valid," &c. The signature of one of the subscribing witnesses being proved, the other witness could not be found. Deed read in evidence, dated 22d January, 1840, from the widow and heirs of Benson to the plaintiff. A deposition under the act of congress to prove this deed, taken before the mayor, &c., was objected to, because the mayor does not certify the witness was cautioned in the words of the act. The certificate states "that the witness was sworn in pursuance of the act of congress, and carefully examined and sworn." As under the above act, depositions are taken without notice, great strictness has been required. Perhaps in some instances this may have been carried too far. For, if on examining the deposition, surprise can be alleged by the other party, the court in the exercise of their discretion, will give time to re-take the deposition. In this case we think the objection must be overruled. The certificate does not state the witness was cautioned, but it states "that he was sworn in pursuance of the act." This is sufficient. The defendant offered a deed from Patrick Cain, for the land in dispute, to Wordsworth, dated in 1818. This deed was acknowledged before a master in chancery. There is no evidence that the person who took the acknowledgment was a master in chancery, and the deed is objected to on that ground. The act of 1822, provides, "that all deeds, mortgages, &c., which shall have been, or may be hereafter, perfected and executed according and in conformity to the laws of the state or territory in which they may be respectively made, for lands lying within this state, shall be and are hereby declared to be valid, to all intents and purposes, good and available in law." By the second section of the same act, "all deeds which have been made and acknowledged as above, are made valid." This section operates as a rule of evidence. The act of 1822, on this subject, was repealed by an act of [January 21] 1827 [Rev. Laws Ill. p. 129]. The act of 1833 repeals all acts within its provisions, prescribing a different mode. The deed offered by defendant was not recorded under the act of 1822. But the only question in relation to this deed is, whether the acknowledgment is a sufficient proof of its execution, and is within the above statute. There is no proof that the person who took the acknowledgment was a master. A master is appointed by the state court, and if he be authorised to take an acknowledgment of a deed in New York, this court cannot be presumed to know that he is authorised to act as master. On this ground, the deed offered by the defendant is overruled.

Verdict for the plaintiff.

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1855.

PAYMENT—EFFECT OF RECEIPT—PAYMENT BY NOTE.

1. A receipt of payment by a note is not conclusive, but only a prima facie evidence of payment.

2. A clerk invested with general authority to collect debts, presented a bill for supplies which were furnished on the credit of the vessel, and the debtor, not denying the claim, said that he was not then able to pay. On a subsequent application, the clerk expressed his willingness to take a negotiable note, if a certain third person would join in the note, and said he would then give the debtor the time desired, but if this were rejected, he should be compelled to attach the vessel. The note was given, and a receipt given of "payment by note." The note was endorsed by libellants, cashed the same day, and not being paid at maturity, returned to them, and was now produced in court and offered to be cancelled. Held, that the original debt was not extinguished, and that the lien on the vessel was not waived or abandoned.

[2][This was a libel in rem for a balance alleged to be due on a bill of ship chandlery, furnished to the Fashion, during the spring of 1853, by Moore & Foote, merchants at Detroit. The only controversy was as to the amount due to the libelants. The balance claimed in the libel was $141.44. The answer of the claimant, who was the master and also the owner of the boat, alleged that only $13.53 remained unpaid; and that that amount, with costs, had been duly tendered to the libelants, and by them refused. From the allegations and admissions of the parties, and the proofs taken in the case, it appeared that a bill of the amount due to the libelants on the 22d of May, 1854, was presented for payment on two occasions, by George F. Bagley, a clerk of the libelants, to Henry L. Newberry, the owner of the Fashion, at Chicago, Illinois. Bagley intimated to Newberry, that unless payment was made, the boat would be attached. On the second occasion, Newberry wishing for further time, Bagley offered to take a negotiable note for the amount, to be signed by Newberry and some other person. This offer was acceded to by Newberry, who thereupon gave to Bagley the promissory note of himself and one J. R. Hugenins, for the amount claimed, payable in thirty days, to the order of the libelants. On receiving this note, Bagley delivered the bill which he had presented, to Newberry, after first writing at its foot as follows: "Chicago, May 22, 1854. Received payment, by H. L. Newberry & J. R. Hugenins' note, at 30 days. Moore & Foote, per Bagley." The note was delivered to the libelants, who subsequently procured it to be discounted at an exchange office on the strength of their indorsement. It was not paid at maturity, and the libelants were compelled to take it up. It still remaining unpaid, the libelants produced it in court to be canceled or surrendered to the makers. Bagley testified that he had general authority to collect the libelants' demand, but no special authority to waive their lien on the steamboat, or to take a note in payment of the account. The question made on the hearing of the cause was as to the effect of taking the note of Newberry and Hugenins on the libelants' demand.

[I. The giving of a negotiable note by a debtor to a creditor extinguishes the original debt. (1) To hold a contrary doctrine, in case like the one at bar, would give two separate rights of action, distinct in their nature, for one cause of action. The original creditor might sue the boat—the holders of the note sue the maker. (2) A contrary decision would give secret liens to a class of floating property, which might lie dormant and secret for years, until the note matured, and then be brought forward, to the great damage of innocent purchasers of a vessel.

[II. When new parties are taken on a note in payment of a debt, it then is an absolute discharge, unless a contrary agreement is proved.

[III. The assignment of a lien, or the claim of a material man, on a vessel, is an extinguishment of the lien, and once having been extinguished, it can never be revived. 6 Shep. [Me.] 249; 10 Shep. [2] [From Newb. 49.]

WILKINS, District Judge. The clerk of the libellants, invested with a general authority to collect debts, presented a bill for the amount claimed, to the respondent, on the 22d of May last, 1854, and demanded payment. The respondent, not denying the accuracy of the account, stated that he was not able at the time to make payment. At a subsequent interview, the clerk renewed his application, expressed his willingness to take a negotiable note for the amount, if a certain individual, whom he named, would join in the same, and that then he would extend to the respondent the time desired, but that if this proposition was rejected, he would be compelled to attach the vessel. The note indicated was procured by the respondent, received by the clerk, and the account adjusted by a receipt, given in this language: "Received payment by note. Moore & Foote, by G. F. Bagley, Clerk." This note, being endorsed by the libellants, was, on the same day, cashed at a broker's office, and not being paid at maturity, was returned to them; it is now exhibited in court, and offered to be cancelled. This libel is exhibited on the original account. The answer alleges payment, and denies the existence of the maritime lien. Such being the facts, two questions are presented: 1st. Was the original debt extinguished by the note? If not, 2dly. Does the transaction show an abandonment or waiver of the lien?

The circuit court for the United States, for this district, in Allen v. King [Case No. 226], and in Weed v. Snow [supra], has settled the law for this court, namely, that a receipt of payment by note is not conclusive, but only prima facie evidence of the payment of the debt, and that such evidence may always be explained by other extraneous circumstances, showing the intention of the parties when the receipt was given, and that there was in fact no actual payment of the debt. This renders unnecessary the consideration of the conflicting decisions in other states. This court will follow the rulings of the circuit, as long as they are unreversed by the supreme court of the United States. Most of the cases cited were considered in Allen v. King [supra], and there is nothing in this receipt which takes it out of the ruling in that case. Here there is no proof of an agreement that the note should discharge the pre-existing debt, and no proof that it should not so operate. Our judgment must rest on the intention, as manifested by the conversation and conduct of the parties at the time. The receipt, unexplained, as in De Graff v. Moffat [Case No. 3,748], cited by the respondent's proctor, would have been conclusive. The proofs exhibit these facts: The master was not able or not willing to pay when the account was first presented. He did not contest the sum due. But he wanted time as a convenience to himself. The agent or clerk was willing to give time on certain conditions. With this spirit of accommodation the note in question was procured and received. The statement of the clerk, that unless the proposed arrangement was acceded to, the vessel should at once be attached, can, by no fair principle of construction, be held to signify his design to receive the note as absolute payment, and an extinguishment of the debt. Moreover, it appears that the agent was only authorized to collect debts. He had no power to exchange securities, especially a higher for one of less grade,—a security in rem for one merely in personam. Such power is not necessarily implied in a simple agency to collect. And certainly the cashing of the note by the broker was solely on the strength of the contract of endorsement. Had the intrinsic credit of the drawers been sufficient, the face of the obligation would have been otherwise.

Holding, therefore, that the note, independently, was not a satisfaction of the debt, the only question remaining is,—was the lien abandoned by the libellants' receiving the note, and thus recognizing the act of the clerk? It is to be observed that, as the transaction took place in Chicago. the libellants did not, in fact, receive the note, but only the money raised by its discount, when it was too late for them to disavow or repudiate the transaction. Where materials are furnished a vessel, the credit is given either to the owner, the captain, or to the ship, and the law creates the lien on the latter. Such lien, however, may be waived, either at the time the materials are furnished, or be abandoned by a subsequent agreement, expressed or implied, on the part of the creditor. He may, at his option, look to other security, and if so, no lien attaches to the ship. In the case of De Graff v. Moffat [supra], so confidently relied upon, the contract, at the time it was entered into by the parties, embraced a credit by the notes of the respondent. After the libellant had closed his proofs, the respondent introduced in evidence a settlement between the parties—an account current in the handwriting of the libellant—in which sundry promissory notes were credited and admitted as cash. This account was balanced, and for the sum remaining due, a receipt in full was given, being expressed at the foot of the account as a payment by note, which was not produced or offered for cancellation. No evidence was introduced showing any understanding modifying or contradicting this receipt, and it was, of course, held, as in Allen v. King [supra], prima facie evidence of payment. Besides, the original agreement, as shown by the account, certainly waived all lien upon the vessel. Although a note under certain circumstances will not operate as an extinguishment of the debt, yet, when the creditor accompanies the act of receiving it in payment with the manifest intention to take it as his sole security, and not to look to the ship, such intention clearly expressed or certainly implied, operates as the abandonment of the lien which the law gave him. Such an intention was not manifested in this case. There was no understanding to release the vessel. It is true that she was not yet attached by process; and it is true that the clerk threatened it; but it is alike true that, at that interview between the clerk and the respondent, all the latter wanted was further time to pay the debt. The former wanted the money due; and under these circumstances the note was given and taken.
