BANKRUPTCY—MONEY LOANED—PREFERENCE—MORTGAGE.

1. One who lends money to a retail trader within four months of his bankruptcy, and when he was actually insolvent, on a mortgage of his stock in trade, is bound to make some inquiry into his object in raising the money; and if upon the slightest inquiry he could have discovered that the whole purpose was to prefer a creditor, his mortgage may be avoided by the assignee.

[Cited in Ex parte Packard, Case No. 10,650; Ex parte Ames, Id. 323; Bucknam v. Goss, Id. 2,097.]

[Cited in Noble v. Scofield, 44 Vt. 284.]

2. Clauses one and two of the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534)], considered. A mortgage given to raise money to pay a creditor by way of preference comes within clause two of section thirty-five.

[Cited in Swan v. Robinson, 5 Fed. 296.]

The stock of goods which came to the possession of the assignee was mortgaged to the petitioner, and by order of court the stock was sold at auction, and the money was paid into the registry subject to all lawful liens. The mortgagee petitioned to have it paid out to him, and the assignee opposed the petition, on the ground that the mortgage was voidable by him under the second clause of the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act. The evidence tended to show that Butler was a retail trader, having a shop on Tremont street, Boston, and one at North Cambridge; that his stock in the latter place was mortgaged in May, 1870, but under what circumstances was not shown at this hearing; that towards the end of June, if not earlier, he found difficulty in meeting his engagements, and some creditors did not obtain prompt payment of their accounts. He was owing one Cushman a balance of about fifteen hundred and eighty-six dollars, on a note which had been given for a stock of goods in April, 1868, and on which he had made many small payments, from time to time. Mr. Cushman asked him for another payment, and he said that he could not make it unless he borrowed the money. Kimball, a clerk or partner of Mr. Cushman, then suggested to Mendell, the now petitioner, that he might invest his money to advantage in a mortgage of Butler's stock, and to Butler that the petitioner would probably lend him the money. He brought the parties together, and the petitioner agreed to lend him $1600. The transaction was concluded, and the money advanced in Cushman's place of business, and Kimball, the clerk or partner, lent the petitioner $600 to make up the sum. The money was paid over by the bankrupt to Cushman in settlement of the old note, but it was not proved that this was done in presence of the mortgagee, or that he was, in fact, fully informed of the nature of the transaction. He made no inquiry into the condition of the mortgagor's affairs, but relied mainly as to security on the advice of Mr. Cushman and Mr. Kimball. Butler asked him to keep the mortgage off the record, because it would injure his credit, and he agreed that he would not record it at once, and so instructed Mr. Kimball, with whom he left the note and mortgage. The stock in trade of Butler was attached about two weeks after, and so remained until he went into bankruptcy on the 26th of August, 1870.

L. W. Howes, for mortgagee.

T. F. Nutter, for assignee.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John Lowell, LL. D., District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

LOWELL, District Judge. It is plain that the money was raised for the express purpose of paying a pre-existing debt, and the intent to prefer the creditor may be fairly inferred. The only doubt is, whether the mortgagee was a party to the fraud upon the statute, or was kept in the dark by his friends. There is evidence from which it may be argued that he must have understood the scheme, unless he were wilfully blind; but the assignee relies more particularly upon the second clause of the thirty-fifth section of the statute, as imposing such knowledge upon him by operation of law, unless he made diligent inquiry. It is strenuously urged, in opposition to this view, that the clause in question does not refer to mortgages at all, nor to preferences, whether direct or indirect, but only to sales out of the ordinary course of business of a trader.

Clauses one and two of section thirty-five are copied from the general statutes of Massachusetts (chapter 118, §§ 89, 91), with this important difference, that in both those sections the limitation was six months, whereas in clause one of the bankrupt act, relating more particularly to preferences, it is four months. Under the state statute the second clause was held to apply to preferences equally with the first. Metcalf v. Munson, 10 Allen, 491; Nary v. Meerill, 8 Allen, 451. And it is plain that the language of the second clause, taken by itself, does fairly include preferences, excepting such as are made by payments of money. But under the bankrupt act, the tendency of opinion has been that the difference in limitation shows an intention to put preferences on a different ground from other technical frauds. For instance, in a late case it was held in an action by an assignee to recover back money paid by the bankrupt to a pre-existing creditor, that the declaration was bad for alleging the payment to have been made within six months instead of four months before the bankruptcy. Bean v. Brookmire [Case No. 1,168]. I hold it still open to argument whether the thirty-ninth section does not substitute six months as the limitation in all cases, repealing to that extent the thirty-fifth section. In the case just cited, it appears to have been argued that the thirty-ninth section abolished all limitation; this argument was very properly overruled. But it may be said with a good deal of plausibility, that when congress in the thirty-ninth section made a preference an act of bankruptcy and proceeded to say, that if it was made the foundation of a petition within six months, the debtor might be adjudged a bankrupt, and if he were, the assignee might recover the money or other property, they were establishing a general rule, by means of a special example, and that that rule is, that preferences within six months may be avoided by the assignee. If so, this section, to that extent, repeals the earlier section. This is a view that has lately occurred to me, and in which I reserve my final opinion. If this construction should be ultimately adopted it will certainly reconcile some apparent discrepancies, and remove some apparent difficulties.

The precise point of this case is, whether a person advancing his own money to a trader, and taking security from him, out of the ordinary course of the trader's business, is to be held liable to reconvey the security, if the only fraud intended by the debtor is the payment of a creditor by way of preference. In Massachusetts it was held in the affirmative. Crafts v. Belden, 99 Mass. 535. But, as we have already seen, the statute of that state made no distinction between preferences and other technical frauds. Here the argument is, that if the creditor himself, who has received the preference, cannot be pursued after four months, it is very hard that one who is merely aiding him to obtain his money should be liable for two months longer. I feel the force of this objection, but the language of the act plainly includes this case, and it does not seem to come within the first clause, which contemplates that the money or property coming from the debtor should be applied by the person receiving it to the payment or security of the creditor. A transaction of the kind now in question is one step farther from the preference and fully within the second clause. In fact this mortgage was given within the four months, so that if it came within the first clause, the assignee would be entitled to recover, but it seems to me that it does not, and the assignee would be without remedy if it were not for the second clause. And I cannot believe the statute is so defective.

Taking this to be so, it is clear that the mortgage was out of the ordinary course of business of Mr. Butler, because he was a retail trader, doing a business of about one hundred dollars a day, and a mortgage of such a trader's whole stock is a confession of insolvency. Nary v. Meerill, 8 Allen. 451. If made directly to the creditor, it would have been an act of bankruptcy, as I have often decided. And both parties considered it injurious to his credit, and for that reason agreed that it should not be recorded until some necessity should arise therefor.

The petition of the mortgagee must for these reasons be dismissed. I here desire to express my preference that such cases should be brought in the form of actions at law, that a jury may decide the facts. Here the evidence tends very strongly to show that a creditor was preferred. If the creditor himself were innocent, but the debtor and mortgagee contrived the preference, the latter would be liable, though the creditor would not be. Crafts v. Belden, 99 Mass. 535. But in this case it is possible that the mortgagee was hoodwinked by the others, though the prima facie evidence is against him, and is not met, and I do not believe the truth to be so. Supposing, however, that he was not aware of the exact nature of the transaction, the assignee could certainly recover of the creditor, who is the party benefited, and justice would seem to require that he should be the person to repay the money. If, then, the mortgagee should apply to me to direct the assignee to bring an action against the creditor, on some proper terms, I should probably make such an order.

Petition dismissed. Money to remain in court for ten days unless the mortgagee waives his right to apply to the circuit court for a revision of this decree.

Case No. 9,419.

MENDELL v. The MARTIN WHITE.

[Hoff. Op. 450.]

District Court, N. D. California. Feb. 13, 1856.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—PERSONAL INJURIES.

[Admiralty has jurisdiction of a suit in rem for damages for personal injuries caused by a collision upon navigable waters, especially where a statute of the state on the navigable waters of which the injury occurred makes the vessel liable for injuries to the person as well as to property.]

Libel in rem by J. T. Mendell against the steamer Martin White to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by the libellant in a collision of the Martin White with the vessel of which libellant was master. A claim was put in on behalf of the steamer, and exceptions filed to the jurisdiction of the court. It was not denied that the suit being for a marine tort, the cause of action was within the cognizance of the admiralty; but it was insisted that, for a personal injury upon the seas, the libel could only be brought in personam (against the owner of the vessel) and that a suit in rem (against the vessel itself) could not be sustained, the latter form of action being restricted to cases of injury to property, while for injuries to the person, the libel in personam is the only remedy.

P. W. Shepheard, for libellant.
Blanding & Della Torre, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. By the general principles of the civil as well as the common law, the principal is responsible for the wrongful acts of his agent, done in the execution of his agency (Paley, Ag. p. 3, § 1; Poth. Obl. No. 453, 456; Domat. Civ. Law, tit. 16, § 3; Story, Ag. § 452 et seq.), and the liability is familiarly imposed as well for injuries to the person as for damages to property. On this principle depends the responsibility of owners for damages by collision and for injuries to the goods of shippers. The ship owner has ever been held liable for the tortious abduction of a minor child by the master, and this too without notice of the master's acts. Sherwood v. Hall [Case No. 12,777]; Steele v. Thacher [Id. 13,348]; Plummer v. Webb [Id. 11,234]; 7 D. Rep. 132. Although at common law the principal has been held not liable for acts of wilful and intentional wrong on the part of an agent, but only for the consequences of his negligence and unskilfullness, the maritime law carries his vicarious responsibility much further. By that law the owner is liable for all the acts of the master done in the execution of the business for which he is employed, by which third parties are injured, whether the injury was occasioned by the wilful acts, or by the negligence or want of skill of the master (Dias v. The Revenge [Case No. 3,877]); and this liability in the case of the owner of a privateer, extends not only to damages by spoliation of papers, but also for ill-treatment unnecessarily inflicted upon the persons of the captured crew (Id.; 5 C. Rob. Adm. 291; Id. 33; 1 Dod. 291). See, also, The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 456; Del Col v. Arnold, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 333; The Lively [Case No. 8,403]. It is therefore evident that in this case the libel, if in personam against the owners, would have been sustained, and satisfaction could have been enforced by the attachment of their property or choses in action. The Invincible [Id. 7,054]. If then the owners are personally liable as such it would seem necessarily to follow that in this as in other cases of collision, the proceedings may be directly against the ship as the offending thing.

By the civil law the owner, or exercitor, was personally responsible for the acts of the master as well ex delicto as ex contractu. If there were several, each was bound in solido for the full amount of the obligations of the master ex contractu. The maritime law introduced into this principle an important qualification. It held the owners bound in solido for the acts of the master, whether of tort or of contract, but limited the extent of their liability to the value of the ship. Such was the settled law of the Mediterranean, and such, according to Emerigon, is the established jurisprudence of the north of Europe. The Ordonnance de la Maine provides that proprietors of vessels shall be responsible for the acts of the master, but they shall be discharged by abandoning ship and freight. Whether or not this limitation applied to the obligations of the master ex contractu as well as ex delicto is disputed, but in the language of Mr. Ware it may safely be affirmed that by the general maritime law of Europe the liability of owners for the wrongful acts of the master is limited to the interest they have in the vessel, and that by abandoning the ship and freight they discharge themselves from all personal responsibility (The Rebecca [Case No. 11,619]; The Phebe [Id. 11,061]), from which the foregoing observations and citations have been taken. "If, then, this be the established principle in cases arising ex delicto, what," says Ware, J., "is the natural consequence? Is it not to render the ship herself liable to the creditor in specie? When the law confines a creditor to a particular fund for his remuneration, it cannot be so absurd as to prohibit him from making that fund available by laying his hand on it and securing it." It was accordingly held by Judge Ware in the cases mentioned, that in a suit "founded on the wrongful acts of the master" (negligent storage of goods), the shipper may procure satisfaction for the damage by a proceeding in rem. These cases, it will be seen, nowhere recognize the distinction sought to be taken between injuries to property by the master's tort and injuries to his person; on the contrary, they seem to lay down the broad principle that in all cases of tort, where the owners are liable the ship is also liable in law, and in The Phebe [supra] it is even said that in the origin of the custom the primary liability was upon the vessel, and that of the owner was not personal but merely incidental to his ownership, from which he was discharged either by the loss of the vessel or by abandoning it to the creditor.

The personal liability of the owner in this case is not denied and the general liability of the vessel in rem, in cases of collision, is not disputed. I am unable to perceive why, on general principles of the maritime law, or in reason, the ship should not be as responsible for this kind of damage as for any other. Although I have found no direct authority on this point, yet the books contain cases closely analogous. In McGrath v. The Candalero [Case No. 8,809], the court allowed damages for the detention of the crew on board of a privateer which had made a tortious seizure of the actor's vessel, and ordered that the privateer remain under attachment until the same was paid. In the case of King v. The New World, which was an appeal from this court, the supreme court sustained a libel in rem. brought by a passenger, for personal injuries received by the explosion of a boiler, and this where the passenger was "a steamboat man," and paid no fare. 16 How. [57 U. S.] 472. I think that this case sufficiently shows the inaccuracy of the statement of Browne that for injuries to property the libel is in rem, and for those to the person in personam. 2 Bro. Eq. & Adm. 201, 202.

If this question were more doubtful, the fact that the statute of California renders boats and vessels engaged in navigating the waters of this state liable for injuries to the person as well as to property, is sufficient to justify this mode of proceeding, supported as it is by the principles and analogies of the general maritime law, and recognized in other very similar cases of maritime torts. The collision in this case occurred in the waters of this bay, and the parties are all citizens and residents of California. The case is one confessedly of admiralty jurisdiction, and I see no reason why this court should not enforce the liability created by the local law. I think, therefore, that the exceptions should be overruled.

RIGHT OF ATTACHING CREDITORS TO OPPOSE ADJUDICATION—ASSIGNMENT AS AN ACT OF BANKRUPTCY.

1. An attaching creditor may intervene and oppose an adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy on the ground of fraud and collusion between the petitioner and debtor.

[Cited in Re Williams, Case No. 17,706; Re Scrafford, Id. 12,557; Re Jonas, Id. 7,442; Re Austin, Id. 662.]

[Cited in Risser v. Hoyt, 53 Mich. 198, 18 N. W. 611.]

2. Even a fair general assignment for the benefit of creditors is an act of bankruptcy, because it necessarily defeats the operation of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

[Cited in Globe Ins. Co. v. Cleveland Ins. Co., Case No. 5,486.]

3. Within the meaning of the law defining acts of bankruptcy an assignment, invalid under the laws of the state where made, but used as a means for giving a preference, is an act of bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Lawrence, Case No. 8,133.]

D. Mendelsohn filed his petition praying an adjudication of bankruptcy against his brother, S. Mendelsohn. On the return day of the order to show cause, the alleged bankrupt, S. Mendelsohn, did not appear and on motion a default was entered, and thereupon an adjudication was asked for. At this stage in the proceedings certain creditors appeared and asked leave to intervene and contest the facts in the petition. They allege in their petition that they are creditors and have a lien, by attachment, on the goods of the debtor; that the proceeding for adjudication is collusive and fraudulent, and the alleged debt of the petitioning creditor a sham. The petitioning creditor objected to their being allowed to contest his petition, upon the ground that until an adjudication the case is solely between himself and the debtor. This question was reserved, and testimony was taken upon the petition of intervention and the whole case submitted. One of the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition for adjudication was that the debtor made an assignment of his property to Messrs. Davis & Co. with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors and to defeat or delay the operation of the act. An assignment was in fact executed by the debtor to Davis & Co. purporting to be in trust for all his creditors. The circumstances attending this assignment were that one Stone, the agent of Davis & Co., was pressing the debtor for payment of their claim, and procured the execution of the assignment with the understanding, as he says, that Mendelsohn should remain in possession of the goods, and carry on the business as before its execution; that on Monday of each week the debtor should pay $75, to be applied to the payment of creditors whose claims exceeded $100, and that Mendelsohn should provide for the payment of the small creditors himself. The arrangement was so far acted on that some $150 were paid to Stone, which is now on deposit for the benefit of the creditors who are entitled to it.

F. G. Newlands, for intervening creditors.

HILLYER, District Judge. The first question is as to the right of these creditors having attachments to intervene and oppose the adjudication at this time. That the creditors now asking to intervene have a direct interest in opposing the adjudication is plain. They have attached the debtor's property, and if proceedings in bankruptcy do not go forward, will have a lien thereon for their security. If, however, there is an adjudication and an assignment their attachment will be dissolved, and their right to prosecute their suit to judgment suspended.

[After adjudication, it has been settled in this court, that attaching creditors may move to set it aside; that they have an interest in and a clear right to be heard and resist the proceedings on the ground that the court is without jurisdiction. Fogerty v. Gerrity [Case No. 4,895]. It was also held in that case that all other creditors are parties to and bound by the proceedings, so that, although neither the petitioning creditor nor the debtor objected to the jurisdiction, that was not sufficient to confer jurisdiction, even if it could be so conferred.] [2]

Such being the case, it cannot well be maintained that there is no relief for these attaching creditors, if it be true, as alleged, that the debt of the petitioning creditor is not a just debt, and yet the debtor colluding with him admits it, and consents to an adjudication. A court of equity would grant relief against, and annul a decree so obtained by fraud, for fraud infects and corrupts the judgments of all courts. Story, Eq. Pl. § 426. In some form, then, it must be admitted that persons whose rights are injuriously affected by a fraudulent adjudication may apply for and obtain relief. No court ought or can close its ears to this petition.

[The bankrupt law makes no provision in these cases for notice to the creditors in general, and the only necessary parties are the petitioning creditors and the debtor; yet this is no sound reason for denying the right to intervene upon good grounds being shown, such as collusion and fraud on the part of the original parties to the proceeding.] [2]

An intervener, it is said, may come in at any stage of the cause, even after judgment, if an appeal can be allowed on such judgment. Bouv. verb. "Intervention." The question is essentially one of practice, and to my mind it is better in every aspect of it, to allow the attaching creditors to come in and be heard before the adjudication, than to wait until a decree is made and compel them then to impeach it for the fraud which would have defeated it in the first instance. I think, therefore, that these parties showing that they have a direct interest in defeating an attempted fraud like the one set up, should be allowed to intervene before the adjudication for the protection of their interest.

I am aware that there have been decisions which at first blush seem to be against the practice here adopted; but on examination they will, most of them, be found not really so, and to differ from the present case either in the fact that the adjudication would not have the effect to render unavailing any security of the creditors petitioning to intervene, or that the petitioners were mere creditors with no other claim to be heard. In re Bush [Case No. 2,222]; In re Boston, H. & E. R. Co. [Id. 1,679].

Looking, then, to the evidence for and against the validity of the petitioning creditors' debt, I find that the interveners have failed in their attempt to show it to be fraudulent. That leaves for decision the question whether the assignment was an act of bankruptcy.

[2] [But this was said in a case in which certain creditors applied to have the adjudication set aside, on the ground that a certain assignment had been made by the debtor for the benefit of his creditors, to which the petitioning creditor it seems was not a party, though he assented to the assignment. Now, in this case, the adjudication in bankruptcy did not have the effect to render unavailing this assignment; if valid, against the assignee, it could still be maintained against the assignee. No want of jurisdiction was alleged, nor fraud, nor collision. What was said by the learned judge about the right of creditors to intervene before adjudication was unnecessary to the decision. In Re Boston H. & E. R. Co. [supra], a motion was made by a creditor before adjudication for leave to defend against the petition. But the court said the question, before the adjudication at least, was between the debtor and the petitioning creditors, "with which no outside party, sustaining merely the relation of a person who claims to be a creditor of the debtor, can be allowed to interfere." No want of jurisdiction was alleged, no fraud or collusion. Nor does it appear that the direct effect of the adjudication and assignment would deprive the creditor of any security which he then had for his debt. He was, as the court says, a mere creditor, with no other claim to be heard. On the whole, then, the right of the attaching creditors to appear and oppose the adjudication on the grounds alleged cannot properly be denied them, and they must be heard. Of course, what has been said is not meant to convey the idea that the fact that a creditor has an attachment lien is of itself any ground for denying the adjudication; it only gives him a right to be heard. If there is no fraud or want of jurisdiction, the fact that the adjudication will dissolve his lien is no ground for its denial. And first, it is denied that the debt of the petitioning creditor is valid and just. The evidence for petitioning creditor is that the debt is made of two items, as follows: In 1873 the petitioning creditor was in partnership with J. Zacharias and his brother; the debtor bought goods of the firm. When the firm was dissolved, the petitioning creditor was charged and his brother credited on the firm books with the balance due, four hundred dollars; fifty dollars was paid on this in January, 1874, leaving three hundred and fifty dollars balance due. Afterward the petitioning creditor formed a copartnership. Rub and the debtor bought of this firm goods to the amount of over one thousand dollars. When Mr. Wentenrich came in, in July, 1874, he refused to give credit to S. Mendelsohn, and the amount due Rub and D. Mendelsohn was charged and credited as before to the extent of D. M.'s profits, viz., four hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirteen cents. The balance of the firm debt was afterwards paid by S. Mendelsohn. There is no doubt of the existence of the firms and the purchase of the goods by the debtor as stated. I see no good ground to say that settlements were not made as stated also, and the charges made to the petitioning creditor.

[2] [From 12 N. B. R. 533.]

[The only marks of suspicion are the fact that the debtor and petitioning creditor are brothers, and certain erasures on the ledger of Rub, Mendelsohn & Co. That the parties are brothers is a circumstance which warrants the court in scrutinizing the transaction closely, but not in inferring fraud from that alone. The clerk who made the entries swears they were made at the time they bear date, and explains the erasure, which was done by him. In the account, the whole amount due from S. M. to the firm had been charged to D. M. and credited to S. M. This was erased, and over it was written the amount agreed upon of D. M.'s profits, four hundred and ninety-seven dollars and thirteen cents. This was done, the clerk says, at the time it bears date. No plausible motive is shown or suggested for a false entry of this kind at that time. The book of original entries was shown, and the items of the account against the debtor correspond. The balance due the firm was paid by S. M. through the clerk, S. Friedman. After the last balance of one hundred and two dollars was paid, which ignored the firm account, no more payments were made. He says that for nine months past he has not seen D. M. at the store of S. M. On the other hand, the debtor stated, as they say, to Stone and to Baum, that the list he gave them was all he owed, and the debt of D. M. was not on it. The debtor denies this, and it is shown that other creditors of his were not mentioned at the time. Of course, the failure of the debtor to state this debt to Stone and Baum is not proof that it did not exist, but merely a circumstance of suspicion, and a slight one, on the general charge of collusion and fraud.

[There is not, in my mind, from the evidence, any doubt that the petitioning creditor's debt was bona fide, and arose as stated. There is no pretense of any motive for trumping up a debt of this kind in this way against his brother one and two years ago. It is an everyday thing for embarrassed debtors to conceal the true state of their affairs from creditors who are pressing for payment; they overstate their assets, and understate their debts. It seems to be true that for nine months before these proceedings were commenced these brothers had not spoken to each other. The actions of the debtor, during the three or four weeks preceding the petition, show nothing to indicate a fraudulent purpose. He undertook to pay seventy-five dollars a week for his larger creditors, and to pay off the small ones; he agrees to sign the assignment to Davis & Co., under a belief that it was, as they desired he should believe, a valid one; and finally attempts to settle at twenty-five cents on the dollar. It is hard to reconcile all this with the idea that he was meditating and arranging for a fraudulent bankruptcy proceeding at the time. The evidence for the petitioning creditor is that no part of his debts has been paid, and this is not contradicted. Friedman's evidence shows that the payments he made were on account of the firm debt, and not that of the petitioning creditor. Two acts of bankruptcy are alleged, and it is urged that neither has been proved. The first is, that the debtor made an assignment of his property to Davis & Co., with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, and to defeat or delay the operation of the act. An assignment was, in fact, executed by the debtor to Davis & Co., purporting to be in trust for all his creditors. The facts are that Stone, the agent of Davis & Co., was pressing the debtor for payment of their claim, and procured the execution of the assignment with the understanding, as he says, that Mendelsohn should remain in possession of the goods, and carry on the business as before its execution; that on Monday of each week the debtor should pay seventy-five dollars, to be applied to the payment of creditors over one hundred dollars; that M. should pay the small creditors himself. The arrangement was so far acted on that some one hundred and fifty dollars were paid to Stone, which sum is now on deposit for the benefit of creditors entitled to it. When the debtor failed to make payment of the seventy-five dollars weekly, and told them he could not, he was told that the property in the store belonged to the assignee. Suit was afterwards begun, and the store and goods attached.] [2]

The weight of authority is decidedly that even a fair general assignment for the benefit of creditors is an act of bankruptcy, because it necessarily defeats the operation of the bankrupt act, and hinders and delays creditors. But it is said that this assignment was void, and could not therefore be an act of bankruptcy, and it is clear that under the Code of California, it was not a valid assignment. But admitting the assignment to be so defective that it could not be enforced, it is, it seems to me, looking to the use made of it in this case, as much an act of bankruptcy as if it had been executed with all the forms.

The attaching creditors say they knew from the first that it was void as an assignment, but sought to make the debtor believe it was valid in order to use it as an instrument for collecting their debts. The debtor appears to have so believed, and admits it was made with a view to giving a preference to some of his creditors, and says he named six creditors to Stone, whom he wanted paid first.

Here, then, was, to all intents and purposes, a transfer of the debtor's property, and acting upon it, he paid over the agreed sum per week to the creditors entitled under the assignment to share therein. Under the thirty-ninth section "any conveyance or transfer with intent to prefer" is an act of bankruptcy. The assignment in this case, though invalid as an assignment under the laws of California, was an attempt to transfer property with intent to prefer certain creditors named by the debtor.

A construction of section 39 is inadmissible, which would permit a debtor to do that by means of an invalid instrument, which he could not do by one properly executed. The bankrupt act, cannot be defeated by omitting some of the forms in executing the assignment, and then setting up such omission in defense to proceedings in bankruptcy.

Within the meaning of the law defining acts of bankruptcy, I think this was an assignment, and made with the intent charged, so that on the whole case there must be an adjudication of bankruptcy as prayed.

MENDELSOHN v. The LOUISIANA.

[3 Woods, 46.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1877.

CARRIERS—INJURED IN TRANSIT—BILL OF LADING—EXCEPTIONS—LIABILITY.

Where soda, shipped on board an iron steamship at Liverpool for New Orleans, late in the winter, was transported through the Gulf in the warm weather of the early spring, and was damaged by the humidity of the hold, and loss or damage by heat and sweating were among the exceptions of the bill of lading; held, that the case fell within the exceptions, and the ship was not liable.

Transferred to circuit from district court, by virtue of section 60, Rev. St., the district judge having been of counsel for one of the parties.

M. Dinkelspiel and F. Michinard, for libelant.

J. D. Rouse and Wm. Grant, for claimant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The libel alleged the shipment on board the steamship Louisiana at Liverpool, on April 8, 1873, in good order, consigned to libelant at New Orleans, of 500 kegs of bi-carbonate of soda; that the steamship arrived on May 14, 1873, but failed to deliver the said merchandise in good order, but, on the contrary, that it was deteriorated in value thirty per cent from improper stowage and want of proper care and by water and otherwise, to the libelant's damage $1,200. The answer averred that the soda was delivered in the same order as received, and denied improper stowage or any negligence or want of care. On the contrary, it averred that the soda was well stowed and, for greater security, was put in the fore and after holds under the decks; that the weather was fine during the entire voyage and the ship tight and stanch; that she did not leak; made no water, and none got into her hold during the entire voyage, and that if the soda sustained any damage, it was caused by its inherent qualities. The exceptions in the bill of lading were as follows: "Excepting loss or damage arising from the act of God, the queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, restraints of princes, rulers or people, jettison, barratry of the master or mariners, thieves, vermin, frost, heat, sweating, decay, rain, spray, leakage, breakage or rust, coal or coal dust, fire, steam, machinery or boilers or any defect therein, collision, or any other accidents of the seas, rivers or navigation of whatsoever nature or kind."

The evidence is entirely satisfactory to my mind that the goods of the libelant were carefully and properly stowed and that the damage which they suffered was not caused by any carelessness or negligence of the master or seamen, but was caused by the sweating or humidity unavoidable in the hold of an iron ship, loaded in Liverpool in the winter or early spring, and making a voyage to New Orleans through the Gulf in the warm weather of spring. Such a cause of damage is within the exception, "sweating," and also the exception, "accident of navigation," reserved in the bill of lading; and the ship is not liable for the deterioration of the goods. Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 272. The libel must be dismissed at libelant's cost.

BANKRUPTCY—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS —WHEN ORDERED—PLENARY POWER.

1. The district court will order the production of books and papers at the summary hearing on the return day of the order to show cause.

[Cited in Re California Pac. R. Co., Case No. 2,315.]

2. The fifteenth section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 82] is applicable to such cases; if not, the general scope of the bankrupt law gives plenary power.

[Cited in Re California Pac. R. Co., Case No. 2,315.]

Pending the trial of the issues made by the pleadings in the above case, which had been referred to a commissioner to take the testimony and report, the creditor, by petition to the court properly verified and supported by the affidavit of one of his solicitors, sets forth, among other things, that the "State Savings Association" is only an assumed name in which the debtor, Mendenhall, transacted business, and that the latter and the Savings Association are one and the same; and, also, that about January 1st, 1871, the Savings Association, so-called, became the entire and exclusive property of the said Mendenhall, by an agreement between him and R. J. Baldwin, at that time the only owners of the same; and that the books of the said Mendenhall and the State Savings Association are material testimony upon the issue of indebtedness charged in the petition. It is also stated that notice was served upon Mendenhall or his solicitors to produce the books, and that they had failed to do so.

On this petition and affidavit, the creditor obtained an order upon the debtor to show cause why he should not produce the books as described therein. In response thereto the debtor presents an affidavit setting forth that he is willing to produce any papers and books belonging to him relating to any matters between him and said petitioner, and is now willing so to do; that he has no books, papers or documents of any kind whatsoever relating to any matters or dealings between him and said petitioner, and never has had; and that he has never had any dealings whatever with said petitioner. And, further, that the said State Savings Association and himself are not one, and that he has not the exclusive control nor custody of the books of said association, and never has had; that said association is a corporation under the laws of the state of Minnesota, and that his only right of control and possession of any of the books or other property of said association is such as results from his being one of the corporators, and one of its officers, and that he has never done his private business in the name of said association, nor ever assumed to use that name in and about his individual business, and that the books of said association are not even in his control or possession, officially or otherwise. An affidavit of the debtors' solicitors is also presented, denying that any paper or notice demanding the production of books had been served upon them or either of them.

NELSON, District Judge. The act of congress (1 Stat. 82, § 15), in substance, provides, that the courts of the United States in trial of actions at law, on motion and due notice thereof being given, shall have authority to require the parties to produce books or writings in their possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue, in cases and under circumstances where they might be compelled to produce the same in chancery. There is also authority to grant final judgment upon the issue involved in the trial, or a judgment of non suit in case the order for their production is disobeyed. This statutory provision is peculiarly stringent, and when a court is asked to enforce it, a plain case must be presented for its interposition. There is no limitation in regard to the kind of actions at law which must be on trial in order to entitle either party to the benefit of the statute, and the objection urged by the debtor's solicitor, that this is a bankruptcy proceeding, and, therefore, not within its purview, I think not tenable. The only qualification is, that the right must be such as a court of equity would sustain on a bill of discovery; if so, then the summary method provided in the statute is a substitute for the bill.

Now, while I am satisfied that the petition seeks to have the books produced for some purposes not pertinent to the issue on trial, and on that account irrelevant, still I think an examination of the testimony already introduced shows that the books of the Savings Association do contain an account with the petitioning creditor, as represented by his pass book introduced in evidence, which purports to be a statement of such account, and that it is in the power of the debtor to produce the books. If, in addition to this, it is conceded that the testimony would establish the further fact that the debtor is the sole owner of the corporate rights, claimed by virtue of the articles of association, then, irrespective of any question as to whether such an association is a corporation or not, the petitioner would be entitled, as a matter of right, to the benefit of an examination of all papers and books so far as they may relate to any business transaction between himself and the association, and also so far as they may corroborate the witnesses in regard to any admission of Mendenhall that he was about to manage the business of the association so that he would be solely and individually responsible.

It is undisputed that there is testimony already in the case tending to establish the fact that the affairs of this association were under his sole and exclusive management, and the books and other papers are, therefore, certainly competent and proper evidence. I think a prima facie case of the materiality of these books has been made out, as the testimony now stands, and that a bill of discovery, according to the rules of equity, would be allowed.

I have thus far placed the authority to act upon the fifteenth section of the judiciary act. If incorrect in this position, I think the general scope of the bankrupt law would give plenary power to this court to compel the examination of all papers and books of the debtor, or in his possession, if pertinent to the issue, and required for the protection of the rights and interest of the petitioning creditor. The proceedings at this time seem to require the exercise by the court of this power, and I grant the order asked for.

Inasmuch as the testimony in the case is nearly closed, I will accede to the request of the debtor's solicitor and hear the case upon the evidence already taken by the commissioner and reported, and such other as may be introduced before me in connection with the books and papers, when produced. The order nisi is made absolute, and the books, &c., will be produced before me at my chambers, in St. Paul, on March 2, 1874, at 11 a. m.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITION—PERMISSION TO WITHDRAW—DELAY.

A creditor filed petition to have his debtor adjudged bankrupt, and subsequently, on the creditor's debt being settled by the debtor, on the return day of the order to show cause, entered a motion to dismiss the proceedings. Another creditor presented a petition alleging the acts of bankruptcy charged were true, and praying that the motion be denied and the case proceed. Held, that while permission to withdraw would not prevent other creditors from instituting new proceedings, it would delay and embarrass the operation of the act, and it must, therefore, be denied.

[This case was previously heard upon petition of the creditor asking for production of certain books. Case No. 9,423.]

On February 2d, 1874, an order to show cause was issued, upon the petition of Lydia T. Pomeroy, to have the debtor, Mendenhall, adjudged a bankrupt. The return day was fixed on February 9th, and on the 6th inst. a motion was made, by the solicitor appearing for the debtor, to dismiss all proceedings. To sustain the motion, a petition of Lydia T. Pomeroy was presented, setting forth that the debtor had fully settled her debt against him, and she asks that the proceedings instituted may be dismissed, and that she be permitted to withdraw her original petition. John Kausal, who also claims to be a creditor of the debtor, resists the motion to dismiss, and presents a petition properly verified in which he states his claim, and alleges that the debtor had committed the acts of bankruptcy charged by Lydia T. Pomeroy, and asks that the motion be denied, and that his claim be substituted at the proper time and the case proceed.

C. H. Benton, for debtor.

Cooley & Lowery and Merrick & Morrison, for creditor, Kausal.

NELSON, District Judge. The only question necessary to consider, and which will dispose of this motion to dismiss, is, can any creditor, other than the one petitioning that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt, intervene at any time before adjudication and be heard upon an application made to the court in behalf of the debtor? I confess that on first view, it would seem that, following the analogy between ordinary actions, no third party could meddle with the proceedings which, upon the face of the pleading and papers on file, appear to be between two parties—the petitioning creditor and his alleged debtor. From an examination, however, of the objects of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and the result to be accomplished by the involuntary proceedings, it at once appears that something more is to be effected by the prosecution of a suit in the bankruptcy court, than is originally sought by a suit at law.

The submission of the estate of a debtor for distribution among all his creditors—ignoring all preference—is the chief object to be attained by these proceedings, and not only the petitioner but every creditor is directly interested in compelling this distribution. The bankrupt law, in section forty-two, makes provision for a substitution of any other creditor, on the return day, or adjourned day, when the petitioner fails to appear and proceed, but this does not prohibit a creditor from asking intervention at any time, when necessary for the purpose of preserving and protecting his interest in the estate of the debtor. If he is seeking earnestly to enforce a meritorious claim, I can see no reason why a court should not recognize his application, and allow him to intervene for the purpose of protecting his interests.

Tested by the above remarks, it seems to me the last creditor is entitled to be heard, and from the allegations in his sworn petition, which, for the purposes of this motion, must be taken as true, there can be no doubt that his intervention is just and proper, and may serve to protect the interest of all the creditors. The petitioning creditor, after instituting proceedings which, when completed, would subject the estate of the debtor to the demands of all creditors, if the allegations in her petition are true, received payment of her claim, and acknowledging an acquittance, asks a withdrawal of these proceedings. Now, while a permission to withdraw would not prevent other creditors from instituting new proceedings, I can see that not only a delay would occur which might embarrass the operation of the bankrupt law, but a combination might be formed among some of the creditors which would prevent a fair and equal distribution of the debtor's estate.

Motion to dismiss denied.

PARTNERSHIP—ASSUMING TO BE A CORPORATION—HOW LIABLE.

Where certain persons associated themselves together, assuming to be a corporation and using a corporate name, without authority of law, they are individually liable as co-partners for the debts of the association; and a creditor who has dealt with them as a corporation is not thereby estopped from setting up his claim against them individually.

[This case was formerly heard upon the petition of the creditor to have certain books and accounts produced, showing the identity of the bankrupt with the State Savings Association. The petition was granted. Case No. 9,423. It was again heard upon motion to dismiss proceedings. Id. 9,424. It is now heard upon petition of a creditor to be substituted for the original petitioner.]

The demand of the creditor who petitioned to be substituted was evidenced by a "pass book" issued to him upon a deposit with "The State Savings Association," and it was conceded that the deposit was made with the association at the time stated in the petition, but it was denied by the alleged debtor that he was individually liable, and he claimed that the association was a corporation by virtue of an act of the state of Minnesota, entitled: "An act for the incorporation of colleges, seminaries, churches, lyceums, libraries and other societies for benevolent, charitable, scientific and missionary purposes."

The following are the sections of the act (chapter 17, Comp. St. Minn.) under which it is claimed a corporation was created:

Section 56: "That any three or more persons desirous of forming a corporation for a college, seminary, church, lyceum, library or any benevolent, charitable, scientific or missionary society, shall adopt articles certifying: (1) The names of the persons concerned, and their having associated to form a body politic. (2) Their corporate name and location or place of business. (3) If a joint stock company, the amount of capital stock and the amount constituting a share; if not a joint stock company then the terms of admission to membership. (4) What officers the society or company will have, by what officers business will be conducted, and when they are to be elected, or if appointed, when and by whom such appointment is to be made; and also the number of trustees to manage the said society, and the names of the trustees for the first year of its existence, which articles shall be subscribed and sworn to by them or by their president and secretary and a majority of their associates, before some officer authorized to take the acknowledgment of deeds, and filed and recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the county where such corporation shall exist, and a duplicate thereof shall be filed in the office of the secretary of the territory (state)."

Section 57: "When such articles shall have been filed as aforesaid, the persons who shall have signed and acknowledged the same, and their successors, shall be a body politic and corporate, with perpetual succession. They shall be capable in law of suing and being sued, pleading and being impleaded, answering and being answered, in all courts of law and equity. They may have a common seal, alter and change the same at pleasure; acquire and sell property, personal and real; make by-laws, rules and regulations as they may deem proper or best for the good order of the corporation: provided, that such by-laws, rules and regulations, be not contrary to the constitution and laws of the United States, or the organic act of this territory (state)."

The following articles were executed and filed:

"Articles of the State Savings Association:

county, Minnesota, have associated to form a body politic by the corporate name of 'State Savings Association.' That the said corporation shall be a joint stock company with a capital stock of twenty-five thousand dollars, divided into two hundred and fifty shares of one hundred dollars each. The place of business of said association shall be the town of Minneapolis, Hennepin county, Minnesota. The business of said association shall be such as is usually transacted by savings institutions. The business of said association shall be managed by three trustees, to be chosen by the stockholders on the first Tuesday in January in each year. The first trustees shall be Richard J. Mendenhall, Rufus J. Baldwin and Thomas A. Murphy, who shall serve until the first annual election, and until others are chosen in their place. The trustees shall annually, immediately after their election, appoint one of their number president and one of their number secretary, whose duties shall be such as ordinarily pertain to such officers respectively, and as shall be assigned to them by the trustees. NELSON, District Judge. Upon the application of John Kausal to be substituted in the place of the petitioning creditor, who failed to appear on the return day of the order to show cause, the debtor filed an answer denying the allegations made that he is a creditor, and has also in form denied the acts of bankruptcy charged in the original petition on file. The right of substitution must be established before the debtor can be required to try the questions presented by a denial of the acts of bankruptcy, and the court has proceeded summarily to hear the allegations of the creditor and the debtor in order to determine that issue.

Without elaborating the questions raised by the evidence, I have arrived, after an examination, at the following conclusions: What is the status of the association of which the debtor is a member? I feel less delicacy in deciding this question, from the fact that no act of the legislature of the state of Minnesota, in my opinion, exists, which can be invoked to sustain the claim made in the debtor's answer, that the articles of association created a corporation. I am, therefore, led to the conclusion that the articles executed by Mendenhall, Baldwin and Murphy, December 18th, 1865, on file in the office of the secretary of state of Minnesota, entitled: "Articles of the State Savings Association," did not authorize the exercise by said association of any corporate rights, by virtue of sections 56 and 57, c. 17, p. 286, Comp. St. Minn., and it is a misnomer to call it a corporation.

This is not a case where there have been defects in the proceedings taken to perfect the organization of a corporation, or an abuse of corporate rights, and an attempt made to take advantage of them by objection in a collateral proceeding. The point is raised upon the face of the articles of association, and the doctrine of estoppel urged does not apply; the utmost that can be claimed for these articles is, that the onus probandi is thrown upon the creditor to show that they do not create a corporation.

True, the facts show that Kausal had dealings with the association by the name designated and claimed in the articles to be its corporate name, still he is not thereby estopped from showing that it had no legal corporate existence. Even upon the strict rule contended for by the respondent's counsel, in regard to which the authorities are by no means agreed, it was necessary for this association assuming to act in a corporate capacity to show itself to be a corporation de facto as against persons who have had dealings with it. Simply showing that it had acted as such for any period of time, however long, is not sufficient. Some law, under which a corporation with the powers assumed might be lawfully created, must be shown in addition to mere user, before it can be said to exist as a corporation de facto.

The authorities cited to sustain the doctrine of estoppel in this case, relate to bodies exercising corporate powers and existing as corporations de facto within the rule above laid down. It cannot be maintained successfully that the act of the legislature authorized any such corporate capacity as is claimed here. This court, therefore, is not required to regard this association, so far as third persons are concerned, as a corporation until it shall have been otherwise decided by judicial proceedings properly instituted.

From the views above expressed, this is apparent, for there is no existing corporation de jure or de facto. Having at the outset decided that this association did not become a corporation under the laws of the state, it does not follow that the creditor has no remedy for a recovery of his deposit, because he dealt with it in its assumed corporate capacity. Not being clothed with any corporate franchises, its individual members cannot escape pecuniary responsibility by taking refuge behind any supposed privilege or sanctity conferred by its efforts to become a corporation, and any creditor can treat it as a partnership, holding the members thereof personally liable for all acts done within the scope of the partnership.

It is fairly established by the testimony, I think, that previous to the deposit in the association by this creditor, Murphy and Baldwin had withdrawn, and the debt was due him from Mendenhall. He therefore has a right to be substituted in the place of the original petitioner, and the court must proceed to adjudicate on such petition.

Case No. 9,426.

MENDENHALL v. CARTER.

[7 N. B. R. 320.] [1]

District Court, W. D. North Carolina. 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—ACT OF—STOPPING PAYMENT—COMMERCIAL PAPER—CONFEDERATE CURRENCY.

1. A debtor does not commit an act of bankruptcy who stops payment of a note, given long before the passage of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] and does not resume payment subsequent thereto, up to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Brewer & Bemis Brewing Co., Case No. 1,850.]

2. A note payable in money is commercial paper, although at the time of its execution Confederate currency was the only medium of exchange in the section of the state where the note was given. Petition dismissed.

This is a creditor's petition, filed on the 24th day of June, 1871, to obtain an adjudication of bankruptcy against Thomas D. Carter. The debt of the petitioner is "for the sum of $600, money had and received of petitioner by the said Thomas D. Carter, to the use of petitioner, on the 15th day of July, 1870," etc. The petitioner further represents—"That within six calendar months next preceding the date of this petition, the said Thomas D. Carter did commit an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of said act, to wit: In that, in the month of July, 1863, the said Carter was a trader, and in the said month executed to W. A. Caldwell, cashier of the Farmers' Bank of North Carolina, his certain promissory note for the sum of $4,123.71, payable in one hundred and eighty days after date; that said note was commercial paper," etc.; that said money was used as a trader, etc.; that no part was paid up to the 17th day of May, 1871, etc.; "and therein said Carter has stopped and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days," etc.

A demurrer was filed by respondent, and upon the argument it was agreed by counsel that only the following questions of law should be considered and decided by the court: First. The respondent stopped payment before the passage of the bankrupt act, and did not resume payment subsequent thereto up to the filing of the petition. Was this an act of bankruptcy? Second. Is the note described in the petition commercial paper?

DICK, District Judge. I have not been able to find any case in our courts in which the precise point first presented has been considered and determined. On the argument, my attention was called to the case of Baldwin v. Wilder [Case No. 806], as deciding an analogous question, and the counsel insisted with much earnestness and force, that the principles there announced ought to govern the case before us. Mr. Hilliard, in his work on "Bankruptcy" (page 26), in speaking of the time when acts of bankruptcy may be committed under the English statutes, says: "An act committed before the passage of the statutes is not sufficient to support a commission," and several cases are cited as authorities. I have not had an opportunity of examining those cases to see whether they throw any light upon the question before us. In determining this case, I will, in the first place, inquire what is the fair and reasonable construction of the clause in the statute upon which this proceeding is founded; and then consider the opinion of the learned judge in the case above mentioned. The primary rule (sometimes called the golden rule) in the construction of statutes, is to give to all the plain and unambiguous words of a statute their literal and ordinary meaning, unless manifest absurdity or injustice would be caused by so doing. Another rule of great practical importance is, "that a statute must in general, on principles of obvious convenience and justice, be construed as prospective and not retrospective in its operation: it must be considered as intended to regulate the future conduct of persons, and not apply to past transactions." Broom, Com. Law, 6. This rule should be observed unless the terms of the statute plainly show a contrary legislative intent. The act of bankruptcy alleged in the petition is that the respondent "has stopped and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days." As the promissory note mentioned in the petition was not paid at maturity, the act of stopping payment occurred one hundred and eighty-three days after date, more than three years before the passage of the bankrupt law, March 2, 1867, and the non-resumption of payment continued up to the 17th day of May, 1871, just before the petition was filed. The allegation that the respondent was a trader, etc., was not denied, and is not deemed material in the construction of the statute since the amendment of the 14th July, 1870 [16 Stat. 276]; for the act of bankruptcy alleged may now be committed by any person who executes commercial paper and fails to make payment within a period of fourteen days after maturity. In re Hercules Assurance Co. [Case No. 6,402].

[1] [Reprinted by permission.]

To constitute this act of bankruptcy, two things must concur, and one necessarily precedes the other. 1. The debtor must fail to pay his commercial paper at maturity. 2. He must fail to resume payment within a period of fourteen days. If payment should be made in twenty days after suspension, this will not do away with the act of bankruptcy. The active words in the statute to express these two requirements are—"stopped or suspended" and "not resumed payment." These are plain and unambiguous words when used together, and must be separately and literally construed. The words "stopped or suspended" are sometimes used to denote not only the act of stopping, but, also, the not resuming payment; and if they were the only words used in the statute they would express both ideas. Congress has seen proper to use both expressions, and connect them together with the ordinary conjunctive conjunction. We must take it for granted that congress in framing such an important and carefully considered statute, used the words "ex industria," and with the purpose of conveying the different significations which they literally express.

The 39th section, as amended July 14th, 1870, after leaving out intermediate and inapplicable words and clauses, would read as follows: "That any person residing and owing debts as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy," etc. In construing this section according to the plain and literal meaning of the words used, we conclude that the respondent, having stopped payment before the passage of the statute, the subsequent non-resumption of payment of his commercial paper did not constitute an act of bankruptcy.

The petitioner's counsel on the argument insisted that the non-resumption of payment by the respondent of his dishonored commercial paper subsequent to the bankrupt law was a continuous act of bankruptcy, and the case of Baldwin v. Wilder, supra, was relied on as authority, and the counsel seems to be sustained in his views by the reasoning of the learned judge in that case. We have great respect for the ability, learning, and high reputation of Judge Emmons, but we cannot adopt his opinion in the decision of the case before us. We think, as we have before indicated, that the words "stopped" and "not resumed" have distinct significations. There cannot be a condition of non-resumption without a previous stopping of payment, but the words, as used, have a different relation as to time in the transaction. A fraudulent stopping of payment is an immediate act of bankruptcy, and no subsequent resumption will free the fraudulent debtor from an adjudication of bankruptcy, if proceedings are commenced within six months. In this clause of the statute the word "stopped" refers to the time of the immediate act, and the question of non-resumption does not arise, and the words "not resumed" are not used. In the subsequent clause, where a stopping of payment which is not fraudulent is provided for, the words "stopped" and "not resumed" are both used, one with reference to the time when the paper was dishonored according to the law merchant and the other with reference to the fourteen days of grace allowed by the bankrupt law. In this case, stopping is an inchoate act of bankruptcy, which is completed by a failure to make payment for fourteen days. We think, therefore, that the stopping as well as non-resumption of payment of commercial paper must both have occurred after the 2d of March, 1867, to come within the provisions of the statute.

"Is the suspension an indivisible act, that, once committed, is not continuing? The law is full of analogies to the contrary." Baldwin v. Wilder [Case No. 806]. This terse expression of judicial opinion was cited on the argument, and ably enforced by counsel, with many analogies from the law. Even were we to admit the principle announced, it would not apply to our case. There are many acts recognized in law as continuous in their nature, but the act continued is always of the same character as when it began. Thus a nuisance is continuous, but it commences a nuisance. A permanent trespass is continuous, and may be so alleged in pleading; but it was a trespass ab origine. In our case, the stopping and not resuming payment for three years before the statute was passed was not an act of bankruptcy, and the subsequent non-resumption is not declared to be such act in the statute. I cannot concur with Judge Emmons in speaking of this act of bankruptcy. "Every fourteen days' suspension, no matter how often repeated, or how long continued, are but successive acts of bankruptcy." Why should we have successive acts of bankruptcy accruing at every period of fourteen days, when the first act under the statute will exist for six months for the purpose of commencing proceedings? I agree to the proposition that this is a remedial and beneficial statute, and should be liberally construed; but the indulged debtor under the law has some rights as well as the creditor, and a "statute of repose" is as much needed in bankruptcy matters as in any other legal proceedings.

If the act of stopping payment is fraudulent, can it be indefinitely continued by constructive succession, and proceedings be commenced ten years after the first occurrence of the act? If so, the six months' limitation in the statute is useless verbiage, and should be taken out, as it is well calculated to mislead not only merchants and traders, and those who deal with them, but also lawyers. If the limitation applies in a case where there is fraud, it certainly ought to apply where there is no fraud. When a trader fails to pay his commercial paper when due, or within the three days of grace allowed by the custom of merchants, he is regarded as commercially insolvent. The bankruptcy law allows fourteen additional days of grace to commercial paper, and if payment is not made within that time, the maker is insolvent in contemplation of the statute. If the statute has used only the words "stopped or suspended payment of commercial paper," then three days of grace would have been allowed for payment by operation of the law merchant; and could it be properly said that every subsequent period of three days' non-payment constituted successive acts of bankruptcy, and that the six months' limitation would not apply? The additional days of grace allowed by the bankrupt law certainly cannot have the effect of rendering such limitation nugatory. We think that this six months' provision was intended by the framers of the law to operate as a limitation on bankrupt proceedings, and was prompted by the same wise and beneficent spirit of legislation which has given rise to all statutes of limitation, both in this country and in England. The act of bankruptcy which we are considering, originally, could only be committed by bankers, merchants, traders, etc., in the course of their dealing, and the provision in the statute was intended to secure punctuality, regularity and uniformity in commercial transactions. To secure this result there must be action both on the part of the debtor and the creditor. The debtor is required to pay at maturity, or within a period of fourteen days, and the creditor to demand and enforce payment within six months after the commercial paper which he holds is dishonored.

In commercial cities where the custom of merchants is well regulated, understood, and strictly enforced, a trader who fails to meet his commercial paper at maturity loses at once his financial credit, is regarded as insolvent, and is generally forced to wind up his business. This was the custom of merchants before the passage of the bankrupt law, and no injustice or injury is done to creditor or debtor by the six months' limitation, as both parties understand their rights and obligations, and no further time is needed to commence proceedings in bankruptcy. When the holder of dishonored commercial paper gives indulgence to the maker for more than six months, he shows, by such conduct, that he is either satisfied that the debtor is solvent in the ordinary sense, in having property sufficient to pay all of his debts, or he relies upon collateral securities, or he is willing to resort to the ordinary remedies furnished by the common law for the collection of his claim. Such a creditor, by allowing such indulgence to his debtor, gives him credit in the community and enables him to enter into business engagements with other parties; and it would open a wide door to injustice and oppression, if such creditor could, at any indefinite time, intimidate the debtor and his friends by threats of proceedings in bankruptcy. If this limitation is just and wise in its operation in commercial cities, it will apply with more justice and force in the rural districts, where the custom of merchants is but little understood, and can hardly be said to regulate, practically, the business transactions of merchants and traders, and much indulgence is shown by creditors.

We can carry the argument still further by referring to the condition of things produced by the amendment of July 14th, 1870. Now, any person who executes commercial paper is liable to commit the act of bankruptcy insisted on in this case. Heretofore, in the ordinary dealings among our people, promissory notes were usually secured by responsible sureties, and by the indulgence of holders, were allowed to remain overdue for many years. When this amendment is generally understood, it will have the effect of doing away with the loose credit system which has so long prevailed in many sections of the country. A man who now executes his promissory note must not only be solvent in the ordinary acceptation, in having property sufficient to pay all of his debts, but he must also be solvent in a commercial sense, in having money to meet such note at maturity, or he may be forced into bankruptcy. As the statute requires such strict punctuality on the part of the debtor, he ought to be allowed the benefit of the limitation where the creditor by negligence or designed indulgence fails, for six months, to enforce the statutory remedy. The evident policy of the statute is to make creditors, as soon as possible, avail themselves of the extraordinary remedy provided, in order that business matters may be kept in a condition of commercial solvency, and the maxim, "vigilantibus non domientibus jura subveniant," ought to apply with more force than it does to the ordinary remedies provided by the common law. Broom, Leg. Max. 692. In our construction of the statute in giving force to the literal signification of the words used, we feel that we are not obnoxious to the charge: "Qui hoeret in litera, hoeret in cortice;" for our construction gives effect to the manifest legislative intent, and is consistent with the "reason of the thing."

We find but little difficulty in disposing of the other question presented in the argument. By a statute of this state, promissory notes, payable in money, are placed on the same footing as inland bills of exchange, and are controlled and regulated by the custom of merchants. The note in this case is payable in money; and although at the time of its execution, Confederate currency was the only medium of exchange in this section of the state, the lex loci did not make such currency a legal tender in the payment of debts. The ordinance of the 18th of October, 1865, declares, in substance, that executory contracts like the one before us, "shall be deemed to have been made with the understanding that they were solvable in money of the value of said currency"—"subject, nevertheless, to evidence of a different intent of the parties to the contract." [Ord. N. C. 1865–66, p. 20.] Where the nature of such contract is not set forth in the instrument, Act 1866, c. 38, allows the parties to show in evidence the property or other consideration for which the contract was executed, etc. Act 1866, c. 39, establishes a scale of depreciation of Confederate currency, etc. These statutes have been recognized as constitutional by the supreme court of this state, but they do not affect the character of this note as commercial paper. The parties may show a collateral contract, which may change its value, and it may be subject to the scale of depreciation; but still it is negotiable and payable in money, and is commercial paper. If the non-resumption of payment alleged in this case was held by me to be a continuous act of bankruptcy, I would also hold that the said ordinance and statutes so far changed the rights and obligations of the parties to this note, as to excuse the respondent for not making payment until the real value of the note was legally ascertained and established, as provided by said legislation. As I have been upon the bench of this court but a few months, and this is my first opinion in a case of bankruptcy, I am gratified that the petitioner can have an opportunity of having my decision reviewed in a higher court. It is ordered that the petition be dismissed.

SEAMEN—WAGES—FORFEITURE—REMITTED—EARNED SUBSEQUENTLY—SET-OFF.

1. Wages of seamen are forfeited for gross offences; but not for slight faults, either of neglect or disobedience. There must be either an habitual neglect or disobedience, or a single act of a heinous and aggravated nature.

3. Repentance and tender of amends reinstate the claim for wages.

4. If the articles prohibit any traffic by the seamen under forfeiture of wages, yet the master may remit the forfeiture.

5. A master has no right to degrade the ship's carpenter without sufficient cause.

6. Wages forfeited for an offence are only such as are earned antecedently, and not subsequently to the offence. In general, set-offs are not admissible in the admiralty.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Libel for seamen's wages on a voyage from Boston to the Sandwich Islands, Northwest Coast, and Canton in China, and thence back to Boston. There was a special answer put in by the owners, contesting the right to wages on various grounds, some applicable to all, and some to part only of the libellants. In substance it stated: (1) That the libellants, together with one Sheridan and Rodman, also mariners on board said vessel, entered into a confederacy and conspiracy to disobey and unlawfully resist the lawful authority of [Hersey] the master of said vessel, and did violently and forcibly resist his authority, whereby the lives of the officers, passengers, and crew of said ship, and the ship itself and a valuable cargo on board were greatly endangered; and the master, for that cause alone, was obliged to put into the port of St. Helena. And the respondents maintained, that according to the contract made by the libellants, as well as by the general rules of the maritime law, they had forfeited their wages by such mutinous conduct. (2) That said forfeiture was never remitted by the master; that the libellants were permitted to return home in, and assist in the navigation of, said vessel, under the express declaration of the master, and upon a condition understood and assented to by the libellants, that this should not be deemed to operate as a release or remission of any forfeiture of wages, or other penal consequences of their misconduct. (3) That the libellants ought not to recover any sum by way of wages, even if they were not forfeited by such misconduct, because the respondents had suffered damage by the misconduct and breach of duty of the libellants to an amount exceeding the sums so claimed for wages. (4) That as to the claim of Woodward, if the same were allowed at all, it should be allowed for the sum claimed; because the said Woodward had shipped to perform the duty of a carpenter at a high rate of wages; and being found incompetent to such duty, very early in the voyage relinquished his situation as carpenter, and took that of an ordinary seaman. A decree was rendered pro forma by consent of parties, in the district court, in favor of the libellants.

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

STORY, Circuit Justice. The present is a suit brought by William Woodward, John H. Hemmer, Artemas Gulliver, and William Brown, for the recovery of wages alleged by them, in their summary petition, to have been earned on a long and circuitous voyage in the ship Mentor, from Boston to the Sandwich Islands, to the Northwest Coast, to Canton in China, and from thence back again to Boston. The voyage has been completed by the return of the ship to Boston, and the libel seeks a decree in rem for the wages asserted to be due. There is a very special answer put in by the owners, asserting, that all the libellants have forfeited their wages by reason of a gross combination, and endeavour to commit a revolt, on board of the ship on the homeward voyage, which is set forth in the defensive allegation with all due circumstantiality. There are other separate allegations, in respect to two of the libellants, viz. Hemmer and Woodward, which I shall have occasion hereafter to notice, when I come particularly to examine the special merits of their claims.

It need hardly be stated, that in this court, seamen, as a class of persons, are entitled to receive peculiar indulgence. Their habits of life, their incessant and laborious service, their frequent exposure to peril of no ordinary character, their intrepidity and thoughtlessness, their hardihood, sometimes approaching almost from necessity to ferocity, and their profuse and often captivating gallantry, give a colouring to their characters so mixed and variable, so full of lights and shades, that it requires the intimate knowledge of a court of admiralty duly to estimate both their frailties and their merits. They partake, in short, somewhat of the boisterousness of the element which they navigate; and their acts must be judged of, not by the courtesy, or the rigid exactions of domestic society, but by that milder judgment, which winks at their errors, and mitigates its own resentment in consideration of the provocations, temptations, and personal infirmities incident to their employment. To visit all their ill-advised, and even mischievous conduct with severe penalties, would be most discouraging to the maritime service of the country, and perhaps fatal to the safety, as well as the enterprise of our commerce. To indulge them in gross misdemeanors, without adequate correction, would be to create mutinies, and overturn the discipline of the ship, and thereby open a path to the destruction, both of the property and the persons on board. The marine law has therefore, in cases of this nature, adopted a milder course. It punishes gross and obstinate offences with a forfeiture of wages, especially if they are persisted in without repentance or amends. It treats lighter faults with an indulgent lenity, allowing compensation for any losses and expenses caused by them; passing over slight errors, unaccompanied with mischief, without notice; and correcting habitual neglect, or incompetent performance of duty, when it amounts only to levissima culpa, by a correspondent diminution of wages.

On the other hand, it is the disposition of the court to uphold, with a firm hand, a reasonable exercise of the authority committed to the master and other officers of the ship. It views a prompt and cheerful obedience of orders, on the part of the seamen, as of the deepest importance. It admits of no slight excuses for a slow or reluctant fulfilment of duty, and weighs not with a scrupulous nicety the language of the command, or the necessity of the service. Occasional harshness in manner or matter, occasional ebullitions of passion, and other infirmities, incident to nautical life, are not admitted as justifications of insubordination; but are deemed not wholly inexcusable, unless they degenerate into wanton and malicious abuse, or illegal severity.

The very necessities of the sea service require this stubborn support of authority. On the ocean the officers can have but little physical power compared with that of the crew. They may, at any time, become the victims of a general conspiracy to revolt; and unless they can subdue obstinacy and indolence by the moral influence of command, and enforce a prompt and uncomplaining obedience by punishment, the ship and cargo must soon be at the mercy of the winds and waves.

If these remarks are true in regard to voyages in general, they must apply with increased force to voyages of the description before the court, where savage countries are to be visited, and trade carried on with persons crafty, vindictive, and ferocious, and where the whole profits of the voyage depend upon vigilance, industry, and exclusive devotion to the interests of the ship.

The general matter of defence, as applicable to all the libellants, has been sufficiently established by the proofs in the cause. At the present term of the court the libellants have been tried and convicted upon an indictment for an endeavour to make a revolt on board of the ship; and by the consent of the parties the testimony brought to the knowledge of the court, upon that occasion, has been permitted to be adduced as evidence in the case now in judgment. It appears that, on the homeward voyage from Canton, while the ship was a little to the east of the Cape of Good Hope, on the 8th of June last, one of the seamen, by the name of Rodman, being dissatisfied with the usual allowance of fresh provisions on that day, sent a message to the captain, that if the crew had not more provisions allowed them, they would take it of themselves. On being sent for on account of this disrespectful language, he admitted he had used the expressions, and added, in the presence of the crew, who assembled themselves near him on the deck, that so he had said, and so they all had said, and now said. The captain then stated, that the crew had the usual allowance; that he, Rodman, had been trying to make a revolt on board for some time, and that Hemmer, who was then present, was another damned rascal. Immediately another seaman, whose name was Sheridan, advanced towards the captain, and said, "We are no damned rascals." The captain put out his hand to press Sheridan back, who immediately struck the captain with his fist, in the face, several times, by which he received considerable injury, bleeding profusely at the nose. The captain then seized hold of Sheridan, who retreated backwards towards the forecastle of the ship, and in the struggle between him and the captain, both fell over the caboose, the captain being upon the top. Brown, Rodman, and Woodward then took hold of the captain, and endeavored to disengage Sheridan from him, and finally succeeded in their efforts, notwithstanding the interference of the mates. The crew were standing around at this time, manifestly countenancing and encouraging Sheridan in his conduct. The captain immediately ordered Sheridan to come aft. Several of the crew said he should not; among them were Brown, Hemmer, and Gulliver, the latter of whom began to strip off his jacket, and said, "If you are going to take anybody aft, we will see." The captain being unable, with the assistance of his officers, to enforce his order to have Sheridan brought aft, retired to his cabin, and having washed himself, came afterwards on deck, and ordered all the crew to come aft. They accordingly came; and he then required that they should deliver up Sheridan; which they strenuously refused, first generally, and afterwards upon a particular demand from each of them, separately; and stated, that Sheridan should not be delivered up. The captain then ordered Sheridan not to perform any more duty on board; and dismissed the others of the crew to their duty. A consultation was immediately had in the cabin, by the captain, officers, and passengers, as to what was best to be done upon the present exigency, and it was their unanimous opinion that the ship ought to put into the first port; they thinking that there was a deliberate conspiracy among the crew to commit a revolt. At this time, and for several days after, it blew a severe gale, so that they could not put into the Cape of Good Hope; and on this account alone the ship afterwards put into St. Helena, and there Rodman and Sheridan were put ashore and dismissed. After the affray of the 8th, the crew, with the exception of Sheridan, performed their duty as usual; but the master and officers swear, that they were always in expectation of a mutiny, and took precautions to suppress it, until after the arrival of the ship at St. Helena.

Such is a summary of the more important facts, upon which a jury of the country have passed a deliberate judgment, and with the result of that judgment I am entirely satisfied. The case appears to me to be one, in which there was an unquestionable endeavour, by the libellants, to make a revolt on board of the ship; in the first place, by a combination to support Rodman in his attempt to intimidate the captain in the discharge of his duty in the management and control of the provisions of the ship; in the second place, by assisting and encouraging Sheridan in his gross and brutal attack upon the captain; and in the last place, by their deliberate determination, after their passions were cooled, to resist orders, and to prevent Sheridan from being put in custody by way of punishment, for the enforcement of the discipline of the ship.

What then are the consequences, which the marine law attaches to offences of this nature? It is said, that they carry with them a forfeiture of all the wages of the offending seamen; and for that purpose, the language of the eminent judge, who now presides in the court of king's bench, in his excellent work on the Law of Shipping, has been cited. "It seems," says he, "that neglect of duty, disobedience of orders, habitual drunkenness, or any cause which will justify a master in discharging a seaman during a voyage, will also deprive him of his wages." [2] In a limited and restricted sense the proposition here stated may be, and doubtless is, true. But it is not a single neglect of duty, or a single act of disobedience, which ordinarily carries with it so severe a penalty. There must be a case of high and aggravated neglect or disobedience, importing the most serious mischief, peril, or wrong; a case calling for exemplary punishment, and admitting of no reasonable mitigation; a case involving a very gross breach of the stipulated contract for hire, and going, in its character and consequences, to the very essence of its provisions. The only authority, cited in support of the proposition by the learned author, shows, that it must have these limitations attached to it. Lord Stowell, in the case of The Exeter, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 261, 263, where the charges made against a mate, suing for wages, were, "drunkenness, neglect of duty, and disobedience," said, "these are certainly offences of a high nature, fully sufficient to justify the discharge, if proved. In respect to the negligence it would not be necessary to prove that it was wilful negligence; it would be sufficient if it appeared to amount to that habitual inattention to the ordinary duties of his station, that might expose the ship to danger; for the person in Robinet's station stipulates against such negligence." Here the learned judge manifestly relies on the inflamed character of the offence, and the habitual recurrence of it. In the same manner he deals with the subject of drunkenness, visiting the forfeiture, not on a single act, but upon such a habit as was conclusive proof of disability for general maritime employment. In respect to disobedience, the cause did not require the learned judge to advert to any such distinction, for while he spoke of disobedience to lawful command (especially in an officer), as an offence of the grossest kind, the only act of disobedience alleged, was the refusal to leave the ship upon an unjustifiable dismissal by the master, which the court treated as wholly insufficient to defeat the claim for wages. I should be sorry indeed to lay it down, as a general proposition, that any act of disobedience by a seaman, however slight, is of course to be visited with a forfeiture of wages, or will justify a master in dismissing him in the course of the voyage. Such a principle, it seems to me, would be very disastrous to the commercial interests of the country, and would involve so many difficulties in its application, that the denial of wages would soon, from the necessities of the case, with reference to the ordinary habits of seamen, introduce an essentially different contract into maritime employment. My opinion is, that the disobedience must either be an act of a very gross nature, involving serious danger, a mischief, or malignancy; or it must be habitual, and produce such a general diminution of duty, as goes to the very essence of the contract. Severe as the old maritime laws [3] were, they ought not to be construed as justifying a more extensive interpretation; and the milder spirit of modern times has introduced principles, which appear to me more fitted to preserve good order on board, and at the same time to encourage a policy, which aims at the suppression of crimes by taking away the motive for obstinate perseverance in misconduct. The Consolato del Mare (chapters 159, 160, 161) contented itself with declaring, that every seaman was bound to execute the orders of the master, without affixing any penalty to mere disobedience; but when the seaman sought a quarrel with the master, it punished him with the loss of half his wages and his goods on board; if he lifted his hands against the master, it required the crew to seize, bind, and imprison him, and punished the refusal with the loss of wages and goods; and if he struck the master in anger, it punished him with the loss of every thing. In these provisions there is a progressive severity, which does not visit every offence with a total forfeiture of wages; but reserves it only for heinous offences. If we may trust to the law of France, as expounded by Pothier, a very mitigated rule prevails in that country. It is said by him, that the master may discharge a mariner for intemperance, want of capacity, for being a blasphemer, a thief, refractory, or quarrelsome, so as to cause disorder in the ship, &c. and in such case he has no claim for wages, except for the services rendered before his discharge; he can claim none for those services he has failed to render.[4] It would not seem, from these remarks, that Pothier contemplated any general forfeiture of wages in the cases stated by him; and Valin, in his Commentaries, has not adverted to any, except so far as they are authorized by the text of the French ordinance.[5]

Those judges, in our own courts, who have been called most frequently to administer this branch of law, have certainly not felt themselves bound to inflict the forfeiture of wages for slight misbehavior, whether by disobedience or negligence; and even aggravated offences and very gross acts have been dealt with in a cautious and indulgent spirit.[6] It appears to me that there is much in the reasoning of these enlightened persons, that cannot fail to commend itself to every maritime court. I confess myself not scrupulous in admitting, that my own judgment is satisfied with the principles on which they have acted. I should be sorry to lay it down as a settled rule, that even the commission of the offence of endeavoring to make a revolt, punishable, as it is, by fine and imprisonment under our laws, is, in all cases, to be visited with a total forfeiture of wages. Cases may easily be conceived, where the seamen have, in a legal sense, committed the offence, and yet under such circumstances of gross provocation and misconduct on the part of the master, as to form a very strong excuse, addressing itself to the conscience and mercy of the court. And where seamen have been guilty of inflamed offences, and serious violations of duty, under circumstances of an aggravated nature, if they testify by their subsequent conduct a thorough repentance and contrition; if they apologize for, and offer amends for the wrong, and justify a confidence in their sincerity by subsequent, exemplary diligence, there is no stubborn rule of law that prohibits the court from mitigating the forfeiture, and giving them the whole, or a portion of their wages, according to its discretion. Such, as I understand them, are the principles incorporated into the old maritime codes, and adopted and practised upon by a pretty uniform course of opinion in the tribunals of our own country.[7] These principles appear to be countenanced by decisions of the common law in analogous cases; though it might be sufficient, on the present occasion, to say that the law has done nothing to repudiate them in respect to maritime contracts.[8]

In the present case, the conduct of the libellants was without any adequate excuse or apology. It is in proof, that there was a sufficiency of good provisions on board, which were dealt out to the full allowance, by the orders of the master, during the whole voyage. If, on a few occasions, any deficiency occurred, it was unknown to the master, and not designed on the part of his immediate agent. As to the times and manner, in which fresh provisions were to be furnished, he was the proper judge, and in the exercise of this reasonable discretion he does not appear to have been guilty of any error or misconduct. There was no harshness, or unfeeling denial, and no desire evinced to give the crew less than a just share of what was slaughtered. Under such circumstances, the affray of the 8th of June must be considered as having its origin in a mutinous spirit, endeavouring to work its way to improper indulgencies by intimidation and force. The necessary tendency of such conduct was to put a most valuable cargo (near 300,000 dollars in value) in jeopardy, and to place the officers and passengers in a state of anxious and inconvenient alarm. The co-operation of the libellants, in the maligant attack of Sheridan upon the captain, and their subsequent aid in screening him from punishment, by deliberate combination and active assistance, are acts of such a nature, as make the legal offence assume a very aggravated character. I think I should not perform the duty, which the law requires of me on the present occasion, if I did not pronounce, that it ought to be visited by a forfeiture of the wages antecedently earned.

An attempt has been made to carry forward the forfeiture to the time of the arrival of the ship at St. Helena, upon the ground, that the officers were obliged to employ extraordinary precautions, and that the mutinous spirit of the crew was not subdued until the leaders were dismissed at that port. But there does not appear to me any sufficient evidence to sustain this part of the case. All the crew performed their duty faithfully after the affray, during the remainder of the voyage; and the measures of the officers, however discreet, arose from suspicions from the past, and were not called for by any subsequent acts of the crew. If a forfeiture were to be inflicted under such circumstances, it would be because the fear of injury is, in contemplation of law, equivalent to the actual commission of gross offence. The forfeiture can attach to no wages except those earned antecedently to the affray.

But it has been urged, on behalf of the libellants, that admitting the forfeiture, justly attached to these wages, they are still entitled to recover them, because there has been a remitter to their original rights by the voluntary act of the captain. It is said, that he has pardoned their offence, and for the encouragement of the crew, in the discharge of their duty, has agreed to bury their past misconduct in oblivion. If this allegation were supported by the evidence, I should have no difficulty in applying the rule already hinted at in their favor. The master is the general agent of the owner, in respect to the management and navigation of the ship, and has authority, so far as affects the contract of the seamen for wages, to stipulate with them for a remission of their faults, and to reinstate them in their rights.[9] It is sound policy to intrust him with such an authority; and the maritime law upholds its exercise with a steady confidence. If it were otherwise, on many occasions the ship would be deserted, and the voyage be defeated, for want of a suitable crew to navigate her. If no subsequent good conduct could purge the forfeiture, and no services, however cheerful and constant, could redeem the fault, what motive would there be for seamen to remain by the ship, in her perils or disasters, especially when the subsequent earnings might be scarcely worth a moment's consideration.

My difficulty is, in drawing a satisfactory conclusion as to the fact of remitter, from the evidence in this case. If the master had been able to obtain other seamen at St. Helena, at a reasonable rate, and had omitted so to do, his conduct in retaining the libellants, after so gross a fault, might well be deemed, in the absence of all counter proof, a presumptive waiver of the forfeiture, and an implied forgiveness. In cases of desertion, the subsequent receiving of the offender on board, without objection, has been often admitted as equivalent to a pardon or remitter[10] and the principle, which governs in that case, may well be applied to forfeitures arising from other misdemeanors. But it is in proof, that at St. Helena no other seamen could be obtained; and the master, therefore, was compelled to retain the libellants on board, or to break up the voyage. His act of retainer therefore, after an opportunity to discharge the offenders, does not possess such a significancy, as may well be attributed to it under ordinary circumstances. Then, as to the declarations, imputed to the master on his departure from St. Helena, they are very imperfectly proved, and at most import no more than that if their subsequent conduct was good, he would use them well; but if otherwise he would put into some other port, and discharge them there. Taking these expressions in connection with the actual necessity of retaining them, they fall short of the purpose of establishing a remitter or pardon. Indeed upon this occasion the crew did not make any promises of future good conduct; and never, at any time, expressed any contrition for their offence, or offered any amends. If, before their arrival at St. Helena, they had so done, it might have given a very different complexion to the cause, and have entitled them to a very indulgent consideration from the court. In the actual posture of the facts, the allegation of a remitter or pardon does not appear to me to be established in any satisfactory manner. The forfeiture remains, therefore, with its fullest legal effect.

A farther claim is made against the libellants for the actual expenses occasioned by the stopping of the ship at St. Helena, and also for demurrage during the time of her detention. Under the circumstances, I have no doubt that the call and stay at St. Helena was a very proper and justifiable act on the part of the master, and such as sound prudence dictated. But still there is some difficulty in admitting this adminicular claim for compensation. If the forfeiture of wages had been waived, the ground of claim for compensation for actual expenses and losses would undoubtedly have remained in full force; for it is not necessarily included in such a remitter. But as the forfeiture is insisted on, the question arises, whether the court ought to give a full compensation ultra the forfeiture, or draw the compensation from the forfeited fund. Now the forfeiture authorized by the marine law, in cases of this nature, is not given to the owner as a mere boon; but is designed to operate primarily as a warning penalty upon the seamen for misconduct; and secondarily, by way of compensation for the supposed or actual losses of the owner. If the forfeiture exceeds the injury to the owner, there does not seem to be any particular equity calling upon the court to go farther; if it falls short of the injury, then justice requires that the seamen should make such additional compensation as is equivalent to the unsatisfied amount of the injury. In both cases the penalty operates with great severity upon the seamen; and, for the purposes of civil justice, seems sufficiently extensive. In flagrant cases, too, the party is subjected to a criminal prosecution; and thus, in effect, may undergo a double punishment. No authority in the marine law has been distinctly pointed out, justifying the present, as a substantive claim, ultra the forfeiture of wages. I am not prepared to admit the justice or convenience of such a principle. I will not say that a case may not arise, in which the court, looking at the atrocity of the offence, may not properly visit it with the cumulated load of forfeiture and compensation. But there is an equity, addressing itself to the court on the present occasion, which cannot be overlooked. The libellants, independently of this claim, will suffer a punishment fully equal to their misconduct. I am not willing to be instrumental in making it more oppressive. My judgment accordingly is, that the demurrage and expenses at St. Helena ought to be allowed to the owners; but in case the amount does not exceed the forfeited wages, the indemnity is to be sought out of that fund. Conjectural loss of profits or of interest, in consequence of the supposed increase of the length of the voyage, has been already intimated, at the argument, to be inadmissible upon principle. If the markets had risen in price, or the ship had avoided a storm, or made her passage more speedily in consequence of the delay at St. Helena, the seamen could not have interposed these as equitable off-sets to the claim for compensation. They rest on too uncertain a basis; and are incapable of an uniform adjustment, so as to constitute an equity for both parties.

We may next proceed to the consideration of the objections which peculiarly belong to some of the libellants, and are inapplicable to the rest.

First. As to Hemmer. It is asserted in the pleadings, that he was guilty of an infraction of the ship's articles by trading with the natives of the Northwest Coast and Sandwich Islands, &c., and thereby forfeited his wages, as well as all the goods he had on board. Upon inspection of the articles, it appears that the crew are expressly prohibited from such traffic, under the penalty of a forfeiture of all their wages, and all their goods and effects on board of the ship.[11] How far the law would enforce such a penalty as to the goods or effects on board, in case an attempt were made to sue for the same in a court of justice, I am not called upon to decide; and, as at present advised, I should feel no inconsiderable difficulties on the subject. Forfeitures in civil cases are generally odious, and not unfrequently mitigated in courts, professing to act in equity, as this court does, sitting in admiralty. The act of trading is substantively proved; and the seizure of the furs, which constituted the object of the traffic, was accordingly made by the master upon search, while the ship was at sea on her voyage to Canton. But after the arrival of the ship at that port, the master, upon full deliberation, released the furs, and delivered them back to the offender; and this being an act which, as agent of the ship, he was competent to do, I am of opinion that the forfeiture was remitted to all intents and purposes, and can no longer subsist as to the wages or goods. It appears, that, with the proceeds of the furs, Hemmer afterwards purchased silks at Canton, which were brought home in the ship, and landed at Boston. But this, of itself, constitutes no offence, and may be considered as presumptively licensed by the master. Hemmer's wages, therefore, since the affray, are not affected by these transactions; and as to antecedent wages, the forfeiture, if it could attach at all, could only affect wages earned at the time of the traffic, and these would be completely swallowed up in the later and efficient forfeiture, by the endeavour to make a revolt on the 8th of June.

Secondly. As to Woodward. He shipped as carpenter for the voyage; and an attempt has been made to establish that he was not competent to perform the duty. It does indeed appear, that the master was on the outward voyage dissatisfied with him, and gave a superior authority to the carpenter's mate, and employed Woodward principally, but not entirely, in the ship's common duty. But whenever business of this sort was carried on, he always assisted in the carpentry; and there is no pretence to say, that he laboured under any general incapacity. On the contrary, a person with whom he worked ashore, has spoken favorably of his capacity; and no fact, except of slowness, has been established against him. I must be permitted to say, that when a man ships in any particular capacity on board a ship, it is not for slight causes that he is to be degraded or compelled to perform other duty. He is not to be subject to the caprice, or distaste, or petulance of the master. He stipulates for fair and reasonable knowledge, and due diligence; but not for extraordinary talents. If he is guilty of fraud or misrepresentation, he is doubtless subject to all just consequences. But when he acts bona fide, and is willing to perform his duty, if he should be more tardy in his movements than other men, it constitutes no just ground for degradation. The master has shown no sufficient reason in this case for placing his own mate over him; and if he had refused, under such circumstances, to perform the additional seamen's duty imposed upon him, I am not satisfied that he would not have been entirely warranted in law. But since he was somewhat acquainted with seamanship, and performed his duty as carpenter when required, and as seaman on all other occasions, there is no legal ground upon which the full wages stipulated in his contract as carpenter ought not to be paid to him. Of course, as one of the offenders in the affray of the 8th of June, his wages antecedently earned are forfeited.

These are all the observations, which I think it necessary to make in the case; and I shall accordingly refer it to a commissioner to ascertain the wages now due to the libellants upon the principles already stated.

The defence has been very properly made, and being in its main point sustained, I do not feel myself under all the circumstances, called upon to give any costs in the case. Each party must accordingly bear his own costs. Decree accordingly.

[This cause was again heard on exceptions to the commissioner's report. Case No. 9,428.]

The MENTOR.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1825.

SEAMEN—WAGES—FORFEITURE—EARNED SUBSEQUENTLY—ADVANCE—CLOTHES—HOSPITAL MONEY.

1. Where seamen had forfeited their wages by misconduct in the voyage, and afterwards earned wages, the court held that the advance wages stipulated in the shipping articles, should be a charge on the forfeited wages.

2. Money advanced in the voyage for clothes, &c., and not stipulated for, should be a charge on the unforfeited wages.

3. Hospital money should be apportioned pro rata on the wages of the whole voyage.

[Cited in Swift v. Mercantile Ins. Co., 113 Mass. 289.]

[This was a libel for seamen's wages against the ship Mentor, Hersey, master. A decree was rendered for libellants, and a reference made to a commissioner to ascertain the wages due. Case No. 9,427. It is now heard on exceptions to the commissioner's report.]

Upon the coming in of the report, several exceptions were taken to the report by Basset & Gay, for libellants. (1) That the wages advanced according to the shipping articles ought not now to constitute a charge against the seamen, to be paid out of the wages remaining due to them since the 8th of June, the time to which the forfeiture applied. (2) That money advanced by the master to the libellants in the foreign ports, and principally at Canton, to buy clothes and other necessaries, should be a charge on the forfeited wages, and not on those now due. (3) That the hospital money ought to be a charge on the forfeited wages.

STORY, Circuit Justice. It is not my intention to lay down any inflexible rule, by which the court ought in all cases to be bound, in considering charges of the nature of those in controversy. In cases where the wages are forfeited, the court must exercise a wholesome discretion as to the manner in which it will grant relief, upon pecuniary charges against the seamen; and ought to look cautiously to all the circumstances mitigating, as well as inflaming, the offence. When the court pronounces the forfeiture incurred, it is incumbent upon those, who set up an equity, to have the forfeited fund charged with advances made to the offending party, to establish such equity by proof addressing itself to the discretion of the court. None has been presented in this case, which, in my judgment, ought to vary the common rule, by which forfeitures are governed. The exceptions, therefore, must be disposed of upon their general merits.

1. As to the advance wages. The shipping articles stipulate, "that two months' wages advanced before sailing, and one month's wages to be paid at Canton, is the pay the said seamen or mariners are to receive till the ship returns to her port of discharge in the United States of America." The right to such advance wages is therefore a part consideration of their contract; and if they go on the voyage, the advance so made is absolutely their due, and is not affected by any subsequent occurrences. It constitutes no personal charge against the seamen, and if by any accident in the course of the voyage, the latter is defeated, so that no freight is earned, and no wages become due, the advance is not recoverable back from the seamen. It is to be considered as a bounty upon their shipping. Now the advance wages paid at Boston and Canton must, under these circumstances, be considered as an absolute payment to the libellants, and for which the owner had no personal claim against them. He has a right to deduct the advance from the wages already earned, or first earned in the voyage; or rather, the right of the seamen to receive other compensation accrues only from the time not covered by such advance, whether it be in the inception or prosecution of the voyage. The true effect of a stipulation for advance wages is, that the owner gives the advance absolutely, if the seaman goes on the voyage, consenting to lose it, if the wages subsequently earned do not indemnify him. Under such circumstances, it appears to me that the advance wages are not a subsisting charge against the seamen; but they are a charge solely on the forfeited funds; and especially here, where more wages were earned in the voyage than gave a complete indemnity. This claim of the owner must therefore be rejected.

2. As to the advance money for clothes and other necessaries during the voyage. This is a charge, which the court will watch with peculiar solicitude. It is not sound policy to favour the advance of money to seamen in foreign ports, who are thereby often tempted to extravagance and dissipation, and their attachment to the ship and voyage materially diminished. Such advances are also usually made at a high premium; and there is always an opportunity thus given to take unjustifiable advantages of the poverty, thoughtlessness, and ignorance of seamen. Sitting, therefore, as a court of admiralty, whose duty it is in a peculiar manner to guard seamen against the effects of their own infirmities, and to uphold a firm maritime policy, I have no doubt that the obligation to watchfulness in cases of this nature, emphatically deserves our attention. We ought to see that the advances are reasonable and proper, and that the premium is such as has the sanction of general usage, or stands upon equitable principles. In such cases, the court will recognise the advance as a personal charge upon the seamen, for which the master and owner has an implied lien on the wages earned in the voyage; and has, moreover, the obligation of a personal responsibility. If the court, on the other hand, perceives that these charges are unjustifiable in amount or premium, it will either reject them altogether, leaving the party to such remedy, as the common law may afford him, or cut the demand down to a moderated charge. In the present case the advance money appears to me to have been reasonable, both in amount and premium. There is not the slightest reason to doubt, that it was such a sum as a good master, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, might well allow for necessaries, although, by the shipping articles, he might not be bound to allow it. It ought, in my judgment, to be held in the present case, a charge upon the unforfeited wages now decreed due by the court.

3. As to the hospital money. Act July 16, 1798, c. 94 [1 Story, Laws, 554; 1 Stat. 605, c. 77], provides, "that the master or owner of every ship or vessel of the United States arriving from a foreign port into any port of the United States, shall, before such ship or vessel shall be admitted to an entry, render to the collector a true account of the number of seamen, that shall have been employed on board such vessel since she was last entered at any port in the United States; and shall pay to the collector at the rate of twenty cents per month for every seaman so employed, which sum he is hereby authorized to retain out of the wages of such seamen." It appears to me, that this deduction ought to be considered as a monthly deduction, to be apportioned upon the wages of the whole voyage; and not to be borne as a charge upon the unforfeited wages exclusively. I shall therefore direct, that a deduction of the hospital money of twenty cents per month, and no more, shall be deducted from every month's wages due since the forfeiture on the 8th of June. Decree accordingly.

MENZELL v. CHICAGO & N. W. RY. CO.

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. Oct., 1870.

CARRIERS — LIMITATION OF LIABILITY — SPECIAL CONTRACT—LOSS BY FIRE.

1. A contract between a railway company and the shipper of goods, limiting the common law liability of the company as a carrier, will have no greater operation given to it than the language used plainly shows the parties must have intended that it should have.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover of the defendant, the Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company, the value of certain goods which he alleges that on or about the 7th day of September, 1868, he delivered to it in Oshkosh, in Wisconsin, to be transported to Marshalltown, in Iowa. The defendant is alleged, in the petition, to be a common carrier, operating its road between these two places. The answer admits that the defendant is a common carrier, and that it was operating a line of railroad between Oshkosh and Marshalltown, but it does not admit the receipt of the goods or the value thereof, as claimed by the plaintiff. The answer also admits "that on or about September 7, 1868, at Oshkosh station, Wisconsin, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant a lot of household goods and furniture to be transported to Marshalltown, in Iowa, on the defendant's railway." And it sets up a special contract, dated September 7th, 1868, signed by the plaintiff, by which, "in consideration of the company transporting the property to Chicago station," the plaintiff "does hereby release the said company, and each and every other company, over whose lines said goods may pass to destination, from any and all damages that may occur to said goods, arising from leakage or decay, chafing or breakage, or from any other cause not the result of collision of trains, or of cars being thrown from the track while in transit." The contract gives the company the right to send the goods on arrival at their destination (Marshalltown) to a warehouse, after the lapse of a certain time, without payment of charges. After setting out this release or contract the answer alleges that in course of transportation at Chicago it was necessary to put the goods in the defendant's warehouse or freight depot at that place, and that while there the said building accidentally took fire and the goods of the plaintiff were destroyed, without any fault or neglect on the part of the defendant. No written reply is filed, because the statute of the state (adopted as the practice of this court) dispenses with a reply, and provides that "new matter in the answer shall (without any written pleading) be deemed controverted by the adverse party as upon a direct denial, or avoidance." Revision 1860, Iowa, § 2917. Under this statute the plaintiff on the trial claimed to avoid the effect of the written release or special contract set up in the answer, by insisting that it was procured by fraud or deception, he being a German and not able to read English, and not knowing or having had explained to him the nature of the instrument, and being ignorant thereof. The plaintiff also claimed that if the goods were consumed by fire, that the fire was owing to the fault or negligence of the company, in storing them in an exposed warehouse containing inflammable articles, without being duly guarded or watched. The plaintiff also insisted that this special contract is not binding upon him because there was no consideration therefor. He also maintained that as a matter of law the instrument does not undertake to exempt the company for loss by fire while the goods were in the warehouse at Chicago, an intermediate station on the line of transportation.

Certain facts admitted on the trial, or not controverted, may be here noticed. It is not denied that on the afternoon or evening of Monday, September 7, 1868, at Oshkosh, the plaintiff delivered to the defendant's agent certain boxes and packages for transportation, and that the company received them and agreed to transport them for the plaintiff to Marshalltown, Iowa. The goods arrived at Chicago on Friday, September 11th, in the afternoon, the distance being 193 miles. Chicago is the end of the Wisconsin division of the defendant's road; and the evidence shows as to goods not in bulk (like the present), that the usual course of business of the company is to reship them at Chicago, putting them into and passing them through their warehouse. The goods of the plaintiff were put by the defendants into their warehouse or freight depot, on Saturday, the 12th of September. On the afternoon of the succeeding day (Sunday) the warehouse containing the goods took fire and the goods were consumed thereby.

The trial was to a jury before DILLON, circuit judge. Both parties produced evidence in relation to the controverted questions of fact. The jury found a general verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the goods, and returned the following answers to certain questions of fact submitted to them in pursuance of the practice in the state courts of Iowa, adopted as the practice of this court; viz.:

[Question 1. Can the plaintiff read English,

and did he understand the nature of the special contract of Sept. 7th, 1868, set up in the answer, when he signed it? Answer. No. Q. 2. Was said contract read to him, or its nature explained to him? A. No. Q. 3. Did the plaintiff sign it in ignorance of its nature? A. Yes. Q. 4. Was the plaintiff guilty of negligence or fault, in not knowing (if such is the fact) the nature of the contract? A. No; under the circumstances. Q. 5. Did the agent who furnished the blank and required the plaintiff to sign it purposely conceal from the plaintiff the nature of the paper? A. No. Q. 6. Did the agent believe that the plaintiff did understand the paper he signed? A. No. Q. 7. If the plaintiff did not understand the contract, whose fault was it, his or the agent? or was it an accident and not the fault of either? A. The agent's, under the circumstances. Q. 7½. Did the agent know, or have cause to believe that the plaintiff could not read English? A. He had cause to believe he could not. Q. 8. Did the defendants' agent make any representation to the plaintiff as to the nature of the paper they wished him to sign? A. No. Q. 9. What did plaintiff believe the paper was when he signed it? A. A paper; the contents of which he had no definite idea, but which he understood to refer to his goods. Q. 10. Did he make inquiries concerning its character or contents? A. No. Q. 11. Did the fire in defendant's warehouse happen without any fault or neglect of the company or its agents? A. No. Q. 12. In respect to storing the goods in the warehouse and in caring for them while there, did the company pursue such a course and take such care of them as an ordinarily prudent man would have done, if the whole risk of loss had, under the circumstances, been his own? A. No.] [2]

The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that the special findings, as well as the general verdict, were against the weight of evidence, and for other reasons.

Withrow & Wright and H. C. Henderson, for the motion.

H. E. J. Boardman, opposed.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The motion for a new trial must be overruled. In the view I take of the case it is not necessary to consider whether the plaintiff succeeded by the fair weight of the testimony in establishing that the special contract was obtained from him by fraud. Nor is it necessary to consider whether the alleged want of any specific consideration therefor renders it inoperative, nor whether the special finding that the fire happened through the fault of the company, is so manifestly unsupported by evidence as to make it the duty of the court to set it aside.

On the admitted facts of the case, conceding the validity of the special contract on which the defendant rests, and that it is binding upon the plaintiff, and that the fire was purely accidental, it is still my opinion, as it was on the trial, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

By the common law a public carrier is liable to the owner of the goods, though they are without fault, on the part of the carrier, destroyed by fire while in the course of transportation. The contract between the plaintiff and the defendant is admitted in the answer to be to carry the goods from Oshkosh to Marshalltown; and the goods were burned at Chicago, an intermediate station, and while the defendant sustained towards the plaintiff the relation of a common carrier. Hence, the defendant is prima facie liable to the plaintiff for the value of his goods destroyed by the fire, but to avoid such liability the company sets up and relies upon the above-mentioned special contract, signed by the plaintiff.

The strict responsibility to which the common law holds public carriers is, in my judgment, founded upon a sound and enlightened public policy, and is salutary in its operation; and although it is admitted that it is competent for the shipper and the company, in the absence of prohibitory legislation, to make a special contract, limiting, to a reasonable extent, the common law liability of the latter, yet the courts construe these contracts somewhat strictly; at all events, give to them no greater operation than the words used plainly show that the parties must have intended they should have. Therefore, if the plaintiff, for a consideration, had knowingly entered into a contract with the company, specifically releasing it from all liability for loss of the goods by accidental fire, without fault on its part, while in transit, such a contract, it is conceded, would be binding upon the plaintiff. But did the plaintiff in this case make any such contract? This involves a construction of the special contract set up by the company. The language is, "I hereby release said company from any and all damage that may occur to said goods, arising from leakage or decay, chafing or breakage, or (and this is the language relied on) from any other cause not the result of collision of trains, or of cars being thrown from the track while in transit."

Construing this general and indefinite language conformably to the rules adopted by courts in the interpretation of contracts of this kind, it is my opinion that it does not plainly or satisfactorily appear therefrom that the parties intended thereby to exempt the company from liability for a total loss or destruction of the goods by fire while in the warehouse of the company at an intermediate station on the line of transportation; and therefore this agreement (admitting that it was knowingly entered into by the plaintiff, and founded upon a sufficient consideration) does not relieve the company from liability for the loss of the goods by fire, even though the fire were accidental, and without fault

District Court, S. D. New York. 1858.

MARITIME LIEN—TIMBER FOR BUILDING—QUANTITY AND VALUE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

This was a libel [by William Menzies against the bark Agnes] to recover for certain timber furnished for the vessel to Erskine for building the same vessel. No direct evidence was given whether the timber was furnished to Erskine or directly to the vessel. But enough evidence was given to raise a presumption that the libelant and Erskine dealt, in respect to the lumber, on the understanding that it was supplied mainly, if not wholly, for the particular vessel.

HELD BY THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge). That this affords adequate ground for lien in favor of the vendor to the value of the material used in the vessel. But it devolves upon the libelant to establish by clear evidence the quantity and value of the material procured for and used in constructing this vessel. Decree for the libelant with reference accordingly.

MARITIME LIENS—UNPAID INSURANCE PREMIUM—OWNERSHIP OF VESSEL—INSURANCE CONTRACTED FOR BY MASTER.

A master of a vessel, who has no proprietary interest in the vessel, but whose wife has such interest, insured the vessel in his own name alone. The insurance company tried to assert a lien on the vessel for the unpaid premium. Held, no such lien.

In admiralty.

WELKER, District Judge. The wife of David Becker was the owner of three-fourths of the Orphan Boy. He husband was the master, and acted as her general agent in the management of her part of the vessel. On the 2nd day of April, A. D. 1877, said David Becker, in his own name, took out a policy of insurance in the libelant's company for the sum of $2,000, on which he was to pay a premium of $140. That at the time of the insurance nothing was said of the ownership of the wife to any part of the vessel, or that the insurance was for her benefit; but the company supposed him to be the owner; nor was there any proof that the wife expressly authorized or directed the insurance to be made. The premium was not paid, and this libel is filed to assert a lien on the vessel for such unpaid premium.

Held: 1. That the husband, as master of the vessel, had no authority to make the insurance in his own name. 2. That the husband of the wife had no insurable interest in the wife's interest of the vessel, so as to create a lien upon the vessel for the premium. 3. That the insurance and policy being in the name of David Becker alone, and "not for the interest of all concerned," the company was only liable, if liable at all, to him, and not to the owners of the vessel in case of loss; and he having no insurable interest in the vessel, the policy could not be enforced against the libelants in case of a loss. That, where the policy itself was such as could not be enforced by the owner of the vessel, the insurance thereof created no lien on the same for the premium agreed to be paid. The libel is dismissed with costs.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — MORTGAGE — TRUSTEE — SUIT IN STATE COURT—RECEIVER—STAY OF PROCEEDINGS—SERVICE IN STATE COURT.

1. The plaintiff, owning first mortgage bonds of a railroad company, brought this suit, in this court, to foreclose the mortgage and remove the two trustees, alleging that one was the sole trustee in a claimed preference mortgage of the same property, which he was seeking to foreclose in a court of the state, in which proceeding the other trustee had been appointed a receiver of the property, and was in possession. There were demurrers, and a plea of the pendency of those foreclosure proceedings, and a plea of the filing of a cross-bill therein by the trustees of the first mortgage, for foreclosure, on the day after the filing of the bill in this suit, in which this plaintiff was named a defendant, and on whom process was served, by an order of the state court, out of the state, before the service of the subpoena in this suit. The case was heard on the pleas set down for argument and the demurrers: Held, this court will not stay this suit until the proceedings in the state court shall be completed.

[Cited in Dwight v. Central Vermont R. Co., 9 Fed. 789.]

2. This court can and will proceed with this suit, although the property is in the possession of a receiver of the state court, though it will do nothing to disturb such possession, or to interfere with the receivership.

3. The service of the process of the state court on the plaintiff, as a defendant to the cross-bill, out of the state, was not effectual.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

4. The fact that the mortgage trustees brought the cross-bill, did not draw the plaintiff in, and make him a party to it, by representation, as the trustees represent, in the suit, only the rights of such bondholders as join in it.

5. The position of the trustees is such that they cannot alone properly represent the bondholders, and no refusal by them to foreclose, after a request by the plaintiff, need be shown.

[Cited in Mercantile Trust Co. v. Portland & Ogdensburg R. Co., 10 Fed. 605.]

6. It is no objection to this suit that this court cannot settle the accounts of the receiver.

[This was a bill in equity by the Mercantile Trust Company against the Lamoille Valley Railroad Company, the Montpelier & St. Johnsbury Railroad Company, the Essex County Railroad Company, Luke P. Poland, and Albert B. Jewett, for a foreclosure of mortgage and the removal of trustees. Heard on demurrers and pleadings.]

Edward J. Phelps and Guy C. Noble, for plaintiff.

Benjamin F. Fifield, Luke P. Poland, and Harry D. Hyde, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This is a bill in equity brought by the plaintiff, as owner and holder of one hundred thousand dollars of the first mortgage bonds of the railroad of the defendants, which are railroad corporations, in behalf of itself, and all other like owners and holders who are non-residents of the state of Vermont, and wish to join therein, for a foreclosure of the mortgage, and removal of the trustees, alleging that one of the trustees is the sole trustee in a claimed preference mortgage of the same property, which he is seeking to foreclose in the state court, in which proceeding the other trustee has been appointed a receiver of the property, and is now in possession, with another person, as such receiver. Some other bondholders have become parties here with the plaintiff. Some of the defendants have demurred to the bill, and others have pleaded the pendency of those foreclosure proceedings, and a cross-bill filed therein by the trustees of the first mortgage, for foreclosure, on the day after the filing this bill in this court, in which this plaintiff was named a defendant, and on whom process was served, by an order of that court, out of the state, before the service of the subpoena in this cause. The plaintiff set down the pleas for argument, and the cause has been heard upon the pleas and the demurrers.

Before proceeding to the argument of the questions so raised, it was moved, in behalf of the defendants, that this court should stay these proceedings until those in the state court should be completed, and thereby compel the plaintiff to become a party there, if not already one, and to proceed there instead of here. But, courts have not the right to disown their jurisdiction. It is their duty to hear and determine causes properly brought before them, and to determine whether they are properly so brought, if such question arises, and not to advise or compel the parties to go elsewhere for relief, even though it should appear that the relief might better be obtained elsewhere. In Magna Charta, c. 29, it was declared by the king, for his courts: "Nulli vendemus, nulli negabimus, aut differemus, rectam, vel justitiam." This is fundamental to the duties of courts. The duty cannot be fulfilled by sending parties elsewhere for what they have a right to here, nor by compelling them to wait until some other time for what they have a right to now. If the plaintiff has a right to prosecute this suit in this court, it has, also, the right to have it proceeded with according to the course of the court, and, as question is made as to whether it has the right to so proceed, it has the right to have that question heard and determined, as may appear to be right, also. There was no proper course but to hear the parties upon the questions raised, and there is no proper way now but to pass upon them.

It is familiar learning, that, upon the demurrers, the bill is to be taken as true, and that, upon the pleas, the bill and pleas are all to be taken as true, unless inconsistent, in which case the allegations in the pleas prevail. These pleadings here raise two principal questions, both of which have been very thoroughly argued by counsel familiar with questions of this sort, and with these subjects. The first is, whether this court should proceed at all, or has jurisdiction to do so, while the property which is the subject of the controversy is in the custody of the state court, in the hands of its receivers. This question arises upon both the demurrers and the pleas, for the fact of the receivership is alleged in the bill as well as in the pleas.

That this court ought not to, and cannot lawfully, go so far with the proceedings as to take the possession of the property from that court, or as to in any manner interfere with the possession of it by that court, or its officers, is not disputable. Such a course would be contrary to the provisions of the statute of the United States (Rev. St. § 720) which prohibits the writ of injunction from being granted by any court of the United States, to stay proceedings in any court of a state, unless authorized by some law relating to bankruptcy. Although the possession might be trenched upon by some process or proceeding different from an injunction in form, still the effect would be the same as if the proceedings of the state court should be stayed, and the statute would be violated in spirit, if not in letter. And, if there were no such statute, as the jurisdiction of the two courts in this class of cases is concurrent, and not revisory one of the other, the one first acquiring jurisdiction, by proceedings involving the possession of specific property, could not, upon common and well-settled principles, be disturbed in such possession by the other, while the proceedings involving the possession should be pending. The right to the possession of the property would be as exclusive as that to the rest of the proceedings. So, the debatable question here is, not whether this court will grant relief that will disturb the possession of the state court, for, surely, it will not do that, but whether it will hear and determine any question, or grant any relief, concerning the right to the property and not extending to the possession, while that court has possession. There is nothing, either in the letter or the spirit of the statute, that prohibits a party having a question of right, or a claim to relief, that can be determined without meddling with the possession of any court, from having the question determined or the relief granted by any court of competent jurisdiction for the purpose. Neither is there anything in the nature of things which should prevent. There could be no conflict between courts or their officers, growing out of such proceedings, nor are there any apparent evils likely to follow. Neither do the authorities go to that length. In Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612, Mr. Justice Grier, in delivering the opinion of the court, said, that the court having the possession of the property should have the disposition of "every question which occurs in the case," not including in the statement every question concerning the property. The cases which have followed are consistent with that distinction, and, in view of it, Watson v. Jones, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 679, is not at variance with the others. The right of the state court to the possession of the property during the continuance of the litigation before that court involving the possession, was sedulously respected, and the relief granted was carefully shaped to the disposition of the possession by the state court. In that case, Mr. Justice Miller, after stating the pleadings and proceedings, and that the bill contained a special prayer for relief that would interfere with the possession and disposition of the property by the state court, and that it contained a general prayer that would cover other relief said: "Under this prayer for general relief, if there was any decree which the circuit court could render for the protection of the right of the plaintiffs, and which did not enjoin the defendants from taking possession of the church property, and which did not disturb the possession of the Louisville chancery, that court had a right to hear the case and grant that relief." The authority of that case has not been questioned by the court which decided it, and it is not open to question here. In this case, as in that, some of the relief which the bill might cover would interfere with the possession of the state court, and some of it would not. The execution of an order of sale, under the provisions of the mortgage, or of an order for the delivery of possession, under other provisions, would have that direct effect, and, perhaps, the general prayer for relief would cover either; but, as before mentioned, it is clear that the plaintiff cannot have such relief. None can be had except that which will not interfere with the present possession. A decree of foreclosure would not. It would only cut off the equity of redemption of the plaintiff's bonds, which the mortgagors now have, and would not affect the possession at all, but only the right. Carpenter v. Millard, 38 Vt. 9; Shaw v. Chamberlin, 45 Vt. 512; Brooks v. Vermont Cent. R. Co. [Case No. 1,964]. A mortgagee, in Vermont, may have an action of assumpsit to recover his debt, an action of ejectment to recover possession of the mortgaged premises, and a suit in equity to foreclose the right to redeem, all going on at the same time, each in a different court from either of the others, and neither will interfere with the other, nor will the pendency of any of them abate either of them. The remedy in each case is distinct from that in the others. This was so at the common law.

The objection on account of the receivership cannot prevail to prevent proceeding in this cause, so far as it can go without interfering with the receivership; and a decree of foreclosure can be had, if the plaintiff is otherwise entitled to one, without involving such interference.

The other principal question is, whether the state court had the same parties before it, either actually or by representation, for the same relief, so that it had jurisdiction of the cause, before the parties were brought before this court, so as to give jurisdiction. One branch of this question is, whether the service of the process of the state court upon the plaintiff here, as a defendant to the cross-bill there, out of the state, would be effectual. A party having property within a state submits it to the laws of the state and to such proceedings as they provide for, and, if they provide for proceedings against it without personal service, or even without any service, he must, probably, submit to them; but he cannot justly be compelled to submit to any process which the laws of the state do not provide for. The laws of the state of Vermont provide for service upon non-residents, in chancery cases, by publication in a particularly specified manner. Gen. St. 249, § 21. They also provide for constructive service upon non-resident defendants whose property is attached, in actions at law (Gen. St. 296, § 48), and, also, for service in various modes upon non-resident defendants in divorce proceedings. But they nowhere provide for any order by the courts of chancery, to serve their process out of the state, nor for serving it out of the state, in the manner in which this was served, or in any other manner. Such service has often been made, sometimes where the court required it, in order that actual notice might be given, as a matter of fairness, and sometimes as a substituted service. But, whether it is operative at all, as the only service, has been much doubted; and that question was expressly avoided and left undecided by the supreme court of the state, in Cheever v. Birchard (pamphlet opinion of Steele, J., 10). There is no known decision of the state court holding such service to be good or bad, but there are several that hold similar service in proceedings at law to be wholly void, even in suits concerning real property within the state. Propagation Society v. Ballard, 4 Vt. 119; Skinner v. McDaniel, Id. 418. The court has no jurisdiction or authority to act without the state, and it is not easy to see how it can affect any party by anything done by it, or under its order, without the state; nor how it can affect any right within the state belonging to parties without, otherwise than by proceedings under and according to the laws of the state. As viewed here, that service was not operative upon the plaintiff, nor such as it was bound to take any notice of.

But, if that service had been operative, a question whether the proceeding to which it would make the plaintiff a party was a proper one for obtaining the relief sought here, would still remain. It would have made the plaintiff a defendant to a cross-bill for the foreclosure of a mortgage securing its own debt, which might not be a very favorable position in which to obtain the affirmative relief of foreclosure in its own favor.

It is urged, however, that, because the mortgage trustees are parties, they draw the plaintiff in and make it a party, by representation, whether it will or not. The trustees hold the legal title to the mortgaged estate, but not the mortgage debt. It is quite familiar doctrine, that a mortgage is incident to the debt, which is always the principal thing. The default which would forfeit the estate would be to the bondholders owning the debt, not to the trustees holding the legal estate. The trustees could not foreclose the mortgage without the support of the bondholders, or some of them, in it. If they should undertake to do so, and no bondholder should come in and prove his bonds, they could have no complete decree. But bondholders may foreclose and have a full decree, whether the trustees will or not. At the argument, counsel very familiar with these subjects were pressed to show a case where a bondholder had undertaken to foreclose and been denied that relief, but no such case was produced; and it was admitted there were none. The bondholders have control of the bonds and the trustees have not. This is what was meant in Brooks v. Vermont Cent. R. Co., in stating that the trustees were not agents for the bondholders, and what was understood to be the effect of the authorities cited there in support of that proposition. It has been many times held, against the objection of the mortgagors that all were not joined in a proceeding to foreclose, that all need not be joined, which seems to be very plain. It is equally plain, that some must join, at some stage, in order to have a perfect decree. Suppose some do join and others do not, and a decree perfected to foreclose the right to redeem the bonds of those who do, and not of the rest. If the property should be redeemed from that decree that would not pay the other bonds, nor cut off the owners of them from their right to foreclose. If it should not be redeemed, while the right of the mortgagors to it would be extinguished, that of the holders of the bonds not foreclosed would not be, but would still remain as against those who did foreclose, and could be enforced. Wright v. Parker, 2 Aikens, 212; Langdon v. Keith, 9 Vt. 299; Belding v. Manly, 21 Vt. 550; Brooks v. Vermont Central R. Co. [Case No. 1,964]. This shows, that, when the trustees foreclose, the bondholders who join are the real parties and foreclose in behalf of their own rights, through the trustees, and that the trustees do not represent the rights of any who do not join. In an action of ejectment, depending upon the strict legal title, it would be different. There, the trustees could prevail alone, without the bondholders, but the bondholders could do nothing without the trustees. But, in equity, the real owner is regarded and the nominal owner is not. And, as this case is situated, the trustees may not represent all the rights of the bondholders as well as they would in ordinary cases. Poland, one of the trustees in the first mortgage, is sole trustee in another mortgage, claimed to have preference. The state court has the trustees of both parties to the proceedings there. With the trustees as parties alone, the only decree there could be would be, either that he should be foreclosed unless he should pay himself and the other so much by such a time, or that both should be foreclosed unless they should pay him so much by such a time. In either case he could redeem by paying himself, which would not accomplish anything. It would all be within himself. He cannot represent the plaintiffs and their opponents at the same time. Bondholders of each mortgage are made parties, it is true, and such as may fairly represent the interests common to each class, but, if so, they do not represent in fact all others of the same classes. They can only act for themselves. Whether those proceedings shall abate this suit, depends as well upon its being for the same relief in full, as upon being between the same parties, and the relief available there might fall far short of an effective foreclosure, as is sought here. This is not the fault of the trustees, but of the position in which they have been placed by those who have made them trustees.

It is said, in behalf of one demurring party, that the bill does not show any request from the plaintiff to the trustees to foreclose, and that they are not entitled to proceed in their own behalf without such request and a refusal or failure to comply. It is true, that no such request is alleged, so far as has been observed, but it is also true, for the reasons just stated, that none would be of any avail. The trustees are not so situated that they can foreclose alone.

It is also objected, that this court cannot proceed to a decree of foreclosure in behalf of the plaintiff, because such a decree cannot be perfected without ascertaining the sum due in equity, and that this court cannot settle the accounts of the receivers, to ascertain how much there is in their hands to apply on the mortgage debt, because it has no jurisdiction over them. It is true, that this court cannot settle their accounts. It is also true, that they were not appointed in a suit to which the plaintiff was a party; if the plaintiff had been a party there, it could not maintain this suit here; they were appointed in a suit between others and the mortgagors. The sum due in equity is to be ascertained by fixing the amount lawfully due after deducting payments. The source from which the mortgagors derive means of payment, or what means they might derive if they could have their property, or how much it would pay if the plaintiff had it, or the avails of it, is of no consequence, unless the plaintiff has had it. It was the duty of the mortgagors to make payment, and that their property got into litigation is no lawful excuse for not making it. All payments which they make or procure to be made, before the accounting, will apply as payment to keep down the sum due, and all made afterwards, and before the expiration of the time of redemption, will help them redeem. If they would have their property in the custody of a court apply in either way, they must relieve it from the custody, so it can be applied, the same as if it had been attached or taken in execution, in some suit against them. This may be unfortunate, but, if so, it is due to the insolvency of the mortgagors, not to the fault of the plaintiff.

Many books and cases have been cited in behalf of the defendants, in support of their objections, in many of which there are rulings and dicta which would be strongly in their favor if the questions had arisen in the same way, and the proceedings had been to the same purpose and effect as these; more than time and space admit of specific reference to. What is said in some of them is with reference to the effect of citizenship of actual parties upon the question of jurisdiction of the federal courts; what is said in some others is in respect to foreclosure under laws which require sale of the property, and division of the avails, and not concerning a foreclosure to merely bar the equity of redemption; and in none of them, so far as observation has extended, has anything been held upon questions precisely like these, contrary to what is here held or said, which, however applicable there, would be so here.

The pleas, although not to the whole bill, are to the relief by foreclosure, and as such cannot stand; neither can the demurrers. However desirable it might be that this cause should be before a court where all interested in the property could be made parties, and all rights to it be adjusted, still, as the plaintiffs have the right to come into this court for such relief as they can have here, and they can have some relief here, the court must entertain their cause in respect to that relief. The pleas and demurrers are overruled.

[3 Hughes, 488.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Virginia. Jan., 1878.

COLLISION—VESSEL AT ANCHOR—CONCLUSIVE PRESUMPTION.

Where a vessel lying at anchor in a harbor on proper ground showing lights is run into by a moving steamer and damaged, the presumption of fault is conclusive against the steamer.

Libel in admiralty [by John L. Mercer against the steamer Florida] for damages for collision. The libel was for a collision by the Florida with the schooner Marion A., and by which the schooner was sunk and her cargo damaged, on the morning of February 17th, 1877, at about six o'clock, on a dark morning, at a point about seventy-five yards south by east of the Red Buoy, which is placed nearly opposite the custom-house on the Portsmouth side in Norfolk harbor. The loss was about $1,000.

HUGHES, District Judge. The cause is one of a steamer coming into a harbor studded with vessels at anchor and lined with vessels moored at the wharves, in what its witnesses called a dark night, and colliding with a vessel at anchor. A collision by a steamer running into a vessel lying at anchor anywhere, raises the presumption of fault against the steamer. Much stronger is this presumption where the collision is in a harbor at night when and where the utmost caution is required of the moving vessel. And steamers in motion are held to stricter responsibility for fault than sailing vessels in motion; because of the greater facility with which their navigators can manage them. I need not cite authority for these obvious propositions. They are well-settled laws. On the other hand, I held in The J. D. Everman Case [Case No. 7,591], that in an open roadstead several miles square, where there was no harbor master and no known or conceded line of channel, a vessel might anchor anywhere at will. While that is emphatically the case in Hampton Roads, it is not the case in the harbor of Norfolk and Portsmouth, deep water in which constitutes a channel in most of the harbor of only the width of a few hundred yards. Here they have a harbor-master, who ought to be held to a very strict attention to his work and to an unremitted discharge of his duty day and night. He ought to be an active, energetic, ever-watchful, never-negligent, earnestly-faithful man to his duties. Any other sort of harbor-master will be the cause of frequent collisions, much dissatisfaction to navigators frequenting the port, and continual and indefinite injury to the commerce of the two cities. I say that a harbor-master is here who ought to be on hand to assign vessels to proper and safe places of anchorage at all times. A vessel placed at anchor by him is presumptively free from fault as to the place of lying at anchor. Vessels, indeed, must often cast anchor at times when they cannot avail of the services of the harbor-master. A vessel which casts anchor at such a time selects its place of anchorage on its own responsibility. If a vessel anchors at an improper place anywhere it is at fault, though if a steamer run into her when thus at fault the presumption is against the steamer and the burden of proof is upon the steamer to show the fault of the vessel. If a vessel chooses a wrong anchorage in a much-frequented and narrow harbor it will be held to more strict responsibility, and to be more violently in fault, because of its being in a harbor; but if she is run into by a steamer while lying there the presumption will be violently against the steamer, and the burden of proving fault in the vessel will rest still upon the steamer.

It is for the interest of all that settled rules of law on these subjects should be enforced. It will not do to say that the public interest of a city requires that steamers should be favored by the courts at the expense of smaller craft. Nor will it do on the other hand to maintain that men of small means and having small properties, like sloops and schooners, ought to be favored by the courts at the expense of wealthy companies owning great steamers. Ideas of what class of vessels do most service to the public cannot enter into the deliberations of court in cases of collision. Neither class of vessels can be allowed to proceed upon the notion that the other class has no right which it is bound to respect.

If steamers run out of the channel or too close to the edge of the channel of a harbor, and in doing so strike a vessel at anchor, it will be always held in this court to be responsible for the consequences. It has no right to try experiments of nice running in a narrow and much-frequented harbor. It must seek the middle of the channel and not swerve from it if possible.

On the other hand, vessels cannot be countenanced by the court in anchoring within the channel. Their duty is to get on the edge of it or out of it. If they obstruct the channel they must not expect to recover damages if they are run down or run into by vessels in motion. The master of a vessel may think it will do no harm for his vessel alone to anchor in the channel, it being very easy for a steamer to go around one vessel. But the exercise of such a liberty by one vessel demoralizes the whole discipline of a harbor, and no one vessel has a right to take a position in which, if a hundred other vessels took like positions there would be an obstruction of navigation. Example is always contagious, especially vicious example.

I think I have said enough to indicate that I consider this case to turn entirely upon one single question; and that is, whether the Marion A. was anchored in the channel too far from the edge of it at the time of the collision. As to the light, the Florida's witnesses only say that they did not see a light on the schooner. But the testimony of the witnesses of the schooner is positive, consistent and outspoken on that point. Captain Dehart saw the light was put up, the seaman Post testifies that it was put up, and Mr. Robert Mercer saw it hanging and burning after the collision. Nor is it worth while to consider the point made by claimant's counsel as to the lookout of the Marion A. A vessel must have proper lookouts until she is anchored, and is always held strictly to the duty of keeping a lookout when not anchored; but when once anchored the lookout, who is an officer of navigation on a vessel in motion, becomes then a mere watchman for purposes of patrol, protection, and warning on the anchored vessel. So that the case turns solely upon the question, where was this schooner anchored?

The libel recites that, at the time of the collision, the Marion A. was lying "just south of the Red Buoy," which is fixed on the edge of the channel on the Portsmouth side. The answer admits and alleges that "the point at which said schooner was then anchored is about south by east of said buoy, and about midway between the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth, to the southward of the United States custom-house at Norfolk." Without reciting and commenting upon the evidence of each witness who testified in the case on this point, I think I can safely say that their evidence on either side is substantially epitomized in the language I have quoted from the libel and answer. I shall take the position of the schooner at anchor to be that assigned to it by the answer, which was deliberately drawn and intelligently and deliberately sworn to by Captain Dawes. The only point left open to doubt by the allegation of the answer is as to the distance at which the schooner lay from the Red Buoy on the course of south by east. The schooner's testimony is that this distance was fifty yards, though Hubbard places it at one hundred and fifty yards. I shall assume that it was a hundred yards, and this distance would place it about due south of the custom-house. I have no better guide in ascertaining the position of the schooner from these data than the official chart of the harbor made by the officers of the United States coast survey, a copy of which I have before me.

The testimony of witnesses as to depth of water is always perplexingly inaccurate; and there is no safe guide but the charts. The official chart gives a channel north of the Red Buoy of more than three hundred yards in width, clear of wharves, slips, and docks. All these charts lay down three dotted lines: one representing the line of six feet depth of water on each side of the channel; another of twelve feet depth; and the third of eighteen feet depth. The channel of Norfolk harbor, north of the Red Buoy, between the two lines of eighteen feet depth, is about three hundred yards in width, and from twenty-five to forty-two feet in depth. The Red Buoy sits south of the channel on the Portsmouth side, and a little south of the line of twelve feet water on that side. I have drawn a red line from the Red Buoy on the chart on the course of south by east. This line intersects the line of twelve feet water at a distance of about 100 yards from the Red Buoy, and intersects the line of eighteen feet water at a distance of 300 yards from that buoy. If, therefore, the schooner was lying anywhere within a distance of 100 yards wide from the buoy on a south-by-east course, it was within the line of twelve feet water, and there was an open, free channel north of it nearly 400 yards and 12 to 42 feet deep. If the schooner was lying anywhere within 300 yards of the Red Buoy on this south-by-east course, it was within the line of eighteen feet water, and there was an open, free channel north of her of 300 yards in width and 18 to 42 feet in depth. The schooner was south of the line of twelve feet water, and outside of the principal main channel of navigation in the harbor. It would have been more prudent for it to have been farther south and on the flats, because steamers drawing less than twelve feet water could follow it and strike it where it was; but still it was not in the channel, and scarcely on the edge of the channel, properly so called, at the point at which it was actually lying. But this does not constitute a fault in the schooner. All that could possibly be claimed is, that it was an imprudence in view of the fact that steamers often run outside of the main channel in running short cuts to their points of destination. The schooner, therefore, was not legally in fault.

The next question is, whether the steamer had a right to run close to the south edge of the channel in a harbor where that edge is the usual anchoring ground of shipping, and on a dark morning, when the utmost caution was incumbent on the steamer, and when it was most especially her duty to avoid all risk and keep to the middle of the channel. The officers of the Florida account for her running in the direction of the schooner by referring to the position in which a Norwegian bark was then lying at anchor. I judge from what has been stated in evidence, though that was very uncertain and unreliable, that the Norwegian bark was lying southeast of the Red Buoy on the line of eighteen feet water. But even if she had been much farther north, and entirely out in the channel, there was room in a channel three hundred yards wide for the Florida to pass to the north of the bark. At all events the schooner cannot be held for the fault of the Norwegian bark. It was the duty of the harbor-master to require the bark to change her position; and both the harbor-master and the bark are blamable for the bark's position. But their fault did not relieve the steamer from the duty on such a night, and coming into a small harbor, to keep in the middle of the channel.

I feel called upon to make another remark. The Florida was moving into the harbor at a speed too great to check up and stop in the distance of about a hundred yards. It is very difficult for the officers of steamers to realize the fact that they have no legal right to run through a harbor at that speed. It is so seldom that harm occurs in doing so, and it is so customary with steamers to run at such speed, that habit passes with them for law, and they come to believe that such speed is legally allowable. The law of navigation for steamers moving in harbors is: that they must run at a speed under which they can check up within a much shorter space than a hundred yards. This is especially incumbent upon them when entering a harbor filled with vessels on a dark night. The Florida ought to have crept along feeling her way at the slowest speed. I make this as a general remark, and do not lay stress in this case, upon the speed at which the Florida was running. The steamer was in fault, but the fault consisted in leaving a channel three hundred yards wide and running along the edge of it, in or within the south line of twelve feet water. See The Granite State, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 310.

The decree must be against the steamer or its stipulators.

District Court, S. D. New York. May, 1847.

PLEADING IN ADMIRALTY—JOINDER OF CAUSES—WAGES—MONEYS ADVANCED—IN REM—IN PERSONAM—JOINT LIABILITY.

1. A claim for seamen's wages and a claim for moneys advanced to the use of the ship may be united in one action against the ship.

[1] [Reported by Abbott Brothers.]

2. A seaman who claims to recover both for wages and for moneys advanced to the ship's use, may join in a libel in rem with a co-libellant claiming wages only.

3. Where the vessel is liable to two libellants for wages, for which, under the practice of the court in respect to the consolidation of suits, they may be compelled to sue in common, they may join in one action in rem, not only in suing for the common demands, but also in respect to other claims which are peculiar to each.

4. The history of the distinction between proceedings in rem and in personam, reviewed.

[Cited in The Richard Busteed, Case No. 11,764; The City of Norwalk, 55 Fed. 111.]

5. Where both the vessel and the master or owner are conjointly liable, the personal remedy, and the remedy against the vessel, may be sought in one and the same action.

[Cited in The J. F. Warner, 22 Fed. 344.]

6. Rule 13 of the supreme court interdicts the blending of an action against the owner personally, with one against the vessel, for the recovery of wages.

7. A claim for wages, and for moneys advanced to the use of a vessel on the part of one libellant, cannot be joined, in an action in personam, with a separate claim for wages alone, on the part of another.

This was a joint libel filed by William Johnson and Benjamin Griffiths against the sloop Merchant, in rem, and also in personam, against her master, John Kenan, and her owner, Joshua Jones, to recover wages and for moneys paid to the use of the vessel. The libellant Griffiths, averred in the libel that he was employed on board the sloop, running between New York and Newburg, upon a contract for wages, at $30 per month; and that he served ten days, for which he claimed $10. The libellant Johnson, alleged that he was likewise employed on board the sloop at the same time; that no specific agreement was made with him for wages; that he served for twenty-one days, and that his services were worth $2.25 per day, and he accordingly claimed for them $47.25. He also showed that he had made advances of cash for the use and service of the vessel, amounting to $83.75, for which he claimed to recover. The libel prayed a decree against the vessel, and also against the master and against the owner.

The owner filed the following exceptions to the libel:—(1) That a demand for wages and a demand for moneys advanced to the use of the vessel, could not be joined in one libel; and that at least they could not be prosecuted in rem and in personam, in one action. (2) That a suit for wages could not be maintained against the vessel, master, and owner conjointly. (3) That the demands of the two libellants could not be joined in one action in personam against the respondents.

The cause now came before the court upon these exceptions.

Edwin Burr, in support of the exceptions.

Alanson Nash, opposed.

BETTS, District Judge. The strict rules of the common law in respect to the unity of the cause of action, or the community of interest or of responsibility of parties to actions, are not observed in the maritime courts. The practice in those courts is at least as liberal and comprehensive as that pursued in equity. In admiralty, the libel or petition is employed to present the case of the prosecutor upon which he desires the interposition of the court in his behalf. Such a case may be composed of wrongs to the person of the prosecutor or to his property, or of a breach of contract, or of omission to do what he is rightfully and equitably entitled to have performed. The libellant Johnson, can accordingly properly bring his single action in this court, for wages earned, and materials and supplies furnished the vessel, provided he establishes a case falling within the jurisdiction of the court; and in that respect his remedy would be the same whether he prosecuted the vessel in rem or the parties liable to him in personam. The admiralty adopts the rule of the civil law, respecting the cumulation of actions (1 Browne, Civ. Law, 446), to avoid multiplicity of suits. Griffiths has not a right concurrent with Johnson in the whole subject-matter in suit, but their demands are of the same kind, so far as wages are concerned, the libellants having both served at the same time on board this vessel, although not for equal periods.

From this view of the subject, it follows that had these libellants commenced separate actions against the vessel for their wages, the court, at the instance of the respondents, would have compelled a consolidation, as contemplated by the act of July 20, 1790 (1 Stat. 133, c. 29, § 6), which prescribes that in this class of cases, "all the seamen or mariners (having cause of complaint of the like kind against the same ship or vessel), shall be joined as complainants;" or, would have prohibited the recovery of costs in more than one suit; and as in such case the contestation of the claims of each libellant is separate, as much so as if those claims were prosecuted in distinct actions, there would be neither incongruity nor inconvenience in permitting the libellants to connect with their several claims of wages such other demands as each party might be allowed to charge upon the vessel; and accordingly, the actions being united for one purpose, there would be no just ground of exception that in other respects each embraced particulars which could not be of themselves the subjects of a joint suit. Assuming that Johnson has a lien on the vessel for wages and money advanced for her necessities, and Griffiths a lien in common with him for wages only, I think no exception lies to the joinder of both demands in one libel. For the vessel being deemed liable to both for the wages, which must be sued for in common, each party may fitly pursue against her in the same action such other demands as are peculiar to himself. It is not to be supposed that congress intended by that enactment to save vessels and owners from multiplicity of actions for wages, by interfering with and inhibiting the right of each seaman, as it exists at law, to connect other demands with his individual suit for wages.

A greater difficulty is presented by the other aspect of the first exception; whether these different demands can be prosecuted in personam against the respondents by joint action. The admiralty had an established jurisdiction in personam over matters falling within its cognizance, long before a remedy was afforded in rem, other than upon express hypothecations. Browne supposes that suits were originally in rem on the instance side of the court. 2 Browne, Civ. Law, 396, note. The remedy in rem is undoubtedly the more useful and desirable one, but there are no traces of its exercise in the English admiralty until long after actions in personam had been of common use. Godolphin, in his Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty, published in 1661, points out the method in which the jurisdiction was exercised, as derived from the Consolato del Mare. He says the proceedings were summary, by warrant of arrest, and caution for the appearance of the party arrested. Godol. Adm. Jur. 41. So, also, it manifestly appears in the stipulation between the law judges and judge in admiralty, of May 15, 1575 (Zouch, Adm. 120), that the arrangement of jurisdiction had relation to its exercise in the arrest of the party alone. Throughout the first thirty chapters of the Consolato del Mare, which have relation to the enforcement of maritime contracts, the proceedings of the consular courts and courts of appeal are by personal summons or citation of the parties sought to be charged, and by decrees against them personally; which, like our judgments at law, could be executed upon the property of the debtor (2 Consol. del Mare, par Boucher, 9, 33), and in the subsequent chapters, in which provision is made for the sale of vessels to satisfy what are now regarded as maritime liens, it is at best equivocal whether the sales were not made by force of executions on judgments or decrees first obtained in personal suits, and not by the direct condemnation of the vessels or merchandise. So Clarke, in his Admiralty Practice, does not, as Browne intimates, merely treat first of proceedings in personam, but he views the process against vessels and property by warrant of arrest or sequestration, as auxiliary only to the suit in personam, and employed to constrain the appearance of the real party to be charged (title 28, and Oughton's Notes), and this was clearly so by the civil law (Wood, Civ. Law, bk. 4, c. 3, § 2).

The method of initiating suits in the English admiralty by arrest of the vessel, is declared to be of ancient use (The Dundee, 1 Hagg. Adm. 124; 2 Chit. Prac. 536), but at what point of antiquity it became a remedy of the court, is not traceable from the published decisions or rules. Evidently it must have been posterior to the compilation of Clarke's Praxis in the reign of Elizabeth, and which was first published in 1679,—Brevoor v. The Fair American [Case No. 1,847],—because that form of action is not treated of by Clarke. Title 28 of his work has reference to proceedings against property to compel the appearance in personam of the respondent.

There is certainly no clear authority showing that actions in rem preceded those in personam, as the general means of exercising the jurisdiction of the court; far less is there any to prove that the latter class of actions derived their qualities from the processes or rules of pleading employed in the former. Each form of action is distinct and independent of the other in respect to the methods of procedure employed, and (with a few exceptions) in respect to jurisdiction over the subject-matter upon which they may act. Suits in rem and in personam are by no means convertible, and if in some instances they are concurrent, there are numerous cases in which one must be employed to the exclusion of the other. Willard v. Dorr [Case No. 17,679]; The Packet [Id. 10,654]; Hammond v. Essex Fire & Marine Ins. Co. [Id. 6,001]; The George [Id. 5,329]; The Grand Turk [Id. 5,683]; The Orleans v. Phoebus, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175; Drinkwater v. The Spartan [Case No. 4,085]. It therefore does not follow that because these libellants may, or even must join in an action for wages against a vessel, that the like rule applies when the prosecution is in personam alone. These observations are intended to meet that part of the argument which regards the proceedings in this case as two separate suits, each of which is to be upheld or discharged upon principles applicable to it if prosecuted as a sole action; and they are made for the purpose of limiting the operation of the decision to the present case as it stands upon the pleadings.

The practice in this district has always sanctioned a proceeding conjointly in rem and in personam in cases where the party was entitled to the public remedy. See the case of The Zenobia [Case No. 18,208], decided in this court in July, 1847. Betts, Adm. 20. Such it is believed is the common course of admiralty courts in the United States. Abb. Shipp. 783, and note. This avoids multiplicity of suits, and saves needless repetitions of proofs and discussions, because the same facts, and between the same parties, must be in contestation in each action. In the instance of seamen suing for wages, the same libel was allowed to pray the arrest and condemnation of the vessel, etc., etc., and process and a decree against the master and owner, to satisfy the wages in arrear. The like result is obtained in the English admiralty, by compelling the parties chargeable personally to come into the suit in rem, and give their absolute appearance. This subjects them and their sureties to satisfy the decree of the court (The St. Johan, 1 Hagg. Adm. 334), and is equivalent to an arrest and decree in personam. In this case, accordingly, the proceeding in personam is not to be regarded as an independent action, subject to the rules which would govern it in that form, but as auxiliary and concomitant to the suit in rem for wages, which must then be conducted in the name of both parties, and may have also the advantage of a personal decree at the same time.

But it is argued that, in this point of view, the libellants had no authority to unite the owner and master with the vessel; rule 13 of the supreme court, declaring that, "in all suits for mariners' wages, the libellants may proceed against the ship, freight, and master, or against the owner and master alone in personam." Although the question of who may be responsible to a demand is one of general jurisprudence, yet the form and the arrangement of process by which the obligation is to be enforced, is matter of practice. And, according to the provisions of the act of congress of August 23, 1842, the supreme court is vested with authority to impose on inferior courts an absolute law in this respect (5 Stat. 518, § 6), and the court, under that power having proceeded to regulate this subject-matter, their regulation must be regarded complete and exclusive, inhibiting what it does not allow, as well as governing what is fixed by positive appointment. Gibbons v. Ogden, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 1. The remedy, therefore, in admiralty, must be in conformity to the direction of the supreme court rules; and rule 13, must, I apprehend, be accepted as having determined this point, whether regarded as matter of practice or pleading, by designating the methods in which this remedy is to be pursued, and thus also excluding all others. At least, it limits the scope of actions in rem and personam conjointly, when prosecuted for the recovery of wages, to the vessel, freight, and master, deferring the remedy in personam to a separate suit, where the owner is made a party. It is difficult to perceive the policy which induced this change of practice, or why the owner is not as aptly connected with the vessel as the master, in a proceeding involving their common liability, particularly when that of the owner is primary and coupled with an interest, whilst that of the master is only incidental to his office. That this distinction of actions is, however, considerately made, is obvious from rules 12, 14–17, and I feel constrained to say, that suitors are by force of rule 13, now interdicted from blending an action against the owner personally with one against the vessel, for the recovery of wages. The second exception must, accordingly, be allowed in favor of the respondents.

The third exception is overruled. The two seamen can rightfully join in a prosecution for wages, and each is entitled to unite with his demand other claims in his behalf, being liens on the vessel. This exception is not extended to the joinder of the master and owner with the proceeding in rem. The exception, however, raises the general question whether the libellants can proceed jointly against the master and owner, in personam, for the demands put forth by the libel. Clearly, at common law, parties must show a common interest in the subject-matter of the suit, to be enabled to prosecute it in their joint names. It is not sufficient that their respective claims are of the same character or kind, upon contracts express or implied, liens or other liabilities; but it must furthermore appear that each plaintiff is entitled to a common share in the recovery. 1 Chit. Pl. 8. The same is the case in equity, and a demurrer will lie for multifariousness for joining parties who have distinct interests. Edw. Parties, 10; Story, Eq. Pl. § 279; Yeaton v. Lenox, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 123. The civil law does not seem to have laid down rules in relation merely to parties uniting in an action, although it did regulate the joinder of different causes of action in one suit; usually prohibiting the union of remedies which were dissimilar in kind (24 Poth. Pand. 368; Dig. lib. 50, tit. 17, art. 431; Wood, Civ. Law, 372), but permitting to be embraced, in one libel, demands arising from different sources, as from personal obligation, hypothecation, &c. Code, lib. 7, tit. 40. Nor do I find that the practice of ecclesiastical courts made provisions specifically, respecting omitting or bringing into suits a multiplicity of parties. 2 Chit. Gen. Prac. 481–489.

The principles and doctrines of the general law ought, accordingly, to be applied to proceedings in admiralty, ex contractu, so far as they govern methods of pleading. This is clearly so, as to the essential components of a libel, plea or exception; and the convenience and usefulness of conformity, in the structure of proceedings in the different courts, is a persuasive reason for adhering to the well-defined and understood course of other courts, in the pleadings in admiralty, and would induce the court to be readily guided by those rules, when not infringing any principle or object of the remedies obtaining here. In this view of the subject, I am inclined to think actions in personam in admiralty ex contractu et è diverso intuitu, must be governed by the rules applicable to them in other courts in respect to the competency of parties to unite in their prosecution; and that the present case is clearly one in which such joinder could not be allowed, if the suits had been against the respondents solely. In actions in tort, the rule is different. American Ins. Co. v. Johnson [Case No. 303]; The Amiable Nancy [Id. 331]; same case, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546.

I do not intend in this case, to decide that the crews of sea-going vessels must sever in actions for their wages earned on a common voyage; or that parties whose rights spring out of a common cause of action must do so; but shall leave these questions to be disposed of as they may arise. But engagements for services on board river craft navigating between ports of this state, and for different periods, and at different wages, ought not to be distinguished in the modes of prosecution in this court against parties personally, from like suits in the courts of law. Questions have been raised and argued, upon the import and effect of the supreme court rules 12, 14–17; but, as they do not bear upon the points now decided further than has been already noticed, I shall forbear any remark upon them, other than to say that a remedy for supplies or materials furnished the vessel cannot be had against the master and owner, in connection with the vessel, but only against one of them. Rule 12.

The decision of the court upon the exceptions is: (1) That these libellants cannot maintain a joint action, in personam, solely upon the matter set forth in the libel. (2) That the libel is maintainable against the vessel in rem, in behalf of both parties, and that a decree may be taken for wages against both the vessel and master. (3) That no recovery or decree can be had in this form of the action against the owner. (4) That Johnson can have a decree for supplies, &c., against the vessel, and against either the master or owner at his election, but not against both.

Decree to be entered accordingly.

The MERCHANT.

ACOSTA et al. v. The MERCHANT.

[4 Adm. Rec. 544.]

District Court, S. D. Florida. Dec. 9, 1851.

SALVAGE—AMOUNT—UNITED STATES MAILS.

[A schooner laden with rice, and carrying the United States mails, went upon Pacific Reef, and became a total loss. Two small vessels, carrying 22 men, saved the mails, $900 worth of cargo, $7,760 in specie, and three hundred and fifty dollars worth of surveying instruments, and carried them 150 miles into port. It appeared that the specie and surveying instruments could have been landed by the schooner's boats on a barren island near by. Held, that the salvors should be allowed 40 per cent. on the cargo, 6 per cent. on the specie, and 15 per cent. on the surveyors' instruments; but there could be no allowance for the mails, as they could not be sold for salvage.]

[This was a libel in rem by Manuel Acosta and others against the cargo and materials of the schooner Merchant for salvage.]

Samuel J. Douglas, for libellants.

Wm. R. Hackley, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. The principal facts in this case may be briefly stated as follows: The schooner Merchant, from Charleston, laden with rice, and having on board the Key West, Havana, and California mails, in the night of the 27th of November, ran ashore on that part of the Florida Reef known as the Pacific Reef, situated near Cape Florida, and about one hundred and fifty miles from this port, and, soon after striking, bilged, filled with water, and became a total loss. In the morning the smack I. A. Latham (Manuel Acosta, master), of the burthen of 63 tons, and carrying a crew of 7 men, and the sloop Texas (Wm. H. Bethel, master), of 97 tons and 15 men, both engaged in the business of wrecking, arrived at the wreck, and at the request of the master, C. W. Westendorff, took on board their vessels the mails, the passengers, their baggage, and the materials of the vessel, and so much of the cargo as could be got, and as was worth saving, and brought them to this port. On their arrival, they delivered the mails to the agent of the contractor, to be forwarded. The cargo and the materials have been sold, producing the sum of $955.87. The Merchant had also on board $7,760 in specie, and three boxes of surveying instruments belonging to the United States, and then in the care of Mr. Totten, a passenger of the coast survey, and valued at $350. The specie and surveying instruments were brought to this port by the libellants.

It is very evident, that the cargo and materials saved would have been wholly lost but for the services of the salvors. As to these, I think forty per cent. of the amount sales is a reasonable salvage to be allowed the libellants. It makes $382.34.

It is equally clear, that the mails, the specie, and the surveying instruments were in no considerable peril of loss; for Captain Westendorff could have removed these to the land, in his boats; and without doubt would have done so had not the assistance of the libellants been offered. But had he removed them to the shore, they would still have been one hundred and fifty miles from any port, or from any place where they could be used, or made available to any practical purpose,—They would have been on a barren island, and to have removed them to this or any other port would have required a vessel, and he had none at his command, nor could one be procured, but by waiting for the arrival of some wrecking vessel cruising on the coast. Under these circumstances, I think the libellants have rendered to the owners of this property a very substantial and real service, that ought to be reasonably rewarded. The facts and circumstances fully considered, I think six per cent. upon the specie, or $465.60, and fifteen per cent., or $52.50, upon the value of the boxes of instruments, will be a reasonable compensation for the service rendered. The aggregate of these sums is $900.44; and allowing the one-half thereof to the owners of the wrecking vessels, and dividing the residue among the men the share of each will be about fifteen dollars.

In making this decision, I have allowed nothing to the salvors for their services in bringing the United States mails to this port. Under the circumstances, this was a valuable and important service; but it would be unequal and unjust to increase the amount of the salvage upon the cargo and materials and upon the specie in order to compensate the salvors for this service; for this would be in effect to take the money of the owners or underwriters of this property to pay a claim they are in no manner liable for. Although the property of the United States is no more exempt from the payment of salvage than that of an individual, and in like manner may, in general (with exceptions founded on public policy), be retained by the salvor, or sold by order of the court for the payment of salvage, yet the mails of the United States cannot be considered or treated in this regard as property or as liable to detention or sale. The mail bags may perhaps be considered as property, but not their contents; and both, upon principles of public policy, would be exempted from detention or sale, upon a claim of salvage. In the present case, I think justice demands, that a moderate and reasonable sum should be paid the libellants for their services in taking the mails from the wreck, and bringing them to this port. But this court has no means by which to make such compensation.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed: That the libellants have, recover and receive in full compensation for their services in saving the cargo and materials of the schooner Merchant as by them alleged forty per cent. ($382.34) upon the amount sales thereof; and that they recover and receive six per cent. ($465.60) for their services in bringing the specie to this port, and fifteen per cent. ($52.50) upon the value of the boxes of instruments for like services; and that, upon the payment thereof and their proper proportion of costs, the marshal restore said specie and boxes of instruments to the claimants, for and on account of whom it may concern. That the clerk, in taxing the costs in this case, charge each species of property with the wharfage, storage, or other charges properly belonging to it; and that he apportion the costs in this suit between the different claimants or species of property, according to their respective value or amounts, and charge each species with its proper amount thereof.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 25, 1857.

APPEAL—LIBEL DISMISSED—FOR WANT OF PROSECUTION—FINAL DECREE—REMEDY.

1. No appeal lies to this court from a decree of a district court, in admiralty, dismissing a libel in rem for want of prosecution.

[Followed in The Delaware, 33 Fed. 589.]

2. Such a decree is not final, or conclusive of the subject-matter of the litigation between the parties.

3. The remedy of the aggrieved party is to bring a fresh suit.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel of information, in rem, filed in the district court, by the United States, against the schooner Merchant and her cargo, to forfeit them, on the ground that the vessel was fitted out and equipped with the intent to engage in the slave trade. It was filed on the 21st of April, 1857, and the vessel and cargo were taken into the custody of the marshal, on the 23d of the same month. Vincent Beiro intervened, and claimed title to the cargo, and put in an answer to the libel. Thomas Carlin also intervened, claiming title to the vessel, and put in an answer. On the 12th of May, the proctor for the libellants obtained an order for leave to amend the libel. This amendment was filed on the 21st of the same month. The cause was placed on the calendar, and, at a stated term of the district court, held on the 5th of June, it was called in its order for hearing, by the proctors for the claimants. The proctor for the libellants declining to proceed in the cause, his default was entered, and the libel was dismissed. The proctor for the libellants, however, stipulating that he would proceed and try the cause on the next Wednesday, and that, in case of failure, a decree dismissing the libel might be entered, and the proctors for the claimants consenting, the cause was ordered to be restored to its place on the calendar. At a stated term of the court, held on the 18th of June, the cause was again regularly called on the calendar for hearing by the proctors for the claimants. The proctor for the libellants again declined to proceed, and moved a postponement, which motion was resisted. The court refused to postpone the cause, and an order was entered, agreeably to the terms of the previous order dismissing the libel for want of prosecution. [Case unreported.] Thereupon an appeal was taken to this court by the libellants. A motion was now made by the proctors for the claimants to dismiss the appeal for want of jurisdiction, upon the ground that the order or decree of the court below dismissing the libel, was not a final decree.

John McKeon, Dist. Atty., for libellants.
Charles Donohue, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. By the 39th rule of the supreme court, in admiralty, it is provided, that if, in any admiralty suit, the libellant shall not appear and prosecute his suit according to the course and orders of the court, he shall be deemed in default and contumacy, and the court may, upon the application of the defendant, pronounce the suit to be deserted, and the same may be dismissed, with costs; and, by the 40th rule, that the court may, in its discretion, upon the motion of the defendant and the payment of costs, rescind the decree in any suit in which the decree may have been against the libellant for contumacy and default, and grant a rehearing, at any time within ten days after the decree has been entered, the defendant submitting to such further orders and terms as the court may direct. The proceedings in the court below, in this case, on the refusal of the proctor for the libellants to prosecute his suit, were, as I understand them, taken, substantially, in accordance with the practice prescribed by the 39th rule, and are analogous to those in a common law court, where the plaintiff is non-prossed for not prosecuting a cause there, as required by the rules and practice of that court. The decree or judgment in such cases is not a final decree, and is not the subject of an appeal or writ of error, unless such a review is specially provided for by law. The remedy of the party, if he fails to procure the order of dismissal to be set aside, and the cause to be reinstated in court, is to bring a fresh suit. The order or decree of dismissal is not final, or conclusive of the subject-matter of the litigation between the parties.

In the case before me, if I should entertain the appeal and reverse the order of the court dismissing the libel, I could not remit the proceedings to the court below, and direct that court to proceed in the cause, as I possess no such power; and, if I should retain the cause, and undertake to hear it in this court, I should be usurping the jurisdiction of the district court, which has exclusive original cognizance in all such cases. It would be purely the exercise of original jurisdiction in a case in admiralty. I am satisfied, therefore, that I have no jurisdiction in the case, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Case No. 9,437.

MERCHANT et al. v. LEWIS.

[1 Bond, 172.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1857.

PATENTS — INFRINGEMENT — COSTS — VERDICT — TRIPLE DAMAGES—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. Under section 14 of the patent act of 1836 [5 Stat. 123], which provides substantially that where a verdict is rendered for an infringement of a patent right, it shall be competent for the court to render judgment for any sum not exceeding three times the amount of the verdict, as the circumstances of the case may require, with costs, the right of the plaintiff for costs follows from a verdict in his favor for any amount of damage, whether nominal or compensatory, and without any reference to the action of the court in adjudging an increase of damages.

2. The discretion given to the court by said section was clearly to meet the case of a willful and aggravated violation of a patent right, in which the jury had failed to do full justice to the plaintiffs.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[This was an action by Merchant and Humphrey against James Lewis to recover damages for the infringement of letters patent granted to Zebulon and Austin Parker, Oct. 19, 1829.]

Lee & Fisher, for plaintiffs.
Corwin & Probasco, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action to recover damages for an infringement of the exclusive right of the plaintiffs to the improved water-wheel, patented by Zebulon and Austin Parker. Upon the trial, the jury returned a verdict against the defendant for five dollars; and judgment has been entered on the verdict, including full costs. The defendant has filed a motion for a retaxation, on the ground that a verdict in a patent case for nominal damages does not entitle the plaintiff to costs. The decision of the question presented on this motion depends wholly on the construction to be given to section 14 of the patent act of 1836 (5 Stat. 123), which provides in substance that where a verdict is rendered for an infringement of a patent right, it shall be competent for the court to render judgment for any sum not exceeding three times the amount of the verdict, as the circumstances of the case may require, with costs.

It is insisted by the counsel for the defendant, that under the section referred to, the plaintiffs can not recover costs, except in cases where the damages found by a jury have been trebled by the court. This would seem to be an exceedingly technical construction of the statute, not required by its phraseology, and obviously in conflict with its intention. The right of the plaintiff to costs follows from a verdict in his favor for any amount of damages, whether nominal or compensatory, and without any reference to the action of the court in adjudging an increase of damages. The discretion given to the court was clearly to meet the case of a willful and aggravated violation of a patent right, in which the jury had failed to do full justice to the plaintiff. In such a case costs are awarded; but there is nothing to negative the plaintiffs' right to recover them, if the court should refuse to exercise the discretion which the statute confers. A verdict for damages, whatever may be the amount, implies that the defendant has been a wrong-doer in the unauthorized use of the plaintiff's exclusive right under his patent; and such a verdict will carry costs. It is not a just inference, in a patent right case, that because nominal damages are found by the jury, the action is necessarily frivolous or vexatious. It happens, not unfrequently, that the owner of a patent is compelled, for the protection of his rights, to sue for an infringement, under circumstances in which he neither seeks to recover nor asserts a right to anything beyond mere nominal damages. This may be necessary for the establishment of his patent, and to prevent infringements. And, as by the legislation of congress, the circuit courts of the United States have exclusive jurisdiction in patent cases, it would be a great hardship if he were subjected to the costs in thus asserting his legal rights.

It may also be remarked, in answer to the views urged by the defendant's counsel, that if sustainable it would result that costs against a defendant could not be recovered in any patent case where the verdict was less than five hundred dollars, unless the court, in its discretion, should treble the damages found by the jury. Such a construction would most injuriously affect the rights of many meritorious patentees, and would be in opposition to the spirit and design of the patent laws. The case referred to by counsel, Kneass v. Schuylkill Bank [Case No. 7,876], in which it was ruled that costs were not recoverable by the plaintiff in a patent case, unless the judgment amounted to five hundred dollars, arose under the patent act of 1793 [1 Stat. 318]. By section 5 of that act the rule of damages was three times the price for which the thing patented was usually sold or licensed; but there was no provision giving the plaintiff a right to costs. The court held that as the statute did not give costs, they could not be recovered unless the judgment was for five hundred dollars or upward. Then, by the provision of section 20 of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 83], the plaintiff was entitled to full costs. The motion for a retaxation is therefore overruled.

MERCHANTS' & MANUFACTURERS' BANK v. STAFFORD NAT. BANK.

District Court, D. Connecticut. May, 1877.

BANKS AND BANKING—NEGLIGENCE IN COLLECTING DRAFT—LIABILITY OF BANK.

[A draft payable at sight was left with plaintiff bank for collection, which forwarded it to defendant bank with instructions to return without protest if not accepted or paid. Defendant promptly presented the draft, and the drawee said he would look up the matter. Defendant bank then mislaid the draft, and did nothing further for several weeks. Immediately after presentation of the draft the drawee wrote the drawers that it was paid; and his letter being shown to plaintiff bank, it thereupon paid to the drawers the amount of the draft. The drawee subsequently ascertained that he owed the drawer nothing, and the draft was not paid. Held, that defendant bank was guilty of negligence in not immediately notifying plaintiff as to the state of affairs, and was therefore liable for the amount of plaintiff's loss, it appearing that the drawers had no visible property from which the amount could be made by legal proceedings.]

At law.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is an action of assumpsit to recover damages for the alleged breach of contract by the defendants in not collecting a draft which was forwarded to them for collection and for non-compliance with their undertaking as collecting agents. The action was tried by the court, both parties having by written stipulation waived a trial by jury. The facts which were found to have been proved on the trial are as follows: Both parties to the suit are national banking associations. S. Folsom & Co., of Detroit, Michigan, endorsed and delivered for collection, on August 30th, 1876, to the plaintiffs, a bank in Detroit, said Folsom & Co.'s draft of that date for $500 upon Julius Converse, treasurer of the Mineral Springs Manuf'g Co., payable at sight to the order of the drawers, at the Stafford National Bank. On the same day the plaintiffs forwarded said draft to the defendant corporation, endorsed, "Pay R. S. Hicks, cashier, or order, for collection," and attached to the draft the following notice: "If not accepted or paid, return without protest." The draft was enclosed in a letter to the defendants' cashier, of which the following is the material portion: "I enclose for collection and remittance to the Merchants' Natl. Bank, N. Y., for our account. Return at once, if not paid. Yours truly, F. W. Hayes, Cashier. No protest. $500." The letter and draft were received by the defendants on September 1st or 2nd, who presented it for acceptance to the drawee prior to September 4th. He replied he would look up his account and inform the cashier in regard to payment. Mr. Converse, as treasurer, was also advised by the drawers by letter of Aug. 30th, that such a draft had been forwarded, and on Sept. 4th wrote them as follows: "The $500 draft has been received and paid. Don't draw any more. The balance that may be due on what you have brought, if any, we will remit for when we get your full account." Upon the receipt of this letter on the afternoon of Sept. 5th the drawers showed it to the plaintiffs, who, believing, from its contents that the draft had been duly paid to the defendants, paid the drawers $500, less $1.25 charges of collection. Mr. Converse was also president of the defendant corporation, which fact was known to the plaintiffs. After Sept. 4th Mr. Converse wrote S. Folsom & Co. making inquiries in regard to items of their account which were not understood. Not hearing from them, or not receiving satisfactory replies, he began to investigate the account, and ascertained that he had overpaid them $300, not including the $500 draft. When he commenced this investigation he did not know that the draft had not been paid by the defendants. Meanwhile the draft had been mislaid in the defendants' bank, and had escaped the attention of the cashier, who had no further conversation with Mr. Converse on the subject until Sept. 22nd. On that day Mr. Converse directed the cashier to return the draft unpaid, who accordingly on September 22d wrote to the plaintiffs for the first time on the subject of the draft and returned it unpaid. The plaintiffs thereupon demanded repayment from S. Folsom & Co., which was refused. Folsom & Co. are solvent, and ordinarily pay their bills, but a judgment against them cannot be collected from any visible property without difficulty. If the defendants had written the plaintiffs on or prior to Sept. 4th that the draft had not then been paid, the defendants would not have paid Folsom & Co. The amount of the draft has never been paid to the defendants, and no part of the sum has ever been repaid to the plaintiffs.

The principles of law which I deem to be applicable to the case upon the foregoing facts, are as follows: The relation which the defendants sustained to the plaintiffs was that of an agent who has undertaken with his principal upon sufficient consideration to perform a certain duty. The general duty of an agent who receives for collection a bill of exchange is to use due diligence in presenting the same for acceptance, and in presenting it for payment, if it has been accepted, and to give the holders and other parties to the paper, by the next day's post, the notices of dishonor required by law in case acceptance or payment is refused, and to give to his principal any special notice which is required by the terms of the instructions to the agent, or of the contract which the agent has entered into with his principal. The agent is also required to protest, in case of non-acceptance, or non-payment, if protest is not forbidden, and to send the protest to the holder. Walker v. Bank of New York, 5 Seld. [9 N. Y.] 582; Hamilton v. Cunningham [Case No. 5,978]. The special instructions which were given in this case to the defendants, which instructions by the acceptance of the agency they undertook to observe in substance, were as follows: The draft was not to be protested, but was to be returned at once to the plaintiffs if not paid; if paid, the amount was to be remitted to a specified bank in the city of New York. It thus became the duty of the defendants to present the draft for acceptance and if acceptance was refused, or payment was not made (no days of grace being allowed in this state upon sight drafts) to return the draft at once, or to notify the plaintiffs of the delay in payment. The draft was received on Sept. 1st or 2nd. It was promptly presented for acceptance, but without any formal acceptance so far as the defendants were aware. No further communication was had with the drawer, and the draft was mislaid until Sept. 22nd, when for the first time any information was given to the plaintiffs. The defendants do not seem to have appreciated the duties which devolved upon them by reason of the agency. They were manifestly guilty of laches, and, it is not denied that a collecting agent may recover from his agent the loss which the former has sustained by reason of the laches of the latter. Commercial Bank v. Union Bank, 11 N. Y. 203.

The important question however in this case is as to the amount of damages which were sustained by the plaintiffs in consequence of the defendants' neglect. The agent by neglecting any part of his duty does not necessarily become responsible for the whole debt. The damages are not necessarily commensurate with the amount of the draft which has been remitted for collection. "A person acting on commission, who by his misconduct has brought loss upon his principal, is responsible to the precise extent of the loss produced by that misconduct." Hamilton v. Cunningham, supra; Van Wart v. Woolley, 3 Barn. & C. 439, Moody & M. 520. In this case the payment was made by the plaintiffs upon the strength of the drawee's letter of Sept. 4th, and I have been in some doubt, the payment to Folsom & Co. having been made in reliance upon the drawee's assertion that the draft had been paid, whether the defendants, although liable for the non-performance of their duty, were liable for the full amount which was paid to Folsom & Co. But the duty of the defendants was to return the draft at once if not paid, or inform the remitter of the delay in payment. If the defendants' cashier had discharged his duty, and had informed the plaintiffs of the non-payment, no injury would have accrued to the plaintiffs, who would have been seasonably advised of the mistake of the drawee.

Furthermore, if the defendants had promptly performed their duty, and obtained an answer to their demand of payment the draft would either have been paid on September 4th, for the drawee was apparently then ready to pay, or on the same day they would have notified the plaintiffs of non-payment. In either case no loss would have been sustained by the plaintiffs. Although Folsom & Co. are liable to the plaintiffs for the amount of money which they paid through mistake of fact, which amount was not actually due to Folsom & Co. from the drawee (Bank of Orleans v. Smith, 3 Hill, 560; Wingate v. Mechanics' Bank, 10 Pa. St. 104; East Haddam Bank v. Scovil, 12 Com. 303); yet the loss having actually occurred to the plaintiffs through the laches of the defendants, and the amount of that loss having been ascertained, the plaintiffs may look also to the defendants for satisfaction. Judgment should be entered in favor of the plaintiffs for $498.75, and interest from Sept. 5th, 1876.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—AT WHAT TERM—PLEADINGS NECESSARY.

1. Under section 3 of the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 471), which requires the application to the state court for the removal of a cause into the circuit court of the United States, to be made "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried," the term referred to is a term occurring after the passage of the act, and not a term before such passage.

[Approved in Crane v. Reeder, Case No. 3,356; Meyer v. Delaware R. Const. Co., 100 U. S. 473; Woolridge v. McKenna, 8 Fed. 666; Re Iowa & M. Const. Co., 10 Fed. 405.]

2. Where an action at law removed under said act is at issue when removed, no other or different pleadings are necessary than those in the state court.

[This was an action by the Merchants' & Manufacturers' National Bank against George M. Wheeler. Heard on motion to remand cause to the state court.]

Stillman K. Wightman, for plaintiffs.

Thomas M. Wheeler, for defendant.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The defendant's first application to remove the cause seems to have been abandoned on account of defects supposed to exist in the papers presented to the state court. The subsequent application, which is to be regarded as made on the 27th of April, 1875, avoided the defects of the papers used on the prior application. The rule being now settled, that the application, if sufficient, by law is effectual to remove the cause, however it may be disposed of by the state court, the question now is whether the defendant was in time under the act of March 3d, 1875 (18 Stat. 470). The act was passed after the commencement of the March circuit, and the application was made during the succeeding circuit term, and before the actual trial of the cause. If, therefore, the statute means, by the phrase "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried," a term occurring after the passage of the act, then, beyond question, the application was in time. That such is the meaning of the statute many considerations concur to prove. The act defines anew the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, making it substantially as extensive as the constitution permits, excepting cases where the supreme court has original jurisdiction. It then proceeds to declare, in substance, that every civil suit of which original jurisdiction might be taken by the circuit court, shall, if brought in a state court, be removable into the circuit court, whether then pending or thereafter brought. This is the grant of authority, and it defines the subjects on which it is to operate, as all suits, pending or to be brought. All are to be removable. What follows is merely detail as to the manner in which the power is to be exercised. It should receive a construction in harmony with the grant of power. By section 3, the party seeking a removal, is to apply "before or at the term at which said cause could be first tried." If this is taken to mean a term which occurred before the passage of the law, it to that extent renders nugatory the provision making all suits removable, and excludes from the privilege that large number of cases in which a term at which the cause could be tried had previously passed by. There is no reason for such a distinction, and the clause should be construed to relate to a term occurring after the act in question became a law. The question has been examined and decided in the same way by Judge Swing, of the Southern district of Ohio, in Andrews v. Garrett [Case No. 375].

I consider this cause as removed to this court according to law, and the motion to remand it should be denied.

A motion is also made to set aside, as irregular, a rule entered in the common rule book, on the defendant's motion, requiring the plaintiffs to file and serve a copy of the declaration, or be non-prossed. The cause was at issue in the state court, and a copy of the record there had been entered in the circuit court, as the statute requires, and then the statute goes on to prescribe, that, "the said copy being entered, as aforesaid, in said circuit court of the United States, the cause shall then proceed in the same manner as if it had been originally commenced in the said circuit court." As the mode of pleading in this state is the same in the United States courts as in the state courts, in actions other than in equity or admiralty, by force of section 914 of the Revised Statutes, no other or different pleadings were necessary than those in the state court, and the rule entered was, therefore, irregular. Lewis v. Gould [Case No. 8,324].

These rules must, on the plaintiffs' motion, be set aside.

BANKRUPTCY—ACT OF — STATE PROCEEDINGS IN INSOLVENCY—JURISDICTION EXCLUSIVE—DUTY IN INSOLVENCY—PAYMENTS THEREAFTER.

1. A fire insurance company is clearly within the scope and provisions of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

2. The appointment by a state court of a receiver to take possession of the property and assets of the corporation is "a taking on legal process" within the meaning of the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act.

3. It is not a valid objection to the jurisdiction of this court that the proceedings in the state court were in accordance with a general statute of the state, and part of its organic law, and that the state court had first obtained jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter. Such a construction would effectually defeat the operation of the bankrupt law.

[Cited in Re Safe-Deposit & Savings Inst., Case No. 12,211; Re New Amsterdam Fire Ins. Co., Id. 10,140.]

4. Nor is it a valid objection that the state statute under which the proceedings were instituted is not an insolvent law. If the fact of insolvency exists, and the corporation is within the provisions of the bankrupt law, this court has exclusive jurisdiction, and the fact that the state law does not purport to relieve the bankrupt from his debts, cannot be urged as a reason why the state court should hold the assets and administer the estate.

[Cited in Re Brinkman, Case No. 1,884.]

5. Though the proceedings in the state court may have been within its powers and jurisdiction, yet when the fact of bankruptcy intervenes the exclusive jurisdiction of this court attaches.

[Cited in Re Safe-Deposit & Savings Inst., Case No. 12,211; Re Green Pond R. Co., Id. 5,786; Re Hathorn, Id. 6,214.]

6. When the corporation found itself insolvent, it should have at once filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy; and failure so to do, and acquiescence in the proceedings against it by the state court, is itself an act of bankruptcy.

7. The payment by the corporation, when actually insolvent, of the rent necessary to preserve a valuable lease, is an act of bankruptcy; and although such payment was judicious, and made in good faith, and such an act as would have been authorized by this court, these facts do not change the character of the act under the law.

In bankruptcy. The petitioning creditor in this case, the Singer Manufacturing Company, filed a petition in bankruptcy against the Merchants' Insurance Company, on an indebtedness upon a policy of insurance issued by the latter company, upon which loss was sustained on the 9th of October, 1871, and the chief act of bankruptcy alleged is that said insurance company, being insolvent, did on the 6th day of November, 1871, suffer its property to be taken on legal process, under certain proceedings instituted by the attorney general of Illinois, in the circuit court of Cook county, pursuant to the twenty-third section of the statute of that state approved March 11th, 1869, entitled, "An act to incorporate and govern fire and marine insurance companies, etc." The answer of the insurance company admitted the substantial facts alleged in the petition, and submitted to the court whether those facts constitute an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the law.

Eldridge & Tourtellotte, for petitioner.
McCagg, Fuller & Culver, for respondent.

Before DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge, and BLODGETT, District Judge.

BLODGETT, District Judge. The respondent is a corporation, created under a special charter granted by the legislature of Illinois in 1861, and since 1863 up to about the 6th of November last, said company has been engaged in doing a fire and marine insurance business, pursuant to the powers granted in its act of incorporation, having its principal office in the city of Chicago. By reason of the losses sustained by said company from the great fire which occurred in this city on the 9th of October last, said company became insolvent, and on the 31st of October last the people of the state of Illinois, by the attorney general of the state, filed their bill of complaint in the circuit court of Cook county, pursuant to the 23d section of the general insurance law of this state, alleging in substance that said company had become insolvent and unable to pay its liabilities, and that its assets were insufficient to justify the continuance of said company in business, and praying that said corporation might be dissolved, and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of its assets; and on the 6th of November last the officers of said company, fearing that judgments might be obtained in certain suits then pending against the company, and the plaintiffs in such suits thereby obtain an undue preference over other creditors, consented to the appointment of a receiver by said court in accordance with said bill, and W. E. Doggett, Esq., was accordingly appointed such receiver, and the company has since delivered over to him all its assets and property. No charge of willful or intended fraud is brought against the corporation or its officers, it being conceded that its officers and managers are among the most upright and capable of our citizens, and that the present insolvency of the company results from circumstances beyond the control of those in charge of its affairs.

Upon these admitted facts we are called upon to adjudicate. There can be no doubt, or at least we have none, that this corporation is one of that class of corporations intended to be within the scope and provisions of the general bankrupt law. The 37th section declares that "the provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed business or commercial corporations and joint stock companies." The business of insurance, for the carrying on of which this company was incorporated and in which it has been engaged, is clearly included within the definitions given by the statute.

The object and intent of the general bankrupt law is to place the administration of the affairs of insolvent persons and corporations exclusively under the jurisdiction of the federal courts sitting as courts of bankruptcy; and the enactment of the general bankrupt law now in force suspended all actions and proceedings under state insolvent laws. Com. v. O'Hara [6 Phila. 402]; Perry v. Langley [Case No. 11,006]; Van Nostrand v. Carr [30 Md. 128]; Martin v. Berry [37 Cal. 208].

It also seems clear to us that the appointment of a receiver by the state court to take possession of the property and assets of the person, firm, or corporation, and apply the same to the payment of debts, is a "taking on legal process," within the meaning of the 8th clause of the 39th section of the bankrupt act. The receiver of a court of chancery is its executive officer, as much so, to all intents and purposes, as a sheriff of a court of law; and the goods or property in his hands are as much in the custody of the law as if levied upon under an execution or attachment. Indeed, the purpose for which the receiver in this case takes the property is the same as that of a sheriff in making his levy, except that the scope of the receiver's warrant is more comprehensive, he being required to pay all debts, while the sheriff only seeks the payment of the specific debt mentioned in his execution or attachment.

Although I am not aware that this particular point has ever before been raised in this court, it has often been decided elsewhere.

But it is objected that the proceedings in the state court here complained of being in accordance with a general statute of this state and part of the organic law by which the respondent exists, and being predicated mainly upon the reserved right of the state to protect its citizens against irresponsible insurance companies, and the state court having acquired jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, this court cannot now interfere as a bankrupt court and take charge of and administer the assets in question, although the insolvency of the respondent is fully conceded.

It seems enough to suggest, in answer to this position, that if correct, any state could effectually defeat the operation of any bankrupt law passed by congress by simply providing that any person or corporation, if deemed insolvent or incapable of doing business by a state officer, might, under the power of exercising and enforcing police regulations or enactments by the states, be wound up, and its assets administered upon, in the state courts, notwithstanding such person or corporation might be insolvent and guilty of all the acts of bankruptcy provided for in the general bankrupt law.

It is further urged that the proceeding in question does not come within the terms of the bankrupt act, because the state law under which it is instituted is not an insolvent law inasmuch as it does not purport to discharge the debtor from its liabilities; but we fail to perceive how the treatment the debtor may receive at the hands of the state court can avail to sustain that court's control over the assets. If the fact of insolvency exists and the person or corporation is within the provisions of the bankrupt law, the federal courts sitting in bankruptcy have exclusive jurisdiction of his property, and the fact that a state law does not purport or attempt to relieve the debtor from his debts cannot, it seems to us, be urged as a reason why the state court should hold the assets and administer them after proper proceedings in bankruptcy have been instituted in the federal courts.

We might further answer this objection by the suggestion that a discharge of an insurance company's liabilities under this state statute and proceedings in the state courts would be, in the nature of things, superfluous and unnecessary, for the reason that the main object of the proceeding is to forfeit the charter and franchises of the corporation, and why assume to discharge from further liability a debtor whose legal entity is to be dissolved? If its corporate existence is to be terminated it matters little what becomes of its unpaid balances.

It also seems clear to us that in so far as a state law attempts to administer on the effects of an insolvent debtor and distribute them among creditors, it is to all intents and purposes an insolvent law, although it may not authorize a discharge of the debtor from further liability on its debts.

We have no doubt that the proceeding in the state court to forfeit the charter and corporate franchises of this company is entirely valid and within the powers and jurisdiction of that court, perhaps exclusively so. The state having created the corporation may undoubtedly dissolve it in its own way, consistent with the terms of the grant.

The fallacy of the respondent's argument seems to us to consist in the assumption that because the state court had jurisdiction for the dissolution of the corporation, it can therefore hold jurisdiction under all circumstances for the distribution of the assets. If the fact of insolvency had not existed, and no act of bankruptcy had been committed, the state court would probably have had the right to administer the assets if once within its control, as an incident to the principal object to the proceeding which was the dissolution of the corporation. But, as before stated, when insolvency, or other facts, intervene so as to make the debtor a proper subject for the operation of the bankrupt act, the exclusive jurisdiction of the bankrupt court attaches, and the state court and those acting under its mandate must surrender the control of the assets, whatever may be the final decree in regard to the continuance of the corporation. When the corporation found itself insolvent, or was certified to be insolvent by the state auditor, acting under the state law, and proceedings were instituted for the dissolution of the corporation and the administration of its assets, it was the duty of the corporation at once to voluntarily file its petition to be adjudged a bankrupt in the federal court, and its failure to do so, and its acquiescence in the proceedings by which its assets were placed under the control of the state court, is in itself an act of bankruptcy.

This is not a case of concurrent jurisdiction between the state and federal courts. In all cases where the state and federal courts have concurrent jurisdiction, the court which first obtains control of the parties and property by judicial proceedings will retain it, and the authorities cited by the counsel from the 8th Howard, and later cases, are full in point, but we conceive they do not apply to this case, inasmuch as this court has exclusive jurisdiction in cases of bankruptcy. In our view, then, the admitted facts show the respondent guilty of the act of bankruptcy charged in the petition, and nothing in the proceedings had before the state court tends to oust this court of its jurisdiction and authority to adjudicate the respondent a bankrupt.

The precise steps by which the officers of this court shall hereafter obtain possession of the assets of the bankrupt need not now be indicated, as the action of this court in that regard will be governed by circumstances as they may hereafter arise.

In thus announcing our conclusions, we do not consider that we are adopting any new rule, or making even a new application of an old one, as the pathway we are treading appears to us to be well beaten by precedents and authority. Nor should we have taken pains to so fully state our views but for the fact that the overwhelming calamity which befel this city on the 9th of October last, brought financial ruin upon a large number of insurance companies doing business here, and makes it seem desirable that a tolerably full exposition should be given of the law governing the rights and duties of insurers and insured.

It is also proper to add that the petition in this case charges a further act of bankruptcy —in that said insurance company, on or about the 31st day of October last, being then insolvent, paid one of its creditors in full, thereby giving such creditor a preference over other creditors. And it is admitted in the answer that after the company became insolvent a large sum of money fell due one Tuthill King for rent of the lot on which the company had erected a valuable building; and as this lease was deemed a valuable asset, and would be forfeited unless the rent was paid at maturity, the company paid the same, deeming that it was thereby subserving the best interests of its creditors.

We have no doubt but what the admitted facts applicable to this charge make out a technical act of bankruptcy. But no stress was laid upon it in the argument, as all parties seemed desirous of a decision upon the other charges.

The expenditure complained of seems to have been judicious and made in good faith, and this court would probably, on the facts stated, have authorized it, but this does not change the character of the act under the law.

It was undoubtedly a preference, and as such, a technical act of bankruptcy. An order of adjudication will be entered as prayed in the petition.

Suffering property to be taken under an order of the state court, appointing a receiver in an action instituted by the attorney general of the state to dissolve the corporation, is an act of bankruptcy. In re Washington Marine Ins. Co. [Case No. 17,246].

BANKRUPTCY—MEETING OF CREDITORS—NOTICE—ACTION OF—RULES OF PROCEEDING—ASSIGNEE'S ACCOUNTS—EXTRA ALLOWANCE.

1. A notice to creditors that a meeting would be held at a specified time and place for the purposes named in the 27th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 529)], and that a final dividend would be declared, is a sufficient notice to authorize such meeting to make a final disposition of the estate.

2. Where the assignee's accounts and vouchers have been filed with the register, a reasonable time before such final meeting, the meeting may by vote properly dispense with the reading of them, and the exhibition of the vouchers, nor have individual creditors the right then to insist upon such reading or exhibition.

3. In the absence of specific provisions of law on any point, creditors' meetings are properly guided by the rules and usages of parliamentary bodies.

4. A creditors' meeting has no power over the accounts or fees of the assignee, but if the register submits them to such a meeting, their action will be regarded by the register and court, unless there exist grave reasons to the contrary.

5. The register has no authority to allow an extra compensation to the assignee, even after a vote by the creditors' meeting. The proper practice is to apply to the court for such extra allowance previous to the final meeting.

BLODGETT, District Judge. At the request of W. H. Sisson and J. N. Witherell,

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

H. N. Hibbard, Esq., one of the registers of this court, to whom this case is referred, has certified to the court twelve questions touching the powers and duties of the register in the conduct of creditors' meetings. I do not propose to answer these questions seriatim, as they all practically relate to a few points of practice stated in different phases, and several of the questions seem to be purely speculative, and no direct or categorical answer is deemed necessary for a solution of the points raised in the case.

On the first of October last, an order of court was duly entered on the application of the assignee for a general meeting of the creditors of the bankrupt to be held before Mr. Hibbard, register, on the second day of November last, for the purposes named in the 27th and 28th sections of the bankrupt law. Due notice of the time, place and purpose of the meeting was given by the assignee, and the notice also stated that at said meeting a final dividend would be declared. The assignee reported to the meeting an account of his receipts and expenditures as such assignee, but on motion of Mr. Sisson, the meeting adjourned to the 24th of November, and the assignee was directed by the register to prepare and file in the register's office on or before the 16th of November, a full itemized account of his receipts and payments, for the purpose of being examined by the creditors. The assignee, in pursuance of said order, did, on the 16th of November, file said itemized account, with the register, verified by oath, and the vouchers pertaining thereto, and the same remained in the register's office until the day to which said meeting was adjourned, subject to the inspection of all persons interested. The adjourned meeting was held, pursuant to adjournment, on the 24th of November, but was not attended by a majority in number and amount of all the creditors who had proved their debts. At this meeting the itemized account of the assignee was produced and the items for assignee's services, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $10,500, discussed by the creditors present, that being the only element of the assignee's account to which any exception seems to have been taken. After the matter had been fully discussed, the register, for the purpose of obtaining the sense of the creditors present, upon the charges of the assignee, submitted to the meeting a motion made by a creditor, to the effect that the accounts and charges of the assignee as presented be approved, to which action of the register in the submission of said motion to the meeting, Mr. Sisson and Mr. Witherell objected; but, notwithstanding their objections, the register put the motion to the meeting, and the same was passed by a large majority of the creditors present. Said Sisson then insisting that he had had no time to examine the assignee's account, the meeting was again adjourned until the 27th of November. On the 27th a further meeting was held, pursuant to adjournment, at which meeting the assignee commenced to read his itemized account, whereupon Mr. Sisson moved that the voucher for each item of said account should be produced and exhibited to the meeting by the assignee. It was then stated that the vouchers numbered over 8,500, which statement was conceded to be substantially true. Some of the creditors present then objected to Mr. Sisson's motion, on the ground that he had had ample time for the examination of the accounts and vouchers, and that one adjournment had been had expressly for the purpose of enabling him to examine said accounts, and that he had made such examination; and it was claimed that Mr. Sisson should point out or indicate the items of the account to which he objected. Mr. Sisson refusing to specify any particular item of the account as objectionable, and insisting on the reading of the account and vouchers in detail, a motion was made to dispense with the reading and approve the accounts of the assignee, including his charges for fees and expenses, which, although objected and excepted to by Mr. Sisson and Mr. Witherell, was put to the meeting by the register and almost unanimously adopted; after which proceedings the register audited and approved said assignee's account, except as to the charges for register's fees, the register having examined said account and vouchers and satisfied himself of its correctness.

To this action of the register in submitting to the meeting these various motions for approving the assignee's charges for fees and expenses, and dispensing with the reading of the accounts and vouchers, and approving the same against the objections of Mr. Sisson and Mr. Witherell, they except, and request the opinion of the court as to the regularity of these proceedings.

The order of court calling this meeting directed it to be held for the purposes of a final dividend. The notice of the assignee seems to have stated that the meeting would be held for the purposes named in section 27 of the bankrupt law, instead of stating that it would be held for the purposes named in sections 27 and 28; but it also stated that a final dividend would be declared, and as all creditors must be presumed to have known that this was not the first dividend meeting, it seems to me the business of making a final disposition of the affairs of the estate and declaring a final dividend was properly and legally before the meeting. One of the preliminaries to the making of such dividend, is the auditing of the assignee's account. The law and rules devolve the duty of passing and auditing the assignee's account upon the register, and the uniform practice by the register of this court has been to submit the assignee's accounts to the creditors' meeting for examination, discussion, explanation and approval before the same was audited, a practice which has always seemed to me eminently just and fair toward all parties interested. Perhaps by the strict letter of the law the assignee's accounts need not be submitted to the creditors' meeting before auditing, but there can certainly be no harm in it, and I am not disposed to change the practice in that regard. The creditors are entitled, before the assignee's accounts are finally approved, to a full examination of the same, and there seems no occasion so appropriate as the duly called dividend meetings for such examination and discussion. In this case the account presented on the first assembly of the creditors pursuant to this call does not seem to have been in strict compliance with the rules, at least on objection being made an itemized account with all vouchers was ordered to be filed by the 16th of November in the register's office, and the meeting was adjourned until the 24th. The account and vouchers were filed within the time limited, and all creditors had opportunity to examine the same as fully as they chose for the eight days intervening before the adjourned meeting was held, and some creditors appear to have availed themselves of their privilege. The account was a very long one, involving the collection and disbursement of over $500,000, and the administration and winding up of the affairs of one of the largest insurance companies existing in this city at the time of the great fire. The vouchers were necessarily numerous.

The only items specifically objected to by any creditor were those charged by the assignee for his own compensation, and no one objected to these except Messrs. Sisson and Witherell. At the first meeting this item was discussed, and after discussion, a motion was made that the meeting approve the charge and the register took the vote of the creditors present or represented at the meeting on the question.

The meeting, also, on motion dispensed with the reading of the assignee's account and vouchers in detail, although Mr. Sisson and Mr. Witherell insisted upon such reading. I can see no irregularity in this. Neither the bankrupt law nor the rules under it, nor the usages of parliamentary bodies, by which creditors' meetings are properly guided, in the absence of specific provisions of law on any point, require that the entire body of creditors attending a meeting, shall sit and hear read the report and accounts of the assignee, unless they choose to do so, to gratify the whim or caprice of one or two creditors. If the majority of those present at the meeting see fit to dispense with the reading they can undoubtedly do so. Ample opportunity should be given all creditors to examine and object to the assignee's accounts, but that does not require that those who do not wish to make such examination, or have already made it to their own satisfaction, should sit through a creditors' meeting to hear those accounts read in detail.

In this case the only objection which took any specific form, or was even worthy of attention, was in regard to the items for assignee's fees and charges, and it was peculiarly appropriate that the register should take the views of the creditors present or represented as to those items. Not that he or the court was necessarily to be governed by the vote in finally passing the assignee's accounts. Yet the item being large and it being presumable that many of the creditors had information in regard to the nature and value of the assignee's services, their judgment on the question is certainly of weight, and the expression of a large majority should not, except for grave reasons, be overruled.

When there is a majority in value of the creditors of an estate present, the action of the meeting, or of a majority of such a meeting, should be as far as possible regarded in any matter resting in the discretion of the court or register, such as the allowing of extra compensation to the assignee. The passing of the general accounts of the assignee and settling his fees as allowed by law are, however, matters with which the creditors' meeting has nothing to do except so far as the register sees fit to submit them to the meeting for advice or information. Nor does it make any difference whether there is a majority in number or value of the creditors present or represented at such meeting. It is just as proper to take the sense of those present on any of these questions as if all were present. The meeting is a legal meeting, and what is done by those present is as binding as if all the creditors were present. Neither a minority nor majority can audit the assignee's accounts; that is the duty of the register.

The real grievance, if I properly understand these proceedings and objections, consists in the fact that the assignee charged $2,500 more than his legal fees, and the register, after said charge had been approved by the creditors present, approved the account including this item.

By the 27th and 28th sections of the bankrupt law, assignees besides being allowed certain specific fees may be allowed a reasonable compensation for their services in the discretion of the court. This allowance of extra compensation is no part of the duty of the creditors' meeting nor of the register, but is to be allowed by the court in the exercise of its judicial discretion in view of the nature of the duties performed by the assignee and the degree of compensation he has already received from the regular fees. But for the purpose of determining the propriety of such an allowance, it is eminently proper that the question of its fairness should be, if practicable, submitted to the creditors in some form. If it is charged into his general account which creditors have had an opportunity to examine, and no objections are made, or if submitted to a creditors' meeting and sanctioned by an almost unanimous vote of the creditors present, such action would have great weight with me in determining the propriety and amount of the allowance, and if the meeting was largely attended I should consider the vote in favor of the allowance almost potential.

The certificate in this case shows that the register allowed and audited the assignee's entire claim after taking the vote of the meeting. In this I think he erred. The proper practice I think would be where an assignee claims extra allowance for him to apply to the court for such allowance previous to the final meeting, and the court, on hearing the application, can allow such amount as the facts justify, which would then be properly chargeable as an item in the assignee's account to be reported to the meeting and audited by the register.

The practice, however, in this district has heretofore been to submit the entire claim of the assignee to the creditors at the final meeting, and if approved by a majority, the register passed the account without submitting it to the court. I do not intend by what I have said to disturb any settlements of assignee's accounts which have been made and passed unchallenged, but only to indicate a practice for the future, and to say that in this case leave will be given the assignee to present his claim for extra allowance at any time before the dividend is paid.

Case No. 9,443.

MERCHANTS' INS. CO. v. McCARTNEY.

[1 Lowell, 447; [1] 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 122.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1870.

TAXES—ON INCOMES—BANK DIVIDENDS—ACCRUED BEFORE PASSAGE OF ACT—ASSESSED AS CAPITAL.

1. An insurance company being a stockholder in a bank received a dividend from the bank, three-tenths of which was made out of profits accumulated before the passage of the first act for collecting internal revenue, and seven-tenths from profits acquired afterwards. The bank more than five years before this case was tried had paid the revenue tax on the seven-tenths and denied a liability to taxation for the three-tenths, and it had never been enforced. Held, the three-tenths was capital and not liable to assessment as income under Act June 30, 1864, § 116, etc., 13 Stat. 281.

2. The seven-tenths having been once assessed to the bank could not be again assessed to the insurance company.

The plaintiffs owned stock in the Suffolk bank, and as such stockholders received $115,200 as their share of an extra dividend declared by the bank January 3, 1865; of which they carried the fifteen thousand, odd, to their surplus fund, and declared a dividend among their own stockholders of the remainder. Of the dividend declared by the bank, about three-tenths consisted of profits laid aside before the passage of the first internal revenue law, and of profits of sales of real estate bought before that time; and on the remaining seven-tenths the bank paid a tax of five per cent to the government, but denied their liability for the three-tenths, and it had never been exacted of them. The defendant [W. H. McCartney, collector] collected of the plaintiffs against their protest a tax of five per cent upon the whole sum so received by them, and the question presented by the agreed facts here was whether such tax was lawfully assessed.

S. Bartlett and F. W. Palfrey, for plaintiffs.
J. C. Ropes, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The revenue act under which this assessment was made is that of June 30, 1864, and especially sections 116–121, 13 Stat. 281, etc.

Section 120, p. 283, levies the duty on all dividends thereafter declared due as part of the earnings, income, or gains of any insurance company, and on all undistributed sum or sums made or added during the year to their surplus or contingent funds. In other words, it assesses the net annual income or gains of such corporations, whether they choose to divide them or to add them to their funds. And it provides in section 117 that in estimating the annual gains, profits, or income of any person there shall be deducted the income derived from dividends on shares in banks, &c., which shall have been assessed to and the tax paid by the corporations. And in section 121 that when any dividend is made which includes any part of the surplus or contingent fund of any bank, insurance company, &c., on which a duty has been paid, the amount of duty so paid on the fund may be deducted from the duty on the dividends.

The plaintiffs contend that no part of the dividend paid them by the bank was liable to assessment in their hands, because, as to the three-tenths, it was not income, and as to the seven-tenths it had already paid the tax.

As to the three-tenths it seems to me to have been a division of capital, a return to the plaintiffs in money of a part of the property which was already in their ownership as capital stock when the first tax act was passed. If the Suffolk bank had been wholly wound up, and had returned to its stockholders the exact value of their shares in money, having made no profits since the passage of the original act, this sum of money could not be taxed as income, gains, or profits; and so of a part. If the plaintiffs on receiving the money chose to divide it among their own stockholders, still it is not a dividend out of gains and profits, nor out of the surplus funds, because the surplus funds that are taxable, are those which are or have been made out of profits, since the passage of the act. This view appears to have been acquiesced in by the government, for they have neglected for some five years to enforce the opposite construction against the bank; and if this money was capital in the hands of the bank it was still capital when it reached the stockholders. The tax is assessed on the bank for convenience, but is intended to be, in effect, a tax on the shareholders; and if the latter be not assessable for the income tax it cannot be levied on the corporation. Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 262.

There is more difficulty in that part of the case which relates to the seven-tenths. The plaintiff corporation is bound to pay on its net "income earnings or gains," whether divided or added to its funds, and so the argument must apply equally to the sum divided and to that carried to the surplus fund, it being admitted that it was not needed to pay losses or expenses [in their own business; because it appears that the whole of it has been appropriated either to the dividend or the surplus fund. And this was assumed by both sides at the argument.][2] So the question simply is: Does such a dividend on which the tax has once been paid form part of the income of the plaintiffs in the sense of section 120? It is not exempted by the proviso of section 121, above cited, for that merely means that if a corporation has once paid the tax on its gains when turned over to the surplus fund it shall not pay again when it divides that fund.

It is equally clear that sections 116 and 117 do not refer to the incomes of corporations, because the mode of assessment, the exemptions of six hundred dollars rent of homestead, &c., and the increasing rate of tax on larger and larger incomes, are all incompatible with such a reference.

The real point seems to me to be whether in estimating the income of a corporation we are to take the analogy of section 117. For instance, in relation to the three-tenths which I have held to be capital, I have in fact followed the rule of section 117, though I did not refer to that section because it seemed to me the result was the same upon any fair meaning of the word income. Now supposing the question were whether interest on government bonds, or interest accrued but not actually received, &c., is to be included in the income of a corporation, might we properly refer to sections 116 and 117 to see what is income. After much reflection I am satisfied that we are bound to make such a reference, and to take those sections as our guide in ascertaining the meaning of income in the statute. The general intent of the legislature not to tax incomes twice is clear, and so is the injustice of such taxation; but my decision rests mainly on this: The intent of congress was to tax the income of the shareholders of the Suffolk bank by a tax levied directly upon the bank. The income of these plaintiffs has been so taxed. I am not ready to believe that it was intended that the same income should be again returned to the government for a new taxation, merely because it passed through another corporation before reaching the individual owners.

This conclusion I should reach, I think, without aid from section 117, and although that section contained no express exemption. But when I find that exemption it strengthens the argument because it shows what the law regards as taxable income. It was argued that this net dividend must be income because the statute of 1865 (13 Stat. 479) requires that such a dividend shall be returned as income. But the same law declares that the tax which has been paid on such a dividend shall be deducted from the tax that would otherwise be assessed on the shareholder's income. It was required to be returned because it ought to be counted in ascertaining the aggregate income, which as the law then stood, was assessable at a higher rate than five per cent if it exceeded five thousand dollars. That amendment was passed some two months after this tax was assessed, and if the argument be good that such dividends are income since that time because of the amendment, I see not why it does not hold equally good to take them out of the income account before that act was passed, or to take them out of the class of assessable income if they have been once assessed.

I do not base my judgment upon the ground that the plaintiff corporation is a mere agent or trustee for its own shareholders in receiving and paying out this dividend. I do not understand that to be so in fact or in law. But I do decide that the plaintiff corporation itself, as a shareholder in the Suffolk bank, is not bound to treat this dividend on which the income tax has been paid, as income liable to assessment again by the government, [and this] [2] whether it found it necessary to use the dividend in one way or another, [whether to pay taxes, expenses, or dividends. It is exempted from the income account. In accordance with the agreement of the parties, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiff for the full amount of $5,760 and interest and costs.][2]

SALVAGE—FRAUDULENT COMPACT WITH OFFICERS.

[Money received from salvors by the officers of a wrecked vessel while the salved property was in their care, though given in charity, may be recovered by the owners and insurers, the receipt of such gift being incompatible with their duties.]

[This was a libel in personam by the Merchants' Insurance Company of Boston and others against Asa Seller.]

[2] [From 12 Int. Rev. Rec. 122.]

Libel in behalf of the owners and insurers of the ship Bombay and cargo, against Asa Seller, the first mate of that ship, to recover a sum of money alleged to have been paid to him by the salvors of the vessel, which got on shore, and was carried into Key West in February, 1838. The libel charged that $1,000 was so paid to the captain, $300 to the first mate, and $200 to the second mate; that it was paid in pursuance of a corrupt understanding between the salvors and officers, and with a view to influence the testimony of the latter, and to inflame the salvage, &c. The captain paid the amount received by him, when demanded by the agent of the insurers. The second mate, being out of the country, was not served with process, and the suit proceeded against the first mate alone. He filed an answer, admitting the receipt of the money, but denying any fraud or agreement between him and the salvors, and alleging that the money was given him from motives of compassion, and in consideration of his unfortunate condition.

THE COURT gave judgment for the libelants, for the sum received by that officer, three hundred dollars and costs. The reception of the alleged sums of money from the salvors, by the officers of the wrecked ship, under the circumstances in which the property committed to their charge was placed, was holden by THE COURT to be altogether inexcusable. The transaction was pronounced to be of novel and exceptional character; that, with the aspect of charity and benignant consideration, it placed the officers of the ship in a position in reference to the claims of salvage, then in controversy, incompatible with their dutiful relations to the ship and cargo, and to owners and underwriters.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK v. LITTLE ROCK.

[5 Dill. 299.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Arkansas. 1878.[2]

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—LIABILITY ON BONDS—ILLEGAL SCRIP—VALID DEBTS.

The city of Little Rock, in payment of valid debts against the city, issued bonds in the similitude of bank-bills, in violation of statutes of the state, one of which prohibited the making or receiving of such paper. Afterwards the city called in and cancelled these illegal bonds, and issued in their place other bonds, which were unobjectionable in form: Held, that the city was liable on these latter bonds to holders thereof who had not participated in the issue of the illegal bonds, although they had notice of all the facts of the transaction.

At law.

Mr. McClure, for plaintiff.

Mr. Rose, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and CALDWELL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge (orally). This action is brought to recover on certain bonds of the city, numbered from 1 to 156, issued in 1874, under the power conferred by section 3294, Gantt's Dig. There is also a common count, based upon the same cause of action; and then another claim for an account known as the "ledger" account, which is in the nature of an acknowledgment of the liability of the city under the ordinance of October 30th, 1874.

It seems that the city, being indebted, and wanting to borrow money to pay such indebtedness and defray the necessary current expenses of the city government, in January of 1867, by the action of its council, resolved to borrow the sum of $100,000, specifying that $50,000 was for the establishment of schools, and $50,000 for other purposes.

Mr. Wassell, who was a member of the city council, testifies that at the time of the consideration of the question of the form in which the city could issue her obligations, this form of issuing the obligations of the city was deemed the most expedient—that is, to issue her obligations for money in the form of bonds. They could not, he said, issue money; they could, and did, issue bonds; and that they were advised by the city attorney that they had the power to do so.

The bonds which were issued were issued in denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100. The bonds were engraved with vignette, on colored paper, and in form and appearance very nearly resembling the ordinary greenback or bank-bill. The bonds in this form, purporting to be Little Rock city bonds, running for periods of from one to ten years, amounted, in the aggregate, to $100,000.

Here is the form of the bond: "Ten years after date, the city of Little Rock will pay five dollars to bearer, with interest at the rate of eight per cent per annum at maturity. Little Rock, Arkansas, July 22d, 1867." (Signed by the recorder and by the mayor.)

These bonds were paid out by the city for various classes of ordinary indebtedness. A portion of this money was expended under the direction of the city council—$3,500 to pay for the lot on which stands the present city hall, and $17,500 for the erection of the present city hall; $6,000 went to pay overdue coupons on bonds issued by the city, under legislative authority, in aid of the Memphis and Little Rock Railroad Company; $4,000 to put up the Peabody schoolhouse; $6,000 was appropriated and went to pay the interest on those Memphis bonds; $3,600 to grade Markham street; $2,000 for culverts, and $5,000 and $2,000 for improvement of Ferry street; $2,000 to purchase cemetery grounds; $3,600 for the fire department; $8,000 for improving and extending the public landings; $2,000 and $4,000 for school sites; and from $1,500 to $1,700 per month was paid out on audited claims against the city for police services, salaries of city officers, gas, etc. It was paid out to persons who were creditors of the city, for property sold to it, or for materials furnished or labor performed for it.

The evidence shows—and it is undisputed—that when claims were allowed against the city by the council, a warrant was drawn on the treasurer of the city in the usual form, and when the warrant was presented to the treasurer what were called "Little Rock City Bonds," on bank-note paper, were paid out by the city on those warrants—the warrant being taken up and this paper given out in exchange for it.

The city received it for taxes, in the payment of licenses and other dues, and it passed in and out of the city treasury frequently—if not generally put out again, it was reissued to some extent.

The evidence further shows—and it is an undisputed fact—that this paper, for a long period, was a very considerable portion of the circulating medium of the city; it was taken in and paid out by the merchants, bankers, and others; and the Merchants' National Bank, of Little Rock, received a very large amount of it. Undoubtedly it is true that a considerable portion of the bonds or claims sued on were for money of this character, termed "city bonds" or "city money," which the plaintiffs had received in the course of their business as bankers. The present plaintiff was not connected originally with the issuing of this money by the city; it was not issued to advance any scheme of the plaintiff, nor for any consideration furnished by it, nor by its procurement; nor was the plaintiff in anywise connected with the inception of it.

Afterwards the city council passed an ordinance by which they invited the holders of this paper to bring it in for cancellation, agreeing to issue to them new obligations of the city for the amount of the principal of those city bonds and the accrued interest thereon. The evidence shows (it is undisputed) that under that authority the present holders surrendered to the city the sum of $31,000, including accrued interest of $354.22. They were cancelled and destroyed by the city; and in lieu of the amount of them then due, the city issued a like amount of bonds, to-wit, the bonds in this suit. The plaintiffs also had some other paper, which they surrendered in like manner, and which was cancelled by the city, which acknowledged its indebtedness for the amount by giving plaintiff credit therefor on its ledger; and this is what is known as the "ledger account." The plaintiff shows that the new bonds were given for the principal and interest of the overdue bonds on bank-note paper, and the amount credited on the ledger account is for like bonds, and for which new bonds were not issued.

The city of Little Rock defends against this action, and its main defence is: The emission of these bonds in this form—on bank-note paper—and for the purposes in view (as it appears on their face that they were issued and circulated as money), was in direct violation of the statutes of the state in that regard, and, therefore, that the bonds thus issued were illegal and void, and that the new bonds issued in lieu thereof were also illegal, void and without consideration, the issuing of the original bonds having been in violation of the statutory provision, and, therefore, not imposing any legal obligation against the city.

This defence makes it necessary to inquire into the legislation on this subject in this state. I will, however, state, in this connection, that the court finds that the issuing of city bonds on bank-note paper, engraved with vignettes, in the similitude of greenbacks or bank-bills, in the denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100 notes, in connection with the undisputed fact that they formed for a considerable period the local circulating medium of the city and community, in lieu of currency, establishes that such bonds were issued for the purpose of circulating as money, in violation of the statutes of the state in that regard. But it is quite another question, and one not necessary to be decided in this case, whether the statutes of the state in reference thereto, and the expositions thereof by the supreme court of the state, declare that the city would not be held responsible to the holders of such bonds issued in payment of legal claims duly passed upon. I think it is better to refer to the legislation upon this subject chronologically, rather than in the order in which it is embodied in Gantt's Digest (chapter 19, p. 256). It would appear from the acts, that the state of Arkansas has for a long time had a very pronounced and decisive policy against the issue, by persons or by private or public corporations, of paper designed to pass as a circulating medium; and no one can say but that, in the light of experience, it is a wise policy.

The first act of the legislature upon the subject appears in the Revised Statutes of Arkansas of 1838 (page 674). It is entitled "Private Notes." No title to this act is given, but the title may be seen in another act afterwards passed, which went into effect February 14th, 1838 (section 5 of the act entitled "Change Tickets"; c. 24, p. 175, Rev. St.), and the title is in these words:

"Sec. 5. The act passed at this session of the general assembly, entitled 'An act to prevent the circulation of private notes in this state,' approved November 25th, 1837, shall take effect and be in force from and after the 1st day of March next."

This first act, entitled "Private Notes," was passed and approved November 25th, 1837, and went into effect on the 1st day of March, 1838; and it is an important consideration, in order to understand the legislative intention, that the act entitled "Change Tickets" was last passed, though first to go into effect.

The first act, in its 1st section, provides as follows: "No person or persons, unauthorized by law, shall intentionally create or put in circulation, as a circulating medium, any note, bill, bond, check, or ticket purporting that any money or bank-notes will be paid to the receiver, holder, or bearer, or that it will be received in payment of debts, or to be used as a currency or medium of trade in lieu of money."

The next section provides: "If any person or persons shall issue, put in circulation, sign, countersign, or endorse any such note, bill, bond, check, or ticket, he, she, or they so offending shall be indicted, and, being thereof convicted, shall be fined not less than $50 nor more than $300, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months."

Section 3 it is important to consider: "If any person or company vend, pass, receive, or offer in payment any such note, bill, bond, check, or ticket, he, she, or they so offending shall forfeit the sum of $50, to be recovered by action of debt, with costs, to the use of any person who will sue for the same before any justice of the peace of the county in which the party offending may be found.

Section 4: "The preceding section shall not affect any note issued by any bank authorized by law in the United States, except notes for less sums than $5."

Approved November 25th, 1837; in force March 1st, 1838.

Now, it will be observed that corporations, private or public, are not mentioned in this act. By the 1st section, the terms of prohibition are that no person or persons, unauthorized by law, shall issue or put in circulation this unauthorized currency. By section 21 of chapter 129 of the same Revised Statutes, it is provided that "when any subject matter, party, or person is described or referred to by words importing the singular number or the masculine gender, several matters and persons, and females as well as males, and bodies corporate as well as individuals, shall be deemed to be included;" and by section 24 of the same chapter it was further provided that, "for the purpose of construction, the Revised Statutes passed at the present session of the general assembly shall be deemed to have been passed on the same day, notwithstanding they may have been passed at different times. If any provisions of different statutes are repugnant to each other, that which shall have been last passed shall prevail, and so much of any prior provision as may be inconsistent with such last provision shall be deemed repealed thereby."

In a case some years after, the question arose in the supreme court of the state as to whether the word person, as used in the act approved November 25th, 1837, included corporations and municipal corporations; and the supreme court, in the case of Van Horne v. State, 5 Ark. 349, held that the word "person" did include corporations, public and private. If that is so, then we must hold this statute to read the same as though corporations had been expressly mentioned, for by construction the supreme court has incorporated the word "corporations" into the original statute; and when section 3 is read in the light of this construction, it provides not only if any person or persons, but also if any corporation or corporations, pass, receive, or offer in payment any of this illegal money, they are liable to a penalty, to be recovered by any person suing for it. And if this statute were without any modification, we have an interpretation by the supreme court of the state that corporations of all kinds, as well as private persons, are alike prohibited and liable to penalties; and not only to that effect, but the person who receives the money, or offers it in payment, is also made criminally subject to a penalty; so, while this statute provides against any person who shall put out a dangerous medium of circulation, if the law was still unmodified there would be some ground to claim, if it should be violated (and, unfortunately, all laws are violated), that the person who received and the person who attempted to offer it in payment were in pari delicto, for it is made criminal against him to issue it, it is equally made penal against you to receive it, and it is, therefore, equally in violation of the general purpose of the law, and there would be no right to recover under this act as it originally stood.

But before the session of the legislature closed, they passed another act (the act approved February 14th, 1838), which, in terms, refers to the subject matter of the previous act, and modified it by discriminating in favor of the person who holds the money in plain violation of the provisions of the law. [Rev. St. 1838, p. 175.] It reads (section 1): "The holder or owner of any change ticket, bill, or small note, issued for the purpose of change or otherwise, shall have the right to sue the drawer, issuer, or endorser of such change ticket, bill or bills, or small note or notes, before any justice of the peace in this state;" allowing him to recover the money, contrary to the prohibition of the prior act. We must conclude that subsequent consideration convinced the legislature that it was better not to punish the innocent receiver. Now, there can be no doubt, upon the original statutes, that the supreme court of the state, in Van Horne v. State, was correct; nor is there any doubt that there is any less principle involved in holding municipal corporations issuing this scrip, equally with individuals, liable to the innocent party not procuring it to be issued.

There is another act in support of the view I have just stated—the act of December 17th, 1838 [Laws 1838, p. 13], entitled "An act to prohibit the issuing of small bills, notes, or change tickets." The 1st section provides: "That from and after the passage of this act, it shall not be lawful for any city, town, or corporation whatever, within the state of Arkansas, to issue small bills or notes, commonly denominated change tickets or shin-plasters, unless specially authorized by law."

Section 2 provides: "That all persons, officers of such city, town, or corporation, or others, whose names shall be affixed to any such bills, notes, change tickets, or shin-plasters, issued in violation of this act, shall be individually responsible for the same."

This act extends the liability to all persons, officers of any corporation or town, or others, whose names shall be affixed. Private corporations would be liable; and if any of its officers put his name to such bills or change tickets, it imposes a personal liability on him.

Section 3 provides: "That the holders of any such bill, note, or change ticket, or shinplaster, issued in violation of this act, may sue for and recover in gold or silver the amount for which they purport to be payable, from the individuals whose names shall be affixed thereto, before any justice of the peace."

This act did two things: At the time it was passed, the Van Horne Case, in which the supreme court of the state held that municipal corporations were included in the first act, had not been decided, and this act removed any doubt as to whether municipal corporations, with others, were embraced within the inhibitions of the original act; and, secondly, it gave an additional remedy against the officers of the municipal corporation, making them also personally liable to the holder; but it did not take away any right or remedy given to the holder by the former act. Since the legislature chose to pass this special act relating to municipal corporations, it may be said the supreme court erred in deciding that corporations were included in the original act. But as between the legislature and the supreme court, the latter is the proper and the best interpreter of the meaning of previous acts of the legislature; and, besides, this last act had been passed and in force three or four years before the case of Van Horne v. State was decided.

Subsequently, in the case of Jones v. City of Little Rock, 25 Ark. 301, the court decided that the parties seeking relief were not the proper parties to apply for it, and, in delivering the opinion of the court, it was held that there was no right to issue this paper, and in the course of the opinion it is said that if it was issued contrary to law the city would not be liable for it.

The latter statement was clearly dictum, and it is claimed that so much of the opinion in Van Horne v. State as holds the city is liable for such issues is dictum also. If this is so, one dictum neutralizes or equals the other.

I cannot say that these decisions are conclusive in settling this statute, but it is clear to my mind that, although this paper was issued in violation of law, the legislature did not intend that the innocent holders of such paper should be held liable to the penalties imposed on those who receive it by the terms of the first act.

Upon the principles of law applicable to the subject, we are of opinion:

1. That the form and appearance of the city bonds, on bank-note paper, engraved with vignettes, in the similitude of greenbacks or bank-bills, and of the denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100, in connection with the undisputed fact that they did form, for a considerable period, a local circulating medium, and were used by the city and the community in lieu of currency, establishes that the said bonds were issued for the purpose of circulating as money, and in violation of the statutes of the state in that regard.

2. It is quite another question, and one not necessary to be decided in this case, and which we do not decide, whether, under the statutes last referred to, in view of the exposition thereof by the supreme court of the state, the holder of such bonds, if in nowise concerned in their illegal issue, and if they represented or were issued for a valid and legal claim against the city, could not recover thereon against the city. Nor is it necessary to determine whether the act of December 14th, 1875, has the effect to validate city money, so called, of the character of the bonds issued by the defendant city, known as city bonds, on bank-note paper.

3. The immediate consideration of the bonds in suit was the surrender by the plaintiff to the defendant of an equal amount, including interest, of what are styled "city bonds on bank-note paper," all of which last-named bonds were overdue at the time of such surrender, and of date prior to July 13th, 1868, and which were held and owned by the plaintiff at the time of such surrender, and which had been originally issued to other persons than the plaintiff, in exchange for or payment of the ordinary warrants of the city—issued to divers persons upon valid claims against the city, audited and allowed by the city council. The city bonds on bank-note paper thus held by the plaintiff were, at the instance of the city, surrendered to it, and destroyed by it, and the bonds in suit issued therefor. Assuming, but not deciding, that if in the hands of the plaintiff the said city bonds on bank-note paper could not have been enforced in an action directly on said bonds against the city, the court is of opinion that the bonds in suit, issued by the defendant in lieu of said bonds on bank-note paper (the last-named bonds having been originally issued under the circumstances above stated, for valid debts against the city to other creditors of the city than the plaintiff, and the plaintiff not having been connected with their issue), constitute a valid ground of action against the city, and the city is liable thereon to the plaintiff, although the said city bonds on bank-note paper were of such an appearance, and of such a form, as to be especially adapted to constitute a circulating medium, and were in fact used in and about the city as a local circulating medium in lieu of money.

4. There is also a claim against the city for the amount of certain city bonds, on bank-note paper, surrendered by the plaintiff to the city at its request, for which the city issued no new bonds, but placed the amount of the bonds surrendered by the plaintiff and destroyed by the city to the credit of the plaintiff on the ledger of the city. The same principles of law apply to this claim as to the claim on the new bonds.

5. Under the foregoing views there is no question of the statute of limitation in this case, although it is probable that, under the "call" made by the city in 1875, and the action taken thereunder, this defence would in no event be available to the city; but it is not necessary to rule the point.

The plaintiffs are entitled to judgment for the amount of the new bonds issued in lieu of the bonds surrendered, and the amount placed as the credit to the plaintiff on the ledger account of the city, which was introduced in evidence.

Judgment accordingly.

This judgment was affirmed in the supreme court. 98 U. S. 308. See subsequent opinion of state supreme court [unreported].

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK v. NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE.

[7 Am. Law Rev. 572.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1873.

BILLS OF LADING — ACCEPTANCE—SURRENDER BY BANK—LIABILITY.

At law.

Before SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge, and a jury.

This was an action against the defendants for negligence on surrendering upon acceptance, instead of holding for payment, three bills of lading, two of them attached to two thirty-day drafts, drawn by James H. Mulford, of Memphis, upon Green & Travis, of Boston, and one to a sight draft, drawn by S. M. Anderson & Co., upon the same parties, in June, 1870.

The plaintiffs offered evidence to show the drafts were drawn against cotton sold by the drawers of the drafts, and shipped to Messrs. Green & Travis; that the drafts were discounted by the plaintiff bank, and the railroad receipts attached to the drafts; that the plaintiff bank forwarded the drafts, with bills of lading attached, to their correspondent bank in New York (the Metropolitan National Bank); and that the Metropolitan National Bank forwarded the same to the defendant bank for acceptance and payment; that the defendant bank presented the drafts to Green & Travis for acceptance, and upon acceptance, delivered to them the bills of lading; and that Messrs. Green & Travis failed soon after (June 29, 1870), leaving the drafts unpaid. The defendants claimed that the bills of lading were attached to the drafts to secure their acceptance, and not their payment; and that, in the absence of instructions to hold for payment, the defendants were authorized to surrender the bills of lading upon acceptance. They also offered evidence to show that there was an agreement between Green & Travis and the parties of whom they purchased the cotton (Mulford & Anderson) that the bills of lading should be surrendered upon acceptance, and claimed that the plaintiff bank were bound by this agreement. It appeared that there were no instructions given to the defendants either by the plaintiff bank or the Metropolitan National Bank of New York concerning the drafts in question; but the defendants proved that instructions were given to them to hold one bill of lading attached to a large draft in December, 1869, and that this was the only instruction given.

THE COURT ruled, that in the absence of instructions or consent expressed or implied by the plaintiff bank, the defendants were not authorized to surrender the bills of lading upon acceptance of the drafts by Green & Travis, but should have held them for payment; that the agreement of the vendors of the cotton and drawers of the drafts (Mulford & Anderson) that the bills of lading should be delivered up upon acceptance of the drafts would not be obligatory upon the plaintiff bank unless they were informed of it, and directed the jury to find upon and answer two questions: First, whether there was an agreement between Green & Travis and Mulford & Anderson that the bills of lading should be surrendered upon their acceptance; second, whether this was known to the plaintiff bank.

The jury found, under the instructions of the court, a general verdict for the plaintiff for the value of the cotton surrendered, and found also that there was an agreement with Green & Travis by Mulford & Anderson for the surrender of the bills of lading upon acceptance of the drafts, but that the agreement was not known to the plaintiff bank.

PRACTICE IN CIVIL CASES—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS —AT LAW — IN EQUITY — SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM—NOTICE TO PRODUCE—EFFECT OF — WHEN PRODUCED.

1. The word "require" in section fifteen of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 82], when taken in connection with a subsequent clause, does not mean to include a power in the circuit courts to compel a compliance with an order to produce books or writings; but if the party against which the order is passed shall fail to comply, then it shall be lawful for the court to give judgment, if against the defendant, the same as in case of default, if against the plaintiff, the same as in case of nonsuit.

2. At common law parties were not competent witnesses, and they could not be compelled to attend, by writ of subpoena, or bring with them any writings pertinent to the issue, by the writ of subpoena duces tecum.

[Cited in Bischoffsheim v. Brown, 29 Fed. 343; Edison Electric Light Co. v. United States Electric Lighting Co., 44 Fed. 300; Johnson Steel Street-Rail Co. v. North Branch Steel Co., 48 Fed. 195.]

3. Notice to produce was at law the only method of a party desiring the production of papers by the other, unless he resorted to equity. Such notice, however, only laid the foundation for the production of secondary proof.

4. The conditions under which the power to require the production of writings, etc. should be exercised are: The motion must be in a case at law; the writings, etc. must appear to be in the possession of the party against whom the order is passed; it must appear that they contain evidence pertinent to the issue, and that the circumstances are such that the party might be compelled to produce them, as provided in the section referred to.

5. The order may be absolute or nisi.

6. Production before the trial is not perhaps contemplated by the provision, unless there is just ground to apprehend that the writings may be destroyed, or transferred to another, or removed out of the district, in which cases the order should be made without delay, and absolute.

7. In the case of incorporated banks having officers well known as the custodians of their books and papers, notice should be given for such officers to produce any document desired in the case.

Motion by plaintiffs that defendants be required to produce certain documents or writings in their possession.

B. R. Curtis, C. B. Goodrich, and B. F. Thomas, for defendants.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Power is conferred upon the circuit court, by the fifteenth section of the judiciary act, in the trial of actions at law, on motion of either party, and due notice thereof being given, to require the opposite party to produce any books or writings in his possession or power, which contain evidence pertinent to the issue in cases, and under circumstances where the party might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceeding in chancery. 1 Stat. 82.

Evidently the word "require," when taken in connection with the subsequent clause of the same section, does not include a power to compel a compliance with the order and direction of the court. On the contrary, the provision is, that if a plaintiff shall fail to comply with such order, it shall be lawful for the court, on motion, to give the like judgment for the defendant as in case of nonsuit, and if a defendant fail to comply with the order it shall be lawful for the court, on motion, to give judgment for the plaintiff, as in case of a default. Evidence is essential in the trial of actions at law; and the acts of congress, and the rules and usages of courts, provide the means for compelling the attendance of necessary witnesses for the purpose, and the production of books and writings material to the issue. Circuit courts, as well as all other federal courts, may issue any writ necessary for the exercise of jurisdiction, agreeably to the principles and usages of law, and of course they may issue the writ of subpoena, to compel the attendance of witnesses. They may also issue the writ of subpoena duces tecum, to compel the attendance of a witness, and also to require him to bring with him books and writings in his possession containing evidence material to the issue in a pending action. Parties were not competent witnesses at common law, and of course they could not be compelled to attend the trial, by the writ of subpoena, or to attend and bring with them any books or writings in their possession which were pertinent to the issue, or which might tend to elucidate the matter in controversy, by the writ of subpoena duces tecum. Notice to produce was the only remedy of a party in a suit at law, unless he resorted to equity, in case the other party to the record had in his possession books or writings containing evidence material in the trial. Such notice, however, never enabled the party to compel the production of such books or writings. All the effect it had was to lay the foundation for the introduction of parol or secondary proof of their contents, in case it appeared that the books and writings described in the notice were in the possession of the party notified, and that he refused to produce them at the trial, as requested. Recent acts of congress make parties, where the suit is between individuals, competent witnesses, which in many cases affords a better and more certain remedy in relation to books and writings in possession of the opposite side, than notice to produce. Besides these common-law remedies to obtain such books and writings, when "pertinent to the issue," power is conferred upon the circuit and district courts of the United States to require a party, in the trial of actions at law, to produce books or writings in his possession or power, if it appears that they contain evidence pertinent to the issue, and the case and circumstances are such that he might be compelled to produce the same by the ordinary rules of proceedings in chancery suits. Undoubtedly the power conferred is a discretionary power, but it is one which should be firmly exercised in a case falling within the conditions specified in the provision, when it appears that there is just ground to apprehend that delay will defeat the action of the court, and that the party is unable to obtain the evidence by subpoena duces tecum, and that the case and circumstances are such that notice to produce is not a safe and adequate remedy. Unless the case is shown to be one within the conditions specified in the provision, the power "to require" or pass the order does not exist. Those conditions are that the motion must be in a case at law, and on due notice to the opposite party, and it must appear that the books or writings are in the possession or power of the other party, and that they contain evidence pertinent to the issue, and that the case and circumstances are such that the party might be compelled to produce the same, as therein provided. No doubt is entertained that the motion may be made, in a pending action at law, before the day of trial; but the requirement of the order of the court must perhaps be that the books and writings be produced at the trial of the action. Such an order may be absolute or nisi, as the circumstances may justify or require. Production before the trial is not perhaps contemplated by the words of the provision, nor is it in general necessary, as the penalty, in case of failure to comply with the order, is not arrest and imprisonment until the party comply, as for a contempt, but a judgment of nonsuit, or default, as the plaintiff or defendant is the offending party. Where the motion is accompanied by satisfactory proof that the case is one in all respects within the conditions of the provision, and it is also satisfactorily shown that there is just ground to apprehend that the books and writings may be destroyed or transferred to another, or removed out of the jurisdiction before the day of trial, the order should be made without delay, and be absolute. On the other hand, if there is no suggestion of fraudulent intent to suppress the documents, and the evidence to show that they contain any matter pertinent to the issue is not satisfactory, the order, if made at all, should be made nisi, or the application may be refused.

Danger that the evidence, if any, will be suppressed, or that the books and witnesses will be transferred, or that they will be removed out of the jurisdiction, is not suggested in this case, and the evidence to show that the case is one within the conditions of the provision is not entirely satisfactory. Were there no other objections to the granting of the motion, we should be constrained to deny it, but there is another even more decisive than those already suggested. Incorporated banks have officers for the transaction of their business, and some one or more of those officers, as provided by law, and the usages of such institutions, have the possession of the books and papers, and are known as the legal custodians of everything belonging to the corporation. Heretofore the commands of the subpoena duces tecum have been ample to obtain such evidence as that described in the motion, and the court is not satisfied that the same process will not have a like salutary effect in this case. Should it fail, it will then become the duty of the court, in case a proper application is made, to exercise all the power it possesses to afford an adequate remedy to the moving party in this case.

Motion denied.

Case No. 9,449.

MERCHANTS' NAT. BANK OF BOSTON v. STATE NAT. BANK OF BOSTON.

TRIAL — NONSUIT — EVIDENCE INSUFFICIENT—INSTRUCTION—USAGE—CASHIER—CERTIFICATE OF CHECKS.

1. Judges of the circuit courts cannot direct a peremptory nonsuit, but the defendant, when the plaintiff's case is closed, may move the court to instruct the jury that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff is not sufficient to warrant a verdict, and that, as matter of law, their verdict should be for the defendant.

[Cited in McConnell v. Merrill, 53 Vt. 153.]

2. The motion must be made at the close of the plaintiff's case, or the trial must proceed.

3. The motion is not addressed to the discretion; it presents a question of law, and the ruling of the court is a subject of exception.

4. A power evidenced by a usage must be considered as defined and limited by that usage; and if it appeared that a usage existed among certain banks other than the defendant bank for the cashier to certify checks upon them, it is doubtful if it could be regarded as evidence that the cashier of the defendant bank had any such authority.

5. The motion by the defendant in this case, that the court instruct the jury that the evidence

[1] [Reported by William Henry Clifford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

[2] [Reversed in 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 604.]

introduced by the plaintiff was not sufficient to warrant a verdict, was allowed, because it was held that the act of June 3, 1864 [13 Stat. 99], conferred no authority upon the cashier of the defendant bank to certify as good the checks described in the declaration.[2]

[Cited in Congress & E. Spring Co. v. Edgar, 99 U. S. 656.]

Assumpsit upon certain checks upon the defendant bank, and certified as good by the cashier thereof. At the close of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved that the court instruct the jury that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff was not sufficient to warrant a verdict.

Sidney Bartlett and J. G. Abbott, for plaintiff.

B. R. Curtis, C. B. Goodrich, and B. F. Thomas, for defendant.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and LOWELL, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Repeated decisions of the supreme court have established the rule that the judges of the circuit courts cannot direct a peremptory nonsuit when the plaintiff is present in court and claims the right to submit his case to the jury. But the defendant instead thereof, when the plaintiff's case is closed, may, if he sees fit, move the court to instruct the jury that the evidence introduced by the plaintiff is not sufficient to warrant a verdict in his favor, and that as matter of law their verdict should be for the defendant. Unless such a motion is made for the defendant at the close of the plaintiff's case, the trial must proceed, and the evidence must be submitted to the jury, under the instructions of the court. When made, the motion is not one addressed to the discretion of the court, but it presents a question of law, which it is the duty of the court to decide, and the ruling of the court, in granting or refusing the motion, is as much the subject of exceptions by the party aggrieved as any other ruling of the court in the course of the trial.

In considering the motion, the court proceeds upon the ground that all the facts stated by the plaintiff's witnesses are true; and the rule is, that the motion should be denied, unless the court is of the opinion, in view of the whole of the plaintiff's evidence, oral and written, and of every inference the law allows to be drawn from it, that the plaintiff has not made out a case which would warrant the jury to find a verdict in his favor. Evidently the plaintiff's case, when viewed in that light, presents a question of law for the court, and it is well settled by the highest authority that it is the duty of the court to give the instruction whenever it appears that the evidence is not legally sufficient to serve as a foundation for a verdict for the plaintiff. Scuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 370; Parks v. Ross, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 362; Bliven v. New England Screw Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 433.

Guided by these views, the court has come to the conclusion that the prayer for instruction presented by the defendants must be granted. Considering that the case is one which will probably be removed into the supreme court for review, the court does not deem it necessary or expedient to enter into any extended discussion of the several questions involved in the motion.

Briefly expressed, the grounds of the decision of the court may be stated in the following propositions, in which both judges concur:—

1. That the act of congress of June 3, 1864, entitled "An act to provide a national currency," etc. conferred no authority upon the cashier of the defendant bank to certify, as good, the several checks described in the first eight counts of the declaration. 13 Stat. 99, §§ 8, 23.

2. That the power to certify the checks of third persons, in behalf of the corporation, is not inherent in the office of a cashier of a national bank, nor is the exercise of such a power within the scope of his usual and ordinary duties. U. S. v. City Bank of Columbus, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 56; Miner v. Mechanics' Bank of Alexandria, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 71; Bank of U. S. v. Dunn, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 51; Fleckner v. U. S. Bank, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 360; Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738; Mussey v. Eagle Bank, 9 Metc. [Mass.] 306; Kirk v. Bell, 16 Q. B. 290; 12 Eng. Law & Eq. 389; Hoyt v. Thompson, 1 Seld. [5 N. Y.] 320; Bank Com'rs v. Bank of Buffalo, 6 Paige, 497; 1 Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 460–472.

Recent cases decided in the courts of New York, referred to by the plaintiffs, do not affect the question, as they were founded upon either an admission in the pleadings, or an agreed statement of facts, admitting that the usage was that cashiers might certify checks, or on proof that such had been the practice of different banks. Whether the teller had authority from the bank to certify checks was not a question in the case of Willets v. Phoenix Bank, 2 Duer, 129, because the opinion of the court shows that the complaint averred, and the answer admitted, that the certifying the checks was the act of the defendant bank. Slight examination also of the case of Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 4 Duer, 219, will show that it contains nothing to support the theory that the cashier of the defendant bank had authority to certify as good the checks in question in this case. The statement of the court in that case was that the teller "had general authority to certify checks," but the exception to his acts was, that his general authority in that behalf was qualified by directions not to give such certificates, unless the customer had funds. Contrary to those instructions, the charge of the defendant bank was, that he colluded with a customer, and certified his checks, when the customer had no funds on deposit. The decision of the court was, that the bank was liable for the amount of the check, as it appeared beyond controversy that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder of the checks without notice. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 14 N. Y. 623, 16 N. Y. 125.

Support to the theory of the plaintiffs cannot be drawn from the case of Claflin v. Farmers' & Citizens' Bank, 25 N. Y. 293, as the admitted fact in that case was, that the president who certified the checks had a general authority to that effect, but the checks as certified were held to be void, even in the hands of a bona fide holder, because they were checks drawn by himself. Checks on a bank marked "good," say the court in the case of Girard Bank v. Bank of Penn Tp., 39 Pa. St. 99, are to be regarded as evidences of deposit to the credit of the holder; but the authority of the president, cashier, or any other officer of the bank to make such a certificate was not made a question in the case, and was not decided by the court. By the true construction of the seventeenth article of the by-laws, it confers no such power upon the cashier of the bank, and there is no evidence in the case that the directors or the corporation ever authorized the acts of the cashier in making the certificates upon the checks under consideration. Proof of any such usage on the part of the defendant bank, or of any such antecedent practice by their cashier, is entirely wanting, and the evidence as to the usage of other banks fails altogether to show that the cashiers of the other banks in this city, or any one of them, are accustomed to certify checks as good either with or without funds in the bank.

Twenty-two of the cashiers of the national banks located and doing business in Boston were examined by the plaintiffs, and not one of them testified that he, as cashier of a bank organized under the act of congress, certified a check of a third person as good. None testified affirmatively in that respect, but one, if no more, testified that he never had given such a certificate. They all concur that as cashiers they borrow money for their respective banks whenever the bank is in want of money, and give the check of the bank for the amount, and sign it as cashier. Their testimony also is, that they buy and sell New York funds as the agents of their respective banks. Those selling give a draft on New York, signing it as cashier, and those buying give checks, or pay for the same in legal-tender notes or other national currency, or other current funds. The plaintiffs also proved that the cashier of the defendant bank prior to the 23d of February, 1867, borrowed large sums of money of the Second National Bank in Boston, on checks signed by him as cashier; and the cashier of the latter bank testified that he knew no one in the several transactions but the cashier who gave the checks. Giving full effect to testimony as to usage, it only proves that there is a usage among the banks in this city that the cashiers may borrow money of other banks than their own in the settlement of balances through the clearing-house, and may sign the checks given for the same in behalf of their respective banks, and that they may also buy and sell New York funds in the manner before explained. But the opinion of the court is, that the evidence introduced to show usage has no tendency to show that there is any usage among the banks in this city that the cashier of a national bank may certify checks as in this case. The better opinion is, that a power evidenced by usage must be considered as defined and limited by the usage. Strong doubts are entertained by the court, even if it appeared that such a usage prevailed among the other banks in the city, whether it could be regarded as evidence that the cashier of the defendant bank had any such authority, unless it appeared that the defendant bank had in some way directly or indirectly sanctioned the usage; but it is not necessary to decide that question at the present time. Be that as it may, it is nevertheless clear that usage cannot make a contract, or vary or enlarge one, as made by the parties. Evidence of usage is admissible to explain what is doubtful, but it is not admissible to contradict what is plain. Insurance Co. v. Wright, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 470; Bliven v. New England Screw Co., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 431; The Reeside, [Case No. 11,657]; Dickinson v. Gay, 7 Allen, 37; Dodd v. Farlow, 11 Allen, 428.

Viewed in any light, the court is of the opinion that there is no evidence of usage in this case which would warrant the jury in finding that the cashier of the defendant bank had any authority whatever to bind the bank by his certificates that the checks were good. The argument of the plaintiffs also is, that the certificates of the cashier import on their face that he was authorized to exercise that power in behalf of the bank. Stated in other words, the proposition is that the certificate affords a prima facie presumption of authority in the officer to make the certificate, but the court is of a different opinion, as the proposition, if admitted, would enable the cashier to exercise all the powers vested in the directors by the act of congress, to which reference has been made. Payments made, or money received over the counter of the bank by the cashier, are doubtless within that rule, and so perhaps are any other acts of the cashier, within the scope of his usual and ordinary duties. But the doctrine cannot be applied to the acts of the cashier outside of his usual and ordinary duties, without establishing a rule which will enable every cashier at will to absorb all the powers of the directors, and to render null the most important features of the eighth section of the act of congress providing for a national currency. Doubtless the decision of the court in the case of Bank of Vergennes v. Warren, 7 Hill, 91, was in fact founded on that distinction; but if it was the intention of the court to give it a wider application, it is clear that it is contrary to the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, and cannot be favored by this court.

The ninth count of the declaration is for goods sold and delivered by the plaintiff bank to the defendant bank; but the court decides that there is no evidence in the case which would warrant the jury in finding that the plaintiff bank ever sold the gold certificates and the coin, or either of the same, to the defendant bank or to the cashier thereof in their behalf, as alleged in that count.

Assuming that the propositions stated are correct, then it necessarily follows that the plaintiffs have no cause of action under the tenth and eleventh counts of the declaration. They have not introduced any evidence in the case which would warrant the jury in finding a verdict in their favor under those counts. Motion granted.

[NOTE. Pursuant to the instruction of the court, the jury found for the defendant. The plaintiff excepted, and carried the case by writ of error to the supreme court, where Justice Swayne reversed the decision of this court, and awarded a venire de novo; Justices Clifford and Davis dissenting. 10 Wall. NATIONAL BANKS—REAL ESTATE SECURITIES—BILL TO FORECLOSE MORTGAGE.

A national bank does not transcend its powers in taking from a customer as collateral security for a loan to him, the note and mortgage of a third party, together with certain personal securities; and if the borrower becomes insolvent, and the personal securities prove insufficient the bank can maintain a bill to foreclose the mortgage.

Bill of foreclosure.

Simeon Mears was a regular customer of the bank, frequently borrowing large sums of money. Sometime prior to 1875, he borrowed $5,000 on short time paper, and deposited as security, note of J. E. Warren for $4,740, secured by mortgage to E. Ashley Mears, the note being payable to E. Ashley Mears, and indorsed over by him to Simeon Mears. When the latter's note matured he could not pay it, and the bank took Warren's note. When that matured Warren was insolvent, and Simeon Mears, who had indorsed it, was called upon to pay as indorser of Warren's note. The bank all the while held other securities, and by selling these, Mears' debt was reduced to $2,887, on September 3, 1875, when he gave a new note for this sum, and the Warren note was treated as collateral for this.

Mattocks & Mason, for complainant.

E. A. Otis, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This case was submitted to the court on final hearing upon the briefs of counsel and upon the proof taken before the master. It is a bill filed to foreclose a mortgage given by J. Esaias Warren and wife to E. Ashley Mears, by E. Ashley Mears assigned to Simeon Mears, and by Simeon Mears assigned to the complainant. The defendants to the bill are Simeon Mears and the mortgagor, and George B. Warren, who claims as a grantee of the mortgagor by a quit-claim deed made some month or so after the mortgage was made, but recorded prior to the mortgage. The quit-claim from J. Esaias Warren, the mortgagor, to George B. Warren, was put on record about a month prior to the recording of the mortgage, although the mortgage was made prior to the quit-claim deed, but the testimony of George B. Warren shows very clearly that he took title from J. Esaias Warren, mortgagor, merely as security, with the understanding that he took it subject to any liens which had been created upon the property.

There are two objections by these defendants to the foreclosure—first, on behalf of George B. Warren, that he is an innocent purchaser without notice, which I have said is sufficiently disposed of by his own testimony. [The second is, that this bank, the complainant in this case, being a national bank, acting under the national banking law, cannot make loans upon this class of security. The facts, about which there is to be no dispute, are, that Warren made his note, secured by a mortgage, to E. Ashley Mears; E. Ashley Mears assigned to his father, Simeon Mears, and Simeon Mears took it to the complainants in this case, the Merchants' National Bank of this city, and effected a loan, giving the note as collateral security for the loan. This was some time shortly after the note was made—within a few months. It was carried along until some time in the year 1875, when Mr. Mears paid up part of the loan, and the bank further reimbursed itself for the full loan, by the sale of other collaterals, and became the owner by sale, and an agreement between themselves and Mears, of the Warren note and mortgage as final security for the payment of the balance of twenty-seven or twenty-eight hundred dollars.] [2] It is objected, as I said before, that this transaction is ultra vires, that it is beyond the power of a national bank to make a loan upon real estate security, and a large array of authorities is cited in support of this proposition, and it is a proposition in regard to which I have no doubt, where it is invoked in a proper case; but here, I do not think the loan can be said to have been made upon real estate security. It was made upon a note to Mears, secured by collateral. The collateral was the Warren note—with such incidental security as the Warren note had.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Reporter, 426, and 6 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 46, contain only partial reports.]

I had occasion, about a year ago to go quite carefully into this question in a suit brought by the Northwestern National Bank against Loewenthal [unreported], where precisely this same question was raised and contested very vigorously. All the authorities were there considered that entered into this brief; and I held then, and on re-examination of my position at that time, I am contented with the view I then took of the case—that the transaction cannot be held to be within the limitations, either expressed or implied, of the national banking law. The seventh clause of section 5136 reads as follows: "To exercise by its board of directors or duly authorized officers or agents, subject to law, all such incidental powers as shall be necessary to carry on the business of banking; by discounting and negotiating promissory notes, drafts, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt; by receiving deposits; by buying and selling exchange, coin and bullion; by loaning money on personal security; and by obtaining, issuing and circulating notes, according to the provisions of this title." Rev. St. U. S.

It is claimed, and I think it has been amply held by various state courts, and indirectly by the United States court, that national banks can only loan money on personal security directly. Section 5137 provides that: "A national banking association may purchase, hold and convey real estate for the following purposes, and no others: * * * Second, Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted."

Here is the express power to take a mortgage on real estate for debts which have been previously contracted. You may not loan money on real estate security; but after the creditor has made default, or after the loan has been actually made, the bank may take real estate security, unless the transaction should be colorable for the purpose of evading the statute—making the loan first, and taking security so soon afterwards as to show it was part of the original understanding; but in a case such as is provided here, there is no doubt but what the bank, after having made a loan, if it becomes doubtful of the borrower's solvency or ability to give satisfactory personal security, may then take a mortgage on real estate, so that this case now before me is not affected by the clause which I have just read. It simply authorizes them to take security on real estate under certain circumstances.

The seventh clause which was just read, undoubtedly contemplates that the loans made by a national bank shall be made upon personal security. But was this anything but personal security? The bank had the note of Simeon Mears with a large amount of other collaterals, the whole transaction, in its inception, amounting to thirteen thousand dollars, and from time to time, Mr. Mears made payments, and other securities were applied which were held by the bank, until the indebtedness from thirteen thousand dollars was reduced to twenty-seven hundred dollars, and then by an arrangement between the parties, this was taken as final satisfaction or security for the twenty-seven hundred dollars balance.

I think that this cannot be held within the inhibiting clause, and I am most clear that the defense set up cannot avail. There will be a decree for the complainant for the amount found due, and it will be determined, of course, after the sale of the estate, whether there is any residue to go to the other parties in interest, after satisfying the lien of the bank.

BANKRUPTCY—MORTGAGE—KNOWLEDGE OF INSOLVENCY—FRAUD ON CREDITORS.

A mortgage given when a debtor was insolvent is not valid, if the mortgagee had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and that the mortgage was given in fraud of creditors; hence, the prayer of a petition asking that such mortgage be first paid off from the avails of the mortgaged property must be denied.

[Walter C. Cowles was declared a bankrupt upon the petition of S. G. Renick, president of the First National Bank of Hastings. Case No. 3,297. The Merchants' National Bank of Hastings now seek to establish a lien by way of chattel mortgage upon the bankrupt's assets.]

NELSON, District Judge. The Merchants' National Bank holding a mortgage upon a large amount of the personal property of Cowles, who was adjudicated a bankrupt December 21st, 1867, files a petition against Daniel W. Truax, the assignee, claiming a recognition of the lien, and asking that it be first paid off from the avails of the mortgaged property. The assignee, in his answer, alleges that the property was mortgaged to the bank to defraud the creditors of the debtor, and with the intent to give a preference, and that the petitioner having proved up the claim, secured by the mortgage, before the register, has released, abandoned, and discharged the property, taken as security therefor. The evidence reported shows the same state of facts to exist in regard to this transaction as was shown at the time Cowles was adjudged a bankrupt, and clearly establishes two propositions, which are conclusive of the petitioner's rights.

First. That Cowles was insolvent at the time he executed the mortgage. Insolvency, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, when applied to traders, means inability to pay debts in the ordinary course of business, as persons carrying on trade usually do. See Bouv. Law Dict. tit. "Insolvency"; [Buckingham v. McLean] 13 How. [54 U. S.] 151; 4 Cush. 128; 3 Gray, 594. The debtor, although totally unable to meet the ordinary current expenditures necessary to enable him to carry on his business, seems to have been blind to his condition; this, however, may have arisen from the fact that he regarded himself as not absolutely broken up, and hoped that he might retrieve his affairs, and eventually pay his debts, but his own belief as to his condition cannot disprove the fact, substantiated by the strongest testimony, of his insolvency.

Second. The mortgagee had reasonable cause to believe that Cowles was insolvent, and that the mortgage was in fraud of creditors. The testimony of Howes, the cashier, as well as that of Van Dyke, the president, is conclusive upon this point. Howes says: "Cowles told him at the time that the personal property mortgaged was subject to a lien; that judgment would go against him, and he should be subjected to great loss unless he should be able to get the money to release the property; $1,000 was paid then, and the balance, deducting stamps, &c., was credited to an account headed 'W. J. Van Dyke, special.' The balance was to be paid upon W. J. Van Dyke's check; it was to be paid by Cowles at Mr. Van Dyke's say so; and was not to be paid upon Mr. Cowles's checks. I think the credit was made to Van Dyke at my suggestion, inasmuch as the money was not to be paid except for the purpose of manufacturing the lumber, and to make our security available." The evident design on the part of the witness is apparent from this portion of his testimony. He wished to prevent, if possible, the creditors of Cowles from reaching the money. Van Dyke appears to have taken the same view of the case, and says he wished the money to be so placed that Cowles could tell his creditors that he had none. At this time Howes had reasonable cause to believe Cowles solvent. He says, "At the time the loan was made, I considered Cowles solvent,—that is, if his assets were well managed, that they were more than his liabilities."

It is unnecessary to consider this case further; it seems too plain to admit of doubt; allowing all the testimony offered by the petitioner, and rejecting that portion objected to by him, we are unable to grant the relief asked for. Prayer of petition denied.

[C. D. Tuttle, the holder of another chattel mortgage on the property, sought by petition to establish a lien thereon, which was also denied by the court. Case No. 14,277.]

[38 How. Pr. (1870) 31.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York.

ACTION ON BOND TO STAY JUDGMENT PENDING MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—MOTION TO STAY PROCEEDINGS—AUXILIARY EQUITY SUIT.

[A stay of proceedings on a judgment in a state court pending a motion for a new trial was granted upon defendants giving bond conditioned to pay the judgment if the motion were denied. The motion was denied, but defendant took an appeal therefrom, and the appellate court stayed proceedings pending the appeal. In the meantime plaintiff brought an action in a federal court upon the bond given in the state trial court, whereupon defendants moved the federal court to stay proceedings in this action until the disposition of the appeal. Held, that as the condition of the bond had in fact happened it was not clear that plaintiff should not be allowed to enforce it immediately, and, as an order staying proceedings would deprive him of that right without any opportunity of obtaining a review, such stay would only be granted upon condition that defendant should institute a plenary suit on the equity side of the court, auxiliary to the action at law, to restrain the prosecution thereof, so that a determination of the questions raised would become subject to review by appeal.]

Action on an undertaking, given by the defendants [Charles Leland and others] to the plaintiff, to stay proceedings pending a motion for a new trial; in an action wherein the plaintiff had recovered judgment against two of the defendants in a state court. The condition of the undertaking, was to pay the judgment if the motion for a new trial was denied. It was given pursuant to an order of the court, requiring it as a condition of granting a stay of proceedings on the judgment. The motion for a new trial having been denied, the defendants in that case appealed to the general term, and the court upon motion, and after a hearing, ordered a stay of proceedings on the judgment pending the appeal, provided the defendants gave a bond or undertaking of the same general character as required upon appeals from judgments. The defendants gave the undertaking required. The plaintiff having commenced this action and entered a rule that defendants plead, the defendants now moved to stay proceedings in this action pending the appeal in the state court.

Francis C. Barlow, for plaintiff.

Wm. G. Choate and John Fitch, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The several stays of proceedings granted by the state court by the orders of May 11, 1868, May 30, 1868, and Jan. 21, 1869, are, in effect, nothing more than stays of the collection by execution of the judgment recovered in the state court. If it were quite clear that the undertaking of May 29, 1868, was merely an additional security for the payment of the judgment, the mode of giving defendants in this suit relief by staying the plaintiff's proceedings herein, by an order made on a motion to that end, would be objectionable as concluding the plaintiff's rights, without his having any means of review. But I regard it as by no means certain, that the undertaking, given as it was, and as is stated on its face, for the purpose of obtaining a stay of execution on the judgment, until the motion for a new trial in the suit could be heard and decided, and in consideration of such stay and being an absolute undertaking to pay this amount directed to be paid by the judgment, if such motion for a new trial should be denied, is not one which the plaintiff in this suit was entitled to enforce, without regard to the appeal from the judgment. That question, and the question whether this court has any right to interpolate into the undertaking any other condition than the one expressed in it, or which to make it operative, namely: that the motion for a new trial should be denied or dismissed, ought in view of the fact that the motion for a new trial was denied and that the defendants in the judgment had the benefit of a stay in execution therein, while such motion was pending, to be raised and disposed of in a plenary suit. A suit brought on the equity side of this court by the defendants in the suit against the plaintiff therein, to restrain or regulate this suit and thereby prevent injustice, would not be an original suit, but would only be auxiliary and supplementary to and dependent on this suit and would be maintainable without reference to the citizenship or residence of the parties to it; and process in it could be served on the plaintiff in this suit out of this district. Dunn v. Clark, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 1; Clark v. Matthewson, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 169, 172; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 451, 460; St. Luke's Hospital v. Barclay [Case No. 12,241]; Logan v. Patrick, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 280; Dunlap v. Stetson [Case No. 4,164].

As the amount of the judgment obtained in this court and collection of which is sought to be restrained is $5,301.23, either party to such equity suit, could obtain the judgment of the highest court on the question involved. I think the proper disposition to be made of the present motion is to direct a stay of all proceedings in this suit, to collect on execution any judgment which the plaintiff may obtain herein, on condition that the defendants herein institute within thirty days herefrom such an equity suit as is above suggested.

I do not feel disposed to interfere with the right of the plaintiffs to proceed to obtain a judgment in this suit if they are entitled to one as against any legal defence which may be interposed, leaving the questions which were raised and discussed on the motion to be disposed of in the equity suit to be brought.

TAXATION—NATIONAL BANK UNEQUALLY TAXED—RELIEF.

The capital stock of a national bank was assessed at its full value, while all other property was assessed at less than one half its full value: Held, that the capital stock was onerated with an undue proportion of the public taxes, and that the bank in its corporate capacity was entitled to a standing in court for relief.

Action by the Merchants' National Bank of Toledo against [William] Cumming, [treasurer of Lucas county and] collector of taxes, to restrain him from collecting a tax assessed for the year 1876 on the shares of stock of plaintiff's bank. The late Judge Emmons of the same circuit, before his death, granted a preliminary injunction.

Mr. Raney and Wager Swayne, for plaintiff.

Mr. Griswold and F. K. Hamlin, for respondent.

BAXTER, Circuit Judge. [There were several points presented and urged in the argument of this case on hearing which, in the view I have taken of it need not be discussed here suffice it to say that,] [3] from the pleadings and proofs, it very satisfactorily appears that complainant's capital stock was assessed for the year 1876 at its full value, while all other property was assessed at from thirty to forty per cent. only of its real value, and that, by reason of this unequal assessment, complainant's capital stock was in the hands of its shareholders onerated with an undue proportion of the public taxes. It is not important to inquire into the methods leading to such a result. Whether from inadvertence or design, the consequences are the same to the complainant. It is an injustice that contravenes the constitution of Ohio, as well as the provisions of the national banking law, and a wrong which the courts may, when their powers are properly invoked, take cognizance of to redress. But the defendant insists that the wrong complained of is a wrong to complainant's shareholders, against whom the tax was assessed, and not against the complainant. This objection seemed, on first impression, to have been well taken, but further reflection induces the belief that it involves the rights of complainant as well as the rights of its corporators. Between the two there is an intimate connection; the legal entity—the corporation—is distinct from the shareholders, but the former is a trustee for the latter, and custodian of corporate funds; and if it shall pay the taxes so assessed, and assume to deduct the same from dividends declared, or to be hereafter declared in favor of its shareholders, it may, and the averment is that it will, subject itself to a multiplicity of suits with its own shareholders; whereas, if it refuses to pay these taxes, it will impair its credit, embarrass its business, and expose itself to vexatious and expensive suits, and entail upon itself irremediable injuries in resisting the illegal exactions made upon it. Hence, in view of the probable consequences, I have reached the conclusion that the complainant, in its corporate capacity, is entitled to a standing in this court, and to relief, and I shall, therefore, authorize a decree permitting complainant to pay to the defendant, or into the registry of the court, forty per cent. of the amount of the tax assessed against its shareholders, in accordance with its tender heretofore made, and, on this being done, an injunction be issued perpetually enjoining the collection thereof. The costs will be decreed against defendant, to be paid out of the money to be realized under decree hereinbefore authorized.

COLLISION—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

[A libel for the loss of a steamer sunk in collision with a schooner on a clear night in Long Island Sound will be dismissed where it appears that the vessels, properly manned and carrying proper lights, were aware of each other's presence in due season, and libelants could not establish by preponderating evidence that the schooner changed her course.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States from the Southern district of New York.

[This was a libel in rem by the Merchants' Transportation Company against the schooner New York for collision. Libelants were owners of the steam propeller Charles Osgood, which was lost in collision with the schooner New York on Long Island Sound. There was a decree in the district court dismissing the libel. The libelants appeal.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. On the evening of the 10th of November, 1858, the Osgood was proceeding on one of her usual trips through the Sound from the city of New York to Norwich, Conn., and the schooner on one of her regular trips in the opposite direction, from Boston to New York. The wind was about north northwest, with a breeze of some five or six knots the hour. The direction of the propeller was about east northeast, and that of the schooner about west by south. She was on her starboard tack, and had been from three miles east of New Haven. The night was clear, and no difficulty in seeing vessels at a considerable distance. Both vessels had lights and saw each other in time to have avoided the disaster. They came together in the middle of the Sound, northeast of Huntington's Light, the schooner striking the propeller, head on, on the larboard side, opposite the boiler, and about one-third of the way from the stern. The propeller filled and sunk in a few minutes, from the effects of the blow. On the part of the propeller, it is insisted that when she discovered the schooner, which was a mile or more ahead, she was a point in her weather-bow, and that if she had kept her course the collision could not have happened, but that, as she approached the propeller, and while at an angle of forty-five degrees on her line of sailing from the propeller, she suddenly changed her course, bearing away before the wind, until she struck her, as already stated. On the part of the schooner, it is claimed that she discovered the propeller a long distance ahead, half a point on her weather bow, and that, as the two vessels approached, the propeller attempted to pass across the bow of the schooner; that the helm of the latter was immediately ported, to luff into the wind and avoid a collision, but the two vessels were so close to each other it was impossible to prevent it. The court below found in favor of the view taken by the schooner, and dismissed the libel. It was sustained in the proofs by three witnesses on board this vessel, the master and two hands, one at the wheel and the other the look-out. The view of the propeller was sustained by two, the master and the man at the wheel. The look-out was not examined, but his absence was accounted for, he having gone to California.

It is quite clear, unless the propeller can maintain her position that the schooner suddenly changed her course by bearing away before the wind, and thus produced the disaster, that the ground of the libel fails, as no fault can be justly imputed to her. If she kept her course, which she had pursued from a point three miles east of New Haven, and which must have been seen on board the propeller for a mile or more before the collision occurred, it was the duty of the latter to have adopted the proper movement to avoid her. The case turns upon this question of fact, did or did not the schooner change her course and thus produce the disaster? We think the weight of the proofs with the finding of the court below; at least upon the evidence, we cannot say that the libelants have established the affirmative so fully and satisfactorily as to justify us in charging this vessel with the loss. The case is one of great carelessness, or want of skill, on the one side or the other. The night was not dark, nor the wind very strong. Both vessels were near the middle of the Sound, which is several miles wide at the place of collision. They saw each other at a distance that afforded full time for any necessary movement to have prevented the meeting. Our surprise is nearly as great that it happened at all as if it had occurred in open day. Decree below affirmed.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. James T. Abbott & Co. were ship agents at St. Thomas, and were the correspondents of Edmund A. Souder & Co., of Philadelphia. Otto Lachenmeyer, one of the respondents, was in the employment of E. A. Souder & Co., and in conducting their correspondence with James T. Abbott & Co., authorized them to charter a vessel for his father, John Lachenmeyer, to carry lumber from St. Mary's, Georgia, to Montevideo, sending them a printed form of charter-party used in the business of E. A. Souder & Co., limiting the freight rates to be paid to $19 to $20 gold "flat," per M. feet, and, if absolutely necessary, to add a gratuity of $50 to the master, and with the privilege of ordering the vessel to a port on the Uraguay not above Paysander or to Rosario on the Parana, at $2 per M. feet additional freight. This order was renewed several times by Otto Lachenmeyer, modified only by an enlargement of the limit to $21 gold, and an optional change of the place of loading to Fernandina or Lachlisin's Mills. On the 23d of December, 1869, James T. Abbott & Co. chartered, at St. Thomas, the libellant's vessel, the St. George, and, in the name of Otto Lachenmeyer, entered into a charter-party with him, by which he was to receive $21 gold per M. freight, a percentage of 5 per cent. per M. and, if the destination of the vessel was changed to Rosario, Fray Rentos or Paysander, an additional freight piece of $2.50 per M. feet. In pursuance of this charter, the libellant immediately sailed to St. Mary's where he was notified that the respondents disavowed the charter-party, as having been made in violation of instructions to James T. Abbott & Co., and that lading would not be furnished on the footing of it. The libellant awaited at St. Mary's the expiration of his lay days and until the 9th of March following, refusing any other engagement of his vessel, and has filed his libel to recover the demurrage stipulated by the charter party, and the damages arising from its non-fulfilment by the respondents.

The libellant can recover only on the footing of the contract made with him by James T. Abbott & Co. If it substantially embodies the terms for which they were authorized by the respondents to stipulate, it is the respondent's contract, and the libellant had a right to call upon them to fulfil it. That an agent can bind his principal only within the extent of his authority, and that this must be ascertained, at their own peril, by those who deal with him, is an elementary principle of the law of agency. In its application, it is relaxed only where the principal, by his acts or declarations, or by a general substitution of the agent for himself in the transaction of the kind of business entrusted to him, authorizes the presumption that the agent is invested with unrestricted discretion as to the subject matter of the agency, or at least with power to bind his principal to the extent to which he assumes to act for him.

What then is the relation in which the parties stand to each other. It is plainly such as ordinarily results from the exercise of authority by one who is employed to perform a service for another, under special instructions and with limited powers. James T. Abbott & Co. were the agents employed to charter a vessel in behalf of John

Lachenmeyer, with specific instructions as to the kind of vessel to be obtained, the ports of sailing and discharge, the price to be paid for freight and the amount of gratuity to the master. They were, therefore, special agents, and only their acts within the scope of their instructions are binding upon their principal. No act or declaration of the principal has been shown, from which an enlargement of this limited power of the agents can be presumed, and it is hardly necessary to add that no such effect is due to the fact, if it be a fact, that James T. Abbott & Co. were the exclusive shipping brokers of Edmund A. Souder & Co., at St. Thomas. The latter were the intermedium through whose connection with James T. Abbott & Co. the negotiation was conducted and their employment was effected, but certainly neither the nature nor extent of their relations can operate to charge the respondents with the obligation of a contract, to which they did not, by express authorization or legal implication, yield their assent. In point of fact, such an assumption is repelled by the charter-party itself, for upon its face James T. Abbott & Co. describe themselves as the agents of Otto Lachenmeyer, not of E. A. Souder & Co. There was no room for misconception by James T. Abbott & Co. They knew who their principal was. They represented themselves to libellant as acting for Otto Lachenmeyer, and thus the libellant was warned of the duty, and informed of the means, of ascertaining the nature and limitations of the contract which they were authorized to make with him. Nor was there any ambiguity in the instructions given to the agents. What may be the meaning of the term "flat," which has supplied a subject of such earnest discussion and animadversion by the counsel,—this much is clear: That $21 gold per M. feet and $50 currency to the master were authorized to be paid, and an additional $2 per M., if the port of discharge was changed by the charterer to the Uruguay or Parana. Now, instead of these rates, to which James T. Abbott & Co. were limited by their instructions, they stipulated for $21 gold, and 5 per cent. primage also in gold—which is a form of gratuity to the master—and $2.50, if the destination of the vessel was changed. Is such a contract, in the execution of which the agents did not observe their instructions, and provided for payments in excess of those to which they were limited, to be regarded as the engagement of their principal? Obviously not; and of this the libellant is chargeable with notice, because he dealt avowedly with representatives, and was bound, at his peril, to know that they kept within the line of their authority.

Although these considerations are decisive against the libellant, an additional objection is made to his recovery, which was not urged in the district court, and which, it is therefore argued, is not available to the respondents now, as the whole case is brought into this court and is heard de novo, and as no assignment of specific errors is required, all the questions arising upon the pleadings, and proofs are legitimate subjects of consideration. The objection now urged is distinctly presented by the answer of the original respondent, and seems to have led to the libellant's motion, which was ordered to stand as a supplemental libel against John Lachenmeyer. It has not been waived and may, therefore, be pressed at any stage of the controversy. As before stated, Otto Lachenmeyer was merely the organ of his father, John Lachenmeyer, in the correspondence in relation to the charter. He so declares himself in explicit terms, and his correspondents are asked to exert their offices only for the benefit and in the behalf of John Lachenmeyer. He did not propose that they should make any engagements for him. John Lachenmeyer was their principal, whom alone they had power to bind. But the charter-party was executed in the name of Otto Lachenmeyer as the charterer, and John Lachenmeyer is not a party to it. It is not then the contract of Otto Lachenmeyer, because it was unauthorized by him. Nor is it the contract of John Lachenmeyer, because he is not named in it and it does not purport to bind him. This is an awkward dilemma, either horn of which is fatal to the libellant.

The decree of the district court dismissing the libel is affirmed, with costs to be taxed against the libellant.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—ENEMY PROPERTY.

Vessel and cargo condemned for a violation of the blockade, and as enemy property.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel, with a cargo of spirits of turpentine, was captured as prize January 4, 1863, coming out of Charleston harbor, by the United States ship-of-war Quaker City. The cargo was sent to this port for adjudication, and regularly arrested here, by warrant of attachment, January 30 thereafter. The marshal duly returned the process February 17 thereafter. No one appearing on the return and proclamation to make defence, a judgment of default and condemnation was then duly entered, upon motion of the district attorney. No ship's papers were found on board of the vessel. The owner of the vessel, her mate, and one passenger were examined as witnesses in preparatorio before the prize commissioners. The facts proved by the testimony are, that the vessel and her cargo of turpentine were both the entire property of the witness, the owner, who resided in Charleston, and avowed, on oath, his citizenship, and denied all allegiance to the United States government. He purchased the vessel and her cargo in Charleston immediately previous to her leaving port on this voyage. He knew of the blockade of the port. She had attempted to come out once unsuccessfully previous to her capture, and was captured in or near the harbor of Charleston as she came out of it on a voyage destined to Nassau, New Providence, and back to Charleston. A mail on board, which she was carrying to Nassau, was thrown overboard. The owner avers that she raised no flag because she had none on board, but that he would have carried a confederate flag had he possessed one, and would have resisted the seizure by force had he been armed. The mate testifies that the capture was made in Charleston harbor, January 4, between two and three o'clock in the morning. The vessel was on her arrest taken to Port Royal, and, under an appraisement and survey, by order of Admiral Dupont, was appropriated to the use of the United States naval service on that station, at the valuation of $200.

Let a decree be entered for the condemnation and forfeiture of the vessel and cargo to the libellants.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. March 12, 1873.[1]

RAILROAD COMPANIES—TOWN BONDS—SPECIAL ACT—ELECTION—IRREGULARITY IN.

1. The bona fide holder, for value paid, of coupons payable to bearer, issued by a town organized under the township organization law of Illinois, by virtue of a special act of the legislature empowering such town to vote subscription to the capital stock of a railroad company, is not bound to prove that every prerequisite has been complied with, in order to maintain his action.

2. A mere irregularity in the form, for example, of an election, called to vote for or against such subscription, does not constitute a good defense to a suit upon the bonds or coupons in the hands of a bona fide holder.

3. The plaintiff in this case has established a prima facie case, by showing the law, the vote, the acceptance by the company, the issuing of the bonds, and a compliance with the conditions upon which the vote was taken, though as to this last it was perhaps not necessary for the plaintiff in a case like this to prove such compliance.

4. It is not material under the statute in question that the application for the election should be formally addressed to the town clerk. The application was in fact received by him, and he acted upon it by giving the requisite notices for the election.

5. That the ordinary judges of election, the supervisor, assessor and collector, presided and canvassed the votes, instead of a moderator, if a defect at all, is but an irregularity, which does not render the election void, nor invalidate these securities in the hands of an innocent purchaser.

6. Held, that it is to be presumed that the persons authorized to vote under the terms of this act were legal voters, and not mere inhabitants.

7. That the subscription in question was not made until after the constitution of 1870 took effect, is not such unreasonable delay as will constitute a valid defense against an innocent holder of the bonds; the new constitution expressly permitting such subscription to be made, where there has been a prior vote.

8. The conditions of the vote in this case construed, and held to have been complied with.

9. Where bonds are placed in the hands of a third person to deliver upon the happening of certain things, and he delivers them irregularly or prematurely or contrary to instructions, and the bonds pass into the hands of bona fide purchasers without notice, the loss, if any, must fall upon the party who has so placed them in the hands of the third person, and not upon the purchaser.

[This was an action of assumpsit by George O. Mercy against the town of Ohio.]

Geo. O. Ide, of Paddock & Ide, for plaintiff.
M. T. Peters, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. On the 28th of Feb'y, 1867, the legislature incorporated the Illinois Grand Trunk Railway with power to build, maintain, and use a railway from some point or points on the Mississippi river, either at Rock Island, Fulton, or any other intermediate point or points to Prophetstown, Mendota, Newark, and the village of Lisbon, Grintown, and Joliet to Chicago, or to any desirable point on the Indiana state line. The road was to be built on or near the established line of the old Illinois Grand Trunk Railway, as nearly as might be practicable, from Prophetstown to Joliet, running through the places aforesaid. On the 25th of March, 1869, the legislature amended this act, and declared that "any city, incorporated town or township, which may be situated on or near the route of the Illinois Grand Trunk Railway, west of the city of Mendota, by the way of Prophetstown to the Mississippi river, may become subscribers to the stock of said railway, and may issue bonds for the amount of such stock so subscribed, with coupons for interest thereto attached, under such limitations and restrictions, and on such conditions as they may choose, and the directors of said company may approve—the proposition for said subscription having been first submitted to the inhabitants of such city, town or township, and approved by them." The amendment further provided that upon the application of ten voters, as aforesaid, specifying the amount to be subscribed and the conditions, it should be the duty of the clerk of the city, town or township, to call an election in the same manner that other elections for the city, town or township were called, for the purpose of determining whether the city, town or township would subscribe to the stock of the railway; and it provided that if a majority of the voters should be for the subscription, then the corporate authorities of such city, town or township, and the supervisor and town clerk of such township should cause the subscription to be made, and upon its acceptance by the directors of the company, the bonds were to be issued in conformity with the vote, which bonds were to be of not less than one hundred dollars, and in no case to bear a higher rate of interest than ten per cent. Under these laws, bonds were issued by this town, and bore upon their face that they were issued under them, and they came into the hands of the plaintiff in good faith for value. Upon the coupons of these bonds this suit has been brought, and various objections have been made by the town to the recovery by the plaintiff in this case.

I suppose there can be no doubt that in a case like this it is necessary for the plaintiff to make out that the bonds were issued in pursuance of authority properly given to the town. This is claimed to be shown by the introduction of the law, and by showing that there was an application made, as required by the law, containing certain conditions; that there was a vote taken, and that the majority of the vote was in favor of the subscription; that it was accepted by the company, and the bonds issued in pursuance thereof, the conditions having been complied with. How far it is necessary for a bona fide holder of bonds or coupons issued in this way to establish in evidence before recovery, the conditions under which the bonds were to issue, is a question about which there has been a good deal of controversy in the courts—whether, in other words, it is incumbent on the bona fide holder of bonds or coupons to prove all the prerequisites, which the law required, prior to the issuing of the bonds. The courts have held uniformly in the construction of such laws, that it is not indispensable that every prerequisite should be shown, and they have further uniformly held that a mere irregularity in the form, for example, of an election, did not constitute a good defense to the suit for the bonds or coupons in the hands of the bona fide holder.

The first objection made is in relation to the authority, and my opinion is, that upon this question a prima facie case is made out when the plaintiff has shown what has been already stated—the law, the vote, the issuing of the bonds, the acceptance and compliance with the conditions upon which the vote was taken, though as to this last perhaps it was not necessary in such a case as this. One of the objections on the part of the town is, that there was no town election held. The facts are, that when the application was made by the number of voters required by the statute, and notice was given, the election seems to have been held by the ordinary judges of election, and not by the moderator, who ordinarily presides at mere town-meetings. The authorities of the town, or the persons whose advice was followed in this case, seem to have thought that it being an election, the judges of election, as in state and county elections, should receive the votes; and they accordingly did receive, canvass and announce them. The supreme court of this state has decided that, in the absence of all language in a statute designating the particular manner in which an act shall be done by a town, the presumption is, it is to be done by the town as a town, or a township. The only organization that this town of Ohio had, was the township organization under the statute. The supreme court having held, that under a statute such as this, it was the duty of the township to have proceeded in a regular town-meeting manner, perhaps it would have been proper that the moderator should have received and canvassed these votes, rather than the judges of election. I do not see, as to one objection that is made, that the application is addressed to any particular person. I do not think that is material. The object of the law was that there should be an application made, and that the clerk should give the notice. The application is shown, and the clerk did give the notice, and there is no question made but that the notice was such a notice, and for such time as the law required.

There is further objection made as to the votes that were taken. It does not appear that there was any one who was desirous to vote, whose vote was rejected, and the presumption would be, I think, that legal voters were meant by the language of the law.

Another objection taken under this head, is as to this being an election to subscribe stock to the Illinois Grand Trunk Railway Company, when the corporation was the Illinois Grand Trunk Railway. I do not think that is a substantial objection. The application is in proper form, describing the corporation as the Illinois Grand Trunk Railway, and the notice seems to be so, and the bonds that were issued seem to be in the same form.

But the principal objection taken under this head is that which has been already referred to—the fact that the judges received and canvassed the votes, instead of the moderator; and the question is, whether that is, as against this plaintiff, a vital objection—one going to the foundation of the authority, so far as he is concerned, warranting the town, as to him, in saying, that the bonds were unauthorized because of this defect. My opinion is, that it has not that right, that it is simply an irregularity, and does not render the election (even conceding the correctness of the position taken by the defense) absolutely void, and the bonds in the hands of an innocent holder a nullity. The main thing in this election was to determine whether there was a majority of the voters in favor of the subscription, upon the conditions named. There is no dispute but that there was such a majority; and the fact that certain persons named as judges, by common consent, received the votes, and canvassed them, is nothing more than an irregularity, which might render the election voidable, but does not render it a nullity when suit is brought upon the bonds in the hands of an innocent holder.

Another objection taken on the part of the defense is, that the proposition of the town to subscribe for the stock, was not accepted by the company until October, 1870, after the adoption of the new constitution of the state. The election was held on the 21st day of August, 1869, and it is contended that this was an unreasonable delay, and that the town was not bound by an acceptance of the company made after so long a time, the constitution of 1870 having prohibited municipalities from making subscriptions to the capital stock of railroad companies or private corporations. But the new constitution also provided that the adoption of the section prohibiting subscriptions in the future should not be construed to affect the rights of any municipality to make a subscription where the same had been authorized under a law already in force by a vote of the people prior to the adoption of the constitution. The only question, therefore, would be (this being within the letter and spirit of that provision of the constitution) whether there was an unreasonable delay, and I do not think that as against an innocent holder, the court can assume that there was such delay as to render the bonds void in his hands.

The next objection is one about which I have had considerable difficulty, under the language of the amendment of March, 1869, declaring, in case there is a majority of the voters in favor of a subscription, that the corporate authorities of the said city, town or township, and the supervisor or town clerk of the said township, shall cause the subscription to be made, and upon its acceptance by the directors of the company shall cause bonds to be issued in conformity with the vote. The bonds, in point of fact, were in this instance issued by the supervisor of the town, and the clerk, and the question here is, whether that is within this clause of the amendment; and it may be a question who are the corporate authorities within the meaning of this law. Of course, the words "supervisor" and "town clerk" of a township, could not both apply to a city; "said city, town or township, and the supervisor and town clerk of said township"—because, as we know, ordinarily, a supervisor is not an officer of a city. There must, therefore, be some limitation of this language, the "supervisor and town clerk of such a township," and after some hesitation I have come to the conclusion that the supervisor and town clerk are, within the meaning of this law, the corporate authorities who had the right to act, to cause the subscription to be made, and the bonds to be issued; and I think that has been generally the construction given to language similar to this, as used in statutes. I find several cases where the supervisor and town clerk have issued the bonds under somewhat similar language to that which has been used here, and either no objection was made to the authority, or else it was overruled, if any was made. This is a question, I admit, not free from difficulty; but I have thought, in view of the decisions which have been made by the supreme court of the United States, in relation to bonds, with such recitals in the hands of bona fide holders for value, that the construction ought to be, in a matter of doubt like this, in favor of the holders of the bonds.

Another objection made is, that one of the conditions was not complied with—that the road was not completed, as required by the conditions of the vote. It seems to me that, as a matter of fact, that is hardly made out. But, on the contrary, I am inclined to think that the weight of the evidence shows that the road was completed within the fair meaning of the condition. One of the conditions was, that "the Grand Trunk Railway shall be completed, and the cars running thereon, for the purpose of carrying passengers and freight from Mendota through the town of Ohio." It can hardly be contended, I apprehend, that the whole of the road should be completed from the Mississippi to Chicago, or the state line, before the bonds could be issued within this condition, in view of the limitation made by the amendment itself to the towns that might subscribe, they being west of the city of Mendota.

Another objection made is, that these various conditions that were annexed to the application, and the notice of the vote, were not inserted in the bonds. The language is somewhat peculiar: "Said bonds to be issued and delivered only on this expressed condition, 'that the aforesaid Grand Trunk Railway,' etc., 'shall be completed.'" The construction sought to be given by the defense is, that these conditions should be "expressed" in the bonds—that is, inserted in the bonds, and it being conceded that they were not, that the issue was unauthorized and void. I hardly think that so rigid a construction as this ought to be given to this language. The word, to be sure, is "expressed." The language is not, however, "expressed in writing"—it is not that these conditions are to be inserted in the bonds. It would be a literal compliance with this language, if the conditions were expressed orally, when they were delivered. Anything may be expressed by word of mouth, as well as by writing, and as against an innocent holder, it seems to me that to sustain the objection would be a stringent construction of this language. The meaning of it was probably intended to be, simply, "upon the express condition," and it may be nothing but a mere clerical error, or an ungrammatical phrase. I am inclined to think, however, that had the intention been that the condition should be inserted in the bonds; and if that had been the meaning of the signers to the application, that intention would have been stated a little differently.

There is nothing in another objection made that, by the terms of the election, no part of the principal and interest of the bonds or coupons was to become due until after five years from the issue. I do not think that a fair construction to be placed on the whole subject. On the contrary, I think the fair meaning would be, that coupons were intended to be payable before the principal of the bond was payable. The language of the amendment of March, 1869, was that bonds were to be issued, with coupons for interest attached. The language of the application is, that bonds might be issued, with interest payable at a particular time. One-fifth of the whole number were to be due in five years, and one-fifth in every succeeding year thereafter. Now I do not think it a reasonable construction of the law, the application, the notice, and the vote, to say that the interest of these bonds was not to be payable until after the expiration of five years. On the contrary, it is apparent to every one that bonds of that character never could have been negotiated at all, and that the whole enterprise would necessarily have been a failure. This is only referred to for the purpose of putting a construction upon acts performed, and an unreasonable construction should never be placed upon acts like these.

Another objection is, that the Grand Trunk Railway was not organized when the election of August, 1869, took place. I do not think that that would render the election absolutely void. The company was not required to do any act until the election took place, and until they were called upon to make an acceptance of the subscription. It might possibly be a question whether it ever would be organized, unless the subscriptions were made as authorized.

The ninth and tenth objections as to the issuing of coupons, and the completion of the road, I have already considered.

As to the delivery of the bonds, the facts seem to be that the bonds were issued, and placed in the hands of a third party, with instructions to deliver them under certain circumstances, and he delivered them, as he supposed, in compliance with the instructions. Now, there may be a very serious question whether, when bonds are delivered in such a way as this, to a third party, and are by that third party turned over, and come into the hands of an innocent holder for value, the party so placing them in the third party's hands, should not, in case of any irregularity in relation to the matter, or of non-compliance with instructions, suffer the consequences of such irregularity, or non-compliance with instructions, and it seems to me that under the evidence in this case, and what is stated in the bonds, and as against this plaintiff, the defendant must, if there has been any non-compliance with regulations or instructions, suffer the consequences.

This disposes of all the objections, and I think that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount of the coupons sued on, with interest from the time the coupons ought to have been paid. The principles which are here stated are, I think, fairly deducible from the numerous decisions of the supreme court of the United States, upon the subject of municipal bonds in the hands of bona fide holders for value.

[The case was taken by the defendant, on a writ of error, to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. 18 Wall. (85 U. S.) 552.]

BANKRUPTCY—VOLUNTARY SUBMISSION OF BANKRUPT TO ARREST—MOTION TO SET ASIDE BANKRUPTCY.

After involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced, the petitioning creditors commenced an action in a state court against the bankrupt and another, to recover a debt, composed in part of a note set forth as protested in the petition in bankruptcy. In that action, they obtained an order of arrest, but they gave instructions to the sheriff not to arrest the bankrupt or serve him with the summons. The bankrupt voluntarily surrendered himself to the sheriff, and gave bail, and then moved, before the return of the order to show cause, to set aside the bankruptcy proceedings. Held, that the bankrupt had not removed himself from the effect of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and that the motion must be denied.

[In the matter of George Merkle, an alleged bankrupt.]

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a motion, on the part of an alleged bankrupt, made before the return of the order to show cause why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt, to set aside the proceedings against him, for the reason that, since the commencement of the proceedings, the petitioning creditors have caused him to be arrested and held to bail in an action, commenced in a state court, to recover a debt composed in part of the note set forth as protested in the petition.

Whatever force there might be in the position that the taking of the bankrupt upon an order of arrest amounts to a satisfaction of the debt, is destroyed, in this case, by the fact disclosed, that although an action was commenced by the petitioners, in which the bankrupt and another person were joined as defendants, and an order to arrest both defendants was granted by the state court, specific instructions were given to the sheriff, not to arrest the bankrupt, nor to serve him with the summons in this action, and that the arrest of the bankrupt was made because he voluntarily surrendered himself to the sheriff, and voluntarily gave bail, in that action, without the knowledge or assent of the petitioners, who now disclaim the proceeding, as against the bankrupt, and offer to give their consent to cancel the bail bond, if any consent on their part be necessary.

A person proceeded against as a bankrupt, does not, by voluntarily placing himself under arrest, or in jail, or in any other place of confinement, remove himself from the effect of the bankruptcy act. The motion is denied.

MARITIME LIENS—REPAIRS—LAW OF CANADA.

There being no lien by the local law for repairs furnished in Canada, no proceeding in rem can be maintained here to enforce the payment of such repairs.

This was a libel for repairs furnished to the schooner Mermaid, at the port of Amherstburg, in the province of Canada West. It was admitted, by stipulation, that the vessel was a Canadian bottom, owned in Canada; that there was no local statute of that province giving a lien to material-men, and that the contract for the repairs was also made at Amherstburg.

J. S. Newberry, for libellant.

D. B. Duffield, for claimant.

WILKINS, District Judge. By the constitution of the United States, its judicial power extends to "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction;" and it is contended, by the counsel for libellant, that this language embraces the general maritime law of continental Europe, unrestricted by the rulings of the English courts limiting admiralty jurisdiction to the ebb and flow of the tide; and that, by this general law, which, as part of the law of nations, is recognized in Canada, the fact of making the repairs of itself created a lien upon the vessel enforceable in this court. I cannot so rule. The Mermaid was a foreign vessel in the port of Detroit, and liable in this court for supplies furnished here, yet if no lien attached at her home port, where the contract was made and performed, none can be enforced here. The law of England covers her provinces, unless changed by provincial statutes; and there being no local law giving this lien, and no ebb and flow of the tide bringing the waters of the lakes within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, as interpreted by the English courts, there was no lien existing against the vessel. Libel dismissed.

NOTE. It will be observed that the Mermaid was a Canadian bottom, consequently the case presents the ordinary feature of repairs furnished in a home port, for which there was then confessedly no lien, under the decision in the case of the General Smith. Had the Mermaid been an American vessel, the question might have been one of greater difficulty. See The Avon [Case No. 680]; The Champion [Id. 2,583].

OFFICERS—COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—FEES—DEPUTY—ABSENCE—DEATH.

1. Under the 22d section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 644), where the deputy of a collector of the customs acts for the collector, in cases of occasional and necessary absence and of sickness, the collector still acts, but acts by the deputy, and is entitled to all the perquisites and emoluments of the office; but, where the collector is disabled or dies, the duties and authorities vested in him devolve on the deputy, and the perquisites and emoluments which accrue to the office of collector, after such disability or death, do not belong to the collector, or to his estate.

[Cited in Chadwick v. Earhart, 11 Or. 389, 4 Pac. 1181.]

2. No officer is entitled to the emoluments of an office for any longer period than the period during which he holds the office.

3. The provisions of the statutes of the United States on that subject, cited.

4. The right to the compensation attached to an office grows out of the discharge of the duties of such office, and its emoluments do not belong to a person who does not discharge its duties.

This was a final hearing, on pleadings and proofs, of a suit originally brought in a state court, and removed into this court by certiorari. Preston King, while holding the office of collector of customs for the district of the city of New York, died, on the 13th of November, 1865, at said city, intestate. The plaintiff [Ela N. Merriam] was appointed his administrator, on the 25th of November, 1865, by the surrogate of St. Lawrence county, New York. Mr. King became such collector on the 1st of September, 1865. On the 22d of September, 1865, Mr. King, by an instrument in writing executed by him, under his hand and official seal, appointed the defendant "special deputy collector of customs." The material parts of that instrument were in these words: "District of the City of New York. To Charles P. Clinch. By virtue of the powers vested in me by the 22d section of the act of March 2d, 1799, chapter 28, and in pursuance of the treasury circular of February 1st, 1850, appended to the treasury circular of April 3d, 1842, I hereby constitute and appoint you special deputy collector of the customs, within this district, to act for me during my absence or sickness, and, in case of my disability or death, the duties and authorities vested in me as collector will, by law, devolve on you, my special deputy." From the time of the death of Mr. King until the 16th of May, 1866, the defendant acted as collector of customs for said district, under said appointment as special deputy. During that time, large sums of money accrued and became due and payable, for the salary of the collector of customs of said district, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures. The plaintiff claimed that these sums pertained, as perquisites of office, to such collector, and came into the hands of the defendant in a fiduciary capacity, as the servant, agent, and special deputy of Mr. King. He averred that the defendant claimed to hold and retain such sums in his own right, and refused to account for them, or pay them over to the plaintiff. The prayer of the bill was, in substance, that the defendant pay over to the plaintiff all such moneys as had come into the hands of the defendant, as such servant, agent, and special deputy of Mr. King, as such collector, on account of the salary of the collector of said district, and on account of the share of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and other perquisites of office, pertaining to said office, accruing or arising between November 13th, 1865, and May 16th, 1866. The defendant, prior to his said appointment as special deputy was appointed assistant collector of customs at the port of New York, under section 16 of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 753), and, from the time of his said appointment as such assistant collector, until the 16th of May, 1866, he received and retained a salary as such assistant collector, at the rate fixed by law for that office, $5,000 per annum, and, in addition, he received and retained, from the 13th of November, 1865, to the 16th of May, 1866, the full salary allowed by law to the collector, and the share of fines, penalties, and forfeitures allowed by law to the collector.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The question involved in this case arises under the 22d section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 644). That section provides, that "every collector, * * * in cases of occasional and necessary absence and of sickness, and not otherwise, may * * * exercise and perform" his "functions, powers, and duties, by deputy, duly constituted" under his hand and seal, "for whom, in the execution of his trust," he "shall be answerable;" and "that, in case of the disability or death of a collector, the duties and authorities vested in him shall devolve on his deputy, if any there be, at the time of such disability or death, for whose conduct the estate of such disabled or deceased collector shall be liable." The section provides for two classes of cases in which the collector is unable to discharge himself the duties of his office. The first class is where the collector is necessarily occasionally absent, or is sick. The second class is where the collector is disabled or dead. In the first class of cases, the collector does not cease to exercise or perform the functions, powers, or duties of his office. On the contrary, by the express language of the section, he continues to exercise and perform such functions, powers, and duties, but he exercises and performs them by his deputy. Such deputy must be duly constituted such deputy under the hand and seal of the collector, and the collector is made answerable for the execution, by such deputy, of his trust. In the second class of cases, that is, the disability or death of the collector, the duties and authorities vested in him devolve on his deputy, if there be one at the time of such disability or death, that is, on the deputy whom the section thus authorizes him to constitute; and the estate of such disabled or deceased collector is made liable for the conduct of such deputy. In the second class of cases, if there be a deputy, the collector does not continue to exercise and perform the functions, powers, and duties of the office by the deputy, but the duties and authorities before vested in the collector devolve on the deputy; and, in such second class of cases, if there be no deputy, then, by a provision in the same section, the duties and authorities before vested in the collector devolve on the naval officer of the same district, if any there be, and, if there be no naval officer, then on the surveyor of the port, if any there be, and, if there be none, then on the surveyor of the nearest port in the district. The section also provides, that the authorities of the person empowered to act in the stead of a disabled or dead collector shall continue until a successor to such collector shall be duly appointed and ready to enter upon the execution of his office If, under this section, there is no person empowered to act in the stead of the disabled or dead collector, then the duties and authorities before vested in the collector do not devolve on any one.

Now, where a deputy, constituted under this law, acts for the collector, in cases of occasional and necessary absence and of sickness, the collector still acts, but acts by the deputy, and is entitled to all the perquisites and emoluments of the office, as fully, while so acting by deputy, as if he did not so act by deputy. But, when the collector is disabled or dies, then the duties and authorities vested in him devolve on the deputy thus constituted. The collector, in such case, whether he be disabled or dead, does not exercise or perform his functions, powers, and duties, by such deputy, nor does he act by such deputy, nor is he entitled to the perquisites and emoluments of the office, which he would have been entitled to, if he had not become disabled or had not died. The duties and authorities of the office devolve on such deputy, if there be one, and, if there be none, then on the other officers successively, who are designated in the section. The word "authorities" is broad enough to include the emoluments of the office. The "duties" of the office include the obligations which the officer owes to superior authority and to the public. The "authorities" of the office are the powers and prerogatives with which the office is clothed, connected with the discharge of his duties, including, not only such powers as are necessary to enable him to discharge his duties properly, but the right and the power to demand and receive the emoluments attached by law to the office.

These views accord with settled principles. The constitution of the United States (article 2, § 6) provides, that "in case of the removal of the president from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the vice president." The provision, in this section of the constitution, that the powers and duties of the office of president shall devolve on the vice president, is identical, in legal effect, with the provision, in the 22d section of the act of 1799, that the authorities and duties vested in the collector shall devolve on his deputy. Three times, since the adoption of the constitution, the president has died, and, under the provision referred to, the powers and duties of the office of president have devolved upon the vice president. All branches of the government have, under such circumstances, recognized the vice president as holding the office of president, as authorized to assume its title, and as entitled to its emoluments. The vice president holds the office of president until a successor to the deceased president comes to assume the office, at the expiration of the term for which the deceased president and the vice president were elected. The deputy, under section 22 of the act of 1799, holds the office of collector, until a successor to the disabled or deceased collector is duly appointed, and ready to enter upon the execution of his office. It has never been supposed that, under the provision of the constitution, the vice president, in acting as president, acted as the servant, or agent, or locum tenens of the deceased president, or in any other capacity than as holding the office of president fully, for the time being, by virtue of express authority emanating from the United States. So, in the case of the collector, the deputy, in acting as collector, after the death of the collector, who constituted him such deputy, does not act as the servant or agent of the deceased collector, but holds the office of collector fully, for the time being, by virtue of express authority emanating from the United States. The fact that, in the one case, the constitution itself designates the person on whom the powers and duties of the office shall devolve, and that, in the other case, the collector is authorized, before his decease, to designate such person, makes no difference in the principle. The person so legally designated becomes, when he assumes the powers and duties so devolved upon him, the direct agent of the government, and not the agent or servant of any individual who may have designated him.

It is, also, a well established principle, that no officer is entitled to the emoluments of an office for any longer period than the period during which he holds the office. And the legislation of congress is to this effect. The purport of the statutory provisions on the subject of the compensation of public officers—Act March 3, 1839, § 3 (5 Stat. 349); Act Aug. 23, 1842, § 2 (5 Stat. 510); Act Aug. 26, 1842, § 12 (5 Stat. 525); Act Sept. 30, 1850, § 1 (9 Stat. 542, 543)—is, that no person is entitled to receive the emoluments of an office which he does not hold. Opinion of Attorney General Crittenden, 5 Op. Attys. Gen. 768.

In the present case, Mr. King, by his death, ceased to hold the office of collector; and not only so, but the duties and authorities before that time vested in him, then devolved on the defendant, because the defendant had, during the lifetime of Mr. King, been duly constituted by him his deputy, in accordance with the provisions of the 22d section of the act of 1799. The designation of the defendant as deputy, made by Mr. King, was made strictly in accordance with those provisions. The instrument refers to the section, and then states, that Mr. King constitutes and appoints the defendant special deputy collector of the customs, within the district of the city of New York, to act for him during his absence or sickness, and then adds, "and, in case of my disability or death, the duties and authorities vested in me as collector, will, by law, devolve on you, my special deputy."

I am unable to see any ground upon which the right of Mr. King to the emoluments of the office of collector, after his death, can rest. It is urged, that the provision of the section in question, which declares that the estate of the deceased collector shall be liable for the conduct of the deputy, gives to the estate of the deceased collector a title to the emoluments of the office, during its administration by the deputy. Indeed, the claim of the plaintiff seems to be put wholly on that provision; and the idea that the defendant, in administering the office, under his appointment as such deputy, acted as the servant or agent of Mr. King, and not as a direct agent of the government, can rest on nothing but that provision. But that provision cannot have the effect claimed for it. Under that clause of the 22d section which relates to the absence and sickness of the collector, he is entitled to the emoluments of his office while he is so absent or sick, and yet he is expressly, by the section, made answerable for the execution of the trust of his deputy, during such absence or sickness. But he is entitled to such emoluments in that case, not because he is answerable for the acts of his deputy during such absence or sickness, but because he himself, by the very terms of the act, still execises and performs the functions, powers, and duties of the office, although he does so by deputy. Under that clause of the same section which relates to the disability and death of the collector, he is not entitled to the emoluments of the office, after he dies, although his estate is, by the section, expressly made liable for the conduct of the deputy whom he designates. The reason why he is not entitled to such emoluments in that case, is, because he ceases, by his death, to hold the office, and to exercise or perform its functions, powers, and duties. The liability of his estate for the conduct of the deputy, after his death, is a special liability, attached by law, as a condition. No person is bound to accept the office of collector, but, if he does, he takes it subject to the burdens which the law imposes on the holding of it. Nor, after he takes it, is he compelled to appoint a deputy, under section 22 of the act of 1799. The provision is permissive only. But, if he avails himself of it, and appoints a deputy, with the incidental advantage to himself of being able, under the section, to perform, by deputy, while occasionally and necessarily absent or sick, the duties of the office, and thus enjoy, while so absent or sick, its emoluments, he makes such appointment of a deputy subject to the condition imposed by the statute, that, on his own death, the duties and authorities of the office devolve on such deputy, and his own estate becomes liable, after his death, for the conduct of such deputy, while administering the office. Under the section, but one appointment of a deputy, for any purpose, can be in force at any one time. The same person, when designated, is to act in the cases of absence, sickness, disability, and death; and the collector, in availing himself of the privilege of performing the duties of his office, during his lifetime, while absent or sick, by such deputy, must take on himself all the liabilities which the designation of such deputy imposes. And there is nothing unreasonable in making the estate of the deceased collector liable for the conduct of the deputy, or in withholding from it, notwithstanding such liability, the emoluments of the office, during the term of such liability. The liability is imposed because the collector has the sole and unresrticted designation of the deputy. No superior officer of the government has any voice in approving or disapproving, confirming or rejecting, such appointment. Hence, the manifest propriety of holding the estate of the deceased collector liable for the conduct of the deputy after the death of the collector, so long as such deputy continues to act as the agent of the government, under a designation made by the deceased collector. But there would be no propriety in giving to the estate of the deceased collector the emoluments of the office during such period. The right to the compensation attached to an office grows out of the discharge of the duties of such office, and its emoluments do not belong to a person who does not discharge its duties. Conner v. City of New York, 1 Seld. [5 N. Y.] 296.

I do not think that the fact that the defendant has, with or without the assent of the government, continued to receive, during the period in question, the salary appertaining to the office of assistant collector of customs at the port of New York, has any bearing upon the question of the right of Mr. King's estate to the emoluments of the office of collector during that period.

In passing on the question involved, I only decide that Mr. King's estate is not entitled to those emoluments. I do not mean to decide that the defendant is entitled to retain them. Whether there is any thing in the fact that the defendant accepted the salary of assistant collector, that precludes him from claiming the emoluments of the office of collector during the same period; or whether there was such an incompatibility between his acting as collector and his being assistant collector, as to make it impossible for him to hold both offices, and to authorize the government to call upon him to elect which office he would hold, and whether he has, in fact, made such election in favor of the assistant collectorship; or whether, under the general rule and practice, that, where an officer holding one office is authorized to perform the duties of another, he may receive the emoluments of the office which he is thus temporarily filling, but cannot receive his own at the same time, the defendant may have the emoluments of the collectorship on relinquishing those of the assistant collectorship; or whether, if he would be otherwise entitled to the emoluments of the office of collector, he is not entitled to them because of his not having taken, on the death of Mr. King, the oath required by the 4th section of the act of June 1, 1789 (1 Stat. 23), or the oath required by the 20th section of the act of March 2, 1799 (5 Stat. 641); or whether, as to so much of such emoluments as consists of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, the naval officer of the district and the surveyor of the port, are, under section 91 of the same act (5 Stat. 697), entitled to what would have been Mr. King's share of the same if he had lived, on the ground that, within the meaning of that section, there was no collector in the district, until such a successor to Mr. King as the 22d section of that act speaks of, was duly appointed—are questions not involved in this case, and in regard to which I neither express nor intimate any opinion.

The bill must be dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 9,461.

MERRIAM et al. v. DRAKE.

[9 Blatchf. 336; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 259.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Jan. 16, 1872.

PATENTS — COMBINATION — EQUIVALENTS — SAME RESULT—WHIP SOCKETS.

1. The claim of the reissued letters patent granted to John O. Merriam and Edwin Chamberlin, as assignees of Charles B. Morehouse, the inventor, July 12th, 1870, for an "improvement in whip-sockets," the original patent having been granted to said Morehouse February 6th, 1866, namely, "The whip-socket, B, having permanently attached thereto the stationary jaw or clamp, E, in combination with the detachable jaw or clamp, G, whereby the said whip-socket may be fastened to, and connected with, the dash-board rod of a carriage or other vehicle, substantially in the manner and by the means herein described and set forth," is a claim to a whip-socket having, at the top and bottom thereof, metal rings or flanges, for the purpose of giving support and strength, with a stationary jaw of a clamp permanently attached thereto, and a detachable jaw, to be applied to clasp the rod of the dash-board, the detachable jaw forming, in connection with its fellow, a mouth or double jaw, which can be slid off and upon the object to which it is to be fastened, and made tight thereon by the single screw which holds its outer end to its fellow.

2. Such form of clamp allows the whip-socket to be made fast to the dash-board rod without perforating the leather thereof.

3. Such claim is not infringed by a whip-socket which has no rings or flanges, and has a substantially different clamp, requiring the perforation of the leather of the dash-board to admit of its application thereto.

[This was a proceeding by John O. Merriam and Edwin Chamberlin against Francis Drake to restrain certain infringements.]

for an "improvement in whip-sockets," granted to Charles B. Morehouse, February 6, 1866; assigned to complainants, and reissued to them July 12, 1870 [No. 4,071]. The invention is illustrated by the above engraving, in which the upper ring and clamp and the dash-board and rod are omitted. The description in the specification is as follows: "The nature of the said invention and improvement consists in the use of a whip-socket, having permanently attached thereto a suitably shaped extension or extensions, adapted to fit the dash-board rod of a carriage or other vehicle, in combination with one or more screw-caps, whereby said whip-socket may be securely fastened to the dash-board rod, substantially in the manner and for the purpose hereinafter more fully described and specified." It described the construction and operation of the invention as follows: "The whip-socket, B, may be made in any usual shape, and of any material desired, having at the top and bottom thereof metal rings or flanges, D, which are for the purpose of supporting and strengthening the whip-socket, B, and form part thereof. To these rings or flanges, D, are securely and permanently attached the stationary clamps, E. These clamps, E, should be of proper shape and size to conform to the dash-rod. The clamp, G, is made of malleable cast-iron, or other metal, and, in size and shape to correspond with the stationary clamp, E. The operation of the improved fastening is as follows: The whip-socket, B, is placed against the dash-board, A, the stationary clamps, E, fitting closely against the dash-board rod, K. The clamp, G, is then placed against the said dash-rod, K, opposite to the stationary clamp, E, and then, by means of a screw or screws, or other mechanical means, the said clamps are forced together, securely clamping, clasping, and grasping the dash-board rod, K, thereby securely holding and fastening the whip-socket, B, in its proper place and position, yet detachable at pleasure." The claim was in these words, as follows: "The whip-socket, B, having permanently attached thereto the stationary jaw or clamp, E, in combination with the detachable jaw or clamp, G, whereby the said whip-socket may be fastened to and connected with the dash-board rod of a carriage or other vehicle, substantially in the manner and by the means herein described and set forth."][2]

John B. Gale, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. It will be seen, from the description and claim of the patent, that the patentees do not claim that either of the parts which make up their improved whip-socket is new. The whip-socket itself may be made in any usual shape, and of any material desired, having, however, at the top and bottom thereof, metal rings or flanges, plainly indicating, as, also, the plaintiffs' proofs in regard to the previous state of the art show, that whip-sockets for sustaining the whip, and attached to the dash-board rod, were not new, but were precisely what the patentees claim to have improved. And there is no claim, obviously there could be none, that clamps were not well known and common devices for clasping and holding, permanently or temporarily, as the case might require, whatever might be placed between the two jaws thereof. Nor is the feature, that one jaw is permanent or fixed, and the other movable and detachable, claimed to be, in itself, novel. The manner in which parts of machinery are clamped by a double or single jaw; the well known clamping tools of the joiner, the cabinet-maker, the shoe-maker, and the blacksmith; the common device of a clamp connected with, and forming part of, various articles in domestic use, to fasten them to a table, or to a fixture, as, for example, the common reel, the needle cushion, and like articles found in the shops, and in the use of the seamstress or embroiderer—is familiar. Nor could the patentees claim the use of a clamp generally, as a means of attaching a whip-socket to a dash-board. That would be claiming, as an invention, the mere application of an old device to a new use, which, by itself alone, is not the subject of a patent.

In view of the state of the art, and of the want of any pretence, in the specification or claim, that either of the parts are new, the claim of the plaintiffs' patent must be construed to be for a whip-socket constructed substantially as described, that is to say, having, at the top and bottom thereof, metal rings or flanges, for the purpose of giving support and strength, with a stationary jaw of a clamp permanently attached thereto, and a detachable jaw, to be applied, by some mechanical means, so as to clasp the rod of the dash-board; and, as clamps are of various form and manner of application, the precise form and mode of attaching the detachable jaw in the plaintiffs' patent is carefully exhibited in the drawings, where it is exhibited as forming, in connection with its fellow, a mouth or double jaw, which, (like the clamp attached to a lady's pin and needle cushion) can be slid off and upon the object to which it is to be fastened, and made tight thereon by the single screw which holds its outer end to its fellow. It is a whip-socket having this combination, and the devices employed to adapt each part to its place and office in the combination, that is secured to the plaintiffs by their patent; and, each part being old, the plaintiffs could not, and do not, by their patent, close the door to any other combination of these old elements, or to any other mode of combining them which is not substantially like that employed by the plaintiffs.

The office, as well as the advantage, of the form of clamp specified by the plaintiffs as a part of their whip-socket, is shown by the evidence, as well as by the specification annexed to the original patent, of which the patent relied upon is a reissue. It was deemed important, that the whip-socket should be so constructed that it could be made fast to the dash-board rod without cutting, perforating, or injuring the leather which constitutes the dash-board. That was the chief feature in the patent. Other patents existed for fastening a whip-socket by means of a metallic clamp differing but little from the one used by the plaintiffs; but the application thereof to the dash-board rod involved the cutting or perforating of the leather to permit one jaw of the clamp to pass through, so as to embrace the rod, when the socket was in its proper position. Accordingly, the specification and drawings of the original patent, and of the reissue, describe, exhibit, and refer to a peculiar arrangement of the jaws of the clamp, so that, at one end, they are held together and tightened by the clamp-screw, and, at the other end, are open, to be slid sidewise upon the rod, before the screw is made tight; and they may be removed in like manner, without disfiguring the leather of the dash-board.

I do not suggest that such a whip-socket, made up of these several parts arranged and adapted to each other in the manner described, was not a patentable device. Its peculiar arrangement of the parts, and their adaptation to the purpose in view, probably made it something more than a putting of an old device to a new use; but the patent stands upon rather narrow ground. It does not cover every possible mode of clamping a whip-socket to a dash-board, but, at most, only a mode which is substantially the same.

The defendant does not use or sell such a whip-socket as is described or referred to in the plaintiffs' specification, nor one that is at all like it. His socket consists of two parts hinged upon each other, so as to open and close at the top and bottom alternately, as the whip shall be inserted or withdrawn. It has no rings or flanges at the top or bottom, nor elsewhere thereon. Indeed, rings or flanges could not be placed thereon at all, without destroying its chief and peculiar characteristic, namely, the opening thereof at the top, to receive the whip, and the closing thereof around the whip when it is thrust to the bottom, and opening, in turn, when the whip is withdrawn. The defendant does not, therefore, use the plaintiffs' rings, nor any equivalent device, for either would be impracticable. The rings in the plaintiffs' whip-socket serve a double purpose. They strengthen the socket, and are its sole support, and are the base of the clamps, by an extension thereon forming the permanent jaws. The whip-socket used or sold by the defendant has not, and cannot have, any such rings. It is made of sufficient strength to render them unnecessary for either strength or support. It will not avail the plaintiffs to say, that, by making the defendant's socket of a form, or thickness, or strength sufficient to render the rings unnecessary, the defendant does employ an equivalent. Not so. He dispenses with the plaintiffs' device altogether. He has no need to use it, and is unable to use it. He has contrived another mode of giving strength and support, and has provided, in such other mode, for attaching it to the clasp which he employs to secure it to the dash-board. It is not true, that a device is necessarily equivalent to another, merely because it effects the same result. The whole field of invention is cultivated with a view to devise other and new modes of effecting results that are known and common. The defendant does not use or sell a whip-socket having a clamp substantially like that which is described in the plaintiffs' patent. True, he fastens the whip-socket to the dash-board rod. That is the result attained by both. But, as already, in substance, suggested, the plaintiffs have not secured to themselves a monopoly of the result, but only of the special means of accomplishing it, in the combination constituting the whip-socket described, and such other means as are, in the combination, equivalent thereto. To one side of the body of the defendant's whip-socket are permanently attached projections, with outward curved faces, fitting the side of the dash-board rod, and, on the outer side of the rod, a strap of metal, also curved, is applied to the rod, and, by a screw at each end, passing to the projections first named, this strap is drawn down upon the rod and clasps it, drawing the inner projections on the socket firmly against the rod. This part of the defendant's whip-socket is not like that of the plaintiffs in form, nor in mechanical structure, nor in mode of operation, nor in its result, except only that it does fasten the whip-socket to the rod. It requires that the leather of the dash-board be cut or perforated, to allow of its application. It cannot be slipped upon the rod sidewise, and so removed at pleasure. It cannot be moved from one position to another, slid up or down, without new perforations of the leather, with each change of position, thus disfiguring the dash-board. In short, the defendant's whip-socket, with its adaptation to use, is a different organization, and constitutes no infringement of the plaintiffs' patent.

The bill of complaint must be dismissed, with costs.

PATENTS—WHIP-SOCKETS—EQUIVALENTS.

1. The complainant's patent, for a combination, with whip sockets, of the particular means described for attaching them to carriages—the device used being a clamp, one arm of which is formed of projections on the side of the socket, and the other of a lever of the third order, both curved to fit the dash-rail of a carriage, and so constructed that it will fasten to the rail without reaching round it, and is worked by a screw and nut; is not infringed by the use of a socket, with a clamp extending around the rail made up of projections from the socket, a bar to go behind the dash-rail, and two screws with nuts, one on each side of the rail.

2. It is not infringed by the use of a socket with a clamp extending around the rail, made up of projections from the socket, a bar to go behind the rail, and a bar hinged to a projection at one side of the rail.

Josiah P. Fitch, for complainants.

Charles J. Hunt, for defendants.

WHEELER, District Judge. This cause has been heard on pleadings, proofs and argument. The plaintiffs own reissued patent, No. 5,713, dated December 30th, 1873, which they allege the defendants infringe. The defendants, among other defences, deny any infringement.

The invention is of an attachment to whip-sockets for fastening them to carriages. Not of whip-sockets, nor of the attachment of them to carriages, for those things were long before known, but of the combination, with whip-sockets, of the particular means described for attaching them to carriages. This is all that is claimed of the patent, and all the patent the invention would bear.

The device used is a clamp, one arm of which is formed of projections on the side of the socket, and the other of a lever of the third order, both curved to fit the dash rail of a carriage; and it will fasten to the rail without reaching round it, and is worked by a screw and nut.

The defendants have sockets, with two different attachments, for fastening them to carriages. Each consists of a clamp, and so far in name their methods are like the plaintiffs'. But each of their clamps is quite different from the plaintiffs'. One is made up of projections from the socket, a bar to go behind the dash-rail, and two screws, with nuts, one each side of the rail. The other, of like projections, and bar to go behind the rail, with the bar hinged to a projection at one side of the rail, and worked by a nut and screw at the other side of the rail. Both extend around the rail.

If the patent had been for the result of attaching a whip-socket to a carriage by the means described, it might be said that the defendants accomplished a result of which the plaintiffs had a monopoly by means mechanically equivalent to the plaintiffs, and that they thereby infringed. But here the whole field of attaching sockets to carriages was left open, except as to the use of the means described, and the monopoly of the use of those could not be infringed by the use of others not the same.

From the comparison of the two methods of the defendants with those of the plaintiffs, they do not appear to be the same. They may be equivalents in accomplishing a result, but not in methods of accomplishing it, so there does not appear to be any infringement.

This result makes the consideration of the other defences set up wholly unnecessary for the purposes of the suit. Let a decree be entered dismissing the bill of complaint, with costs.

District Court, E. D. Michigan.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBTS—REGISTER—COMMISSIONER—DISCRETION TO REFUSE—RECEIPT AND FILING.

1. As the law now stands, proof of debts in bankruptcy may be taken by a register or by a commissioner in all cases, whether of a resident or non-resident creditor, or whether such commissioner holds his office in the same town with the register or not. The only limitation being that it shall be taken before a register or commissioner of the same judicial district in which the creditor resides or in which the proceedings are pending.

2. The court has no discretion to refuse to receive and file a proof of debt which appears on its face to have been taken by a proper officer and to be correct in form and in substance.

3. The receipt and filing of proof of debt alone confers jurisdiction over the claim on the court, and then only does its revising power over such proof, mentioned in the act of 1868 [15 Stat. 228], commence. The receiving and filing of a proof of debt concludes nothing, and the power still remains in the court to revise and correct, or reject such proof altogether.

[In the matter of W. B. Merrick, a bankrupt.]

By Hovey K. Clarke, Register:

I, the above named register, hereby certify that in the course of proceedings before me in the above bankruptcy, on the 12th day of November instant, Mr. O. Kirchner presented to me to be filed as proof of debt against the above bankrupt's estate, an affidavit drawn up by himself, and sworn to on the same day before Ervin Parmer, "United States commissioner, Eastern district of Michigan." Observing the date of the jurat, I inquired where the claimant then was, to which Mr. Kirchner replied that he did not know. I then inquired why he had not been produced before me to prove his claim, remarking that the paper offered appeared to be an "affidavit" and not a deposition. To this no reply was given, except to concede that it was an affidavit, drawn by Mr. Kirchner, and that he had a right to insist on its being filed. I declined to take it and he withdrew. On the 14th of November Mr. Kirchner again appeared and "tendered" the paper to be filed, the theory of a "tender" seeming to be, that in this case the paper offered so fully satisfied the law in every particular that the register had no discretion whatever; that his duty had become clerical only, namely, to file the paper and thus admit the claim of Edmund Cole as satisfactorily proved. I am unable to concur in this view of the powers and duties of registers in taking proof of debts. I have not been furnished with a statement of the principle of law by which this view of my duty is supposed to be supported, unless a reference to Shephard's Case [Case No. 12,753], may be regarded as conveying by inference such statement. I do not see anything in the case to which I am referred, that has any bearing on the question before me, except that United States circuit court commissioners are authorized to take depositions to prove debts in bankruptcy within the district where the case is pending. This was a disputed point before the amendment to the bankrupt act of July 27, 1868, Hall, J., in Shephard's Case [supra], holding that the commissioners had such power; and Busteed, J., in Re Haley [Case No. 5,918], holding that they had not. But the act of 1868 gives this power with sufficient clearness, so that I do not see how any question can be raised upon it. I have always hitherto been able when certifying for the determination by the district judge questions which arise on my own powers and duties, to state with some definiteness the point to be decided. If in this certificate I shall not be able to state the case as it is regarded by Mr. Kirchner, who demands the filing of the proof of debt in this case, my inability is not the result of any indifference on my part to the duty I am called to perform. Each of my interviews with him was ended so abruptly, that no proper opportunity was afforded me to state my views of his demand. The last interview was closed by his positive assertion that there was no question in the case. Under these circumstances I am obliged to discuss every question which seems to me pertinent, or may be so regarded by the district judge, in the determination of the propriety of the demand that the paper shall be filed as proof of debt due to Edmund Cole.

I. The duties of a register to whom a cause in bankruptcy is referred, in taking and filing proof of debt, are not only judicial and clerical, but they are also supervisory. The first meeting of creditors for the proof of debts and the choice of an assignee is called a "court of bankruptcy" (section 11), which the register is to hold and in which he is to preside (sec. 4). It cannot be doubted, I think, that the powers given to "the court" by the act as to the proof of debts are by the general order of reference (from No. 4) conferred upon the register, subject of course, to the transfer to the district judge for determination of any issue of law or fact which may arise in the proof of debts. What general powers could be committed to him by the order of reference if these are not? The provision of section twenty-two, that the deposition must be satisfactory to the officer taking it, and, as if to provide for the case of a proof taken before a commissioner, the provisions which authorize the requiring of "further pertinent evidence either for or against the admission of claims," and the provisions of section twenty-three, authorizing the postponement of a proof of claim, where "doubts are entertained concerning its validity,"—the exercise of which power must be conceded to the register, for proofs of debts in the first instance can be presented nowhere else but to him—and the act of 1868, under which commissioners within the district of the register in charge of the case derive their power to take deposition in bankruptcy, and which expressly subjects all such proofs to the revision of the register, all seem to me to be irreconcilable with the proposition that the register's powers over a proof of debt, taken before a commissioner, in a cause referred to him, is confined to the merely clerical function of filing it. I regard his powers, and consequently his duties, as of a much more responsible character than this; and they are of a character which every real creditor has an interest in their faithful and intelligent performance. If the register's duties were judicial only he might rest his action upon the theory, that as every creditor is a party to every proffered claim, any other creditor adverse to the claimant may appear and raise any question touching the validity of the claim, and so long as no question was presented to him by a party he was not called to the exercise of any duty concerning such proffered claim; but this would be practically impossible, and hence the importance to every creditor of the supervisory power expressly vested with registers by the act of 1868. Every creditor is interested in the maintenance of this power in its fullest efficiency in the hands of the register, and it ought not be in the power of any creditor, or party claiming to be such, to evade or defy it. If I have in this statement correctly apprehended the powers of the register in taking proof of debts, I think he has a right to be informed, and that it is his duty to know why a creditor claiming to have a debt against a bankrupt's estate, instead of attending before the register, specially charged with the powers of the court in taking proofs, and submitting to the examination which the act contemplates, goes before a commissioner of his own selection, having his office in the same building with the register, and thus without any apparent reason evades the scrutiny which the register might exercise; and if the claimant refuse to answer, I think it my duty to decline to take the proof until some reason is given for what appears to be an evasion of the order of reference. I do not think that the power to take depositions in bankruptcy was conferred upon commissioners for any such purpose. It was designed for the relief of creditors who are at inconvenient distances from the register—a privilege which it would be well if it were possible to extend. The passage of the act of 1868 had a very beneficial effect in this respect; but I cannot think it was the purpose of the act to allow this convenience to be converted into a means of transferring some of the most important duties of the register to commissioners having their offices in the same place, and, stripping the register of all his supervisory powers, leave to him the merely clerical duty of filing proofs taken before commissioners.

II. Proofs of debts are to be established as provided by section twenty-two of the act, by depositions, not affidavits, taken before a register or commissioner. The provisions of the act on this subject are peculiar. Among them is this: "That no claim shall be allowed unless all the statements set forth in such deposition shall appear to be true." Appear to whom? Of course to the officer taking it. That it must be "satisfactory" to him the act very plainly requires. I do not see how it can be supposed that an affidavit drawn by the attorney of the affiant, and merely sworn to before the officer authorized to take a deposition, is a compliance with this provision of the act. The distinction between a deposition and an affidavit ought to be well understood, for notwithstanding the words are sometimes inaccurately used, and an "affiant" is often called a "deponent," (see Burrill, Law Dict. p. 366, "Depositions,") yet, strictly, in a deposition the statements are reduced to writing by the officer taking it, or by a disinterested person under his direction, and thus he becomes officially cognizant of what the deposition contains, as he certainly ought to be, if it is required that it shall be satisfactory to him. On the contrary, an affidavit is an ex parte statement drawn by the attorney of the party interested in it, of the contents of which the officer who administers the oath is not expected to have any knowledge, and in a very large proportion of cases he has no knowledge of such contents whatever. To infer from the jurat to an affidavit that the officer administering the oath had examined the affidavit, or had made himself in any way acquainted with its contents, or knew even that the affiant was acquainted with and understood its contents, would be contradicting an experience nearly universal. In the few cases, in all, however, not amounting to half a dozen, where this practice has been attempted before, of presenting as proofs of debts affidavits drawn by attorneys and sworn to before commissioners, which, having declined to receive, when the claimants subsequently appeared before me to prove their claims, I have found in almost every instance that the proof had not been read to the claimant by the commissioner and that in some instances only what the attorneys supposed to be the substance of it had been stated to the affiant before he swore to it. I am persuaded that the framers of the bankrupt act never intended that the very important matter of proving debts in bankruptcy should be committed to such loose methods of procedure; and I am very sure that the interests of all creditors demand that facilities for the examination of creditors when proving their claims should rather be rendered more effective than that a practice should be tolerated which will reduce proofs of debts in bankruptcy to a mere formality. I regard it as worthy of careful attention by the court and its officers to prevent any such result. All creditors have an interest in such a construction of the act, and in the establishment of such a practice under it as shall afford the fullest opportunity for the scrutiny of all claims which are offered for proof; and under the law as it stands, this can be done nowhere so conveniently and effectively as by the register to whom the cause is referred. These views as to the nature and examination in proofs of debts which the bankrupt act contemplates, I think, are fully supported by several reported cases to which I refer. In re Haley [Case No. 5,918]; In re Strauss [Id. 13,532]; In re Elder [Id. 4,326].

III. In considering the question as one of practice, which it is desirable should be such as will enable creditors to secure all the rights to which they are entitled, with the least inconvenience and expense to them, it may be remarked that a practice which will add to the fees which must be paid to the officer who takes a deposition, an attorney fee for drawing it, does not deserve encouragement; for even if, in such a case as this, the oath is administered by the commissioner, without charge, it is scarcely possible that any attorney would rate his services so low as to be satisfied with the fee which the law allows to its officers for the whole service of taking and filing a deposition to prove a debt. Beside, it is the policy of the law that all the expenses of realizing and distributing a bankrupt's assets, including the fees for proving claims, shall be a charge upon the fund, and are entitled to priority of payment before any dividend. To call in professional assistance, in any but a few peculiar cases, to aid in proving claims in bankruptcy is wholly unnecessary. So the profession generally understand it; and if there be any who do not, the public should know it, that they may not be subjected to any useless expense to secure their due proportion of the bankrupt's assets. All which, together with the proof of debt offered, is respectfully submitted.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. By section 22 of the bankrupt act it was provided, "that all proofs of debts against the estate of the bankrupt, by or on behalf of creditors residing within the judicial district where the proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, shall be made before one of the registers of the court in said district, and by or on behalf of non-resident creditors, before any register in bankruptcy in the judicial district where such creditors, or either of them reside, or before any commissioner of the circuit court authorized to administer oaths in any district." A difference of construction by the courts having arisen as to the power of a commissioner, under that provision, to take proof of debts, where the creditor resided within the district where proceedings were pending, congress by section three of the act of July 27, 1868 (15 Stat. 228) enacted that "such commissioners may take proof of debts in bankruptcy in all cases, subject to the revision of such proofs by the court according to the provisions of said act." So that as the law now stands proof of debts in bankruptcy may be taken by a register or by a commissioner in all cases, whether of a resident or non-resident creditor, or whether such commissioner holds his office in the same town or in the same building in which a register holds his office, the only limitation being that it shall be taken before a register or commissioner of the same judicial district in which the creditor resides, or in which the proceedings are pending. The law never did require, neither does it seem to have been contemplated, that such proofs should be taken before the register to whom the bankruptcy has been referred; to the exclusion of all others.

In this state of the law, I cannot see that the court has any discretion to refuse to receive and file a proof of debt which appears on its face to have been taken by a proper officer, and to be correct in form and in substance. By the receipt and filing of proof of debt, and by it alone, the court obtains jurisdiction of the claim and of the creditor presenting it; and then, and then only, does the revisory power of the court over such proof mentioned in the act of 1868 commence. The receiving and filing of proof of debt concludes nothing. True, unless otherwise ordered, it entitles the creditor to be placed on the list of creditors, vote for assignee, and receive dividends. But the court may otherwise order; and, under its revisory powers, may postpone the same, as provided in section twenty-three; and, as provided in section twenty-two, summon the creditor and other persons before it, and examine them in regard to the claim itself, and may reject the claim altogether, or in part only; and do all other things in regard to it which the act authorizes to be done. In this case the creditor is a resident of this district, and the commissioner before whom the proof was taken is a commissioner of this district. It appears, therefore, that the proof was taken before a proper officer. The proof is also strictly correct in form and in substance. It is objected, however, by the register, that it is an affidavit merely, and not a deposition. I cannot see the force of this objection, the proof being, as it is, in the exact form prescribed (form No. 4). It is also objected that it appears to have been written by the creditor's attorney, and not by the commissioner. The rules and regulations for taking depositions of witnesses to be used as evidence in the courts usually require that the depositions shall be written by the officer taking it, by some disinterested person in his presence, or by the witness. There is, however, no such requirement in this case. Neither is it of so much importance, in view of the fact that what the creditor must swear to is clearly and explicitly pointed out in the act, section twenty-two, and the exact form in which he shall do it is prescribed (form No. 4). It is a practice, however, not to be commended. It is far preferable, and more in accordance with the spirit of the act, that the officer, with the act and the form before him, should examine the creditor on oath touching the matters specified, and himself reduce the deposition to writing or fill up the printed blank, if such is used. But I am not prepared to decide that unless this is done the proof should be rejected, especially where no attendant or resulting objectionable circumstances or facts are made to appear. If a creditor sees fit to go to the unnecessary expense of employing an attorney to draw up his proof of claim, in an ordinary case, instead of having the officer to do it whose duty it is, I do not know that the court ought to complain; but the court will see to it that the estate is not damaged by an allowance for any such unnecessary service.

The argument of the learned register against recognizing the power of commissioners doing business in the same town, or, as in this case, in the same building as the register in charge, is of much force. But, in my view of the matter, it goes rather to the policy and justness of the law than to the validity, or to the power and duty of the court to set it at naught by construction. It is, no doubt, the wiser policy for creditors, in all cases where they can do so conveniently, to make their proof before the register in charge, because he is thereby afforded an opportunity of putting such questions to them, and making such explanations to them as to their rights and liabilities as he may see fit, and the creditor may then be saved the trouble of being afterward summoned before the court to submit to an examination in regard to his claim. But all the court can do is to commend that course to creditors as the wiser policy.

It follows, from what has been said, that the proof of debt of Edmund Cole must be received and filed.

Case No. 9,464.

MERRICK v. BERNARD.

[1 Wash. C. C. 479.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1806.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—KNOWLEDGE—SALE THROUGH SUPER-CARGO—PRIVATE DEBT.

1. If a party knows that A is an agent for several shippers, who had separate interests in the cargo, he cannot take the property of the principal to pay his debt; although he would be perfectly justified in paying over the money, for the use of the principal, to the agent.

2. A consignee, who receives merchandise from the super-cargo for sale, and who knows that the super-cargo is the agent of others, contracts a debt with such shipper for the proceeds of his portion of the cargo; and the super-cargo has no right to appropriate the same to the payment of his private debt.

This action was brought, to recover the amount of sales of certain goods of the plaintiff, which were put into possession of the defendant, a merchant of Bordeaux, by Randell the agent of the plaintiff, and super-cargo of the Ploughboy. It appeared by the evidence of Randell, that the Ploughboy was the property of Jones & Clark, of Philadelphia, who put on board the principal part of the cargo; but the plaintiff, with some other merchants, also shipped separate cargoes for Bordeaux, consigned to Randell, the super-cargo, who received his separate instructions from each shipper. The plaintiff's instructions rather limited the general authority of the super-cargo, but it did not appear that they were communicated to the defendant. On arriving at Bordeaux, Randell placed the business in the hands of the defendant, to whom the whole cargo was delivered; and a freight list, which did not distinguish otherwise than by numbers, the separate interest of the shippers. But the defendant was distinctly informed, that such separate interests did exist, and to what extent. Some time after the sales had begun, but before the whole was completed, Randell drafted a plan for a voyage, for the ship, with a cargo from Bordeaux to Guadaloupe, and thence back to Bordeaux, with a cargo of colonial produce; and having received considerable advances from the defendant, to enable him to place funds in England, for the use of Jones & Clark, he stipulated with the defendant, to return to Bordeaux, to the defendant's address; and to secure the defendant, he gave him a general invoice of the whole cargo, to enable him to insure. He took in a cargo at Guadaloupe, and returned to Bordeaux; but before he got into the town, having heard that the government during his absence had laid such high duties on colonial produce imported otherwise than in French bottoms, as to render the voyage a losing one; he wrote to the defendant to know how this fact was, and suggesting the propriety of his going to Amsterdam, or elsewhere, to sell the cargo, promising to allow the defendant the same commissions, as if he had sold it. The defendant wrote him, that he was misinformed as to the new law; that he would be admitted to an entry, if he was furnished with all proper certificates and documents. He went up, and delivered the cargo to the defendant, with a freight list, from which, or from other papers, the separate interests of the shippers were distinguished. About this time, the defendant received information of certain bills, drawn on him by Jones & Clark, payable in Amsterdam; and finding that the part of the cargo belonging to Jones & Clark, would, in consequence of the new duties, not form a sufficient fund to enable him to take up those bills, he hesitated about accepting them. To induce him to do so, Randell agreed to place in his hands the whole cargo; observing, that he could draw upon Jones & Clark to reimburse the other shippers. This was agreed to. The whole cargo was so appropriated; the bills were drawn on Jones & Clark, who refused to pay them. The defendant being found in Philadelphia, this action, for money had and received was brought to recover the full amount of the plaintiff's part of the cargo, deducting therefrom the old, and not the new duties; which, it was contended, ought not to be charged to the plaintiff, as it was by the defendant's misinformation to Randell, that he went up to Bordeaux.

Duponceau and Dallas, for defendant, contended; first, that Randell, from his general power as agent, had a right to make this appropriation of the plaintiff's funds, and to reimburse him by bills on Jones & Clark, for the payment of which the defendant was not answerable; that if this was his general power, the defendant was not to be affected by any private limitations of it, from particular instructions; unless such communication was communicated to the defendant. That though a factor cannot pledge the goods of his principal, for a debt of his own, whether with or without notice (6 East, 17), yet he may sell, if bona fide, and without notice (4 Burrows, 2051). That the power of a foreign agent is more extensive than a domestic one. Bull. N. P. 130. That it was not sufficient, that the defendant should have notice of the separate interests of the shippers; but that he should have had notice, that the agent had limited powers. Randell might have received from the defendant, the amount of the plaintiff's interest, and then have lent or given it to defendant, if he pleased; in which case, he alone would be answerable. 2d. As to the extra duties; Randell was bound by a contract, which was certainly within the scope of his authority, to go to Bordeaux, that the defendant might not lose the security for his advances, or the commissions; and that the increase of duties did not discharge him from this obligation; if he did wrong, he alone is liable. Cases cited, Abbot, 78; 3 Bos. & P. 490.

On the plaintiff's side was cited, 6 East, 17; 3 Term. R. 757; 2 Strange, 1178, as to the powers of factors.

Ingersoll & Gibson, for plaintiff.

THE COURT informed the plaintiff's counsel, when about to reply, that they wished him to confine his observations to the facts in the cause; since, upon the law of the case, it was impossible there could be two opinions. If the defendant knew, that Randell acted as agent for the several shippers, and that they had several interests in the cargo; then the defendant, by the sale of the plaintiff's part of the cargo, contracted a debt with him, though he would have been fully justified in paying the money to the agent, unless prohibited to do so by the principal. But this very power in the principal, to forbid that payment, proves that there subsisted a contract also between the defendant and the principal. If this be the case, the question is, has this debt been legally discharged? That it has been paid either to the plaintiff or to Randell, is not pretended; but has the defendant, by any act of Randell, been exonerated from the payment? This brings us to the question, what acts the agent could do, to discharge the defendant within the general scope of his authority; for if that was restrained by any private instructions, it does not appear that such instructions were communicated to the defendant. He had a power to sell the plaintiff's property to the defendant, or to authorize him to sell it, and he might have received payment in money or in bills, and possibly in other ways. But most clearly he had no right to permit the defendant to retain the money, to satisfy the debt due from the agent himself, or from any third person, with notice to defendant of the plaintiff's interest. If the defendant had paid the money to the agent, he, the agent, might, without such notice, have paid the money again to the defendant, to enable him to take up the bills of Jones & Clark; because, in that case, having once received the money, and mixed it with the general mass of his own money, there could be no means to identify it, as belonging to the plaintiff; and in that case, the agent alone would have been responsible. See Salk. 160. But suppose, when the defendant paid the money, in the supposed case, he had received it back, with perfect knowledge that it belonged to the plaintiff; the payment and repayment being merely an operation to enable the agent to convert the plaintiff's money to the use of Jones & Clark, there would have been mala fides in the transaction; and the defendant, receiving the money as the money of the plaintiff, would be answerable to him for it; no matter how the transaction was sanctioned by the agent, the defendant could not say, that he had discharged the debt once due to the plaintiff. The whole question then is, whether this transaction was bona fide or not: and whether so or not, must depend on the question, whether the defendant knew that Randell was the agent of distinct shippers, and that the cargo thus assigned over to him, for the payment of the bills, was the property of different persons. If he did know these facts, the cause is clearly with the plaintiff.

Upon the second point, the facts appearing to be as stated by the defendant's counsel, that Randell was bound, by an agreement with the defendant, to return from Guadaloupe to Bordeaux; the counsel for the plaintiff, upon an intimation from the court, of their opinion on that point, gave up the claim of difference between the old and new duties.

District Court, S. D. New York. June 14, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE—RENT—VERBAL LEASE—POSSESSION SURRENDERED.

Bankrupt held his store on a verbal lease, terminating May 1, 1869, for sixteen hundred dollars per annum and taxes. On December 26, 1868, he surrendered his stock of goods to the register, and delivered to him the key of his store. The register turned the same over to the assignee, March 2, 1869, and on the 25th of March the goods therein were sold by the assignee's order. On the 1st of February, the landlord executed another lease to a stove company. Toward the end of April applications were made to the assignee for the key, and he immediately delivered it up. The store had been unoccupied by the assignee after the 1st of April, and he was ignorant of the owner and of the second lease. The landlord claimed rent from December 26, 1868, to February 1, 1869, and the stove company claimed rent at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum from February 1, 1869, to May 1, 1869. Held, the assignee should only pay rent at the rate of sixteen hundred dollars per annum to April 1, 1869.

The bankrupt [Truman Merrifield] filed his petition December 26th, 1868, at which time he had a stock of goods at No. 230 Water street, which premises he occupied under a verbal lease from B. Stephens and others from May 1st, 1868, to May 1st, 1869, at a rent of sixteen hundred dollars a year, and the taxes on the property. Upon filing his petition, the bankrupt surrendered his property to the register, John Fitch, and delivered to him the key of said store, and the register thereupon placed a man in charge of the property. After the appointment of an assignee on the 27th day of February, 1869, the person in charge of the stock of goods, by direction of the register, delivered the key to the assignee (March 2d, 1869), who sent the same to an auctioneer, with directions to take possession of and sell the said stock of goods. The said auctioneer immediately proceeded to take an inventory of stock, and the same was sold on the 25th day of March, 1869, and the goods immediately afterwards were removed. The possession of the premises could have been delivered to anybody who required the same on or at any time after the 1st of April; but it was not until the last week in April that application was made to the assignee for the keys of the place, when they were immediately delivered. The store had been unoccupied by the assignee since the 1st of April. The assignee was not, at the time of his appointment, nor until the end of April, aware who was the landlord of the building, or entitled to the rent. The owners of the building made a written lease, on the 1st of February, to the Barstow Stove Company, to rent the said premises, No. 230 Water street, to them at the rate of two thousand dollars a year, of which arrangement the assignee had no knowledge, and no application was made by the Barstow Stove Company to him for the possession of the said premises until the last week of April, when they were immediately delivered. The owners, B. Stephens and others, claim to be paid by the assignee the rent of said premises, from the 26th day of December, 1868, to the 1st of February, 1869, at the rate of sixteen hundred dollars a year, amounting to one hundred and fifty-five dollars and fifty-five cents. The Barstow Stove Company claim to be paid by the assignee the full rent of the said premises for the three months of February, March, and April, at the rate of two thousand dollars a year, or five hundred dollars.

It is hereby stipulated and agreed that the foregoing statement of facts may be submitted to the court for its decision as to the liability of the assignee to pay the rents claimed.

E. M. Willett, for claimants.

C. W. Bangs, for John Sedgwick, assignee, etc.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I think that the assignee ought to pay rent for the store from December 26th, 1868, to April 1st, 1869, at the rate of sixteen hundred dollars per annum, and for no other period, at any rate.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT—EVIDENCE—WITNESS—INTEREST.

guardian, if he be alive, or against his executor or administrator, if he be dead.

By JOHN L. EDWARDS, Register:

[Memorandum:—At the second and third meeting of creditors on the 16th day of April, A. D. 1877, Reed R. Wheeler, of Burton, in said district, proved his claims against said estate for over three thousand dollars. The assignee objected to the allowance of this proof, whereupon an order was made by the register that the parties interested therein appear before him at his office in Newport, in said district, on the 12th day of May, A. D. 1877, at 10 o'clock a. m., for the purpose of hearing such questions as might arise in relation to the modification or expunging of said proof. In pursuance of said order the parties appeared with their counsel before the undersigned register, at the time and place set for said hearing. Inasmuch as the creditor had neglected to prove his claim before the second and third meeting of creditors, well knowing that the claim was disputable and would be contested by the assignee, and inasmuch as the settlement of the estate would be delayed on account of the adjustment of said proof through the neglect of the creditor in not seasonably proving his claim, so that its adjustment could have been had in the due course of settling the estate, the register ordered that the said Reed R. Wheeler deposit with the register the sum of forty dollars, to be applied in extinguishment of the costs of the assignee at such hearing so far as the same might become necessary. No objection was made to this order. The subject matter of the creditor's proof consists of a long account which, up to December 1, 1871, consisted mainly of commissions on the sale of emery wheels which the bankrupt [E. C. Merrill] manufactured, and which it was conceded the said Reed R. Wheeler sold on commission up to that time as traveling agent of the bankrupt. Said Wheeler claimed that, in October, 1872, he made a contract with the bankrupt by which he was to have wages for his services in making sales, at as high a price as said Merrill was paying any other of his employees, or as much as said Wheeler could make at his trade, which was that of a blacksmith, and that said services under the contract were to commence December 1, 1871, dating back from October, 1872, to December 1, 1871. Said Wheeler continued his services, either on a commission or under a contract for wages up to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, and after December 1, 1871, charged his services at one thousand dollars per year above expenses. The assignee claimed that said Wheeler worked on commission all the time, and denied that said Wheeler made any contract with the bankrupt in October, 1872, or at any other time to work for wages. The petition in this case was filed on the 22d day of December, 1873, and said bankrupt deceased in February, 1874. Said Wheeler offered himself as a witness to prove said contract, which he claimed he made with the bankrupt in October, 1872. To his admissibility as a witness for this purpose the assignee objected. And the register ruled that said Wheeler was not an admissible witness for that purpose on account of the decease of said bankrupt with whom the contract was claimed to have been made. Counsel for said Wheeler desired that this question might be submitted to the district court for their opinion thereon. I therefore certify the same to the district court for decision thereon.] [2]

WHEELER, District Judge. Upon the question concerning the competency of the creditor as a witness in his favor, certified by the register, the law of the forum must as a matter of course govern. In these proceedings the courts of the United States constitute the forum and consequently the laws of the United States must control in this respect. By those laws no witness can be excluded on account of interest except in actions by or against executors, administrators or guardians in which judgments may be rendered for or against them. Rev. St. § 858. By the laws of the state, where one party to a contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead the other is excluded as a witness. According to the state law this creditor would be excluded. Such exclusion however would be on account of interest of the witness, and contrary to the law of the United States, unless the case would fall within the exception contained in the proviso to the statute on this subject.

The proof of a debt against an estate in bankruptcy is not a proceeding against a bankrupt, nor his guardian if he have one when alive, nor against his executor or administrator when he is dead, but is a proceeding in rem solely and affects the estate only. It is not an action against either an executor or administrator for or against whom any judgment can be rendered in it, and is not within the exceptions in the law of the United States.

The law of the United States prohibits the exclusion of this witness on account of his interest; and as it would seem, the law of the state, which but for this prohibition would exclude him, is not in force in this proceeding. For these reasons, in the opinion of this court the decision of the register excluding the witness is erroneous.

PARTNERSHIP—SPECIAL PARTNER—CONTRIBUTION—CASH—GOODS.

L. and three other persons undertook to form a limited partnership under the provisions of the statute of New York (1 Rev. St. p. 764, § 2) which provides that such partnerships may consist of general partners, and "of one or more persons who shall contribute, in actual cash payments, a specific sum, as capital, to the common stock, who shall be called special partners, and who shall not be liable for the debts of the partnership, beyond the fund so contributed by him or them to the capital." The articles of copartnership provided that L. should contribute to the common stock $1,000 in cash, and, in addition, "the entire inventory on hand, of the effects and property belonging to him, lately owned and used by A. and said L., supposed to be about $8,000." The certificate filed under the statute stated that L., the special partner, had contributed to the common stock "$1,000 in cash and about $8,000 of effects and property, the exact amount of which is yet to be ascertained," and to it was annexed an affidavit of one of the general partners, that L. had actually contributed the sum of $1,000 in cash to the common stock of the firm, and had paid in the same in good faith: Held, that the partnership was not a limited one, and that L. was a general partner.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

Charles B. Sedgwick, for creditors.
Francis Kernan, for debtors.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The firm of Merrill, Wilder & Co. were charged by a creditor with having committed acts of bankruptcy, and, in the petition, it was averred, thet the firm was composed of William G. Merrill, David Wilder, Villars Merrill, Junior, and George J. Letchworth, all general partners therein. The application for a decree adjudging them bankrupts was resisted by Letchworth, only on the ground that he was not, and had never been, a general partner, but was only a special partner in the firm, and that the copartnership was a limited copartnership, formed under the provisions of the statutes of the state of New York, wherein he was in no wise liable for the debts of the firm otherwise or beyond the capital he had contributed to the common stock. The district court held him to be a general partner, and adjudged all the partners bankrupt, and that adjudication Letchworth seeks to review and reverse in this court. His petition of review states the facts upon which the adjudication proceeded, and, as the allegations of the petition are not denied, they are to be deemed admitted for the purposes of the review.

The only facts which I deem it material to notice, and upon which the petition will be disposed of, are that the parties attempted to form a limited partnership in which Letchworth should share in the profits of the business to be carried on, and have the immunities which the statutes authorizing such copartnerships allow, and yet not contribute, nor be bound to contribute, his share of the capital in cash. They entered into articles of copartnership containing numerous details touching the business to be carried on, stipulating that each of the four partners should share equally in the profits and losses of the business. The consideration for which Letchworth was to be thus admitted to membership in the firm, and permitted to share the profits, was, that he should contribute to the common stock one thousand dollars in cash, and, in addition thereto, "the entire inventory on hand, of the effects and property belonging to him, lately owned and used by M. Alden, deceased, and said Letchworth, supposed to be about eight thousand dollars." To carry their purpose into effect they signed and filed, as required by the statute, a "certificate of limited partnership," (so entitled,) in which, among other proper particulars, it was certified, that "the said William G. Merrill, David Wilder, and Villars Merrill, Jr., shall be the general partners, and the said George Letchworth shall be a special partner, and has contributed to the common stock one thousand dollars in cash, and about eight thousand dollars of effects and property, the exact amount of which is yet to be ascertained." To the certificate was annexed the affidavit of William G. Merrill, that Letchworth "has actually contributed the sum of one thousand dollars in cash, to the common stock of the said firm, and has paid in the same in good faith."

The statute under which the parties attempted to establish a limited partnership (1 Rev. St. N. Y. p. 764, § 2) provides, that such partnerships may consist of general partners, responsible as general partners now are by law, and "of one or more persons who shall contribute in actual cash payments, a specific sum, as capital, to the common stock, who shall be called special partners, and who shall not be liable for the debts of the partnership, beyond the fund so contributed by him or them to the capital." It then requires that the certificate to be filed shall, among other things, state "the amount of capital which each special partner shall have contributed to the common stock," and that there shall be filed with the certificate an affidavit "stating that the sums specified in the certificate to have been contributed by each of the special partners to the common stock have been actually and in good faith paid in cash."

It is quite certain, that the copartnership

which these parties attempted to establish was not such as this statute provides for. They doubtless acted with most entire fairness and integrity. They no doubt supposed that what they did sufficiently satisfied the reason and intent of the statute, so long as, in their published notice, they informed the world that the capital contributed by Letchworth to the common stock was not actually paid in cash, but consisted in part of property, the amount of which was not yet ascertained. But this was not in compliance with the statute, and neither they nor the court are to entertain the inquiry, whether a statute authorizing just such a partnership as they entered into, and securing to Letchworth immunity for the debts of the firm, would not be a better statute than the legislature have seen fit to enact. In general, all who share the profits of the business of a copartnership are liable to its creditors for all of its debts. The statute permits the formation of a copartnership in which, as to one or more of the members, there shall be an exemption from liability beyond the fund "contributed by him or them to the capital." The express condition of that immunity is, that that fund be contributed in actual cash payments. The expression "fund so contributed," which fund is made the limit of the liability of special partners, imports, contributed "in cash." It was, of course, competent for the legislature to have authorized such partnership, and to have permitted the special partner to contribute property or goods at a just valuation, but they have not done so. So, it was competent to have permitted a contribution of part cash and part goods or other property, but, for reasons concerning which we are hardly at liberty to speculate, this was not done. We are bound by the statute, and the parties cannot claim under the statute, which derogates from the general rule of law, without showing a strict compliance with the statute. They cannot be permitted to say that it was just as well for the firm and for its creditors to have a contribution of goods at their fair value as to have cash. The legislature saw fit to require that he who contributed capital to be employed in the joint business, to be the basis or consideration of his participation in the profits, should, in order to the limitation of his liability for debts, pay all of that contribution in money, before the partnership should be deemed formed; that that money should be under the exclusive control of the general partners; that they should be at liberty to invest or employ it as in their discretion they saw fit, for the benefit of the firm and its creditors; and that no one should be permitted to share profits on the basis of a contribution of goods or property, and yet be entitled to limit his liability for debts. It is unnecessary to vindicate the statute, and yet it is pertinent to inquire—can a person be permitted, under such a statute, to put in one hundred dollars cash, and a stock of goods estimated at fifty thousand dollars, be permitted to share profits on the basis of a contribution of $50,100, to capital, and yet be not liable for the debts?

I am decidedly of opinion that the parties failed to establish a limited partnership, and that they were always general partners. I may add, further, that an express provision of the statute, that the certificate filed shall state "the amount of capital which each special partner shall have contributed to the common stock," was not satisfied by a certificate that Letchworth had contributed "$1,000 in cash and about $8,000 of effects and property, the exact amount of which is yet to be ascertained."

For these reasons the decision of the district court was correct. Whether the other ground of the decision was so or not it is unnecessary to inquire.

The adjudication is affirmed, with costs.

SHIPPING—CHARTER PARTY—DANGERS OF THE SEA—FIRE—INDEMNITY.

1. Where by the terms of a charter-party the hirers of a vessel covenanted to return her on the expiration of the service in like good condition as when she sailed, ordinary wear and the dangers of the seas excepted, the risk of a loss by fire is on them.

2. "Dangers of the seas" include only those which accrue from the action of the elements, and such as are incident to that cause, rather than all that arise on the sea. An accidental fire is not one of the peculiar dangers of the sea.

3. In all contracts, both for service performed, and for dangers assumed by the way of bottomry or insurance, the maritime law gives full indemnity, but no more.

Mr. Merrill, for libellants.

Shepley & Dana, for respondents.

WARE, District Judge. This is a libel on a charter-party. The libellants, being the owners of the schooner William Henry, of the burthen of 130 tons, on the 17th of February, 1853, let her to the respondents, by the charter-party, for two or three voyages, at the option of the hirers, from Frankfort to the Chesapeake Bay, or any other Southern port or ports, for the monthly charter of $150. By the terms of the contract, the hirers were to victual, man, and sail the vessel, at their own charge, and to return her at the expiration of the service, to the owners, in the like good condition as when they took her, ordinary wearing and the dangers of the seas only excepted. She soon after took in a cargo of ice and sailed from the Penobscot on the first of March, for Pensacola. According to the testimony of the respondents the vessel was found to leak some, but not badly, soon after getting to sea, but about ten or eleven days after sailing the leak increased, either from an injury to the vessel from striking some heavy, floating body in the water, or from the increased violence of the sea. In the condition in which the schooner then was, the master did not think it safe to prosecute the voyage to Pensacola, and he bore away and put into Norfolk for repairs. He then made a protest, and called a survey of the vessel. It was found that the ice had been considerably wasted by the influx of sea water, and the cargo had shifted, and the surveyors advised to unload her and sell her cargo, in order to a more full examination of her hull. This was accordingly done, and on an examination some trifling repairs were made, at an expense of something over twenty dollars. The outward cargo for Pensacola having been sold, the voyage was abandoned. After remaining at Norfolk about ten days, the master sailed for Baltimore, with a light, southerly wind, and fair weather, passed Point Comfort about dark, and though varying his course from time to time, in order to keep in the deep water of the channel, struck on the Tangier shoals about midnight. After lying there through one tide, about a mile and a half from the shore, and attempting without success to get the vessel off, the master, with the crew, left in the boat early in the afternoon, and went ashore. They returned in the course of the afternoon and took some articles from the vessel and left her for the night, towards the close of the afternoon. The next morning the schooner was discovered to be on fire, and when the master and crew arrived in the boat, she was burned from stern to midship. Some of the sails and rigging were saved, but the hull of the vessel was entirely destroyed. The schooner was insured for $1500, and valued in the policy at $3000. The insurance has been paid.

[1] [Reported by George F. Emery, Esq.]

[2] [Affirmed in Case No. 115.]

[3] This case, though appearing by the manuscript to have been decided in 1859, was determined in 1854, and the decree of the district court was affirmed by the circuit court at September term, 1854.

A large amount of testimony has been taken relative to the conduct of the master before the vessel arrived at Norfolk, to the transactions there, to the master's conduct after leaving Norfolk in going up to the Chesapeake, and his leaving the vessel after she struck on the shoal, from all which the counsel for the libellants infers, that there was gross negligence, if not criminal misconduct, on the part of the master, while the counsel for the respondent contends that no fault is justly imputable to him, but that throughout the whole he acted with reasonable discretion and prudence, and that the loss of the vessel was a pure misfortune for which the hirers are no way responsible.

In the view which I have taken of the case, I have not thought it necessary to enter into a minute examination of this testimony. By the general principle of the law of hiring of things, the hirer is bound to take the same care for the preservation of the thing that a prudent man takes of his own property of a like nature, under like circumstances. Story, Bailm. §§ 398–400. It is a contract of mutual interest. The hirer is benefited by the use of the thing, and the lender by the hire or rent paid. The hirer is not liable, as a common carrier, for a loss by every sort of accident, except by the act of God, neither is he bound for that extreme care and diligence, that one is, who has the use of a thing by a gratuitous loan and the whole benefit of the contract is on one side, and the burthen on the other. But he is responsible not only for his own diligence, but for that of his servants, to whom the thing is entrusted. If this, therefore, had been an ordinary contract of hiring, and to be governed by the common principles of the law applying to this contract, the inquiry into the conduct of the master and crew would become very material. But the liabilities of the hirer may be varied or enlarged by the terms of the contract; and the agreement by which this vessel was hired, was special. She was hired by a charter-party, by which the hirers covenanted to return her on the expiration of the service, to the owners, in like good condition as when she sailed, ordinary wear and the dangers of the seas excepted. Stranding on the shoals is indeed one of the dangers of the sea, but the stranding was not the proximate cause of the loss. In the actual state of the weather, it is, I think, sufficiently apparent from the evidence, that the vessel might have been got off and saved without great difficulty or expense, if she had not been burnt. It may be said that the stranding led to the burning, and was thus the first, and in one sense the efficient cause of the loss. But even this would not have been the case if the master and crew had remained on board; and after all the explanations that have been given, I cannot perceive that the abandonment of the vessel was imperiously called for. It is said, indeed, that there were some indications of a storm, and if one had arisen the vessel must have been destroyed, and the lives of the crew put in jeopardy. But the peril should be imminent and serious that will justify a master in abandoning his vessel. Lying as they did, within a mile and a half of the land, the master might well have remained in the vessel till the danger was more pressing. Without, however, dwelling on these circumstances, the risk of a loss by fire, in my opinion, by the terms of the contract, the hirers took on themselves. Dangers of the seas is somewhat of an equivocal expression. It may, without any violation of its natural import, be interpreted to mean, dangers that arise upon the sea, which would include every hazard and danger, from the beginning to the end of the voyage, of whatever kind; or with equal propriety, it may mean only those which arise directly and exclusively from that element, of which that is the efficient cause. Sometimes it is taken in one sense and sometimes in the other. In insurance cases, where the import of this phrase is as often considered as in any other, perhaps oftener, its meaning is not exactly settled. And there may be a difference between the force given to it in this, and other maritime contracts, such as bills of lading and charter-parties; and I am not aware, if this is the case, that it is exactly discriminated. In most cases, the owners of the ship have the possession by their own masters and mariners, for whose conduct they are more or less responsible. But in the present, the charterers had the possession. They equipped her with their own master and men, and had the entire direction of her motions. The exceptions were introduced into the charter-party in their favor. It would, therefore, be natural, and in conformity with the common rule of law, if its meaning were doubtful or ambiguous, to interpret it against them, and in favor of the other party. I think, also, it would be most in harmony with the general inclination of American courts, to interpret this phrase as including only dangers that arise from the action of the elements and the dangers incident to that cause, rather than to include all that arise on the sea. The exception now commonly introduced into insurance policies of loss by fire, shows a doubt, at least among those most conversant with maritime affairs, whether this would come within the common phrase, dangers of the sea. An accidental fire is not certainly one of the peculiar dangers of that element. It may arise on land as well as at sea. Besides, an accidental fire always implies some degree of fault or carelessness among those whose duty it is to prevent it. On the whole, in this case, I do not think that a loss by fire ought to be included in the dangers of the seas, and more especially as the charterers had the possession. This decision is, I think, justified by the principles of law,[4] and is consonant to the decision of the courts.

If it be held that the charterers are liable on this contract, the question arises, for what sum they are liable, whether for the whole value of the vessel, or for such part as is not covered by the insurance. Though this question was not raised in the argument, it is not seen how it is to be avoided, and it is not of easy solution. The schooner was insured for $1500, and this has been paid. Insurance is essentially a contract of indemnity. Where nothing is exposed to loss, it is a mere wager, and it is a well-established principle that this is simply void, and as a consequence, the property at risk, even when valued, may be always a subject of inquiry; though if anything is at risk, the court will incline in favor of the assured. Alsop v. Commercial Ins. Co. [Case No. 262]. In this case, the vessel was at risk, and was of greater value than was assured by the insurers, and as by the terms of the policy, a loss by fire was included, they could make no defence. But on this contract, can the owners recover the full value of the vessel? If they can, so far as the insurance goes, they recover a double indemnity. And this is against the clear policy of the maritime law. But the counsel for the libellants says they recover as trustees for the insurers. What claim have the insurers to this sum since a loss by fire was one which they expressly took on themselves? It seems to me that their mouth is closed. Their own contract, their own words, must raise an insuperable obstacle to their recovery in any form of action, or against any parties. If the owners recover in this action the full value of the ship, in every view which I can take of the case, they will be twice paid to the amount of the insurance. In all contracts, both for service performed, and for dangers assumed by the way of bottomry or insurance, the maritime law scrupulously gives what is due to full indemnity. But it gives no more. It does not permit owners to make a profit out of a common calamity. On the best consideration of the subject, which I have been able to give, I think the owners in this action can recover the whole of value of the schooner above the amount insured, and no more. There were a number of depositions taken as to the value of the vessel. There was a wide and singular discrepancy in the testimony, varying in the estimate of her value from $1000 to $3500. In such a conflict, the court is thrown on its own opinion, to be made up from circumstances about which there is no controversy, and as this case will by appeal be carried to another tribunal, any errors I may commit may be corrected. She was of the burthen of 130 tons, and about seventeen years old, and I have come to the conclusion that she was worth about $2000. The libellants also claim charter for her to the time when she was lost, amounting to $115. This is allowed. Some, also, of the rigging was saved. After all allowances are made, the decree will be that the libellants receive $698, and costs of suits.

[4] The Roman law contains salutary admonitions on this subject. Every fire in a building, if it could be traced to no other cause, was presumed to arise from the negligence or fault of the inhabitants. Plerumque incendia culpa fiunt inhabitantium. Dig. 1, 15, 3, § 1; Dig. 18, 6, 11. And by the Aquilian law, those from whose fault it arose, or whose duty it was to prevent its spreading and ravages, were answerable for the consequences. Dig. 9, 2, 27, §§ 5, 9. The French have adopted this principle from the Roman law, and carried it out with much more efficiency than has been done either by the law of England or this country. 11 Toullier, No. 155 et suivant, in an examination of engagements that are formed without convention, has, with his usual learning and ability, given the history and present state of the French law on this subject, and particularly in No. 179, in vindication of the severity of the law.

[The respondents appealed to the circuit court, where the decree of the court below was affirmed, and it was also decided that, as there was no appeal by the libellant, he could not claim greater damages in this court than those allowed in the district court. Case No. 115.]

DEPOSITION—NOTICE TO TAKE—BY WHOM TAKEN—EX PARTE—COURTS—JUDICIAL NOTICE OF LAWS—MORTGAGES—CHATTEL—RECORD—NOTICE OF LIEN—BILL OF SALE—FORECLOSURE.

1. Where the name of a defendant is omitted in the caption of a deposition, but appears in the commission and proceedings, such deposition should not be excluded.

2. Notice to take depositions is sufficient, if served by delivering a copy to the party, or leaving such copy at his dwelling-house or usual place of abode with a free white person, a member of, or resident in the family.

3. If a witness resides more than one hundred miles from the place of trial, his deposition may be taken under the 30th section of the judicial act of 1789 (1 Stat. 88) without notice. But the requisites of that act must be observed strictly.

4. The residence of the witness and distance from the place of trial, are facts proper for the inquiry of the officer taking the deposition, and his certificate of those facts is competent evidence and sufficient to authorize the deposition to be read.

[See Banks v. Miller, Case No. 963.]

5. The probate court of Mississippi being a court of record, and possessing a seal, the judge thereof is the judge of a county court, within the meaning of the above act, and as such, authorized to take a deposition under it.

6. Notice of the time and place of taking depositions is necessary under a joint commission; but when the opposite party, after notice, fails or refuses to join, and the commission issues ex parte, notice is not necessary.

7. On an ex parte commission, the party suing it out is at liberty to put as few of the interrogatories as he thinks proper; except that he must put the last general interrogatory.

8. The courts of the United States will judicially take notice of the laws of the several states in the same manner as of the laws of the United States.

9. Until the act of the 20th February, 1838 (Rev. St. p. 578), and which took effect on the 19th March, 1839, there was no law requiring mortgages of personal property to be recorded; yet mortgagees, before that time, under laws in force, were permitted to have such mortgages recorded if they deemed it expedient.

10. Such recording was legal, but not per se operating as constructive notice to creditors and purchasers, although it tended to give publicity to the mortgage as well as repel fraud.

11. The statute of frauds (Ter. Dig. 266) cited and explained.

12. Notice of a lien or incumbrance on property, binds the purchaser when received before the actual payment of the purchase-money, and arrests all further steps towards the completion of the purchase, and if persisted in, is held to be in fraud of the equitable incumbrance.

13. A purchaser, to be protected, must deny notice before the actual payment of the purchase-money, and this essential averment cannot be supplied by intendment.

14. Where the existence of a mortgage was known and talked of in a neighborhood, and publicly proclaimed at a sale of such mortgaged property, under execution against the mortgagor; held, to be sufficient actual notice to purchasers at the sale, to hold them responsible.

15. Actual notice proved by facts and circumstances.

16. A bill of sale absolute on its face, and the vendor still retaining the possession of the property sold, has been held to be per se fraudulent as to creditors and subsequent purchasers of the vendor; such possession being inconsistent with the deed.

[Cited in Hempstead v. Johnston, 18 Ark. 123.]

17. Possession of slaves by the mortgagor, either before or after forfeiture, is neither fraudulent, nor a badge of fraud requiring explanation; such possession being consistent with the deed.

18. Declarations by a grantor impeaching a deed he has made, are incompetent evidence.

19. The practice in mortgage cases is by interlocutory decree to allow until the next term to redeem; and if the debt is not then paid or tendered, by final decree, to foreclose and bar the equity of redemption, and direct a sale if proper to be had.

20. An absolute foreclosure, in many cases, may be decreed without sale. It is a matter of sound discretion.

[This was a bill in equity by Ayres P. Merrill against James L. Dawson, William Dawson, James Smith, Samuel C. Roane, Samuel Taylor, Nathaniel H. Fish, Garland Hardwick, Absalom Fowler, Noah H. Badgett and Sophia M. Baylor, to foreclose a mortgage of certain negroes executed to secure the plaintiff.]

S. H. Hempstead, for complainant.

I. It is too well established at this day to be controverted, that a mortgage is a chattel interest. The object of the transaction in its original construction, is to create a security and that only. The mortgagor is equitably the sole owner until foreclosure, and has an estate of inheritance which may be devised, granted, or sold. 1 Atk. 603; 12 Ves. 334; 2 Ball & B. 402. The property in equity is regarded as only charged by the mortgage, and in no way passed, modified, altered, or affected, and the mortgagee, after foreclosure, acquires a new estate. 1 Pow. Mortg. 112a; Radcliffe v. Warrington, 12 Ves. 334; 4 Kent, Comm. 135, 142, 159; 1 Hil. Abr. 276; Clark v. Beach, 6 Conn. 142; Wilson v. Troup, 7 Johns. Ch. 38; 1 Schoales & L. 380; 1 Pow.

[2] [Affirmed in 11 How (52 U. S.) 375.]

Mortg. 187b, 188a, and note P; Bogart v. Perry, 1 Johns. Ch. 55; Doug. 630-632; Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns. 42; Jackson v. Bronson, 19 Johns. 325; Runyan v. Mersereau, 11 Johns. 534. The foreclosure operates as a new sale and purchase, and creates an estate in the mortgagee when there was none before. 3 Pow. Mortg. 1022, note B; Hill v. Price, 1 Dickens, 344; 2 Burrows, 978. And so mortgaged property cannot be sold on execution against the mortgagee, before possession acquired on foreclosure of the equity of redemption, although the debt be due, and the estate of the mortgagee has become, technically speaking, absolute at law. Huntington v. Smith, 4 Conn. 235; Blanchard v. Colburn, 16 Mass. 345; Jackson v. Dubois, 4 Johns. 216; Hitchcock v. Harrington, 6 Johns. 290; Collins v. Torry, 7 Johns. 278; Fish v. Fish, 1 Conn. 559. And it is on the same principle that a mortgagee in possession is accountable to the mortgagor for rents and profits. 1 Pow. Mortg. 171; 2 Mass. 435. And the former must account for the hire of mortgaged slaves while in possession. 1 Bibb, 195; 3 Bibb, 18; 6 B. Mon. 122. The principle, then, is clear, and sustained by the authority of all respectable courts, that the debt is the principal and the mortgage the incident; and as it is a rule in equity that what is once a mortgage is always a mortgage, (2 Story, Eq. Jur. 287; 1 Vern. 8; 1 Eden, 59; 7 Ves. 273; 7 Johns. Ch. 43; 1 Pow. Mortg. 116a,) it would seem to follow irresistibly that the mere fact of forfeiture could not change the relative situation of the parties so as to divest one of an estate and vest it in another, and that so long as the right of redemption exists, there is no change at all, and the mortgage, whether before or after forfeiture, remains a mere security for a debt. The object of the mortgage in this case was to indemnify Merrill, on account of his indorsement for the accommodation of Dawson, of the two notes mentioned in the bill, amounting to twelve thousand five hundred and seventy-eight dollars and twenty-two cents, and which were subsequently discounted at the Planters' Bank of Mississippi, at Natchez, for the exclusive benefit of Dawson, and the proceeds paid to him. Merrill was, in fact, security, and as such was obliged to take up these notes on the 4th of March, 1842; and at that point of time his right to proceed on the mortgage accrued. He was, then, actually damaged, and the condition of the mortgage was broken. The formal wording of the mortgage provides for the payment of the notes to Merrill, but that is quite immaterial, since the object is to ascertain the true nature of the transaction between the parties; and it was as I have stated it. Flagg v. Mann [Case No. 4,847]; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 287; 1 P. Wms. 270; 1 Ves. Jr. 406. It has been well said, that courts of equity do not regard the forms of instruments, but look to the intention and give to the acts of parties such construction as that intention justifies and requires. Barron v. Paxton, 5 Johns. 258; Reed v. Jewett, 5 Greenl. 96.

In all cases of indemnity it would seem to be a clear proposition, that actual damage must alone invoke redress, and so are adjudged cases. 1 Saund. 116, note 1; Douglass v. Clark, 14 Johns. 177; Aberdeen v. Blackmar, 6 Hill, 324; Churchill v. Hunt, 3 Denio, 321; Gilbert v. Wiman, 1 Comst. [1 N. Y.] 550. There was no default for which the mortgage could be foreclosed until the 4th of March, 1842, and he asserted his rights in the proper tribunal within six months afterwards, and in shorter time than non-residents usually allow themselves to seek a remedy in our courts. Looking to the true nature of the transaction, it is apparent that he could not foreclose before payment; because, otherwise, he might at any moment have possessed himself of the mortgaged property or the value, without paying a farthing, or being injured to the extent of a penny, in opposition to the clear intention of the parties, and against the well-established principles of equity. Marsh v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. 461. On the 4th of March, 1842, then Merrill was obliged to take up those notes by payment; on that day he became the legal holder of them; on that day his right to seek indemnity from the mortgaged property became perfect, and not until then. This is a point of some consequence, because it entirely destroys the chief ground of defence of the defendants, if ground that can be called, which is unsustained by authority and condemned by reason, namely, that the mortgagor retaining the possession of the slaves rendered the transaction fraudulent. In point of fact, so far from the mortgagor's having remained in possession after forfeiture, the very reverse is true, because he was dispossessed of the slaves in 1841 by the levy and sale under which the appellant claims; so that whether such possession would or would not be fraudulent, must be a purely speculative inquiry, not strictly applicable to the facts of the present case. But, as a matter of curiosity, let us see how the question stands on the score of authority.

Now I assert the general rule in the American and English courts to be, that the possession of personal property by the mortgagor, either before or after default or forfeiture, is not fraudulent, the possession being consistent with the deed. And that doctrine has been established by the supreme court of the United States in the cases of Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 309; U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 75; Conrad v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 449. And by Judge Story in Wheeler v. Sumner [Case No. 17,501]; De Wolf v. Harris [Id. 4,221]. And in the following cases, decided in the state courts, namely, Head v. Ward, 1 J. J. Marsh. 280; Hundley v. Webb, 3 J. J. Marsh. 645; Maples v. Maples, 1 Rice, Eq. 300; Callen v. Thompson, 3 Yerg. 475; Sommerville v. Horton, 4 Yerg. 551; Bruce v.

Smith, 3 Har. & J. 499; Hambleton v. Hayward, 4 Har. & J. 443; McGowen v. Hoy, 5 Litt. [Ky.] 239; Haven v. Low, 2 N. H. 15; Ash v. Savage, 5 N. H. 547; Barron v. Paxton, 5 Johns. 258; Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 446; Craig v. Ward, 9 Johns. 197; Marsh v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. 461; Weller v. Wayland, 17 Johns. 102; Smith v. Acker, 23 Wend. 653; Planters' & Merchants' Bank v. Willis, 5 Ala. 780. In the English courts, in Stone v. Grubham, 2 Bulst. 225; Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 432; Edwards v. Harben, 2 Term R. 587; Jarman v. Woolloton, 3 Term R. 618, 620; Eastwood v. Brown, 1 Ryan & M. 312; Reed v. Wilmott, 5 Moore & P. 564; 7 Bing. 583; Latimer v. Batson, 7 Dowl. & R. 110; 4 Barn. & C. 653; Martin v. Podger, 2 W. Bl. 701; 3 Barn. & Ald. 507; Lady Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 145. The same principles will be found in elementary treatises of high character, namely, Rob. Frauds, 550; Long, Sales, 71–76; 2 Kent, Comm. 518; 1 Pow. Mortg. 155; 2 Pow. Mortg. 646; Shep. Touch. 65. In Lady Lambert's Case, referred to in Shep. Touch. 65, it was determined that a mortgage or other conditional sale being good at the commencement, without a transfer of possession to the mortgagee or vendee, it will in law continue so, notwithstanding the retention of possession by the mortgagor or vendor, after forfeiture. In fact, to hold that possession by a mortgagor would even be prima facie evidence of fraud, would be an outrage on the common sense of society. Head v. Ward, 1 J. J. Marsh. 280. Jurists of this age content themselves with combating fraud, in fact, when discovered; and do not feel warranted in assuming its existence, either at law or equity, without conclusive proof. Not stopping at the explicit declaration that fraud shall never be presumed, they have thought it just to go further and say, that where an act does not necessarily import fraud, and may have been more probably done through a good than a bad motive, the presumption of innocence must prevail. Gregg v. Sayre, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 244; Fleming v. Slocum, 18 Johns. 405; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 199.

An attentive examination of the cases with regard to the possession of property by the vendor, even after an absolute sale, and where such possession is not consistent with the nature or terms of the deed, will show that the weight of authority is in favor of this proposition, namely, that such possession as to creditors and purchasers, without notice, is only prima facie fraudulent, and may be explained, and is not, per se, fraudulent, admitting no explanation. But when we come to the consideration of mortgages, where, by the very nature and terms of such instruments, the possession of the mortgagor, both before and after default, is consistent with the deed itself, how is it possible for any one who has shaken from his robes the dust of the black letter tomes of past ages, to maintain before an enlightened court that such possession is either fraudulent or a badge of fraud; and what court, at this day, would have the courage to sanction such a doctrine?

It is worthy of observation that cases upon mortgages of chattels, where continuance of possession by the mortgagor occurs, do not turn upon any distinction between possession before or after forfeiture, but upon general principles, and thus completely refuting the idea, if such a fallacy requires refutation, that possession is unobjectionable before, but fraudulent after default. It is believed that there is no respectable case predicated upon any such distinction, and which, indeed, would be in disregard of the universal maxim —"Once a mortgage, always a mortgage." The decisions are the reverse. Bucklin v. Thompson, 1 J. J. Marsh. 223; Head v. Ward, Id. 281; McGowen v. Hoy, 5 Litt. [Ky.] 239. In considering mortgages of chattels, it must not be forgotten that prominent distinctions exist between a pledge or mortgage of goods which are consumed in the use, and a mortgage of slaves, which partake more of the nature of realty, and are so regarded in the Southern states, for many purposes not material to be here enumerated. They are a peculiar species of property, and on account of their value and capability of commanding ready money on sudden emergencies, are oftener subjects of mortgage than any other species of property denominated personal. And general practice as to slaves has so familiarized possession by the mortgagor that it is justly regarded as one of the conditions and incidents of the contract, whether the mortgage is recorded or not; and delivery of possession would be out of the common course. Maples v. Maples, Rice, Eq. 300; Fishburne v. Kunhardt, 2 Speer, 564. In the case last cited Frost, J., said: "The presumption of fraud from possession by a mortgagor after condition broken would be arbitrary, because contrary to almost universal experience." And in Maples v. Maples, above cited, which involved a mortgage of slaves, Chancellor Johnson said: "Permitting the mortgagor to remain in possession of the mortgaged property, although there is no covenant to that effect, is too common here to excite suspicion." And in the same case, on appeal, Chief Justice Dunkin held that possession by the mortgagor after forfeiture was neither fraudulent nor a badge of fraud requiring explanation. Indeed, in South Carolina, that doctrine has been so repeatedly adjudged as to have become a permanent landmark in her jurisprudence, as will be seen by the following cases, in addition to those cited, and to which particular attention is invited, especially as they relate to mortgages of slaves, and are, therefore, directly in point. Gist v. Pressley, 2 Hill, Eq. 325; Bank v. Gourdin, 1 Speer, Eq. 439, 458; Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill [S. C.] 23. On this question we are obliged to go to slave states for authority, because in non-slaveholding ones sales and mortgages of slaves do not occur, and consequently no such cases arise. In the case of U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 73, above cited, Chief Justice Marshall says: "The difference is a marked one between a conveyance which purports to be absolute, and a conveyance which, from its terms, is to leave the possession in the vendor. If in the latter case the retaining of possession was evidence of fraud, no mortgage could be valid. The possession universally remains with the grantor until the creditor becomes entitled to his money, and either chooses, or is compelled to exert, his right." Barron v. Paxton, 5 Johns. 258.

It may not be inappropriate to observe, that in New York there is an express legislative act declaring that bills of sale, and mortgages of goods and chattels, shall be presumed to be fraudulent, when possession continues in the vendor or mortgagor, unless the person claiming under such sale or mortgage shall show the absence of an intent to defraud and the good faith of the transaction. 2 Kent, Comm. 528; Stoddard v. Butler, 20 Wend. 548; Butler v. Van Wyck, 1 Hill, 442. Hence decisions made after that statute, based upon or influenced by it, would not furnish a safe guide as to the general question here discussed, out of New York, that being among the few states where such a statute exists. And yet, even there, it has been repeatedly held, and has now become settled doctrine, that such possession is only primâ facie evidence of fraud, and that almost any excuse is sufficient to destroy that presumption, and show the good faith of the transaction. Smith v. Acker, 23 Wend. 653; Fuller v. Acker, 1 Hill, 473; Butler v. Van Wyck, Id. 438, 447. "Perhaps," says Cowen, J., delivering the opinion of the majority of the court, in the last case, "it is necessary for the vendee or mortgagee, claiming in the face of a continued possession in his vendor or mortgagor to give evidence, slight at least, that the consideration was a true debt. Beyond this the verdict of the jury must be received as final. The convenience of the vendor or mortgagor, the declared purpose of enabling him to pay debts, even the comfort of his family, in retaining household furniture, according to their rank in life; in short, motives of humanity, and almost of mere courtesy, may, I think, on the authority of Smith v. Acker, 23 Wend. 653, be given in evidence to the jury, who may, if they please, allow them as legitimate excuses." And in Stoddard v. Butler, 20 Wend. 548, Senator Verplanck held this language: "Thus it happened here and in England, that, whilst the courts and the books laid down the rule broadly, and often applied it strictly, that 'unless possession accompanies and follows the deed, it is fraudulent and void,'—in the words of Justice Butler, Edwards v. Harben, 2 Term R. 587, adopted and incorporated in our own statute; yet first case after case, and then class after class, of exceptions was exempted from the rule, until with us there were no less than twenty-four distinct grounds of exemption; such as the kind of sale, purchase under execution or distress for rent, necessity, convenience, the custom of trade, the distance or situation of place, the relation of parties, motives of humanity or of friendship, and special circumstances of various kinds, more or less accurately defined, all enumerated by Judge Cowen. 3 Cow. 190."

At an early period of English jurisprudence, fraud was arbitrarily inferred from acts susceptible of a satisfactory explanation. But when the extension of commerce rendered the frequent transmission of property necessary, and created a corresponding demand for securities of various kinds, the harsh rules of a darker age yielded to a wiser policy, more compatible with the actual condition of mankind, and the usual course of human affairs. Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80, is a leading one on the subject of fraudulent sales of personal property. It was decided in the forty-fourth year of the reign of Elizabeth, in the court of star-chamber,—a tribunal which, becoming odious in consequence of its usurpations was abolished in the sixteenth year of the reign of Charles I.; and, as Lord Clarendon informs us, "to the general joy of the whole nation." The case derives no weight from adventitious circumstances, such as the dignity and authority of the tribunal, or the eminence and integrity of the judges; but it must be supported, if at all, on the intrinsic justice of its doctrines. Now, when we recollect that the proceeding was a criminal information on the part of the crown, and remember, too, the historical fact, that the tribunal itself was an instrument of tyranny in the hands of the sovereign, we shall not wonder that the information was sustained by "the whole court of star-chamber," and Twyne himself branded as a criminal. It is sufficient to observe that the resolutions in that case would hardly be adopted to their full extent in modern times, although it cannot be denied that there were such marks and signs of an intent to defraud creditors as might create suspicion and demand explanation, and might probably authorize fraud to be inferred as a question of law, without the intervention of a jury, if that course of practice could be tolerated at all. (1) The gift was general and absolute, without exception of apparel, or any thing of necessity. (2) The donor continued in possession and used them as his own, and by reason thereof traded and trafficked with others, and defrauded and deceived them. (3) It was made in secret. (4) It was made pending the writ. (5) There was a secret trust between the parties, for the donor possessed all and used them as his proper goods, notwithstanding the gift was absolute and unconditional. (6) The deed stated that the gift was made honestly, truly, and bonâ fide. These were the principal, and by no means slight, badges of fraud in that celebrated case; and yet a court at this day would not feel warranted in holding such a transaction fraudulent per se as the court of star-chamber did, but would allow a party to explain it if in his power. To hold that retention of possession is per se fraudulent, is to establish an artificial rule not founded in truth nor upheld by the principles of justice. It is to destroy an important element of trade and commerce, and take us back to the primitive ages, where the transactions between men were few and simple, and where ignorance of writing and the absence of records, rendered actual delivery the more necessary as an indication of title. It is to crush the energies of the debtor by depriving him, in many cases, of the means of extricating himself from embarrassment without absolute ruin. Harshness to debtors has yielded to an enlarged and liberal philanthropy. Imprisonment for debt, the relic of a barbarous age, is fast disappearing everywhere. The debtor cannot be put in chains and sold to foreigners, nor can his body be cut in pieces; both of which were allowed by the laws of the twelve tables of Rome. Cooper's Justinian, 658. In place of such cruelty certain property, necessary for his sustenance and comfort, is, in most if not all of the states, preserved to him against the rapacity of the creditor, and the exemption of homesteads is now becoming a very general policy in our country. In the strongest cases in favor of the proposition that possession must accompany the deed in absolute sales, as Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80; Stone v. Grubham, 2 Bulst. 225; Cadogan v. Kennett, Cowp. 432; and Edwards v. Harben, 2 Term R. 594, it is expressly conceded, that if the conveyance is conditional, or if, by the terms or nature of the instrument or deed, possession is consistent therewith, such possession is not only not per se fraudulent, but not even a badge of fraud, requiring any explanation at all. The weight and respectability of authority undoubtedly is, that possession by the vendor, even after an absolute sale, and where such possession is incompatible with the deed, is only primâ facie evidence of fraud, and subject to explanation, and is not per se fraudulent. Kidd v. Rawlinson, 2 Bos. & P. 59; Lady Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 145; Beals v. Guernsey, 8 Johns. 452. And the same doctrine has been established by the supreme court of Arkansas in the cases of Cocke v. Chapman, 2 Eng. [7 Ark.] 200; Field v. Simco, Id. 275, and cases there cited; Costar v. Davies, 3 Eng. [8 Ark.] 218.

There is a principle connected with this question of possession which deserves consideration. The only reason why absolute sales of chattels, where there was no transfer of possession, were declared fraudulent and void, was on the supposition that there was a secret trust between the parties, and that the retention of possession was calculated to deceive those with whom the vendor might subsequently deal. As expressed by Justice Burnet (1 Atk. 163), "Possession can be no otherwise a badge of fraud than as it is calculated to deceive creditors; as to the possession of goods, I have no way of coming to the knowledge of the owner but by seeing who is in possession of them." Such a sale is held fraudulent and void as to creditors and purchasers, although good between the parties themselves. Whenever the rule is enforced it is for the benefit of creditors and purchasers, and they are the only persons who can avail themselves of it. Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80; Long, Sales, 67. Now where a creditor or purchaser has notice of a bona fide sale for a valuable consideration, he cannot say or pretend that he has been deceived, deluded, or defrauded, although the vendor retains possession, uses the property as his own, and such possession is inconsistent with the deed or contract. With such knowledge, to allow the second to overreach the first purchaser would be to sanction a fraud. In such a case the retention of possession would be of no consequence, and could not be available for any purpose. This doctrine is sustained by the case of Sanger v. Eastwood, 19 Wend. 514, where it was held that a purchaser of personal property, with notice of the existence of a mortgage covering it, cannot avail himself of the facts, that the mortgage was unaccompanied by delivery of possession, and that it had not been filed for record. And from other cases the rule is deducible, that if a creditor has knowledge of a sale, the mere retention of possession is a matter of no consequence. Steel v. Brown, 1 Taunt. 381; Sturtevant v. Ballard, 9 Johns. 337; Barron v. Paxton, 5 Johns. 258; Ryall v. Rolle, 1 Atk. 165; Bissell v. Hopkins, 3 Cow. 166. It is said that there is no clause in this mortgage, authorizing the mortgagor to retain possession, and that that is a badge of fraud. It is sufficient to reply that it was not necessary; because, first, the transaction was of such a nature that the mortgagee was not entitled to the possession of the slaves until he paid the notes; and, second, the effect of the mortgage is the same as if it contained such a clause, for this right in the mortgagor is incidental to a mortgage, and implied by law without such clause.

"There is usually in English mortgages," says Kent, "a clause inserted in the mortgage that until default in payment the mortgagor shall retain possession. This was a very ancient practice, as early as the time of James I., and if there be no such express agreement in the deed, it is the general understanding of the parties, and at this day almost the universal practice, founded on a presumed or tacit assent." 4 Kent, Comm. 148; 5 Johns. 258; 2 Hill, Eq. 328. In mortgages of slaves, very general practice has familiarized possession by the mortgagor, as one of the conditions and incidents of the contract. It is too common and universal to excite suspicion. Fishburne v. Kunhardt, 2 Speer, 564; Bank v. Gourdin, 1 Speer, Eq. 439, 458;

Maples v. Maples, Rice, Eq. 300. The general custom in Arkansas, as proved by witnesses, accords with this doctrine, and it is just and reasonable, and a different one could not be tolerated as to slaves. But even if it were necessary to show any circumstances in this case by way of explanation of possession, the record contains an abundance of reason to justify it. 1. The nature of the transaction between Dawson and Merrill, which was only to secure Merrill from loss and damage, in consequence of the indorsement of these notes, and not in fact allowing Merrill the right of possession at all; until he was damnified by the payment of the notes, which was not until the 4th of March, 1842, and then the negroes had been sold. 2. That at the time Dawson made the mortgage, Nov. 25, 1837, he was a wealthy and solvent man, with a large property, and able or supposed to be able to pay all his debts, and who did not become embarrassed until long afterwards. 3. The mortgage was made in Natchez, Mississippi; the negroes were upon Dawson's plantation, in Jefferson county, Arkansas, and the mortgage was placed upon record, thus showing that it was not a secret transaction. 4. Merrill was then, and ever has been, a non-resident of this state, within the saving in the statute of limitations, even if it could be pretended that any statute applied. This is no stale demand; nor is it pretended that Merrill slept upon his rights, for after he paid the notes, he immediately commenced proceedings to subject the mortgaged property. 5. The whole testimony shows, and Dawson's answer under oath admits, that the mortgage was made bona fide and for a valuable consideration, and to secure Merrill; and the conduct of the latter proves the fact. In addition to this, the defendants had actual, if not constructive, notice, as will presently appear, and they purchased in their own wrong. 6. Last of all, the possession of Dawson, while he did have possession, was consistent with the deed of mortgage, and in fact Merrill was not entitled to possession at all until March 4, 1842. That there was at any time, any actual fraud in the transaction, has not been proved. There is no circumstance or fact which would justify even a suspicion of fraud as to Merrill. The idea that they colluded with each other to defraud a subsequent creditor, to defraud a person who was not a creditor of Dawson until long afterwards, is absurd. As to subsequent acts and declarations of Dawson, referred to by some of the defendants in their answers, suffice it to say, they are not proved, and if they were proved, they could not affect Merrill in the slightest degree, he being wholly unconnected with them. That there was any fraud in fact is a naked assumption, without the slightest evidence to sustain it.

II. It is insisted by the defendants, that this mortgage was not legally acknowledged, and that it was not in fact properly or legally recorded, although the recorder certified under his hand and official seal, on the original mortgage, that it was duly recorded in book B, page 174, on the 29th of December, 1837, and hence that it does not act as constructive notice. It is true that the record does not show on what day it was recorded, but that is not material, nor can the certificate of the registering office be contradicted, as we shall presently perceive. This was such an instrument as the law authorized to be recorded. The law in force in 1837 required the recorder to record all deeds and conveyances which were presented to him for that purpose. Ter. Dig. 454. It does not limit such deeds and conveyances to real property; personal chattels would therefore be embraced. It does not require any particular mode of acknowledgment or authentication, or indeed any at all. Act 1804; Ter. Dig. 454. The same act, under the title "Mortgages," (section 1, Ter. Dig. 433,) requires every mortgagee of real or personal estate, when the mortgage is satisfied, at the request of the mortgagor, to "enter satisfaction upon the margin of the record of such mortgage recorded in said recorder's office." The second section prescribes a penalty for failure to do so. The fifth section of same act gives the same remedy upon a "mortgage of personal property" as upon real estate. Ter. Dig. 434. These provisions show conclusively that mortgages of personal property were authorized to be recorded, (Hodgson v. Butts, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 140; 1 Pet. Cond. R. 476; McKeen v. Delaney's Lessee, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 22; 2 Pet. Cond. R. 179,) whether such recording would operate as constructive notice or not. The mortgage was made in the state of Mississippi, and was properly acknowledged before the judge of the probate court of Adams county, an officer competent to take the acknowledgment of deeds in that state. How. & H. Dig. p. 368, § 99; Talbot v. Simpson [Case No. 13,730]. A judge of probates in Mississippi is a judge of a county court, within the meaning of the act of congress of 1789. The recorder acts ministerially and not judicially in the matter of recording deeds. Elliott v. Piersol, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 341; 2 Bin. 40; Dawson v. Thruston, 2 Hen. & M. 135. When a deed, therefore, is presented to the recorder for record, he ought to admit it, and has no authority to reject it. Id. The recording of a deed is evidence that it was legally proved and admitted to record (Talbot v. Simpson [supra]), and the certificate of the registering officer cannot be impeached or controlled by producing the record and showing a variance (Ames v. Phelps, 18 Pick. 314), or traversing such certificate. Rex v. Hopper, 3 Price, 495. If after a deed is left for record with the clerk to be recorded, he delivers it to the grantor without recording it, this is a breach of official duty for which the clerk would be liable to creditors for any injury they might sustain, but would not render the deed void or impair the rights of the grantee. Bank of Kentucky v. Haggin, 1 A. K. Marsh. 307; Avent v. Read, 2 Stew. [Ala.] 488. Hence if a deed after it is received by the clerk remains unrecorded through no fault of the grantee, until after an attachment of the land embraced in the deed, the attachment shall not prejudice the grantee. Franklin v. Cannon, 1 Root, 500; Hartmyer v. Gates, Id. 61; Judd v. Woodruff, 2 Root, 298. The same principle is substantially decided in McGregor v. Hall, 3 Stew. & P. 397.

The principle upon which these cases rest is, that the officer is presumed to discharge his duty, and that if he omits to do so, the grantee or mortgagee shall not be prejudiced —shall not lose his rights, which would indeed be against the dictates of justice. It is not required of him "that he should stand by and see that the clerk does his duty." Beekman v. Frost, 18 Johns. 563, 1 Johns. Ch. 300. In the case of King v. Hopper, 3 Price, 495, it was expressly held, that the lodging of a deed in the officer's hands is an enrolment. "And indeed," says Richards, B., "the affairs of mankind would be in a dreadful condition if it were not so, for when the deed is once lodged, the party interested in it loses all dominion and control over it, and it is from that moment left entirely with the officer. If an actual and complete enrolment were necessary, this deed had not been enrolled on the 22d nor on the 24th of July; but the cases all decide that that is not necessary, and that the instant a deed is lodged in the office, from that instant it must be considered as enrolled, and the practice accords with that rule." The same principle was explicitly asserted in Garrick v. Williams, 3 Taunt. 544. In McDonald v. Leach, Kirb. 72, it was held, that where a deed is received for record, this entry made upon it by the register and the deed lodged in the office, is equivalent to actual registration. 2 Hil. Abr. p. 432, § 87; McConnell v. Brown, Litt. Sel. Cas. 462. When all the requisites have been performed which authorize a recording officer to record any instrument whatever, and the order for that purpose has been given, the instrument in law is considered as recorded, although the manual labor of inserting it in a book kept for that purpose may not have been performed. Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 147; 1 Pet. Cond. R. 273, 274. The receiving of an instrument, marking it filed by the clerk, and signing such indorsement officially, is a sufficient recording to protect the rights of the grantee from subsequent incumbrances. See cases above cited. Nor is it necessary that the date of recording should be put upon the record. If the recording of the deed with the acknowledgment is prior to the opposing title, it is sufficient. Galusha v. Sinclear, 3 Vt. 394; Morey v. McGuire, 4 Vt. 327; Wickes v. Caulk, 5 Har. & J. 36; Rex v. Hopper, 3 Price, 495.

It has been held that registry acts are remedial, and ought to be liberally and beneficially construed. Jackson v. Town, 4 Cow. 599; James v. Morey, 2 Cow. 247; Jackson v. Bowen, 7 Cow. 13; 2 Pow. Mortg. 624a. Hence a memorial of registry containing the substance of a covenant in a lease, without expressly setting it forth, has been held to be a good registration. McAlpine v. Swift, 1 Ball & B. 285. In Latouche v. Dunsany, 1 Schoales & L. 157, Lord Redesdale said that if registration was to be considered notice, it must be notice whether the deed be duly registered or not. A clerk may record a deed made by an agent without inquiring into the validity or fact of agency. 3 A. K. Marsh. 92. The registry of a deed executed by several, but acknowledged by one only, is good and sufficient. Shaw v. Poor, 6 Pick. 86. A clerical error or mistake does not vitiate the registry of a deed. As where a term assigned was of sixty-one years, and was stated in the enrolment to be sixty-two years; or, as where the consideration was 250 pounds and was enrolled 280 pounds; or, as where the name of the trustee was enrolled "Seden," when it was spelt "Soden" in the deed, and where the assignment was stated to be Seden, habendum to Corrie; in these cases the enrolment was held good. Ince v. Everard, 6 Term R. 545; Wyatt v. Barwell, 19 Ves. 435; 2 Pow. Mortg. 621, note. Where lands lie in several counties, it is sufficient to record the deed in any one of them. Scott v. Leather, 3 Yeates, 184; Duffield v. Brindley, 1 Rawle, 91. Deeds were enrolled at the common law for safe custody. 1 Salk. 389. The enrolment of a deed under the statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, is a record, and, therefore, is not traversable. Rex v. Hopper, 3 Price, 495. The indorsement of the registry of a deed on the deed itself is sufficient evidence of enrolment. Pyne v. Dor, 1 Term R. 55. The production of a deed with the memorial indorsed, is sufficient proof of the enrolment. Compton v. Chandless, 4 Esp. 18; Bull. N. P. 229; Kinnersley v. Orpe, 1 Doug. 56. The date of enrolment indorsed by the clerk of enrolments on the deed, is conclusive evidence of the date and fact of enrolment. Rex v. Hopper, 3 Price, 495; 1 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 425; and there can be no averment or proof against it.

The object of every registry act is to afford publicity, and if a deed was in reality recorded, before a subsequent incumbrance accrued, it would be strange if the subsequent incumbrancer could say, that although the deed was on record, yet it afforded no notice, because the precise day of placing it there did not appear from the record. That would be to say, that the registry is utterly void, unless the date of it appears from the record, which would entirely destroy the beneficial construction which has ever been placed on registry acts, and would be at war with the first principles of justice as well as adjudged cases. Under the registry act of 27 Hen. VIII., a party might be permitted to give evidence of the day of an enrolment having been actually made, because it was not the usage to insert on the record the particular day.

Rex v. Hopper, 3 Price, 495; 1 Exch. 403. It has, as I think, been demonstrated (1) that the mortgage from Dawson to Merrill was lodged and filed for record December 29, 1837, and was from that day, in contemplation of law, enrolled, so as to protect the rights of the mortgagee; (2) that no evidence is admissible or can be received to impeach or contradict the certificate of the recorder indorsed on the mortgage. But if such evidence can be received, then I contend (3) that the mortgage was actually recorded, and that it is immaterial whether the manual labor of transcribing it was performed by the clerk in person, by Dawson, or any other amanuensis, provided the clerk adopted and sanctioned the act, which he did, as is manifest from his certificate, and which certificate is not to be controverted by parol proof, for that would be to set up inferior in the place of the higher evidence.

In England, registration is not of itself notice, and a mortgagee or purchaser is not bound to search the register; but if he does, he will be deemed to have actual notice of all incumbrances on the register, within the period of his search, (2 Pow. Mortg. 631a, note; Wiseman v. Westland, 1 Younge & J. 117; Bushell v. Bushell, 1 Schoales & L. 103; Latouche v. Dunsany, Id. 157,) thus showing it may be made the medium of actual notice. But in this country registry is constructive notice to all the world. Johnson v. Stagg, 2 Johns. 510; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 299; Peters v. Goodrich, 3 Conn. 146; Grant v. Bissett, 1 Caines, Cas. 112; Parkist v. Alexander, 1 Johns. Ch. 398; St. Andrews' Church v. Tompkins, 7 Johns. Ch. 14. Where a person claims to be a purchaser without notice, he is bound to deny, fully and in the most precise terms, every circumstance and fact from which notice might be inferred (Jerrard v. Saunders, 2 Ves. Jr. 454; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 303); and this he must do, although notice is not charged in the bill. 3 P. Wms. 244, note; Bodmin v. Vandenbendy, 1 Vern. 179; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 573, and cases there cited; Murray v. Finster, 2 Johns. Ch. 155; Galatian v. Erwin, 1 Hopk. Ch. 55, 56; Carr v. Callaghan, 3 Litt. [Ky.] 365. "If a purchaser wishes to rest his claim on the fact of being an innocent bona fide purchaser, he must deny notice, even though it be not charged, and he must deny it positively, not evasively; he must even deny fully and in the most precise terms every circumstance from which notice may be inferred." Per Chancellor Kent, in Denning v. Smith, 3 Johns. Ch. 345; Pillow v. Shannon, 3 Yerg. 511. Every case on the registry acts has been determined on the ground that those acts do not affect the great fundamental principles of equity; but that every purchaser claiming under a registered deed, with notice of a prior incumbrance or purchase, is subject to any equity which such prior incumbrance or purchase may create. Chandos v. Brownlow, 2 Ridg. App. 428, vide 3 Sudg. Vend. p. 307, and notes b and 1, and authorities there cited; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 385; Cotton v. Hart, 1 A. K. Marsh. 58. So, too, in Portwood v. Outton's Adm'r, 3 B. Mon. 253, it is said, that a mortgage of land without seal or scroll was not a recordable instrument within the statute, so as to make the record constructive notice, yet that it was good against a subsequent purchaser with notice of its existence.

III. But, supposing there was no constructive notice arising from the registry of the mortgage, the defendants had actual notice. It is a just and salutary rule, calculated to preserve good faith and protect the rights of individuals, that whatever is sufficient to put a party upon inquiry is good actual notice. Johnson v. Bloodgood, 1 Johns. Cas. 53; Sterry v. Arden, Id. 267; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 389; Ferrars v. Cherry, 2 Vern. 384; Smith v. Low, 1 Atk. 490; Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 437; Daniels v. Davison, 16 Ves. 250; Newman v. Kent, 1 Mer. 240; Green v. Slayter, 4 Johns. Ch. 46; Peters v. Goodrich, 3 Conn. 146; Ward v. Fox, Hughes [Ky.] 431; Johnston v. Gwathmey, 4 Litt. [Ky.] 317; Roberts v. Stanton, 2 Munf. 129; Pitney v. Leonard, 1 Paige, 462; Burkart v. Bucher, 2 Bin. 466; Newl. Cont. 54; Sugd. Vend. 498. In a great variety of cases it must necessarily be a matter of considerable difficulty to decide what circumstances are sufficient to put a party upon inquiry. Such, certainly, however, as to facts, as that a reasonable mind could not hesitate to deem sufficient to call for further inquiry, and to put a party upon his diligence, is good actual notice. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 389; Nantz v. McPherson, 7 T. B. Mon. 599; Jackson v. Sharp, 9 Johns. 166; Jackson v. Burgott, 10 Johns. 460; Dunham v. Dey, 15 Johns. 567; 2 Pow. Mortg. 561. Examples of actual and implied notice, sufficient in equity. In Fry v. Porter, 1 Mod. 300, Hale, C. B., speaking of the point of notice, said: "Here are several circumstances that seem to show there might be notice, and a public voice in the house, or an accidental intimation, &c., may possibly be sufficient notice." Butcher v. Stapely, 1 Vern. 364; 2 Pow. Mortg. 561. A verbal communication to a purchaser before he receives a conveyance, that A. B. has a claim to the land, is a sufficient notice to charge the purchaser with A. B.'s equity. Currens v. Hart, Hardin, 37. Lis pendens is sufficient notice. Green v. Slayter, 4 Johns. Ch. 38. A violent presumption of notice or proof of facts which imply it is sufficient. Cunningham v. Buckingham, 1 Ohio, 265; 2 Hil. Abr. p. 458, § 246. Where a grantor notified his grantee in writing, that the title of the land was in another as collateral security, to pay certain notes, this was held a sufficient notice to the purchaser, although nothing was said of date, amount, or time of payment. Dunham v. Dey, 15 Johns. 567. H. went as an agent for the defendant to purchase a lot of B., who refused to sell, and told him he had already conveyed the lot to

G., one of the lessors of the plaintiff. "Here, then," says the court, "was a direct and positive notice to the agent of the defendant," equivalent to a notice to his principal. Jackson v. Sharp, 9 Johns. 168. Notice of a prior incumbrance may be presumed from inadequacy of price. 2 Pow. Mortg. 578a, note. On the principle, that whatever puts a party on inquiry is good notice in equity, it is observable that if a person be apprised that the legal estate is in a third person at the time he purchases, he will be bound to take notice of the trusts with which the legal estate is clothed. 2 Freem. p. 137, pl. 171; 2 Pow. Mortg. 578, note. While H. was in negotiation for the purchase of a lot, he was informed that G. claimed the lot and had title, and was cautioned against purchasing, but he made the purchase and took a quitclaim deed. Kent, C. J., held that this was actual notice beyond all controversy, and that the purchase was subject to G.'s prior right. Jackson v. Burgott, 10 Johns. 460. A subsequent purchaser admitted in his answer that before the execution of the deed to him, he had heard that the grantor had made some provision for his daughters, out of property in Greenwich street, and there was no evidence in the case that the grantor owned any other property in that street, except the lots included in the settlement. Chancellor Kent held this purchaser chargeable with constructive notice, or notice in law of this settlement, "because he had information sufficient to put him on inquiry." Sterry v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 267. Where a sheriff stated and declared to all bidders, at the time of the sale, that the property offered was subject to a mortgage, this was deemed sufficient actual notice to charge a purchaser at the sale with such mortgage. Muse v. Letterman, 13 Serg. & R. 168; Lindle v. Neville, Id. 227.

Notice sometimes resolves itself into matter of fact, and sometimes into matter of law; each case, to a great extent, depends upon its own circumstances as to notice. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 387–389; Com. Dig. "Chancery," 4, c. 2. If a man purchases land, and is informed of the existence of a lease, this is sufficient to put him on inquiry, and is therefore good notice; or if he is informed that the estate is in the possession of tenants, he is bound to inquire into the claims of those tenants, and is affected with notice of all the facts as to their estates, and is bound by the leases they hold. Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 437; Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 118; Hall v. Smith, 14 Ves. 426; 1 Story. Eq. Jur. 389, note 3 and authorities therein cited; St. Andrew's Church v. Tompkins, 7 Johns. Ch. 16. The recital in a deed is notice; thus the recital of a letter of attorney, by which a deed was made, is notice to the purchaser of the existence of such a power. Jackson v. Neely, 10 Johns. 374; Cuyler v. Bradt, 2 Caines, Cas. 326; 2 Pow. Mortg. 620a; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 389; Hall v. Smith, 14 Ves. 426. Evidence that a tenant cut wood on the land is constructive notice to the demandant, that the former held a deed of the land. Kendall v. Lawrence, 22 Pick. 540. So possession of land is notice to a purchaser, and he must inquire of the title of the occupant. Knox v. Thompson, 1 Litt. [Ky.] 352; Fitzhugh v. Croghan, 2 J. J. Marsh. 434; 4 T. B. Mon. 196; 2 J. J. Marsh. 180; Brown v. Anderson, 1 T. B. Mon. 201. The deposit of title deeds as a security for money, constitutes an equitable mortgage; and a person, knowing such deposit, cannot take a mortgage or purchase to the prejudice of the equitable incumbrance so created. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 383, 384. Notice may be either actual and positive, or constructive, or. implied. Id. 387. And the fact of notice may be inferred from circumstances as well as proved by direct evidence. 4 Mass. 637. "Any circumstance," says the court in Knox v. Thompson, 1 Litt. [Ky.] 353, "that puts another on the search, is sufficient to convict him of notice." Nothing can destroy the effect of actual notice. 2 Pow. Mortg. 617, note, 572a. It is also a rule, that where there is notice of a deed the purchaser is bound by the effect and consequence of it, whatever opinion he may entertain as to its validity. Thus in the case of Ferrars v. Cherry, 2 Vern. 384, it was held, that the defendant purchased with notice of the settlement, but he contended that the settlement did not recite or contain any notice that it was made pursuant to articles entered into before the marriage, and that the settlement was therefore voluntary, and fraudulent as to him; but the court said "he ought to have inquired of the wife's relations, who were parties to the deed, whether it was voluntary or made pursuant to an agreement before marriage; and, having notice of the deed, must at his peril purchase, and be bound by the effect and consequences of the deed." 2 Pow. Mortg. 572, 573. So in Brackett v. Wait, 6 Vt. 424, it was expressly held, that where a person has notice of a prior unrecorded deed, he is not protected from the effect of such notice by any erroneous opinions as to its validity, and must purchase at his peril.

There is another point connected with notice, which seems to me entitled to great weight, and it is this: By the English registry acts, recording is not constructive notice; but, if the records are searched, that is actual notice to a purchaser of all incumbrances within the period of his search. 2 Pow. Mortg. 631b, note. In this country the unauthorized registry of a deed would not amount to constructive notice. In all the cases upon this class of deeds in the American courts, the principle has not been carried further than that they are not constructive notice; but it has not been determined, that, when such deeds are actually recorded in a register office, that a search for and examination of the deed so recorded, would not be actual notice, or a circumstance from which notice would be presumed. On every principle of reason it would seem that the actual fact of examining a record, in an office where incumbrances are preserved, although the deed was not authorized to be recorded at all, would, at least, be equivalent to a verbal communication of an incumbrance, and would have the advantage of furnishing more precise and certain information, —such, at least, as would be sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry, which is all that is necessary to constitute actual notice. In Morrison v. Trudeau, 1 Mart. [N. S.] 384, it was held that a deed unduly registered, either from want of valid acknowledgment, or otherwise, will, notwithstanding, operate as notice to third persons. I understand the court to declare that such a record may constitute medium of actual notice, as, for example, by examination or means of a like character. So in the British courts judgments on record are not of themselves notice, and yet if it can be proved that a party searched the records of the court, it will be enough to bind him with notice of all judgments entered, though he might have overlooked them. 2 Pow. Mortg. 597, and notes. But it is unnecessary to pursue the point for the proof of actual notice, independent of this circumstance, is clear and conclusive, leaving no doubt on the mind as to the knowledge of the defendants of the existence of the mortgage at the time of their purchase. It was proclaimed at the sale,—the record book, where the mortgage was recorded, was lying open near at hand and all persons referred to it, and some of the defendants made search. Proof could not be more conclusive.

IV. Notice of a lien or incumbrance on property, binds the purchaser, if received by him at any time before the execution of the conveyance and payment of the purchase-money, and arrests all further proceedings towards the completion of the purchase; and, if persisted in, it is held to be done in fraud of the equitable incumbrance. 2 Pow. Mortg. 617; 2 Fonbl. Eq. bk. 2, c. 6, § 2, note I; Id. § 3, note M; Id. bk. 3, c. 3, § 1, note B; Taylor v. Stibbert, 2 Ves. Jr. 441; Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. 68; Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 38; Le Neve v. Le Neve, 3 Atk. 654; Story v. Lord Windsor, Id. 304; 1 Paige, 208–284; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 301. In Wormley v. Wormley, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 449, it is said by Story, J., to be a settled rule in equity, that a purchaser without notice to be entitled to protection, must not only be so at the time of the contract or conveyance, but at the time of the payment of the purchase-money. Mead v. Orrery, 3 Atk. 238. And in Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. 68, above cited, Chancellor Kent said: "A plea of a purchase for a valuable consideration without notice, must be with the money actually paid; or else, according to Lord Hardwicke, you are not hurt. The averment must be, not only that the purchaser had not notice at or before the time of the execution of the deeds, but that the purchase-money was paid before notice. There must not only be a denial of notice before the purchase, but a denial of notice before payment of the money. Harrison v. Southcote, 1 Atk. 538; Story v. Lord Windsor, 2 Atk. 630. Even if the purchase-money be secured to be paid, yet, if it be not in fact paid before notice, the plea of a purchase, for a valuable consideration, will be overruled. Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304." Now Roane and Taylor, in their answers, show that they had notice before the sale; they do not deny notice. Fish denies notice generally; Fowler states that he did not receive actual notice until after the negroes came to his possession. In none of these answers is there any denial, or any thing equivalent to it, that the purchase-money was actually paid when the notice was received. This is absolutely necessary, as shown by the above cases. It must be positively averred in the answer, and cannot be inferred or supplied by intendment; and without it the plea of a purchase for a valuable consideration without notice, must be overruled. It is to be observed also, that Roane, Taylor, and Fish, do not show themselves to be bonâ fide purchasers for a valuable consideration at all. They do not specify the judgment under which they purchased,—do not show, or exhibit, or refer to, or produce a judgment and execution,—which they were bound to do, to bring themselves within the character of purchasers.

The rule is, that an unregistered mortgage has preference over a subsequent docketed judgment. But if the property mortgaged be sold by the sheriff, prior to the registry of the mortgage, a bonâ fide purchaser at the sheriff's sale, without notice, will be protected against the mortgagee, if he has actually paid the consideration, and shows a conveyance, good in form, by the recording of which he obtains priority as a purchaser. Jackson v. Terry, 13 Johns. 472. In fact a sheriff's deed, in the absence of statutory provisions, cannot be received in evidence at all, unless the judgment and execution are produced, for the purchaser claims under the judgment and execution, which is the only authority for the sheriff to sell. Bowen v. Bell, 20 Johns. 338; Weyand v. Tipton, 5 Serg. & R. 332; Dunn v. Meriwether, 1 A. K. Marsh. 158; Cox v. Nelson, 1 T. B. Mon. 94; Hinman v. Pope, 1 Gilman, 136. Nor do those persons show any deed from the sheriff, and in these particulars have failed to show themselves purchasers. But be this as it may, the defendants, Roane, Taylor, Fish, Fowler, and Badgett, had actual notice. Badgett, in addition to having notice himself, purchased from Fowler, who had notice. The purchasers of these negroes could acquire no better right than Dawson himself had to them. The officer only professed to sell the right and interest of Dawson, whatever it might be, as his deposition amply proves. The defendants who purchased stand in Dawson's shoes,—the sale, if valid, was a judicial assignment or transfer of Dawson's interest, subject, undoubtedly, to all subsisting prior incumbrances, and to the rights of third persons. To that sale the rule of caveat emptor most strongly applies. Merrill was neither party nor privy to the judgment under which the negroes were sold, and of course his rights were not affected by any proceeding under it. If A. is in the possession of a slave, and it is sold as his property, but in fact belongs to B., may not the owner reclaim his property; and is it any defence for the purchaser to say that he purchased without notice, that B. was the true owner? A court of justice would inform him that he bought at his peril, and could acquire no greater right than A. had to the property. This principle, necessary to preserve the sacred rights of property, rests upon a foundation, unconnected with the doctrine of notice of another's right. It rests upon the great principle applicable to all sales of personal property, whether by the agreement of parties or by the authority of law under judicial process, that the purchaser must look to the title and buy at his peril,—that the maxim caveat emptor must govern. Ashe v. Livingston, 2 Bay, 85; Long, Sales, 164; Clute v. Robison, 2 Johns. 595; 2 Pow. Mortg. 589a.

VI. Roane, Taylor, Fowler, Fish, and Badgett, are liable personally for the value of the slaves, in case they do not surrender them. Blair v. Owles, 1 Munf. 38; Hughes v. Graves, 1 Litt. [Ky.] 317. They were appraised at the sale by three respectable and disinterested persons, under oath, according to the appraisement law, and that must necessarily constitute the criterion of value. The testimony proves that they were very likely negroes. The parol testimony very satisfactorily proves that they were not valued beyond what they were worth. I insist upon that criterion of value, for it is the only one to which we can rightfully resort.

VII. It is perfectly manifest from the pleadings and proofs in the cause, that the negroes will be insufficient to discharge the mortgage debt, and that it is, therefore, necessary to apply the hire thereto, which hire is claimed of the defendants by the complainant, in his bill. The defendants are personally accountable for the reasonable hire of the slaves, at least from the time of the service of process upon them, which is equivalent to a demand. Graves v. Sayre, 5 B. Mon. 390; 7 Dana, 227; 2 B. Mon. 159. As to other cases relative to hire, vide Reed v. Lansdale, Hardin, 6; 3 Bibb, 18; 6 T. B. Mon. 122; 7 T. B. Mon. 544; 4 T. B. Mon. 347; Mims v. Mims, 3 J. J. Marsh. 108. In detinue the institution of suit is a sufficient demand to entitle the plaintiff to the hire of slaves by way of damages from that time. Tunstall v. McClelland, 1 Bibb, 186; Cole's Adm'r v. Cole, 4 Bibb, 340; Jones v. Henry, 3 Litt. [Ky.] 49; Carroll v. Pathkiller, 3 Port. [Ala.] 279. And so in this case, the hire must be computed at least from the service of the writ of subpoena on the defendants.

A. Fowler argued the case for himself and other defendants fully and elaborately, on the principal grounds (1) that as the possession of the slaves did not accompany and follow the mortgage, but remained continuously in the possession of the mortgagor, the mortgage was, therefore, fraudulent and void as to creditors and purchasers; (2) that it was not properly acknowledged or recorded, and that the defendants had no constructive notice, and no sufficient actual notice of its existence, and that they were innocent and bona fide purchasers, for a valuable consideration, without notice; (3) that the mortgage was fraudulent in fact, and was designed and intended to protect Dawson's property from creditors, and that the suit was prosecuted for Dawson's benefit. These points and others were argued with great ability by Mr. Fowler, but the reporter having no notes of it, or of the authorities cited and relied on, is unable to insert them here, which he would otherwise do with great pleasure. On the 18th of July, 1846, the defendants filed exceptions to depositions taken by complainant.

JOHNSON, District Judge. The first exception points to the omission of the name of James L. Dawson, as one of the defendants, in the caption of the depositions of Trapnall, Dorris, Walker, White, Bogy, and Hammett; but his name appears as a defendant in the order of the court appointing commissioners, in the notices served on the defendants, in the caption of the interrogatories which were filed and attached to, and issued with, the commission, in the commission which issued under the authority of this court, and in the oath of the commissioners to execute the same. The commissioner states, in the caption of the depositions, that they were taken in pursuance of said commission and interrogatories, in each of which the names of all the defendants are fully stated. Under these circumstances, it cannot, in my judgment, be said, that the depositions do not appear to be taken in this case, and this exception is overruled. [Keene v. Meade] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 6.

The second exception is, that notice of filing interrogatories, and the time and place of taking such depositions, was not given to Roane, Badgett, Taylor, and Fowler. The notice was served on Taylor, Roane, and Fowler, by delivering to each of them a true copy of the notice, and on Badgett and Fish, by leaving a true copy of the notice with a white member of the family, and on Dawson and Baylor by delivering a true copy to their counsel, they not being residents of this district. This, in my opinion, is a good service of the notice. By the 13th rule of practice for the courts of equity of the United States, the service of a subpoena may be made by leaving a copy thereof at the dwelling-house or usual place of abode of each defendant, with some free white person who is a member or resident in the family. If this be a sufficient service of a subpoena to notify the defendant of the suit, it ought to be considered sufficient service of a notice in any subsequent proceeding in the cause. This exception is also overruled. The third exception is in these words: "Only a part of the interrogatories of said complainant were propounded to and answered by, each of said witnesses." Not having arrived at any satisfactory conclusion upon this exception, in the absence of the presiding judge, a decision upon it will be deferred to the next term of this court. The fourth exception is, "that the deposition of Henry D. Mandeville, taken at Natchez, on the 8th of March, 1845, was taken without any sufficient notice having been served on said defendants, of the time and place of taking the same." The answer to this exception is, that where the deposition is taken according to the acts of congress, at a greater distance from the place of trial than one hundred miles, no notice is required. By the certificate of the magistrate before whom the deposition was taken, it appears that the witness lives more than one hundred miles from this place. That his certificate is competent evidence of the fact, is established by the adjudication of the supreme court, in the case of the Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 617. The court say: It was sufficiently shown, at least prima facie, that the witness lived at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of trial. This is a fact proper for the inquiry of the officer who took the deposition, and he has certified that such is the residence of the witness. In the case of Bell v. Morrison, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 356, it is decided that the certificate of the magistrate is good evidence of the facts therein stated, so as to entitle the deposition to be read to the jury. This exception is overruled.

The fifth exception is to the competency of the evidence contained in the deposition of Mandeville. The decision of this exception will be reserved to the final hearing.

The sixth exception is to the authority of the magistrate, before whom Mandeville's deposition was taken. It was taken before Thomas Fletcher, "judge of the probate court, within and for the county of Adams, and state of Mississippi"; and the inquiry is, whether he is authorized by the acts of congress to take depositions. By the thirtieth section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 80], depositions de bene esse may be taken before any judge of a county court of any of the United States. Is Thomas Fletcher a judge of a county court of any of the United States? In order to decide this question, we must look into the laws of the state of Mississippi. That this court is bound to take notice of the laws of Mississippi, is clearly settled by the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Owings v. Hull, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 625. The court there held that the laws of all the states in the Union are to be judicially taken notice of, in the same manner as the laws of the United States are to be taken notice of by the circuit courts of the United States. Looking, then, into the laws of Mississippi, we find a court of probate established in each county of the state, with jurisdiction in all matters testamentary, and of administration, and of orphans' business; in the allotment of dower, in cases of idiocy and lunacy, and of persons non compos mentis; see section eighteen of the fourth article of the constitution, and the acts of the legislature of 1833, law 444. By the fourth section of the act it is provided, that the court of probate in each county shall provide a seal for said court, thereby constituting it a court of record. The question then is, Is this a county court? It is a court of record established in each county in the state, and styled "the probate court of the county of ———." I am clearly of opinion that it is such a county court as is contemplated by the act of congress, and that depositions may be taken before the judge thereof. The deposition of Mandeville is a deposition taken de bene esse, and may be read on the final hearing, unless the defendant shall show that the witness has removed within the reach of a subpoena after the deposition was taken, and that fact was known to the party, according to the decision of the supreme court in the case of the Patapsco Ins. Co. v. Southgate, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 617; Russell v. Ashley [Case No. 12,150]. This exception is therefore overruled.

On the 3d day of June, 1847, the following opinion was given on the exceptions to depositions previously filed:

JOHNSON, District Judge. At the last term the defendant's second exception to the plaintiff's depositions was overruled. The attention of the court is again called to that exception, as not having been fully considered. The notice of the time and place of taking the depositions, is insisted to be insufficient. I am, however, of opinion that no notice was necessary. It was an ex parte commission, in which the defendants, after being duly notified, failed to join, by filing cross interrogatories. In taking depositions under a commission, notice of the time and place of executing the commission is requisite, where the commission is a joint one. But when it is not joint, but ex parte, notice is not required. See 1 Smith, Ch. Prac. 364; 1 Newl. Ch. Prac. 262.

Upon the defendant's third exception, no opinion was expressed at the last term. It is as follows: "Only a part of the interrogatories of said complainant were propounded to, and answered by each of said witnesses, &c., they should be therefore suppressed." I am now satisfied that this exception is not well taken. The commission for taking these depositions, is not a joint, but an ex parte, commission in which the defendants failed to join; and it is only in cases of a joint commission that it becomes necessary that all the interrogatories should be propounded. Where the commission is ex parte, the party refusing or failing to join it, would not be permitted to put any interrogatory to the witness, although he might be present at the examination. In such a case it is not incumbent on the person taking the deposition to cause all his interrogatories to be propounded to the witness. He is at liberty to put as many or as few of them as he thinks proper, with the exception of the last interrogatory, which must be put. This is the settled practice in the high court of chancery in England. See Newl. Ch. Prac. 267. Exception overruled.

On the 23d of August, 1847, the cause came on for hearing, and the court delivered the following opinion:

JOHNSON, District Judge. This is a bill in chancery, filed by Merrill, for the foreclosure of a mortgage of sundry slaves, executed to him by the defendant, James L. Dawson; and from the bill, answers, and evidence in the cause, the material facts appear to be as follows: That on the 11th of April, 1837, one N. L. Williams made his promissory note to the defendant Dawson, for the sum of $11,428.22, payable two years after date, and negotiable at the Planters' Bank of Mississippi at Natchez; and on the 1st June, 1837, said Williams executed to said Dawson a like promissory note for the sum of $1,150, payable twelve months after date; and said Dawson, being desirous of raising money on said notes, obtained from the complainant his indorsement upon said notes, as additional security thereto, and to secure and indemnify him against his liability thus assumed, as the surety of Dawson; the said Dawson, on the 25th of November, 1837, executed to said Merrill a mortgage upon sundry slaves therein named and described, the condition of which said mortgage was, that "if the said Dawson shall pay to said Merrill the sum of $12,578.22 (the amount of said two promissory notes), on the day the said notes shall become due, then the said indenture to be void." That on the 29th day of December, 1837, the said mortgage was recorded in the recorder's office in Jefferson county in this state, without acknowledgment or proof of its execution, except before a judge of the state of Mississippi. That the slaves named and described by the said mortgage were in the said county of Jefferson, on the plantation of Dawson, where he resided; and so remained in his possession until the 11th day of October, 1841, when all of them, except those claimed by the defendant, Sophia M. Baylor, were sold by the sheriff of Jefferson county, upon judgments and executions against the said Dawson; at which sale the defendants purchased, and received possession of a part thereof. That on the 28th day of November, 1837, the said Dawson presented said notes to said Planters' Bank, and by the discount thereof obtained the money to become due by said notes; that when the said notes became due and payable, neither the said Dawson nor the said Williams ever paid any part thereof, but suffered them to remain wholly unpaid until the 4th day of March, 1842, when the complainant, as the indorser thereof, paid the full amount of principal and interest due by said notes. Dawson, in his answer, admits all the material allegations in the complainant's bill. The defendant, Sophia M. Baylor, claims the following slaves, embraced in the mortgage, namely, Dick, Beverly, Lucas, Porter, and William, as her own property at the time the mortgage was executed by Dawson, who admits, in his answer, that he had only conditionally bought them of her, which condition he was unable to perform, so as to get a title to said slaves. From an examination of the evidence in the cause, I am satisfied that these five slaves were the property of Mrs. Sophia M. Baylor, and that Dawson had no right to mortgage or otherwise dispose of them. The bill, therefore, as to the defendant Baylor, will be dismissed. The remaining defendants allege, in their answers, the mortgage set up by Merrill, the complainant, is as to them fraudulent and void, not having been made upon a good and valuable consideration, and bona fide, but with the intent to defraud the creditors and purchasers of Dawson; that it never was legally recorded; that the possession of the slaves did not accompany and follow the mortgage, but remained and continued with Dawson, the mortgagor, after the mortgage is alleged to have been made, and never were in the possession of Merrill, and is therefore fraudulent and void.

The exceptions to the mortgage I will proceed to consider; and, first, as to the registry or recording of the mortgage. Previous to the enactment of the Revised Statutes of this state, which took effect and went into operation by the governor's proclamation of the 19th March, 1839, there existed no law or statute requiring mortgages of personal property, made on consideration deemed good or valuable in law, to be recorded. The statute concerning conveyances (Steel & M. Dig. 131) relates solely to deeds, conveyances, bonds, and other obligations for lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and contains no provision whatever relating to deeds, conveyances, or mortgages of personal property. The Statute of Frauds (Id. 267) contains the following provisions: "And moreover, if any conveyance be of goods, chattels, and be not on consideration deemed good or valuable in law, it shall be taken to be fraudulent within this act, unless the same be by will duly proved and recorded, or by deed in writing acknowledged or proved by the witnesses in the office of the clerk of the superior court of this territory, the clerks of the circuit courts, or before any justice of the peace or other competent authority within the county wherein one of the parties lives, within three months after the execution thereof, or unless possession shall really and bona fide accompany the gift or conveyance; and in like manner, where any goods or chattels shall have been pretended to have been loaned to any person with whom, or, claiming under him, in whose possession (they) shall have remained for the space of five years without demand made and pursued by due process of law. on the part of the pretended lender; or where any reservation or limitation shall be pretended to have been made of any use of property, by way of condition, reversion, remainder, or otherwise, in goods and chattels, the possession whereof shall have remained in another, as aforesaid, the same shall be taken as to creditors and purchasers of the persons aforesaid, so remaining in possession, to be fraudulent within this act, and that the absolute property is with the possession, unless such loan, reservation, or limitation, or use of property were declared by will or deed in writing, proved and recorded as aforesaid, and even then the creditors or purchasers may show actual fraud; and on such fraud being established, every such gift, contract, sale, loan, or possession shall be set aside in favor of such creditors or purchasers; and the provisions of this section shall also be extended to subsequent creditors after such pretended gift, sale, contract, loan, or conveyance." The second section of this act expressly provides, that "this act shall not extend to any estate or interest in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, goods or chattels, which shall be upon good or valuable consideration, and bonâ fide and lawfully conveyed as aforesaid, nor to any person or persons who may be subsequent purchasers for bonâ fide considerations without notice." It is manifest, then, that the Statute of Frauds (which is only declarations of the common law), does not extend to the mortgage in this case, nor embrace it in any of its provisions, provided it was made upon a valuable consideration and bonâ fide; and if it were not, then it is inoperative and void, independent of the statute. But although mortgagees of personal property were not required to have their mortgages recorded, yet they were allowed and permitted to have them recorded if they deemed it expedient. This I infer from the following provisions, under the heads in the above digest of "Recorder" and "Mortgages." The first section under the head "Recorder" provides that there shall be an office of recorder in each and every district or county, which shall be called and styled "the recorder's office;" and the recorder shall duly attend the service of the same, and provide well bound books, wherein he shall record all deeds and conveyances which shall be brought to him for that purpose, according to the true intent and meaning of this act. The first section under the head of "Mortgages" provides, that every mortgagee of any real or personal estate in this district (territory), having received full satisfaction and payment of all sum or sums of money as are really due him by such mortgage, shall, at the request of the mortgagor, enter satisfaction upon the margin of the record of such mortgage recorded in the said recorder's office, which shall for ever after discharge, defeat, and release the same. From these provisions, it can hardly admit of doubt, that mortgagees were entitled to have their mortgages recorded in the recorder's office; for unless they were recorded, how is it possible that the entry of satisfaction could be made upon the margin of the record of such mortgage? The statutes are silent as to the acknowledgment or proof of the execution of the mortgage before it shall be admitted to record, but expressly requires the recorder to record all deeds and conveyances which shall be brought to him for that purpose; neither do the statutes declare that the registry of a deed or mortgage of personal estate shall operate as notice to creditors or purchasers; and in the absence of such a provision, I do not feel warranted in giving to it such a construction. The mortgage, then, in the present case, was properly admitted to record in the recorder's office, in Jefferson county, without requiring acknowledgment or proof of its execution. The acknowledgment before the judge in Mississippi being unauthorized by law, is to be considered as null and void. It stands, then, as a mortgage legally recorded, notwithstanding the registry thereof does not operate as constructive notice to creditors and purchasers.

The next inquiry is, Whether the defendants had notice of the mortgage before they became purchasers? They claim to be bona fide purchasers at the sheriff's sale, without notice of the complainant's mortgage or lien upon the property. Notice of a lien or incumbrance upon property binds the purchaser, if received by him at any time before the execution of the conveyance and payment of the purchase-money, and arrests all further proceedings towards the completion of the purchase; and if persisted in, is held to be done in fraud of the equitable incumbrance. 2 Pow. Mortg. 619; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 301. In the case of Wormly v. Wormly, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 449, it was said by Judge Story to be a settled rule in equity, that a purchaser without notice, to be entitled to protection, must not only be so at the time of the contract or conveyance, but at the time of the payment of the purchase-money; and in Jewett v. Palmer, 7 Johns. Ch. 68, Chancellor Kent said: "A plea of purchase for a valuable consideration without notice, must be with the money actually paid; or else, according to Lord Hardwicke, you are not hurt." The averment must not only be that the purchaser had not notice at or before the time of the execution of the deeds, but that the purchase-money was paid before notice. There must not only be a denial of notice before the purchase, but a denial of notice before payment of the money. Even if the purchase-money be secured to be paid, yet if it be not in fact paid before notice, the plea of a purchaser for valuable consideration will be overruled. Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304. There is not in the answers of the defendants, or either of them, any denial or any thing equivalent to it, that the purchase-money was actually paid before they had notice of the mortgage. This averment is essential, and cannot be supplied by intendment in order to make the plea available. The defendants, then, have not placed themselves in the attitude to call for proof on the part of the complainant, that they really and in fact had notice. But admitting their denial of notice to be full and complete, the evidence in the cause conclusively establishes the fact that they and each of them had actual notice of the mortgage before they made the purchase. The defendants Roane and Taylor admit that they saw the record of the mortgage in the recorder's office, before they purchased, but believed it to be fraudulent and made merely for effect. The defendant Fish says, in his answer, "this respondent thinks there was no general notoriety on the subject of this mortgage, as he never heard it spoken of but once before he purchased one of said negroes, and then it was said to be fraudulent by the persons speaking of it."

These admissions are amply sufficient to charge these defendants with notice of the mortgage. But by adverting to the depositions taken in this case, it will be seen that actual notice of the mortgage is conclusively proved against each of the defendants before the sale was made by the sheriff. Martin W. Dorris, in his deposition, says, "I believe that F. W. Trapnall proclaimed the existence of said complainant's incumbrance, and forbid the sale; and that Samuel C. Roane, Samuel Taylor, N. H. Fish, and Col. Fowler, were present in hearing of such proclamation; and that he heard Samuel Taylor say since the said sale that he was aware of the existence of said mortgage." Robert W. Walker in his deposition, says, "I know that said record book B. was lying open at page 174, in the clerk's office of said county, on the morning of said sale, subject to inspection, and that Absalom Fowler, in person, examined said record book, and inspected said deed of mortgage. I believe that it was generally known and spoken of at the sale by those present, that the complainant Merrill had a mortgage on the negroes." Drew White says, that he, as deputy sheriff, sold the negroes in contest, and that when said sale was about to commence, he proclaimed, in the presence and hearing of said Roane, Taylor, Fowler, and Fish, that said negroes would be sold subject to all incumbrances, without reference to any particular incumbrance. He further states, that F. W. Trapnall did forbid the sale of said negroes on behalf, he thought, of William Dawson. Ignace Bogy states, that "at the time said slaves of Dawson were sold by the sheriff of Jefferson county, I heard F. W. Trapnall, Esq., in an audible voice, forbid the sale of them, at the time when they were offered for sale, at the instance of some person whose name I do not now recollect; and said defendants, Roane, Taylor, Fish, Badgett, and Fowler, were present at the time, but as I did not have their ears, I cannot say that they also heard him." John J. Hammett, sheriff of Jefferson county, who made the sale, states, "that it was generally understood and spoken of by those present at said sale of said negroes, that said complainant Merrill had a mortgage upon them. I believe said Trapnall did, on behalf of one William Dawson, forbid publicly, the sale of said negroes. I believe that said defendants were all present at that time; and that when about to commence the sale of said negroes, I, as sheriff as aforesaid, proclaimed publicly and audibly, in the hearing of all present, and notified all persons that I offered said negroes for sale subject to all incumbrances, and that I would convey to the purchasers of said negroes the interest and title of said Dawson only; and that there were some three or four mortgages recorded in the clerk's office upon said negroes, to which mortgages I referred all persons present, and requested them to go into the clerk's office and examine for themselves before purchasing; and I believe that said defendants Roane, Taylor, Fowler, Fish, and Badgett were all present and heard such proclamation." Frederick W. Trapnall states: "I was present at the sale of the negroes of J. L. Dawson, at the October term of the circuit court of Jefferson county, in 1841, and at the request of Dawson at the time the sale was about to take place, I proclaimed in a loud voice that the negroes then offered for sale by the sheriff were embraced in a deed of mortgage, made by him to A. P. Merrill, which was then of record in Jefferson county, which was then unsatisfied, and I therefore forbid the sale. My impression is, that Absalom Fowler, Samuel C. Roane, Samuel Taylor, Nathaniel H. Fish, and Noah H. Badgett, defendants in this suit, were present on that occasion, and were within hearing of my voice. Badgett was standing by me at the time, and heard my proclamation; a good deal of conversation took place upon the subject. The sheriff then proclaimed that the negroes had been appraised, and would be sold subject to it."

The evidence just recited is, in my judgment, amply sufficient to charge the defendants with actual notice of the mortgage under which the complainant claims; the proof is too clear, direct, and positive, to admit of any reasonable doubt.

The remaining inquiry is, Whether the mortgage in this case was made upon a good and valuable consideration, and bona fide, or with the design and intention of defrauding the creditors and purchasers of Dawson. The main ground relied upon by the defendants' counsel is, that the possession of the slaves did not accompany and follow the mortgage, but was retained by the mortgagor, and this circumstance is insisted to be conclusive and untraversable evidence of fraud; but that, if not conclusive evidence, at least a strong badge of fraud, sufficient, in this case, to render the mortgage inoperative and void against the defendants. A bill of sale absolute upon its face, made by a person who still continues in possession of the property, has been held both in England and in this country, by the highest tribunals, to be, per se, fraudulent as to the creditors and subsequent purchasers of the person so retaining possession. This doctrine received the sanction of the supreme court of the United States in the case of Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 309. The fact of possession not accompanying such a bill of sale, is considered conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent, and as to creditors and purchasers the bill of sale is, in a judgment of law, fraudulent and void; but the continuance of possession by a mortgagor is not considered as having the same conclusive and vitiating effect upon the mortgage. There is an essential difference between the effect of a possession retained by the maker of an absolute bill of sale, and the possession retained by the maker of a mortgage. The object of the one is to pass the absolute right of property, and the object of the other is to give a security defeasible upon a particular contingency; the possession in the former case is utterly incompatible with the deed; whereas, in the latter case, there exists no such incompatibility. Whilst, therefore, the possession in the former case may be correctly said to form the conclusive and untraversable evidence of fraudulent intent, and under the deed, per se, fraudulent, such cannot be admitted to be the effect of the possession in the latter case. Possession by the mortgagor before forfeiture cannot be construed to be fraudulent, because it is consistent with the title, that not vesting until forfeiture. Nor can the continuation of the possession, after a breach of the condition, of itself, unconnected with any other circumstance of lapse of time, or the conduct of the mortgagee, be considered as a strong badge of fraud. The deed is still a mortgage; the right of the mortgagee is still contingent and collateral, and the possession of the mortgagor is not necessarily inconsistent with the title.

The utmost extent to which the authority of the decision can be carried, is that the tribunal, whose province it is to decide the facts, may infer a fraudulent intent, from the fact of possession remaining in the mortgagor. But this inference may be dispelled by the proof of other facts showing the transaction to be fair and bona fide. McGowan v. Hoy, 5 Litt. (Ky.) 240, and the authorities there cited; Head v. Ward, 1 J. J. Marsh. 280. See the case of U. S. v. Hooe, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 73; also, Wheeler v. Sumner [Case No. 17,501]; D'Wolf v. Harris, [Id. 4,221]; Maples v. Maples, Rice, Eq. 300; Fishburne v. Kunhardt, 2 Speer, 564; Gist v. Pressley, 2 Hill, Eq. 318; 2 N. H. 15, 547; Smith v. Acker, 23 Wend. 653.

Are there any other marks or badges of fraud in the present case? From all the facts and circumstances connected with the mortgage, independent of the declaration of Dawson after he made the mortgage (and they are clearly incompetent evidence), I have seen nothing from which an inference of fraud and collusion can be deduced. The execution of the mortgage by Dawson, and his indorsement of the two promissory notes, is established by Dorris and Hammett, who prove his handwriting; and the indorsement of the notes by Merrill, is proved by the cashier and teller of the Planters' Bank. The discount of the notes, and the payment of the money to Dawson by the Planters' Bank, and the payment to the bank of the notes by Merrill, on the 4th March, 1842, is established by the testimony of the same witnesses. The mortgage itself was actually recorded in the recorder's office in Jefferson county, on the 29th December, 1837. These facts clearly prove that the mortgage was made upon a good and valuable consideration, and bona fide, and not with the design or intent to defraud creditors and purchasers. Where this appears from the evidence in the cause, the inference of fraud, if any, arising from the mortgagor's possession is dispelled, and not calculated to cast a shade upon the mortgage. The defendants in their answers aver, that from the declaration of Dawson stating that the mortgage was merely nominal, and made only for effect to shield his property, they regarded the mortgage as fraudulent and void. No principle of the law of evidence is better settled than that the declarations of the grantor impeaching a deed he has made, are incompetent, and cannot be received for that purpose.

The conclusion to which I have arrived from a consideration of all the circumstances of the case is, that the mortgage was made upon a valuable consideration and bona fide, is free from the taint of fraud and collusion, and that the complainant is entitled to the relief he seeks.

The inquiry here arises as to the decree which ought now to be made. In the case of Downing v. Palmateer, 1 T. B. Mon. 66, the court of appeals of Kentucky states the practice in the following terms: "The practice of the courts of equity on this subject is simple, and ought not to be departed from. Whatsoever controversies may arise about the validity of a mortgage, its forfeiture and its payment, in whole or in part, is decided upon at its first hearing, and the courts ascertain what is due, and by interlocutory decree declare that unless this sum is paid, or tendered by a particular time, the mortgage shall be foreclosed, and a sale decreed, if a sale is proper to be had. The time so given ought to expire in term time, and is sometimes, under extraordinary circumstances, lengthened by the chancellor. If, when that time expires, payment is moved with such costs as the chancellor shall adjudge, the mortgage is released, and there is an end to the controversy. "If a tender and refusal is relied on, the money is brought into court, with such costs as shall be allowed, and the party is thus permitted to redeem. If, on the contrary, neither payment nor tender is relied on (in all of which matters the court ought to adjudge), the court may decree an absolute foreclosure in many cases without sale; but if a sale is prayed for, and deemed expedient, the chancellor decrees it accordingly, and appoints his commissioners to execute it."

The principle and practice above laid down I deem to be correct, and they will be acted upon in the present case.

Decree: This cause came on to be heard at this term, and was argued by counsel, and thereupon, upon consideration thereof, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed as follows, namely: That the bill as to the defendant, Sophia M. Baylor, be, and the same is hereby dismissed with her costs to be paid by her (to) the said complainant. And it is further ordered and decreed, that unless the sum of eighteen thousand nine hundred and thirty-four dollars shall be paid or tendered to the said complainant, or his solicitor, by the remaining defendants, or any or either of them, on or before the first day of next term of this court, they, the said defendants, are from thenceforth to stand absolutely debarred and foreclosed of and from all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption of, in, and to the said mortgaged property in the bill mentioned, and a sale of said mortgaged property decreed, if a sale thereof shall be deemed expedient by this court. And the question of hire of the mortgaged property, of costs, and all other questions in the cause not now decided, are reserved to the further decree of this court.

William Dawson, James Smith, and Garland Hardwick, having disclaimed, the bill was dismissed as to them.

On the 15th of May, 1848, the cause came on for further and final hearing, and THE COURT pronounced the following final decree:

This day come the parties by their respective solicitors, and this cause coming on for a further and final decree in the premises, it doth satisfactorily appear to the court here, from the pleadings and proofs herein, that the indenture of mortgage mentioned in the bill was made in good faith, for a good and valuable consideration, on the 25th of November, 1837, by the said James L. Dawson, one of said defendants, to and with the said Ayres P. Merrill, the complainant, for the purpose of securing the payment by the said Dawson of the two promissory notes particularly mentioned in the said mortgage and bill of complaint, namely, one for eleven thousand four hundred and twenty-eight dollars and twenty-two cents, dated 1st of April, 1837, and due two years after the date thereof; the other for eleven hundred and fifty dollars, dated 1st of June, 1837, due twelve months after the date thereof, drawn by N. L. Williams, and payable to the order of the said James L. Dawson at the Planters' Bank of Mississippi at Natchez, and indorsed by said James L. Dawson, and also by the said Ayres P. Merrill, as security for said Dawson, to enable the said Dawson to obtain the discount thereof at the said Planters' Bank, as alleged in the bill; and which said mortgage was also made, and intended to be made, to indemnify and save the said Merrill harmless in regard to his indorsement of said notes. That on the 28th of November, 1837, said bank discounted said notes for the sole and exclusive use and benefit of him, the said Dawson, and placed the proceeds to his credit on the books of the bank, and subsequent to that time paid said proceeds to him or order, and that said bank thus became the bona fide holder of said notes for a valuable consideration; that when said notes respectively became due and payable, the said N. L. Williams, as well as the said Dawson, wholly failed to pay the same to said Planters' Bank, nor did any other person pay the same for them, nor any part thereof; and therefore the notes were duly protested for non-payment. And on the 4th day of March, in the year 1842, the said Ayres P. Merrill, by reason of the premises and as last indorser, was obliged to pay and did pay the sums of money in said promissory notes specified, together with interests, costs, &c., up to that time, amounting in the aggregate to fifteen thousand five hundred and ninety-three dollars and sixty-one cents, to the said Planters' Bank of Mississippi at Natchez, and then took up the same, and became, and from thenceforward continued to be, the legal holder and owner of said notes; and that being such legal holder and owner thereof, by virtue of the payment aforesaid, he did, on the 7th day of September, 1842, commence this his suit, to avail himself of the provisions of said mortgage, and to foreclose the same. That at the making of said indenture of mortgage, the said James L. Dawson was possessed, as of his own absolute property, of certain negro slaves specified in said mortgage and bill of complaint, and then upon his plantation in the county of Jefferson and state of Arkansas, of the names and then of the ages respectively next mentioned, namely, negro man named Jim, sometimes called "Old Jim," forty years old; Governor, twenty-two years old; Sandy, twenty-one years old; Connell, twenty years old; Tom, nineteen years old; negro woman named Phoebe, seventeen years old; Catharine, eighteen years old; Maria, sixteen years old; Mary, fifteen years old, and Eliza, eighteen years old; negro boy named Ransom, twelve years old, and Jim, sometimes called "Young Jim," eleven years old; all of whom were likely and valuable slaves, and continued in the possession of the said James L. Dawson until the 11th of October, 1841, and were and are hereby declared subject to the mortgage debt mentioned in the pleadings. That a male infant child of said Phoebe, named Jackson; that another male infant child of said Phoebe, named Beverly; that an infant boy of said Mary, named Henry; and that an infant girl of said Maria, named Frances, born since the making of said mortgage, as well as such other of the issue of such mortgaged slaves, not herein specially named, as may have been born since the making of said mortgage, ought to be, and hereby are declared to be, subject to the operation of said mortgage, and are to be sold towards discharging the said mortgage debt. That on the 11th of October, 1841, the said negro slaves, men, women, and children (excepting Beverly, born since), having been first valued according to law by three appraisers, sworn for that purpose, were sold as the property of said James L. Dawson, under execution, at the court house door of Jefferson county, and which sale, if valid at all, was, in the opinion of the court, subject to said mortgage and to the rights of said Merrill, under and by virtue of the same; and that on that occasion the said Samuel Taylor purchased and obtained possession of Old Jim, Catharine, and Ransom; that at the same time Samuel C. Roane purchased and obtained possession of Sandy, Connell, and Young Jim; that at the same time the defendant Fish purchased and obtained possession of Governor; that at the same time the defendant, Absalom Fowler, purchased and obtained possession of Tom, Mary and her infant boy named Henry, Maria and her infant girl named Frances, Phoebe and her infant boy named Jackson, and said negro woman named Eliza. That about a week after said sale, the defendant, Noah H. Badgett, purchased of said Fowler the said negro woman Phoebe and her infant boy named Jackson, and also the said negro woman Eliza; and that said Phoebe, since her acquisition by the said Badgett, has given birth to a male infant boy named Beverly. That if any notice was necessary, the said defendants respectively, as it satisfactorily appears to the court from the pleadings, circumstances, and proofs herein, had sufficient actual notice of the existence of said mortgage, before and at said sale, to render their purchases respectively subject to it.

That upon the proof in this cause, the court is of opinion, and doth find the said negro slaves respectively to be of the following value, namely, Old Jim, five hundred dollars; Governor, eight hundred and fifty dollars; Sandy, eight hundred dollars; Connell, eight hundred dollars; Tom, eight hundred dollars; Phoebe and her said child Jackson, one thousand dollars; Beverly, another child of said Phoebe, fifty dollars; Catharine, eight hundred dollars; Mary and her said child Henry, seven hundred and fifty dollars; Maria and her said child Frances, nine hundred dollars; Eliza, seven hundred dollars; Ransom, eight hundred dollars; Young Jim, six hundred dollars. That subpoenas in this case were served on the said Fowler on the 10th, on said Badgett on the 12th, on said Roane on the 14th, on said Taylor on the 14th, and on the said Fish on the 15th day of September, 1842; and the court here being well satisfied that said negro slaves are insufficient to discharge said mortgage debt, and that the hire thereof, according to the rate as proved by the depositions in this cause, ought to be applied towards the extinguishment of said interest and principal, such hire to be estimated from the time of the service of the subpoena on said defendants respectively, up to this time.

That from the proofs in the cause, the court is of opinion, and doth find the value of the hire of the following negro slaves in the possession of Absalom Fowler: for Mary, seventy dollars; for Tom, one hundred dollars; for Maria, seventy dollars per annum; and for which the said Fowler is declared accountable, at the rates aforesaid, to be computed against him from the 10th day of September, 1842, when the subpoena was served upon him, and which makes an aggregate amount of thirteen hundred and fifty-eight dollars, and for which said amount decree ought to be rendered in favor of the complainant. That the court is also of opinion, and doth find the value of the hire of Phoebe, in the possession of the said Noah H. Badgett, to be seventy dollars per annum, which being computed from the 12th day of September, 1842, the time when the subpoena was served upon him, amounts to three hundred and ninety-six dollars, which is chargeable against said Badgett, and for which a decree ought to be rendered in favor of the complainant. That S. H. Hempstead, Esq., the solicitor of the said complainant, produced and read in open court a certain memorandum or agreement in writing, executed in duplicate by and between the said Ayres P. Merrill, acting in that behalf through S. H. Hempstead, his attorney in fact, of the one part, and Samuel Taylor and Nathaniel H. Fish, two of said defendants, of the other, dated the 10th day of December, 1847; and also a certain other memorandum or agreement in writing, also executed in duplicate, by and between the said Ayres P. Merrill, acting in that behalf through S. H. Hempstead, his attorney in fact, of the one part, and Samuel C. Roane, one of said defendants, of the other, dated the 22d day of April, 1848; whereby it manifestly appears that the said Samuel Taylor, Nathaniel H. Fish, and Samuel C. Roane, acknowledging the right of said complainant to subject the said slaves so purchased by them respectively to the said mortgage, and to recover reasonable hire therefor, and also with a view to end any further litigation, as far as they are concerned, adjusted and compromised with said complainant, and in such adjustment, said Samuel Taylor, not delivering the said slaves purchased by him, accounts for the same as follows: Old Jim at five hundred dollars, Ransom at eight hundred dollars, and Catharine at eight hundred dollars, amounting in the aggregate to twenty-one hundred dollars, and which is the appraised as well as the real value thereof, and for the hire thereof nine hundred dollars; making an aggregate of three thousand dollars. That said Nathaniel H. Fish, not surrendering Governor, accounts for him at eight hundred and fifty dollars, the appraised as well as the real value of him, and for his hire three hundred dollars, making together eleven hundred and fifty dollars. That said Samuel C. Roane, not delivering Sandy, accounts for him at eight hundred dollars, the appraised as well as the full value, and for the hire of the slaves purchased by him as aforesaid six hundred dollars, making together fourteen hundred dollars; that he elects to surrender to the complainant Connell, who is to be received at eight hundred dollars, the appraised as well as the full value thereof, and Young Jim at six hundred dollars, the appraised as well as the full value thereof, making for the two fourteen hundred dollars; and which two last-mentioned slaves are hereby decreed to the complainant, by consent of parties and to carry out said agreement, making altogether the sum of six thousand and nine hundred and forty-nine dollars, to be applied towards the extinguishment of said mortgage; and with which the said James L. Dawson is to be credited on said mortgage debt, as of the day of the rendition of this decree. The court here being satisfied, that by said compromise the said defendant Dawson obtains as large if not a larger credit on said mortgage debt than if said negroes were sold; and there is nothing in controversy, as far as said Taylor, Fish, and Roane are concerned, except costs. That the court here from the pleading and proofs in the cause, is of opinion, and doth find the indebtedness of the said defendant Dawson, up to this time, upon said mortgage, to be twenty-one thousand and three hundred and twenty-eight dollars for principal and interest, and deducting therefrom the said credit of six thousand and nine hundred and forty-nine dollars, that the balance justly (due) and owing by the said defendant Dawson to the said Ayres P. Merrill, and in arrear at this time upon said mortgage, and secured thereby, is fourteen thousand three hundred and sixty-nine dollars ($14,369).

It is therefore ordered and adjudged and decreed, that the said James L. Dawson do pay to the said Ayres P. Merrill the said balance of fourteen thousand three hundred and sixty-nine dollars, which includes principal and interest, and is the sum now justly due upon said mortgage, after allowing the credit aforesaid. That the said James L. Dawson, Absalom Fowler, and Noah H. Badgett be, and they are hereby absolutely barred and foreclosed from all equity of redemption in and to all or any of the slaves specified in the said mortgage, or to the issue thereof born since the making of said mortgage; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that Samuel A. White be, and he is hereby, appointed a commissioner in this case, and to whom the said Absalom Fowler and Noah H. Badgett, without any unnecessary delay, and upon request being made by him, are required to surrender and deliver said slaves so purchased and possessed by them respectively as aforesaid; that is to say, that the said Absalom Fowler be, and he is hereby, required to surrender to such commissioner said slaves, Tom, Mary, and her child Henry, and Maria and her child Frances, aforesaid, and the issue thereof, if any, by whatever name known or distinguished, and born since he acquired them; and that said Noah H. Badgett also be, and he is hereby required to surrender to such commissioner said slaves Eliza and Phoebe, and her two children named Jackson and Beverly, and such other of her issue, if any, by whatever names known, born since he acquired her; and the said commissioner may, if it is necessary, sue out a writ of assistance to obtain the possession of said slaves, or any of them. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that in case the said Absalom Fowler and Noah H. Badgett, or either of them, should be unable to deliver, or should fail or refuse to deliver, the slaves so purchased by them as aforesaid, upon the request of said commissioner, then and in that event it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that for Tom, Mary and her child Henry, and Maria and her child Frances, or any one of them which the said Absalom Fowler is unable, or should fail or refuse to deliver, he shall be held accountable and liable, and shall pay to the said complainant, Ayres P. Merrill, the value thereof, as fixed and ascertained in a previous part of this decree, and to which reference is now made for the value thereof respectively, and for the collection thereof a special execution may issue, as at law; and for said negro Eliza and negro woman Phoebe and her said children, Jackson and Beverly, or any of them which the said Noah H. Badgett is either unable or should fail or refuse to deliver up to such commissioner, he shall in like manner be held accountable and liable to said complainant, Ayres P. Merrill, for the value thereof respectively, as fixed and ascertained in a previous part of this decree, and to which reference is now made respectively, and for the collection of which a special execution may issue, as at law; but before any such execution can be taken out in either case, the said commissioner must file in the office of the clerk of this court an affidavit stating such inability, failure, or refusal to deliver on request, and then said execution may issue against the proper persons upon the application of the complainant or his solicitor, and which shall be executed by the marshal as executions in ordinary cases; and whatever moneys may be made thereon shall be applied towards the extinguishment of the balance of said mortgage debt; and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that if the said commissioner shall obtain the possession of all or any of said slaves, or the issue thereof aforesaid, either by voluntary delivery to him, or by his own exertions, or by a writ of assistance, he shall sell the same at the front steps of the state house in the city of Little Rock, at public auction, for cash in hand, on some convenient day to be fixed by him, first giving at least thirty days' notice of the time and place of sale, by publication in the "Arkansas Banner," and advertisements posted up at three public places in the city of Little Rock; and that said commissioner be, and he is hereby empowered to make proper bills of sale to the purchaser or purchasers, and that, after paying the expenses of sale, he pay to the said complainant or his solicitor the proceeds of such sale, and which proceeds must be applied towards the extinguishment of said mortgage debt; or if the complainant should purchase the negroes, or any part of them, at such sale, the amount bid by him must be allowed as a credit on said mortgage debt; and that a copy of this decree be furnished by the clerk to said commissioner, and that he make a full report of his proceedings to the next term of this court; and it is further ordered and decreed, that the said Absalom Fowler do pay to the said complainant the said sum of thirteen hundred and fifty-eight dollars, it being the hire of said slaves, Tom, Mary, and Maria, according to the rates and computed hire mentioned in the introductory part of this decree, and for which sum an execution may issue as at law, upon the application of the complainant or his solicitor, and the amount, when collected, is to be placed as a credit upon the said mortgage debt; and it is further ordered and decreed, that the said Noah H. Badgett do pay to the said complainant the said sum of three hundred and ninety-six dollars, being the hire of the said slave Phoebe, according to the rate and computed hire mentioned in the introductory part of this decree; for said sum execution may issue, as in the last-mentioned case, and the amount collected shall be placed in like manner upon said mortgage debt; and it is further ordered and decreed, that the costs of this suit be taxed by the clerk against the said defendants Taylor, Roane, Fowler, Fish, and Badgett, the proportion of one-fifth part thereof to each one of them, and that they respectively pay said costs in that proportion; but the costs of the defendants, James L. Dawson, Baylor, Smith, Hardwick, and William Dawson, are excepted out of the costs as above ordered to be paid. The costs occasioned by these defendants must be paid by the complainant. Whereupon the said defendants, Absalom Fowler and Noah H. Badgett, come and pray an appeal from a decree rendered herein to the next term of the supreme court of the United States; and thereupon, the court being fully advised in the premises, is of opinion that said prayer ought to be, and the same is hereby granted. And thereupon, it is further considered and ordered by the court, that, upon the said defendants Fowler and Badgett, or either one, giving security according to law for the prosecution of said appeal to effect, and to answer all damages and cost, if they fail to make their plea good in the said supreme court; that the appeal hereby granted is to operate as to both or either who may give the required security, against said complaint as a supersedeas.

Appeal bond was given by Fowler, a transcript taken, and the case removed into the supreme court [where the judgment below was affirmed. 11 How. (52 U. S.) 375].

Circuit Court, D. Maine. Sept. Term, 1870.

NEGLIGENCE—HIGHWAYS—DUTY TO KEEP IN REPAIR—WOODEN AWNING—CONDITIONS TO RECOVERY—INJURY—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

1. Towns are required, by the statute of this state, to keep their highways in such repair as to be safe for travel, either by day or night.

2. Compensation may be recovered, in this state, from any town bound by law to keep their highways in repair, for an injury received by any person travelling on such road or way, in the exercise of ordinary care, provided it be shown that the town had reasonable notice of the defect.

3. A wooden awning was well and strongly built, projecting from a shop or building over a sidewalk; at one end was attached to the awning, in a safe manner, a board, used as a signboard. As the plaintiff was passing under the signboard, the awning was struck by the carriage of a teamster, who was driving in the street, and who had approached near to the side where the awning was. The board fell and injured the plaintiff. Held, that the town was not liable, because the court could not determine whether the bodily injury was received through a defect or want of repair of a way or not.

4. The construction given to a state statute by the highest court of the state in which the statute is enacted is obligatory upon this court when seeking the construction of that statute.

[Cited in Lookout Mountain R. Co. v. Houston, 44 Fed. 450.]

5. Under the laws of Maine, certain conditions are annexed to the right to recover from a town for injuries received in consequence of a defective highway, which are as follows:—(1) The highway must be one the town is bound to keep in repair. (2) It must have been defective at the time of the accident. (3) The plaintiff must have been injured as alleged in the declaration. (4) The town must have had reasonable notice of the defect prior to the injury. (5) The plaintiff must have been in the exercise of ordinary care at the time of receiving the injury. (6) The injury must have been occasioned solely by the defect, and not by any want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff.

6. The question whether the way was out of repair, or defective, or not, is one of fact for the jury, and that having been submitted to them under instructions to which no exception was taken, the court was not inclined to question the finding or set the verdict aside on the ground that that was an improper finding.

7. It was manifest that the jury found the awning to be a defect; therefore, the question for the court was whether the plaintiff received the injury by reason of such defect, under the existing statute of this state, conferring the right of action in such cases.

8. Travellers may receive injuries while travelling upon defective highways, and such as are not occasioned by the defects or their own negligence, and still the town required to keep the same way in repair, not be liable for the injury.

9. An injury may be produced by the united effect of a want of repair in a road, and some other cause, and the injured party not be entitled to recover from those whose duty it was to keep the way in repair.

10. If an obstruction be left in a street by a responsible party, still, if the town, by its own neglect, allow the obstruction to remain until it is chargeable with notice, the town, &c., is liable to a person injured by reason of the existence of such obstruction.

Trespass on the case [by Mary W. Merrill] to recover damages for personal injury, alleged to have been received by reason of a defective highway, in Portland. The alleged defect was an awning projecting from the front of a store, over the sidewalk. This awning was struck by a team, with a high rack projecting over the wheels, and a board was thereby knocked off the awning, which, falling on the plaintiff, passing under the awning, caused the injury. Verdict for plaintiff. Motion for new trial.

Geo. F. Talbot and A. Merrill, for plaintiff.
J. W. Symonds, City Sol., for defendants.

Before CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice, and FOX, District Judge.

CLIFFORD, Circuit Justice. Travellers have a right to travel by night, as well as by day, and towns are required by law, in this state, to keep their highways, townways, and streets in such repair that they shall be safe and convenient for that purpose. Compensation for any bodily injury received by a traveller, through any defect or want of repair in any highway, townway, or street, may be recovered of the town, bound by law to keep the same in repair; provided it appears that the town had reasonable notice of the defect or want of repair, and that the plaintiff was, at the time, in the exercise of ordinary care. Rev. St. Me. 227. Severe bodily injuries were received by the plaintiff, on the 16th of August, 1866, while walking up Congress street in this city, by the falling of a wooden awning attached to the front of the store, numbered 366, occupied at the time by Walker & Son, doing business as fruit dealers and confectioners. When the accident occurred, the plaintiff was on the sidewalk on the southeasterly side of the street, and the evidence showed to the satisfaction of the court and jury that she was in the exercise of ordinary care. Although the awning was constructed of wood, still the evidence showed that the frame was well and strongly built, of sound timbers, supported by four rafters, attached to a joist, spiked securely to the front of the building, and by three iron rods or braces, secured to the building above the frame of the awning by screws, and connected with the front of the frame which supported the awning, by screw bolts running through the plate of the awning frame. Damages were claimed by the plaintiff of the defendants upon the ground that the awning, as constructed, rendered the street defective, and, being unable to adjust the controversy with the proper authorities, she brought an action of trespass on the case, against the defendants, in the circuit court for this district. Service was duly made, and the defendants appeared and pleaded the general issue, and, upon that issue, the parties at the last term went to trial, and under the instructions of the court, the district judge presiding, the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing the damages in the sum of $5,000. Dissatisfied with the verdict, the defendants filed a motion to set it aside, and for a new trial, upon the following grounds: (1) Because the verdict is against the evidence and the weight of the evidence. (2) Because the verdict is against law. (3) Because it is manifestly against the instructions of the presiding justice.

Since that time the several questions involved in the motion have been very fully and ably argued, and the court is now prepared to dispose of the case. Certain conditions are annexed to a right of action for such an injury, which are created by the statute conferring the right, either in express terms, or by the construction given it by the state courts, which is as obligatory in this court as the text of the statute. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 603. They are as follows,—and they must all concur, before it can be held, that the defendant town is liable (Nichols v. Brunswick [Case No. 10,238]: (1) That the highway was one that the inhabitants of the town were bound to keep in repair. (2) That it was defective and out of repair at the time of the accident. (3) That the plaintiff was injured as alleged in the declaration. (4) That the town had reasonable notice of the defect, prior to the injury. (5) That the plaintiff was in the exercise of ordinary care at the time the accident and injury occurred. (6) That the injury was occasioned solely through the defect or want of repair in the way, whether highway, townway, or street, and not from any negligence or want of ordinary care on the part of the injured party.

Two of those conditions,—the second and sixth,—it is contended by the defendants, did not occur in the case, and that the jury were not justified in so finding, either from the evidence introduced in the case or by the instructions of the court. On the contrary, they insist that the street was not defective or out of repair at the time of the accident, and that the injury was not occasioned, either wholly or in part, by any defect or want of repair in the street; but wholly by the negligence and carelessness of a third party, for whose acts they are not in any respect responsible. They do not impute any negligence or want of ordinary care to the plaintiff; but they insist that the injury was occasioned by the negligent and careless act of a teamster who was passing up Congress street at the same time, travelling with his wagon, drawn by three or more horses, somewhat faster than the plaintiff. The wagon had a high rack, wider than the distance between the wheels, and projecting over the sides of the same, such as teamsters use to transport empty barrels from their place of manufacture in country towns to this market. Although the travelled part of the street is forty feet wide, the teamster had turned his horses to the south-easterly side of the same, and as the team approached the place where the accident occurred, the wagon wheels on that side were moving in the gutter near the curb-stone, and, as he rode along, the top of the rack on that side, struck the westerly corner of the awning, just as the plaintiff passed under it, knocking off the end board of the awning, used also as a sign by the occupants of the store; and the board so torn from its fastenings, fell upon the head of the plaintiff, knocking her down and bruising her badly, and injuring the nerves of the eyes so severely, that she has become entirely blind, without any prospect that she will ever recover her sight. Evidence was also introduced, showing that the awning was built some two months before the accident, and that it remained there some two years and a half, when, a large mass of snow having accumulated upon the covering, it was broken down by the weight. Unless the witnesses misstate, the awning was constructed of good materials, and it was securely attached to the front of the store. Before the accident, the end board which was knocked off by the teamster in the manner described, was once taken down, that the occupant of the store might have his name or the name of his firm painted on it; but the testimony shows that it was subsequently replaced, and apparently in a safe manner, and so continued to the time the accident happened. Much testimony was introduced on the question whether the awning, as constructed, was of the height and width as required by the city ordinance. On the part of the plaintiff, it was insisted that it was not of the required height, and that it was also defective, inasmuch as it extended into the street, three or four inches beyond the curb-stone. Both of these propositions, if fact, were controverted by the defendants, and they introduced testimony to establish the opposite theory; but the question whether the street was defective or out of repair, in every aspect of it, was one of fact for the jury, and inasmuch as the same was submitted to their consideration, under instructions to which no exceptions were taken, the court is not inclined to assume that in that respect there was any error in the action of the jury. Doubts are entertained by the district judge, whether he would have found in accordance with the verdict if the question had been submitted to his determination; but in view of the fact that there was considerable evidence in support of the finding of the jury, he fully concurs in the conclusion that the verdict should not on that ground be set aside.

Negligence cannot be imputed to the plaintiff; but it is clear to a demonstration that the teamster was both negligent and rash, and that if he could be identified he would be liable to make compensation to the plaintiff for the injuries she received by the fall ing of the board. Suggestions of that kind, however, are of little or no avail, as the evidence furnishes no ground to hope that he can be found, and, if discovered, it may be found that he is wholly irresponsible. Judging from the evidence as reported, the only person who saw him drive his wagon, or the rack on the same, against the awning, was the police officer, who testifies that he, the teamster, first collided with the wagon of the witness, which was standing on the same side of the street, opposite the store next below the one to which the awning was attached; that he saw the rack when it first struck the awning; that he hallooed to him to be careful, that he would break down the awning; that he gave no heed to the warning, and that, as his team advanced, the corner of the rack struck the end board of the awning, and it fell on the head of the plaintiff in this case.

Evidently, the jury found that the awning constituted a defect in the street, and, in view of that finding, the only question in the case is, whether they were also justified in finding that the injury was received by the plaintiff through that defect, within the meaning of the statute of the state upon which the action is founded. By that statute it is provided that if any person receives any bodily injury . . . through any defect or want of repair, or sufficient railing in any highway, townway, causeway, or bridge, he may recover for the same, in a special action on the case, of the county, town, or persons obliged by law to repair the same, if such county, town, or persons had reasonable notice of the defect or want of repair. Rev. St. Me. 227.

Viewed in this light, as the case must be, it is manifest that the rights of the parties depend upon the true meaning of the phrase in that statute,—"receives any bodily injury through any defect or want of repair," and it is evident that the parties by their counsel have taken the same view of their rights, as is evidenced by their elaborate briefs and very able arguments presented orally to the court.

Bodily injury of a very serious and permanent character, beyond all doubt, was received by the plaintiff, without any fault on her part, by the falling of the board; but the question is, whether she received the injury through the defect or want of repair in the street, within the meaning of that statute. Except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States shall otherwise require or provide, the laws of the several states shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply. Such was the provision of the judiciary act, and it has remained in force to the present time without modification or repeal. 1 Stat. 92. "Infinite mischief would ensue," said Marshall, C. J., "should this court observe a different rule in construing the statutes of a state, from that established by the judicial authority of the state." M'Keen v. Delancy, 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 22. In cases depending on the statutes of a state, the federal courts adopt the construction given to the statute by the highest court of the state, where that construction is settled and can be ascertained. Polk's Lessee v. Wendell, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 98; Emendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 157. Justice to the citizens of the several states required this to be done, and the natural import of the words in the act of congress includes the laws in relation to evidence and rights conferred by statute, as well as the laws in relation to property. Vance v. Campbell, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 430; Wright v. Bales, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 535; Loring v. Marsh [Case No. 8,514]. Other authorities of like import might be cited; but it is sufficient to say that the construction given to a state statute by the highest judicial tribunal of the state, is regarded as a part of the statute, and is as obligatory in the federal courts as the text. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 599. Governed by those authorities, it becomes the duty of the court here to follow the state decisions, as ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the provision under consideration. "Persons may be injured," said Shepley, C. J., in Moore v. Inhabitants of Abbot, 32 Me. 46, "while travelling on the highway, without being blameworthy and without the fault of those who are required to make the ways safe and convenient, and in such cases the risk is their own."

Persons may also suffer injury while travelling upon the highway which is not safe and convenient, and the injury may not be occasioned by the want of repair, or by their own want of care to avoid it, and in such a case, the same learned judge said, it would be quite clear they could not recover damages of those who were in fault by neglecting to keep the way safe and convenient. Several other propositions were also laid down in that case, which it becomes important to notice, as they are directly applicable to this case; for example, that an injury may also be occasioned by the united effect of a defect in the way, and some other cause, and in that case the court say that the party injured cannot recover of those whose duty it was to keep the way in repair; because he does not prove that the injury was occasioned through or by reason of such want of repair, and, as applied to the case then before the court, no doubt is entertained that the principle laid down is correct. He should prove, in order to recover, that the injury was occasioned entirely through the defect or want of repair, for the statute was not intended to impose upon towns the burden of making compensation for injuries not occasioned by their own neglect of duty. Travellers are bound to exercise ordinary care, and if they do not and their negligence or want of ordinary care contributes to the injury, the injured party cannot recover of the county or town bound to keep the same in repair, as it cannot be held, in that state of the case, that the injury was occasioned entirely by the defect or want of repair in the way where the injury occurred, as it is certain that the negligence or want of ordinary care of the plaintiff contributed to the result.

Cases may often arise, also, where the way is defective and the proof of injury clear, and yet it may appear that the act of a responsible third party either caused the injury by forcing the injured party upon the obstruction, or contributing to it, as in this case, and in that state of the evidence it is equally clear that the county or town, though bound by law to keep the way safe and convenient, is not liable to the injured party under that statute, as in that state of the case it cannot be determined that the bodily injury was received solely through the defect or want of repair in the way. Expressions are certainly found in that opinion which leave it to be inferred that the exemption of towns from liability under that statute, would be extended to cases where the contributory act was the direct consequence of some natural cause, as where the horse of the traveller, though of good temper and well trained, is caused to shy by lightning, or by the rays of the moon suddenly falling on the pathway, through the opening clouds, or other similar incidents occurring in the experience of every one accustomed to travel by night. Certainly, towns are not responsible because the horse of the traveller suddenly becomes frightened and starts aside. The question of the liability of towns, &c., where, under such circumstances, the traveller is thrown over a bank or into a stream for the want of a sufficient railing, is a very different one from the question before the court, where it appears that the end board of the awning, which fell upon the head of the plaintiff, was forced from its fastenings by the negligent and rash act of a legally responsible party. Later decisions of the state court hold that the town is not liable, even where the horse of the traveller, though well trained, is caused to shy by the noise created by the diving of a muskrat into the water of a stream at the moment the horse is crossing the bridge, and where the traveller was thrown from his carriage and injured, from the want of a sufficient railing. Such cases, and others of a like kind, as where the horse is frightened by the cry of a child in an adjacent house, or the shriek of an insane person, or the sudden start of a hare or flight of a bird, present a question of construction which, if res integra, would deserve far more consideration than the one in this case, as the incidents adverted to are such as every person meets who is accustomed to travel in the night; but the court does not find it necessary to examine any such question, as the case before the court is unquestionably controlled by the rule of construction actually laid down in the leading case decided by the state court, which has ever since been followed without doubt or hesitation, as giving the true construction and meaning of that wise and humane enactment. Bigelow v. Reed, 51 Me. 329; Coombs v. Topsham, 38 Me. 204; Anderson v. Bath, 42 Me. 348.

Suppose the general rule to be as it is assumed by the court, still it is contended that the cases Springer v. Bowdoinham, 7 Me. 445, and Frost v. Portland, 11 Me. 271, admit of an exception to the general rule, and that the case before the court properly falls within that exception; but the court is of a different opinion. Undoubtedly towns in certain cases are liable, under those decisions, for an injury received by a traveller, by means of an obstruction placed or left in a highway, townway, or street by a responsible third party, where the obstruction has been allowed to remain in the highway, townway, or street, until the town is chargeable with notice, but in such cases, the county or town is liable to the injured party, because of their negligence in suffering it to remain, and not on account of the act of the third party in placing or leaving it in the travelled part of the way. They are bound to repair any such way, as well as to open and make it, and by suffering the obstruction to remain after they have notice of its existence, they become chargeable, because the way is defective and out of repair. Such cases however, afford no support to the claims of the plaintiff, as they rest entirely upon different ground. Kidder v. Dunstable, 7 Gray, 104. Reference need only be made to such portions of the instructions of the court as relate to the question under discussion. They were as follows: "That if the jury find that the awning as constructed was a defect in the street, and that the travelled part of the same, outside of the sidewalk, was safe and convenient, so that the teamster with his team could have passed over any part of it without difficulty, and that he reined his team into the gutter, and so drove along as to strike the awning with the corner of his rack, and thereby forced off the end board of the same, so that it fell upon the plaintiff, causing the injury for which the suit is brought, and that the board would not otherwise have fallen, the defendnats are not liable, because, when an injury is occasioned by the united effect of a defect in the highway and any other cause, the town or city is not liable." Both parties agreed in the correctness of that instruction, and inasmuch as it is substantially in accordance with the rule laid down in the leading case upon that subject as decided by the supreme court of the state, it was the obvious duty of the jury to have followed it, and if they had done so, their verdict must have been for the defendants. Any remarks to apply the instruction to the evidence as reported is quite unnecessary, as the proper application is as obvious as anything can be in judicial investigations.

Verdict set aside, and a new trial granted.

Case No. 9,471.

MERRILL et al. v. RINKER.

[Baldw. 528.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1832.

PERSONAL PROPERTY—BAILMENT—TITLE—ACTION TO RECOVER—WITNESS—PARTNERS—IN WHOSE NAME ACTION TO BE BROUGHT.

1. A receives goods from B and C, on an agreement that A should take them for sale from place to place, to pay the invoice price for such as were sold, to return those unsold and be credited with the amount at the prices charged, A to receive the surplus of what was sold over the invoice price. Held, that such agreement is not fraudulent in law, if not so in fact.

2. The goods were put up in New York, and brought to this state for sale, where they were attached by the creditors of A, for debts due before the agreement. A returns to New York, returns the invoices and abandons the goods to B and C, who rescinded the contract. Held, that A was a competent witness in an action for taking the goods.

3. B and C could recover in trover for taking them, if the contract was not fraudulent.

4. A and M were partners when the goods were invoiced, before the contract, M sold his interest in the partnership effects to B. Held, that A and B could sustain the action.

5. Reputed ownership in A, under such a contract, does not justify a creditor of A in taking the goods, unless under the statutes of bankruptcy.

6. Possession of goods by any other than the real owner, is neither fraudulent or a badge of fraud, if the want of possession is fairly accounted for, and there is no fraud in fact.

[Cited in Almy v. Wilbur, Case No. 256.]

[Cited in Stevens v. Works, 81 Ind. 451.]

This was an action of trover, brought against the sheriff of Lehigh county, under the following circumstances: Thomas W. Viles was an insolvent debtor, who had been discharged under the insolvent law of New York in 1828. Merrill & Minikin were merchants in New York, to whom Viles applied for goods to trade on, which they agreed to furnish him on these terms; an invoice of the goods delivered was to be made out, Viles to sell them at the invoice price, and not less, he was to receive the overplus for his trouble, to return what he did not sell and be credited for them, and to pay the invoice price for what he sold. Under this agreement goods were laid off, and were packing, from the 25th February till the 5th March, 1830, amounting by the invoice to 1328 dollars, and delivered to a wagoner employed by Viles, who took them to Easton in this state, where they were attached by his New York creditors, Viles immediately returned to New York, delivered back the invoice to Merrill, and abandoned the concern; Merrill accepted the invoice, and rescinded the contract; the goods were afterwards taken to Allentown, where they were sold by the defendant, on process by the creditors of Viles, who indemnified him. On the 5th of March, 1830, Minikin sold out his interest in the firm of Merrill & Minikin, to Foster, one of the plaintiffs. Merrill & Foster were the only partners in the firm, the business was carried on in the name of E. Merrill, agent. Viles received the invoice on the 6th of March, made out in the name of Minikin & Co., dated 25th of February, Merrill struck out this date and inserted 6th of March, he also struck out Minikin & Co., and put in E. Merrill, agent; thus altered it was delivered to Viles. The invoice was copied from the books of the plaintiffs, where it was entered, the invoice in the book and copy was headed, "Merchandise, consigned to J. W. Viles by Merrill & Co.," and altered as above. Minikin & Co. had previously had similar transactions with Viles, who settled for them on the terms above stated, and was credited with the goods returned unsold. The plaintiff's agent demanded the goods from the defendant before sale, who refused to deliver them, saying he was indemnified. The debts of Viles, for which the goods were sold, were due before his discharge.

At the trial, Viles was offered as a witness by the plaintiffs, to which Mr. Wharton and Sergeant objected on the ground of interest, inasmuch as he is liable to the plaintiffs for the value of the goods, an agent may be admitted from the necessity of the case, but here there is no agency.

BY THE COURT: The jury must decide whether Viles is an agent, factor, or purchaser of the goods, as between plaintiff and defendant. But as the plaintiff has rescinded the contract, and accepted a re-delivery of the invoice, with an abandonment of the goods by Viles, he cannot consider Viles as a purchaser, nor can he look to him for the goods as his agent, where they have been taken from him by process which he could not resist; so that he has no interest in the suit. The bringing the suit, is an affirmance of Viles's being a consignee, in which capacity he is answerable only for negligence, or a violation of the terms of the consignment, neither of which is in evidence. 2 H. Bl. 590, 591. The objection was overruled, but the plaintiffs did not call the witness till they produced a release to him from plaintiffs.

T. Bradford and J. R. Ingersoll, for plaintiffs.

The transaction was a fair and real one, made bona fide, without any intention to give Viles a false credit, or injure his creditors, the effect of which was to make Viles the special agent, factor or consignee, with power to sell at prices limited, and with a right to return the goods unsold to the plaintiff. He was not a purchaser of any goods remaining unsold, nor was he a debtor to the plaintiffs except for what he did sell; the seizure by the sheriff prevented a sale or re-delivery according to the terms of the consignment, so that the property of the goods remained in the plaintiffs. It was competent to them and Viles to rescind the agreement, by which the rescission related to the delivery of the goods. Salte v. Field, 5 Term R. 211, 213. Viles having no interest in the goods, unless they sold for more than the invoice price, was not a partner of the plaintiffs, his only claim was in the nature of a commission, or compensation for his services in selling: he had no interest till a sale. Miller v. Bartlet, 15 Serg. & R. 137; there was therefore nothing to be taken on an attachment against the property of Viles. No property passed by the delivery, till the contract was consummated by complying with the conditions, though it had not been rescinded or a partial payment refunded. Marston v. Baldwin, 17 Mass. 606, 610. If the interest in the profits is merely in payment of services, it makes no partnership (Dry v. Boswell, 1 Camp. 330; s. p., Wish v. Small, Id. 331, cited); so if a broker is employed to sell and is to receive all that the article sells for beyond a certain sum fixed by the plaintiffs (Benjamin v. Porteus, 2 H. Bl. 590, 591; s. p., 15 Serg. & R. 119). Viles could not have sold these goods to pay his old debts, neither could he have pawned them; such acts by a factor would not charge the property, so as to divest the right of plaintiffs. Martini v. Coles, 1 Maule & S. 140. The assignment by Minikin to Foster of his stock in the firm, gave the latter a joint interest in the goods, so as to authorize this suit in the names of Merrill & Foster. They had a right of stoppage in transitu, Viles was their bailee, whose possession was theirs, which is sufficient to maintain trover against any one who takes them out of his hands (Thorp v. Burling, 11 Johns. 285; 1 Maule & S. 140; 16 Johns. 74; 1 Johns. 472, etc.), there was a conversion here, no demand was necessary, but if necessary a demand by an agent is sufficient, (3 East, 381). By the terms of the contract, the plaintiffs retained their right to the goods, which were bailed to be sold on special conditions, limiting the price, stipulating for their return at all events if not sold; it was a special consignment in the nature of a conditional sale, by which the general property remained in the plaintiffs, subject to the right of selling at the invoice prices. Though this was not in the ordinary course of factorage transactions, yet it was so in its incidents, and the relative position and rights of the plaintiff and Viles; third persons were in no worse condition than if it had been an ordinary consignment, as the only peculiarity in it was the mode in which Viles was to account for the goods intrusted to him.

The turning question is on the good faith and fairness of the course of dealing between the parties; though the jury should find it to have been fraudulent, collusive, or a mere colour to cover an absolute sale to injure creditors or purchasers, or to give Viles a false credit, there is nothing in the transaction to make it so, as matter of law. Cases of reputed ownership merely, without any badge of fraud, arise only under the English statutes of bankruptcy. Though there was a delivery to Viles, it was conditional, so that any violation of the terms by Viles would rescind the contract from the time of delivery; the same effect would be produced if any third person should take a tortious possession of them, thus preventing Viles from selling pursuant to the condition. The plaintiff therefore had, at the time of the conversion, such property and present right of possession, as is sufficient to maintain this action. 1 Johns. 472; 15 East, 609. Here the property was unchanged, the specific goods entered in the invoice, were the same which were taken by defendant, and the right of property remained in plaintiffs. 2 Ves. Sr. 582, 585; 1 Atk. 232; 3 P. Wms. 185; 2 Esp. 578, 579.

T. I. Wharton and Mr. Sergeant, for defendant.

1. The transaction between the plaintiffs was in substance a sale on credit, but disguised so as to give it the appearance of a consignment or agency. Viles had the uncontrolled possession, with power to sell, not as a bailee, but as the owner of the goods, it was not a case of factorage, as Viles was liable for the invoice price as soon as he sold. Where property is delivered to another to be returned specifically, it is a bailment, but if an equivalent in kind, or any other may be returned, it is a sale. Jones, Bailm. 102; Story, Bailm. 193; 7 Cow. 752; 4 Cow. 752; 19 Johns. 44; 2 Kent, Comm. 464; 1 Rand. (Va.) 3. The option of re-delivery or paying the value, distinguishes a loan or bailment from a sale. 2 Wheat. Selw. 1052. Though the statute 21 Jac. 1, does not extend to a factor, yet if goods are in the hands of a retail dealer, to be sold or returned, they pass to his assignees as a case of reputed ownership. 2 Camp. 83; Bull, N. P. 42; 2 East, 117, 125. Where goods were sold to be paid for in thirty days, or warehouse rent to be paid, the property was absolute in vendee, though there had been no delivery, 1 Camp. 513. Here was an actual delivery and removal of the goods out of the control of the vendor, Viles was in full possession as owner, with assent of plaintiffs, this is evidence of property till the plaintiffs make out the property to be in them clear of all doubt. 5 Serg. & R. 275. Plaintiffs could not reclaim the property or countermand the authority to sell, Viles pays all charges and expenses, and has no lien on the goods; these circumstances divest the case of every feature of one of factorage or agency, nor is it a case where the plaintiffs had any right of stoppage in transitu. The delivery was complete, Viles's power over the goods absolute, and there was no insolvency between the sale and their reaching their destination. So that the right of stoppage did not exist. Rop. Vend. 189; Abb. 374; Holt, 498; 2 Wheat. Selw. 1052; 2 East, 125.

2. Viles was a partner by having a right to the profits (Gow, 15, 19); third persons had a right to so consider him (17 Ves. 404; Rosc. 89; 19 Ves. 461), and to seize the goods in his possession.

3. To support trover the plaintiff must have actual possession, or such property in the goods as gives him the right of present possession, absolute or qualified. 1 Chit. Pl. 150; 2 Wheat. Selw. 1050, 1051, 1057. A landlord cannot have trover for goods leased during the term (7 Term R. 9, 11; s. p., Corfield v. Coryell [Case No. 3,230]) because he has not a present right of property; otherwise, if the lease is void, as if made to a feme covert (15 East, 607). Here the plaintiffs had neither property, possession or a present right of possession.

BALDWIN, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Whether by the contract between the plaintiffs and Viles, there was a sale or a special consignment to the latter, of the goods in controversy, depends mainly on the intention of the parties. If the contract, as testified by the witnesses, and entered on the books of the plaintiffs, contains their whole agreement, as truly understood and intended by both parties, it is no sale in law or fact, on the other hand, if the real object was a sale, under the cover of a former consignment, then it was a sale and not a consignment, however it may have been entered on the books, or stated to the witnesses. This is a matter of fact for your consideration, should you find the transaction to be a consignment, you will inquire whether it was fairly and honestly made, with no other object than has been stated or shown in evidence, or is evident from its nature; or whether it was done to enable Mr. Viles to defraud his creditors, to give him a false credit, or hold him out in false colours on the credit of the goods. Should you think that the goods were delivered for either of such purposes, it was fraudulent as to creditors and third persons, whether it was a sale or consignment, and your verdict ought to be for the defendant. Should you think that the contract was made fairly and honestly, as a special consignment, to enable Viles to support himself and family, your verdict will depend on whether it is fraudulent in law, though not in fact. Fraud in law, is the commission of an act prohibited by the words or policy of the law, or where certain acts are deemed full evidence of fraud and fraudulent in themselves, though not so intended; cases of reputed ownership do not come within this rule, they arise only under the positive provisions of a bankrupt law, by which a person in possession at the commission of an act of bankruptcy, of goods with the consent of the true owner, is declared to be the reputed owner, and the goods pass to his assignees, in the same manner as if he was the real owner. In cases not within the statutes of bankruptcy, there must be something more than merely reputed ownership in the person in possession of goods, to effect the right of the real owner; something inconsistent with the nature of the transaction, the dealings between the parties, or some badge or evidence of fraud, intended or tending to injure others. 9 Johns. 201.

As a general rule, the possession of personal property is evidence of ownership, but if from the nature of the case, possession is necessarily in one person, and the ownership in another, it is neither fraudulent in itself, nor a badge of fraud; a possession for a special purpose, by a person for the use, by the orders, or in the transaction of the business of another in its usual course, does not make the property liable to an execution or attachment for the debt of the holder. Such a possession is not within the principles of the statutes, or common law, for the suppression of fraud; if the contract is fair and honest, the possession consistent with its nature, terms and intention of the parties, then as the want of possession by the real owner, is fairly accounted for, his rights cannot be affected by a third person. After an absolute sale of goods, possession by the vendor is prima facie evidence of fraud, which must be rebutted; if the sale is conditional, the retention of possession by the vendor, till the condition is complied with, is no evidence of fraud. Goods consigned to a factor, an agent, or delivered for a special purpose, cannot be taken from the true owner; if the conduct of the parties is consistent with their contract, and that in its terms is fair and honest, no fraud is imputable, its form is immaterial, whether it is in the shape of a consignment, a conditional sale, or partakes of the character of both, according to the true intention of the parties. Vide 9. Johns. 337, 338, and cases cited, 5 Serg. & R. 278. In this case the contract was a special one, giving Viles power to sell at invoice prices, but binding him to return the goods if not sold; as between him and the plaintiffs, this did not vest the property in him by the delivery, he was their agent while the goods were in his possession, and when he sold them was their trustee for their invoiced price. Before a sale, the creditors of Viles had no more right to seize the goods, than if they had been in the warehouse of a factor or commission merchant; from the nature of the contract Viles must have the possession and control, and while he was acting pursuant to the contract in good faith, his creditors had no right to take the goods. Any reputed ownership from possession, and selling the goods as his own, would not justify their seizure for an antecedent debt; though a person who, trusting to the visible ownership, had given him a credit, might set off his debt against a claim by the plaintiffs for the goods purchased. 7 Term R. 359, 361. As a question of law therefore our opinion is, that the agreement between Viles and the plaintiffs, was not fraudulent in itself as against the law; you will decide whether it was fraudulent in fact or intention; if you negative fraud, then the contract is valid in law, either as a consignment, or a conditional sale. It has been contended that Viles was a partner, and the goods liable to seizure for his debt; but even admitting that the contract created a partnership, a creditor of an individual partner has no right to sell the partnership property; he can sell only what belongs to the debtor partner, after paying the debts due by the firm, and his own debt to the firm. An execution, an attachment, or act of bankruptcy, may dissolve the partnership, but gives no authority to force a sale of the joint stock, before the share of the debtor partner is ascertained; what belongs to the creditors, or the solvent partners of the firm, cannot be appropriated to pay the private debt of a partner.

It is objected to the plaintiffs' right of recovery, that they have no joint interest in the goods, or possession in law or fact, sufficient to sustain an action of trover. If you are satisfied that in point of fact, Minikin had transferred his interest in the partnership effects to Foster, before the commencement of this suit, then in point of law the plaintiffs have a joint interest in the goods.

Whether the plaintiffs have such possession or right of possession as will sustain this suit, depends on your opinion on the question of fraud in fact; if you think the contract was colourable, intended as a cover for fraudulent purposes, the action must fail. But if you think the contract was in good faith, made for the purposes stated, the conduct of the parties consistent therewith, without any intention to defraud third persons; then, as no rule of law or policy is violated, the plaintiffs had the right of possession, against any person who converted the goods to his own use, while the contract was in the course of execution, according to the true intention of the parties; they have the legal possession, and may recover in trover the value of the goods, with interest from the conversion.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb. 13, 1874.[2]

PATENTS—CLAIM—PRODUCT—PROCESS—HYDROCARBON OIL.

1. A patentee may claim broadly a new product, however made, or he may claim the new product, when made by a described process, or he may claim the process, but he cannot embrace both the process and the product in the same claim.

[Cited in Milligan & Higgins Glue Co. v. Upton, Case No. 9,607; Durand v. Schulze, 10 C. C. A. 819, 61 Fed. 821.]

2. A claim for "the above described new manufacture of deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oils, suitable for lubricating and other purposes, free from the characteristic odors of hydrocarbon oils and having a slight smell like fatty oil, from heavy hydrocarbon oils, by treating them substantially as hereinafter described," is a claim for a heavy hydrocarbon oil, having the characteristics described in the patent, and produced by treating the oils in the manner described in the patent, and is not infringed by a similar oil produced by a different process.

[Cited in Badische Anilin & Soda Fabrik v. Hamilton Manuf'g Co., Case No. 721; Cone v. Morgan Envelope Co., Id. 3,096.]

3. A patent for a deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oil, made from heavy hydrocarbon oils (from which the lighter oils and mechanical impurities have been previously separated by distillation), by distilling from them, under atmospheric pressure, the volatile matters from which the objectionable odors arise, is not infringed by a hydrocarbon oil of the same characteristics, obtained directly from the crude petroleum by distillation in vacuo, in such a manner as to leave the heavy hydrocarbon oil as the distillate, free from the odorous bodies.

[Bill in equity [by Joshua Merrill against David M. Yeomans and others] for an injunction to restrain alleged infringement of letters-patent [No. 90,284] for improved manufacture of deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oils, granted the complainant May 18, 1869; and for an account. The principal question in the case was as to the construction of the first claim of the patent, which was as follows: "I claim the above-described new manufacture of deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oils, suitable for lubricating and other purposes, free from the characteristic odors of hydrocarbon oils, and having a slight smell like fatty oil, from heavy hydrocarbons, by treating them substantially as hereinbefore described."] [3]

B. R. Curtis, Chauncey Smith, and Walter Curtis, for complainant.

Causten Browne, William Bakewell, and Jabez S. Holmes, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The invention of the complainant relates to the manufacture, from heavy hydrocarbon oils possessing the characteristic odors of such oils, by a process of treatment described in the specification in his patent, of deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oils, free from such characteristic odors, and having only a slight smell like fatty oil, and suitable for lubricating and other purposes.

The most important and intricate questions presented at the hearing of the case relate to the construction of the first claim in the patent. Considered in the broader view which courts take of the construction of claims, by considering them in connection with the specification, and the discovery and invention therein described, the question presented is: What is really the subject of the complainant's patent? Is it for a new article of manufacture, or for a new process of manufacturing? Is it, in the words of the statute, "for a new and useful art," or for "a new and useful manufacture?" It is contended on the part of the complainant that the patent secures to Merrill his product, and products substantially the equivalent of his, by whatever process produced. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the patent is only for a process. Another construction, which we shall have occasion to consider hereafter, may be adverted to here, that the patent is for the described product of a specially described process. The questions of construction of the claims are attended with more difficulty, from the fact that the patentee, in stating his invention and specifying his process and making his formal claim, uses the word "manufacture" in its two different meanings, signifying, respectively, the operation of making, and the thing made.

To arrive at the true construction of the claim, we must first understand the nature and properties of "the heavy hydrocarbon oils," which are the subject of the described treatment, next the described treatment, process, or art, and finally, "the deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oils," the described product of the treatment. This renders necessary a hasty glance at the history and state of the art prior to the invention of the complainant.

These oils are called "hydrocarbons" because they are composed of hydrogen and carbon, and do not, like most animal and vegetable oils, contain oxygen. They are the product of distillation of bituminous coals and shales, and of natural asphaltum or bitumen. The principal source of supply at the present time, however, is from the petroleum-wells, the product of which is used either in its natural state or as converted into a variety of articles by the process of distillation. By distillation a great variety of products can be obtained by the same process from coal, coal-tar, asphaltum, and petroleum. The distillation of petroleum was at first practised only for the purpose of refining it by separating it from foreign matters, and separating from it some of the combined carbon, too large a proportion of carbon causing it to generate too much smoke, and rendering it unfit for use in lamps as an illuminating-oil. It soon became known that, in distillation, petroleum separated into hydrocarbons of different gravities. Ordinary distillation separated the substance from fixed bodies held in solution or suspension in it, and separated the more volatile bodies from those of less volatility. By destructive distillation of petroleum, the character of the substances was changed in like manner as gas is produced by the destructive distillation of coal.

In the process of distillation, petroleum separates into hydrocarbon fluids of different gravities. The lightest fluids come over and are condensed first, and they increase in gravity as the distillation proceeds. The lighter oils come over more readily and with less heat. The heavier oils require a higher degree of heat to vaporize them. During the process of distillation, by changing from time to time the receiving-vessel into which the distillate runs from the condenser, the distillate is separated into the various products having different gravities. This is termed "fractional distillation." By continually changing the receiver from time to time, fluids of any desired gravity may be obtained, from the highest to the lowest which petroleum will yield under treatment. An arbitrary division of the products is made in practice, according to the commercial uses of the products. All the fluid which first runs from the still, until it falls to a gravity of about 60° Baumé, is classed as benzole or naphtha. All in the next grade, between 60° and about 38° or 40° Baumé, is known as "burning-oil," or "refined oil," and more popularly known as "kerosene-oil," and is used principally for illuminating purposes. All the distillate below 38° or 40° Baumé is known as paraffine-oil, or lubricating-oil; and this is the product of distillation which Merrill refers to in his specification as "heavy hydrocarbon oil." The language of the specification is: "My invention relates to the heavy hydrocarbon oils, which have heretofore been produced by distilling crude petroleum, or the crude oils obtained from the distillation of bituminous coals, bituminous shales, bituminous schists, asphaltum, and other substances producing hydrocarbon oils, by distillation. * * * These oils are well known to the trade, and distinguished from the lighter burning-oils and naphthas by the term 'heavy oils,' their specific gravity varying greatly between the asphaltum oils and paraffine oils."

These heavy hydrocarbon oils thus produced had a persistent disagreeable smell, which made them offensive and undesirable for use in close, warm rooms, as in woollen manufactories. "Attempts had been made to remove the smell by filtration, but with partial success." It had been the practice to treat such oils with acids and alkalies for the purpose of removing the peculiar offensive odor. This resulted in improving the character of the odor, but without wholly removing the persistent disagreeable smell. For several years before the date of Merrill's invention the progress of improved modes of treatment of paraffine oils had been so great that heavy hydrocarbon oils for lubricating uses had been produced and sold in large quantities, substantially, although not entirely, free from the peculiar odor of petroleum distillates.

William Atwood, a witness on the part of the complainant, who has been connected with this manufacture from its inception to this day, and who is probably as familiar with the history of the art and the properties of the different hydrocarbons as any manufacturing chemist in this country, testifies in relation to the lubricating-oils manufactured prior to the date of the Merrill invention by the Portland Kerosene-Oil Company, and known, in the evidence in this record, as the "Portland Oils." His testimony is, in substance, that the Portland oil compared with the oil manufactured by the Downer Company under Merrill's patent, is "as good as a lubricating-oil, but not for mixing with other oils, where it is desired that its own peculiar smell shall not appear. * * * There still remained the odor of the volatile oils, which were always present. It was certainly desirable to remove any odor arising from any source." He also describes the odor of the Merrill oil as "a different odor" from the odor of the Portland oil, "being less tenacious: or, in other words, one can be completely covered up with a smaller amount of any other odor than the other."

As the Portland oils, and those substantially like them, sold by the Downer Company, before the date of Merrill's invention, were the best of the heavy hydrocarbons sold as lubricating-oils at that time, it is sufficient to refer to them as showing the state of the art at that time without more particularly adverting to the Maysville and other oils, which, also, had been previously manufactured and sold, and which the witnesses have particularly described. It is also contended in behalf of the defendants that the "Neutral Topaz Oil," like that sold by the defendants, had been manufactured by Dr. Tweddle, of Pittsburg, before the date of Merrill's invention. I do not find, after careful comparison of the testimony in the case, sufficient evidence to satisfy me that such was the fact. On the contrary, I am satisfied that Merrill was the first and original inventor of the process described by him, and I therefore pass to the consideration of the second step in the inquiry as appertaining to his process, and the product of his process, and the invention claimed and secured by his patent. The first step in this inquiry has been to ascertain what was the material to be operated upon. This we have found to be a heavy hydrocarbon oil, the product of distillation, objectionable for use as a lubricator by reason of those offensive odors peculiar to petroleum distillates. These offensive odors were due to the presence of the more volatile oils. The heavy hydrocarbon oils were generally sold as lubricators, to be mixed by the purchasers with sperm-oil or other fatty oils. They were also mixed with such oils by the manufacturers and dealers, and the mixed oils sold to the consumers for lubricators. Before the introduction of the Merrill oil, although the producers of the heavy hydrocarbon lubricators had succeeded in so far freeing them from the volatile compounds and the lighter and thinner oils, as to put on the market and sell in very large quantities an article satisfactory to the consumers in relation to its lubricating qualities, and substantially free from the peculiar offensive odors, yet this result was attained by a sacrifice of quantity to quality in the manufacture, and was only proximately the desired result, for there still remained some of the odor of the volatile oils. This peculiar odor was so persistent, that, when mixed with other oils, in whatever proportions, it was the predominant odor, and pervaded the whole mass.

The next step to be taken in the path of inventive art, as applied to the manufacture of paraffine or lubricating oils, was to eliminate the peculiar characteristic odor of the petroleum distillates, and also to increase the proportion of deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oil produced from a given quantity of crude oils. This brings us to the second step of the inquiry, Merrill's process.

After stating that his "invention relates to the heavy hydrocarbon oils which have been heretofore produced by distilling crude petroleum, or the crude oils obtained from the distillation of bituminous coals, bituminous shales, bituminous schists, asphaltum, and other substances producing hydrocarbon oils by distillation;" and, after adverting to the various modes of treatment, by acids and alkalies, and by filtration, which had been resorted to, with only partial success, to remove the persistent disagreeable odor peculiar to these distillates, he describes his process as follows: "To make heavy hydrocarbon oils free from the characteristic unpleasant odors of heavy hydrocarbon oils, I take the heavy oils which have been separated from the lighter oils and from mechanical impurities by distillation, and after chilling and expressing the solid paraffine, when such operation is necessary, place them in a still, heated by a fire underneath, and slowly and gradually raise the temperature, until from ten to thirty per cent. of the contents of the still are distilled over, when the still is cooled down and the remaining contents removed. The matters which go over to the condenser have a very foul, offensive, and disgusting odor, but the oil remaining in the still, if the operation has been properly conducted, is free from the characteristic offensive odor of hydrocarbon oils, and has no smell except a slight odor similar to fatty oils. It can be mixed, in all proportions, with sperm, lard, fish oils, and vegetable oils, and is so neutral in its character, that it takes the odor of the oil that it is mixed with."

He then goes on to describe, as a separate and distinct invention, the introduction of superheated steam within the still, whereby he claims the process will be facilitated, and oil of lighter color produced. This is the subject of the second claim in the patent. As no question arises in this case out of any alleged infringement of the claim relating to this portion of the alleged invention, no further reference will be made to it. After describing his apparatus, and the mode of using it for the introduction of superheated steam within the still, he continues: "I do not wish to confine my invention to its use in combination with the fire, because I can accomplish the same result by fire-heat alone applied to the still, or by any known mode of heating the still which will heat the oil sufficiently to distil over the portions of the oil necessary to be removed."

This, then, is his process: Taking the heavy hydrocarbon oils, the product of distillation, from which the lighter oils and mechanical impurities have been separated by distillation (and the paraffine, when necessary, also separated by the process of chilling and expressing), he distils from them the volatile matters from which the objectionable odors arise, and at the same time prevents new formations of such matters by keeping the temperature of the oil in the still below that at which these matters form by decomposition of the oil. After distilling off from twenty to thirty per cent., as the case may be, of volatile matters, the oil is left to cool in the still, and is then drawn off into tanks, for sale and use.

The product of Merrill's process is well and aptly described in the words of the specification as a heavy hydrocarbon oil, "so completely divested of its fetid and pungent odors, having only a slight smell like a fatty oil, and so oily as to be greatly improved and increased in value as a lubricating-oil, or for any purposes for which it may be used, either alone or mixed with other oils."

Having determined the scope of Merrill's invention, we are better able to determine what is within the scope of his claim. The first claim in his patent is as follows: "I claim the above-described new manufacture of deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oils, suitable for lubricating and other purposes, free from the characteristic odors of hydrocarbon oils, and having a slight smell like fatty oil, from heavy hydrocarbon oils, by treating them substantially as hereinbefore described." If we were to omit from this claim the last seven words—"by treating them substantially as hereinbefore described"—there would be little doubt that the claim was broadly for a new article of manufacture, without limitation as to the mode by which it might be produced. It is claimed that the use of this last phrase in the claim, in connection with the words in the first part of the claim, render the claim, when properly construed, a claim for the described process alone. Substantially, the argument is, that "a manufacture" of oils, by "treating them substantially as hereinbefore described," is a claim for the described process rather than for the product.

A patentee who has invented a new process in the arts, whereby an article of manufacture is produced, new in kind and not before known, may separately claim and patent both the art and the manufacture. He cannot properly combine them in one claim. Differing in that respect from the English law, which allows a patent for "any manner of new manufactures" (a term which includes process and product), our law distinguishes between a patent for an art and a patent for a manufacture. "No doubt," says Mr. Justice Clifford, in Goodyear v. Providence Rubber Co. [Case No. 5,583], "can be entertained that a new product or manufacture, and a new process or method of producing the new article, are the proper subjects of separate and distinct claims in an original patent." Sometimes an old process produces a new product. If the thing produced be new, in and of itself, it is patentable as a new manufacture. If it be capable of being produced by various different processes, as for instance, by hand by the use of hand-tools, or by automatic or other machines, yet, when the product is independent of the process, the patent is infringed by the unlicensed manufacture of the new product by any mode of manufacture, the process of manufacture being wholly unimportant.

In other instances, however, not only does a new process produce a new product, but the process is inseparable from the product, and inheres in it after it is made, so that, upon inspection of the product, it is manifest that the process must have been employed. Whenever we see the new manufacture "vulcanite," we know this product was made by the process of subjecting a plastic compound of rubber and sulphur to heat, whereby the chemical change was effected which characterizes the vulcanite.

It is competent, therefore, for a patentee, under the appropriate and fitting conditions appertaining to his invention, to claim broadly the new product, however made, or to claim the new product when made by a described process. This, it appears to us, is what Merrill has claimed—a heavy hydrocarbon oil having the characteristics described in the patent, and produced by treating the oils in the manner described in the patent. He made his claim as if he believed that his oil could only be made by his process; and, if such was his belief, the evidence has not fully demonstrated to our satisfaction that he was not justified in that belief. The construction we have given to the claim is the only one which appears to us to be admissible, and the only one consistent with the language used by the patentee, and one which, most effectually, probably, secures to him the product of his invention. The thing patented and covered by the first claim in the patent, is, consequently, a heavy hydrocarbon oil, produced from heavy hydrocarbon oils, themselves the product of distillation, and having the offensive odors peculiar to petroleum distillates; such patented heavy hydrocarbon oil being so far deodorized as to be free from the characteristic odors of heavy hydrocarbon oils, and having a slight smell like fatty oil, suitable for lubricating and other purposes, and the product or result of the treatment described in the patent.

The defendants are charged with an infringement of this first claim in the letters patent No. 90,284, to Joshua Merrill, the complainant, dated May 18th, 1869. The evidence of infringement rests in the proof that the defendants have purchased, used, and sold in the market, quantities of heavy hydrocarbon oils, known as "Neutral Topaz Oils," being the product of a manufacture by Herbert W. C. Tweddle, of Pittsburg, according to the process described in his patent No. 99,975, dated February 15, 1870. This neutral topaz oil is abundantly proved to possess many characteristic properties in common with those peculiar to Merrill's oil, and which distinguished Merrill's oil from the lubricating paraffine-oils which had preceded it. The two oils have substantially the same density and odor, the same amount of lubricating quality, the same freedom from the offensive odors of petroleum distillates. In both, the boiling-point was from one hundred and fifty to two hundred degrees higher temperature than the boiling-point of the best of the other hydrocarbon heavy oils. Whatever presumption of fact might arise, in the absence of other proof to the contrary, that the processes must be substantially the same, because the results are so similar, we are not left in doubt, in this case, as to the process of making the "Neutral Topaz Oil." It is clear that the process is essentially different from that described in Merrill's patent. The very essence of Merrill's invention was the elimination of offensive odors existing in distillates, the product of a destructive distillation. It was a deodorizing process, consisting in the removal, by distillation, of the light offensive oils produced in the oil by previous distillations, leaving a sweet residuum in the still. This product was a deodorized oil, an oil disinfected, an oil described by him as "completely divested of its fetid and pungent odors." Tweddle does not make his oil from a distillate made offensive by the presence of the products of distillation, but directly from crude petroleum. His process is not a deodorizing or disinfecting process to remove the odorous bodies that had been formed by or existed after distillation. It is designed to so conduct the distillation as to leave the distillate of crude petroleum free from those odorous bodies. Tweddle's has been well described as a process of prevention, while Merrill's is one of cure. In the two processes, Merrill's deodorized oil is a residuum left in the still; Tweddle's neutral topaz oil is a distillate which passes over and is condensed, and falls into the receiver. Tweddle's process is conducted in vacuo; Merrill's under atmospheric pressure. Other differences are apparent, upon examination of the different processes, as described in the respective patents, and as described by the expert witnesses. Sufficient has already been said to show that the differences in the two processes are so radical, that Tweddle's neutral topaz oil cannot, with justice, be claimed to be a deodorized heavy hydrocarbon oil manufactured from heavy hydrocarbon oils, by treating them substantially as described in Merrill's patent. Therefore the use and sale of it by the defendants was not an infringement of the first claim in the Merrill patent. Bill dismissed.

[NOTE. The case was taken on appeal, by the complainant, to the supreme court, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed; Mr. Justice Clifford dissenting. 94 U. S. 568.]

Case No. 9,473.

The MERRIMAC.

District Court. E. D. New York. June, 1867.

SALVAGE—TROOPS TRANSPORTED—CONTRACT WITH GOVERNMENT—PASSENGERS.

1. Where a regiment of soldiers of the United States was being transported from New Orleans to New York upon a steamer, under a contract between the owners of the steamer and the government, and the vessel, having sprung a leak, was saved from sinking by the labor of the troops for four days and three nights in bailing the vessel, working under the command of the officers of the regiment, and continuing their labor after the vessel was brought so near shore that she might have been beached or the men landed in boats, and until, by the help of another steamer which came to her assistance, she was brought to the Mississippi bar and was thus saved from a total loss, held, that the relation of the troops to the ship was not that of passengers, and that they could recover salvage compensation for their services.

[Cited in White v. McDonough, Case No. 17,552.]

2. Even if they had been passengers belonging to the ship by virtue of a passenger contract, the court might well award them salvage by reason of the services performed by them after the vessel was in sight of the beach and they could have escaped from her.

[Cited in The F. I. Merryman, 27 Fed. 314.]

[This was a proceeding by Joseph Forbes against the Merrimac. It was pleaded by the defendants that the libelants should have made themselves parties to another suit pending in the Eastern district of Louisiana by Charles Morgan and others, claiming salvage against the Merrimac. The case came up upon exceptions to the article of the defendants' answer setting up this defence. The exception was allowed and leave given to reform answer. Case No. 4,927.]

This suit was brought to enforce a claim for salvage preferred by a large number of persons formerly comprising a colored regiment of the United States army. The facts were as follows: The steamer Merrimac left the port of New Orleans in the month of November, 1865, bound to this port, laden with cotton and troops. On the morning of Saturday, the 11th, she sprung a leak, which increased to such a degree as to compel her to put back to New Orleans, then some two hundred miles distant. The water soon choked the pumps, and the crew commenced to bail, notwithstanding which the leak gained rapidly and by two o'clock on Sunday morning had fully extinguished the fires, and the engine stopped. Up to this time the effort to keep the vessel afloat had been confined to bailing from the engine room, which had been done at first by the crew, who had been gradually relieved by the men of the regiment, whom the commanding officer had called up, until the labor had passed entirely into the hands of the soldiers. The water, however, continued to gain, and was some seven feet in the hold at this time. The master of the steamer, who appears to have been a competent man, and whose conduct does him credit, then informed the major commanding that the work of bailing must be made a regular thing by the regiment, whereupon the major issued orders to organize the regiment into two reliefs of five companies each, to work two hours on and two hours off. This was done, and in this manner, under the immediate direction of its officers and under military discipline, the bailing, by hand, by buckets and tubs from places in the engineers' room, and by barrels hoisted by a whip from two hatches, was continued by the regiment without intermission and with such success that the water was kept nearly at a standstill. The crew of the vessel were for the most part engaged in emptying the barrels and in the navigation of the vessel, she being then under sail, but poorly equipped for that purpose, and unable to hold her course upon a wind. On Sunday night a sail appeared in sight, when guns were fired and rockets sent up, in hopes to bring her to their assistance, but without avail. On Monday evening a light was made, which proved to be the Timbalier light, some forty-five miles west of the Mississippi bar. The weather was then fair, and the steamer came to anchor in ten fathoms of water, with the beach in plain sight. Soon after the lights of a vessel were seen and signals of distress were again made, which brought to their aid the steamer Morgan. From this steamer the true position of the Merrimac was learned and more buckets procured, and at the request of the master, the Morgan lay by her during the night, and next morning took her in tow, and towed her to the bar, on which she at once grounded at four p. m., Tuesday. Up to this hour the bailing had been continued by the men of the regiment, directed by its officers, without cessation, night or day. The labor had been severe and exhausting; some of the officers were without sleep for three nights; the water gave out, and was only supplied by a shower of rain which fell. No regular meals were served, and the men would drop asleep as soon as relieved, and were often with difficulty roused again by their officers, who went around for the purpose twenty minutes before each relief was to be put to work. When the vessel anchored off the Timbalier light her position was unknown to the master; but the beach was in plain sight, and while at anchor the water was smooth, so that the steamer could have been beached and the men could have been landed in the boats. No effort was made to abandon her, but, on the contrary, the major stationed guards at the boats to prevent any resort to them for that purpose by any one, and his men were kept bailing, the regiment working with the regularity of a machine; and, so far as the leak was concerned, effectually supplying the place of the engine which had been stopped by the water, only ceasing when the steamer reached a place of safety on the bar, within reach of the steam pumps, whence she was towed to her dock.

BENEDICT, District Judge. It cannot be disputed that this valuable steamer, with her cargo, was in a position of very great peril, from which it was rescued by severe and exhausting labor performed by the libellants. But while the service is admitted, it is contended that the case is not one where salvage can be awarded. The main objection of many which have been ably presented by the claimants, is that the persons who performed the service in question were passengers, and that the service consisted of ordinary physical labor, within the line of the duty, which, as passengers, they owed to the ship. To this objection it is answered by the other side that the circumstances attending the rendition of the service were extraordinary, and the labor performed was not such as is included in a passenger's duty, and, further, that the libellants were not passengers within the meaning of the rules regarding salvage. The fact that a large steamer leaking as this one was, with from seven to ten feet of water in her hold, was kept afloat for the space of four days and three nights by the process of hand bailing, is undoubtedly an extraordinary occurrence, made possible in this case only by the circumstance that this large number of men were kept constantly at work and with great efficiency by the powerful aid of military discipline, judiciously but firmly applied by the officers of the regiment; but it may admit of doubt whether the circumstances were such as to change the character of the service and take it out of the category of ordinary labor, which it is said may be required of a passenger belonging to a ship which is in danger.

The determination of this question is unnecessary in the present case, inasmuch as I am of the opinion that the libellants did not sustain that relation to this steamer which is designated by the word "passenger" in the rules applied to salvage demands. The reason of the rule in question indicates the class of persons to which it relates. Passengers are not allowed salvage reward for ordinary labor performed by them in saving their ship, because such labor is made the duty of the passenger by the pre-existing contract under which he connected himself with the ship. 3 Kent, Comm. 314. Manifestly such a duty, the liability to which and the extent of which must vary according to the voyage, the character and outfit of the vessel, the competency of her master, and many other like circumstances peculiar to each case, can only arise out of a voluntary agreement. The duty rests in contract. It is a "covenanted allegiance:" the pre-existing covenant spoken of by Lord Stowell. The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. 236. This being so, I am unable to see how the libellants are to be considered as within the rule. They made no contract with the ship, had no power of selection of the ship, or the voyage even. They paid no passage money and incurred no liability for any. They acquired no right of action against the ship in case of failure to transport them. They were not fed or furnished by the ship, and had no interest whatever in being transported in her, but were men simply compelled by the orders of their superior officers to go on board this vessel at a certain time, to leave again whenever ordered by their officers. The government, it is true, had contracted with the ship for the transportation of this body of troops from New Orleans to New York, and to pay for their transportation, but privity of contract between the men and the ship, which would make ordinary labor for the ship in distress a duty, is wanting. That the position of these men on board was not considered by the master to be that of ordinary passengers is apparent from the fact in evidence that the master issued no orders to them, and did not undertake to direct their labors, but applied to the commanding officer of the regiment to issue his orders and to keep them to the work under his direction. This view is also confirmed by the circumstance which, although not recollected by the master, is proved by Major Bumstead, the commanding officer, whose appearance and mode of giving his evidence add weight to his statement, that when the master first spoke to him of the likelihood of being compelled to call upon him for men to assist in bailing, he said that the men, of course, should be paid. But it is said that the men were not the crew or the cargo, and, therefore, must have been passengers. This does not follow. A man may personally be on board a ship and be neither master, crew, nor cargo, and yet not sustain the legal relation of passenger, as was held by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Hanna, 15 Law T. (N. S.) p. 334. My conclusion, therefore, is that the service performed by the libellants cannot be held to have been performed by them in the line of any duty as being passengers. Having thus disposed of the main question, it is only necessary to say that the other objections raised by the claimants, have been heretofore passed on by the court. The fact that they were soldiers and in peculiar relations to the government, is no defence, as many cases in the books will show. That they saved their own lives with the ship does not bar them from reward, nor is it good ground of objection that they did only what was their bounden duty as men. It is, indeed, the bounden duty of every man to labor when he can to save the lives and property of his fellow man. And it is to encourage the performance of this duty that the maritime law, out of considerations of public policy, awards compensation for its performance. Performance of a duty imposed by contract is not rewarded, but services rendered in pursuance of the dictates of humanity, and prompted by a desire to perform the obligations which attach to every man, these are the very services which, when they result in the saving of property, are rewarded by a court of admiralty. Again, it is said, that the services involved no risk, enterprise, or disinterestedness, and that these are necessary characteristics of every salvage service. The rule is stated too broadly. The Clifton, 3 Hagg. Adm. 121; The Enterprise, Ship. Gaz. 1854; The Black, Ship. Gaz. 1854; The Purissima Concepcion, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 184. And besides, this service was not wholly wanting in these characteristics. The labor here performed might well involve risk to health, and certainly the mode of its performance under the circumstances, displayed much patience, willingness, and subordination.

The case presents another feature which is entitled to notice here. It appears in evidence here, that when the steamer reached the place where she anchored, the beach was in plain sight. The weather was then fine, and the sea soon became smooth. The steamer could then have been beached, or the troops landed in the boats; instead of which, guards were stationed at the boats by the major commanding, to prevent any one from attempting to resort to them, and the men were kept at the exhausting labor all that night and during the next day, and until the steamer was safely grounded on the Mississippi bar. This labor, performed after the steamer came to anchor, was for the sole purpose of saving the ship and cargo. Had the bailing been stopped, the steamer would have sunk and been lost, although the lives of those on board would have been saved. And this labor was willingly performed by men who were already worn with labor, want of sleep, and proper food, and who had the physical power to control the ship as well as their own actions. This feature of the case might justify an award to the libellants, even if they had been passengers belonging to the ship by virtue of a passenger contract; but I do not rest my decision upon this ground, but upon the ground that the libellants were not passengers, within the meaning of the rule which denies compensation to passengers, and are consequently entitled to a proper reward for the labor they performed, and I deem the considerations of public policy, upon which the whole doctrine of salvage rests, to be fully applicable to the present case, and to require that the good order, patience, and willingness with which this large body of men—soldiers as they were, with arms and the power to provide as they pleased for their own safety—labored constantly to keep the ship afloat, should be recognized in a court of admiralty. There remains to determine the amount proper to be awarded. Upon this question, as the case is peculiar, not only in some of the circumstances attending the service, but in the number of persons claiming to be rewarded, and as no argument upon this point is submitted in behalf of the claimants, I desire before determining it to hear the views of counsel.

On hearing counsel, the court fixed the amount of salvage at two months' pay for each officer and man, according to the rate received by them in the military service. There were three hundred and fifty-one persons who appeared as libellants in the suit. The vessel was valued at two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the amount of salvage decreed was twenty thousand five hundred and thirteen dollars. No appeal was taken from the decree.

Case No. 9,474.

The MERRIMAC.

[1 Ben. 490.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1867.

SEAMEN'S WAGES—FORFEITURE—DESERTION—FORM OF OATH—CHINAMAN.

1. Where a sailor deserted from a vessel, before the voyage for which he was shipped was completed, and never afterwards made any attempt to return to his duty: Held, that he had forfeited his wages then due, irrespective of the statute of July 20, 1790 [1 Stat. 131].

2. The libellant, a Chinaman, was offered as a witness in his own behalf, and was sworn in the usual way. Objection was made, on behalf of the claimants, that the oath thus taken was not binding upon him. The court directed the claimants to examine him on that point. He stated that he did not know the name of the book that he was sworn on, but that, if he should say anything that was not true, the court would punish him, and after he was dead he should "go down there," making an emphatic gesture downward with his hand: Held, that a witness must be sworn in such a way as was binding on his conscience.

3. The libellant might be examined on the oath which he had taken.

This was a libel by William A. Corning against the bark Merrimac, and David Marshall her master, to recover wages, and the value of clothes alleged by the libellant to have been left on board of the vessel, to the amount of $404. The defence set up was desertion. The libellant testified, that he was sick in Havana, and left the vessel, taking his clothes with him, and that he went to the hospital, and, after being there some days, was put again on board of the vessel, and, after being on board of her a day or two, again left her, and did not return to her. He alleged ill treatment on board as the cause of this second leaving; but as to this his evidence was contradicted. He afterwards made his way to New York, and, finding the bark there, filed his libel. On the trial of the cause, the libellant offered himself as a witness, and was sworn in the usual way. The claimant objected to this, on the ground that the libellant was a Chinaman, and that the ordinary oath upon the Bible was not binding upon him. The court directed the claimants to examine him on this point. The libellant, on examination, said, that he was a Chinaman, but had left China when he was fifteen years old; that he did not know the name of the book upon which he was sworn; that if he should tell anything that was not true, the court would punish him; and, on being asked if anything would happen to him after he was dead, if he did not tell the truth, he answered that he would "go down there," making an emphatic gesture downward with his hand. The court ruled that a witness must be sworn in such a way as was binding upon his conscience, and that the libellant, on this testimony of his, might be examined. The libellant was then examined. The claimants put in evidence a deposition which he had given de bene esse, contradicting in some respects the evidence which he had given on the stand.

A. Nash, for libellant.
Benedict & Benedict, for claimants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel by a seaman to recover his wages and the value of certain clothing and other personal property. The libellant shipped at Boston, as cook and steward, on the 3d of January, 1866, at $35 a month, for a voyage from Boston to Havana, and thence where the master might direct, and finally to a port of discharge in the United States, the voyage not to exceed six calendar months. He signed the proper shipping articles, containing the above particulars, at Boston. He joined the vessel on the day he shipped. She left Boston January 12th, and arrived at Havana February 2d, and left Havana again on the 1st of March. The libellant went to Havana in the vessel, discharging his duties, but he did not leave Havana in the vessel. The defence set up in the answer is, that the libellant deserted from the vessel at Havana, and thereby forfeited all his wages. This defence is, I think, proved. The clear weight of the evidence is, that the libellant left the vessel and her service at Havana on the 26th of February, not only without leave and against his duty, but with an intent not again to return to his duty. Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907]. He never afterwards made any attempt to return to his duty. I place my decision on this ground, irrespective of the statutory forfeiture of wages insisted on under the fifth section of the act of July 20, 1790, in connection with the entries in the log book. The libellant, in fact, deserted twice; once on the 11th of February, and once on the 26th. But one desertion, the second one, is set up in the answer, and, whatever circumstances attended the first desertion, as involving the question whether or not the illness of the libellant furnished a sufficient excuse for his leaving the vessel on the first occasion, his second leaving was a plain desertion, unrelieved by any mitigating circumstances. It was not induced by any ill treatment on the part of the master and officers. The evidence of the libellant himself is wholly unreliable. There are so many material contradictions between his testimony given orally at the trial, and his deposition taken de bene esse before the trial, as to show that he is entirely unworthy of credit.

As to the clothing and other articles which the libellant left on board of the vessel when he deserted, there is nothing shown to charge the vessel with liability for them, and there is no sufficient evidence that the master ever had any of them.

The libel must be dismissed.

The MERRIMAC.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 563.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1863.

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—ENEMY PROPERTY.

Vessel and cargo condemned as enemy property, and for a violation of the blockade.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured, July 24, 1863, at sea, on the Atlantic Ocean, in latitude 33° 59′ 30″ north, and longtitude 76° 55′ west off Wilmington North Carolina, by the United States gunboat Iroquois, and were sent into this port for adjudication. They were libelled in this court, as prize, under such arrest, July 28th, thereafter, and the warrant and monition on the process were duly served on the vessel and cargo on the same day. No person appearing thereupon, due proclamation was made in open court, and a decree of default was rendered against the prize property, and all persons interested therein. The papers of the vessel and the proof taken in preparatorio were submitted to the court, and judgment and condemnation against the prize was prayed by the United States attorney. A register of the vessel was recorded, in the name of the Confederate States, at the Wilmington custom-house, in North Carolina, to Richard Bradley, of that place, as owner, July 21, 1863. A shipping agreement with the master and crew, signed, without date, a manifest, a clearance of the vessel and cargo from Wilmington, North Carolina, to St. George's, Bermuda, and several bills of lading of the same direction, signed in July, 1863, were produced with the papers from the vessel. The cargo was cotton, spirits of turpentine, and tobacco.

This, upon the vouchers in writing, is palpably a case of the seizure of enemy property, in flagrante delicto of traffic, in an enemy vessel, at sea. No citation of legal authority is requisite to show its confiscability. The deposition in preparatorio taken from the master of the vessel is in full harmony with the paper documents. He swears that he is a resident of North Carolina, and owes allegiance to that state, and not to the United States; that the vessel was captured sailing under the Confederate flag; that she was built in England, and was owned and sailed by a stock company in Wilmington; that he knew that the port of Wilmington was under blockade before he sailed from it, and saw the blockade squadron lying outside; that the cargo, he supposes, was the growth and manufacture of the Southern states; and that there was a consignee in Bermuda for the vessel and cargo. No comments need be added to this fullness of inculpatory evidence.

A decree is rendered condemning the vessel and cargo to forfeiture.

[The merchant steamer Eagle rendered valuable assistance in delaying and capturing the Merrimac. The master of the Eagle interposed a claim on her behalf that she should be entitled to share as one of the captors. It was decided that no such right existed. Case No. 9,476. The case was again heard upon the commissions and allowances claimed by the prize commissioners. Id. 9,477.]

PRIZE—ARMED VESSEL ASSISTING—TO WHOM PRIZE BELONGS—DISTRIBUTION.

1. The proceeds of property captured as prize of war belong exclusively to the government, and can be distributed or allotted only according to direct and positive authority of law.

2. Under the acts of March 25, 1862, and July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 375, § 4, and Id. 607, § 6), an armed merchant vessel, not in the service of, and having no commission from, the United States, although she is present at the capture of a prize and co-operates therein, is not entitled to share in the proceeds.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. The Merrimac was captured at sea by the United States vessel of war Iroquois, and was condemned in this court as lawful prize. [Case No. 9,475.] The merchant steamer Eagle interfered actively, and probably serviceably, in intercepting and delaying the prize in her endeavor to evade a blockade port of the enemy, and escape from the Iroquois while in chase of her. On the reference to the prize commissioners, under the decree of condemnation, to report the proper distribution of the prize proceeds among the capturing vessels, the master of the steamer Eagle interposed a claim on her behalf that she should be decreed entitled to share, as one of the captors, in that distribution, but stated that his ship had no commission from the government. That application was opposed on the part of the Iroquois, on the ground that the Iroquois was the only .public ship of the United States present or within signal distance at the time of the capture, and the prize commissioners so reported the fact to be; and furthermore reported, that the capture was made by the Iroquois, and that the armed merchant steamer Eagle was present at the capture, and co-operated therein.

Under the laws of the United States, the proceeds of property captured as prize of war belong exclusively to the government, and can be distributed or allotted only according to direct and positive authority of law. Act March 25, 1862 (12 Stat. 375, § 4); Act July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 607, § 6). The statute law names the public ships and armed vessels in the service of the United States as exclusively entitled to share in the distribution of prize money. The power of the courts under our laws is, accordingly, limited to that special method of allowance. It is the fundamental doctrine of all governments that the title to prize property vests in the nation, although the modes of exercising or enjoying that dominion may be widely various. The Elsebe, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 173.

The rule as to sharing in prize captures is of broader range under the English law than under the American. The prize is there regarded as belonging, in a larger sense, to the admiralty or to the crown, as representing the right of the admiralty, and the distribution of its proceeds, as subject to the instructions of the admiralty or the crown, and as not depending entirely on statutory enactments. The numerous cases in the English courts, cited and commented on by the counsel for the Eagle, on the hearing, are all within that general principle. Accordingly, whatever may be the intrinsic importance of the service rendered by the Eagle in this capture, or the gallantry or hazard accompanying its performance, the court is not empowered to consider any other question than the legal right of the vessel to demand a compensation to herself out of the prize fund.

It is clear that right is not given by any statute or other authoritative public grant. It must, therefore, be denied by the court.

Decree accordingly.

[The case came again before the court on the question of costs taxable to prize commissioners. Case No. 9,477.]

The MERRIMAC.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 585.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1864.

PRIZE—COMMISSIONERS — COSTS—COMPENSATION—CUSTODY FEES.

1. The question of the costs taxable to the prize commissioners considered.

2. The act of March 25, 1862 (12 Stat. 374), discussed as to the compensation provided by it for the prize commissioners.

3. The tariff of allowances to the prize commissioners, prescribed by the court under that act, explained.

4. The act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 608), restricting the compensation to each prize commissioner to $3,000 per year, discussed.

5. The difficulty of carrying out the statutory provisions as to the compensation of the prize commissioners set forth.

6. A prize commissioner cannot have taxed to him custody fees in respect of a vessel.

7. Custody fees to a prize commissioner, in respect of a cargo, are a personal allowance to him for an individual trust executed by him. No third person is authorized to assume such custody, and a charge by a prize commissioner of such fees, where his possession of the cargo was merely constructive, and not personal, will not be allowed.

8. The court refused to allow to a prize commissioner a charge of one per cent. on the proceeds of a vessel and cargo, as custody fees, for holding them in possession less than thirty days, and until they came into the custody of the marshal, on a warrant of arrest.

BETTS, District Judge. A list of items for allowance or taxation in this cause was submitted to the court by one of the prize commissioners in November last. It was authenticated by the deposition of the commissioner, in the usual form required for the allowance of the particulars charged. The bill amounts to $2,184.81, and is thus verified: "Henry H. Elliott, being duly sworn, says that the foregoing bill is true and correct according to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief; that the charge of $2,184.81, above mentioned, is not more than a just and suitable compensation for his services in this cause, as he verily believes. Sworn November 30, 1863." To the bill was also appended a consent in writing, signed by the United States district attorney, and also by Messrs. Sandford and Woodruff, Messrs. Owen, Gray & Owen, and Mr. Donohue, proctors, representing various captors in the suit, that the bill be taxed at that sum. But there is no evidence offered proving that special services of any description were rendered, or liabilities incurred, by the commissioner, in consequence of the custody of the cargo. One item charged in the bill was of this tenor, the whole being in print, except the sums and the times of the services, which were filled in in writing: "Custody fees for taking and holding the prize property until it passed into the charge of the marshall, being less than thirty days, the same fees as are allowed by law to him for custody fees, viz., one per cent. on $202,741.16; the gross proceeds thereof, $2,027.41." The court returned the bill to the commissioner for further explication of the grounds upon which the item was charged, particularly inquiring what period of custody or actual keeping of the cargo was covered by it. The evidence presented in support of the item in that respect consists of the affidavit of John Perry, an employé of the prize commissioners. He testifies

"that, in the employment of the prize commissioners, he went on board the above prize vessel when she was brought into this port, with a steamboat chartered for that purpose; that the prize was lying in Buttermilk Channel; that he found her cargo in a very bad condition, and very much scattered about over the vessel; that he took charge of the cargo, and took the vessel into the Atlantic docks, under the orders of the prize commissioner; that, on reaching the docks, she was boarded by the commissioner, and her hatches and cargo duly secured and sealed; that he remained on board and kept the vessel and cargo in custody, on behalf of the prize commissioners, for two days steadily, and thereafter was on board from time to time; that night watchmen were placed and retained on board by the commissioners during his absence, until the vessel was duly delivered into the custody of the marshal; that, under the orders of the commissioners, he took an accurate inventory, at the time, of all the loose and exposed cargo, and reported it to them; that, when he took charge of the cargo, it was exposed to pilfering and loss; and that the charge and custody of the cargo, by the commissioners, was necessary for its protection and safety." In the commissioner's bill of costs no special charges are entered for the services and disbursements spoken of by this witness, but a general charge, in print, of $25, is made in the bill, independent of the item of $2,027.41 particularly in question on this taxation, in the following terms: "Proceeding to the steamer, and taking possession of the captured property; taking information in reference to the situation and condition thereof, and whether bulk had been broken, &c.; placing the seals of the commissioners upon the hatches, &c.; examining into the safety of the property, and attending to the proper care and protection thereof, &c." So, also, an antecedent item in the bill provides compensation to the commissioners for the receiving, receipting, &c., of the prize effects and papers by them from the prize-master, $5.50.

The account of proceedings in the initiation of the suit in the district attorney's office represents that the prize was brought into this port July 28, 1863, and states that the libel was filed, and process thereon issued, on the same day; and the account from the marshal's office is, that the process was served the same day upon the vessel and cargo. This discrepancy, no doubt, arises from inaccuracy of memory in the deponent Perry, who states his personal action and that of the commissioners regarding the prize, prior to her arrest by the marshal, from his recollection at the time his affidavit was attested to, December 24, 1863, which was five months after the business in which he took part was transacted, and who cannot be expected to be as exact and reliable as to time as official entries or files. The court must, accordingly, regard the claim for compensation charged in the main item in question at $2,027.41 as resting virtually upon services constructive in character, and not flowing from official acts performed by the commissioner personally, or any responsibilities imposed upon him in the particular which is made the basis of this claim. The verification attested to by the commissioner, November 30, 1863, comprehends the whole bill. He says "that the foregoing bill is true and correct, according to the best of his knowledge, information and belief; that the charge of $2,184.81, above mentioned, is not more than a just and suitable compensation for his services in the cause, as he verily believes." The judgment of the commissioner may be proper, that, in the aggregate, his compensation for his entire services in the cause should be rated and allowed at $2,184.81. But that consideration cannot be regarded in determining the value of the particular items set forth as subjects for allowance. Each of them must be passed upon on the strength of its individual legality or intrinsic worth.

The consent of the United States attorney, and of the proctors for the three other war vessels co-operating in the capture of this prize, to the allowance of the above bill as stated by the commissioner, cannot justify the court in directing an amount to be paid to the commissioner out of the prize proceeds under the control of the court, which is not within the provisions or contemplation of the law which places that fund at the disposal of the court. This court has never considered that it possessed a rightful authority to devote to the officers of the court moneys arising out of the captures in prize proceedings, upon any other principle than those which govern the judiciary in the exercise of fixed directions of law, and with as careful an adherence to its spirit as if literally declared by congress in a code of specific fees.

Limiting the operation of these general remarks at present to the case of compensation of prize commissioners, the following positions of law are deemed to exist in the respect to the reward they are entitled to obtain for their services under the adjustment and determination of the court: The act of congress of March 25, 1862, is the first specific regulation made by positive law for the services and compensation of prize commissioners as public officers. The first section of the act designates various duties to be performed by them; and the third section appoints the method of their compensation. The statute is obscure and indefinite in its main features, and very difficult of satisfactory interpretation and execution. It points out no method by which the courts are to ascertain the value of the services rendered by these officers, none of which are rendered in the face of the court, or within its personal knowledge, or are of a character likely to fall within its familiarity, nor does the law indicate what limitation, if any, shall be applied to the amounts to be awarded. The duties prescribed are partly legal, partly clerical, partly mercantile, and in part miscellaneous, and appertaining to the skill and experience of persons conversant with mercantile and general business transactions, and not supposable to be familiar to the individual experience of members of courts of justice, or to their professional or official pursuits or habits. The statute supplies no assistance to the court by a jury, assessors, referees, or other agencies, through which a reasonable approximation to the measure of "suitable and just compensation" called for may be attained. No existing course of public employment is known which can be recurred to for a precedent or ground of proceeding to guide the action of the court with any appreciable certainty, particularly none which gives countenance to the awarding of a compensation to possibly a mere day-laborer on a scale adequate to recompense a high trust assumed to have been performed by a bailee acting in an official capacity.

Immediately on the passage of the act of March 25, 1862, the court applied itself, with the active aid of one of the prize commissioners, a lawyer of long experience and high distinction in the profession, to searching for precedents in books of practice, and to gathering the usages of the government in the allowances made under its authority to its employés for services of a similar character and nature, with a view to frame a scheme of compensation which might comport with and carry into effect the enactments of the law. The main purpose was to adopt a tariff of allowances for the particular services imposed upon the commissioners, which should be commensurate with what was anticipated would be their probable character and value, and should keep in view a restriction of the allowance, in the aggregate, to five thousand or six thousand dollars per annum. Congress had evinced, by long-continued legislation, its purpose to restrict the compensation of its officers discharging the highest civil and judicial functions within this district to rewards not exceeding in gross the sum of $6,000 yearly; such as the justices of the supreme and circuit courts, the subtreasurer, the collector, the postmaster, the naval officer, the United States attorney, the marshal, &c.; whilst other officers, charged with multifarious and responsible trusts, and frequently guaranteed by heavy pecuniary sureties, were remunerated for services, not dissimilar in character from those expected from the prize commissioners, with less than $4,000 per year; such as the judge of the district court, the clerks of the circuit and district courts, and all the subaltern officers of every other department of public service, military, naval, and financial; the tenure of most of such offices being, like that of the prize commissioners, at the discretion of the appointing power. In preparing the scheme of costs or compensation for the prize commissioners, the court was anxious to designate, with positiveness, the specific amount of allowance for each item of service, where it could be determined, from statutory appointments or well established usages, for like services in other situations under the government; and where such method could not be pursued, then to have the allowances claimed left to the judgment of the court upon specific evidence as to the quantum meruit, submitted for its guidance on taxation. The question arising on the present taxation is of the latter order. It was yet to be ascertained, from actual practice, whether the duties of the prize commissioners would be adequately paid by moderate additions to the stated fees appointed in the schedule arranged by the court, or whether, from year to year, the discretionary allowances reserved for special items must be varied so as to secure about the proposed compensation of five to six thousand dollars yearly, above necessary disbursements. The opportunity to meet that result substantially was expected to be obtained principally by the adoption of the provisions for unfilled blanks, one of which is now the subject of consideration. A provision of that kind had existed in the stated admiralty rules of this court since 1828. It was derived from a prior authority given by statute (1 Stat. 277, § 4), and was continued as a usage of the court of admiralty, in respect to the compensation of the marshal for the custody of seized goods, after the enactment ceased to be in force as to vessels and goods (Dist. Ct. Rules 49–51). All these allowances are subject to discretionary alteration by the court. Rule 52. But, independent of that qualification to the claim to this enhanced mode and rate of compensation, in prize proceedings, under the admiralty rules, the discretion which the court might exercise under section 3 of the act of March 25, 1862, is regarded as inhibited or limited by the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 608), which prohibits the annual salaries of prize commissioners being so increased, in any way, as to exceed, in the aggregate, the sum of three thousand dollars. Since the act of July, 1862, no amount of merit, or even losses, proved to have attended the performance of their duties by the prize commissioners, can authorize the court to enlarge their yearly emoluments above $3,000. The court is clothed with no power, by either act, to adjust that salary or maximum allowance, pro rata, upon prizes placed in the keeping of the commissioners during any other period than the particular year in which the services charged for were performed; and that, frequently, cannot be practically fulfilled by the court. Instances now exist in which cases of the condemnation of prizes in this court in the early stages of the war stand at this time undecided by the courts of appeal, and no execution can go from this court to make out of other prizes the sum adjudged to the commissioners for their services in those cases. Nor, however ample to that end the proceeds of prize property captured and condemned within a year may be, in their general amount, can execution out of this court touch any portion of the fund, except that made out of the individual vessel in respect to which the services represented by the execution were rendered. So long as the captured prize proceeds exist, they must be made to contribute their proportion to this salary lien; and the demand cannot be lawfully attached to other prize proceeds held by the court. This state of facts leaves the court no means of fulfilling the direction of the two acts of March and July, 1862, but by an effort to compute conjecturally whether the current services of a commissioner, rated according to the tariff first adopted by the court, will amount to the sum of $3,000 for a particular year, which can alone be paid to him for his services during that year.

The court has not officially before it a return, in numbers, of the prizes seized and prosecuted to conviction, from July 17, 1862, to the close of the year directly succeeding, but a note taken from entries in one of the offices of the court shows that eighty-four arrests and condemnations were prosecuted during that period in this court. Evidence can be easily furnished from the papers in the respective causes, showing the exact amount of costs estimated in those suits; but it is assumed that the sum taxable against these eighty-four cases will average all of $100 in each case for the services of the prize commissioners, deeming both commissioners to be actually engaged in performing their duties. That will give $8,400 per year, which will be an excess of $2,400 above the legal compensation payable to the two, subject, of course, as is specified in the taxation, to the limitations prescribed by statute in the payment thereof. In the present case, however, it is to be observed, that only one of the commissioners presents, as claimant, a bill of services to be taxed. He cannot ask to have adjudged to him over $3,000 for a year. That is to be provided for out of pro rata assessments upon each of the 84 cases; and, in strictness, if the court could have made known to it the services performed in all of those suits, each case would be assessed, upon like items, exactly the same charges, up to a complement, from the whole, to the amount of $3,000, and nothing over that sum. Then, in this case of the Merrimac, the entire taxation to be levied for this bill would not, in all reasonable probability, surpass fifty or one hundred dollars. The terms of the two acts of March and July, 1862, do not supply the court the means to effectuate that intent of the law, by bringing together the proceeds of captures for any particular year and allotting them to discharge the assessment. That can be done only by the navy department. But, by the statute, each vessel is exempt from liability for this class of services, except for the year in which the services were actually performed in relation to her. It is to be further noted that the prize commissioners are not created accounting officers to the treasury for surpluses of moneys paid over to them under orders of the court; and that the government possesses no remedy against them for excesses paid to them, if such exist, other than through personal actions therefor, as multifarious as the prizes from which the surplus payments are derived. The court, in administering these complex enactments, in the spirit of justice and equity, will, accordingly, be actuated by wo prominent considerations: First, to so adjust the assessments imposed upon the prizes for the payment of the prize commissioners as to fairly cover the salaries of the persons performing the duties of those offices whenever the amount subject to taxation is reasonably sufficient to that end; and, second, to avoid, with equal care, withdrawing from the beneficiaries to whom prize proceeds are devoted by law, after payment of the legal costs, moneys not lawfully payable to any officers of court. The court cannot, in principle, regard the government as any more empowered to divert such surpluses from their lawful destination to other uses, than the court or its officers are to misappriate the moneys under their special charge.

In review of all the legal and equitable considerations applicable to the particular item of taxation in question,—the charge of one per cent. commission on $202,741.16, the aggregate amount of the proceeds of the prize vessel and cargo in this suit, resulting in a charge of fees or compensation, as above stated, of $2,027.41,—I observe: 1. The value of the steamer, $65,000, does not fall within the contemplation of the admiralty rule respecting "custody fees." That rule relates to goods or personal effects solely; and the value of the ship must necessarily be excluded from the charge. With regard to the cargo, it is not proved that extra labor or expense was imposed upon the officer by its custody, as it was all retained on board the vessel. 2. Custody fees on the cargo, ($137,741.16) are, in their nature, a personal allowance to the bailee, for an individual trust executed by him. The reading of the rule denotes that it contemplates the fulfilment of a special confidence imposed by the court upon an official person, intermediate the interposition of another official, the marshal, by a superseding authority. No third person is authorized to assume such custody. He must be the official, individually. The judge of the district receives the prize from the captors, under the directions of the prize law, and he only can designate the person who is to take into manual possession prior to its seizure by due process of law. The prize master has no authority to put the prize into the custody of a servant of a commissioner. His delivery must be an actual one to the lawful substitute of the judge. The custody of the goods or cargo must pass in reality from the prize master to the commissioner, to constitute a legal delivery to the latter, and must be receipted for by him. The rule gives no compensation to the commissioner for the acts and doings of his servants or employés, independent of his special directions and supervision, so as to constitute the act personal by the officer. It is obvious that the rule contemplates a possession of the seized property purely official, and of the shortest duration practicable, until it is put under the guardianship of legal process. The allowances named are subject to variation, for cause adjudged by the court, in order to keep the compensation in reasonable correspondence with the labor and responsibility incurred.

The proofs in this case show that the commissioner had a mere constructive possession of the cargo, no further, and for no other purpose, than that which is provided for under the standing charge allowed for "taking possession of it, with the papers, and placing his seal upon the hatches," &c. The affidavit given by Perry, the employé of the commissioner, in the first instance, proved no personal services performed by the commissioner in respect to the custody of the cargo. A supplementary deposition made by him on the 7th of January, 1864, and a deposition made by Prize Commissioner Eagle, on the 8th of January, evidently under a misapprehension of dates, state that the commissioners had possession of this cargo, and performed acts for its safekeeping, previous to its being arrested by the marshal. This statement, however, if accepted as further proof, does not show that this was extra duty, entitled to a special compensation, under the principles adopted by the court in the above decisions. But Commissioner Eagle and Mr. Perry are, both of them, in error in supposing that they were in possession of the prize on the first of July. It appears, from the records and proofs in the cause, that the vessel was captured off Wilmington, North Carolina, July 24, and was brought into this port July 28, and was arrested and taken into actual custody, upon the process of attachment, on the same day, by the marshal.

I cannot, upon the evidence before me, regard the commissioner as entitled to have taxed any part of the item charged for "custody fees," amounting to $2,027.41. If application is made to permit further proofs to be given formally by the commissioner in support of that item, such privilege will be allowed, under a like power to any other party interested in the funds, to offer counteracting proofs; and evidence will also be allowed to be given by any party in interest, tending to determine whether it be necessary and lawful, for the satisfaction of salary due the commissioner for the year following the custody of this prize, that any portion of the item in question, or of other surplus commissions remaining in court, be appropriated to satisfy such arrearage. In case such power and necessity exist, it, doubtless, is within the competency of the court to rate such a proportionate allowance toward such deficiency as may, under all the considerations, be found to be reasonably proper for that purpose.

In arranging the tariff of charges, the court took into consideration the probability that the prosecutions, on the success of which the compensation of these officers is dependent, would occasionally be defeated, or fail to yield proceeds adequate to their satisfaction; and, accordingly, the estimates were framed with a view to meet such deficiencies. Moreover, the bills up to July 17, 1862, were allowed in contemplation of the payment of $6,000 per annum to each commissioner. Since the passage of the act of limitation of that date, the prospective assessment on prize proceeds should be diminished accordingly whenever the court is satisfied that the confiscation may be carried into effect, so as to secure their compensation to the commissioners upon a lesser rate of allowance out of the fund.

The MERRIMAC.

District Court, D. Oregon. March 31, 1874.

TOWAGE—CUSTOM—TOW-LINE—AT WHOSE RISK—NEGLIGENCE—DUTIES—COLLISION BETWEEN TUG AND TOW.

1. H. agreed with W. to tow his scow from Astoria to Cape Disappointment for twenty dollars, without mentioning which should furnish the tow-line: Held, that in the absence of any usage or understanding to the contrary, the tug was bound to furnish the tow-line as a part of the necessary means to perform the towage, as undertaken.

2. Where evidence was offered by H. to prove a custom to the effect that the tow was bound to furnish the tow-line in such cases: Held, that it was not sufficient, and that the master of the tow could not be affected by it, if established, unless knowledge of it was brought home to him.

3. Where a man on the tow furnished a line to the tug at the request of the master of the latter, but stated at the time that he did not think it sufficient to tow with: Quere, should the line be considered as furnished by the tow, and at her risk, or otherwise.

4. The contract to tow the scow and her cargo from Astoria to the cape was one of the hire of the carriage or transportation of the same for a compensation, and was, therefore, a bailment of the kind denominated "Locatio operis mercium vehendarum," in which the master of the tug was bailee, and responsible for ordinary skill and diligence.

[Cited in Ye Seng Co. v. Corbitt, 9 Fed. 428.]

5. The tug M. left Astoria with the scow J. F. in tow, two hundred feet astern, on the last of the ebb tide, for Cape Disappointment, and met the flood tide and south-west wind abreast of Sand Island, as might have been reasonably expected, where such tide and wind always make a rough sea, and in attempting to tow said scow against the same, the tow-line of the tow and also of the tug parted, and the scow went on Chinook spit and was lost: Held, that the tug did not exercise ordinary skill and diligence in undertaking the voyage on the last of the ebb tide, or in attempting to tow the scow against the flood tide and wind; and therefore is responsible for the consequent loss of the same.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 6 Chi. Leg. News, 248, gives only a partial report.]

[Cited in The M. J. Cummings, 18 Fed. 183.]

6. Under the circumstances of the employment, with the exception of steering the tow, working her pump, and handling her end of the tow-line, the tug is responsible for the navigation of both vessels; and her duties were those of a private carrier for hire, just as much as if she had had her upon her own deck instead of astern, at the end of a tow-line.

[Cited in The Chickasaw, 38 Fed. 361.]

7. Where a tug negligently places a tow in a peril from which she is lost, it is no excuse that the tow might have been saved, but for a mistake of or want of skill in the crew of the latter, in bending a tow-line in a dangerous emergency, or the want of extraordinary ground tackle.

8. Where a tow has parted from the tug and gone adrift, and is in great peril, and the latter, at the request of the crew of the former, attempts to take them off, and in so doing collides with the tow and sinks her, the tug is not responsible for the consequences of such collision, unless it was intentional or the result of gross negligence.

William Strong and Joseph N. Dolph, for respondent.

DEADY, District Judge. This suit is brought to recover $2,500 damages sustained by the libellant in the loss of the John Francis and her cargo of eighty cords of ash wood, through the negligence of the tug Merrimac, while engaged in towing said John Francis from Astoria to Cape Disappointment, on September 9, 1873.

The vessel lost was a "schooner scow," of ninety-five and one-half tons burden, one hundred and twenty feet in length, twenty-one feet in breadth, and four and one half feet in depth, with two masts and a rudder and steering gear; she was decked over, fore and aft, carried an anchor weighing two hundred and eighty pounds, with thirty to forty fathoms of chain; she was built in 1866 for the wood and hay trade on the Columbia river, at a cost of $4,500. Some time in 1872, libellant bought her for $1,100, and afterward put $800 worth of repairs, rigging and sails upon her.

The Merrimac is a single engine-propeller, of fifty or sixty horse power, and forty-eight tons burden, and has been engaged for some years in towing on the Columbia river, and over the bar to and from the sea. About September 1, 1873, the libellant met the master of the Merrimac, Richard Hobson, of Portland, where conversation was had between them, to the effect that the former expected to be at Astoria in a few days with his scow, bound for Cape Disappointment, when he would want a tug and that the latter would be ready to tow him over.

Early in the morning of the ninth the John Francis arrived at Astoria from the mouth of the Sandy, in tow of the libellant's little steamboat, the Wasp. The Merrimac having heard the previous evening that the scow was on the way, came over to Astoria from Cementville in the night to meet her.

Here the libellant and the master of the tug met and made a contract, whereby the latter agreed to tow the scow over to the cape for twenty dollars, nothing being said as to who was to furnish the tow-line. This was about eight o'clock, and near the last of the ebb tide. The master of the tug directed the libellant to have the anchor of the scow lifted, and let her drift out from the wharf, and he would come around with the tug and take her in tow, and in the meantime the libellant was to take the Wasp in near shore and secure her and come off to the scow in his skiff.

The tug came alongside of the scow, and asked libellant's brother, who was the only person on board, to give him the line that was lying on the forward part of the scow, which he did. The tug then steamed along slowly, with the scow astern, for nearly a mile, when the libellant and another brother came on board the tow, and the tug steamed away at the rate of four or five knots an hour.

The distance from Astoria to the cape is about fifteen miles. Abreast of Sand Island, and about four miles from the cape they met the flood tide and wind from the southwest. At this point the sea is always rough during the flood tide. The wind and tide being on the tow's quarters, she began drifting to leeward, when the tug turned up to the tide, and the strain or surge parted the line some feet outside of the scow. The tug then backed up and gave the tow her line, which very soon parted short off some fifteen or twenty feet from the scow. Thereupon the tug gave the tow the long end of her line, and directed it to be bent on to the long end of the tow's line, which was done; but the knot slipped while being drawn through the water, and the line parted before it was drawn taut. By this time the scow had drifted within one hundred feet of Chinook spit, and the master of the tug directed the tow to drop her anchor, which was done, in about three fathoms of water, with twenty-five fathoms of chain. This was near the first black buoy. The scow, under the force of the wind and tide, dragged her anchor slowly in the direction of the spit, and the men on her called to the tow to come and take them off. The tug backed up to windward and alongside the scow, but as she reversed her engine to go ahead, it caught on the center for a moment, and she drifted closer to the tow. As she passed the bow of the scow a swell caught her, and carried her across it, where her propeller got foul in the anchor chain, until it was paid out further, when she got away. During this time the guard of the tug struck the bow of the scow at one corner, and broke it down, so that the sea poured in and filled her in a few moments, whereupon the crew of the tow ran aft, jumped into their skiff and got on board the tug, which was distant some two hundred yards waiting for them.

The tug proceeded to the cape and returned at ebb tide, but the scow had drifted so far into the breakers that it was not considered safe to go to her with the tug. By the next morning at ten o'clock her bow was pulled out of her with the fastening of the anchor chain, and she went on to the spit, and was lost. The cargo of wood floated out as soon as she filled, and was lost.

The line taken from the tow was a four-and-a-half-inch line, about forty fathoms in length, and apparently in good condition. Henry Wilson, who gave it to the tug, testifies that the Merrimac came alongside, and Hobson asked him if the line lying forward on the tow "was strong enough for a tow-line." He answered, "I do not know; I do not believe she is;" when Hobson sang out, "Heave that line, and not stand there to look at it."

Hobson testifies: I asked Wilson "if that was the line he was going to tow with?" What he said in reply "I do not recollect." I then ordered him "to give us the line quick before we drifted away."

Ingalls, who took the line from the tow, testifies: "We went alongside, and asked if they had a line, and they began to hunt one up. They said they had one, and I took the line myself, and made it fast to the bitts."

J. W. Bloomfield, a passenger on the tug, and the person to whom the wood was sold to arrive at the cape, testified that "Hobson asked one of the men on the scow whether he had a good line. The man said he did not know whether the line was good or not. I think the man was Wilson's brother. Hobson said, 'Hurry and give us the line anyway.'"

Upon this testimony, I conclude that the transaction of taking the line from the tow took place substantially as stated by Henry Wilson.

The line of the Merrimac was a four-and-three-quarter-inch Manilla rope of about forty fathoms in length. It had been spliced, and subjected to severe strain in towing rafts of saw-logs.

Either of them were probably sufficient to tow the scow in smooth water, or with the tide, but not against the flood-tide, between Sand Island and Chinook spit, as the fact of their parting as they did abundantly proves. In this case the result is a safe criterion by which to judge of the sufficiency of the lines. The Webb, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 414.

The contract being silent as to who should furnish the tow-line, the respondent alleged and gave evidence tending to prove that there was a custom at the mouth of the Columbia river that in such cases the tow should furnish the line. The evidence in support of the usage is weak—comes mainly from witnesses who are interested in tugs—and, in my judgment, falls far short of establishing any such custom. The most that can be claimed for it is, that it establishes a usage in the case of sea-going vessels, particularly when being towed astern, that the tow shall furnish the line or pay the tug extra for furnishing it, but in the case of scows and the like, that the tow shall furnish the line if she has one, but if not, the tug shall furnish it without extra charge. Besides, it is clear that no usage upon the subject was known to the libellant, and before he can be affected by a custom so recent and local as this is claimed to be, knowledge of it must be brought home to him. 2 T. Pars. Cont. 57.

My impression is, that the undertaking to tow the scow from Astoria to the cape bound the respondent to furnish the necessary means to do the service with, and in the absence of any custom or understanding to the contrary, to furnish a sufficient tow-line as a part of such means. But the tow did furnish the line, and I think the tug ought not to be held responsible for its sufficiency, unless it appears there was some understanding that it was to be used at the risk of the latter. If the master of the tug called for the tow's line, and it was given and used without anything further being said or done by either party, the reasonable inference would be that the parties understood the contract as requiring the tow to furnish the line, or that they thereby modified or supplemented it to that effect. But in this case the man on the tow, in giving the line, also said he did not think it was sufficient, and there is reason for holding that, if the master of the tug took the line, notwithstanding this opinion, he took it upon his own judgment and risk. He testifies that he thought the line was sufficient. Still, when the master of the tow came on board, he made no objection to the use of the line, and manifestly did not think it insufficient. Upon the whole, it is not clear to my mind whether the circumstances under which the line was given and taken from the tow constitute an implied agreement that it was to be used as the line of the tow, and at her risk, or otherwise. As the case may be satisfactorily disposed of upon another ground, it is not necessary to definitely decide this question.

The contract to tow the scow and her cargo from Astoria to the cape was one of the hire of the carriage or transportation of the same for a compensation, and was therefore a bailment of the kind denominated locatio operis mercium vehendarum. The services of the tug, and her master and crew, were hired by the libellant for that purpose. This constituted the libellant the bailor, and the respondent the bailee, of the scow and her cargo. Story, Bailm. § 370; Edw. Bailm. 338.

This is a bailment which is beneficial to both parties, and the bailee is responsible for ordinary skill and diligence. Edw. Bailm. 371; Story, Bailm. 457. But he is not a common carrier, and may contract for a more restricted liability than the law imposes upon him. Alexander v. Greene, 3 Hill, 19; The Webb, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 414. Counsel for respondent insists that this hiring did not amount to a bailment of any kind, and in support of this proposition, cites a dictum of Bronson, J., in Wells v. Steam Nav. Co., 2 Const. [2 N. Y.] 208, to that effect. It was decided in that case that the proprietor of a tow-boat was not a common carrier, as to the boat towed, but the dictum that such proprietor was not a bailee, and that the transaction was not a bailment, is in direct opposition to the language of all the authorities, as well as that of the learned judge elsewhere in the same opinion, and in Alexander v. Greene, supra.

The master of the tug being a bailee for hire, and as such responsible for ordinary skill and diligence in the performance of his contract, what was his duty in the premises? Impliedly he undertook to furnish a tug, properly equipped, and of sufficient capacity and power to take the scow to the cape, and for the exercise of ordinary skill and prudence in selecting the proper time to make the voyage, with reference to the craft to be towed, and the wind and tide, or other ordinary peculiarities of the navigation, and in the conduct of the enterprise in the case of any unlooked for or extraordinary emergency.

Of course the relations between the tug and the tow may be modified by express agreement, or the reasonable implication arising from the circumstances and nature of the employment in a particular case, so as to make the tug the mere servant of the tow and under its direction. In such a case the liability of the tug may be limited to the mere point of furnishing a sufficient motive power for the tow, while the whole responsibility as to the time and manner of making the voyage or transportation would rest with the latter. Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 121.

In this case the scow being towed astern a distance of some two hundred feet, with her own master and crew aboard, the tug is not responsible for the manner in which she was steered. It is evident from the circumstances that the tow relied upon her own steering gear and crew to keep her in the proper place in the channel, so far as the course of the tug would permit. Sproul v. Hemmingway, 14 Pick. 7. Neither is the tug responsible for any injury which may have happened to the tow by reason of any defect or deficiency in her condition, construction or appointments, considered as a scow. It was implied in the contract to tow her, that the John Francis was as seaworthy as vessels of her class and construction ordinarily are.

But as to all the other matters involved, or to be performed in the undertaking, I think the tug is responsible for any lack of ordinary care or diligence on the part of the respondent.

The water to be crossed was not an ordinary one. The peculiar difficulties and dangers of the voyage were well known to the respondent, and almost unknown to the libellant. The vessel to be towed was a flat-bottomed one, with a square head and stern, well loaded down with wood. She could be towed to the cape on the ebb tide with comparative safety, while it is almost certain that she could not be towed against a flood tide between Sand Island and Chinook spit.

Under the circumstances, there was a want of ordinary skill and diligence on the part of the respondent in leaving Astoria with this scow in tow for the cape on the last of the ebb tide. He could not expect to carry it with him, and must have known that he would meet the flood tide and wind at Sand Island, where it always made a rough sea against which it would be dangerous to tow the scow. The Brooklyn [Case No. 1,938]; The M. M. Caleb [Id. 9,680]; The Olive Baker [Id. 10,489]; The Blanche Page [Id. 1,523]; The M. A. Lennox [Id. 8,987]; The Deer [Id. 3,737]. To obviate the force of these facts counsel for respondent claims that the voyage was delayed half an hour waiting for the libellant to join the scow after the tug had hitched on to her, and that this was the cause of being caught in the flood tide.

Taking all the circumstances into consideration, I do not think this proposition is supported by the evidence, and if it was, it does not justify the respondent in putting the scow into the peril, from the effects of which she was lost.

The testimony as to the time which elapsed between the hitching on to the scow and the libellant's joining the latter, varies from fifteen to thirty minutes, and as to the distance made in the meantime, from a quarter of a mile to a mile. The weight of the evidence is, that the time was not to exceed twenty minutes, and the distance not more than three fourths of a mile.

The tug was making four to five knots an hour until she met the flood tide, and, had the ebb served, she would have made the cape in something more than three hours. The evidence is not clear and direct to the fact, but the reasonable inference from all the circumstances is, that the tug did not make more than two and a half knots an hour against the flood tide. The witnesses all agree that the vessels met the flood tide abreast of Sand Island, and this is very probable when it is remembered that they left Astoria on the last of the ebb tide—near low water. As indicated by the chart, this is about four miles from the cape. If, then, there had been no delay in starting, the tug would have met the flood tide in apparently the roughest place in the channel—about two miles from the cape—and encountered substantially all the perils she did, with, in all probability, the same results.

But, for the sake of the argument, admit that the loss occurred on account of the delay. That does not excuse the respondent. The delay occurred while the respondent was in command and under his direction; and it does not appear that the libellant occupied any more time in making the Wasp fast and getting back on to the scow than was necessary and anticipated, and allowed for when the contract was made. By his undertaking he was bound to know whether it was prudent to start when he did or proceed on the voyage after the libellant came on board. The libellant gave no direction in the premises from the time the contract was made until he called to the tug to take them off the scow, and assumed no risks save those which the law necessarily cast upon him.

But suppose that the respondent had good reason to believe, when he started, that he could make the cape without encountering the flood tide, still when the fact proved otherwise, I think it was his duty, as a prudent man, to return to a place of safety and await the high tide and smooth water; particularly when it is considered that the only tow-lines on board were insufficient to draw the scow through that sea, even if she could ride it.

With the exception of steering the tow, working her pump and handling her end of the tow-line, the tug is responsible for the navigation of both vessels. Her duties were those of a private carrier of the tow for hire, just as much as if she had had her upon her own deck instead of astern at the end of a tow-line. In Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 122, it was held that "whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the usual and ordinary course of such an employment, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, over waters where such accessory motive power is necessary or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels." While in this case the tow had her master and crew on board, yet they had nothing to do with the navigation of either vessel except to steer the tow in the wake of the tug, to work her pump and handle her end of the tow-line. In other respects the navigation of the tow was as much under the control of the tug as if there had been no one on board of her. The master of the tug selected his own time for starting, as he said that the scow could not be towed over the route except in time of smooth water. While they were under weigh no communication passed between them, except when the tug backed down to give the tow her line.

Respondent also insists that if the two pieces of lines had been properly bent together, the knot would not have slipped and the scow might have been saved. Each of these lines had just snapped like a mere thread, and there is nothing in the evidence or circumstances which makes it even probable that the increase in length, caused by fastening them together, would have made them sufficient to tow the scow against that tide and wind if the knot had held.

The fault alleged is, that the libellant did not seize the knot. But certainly it could not have been expected that when the scow was about going into the breakers the libellant would take time to go after and get some small cord and deliberately seize this knot. Nothing of the kind was directed or suggested by the respondent when he gave the order to bend the lines together. Apparently the knot was well made, but while being drawn through and against the water it loosened, and as the line became taut, slipped. But even a mistake in this matter by the libellant would not excuse the tug, which had already negligently brought the scow into this peril. The Webb, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 417.

As to what followed after the scow cast anchor I do not think it material. It is possible that the scow might have ridden safely at the place she was left by the tug, until the turning of the tide, if her anchor had been larger and the chain longer. But the peril, which resulted in her loss, had already been incurred by the negligence of the respondent. The Webb, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 417; The Merrimac, Id. 203; Union S. S. Co. v. New York & V. S. S. Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 313. The libellant was not bound to have provided his scow with ground tackle sufficient to hold her in such an extraordinary position as that. In my judgment her ground tackle was sufficient for all ordinary emergencies.

So with the collision that occurred in attempting to take the libellant and his brothers from the tow after the anchor was dropped. The responsibility of the tug, under the contract to tow the scow, was at an end. For the time being the undertaking had been abandoned by the tug. In going to the scow, at the request of the libellant, the tug was employed more as a salvor than otherwise, and is not responsible for an injury to the scow caused by a collision under such circumstances. There is no doubt but that the collision occurred, and that the scow was sunk and the wood washed away as the immediate consequence of it. But I do not think the tug was handled so unskillfully or carelessly as to make her liable for the consequences.

In the bill of particulars the scow is charged at $1,800, the wood $400, and the furniture, stores, clothes, etc., at $301. I find their value as follows: Scow, $1,200; wood, $280; other articles, $150; making in all $1,630. The wood cost libellant $2.50 a cord, on the bank, at Sandy, and he had sold it, to arrive at the cape, for $4.50. I have allowed $3.50 per cord for it at Astoria. These are coin valuations, to which I add ten per centum for the difference between coin and currency, which makes it $1,793.

The libellant, within a day or two of the disaster, went out to the wreck and recovered the anchor and chain from the sand, and some blocks, ropes and rigging from the hull of the scow. Of these he has sold all but the rigging for $73, which he values at $40. Allowing him one third of this amount for saving these things the remainder—$75.33⅓—must be deducted from the above, which leaves the sum for which the libellant is entitled to a decree, $1,717.66⅔ and the cost of suit.

District Court, D. Connecticut. Feb., 1878.

BANKRUPTCY — EFFECT OF FORMER DISCHARGE — NEW PROMISE TO PAY—NEW CREDITORS —MARSHALING ASSETS.

1. A discharge by virtue of compliance with the terms of a composition in bankruptcy is a discharge by operation of law, even as against an assenting creditor, and an indebtedness thus discharged is a sufficient consideration for a new and express promise to pay the original debt.

2. Where a debtor who had been discharged under composition proceedings in bankruptcy, gave to one of his creditors who had signed the resolution a new note for his old debt, and afterwards again went into bankruptcy, held, that the claim so revived should not be postponed to those of the new creditors.

3. Under section 4972, the district court has power only to marshal assets according to priorities and rights which have been created or established by the act itself, or have been created by liens placed upon the assets by the act of one of the parties, or by operation of law, and has no power to discriminate between different classes of debts of the same legal character.

Appeal from a register in bankruptcy.

Application of the assignee of the estate of Matthew M. Merriman, bankrupt, to have the proof of a claim by the American National Bank expunged.

J. Hooker and A. D. Smith, for assignee.

H. C. Robinson and C. E. Gross, for bank.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. Matthew M. Merriman had been duly adjudicated a bankrupt by decree of this court, prior to August 17th, 1875, and his estate was then in settlement. On that day, upon his application, an order was passed directing a meeting of his creditors to be held on August 30th, 1875, to ascertain if they would resolve to accept a composition to be proposed by him in satisfaction of their respective debts. At said meeting he presented a proposition to pay, in full satisfaction and discharge of their respective claims, twenty-five per centum thereof, which payment was to be secured by his four equal promissory notes, indorsed by Joseph Merriman, to be dated on the day of the final confirmation of the resolution by the court, and payable in three, six, nine, and twelve months from the date thereof, with interest. The American National Bank had duly proved against the estate of said bankrupt his notes to the amount of four thousand four hundred dollars, indorsed by Joseph Merriman. Said resolution was passed at said meeting by the requisite majority in number and value of the creditors assembled at such meeting, and was confirmed by the signatures thereto of the debtor and of the requisite creditors in number and value. The American National Bank, by their duly constituted attorney, expressly accepted said proposition at the first meeting of creditors, and expressed said acceptance by their signature. At the second meeting of creditors, held on September 11th, 1875, the resolution was found by the court to be for the best interest of all concerned, and was ordered to be recorded. On November 27th, 1875, M. M. Merriman gave said bank his three notes, amounting in all to four thousand four hundred dollars, indorsed by Joseph Merriman, in renewal of the pre-existing notes which were due to said bank, paid the discount due thereon, and continued to renew said notes, making from time to time partial payments on the renewals, and paying the discounts thereon, until December 8th, 1876, when there was due upon the last renewals three thousand one hundred and eighty-five dollars, which sum with interest thereon is still unpaid. Joseph Merriman has continued to be the indorser upon each set of renewals. The bank received in one year after September 11th, 1875, either in reduction of the notes, or by way of interest, more than the amount which was payable by M. M. Merriman by the terms of the composition, but did not receive the same as a payment on the composition. No notes in accordance with the resolution were ever given to or demanded by said bank, but the giving of said notes was waived by the bank. Joseph Merriman's indorsement made the original notes and the renewals secure. It was not claimed by the assignee that said bank assented to or signed said resolution under any promise or expectation that the debt of four thousand four hundred dollars was to be paid by the bankrupt. Fraud on the part of either party to the composition was not claimed. M. M. Merriman was again adjudicated a bankrupt by decree of this court on February 16th, 1877, and John Hooker, Esq.,

[1] [Reprinted from 18 N. B. R. 411, by permission. 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 120, contains only a partial report.]

was subsequently appointed assignee of his estate. Said bank has proved against said estate the last renewal notes, amounting to three thousand one hundred and eighty-five dollars. The assignee objects to the allowance of this claim upon the ground that the notes are without consideration, and that the debt which they represent has been legally discharged.

All the questions of law which arise upon the foregoing facts were discussed by counsel, the principal question being, whether an express promise made by a bankrupt to a creditor to pay the amount of his debt is valid, such creditor having theretofore expressly assented to a composition made and confirmed under the 17th section of the amended bankrupt act of June 22, 1874 [18 Stat. 182], and such composition having been substantially carried into effect, and exact compliance with its terms having been waived by the creditor. An express promise by a debtor to pay a debt which had been, previously to such promise, barred by some positive statute, or had been discharged by operation of law, is binding upon the promisor. Cook v. Bradley, 7 Conn. 57; Stafford v. Bacon, 1 Hill, 532. In such cases the moral obligation to make payment, although the debt has been legally discharged, is a sufficient consideration for a new and express promise. In order to revive a debt which had been discharged by bankruptcy or insolvency proceedings, the new promise must be clear, distinct and unequivocal. Allen v. Ferguson, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 1. A promise to pay a debt which has been voluntarily discharged by the creditor, as by accord and satisfaction, is not legally binding. Performance of an agreement of composition inter partes, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, or legal tender of performance of such agreement in accordance with its terms, is a discharge of the debt which has been agreed to be compromised, so that the discharged debt cannot legally be revived. An agreement of composition inter partes becomes an executed agreement by full payment on the composition, though not in accordance with the terms of the agreement, provided compliance with the terms is waived by the creditor.

I forbear to consider the question whether the payment within the year to the bank of an amount of money equal to the twenty-five per cent. and interest, which was payable by the resolution, is a satisfaction of the agreement, the money not having been paid to or received by the bank upon the composition, but upon the antecedent debt, and shall assume that, before the last renewal notes were given, the debtor had been legally discharged by his compliance with the terms of the resolution, legal compliance having been waived by the creditor.

The question which was first suggested resolves itself into this: Is a discharge, by performance of the terms of a bankruptcy composition, a discharge by operation of law, or is it a voluntary discharge from the debt which was due to a creditor who had expressly assented to the resolution of composition? The resolution to accept a composition, and the proceedings which result in an assent by the requisite number of creditors, and in the recording of the resolution by order of court, are proceedings in bankruptcy. They are a method of dividing the estate of the bankrupt among his creditors under the control of a court of bankruptcy. Payment under a composition is one mode of distribution; payment of dividends by an assignee is another mode. Theoretically, each mode divides the whole estate. A discharge by virtue of payment of the amount specified in the resolution of composition is confessedly a compulsory discharge as to the non-assenting creditor. The discharge is in a certain sense a voluntary act of an assenting creditor, because it is in his power to give or withhold his assent. Assent is a matter of his own election, and if the requisite number of creditors do not assent, the resolution has no effect. But the discharge is also by operation of law as to the assenting creditor, because the entire proceeding is a part of bankruptcy proceedings instituted under authority of a court, and this particular method of division of the bankrupt assets has no validity unless the court is satisfied that the proposition is for the interest of the creditors. The assent of the creditors is a means of ascertaining the fairness and propriety of the proposed division. The proceeding is not a composition inter partes, in which proceeding each creditor can make his assent or dissent final as to himself, but is a statutory composition wherein the assent only of a specified number is required, subject to a subsequent decree of court. The composition is as to the assenting creditor both a voluntary act and an act of the law, but its efficiency is derived from the compulsory power of the law. The differences are radical between the nature of a composition inter partes and of a bankruptcy composition. The root of their differences is the fact that the entire proceedings for and in a bankruptcy composition are proceedings in bankruptcy, and are a part of a system for the compulsory division of assets which is administered by a court, while a composition inter partes derives its validity merely from the will of the parties. These differences induced the supreme court of Massachusetts to declare recently that the proceedings for a composition under the statute "differ wholly in nature and effect from a voluntary composition which binds only those executing it." Guild v. Butler, Oct., 1877 [122 Mass. 498]. That a discharge by virtue of compliance with the terms of a bankruptcy composition is a discharge by operation of law, is indicated by the effect of such a discharge upon sureties or indorsers of the debtor under the corresponding section of the English act of bankruptcy.

Proceedings under the 126th section of the

English bankruptcy act of 1869 are substantially similar in character to proceedings under the section of our bankrupt act in regard to composition. A discharge of the principal debtor by virtue of an executed agreement inter partes is a discharge of his surety, unless such result is expressly avoided by the terms of the agreement of composition, but a discharge of the principal debtor by virtue of a composition under the 126th section of the English act is, after some hesitancy on the part of courts, and after a contrary decision, now clearly held not to be a discharge of the surety, although the creditor had expressly assented to the terms of the resolution. Ex parte Jacobs, 10 Ch. App. 211, overruling Wilson v. Lloyd, L. R. 16 Eq. 60. In the case of Megrath v. Gray, L. R. 9 C. P. 216, the same result was reached. The court of common pleas placed their decision upon the ground that it is a universal rule in bankruptcy law that the discharge of an insolvent debtor does not discharge his solvent co-debtor, and that this principle has always been recognized in English bankruptcy acts since the declaratory act in 10 Anne, and was again expressly incorporated in section 50 of the act of 1869, and that the discharge mentioned in section 50 applies also to a discharge which may be obtained as a result of the proceedings under section 126. In Ex parte Jacobs the court took a somewhat broader view of the subject. It stated the question as follows: "There can be no doubt that, if the holder of a bill, by becoming party to a deed or agreement, independently of the bankrupt act, agrees to accept a composition from the acceptor, he thereby discharges the drawer; but, on the other hand, it is equally clear that if the acceptor is discharged from his liability by operation of law by becoming a bankrupt, the liability of the drawer to the holder is not thereby affected. We have now to consider whether the discharge of the acceptor under the 125th and 126th sections of the bankruptcy acts of 1869, where the holder of the bill votes in favor of the liquidation or composition, is to be considered a discharge by the voluntary act of the holder, or a discharge by operation of law." The reasons which influenced the court were, first, that in a composition inter partes the discharge is the act of the creditor alone, whereas in a bankruptcy composition the proper majority have power to assent to the terms, whether the particular creditor chooses to attend or not, or chooses to vote or not; and, secondly, the injurious results of the doctrine that an assenting creditor was discharging his surety. "The consequences of holding that the holder could not vote without discharging the drawer would be, that in many cases a great number, and in some cases the majority, could not vote."

I have been pressed towards a conclusion that the discharge should be deemed to be the voluntary act of the assenting creditor by the fear that the contrary doctrine would open a door to fraud, and that a bankrupt would be enabled to obtain easily the requisite majority of his creditors, and then, disregarding forthwith the terms of the resolution, would give notes to the favored few, and thus revive his debts to the disadvantage of subsequent creditors, while he is also guilty of a breach of faith towards the unfavored majority. But a consideration of the character and nature of bankruptcy composition leads to the conclusion that while this improper course of conduct is possible and practicable, it is one which is permitted by the present terms of the bankrupt act.

The assignee also claimed that the case showed that M. M. Merriman's estate was deeply insolvent, which was not denied, and that the bulk of the debts were incurred after the first bankruptcy for goods which went into the new business, that the bankrupt obtained credit upon the faith of his discharge by virtue of his composition and in the belief that his old debts were cancelled, and that the goods which were then sold form the bulk of the assets of the estate. From these facts the assignee insists that an equity has arisen that payment of a dividend upon the revived debts should be postponed until the new debts have been fully paid.

If the conclusions which have heretofore been indicated are correct, each class of debts is alike legally due, and no express lien in favor of any one class of creditors has attached to the fund in the hands of the assignee. Section 4972 declares that "the jurisdiction conferred upon the district courts as courts of bankruptcy shall extend: * * * Fourth. To the adjustment of the various priorities and conflicting interests of all parties. Fifth. To the marshalling and disposition of the different funds and assets, so as to secure the rights of all parties and due distribution of the assets among all the creditors." I am of the opinion that these clauses confer upon the district court power only to marshal assets according to priorities and rights which have been created or established by the act itself, or have been created by liens which have been placed upon the assets by the act of one of the parties or by operation of law, and that it is not in the power of the court to discriminate between different classes of debts of the same legal character, although as matter of morals or of honor one class of debts should not have been incurred. The application to expunge the claim of the bank is denied.

[Ejectment by Charles Merriman against E. W. Bourne and others.]

Patterson, Wallace & Stowe, for plaintiff.
L. B. Crockett, for defendants.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and HOFFMAN, District Judge.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The only facts necessary to be noticed under the views we have adopted with regard to this case are the following: On the 15th April, 1847, S. E. Woodworth obtained from Edwin Bryant, alcalde of San Francisco, a grant for the 100-vara lot known as No. 22, and which embraces the premises in controversy. Shortly after receiving this grant he appears to have taken possession of the lot and enclosed it with a fence, which remained for some months, but which in 1849 had either fallen down or been removed by parties who entered on the premises, claiming under a grant made to one Fulton by Colton, a justice of the peace. Woodworth thereupon brought ejectment in the court of first instance, and having recovered judgment, ejected the persons who had taken possession of the lot. An appeal having been taken to the supreme court, the judgment was reversed, and a writ of restitution was awarded to restore the defendants in that suit to the possession of the premises from which they had been ejected under the writ of possession. From the report of the case (1 Cal. 295) it appears that the plaintiff claimed to recover, first, on his grant as constituting a perfect title to the lot, and secondly, on a possession prior to the entry of the defendant. The court held, first, that the grant by the alcalde was void and insufficient to give even color of title, and, second, that the prior possession as shown by the evidence was too loose, indefinite and equivocal to authorize a recovery against a defendant who had entered peaceably and without fraud. From the date of the writ of restitution awarded under this judgment up to 1853, the lot, or a large portion of it, appears to have been in the possession of parties claiming under Fulton, but in 1853, F. A. Woodworth, to whom Selim E. Woodworth had conveyed the land, instituted ejectments against the parties in possession, and in the course of the years 1853, 1854 and 1855, he succeeded in obtaining possession of the whole lot, which he still holds. In numerous instances the parties in possession were ejected under writs of possession issued in pursuance of judgments obtained in ejectment suits. In other cases, the persons being threatened with suits and desiring to avoid expense, and to have the privilege of removing these houses erected on the lot, consented to acknowledge the will of Woodworth, and to accept leases under him as his tenants.

The plaintiff in the present suit derives title from Fulton, one of the defendants in the former suit; and the defendant holds under F. A. Woodworth, the grantee of S. E. Woodworth. On the trial of the cause, the plaintiff offered in evidence, as showing color of title, a grant from Colton, justice of the peace, to Joseph F. Atwill, dated December 12, 1849, and a deed from Atwill to Fulton, dated February 11th, 1850. He also produced the record of the suit of Woodworth v. Fulton [1 Cal. 295], with the writ of restitution under which Fulton was restored to the possession. Testimony was also introduced tending to show a possession by Fulton prior to 1849; but the evidence was indefinite and unsatisfactory, and it was not urged by counsel as sufficient to constitute a ground of recovery. The defendant introduced and proved the alcalde's grant before alluded to, together with the records of the various ejectment suits in which he had recovered possession of different parcels of the land. He also proved the circumstances under which he had obtained possession of other portions of the lot without suit. To the introduction of the alcalde's grant the plaintiff's counsel objected on the ground that the decision in Woodworth v. Fulton was a final judgment involving and determining the invalidity of the grant relied on as a defence to this action; that this determination was, and is, not the only law of that case, but the law of that piece of property, and that the defendant Woodworth, and all claiming under him, are forever barred from setting up that title as against Fulton and his privies, and this notwithstanding that the case of Woodworth v. Fulton [supra] has been overruled, and alcalde grants similar to the one relied on in that case, have been subsequently adjudged to constitute valid titles. On these grounds the counsel for plaintiff contended, not only that the grant should not be received in evidence, but also that the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict.

We are clear that both these positions are untenable, conceding the law to be precisely as claimed by the plaintiff, and admitting that the judgment of the supreme court, declaring the alcalde grant to be wholly void, remains the law of the case and of this piece of property forever binding on Woodworth, and his representatives claiming under that title, it by no means follows that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. The judgment of the supreme court at most determined merely that the title relied on by Woodworth was invalid. It in no respect affirmed the validity of the title of the defendant in that suit. The case did not and could not have involved any inquiry into the validity of the Colton grant, under which the defendant claimed title. Had it done so, it is obvious that the court must have pronounced it to have been wholly void and insufficient to give color of title. Whatever effect, therefore, the judgment may have had as a bar to any future assertion by Woodworth, or his privies of any title under that grant, it could have no effect whatever as an affirmance of Fulton's rights under the Colton grant, nor to impart in that grant in his hands, even as against Woodworth, any validity as an independent source of title. Since that suit, Woodworth has, without force or fraud, or surprise, obtained possession of the lot in question; and his tenants are now sued by the grantee of Fulton. Conceding that Woodworth can claim nothing under his grant, he is, nevertheless, in possession of the land, and this plaintiff in ejectment, like any other, must recover on the strength of his own title. He has failed to show any prior possession, and the Colton grant produced by him is not pretended to possess any validity whatever as a source of title. Under these circumstances, it is clear to us that he must fail.

Secondly. But the title set up by the defendant is not the same title as that passed upon by the supreme court in Woodworth v. Fulton. It of course will not be contended that the judgment in that suit operates as a bar to the assertion by Woodworth of any subsequently acquired title to the premises in controversy. Assuming then, that the decision of the supreme court was not only the law of the case, but was in all respects correct, and that a grant by an alcalde possessed per se, no validity whatever, the subsequent action by the legislature of this state and by congress in respect to this class of titles has imparted to them unquestionable validity. In the act of the legislature of California, passed March 11th, 1858 [Laws 1858, p. 56], the provisions of the ordinance of the common council of this city, No. 822, passed June 20th, 1855, are recited. In section 2d of this ordinance it is provided that "all persons who hold grants to lots of land lying east of Larkin street and northeast of Johnson street, made by any ayuntamiento, town council, or alcalde of said pueblo, since 1846, and before the incorporation of the city of San Francisco by the state of California; and which grant, or the material portion thereof, was registered or recorded in a proper book of record deposited in the office, or custody, or control, of the recorder of San Francisco on or before the 3d day of April, 1850, * * * shall, for all purposes contemplated in this ordinance, be deemed to be the possessors of the land so granted; although the said lands may be in the actual occupancy of persons holding the same adversely to the said grantees." The second section of the act above cited provides that "the grant of relinquishment of title, made by the said city in favor of the several possessors, by sections 2 and 3 of the ordinance just above recited, shall take effect as fully and completely for the purpose of transferring the city's interest, and for all other purposes whatever, as if deeds of release and quit-claim had been duly executed and delivered to and in favor of them individually and by name; and no further conveyance or other act shall be necessary to invest said possessors with all the interests, rights, title, benefits and advantages, which the said order and ordinances intend or purport to transfer and convey according to the true intent and meaning thereof." By the 5th section of the act of congress of July 1st, 1864 [13 Stat. 333], it is provided that "all the right and title of the United States to the lands within the corporate limits of the city of San Francisco, as defined in the act incorporating said city, passed by the legislature of the state of California on the 15th April, 1851 [Laws 1850–53, p. 944], are hereby relinquished and granted to said city, and its successors, for the uses and purposes specified in the ordinances of said city, ratified by an act of the legislature of the said state, approved on the 11th of March, 1858 [Laws 1858, p. 52], entitled 'An act concerning the city of San Francisco and to ratify and confirm certain ordinances of the common council of said city,' there being excepted from this relinquishment and grant all sites or other parcels of land which have been and now are occupied by the United States for military, naval or other uses," etc., etc. It is not disputed that the grant under which the defendant claims falls within the class mentioned in the second section of the ordinance No. 822. This ordinance, by the express terms of the act of March 11, 1858, operates as a full and complete grant of relinquishment of the title of the city, in favor of the persons therein described; and congress has, by the act above cited, granted and relinquished to the city for the uses and purposes mentioned in said ordinance, and in the act ratifying it, all the right and title of the United States. Whatever, therefore, may have been the invalidity, or even nullity of the grant under which the defendant claims, at the time the judgment in Woodworth v. Fulton was rendered, it has since become a valid and indefeasible title by the grant and relinquishment of title, to him, by the city, by the state of California, and by the United States. The title he now sets up is thus radically different from that relied on in his former suit, and no judgment in that suit declaring the grant to be invalid, can estop from asserting in this suit his subsequently acquired title derived from any source from which the title could flow, viz.: from the city, from the state, and from the congress of the United States. Judgment must therefore be entered for defendant.

MERRIMAN v. The MAY QUEEN.

[Newb. 464.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Louisiana. April, 1854.

CARRIERS—DAMAGE TO GOODS—PRIMA FACIE LIABILITY—NOTICE LIMITING—AGREEMENT—SHIPPER—GROSS NEGLIGENCE.

1. When loss or damage happens to goods while in the possession of a common carrier, the onus probandi is on the carrier to exempt himself from liability; for prima facie the law imposes upon him the obligation of safety.

2. In cases where the carrier has given notices qualifying or limiting his liability, the burden of proof of negligence is on the shipper, not of diligence on the carrier. This is contrary to the general rule where there is no notice.

3. A common carrier may qualify his liability by a general notice to all, of any reasonable requisition to be observed, as to the manner of delivery, entry of parcels, information of contents, rates of freight, and the like.

4. A common carrier cannot, by a general notice, limit, restrict or avoid the liability devolved on him by the common law, or the salutary grounds of public policy.

5. A common carrier's liability may be limited or restricted by an express agreement between the parties; but he cannot do so by any act of his own. It requires the assent of the parties concerned; and this is not to be inferred or implied from a general notice to the public; nor is it to depend upon doubtful or conflicting evidence, but it should be specific and certain, leaving no room for controversy between the parties.

6. Where a bill of lading had stamped upon it "Goods to be receipted for on the levee—not responsible for rust, breakage, leakage, cooperage —weight and contents unknown," and the witness who received the goods stated "that the vessel would not be responsible for breakage," this is not such a certain and specific contract as is required to free the carrier from liability.

7. Where an individual residing in Philadelphia was employed by a firm in Memphis, Tennessee, to construct glass cases, and from abundant caution superintended their shipment, he is in no legal or just sense the shipper, nor could he bind the owner by any contract he might enter into of so important a character as would exempt the vessel from the usual and well established responsibilities of a common carrier.

8. But even if an express agreement has been entered into, limiting the responsibility of the carrier, such a contract could not be pleaded as an exemption from liability for any loss or damage resulting from gross negligence or misfeasance of the master or his servants.

[Cited in Steele v. Townsend, 37 Ala. 247.]

9. Where the officers of a vessel knew perfectly well the contents of certain boxes to be glass cases, a failure to observe every precaution necessary to insure their safe stowage and safe delivery must be held gross negligence.

10. A protest cannot be received in our courts as evidence for the master or owner, but may be evidence against him and them.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

Clarke & Bayne, for libelants.
Durant & Hornor, for respondent.

McCALEB, District Judge. The libelant has instituted this action in rem to recover the damages sustained by him in consequence of the failure on the part of the officers of the brig to deliver, in the like good order in which they were received on board, four glass counter cases, which were shipped by J. E. Caldwell & Co., in the port of Philadelphia, to be delivered to Wright, Williams & Co., at this port. The shipment was made on the 9th of August last, as appears by the bill of lading. There were five cases put on board the brig, and one, only, was delivered in good order. The other four were found, immediately after they were taken from the vessel and placed upon the levee, to be broken in pieces and utterly worthless. The libel alleges this breakage to have been caused by the careless, negligent and improper manner in which said cases were stowed and handled by the officers and crew of the brig. The answer of the respondents denies the allegations of negligence and carelessness, and avers that the brig was not accountable for breakage, and that the contents of the boxes in which the cases were placed were unknown: that they have delivered to the consignees, Wright, Williams & Co., the boxes of cases in the same good order and condition in which they received them on board their vessel: that the outward appearance of the cases of packages was, in all respects, as clean, fresh and new as when they were put on board the May Queen, in the port of Philadelphia. The answer further avers, that the vessel encountered heavy weather on her passage from Philadelphia to New Orleans. On the bill of lading annexed to the libel is stamped the following words: "Goods to be receipted for on the levee; not accountable for rust, breakage, leakage, cooperage; weight and contents unknown." It is upon these words, thus stamped upon the bill of lading, that the proctor of respondents has relied to show such a limitation of responsibility on the part of the vessel as should exempt her from all responsibility for the loss sustained by the breaking of the cases in question.

The issue raised by the pleadings must be determined by the evidence, and by the law applicable to such a case as that evidence presents. And let us first examine the evidence taken under a commission, in the city of Philadelphia, where the cases were shipped.

The witness Beal states that he is a member of the firm of Beal & Forman, who were employed by J. E. Caldwell & Co. to make the five show cases in question. They were made and finished in good order, in every respect. The glass was from a quarter of an inch to three-eighths in thickness, and was of the best quality English plate glass. The cases were packed on Monday, the 8th of August, and shipped on Tuesday, the 9th. They were packed and shipped in five boxes, each case in a box by itself. The boxes were made by witness' firm, expressly for the cases. The witness himself assisted in packing them. He and three others were engaged in packing them, and they were employed until 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon. The wooden or bottom part of the cases were respectively secured fast to the boxes. The glass was then covered with paper, to prevent the straw from scratching the glass, and the German silver mounting, and the sides were then covered and filled in, the straw packed in closely, but not so tight as to cause any pressure. The straw was not packed so as to strain in any place, for the cases were screwed tight, and could not move. The tops were screwed on. The top and bottom were of inch stuff. The witness marked all the boxes himself. He believes they were marked "C. J. Merriman, care of Wright, Williams & Co., New Orleans." Also, in very large letters, on the lid of the boxes, respectively, was "Glass case;" and he thinks, "With care." On the edge of the boxes was written "This side up," or "This edge up." The witness did not deliver the boxes, but his partner did. The cases were so packed that unless they had been jarred or banged in some manner, they could not have been broken. The witness Forman corroborates all that was stated by his partner, in reference to the packing the cases and directing the boxes, and further testifies that he aided in putting the boxes on board the brig. He declared that he engaged four men who were working for the brig, to assist him in placing them in the vessel, and he saw them swung up by a tackle and lowered down between decks. They were placed between the two masts. He went down himself to see that they were handled carefully. They were handled carefully, but they were not finally stowed away when he left them; for the man who was stowing, said that he could not stow them away properly, until he got other goods to stow with them. The clerk, the captain and the mate were there, and he told them of the contents of the boxes, and that if roughly handled, they would be broken. The mate said that he would have the superintending of the taking them out, and that he would see that they were handled carefully. The witness asked particularly if there was any danger of the goods shifting in the vessel at sea. They (the captain and mate) replied there was not. The bill of lading was procured by Caldwell & Co., and the witness never saw it. The evidence of this witness is in many essential particulars sustained by the testimony of Jackson, and the whole taken together leaves no doubt whatever upon my mind that the cases were well made, properly packed, and safely deposited on board the brig. The testimony of the men who aided in putting the boxes on board, has also been taken under a commission, and introduced in evidence by the respondents. It substantially agrees with that of Beal and Forman. The testimony of Pettit, who was engaged in receiving the cargo on board of the May Queen, does not contradict that of Beal and Forman, but proves another fact to which the witness Forman does not allude. It is, that he (Forman) was informed at the time cases were put on board, that the owners would not be responsible for breakage.

The important question to be determined is, does the stamp on the bill of lading, to which reference has already been made, taken in connection with the declarations made by Pettit to Forman, so far limit the responsibility of the vessel, as to exempt her from all liability for the loss? There is no direct evidence to show when or how the breakage was caused. I am, however, perfectly satisfied that it was not caused by any carelessness or want of skill on the part of the witness Forman, and those employed by him, in putting the cases on board, and placing them between decks. Up to the time when they were left by Forman, I am satisfied they were safe and sound. The breakage then, must have occurred after the shipment, and before the boxes were delivered to the consignees on the levee in this city. The testimony of the cartmen shows that the contents of the boxes were broken before they were received into the carts. They were therefore broken while the boxes were in the care and custody of the officers of the vessel, or those employed by them. Whether the breakage was the result of the straining of the vessel, caused by the violence of the wind and waves, or of the carelessness or negligence with which the boxes were finally stowed, or in the handling them when they were delivered upon the wharf, are questions which can be settled by no direct evidence. And so far as the libelant is concerned, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to produce direct proof, if such should be required. The general rule of law is, that in all cases of loss, the onus probandi is on the carrier to exempt himself from liability; for prima facie, the law imposes upon him the obligation of safety. Story, Bailm. § 529. In cases where notices are given by the common carrier for the purpose of qualifying or limiting his responsibility, the burden of proof of negligence is on the party who sends the goods, and not of due diligence on the part of the carrier; which is contrary to the general rule in cases of carriers, where there is no notice. Story, Bailm. § 573. It is now well settled, that a common carrier may qualify his liability, by a general notice to all who may employ him, of any reasonable requisition to be observed on their part, in regard to the manner of delivery and entry of parcels, and the information to be given to him of their contents, the rates of freight and the like; as, for example, that he will not be responsible for goods above the value of a certain sum, unless they are entered as such, and paid for accordingly. But the right of a common carrier, by a general notice, to limit, restrict or avoid the liability devolved on him by the common law, on the most salutary grounds of public policy, has been denied in American courts, after the most elaborate consideration; and therefore a public notice by stage coach proprietors, that "all baggage was at the risk of the owners," though the notice was brought home to the plaintiff, has been held not to release them from their liability as common carriers. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 215.

But it is contended on behalf of the respondents, that the common law liability of the carrier, has been in this case limited or qualified by an express agreement. The question has often been made, whether it is competent for the carrier to restrict his obligation even by a special agreement. It was very fully considered in the case of Gould v. Hill, 2 Hill, 623, and the conclusion arrived at that he could not. See, also, Hollister v. Nowlen, 19 Wend. 240, and Cole v. Goodwin, Id. 272, 282. The supreme court of the United States, however, in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, held that as the extraordinary duties annexed to his employment, concern only, in the particular instance, the parties to the transaction, involving simply rights of property, the safe custody and delivery of the goods, no well founded objection to the restriction could be perceived, or any stronger reasons forbidding it than exist in the case of any other insurer of goods, to which his obligation is analogous; and which depends altogether upon the contract between the parties. The owner, by entering into the contract, virtually agrees, that, in respect to the particular transaction, the carrier is not to be regarded as in the exercise of his public employment; but as a private person who incurs no responsibility beyond that of an ordinary bailee for hire, and answerable only for misconduct or negligence. The right thus to restrict the obligation, is admitted in a large class of cases, founded on bills of lading and charter parties, where the exception to the common law liability (other than that of inevitable accident), has been from time to time enlarged, and the risk diminished by the express stipulation of the parties. The right of the carrier thus to limit his liability by the shipment of goods, has never been doubted. But admitting the right thus to restrict his obligation, it by no means follows that he can do so by any act of his own. He is in the exercise of a sort of public office, and has public duties to perform, from which he should not be permitted to exonerate himself without the assent of the parties concerned. And this is not to be implied or inferred from a general notice to the public limiting his obligation, which may or may not be assented to. He is bound to receive and carry all the goods offered for transportation, subject to all the responsibilities incident to his employment, and is liable to an action in case of refusal. The supreme court of the United States, having expressed these views fully in the opinion referred to, further declare that "the burden of proof lies on the carrier, and nothing short of an express stipulation by parol, or in writing, should be permitted to discharge him from duties which the law has annexed to his employment. The exemption from these duties should not depend upon implication or inference, founded on doubtful or conflicting evidence; but should be specific and certain, having no room for controversy between the parties." The special agreement relied on in this case, arises from the stamp on the bill of lading, and the declarations made by the witness who received the boxes on board, that the vessel would not be responsible for breakage. In regard to the stamp referred to, I confess I cannot attach to it any importance. It seems to have been kept ready for a convenient resort, to limit or qualify the obligations of the ship owner without any notice to the shippers. There is no evidence that the latter in this instance, assented to the limitations of the liability of the former, which it has been attempted to create, by means of this stamp. I am by no means convinced from such evidence, that there has been "such a certain and specific contract between the parties as leaves no room for controversy." The evidence in the cause shows, moreover, that the stamp is false in point of fact. It was not true that the contents of the boxes were unknown. The witness Forman, who put the boxes on board, states, that "the clerk, the captain and the mate were there, and that he told them of the contents of the boxes, and that if roughly handled, they would be broken. The mate replied that he would have the superintending of the taking them out, and that he would see that they were handled carefully. The witness asked particularly if there was any danger of the goods shifting in the vessel at sea. They, the captain and mate, replied, there was not."

But it is urged on behalf of the respondents, that the person who was engaged in receiving cargo on board the May Queen, expressly stated to the witness Forman, that the vessel would not be responsible for breakage. This witness it will be remembered, was the maker of the cases which are the subject of litigation, and from abundant caution, superintended their shipment; but in no just legal sense can he be regarded in the light of the shipper. The consignors and shippers acting for the owner of the cases residing in Memphis, Tennessee, were Caldwell & Co.; and I am aware of no principle of law which will hold them bound by the stipulations of a contract, to which there is no proof they ever assented. It is not shown that Forman had any authority to make on their behalf, a special agreement of so important a character as would exempt the vessel from the usual and well established responsibilities of a common carrier. It does not appear that the witness assented at all to the declaration on the part of the person who was receiving the cargo; it is perfectly clear that he did not assume authority to make a contract binding upon the shippers; and the court is therefore bound to say that the exemption from liability claimed for this vessel, has been made to depend upon implication or inference founded on doubtful or conflicting evidence; and that it is not of that specific and certain character, which according to the decision of the supreme court of the United States, already referred to, should leave no room for controversy between the parties. But even if we admit that there was a special agreement in this case between the shippers and the owners, by which the liability of the vessel as a common carrier was limited, it has never been held that such a contract could be pleaded as an exemption from responsibility for any loss or damage resulting for gross negligence or misfeasance in the master or his servants. 2 Kent, Comm. 607; Story, Bailm. § 558. It has been satisfactorily shown that these cases were put on board with great care under the superintendence of the witness Forman, and that they were left safe and in good order by him in the custody of the officers of the vessel. If they have not been delivered in like good order and condition, the conclusion is irresistible that the care and caution which were observed in putting them on board, were wanting on the part of those employed in unlading and placing them on the levee. The officers of the vessel knew perfectly well the contents of the boxes, and a failure on their part to observe every precaution necessary to insure their safe delivery, must be regarded as such gross negligence as subjects the vessel to the usual liability for the loss by breakage. The same conclusion must necessarily follow, if after they were left by Forman, they were finally stowed in such a manner as to render them liable to be jostled against other articles by the motion of the vessel.

The proctor for the respondents has relied upon a protest which was made by the second mate of the May Queen, and which was not afterwards extended in consequence of the death of the master, to show that the breakage may have been caused by the perils of the sea. Even if the protest could be received as conclusive evidence of all the facts it contains, there is no fact stated in it, which would justify the court in saying that the damage complained of was caused by the winds and waves, or by any other cause absolutely beyond the control of the officers of the vessel. Such a conclusion would be a mere presumption or inference from a general statement, that at certain intervals of the voyage the vessel experienced hard rain squalls which caused the vessel to labor hard. But whether these squalls actually produced the damage alleged to have been sustained in this case, must be left to conjecture only.

But I am satisfied that his protest cannot be received as evidence to establish the facts for which it was introduced. As a general rule it is difficult to perceive upon what ground such ex parte statements as are contained in protests, can be admitted to determine a controversy between the vessel and the shippers. The latter, having, as in this case, no opportunity of cross-examining the persons who make the statements, can rarely be prepared to counteract the effect which such statements, if admitted, would be calculated to produce. If such evidence could be permitted to prevail in a case like this, the shippers of cargo would be placed at the mercy of those who navigate the vessels upon the high seas, and who by their usually extravagant descriptions of the storms and tempests they encounter, would have it in their power to cause every case of damage involving a doubt, to be ascribed to the perils of the sea. "In a seaman's protest," says Judge Hopkinson in the case of Hand v. The Elvira [Case No. 6,015], "the waves are always mountain high, the winds never less than a hurricane, and the peril of life generally impending. There may be some pride of authorship in these compositions, and the writer may aim to exhibit his power and skill in describing dangers." In the case of The Betsey Caines, 2 Hagg. Adm. 28, the protest by the master attested by two of his seamen, was offered as evidence. It was objected to as quite inadmissible upon the ground that it was res inter alios acta; and Lord Stowell said: "I should be unwilling to allow a protest to be introduced that has been properly described as res inter alios acta. I therefore reject the protest and the article that pleads it." But I consider the authority of Abb. Shipp. 466, as conclusive on this point. "The protest," says that authority, "is a declaration or narrative by the master, of the particulars of the voyage, of the storms or bad weather which the vessels may have encountered, the accidents which may have occurred, and the conduct, in cases of emergency he had thought proper to pursue. With whatever formalities drawn up, it cannot be received in our courts as evidence for the master or his owners; but it may be evidence against him and them, and he should take care to supply from the log-book, his own recollection and that of the mate, or trustworthy mariners, true and faithful instructions for its preparation."

After an attentive examination of the law and evidence in this case, I am satisfied that the libelant is entitled to recover the damage he has sustained in consequence of the breakage complained of; and it is therefore ordered that there be judgment in his favor against the brig May Queen, for the sum of five hundred and sixty dollars, with five per cent. interest from the 17th of October, 1853, and the costs of suit.

MERRITT et al. v. BREWER.

[4 Am. Law J. (N. S.) 334; 14 Law Rep. 452; 25 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 594.]

SHIPPING—AUTHORITY OF MASTER TO BIND OWNER—EVIDENCE—LIEN.

The libellants [William H. Merritt & Co.] supplied a ship belonging to the state of Maine, and owned by the respondent [J. N. M. Brewer], with ship stores, &c., in this port, at various times, between July, 1849, and August, 1850, on the orders of her master. In June, 1850, the respondent paid the indebtedness then accrued for such supplies, to the amount of $409.30, and interest. The ship then being in this port, and fitting for a voyage to the East Indies, under the same master, the libellants, on the like order, furnished her stores and supplies for the voyage, and allege also that they shipped cargo on board. The master died at Manilla before the voyage was completed. The libellants proved, by the admissions of the master who succeeded him, that a portion of the libellants cargo was appropriated at Manilla to the necessities of the ship. They also proved, that, in addition to ship stores and other supplies furnished the ship in New York, they advanced to the master various sums in cash, whilst she was here fitting out.

Held, that the master had competent authority in law to charge the ship or owner for such supplies, and that it was not necessary for the libellants to prove they were absolutely necessary for the ship, nor that they were actually placed on board. If they were such as were appropriated for the voyage, and were delivered pursuant to the order of the master, or in the usual mode of business, the owner was chargeable for them.

Held, that by paying the former credit to the master and ship, the respondent gave an implied authority to the master to contract the subsequent debt of the same character.

Held, that the declarations of the new master were incompetent evidence to charge the defendant on the claim of libellants for cargo shipped on board. They should proceed upon the bill of lading.

Held, that advances of cash to the master created no lien on the vessel and no liability of the owner, unless appropriated to her necessities, which the creditors must prove, as also the advance for insurance.

District Court, N. D. New York. Nov. 27, 1849.

COURTS—ADMIRALTY—MATERIAL MEN—SUIT IN PERSONAM.

[Under rule 12 prescribed by the supreme court in 1845, admiralty courts have no jurisdiction over suits in personam brought by material men to enforce payment of their claims.]

[Cited in Cunningham v. Hall, Case No. 3,481.]

[This was a proceeding by Jacob T. Merritt and others against Edward Sackett and George Sackett for the value of supplies furnished the defendants for the schooners Arkansas and Alabama.]

CONKLING, District Judge. This is an action in personam, on the admiralty side of the court, instituted under the act of congress of February 26, 1845 [5 Stat. 726], conferring a quasi admiralty jurisdiction upon the district courts of the United States of certain cases arising out of the commerce and navigation of the lakes. The suit is for the value of certain articles of ship chandlery sold by the libellants, who are dealers in such articles, having their place of business in the city of New York, to the defendants, resident at Sacketts Harbor, in this district, alleged to have been designed for use, by the defendants, in the completion and fitting out of the schooners Arkansas and Alabama, at the latter place. A warrant of arrest having been issued and returned executed, it is now, on the return day of the process, objected, in behalf of the defendant, that the court has no jurisdiction of the case, and that the defendant ought therefore to be discharged from arrest, and the libel dismissed. The objection is founded on the domestic character of the vessel, and I am the more anxious explicitly to state the grounds of the conclusion at which I have arrived, because it was at variance with what was said by me some months ago, when called on to decide the admission of a libel of the like nature with this. My answer in that case to the application of the proctor for an order directing process to issue, was as follows: "Whether this suit is maintainable is a question which has not yet been directly decided by the supreme court. The admiralty jurisdiction of the American courts of suits in personam, by material men for labor, materials and supplies, in a home port, was however distinctly asserted by Mr. Justice Story in delivering the opinion of the court in the early case of The General Smith [4 Wheat. (17 U. S.) 438], and follows as a necessary consequence of the doctrines constantly asserted and acted upon by him in his circuit. The principle upon which he is well known to have uniformly insisted is, that the admiralty jurisdiction in personam extends to all maritime contracts; and the contract in question is clearly of that character,—whether in the case of a domestic or of a foreign vessel. It is upon this ground alone that the admiralty takes cognizance of liens in favor of material men, given by state laws, for repairs and supplies furnished in a home port. Several of the judges of the supreme court, in dissenting opinions, and at the circuit, have controverted this general principle; but it has been uniformly acquiesced in and repeatedly applied by the majority of the court, as it has been by several of the district courts. Under these circumstances, I do not feel at liberty to decline to take cognizance of suits in personam, in favor of material men in the cases of vessels embraced by the act of congress, although the services may have been rendered, or the materials or supplies furnished, at the place of the owner's residence."

In the foregoing review of the question, it will be seen, no reference is made to rule 12 of the rules prescribed by the supreme court of the United States, 1845, to regulate the practice of the courts of the United States, in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. In fact the rule was then altogether overlooked. It is as follows: "In all suits by material men, for supplies, or repairs, or other necessaries for a foreign ship, or for a ship in a foreign port, the libellant may proceed against the freight and ship in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam; and the like proceedings in rem shall apply in cases of domestic ships, where, by the local law, a lien is given to material men for supplies, repairs or other necessaries." The direct object of this rule was to prescribe, or declare, the various forms of remedy to which those known in admiralty jurisprudence as material men shall have a right to resort for the enforcement of their claims. It is one of a series of rules, by the others of which it is immediately followed, having the like objects in relation to other subjects of admiralty jurisdiction. The latter branch of the rule, authorizing a suit in rem, for supplies furnished to a domestic vessel, where by the local law a lien is given, may not necessarily require a construction which would exclude a farther remedy in personam, though there is strong color for such an interpretation, according to the legal maxim, "expressio unis exclusio est alterius." But these rules imply a consciousness, on the part of the judges of the supreme court, of the right, and, indeed, of the necessity, of exercising to some extent what savors strongly of discretionary authority, in determining the limits and conditions of this branch of the jurisdiction of the American courts; and no one who is familiar with the uncertainty and difficulty by which the subject, as left by the constitution and the judicial act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], was environed, and the discussions to which it has given rise, can fail to perceive the impossibility of excluding considerations of expediency altogether from the inquiry. This is a point of some importance in the present case, because, although the general principle has been incidentally asserted on several occasions by the supreme court, that all maritime contracts fall within the scope of the admiralty jurisdiction, (and the contracts of material men are reputed to be of this description), yet what was said in the case of The General Smith 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 438, as to the right of the material man to sue in personam, in the admiralty, was but an obiter dictum; and in the subsequent case of Ramsey v. Allegre, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 611, the court expressly waived any decision upon the question of this right, and one of the judges, in a very elaborate opinion, unequivocally denied its existence.

Under these circumstances, it seems not unreasonable to suppose that the supreme court thought proper, if not absolutely (by implication), to repudiate the remedy in personam in the case of domestic vessels, at least to reserve the question for future consideration. The contract of marine insurance is also, so far as I can discern, undeniably a maritime contract, and, as such, was very naturally held by the late Mr. Justice Story to be comprised within the admiralty jurisdiction of the courts of the United States. Still, in no instance is it believed, out of the First circuit, has a suit in the admiralty been maintained or instituted on this species of contract; and in the case of New Jersey Steam Nav. Co. v. Merchants' Bank of Boston, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344, the distinguished counsel for the libellant, though arguing in favor of a comprehensive admiralty jurisdiction, expressly disclaimed its existence in the case of marine insurance. In order, however, to justify this disclaimer, it became necessary for him to qualify the general principle above mentioned, affirming the admiralty jurisdiction over all contracts in their nature maritime, and virtually to limit it to these for the performance of maritime services.

But the principle thus restricted, would exclude material men, as well in the case of foreign as of domestic vessels, and also bottomry bonds, which have at all times been admitted to be within the admiralty jurisdiction, even in England. If, therefore, policies of insurance are to be excluded from the admiralty jurisdiction, the exception, so far as I am able to discern, will be purely arbitrary: and yet the impression seems to be generally entertained, that the supreme court is not likely, if the question should ever be brought before it for decision, to uphold the admiralty jurisdiction over this species of contract.

With respect to the remedies for materials or supplies furnished for a vessel in her home port, it is also to be observed, that it is only in virtue of the lien given by a state law that the admiralty jurisdiction is held to attach at all; and if the question has not already been determined, it might be worth while to consider, whether it would not be better to leave such liens to be enforced in the state tribunals alone. But the ground on which the established doctrine rests is, that while the lien given by the local law is to be regarded as in its nature maritime, and therefore fit to be enforced by admiralty process, yet that no lien is given by the general maritime law; the contract being but an ordinary personal transaction between the parties residing in the same place, and the exigencies of commerce not requiring that any lien should be implied. Would it be absurd, then, to hold the contract to be one with which the maritime law has no especial concern, and which therefore confers no right to resort to a maritime court for its enforcement?

Without pursuing the inquiry further, my conclusion is, that the omission in the rule above cited, of any mention of a remedy in personam in favor of material men in a home port, was made ex industria, and was designed to be significant. For this reason alone, therefore, I deem it more safe and discreet, for the present at least, to abstain from the exercise of this jurisdiction. There is another consideration also connected with the subject, which, under existing circumstances, is fitted to awaken additional caution in dealing with this question, and which might, perhaps not improperly, in some degree influence a decision upon the propriety of assuming a doubtful authority. To render the remedy in question more effective than a suit in common law in a state court, resort must be had to the process of arrest against the person of defendant; and it was doubtless in the hope of deriving superior advantage from the employment of this form of process, that the libellants have seen fit to come into this court at all. But imprisonment for debt by means of process issued from the state courts, having in this state been abolished by law, its continuance, through the process of the national courts, in cases of admiralty jurisdiction, is regarded with jealousy and distrust. In a recent case, the legality of such process from this court was denied, but was upheld by the court. And in the present case, as I am informed, a writ of habeas corpus has been sued out by the defendant, before one of the state judges, on the ground that the process of arrest was not warranted by law. Collision between the state and national authorities is always to be deeply regretted, and no enlightened and patriotic functionary can be insensible to the duty of carefully abstaining, as far as he can consistently with paramount obligations, from all acts likely to lead to so deplorable a result.

BONDS—TOWNSHIP—ACT OF LEGISLATURE—HOW PAYABLE—NEGOTIABILITY—DEFENCES.

1. The cases of Foster v. Callaway Co. [Case No. 4,967], and Sherrard v. Lafayette Co. [Id. 12,771], cited.

2. The bonds in suit, not being promises to pay money absolutely, are not negotiable, and are, therefore, open, in the hands of any holder, to defences which would have been available against the payee.

[Cited in Chaffee v. Rutland R. Co., 55 Vt. 123.]

3. A township bond containing a statement that "it is to be converted into a county bond" whenever a certain injunction shall be finally dissolved, and county bonds issued under the order enjoined, not being a promise to pay money absolutely, but a stipulation for bonds thereafter to be issued, is not negotiable in such a sense as to preclude the maker from defences, although it may be held by the plaintiff for value before due, and without actual notice of the maker's defences.

Action on township bonds issued under the act of March 23d, 1868. The cause was submitted to the court on agreed facts.

T. K. Skinker, for plaintiff.

Graves & Rathburn and T. C. Fletcher, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

KREKEL, District Judge. This suit is brought on coupons detached from Saline county bonds, issued in payment of a subscription of Marshall township, in Saline county, to the capital stock of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad. A vote was had under the so-called township act of March 23d, 1868, and the requisite two-thirds vote of those voting was given in favor of the subscription, on certain conditions embodied in the order of the county court. Saline county, as such, prior to the subscription of Marshall township, had made a county subscription of $400,000 to the same railroad. This last subscription had been attacked for illegality in the circuit court of Saline county, and such proceedings were had in the case as resulted in perpetually enjoining the issuing of the bonds. The ground mainly relied on in opposition to the issuing of the bonds was the unconstitutionality of the amendment of the charter of the said railroad company of March 24th, 1868.

The original charter of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, granted in 1859, and the several amendments thereto prior to the amendment of March 24th, 1868, authorized the company to build a road from Louisiana, on the Mississippi river, to any point on the Missouri river, and authorized the counties along the line of the road to subscribe stock thereto, without having the question of subscription submitted, as required by the constitution of 1865. By the amendment of March 24th, 1868, the railroad company sought to obtain the privilege of extending their road across the Missouri river, and, at the same time, to have the provision regarding subscribing without submission granted to the counties along the line of the extension on the south side of the Missouri river.

Acting under the supposition that these powers had been granted by the amendment, the company applied for and obtained the subscription of $400,000 of Saline county, the issuing of the bonds for which was enjoined. While the proceedings to enjoin were pending, the people of Marshall township, under the act of March 23d, 1868, petitioned the county court of Saline county to submit to the voters of Marshall township the question of subscribing $150,000 in aid of extending the road across the Missouri river, on the condition of building it to Marshall, the county seat of Saline county, and within Marshall township, and the further condition of establishing a depot within half a mile of the town of Marshall. Under this submission a vote was had, resulting in a two-thirds majority in favor of a subscription, and the bonds subscribed.

The constitutional power of the legislature of Missouri to grant powers such as are contained in the amendment of the charter of March 24th, 1868, as well as the negotiability of the bonds issued, are to be considered. Regarding the constitutionality of the amendment of March 24th, 1868, these questions were raised in the supreme court of Missouri, namely: The right to amend the original charter so as to extend the road across the Missouri river; secondly, the granting of the power to subscribe without submission; thirdly, the failing to recite in the title the subject embraced in the act.

Upon two of these questions the supreme court of Missouri has left us in doubt. On the question of the right to extend the road across the Missouri river, and the question of the title of the act, the judges were divided in opinion—the special judge called in deciding against the constitutionality of the amendment on both grounds, Judge Wagner, in a dissenting opinion, reaching an opposite conclusion, and the third judge expressing no opinion. As may be seen in the case of Foster v. Callaway Co. [Case No. 4,967], this court inclined to follow Judge Wagner's views on these questions. Upon the second question, "the granting of the power to subscribe without submission," all the judges agreed that the constitution of 1865 prohibited the legislature from granting such a power, and this court, in the case of Sherrard v. Lafayette Co. [Id. 12,771], followed that decision.

The so-called "Township Act" of March 23d, 1868, under the decision of State v. Linn County Court, 44 Mo. 504, and cases since, has been treated by this court as constitutional, the question of its constitutionality never having been directly raised; yet it must be confessed that the intimations in the Harshman v. Bates Co. case [Case No. 6,148] look to a different view. The doubt will soon be solved, as in some of the cases now pending before the supreme court of the United States the question is directly made.

Assuming the so-called "Township Act," of March 23d, 1868, to be constitutional, and the grant of power to extend the railroad across the Missouri river by the amendment of the charter of the company by the act of March 24th, 1868, as within legislative authority, we would hold bonds, so far as these questions are concerned, in conformity to decision rendered by this court prior to the decision of the Harshman v. Bates Co. case [supra]. If the views expressed in the latter case shall be maintained, they would control this case. The question of negotiability and consequent notice remains to be considered.

The Marshall township bonds read as follows: "United States of America, State of Missouri. Saline County Bond. No. 3; Class 'A'; nine years; $100; interest ten per centum per annum. Know all men by these presents, that, on the 1st day of January, A. D. 1880, the county of Saline, in the state of Missouri, promises to pay to the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, or bearer, the sum of one hundred dollars, at the Bank of America, in the city and state of New York, together with interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum, payable at the said Bank of America on the 1st day of January of each year, on the presentation and delivery of the annexed coupons of interest as they severally become due. This bond is issued in part payment of a subscription of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars made by Marshall township to the capital stock of the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company, pursuant to an order of the county court of Saline county made on the 7th day of September, 1870, and is to be converted and exchanged for bonds of the county of Saline whenever the injunction now covering the subscription of four hundred thousand dollars made by the county court of said county on the 7th day of February, 1868, to said Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company shall be finally dissolved, and bonds issued under said order. In testimony whereof," etc.

The $400,000 of Saline county bonds referred to on the face of these Marshall township bonds were never issued, but their issue was enjoined, as stated. It would seem that the recital in the bond sued on, that it "is to be converted and exchanged for bonds of the county of Saline whenever the injunction now covering the subscription of $400,000 made by the county court of said county on the 7th day of February, 1868, to the Louisiana and Missouri River Railroad Company shall be finally dissolved, and bonds issued under said order," quite clearly expresses the intention of the parties. It is not a promise to pay money absolutely, but a stipulation for bonds thereafter to be issued. Nor does the promise to pay, the manner in which payment is to be made, or the form of the bond, militate against this view, for all of this may well have been set out as indicating the terms and conditions of the new bond thereafter to be issued.

The bonds not being negotiable, notice as to the conditions upon which they were issued attaches. And here we find, from the order of the county court of September 7th, 1870, recited in the bond, and the agreed statement of facts, that they were issued, among others, on the condition that the said road should be graded from the point of crossing the Missouri river to the town of Marshall, and that a permanent depot be established within half a mile of the town of Marshall. The presumption arising from the issuing of said bonds as to the compliance of the conditions on which they were issued is relied on as showing that they were properly issued; and this would be the case were the bonds negotiable and in the hands of innocent holders. The object in making the subscription and issuing the bonds was to aid in the construction of a railroad to the town of Marshall, the county seat of Saline county, and not the having some valueless work done thereon, not accomplishing the object. The building of the railroad, as shown by the agreed facts, has been abandoned, and thus the object of the subscription and the issuing of the bonds defeated. The consideration for which the bonds were issued having failed, the coupons thereof constitute no legal obligation to pay. Judgment is therefore rendered for defendant. Judgment accordingly.

[NOTE. Subsequently the validity of the county bonds was put in issue in the case of Pepper v. Saline County, Case No. 10,972. This case was heard upon demurrer to answer. The bonds were held not negotiable, and therefore subject to the equities set up by defense of noncompliance with conditons on which they were issued. The demurrer was overruled.]

MERRYFIELD et al. v. JONES.

[2 Curt. 306.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.

BONDS—FOR INJUNCTION—ACTION FOR DAMAGES—POWER OF COURT OF EQUITY.

A court of equity cannot order the complainant and his sureties on an injunction bond, to pay the damages sustained by reason of the injunction. The defendant must resort to an action on the bond.

[Cited in Spencer v. Sherwin, 86 Iowa, 120, 53 N. W. 86; City of St. Louis v. St. Louis Gaslight Co., 82 Mo. 350; Sturgis v. Knapp, 33 Vt. 522.]

R. H. Dana, Jr., in behalf of [Edwin] Jones, moved the court to refer to a master, the question, how much damage Jones had suffered by reason of temporary injunction, restraining him from using a machine alleged to be patented; and that the complainants [William J. Merryfield and others], and their sureties, in a bond, conditioned to pay to Jones any damages he might suffer by reason of that injunction, if finally determined not to be rightful, might be decreed to pay the same. And he showed that the bill had been dismissed, and the injunction dissolved.

The motion was resisted by Mr. Brigham, for complainants.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. It is not incident to the general powers of a court of equity to proceed against the principals and sureties on such a bond, and enforce payment of the damages secured by its condition, by a decree. It would be a convenient, and, perhaps, a proper power, to be conferred on the courts of the United States by congress. In Hiriart v. Ballon, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 156, it was held that by virtue of a rule of the state courts of Louisiana, adopted under the act of congress of May 26, 1824 (4 Stat. 62), by the circuit court of the United States, there might be a summary judgment against the principal and sureties in an appeal bond at law. The objection that a suit on a bond is, in its nature, a suit at the common law, and so that a right to a trial by jury is conferred by the seventh amendment of the constitution, seems not to have been overlooked in that case; though how far it was considered does not appear. If not determined, it is a grave question, Gwin v. Breedlove, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 29; Gwin v. Martin, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 7. But I do not find it necessary to consider it, in this case, because I am clearly of opinion, that aside from positive legislation, a court of equity does not afford a remedy on such bonds. It must be sought by an action at law. Bean v. Heath, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 168. Motion denied.

That the petitioner was arrested by the orders of the major-general commanding in Pennsylvania, upon the charge of treason, in being "publicly associated with and holding a commission as lieutenant in a company having in their possession arms belonging to the United States, and avowing his purpose of armed hostility against the government." 2. That he (the officer having the petitioner in custody) was duly authorized by the president of the United States, in such cases, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus for the public safety. Held, that the petitioner was entitled to be set at liberty and discharged immediately from confinement, upon the grounds following: 1. That the president, under the constitution of the United States, cannot suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, nor authorize a military officer to do it. 2. That a military officer has no right to arrest and detain a person not subject to the rules and articles of war, for an offence against the law of the United States, except in aid of the judicial authority, and subject to its control; and if the party be arrested by the military, it is the duty of the officer to deliver him over immediately to the civil authority, to be dealt with according to law.

[Approved in Re Kemp, 16 Wis. 367.]

Habeas corpus. On the 26th May 1861, the following sworn petition was presented to the chief justice of the United States, on behalf of John Merryman, then in confinement in Fort McHenry:

"To the Hon. Roger B. Taney, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States: The petition of John Merryman, of Baltimore county and state of Maryland, respectfully shows, that being at home, in his own domicile, he was, about the hour of two o'clock a. m., on the 25th day of May, A. D. 1861, aroused from his bed by an armed force pretending to act under military orders from some person to your petitioner unknown. That he was by said armed force, deprived of his liberty, by being taken into custody, and removed from his said home to Fort McHenry, near to the city of Baltimore, and in the district aforesaid, and where your petitioner now is in close custody. That he has been so imprisoned without any process or color of law whatsoever, and that none such is pretended by those who are thus detaining him; and that no warrant from any court, magistrate or other person having legal authority to issue the same exists to justify such arrest; but to the contrary, the same, as above stated, hath been done without color of law and in violation of the constitution and laws of the United States, of which he is a citizen. That since his arrest, he has been informed, that some order, purporting to come from one General Keim, of Pennsylvania, to this petitioner unknown, directing the arrest of the captain of some company in Baltimore county, of which company the petitioner never was and is not captain, was the pretended ground of his arrest, and is the sole ground, as he believes, on which he is now detained. That the person now so detaining him at said fort is Brigadier-General George Cadwalader, the military commander of said post, professing to act in the premises under or by color of the authority of the United States. Your petitioner, therefore, prays that the writ of habeas corpus may issue, to be directed to the said George Cadwalader, commanding him to produce your petitioner before you, judge as aforesaid, with the cause, if any, for his arrest and detention, to the end that your petitioner be discharged and restored to liberty, and as in duty, &c. John Merryman. Fort McHenry, 25th May 1861.

"United States of America, District of Maryland, to wit: Before the subscriber, a commissioner appointed by the circuit court of the United States, in and for the Fourth circuit and district of Maryland, to take affidavits, &c., personally appeared the 25th day of May, A. D. 1861, Geo. H. Williams, of the city of Baltimore and district aforesaid, and made oath on the Holy Evangely of Almighty God, that the matters and facts stated in the foregoing petition are true, to the best of his knowledge, information and belief; and that the said petition was signed in his presence by the petitioner, and would have been sworn to by him, said petitioner, but that he was, at the time, and still is, in close custody, and all access to him denied, except to his counsel and his brother-in-law—this deponent being one of said counsel. Sworn to before me, the 25th day of May, A. D. 1861. John Hanan, U. S. Commissioner.

"United States of America, District of Maryland, to wit: Before the subscriber, a commissioner appointed by the circuit court of the United States, in and for the Fourth circuit and district of Maryland, to take affidavits, &c., personally appeared this 26th day of May, 1861, George H. Williams, of the city of Baltimore and district aforesaid, and made oath on the Holy Evangely of Almighty God, that on the 26th day of May, he went to Fort McHenry, in the preceding affidavit mentioned, and obtained an interview with Gen. Geo. Cadwalader, then and there in command, and deponent, one of the counsel of said John Merryman, in the foregoing petition named, and at his request, and declaring himself to be such counsel, requested and demanded that he might be permitted to see the written papers, and to be permitted to make copies thereof, under and by which he, the said general, detained the said Merryman in custody, and that to said demand the said Gen. Cadwalader replied, that he would neither permit the deponent, though officially requesting and demanding, as such counsel, to read the said papers, nor to have or make copies thereof. Sworn to this 26th day of May, A. D. 1861, before me. John Hanan, U. S. Commissioner for Maryland."

Upon this petition the chief justice passed the following order:

"In the matter of the petition of John Merryman, for a writ of habeas corpus: Ordered, this 26th day of May, A. D. 1861, that the writ of habeas corpus issue in this case, as prayed, and that the same be directed to General George Cadwalader, and be issued in the usual form, by Thomas Spicer, clerk of the circuit court of the United States in and for the district of Maryland, and that the said writ of habeas corpus be returnable at eleven o'clock, on Monday, the 27th of May 1861, at the circuit court room, in the Masonic Hall, in the city of Baltimore, before me, chief justice of the supreme court of United States. R. B. Taney."

In obedience to this order, Mr. Spicer issued the following writ:

"District of Maryland, to wit: The United States of America, to General George Cadwalader, Greeting: You are hereby commanded to be and appear before the Honorable Roger B. Taney, chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, at the United States court-room, in the Masonic Hall, in the city of Baltimore, on Monday, the 27th day of May 1861, at eleven o'clock in the morning, and that you have with you the body of John Merryman, of Baltimore county, and now in your custody, and that you certify and make known the day and cause of the caption and detention of the said John Merryman, and that you then and there, do, submit to, and receive whatsoever the said chief justice shall determine upon concerning you on this behalf, according to law, and have you then and there this writ. Witness, the Honorable R. B. Taney, chief justice of our supreme court, &c. Thomas Spicer, Clerk. Issued 26th May 1861."

The marshal made return that he had served the writ on General Cadwalader, on the same day on which it issued; and filed that return on the 27th May 1861, on which day, at eleven o'clock precisely, the chief justice took his seat on the bench. In a few minutes, Colonel Lee, a military officer, appeared with General Cadwalader's return to the writ, which is as follows:

"Headquarters, Department of Annapolis, Fort McHenry, May 26 1861. To the Hon. Roger B. Taney, Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Baltimore, Md.—Sir: The undersigned, to whom the annexed writ, of this date, signed by Thomas Spicer, clerk of the supreme court of the United States, is directed, most respectfully states, that the arrest of Mr. John Merryman, in the said writ named, was not made with his knowledge, or by his order or direction, but was made by Col. Samuel Yohe, acting under the orders of Major-General William H. Keim, both of said officers being in the military service of the United States, but not within the limits of his command. The prisoner was brought to this post on the 20th inst., by Adjutant James Wittimore and Lieut. Wm. H. Abel, by order of Col. Yohe, and is charged with various acts of treason, and with being publicly associated with and holding a commission as lieutenant in a company having in their possession arms belonging to the United States, and avowing his purpose of armed hostility against the government. He is also informed that it can be clearly established, that the prisoner has made often and unreserved declarations of his association with this organized force, as being in avowed hostility to the government, and in readiness to co-operate with those engaged in the present rebellion against the government of the United States. He has further to inform you, that he is duly authorized by the president of the United States, in such cases, to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, for the public safety. This is a high and delicate trust, and it has been enjoined upon him that it should be executed with judgment and discretion, but he is nevertheless also instructed that in times of civil strife, errors, if any, should be on the side of the safety of the country. He most respectfully submits for your consideration, that those who should co-operate in the present trying and painful position in which our country is placed, should not, by any unnecessary want of confidence in each other, increase our embarrassments. He, therefore, respectfully requests that you will postpone further action upon this case, until he can receive instructions from the president of the United States, when you shall hear further from him. I have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient servant, George Cadwalader, Brevet Major-General U. S. A., Commanding."

The chief justice then inquired of the officer whether he had brought with him the body of John Merryman, and on being answered that he had no instructions but to deliver the return, the chief justice said: "General Cadwalader was commanded to produce the body of Mr. Merryman before me this morning, that the case might be heard, and the petitioner be either remanded to custody, or set at liberty, if held on insufficient grounds; but he has acted in disobedience to the writ, and I therefore direct that an attachment be at once issued against him, returnable before me here, at twelve o'clock to-morrow." The order was then passed as follows:

"Ordered, that an attachment forthwith issue against General George Cadwalader for a contempt, in refusing to produce the body of John Merryman, according to the command of the writ of habeas corpus, returnable and returned before me to-day, and that said attachment be returned before me at twelve o'clock to-morrow, at the room of the circuit court. R. B. Taney. Monday, May 27 1861."

The clerk issued the writ of attachment as directed. At twelve o'clock, on the 28th May 1861, the chief justice again took his seat on the bench, and called for the marshal's return to the writ of attachment. It was as follows:

"I hereby certify to the Honorable Roger B. Taney, chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, that by virtue of the within writ of attachment, to me directed, on the 27th day of May 1861, I proceeded, on this 28th day of May 1861, to Fort McHenry, for the purpose of serving the said writ. I sent in my name at the outer gate; the messenger returned with the reply, 'that there was no answer to my card,' and therefore, I could not serve the writ, as I was commanded. I was not permitted to enter the gate. So answers Washington Bonifant, U. S. Marshal for the District of Maryland."

After it was read, the chief justice said, that the marshal had the power to summon the posse comitatus to aid him in seizing and bringing before the court, the party named in the attachment, who would, when so brought in, be liable to punishment by fine and imprisonment; but where, as in this case, the power refusing obedience was so notoriously superior to any the marshal could command, he held that officer excused from doing anything more than he had done. The chief justice then proceeded as follows:

"I ordered this attachment yesterday, because, upon the face of the return, the detention of the prisoner was unlawful, upon the grounds: 1. That the president, under the constitution of the United States, cannot suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, nor authorize a military officer to do it. 2. A military officer has no right to arrest and detain a person not subject to the rules and articles of war, for an offence against the laws of the United States, except in aid of the judicial authority, and subject to its control; and if the party be arrested by the military, it is the duty of the officer to deliver him over immediately to the civil authority, to be dealt with according to law. It is, therefore, very clear that John Merryman, the petitioner, is entitled to be set at liberty and discharged immediately from imprisonment. I forbore yesterday to state orally the provisions of the constitution of the United States, which make those principles the fundamental law of the Union, because an oral statement might be misunderstood in some portions of it, and I shall therefore put my opinion in writing, and file it in the office of the clerk of the circuit court, in the course of this week."

He concluded by saying, that he should cause his opinion, when filed, and all the proceedings, to be laid before the president, in order that he might perform his constitutional duty, to enforce the laws, by securing obedience to the process of the United States.

TANEY, Circuit Justice. The application in this case for a writ of habeas corpus is made to me under the 14th section of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 81], which renders effectual for the citizen the constitutional privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. That act gives to the courts of the United States, as well as to each justice of the supreme court, and to every district judge, power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of an inquiry into the cause of commitment. The petition was presented to me, at Washington, under the impression that I would order the prisoner to be brought before me there, but as he was confined in Fort McHenry, in the city of Baltimore, which is in my circuit, I resolved to hear it in the latter city, as obedience to the writ, under such circumstances, would not withdraw General Cadwalader, who had him in charge, from the limits of his military command.

The petition presents the following case: The petitioner resides in Maryland, in Baltimore county; while peaceably in his own house, with his family, it was at two o'clock on the morning of the 25th of May 1861, entered by an armed force, professing to act under military orders; he was then compelled to rise from his bed, taken into custody, and conveyed to Fort McHenry, where he is imprisoned by the commanding officer, without warrant from any lawful authority.

The commander of the fort, General George Cadwalader, by whom he is detained in confinement, in his return to the writ, does not deny any of the facts alleged in the petition. He states that the prisoner was arrested by order of General Keim, of Pennsylvania, and conducted as aforesaid to Fort McHenry, by his order, and placed in his (General Cadwalader's) custody, to be there detained by him as a prisoner.

A copy of the warrant or order under which the prisoner was arrested was demanded by his counsel, and refused: and it is not alleged in the return, that any specific act, constituting any offence against the laws of the United States, has been charged against him upon oath, but he appears to have been arrested upon general charges of treason and rebellion, without proof, and without giving the names of the witnesses, or specifying the acts which, in the judgment of the military officer, constituted these crimes. Having the prisoner thus in custody upon these vague and unsupported accusations, he refuses to obey the writ of habeas corpus, upon the ground that he is duly authorized by the president to suspend it.

The case, then, is simply this: a military officer, residing in Pennsylvania, issues an order to arrest a citizen of Maryland, upon vague and indefinite charges, without any proof, so far as appears; under this order, his house is entered in the night, he is seized as a prisoner, and conveyed to Fort McHenry, and there kept in close confinement; and when a habeas corpus is served on the commanding officer, requiring him to produce the prisoner before a justice of the supreme court, in order that he may examine into the legality of the imprisonment, the answer of the officer, is that he is authorized by the president to suspend the writ of habeas corpus at his discretion, and in the exercise of that discretion, suspends it in this case, and on that ground refuses obedience to the writ.

As the case comes before me, therefore, I understand that the president not only claims the right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus himself, at his discretion, but to delegate that discretionary power to a military officer, and to leave it to him to determine whether he will or will not obey judicial process that may be served upon him. No official notice has been given to the courts of justice, or to the public, by proclamation or otherwise, that the president claimed this power, and had exercised it in the manner stated in the return. And I certainly listened to it with some surprise, for I had supposed it to be one of those points of constitutional law upon which there was no difference of opinion, and that it was admitted on all hands, that the privilege of the writ could not be suspended, except by act of congress.

When the conspiracy of which Aaron Burr was the head, became so formidable, and was so extensively ramified, as to justify, in Mr. Jefferson's opinion, the suspension of the writ, he claimed, on his part, no power to suspend it, but communicated his opinion to congress, with all the proofs in his possession, in order that congress might exercise its discretion upon the subject, and determine whether the public safety required it. And in the debate which took place upon the subject, no one suggested that Mr. Jefferson might exercise the power himself, if, in his opinion, the public safety demanded it.

Having, therefore, regarded the question as too plain and too well settled to be open to dispute, if the commanding officer had stated that, upon his own responsibility, and in the exercise of his own discretion, he refused obedience to the writ, I should have contented myself with referring to the clause in the constitution, and to the construction it received from every jurist and statesman of that day, when the case of Burr was before them. But being thus officially notified that the privilege of the writ has been suspended, under the orders, and by the authority of the president, and believing, as I do, that the president has exercised a power which he does not possess under the constitution, a proper respect for the high office he fills, requires me to state plainly and fully the grounds of my opinion, in order to show that I have not ventured to question the legality of his act, without a careful and deliberate examination of the whole subject.

The clause of the constitution, which authorizes the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, is in the 9th section of the first article. This article is devoted to the legislative department of the United States, and has not the slightest reference to the executive department. It begins by providing "that all legislative powers therein granted, shall be vested in a congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." And after prescribing the manner in which these two branches of the legislative department shall be chosen, it proceeds to enumerate specifically the legislative powers which it thereby grants [and legislative powers which it expressly prohibits];[2] and at the conclusion of this specification, a clause is inserted giving congress "the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The power of legislation granted by this latter clause is, by its words, carefully confined to the specific objects before enumerated. But as this limitation was unavoidably somewhat indefinite, it was deemed necessary to guard more effectually certain great cardinal principles, essential to the liberty of the citizen, and to the rights and equality of the states, by denying to congress, in express terms, any power of legislation over them. It was apprehended, it seems, that such legislation might be attempted, under the pretext that it was necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers granted; and it was determined, that there should be no room to doubt, where rights of such vital importance were concerned; and accordingly, this clause is immediately followed by an enumeration of certain subjects, to which the powers of legislation shall not extend. The great importance which the framers of the constitution attached to the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, to protect the liberty of the citizen, is proved by the fact, that its suspension, except in cases of invasion or rebellion, is first in the list of prohibited powers; and even in these cases the power is denied, and its exercise prohibited, unless the public safety shall require it.

It is true, that in the cases mentioned, congress is, of necessity, the judge of whether the public safety does or does not require it; and their judgment is conclusive. But the introduction of these words is a standing admonition to the legislative body of the danger of suspending it, and of the extreme caution they should exercise, before they give the government of the United States such power over the liberty of a citizen.

It is the second article of the constitution that provides for the organization of the executive department, enumerates the powers conferred on it, and prescribes its duties. And if the high power over the liberty of the citizen now claimed, was intended to be conferred on the president, it would undoubtedly be found in plain words in this article; but there is not a word in it that can furnish the slightest ground to justify the exercise of the power.

The article begins by declaring that the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America, to hold his office during the term of four years; and then proceeds to prescribe the mode of election, and to specify, in precise and plain words, the powers delegated to him, and the duties imposed upon him. The short term for which he is elected, and the narrow limits to which his power is confined, show the jealousy and appreliension of future danger which the framers of the constitution felt in relation to that department of the government, and how carefully they withheld from it many of the powers belonging to the executive branch of the English government which were considered as dangerous to the liberty of the subject; and conferred (and that in clear and specific terms) those powers only which were deemed essential to secure the successful operation of the government.

He is elected, as I have already said, for the brief term of four years, and is made personally responsible, by impeachment, for malfeasance in office; he is, from necessity, and the nature of his duties, the commander-in-chief of the army and navy, and of the militia, when called into actual service; but no appropriation for the support of the army can be made by congress for a longer term than two years, so that it is in the power of the succeeding house of representatives to withhold the appropriation for its support, and thus disband it, if, in their judgment, the president used, or designed to use it for improper purposes. And although the militia, when in actual service, is under his command, yet the appointment of the officers is reserved to the states, as a security against the use of the military power for purposes dangerous to the liberties of the people, or the rights of the states.

So too, his powers in relation to the civil duties and authority necessarily conferred on him are carefully restricted, as well as those belonging to his military character. He cannot appoint the ordinary officers of government, nor make a treaty with a foreign nation or Indian tribe, without the advice and consent of the senate, and cannot appoint even inferior officers, unless he is authorized by an act of congress to do so. He is not empowered to arrest any one charged with an offence against the United States, and whom he may, from the evidence before him, believe to be guilty; nor can he authorize any officer, civil or military, to exercise this power, for the fifth article of the amendments to the constitution expressly provides that no person "shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law" —that is, judicial process.

Even if the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus were suspended by act of congress, and a party not subject to the rules and articles of war were afterwards arrested and imprisoned by regular judicial process, he could not be detained in prison, or brought to trial before a military tribunal, for the article in the amendments to the constitution immediately following the one above referred to (that is, the sixth article) provides, that "in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence."

The only power, therefore, which the president possesses, where the "life, liberty or property" of a private citizen is concerned, is the power and duty prescribed in the third section of the second article, which requires "that he shall take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed." He is not authorized to execute them himself, or through agents or officers, civil or military, appointed by himself, but he is to take care that they be faithfully carried into execution, as they are expounded and adjudged by the co-ordinate branch of the government to which that duty is assigned by the constitution. It is thus made his duty to come in aid of the judicial authority, if it shall be resisted by a force too strong to be overcome without the assistance of the executive arm; but in exercising this power he acts in subordination to judicial authority, assisting it to execute its process and enforce its judgments.

With such provisions in the constitution, expressed in language too clear to be misunderstood by any one, I can see no ground whatever for supposing that the president, in any emergency, or in any state of things, can authorize the suspension of the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, or the arrest of a citizen, except in aid of the judicial power. He certainly does not faithfully execute the laws, if he takes upon himself legislative power, by suspending the writ of habeas corpus, and the judicial power also, by arresting and imprisoning a person without due process of law.

Nor can any argument be drawn from the nature of sovereignty, or the necessity of government, for self-defence in times of tumult and danger. The government of the United States is one of delegated and limited powers; it derives its existence and authority altogether from the constitution, and neither of its branches, executive, legislative or judicial, can exercise any of the powers of government beyond those specified and granted; for the tenth article of the amendments to the constitution, in express terms, provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states, respectively, or to the people."

Indeed, the security against imprisonment by executive authority, provided for in the fifth article of the amendments to the constitution, which I have before quoted, is nothing more than a copy of a like provision in the English constitution, which had been firmly established before the declaration of independence. Blackstone states it in the following words: "To make imprisonment lawful, it must be either by process of law from the courts of judicature, or by warrant from some legal officer having authority to commit to prison." 1 Bl. Comm. 137.

The people of the United Colonies, who had themselves lived under its protection, while they were British subjects, were well aware of the necessity of this safeguard for their personal liberty. And no one can believe that, in framing a government intended to guard still more efficiently the rights and liberties of the citizen, against executive encroachment and oppression, they would have conferred on the president a power which the history of England had proved to be dangerous and oppressive in the hands of the crown; and which the people of England had compelled it to surrender, after a long and obstinate struggle on the part of the English executive to usurp and retain it.

The right of the subject to the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, it must be recollected, was one of the great points in controversy, during the long struggle in England between arbitrary government and free institutions, and must therefore have strongly attracted the attention of the statesmen engaged in framing a new and, as they supposed, a freer government than the one which they had thrown off by the revolution. From the earliest history of the common law, if a person were imprisoned, no matter by what authority, he had a right to the writ of habeas corpus, to bring his case before the king's bench; if no specific offence were charged against him in the warrant of commitment, he was entitled to be forthwith discharged; and if an offence were charged which was bailable in its character, the court was bound to set him at liberty on bail. The most exciting contests between the crown and the people of England, from the time of Magna Charta, were in relation to the privilege of this writ, and they continued until the passage of the statute of 31 Car. II., commonly known as the great habeas corpus act.

This statute put an end to the struggle, and finally and firmly secured the liberty of the subject against the usurpation and oppression of the executive branch of the government. It nevertheless conferred no new right upon the subject, but only secured a right already existing; for, although the right could not justly be denied, there was often no effectual remedy against its violation. Until the statute of 13 Wm. III., the judges held their offices at the pleasure of the king, and the influence which he exercised over timid, time-serving and partisan judges, often induced them, upon some pretext or other, to refuse to discharge the party, although entitled by law to his discharge, or delayed their decision, from time to time, so as to prolong the imprisonment of persons who were obnoxious to the king for their political opinions, or had incurred his resentment in any other way.

The great and inestimable value of the habeas corpus act of the 31 Car. II. is, that it contains provisions which compel courts and judges, and all parties concerned, to perform their duties promptly, in the manner specified in the statute.

A passage in Blackstone's Commentaries, showing the ancient state of the law on this subject, and the abuses which were practised through the power and influence of the crown, and a short extract from Hallam's Constitutional History, stating the circumstances which gave rise to the passage of this statute, explain briefly, but fully, all that is material to this subject.

Blackstone says: "To assert an absolute exemption from imprisonment in all cases is inconsistent with every idea of law and political society, and in the end would destroy all civil liberty by rendering its protection impossible. But the glory of the English law consists in clearly defining the times, the causes and the extent, when, wherefore and to what degree, the imprisonment of the subject may be lawful. This it is which induces the absolute necessity of expressing upon every commitment the reason for which it is made, that the court, upon a habeas corpus, may examine into its validity, and according to the circumstances of the case, may discharge, admit to bail or remand the prisoner. And yet early in the reign of Charles I. the court of kings bench, relying on some arbitrary precedents (and those perhaps misunderstood) determined that they would not, upon a habeas corpus, either bail or deliver a prisoner, though committed without any cause assigned, in case he was committed by the special command of the king or by the lords of the privy council. This drew on a parliamentary inquiry, and produced the 'Petition of Right' (3 Car. I.) which recites this illegal judgment, and enacts that no freeman hereafter shall be so imprisoned or detained. But when, in the following year, Mr. Selden and others were committed by the lords of the council, in pursuance of his majesty's special command, under a general charge of 'notable contempts, and stirring up sedition against the king and the government,' the judges delayed for two terms (including also the long vacation) to deliver an opinion how far such a charge was bailable; and when at length they agreed that it was, they however annexed a condition of finding sureties for their good behavior, which still protracted their imprisonment, the chief justice, Sir Nicholas Hyde, at the same time, declaring that 'if they were again remanded for that cause, perhaps the court would not afterwards grant a habeas corpus, being already made acquainted with the cause of the imprisonment.' But this was heard with indignation and astonishment by every lawyer present, according to Mr. Selden's own account of the matter, whose resentment was not cooled at the distance of four and twenty years." 3 Bl. Comm. 133, 134.

It is worthy of remark, that the offences charged against the prisoner in this case, and relied on as a justification for his arrest and imprisonment, in their nature and character, and in the loose and vague manner in which they are stated, bear a striking resemblance to those assigned in the warrant for the arrest of Mr. Selden. And yet, even at that day, the warrant was regarded as such a flagrant violation of the rights of the subject that the delay of the time-serving judges to set him at liberty, upon the habeas corpus issued in his behalf, excited the universal indignation of the bar.

The extract from Hallam's Constitutional History is equally impressive and equally in point: "It is a very common mistake, and that not only among foreigners, but many from whom some knowledge of our constitutional laws might be expected, to suppose that this statute of Car. II. enlarged in a great degree our liberties, and forms a sort of epoch in their history. But though a very beneficial enactment, and eminently remedial in many cases of illegal imprisonment, it introduced no new principle, nor conferred any right upon the subject. From the earliest records of the English law, no freeman could be detained in prison, except upon a criminal charge or conviction, or for a civil debt. In the former case it was always in his power to demand of the court of king's bench a writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, directed to the person detaining him in custody, by which he was enjoined to bring up the body of the prisoner, with the warrant of commitment, that the court might judge of its sufficiency, and remand the party, admit him to bail, or discharge him, according to the nature of the charge. This writ issued of right, and could not be refused by the court. It was not to bestow an immunity from arbitrary imprisonment, which is abundantly provided for in Magna Charta (if indeed it is not more ancient), that the statute of Car. II. was enacted, but to cut off the abuses by which the government's lust of power, and the servile subtlety of the crown lawyers, had impaired so fundamental a privilege." 3 Hall. Const. Hist. 19.

While the value set upon this writ in England has been so great, that the removal of the abuses which embarrassed its employment has been looked upon as almost a new grant of liberty to the subject, it is not to be wondered at, that the continuance of the writ thus made effective should have been the object of the most jealous care. Accordingly, no power in England short of that of parliament can suspend or authorize the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. I quote again from Blackstone (1 Bl. Comm. 136): "But the happiness of our constitution is, that it is not left to the executive power to determine when the danger of the state is so great as to render this measure expedient. It is the parliament only or legislative power that, whenever it sees proper, can authorize the crown by suspending the habeas corpus for a short and limited time, to imprison suspected persons without giving any reason for so doing." If the president of the United States may suspend the writ, then the constitution of the United States has conferred upon him more regal and absolute power over the liberty of the citizen, than the people of England have thought it safe to entrust to the crown; a power which the queen of England cannot exercise at this day, and which could not have been lawfully exercised by the sovereign even in the reign of Charles the First.

But I am not left to form my judgment upon this great question, from analogies between the English government and our own, or the commentaries of English jurists, or the decisions of English courts, although upon this subject they are entitled to the highest respect, and are justly regarded and received as authoritative by our courts of justice. To guide me to a right conclusion, I have the Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States of the late Mr. Justice Story, not only one of the most eminent jurists of the age, but for a long time one of the brightest ornaments of the supreme court of the United States; and also the clear and authoritative decision of that court itself, given more than half a century since, and conclusively establishing the principles I have above stated.

Mr. Justice Story, speaking, in his Commentaries, of the habeas corpus clause in the constitution, says: "It is obvious that cases of a peculiar emergency may arise, which may justify, nay, even require, the temporary suspension of any right to the writ. But as it has frequently happened in foreign countries, and even in England, that the writ has, upon various pretexts and occasions, been suspended, whereby persons apprehended upon suspicion have suffered a long imprisonment, sometimes from design, and sometimes because they were forgotten, the right to suspend it is expressly confined to cases of rebellion or invasion, where the public safety may require it. A very just and wholesome restraint, which cuts down at a blow a fruitful means of oppression, capable of being abused, in bad times, to the worst of purposes. Hitherto, no suspension of the writ has ever been authorized by congress, since the establishment of the constitution. It would seem, as the power is given to congress to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, in cases of rebellion or invasion, that the right to judge whether the exigency had arisen must exclusively belong to that body." 3 Story, Comm. Const. § 1336.

And Chief Justice Marshall, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court in the case of Ex parte Bollman and Swartwout, uses this decisive language, in 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 95: "It may be worthy of remark, that this act (speaking of the one under which I am proceeding) was passed by the first congress of the United States, sitting under a constitution which had declared 'that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.' Acting under the immediate influence of this injunction, they must have felt, with peculiar force, the obligation of providing efficient means, by which this great constitutional privilege should receive life and activity; for if the means be not in existence, the privilege itself would be lost, although no law for its suspension should be enacted. Under the impression of this obligation, they give to all the courts the power of awarding writs of habeas corpus." And again on page 101: "If at any time, the public safety should require the suspension of the powers vested by this act in the courts of the United States, it is for the legislature to say so. That question depends on political considerations, on which the legislature is to decide; until the legislative will be expressed, this court can only see its duty, and must obey the laws." I can add nothing to these clear and emphatic words of my great predecessor.

But the documents before me show, that the military authority in this case has gone far beyond the mere suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. It has, by force of arms, thrust aside the judicial authorities and officers to whom the constitution has confided the power and duty of interpreting and administering the laws, and substituted a military government in its place, to be administered and executed by military officers. For, at the time these proceedings were had against John Merryman, the district judge of Maryland, the commissioner appointed under the act of congress, the district attorney and the marshal, all resided in the city of Baltimore, a few miles only from the home of the prisoner. Up to that time, there had never been the slightest resistance or obstruction to the process of any court or judicial officer of the United States, in Maryland, except by the military authority. And if a military officer, or any other person, had reason to believe that the prisoner had committed any offence against the laws of the United States, it was his duty to give information of the fact and the evidence to support it, to the district attorney; it would then have become the duty of that officer to bring the matter before the district judge or commissioner, and if there was sufficient legal evidence to justify his arrest, the judge or commissioner would have issued his warrant to the marshal to arrest him; and upon the hearing of the case, would have held him to bail, or committed him for trial, according to the character of the offence, as it appeared in the testimony, or would have discharged him immediately, if there was not sufficient evidence to support the accusation. There was no danger of any obstruction or resistance to the action of the civil authorities, and therefore no reason whatever for the interposition of the military.

Yet, under these circumstances, a military officer, stationed in Pennsylvania, without giving any information to the district attorney, and without any application to the judicial authorities, assumes to himself the judicial power in the district of Maryland; undertakes to decide what constitutes the crime of treason or rebellion; what evidence (if indeed he required any) is sufficient to support the accusation and justify the commitment; and commits the party, without a hearing, even before himself, to close custody, in a strongly garrisoned fort, to be there held, it would seem, during the pleasure of those who committed him.

The constitution provides, as I have before said, that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law." It declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." It provides that the party accused shall be entitled to a speedy trial in a court of justice.

These great and fundamental laws, which congress itself could not suspend, have been disregarded and suspended, like the writ of habeas corpus, by a military order, supported by force of arms. Such is the case now before me, and I can only say that if the authority which the constitution has confided to the judiciary department and judicial officers, may thus, upon any pretext or under any circumstances, be usurped by the military power, at its discretion, the people of the United States are no longer living under a government of laws, but every citizen holds life, liberty and property at the will and pleasure of the army officer in whose military district he may happen to be found.[3]

[3] The constitution of the United States is founded upon the principles of government set forth and maintained in the Declaration of Independence. In that memorable instrument the people of the several colonies declared, that one of the causes which "impelled" them to "dissolve the political bands" which connected them with the British nation, and justified them in withdrawing their allegiance from the British sovereign, was that "he (the king) had affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power."

In such a case, my duty was too plain to be mistaken. I have exercised all the power which the constitution and laws confer upon me, but that power has been resisted by a force too strong for me to overcome. It is possible that the officer who has incurred this grave responsibility may have misunderstood his instructions, and exceeded the authority intended to be given him; I shall, therefore, order all the proceedings in this case, with my opinion, to be filed and recorded in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland, and direct the clerk to transmit a copy, under seal, to the president of the United States. It will then remain for that high officer, in fulfilment of his constitutional obligation to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," to determine what measures he will take to cause the civil process of the United States to be respected and enforced.

Case No. 9,488.

MERSEROLE et al. v. UNION PAPER COLLAR CO.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 483; 6 Blatchf. 356.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 27, 1869.

COURTS — JURISDICTION — AVERMENT OF CITIZENSHIP — STATE COURTS — JURISDICTION OVER PATENTS — AUTHORITY TO ADJUDGE VOID — LICENSE — SUIT TO REPEAL.

1. It is not sufficient to aver that the complainants are citizens of the United States. It should appear, affirmatively, that they are not citizens of the same state with the defendants.

[Cited in Lewis v. Hitchcock, 10 Fed. 6.]

2. The only authority to adjudge letters patent void, conferred by any statute of the United States, is found in section 16 of the act of 1836 [5 Stat. 123], and section 10 of the act of 1839 [Id. 354], and extends no farther than to a case of two interfering patents, and to a case where the granting of a patent is refused by the commissioners of patents, or by one of the justices of the District of Columbia on appeal.

3. Whether the suit be one by a licensor, to enforce the covenants contained in a license granted under a patent, or be one by the licensee to destroy and annul the license and its covenants, it is equally impossible to find in the subject matter any basis for the jurisdiction of a circuit court of the United States.

[Cited in White v. Lee, 3 Fed. 224; Teas v. Albright, 13 Fed. 413; Albright v. Teas, 106 U. S. 620, 1 Sup. Ct. 556.]

4. If the license is void, because the patent is void, the fact that the plaintiff must show that the patent is void, in order to get rid of the license, does not make the case one arising under the patent act so as to give jurisdiction to a circuit court.

5. A state court has jurisdiction to decree a license to be void and inoperative for fraud, or any other adequate reason, and the fact that, in the investigation, the state court will be obliged to inquire whether there was anything new in the patents which could operate as a consideration for the license, can not deprive the state court of jurisdiction, or confer it upon a circuit court of the United States.

[Cited in brief in Havana Press Drill Co. v. Ashurst, 148 Ill. 121, 35 N. E. 873. Criticised in Continental Store Service Co. v. Clark, 100 N. Y. 368, 3 N. E. 335.]

6. A state court can not take cognizance of a suit brought for the infringement of a patent nor of a direct suit brought to decree a patent to be void, but when a patent comes in question collaterally, its validity must become a subject of inquiry in the state courts.

7. Every citizen has, abstractly, the same interest with every other citizen, that a void patent shall not be in existence. Yet such interest is not sufficient to warrant the maintenance of a suit to repeal a patent.

8. A suit to repeal a patent, except in the cases stated in section 16 of the act of 1836, and section 10 of the act of 1839, can not be brought either in a state court or a circuit court of the United States.

9. Section 16 of the act of 1836 and section 17 must be construed together, and the confiding of authority by section 16, to declare a patent void, in certain specified cases, must be regarded as intended not to confer such authority in any other cases.

[This was a bill in equity, to which a demurrer was interposed by the defendants. The plaintiffs [Cornelius M. Merserole and James L. Libby] were described, in the bill, as "citizens of the United States," but they were not averred to be citizens of any state of the United States. The defendants were described as "The Union Paper Collar Company, claiming to be a corporation created under the laws of the state of New York, and having its office and principal place of business in the Southern district of New York." The plaintiffs were manufacturers of paper collars. On the 9th of January, 1868, they became the assignees, by an assignment in writing, of a license in writing, granted by the defendants, on the 11th of May, 1866, to the Norwich Paper Collar Company, to make and sell collars, cuffs, and bosoms of paper, or of cloth and paper, according to any or all of nine several letters patent, granted by the United States, and set forth in the license, on the payment to the licensors of certain specified current tariffs. The assignment of the license to the plaintiffs was made with the consent of the defendants, and on the assumption, by the plaintiffs, of the covenants of the license as to the payment of tariffs, and otherwise. The bill averred, that the plaintiffs purchased the license on the strength of representations, previously made to them by the defendants, that the patents were valid, and that the plaintiffs, if they purchased the license, would be allowed to make and sell four millions of paper collars, without paying therefor. It also averred, that the patents were, all of them, invalid, for want of novelty; that the consideration for the purchase of the license by the plaintiffs was void; that the plaintiffs had paid some tariffs under the license; and that the defendants were now claiming tariffs, under the license, from the plaintiffs, on such four millions of collars. The prayer of the bill was, (1.) That, during the pendency of the suit, the defendants might be enjoined from commencing any suit at law upon the license, to recover from the plaintiffs the tariffs reserved therein upon the collars manufactured by the plaintiffs, and from alienating the license; (2.) That this court would decree all of the patents void for want of novelty, and that thereby the consideration for the license had entirely failed; (3.) That the defendants might be decreed to cancel the license, and the agreement made by the plaintiffs in the assignment of it to them, and to return the amount of tariffs paid by the plaintiffs. The demurrer was interposed on the ground that it did not appear, from the bill, that this court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, or of the parties thereto, or to grant the relief therein prayed for.][2]

Clarence A. Seward, for plaintiffs.
George Gifford, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In order to give this court jurisdiction of the suit on the ground of parties, it must be a suit between a citizen of the state of New York and a citizen of another state. Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 11 (1 Stat. 78). The necessary averments of citizenship to confer jurisdiction must appear on the face of the bill. This bill is defective in that respect. The plaintiffs are not averred to be citizens of any state, but only citizens of the United States. It should appear, affirmatively, that they are not citizens of the same state with the defendants.

The other ground of jurisdiction invoked is that of the subject-matter of the suit. In that respect, the bill is founded wholly on the alleged invalidity of the patents; for, if this court has not jurisdiction, growing out of the subject-matter, to decree the patents to be void, it has none to enjoin the defendants from suing on the license under the patents, or to decree that the consideration for the license has failed, or to decree the canceling of the license or the agreement, or to decree a return of paid tariffs.

The only authority conferred on this court, by any statute of the United States, to adjudge any letters patent to be void, is that given by section 16 of act of July 4, 1836 (5 Stat. 123), as extended by section 10 of the act of March 3, 1839 (5 Stat. 354). Such authority extends, by those provisions, no farther than to a case of two interfering patents, and to a case where the granting of a patent is refused by the commissioner of patents, or by the chief justice of the District of Columbia on appeal.

The jurisdiction of this court fails, therefore, in this case, as respects the subject-matter, so far as regards the conferring on it of any special authority to declare the patents in question void. It is urged, however, on the part of the plaintiffs, that section 17 of the act of July 4, 1836, confers upon this court jurisdiction to declare these patents void. That section provides that "all actions, suits, controversies, and cases arising under any law of the United States granting or confirming to inventors the exclusive right to their inventions or discoveries, shall be originally cognizable, as well in equity as at law by the circuit courts of the United States." It is claimed that this suit is one arising under the laws of the United States which grant to the patentees named in the patents in question the exclusive right to the inventions covered thereby.

So far as regards the right of the defendants to sue the plaintiffs upon the license, to recover from the plaintiffs the tariffs reserved therein, and the rights of the defendants to alienate their interest under the license, and their right to hold in force, as against the plaintiffs, the license and the agreement made by the plaintiffs in the assignment of the license to them, and the right of the defendants to retain the amount of tariffs paid by the plaintiffs, it needs no argument to show that those rights arise, all of them, out of and under the license and the agreement and the transactions thereunder, and not in any proper or legal sense, out of or under the patents or the law under which they were granted; and that this suit, so far as it seeks to impair or destroy those rights, has the same origin and basis. It is well settled that such a subject-matter does not confer on this court jurisdiction of a suit. Wilson v. Sandford, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 99; Goodyear v. Union India Rubber Co. [Case No. 5,586]. Whether the suit be one by a licensor to enforce the covenants contained in a license granted under a patent, as in the cases just cited, or be like the present suit, one by the licensee to destroy and annul the license and its covenants, it is equally impossible to find in the subject-matter any basis for the jurisdiction of this court. So far as the suit is based on any alleged false representations made by the defendants, it arises out of a fraud committed by the defendants, and not under any act of congress.

If the license and the agreement of the plaintiffs are void because the patents are void, the fact that the plaintiffs must show that the patents are void, in order to get rid of the license and the agreement, does not make the case one arising under the patent act, so as to give to this court jurisdiction of it. A state court has jurisdiction to decree the license and agreement to be void and inoperative for fraud, or any other adequate reason, and the fact that, in the investigation, the state court will be obliged to inquire whether there was anything new in the patents which could operate as a consideration for the license and agreement, can not deprive the state court of jurisdiction, or confer it on this court. It is true that a state court can not take cognizance of a suit brought for the infringement of a patent; nor of a direct suit, brought to decree a patent to be void. But, as is well said by Chief Justice Williams, in Rich v. Atwater, 16 Conn. 409, 414: "That the validity of patent rights is a subject peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States is true. But it is equally true, that when they come in question collaterally, their validity must become a subject of inquiry in the state courts. Thus, in a suit upon a note if it is claimed that the note was given for a patent right, and the patent is invalid, and so there was no consideration for the note, the state courts constantly exercise jurisdiction." In Rich v. Atwater, the plaintiff owned a patent for a machine which the defendant was infringing. The defendant, by a covenant, agreed not to use the infringing machine any longer, but nevertheless, went on using it, and the plaintiff brought a suit founded on the agreement for an account and an injunction. The defendant offered to prove that the patent was invalid for want of novelty. The plaintiff objected to the evidence, and took the point before the full court, which held that the evidence was admissible. In Cross v. Huntley, 13 Wend. 385, the suit was brought on a note given on the sale of a patent for a machine. In defense, it was proved that the machine was not new, and that the specification of the patent was so defective as to avoid the patent. Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is insisted by the defendant below that the patent is void on the grounds: (1) That the machine, for the making and vending of which the patent was granted, is not a new invention; and (2) if new in parts, the patent is void, inasmuch as it is for the whole machine, and not for the improvement. If either of these positions were sustained by the proof, the defendant was entitled to judgment in the court below, as in such case a failure of the consideration of the note was shown. From the evidence, there can not be a doubt but that the patent, in both respects, is defective and void. * * * The patent being void, nothing passed to the plaintiff in error, and the note was given without consideration." The case of Head v. Stevens, 19 Wend. 411, was one of the same character. It can make no difference whether the payee of the note or the licensor in the license brings the suit to enforce the note or the license, or whether the suit is brought by the maker of the note, or the licensee in the license, to cancel the instrument. The state court has jurisdiction in either case, to inquire collaterally into the validity of the patent.

It is true, that a state court can not entertain jurisdiction of a direct suit to repeal a patent. Every citizen has, abstractly, the same interest with every other citizen, that a void patent shall not be in existence. Yet, such interest is not sufficient to warrant the maintenance of a suit to repeal a patent. Such a suit can not be brought in a state court. If not embraced within section 16 of the act of 1836, and section 10 of the act of 1839, it is not within the jurisdiction of this court; for it can not be contended that every citizen has a right to bring a suit in the circuit court of the district where the proper defendant may be found, to repeal a patent, for the reason that such suit is a suit arising under a law of the United States. If such right existed under section 17 of the act of 1836, the provisions of section 16 would be useless. The two sections must be construed together, and the confiding of authority, by section 16 to declare a patent void, in certain specified cases, must be regarded as intended not to confer such authority in any other cases. The bill must be dismissed with costs.

Case No. 9,489.

The MERSEY.

[Blatchf. Pr. Cas. 187.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. July 28, 1862.[2]

PRIZE—VIOLATION OF BLOCKADE—ENEMY PROPERTY—LOG-BOOK—MUTILATION—NEUTRAL OWNER—PRETENDED SALE—CONSIDERATION.

1. The log-book was mutilated with intent to mislead and deceive with regard to the purposes of the voyage, in fraud of the belligerent rights of the United States, and the culpability thus shown, coupled with other marks of disguised and dishonest practice, demands the condemnation of vessel and cargo. Vessel and cargo condemned on the following grounds: (1) The vessel left the enemy's country as enemy property, and no attempted change of it to neutral property was made until her arrival in a neutral port. There is no evidence of a bona fide consideration paid for her purchase, or of a bill of sale executed, or of actual possession delivered to the alleged purchaser, or that he ever exercised acts of ownership over the vessel, or claimed to be her owner. (2) She had previously come out of an enemy port by evading the blockade, and was seized on her first voyage subsequent thereto. (3) Her ostensible voyage from a neutral port to a loyal port was simulated, and she was really bound to a blockaded port.

2. The rule of the English prize law is emphatic that the absence of a bill of sale from the ship's papers, and the want of proof of payment of the purchase money, in support of a claim by a neutral to an enemy vessel, are circumstances so strongly suspicious, and so vitally defective to a bona fide title to her, that the court, after condemnation of the vessel on the preparatory proofs, will not even allow further proof to be given in support of the title.

3. A transfer of property to a neutral by an enemy in time of war, or in aid of a contemplated war, is illegal, as in violation and fraud of vested belligerent rights.

4. The court will take judicial notice of the notorious course of trade between the neutral port of Nassau and the blockaded ports of the enemy.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq.]

[2] [Reversed in Case No. 9,490.]

5. Suspicious circumstances as to the destination of the vessel commented on.

6. The intentional mutilation of the log-book of the vessel is convincing evidence of an attempt by her to perpetrate a fraud, in violation of the law of nations, for which she and her cargo are subject to forfeiture.

7. It will always be inferred that the papers of a vessel which have been destroyed related to the vessel and cargo, and that it was of material consequence to some unlawful interests that they should be destroyed.

8. The spoliation of papers is not per se a ground for necessarily condemning a vessel, but it raises a strong presumption of fraudulent purposes in those having charge of her, which will effect her condemnation it not satisfactorily accounted for.

9. The particulars of the mutilation of the log-book in this case stated.

In admiralty.

BETTS, District Judge. This vessel and cargo were captured on the 26th of April, 1862, in the Atlantic Ocean, two days' sail from Nassau, N. P., by the United States steamer Santiago de Cuba, and were sent into this port for adjudication as prize of war. A libel for their condemnation was filed on the 17th of May. On the 17th of June, Joseph Roberts, a resident merchant of Nassau, New Providence, intervened and filed his claim and answer and test oath to the libel, averring and testifying that he is a subject of the queen of Great Britain, and a resident of Nassau aforesaid, and owner of the said vessel and her tackle; that, when seized, the vessel was in the Gulf of Florida, about eighty or one hundred miles from land, and that she was laden with an honest cargo, belonging to Sawyer & Menendez, of Nassau, and was on an honest voyage from Nassau to Baltimore. Robert H. Sawyer and Ramon A. Menendez answer and claim that the cargo of the vessel belonged to them, that the voyage was a lawful one, and that the vessel was unlawfully seized. The test oath to the claim of Sawyer & Menendez is made by Montell, the consignee. The papers found on the vessel were, first, a certificate of British registry at Nassau, N. P., Bahamas. This certificate bears date at Nassau, the 15th of April, 1862. It states the vessel to be foreign built, and that her foreign name was Elizabeth. Second, the shipping agreement signed between William H. Sweeting, master, a mate, four seamen, and a cook, dated April 21, 1862. Third, a bill of lading and invoice of the cargo from the shippers Sawyer & Menendez, dated Nassau, April 20, 1862, consigned to J. I. Montell, of Baltimore. Fourth, a clearance at the port of Nassau of the same cargo for the port of Baltimore, April 21, 1862. Fifth, a letter of advice from the shippers to the consignee of the consignment, dated April 22, 1862. Sixtn, the leaves of a portion of what appears upon its face to be a log-book of the voyage. The examination of the master, the mate, and one seaman, is also put in evidence, the same having been taken in preparatorio.

Upon the pleadings and proofs the libellants contended—First. That the vessel and cargo were subject to forfeiture, she having, on the voyage immediately preceding that of her capture, unlawfully run the blockade of the port of Charleston, existing at the time. Second. That the voyage which was being performed, and which purported to be to Baltimore, and with an honest neutral lading, was simulated and untrue, and the vessel and cargo on board being really enemy property and destined for the port of Charleston. Third. That the log-book was mutilated on the voyage for fraudulent purposes; and that the evidence in the case, furnished by the witnesses and the documents, was intended for deception and fraud as to the facts of the voyage and its objects. The claimants urged, on the contrary, that they were honest owners of the vessel and cargo, and that the whole adventure was truly represented in the answers and claims interposed.

The master testifies, in his examination in preparatorio, that he had no knowledge of the vessel until he saw her in Nassau, in March last, and that he was appointed her master by Sawyer & Menendez, who delivered possession of her to him as master. He states his belief that she was an American-built vessel, and that when she took out a British register in April her name was changed from the Elizabeth to the Mersey. He states that he heard that the schooner came to Nassau, with a cargo of cotton, from Charleston, on her last voyage; that he saw the cotton on board of her, and that she came to Nassau the last of March. He states that he had heard that while her name was the Elizabeth, she belonged to a man in Charleston by name Comall; that Roberts, the claimant of the vessel, resides at Nassau, where he has known him for four or five years; and that he knows of his ownership by the registry, and also heard that he was owner, but never heard anything about any sale. He states that he believes that the cargo belongs to Sawyer & Menendez, who have resided five or six years in Nassau; that the consignee, Montell, was formerly a resident of Nassau, but has resided in Baltimore for twenty-seven years; that he, the witness, has been acquainted with him from boyhood; that he does not believe that the consignee has any interest in the cargo; and that he knows nothing of any bill of sale of the vessel, or of any agreement about her, or of any charter-party. He further states that he knew that all the Southern ports were under blockade; that he understood that the vessel came to Nassau from Charleston, and, therefore, supposes she run the blockade there; that he knows no more of the history of the vessel than he has stated; and that no papers or writings on board of the vessel were altered or mutilated or suppressed on the voyage.

This brief synopsis of the evidence of the master plainly manifests that the vessel was not put in his charge by her registered owner, and that he went into her service with a clear understanding that she was not to be sailed to Baltimore in the interest of Roberts, or of Montell, the nominal consignee of the cargo. The letter of instructions which she carried to Montell from Sawyer & Menendez evinced that an ulterior voyage remained to be performed by the vessel, other than a return to Nassau, had she reached Baltimore, and that the master was the confidential agent to be consulted by the consignee, "both in selling and also in purchasing a return cargo." This language evidently denoted that the master was not a mere carrier of the cargo to Montell, and also that Roberts acted in no way in fitting out or directing the voyage, that being exclusively the act of the shippers of the cargo, who were corresponded with by the master as the actual owners of the vessel. In answer to the 14th interrogatory, the master says: "The cargo is owned by Sawyer & Menendez, I believe, because they shipped it, and it is stated in the invoice that they were the shippers;" but to the 28th interrogatory he says: "If the vessel had arrived at her destined port, I suppose the cargo would have belonged to S. T. Montell, the consignee. The shippers, I suppose, took the chances of the market." The two suppositions of this last answer are incompatible with each other, and one of them with the statement of the witness in reply to the 14th interrogatory. No bill of sale or other conveyance of the vessel to Roberts was found with the papers on board, and no payment of a consideration on her transfer, nor any act of possession or ownership on his part, other than the registration of her in his name, was proved or asserted by Roberts. The testimony from the claimants is, that the master had been acquainted with Roberts four or five years in Nassau. The master offers no further evidence of the fact of sale than that he had seen the registry and had heard that Roberts was the owner; but, under these circumstances, the manner of proof leads to the implication that the hearsay of which the master testifies was from the shippers rather than from Roberts' own declaration or assertion of ownership, which Lord Stowell regarded as very feeble and equivocal evidence in proof of ownership. The Two Brothers, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 131. The rule of the English prize law is emphatic that the absence of a bill of sale from the ship's papers (it being the title-deed to the vessel), and the want of proof of payment of the purchase money, in support of a claim by a neutral to an enemy vessel, are circumstances so strongly suspicious and vitally defective to a bona fide title to her that the court, after condemnation of the vessel on the preparatory proofs will not even allow further proof to be given in support of the title. The Christine, 1 Spinks' Prize Cas. 82. For aught that appears before the court, this vessel retained the same character and ownership she bore when she left Charleston and entered the port of Nassau the last of March, and at the time the British registry on board of her was executed at Nassau; but, beyond that subsidiary principle is the higher doctrine that a transfer of property to a neutral by an enemy in time of war, or in aid of a contemplated war, is illegal, as in violation and fraud of vested belligerent rights. The Bernon, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 102; The Noydt Gedacht, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 137, note; The Minerva, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 396, 400, note; The Rosalie and Betty, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 343. The cargo on board was documented as neutral, and by the papers was directed to a neutral port; and unless it was on carriage under false and fraudulent semblance, with intent to cover and disguise its character, and to convey it to an enemy port, or in some other way fraudulently evade the belligerent right of the United States, it must be restored to the claimants thereof.

The question, then, specifically touching the suit for the condemnation of the cargo, rests upon the inquiry whether it is virtually shown to be enemy property, or to have been exported from Nassau with the view and purpose of evading the blockade and carrying it to the enemy, or whether any deception has been practiced in relation to its transportation, calculated and intended to mislead the government and disguise the true character of the voyage and violate the belligerent rights of the United States. The intrinsic and extraneous circumstances insisted upon by the libellants as indicating a culpable intention in the vessel and voyage consist essentially in the imputation that it was matter of notoriety at Nassau, and personally known to all the vessel's company, that the Southern ports were in a state of blockade, and that the court is judicially informed that the open and steady course of navigation and trade at the time of the fitting out of the vessel at Nassau was that of running cargoes in and out of Charleston in violation of the blockade of that port by neutral and enemy vessels notoriously and publicly employed in and prosecuting that object and pursuit; and that this vessel on her last voyage evaded the blockade of Charleston with an enemy cargo, and immediately on her arrival at Nassau assumed a neutral ownership, and was reladen with a cargo specially adapted to the wants of Charleston, and of the character of the cargoes constantly being shipped from Nassau to Charleston in violation of the blockade. Sir William Scott, in The Rosalie and Betty, 2 C. Rob. Adm. 344, says that the judiciary is not to shut its eyes "to what is generally passing in the world—to that obvious system of covering the property of the enemy which, as the war advances, grows notoriously more artificial. Not to know these facts, as matters of frequent and not unfamiliar occurrence, would be not to know the general nature of the subject upon which the court is to decide; not to consider them at all, would not be to do justice." The fact is proved that a large quantity of salt, particularly, was laden directly from a vessel bringing it from Liverpool on board of the Mersey, and the circumstances attending the discharge of the Mersey and the reloading her for her outward voyage strongly import that the transactions were under a common interest and superintendence. The master had been for years acquainted with Roberts and with Sawyer & Menendez, yet treated with the latter as owners of the vessel and cargo, and was to act as their agent in the disposition of the cargo and in obtaining a return one at the port of alleged destination. The mate, contrary to the assertion of the master, considered him to have been appointed by Roberts. So hurried and confused does the business seem to have been in its transaction, that the master says, on his examination, that he does not know the capacity of the vessel. The mate says that she was of about fifty tons burden, and the steward estimated her at two hundred tons. The shipping agreement with the crew is from Nassau to Baltimore and back, without specification of time of employment; and the letter of instruction and advice to the consignee, for the disposition of the adventure, gives no other directions as to a return cargo than a reference to the counsel and advice of the master. Such obscurity and looseness in conducting a mercantile voyage gives occasion for suspicion that something was connected with it, and designed to be carried into effect by it, which was cautiously kept out of view; and the notorious course of trade and intercommunication between Nassau and Charleston, from the breaking out of the war to this day, gives occasion to a strong presumption that it was purposed, on the part of those who managed the Mersey, that she should fulfil the business on which she started at Charleston, by returning directly back to the place of her departure with a cargo adapted to that market. It would be no uncommon device to adopt a circuitous back track, and remove from the papers all outward marks of culpability in its initiation.

The evidence bearing upon this branch of the inquiry, although negative in form, is efficient in character if it sustains the interpretation put upon it by the libellants. They charge that the log-book, arrested with the vessel, has been mutilated and spoliated so as to destroy or conceal entries evidently made upon it originally. Such an act, if committed, supplies convincing evidence of an attempt by the vessel to perpetrate a fraud or deceit, in violation of the law of nations, for which she and her cargo are subject to forfeiture. The master of the vessel testifies that she was captured and taken in tow at about 30° north latitude, but he does not remember the longitude. The mate answers the interrogatory in about the same language; and the steward says he does not know and never heard what was the longitude of the capture, but it was somewhere in the Gulf Stream. And they all say that the vessel was thence taken to Port Royal. It is marked on the log of the vessel to have been latitude 30° 17′, longitude 79° 33′, at 3½ p. m., when she was taken in tow by the captors, and that she, in tow of the capturing vessel, made land the next morning between nine and ten o'clock, against heavy weather. The portion of the log-book taken with the vessel notes the latitude of the place of departure of the vessel to be 27° 7′, and the longitude 79° 13′. The latitude of Baltimore is laid down on the charts as 39° 17′ N., and the longitude 76° 36′ W., and Charleston is in longitude 79° 54′, and latitude 32° 47′. It will be perceived, by the statement of the longitudes of the point of departure of the vessel and that of her alleged point of destination, that she had, between 10 o'clock a. m. of Thursday and 3½ p. m. of Saturday, varied her position towards the coast of the blockaded states, southerly, off and below Charleston, about three degrees of north latitude and one degree of west longitude, and was three degrees west of the longitude of Baltimore. No reason or excuse is assigned for such apparent approach to the coast, nor is it shown to have been the regular line of navigation for Baltimore. Indeed the ship's company deny all knowledge of her position in that respect. Whether such ignorance is real or simulated might be explained by a perfect log, recording the route intended to be run on the voyage, and the impediments or causes preventing the fulfilment of such purpose.

This renders the solution of the inquiry pertinent and important, whether the log found on board had been mutilated or varied surreptitiously after the vessel left Nassau. Her transit directly in front of the line of blockaded ports would pass through about eleven degrees of latitude. The English and American prize law regards the act of destroying or mutilating the ship's papers (among which log-books rank as of primary importance) to be proof of mala fides in the actors, and to demand the worst presumption against those concerned in it. It will always be inferred that the papers relate to the ship or cargo, and that it was of material consequence to some unlawful interests that the papers should be destroyed or suppressed. The suppression or spoliation of papers is not now considered in the American or English courts as, per se, the necessary damnatory cause of forfeiture of vessel and cargo (The Pizarro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 227), but it raises a strong presumption of fraudulent purposes in those having charge of the ship and papers, which will effect the condemnation of the prize if not satisfactorily explained and accounted for. The Two Brothers, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 131; The Hunter, 1 Dod. 480.

Notwithstanding the exceedingly positive assertion of the master, mate, and steward, in their examination in preparatorio, that no alteration or destruction of any papers on board had been made, the log is produced palpably mutilated by having the first leaf torn or cut from the paper book out of which the log is formed, so as to leave marks of writing or figuring visible upon the first page thereof, and leading to a strong presumption that other entries had also been made upon the second page, because that method of keeping the log is subsequently followed to the time of the capture of the vessel. The other half of that sheet, the left side of the outward one, remains entire, and the whole book is stitched through the middle folding of the same, the broken edge of the displaced leaf showing marks of writing still upon it outside of the stitching which fastened it. Two circumstances thus apparent on the face of the log, as it stands, demand clear explanation from the testimony of the master and mate. One is, why no regular entry is made by name of the port of departure on the voyage and of the port of destination, if really a fair trading adventure was contemplated between two neutral ports. Another particular gathered from the dismembered log contrasts very unfavorably with the positive averments of the master and mate in their examinations. The note on the bottom of the first written entry in the log represents the longitude of the vessel at the hour of her departure (10 a. m., Thursday, April 24, 1862) to be 79° 13′, and on Saturday, April 26, when taken in tow by the captors, the entry represents the vessel to be in longitude 79° 33′, only twenty minutes west of her point of departure, whilst the mate testifies that she was arrested about one hundred miles from land, and the master, in the face of that entry, swears he had no knowledge of the longitude of the place of her capture. It is, moreover, observable that the remarks heading the first two remaining pages of the log omit naming the month as well as the place of beginning of the voyage, leaving the implication very strong that those particulars, as well as others tending to shed light upon the enterprise, had been duly registered in the first opening of the log account thereof, and that the after leaves had been continued as if the preliminary facts and others characterizing the voyage were already duly recorded. I therefore hold that, upon the evidence, the log must have been thoughtfully changed or spoliated, and that in judgment of law such alteration or suppression was made with intent to mislead and deceive with regard to the purpose of the voyage, and is, therefore, fraudulent, as against the rights of the United States as a belligerent power, and affords evidence of culpability which, coupled with other marks of disguised and dishonest practices, authorizes and demands the condemnation of the vessel and cargo.

Without dwelling longer upon special points of law or fact in the case, the result is—

1st. The vessel left Charleston as enemy property, and no attempted change of it to neutral property was made until her arrival in Nassau. There is no evidence of a bona fide consideration paid for her purchase, or of a bill of sale executed thereof, or of actual possession delivered to the alleged purchaser, or that he ever exercised acts of ownership over the vessel, or claimed to be her owner.

2d. She came out of Charleston by evading the blockade of the port, and was seized on her first voyage subsequent thereto. The Christiansberg, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 376, 382, notes; The General Hamilton, Id. 62.

3d. The alleged voyage from Nassau to Baltimore was simulated and unreal and was meant for a blockade port. The mutilated log, the description of cargo on transportation, the mode of fitting out and conducting the enterprise, the notorious course of dealing and trade to and from Nassau since the war, and the misrepresentations in the log and in the testimony of the master and mate of the approach of the vessel, when captured, towards Charleston, are facts justifying strong suspicions of her integrity and honesty, and must prevail against her in the absence of exculpatory proof.

For the causes indicated I adjudge the vessel and cargo confiscable in this suit, and decree their condemnation and forfeiture accordingly.

This decree was reversed on appeal by the circuit court, July 17, 1863. [Case No. 9,490.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. This vessel and cargo were captured on the 26th of April, 1862, in the Gulf Stream, about one hundred miles from land, and two days out from Nassau, N. P., on a voyage from the latter place to Baltimore and back. Her cargo, which was put on board at Nassau, consisted of salt, coffee, soap, merchandise, &c. The vessel is owned by Roberts, a merchant and resident of Nassau, and a British subject. The cargo is owned by Sawyer & Menendez, of the same place, one of them a British subject, and the other a Spanish. According to the evidence the vessel was in her proper course, pursuing her voyage to Baltimore, and without any intent to run the blockade of any of the Confederate ports. She seems to have been convicted on suspicion, from hearsay evidence and report that she had run the blockade of Charleston on her previous voyage, and that she was still the property of a citizen and resident of some of the Southern states. I am not satisfied that these facts, or any of them, have been established by competent proof. The cargo, it is admitted, belongs to British and Spanish subjects. Much stress is laid upon a mutilation of the log-book, which is fully explained by the further evidence of the mate and steward. Decree below reversed.

District Court, D. California. June Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—OBJECTION BY BOARD—ADDITIONAL TESTIMONY.

The objection by the board to the confirmation of this claim obviated by the additional testimony taken in this court.

Claim for about half a league of land in Santa Clara county, rejected by the board, and appealed by the claimant [Maria Antonia Mesa].

Jeremiah Clarke, for appellant.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty., for appellees.

Before HOFFMAN, District Judge.

This case has been submitted to the court without argument; we are referred, however, by the district attorney to the opinion of the board of commissioners for a statement of the objection to the validity of the claim on which he relies. The ground on which the claim was rejected by the board was that there was no description of the granted land, either in the grant itself or the map which accompanies it, sufficient to designate it and effect its segregation from the public domain, or rather from the adjoining mission lands, out of which it was to be taken. The land is described in the grant as the land known as the [Rancho] Rinconada del Arroyo de San Francisquito, and bordering on the land of the Pulgas, belonging to Doña Soledad Ortega, and on the land of the establishment of Santa Clara. By reference to the map, the course of the Arroyo San Francisquito, which is the southern boundary of the Pulgas land, appears clearly laid down. The northern boundary of the land intended to be granted is thus ascertained, but the claim was rejected by the board because "there are no other indications or lines on the map to show the size, the shape, or the location of the tract," the only information conveyed by the map being that the land fronts somewhere on that creek, but on what portion of it, or to what extent does not appear. It is unnecessary to inquire how far the legal principle upon which the decision of the board is founded, is affected by the case of Fremont v. U. S. [17 How. (58 U. S.) 542]. From additional testimony of Aaron Van Dorn taken in this court, it appears that, as a deputy United States surveyor, he has surveyed the adjoining ranchos, and is acquainted with the surrounding country, and that there is no difficulty whatever in locating the land by means of the calls in the grant and the map. This witness testifies that the principal objects mentioned for boundaries are natural objects, well known and defined. That those objects exist to the witness' own knowledge, and that while making a survey of the adjoining ranchos, a certified copy of the map in this case constituted a part of his instructions from the surveyor general. The objection therefore raised by the board to the claim would seem to be entirely obviated by this testimony. In confirmation of this evidence, it may be observed that the tract of land solicited appears from the documents in the expediente to have been well known to the governor, and by those officers whom he directed to report upon the application.

The petition asks for a piece of land adjacent to the lower part of San Francisquito creek on the south, the situation of which forms a corner, as will appear by the map; said location is bordering on the Pulgas rancho, and its extent is probably half a square league. The petitioner further states that about two years before, he had obtained permission to occupy this land from the administrator of Santa Clara. The officers to whom reference for information is had, report that the land solicited is known to belong to the mission of Santa Clara, and that, as the map shows, part of it belongs to the widow Soledad Ortega. José Estrada reports that the land on which the house is situated, belongs to the heirs of Don Louis Arguello, and on the land in the direction of Santa Clara, on this side of the San Francisquito, the cattle and horses of the ex-mission pastured, and that it is the only watering place on said location. The prefect to whom the governor refers the whole matter, reports that the house, which, according to the map, stands on the land belonging to the widow Soledad, has been moved, as he is informed by the petitioner, and that the cattle of the ex-mission have enough land above what the petitioner solicits. We think it evident from the general tenor of these reports, that the governor and the officers must have had a clear and definite idea of the situation and extent of the land intended to be granted, and when in addition we have the direct testimony of a deputy United States surveyor that the land can, by means of the map and the calls on the grant, be readily located, we think that no ground remains for the rejection of this claim for want of definiteness. No other objection is mentioned by the commissioners. The genuineness of the grant is not disputed, and the grantee appears to have fully complied with the conditions.

A decree of confirmation must therefore be entered.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—APPEALS TO CIRCUIT COURT—WHEN AUTHORIZED.

The act of congress of July 1, 1864 [13 Stat. 332], "to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California," did not authorize appeals to the circuit court from all past decrees in land cases of the district court, but only from decrees of that court then appealable to the supreme court, but from which no appeal had been taken, and from decrees of the district court which might be subsequently rendered.

Appeal from the district court, heard at the February term of 1865.

[This was a suit by Maria Antonio Mesa against the United States, concerning certain Mexican land grants.]

W. H. Patterson, for appellant.

Delos Lake, U. S. Atty., for respondent.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. This case comes before the court on appeal from the decree of the district court approving the official survey of the land confirmed to the claimant. [Case unreported.] The decree was entered in April, 1861, and the appeal was taken in March of the present year. The question presented is whether under the act of July, 1864, "to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the state of California," this court can take jurisdiction of the case. The object of that act was to relieve the supreme court from the necessity of considering cases of survey and location of private land claims, which raised few questions of interest except to the parties engaged in the litigation, and to vest in the circuit court the jurisdiction of future cases of this character. While, therefore, the jurisdiction of the supreme court was retained over pending appeals, jurisdiction was vested in the circuit court over cases in which appeals might subsequently be taken. The language of the statute is: "That where a plat and survey have already been approved or corrected by one of the districts courts of the United States for California, and an appeal from the decree of approval or correction has already been taken to the supreme court of the United States, the said supreme court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal. But where from such decree of approval or correction no appeal has been taken to the supreme court, no appeal to that court shall be allowed, but an appeal may be taken within twelve months after this act shall take effect, to the circuit court of the United States for California, and said court shall proceed to fully determine the matter." From the general language here used, counsel contend that the right of appeal to the circuit court from all past decrees is conferred; and thus that surveys and locations which have become absolute by lapse of time, may be again opened to contestation. Such is not, in our judgment, the proper construction of the act. We are clear that the act was only intended to authorize a review by the circuit court of decrees which were then appealable, but from which no appeal had at the time been taken to the supreme court; and of decrees which might be subsequently rendered in cases pending undetermined in the district court, the time within which to appeal to the circuit court in both classes of cases being limited to the period of twelve months after the passage of the act. The construction for which counsel contend would take from the act its just designation as an act to expedite the settlement of land titles, and render it an act to cloud the titles and delay their settlement. It follows that the motion to dismiss the appeal must be granted. In considering the question presented we have not noticed the fact that an appeal had already been taken in this case to the supreme court of the United States and there dismissed, as it was unnecessary for the disposition of the motion. Appeal dismissed.

Case No. 9,493.

MESNER et al. v. SUFFOLK BANK.

[1 Law Rep. 249.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1838.

SALVAGE—DERELICT—PROPERTY OF PASSENGER—REWARD OFFERED—SALVORS—SHIP'S COMPANY—COMPENSATION—EXTRAORDINARY EXERTIONS.

1. The steamboat New England, on her passage from Boston, for ports and places on the Kennebec, by collision with the schooner Curlew, sailing in an opposite direction, was so severely injured as to be deemed in immediate danger of sinking, and, under that apprehension, was left by all on board. The passengers, and part of the crew went on board the Curlew, the master with other officers and the residue of the crew remained in small boats about the wreck, employed in saving articles found floating, and after a brief interval, judging it safe so to do, again went on board, for the purpose of saving, and did save baggage of passengers, money and other property to a large amount.

2. The New England under these circumstances, and at the time when the alleged services of the libellants were performed, ought not to be considered as derelict.

3. The rules of the marine law, relative to the exertions required of seamen in cases of shipwreck, or of disaster at sea, are equally applicable to navigation by steamboats.

4. The distinction, or exception, by which pilots in the usual mode of navigation, have, in some instances, been admitted as salvors, is not applicable to pilots or engineers of steamboats, belonging to the ship's company.

5. A promise of reward from a passenger, in the circumstances above described, to officers, or crew of the distressed vessel, to secure their exertions for saving his property, held not to be legally binding.

6. Where there is a presumption of blame, as to the collision on the part of the steamboat, if such presumption be not repelled by evidence, a claim of compensation by any of the officers or crew of such steamboat, for extraordinary exertions, is not maintainable.

7. Nor is a suit against a passenger, or other person having property thus saved, to be sustained, when instituted separately and after the payment of wages, in full, to those engaged in that service, without claim or demand on their part at that time or previously for any such extra compensation.

[This was a libel by George Mesner, late chief engineer of the steamboat New England; George Stillfin, late pilot of said boat; Fitz Goodin, late deck hand, and James Collins, late a wheelman, on said boat,—against the president, directors and company of the Suffolk Bank, for salvage.]

B. R. & G. T. Curtis, for libellants.

S. Hubbard, B. R. Nichols, and C. Atwood, for respondents.

DAVIS, District Judge. This libel is for salvage service alleged to have been performed, for the benefit of the respondents, in saving two packages of bank bills, of the declared value of $50,000, asserted to have been saved, under circumstances of great peril and extremity from the captain's office in the steamer New England, in which that property had been deposited by Joseph H. Dorr, agent of the Suffolk Bank, the said steamer having been previously deserted by all on board from apprehension of her sinking, after a disastrous collision with another vessel, the schooner Curlew; the exertions of the libellants in the premises being, as they assert, induced by a reward of five thousand dollars, offered by said Dorr, one of the passengers in the New England. The respondents place their defence on the following averments, summarily collected from their answer. First. That the night on which the collision occurred, was very pleasant with little wind, the sea calm, and the atmosphere so clear, that a vessel could be seen at the distance of several miles; that the schooner was sailing at a slow rate, and under usual sails; that the steamer was proceeding with great velocity, under high steam, and with several sails spread, and that under such circumstances, the collision could not have occurred, but through a defect of duty, on the part of the officers and crew of the steamer, who were at the time, in special charge of the engine and navigation of the New England, and that the libellants, themselves, or some of them, were in said special charge of the engine and navigation of the steamer. Secondly. That the respondents had delivered to Mr. Joseph Dorr, their agent, two packages of bank bills, one package containing bills of the Globe Bank, of Bangor, to the nominal amount of 20,000 dollars, and the other package containing bills of the Commercial Bank, of Bangor, of the nominal amount of 26,000 dollars, both packages being placed in one carpet bag, which was delivered with its contents to the clerk of said steamer, for safe keeping; that the said bank bills were comprehended in an agreement, subsisting between the respondents, and the said Globe and Commercial Banks, respectively, relative to the redemption of their bills, by which the said banks had been charged for the amount by the Suffolk Bank, and that the said bills, by the terms of such agreement were at the risk of said Globe and Commercial Banks respectively. Thirdly. That they do not admit, that the said Dorr made such offers of reward, nor any offer of reward, to the libellants as they allege, and that he was not authorized or empowered in behalf of the respondents, to promise such, or any reward whatever, for the recovery of said bills, or for any purpose whatsoever. Fourth. That the said steamer and property on board, were not abandoned by the officers and crew, as in the libel alleged, but, that from and after the collision, and until the libellants themselves finally left the steamer, the officers and crew thereof remained, and were on duty, on, or about that vessel, without abandoning the same, or any property on board; that the libellants, themselves, were acting under the orders of the captain, and other officers, and continued, and acted under such orders until long after the time of the services alleged in the libel. Fifth. That the libellants in the premises, were not acting in their private or individual capacity, but that said bank bills, together with other large amounts of bills, money and other property, belonging to various persons, were taken from said steamer by her officers and crew, only in discharge of their several duties, and to relieve themselves, and the owners of said steamer, from the legal liabilities which would have been incurred by the dereliction or loss of said property; that the same was done under the direction of the captain and other officers; that the said bills and other property being recovered were delivered to, and remained in the possession and control of the said captain and other officers, and were, afterwards, delivered by them or some of them, to the several owners, or to others for said owners, without any claim or pretence of claim by the libellants, or any of them, or by said officers, or others, of any right of salvage thereon; that the bills were delivered by the captain of said steamer, to the respondents, without any claim of salvage, or notice of such claim, or any allegation or pretence, that he, or any of the officers, or crew, had, in respect to said bills, done more or acted otherwise, than was required in the performance of their several duties, and for their protection and discharge from their legal liabilities. Sixth. That the motives, or inducement, by which the libellants were actuated, were not such as they allege, but that they acted as the respondents verily believe, in all the premises, only in performance of their several duties, and under the orders of the officers, and for earning, and securing their own customary wages; that the libellants, and each of them, in fact, claimed, and received, from the owners and officers of said steamer, their customary wages, for all said time, and until their arrival at Boston, the day following, as also all their wages at the time of the collision pending, or at any time earned; that the libellants were, thereby, fully paid for all services alleged or done by them, at the time aforesaid, and that they, nor any of them, ever made any or further claims upon said owners or officers, than for their wages so paid in full. Seventh. It is denied that the labor and risks incurred by the libellants, in the premises, were in nature or degree as in the libel alleged. They were, it is asserted, by the respondents, comparatively slight, in a very little (if any) degree, exceeding the common services and risks of seamen, the whole having been done in full daylight, and in a very short time, and in the particular mode pointed out by others; that the sea was calm, the weather pleasant, and numerous boats and assistants constantly at hand; that, in fact, equal or greater labor and risk were incurred by other persons than the libellants, on board and about the said steamer, who have made no claim for compensation. Eighth. That if the bills so saved, were in fact the property, and at the risk of the respondents, the saving was of no pecuniary benefit to them, the same being of known amount, and the whole matter capable of explicit proofs; that independently of the agreement with the Globe and Commercial Banks, the claim of the respondents, upon those banks, from which the bills had been issued, for the amount, would not have been defeated or affected, by the total loss of said bills. That in the event of such loss, the fact of the prior receipt of said bills by the respondents, and of their loss and destruction were capable of proof, and would, in fact, have been proved by the respondents, and that they would have been able to sustain their charges, for the amount, with interest against the said banks, and that the said banks, as the respondents have been assured, would have readily allowed said charges, without the production of the bills; that the said bills, when taken from the steamer, were saturated by the salt water, and greatly stained and injured, and that the fact of the loss of them would have been so notorious, that any attempt to pass them by any person who might have found them would have been unsuccessful, as they would easily have been identified as the lost bills; that the said banks which issued them, were in no danger of being compelled, nor would they have been liable to pay them, to any holders of them, and further that the bills of said banks, were at that time, generally uncurrent, and have so continued to the time of filing the answer of the respondents in this suit. Ninthly. That if the libellants can be considered as rightfully entitled to salvage in the premises, there were other, and large amounts of bills, and other property belonging to various persons, taken from the said steamer by the libellants, under the same circumstances, or other persons acting with them, and equally entitled to come in and claim with them, and that said other bills and property, or their owners, ought to bear or pay a contributing share of such compensation or salvage, as may be decreed. The proof in the case on the part of the libellants, is contained in the depositions of George Mesner, and James Collins, two of the libellants, and in the depositions of William Rush, William Griffin, Jason Collins, and Andrew McCausland, firemen on board the New England, at the time of the disaster, and of Isaac Powell, the cook. The respondents produce the testimony of Nathaniel Kimball, master of the New England, William L. Stone, the clerk, Joseph H. Dorr and Samuel G. Stimson, passengers.

The testimony is unusually voluminous, from the very extended and searching examination which was pursued by the contending parties, and is in some instances, not easily reconcilable. The following facts, however, are admitted, or satisfactorily proved: The steam packet New England, Nathaniel Kimball, master, sailed from Boston, on the 30th day of May last, bound to Bath and Gardner, on the Kennebec river, and between 1 and 2 o'clock, of the next morning, about 16 miles south from Boon Island light came in contact with the schooner Curlew, deeply laden with lime, bound for Boston, from an Eastern port, the steamer being under rapid way, at the rate of 12 miles an hour, impelled by her machinery in full operation, and with her sails set, a foresail and jib. The stroke was particularly severe in its effect on the steamer. A large hole, some of the witnesses say as large as a hogshead, was made in her bow, and in about twenty minutes she was filled with water. The alarm and dismay of all on board, as they rushed on deck, most of them aroused from sleep by the shock, was excessive. The vessel was fast settling, and, from a persuasion that she would soon sink, all applications for arresting the influx of water proving ineffectual, it was decided to take refuge on board the Curlew, a measure in which the master and officers of the steamer, and all on board concurred for the preservation of their lives. This was effected partly by boats, with which the steamer was well furnished, but principally, by immediate transit to the Curlew, which haled alongside, not having sustained any considerable injury by the concussion.

When the Curlew stood off, as she soon did, from apprehension of danger, if the steamer should sink, while attached to her, she had received on board all the passengers, sixty-three in number, excepting one, who was killed, (in what manner does not appear in the evidence,) and all the crew of the steamer, excepting Capt. Kimball, and some of his officers and men, who remained in the boats, and were actively employed in saving such baggage of the passengers and materials of the wreck, as were found floating, which they collected and delivered on board the schooner. Some time was spent in this operation, when it was perceived, that the steamer, instead of gradually sinking as was expected, became stationary. Hopes were then entertained, that she would not sink, and the appearances were so promising, that she would continue thus stationary, the weather also being clear and mild, and the sea smooth, that Capt. Kimball, and the men with him were encouraged to go on board the wreck in their boats, and to make an effort to save the baggage and other valuable articles, which might be accessible. At that time, the only part of the New England, above water, was the promenade deck, which the party in the small boats, or some of them, ascended, and forthwith proceeded to recover the baggage, breaking through the sky-light, beneath which was the baggage rack. In this, good progress was made, and the trunks, bags and other packages which were in this mode recovered, were sent in boats and delivered on board the Curlew, then standing off and on, at varying distances from the wreck. After a considerable portion of the baggage had thus been received and placed on board the Curlew, there appeared urgent motives that the Curlew should be relieved from her uneasy situation, and proceed to Boston, in contemplation of being replaced, for assistance to Capt. Kimball and the men remaining with him, by another schooner then nearly approaching them. Mr. Blanchard, first pilot of the New England, by appointment from Capt. Kimball, left the boats and went on board the Curlew, to take all proper charge of the property saved, and placed on board the vessel, and of that part of the crew of the New England, who were on board the schooner. The Curlew departed before sunrise, and was replaced by the schooner Evelina, of Portland. The recovery of the baggage through the sky-light aperture, was industriously pursued, and all or nearly all the remaining contents of the baggage rack, were saved, and conveyed in the boats to the schooner Evelina. This being accomplished the more difficult task remained, the recovery of the valuable property in the captain's office, which could only be effected by cutting a passage through the promenade deck. This was performed, by means of an axe, brought by Mr. Stone, the clerk, from the schooner Curlew, before her departure. From the opening thus made, there was fished up (as the witnesses expressed it) two carpet bags, one containing the packages of bank bills, which had been deposited by Mr. Dorr, with the clerk of the boat; the other holding the smaller amount of bank bills, belonging to Mr. Stimson. In this operation, the libellants were all actively and laboriously employed. The carpet bags, with their contents were delivered to Mr. Stone, and by him to Capt. Kimball, who was alongside in one of the boats; Mr. Stone was despatched with them to the schooner Evelina, and did not return again to the wreck. After his departure an iron safe, containing Capt. Kimball's money, about six hundred dollars in specie, was drawn up. The men next proceeded to save other articles of small value, such as the bell which they disengaged from its fixtures, and a portion of copper pipe, part of the machinery. "We supposed," says Capt. Kimball, "that we had saved everything that could be saved by the small boats, unless we had towed the steamer in." The men then left the wreck and repaired to the small boats, by direction or advice of Capt. Kimball, who appears to have been vigilantly attentive for the safety of all in concert with him in the undertaking, and who, after the saving of the articles mentioned, noticed some small change of position in the wreck, inducing him to advise the men to leave the wreck, and go into the boats. Soon after they left the wreck she turned bottom upwards. Capt. Kimball and the men with him, went on board the schooner Evelina, and proceeded in her forthwith to Boston. They had been employed in the service described about five hours. The reentrance on board the steamer, was, as I should infer from the testimony, not far from the commencement of twilight. When the carpet bags were extracted from the captain's office, it was near sunrise, and the safe was drawn up, about an hour after sunrise. On arrival at Boston, the packages saved, belonging to the Suffolk Bank, were forthwith delivered to the proprietors, containing the whole amount of bills delivered by Mr. Dorr, to the clerk of the steamer, forty-six thousand dollars. At the time when the steamer, which it had been supposed would sink, became stationary, and the boats were about proceeding to go from the Curlew for the purpose of boarding her, Mr. Dorr, it appears from the evidence, made urgent requests, and large offers of pecuniary reward, first of $2000 and then of $5000 to those would save for him the packages of bills, which he had lodged in the captain's office. These offers it is testified were made in the hearing of the libellants, and received a reply from one of them, Mr. Mesner, that as to both sums, Mr. Dorr might as well offer the whole, for he must know that it could not be done. These asserted offers are denied by Mr. Dorr, who affirms, that he made no offer of any particular sum, but that he did promise a reward, and in presence of many of the crew. Mr. Stone, however, testified that he was promised 1000 dollars, by Mr. Dorr, if he should succeed in saving his money; and so many witnesses testify to the offers of 2000 and 5000 dollars, made to those in the boats, that I am bound to believe, that some such offers were made by that gentleman, but made in such a state of anxiety and excitement, that the expressions which at such a moment escaped him, are not recollected. The libellants, with all the rest of the crew of the New England, received their wages, in full, on the 1st day of June, reckoned at their respective rates, up to that time, one day after the disaster. Receipts, in common form, were given by them, without claim or demand of any further compensation or allowance, excepting that one of the witnesses testifies that he did say, at the time of the payment of wages, that he thought he ought to receive something more. After that time and before the filing of the libel, Mr. Stone, in consideration of his services in the premises, received from the bank, three hundred dollars, through Mr. Dorr, their agent, for which he gave a receipt. This transaction was without any previous consultation with Capt. Kimball, or any of the other officers, or with any of the crew of the New England, none of whom have participated with Mr. Stone in that donation.

Have the libellants, from the facts proved, a legal claim in the application of the law marine to those facts, a right to any further allowance than the wages which they have received, and, if so, to what amount? If they are thus entitled, it must be as salvors, or by virtue of the offer or promises made by Mr. Dorr, agent of the Suffolk Bank, or on the ground of extraordinary gallantry and enterprise. The general rule of law, respecting salvage, excludes the ship's company. A salvor is a person, who, without any particular relation to a ship in distress, performs useful service, and gives it as a volunteer adventurer, without any pre-existing covenant that connected him with the duty of employing himself for the preservation of the ship. The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. 236; Hobartsal v. Drogan, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 122. The allowance to be made to the crew of a vessel, for their services, is, in the language of our decisions, on the subject, denominated salvage, or more frequently qualified salvage or compensation in nature of salvage. The adjudications in England do not adopt the term salvage in reference to such services, but consider the requisite compensation as due by the contract. In our legal nomenclature, on this head, we have two descriptions of civil salvage; general salvage, to which the definition that has been cited is applicable; and special or qualified salvage, a remedy for seamen against property saved by their exertions from a ship to which they belonged. Such suit is ordinarily limited to wages due, but it is understood, that it is competent to the court to award additional recompense, in cases of extraordinary danger and gallantry. The Two Catherines [Case No. 14,288].

In regard to wages, there is in this case, no question, the libellants having received their wages in full. Their claim for additional recompense, for extraordinary danger and gallantry, is reserved for separate consideration in another connexion. They cannot claim as general salvors, from their relation to the New England; being part of the ship's company, they are excluded by a rule of marine law, of ancient standing, approved acceptance, and of such familiar application, that the learned counsel at once yielded to its government for the exclusion of claim under that head, unless they should show that the libellants, according to the facts of the case, were in a position and character at the time of the alleged service, entitling them to be admitted as salvors, notwithstanding their engagements, as officers and men on board the New England. For this purpose it is contended in the first place, that the New England was abandoned, and derelict, and that the libellants' contract, in reference to service on board of her, was at an end; that the services which were rendered by them after she was first left, were purely voluntary, and could not be required by any duty incumbent on them under those circumstances. They allege, "that the passengers, captain, officers, and crew of said boat, within the space of thirty minutes after the collision, left the said boat under the apprehension, and expectation, that the said boat would go down, and went on board the schooner Curlew, with the intention to leave and abandon, and did leave and abandon, all further navigation of said boat." The navigation of the boat was abandoned, but the circumstances of the case do not present a case of derelict. The situation of the New England was deplorable but not desperate. She was left, indeed, by all on board, under an apprehension that she was sinking, but the master and a portion of the crew remained about her, in their boats, and very soon entered on board again, for saving the property of the passengers and owners as might be practicable. It would be carrying the doctrine of derelict to an undue extreme, to consider this a case of absolute abandonment. In the case of The Emulous [Case No. 4,480], in this particular of similar character, it was suggested that it was a case of derelict. But that ground was not sustained by the court, there being not only the animus revertendi, but the actual presence of the master when the salvage service was performed. Here was the actual presence of the master, through the whole transaction, in all its phases. Capt. Kimball appears to have been assiduously attentive, vigilant, and faithful in reference to his trust; he was not at any time on board the Curlew, and during the brief interval which elapsed before re-entering his vessel, being employed with the small boats about the wreck, and having improved the earliest moment while the vessel was under his watch, to enter on board, when it could be with safety, the animus revertendi, may reasonably be presumed to have existed. The agency and exertions of the officers and men accompanying him must in my opinion be considered as under his direction, and, in performance of the duties which their obligation in connection with the New England, imposed. It is further argued in regard to two of the libellants, Mesner and Stillfin, that they held such official stations, in the employment of the steamer, one being second pilot, and the other first engineer, that they were not bound to the exertions, labor, and hazard, which are incumbent on seamen, in such emergencies, though the other two libellants, Collins and Goodin, may have been subject to the performance of such duties, arduous and severe as they may have been. Mesner and Stillfin, it is contended, are entitled to claim as salvors, on the same ground, as pilots are known to have been thus admitted.

The few cases, in which pilots have been admitted to share as salvors, rest on grounds which do not appear to me applicable in the present instance. "It is clear," says Judge Hopkinson, in the case of Hand v. The Elvira [Case No. 6,015], "that a seaman is much more closely bound to a ship than a pilot, and the duties to her are far more extensive, permanent and severe." Pilots, in ordinary navigation, are engaged occasionally, and for a particular service, and for the established reward for such special services; for extraordinary services, of another description, foreign to their line of duty, they have been considered to be entitled to claim as salvors. The pilot of a steamboat, is of a different character, he is one of the ship's company, and if styled sailing master, it would more fully and correctly indicate his line of duty. Ordinarily he satisfies all claims, by confining himself to his appropriate duties. But in trying emergencies, as in shipwrecks or in distress, or disaster at sea, he must, I think, from his intimate relation to the ship, be considered to be on a different footing from pilots in ordinary navigation, and to be holden to like exertions for preservation of life and property as if belonging to a ship's company in common navigation. So is it also with the engineers, or any other officers belonging to a steamboat, and with the whole crew. In some remarks which I have recently seen, respecting the anticipated extension of steamboat navigation on the ocean, the writer notices the effect of the "daring achievement," and of the application of a power "which takes the mind up from former associations." The animating views connected with these remarks, there is certainly no disposition to depreciate. But it must be remembered, that the extensive application of the new power, has its peculiar dangers, imposing corresponding duties, on those by whom it is exercised. In the dissipation of former associations, we are to take a sober view of probable contingencies, and be careful to retain the good old rules of the marine law, which have proved efficacious and salutary in the progress of navigation, and essentially subservient to the safety and security of all concerned. With these views I cannot but consider the claim of the pilot and engineer of the New England, of exemption from the legal duties belonging to a ship's crew, in cases of extremity, and to become general salvors, in consequence of holding those offices, not to be sustained. Those who may be about to embark in a steamboat, may reasonably be considered as entertaining no expectations of such exemption; and, if it were decided otherwise, masters and owners of steamboats, would probably find it expedient, to ensure confidence and custom, by express stipulations, publicly announced.

On the same ground that the libellants are incapacitated, by law, from being general salvors, rests the invalidity of the promise, or offer made by Mr. Dorr. In the case of Harris v. Watson, Peak, Cas. 72, a promise made by the master of a ship, of extra wages, in a case of extremity, was held not to be binding, on principles of general policy. "If this action was to be supported," says Lord Kenyon, "it would materially affect the navigation of this kingdom." Neither as I conceive, will the law enforce a promise of pecuniary reward made by a passenger to one or more of the crew of the wrecked vessel, for the purpose of engaging him or them to his particular interest in such a season of general calamity. If the libellants could be considered as general salvors, any promise of pecuniary reward would be of little or no importance. It might be too much or too little. The court would in such case adjust the reward according to merit and benefit. Being as they are deemed to be, not general salvors, but engaged in saving the property conformably to their duties, they were not at liberty to place themselves under engagements which an admission of the validity of the promise would import. Capt. Kimball, I conceive, could not legally act under a promise of this description, neither could any under his command. The preferences which such engagement would involve, are inadmissible.

In regard to the pecuniary loss, which one of the libellants, Mr. Mesner, asserts that he sustained, it is not alleged in the libel nor is it duly proved, and if the sum mentioned were in his chest, at the time, the loss cannot be imputed to his attention to saving the property in the captain's office. There was ample time, after he entered on board before the opening was commenced into that office to repair to his berth, and save any valuable articles which it contained, if it were practicable. I cannot but conclude therefore, that the berth, which was forward, was entirely under water, and inaccessible; and that his failing to resort to it, for saving his property.

in that place, was from its impracticability, and not occasioned by his devotion to saving the respondent's money.

In regard to the only remaining ground, taken in support of the libellants' claim, that of deserved recompense for extraordinary danger and gallantry, it is readily conceived how those characteristics should lead to augmentation of compensation, in awards for salvage service, and the American authorities distinctly authorize an allowance, for such cause, in the salvage suits by seamen, on account of property saved by them from the wreck of a vessel to which they belonged. There would seem, indeed, to be a difficulty in reconciling an allowance of this description, in addition to wages, with the strong language of the maritime law, in reference to the seaman's duty on such occasions. He is required as has been repeatedly decided, and as the digests on the law of shipping repeat, to exert himself, to the utmost, to save as much as possible of vessel and cargo, in terms so intense, as would seem to embrace any services comprehended under the expression cited in support of this claim. Lord Stowell, in the case of The Neptune, emphatically states the inconveniences and embarrassments, from suits of this description, for an unliquidated sum, "the one party hardly guessing what is proper for him to ask, and the other equally ignorant what he ought to refuse, and the court having to find the proper liquidation, often on evidence sworn to, on both sides, with equal intrepidity." These remarks of that distinguished jurist, are entitled to serious attention, but the law as declared by our own courts is to be taken, for guide and government on the subject. Lord Stowell would limit the compensation in such cases, to the wages; our decisions are of more extensive import, and authorize a recompense in addition to the wages. In connexion with a distinct declaration of this doctrine, in the very instructive case of The Two Catherines [supra], the court appears to have in a degree anticipated the difficulties, which so strongly impressed the mind of Lord Stowell two years afterwards in the case of The Neptune. "It appears to me," says Mr. Justice Story, "that there is sound policy and wisdom in fixing in ordinary cases of this sort a settled salvage, at least to the extent of wages earned, leaving an additional recompense to be made in cases of extraordinary danger and gallantry, where the service is greatly enhanced by the preservation of life and the great value of the property at stake." There are exceptions, according to frequent decisions, to the general rule, which precludes seamen from being admitted as salvors, in reference to the vessel to which they belong or its cargo. Such is the case of recapture of their vessel, a dangerous service, which they are not bound to perform, and their contract being dissolved or suspended by capture. In the instance of Toole in the case of The Blaireau, "the captain," says Chief Justice Marshall, "who was entrusted by the owner, with power over the vessel and her crew, had discharged him from all further duty, under his contract, so far as any act whatever could discharge him." The distinction prevailing, in cases of such description, is, that there is a change of state or condition, but where the service is merely heightened in degree, being in the performance of the duties required by the mariner's engagement, there is, manifestly, opened a wide field for claims and controversies, requiring, if practicable, some definite limits, though it may be difficult to assign them. In the case of The Two Catherines the limit recommended in ordinary cases is the amount of wages due, an additional recompense to be decreed for extraordinary merits. Where the wages have been paid, I am not prepared to sustain a separate suit against individuals, passengers or shippers, whose property may have thus been saved. When an allowance is made, on that ground, in connexion with a suit for the wages, it is admissible, by analogy with the reward allowable in such case for the preservation of life, for which a separate and distinct demand cannot be maintained. In a salvage suit, where such claim for extra allowance is associated with the claim for wages, admiralty rules and practice are well adapted to bring all parties and interests before the court, and to comprehend the entire merits in one decision. But the party is not, I think, at liberty to break his case into fragments, and after wages are received, to maintain separate suits against individual owners of property saved for such extra allowance. On this ground, the libellants having received wages without claim of any further demand, cannot in my opinion, legally maintain this suit.

If the case were free from this objection, I am not satisfied, that the facts in evidence would sustain the claim which is made. The services rendered by the libellants, were, indeed, prompt, energetic and efficient, and the value of the property saved, for the respondents, cannot, I think, be reduced to the low estimate, expressed in their answer, and in the arguments of their counsel. But the time employed by the libellants was brief, and considering the mildness of the weather, the smoothness of the sea, the number of boats well manned, which were around the wreck, under the direction of Capt. Kimball, whose vigilant attention to the safety of the men employed was in constant exercise, they were not, as appears to me, in any very imminent danger. The most alarming apprehension, probably, was the fall of the steam-pipes. This it appears engaged the particular attention of Capt. Kimball. He directed the rods, on one side to be loosened, to secure the expected fall in a safe direction. This, he says, was done, and the steam-pipes fell without injury to any one. The men, says Capt. Kimball, "worked jovially;" by which I understand, that they worked with alacrity, without fear, and with that hilarity which is usually the happy accompaniment of strenuous action in the performance of duty. It is to be considered, however, that if their services should be estimated as of a high order, that they were under peculiar obligations to extraordinary exertion to save the property of the passengers, considering the character, and origin of the disaster. There is presumptive evidence, that the steamer was at fault, in the collision, from want of due vigilance or attention by those who had her in charge at that moment. It is certain that such was the impression of the passengers, generally and emphatically expressed. Under such circumstances, the officers and crew of the New England were bound to the utmost exertions, after the passengers were placed in safety, to save their property. If the effect of the concussion had been reversed, and the Curlew had been the sufferer, and had been laden with valuable commodities, no one, I think, will say, that the officers and crew of the New England, could legally or reasonably claim pecuniary compensation for the relief that they might afford in such extremity, which their vessel had been instrumental in producing. In the actual event of the shock, they were equally bound to render all practicable aid, for the preservation of life and property intrusted to their care, and without demanding extraordinary reward for their exertions. Such, indeed, it is believed, was the spirit with which the libellants were actuated.

Remarks were made in the argument, relative to their motives, in their proceedings, and it was inferred that in the saving of the money from the captain's office, they were not influenced by the promise of reward, made by Mr. Dorr. Their motives, I should say, were probably various. They were told repeatedly, that the payment of their wages depended on saving the captain's money, contained in the iron safe. This, it may be presumed, had its influence. That they were not primarily prompted by Mr. Dorr's offers, would appear from the fact, that they did not forthwith employ themselves in recovering the property in the captain's office; but, very properly, began their labors in saving the contents of the baggage rack, by the opening at the sky-light. Their prevailing motive, may be considered to be a sense of duty, and respect to the orders and influence of their superior officer.

The bounty of the bank to Mr. Stone, probably produced new views and determinations in the minds of those who thought themselves equally entitled to reward. That gratuity, has no legal bearing on the case before me. If previously to that bestowment, Captain Kimball had been consulted, in regard to the application of such donation as the respondents might be willing to grant, or if the libellants themselves had made a claim on the bank, prior to the payment made by Mr. Stone, distribution might perhaps have been made, obviating all umbrage, and preventing the institution of this suit.

Such are my views of this case, and the libel will be dismissed. It is a relief to know, that, if the decision be erroneous, the libellants have their remedy by appeal, in the result of which any mistakes in matters of law, or in the application of law to the facts, may be corrected. Libel dismissed. It is understood that costs are not claimed for the respondents.

MESSENA et al. v. The NEILSON.

[24 Betts, D. C. MS. 13.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan. Term, 1858.

COLLISION—DEFENSES—TITLE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—LIGHTS.

[1. The fact that a pilot vessel is cruising off her station is no defense to a libel against another pilot vessel for a collision.]

[2. The fact that the owners of a vessel in possession have placed the title temporarily in another, to secure moneys borrowed to pay her purchase price, will not prevent their maintaining a libel for collision.]

[3. Libellant in a collision case must show freedom from contributory negligence.]

[4. There can be no recovery for the loss of a pilot boat in a collision where she was lying to in a thick cloud at night, without any light exhibited on deck, so as to afford a warning to approaching vessels, and with only a small boy on deck, where the colliding vessel was properly manned, and did not see the other until too late to avoid the collision.]

The pilot schooner Julia was built by Messrs. Grinnell & Woolsey, of this city, and enrolled and licensed in their name September 5, 1854. She was built under an arrangement with the libellants [Edward D. Messena and others] that they were to become purchasers and owners of her on payment of the costs and charges of her building. April 29, 1856, Grinnell & Woolsey licensed the vessel to the libellants; and on the 4th of March, 1857, Grinnell assigned her to his co-owner, Woolsey, and the libellants, as also all claims and demands against the pilot boat A. Bleeker Neilson and owners, and all persons concerned in producing the collision in question in this action. To fulfill the contract of purchase, the libellants, through Mr. Blunt, obtained from an insurance company a loan of money to pay the purchase price of the vessel under an arrangement that the ownership should be vested in G. W. Blunt for the security of that loan. Mr. Blunt accordingly took the legal title in his own name, for the security of that loan, with the privilege reserved to the libellants to pay off the debt by installments out of their earnings as pilots in the employment of the boat. When the debt was satisfied, the vessel was to become the property of the libellants, as co-owners, in the proportion they should have respectively paid towards the extinguishment of the debt. The loan has not yet been fully satisfied, and the title of the boat still remains in the name of Blunt at his disposal for satisfaction of that debt.

On the 19th of October, 1856, the pilot boat, under the command and in the employment of the libellants, was allotted to keep station near the Hook, in conformity to the by-laws of the board of commissioners of pilots; and in violation of their duty in that respect, she was that evening removed from that station seven or eight miles, and employed in cruising for vessels outside the Hook, and between eight and nine o'clock in the evening she encountered the collision which is the subject of this action. The Julia was lying to, under headway of about 1¼ knots the hour, heading S. S. W., the wind W. S. W., and moderate. It was a dark starlight night, but a thick cloud or bank lay in the S. E., towards which the two vessels were steering. The Julia had two hands in charge of the deck, the rest of the crew having their watch below; one of these assigned to her charge was a lad of 17 years old, and the other, an able seaman. The boy had charge of the helm, and the other was below, when the schooner A. B. Neilson was discovered from the Julia approaching on her starboard side, from the north, the two vessels then being 3 or 4 miles southerly of the station ship, and running pretty much in the same direction. No light was on the Julia except a small hand-lamp, standing in the binnacle, and there was no lookout on deck. The man below was hailed by the boy, and told that a vessel was approaching; he answered the hail, but not coming on deck, the boy shortly after caught the binnacle lamp, and ran forward, calling again earnestly that a vessel was coming right at her, when the man came out, took the lamp from the boy, and held it out over the railing, as a warning towards the Neilson. The light was then first seen on the Neilson, but she was too near the Julia to be able to avoid her. The Neilson was well manned, with a competent lookout upon deck, stationed about midships, and as far forward as is usual in small vessels, and as far as could be and keep out of the spray thrown over her bows, and he was moving backwards and forwards, and across the deck, looking out attentively in all directions. She also had a lantern lighted, and in good order, suspended in the shrouds, 10 or 12 feet above the deck. The Julia was not seen from her until the binnacle lamp was held out as a warning, and when the two vessels were nearly in contact, and too late for anything to be successfully done on board either to avoid the collision. The Julia was struck on her starboard side, and shortly after went down, and became a total loss.

BETTS, District Judge. I shall lay out of view in this case the fact that the Julia was off her station at the time of the collision, as affording any excuse for a trespass committed upon her. This was no malfeasance which the claimant could set up as a bar to his liability for his own illegal conduct. The libellants may have been liable to fine or disability, because of disobedience to the regulations of the service in which they were subordinate, but such delinquency would not outlaw them in respect to the fullest protection and remedy in this suit, if wronged in their persons or property, by the unjustifiable acts of the claimant or his agents. Their act was not a fault in itself conducing to the collision, and thereby also inflicting an injury upon the claimant, because the Neilson had no reason for guarding herself specifically against the Julia, or to suppose she was near the station ship or in any other particular position. Her being found in this place, therefore, could in no way mislead the colliding vessel in the choice of her own course, or in the manner in which she pursued it.

Nor shall I regard the question of title to the Julia, or the competency of the libellants to maintain this action upon the footing of the provisional interest accruing to them in the vessel under the arrangement for her purchase, whether set up as a legal or equitable ownership, or a right to an exclusive possession and use of the vessel. Mr. Blunt's testimony proves that he considers himself the trustee of the Insurance Co. creditor, and to be to the libellants no more than a pipe of conveyance, by which the title is to be transmitted to the libellants, when the debt owed the company is extinguished. To that period he regards himself the trustee of that creditor; and if the debt is not paid, he supposes the boat is to be devoted by him to that end. The libellants do not produce proof of the paper title to the boat, from Grinnell to them, although they offer in evidence papers prepared and partially executed for that purpose. Passing by those collateral points, I shall look only at the merits of the case involved in the charge of culpability of the Neilson, and the right of the Julia to damages incurred in the transaction which occasioned the loss, assuming that the libellant had a possessory interest in her at the time, which was destroyed or injured by the collision.

A cardinal principle lying at the bottom of actions for collision at sea is that the party setting up an offence or tort, to have been committed to his damage by another, must show himself clear of any misfeasance or remissness conducing to or promoting the injury. He grounds himself in his plaint essentially on the assumption that every thing incumbent on him by law to do in respect to the preparation and management of his vessel on the occasion was duly performed, and in a cautious and skillful manner, and these matters must be clearly proved by him. Abb.

Shipp. 306; Story, Bailm. § 609. And if that was not so, he could stand only upon his common-law remedies, under which he is debarred all remuneration in his losses, when what he suffers is attributable wholly to the want of proper diligence or precaution on his part. As the complaining party, he must supply preponderating proof that the injury he sustained proceeded from negligence or the want of skill in the management of the vessel he proceeds against, and charges with causing him the loss he has sustained. The Catherine of Dover, 2 Hagg. Adm. 145; The William Young [Case No. 17,760]; The Relief [Id. 11,693]. The position of the Neilson to the rear and windward of the Julia imposed upon the former the duty of keeping clear of the latter in passing her. The Governor [Id. 5,645]. But she is relieved of blame in failing to do so, if, from causes not under her own control, but, on the contrary, created or promoted by the Julia, she was prevented discovering her until too late to escape her. Peck v. Sanderson, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 178. It appears to me the evidence on the part of the libellants themselves clearly casts the blame upon them in this respect. If not actually lying to at the time, the Julia was enveloped in a thick cloud in almost a motionless state. She was discernible only a few yards distance from a vessel proceeding from northerly towards the east, and there being no more than a small binnacle light in use, and that not exhibited on deck in a way calculated to afford warning to vessels nearing her, and with only one small boy on deck to manage the vessel and keep a lookout. Each of these particulars are evidence of culpable negligence on the part of the libellants, and would excuse the Neilson from responsibility for the consequences of the collision, especially upon the clear and positive testimony given by the claimants, that the Julia was not in fact discovered from the Neilson until too late for her to take any effectual measures to escape a collision.

The case before cited—[Peck v. Sanderson] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 178—declares the rule to be that the omission of a vessel injured by a collision to supply proper notice of her position to another known to be in a dangerous proximity to her relieves the colliding vessel from liability for the injury done in consequence. The fact implied by the court in that case is distinctly proved in this by the libellants' testimony that the helmsman on the Julia saw the light of the Neilson approaching and bearing directly upon the former, before he called the watch from below, and in time to allow a second call and several minutes to intervene, before he came on deck, and any warning light was shown to the Neilson, and which was the first notice to her that the Julia was in the way. These acts of neglect and culpable mismanagement on board the Julia are sufficient to bar all right of recovery in this case; but, independent of the faults of which the libellants were guilty, it is, in my judgment, satisfactorily proved that the Neilson was properly manned and conducted, and the rate of six or eight knots the hour at which she was running was not unsafe or imprudent at the time. It is further to be remarked that although the excusatory evidence offered by the libellants for the neglect and irregularity in the management of the Julia comes in part from the libellants themselves, and therefore, if admissible at all, must be received with distrust and great allowance, yet the testimony given by witnesses indifferent to the parties and the controversy is overpowering to prove a plain and culpable neglect and want of precaution in failing to signalize the Neilson in some proper way, and apprize the latter of her position, after the boy at her helm became aware the other was nearing her in her position, and whilst there remained ample time to give such warning as would have placed it in the power of the Neilson to protect both from harm. It was not necessary that the Neilson, to exonerate herself from responsibility for this injury, should show she exercised the highest possible diligence and precaution to avoid it. That might require her to come to absolutely and suspend all movements during the night; it is sufficient for her to exercise the usual and ordinary precaution of vessels under way, and with that restriction she was entitled to continue her voyage notwithstanding possible circumstances might intervene rendering her navigation dangerous to other vessels. Stuart v. Foster, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 93. The testimony of disinterested witnesses satisfactorily proves the speed of the Neilson at the time to have been no greater than was prudent as she was manned and managed, not exceeding 6 to 8 miles the hour, and the boy on the Julia proves he saw her light distinctly a mile or more off. Under the facts in evidence, I hold, therefore, that the fault of the collision lies primarily with the Julia, and that the libellants cannot therefore sustain this action to charge the consequences of it upon the Neilson.

Libel dismissed, with costs to be taxed.

COLLISION—STEAMER AND SAIL VESSEL.

[A steamer meeting a sail vessel beating against wind and tide is bound to anticipate the sail vessel going in stays for another tack when necessary or proper to do so, and so regulate her speed as to avoid the sail vessel.]

In admiralty.

2 [Date not given.]

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This libel in rem is brought by John T. Messereau, owner of the sloop David D. Crum, against the steam propeller Sophia, to recover damages suffered by the sloop in a collision with the propeller in the Kills, between Staten Island and the New Jersey shore, on the 10th day of June, 1859. The sloop was bound from the Palisades to Elizabethport, and the propeller was on her voyage from Philadelphia to New York. The wind was blowing fresh at the time down the Kills toward New York Bay, and the tide was ebb, setting with a pretty strong current in the same direction. The collision occurred about 11 o'clock in the morning, and while the propeller was moving with considerable speed. The sloop was under single reef mainsail and jib, heavily loaded with stone and was beating against wind and tide. The captain of the propeller states that when he first saw the sloop she was just standing on her long tack toward Bergen Point; that she did not continue on that tack as long as she might, and as long as he had a right to expect she would, but that she suddenly went in stays and stood for the Staten Island shore, on her short tack. He states that when she went in stays for this latter tack she was rather astern of the propeller, and that if she had kept her course close she would have passed to the westward of and under the stern of the propeller, but that, on the contrary, she kept away, as if making a long instead of a short tack toward Staten Island, thereby coming across the bows of the propeller; that when he saw the course of the sloop he slowed and stopped his engine, and ported his helm, thereby endeavoring to avoid the collision.

Now I think the evidence clearly shows that the captain of the propeller both mistook the position of the sloop and his duty towards her, and that he failed in his duty towards her in several important and decisive particulars. (1) I think he was bound to anticipate that the sloop would go in stays and come on to her short tack near the spot where she did. (2) That, if the vessels had occupied the relative positions which he claims they did when the sloop went in stays for her short tack, the collision would have been impossible; for the steamer, with her speed as stated by him, would have passed the point of collision before the sloop could have reached it. (3) That, seeing this sailing vessel, beating up a narrow channel against wind and tide, the propeller going in the opposite direction with the wind and tide in her favor, under the power of steam, should have had her speed effectually checked, and, if necessary, stopped, in season to have passed the sloop in safety. (4) It is evident from the whole evidence, including that of the captain of the propeller, that he did not accurately calculate the position of the sloop, the necessary course which she must take on her short tack, and the inevitable effect of the wind and tide in carrying her on this tack to the eastward, down the Kills, and that he erroneously supposed he could safely pass to the southward of her, and that in attempting to do so the collision occurred, through the fault of the propeller, and without fault on part of the sloop.

It follows from these conclusions that a decree must be entered for the libellant, and an order of reference to ascertain the damages.

METAL STAMPING CO. v. CRANDALL.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. Term, 1880.

BILL OF REVIVOR—BY ASSIGNEE—SUPPLEMENTAL BILL—PRACTICE IN EQUITY—UNINCORPORATED COMPANY—HOW SUIT PROSECUTED.

1. A bill of revivor will not lie when filed by the assignee of the original complainant, as the right to file such a bill is confined to cases of representation of the party deceased by the mere operation of law.

2. In case of the death of an original complainant and assignor the proper course for the assignee is to file a supplemental bill.

3. The bill of an unincorporated company should be prosecuted in the names of the individual partners, and not in the name of the company.

In equity.

A. v. Briesen, for complainant.

R. H. Duell, George W. Hay, and Charles H. Duell, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. This cause comes here upon the bill of revivor filed by the complainants, the plea of the defendant, the replication of the complainant, and the proofs taken under the issue thus raised. The original bill was filed by Charles Schuessler, March 24, 1879, to restrain the infringement of letters patent [No. 61,628] for an "improvement in buckle-fastenings," originally issued to Robert Meyers on the 29th day of January, 1867, assigned by him to Schuessler, May 8, 1874, and reissued to Schuessler, as assignee of Meyers, May 23, 1876 [No. 7,129]. There was an answer and replication in the original suit, and proofs were taken therein [Case No. 12,485]; but before a hearing, and on the 6th day of September, 1879, Schuessler died. The proofs show that March 16, 1874, Schuessler and one Walters entered into an agreement to become partners under the name of the Metal Stamping Company, by which, among other things, they agreed that all inventions or improvements made by either party, or for which either party should obtain letters patent, should be owned by the parties jointly and equally. November 27, 1877, one Loercher was, by articles of agreement admitted as a partner into the firm of the Metal Stamping Company, the agreement reciting that Loercher was to have a fifth interest in the assets and business of the firm as manufacturers under various letters patent including the Meyers reissued letters patent. By a further agreement made between the partners August 13, 1879, Schuessler transferred to the Metal Stamping Company the sole and exclusive right and privilege to manufacture, use, and sell the invention and improvement described in the letters patent during the life of the partnership, and the agreement of transfer also provided that upon the dissolution or extinction of the partnership the letters patent should only be assigned by the joint signatures of the partners or their legal representatives. It thus appears that when the original bill was filed Schuessler held the legal title to the patent in question; but the equitable title to the patent and the right to recover for damages by reason of its infringement since its assignment to Schuessler was in the Metal Stamping Company, and by the instrument of August 13, 1879, the legal title to the patent became vested in the Metal Stamping Company, because after that nothing remained in Schuessler which he could transfer without the participation of the other members of the firm.

The case thus presents the single question whether a bill of revivor will lie to introduce the Metal Stamping Company into the controversy, and I am of opinion that it will not, because the complainant's interests have not been acquired by the death of Schuessler, but by the transfers and agreements made between him and the complainants. After the complainants acquired the legal title to the patent they were in a position to file a supplemental bill. Story, Eq. Pl. § 346. The right to file a bill of revivor is confined to cases of representation of the party deceased by the mere appointment and operation of law. Story, Eq. Pl. § 354. On the other hand there may be a priority of right and title under the deceased by a transfer or conveyance of that right to a person who is not in by mere operation of law, and is not the heir or personal representative of the deceased, and in such a case a bill of revivor will not lie. 2 Barb. Ch. Prac. 51.

It is proper to suggest that as the Metal Stamping Company is not a corporation, but the name of a partnership, neither a bill of revivor nor a supplemental bill can be prosecuted except in the names of the individual partners. This point has not been raised, but should not be overlooked if further proceedings are taken. Judgment is ordered for the defendant upon the plea.

BANKRUPTCY—STAYING PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURTS—APPEAL.

1. A judgment in a state court against a bankrupt, which has been duly appealed from by him, is not a final judgment under the twenty-first section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)].

2. The prosecution of the case, under such appeal, is forbidden to the creditor by that section.

[Approved in Re Leszynsky, Case No. 8,278.] [Cited in Brandon Manuf'g Co. v. Frazer, 47 Vt. 89.]

3. A motion to compel the bankrupt to furnish new security on such appeal, or abandon the appeal, is embraced within that prohibition.

[In the matter of Benjamin F. Metcalf and Samuel Duncan, bankrupts.] This case came before the court upon a petition filed by Henry D. Brookman and John U. Brookman, for relief from an injunction issued by this court restraining all proceedings in a certain cause pending in the court of appeals of the state of New York, wherein the petitioners were plaintiffs, and one of the bankrupts the defendant. It appeared that the case had been tried, and judgment given for the plaintiffs, which judgment had, however, been appealed from by the defendant, who had given security upon such appeal, as required by law. It also appeared that one of the sureties upon the appeal had become insolvent, and the plaintiffs had, since the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, given notice of a motion to compel the bankrupt to furnish new security, or abandon his appeal; whereupon the bankrupt obtained from this court, in which his petition in bankruptcy had been filed, an injunction staying all proceedings in the cause referred to, which injunction the plaintiffs in that cause now asked to have dismissed.

Owen, Nash & Gray, for the motion.

Emerson & Goodrich, in opposition.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The twenty-first section of the bankruptcy act declares that "no creditor whose debt is provable under this act shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined." This is a very clear provision, the object of which is to prevent a race of diligence between creditors, and to protect the bankrupt from being harassed with suits pending the question of his discharge. It seems to apply to all cases where the personal liability of the debtor is sought to be fixed or ascertained by a final judgment pending the determination of the question of his discharge, and, in my opinion, it applies to a case like the present, where an action against one of the bankrupts is pending in the court of appeals of the state, to which an appeal had been taken by him prior to the filing of the petition in bankruptcy. In such a case there is no final judgment within the meaning of the bankruptcy act; the debtor's liability has not been finally determined, and there being no final judgment, the bankruptcy act declares that the suit shall stop, pending the determination of the question of the bankrupt's discharge. This option to endeavor to obtain a discharge in bankruptcy, and, failing in that, to defend all undetermined personal actions, is a right given a debtor by the bankruptcy act under the constitution of the United States, and he is entitled to be protected in that right by this court. But it is said that the motion for further security, which has been noticed by the creditor in the actions pending in the court of appeals, is not strictly a proceeding against the bankrupt. I think otherwise. It is just the proceeding which will compel the bankrupt to determine, pending his application for his discharge, whether to defend the suit or allow a final judgment. But the bankruptcy act does not permit him to be forced to decide that question now. It declares that no such suit shall be allowed to proceed until he has had a reasonable time to obtain his discharge, if he can, and the mandate of the act to this court is to stay such a proceeding in whatever court it may be pending. My opinion, therefore, is, that it is the clear duty of this court to maintain the injunction heretofore granted against the petitioners until the bankrupt shall have had a reasonable time to obtain his discharge. What effect the discharge, if obtained, will have upon the proceedings pending in the state courts, I do not undertake to decide. The motion must be denied.

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 1 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 46, contains only a partial report.]

METCALF v. DAVIES SCREW CO. et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1878.

TAX SALE—TAX ON CHATTELS—SALE OF LAND—REMEDY.

Taxes on chattels are not a lien on the real property of the owner until after judgment on suit to recover them.

The real and personal property of the Davies Screw Company, at Dayton, Ohio, having been sold, under mortgage and judgment liens, and the fund being insufficient to pay the liens, two claims in respect to taxes were interposed, each claiming priority over the creditors. One was by Samuel Bigger, purchaser of the real property at tax sale. This was contested on the ground that the auditor's certificate was void for want of certainty; the description of the property being "six acres of land, east of Troy Road, sections 4 and 34, township 1, range 7,. in said county." The other claim was by the treasurer of Montgomery county, who claimed priority for payment of the taxes assessed against the company, upon its chattel property, for the years 1866 and 1867. Upon this assessment the treasurer obtained judgment in the court of common pleas, and execution was levied, but it was subsequent to the mortgage and levies by the marshal in favor of the creditors, who resisted on the ground that the statute creates no lien for taxes upon personal property.

King, Thompson & Maxwell, for complainant.

Thomas & Kemper, for Bigger.

W. Munger, for treasurer.

SWING, District Judge. Two questions are presented for decision. The first grows out of the claim of Samuel Bigger, purchaser at tax sale. Under this sale the purchaser claims a lien for the amount of the taxes paid, and fifty per cent. penalty, and six per cent. interest thereon. To this claim it is objected that the tax sale was void by reason of the imperfect description of the land sold. Was this sale void? We think this is not an open question. In Raymond v. Longworth [Case No. 11,595], in which the description was as in this case, it was held insufficient, and the sale was declared void. Upon error to the supreme court of the United States (14 How. [55 U. S.] 76) this decision of the court below was affirmed. And see, also, the various cases decided by the supreme court of Ohio, holding the same doctrine as referred to in the opinion of the court. The description in this case is literally within the cases referred to, and their authority is conclusive upon the question. The tax sale must be held void; and under the statute of Ohio, and the decision of the supreme court of the state in Johnson v. Stewart, 29 Ohio St. 498, the purchaser at tax sale is entitled to the sum by him paid at such sale, and the subsequent taxes, with 6 per cent. interest thereon.

The second question grows out of the claim of the treasurer of Montgomery county for the taxes due upon the personal property belonging to the Davies Screw Co., for the years 1866 and 1867. The personal property was, under an execution issued from this court, levied upon and taken into possession by the marshal in January, 1877. By the laws of Ohio a lien is created in favor of the state upon all real estate for the taxes thereon, but no such lien is created upon personal property; the only provision of law in relation to personal property in that respect is that all personal property subject to taxation shall be liable to be seized and sold for taxes. Such lien would be wholly impracticable, and therefore the legislature has never attempted to create one. It follows, therefore, that the marshal holds this property freed from any claim of the state for taxes assessed prior to his levy thereon.

As to the taxes assessed subsequent to the levy of the marshal there may be some question. It is claimed that the taking of the property under execution by the marshal did not relieve it from taxation; that it was the duty of the marshal to return it for taxation. There is certainly no express, and I think no implied, provision of the law which requires the marshal to do so. Indeed, a provision of this character would be attended with greater difficulty than that of a lien; and the officers in this case seem to have so regarded the law, for they never made any demand upon the marshal to do so. When the Davies Screw Co. failed to return the property for taxes, they listed these chattels in its name, and as its property, and levied the taxes thereon against said company; and subsequently, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute, they obtained a judgment against the company for the amount thereof which was levied upon the property. There being no law requiring the marshal to list this property for taxation, and no proceeding against him in relation thereto, and there being no lien upon this property for the payment of the taxes, the only lien, if any, which exists, is that by the levy of the execution issued upon the judgment against the Davies Screw Co. for the taxes; and this, being subsequent to the title of the marshal, is postponed to it.

The application must therefore be overruled.

[5 Dill. 565.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. 1879.

BANKRUPTCY — ADJUDICATION OF BANKRUPTCY AGAINST A PARTNERSHIP—NECESSARY PARTY —DORMANT PARTNER.

1. It is not essential to the validity of an adjudication of bankruptcy against a partnership that a secret or dormant partner should be made a defendant.

2. The firm property is bound by an adjudication made against the ostensible partners.

3. A dormant or secret partner is not a necessary defendant at law or in equity.

4. Effect of non-joinder of a joint party to a contract discussed.

[This was a suit by Henry H. Metcalf, assignee of the estate of A. Bernard, John G. Mead, and M. E. Mead, trading as A. Bernard & Co., against Thomas Officer and William H. M. Pusey, trading as Officer & Pusey. The defendants demur.]

A. B. & J. C. Cummings, for plaintiff.

C. C. Cole and N. M. Pusey, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and LOVE, District Judge.

LOVE, District Judge. This case is before the court upon the demurrer of the defendants to the plaintiff's petition. The plaintiff, who sues as assignee in bankruptcy, shows that the petition in bankruptcy was filed on the 1st of May, 1877, by certain creditors of A. Bernard & Co., against A. Bernard and John G. Mead as the members composing that firm, and that on the 13th day of May, 1877, they were duly adjudged bankrupts; that on the 5th day of May, 1877, the plaintiff was elected assignee of said estate of A. Bernard & Co., and received a conveyance of the same from the register under the order of the court; that thereafter, on the 12th day of October, 1877, a supplemental petition was filed in the court of bankruptcy by said creditors, alleging that M. E. Mead was a partner in said firm of A. Bernard & Co., and praying that she might be made a party and adjudged a bankrupt upon the original petition, and that such proceedings were had that she was, on the 19th day of November, 1877, made a party thereto and adjudged a bankrupt on said original petition as a member of said firm; that on the 24th day of January, 1878, an assignment was duly made, by order of the court, of all the estate that the bankrupts, or either of them, possessed on said 1st day of May, 1877. The plaintiff further states that about the 5th day of April, 1877, said firm of A. Bernard & Co. made a payment to defendants in the sum of $3,500, defendants being then creditors of said A. Bernard & Co. in said sum, and that said sum was paid under circumstances which made it a fraudulent preference under the bankrupt law.

The court having caused the papers in the original case to be certified for its inspection, finds it to be alleged in the supplemental petition, among other things, that the petitioning creditors were informed by both A. Bernard and John G. Mead, at the time of the purchasing of the goods which formed the basis of their claims, that said A. Bernard and John G. Mead were the persons composing said firm of A. Bernard & Co.; that they filed their petition in bankruptcy to put said partnership into bankruptcy under that belief; that, at the time of filing said creditors' petition, each of said petitioning creditors had been informed and believed that said firm of A. Bernard & Co., then carrying on business in Council Bluffs, Iowa, was composed of A. Bernard and John G. Mead; that each of said petitioning creditors continued in the belief that said A. Bernard and John G. Mead composed said firm until about the 27th day of September, 1877, when, upon the trial of a certain action brought by this plaintiff to recover assets claimed to belong to said estate, A. Bernard testified that Mrs. M. E. Mead, the wife of said John G. Mead, was a partner in said firm of A. Bernard &

Co., and that, until it so appeared by the testimony of said A. Bernard, each of said petitioning creditors was ignorant of the fact that Mrs. M. E. Mead was a member of said firm. It also appears by the original petition that the acts of bankruptcy were committed in the month of April, 1877, to-wit, on the 21st day of April, 1877, and at other times within the same month.

It is clear that the foregoing statements, taken together, amount to an allegation that Mrs. M. E. Mead was a dormant or secret partner of said firm, and that A. Bernard and John G. Mead were the ostensible partners; and this court will presume, after judgment, at least, that the district court, in which said supplemental petition was heard and determined, so found.

The object of the present suit is to compel Officer & Pusey, the defendants, to restore to the assignee the sum of money which they received from A. Bernard & Co., the bankrupts, in payment of the bankrupts' debt to them. It is claimed that the payment was an illegal preference, in fraud of the bankrupt law.

In support of this demurrer the defendants contend: (1) That a partnership can be put in bankruptcy only by proceedings against all the partners. (2) That the fact that there was a secret or unknown partner does not affect the question. (3) That the proceeding by supplemental petition was absolutely void, since common law governs proceedings in bankruptcy, and amendments are not allowed. (4) That the limitation prescribed by the bankrupt law ran till the amendment or supplemental petition was filed, which was after the expiration of the two months fixed by the amendment to that statute, and that, inasmuch as the amendment or supplemental petition was not filed until more than two months after the alleged acts of bankruptcy were committed, this action cannot be maintained.

Thus the question is whether or not it is essential to the validity of an adjudication of bankruptcy against a partnership that a secret or dormant member of the firm should be made a defendant. The adjudication ordinarily brings the individual as well as the partnership property, debts, and assets into bankruptcy to be administered, but this result follows the adjudication only where the individual members whose property is to be affected are served with process or duly notified by publication. But may not the partnership property, debts, and assets be brought into bankruptcy and bound by the adjudication by serving the ostensible partners only? Is it absolutely necessary that the petitioning creditors should, in order to reach the partnership property, bring before the court an unknown member of the firm, whose existence as such is kept a secret by the ostensible members? If so, the most serious inconvenience and confusion would follow as a consequence.

The petitioning creditors cannot, in the first instance, do what to them is impossible. They cannot make members of the firm who keep themselves out of view, and with whom they have made no contract, parties defendant to the petition; and this is by no fault of the petitioning creditors, but rather by that of the members of the firm, both secret and ostensible. The cause against the ostensible members proceeds to adjudication; the creditors meet, choose an assignee, and by the order of the court all of the partnership property, and all of the individual property of the ostensible members who are served, is conveyed to the assignee; the assignee takes possession of the property and assets, collects and pays debts, adjusts liens, sells and conveys property, and makes dividends. After all this, it turns out that there was a secret partner, whom the petitioning creditors, not knowing, did not serve. What follows, according to the doctrine of this demurrer? The adjudication was an absolute nullity. The adjudication was the sole fountain of authority for all that has been done in pursuance of it. The counsel for the defendants contend that there is no remedy but to set aside the adjudication and serve the secret members of the firm; and I suppose that if at some future stage of the proceedings another secret member should be discovered, it would be necessary to set aside the adjudication again and begin de novo. But how, in the meantime, are the confusion and mischief arising from the sale and conveyance of the property of the bankrupt by the assignee, and the administration generally by that officer, to be remedied? Upon this point the counsel have given us no light. It cannot, of course, be denied that the resulting mischief is the direct consequence of the misconduct of the ostensible partners, in first keeping the fact of there being another partner concealed, and in not, in the second place, pleading the existence of the secret partner in abatement.

Counsel, in order to justify a doctrine leading to such consequences, appeal to the analogies of the common law. I see, myself, no reason why a different rule as to parties in this respect should prevail in bankruptcy from that which obtains in equity and common law proceedings. What, then, is the rule at law and in equity as to the necessity of bringing in a secret partner in order to make a judgment valid as to the firm? It may be safely affirmed that it never was essential that a secret or dormant partner should be served in a proceeding at law or in equity. If any district court in bankruptcy has affirmed the contrary, it has simply mistaken the law, and it would have done well not to publish its opinion.

At common law the non-joinder of a party to a joint contract could be taken advantage of only by plea in abatement, in which it was incumbent on the defendant to give his adversary a better writ, as the phrase was—that is, it was necessary in the plea to name the parties jointly liable and not included in the original writ. If the defendant failed to plead in abatement, he could not avail himself of the omission to make the joint obligor a party on the trial by moving for a non-suit, and the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. But if the plaintiff failed to make a joint contractor with himself a party plaintiff, the consequence was much more serious, for the defendant might, at the trial, in such case, move for a non-suit, and the plaintiff's action fail. Such was the law even as to ostensible parties to a joint contract. With respect to dormant or secret partners, it never was, at common law or in equity, necessary for the plaintiff to join them in the action. The law was not so unreasonable as to require the plaintiff to join in his suit a party defendant with whom he had no contract or privity whatever, and of whose existence he had no notice.

The true rule is now settled to be that if the plaintiff has no means of knowing the existence of the dormant partner's relation to the firm, the partner sued cannot plead in abatement the non-joinder of the dormant partner. If the plaintiff was unaware of the dormant partnership at the time of making the contract sued upon, he might or might not, at his election, join the dormant partner. Ex parte Hamper, 17 Ves. 412; Ex parte Liddel, 2 Rose, 36; Grellier v. Neale, 1 Peake, 146; Robinson v. Wilkinson, 3 Price, 538; Ex parte Layton, 6 Ves. 438; Hoare v. The question really is with whom the contract was intended to be made. It would be a most strange doctrine to hold that a party should be compelled in an action on a contract to join one as defendant with whom he has no covenant whatever; but since a dormant partner participates in the profits, and is in fact a partner, a creditor of the firm may, at his election, hold him responsible, notwithstanding the fact of the want of privity of contract between them.

It was, moreover, the practice at common law to proceed by scire facias against a partner who, though liable, was not joined in the original action. Indeed, the plaintiff could not proceed otherwise. He could not sue the dormant partner without joining the ostensible partners, and he could not unite them in a new and independent action against the dormant partner, because he already had a judgment against them. The plaintiff's true course, therefore, was to proceed by scire facias on his judgment, in which he recited the previous proceedings and judgment, and averred the fact of dormant partnership and the consequent liability of the dormant partner, and prayed that he should be required to show cause why he should not be made a party to the judgment.

In the present case the writ of scire facias could not be employed. It is a common law writ wholly inapplicable to the original proceeding in bankruptcy. By analogy to it, however, the petitioning creditors in this case obtained leave to file a supplemental petition, stating the same facts and asking substantially the same relief. I have, myself, no doubt that in this way the secret partner was brought regularly into court and made a party to the adjudication. It is equally clear to my mind that all her effects and property were thus brought into bankruptcy to be administered. It does not, however, follow that third persons who were individual creditors of the secret partner, and who dealt with her as such, are to be affected injuriously by the delay in commencing the proceedings by supplemental petition to make her a party.

The supplemental petition was not filed until the two months had expired within which, by the provisions of the bankrupt law, it was necessary that it should be filed in order that the assignee might commence a suit to divest a third person of a fraudulent preference; and if this suit was an action by the assignee against an individual creditor of the dormant partner to impeach a payment to him out of the dormant partner's individual estate, I should, myself, strongly incline to the opinion that such individual creditor might successfully plead the limitation.

But this is not a suit to compel an individual creditor to restore a payment alleged to have been made to him out of the dormant partner's effects in fraud of the bankrupt law. This is a suit against a partnership creditor to compel him to repay to the assignee a sum of money which it is alleged the bankrupt firm paid him in fraud of the law. The proceeding to put the partnership into bankruptcy was commenced within the prescribed time. The limitation of the statute does not, therefore, apply to that proceeding. Both of the ostensible partners were served with process, and were regularly before the court. They had informed the petitioning creditors that they were the only members of the firm. The service upon the ostensible partners was, as we have seen, sufficient to put the firm into bankruptcy. The adjudication was strictly regular as to the firm. The firm was, to all intents and purposes, by a valid judgment, subjected to the orders of the court of bankruptcy. The fact that a subsequent petition was filed to bring in a dormant partner did not in the slightest degree invalidate the adjudication against the partnership. The utmost that can be said of the supplemental proceeding is that it was irregular, erroneous, and insufficient to bring the dormant partner and her estate into bankruptcy. The ostensible members of the partnership could not complain of the error in the judgment under the supplemental petition. It was owing to their misrepresentations that the secret member was not made a party to the original petition. To allow them to conceal the existence of their secret partner, and then to defeat the action of the creditors by the plea that the adjudication was erroneous and void as to them, would be to countenance a direct fraud upon the creditors of the partnership.

There seems to be no solid ground whatever for the argument that the adjudication of bankruptcy against the partnership was not only erroneous, but null and void, because the secret partner was not originally made a party, and because she was subsequently brought into court by the supplemental petition.

The original petition in bankruptcy was filed within two months from the time when the acts of bankruptcy were committed. It was, therefore, in time to enable the assignee to sue a party who had obtained a fraudulent preference, to the prejudice of the creditors. But counsel insist that the filing of the original petition, without making all the partners, ostensible as well as dormant, defendants, was a void act, and that it was, therefore, wholly unavailable to the creditors. Now, it was a thing simply impossible for the petitioning creditors to make the secret partner a party until they discovered that she was a partner, and this they did not discover until it was too late. Why did they not make the discovery till after the expiration of the two months? Whose fault was it? It was the fault of the partners themselves. All of the partners by concealment, and the ostensible partners by express representations, led the petitioning creditors into the erroneous belief that the ostensible partners were the only partners.

Shall the defendants be permitted to take advantage of their own wrong, or at least of their own fault, and defeat altogether the remedy of the petitioning creditors by pleading a delay caused by their own misconduct? Demurrer overruled.

Case No. 9,497.

METCALF v. ROBINSON.

[2 McLean, 363.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1841.

ACTION OF DEBT—DECLARATION—PROMISED TO PAY—AGREED TO PAY.

1. A declaration in debt on simple contract is bad, if it alledge the defendant promised to pay. The word "agreed," instead of "promised," should be used.

[Cited in Cruikshank v. Brown, 10 Ill. 78.]

2. The action of debt is founded upon the contract. The action of assumpsit on the promise. And this is the principal distinction between the two actions.

[Cited in Carrol v. Green, 92 U. S. 513.]

3. Though the declaration, in other respects, have the form of debt, yet if it alledge a promise, it has the form of assumpsit and not of debt.

At law.

M'Kinney & Gookins, for plaintiff.

Mr. Lockwood, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought on a bill of exchange, for $627 33, drawn by the plaintiff on the defendant, accepted by him and protested for nonpayment. The first count of the declaration complains, &c., of a plea that the defendant render unto the plaintiff one thousand dollars, which he owes and unjustly detains from him. For that whereas, &c., setting out the bill, its acceptance and protest for nonpayment. And that the plaintiff, as drawer, was forced and obliged to pay the holder, &c., of which the defendant had notice, "by means whereof said defendant then and there became liable to pay said plaintiff said sums of money; and being so liable, he, the said defendant, then and there undertook and promised to pay," &c. The second count states that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for so much money, &c., had and received to and for the use of the plaintiff at defendant's request. And, also, in the further sum of seven hundred dollars for money laid out and expended, &c.; and being so indebted, he, the said defendant, in consideration thereof, then and there undertook and promised to pay to the said plaintiff said sums of money, when he, the said defendant, should be thereunto requested. Yet the said defendant has refused, &c., to the damage of the said plaintiff two hundred dollars. To this declaration the defendant demurred, and assigned as cause of demurrer a misjoinder, the first count being in debt and the other in assumpsit.

The forms of a declaration in an action of indebitatus assumpsit, and in debt on simple contract are very similar. There are, however, certain words by which they are distinguished, and which give the one or the other character to the action. The action of debt is founded upon the contract, the action of assumpsit upon the promise, and in this consists the principal distinction between the two actions. In the action of debt, on simple contract, express or implied, the subject matter of the debt should be described precisely as in the common counts in assumpsit. The consideration for the contract must be stated, as also any inducement necessary to explain the contract of consideration, and it should be stated the party agreed to pay. Stating that he promised to do so would be bad. Emery v. Fell, 2 Term R. 28; 2 Bos. & P. 78. In the case of Brill v. Neele, 3 Barn. & Ald. 208, the record stated, that the plaintiff had brought his bill, &c., in a plea of debt, and the commencement of the declaration was in the common form in debt. The first count then stated, that defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for work and labor, &c., and, being indebted, that the defendant undertook and promised to pay upon request, &c. The second count was upon a quantum meruit, and in form like the first. The other counts were properly framed in debt. To this declaration there was a demurrer, assigning for cause the misjoinder of debt and assumpsit. In support of the demurrer the case of Dalton v. Smith, 2 J. P. Smith [Eng.] 618, was cited, where the court held a declaration containing counts precisely similar to be bad; and Lawrence, Justice, there said, that the counts laid with a promise were counts in assumpsit without a breach.

There can be no doubt, that in the case under consideration, the counts were intended to be in debt. This is plainly seen from the general form and language of the counts. The damages are laid at the conclusion of the declaration, as in debt, in a less amount than the sum demanded. But in both counts it is alledged that the defendant, "in consideration thereof, undertook and promised to pay." This, under the above authority, makes the counts assumpsit. They are counts in assumpsit without a breach. The breach assigned in the last count, which lays the damages at two hundred dollars, when the amount demanded is the sum of one thousand dollars, is wholly irregular. Leave given to the plaintiff to amend his declaration.

The METEOR.[1]

District Court, S. D. New York. March 14, 1866.[2]

VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY LAWS — FITTING OUT VESSEL — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE — RES GESTAE — PRESUMPTIONS.

[1. Where a libel of forfeiture is filed against a vessel under the act of 1818 (3 Stat. 448), on the ground that she was fitted out, or attempted to be fitted out, to cruise against a nation with which the United States are at peace, the suit is solely against the vessel herself, and the court is not concerned with the question, who are her real owners? Held, therefore, that where exceptions were filed to the claim on the ground that the persons claiming to be owners of the vessel were not her sole, true, and lawful owners, the court was under no obligations to try this issue before going into the merits of the libel, as it was wholly immaterial to the case.]

[2. A libel or forfeiture against a vessel which has been seized upon water navigable from the sea is a civil cause, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and must be tried to the court sitting as a court of admiralty, without a jury.]

[3. In order to condemn a vessel for violation of the neutrality laws, it is not necessary that any person should be first convicted of the crime of fitting out and arming her, or attempting to do so, for the purpose of cruising against any foreign country with which the United States are at peace. Nor is it necessary that there should be satisfactory evidence, produced under the libel of condemnation, of the commission of the personal offence by some person whose action concerning the vessel can, from his relation to it or to its owners, be imputed to the owners as their actions. On the contrary, it need not be shown that the owners were concerned in any violation of the law. All that is required is proof that the vessel was fitted out and armed, or attempted to be fitted out and armed, by some person or persons, with the unlawful intent, but their individuality or identity need not be shown.]

[4. To subject the vessel to forfeiture, it is not necessary that she should have been actually fitted out and armed in the United States, but it is sufficient if any person has been engaged, within the United States, directly or indirectly, in preparing the vessel with the intent that she should be employed in committing hostilities against a power with which the United States are at peace, whether the intent was to arm her in the United States or elsewhere.]

[5. The act of 1818 being clear and unambiguous on its face, the court will not look, for the purpose of interpreting it, to any arguments drawn from the history of the neutrality legislation of the United States, the condition of foreign relations, the political correspondence of the public authorities, or to the discussion in congress preliminary to its passage.]

[6. A certificate by the secretary of state of the United States, under his hand and the seal of the department, certifying that, from authentic information on file in his department, it appears that a state of war has existed from a given date between certain foreign nations, that the United States are at peace with both of them, and that a certain person named is the recognized consul for one of these nations in a certain port of the United States, is competent evidence, under the act of September 15, 1789, to prove the facts therein stated. And it is competent, also, under this act, to prove a declaration of war by one foreign nation against another by means of a translation, certified by the secretary in the same manner, of a document officially communicated to that department, which document is the promulgation by one of these foreign nations of its declaration of war.]

[7. It is within the discretion of a court of admiralty to permit amendments to a libel of forfeiture, even after the evidence is all in and the arguments thereon have been completed, in matters of substance as well as of form, when public justice and the substantial merits of the controversy require it, the only limitation being that such amendments shall not introduce any new res or subject of litigation.]

[8. Where a number of persons were associated together, according to a common plan, in an attempt to fit out and arm a vessel contrary to the neutrality laws, held, that certain testimony given by these persons, which was of a hearsay or secondary character, was admissible as declarations in reference to the common object, and as forming part of the res gestae.]

[9. Where the evidence on the part of the government creates a well-grounded suspicion that the vessel was intended to be fitted out and armed for the unlawful purpose mentioned in the statute, the failure of the claimants to put in any evidence explaining the suspicious circumstances must lead to the condemnation of the vessel.]

[2] [Reversed in Case No. 15,760.]

[This was a libel of forfeiture filed by the United States against the steamship Meteor because of an alleged violation of the neutrality act of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 448).]

Samuel G. Courtney, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

William M. Evarts and Joseph H. Choate, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. In directing, on the 13th of July last, the entry of a decree condemning and forfeiting the vessel, her tackle, &c., in this case, the court appended to the decree, as signed, a memorandum to the effect that it would proceed as early after the entry of the decree as might comport with the health and physical ability of the judge, to place on file, in connection with the decree, the positions of law and fact governing the judgment of the court in the decision thus rendered. The intention thus expressed will now be fulfilled.

The libel of information in this case is filed by the attorney of the United States for this district, on behalf of the United States, against the steamship Meteor, under seizure by the marshal of the district, and her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof, in a cause of seizure and forfeiture. The original libel was filed on the 23d of January, 1866. A monition was issued thereupon, on the same day, against the vessel, her engines, tackle, &c., returnable on the 13th of February, 1866. The monition was duly served on the day of its issue, by an attachment of the vessel, her engines, tackle, &c., by the marshal, and by the giving of due notice to all persons claiming the same.

On the 24th of January, 1866, an amended libel was filed, setting forth more particularly the alleged causes of action. The cause of action set forth in the original libel was simply that the vessel had been fitted out to commit hostilities against the government of Spain, in violation of the neutrality act of congress of 1818 [3 Stat. 447]. The amended libel states (1st) that the vessel "is now lying in the port of New York, on waters navigable from the sea by vessels of the burden of ten tons and upwards, within the Southern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and is ready to sail for certain places to the attorney of the United States unknown, with intent to cruise and commit hostilities, in the service of the government of Chile, against the subjects, citizens, and property of the government of her majesty the queen of Spain, with whom the United States are at peace"; (2d) that the vessel "has, on the 23d day of January, 1866, within the limits of the United States, to wit, at the Southern district of New York aforesaid, been fitted out and armed by certain persons to the said attorney unknown, with intent that such steamship or vessel should be employed in the service of the agents of the government of Chile, to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, and property of the aforesaid government of Spain, with which the United States then were, and now are, at peace, as aforesaid"; (3d) that the vessel "has, on the 23d day of January, 1866, within the limits of the United States, to wit, at the Southern district of New York aforesaid, been fitted out by certain persons to the said attorney unknown, with intent that such steamship or vessel should be employed in the service of some persons to the said attorney unknown, to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, and property of the said government of Spain, with which the United States then were, and now are, at peace as aforesaid"; (4th) that the said vessel "has, on the day and year aforesaid, and at the place aforesaid, and within the limits of the United States as aforesaid, been attempted to be fitted out by certain persons to the said attorney unknown, with intent that such steamship or vessel should be employed in the service of some persons to the said attorney unknown, to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens and property of said government of Spain, with which the United States are at peace"; (5th) "that certain persons whose names are to the said attorney unknown, on the day and year aforesaid, and at the place aforesaid, and within the limits of the United States, were knowingly concerned in the furnishing and fitting out of the said steamship or vessel, with knowledge and intent that such steamship or vessel should be employed in the service of some persons to the said attorney unknown, to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, and property of the said government of Spain, with which the United States were, and now are, at peace"; (6th) "that all and singular the matters hereinbefore secondly, thirdly, fourthly, and fifthly articulated, are all and each of them contrary to the third section of the act of congress approved April 20th, 1818, entitled 'An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned' "; and that, by reason of the premises and by virtue of the said act, the said steamship, her tackle, &c., and arms, &c., became forfeited. The prayer of the amended libel is as follows: "Wherefore, the said attorney of the United States, on behalf of the said United States, prays the usual process and monition of this honorable court against the said steamship, now under seizure by the marshal of this district aforesaid, and her tackle, apparel, furniture, arms, and ammunition, in this behalf to be made, and that all persons interested in the said steamship and her tackle, apparel, furniture, arms, and ammunition aforesaid, may be cited to answer the premises, and that, all due proceedings being had thereon, this honorable court may be pleased to decree for the forfeiture aforesaid, and that the said steamship Meteor and her tackle, &c., and arms and stores aforesaid, may be condemned for the use of the United States, according to the said act of congress," &c.

On the 13th of February, 1866, William F. Cary filed a claim to the vessel, her tackle, &c., which was subscribed by him and duly sworn to. The claim is in the words following: "And now William F. Cary, of the city of New York, merchant, intervening as agent for the interest of Robert B. Forbes and John M. Forbes, of Boston, in the state of Massachusetts, in the said steamship, her tackle, &c., appears before this honorable court, and makes claim to the said steamship, &c., &c., as the same are attached by the marshal, under process of this court, at the instance of the United States, and the said William F. Cary doth aver that he was in possession of the said steamship, &c., at the time of the attachment thereof, and that the persons above named are the true and bona fide sole owners of the said steamship, &c., and that no other person is the owner thereof, and the said Cary was and is the true and lawful bailee thereof, as agent and consignee; wherefore he prays to defend accordingly." On the same 13th of February, 1866, the said claimant, William F. Cary, filed his answer to the libel. The answer is as follows: "The answer of William F. Cary, of the city of New York, intervening for the interest of his principals, Messrs. John M. Forbes and Robert B. Forbes, of Boston, in the state of Massachusetts, to the libel of information of Daniel S. Dickinson, attorney of the United States for the Southern district of New York, who prosecutes on behalf of the said United States, against the said steamship Meteor, her tackle, apparel and furniture, in a cause of seizure and forfeiture, alleges as follows: First, the said respondent admits that the said steamship Meteor is now, and was at the time of her seizure, lying in the port of New York, within the Southern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and that, at the time of her seizure, she was ready to go to sea. Second, but the said respondent denies each and every other allegation in the said libel contained, and avers that the same are untrue, and he denies that by reason of the premises in the said libel set forth, or for any other cause, the said steamship, her tackle, &c., became or is forfeited, or subject to forfeiture. Wherefore the said respondent prays that the said libel may be dismissed with costs, and that the said steamship, her tackle, &c., may be restored to the possession of this respondent, as the agent of her said owners."

On the 15th of February, 1866, the attorney of the United States filed exceptions to the claim. The exceptions allege "that the said Robert B. Forbes and John M. Forbes were not at the time of the forfeiture alleged, in the libel aforesaid, and are not now, the sole, true and lawful owners of the said steamship Meteor, her tackle, &c., in manner and form as the said Robert B. Forbes and John M. Forbes have above claimed"; and the exceptions pray that the claim may be dismissed.

On the 26th of March, 1866, the cause, being upon the calendar for trial, was called in its order. The attorney of the United States insisted before the court that the hearing on the exceptions to the claim must be brought on before the trial of the issue raised by the answer to the libel, and that the affirmative upon the allegations made in the claim was cast upon the claimant. The counsel for the claimant controverted this position, and claimed that the attorney of the United States should proceed to trial upon the issue raised by the answer to the libel, and produce proofs in support of the libel, or submit to a decree dismissing it. The court decided that no triable issue had been framed on the exceptions to the claim; that any issue which might be framed on such exceptions would be an immaterial issue; that the suit was one in rem, prosecuted solely against a vessel and her appurtenances under seizure, and not a suit in personam, in any manner affecting personally the claimant, or the principals represented by him; that the court possessed no authority or jurisdiction over or in respect to the claimant or his principals, otherwise than through and by means of the res itself; and that the trial of the cause must proceed on the issue raised by the libel and the answer. It was accordingly proceeded with upon that issue.

The counsel for the claimant then insisted that the court, sitting as a court of admiralty, was incompetent to adjudge the cause and give the relief prayed for in the libel, and that the case must be tried by a jury, and moved that a jury be summoned and impannelled to try it. The court decided that the case was one of the seizure of a vessel upon waters navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, for a breach of the law of the United States, and was a civil cause, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and was within the cognizance of this court, sitting as a court of admiralty, and must be tried without a jury. The jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty of the United States, in cases like the present, is unquestionable, and is based upon constitutional and statutory authority, and settled by judicial decisions of long standing. Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2; Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 9 (1 Stat. 77); Glass v. The Betsey, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 6; Penhallow v. Doane, Id. 54; U. S. v. La Vengeance, Id. 297; U. S. v. The Betsey, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 443; Whelan v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 112; U. S. v. The Little Charles [Case No. 15,612]. The four cases of The Slavers, 12 Wall. [69 U. S.] 350–403, were all libels of information filed in the district court in admiralty. Those cases were all carried by appeal to the supreme court, and in all of them the vessels were condemned and forfeited for violations of the acts against the slave-trade, without any question being raised by either the court or counsel as to the jurisdiction of the district court in admiralty.

The counsel for the claimant then insisted that the libel must be dismissed for the reason that under the third section of the act of April 20, 1818, upon which the libel is founded, an indictment and conviction of the person or persons committing the offence named in that section is a necessary prerequisite to a decree for the forfeiture of the vessel. It was admitted by the attorney of the United States that there had been no such indictment or conviction. The third section of the act of April 20, 1818 (3 Stat. 448), enacts "that if any person shall, within the limits of the United States, fit out and arm, or attempt to fit out and arm, or procure to be fitted out and armed, or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people with whom the United States are at peace, or shall issue or deliver a commission within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not more than ten thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years; and every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all materials, arms, ammunition, and stores, which may have been procured for the building and equipment thereof shall be forfeited, one half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the United States." The court ruled that such previous conviction or indictment is not necessary under the statute, and denied the motion of the claimant to dismiss the libel.

As this question in regard to the necessity of a prior conviction of some person upon an indictment for violation of the third section of the act of 1818, before a condemnation of the offending vessel can be had, was much debated on the trial, it is deemed proper to state somewhat at length the reasons for the decision made by the court that such prior conviction is not necessary. The counsel for the claimant, in summing up the case before the court, after the evidence had all been put in, somewhat modified the views he had previously urged as to the necessity of a prior conviction of some person under the act, and maintained that, under the third section, the forfeiture of the vessel follows as a consequence of the completion of the offence forbidden by that section, and only as such consequence; that, before the vessel can be forfeited, there must either be an ascertained conviction of some person for the commission of the offence in question, or else there must be, on the trial of the issue raised by the libel and answer, satisfactory evidence of the commission by some person of the personal offence; and that such person must be some one whose action concerning the vessel can, from his relation to the vessel or its owners, be imputed to the owners as their action.

The positions thus maintained by the counsel for the claimant overlook the clearly marked distinction between a forfeiture resulting from a seizure under the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and a forfeiture resulting from a conviction and judgment in a court of law. This clearly marked distinction is founded upon the character of a proceeding in rem in the admiralty. The proceeding in the present case is wholly one in rem, and the character of such a proceeding is nowhere more accurately defined than in the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of U. S. v. The Little Charles [Case No. 15,612]. The vessel in that case was seized, as forfeited to the United States, for a violation of the embargo laws of December 22, 1807, and January 9, 1808 (2 Stat. 451, 453). A libel was filed against her, alleging that she departed from a port of the United States to a foreign place, with a cargo on board, contrary to the provisions of the embargo laws, and that she had therefore become forfeited to the United States, and had been seized within the jurisdiction of the court, as forfeited, and it prayed for a decree of forfeiture. On the trial of the cause, the district court rejected as testimony the report and manifest of the cargo of the vessel, signed by the master, as incompetent evidence, upon the ground that the ex parte oath of the master thereto could not be read as evidence in the cause, he being no party to it. On an appeal taken by the United States to the circuit court, an objection was made to the admissibility in evidence of the report and manifest, with the oath of the master, upon the ground that the case was a criminal case, and that the declarations of the master could not affect the vessel or the owners. Upon this point Chief Justice Marshall says: "The argument that in criminal cases no authority can be given, that the character of principal and agent disappears, and the parties become accomplices, will not be controverted. If this was a prosecution against the owner personally, and the confession of the master was adduced, to prove that he acted under the authority of the owner, the argument would be entitled to great consideration. But this is not a proceeding against the owner, it is a proceeding against the vessel, for an offence committed by the vessel, which is not less an offence, and does not the less subject her to forfeiture, because it was committed without the authority, and against the will of the owner. It is true that inanimate matter can commit no offence. The mere wood, iron, and sails of the ship cannot, of themselves, violate the law. But this body is animated and put in action by the crew, who are guided by the master. The vessel acts and speaks by the master. She reports herself by the master. It is therefore, not unreasonable that the vessel should be affected by this report. But this vessel is the property of another, and his property, it is said, ought not to be wrested from him by evidence which would be inadmissible in an ordinary question concerning property. The court thinks otherwise. The master is selected by the owner, as his agent, for the purpose, among others, of reporting the vessel on her coming into port. The report is not a criminal act, but one prescribed by law. It must state truly the voyage, and, however criminal that voyage may be, in reporting it, the master is in the precise line of his duty, and in the execution of an authority inseparable from his character as master. This report, then, which is in the very terms prescribed by law, contains, according to the mandate of the law, an averment of the place from which the vessel last sailed. This averment, then, the owner has authorized the master to make for him; and although he may certainly be permitted to controvert it, the court deems it prima facie evidence of the fact. Such evidence has often been considered in the supreme court sufficient to warrant a forfeiture in the absence of that testimony which would be in the power of the claimant, if innocent, and was so considered in the case of The Aurora, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 382." The circuit court reversed the decree of the district court, and condemned the vessel.

A proceeding in rem against a vessel or other thing for a forfeiture, because of the violation of a statute of the United States, is an entirely distinct proceeding from a prosecution of a person through whose agency or procurement the offence has been committed; and it is well settled that no conviction of any person for the offence is necessary to warrant a condemnation of the res. This was decided by the supreme court in the case of The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1. That was a libel of information against the vessel to forfeit her for a piratical aggression committed in violation of the acts of congress of March 3, 1819, and May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 510, 600). The district court restored the vessel without damages for the capture. The circuit court, on appeal, affirmed so much of the decree as acquitted the vessel, and reversed so much of it as denied damages, and itself awarded damages. The United States and the captors appealed to the supreme court, and the objection was there taken by the appellees that the offenders were not alleged in the libel to have been convicted upon any prosecution in personam, of the offence charged in the libel, and that there must be a due conviction, upon a prosecution and indictment for the offence in personam, averred and proved, in order to maintain the libel in rem. Upon this point Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is well known, that at the common law, in many cases of felonies, the party forfeited his goods and chattels to the crown. The forfeiture did not, strictly speaking, attach in rem; but it was in part or at least a consequence of the judgment of conviction. It is plain from this statement, that no right to the goods and chattels of the felon could be acquired by the crown by the mere commission of the offence; but the right attached only by the conviction of the offender. The necessary result was, that in every case where the crown sought to recover such goods and chattels it was indispensable to establish its right by producing the record of the judgment of conviction. In the contemplation of the common law, the offender's right was not divested until the conviction. But this doctrine never was applied to seizures and forfeitures created by statute, in rem, cognizable on the revenue side of the exchequer. The thing is here primarily considered as the offender, or rather the offence is attached primarily to the thing; and this, whether the offence be malum prohibitum or malum in se. The same principle applies to proceedings in rem, on seizures in the admiralty. Many cases exist, where the forfeitures for acts done attach solely in rem, and there is no accompanying penalty in personam. Many cases exist where there is both a forfeiture in rem and a personal penalty. But in neither class of cases has it ever been decided that the prosecutions were dependent upon each other. But the practice has been, and so this court understand the law to be, that the proceeding in rem stands independent of, and wholly unaffected by, any criminal proceeding in personam. This doctrine is deduced from a fair interpretation of the legislative intention apparent upon its enactments. Both in England and America the jurisdiction over proceedings in rem is usually vested in different courts from those exercising criminal jurisdiction. If the argument at the bar were well founded, there could never be a judgment of condemnation pronounced against any vessel coming within the prohibitions of the acts on which the present libel is founded; for there is no act of congress which provides for the personal punishment of offenders who commit 'any piratical aggression, search, restraint, depredation, or seizure,' within the meaning of those acts. Such a construction of the enactments which goes wholly to defeat their operation, and violates their plain import, is utterly inadmissible. In the judgment of this court, no personal conviction of the offender is necessary to enforce a forfeiture in rem, in cases of this nature."

In the Case of the Embargo Laws, the third section of the act of January 9, 1808 (2 Stat.

454), provided, in addition to the forfeiture of any vessel which should violate the law, that the master of the vessel and all persons knowingly concerned in the prohibited voyage should forfeit and pay for every offence, a sum not exceeding twenty thousand dollars nor less than one thousand dollars, "whether the vessel be seized and condemned or not." In the case of the piratical aggressions there was no provision made by the statutes for the personal punishment of the offenders. But, as is said by Mr. Justice Story, in his opinion just quoted in the case of The Palmyra, it has never been held that the prosecutions were dependent upon each other in either class of cases, that is, whether the forfeiture for the act done attaches solely in rem, without any accompanying penalty in personam, or whether there is both a forfeiture in rem and a personal penalty prescribed by the statute. This doctrine was affirmed by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. The Malek Adhel, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 210, which was a libel in rem against the vessel and her cargo for a violation of the piracy act of March 3, 1819 (3 Stat. 510). In that case it was admitted at the trial that the owners of the vessel never contemplated or authorized the piratical acts complained of, and it was contended before the supreme court that the property was not liable to condemnation, because the owners neither participated in nor authorized the piratical acts. Upon this point, Mr. Justice Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The next question is whether the innocence of the owners can withdraw the ship from the penalty of confiscation under the act of congress. Here again it may be remarked that the act makes no exception whatsoever, whether the aggression be with or without the co-operation of the owners. The vessel which commits the aggression is treated as the offender, as the guilty instrument or thing to which the forfeiture attaches, without any reference whatsoever to the character or conduct of the owner. The vessel or boat (says the act of congress) from which such piratical aggression, &c., shall have been first attempted or made, shall be condemned. Nor is there anything new in a provision of this sort. It is not an uncommon course in the admiralty, acting under the law of nations, to treat the vessel, in which or by which, or by the master or crew thereof, a wrong or offence has been done, as the offender, without any regard whatsoever to the personal misconduct or responsibility of the owner thereof. And this is done from the necessity of the case, as the only adequate means of suppressing the offence or wrong, or insuring an indemnity to the injured party. The doctrine also is familiarly applied to cases of smuggling and other misconduct under our revenue laws, and has been applied to other kindred cases, such as cases arising on embargo and non-intercourse acts. In short, the acts of the master and crew, in cases of this sort, bind the interest of the owner of the ship, whether he be innocent or guilty; and he impliedly submits to whatever the law denounces as a forfeiture attached to the ship by reason of their unlawful or wanton wrongs." The judge then cites, as authority for these positions, the cases of U. S. v. The Little Charles [supra] and The Palmyra [supra] and adds: "The same doctrine has been fully recognized in the high court of admiralty in England, as is sufficiently apparent from the Vrouw Judith, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 150; The Adonis, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 256; The Mars, 6 C. Rob. Adm. 87; and indeed in many other cases where the owner of the ship has been held bound by the acts of the master, whether he was ignorant thereof or not. The ship is also, by the general maritime law, held responsible for the torts and misconduct of the master and crews thereof, whether arising from negligence or a wilful disregard of duty; as, for example, in cases of collision and other wrongs done upon the high seas or elsewhere within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, upon the general policy of that law, which looks to the instrument itself used as the means of the mischief, as the best and surest pledge for the compensation and indemnity to the injured party. The act of congress has therefore done nothing more on this point than to affirm and enforce the general principles of the maritime law and the law of nations."

The conclusion drawn from these authorities is that under the third section of the act of 1818, under which the libel in this case is filed, it is only necessary, in order to secure a condemnation of the vessel, for the libellants to show that the vessel has been fitted out and armed, or been attempted to be fitted out and armed, or been furnished, fitted out or armed, with the intent on the part of any person fitting out and arming her, or attempting to fit out and arm her, or procuring her to be fitted out and armed, or knowingly concerned in the furnishing, fitting out or arming of her, that she should be employed in the service of any foreign state, or of any people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any people with whom the United States are at peace; that it is not necessary for the libellants to prove the individuality or identity of such person, any further than to prove that the prohibited acts were done by some person; that it is not at all necessary for the libellants, to show that the owner of the vessel or his authorized agent was concerned in the commission of the prohibited acts; but the law imposes upon the owner the necessity of withholding his property from being made by any person the instrument of violating the law; and that, if the law has been violated, the vessel may be forfeited if the prohibited acts have been committed by any person, whether the owner was concerned in the violation of the law or not. The evidence given on the trial was voluminous, but was wholly confined to the testimony put in on the part of the libellants, no evidence having been given on the part of the claimant or his principals.

After the testimony had all been put in and the summing up had been concluded, the libellants, on due previous notice, moved the court to amend the amended libel filed January 24, 1866, by inserting at the end of the fifth count the following additional counts, namely: "Sixth. That the said steamship or vessel Meteor has, on the 23d day of January, 1866, within the limits of the United States, to wit, at the Southern district of New York aforesaid, been furnished, fitted out, or armed by certain persons to the said attorney unknown with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of a foreign state, to wit, the service of the republic of Chile, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of the government of her majesty the queen of Spain, with whom the United States then were and now are at peace. Seventh. That certain persons, to the said attorney unknown were, on or before the 22d day of January, 1866, within the limits of the United States, to wit, at the Southern district of New York aforesaid, knowingly concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of the steamship or vessel Meteor, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of a foreign state, to wit, the service of the republic of Chile, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens or property of the aforesaid government of Spain, with whom the United States then were and now are at peace as aforesaid"; and also by changing the numbering of the last count in the amended libel on file from "sixth" to "eighth." The counsel for the claimant objected to the granting of the motion to amend at that stage of the trial, as unprecedented. The necessity for the proposed amendments, as urged by the counsel for the libellants, was that the first count of the amended libel averred no offence within the act of 1818; that the second count was a count for fitting out and arming the vessel; and that the third, fourth, and fifth counts, which severally averred that the vessel had been fitted out, and that she had been attempted to be fitted out, and that certain persons had been knowingly concerned in furnishing her and fitting her out, all of them averred an intent that she should be employed "in the service of some persons, to the said attorney unknown," to commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, and property of the government of Spain, and did not any of them aver, in the language of the third section of the act of 1818, an intent that the vessel should be employed in the service of some foreign prince or state, or of some colony, district, or people. The question as to allowing these proposed amendments to be made was held open for consideration.

Courts of admiralty are little trammelled by a regard for mere technicalities, substantial justice without unnecessary delay or expense being the object which they keep in view. Accordingly they acknowledge no limits to their right to allow amendments when conducive to this end, in every stage of a cause, and not only in the court of original jurisdiction, but in all appellate courts, and not only in matters of form, but in matters of substance. Conk. Treatise (3d Ed.) p. 562. In the case of The Edward, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 261, which was an information against a vessel for the violation of one of the embargo acts, the district court having condemned the vessel, the circuit court, on appeal, allowed the libel to be amended by inserting an averment naming the particular foreign interdicted port to which the vessel was destined. The case was then taken to the supreme court, and Mr. Justice Washington, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It is contended for the claimant, that the circuit court has only appellate jurisdiction in cases of this nature, and that to allow the introduction of a new allegation would be in fact to originate the cause in the circuit court. This question appears to be fully decided by the Cases of The Caroline and The Emily, determined in this court. These were informations in rem under the slave-trade act, and the opinion of the court was that the evidence was sufficient to show a breach of the law, but that the informations were not sufficiently certain to authorize a decree. The sentence of the circuit court was therefore reversed, and the cause remanded to that court with directions to allow the informations to be amended." In the case of The Marianna Flora, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 1, which was a libel founded on an act of congress [3 Stat. 510], against a Portuguese vessel, for an alleged piratical aggression on The Alligator, a United States armed vessel, the district court ordered restitution with damages. The circuit court, on appeal, allowed the libellants to file a new count or allegation, in which the aggression was stated to be hostile, and with intent to sink and destroy The Alligator, and in violation of the law of nations, and reversed the decree for damages, the libellants consenting to the decree for restitution. On appeal to the supreme court, Mr. Justice Story, delivering the opinion of that court, says: "An objection, which is preliminary in its nature, has been taken to the admissibility of this new count to the libel filed in the circuit court, upon the ground that the original subject-matter was exclusively cognizable in the district court, and to allow this amendment would be to institute an original and not an appellate inquiry in the circuit court. But the objection itself is founded on a mistaken view of the rights and authorities of appellate courts of admiralty. It is the common usage and admitted doctrine of such courts to permit the parties, upon the appeal, to introduce new allegations and new proofs, 'non allegata allegare, et non probata probare.' The courts of the United States, in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in admiralty causes, are, by law, authorized to proceed according to the course of proceedings in admiralty courts. It has been the constant habit of the circuit courts to allow amendments of this nature in cases where public justice and the substantial merits required them; and this practice has not only been incidentally sanctioned in this court, but on various occasions, in the exercise of its own final appellate jurisdiction, it has remanded causes to the circuit court, with directions to allow new counts to be filed." It is well settled in the practice of the courts of admiralty of the United States, that where, on the evidence, the merits are clearly with the libellant, but the libel is defective, it will not be dismissed, but the party will be allowed to assert his rights in a new allegation. The Adeline, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 244; The Palmyra, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 1. A new res or subject of controversy cannot be introduced under such privilege of amendment. but the court will not permit substantial justice to fail in respect to the matter which is the subject of the action, by reason of defects or informalities in the libel. The foundation of this power of allowing amendments is the 32d section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 91); and by rule 24 of the rules of practice for the courts of the United States in admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, on the instance side of the court, prescribed by the supreme court at the December term, 1844, in pursuance of the act of August 23, 1842 [5 Stat. 516], it is provided as follows: "In all informations and libels, in causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, amendments in matter of form may be made at any time, on motion to the court, as of course. And new counts may be filed, and amendments in matter of substance may be made, upon motion, at any time before the final decree upon such terms as the court shall impose." The same power of amending informations in any stage of the cause is given by rule 186 of this court.

In the present case, the court is of opinion that the proposed amendments will not introduce any new res or subject of litigation, and that public justice and the substantial merits of the controversy require their allowance, and without the imposition by the court of any terms on the libellants. The amendments are, accordingly, allowed to be made, with like effect as if they had been contained in the amended libel when it was filed, and the libellants are at liberty to enter an order of amendment to that effect. If any prejudice to the claimant could arise from the allowance of these amendments, or if it were alleged that he could thereunder aver or prove matters of defence which he could not or did not adduce on the trial, the court would take care to guard him from any such prejudice. But no such objection arises, especially in view of the fact that the claimant put in no testimony in defence on the trial.

On the merits, the sole question for determination in this case is whether the averments of the libel, as thus amended, are supported by the testimony, and whether any offence prohibited by the third section of the act of April 20, 1818, was committed prior to the filing of the libel, so as to require the forfeiture of the vessel, her tackle, &c. The offences set out in the section must have been committed within the limits of the United States, and are properly classified thus: First. The fitting out and arming by any person of any vessel, with the intent on the part of such person, that she shall be employed in the service of any foreign state, or of any people, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens or property of any foreign prince or state, or of any people, with whom the United States are at peace. Second. The attempting by any person to fit out and arm any vessel with the like intent. Third. The procuring by any person to be fitted out and armed, any vessel with the like intent. Fourth. The being knowingly concerned by any person in the furnishing of any vessel with the like intent. Fifth. The being knowingly concerned by any person in the fitting out of any vessel with the like intent. Sixth. The being knowingly concerned by any person in the arming of any vessel with the like intent. Seventh. The issuing or delivering by any person of a commission, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed as aforesaid. If any one of these offences has been committed, the vessel in respect to which it is committed is, with her tackle, &c., to be forfeited.

It was strenuously urged by the counsel for the claimant, on the hearing, that the only crime created by the third section of the act of 1818 is the crime of fitting out and arming a vessel with the intent named in the statute; and that, although the attempt to commit that crime, or the procuring that crime to be committed, or the being knowingly concerned in committing that crime is punishable under the statute, yet the body of the crime is the fitting out and arming, and nothing short of that is punishable under the statute, either against the wrong-doer personally, or against the offending res; and the interpretation sought to be put by the counsel upon these words of the statute, "or shall knowingly be concerned in the furnishing, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent," &c., is, that it is not necessary to the criminality of the individual that he should have performed every part of the crime, but it is enough if he was knowingly concerned in any one step in the chain of conduct which completed the criminality, or would have completed it if carried out, but still the crime must be the crime of fitting out and arming, either completed or attempted. But the court cannot adopt this interpretation of the statute. The mischief against which the statute intended to guard was not merely preventing the departure from the United States of an armed vessel, but the departure of any vessel intended to be employed in the service of any foreign power, to cruise or commit hostilities against any foreign power with whom the United States are at peace. The neutrality of the government of the United States, in a war between two foreign powers, would be violated quite as much by allowing the departure from its ports of an unarmed vessel with the clear intent to cruise or commit hostilities against one of the belligerents, as it would be by permitting the departure from its ports of an armed vessel with such intent. If the intent to cruise or commit hostilities exists when the vessel departs, and the vessel is one adapted to the purpose, the subsequent arming is a very easy matter. The facility with which this can be done was made manifest in the case of The Shenandoah and other vessels which, during the late Rebellion, left England unarmed, but with the full intent on the part of those who sent them forth that they should be used to cruise and commit hostilities against the United States, and were subsequently armed in neutral waters. It would be a very forced interpretation of the statute to say that it was not an offence against it to knowingly fit out a vessel with everything necessary to make her an effective cruiser, except her arms, and with the intent that she should become such a cruiser, because it could not be shown that there was any intent that she should be armed within the United States. The evil consequences which would flow from interpreting the statute to mean that the crime must include the arming of the vessel within the United States, become especially apparent in reference to that part of the third section which forbids the issuing or delivering a commission, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, for any ship or vessel, to the intent that she may be employed for the purpose named in the section. Under such an interpretation of the statute, it would be no offence to issue or deliver a commission within the United States for any vessel, unless such vessel were actually armed at the time, or perhaps were intended to be armed prior to her departure from the United States; and it would be no offence to issue a commission within the United States for a vessel fitted and equipped to cruise or commit hostilities, and intended to cruise and commit hostilities, so long as such vessel was not armed at the time, and was not intended to be armed within the United States, although it could be shown that a clear intent existed, on the part of the person issuing or delivering the commission, that the vessel should receive her armament the moment she should be beyond the jurisdiction of the United States. The court cannot give any such construction to the statute. Such a construction was repudiated by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 445. That was an indictment founded on the same section of the act of 1818 on which the libel in the present case is based. It came before the supreme court on a certificate of a division of opinion from the judges of the circuit court for the district of Maryland. The division of opinion arose on two counts of the indictment, and on the evidence given in reference to the matters in those counts. Those counts were alike in substance, and averred that the defendant, within the limits of the United States, was knowingly concerned in the fitting out of a vessel called the Bolivar, with intent that such vessel should be employed in the service of the United Provinces of Rio de la Plata, to commit hostilities against the subjects of the emperor of Brazil, with whom the United States were at peace. There was no averment in either of the counts that the vessel was armed or was intended to be armed. On the trial before the circuit court evidence was given of the repairing and fitting out of the vessel, under the superintendence of the defendant, at Baltimore. It was contended before the supreme court by Mr. Wirt, on the part of the defendant, that the only mischief which the act of 1818 was intended to remedy was the arming and equipping of vessels in our ports, and the sending them forth, in warlike array, to cruise and commit hostilities on foreign nations with which we were at peace, and that the act was not intended to reach a vessel whose equipments were so equivocal as to be applicable either to commerce or war; that the statute, being a penal statute, should be interpreted strictly; that the third section of the statute required that the vessel should be completely fitted out and armed in our own ports, and be there put in a condition to commit hostilities immediately; that in order to convict any person of an attempt under the section, it must be shown that his object was to fit out and arm completely, and to place the vessel in all respects in a state for immediate hostilities; that, in order to be guilty of a procurement under the section, the charge must not be that the accused procured the vessel to be fitted out, merely, but that he procured her to be fitted out and armed; that with respect to that part of the section which speaks of persons knowingly concerned in the furnishing, fitting out or arming of a vessel, the participation of those persons is of an accessorial character; that there is under the statute a principal in the offence and an accessory; that the offence must have been committed, that is, there must have been a fitting out and arming, or an attempt to fit out and arm, or the principal actor has been guilty of no offence; that it could not have been intended to punish the secondary or accessorial actor, if the principal actor has not been guilty of an offence; that this consequence would follow, if any one had knowingly furnished articles to the vessel to be used for that purpose, and yet if, before the complete fitting out and arming had been accomplished, the vessel had been seized and this consummation prevented, the prime actor thus not being indictable under the law; that thus a part of a transaction would become a crime in one citizen while the whole of it would not be a crime in another; and that if the fitting out per se is, under the third section, a crime, without arming, the copulative "and" would have found no place in the section, and the language of the law would have been "fit out or arm" and "attempt to fit out or arm." The supreme court unanimously overruled these views. Mr. Justice Thompson, delivering its opinion, after stating the prayers upon which the opinions of the judges of the court below were opposed, says: "The instruction which ought to be given to the jury under these prayers involves the construction of the act of congress touching the extent to which the preparation of the vessel for cruising or committing hostilities must be carried before she leaves the limits of the United States, in order to bring the case within the act. On the part of the defendant, it is contended that the vessel must be fitted out and armed, if not complete, so far at least as to be prepared for war, or in a condition to commit hostilities. We do not think this is the true construction of the act. It has been argued that although the offence created by the act is a misdemeanor, and there cannot, legally speaking, be principal and accessory, yet the act evidently contemplates two distinct classes of offenders,—the principal actors, who are directly engaged in preparing the vessel, and another class, who, though not the chief actors, are in some way concerned in the preparation. The act in this respect may not be drawn with very great perspicuity. But should the view taken of it by the defendant's counsel be deemed correct (which, however, we do not admit), it is not perceived how it can affect the present case. For the indictment, according to this instruction, places the defendant in the secondary class of offenders. He is only charged with being knowingly concerned in the fitting out the vessel, with intent that she should be employed, &c. To bring him within the words of the act, it is not necessary to charge him with being concerned in fitting out and arming. The words of the act are, 'fitting out or arming.' Either will constitute the offence. But it is said such fitting out must be of a vessel armed, and in a condition to commit hostilities, otherwise the minor actor may be guilty when the actor would not, for as to the latter there must be a fitting out and arming, in order to bring him within the law. If this construction of the act be well founded, the indictment ought to charge that the defendant was concerned in fitting out the Bolivar, being a vessel fitted out and armed, &c. But this, we apprehend, is not required. It would be going beyond the plain meaning of the words used in defining the offence. It is sufficient if the indictment charges the offence in the words of the act; and it cannot be necessary to prove what is not charged. It is true, that with respect to those who have been denominated at the bar the chief actors, the law would seem to make it necessary that they should be charged with fitting out 'and' arming. These words may require that both should concur, and the vessel be put in a condition to commit hostilities, in order to bring her within the law. But an 'attempt' to fit out 'and' arm is made an offence. This is certainly doing something short of a complete fitting out and arming. To attempt to do an act does not, either in law or in common parlance, imply a completion of the act, or any definite progress towards it. Any effort or endeavor to effect it will satisfy the terms of the law. This varied phraseology in the law was probably employed with a view to embrace all persons of every description who might be engaged, directly or indirectly, in preparing vessels with intent that they should be employed in committing hostilities against any powers with whom the United States were at peace. Different degrees of criminality will necessarily attach to persons thus engaged. Hence the great latitude given to the courts in fixing the punishment, viz. a fine not more than ten thousand dollars, and imprisonment not more than three years. We are accordingly of opinion that it was not necessary that the jury should believe or find that the Bolivar, when she left Baltimore, and when she arrived at St. Thomas, and during the voyage from Baltimore to St. Thomas, was armed, or in a condition to commit hostilities, in order to find the defendant guilty of the offence charged in the indictment."

In view of this decision, it must be regarded as the settled interpretation of the third section of the act of 1818, that that section applies to every person who is engaged within the United States, directly or indirectly, in preparing a vessel with the intent that she shall be employed in committing hostilities against any power with which the United States are at peace, and to every such vessel, whether such vessel be armed in the United States or not, or be intended to be armed in the United States or not.

Having determined the true interpretation of the section of the statute on which the libel in the present case is founded, the next inquiry is, as to whether any of the offences prohibited by that section have been committed; and, as it is not claimed that the Meteor was armed in the United States, or was intended to be armed within the United States, the inquiry may be limited to the question as to whether any person was knowingly concerned in furnishing or fitting out the Meteor with intent that she should be employed in the service of the government of Chile, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects or property of the queen of Spain, the United States being at the time at peace with the queen of Spain.

The libellants put in evidence a certificate made by the secretary of state of the United States under his hand and the seal of the department of state, dated the 29th of March, 1866, certifying "that it appears, from authentic official information on file in this department, that a state of war has existed between Spain and the republic of Chile, from the 25th of September, 1865, up to the present time; that the United States are, and have been during the same period, at peace with both the aforesaid nations; and that Stephen Rogers was recognized as consul, ad interim, of the republic of Chile, for the port of New York and its dependencies, from the 13 of October, 1864, to February 12, 1866, when his exequatur was revoked." The libellants also put in evidence a certificate made by the secretary of state of the United States, under his hand and the seal of the department of state, dated March 31, 1866, embodying the translation of a document officially communicated to, and then on file in that department, being the promulgation by the government of Chile, at Santiago, on the 25th of September, 1865, of the declaration of war between the republic of Chile and the government of Spain. The counsel for the claimant objected to the admissibility in evidence of these certificates, upon the ground that they were not made evidence by any statute, and were not competent evidence of the existence of the facts stated in them. The court overruled the objection. There can be no doubt as to the competency of the testimony. By section 5 of the act of September 15, 1789 (1 Stat. 69), it is provided that all copies of records and papers in the office of the secretary of state, authenticated under the seal of office of the department, shall be evidence equally as the original record or paper. It is laid down in 1 Greenl. Ev. § 479, that the certificate of the secretary of state of the United States is evidence that a particular person has been recognized as a foreign minister. In Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 19, it was held that a certified copy, under the hand and seal of the secretary of state of the United States, of the letters of the agent of congress resident abroad, addressed to that body, relative to the business of his trust, and of the official order of a foreign colonial governor concerning the sale and disposal of a cargo of merchandise, were admissible evidence of those transactions. In U. S. v. Liddle [Case No. 15,598], which was an indictment for an assault and battery on a member of the Spanish legation, it was held that the certificate of the secretary of state was good evidence, and the best, to prove that the person on whom the assault and battery was committed had been received by our government as a secretary attached to the Spanish legation; on the ground that the secretary of state was the proper organ of the government, his certificate, being an acknowledgment by the government that the person had been received in the character attributed to him, was the best evidence of the fact. In U. S. v. Benner [Case No. 14,568], which was an indictment for arresting and imprisoning the secretary of legation of the minister from Denmark, it was held that a certificate from the secretary of state, under the seal of the department, that the person had been recognized by the department as attached to the legation of Denmark, was full evidence that he had been authorized and received by the president in the character referred to. The same principle was held in the case of U. S. v. Ortega [Id. 15,971], which was an indictment for an assault upon a Spanish chargé d'affaires. It is well settled that public documents, properly authenticated, and whose contents are pertinent to the issue, when authenticated by the public officer whose duty it is to authenticate them, and when their contents are such as belong to the province of the officer or come within his official cognizance and observation, are admissible to prove at least prima facie the facts they recite. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 491. In Thelluson v. Cosling, 4 Esp. 266, it was held that a paper being a declaration of war made by Spain against France, transmitted to the office of the secretary of state in England by the ambassador of England at Madrid, and produced in court from that office, was sufficient evidence of the date of the declaration of war. These principles cover all the facts embraced in the certificates from the department of state, and those certificates are sufficient primâ facie evidence of the facts covered by them. It is, therefore, established,—First, that a state of war existed between Spain and Chile from the 25th of September, 1865, to the time of the trial; second, that the United States during that period were at peace with both Spain and Chile; third, that Stephen Rogers was the recognized consul of Chile at New York from the 13th of October, 1864, to the 12th of February, 1866.

The court is not left to speculate as to the character and capacity of the Meteor, as a vessel capable of being used to cruise or commit hostilities in a warlike character. In many, if not most cases of prosecutions under neutrality acts, it appears that artifices and subterfuges have been resorted to, which leave it very much in doubt, on the evidence, whether the vessel were not fitted and intended equally well for innocent commercial purposes and for purposes of war; just as, in cases of prosecutions under the slave-trade acts, it often appears difficult to determine whether the vessel fitted out was intended for a whaler or for a slaver. This embarrassment in determining whether a warlike character could be affixed to the vessel beyond doubt was manifested in a very marked degree in the case of the prosecution against the Alexandra, in England, under the British neutrality law. But, in the present case, the Meteor is characterized by Mr. Robert B. Forbes, one of her owners, in a letter written by him from Boston, on the 13th of September, 1865, to a gentleman in New York, in the following terms: "The Meteor is for sale, but I have not offered her, because she needs cleaning up and painting, after her late experiences carrying troops and cargoes. She can be bought for much less than cost, and much less than she can be built for today. I can not name a price until I consult the other owners. I am open to an offer. Am I to understand that you are acting as a broker, and, if so, whether you expect to earn a commission out of us, and how much, if you should buy her? She was destined to carry one heavy pivot amidships, on gun deck, or two 10-inch or other guns at the same point, namely, just before the mainmast; forward of this are four ports (two on each side), where 8 or 9 inch Dahlgrens would have been mounted, had she been taken by the United States navy department; and abreast of the engine-hatch, aft, there are two ports on each side, where she could have mounted short 32's, or 24 pound howitzers; and on upper deck there are beds for two 30 pound Parrots: making one pivot 11 inch, or two 10 inch; four broadside, 8 or 9 inch; four 32 or 24 pound howitzers on gundeck; two light chase guns on upper deck. She has two 62½ by 36 inch cylinders, four tubular boilers; propeller of brass, 13½ feet diameter and 23 feet pitch. The motive-power, boilers, &c., were imported from Scotland, at a very large cost, and are first quality. The ship was built by myself and a few friends, to cruise after British pirates, and she would have been taken by the U. S. had not Fort Fisher fallen just as it did. She was first under steam at sea last December, and was tried under the auspices of the Navy Dept. at the measured mile, below New York, on the 5th January, when, according to the report, she attained a rate of speed said to be superior to that of any propeller tried over that ground by the United States. Since April 1, she has been three trips South with troops, and one to New Orleans with cargo. H. B. Cromwell & Co. loaded her out, and wrote that she was the most capable ship they had loaded, being full of heavy cargo on 16 feet 4 by 14 feet draught." This letter proves that the Meteor was a vessel of war, constructed to cruise and commit hostilities, and intended to be mounted with eleven or twelve guns, and of great speed and carrying capacity; that there were other owners of her besides Mr. Forbes; and that she was for sale, and at a price much less than her cost, and much less than a similar vessel could be built for. The fact that there were other owners of the Meteor besides the Messrs. Forbes is shown by the testimony of Mr. Robert B. Forbes, and he gives the names of such owners. Three of them, Messrs. Abiel A. Low, William H. Aspinwall, and Leonard W. Jerome, were examined as witnesses for the libellants on the trial, and it appears that all of these witnesses advised and desired the sale of the vessel. It also appears that a person by the name of Benjamin V. Mackenna left Chile to come to this country on the 1st of October, 1865, and arrived here on the 19th of November, 1865; that he occupied the position in Chile of a member of the house of deputies, and secretary thereof; that he was appointed before he so left Chile, confidential agent in the United States of the government of Chile; and that he held that position from the time of his so leaving Chile down to the time of the trial.

The only testimony adduced upon the trial as to any direct conference between any one of the owners of the Meteor and any person holding an official relation to the Chilian government, in respect to the Meteor, is that given by Mr. Jerome. He was called by the libellants as a witness, and was examined on the 7th of April, and testified, on his direct examination, that he had once, and but once, been on board the Meteor; that that was some four or five months ago; that Mr. Asta Buruaga, the Chilian minister, was in his company at the time; that the vessel was lying at the time at Jersey City; and that he met the Chilian minister at the vessel by agreement. The witness was then asked: "Q. What was the agreement you made with him by which you met him there? A. I asked him to look at the ship. Q. For what purpose? A. To see if he would buy her. Q. And he did look at the ship? A. He did. Q. Did you and he examine the ship together on that occasion? A. We went through her partially, not much." Again, he says in reference to conversations with Asta Buruaga: "I never had any conversations with Asta Buruaga after the Chilian war began; my conversation with him was some time previous to the war. Q. What time did you visit the Meteor as she lay at Jersey City? A. It was some time previous to the arrival of the news of the declaration of war between Spain and Chile. Q. What month was it that you and Buruaga visited the Meteor together? A. I cannot tell. Q. Was it the month of November last? A. I cannot tell you; my memory is very poor about dates. Q. Was it in the month of October? A. I don't know. Q. Was it in the month of September? A. I don't know the month. Q. What year was it? A. I should think it was in the year 1865. Q. Have you any doubt about its being in the year 1865? A. Very little. Q. How long was it before the seizure of the vessel? A. Well, I cannot tell, several months. Q. When you use the expression 'several months,' how many months do you mean? A. Well, I cannot say how many, I should say over two. Q. Is that as near and as definite as you can be as to the time? A. On reflection, I should say it was three instead of over two. Q. Is that as near and as definite as you can be as regards the time? A. Yes; I cannot tell you any exact dates about it. Q. When was the vessel seized? A. That I do not know. Q. She was seized on the 23d of January, 1865. How long before that was it you were with Asta Buruaga on board the vessel? A. I do not recollect dates. If you wish to fix the time, I can give it positively; it was some time before the arrival of the news of the declaration of war. Q. When was the news of the declaration of war? A. That I do not know. Q. When did you first hear of it? A. I heard of it the next morning after it arrived here by the Aspinwall steamer. Q. How long ago was it? A. I do not know; I cannot give the date. Q. About how long ago was it? A. Sometime in the year 1865. Q. Is that as near and as definite as you can be,—that it was sometime in the year 1865? A. You asked me when the news of the declaration of the war came; I am positive it was in that year. Q. Is that as near and as definite as you can be,—that it was sometime in the year 1865? A. No, I can bring it down, I think, subsequent to the 1st of July; I would not be perfectly positive of that, but I think so." On his cross-examination, the witness testified: "Q. You said that you met the minister on board the Meteor by previous appointment. Was that appointment made the day before or the week before? A. I cannot recollect that. Q. Was it made soon before you met on board? A. It was very soon before; I cannot tell but that we went right over the same morning; I merely asked him to look at the ship. Q. How long had the ship been for sale? A. She had been for sale ever since the close of the war. Q. Since about a year ago? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was there anything else between you except that he was to look at the ship as a matter for sale? A. That is all. Q. To see whether he would buy it? A. I don't think he had much intention of buying it, anyway; he went over there; I wanted to see the ship myself; I had never been on board of her. Q. Was there anything but the sale talked of, or suggested, on either side? A. No, sir. Q. The sale of the ship as she lay? A. Yes, sir." On his redirect examination, he testified: "Q. What time did you and Asta Buruaga make this appointment to see the ship? A. I don't know. Q. Have you any recollection on the subject that is at all definite? A. I have not; it was not an event that fixed itself very particularly in my mind. Q. I understood you, on your direct examination, that he wanted to buy the ship? (Mr. Evarts objects that the witness did not use that language.) Q. Did I understand you as stating, on your direct examination, that the Chilian minister desired to purchase the ship? A. No, sir. Q. What did you say in regard to that matter? A. I said I asked him to go and look at her. (The stenographer was called upon to read the witness his testimony.) Q. Do you desire to change your testimony, in that respect, or is it correct? A. Not exactly; I am recorded there as saying that I asked him there to see if he would buy her. Q. In what particular is your testimony incorrect? A. I could not expect him to buy her, because he had no power to buy her, as I understood; the ship was for sale, and I wanted him to look at her; perhaps he might recommend her. Q. You say you did not expect him to buy her? A. No, sir. Q. Because he had not the authority to buy her? A. No. Q. Who did you suppose had the authority to buy her? A. I did not suppose any one had at that time; I thought the occasion might turn up. Q. How did you know he had not authority to buy her? A. I did not know. Q. What did you mean when you said you did not suppose he had authority to buy her? A. I simply did not suppose he had. Q. Who did you suppose had? A. I did not suppose anyone had. Q. Why, then, did you ask the Chilian minister to look at the ship? A. Well, I thought the occasion might turn up that he might want to buy her."

It is quite apparent, from the whole of this testimony, taken together, that Mr. Jerome, as one of the owners of the vessel, put himself into communication with the representative of the Chilian government, with a view to the sale of the vessel to that government; and whether this visit of Mr. Jerome, in company with the Chilian minister, to the Meteor, took place after intelligence of the declaration of war between Chile and Spain was received in the United States, or at a period so shortly before that time that affairs between Chile and Spain were in such a condition as to give rise in Mr. Jerome's mind to the impression that the occasion was likely to "turn up" when the Chilian minister might want to buy the vessel, is immaterial to the point under consideration. That point is the direct communication between one of the owners of the Meteor and the representative of the Chilian government, at a date not far distant from the time when the war broke out between Chile and Spain, in reference to the sale of the vessel to that government. And the evidence of Mr. Jerome establishes this point.

It also appears that the claimant, Cary, was in treaty with the Chilian government for the sale of the Meteor to them, after the war between Chile and Spain had broken out. Cary was the authorized agent of the owners. A letter is in evidence written by the Messrs. Forbes to Charles L. Wright & Co., ship-brokers, dated Boston, December 13, 1865, stating that an engagement of Messrs. Cary & Co., in regard to the sale of the vessel, would be duly ratified by the Messrs. Forbes. Charles L. Wright testifies, that within a day or two after the receipt of that letter of the 13th of December from the Messrs. Forbes, he had a conversation with Cary, at his, Wright's, office, in regard to the sale of the Meteor; that Cary asked for the names of the witness's principals; that the witness told him he believed that the parties represented the Chilian government; that the parties he referred to were then in fact in an adjoining room; that he, Wright, then went into that room, and had an interview with those parties (McNichols, Byron and Conkling), in which they said that they represented the Chilian government; that after that he saw Cary again, and told him that he, the witness, believed the parties wished to purchase the boat for the Chilian government, and Cary replied: "If these are your parties, I don't think you can do anything with them, because I don't believe they have any money;" and that Cary also said that he, Cary, had had an application of that kind before, and they had no money. Again, this witness, being asked if anything was said by Cary, at the interview with him, to the effect or in substance that he had already had negotiations for the sale of the Meteor to the Chilian government, answers: "As I have said, at that time he said he had already been in treaty with them, and they had no money." Wright states in his testimony how he came to have this interview with Cary. It was as follows: About the 1st of December, 1865, three men, named Byron, McNichols, and Conkling, called at Wright's office in New York. These were the same persons before referred to as being in an adjoining room, at the time of the interview between Wright and Cary, after the receipt by Wright of the letter from Forbes. These men opened negotiations with Wright for the purchase of the Meteor for the Chilian government. Wright saw the three men almost every day during the month of December. About the middle of December, and in consequence of the negotiations he was having with the three men, Wright went to see Rogers, the Chilian consul, at Rogers's house in New York, and Rogers then gave Wright to understand that the three men who were so negotiating for the purchase of the Meteor were in communication with him, Rogers, in regard to the matter. The negotiations that were thus carried on between Byron, McNichols, and Conkling on the one part, and Wright on the other, satisfactorily appear to have been carried on, on behalf of the Chilian government on the one side and the owners of the Meteor, represented by Cary, on the other. We therefore find the authorized agent of the owners of the Meteor knowingly concerned in negotiating for the sale of the vessel to the Chilian government in December, 1865, after the announcement of the war between Spain and Chile. Wright further testifies, that in reply to Cary's remark that the parties had no money, he, Wright, stated to Cary that he believed they could make arrangements for some money, and that if so, he, Wright, would communicate with him, Cary, further; and that Cary called again at his, Wright's office about the 20th of December, to inquire if there had been anything done. McNichols testifies that Rogers, the consul, told him, in November or December, 1865, that the special agent or the Chilian minister (the witness forgot which) had been negotiating about the Meteor, and the delay was for want of funds, and that the Meteor had been offered to the functionary for a little less than two hundred thousand dollars in gold.

The testimony, therefore, is abundant that the owners of the Meteor, both directly and through their recognized agent, Cary, were knowingly carrying on negotiations with persons whom they recognized as authorized to represent the Chilian government, and who did in fact represent that government, for the sale of the Meteor to that government; that the negotiations between Cary and Wright were carried on during the war between Spain and Chile; and that Wright disclosed to Cary that his principals were the Chilian government.

The Meteor was seized on the 23d of January, 1866. The manifest of her cargo furnished to the custom-house by her master, and put in evidence, sets forth her cargo as being fuel and stores, and her destination as being Panama, with a crew fifty-seven in number.

The government inspector, Louis J. Kirk, testifies, that the day before she was seized, she being put up for clearance, and some question being raised in regard to her, he went on board of her and examined her at her dock at Brooklyn, at the request of the surveyor of the port; that he saw large quantities of ordinary ship's stores on board and a large quantity of coal; that he examined her cargo-book; that he saw no freight or merchandise on board; that the mate told him they had no freight; and that the mate said he was going to Panama and had signed papers for a year, and calculated to be in New York in three months from the time he left. James K. Ford testifies, that two Parrot guns, and eleven cases supposed to contain shell or shot, six gun tackles, and some other appurtenances for cannon, were placed by a Mr. Smith, acting for the firm of Cary & Co., in his, the witness's, public store in Brooklyn, on the 18th day of January, 1866. Wright testifies, that about the middle of December he told Rogers, at Rogers's house, that he did not think it possible to get an armed vessel, like the Meteor, away from New York.

William Jarvis, a deputy marshal, testifies, that under orders from the marshal he arrested the Meteor on the 23d of January between 12 and 1 o'clock; that at the time she had steam up and the crew on board, and was getting ready to go to sea; that Mr. Robert B. Forbes was on board; that Mr. Forbes stated to the mate in the witness's presence, that he was sorry he had missed his trip down to the Narrows in the boat; and that Mr. Forbes called for his carpet-bag and took it ashore with him.

Thomas H. Sease testifies, that after the seizure of the Meteor by the marshal, he acted as one of the ship-keepers on board of her and lived on board of her; that on the 2d of February the captain of the Meteor asked of the witness permission to take on shore five and a half boxes of shot for Parrot guns, and stated that the guns belonging to the ship had been stored in the Pierrepont stores; that the witness saw the boxes of shot and the shot in one of the boxes which had been opened; that the captain said to him, in reference to the boxes, that he had ordered all the things to be taken on shore, and these had been in some way overlooked and left on board; that the witness told him that he could not take them on shore without the marshal's permission; that the captain then said, "Never mind, don't say anything about it."

Frederick Nichols, a mariner, testifies, that on the Friday before the Meteor was seized he was on board of her and saw barrels of stores going on board, and was told by the stevedore, who was engaged in loading them, that the vessel was bound to Chile; that he saw on board a large quantity of coal in bags and in bins, and a case of rifles, and a small box of cartridges for Sharpe's rifles; that the hold of the vessel appeared to be nearly full; that on that day he saw Mr. R. B. Forbes on board, and heard him, in answer to a question from the mate of the vessel, reply, "Put them in the racks, certainly;" that Forbes and the witness left the vessel together; that on the way up the wharf Forbes remarked to the witness that the vessel was very buoyant for a vessel that 750 tons of coal on board and six months' stores; that the witness told Forbes he thought she was bound for Chile, and Forbes said she was cleared for Panama, or she will clear, and the witness added: "I will not say whether he said she was cleared, or bound, for Panama"; and that the witness and Forbes crossed the ferry together. The witness gives this account of a conversation with Forbes on the ferry-boat: "Q. Did you have any conversation with him crossing the ferry? A. We talked in the same strain over in the boat. Q. What did you say? A. I told him I supposed if that vessel had gone to Chile, I would have gone in command of her, or something like that. That was the only remark I made. Q. State in what tone of voice you talked with Mr. Forbes,—whether loud or otherwise. A. I talked pretty loud, because Captain Forbes is a little troubled with deafness or does not hear accurately. Q. When you told him that, what did he say? A. He told me that I had not ought to talk quite so loud in public about such matters; I would not say that these were his words, but that this was the meaning, and I think the words were used." The witness also says, that on the same day or the next he, in company with Wright, went to see Rogers at his house, and the witness and Wright remarked that they thought the Meteor was off for Chile; that Rogers remarked, during the conversation, that Mackenna had done this business through some other brokers, and they thought they had got a good bargain in the Meteor, because they had got 750 tons of coal in the contract; that Rogers, in reply to a remark from the witness or Wright about the stores being marked for Panama, said that the vessel was to go to Panama and there was to be turned over and change command. The witness then says: "Q. Did he say to whom she was to be turned over? A. Our conversation was of Chile, but I cannot swear that he used the word Chile on that occasion. Q. Was anything said as to the officer to whom she was to be turned over at Panama? A. I think he said Williams. Q. (by the Court) Who was Williams? A. One Williams was a man in command of the Esmeralda. Q. Nothing was said about what Williams it was? A. No, sir. Q. What did you say about Williams being an officer of the Chilian navy? A. The one I had reference to was in command of the Esmeralda when she captured the Carvadonga. Q. Did he call him anything else but Williams? A. I do not remember that he did; he might." This witness also says that on the Monday before the seizure of the vessel, he saw Mackenna, and that this conversation took place between them: "I told him I supposed that the Meteor was off; he shrugged his shoulders and said he did not know she was; I told him I had supposed that I would go out in command of her if she went out, but I saw that no officer that had served in the Union army had any chance with him, but that all the officers I heard of his appointing were the meanest rebels he could get hold of, and I thought he would make a very good rebel himself. He said: 'Wait, wait! there may be an opportunity yet to ship.' That was all that occurred." This witness also says, that the master of the Meteor, Captain Kemble, told him, before the seizure, that if the parties Byron, McNichols, and Conkling bought her, he, Kemble, would go out and deliver her over to some other parties or some other officers.

We are now brought to an examination of the testimony given by the witnesses Wright, Hunter, McNichols, Conkling, Nichols, and Ramsay, upon the subject of the negotiations between the parties who acted for the Chilian government on the one side and the agent of the owners of the Meteor on the other, in reference to the sale of that vessel. The parties employed by Rogers, the Chilian consul, to enter into negotiations for the purchase of the Meteor, were McNichols, Conkling, and Byron. Byron has not been examined as a witness. McNichols and Conkling testified as witnesses for the libellants, and it will be proper first to examine their testimony.

McNichols says, that he knows Wright and Rogers, but not Mackenna; that he first saw Rogers about the latter part of October, or the beginning of November, 1865, and he identified Rogers in the court-room; that Conkling went with him on that occasion to see Rogers, at Rogers's house in New York; that Rogers told McNichols and Conkling, at that interview, that he wanted vessels for war purposes for the Chilian government, wooden screw propellers, and heavy guns, for the Chilian navy, and wished to know whether McNichols and Conkling had any facility in finding such a class of vessels; that he, McNichols, told Rogers that that was in their line, and they could furnish him with estimates; that the witness and Conkling saw Rogers again at his house three or four days afterwards; that the witness furnished Rogers on that occasion with a description in writing of different steamers, not including the Meteor, however; that on that occasion the witness had some conversation with Rogers in reference to the style of clearing vessels at New York, and in reference to arms, and left with Rogers estimates of arms for the navy; that Rogers said he would leave them with the special agent or the Chilian minister and report again; that the witness saw Rogers, at different times before taking to him the list of the Meteor; that about three weeks after the last-named conversation the witness and Conkling went to Rogers's house with the estimate of the Meteor; that on that occasion Rogers said that he did not think the brokers had control of the sale of the Meteor, and that he understood there were arrangements made concerning her, and that she was out of the market, as it were, and that the special agent or the Chilian minister (the witness forgot which) had been negotiating about the Meteor, and the delay was for want of funds; that Rogers also stated, at that time, that the Meteor could be had on more advantageous terms if there was a good capitalist who could advance the funds to buy her from Mr. Forbes, and that the Meteor was offered to the special agent or the Chilian minister (the witness forgot which) for a little less than two hundred thousand dollars in gold, and that the estimate of Mr. Wright was much larger than that; that Rogers also then told the witness to ascertain if Wright & Co. actually had the control of the sale of the vessel, and to be sure if they had; that he, the witness, believed that there was some mention made at that interview, that if a capitalist would undertake to advance the money to purchase the Meteor from Forbes & Co. and clear her from New York, there could be no dispute of the agent or special agent at New York paying a very handsome price or a very liberal price; that the witness, in company with Conkling, saw Rogers on the next night after that, at Rogers's house, and told Rogers that Wright represented that he had the entire control of the sale of the Meteor; that some conversation then took place about the way they wanted the broker or capitalist to advance his funds, and that there was some talk about drafts on the Chilian government; that Rogers said that the only way that they could at that time arrange for the payment of the vessel was to arrange with any capitalists in giving drafts on the Chilian government; that they had some conversation in reference to the drafts; that Rogers said he could not tell until he could hear from the minister in Washington, and wanted to know if the brokers or any capitalists had the means of advancing the money to purchase the vessel; that Rogers said it would require a large amount of money, and wanted to know if the brokers could control the money to purchase her; that when Rogers told the witness, on the previous occasion, to be sure to ascertain whether or not the brokers had control of the sale of the Meteor, he, the witness, went down and saw the brokers, Wright & Co., and asked Wright if he had the control of her; that Wright came in from his front office, and told the witness that Mr. Cary was in the front office, and showed the witness a telegram from Mr. Forbes to Mr. Wright, and said that he had authority to sell the vessel, and asked the witness who his principals were, and the witness told him the Chilian government; that Wright then went into the other room; that the price of the vessel had been before that named by Byron to the witness; that one or two days after this interview with Wright, the witness called again on Wright in regard to the purchase of the Meteor, as Wright wanted to know the style of the bonds or drafts for the payment of the vessel,—whether they were bonds or drafts,—and to see whether he could negotiate them with a capitalist in New York, and wanted to know very minutely about it, and said he was going to call, or had called, on Duncan, Sherman & Co. in reference to them, and proposed that he should be introduced to Rogers, so that he could be in a better position to understand the thing,—the difference in exchange; that Wright made an appointment, and the witness went up with him to Rogers, with Rogers's consent; that the conversation at that interview was about the clearing of the vessel, and about the difference of exchange, and the class of bonds they would give; that Wright mentioned that the thing was almost impracticable, because no house or capitalist would run such a risk unless the exchange could be negotiated here, and thought the Chilian government should run part of the risk themselves in advancing the money here; that at a subsequent interview between the witness and Rogers, Rogers said that he thought he could get Mackenna to run one-third the risk, and that the capitalist would only have to run two thirds of the risk in clearing the vessel out from New York; that at different interviews Rogers said that Mackenna did not wish to advance any money on the Meteor or any steamer, until she was delivered outside of Sandy Hook; that at one interview Rogers said that the capitalist that would take the thing in hand should take all the risk of clearing the vessel from New York, and it would be preferable to any port in South America, and that the captain should name Buenos Ayres, as a courier could go from Buenos Ayres across the mountains in two days and a half, so that it would be an advantage to any capitalist who would accept the drafts, in getting them cashed; that Rogers said that the vessel could be accepted at sea, or outside of Sandy Hook; that at one interview Rogers said that Captain Jones, whom the Chilian minister had sent, was acting for Mackenna as inspector, and helping to carry out business in regard to vessels; that on the Saturday before the Meteor was seized, the witness and Conkling had an interview with Rogers at Rogers's house; that on that occasion Rogers said that the sale of the Meteor was settled, and he understood she was to clear next week for Panama, and that the purchase of the Meteor was all settled; that Rogers told the witness that the Meteor was going to clear for Panama, and said that it was an understood thing what purpose she was to go for; that at the interview on the Saturday before the Meteor was seized, Rogers said that Mackenna was making use of the information that Wright and the witness had taken up to him, Rogers, and had employed other parties to accomplish his object; that on the following Monday Rogers told the witness, at the witness's office, that the Meteor was expected to clear that morning from the custom-house; that the witness took up to Rogers for Wright, estimates as to the fitting of the vessel with stores and coal for the voyage; that estimates had been left with Rogers, in reference to coaling as part of the cost; and that at the same time an estimate was left with Rogers of the armament that would be necessary for the Meteor.

Conkling testifies, that he became acquainted with Rogers about the 1st of November, 1865; that he, in company with McNichols, saw Rogers at Rogers's house in New York, on the Saturday evening prior to the seizure of the Meteor; and that Rogers then said to McNichols that the vessel would probably sail on the first of the week, perhaps on Monday, and that all the arrangements had been completed for her sale to the Chilian government, he believed, by Mackenna.

Wright testifies that he is a ship-broker; that about the 1st of December, 1865, a man calling himself Byron called at his office, and asked him if he had any sea-going steamers for sale; that the witness asked Byron what kind he wished, and he said he wished to purchase three or four good fast sea-going steamers; that the witness made a memorandum of it, and told Byron he would see if he could look up such ones as he wanted; that Byron called again the next day and the witness gave him a list of two or three steamers, including the Meteor, and asked him who he wished the vessels for; that he told the witness he would bring the parties to the office; that the next day he brought McNichols and Conkling to the witness's office and introduced them to the witness as his principals; that the witness then asked McNichols and Conkling if any of the vessels named in the list would suit them, and they told them that the Meteor was the vessel they wanted,—that had been selected from the list; that then they asked the witness if he could get the price of the Meteor, and he told them that he would communicate with the owners of the Meteor; that the witness then sent a dispatch to his, the witness's, brother, who was in Boston on a visit, to see Mr. Forbes, of Boston, and get a price for the Meteor; that the witness got a reply from his brother and then wrote a letter to Mr. Forbes, of which the following is a copy: "New York, Dec. 12, 1865. R. B. Forbes, Esq., Boston. Dear Sir. We telegraphed our Mr. H. H. Wright, at your city, to obtain from you the price of the Meteor, subject to com. of five per cent. to us, and have his reply offering the ship at $350,000. In your absence, we called on Messrs. Cary & Co., who furnished us particulars, which we have handed to our parties. They have made a slight inspection of the ship and propose sending their engineers on board to-morrow, when, if they mean business, we shall be prepared to make an offer. Mr. Cary has called on us to-day, and says he is the party through whom the purchase is to be made. We telegraphed as above, supposing you were the only party. Please set us right on this point, as we do not wish any collision, should we effect a sale. Yours truly, Chas. L. Wright & Co."; that the witness received, in reply, from J. M. Forbes & Co., the following letter: "Boston, Dec. 13, 1865. Gent. Anything which Messrs. Cary & Co. engage will be duly ratified by us. Truly, J. M. Forbes & Co., Agents Steamer Meteor, Messrs. C. L. Wright & Co."; that on the receipt of that letter the witness replied to it as follows: "56 South Street, New York, Dec. 14, 1865. Messrs. J. M. Forbes & Co., Boston. Gent. We have your favor of yesterday. We will arrange all matters with Mr. Cary according to your request. Some matters of detail have prevented us from making an offer for a day or two, but we are quite confident that we shall shortly be in shape to close with you. We are, very truly, Chas. L. Wright & Co."; that the witness saw Cary on the day he, the witness, telegraphed to his brother, or on the day that he wrote the letter to R. B. Forbes,—on the 11th or 12th of December,—at the witness's office in South street; that Byron, McNichols and Conkling were in the private office when Mr. Cary came; that Mr. Cary at that time understood the witness had been communicating with Mr. Forbes about the Meteor, and told the witness that he, Cary, had as much to say about the ship as Mr. Forbes had; that the witness told Cary that he, the witness, had parties who he thought would buy the ship, and that he would communicate with him, Cary, as soon as he could do so definitely, and would treat through him, Cary, for the purchase of the vessel; and that on that occasion nothing was said by the witness to Cary as to who the principals were. The remainder of the testimony of Wright has been heretofore recited, in considering the point as to whether the Meteor was purchased for the Chilian government, and as to whether Cary, representing her owners, was advised of the fact that the Chilian government were the parties negotiating for the vessel through Wright.

Frederick Nichols, a mariner, testifies, that he knows R. B. Forbes, Wright and Rogers; that the first time he saw Rogers was at Rogers's house in New York, between the 15th of September and the 10th of December, 1865; that he went to the house of Rogers, the Chilian consul, on that occasion, with a man named Bates, of Valparaiso, to see if two letters of marque which Bates held were genuine; that Bates showed Rogers the two letters of marque and asked him if the signature was genuine, and said he had no doubt of it; that Bates left the letters of marque with Rogers and took from Rogers a receipt of them; that Rogers said there was to be a Chilian minister or special agent appointed for Chile, who would be here soon, and that when he arrived he, Rogers, would know then what they should do; that Bates told Rogers to let the witness have one of the letters of marque if the witness wished or if he raised stock for a privateer; that Bates asked the witness to take one of the letters of marque; that on that occasion Bates handed to Rogers a printed paper containing instructions in Spanish, some parts of which Rogers at the time translated to the witness; that the witness had a number of interviews subsequently with Rogers; that at one of those interviews Rogers said that some parties representing Chile (the witness afterwards said he thought Rogers said it was the Chilian minister) had been on board the Meteor, had seen her and liked her very much, and Rogers wanted the witness's opinion of her; that Rogers asked the witness what he thought of her and what kind of a vessel she was: that the witness replied that he had never seen her, but had often heard of her, and knew what vessel she was and what she was built for, and knew Mr. Forbes; that the witness was told by Rogers that the special agent from Chile had arrived; that Rogers called him Mackenna; that some time in December the witness went on board of the Meteor, at the request of Wright, to meet McNichols, Byron, and Conkling, and met them there and was introduced to McNichols and Conkling, having been introduced to Byron previously at Wright's office, on an occasion when Wright, at the request of Byron, sent for the witness; that the witness made an estimate, at the request of Byron, of the guns the Meteor would carry and the ammunition she would require, &c., for three or six months and gave it to Conkling or McNichols; that shortly after that the witness, in company with Wright, saw Rogers, and Rogers asked what it would require to fit the vessel out with guns and ammunition and deliver her at some foreign port (the witness did not remember exactly what,—it was called Montevideo, he thought,—or outside of the harbor); that the witness gave Rogers an estimate of it, or assisted to make up the estimate with Wright, and thinks it amounted to about $390,000; that at one of the interviews with Rogers, Rogers said there was difficulty in raising money to buy these vessels, but that if they could get drafts cashed on the Chilian government they could pay for the boats,—for the Meteor; that Rogers gave the witness a card of introduction to Mackenna, and the witness saw Mackenna at Mackenna's house the last of December, 1865, or the first of January, 1866, and gave him the card, and told him that he, the witness, would like to have an appointment in some way in the Chilian navy, or get command of some vessel fitting out in New York, that he had just left the United States navy and was willing to go into the Chilian service for awhile; that Mackenna said that he had heard of the witness from Rogers, and would bear him in mind, and if any opportunities offered, would let him know of it; that at that interview the witness told Mackenna that he understood that Catesby Jones had been appointed inspector of vessels for the Chilian government, and Mackenna replied: "Well, he has inspected some"; and that the witness, at that interview, suggested the names of several vessels, and that Mackenna said he wanted vessels whose machinery would run at least two or two and a half years, to go on that station. The remainder of the testimony of Nichols has been before referred to, on the point as to the knowledge by Forbes that the Meteor was destined for the service of Chile.

Daniel J. Hunter testifies that he was employed by Mackenna as translator, and resided with him, commencing in December, 1865; that he knows Rogers, and also a man called Captain Wilson; that he first saw Captain Wilson nearly a year ago in Chile, and had seen him on several occasions in this country, and had seen him three weeks ago in New York, and had seen him at Mackenna's house, and had been present at interviews between Mackenna and Wilson, and had heard them discuss, in a general way, the subject of fitting out privateers in behalf of Chile against Spain; that in those interviews the witness heard the subject of the purchase or the getting of the Meteor discussed; that the witness knows Captain Kemble; that the witness had been on board of the Meteor twice, the first time nearly three months before the time he was giving his testimony; that on the first occasion three Chilians were in company with him; that the witness had seen Captain Kemble at Mackenna's house when Kemble came and called on him, the witness; that Kemble called at Mackenna's house twice, some two or three months ago, and saw Mackenna there on both occasions, and remained at Mackenna's at those times an hour or so; that the witness knows Mr. Asta Buruaga, the Chilian minister at Washington, and had seen him in New York, at Mackenna's house, after the arrival of Mackenna in the United States, and had seen Rogers at Mackenna's house, on a great many occasions, and had heard the subject of fitting out privateers discussed between Rogers and Mackenna in a general way, and had heard the Meteor mentioned between them.

George M. Ramsay testifies, that he knows Mackenna and Rogers, and he produces a paper, which he saw Mackenna sign in two places. The paper is signed, "Benj. Vicuna Mackenna, confidential agent of the government of Chile, in the United States of America," and is a contract dated New York, December 27, 1865, between Mackenna of the one part, and Ramsay, as the inventor and owner of certain boats called "torpedo boats," and also of torpedoes, for the delivery by Ramsay, in Chile, of two torpedo boats and ten torpedoes, within ninety days from the date of the contract, and for the personal service of Ramsay in Chile, with "the necessary skilled men to assist him to efficiently operate said two torpedo boats against the enemy's vessels of war and transports, for and in behalf of the government of Chile, for a period of one (1) year from the delivery of the said torpedo boats as herein provided, but with the proviso that should the present war with Spain terminate before the expiration of that year, then his term of service also expires." The contract also provides for the payment by the government of Chile to Ramsay of "a premium for the destruction of any and all Spanish vessels of war or transports which he may accomplish," with a provision as to fixing the amount of such premiums. In the contract, Mackenna agrees to furnish Ramsay "and his associates, such commissions as they may require, to show they are legally authorized by the government of Chile to perform such service as is herein implied and expressed." This contract has appended to it a certificate signed "Stephen Rogers, Consul for the Republic of Chile in New York," &c., &c. Hunter states that he had a talk with Rogers in regard to his giving this certificate before he, the witness, received it; and that after that conversation, he received the certificate as being provided for in the contract, and attached it himself to the contract. The certificate is dated December 29, 1865, and is as follows: "I certify that one Benjamin Vicuna Mackenna, now in this city, is duly and fully authorized by his government, the republic of Chile, to execute contracts, and sign any and all agreements for the said government, that in his discretion may promote her interests, and that, in my presence, he did sign, on the 27th inst., a contract with George M. Ramsay, respecting the sale and the operating of torpedo boats."

The testimony thus reviewed leads clearly to the conclusion, that Wright, McNichols, Conkling, and Byron, within the limits of the United States, were knowingly concerned in procuring the Meteor to be put within the control of the authorized representatives of the Chilian government, with intent that she should be employed in the service of Chile, to cruise or commit hostilities against Spain. This is, in the judgment of the court, a furnishing of the Meteor to the Chilian government with such intent. The testimony is also abundant to show that the active owners of the Meteor, and their authorized agent, Cary, were themselves knowingly concerned in offering the vessel to the Chilian authorities, and placing her within their power and control, with such intent. They, therefore, in a like sense, were concerned in furnishing the vessel, with that intent, to the Chilian government. But the evidence is also clear that Captain Kemble and others concerned in putting stores and coal on board the Meteor did so with the intent that she should be employed in the service of Chile to cruise or commit hostilities against Spain, and were thus knowingly concerned, within the limits of the United States, and with such intent, in furnishing the Meteor with stores and coal, and in fitting her out with what was necessary to make her an effective vessel. This would bring what was done within the inhibition of the third section of the statute, even though the meaning of the word "furnishing" should be limited to the act of providing the vessel with supplies, fuel, and other articles necessary or proper for her use.

Much stress was laid, in the course of the argument, by the counsel for the claimant, upon the fact that the testimony of the witnesses Wright, McNichols, Byron and Conkling, as to conversations between them on the one side, and Rogers and Mackenna on the other, was hearsay and secondary in its character. The testimony of these witnesses clearly shows that a common plan was entered upon by them and Rogers and Mackenna to procure the Meteor for the service of Chile, in the war between that country and Spain. Rogers set McNichols, Byron and Conkling in motion as his agents for that purpose. The law is well settled, that where two or more persons are associated together for the same illegal purpose, any act or declaration of one of the parties in reference to the common object, and forming a part of the res gestae, may be given in evidence against the others. American Fur Co. v. United States, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 358. Upon this principle the court admitted at the trial the evidence in regard to which the objection was made.

In the course of the trial, considerable evidence was received by the court provisionally, under the objection of the counsel for the claimant that such evidence would be irrelevant, if standing by itself, and if unconnected with other evidence. But, in the judgment of the court, the evidence thus objected to was made competent by being satisfactorily connected with the rest of the evidence in the case. The court, on the trial of a cause in admiralty, is not embarrassed by the apprehension which exists on the trial of a cause before a jury, as to the effect likely to be produced by evidence which may, after it has once been given, be afterwards stricken out as incompetent. In the conduct of all trials, the evidence must come in at different stages of the trial, and it is often absolutely necessary to admit evidence the strict legal competency of which cannot be shown until after it is received. In the present case, the court has applied to the evidence the rules which govern in trials in the admiralty, and has not taken into consideration any testimony which is not admissible under those rules. The court cannot, in the present case, overlook the fact that neither Mr. Cary, nor any one of the owners of the Meteor, nor any other witness, was put upon the stand on the part of the claimant, to make any explanation as to the object for which the Meteor was about to go to sea when she was seized, or as to her real destination. In view of the testimony put in by the libellants in this case, the court is clearly of opinion that the onus probandi rested on the claimant to show the real character of the transactions in regard to the Meteor and her actual destination, if such character and destination were different from those so clearly indicated in the testimony given on the part of the libellants. The exculpatory testimony, if any existed, was within the control of the claimant, Cary, and of his principals, the Messrs. Forbes. The libellants seem to have produced as witnesses nearly every person who had any active connection with the transactions in regard to the Meteor. The absence of such exculpatory testimony is not accounted for, and the legal presumption follows, that the facts testified to by the witnesses for the libellants do not admit of a satisfactory explanation. The Short Staple [Case No. 12,813]; s. c., 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 55; Ten Hogsheads of Rum [Case No. 13,830]; The Struggle v. U. S., 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 71; The Robert Edwards, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 187. The very recent cases of The Slavers, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 350, 366, 375, 383, cases of libels under the slave-trade act [1 Stat. 347; 3 Stat. 450] three of which were originally brought in this court, lay down principles which are very pertinent to the present case. In The Kate, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 350, the principle laid down by this court was affirmed by the supreme court,—that when the evidence on the part of the government creates strong suspicions or well-grounded suspicions that the vessel seized as being employed in the slave-trade was fitted out or fitting out for that purpose, such evidence must produce her conviction and condemnation unless rebutted by clear and satisfactory proofs on the part of the claimants, showing her voyage to be a lawful one. In another of those cases, The Reindeer, 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 383, the supreme court say: "Suits of this description necessarily give rise to a wide range of investigation, for the reason that the purpose of the voyage is directly involved in the issue. Experience shows that positive proof in such cases is not generally to be expected, and for that reason, among others, the law allows a resort to circumstances as the means of ascertaining the truth. Circumstances altogether inconclusive, if separately considered, may, by their number and joint operation, especially when corroborated by moral coincidences, be sufficient to constitute conclusive proof." In the case of Clifton v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 242, which was a libel of information on a seizure for the fraudulent undervaluation of goods in an invoice, the circuit court instructed the jury that "to withhold testimony which it was in the power of a party to produce in order to rebut a charge against him, where it was not supplied by equivalent testimony, might be as fatal as positive testimony in support or confirmation of the charge," and "that if the claimant had withheld proof which his accounts and transactions with these parties afforded, it might be presumed that, if produced, they would have operated unfavorably to his case." This instruction having been excepted to by the claimants, the case was taken to the supreme court by writ of error. Mr. Justice Nelson, in delivering the opinion of that court, says, in regard to these instructions: "They were not only quite pertinent to the question in hand, but founded upon the well-established rules and principles of evidence. The prosecution involved in its result not only the forfeiture of a considerable amount of property, but also the character of the claimant, both as a merchant and an individual. He was charged with a deliberate and systematic violation of the revenue laws of the country by means of frauds and perjuries, and the court had pronounced the proof sufficient to establish the offence unless explained and rebutted by opposing evidence. Under these circumstances, the claimant was called upon by the strongest consideration, personal and legal, if innocent, to bring to the support of his defence the very best evidence that was in his possession or under his control."

Much reliance was placed by the counsel for the claimant, in his summing up, upon the doctrine supposed by him to have been laid down by the supreme court in the case of The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283. That doctrine was stated by the counsel in various forms, but the principle contended for was that freedom of commerce is allowed to a neutral to furnish to a belligerent warlike materials or warlike vessels as articles of merchandise or traffic; that while the principle of the law of nations is recognized, which prohibits neutral territory from being used by either belligerent as a vantage-ground from which he may sally forth to commit hostilities upon the other belligerent, yet the right of citizens of the neutral country to sell all that their industry produces for purposes of war, as fair matter of trade, to any belligerent, cannot be interfered with, that it is no offence and no violation of neutrality to sell a vessel of war, armed or not armed, in our ports, to a belligerent power; and that there is the same right under the law of nations, to sell in our ports an armed vessel, under such circumstances, that there is to sell guns or ammunition or any other raw material. At another stage of his argument, the counsel maintained the proposition, that unless it appeared affirmatively that the vessel was to sail out from the port of New York as an enlisted hostile ship of one belligerent, there was no criminality, although it should be made to appear by indisputable proof that she had been built, fitted, armed, and equipped as a ship of war, complete and ready for action.

The views thus pressed upon the court have, in its judgment, no foundation in public law, or in any decision that has been made by the highest judicial tribunal of the United States. The case of The Santissima Trinidad was decided by the supreme court at the February term, 1822. It was a libel filed by the consul of Spain, in the district court of Virginia, in April, 1817, against certain property originally constituting a part of the cargo of the Spanish ship Santissima Trinidad, which was alleged to have been unlawfully and piratically taken out of that vessel on the high seas, by a squadron consisting of two armed vessels called the Independencia del Sud and the Altravida, and manned and commanded by persons assuming themselves to be citizens of the United Provinces of the Rio de la Plata, commonly called the government of Buenos Ayres. The libel was filed by the consul on behalf of the original Spanish owners of the property, and claimed the restitution of the property principally upon three grounds,—First, that the commanders of the capturing vessels were native citizens of the United States, and were prohibited by our treaty with Spain of 1795 from taking commissions to cruise against that power; second, that the capturing vessels were owned in the United States and were originally equipped, fitted out, armed and manned in the United States, contrary to law; third, that their force and armament had been illegally augmented within the United States. The district court decreed restitution of the property, and the circuit court affirmed the decree, and the case was then taken by appeal to the supreme court. That court (Mr. Justice Story delivering its opinion) decided that the Independencia was in point of fact a public ship belonging to the government of the United Provinces, and that all captures made by her were to be regarded as valid. It appeared that the property in question was captured by the Independencia alone, and the Altravida being a tender, or despatch vessel, to the Independencia. The supreme court also decided that the evidence showed that there had been a clearly illegal augmentation of the forces of the Independencia and the Altravida, within the jurisdiction of the United States, by an increase of their crews there, prior to the capture in question, and that such illegal augmentation was a violation of the laws of nations as well as of our own municipal laws, and required restitution to be made of the property subsequently captured by the vessels. The court, therefore, affirmed the decree of the circuit court. In the course of his opinion Mr. Justice Story discusses the point taken, that the Independencia was originally armed and fitted out in the United States contrary to law, and says: "It is apparent, that though equipped as a vessel of war, she was sent to Buenos Ayres on a commercial adventure, contraband indeed, but in no shape violating our laws, or our national neutrality. If captured by a Spanish ship of war during the voyage, she would have been justly condemnable as a good prize, for being engaged in a traffic prohibited by the law of nations. But there is nothing in our laws, or in the law of nations, that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels, as well as munitions of war, to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation. Supposing, therefore, the voyage to have been for commercial purposes, and the sale at Buenos Ayres to have been a bona fide sale (and there is nothing in the evidence before us to contradict it), there is no pretence to say that the original outfit on the voyage was illegal, or that a capture made after the sale was, for that cause alone, invalid." These views of Mr. Justice Story were, as is apparent from the statement which has been made of the case, obiter dicta, and not necessary to the decision of the cause, restitution of the property being decreed upon the ground of the illegal augmentation of the force of the capturing vessel in our ports prior to the capture. The facts in regard to the commercial adventure of the Independencia, referred to by Mr. Justice Story, as they appear in the report of the case, were, that that vessel, having been a privateer during the war between the United States and Great Britain, was, after the peace, sold by her original owners, and loaded by her new ones, at Baltimore, in January, 1816, with a cargo of munitions of war; that she sailed from Baltimore with them, and armed with twelve guns, part of her original armament, to Buenos Ayres, under written instructions from her owners to her supercargo, authorizing him to sell the vessel to the government of Buenos Ayres, if he could obtain a suitable price; and that she was sold at Buenos Ayres to parties who again sold her, so that she became a public commissioned vessel of the government of Buenos Ayres. It was on these facts that Judge Story remarked that the vessel, though equipped as a vessel of war, was sent to Buenos Ayres on a commercial adventure in no shape violating our laws or our national neutrality, in that there is nothing in our laws, or in the law of nations, that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels to foreign ports for sale. If the Messrs. Forbes, or any of the owners of the Meteor, or Mr. Cary, their agent, or any of the parties concerned in the transactions in regard to the Meteor, had testified before the court, on this trial, that the Meteor was going out to Panama on a purely commercial adventure, to be sold there, if a suitable price could be obtained, and if it appeared that there was no intent on the part of the owners, or any other person, that the vessel should be used to violate the neutrality of the United States, there might be some pretence that this case was within the principle thus laid down by Mr. Justice Story. But the whole testimony points in a different direction. The transaction with the agents of Chile at New York, in regard to the Meteor, was, it is true, a commercial adventure, in so far that the vessel was sold, and that such sale was a matter of trade or commerce at New York, between her owners and the agents of the government of Chile. But, in the sense in which Mr. Justice Story speaks of the sending of the Independencia to Buenos Ayres on a commercial adventure, there was no commercial adventure in the case of the Meteor.

What the supreme court regard as not being a commercial adventure is shown by the opinion of that court, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of The Gran Para, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 471, which came before that court at the same term as the case of The Santissima Trinidad [supra]. It was a libel filed in the district court of Maryland, by the consul-general of Portugal, praying for the restitution to Portuguese owners of a quantity of gold and silver coin alleged to have been taken from the Portuguese ship Gran Para by a private armed vessel called the Irresistible, fitted out in the United States in violation of the neutrality acts. It appeared that the Irresistible was built as a war vessel in the United States, and sailed from Baltimore for Teneriffe, between February and June, 1818, with a crew of fifty men, and with cannon, small arms and ammunition in her hold, entered outwards as cargo; that she proceeded to Buenos Ayres, and was commissioned as a vessel of the government of Buenos Ayres, to cruise against Spain, and sailed from Buenos Ayres on a cruise, in June, 1818; that the next day her master produced a commission from the chief of the Oriental Republic, to cruise under that commission, and sent back the commission of the government of Buenos Ayres; that during the cruise the money in question was captured; and that the Irresistible subsequently brought the money to Baltimore. Chief Justice Marshall, in his opinion, says: "That the Irresistible was purchased, and that she sailed out of the port of Baltimore, armed and manned as a vessel of war, for the purpose of being employed as a cruiser against a nation with whom the United States were at peace, is too clear for controversy. That the arms and ammunition were cleared out as cargo cannot vary the case. Nor is it thought to be material that the men were enlisted in form as for a common mercantile voyage. There is nothing resembling a commercial adventure in any part of the transaction. The vessel was constructed for war, and not for commerce. There was no cargo on board but what was adapted to the purposes of war. The crew was too numerous for a merchantman, and was sufficient for a privateer. These circumstances demonstrate the intent with which the Irresistible sailed out of the port of Baltimore. But she was not commissioned as a privateer, nor did she attempt to act as one, until she reached the river La Plata, when a commission was obtained and the crew re-enlisted. This court has never decided that the offence adheres to the vessel, whatever changes may have taken place, and cannot be deposited at the termination of the cruise in preparation for which it was committed; and, as the Irresistible made no prize on her passage from Baltimore to the river La Plata, it is contended that her offence was deposited there, and that the court cannot connect her subsequent cruise with the transactions at Baltimore. If this were to be admitted in such a case as this, the laws for the preservation of our neutrality would be completely eluded, so far as their enforcement depends on the restitution of prizes made in violation of them. Vessels completely fitted out in our ports for military operations need only sail to a belligerent port, and there, after obtaining a commission, go through the ceremony of discharging and reenlisting their crew, to become perfectly legitimate cruisers, purified from every taint contracted at the place where all their real force and capacity for annoyance were acquired. This would, indeed, be a fraudulent neutrality, disgraceful to our own government, and of which no nation would be the dupe. It is impossible for a moment to disguise the facts, that the arms and ammunition taken on board the Irresistible at Baltimore were taken for the purpose of being used on a cruise, and that the men there enlisted, though engaged in form as for a commercial voyage, were not so engaged in fact. There was no commercial voyage, and no individual of the crew could believe that there was one. Although there might be no express stipulation to serve on board the Irresistible, after her reaching the La Plata and obtaining a commission, it must be completely understood that such was to have been the fact. For what other purpose could they have undertaken this voyage? Everything they saw, everything that was done, spoke a language too plain to be misunderstood." The court affirmed the decree restoring the money, on the ground that it had been captured by a vessel which had violated our neutrality law. The court held that the Irresistible came within the prohibitions of that part of the third section of the neutrality act of June 5, 1794 (1 Stat. 383), which makes it penal for any person, within any waters of the United States, to be knowingly concerned "in the furnishing, fitting out or arming of any ship or vessel with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince or state, to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects, citizens or property of another foreign prince or state with whom the United States are at peace." The court also referred to the fact that the neutrality act of March 3, 1817 (3 Stat. 370, § 1), adapts the previous laws to the actual situation of the world, by adding to the words "of any foreign prince or state," in the third section of the act of 1794, the words "or of any colony, district, or people." The third section of the act of April 20, 1818, is in substance the same with the first section of the act of 1817. The Meteor, although she did not have on board of her, when seized, any cannon, small arms or ammunition, except the boxes of cannon-shot testified to by the witness Sease, was not, on the evidence, really engaged any more in a commercial adventure, in taking out her clearance for Panama, than was the Irresistible in her voyage to Buenos Ayres. The Meteor, although not completely fitted out for military operations, was a vessel of war, and not a vessel of commerce. She had in no manner been altered from a vessel of war so as to fit her to be only a merchantman, and so as to unfit her to be a vessel of war. It needed only that she should reach a point beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, and there have her armament and ammunition put on board of her to become an armed cruiser of the Chilian government against the government of Spain. To permit a transaction of the kind shown by the proofs in this case to be consummated, would, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of The Gran Para [supra] be "a fraudulent neutrality."

The case of Moodie v. The Alfred, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 307, decided by the supreme court at the August term, 1795, was pressed, upon the argument, by the counsel for the claimant, as sanctioning the freedom of commerce for which he contended. In that case, a British prize had been taken by a French privateer and sent into Charleston. The privateer had been built in New York, with the express view of being employed as a privateer against Great Britain, in case there should be a war between the United States and Great Britain. Some of the equipments put upon her in New York were calculated for war, though they were frequently used for merchant ships. She was sent to Charleston, where she was sold to a French citizen. He carried her to a French island, where she was completely armed and equipped and furnished with a commission, and she afterwards sailed on a cruise, during which the prize in question was taken. It was contended, in that case, that the original construction or outfit of the privateer was an original construction or outfit of a vessel for the purposes of war, and that therefore, the capture of the prize was illegal; but the court overruled this view. That case affords no countenance to the doctrine in support of which its authority is adduced. The only fact appearing in the case bearing on the illegality of the transaction was, that the vessel was built in the United States, was furnished there with some warlike equipments, and was there sold to a French citizen. But the main ingredient was wanting of any furnishing, fitting out or arming of the vessel with intent that she should be employed in the service of France, to cruise or commit hostilities upon the subjects or property of Great Britain. She was built with the intent to cruise in the service of the United States against Great Britain in the contingency of a war between those two powers, and no circumstance appears in connection with the sale of the vessel, except that she was sold in the United States to a French citizen. If it had been shown that she was purchased by the French citizen with intent to employ her in the service of France to cruise against Great Britain, the case might have been a different one, and the decision might have been different; but the case as it stands furnishes no support to the doctrines urged by the counsel for the claimant. Nor is there anything to be found in the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 445, which sanctions those doctrines. According to that decision, the question of intent is the main question under the neutrality law, and, as the court say, "all the latitude necessary for commercial purposes is given to our citizens, and they are restrained only from such acts as are calculated to involve the country in war."

The sale of a fully armed vessel of war in the United States to a belligerent government, or to a subject or citizen of such government, may be, as a naked act, lawful and no offence against the law of nations or the statutory law of the United States; but, if such vessel passes virtually, and to all practical intents and purposes, in the United States, into the control of the belligerent power, or of its subject or citizen, with the intent on the part of those concerned in putting the vessel under such control that she shall be employed in the service of the belligerent power, to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens or property of a power at war with such belligerent and at peace with the United States, the neutrality of the United States is compromised, and the neutrality law of the United States is violated. To say that, with such an intent proved in the sale of the vessel, nothing has been done in violation of the third section of the act of 1818, is to make such section virtually a dead letter. The doctrine contended for would result in this,—that the building and arming of the vessel would be perfectly lawful, because, in building and arming her, there was no intent to have her unlawfully employed; and the sale would be perfectly lawful, although such intent existed at the time of the sale, because no such intent existed when she was built or armed; and no interference could be had with her after the sale because, as she was fully armed and equipped at the time of the sale, it would be unnecessary to do anything to her after the sale to enable her to cruise or commit hostilities. This consequence would follow; not only in respect to a vessel fully armed, but in respect to one which had been merely attempted to be fitted out and armed, and in respect to one which had been only partially fitted out and armed. The intent is, under the third section, the thing which marks the offence. If the prohibited intent does not exist, a citizen of the United States may not only sell a fully armed vessel in a port of the United States to a belligerent power, or to a subject or citizen of such power, but may also send a fully armed vessel to a foreign port for sale as a purely commercial adventure. To say that the neutrality laws of the United States have never prohibited the sale of a vessel of war as an article of commerce is merely to say that they have not prohibited the fitting out and arming, or the attempting to fit out and arm, or the furnishing or fitting out or arming, of a vessel within the limits of the United States, provided the unlawful and prohibited intent did not exist.

The language of the act of 1818 is not ambiguous, and does not admit of any latitude of construction, nor is there any provision in any section of it conflicting with any provision in any other section of it. It is, therefore, unnecessary to look outside of the statute for any aid in arriving at the intention of the legislature in its enactment. While it is the duty of the court, in interpreting a statute, to effect the intention of the legislature, that intention must be searched for in the words which the legislature has employed to convey it. Where the language of an act is explicit, there is a great danger in departing from the words used to give to the law an effect which may be supposed to have been designed by the legislature. The Paulina's Cargo v. U. S., 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 52; Denn v. Reid, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 524. When, as in the present case, such intention is, in the face of the statute, not at all ambiguous, the court cannot look elsewhere than into the statute itself for any aid in interpreting it. These considerations dispose of any argument in favor of the interpretation urged by the counsel for the claimant, drawn from a history of the neutrality acts of the United States, and the condition of the foreign relations of the United States, at the time of the enactment of the statute, and the political correspondence of the public authorities of the United States, and the discussions in congress preliminary to the passage of the act.

The importance of this case, not merely in view of the pecuniary value of the vessel proceeded against, but also in respect to the principles of public law involved in it, has led the court to a more extended discussion of those principles than would otherwise have been necessary. The court, however, entertains no doubt as to the correctness of the doctrines of public law which it has applied to the present case. Those doctrines are the result of the legislative, executive and judicial action of the public authorities and courts of the United States in a great variety of cases, and the court has nowhere found a more excellent summary of them than in Wheat. Int. Law (8th Ed.) with notes by Dana, pp. 562, 563, note 215: "As to the preparing of vessels within our jurisdiction for subsequent hostile operations, the test we have applied has not been the extent and character of the preparations but the intent with which the particular acts are done. If any person does any act, or attempts to do any act, towards such preparation, with the intent that the vessel shall be employed in hostile operations he is guilty, without reference to the completion of the preparations or the extent to which they may have gone, and although his attempt may have resulted in no definite progress towards the completion of the preparations. The procuring of materials to be used, knowingly and with the intent, &c., is an offence. Accordingly, it is not necessary to show that the vessel was armed, or was in any way, or at any time, before or after the act charged, in a condition to commit acts of hostility." "Our rules do not interfere with bona fide commercial dealings in contraband war. An American merchant may build and fully arm a vessel, and provide her with stores, and offer her for sale in our own market. If he does any acts, as an agent or servant of a belligerent, or in pursuance of an arrangement or understanding with a belligerent, that she shall be employed in hostilities when sold, he is guilty. He may, without violating our law, send out such a vessel, so equipped, under the flag and papers of his own country, with no more force of crew than is suitable for navigation, with no right to resist search or seizure, and to take the chances of capture as contraband merchandise, of blockade, and of a market in a belligerent port. In such case, the extent and character of the equipments is as immaterial as in the other class of cases. The intent is all. The act is open to great suspicions and abuse, and the line may often be scarcely traceable; yet the principle is clear enough. Is the intent one to prepare an article of contraband merchandise, to be sent to the market of a belligerent, subject to the chances of capture and of the market? Or, on the other hand, is it to fit out a vessel which shall leave our port to cruise, immediately or ultimately against the commerce of a friendly nation? The latter we are bound to prevent. The former the belligerent must prevent." The evidence in the present case leaves no rational doubt that what was done here in respect to the Meteor, was done with the intent that she should be employed in hostile operations in favor of Chile against Spain, and that what was done by her owners towards despatching her from the United States was done in pursuance of an arrangement with the authorized agents of Chile for her sale to that government and for her employment in hostilities against Spain, and that the case is not one of a bona fide commercial dealing in contraband of war.

With these views, there must be a decree condemning and forfeiting the property under seizure, in accordance with the prayer of the libel.

[The case was taken, on appeal, to the circuit court where a decree was entered reversing this court and dismissing the libel. Case No. 15,760.]

[The following note is reprinted from 3 Am. Law Rev. 234.]

NOTE. On the 23d January, 1866, the steamship Meteor, lying at her wharf in New York, was seized by the United States marshal, by virtue of a warrant filed by the United States district attorney, in the district court for the Southern district of New York. The libel charged that the Meteor had, within the jurisdiction of the court, been furnished and fitted out, or attempted to be fitted out, by persons to the district attorney unknown, with the knowledge and intent that she should be employed in the service of the government of Chili, to cruise and commit hostilities against the subjects and property of the government of Spain (with which power we were then at peace), contrary to the third section of the act of congress, approved April 20, 1818, commonly called the "Neutrality Act."

On the 14th March following, Mr. Evarts, of counsel for the owners moved to have the vessel appraised and released to them on bond, according to the customs in causes in admiralty on the instance side of the court. He supported his motion on the ground, that it was matter of ordinary right in such causes. He adduced the analogy in the practice under the slave trade act, and the piracy act; and urged that a privilege never withheld from the nefarious traffickers in human beings ought not, certainly, to be refused to men of the well-known high standing and integrity of the owners of this vessel, constructed, as she has been, upon the most patriotic motives. The district attorney, in reply, argued that the neutrality act was a complete whole in itself, which in some cases directly authorized bonding, and in others by a necessary implication withheld the privilege. He suggested that to bond the vessel was simply to set her free at once to depart upon her illegal cruise. He further insisted that even if the court had power to bond the ship, it was, at least, a matter of judicial discretion; and as a consideration, which in this view would be "fatal to the motion," he read and "made part of his argument" certain letters from the state department, embodying "instructions" to himself. Probably no error can be committed in construing the contents of these letters as the district attorney himself construed them; that is to say, as imperative exhortations to use all the machinery of the law for the purpose of securing the forfeiture of this vessel. In the same connection, he argued strenuously, as a fact which "ought to have some bearing on the question now before the court," that an application had been made to the state department to release the vessel, and been refused. This matter and the "instructions" of the letter were dwelt upon at length and emphatically; and thus, at this early stage in the proceedings, the government counsel, with a faint deprecation, took the ground, which they afterwards deliberately and distinctly assumed, that the whole was an affair of state, rather than a question of law, and that the judge was for the purposes of this cause, not so much a judicial magistrate as a political subaltern.

Mr. Evarts replied. He said that the court had no precautionary power which could be exerted to prevent any further offence by the vessel; that such power, in an ample degree, was lodged with the executive. That the bonding was a matter of obligation, not of discretion; but, if it should be held matter of discretion, he stated facts which he thought should induce the court to grant his motion. In reference to the application stated to have been made to the state department, he explained that it was only an application for the entire discontinuance of the suit and absolute release of the vessel, grounded on the belief of the owners that the government "in plain view of the rights and purposes of the owners, could not seriously intend to make it a matter of judicial inquiry;" that the request was properly preferred to the executive, within whose province lay the duty of deliberation and the power of control as to whether the suit should go on or be discontinued; that the owners had never "asked the government, by any intimation of its wishes, to affect the court's direction and conduct of questions arising in the prosecution;" that if the prosecuting attorneys insisted upon having the secretary of state and the president "heard on questions touching the due administration of justice, except by argument and in methods for which the law provided," then they "introduced an impropriety into the administration of justice," not justified by the secretary's letter, and which the "judiciary of the United States would not submit to tolerate for a single moment."

On the 23d March, the opinion of the court was rendered, refusing the motion. The position taken was, that the statute itself was conclusive to the effect that "the vessel, while held under seizure by process in favor of the United States for the violation of that statute, cannot be discharged on bail by order of a judge of the United States under the authority of the common rules and practice of this court." . . . That the "clear purport and intent" of the statute was that "the vessel [should] herself be detained, so that the forfeiture, which is the penalty, &c., may be forced against her specifically in case of condemnation." The court thus decided that it had not the power to bond the vessel at this time when she had in her favor the legal presumption of innocence. Soon afterwards the trial upon the merits was had, and the court pronounced a decree of condemnation. Thereupon the vessel became tainted with guilt, and the necessity of enforcing the forfeiture "against her specifically" seemed then to be in a fair way to be executed. But just at this juncture the judge reversed his former decision, and the decree of condemnation was promptly followed by an order that the Meteor should be appraised and bonded, if her owners so wished. It was accordingly done, and she was released. No opinion was delivered, either at the time or afterwards; no reasons or explanation were vouchsafed for this astonishing contradictory action. The record simply remains thus: On 23d March, the court had no legal power to bond the vessel which was then presumably innocent; on 20th July, it bonded her after she had been adjudged guilty. We of the outside are remitted to our own cleverness to account for these strange series of incongruous acts. No new law, no new legislation, occurring between March 23d and July 20th, aids us.

To take up again the thread of the history of the case, we will go back to the 28th March. On this day the trial of the case began. The vessel was then still in the custody of the United States marshal. The substance of the evidence adduced by the government was briefly as follows: The Meteor was a swift seagoing steamship; she was built by a number of public-spirited citizens, with the intention of offering her to the United States government, for the purpose of pursuing and destroying the Alabama; to this end she was capable of carrying a moderate armament; but her chief merit lay in her speed, to which every other consideration had been made subordinate. Before she was finished, the need for such vessels had ceased. She had since been used by government as a transport ship for troops, and afterwards had been employed as a freighting vessel, in the merchant service, between home ports. Originally two Parrot guns had been placed on board her, which had been subsequently removed; and beyond this, she had received no warlike equipment whatsoever. She had on board 750 tons of coal, being about 12 tons per day for the shortest voyage to Panama, and provisions for six months, a portion of which were marked "reserved stores." She was for sale for several months. There was war between Spain and Chili, pending which a certain accredited agent of Chili, in New York, wished to buy stanch seagoing steamers; the Meteor, among others, attracted his attention (though through no act of her owners), and suited his purpose. Three "adventurers," of that nondescript hand-to-mouth occupation which furnishes a mysterious livelihood to so many inhabitants of large cities, sought to get a handsome commission, by bringing about a sale of the Meteor to this Chilian agent. One of these men was an army and navy claim agent, interested in petroleum and mining stocks; the other sometimes "speculated in oil stocks," and had been a "bounty broker." For want of ready money, their efforts ended only in egregious failure, as they themselves very freely acknowledged. The owners, the Messrs. Forbes, were ready and willing to sell the vessel to this Chilian agent; but she was to be sold and delivered in precisely the condition in which she was then lying at the wharf, for the full price in cash down. This money could not be thus raised. The whole plan, for this reason, fell through; and the negotiations conclusively ceased. The vessel, with the coal and provisions before named, was cleared or about to clear for Panama, when she was seized under the libel. The informer was one of the three disappointed adventurers. The evidence was explicit to the effect that in the negotiations with the Messrs. Forbes, nothing was for a moment contemplated, save an outright sale of the vessel as she lay for cash down in full. It was further explicit and consistent, to the effect that the negotiations concerning the sale were understood by all parties to have been finally and totally abandoned, without having accomplished any thing, a long time before the seizure. The only connection between the three middle-men, or "runners" as they were called on the trial, and the owners of the vessel, consisted in two or three visits of inquiry made by the middle-men, to a shipbroker, who communicated the offers made to him for the ship to the New York agent of the owners, and who received authority from him to sell her upon the terms above stated.

To breathe into these historical facts, in themselves apparently innocent, a guilty life, the district attorney and his associate counsel relied upon testimony which they were permitted to introduce contrary to the strict rules of law; because, as they frankly stated, unless this permission was accorded to them, they should be quite unable to make out their case. The evidence which was admitted through the door of this cogent necessity was as follows: One witness testified that a man who looked very like a stevedore, but who might, nevertheless, have been some other species of laborer, told him that the ship was going to Chili. The same witness was allowed to add that "stevedores were apt to know" the destination of vessels. One Conkling, the man who had stated himself to be an "oil speculator" and "bounty broker," was even permitted to state that one man had said to another man, that "he believed" the arrangement for the sale of the vessel had been completed by a third individual. It was further shown, that when the vessel was seized, with her steam up, Captain R. B. Forbes was on board; that he said he was sorry to lose his trip down the Narrows; called for his carpet bag, received from the errand boy a small black hand-bag, and went ashore; that afterward, as he was crossing on the ferry boat, he encountered a seafaring man. This man was placed on the stand, and stated substantially, that when he met Mr. Forbes, he "wanted to talk;" that he had himself been actively urging some of the third parties to put him in command of the ship, if they should succeed in buying her, and that he was disappointed at the non-success of his demands. In other words, this "captain" was an American citizen, who had been disappointed in the laudable design of becoming a Chilian privateersman. In a loud tone the "captain" said to Mr. Forbes, that he thought the Meteor was going to Chili; Mr. Forbes said she was bound or cleared for Panama; the other responded, that if she had gone to Chili. he had supposed that he should have gone in command of her. The folly of this speech, which, however harmless for others, might have been damaging to the speaker, was rebuked by Mr. Forbes, with the admonition that the captain had better not make such remarks in so high a tone. Further, it was stated that Captain Kemble, in command of the Meteor when she was seized, and previously, had been heard to say that if she was sold, he should take her out to Panama and there deliver her over to a "fighting captain." Besides this, the tale of the fiasco of the three disappointed adventurers was narrated in full. In the course of the narration, hearsay testimony was introduced by wholesale, when the very witnesses who could have given it at first-hand were sitting in the court-room. Neither was any link established between this story, which was a thing of the past, that had found its death and burial in empty words and nothing more, and the subsequent condition and history of the vessel. On this ground, the defendants' counsel took exception to the admission of that part, even, which was not hearsay; objecting that it related wholly to a separate, distinct, and completed transaction, having no bearing upon or connection with any fact that could be proved, or had been offered, or attempted to be proved, against the vessel under the libel.

Upon this evidence the government rested its case. Mr. Evarts then rose and stated that it was not his intention to introduce any testimony, inasmuch as he was fully satisfied with that given by the witnesses called by the government. We do not propose to dwell upon the arguments at any great length. The ground assumed by the government counsel was double: they urged that, under the law as it stood, the facts warranted a decree of forfeiture. The strongest point which they made in this branch of their argument ought, perhaps, to be briefly suggested, for it was so subtle and ingenious, though withal so weighty and pregnant, that it might escape the attention of the reader, and fail to meet that consideration which it deserves, and which Judge Betts awarded to it. As oaks from acorn grow, so this theory in all its completeness sprouted from the little piratical-hued carpet bag of contents unknown, or at least unproved. It was suggested that this bag contained the muniments of title of the ship; that Mr. Forbes was going with her outside of Sandy Hook; that there he was going to make formal delivery of her, with all the legal documents, to certain agents of the Chilian government, who were to turn up from somewhere and be outside Sandy Hook; that when Mr. Forbes would return, and from some source not known, or at least not named by the government, an armament would be put on board the vessel; that she would then hoist the Chilian flag and begin her career of destruction. The whole story had the incontrovertible force of being a physical possibility. If true, it would certainly have plunged the owners deep into a guilty collusion with a belligerent purchaser. While the ingenuity of the conception challenges admiration, the question, whether or not this elaborate plan, with all its minute details, could be considered as reasonably proved to the conviction of an ordinary mind, by the appearance of the carpet bag, with its peculiar traits of size and color, is a matter on which each of our readers must make up his own mind. Whatever each one may decide, none will fail to draw the obvious moral against carrying small black hand-bags.

The second ground of the government counsel was purely diplomatic. In this branch of their argument, they urged, that, if the law had been previously against them, yet the necessities of the nation now required that this law should be changed: Referring directly to the Anglo-rebel cruisers, they said that "public reasons" demanded "an interpretation" of the act, such as would make their case good. The leading case on the subject is that of the Santissima Trinidad. The famous ruling of Judge Story, in his opinion delivered in that case, has always since been assumed by judges, lawyers, and publicists as laying down what had before been supposed to be the sound law in such matters, and what could never, after the publication of that opinion, be doubted. This obstacle it was thought more advisable to crush beneath the juggernaut car of the state department, than to seek to undermine or circumvent by legal subtlety. The language used in discussing it was as follows: "If the supreme court maintains the broad dictum of the Santissima Trinidad, after the late positive utterances of the department of state on that very point, there will be a conflict of opinion between the executive and judicial departments of the government, on a matter of international law, not at all creditable to the United States, which, since its peremptory demand on England for indemnity for losses occasioned by Anglo-rebel cruisers, cannot well change its attitude."

From this pregnant text issued a long, urgent, elaborate, politico-diplomatic argument, crammed full of the various phases of the Alabama discussion, and the present position and real or supposed needs and wishes of the secretary concerning the same. In speaking thus of these diplomatic features of this trial, we are advancing no novel views. Severe animadversions upon them have been reiterated again and again in other quarters. But we do not wish to be understood as undertaking to utter such animadversions. Neither do we wish to be understood as making any unreasonable imputation against the motives of either the counsel or the judge. There can be no question that they were actuated solely by a regard to what they supposed to be the public good. They conceived that they had the best authority for believing that the condemnation of the vessel would be a national advantage, that it could almost be called a national necessity, in view of the great aid which this condemnation would furnish in the negotiations with England. Their patriotic anxiety probably blinded their eyes to the obvious impropriety of introducing such arguments as those which we have narrated above, into legal proceedings which could properly deal only with the facts in evidence and the law bearing upon them. But it would seem to be shown by the history of this case that the question, whether or not it is justifiable to seek to change the established interpretation of a statute, and to overrule decisions, on the ground of public utility, is one of legal ethics on which honorable members of the profession are able to differ.

When the case came upon appeal before Mr. Justice Nelson, it was for the first time stripped of such foreign accompaniments, and was tried by that eminent judge upon the sole basis of its legal merits. It is at this stage that the case becomes very valuable to the profession. Judge Nelson is probably the first authority in the land upon questions of marine and commercial law. His rulings in this case were clear and decisive, and were given without any expression of doubt. It was a piece of great good fortune that the cause fell within his circuit. The evidence which we have above commented upon as hearsay, and a part of which we have narrated, had been admitted by Judge Betts on the ground that it was the testimony of some of several co-conspirators against others. Judge Nelson disposed of it briefly in the statement, that "the principle that Judge Betts lays down is all right; but it does not cover the evidence that was allowed." Referring to the evidence of Conkling, above stated, he suggested, with a certain satirical humor, that "if you want to prove what a person has said, you cannot prove it by one man saying that another said he had said it."

On the matter of the sufficiency of the proof offered, Judge Nelson stated that he regarded it as absolutely indispensable for the government to show some outfit of a warlike nature; some furnishing which had prepared, or aided in preparing, the vessel for belligerent use. Coal and provisions, to the amount which she was shown to have had on board, he did not consider as constituting such a furnishing or fitting out as was contemplated by the use of these phrases in the act. If a simple sale was legal, he said, and that it was so admitted by the government counsel, then fuel and provisions were a necessary concomitant to enable the vessel to leave the port. The naked right of sale, unless it included these indispensable privileges, was an utter nullity. It was ex necessitate rei that if she could be legally sold, she could be legally delivered, and if coal and provisions were requisite to make delivery possible, they could be legally placed on board her. The judge said, "These owners had a right to sell the ship, and the government must make out that she has been fitted and equipped for a military or naval expedition . . . It must be an arming or fitting out for war purposes . . . I do not see any evidence of that fitting out . . . I agree that if the agents of a hostile government should make a contract to build a ship for service in war, then suspicion would commence in the origin of the contract, and very slight circumstances might go to make out the purpose and the intent. But this vessel was built as a war vessel for our own government. Being no longer required for that use the owners had a right to sell her; and therefore, having that right, the mere fact that stores were put on board of her, that were necessary to convey and transfer her abroad to the parties to whom she was sold, forms no ground of suspicion at all; because the right to sell carried with it the right to put on board these provisions and stores. In order to make out that there was a hostile purpose intended, as an expedition against a country with which we were at peace, in violation of this law, you must show there was some fitting out, in the military or naval sense, with intent to commit this hostile act against a government with which we were at peace . . . I do not see that you have made out anything. No munitions of war on board and no evidence that any were to be put on board . . . There was nothing illegal in the furnishing of stores and supplies,—nothing in the act to forbid it. You must connect this with the military or naval expedition, which you have not done . . . I cannot decide this case on conjecture or suspicion . . . I have been waiting for you to show any naval equipment, either in fact or intention." The judge proceeded to say, that, since the prosecuting counsel acknowledged that the vessel might be legally sold to the Chilian government, he thought, with their evidence, "they might as well give up their case." The want of any proof even that there had been a sale, the judge stated, was one of his "troubles in the case." It was his own impression, from the evidence, that there had been no sale; an opinion, which later in the progress of the cause, he stated decisively. But at any rate, he said, it was a "transparent" fact that there was "no evidence of fitting out within the sense of the act."

Much extraneous matter having been thus cleared away, the judge came to the consideration of the important point of the intent. He said, "I think the only question in the case is one of intent." He considered that the vessel had undoubtedly been furnished with stores and fuel by the owners, with the intent to carry her to Panama, and there or elsewhere, to sell her "to the Chilian government, if they could, or anybody else; knowing, if they sold her to the Chilian government, that she would be employed in the war between Chili and Spain." If this knowledge of the result to be expected upon the fulfilment of a contingency, was a breach of the act the government had made out its case. Judge Betts had declared that it was so. In other words, he had declared that a knowledge of the use to which she would be put was equivalent to, and identical with, an intent that she should be put to that use, as the phrase "intent" was to be construed in the act. That is to say: A sale is legal; but if the seller knows that the thing sold will be used for the purpose for which it is made, and to which it is adapted, the sale is illegal. The reductio ad absurdum is evident. It was well put by Judge Nelson: "I cannot imagine a sale to a government at war that can be upheld upon that doctrine; because, while as a mere commercial transaction the sale of a war vessel is conceded to be legal, yet if you connect with it that the vessel is known to be used by the belligerent against his enemy, then it is illegal. That I understand to be the doctrine of Judge Betts. I do not see, therefore, but that he virtually annuls the right to sell." This point is, doubtless, the most important in the case. It is the point of divergence between the case of the Meteor and the cases of the rebel cruisers. It is the distinction which leaves the former innocent, and makes the latter guilty. The correctness of Judge Nelson's views seems obvious almost to the degree of an axiom. To say that a man may sell a knife, but that he shall not do so if he knows that it will be used to cut with, is an imbecility. Yet the legality of simple sales of war vessels to a belligerent, is a privilege which congress has insisted upon preserving to all American citizens. The history of the legislation on the subject is at once instructive and conclusive. The first neutrality act was passed in 1794. The case of The Mermaid [Case No. 1,897] and the case of Moodie v. The Alfred, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 307, which was probably the same case under a different name, decided that under this act a sale of a war vessel to a belligerent was legal. The further legislation in 1797, subsequent to both these decisions, made no change in the act in this respect. In 1816, during the long war between Spain and her South American colonies, the Spanish minister to this country was anxious to have the sale of war vessels wholly prohibited. President Madison consulted Attorney General Rush, concerning the force of the existing law. In the opinion which Mr. Rush returned, he said: "I am aware of no law of the United States that can prevent a merchant or ship owner selling his vessel and cargo (should the latter even consist of warlike stores) to a citizen or inhabitant of Buenos Ayres or any part of South America, nor will it, do I think, make any difference whether such sale be made directly, in a port of the United States, with immediate transfer and possession thereupon; or under a contract entered into here with delivery to take place in a port of South America." 1 Op. Atty. Gen. p. 190 (July 27, 1816). Thereupon the president called the attention of congress to the subject, that they might, if they thought expedient, legislate afresh in the matter. The debates which followed were long, warm, and animated. There can be no question but that the matter was thoroughly discussed, and the conclusion was the deliberate judgment of congress upon the policy which it behooved the United States to maintain. The history of the debate is important. A bill was introduced, entitled "A bill to prevent citizens of the United States from selling vessels of war to the citizens or subjects of any foreign power, and more effectually to prevent the arming and equipping vessels of war in the United States, intended to be used against nations in amity with the United States." The first section of this bill enacted, "that if any citizen of the United States shall, within the limits of the same, fit out, &c., any private ship or vessel of war, to sell the said vessel or contract for the sale of the said vessel, to be delivered in the United States or elsewhere, to the purchaser with intent or previous knowledge, that the said vessel shall or will be employed to cruise or commit hostilities, &c.; such person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be adjudged guilty, &c." This bill emerged from the hands of our national legislators so wonderfully shorn of its important features as to be scarcely recognizable. Congress did not propose to take away, or in any degree to trammel, the full right, as it then existed, of dealing in vessels of war. So the phrases about "selling vessels of war" disappeared equally from the title and the body of the act which was finally passed in 1817. Neither did it escape the keenness of the statesmen who were engaged in the discussion, that this right of sale would be, as Judge Nelson said, a "mere nullity," if the "previous knowledge" of the seller that the vessel "will be employed" to cruise, &c., were allowed to remain a part of the law. They were resolved to retain the right of sale as a practical right. So when they struck out the words which forbade a sale, they also struck out these words about "knowledge" which would otherwise have been potent wholly to frustrate an essential object of the legislation. The codification in the following year, 1818, constituting the present law, left this matter unchanged. In 1822, the whole subject being still freshly remembered, Judge Story delivered the famous opinion in the case of The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 283. This sustained the legality of sales of war vessels to one of two belligerents, with the other of whom we were at peace. This has ever since been considered the leading case on the subject. Ten years later, in 1832, it was followed and affirmed in U. S. v. Quincy, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 445. Since then, there has been no adjudication until this Meteor Case arose.

In comparing the case of the Meteor with those of the Anglo-Confederate cruisers in connection with this principle that a naked sale is legal if unaccompanied with circumstances showing an illegal intent, we must again seek for a clear exposition of the law, in a quotation from Judge Nelson. He said, "It is impossible to say that these owners of the Meteor took any interest in co-operating with or aiding the Chilian government in war with Spain, or are connected with that idea." Also, we would refer again to his remark previously quoted, that if a vessel were built under a contract made with the agents of a belligerent government, then suspicion would rest upon her from the very inception. In these words of the learned justice, the whole distinction lies as in a nutshell. Precisely those essential circumstances indicative of an illegal intent which were absent in the case of the Meteor, were notoriously present in the cases of the rebel cruisers. Some, at least, of these, were built by a contract, with agents of the Confederate government, and according to specifications furnished by these agents. The English builders, owners, and sellers of all of them certainly "took an interest in co-operating with and aiding" the rebels "in war with" our government, and were "connected with that idea." It was by their aid, or rather by their sole action, that the armament and munitions of war, the stores and supplies, were placed on board, and the crews were enlisted and shipped. It is on these very facts that we base our demands. The Alexandra was built in pursuance of a contract with, and according to directions furnished by, Confederate agents. The Alabama sailed from Liverpool to a small port near Holyhead; there took in a part of her fighting crew, which had been enlisted in Liverpool; thence sailed to the Azores, and there took in her armament, which was brought to her by two vessels from Liverpool. The Georgia, or Japan, sailed from Greenock, to a small French port in the channel, whither her armament, officers, and crew were brought out to her from Liverpool. The Shenandoah, or Sea King, sailed from London to Funchal, and there received her armament and crew from a steamer which brought them to her from Liverpool; sailing from that port at the same time that she sailed from London. It seems hardly necessary to point out the particulars in which the facts in all these cases transcend the facts in the Meteor Case. In each one of them, the guilty intent is clear. In no one of them did the transaction bear any resemblance to a simple matter of outright bargain and sale. There was "co-operation,"—active, essential, and important "co-operation" and "aid,"—furnished by the sellers to the buyers, up to the very moment when these vessels were completed fighting ships of the Confederate "navy." The English parties intended to do, and actually did, more than merely dispose of ships for cash, after the fashion of the ordinary and innocent sale which was at one time projected by the owners of the Meteor; but which Judge Nelson found that they failed to accomplish. The English vendors lent active, efficient, and indispensable assistance to the rebel vendees, up to the very point of cruising in the vessels themselves. They only stopped short of becoming actual combatants. They were partners in the proceeding up to the very moment when the vessels began to burn and destroy. They took the active part in all the previous undertakings. They built the ships by contract and under directions; they made the arrangements for their departure, and for the simultaneous departure and safe transportation and sure transfer of the munitions and crew, upon receipt of which the vessels were at once in fighting trim. If these circumstances do not constitute proof of an "intent" such as that designated in the statute, then the United States has no case against England; and if they do not show an intent utterly different from an intent to sell outright for cash a wholly unequipped ship, long since built for most honorable purposes, and there to drop all connection with her, then there is no precision or intelligibility in language.

We have forborne to criticise the opinion rendered by Judge Betts, because we have not intended so much to criticise as to narrate. But it is a suggestive fact, that at the trial before Judge Nelson, the district attorney put it in as his brief in the case, because, as he said, it "puts it in a better manner than I can do." Judge Nelson simply rendered a short decree reversing that of Judge Betts, on the ground that the evidence did not sustain the allegations of the libel. The government gave notice of their intention to appeal to the supreme court of the United States, but have since withdrawn their appeal. So the case is closed with the decree of Judge Nelson. Under these circumstances it is to be regretted that his honor did not see fit to write an elaborate opinion discussing both the law and the facts in the case, which must have been of very great value, by reason of the peculiar fitness of Mr. Justice Nelson to adjudicate in causes of this nature. The quotations which we have made, are from his rulings at the hearing before him, and are, of course, much less elaborate than could have been expected in an opinion.

Judge Betts suggested a melancholy consolation for the owners, when he refused to bond the vessel. He said, in case of acquittal, congress might see fit to compensate them for their injuries and losses unjustly incurred. It is not a cheerful prospect for men who have lost money enough to ruin a prosperous merchant, to be remitted to the uncertain success, and the certain vexation, labor, expense and delay, attendant upon the effort to secure reimbursement by a private bill in congress. A rich man might well be utterly ruined if his vessel is to be kept rotting at the wharf, while his case is slowly passing through the many stages of litigation which precede the final judgment. The power of the informer to levy black-mail in such a case is enormous, and wholly disproportioned to the power which it has been deemed safe to allow him in any other class of government prosecutions. We should incline, as a question of law, to consider the argument of Mr. Evarts as conclusive to the effect that bonding is, at least, a matter of discretion, if not of obligation. But the point is a doubtful one and the first action of Judge Betts certainly affords a precedent for holding that bonding is not even permissible. These facts seem to suggest the advisability of some supplementary legislation which should place this important matter upon a certain and a just ground. It would be easy to declare that bonding shall be either obligatory or discretionary, as shall seem good. Also, it would seem quite worthy of a fatherly government to provide some better means than the alarming prospect of an appeal to congress for reimbursing a citizen whom the law declares innocent, and who has, in the course of the litigation which has led to this conclusion, lost, it may be, some hundreds of thousands of dollars. The hardship in these cases is not only vastly greater in degree, but it is entirely different in kind, from the hardship suffered in ordinary cases of governmental prosecution of men, finally found innocent; and seems to admit and to demand some recognized method of restitution, at least, for the injury inflicted upon their property. Such restitution would still leave them, like other men acquitted in government suits, to bear their own costs of court and counsel fees; a rule which is equally unjust and universal, and which it would be hopeless to try to change. But if a ship, worth $200,000 or $300,000, had grown so unseaworthy, that at the close of the trial, she was worth only $50,000 or $25,000, her innocent owner ought certainly to have a surer and an easier remedy than the privilege of lobbying a private bill through congress.

The METIS.

[4 Ben. 120.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1870.

COLLISION — STEAMER AND SCHOONER — COURSES SLIGHTLY CROSSING—CHANGE IN EXTREMIS.

1. The schooner C. was in Long Island Sound, heading west, with the wind east, and sailing wing and wing, with lights properly set and burning. The night was dark, but without fog or haze. The steamer M. was heading east three quarters south, going 8 or 10 miles an hour. The green light of the schooner was seen from half a point to a point on the steamer's starboard bow. The steamer ran on till the schooner was about 300 yards off, when her wheel was starboarded, and her head was swung to port about a point and a half, and she was steadied on a course east by north half north. The schooner's green light suddenly became invisible, and the vessels came together, the steamer striking the schooner on her port side, about amidships. The engine of the steamer was stopped and backed as soon as the green light became invisible. Held, that, if the disappearance of the green light had been caused by the schooner's having changed her course, under those circumstances, such change would not have been a fault on the part of the schooner.

2. On the evidence, she did not change her course, and the disappearance of the green light was caused by the steamer's crossing the line of direction of the schooner.

3. The steamer should have starboarded earlier or not at all. She was solely in fault.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This libel is filed by the owners of the schooner Cosmos, which was sunk and totally lost, with a cargo of lime in barrels, being carried on freight by her from Rockland, Maine, to the city of New York, through a collision which took place between her and the steamer Metis, between 1 and 2 o'clock, a. m., on the 4th of September, 1868. The collision occurred in Long Island Sound, off Plum Island. The Metis was a screw steamer, bound from New York to Providence. The wind was about due east, and blowing an eight knot breeze, at which rate the schooner was going about dead before the wind. The night was dark, but without fog or haze, and a vessel could, irrespective of her lights, be seen at the distance of at least half a mile. The schooner had set, her mainsail, foresail, jib, flying jib and main gaff-topsail, and was heading west.

The answer of the Metis, recognizing her duty to keep out of the way of the schooner, sets up, that the Metis was on her course, heading nearly due east; that those in charge of her discovered the schooner at a distance of about three quarters of a mile, bearing about a point off the starboard bow of the Metis; that only the green light of the schooner was seen; that this indicated that the schooner was on a course to the southward of the Metis; that no red light of the schooner was seen; that the Metis continued on her course, merely putting her wheel to starboard a little, so as to give the schooner plenty of room, but keeping the schooner's green light plainly in view all the time, and seeing no red light on the schooner; that the steamer continued running so, until the vessels had approached very near to each other, and, as near as could be judged, within about 100 to 150 yards, at which time there was a wide berth for the vessels to pass each other, if each kept her course, when suddenly the schooner's green light became invisible, and she made a complete change of her course, bringing her across the bow of the Metis; and that thereupon the engine of the Metis was stopped and backed, but it was impossible to avoid the collision, and the Metis struck the schooner about amidships on the port side.

This defence is thus put wholly on the alleged change of course in the schooner. It is to be noted that the answer puts the green light of the schooner only a point on the starboard bow of the Metis, when discovered; that the Metis does not claim to have done anything except starboard a little; that there is no allegation that, by such starboarding, the green light of the schooner was at all opened, or thrown any more to the starboard; and that the allegation of a change of course in the schooner is based on the fact that her green light became invisible.

The evidence on the part of the Metis shows, that she was running on a course east three quarters south, when the schooner was sighted, sailing winged out, about from half a point to a point on the starboard bow of the Metis; that, notwithstanding the schooner was thus made out nearly ahead, and was seen to be winged out, and, therefore, moving with the full force of a wind dead aft, and the Metis was going at the rate of 8 to 10 knots an hour, the Metis ran on, making no change, until she had approached to within some 300 yards of the schooner, when her wheel was starboarded and her head was swung to port about a point and a half, and she was then steadied on her course at east by north half north; and that, after all this, the schooner bore only from one to two points on the starboard bow of the Metis. This shows that the starboarding of the Metis had no substantial effect in the way of throwing the schooner more on the starboard bow of the Metis, but that the Metis really ran at the schooner. As the Metis was heading east three quarters south, and the schooner was heading west, the courses of the two vessels were in fact crossing. The error of the Metis is shown in her answer, by the statement, that, as she saw only the green light of the schooner, and saw that a point on her starboard bow, she concluded that the schooner was on a course to the southward of the Metis, that is, that their forward courses were not crossing courses. Hence, as her answer says, she did nothing but put her wheel to starboard a little, thinking that all was safe so long as the green light of the schooner was kept in sight to the starboard.

The testimony of the mate of the schooner, who was at her wheel, corroborates this view of the movements of the Metis. He says, that, on the steamer's being reported, by the lookout, as ahead, he looked, and saw her red light, and her forward and after white lights; that the forward white light was a little to the port from him of the after white light; and that this view continued until just before the collision, when the red light of the steamer disappeared, and her green light came into view, and her forward white light went more to the starboard of him than her after white light. This shows that the courses of the vessels were crossing, and that the Metis did not starboard until she was close upon the schooner, and substantially ran directly at her.

Now, if, under these circumstances, the schooner, running thus rapidly before the wind, and seeing a large steamer coming upon her without making any movement to avoid a collision, had, in alarm, changed her course in the jaws of danger, at a distance off from the steamer, which, at the combined speed of 16 miles an hour, would be traversed in a space of less than 40 seconds, or according to the answer, of not over 20 seconds, such change could not be imputed to her as a fault.

But I am satisfied that there was no change of course by the schooner. The green light of the schooner disappeared, because the Metis crossed the projection forward of the schooner's course. It did not disappear until after the Metis had starboarded and steadied. She did not begin to starboard until she had got within 300 yards or so of the schooner. She must have nearly lost the green light when she starboarded. Her starboarding caused the green light to keep in view a little longer, while she was really running straight at the schooner. Then, as the forward course of the schooner carried her green light out of sight, the Metis, running on, struck the port side of the schooner forward of her main rigging, angling aft. This produced the impression on board of the Metis, that the schooner had changed her course, and had run across the bows of the Metis, at a time when otherwise the schooner would have gone clear, to the southward of the Metis. But the fact was, that the Metis actually ran across the course of the schooner, from north to south, and then, as the result of her starboarding, ran into the port side of the schooner. If she had starboarded earlier, or had not starboarded at all, when she did starboard, there would probably have been no collision. In the former case, she would have passed to the northward, and in the latter case to the southward, of the schooner.

The evidence is satisfactory, that the schooner had her proper lights set and burning. Even if she had no red light burning, as is claimed by the Metis, the absence of it could not have contributed to the collision. She kept her course at all times from the time she sighted the Metis, and she had a proper and competent lookout, who saw and reported the lights of the Metis at some two miles' distance. It being the duty of the Metis to avoid the schooner, it is for her to establish a change of course by the schooner. As the change claimed is one that would have brought the schooner's head to about northwest, the Metis running east by north half north, and the wind being east, it follows that, if the schooner had ported to make such change, both of her booms would have gone to port, and her jibs would have filled to port. But the evidence is satisfactory, that, up to the actual blow, her main boom was off to starboard, and her fore boom to port, and her jibs were hanging amidships, not filled.

There was no fault on the part of the schooner, and the Metis was solely in fault in the collision. There must be a decree pronouncing her liable for the damages caused to the libellants thereby, with costs, and ordering a reference to ascertain such damages.

[The case was heard, at a later date, when exceptions to the commissioner's report were overruled, and the report confirmed. Case No. 9,500.]

COLLISION—DAMAGES—TOTAL LOSS—INSURANCE—PARTIES.

1. In a case of collision for the sinking of a schooner by a steamer in Long Island Sound, the libel alleged that the schooner was "sunk," and the answer admitted that "the schooner with her cargo was sunk and lost." The steamer was held liable, and the commissioner, to whom it was referred to ascertain the damages, reported, as such damages, the whole value of the schooner and her cargo. Exceptions were filed to the report, because the commissioner had allowed such whole value in the absence of any proof that the libellants had tried to raise the vessel, or that she could not be raised; because he had allowed such whole value although one of the libellants who owned half of the schooner had insurance on her, and had been paid by the insurers for a total loss; and because one-half of the cargo was the property of a party who was not a libellant: Held, that, on the pleadings, no proof was necessary that the schooner could not be raised.

2. The facts in relation to the insurance constituted no defence.

3. The owners of the schooner, who were carriers of the cargo, could recover for the damage to the cargo, without joining the other owner of it as a libellant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. These are exceptions to the report of the commissioner in a case of collision, wherein the schooner Cosmos, and her cargo, were sunk by the steamer Metis, and there was a decree for the libellant. [Case No. 9,499.]

The first, second and third exceptions may be considered together. The first exception is, that the commissioner improperly received evidence of the value of the schooner at the time of the collision, as fixing the amount of the damage to her, instead of requiring evidence as to the amount which it would have cost to raise and repair her. The second exception is, that the commissioner erred in allowing $5,000 for the schooner, on the basis of her value at the time of the collision, without evidence of any efforts, on the part of the libellants, to raise and repair her, or that the circumstances of her sinking were such that she could not have been raised and repaired, or that the cost of raising and repairing her would have exceeded or equalled her value after the repairs were made. The third exception is, that he commissioner erred in allowing $5,000 for the schooner, as damages, without any evidence on which an assessment of the damages could be properly computed. The commissioner allowed for a total loss of the vessel, and for her value when lost. The claimants insist, that the libellants should have shown that they tried to raise her and failed, or that she could not have been raised and repaired, or that the cost of raising and repairing her would have at least equalled her value after being repaired. She was sunk in the night, in Long Island Sound, off Plum Island, going down in some two minutes after the steamer struck her, and her cargo was 1,123 barrels of lime. The libel alleges that she was "sunk" by the steamer; that she "sank" so quickly that the officers and crew with difficulty saved their lives; and that the steamer ran against her and "sank" her. The answer states, that, in consequence of the collision, the "schooner, with her cargo, was sunk and lost." This state of the pleadings is sufficient to relieve the libellants from showing that the vessel was totally lost by the sinking, or that they tried to raise her, or that she could not have been raised, or would have been worth less than the cost of raising and repairing her. The case is not like that of The Baltimore, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 377. In that case the libel alleged that the vessel and cargo were sunk in such deep water as to make both of them a total loss. That allegation was expressly denied by the answer, and the libellants failed to introduce any proof to support their allegation. In the present case, there being no other proof, the allegation of the answer is sufficient proof that the vessel was so lost as to have been totally lost.

The fourth, fifth and sixth exceptions go to the point, that the allowance of $5,000, as the value of the vessel, was excessive, on the evidence, and that the amount allowed for such value should not have been more than $3,600. I think that the commissioner was fully justified in fixing the sum of $5,000 as the value of the vessel.

The seventh exception is, that the commissioner erred in allowing the $5,000, on the basis of the value of the whole of the vessel, and that he should not have allowed more than one-half thereof, inasmuch as one-half of the schooner was owned by the libellant Hall, and such interest of his was insured, and the underwriters had paid him $1,500, as and for a total loss thereon, and had thereby become the owners of the claim for the damages to such one-half interest, and Hall no longer had any interest therein. This defence, in substance, was taken in the answer. Such a defence was expressly overruled in the case of The Monticello v. Mollison, 17 How. [84 U. S.] 152, 155. See, also, Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 257, 267.

The eighth exception is, that the commissioner erred in allowing $1,263.67, for loss of cargo, on the basis of the full value thereof, without evidence as to the ownership of the cargo, except as to the one-half interest therein owned by the libellant Hall, and without evidence as to whether the vessel or her owners were liable to the owners of the cargo for the loss of the cargo or any part thereof. The cargo was owned by the libellant Hall and another person jointly. Such other person is not a libellant. Hall was master of the schooner. The cargo was being transported on freight. The owners of the vessel are libellants. As such owners and carriers of the cargo on freight, the libellants can recover for the damage to the cargo, without the joining, as co-libellant, of the person who, jointly with Hall, owned the cargo. The Commander-in-Chief, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 43, 51, 52; The Commerce, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 574, 582; Newell v. Norton, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 257, 267.

The ninth and tenth exceptions, which relate to the value of the personal effects belonging to the libellants Hall and Grindle, are overruled.

All of the exceptions are disallowed, and the report is confirmed.

Case No. 9,501.

The METROPOLIS.

[Betts' Scr. Bk. 694.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1862.

COLLISION—PASSENGER STEAMER—LOOKOUT — OBLIGATION TO CARRY LIGHTS—DEFENSE—VESSEL LOST WITHOUT LICENSE.

[1. It is no defense to a libel for a loss by collision that the vessel lost was engaged in the coasting business without any license as required by law.]

[2. It is inexcusable negligence for a large passenger steamer navigating Long Island Sound at night not to have a lookout other than the pilot in the pilot house.]

[3. The absence of a lookout forward on a large steamer navigating Long Island Sound on a moonlight night at great speed will be held to have contributed to a collision with a small propeller, which should have been seen by a competent and diligent lookout in time to have avoided the collision.]

[4. Local inspectors cannot release a vessel from the obligation to carry colored lights as provided by law.]

[5. The fact that a steam propeller sunk in a collision did not carry her mast light at a proper elevation, and carried no colored lights, as required by law, will not prevent a recovery where the colliding vessel, travelling at great speed on a moonlight night, had no lookout, and her pilot would not have seen the colored lights had they been carried, did not see the bow light, and in fact saw the mast light in ample season to have avoided a collision.]

[This was a libel by The New London Transportation Company, owners of the steam propeller J. N. Harris, against the steamboat Metropolis and William Brown, master, for collision. The Bay State Steamboat Company appeared as claimants.]

E. C. Benedict, W. R. Beebe, and W. Q. Morton, for libellants.

F. B. Cutting, for claimants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This suit is instiuted by the libellants, owners of the steam propeller J. N. Harris, to recover damages suffered by the latter in a collision with the steamboat Metropolis, owned by the claimants. It appears from the proofs taken in the case that the two boats, at the time of the collision, were running regularly through Long Island Sound; the Harris between New York and New London, and the Metropolis between New York and Fall River. The Harris was a small vessel, a little over two hundred tons burthen, and of power proportionate to her size. Her business was principally the transportation of freight, though she carries some passengers, and had several on board at the time of the accident, which has given rise to the present controversy. The Metropolis belonged to the largest class of side-wheel passenger steamers, and was capable of moving with great speed and power. At the time of the collision the vessels were pursuing opposite courses, the Harris being bound from New York to New London, and the Metropolis from Fall River to New York. They met and collided in the open Sound, a few miles to the south, and eastward of New Haven Light, the Harris having passed it about an hour before. Both boats were moving at the time of the collision, the Harris very slowly, and the Metropolis at a high rate of speed. The latter struck the Harris about twelve feet forward of her pilot house, cutting her nearly in two, and sinking her almost instantly. The owners of the Harris have filed this libel, and are seeking to recover for the injuries suffered by their boat. The disaster was a very serious one, involving a considerable loss of life, as well as large damage to property. But the only question presented for our consideration on the merits of the case is that which relates to the cause of the collision.

The claimants have raised a question of a preliminary character, which if it prevails, must operate as a complete bar to the suit. It is proper, therefore, to consider it before we proceed to the other points of the controversy. This point is founded on the alleged non-compliance of the Harris with the regulations of the coasting-trade, and the equipment of steamers as prescribed by the several acts of congress relating thereto. The second section of the act of July 7, 1838 [5 Stat. 304], "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam,"—provides, "that it shall not be lawful for the owner, master or captain of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, to transport any goods, wares and merchandise, or passengers, in or upon the bays, lakes, rivers, or other navigable waters of the United States, * * * without having obtained from the proper officer a license under the existing laws, and without having complied with the conditions of this act." The act fixes a penalty of five hundred dollars for every violation of this provision. The license referred to in the act cited is conceded to be the coasting license provided for by the act of February 18, 1793 [1 Stat. 305], and which is to be issued by a collector,—in this case by the collector of the port of New London. The act of August 30, 1852 [10 Stat. 61], was an act to amend that of July 7, 1838; and section one provides "that no license, register or enrolment, under the provisions of this act or the act to which this is an amendment, shall be granted, or other papers issued, by any collector, to any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, and carrying passengers, until he shall have satisfactory evidence that all the provisions of this act have been fully complied with; and if any such vessel shall be navigated with passengers on board, without complying with the terms of this act, the owners thereof and the vessel itself shall be subject to the penalties contained in the second section of the act to which this is an amendment." This act of August 30, 1852, also provides for the inspection of hulls and boilers of steam vessels, by officers appointed for that purpose, who are to give certificates of such inspection, and of their approval of the equipment of the boats.

The Harris took out her annual coasting license on the 11th of August, 1857, which was, by its terms, to continue in force one year and no longer. The accident occurred on the morning of the 15th of August, 1858, at about 2 o'clock. It is conceded that no new license had been taken out. The claimants insist that the license had expired, and that the Harris was, at the time of the collision, running in violation of law. The libellants contend that by the terms of the 9th section of the act of 1793, the Harris had three days after her return to the district of New London, within which to deliver up her license, she being out of the district when the term for which it was granted expired, and that it was still in force at the date of the collision. On this claim of the libellants I express no opinion, but proceed to consider the point as raised by the claimants. Their argument is that the Harris was at this time engaged in prosecuting an unlawful voyage,—she was carrying freight and passengers without a license and without a certificate in violation of the statute, and for which she and her owners were liable to heavy penalties, and are therefore not entitled to come into this court or claim damages for injuries received in this collision while she was thus illegally employed. Two cases have been cited as directly supporting this proposition, together with others which are claimed to rest on analogous principles. The first case cited is that of The Maverick [Case No. 9,316], determined by Judge Sprague in the district of Massachusetts. An attentive examination of this case satisfies me that it does not sustain the position assumed by the claimants in the present suit, although some remarks of the learned judge, in his opinion, would seem to favor that view. The libellant in that case was the mate of a brig which had run a warp or line across the track of a ferry in Boston harbor, and the Maverick, a steamboat, ran forcibly against the line, in which the leg of the libellant had become entangled, by which he was seriously injured. The libel was brought to recover damages for this injury, and the defense justified this forcible act by pleading a license to run the ferry. This license the owners of the Maverick held by assignment from the original grantees. The court held that a license to run a ferry, under the statutes of Massachusetts, was not assignable; that the defendants took nothing by the assignment, and that therefore the defence failed. The other case referred to on the argument is that of The Leopard [Id. 8,264], and is very similar to that of The Maverick [supra]. The doctrine of the latter case is cited by Judge Ware in giving his opinion in that of The Leopard; and it must be admitted that he seems to take the same view of its effect as that urged by the learned counsel for the claimants in the case now under consideration; but I do not understand him either to affirm or deny the principle which is inferred he regarded as laid down in the case of The Maverick.

But on this principle, I do not think the doctrine now contended for can be sustained. There is no logical or legal connection between the failure of the Harris to obtain the renewal of her coasting license and the collision which resulted in her destruction. She was not absolutely prohibited from being on Long Island Sound and in the vicinity of the accident, nor is it necessary for her to justify her presence there by showing a license of any kind, although it might have been unlawful for her to have been engaged in the business covered by a coasting license. In the case of The Maverick, it must be remembered that, according to the facts there shown, the warp of the brig was rightfully in the place where it was struck by the steamboat, as against all but ferryboats, and in order to maintain the right to move forcibly against it, any vessel would have been required to justify under an authority resting on a ferry grant, and thus show a right superior to that of the brig. There was no right in common there. The warp of the steamboat must give way, and the latter could only claim the exclusive right by a justification under a special grant. That justification failed. But in the cases of the Harris and Metropolis, neither had or claimed any exclusive right to navigate Long Island Sound, in the exercise of which it became necessary for one to yield to the other. It was in the attempted exercise of no such right that the disaster occurred. When congress enacted the law requiring steamers to take out a coasting license, and have a certificate of proper equipment, before carrying passengers, fixing penalties for non-compliance, surely it was not intended that the penalty of outlawry should be superadded. This would vastly enhance the dangers of steamboat travel, which it was the object of the act to diminish, and invite collisions by exempting the colliding boat and its officers from the consequences of their carelessness or recklessness. It would have been equally unlawful for the Harris to have had on board gunpowder or other explosive substance, without a special license for that purpose, as provided by the seventh section of the act of 1852, and while a violation of that provision would have subjected her to a penalty, I apprehend that such an omission to comply with the law would hardly be urged as a ground upon which she should be deemed an outlaw on the waters, and her right to any redress for any injuries arising from the negligence of others wholly denied.

The case cited from 10 Metc. (Mass.) 363 (Bosworth v. Inhabitants of Swansey), evidently rested on the local laws of Massachusetts as expounded by her courts. It was a suit at law to recover damages received by the plaintiff while traveling on a defective public highway which the defendants were bound by law to keep in repair. The opinion of the court states the law of Massachusetts to be such, that in order to recover, the plaintiff must prove himself to have been wholly without fault, and that inasmuch as he was, when he received the injury complained of, traveling on the highway on Sunday, in violation of a statute of the state, he must be deemed to be in fault and therefore not entitled to recover. The application of the doctrine of that case to cases of collision would be a novelty in maritime law. The other cases cited by the claimants' counsel on the argument had their inception in contracts prohibited by law, and rest on the well-known principle that courts will lend no support to such contracts nor to any rights growing out of them, and therefore have no bearing on the present question. The preliminary objection to the right of the libellants to a standing in court must therefore be overruled.

We come now to the consideration of the merits of this case, and the only points which I regard as demanding any extended inquiry are those which charge the Harris with being in fault. I have carefully examined the evidence and considered the able arguments which have been offered to exculpate the Metropolis; and though I am aware that in regard to the comparative degree of care and circumspection required of large passenger steamers when meeting propellers and sailing vessels, the law has been carried to the verge of rigor, still I am satisfied, that under its most liberal interpretation, there is no escape from the conclusion that the Metropolis was in fault on this occasion. She had no lookout. This was an inexcusable neglect in a vessel like her. The law in this respect is well settled, and so familiar that the citation of authorities would be superfluous. It is in vain to urge that the pilot was acting as a lookout. It is admitted that he was in the pilot-house, engaged in directing the navigation of the steamer. He could not, while thus employed, be such a lookout as prudence and safety required, nor such a one as the law, as settled by repeated decisions in both the circuit and supreme courts, requires. The duties of his position as pilot were of the most responsible and exacting character, and, if properly attended to, disqualified him from exercising that single eyed diligence which is demanded from a lookout. The latter should have no other duty to perform, no other employment to distract his attention. He should occupy the most favorable position for scanning the path of his vessel, should be isolated from everything that can divert his mind from the single duty before him, and be wholly relieved from all other anxieties or cares. That the pilot of an immense steamer, moving in the night in a great thoroughfare like Long Island Sound, in a track frequented by other vessels, and at a high rate of speed with all the duties and responsibilities of such a position resting on him, is not such a lookout as I have described, needs no argument to prove. That this collision, with all its disastrous consequences, resulted from the failure of those in charge of the Metropolis to discover the Harris, what she was, and the course she was steering, in season, there can be no doubt; and that the absence of a lookout contributed to the accident is equally clear. Indeed, in view of the clear proof that the weather was clear and the moon two hours high at the time, it is difficult to see why a lookout, if he was attending to his duty, would not have discovered the Harris in ample season to have cleared her, even if she had no light visible. Suppose she had been a sailing vessel in motion, and without lights. What justification would the Metropolis have to present for colliding with her under such circumstances, and when running at such great speed? That the night was sufficiently light to have discovered even a sailing vessel without lights, is evident from the speed of the Metropolis. No pilot would have risked such a boat and the lives of man, passengers by going at such a speed, unless it was light enough to have seen vessels far enough ahead to have cleared them. I therefore think the irresistible conclusion is, that the absence of a lookout on the Metropolis was not only a grave fault, but one which directly contributed to the disaster.

But it is insisted that the Harris was also in fault, in particulars which ought to bar her claim for damages altogether, or at least reduce the amount, under the familiar rule that where both vessels are in fault the damages must be apportioned. Among the faults charged on the Harris, and the only ones I deem it important to dwell upon, are—(1) Want of a good lookout. (2) Improper location of her stern or masthead light. (3) Want of colored side lights. (4) Total absence of a bow light, or at least of one sufficiently bright to have been discovered by the Metropolis in time. It is proper, in this place, to note the leading circumstances under which the steamers approached each other,—the state of the sea, the degree of darkness which prevailed, their rate of speed, and the movements made by each on the discovery of the other. There was nothing in the state of the weather or sea tending to embarrass either vessel, or in any degree to produce the disaster. The night was comparatively calm, and the water tranquil, and both boats were under the perfect control of their navigators. The night, if not very light, was certainly far from dark. The moon was nearly two hours high. There was no fog or mist, or obstruction of any kind to obscure their view of each other. When five miles apart they were approaching each other nearly head and head; the Harris moving through the water at the rate of six or seven, and the Metropolis at the rate of sixteen or seventeen miles an hour. The former was a small propeller of about two hundred tons; the latter, a side-wheel steamer of about 2,000 tons. The pilot of the Harris discovered the Metropolis not far from five miles off, about half a point on his port-bow, and as they were approaching each other nearly head and head, very properly ported his helm to pass to the right. The lights of the Metropolis were distinctly visible when she was first discovered by the pilot of the Harris. Precisely at what distance the pilot of the Metropolis discovered the stern or masthead light of the Harris, is not easy to determine. His testimony on this point is uncertain and very unsatisfactory. The first he saw was this stern light which was fastened to the stay at an elevation of forty or fifty feet from the deck. This light he mistook for a star, and it suddenly disappeared from his view. He is wholly unable, either by an estimate of time or distance, to furnish the court with any means of determining how far off the Harris was at this time, when he first caught a glimpse of her light; but as it was a globe lantern, and according to the evidence was burning brightly at the time, he must, unless his vision was very imperfect, have discovered it when several miles distant; and had he known what she was, and the course she was steering, he could have cleared her without any difficulty. The light very soon re-appeared but how soon he is equally unable to give even an approximate idea. This light, both when it was first discovered and when it re-appeared, bore, the pilot says, about a point or a point and a half on the starboard bow of the Metropolis. When he saw it the second time, he concluded that it was the light of a propeller bound westward, and starboarded his wheel to pass to the left of her. He immediately discovered her sails, and for the first time attempted to check or stop the speed of his boat, and at the same time hove his wheel hard astarboard; but it was too late. She struck the Harris nearly at right angles, cutting far into her, and sinking her almost instantly. At the instant of collision the Harris must have been heading nearly south by east, and the Metropolis about southwest. The pilot of the Harris, when he discovered that the Metropolis had changed her course and was bearing down for the former, ported his wheel again and nearly stopped her before she was struck.

It will at once be seen, from this statement of the position and course of the two boats, from the time the pilot of the Harris discovered the Metropolis, and when, or nearly when, the former ought to have been seen by the pilot of the latter, that there was great negligence somewhere, or the accident would never have happened. That the speed of the Metropolis ought to have been checked at once when the stern light of the Harris was discovered is very certain, especially as the pilot of the former does not pretend he then saw her hull or sails, and therefore could have no knowledge of the direction in which she was moving. It may be said that the collision might still have happened if any effort had been made to stop her; but this is by no means certain. The great difficulty in finding any fact in this part of the case which can excuse the Metropolis, is that her pilot seems wholly oblivious as to time or distance at this fatal point of his voyage. To hold a steamer like her blameless in running without a lookout, and at such a rate of speed after she has discovered a vessel's light in her vicinity and ahead of her, and while her officers are wholly ignorant of the character and course of that vessel, would encourage recklessness and greatly enhance the dangers of navigation.

We now come to consider particularly the charges of fault made against the Harris; and 1. The want of a proper lookout. I think upon this charge the evidence wholly fails, and can come to no other conclusion than that she had a proper lookout and that he was on duty, and remained in his position at the expense of his life.

2. The improper location of the stern or mast-light of the Harris. This may be disposed of in few words. The light was at a proper elevation, was sufficiently bright, was seen by the pilot of the Metropolis, even when he discovered it the second time, far enough off to have enabled him to have cleared her, had he known what she was, and the course she was steering.

3. The third charge is that the Harris did not have the colored lights prescribed by the regulations of the supervising inspectors. This point was elaborately discussed on the argument, but from the view I take of the proofs, I do not feel called upon to dwell upon it here. I do not, however, assent to the position of the libellant's counsel, that if the regulations of the supervising inspectors, requiring propellers to carry side lights, was valid, the Harris was released from all obligation to conform to it by the act of the local inspectors. In my judgment, the local inspectors are clothed with no power to abrogate such a regulation, or to release any particular vessel from obligation to comply with it. For the purposes of this case, I assume the rule requiring these lights to have been valid and binding on the Harris, and I also assume, for the same purpose, as correct, the proposition of the claimants' counsel, that "the burden of proving that the collision was not caused or superinduced by their absence, and that the accident would equally have happened if she had had these lights," is on the libellants. I regard the evidence of the pilot of the Metropolis as conclusive, that if the Harris had had the regulation lights he would have failed to have seen them. He did not discover her bow light at all, and in the view in which I think that light is placed by the evidence, it is hardly possible, failing as he did to see it at any time, that he would have discovered one of these colored lights, if the Harris had had them set. There was no lookout, who with greater vigilance and keener vision, might have discovered both the side and bow lights. If this be a correct view of this point, then the absence of the regulation lights of the Harris had no connection with the causes of the disaster and no injurious consequences can attach to her owners in this suit for that omission.

4. That the Harris had no bow light or at least an insufficient one. From the testimony of Capt. Smith of the Harris and the passengers, Morning and Orr, it is evident that a light was trimmed and placed in the box on the bow, at the proper time. Nor can there be much doubt that this light when so placed there, and for some time after, was sufficient to have enabled the pilot of the Metropolis, or a sufficient lookout, to have discovered her in ample time, to have given her a wide berth. What the condition of that light was during the time the vessels were approaching each other for the last five miles preceding the collision is not so clearly proved, and it is on this point alone that I have felt some doubt as to the conclusion to be drawn from the evidence. The proofs show that the oil with which the lamp was supplied was of good quality, and the evidence of Graves and Flannagan, hands on board the Harris, warrants the conclusion that it was burning tolerably brightly at the time of the collision. I think the evidence of Johnson, the watchman on board the Metropolis, tends to confirm their testimony. It is quite evident that the light he discovered, and which he thought at first was light in a schooner's companionway or binnacle, and afterwards supposed it to be in the engine room of the Harris, was the bow light of the latter; and his error is accounted for by the resemblance of the sash in the light box to a window. The failure to sight this light in time to ascertain the course of the Harris must therefore be attributed, not to the feebleness of the light, but to the absence of a proper lookout who could have discovered it.

From this point of the evidence, it follows that the Harris is not chargeable with any fault which contributed to the accident, and for which her owners are to be held responsible in this suit. And in coming to this conclusion, I assume the light produced in court to be the one which the Harris had on her bow, and while I by no means intend to intimate that in my opinion such a light is a sufficient one for a propeller on all occasions, I think it was adequate on the night and under the circumstances of this disaster; and that had there been a proper lookout on board the Metropolis, the Harris would have been seen, and both her lights sighted in season to have cleared her. Indeed, as already remarked, it is difficult, considering that state of the weather and atmosphere which prevailed, to see why a good lookout could not have discovered her sails and hull soon enough to have enabled the Metropolis to have avoided her, and it is more difficult to discover anything in the testimony of the pilot of the Metropolis which would justify the inference that he would have discovered a bow light on the Harris, even if she had had one of the precise character which the claimants insist she should have had.

There were other points raised on the argument, and pressed with great learning and ability, but the conclusions to which I have arrived render our examination of them unnecessary in this place. A decree must be entered for the libellants with an order of reference to ascertain the damages.

During my examination of the voluminous evidence in the case, I have felt a never absent though unavailing regret that the case could not have been decided by the able and lamented judge who presided at the trial when the proofs were taken, and whose comprehensive, exact and luminous judgment would have shed light on every branch of the controversy. The most diligent perusal and comparison of the mass of evidence has doubtless failed to present the facts to my mind with that clearness with which they were revealed during the narrative of the witnesses; and if I have erred in the view which I have taken of the case, that error can be corrected by a higher and more competent tribunal.

Case No. 9,502.

The METROPOLIS.

[8 Ben. 19.][1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1875.

MARITIME LIEN—SUPPLIES—CHARTERED VESSEL—CREDIT.

The steamboat Metropolis, belonging to the N. S. S. Co., a Rhode Island corporation, was chartered to the N. J. S. R. R. Co., a New Jersey corporation, the latter to victual and man her and pay all her bills. Supplies were furnished to her in New York by P. & V. W., who claimed a lien upon her therefor. It appeared, that the supplies were furnished on printed requisitions bearing the name of the N. J. S. R. R. Co., and signed by G., as the agent thereof; that G. was also the purchasing agent of the N. S. S. Co.; that supplies for steamboats belonging to and run by that company were also furnished by P. & V. W., on requisitions made out in the name of the N. S. S. Co., and signed by G., as agent thereof; that all bills for such supplies were promptly paid; that the N. S. S. Co. was in good credit; that the bills for the supplies in question were made out to the steamboat Metropolis and owners; and that P. & V. W. went to one place to obtain pay for bills of supplies obtained for the N. S. S. Co., and to another for those obtained for the N. J. S. R. R. Co., and some times took the notes of the respective companies for the respective bills. Held, that, on these facts, the supplies in question were not furnished on the credit of the steamboat Metropolis, and the libellants had no lien on her therefor.

In admiralty.

Salter & Cowing and E. H. Owen, for libellants.

William Allen Butler and T. B. Stillman, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The libel in this case alleges that the engineer and master of the steamboat Metropolis obtained from the libellants certain articles of engineer supplies and ship chandlery for the use of said steamboat; that the same were for the use of and were delivered on board of said steamboat, in the port of New York, in June, July, August, September and October, 1873; that said articles were delivered on the credit of the vessel's bottom; that at the said times the said steamboat was a foreign vessel, and was owned by the Narragansett Steamship Company, a Rhode Island corporation; and that said articles were necessary and proper for the use of said steamboat. The libel prays for process against the vessel and that she may be condemned.

The Narragansett Steamship Company appears as claimant of the steamboat, and its answer avers that at and before the times mentioned in the libel, it being a Rhode Island corporation, was the owner of the said steamboat, and had chartered her to the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, a New Jersey corporation; that, by the terms of said charter, the latter company was to victual the vessel, furnish supplies, keep her in good order, and pay all her bills while navigating under said charter; that, in pursuance of said charter, the latter company took possession of the vessel and navigated her under said charter during all the time mentioned in said charter; that the latter company was also the charterer of other steamboats upon the same terms and conditions; that such facts were known to the libellants; that work and labor were performed, and materials were furnished, by the libellants upon and to all of said vessels, and were done, performed and furnished upon the credit of the latter company, and not upon the credit of the Metropolis, and in law constituted no lien upon said vessel; that the labor done and the materials furnished to the Metropolis were not done, performed or furnished upon the credit of said steamboat, and did not constitute any lien upon her; that the claimant, as owner, is not liable for said claim; and that, therefore, it cannot constitute any lien upon the vessel.

The case was tried entirely upon testimony brought out in the presentation of the case on the part of the libellants, the claimant not having called any witnesses. The libellants were furnishers of engineers' stores and ship chandlery, keeping a store in the city of New York, and the articles in question were furnished from such store and were supplied to and were used on board of the Metropolis. They were all of them ordered by requisitions, each of which was partly in writing and partly in print, being a printed blank filled up. The blank as printed, read thus:

"Be careful to obtain receipts for stores delivered. New Jersey Southern Railroad, Purchasing Agent's Office, Pier 28, North River.

No. New York, 1873.

M Please supply

with the following specified articles, viz.:

"Purchasing Agent.

Each requisition had its number, and its date by month and day, and the names of the libellants, and the name of the steamboat Metropolis, and the description of the articles to be supplied, filled into the proper blanks; and each was signed "A. Gould" before the printed words "Purchasing Agent." The Narragansett Steamship Company was, at the same time, obtaining supplies from the libellants for steamboats owned by it, which it was running itself, and which were not run by the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company under charter; and the libellants, at the same time, were furnishing supplies to boats other than the Metropolis, which were run by the latter company. A. Gould, the same person who was purchasing agent for the one company, was purchasing agent for the other company. The two companies had a common office in the city of New York, where Gould transacted such business of each company as related to supplies for the boats run by the respective companies. The libellants furnished supplies to the boats run by the Narragansett Steamship Company on printed blank requisitions filled up, which were in printed form, like the printed forms of the requisitions for the supplies furnished to the Metropolis, except that they were headed in print "Narragansett Steamship Company." They were signed "A. Gould, Purchasing Agent." The libellants delivered their bills to Gould, at his said office, for the supplies furnished to the several boats run by the two companies respectively. The bills for the supplies in question were made out to "Steamer Metropolis and owners." When the bills were rendered to Gould, he sorted them out, and, in accordance with his directions, the libellants went to one place to get pay for the articles supplied to the boats run by the Narragansett Steamship Company and to another place to get pay for the articles supplied by the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company. In the course of such business the libellants took, for some of their bills for the former articles, promissory notes made by the former company, and for some of their bills for the latter articles promissory notes made by the latter company. All notes ever given to the libellants by the former company were paid, and all supplies ever furnished by the libellants to boats run by the former company have been paid for.

On the foregoing facts, this case presents a very different aspect from one where supplies are furnished to a vessel in a foreign port, on the order of her master. The libellants could have no claim against the Narragansett Steamship Company for the supplies furnished by them to the Metropolis, furnished under the circumstances and on the requisitions shown in evidence. It was clearly understood by the libellants that they were not supplying the Metropolis on requisitions made by or for the Narragansett Steamship Company. In receiving the requisitions for the supplies to the Metropolis, and in furnishing such supplies, the libellants recognized Gould as acting solely as purchasing agent for the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, and in its behalf. They knew the distinction between the two companies, and they knew, from the requisitions made in the names of the two companies respectively, that the supplies to the Metropolis were not furnished by them on requisitions made by Gould as purchasing agent for the Narragansett Steamship Company, while supplies to other boats were furnished by them on requisitions made by Gould as purchasing agent for that company. On all the facts it must be held, that the supplies were not furnished to the Metropolis on her credit, or on the credit of herself and of the Narragansett Steamship Company, as her owners. It clearly appears that the Narragansett Steamship Company had credit, upon which supplies, if to be obtained by or for them, for the Metropolis, could have been obtained, and that the libellants knew that. Within the principles laid down in the case of The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 129; The Lulu, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 192; The Kalorama, Id. 204; and The Patapsco, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 329,—no lien was created on the vessel in favor of the libellants, and the libel must be dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 9,503.

The METROPOLIS.

[9 Ben. 83.][1]

District Court, E. D. New York. March, 1877.

MARITIME LIEN—PRESUMPTION OF CREDIT — BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Where necessary supplies, furnished to a foreign vessel, were procured by a steward, authorized to get them but appointed by a railroad company then using the boat: Held, that the owners, by permitting the appointment of the steward with authority to procure supplies, must be considered to have consented that supplies be procured in the ordinary way, upon the credit of the vessel;

2. That on the question of fact whether the supplies were furnished upon the credit of the vessel, the burden is upon the claimants, the presumption being that necessary supplies are ordered upon such credit.

The Narragansett Steamship Company, owning several vessels, made an arrangement with the New Jersey Southern R. R. Co., for the use of their boats to run from Sandy Hook to New York, when required, and carry the railroad company's passengers at so much per day, the railroad company to furnish supplies, materials and crew. Thereupon the railroad company put a steward on the Metropolis, one of the Narragansett Co.'s steamboats, to keep and supply a restaurant on board, who bought supplies, the requisition being made out "The New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, to James M. Fuller, Dr.;" which were delivered on board and used on the boat, in the restaurant. Fuller and Derry, another contractor, furnished supplies, also, to four other steamboats under the same arrangement and circumstances; and the railroad company having become insolvent and passed into the hands of a receiver, actions were brought to enforce liens upon all the vessels, but only one set of proofs was taken, applicable to all the cases. Opinions were rendered and final decree made in all the cases; but the facts being the same, only this one and the case of The Long Branch [Case No. 8,484] are reported.

Beebe, Wilcox & Hobbs, for libellants.
Shearman & Sterling, for claimants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action to enforce a lien against the steamboat Metropolis for provisions supplied to that vessel during the months of July and August, 1873, at the city of New York. The libel avers that the provisions in question were necessary for the vessel in her employment, and were furnished upon the credit of the vessel, she being a foreign vessel.

The claimant of the vessel is the Narragansett Steamship Company, which sets forth by way of defence that the supplies in question were furnished to, on the order and solely on the credit of the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, and no lien upon the vessel was created thereby.

The evidence shows that the work in question was ordered by the master of the vessel, whose authority to give the order has not been disputed. The vessel was a foreign vessel, being owned by the Narragansett Steamship Company, a foreign corporation. The president of this corporation was Jay Gould, who was also the president of the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, at this time operating a railroad from Sandy Hook, Long Branch and Philadelphia, and running in connection with the railroad a line of steamboats from Sandy Hook to the city of New York, a distance by water of some twenty miles.

Between these two corporations the proofs show an arrangement to have existed, that the steamboats of the Narragansett Steamship Company should run for the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, on their route from and to Sandy Hook, as they might be wanted by reason of accident to the boats of the railroad company, or other necessity. This arrangement was verbal, for no definite period of time and for no particular days or specified voyages. The railroad was to pay for the use of the boats by the day when they were used. The price for the Metropolis, when used, was $100 per day, the railroad company to furnish the supplies, materials, and crews.

By virtue of this agreement, the Metropolis made various irregular trips on the route between Sandy Hook and New York, making in all eighty-three days during the season of 1873.

It may perhaps be assumed—unless some evidence has escaped my attention, owing to the confused and improper method adopted in taking the testimony of five different cases all together—although the evidence hardly proves the fact, that the provisions in question were to enable the boat to make one or more of these trips between Sandy Hook and back. If so, according to the arrangement between the two companies, as between the railroad company and the Narragansett Steamship Company, the expense of these provisions was to have been borne by the railroad company. The provisions were ordered by the steward of the boat, appointed by, and acting under the authority of the railroad company, and were delivered on board of and used by the boat. The requisition for the articles was headed, "New Jersey Southern Railroad Company, Steamer Metropolis, received from James M. Fuller," &c., &c.

The authority of the steward to procure these supplies is not disputed, but it is contended that as he had authority to order for the New Jersey Southern Railroad Company alone, and not for the Narragansett Steamship Company, his acts created no lien upon the boat, but simply charged the railroad company. My opinion is otherwise.

If the arrangement between the two companies was such as to constitute the railroad company owners for the voyage and transfer to them the possession and control of the vessel, then the power to bind the vessel for necessary supplies became vested in the railroad company, and the vessel would be bound by their contract for necessary supplies, provided the same were furnished upon the credit of the vessel. If, on the other hand, the effect of the arrangement between the two corporations was not to transfer the possession and control of the vessel to the railroad company, and the agreement was simply on the part of the owners of the vessel to perform certain voyages, and on the part of the railroad to pay a certain compensation for that service so rendered by the ship owner, still the vessel would be liable for supplies used by her in the performance of that service, provided the same were furnished upon the credit of the vessel.

When the owners of the boat permitted the railroad to place on board this boat a steward, with authority to procure the provisions necessary for the boat, they permitted the boat to be charged by the steward so appointed and authorized for necessary supplies so procured.

It is well known that the duty of procuring supplies of the character in question for vessels of this description in many if not in most cases devolves upon a steward or manager, who, in this particular, is the representative of the owner. The owners of this vessel when they made this arrangement with the railroad company not only knew that supplies must be procured for the vessel to enable her to perform the service it was intended she should perform, but they must also be taken to know that the steward they permitted to be appointed to the vessel would, in the ordinary course of business, be authorized to procure such supplies of this character as the vessel might need.

The ordinary method of procuring supplies for a foreign vessel, is upon the credit of the vessel. The owners of this boat are to be considered as having contracted that the vessel's necessary supplies should be procured in the ordinary manner of procuring such supplies, and cannot be permitted to say that they did not suppose that the vessel would be charged with a lien. When, then, it is made to appear that the supplies were necessary, and were in fact used on board the vessel, and that they were procured by the officer whose ordinary duty it is to procure such articles, and that such officer was authorized to procure the same, a case is made where the vessel herself is charged with a lien, provided the supplies were procured upon the credit of the vessel. The liability of a foreign vessel for supplies, arises out of the fact that the supplies are used on board the vessel to enable her to make voyages and earn freight, and the further fact that the supplies are procured upon the credit of the vessel by a person duly authorized to procure the same. A vessel sailed on shares by her master is held bound for supplies procured by the master, notwithstanding the fact that as between the master and owners the master alone is to furnish the supplies.

So in the case of The City of New York [Case No. 2,758], where the vessel was chartered and coal was ordered by a purser employed by the chartered vessel, she was held liable when the fact was proved that the coal was furnished upon the credit of the boat.

In this view of the law the decision of this case must depend upon the question of fact, whether the provisions in question were furnished upon the credit of the boat. If they were so furnished, the boat and also the railroad company became bound therefor. If they were not so furnished the railroad company alone is bound.

Upon this question the burden is upon the claimant. When one authorized to procure supplies for a foreign vessel, orders supplies for the vessel, that are used by the vessel and necessary therefor, the presumption arises that they are furnished upon the credit of the vessel (Insurance Co. v. Baring, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 159), and the necessity for the credit of the vessel is shown by proof of the necessity of the supplies for the use of the vessel (The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 138).

The present case is relieved of all difficulty upon the question to whom credit was given, by the circumstance that facts precisely similar to those here made to appear as bearing on the question whether credit was given to the vessel, were shown in an action brought by this same libellant against the steamboat Plymouth Rock, a vessel running on the same route, and were in that case found, not only by this court, but also by the circuit court upon appeal, to be insufficient to justify holding that the supplies were furnished solely upon the credit of the railroad. The two cases are alike except that in the case of The Plymouth Rock the railroad company was the actual owner of the vessel, while in this case they were using the boat of another under the arrangement which has been described. That fact, as has been shown, does not, in a case like this, affect the question of the liability of the vessel when once the credit of the vessel is found to have entered into the contract as an element thereof.

I have been referred by counsel to a case decided by the district court for the Southern district of New York, where in an action against this same boat by a different libellant upon similar facts, a different conclusion was arrived at. I presume the case alluded to was determined before the decision of the circuit court in the case of The Plymouth Rock [Case No. 11,237], had been promulgated. The decision of the appellate court in the case of The Plymouth Rock is decisive of the question of credit in this case, and compels a decision in favor of the libellant.

METROPOLITAN LIFE INS. CO. v. HARPER.

Circuit Court, W. D. Virginia. March 20, 1878.

INSURANCE—LIFE—POLICY PAID—SUIT TO RECOVER—FRAUD—COURTS — FEDERAL JURISDICTION—FOREIGN INSURANCE COMPANY — STATE STATUTE.

1. Where the amount of a policy of life insurance has been paid by the insurer, and he afterwards brings suit to recover it back, he must be deemed by the payment to have settled and waived all questions of law and fact, as to the validity of the original contract, except fraud, which they had the means of raising when they paid the loss.

[Approved in Stache v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 49 Wis. 96, 5 N. W. 36.]

2. A foreign insurance company may sue as plaintiff in a United States court, regardless of any state law forbidding such foreign companies from resorting to United States courts.

[In equity. Bill by the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company against George W. Harper, on a policy of insurance paid the defendant.]

RIVES, District Judge. This is a suit in chancery, brought for the amount of a life policy paid the defendant under the allegation of a fraudulent procurement thereof. The jurisdiction, therefore, of the court arises out of this alleged fraud. The application and medical examination of the insured took place on the 8th day of July, the policy issued on the 2d August, and the death occurred on the 18th October, all in the same year, 1875. The proofs of death were taken in the succeeding November. They bear on their face the marks of due care and just precaution. They consist of the statements of the claimant, the attending physician, the undertaker, and the company's resident agent. They display a searching scrutiny into all the facts affecting the liability of the complainant under its contract of insurance. The death was sudden. There had been no such complaint, or known disease beforehand, as would have led to the apprehension of such an instantaneous seizure and death. It was, therefore, well suited to challenge the attention and arouse the suspicions of the company. Could such a sudden death occur without some organic disease, or constitutional infirmity, concealed in violation of that stipulation of the policy, denouncing it null and void, "should any of the statements or declarations made in the application, on the faith of which this policy is issued, be found untrue as regards the age, health, habits, or family history of the insured?" The period of ninety days after due notice and satisfactory proof of death, is reserved to the company for a consideration of the question of its liability under the various warranties it exacts of the insured, of the absolute verity of his answers to their interrogatories. These questions are so numerous and cover such a variety of topics, and in some instances, of such apparent remoteness to the risk, that untrue answers, however immaterial or mistaken, must often be found in practice to furnish a loophole of escape to the insurer. Still the normal requirements of good faith and truth must prevail; and it is not for the insured, or the court that has to pass upon his contract, to shelter him under the plea of the immateriality of the falsehood. He has chosen to contract on the basis of the truth of his answers to all questions; and he has no right to discriminate between them as to their relative weight with his co-contractor. It is scarcely to be supposed that this company was idle in this interval, and failed to make diligent inquiry into all facts touching the payment of the policy. Had they chosen to be thus derelict, it is but just that they should be bound by the consequences of their negligence. But, in my opinion, they are not subject to such an imputation. Look to the questions, with which they ply their resident agent, D. H. Pannill, and his answers. He is asked to state all the facts and circumstances within his knowledge relating to the cause of death. His answer is: "I know nothing of the facts and circumstances attending this death, of my own knowledge. I heard that he died suddenly in Danville, some said of apoplexy, some of heart disease." Again, in answer to the seventh question, as to his knowledge, information, or belief, of any facts inconsistent with the statements made in the application of the insured, he concludes his answer with this significant disclaimer: "I know of no fact why the insured should not have been regarded as insurable at the time he was insured, and have heard of nothing since, but quite the contrary from all who knew him." This information was given the company by their responsible resident agent under the date of the 16th November, 1875. Should they not have taken alarm at his report of "death from heart disease?" Did not the inquiry naturally arise whether such disease did not antedate the application, and if so, its existence be a breach of its warranties? It is hard to suppose that the four months intervening between these proofs, and the payment of the policy on the 29th March, 1876, passed unimproved by the company in a searching inquiry into all the breaches that are now marshalled in imposing array in the argument of this cause. Is there no legal effect to be attributed to this payment, under these circumstances of delay, and opportunity of inquiry? Notwithstanding this acknowledgment and ratification of the contract, is the case still open in equity for all the defences which the company could have made to an action of law by the defendant to recover of them the amount of this policy? I think not. Reason and authority alike declare that after this payment they are precluded from setting up the warranties, of which they might have availed in their resistance of this payment. The time has passed for such defences. Whether by design or neglect, they have allowed the time to pass within which they could have opened up and relied upon such defences. They have virtually waived them, and are now remitted to the sole defence of fraud. To this effect is the case cited by Mr. Bouldin, of the National Life Ins. Co. v. Minch, 53 N. Y. 144. It was an action brought to recover of the defendant as administrator, etc., of Anna C. Minch, $2500 and interest as damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of a conspiracy and fraudulent representations, whereby the plaintiff was induced to insure the life of the deceased and to pay the loss after death. It is precisely like the case at bar with this exception, that it was a case at law and triable before a jury; whereas the present is in equity, and to be tried by the chancellor without a jury. The doctrine was there clearly and distinctly announced that a breach of any warranty in an application for a policy of life insurance, must be insisted upon by the insurer, when a claim is made for the execution of the contract, or it will be deemed to have been waived. Mere ignorance of a fact which would have enabled a company to defend on account of such breach is not such mistake of fact as will enable it to recover back money paid upon the policy. In the opinion of the court in this case, this pertinent and comprehensive remark of Judge Sutherland in 27 Barb. 354, is quoted and approved: "In this action they must be deemed by the payment to have settled or waived all questions of law or fact, as to the validity of the original contract, except fraud, which they had the means of raising when they paid the loss."

The doctrine thus clearly stated and commended by its reasonableness to our approval seems to me conclusive of many points raised and discussed by plaintiff's counsel. Such, for instance, is the objection to the appointment and disqualification of the medical examiner. It seems that regularly he is appointed by the general agent, who reports him to the company for confirmation, where I suppose he is duly registered. Whether this is the case where there is a new field for the introduction of this insurance business I am not informed; at any rate the act of the local agent in the appointment becomes known to the company on the issue of the policy, and any irregularity or impropriety therein is the act of the agent, and necessarily waived by the grant of the policy. On this occasion the agent enters on his canvass under the auspices of a resident attorney of the county, to whom the agency was transferred. The insured was a man of respectability and influence; and it was an object with these canvassers to secure him as a patron of their business; accordingly, a friend and neighbor is warmly solicited to aid them in prevailing on the decedent to take a policy in their company. He does so. Under such circumstances of importunity the agent would scarcely agree to be balked in his scheme by the want of a disinterested physician; on the contrary it would not have been surprising if he had improved a medecin malgre lui (a doctor in spite of himself) out of the materials nearest him rather than lose the prize he was in the act of clutching. Nor would it have mattered in law or reason, because his act or fraud would have to go before the company and be repudiated in the rejection, or ratified in the issue of the policy. So, the time for this objection has passed; and whatever irregularity or impropriety there may have been in this selection of the medical examiner, and his conduct of the examination, the company is estopped from availing of it at this time by their accepting the action of their agent in the premises. It is proven that Dr. Robertson did not wish to act; pleaded urgent professional calls upon him at the time, and that the insured also suggested to Dr. Smead, the agent, the impropriety of his acting, as he was a brother-in-law of his, but none of these considerations diverted Dr. Smead from the consummation of the proposals while his recruit was yet in the humor for the contract. Now would it not be a great injustice under these circumstances to allow the company to disavow the knowledge or plead ignorance of these facts; and after the execution of the contract by the issue of the policy to rake up from the past objections that were merged in that policy and obliterated by its grant? I cannot escape the conclusion that it would be. In the same way, and for the same reason, it is not permissible for the plaintiff's counsel to range through the whole network of interrogatories and rely upon breaches unaffected by fraud. To constitute such fraud, the falsity of the answer is not sufficient of itself; it must be combined with the guilty knowledge of its falsity. Take for instance the answer to the eighteenth question, which has been arraigned by the concluding counsel of the plaintiff as the rankest fraud in the case; the assertion, namely, of the medical examiner that the life proposed was in all respects a first-class healthy risk. This is an opinion still avowed by Dr. Robertson, and I am at a loss to conceive how they should predicate of it, much less prove a knowledge on his part to the contrary, and a fraudulent concealment thereof. So with the answers to questions seven and eight, the truth of which is still averred by Dr. Robertson; and we have no testimony to the contrary at the time of insurance. So far as the testimony discloses, the rheumatic symptoms may have supervened upon the insurance; at the time of the medical report no ailment was spoken of save catarrhal and neuralgic affections; so that fraud cannot fairly be imputed to these answers. And, further, I take it that counsel for the plaintiff have fully conceded that they are restricted to allegations of fraud and cannot now rely on bare breaches of warranty, which were settled, adjusted, and closed forever by the voluntary payment of the loss, though the company were ignorant of the existence of the breaches at the time of such payment. In the same line of argument, much stress is laid on the discharge of the insured from the Confederate army at Norfolk, in 1863, some twelve years prior to the insurance; and although a witness attributes that discharge as well to incompetency as a colonel of militia as to low spirits and enfeebled health. But Dr. Robertson declares that that discharge was not on any grounds affecting longevity, but rather from apprehension of what disease might be developed by the life and exposure of the camp; and it is not just to predicate of his silence on that head, a fraudulent concealment on his part in the absence of all proof that his apprehension of consumption was ever fulfilled by the event, and his positive assertion that the insured was not consumptive.

The bill in this case is framed upon the idea that the plaintiffs would be restricted to the question of fraud. It does not contemplate or ask for relief on the score of breaches of warranty, free from such taint. I admit there is a general sweeping averment of fraud, but it is virtually narrowed to three special instances, which are confined to the answers to three questions, namely: Nos. 10, 11 and 12, and are said to consist in the fraudulent assertion: (1) "That William H. Harper had never had any illness or injury; (2) that he had never consulted any physician concerning himself; and (3) that he did not use alcoholic stimulants or malt liquors to any daily extent." To these specific charges the pleadings and proofs conform; not so, however, with the argument, which, as I have shown, has taken a wider range.

I must now turn my attention to this aspect of the case. First, however, we must ascertain the current of authorities by which I must steer my course to a decision in this cause. One class is where the applicant, by himself or another, prepares his declaration and solicits his policy. There the courts decide that he is bound by his answers and warrants their truth, so that it is not for him nor the court nor the jury to rely on their immateriality; they are stipulated for as a basis of the contract; the insurer had a right to call for them; and it is for him alone to determine the weight to be given them in his decision upon the grant or refusal of the policy. Nothing but truth in such answers can subserve the ends of morals or law, and uphold the bona fides and justify the execution of the contract. No question here arises as to the obligation of the warranties, for they are not challenged by any testimony dehors the written instrument affecting its purport or validity. Such are the cases of Jeffries v. Life Ins. Co., 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 47, and Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. France, 91 U. S. 510. But a different rule is applied to the case of local agents who are engaged in the business of soliciting insurance. Where they are active and the insured passive; where they prepare the declarations and dictate the answers, and the respondent accepts them, the courts have refused to enforce against the insured the leading canon of evidence, namely, that a written instrument cannot be varied by parole testimony. But upon the ground that the insurer has, by the act of his agent, secured an advantage which operates as a fraud upon the insured, the latter will be allowed to prove the part of the agent in the framing of his answer, though it tends to invalidate the authenticity of the instrument. This is done under the doctrine of estoppels in pais; a doctrine, as Justice Miller observes, well established and understood, but its applicability not so well defined as could be wished. It has, however, been applied to insurance in numerous well-considered judgments by the courts of this country. Otherwise, the officiousness of insurance agents would defeat the ends of justice and often tend to the support of dishonest claims. To this class belong the cases of Insurance Co. v. Wilkinson, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 222; Insurance Co. v. Mahone, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 152; Continental Ins. Co. v. Kasey, 25 Grat. 268; Manhattan Fire Ins. Co. v. Weill [Case No. 9,022].

Being thus furnished with the law and the discriminations made by it, we advance to the facts of this case. It is not my purpose to enter on a critical examination of the voluminous proofs in this cause. I shall indicate my conclusions rather than endeavor to support them by particular references to the testimony. The pleadings in this cause must be given their just weight. This forum allows the complainant to appeal to the conscience of the defendants, and when he has done so, the answers can only be overruled by two witnesses, or one witness with corroborating facts. What, then, briefly is the statement of Dr. Robertson's answer? That he was arrested in the midst of urgent professional calls by Dr. Smead, the agent of the plaintiff, and constrained by his importunity to undertake a task entirely new to him, that of a medical examiner of his brother-in-law, William H. Harper; that he had not time to read the paper or printed forms presented to him, but was directed in his task by the agent, to whom he readily yielded as to one authorized by the company to guide him in filling up the blanks in the printed form. "When in this way he reached question No. 10, respondent stopped, and was going on to mention the illness and injuries which the said W. H. Harper had had, without objection on the part of W. H. Harper, when said Smead said that that question must be answered 'No,' unless such illness or injury had impaired said Harper's constitution or general health; and respondent believing it had not, and believing also that said Smead knew how the said question should be answered so as to meet the requirements of his company, wrote the answer 'No.' When question No. 11 was reached, namely, 'Has the said life ever consulted any physician concerning himself?' respondent asked said Smead if he must answer whether he consulted him, or whether he had consulted any other physician besides himself, and said Smead replied that he must answer whether he had ever consulted any physician besides himself, and that he must answer said question 'No.' When question No. 12 was reached, namely, 'To what daily extent does the said life proposed use alcoholic stimulants or malt liquors?' respondent answered, 'Not at all,' and he claims now that answer was true." Now if this answer could be disproved there is one only living witness who could do so, and that is Dr. Smead. His deposition has been taken and filed by the plaintiff in this cause. I have read it attentively, and can find nothing substantial to contradict or discredit the answer. There are some trivial and circumstantial discrepancies, but a substantial agreement. Dr. Robertson is arraigned for not excluding Smead from the examination, and for not reading the caption of the paper; while Dr. Smead, acting at different times both as agent and medical examiner, pleads as his excuse for his forbidden presence, that he also had not read the caption and was ignorant of its prohibition. This disposition, then, is to be taken as sustaining the answer. Not a suspicion, therefore, is left as to the part of Dr. Smead in dictating the simple answer of "No" to the questions Nos. 10 and 11, and suppressing the explanatory remarks of Dr. Robertson as assented to by W. H. Harper. Can the company, therefore, take advantage of this answer dictated by their agent, and exclude the explanation made by Dr. Robertson? Certainly not, if the decisions of the supreme court that I have cited are to be respected and obeyed. But, say the plaintiff's counsel, give the defendant the benefit of Dr. Robertson's explanations, which were suppressed by Dr. Smead, and still there is a fraudulent concealment of the real state of the insured life. He is confronted by the fact of Harper's discharge from the Confederate army and his spell of sickness in February, 1875. This, of course, depends on the testimony, and the plaintiff assumes the onus of showing the former was due to a consumptive habit, and the latter to a serious organic derangement. It is easy enough with a suspicious turn of mind to conceive and charge such was the case; but with the court it is a question of proof. There has been a diligent search for testimony on this subject; a large number of witnesses have been examined upon it; no pains have been spared to establish it, if it existed; and yet after a careful sifting of the testimony it seems to me there is a plain defect of proof to maintain the issue on the part of the plaintiff. The sum of the testimony is that the discharge from the army was owing to low spirits and depressed health as well as military incapacity; and that the spell of sickness in the winter arose from a temporary derangement of the stomach, from both of which the insured recovered before the insurance in July, 1875. If these indispositions were more serious, I can only say the fact has not been shown to my satisfaction. No one of all these witnesses has been found to testify that the insured was consumptive, or that his health was impaired by organic disease. It is true that he was sick for some eight or ten days in February preceding his demise, but where is the proof that it was otherwise than as described by his physician; a transient affection of the stomach, from which he recovered without any lasting injury. All this diagnosis may be wrong, but where is the proof of it? Parties in interest and third persons may speculate to the contrary, as interest or suspicion may suggest; but the judgment of the court must repose on a surer foundation. It requires proof, and is forbidden to enter the field of conjecture, where fraud is never presumed, but is always to be proved. The same reasoning applies to the habits of the insured as to drink. No witness deposes that he ever saw him drunk or under the influence of liquor. Prior to his sickness he drank ardent spirits occasionally at home and abroad, but no one can be gotten to declare that the habit affected his health or constitution, or that he ever carried it to excess. His indulgences in this way might be exaggerated or lightened, according to the fancy of the witness; but I infer from the general current of testimony he had been a moderate drinker, and had not in this respect abused or impaired his health or constitution. But after February, 1875, it is indisputably proven that he abjured ardent spirits and addicted himself to the occasional use of wine only. Under this state of proof was Dr. Robertson justified in answering question No. 12: "To what daily extent does the insured use alcoholic stimulants," "Not at all?" I think he was, and I discern in that answer no concealment whatsoever, much less a fraudulent concealment. Thus, then, stands the case with the defendant Dr. Robertson. The insured only acquiesced in these answers, and must be, at least, as free of fraud as he. Both these men stand fair and irreproachable in their communities. I see nothing in this testimony to blast their characters and convict them of fraud. There is no ground to fear that these insurance companies will fail of the protection of the courts and be left exposed by them to the machinations of the fraudulent. They are praiseworthy and beneficent enterprises and will, I doubt not, receive the full protection of the law in all cases of fraud. This is proven by the sequel of the case of Anna C. Minch, which I have quoted. The new trial resulted in the finding of the atrocious fraud alleged, and the recovery of the amount of the policy already paid, with interest and costs. Such, I am sure, would be my judgment in such a case. But it is solely because the fraud is not proved to my satisfaction that I feel constrained to deny the relief asked. Had it appeared to me that W. H. Harper had by himself, or in conspiracy with Dr. Robertson, fraudulently violated any of the warranties on which his policy rested, no such consideration of sympathy as has been hinted would, for a moment, withhold me from the retribution which it would be in my power and will to visit upon such a breach of faith. I am not able to fasten on the deceased the fraud alleged against him. He seems to me to have been the passive recipient of the policy he was solicited to take; and his tacit acceptance of the answers which Dr. Robertson gave for him, under the direction of the agent, are not tainted by falsehood or fraud. Nor does it seem to me that the company have any right to complain that either their agent or medical examiner betrayed their confidence or exceeded their authority. The whole transaction was as fair and honest as the infirmity of human nature admits of. An interested and jealous mind may doubtless discern flaws and lapses in it; but a generous and just construction of motives and acts will, it seems to me, exculpate the parties from the serious charges against them.

In casting around for the cause of this controversy, I can scarcely be mistaken in attributing it to the sudden and remarkable death of the insured. It was well calculated to provoke hostile speculations, and to impugn the accuracy or good faith of the medical report. In contemplating such a catastrophe, so instantaneous and unaccountable, rumors might well spread that it was due to heart disease, or some organic derangement which Dr. Robertson should have seen in its beginning and reported on his examination. Hence, medical experts have been examined as to this death, and have failed to detect or expose its immediate cause. All of certainty we have on the subject is the theory of his physician that it was the transfer of his neuralgic rheumatism to his heart. At any rate there is an entire absence of proof to show it was owing to a cause existing at the time of the medical examination, was then known to Dr. Robertson, and fraudulently suppressed by him. In Mrs. Minch's case, she was represented to have died of pneumonia, when it was proven she died of cancer, fraudulently concealed in her declaration. How unlike to this case! I have not adverted to the testimony of Dr. Hegeman, the vice-president of this company. It is so largely devoted to the offer and rejection of compromises, all of which is inadmissible as evidence, that it has no special weight in this case. So far as it seeks to impeach the evidence of Dr. Robertson through his conversations and letter exhibited with the deposition, I see nothing that may not be reconciled, and be consistent with the truth of both witnesses.

After a careful and deliberate consideration of the case, I am satisfied it was right to set aside the issue once directed in it. It is emphatically a case of equitable jurisdiction, where the verdict of a jury could scarcely aid the court. Where the credibility of conflicting witnesses is to be passed upon, it is perhaps proper to evoke the verdict of a jury; but in all other cases resting upon the original jurisdiction of a court of equity, it is rarely discreet to devolve the responsibility of a judgment, in whole or in part, upon the finding of a jury. It has been suggested that as this company has contracted, under the terms of the act of assembly, to be amenable to suits in the courts of this state, it forfeits its character of a foreign corporation and its right to sue in this court. This consequence does not seem to me legitimate. It may be bound to appear through its resident agent to suits against it; and when brought its agent may be precluded from removing the case to a federal court, as, I am told, has been decided by our court of appeals. But evidently this act does not pretend to deprive the foreign corporation of its resort, as plaintiff, to this court. Hence, I decline to yield to the claim of the defendant's counsel that I have not jurisdiction of this case.

I have thus hurriedly disposed of the questions raised and discussed in this case with rare ability. It only remains for me to announce my judgment that the bill must be dismissed with costs, and the injunction against the bankers dissolved, so that they may pay the deposits to the defendant, George W. Harper.

METROPOLITAN R. CO. v. SLACK.

[Holmes, 375.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May, 1874.

TAXATION—INCOME TAX — EARNINGS OF RAILWAY COMPANY.

1. Section 119 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 283), as amended by the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 138), providing that income taxes "shall be levied on the first day of May, and be due and payable on or before the thirtieth day of June, in each year, until and including the year 1870, and no longer," does not apply to an internal-revenue tax on the dividends and earnings of a railway corporation for the first six months of the year 1870, which is not an income tax, but an excise.

2. Under section 15 of the act of July 14, 1870 (16 Stat. 260), providing for levy and collection of a tax "for and during the year 1871," on interest paid by corporations, "and on the amount of dividends of earnings hereafter declared by them," the dividends and earnings of a railway corporation for the last six months of the year 1870 are not taxable.

Assumpsit to recover the amount of certain taxes, paid under protest by the plaintiff, a street-railway corporation, to the defendant [Charles W. Slack], a collector of internal revenue. The action was originally brought in the state court, and was removed by the defendant to this court by certiorari. The case was heard on an agreed statement of facts, the material parts of which were as follows: On the 23d of June, 1870, the directors of the plaintiff corporation declared a dividend of its savings and income for the first six months of the year 1870, payable July 1, 1870. The savings and income for the first six months of 1870 not being sufficient to pay the dividend, a portion of the surplus earnings of the previous year (upon which tax had been paid) was added to the earnings of the first half of 1870, to make up the amount of the dividend. A tax of five per cent was assessed upon the dividend, from the amount of which tax was deducted the tax paid by the corporation on the surplus earnings of 1869, carried forward as above; the balance was paid by the plaintiff under protest. On the 22d of December, 1870, the corporation declared a dividend of its earnings and income for the last six months of 1870, payable Dec. 30, 1871. A tax of two and a half per cent was assessed on this last dividend, and a like tax on the surplus earnings of the corporation over and above the dividend for said six months; which tax was paid by the plaintiff under protest.

LOWELL, District Judge. The reasoning of the supreme court in Barnes v. Railroads, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 294, seems to me to govern the first part of this case, relating to the tax assessed upon the plaintiff for the dividend declared in June, 1870. In those cases it was laid down that the tax upon the earnings of such companies as the plaintiff is an excise imposed upon them directly, and not a part of the general income tax of their shareholders. It seems to follow, fairly, that the limitation of section 119 of the act of 1864, as amended by the act of 1866 (14 Stat. 138), which brought the income tax to a close with the end of the year 1869 (assessable in May and payable in June, 1870), does not apply to this excise. This part of the case I decide for the defendant.

The question concerning the tax on the earnings of the second half of the year 1870 is one of difficulty, because section 15 of the act of 14th July, 1870 (16 Stat. 260), appears to be self-contradictory. It provides that there shall be levied and collected "for and during the year 1871" a tax of two and a half per cent on the amount of all interest or coupons paid, &c., and on the amount of all dividends of earnings, income, or gains, "hereafter declared" by any bank, &c. I have taken pains to examine the records of congress, and find that the words "for and during the year 1871" were inserted upon the report of a committee of conference, and without a word of debate in either house.

As the section stood before those words were added, the meaning was, that, instead of the former tax of five per cent, there should be levied a lighter tax, but that this should not be retroactive so as to relieve dividends which had been or should be declared before the passage of the act, and thus become liable to the five per cent. When the words "for and during the year 1871" were added, the "hereafter declared" became almost meaningless, or else repugnant; and, if the latter, the question is, which is to control?

The commissioners of internal revenue decided, first, that dividends for the last half of 1870 were liable to be assessed (12 Int. Rev. Rec. 93, 117); then that they were not (13 Int. Rev. Rec. 17); and then again that they were (14 Int. Rev. Rec. 57); and it is not surprising that there should be this conflict of opinion. I cannot find any way of fully reconciling the apparent inconsistency. It is not, in my opinion, possible so to change the words "for and during the year 1871" as to hold that they authorize an assessment for 1870. I think "during" is intended to express the idea that after 1871 there shall be no further excise of this character; and not, as was argued by the defendant, that the levy must actually be made in that year of all the profits of that year, and also of those of the last half of 1870.

In my opinion, a levy made in 1872, for the earnings of 1871, would be valid, and was intended to be made, if necessary; in other words, the tax was upon the whole profits of 1871, and could not be evaded by declaring out of those profits a dividend payable in 1872. And this I understand to be the decision under the act of 1866, in Barnes v. Railroads, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 294.

If this be so, what warrant have we for saying that a tax to be levied for the year 1871 means for eighteen months? If the latter half of 1871 is included in one year, how can the latter half of 1870 be included in the same year? There is no reason for any such provision; and it is contradicted by section 16, which requires a return to be made to the assessor within thirty days after the dividend is declared. The construction contended for by the defendant requires us to hold that a dividend payable in August is to be returned in September, though it is not taxable until the following January.

That congress understood full well the meaning of the words used in the opening clause of section 15, is shown by an amendment inserted, if I mistake not, at the same time and in the same way in section 6; namely, that the income tax should be levied and collected for the years 1870 and 1871, and no longer. The "during" of section 15 corresponds, as I have said, to the "no longer" of section 6; and the unmistakable meaning of the early part of section 15 is, that the tax on the dividends of railroad companies shall be levied for the year 1871, and no longer. So far I do not find difficulty: but this brings the two phrases into direct repugnancy; because "hereafter declared" seems to mean at any time after the passage of the act.

Upon the whole, I think the governing clause of this section is the opening clause; because, if that is rejected, there is no power left to levy any tax. It is equally improper to reject any part of that clause, because then there is no limitation of years at all. That part of the section must, therefore, be entirely changed by interpolating the words "for the remainder of the year 1870," or something equivalent; or else it is plain that congress has failed to authorize a levy for the last months of 1870, whatever it may have said about dividends in some other clause.

Now, I know of no authority which will authorize such an interpolation. It seems to me much more consistent with sound construction to reject the words "hereafter declared," or to make them yield a part of their meaning, and remain as surplusage, or nearly so; because all the dividends earned in 1871 would be declared after the passage of the act, while all the dividends thereafter declared can by no means be assessed for the year 1871. Indeed, to give to those words the force contended for, is to change and enlarge their sense into nearly the opposite of their original meaning. When written, they meant that the reduction of the tax should not be retrospective. As now proposed, they would mean that it shall not be too prospective. I cannot believe that it is permissible to supply a meaning for an act of congress upon any theory of what they probably might be expected to intend, which would so twist this section as to read that on all dividends hereafter declared until the end of 1871, including all earned in 1871, there should be levied the tax. I come back, therefore, to the point which is in reality the gist of the case,—that it is not the declaration of a dividend, but the earning of profits, that is the material thing, and that it is upon the profits earned in 1871 that the tax is imposed, and on none other. I have found my judgment enlightened and my opinion fortified by the decision and reasoning of McKennan, J., in Philadelphia & Reading R. Co. v. Kenney [Case No. 11,088], which sustains this construction of the statute.

Judgment for plaintiff for the amount of the second sum mentioned in the agreed facts, with interest at six per cent from July 31, 1871.

NOTE. Upon a similar case involving the interpretation of section 15 of the act of July 14, 1870, a majority of the United States supreme court, stating that "the ambiguous terms of the statute prevent the possibility of a satisfactory solution of the question presented," adopted "the construction practically placed upon it by the administrative department of the government"; and decided in favor of the tax. PATENTS — REISSUE — COMPARISON — MATTERS OF FACT—DECISION OF COMMISSIONER—STATE OF THE ART—CLOTHES WRINGERS.

1. In a suit for infringement of a reissued patent, the question whether or not the reissue is for the same invention as the original patent, is one of construction for the court upon comparison of the two instruments. Questions as to matters of fact connected with the surrender and reissue are closed by the decision of the commissioner granting the reissue.

[Cited in Spaeth v. Barney, 22 Fed. 829.]

2. In view of the prior state of the art, the reissued patent, No. 2829, dated Dec. 31, 1867, granted Sylvanus Walker, for an improvement in clothes-wringers, originally patented to Isaac A. Sergeant, July 27, 1858, must be construed as a patent for a wringer consisting of a new U-shaped yoke frame, with uprights or their equivalents, in which a wringing mechanism is supported in position on one side of a wash-tub, in combination with an adjustable clamping device for fastening the wringer to the tub.

[2] [Affirmed in 20 Wall. (87 U. S.) 342.]

3. So construed, the patent is not infringed by the manufacture and sale of a clothes-wringer consisting of an old adjustable clamping device for holding the wringer to one side of a wash-tub, and two upright standards connected at the bottom by a cross-bar; the standards supporting the journals of the pressure-rollers of an old wringing mechanism.

In equity.

Thomas A. Jenckes and James H. Parsons, for complainant.

B. F. Thurston, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This is a bill in equity brought by the complainant, as assignee of Isaac A. Sergeant, for infringement of division 2, No. 2829, of letters-patent for an improvement in clothes-wringers. Said letters-patent [No. 21,029], were originally granted to Isaac A. Sergeant July 27, 1858, and were reissued in two divisions, one dated June 18, 1867, and the other being one upon which this bill is brought, dated Dec. 31, 1867.

The machine described in the original patent belongs to that class of clothes-wringers generally known as "twist-wringers," in the use of which clothes are wrung and the water expelled by twisting the clothes into a rope, in the same manner as clothes are wrung by hand.

The original Sergeant machine had a yoke frame of U form, which yoke frame had a pair of jaws and a clamp wedge for securing the frame to the side of a common wash-tub. This portion of the original machine constituted that part of the invention which is embraced in the division of the reissued patent, No. 2829. To the yoke frame a hinged frame was attached, which, when in position, is at right angles with the yoke frame. A cross-bar unites the two sides of the hinged frame. In the centre of the cross-bar is set a "hitching pin," around which the clothes to be wrung are partially wound and held fast by the left hand of the operator, while the right hand turns a rotary clamp which is set in the yoke frame, and which gives the clothes the twist necessary to expel the water. More minute description of this rotary clamp is unnecessary, as it has little if any connection with any questions at issue in this case, the peculiarities of the wringing mechanism not forming any part of the mechanism recited in the claims of the reissued patent No. 2829.

After the death of Isaac A. Sergeant, his administratrix, on account of a defective specification, surrendered the original patent; and on two corrected specifications two new patents were reissued to one Walker, to whom the administratrix and the heirs-at-law had assigned the patent. Walker duly assigned to complainant all his interest in the patent, and in any divisions to reissues thereof.

The claims in the reissued patent, No. 2829, are for: First, the employment or use of a portable frame or yoke, B, with uprights, S S, or their equivalents, for supporting a clothes-wringing mechanism in position on one side of a common wash-tub, for the purposes set forth. Second, the application of an adjustable clamping device, when employed to attach a clothes-wringer to one side only of a wash-tub, in the manner described and for the purposes set forth.

In the reissued patent, division 2, No. 2829, by a separation of the inventions of the patentee, the yoke frame, in combination with its device for being clamped to one side of a common wash-tub, is claimed as a separate structure, without regard to the structure of the wringing mechanism used with such "supporting and connecting apparatus."

The answer of the defendant alleges in defence, that the reissued letters-patent are fraudulent and void, because they were sought to be procured for the purpose of embracing therein more than was the invention of the said Isaac A. Sergeant; that they were obtained for the purpose of endeavoring to embarrass the defendant and other parties manufacturing wringing-machines, by the assertion of a colorable claim to a subject of invention, which, if construed by the court as broadly as the complainants by their assertions claim that it should be, would prevent the manufacture of any wringing-machine that was detachable from a tub.

If it appears upon the face of the reissued patent that it is not for the same invention as that embraced or secured in the original patent, then it would be the duty of the court, as a matter of law, to declare the reissued patent invalid; for such a state of facts, apparent upon a comparison of the two instruments as construed by the court, would show that the commissioner of patents, in granting the reissue, had exceeded his authority, and that there was such a repugnancy between the old and the new patent that it must be held as a matter of legal construction that the new patent is not for the same invention as that embraced and secured in the original patent. Matters of construction arising upon the face of the patent are open questions to be decided by the court; but all matters of fact connected with the surrender and reissue are now held to be closed by the decision of the commissioner in granting the reissued patent. Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 516.

This disposes of the first objection in the answer to the validity of the reissued patent; for there does not appear to be any ground upon which it could with reason be contended that the invention claimed in the reissued patent was not described or substantially indicated in the original patent; and the other questions of fact are closed by the decision of the commissioner.

The defendant also sets up in its answer the anticipation and prior knowledge of the alleged invention of the complainant by various parties, patentees and rejected applicants for patents, whose names and the dates of whose applications and inventions appear in the answer and the amendments thereto.

In view of this defence, it becomes necessary to consider the state of the art prior to the date of the alleged invention by Sergeant, and to define the construction and the limitations of the claims in the reissued patent under which complainant claims. Without going into a detailed description of wringing-machines existing anterior to the date of Sergeant's invention, it will be sufficient for the purposes of this case to observe that wringing-machines were in use in many different forms of more or less practical utility. Clamping devices, also, were old and well-known means of attaching machines of various descriptions to benches, tables, or other articles with which they were used. Reels for thread, vises, eyeletting-machines, fluting-machines, egg-beaters, and small mills, had been attached to benches and tables by clamping devices similar in principle to the one described in the Sergeant patent. A clamping device identical with the one used by defendants, and comprehended in the reissued patent No. 2829, was applied to a wringing-machine before the Sergeant invention.

Letters-patent for a washing-machine issued to H. W. Sabin, Aug. 16, 1845. In his machine a common twist-wringer was supported by a standard furnished with jaws and a clamp screw, the two forming a clamping device such as is in common use on all wringers at the present time; but the standard was not a U-formed yoke frame, but simply a support for the journal of a shaft, although the standard had jaws and a clamping instrument adapted to secure the standard to the side of a wash-tub. Unless the U form of the yoke frame in the Sergeant mechanism is to be considered as an essential part of the Sergeant invention, as distinguished from the standard in Sabin's machine, which is simply a support for a journal, it is difficult to perceive the novelty of the Sergeant invention. The experts examined in behalf of the complainant testify, that, in their opinion, "The said (Sabin) standard is simply a support for the journal of a shaft, and is not a yoke frame such as is described in the reissued patent, nor the equivalent of one, by reason of the differences above referred to." But when they compare the yoke frame in the reissued patent with the apparatus for supporting the wringing mechanism in the defendant's machines, which have two upright standards supporting journals for the pressure-rollers, the two upright standards being connected by a cross-bar at the bottom, they testify that not only the two upright standards connected by a cross-bar at the bottom form the yoke described in the patent, as seen from the inside of the tub, but that all the parts are duplicated; and the face of the machine presented to the outside of the tub has also two uprights, and a connection which corresponds to the yoke in the patent. Applying the same reasoning, it is not easy to see why each standard which supports the journals, as viewed from the sides, is not to be considered also as a separate yoke frame with two uprights and a cross-piece, so that it would be as correct to say that the yoke frame of the complainant is quadruplicated, as to say that it was duplicated. This would seem to be the necessary result of making the U-shaped yoke frame include any form of a journal-supporting standard, and it would seem to prove, if correct, that the Sabin patent anticipated the Sergeant invention.

The U-form of the yoke frame of the Sergeant machine was necessary as a device for supporting a clothes-wringing mechanism, in the manner and for the purposes set forth. The manner of support was the semicircular shape at the bottom of the U-formed yoke frame, which constituted of itself a journal-box; and the peculiar form of that standard, which was new, when combined with any wringing mechanism which was old and well-known, and a wedge, screw, or other well-known and equivalent clamping device, which was old, constituted the only invention which, in the state of the art at the date of the Sergeant invention, could be embraced and protected in that division of the reissued patent. This combination of such a yoke frame, with uprights or their equivalents for supporting a wringing mechanism in position on one side of a common wash-tub with an adjustable clamping device, all substantially in the manner and for the purposes set forth in the patent, is all that can be sustained as new in this division of the reissued patent. To attempt to make the claims in this division of the reissued patent sufficiently broad to cover any form of portable standard for supporting a journal of any form of wringer in combination with a wedge, or helical wedge or screw, or other clamping device for securing the frame to the side of a tub, would be fatal to the patent, as it would clearly embrace what was old, both in the separate parts and in the parts in combination. The two upright standards in the defendant's machine connected with a cross-bar may in one sense be said to be the equivalent of the U-shaped yoke frame of Sergeant. But the upright standards each support, independently of the other, their respective journal-boxes, in the same manner substantially that Sabin's standard supported a journal for clothes-wringing mechanism. There is no significance in any similarity, or supposed similarity, to a U-shaped yoke frame constituting a journal-box of itself, and requiring that exact semicircular or substantially semicircular form to form of itself the journal-box. The reissued patent in controversy in this case is, as construed by the court, only for a combination. Upon no other construction could it be sustained. The first claim refers to peculiarities in the construction of the U-shaped yoke frame for the support of the wringing mechanism; the second, to the combination of this peculiarly constructed yoke frame with reference to the purposes of the peculiar form of construction with an adjustable clamping device, when employed to attach a clothes-wringer to one side only of a wash-tub.

The standards or uprights in the defendant's machine can with no more propriety be considered as the equivalents of the U-shaped yoke frame in the complainant's, than can Sabin's standard be considered as a yoke frame, because it supported a journal-box. If the two standards in defendant's machine, with their connecting cross-bar, are to be claimed as the equivalent of complainant's yoke frame, then any frame of any kind supporting any wringing mechanism must be considered an equivalent; for there cannot be any form of frame constructed supporting a journal which could not be dissected in a yoke frame, or a U-shaped yoke frame, by an elimination of parts not indispensable. The defendant does not use a U-shaped yoke frame with any such peculiarity of form in the construction of the frame for the same purpose, or to be used in the same manner in which it is used in the complainant's combination. If the defendant's frame and standards, either separately or in combination, are the equivalent of complainant's yoke frame, then complainant's yoke frame, when combined with a clamping device and a wringing mechanism, is the equivalent of Sabin's journal-supporting standard in similar combination.

As the defendant, in the view taken by the court of Sergeant's invention, does not use all the elements of his combination, when Sergeant is confined within the exact limits of his invention and is allowed the full benefit of his invention so far as it was novel, it is not liable as an infringer. Bill dismissed, with costs.

Case No. 9,508.

METROPOLITAN WRINGING MACH. CO. v. YOUNG et al.

[14 Blatchf. 46; 2 Ban. & A. 460.][1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Nov. 18, 1876.

PATENTS—REISSUE—CLOTHES WRINGERS — COMBINATION.

The first claim of the reissued letters-patent, division A, granted to the Metropolitan Washing Machine Company, January 7th, 1873, for an "improvement in clothes wringers" (the original letters patent having been granted on the invention of Alby H. Page, January 29th, 1867), namely: "In a wringer having a pair of squeezing rollers, and an operating crank, and two uprights or standards, the employment of clamping means arranged to take hold of the tub at or near the base of each standard," is limited to a combination in which a swivel or its equivalent, is employed as one of the parts of a clamping device, and must be read with reference to the specification, and as though the words "substantially as described," were inserted.

Charles L. Woodbury, Benjamin F. Thurston, and Livingston Scott, for plaintiffs.

John F. Seymour and Edmund Wetmore, for defendants.

WALLACE, District Judge. The complainants are the owners of letters patent [No. 61,680] originally issued, on the invention of Alby H. Page, January 29th, 1867, for an "improvement in clothes wringers," and reissued [No. 5,223] to the Metropolitan Washing Machine Company, January 7th, 1873, in three divisions. The improvement relates to a device for fastening the wringers to tubs of various sizes. Infringement is predicated upon the first claim only in the reissued patent, division A, the other claims having been abandoned on the argument. That claim reads as follows: "In a wringer having a pair of squeezing rollers, and an operating crank, and two uprights or standards, the employment of clamping means arranged to take hold of the tub at or near the base of each standard." The defendants rely upon three defences to the action, insisting, first, that Page, the inventor of the alleged improvement, had abandoned it to the public; second, that, if the claim is construed to cover all clamping devices for such machines, it is void for want of novelty; and, third, that, if the claim is limited to clamping devices of the particular character described in the specification and shown in the drawings, the defendants do not infringe. I do not deem it necessary to pass upon any but the last of these defences. In my view, the true construction of the patent limits the claim to a combination of the machine with a clamping device of a specific construction, which the defendants have not adopted. Construing the claim as favorably as its language, the state of the art, and the extent and character of the actual invention will permit, it must be limited to a combination in which a swivel, or its equivalent, is employed as one of the parts of a clamping device. It cannot be sustained as a broad claim for any kind of "clamping means arranged to take hold of the tub at or near the base of each standard" of the wringing apparatus. It is to be read with reference to the specification, and as though the words "substantially as described" were inserted. It is conceded, that all that Page contemplated was to effect a new organization of the clothes wringers in use, by combining wringing apparatus similar to that in the Allendar machine with a device for clamping it to tubs and vessels, so that the wringing apparatus could be adjusted, without further adaptation, to tubs and vessels of different forms and sizes, and detached at pleasure. Prior to his first application for a patent, the most popular wringing machines were a part of the vessel itself, or were made part of a bench or frame. Wringers of various construction had been made to be attached to a tub or other vessel, but none like the Allendar machine had been made which could be adjusted in a satisfactory way to tubs and vessels differing in size and form. It was the aim of Page to supply this want. Clamping devices were a well known means of fastening machines to chairs, benches, platforms, tables and other articles. The combination of a well known wringing apparatus with a tub or vessel, by means of a well known clamping device, would not be patentable, unless some new and useful result due to the combination would ensue. It is difficult to see how any new result, in a patentable sense, could follow from combining the wringing apparatus with a device for fastening it upon a tub, unless there should be something in the device peculiarly adapted to co-operate with the wringing apparatus. Such a result would not follow from the employment of an ordinary clamp, or of two, one at or near the base of each standard of a wringer with two standards. Nor would it necessarily follow because the clamping device might be such as to adapt the wringing apparatus to tubs of different sizes; because, the aggregation of devices, each of which is old, so that each may work out its own effect, without the production of something novel arising from the co-operation of the devices, is not a new result. Clamps are usually placed at the point which will give the greatest stability to the machine. This may be near the base of the support of the machine. If there are two supports, it is quite possible that a clamp on one may suffice to attach the machine sufficiently. If it does not, and two are used, the result is but an aggregation of the results due to each. These considerations lead, in ascertaining the extent of the actual invention of Page, to search for it in some distinctive feature of his clamping device, which, from its peculiar co-operation with the wringing apparatus, produces the new result which renders his invention patentable. The description in the patent and the drawing both exhibit a clamping device which consists of two curved bars having three vertical fingers, two of which proceed from each end of the bar, on one side of it, and one from the centre, but on the opposite side of the bar. The latter finger has a set screw passing through it, with a small button on its end. Each bar is pivoted to a small bracket by a stud, and the brackets are fastened to the upright, near its base, on the side or front. When the bars are clamped to the tub by adjusting the bar by means of the pivot, four of the six fingers are placed on the outside of the tub, and two, those having the set screw, on the inside. The set screw is then adjusted, and thereby the uprights are rigidly attached to the tub. The specification proceeds as follows: "This construction presents a swivel or joint, which allows each clamping device to turn, and thus adapt itself perfectly to tubs and washing machines of different sizes and forms. The employment of two sets of clamping devices, and the taking firm hold on the edge of the tub at points so far removed from each other, provides for very effectually resisting the tortional strain" (caused by operating the crank.) Language could hardly be plainer to indicate that the swivel is deemed an important part of the contrivance. It is also obvious, from the whole mechanism of the clamping device, that the pivot is the controlling factor in the construction; and I am unable to see what equivalent could be employed in its place, without requiring a radical change in the entire device. Without the pivot there could be no swivel, and the vertical fingers could not be placed in the required position.

Turning to the application for the original patent, it is clear that Page considered the swivel as the important feature of his invention; for, he concludes his description by stating that "the advantage of this arrangement consists in the employment of a swivel or joint, which allows the clamping device to turn, and thus adapt itself perfectly to tubs of different sizes and forms." This terse statement of his idea is quite ingeniously diluted in the language of the reissue. In the original he summarizes his invention as one wherein "the advantage of his arrangement consists in the employment of a swivel," while, in the reissue he says: "This construction presents a swivel." In the first, the employment of the swivel is stated as the gist of the improvement. In the reissue the attempt is to present it as a secondary or cumulative advantage. I cannot resist the belief, in view of the decided difference between the claims in the original and the reissue, and of the changes in the description, that it was intended to import vagueness and generality into the reissue, to obscure somewhat the cardinal idea of the inventor. Enough, however, remains to show that the reissue describes the same invention as did the original, and that the swivel cannot be discarded, but must be regarded as one of the controlling elements in the combination.

Assuming that the patent covers a combination which is the proper subject of a patent, either because a new result is produced, or because the clamping device is new, the claim in question has not been infringed by the defendants' structure. In their structure, the wringer is clamped to the tub by two jaws attached by a spring connection, one to either standard, having a thumb-screw passing through either jaw and screwing into a piece of metal imbedded in either standard. The wringer may be set upon the edge of the tub, the jaws at the base of each standard being placed outside of the tub, and the standards upon the inside and opposite the jaws, and, by means of the thumb-screw, the jaws are moved towards the standard, thus firmly clamping the wringer upon the tub between the jaws and the standard. Quite evidently, this is a simpler and more convenient and less expensive device than the complainants'. The swivel is discarded, the curved bars which are useless without the pivot are discarded, and the standards are utilized to supply the place of four of the vertical fingers on the bars. The contrivance of the defendants is so far different from that of the complainants that it amounts to a substantive invention. This is quite conclusive against the theory of infringement. Indeed, it was substantially conceded, upon the argument, that, if the swivel should be held to be an essential part of the combination covered by the claim, the defendants' structure is not an infringement.

A decree is ordered for the defendants, dismissing the bill, with costs.

Case No. 9,509.

In re METZ et al.

[6 Ben. 571.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—RENT OF PREMISES AFTER ADJUDICATION—INJUNCTION—DISPOSSESSION.

The firm of M., B. & C. hired premises in New York City, at a rent of $7,500 per annum, payable monthly. On the 1st of May, 1872, they owed $1,875 for the rent, and the landlord commenced proceedings to dispossess them. On the 6th of May a petition in involuntary bankruptcy against M., B. & C. was filed, and an injunction was issued restraining the debtors and all other persons from interfering with the debtors' property, which was served on the landlord. A warrant of dispossession was issued in those proceedings, but was not executed, and on the 20th of May a formal injunction was served on the landlord, ordering him to refrain from any interference with the property of the bankrupts, except to preserve the same. The marshal, on May 6th, took possession, under the warrant, of the bankrupts' stock of goods, on the premises in question. On May 22d, 1872, the landlord applied to the bankruptcy court for a modification of the injunction, so as to allow of the execution of the warrant of dispossession. The application was denied. No application was made to the court to order the removal of the goods from the premises, but the marshal was applied to to give up the premises, and also to pay rent, but he refused to do either. He remained in possession of the premises till December 13th, 1872. The landlord now applied to be paid rent of the premises at the rate of $7,500 for the whole period, stating that he had had an offer of that sum for the premises, for the unexpired term of the lease, and that the premises were worth that sum: Held, that the landlord was not entitled to claim rent at the rate of $7,500 for the period, but was entitled to a reasonable compensation for the use and occupation of the premises.

[In the matter of Joseph Metz and others, bankrupts.]

J. J. Marrin, for applicants.

W. F. Scott, for assignee.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On the 26th of December, 1871, the firm of Bailey & Debevoise leased to the bankrupts, who composed the firm of Metz, Brothers & Cleve, for the term of three years and one month from the 1st of January, 1872, for the yearly rent of $7,500, payable monthly, not in advance, the store and basement of the building numbers 353 and 355 Canal street, in the city of New York. Metz, Brothers & Cleve made only one of the monthly payments, and, on the 1st of May, 1872, owed the lessors, for rent, $1,875, which remains unpaid. Prior to May 6th, 1872, Bailey & Debevoise instituted proceedings, in a local court, to dispossess the bankrupts for the non-payment of such rent. On the 6th of May, 1872, a petition in involuntary bankruptcy was filed in this court against the bankrupts, and an order to show cause was on the same day issued thereon, returnable May 18th, 1872. This order contained a clause of injunction restraining the debtors and all other persons from disposing of the debtors' property and interfering therewith until the further order of the court. A copy of this order was served on Bailey & Debevoise, on the 17th of May, 1872. Prior to the 20th of May, 1872, a warrant had been issued, in the dispossession proceedings, to the proper officer, directing him to remove the bankrupts from the premises in question, but such warrant was not executed. On the 20th of May a formal injunction, issued by this court, and bearing date the 18th of May, and addressed to the debtors and to Bailey & Debevoise, and commanding them to refrain, until the further order of the court, from making any transfer or disposition of any of the property of the debtors, and from any interference therewith, except to preserve the same, was served on Bailey & Debevoise. The debtors had appeared on the return day of the order to show cause, and the matter was adjourned for a week.

Simultaneously with the issuing of the order to show cause, a provisional warrant was issued by the court to the marshal, under section 40, under which he, on the 6th of May, 1872, took possession of the stock of goods of the debtors, which was in and on the premises in question. He did not remove such stock of goods, but left it there.

On the 22d of May, 1872, Bailey & Debevoise presented a petition to this court, setting forth the lease and its terms, the indebtedness of $1,875 for rent, the institution of the dispossession proceedings, the issuing of the warrant therein for the removal of the debtors from the premises, the institution of the bankruptcy proceedings, the issuing and the service, on Bailey & Debevoise, of the order of May 6th, 1872, containing the injunction clause before mentioned, and the service of the formal injunction, on the 20th of May. The prayer of such petition was, that the injunctions might be so modified or altered, that Bailey & Debevoise might be allowed to execute and enforce such warrant of removal. On this petition an order was asked that the petitioning creditor show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted.

Such petition of Bailey & Debevoise did not set forth that it was possible to remove the stock of goods from the premises, so as to give the enjoyment of the possession of the premises to Bailey & Debevoise, without injury to the stock of goods, nor did it ask this court to direct the marshal to remove the goods from the premises, with a view to allowing Bailey & Debevoise to obtain possession of the premises under the dispossession proceedings. The order and the injunction of this court in no manner restrained Bailey & Debevoise from executing the warrant of removal, except in so far as it restrained them from interfering with the property of the debtors. The removal of the goods, then in the custody of the marshal, on the premises, was necessary to the full enjoyment of the possession and use of the premises by Bailey & Debevoise. The occupation of the premises by the marshal was the occupation of them by this court. The debtors were not in the actual occupation of the premises, although, as between them and the lessors, having the technical legal possession of the premises. The prayer of the petition of Bailey & Debevoise was, that the injunction, which did not, in this regard, affect Bailey & Debevoise, except as it restrained them from interfering with the property of the debtors, might be so modified that they might execute such warrant of removal. This was, in effect, asking that they might interfere with the property of the debtors, in executing such warrant of removal, and might themselves, by means of such warrant, remove such goods from the premises. So far as a formal, technical removal of the debtors from the premises, personally, and as tenants in actual occupation under the lease, was to be effected by the execution of such warrant of removal, the injunction did not need to be modified. It needed to be modified only for the purpose of dispossessing the marshal and removing the stock of goods from the premises, so as to give back the actual use and occupation of the premises to Bailey & Debevoise. In this view, no sufficient reason was shown for modifying the injunction, as no sufficient reason was shown for directing the marshal to remove the goods and vacate the premises. Therefore, this court declined even to grant the order requiring the petitioning creditor to show cause, that was asked for on the petition of Bailey & Debevoise.

A landlord who lets premises to a tenant to be occupied for purposes of trade, must be held to do so with the full understanding that the tenant may be proceeded against in bankruptcy, and that the bankrupt court may be called upon to take possession of the goods of the tenant on the premises. In many cases, it will be impossible to remove the goods before a sale of them, without great loss and injury. In other cases, it will be impossible, because unjust to the debtor, to sell them before adjudication, and the adjudication may be delayed. Therefore, merely setting forth such facts as Bailey & Debevoise set forth in their petition, furnished no ground for directing the marshal to remove the goods and leave the premises.

The debtors were adjudicated bankrupts on the 7th of August, 1872. An assignee of their estate was appointed on the 23d of December, 1872. The goods remained on the premises, in the custody of the marshal, and the marshal remained in occupation of the premises, in custody of the goods, until the 13th of December, 1872, at which time Bailey & Debevoise obtained possession of the premises. Prior to that time they made to this court only the one application before mentioned. They now apply to be paid, out of the assets of the estate, the sum of $4,520.81, as rent of the premises from the 6th of May, 1872, to the 13th of December, 1872, at the rate specified in the lease, $7,500 per annum.

Bailey & Debevoise show that while the marshal was in possession they applied to him to give up the possession to them, and also applied to him for rent, but that he did not comply with either request. But they made no application to this court after the adjudication. They also now state that while the marshal was in occupation they received an offer for the hiring of the premises for the remainder of the term under the lease to the bankrupts, at the rent of $7,500 per annum, and that that was a fair and proper rent for the premises. But they never made known to the court their ability to rent the premises for that sum, or laid before the court such a state of facts as would have enabled the court to determine with propriety, in advance, that rent at that rate ought to be paid in preference to removing the goods elsewhere. Nor do they now show that it was necessary for the goods to remain on the premises, at such an expensive rent. Certainly, there is nothing to warrant the presumption that the court would have sanctioned, in advance, so large a rent.

Before adjudication, the debtors were entitled to be heard on the question of removing their goods from the premises, or of selling them on the premises, with a view to giving up the premises. And it may very well be that an application made to this court in May, 1872, to direct the marshal to remove the goods from the premises, or to sell them on the premises, made on notice to the debtors, as well as to the petitioning creditor, would have been granted, if it had appeared that the alternative would have been the rent now asked, or, if denied, would have been denied on the full understanding that the sum to be paid for the occupation of the premises by the marshal, was to be at the rate of $7,500 per annum. Bailey & Debevoise were themselves general creditors for their $1,875 of unpaid rent, and in a position to make such an application.

But, most clearly, after the adjudication, it was the duty of Bailey & Debevoise to have asked the court to sanction the rate of rent they now ask, or to give up the premises. It was not enough for them to ask possession or rent from the marshal. He was the officer of the court, acting under the warrant. It cannot be presumed, and there is nothing to show, that, if a proper application had been made to the court, the court would not, at an earlier day, have ordered the marshal to remove the goods and leave the premises. The application that was made, was made four days after the return day of the order to show cause, the hearing on such order having been making out a case for the action of the court adjourned for a week, and fell far short of to remove the marshal and the goods; and the making of such application can carry with it no implication of any right in the applicants thereafter to receive rent at the rate of $7,500 per annum, so long as the marshal should remain on the premises.

But, the applicants are entitled to receive a reasonable compensation for the use and occupation of the premises, based upon the considerations hereinbefore set forth, and any others properly bearing on the question. The assignee is directed to make a formal answer to the petition, setting forth such facts and positions as he may deem proper for the protection of the estate, and the matter may then be brought before the court, on notice, for further action.

BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE—RIGHTS AND DUTIES—PREFERRED MORTGAGEE.

The assignee in bankruptcy represents the whole body of creditors, and it is his right and duty to contest the validity of any mortgage by which one creditor has obtained a preference over another.

[Cited in Potter v. Coggeshall, Case No. 11,322.]

[Approved in Southard v. Benner, 72 N. Y. 428.]

In this case [Jacob] Metzger had been adjudicated a bankrupt upon the petition of his creditors. The assignee, upon his appointment, took possession of a stock of goods upon which Abernethy & Co. claimed to hold a chattel mortgage, executed prior to the filing of the petition. An order was granted that the sale of the goods by the assignee should not prejudice the right of these mortgagees; but that they should have the same lien upon the fund as upon the goods themselves. Subsequently Abernethy & Co. filed their petition, setting forth their mortgage, and praying that the assignee might be ordered to satisfy the same out of the funds in his hands. The assignee filed his answer to this petition, setting up that the mortgage was fraudulent and void as to the creditors. The case was tried, and the invalidity of the mortgage as to creditors, under the decisions of the court of appeals of this state, was fully proven. Upon the argument of the case, however, the counsel for Abernethy & Co. claimed that this defence could not be set up by the assignee in bankruptcy, as he succeeded only to the rights which the bankrupt had, and that, as between the bankrupt and Abernethy & Co., the mortgage was valid. Further, that none but judgment creditors could contest the validity of the mortgage, and that the assignee did not stand in that position. The counsel for the assignee argued that in bankruptcy the assignee succeeded as well to the rights of the creditors as the bankrupt: that he was entitled to maintain the void character of this mortgage; that if this were not so bankrupts might prefer creditors with impunity, and dispose of their property to pretended creditors; that the rule "regarding judgment creditors only being entitled to contest the mortgage" did not apply to bankruptcy proceedings, for they took the place of judgments, and creditors were prohibited from prosecuting to judgment their claims.

HALL, District Judge. The position assumed by the assignee was the proper one; he represented the whole body of creditors, and it was his right and duty to contest the validity of any mortgage by which one creditor had obtained a preference over the others, the whole object of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] being to compel an equal distribution of the failing debtor's property among all his creditors.

EXTRADITION—HOW EFFECTUATED — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENT TO JUSTIFY TRIAL—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—EXTRATERRITORIAL OFFENSES — TREATIES—BASIS OF EXAMINATION OF FUGITIVE.

[1. The extradition of a fugitive from justice of a foreign country can only be effectuated through the agency of the tribunals of justice, whose province it is to determine the existence of reasonable cause for the charge of crime, and, if there be sufficient evidence, to justify putting the accused upon his trial.]

[2. All federal courts inferior to the supreme court receive their creation and allotment of jurisdiction from congress, and can exercise only such as is confided by law; but, after jurisdiction is designated, the court will take cognizance of all matters which fall within the scope of its powers, without special appointment of law.]

[3. Transactions declared by law to be offenses occurring in foreign territories, on the high seas or elsewhere, are within the jurisdiction of the circuit and district courts under the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73) and its kindred statutes, and such courts must receive complaints, take evidence, issue warrants, and apprehend and commit a person accused of such offenses, without further authorization for so doing than their general capacity to take cognizance of crimes.]

[4. The provisions in a treaty addressed to the judicial power become a rule of law of themselves, and are carried into execution by the courts, without other direction or authority.]

[5. A treaty, when addressed to the judicial power, being of equal force with an act of congress, the provisions of the treaty with France of November 9, 1843, for extradition of fugitives from justice requiring the investigation of charges of crime, and the arrest and imprisonment of the accused as for trial, are binding on the courts.]

[6. Testimony of a vice consul that he has received official information from his government that an alleged fugitive from justice stands charged with the crime of forgery, and also of a person that he was defrauded by the accused, whom he pursued through several countries to the United States, together with verified depositions on regular proceedings before the judge of instruction regularly certified by the inferior officers, and also under the great seal of the minister of foreign relations, are sufficient to support a charge of crime, and justify apprehending the accused and detaining him for trial.]

[7. The questions whether the United States government is bound by a treaty compact to deliver up an alleged fugitive from justice apprehended and detained by a federal court for trial, for offenses committed by him in the foreign country, not crimes by our laws, whether he is within the description of persons named in the treaty as subject to extradition, when the treaty went into operation and became obligatory, and whether the obligations assumed by the treaty will be fulfilled, are addressed to the political, and not the judicial, department.]

[8. The laws of France, and not those of the United States, form the basis for the inquiry as to whether an extraditable offense has been committed under the treaty of November 9, 1843, providing that the laws of the place of refuge are to be applied to the investigation as "if the crimes had been committed" where the arrest was made.]

[9. A person against whom a complaint has been made and accepted before a judge of instruction in France is a person accused, within the meaning of the treaty of extradition, although no indictment has been found against him.]

[10. A treaty will take effect from its date, irrespective of its ratification, unless a different period is fixed by the contracting parties, or must be adopted in order to fulfill their manifest intention.]

[On warrant for the apprehension of Nicholas Lucien Metzger, an alleged fugitive from justice.]

BETTS, District Judge. The United States attorney for this district, under instructions from the secretary of state, and by direction of the president, appeared before me, and prayed judicial action on a requisition made on the president, through the medium of the diplomatic agents of the French government. The requisition demands, pursuant to the treaty of November 9, 1843, between the two governments, that Nicholas Lucien Metzger be delivered up to justice, he being charged with having committed the crime of forgery in France, and having since sought an asylum in the United States, and being now found within the Southern district of New York. The same application had been previously made to a magistrate of the state of New York, and his order directing the apprehension and commitment of Metzger was subsequently set aside by the circuit judge, and the prisoner was discharged from the arrest, on habeas corpus, upon the ground that the judicial authorities of the state of New York have no jurisdiction in the case. I granted a warrant for his apprehension, and he was brought before me by the marshal, accompanied by Messrs. Hoffman & Blunt, his counsel. Mr. Butler, the United States attorney, appeared in behalf of the United States, and Messrs. Cutting & Tillou in support of the requisition on the part of the French government. The counsel for Metzger took exception to the competency of a judge of the United States to grant a warrant of arrest, and also to the adequacy of the evidence produced, to justify the commitment of the accused. The discussions of the various topics brought in review have been marked with great learning and ability, and were prolonged, several adjournments intervening from the 10th to the 28th of December. The counsel on both sides supported their arguments by numerous citations of treatises on international law; treaty compacts between the United States and foreign powers, and those between foreign powers alone; diplomatic correspondences; executive and legislative documents and debates; the municipal laws of France and their explications; the laws of the United States and of the state of New York; and the decisions of the United States courts, and courts of the respective states, and of England. It being admitted on both sides that Metzger is now in confinement in this district on civil process, and must remain in detention for a considerable period, irrespective of the disposition to be made of this application, I have not deemed it expedient to defer other public business pressing urgently on my time, in order to give this case more immediate dispatch. Having examined carefully the authorities referred to by counsel, and weighed the reasonings submitted to me, I avail myself of the earliest opportunity to state the result of my reflections upon the subject.

The question lying at the foundation of all others, and naturally first to be considered, touches the jurisdiction of the United States judiciary over the subject-matter. A treaty under the constitution of the United States may have a double aspect and operation: First, that accompanying it as a compact between sovereign powers and governed by the law of nations; and, secondly, one equivalent to an act of the legislature, our constitution declaring a treaty to be the law of the land. Article 6. In the latter case it operates of itself, without the aid of any legislative provision; but in the former the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the courts. Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 314. To determine the operation of this convention, it must be ascertained whether it imports the necessity of judicial aid to carry it into execution, and whether it communicates that degree of authority which enables the judges of the United States, as individual magistrates, to take cognizance of it. Without inquiring into the polity of France, and the probable operation of the treaty in this respect within her dominions, it is manifest that the provision demanding the apprehension and commitment of persons charged with crimes cannot be carried into effect in this country, but by aid of judicial authority. Not only in the distribution of the powers of our government does it appertain to that branch to receive evidence and determine upon its sufficiency to arrest and commit for criminal offences, but the prohibition in the constitution against issuing a warrant to seize any person except on probable cause first proved necessarily imports that issuing such warrant is a judicial act. [Ex parte Burford] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 448; Amend. Const. art. 3. It is believed this doctrine is firmly established in the jurisprudence of this country and England, in respect to the surrender of fugitives from justice, whether the obligation to surrender is deduced from the law of nations, or is recognized only when expressly stipulated by treaty. In every authority I have consulted, it seems to be regarded as an elementary principle that the extradition is to be effectuated through the agency of the tribunals of justice whose province it is to determine the existence of reasonable cause for the charge of crime, and if there be sufficient evidence to justify putting the accused upon his trial. 1 Kent, Comm. 37; Story, Confl. Law, 627, and note; 1 Am. Jur. 297; 4 Johns. Ch. 106; [Holmes v. Jennison] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 540; U. S. v. Davis [Case No. 14,932]; Ex parte Dos Santos [Id. 4,016]; Basset's Case, 1 New Sess. Cas. (Eng.) 33.

"Jay's Treaty," as it is usually termed, the treaty with England of Nov. 19, 1794, introduced the same stipulation in regard to the surrender of fugitives from justice, that is adopted in the treaty. The attention of the executive, judicial and legislative departments of government were early aroused to a most excited attention to the effect and operation of the provision, and to the appropriate method of carrying it into execution. The British authorities demanded the surrender of a seaman, Robbins, on a charge of murder, committed by him at sea, on board an English man-of-war. The president invoked the interposition of the United States judge of South Carolina, to examine the evidence and to take order for the arrest of the accused. He was apprehended and committed upon the warrant of the judge, and thereupon delivered over by the president to the English government. Soult v. L'Africaine [Case No. 13,179]; 1 Hall, Jour. Jur. 13–27. The subject was brought before congress the succeeding session, and the functions of the executive and judicial departments were most thoroughly examined and discussed, by men of the highest name in the juridical annals of the country. 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] Append. 19; U. S. Gaz. 1800. In looking over the report of the proceedings before the United States judge, and the debates in congress, so far as they are preserved in the papers of the day, I do not find the suggestion made, that the apprehension and commitment by the judge, were not by competent authority. The great struggle by counsel before the court, and in the debates in congress, was to maintain that the offence charged in that case was triable under our laws, and in this country, and if not, that it belonged to the judiciary and not to the executive, to decide whether the casus foederis existed, and if the accused was subject to extradition. These views were maintained by Mr. Nicholas, Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Livingston and others, and combatted by Mr. Marshall, Mr. Dana, Mr. Otis, Mr. Harper, Mr. Bayard and others. The house, after a prolonged discussion, by a vote of 65 to 39, affirmed the correctness of the procedure in the case, and I do not meet with an instance since that period in which the justness of the decision has been called in question. I am satisfied that such also is the sound exposition of the corresponding provision in this treaty, and that the government can only fulfil its engagement in this respect, by the instrumentality of the judicial tribunals.

Whether the judiciary can act in the matter without direction, or express authorization by act of congress, is the next question in order, and that on which there would seem to be more difficulty and more ground for doubt. But I am persuaded the question is susceptible of a satisfactory solution. The judicial power of the United States extends to all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made under its authority. Const. art. 3, § 2; [Chisholm v. Georgia] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 475. A case arises under the constitution or a treaty, when the subject-matter in contestation is controlled by either, or the correct decision of it depends on their construction. 3 Story, Const. Law, 1640, 1642; [Osborne v. Bank of U. S.] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 819; [Holmes v. Jennison] 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 540. But although a subject comes within the scope of the powers of the judiciary, and is properly referable to their authority, still it is cardinal principle of our jurisprudence that no subordinate court or magistrate can take cognizance of it, without express authorization by law. The supreme court, being created by the constitution, may derive jurisdiction directly from its authority, and may probably, without the aid of legislation, supply the law of procedure necessary to the exercise of such jurisdiction. [Chisholm v. Georgia] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 419; [Rhode Island v. Massachusetts] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 657. But all tribunals inferior to the supreme court receive their creation and allotment of jurisdiction from congress, and can exercise no other than such as is confided to them by law. The constitution and law must accordingly concur in conferring jurisdiction, in order to put in action in those courts the powers imparted to the judicial department. Ex parte Cabrera [Case No. 2,278]; U. S. v. Nine Packages of Linen [Id. 15,884]; Livingston v. Jefferson [Id. 8,411]; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; [American & Ocean Ins. Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 545; [U. S. v. Coombs] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72. The further general principle is equally settled, that after a court is established and its jurisdiction designated, it takes cognizance of all matters then existing, or afterwards arising, which fall within the scope of its powers, without those particulars being assigned to it by special appointment of law. This is so in respect to cases of common-law and admiralty jurisdiction. Burke v. Trevitt [Case No. 2,163]; The Abby [Id. 14]; Picquet v. Swan [Id. 11,134]; Davis v. New Brig [Id. 3,643]; [Glass v. The Betsey] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 6; [Penhallow v. Doane] Id. 54; [Bank of U. S. v. Planters' Bank] 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 931; [Postmaster General v. Early] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 136; [Kendall v. U. S.] Id. 527. And the like doctrine is applicable to cases of criminal jurisdiction. U. S. v. Coolidge [Case No. 14,857]; [U. S. v. Hudson] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; [U. S. v. Bevans] 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336; [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; [Jones v. Shore] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S. 467. The judiciary act of September 24, 1789, and subsequent statutes organizing the courts of the United States, and distributing amongst them, the subjects over which their jurisdiction may be exercised, allot to the circuit and district courts cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States; and accordingly, transactions declared by law to be offences occurring in foreign territories, on the high seas, or elsewhere, fall necessarily within the criminal jurisdiction of those courts. They must receive complaints, take evidence, issue warrants, apprehend and commit persons accused of such offences, without further authorization for so doing, than their general capacity to take cognizance of crimes.

The inquiry to be answered, then, is whether the provisions of this convention create a case upon which that criminal jurisdiction attaches. The authorities quoted have relation generally to legislative enactments as necessary to enable the tribunals to exercise their jurisdiction; yet it is manifest that the aim of the courts in these cases was to determine the extent of the inherent powers of the judicial department,—how far they can exercise powers derived directly from the constitution, without other authorization by law, and reference was had to laws enacted by congress, because in the cases under adjudication there was no other source from which the law required could emanate. Treaties are placed by the constitution in the same rank with acts of congress, and even with the constitution itself, for by the sixth article it is declared that "this constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." It has been repeatedly decided by the supreme court that under this provision of the constitution, a treaty becomes equivalent to a law of congress, and where its stipulations apply, they must be observed and enforced by the court, in adjudging as well upon individual rights as those of the nation. [U. S. v. The Peggy] 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 109, 110; [Foster v. Neilson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 314. A great distinction exists between the effect and operation of treaties under our constitution, and that given them in England. 3 Story, Const. Law, 1515. In that country a treaty is regarded only as a contract addressed to the political power and an act of parliament is required to give it effect infra-territorially. 1 New Sess. Cas. [Eng.] 33. But in the United States the provisions in a treaty addressed to the judicial power become a rule of law of themselves, and are carried into execution by that department without other direction or authority. [Foster v. Neilson] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 314. The engagements of this treaty are accordingly to be accepted by the courts the same as if they were incorporated in a statute, and it is not supposed that a reasonable doubt could be entertained, if a law of congress had directed the president to deliver up fugitives from justice, provided the fact of the commission of the crimes charged against them shall be so established as that the laws of the court would justify their apprehension and commitment for trial "if the crimes had been here committed," but that it must appertain to the judicial tribunals to ascertain such fact, not but that the authority so to do resulted from their organization and appointment to take jurisdiction of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States. It by no means is a necessary ingredient to the jurisdiction that the court or magistrate should have power to punish as well as arrest for the crime. Under the general authority, judges and magistrates take cognizance of offences charged upon a person; and if it appears that the crime was committed, or is properly triable in a different district, they remit the prisoner out of the jurisdiction of the arresting tribunals, to that within which the offence was committed. 1 Story's Laws, p. 66, § 33. Those compacts in the treaty so much dwelt upon in the arguments, as being in their nature merely executive acts, or engagements to perform future acts, are within the ordinary acceptation of the national contracts, and operate only upon the political power of the country. Contracts of that description cannot be always performed without the aid of legislation, either in this country or France. But the treaty also embraces the further provision, requiring the investigation of charges of crime, and the arrest and imprisonment of the accused as for trial; and in that respect, in this country, it drops the character of a contract merely, and assumes that of a municipal law addressed to the civil magistrates. The like provision in Jay's treaty was so accepted and acted upon. A judge of the United States took cognizance of the matter under authority of the treaty law alone. Soult v. L'Africaine [Case No. 13,179]; 1 Hall, Jour. Jur. 13; 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] Append. 19. And no where, in the severe scrutiny the subject underwent, does it appear an objection was raised to the competency of the judge to arrest and commit by virtue of that law. Review of Proceedings by Marshall (afterwards Chief Justice), 1 Hall, Jour. Jur. 27. So other eminent judges have recognized a treaty as supplying all the law necessary to compel them to interfere and cause the apprehension of fugitives from justice. U. S. v. Davis and Ex parte Dos Santos [supra]. Without pursuing the argument further, I feel prepared upon these principles and authorities to declare that the duty devolves on me, under the authority of this treaty as a law of the land, to take cognizance of the requisition and charge laid before me.

The only remaining topic involved in the case of a strictly judicial character relates to the sufficiency of the evidence produced against the accused to authorize his apprehension and commitment. The evidence relied upon in support of the requisition consists in official documents transmitted from the keeper of the seal, minister of justice, in France, through the minister for foreign affairs, to the French minister in the United States, and by him delivered to the vice consul of France in this city, to be produced before the proper tribunal here. The oral testimony of two or three witnesses was also taken before me, auxiliary or supplementary to the documentary proofs. The counsel for the accused ground themselves, with strong assurances, upon objections to the competency of the documentary proofs, for the want of proper authentication, and because not originally taken in due form of law; and to the inadequacy of the oral evidence to justify his apprehension. It would prolong this opinion to an unusual extent to take up and consider consecutively the positions maintained upon these topics. I shall limit myself to stating general results, with the leading considerations tending to support them, and not attempt to discuss the particular points with fullness.

It will be proper first to notice the rules which in our law describe or fix the character or kind of evidence necessary on such preliminary proceeding, and the degree or amount of evidence required to support a charge of crime, and justify the apprehension of the accused and his detention for trial. Under our system of jurisprudence, no testimony is received on the trial of a criminal charge, unless delivered on oath, in presence of the accused; but a complaint or charge of crime may be made ex parte on affidavit, and one magistrate may act on depositions made before another, within or out of the jurisdiction of the examining magistrate, to issue his warrant of arrest, and commit the accused for trial. [Ex parte Bollman] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 129; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 36, 37, note; 1 Burr's Trial, 12, 16. Nor need the evidence approach that full proof necessary to justify a conviction. The constitution requires no more than that probable cause be shown, to authorize an arrest (Amend. 6); and probable cause is deduced from a state of facts and circumstances, which afford reasonable grounds of suspicion of guilt (1 Burr's Trial, 11, 14, 16; [Ex parte Bollman] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 129; Barb. Cr. Law, 455, 492, 496; 4 Blau [by Chitty] 235). Dalton holds that a magistrate must commit when there is good ground for suspicion. Dalt. Ch. 166. Whether further proof must not be given to justify an indictment may be an unsettled question (Whart. Cr. Law, 125); but that does not arise for investigation in this state of the case. The testimony of the witnesses on deposition or orally before me might well authorize detaining the accused to give opportunity for additional proof, if not deemed sufficient to justify his absolute commitment for trial. 1 Burr's Trial, 16. The vice consul of France, Mr.

Borg, testifies that he has received official information from his government, that the accused stands charged with the crime of forgery of authentic deeds and instruments, committed by him in France in numerous cases in his capacity of royal notary, and also with forging of commercial and bank paper since November 9, 1843, and that he fled from justice of that country, and has taken refuge in this; and the witness has reason to believe and does believe such to be the facts. Mr. Karst proves his personal acquaintance with the accused at Sarreguemines in France, for many years, where the witness knew him, acting in the official character of a royal notary. Witness was defrauded by him in a transaction as notary of 20,000 francs. The accused absconded from France in February, 1844; and witness pursued him through Belgium, Prussia, and England to the United States. The accused traveled under a feigned name. He left a wife and child residing in France, and was charged with various crimes at the time he privately left there. Evidence creating a strong suspicion that a felony has been committed, and that it was perpetrated by a particular person, will warrant his apprehension without direct proof of the corpus delicti. 1 Burr's Trial. The report of the trial of Col. Burr, before Chief Justice Marshall, is referred to the more frequently for principles governing incipient proceedings in commercial cases because the questions were discussed by eminent counsel, and that distinguished judge gave every point a careful consideration, delivering his opinion upon them in writing.

Admitting the proofs of this class to be inadequate to justify the detention of the accused, I think the documentary evidence furnished by the French government is legally admissible. The counsel for the accused have reasoned this point on the assumption that the statute law of the state of New York supplies the rule of decision which the court must observe in this respect, under the direction of the judiciary act (section 34), and that these proofs are not authenticated conformably to the requirements of that law. Chief Justice Marshall decided that the section has no relation to criminal cases (1 Burr's Trial); and indeed it is a settled doctrine that the state laws do not ex proprio vigore affect the procedure of the United States courts, in any description of actions. [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1; [Bank of U. S. v. Halstead] Id. 51; [Beers v. Haughton] 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 329; [Duncan v. Darst] 1 How. [42 U. S.] 304; [Bronson v. Kinzie] Id. 323. It is not controverted but that the evidence might be so taken in France, pursuant to the laws of that country, as to be admissible in our judicatories to support charges of crime preferred under the treaty. Nor do I understand the objection raises any question touching the regularity of the proceedings, in the present case, before the juge d'instruction. His authority is clearly stated in the Code, and the method of procedure there indicated appears to have been carefully observed. Code D'Inst. Cr. arts. 70, 71, 76, par Rogron. The depositions were signed by the witness, the judge, and clerk at the same time, and the most commendable caution was exercised in making their contents clearly known to each witness, before they were completed. These documents are furnished pursuant to instructions of the secretary of state of the United States, to the French minister, on the 4th of December, 1844; and, unless the rule of law is imperatively so, they ought not to be subjected to a complete conformity with our usages, or those familiar to the common law, in all the formalities of authentication. All that can be reasonably exacted is that the documents offered as evidence on this preliminary inquiry shall be clothed with all substantial proof of verity. It is proper first to notice the method of verification adopted, and then consider its legal effect. The documents consist of the original mandat d'arret, issued against the accused by the judge of instruction, under the seal of the "cour civil d'instruction of Sarreguemines," and subscribed by him; and of copies of the depositions heard "dans la procédure instruite." The Procureur du Roi, for the department of Sarreguemines, made a requisition under his hand and official seal on the Greffier of the tribunal, to deliver a copy of the depositions taken in the matter, "certifiée conforme par lui." Dupin, the Greffier, adds to the depositions "pour copie conforme" delivered at the request of the Procureur du Roi, to which he subscribes his name, and affixes the seal of the tribunal. The chief of the bureau of the minister of justice and keeper of the seals, Laudy, certifies to the act of the Procureur du Roi, and of the Greffier "vu pour legalisation," of their respective signatures, and subscribes his name and affixes the seal of the bureau. The chief of the Chancellerié, De Lamarre, under the seal of the ministry of foreign affairs, and by authorization of the minister, certifies in the same form, to the signature of Laudy. Mr. Borg and Mr. Bartholemy (formerly an advocate in France), both examined before me, testify that the seals and certificates attached to these papers are the regular and accustomed methods of authenticating like documents in France, and that the seal of the ministry of foreign relations is the highest seal employed in France for these purposes. The French law books also speak of it as the great seal, and that it verifies public acts, &c., but distinguishes as le petit scel that which is affixed to judicial acts emanating from the royal jurisdictions. Dict. du Droit; Doinisart, Merl. Repert, voce, sceau, scel.

A procédure instruite before a tribunal in France has more the character and formalities of a trial than the proceedings under our laws before a magistrate on a charge of crime. The proceedings before a judge of instruction are to be enregistered, which is copying or transcribing them on the minutes of the court. 10 Merl. Repert, 347, et suie. Whenever an expedition or copy is required by the proper authority (Code, par Baequar, p. 707, art. 7), une copie conforme is a copy collated or compared with the original, by the Greffier, and has all the characteristics of an exemplification from the record under our laws (Dict. de Droit; 4 Merl. Repert, 442, 443, arts. 1, 2; 6 Merl. Repert, 440, 443, Acts, v. 1, 4), and the certificate of the Greffier to that effect imports all that is demanded here to authenticate an exemplification of a record. So also the concise certificate of the keeper of the seals is equivalent to our expanded formulas. "Vu pour legalisation" signifies that the high functionary charged with that service has inspected the certificates, and found them legal in form and substance, containing every requisite to give them full credit and validity. Legalisation, c'est l'attestation que donne un officier public de la verité des signatures apposées à un acte, ainsi que des qualités des ceux qui l'ont fait et recu, afin qu'on y ajoute foi dans un autre pays. 16 Merl. Repert, p. 403; 3 Denisart, Coll. Jur. p. 85. A greater amplitude of phrascology would not have expressed with more distinctness, and certainly all the essential parts demanded of our law in such verification, and I am not aware that any set form of words is necessary in any system of jurisprudence. The fixed meaning of the phrase "vu pour legalisation" in the French jurisprudence gives to an authentication so made by the keeper of the seals all the weight of verification which can be attached to the acts of that high functionary. I hold then that these documents exhibit satisfactory evidence that the depositions were taken by the judge named therein in due form of law, and that he had competent authority to take them, and that exact and full copies are furnished from the appropriate court or minutes by a proper officer. And upon the strict rules of evidence obtaining in our courts, they are sufficiently authenticated to be received as evidence here. [Church v. Hubbart] 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 187, 238; Wood v. Pleasants [Case No. 17,961]; 3 Cowen & Hill's Notes to Philips' Ev. 1123.

These facts are clearly proved by this evidence: That the accused was charged or "inculpé" with commission of forgery in France, in the exercise of his functions as notary, and in drawing up and executing acts or instruments appertaining to his ministry or official trust, and with forgery of commercial and bank paper, and with having made use of forged acts or instruments. The facts proved against the accused in support of these charges are that in repeated instances after the 9th of November, 1843, he prepared and had completed in his capacity of notary authentic deeds, by which various individuals pledged and hypothecated their property to secure alleged loans of money, and that the deeds declared the sums loaned and secured were at the time of making the deeds actually paid over in specie to the borrowers, and that two witnesses were then present, and signed the instruments or authentic deed, and that those declarations are false. It appears that by the laws of France these notarial acts become entitled to registry, and have similar force and effect with records of common law courts. Their verity cannot be impeached except for forgery. Baeque, Codes des Officiers Ministerials, p. 864, art. 19. Accordingly, the Code Penal denounces a falsification of these acts by notaries a forgery or faux, and subjects the guilty officer to infamous punishment (Code Penal, arts. 145–147), and also for making use of the forged acts or deed (article 148). The court of cassation, in exposition of the law, decided that a false declaration of the presence of two witnesses, on the execution of such notarial acts, is a forgery within the terms of article 146, as "constatant comme viais des faits faux." Explication de Code Penal, par Rojeor, p. 57. Official, notarial acts, being by the French system, the common mode of authenticating conveyances, devises and contracts of every description, the conduct of French officers would appropriately be brought under the severest supervision of the law. Notaries are officers of high dignity and confidence, appointed for life, and charged with the most delicate and important functions in respect to individuals and the public. They have always been as well antecedent to the compilation of the Codes, as since, subject to criminal prosecution for malversation in office. 3 Denisart, Coll. Jur. 434, 457; 21 Merl. Repert, 320-367. And it is therefore no way surprising that the transactions which under our Code might be only a misdemeanor, or malfeasance, rendering the officer liable to a civil action, should in France be visited with all the consequences of an infamous crime. I have accordingly no hesitation in declaring that the evidence before me amounts to probable proof that Metzger committed in France the crime de faux named in the treaty, and would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial therefor, if under our laws these acts had been crimes if committed here.

The topics already disposed of embrace all those legitimately belonging to the judicial authorities, to investigate and determine. The other points debated on this hearing are of a diplomatic character, and it is the province of the president, at least in the first instance, to decide them at his discretion. Whether the government is bound by the treaty compact to deliver up the accused, for offences committed by him in France which are not crimes by our laws, whether he is within the description of persons named in the treaty as subject to extradition, whether the treaty went into operation and became obligatory from its date or only from its ratification, by assent of the senate or other period posterior to the date, and finally whether the obligations assumed by the treaty will be fulfilled or not, are considerations addressed to the political department of the government. Over these questions the judiciary has no immediate control or jurisdiction. The casus foederis of the treaty may be ever so manifest; yet, under the polity of our government, it in no way appertains to the judiciary to direct or contravene the action of the executive department in respect to it. The judicial authority can only be invoked incidentally and indirectly, to pass upon such provisions of a treaty; and it is only in that manner that acts of the president in execution of a treaty contract can be reviewed and adjudicated upon in courts of justice.

It seemed to be conceded in the Robins Case [Case No. 16,175] that a person under arrest for the purpose of being delivered up under the treaty with England, November 19, 1794, was entitled to the writ of habeas corpus, and the judgment of the proper tribunal whether the arrest was justified by law. That inquiry would probably also invoke the consideration of the competency of the executive authority to hold him in arrest, or deliver him over to be transported out of the United States. The English courts grant the writ in like cases (1 New Sess. Cas. 337); but, as already noticed, they proceed upon the principle that the extradition can only be made when authorized by act of parliament passed in execution of the treaty. If a writ of habeas corpus should be applied for in this case, the application must in the first instance, as the United States courts in this district are now constituted, be addressed to me; and, as the counsel on both sides have thoroughly examined every question connected with the subject, I deem it advisable now to pronounce my opinion, upon the entire case, that no other procedure may be taken with a view to any further action in the matter. I shall limit my attention to three propositions contended for in behalf of the accused by his counsel to be, if not clearly in his favor, yet that they place the authority of the executive over him, under the treaty, in so doubtful a light, as to entitle him to a discharge.

The first position is, that the true construction of the treaty in connection with the proviso to the first article is that a person is not subject to extradition unless the facts proved against him constitute in the country where he is arrested, one of the crimes in the treaty. In the present case I do not think sufficient evidence has been produced, to establish probable cause of suspicion that the crime of forgery defined by our laws has been committed by the accused. The exemption of the accused for this cause was urged with great confidence by his counsel, but the point does not impress my mind as resting upon a just exposition of the treaty, or demanding of me more than a brief statement of the reasons which prevent my acceding to that interpretation. The preamble expounds clearly the motives upon which the convention was founded. Each nation was desirous that malefactors should find no shelter in the territories of one, against punishment for crimes committed within the dominions of the other, and the high contracting parties manifest most unequivocally their intention to remove fugitives from their place of refuge in order to bring them within the operation of the laws they have violated. The purpose of each was to maintain the justice of their own country, and secure the sanctions of their laws within their respective dominions. To attain this object, the commission of the privilege is made mutual and reciprocal, each engaging to deliver to the justice of the other, persons who being accused of the crimes enumerated, committed within the jurisdiction of the requiring party, should seek an asylum or be found within the territories of the other. The terms employed in the treaty appear to me to carry out this purpose with a clearness and precision which scarcely admit of misconstruction. I should also infer that the proviso which is claimed to include the qualification urged in behalf of the prisoner was framed ex industria to avoid the construction sought to rest upon it. As in the body of it the observance of the laws of the place of refuge is exacted, in pursuing the apprehension and detention of the fugitive, it appears to have been thought expedient to mark by definite directions, that those laws were to furnish the method of procedure only, for it is declared that they shall be applied to the investigation abroad, as "if the crimes had been committed" where the arrest was made. The matter to be inquired into and adjudged obviously is, therefore, the fact of the commission of the crime charged, within the dominions of the party requiring the surrender of the fugitive; and accordingly the laws of France afford the basis of the inquiry in this case, and not those of the United States. If an ambiguity should be detected in the language used in these engagements, the fundamental doctrine applicable to all contracts would have its effect here, and the compact would be expounded according to the understanding and intent of the parties gathered from the whole convention; and their concurrent and subsequent acts in execution of it would be received as forcible presumptions of its true meaning. As already intimated, I am satisfied that the crime de faux, named in the treaty, was committed by Metzger in France; and he accordingly, in this respect, comes within the provisions of the treaty.

The further position taken for the prisoner that he does not come within the description of persons whose surrender the French government is entitled to claim under the treaty rests upon questions strictly technical, artificial, and verbal, and involves no principles of general jurisprudence. It is, in effect, a question of procedure or practice properly referable to the special laws or usages of the French tribunals and authorities. The terms of the treaty are "les individus accusés," "les individus qui accusés," "les individus qui seront accusés," etc., and shall be delivered up to justice; and the point raised upon these expressions is that, by the French law, only a party "en accüsation" is "accusée" in the acceptation of the term in the Penal Code, and in the usages of the tribunals: and that accordingly his surrender cannot be demanded by the French government, or made by ours, until proceedings in justice inculpating or criminating him have been so far pursued that he is "mis en accusation,"—equivalent in our law to indicted or arraigned. Such, it is proved by Mr. Bartholemy, is the understanding of the term by the bar and courts in France; that "inculpé" and "prévenu" designate persons against whom criminal charges or proceedings are instituted up to the period they are acted upon by the Chambre de Conseil, and an accusation is decreed by it, and then, and not before, they become "accusée." Code d'Inst. Cr. acts, 127, 128, 241, 465. There may exist in France, from positive appointment of law, or usage, in respect to the term "accusée," an import in the idiom of the tribunals, different from what it bears in the literature of the language, and which it may be difficult for a foreigner to apprehend. It is a fact of common occurrence in the arts and professions for words to be diverted from their signification recognized by the literature of the language and familiar to the ear, and to acquire one entirely arbitrary in that relation; and, with my limited means of knowing the technicalities of a foreign forum, I shall carefully abstain from pronouncing upon the just force of this term in that application. It may not, however, be improper to notice, that Rojrou (article 91, Code d'Inst. Cr. notes) remarks on the subject, that usually (en général) a person is said to be inculpé when under a charge which may compel him to appear before the juge d'instruction; and prévenu, when he has been already subject to like orders; and accusée when remitted to the court of assizes by a decree of accusation. It would thus seem that the distinction in the dialect of the courts amounts to little more than a convenient distribution of phrases, and it is not an appellation fixed determinably by law. The French jurists note a difference in the use of the word "accusée" as a participle and a substantive; and, previous to the compilation of the Codes, it was only in the latter application, l'accusée, that it imported the party was decreed en accusation, whilst in the former sense it embraced both inculpé and prévenu, and denoted an individual complained or informed against for, or charged with, the commission of a crime. 1 Denisart, 38, 41, Dict. de Droit. The distionaries de Trevoux, (en avorat), Descenieres (Avocat), Mand of Chamband, Boyer, and the Academy, all note the same distinction. Since the adoption of the Codes, the usage has been more uniform to limit the term "accusée" to persons in accusation or indicted. 1 Merl. Repert Jur. Dist. de Droit. These verbal disquisitions are, however, a most unsatisfactory method of determining the import of language employed in a treaty designed to adjust international interests of high importance and gravity. The meaning of words not necessarily technical or professional (like the description of crimes) will be sought for in the general scope of the instrument, and the intention of the high contracting parties directly expressed or evinced by concomitant and subsequent acts. It is most manifest that the controlling purpose of the engagements was to render the advantages of the great principle fixed by the contracting parties, mutual and reciprocal to the fullest extent. Whatever privilege one acquired, he yielded the same in return to the other. There can be no doubt upon the contract with us, that the United States has the right to demand of France the surrender of persons charged or complained against, according to the provisions of the treaty, without regard to the state of prosecution in this country, or whether any has been instituted or not. Presenting a complaint with evidence to support it is a charge or accusation according to our laws, and it may be as well made in the first instance, before the French tribunals, as our own. The words "charged," used in the preamble, and "accused," in articles 1 and 2, are of the same import in that connection. The word "accusée" is in both instances adopted by the contracting parties as the concurrent and equivalent expression in the French language, and the meaning intended to be applied to the language at the time, must prevail in the construction of treaties equally with other agreements. The French government now formally demands the surrender of Metzger as being within the purview of the treaty, although he is not technically en accusation before the courts of that country, and the president of the United States avows his readiness to fulfill the engagement in that sense; and both the high contracting parties in this solemn manner signifying this construction and acceptation of the undertaking, I should not hesitate, even if an ambiguity attached to the language employed, to give it that force and effect. But having no doubt in my own mind, I should, independent of that solemn corroboration, of the exposition I give the treaty, declare that Metzger is a person accused of the crime of forgery committed in France, and in this view subject to the operation of the treaty.

The remaining consideration relates to the period at which the treaty took effect. The crimes proved against the accused were committed by him subsequent to the date of the treaty, but prior to its ratification by the president, with the advice and consent of the senate. It would be an useless labor to quote the opinions of foreign publicists on the question; or to spread upon this opinion in extenso the reasonings of American jurists, or the judgments of our judicatories, upon the subject. All that has been written abroad has been examined and discussed with great care and sagacity by our courts and jurists; and, in my opinion, the principle is conclusively settled, that a treaty is to be regarded as taking effect from its date, unless a different period is fixed by the contracting parties, or must be adopted in order to fulfill their manifest intention. It must necessarily be, in effect, a question of intention, and the public law, the same as municipal, implies the intention of the parties to be, when not defined by themselves, that these contracts shall have effect from the time of their execution. 1 Kent, Comm. 169; Whart. Int. Law, 306; 2 Elliot, Dip. Code, 409, 410; Beale v. Pettit [Case No. 1,158]; [U. S. v. Arredondo] 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 757. The principle is the same when the contract is entered into through the intermediation of agents, and their acts are to await confirmation or ratification by their principal before becoming complete, for it is a maxim of the law that "omnis ratihabitro retrotrahitum," and the obligation goes into force as if perfected at its formation. Moreover, this, like other arrangements between the parties, is to be interpreted and carried into effect, conformably to the purpose disclosed in the terms of the contract, or derived from other evidence. The 5th article by prohibiting the operation of the treaty anterior to the date affords a violent presumption that the parties contracted with the understanding and intent that it should take effect at its date, and this interpretation is furthermore assented to and acquiesced in by their proceedings on this application. Both parties insist that the treaty is obligatory from the time it was signed; and although such act of the parties cannot avail to the prejudice of others, whose rights are affected by the treaty, yet it is a circumstance entitled to be regarded on an inquiry with the motives which governed the creation of the compact.

The result of my reflection upon the entire subject is that if the president in his discretion determines the casus foederis of the treaty exists, and that Metzger ought to be delivered up to the French government, there is nothing shown in this case which entitles him to the interference of the judiciary, to prevent the decision of the president being carried into execution.

[NOTE. Metzger then moved in the supreme court for a writ of habeas corpus. The motion was overruled, Mr. Justice McLean delivering the opinion of the court. He held that the court had no jurisdiction to issue the writ for the purpose of reviewing the decision of the district judge. 5 How. (46 U. S.) 176.]

Case No. 9,512.

In re METZLER et al.

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1867.

BANKRUPTCY—INVOLUNTARY—INJUNCTION—PERISHABLE PROPERTY.

1. Where petitions were filed in involuntary bankruptcy, and injunctions were issued to prevent the sale of the debtors' property on execution, the facts on which the injunctions were issued being the very acts of bankruptcy alleged, and the bankrupts had taken issue and demanded a jury, and motions were made to set aside the injunctions on the merits: Held, that the court would not, on a motion, on affidavit, dispose of the issues which were involved in the proceedings.

[Cited in Re Moses, Case No. 9,869.]

2. If the property was perishable, that was no ground for dissolving the injunctions.

3. The court had no power to sell the property, as perishable, at this stage of the proceedings, unless it was in the possession of the messenger.

[Cited in Re Moses, Case No. 9,869.]

This was a motion to dissolve injunctions. On July 18th, 1867, a petition was filed by Willson, Watrous & Co., as creditors of Metzler & Cowperthwaite, to have them adjudged bankrupts, and on July 22d an injunction was issued against the debtors and one Hervey C. Calkin, and the sheriff of New York, enjoining them from selling any goods of the debtors not excepted by the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]. On July 23d a similar petition was filed by C. Cowles & Co., and on July 24th a similar injunction was issued against the same parties, and also against George E. Cowperthwaite and John N. Blasi. The act of bankruptcy alleged in the first petition was an assignment of property made by the debtors to Calkin on June 26th, 1867, in trust to pay certain preferred creditors. The assignment was shown to be in writing, and Calkin was alleged to have accepted it and taken possession of the property. The injunction in the first case, was issued on a petition of the creditors, which alleged the entry of a judgment on July 16th, in the supreme court of the state of New York, in favor of Calkin against the debtors, for $3,531.60, and that it was entered in pursuance of an offer by the debtors to allow it, and that execution was on the same day issued to the sheriff of New York, who levied on the property included in the assignment, and had advertised it for sale under the execution. The act of bankruptcy alleged in the second petition was the same assignment to Calkin, and that the debtors had suffered their property to be taken under the judgment in his favor, and under a judgment in favor of George E. Cowperthwaite, entered on an offer of judgment, for $2,519.94, and under a judgment in favor of John N.

Blasi, entered on a like offer, for $1,885.30. On the return of the orders to show cause, the debtors appeared and denied that they had committed the acts of bankruptcy alleged, and demanded a jury, which was ordered. The motion to set aside the injunctions was made in behalf of Calkin and George E. Cowperthwaite, and was founded on affidavits, which set forth a written agreement made between them and the debtors, in March, 1866, by which they agreed to advance notes to the debtors, to secure which the debtors transferred to them the property which they then had or might afterwards have in their business, with a covenant to return the notes if demanded, and, in case they failed to return them, they agreed to execute such bill of sale, or confession of judgment, or other security, as should be demanded. The affidavits further showed the advance of the notes to the debtors, and a further advance of $1,000 by Calkin, and a demand by him of repayment of this $1,000, and that the debtors were unable to repay it, but offered to make an assignment and prefer Calkin and George E. Cowperthwaite. They further set up the assignment to Calkin, and that George E. Cowperthwaite was absent when it was made; that, when he returned, he refused to assent to it; that, thereupon, on July 10th, Calkin and George E. Cowperthwaite served written notice on the debtors, demanding a return of the securities, as provided in the agreement of March, 1866; that the debtors refused to return them; and that, thereupon, the suits were commenced in favor of Calkin and George E. Cowperthwaite, and the judgments entered and executions issued. The affidavits in opposition showed that the debts of the creditors were for materials furnished the debtors since January 1st, 1867, to be used in their business, and that the creditors had no knowledge of the agreement of March, 1866, till after the judgments were entered.

N. Cross, for the motion.

H. Sheldon and W. E. Curtis, in opposition.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. It is urged, as a ground for dissolving the injunctions, that the assignment to Calkin, and the obtaining of the judgments against the firm, were valid transactions, and not void under the bankruptcy act, and that they were merely in fulfilment of a previous agreement, and were the effect of measures taken by the creditors. These transactions are the very acts of bankruptcy alleged in the original petitions of the creditors, and the very acts, the commission of which is denied by the debtors, and in respect to which they have demanded, and the court has ordered, trials by jury. The injunctions were granted under the fortieth section of the act. The intent of the provisions of that section manifestly is, to give the court authority, in a case of involuntary bankruptcy, when an order is issued requiring the debtor to show cause why he should not be declared a bankrupt, to prevent, by injunction, any interference with the debtor's property, until a decision shall be arrived at, whether the debtor is or is not to be adjudged a bankrupt. In the present case no such decision has been arrived at. The decision is suspended by the act of the debtors, in denying that they have committed the act of bankruptcy alleged, and in demanding a trial by jury. The same facts which constituted sufficient ground for issuing the order to show cause, also furnish sufficient reasons for issuing the injunction. The court will not, on a motion of this kind, on affidavits, dispose of what are really all the issues involved in the proceeding. If the injunctions should be dissolved, and the debtors should afterwards be adjudged bankrupts, and an assignee of their estate be appointed, the court would have dissolved the injunctions on the same state of facts on which the debtors were adjudged bankrupts. Substantially, the whole of the property of the debtors would have passed to the three preferred creditors, leaving to the assignee only an inheritance of litigation, and the very object of the remedy by injunction, given by the fortieth section, would have been defeated. Without deciding, therefore, definitely, whether the transactions set forth are or are not void, under the bankruptcy act, it is sufficient to say, that there is a probable cause for continuing the injunctions, until it shall be decided whether the debtors are or are not to be adjudged bankrupts. Indeed, independently of anything contained in the agreement of March, 1866, the including in the judgment, in favor of Calkin, of the $1,000, not provided for by that agreement, would be a good ground for continuing the injunction, as respects that judgment; and the giving of the judgment to Blasi would be a sufficient ground for granting an injunction, as respects any property levied upon under an execution on that judgment.

It is represented that the property levied on under the executions on the judgments and about to be sold, is perishable, and that it is for the interest of all parties that it should be sold and preserved for whoever may be entitled to the proceeds. But it is not proper to dissolve these injunctions, and thus allow the proceeds of the property to pass to the judgment creditors, to the exclusion of an assignee in bankruptcy, who may in the end be entitled to claim it. This court has no power to order the sale of the property as perishable, at the present stage of the proceedings, unless it is in the possession of the messenger (rule 22 of the general orders in bankruptcy), and it cannot come into the possession of the messenger until a warrant is issued under section forty-two, unless a warrant be issued, under section forty, to the marshal, to take possession of it provisionally. Such warrant cannot issue unless it appears that there is probable cause for believing that the debtor is about to remove or conceal his goods and chattels, or his evidence of property, or make a fraudulent conveyance or disposition thereof. But the fact that this court has no power to order the sale of this property at the present time, is no reason why it should not exercise the power, which is expressly given to it, of interposing, by injunction, to prevent any interference with the property until it shall be decided whether the debtors are or are not to be adjudged bankrupts. The motion to dissolve the injunctions is denied.

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1853.

JUDGMENT—AUTHENTICATION OF RECORD—COURTS—PRESUMPTION OF KNOWLEDGE OF STATE LAW—IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT—FRAUD.

1. Where a record of a judgment of a state court is offered in evidence, in the circuit court, sitting within the same state, the certificate of the clerk and seal of the court is a sufficient authentication. Such an authentication, it is supposed, would be good in the state courts of the same state; and if so, it is good in this court.

[Cited in Bennett v. Bennett, Case No. 1,318; Turnbull v. Payson, 95 U. S. 422.]

[Approved in Bradford v. Russell, 79 Ind. 74.]

2. The judges of the supreme court are presumed to know the laws of the respective states, as their jurisdiction extends throughout the United States.

3. In Michigan, although imprisonment for debt is abolished, yet where a debtor acts fraudulently, or is about so to act, he may be arrested. And after such an arrest, the sheriff, if he permit him to escape, is liable to an action for an escape. And such an action may be brought in this court.

At law.

Frazer & Davidson, for plaintiff.
Hawkins & Jocelin, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action against the sheriff of Washtenaw county, for an escape. A record was offered in evidence of a judgment obtained in that county, before a state court, against the defendant, who, it is alleged, was in the legal custody of the sheriff, and from whose custody he was permitted to escape; for which this action was brought. The record was objected to, because it was only certified under the seal of the court, by the clerk, but had not the certificate of the presiding judge, that the record, etc., "was in due form." By the act of congress, of the 26th of May, 1790 [1 Stat. 122], it is provided: "That the acts of the legislatures of the several states shall be authenticated by having the seal of their respective states affixed thereto; that the records and judicial proceedings of the courts of any state, shall be proved or admitted in any other court of the United States, by the attestation of the clerk, and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a seal, together with a certificate of the judge, chief justice, or presiding magistrate, as the case may be, that the said attestation is in due form."

It is supposed that judgments of the state courts as well as its legislative action, are required to have the above authentication, when used as evidence in another state. When used within the state, the published statutes are evidence, and so, it would seem, are the judgments regularly certified by the clerk under the seal of the court. It can hardly be necessary for a state judge to certify to another state judge, when each knows officially what is "the due form" required. And if such a certificate of the presiding or chief justice be not necessary to make the record evidence in a court of the state where rendered, the same rule is applicable in this court. It has been held by the supreme court, that as its jurisdiction extends throughout the United States, the judges of that court are presumed to know the laws of the respective states. They require no authentication of the laws of the states, as above provided, but act on them from their own knowledge, or from the published statutes. And on the same principle, they take cognizance of the courts of each state organized under its laws, and of the jurisdictions they exercise. This being the case, the necessity of the certificate of the judge, as to the "due form" of a state court record, is not very apparent. It would be objectionable, to those of the profession who look more to form than substance. But however this may be, we admit the record objected to without the certificate of the judge, as it is the record of a court of the state of Michigan.

It is also objected that the arrest in this case was made under a special statute of the state, partaking to some extent, of a criminal procedure, of which this court cannot take jurisdiction. The procedure took place under the Revised Statutes of 1846, entitled "An act for the punishment of fraudulent debtors." The 1st section declares that no person shall be imprisoned for debt, except as follows. The plaintiff may apply for a warrant to arrest the defendant, and the warrant may be issued on the affidavit of the plaintiff or some other person, that the debt is due, and that the defendant is "about to remove to defraud his creditors, or that he has property which he refuses to apply to the payment, or that he has disposed, or is about to do so, of his property to defraud his creditors, or that defendant fraudulently incurred the obligation sued on; and upon proof to the satisfaction of the officer called on to issue the warrant, he shall issue it."

On the warrant, the defendant being arrested is brought before the officer, where the defendant may controvert the facts alleged, on which the warrant was issued. On this examination, if the officer finds the allegation true, he may commit the defendant, unless he shall pay the debt, give security, or enter into bond to assign in thirty days his property for the benefit of his creditors, and if committed, the defendant remains in custody until final judgment shall be rendered in his favor, or until he has assigned his property or obtained his discharge under the insolvent laws. The commitment having been made under the above statute, it is charged the sheriff suffered him to escape.

No objection is perceived to the jurisdiction of this court. The proceeding, under the statute, is not criminal. It gives a remedy against a fraudulent debtor, and in the action now before us, we have to inquire whether the defendant in the action before the state court, was legally in custody. To prove this the warrant must be produced, or its loss must be shown, to authorize secondary proof of its contents. The warrant is not produced, and some evidence has been offered of its loss. The warrant was issued by Judge Lane, who, on examination, committed the defendant. Shortly after this, Judge Lane died. A copy of the warrant appears to be contained in the recognizance entered into by the defendant, to appear and answer the allegations of fraud; but to make this evidence the original must be shown to have been lost. A file of the judge's papers, found in his office, has been examined, but the original warrant was not found in it. The other papers of the judge have not been examined, and this is essential to the reception of secondary proof.

A non suit was suffered by the plaintiff, which the court, on motion, set aside, on payment of costs.

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1879.

FEDERAL COURTS — FACTS CONFERRING JURISDICTION—CORPORATIONS.

Where a corporation is a party to an action, the allegations conferring jurisdiction on the federal courts need not appear in the caption of the petition. It is sufficient if the facts conferring jurisdiction are in some form affirmatively shown by the record.

Action on a promissory note, the caption of the petition being "The Mexico Southern Bank, a Corporation, Plaintiff, v. Townsend Reed, Defendant," and it comes before the court on a motion made by defendant to dismiss the petition for the following reasons: First. "Because the statement and designation in the caption of the petition of the alleged plaintiff is not in conformity to law." Second. "Because by law jurisdiction of the court in a case like this must be shown by a full statement and designation in the title or caption of the petition of the kind, character, and location of the corporation as entitling it to sue therein, as well as in the body of the petition." Third. "Because the name and designation of the plaintiff as a corporation in the said caption, without assuming therein its location, character, and kind, are not the same as is averred in the body thereof; the averment is, referring to the said caption, 'said plaintiff,' when, in fact, in said caption naming the plaintiff, it is not named or described as in the body of the petition."

H. C. Whitman, for the motion.
G. T. Harrison, contra.

SWING, District Judge. The vital point in the motion to dismiss the petition, and the only point necessary to be decided by the court, is, whether the caption of the petition is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction in this case. "It is a settled doctrine of this court, that, in cases where jurisdiction of the federal courts depend upon the citizenship of the parties, the facts essential to support that jurisdiction must appear somewhere in the record," says Mr. Justice Harlan, in the opinion given by him, October term, 1878, in the supreme court of the United States, in Robertson v. Cease [97 U. S. 646]. In Railway Co. v. Ramsay, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 326, the present chief justice said: "They need not necessarily, however, be averred in the pleadings. It is sufficient if they are in some form affirmatively shown by the record." That view was approved by the subsequent case of Briges v. Sperry, 95 U. S. 403. In the present case, the only record is the petition, therefore the necessary allegations must be contained somewhere in the petition, and must be distinctly and positively averred, but not necessarily in the caption, and it is not sufficient that the facts of jurisdiction may be inferred argumentatively from the averments. Now, though in this case the statements of the location, character, and nature of the corporation, the plaintiff herein, are not set forth in the caption of this petition, yet allegations essential to support the jurisdiction of the court, so far as pertains to the plaintiff, appear in the body of the petition, namely, that the plaintiff "is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, and is engaged in the business of banking in the city of Mexico, in said state," and in cases where the jurisdiction of the federal courts depends upon the citizenship of the parties, the decisions hold that for the purposes of suit a corporation is a citizen of the state under whose laws it has its existence and being. Motion overruled.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT ASSIGNMENT—PAYMENTS MADE—ACCOUNTING THEREFOR.

Bankrupt made a fraudulent assignment to S. The attorney of S. was attorney for the bankrupt, and also for one P., a creditor. Payments were made to S. and to P. by said attorney, out of proceeds of assigned property. Held, that the assignment was void, and that S., P., and the attorney should account to the assignee for the property and proceeds thereof.

F. C. Bowman, assignee in bankruptcy, in person.

Stevens & Reymert, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The assignment from the bankrupt to Salmons was made in fraud of the bankrupt act [of 1867, 14 Stat. 517]; it was not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the bankrupt, and that fact is made, by the thirty-fifth section of the act, prima facie evidence of fraud. Besides, it clearly appears from the evidence that the bankrupt was insolvent when he made the assignment, and that Salmons then had reasonable cause to believe him to be insolvent, and that he was contemplating going into bankruptcy, and that a fraud on the act was intended by the transaction. All the consideration Salmons has paid for the assigned property has been paid out of the collections of the debts assigned. The attorney for Pretorius knew the mala fides of the whole transaction before he paid any money over to Pretorius, and the latter is chargeable with all the knowledge which his attorney had. The same person was also attorney for Salmons and for the bankrupt. Any money which Salmons or his attorney has paid to the bankrupt or Pretorius, and any money which Salmons himself has received, and any money which the attorney has retained out of the collections or proceeds of the assigned property, must be paid over to the assignee in bankruptcy by Salmons. The bankrupt and Pretorius and the attorney must further be held liable to account to the assignee in bankruptcy for what they severally have received or retained out of such proceeds. The assignment to Salmons must be set aside as void, and he and his attorney must transfer and deliver to the assignee in bankruptcy all the assigned property which has not been realized or collected, or which still remains unconverted into money, and all evidences thereof and the temporary injunction heretofore granted must be made perpetual. Salmons must also pay the costs of this suit.

MEYER et al. v. BAILEY et al.

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. May, 1875.

PATENTS—REISSUE—ASSIGNMENT OF TERRITORY—SURRENDER—CONCURRENCE OF OWNERS—RATIFICATION.

1. The bill in this case was brought to restrain the infringement of a reissued patent, the title to which the complainants claimed to own within a specified territory; the defendants demurred to the bill upon three grounds, the second and third of which were: (2) That the infringement complained of was not averred to have been committed within the territory covered by the assignment to the complainants; and (3) that it was not averred that the infringement was committed after the date at which the interest of the complainants in the patent accrued. The bill, after setting out the date of the reissue and the grant of a defined and exclusive territorial interest in it to the complainants, averred, "that the said defendants are now constructing, using, and vending to others to be used and sold, large numbers of hydrants and street washers, in some parts thereof substantially the same in construction and operation as in the said reissued letters patent mentioned, the exclusive right and privilege to make and use which, and vend to others to be used, is thus by law vested in your orators." And further, that the defendants have "made and used, and intend still to continue to make and use, the said improvements in the Western district of Pennsylvania, all of which acts and doings are in violation of the exclusive rights and privileges so as aforesaid vested in your orators, under and by virtue of the said recited reissued letters patent: Held, (1) That the averments taken in connection with the statement of the complainants' title, to which they refer, import, necessarily, a charge of infringement after the date of the reissue, and of the grant to the complainants, and within the territory covered by the grant. (2) That they allege infringement at and before the date of the bill, and after the date of the reissue, and the grant within the territory in which the complainants had the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention.

2. M., the patentee, assigned to B. his interest in the patent for the state of Pennsylvania, and afterwards reissued the patent. Subsequently to the reissue, B. assigned his title to a certain territory in the state of Pennsylvania, under the reissued patent, to the complainants, who filed a bill against the defendants. The defendants demurred to the bill on the ground that B.'s interest was outstanding at the time of the surrender by the patentee, and that he did not appear to have been a party or to have assented to or approved of the surrender, and that therefore the reissue was void: Held, that B. was not an assignee within the meaning of the statute, and it was not therefore necessary for him to join in the surrender in order to give validity to the reissued patent.

3. The concurrence in the surrender of a patent by a transferee of an interest in it who is not an assignee within the meaning of the statute, is not essential to the validity of a reissue of the patent.

4. Under the patent act of 1836 [5 Stat. 117], the thirteenth section of which provides for the surrender and reissue of a patent, if a part of the whole patent has been assigned by the patentee, an efficacious surrender can be made only by the concurrence of both the owners of the patent; but this may be manifested, by the assignee, by his direct co-operation in the surrender or his subsequent ratification of it.

5. If an assignee of a part of the whole of a patent does not join with the patentee in surrendering and obtaining a reissue of the patent, but afterwards accepts the reissue and transfers a part of the interest in it which was originally vested in him by the patentee, this is an expressed ratification by him of the act of the patentee in obtaining the reissue.

[This was a bill in equity by Henry C. Meyer and others against George C. Bailey and others to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 38,694, granted to J. G. Murdock, May 26, 1863, and reissued May 11, 1869 (No. 3,434).]

W. Bakewell and T. B. Kerr, for complainants.

G. H. Christy, for defendants.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. One of the defendants demurs to the bill on three grounds: (1) That the reissue upon which the suit is founded was granted upon a surrender of the original patent by the patentee after he had made an assignment of "the full and exclusive right, title, and interest in and to the said" (original) "letters patent and invention, in and to the state of Pennsylvania," while said assigned interest was outstanding, and it does not appear that the assignee was a party to, or assented to, or approved of said surrender. (2) That the infringement complained of is not averred to have been committed within the territory covered by the assignment to the complainants. (3) That it is not averred that the infringement was committed after the date at which the interest of the complainants in the patent accrued.

Of the last two clauses of demurrer it is sufficient to say that they rest upon too narrow an interpretation of the averment of the bill, and are, therefore, unfounded in point of fact. The bill sets out the date of the reissue and the grant of a defined and exclusive territorial interest in it to the complainants, and then avers "that the said defendants are now constructing, using, and vending to others to be used and sold, large numbers of hydrants and street washers, in some parts thereof substantially the same in construction and operation as in the said reissued letters patent mentioned, the exclusive right and privilege to make and use which, and vend to others to be used, is thus by law vested in your orators." And further, that the defendants have "made and used, and still continue to make and use, the said improvements in the Western district of Pennsylvania, all of which acts and doings are in violation of the exclusive rights and privileges so as aforesaid vested in your orators, under and by virtue of the said recited reissued letters patent."

Taking these averments in connection with the statement of the complainants' title to which they refer, they import necessarily a charge of infringement after the date of the reissue and of the grant of the complainants, and within the territory covered by the grant. They allege infringement, at and before the date of the bill, and, therefore, after the date of the reissue and the grant, within the Western district of Pennsylvania, "in violation of the exclusive rights and privileges so as aforesaid vested in" the complainants, and, therefore, within the territory in which, as before stated, they were granted the exclusive right to make, use, and vend the invention. This is too clear for contention, and the demurrer, therefore, cannot be sustained on either of these grounds.

The bill avers that the patentee, on the 18th day of September, 1867, "by an assignment in writing, sold, assigned, and transferred unto Augustus Buerkle the full and exclusive right, title, and interest in and to said letters patent, in and to the state of Pennsylvania." The interest thus granted was outstanding at the time of the surrender by the patentee of the patent, and this constitutes the gravamen of the first clause of the demurrer. The 13th section of the patent act of 1836 provides for the surrender of a patent by a patentee, if he is at the time sole owner of the patent, by his personal representative after his death, and by an assignee, when there has been an assignment of the original patent. If a part of the whole patent has been vested in another so as to constitute such an assignee within the meaning of the act, an efficacious surrender can be made only by the concurrence of both the owners of the patent; but this may be manifested by the assignee by his direct co-operation in the surrender, or his subsequent ratification of it. The bill does not aver that Buerkle, the assignee, joined in the surrender of the original patent; but it does aver a fact from which his adoption and ratification of the act of the patentee, in making the surrender, is conclusively deducible. He accepted the reissued patent, and transferred to the complainants a part of the interest in it which was originally vested in him by the patentee. There could be no more expressive form of ratification by him of the act of the patentee. This is set out in the bill and is sufficient, in any aspect, to avert the objection to the validity of the reissue. But if this were not so, he was not an assignee within the contemplation of the act, whose concurrence in the surrender of the original patent is required to give validity to the reissued patent.

What is meant by an assignee seems now to be settled by repeated adjudication, and by the explicit definition of the act of 1836. In Tyler v. Tuel, 6 Cranch [10 U. S. 324], it was held, under the act of 1793 [1 Stat. 318], that one to whom was transferred all the rights secured by a patent, excepting certain counties in the state of Vermont, was not an assignee within the meaning of the law, but a mere grantee of a sectional interest in the patent; and in Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,600], it was held that the transferee of an undivided part of an entire patent was an assignee. From these decisions it results that only a person who is invested with the entire ownership of a patent or an undivided part of the whole is to be regarded as an assignee. Such, also, is the import of the act of 1836, in the 11th section of which it is provided that "every patent shall be assignable in law, either as to the whole interest or any undivided part thereof, by any instrument in writing," and this assignment, "and also every grant and conveyance of the exclusive right under any patent to make and use the thing patented within and throughout any specified portion of the United States, shall be recorded," etc. The distinction established by previous judicial decisions between an assignee and the grantee of a sectional interest in a patent is evidently contemplated by this section, as it is also by the 14th section, which authorizes the bringing of suits by "patentee, assignee, or grantee of the exclusive right within and throughout some specified part of the United States." It is, therefore, properly determined, in Potter v. Holland [Case No. 11,329], that: "An assignee is one who has transferred to him in writing the whole interest of the original patent, or an undivided part of such whole interest in every portion of the United States. And no one, unless he has such an interest transferred to him, is an assignee. A grantee is one who has transferred to him in writing the exclusive right, under the patent, to make and use, and to grant to others to make and use, the thing patented, within and throughout some specified part or portion of the United States."

Now it has been seen that besides the patentee and his personal representatives, an assignee only is authorized to surrender a patent and obtain a reissue. It is a plain sequence from this that the concurrence in the surrender of a patent by a transferee of an interest in it, who is not an assignee within the meaning of the statute, is not essential to the validity of a reissued patent.

Was Buerkle, then, such an assignee as the statute contemplated? Evidently he was not. The transfer to him embraced only the state of Pennsylvania, and within its limits his interest was exclusive. He was therefore not an assignee within the statutory definition, but merely a grantee of an exclusive right under the patent to make and use the thing patented within and throughout a specified part or portion of the United States, and it was not necessary to aver that he united with the patentee in the surrender of the original patent. The demurrer must, then, be overruled, and the defendant ordered to answer.

PATENTS—RUBBER OVERSHOES—PATENTABLE NOVELTY—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The invention covered by the claim of the letters patent granted to Christopher Meyer and John Evans, July 16th, 1872, for an "improvement in rubber overshoes," namely, "As a new article of manufacture, India rubber shoes, with strengthening or other ribs homogeneous with the substance of the body, formed by thickening up the said substance in the forming of the sheet, substantially as specified," is, to thicken up the plastic India rubber in desired places, in the sheet, as the sheet is being formed between two rolls, by means of grooves and ribs on one of the rolls, the other roll being plain, so as to leave the sheet thicker where the India rubber has entered the grooves than it is in the other parts of it, and thus make a sheet which is a flat plane on one side, and has raised ribs or projections on the other side, and to make such ribs or projections on that part of the sheet which is to be used to form the upper part of the shoe.

[Explained in Meyer v. Goodyear India-Rubber Glove Manuf'g Co., 11 Fed. 894, 895.]

[Followed in Meyer v. Goodyear India-Rubber Glove Manuf'g Co., 11 Fed. 892, 896.]

3. A sheet made according to the patent to Meyer and Evans. is made strictly in accordance with the directions of the earlier patent, without any addition. The sheet of the earlier patent was used to cut therefrom the sole of an India rubber shoe, the sheet and the sole having a variety of thickness in different parts, and being formed in one piece, at a single operation, by the use of rollers, one of which had a surface the reverse of the form to be produced. The sheet of the later patent is used to cut therefrom the upper part of an India rubber shoe, such sheet and such upper part having a variety of thickness in different parts, and being formed in the manner above described. The two manufactures are analogous, the sole, in the one case, and the upper part, in the other, being cut and made from the sheet in the same manner; and the shoe with the upper part so thickened up is not a new article of manufacture, in view of the prior shoe with the sole so thickened up.

Stephen D. Law, for plaintiffs.

George Harding and James H. Ackerman, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought on reissued letters patent [No. 4,977] granted to the plaintiffs, July 16th, 1872, for an "improvement in rubber overshoes," the original letters patent [No. 111,962] having been granted to them, as inventors, February 21st, 1871. The specification says: "Our invention relates to the strengthening ribs employed upon the uppers of India rubber shoes, and consists in an improvement which will be hereinafter described, and subsequently specified in claim. Figures 1 and 3 represent plain views of two modifications of these ribs, and Fig. 2 a sectional view of forming rolls, with the plastic substance passing therethrough. Fig. 4 is a section of Fig. 1. A A, in Fig. 1, represent plain ribs, enclosing a space, in configuration similar to the openings in the uppers of ordinary rubbers. B represents a rib around the top or mouth of the shoe. b is an imitation thread passing around each rib. A' A', in Fig. 3, represent the ribs arranged in the form of a single ornamental buckle. B', in Fig. 2, represents rolls, of which the lower is plain, and the upper ribbed or pointed at d, and grooved at c, to make the strengthening ribs A A' or B, and the rows of imitation stitches b, which said ribs and grooves will be in any form or shape and location on the roller, according to the form or location of the rib or other device it is desired to produce. The imitation stitches may consist either of indentations formed in the surface of the sheet, or points projecting above the surface—the one will be formed by projections on the rollers, and the other by indentations. a a represent the ribs formed from plastic rubber as it is carried through the rolls, and it will be observed that they are not corrugations, like the strengthening ribs used upon metal, but a thickening up of the substance in certain lines or directions. a', in this figure, represents the indentations to imitate thread stitches. The process through which the material passes, to bring it into the form required, is as follows: The mass of plastic rubber is forced into the opening between the moulding or shaping rolls, and drawn out into a sheet, with the ribs and points or indentations completely shaped. It is then made up into the shoe or sandal, and vulcanized. We thus produce these ribs or figures in homogeneous connection with the other part of the sheet. They are, therefore, better than when of separate strips, pasted on in the gummy state after the sheet is formed, and secured to it in the vulcanizing process, as in the common way; and, being formed at the same time the sheet is rolled, and by the same operation, it is done without expense other than the preparing of the grooves, indentations and points in the rollers. Moreover, the said ribs or figures will be much more perfect and uniform than when done by hand. The same is true in regard to the imitation stitching, also, which has heretofore been made by a pointed wheel rolled alongside of the ribs by hand." The claim is in these words: "As a new article of manufacture, India rubber shoes, with strengthening or other ribs homogeneous with the substance of the body, formed by thickening up the said substance in the forming of the sheet, substantially as specified."

The invention set forth in this specification, as shown by the description and the claim, is to thicken up the plastic India rubber, in desired places, in the sheet, as the sheet is being formed between two rolls, by means of grooves and ribs on one of the rolls, the other roll being plain, so as to leave the sheet thicker where the India rubber has entered the grooves than it is in the other parts of it, and thus make a sheet which is a flat plane on one side, and has raised ribs or projections on the other side. The application of this idea, developed in the specification, is, to make these ribs or projections on that part of the sheet which is to be used to form the upper part of the shoe—that part which covers the top of the foot, and that part which surrounds the opening through which the foot enters the shoe. The advantage set forth is, that the ribs or projections thus made are of one substance with the rest of the material, and in homogeneous connection with it, and, therefore, better and more cheaply, uniformly, and perfectly made, than when made by pasting on strips by hand to form the ribs or projections. The patented invention is really complete when the sheet is made by the means described, ready to be made up into a shoe, and to be vulcanized. The process of making the sheet into the shoe and vulcanizing the shoe is no different from the process used to make a sheet into a shoe and vulcanize the shoe, when the ribs or projections are formed by pasting strips on the sheet by hand.

With this view of the invention, it is impossible to say that there is anything of patentable novelty or patentable invention in it, beyond what is fully shown in the patent [No. 10,429] granted to Elias C. Hyatt and Christopher Meyer, January 17th, 1854, for an "improvement in the manufacture of boot and shoe soles of gutta percha or India rubber." The specification of this patent describes the use of two rollers. One of them is a smooth roller. The other roller, called the "soleing roller," has three distinct circumferences, which produce three different thicknesses of the sole. The material, in a soft state, is passed between the rollers in a continuous sheet. The smooth roller produces a smooth surface on one side of the soleing. The other roller produces, of different thicknesses, the fore part, the shank and the heel of the sole. Thus, in one operation is performed what had previously been done in three distinct processes, and the soleing is formed in one continuous sheet. The specification goes on to say: "Heretofore, India rubber soleing has been made one strip of equal thickness throughout, or by several strips of different thicknesses for heel, shank and forepart, cemented together at their ends, or of one strip having the length and breadth of the sole, with separate pieces cemented thereon to give proper thickness to the heel and forepart of the sole. It is at once evident that the first is an inferior sole, and requires more material than the others; and that the second and third require additional labor in the manufacture, and that the parts are liable to become separated in the process of manufacture, or afterwards, causing loss to the manufacturer or consumer. It is equally obvious that all these inconveniencies and imperfections are avoided by making the sole in one piece, as above described, by one process, and that such sole is thus produced at once, better and cheaper than heretofore. We are aware that India rubber has long since been reduced to sheets by rolling, and that the rollers used for this purpose have sometimes been engraved to produce a figured surface, analogous to that often cemented to the heels and foreparts of shoes; but these sheets have been of substantially uniform thickness, varying only in the slight indentations, &c., required to produce an ornamental or figured surface. This we do not claim. But we are not aware that India rubber has ever been rolled into sheets having a substantial variety of thickness in its different parts. Nor are we aware that shoe soles, having the proper variety of thickness, have ever been rolled out or made in one solid piece before our invention. Nor was it known that such forms could be produced as we have produced them in India rubber, until our experiments practically illustrated the fact." The claims of this patent, three in number, are in these words: "1st. Producing a shoe sole, or other analogous manufacture, in India rubber or gutta percha, in one piece, having variety of thickness in its different parts, by the use of rollers, whose surfaces present the reverse of the forms to be produced, at a single operation, substantially as herein described; 2d. Forming soleing of India rubber or gutta percha, with shanks, foreparts and heels of appropriate differences of thickness, in one solid piece, and at one operation, as described, thus producing a useful, economical and novel manufacture; 3d. We also claim such soleing or analogous manufacture in continuous sheets, at one operation, by rolling, as described."

The specification of this patent to Hyatt and Meyer fully instructs those engaged in the manufacture of India rubber shoes how to roll unvulcanized India rubber into a sheet having a substantial variety of thickness in its different parts, the sheet being made in one solid piece, the variety of thickness being produced by a thickening up of the material in any desired place, one face of the sheet being smooth and the other face having projections upon it, the projections having a homogeneous connection with the other parts of the sheet, with the advantage of cheapness and durability, as contra-distinguished from giving the increased thickness by pasting on, or cementing on, separate strips or pieces of the material, and the result being produced by the use of rollers, one of which is smooth and the other is of such configuration on its surface as to admit of more material in thickness being left at one place than at another. A person who makes a sheet according to the patent sued on, makes it strictly in accordance with the directions of the earlier patent, without any addition. A sheet out of which to cut the upper part of an India rubber shoe, such sheet and such upper part having a variety of thickness in different parts, and being formed in one piece, at a single operation, by the use of rollers, one of which has a surface the reverse of the form to be produced, is an analogous manufacture, in all respects, to a sheet out of which to cut the sole of an India rubber shoe, the sheet and the sole having a variety of thickness in different parts, and being formed in the manner above described. When the sheet is prepared from which to make the upper part of the shoe, such upper part is cut and made from it in the same manner in which the sole is cut and made from the prepared sheet from which to make the sole. The shoe having the substance or material of the upper part so thickened up is not a new article of manufacture, in view of the prior shoe having the substance or material of the sole so thickened up. It is a mere double use of the same invention. The fabric not being new, the application of it to make the upper part of a shoe is not invention, nothing novel being required to adapt it to make such upper part. The fabric which is described in the plaintiffs' patent is directly within the first and third claims of the earlier patent. The fabric of the earlier patent includes the whole of the invention set forth in the plaintiffs' patent. Smith v. Elliott [Case No. 13,041].

The bill must be dismissed, with costs.

[NOTE. From the decree entered in this case the complainant appealed to the supreme court. Pending appeal the complainants surrendered their patent, and obtained a reissue. The supreme court, Mr. Chief Justice Waite delivering the opinion, remanded the case upon the ground that the surrender extinguished the patent, and therefore no action could be maintained thereon. BANKRUPTCY — STAYING PROCEEDINGS — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—RESULTING TRUST.

1. Where after a bankrupt had filed his petition and been adjudged a bankrupt, creditors who held judgments against him, and had proved their debts in the bankruptcy proceedings, commenced a suit in a state court against him and others, charging that certain real estate which stood in the name of the bankrupt's wife, had been bought by him and paid for with his money in fraud of his creditors, and that a trust had resulted in their favor from such purchases, and praying that their judgments might be satsified out of such property: Held, that, by proving their debts in the bankruptcy proceedings, the creditors waived all right of action against the bankrupts, on either the judgments or the original indebtedness; and that proceedings in such suit must be stayed, under the 21st section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)].

[Distinguished in Hill v. Phillips, 14 R. I. 95.]

2. If the allegations of the creditors were true, the money used by the bankrupt in the purchase of the real estate was "property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors," under the 14th section of the act, and passed to the assignee in bankruptcy under that section.

[Cited in Re Rainsford, Case No. 11,537.]

On the 8th of June, 1865, Martin Maas recovered a judgment, in the supreme court of New York, against the bankrupt, Louis Meyers, and one Sondheim, as joint debtors, for $1,130.70. It was duly docketed and execution was issued on it and returned unsatisfied. It was now wholly due, with interest from January 8th, 1866. It was founded on two promissory notes of the debtors, one made July 18th, 1860, at eight months, for $679.01, and one made August 25th, 1860, at eight months, for $322.48, and an account for $9.62, for goods sold. The consideration for the notes and account was goods sold to the debtors by Maas, in July, August, and September, 1860. On the 9th of April, 1866, Bache, Ulman & Bach recovered a judgment in the supreme court of New York, against the bankrupt and Sondheim, as joint debtors, for $1,167.08. It was duly docketed and execution was issued on it and returned unsatisfied, and it was now wholly due, with interest from its recovery. It was founded on a promissory note of the debtors, made August 10th, 1860, at eight months, for $781.56. The consideration for the note was goods sold to the debtors by Bache, Ulman & Bach, in July, August and September, 1860. On the 27th of March, 1868, Maas and Bache, Ulman & Bach commenced an action, in the supreme court of New York, against the bankrupt and his wife, the complaint in which, after setting forth the foregoing facts, averred that, while the bankrupt was so indebted to them, and while he was insolvent, and on or about the 14th of April, 1864, he purchased, with his own money and his own means, certain land in the city of New York, with the dwelling house thereon, particularly described in the complaint; that, on such purchase, the said house and lot of land were conveyed, by the direction of the bankrupt and at his request, to his wife, by the vendors, by a deed of conveyance recorded July 5th, 1864; that the bankrupt paid the whole or the greater part of the consideration or purchase money of the conveyance, and more than sufficient thereof to pay the amount of the said two judgments and interest; that the consideration or purchase money was $7,400; that the house and lot were now worth over $20,000; that the conveyance was voluntary and without consideration, as between the bankrupt and his wife, and was founded upon no other consideration, as between grantor and grantee, than the purchase money, so paid by the bankrupt, and was fraudulent, as against the plaintiffs in the suit, as his creditors; that, on such conveyance, the legal title, in fee simple, to the house and lot, vested in the wife of the bankrupt and was still in her, and a trust resulted in favor of said plaintiffs, as creditors of her husband, to an extent sufficient to satisfy their demands, being the amount of the said two judgments and interest; and that Sondheim was insolvent and had been so since prior to the purchase of the house and lot. The prayer of the complaint was for judgment that the trust might be established and declared, that the plaintiffs might be entitled in equity to enforce the trust, that the wife of the bankrupt might be declared to be the trustee thereof, and that, unless she should pay to the plaintiffs the amount upon their judgments, with interest, the house and lot might be sold by a receiver to be appointed by the court, and that out of the proceeds the judgments and interest might be paid. On the 13th of February, 1868, and before the said suit was commenced, the bankrupt filed his voluntary petition in bankruptcy. The creditors above named proved their said debts in the bankruptcy proceedings. On the 10th of April, 1868, this court made an order staying all proceedings in the said action until the question of the discharge of the petitioner in bankruptcy should be determined by this court. The creditors now applied to the court for an order vacating and setting aside such order of stay.

A. R. Dyett, for the creditors.

Benedict & Boardman, for the bankrupt.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The order of stay was made under that part of section twenty-one of the bankruptcy act which provides that "no creditor proving his debt or claim shall be allowed to maintain any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, but shall be deemed to have waived all right of action and suit against the bankrupt, and all proceedings already commenced, or unsatisfied judgments already obtained thereon, shall be deemed to be discharged and surrendered thereby; * * * and any such suit or proceeding shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be stayed, to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge." The action in question, so far as it concerns the bankrupt as a defendant in it, is a suit for the debts set forth in the complaint, a suit to collect such debts, and the creditors, by proving such debts in the bankruptcy, waived all right of action thereon against the bankrupt, and the judgments, so far as they were judgments against the bankrupt, were thereby discharged and surrendered. This view applies, whether the action be regarded as founded on the original indebtedness of on the judgments. The order of stay was, therefore, proper, as respects the bankrupt. It is urged, however, that the suit ought to be allowed to proceed against the wife, as a suit to have the debts paid out of real estate of which the legal title is in the wife, and to enforce a trust created by the statute law of New York, in favor of the creditors, it being provided thereby (1 Rev. St. 728, §§ 51, 52), that "where a grant for a valuable consideration shall be made to one person, and the consideration therefor shall be paid by another, no use or trust shall result in favor of the person by whom such payment shall be made, but the title shall vest in the person named as the alienee in such conveyance," subject only to the provision, that "every such conveyance shall be presumed fraudulent as against the creditors at the time of the person paying the consideration, and, where a fraudulent intent is not disproved, a trust shall result in favor of such creditors, to the extent that may be necessary to satisfy their just demands." It is claimed, that the real estate in question was, therefore, never the property of the bankrupt, and could not pass to his assignee in bankruptcy; and that it does not pass to such assignee under section fourteen of the act, as being "property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors," because it never was conveyed by the bankrupt. This view overlooks the true character of the suit brought by the creditors in the state court. Their complaint shows that the bankrupt took his own money and made the purchase of the house and lot; that, on such purchase, it was conveyed by the vendors to the bankrupt's wife; that the purchase money so paid by the bankrupt was more than enough to pay the judgments; that the transaction was fraudulent as against the creditors; and that a trust resulted in favor of the creditors, to an extent sufficient to satisfy their demands. This trust they seek to have enforced against the house and lot, as representing the money so fraudulently applied by the bankrupt. The fraud, and the only fraud, committed by the bankrupt was in taking his own money and using it in this way. Therefore, on the case set up by the creditors in their complaint, the money so used and applied by the bankrupt, as now represented by the house and lot, is "property conveyed by the bankrupt in fraud of his creditors." As such, it passed, by virtue of section fourteen of the act, to his assignee in bankruptcy, and he can sue for and recover such property. Any equitable right which the creditors had to enforce any trust created by the law of New York in their favor, in respect to such money or its representative, and any equitable right conferred on them by the bringing of their suit, is subordinate to the right and title of the assignee in bankruptcy. His title relates back to the 13th of February, 1868. The suit of the creditors was brought afterwards. The equitable right to enforce the statutory trust is not such a lien or pledge as is saved or protected, as against the assignee, by the provisions of the fourteenth or twentieth or any other section of the act. The motion to vacate the order of stay is denied.

MEYERS v. VALLEY NAT. BANK.

[18 N. B. R. 34; [1] 2 Nat. Bank Cas. (Browne) 156.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. 1879.

BANKRUPTCY — ILLEGAL PREFERENCE — BANK SHARES—LIEN THEREON CLAIMED—FORM OF ACTION BY ASSIGNEE—TITLE TO STOCK.

1. The bankrupt B. held certain shares of stock of the defendant, a national bank. The bank claimed a lien on such stock, under its by-laws to secure an indebtedness due it from the bankrupts. This by-law the assignee claimed was void under the national banking law, and upon refusal of the bank to give him, as assignee, a certificate for these shares, brought action for their value. Held, that as judgment for conversion vests the title to the converted property in the wrong-doer, and the wrong-doer in this case cannot hold the title, the assignee cannot maintain the action in this form.

2. The bank purchased a quantity of its stock on the market and not having the right to hold it in its own name, divided it among some of the directors. The bankrupt B. who was one of the directors, took some of this stock and gave his note therefor, the bank retaining the certificate for him, although the stock was transferred to him on the books, and he received dividends thereon. On his failure the bank caused him to transfer the stock to its teller, but retained the note as an asset. In an action by the assignee to set aside the transfer as a preference, held, that the bank had lawfully no stock to convey, and that B. was not the lawful owner.

Peter Behr, of Goodwin, Behr & Co., had owned for some years ten shares of Valley National Bank stock, on which the bank claimed a lien, under its by-laws to secure the large sum due it from Goodwin, Behr & Co. Mr. Meyers claimed that this by-law was void, as in contravention of the national banking law. The bank refused to give him, in his own name as assignee, a certificate for these ten shares, and he sued for their value. It also appeared that the bank had bought in a lot of its own stock on the market, and not having the right to carry it in its own name, arranged to parcel it among some of the directors. Behr, one of its directors, took twenty-five shares under this arrangement, and gave the bank his note for the amount, which was entered as a discount, the bank retaining the certificate for the sharer, although the stock was transferred to Behr on its books, and he received the dividends thereon. This note was given in 1876, and was several times renewed, Behr never being called on for payment. When he failed last September, the bank had him transfer the twenty-five shares to E. G. Moses, its teller, to secure itself. It kept Behr's note, however, and claimed it as an asset. The assignee claimed that this transfer was a preference. This was the second count in the petition.

TREAT, District Judge. At the trial of this case the first impression was that the defendant must be held estopped from disputing that Behr was the owner of the shares mentioned in the second cause of action. Further reflection upon an examination of the national bank act (sections 5201 and 5210, with the cognate sections in the Revised Statutes) has induced a different conclusion. The bank was prohibited from becoming the purchaser or holder of the shares in dispute. How, then, could it acquire any title thereto which it could transfer to Behr? The irregular and unlawful contrivances adopted cannot change the legal results. The bank had lawfully no stock to convey, and though Behr may have appeared on the stock ledger as the owner of these shares, and the bank have paid him a cash dividend thereon, still he was not the lawful owner. A list of the stockholders, as required by section 5210, and the report thereof to the comptroller of the currency, is necessary for the protection of all interests, especially with reference to the double liability. Hence, as to the second cause of action, the finding is for the defendant. As to the first cause of action—conversion of the ten shares—the parties consent to a judgment for the value thereof, five hundred and fifty dollars. But the court is here met by the legal difficulty that the bank cannot purchase or hold those shares. As judgment for conversion vests the title to the converted property in the wrong-doer, and the wrong-doer in this case cannot hold the title, how can the court give a judgment which will contravene the law? To carry out the agreement between the parties as to the said ten shares they should consent to an amendment of the petition, so that damages may be had for failure to transfer as demanded by plaintiff. The court can then assess nominal damages and costs, with the understanding that the transfer will be at once made to the plaintiff.

Circuit Court, D. California. July Term, 1858.

GRANTS—CONFLICTING CLAIMS—THIRD PARTIES—KIND OF RELIEF—LAND PATENTS—EJECTMENT.

1. Where parties set up conflicting claims to property, with which a special tribunal may deal, as between one of the parties and the government, regardless of the rights of third parties, the latter may come into the ordinary courts of justice and litigate their claims.

2. Such party can only litigate in the tribunal which can afford the relief asked. If his right be legal, he must seek it in a court of law; if an equity, in a court of chancery.

3. The proviso in the act of congress approved March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 301), in relation to patents, does not destroy the distinction between equity and law which obtains in the federal courts.

4. The plaintiff holds a legal title. The title of defendants, in this case, is inchoate, and not such as can be used in bar of an ejectment, where a legal title is counted on.

At law.

Johnson & Rose, for plaintiff.

Jeremiah Clarke and Crockett & Crittenden, for defendants.

McALLISTER, Circuit Judge. This is an action of ejectment, brought for the recovery of certain lands situated within this district. The plaintiff introduced and relied on a patent which had been issued to him from the government of the United States. The defendants then offered a Mexican grant, and a confirmation of the claim under it by the board of land commissioners created by the act of congress of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 631), with an affirmance by the district court of the United States for the Northern district of California, on appeal from the said decision of the land commissioners. The plaintiff presents a perfect, legal title. To that of the defendants we shall hereafter allude. There is no doubt that where parties set up conflicting claims to property, with which a special tribunal may deal, as between one of the parties and the government, regardless of the rights of third parties, the latter may come into the ordinary courts of justice for relief, and litigate their claims. Thus, a party may go into a court of equity, to set aside the decision of the register and receiver, confirmed by the commissioner, and which was obtained by fraud. Garland v. Wynn, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 6. But the party seeking relief can only obtain it in the tribunal which has the power to afford it. If his right be a legal one, he may vindicate it in a court of law; if equitable, he must enforce that equity in another forum. "An equitable claim," says Mr. Justice McLean, "however strong it may be, cannot be set up at law to defeat the legal title." Baird v. Wolfe [Case No. 760].

The provision in the act of congress of March 3, 1851, which enacts that the patent to be issued under it "shall not affect the interests of third parties," does not alter or change the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, nor destroy the distinction which by their law separates legal from equitable rights; prescribing, as they do, as rules of action in administering the former, the principles of the common law, and in the administration of the latter, the rules and proceedings of chancery. Now, as, prior to that enactment, the party to vindicate a legal right must be in a court of law,—to enforce an equity he must be in a court of equity. In Willot v. Sandford, 19 How. [60 U. S.] 79, 82, it is said: "In the next place, the United States reserved the power to survey and grant claims to lands, &c. . . . nor have the courts of justice any authority to disregard surveys and patents, when dealing with them in actions of ejectment." It does not seem to be denied, that the foregoing principles must control the action of the court; but it is contended, that defendants have a perfect, legal title. Being in a court of law, if both parties had legal titles, the question would arise how far this court would follow some of the state courts who, in a court of law, in a conflict between two legal titles, permit the parties to go behind them into the prior equities. It is admitted that the Mexican grant offered in evidence had never received the approval of the departmental assembly of California; that no judicial possession of the land was ever given, and that no survey of the land, or severance of it from the public domain, by a functionary of Mexico, was made before the cession of California to the United States. It is contended, however, that the approval by the departmental assembly was unnecessary to make it a legal title; and the fact that there was no judicial possession given does not affect the title, because the boundaries of the land are given so precisely in the grant, there was no necessity for a survey and delivery of judicial possession. If the court could dispense with the action of one of the political departments of Mexico, in the exercise of the granting power, and consider the title as legal and complete, it is still strange that—if the boundaries are so precisely described as to dispense with any necessity for a survey—the surveyor to whom the duty was confided of making a survey correctly, has not only failed in finding the boundaries, but erred so egregiously as to cause great alleged injustice to the defendants.

The grounds relied on to establish a perfect legal title in the defendants are, first, the Mexican laws; second, the confirmation of the claim under the title derived from those laws, made by the district court; and third, the clause in the act of March 3, 1851, which declares the patent when issued shall not affect the rights of third parties.

As to the first ground, a Mexican title, precisely similar to the one under consideration, save there had been no confirmation of it, was fully considered by this court in the case of Tobin v. Walkinshaw [Case No. 14,068], at its September term, 1855; where it was decided that a Mexican grant which had not received the sanction of the departmental assembly, and where there had been no judicial possession given nor any severance of the land from the public domain prior to the cession of California to the United States, was not such legal title as would sustain an action of ejectment, and defeat a legal title. This court gave in that case the reasons, in detail, on which it rested its decision. Until the action of the appellate tribunal shall ascertain the error of this court in that case, the reasons which then governed must control in this. The court cannot, therefore, consider that defendants hold a perfect title under the Mexican laws.

The next inquiry is, if a legal title is not held under the Mexican laws, did the confirmation of the claim by the district court, under that title, give defendants a legal title? The court knows of only three modes by which a legal title to real estate can pass from the United States,—to wit, by patent; by legislative confirmation, followed by a survey in the terms prescribed by it; or by a legislative confirmation describing the boundaries of the land with such precision as, in the absence of anything to the contrary, raises the fair inference that all the land within the prescribed limits was intended to be granted, thus dispensing with the necessity of a survey by an officer of the United States. In each of these modes, the granting or political power is exerted. The court is aware of no case in which the decree of a judicial tribunal has operated per se as the conveyance of the legal title to real estate. In Hickey's Lessee v. Stewart, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 750, it was held, that the decree of a court of equity, declaring the complainant the equitable owner of land, and directing the defendant to convey it,—though in part executed by a writ of habere facias, putting the party in possession of part of the premises,—does not confer a legal title, and is not a bar to an action of ejectment. In that case the court say: "The defendant in ejectment can never defend his possession against the plaintiff upon a title in himself by which he could not recover the possession if he were out, and the plaintiff in, possession. Reversing the position of the parties in this case, could the defendants, if plaintiffs recover the land in controversy upon this decree, and evidence of possession under it, prevail against the title of the plaintiff? We have no hesitation in saying they could not; and, therefore, the decree, if founded upon a valid, equitable title, would be no legal bar to the action of the plaintiffs."

In Baird v. Wolfe [supra], the plaintiff gave in evidence a patent. The land had been located by survey by one Baird, and sold to one Dunbar. The claim had been reported on favorably by the land-officer, whose report was made to congress, and by them examined and confirmed; and a certificate was issued, which authorized the person to whom it issued to locate the land within the time and place limited. It was contended that the act of congress, confirming the right to the tract of land to the original claimant upon the report of the register and receiver vested in the claimant the legal title. But the court say: "This was not the effect of the confirmation. It was the right to the four hundred acres of land which was confirmed, and not to any particular tract of land. The certificate which the claimant received as evidence of his right, authorized his location of the four hundred acres. A legislative act, confirming a title which was in its terms final, and required no further action of the government, would be considered a grant. But the right before us is not of this character." In that case congress itself had directly transferred the title to the right; but as something else was to be done for the segregation of the land, until that was accomplished the title was deemed inchoate.

In West v. Cochran, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 415, the court say: "It was competent for congress to take up these titles or rights, and act on them, either by legislating directly that each claimant should be confirmed, and have a perfect title to his actual possession," &c., "without ascertaining, in the act of confirmation, or by any special means provided therein, the bounds of claims confirmed. But it was also competent for congress to provide that before a title should be given to any possessor, the exact limits of his possession and the title which the United States was to give should be defined, and that this should be done by such agencies and in such manner as might be fixed by congress. This is in entire accordance with the provisions of the treaty, which guarantees to the inhabitants the rights of property secured to them; but it was not intended to provide for the particular modes and instrumentalities by which such rights should be ascertained and enforced; these being left to the nation, to whose powers they were confided; so that the question is, What has congress deemed expedient? Now, the policy which is so obvious, and which has been acted on by the United States ever since they began to exercise power over the public lands, namely to give defined limits to grants, may well be supposed to have actuated congress in 1807. The provisions of that act clearly show that although congress intended that the commissioners should adjudge the existence of good titles to lands held under French and Spanish possessors, yet they did not intend that a final legal title, as against the United States, should be made to vague grants, until their bounds had been ascertained by the means there designated, and the particular tract defined by survey."

Now, congress have by the act of March 3, 1851, designated the means by which to ascertain the limits of lands the claims to which had been confirmed, namely, by a survey made by the appropriate officer of the government, the evidence of which survey and the alienation of the title was the patent to be issued. It is evident that congress did not intend any more in this than in the case just cited,—to part with the legal title until the exact limits of the land had been defined by previous survey. When such patent shall have issued, the presumption would arise that the patent was valid, and it would be prima facie evidence that all incipient steps had been regularly taken before the title was perfected by the patent. Minter v. Crommelin, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 88. In Bagnell v. Broderick, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 450, the court say: "Congress has the sole power to declare the dignity and effect of titles emanating from the United States; and the whole legislation of the federal government, in reference to the public lands, declares the patent the superior and conclusive evidence of legal title; and until its issuance the fee is in the government, which by the patent passes to the grantee, and he is entitled to recover the possession in ejectment."

The conclusion to which the court has come is, that the title of the defendants in this case cannot be set up in this court against the legal title of the plaintiff. The same is therefore excluded as evidence in this cause.

The MIANTINOMI.

[3 Wall. Jr. 46; 3 Pittsb. Leg. J. 20; 3 Liv. Law Mag. 598.] [1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1855.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—FEDERAL AND STATE LEGISLATION—WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

1. The regulation of weights and measures having been given by the constitution to congress, it is doubtful whether the enactments of any state on that subject are of any validity whatever: even though congress have wholly neglected to attend to this regulation.

2. When parties contract for any material by weight, using terms that have come to us from times past, with a definite meaning, such as "tons,"—which have been commonly regarded as meaning 2,240 lbs.,—the mere fact that a state has undertaken to regulate weights and measures, and, in discharge of such an office, has fixed the ton at 2,000 lbs., will not dispense with an obligation to furnish the old measure.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Western district of Pennsylvania.]

The constitution of the United States (article 1, § 8, par. 5) gives to congress the power "to fix the standard of weights," a power which, however, it has never exercised except by an act of May 19th, 1828 [4 Stat. 277], in which it declares that a certain "brass troy pound weight," then in the custody of the director of the mint of the United States, shall be the standard troy pound of the mint. In this state of federal inaction, the legislature of Pennsylvania by an "Act to fix the standards and denominations of measures and weights" in that commonwealth, enacted (section 13) on the 15th April, 1834, that the standard of weight shall be a pound, to be computed upon the troy pound of the mint of the United States, referred to in the act of congress of May 19th, 1828, to wit: "the troy pound of this commonwealth shall be equal to the troy pound of the mint aforesaid, and the avoirdupois pound of this commonwealth shall be greater than the troy pound aforesaid in the proportion of 7,000 to 5,760:" and enacted further (section 17) that "the denominations of weight of this commonwealth, whereof the pound avoirdupois as heretofore provided is the standard unit, shall be, 16 drams, make one ounce; 16 ounces, make one pound; 25 pounds, make one quarter; 4 quarters, make one hundred; 20 hundreds, make one ton." Notwithstanding this law, the ton of coal (the ton weight being the unit by which coal is always bought in Philadelphia), as perhaps of other things, was popularly regarded as being 2,240 pounds. To the great majority of people the existence of the Pennsylvania act was unknown. But towards the close of the year 1853,—coal having been then lately very much, as it continued afterwards, on the rise in price,—almost all the vendors of coal of Philadelphia, met together in a public way, and having made agreement with one another to this effect, publicly, and in a body, "Resolved, that on and after December 1st, 1853, the weight for a ton of coal shall be 2,000 pounds; and that the price be reduced in proportion to the weight." These proceedings of the coal dealers were matters of great publicity, and known to most persons who burn coal and read the city newspapers. From that time the coal dealers, when furnishing coal in the city, furnished but 2,000 lbs. as a ton.

In this state of facts, one Holt had contracted, previously to these resolutions, to furnish the steamer Miantinomi with several hundred "tons" of coal at the market prices, and furnished that part of his "tons" which he delivered after the resolutions at the rate of 2,000 lbs. He had given no notice to the parties with whom he had contracted, that he was, after the resolutions, furnishing 2,000 lbs. as a ton, and it did not appear that they knew of the resolutions. As a fact, they discovered the change in the kind of "tons" only by observing that the new tons did not burn so long, nor propel the boat so far, as the old ones: in other words, that 2.000 lbs. would not have the effect of 2,240 lbs. In regard to price, while there was nothing to show that compared with the subsequent still rising rates, the libellants had not reduced the price of the short tons in proportion to the reduction of the unit, it was clear that with the still rising prices, the defendants were charged more for one of the short tons, than under the old prices they had been for the large ones. And there was nothing which showed that they knew about rising prices at all. Holt having libelled the steamer for his claim, the owners of the vessel alleged in defence that he "had rendered false weights to the amount of many hundred of pounds," and claimed a deduction to be made for these "tons" of 2,000 lbs.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. [This case was very summarily decided; being submitted without argument by the respondent's counsel. As the subject is of some interest the decision seems to have attracted public attention. In order to avoid the misapprehension so frequently attending off-hand reports of parol opinions, I have concluded to state more particularly the case and the reasons of my decision. The libel in this case is in a cause of contract. Holt, the libelant, claims a balance of account on his contract to supply coal to the steamboat Miantinomi, owned by the New Jersey, Delaware and Pennsylvania Steamboat Company. The respondents, the owners, in their answer, admit the contract with Holt to supply the boat with coal, and "that he pretended to furnish and deliver the amount of coal as stated in his account set forth in this libel, but did not in truth deliver said amounts nor to the value as stated, but rendered false weights to the amount of several hundred of pounds.

[It appears from the evidence, that after the libelant had continued for some time to deliver coal according to his contract, the agents of defendant's began to observe a deficiency in weight, and that the same nominal amount of tons as then delivered, did not propel the boat so long as at first. That this deficiency was found on weighing to amount to some two or three hundred pounds in every ton. In answer to this charge and by way of justification of his delivery of short measure, the libelant gave in evidence an agreement between himself and some other coal dealers, in December, 1855, to reduce the weight of the ton of coal from 2,240 pounds to 2,000 lbs., and to deliver to their customers thereafter that amount for a ton. How far the laborers, miners and carriers of coal, partook in the benefits of this resolution, does not appear, nor is it important to the decision of this case. It is true, that resolution contemplated a reduction of price in proportion to the reduction of weight. But whether from a mistake in their arithmetic, or for what other reason does not appear, the price was varied in the inverse ratio of the quantity. An inspection of the libelant's account shows that while he delivered 2,240 lbs. to the ton, the charge varied from four dollars up to $4.90 and $5 per ton; but when he commenced to deliver at the short weight, the price varied from five up to $5.80.

[The case, then, is this, a contract is made for the coal at so much, (say the market price) per ton. Anthracite coal being a heavy article, and used in large quantities, the unit by which it is valued and sold is by the ton weight, and not by the measure or by the bushel, as is the custom with dealers in bituminous coal west of the Allegheny mountains. This unit has from time immemorial been the representation, or supposed to be the synonym, for 2,240 lbs. avoirdupois. In the contract before us both parties used the term in that signification. No notice is given to the respondents that thereafter the unit quantity in the sale of coal was to be changed from the ton to the pound, and that the vendor, instead of the ton which he had contracted to deliver, intended thereafter to deliver by the pound, and call 2,000 lbs. a ton, for convenience or calculation; and that while the price for a nominal ton was increasing from twenty to fifty per cent., the quantity was decreased by ten or eleven per cent. The defendants are left to discover this fact by the failure of the 2,000 lbs. to do the duty of 2,400 lbs.] [2]

It is almost superfluous to remark that as it requires the assent of both parties to make a contract, it also requires the same consent to change it. It may be said, that as two multiplied by three will have the same product as three multiplied by two, the result will be the same either way, provided the price be diminished in proportion to the quantity. This is undoubtedly true; but it is not the case before us. The defendants finding the price increasing every few days, continue to pay the apparent market value under the supposition that they are receiving their coal according to the unit of quantity and valuation, when they made the contract. If notice had been given them that eleven per cent. was to be added secretly to the price by this contrivance of diminishing the quantity, they might not have assented to it. And until they can be shown to have assented to it, they cannot be made its victim.

If the grocers in a particular street finding that it would add much to their profit in times of scarcity and high prices, to deliver flour and other provisions at the pound troy instead of the pound avoirdupois, as heretofore, and should conspire together to deliver thereafter but twelve ounces to the pound instead of sixteen, such conduct would receive no countenance from the public. thus imposed upon, and in courts of justice would be treated as a fraud, and receive that appellation without seeking for a milder synonym.

Coal is a necessary of life in this climate, and unfortunately for the consumers, the demand has increased to such an extent as to put it in the power of those who supply it to extort their own price. When its price was moderate, and the profits of the vendor merely remunerative, there were no schemes to reduce the quantity by changing the meaning of words to suit the rapacity of speculators. This scheme of reducing the quantity by ten per cent. was not concocted till after prices had increased twenty-five per cent. and were proceeding up to fifty. When it was discovered that competition could not check speculation on a necessary of life, the public were made the victims of this agreement, contrivance, conspiracy, or whatsoever it may be called.

My attention has been turned to an act of the Pennsylvania assembly passed in April, 1834, on the subject of "weights and measures." [By this act it is stated that the "pound troy as kept at the mint of the United States should be the standard of weight—that the pound avoirdupois should exceed the pound troy in weight in the proportion of 7,000 to 5,760—that 25 pounds should make a quarter and 2,000 pounds a ton."] [2] For the purpose of the present case it may not be necessary to decide upon the power of any state legislature to make such an enactment. It was probably intended for the convenience of the officers on their public works. As approximating decimal divisions it is much more convenient for calculation when the pound is made the unit on which to compute price or value. In very many cases the pound and its decimal multiples have been adopted almost entirely instead of the old quarters, hundred weights and tons; just as

[2] [From 3 Pittsb. Leg. J. 20.]

[2] [From 3 Pittsb. Leg. J. 20.]

25 feet has been adopted by engineers as the cubic yard instead of 27. But in all those cases a change of language is made to suit this convenient change of multiple. Thus the engineer would state on a contract for excavation the price at so much "per cubic yard of 25 feet." So the terms "per 100 lbs.," or "hundred neat," are substituted for "cwt.," which represents 112 lbs. And when the ton is used to represent, for convenience of calculation, 2,000 lbs., the contract should and usually does so state it as "per ton of 2,000 lbs.," or "per ton neat." But as coal and other cheap and heavy articles have never been sold by the pound as a unit for calculating its price, but by the ton, convenience of calculation has never required, nor has custom sanctioned any reform (so called) or change in the amount so represented by this unit. Accordingly, notwithstanding, that this act of the legislature was passed more than twenty years ago, it has never been adopted in practice in the sale of coal and other heavy articles whose unit of calculation is usually by the ton and not by the pound.

The congress of the United States having the power to regulate commerce between the several states, it was of great importance that the value of money and the standard of weights and measures should be uniform. Accordingly their regulation is intrusted to congress. Every change or innovation by the several states would tend only to increase confusion and difficulty. This duty intrusted to congress, seems apparently to have been much neglected. I find no legislation on the subject by congress, except in the act of May 19th, 1828, c. 67, where it is enacted that "the brass troy pound weight, procured by the minister of the United States at London, in the year 1827, for the use of the mint, and now in the custody of the director thereof, shall be the standard troy pound of the mint of the United States." As the English standard of weights and measures had been adopted by long custom in every state, it was, perhaps, unnecessary for congress to interfere further than it has done. For as the standard of the London tower weights, and the English terms or denominations used to represent their fractions and multiples, were universally adopted in the United States, and of course uniform, nothing was required of congress, unless it entirely changed its standard and introduced decimal fractions and multiples for greater facility of calculation, as it has done in our coin. Whether this uniformity of weights and measures has been established by custom or congressional legislation, it is evident that any interference of state legislation to change either the standard of weights or the meaning of the terms used to represent its multiples or fractions, is not only useless but injurious. Accordingly, the provisions of this act of assembly have remained a dead letter, and it is practically obsolete so far as concerns the standard ton. It compels no one, nor could it do so, to adopt its use of language. Men may contract either with or without its sanction to make the pound their unit, and to sell at so much per 100 lbs.—or so much for 2,000 lbs., and they may call it, or any other multiple of a pound, a ton, if the parties to the contract agree to do so. But this act, if it have any efficacy whatever, (which, as I have intimated, is doubtful,) cannot be invoked to change the terms of a contract contrary to the consent of one of the parties, or to authorize vendors who buy coal at one standard of weight to sell it at another, and thus extort from purchasers an increased price for a diminished quantity.

A deduction must be made as claimed by the defendants on their theory that 2,240 lbs., and not 2,000 lbs., are a ton.

Case No. 9,522.

The MICHAEL GROH.

[1 Brown's Adm. 419.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. May, 1872.

TOWAGE—NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES—EXPENSES OF GETTING OFF—PROTEST.

1. Where a vessel is aground amidships, and in danger of springing a leak, and wetting a valuable cargo, courts will not, as against the party by whose negligence she was grounded, scrutinize very closely the expense of getting her off, provided the master has acted in good faith.

2. The expense of a protest made before unloading, will be allowed, though it proves to be unnecessary.

On the libel of James Cooper and Robert Meginnity, owners of the schooner Columbian, for negligent towing and grounding of the schooner on a reef above Belle Isle, in Detroit river, June 9th, 1871. Libellants claimed damages for lightering, services of tugs and services of men in getting the schooner off, for damage to cargo, repairs, demurrage, etc., to the amount of $2,500. The answer admitted the towing and grounding of the schooner, but denied that the grounding was caused by negligence, or any fault on the part of the Michael Groh, or that the latter was liable for any part of the damages claimed.

W. A. Moore, for libellant.
H. B. Brown, for claimant.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. On the hearing, it was conceded that the Michael Groh was in fault, and that she is liable for all proper damages in consequence of the grounding of the schooner, including all necessary expenses in getting her off. The only contest there is relates to certain items of expenses and damages claimed by libellants. The items objected to, and the objections raised, will be taken up and considered in their order:

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

First. As to the services of the tug U. S. Grant, eleven hours, at $20 per hour, $220. The objections to this item are, first, that by an agreement between the master of the schooner, and the master of the Michael Groh, the latter was to get the schooner off at the expense of the Groh, and it is claimed that by virtue of this agreement, the master of the Groh had the right to select the means, and that the U. S. Grant was employed by the master of the schooner against the consent of the master of the Groh, and in violation of the tenor and effect of the said agreement; second, that the U. S. Grant was retained longer than was necessary, and after it clearly appeared that the vessel could not be got off by her; third, that it was poor judgment to attempt to pull her off without first lightering. Soon after the grounding of the schooner, there was some conversation between the two masters about getting the schooner off; but the evidence fails to satisfy me that it amounted to anything more than a recognition by the master of the Michael Groh of his liability for the grounding, saying at the same time that he would get her off. The future conduct of the two masters would seem to indicate that this was all there was of it, and that they in fact worked in concert, each doing all he could, according to his best judgment, to accomplish the result. About the only difference between them, so far as I can discover from the evidence, was in what appeared to be the controlling motive of each in what he did or refrained from doing. On the part of the master of the schooner it seemed to be expedition—to get his vessel off in the shortest possible time, regardless of expense. On the part of the master of the Michael Groh it seemed to be economy in the expenses—to get her off, but to do it with the least possible expense, even if it involved more or less delay.

The evidence shows that the schooner got aground about nine o'clock in the afternoon of June 10th, 1871. After the Michael Groh had pulled upon her for some time, and long enough to satisfy them that she could not pull the schooner off without aid, the two masters went to Detroit in quest of aid. Early the next morning they applied to the owner of the tug U. S. Grant, but the master of the Michael Groh objecting to his terms, they left in quest of cheaper aid. After spending an hour and a half or two hours in a vain search, the master of the schooner returned to the owner of the U. S. Grant and engaged her at twenty dollars per hour, and one hundred dollars for use of hawser. This was done without any further consultation with the master of the Michael Groh, and without his having withdrawn the objection made by him in the morning. This illustrates the controlling motives of the two masters as before suggested —the one being all for expedition, and the other all for economy. But let us see what justification there was for the master of the schooner to do as he did. His vessel was heavily laden with wheat. She was aground nearly amidships, both ends being clear of the bottom. She was in great danger of straining and springing a leak, and thus not only damaging her hull, but causing great damage to the cargo by wetting. Every hour's delay tended to precipitate these results. And in addition to these facts, the agent of the insurers of the cargo was urging expedition. It was under these circumstances that the master of the schooner engaged the services of the tug U. S. Grant as he did. I think he was fully justified in doing so. He had, in my opinion, been even liberal with the master of the Michael Groh in waiting for him as long as he did, and aiding him to find cheaper aid. He could hardly have been justified to his owners and the underwriters in waiting longer.

After the U. S. Grant had been employed and had commenced operations, the master of the Michael Groh succeeded in obtaining the gratuitous services of the United States revenue cutter Fessenden to aid in pulling the schooner off. The united forces of the Fessenden, the U. S. Grant and the Michael Groh, however, proved unavailing. It was then determined to lighten the schooner, and the U. S. Grant was retained to pull upon her from time to time while the lightening was going on, so as to diminish the necessity for lightening as much as possible. It was this retention of the Grant that constitutes the second objection to the allowance for the services, in part. I think her retention was for a proper and legitimate purpose, and that the objection is therefore untenable.

The third objection to the allowance for the services of the U. S. Grant is, that good judgment required that the schooner should have been first lightened before attempting to pull her off. The necessity of lightening was not so evident before an attempt to pull her off had been made as to make such attempt unjustifiable. It was, in fact, mere matter of speculation, whether she could or whether she could not be got off without lightening. If she could be got off without it, then it was the duty of those in charge to do so, and they could ascertain only by trying. But beyond all this, if there was any mistake of judgment here, it was a mutual mistake, and the respondents are estopped from claiming any advantage on account of it. The item for services of the tug U. S. Grant is allowed at the amount claimed by libellants, $220.

Third. As to the item for services of the schooner Nettie Howard, lightening, $480. The proof shows that the employment was by the hour, at $8 per hour. The objections are, first, that the rate per hour is extravagant; that a vessel could by reasonable diligence have been obtained for $3 per hour, which would have answered the purpose; second, that the proof fails to show a sufficient length of time to come to the amount charged, even at the rate paid. The first objection is not sustained by the proofs. There was some proof that there was an open scow somewhere within reach, which might have been obtained at $3 per hour. In the first place there is no proof that the master of the schooner knew that fact. If it was his duty to ascertain it, it was equally the duty of the master of the Michael Groh not only to ascertain it, but to inform the other of it. It is true the master of the schooner seems to have employed the first vessel he could find; but, under the circumstances, respondents have no right to be very nice in their requirements of diligence on the part of the vessel in peril, in order to save a few dollars to the vessel by whose fault the peril accrued, when such diligence involved loss of time and consequent added peril to the vessel. And, in the second place, I do not think it would have been prudent to employ an open scow as a lighter, in view of the nature of the cargo.

The second objection to this item is sustained. The length of time the Nettie Howard was employed, as shown by the proofs, and as conceded in the argument, was 47½ hours, which, at $8 per hour, amounts to $380. The Nettie Howard was a Canadian vessel, and the difference in the two currencies was made up, being twelve per cent. at that time; this must therefore be added to the above amounts, making a total of $425 60, at which amount the item for services of the Nettie Howard for lightening is allowed, in lieu of $480, as claimed.

Sixth. As to the item for expenses of protest, $7 75. The objection to this item is that protest was unnecessary. On arriving at Buffalo, the destination of the schooner, the master, not knowing how badly the cargo might be injured, as a prudential step with reference to the insurance on the cargo, got out protest papers before unloading. Now, while protest was unnecessary to charge the Michael Groh, yet it was, to say the least, prudent under the circumstances, for the purpose above stated, and I think it ought to be allowed. The item for expenses of protest is, therefore, allowed at the amount actually paid, $7 75.

The remaining exceptions involved simply questions of fact. Exceptions overruled.

[Brun. Col. Cas. 63; [1] 3 Day, 294.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Sept., 1808.

COURTS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION — ALIENS — SEAMEN—CORPORAL PUNISHMENT—DISOBEDIENCE.

1. Federal courts do not acquire jurisdiction of a case because one of the parties is a subject of a foreign power; such subject may still be a naturalized citizen. The party must be stated to be an alien in express terms.

[Cited in Berlin v. Jones, Case No. 1,343.]

2. The master of a vessel has a right during the voyage to punish mariners by corporal chastisement for disobedience to his reasonable commands for insolence and other offenses.

[Cited in Fuller v. Colby, Case No. 5,149.]

This was an action of assault and battery [by Charles Michaelson, of Bass End, in the Island of St. Croix, a foreign subject, viz., a subject of the King of Sweden." By the constitution of the United States the judicial power may extend to cases between citizens of a state and foreign subjects; but congress, in the provision of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 73] under that clause, have restricted it to cases in which "an alien is a party." He must be stated to be an alien, in express terms. It is not sufficient that the description be such as to imply it. This court will take nothing by implication. Besides, it is a non sequitur that because a man is a subject of a foreign power he is an alien; he may be at the same time a naturalized citizen of this state.

Mr. Staples, for plaintiff, moved for leave to amend.

Mr. Staples and Mr. Wales, for plaintiff.

Mr. Ingersoll and N. Smith, for defendants.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, at first said he did not see how a court not having jurisdiction could make any order in the cause. But upon its being stated that an amendment had been allowed, at the last term, under similar circumstances, he remarked that the court had not committed itself on the point; and after a short consultation between the judges, the motion was granted upon payment of costs. On the trial it appeared that Denison, one of the defendants, was the master of a vessel, and the plaintiff his mariner; and that the beating complained of consisted in the punishment inflicted by the former upon the latter, for disobedience of orders, insolent language and personal violence. The plaintiff's counsel contended that the master has no right to inflict corporal punishment for insolent language, nor for disobedience to orders, not relating immediately to the management of the vessel, nor, indeed, for past offenses of any kind.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, in summing up, after taking notice of the weapon, which was not dangerous, the mode of punishment, which was not unusual, and the degree which, however severe, was less that sufficient to reduce the plaintiff to submission, recognized the right of the master, during the voyage, to correct a mariner for disobedience to any reasonable commands, and for insolence and other offenses. The punishment, in its nature, is not limited to confinement, corporal chastise-ment being often necessary and proper; and as to its extent, depends upon the circumstances of the case, the aggravation of the offense, or the continuance of the disobedience. This is a salutary authority and ought to be maintained. Without it, it would be impossible to navigate our vessels.

[2] [Assumpsit by Payson, assignee in bankruptcy of the Republic Insurance Co. of Chicago, against Michener, a resident of Philadelphia. The following cause of action was set forth in the declaration: The Republic Insurance Co. issued shares of stock at the par value of $100, upon certain terms, viz.: The real and personal property of each stockholder was to be held liable for losses of the company in the amount of stock held by him, and not actually paid in; twenty per cent. of the par value was to be paid in upon delivery of the certificates, and the remaining eighty per cent. was to be assessed only in the event of the twenty per cent. cash fund of the company becoming exhausted by losses. In 1871, the defendant became the owner of twenty shares of stock, having agreed to the above terms, and having paid $400, or twenty per cent. of the par value of the same, to the company upon receipt of the certificates. Later in the same year the company met with severe losses by reason of the Chicago fire, whereby the whole of the twenty per cent. cash fund, and all other funds possessed by them were exhausted, and in 1872 the company was adjudicated bankrupt, and Payson was duly appointed assignee. In 1873, the bankruptcy court in Chicago decreed that a call and assessment should be made upon the stockholders of sixty per cent. upon each share of unpaid stock, and if default in payment should be made after March 1st, 1873, after proper notice and publication, the assignee should be empowered to bring suit for its recovery. The defendant had refused to pay the sixty per cent. assessment, and the amount claimed was $1,200, with interest. Plea non-assumpsit.

[Upon the trial, after proof of the conditions above mentioned, and of the defendant's ownership of the stock, the plaintiff offered in evidence an exemplification of the record of the bankruptcy court of Chicago to prove (1) the assignment to the assignees in bankruptcy, and (2) that an assessment had been decreed by the court, and authority given to the assignee to collect it. Admitted under objection by the defendant (1) that the papers were not properly bound together; (2) because it was not a copy of the whole record; and (3) it did not appear by them that the defendant had notice of the proceedings referred to therein.

[The defendant offered to prove by his own testimony that he was induced to purchase the stock by the representations of the agent of the company in Philadelphia, to the effect that all Philadelphia subscriptions were to be the capital stock of a Philadelphia branch of the company, to be securely held and invested in Philadelphia under the management of a local board of directors, elected by the Philadelphia stockholders; that this arrangement was in fact, carried out for about twenty months when the company abolished the local branch at Philadelphia and the local board of management without the consent of the Philadelphia stockholders. Objected to; objection sustained. The defendant then offered to prove, by the testimony of the assignee, Payson, (1) that the company before bankruptcy had abolished a similar branch office in New York, and had bought back from the local stockholders there the stock they had subscribed for, and had released them from all liability for any further assessment on the stock; (2) that after the Chicago fire the insured received a payment of twenty-five per cent. of their losses; and in consideration of immediate payment released the company from further liability, which releases the company afterwards surrendered without consideration, and allowed them to prove their claims in full, on account of which the assessment became necessary; and (3) that losses to a large amount were adjusted by the company, and policy holders and stockholders were permitted by the company to pay their assessment by certificates of indebtedness issued for adjusted losses after insolvency. Objections to these offers were sustained. The defendant then testified that he paid $500 when he received his certificate of stock, $400 on the stock and $100 premium.

[THE COURT charged the jury, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount claimed by him, unless the defendant was entitled to a credit of $100.

[Verdict for plaintiff for $1,232.

[Defendant assigned as error: The admission in evidence of the exemplification of the bankruptcy record, the rejection of his offers, and the charge of the court as given above.] [2]

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The first assignment of error relates to the admission in evidence of a record of proceedings in bankruptcy in the district court for the Northern district of Illinois, against the Republic Insurance Company of Chicago, as assignee of which the defendant in error brought this suit. It was objected to on the ground that it does not purport to be a copy of the whole record, but it was admitted to show, 1st, an assignment to the plaintiff below, and 2d, an assessment by the authority of the bankrupt court upon the stock of the bankrupt company to pay losses. There can be no doubt of the admissibility of this record to show the assignment, because the 14th section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)] expressly provides, that a copy thereof, duly certified by the clerk of the court, under the seal thereof, shall be conclusive evidence of the assignee's title to sue for the bankrupt's property. But was it properly admitted for the additional purpose for which it was offered? The bankrupt act, while it enacts that the proceedings in all cases in bankruptcy shall be deemed matter of record does not treat these proceedings as constituting an integral record, for it declares that they shall not be recorded at large, but shall be filed, kept, and numbered, in the office of the clerk of the court, and copies of such record, duly certified by that office, under the seal of the court, are made presumptive evidence of all the facts therein stated. It would therefore, seem to be the intent of the act, that in so far as any of these proceedings might be used as evidence, copies of them are to be authenticated as separate records, and so are competent presumptive evidence of the facts stated in them. The certificate of the clerk of the court authenticates the copies of the papers and proceedings contained in the record "as true copies of all the papers filed, proceedings had, and record and docket entries made in said case, and of the whole thereof, in any way relating to an assessment upon the stockholders of said company," etc. It is an exemplification of all "matters of record" touching the assessment, and, as such, was properly admitted to show that fact.

The second assignment is founded upon the rejection of the offer to prove, by the plaintiff in error, certain representations made by the agent of the insurance company to him, when he made his subscription of stock, touching the establishment of a branch in Philadelphia, of which the subscriptions made there were to be the capital which was to be under the control of a local board of directors, and was to be set apart for losses in Philadelphia risks, accompanied by further proof that this local office had been withdrawn, and the assurances given had not been fulfilled. While it did not appear that any loss or injury whatever could result to the plaintiff in error from the partial non-fulfillment of these representations, it is at least questionable whether such evidence could have the effect of relieving the plaintiff in error from the payment of any part of his subscription. But in this suit it is altogether unavailable to him. Like a creditor's bill in equity, this suit is a proceeding by the constituted representative of a bankrupt corporation to collect its assets, that they may be applied to the payment of its debts. The plaintiff in error is a subscriber to its stock, of which subscription he has paid only twenty per cent. The remaining eighty per cent. is part of the assets of the corporation, indispensably required for the payment of its debts, and its creditors may lawfully insist that it shall be so appropriated. Now, it is plain that the plaintiff in error cannot gainsay this right of the creditors, unless he can show such an equity as would entitle him to a preference over them, if he had paid up his stock subscription in full. But he took and held a certificate for the full amount of the stock subscribed for by him, and received dividends upon it, and upon the basis of his subscription and that of others, the company was enabled to create its indebtedness. Surely, as against those who became creditors of the corporation upon the faith and security of its stock subscriptions, his equity is subordinate and unavailing, and was rightly so treated by the court below.

The only remaining question which requires notice, relates to the legal sufficiency of the assessment upon the stockholders, which this suit was brought to recover. By virtue of the adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of an assignee, not only was the control of the bankrupt corporation over its assets, of every kind, superseded, but complete domain over them was conferred upon the assignee. He alone can sue for and recover them, and whatever rights the bankrupt had in reference to their collection, he can claim and enforce. He is also the representative of the creditors, for they can make the assets of their debtor available only through his agency. As Mr. Justice Dillon has well said: "However it might have been before, creditors cannot, since the supervention of bankruptcy, bring bills in equity or other actions in their own names directly against the stockholders, to enforce their liability with respect to their unpaid stock." It was one of the unquestionable faculties of the bankrupt corporation to assess ratably upon its unpaid stock a sum sufficient to pay its debts, and the exercise of this power the creditors might have compelled. But by the proceedings in bankruptcy, the power of the directors and the direct remedies of the creditors, in reference to the assets of the corporation, were superseded, and the assignee was constituted the representative of both these interests. In the exercise of all his functions in this twofold character, he is subject to the control and direction of the court in which the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted. It has exclusive jurisdiction of the administration of the bankrupt's assets, and of their distribution among creditors. Any adjudication which it may make in the exercise of this jurisdiction is unquestionable in a collateral proceeding in another forum. The assessment in question was directed and sanctioned by the court, which has authority so to adjudge, and for any excess in it redress must be sought in that tribunal. The record then shows a valid assessment upon the stockholders of the bankrupt, and the instruction given to the jury, in reference to it and to the right of the plaintiff below to recover, was correct.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES — TERM AT WHICH CAUSE COULD HAVE BEEN TRIED—PLEA IN BAR —ISSUE COMPLETE.

Where, in an action upon a policy of fire insurance, the defendant pleads the condition thereof, limiting the time within which suit must be brought, in bar, a reply becomes necessary to render the issue complete and the case ready for trial, and until the issue be thus completed, no term can be held to have passed at which the cause could have been tried, within the meaning of the 3d section of the act of congress, approved March 3, 1875 [18 Stat. 470], where the application for the removal is made by the party not in default for the completion of the issue, and such application is in time, and the cause removed under the act referred to.

SWING, District Judge. The plaintiff is a corporation existing under the laws of Michigan, and on the 4th day of October, 1873, filed its petition in the superior court of Cincinnati, to recover the sum of $13,513.41 from defendant—an Ohio corporation—for certain losses by fire insured against under the latter's policies. The petition is in the ordinary form, and contains the usual averments of compliance with all conditions of the policies, following, in this particular, the requirements of the Ohio Code. The defendant in due time answered, pleading the limitation, or year clause, so called, of the policy, which provides, in substance, that suit shall be commenced within twelve months from the occurrence of the loss, otherwise that the claim would be barred. No reply was filed to this answer, or action of any kind taken by plaintiff in regard to it, and on the 10th day of February, 1876, the defendant petitioned the state court in due form, accompanied by a proper bond, for the removal of the cause to this court, under the act of congress, approved March 3, 1875, and the transcript was regularly filed herein at the April, 1876, term, as required by that act. The plaintiff now moves to dismiss the cause for want of jurisdiction, and to remand it to the state court. No question is made or raised as to the citizenship of parties, the amount involved, the nature of the controversy or suit, or to the formalities necessary to remove the cause. All these are considered to be sufficient and regular. But it is claimed that the application for removal was not made in time to the state court; in other words, that it was not made at or before the term at which the cause could have been first tried after the passage of the act above mentioned, plaintiff contending that the case was at issue and ready for trial at, and long before, such passage, while the defendant maintains that the issue was, and is, incomplete for want of a reply to its answer, and that no trial could or can properly occur until such reply be filed, and that the general averment in the petition of performance of all conditions of the policy relates—as expressly provided by the Ohio Code—only to conditions precedent, and does not apply to or cover conditions subsequent, or such as are required to be pleaded specially in order to be made available as a defense, and that the plea of the year clause or limitation, set up in defendant's answer, is of this character. The pleadings under the Ohio Code, other than motions and demurrers, are limited to a petition, answer, and reply.

The question, therefore, for the determination of the court is: Was the application for removal of the cause made in time? It was not made at the first term after the passage of the law of March 3d, 1875, and if at that term the cause could have been tried, the application for removal was too late, and whether the cause could have been tried at that term depends upon the answer to the question whether it was then at issue. Without entering into an extended discussion of the general doctrine of pleading, we are of the opinion that the answer of the defendant setting up the limitation as provided in the policy, required of the plaintiff a reply. That reply not having been filed, the cause was not at issue, and could not have been tried at any term before the passage of the law in question, and before the term at which the application for removal was made. Scott v. Clinton & S. R. Co. [Case No. 12,527]. The motion to remand is therefore overruled.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1873.

INTERNAL REVENUE — PENALTY — FRAUDULENT OMISSION—SUM NOT LEGALLY TAXED—BY WHOM PENALTY DETERMINED.

1. The penalty of one hundred per cent on re-assessment of an internal revenue tax, under the act of March 2, 1867 (13 Stat. 480), for false and fraudulent omission of taxable property from the return to the assessor, cannot be lawfully collected, if the re-assessment includes a sum not legally taxed.

2. Under the act of March 2, 1867, it is a prerequisite to the lawful collection of the penalty of one hundred per cent in addition to the internal revenue tax as re-assessed according to that act, for false and fraudulent omission from the return of taxable property, that the assessor should determine that the omission was false and fraudulent, and adjudge the penalty to have been incurred. A penalty added by the assessor only on the order of his superior officer, and not as the result of his own finding upon the facts, is not legally added, and cannot lawfully be collected.

Action [against Charles W. Slack] to recover an internal revenue tax, and penalty, assessed upon the plaintiff corporation, and paid under protest.

S. Bartlett and F. W. Palfrey, for plaintiff.
F. W. Hurd, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The assessor of internal revenue for the third district in Massachusetts, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 2, 1867 (13 Stat. 480), after a return had been made by the treasurer of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, re-assessed the company on sundry items not returned by them for assessment, and which, under advice of counsel, the treasurer had, in good faith apparently, supposed were not subject to the tax. There was no concealment on the part of the company or the treasurer, as the facts upon which the assessor made his re-assessment were obtained by him from the reports of the company, which were publicly printed and widely distributed.

After examining the items on which the re-assessment was made, I see no reason to doubt the legality of any of the items except the one of $1,722.93, assessed as tax on the surplus fund of the company for the year, after deducting operating expenses and interest account, and dividends, and contributions to the sinking fund, and other items properly to be deducted from the gross earnings, before determining the amount on hand as surplus earnings for the year. But, in arriving at the result, the assessor omitted to deduct the tax already paid by the company on passengers and mails. Deducting this amount, there would be no surplus beyond that on which the company had already paid the tax. The re-assessment was for $12,772.09, which included the sum of $1,722.93 on surplus, for which the company was not legally liable on the re-assessment; and, by direction of the commissioner of internal revenue, an additional sum of $12,772.09 was assessed and collected, as a penalty for a false and fraudulent return. This penalty was illegally collected, for two reasons: First, the penalty is for the gross sum of $12,772.09, being one hundred per cent on $12,772.09, when $1,722.93 should be deducted, leaving only $11,049.16 to be re-assessed, and a like sum to be added as penalty; namely, a penalty of $11,049.16, instead of a penalty of $12,772.09. The penalty being in one sum, and bad in part, is bad in the whole.

Second, the evidence shows that the assessor did not determine that the omission was false and fraudulent, and therefore adjudge the penalty to have been incurred. He added the penalty only on the order of his superior officer, and not as the result of his own finding upon the facts of the case. He appears to have arrived at the conclusion that the omission was not false and fraudulent; and I see no reason to doubt the correctness of his conclusion. The act of adjudging the omission to have been false and fraudulent was a quasi judicial act, to be performed by the assessor himself; and as he never so adjudged it, but only added the penalty under orders from his superior officer, the penalty was not legally added, and was not collected by authority of law. Judgment for the plaintiff for the two sums of $12,772.09 and $1,722.93, with interest from the date of payment.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ACT OF CONGRESS—CONSTITUTIONALITY—LAWS IMPAIRING OBLIGATION OF DEBTS.

1. Constitutionality of the internal revenue law of 1866 considered and affirmed.

2. The restriction upon the passage by the states of laws impairing the obligations of contracts not applicable to the federal government.

[3. Cited and disapproved in U. S. v. Erie R. Co., Case No. 15,056, in respect to the point that under the statute the interest payable by a corporation upon its bonds, is either the property of the corporation, and thus rightfully taxable, or the property of the bondholder, and thus taxable because in the shape of funds within the jurisdiction of the taxing power, the tax attaching to the interest, as funds of the bondholder in the hands of the corporation.]

This suit was brought August 16, 1871, in the state court, after appeal duly made to the commissioner of internal revenue, to recover the amount of an internal revenue tax of eight hundred and sixty dollars and thirty-three cents, paid to the defendant [Charles W. Slack] as collector of internal revenue for the Third Massachusetts internal revenue district, on the 28th February, 1870. It was duly removed to this court by certiorari, and was here heard upon agreed facts. The tax was assessed on or about the 19th day of February, 1870, on sterling bond interest paid by said company in London in gold, in the previous month of January, by cashing certain coupons which then fell due. The coupons taxed as aforesaid were attached to certain sterling bonds issued by said railroad company, to the amount of 95,700, and negotiated by their agents in London in the year 1852, or early in 1853; many years before the passage of the first internal revenue law of the United States. These bonds were due in July, 1872, and were paid at maturity in gold in London. So far as the company knows, not one of these bonds was ever held by any person in the United States, or by other than non-resident aliens, and the interest accruing was regularly paid in gold in full in London, without rebate, or reservation of the United States internal revenue tax.

F. W. Palfrey, for plaintiff.

P. Cummings, Asst. U. S. Atty., for defendant.

The case was argued at the October term, 1875, of this court, before CLARK, District Judge, sitting as circuit judge. Judge Clark held the case under advisement until October 3, 1876, when he delivered the following opinion:

The case is well presented in the agreed statement of facts, and the sole question before the court is, whether congress had power to impose the tax. The statute of the United States provides: "That any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack water company, indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip, or money due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, as part of the earnings, profits, income, or gains of such company carried to the account of any fund, or used for construction, shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest or coupons, dividends or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, and said companies are hereby authorized to deduct and withhold from all payments on account of any interest, or coupons, or dividends due and payable as aforesaid, the tax of five per centum; and the payment of the amount of said tax so deducted from the interest or coupons, or dividends, and certified by the president or treasurer of said company, shall discharge said company from that amount of the dividend or interest, or coupon on the bonds or other evidence of their indebtedness so held by any person or party whatever, except where said company have contracted otherwise." 14 Stat. 138, 139. In considering this statute in the case of U. S. v. Railroad Co., 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 322, the supreme court held that the tax imposed was upon the creditor and not upon the corporation; and the corporation is made use of as a convenient means of collecting the tax. But it is difficult to see how that decision can be made applicable in this case; because the corporation here paid the interest in full, for the reason as stated in the brief of the plaintiff that they had "otherwise contracted." If this be so, the case falls within the exception of the statute "except when said company have otherwise contracted," and the tax falls on the corporation and not on the bondholders. But whether the tax authorized and imposed be upon the corporation or upon the bondholders, who in this case appear to be foreigners, we think the tax can be supported. The language of the statute is broad enough and explicit enough for that purpose. The language is "any railroad" indebted by bonds stipulating for interest, "shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, and to whatsoever party or person the same shall be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens," and may deduct the tax paid from the interest due the bondholder, "except when said companies have otherwise contracted." Speaking of this statute in Railroad Co. v. Jackson, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 269, Mr. Justice Nelson, who delivered the opinion of the court in that case, said "the question hereafter will be not whether the law embraced the alien non-resident holder, but whether it is competent for congress to impose it." Id. Could congress then impose this tax?

The constitution of the United States says (article 1, § 8) "the congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence, and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imports, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States," that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken," and that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state." These are the only express provisions in the constitution in regard to taxation, and they contain the only express restrictions upon congress on that subject. There is nothing further as to the persons to be taxed, nor as to the objects or manner of taxation. But it is very obvious, that taxation cannot extend beyond the jurisdiction of the taxing power; and that the objects of taxation must be within its territorial limits. So it was decided in Railroad Co. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall [82 U. S.] 300. In that case, it was held that "bonds issued by a railroad company are property in the hands of the holders, and when held by non-residents of the state, in which the company was incorporated, they are property beyond the jurisdiction of the state." But the decision in that case was upon a taxation by the state of Pennsylvania, under a statute of that state very different from the statute of the United States, now under consideration; and the decision was upon a ground, as the principal one, so entirely wanting in this case, that I have not found that case a satisfactory guide in this; though some of the reasons there presented are of weight here. "Persons, property and business," it is said, "are proper subjects of taxation." "It may touch property in every shape, in its natural condition, in its manufactured form, and in its various transmutations." "It may touch business in its almost infinite forms, in which it is conducted, in professions, in commerce, in manufactures, and in transportation." "Unless restrained by the provisions of the federal constitution, the power of congress as to the mode, form, objects, and extent of taxation is unlimited." Railroad Co. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 319.

Now, applying these principles to the case under consideration, I think the tax must be sustained. The statute provides "that any railroad, canal, turnpike, canal navigation, or slack water company indebted for any money for which bonds or other evidence of indebtedness have been issued, payable in one or more years after date, upon which interest is stipulated to be paid, or coupons representing the interest, or any such company that may have declared any dividend in scrip or money due or payable to its stockholders, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens, shall be subject to pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest, or coupons, dividend or profits, whenever and wherever the same shall be payable, including non-residents, whether citizens or aliens." Now when this interest became due and payable, whose property was it? If it was the railroad's, then the railroad was rightfully taxed for it. If it was not the railroad's, then it was the bondholders' and was equally the subject of taxation, as it was within the jurisdiction of the taxing power, and the tax could be collected out of the funds under its control. The tax attached to this interest, as soon as it became due in the hands of the railroad, and if, as the supreme court says, the railroad is only a convenient mode of collecting the tax, they are so because they have funds of the bondholders in their hands. The case is analogous to what is known in some of the states as the trustee process, by which the property rights or credits of one person are attached in the hands of another. As if A. owes B. a creditor of B. may attach a debt due by A. to B. in the hands of A. The same thing is done in other states by the process of garnishment.

There is another consideration of much force. Congress is the taxing power, at liberty to choose the objects of taxation, the methods and the amount, under the restrictions of the constitution. It may make its own laws for effectuating its purpose. In the internal revenue law of 1866, in the section just quoted, it has laid a tax on interest due from railroads on their bonds eo nomine; and in this case have collected it. If there were nothing to collect the tax out of, then the tax must fail. But in this case, they have reached the fund, and have collected the tax, out of the interest, mentioned in the statute. What is there in the constitution of the United States to forbid this? and if there be nothing, what power has this court, or any other court to say it shall not be done? If it be said this interest is not the fund of the bondholder, then it must follow that the bondholder is not taxed, because the tax is laid upon the interest. "Shall be subject to and pay a tax of five per centum on the amount of all such interest," are the words of the statute.

In the case of Railroad Co. v. Pennsylvania, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 320, Mr. Justice Field said that bonds issued by the railroad in that case were property undoubtedly, but property in the hands of the holders, and not the property of the obligors. That is undoubtedly true, when you speak of the bonds as such; the bonds are the property of the owners, but the fund out of which they are to be paid is in the hands of the obligors, and it is precisely the interest accruing from this fund that congress has taxed in the hands of the obligors. The remark made by Justice Field, that this is not a legitimate exercise of the taxing power, must be held to apply to the case then before the court, which was a taxation by the state of Pennsylvania, which the court held impaired the obligation of a contract. But no such consideration arises here, and if a taxation by congress be within the limits of the federal constitution, no contract between persons, natural or artificial, or states and persons, can be set up to defeat it. States cannot pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts, but there is no such restriction in the federal constitution upon the congress as to the power of taxation. It is a question for their wisdom and discretion, and not a constitutional prohibition.

Objection is made that such a taxation was in violation of the constitutional provisions, that all taxation should be uniform throughout the United States, "and that private property shall not be taken for public uses without just compensation," and "that it was an attempt to tax subjects over which the sovereign power of the state did not extend." But it is difficult to see, and the court does not see any particular in which the tax is not uniform throughout the United States. It is laid upon all railroads indebted by bond, in the same amount, and collected in the same manner. The extent and operation are the same for all within the United States. If it operates indirectly otherwise upon the non-resident, it is a sufficient answer to say that he is without the constitutional limit of the taxation, and the tax cannot be defeated on that account. The tax must be uniform throughout the United States, not beyond them. The provision of the statute, that the payment of the tax should discharge the company from so much of the interest except where the companies have contracted otherwise extends to all railroads throughout the United States, and if any company has contracted otherwise, it is an undertaking of their own, with which congress wisely does not seek to interfere, but it cannot be set up to defeat the tax. That exception is uniform throughout the United States.

The objection that the tax takes private property for public use without just compensation is equally untenable. We do not think that provision of the constitution is applicable to taxation. "A tax," says Mr. Justice Hunt, in the case of U. S. v. Railroad Co., 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 326, "is understood to be a charge, a pecuniary burden, for the support of the government." It might be laid by an oppressive or very badly administered government, and no benefit received from the payment of the tax by the taxpayer, and yet the tax might be legal. Taking property for public use is where the land or other property of an individual is taken from him, and for the use of the government, or public, and where if the property were not paid for, the burden would fall chiefly upon the person whose property is taken, and not upon the public generally. In such case payment must be made to prevent inequality. Nor is it sufficient to defeat this taxation to allege that it was an attempt to tax subjects over which the sovereign power of the state did not extend. If by the word "subjects" persons be meant, the answer is, that no attempt is made to tax persons; if by it property be meant, the answer is, that property found within the jurisdiction is a proper subject of taxation.

Case No. 9,528.

MICHIGAN INS. BANK v. ELDRED.

[6 Biss. 370;[1] 7 Chi. Leg. News, 411; 21 Int. Rev. Rec. 315.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. July, 1875.

ESTOPPEL—PLEA IN BAR—RECORD OF ANOTHER ACTION.

1. In assumpsit upon a promissory note, the bar of a judgment in another state upon the same note is not avoided by the record of an action upon that judgment to which the defendant pleaded nul tiel record, and in which action plaintiff took a nonsuit. The plea of the judgment is good, there is no estoppel, and the second record is not admissible in evidence.

2. Doctrine of estoppels considered.

This was an action upon a promissory note for $4,000, dated June 12, 1861, made by F. E. Eldred, payable in sixty days, to order of and indorsed by Eldred & Balcom. At the trial, the plaintiff introduced in evidence the note sued on, and after presenting some other testimony not necessary to mention, rested. To bar a recovery, the defendant, Anson Eldred, introduced in evidence the record of a judgment recovered May 13, 1862, upon this note by the above-named plaintiff against the defendant, in the circuit court of Wayne county, in the state of Michigan. Other testimony not important to notice was then introduced and the defendant rested. To avoid the effect of the Michigan judgment, the plaintiff offered in evidence the record of an action commenced March 2, 1863, upon that judgment by this plaintiff, against these defendants, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Wisconsin, the record of which action showed that the defendant, Anson Eldred, interposed as a defense therein the plea of nul tiel record, to which there was a replication. It appeared also by that record, that on the 18th of April, 1864, a judgment of non-suit was entered in that action. This record, or, to speak more accurately, the defendant's plea of nul tiel record, it was claimed by counsel for plaintiff, must operate to estop the defendant from now pleading in the present cause the Michigan judgment as a bar to a recovery. The defendant objected to the introduction in evidence of the record thus offered, insisting that it was immaterial and created no estoppel. The court sustained the objection, excluded the record, held the Michigan judgment a bar to a recovery on the note, and directed a verdict for defendant; which ruling, was claimed on this motion for a new trial, to be erroneous.

Finches, Lynde & Miller, for plaintiff.
Cottrill & Cary, for defendant.

DYER, District Judge. I have re-examined the question involved in this cause and the authorities cited by counsel. Upon the single issue presented by the note and the Michigan judgment, the defendant would of necessity be entitled to a verdict, as that judgment would bar a recovery on the note. Eldred v. Michigan Ins. Bank, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 545. Could the plea of nul tiel record interposed by the defendant, Anson Eldred, in the suit brought in Wisconsin upon the Michigan judgment, operate as an estoppel so as to preclude him from setting up that judgment in the present action as a bar to the plaintiff's recovery upon the note? An estoppel has been well defined as "an obstruction or bar to one's alleging or denying a fact contrary to his own previous action, allegation or denial, upon the faith of which another has acted."

To give to a judgment the effect of an estoppel, it must appear that the matter in question was or might have been directly involved in the former action as a necessary issue, and was passed upon by the court or jury at the former trial. Kerr v. Hays, 35 N. Y. 331. The point or question in controversy must have been determined and adjudicated to make the record of the former proceedings conclusive. Where an action has been dismissed or a judgment given for the defendant upon a preliminary point before reaching the merits, it is no bar to another action. New England Bank v. Lewis, 8 Pick. 113; Hughes v. Blake [Case No. 6,845]; McDonald v. Rainor, 8 Johns. 442. "It is the judgment upon the findings that makes the estoppel. If the judgment be one of non-suit or in the nature of non-suit, and the action be dismissed, nothing whatever is adjudged in respect to a subsequent suit. It is no bar to anything." Sheldon v. Edwards, 35 N. Y. 279. "The rule that estoppels must be certain to every intent, is peculiarly applicable to estoppels by record and judicial proceedings, and for this reason the record of a judgment must show with some degree of certainty the precise points determined, and not from inference or argument; and where it gives no indications at all of what particular matters were adjudicated, it leaves the question unsettled and is not available either as an estoppel or anything else, but merely evidence of its own existence. * * * When the judgment is used in pleading as a technical estoppel, or is relied on by way of evidence as conclusive per se, it must appear by the record of the prior suit, that the particular controversy sought to be concluded was necessarily tried and determined." Herm. Estop. § 86. A party cannot plead a former judgment as an estoppel to a present action unless the same point is put in issue on the record and directly found by the court or jury. Eastman v. Cooper, 15 Pick. 276; Gilbert v. Thompson, 9 Cush. 348. "The effect of what occurs in one judicial proceeding upon another, is sometimes due to the principles of estoppel in pais, rather than by record. A man who obtains or defeats a judgment by pleading or representing an act of adjudication in one aspect, is estopped from giving it a different and inconsistent character in another suit founded upon the same subject-matter." Herm. Estop. § 100. But it must appear that the judgment was obtained or defeated because of the pleading interposed or representation made.

An estoppel in pais happens when a party makes a statement or admission, either expressly or by implication, with the intention of influencing the conduct of another, and that other acts upon the faith of such statement or admission, and will suffer injury if such party is permitted to deny it. Norton v. Kearney, 10 Wis. 443; Brown v. Bowen, 30 N. Y. 519. "The doctrine of equitable estoppel is founded upon the principle that a party has by his own voluntary act, placed himself in such a situation in regard to some fact, that he is precluded from denying it." Herm. Estop. § 328. And it must appear that the declarations or acts claimed to create the estoppel were relied and acted upon by the person in whose favor the estoppel is invoked.

Applying these principles, what is the state of case here presented? Clearly, not an estoppel by judgment, because it does not appear that the judgment of the circuit court in Wisconsin was upon the plea of nul tiel record, or resulted from that plea. The form of that judgment is as follows: "This day this cause was called for trial, and came the parties by their counsel, when the plaintiff by its counsel took a non-suit." Then follows a judgment for costs. Nothing was found or determined by the court, as far as the record shows, upon the plea. It was merely a judgment of voluntary non-suit. It is true that the plea of nul tiel record was the only plea that could have been interposed in that action, except the plea of payment, or satisfaction, or the like. But it does not appear from the record that the act or pleading of the defendant produced the action of the plaintiff in taking a non-suit. It does not appear that the judgment of non-suit was necessitated, or that a judgment for the plaintiff was defeated by the plea of nul tiel record. There may have been numerous reasons why the non-suit was taken other than the interposition of this plea. The case of Washington, A. & G. Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 333, is here in point. It was there held that the record of a former suit between the parties, in which the declaration consisted of a special count, and the common money counts, and where there was a general verdict on the entire declaration, cannot be given in evidence as an estoppel in a second suit founded on the special count; for the verdict may have been rendered on the common counts. Since it does not appear that the plaintiff relied and acted upon the plea which the defendant interposed, I think the case is not within the principles of an estoppel in pais. Moreover, whether or not there was a valid record and judgment, must have been as well known to the plaintiff in the suit on the Michigan judgment in the circuit court in Wisconsin, as to the defendant in that action.

In the cases cited by the learned counsel for plaintiff, I think it clearly appears that the action of the courts and of the parties was based upon the pleading, which was held to operate as an estoppel. Kelly v. Eichman, 3 Whart. 419; Campbell v. Stephens, 66 Pa. St. 314; Presbyterian Congregation v. Williams, 9 Wend. 148. Especially is this true of Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Howard, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 308, where the plaintiff brought an action of assumpsit upon an instrument which the defendant insisted was a sealed instrument; and upon this plea the defendant obtained a judgment, to the effect that the action of assumpsit would not lie. The plaintiff bringing a second action of covenant, it was held that the defendant was estopped to deny in that action that the instrument was a sealed instrument, because, in the first action, the claim of the defendant not only induced the plaintiff to bring the second action, but defeated the first, by asserting and maintaining the paper in controversy to be the deed of the company. This was clearly a case of estoppel in pais.

The case of Sheppard v. Hamilton, 29 Barb. 156, was strongly urged by plaintiff's counsel at the trial, and again in argument of this motion. The facts were these: Whittlesey held a note of $1,000, made by Emery and Peter Thayer. The defendant, Hamilton, became legally bound to Emery Thayer to pay this note. Subsequently, Hamilton negotiated with Whittlesey an extension of time for the payment of the $1,000, and consummated the same by delivery to Whittlesey of a note for $1,000, made by himself and J. A. Hamilton, to the order of Henry Decker, and indorsed by Decker; and Whittlesey thereupon gave up the Thayer note to the defendant, who delivered it to Thayer. The substituted note not being paid when due, the plaintiff, having become possessed by assignment of all the interest of Whittlesey in both notes, commenced an action on the last note against the makers and indorser. The defendants put in a verified answer, alleging a usurious agreement between Whittlesey and the defendant, Hamilton. The plaintiff, on the coming in of this answer, discontinued his action and began another action on the first note. Held, that in the action on the first note, the defendant should not be permitted to deny that what he alleged under his oath in the previous action was true. Here it seems apparent that, relying upon the allegation of usury made by the defendants in the first action, the plaintiff acted upon it, discontinued and abandoned his action, and brought a new action on the original note to avoid the alleged usury, and solely because of the plea of usury. Here was a clear ground for application of the principle of equitable estoppel. Moreover, in that case, the plaintiff was the transferee of Whittlesey. He was not a party to the alleged usurious agreement. The usury sprang from the contract between Whittlesey and Hamilton, and the plaintiff was a stranger to it, and when the defendants plead it, the plaintiff could rightfully rely upon the plea as cause for withdrawal of his suit. But in the case at bar, the plaintiff and defendant were the identical parties to the record of the Michigan judgment, and the plaintiff must be presumed to have had equal knowledge with the defendant of the validity of that record and judgment. If it appeared here that the plea of nul tiel record occasioned and was the cause of the non-suit taken by the plaintiff in the action on the Michigan judgment, if the record showed that the plaintiff relied and acted upon that plea, the principle would be applicable that "when the ground taken by either party to a suit is prejudicial to the other by cutting him off from a good defense, or precluding a recovery on a valid cause of action, it will bind the party who adopts it by an equitable estoppel."

In any view I can take of this question, I am unable to reach a different conclusion from that arrived at on the trial. Motion for new trial denied.

DEED OF CORPORATION—POSSESSION—TITLE—JUDGMENT—ATTACHMENT—SERVICE—CONSPICUOUS PLACE.

1. The signatures of the proper officers appearing to an instrument purporting to be the deed of a corporation, the presumption is that such instrument was signed by them by authority of the corporation; and if the seal of the corporation is upon such instrument, that itself is prima facie evidence of their authority to sign.

2. Possession is prima facie evidence of title, and proof of prior possession is sufficient to maintain ejectment against a mere trespasser.

3. When both parties in ejectment claim title from the same person, neither is at liberty to deny that such person had title.

[Approved in McDonald v. Hannah, 8 C. C. A. 426, 59 Fed. 978.]

[Cited in Smith v. Laatsch, 114 Ill. 273, 2 N. E. 59.]

4. A personal judgment for money or damages in a state court against an absent defendant who did not appear in the action, is so far a nullity.

5. By a valid attachment of property within its jurisdiction a state court acquires jurisdiction to give judgment that an absent defendant not otherwise served with process in the proceeding is indebted to the plaintiff therein, and to enforce the payment of the same by the sale of such property.

6. Where the statute authorizes a writ of attachment to be served upon real property by leaving a copy of the same with the occupant thereof, "or if there be no occupant," then "in a conspicuous place" thereon, and it appears from the return that the writ was served by posting a copy on the premises without stating whether they were occupied or not: Held, that the service upon the premises was unauthorized and invalid, and that the judgment thereon was a nullity and the sale of the property attached void.

7. Semble, that a service of a writ of attachment by leaving a copy of the writ upon the premises is not good unless it appears that it was posted thereon "in a conspicuous place."

Action [by Robert Mickey against Julius A. Stratton] to recover possession of real property.

Addison C. Gibbs, W. Scott Beebee, and J. Quinn Thornton, for plaintiff.

Rufus Mallory and W. W. Thayer, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the possession of the east half of lots 1 and 2 in block 20, and the whole of block 15, in the town of Salem, and damages for the detention of the same.

The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is a citizen of the state of Pennsylvania and the defendant of the state of Oregon; that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the premises, and entitled to the possession of the same, which the defendant wrongfully withholds from him to his damage five hundred dollars; and that the premises are of the value of four thousand dollars.

The defendant by his answer denies the allegations of the complaint except as to the value of the property, and pleads title and right to the possession of the premises in Parrish L. Willis, which plea the plaintiff by his replication denies. The case was heard by the court without the intervention of a jury.

The premises are situated in township 7 south, of range 3 west, of the Wallamet meridian, and within the husband's half of the donation claim of William H. Willson and Chloe his wife. The "claim" was occupied by them in 1844, and claimed by Willson as a settler under the donation act in February, 1852, as appears by his notification, number forty-seven. On February 4, 1862, in pursuance of the surveyor-general's certificate, number twenty, a patent to the donation issued to Willson and wife—the south half to the husband and the north one to the wife.

On July 30, 1855, Willson and wife, in consideration of the sum of one hundred dollars, duly conveyed the east half of lots 1 and 2 aforesaid to George Lesley, who upon December 4, 1857, in consideration of the sum of two hundred dollars, duly conveyed the same to George K. Shiel.

On December 2, 1854, said Willson and wife duly conveyed sundry blocks and parcels of land situate within said Willson's half of said donation claim, including block 15 aforesaid, to "the trustees of the Wallamet University," for the "endowment and support" of the same, with the right "to sell or otherwise dispose" of the same for such purpose; and on June 11, 1857, David Leslie, as "president" of said "board of trustees," and Francis S. Hoyt, as "secretary" of the same, in consideration of the sum of seven hundred dollars, and in the name of "the trustees of Wallamet University," executed a deed to George K. Shiel for the block 15 aforesaid, the same being described therein by metes and bounds, and alleged to contain two and six hundred and twenty-five thousandths acres, "more or less."

This deed purports to be signed and sealed, and there is a scrawl or private seal at the end and right of the names of the president and secretary respectively. There is also what appears to be a corporation seal, but the same does not otherwise purport to have been affixed by the secretary. On the same day that it was signed this deed was duly acknowledged by said Leslie and Hoyt as president and secretary, as aforesaid, before J. G. Wilson, clerk of the supreme court.

The trustees of the Wallamet University were incorporated by an act of the territorial legislature, passed January 12, 1853. By section two of the same they were authorized to have and use a common seal, "impressed with such devices and inscriptions as they shall deem proper, by which said seal all deeds * * * of said corporation shall pass and be authenticated." By section four it was further provided: "That all deeds and other instruments of conveyance shall be made by the order of the board of trustees, sealed with the seal of the corporation, signed by the president, and by him acknowledged, in his official capacity, in order to insure their validity."

From the date of the incorporation of the trustees until after the date of this deed they used as their common seal the eagle face or reverse side of a twenty-dollar piece of gold, of the size and general similitude of the gold coin of the United States of that value, and inscribed around the margin—"San Francisco, California, twenty D."—and the seal upon this deed, although the impression is very indistinct and somewhat effaced, appears to have been made with this piece of gold; but it does not appear that there ever was any formal vote of said trustees adopting said piece of gold as the seal of the corporation.

On January 21, 1873, John Hughes commenced an action in the state circuit court for the county of Marion against said George K. Shiel, upon two promissory notes and an open account, wherein on March 11, 1873, he appears to have "recovered judgment," whatever that means, "against the defendant," by default, for the sum of three hundred and fifty-eight dollars and forty cents, with costs and disbursements; that by virtue of an execution issued thereon, the sheriff of said county, on March 17, levied upon said premises, and on April 11, 1873, sold the same to said Parrish L. Willis, the east half of said lots 1 and 2, for two hundred dollars and said block 15 for two hundred and fifty dollars; and after due proceedings in the premises, including a confirmation of such sale, on August 11, 1873, made and delivered a deed of the premises to said Willis as said purchaser.

On March 20, 1878, George K. Shiel, for the consideration of one thousand and ninety-five dollars, bargained, sold and quitclaimed the premises to the plaintiff.

It is claimed by the defendant that the alleged deed of June 11, 1857, from the university to Shiel, is ineffectual as a conveyance of said block 15, because it does not appear that the same was made "by the order of the trustees," as provided in section 4 of the act of incorporation, or that it is sealed with the seal of the corporation, and therefore the grantor of the plaintiff never acquired the title to such block.

But I find that the seal upon this deed is that of the corporation at that date. This being so, and the signatures of the proper officers appearing signed thereto, the presumption is that these officers did not exceed their authority in this respect; and the seal itself is prima facie evidence of their authority. Ang. & A. Corp. § 224; Koehler v. Black River F. I. Co., 2 Black [67 U. S.] 716.

But it appears from the evidence that Shiel was in possession of the premises under this deed until the conveyance by the sheriff to Parrish, under which the defendant entered. Possession is always prima facie evidence of title and proof of prior possession is sufficient to maintain ejectment against a mere trespasser. Tyler, Ej. 73; Day v. Alverson, 9 Wend. 233; Hutchinson v. Perley, 4 Cal. 34; Hicks v. Davis, Id. 69; Winans v. Christy, Id. 78; Bequette v. Caulfield, Id. 278; Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 194; Turner v. Aldridge [Case No. 14,249]; Christy v. Scott, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 290; Jones v. Easley, 53 Ga. 455; Oregon Cascades R. Co. v. Oregon Steam Nav. Co., 3 Or. 178; Eagle Woolen Mills Co. v. Monteith, 2 Or. 282.

The deed from the sheriff to Willis is claimed to be invalid, and unless it is found to be sufficient the defendant is in as a mere trespasser and the plaintiff must prevail in this action upon the prior possession of his grantor, Shiel, without reference to the validity of the deed from the university to the latter.

But there is another and conclusive answer to this objection. The plaintiff and defendant both claim under Shiel, and it is not necessary for either to prove title farther back than him. The defendant sets up an estate in fee in Willis in the premises, to defeat a recovery by the plaintiff in this action, and if he has any interest therein upon the evidence, it is derived from Shiel by means of the sheriff's sale and deed. The plaintiff claims under Shiel also, by a conveyance subsequent to that of the sheriff. Neither is therefore at liberty to deny Shiel's title at the time of the sheriff's sale. In Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 715, the supreme court says: "The defendants, equally with the complainant, claim title from the same common source. This is clear from the pleadings and the proof. If, therefore, both parties claim title from the same person, neither is at liberty to deny that such person had title."

This rule is also maintained in Eagle Woolen Mills Co. v. Monteith, 2 Or. 282; Brown v. Brown, 45 Mo. 414; Fellows v Wise, 49 Mo. 352; Butcher v. Bogers, 60 Mo. 140; Ames v. Beckley, 48 Vt. 395; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 397. Greenleaf, supra, says: "Where both parties claim under the same third person, it is sufficient to prove the derivation of title from him, without proving his title."

The plaintiff, therefore, in effect admits that at the date of the sheriff's sale Shiel had a good title to the premises, which passed to the purchaser, unless the sale was void. But the plaintiff contends that this sale was void and inoperative because the court in Hughes v. Shiel did not acquire jurisdiction of either the person of the defendant or his property.

In that action service of the summons was ordered to be made by publication for six consecutive weeks in a weekly newspaper, upon the affidavit of Hughes to the effect that Shiel was then a non-resident of the state but had property therein; and upon the same day and upon a like affidavit a writ of attachment was issued against the property of Shiel in Marion county. The summons was published in the paper directed, six times, between January 24 and February 28, 1873, both days inclusive; and on January 23, 1873, the sheriff returned the attachment, indorsed, that on January 21 he levied upon and attached the premises in controversy "by posting copies of the within writ, certified to by me, on said block 15, and also on the building standing on the east half of lots 1 and 2."

Many objections are taken by the plaintiff to the regularity and effect of these proceedings by publication and attachment which it will not be necessary to consider. The action of Hughes v. Shiel was begun and terminated before the decision of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 719. By the ruling in that case, the service of the summons by publication, even if made as by the statute provided, did not give the court jurisdiction of the person of Shiel, and the judgment in the action, so far as it depends upon such service, is a nullity. The doctrine of the case is succinctly stated in the second syllabus: "A personal judgment is without any validity if it be rendered by a state court in an action upon a money-demand against a non-resident of the state who was served by a publication of summons, but upon whom no personal service of process within the state was made and who did not appear; and no title to property passes by a sale under an execution issued upon such judgment."

In Hughes v. Shiel it was "adjudged" that the plaintiff "recover judgment against the defendant," and not some certain sum or thing of or from him. But taking this for a judgment rather than for an order for one, it is in form only a personal judgment given without service upon the defendant or his personal appearance, and is therefore so far a nullity.

But conceding this point, the defendant contends that the court acquired jurisdiction of the premises by means of the levy thereon of the attachment, and that the judgment, though personal in form, is sufficient to support the execution as to the sale of the property attached, citing Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 315, in which it was held that a proceeding may be maintained by the attachment of an absent defendant's property to enforce the collection of a debt due by him, and that in such case where there is a valid writ and levy, a judgment of the court, an order of sale and a sale and sheriff's deed, the proceeding cannot be held void when questioned collaterally. Tried by this rule, if there was a valid levy in Hughes v. Shiel, so as to give the court jurisdiction, the subsequent proceedings, in my judgment, were sufficient. For although the judgment was personal in form and did not limit the relief to be obtained thereon to the sale of the property attached, yet such was the only use made of it. And although it is true that it did not directly authorize the sale of the premises to satisfy the sum found due Hughes, and that instead of a venditioni exponas or order of sale issuing to enforce the judgment by the sale of the property attached, an execution was issued against the property of the defendant generally, as upon a personal judgment for money, yet only the property actually attached was sold thereon; and notwithstanding the return of the sheriff shows that he levied the execution upon the property sold as if the same was not attached, yet that was merely an unauthorized and useless act, because the law provides that an execution against property, as to such as is already attached, is to be executed without any further levy or seizure, by simply selling the same (Civ. Code Or. § 280, subd. 2), which practically makes an execution in such case merely a venditioni exponas —an order of sale.

But was there a valid service or levy of the attachment upon these premises? In the case of real property the law provides that a writ of attachment shall be executed "by leaving with the occupant thereof, or if there be no occupant, in a conspicuous place thereon, a copy of the writ, certified by the sheriff." Civ. Code Or. § 147, subd. 1.

In Settlemier v. Sullivan, 97 U. S. 444, it was held that under subdivision 5, § 54, Civ. Code Or., which requires a summons to be served upon "the defendant personally, or if he be not found," then upon some member of the family of a certain age, at his usual place of abode, a valid substituted service could not be made unless the officer, using at least ordinary diligence, is unable to find the defendant in the county, and that fact must affirmatively appear from his return. Says Mr. Justice Field, who delivered the opinion of the court: "If it be admitted that substituted service of this kind upon some other member of the family is sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to render a personal judgment against its head, binding him to the payment of money or damages, it can only be where the condition upon which such service is permissible is shown to exist. The inability of the officer to find the defendant was not a fact to be inferred, but a fact to be affirmatively stated in the return."

In Trullinger v. Todd, 5 Or. 39, the court held a judgment entered in vacation void, for want of due service, where there was a return of substituted service of the summons, without an affirmative statement that the defendant could not be found, saying: "The statute * * * evidently implies that when a summons is placed in the hands of an officer for service, that he will use ordinary diligence, at least, to find the party against whom the summons is issued, in order that he may make personal service upon him; but after using ordinary diligence, if he should fail to find such party, constructive service may be made; and when such service is made, the certificate should contain the fact that the party could not be found."

Now, the analogy between these cases and the one at bar is complete. The service of an attachment, in case of real property, is required to be made by leaving a copy of the writ, "with the occupant thereof," but "if there be no occupant," then, and in that case only, by leaving such copy "in a conspicuous place thereon." The law is framed upon the reasonable assumption that the occupant represents the absent owner, and therefore it requires the service to be made upon him; and no substituted service, by leaving a copy of the writ on the premises, is permissible unless there is no one in the occupation of the premises upon whom service can be made, and that fact must appear from the return, or else the service upon its face is unauthorized and invalid.

The Civ. Code Or. § 160, provides that when the writ of attachment shall be fully executed or discharged, "the sheriff shall return the same with his proceedings indorsed thereon."

The return must state what was done, and the presumption that an officer has done his duty is not sufficient to supply a material fact or circumstance which does not appear in his return. For the law having made "it his duty to indorse his proceedings under the writ, thereon, the presumption that he did his duty applies as well to the making of the return as the service of the writ, and therefore there is no room to presume that he did his duty in making the service more fully or otherwise than he has stated in his return.

In Hughes v. Shiel the attachment was not alone a collateral proceeding to obtain a lien upon property as a security for the judgment which might be obtained therein, but it was also the very process upon the due service of which depended the jurisdiction of the court. In Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 319, Mr. Justice Miller says: "Now, in this class of cases, on what does the jurisdiction of the court depend? It seems to us that the seizure of the property, or that which, in this case, is the same in effect, the levy of the writ of attachment on it, is the one essential requisite to jurisdiction, as it unquestionably is in proceedings purely in rem. Without this the court can proceed no further; with it the court can proceed to subject that property to the demand of the plaintiff. If the writ of attachment is the lawful writ of the court, issued in proper form under the seal of the court, and if it is by the proper officer levied upon property liable to attachment, when such a writ is returned into court, the power of the court over the res is established."

Neither does it appear from the return that the copy left upon the premises was posted in a conspicuous place. As to the east half of lots 1 and 2 the return states that the copy was posted "on the building" thereon, but whether on the front or back, or the upper or lower story, or whether either was "a conspicuous place" on the premises does not appear, while as to block 15, it simply states that the copy was posted "on said block."

But it is not necessary to consider the effect of this omission. The return is radically defective because it does not appear therefrom that the premises were unoccupied at the time of this alleged service by leaving a copy of the writ upon the premises, and unless they were the sheriff had no authority to make such service. The writ of attachment being the only process by which the court could acquire jurisdiction, and there being no valid service of the same it follows necessarily that its judgment was a nullity and the sale upon the execution thereon is void. There must be a finding that the plaintiff is the owner of the premises and entitled to the possession of the same with nominal damages for the detention.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 568.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1825.

JUSTICE OF PEACE—JURISDICTION—CAPIAS—TRESPASS—PROPER REMEDY.

A justice of the peace has jurisdiction in a case of a small debt, and his judgment is not absolutely void; and the officer who serves a ca. sa. upon that judgment is not a trespasser; although the plaintiff's proper remedy was upon the defendant's administration-bond, the penalty of which was $500, and so beyond the jurisdiction of the justices.

Trespass and false imprisonment.

William Mickum was a constable, and S. Mickum was his surety in his official bond. W. Mickum, the constable, had received money for Charles Paul, and had failed to pay it over. Paul, supposing S. Mickum to be liable to him for the money received by William Mickum, the constable, brought suit in his own name against S. Mickum, before a justice of the peace. S. Mickum appeared before the justice and denied his jurisdiction, contending that if liable for the money received by William Mickum, it was only upon the bond, the penalty of which was $500, and upon which no suit could be brought before the justice. But the justice overruled the objection to his jurisdiction, and rendered judgment against S. Mickum for $2.50, upon which Paul issued a ca. sa. which was served by [John] Edds, who was a constable, and who arrested and imprisoned the defendant, S. Mickum; for which arrest and imprisonment, this action of trespass is now brought.

J. Dunlop, for plaintiff, contended that the justice had no jurisdiction in the case; and that, therefore, both the constable who served, and the party who procured the ca. sa. were guilty of trespass and false imprisonment. S. Mickum could be made liable only by a suit upon the bond, of which the justice clearly had no jurisdiction.

C. Cox, for defendant Edds, the constable, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that the constable was justified by the ca. sa. The suit before the justice was not upon the bond, for then the suit would have been in the name of the United States, the obligee. But it was a simple action of debt by Charles Paul against S. Mickum. The justice might have been mistaken as to the liability of S. Mickum for the money received by William Mickum; but that was only an error of judgment, upon which the defendant might have appealed, if the judgment had been for more than five dollars. So, if the justice admitted improper evidence, it would be matter for appeal, but would not deprive him of jurisdiction.

J. Dunlop, contrà. The averment in the warrant, that it was for debt, within the jurisdiction of the justice, did not give him jurisdiction. The question depends upon the nature of the case; as if, upon a warrant for debt, he should give judgment for a trespass. Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 282; Esp. N. P. (Am. Ed.) 195; Ritchie v. Stone [Case No. 11,864], in this court, at October term, 1821; Wells v. Hubbard [Id. 17,397], at April term, 1822; Brown v. Compton, 8 Term R. 424; 1 Salk. 273, pl. 5; Orby v. Hales, 1 Ld. Raym. 3; Crump v. Halford, 4 Mod. 353; The Marshalsea, 10 Coke, 76 (a); Nichols v. Walker, Cro. Car. 395; Hill v. Bateman, 2 Strange, 710; Shergold v. Holloway, Id. 1002; Smith v. Bouchier, Id. 993; Perkin v. Proctor, 2 Wils. 385.

P. Dunlop, in reply, cited Selw. N. P. 923, and the case of Shergold v. Holloway, 2 Strange, 1002.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that inasmuch as the warrant in this case was for a debt under five dollars, and the justice professed to act in a case of debt within his jurisdiction, his having received the bond in evidence did not deprive him of jurisdiction in the case. Paul claimed of S. Mickum two and one half dollars as a debt; for this the justice issued his warrant. The question, whether Mickum was indebted to Paul in that sum, was a question within the jurisdiction of the justice. It might have been supported by proper evidence; and the admission of improper evidence could only be ground of reversal upon appeal, if an appeal were given, but did not oust the justice of his jurisdiction.

COLLISION — VESSEL AT ANCHOR—ICE—FOUL ANCHOR.

The brig N., while lying at anchor in the port of New York, was run into by the bark M., which drifted down upon her with the tide in the night. The defence set up by the bark was, that she was forced from her own anchor by an irresistible field of ice brought down on her by the tide. As to the presence of any such field of ice, there was a conflict of evidence; but the evidence showed that the port anchor of the bark had no stock, and that the chain of the starboard anchor was fouled when it was got up on the morning after the collision. Held, that, on the evidence, the bark had failed to show that the drifting was an inevitable accident.

brig Napier, at night, while the latter lay at anchor in this harbor. The defence is that the Midas was carried from her moorings by a large field of ice, which caused her to drag her anchor. The presence of any such field of ice, as is sworn to by the claimant's witnesses, or of any ice that should cause a vessel to break away, is wholly denied by several witnesses. The occurrence, as described by the claimant's witnesses, appears to my mind somewhat improbable, but, of course, not impossible. The drifting of the vessel may, however, be accounted for by the fact that the chain of the bark had become wound around the stock and fluke of her anchor, so as to render it unable to bite the ground sufficiently to hold her, when the tide ran ebb. It is proved, and not disputed, that her starboard anchor was found in this condition when it came up next morning, and that this would account for her dragging, and it is also proved and not disputed that her port anchor had no stock at all, and was not therefore an anchor calculated to hold when dropped. In the presence of such proofs, as to the condition of the ground tackle of the bark, and of the evidence in the case casting doubt upon the statement that a large field of ice caused the bark to drift, I must hold that the bark has failed to show that the accident was caused by the overwhelming power of ice, which could not be successfully resisted.

There will accordingly be a decree for the libellant, with an order of reference to ascertain the amount.

CARRIERS—DELIVERY ON WHARF—USAGE AS TO DELIVERY.

1. To constitute a good delivery of goods from a ship upon a wharf, there must be a reasonable notice to the consignee that the goods will be so unladen; a knowledge casually acquired by the consignee that the vessel has arrived and will discharge at a certain wharf will not dispense with such notice.

[Cited in Mordecai v. Lindsay, 5 Wall. (72 U. S.) 495; One Thousand, Two Hundred and Sixty-Five Pipes, etc., Case No. 10,536; The Boskenna Bay, 40 Fed. 93; Constable v. National Steamship Co., 154 U. S. 51, 14 Sup. Ct. 1076.]

In admiralty.

J. P. Healey, for libelants.

R. H. Dana, Jr., and H. A. Scudder, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is a libel founded on a bill of lading in the usual form, signed by the master of the ship Middlesex at New Orleans on the 19th day of March, 1855, agreeing to deliver sixty barrels of lard at the port of Boston unto the libelants or their assigns, dangers of navigation only excepted. The ship arrived in the port of Boston on Saturday, the 21st day of April, 1855, and commenced discharging cargo on Tuesday, the 24th. On Thursday, about five o'clock p. m., a small part of the libelants' merchandise was discharged; and in the course of Friday, before half past two o'clock, thirty-one barrels thereof had been landed on the wharf. They came out promiscuously with other merchandise, and were so stowed on the wharf. It does not appear that at any time any considerable quantity was accessible, so that it could have been taken away by the libelants. No notice of the arrival of the vessel, and that her cargo was about to be discharged, was given by the master to the libelants. But Wilde, a clerk of the libelants, without any direction to that effect from his employers, went to the vessel, on Wednesday or Thursday, and inquired of the mate if the merchandise was ready for delivery; he replied, it was not, and he could not tell when it would be. He then asked the mate if he would notify the libelants when the merchandise should be ready, and the mate said he would. He thereupon gave the mate the libelants' business card, and asked him if he knew where the libelants' place of business was; the mate took the card, and said he did, or ought to, for he was a "North End boy." The fact that the vessel was at Battery wharf, and the result of this interview with the mate, was made known to the libelants by Wilde on the day when it occurred. The mate denies that he made an absolute promise to give notice; but I do not deem this material, because the libelants were informed that he did. So much of this merchandise as had been landed on Friday was destroyed by an accidental fire which broke out on the wharf about half past two o'clock on that day.

Upon this state of facts I do not think the notice of readiness to deliver, required by law, was given. When the master, or the owners, or consignees of the vessel give notice to consignees of cargo that the vessel is about to discharge at a particular wharf, it is deemed equivalent to a declaration by him or them that the master will be in readiness to deliver the cargo there at some proper time, as soon as, by the use of due diligence, he can get it out of the vessel in a state to be delivered. But mere knowledge that the vessel has arrived, and is discharging at a particular wharf, gained in some casual manner by the consignee, without any act on the part of the master to indicate a readiness to deliver, is not within the usage, which is for the master, or some agent for the vessel, to give notice to the consignees. And I do not think such casual knowledge is sufficient to impose on the consignee the duty of attending to the discharge of the vessel, and being in readiness to receive his goods as soon as they are ready for delivery. I think a consignee of cargo may well say: "I knew it was usual for some agent of the vessel to give express notice to consignees. No such notice was given. I inferred that for some cause the master would not be ready within a reasonable time to deliver my cargo, and I consequently made no preparation to receive it." It must be remembered that it is not knowledge of the arrival of the vessel and that she is discharging, but notice of the readiness of the master to deliver, which is the operative fact. And to convey this notice the master, or some one acting for the vessel, should give such notice, or some notice, which by custom is equivalent to it. In this case the libelants, at the same time when they were informed by their clerk, that the vessel was discharging at Battery wharf, were also informed that the mate could not tell when their merchandise would be ready for delivery, and had engaged to give them notice when it should be ready. I do not think the mate had authority to bind the vessel by this engagement. But I consider that these circumstances are material when coupled with the want of notice by any one representing the vessel; and that the libelants were not bound to make preparations to receive their consignment until they had some further notice.

But there is another ground on which, in my opinion, this case must be decided in favor of the libelants. Their consignment was but a very small part of the entire cargo of the vessel. The part of it which was landed was stowed on the wharf promiscuously with the residue of the cargo. I do not think the consignee of a parcel of merchandise is required to overhaul the residue of the cargo on the wharf to find his goods. For the convenience of the vessel a particular consignment may be stowed in any proper place in the vessel, and even mingled with goods belonging to others, and it must come out as it is reached in the process of unlading. But each consignee has a right to have his goods delivered to him separated from all others; and the duty of separating them from all others is part of the duty of delivery. No doubt there must be, as in practice I believe there is, a reasonable cooperation between the master and the consignees of cargo in the process of delivering it, and especially in cases of general ships, of large tonnage, such as are now employed. The consignee cannot justly expect, and cannot lawfully require, that upon a crowded wharf, where a large cargo is being delivered to numerous owners, each consignment should be set apart by itself, and so placed as to be most easily accessible. That should be done which may be done reasonably and is usually done in similar circumstances. But there is no evidence in this case to show, and it is not to be presumed that all that is usually done by the master in a case like this, is to pile thirty-six barrels belonging to a particular consignee promiscuously with other cargo discharged on four different days. I cannot say that, when so placed, the libelants' goods were ready for delivery, and therefore I hold that their contract for delivery had not been performed when the fire took place.

It was urged in the case, that, as it appears to be the usage for consignees to pay wharfage on their goods, the wharfinger is the agent of the consignees to accept a delivery of the goods, and consequently, as soon as landed on wharf, the goods are delivered to the consignee. I suppose the usage mentioned is for consignees who accept goods to pay their wharfage, and for consignees who do not accept goods not to pay it. I do not believe there is any usage which makes wharfingers the agents of the consignees to accept consignments for them; and if such a usage were proved, I could not admit that it was a reasonable or lawful usage. It would be inconsistent with the nature of the employment, and would lead to too much confusion of rights to be tolerated. The acceptance of the goods by the consignee, independent of any usage, may be sufficient to raise an implied promise to pay their wharfage; and the usage spoken of is probably nothing more than a practical conformity to those rights and duties of the parties which grow out of the rules of law. That, in my opinion, landing is not delivery, I have already stated in the Case of the Salmon Falls Company.

It was also insisted that the consignees could not maintain a libel founded on the bill of lading alone, without some further evidence of their ownership of the goods. I consider this question to have been settled in the case of Lawrence v. Minturn, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 100. The same was held at common law in Tronson v. Dent, 8 Moore, P. C. 419.

The decree of the district court must be affirmed, with six per cent. damages and costs.

Delivery on the wharf of goods from a ship is sufficient if notice thereof be duly given to the consignee, and consignments are properly separated so as to be conveniently open to inspection. See The Eddy, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 459, citing above case.

DEEDS — ACKNOWLEDGMENT — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—CONTINUING IN POSSESSION—EVIDENCE—VARIANCE IN DESCRIPTIONS.

1. In 1823, the commissioner of the public buildings in Washington had authority to take the acknowledgment of deeds of land in Washington county.

2. A purchaser under an execution against the grantor has a right to show the deed to be fraudulent as to the creditor under whose execution he purchased. Although there is a variance, in some respects, in the description of the land in the two deeds, they may be given in evidence to the jury, who may decide the question of identity.

3. A conveyance to his son, by a father, of all his estate and effects, while indebted, and continuing in possession after the conveyance, is evidence of intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors.

[Cited in Merriman v. Hyde, 9 Neb. 119, 2 N. W. 218.]

Ejectment for land in the county of Washington, D. C. The plaintiff [Middleton's lessee] offered in evidence a deed from Smallwood C. Middleton to his son Samuel Middleton, under whom the lessors of the plaintiff claimed title. This deed was dated February 24th, 1823, and acknowledged before Mr. Elgar, the commissioner of the public buildings, who succeeded to the office of superintendent, who succeeded to the office of the commissioners appointed under the act of congress of the 16th of July, 1790 (1 Stat. 130), who were severally authorized to take such acknowledgments, by the Maryland act of 1791, c. 45, §§ 7, 8. When the board of commissioners was dissolved by the act of congress of 1st of May, 1802 (2 Stat. 175), entitled "An act to abolish the board of commissioners in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," the office of superintendent was created, to whom was transferred all the powers of the commissioners, and by the act of the 29th of April, 1816, c. 150, §§ 2, 5 (3 Stat. 324), the office of superintendent was abolished and that of commissioner was established, to whom was transferred all the duties of the old board of commissioners, and of the superintendent.

Mr. Morfit and Mr. Key, for defendant [Rezin Sinclair], objected to the admission of the deed in evidence, and contended that the commissioner for the public buildings had no authority to take the acknowledgment; that he succeeded only to the powers of the commissioners as a board, and not to any powers given to the commissioners severally. The Maryland act of 1791, c. 45, § 8, says, "that acknowledgments of deeds" "made before and certified by either of the commissioners, shall be effectual." The act of congress of the 1st of May, 1802, § 2 (2 Stat. 175), says, "And the said superintendent is hereby invested with all powers, and shall hereafter perform all duties which the said commissioners are now vested with, or are required to perform, by, or in virtue of any act of congress or any act of the general assembly of Maryland, or any deed or deeds of trust from the original proprietors of the lots in the said city, or in any other manner whatsoever." And by the second section of the act of congress of the 29th of April, 1816, c. 150 (3 Stat. 324), it is enacted that the commissioner of the public buildings "shall perform all the duties with which the said three commissioners" (appointed under the act of 16th of July, 1790) "were charged;" and by the 5th section of the same act of 29th April, 1816, it is enacted that the duties of the office of superintendent thereby abolished "shall be performed by the commissioner to be appointed by virtue of this act." The commissioner, therefore, had only the powers given to the first commissioners as a board.

THE COURT, however (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), overruled the objection, and said that the point was settled in the case of Peltz v. Clarke [Case No. 10,914], in this court at May term, 1826, and they were not disposed to disturb that decision.

Mr. Bradley, for plaintiff, then contended, that the defendant, being neither a creditor of Smallwood C. Middleton, the grantor, nor a subsequent purchaser from him, was not competent to object to the validity of the deed as being fraudulent; for, if fraudulent, it is so only as to creditors and subsequent purchasers.

But THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objection; because the defendant does not claim in the character of a subsequent purchaser; but claims under a judgment and execution in favor of a creditor who had furnished materials for a building erected upon the land in dispute before the date of the deed; and if the deed was void as to that creditor the sale under the execution was valid, and the defendant, who claims under that sale has a good title.

The defendant, in order to show his right as a creditor, or as claiming under a creditor, offered in evidence a judgment, fieri facias, and sale in 1827, in an action by King and Langley against the grantor, Smallwood C. Middleton, and that the cause of action originated before the date of the deed. That the land was sold under the fieri facias to one C. King, who conveyed to a Mrs. Bryan, under whom the defendant claims title. The description of the land in the deed from the marshal differs, in some respects, from that in the deed from S. C. Middleton to his son in 1823; the beginning, however, is the same.

Mr. Bradley objected to that evidence on account of this difference in the description of the land.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted the evidence to go to the jury.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Mr. Key, for defendant, then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they should believe from the evidence that the said S. C. Middleton at the date of the said deed to his son was indebted to the said King and Langley, and that after the said deed he continued in possession of all the property mentioned in the said deed until the said sale under the said execution of King and Langley, and the said purchase by Mrs. Bryan as aforesaid, and that he had no other property; then such indebtedness, and such continuing in possession, is evidence of the said deed's being made by the said S. C. Middleton to his son, with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors; and that upon the said evidence of such intent, if believed by the jury, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action.

And THE COURT (nem. con.) so instructed them; and also at the prayer of Mr. Bradley, for plaintiff, further instructed them, that if from the evidence they should be of opinion that the said deed was made bonâ fide, and without any intent to defeat or defraud the creditors of the said S. C. Middleton, and for a valuable consideration; and the said Samuel Middleton (the son) was jointly in possession of the said land, with the said Smallwood C. Middleton after the making of the said deed, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

PATENTS—REISSUE—VARIANCE — NEW ARTICLE — COMBINATION — DEFECT — HOW OCCURRING — STATE OF ART—UTILITY—ASSIGNMENT — PRIMA FACIE TITLE.

1. The recital, in a reissue, of a prior assignment, and the action of the commissioner in granting the patent to the assignees, make a prima facie case of title.

2. The only mode of impeaching the reissue upon the ground that it is for a different invention from the original, where there is no allegation or proof of fraud, is by showing, upon the face of the instrument, that one is so different from and repugnant to the other that the court can see that the invention described in the original is another and different one from that set forth in the reissue.

[Cited in Andrews v. Wright, Case No. 382.]

3. The claim in the original was for a new article of manufacture; in the reissue, it was for a combination and arrangement of the parts. The former claim was unfortunate, as changes could be made to evade the patent, while retaining the principle of the invention. The defect was curable by reissue.

4. Whether the defect occurred through inadvertence or mistake, is a question for the commissioner to decide.

5. Proof introduced to show the state of the art can have no effect on the case beyond the aid it may give the court in construing the patent. It can not be permitted to defeat the suit by antedating the invention, when that issue is not raised by the pleadings.

6. The very struggle of the parties in the suit—the complainant for the exclusive, and the defendant for the unrestrained right to manufacture the patented article—is ample evidence that it is of some utility.

7. Whenever a change or device is new and accomplishes beneficial results, courts look with favor upon it. The law in such cases has no nice standard by which to gauge the degree of mental power or inventive genius brought into play in originating the new device.

[Cited in Hoe v. Cottrell, 1 Fed. 603; Celluloid Manuf'g Co. v. Comstock & Cheney Co., 27 Fed. 360.]

8. Letters patent for an "improved self-mousing hook," granted to John R. Henshaw, October 26, 1858, and reissued February 6, 1866, are valid.

This was a bill in equity filed to restrain the defendants [Oliver Judd and others] from infringing letters patent [No. 21,879,] for an "improved self-mousing hook," granted to John R. Henshaw, October 26, 1858, assigned to complainants, and reissued to them February 6, 1866 [No. 2,166]. The claim of the original patent was as follows: "An improved article of manufacture, a self-mousing hook, having a socket e, and ear f, and a horizontal spring k; the whole made as shown and described." The claim of the reissued patent was as follows: "Locating the spring of a snap-hook, substantially as shown and described, so as to act upon points intermediate between the hinge and hook proper in combination with forming recesses for holding the spring, as set forth."

Hubbard & McFarland, for complainants.
Horace Cornwall, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This suit is founded on a patent for an alleged improvement in self-mousing or snap-hooks. The original patent was granted to J. R. Henshaw, and bears date October 26, 1858. This was subsequently surrendered by, and reissued to, the present complainants. The reissue is dated February 6, 1866. The bill counts upon this reissue, and charges the respondents with infringing the right which it purports to grant to the complainants. The usual relief of an injunction and account is prayed for.

The answer admits the granting of the original patent to Henshaw, but qualifiedly denies that he was the original inventor, and that the same had not been in use before his application for letters patent. It denies that the complainants were the assignees of Henshaw and therefore entitled to a reissue. It denies that the surrender was made for the purpose of correcting any error or inadvertence, and avers that the same was done for the purpose of enlarging the right of the complainants under the patent. It also denies that the reissue is for the same invention as the original.

The answer then sets up two patents issued to Judd, one of the respondents, one dated August 25, 1863, the other December 13, 1864, and avers that all the articles in question, the manufacture of which is charged by the bill as an infringement of the complainants' rights, have been made under and in conformity to these patents. There is also a general denial of infringement as charged in the bill.

So far as the validity of the patent is questioned on the ground that it was reissued to the complainants, there is no real doubt in the case. The reissue counts upon a prior assignment of the original patent to the complainants, and this makes, with the act of the commissioner granting the reissue to them, a prima facie case on this point.

There is no proof in the case tending to overcome this, and the court must therefore presume that the reissue was properly granted to these complainants. The reissued patent is also prima facie evidence that it is for the same invention as the original, and as there is no allegation or proof of fraud, the only mode of impeaching the reissue on this ground is, by showing upon the face of the instruments that one is so different from and repugnant to the other, that the court can see that the invention described in the reissue is another and different one than that set forth in the original. Upon a careful comparison of the two I find no such difference or repugnance. The change in the last specification from the original is descriptive and formal rather than essential, so far as the scope of the invention is concerned.

The claim in the original was for an improved article of manufacture, while in the reissue it is for a combination and arrangement of the parts. The elements of the combination, in connection with the arrangements in the reissue, are precisely the features which made the article new in the original. But claiming it as an article of manufacture was unfortunate, as changes could be made so as to evade the patent, though the principle of the invention might be retained. This was a curable defect, provided it occurred through inadvertence and mistake, and whether it did so occur was a question of fact for the commissioner to decide. The invention thus described in the reissued patent must be deemed to have been made as early as October 26, 1858, the date of Henshaw's patent. Upon the recital in the reissue and the act of the commissioner granting the latter to these complainants, in the absence of any countervailing proofs they are to be deemed, in judgments of law, its rightful owners and entitled to whatever right it confers.

As this invention, on the face of the papers, antedates those described in the patents set up by the respondents, and there being no proof of a prior invention of the kind by any one else, there can be no struggle between the parties here as to who was first in this field of discovery. The remaining inquiries are, is the improvement novel? is it useful? did Henshaw invent it? and have the respondents infringed?

On the first three inquiries the patent itself is prima facie evidence in the affirmative, and one of the witnesses, well qualified to speak on the subject, testified that it was new. There is no evidence to counteract this proof. Whatever was introduced to show the state of the art can have no effect on the case beyond the aid it may give the court in construing the patent. It can not be permitted to defeat the suit by antedating the invention, as that issue is not raised by the pleadings. But in the judgment of the court no article or device presented by the evidence, or specimen of hooks introduced on the trial, antedates this invention. The truss hook with a spring enclosed in a tumbler, and the one with a spring in the socket, are both differently arranged. The springs are both behind the joint-pin, and are not held by recesses sunk into the arm of the hook, and it will be seen when we come to the question of utility, that this difference, though apparently slight, is in reality not merely formal but substantial. I have no doubt on the question of novelty. On the proofs as they stand, the improvement must be declared new. Its utility is equally clear, at least in one aspect, and that is sufficient to support the patent on this point. The very struggle of the parties in this suit, the complainants for the exclusive, and the respondents for the unrestrained, right to manufacture this kind of hook is ample evidence that it is of some utility. I agree with the counsel for the respondents that the truss hooks, with springs in the rear of the joint pins, especially the one in a vertical tumbler, appear to be much more substantial and perfect articles. But the demand for the patented article involved in this suit is evidence that it is preferred over the truss hooks. Doubtless, the reason is that they can be manufactured and sold at a cheaper rate. Cheapness generally commends an article to the American public.

Did Henshaw invent the article in the sense of the patent law? The point on which this question is open to inquiry in this suit, is that which relates to the fact whether or not it required invention. In disposing of this branch of the case, it will be necessary to examine the specification and see what device it covers. This can be done by giving a construction to the claim, for it evidently aimed to state the invention in brief terms, though it must be confessed that it is done in an obscure way. It is often the misfortune of inventors to have their specifications drawn with very imperfect skill, but courts have long exercised great liberality in giving construction to these instruments. It may well be doubted whether their indulgence has not gone too far in this direction, and their efforts to save the rights of inventors in particular cases been perverted into an assumed license to indulge in loose descriptions. The present specification requires the application of the liberal rules of construction in order to an intelligible understanding of the claim, and I see no reason why they should not be applied, especially in view of the settled practice of the courts. The claim is: "What is claimed as the invention of the said Henshaw is, locating the spring of a snap hook, substantially as shown and described, so as to act upon points intermediate between the hinge and hook proper, in combination with forming recesses for holding the spring, as set forth." Read literally and apart from the body of the specification, this would be both unintelligible and obscure. The first part of the sentence refers to the arrangement of the spring. It is placed in front of the hinge pin instead of the rear. When so arranged, it is combined with the recesses for holding it, which are new. This is a new organization of the hook and spring, combined with a new element or device for holding the spring in place. The statement in the claim, that locating the spring in the manner described is combined with forming the recesses, is mere absurdity. But a glance at the specification and drawings shows at once what really was meant.

It is urged that this transposition of the spring, in connection with the simple device of sockets for holding it in place so that it can perform the desired function, is a merely colorable change of the old snap hook, requiring no invention, and therefore not patentable. But the change effects palpable and useful results, else why is there a struggle for its use or application to articles of this character? Whenever a change or device is new, and accomplishes beneficial results, courts look with favor upon it. The law, in such cases, has no nice standard by which to gauge the degree of mental power or inventive genius brought into play in originating the new device.

A lucky casual thought involving a comparatively trifling change, often produces decided and useful results, and though it be the fruit of a very small amount of inventive skill, the patent law extends to it the same protection as if it had been brought forth after a lifetime devoted to the profoundest thought and the most ingenious experiment to attain it. In the present case the degree of ingenuity employed in producing this improvement was undoubtedly small but I have no doubt that it is entitled to the protection of the law. The remaining question is, whether the respondents have infringed. The hook which they manufacture has a spring, the main coil of which is so placed that the hinge pin passes through it, but though only part of the coil is thus brought in front of the hinge pin yet the bearing points or feet of the spring are so located as to act on points intermediate between the hinge and hook proper, in substantially the same manner as the ends of the coil in Henshaw's invention.

These feet are held in and by recesses or sockets in the same manner as in Henshaw's. In other words, the spring as located and operating in combination with the recesses, the respondents' hook, embody the whole of Henshaw's invention, and accomplish the same result in the same way. It may be an improved form of Henshaw's invention, and if so, the new part or improvement is patentable; but this fact gives no right to use what was invented and patented by another.

A decree for an account and injunction must, therefore, be entered against the respondents. The decree for an account may be entered at once, and the accounting should be proceeded with, without delay, and completed on or before the first day of the next regular term of this court, at which time a final decree and injunction will be entered.

ARREST—PROTECTION FROM—SUITORS — FACTS TO MAKE OUT CASE—HOW PROVED.

The protection from arrest given to suitors, extends to petitioners for the bankrupt act. The privilege is regarded liberally; but the facts necessary to make out a case for protection, must be proved otherwise than by the oath of the party who claims it.

Mifflin, a petitioner for the benefit, &c., had made an appointment to be at a commissioner's office, on a certain Monday at eleven o'clock a. m., on business connected with the petition. The appointment was proved by the commissioner. Not long after making this appointment with the commissioner, he promised one Freeman to call at his (Freeman's) store, on this same Monday, some time before eleven. The commissioner's office was one square south of the court house (S. E. corner 6th and Chestnut streets,) and Freeman's store two squares north of the court house. He did not call at Freeman's as he had promised to do, and on this same Monday, a few minutes before eleven, when close to the court house, and walking in a course which might have been to either Freeman's or the commissioner's, he was taken on a ca. sa. at Freeman's suit. He now applied to be discharged from arrest. Mifflin himself swore, that he left his residence, (some seven or eight squares from the commissioner's office,) at about half past ten o'clock, a. m., and wishing to see his counsel, Mr. Ingraham, about his visit to the commissioner, he stopped at Mr. Ingraham's office, (which was in course to the commissioner's,) but learning there that Mr. Ingraham had gone to court, he went first to the court house, and thence to the Athenaeum, (about a square east of the court house,) to find Mr. T. who had been there, and that returning from the Athenaeum, and on his way to the commissioner's, he was taken by the sheriff. The whole deviation was about two squares, or about 300 yards.

It was alleged against the application, 1. That the deviation was extravagant; 2. That the process was final.

RANDALL, District Judge (declining to hear the argument on the other side,) said, that it was a simple question of intention. Was Mifflin intending to go to the commissioner's? The appointment had been duly proved. It was near to eleven o'clock, and Mifflin was just one square north of the commissioner's office, and in the course to it. The appointment with Freeman was not material. Mifflin might have designed to go there before going to the commissioner's, or afterwards; nor was it important that he had deviated a square or two in going to the commissioner's. This privilege of suitors was regarded liberally. In point of time a party had been allowed a delay of three or four days, when the business which protected him called him away from his residence. No rule required a party to move to the spot in a straight line, and in the same line home again. It was important, however, that the appointment with the commissioner had been shown otherwise, than by Mifflin's oath, as the oath of a party, alone, would be insufficient. There was nothing in the objection that the process was final, as Freeman might issue an alias ca. sa. The petitioner was, accordingly, without hesitation, discharged from arrest.

District Court, S. D. New York. March 23, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—ARREST ON STATE PROCESS—DEBT FRAUDULENTLY CONTRACTED—MOTION TO VACATE—INJUNCTION.

The bankrupt having been arrested by order of a state court at the suit of creditors whose debt appeared by the order to have been fraudulently contracted, applied to have said order of arrest vacated by the bankruptcy court, and the said creditors, who had subsequently proved the debt in bankruptcy, enjoined from further proceedings thereon. Held, that such debt was one not dischargeable in bankruptcy, and the order of the state court could not be vacated or its proceedings set aside. But that the debt being provable in bankruptcy, proceedings of the creditors in their suit in the state court would be stayed until the determination of the bankruptcy court on the question of discharge.

[Cited in brief in Ansonia Brass & Copper Co. v. New Lamp Chimney Co., 53 N. Y. 124.]

In bankruptcy.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The bankrupt's voluntary petition in bankruptcy was filed December 11th, 1867. He was adjudicated a bankrupt on the 13th of December, 1867. On the 17th of December, 1867, an order was made by one of the justices of the supreme court of the state of New York, in a suit commenced against the bankrupt on the 14th of December, 1867, by Leopold Wise and Morris Wise, reciting that it had been made to appear to the said justice by affidavit that the plaintiffs in said suit had a sufficient cause of action against said bankrupt on a money demand on contract, and that the debt was contracted by false and fraudulent representations of the bankrupt, and requiring the sheriff of the city and county of New York forthwith to arrest the bankrupt and hold him to bail in the sum of three thousand dollars. The affidavit on which the order of arrest was made, shows a case of a debt created by the fraud of the bankrupt, and such a debt as under section thirty-three of the act would not be discharged by a discharge in bankruptcy. The bankrupt now, on a petition setting forth that the affidavit on which the order of arrest was granted was wholly false, and that the creditors have proved their debt in the bankruptcy proceedings, and that he has been arrested under the order, and given bonds to abide the order of the state court, applies to this court to vacate the order of arrest, and set aside the proceedings of the creditors, and enjoin them from further prosecuting their suit, and from proceeding further on the order of arrest.

It is urged on the part of the bankrupt, first, that the creditors, by proving their debt, have, under section twenty-one of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)] waived all right of action and suit against him; second, that this court must enquire into and determine, on this application, the question as to whether the debt in question was, in fact, created by the fraud of the bankrupt.

First. It was held by this court in the Case of Rosenberg [Case No. 12,054], that so much of section twenty-one of the act as imposes a penalty for proving a debt, cannot be construed as applying to a debt which, by section thirty-three, is not dischargeable. This view was upheld by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the circuit court for this district, in the Case of Robinson [Id. 11,939], where he holds that the thirty-third section must be regarded as taking a debt created by fraud out of the operation of the first clause of the twenty-first section, that is, the clause imposing, as a penalty for proving a debt, the destruction of all right of action and suit upon it. The proceedings in the supreme court in this case, so far as they have been placed before this court, consisting of the order of arrest and the affidavit on which it was made, although such order was, as is the practice, made ex parte, must, for the purposes of this application, be considered as an adjudication by the state court that this debt was created by the fraud of the bankrupt. It was open to the bankrupt to show a different state of facts to the state court, on a motion there to discharge the order of arrest. Instead of doing so, he comes into this court, on that state of facts, and claims the benefit of the last clause of section twenty-six of the act, which provides that "no bankrupt shall be liable to arrest during the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy, in any civil action, unless the same is founded on some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not release him." As the order of arrest states, on its face, that it has been made to appear by affidavit, to the justice issuing it, that the debt was contracted by false and fraudulent representations of the bankrupt, the debt must be regarded as being taken out of the operation of the first clause of the twenty-first section.

Second. The order of arrest must be regarded, at least for the purposes of this application, as an adjudication by the state court between the parties to the suit in which the order is entitled; that the arrest was founded on a debt from which a discharge in bankruptcy would not release the bankrupt. In re Robinson, before cited. In Re Kimball [Id. 7,768], it was held by this court that where it appears, by inspection of the proceedings in the state court in which the arrest was made, that the arrest was founded by the state court on a debt which appears, on the face of such proceedings, to be one created by the fraud of the bankrupt, this court will not enquire any further into the question of fraud or no fraud, on an application to discharge from the arrest. The decision of this court in that case was affirmed by Mr. Justice Nelson, in the circuit court for this district, In re Kimball [Id. 7,769], who says, in his opinion, that the question whether the federal court will, under the twenty-sixth section, discharge the bankrupt from arrest during the pendency of the bankruptcy proceedings, "must depend upon the case presented upon which the arrest was made in the action in the state court." In this case, therefore, this court cannot go behind the order of arrest, and the adjudication which is found on its face.

It results that the order of arrest cannot be vacated, nor can the proceedings of the creditors in arresting the bankrupt be set aside. But as the debt sued on in the state court by the creditors is a provable debt, the suit must be stayed until a determination is had as to the discharge, whether the debt be one that will be discharged or one that will not be discharged. In re Rosenberg, before cited. The further proceedings of the creditors in the suit, must, therefore, be stayed, in accordance with the provision of section twenty-one, to await the determination of this court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge.

Case No. 9,539.

[26 Int. Rev. Rec. 5.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan. 5, 1880.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SALE OF LEASED DISTILLERY FOR TAXES — RIGHTS OF PURCHASER FROM LESSOR—EVIDENCE.

[One purchasing property which has been used as a distillery under a lease containing covenants that the premises should be subject to a lien for taxes and penalties, in accordance with Rev. St. § 3262, must be regarded as taking the same with notice of such use, and the property is therefore subject in his hands to the lien of any assessment which may subsequently be made against the lessee for such taxes or penalty. Such purchaser stands in the shoes of his grantor, and, through him, has the same right of appeal that the lessee would have, from the assessment. Therefore, if he permits the premises to be sold without taking an appeal, he has no right, on subsequently suing the collector for the value of the property, to introduce evidence that no tax or penalty was in fact due the government at the time the assessment was made.]

[This was an action at law by the Milan Distilling Company against John Tillson to recover the value of certain distillery property sold by defendant, as collector of internal revenue.]

Beardsley, Wilkinson & Osborne, for plaintiff.

Joseph B. Leake, U. S. Atty., for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is an action on the case, brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, to recover the value of a distillery and appurtenances sold by the defendant under a distress warrant issued by him for the collection of a tax on spirits assessed against one George P. Freysinger; and the question raised is whether the plaintiff shall be allowed to give proof showing, or tending to show, that no tax was in fact due from George P. Freysinger to the government at the time the assessment was made. The admitted facts in the case are that in the year 1869 Jacob Freysinger was the owner in fee of the property in question, and leased the same to George P. Freysinger, to be used as a distillery. At the same time he consented in writing that the premises should be used as a distillery, and that the taxes and penalties should be a first lien on the premises, in accordance with section 3262, tit. 34, Rev. St.; and George P. Freysinger continued from the time of such lease up to the latter part of February, 1873, to occupy the premises, and carry on the business of a distiller thereon with the consent of Jacob Freysinger as aforesaid. In July, 1873, Jacob Freysinger having resumed possession, conveyed the premises by deed, in fee, to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff took possession and carried on business as a distiller thereon till about January 24, 1876. On the 31st of December, 1875, the commissioner of internal revenue made an assessment of $226,200 against George P. Freysinger, for taxes on spirits produced at the distillery mentioned during the years 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873, and not deposited in a bonded warehouse as required by law. This assessment was transmitted for collection to the defendant, who was then collector of internal revenue for the Fourth district of this state; and the defendant having duly demanded of George P. Freysinger the payment of the tax, and the same not having been paid, the defendant issued his distress warrant, and on the 24th of January, 1876, levied upon and took possession of the distillery premises and appurtenances, and afterwards sold and conveyed the same, by virtue of the said assessment, warrant, and levy. It is admitted that the assessment, warrant, levy and sale were in all respects regular in form.

In order to sustain the issue on its part, and show that the property was wrongfully sold by the defendant, the plaintiff offers proof tending to show that no taxes were in fact due from George P. Freysinger to the government, for spirits produced at the distillery mentioned, as stated in the assessment; to which proof the defendant objects, and insists that he is fully protected by the assessment, and that it cannot be collaterally attacked, or inquired into in this action. There can be no doubt that if the assessment, levy, and sale had been made during the tenancy of George P. Freysinger, the assessment would have been an ample protection to the officer who was charged with its collection; but the plaintiff claims that, it having become seized of the property by deed after the tenancy terminated, this proof is admissible. I do not think the title relieved the property of the lien created upon it by the plaintiff's grantor. The plaintiff is, I think, so far in privity with the title as to be bound by the acts of its grantor or his lessee. The facts showing that the premises had been, for several years before the plaintiff's acquirement of title, used as a distillery, the plaintiff must be charged with notice that they were, under the law (sections 3251, 3262), liable for all taxes and penalties incurred by Jacob Freysinger or George P. Freysinger, his tenant, in respect of spirits produced thereon. If the property in the hands of the plaintiff, as grantee of Jacob Freysinger, is subject to this tax, then the assessment must be as complete a shield to the collector as if the assessment had been made while Freysinger remained the owner. And if I am right in assuming that the property, after conveyance to the plaintiff, remained liable to an assessment for taxes and penalties incurred under its former owner, then there is an end to the question, for the plaintiff has no better right to contradict the assessment than the Freysingers have. The plaintiff took the property subject to the burdens which the plaintiff's grantor had put upon it,—that is, if the plaintiff was bound, as I think it was, to take notice of the uses to which the premises had been applied before it acquired title. It is manifest that the only remedy George P. Freysinger and Jacob Freysinger, his landlord, could have had against his assessment, was by appeal; but it is urged that the plaintiff could not appeal, because the assessment was not against the plaintiff, but against George P. Freysinger, and therefore it is argued that this suit is the plaintiff's only remedy. I think, however, that the plaintiff, or Jacob Freysinger, could have appealed, because the assessment was a lien on the property. Jacob Freysinger, as owner of the fee, stood, so far as this property is concerned, in the position of surety for his tenant. He had pledged this property to the government for the payment of all taxes and penalties incurred during the time his tenant carried on the business of distilling there, and, if an attempt was made to charge the property with such taxes and penalties, he would certainly have the right to be heard on appeal. If not, then such right could only be denied because he was concluded by the acts of his tenant, and had no right to a hearing before any tribunal, but must submit to whatever dilemma the property had been brought to by his tenant's act,—which would not help the plaintiff in this case.

I am of opinion that the plaintiff is so far in privity with the acts of the Freysingers, in regard to the lien of this assessment, that it is bound to pursue all the remedies which the Freysingers would have been bound to pursue. The plaintiff stands in the tracks of the Freysingers. If Jacob Freysinger could appeal, the plaintiff, as his successor, could do so. Numerous authorities are cited in support of the defendant's position that the assessment is a complete protection to the defendant in this case. Those most directly in point are Murray v. Hoboken Land Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 284, Nichols v. U. S., 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 122; and Erskine v. Hohenbach, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 614. The last was a case from the Eastern district of Wisconsin, where the collector was sued in trespass for having levied upon the property of a manufacturer of tobacco for the collection of an assessment regularly made; and the collector justified the seizure and sale under the assessment and his warrant for the sale of the property. Trial was had, and judgment rendered against the collector, the court allowing the plaintiff to go behind the assessment, and show, as is here proposed, that nothing was actually due from the plaintiff on the assessment under which the collector acted. The case went to the supreme court; and in the opinion reversing the judgment of the circuit court it is said: "The collector could not revise or refuse to enforce the assessment regularly made by the assessor in the exercise of the latter's jurisdiction. The duties of the collector, in the enforcement of the tax, were purely ministerial. The assessment, duly certified to him, was his authority to proceed, and, like an execution to a sheriff, regular on its face, issued by a tribunal having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, constituted his protection. Whatever may have been the conflict at one time, in the adjudged cases, as to the extent of the protection afforded to ministerial officers acting in obedience to process of orders issued to them by tribunals or officers invested by law with authority to pass upon and determine particular facts, and render judgment thereon, it is well settled now that if an officer or tribunal possess jurisdiction over the subject-matter upon which the judgment is passed, with power to issue an order or process for the enforcement of such judgment, and the order or process issued thereon to a ministerial officer is regular on its face, showing no departure from the law or defect of jurisdiction over the person or property affected, then and in such case the order or process will give full and entire protection to the ministerial officer in its regular enforcement, in any prosecution which the party aggrieved thereby may institute, against him, though serious errors may have been commited by the officer or tribunal in reaching the conclusion or judgment upon which the order or process is issued." So, too, in Clinkenbeard v. U. S., 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 65, the court said: "It is undoubtedly true that the decisions of an assessor, or board of assessors, like those of all other administrative commissions, are of a quasi judicial character, and cannot be questioned collaterally when made within the scope of their jurisdiction. But if they assess persons, property, or operations not taxable, such assessment is illegal, and cannot form the basis of an action at law for the collection of the tax, however efficacious it may be for the protection of ministerial officers charged with the duty of actual collection by virtue of a regular warrant or authority therefor."

If the tax assessed against George P. Freysinger is not a lien upon the premises in question under the law, and the written consent of Jacob Freysinger, from whom the plaintiff derived title, then it is in the power of any distiller, by the alienation of his distillery property, to deprive the government of its most efficient guaranty for the payment of the taxes and a due observance of the law.

I am therefore of opinion that the plaintiff took this property subject to any assessment to which George P. Freysinger was liable, in respect of spirits produced on the premises during his tenancy, and that the plaintiff cannot in this action, be allowed to show that the taxes mentioned in the assessment were not in fact due, and thereby charge the defendant with a wrongful sale of the premises under the assessment and warrant; that the plaintiff's remedy against the assessment, if it was aggrieved thereby, was by an appeal, and payment of the money, and suit against the officer, in case the assessment was not remitted on appeal; in short, that the plaintiff's remedy was the same as that of Freysinger, and it was not authorized to lie by and allow its property to be sold under the assessment, and then sue the collector for the value of the property sold, and on the trial of such suit attack the assessment collaterally. The testimony offered is therefore excluded.

Case No. 9,540.

MILBOURNE et al. v. The DANIEL AUGUSTA.

VICKERS et al. v. SAME.

[3 Hughes (1880) 464.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland.

MARITIME LIENS—STATUTORY—DOMESTIC VESSEL—MATERIAL AND SUPPLIES.

The work, material, and supplies are, and what are not, liens upon a domestic vessel under the law of Maryland and the decision of the United States supreme court in the Lottawanna Case.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Maryland.

[These were libels by Charles D. Milbourne and William McGee against the schooner Daniel Augusta, and by William H. Vickers and William J. Carrol against the same, for supplies furnished the respondent.]

BOND, Circuit Judge. These are two libels, filed by citizens of Maryland, to enforce a statutory lien, given by section 44 of article 61 of the Maryland Code of Public Laws, against a domestic vessel in a home port. The section is as follows: "All boats or vessels of any kind whatsoever used or intended to be used on the waters of the Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and other waters of this state as carriers of freight or passengers, and all other boats or vessels belonging in this state, shall be subject to a lien and bound for the payment thereof as preferred debt for all debts due to boatbuilders, mechanics, merchants, farmers, or other persons, from the owners, masters or captains, or other agents of such boats or vessels for materials furnished or work done in the building, repairing, or equipping the same."

The first libel claims to have a lien under this section of the Code for repairing and furnishing the materials to repair a new topsail, mainsail, foresail, and jib, and for a large amount of rope and tackle furnished for the schooner's use and repair. The requirements of the Code of Maryland relating to the manner of acquiring a lien of this kind have all been complied with. There was a mortgage on the schooner properly recorded, amounting to one thousand dollars without interest.

We can see no reason why the decree of the district court which held the schooner responsible for the repairs and materials furnished by the libellants, should not be affirmed. The materials furnished went into and became a part of the schooner. The work and labor charged for were done in working the new material into the schooner. Since the case of The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 558, there can be no doubt of the power of the court of admiralty to enforce a lien given by a state statute upon a domestic vessel in a home port. The debt set out in the libel is within the words of the Maryland statute. It is due to a "mechanic" and "merchant," and is for "materials furnished" and "work done," in "repairing" and "equipping" the schooner.

The second libel is for groceries furnished to the schooner. There is no dispute about the account. The only question is whether or not there can be a lien under the Maryland statute for supplies furnished to a domestic ship in her home port. In the Code of Maryland this lien is found under the title "Mechanic's Lien." Originally mechanics alone were protected under it, but from time to time its scope has been widened until now its terms, as we see from its recital above, embrace boatbuilders, mechanics, merchants, farmers, or other persons. Still the idea of the law that the lien should be for something which tended to increase or create the rem upon which the lien attached has been preserved. For though the lien is given not only to mechanics and material men, but to other persons, it is only so given for materials furnished or work done in building, repairing or equipping the vessel. The lien will cut out a mortgage, though prior in date, if unrecorded, and justly, for the theory of the law is that the mechanic or material man, has added something by goods furnished or work done on the vessel, which the mortgage did not embrace, for they were not there when it was executed. The articles mentioned in the libel in this case are not materials furnished in repairing or building the ship. They are supplies furnished her crew. They never became a part of the rem upon which the libel is laid. They are no part of the equipments of the ship, for the word "equipment" refers only to something in her which goes to make her a complete ship qua ship, and not to that which is necessary to the comfort and support of the crew. A ship is fully equipped when she floats complete as a ship without a crew, to say nothing of what they are to eat. A soldier is fully equipped as a soldier when he has his clothing and arms. His haversack, which is part of his equipment, may have no rations in it. The water cask of this schooner was a part of her equipment. It was part of her. The water in it was part of her supplies, not her equipment. For these reasons we think the decree of the district court in this case should be reversed.

Decrees will be signed in accordance with this opinion.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1826.

JUSTICE OF PEACE—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT—INTEREST.

A debt of $50, upon which interest is due, cannot be recovered before a justice of the peace.

This was an appeal from a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace, upon a bond for $100 penalty, with condition to pay $50 on the first of February, 1820. The judgment was for $50, to carry interest from the 1st of February, 1820, till paid, there being then more than five years' interest due.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that it had been uniformly decided by this court that the interest, as well as the principal, is part of "the matter in dispute;" and that if the principal and interest amount to more than $50, a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction of the case.

MASTER AND SERVANT—ACTION FOR ENTICING—EVIDENCE — DECLARATIONS OF SERVANT — CONSIDERATION—PRIMA FACIE CASE.

1. An averment that John Leonard, "for a certain price," agreed to serve the plaintiff, is supported by evidence that John Leonard, in consideration of eight guineas paid by the plaintiff to a third person, agreed to serve the plaintiff.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

2. In an action for enticing a servant, the declarations of the servant cannot be given in evidence.

3. A contract made in this country does not create such a relation of master and servant as will authorize a justice of the peace to compel a specific service, and to inflict stripes for disobedience, under the law of the 26th of December, 1792, c. 132; but may give the master such a right to the service as will enable him to recover damages for enticing away the servant; and employment is prima facie evidence of enticement.

[Cited in Duckett v. Pool, 33 S. C. 238, 11 S. E. 690.]

Case for enticing a servant. The plaintiff's declaration stated that John Leonard, (the servant,) for a certain price agreed to serve the plaintiff for eight months. The plaintiff produced an indenture by which, in consideration of eight guineas paid by the plaintiff to Alexander Smith, Leonard agreed to serve the plaintiff for eight months.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant, objected that the proof varied from the declaration. The declaration means a certain price to be paid, and not a price paid; it means paid to Leonard and not to Smith.

But THE COURT (KILTY, Chief Judge, absent) overruled the objection, and said there was no variance. The court refused to admit the declarations of the servant to be given in evidence.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, moved the court to instruct the jury that the indenture constitutes the relation of master and servant, so as to make it actionable to entice away the servant; and also so as to come within the act of assembly of Virginia, which authorizes a justice of the peace to compel a specific service, and to whip the servant for running away. It is a contract to serve, made in a foreign country. He came into the country "under contract to serve another," as expressed in the act of assembly of Virginia (chapter 132, p. 247).

Mr. Swan, contrà. If there was a contract in Ireland, it is not the contract on which this action is brought. The contract with the plaintiff was made in this country.

THE COURT (FITZHUGH, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the indenture being executed here, the servant was not such a servant as is described in the Virginia Laws (chapter 132), and therefore the whipping by the order of the justice was illegal; but still it was such a contract for service as would maintain this action if Leonard was enticed away by the defendant.

Mr. Lee then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if Leonard had deserted the service of Milburne, and if the defendant, knowing that fact, employed and harbored Leonard, it is sufficient evidence to the jury that the defendant enticed Leonard away. Esp. N. P. 646; Fawcet v. Beavres, 2 Lev. 63.

Mr. Taylor, contrà, cited Blake v. Lanyon, 6 Term R. 221, and contended that the employment of the servant, by the defendant, was not evidence of enticing, although the defendant knew that the servant had left his master.

THE COURT was of opinion that it was presumptive evidence against the defendant, from which the jury might infer that he enticed the servant away.

APPEAL—JUSTICE OF PEACE—JURY DENIED—ERROR.

If a jury is required, and denied by the justice, when the sum exceeds ten dollars, it is an error for which his judgment should be set aside.

Error to Chicot circuit court.

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and CROSS, JJ.

CROSS, Judge. This cause is brought here upon a writ of error to the Chicot circuit court. The record shows that a suit was commenced before a justice of the peace, by the defendant in error, against [Benjamin L.] Miles, the plaintiff, for the sum of $17.95 cts. On the day of trial, Miles produced an account against [Thomas] James, of $15.37½ cts. Whereupon James asked the justice to discharge the jury, which, on the application of Miles, had been summoned without his consent, on the ground that the sum in controversy was not sufficient in amount to entitle the parties, or either of them, to a trial by jury. The justice went on to try the cause himself, and gave judgment against Miles for $9.52½ cts. Subsequently, and within the time prescribed by law, a writ of certiorari was sued out by Miles, and the proceedings certified up to the circuit court, and at the November term were there confirmed. This confirmation of the proceedings of the justice, is the only error assigned. Our statutes point out the methods by which a judgment rendered before a justice of the peace may be brought up before the circuit court. One by appeal, the other by certiorari. The former it will be necessary to examine. When the certiorari is used, the statute provides, "that if the court shall set aside the proceedings of the justice for irregularity or informality appearing upon the face of them, the court shall examine into the merits of the case, and give judgment as in other cases." Geyer, Dig. § 18, p. 391. The power of the circuit court to set aside the proceedings of the justice, is made to depend upon the irregularity or informality appearing upon their face, as certified up under the command of the certiorari. If either exist, they are to be taken for naught, and an examination of the merits permitted. On the other hand, if they be regular and formal, their confirmation must follow. Was it regular in the justice to deprive Miles of the right of trial by jury? A quotation from the statute will afford a sufficient answer to the question. It declares that "if the sum demanded exceeds ten dollars, either party shall have a right, upon application therefor, to a trial by jury." Geyer, Dig. § 12, p. 387. Here the sum demanded exceeded ten dollars, application was made for trial by jury, and that mode of trial refused. This refusal of the justice, we think, was sufficiently irregular for setting aside his proceedings. It was, consequently, error in the circuit court to confirm them. Judgment reversed.

EQUITY PRACTICE—SENDING ISSUES TO JURY — RAILROAD COMPANIES — NEGLIGENCE AND CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

[1. On a motion to send to a jury the issues arising under a petition against railroad receivers to recover damages for an alleged wrongful death, it is competent for the court to determine, on the evidence submitted, whether or not the case is one for damages, and if of opinion that it is not, then to dismiss the petition finally.]

[2. The rule applicable to the case of a boy killed by jumping upon an engine slowly moving through a street, is that if he was himself guilty of any negligence or act which caused the accident there can be no recovery unless defendant could have avoided it by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence.]

[3. A boy of eight years jumped upon the front of a locomotive moving slowly through a street, and the fireman, who saw him, immediately called to him to hold on, then notified the engineer, and ran to the boy's rescue. The engineer immediately reversed, and the boy either voluntarily loosened his hold or was jarred off by the shock and sustained injuries causing his death. Held, that even if the engineer committed a mistake in reversing, yet, having acted on the ordinary rule in such cases, it did not render the company liable, for its duty was to use only ordinary care and diligence.]

[4. A boy of eight years whose mother permits him to play upon the street is presumably of sufficient intelligence to know the danger of attempting to jump upon the front of a moving locomotive, and is therefore capable of contributory negligence barring a recovery for his death.]

The petitioner is the mother, the administratrix and the sole heir of the intestate [William Miles], who was killed by being run over by a locomotive engine of the defendants [the receivers of the Atlantic, Mississippi & Ohio Railroad Company] in the city of Norfolk on the 3rd day of January, 1878. The petitioner sues under the provisions of the Code of Virginia (chapter 145, §§ 5, 8) authorizing the personal representative of a deceased person to sue when that person if alive could have recovered damages for the wrongful act or neglect of the person or corporation sued. The claim is for $10,000 damages. All the evidence is in the form of depositions, and consists exclusively of that of the witnesses summoned by the petitioner. Its substance is as follows: The city of Norfolk allows freight trains and locomotives of the defendants to be run on the railroad track on Wide-Water street at a rate of speed not exceeding five miles an hour. A freight train of eight or ten cars was, on the 3rd January, 1878, running slowly along this street at the rate of 2½ to 3 miles an hour, pushed from the rear by a locomotive engine. There was a lookout on the forward car, and one on the rear car; and an engineer and a fireman on the locomotive. As the engine passed a group of men a lame boy in his eighth year of age, who had been frequently on the street unattended, got upon the fore-part of the engine. The fireman who was looking out on that side (while the engineer was doing so on the other) saw the boy's act, realized the danger he was in, and at once motioned and called to him to hold on. He also gave immediate notice to the engineer of the boy's situation and jumped down immediately and went to the boy's rescue. The engineer, obeying a rule prescribed when danger threatens, stopped and reversed his engine, causing a slacking of the cars, and a jerk such as would be produced with a train running thus slowly. Before the fireman who had jumped down could reach the boy, the latter had let go his hold to drop to the ground; or else the jar of reversing the engine had jostled loose his hold. In falling, the boy was caught by the machinery of the cylinder, dragged down upon the track, and his legs were run over by the engine, receiving injuries causing a nervous shock from which he died in a few hours. The mother of the boy lived on the same street in an upstairs room. She had gone out more than an hour before the accident, and was at an acquaintance's on another street of the town, sewing, at the time. In going out, the boy had followed her down stairs to the door of the ground floor, and had promised her there, not to go out upon the street. The evidence does not show, as counsel for petitioner asserts, that the fireman was attempting to put the boy off the engine. On the contrary, it shows that the effort of the fireman was to induce the boy to hold on, until he could rescue him. The evidence does not prove that the reversing of the engine jarred the boy off, as the same counsel assumes. The evidence leaves that matter in doubt. Wood, the fireman, who was the witness nearest the boy, testifies that he could not tell whether the boy dropped off of his own accord, or was jostled off by the jar of the engine in reversing. On the other hand, Brown, who was a little way off, says, the boy "let go his hold;" and expresses the opinion that the cause of the accident was "the jar of the box-car which must have been caused by reversing the engine;" and adds, that but for the boy's being lame "he might have saved himself;" intimating by the last remark, that he thought the accident was not due directly or exclusively to what was happening to the train. This witness testifies that the fireman did all that it was proper for him to do in the emergency; and the fireman and engineer testify that there was nothing which they could have done to save the boy, that they did not try to do. These three men were all witnesses of the petitioner, but employés of the defendants. There is nothing in the evidence to impeach or contradict their testimony. The foregoing is but the gist of the evidence, which may be seen at large in the depositions filed in the cause.

HUGHES, District Judge. If, on a review of the evidence, and on the law arising upon it, it shall appear to the court that this is a case for damages, then it must be sent to a jury for an assessment of the amount to be accorded to the petitioner. It has been argued and submitted on the question whether or not it is a case for damages and for a jury, and this is the first question upon which I am to pass. It is not pretended that any evidence in addition to that now before the court can be had in the case. Indeed the case has been closed as to the taking of evidence. So that, all the evidence being in, and the case submitted upon the question whether or not it is a case for an enquiry as to the amount of damages, it is not only competent for the court to determine whether or not it is a case for damages; but also, if concluding that it is not, to dismiss the petition finally.

The law of negligence applicable to such a case as that at bar may be stated as follows: The plaintiff in an action for negligence cannot succeed if it is found that he has himself been guilty of any negligence or act which caused the accident, unless the defendant could, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, have avoided the mischief which happened. Radley v. London & N. W. Ry. Co., L. R. 9 Exch. 71. The present case turns upon the latter enquiry; for whether it be a grown person or a child who wantonly gets upon a running engine, the managers of the engine and train are bound to use ordinary care and diligence to avoid accident to him. And, if that ordinary care and diligence appears, there can be no recovery; whether the sufferer by the accident be a grown person, or a youth capable of knowing whether or not his act was wrongful and dangerous, or a child too young to conceive the nature of his act. The testimony shows that the engineer acted upon the rule which the experience of railroad men has taught to be the wisest, safest and best one; namely, when danger threatens, to stop the engine and reverse it. The testimony shows that the fireman acted upon the belief (evidently proper) that it was best for that boy to hold on, and for himself to go to his rescue and to lift him clear of entanglement with the machinery. The testimony thus proves that these men used more than ordinary care and diligence in these respects and brings the case within the rule which exonerates defendants from liability to damages.

The testimony indicates that the boy was killed, not from want of ordinary care and diligence in the engineer and fireman, but from a jarring of the engine necessarily incident to the position in which he had placed himself, and from a lameness which disabled him from keeping clear of the machinery when he dropped from the engine. Even if it were true, which I by no means concede, that the engineer committed a mistake in stopping and reversing the engine, yet this would not subject the defendants to liability. He was bound only to use "ordinary care and diligence;" he was not bound to avoid mistakes, committed with bona fide intention to carry out reasonable rules and orders prescribed for such emergencies. If he innocently committed such a mistake, then the case falls within that most excellent rule of law laid down by Dr. Wharton (Whart. Neg. § 314): "The law has so high a regard for human life that it will not impute negligence to an effort to preserve it, unless made under such circumstances as to constitute rashness in the judgment of prudent persons." And another writer says (Bigelow, Torts, p. 312): "The defendant can never be liable when anything out of the natural and usual course of events transpires in such a way as to make the defendant's negligence, otherwise harmless, productive of injury."

Some of the more general principles of law governing a case like that at bar are the following: "When a man does everything in his power to avoid doing the mischief, then the liability ceases, and the event is to be regarded as a casualty." Whart. Neg. § 781. "A person is expected to anticipate and guard against all reasonable consequences of his act, but not to anticipate and guard against that which no reasonable man would expect to occur. Greenland v. Chaplin, 5 Exch. 248; Add. Torts, 29. "The standard by which to determine whether a person has been guilty of negligence is the conduct of the prudent or careful or diligent man." "The mere fact of an injury having been suffered is not enough to establish a charge of negligence. No one is responsible for an injury caused purely by inevitable accident, while he is engaged in a lawful business, even though the injury was the direct consequence of his own act, and the injured party was at the time lawfully employed, and in all respects free from fault." Shear. & R. Neg. § 5. "There are many cases in which it might be desirable that a greater degree of care should be used than the law requires; but it is only the lack of such care or diligence as the law demands which constitutes culpable negligence. And the law makes no unreasonable demands. * * * * If one uses all the skill and diligence which can be attained by reasonable means, he is not responsible for failure." Id. § 6.

I think these extracts contain the law of the present case. These men did, not only what prudent men usually do in such an emergency as that which happened, but they did what the experience of railroad men, and rules of prudence usually governing the running of railroads required them to do. I have considered the case without any reference to the doctrines of contributory negligence. If a grown and responsible man had got upon that engine while in motion, and suffered the injuries sustained by the boy Miles, there would have been no semblance of blame attaching to the railroad officers. The fireman might have ordered him off peremptorily; and the engineer might have stopped the train as abruptly as he had chosen; all without incurring liability for fault, if they acted in good faith; and there could have been no recovery. But there are cases in which children and persons of unsound mind are considered incapable of responsibility for their acts and are not held to the consequences of them, however reckless or tortious. If the boy in the present case had been too young to know that he was doing wrong and incurring risk of danger in getting on a running engine, then the conduct of the men on the engine could be judged wholly without reference to the boy's act, and if they were guilty of fault, liability for damages would have been incurred. In what has been said, I have treated the case in that point of view. But, is a boy in his eighth year incapable of discerning that such an act as that of young Miles, was wrong and perilous? This boy, it seems, was frequently on the street. His being often upon the street alone, implies that his mother thought him capable of knowing how to keep out of danger; for they lived on the very street on which the freight trains and locomotives of the defendants habitually ran. It is not the case of a child two or three years old being run over by a train on the track of a railroad in the country, at a point distant from a depot, where trains pass at full speed and afford but short notice of their approach,—as in Ex parte Stell [Case No. 13,358], decided by me. Nor is it the case of a child being injured while on a street traversed by a railroad track in consequence of the train moving faster than is allowed by law, or of a car becoming detached in consequence of some omission or careless act of an employe, as in Norfolk & P. R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Grat. 455. Here there was no surprise; no unusual speed; no act of carelessness. There was a look-out at each end of the train. The engine was properly manned and managed. The engine bell was ringing the alarm. The child was not a helpless, thoughtless, listless infant. He was not run over while unconsciously at his play. It was the case of a boy nearly eight years of age, frequently on the street, who himself got on an engine in wantonness, and who dropped off, probably of his own accord in fright; or possibly from inability to stay on a place not arranged to secure a safe footing for any one. I think it is a fair, if not a necessary inference from the acts of this boy and his mother, that he was intelligent enough to know the nature and danger of what he was doing. In all the cases of injuries to children which I have seen in the Reports, they were the passive subjects of injury. Here, however, is the unusual, if not the unprecedented case of the child being the actor on the occasion, and the originating author of the misfortune which befell him. I think this child was capable of intelligent choice between what was wrong and dangerous on one hand; and what was right and safe on the other; and that he intelligently chose the wrong and dangerous course. If this be so, the law is plain. The supreme court of the United States, in Railroad Co. v. Gladman, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 408, say: "The rule of law in regard to the negligence of an adult and the rule in regard to an infant, is quite different. By the adult there must be given that care and attention for his own protection that is ordinarily exercised by persons of intelligence and discretion. If he fails to give it, his injury is the result of his own folly, and cannot be visited upon another. Of an infant of tender years less discretion is required; and the degree depends upon his age and knowledge. Of a child three years of age, less caution would be required than of one of seven; and of a child of seven less than of one of twelve or fifteen. The caution required is according to the maturity and capacity of the child; and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case." The same proposition is repeated by the same court in Railroad Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 660. In Lynch v. Smith, 104 Mass. 52, the court say, passim: "If the child has not acted as reasonable care adapted to the circumstances of the case would dictate, and the parent has also negligently suffered him to be there, both these facts concurring contribute to the injury, for which the defendant ought not to be required to make compensation." The child there was 4 years and 7 months old. Plaintiff recovered. In Dowd v. Chicopee, 116 Mass. 93, it was held by the court that the plaintiff (an infant) was bound to prove that he exercised that degree of care and attention which may fairly and reasonably be expected from boys of his age and capacity. Wharton says (sections 310, 322), that from a child diligence and care are only to be exacted in proportion to his age or capacity; and Bigelow says (page 320), that if a child be guilty of contributory negligence (supposing him capable of negligence) there can be no recovery; and that a child must exercise such care as he reasonably can, or as children of the same capacity ordinarily exercise. Irrespectively, however, of the law of contributory negligence as applicable to children competent to know when they are incurring danger, there can be no recovery here.

On the whole evidence and the law arising upon it, as laid down recently in the cases of Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Anderson, 31 Grat. 812, and Railroad Co. v. Jones [95 U. S.] 443, and in my own decision in the case of Ex parte Stell [supra], filed in the papers of that cause, I hold that the defendants in this case are not liable in damages to any amount; that an issue of chancery for a jury must be denied; and that the petition must be dismissed, but without costs against the petitioner,—and I will so order.

PLEADING AT LAW—NON-ASSUMPSIT—PAYMENT—REPLICATION—ISSUE MADE—APPEAL—ERROR.

1. A judgment in assumpsit will be reversed if the cause is tried without replication to good pleas in bar, such as non-assumpsit and payment.

2. Until replication, the jury could not be sworn to try the issue, for in fact there is no issue between the parties to be tried.

Appeal from Chicot circuit court.
Before JOHNSON and SCOTT, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of trespass on the case, on promises, brought by [Enoch] Rose against [Benjamin L.] Miles, to which the latter pleaded non-assumpsit and payment. Without making an issue, or replying, or noticing these pleas, Rose proceeded, a jury was sworn, the cause tried, and a judgment rendered in his favor, from which Miles has appealed to this court. The pleas of Miles were a good bar to the action until avoided, traversed, or denied by replications; and without which a jury could not be sworn to try the issue, for in fact there was no issue made up between the parties. This error is too manifest to require reasoning from the court, and was doubtless the result of inattention on the part of Rose. Reversed.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, against the ship Miletus, by Fletcher Westray and others, owners of a cargo of tea, shipped by that vessel from Amoy, China, to New York, to recover damages to such cargo. Both parties appealed to this court from the decree of the district court. [Case No. 17,461.]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. I concur with the court below, that the damages caused by the destruction of the labels on the coverings of the chest of tea were occasioned by cockroaches. These vermin eat off and deface the paper labels pasted on the outside of the mats which enclose the boxes, which injury embarrasses the assortment and delivery of the article to the consignees, and depreciates the market value of the same.

I also concur in the opinion, that the rule must be regarded as settled, in this court, that damages occasioned by vermin, on board of a ship, to a cargo, in the course of a voyage, are not the result of a peril of the sea, or of any of the dangers or accidents of navigation, within an exception to that effect in a bill of lading, but are damages for which the ship and its owner are liable, as insurers of the safe conveyance of the cargo. Hazard's Adm'r v. New England Marine Ins. Co., 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 557.

I also agree, that the stevedores who discharged the ship at New York, under the special clause in the charter party, were the agents of the shippers, and that the vessel was not liable for the damages done to the packages by those parties. They were selected by the agent of the shippers, in pursuance of the authority contained in the charter party. As both parties have appealed, the decree below is affirmed, without costs to either party in this court.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—DUTIABLE CHARGES—FREIGHT—ACTION TO RECOVER DUTY PAID.

Where merchandise was shipped from Canton to the United States, via Manilla, where it was to be, and was transhipped, and a separate freight paid to Manilla, the charge for freight could not be added to the market value at Canton, as one of the dutiable charges; but all charges incurred at Manilla should be added as dutiable charges.

[Cited in Forman v. Peaslee, Case No. 4,941.]

[This was a suit by Daniel L. Millar and others against Ephraim Millar to recover a certain sum illegally paid for duties.]

A. W. Griswold, for plaintiffs.

Mr. Hallett, Dist. Atty., contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action to recover of the collector of the port of Salem, moneys alleged to have been illegally exacted in payment of duties. In July, 1848, Messrs. Wetmore & Co., at Canton, shipped to the plaintiffs, for their account, four hundred cases of camphor, the product of China. On account of difficulty in procuring a tea vessel to take camphor, because of its effect on a cargo of tea, it was shipped to Manilla, consigned to Messrs. Peale, Hubbell & Co., with directions to forward it to the United States. This was done. Expenses were paid at Manilla for freight from China to Manilla, porterage and coolie hire, duties paid at the custom-house, and commissions of Peale, Hubbell & Co., for their services in receiving and forwarding the property. A separate freight was paid for carrying the camphor from Manilla to the United States. The collector added the freight to Manilla and all the charges there, to the invoice cost of the merchandise, as dutiable charges. The plaintiffs protested against paying a duty on these charges and this freight.

This case comes under the sixteenth section of the tariff act of 1842 (5 Stat. 563). So far as respects the freight from China to Manilla, it is identical with the case of Grinnell v. Lawrence [Case No. 5,831]. Though the Case of Gant, just decided, arose under the act of 1851 (9 Stat. 629), and consequently involved some different considerations, yet many of the views expressed in that case, are applicable to this. My opinion is, that the freight to Manilla was not a dutiable charge. In respect to the other expenses at Manilla, there is much more difficulty. The sixteenth section of the act of 1842, required the collector to add to the value of these goods, estimated according to their market value in Canton, "all costs and charges." It has been argued that this means all costs and charges to get the property on shipboard at the port of exportation, which, in this case, was Canton. I have no doubt it means this, but does it include only these costs and charges? Ordinarily, no others would exist, save marine freight, which, as we have seen, has been excluded according to an early practical interpretation deemed to have been adopted by congress. But when other charges, besides marine freight, and costs and charges incurred to get the property on shipboard, at the port of exportation, have been incurred, as in this case, why are they not to be added? Certainly the language of the act, "all costs and charges," is broad enough to include them, and what is to take those charges out of those explicit and comprehensive words? It is not sufficient that these charges were incurred in order that the property might reach its destination, and so may be fairly considered as expenses of transit. So are all expenses of getting the property to the ship at the port of exportation. These expenses bear the same relation to a part of the voyage from the country of production, to the United States, that the cost of getting the merchandise on shipboard at the point of exportation ordinarily bears to the whole voyage. Unless, therefore, something can be found, in some act of congress, showing that "all costs and charges," means only those incurred at the port whence the merchandise first departs for the United States, and nothing of the kind has been produced, I can see no sound reason why these charges were not dutiable. The same result would follow, if Manilla were considered the port whence this merchandise was imported into the United States; for then, these expenses were incurred at the port of shipment; and, in accordance with the usual rule, would be properly included. But, for the reasons given in Gant's Case, I consider, that as the camphor was purchased by the plaintiffs in Canton for importation into the United States, and went to Manilla, into the hands of the plaintiffs' agents there, merely to be forwarded to the United States, that Canton, and not Manilla, was the place whence it was imported into the United States.

A verdict must be directed, in conformity with the agreement of the parties, to recover so much as was paid by reason of the addition of the freight as a dutiable charge.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—CONDITIONS TO DEFENDING—COSTS—STIPULATION.

[This was a libel in personam by Walter Millard and others against James E. Craig and others, owners of the scow Globe.]

THE COURT decided that, in giving a bond to relieve property taken by a clause of foreign attachment, that the defendant must pay the taxed costs on said motion, as a condition to be permitted to defend the cause on its merits. Order accordingly.

On another motion in the same cause, THE COURT held that the supreme court, by rule 4, has changed the character and scope of stipulations in cases of personal arrest. [Case No. 9,548.] In suits in personam, in whatever way the defendant is brought into court, he is required to give a stipulation to satisfy the decree before he can be admitted to defend the case, instead of giving stipulations for costs only.

[18 Betts, D. C. MS. 4.]

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—COSTS OF ATTACHMENT.

[Respondent in an admiralty suit in personam, after an attachment has been levied upon a return "Not found," before being permitted to defend the cause on its merits, should pay the costs of the attachment.]

[This was a libel by Millard and Mills against James E. Craig and others, owners of the scow Globe. The scow was taken on foreign attachment, and the question is now as to costs thereon.]

BETTS, District Judge. The warrant of arrest in this cause was accompanied by a clause of foreign attachment. The marshal returned the defendants "Not found," and that he had attached the scow Globe, as their property. Sometime subsequent to this return, and after the default of the defendants had been taken, they were allowed by the court, on their motion, to come in and defend the case, on giving the stipulation or bond required by rule 6 of the supreme court. That bond has been given, and the question now is, which party is to pay the costs accrued on the foreign attachment? The property arrested should now be given up, the end for which it was attached having been secured. Sup. Ct. Rule 101. But it rests in the discretion of the court to adjudge, in matters of costs, according to the equity of the parties. Prima facie, the party relieved from a default, or to whom a favor in forwarding his defence is accorded, will be chargeable with the costs created by the proceeding from which he is relieved. Sup. Ct. Rules 10, 40. Here there is no open motion by the defendants to discharge the scow. Their interpretation of the rule is that it becomes released by virtue of the appearance of the parties personally affected pursuant to the rules. This may be so, but it does not therefore dispose of the question whether they are exonerated from costs thereby, or are chargeable with them. In my opinion, it is an equity on the part of the libellant, incident to the appearance of a defendant so pronounced against, that the defendant should satisfy the costs incurred in bringing him into court. If any facts exist on his part tending to counterbalance that general equity, they should be made to appear by him. In observance of all particulars other than what are presented by these papers, I think the defendants come within the rule, and that they must pay the taxable costs on the foreign attachment, as a condition to being permitted to defend the cause on its merits. Order accordingly.

[2 Wall. Jr. 334.] [1]

PRACTICE—JUDICIARY ACT—CITIZENSHIP—ASSIGNMENT OF CHOSE IN ACTION.

In suing on a chose in action, if the plaintiff be not a citizen of the same state as the defendant, his right to sue is not taken away by the fact that the chose may have passed to him through the hands of persons who were citizens of that state, and so unable to prosecute a suit in this court, provided the party to whom the chose was originally given was not such a citizen, and could himself have therefore prosecuted such a suit.

[Cited in Hampton v. Truckee Canal Co., 19 Fed. 4.]

The judiciary act (Act 1789, c. 20, § 11 [1 Stat. 78]), giving jurisdiction to the circuit court of suits between citizens of different states, says that this court shall not "have cognizance of any suit to recover the contents of any promissory note or other chose in action in favour of an assignee, unless a suit might have been prosecuted in such court to recover the said contents if no assignment had been made." In this case, which was a bill in equity to compel the sale of mortgaged premises, the bill set forth that the complainant, the mortgagee, one Milledollar, was a citizen of New York, and that the mortgagor, the defendant, Bell, was a citizen of New Jersey. But while setting forth seven intermediate assignments to persons who were named, it was silent as to the citizenship or residence of any one of them; except of the last, the present complainant, who was entitled, as already stated, a citizen of New York. On a demurrer to the bill, the question was, whether it was necessary to aver that each one of the assignees was or had been a citizen of a state different from that of Bell, the mortgagor and defendant.

In support of the demurrer: In Mollan v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537, a suit by an indorsee of a promissory note against an indorser, the declaration stated the plaintiff Mollan to be a citizen of one state, and the defendant Torrance to be a citizen of another; but was silent respecting the citizenship of one Lourie, a third person, the immediate indorser of the plaintiff, and a party through whom the plaintiff had to trace his title to the money for which the suit was brought. The court, distinguishing the case from that of Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 146, where the judgment was sustained, say: "The suit is brought against a remote indorser, and the plaintiffs in their declaration trace their title through an intermediate indorser, without showing that this intermediate indorser could have sustained his action,"—and quoting Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 8, decide that the count showed no jurisdiction. In Brown v. Noyes [Case No. 2,023], in the First circuit, the court speaking of the clause of the judiciary act now under consideration, and making no distinction in the position of the indorsees, says its policy "was to prevent parties coming into this court by assignments, when those previously interested were not entitled to come here." And in Heckscher v. Binney [Id. 6,316], "when the suit could originally have been brought here, it might be now, if the indorsee also lived out of the state, and could sue here."

Against the demurrer: Wilson v. Fisher [Case No. 17,803], in this circuit, has decided this point, which nothing but the statement there made by Judge Baldwin, that the point had nowhere else, nor at any other time, been directly adjudicated, can allow to be treated de novo. The meaning and extent of the law, is there well presented at the bar. It is immaterial, said Mr. Rawle, senior, through whose hands the debt may have passed by assignment. If the right to the debt is transferred to an alien he may sue, not as representing his immediate assignor, but the original party. Turner v. Bank of North America, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 8, could not be sustained, because it did not appear that the original payee, under whom of course the plaintiff claimed, was a citizen of a state different from that in which the defendant resided. "The act of congress," he said, "refers to the capacity of the party to whom the debt was originally due, to sue in the federal courts, his right passes to the last assignee, who, if he is an alien or a citizen of another state, has the same right to sue here, as if he was the plaintiff in the judgment." And he added, that "full effect is given to the proviso in the act of congress, if the assignee is in the same situation as the party originally entitled to the debt; it would be straining the law beyond its obvious meaning, to put him in a worse." Here the complainant being a citizen of one state, and the defendant a citizen of another, the case comes within the enabling part of the law; and as a suit might have been prosecuted in this court, if no assignment had been made, the complainant does not come even within the letter of the proviso.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. The bill avers that Milledollar, the mortgagee, is a citizen of New York. He could, therefore, have brought his suit in this court for the contents of the bond and mortgage, "if no assignment had been made." And to sustain the jurisdiction of the court in his case, it would have been necessary only to aver that the mortgagors were citizens of New Jersey at the time suit was brought. The complainant's case is therefore within the strict letter of the law—nor can we discover anything in the spirit, equity or policy of the act, or in adjudged cases, which would compel us to give it a construction such as the defendant asks. The statute does not take from the assignee of a chose in action his right to sue in the courts of the United States, unless his immediate assignor could have sustained such action; but only in case the court could have had no jurisdiction as between the original parties to the instrument, if no assignment had been made. The situation or rights of temporary intermediate assignees, holders, or indorsers enter not into the conditions of the case.

The only case which has been brought to our knowledge, in which this point is directly decided, is that of Wilson v. Fisher [supra], which fully supports our view of this point. Mollan v. Torrance 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 537, in the supreme court of the United States, which has been quoted as upholding a contrary doctrine, will be found on examination to have no application. It affirms the doctrine of Young v. Bryan, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 146, that an indorsee who resides in a different state, may sue his immediate indorser residing in the state where suit is brought, although the indorsee may be a citizen of the same state with the maker. The reason is, because the indorsee sues upon his own contract with the indorser, and not on the original contract of the drawer. But in the case last quoted, of Mollan v. Torrance, though Torrance was sued as indorser, Mollan was not the immediate indorsee, and it did not appear that Lowrie, who was the immediate indorsee and contractor with Torrance, could have sued in the circuit court. The question whether, if the immediate indorsee could have sued, and the then present holder and plaintiff could also have sued by reason of citizenship, the rights of intermediate holders could affect the case, was not before the court. The language used in the opinion of the court, is perfectly correct, when applied to the case before it. No court can pronounce dogmas of universal application; and the application of general expressions, in an opinion, to cases not before the court, is a sure road to an erroneous result. The same remarks will apply to the cases decided in the First circuit (Brown v. Noyes [Case No. 2,023]; Heckscher v. Binney [Id. 6,316]), so far as the language of them can be made to apply to the present case at all. They are correct decisions of the case before the court. But the point now under consideration was not raised nor considered.

We are of opinion, therefore, that, as this bill shows that the complainant is a citizen of New York and the defendants citizens of New Jersey, at the time the bill was filed, and that the original contractor or mortgagee is a citizen of the same state, and could therefore have sued these defendants at the time this bill was filed, in the circuit court of New Jersey, "if no assignment had been made," this court has jurisdiction of the case, and the citizenship of the intermediate holders, owners or assignees, is immaterial, and need not be averred. Demurrer overruled with costs.

[1 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 38.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—JOINT CONTRACT—MUTUAL INTEREST—SHARING PROFITS.

1. Where a guarantee was endorsed on a bond in the following words, "We do jointly and severally guarantee the payment of the within bond, with interest and all proper charges thereupon accruing as fully as if the said bond had been executed by us," and the creditor had elected to prove his debt against the bankrupt as a separate debt, held, that the court have not the power to place it in the class of partnership debts, whatever may have been its origin.

2. A mere joint proprietorship of property on joint contract does not render the persons concerned copartners.

3. The partnership relationship, though not limited to mercantile transactions, necessarily depends upon a mutual interest between parties in the profit and loss of the concern, either by actually sharing profits or the expectation of so doing.

[On the part of the creditors of Edmund H. Miller, a bankrupt.]

This was a case arising from the exceptions to the assignee's report, and the questions submitted for the opinion of the court were: 1st. Whether a contract joint and several in its terms may be enforced as a several obligation against each party. 2d. Whether a joint and several obligation entered into by partners under seal must be regarded a partnership undertaking. 3d. Whether the language of the undertaking does not distinguish between the absolute obligations of the parties, and that which they assume as guarantors, being in the latter case joint and several, and in the former, several only.

Mr. Joachimssen, for bankrupt.

Mr. Marbury, for creditors.

BETTS, District Judge. I think there is no support to this last criticism in the language of the contract. The terms are: "We do jointly and severally guarantee the payment of the within bond with interest, and all proper charges thereupon accruing, as fully as if the said bond had been executed by us." This undertaking, made the 20th of September, was written on a bond executed the 27th of June preceding. If it be admitted that "guarantee" is the operative word of the contract, it would rather follow that the terms succeeding it to be construed in qualification or explanation of the scope and meaning of that undertaking than as setting up an independent and different one. That is, the guarantee, being joint and several, is to bind the parties the same as if the bond itself had been so executed by them; and it would be a strained reading, in this view of the object of the parties, to understand the pronoun ("us") as turning a joint and several stipulation into one solely joint. The more natural sense of the expression would be to give to what is called a "guarantee" the same character that would have attached to the obligation had the parties in the same way signed the bond itself. It is plain the obligors intended to join both their joint and several responsibility, and the stipulation to that, and give the undertaking the same effect, though written on the back of the bond, as if subscribed on its face.

The second point raised must be decided in the negative. A mere joint proprietorship of property or joint contract does not render the persons concerned co-partners. 3 Kent, Comm. 36, 39, 40. The partnership relationship, though not limited to mercantile transactions, necessarily depends upon a mutual interest between the two parties in the profit and loss of the concern; either by an actual sharing of profits, or an expectation of them. 2 Kent, Comm. 24, 28; Story, Partn. 170; Colly. Partn. 8. The stipulation therefore by these obligators, if exclusively joint in its terms, would not constitute them partners, nor the contract a partnership engagement. Nor does the fact that the obligors were partners constitute the agreement a partnership contract. The question need not now be mooted whether a joint obligation entered into by partners in respect to matters out of the scope of the partnership can be enforced against the partnership effects to the exclusion of partnership creditors. The immediate point presented for decision is whether this contract, being several as well as joint, must be classed by force of the bankrupt act with partnership demands. This inquiry is solved by well settled rules of law expounding the influence of partnership associations upon the individual capacity of the separate members; for whatever diversity of decision may exist with respect to the remedy of creditors on contracts of partners joint in terms, which ought in equity to be several also (Sumner v. Powell, 2 Mer. 30), in regard to real property acquired with partnership funds, but which under the ordinary rules of law belongs to the partners separately (3 Kent, Comm. 37, 39; Colly. Partn. 342, 347), no question is ever raised but that one partner may bind himself to third persons in his individual capacity, and his undertaking become in every respect a separate contract (Owen, 285, 297). The above case of Sumner v. Powell, 2 Mer. 30, is an authority for looking beyond a bond which is joint in its terms to the consideration upon which it rests and the equities of parties to it, and if found to arise out of considerations several in their character to impose a several liability on the obligors. Owen, 292, 293.

The court will not now decide whether the creditor has an indefeasible right to regard this debt, it being several and joint in its form, as the one rule or the other at his option; nor, he having elected to prove his debt against the bankrupt as a separate debt, whether it is now in the power of the court to place it in the class of partnership debts, whatever may have been its origin. 13 Ves. 70; 1 Rose, 159; 2 Cox, 218; 2 Rose, 34; 5 Madd. 419. This point will be reserved until all the facts are before the court. The creditors are at liberty therefore to go to proofs, to show the liability of the bankrupt to the creditor to have been of a partnership character, and proceedings on the dividend will stay until the report of the commissioner and the judgment of the court thereon.

COURTS—CONFLICT OF JURISDICTION — BANKRUPTCY COURT—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE—ENJOINING SUIT IN STATE COURT.

1. When the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], cannot be properly administered by the bankruptcy court, owing to the interference of a state court and its determination to adjudicate upon the rights of parties and property in the bankruptcy court, then the latter ought not to hesitate to assert its authority.

2. In questions under the bankrupt act, the federal and state courts are not independent, but the former are superior.

3. The finding of a jury that the debtor had committed an act of bankruptcy by making a preference to a creditor in transferring property to him, was in this case substantially an instruction to the marshal to take possession of it, or a ratification of his act, and the marshal was authorized so to do.

4. A decision by the bankruptcy court that a transfer was in fraud of the act is binding upon the state courts, and the creditor must come into the bankruptcy court to assert his rights as against such decision.

5. If, however, he sue the marshal and the assignee in trespass in a state court, the bankruptcy court may enjoin the parties to the suit.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of Illinois.]

E. A. Sherburne, for Baldwin, creditor.

George Herbert and Holmes, Rich & Noble, for the marshal.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. A question of some practical importance was argued before me yesterday, which involves to some extent a conflict of jurisdiction between the state and federal courts. It is rather a peculiar case, and I am not aware that the same question has ever been presented before in any reported case.

The facts are that a petition in bankruptcy had been filed against one S. S. Miller. One of the grounds for adjudication was that he had been guilty of an act of bankruptcy in disposing of some of his goods two days before the filing of the petition, to one Baldwin, a creditor, with an intent to give a preference to him, and in fraud of the bankrupt act. The jury found the allegation to be true, and a decree in bankruptcy was entered against Miller. The effect of this decree was to establish that the sale to Baldwin was fraudulent as against the bankrupt law. A warrant had issued from the bankrupt court, and the property, which it had been claimed was sold by Miller to Baldwin, was taken by the marshal and turned over to the assignee, who sold it and now holds the proceeds.

Baldwin then brought an action of trespass in the superior court of Cook county against the marshal and the assignee, to recover damages for taking the property. The petition presented in the district court asked for the interposition of the court in that suit in the state court, and set forth the above facts, and that Baldwin was a witness in the bankruptcy suit. There were also some affidavits filed, between which and the petition some discrepancies existed. The court on that petition made an interlocutory order restraining Baldwin and his attorneys from prosecuting the suit in the state court until further order.

On a motion to set aside this order, the whole question has been fully argued before me. The case is peculiar in this respect: that Baldwin was a witness in the bankruptcy proceedings, and in a certain sense appeared therein, and it was claimed that it was partly on his testimony that the adjudication was found against Miller. Although, therefore, he was not nominally a party to the bankruptcy proceedings, still, it is insisted he was really a party and had notice of those proceedings and of the adjudication. This being so, the question is whether it was proper for Baldwin under the circumstances and without leave of the bankruptcy court to commence, in the state court, a suit founded on the very sale of property in consequence of which an adjudication in bankruptcy was rendered. It was stated, in an affidavit filed, that the assignee was a party to the suit in the state court at the time of the granting of the injunctional order, but that the suit had since been dismissed as to him. This fact is relied upon by the counsel for Baldwin, as giving him a stronger standing in the state court. The suit being now only against the marshal, and not interfering with the property, and being for damages only, it is contended that Baldwin has a right to maintain his suit, although the assignee has the proceeds of the property.

An embarrassing question arises, because, it is said, all these facts have been presented to the state court, which has refused to consider them, and is determined to go on and render a judgment in the case. The question is, then, whether this was a proper proceeding on the part of Baldwin? I am inclined to think it was not, and, although it might be unpleasant to interfere with the state court, still, when the law could not be properly administered by the bankrupt court, owing to the interference of the state court and its determination to adjudicate on the rights of parties and property, as in this case, then the bankrupt court ought not to hesitate to assert its authority.

There seems to be an erroneous view prevailing among some of the bar and the public, that the state and federal courts are independent of each other in all questions of this kind—that when the state court is called on to yield, it is not consistent with its dignity to submit and allow itself to be overruled. This is not so. The state and federal courts are one for some purposes and distinct for others. The general government is supreme within its legitimate sphere, and this necessitates the state court yielding in such instances. Now the constitution gave power to congress to pass a bankrupt law, and gives the bankrupt court the power over the rights and property of the citizens of the states, and the present law declares that certain proceedings in the state courts shall be of no effect.

For instance, the bankrupt act dissolves all attachment suits commenced within a certain time prior to bankruptcy proceedings, and vests the property attached in the assignee. This is done by virtue of the general power which is given to congress to pass bankrupt laws. This law also puts an end to all insolvent proceedings under the laws of the states, and hence they are ipso facto rendered inoperative when bankruptcy proceedings are taken.

In the present case, then, under this state of things, what is the effect of bankruptcy proceedings? It is this: that this contract between Baldwin and Miller was declared a fraud on the bankrupt law, and inoperative as to creditors. Consequently, a decree in effect that this property belonged to the creditors, and that the assignee had a right to it under the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act,—which declares that "all property conveyed by a bankrupt in fraud of his creditors shall pass to the assignee,"—was substantially by relation an instruction to the marshal to take possession of it. It can hardly be said to be like the case where a party prosecuting in the state court is an entire stranger to the bankruptcy proceedings.

The decree must be presumed to have been correct. It might be said that while the sale by Miller was a fraud on the creditors, still Baldwin was no party to it and that "if he did not have reasonable cause to believe that a fraud was intended, and that the debtor was insolvent," the sale was good as to him. Who, however, is to decide this? It is admitted on all sides that this is a question which the federal court has the right to decide. This being a federal question, could an ultimate decision be rendered by the state courts? Was the assignee bound to follow Baldwin through every state court up to its highest tribunal, and so on to the supreme court of the United States, or must he come into the federal court and assert his rights. Either the case must go to the supreme court of the United States under the 25th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 85], or Baldwin must come into the federal court.

In the case of Buck v. Colbath, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 334, it was claimed that the marshal had improperly taken the property of "B." in an attachment suit in the federal court for the property of "A." There "B." was allowed to sue the marshal in the state court. In that case the supreme court put it on the ground that the question in the federal court was not as to the title to property between "A." and "B." But in the case now before the court that is the question, and the federal court has in one respect decided that the property was Miller's; and this it had a right to decide, as is said by the supreme court in the case of Ex parte Christy, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 292. In Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450, it was decided that when the property is in the possession of the marshal it could not be interfered with by a process from the state court; and here the property was in effect in the possession of the court or its officers, and the maintenance of the action in the state court depends on the construction to be given to the bankrupt law.

It often happens that the federal and state courts decide differently between citizens of a state as to the rights of property, but here the federal court is, under the bankrupt law, the ultimate arbiter as to the construction of the bankrupt law, and by this the state courts are bound. This property must, therefore, come into the federal court to have rights determined. It is asked how Baldwin can have an appeal or writ of error. He has dismissed the suit against the assignee, but the assignee has the property or the proceeds, and Baldwin has a complete remedy for the value of the property taken against him; and an appeal or writ of error will lie, for the value of the property taken, in a suit against the assignee just as in any other case.

The order of the district court is only temporary, and under the peculiar circumstances of the case I shall not at present interfere with it. If there are any facts which in the opinion of counsel may justify it, Baldwin can make application to the bankruptcy court to proceed with his suit in the state court.

See further that an injunction will not be granted to stay proceedings in a suit instituted in a state court against the marshal for taking possession of property which did not belong to the debtor, under a warrant in involuntary proceedings. In re Marks [Case No. 9,095].

GRAND JURY—DISTRICT ATTORNEY—INSTRUCTIONS NOT TO PROSECUTE—OATH OF JURY.

The grand jury, having the case of Casey W. Miller, charged with embezzlement in the First National Bank of Indianapolis, under investigation, came into open court and reported to Judge Gresham that the district attorney had received instructions from the president of the United States against prosecuting a certain party for alleged embezzlement in the First National Bank of Indianapolis, that they had been requested to investigate the matter, and desire to know from the court whether it was their duty to proceed with the case, instructions of the president to the district attorney to the contrary notwithstanding.

GRESHAM, District Judge (charging jury). When you were impanelled at the beginning of the term you swore that you would diligently inquire and true presentment make of such matters as should be given you in charge, or might otherwise come to your knowledge, touching violations of the criminal statutes of the United States; that you would present no one through envy, hatred or malice, and that you would have no one unpresented through fear, favor, affection, reward, or the hope thereof. You could not, if you would, escape the obligation of this oath by heeding the instruction of the president in this particular case. The president may, if he feels so inclined, interfere, even in advance of indictment, by exercising the pardoning power. In no other way has he the slightest authority to control your action. He has it in his power to pardon the alleged offender, and unless he is willing to take this responsibility he has no more right to control your action than the czar of Russia. If you believe the president's instructions to the district attorney were intended to prevent you from making the fullest investigation into the matter now before you, and from returning an indictment against the accused if the evidence should warrant it, you should be inspired with additional determination to do your duty. The moment the executive is allowed to control the action of the courts in the administration of criminal justice their independence is gone. It is due the president to say that the court does not believe he has any desire to encroach on the judiciary, or that he contemplated any unwarranted interference by his instructions to the district attorney. The district attorney says in open court that he is ready and willing to aid you in any examination of this case which you may feel called upon to make. He and his assistants are faithful officers, and will render you all necessary aid in this as in other cases.

fixed for hearing the creditors, upon their petition praying for the discontinuance of the proceedings in this matter, which said petition was referred to me by special order of said district court, "with power to investigate the facts and to report upon the law and expediency of such discontinuance. And further, that said register call a meeting of the creditors," &c. And further, that said register report as soon as may be thereafter the action of said meeting to this court, and as to the power of the court to order such discontinuance. I sat, at the time and place above mentioned, for the purpose of performing the duties so assigned to me.

All the creditors of said bankrupt [William D. Miller] named in the schedule were notified of the time and place of this meeting, under the order of the court, by publication in the Erie Daily Republican, copies of which, containing the notice, were sent to each of the creditors, as well as to those who had proved their debts. Nineteen out of fifty-four of the creditors have proved their debts, amounting in all to the sum of $9,030.95. All of these were present at this meeting, or duly represented by their attorneys, except the "Akron Stove Company," whose claim, as proved, is only twenty-five dollars. All the remaining twelve who have proved their debts, amounting to $9,005.95, vote in favor of dismissing the proceedings in bankruptcy, in compliance with the prayer of the petition. The claims of the creditors who have not proved their debts amount to about twenty thousand dollars. In view of the facts that the petitioning creditor, D. J. Crowell, the bankrupt, and all the creditors who have proved their debts (with the single exception above mentioned), desire the court to dismiss the proceedings, the register is of the opinion that it is expedient and proper that it should be done, provided it is lawful to do so. On this point the following is respectfully submitted to the honorable judge of the district court:

By SAMUEL E. WOODRUFF, Register:

William D. Miller was duly adjudged a bankrupt on the 18th day of October, 1867, on petition of D. J. Crowell, one of his creditors. Twenty-four of his creditors petition the court to dismiss and supersede the whole proceedings. No assignee has yet been chosen. The bankrupt and the petitioning creditor, and all the other creditors who have proved their debts (save one who did not appear nor make any opposition, and whose debt only amounts to twenty-five dollars), join in asking the court to grant the prayer of the petition. Has the judge of the district court the power to do so?

Two learned attorneys appeared before the register, in support of the affirmative of this proposition, but they furnished no authority or law bearing on the point, and base their arguments upon the general power of common law courts to dismiss proceedings upon the application of the parties. The proceedings in bankruptcy are sui generis, and in absence of any express enactment, it is proper to look to the general scope and spirit of the act of congress creating the jurisdiction. I am not aware that the question under consideration has been determined or even discussed in proceedings under the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 517].

In coming to the conclusion I have arrived at, I give much weight to the action of the creditors who have proved their debts, at the meeting above referred to. At that meeting they decided that, in their opinion, it was best for all concerned that the proceedings should be discontinued—nemo contradicente. The act gives large powers in the premises to these meetings of creditors. When presided over by the register it calls them "courts of bankruptcy." Sections 11, 12. It authorizes a majority in number and value of such creditors to elect assignees (section 13), to remove an assignee by a similar vote (section 18), to determine the amount of dividends (section 27). Three fourths in value of them may supersede the proceedings by arrangement, and commit the whole estate of the bankrupt to trustees, who shall settle the estate under their direction (section 43), in which event the whole matter is taken out of the hands of the court, except as its aid is invoked by the creditors. The creditors who do not prove their debts are not allowed to have a voice in any of the proceedings, or to participate in the funds. The policy of the act is to have the estate disposed of in such manner as the proving creditors shall determine is for their interest. In the present case they have determined that their interests will be best promoted by allowing the bankrupt to resume the possession of his estate, and to continue business. The register is of the opinion that the court has power to grant their request. There are some decisions under the bankrupt laws that have a bearing upon this point. In Cullen's Bankrupt Laws (440) it is said: "The only case in which any express provision by statute has been made for superseding a commission is that of a petitioning creditor compounding his debts with the bankrupt; but the lord chancellor has always exercised a discretion of this kind whenever the ends of justice required, either for the sake of the creditors or of the bankrupt himself, that a commission should not be suffered to proceed." Hill. Bankr. (2d Ed.) 406: "A district judge derives the power to supersede a commission of bankruptcy from the bankrupt law, by construction and implication." Morris's Estate [Case No. 9,825], cited Hill. Bankr. 407. "A supersedeas lawfully ordered places the bankrupt and his estate in the same situation they would have been in if the commission had never existed." Id. 407.

For the foregoing reasons the register is of the opinion that it is both expedient, and legal, that a decree be entered by the court, directing the whole proceedings in this matter to be dismissed, vacated, and annulled; and that the marshal, as messenger, be directed to render up to the said William D. Miller, all property in his possession by virtue of the warrant of seizure, upon the payment by the said William D. Miller, of all costs of the proceedings.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. The decision of the register is affirmed.

Ex parte MONSON SAVINGS BANK.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan. 3, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY—SECURED DEBT—MORTGAGE—SALE THEREUNDER—PROVING BALANCE DUE.

The creditor bank held a mortgage for eight thousand dollars given by the bankrupt and one S. M. upon land owned by them in equal shares. After the bankrupt had been adjudicated and an assignee appointed, the bank, without notice to the assignee or leave of court, sold the mortgaged premises at auction for one thousand dollars and claimed to prove for the balance of the debt. It was afterwards agreed by the parties that the value of the land was six thousand dollars, and that the sale had been made "without any thought of the effect it might have upon the balance of their claim in bankruptcy." Held, that no sufficient equitable excuse was given for the failure to comply with the law in disposing of the security, and that the creditor could not prove for any sum whatever.

The Monson Savings Bank held a mortgage, given by Francis Miller, the bankrupt, and S. H. Miller, of land, in Springfield, owned by them in equal shares, to secure their joint note for eight thousand dollars and interest. After F. Miller had been adjudged bankrupt, and after the appointment of his assignee, the bank sold the land by auction, in pursuance of a power in the deed, without notice to the assignee, or actual knowledge on his part, or leave of court, and it was bought by one Holmes, who was the highest bidder, for one thousand dollars. Giving credit for this amount against the debt and interest, and certain taxes and other charges, there remained an excess of debt amounting to seven thousand seven hundred and eighty-one dollars and twenty-six cents, for which the bank offered proof. After the court had intimated that proof could not be allowed on that state of facts, the parties further agreed that the value of the land was six thousand dollars, and that the sale was made by the bank "without any thought of the effect it might have upon the balance of their claim in bankruptcy." The question was then argued, whether the bank could prove for any sum, and what.

M. P. Knowlton, for Savings Bank.
G. Wells, for assignee.

LOWELL, District Judge. The practice of courts of bankruptcy, adopted in its substantial features by our statute (section 5075), requires a secured creditor, if he intends to prove for any excess of his debt above the value of the security, to have that value ascertained either by agreement with the assignees or under the direction of the court. In England the creditor may, in order to prove at the first meeting, put his own value on the security, but at the risk of accounting for all that he obtains above that value, with no corresponding right to have credit for any deficiency; which leads, I suppose, to a settlement with the assignees, in the first instance, in all doubtful cases.

The reason of the rule is well shown by this case. It is, that the assignee may take care that the property brings its full value. Here the sale produced exactly one-sixth of the admitted value; and it will not readily be believed that this result was not purposely brought about for the benefit of the mortgagees, and that they have not retained the actual control of the property, hoping for a large dividend besides.

The decisions follow the statute, and reject proof of any part of a debt when the creditor has failed to take the steps required by law. In re Herrick [Case No. 6,421]; McHenry v. La Société Française [95 U. S. 58]. Our statute is so explicit that decisions are not needed. In bankruptcy there is, in my opinion, some equitable latitude; and if a case should arise in which some forms had been neglected, through mistake of fact, and possibly under some circumstances under one of law, and complete justice could be done, I think the court might permit proof for the proper sum. Lee v. Franklin Savings Bank [Case No. 8,188]. But I do not look upon this as such a case. The parties have agreed that the bank had "no thought" of the effect of their action upon the proof; but this is not enough. They may have known that their action was irregular, though they did not consider the consequences. If they had been ignorant of the bankruptcy, or of the appointment of an assignee, they might well ask to have their mistake corrected. The agreement finds no such state of facts. They acted in a way that was not only irregular, but unfair between man and man, in not giving the assignee notice of the sale.

That the bank was a secured creditor in the sense of the statute, was not denied. It held the joint note of two persons, not alleged to be partners, and a mortgage upon land which the promissors held in common. There is no evidence that there was any relation of principal and surety between the debtors. If the petitioners claim to prove in full against the estate of one of those persons, they must, of course, give credit for the whole amount of the security, and if they restrict their proof to one-half of the debt, they must account for half the security. Richardson v. Wyman, 4 Gray, 553. It may be doubtful whether, in England, there could be proof at all against the estate of one joint debtor, while the other remained solvent. The general theory of administration there has been that the solvent debtor is to pay, and then make such proof as the whole equities will give him.

I do not doubt, however, that the practice here has been to admit full proof against one joint debtor, if the debt was unsecured, or the security was properly dealt with.

This debt was secured, and no sufficient equitable excuse has been given for the failure of the creditor to comply with the law in disposing of the security. Proof rejected.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1842.

BANKRUPTCY—DEBT NOT PROVED—DIVIDEND—RIGHT TO PARTICIPATE—DISTRIBUTION.

A creditor is not entitled to come in and participate in a dividend, where his debt has not been proved, until after the order for a distribution has been passed, and the day of making such dividend has been designated.

[In the matter of Edmund H. Miller, a bankrupt.]

In this case exceptions were taken to the report of the assignee classing the creditors, to whom dividends were allotted by him. The immediate point raised for his honor's decision was, whether creditors were entitled to come in and participate in a dividend, provided the debts were proved previous to the payment of the money out of the hands of the assignee, although not until after the dividend had been declared.

BETTS, District Judge. The proceedings necessary now to bring into view are that on the 20th of April the assignee filed his report that he was prepared to make a dividend out of the assets of the estate, which had been reduced to money, and thereupon moved the court to order notice to be given thereof, and to designate the newspaper in which it should be published, and the day the dividend should be made. An order was entered in conformity to the motion the same day, for all persons having objections to make to such distribution to present the same to the court on Tuesday, the third day of May. No objections were interposed. On the 6th of May, the assignee filed his further report that upon the certificate of the clerk to him, dated May 5th, of debts proved, a dividend could be declared upon that amount, and moved an order accordingly. On the same day, an order was entered on the docket that the assignee pay a dividend pro rata amongst the creditors who may have proved their debts prior to the 11th instant; and if exceptions are filed to the validity of any debt proved, and notice be served on him previous to said day, that he defer payment on such debt until the further order of the court; and if the exceptions are sustained by the court then, that the assignee divide the sum therein embraced rateably amongst the other parties, who have proved their debts as aforesaid. On the 11th of May the assignee filed a further report that of the debts proved against the bankrupt all except one were debts owing by the copartners Pine, Miller & Co., of which the bankrupt was one. That objections had been filed to the validity of one debt proved, which was in the course of litigation, and an order was moved and granted on the 17th that the assignee marshal the debts due by the bankrupt, first discharging his individual indebtedness, and then applying the balance of the assets rateably amongst partnership creditors. On the 2d of June, the assignee filed his further report, specifying the debts and their order, upon which a dividend was computed, and the rate of such dividend. To this report different creditors excepted, and for various causes; but the question now to be disposed of is that raised by the objections of two creditors who proved their debts, and filed the proof on the first day of June.

It is first to be noted, that by the stated practice the assignee estimates his dividends on debts certified by the clerk to have been proved, and the proofs to be on file, and that the clerk is to supply the certificate up to and including the day designated by the court as the one on which the dividend is to be declared. Is the dividend made to be limited to debts in proof at that time, or must the assignee receive, as a new basis of contemplation, all debts proved anterior to the disbursements of the money?

This question is to be considered in a double aspect. First, in regard to the statutory provision; and 2d, upon general principles, deducible from bankrupt and insolvent laws as administered in the United States and England. The authority and direction on the subject conveyed by the statute are contained in the 10th section, and have relation to four particulars. 1st. That a distribution of assets, reduced to money, shall be made amongst creditors who have proved their debts with all practicable and reasonable speed, to commence within six months of the decree of bankruptcy; that notice thereof shall be published at least ten days in a newspaper designated by the court before the order therefor is passed; and all proceedings in bankruptcy shall, if practicable, be completed within two years. A suit with a third party shall not delay a dividend, and creditors not having proved their debts until a dividend or distribution shall have been made and declared shall be entitled to the same pro rata out of subsequent dividends, so as to make all equal. Sections 5, 10. The court is, moreover, required as a preliminary step to order a collection and distribution of the assets at the earliest periods consistent with a due regard to the interests of creditors. Clearly, then, upon these provisions of the act, it is not necessary or proper to await the movement of creditors, in order to put the matter of distribution in action. The orders will be entered, and the notice given, whether debts have been proved or not, and it would seem to comport with the manifest purpose of the act that such order should be peremptory as to time, and, when fulfilled, that it would become absolute as to all creditors who had come in and proved debts, or who had failed to do so. The provision saving to creditors their equal shares out of subsequent dividends when the debts have not been proved, until a distribution shall have been made and declared, plainly denotes that the proof must be in alike before the dividend is declared as before its payment; and that intendment is corroborated by a preceding clause, directing notice to be given in a paper designated by the court ten days before the order is passed. Passing the order would seem, therefore, to be the period that fixed the rights of creditors in respect to that particular dividend. This construction of the act is the only one that can give bearing and consistency to the proceedings under this branch of the law. If additional debts may be brought into the computation after the day designated by the order, the assignee can never determine and report a pro rata which can be subjected to the review of the court, as it would be subject to incessant fluctuations and renewals; and what would render it still more inconvenient and unequal in practice would be that, even after he had paid dividends under the rate, to a part of the creditors, others might come in and arrest payments in progress to the residue, and, by presenting from day to day a new basis of distribution, dwindle down the pro rata first established, and place those creditors to whom it was declared on a scale constantly descending in its proportions.

The inconveniency of these proceedings would induce courts to uphold to the diligent creditor his advantages, if not taken away by the imperative provisions of the law; and in my judgment the act, instead of militating against the course adopted in this case, favors and supports it, for by allowing creditors to come in subsequently to a full proportion, when they did not prove their debts until after a distribution had been declared and made, the intention of congress is that the failure to prove in time excludes the creditor from antecedent dividends is inferrible by very strong implication. This is also in consonance with the interpretation now given the English acts. 1 Schoales & L. 242; 2 Brown, Ch. 50. Nor does the word "made" require the construction put upon it on the argument that the creditor is in time if he proves his debt before the assignee pays out the money. The more natural interpretation of the term as associated and applied would be to regard it equivalent to that of passing the decree or order, because the previous terms of the section indicate that the dividend must be made upon the order passed therefor. The question would be essentially different if the application had been upon adequate equities to postpone the dividend until other creditors could be prepared to participate in it. This power the court could no doubt exercise at least any time within the six months appointed by the statute. 17 Ves. 513. That application would place creditors upon a different footing in relation to each other, for it would afford opportunity to look into and object to the debts proposed to be brought in for a share of the dividend, or, if accompanied by evidence that the first dividend would exhaust the whole estate, would rest upon considerations of impressive equity. This motion is not based upon such equities, and though on the argument it is suggested that no ulterior assets are to be expected that consideration is only urged to induce the court to give a peremptory order admitting those debts to take under the distribution, and not as an incident calling for the interposition of the court to stay distribution for the benefit of all other creditors alike with these particular ones.

I am of opinion therefore that under a proper construction of the act a creditor is not entitled to have his debt brought in for a dividend if not proved until after the order for a distribution is passed and the day of making it designated. That order must be vacated or postponed or otherwise disposed of before any other creditors can come in to share in such dividend. The exception to the assignee's report in this behalf cannot therefore be maintained upon the true import and spirit of the act. The rules prevailing in analogous cases are of like bearing. The decree of distribution and dividend is regarded in England and this country as fixing the rights of creditors as they exist at the time such decree passes. Even assumpsit has been authorized on the part of the creditor to recover the amount of the assignee, and the assignee was not permitted to dispute the amount allotted. Brown v. Bullen, 1 Doug. 407. The case of Pratt v. Rathbun, 7 Paige, 270, 271, is strong to show that creditors will not be allowed to come in as of course, after the day for proving debts before a master has elapsed, so as to obtain an advantage in the distribution of an insolvent's estate, but that the day of proof is not held to with strictness so long as the proof can be received afterwards without injustice to other parties. In that case, although the creditors had gone into proof in due time before the master, and supposed their debt was properly established, the chancellor only allowed them to come in subsequently and supply accidental omissions or insufficiency, on terms essentially changing the position they might have held, had their debt been proved at the time designated. No excuse is presented in this case other in reality than that the matter was not probably regarded as worthy any attention; and the business of the court in these numerous proceedings in bankruptcy can never be conducted with system and despatch if parties are not held to observe the orders of the court passed in interlocutory stages of the case with all reasonable exactness. This being a case of bald laches, the party does not entitle himself to come in and prove his debt, and take a dividend under the order as it stands.

COURTS—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION—HIGH SEAS.

The great lakes are not "high seas" within the meaning of the act of July 29, 1850 [9 Stat. 441], punishing the burning of vessels.

[Cited in Ex parte Byers, 32 Fed. 406. Cited in dissenting opinion in U. S. v. Rodgers, 150 U. S. 280, 283, 14 Sup. Ct. 121, 122.]

Motion in arrest of judgment. The defendant [Henry Miller] was convicted of wilfully procuring the setting on fire of the passenger steamer Morning Star, plying between Detroit and Cleveland, on Lake Erie. The indictment was framed under the act of July 29, 1850 (section 7, 9 Stat. 441), punishing the offense when committed on the "high seas." The defendant's counsel moved the court that a rule be entered directing an arrest of judgment, for the reasons following, to wit: (1) Because the offense named in the indictment is charged to have been committed on the high seas, and this court has no jurisdiction over any part of the high seas. (2) Because the offense charged in the indictment, if committed on any part of Lake Erie, is not an indictable offense within any act of congress cognizable by this court. (3) It appears in evidence that if the offense charged in the indictment was committed at all, it was committed within the territorial boundaries of the state of Ohio, and hence the court had no jurisdiction, and erred in refusing to charge the jury, as requested by the defendant's counsel, that this court had no jurisdiction of the case.

G. V. N. Lothrop, for the motion.

Alfred Russell, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the Government.

WILKINS, District Judge. By the constitution congress may define and punish felonies committed upon the high seas. The motion in this case requires the court to determine the meaning of the words "high seas," as employed in the constitution and the penal acts passed thereunder. The 7th section of the act of July 29, 1850, under which this indictment is framed, provides that "every person not being an owner who shall on the high seas wilfully, with intent to destroy the same, set fire to any vessel," &c.

I regard it as settled that the high seas are the uninclosed waters of the ocean outside the projecting capes. Without going over the cases at length, I may refer to Wiltberger's Case, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76, and Bevans' Case, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336; U. S. v. Grush [Case No. 15,268]. The act of 1850, under consideration, is almost identical with the act of March 26, 1804, c. 40 [2 Stat. 290], and Judge Story, in U. S. v. Robinson [Case No. 16,176], gave a construction to that act, and decided that ship-burning on a bay in the island of Bermuda, land-locked and inclosed by reefs, was not committed on the "high seas" within the purview of the act. So Mr. Justice Nelson, in the late case of U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,731], also held in respect to this offense when committed on the East river. It should be observed that in most other acts touching offenses on the high seas, the words "or in any haven, creek, basin, bay or other waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," are added. And within this latter description the lakes would be included. But the act of 1845 [5 Stat. 726], itself extending the admiralty jurisdiction over the lakes, recognizes the distinction between the lakes and the high seas. The same jurisdiction is given by that act to the district courts in certain cases arising on the lakes, as in cases arising on the high seas.

It is true that, in Moore v. American Transp. Co., 24 How. [65 U. S.] 1, the supreme court declared that navigation upon Lake Erie was not inland navigation as contradistinguished from navigation upon the ocean, and used language classing the lakes with the ocean for certain commercial purposes; but the opinion in that case clearly points out the distinction between the lakes and the high seas.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry B. Brown, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

I agree with the court in Wilson's Case [supra], that it is within the constitutional competency of congress to define and punish this offense when committed upon other waters than the high seas; but congress has not done so; and in cases like this and the case of the Lake Erie pirate, Burley, the federal courts cannot act without an amendment of the act of 1845 extending the jurisdiction to crimes, as well as to torts and contracts concerning lake shipping between the states. Such an act would be beneficial on account of the difficulty of fixing the locality of such crime so as to give jurisdiction to any particular state court, and by reason of the accessibility and effective process of the federal courts. In this and other similar cases the offender will in all probability go unpunished in any state court.

The evidence in this case exhibited a state of facts truly frightful to contemplate, and it is with great regret I feel compelled by the decisions of the supreme court to grant the motion and direct the discharge of the prisoner for want of jurisdiction.

Circuit Court, D. Maine. March, 1872.

PATENTS—MAKING PAPER PULP—WOOD FIBER—INFRINGEMENT.

1. Letters patent for an "improvement in reducing wood to paper-pulp," reissued to A. Pagenstecher, assignee of Henry Voelter, June 6, 1871, which improvement consists in defibring the wood by acting upon a block by a grinding surface, which moves substantially across the fibers, and in the same plane with them, are valid.

2. Such invention is not anticipated by the French patent of Christian Voelter for grinding wood upon the ends of the fibers, or by the English patent of A. A. Brooman, for grinding wood by a stone moving diagonally across the fibers.

3. The novelty of the invention not having been disproved by the facts set up by the defense, and it appearing that there was an actual infringement, and that complainant had been in exclusive possession under the patent for a long time, with the acquiescence of the public: Held, that a provisional injunction should be granted.

[Bill in equity [by Warner Miller] to restrain alleged infringement of letters patent [No. 21,161] for an improvement in reducing wood to paper pulp, originally granted Henry Voelter, Aug. 10, 1858, antedated Aug. 29, 1856, extended for seven years; reissued June 6, 1871, [No. 4,418,] to A. Pagenstecher, and by him assigned to the complainant.] [2]

A. A. Strout and Causten Browne, for complainant.

W. H. Clifford and Chauncey Smith, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The defendants in this case are charged with an infringement of letters patent for a new and useful improvement in reducing wood to paper-pulp, for which letters patent were issued to Henry Voelter, assignor to Alberto Pagenstecher. The letters patent were originally issued to Henry Voelter, dated August 10, 1858, and antedated August 29, 1856; reissued April 6, 1869, to A. Pagenstecher, assignee; extended for seven years from August 29, 1870; reissued June 6, 1871, to Pagenstecher's assignee; reissue assigned to complainant June 8, 1871.

The Voelter patent is for an improvement in the art of reducing wood into pulp for use in paper, and also for certain improvements in machinery therefor. In the specification of the reissued patent, Henry Voelter states: "The art of reducing wood to pulp, by subjecting the same to the action of a revolving stone, is not a new one, machinery for grinding wood, while a current of water was applied to the stone, having been patented in France, by Christian Voelter, as early as 1847 (see vol. 10, second series, Brevets d'Invention); and in England, by A. A. Brooman, of London, in 1853 (see Repertory of Patented Inventions for May, 1854, p. 410).

"In all the processes known or used prior to my present invention, the wood has been acted upon by the stone in one of two ways, viz: either by causing the surface of the stone to act upon the ends of the fibers, the surface of the stone moving substantially in a plane perpendicular to the fibers of the wood; or, secondly, by acting upon the fibers in such a direction that they were severed diagonally, the surface of the stone moving diagonally across the fibers.

"The first plan, in fact, made powder of the wood. The pulp had no practical length, and, on trial, proved worthless, or nearly so. The second plan was carried out by the use of a stone revolving like an ordinary grindstone, the wood being applied upon the cylindrical surface thereof, with the fibers perpendicular, or nearly so, to planes passing through the axis of the stone and the point or locality where the grinding was performed; and this plan also failed because the fibers were cut off in lines diagonal to their own length, and were consequently too short to make good pulp. There were other difficulties attending the process, not necessary here to mention.

"Such was the state of the art prior to my invention; and my improvement in the art consists in grinding, or rather tearing out the fibers from the bundle of fibers which make up a piece of wood, by acting upon them by a grinding surface, which moves substantially across the fibers, and in the same plane with them."

The first claim in the reissued patent is for the improvement in the art herein described, which consists in tearing or grinding out fibers from blocks of wood, in the manner substantially as described, without cutting or severing the fibers either perpendicularly or diagonally to their length, as heretofore practiced in this art.

The third claim is for the combination of a grinding surface and cells or boxes for blocks of wood, so constructed and arranged with reference to the surface, that the fibers or blocks of wood placed therein lie in the plane, substantially, of the grinding surface, and across the line of motion of points in the grinding surface.

The fourth claim is for, in combination with a revolving grinding surface, blocks of wood so held thereon that their fibers are in the relation to the surface and to the motion of points thereon, substantially as described, so that, by the operation of the grinding surface upon the blocks, fibers will be separated from the same without being cut across.

It is clear that the defendants use the improvements and combinations described in the first, third, and fourth claims of the Henry Voelter patent.

The defense is placed substantially upon the ground that the Christian Voelter patent of 1847, referred to by Henry Voelter in his application in 1858, described the same mode of defibring the wood that the reissue describes and claims. Defendants contend further that the reissued patent, as interpreted by them, does not state otherwise.

After a careful examination of the specification in the last reissued patent, it appears to be evident that Henry Voelter, after referring to the inventions of Christian Voelter and A. A. Brooman as describing the state of the art prior to his invention, refers to these two patents, when he says, "In all the processes known or used prior to my present invention, the wood has been acted upon by the stone in two ways, viz: either by causing the surface of the stone to act upon the ends of the fibers, the surface of the stone moving substantially in a plane perpendicular to the fibers of the wood; or, secondly, by acting upon the fibers in such a direction that they were severed diagonally, the surface of the stone moving diagonally across the fibers. The first plan" (and herein I think he clearly refers to the invention of Christian Voelter) "in fact made powder of the wood. The pulp had no practical length, and on trial proved worthless, or nearly so." "The second plan" which Henry Voelter describes is an exact description of the plan of Brooman; and he goes on to state that this plan also failed because the fibers were cut off in lines diagonal to their own length, and were consequently too short to make good pulp.

Having thus described the state of the art prior to his invention, he describes his own improvement in the art to consist in grinding, or rather tearing out the fibers from the bundle of fibers which make up a piece of wood, by acting upon them by a grinding surface, which moves substantially across the fibers, and in the same plane with them.

This process of defibring the wood appears to the court to be clearly suggested, indicated, and claimed in the first application of Henry Voelter for a patent, as distinguished from the prior inventions of Christian Voelter and Brooman in those portions of the specification wherein he states that these prior patents are for the very same, or essentially the same invention, and that the principle and elements of his invention have nothing in common with any known or used machinery or apparatus for preparing and assorting wood-pulp, except the employment of a circular and rotating mill or grindstone as a reducing agent.

After further reference to the prior state of the art as developed in the patents of Christian Voelter and Brooman, he proceeds to state that a most important and decidedly novel feature is introduced in his invention, by constructing and arranging the reducing apparatus in such a manner as to admit, first, of a position of the block with its fibers parallel to the axis of the revolving stone. This position of the fibers of the wood in the plane, substantially of the grinding surface and across the line of motion of points in the grinding surface, is as clearly stated in his first application to be a most important and decidedly novel feature of his invention as it is in the third and fourth claims of the last reissued patent.

If the invention of Christian Voelter embraced the principles and elements of this invention so far as the position of the fibers of the wood in their relation to the plane of, and the line of motion of points in, the grinding surface is concerned, being the principle and elements which distinguish the process of defibring the wood from all prior processes which severed the fibers either perpendicularly or diagonally to their length, then there was a willful suggestio falsi in the original and all subsequent specifications of the Henry Voelter patent.

It can not for a moment be contended that Henry Voelter did not understand the invention of Christian Voelter so far as it related to this position of the fibers of the wood in their relation to the plane of, and the lines of motion of points in the grinding surface. If any such position of the fibers was contemplated in the invention of Christian Voelter, whereby they would be disintegrated and separated, instead of being ground off perpendicularly or cut off diagonally, then Henry Voelter, who was a brother and partner of Christian Voelter, and familiar with his process, must not only have known it, but knowing it, have willfully misstated it; and, in the same paper in which he misstated it, have referred to the evidence which would have proved his statement to be false, and his claim that his process of defibring the wood, as distinguished from grinding or cutting off the fibers, was an important and novel feature of his invention, to be groundless.

The very vague and meager description in the Christian Voelter patent, of the mode in which the wood is applied, would not alone afford any conclusive evidence as to the relative position of the fibers of the wood to the grinding surface. The only description in the patent relates to the position of the block itself in relation to the grinding surface, and contains in it no word necessarily descriptive of the relation of the fibers of the wood to the grinding surface. He says only: "Several bits or pieces of knotless timber, of a length equal to the thickness of the grindstone, are pressed against its external circumference." Defendants contend that the word "length" refers to the dimensions of the block in the line of the fibers of the wood, as distinguished from its true length. The word "length" is undoubtedly sometimes used in this sense. Upon this point it is sufficient to say that these words of description are so ambiguous that they might have been applicable, either to a block of wood, with its fibers substantially parallel to the plane of the grinding surface and perpendicular to the lines of motion of points in the grinding surface, or applicable to a block of wood with the fibers substantially perpendicular to the grinding surface. The word "length," it will be observed in this description, is used only for the purpose of showing that the dimensions of the block in one direction are to be equal to the thickness of the grindstone, for the purpose of utilizing the whole grinding surface. The description itself, therefore, being so ambiguous as not to enable us to determine by that alone the relation of the grinding surface to the fibers, we must look to the remainder of the description to see if we can ascertain from the description of the results of the action, what action was contemplated. Is there anything in the subsequent language of the patent, describing what follows from the action of the grinding surface upon the fibers of the wood, which indicates whether the fibers were disintegrated, as they would be if the block were placed with the fibers in one position, or ground or cut off as they would be if the fibers were placed in the other position, in relation to the grinding surface? In the one case there would be long fibers or bundles of fibers of unequal thickness; in the other, short fibers more or less nearly partaking of the character of dust or powder. He says in the subsequent portion of his specification, referring to the bits of wood before referred to: "These pieces are soon fretted away by the ruggedness of the grindstone, and reduced to a kind of pulp, which, falling into a water-bath situated at the inferior part, is transformed into a pulp or paste of a greater or lesser thinness, according to the intention. That pulp is mixed with a variable proportion of rags, to be thus used for the fabrication of paper." It is manifest from this that the relation of the grinding surface to the fibers of the wood was one which was intended to fret away the wood into a powder or dust, which, falling into a water-bath, would, without any previous screening, be transformed into a pulp or paste suitable to be mixed with rags, to be thus used for the fabrication of paper.

The language used, the process described, the results attained, are utterly irreconcilable with the idea of any such defibring of the wood as would take place if the fibers were disintegrated and separated in such a manner as to require subsequent screening and classification, and are entirely reconcilable with the construction that the fibers were to be ground or fretted away to a powder, which, falling into a water-bath, would be transformed into a paste or pulp ready for admixture, like china-clay, with rags for the use and manufacture of paper.

Aided by this description of the results of the action of the grinding surface upon the wood, we find no difficulty in the construction of the Christian Voelter patent, or in determining that the first sentence quoted from the patent contemplates such a relative position of the fiber to the grinding surface as would afford the result described in the sentence last quoted; that is, substantially, that the ends of the fiber were presented to the action of the grinding surface.

This is the construction which Henry Voelter puts upon the Christian Voelter patent. This is the construction which the patent office has four times put upon it.

Without, upon this motion for a preliminary injunction, stating more elaborately the other reasons which have influenced the mind of the court in coming to this conclusion, I have only to remark, in conclusion, that I entertain no doubt that this construction, so repeatedly given and so long acquiesced in, is clearly correct.

The complainant has for a long time been in exclusive possession under the Henry Voelter patent, with the acquiescence of the public therein, and there is no evidence of any interruption of the exclusive possession under this patent, tending in any way to weaken the presumption in favor of his title arising from this enjoyment and acquiescence. The novelty of the plaintiff's invention is not questioned except by the claim that it was anticipated by the patents to Brooman and Christian Voelter. These patents were referred to in the original application of Henry Voelter; the construction of these patents has four times been passed upon at the patent office, as not anticipating the claims in question in the Henry Voelter patent. The court entirely concurs in the construction thus given.

It is not perceived that any additional light upon the question of the interference with or anticipation of this patent by those set up in the answer could be afforded by any evidence likely to be taken before the final hearing in the cause. So far, therefore, as the question of the novelty of the invention is concerned, the question is as fully presented to the court as there is any reason to suppose it can be at the final hearing. Entertaining no doubt, upon the evidence now presented, of the novelty of the invention, the defendants' process being substantially identical with that claimed in the first, third, and fourth claims of the complainant's patent, it is clearly the duty of the court, under the circumstances, to give the plaintiff the benefit of that presumption of title which the patent affords, and which, in this case, it especially affords him, as against any adverse right set up under patents referred to by him in his original application, and so frequently decided by the patent office not to interfere with the originality of the inventions claimed by him.

Case No. 9,560.

MILLER v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.

[1 Cin. Law Bul. 276.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1876.

PRACTICE AT LAW—NONSUIT—DEMURRER TO EVIDENCE — MASTER AND SERVANT — FELLOW SERVANTS—AMOUNT OF RECOVERY.

1. The circuit courts of the United States have no power to grant a peremptory nonsuit against the will of the plaintiff.

2. Upon a demurrer to evidence, every fact which can be reasonably inferred from the evidence is taken as admitted, and a demurrer is allowed in no case where there are facts and circumstances which tend to establish the issues.

3. As a general rule the master is not liable to his servant for injuries accruing to him from the negligence of a fellow servant engaged in a common employment. And all agents and employés who are engaged in the general business of operating a railroad are fellow servants.

4. The master, however, is bound to use ordinary care to employ and retain in his service competent servants.

5. If, therefore, injury should result to a brakeman upon a railroad from the negligence of an incompetent conductor, engineer, or brakeman, in whose employment the railroad did not use ordinary care, it would be liable.

6. In such case the plaintiff would be entitled to compensatory damages only, unless such injury was "the result of willful misconduct, or of that reckless indifference to the rights of the plaintiff which is equivalent to an intentional violation of them."

At law.

C. Atherton and Follett & Cochran, for plaintiff.

C. H. Kibler and Hoadly, Johnson & Colston, for defendant.

SWING, District Judge. The action was originally brought in the court of common pleas of Licking county, Ohio, by the plaintiff, Lewis E. Miller, against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, to recover damages sustained by him, while acting as brakeman, by being caught between two freight cars, while attempting to couple them, standing on a siding of the defendant's railroad at Thornport, Ohio. The plaintiff alleged that he was the hind brakeman of a train coming north on said railroad on September 2, 1872. That he was the inferior servant of the conductor and engineer of said train, and subject to their orders, and that under their employment the said conductor and engineer were his superior officers. That the forward brakeman on said train was without experience in the duties of his business, and inefficient, and that defendant knew it at and before that time. That the plaintiff was ordered by the conductor of said train to couple said cars, and the engineer detached the engine from his train, and attempted to couple the same to the first car on the siding. That by reason of the inefficiency of the front brakeman that duty devolved upon the fireman. That the plaintiff made the proper signal to the engineer not to come back with the first car against the second. That the plaintiff, in pursuance of his general orders, had procured a crooked link to connect the two freight cars, and went between them to adjust the same preparatory to the coupling of the cars, and that the engineer, not obeying his signal, and having, through the inefficiency of the front brakeman, failed to make the coupling between the locomotive and the front car, again thrust the locomotive against the front car, precipitated that against the second car, while plaintiff was adjusting the crooked link, thereby catching the body of plaintiff between the bumpers of the cars, and very seriously injuring him.

Plaintiff based his right of recovery on two grounds: 1st. That the injury resulted from the carelessness of a superior agent, to whose orders and control he was subject. 2d. Also, that the injury was attributable to the inefficiency of the forward brakeman, and the company was culpable in his selection and retention. On the part of the plaintiff, it was contended that the law of the case should conform to the rule declared in the case of Little Miami R. Co. v. Stevens, 20 Ohio, 415, and followed by a line of decisions in Ohio, declaring the corporation liable to an inferior servant for the carelessness and negligence of a superior servant placed in authority and control over the inferior one. On the part of the defendant, it was argued that the rule in Ohio was anomalous, and contrary to the weight of authority in England, and the most of the states of the Union, and should not be declared to be law by the federal courts.

The case being tried by a jury, and evidence having been given by plaintiff to sustain the issues on his part, the plaintiff rested his case, and the defendant then moved the court to order a non-suit on the ground that the evidence in law was not sufficient to maintain the action.

BY THE COURT. Under the law of Ohio, the court, in a proper case, might either grant a non-suit, or arrest the testimony from the jury and direct a verdict for defendant, and, if we are to be governed by the law of Ohio, we should proceed to the examination of the merits of the motion. It is claimed that section 5 of the act of congress passed June 1, 1872 [17 Stat. 197], which provides "that the practice, pleadings, forms and modes of proceeding in other than equity and admiralty causes in the circuit and district courts, shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the state, within which such circuit or district courts are held," would require us, in the disposition of this motion, to conform to the state practice. In our administration of the law, since the passage of that act, we have held that its provisions were not applicable to and did not control the judge in his trial of the cause; that in this he was governed by the common law and the decisions of the supreme court of the United States; and in this we are fully sustained by the recent decision of the supreme court of the United States in Nudd v. Burrows [91 U. S.] 426. Such being the rule by which we should be governed, we find it to be a well-settled rule "that the circuit courts of the United States have no power to grant a peremptory nonsuit against the will of the plaintiff." Elmore v. Grymes, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 469; De Wolf v. Rabaud, Id. 497; Crane v. Norris, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 598; Silsby v. Foote, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 218; Castle v. Bullard, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 172; Boucicault v. Fox [Case No. 1,691]; Schuchardt v. Allens, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 359. The motion will therefore be overruled.

After the overruling of the demurrer, counsel for defendant suggested to the court that the same object might be obtained by filing either a motion to arrest the testimony from the jury, or a demurrer to the evidence; but, it being suggested by the court that a motion to arrest the testimony from the jury was substantially a motion for nonsuit, the defendant thereupon demurred to the evidence.

BY THE COURT. In the case of Young v. Black, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 565, Justice Story says: "A demurrer to evidence is an unusual proceeding, and is allowed or denied by the court, in the exercise of a sound discretion, under all the circumstances of the case." And again the same learned justice, in the case of Towle v. Common Council of Alexandria, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 320, says: "It is no part of the object of such proceeding (demurrer) to bring before the court an investigation of the facts in dispute, or to weigh the force of testimony, or the presumption arising from the evidence. That is the proper province of the jury." Again: "If, therefore, there is parol evidence in the case which is loose and indeterminate, and may be applied with more or less effect to the jury, or of the evidence of circumstances, which is meant to operate beyond the proof of the existence of those circumstances, and to conduce to the proof of other facts, the party demurring must admit the facts of which the evidence is so loose and indeterminate and circumstantial, before the court will compel the other party to join therein." And in the case of Reed v. Evans, 17 Ohio, 128, the same rule is declared. See, also, U. S. Bank v. Smith, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 172; Suydam v. Williamson, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 427. Applying the doctrine thus laid down to the evidence in this case, the demurrer must be overruled.

The defendant then proceeded to introduce testimony, and at the conclusion of the arguments of counsel THE COURT instructed the jury as follows:

It is claimed by the plaintiff that he was acting as brakeman, under the orders of his superiors, the conductor and engineer, when the accident from which the injury resulted occurred. It is also claimed that the accident resulted from the incompetency of servants in the employ of the defendant. The general doctrine "that a principal is not liable to one servant in his employ for injuries resulting from the carelessness of another servant, when both are engaged in a common service," may be said to be an admitted rule of law. The Ohio courts have engrafted upon this general rule the qualification that, if the servant was acting under the orders of a servant of superior grade, the principal is liable for injuries resulting from the negligence of such superior (Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Keary, 3 Ohio St. 201), and such is believed to be the doctrine of the courts of Kentucky. But, so far as we have been able to examine the doctrine of the courts of the other states of the Union, they admit of no such exception. The question has not been passed upon by the supreme court of the United States, although it was suggested in the case of Union Packet Co. v. McCue, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 508, and Union Pac. R. R. v. Fort, Id. 508. The circuit courts of the United States, so far as we are advised, have followed the general rule. Haugh v. Texas & Pac. Ry. Co. [Case No. 6,221]; Dillon v. Union P. R. Co. [Id. 3,916]. The question not involving the construction of any statute of the state, but being one of general jurisprudence, we are not bound to follow the state decisions upon the question. Pine Grove Tp. v. Talcott, 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 677.

We entertain a very high regard for the decisions of the supreme court of Ohio, and would be satisfied if the rule of law were in accordance with their decisions; but the weight of authority against it requires us, we think, to adopt the general rule that the defendant is not liable to the plaintiff in this cause if the injury complained of was caused by the negligence of either the conductor, engineer, or brakeman; they were all his fellow servants. Whart. Neg. 222; Redf. R. R., 229; and the very careful and extended collection of the authorities by Judge Dillon in the case of Dillon v. Union Pac. Railroad [supra].

Under the second branch of the plaintiff's claim there can be no doubt the defendant was bound to use ordinary and reasonable care and diligence in the selection of their employés, and to furnish suitable structure and machinery. And if the evidence shows you, in this case, that the defendant negligently employed an unskilled and incompetent conductor, engineer, or brakeman, and the injury accrued to the plaintiff by reason of the negligence of conductor, engineer, or brakeman, the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict, unless the plaintiff was fully advised of such incompetency, and remained in the service of the defendant after being so advised. See authorities supra.

If you should find for the plaintiff, you will give him such sum as will compensate him for the injury sustained. And this will embrace the loss of property destroyed, expenses incurred, loss of time, pain and suffering and permanent injuries resulting to him from the accident; but you cannot give exemplary damages, unless you find that the injury was done willfully, or was the result of a reckless indifference to the rights of the plaintiff, or that entire want of care which would raise the presumption of a conscious indifference to consequences. Milwaukee, etc., R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—INJURY TO EMPLOYE—FELLOW SERVANT.

At law.

Homer Goodwin, for plaintiff.

E. J. Estep and Judge Dickey, for defendant.

Before BAXTER, Circuit Judge, and WELKER, District Judge.

BAXTER, Circuit Judge. We have had this case under consideration, and have addressed our inquiries mainly to the principal point in the case. The plaintiff sets forth that he was an employé on the road of the defendant, serving under and subject to the orders of the engineer, and through the negligence of the engineer he was injured. Upon this question it is supposed that there is a difference in the law as administered by this court and the courts of this state; and it is argued that the federal courts, upon this question, are not bound by the adjudications of the supreme court of Ohio. We have not considered that question, nor have we reached any conclusion with reference to the order being suddenly made, an order directing the performance of a hazardous duty; nor have we considered the question attempted to be made as to the imperfect or defective machinery. We think the opinion in the case of Cleveland, C. & C. R. Co. v. Keary, 3 Ohio St. 201, is the ablest, clearest, and most satisfactory discussion of this principle that is to be found in the books anywhere; and we have determined to adopt and adhere to the principles announced in that opinion, as the rule which will govern this court in all future cases involving similar questions. With the principles anuounced in that case counsel are supposed to be familiar, and it is not necessary to repeat them here. It is sufficient to say that this court, in the administration of the law upon questions of this kind, will stand squarely upon the principles announced by Judge Ranney in that case. The demurrer will, therefore, be overruled.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Jan. 18, 1876.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—TOWN BONDS IN AID OF—CONDITIONS OF ISSUE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—OFFICERS—SPECIAL POWERS.

1. A statute of New York which authorized a town to loan its credit in aid of a railroad corporation, by issuing its bonds, prohibited the making of the loan except on the condition that the written consent of a majority of the taxpayers, representing a majority of the taxable property of the town, should first be duly acknowledged and recorded, together with a copy of the assessment roll of the town, in the office of the county clerk, and it made such record evidence, in any court, of the facts therein recited. The requisite number of consents were not obtained, and no consents were recorded in the clerk's office. Coupon bonds were, nevertheless, issued by commissioners specially charged by the statute with that duty, and the bonds recited that they were issued pursuant to law. In a suit against the town, to recover the amount of unpaid coupons, which, with the bonds with which they were issued, were purchased by the plaintiff's assignor, in good faith, before such coupons matured: Held, that the plaintiff need not prove that the bonds were issued in compliance

2. The right to recover could not be defeated by proof that such conditions and limitations were not complied with.

[Cited in Smith v. Yates, Case No. 13,131.]

3. When a municipal corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, a bona fide holder of them has a right to presume that they were issued under the circumstances which gave the requisite authority.

4. A bona fide purchaser of such bonds is not bound to look further, when they, on their face, import a compliance with the law under which they were issued.

[Cited in Foote v. Hancock, Case No. 4,911.]

5. There is no distinction, in this respect, between bonds issued by officers of the municipality having general powers to represent it in its fiscal transactions, and bonds issued by officers acting under a special power in the particular transaction.

[This was a suit by John Miller against the town of Berlin.]

Newcomb & Bailey, for plaintiff.

R. A. & F. J. Parmenter, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. The bonds to which the coupons in suit were originally annexed were issued in flagrant disregard of the rights of the defendant, by the commissioners who were specially charged with the protection of those rights. The act which permitted the town of Berlin to loan its credit in aid of the Lebanon Springs Railroad Company was framed with great care, to prevent the very contingency which has taken place. It was therein provided that it should be lawful for the commissioners to borrow, on the faith and credit of the town, such sum of money as a majority of the taxpayers representing a majority of the taxable property of the town should fix in writing, and it prohibited the exercise of this power except upon the condition that such consent should first be duly acknowledged and recorded, together with a copy of the assessment roll of the town, in the office of the clerk of the county, and it made this record evidence, in any court, of the facts therein recited. These provisions clearly indicate the intent of the statute, that the power to pledge the faith of the municipality should not be executed by the commissioners until, as a precedent condition, the consents of the requisite number of taxpayers had been obtained, and the evidence thereof perpetuated, so that any person interested could ascertain, and prove or disprove, the existence of the condition, in any court of justice. The existence or non-existence of the condition could be determined by a simple mathematical calculation, and the duty of the commissioners to issue, or to refuse to issue, the bonds was made as patent to the world as to the commissioners themselves. These provisions would seem to exclude any implication that the commissioners were to be the sole judges whether or not the facts existed upon which their authority was made to depend. It is conceded, that the requisite number of consents were not obtained, and no consents were recorded in the clerk's office. The inspection of the records of the clerk's office, by the person to whom the bonds were offered for sale, would have shown that the commissioners were attempting to bind the municipality in utter defiance of the conditions upon which they were to exercise their authority. If the liability of a municipal corporation upon bonds issued by its officers is to be tested by the ordinary rules of law applicable to a negotiable paper executed by an agent, it would not require argument to show that the defendant is not liable upon the bonds in question. The bonds, having been issued by agents acting under a special power, would not be the obligations of the corporation, unless they were issued within the limitations and conditions imposed upon the exercise of the power, and it would devolve upon a purchaser to ascertain whether or not the agents were acting within the terms of their authority. A purchaser of negotiable paper which purports to be executed by an agent, cannot recover without proof that the person who assumes to be the agent, is, in fact, the agent of the principal, or has been held out by the principal as an agent. Where, as in this case, the authority of the agent is to be found in an act of the legislature, those who deal with the agent are bound to know the extent and nature of the authority; and where the existence of facts which limit or control the scope of the authority are as much within the means of knowledge of third persons as within that of the agent, it is incumbent upon all who deal with the agent to ascertain whether the facts exist; and the representation of the agent, in such case, will not estop the principal.

But, the adjudications of the supreme court of the United States have invested municipal bonds, issued by the officers of the municipality, with anomalous and peculiar immunities, and it is now too late to apply the ordinary doctrines of the law of commercial paper as the test of the rights and liabilities of the parties to such instruments. Bissell v. Jeffersonville, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 287; Moran v. Miami Co., 2 Black [67 U. S.] 722; Woods v. Lawrence Co., 1 Black [66 U. S.] 386; Mercer Co. v. Hacket, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 83; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, Id. 175; Meyer v. Muscatine, Id. 384; Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 282; Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 355; St. Joseph v. Rogers, 16 Wall. [83 U. S.] 644. These adjudications establish two propositions, which must control this case. The first of the propositions applicable here may be stated in the language of Mr. Justice Swayne (1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 203): "When a corporation has power, under any circumstances, to issue negotiable securities, the bona fide holder has a right to presume they were issued under the circumstances which give the requisite authority." This language is reiterated by Mr. Justice Clifford, in Lexington v. Butler, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 296. The second of these propositions applicable here is that which determines what constitutes a purchaser of such bonds a bona fide holder, and may be stated in the language of Mr. Justice Grier (Mercer Co. v. Hacket, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 93), as follows: "We have decided, that, where the bonds, on their face, import a compliance with the law under which they were issued, the purchaser is not bound to look further." Both of these propositions were enunciated in cases where the bonds had been issued by officers of the municipality having general power to represent it in its fiscal transactions, and might not necessarily be applicable where the bonds were issued by officers acting under a special power in the particular transaction. But, when it is remembered that the general doctrine has always been, that a municipal corporation is the creature of the law which creates it, and can make no contracts and do no acts except such as are permitted by its charter, and that its contracts must be executed, and its acts done, by such officers, and substantially in such manner as the charter prescribes, it will be seen that all distinctions between the contracts and acts of officers of general authority, and those having only special powers, are immaterial. If a purchaser of negotiable paper executed by the officers of a municipal corporation is under no obligation to ascertain whether the officers are authorized to execute the paper in behalf of the corporation, it becomes entirely immaterial to ascertain whether they are acting under general or special powers. It is unnecessary to cite the various cases which sustain the foregoing propositions. It suffices to say, that they constitute an unbroken line of decisions, commencing with the case of Knox Co. v. Aspinwall, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 539, and continuing to the latest expositions of the supreme court upon the subject. In many of the cases the statute under which the bonds were issued was construed to authorize the officers who issued them to determine whether there had been a compliance with the antecedent conditions prescribed before the power should be exercised. In these cases, it was clearly unnecessary to determine any other question, because, if the officers were to judge for themselves when the exercise of their authority was warranted by the facts, that determination could not be questioned collaterally, and, after the bonds were issued, would be conclusive evidence of the authority of the officers to bind the municipality, and any purchaser of the bonds could recover upon them, whether he was a bona fide holder or not, unless fraud or malfeasance on the part of the officers could be shown. As the propositions mentioned have been advanced uniformly in every case arising upon municipal bonds, they cannot be treated as obiter; and, certainly, they cannot be limited in their application to cases where it was unnecessary to apply them at all. It must follow, as a necessary deduction from the two propositions mentioned, that a purchaser of municipal bonds issued by the proper officers of a corporation which, by law, is permitted to lend its aid to a railroad, is entitled to recover when the bonds recite that they are issued pursuant to law, without proving that they were issued in compliance with the conditions and limitations imposed by law upon the transaction. If he is not required to look beyond the recitals when he purchases the bonds, he cannot be required, upon the trial, to produce any evidence of the truth of the recitals. If these justify his purchase, he cannot be defeated if they are disproved upon the trial, for, as against a bona fide purchaser of a negotiable security, no defences are known to the law, except that the defendant never made the instrument, or that it is void by positive statute. From these views it follows, that, inasmuch as authority had been conferred by law upon the defendant to issue its bonds in aid of the railroad, and the commissioners were its officers for the express purpose of consummating this end, the plaintiff must recover, if he is an innocent holder of the bonds. That he is an innocent holder seems clear. It appears, that the bonds, with the coupons now in suit, were purchased before their maturity, by the German Savings Bank, in April, 1871. It does not appear whether or not any of the coupons past due were annexed to the bonds at the time of this purchase. If the past due coupons were purchased at the same time with those in suit, by the bank, I think its title as a bona fide purchaser of those thereafter to become due would not be invalidated by such fact. Each coupon, when severed from the bond, is a distinct obligation, and an independent instrument. Coupons are annexed to bonds in order that they may be severed and transferred by delivery, and thereby carry to the purchaser the interest which they represent. It is not necessary that the purchaser should produce upon the trial the bond to which the coupon was originally annexed, and the surrender or cancellation of the bond after the coupon has been transferred will not defeat the action. They possess all the attributes of commercial paper. Thomson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 327; Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall. [74 U. S] 105; Clark v. Iowa City, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 589. When the bank purchased these coupons, before they were due, and without notice of any defence to them, it became, prima facie, a bona fide holder of them, and the onus rests upon the defendant to show the existence of any other facts which deprive it of that character; and if, therefore, the purchase of overdue coupons at the same time would deprive it of that character, it was for the defendant to show the fact that such a purchase was made. If the bank was a bona fide purchaser, the plaintiff, who purchased of the bank, acquired all its rights.

These considerations lead to a denial of the motion for a new trial.

Case No. 9,563.

MILLER et al. v. BRIDGEPORT BRASS CO.

[14 Blatchf. 282; 3 Ban. & A. 20; 12 O. G. 667.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. Aug. 11, 1877.[2]

PATENTS—LAMPS—REISSUE—CLAIM—SECOND CLAIM—VALIDITY.

1. The second claim of the reissued letters patent granted to E. Miller & Co., as assignees of Joshua E. Ambrose, January 11th, 1876, for an "improvement in lamps," (the original patent having been granted October 16th, 1860, and reissued May 20, 1873, and, as so reissued, extended for 7 years from October 16th, 1874,) namely, "The combination, in a lamp burner, of the following elements: first, a deflector; second, a perforated air distributor, which, with the deflector, forms the combustion chamber; third, a wick tube, extending from the fount to the combustion chamber; fourth, a tube or passage to conduct the gas from the fount to said combustion chamber, substantially as described," is for a different invention from any which was described and claimed in the original patent, and is invalid.

2. The combination contained in said second claim contains a lesser number of ingredients than the combination which composed the original invention, and the specification of the original patent did not suggest that a lamp containing the modified combination of the second claim of the reissued patent was feasible and within the scope of the invention, and, therefore, under the rule laid down in Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 1, said second claim is void.

[This was a bill by Edward Miller & Co. against the Bridgeport Brass Company to restrain the alleged infringement of letters patent No. 30,381, granted to J. E. Ambrose October 16, 1860, and reissued, No. 6,844, January 11, 1876.]

John S. Beach, for plaintiffs.

Charles R. Ingersoll, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity to restrain the alleged infringement, by the defendants, of reissued letters patent, which were issued on January 11th, 1876, to the plaintiffs, as assignees of Joshua E. Ambrose, for an "improvement in lamps." The original Ambrose patent was dated October 16th, 1860, and was reissued May 20th, 1873, and the patent, as reissued, was extended for seven years from October 16th, 1874. The principal defences are, that the reissue is not for the same invention which was described and claimed in the original patent, and that the patent is void for want of novelty.

In the original patent, the patentee declared the object of his invention to be, to obtain a lamp which will burn, without a chimney, and without danger of explosion, those hydrocarbons which are volatile, and contain an excess of carbon, and stated that "the invention consists in the employment or use of a perforated cap, vapor tube, heaters and deflecting plate, arranged," as described, and in a wick-adjusting mechanism, which last-named element is immaterial in this case.

In the specification, the invention was, in substance, described to be the upper part of the body of a lamp, which received at its upper end a cap, C. This cap was of cylindrical form, and might be constructed of perforated sheet iron, the upper end having a perforated plate, c, fitted in it. The wick tube was within the cap or perforated cylinder. Adjoining the wick tube was a tube, F, the lower end of which communicated with the interior of the body of the lamp, the upper end of said tube being covered by the perforated plate, c. On the upper end of the cap, C, was placed a copper, dome-shaped heater, G, slotted at its upper end. A longitudinal bar in the centre of the slot divided it into two parts. The specification proceeded: "The wick tube, E, extends some distance above the perforated plate, c, and, on its upper end, a collar, p, is fitted, said collar having plates, q, projecting from it, slightly inclined from a horizontal plane. Between the inner ends of the plates, q, and the collar, p, there are openings, r. On the outer side of the heater, G, there are vertical ribs, s, at the lower ends of which there are projections, t. These projections, t, serve as bearings for a heater, H, which is similar to G, in form. The ribs and projections, t, admit of a space, u, being between the two heaters, and the upper end of the heater, H, is slotted, as shown at v, and has a plate, w, extending upward for each end of it, and inclined at an angle of about 45°. The tube, F, admits of all vapor generated in the body, A, of the lamp, escaping up into the heater, G, and to the flame, the perforated plate, c, preventing the ignition of the vapor below the orifice of the tube. The plates, q, of the collar, p, and the openings, r, cause a draught to ascend directly upward to the flame, and air is also deflected directly against the inner sides of the heater, G, and becomes intensely heated, so as to supply the flame with warm oxygen. The bar, o, in the slot, n, of heater, G, serves to divide the flame, and prevents it from ascending up through the slot, n, before the carbon is consumed. Between the two heaters, G, H, oxygen passes and becomes highly rarified, and unites with the carbon in the flame, insuring perfect combustion. The plates, w, at the ends of the slot, v, of heater, H, serve to spread the flame and diminish its height, thereby keeping the flame at the point where the heat is most intense. The flame at the slot, n, in heater, G, is merely a gas-generating flame, the illuminating flame having its base at the slot, v, of heater H. By this arrangement the flame is supplied with sufficient oxygen, without a chimney, to support proper combustion and produce a brilliant illuminating flame, and the vapor which passes up through tube, F, is consumed without danger of being ignited below the orifice of said tube." The patentee, after stating that he was aware that dome-shaped heaters had been previously used, and, also, that perforated caps had been used in connection with said heaters, and disclaiming said parts when separately considered, claimed as his invention, "1st, the arrangement of the heaters, G, H, with a space between them communicating directly with the external air, in connection with the collar, p, and plates, q, q, fitted on the top of the wick tube, E, and the perforated cap, C, substantially as and for the purpose set forth; 2d, in combination with the parts aforesaid, the vapor tube, F, placed within the cap, C, and adjoining or contiguous to the wick tube, as and for the purpose specified."

[Drawing of Patent No. 30,381, granted October 16, 1860, to J. E. Ambrose, published from the records of the United States patent office.]

This lamp was not a success, as a lamp which would burn without a chimney, and did not go into general use, but it contained valuable features. The tube, F, conducted the gas from the fount to a point near the end of the wick tube, so that the gas was conveyed to the flame and was consumed, and thus the danger of explosion was materially diminished. In addition, the upper part of the perforated cap, C, was a minutely perforated plate, or disk which extended transversely over the entire top of the cap, below the flame, (forming the floor of what is styled, in the reissued patent, the combustion chamber,) and prevented the return of lighted gas to the lamp fount below, or the ignition of gas within the cap, C, upon the principle of Sir Humphrey Davy's safety lamp. Thus, the combination of the tube and the perforated plate prevented danger of explosion. The perforated plate also performed the office of a distributer of air into the space where the wick was lighted and to the flame.

Lamps having these characteristics, in connection with the other well known parts of volatile oil lamps—a wick tube, a dome-shaped chamber, which serves to direct the air to the flame, and is generally called a deflector, and a chimney, were subsequently manufactured by the owners of the patent, and went into general use. The patent was reissued for the second time, in 1876. The specification of the reissue declares that the invention consists, secondly, "in combining, in a lamp burner, a deflector, a perforated air distributer, with the deflector, forming the combustion chamber, a wick tube extending from the fount to the combustion chamber, an adjusting device to regulate the elevation of the wick, and a tube to conduct the gas from the fount to the chamber above the air distributer." The descriptive portion of the reissued specification does not substantially differ from the language of the descriptive portion of the original specification. In the new specification prominence is given to the perforated plate c, which is called "a perforated air distributer, which, with the deflector, forms the combustion chamber." The second claim, which is the only one which is alleged to have been infringed, is as follows: "2. The combination, in a lamp-burner of the following elements: first, a deflector; second, a perforated air distributer, which, with the deflector, forms the combustion chamber; third, a wick tube, extending from the fount to the combustion chamber; fourth, a tube, or passage, to conduct the gas from the fount to said combustion chamber, substantially as described."

The lamps made by both plaintiffs and defendants contain the heater, G, without the ribs or projections or longitudinal bar; in other words, an ordinary deflector, the perforated plate, the vapor tube, and a wick tube; and are in great demand by the public. The utility of the lamp consists in its safety. A tube which conducted the vapor from the fount to the flame was used, in its simplest form, in the lamp of William Pratt, patented in 1857. In this lamp the flame was not to be protected from the external air. The wick tubes were the long diverging tubes now in common use.

Air distributers had long been known in lamps of the Ambrose class, but I am of the opinion that the minutely perforated transverse plate, c, extending across the lower part of the chamber below the flame, thus forming a perforated floor, and performing the double office of preventing the lighted gas from communicating with the gas in the lamp fount, and also of distributing air to the combustion chamber, had not been anticipated in the defendants' exhibits. But it is not necessary to determine whether either the tube or the air distributer was novel in itself, as the combination only is claimed, and I am satisfied that the combination of the vapor tube to conduct the gas from the fount to the combustion chamber, and the perforated plate constructed as in the Ambrose patent, and performing its double office, with a wick tube, and with either the heater or deflector of Ambrose, or the ordinary deflector, was unknown prior to the date of the patent.

The important question in the case is, whether the lamp which is described and claimed in the second claim of the reissue, is the same invention which was described and claimed in the specification of the original patent. The principles upon which the decision of this question rests, are stated in Gill v. Wells, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 1, and in Stevens v. Pritchard [Case No. 13,407]. In the former case, the court, after declaring the rule to be, that, where a patentee who has invented a new and useful combination of several ingredients, also claims to have invented new and useful combinations of fewer numbers of the ingredients, the inventor is entitled to a patent for the several combinations, and may give a description of the several combinations in one specification, and may secure the benefit of each of the inventions by separate claims, and that if, by inadvertence, he should fail to claim one of the described combinations, may surrender the original patent and obtain a reissue for any combinations which were omitted in the claims of the original patent, proceed to say: "Very different rules, however, apply in a case where the only invention described in the original patent is the one which includes all the ingredients of the machine, provided there is no suggestion, indication or intimation that any other invention, of any kind, has been made. Such a patentee as the one last mentioned may subsequently discover that he can accomplish a new and useful result by a combination embracing less than the whole number of the ingredients included in the prior patented combination, but he cannot secure the right and privilege of a patentee in the combination of the smaller number of the ingredients, by a surrender of his first patent and a reissue of the same, which shall include the second combination as well as the first, because, the reissued patent, in that event, would not be for the same invention as the surrendered original."

The original patent states the object of the invention to be a lamp which would burn without a chimney, and the entire mechanism is directed to accomplish that object. It consisted, generally, of a wick tube, with collar and plates, perforated cap for the conveyance of air, the vapor tube, and two peculiarly constructed heaters, the lower one G, provided with ribs and projections, which served as bearings upon which the upper heater, H, was placed. The two heaters are related to each other, and the entire arrangement of the two, with their various parts, is particularly described, in the specification, to be designed to supply the flame with sufficient oxygen to support proper combustion without a chimney. The invention, so far as the heaters were concerned, consisted in their joint use. The lamp of the second reissued claim is without the complex arrangement of heaters. It contains one deflector, and is the ordinary lamp, with a chimney, for burning volatile hydrocarbons, plus the vapor tube and the perforated plate.

The specification of the original patent suggested no invention save the one contained in the entire combination. A combination of the vapor tube and the perforated plate, either with one heater, or with the other well known ingredients of a lamp, was not indicated as a distinct part of the invention. The second claim of the reissued patent describes an article materially different from the article which was originally patented. The claim contains a combination of a lesser number of ingredients than the combination which composed the original invention. One of the heaters, and all of the caps except the perforated plate, have disappeared. The deflector of this claim is not the heater, G, of the original specification, because no single deflector was therein described, except in its relation to, and as connected with, the upper heater. The two heaters are described as to be used together, and as necessarily related to each other. The whole scope and object of the invention was to produce a lamp by the combined use of the two heaters.

Had the patentee, in his original specification, suggested that a lamp containing the modified combination of the second claim of the reissue was feasible and within the scope of his invention, or that the combination of the vapor tube and the air distributer with the other well known parts of a lamp, would accomplish a beneficial result, the claim of the reissue would not have been in violation of the rule of law which has been quoted. But, upon the face of the two patents, I am of opinion that the claim of the reissued patent is for a different invention from any combination which is indicated or suggested in the original specification as capable of embodiment, so as to compose either an organized structure, or a distinct part of an organized structure.

Case No. 9,564.

MILLER v. BROOKLYN LIFE INS. CO.

[2 Bigelow, Ins. Rep. 35.]

Circuit Court, D. Maryland. 1868.[1]

INSURANCE—LIFE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS—WAIVER—AUTHORITY TO WAIVE.

1. Acknowledgment of receipt of premium does not estop the company from denying the payment as between the company and the party for whose benefit the policy is executed.

2. Where, in response to an application for insurance, the general agents of the company, without receiving any cash payments, write the insured, inclosing the policy, and saying, "We give you your policy," and inclose blank notes for a portion of the premium, prescribing how they shall be filled out and sent, and, as to the balance,—to be paid in cash, but receipted by them,—say they will call for it at the proper time, this is a waiver of payment, and renders the company liable to pay the insurance, though the insured die without paying the notes or the cash balance. And this is especially so when the cash part, which was to be paid by a third person, is not paid by him upon demand, and the agents then write the insured, "We now depend upon you for it," and subsequently write again, no payment having been made, "We are fearful you will lose your policy if payment is not made soon."

3. Where, in the margin of a life policy, there is a clause to the effect that agents have no authority to waive any of the provisions of it, one of which declared that the policy should be void in case of the non-payment of premiums or of premium notes, when due, held, that this did not refer to a premium recited as paid in the policy, but to future premiums.

This was an action by which the plaintiff [Helen A. M. Miller] sought to recover from the defendant $5,000, alleged to have been insured in her name on the life of her late husband, Walter T. H. Miller. There was little or no question as to the facts of the case, which were substantially these: On the 19th of June, 1868, Walter T. H. Miller, then residing in St. Louis, and being engaged in business there with his cousin, Solomon Scott, as his partner, signed an application for a policy of insurance for $5,000 on his life, telling Messrs. Dutcher & Fawcett, the general agents of the company at that point, through whom the application was made, that he was going to Maryland, and, when the policy was received to forward it to him at Reese's Corner, Kent county, Maryland, and to send with it the premium notes, which he would sign and return, and that his partner, Scott, had promised him to pay the cash portion of the premium, the premium being, in all, some $254.85, of which $86.26 was to be in cash; the balance in two notes, at six and twelve months. On July 2, 1868, D. & F., having received the policy from the home office, inclosed it with the premium notes and a statement of the cash due, receipted by them to Miller, saying, "We give you your policy," asking him to return the notes signed, and stating they will at the proper time, call on Scott for the cash premium. On July 10th, Miller sends them the notes signed; on the 22d July, D. & F. call on Scott for the cash, and he refused payment, and though he admitted having promised his partner, Miller, to pay the amount, says he had never promised them to do so; on July 23d D. & F. write Miller of Scott's refusal to pay, and saying they depend upon him for the cash, with the interest since accrued added; wish to have it in time for their monthly statement of August 1st. The letter was answered on August 3d by Miller, who regretted Scott's failure to pay, and promised to send forward, as requested, in a few days, a draft on New York for the amount due; on August 18th, Miller writes he is shipping some wheat to Baltimore, and will direct Messrs. Cox & Brown of that city to purchase and forward the draft. On September 10th, Dutcher & Fawcett write that they have never received a draft, and say, "Now, sir, we are fearful you will lose your policy, if payment is not made soon." Having heard nothing further from Miller, and learning that he was seriously ill, Dutcher & Fawcett, on October 14th, four days after his death, of which they were, however, then unaware, write to him, returning the premium notes which he had sent them, and pronounced his policy forfeited by the non-payment of the cash premium. Mr. Miller having died on the 10th October, 1868, the friends of Mrs. Miller applied to Mr. Metcalfe, agent of the company in Baltimore, and also to the home office, for blanks on which to make proof of his death. They were refused in both instances, the company declining to recognize the policy. They then procured blanks from another office, and having made the necessary proof, and demanded payment on the policy, which was refused, Mrs. Miller testified that her husband had, in July, 1868, handed her the policy, saying it was a present for her; and that she had never paid any premium on it. Mr. Scott, her husband's partner, testified for the defence that Mr. Dutcher had called upon him for the cash premium about the 20th of July, and that he had refused to pay it. On cross-examination he admitted he had promised Miller to do so, but said that he had not at that time intended buying out his share of their business, which he had subsequently done. When Mr. Dutcher called upon him they had some words, in the course of which Mr. D. said he had charged himself with the cash, in the expectation of getting it from him (Scott), as he had promised to pay it, and had given Miller time on the note premiums. Mr. Scott also identified Miller's letters above referred to. Mr. Fawcett identified copies of those sent to Miller by D. & F., and testified that the cash premium had never been paid or charged to themselves on the books of D. & F. The policy itself which was given in evidence by the plaintiff, recited that it was issued upon the faith of the statements, etc., contained in the application of June 19th, and recited also the first premium as "in hand paid." Among the provisos in the policy was one that if the assured "shall not pay or cause to be paid the premium as aforesaid on or before the day herein mentioned for the payment thereof, or any note or notes which may be given to or received by said company in part payment of any premium, on the day or days when the same shall become due," the policy would become void, etc. On the margin of the policy was the following notice: "Agents of the company are not authorized or permitted to waive, alter, or change any of the provisions of this policy." At the foot of the receipt, which was sent to Miller with the policy, was a memorandum to the effect that "agents must not deliver policies until they are paid for." The printed instructions of the company to its general agents, offered in evidence by the defence, contained directions to the same effect, with the additional notice that if the agents should disregard this rule the premium would be charged to them, and further, providing for the forfeiture of the policies in case of non-payment for thirty days. The president of the company testified that the cash premium had never been received by the company, or charged to Dutcher & Fawcett, they having in their monthly report marked the premium as unpaid.

Stirling & Maund, for plaintiff, contended, first, that the defendant had waived the cash payment, which was a condition precedent to the delivery of the policy, and having trusted to the credit of the deceased, and accepted his premium notes, the policy went into actual operation as a contract of assurance, and could not be forfeited by any subsequent failure of Miller to meet the credit so given. Secondly, that the transaction between the agents and Miller amounted to an actual payment made Dutcher & Fawcett, the creditors of Miller, on the one hand, and debtors of the company, on the other; thirdly, that the policy, having been regularly executed and delivered without any fraud on the part of the plaintiff or her husband, became a valid contract of assurance, and, by the recital on its face of the receipt of the premium, estopped the company from denying that the same was paid, except only so far as to allow the company to enforce a recovery of the money actually unpaid by deduction from the amount due by the company on the policy, or by suit against the party by whom it was payable.

W. S. Bryan, for defendant, contended that the facts showed that Dutcher & Fawcett had delivered the policy only upon the faith of Miller's statement that the cash premium was in Scott's hands, ready for them, and that they had never, then or afterwards, waived its payment, and, even if it should be held that Dutcher & Fawcett had waived the cash payment that, Miller being aware of the limit of their power as agents, they could not bind the company by their action in so doing.

GILES, District Judge, after taking time to consider, announced the decision, and, taking up the plaintiff's position, in reversed order, ruled that the company was not estopped from denying the payment of the premium by the recital in the policy, and that, though that point was upheld by the authority of Parsons, in his late work on Marine Insurance, the court could not accede to that doctrine, unless in a case where the interests of innocent third parties, who have purchased upon the faith of such a recital, have intervened, which had not happened in this case.

With regard to plaintiff's second point, the court held that there was nothing to show actual payment to the agents, nor any transaction tantamount to a payment. There was, it is true, an order on a party in St. Louis for the money, but there is no evidence of the agents having received that as a payment, nor of their having charged themselves with the money in the account rendered the company on the 1st of August.

With regard to the plaintiff's first position THE COURT held that there was a waiver of the cash payment by the general agents, which bound the company. THE COURT said that the fact that the payment of the cash premium was waived, and the policy delivered and considered as binding, was evident throughout the whole correspondence. In the agents' first letter they say, "We give you your policy," and they inclose the notes for the balance of the premium, prescribing how they shall be filled out and sent, and as to the cash, say it will be called for at the proper time. This was a clear and unquestionable act of waiver. They make no demand upon Scott until the 22d July, and, upon his refusal to pay, write their second letter to Miller, in which they say, "We now depend upon you for it (the cash), to which you must add interest," etc. This letter clearly treated the policy as existing. The third letter does not vary the position; in it they say, "Now, sir, we are fearful you will lose your policy, if payment is not made soon." Now, a man cannot lose what he has never had. Throughout the whole transaction—the giving credit, the taking of a third party for payment, and the coming back upon Miller upon the third party's refusal to pay—there has been a clear waiver of the cash payment, and a delivery and treatment of the policy as a valid executed contract, recognized alike by the agents in St. Louis and the principal in Maryland. From the 2d of July up to the death of Miller, the company could have sued him for the unpaid premium.

THE COURT further held that the general agents had power to waive the payment of the first cash premium. The marginal notice referred to the provisos contained in the policy, and the proviso relied upon referred, not to the first premium, for that was recited in the policy itself as paid, but to the future premiums only, and a failure to pay upon the days therein named. There was no provision in the policy that it shall not become binding until the first premium is paid, and consequently there was no violation of any provision of the policy by the agents when they delivered it as binding before the premium was paid. The memorandum at the foot of the due bill was a mere direction to the agent, and nothing more. The private instructions of the company to its general agents had never been brought to the knowledge of the assured, and had, therefore, nothing to do with this case. It seemed to THE COURT, however, that those very instructions contemplated that a policy might be delivered by the agents without payment of the premium. This is shown by the rule that premiums not paid in such cases will be charged to the agents personally. It appearing, then, that the cash payment was waived by the agent, and that the waiver was within the general scope of the business of the general agents of the company, and the assured not being bound by the secret instructions issued by the company to their agents, THE COURT will enter judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the policy, less the amount due for premiums, etc. Exceptions reserved by defence, Judgment entered for $5,013.25 and costs.

MILLER v. BUTLER.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1807.

BILL OF EXCHANGE — ACCEPTANCE — GIVEN FOR AWARD—MISTAKE OF ARBITRATORS.

1. A bill of exchange may be accepted, by the drawee's writing the word "accepted" ["excepted"] upon it.

[Cited in Cortelyou v. Maben, 22 Neb. 700, 36 N. W. 160.]

2. In an action by the indorsee, against the acceptor of a bill of exchange, drawn for the amount of an award, the acceptor cannot avail himself of a mistake of the arbitrators in making up the award.

Assumpsit on an inland bill of exchange, drawn by Reed on the defendant, in favor of W. Hartshorne, Jr., or order, stating it to be the amount of an award between Reed and the defendant, which bill was underwritten, "Excepted, Tristam Butler," in the handwriting of the defendant. Hartshorne indorsed it to the plaintiff.

Mr. Swann, for defendant, objected that that was not an acceptance, but THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objection.

Mr. Swann then offered to read the award, (Hartshorne being one of the referees who had signed the award,) and to read an acknowledgment by the arbitrators made subsequent to the award, that if a certain affidavit (then produced,) had been produced to them before the award, it would have reduced their award sixty dollars, and contended that the defendant had a right to discount those sixty dollars against the plaintiff.

But THE COURT rejected the evidence, the bill being negotiable, and in the hands of a third person.

BANKRUPTCY — ACTION TO RECOVER DEBT DUE BANKRUPT—SET-OFF.

[It is no defense to an action by an assignee to recover a debt due the bankrupt that said debt has been claimed by the bankrupt as set-off in a pending suit.]

[This was an action by Miller, assignee in bankruptcy of Wyckoff and others, against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Company. Heard on demurrer to plea.]

To a declaration by an assignee in bankruptcy containing the common counts for money due to the bankrupts, a plea was filed alleging that the defendants, before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, had begun a suit against the bankrupts in the New Jersey supreme court, and that the bankrupts did claim, by way of set-off in that action, the sum of money claimed in this suit, and for the same cause of action, and that that suit was still pending and undetermined.

A demurrer to this plea was sustained. The plaintiff's counsel cited Serra e' Hijo v. Hoffman [30 La. Ann. 67].

Edward Q. Keasbey, for demurrants.
Mr. Keen, for defendants.

MILLER et al. v. The EASTERN RAILROAD.

[27 Leg. Int. 188; [1] 7 Phila. 597.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May 12, 1870.

TOWAGE—SKILL REQUISITE—CAUTION.

Proper skill and caution in performing towage service must be understood as such skill and caution as persons of ordinary prudence, duly qualified for the business of towage, and exercising an honest care of the interests confided to them, ordinarily use.

On the 7th of December, 1869, the above tug, having made up a tow of sixteen barges, (in four tiers astern,) proceeded to tow the same to the locks of the Delaware and Raritan Canal. The tow was prepared to start the day before, but owing to the threatening appearance of the weather, it was deferred until the 7th; and although even then the weather was doubtful, and blowing from the northeast, a start was made with the wind increasing. After proceeding a short distance, the navigator of the tug determined to return, and in turning the tug and tow for that purpose, the "Tinney," (one of the barges in tow,) an undecked boat, owned by the libellant, sunk. She was the starboard or weather barge of the tier, next the tug, and consequently the most exposed of any of the tow. The "Tinney" was subsequently towed ashore where she now lies.

The learned judge of the admiralty, in referring the case to nautical assessors, Captains John H. Young and Thomas G. Munroe, said: "Considering the weather at the time of starting, the particular service intended, the arrangement of the tows, and the relative position of the Tinney, taking her construction into view, and attributing the proper effect to any other circumstances which the assessors may adjudge material, did the tug, in their opinion, use proper skill and caution, in undertaking the towage of such a barge as the Tinney, as it was undertaken? The words 'proper skill and caution' will be understood by the assessors to mean such skill and caution as persons of ordinary prudence, duly qualified for the business of towage, and exercising an honest care of the interests confided to them, ordinarily use."

Thereupon the assessors reported as follows, viz.: "We are of opinion that the navigator of the tug did not use proper skill and caution in arranging the tow, and did not take into proper consideration the construction of the 'Tinney.' The fact that the Tinney was not a decked boat rendered it prudent that her position should have been among the best, instead of which it was unquestionably the very worst of any boat in the tow. While there were several decked boats among the tow, it does not appear that there were any arrangements made to place them in the more exposed parts of the tow. Again, the master of the tug did not use good judgment in electing to start with so large a tow as sixteen barges, at that season of the year, with the threatening weather that then prevailed. He was a man of long experience in that business, had entire control, accountable to none but his employers, fully aware, or should have been, of the ability of his tug to perform the service of the day, and to carry his tow safely through. It appears in the testimony, that the said tug had previously towed as many as twenty-eight boats at one time without assistance, yet it does not appear that those boats were loaded, and the assessors feel constrained to assume that they were not loaded; the more particularly so, when it is borne in mind, that she had a tug to assist her with only sixteen boats. In conclusion, we are of opinion, that the captain of the tug erred with regard to the ability of his tug to carry so heavy a tow through safely under the then existing bad weather; he also erred in not placing some of the decked boats in the more exposed parts of the tow, as he had a perfect right to do. Any curtailment of the tug master's authority, with regard to placing, arranging, making up, or starting the tow, according to his own judgment, would lead to so many difficulties, that all vessels yield implicit obedience to his orders."

J. Hill Martin, for libellants.

A. I. Fish, for respondent.

CADWALADER, District Judge. If either party has the right to complain of my consulting assessors in this case, the libellant is the party. If the assessors had answered my question differently, I might not have been able to decide the case without a commission to new assessors. As the matter stands, I concur in the opinion of the assessors.

MILLER v. ELLIOT.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1839.

PARTY WALL—HOW BUILT—DUTY OF SURVEYOR—REIMBURSEMENT—ACTION TO RECOVER.

1. It is a condition annexed to the title of every house-lot in the city of Washington, that when the proprietor builds a partition-wall between himself and his neighbor, he shall lay the foundation equally upon the lands of both; and that any person who shall afterwards use the partition-wall, or any part of it, shall reimburse to the first builder a moiety of the charge of such part as he shall use.

2. It is the duty of the city surveyor to attend, when requested, and examine the foundations or walls of any house to be erected, when the same shall be level with the street or the surface of the ground, for the purpose of adjusting the line of the front of such building to the line of the street, and correctly placing the party-wall on the line of division between that and the adjoining lot; and his certificate is evidence, and binding on the parties interested; but it is not necessary to the plaintiff's right of action for half the value of the wall, that it should have been so adjusted by the surveyor; or that the walls should be of the thickness required by the third article of the commissioners' regulations of the 20th of July, 1795.

3. The value of half the wall may be recovered in an action upon the case in assumpsit.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Assumpsit for money paid, laid out, and expended, for the defendant's use and at his request; to recover one half of the costs of so much of the partition-wall erected by the plaintiff [Samuel Miller] as was used by the defendant [Jonathan Elliot] in building his house on the adjoining lot. Verdict for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court, whether the plaintiff had a right to place half of his partition-wall on the lot of the defendant, and whether the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for half the cost of so much of the wall as the defendant used in building his house adjoining it.

The case was submitted to the court upon notes of argument by the counsel.

Mr. Addison, for plaintiff.
Mr. Morfit, for defendant.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The original proprietors of the lands now composing the city of Washington, by deeds dated about the 29th of June, 1791, conveyed their lands to Thomas Beall and John M. Gantt, in trust, among other things, to be laid out for a federal city, with such streets, squares, parcels, and lots, as the president of the United States should approve; and that they should convey to the commissioners of the city, for the use of the United States, forever, all the streets, &c., and that the residue of the lots should be equally divided between the United States and the original proprietors; and that the trustees should convey to the original proprietors the lots assigned to them in the division; and that the residue should be sold and conveyed to the respective purchasers. But such conveyances, as well to the original proprietors, as to the respective purchasers, were to be "on, and subject to, such terms and conditions as shall be thought reasonable by the president for the time being, for regulating the materials and manner of the buildings and improvements on the lots generally, in the said city, or in particular streets, or parts thereof, for common convenience, safety, and order; provided such terms and conditions be declared before the sales of any of the said lots, under the direction of the president." Under this provision of the trust-deeds, the president of the United States, on the 17th of October, 1791, before the sale of any of the public lots, declared certain "terms and conditions for regulating the materials and the manner of buildings and improvements on the lots in the city of Washington." The fourth of these terms is, "That the person or persons appointed by the commissioners to superintend the buildings, may enter on the land of any person to set out the foundation and regulate the walls to be built between party and party, as to the breadth and thickness thereof; which foundations shall be laid equally upon the lands of the persons between whom such party-walls are to be built; and shall be of the breadth and thickness determined by such person proper; and the first builder shall be reimbursed one moiety of the charge of such party-wall, or so much thereof as the next builder shall have occasion to make use of, before such next builder shall any ways use, or break into the wall; the charge, or value thereof, to be set by the person or persons so appointed by the commissioners." It is, therefore, a condition annexed to the title of every house-lot in the city of Washington, that when the proprietor builds a partition-wall between himself and his neighbor, he shall lay the foundation equally upon the lands of both; and that any person who shall afterward use the partition-wall, or any part of it, shall reimburse to the first builder a moiety of the charge of such part as he shall use.

By the charter of 1820, § 7, the power is given to the corporation of Washington, "to regulate, with the approbation of the president of the United States, the manner of erecting, and the materials to be used in the erection of houses;" and by section 8, "to regulate party, and other walls and fences." By the by-law of March 30, 1822, (Rothwell's City Laws, 142,) the corporation reënacted the building regulations of the 17th of October, 1791, and those of the commissioners of July 7, 1794, originally made under the authority of the Maryland act of 1791 (chapter 45), except so far as modified by the proclamation of President Monroe, of January 14, 1818, which modification does not affect the present case. The surveyor of the city of Washington, was an officer appointed by the commissioners during their existence, and afterwards by the superintendent during his existence, and afterward by the commissioner of the public buildings, and finally by the corporation of Washington, under the by-law of August 13, 1828. The office of surveyor of the city is recognized, and his fees are regulated by several acts of congress, namely, March 3, 1803 (Burch, 245; 2 Stat. 235); March 27, 1804 (Burch, 246; 2 Stat. 297); and January 12, 1809 (Davis' Laws, 189; 2 Stat. 511; Burch, 267–269). By the fifth section of the act of January 12, 1809, it is enacted, "That it shall be the duty of the surveyor to attend, when requested, and examine the foundation or walls of any house to be erected, when the same shall be level with the street, or surface of the ground, for the purpose of adjusting the line of the front of such building to the line of the street, and correctly placing the party-wall on the line of division between that and the adjoining lot; and his certificate of the fact shall be admitted as evidence, and binding on the parties interested." The same thing is enacted totidem verbis in the by-law of August 13, 1828, authorizing the appointment of a surveyor, &c. This surveyor is the officer who is to perform the duties required by the second and fourth articles of the regulations of the 17th of October, 1791; but by the act of January 12, 1809, as well as by the by-law, he is only to perform them when required, and when the wall shall be level with the street, or the surface of the ground. This act modifies the second article of the regulations in that respect, and dispenses with the necessity of applying to the surveyor. It is no valid objection, therefore, to the plaintiff's right of recovery, that he did not apply to the surveyor to adjust the party-wall, if such was the case. But that fact does not appear. It might, for aught that appears, have been, that the surveyor did so adjust it, as well as the front walls; or that the party-wall may have been laid with the consent of the defendant.

It is also objected by the defendant that the walls were not of the thickness required by the third article of the commissioners of July 20, 1795, made under Act Md. 1791, c. 45, entitled "An act concerning the territory of Columbia." But a compliance with that regulation, is not a condition preliminary to the plaintiff's right of action for half of the cost of the party-wall. The plaintiff may possibly have subjected himself to the penalty of $20, but that penalty does not enure to the benefit of the defendant, and is not a bar to the plaintiff's right of action. It is also moved, in arrest of judgment, that the action should have been debt, and not case. But there is nothing in the record to show that case or assumpsit was not the proper form of action. Let the judgment be entered up according to the verdict.

NOTE. See Act Jan. 12, 1809, § 4, which applies to two cases only. (1) Where a house is built on a subdivision of a lot or square before the surveyor shall have measured the whole front, &c. (2) Where the house was built before the date of the act (12th January, 1809). That section therefore does not touch this case of Miller v. Elliot.

PAYMENT—BONDS—LAPSE OF TIME—PRESUMPTION.

In an action upon a bond, payable by instalments, the jury may, and ought to, presume payment of any instalment payable more than twenty years before the commencement of the suit, and may presume payment of an instalment payable nineteen years and ten months before suit brought.

Debt upon a bond payable by instalments. Nineteen years and ten months elapsed since the last instalment became payable, and another instalment had become payable more than twenty years before the suit was brought.

N. Herbert, for plaintiff.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant.

THE COURT (nem. con.) instructed the jury that as to the instalment due more than twenty years they ought to presume, and as to the other they might presume, payment.

WRIT—INDORSEMENT—AMENDMENT—PLEA IN BAR—ABATEMENT.

1. The indorsement on the writ, required by the state statute, which has been adopted, may be objected by a motion to quash the writ.

2. In such case an amendment would be permitted.

[Cited in Brown v. Pond, 5 Fed. 35.]

3. A neglect to make the indorsement is no ground for a plea in bar. A plea in abatement is the only one that could be filed.

At law.

Mr. Perry, for plaintiff.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant in this case craved oyer of the writ, set it forth, and demurred to the declaration. Several causes of demurrer are assigned, but the variance assigned between the indorsement on the writ and the declaration, being the only one relied on, will be noticed. The statute adopted in our practice, requires the clerk to indorse the cause of action on the writ, without prescribing any form. An indorsement, therefore, which shall state the cause of action in general terms, will be a compliance with the law. As this is a requisite of the statute, it may constitute a ground of objection to the writ, where the indorsement is not made. The most appropriate manner of taking advantage of a neglect to make the indorsement would seem to be by a motion to quash the writ. On such a motion the court would, of course, permit an amendment of the writ to be made. A defective indorsement might be pleaded in abatement, by craving oyer of the writ; but it is no ground for a plea in bar. The demurrer is overruled, and leave given to amend the writ.

CORPORATIONS—LOAN BY DIRECTOR—MORTGAGE—BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE—OBJECTION—TEMPORARY EMBARRASSMENT—INSOLVENCY.

[1. A loan to a corporation by a director thereof, and the giving of a mortgage to secure the same, is not within the rule prohibiting contracts by a trustee with himself in relation to the property held by him in trust.]

[2. An assignee in bankruptcy of a corporation will not be heard in a court of equity to object to a contract made by the corporation with one of the directors, unless he offers to return to the director his advances under the contract.]

[3. A mortgage given by a corporation to secure advances from one of its directors is not invalid merely because the advances were applied to the payment of debts for which the director was security.]

[4. Temporary embarrassment is not "insolvency" within Act N. J. April 15, 1846, § 2, prohibiting insolvent corporations from making contracts.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey.]

[This was a suit by Elias N. Miller, assignee in bankruptcy, against N. N. Halsted, to have a certain mortgage given by the bankrupt declared void. The district court rendered a decree for respondent. The assignee appeals.]

STRONG, Circuit Justice. Notwithstanding the very thorough argument which has been submitted to me in support of this appeal, my opinion accords so nearly with that of the district court that I deem it unnecessary to discuss at length the question involved in the case. I shall content myself therefore with presenting some considerations in addition to those which governed the action of the district judge; considerations which lead me to the same conclusion as that at which he arrived.

That the chattel mortgage given by the company to Halsted was not void in its inception, because unauthorized, is, I think, quite clear. It was formally authorized by a resolution of the board of directors, and I cannot doubt the board, as constituted, was competent to direct its execution. Their minutes show that a quorum was present when the resolution was passed; and, though the mortgagee was one of the directors who constituted the quorum, I am not prepared to say that, for such a reason, the board was incapable of authorizing the mortgage subsequently made. There is uncontradicted evidence that, in addition to the four directors whose names are noted upon the minutes, Mr. Grier, another director, was present at the meeting at which the resolution was adopted. Were it then conceded that Halsted had such an interest in the resolution that he was incompetent to vote for it, or even to aid in constituting a quorum for corporate action upon it (which I doubt), there was a quorum without him, and a majority of the quorum must have voted for the resolution. Certainly no other director than Halsted had any disqualifying interest when the resolution was adopted, or when the mortgage was made. As the mortgage was given to cover only subsequent advances, it vested in the mortgagee merely a dry trust, which continued such until advances on the faith of it were afterwards actually made. Then, and then only, can any person besides be said to have had an interest either in the resolution or in the mortgage. The formal execution of the mortgage, therefore, as the contract of the company, must be treated as established.

And here I may remark it has not been seriously claimed that the mortgage is tainted with actual fraud: Fraud upon the company is not aperted, and certainly, in view of the evidence, it cannot be. I have, however, carefully gone over the proofs, and the result has been that I find nothing which would justify my coming to the conclusion that actual fraud upon the company, or upon any creditors of the company, was either perpetrated or intended. If, therefore, the mortgage is not available to the appellee as a security for the money advanced by him, it must be because it was given in contravention of some legal policy, or in conflict with some statute. Was it, then, inconsistent with any rule of legal policy? Halsted, the mortgagee, was a director of the company, and as such he was a trustee for the stockholders. I recognize in its broadest extent the principle that a trustee cannot contract, either directly or indirectly, with himself, for his own possible benefit, in relation to the property committed to his charge. I agree that all such contracts, even though untainted with actual fraud, are avoidable at the option of the cestui que trust. How far this rule is applicable to one of the several directors of a corporation aggregate, all of whom are, I admit, in an important sense, trustees of the rights and property of the corporation and of its stockholders, it is not necessary now to define. Conceding that it applies to all cases of purchase of the company's property by a director, to all cases of sale by him to the company, and generally to every contract in which his interest may be inconsistent with the interests of the company, it is still undoubtedly true that he may lend to the corporation, and take a valid security for the repayment of the loans. Such a contract is not one made for his benefit, in which his interests are adverse to those of his cestuis que trustent, and therefore the reasons why other contracts, made by persons sustaining fiduciary relations, and by which they may possibly secure benefits to themselves, are held avoidable, are wholly inapplicable to it. A contract of loan at legal rates of interest is one in which it is impossible for the lender to take undue advantages of the borrower. Nothing, I think, is more common than are loans made by directors of railroad, manufacturing, and other corporations to the companies of which they are directors; and it would be disastrous in the extreme were it held that such loans are against the policy of the law. Individuals are often elected directors because of their ability and supposed willingness to make pecuniary advances when needed. It is not unfrequently the case that loans can be obtained from no other source, and, if securities taken for such loans have not the same validity and effect as similar securities given to other creditors, the consequence must be the prostration of many business corporations, and the destruction of the interests of stockholders. And I know of no adjudicated case of authority that classes securities for loans of money taken by directors of joint-stock companies from the companies among those contracts which are avoidable because one of the parties stands in a fiduciary relation to the property respecting which the contracts are made. It is very certain that even a guardian, an executor or administrator may advance money for his cestui que trust, and thereby entitle himself to subrogation to the peace and right of the creditor whose claim he has paid. In such cases the law not only implies a contract to repay the money advanced, with interest, but it gives a preference. And surely an express engagement is not illegal when the duty undertaken thereby is implicitly recognized. Surely, if a director of a company may lend to it lawfully, he may take from it any of the ordinary securities for loans. It is, however, not worth while to spend time in showing that the mortgage to Halsted is not within the rule that a trustee cannot deal for his own advantage with the property held by him in trust, for, even if it is, it is not void. At most it is only avoidable, at the instance of the company or of the stockholders, in equity, and then only on repayment of the money advanced. The assignee in bankruptcy is doubtless clothed with the rights of the bankrupt company. If they could come into a court of equity to avoid the mortgages, so can he. But he must come as they must have come, doing equity, when he seeks it; and that is, repaying the money advanced. It is almost superfluous to say that a creditor of the mortgagors, in the absence of fraud, has no standing against the mortgage in a court of equity. The directors of the company are not trustees for him. Hence, though the assignee represents creditors as well as the bankrupts, it is as the representatives of the latter only that he can complain. He can only assert the rights which they had.

I proceed next to inquire whether the mortgage was forbidden by the statutes of New Jersey. The act of April 15, 1846, intended to prevent frauds by incorporated companies, enacted in its second section that whenever an incorporated company shall become insolvent, or shall suspend the ordinary business of the said company for want of funds to carry on the same, it shall not be lawful for the directors or managers of the said company, or for any officer or agent thereof, to sell, convey, assign, or transfer any of the estate, effects, choses in action, goods, chattels, rights or credits, lands or tenements of the said company, nor shall it be lawful to make any such sale, conveyance, assignment, or transfer in contemplation of the insolvency of any such company; and every such sale, conveyance, assignment, or transfer shall be utterly null and void as against creditors. Other sections of the act make provision for winding up and distributing the assets of insolvent corporations. The whole statute is, in effect, a winding-up act. Whether it has been superseded by the general bankrupt law, I do not care to consider, because I am clearly of opinion that it has no applicability to the present case, even if in force. The evidence convinces me that at the time when the mortgage was given to the appellee the company had not suspended its ordinary business for want of funds to carry it on, or for any reason; nor had it become insolvent, within the meaning of the New Jersey statute. And it is clear the mortgage was not made in contemplation of insolvency. Undoubtedly there was embarrassment. There were debts becoming due, and some already due, which the company had not then the money to discharge. But they had property which, if converted into money, or hypothecated, was much more than sufficient to pay all the debts. And, instead of there having been any contemplation of insolvency the plain and only object for creating the mortgage was to enable the company to go on with its business. Whatever may be the meaning of the word "insolvent" in the bankrupt law, I cannot think the New Jersey legislature intended to treat embarrassment as insolvency, or to arrest the action of every corporation that might find it necessary to borrow money in order to meet its accruing obligations. Looking at the whole statute, I doubt not the word "insolvency" was designed to have its general and popular meaning, namely, the condition of having insufficient property to pay existing debts. Very plainly, such was not the condition of these mortgagors when their mortgage was given to the appellee. I think, therefore, the case is unaffected by the state enactment.

Nor was the mortgage invalid because of the provisions of the 35th and 39th sections of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 534, 536)]. It was executed more than six months before the petition was filed under which the mortgagors were adjudicated bankrupts. It was not, therefore, a fraud against that act. Had it been actually fraudulent, the assignee might doubtless avoid it, irrespective of the time when it was made; but, in the absence of actual fraud, the right to set aside a preference is, I think, under our bankrupt law, limited to transactions which took place within six months from the time when the proceedings which resulted in declared bankruptcy commenced. I come next to inquire whether I ought to declare the mortgage void because the mortgagee left the chattels in the possession of the mortgagors, and consented that they should sell and apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of other debts. This, it must be conceded, is always evidence of fraud, amounting sometimes to conclusive proof. But in this case the contract was made in New Jersey. There it was also to be performed, and I think, therefore, the legal effect upon the contract of established facts is to be regulated by the law of that state. The district judge has shown to my satisfaction that in New Jersey leaving the subject of a chattel mortgage in possession of the mortgagor does not necessarily establish that the instrument is fraudulent, nor does suffering the mortgagor to use or sell a portion of the hypothecated property. The articles sold are discharged from the lien of the mortgage; but it is a question of fact whether the transaction was covinous, so that the articles remaining unsold are also discharged. The conduct and agreement of the mortgagee are important in determining the intent with which the instrument was made, but they are admissible of explanation. I assent so entirely to the opinion of the district judge upon this part of the case that I deem it useless to discuss the matter at length. Meeting, then, the question as an inquiry of fact open to my decision whether the mortgage was a fraud either upon the company or upon creditors of the company, I am forced to the conclusion that it was not.

There remains but one question. It is whether the advancements made by Halsted are covered by the mortgage. It is plain that the mortgage was authorized, and given to cover only subsequent loans or advancements. Such is the purport of the resolution which authorized the instrument. But the evidence is satisfactory that Halsted, the appellee, advanced to the company, after the mortgage was given, more than $28,000; much more than the sum which he has been allowed to take. It is true that the money advanced was applied to the payment of debts, for which Halsted had previously become security. But for those debts the company was primarily liable, and payment of them secured the relief which was sought through the agency of the new loan. Certainly there was nothing in the resolution adopted by the board of directors that limited the application of any money which might be obtained on faith of the mortgage to any specified debts of the mortgagors, much less anything that even impliedly prohibited its devotion to uses in which the lenders might have an interest. I do not feel called upon to say more. Agreeing, as I do, so fully with the reasons which the district judge has given from his order, I regard it unnecessary to reiterate his opinion, and I therefore content myself with affirming the decree he made. The order of the district court is affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. HOOE et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1825.

GARNISHMENT—ABSENT DEBTOR—NO EFFECTS WITHIN JURISDICTION—ATTACHMENT.

1. Upon a chancery attachment in Alexandria county, District of Columbia, against the effects of an absent debtor, the garnishee, residing in Alexandria county, is not liable to the plaintiff for goods of the defendant which are in the garnishee's custody in Virginia, where the debtor himself resides.

2. If the resident garnishee is not indebted to the defendant, and has no effects of the defendant in his possession in this district, and the defendant himself is not found in the county of Alexandria, no decree can be rendered against either the garnishee or the debtor, and the bill must be dismissed, as this court has no jurisdiction in the case.

This was a chancery attachment in the county of Alexandria, District of Columbia, to attach the effects of John Hooe, a resident of Virginia, in the hands of Jonathan Janney, a resident of the county of Alexandria, for a debt due by Hooe to Mordecai Miller & Son, of Alexandria. The subpoena was served upon Janney on the 3d of April, 1824. The garnishee, Janney, answered that he was not indebted to Hooe at the time of service of the attachment, or at any time afterwards, but that Hooe was indebted to him at the time of the service of the attachment in the sum of $587; that Hooe has his crop of wheat ground at Janney's mill in Virginia, which was under the immediate direction and management of one John P. Smoot, who was authorized to give receipts for flour brought to the mill, and to deliver the flour to the respective owners; that Hooe agreed that Janney should retain as much of his flour as would satisfy and discharge the debt to Janney; that after he had retained enough flour for that purpose, there remained more than enough to pay the debt due to Mordecai Miller & Son, the complainants, but Hooe sold it to one George Johnson, to whom it was delivered after the service of the subpoena upon Janney, who, as the property was out of the jurisdiction of this court, did not think himself justified in withholding it from Mr. Johnson, who had purchased it. He denied all fraud and collusion, &c.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion, that as the garnishee was not indebted to the defendant Hooe, and had not any effects of that defendant in his hands within the jurisdiction of this court, no decree could be made against either of the defendants, and ordered the bill to be dismissed.

MILLER et al. v. HUBBARD et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1834.

CONTRACTS—ABANDONMENT — AMOUNT EARNED — FORFEITURE—GARNISHMENT—ASSIGNMENT.

1. If a contract with the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company be declared by them "abandoned" for non-compliance with the terms thereof, according to a right reserved to the company by the contract, the contractors do not thereby forfeit the money which they have earned up to the time of the abandonment, except the 20 per cent. reserved as security for the execution of the work contracted for; although by the terms of the contract, upon the contract being declared "abandoned," it was agreed that "the company should be exonerated from every obligation thence arising, and that the reserved percentage on the contract price should become the property of the company to indemnify them for such breach of contract."

2. The attaching creditor is not in a better condition than his debtor would have been in if the attachment had not been laid.

3. A draft by the defendant on the garnishee, in favor of a third person, before the attachment, is an assignment to the payee of the amount stated in the draft, and will be preferred to an attachment.

[Cited in Jones v. Pacific Wood, Lumber & Flume Co., 13 Nev. 359.]

This was an attachment of money in the hands of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, due to the defendants [Frink Hubbard and others, and the Chesapeake & Ohio Canal], who were contractors to perform certain work upon the canal, and who were indebted to the plaintiffs [Miller and Mackay]. Before the attachment was laid, the company had declared the contract abandoned, for non-performance of the whole work by the appointed time. Before the attachment the defendants had given to one Rohrback a draft for an amount large enough to cover the whole amount due to them by the company.

Two questions were raised in the cause. (1) Whether the defendants, the contractors, by the abandonment of the contract had not forfeited all the money remaining in the hands of the company. (2) If not, then whether the money, at the time of the attachment, was the money of the defendants, or of Rohrback.

R. S. Coxe, for the company.

C. Cox, for Rohrback.

CRANCH, Chief Judge (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent). Attachment under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56. The attachment was issued and served on the 19th of February, 1833. The defendants had been contractors for work on the canal, but having failed to comply with the terms of the contract, it had been declared by the president of the company, "abandoned" on the 9th of February, 1833, under a power reserved in the contract to that effect. By the contract, monthly estimates of the quantity and value of the work done, were to be made by an engineer in the employment of the company, at the prices contained in the proposals, which were to be final and conclusive, unless objected to before payment thereof, and within twenty days after they should have been returned to the president and directors. Within ten days after such return, not less than four-fifths of the sum appearing to be due for work performed since the preceding estimate, were to be paid; the balance being reserved by the president and directors, to ensure the fulfilment of the contract; no portion of which reserved money under any circumstances to be paid until the contract should be fulfilled. It was also agreed, that when the president of the company should have declared the contract abandoned, "the company should thereupon be exonerated from every obligation thence arising; and the reserved percentage on the contract price, should become the property of the company, to indemnify them from such breach of contract."

The following facts were stated and admitted in the argument: That after the contract was declared "abandoned," an estimate was made by the proper officer of the company, of the work done since the preceding estimates, amounting to about $800; to four-fifths of which the defendants were entitled, unless they had forfeited the same by the abandonment of the contract. That on the 16th of February, 1833, the defendants drew an order on the company in favor of the plaintiffs, for the amount due by the defendants to the plaintiffs; and also an order on the company in favor of Jacob Rohrback, for $705.47, "out of any money that may be due to us after a full settlement of our accounts with the said company." That this last mentioned order was delivered to the plaintiffs as the friends of Rohrback, at the same time with the order in favor of the plaintiffs. That the plaintiffs immediately presented to the company for acceptance, the order in their favor; but the company refused to accept it. The plaintiffs did not present the order in favor of Rohrback, although they had it in their possession, nor did they give any notice thereof to the company; but issued the present attachment founded upon the note of the defendants of the 4th of February, 1833.

The following questions were raised in the argument: (1) Whether the defendants, by the abandonment of the contract, had forfeited all the money remaining in the hands of the company. (2) If not, then whether the money (exclusive of the 20 per cent. which was admitted to be forfeited,) was at the time of the attachment, or at any time since, the money of the defendants, or whether it was the money of Rohrback by virtue of the draft, of which the company had not notice until after the attachment was served.

1. Upon the first question, the court is of opinion that the defendants, by non-compliance with the contract, forfeited only the reserved 20 per cent., and that all the residue of the estimated value of their work was due to them, or their assignee or assignees.

2. Upon the second question, the opinion of the court is, that the attaching creditors are not in a better condition than their debtor would have been in, if the attachment had not been laid; and as they could not, after their draft in favor of Rohrback, which is an assignment to him of so much of his claim as is stated in the draft, have received from the garnishees that amount to their own use; and as it is admitted that the draft was sufficiently large to cover the whole amount due by the garnishees to the defendants, there was no money of the defendants in the hands of the garnishees, at the time of the attachment. It is true, that if the garnishees had paid the money to the defendants, after the draft in favor of Rohrback, and before the garnishees had notice of that draft, they would have been discharged; but that would only affect the right of property as between Rohrback and the defendants. They would have received it in trust for him, and he might recover it from them by an action for money had and received to his use. But the garnishees, having received notice of that draft, before they paid over the money to the defendants, are bound by that notice; although in their contract with the defendants they expressly state that, "no draft will be accepted by the president and directors, from any contractor." This clause only relates to voluntary acceptance, and cannot affect the legal obligations of the parties, independent of acceptance.

It is said that the plaintiffs also had a draft from the defendants on the garnishees for the amount of the note upon which the attachment is founded, and given simultaneously with the draft in favor of Rohrback, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs ought to share the fund with him in the proportion of their respective claims. But the court can make no such order in this case, even if such were the rights of the parties; for this attachment can only affect the property of the defendants in the hands of the garnishees, at the time of the service of the writ, or since; and if they had no property in the hands of the garnishees at that time, or since, the attachment must be quashed, and the contending parties left to their legal or equitable remedies.

That a previous assignment of a debt, by the defendant, will be preferred to an attachment, appears by the following authorities: Serg. Attachm. 80; Privilegia Londini (3d Ed.) p. 277; Lewis v. Wallis, T. Jones, 222; Walker v. Gibbs, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 211; Stevenson v. Pemberton, 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 3; Sharpless v. Welsh, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 279; U. S. v. Vaughan, 3 Bin. 394; Caldwell v. Vance, cited in Id. 400; Bank of North America v. McCall, Id. 338; King v. Gorsline [Case No. 7,796], in this court, May term 1831.

As the attachment must be quashed, it is not necessary that the court should notice the objections made by the counsel of Rohrback, that the affidavit did not state that Miller, one of the plaintiffs, was a citizen of Maryland; and that the word defendant was, by mistake, used for deponent. Attachment quashed.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of New Jersey.]

Kauffman & Hauck by their chattel mortgage dated December 1st, 1871, mortgaged to David Jones certain chattels, being the ordinary goods and chattels connected with the brewery, including lager beer then manufactured, to secure the payment of a then present indebtedness of thirteen thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars, "or thereabouts." In the schedule affixed to the mortgage was this clause: "Also all personal property whatsoever of every nature, name and kind not above enumerated, except the books of account and evidence of debt belonging to said Kauffman & Hauck, at said brewery, whether included by name in this schedule or not, of whatever said personal property may or shall consist, and whether said personal property is now on and at said brewery premises, or whether the same shall be placed there during the time the said money mentioned in said mortgage and every part and parcel thereof shall be and remain unpaid." The mortgage was given to secure "Upon demand, all present indebtedness now due, owing, and accruing from said party of the first part to said David Jones, or which may at any time hereafter be due, owing, and accruing from the said party of the first part to the said David Jones, up to the amount in all of fifteen thousand dollars, and not exceeding that amount," with interest. The mortgage was acknowledged January 5th, 1872. Filed January 11th, 1872; refiled November 30th, 1872, and November 29th, 1873. On the 13th of August, 1874, the mortgagee took possession of the mortgaged premises and sold them upon due notice. The mortgagors were adjudicated bankrupts in December, 1874, and an action of trover and conversion was brought by [E. N. Miller] the assignee of the bankrupts to recover the value of the mortgaged premises sold by the mortgagee.

STRONG, Circuit Justice. There is nothing in this record, so far as it is exhibited to me, which exhibits a foundation for any of the errors assigned, except those which relate to the opinion of the court upon the reserved question. I need hardly say that a denial of a motion for a non-suit is not reviewable in error. Nothing was submitted to the jury at the trial except the two questions, what was the value of the goods in controversy, and whether the chattel mortgage under which Jones acquired the possession of the property was fraudulent in fact. No verdict was returned upon the last. The court reserved the question whether the mortgage was fraudulent in law, and allowed each party to turn the case into a bill of exceptions, that the finding on the question reserved might be reviewed by writ of error, in the same manner as if the conclusions of the court had been delivered as a charge to the jury, subject to exception. I am therefore to treat the opinion of the court, upon the reserved question, as a charge to the jury, to which exception was duly taken, and I am justified in assuming that the mortgage was not fraudulent in fact. The learned judge of the district court held that it was fraudulent in law, and ordered judgment for the plaintiff for several reasons, but principally on the supposed authority of Robinson v. Elliott, 22 Wall. [89 U. S.] 513. That was the case of a chattel mortgage of goods in a retail store, given to secure the payment of a series of notes. It contained the following provision: "And it is hereby expressly agreed that until default shall be made in the payment of some one of said notes, or some paper in renewal thereof, the parties of the first part, (the mortgagors), may remain in possession of said goods, wares, and merchandise, and may sell the same as heretofore, and supply their places with other goods; and the goods substituted by purchaser for the goods sold shall, upon being put into said store or any other stores in said city, where the same may be put for sale by the said parties of the first part, be subjected to the lien of this mortgage." The instrument then concluded with separate powers to the mortgagors, on default in payment of their respective claims, to seize and sell (not the whole mortgaged property), but a sufficient amount of goods to satisfy the claims. This mortgage was held to be fraudulent in law, and void. There were peculiar circumstances in the case. There was an express stipulation that the mortgagors might deal with mortgaged property as their own; they might sell it and apply the proceeds as they pleased. It can hardly be asserted that there was any covenant to appropriate the proceeds either to the payment of the debt or to the purchase of other goods to be substituted for those sold, as was said by Davis, Justice, in delivering the judgment of the court: "Whatever may have been the motive which actuated the parties to the instrument, it is manifest that the necessary result of what they did was to allow the mortgagors, under cover of the mortgage, to sell the goods as their own and appropriate the proceeds to their own purposes, and this for an indefinite length of time. A mortgage," he added, "which in its terms contemplates such results, besides being no security to the mortgagees, operates in the most effectual manner to ward off other creditors, and where the instrument on its face shows that the legal effect of it is to delay creditors, the law imputes to it a fraudulent purpose." Robinson v. Elliott [supra] was not intended to rule that the possession of chattels mortgaged might not be retained by the mortgagors, and retained by express agreement of the mortgagee. This was in effect conceded. It was the power given expressly by the mortgagee, to the mortgagors, to dispose of the mortgaged property for their own purposes, which in the judgment of the court stamped the mortgage with legal fraud; it was that which rendered the instrument in the opinion of the court no protection to the mortgagees, while it was a hindrance to other creditors. It has, in many cases, been decided that a mortgage of chattels which permits the mortgagor to remain in possession, and to dispose of the goods in the ordinary course of his business, is not of course fraudulent as a matter of law. The English registration acts and those of many of our states have, at least, for their object protection of both the mortgagor and mortgagee, in the retention of possession and use by the former, and this without any wrong to other creditors, for provision is made for notice to them. But the retention of possession by the mortgagor involves necessarily the consumption in a greater or less degree of the thing mortgaged. All personal property is consumed more or less by its use, certainly the use involves a constant depreciation in value. If, therefore, authorized consumption of the chattels mortgaged renders the mortgage in all cases fraudulent in law, it follows that no valid mortgage of chattels can be made which stipulates for continued possession by the mortgagor. Then the registration acts are totally inoperative. But this is nowhere claimed. It was not in Robinson v. Elliott [supra]. It has been held, indeed, in a few states, that a chattel mortgage which stipulates that the mortgagor may continue in possession and sell the goods in the ordinary course of business is constructively fraudulent, but the doctrine is denied in England, in Maine, Massachusetts, Iowa, and Michigan. Hughes v. Cory, 20 Iowa, 399; Gay v. Bidwell, 7 Mich. 519; Abbott v. Goodwin, 20 Me. 408; Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], and substantially in Massachusetts. 82 Mass. [16 Gray] 597; 44 Mass. [3 Metc.] 515; 56 Mass. [2 Cush.] 294; Brett v. Carter [Case No. 1,844].

It is not necessary, however, for me in this case to enter at large upon the discussion of this question, in regard to which it must be admitted there is much diversity of opinion and judgment. In the case I have in hand, the provisions of the mortgage under consideration differ from those of the one in controversy in Robinson v. Elliott. There is no express agreement even that the mortgagors might continue in possession of the chattels mortgaged, though such an agreement may perhaps fairly be implied. But certainly there is no stipulation that the mortgagors might sell or dispose of the chattels mortgaged for their own use, or for any purpose at all. On the contrary, it is expressly covenanted by the mortgagors that, "in case default shall be made in the payment of (the debt)," or in case they shall at any time before the day of payment stipulated for, remove said goods and chattels (mortgaged), or any of them, or permit or suffer any legal process against property to be issued against them, etc., the mortgagees might take and carry away the chattels mortgaged and sell them. This, to say the least, is an implied denial of any right in the mortgagors to sell the property for their own uses and purposes. On the face of the mortgage then, there is nothing that expressly or by necessary implication empowers the mortgagors to use the property as their own, or to withdraw it from the mortgage. On the face of the instrument, the property is absolutely pledged to the mortgagee as a security for the payment of the debt due him, and there is only an implied understanding that the possession might be retained until default in payment, or until an attempt should be made to withdraw the property from the operation of the mortgage, coupled with an express negative of a right to sell and deliver the property to others. The case is not then within the words or the reason of the rule asserted in Robinson v. Elliott. The learned district judge noticed this difference between the mortgage in the present case and that in Robinson v. Elliott, but thought it of no importance, because, as he said, through all the years of its existence the mortgaged goods and chattels were continually changing with the knowledge and assent of the mortgagee, and he could not help knowing that such a consequence must necessarily follow the mortgagor's method of carrying on business. There can be no difference, he said, in principle, whether an arrangement between the parties is the result of an open and express contract, revealed to the world, or of a parol secret understanding concealed within their own bosom. This may be true if the parol understanding be an established fact. But when the question is whether an instrument in writing is of itself a fraud in law, the answer must be made in view of the instrument alone. A court cannot call to its aid a presumed or assumed collateral understanding adverse to or differing from the written contract of the parties. The existence or non-existence of such an understanding or argument is a fact, which like other facts must be found by the jury. Certainly must this be so when the conduct of the parties after the mortgage was made is relied upon as proof of the collateral parol understanding. In such a case the fraud or honesty of the attempted transfer of the property is dependent for its proof upon a mingled body of evidence, partly parol and partly written, which of course must go to the jury. I think, therefore, the district court erred in concluding, upon the supposed authority of Robinson v. Elliott, that the mortgage under consideration in this case was fraudulent in law.

This brings me to the consideration of the question whether the mortgage was in operation against creditors because it was not refiled in accordance with the statutes of the state. It was dated December 1, 1871. It was filed January 8, 1872, refiled November 30, 1872, and a copy was filed November 29, 1873. The statute of New Jersey relative to chattel mortgages enacted March 24, 1864 [Laws N. J. 1864, p. 493], has reference to mortgages unaccompanied by an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things mortgaged, and it declares that every such mortgage shall be void as against the creditors of the mortgagor, and as against subsequent purchasers and mortgagees in good faith, unless the mortgage or a true copy thereof shall be filed as directed in the act. Nixon, Dig. 613. The second section directs where the mortgage shall be filed, but does not prescribe when. It may, however, I think, fairly be inferred that the filing must be before the rights of creditors other than the mortgagees have arisen. The third section enacts that every mortgage filed in pursuance of the act "shall cease to be valid as against the creditors of the person making the same, or against purchasers or mortgagees in good faith, after the expiration of one year from the filing thereof, unless within thirty days preceding the expiration of the said term of one year a true copy of such mortgage, together with a statement exhibiting the interest of the mortgagee in the property therein claimed by him by virtue thereof, shall be again filed," etc. Now if it be assumed that the filing on the 8th of January, 1872, was not within the provisions of the act (which I confess I am unable to see), the filing on the 30th of November, 1872, may be considered as the original filing, and the refiling of November 29, 1873, was in time; both filings are good as against subsequent creditors. Such I understand to have been the opinion of the district judge, and in this he is sustained by authority—with this opinion I concur. But he seems to have thought that the statement which the statute requires to accompany the filing and the refiling was not such as the law required. I agree that a statement is necessary in addition to the filing and refiling, but a statement was made and filed on both occasions. The statement in each case claims the whole amount mentioned in the instrument to be due thereon, and as constituting the interest of the mortgagee at the date of the refiling. Referring to the instrument it appears that the sum mentioned therein as due to the mortgagee was thirteen thousand nine hundred and sixteen dollars or thereabouts, but it recites that a further credit was asked and proposed to be given, so that the entire amount should be fifteen thousand dollars, and not more. The security was therefore intended to cover the amount of fifteen thousand dollars. That sum the mortgagee was to advance, if he had not already advanced it, and that sum is the only sum spoken of in the mortgage as the "amount" intended to be secured by it. I am inclined to think, therefore, that the statements made when the mortgage was filed were sufficiently specific. They notified all subsequent creditors that the mortgagee had a lien upon the property to the extent of fifteen thousand dollars. I do not, however, consider this very important, for reasons which I will hereafter give; and the district court does not appear to have rested the case upon this point. If it were conceded that the mortgage was void as against other creditors of the mortgagors, it is not to be denied that it was good as between the parties. Creditors might avoid it or disregard it, because it was a fraud on them. It was enabling the mortgagor to hold out to them a false credit, by the possession of chattels which he had owned, but a title to which he had secretly conveyed to another. The fraud consisted in the retention of possession after the right to possession had been conveyed away; hence the recording or registration of chattel mortgages. The object was to render continued possession by the mortgagor legal, by requiring record notice of the mortgagee's rights to be given to all subsequent creditors of the mortgagor or purchasers from him. But when the possession was actually passed to the mortgagee, pursuant to the provisions of the mortgage; when the mortgagor no longer retains the possession, there is no false credit exhibited, and the possession of the mortgagee is not a fraud upon other creditors. No one doubts that in this case Kauffman and Hauck might have actually delivered the chattels to Jones as a security for the debt due him. And had they done so the pledge would have been good, even as against creditors. Until the delivery creditors having recovered a judgment might have levied upon the goods, and held them by right superior to that of a pledgee or mortgagee without possession, except so far as he may have been protected by the statute. And I think, notwithstanding some decisions to the contrary, an assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagors stands in the position of such creditors with equal rights; the adjudication of bankruptcy being equivalent to the recovery of a judgment and a levy—but his rights are no greater. I cannot see that a creditor of Kauffman and Hauck, who may have recovered a judgment against them after Jones, the mortgagee, took possession of the mortgaged chattels, and sold them, would follow the chattels by an execution. The taking possession by the mortgagee would have been no fraud upon such a creditor; not taking possession is the only fraud of which he could complain. How can the assignee in bankruptcy be in any better condition? Long before the adjudication of bankruptcy was made in this case the mortgagee had obtained actual possession of all the mortgaged property and had sold it, and this under an authority given by the mortgagors some years before the adjudication in bankruptcy, not in virtue of any preference given within four months. The taking possession then was not a fraud against the provisions of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], and I am therefore unable to see how it was in any aspect a wrong to the creditors or to their representative, the assignee in bankruptcy. In Brown v. Platt, 8 Bosw. 324, wherein a chattel mortgage claimed to be fraudulent in law as against creditors was assailed, Judge Woodruff held the attack to be unavailable, because, before any creditor questioned the validity of the mortgage, the goods were delivered into the actual possession of the mortgagees upon terms securing to them the custody and right of disposition, with authority to apply the proceeds first to the payment of their own debt. A similar doctrine was held in Massachusetts (Mitchell v. Black, 72 Mass. [6 Gray] 100); then it was ruled that one who had advanced money to a merchant to enable him to purchase merchandise, taking as security therefor (pursuant to agreement) bills of sale from the vendor and also from the debtor, assignments of the bills of lading, and had afterwards allowed the debtor to sell some of the goods as if they were his own, might take possession of the goods unsold at the same time, in order to secure his debt, and that such taking possession, though at a time when the debtor is known to himself and the creditors to be insolvent, is effectual. The retention of possession by the debtor was a fraud in law; but as no other creditor's rights had intervened when the assignee of the bills of lading took possession, he was declared to hold rightfully even as against other creditors. Equally in point is Sawyer v. Turpin [91 U. S. 114].

This is all I need say respecting the only question reserved. But, as the case goes back for a new trial, I add a few words upon a subject learnedly discussed by the district judge, and which may be matter of debate at the second trial. The mortgage included not only the personal property of the mortgagors owned by them at the time the instrument was made, but also after-acquired property. Now I agree that at law, after-acquired property cannot be subject of mortgage or sale, at least it must potentially exist and be capable of delivery. The rule, however, is confessedly different in equity. Lunn v. Thornton, 1 Man., G. & S. 379, was an action at law, in which it was held that a grant of goods which are not in existence, or which do not belong to the grantor at the time of executing the deed, is void unless the grantor satisfied the grant by some act done by him; with that view, after he has acquired the property therein, the decision was rested upon the authority in part of the fourteenth rule of Bacon's Maxims: "Licet dispositio de interesse futuro sit inutilis tamen potest fieri declaratio praecedens quae sortiatur effectum interveniente novo actu." But this maxim is a rule of law, not of equity. In Mitchell v. Winslow [Case No. 9,673], Judge Story ruled mortgages of after-acquired chattels to be valid in equity, and the same thing has been decided repeatedly since, both in this country and in England; and in equity, whatever may be the rule in law, there is no necessity for the "novus actus interveniens." Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, decided in the house of lords in 1862, is the case of the highest authority. There it was decided, after a thorough review of previous decisions, that the title of a mortgagee of after-acquired personal property was superior to that of an execution-creditor of the mortgagor who had put in his execution after the debt had fallen due, and had been demanded, though possession had never been taken from the mortgagor. See, also, Brett v. Carter [Case No. 1,844]. But if this were not so, what principle of law or equity forbids the creation by a deed, such as a chattel mortgage, of a power to seize the subsequently acquired personal goods of the mortgagor as they may be acquired in satisfaction of the mortgagor's debt? If it be admitted such property does not pass immediately on the execution of the deed, or immediately on its acquisition, why does it not when seized under such a power? In Lunn v. Thornton it was more than intimated that a distinction exists even at law between such a case and a mere mortgage of personalty that might thereafter be acquired. The instrument in that case created no such power. The mortgage in the present case expressly gives power to the mortgagee to take and carry away the goods mortgaged, including the future acquisitions, and to sell the same in satisfaction of the debt. Such a seizure and sale were made before any other creditor interfered or had a right to interfere. I forbear any further discussion of this subject; perhaps I ought not to have said so much as I have said, for no question in regard to it was reserved.

The judgment of the district court is reversed, and a new trial is ordered.

MILLER v. KELLY.

[Abb. Adm. 564.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1849.

SALVAGE—CLAIM BY CREW—ACTION IN PERSONAM AGAINST MASTER—CONTRACT FOR THE VOYAGE—MAINTENANCE OF CREW.

1. No claim for salvage can be maintained by the crew of a vessel upon the ground that by their services she is brought through a storm into port, sound in hull.

2. An action for compensation for salvage services rendered to a vessel, cannot be maintained in personam against the master, unless it was performed for his benefit.

3. A mariner who ships "by the run," takes the risk of adverse weather and of other kindred accidents attendant upon maritime enterprise; and if the vessel be driven out of her course by stress of weather, and obliged to take shelter in an intermediate port, and is there detained, the seaman has no claim for additional compensation for extra services thus required.

[Cited in The Clarita and The Clara, 23 Wall. (90 U. S.) 17; Burdett v. Williams, 27 Fed. 119; The C. P. Minch, 61 Fed. 513.]

4. Where a seaman ships "by the run" or "by the voyage," the vessel, although detained at an intermediate port by stress of weather, is bound to maintain him while he remains attached to her, whether his services are useful to her or not.

This was a libel in personam filed by William Miller against James Kelly, to recover compensation for services rendered on board the respondent's vessel. In December, 1848, the libellant shipped at Boston on board the brig W. T. Dugan, of which the respondent was master, for a voyage to New York. He shipped as mariner, and engaged "for the run," at $8, which sum was paid him in advance. The brig, on the voyage, encountered a gale off Martha's Vineyard, in which she was much injured. She put into Nantucket in distress, and there remained for about three weeks, at the end of which time she was towed on to New York by a steamer sent on for the purpose. The libellant commenced this action to recover compensation for the extra services rendered by him to the ship during the storm, and during the detention of the vessel at Nantucket. He claimed to recover either by way of salvage, or on a quantum meruit for such services as being extra his contract.

E. C. Benedict, for libellant.

I. The voyage for which the libellant shipped was the usual direct "run" from Boston to New York, a well-known voyage of safe navigation, from three to six days long—a mere passage from one city to the other. This alone was in the minds of the parties, and on this alone their minds met. If, without the fault of the seamen, this voyage, or run, was deviated from or rendered impossible, whether by accident or design, it was at the risk of the master, who alone controls the voyage. In such case, the men are entitled to a quantum meruit. If the voyage is thus made longer in time or distance, whether the hindrance, departure, or extension occur at either end, or at an intervening port, (not in the run,) the wages are to be increased pro rata. Laws Oleron, art. 19; Cleirac, Oleron, 64, notes 1 and 2; Curt. Merch. Seam. 63.

II. The libellant's demand is as equitable and just as it is legal. Where seamen have encountered great peril in saving their own wrecked vessel, maritime courts are inclined to allow them something in the nature of a salvage quantum meruit, but usually in the name of wages. They are not held to be excluded from their wages by rules which, literally construed, would seem to exclude wages.

F. F. Marbury, for respondent.

BETTS, District Judge. The libellant, in December, 1848, hired himself to the respondent at Boston, as a mariner on board the brig W. T. Dugan, for a voyage to New York, for the sum of $8 for the run. That sum was paid him in advance. This method of hiring was familiar to the ancient marine law. Jac. Sea Laws, 133. It is substantially superseded in modern practice by contracts for monthly wages. Id.; Curt. Merch. Seam. 62, 63. But the obligations in the two cases are equivalent, being an engagement to perform the voyage named.

The vessel, on her regular course, encountered a gale off Martha's Vineyard on the 2d of January, at 3 a. m., which continued until half-past 3 a. m. of the next day, blowing violently from the N. W. The anchors were thrown over without effect; the cable parted, and the main anchor was lost, when both masts were cut away, in order to check the driving of the vessel. She was shortly after brought up by the kedge anchor. In falling, the masts stove a hole in the long boat. The brig came to about five miles east of Cape Pogue. The wind continued N. W., and a light spar was obtained and rigged as a jury-mast; the kedge hawser was cut, and the brig put before the wind for Nantucket, where she arrived, grounding while working into the harbor, and was then towed in by a steamer. The weather was severe and freezing during the efforts to make harbor, and ice made over the decks, rigging, &c. She remained in Nantucket about three weeks, and was then towed to New York by a steamer sent to her for that purpose.

The libellant claims compensation for the time he was thus detained, by way of salvage for assisting in saving the vessel, or as a quantum meruit for his services during the delay of her voyage.

The claim for salvage cannot be sustained. The Neptune, 1 Hagg. Adm. 237; The Branston, 2 Hagg. Adm. 3, note; [Hobart v. Drogan] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 110, 3 Kent, Comm. 246. No services were rendered by the seaman beyond what were required of him by his duty to the ship. He was bound to the hazards of the voyage, and to bestow his best efforts for the preservation of ship and cargo. Detentions through perils and disasters of the sea, are risks assumed by seamen in every shipping contract, and no legal right arises to them from those causes, or their extra exertions to save their vessel, to demand an increased compensation. Abb. Shipp. 647. The vessel was not a wreck, out of which, by his special exertions, a portion of her tackle or of her cargo has been preserved. She came bodily into port, sound in hull. No claim for salvage can be raised by a crew against a vessel so circumstanced. 3 Kent, Comm. 367. And even if such claim might be enforced in rem against the hulk, as a remnant of the entire ship, the demand could not be maintained in personam against the master without proof that the salvage service was performed for his benefit. Sup. Ct. Rules, 19.

The claim for continuing wages on a quantum meruit, is pressed upon the consideration, that the libellant engaged for a continued run or voyage to New York, and that by putting the vessel back off her course, the respondent committed a deviation which entitles the libellant to pay for his time intervening up to the arrival of the vessel in her port of destination.

It cannot be maintained that returning to Nantucket from the anchorage of the brig was a voluntary deviation. There was an imperative necessity that something should be done for the preservation of the vessel and her crew; and, in her crippled condition, nothing else could be attempted so safe and serviceable to both, as to reach that harbor. The measure was compelled by stress of weather, and the absolute exigencies of the vessel and her crew. The libellant could not claim a guaranty of fair weather and a swift run. He took the risk of adverse winds and all accidents incident to maritime voyages. Had the ship been driven on shore, or on a rock, or imbedded in ice, and detained thirty or sixty days, the misfortune would have been part of the risk he assumed in undertaking the voyage. He engaged to perform the voyage: and the fair and reasonable interpretation of the contract is, that he is to stay by and aid the ship in accomplishing it, so long as she can be bona fide employed in its performance. In all the books, shipping by the run is considered equivalent to shipping for the voyage. Curt. Merch. Seam. 63, and authorities cited. In each case the seaman is bound to the vessel so long as she continues on the iter; and her being driven from a direct course by distress, or going voluntarily off it for shelter or repair, in no way relieves him from his contract.

Should it happen on a hiring for a voyage to Europe, that the ship was compelled, ex necessitate, to make harbor in Bermuda, the Western Isles, or Madeira, and be detained a period longer than the usual transit to her port of destination, the seamen would not thereby be released from their obligation to continue to the termination of the undertaking.

The obligation between the parties is reciprocal. The ship is bound to support the crew whilst they remain with her, although their services may be of no value to her, and, as in this case, to continue them on board to the port of their discharge, should the vessel be conducted there wholly independent of their assistance.

I do not discuss the question as to the right of the libellant to demand his discharge at Nantucket, when it was found the vessel must remain there to be repaired, or until she could be towed by a steamer to New York. He made no such request. It was probably most to his interest, in a place so separated from intercourse with other ports during the winter season, to remain with the vessel and be maintained at her expense. Whilst he did continue with her and she was engaged in providing means to complete her voyage, and during its completion, he must be regarded as acting under his contract, and can be entitled to claim no more than the stipulated wages. I shall, therefore, pronounce against the demand, but, as there is color of equity in his claim, and it does not appear to be presented vexatiously, I shall not impose costs on him. Libel dismissed without costs.

MILLER v. KEYS.

[3 N. B. R. 224 (Quarto, 54).] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1869.

BANKRUPTCY — FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE — UNABLE TO PAY DEBTS—INSOLVENCY—PRIMA FACIE CASE — CONSIDERATION FOR NOTE — PRICE OF SLAVES.

1. Creditor upon a note of which slaves were part consideration, filed petition in involuntary bankruptcy against a farmer, charging him with having made fraudulent preferences, being insolvent. Held, a note made prior to the emancipation proclamation, of which slaves were a consideration, is valid, and the debt will support a petition of creditor in bankruptcy.

2. To constitute a fraudulent preference where the alleged bankrupt is claimed to be insolvent, he must so be and know himself so to be, and actually intend and actually give a preference to a creditor.

3. A trader unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business is prima facie insolvent, and the burden of proof is upon him, in such a case, to show that he is solvent—aliter, as to a farmer, where the petitioner must prove the actual insolvency of the alleged bankrupt.

This was a petition by creditor [H. C. Miller] for involuntary bankruptcy of the respondent [J. Crawford Keys] upon four counts, only three of which, however, were relied upon as material, to wit: A mortgage of some three thousand one hundred acres of land to one Tompkins, to secure a debt of four thousand dollars; a subsequent conveyance of the same in fee to pay this debt and six thousand dollars more; the delivering up to Keys & McCully of a note for one thousand dollars, to whom respondent owed seven hundred dollars; each count alleging that the transaction specified was made whilst the respondent was insolvent, and with the intent to give a preference. The petitioner claimed two notes, and the position was taken in the outset by the defense, that he had no status in court, on the ground that one was paid and the other was "tainted with negro." The testimony was pretty conclusive as to the first, but the last was given for the balance of a large transaction had about the commencement of the war, only a portion of which was negroes. His honor charged the jury that a note for negroes before Lincoln's proclamation took effect was perfectly valid, but that the question did not arise in this case properly, as the note grew out of a mixed transaction, and from the original proportions of the consideration, the respondents, by whatever basis of calculation they might adopt, must owe the petitioner two hundred and fifty dollars, which was enough to establish his right to be in court.

A great deal of testimony was offered on the question of insolvency. The respondent told petitioner, when the latter first demanded payment, after the war, that he was (then) wholly unable to pay—could scarcely live, and the English rule of technical insolvency was strongly pressed. Various estimates were made of the value of the lands mortgaged (and subsequently conveyed) to Tompkins, but the preponderance of the testimony made them a hard bargain on the whole at fifty cents per acre; the note delivered up to Keys & McCully was shown to have been given for a two-third interest in a similar tract in the mountains of Pickens. It was further shown that at the time this note was re-delivered, the respondent owed K. & McC. about seven hundred dollars, that no credit was given, and they went on furnishing him with supplies and fertilizers, and, as one of the firm said, the respondent's credit had been perfectly good with them, and remained unimpaired, and that no settlement had yet been made. The case was argued at length and with great zeal and ability on both sides.

McGowan & Perry, for petitioner.
Reed & Trescote, for respondent.

THE COURT charged the jury with great clearness, and very fully. Both parties expressed their satisfaction, and declined to ask special instructions. Without attempting to quote the charge, THE COURT said, in substance, that to make out the case it was necessary that insolvency and a preference must concur. A trader unable to pay his debts in the ordinary course of business, is insolvent, prima facie, and it is incumbent on him to show that he is not so in fact. This rule does not apply with the same strictness to the farmer, and as to them this rule is reversed. The petitioner must take the onus of showing actual insolvency. The "preference" must be an advantage actually given to one or more of his creditors over the others, with the knowledge of his situation and the intent to accomplish this end. The "intent" is an element of the objectionable transaction, according to the letter of the law, and though one is presumed to intend the natural results of his acts, the intent is essential, and must be shown by his acts and the circumstances. When the respondent sold the land to Tompkins, he believed at least that he was paying a debt of ten thousand dollars, and if he considered these lands of such comparatively insignificant value, it would be hard to believe, upon the estimate of the relative value of his assets and liabilities, that he intended or thought he was giving a preference to this creditor. The solution of the mortgage is much more difficult, not only on account of the difference of the sum, but also because it was merely a security for that sum, and did not relieve his estate of it by a settlement in full. The Keys & McCully transaction is a peculiar one, and is to be solved by the testimony which you have. No credit was given upon the books, but if, from the testimony, you are satisfied that the seven hundred dollars was paid by the respondent in full, by the re-delivery of the one thousand dollar note, then is not this more than he could pay to others, and to that extent a preference? If you shall conclude that this note was re-delivered to meet the heavy advances of provisions and of fertilizers subsequently made, as well as the debt already contracted, then you may reach a different conclusion. These are questions which it is your peculiar province to solve. The insolvency and the intent to give preference must concur.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

Case No. 9,579.

MILLER v. LERCH.

[1 Wall. Jr. 210.] [1]

Circuit Court, Third Circuit. Oct., 1848.

RELIGIOUS SOCIETIES—INCORPORATION—POWER TO HOLD IN TRUST—BEQUEST TO CHARITABLE USES.

A religious corporation, created under the act of April 6, 1781, of the Pennsylvania legislature, can be a trustee for the heir at law of the testator, who devised certain lands to it in trust for uses that were void. The statute of mortmain, 9 Geo. II. c. 39, has never been in force in Pennsylvania.

[Cited in De Camp v. Dobbins, 31 N. J. Eq. 691.]

Peter Miller of Easton, devised an estate of about $300,000 to two church corporations of that town, upon certain trusts which his heir at law, the present plaintiff, contended were void, but which the corporations asserted were charitable uses, and as such entitled to the protection given to that class of gifts. A large part of the devise was real estate, which the present action—one of ejectment—was brought to recover. The question was, whether admitting the trusts to be void, the plaintiff had such a legal title as would enable him to recover here in ejectment. In other words, whether the legal title was not in the corporations, and whether the remedy of the heir was not by bill in equity on the other side of this court. Both corporations were created under an act of legislature, April 6, 1791 (3 Smith's Laws, 20), which, with a supplement, empowered them to "take, receive and hold all and all manner of land, &c., to be employed and disposed of according to the objects, articles, and conditions" of their charters, "provided that the clear yearly value or income of the messuages, &c." did not exceed $2000. The charters gave no express power to hold lands in trust for purposes not within the scope of their objects.

J. M. Porter and M. H. Jones, in support of the action.

If the legal title is out of the heir and in the corporations, it can be there for one of two purposes alone; that is to say, either for the use of the corporations themselves; or in trust for the heir at law. Certainly the corporations do not hold for themselves. The statutes of mortmain apply to Pennsylvania corporations, whatever counsel (Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 127) may have said arguendo. The judges of the supreme court of this state, in their report upon the English statutes in force here (3 Bin. 626) Dec. 14th, 1808, say that these acts "are so far in force, that all conveyances either by deed or will, of lands, tenements or hereditaments, made to a body corporate, or for the use of a body corporate are void, unless sanctioned by charter or act of assembly." And the legislature of the state declared the law to be the same way, twenty-five years afterwards in the preamble to one of its statutes. Act April 6th, 1833. The enacting part of the statute, it is true, had reference to a particular matter, but the general and then existing law of the commonwealth is explicitly and intelligently declared in this preamble;—a preamble that would operate not only as a declaration of the then existing law, but if necessary as an adoption of the statutes of mortmain, so far as any thing but enactment can adopt them. "Whereas it is contrary," says this act, "to the laws and policy of the state, for any corporation to prevent or impede the circulation of landed property from man to man, without a license from the commonwealth, and no corporation, either of this state or of any other state, though lawfully incorporated or constituted, can in any case, purchase lands within this state, either in its corporate name, or names of any person or persons whomsoever for its use, directly or indirectly, without incurring the forfeiture of said lands to this commonwealth, unless said purchase be sanctioned and authorized by an act of the legislature thereof; but every such corporation, its feoffee or feoffees, hold and retain the same, subject to be divested or dispossessed at any time by the commonwealth according to due course of law," &c. Indeed the act "enabling religious societies of Protestants within this province to purchase lands," (Act Feb. 6, 1730–31, 1 Smith's Laws, 192), was necessary to counteract the operations of these statutes. But that act never went further than to enable those societies to take sites for churches, houses of religious worship, schools, almshouses, and for burying grounds. And though the act under which these corporations are created, allows them to hold lands to a larger extent, yet it does not enable them to take such a vast estate as is here devised; the yearly value of which is far above $2,000. Neither can the corporations be trustees for the heir. Indeed, as is well known, it was formerly doubted whether a corporation could be a trustee for any purpose; whether it could be seized to any use and convey by bargain and sale; and though the modern doctrine is, that a corporation may be a trustee for some purposes, that is to say, for purposes within its scope, it has never been held that a corporation can be seized of a bare legal estate to hold in trust for a purpose no way connected within its scope,—which is foreign from its purpose—and which arises only in consequence of the uses being void for which the property was conveyed. The uses are void: The devise is void; and the heir takes directly. He has, we think, the legal title and, of course, can maintain ejectment.

Mr. Sergeant and Mr. Bayard on the other side were relieved by the court, after merely stating their points.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. In England, under the statute of 9 Geo. II. c. 36,[2] when lands are devised to a charity, the trust not only is itself void, but it vitiates the devise of the legal estate on which it was engrafted. And therefore in such cases the heir may recover at law, except where there are other trusts not charitable, which, of course, would entitle the trustees to retain the estate, and oblige the heir to prosecute his claim in equity. Jarm. Wills, 200. But this statute, which is usually, though rather inaccurately, called the "statute of mortmain," was never adopted in Pennsylvania, nor is there to be found any similar provision in her own legislation. It is, however, by virtue of this statute alone, and not by any principle of the common law or provision of earlier statutes, that courts of law in England treat the devise or gift as void, and permit the heir to recover in them. Doe v. Wrighte, 2 Barn. & Ald. 710. I am aware that the judges of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in their report upon the English statutes in force in Pennsylvania, make the following remarks: "There are several statutes called statutes of mortmain, one of which (the statute de religiosis) was passed in the 7th year of Edward I. (statute

[2] This statute enacts (section 1) that no manors, lands, &c., nor money, &c., shall be given, &c., to charitable uses, unless by deed indented and executed before two witnesses, 12 months before the death of the donor, executed with certain formalities, and by § 3, that gifts, &c. "made in any other manner or form . . . shall be absolutely, and to all intents and purposes, null and void."

the 2d); another in the 13th year of Edward I. (chapter 32); another in the 15th year of Richard II. (chapter 5); and another in the 23d year of Henry VIII. (chapter 10). These statutes are, in part, inapplicable to this country, and, in part, applicable and in force. They are so far in force that all conveyances either by deed or will, of lands, tenements or hereditaments made to a body corporate or for the use of a body corporate, are void, unless sanctioned by charter or act of assembly. So also are all such conveyances void made either to an individual or to any number of persons associated but not incorporated, if the said conveyances are for uses or purposes of a superstitious nature, and not calculated to promote objects of charity." 3 Bin. 626.

How far this report may be entitled to consideration as a judicial authority, it is not necessary for me to consider; for the assertion that deeds and wills of land made to a body corporate are void, has long been admitted to be a mistake. Indeed, I fully concur with those who refuse to admit that any of the English statutes of mortmain have, or ever had, any operation in Pennsylvania. They were mere statutes of policy, in contravention of the common law, and were passed to prevent the king and mesne lords from being deprived of their feudal and seignoral rights accruing by prerogative and tenure. Some of them were aimed avowedly at the Roman Catholick religion. Our tenures of land subject them to none of those feudal burthens from which they escape by alienation to a corporation, and which, for this reason, were called alienations in mortmain, or dead hand. Lands held by corporations may, in general, be aliened and taxed as lands held by natural persons are; and the state loses none of her prerogatives over them, except the possible chance of an escheat or collateral inheritance tax. They are, therefore, not properly in mortmain as regards the prerogative of the state as superior lord. And how can the terms "superstitious" be predicated of any religion in this state?, whose constitution acknowledges no church as orthodox, and holds all sects and all religions entitled not merely to toleration, but to equal protection? But it is not necessary for the court here to affirm or to deny any speculative doctrine on this subject. It has been examined with great learning and ability by my predecessor, the late Hon. Henry Baldwin, in his opinion in Magill v. Brown [Case No. 8,952] (the case of Sarah Zane's will), decided in 1833, and more recently by Horace Binney, Esquire, in his argument at Washington, in Vidal v. Philadelphia [Id. 16,939]; both printed in pamphlet form. To those documents I would refer the persons who take an interest in the inquiry.

It is enough for the purposes of the present case that these statutes would not make void a conveyance in mortmain, but only expose the land to forfeiture by the entry of the commonwealth. It is therefore a doctrine well settled in Pennsylvania, that a corporation has a right to purchase, hold and convey lands in this state without a license, until some act is done by the government, according to its own laws, to vest the estate in itself. The fact, therefore, that the license contained in the acts of incorporation limits the income of these corporations to $2,000, cannot affect the present question, as it does not avoid the devise in consequence of its being beyond the limits of the license. The legal estate passes by the gift or devise to the corporation, and is defeasible by the commonwealth alone. Leazure v. Hillegas, 7 Serg. & R. 313; Runnion v. Costar, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 122. The remedy therefore of the plaintiff should be by bill in equity, and not by ejectment. If, on the hearing of the case in equity, the court should be of opinion that the trusts limited on this devise are such as a chancellor would not execute, it will treat the devisees as trustees for the heirs at law or next of kin, and decree a conveyance of the legal estate to them. Judgment accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. July Term, 1829.[2]

GRANTS—VIRGINIA MILITARY DISTRICT — CESSION —SUBSEQUENT PATENT — STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — AGAINST GOVERNMENT — VOID SURVEYS.

1. Subsequently to the cession of the Virginia military district, the state of Virginia had no right to issue a patent for land within it.

2. The statute of limitations does not run against the government, but against a title where the possession is held adversely.

3. The act of 1807 [2 Stat. 424], which prohibits entries from being made on lands which had been surveyed or patented, does not protect void surveys or patents.

[This was an action in ejectment by Thomas B. Miller against Stephen Lindsey and others.]

Mr. Leonard, for plaintiff.

Mr. Caswell, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This ejectment is brought to recover possession of 450 acres of land, within what is called the Virginia military district. The defendants are proved to be in possession of the land claimed by the lessors of the plaintiff. To sustain the plaintiff's right, a patent dated the 1st December, 1824, founded on an entry and survey, is given in evidence. The defendants offered in evidence a patent issued by the commonwealth of Virginia, dated March,

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 666.]

1789, to Richard C. Anderson, for the same land, which the court overruled, on the ground that the state of Virginia, subsequently to the cession of this district of country, had no power to appropriate any part of it, or to give a patent for the same. An entry and survey of the same lands, made in January, 1783, which were duly recorded, were then given in evidence by the defendants, and they offered evidence conducing to prove a possession of more than thirty years.

To do away the effect of this evidence, the plaintiff gave in evidence the warrant on which the defendant's entry and survey were made, with proof tending to prove that the services for which the warrant was granted, were in the Virginia state line, and not in the continental line. Indeed, this appears on the face of the warrant. And the question of law is made to the court, whether an uninterrupted possession of more than twenty-one years, under the circumstances of the case, does not constitute a bar to the plaintiff's right of action. Possession to operate as a bar, must be adverse to the right asserted. The right of the plaintiff in this case, it appears, originated in 1824; so that the adverse possession can only be counted from that time. Less than twenty-one years' possession does not constitute a bar; and it is very clear that the statute cannot run against the government. This district of country was ceded by Virginia to the federal government, for the express purpose of satisfying claims of the Virginia troops, for services on continental establishment; after the good lands in certain other districts, should be exhausted. By the cession, this district was placed under the jurisdiction of congress, subject to the trust specified; and patents for lands within it, emanated from the federal government. But at no time were the lands in the district, subject to appropriation by warrants issued by Virginia for services in her state line.

In an act passed by congress the 2nd March, 1807, to extend the time for locating military warrants in this district, and for other purposes, it is provided, "that no locations within the above mentioned tract, shall, after the passage of that act, be made on tracts of land for which patents had been previously issued, or which had been previously surveyed; and any patent obtained contrary to the provisions of that act, was declared to be null and void." The entry set up by the defendants was made in 1783, and the cession of this district in 1784; so that the entry was prior to the cession. But it is not pretended that at the time this entry was made, the warrant authorized it. Provision was made by Virginia elsewhere for the satisfaction of warrants issued for state services. The act of 1807 was designed to protect irregularities in surveys, but not to give effect to void ones. In the case of Taylor v. Myers, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 23, the court decided that this act did not protect a survey where the entry had been withdrawn. The warrant under which this entry was made gave no authority to the holder to make it. He might as well have assumed the right of making the entry without any warrant. And that a survey unsupported by an entry does not come within the law, is clear, from the case above cited. It appears, therefore, that the defendants cannot legally resist the right of the plaintiffs, under their patent, by pleading the statute of limitations, or under the law of 1807.

The jury found a verdict of guilty against the defendants, on which the court entered a judgment.

This case was taken to the supreme court by a writ of error, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 666.

MILLER v. LONG ISLAND R. CO.

[10 Reporter, 197;[1] 5 Cin. Law Bul. 634.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. July 13, 1880.

RAILROAD—USE OF STEAM — NUISANCE — INJUNCTION — ABUSE OF FRANCHISE — PARTIES TO INJUNCTION — FENCINGS WITH CROSSINGS IN TOWN —PRIVATE INCONVENIENCE.

1. Where a railroad is a lawful structure, and the use of steam is permitted by law, the use of the road and the use of the steam on it, independently of any abuse, is not a public nuisance to be enjoined. Where the abuse, if any, is general and common to all owners of adjacent property, the defendants can be called to account only by the sovereign authority.

2. The fencing of a railroad in a city with gates at the street crossings is a regulation for public safety, and any incidental inconvenience is merged in the superior interest of the public.

Bill in equity. The action was brought to restrain defendant from building a railroad, and fencing the same, on Atlantic avenue, in Brooklyn.

S. Hand, S. Sterne, and G. Thompson, for plaintiff.

B. F. Tracy and E. B. Hinsdale, for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. The railroad in question being a lawful structure, and the use of steam power on it being lawful, the use of the road, and the use of the steam power on it by the defendants, is not and cannot be of itself, independently of any abuse in the manner of use, a public nuisance to be enjoined. If there be any abuse in the use of the road, or of steam power on it, such abuse is, on the evidence, one which affects the plaintiff and his property no differently from the manner in which it affects all owners of property along the avenue. The abuse, if any, is one for which the defendants must and can be called to account, not by the plaintiff, but by the sovereign authority of the state or of the city. Osborn v. Brooklyn

City R. Co. [Case No. 10,597]; Currier v. West Side Elevated R. Co. [Id. 3,493].

The foregoing observations apply equally to the fencing. The use of the road and of steam power on it being lawful, it seems to be proper and necessary that the road should be fenced in with gates at the street crossings. This is a regulation for public safety properly made by the common council under the act of 1876. Any incidental inconvenience from the fencing is merged in the superior interest of the public. COPYRIGHT — PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION — DOUBTS OF VALIDITY—DEFENDANT SOLVENT.

[The court will not grant a preliminary injunction to restrain the publication and circulation of a work claimed to be an infringement of the plaintiff's copyright in a case where there is no reason to believe that the defendant will not be able to meet any damages which might be assessed against him upon final hearing, and also where there are grave doubts as to the validity of the plaintiff's copyright, as well as to the infringement complained of.]

Before HOPKINSON, District Judge.

An action was tried, a few months since, in the courts of Pennsylvania, in which "the commonwealth, at the suggestion of James Todd and others, was plaintiff, and Ashbel Green and others, defendants." [4 Whart. 531.] From the nature of the controversy, the importance of the judgment that might be rendered, and the number and respectability of the persons interested in it, the trial produced an extraordinary excitement. The parties were respectively desirous to have a report of the trial for publication, and persons were accordingly employed by each of them to make a report of the proceedings before the court. These reports were published a short time since, each in an octavo volume, within three or four days of each other. If both are true and faithful, they cannot substantially differ from each other, as they both profess to give an account of the same proceedings. The report made on the part of the defendants was prepared by the complainant in the bill now before this court, Samuel Miller, Jr. Esq.; the other report was made or published by the respondent, Archibald M'Elroy. The bill among other things, prays that an injunction may issue from this court against Archibald M'Elroy, to restrain him from printing, publishing, selling, or otherwise disposing of the parts of his said report, or book, which the complainant charges to be for the most part, very nearly in the same words or of the same purport and effect as certain parts of the work of, or report printed and published by the complainant, who alleges, that it is absolutely impossible that the said parts of the work so published by the said Archibald M'Elroy, should be so nearly in the same words, or of the same purport and effect as the said parts of the complainant's work, if the former had been prepared from original notes, taken by the said Archibald M'Elroy, and had not been copied more or less literally from the latter. The affidavit which accompanies the bill, repeats and affirms these allegations. On the 28th day of last March, the complainant entered in the clerk's office of the district court of the United States, the title of his book, as follows:—"Report of the Presbyterian Church Case. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, ex relatione James Todd and others, v. Ashbel Green and others. By a Member of the Philadelphia Bar." It is agreed that the verdict of the jury was rendered on the 26th of March. At the time when this title page was deposited with the clerk, the book was not printed, nor was the manuscript arranged or prepared for printing and publication, although the materials were in the hands of the complainant, the author and reporter. The publication was not made for several months after, as has been already stated.

In addition to these facts, it appears further, by the bill and affidavit, that some months before the publication of the complainant's book, he had printed several copies of certain parts of it, as a paper book for the use of the counsel, who argued the motion for a new trial, and of the judges, before whom that motion was argued, but that these copies were printed after the complainant had deposited the title of his book in the clerk's office; that these paper books were never published or exposed to sale by the complainant, or by any one on his account, or by his permission or order; but that such publication and sale were by him strictly prohibited. It is further stated, or agreed, that the whole of the contents of the volume or book of the complainant, with those parts of it now charged to have been taken from him by the respondent, were printed and published in a certain weekly paper, printed and published in the city of Philadelphia, by William S. Martien, entitled the "Presbyterian," in eleven successive numbers, by the verbal permission of the complainant; which publication was also made after the title of the book had been deposited in the clerk's office, but a considerable time before the printing and publishing of the book. The bill and affidavit allege that the parts of the work of the respondent complained of were taken from the said paper books, and from the said newspaper. No allegation is made that any parts of the said book or report of the respondent were taken or copied from the book of the complainant, the title page of which he had deposited in the clerk's office, nor that the said book was in any manner used by the respondent in making his report. Indeed it could not be so, as the two books were published almost simultaneously. The complaint is distinctly, that the parts of the respondent's report, which are claimed to be the work and property of the complainant, were taken from certain paper books he had printed for the purposes mentioned, and from certain public newspapers, in which his report had been published with his consent.

Putting, for the present, the paper books printed for a special purpose, and in some degree confidential, out of the case, the publication by the complainant of his work in a newspaper, for which there was no copyright, circulated probably in every state of the Union, and was the property of every one who paid for it, presents some very important, and, as I believe, novel questions. I presume they are so, as neither the industry of the counsel concerned in the argument, which has been conspicuous, nor my own research, has found any judicial answers to them. They are these: 1st. Whether an author, who gives his work to the public by printing and publishing it in a public paper, not protected by any copyright, can have such a right in the same work, by afterwards publishing it in a different form, as in a volume or book. 2d. Whether an author, by depositing in the clerk's office a title page, when the work it is intended for was not then printed, nor written, nor the manuscript prepared for printing and publication, although the notes or materials were in the hands of the author, from which the work or book was to be, and afterwards actually was composed, may have a copyright of the work, so afterwards prepared and composed, by affixing to it the title page so deposited? Lastly, which seems to me to press clearly upon this case—3d. Supposing the two points mentioned to be answered affirmatively in favour of the author, and that a book so secured, by depositing the title page as aforesaid, is protected from violation, and that no man can re-print and publish it, or any part of it, without the permission of the author; yet the question remains, whether one can be charged with an infringement upon this right, if he has, in fact, never seen or copied from the book so entered and secured—or in any manner used it in his publication, but has re-printed the same matter, in part or in whole, from a public newspaper in which he found it, where the author had himself published it, and in which paper neither the author nor any other had any copyright? 4th. Whether the notice given in some of the papers of the copyright, as stated in the affidavit, can help the complainant?

These are grave questions, not to be decided on a preliminary inquiry and argument; but to be left without prejudice, to the full and final hearing of the case. If, on that hearing, the complainant shall sustain his case and complaint, he will recover a judgment to compensate him for the wrong he has suffered, and I have no reason to believe, that the respondent will not be able to answer it. In the case of Ogle v. Ege [Case No. 10,462], on a prayer for an injunction, Judge Washington says: "If there appear a reasonable doubt as to the plaintiff's right, or the validity of his patent, the court will require the plaintiff to try his title at law."

Other questions were raised on this argument, such as, that the title of the book is not the same with that deposited in the office; and that the affidavit in charging the infringement is not direct but argumentative, which it is unnecessary for me to notice at this time. It is my desire and intention to keep myself free and open upon all the points that may hereafter be presented to my judgment in the case. Were I to grant the injunction, I should decide the questions I have stated, as well as others, affirmatively for the complainant. I am not now prepared to do this, whatever may be my opinion hereafter. The parties will come to the final hearing on their respective rights, without prejudication of any of them. The injunction is refused.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—EQUITY — BAR TO EQUITABLE TITLE—AMENDMENT TO BILL—RELATION BACK—EFFECT OF.

1. An amendment of a bill generally, relates to the time of filing the bill. But where a new title is introduced by the amendment, affecting the interests of new parties, no relation can withdraw such title from the statute of limitations.

[Cited in Buel v. St. Louis Transfer Co., 45 Mo. 562.]

2. The amendment in such case, or where a question of notice arises, can only have the effect of an original bill.

[Cited in School Town of Monticello v. Grant, 104 Ind. 170, 1 N. E. 302.]

3. At law the statute is applied only against a grant—in equity it operates to bar an equitable title, by analogy to a case at law.

[Cited in Munson v. Hallowell, 26 Tex. 475.]

[This was a suit by Henry Miller's heirs and devisees against Jacob McIntire and Isaac McIntire for the possession of certain real estate.]

Mr. Richardson, for complainants.

Mr. Haggin, for defendants.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

[2] [Affirmed in 6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 62.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The bill was filed in May, 1808, which represented that on the 10th of December, 1782, Henry Miller the ancestor of the complainants, made an entry of 1687 acres of land; which was surveyed the 9th of April, 1804, and patented 12th July, 1820. That the defendants were in possession, and the bill prays they may be compelled to disclose their title and surrender the possession. The bill was amended in June, 1815, by stating that on the 19th June, 1780, an entry of one thousand acres of land was made by Nicholas McIntire on the waters of Licking, &c., which was surveyed contrary to location, and for which a patent was obtained of elder date than the complainants'. That Nicholas McIntire devised the land to his sons Isaac and Jacob, and that Isaac conveyed to John McIntire who is made a defendant. Several others are also made defendants. In his answer Jacob McIntire admits the entry set up in the amended bill, and he states that the entry was amended the 14th December, 1782, and by this amendment it was made to interfere with the complainants' entry. John McIntire states in his answer that he holds the title bond of Nicholas McIntire for a moiety of the land, and that a deed was executed to him for the same by Isaac McIntire, which had never been recorded. He pleads an adverse possession of more than twenty years, in bar of the complainants' right. The complainants' title was fully sustained by the decree of the supreme court in 1826, the respondents therefore exclusively rely on their possession under the statute. Until the defendants were made parties to the suit, by the amended bill, the statute would continue to run in their favor. An amendment of the bill will, generally, have relation to the time of filing the bill; but this can never be the case, where the amendment sets up a title not asserted before; and a question under the statute of limitations or as to notice is involved. From the evidence it appears that more than twenty-six years elapsed, from the time adverse possession was taken by the defendants, until suit was commenced. The Virginia statute of twenty years' limitation, and ten years after the decease of the ancestor, was in 1792 adopted by Kentucky on the adoption of her constitution; and it was provided that the statute having begun to run before the change of government, should continue to operate, as though no change had taken place. An objection is made that the statute does not run against an equitable title; and that it cannot bar the complainants' right, as they did not obtain their patent until 1820. The decisions in 2 Mar. 570, 1 Mar. 53, 506, and 3 Mar. 146, are referred to as sustaining this position. At law the statute is not applied as a bar, except as against a grant, but this is not the rule in equity. The chancellor, by analogy to the statute, will give effect to it, as against an equitable right, where under the same circumstances it would operate against a grant. As more than ten years elapsed from the decease of the complainants' ancestor, at which time there was adverse possession, until the commencement of this suit, the complainants are clearly barred. And under the twenty years' limitation they are also barred; the bill of the complainants must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

This case was appealed to the supreme court, which affirmed the decree. 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 62.

Case No. 9,583.

MILLER v. McQUERRY.

[5 McLean, 469; [1] 10 West. Law J. 528.]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Sept., 1853.

SLAVERY—HOW CREATED—HOW RECOGNIZED—FUGITIVE SLAVES—RECLAMATION—HOW PROVIDED FOR—TRIAL BY JURY—PRESUMPTIONS.

1. Slavery is a municipal regulation; is local; and can not exist without the authority of law. But it need not be shown that it is created by express enactment. It may arise from long recognized rights, countervened by no legislative action. African slavery is thus recognized in Kentucky, and the judges of the supreme court of the United States, whose jurisdiction is co-extensive with the country, are bound to take judicial notice of its existence in those states where it prevails.

2. The constitution of the United States did not leave the enforcement of the provisions for the reclamation of slaves with the states. It vested that power in the government of the United States. This doctrine was affirmed by the supreme court of the United States in Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, has been denied by no respectable state court, and has been sustained by the action of the legislative department of the government.

3. In proceedings, under the fugitive slave law, the inquiry is not strictly whether the fugitive be a slave, or a freeman, but whether he owe service to the claimant. The decision, upon that question, is no bar to an inquiry in the proper tribunal, as to the personal status of the fugitive. The examination is preliminary, and not a final adjudication.

4. The seventh amendment to the constitution, preserving the right of trial by jury in all suits at common law, where the value in controversy exceeds twenty dollars, does not apply to an examination as to the claim for services under this law. Such an examination is not a proceeding at common law, but a statutory one.

5. The presumption of freedom attaches to every resident of a free state, without regard to color; and on the same principle, in a slave state, every colored man is presumed to be a slave.

6. It is not necessary, under the act of 1850 [9 Stat. 462], to produce the record showing the status of the fugitive in another state. The fact that he owes service may be established by other, and oral testimony.

Mr. Ware, for claimant.

Messrs. Joliffe and Birney, for fugitive.

OPINION OF THE COURT. An affidavit being made on the 16th day of August, 1853, that George McQuerry was illegally imprisoned, he was brought before McLEAN, Circuit Justice, that the cause of his detention might be inquired into. The plaintiff, as above stated, objected to the discharge of McQuerry, on the ground that he was held by him as a fugitive from labor. After the evidence was heard, and the facts relied on by defendant's counsel were admitted by the plaintiff; and after the counsel on both sides had argued the facts, and the law of the case, the judge proceeded to give his opinion.

After stating how the cause came before him, he observed, "The right of the claimant to the services of the defendant is the first point to be examined. If the claim as made has been proved, then the detention is not illegal."

Jacob Miller, the son of the claimant, was first examined. He is twenty-one years of age. His father resides in Washington county, Kentucky. He has known the fugitive ever since he can remember, as the slave of his father. A little more than four years ago, he absconded from the service of his father, in company with three others, who were also the slaves of his father. The mother of the fugitive came to his father through the mother of the witness. The fugitives were advertised shortly after they absconded, and a reward of four hundred dollars was offered for their return. They were pursued by different persons, but were not overtaken. One of them was arrested, at Louisville, and returned, but shortly after he again absconded. When Wash., as the fugitive was generally called, was lately arrested, at Troy, in Ohio, he said nothing about being free, but observed that he had no intention to run off an hour before he started; that he was persuaded to do so by Steve, one of the individuals who accompanied him.

William Kelly—Is twenty-three years old, lives in the same county of Washington, within two and a half miles of the claimant, and for nine or ten years has known Wash. to be the servant of the claimant. He lived with the complainant as his other slaves, and was subject to his control. He ran away from his master better than four years ago. Was present when Wash. was arrested near Troy a day or two ago. Wash., at first, did not recognize him, but did so after a little conversation. He told the witness that he was sorry he left Kentucky; did not intend to go an hour before he left, and that he was persuaded to leave by Steve.

James Kelly—Aged twenty-eight years; is brother of the above witness. Has known Wash. eleven years as the slave of the claimant. He corroborates the statements of the preceding witness as to the absconding of Wash., that he was advertised, admitted the right of his master, as stated by the other witnesses.

Isaiah Yoker—Lives in the same county, has known Wash. as the slave of the complainant twelve or thirteen years. He corroborates the other statements made by the witnesses examined before him.

Mr. Trader—Is a deputy marshal, and resides at Dayton. He arrested the fugitive, who said that the claimant was his master, and that he had always been well treated.

Mr. Black—Is also a deputy marshal. He heard Wash. say that the claimant was his master, and that he had been well treated. That he had been persuaded to run away.

As a matter against the right of the claimant it is admitted, that the defendant has resided four years in Ohio, and conducted himself well, being considered as a free man.

From the facts proved, there can be no doubt that the fugitive, under the laws of Kentucky, is the slave of the claimant, and that he absconded from his service a little more than four years ago. The testimony is clear on this point. No attempt has been made to controvert the facts, or to impeach the credibility of the witnesses. Of the many cases my judicial duties have required me to examine, where damages were claimed for aiding the escape of fugitives from labor, no case has been proved with more distinctness and fullness than this one. No one capable of comprehending evidence can doubt, that the fugitive lived with the claimant, as his slave, for many years, and that he left that service, without the leave of his master, several years ago.

No proof, it is contended, has been offered to show that Kentucky is a state in which slavery is authorized by law. And a discussion in the senate of the United States is referred to, in which certain senators declared that there was no law in the South expressly establishing slavery. It is with regret that I hear this argument relied on in this case. It was used by gentlemen of the South, to justify the introduction of slavery into our territories, without the authority of law. In Groves v. Slaughter, a Mississippi case, reported in 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 450, the supreme court of the United States declared, that slavery was local, and that it could not exist without the authority of law. That it was a municipal regulation. Whether this law was founded upon usage, or express enactment, is of no importance. Usage of long continuance, so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, has the force of law. It arises from long recognized rights, countervened by no legislative action. This is the source of many of the principles of the common law. And this for a century or more may constitute slavery, though it be opposed, as it is, to all the principles of the common law of England. I speak of African slavery. But such a law can only acquire potency by long usage. Now it may be admitted that in some of the Southern states, perhaps in all of them, there can not be found a statute which contains the words, "And be it enacted that slavery shall exist;" and this was what was denied in the senate. But this does not shake the decision of the supreme court, above referred to. Usage, of great antiquity, acquires the force of law. The denial, therefore, that slavery existed by virtue of an express law, or by statute law, which was intended to be denied, was no denial at all. But no usage can acquire the force of law, except it has been long recognized as the basis of action, and as the principle on which the rights of property are maintained.

There is no slave state, where the existence of slavery is not recognized and maintained, by numerous statutes and judicial decisions. The statute books of the South are full of such enactments. The relation of master and slave is fully recognized, and, to some extent, regulated. The decision of the supreme court above referred to settles a most important principle. And I have no regrets that I was the means of inducing that decision. It gives the proper limitation to slavery. It can not be extended beyond the jurisdiction of the states sanctioning it, and can not, legally, be affected by the legislative action of any free state. The principle, I believe, was sanctioned by the southern states, and was not controverted by any non-slaveholding state. On the question of slavery in our territories, this doctrine was first departed from. The supreme court has long since held that that court and its judges recognize, without proof, the laws of the several states and territories. The jurisdiction of that court, and of its members, extends throughout the Union. In the respective states they administer the local laws, so that the laws of the states come under their special cognizance in acting upon individual rights. Kentucky is a slave state. Except in regard to land titles, no other subject has been more productive of legal controversy than contracts arising out of slavery.

It is contended that the law authorizing the reclamation of fugitives from labor is unconstitutional. That the constitution left the power with the states, and vested no power on the subject in the federal government. This argument has been sometimes advanced, and it may have been introduced into one or more political platforms. In regard to the soundness of this position, I will first refer to judicial decisions. In the case of Prigg v. State of Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 539, the judges of the supreme court of the United States, without a dissenting voice, affirmed the doctrine, that this power was in the federal government. A majority of them held that it was exclusively in the general government. Some of the judges thought that a state might legislate in aid of the act of congress, but it was held by no one of them, that the power could be exercised by a state, except in subordination of the federal power. Every state court which has decided the question, has decided it in accordance with the view of the supreme court. No respectable court, it is believed, has sustained the view that the power is with the state. Such an array of authority can scarcely be found in favor of the construction of any part of the constitution, which has ever been doubted. But this construction, sanctioned as it is by the entire judicial power, state as well as federal, has also the sanction of the legislative power.

The constitution of the United States, it will be observed, was formed in 1787. Afterwards it was submitted to the respective states for their ratification. The subject was not only largely discussed in the federal convention, but also in every state convention. No question has ever arisen, in regard to our federal relations, which was of equal importance to that of the adoption of the constitution; none in our political history was more thoroughly discussed. The men of that day may be emphatically said to have understood the constitution. In a very few years after the constitution was adopted by the states, the fugitive act of 1793 [1 Stat. 302] was passed. That law is still in force, except where the act of 1850 contains repugnant provisions. In the congress which enacted the act of 1793, it is believed, that some of the members had been members of the convention. They could not have been ignorant of the provision of that instrument. And by the passage of that act they exercised the power, as one that belonged to the federal government. Here is a force of authority, judicial and legislative, which can not be found on any other seriously litigated point in the constitution. Such a weight of authority is not to be shaken. If the question is not to be considered authoritatively settled, what part of that instrument can ever be settled? The surrender of fugitive slaves was a matter deeply interesting to the slave states. Under the confederation there was no provision for their surrender. On the principles of comity amongst the states the fugitives were delivered up; at other times they were protected and defended. This state of things produced uneasiness and discontent in the slave states. A remedy of this evil, as it was called, was provided in the constitution.

An individual who puts his opinion, as to the exercise of this power, against the authority of the nation in its legislative and judicial action, must have no small degree of confidence in his own judgment. A few individuals in Massachusetts may have maintained, at one time, that the power was with the states; but such views were, it is believed, long since abandoned, but they are reasserted now, more as a matter of expediency than of principle. But whether we look at the weight of authority against state power as asserted, or at the constitutional provision, we are led to the same result. The provision reads: "No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor; but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service may be due." This, in the first place, is a federal measure. It was adopted by the national convention, and was sanctioned as a federal law, by the respective states. It is the supreme law of the land. Now a provision which can not be enforced, and which has no penalty for its violation, is no law. The highly respectable gentleman who read an ingenious argument in support of these views, is too good a theologian to contend that any rule of action which may be disregarded without incurring a penalty, can be law. It may be a recommendation, but it can not be a law. This was the great objection to the articles of confederation. There was no power to enforce their provisions. They were recommendatory, and without sanctions. There is no regulation, Divine or human, which can be called a law, without a sanction. Our first parents, in the garden, felt the truth of this. And it has been felt by violators of the Divine or human laws throughout the history of our race.

The provision in the constitution is prohibitory and positive. It prohibits the states from liberating slaves which escape into them, and it enjoins a duty to deliver up such fugitives on claim being made. The constitution vests no special power in congress to prohibit the first, or to enforce the observance of the second. Does it, therefore, follow that effect can be given to neither, if a state shall disregard it? Suppose a state declares a slave who escapes into it shall be liberated, or that any one who shall assist in delivering him up shall be punished. If this power belongs to the states, and not to the federal government, these regulations would be legal, as within the exercise of their discretion. This is not an ideal case. The principle was involved in the Prigg Case, and the supreme court held the act of the state unconstitutional and void. It is admitted that there is no power in the federal government to force any legislative action on a state. But, if the constitution guarantees a right to the master of a slave, and that he shall be delivered up, the power is given to effectuate that right. If this be not so, the constitution is not what its framers supposed it to be. It was believed to be a fundamental law of the Union. A federal law. A law to the states and to the people of the states. It says that the states shall not do certain things. Is this the form of giving advice or recommendation? It is the language of authority, to those who are bound to obey. If a state do the thing forbidden, its act will be declared void. If it refuse to do that which is enjoined, the federal government, being a government, has the means of executing it. The constitution provides, "that full faith shall be given to public acts, records, and judicial proceedings," of one state in every other. If an individual claims this provision as a right, and a state court shall deny it, on a writ of error to the supreme court of the Union, such judgment would be reversed. And the provision is that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Congress unquestionably may provide in what manner a right claimed under this clause, and denied by a state, may be enforced. And if a case can be raised under it, without any further statutory provisions, so as to present the point to the supreme court, the decision of a state court, denying the right, would be reversed. So a state is prohibited from passing a law that shall impair the obligations of a contract. Such a law the supreme court has declared void. In these cases, and in many others, where a state is prohibited from doing a thing, the remedy is given by a writ of error, under the legislation of congress. The same principle applies in regard to fugitives from labor.

A fugitive from justice may be delivered up under a similar provision in the constitution. It declares that, "a person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime." This is contained in the same section as the clause in relation to fugitives from labor, and they both stand upon the same principle. In both cases congress has provided a mode in which effect shall be given to the provision. No one, it is believed, has doubted the constitutionality of the provision in regard to fugitives from justice. The men who framed the constitution, were adequate to the great duties which devolved upon them. They knew that a general government was essential to preserve the fruits of the Revolution. They understood the necessities of the country. The articles of confederation had been found as a rope of sand, in all matters of conflict between the different states, and the people of the different states. Without a general government, commerce could not be regulated among the states, or with foreign nations; fugitives from labor could not be reclaimed; state boundaries could not be authoritatively established. I am aware it has been stated, that the subject of slavery was not discussed in the convention, and that the reclamation of fugitives from labor was not, at that time, a subject of much interest. This is a mistake. It was a subject of deep and exciting interest, and without a provision on the subject no constitution could have been adopted. I speak from information received from the late Chief Justice Marshall, who was one of the chief actors in that day, than whom no man then living was of higher authority. The want of a general regulation on the subject of fugitives from justice and from labor was felt, and the above provisions in the constitution were intended as a remedy. It has proved to be an adequate remedy as against fugitives from justice. In no instance, it is believed, has the constitutionality of this provision been doubted. But the provision in relation to fugitives from labor, resting upon the same principle, is now opposed. If the introduction of this provision into the fundamental law of the Union, was not intended to operate as the law of the Union—if it was recommendatory in its character only—it was useless. The power to surrender fugitives from labor, under the confederacy, was with each state. It could be done, or refused, at the discretion of the state. Did the framers of the constitution intend to leave this matter as it was under the confederation? The provision introduced shows an intention to make some provision on the subject. But by the argument, it is said, the provision made left the power with the states, and did not vest it in the general government. The answer to this is, it was in the states before the provision, and on this view, it added nothing to the power of the states. If such be the true construction of the provision, it fixes an act of consummate folly on the framers of the constitution, and on the members of the state conventions who adopted it. In laying the foundation of a general government, they incorporated into the fundamental law a useless provision, and omitted to provide for an emergency which was felt and complained of in one half of the states. The men of that day were not likely to be guilty of such an omission. They understood the federal and state powers too well, not to know that without some effective provision on this subject, the superstructure which they were about to rear would soon be overthrown. These were the circumstances under which the constitution was framed and adopted. With the abstract principles of slavery, courts called to administer this law have nothing to do. It is for the people, who are sovereign, and their representatives, in making constitutions, and in the enactment of laws, to consider the laws of nature, and the immutable principles of right. This is a field which judges can not explore. Their action is limited to conventional rights. They look to the law, and to the law only. A disregard of this, by the judicial powers, would undermine and overturn the social compact. If the law be injudicious or oppressive, let it be repealed or modified. But this is a power which the judiciary can not reach.

The citizen of a slave state has a right, under the constitution and laws of the Union, to have the fugitive slave "delivered up on claim being made," and no state can defeat or obstruct this constitutional right. The judiciary power of the Union has the primary or eventual power to determine all rights arising under the constitution. This will not be controverted by any legal mind, which has properly investigated the great principles of the constitution. And the question now made is not, in principle, different from a numerous class of cases arising under powers prohibited to the states. The worthy and estimable gentlemen who read an argument on this occasion, in commenting on the cases covered by the fugitive law, embraced all cases of contract, and even that between a minister and his congregation. He supposes if the minister should leave his congregation before his stipulated engagement had transpired; that he was liable to be arrested and returned to his congregation under the fugitive law. This is a case, under this law, which no one before has supposed to be embraced by it. And if the law did cover such a case, it would be the most difficult to carry out of any other which has been imagined. If the minister could be returned, neither the court nor the congregation could compel him to preach. No profession or class of men would be less likely to do anything on compulsion. But the law applies to no case of contract. Where the parties to the agreement are capable of making a contract, the remedy for a breach of it is by action at law. In the case of slaves and of apprentices, there is no remedy against the individual who absconds, by an action.

Various objections are stated to the fugitive slave law of 1850. The duties of the commissioners, the penalties inflicted, the bribe secured to the commissioner, for remanding the fugitive, are all objected to as oppressive and unconstitutional. In regard to the five dollars, in addition, paid to the commissioner, where the fugitive is remanded to the claimant, in all fairness, it can not be considered as a bribe, or as so intended by congress; but as a compensation to the commissioner for making a statement of the case, which includes the facts proved, and to which his certificate is annexed. In cases where the witnesses are numerous, and the investigation takes up several days, five dollars would scarcely be a compensation for the statement required. Where the fugitive is discharged, no statement is necessary. The powers of the commissioner, or the amount of the penalties of the act, are not involved in this inquiry. If there be an unconstitutional provision in an act, that does not affect any other part of the act. But I by no means intimate that any part of the act referred to is in conflict with the constitution. I only say that the objections made to it do not belong to the case under consideration.

The act of 1850, except by repugnant provisions, did not repeal the act of 1793. The objection that no jury is given does apply to both acts. From my experience in trying numerous actions for damages against persons who obstructed an arrest of fugitives from labor, or aided in their escape, I am authorized to say, that the rights of the master would be safe before a jury. I recollect an instance where a strong anti-slavery man, called an Abolitionist, was on the jury in a case for damages, but who, being sworn to find as the evidence and the law required, agreed to a verdict for the plaintiff. He rightly determined that his own opinions could not govern him in deciding a controversy between parties, but that under his oath he was bound by the law and the evidence of the case. It was in the power of congress to give a jury in cases like the present, but the law contains no such provision, and the question raised is, whether the act without it is constitutional. This question has been largely discussed in congress, in the public press, and in conventions of the people. It is not here raised as a question of expediency or policy, but of power. In that aspect only is it to be considered. The act of 1793 has been in operation about sixty years. During that whole time it has been executed as occasion required, and it is not known that any court, judge, or other officer has held the act, in this, or in any other respect, unconstitutional. This long course of decisions, on a question so exciting as to call forth the sympathies of the people, and the astuteness of lawyers, is no unsatisfactory evidence that the construction is correct.

Under the constitution and act of congress, the inquiry is not strictly whether the fugitive be a slave or a freeman, but whether he owe service to the claimant. This would be the precise question in the case of an apprentice. In such a case the inquiry would not be, whether the master had treated the apprentice so badly as to entitle him to his discharge. Such a question would, more probably, arise under the indenture of apprenticeship, and the laws under which it was executed. And if the apprentice be remanded to the service of his master, it would in no respect affect his right to a discharge, where he is held, for the cruelty of his master or any other ground. The same principle applies to fugitives from labor. It is true in such cases evidence is heard that he is a freeman. His freedom may be established, by acts done or suffered by his master, not necessarily within the jurisdiction where he is held as a slave. Such an inquiry may be made, as it is required by the justice of the case. But on whatever ground the fugitive may be remanded, it can not, legally, operate against his right to liberty. That right when presented to a court in a slave state, has, generally, been acted upon with fairness and impartiality. Exceptions to this, if there be exceptions, would seem to have arisen on the claims of heirs or creditors, which are governed by local laws, with which the people of the other states are not presumed to be acquainted. If a fugitive from labor, after being liberated by a judge or commissioner, should voluntarily return to his master, southern courts have held that his original status would attach to him; he would be held as a slave. And, of course, the decision of the judge or commissioner, having been that he did not owe service to the claimant, could not operate as a bar to the rights of the master. The claim to freedom, if made, in the slave state, would be unaffected by the preliminary inquiry and decision. That decision is, that the slave does, or does not, owe service to the claimant. It does not finally establish the fact, whether the fugitive is a freeman or a slave. If the decision on such an inquiry as this, should finally fix the seal of slavery on the fugitive, I should hesitate long, notwithstanding the weight of precedent, without the aid of a jury, to pronounce his fate. But the inquiry is preliminary, and not final. It is true, it may be said, that the power of the master may be so exercised as to defeat a trial for the freedom of the fugitive. This must be admitted, but the hardship and injustice supposed arises out of the institution of slavery, over which we have no control. Under such circumstances, we can not be held answerable.

It may be said that the seventh article in the amended constitution which gives a trial by jury, "where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars," does not apply to a case like this. The provision is, "in suits at common law." This is not strictly a proceeding at common law. The common law is opposed to the principle of slavery. The proceeding is under constitutional and statutory provisions, under the forms specially provided, and not according to the course of the common law.

This is represented to be an ex parte proceeding. It does not bear this character. Had it been represented to me, that the fugitive could produce evidence conducing to prove that he did not owe service to the claimant, time would have been given to procure the evidence. The only allegation, as to what the counsel expected to prove by absent witnesses, was, that the fugitive had resided in Indiana and Ohio four years, and that he was esteemed and considered a freeman. This the counsel for the claimant admitted, and as no further allegation of evidence was alleged to be in the power of the party, of course there was no ground for a postponement. The presumption of freedom attaches to every resident of a free state, without regard to color; and, on the same principle in a slave state, every colored man is presumed to be a slave. But this presumption, in this case, is counteracted by the facts proved.

It is argued, that the evidence is defective, as the record showing the status of the fugitive, as authorized by the act of 1850, is not produced. Such record is not necessary to establish the right of the claimant. If it were produced, the identity of the fugitive would still be an open question. On the question of identity, anything which conduced to prove that the person described in the judgment was not the one before the judge or commissioner, would be admissible.

I am gratified with the gentlemanly bearing and courtesy with which this argument has been conducted. It was due to the occasion and the circumstances. No other course was expected.

Upon the whole, no doubt can exist on the evidence, that the fugitive owes service to the claimant; and, under the law, I am bound to remand him to the custody of his master, with authority to take him to the state of Kentucky, the place from whence he fled.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 471.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1807.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—AUTHORITY TO INDORSE—EVIDENCE—PRODUCTION OF WRITTEN AUTHORITY.

In an action by the indorsee of a promissory note against the maker, the plaintiff need not produce written evidence of the authority of the indorser's agent to indorse.

Debt on a promissory note, made by Moore to W. T. Alexander, or order, for value received, negotiable in the Bank of Alexandria; indorsed, "Pay to Richard and Stephen Winchester, or order"—signed, "William T. Alexander, by his attorney in fact, John T. Wellford"—and "Pay Mordecai Miller," signed, "R. & S. Winchester."

Mr. Swann, for defendant, contended that the plaintiff must show a written authority from W. T. Alexander to John T. Wellford, to indorse and transfer the note.

But THE COURT permitted parol (viva voce) testimony to be offered, to show that Wellford was an agent for Alexander, and that he had been accustomed to indorse the name of Alexander on notes, and that Alexander had sanctioned such indorsements.

MILLER v. NEW YORK et al.

[13 Blatchf. 469.] [2]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Aug. 4, 1876.

BRIDGES — OBSTRUCTION TO NAVIGATION— VIOLATION OF LAW—REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

1. A citizen of New York brought suit in this court against the municipal corporations of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and certain individual citizens of New York, to restrain the building of a bridge in New York across the East river, a navigable river, on the ground that it would be a public nuisance: Held, that this court had no jurisdiction of the suit, so far as any question of a violation of the law of New York was concerned, but that it could take jurisdiction to enquire whether the bridge was being so built as to violate the constitution or laws of the United States.

2. The history of the legislation of New York and of the United States, in regard to such bridge, reviewed.

3. Under such legislation of the United States, if the bridge is constructed in conformity with the requirements of law, it follows that the navigation of the river will not thereby, in contemplation of law, be obstructed, or impaired or injuriously modified.

4. Congress had power to authorize, as a regulation of commerce, the building of the bridge in the prescribed manner.

[Cited in People v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 482.]

5. It appearing that the bridge was being constructed according to the requirements of the legislation of congress, and that the state of New York had, by subsequent legislation, sanctioned its being constructed in such manner, an injunction to restrain its erection, as a public nuisance, was refused.

[6. Cited in Walsh v. Trustees of New York & Brooklyn Bridge, 96 N. Y. 438, to the point that the "Trustees of the New York and Brooklyn Bridge" are not a corporation, and, as such, necessary parties to the suit.]

[This was a bill by Abraham B. Miller against the mayor, aldermen, and commonalty of the city of New York, city of Brooklyn, and others, for a preliminary injunction to restrain the erection of a bridge over the East river, between New York and Brooklyn.]

William H. Arnoux, for plaintiff.

Charles H. Tweed and Edgar M. Cullen, for defendants.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff in this suit is a citizen of the state of New York, and the defendants are the municipal corporations of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and also certain individual citizens of the state. This court, therefore, derives no jurisdiction from the citizenship of the parties, for it is, in general, only when there is a controversy between citizens of different states that jurisdiction is conferred upon the ground of the citizenship of the parties. We must look, therefore, to the subject-matter of the suit, to sustain the jurisdiction. The circuit courts of the United States have original cognizance, concurrent with the courts of the several states, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, arising under the constitution or laws of the United States, or treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority. Act March 3, 1875, § 1 (18 Stat. 470).

The claim of the plaintiff is, that the proposed bridge over the East river, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, will be a public nuisance, from which he will suffer a particular private injury, other than the common injury which every citizen suffers from a public nuisance. Now, if the bridge will be a public nuisance, it must be because it will violate the law of New York or that of the United States. For a violation of the law of New York the plaintiff cannot come into this court. He and the defendants are citizens of New York, and he must seek his remedy from the justice of that state. Jurisdiction in that behalf between citizens of the same state is not conferred upon the circuit courts of the United States. In Milnor v.

[2] [Reported by Hon Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

New Jersey R. Co. [Case No. 9,620], Mr. Justice Grier, giving judgment in the circuit court for the district of New Jersey, said: "The complainants in these bills, in order to show jurisdiction in the court, have stated themselves to be citizens of the state of New York. Their right to a remedy in the courts of the United States is not asserted on account of the subject-matter of the controversy, but they rest upon their personal right, as citizens of another state, to sue in this tribunal. It is plain, by their own showing, that they can demand no other remedy from this court than would be administered by the tribunals of the state of New Jersey, in a suit between her own citizens. A citizen of New York who purchases wharves in Newark has no greater right than the citizen of New Jersey." In the case now before this court, a citizen of New York sues corporations and citizens of New York. That alone does not make a case of jurisdiction in this court, nor would the jurisdictional difficulty be avoided by the existence of a cause of action for a violation of the law of New York. On neither ground, nor on both combined, can this court entertain jurisdiction. Just as diversity of citizenship, in the case before Judge Grier, required him to administer the law of New Jersey between the parties in that suit, so, identity of citizenship in this case excludes a violation of the law of New York from being the subject of redress in this court between these parties. Here, the subject-matter of the suit alone gives jurisdiction, and it must, in its exercise, be confined to that subject-matter.

The inquiry is, therefore, whether, by the constitution or laws of the United States, the bridge in question will be a public nuisance and specially injurious to the plaintiff. If, upon inquiry, it shall be found that the bridge in question is being built in conformity with, and not in violation of, the constitution and laws of the United States, then no court of the United States can regard it as a public nuisance, nor undertake by injunction to interfere with its construction.

The congress has legislated directly upon the subject of this bridge, and in that law has referred to the previous legislation of New York. It will, therefore, be most convenient to state, in their chronological order, the laws of the state and of the United States relating to the building of the bridge.

Chapter 399, p. 948, of the Laws of New York, passed April 16th, 1867, created a corporation by the name of The New York Bridge Company, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a permanent bridge over the East river, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn. To this corporation power was given to acquire and hold so much real estate as might be necessary for the site of the bridge, and of all piers, abutments, walls, toll houses, and other structures proper to said bridge, and for the opening of suitable avenues of approach of said bridge, but not any land under water, in the river, beyond the pier lines established by law. By the 10th section, it was further enacted, that the bridge should not be at a less elevation than one hundred and thirty feet above high tide at the middle of the river; that it should not obstruct any street which it should cross, but that such street should be spanned by a suitable arch or suspended platform as should give a suitable height for the passage under the same for all purposes of public travel or transportation; that no street running in the line of the bridge should be closed without full compensation to the owners of land fronting on the same, for all damages they might sustain; that the bridge should commence at or near the junction of Main and Fulton streets, in Brooklyn, and should be so constructed as to cross the river as directly as possible to some point at or below Chatham Square, in the city of New York, not south of the junction of Nassau and Chatham streets; and that it should be built with a substantial railing or siding, and should be kept fully lighted through all hours of the night. This section was prefaced with a provision in these words: "Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to authorize, nor shall it authorize, the construction of any bridge which shall obstruct the free and common navigation of the East river, or the construction of any pier in the said river, beyond the pier lines established by law." It will be observed, that this is not a prohibition of the obstruction of navigation. Appropriate language of prohibition is found immediately below—"it shall not obstruct any street which it shall cross." This provision is limited to enacting that the statute shall not be taken to authorize the obstruction of navigation.

This act was followed, in 1869, by chapter 26 of the Laws of that year (page 15), passed February 20th, by which, after providing for the representation of the two cities of New York and Brooklyn, in the board of directors of the bridge company, it was enacted that the company should proceed without delay to construct the bridge.

In the same year, an act of congress was passed, approved March 3, 1869 (15 Stat. 336), which enacted (section 1) that "the bridge across the East river, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, in the state of New York, to be constructed under and by virtue of an act of the legislature of the state of New York, entitled, 'An act to incorporate the New York Bridge Company, for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a bridge over the East river, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn,' passed April 16th, 1867, is hereby declared to be, when completed in accordance with the aforesaid law of the state of New York, a lawful structure and post road for the conveyance of the mails of the United States: provided, that the said bridge shall be so constructed and built as not to obstruct, impair or injuriously modify, the navigation of the river; and, in order to secure a compliance with these conditions, the company, previous to commencing the construction of the bridge, shall submit to the secretary of war a plan of the bridge, with a detailed map of the river at the proposed site of the bridge, and for the distance of a mile above and below the site, exhibiting the depths and currents at all points of the same, together with all other information touching said bridge and river, as may be deemed requisite by the secretary of war to determine whether the said bridge, when built, will conform to the prescribed conditions of the act, not to obstruct, impair or injuriously modify, the navigation of the river." By the second section, it was further enacted, "that the secretary of war is hereby authorized and directed, upon receiving said plan and map, and other information, and upon being satisfied that a bridge built on such plan, and at said locality, will conform to the prescribed conditions of this act, not to obstruct, impair or injuriously modify, the navigation of said river, to notify the said company that he approves the same, and, upon receiving such notification, the said company may proceed to the erection of said bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location. But, until the secretary of war approve the plan and location of said bridge, and notify said company of the same in writing, the bridge shall not be built or commenced, and, should any change be made in the plan of the bridge, during the progress of the work thereon, such change shall be subject likewise to the approval of the secretary of war." It will be observed, that this act of congress takes up the subject of the effect of the bridge upon the navigation of the river, where it was left by the law of New York, and introduces positive provisions on the subject, in place of the merely negative provision of the New York statute. That statute goes no further than to say that it shall not be construed to authorize an obstruction, while the act of congress contains a provision, that the bridge shall be so constructed and built as not to obstruct, impair or injuriously modify, the navigation. It goes further and fixes the mode by which it shall be ascertained whether these conditions are observed in the plan of the bridge. The determination of this question is committed to the secretary of war, who is directed, upon being satisfied that the bridge, as proposed, will not obstruct, impair or injuriously modify the navigation, to notify the company that he approves the bridge. When this has been done, the act declares that the company may proceed to the erection of the bridge, conforming strictly to the approved plan and location.

If the foregoing is a correct interpretation of the act of congress, and if the steps pointed out in the act have been taken, then there is the direct authority of congress for proceeding in the construction of the bridge, in conformity with the approved plans, and a conclusive determination that the navigation of the river will not thereby be obstructed, impaired or injuriously modified, unless congress does not possess the power thus to legislate. But, in the case of State of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 421, the authority of congress, under the constitution, to authorize, as a regulation of commerce, that which the judgment of the supreme court had determined to be an obstruction of the navigation of the Ohio river, was maintained. The court held, that the previous judgment had been given on the ground that the regulations of commerce, by authority of congress, existing at the time, were contravened by the bridge, and that it, consequently, was unlawful. The new statute removed this unlawfulness, by adopting a new regulation of commerce. The first clause of the head note to the case states accurately the doctrine maintained by the decision: "The power of congress to regulate commerce includes the regulation of intercourse and navigation, and, consequently, the power to determine what shall or shall not be deemed, in judgment of law, an obstruction of navigation." In that case, the state of Pennsylvania brought its suit in the supreme court of the United States, which had jurisdiction by reason of the character of the party, irrespective of the subject-matter of the action. The state was entitled to maintain its action by showing an obstruction unlawful either by the law of Virginia, or by the law of the United States; and, therefore, it was requisite, in giving judgment against its claims, to deny the unlawfulness of the obstruction, in both of its aspects. The bridge appeared to have the sanction of congress and of the state legislature, and so its lawfulness could not be impeached. But, all the cases in the supreme court, authoritatively decided, hold that the laws of congress, in regulation of commerce, are paramount. Thus, in the case of Willson v. Blackbird Creek Marsh Co., 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 250, which came up by writ of error from the court of appeals of Delaware, of which state the plaintiffs in error (who were defendants below), were citizens, Chief Justice Marshall said: "This abridgment," (of the navigability of a river by a dam erected under a law of Delaware), "unless it comes in conflict with the constitution or a law of the United States, is an affair between the government of Delaware and its citizens, of which this court can take no cognizance." He further observed, that, if congress had passed any act which bore upon the case, the court would not feel much difficulty in saying that a state law coming in conflict with such act would be void. The case was, however, disposed of on the ground that congress had not exercised its power to regulate commerce in such a way as was repugnant to the law of Delaware in question, and that it, therefore, was not invalid.

[54 U. S.] 518, was only the other side of the same doctrine. There the court held that congress had regulated commerce upon the Ohio river in such a way as came in conflict with the legislation of Virginia, and that the action of congress was paramount.

Gilman v. Philadelphia, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 713, was a suit where the jurisdiction rested upon the diversity of citizenship, and where a bridge about to be built by authority of a law of Pennsylvania was assailed as creating an unlawful obstruction to navigation, especially injurious to the rights of the plaintiffs as wharf and dock owners. All the court agreed in the view, that the power of congress was paramount, when exercised. The majority, however, held that it had not been so exercised as to require the court to declare unlawful what was about to be done in pursuance of a law of Pennsylvania, and the decision was against the plaintiffs.

In this circuit have occurred the cases of Silliman v. Hudson River Bridge Co. [Cases Nos. 12,851, 12,852], and 1 Black [66 U. S.] 582, and 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 403, and of Silliman v. Troy Bridge Co. [Case No. 12,853], in each of which the lawfulness of a bridge built in pursuance of a law of the state of New York was finally sustained. In the Hudson River Bridge Co. Case, an injunction was granted originally, but, upon final hearing, the judges of the circuit court differed in opinion, and the judges of the supreme court, likewise, were equally divided upon the question of the jurisdiction of the circuit court perpetually to restrain the erection of the bridge over the Hudson river, authorized by a law of the state of New York. The case was, therefore, remitted to the circuit court, and the bill was, consequently, dismissed. Upon appeal from this final decree, the supreme court was again equally divided, and the judgment, therefore, stood affirmed. In the last case, that of the Troy bridge, the question whether that bridge would cause a material obstruction to the navigation of the Hudson, if built in conformity to the law of the state of New York, was examined at the suit of a citizen of another state, who, as a navigator under a coasting license, was interested in the question, and it was held that such an obstruction would not be created by the building of the bridge in the manner authorized by the law of New York.

It results from the cases considered, that the authority of congress is paramount, in the regulation of commerce, under the constitution; and that its determination in respect to interference with navigation, by obstructions thereto, is conclusive. What it authorizes may be justified upon its authority. What it forbids is necessarily unlawful. Nor is it to be forgotten, that this power of congress is at all times capable of exercise. If it should turn out that the judgment of congress has been mistaken, and that navigation is injuriously affected, it can, by law, require the bridge to be altered or removed, and can adapt its regulation of commerce to its view of the public interests.

It remains to consider whether the authority of the act of congress has been pursued. It appears, from the papers presented on this motion, that the required papers were presented by the bridge company to the secretary of war, and that after a careful investigation, through the corps of engineers and a special commission appointed for the purpose from that body, the secretary of war made his decision in writing, under date of June 19th, 1869, signed with his hand, and endorsed upon the report to him of the chief of engineers. By that decision he approved the plan as so reported, with the single modification, that the height of the centre of the main span of the bridge should not be less than 135 feet in the clear, at mean high water of the spring tides, and provided that the structure should conform in all other respects to the conditions recommended by the commission. By the same document he directed the chief of engineers to furnish the bridge company with a copy of the report of the commission, and a copy of the report on which his endorsement was made, and to notify the company that the plan and location of the bridge were approved, subject to the conditions imposed in that endorsement. On the 21st of June, 1869, the chief of engineers wrote to the president of the bridge company, in pursuance of the orders of the secretary of war, as follows: "Sir—I am directed by the secretary of war to inform the New York Bridge Company that he approves the plan and location of the East river bridge, as reported by the company to the commission instituted by orders from the war department, provided the bridge conform to the following conditions:" These conditions are then specified, in accordance with the decision of the secretary, but are not necessary to be here stated.

The substance of the requirement of congress was, that the secretary of war should approve the plan, and that, upon such approval and notice thereof, the company should have authority to proceed. It was not, in my opinion, necessary that the notice to the company should be under the hand of the secretary himself. It suffices that he, in writing under his hand, made the determination, and directed the notice to be given, and that it was given accordingly. It is not claimed that any departure has occurred, in the actual construction of the bridge, from the plans and conditions imposed by the secretary of war, nor that any such departure is intended; and, therefore, if I am right in the positions before maintained, the plaintiff is not entitled to the writ of injunction which he asks from this court.

But, if it should be considered necessary that any further assent or approval should be given by the state of New York to the construction of this bridge in the manner proposed and sanctioned by the secretary of war,

I am of opinion that such assent has been given by the act of the legislature of New York, passed May 14, 1875 (Laws N. Y. 1875, p. 290). This act was passed years after the transactions heretofore commented on, and after the form and conditions for the construction of the bridge were settled so far as the company and the United States could settle them, and the work had progressed far towards its termination. The act in question is entitled, "An act providing that the bridge in the course of construction over the East river, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, by the New York Bridge Company, shall be a public work of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and for the dissolution of said company, and the completion and management of the said bridge by the said cities." By force of and under its provisions it became the law of New York, that the bridge in course of construction over the East river should be completed and managed as thereinafter provided, for and on behalf of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, as a consolidated district. The said bridge was thereby declared to be a public highway, for the purpose of rendering the travel between the said cities certain and safe at all times. It was further declared, that, from and after the dissolution of the company, the said bridge "shall be a public work, to be constructed by the two cities for the accommodation, convenience and safe travel of the inhabitants of the said district;" and that "the said bridge, and all its appurtenances, and all the property and effects connected therewith, shall vest absolutely in the cities of New York and Brooklyn." By this legislation, the bridge, in its entirety, as then contemplated, became a public work, and received the sanction of the state of New York. No indictment against the two cities for erecting or maintaining it, founded upon the idea of its being a nuisance, could have been supported in the courts of New York, and, of course, the plaintiff could not there have effectually asserted what the state itself could not have maintained.

I have not thought it worth while to advert to the very indirect interest of the plaintiff in the question involved. He is not a navigator, nor interested in navigation directly. He is a warehouse keeper, and the more vessels that can come near his warehouses the better are his chances of getting business. Whether an obstruction below him will be an injury or a benefit when the Hell Gate channel is cleared out, is, at least, problematical. Nor has it seemed necessary to notice the delay of six years, during which several millions have been expended on the bridge, while the plaintiff could have proceeded at once to present the question for judicial consideration.

The motion for an injunction must be denied.

[NOTE. In June, 1880, the case came up for final hearing. The bill was dismissed, with costs. 10 Fed. 513. The cause was then taken by the plaintiff, on appeal, to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court, dismissing the bill, was affirmed. 109 U. S. 385, 3 Sup. Ct. 228.]

BANKRUPTCY—SALE BY SHERIFF — NOTICE — SEIZURE UNDER PRIOR ATTACHMENT—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. A sheriff who, after proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, wherein an assignee is appointed, levies an execution upon, and sells, property which was of the bankrupt, is liable to the assignee for the proceeds of such property, although he pays such proceeds to the execution creditor, before receiving actual notice of the bankruptcy.

[Cited in Re Grinnell, Case No. 5,830; Beecher v. Gillespie, Id. 1,224; Conner v. Long, 104 U. S. 241.]

2. It makes no difference, that, before the proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted, the sheriff seized, under an attachment in the suit, in which the execution was afterwards issued, the property in question, and held it to be levied on in case execution should issue, or sold it by order of court, and held its proceeds for the same purpose.

3. The operation of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] dissolved the attachment, and the title of the assignee vested as of the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

[Cited in Hatfield v. Moller, 4 Fed. 719; Olney v. Tanner, 10 Fed. 108.]

Aaron P. Whitehead, for plaintiff.

Edmund Randolph Robinson and Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for defendant.

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. Reduced to its simplest form, the question raised by the demurrer herein is, whether a sheriff, who, after the proceedings are commenced in bankruptcy wherein an assignee is appointed, levies an execution upon and sells property which was of the bankrupt, is liable to the assignee, notwithstanding he pays the proceeds of sale to the creditors before he receives actual notice of the bankruptcy.

It is true, that, in the discussion of the subject on the part of the defendant, some importance was given to the circumstances, that the property had been attached by the sheriff a few days before the proceedings in bankruptcy were instituted, and, that, by order of court, the property seized was sold as perishable, and the proceeds were held by the sheriff in lieu of the property, to abide the event of the suit, and to be levied upon if judgment was obtained and execution issued. But, it is quite clear, that, as between the assignee in bankruptcy and the sheriff, these circumstances are not material. The statute, in the most explicit terms (section 14), declares the attachment dissolved. In like explicit terms, it declares (section 14) that the assignment to the assignee shall relate back to the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, and that the title to all the bankrupt's estate shall vest in the assignee. This can only mean, that the title of the assignee shall be vested with like legal effect as if the assignment had been executed at the commencement of the proceedings. The sale of the property as perishable, assuming that it was justified by the order of the state court, had no effect except to substitute, in the hands of the sheriff, the proceeds of sale in the place of the property seized. It gave the creditor no greater right, and it in no wise enlarged the power or duty of the sheriff.

When, therefore, by operation of law, the attachment was dissolved, the title of the assignee in bankruptcy was perfect, and the sheriff was liable to pay over the proceeds of the property to him. The sheriff had ceased to have any claim or right to withhold them. Unless, then, he is protected by the issue and levy of the execution, and the payment of the money to the execution creditors, before he was actually notified of the bankruptcy, he is still liable, and the demurrer herein must be overruled.

The question is an important one, but not because it involves any conflict between the courts of the state and the federal courts. The law is the same in both courts. The paramount law having dissolved an attachment, although valid and operative when issued, the relinquishment of the property to the assignee in whom the property was vested, is in no derogation of the authority of the state court, but a legal duty recognized in all tribunals. And so, when an execution was issued, if the property was no longer liable to levy for the satisfaction of the judgment, it is no matter of conflict between the one court or the other, which of them is called upon to recognize or administer the law. The question is important, however, because the construction and effect of the bankrupt act, contended for by the plaintiff, may operate very harshly upon sheriffs and like ministerial officers, and it accords with our sense of justice to say, that they ought not to be held liable for their acts in the execution of process, done in good faith, without actual notice of any proceedings in bankruptcy against the debtor. But the same may be said of private persons dealing, in good faith, and without notice, with the debtor, pending the proceedings, an example of which was considered by Mr. Justice Sharswood in Mays v. Manufacturers' Nat. Bank of Philadelphia [64 Pa. St. 74]. I shall not discuss the question at length. I am wholly unable to withdraw the question, as it is presented under the bankrupt law of the United States, from the reasoning and the principles upon which the same question was settled in England, under the bankrupt law of that country. It was there settled, after full and repeated discussion, in several cases, and finally in the house of lords.

By operation of law, the money received by the sheriff was the money of the present plaintiff, whether the sheriff knew it or not; and in that statement lies the whole of the plaintiff's case. All the arguments founded in the duty of the sheriff to execute process, in the hardship of holding him to take the hazard of the title to property which he applies to executions in his hands, and in various other considerations, which were urged upon me with great ability on the argument, are most fully considered in the English cases to which I have referred. Balme v. Hutton, 9 Bing. 471; Garland v. Carlisle, 10 Bing. 452; Id. (in house of lords) 4 Bing. N. C. 7, 4 Clark & F. 693; and numerous cases cited and commented upon in those cases. On principle, those cases seem to me to have been correctly decided, while it at the same time seems possible to guard against fraud in the conduct of the bankrupt and his creditors pending the proceedings, by some provision in the law which shall not necessarily operate with such hardship upon innocent parties acting in good faith. The demurrer must be overruled, with leave to withdraw the demurrer and plead, on the usual terms.

MILLER v. The REBECCA.

[Bee, 151.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. 1799.

MARITIME LIEN—SUPPLIES—ADVANCES—BOND TAKEN—RECEIPT.

The owner of this vessel pledged her to raise money for repairs, wages, &c. Part of the wages were not proved to have been paid, but advances, specified in the bond as necessary were made beyond the amount of the bottomry bond. Court retained the suit, and ordered payment from sale of the vessel.

The owner of this vessel [Snow Rebecca] being, as the bond itself sets forth, in want of money to fit her out, to pay wages in advance, and repairs necessary to her going to sea, borrowed three hundred dollars from [Stephen] Miller, the master, and duly executed this deed under hand and seal. To do away its validity, a paper has been produced signed by Miller, acknowledging the receipt of a bottomry bond for three hundred dollars in full for two months of his own wages in advance; and of one month's wages, also in advance, of the mate, four seamen, and a boy. It is contended that this money was never paid. But the bond states other purposes and wants, and it has been proved that Miller paid the following sums expressly within the letter of the contract.

For disbursements	$188 00
Butcher's bill	46 00
Ship carpenter for repairs	10 18
His own wages amounted to	66 64
Total	$310 82

BY THE COURT. Admitting, then, that the other wages mentioned in the bond are still due, yet more has been expended on account of this vessel than is secured by the deed in question. There has been no fraud or collusion, the lien is just and legal, and as no other court can do complete justice by a proceeding in rem, I am of opinion that this suit must be retained and the vessel considered as liable for the amount of this bond.

This case was assimilated to Hopkinson, 163; but there, the bond was given to persons who never advanced a shilling for the vessel's use. The consignees of the ship, who could not take a bottomry bond payable to themselves, procured one to be made to a third person, who could not have any legal lien, inasmuch as he had incurred no risque. On account of this collusion, that suit was dismissed.

TREATIES—EFFECT OF ALLIANCE WITH FRANCE.

The United States, by their alliance with France were not considered as parties in the capitulation made by the Marquis De Bouillé with the inhabitants of Dominica.

In admiralty.

Before HOPKINSON, District Judge.

The ship Resolution, belonging to Brandlight and Sons, merchants in Amsterdam, sailed from the Texel on the 9th of January, 1780, bound for the island of St. Eustatius. This voyage was interrupted by stress of weather, which obliged her to put into Lisbon, where she remained some months to refit, but afterwards arrived at St. Eustatius. From St. Eustatius she sailed for the island of Dominica, where she arrived on the 1st of October, 1780. In March, 1781, she sailed from Dominica for Amsterdam, with a valuable cargo of sugar and coffee, shipped by sundry persons, certified to be capitulants in the island of Dominica; which cargo was consigned to Messrs. Brandlight and Sons, of Amsterdam, the owners of the vessel. Soon after the commencement of her voyage from Dominica, she was captured by a British armed vessel, and taken as prize into Nevis, where Admiral Rodney examined her papers, and thereupon dismissed her. She again proceeded on her voyage, but was afterwards captured by another British vessel, from whom she was recaptured by an American privateer; from this privateer she was again taken by a British ship, and finally retaken from her by Peter Miller, the libellant in this cause, and sent into the port of Philadelphia. It is not contended but that in each and every of the captures and recaptures, she remained more than twenty-four hours in the possession of the conqueror. Being thus found in the hands of the enemy, and taken from them by force of arms, the libellants pray that both ship and cargo may be condemned as lawful prize and booty of war.

But it has been contended in behalf of the claimants, that it appears in testimony that the island of Dominica did on the 7th of September, 1778, surrender by capitulation, to the Marquis De Bouillé, general of the French forces in the Windward Islands; that by the terms of this capitulation, all the property and estates in Dominica, with their produce were secured to the inhabitants, and protected from confiscation; particularly by the seventeenth article, in these words: "The merchants of the island may receive vessels to their address from all parts of the world (English vessels excepted) without their being confiscated; and they may sell their merchandize, and may carry on their trade, and the port shall be entirely free for them for that purpose, paying the customary duties paid in the French islands." And it is alleged, that this privilege and protection was extended to absent persons having property or concerns in the island, by virtue of the ninth article of the same capitulation in these words: "The absent inhabitants, and such as are in the service of his Britannic majesty, shall be maintained in the possession and enjoyment of their estates, which shall be managed for them by their attorneys." That these United States being in strict alliance with the court of France, are bound by the terms of every capitulation, convention, or treaty, which the court of France, or any person or persons under that authority, shall make in the course of the war, the war being a common cause, and both allies principals in the conduct of it: that it was also in proof, that the king of England, by his proclamation, dated in December, 1780, extended the effects of the capitulation of Dominica, to Dutch vessels for four months, notwithstanding the rupture between Great Britain and Holland, by the capture of St. Eustatius: and, that this ship, under the sanction of the said capitulation which secured her and her cargo from capture by the French or Americans, and under the said proclamation, which protected her from British capture, sailed from Dominica, with the property of capitulants on board; and that the passport of Monsieur Du Challeau, the French governor of Dominica, endorsed on the manifesto of the cargo, ought to protect this property from being made prize of by the friends and allies of France.
