But if the note was not taken with the understanding that it was absolute payment, can it be inferred that it was received as additional security? If it was, it would not help the respondent's defense. He pleads payment, and relies upon a change of securities. The note was not a higher security than the ship. Why, then, collateral, or why a change? There can be but one answer. The note was received to raise the money at the time for the mutual accommodation of the clerk and the respondent, by placing the former in possession of funds which he then needed, and extended to the latter further time to meet an acknowledged obligation then due. This intention of the parties is too obvious to be disregarded or overlooked. The one did not receive the note in discharge of the lien; the other did not give it with such an understanding. The intention must govern. The note was to be payment, if paid at maturity; if unpaid, all the relations of the parties as to the vessel and the debt, remained unchanged. The circumstance, so ingeniously pressed, that the note was cashed, and the libellants thereby received the amount of the lien, (which then ceased and could not be revived,) does not materially vary the transaction, or exhibit a different intention. The note gave thirty days' time to the respondent. Until that time elapsed, the vessel could not be attached. Why? Certainly not because the debt was paid, or the lien waived, but because the note and its discount evidenced an understanding to await its maturity, and the default of the makers to meet it. It was in proof that the note was discounted on the endorsement of the libellants. That it was never paid by the respondents, but by the former, fully appears by their present possession. The witness stated that the note was returned by the endorsees, who had cashed it in May last, and that the libellants were charged with the amount in their account current with the broker. In other words, the note, when due, was lifted by the libellants. In cases of this description, the material man is not to be deprived of any of his remedies, except upon the most conclusive proof that exclusive credit has been given to other security than the owner, the master, or the ship. Looking to either of the former, to the exclusion of the latter, releases the lien, but must be clearly established. In no case will either be released, unless such was the manifest intention of the party. The maritime law guards, with most scrupulous care, its various subjects. The material man, the furnisher of supplies, and the mariner are equally protected. That credit was originally extended to the vessel in this case, is not questioned. The schedule appended to the answer, reads: "Steam Boat Fashion, to Moore & Foote, Dr. To merchandise rendered on account." To this the receipt is attached upon which the defense is based. So that the lien was in existence and recognized the day the note was given. There is no proof that it was ever waived—no proof of an intention to waive it.

The court was forcibly impressed during the hearing with the fact that the instrument was negotiable, and had been discounted, and that, therefore, as the libellants had received the money, their relation to the vessel had ceased. But the subsequent production of the note, and its tender for cancellation, removed all difficulty as to sustaining the lien. This note is not now outstanding. No innocent endorsee can be affected by the decree, nor can it be discovered how sustaining the libel on the principle stated will peril vessels hereafter by secret liens. The purchaser of a ship or any vessel afloat, purchases with a presumed knowledge of the existing legal responsibilities. The note and the lien cannot both be sustained. While the one is still current as cash, or outstanding, the other is without force or vitality; but if the former is itself dead and as waste paper, the legal existence of the latter is not impaired. Here the ship contracted the debt. That debt never has been paid. The note was but a promise to pay—a broken promise. It was made and accepted with the sole view to an extension of time. Certainly in this tribunal, as a court of equity, the respondent cannot complain of being dealt with inequitably by a decree enforcing payment of the debt of the boat from the boat; a debt not denied either in its character or amount. Decree for the entire claim and costs, and the cancellation of the note on payment of the decree.

MOORE v. PAXTON.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1827.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

1. The statute of limitations is not pleadable to a judgment rendered in another state.

2. Where process is served on the defendant, or his appearance entered to the action, the judgment of another state is conclusive; and no pleas can be interposed thereto, nor can it be impeached in any other way than it could be in the state where rendered.

[This was an action by Alexander S. Moore against Joseph Paxton.]

[1] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of debt brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, upon a judgment obtained in the state of South Carolina. The defendant has plead the statute of limitations, to which plea the plaintiff has demurred. The statute is as follows: "All actions of debt grounded upon any lending or contract, without specialty, shall be brought within five years after the cause of action shall accrue." Geyer, Dig. 274. This has been considered a question of great importance, and has been ably argued at the bar. We are satisfied that the statute of limitations cannot be plead to an action of debt founded on a judgment from another state, or territory, where the process was served upon the defendant in person, or his appearance entered to the action. The judgments of sister states do not stand upon the same footing as foreign judgments; but where the defendant has personal notice by the service of process, or enters his appearance, the judgment is conclusive, and cannot be inquired into in any other way than it could be in the state where the judgment was obtained, and no other pleas can be interposed thereto. This doctrine has been settled by the supreme court of the United States, in Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 481, and Hampton v. McConnell, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 234. The demurrer to the plea of the statute of limitations must be sustained. Judgment for plaintiff.

SALE—POSSESSION—CREDITORS.

A bill of sale of goods is void as to creditors, unless the possession accompanies and follows the deed.

[Cited in brief in Brawn v. Keller, 43 Pa. St. 105.]

Replevin of a horse taken by the defendant, as marshal, in execution against Dunning, and found in his possession. The plaintiff claimed the property under a sale from Dunning, who testified that he sent the horse to Moore, with a bill of sale; that Moore sent him back to Dunning with the bill of sale, saying that as he had no other horse, he might keep him till he (Moore) should send for him.

THE COURT (nem. con.), upon the authority of the case of Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 309, instructed the jury that the sale was void as to creditors, unless the possession accompanied and followed the bill of sale. Verdict for the defendant.

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. May, 1870.

EXECUTION—LEVIED ON ONE PARTNER'S INTEREST —PURCHASER UNDER EXECUTION SALE— TITLE TO WHAT PASSES.

Under a writ of fieri facias, a levy upon and sale by the sheriff of a co-partner's interest in a firm of which he is a member, passes to the purchaser only the defendant's interest in the chattels actually seized upon the writ, and not in his interest in rights of actions or credits of the partnership.

This case originated in a petition of one John D. Rosenberger, a bankrupt, in voluntary bankruptcy. It appeared in the proceedings thereon, that about six months prior to the filing of the same. and just on the eve of a creditor's obtaining a judgment against the bankrupt, his brother, the defendant in this case, procured a judgment against him by confession, and immediately issued a fi. fa. thereon. This writ was returned by the sheriff, "Levied upon right, title and interest of defendant, in and to the firm of J. D. Rosenberger & Co., and sold the same for $50." The plaintiff in the execution became the purchaser; at the time of the sale the stock on hand of the firm was small, its principal assets consisting of its outstanding credits. These were collected in by the liquidating partner, E. B. Taggart, who having discharged the debts of the firm, shortly thereafter, paid over to the order of the purchaser at the sheriff's sale aforesaid, the sum of $4,420.65, on account of the interest of the bankrupt therein so alleged to have been sold as aforesaid.

Upon the hearing of the petition of the bankrupt for a discharge from his debts, the foregoing facts appearing, CADWALADER, District Judge, observed that the bankrupt had neither disclosed in his schedule, nor surrendered to his assignee, the proceeds of his interest in the firm of John D. Rosenberger & Co., which had not and could not have passed to the purchaser at the sheriff's sale any thing beyond the bankrupt's interest in the chattels actually seized on the fi. fa. That any notion to the contrary was one that prevailed only in Philadelphia, and here to a limited extent, and was unknown generally in the state. That it had arisen here from a clear misapprehension of some decisions of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, which, upon examination, would appear to rather conflict with than support the position. Again, the fact that not unusually upon the sale of a partner's interest the outstanding credits were used to settle the outstanding debits of the firm, and so the chattels seized would be relieved, and that the purchaser at the sheriff's sale would almost always be entitled in equity to have the assets so marshalled, might have also had something to do with the mistake. The bankrupt's discharge was refused.

This suit was then brought by the assignee of the bankrupt against the purchaser at the sale, to recover the proceeds of the bankrupt's interest in the firm, received by him, other than such as were derived from the chattels actually levied on.

N. H. Sharpless, for plaintiff.

Geo. W. Thorn, for defendant.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and CADWALADER, District Judge, were both clearly of the opinion theretofore expressed by Judge CADWALADER in the court of bankruptcy; and Judge McKENNAN said, that the law certainly had been so understood in the Western district.

Upon another point arising in the case a juror was withdrawn.

Bill in chancery.

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a suit in chancery brought by Thomas Moore, administrator of the estate of Thomas Curran, deceased, to coerce the conveyance of certain real property, namely, one undivided half of the east half of the north-east quarter of section ten of township thirteen north, in range six west, containing eighty acres, more or less; also the one half of forty acres of ground, more or less, of section seventeen of township thirteen north, in range six west, lying below the town of Batesville, fronting White river, and joining the lands of Charles Kelly and Hartwell Boswell, lying and being in the county of Independence and territory of Arkansas. The bill charges, that the said Curran in his lifetime, and said Richard Searcy, with their joint funds and in partnership, entered the property in controversy at the United States land-office at Batesville; that, by agreement between the parties, the patents for said lands issued in the name of said Searcy; that Curran afterwards died insolvent, and prays the conveyance of one half of the above described lands. The defendant, in his answer, admits the several allegations as set forth in the complainant's bill, but alleges that Curran died indebted to him in the sum of five hundred and sixty-seven dollars and sixty-six cents, which is not denied by the complainant; and contends that he holds a lien in equity on the property in controversy for the full amount of his debt against the estate. This is a controversy between the creditors of Curran, of whom the defendant is one, and a decree of conveyance will be for the benefit of all. Searcy, as a creditor, has only the same equity that the others have; and the accidental circumstance of his being invested with the legal title, cannot avail him in a court of equity to the prejudice and exclusion of the other creditors. Sale decreed accordingly.

REPLEVIN—ACTION ON BOND—BREACH OF CONDITION—RETURN ELOIGNED.

In order to support an action upon a replevin-bond, it is not necessary that the defendant in replevin who has recovered judgment against the plaintiff in replevin for damages and costs, should obtain a writ of retorno habendo returned "eloigned;" but the non-payment of the damages found by the jury, is a breach of the condition of the bond upon which an action may be maintained.

Debt on a replevin-bond. The breach alleged, was the non-payment of the damages and costs found by the verdict of the jury in the trial of the action of replevin, for the defendant in replevin against the plaintiff in replevin. The defendant, who was a surety in the replevin-bond, pleaded in substance, that the plaintiff in replevin was always, after the judgment of the court in that action, ready to return the replevied property, and still is ready to return it. To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder. The condition of the bond was to prosecute the writ of replevin with effect; to return the goods replevied, if a return thereof should be adjudged by the court, and to pay all such costs, charges, and damages as may be adjudged by the court to be sustained by occasion of replevying the said goods; and in all things well and truly to observe and perform the judgment of the said court upon the premises.

Mr. Ashton, for defendant, contended that no action could be maintained upon the bond until a writ of retorno habendo should have been issued and returned "eloigned." But in the action of replevin the defendant in replevin did not obtain a judgment for a return.

THE COURT (nem. con.) adjudged the plea to be bad, and rendered judgment upon the demurrer, for the plaintiff, for the penalty of the bond and damages, to be released on the payment of the damages found for the defendant in replevin in that action and the costs of the replevin, and the costs of the present action upon the bond.

PATENTS—IMPROVEMENT IN SEED-DRILL—CLAIMS—STRICT CONSTRUCTION—DILIGENCE.

1. The second claim of the letters patent granted to Hiram Moore, November 20, 1860, for improvements in seed-drills, was for the combination of the separate bearings of a cylinder for distributing the seed, with a single shaft-bearing in the cylinder, shorter than the cylinder and larger than the shaft. In the defendants' machine the seed was distributed by a revolving wheel or disk with flanges upon the periphery. Held, upon the construction of the patent given by the court, that the claim must be limited to that class of machines having cylinders, and does not include those with flanged disks or wheels, and that consequently there was no infringement.

2. The third claim of the patent was for "a distributing-cylinder for seeding-machines, having a bevelled bearing substantially in the manner and for the purposes specified." Held, that as, upon the construction given to the patent by the court, and upon the evidence, it appeared that the object of the bevel in complainant's patent was to prevent dust and other obstructions from entering the bearings, and that the construction of defendants' seed wheel was such that there was no liability of such obstructions entering the bearings, and further, that if there was any bevel in the defendants' machine more than was incident to the molding of it, it was so slight as to bear no part in the operation of the machine, such bevel did not constitute an infringement.

3. The sixth claim of the patent issued in 1861, to the same patentee, was for the combination of a removable driving-shaft, with a series of seeding-cylinders having independent bearings, whereby said shaft could at pleasure be removed to allow any of said cylinders to be taken out for repairs, without displacing the rest. Held, that this claim was merely for a multiplication or aggregation of the seeding cylinders described in the first patent, and was not patentable.

4. The invention of the patentee, under which the defendants manufacture, having been completed at about the date of that described in the complainants' patent, and there being no lack of diligence in applying for a patent, the court construed complainants' patent strictly, to avoid infringement, and to sustain both grants.

This was a suit in equity for the infringement of letters patent No. 30,685, November 20th, 1860, and No. 31,819, March 26th, 1861, granted Hiram Moore for certain improvements in seed-drills. The defendants [Joseph W. Thomas and others] manufactured under the patent granted to Gilbert Jessup, June 25th, 1861, No. 32,627.

Bowman, Pringle & Scot, for complainants.
Wood & Boyd, for defendants.

BROWN, District Judge. Complainants claim to recover for an infringement of the second and third claims of Moore's patent of 1860, and for the sixth claim of his patent of 1861. I will proceed to dispose of these claims in their order. The second claim of the patent of 1860 is as follows: "2. I claim the combination of the separate bearings of the cylinder with a single shaft-bearing in the cylinder, shorter than the cylinder and larger than the shaft, in the manner and for the purposes substantially as specified."

To understand exactly the nature of complainants' invention, it is necessary to examine with some care the language of Moore's specification. After setting forth the general nature of his improvement, he says: "The object of my said improvements, is more evenly and equally to distribute the grain or seed to be sowed, and to render the machine more simple, and less liable to get out of order, and they relate particularly to that class of seeding-machines in which a toothed distributing cylinder is used at the bottom of a seed-box or hopper, in order to distribute the grain or seed. They consist, first, in combining a conduit or passage for the grain, arranged between the bottom of the hopper and the discharging-orifice, with the oblique discharging-orifice and the distributing-cylinder. Second, in combining separate bearings for the cylinders with a single bearing in the cylinder for the shaft, in the manner hereinafter described. By this means we attain important advantages. The warping or twisting of the seed-box is a fruitful source of trouble in machines of this class, for the hopper, being rigidly fastened at the bottom of the seed-box, any warping or twisting of the latter will cause the hopper to change its position relative to the shaft, and if the cylinder be firmly fastened upon its shaft, it will bind against the sides of the hopper, and, in its bearings, producing much friction and increasing the draft of the machine and its liability to get out of order. By having the shaft-bearing in the cylinder larger than the shaft, and short, the evil effects of a displacement of the cylinder will be obviated in a great measure, as the axis of the cylinder need not be coincident or even parallel with the axis of the shaft, but may vary considerably from it without the cylinder binding upon the shaft, and the cylinder will still be controlled by the revolution of the shaft, the cylinder being retained in place within the hopper by its own independent bearings. I am aware that distributing-cylinders have before this been placed loosely upon shafts at the bottom of hoppers, but without separate bearings, so that they cannot retain their proper relative position within and to the hoppers, and consequently the flow of seed or grain is irregular and uneven."

Bearing in mind that his actual invention was an improvement in machines in which a a tooth distributing-cylinder was used; that in his specifications he announces that his improvements relate particularly to that class of seeding-machines; that the cylinder is a prominent feature in all of his claims; that the evil, which the device set forth in the second claim was designed to remedy, "is said to be a fruitful source of trouble in machines of this class," I think the words "shaft-bearing in the cylinder, shorter than the cylinder and larger than the shaft," were intended to be limited to that class of machines having cylinders, and not flanged disks or wheels, for the distribution of seed. When they are applied to machines having toothed distributing-cylinders, the value of complainants' invention is at once manifest. If the shaft-bearing were made the whole length of the cylinder, the shaft would have to be made smaller than the bearing, in order to get the lateral play so essential to prevent binding and friction, and the longer the bearing the smaller would have to be shaft. But if the bearing be very short, a difference of one thirty-second of an inch between the shaft and the bearing will allow sufficient play. The value, too, of an independent bearing for the cylinder is no less obvious. By this means the cylinder is retained in its exact relative position to the hopper, while its position to the shaft may constantly change without binding, or impairing the operation of the machine.

Defendants' device is constructed on a different principle. In his machine, the seed is distributed by a revolving wheel or disk, with flanges upon the periphery. There is nothing in the wheel which answers the definition of a cylinder, unless this word be extended and construed to include the hub. Webster defines a cylinder to be "a long, circular body, of uniform diameter, and its extremities forming equal parallel circles."

I think the application of this term to the hub of the wheel is unwarranted by the definition, or by the common acceptance of the term.

Moore states in his specifications, that distributing-cylinders have, before this, been placed loosely around shafts at the bottom of the hoppers, but without separate bearings, so that they cannot retain their proper relative position within and about the hoppers, and consequently the flow of seed or grain is irregular and uneven. Now, it being conceded that the shaft may be made smaller than the bearing without infringing the second claim, and admitting that separate bearings may be used for the hub or cylinder, provided that the short shaft-bearing be not also used, it seems to make no practical difference in the operation of defendants' devices whether the shaft-bearing in the hopper be made shorter than the hub, or not. If defendants' witnesses, Blanchard, Bogle and Ludlow, are to believed, and they seem to be uncontradicted, there is no liability to warping or twisting in their machine, and hence, no utility in a shaft-bearing shorter than the hub. I think complainants' exhibit, "defendants' seed-cup," is not an infringement of this claim even upon complainants' theory, since the bearing is of uniform size throughout the whole length of the hub, with the exception of slight and immaterial coring out in the middle; neither do I regard defendants' exhibit, "Thomas, Ludlow & Rogers' seeder," an infringement, since the flanged wheel has no hub at all, but simply a square hole in the centre for the reception of the shaft, and, hence, no separate bearings, the wheel dropping upon its periphery when the shaft is removed. It is true there is a hub or thimble upon one side of the wheel, separate from the wheel, which revolves with the shaft upon a bearing of its own within the casing, and perhaps this might constitute a separate bearing for the wheel, within the meaning of the patent; but, as the square apertures through the hub and the wheel are the same size, the shaft-bearing cannot be said to be shorter than the cylinder, unless the other side of the hopper, which contains a round hole for the passage of the shaft, be also construed as a part of the cylinder. I do not think it will warrant this construction.

There is more difficulty about complainants' exhibit, "defendants' hopper, with seed-cup and driving shaft;" and upon complainants' theory of the construction of their patent there would be an infringement, inasmuch as the hub has a separate bearing of its own, and a shaft-bearing shorter than the hub and larger than the shaft, but holding, as we do, that complainants' patent was intended to apply to a different class of machines, and that the short hub of the vertical distributing-wheel or disk used by defendants is not embraced in the word "cylinder," used so often in complainants' specification, we also feel bound to hold there is no infringement in defendants' device.

There are strong equities in favor of the defendants arising from the respective dates of their inventions. It is well settled, that an invention is not patentable until a machine has been perfected; and, if not actually used, made capable of useful operation. Agawan v. Jordan, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 583; Seymour v. Osborne, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 552; Goodyear v. Day [Case No. 5,569]; Coffin v. Ogden, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 120. Within this definition Moore's invention was not patentable until the spring of 1859, although it seems that as early as the summer of 1857 he had made some experiments, and completed rough drawings of his invention, in the state of Michigan, in or near Grand Rapids. In the spring of 1858 he seems to have had a contrivance substantially in the form of his invention, which he kept in his house, and worked as a model. He left Michigan in March, 1858, and moved to Wisconsin, and during the winter of 1858-59 had a full-sized drill completed, containing seed-cups like his exhibit, operated by a square wooden shaft, which was experimented with by his nephew in sowing wheat on his farm, on or about April 27th, 1859. From all this testimony, I think we are not authorized to conclude that his invention was perfected before the spring of that year.

While these experiments were going on, one Gilbert Jessup, in another state, and some hundreds of miles distant, with no opportunity or suspicion of piracy, was perfecting an invention embodying the substantial principle of defendants' device. While the exact day upon which his invention was so far perfected as to be patentable cannot be ascertained, the testimony shows that he had completed twelve machines by May, 1859. It is scarcely probable that he would have made that number of machines until after he had perfected his invention, and I think, under all the circumstances, we are authorized to conclude that he was entitled to a patent quite as soon, if not sooner than Moore. He appears to have commenced proceedings to obtain a patent as soon as May, 1860, but owing to some delay on the part of his solicitors in New York, his application was not placed upon file until after the Moore patent had been issued. It is very difficult to fix the precise relative dates of these inventions, but in view of the fact that no suspicion of bad faith attaches to Jessup; that his invention was at once put into practical operation and the manufacture of machines commenced on a large scale, we think the court is bound to sustain his invention, if possible, particularly as the principle upon which it operates is quite different from that of the complainants' device.

The third claim of complainants' patent of 1860 is as follows: "I claim a distributing-cylinder for seeding-machines, having a bevelled bearing, substantially in the manner and for the purposes specified." Here again complainant limits himself to distributing-cylinders, evidently having reference to the periphery feeding-cylinder set forth in his specifications. The value of a bevelled bearing in cylinders of this kind results from the tendency of particles of earth, chaff and dust, carried on the periphery of his wheel, to work toward the end and into the bearings, whence they are discharged with the seed. If we are to believe the testimony of defendants' witnesses upon this point, it would appear that the construction of their seed-wheel is such as to prevent the dust and chaff from entering the bearings of the seed-wheels, the repeated revolutions of the wheels having a tendency to throw such particles toward the periphery, and that the taper of the hub performs no function whatever in sowing the grain. It seems, too, that the operation of molding both hub and periphery is assisted by a slight taper from the centre outward, and if the bevelling in the hub is greater than the convenience of molding requires, it is so slight as apparently to play no part in the operation of the machine. Upon this point defendants' witness, Bogle, testifies as follows:

"I have never discovered any difficulty arising from the effects of dirt or straw getting into the bearings of the seed-wheel and casing. In fact, the seed-cups referred to as manufactured by our company are so constructed that there is no liability whatever of dirt, straw or obstructions getting into said bearings, the hub of the distributing-wheel being entirely incased by casing, said casing being so formed that it affords a conducting surface by means of which the grain is carried over the bearing down into the seed and against the vertical face of the distributing-wheel, thus being prevented from coming in contact with the bearings of said wheel, in any manner. The said casing is fitted closely to the vertical face of the distributing-wheel, and the rotating motion of the wheel inclines the grain or other material finding its way into the seed-cup, toward the inner periphery of the carrying-flange found upon the vertical face of the wheel, thus conducting it directly away from contact with the bearings of the wheel and casing, and if the space between the casing and face of the wheel was even large enough to permit dirt, straw or other obstructions to pass through, the motion of the wheel, aided by gravity, would tend to carry such obstructions immediately toward the flange of the wheel, as above stated, thereby preventing any trouble whatever that might occur under a different construction of the seed-cylinder and its casing."

The sixth claim of Moore's patent of 1861 is for "the combination of a removable driving-shaft with a series of seeding-cylinders having independent bearings, whereby said shaft can at pleasure be removed to allow any of said cylinders to be taken out for repairs without displacing the rest, substantially as described."

The same principle of construction allied to the two prior claims will also limit this to the toothed distributing-cylinders described in the specifications. It seems to me, too, that so far as this claim is concerned, there is nothing in the patent of 1861, not already found, or at least suggested to a mechanic of ordinary intelligence, in the patent of 1860. The shaft used in the earlier patent, being smaller than its bearing, must have been removable, and as the later patent does not claim any particular device for removing, it is satisfied by any shaft which is removable. Nothing else is set up in this claim but a multiplication of the seeding-cylinders described in the first patent. This is not patentable. The bill must be dismissed.

MOORE v. UNION MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. et al.

[5 Ins. Law J. 517.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. July, 1876.

USURY — LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY LOAN — CONFESSION OF JUDGMENT.

1. The acceptance of mortgages by a life company in Nebraska in 1872, as security for loans, was not illegal.

2. Where mortgages for $20,000 were given as security for loans on which life insurance for about $80,000 was required on the life of the borrower and others, and the net loans, after deducting premiums, interest, commissions, etc., amounted to about $16,000, held, that the insurance was excessive, and the mortgages were usurious, and the contract void to the extent declared by the statute.

3. Where loans had been made on certain securities by a life company, and, the borrower being threatened by judgment creditors to the amount of about $6,000, the company advanced $3,000, with which its agent obtained the satisfaction of the judgments of record, after which the borrower confessed judgment for $6,000 in favor of the company, held, that the confession stands as security for only $3,000 with interest.

The action is brought for an accounting between complainant [James W. Moore] and the company and [John F.] Kinney, and for a decree declaring certain mortgages executed by [David B.] McMechan and his wife void, and for a perpetual injunction restraining the company from issuing order of sale or execution upon certain confessions of judgment given by McMechan to the company about forty days before he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

McMechan was a dealer in hardware, stoves, etc., in Nebraska City. In 1872 he became embarrassed; judgments aggregating several thousand dollars were obtained against him, and executions were being levied upon his stock. Kinney was the company's general agent in Nebraska. The company's loans were generally made in connection with life insurance, the applicant taking a certain amount of insurance upon his life, and paying the premiums to the company, the usual proportion being $5 of insurance to $1 of loan. McMechan applied to Kinney for $12,000, which, on application to the company, was granted, the agreement being, in consideration of the amount of the loan, that he should take only $36,000 insurance, pay twelve per cent. interest in advance on the loan, and pay a bonus of three per cent. upon the sum loaned to Kinney. McMechan thereupon executed his note and a mortgage upon certain realty for $12,000. Before the money had been advanced, a further loan of $8,000 was negotiated, the agreement being for $40,000 additional life insurance and the payment of a three per cent. bonus and $1,000 to Kinney. As security, a second mortgage upon the realty and a mortgage upon the stock for $8,000 were executed by McMechan, and for further security notes given by his customers were placed in the hands of Kinney. The company's limit on a single risk being $20,000, two brothers of McMechan were examined for policies and the premiums charged to him. The policies were not delivered to the applicants, and $15,000 of the insurance for which premiums were paid was not applied for, but the premiums stood as a credit on the company's books, for which a policy might be taken. The company paid the net sum, deducting premiums, interest, etc., $16,005.65, to McMechan's creditors, through Kinney, in various sums, on the order of McMechan. In January, 1874, McMechan again became embarrassed, and judgment creditors to the amount of about $6,000 threatened to contest the chattel mortgage held by the company. These judgments were satisfied of record by a further advance of about $3,000 by the company, the creditors accepting fifty per cent., whereupon McMechan, according to agreement, confessed judgment in favor of the company for $6,734.40, and also confessed judgment in foreclosure for $8,779.11, the amount claimed as due under the second loan of $8,000, and decree was entered directing the sale of the real estate in the mortgage mentioned. In February the company issued execution upon their judgment at law, which was levied for its full amount upon McMechan's stock in trade in his store. Kinney, acting for the company, purchased the entire stock on the agreement that the goods were to be inventoried at the cost price, with freight added, and the amount credited upon what McMechan owed the company. The inventory showed a valuation of $9,000, according to the company, and from $11,000 to $13,000, according to plaintiff. McMechan's store building was leased by the company at a monthly rental of $50, and retained in its possession, and McMechan conducted the business thereafter as an employee of the company until the goods were seized by the sheriff for taxes against McMechan. It was alleged that through the negligence of Kinney in regard to collecting the notes placed with him as collaterals, a large amount was lost to McMechan. It was also alleged that a large amount had been paid by McMechan, and many notes collected or converted by the company; also that the company received from McMechan the proceeds of sales of his goods, which were misapplied. It was claimed by the company that the taking of life insurance was not a condition precedent to the loan; also that the bonus or commission of Kinney was for services to McMechan, with which the company had nothing to do; also that the advance of $3,000 was not a loan to McMechan; also that the notes given as collateral were mostly worthless; also that McMechan was satisfied with the judgment transaction; also that the stock of goods was seized and sold by the sheriff on another claim, and no consideration for them was received by the company; also that a full accounting was had with McMechan at the time of confessing judgment; also that McMechan, was put into bankruptcy by the creditors whose claims had been satisfied, by means of new obligations obtained secretly from McMechan. On the case being brought up, leave was granted to the company to file a cross bill to foreclose the $12,000 mortgage.

E. F. Warren and Savage & Manderson, for complainant.

A borrower may avail himself of usury in the contract to obtain relief, and his assignee in bankruptcy is in the same situation. Schermerhorn v. Talman, 14 N. Y. 93; Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 444, citing Post v. Bank of Utica, 7 Hill, 391; Peters v. Mortimer, 4 Edw. Ch. 279; Pearsall v. Kingsland, 3 Edw. Ch. 195; Dry-Dock Bank v. American Life Ins. & Trust Co., 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 351; Riggs v. Powers, 6 Ohio St. 19; 1 Ohio St. 298–312; Rev. St. U. S. § 5046; Allen v. Massay, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 351.

The transaction was usurious, first, because interest was charged from the date of the $12,000 note, while the money was not advanced until over three months later. It was claimed that the money was ready, and it was McMechan's fault that it was not sooner disbursed, but no check was then sent by the company to Kinney for such loan, as was their usual course. Second, premiums were charged for policies not delivered. Fulton Bank v. Benedict, 1 Hall, 480; Fire Cases of Utica Ins. Co. v. Cadwell, 3 Wend. 296; New York Fire Ins. Co. v. Donaldson, 4 Edw. Ch. 199, distinguished. Third, about $15,000 of insurance was charged and paid for, on which no risk was assumed. The requiring of $80,000 insurance where only $20,000 would be accepted on the borrower's own life, and charging premiums on insurance not taken, are evidence that the insurance was a condition precedent to the loan.

The transaction was usurious on account of the excessive sums retained as charges and commissions. Kinney was not entitled to them on account of any adequate service rendered. As general agent accustomed to effect loans for the company his acts were those of the company. He was not the agent of McMechan in the transaction. Kinney received no salary for attending to loans, but was remunerated by commissions. The company must have been knowing to the facts. Any loss imposed on the borrower, in addition to the amount lent and lawful interest, is a violation of the law restricting the lender to a specified rate. The money received by McMechan cost him thirty-three and one-half per cent. per annum. Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 86; Butterworth v. Pecare, 8 Bosw. 671, 675–677. Tyler, Usury, 325 et seq.; Williams v. Hance, 7 Paige, 581; Bank v. Hoyt, 32 N. Y. 119; Reed v. Smith, 9 Cow. 648–650; Bank v. Owens, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 527; McFarland v. Carr, 16 Wis. 529; Cases of Crane v. Hubbel, 7 Paige, 413; Barretto v. Snowden, 5 Wend. 181; Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219, where the lender was ignorant of bonus exacted by agent, distinguished.

It is urged that the sums were willingly paid by McMechan, but the law regards usurious terms as involuntary and the result of compulsion. Schroepel v. Corning, 5 Denio, 236. Though usury paid may not be recovered, the debtor may insist on its deduction from any part of the debt unpaid, and it may be applied to the satisfaction of the principal. Farwell v. Meyer, 35 Ill. 40; Booker v. Anderson, Id. 66; Saylor v. Daniels, 37 Ill. 216, 331; Wood v. Lake, 13 Wis. 84; Gill v. Rice, Id. 549. The company were guilty of gross negligence in that Kinney did nothing more to collect the notes than to notify the debtors by letter of the fact, and request their payment, and McMechan is entitled to credit for the entire amount of the same. Jennison v. Parker, 7 Mich. 355; Watts v. Willing (Pa.) 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 100; 2 Pars. Cont. p. 111; Lamberton v. Windom, 12 Minn. 241 [Gil. 151]; Ex parte Mure, 2 Cox, 63; Noland v. Clark, 10 B. Bank of Utica, 20 Johns. 372; Roberts v. Thompson, 14 Ohio St. 1; Douglass v. Reynolds, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 113.

The mortgages given to the company were contrary to the policy of the state, prejudicial to its interests, and contrary to the express power of the statutes, and therefore void. A foreign corporation can do nothing in Nebraska contrary to the policy or statutes of the state, or prejudicial to its interests. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519; Paul v. Virginia, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 181; Ducat v. Chicago, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 410; Insurance Co. v. French, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 407; Ranyon v. Coster's Lessees, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 122; Stoney v. Ins. Co., 11 Paige, 637; Ins. Co. v. Owen, 15 Gray, 491; State Bank v. Coquillard, 6 Ind. 232; Bard v. Poole, 12 N. Y. 495; Ang. & A. Corp. (9th Ed.) § 265. At the date of these mortgages it was unlawful for a company in the state to hold or purchase real estate, except such as was necessary in its legitimate business of insurance, and deeds or conveyances for any other purpose were void. The term "deed" included every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in lands was created, aliened, mortgaged or assigned. Gen. St. c. 11, § 4; Revision 1873, p. 161; Rev. St. 1866, c. 25, § 4; Revision 1873, § 23, c. 25, p. 395; Id. § 46, c. 61, p. 880.

The policy of the state has been to impose similar restrictions though more liberal, on domestic corporations. Gen. St., Revision 1873, § 16, c. 33, resembling Rev. St. U. S. § 5137, p. 999, which was construed in Kansas Valley Bank v. Rowell [Case No. 7,611]. Case of Bank v. North, 4 Johns. Ch. 371, distinguished. Gen. St., Revision 1873, c. 11, §§ 19, 22, 42, 49, 61, 74, 85, 125, 165; Id. § 41, c. 33, p. 445. The company's charter provides that real estate mortgaged to it for security, or taken on loans, shall be offered for sale every four years. Under this provision the company cannot be forced to sell, and unless the mortgages are invalid a release from the mortgagor would merge the title, and the corporation would be able to bar alienation of real property. Carroll v. City of East St. Louis, 67 Ill. 568, 2 Cent. Law J. 557. If the mortgages be illegal the whole transaction is void, and cannot be enforced. Philadelphia Loan Co. v. Towner, 13 Conn. 249; Utica Ins. Co. v. Scott, 19 Johns. 1, excepted to; Coppel v. Hall, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 542, 558; Fowler v. Scully, 72 Pa. St. 456; Seidenbender v. Charles, 4 Serg. & R. 160; Bank v. Owens, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 538; Bank v. Lanier, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 369; Burkholder v. Beetem, 65 Pa. St. 496; Mitchell v. Smith, 1 Bin. 110; Maybin v. Coulon (Pa.) 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 298; [Duncanson v. M'Lure] Id. 308; Badgley v. Beale, 8 Watts, 263; 6 Watts. 231; 7 Watts. 343; Fowler v. Scully, 72 Pa. St. 456.

If the $3,054.75 advanced by the company to obtain satisfaction of judgments against McMechan of record was not a loan to McMechan, as alleged by the company, it was a voluntary payment, for whose repayment they have no valid demand, and the subsequent confession of judgments might be inquired into as fraudulent. The judgments were void, having been made while the debtor was insolvent and in contemplation of bankruptcy. McMechan was adjudged bankrupt on the ground that he had confessed judgment in favor of the company, intending to give them an unlawful preference. Sections 35, 39, Bankrupt Act. The confessions estop the debtor from inquiry, but not the assignee. The judgments can only be assailed for fraud. Credit was not given to McMechan for the inventoried value of the goods, as agreed, and, if the company never received any consideration on account of a seizure by the sheriff, it is their own concern. The sheriff's claim was known to Kinney and the company at the time of seizure, and the company alleged the purchase in two previous suits. The company, having reason to believe McMechan insolvent at the time of confessing judgment, should not be allowed to prove for more than half the debt. Section 39, Bankrupt Law. To secure themselves as against other creditors having judgments aggregating upward of $6,000, the company induced McMechan to confess for double the amount advanced, and issued execution, and directed the levy on his stock.

E. Wakely, for defendant.

The position that the company had no power to loan on real-estate security in Nebraska is sweeping and far-reaching. Millions have been so loaned by foreign corporations, and, if the position is sound, the securities are worthless, even if the loans are not void. The objection is easily met. By its charter the company had power to make such loans. Charter, § 6, p. 6; Id. § 1, p. 1. A corporation may do in any state what its charter empowers it to do in its own, provided the act is not forbidden by or against the policy of such state. Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 519; Kennebec Co. v. Augusta Ins. Co., 6 Gray, 204; American Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Owen, 15 Gray, 494; Arms v. Conant, 36 Vt. 744; Western v. Genesee Mut. Ins. Co., 2 Kern [12 N. Y.] 258; Farmers' L. & T. Co. v. McKinney [Case No. 4,667]; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Albert, 39 Mo. 181; Blair v. Perpetual Ins. Co., 10 Mo. 559; Lathrop v. Commercial Bank of Scioto, 8 Dana, 114; Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Cross, 18 Wis. 109; Bard v. Poole, 2 Kern [12 N. Y.] 505; 18 Wis. 109.

By the strongest implication, Nebraska statutes recognize the power of foreign companies to loan on real-estate security. St. 1866, § 5, pp. 189, 190, 193, 194, 188. This chapter applies to life companies. Gen. St. Neb. p. 428, c. 33, §§ 1, 41. Kinney had no authority to contract the loan. It was made by the company at the home office. The entire $12,000, less one year's interest and premiums, and the $8,000, less premiums, were forwarded to Kinney. The company neither knew of nor sanctioned the bonus of Kinney. It was given for services of Kinney to McMecham. There is no usury unless the lender knows of or sanctions an agreement for commission. The agent has no implied authority to do an unlawful act. If for services to the borrower, commission is not usury. The only contract was in writing by officers of the company. An agent without power to contract has no power to make a lawful agreement usurious by his own private agreement for compensation. Condit v. Baldwin, 21 N. Y. 219; Bell v. Day, 32 N. Y. 175; Thurston v. Cornell, 38 N. Y. 281; Muir v. Newark Sav. Inst., 1 C. E. Green [16 N. J. Eq.] 537; Conover v. Van Mater, 3 C. E. Green [18 N. J. Eq.] 481; Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 Comst. [N. Y.] 266; Baxter v. Buck, 10 Vt. 548; Fay v. Lovejoy, 20 Wis. 407; Rogers v. Buckingham, 33 Conn. 81; Banks v. McClellan, 24 Md. 62; Jones v. Berryhill, 25 Iowa, 289; Mining Co. v. Gwyer, 48 Ga. 11; Beadle v. Munson, 30 Conn. 175; Corlies v. Estes, 31 Vt. 653; North v. Sergeant, 33 Barb. 350; Philo v. Butterfield, 3 Neb. 256.

The condition requiring life insurance was not usurious. The premiums were the usual rates required, without a loan. The insured had the full value of his premiums in the obligation of the insurer to pay at death. Clarke v. Sheehan, 47 N. Y. 188; Utica Ins. Co. v. Cadwell, 3 Wend. 296; New York Fire Ins. Co. v. Donaldson, 3 Edw. Ch. 199; Brooklyn Bank v. Waring, 2 Sand. Ch. 1; Dowdall v. Lenox, 2 Edw. Ch. 267; Bullock v. Boyd, Hoff. Ch. 299; Valentine v. Conner, 40 N. Y. 248; Fellows v. American Life Insurance & Trust Co., 1 Sand. Ch. 203; Stille v. Andrews, 4 C. E. Green [19 N. J. Eq.] 409; Jarvis' Appeal, 27 Conn. 432; Roane v. Bank of Nashville, 1 Head. 526.

Usury is alleged because the company took and retained papers which bore interest from a date prior to the receipt of the money by the borrower. The papers were dated as of the time of execution and acknowledgment of mortgage, which could not properly have been changed. The money was then in readiness. The only claim could be for an inadvertent omission to indorse a few days' interest credit, by which alone the discrepancy could properly be corrected. The lender has a right to interest from the time the loan is to take effect, where the money is ready and the delay in paying it over is not the fault of the lender. Bank of U. S. v. Wagner, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 378–399; Knox v. Goodwin, 25 Wend. 643; Booth v. Swezey, 8 N. Y. 276; Dowdall v. Lenox, 2 Edw. Ch. 266; Walker v. Bank of Washington, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 62; Muir v. Newark Sav. Inst., 1 C. E. Green [16 N. J. Eq.] 537; Howell v. Auten [1 H. W. Green] 2 N. J. Eq. 44; Ware v. Thompson, 13 N. J. Eq. 66; Auble v. Trimmer, 7 N. J. Eq. 242; Beals v. Benjamin, 33 N. Y. 61; Doak v. Snapp, 1 Cold. 180; Stark v. Coffin, 105 Mass. 328–333; Banks v. Van Antwerp, 15 Harek, 29.

This court cannot enjoin proceedings to enforce the judgments. The bankrupt law does not provide for it. Peck v. Jenness, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 612; Orton v. Smith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 263; Ingraham v. Dawson, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 486; Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 450; 4 Ch. 179; 7 Ch. 279.

The larger judgment was simply for the foreclosure of the $8,000 mortgage, which the bankrupt law does not prohibit. The smaller judgment was for a present consideration, for money to pay off other debts, not to get a preference. There was no fraud; it was done in good faith; and without fraud a person may advance money to an insolvent debtor, and take property as security. Cook v. Tullis, 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 332; Gibson v. Warden, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 244; Tiffany v. Luces, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 410; O'Connor v. Parker, 23 Mich. 22; Darby v. Boatman's

Sav. Inst. [Case No. 3,571]; Gaffney v. Signaigo [Id. 5,169]; Darby v. Lucas [Id. 3,573]; McKinney v. Harding [Id. 8,866]; Lenihan v. Hamann, 55 N. Y. 652; Bentley v. Wells, 61 Ill. 59; Biddle's Appeal, 68 Pa. St. 13; In re Burns, 7 A. S. Ry. 100; Vogle v. Lathrop [Case No. 16,985].

No accounting respecting the collaterals is necessary. All sums received on them have already been settled between the parties. A creditor cannot be compelled to exhaust his collaterals before resorting to other securities, where the assignee represents general creditors and no lienholder. Kinney was guilty of no negligence in regard to them; there has been no conversion, nor offer to redeem them. They were practically almost worthless.

The argument of complainant against the right of the company to take mortgages is a misconstruction of the statute in which companies are prohibited from holding lands, but permitted to take mortgages, while in another chapter quoted, for certain prescribed purposes only, mortgages are included in conveyances. To hold land is a different thing from having a mortgage lien. The mortgagor holds the land. Gen. Rev. § 55, p. 881.

There is no foundation for the distinction alleged between foreign and domestic companies. Chapter 25, St. 1866, §§ 1, 2, and prohibiting section. The act of 1873 quoted was subsequent to the execution of the mortgages, and excepts life companies, while it recognizes the power to take mortgages. Case of Carroll v. City of St. Louis concerned the unlimited purchase of land, not the policy of Nebraska concerning the mortgage securities. To entitle a debtor to credit for collaterals not collected, the remedy against him must be shown to be lost through the negligence of the creditor holding them. McMecham virtually controlled proceedings to collect.

The policies were clearly delivered. They were held by Kinney ready for delivery when called for. In case of death the money could have been collected. The $300 premiums unapplied were applicable to any policy when applied for; and the company has not refused to issue a policy.

McMechan's equity under the $8,000 was worth nothing. A creditor may foreclose an equity by a confessed judgment, and no wrong be done an unpaid creditor, unless it was valuable.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. I am of opinion:

1. That the defendant company had the power to take and receive the mortgages, and they are not void ab initio.

2. I find that the mortgages are usurious. This result I reach upon the special circumstances of this case, placing it largely upon the ground that the requiring of such a large and extraordinary amount of insurance, not only upon the life of the borrower, but upon that of others, as a condition of making the loans, is a direct loss to the borrower, and in violation of the purpose and policy of the usury laws. Under the statute of Nebraska, no previous tender by the borrower is necessary as a condition of relief, and the contract, though usurious, is void only to the extent declared by the statute. Rev. St. Neb. p. 447.

3. The confession of judgment for $6,734.40 stands as a security only for $3,054, and interest.

4. The contracts being usurious, payments are to be applied in reduction of the principal.

5. An account must be taken in respect of all the transactions between the parties set forth in pleadings. The company is to be charged with the goods purchased at agreed price, $11,046.80, less amount of valid taxes thereon at time of sale, as to which proofs may be taken by the master, if the question has not been fully adjudicated. The company is to be charged with the amounts actually received on the collaterals. I find that there is no liability in respect to the alleged negligence in not collecting the collaterals. The company to be charged with net amounts received from sales of goods, deducting fair and reasonable expenses of sales, and respecting and carrying out any fair and just settlement of the parties in this regard. Also with the rent of the store at agreed rate, $50 per month. Also with any premiums charged in respect of the $15,000 life insurance for which no risk was assumed by the company. The commissions at 3 per cent. to be credited on the respective mortgages; the other charges of the agent may stand unless by further proof they are shown to be more than the value of the services rendered. The credits to the estate in bankruptcy to be applied first on the $3,054 and interest thereon; next on the $8,000 loan, and any balance on the $12,000 loan. Let interlocutory decree be drawn accordingly, and cause referred to master to take and state an account. Right reserved, on coming in of report, to modify the foregoing.

PAYMENT—DISCHARGE IN BANKRUPTCY—EVIDENCE—HOW PROVED.

1. Bankruptcy of the plaintiff cannot be proved by parol.

2. If the original entries are lost, a copy may be given in evidence.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

Assumpsit for goods sold and delivered.

Mr. Hewitt, for defendant [Nicholas Voss] offered parol evidence to prove the bankruptcy of the plaintiff [Thomas Moore] and assignment of his effects, to show that the plaintiff could not maintain the action. Refused.

At the prayer of the defendant's counsel, THE COURT (KILTY, Chief Judge, absent) gave the following direction to the jury: That if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the book produced is the original entry of the sale and delivery, or if they should be of opinion, from the evidence, that a former entry had been made, but that the same is now lost or destroyed, and that this book was truly copied from the original entry by the witness, then this book is evidence; but if they should be of opinion that prior entries exist which are not produced, then this book is not evidence. MOORE et al. v. WALTON et al.

District Court, N. D. Mississippi.

PARTNERSHIP — MONEY ADVANCED — RIGHT OF ELECTION—BANKRUPT ACT.

A was an experienced merchant, without means. B and C each had some money which they were willing to risk in a mercantile enterprise, but did not intend to render themselves liable for the debts of the concern, should it prove unsuccessful. B and C advanced the money to purchase the stock of merchandise, the business to be carried on in A's name, giving B and C the option to share in the profits, if successful, and if not, then to receive back the amount advanced with ten per cent. interest. Held, that B and C did not have such an interest in the business as to render them liable as partners, within the meaning of the bankrupt act, the evidence showing there was never an election, on the part of B and C, to share in the profits, and a partnership inter se was never entered into. Petition dismissed as to B. and C.

In bankruptcy.

HILL, District Judge. This is a petition in involuntary bankruptcy, filed by petitioners against the defendants, J. C. Walton, H. W. Berkley and Wm. F. Parks, charging that the said defendants were co-partners, doing business as merchants in the village of Red Banks, in this district, under the firm name and style of J. C. Walton, and that as such they did, within six months before the filing of the petition, commit an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], in this, that they suspended the payment of their commercial paper, and did not resume payment within fourteen days. The petition further charges that the defendants had fraudulently, and with a view of defeating the petitioners and their other creditors of said firm, combined together to place their assets and means beyond the reach of their creditors. That said Parks and Berkley were dormant and secret partners of said firm, contributing the capital and receiving part of the profits, and that to avoid liability as such the said Walton had executed a pretended deed of trust to one Gandum, upon the pretence of conveying to him all his goods, debts, &c., as security for a pretended debt due from said Walton to Berkley, and that Walton had conveyed or was about to do so, and invested in property in Tennessee in the name of his wife, a large portion of the money belonging to said firm. The defendants have filed separate answers denying the partnership and denying that Berkley and Parks ever had any interest in the business other than that they each had loaned Walton one thousand dollars at ten per cent. interest, for the purpose of purchasing the stock; that Berkley, as a friend of Walton, had paid Parks, and for repayment of this sum and the amount advanced by himself, took the trust deed mentioned, and deny all fraud charged. Walton admits his insolvency and suspension and non-resumption of payment of his commercial paper as charged; so that so far as he is concerned there is no doubt of his having committed an act of bankruptcy, and must be so declared.

The difficult question to be determined under the facts as established by the proof, under the rules of law as applied thereto, is as to whether Berkley and Parks were partners, either as secret partners, as charged; or, if not, whether they had so held themselves out to the world as partners as to render them liable to be declared bankrupts as such. I must admit that of the many cases brought before and considered by me under the bankrupt law, I have never found one so difficult of a satisfactory solution, either as to the facts or the law. Without entering into a particular analysis of the proof, I will state the facts which to my mind it establishes. Walton was an experienced merchant, but without means. Berkley and Parks each had some money which they were willing to risk in a mercantile enterprise, but did not intend to render themselves liable for the debts of the concern should it prove unsuccessful; to avoid this they advanced the money to purchase the stock of merchandise, the business to be carried on in Walton's name alone, giving to them the option to share in the profits if successful, or if not successful, then to receive back the amount advanced with ten per cent. interest. The business was conducted with this understanding, until in January, 1870, when Parks, becoming dissatisfied, demanded a settlement, which was made, and Berkley executed to him his note for the balance due him, which was afterwards paid, and he ceased to have any further connection with it. Berkley continued under the original agreement until the failure of the business, about the end of the year 1870, when he took possession of the remnant of the merchandise and debts, claiming under the trust deed dated in April previous, but not admitted to record until the last of October, 1870. The notes executed to petitioners were executed upon the 4th of June, 1870. The proof shows that both Parks and Berkley aided Walton in the sale of the goods, and that both manifested an interest in the business, the former up to the settlement stated, and the latter up to the failure, inconsistent with any other conclusion than that they were either interested in it, or contemplated becoming so. This is especially shown by the conduct of the parties about the time and during the settlement with Parks in January, 1870. The most remarkable conclusion is that neither had determined whether to take a share of the profits or the money with interest up to the falling out between Parks and Walton in January, 1870, when he elected to take his money with interest, which he, as between themselves, had a right to do under the agreement; and that Berkley did not make his election until the filing of the trust deed for record, last October, 1870, and perhaps not until the business was broken up, shortly before this petition was filed, when he claims, as a creditor and not as a partner, to take what was left. Walton denies that he took anything with him, and there is no proof that he did, and, if not, Berkley got all that remained.

The above conclusions are fairly deducible from the proof. The question is, do they establish in Berkley and Parks, or either of them, such an interest in the business as to render them liable as partners within the meaning of the bankrupt law? Partnerships are formed in various ways; usually it is an agreement between two or more, in which it is stipulated that the parties will contribute their capital and skill, one or both, in an enterprise, and share the profits and bear the losses in such proportions as may be agreed upon. It matters not what that proportion may be, one may have more, another less, the extent of the interest being immaterial, but the quality of it must be the same; each must have a voice in controlling the business, and each is the agent for his co-partners with authority to bind them in reference to matters within the scope of the co-partnership business. These are the principal elements of a general partnership. Or as between themselves one may furnish the capital and another transact the business. The business may be conducted in such name as the members may choose to adopt. Some may be secret or dormant members of the firm, and unknown to the world, or to any but themselves; yet if such members have an interest in the profits as such, it will render them liable for all the contracts entered into by the firm within the scope of the co-partnership business. Again, one having, as between himself and the other member or members of the firm, no interest whatever, either in sharing the profits or bearing the losses, yet by holding himself out to the world as a partner may render himself liable as such to those dealing with the firm; he may be willing to give his credit to it, and this is usually done by permitting his name to be used as a member of the firm, or by representing himself as such. Those dealing with the firm have no interest, in questions of interest as between the members themselves. Or one representing himself, to an individual or an individual firm, as a member of a firm, will be liable to those to whom he thus represents himself for any contract made with such person or persons by such firm, but if such representation is confined to those to whom made, with the restriction that it is not to be repeated to another, the liability will be limited to those to whom the representation is made. If no restriction is imposed, then the repetition of the representation so made, by those to whom made, to others, will bind the party, for by his representation without restriction he has added, by credit, to the firm, and must be held by it.

These being some of the general rules, what is the result when applied to the facts as forced from the proof? I am inclined to the opinion that there was no partnership as between themselves, without an election to share in the profits, and that, although both Parks and Berkley contemplated making such election, it was never in fact made, and that a partnership inter se was never entered into. I am, however, inclined to the opinion that their acts and conduct in relation to the business was such as to justify those who gave credit to the business conducted in the name of J. C. Walton, to believe that they were partners and to render them liable for contracts as were made upon the belief that they were such partners. But the difficult question of solution is, can they, for such liability, be proceeded against as partners under the bankrupt law? This is a question of first impression in this or any other court, so far as I am informed, and is one of importance. This involuntary feature of the bankrupt law is punitive in its character and effects, and, as such, should only be applied to those who do some act forbidden by the law, or who fail to do some act required by it. It is not the contracting the debt or debts only, that constitutes the act of bankruptcy, but it is something that is done or neglected to be done afterwards, and contemplates the power in each individual to refrain from doing the thing forbidden, or having the power to do the thing required. This, every partner is presumed to possess, but one who has only lent his credit to the firm by holding himself out as such and thereby liable to those who gave credit upon that account, having no interest in the business, or having no voice in the control over its affairs, has not such power, and such being the case, it seems, ought not to be subject to this feature of the law, whilst he may be liable in action at law, or other legal proceedings, for the debts incurred by the firm, upon the faith of his liability, by reason of his acts or words in so holding himself out, either to one or more individuals, or to the public in general, and if the latter, then he would be bound, whether the party giving the credit knew it or not, for if he held himself out as such to the public, the public, or any member of it, had a right to give him credit. If I am correct in these conclusions it follows that neither Parks or Berkley can be declared bankrupts under these proceedings, although they may be liable to the creditors in a proper action brought for that purpose, which, as a matter of course, cannot be adjudged in this proceeding. But the case, as now presented by the pleadings and proof, shows that the stock of merchandise seized by the marshal, and the debts due to J. C. Walton, or their proceeds, belong to said Walton, and are subject to the payment of his debts, and for that purpose the title to the same will vest in the assignee when one shall have been appointed, and until that is done the provisional assignee will take all necessary steps to collect the same. The question as to the validity of the trust deed, not being directly put in issue in this proceeding is reserved, but this does not interfere with the right of the assignee to collect all the debts due, as though no such conveyance had been made.

The judgment of the court, therefore, is that the proceedings be dismissed as to defendants Parks and Berkley, and that J. C. Walton be declared a bankrupt; that warrant issue and all other regular proceedings be had as in such cases. It is further ordered that the provisional assignee pay the costs of this proceeding, out of the funds in his hands, as such assignee, and that he also refund, out of the same, to petitioners the amount deposited by them and paid as costs.

MOORE v. WATERS.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 283.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.

JUSTICE OF PEACE — JURISDICTION — INCIDENTAL QUESTIONS.

A justice of the peace may have jurisdiction of a matter, incidentally, of which he would not, if it were the principal cause of action; therefore he may have jurisdiction in an action of debt upon a bond, in the penalty of fifty dollars, conditioned that if a certain bay mare should be proved not to be the property of J. B., the bond should be in full force, otherwise, void; and thus collaterally try the title to the mare.

Replevin of the plaintiff's property, taken by the defendant [John Waters] who was a constable, under and by virtue of a fieri facias issued by a justice of the peace upon a judgment, by him rendered, in an action of debt upon a bond, in the penalty of fifty dollars, the condition of which was that if a certain bay mare (described therein) should be thereafter legally proven not to be the property of James Brown, then the bond to be in full force; otherwise void.

Mr. Brent, for plaintiff [James Moore], contended that the justice had no jurisdiction to try the title to the mare, which was the only matter tried by the justice.

Mr. Bradley, contra. The cause of action is a debt of fifty dollars; this is within the jurisdiction of the justice, and he cannot be ousted of that jurisdiction by reason of any collateral matter which may come in question, incidentally upon the trial.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting) was of opinion that the justice had jurisdiction of the cause. The bond was a contract to pay $50, upon a certain event. Whether that event had or had not occurred, was a question incidental to the question whether the debt was due or not. If the justice admitted improper evidence, it was error, but could not oust him of jurisdiction. Verdict for defendant.

MOORE v. WILMARTH et al.

[4 Leg. Int. 195.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov. 5, 1847.

EXECUTION — IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT — FEDERAL COURTS — FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE — PUBLIC AND PRIVATE DEBTORS.

1. If a debtor, after suit in this court, takes the benefit of the insolvent laws of Massachusetts, he is entitled, under the acts of congress as to imprisonment for debt, to have an execution issued against his property alone.

[See Moan v. Wilmarth, Case No. 9,686.]

2. The body of a private debtor, when sued in a United States court, is imprisoned, or not, on execution, according to the laws and policy of the state in which the execution issues; but an execution against a debtor to the United States is governed by the uniform and fixed laws of congress.

MOORE v. YOUNG.

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. Jan. Term, 1868.

BANKRUPTCY—VOID PREFERENCE—CHATTEL MORTGAGE—RIGHT OF MORTGAGEE TO TAKE POSSESSION—ATTEMPT TO SELL—RECORDING—RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE.

1. The filing by the mortgagor of a voluntary petition in bankruptcy is "an attempt to sell," within the meaning of the usual clause in chattel mortgages.

2. A chattel mortgage on a stock of goods can only be prima facie fraudulent, as being out of the usual and ordinary course of business, and its validity may be established by proof.

3. In Indiana an unrecorded chattel mortgage, where the property is not delivered to the mortgagee, is absolutely void, as against the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor.

[Cited in Re Oliver, Case No. 10,492.]

4. The assignee is not one of "the parties to the mortgage," but for the collection of assets he represents the creditors, and may sue in every case where they might have sued had the debtor not become bankrupt.

[This was a bill by George J. Moore, assignee in bankruptcy, against Zebulon J. Young.]

A. C. Downey, for complainant.

Carter, Downey & Gordon, for defendant.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is a proceeding in chancery under the bankrupt law. The bill was filed October 30, 1867. The case it proceeds on is substantially as follows: On the first of July last, one Shadrach Hathaway and William H. Hathaway were indebted to the defendant Young to the amount of four thousand dollars, for which they executed to him a note for that sum, payable in one year; and, to secure its payment, they executed to him a mortgage on about twelve thousand dollars worth of goods in a store at Vevay, in Switzerland county, Indiana. The Hathaways then resided at Rising Sun, Ohio county, Indiana. Of this stock of goods, Young had then, and till August following, the custody as their agent and clerk to retail the same.

On the 28th of August, 1867, the Hathaways were, on their own petition, by this court adjudged bankrupts; and Moore, the complainant, was chosen their assignee in September following. At the time when the mortgage was executed, and till the time when the bill was filed, the goods in question were kept in a store-house in Vevay, which was held by the Hathaways under a lease for years.

On the 23rd of October, 1867, Moore, as assignee, demanded the possession of said store-house and goods from Young, who refused to deliver them, claiming the right to retain the goods by virtue of the mortgage. The store-house is not included in the mortgage.

The bill charges that Young was not justified in withholding the store-house and goods by virtue of the mortgage,—1, because the store-house is not mortgaged; 2, because no default by the mortgagors has happened entitling the mortgagee, according to the terms of the mortgage, to take possession of the goods; 3, because the mortgage was made in contemplation of insolvency within four months of the filing of said petition in bankruptcy, with a view to give a preference to Young as a creditor of the bankrupts, he then having reasonable ground to believe that they were insolvent, and that the mortgage was made in fraud of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]; 4, because the mortgage was not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the Hathaways; 5, because the mortgage is void on its face; 6, because the mortgage was never recorded in the county where the mortgagors resided.

A copy of the mortgage is exhibited with the bill.

The answer filed admits the proceedings in bankruptcy; the appointment of Moore as assignee; that the goods in question are in Young's custody, and are worth eleven thousand eight hundred thirty-three dollars and twenty-four cents; and that the mortgage was never recorded in the county where the mortgagors resided. But it denies all fraud; and alleges that the mortgage was made bona fide, not in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, without any view to a preference, without any ground to believe that the Hathaways were insolvent or contemplated insolvency, and in the usual course of their business. The answer avers that the assignment in bankruptcy was such an attempt to sell the mortgaged property as, by the terms of the mortgage, entitled Young to the possession of the goods.

A general replication has been filed; and the cause has been submitted for final hearing and decree on the bill, answer, exhibits, depositions, and certain evidence heard on the trial.

If the mortgage was made bona fide, on a proper consideration, and not in violation of any of the provisions of the bankrupt law, and if it is valid on its face, and is not rendered void as to the assignee by the omission to record it,—I suppose that this action must fail as to the goods. For if, under the facts alleged and proved, Young has a valid lien on the goods, the assignee's course was, not to file this bill, but to apply to the court for leave to redeem the goods from the mortgage lien. Such is the course pointed out by the 14th section of the act and the 17th rule of the supreme court. As to Young's refusal to deliver possession of the store-house, the record shows no justification or excuse for it on the part of the defendant. There must, therefore, be a decree against him on this branch of the case.

As to the goods claimed by the defendant by virtue of his supposed mortgage lien; I will consider the complainant's objections to that claim set forth in the bill, in the order in which they are above stated.

1. The complainant urges that no default has yet happened, touching any condition in the mortgage; and that, therefore, the defendant is not entitled to the possession of the goods. The note, the payment of which the mortgage was intended to secure, will not be due till July next, so, there has been no default in payment.

The mortgage provides that the goods are to remain in the mortgagors' possession till default be made in payment; but that any attempt to sell the goods, without the consent of the mortgagee, shall entitle him to their possession. Were the proceedings in bankruptcy an attempt to "sell" the goods within this provision of the mortgage? I am inclined to answer this question in the affirmative. On the principle that we must construe such instruments as this most strongly against the makers of them, according to the spirit of them, and according to the intent of the parties, I rather think that the transfer of the goods in the bankrupt proceeding was an attempt to sell them, as a sale of them would be the consequence. And this view, I think, is sanctioned by the maxim, "Qui facit per alium, facit per se." The mortgagor could no more authorize their sale by a proceeding in bankruptcy, than he could sell them himself, without breaking the condition of the mortgage.

2. The bill avers that the mortgage is void, because it was made in contemplation of insolvency within four months next before the filing of the mortgagors' petition in bankruptcy. The thirty-fifth section of the act provides that transfers of property, made in contemplation of insolvency within four months before proceedings in bankruptcy by or against the party making the transfer, shall be void, the person to be benefited thereby "having reasonable ground to believe such person is insolvent," and that such transfer "is made in fraud of the provisions of" the bankrupt law. But the evidence does not bring the defendant and his mortgage within the provisions of this section of the act. On the contrary, it is clearly proved that the mortgagors, in executing this mortgage, did not contemplate insolvency, and did not execute it with intent to violate the provisions of the act; and it is equally well proved that the mortgagee, when he took the mortgage, had no reason to believe that the mortgage was made in fraud of the bankrupt act, or that the mortgagors were then insolvent, or even under any pecuniary embarrassment. This objection to the mortgage, therefore, fails for want of proof.

3. The mortgage is objected to as void under the bankrupt law, because it was not made in the usual and ordinary course of the business of the mortgagees. The thirty-fifth section of the act declares that if such a mortgage as the present "is not made in the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor, the fact shall be deemed prima facie evidence of fraud." It is not easy to see precisely what is here meant by the phrase—"the usual and ordinary course of business of the debtor." But I am inclined to think that, upon the evidence, the mortgage in question was made in the usual and ordinary course of business as much as any chattel mortgage could be. It was made to secure an honest debt, part of which was money loaned at the time. But be this as it may, the mortgage could at most be only prima facie fraudulent; and I think the evidence plainly overthrows any such prima facie presumption against this mortgage. This objection to the validity of the mortgage, therefore, can not be sustained.

4. Does the omission to record the mortgage in the county where the mortgagors resided render it void as to the assignee in bankruptcy? The answer to this question must depend on our construction of the bankrupt act and of the Indiana statute relating to the recording of chattel mortgages.

As to the bankrupt act, the defendant insists, that it gives to the assignee precisely the same rights—neither more nor less—which the bankrupt had before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy; and that, as an unrecorded chattel mortgage is confessedly good between the mortgagor and mortgagee, so it must be good as between the assignee in bankruptcy of the mortgagor and the mortgagee. It must be admitted that this view is sustained by many decisions under the bankrupt act of 1841 [5 Stat. 440], and that it is supported by the high authority of Judge Story. Yet nearly all these decisions, except from the rule the case of a fraudulent conveyance by the bankrupt, which is allowed to be good as to the bankrupt himself, but void as to his assignee. This exception has obtained on the ground that such a conveyance is a fraud upon creditors, and that, as the bankrupt law took away the right of action by creditors for such fraud, it must be deemed to have vested the same right of action in the assignee—else the creditors would be without remedy. Does not the reason of this exception equally apply to the case of an unrecorded chattel mortgage? It is very clear that, as to creditors, an unrecorded chattel mortgage, where the property is not delivered to the mortgagee, is absolutely void. And, in the present case, it is certain that if the Hathaways had not been decreed bankrupts, their creditors might have subjected the goods in question to the payment of their debts, notwithstanding this mortgage. But now their right to do so is taken away by the adjudication in bankruptcy; and is it not just as reasonable to suppose that the right vested in the assignee, as that it does so in the case of a fraudulent conveyance? Besides, is it very clear that the failure to record a chattel mortgage, in cases where the mortgagor retains the chattels, is not, in law, a fraud? It is the rule in Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80, that the retention of possession by a vendor or mortgagor of chattels, is in law conclusive evidence of fraud; and there is no authority which makes such retention less than prima facie evidence of fraud upon creditors. The Indiana statute, indeed, so far alters the rule, that if the mortgage is duly recorded the retention of the possession of the goods by the mortgagor is here, perhaps, no evidence of fraud at all. But if the mortgage is not recorded, I think the case is left, as under the statutes of 13 and 27 Eliz., in which such retention of possession is at least prima facie evidence of fraud. In the present case, therefore, the omission to record the mortgage is, in my opinion, a fraud upon the creditors of the bankrupts; and so the case falls literally within the exception to the general rule insisted on by the defendant and supported by the authority of Judge Story.

The third proviso of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act seems to sustain the view here taken. It declares, "That no mortgage * * * made as security for any debt or debts in good faith, and for present consideration and otherwise valid, and duly recorded pursuant to any statute of the United States, or of any state, shall be invalidated hereby."

This provision saves from the operation of the act all prior bona fide mortgages made on present considerations, and duly recorded; and it saves no others. The inference from it appears to me to be fair, and even irresistible, that mortgages not so made and recorded shall be invalidated by the bankrupt act. And, upon this proviso alone, I would think the mortgage in question void as to the complainant.

The Indiana statute provides that, "No assignment of goods by way of mortgage shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, where such goods are not delivered to the mortgagee or assignee and retained by him, unless such assignment or mortgage shall be acknowledged, as provided in cases of deeds of conveyance, and recorded in the recorder's office of the county where the mortgagor resides, within ten days after the execution thereof." 1 Gavin & H. St. p. 352.

It should be noted that this statute is unlike most statutes relating to the recording of deeds and mortgages of real estate, by which, unless recorded within a given time, they are "fraudulent and void as against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee in good faith and for valuable consideration." 1 Gavin & H. St. p. 261. Under such provisions the unrecorded instrument is held good as to all men except purchasers and mortgagees in good faith and for valuable consideration; and he who has notice of such unrecorded instrument is not such purchaser or mortgagee in good faith, and it is valid even as to him. Whereas, the statute above cited makes the unrecorded mortgage of chattels absolutely void as to all men but "the parties thereto," even though they have notice thereof, the only question, as to the mortgage under consideration, seems to me to be thus: Is Moore, the assignee in bankruptcy, a "party thereto"? Without the aid of any authority, we might well answer this question in the negative: the parties thereto are the mortgagors and the mortgagee only. But in rendering this answer, we are not without authority; we are supported by a controlling authority. The supreme court of Indiana, in Lockwood v. Slevin, 26 Ind. 124, has so decided. That case decides that in the case of a voluntary assignment by an insolvent debtor for the benefit of his creditors, his assignee shall hold the goods assigned as against a prior unrecorded mortgage of them; and that such mortgage is void as to such assignee. And Judge Frazer, who delivered the opinion in that case, says that "the statute expressly enacts that a mortgage of chattels, where the possession is not changed, shall not be valid against any other person than the parties to it, unless it is recorded within ten days after the execution thereof. The language is so plain that no room is allowed for construction. Actual notice can make no difference." This decision is in point. It is a construction of the Indiana statute concerning the recording of chattel mortgages, given by the supreme court of Indiana; and it is binding on the courts of the United States. Chicago City v. Robbins, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 418; Gelpcke v. City of Dubuque, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 175; Christy v. Pridgeon, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 196; Green v. Van Buskirk, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 307. Then, the supreme court of Indiana has settled the meaning of the Indiana statute in question, and has held that a prior unrecorded chattel mortgage is void as between the mortgagee and an assignee under a voluntary assignment for the benefit of creditors. If as to such an assignee it is void, the inevitable conclusion must be that it is void as to an assignee in bankruptcy; for surely the former can have no greater rights than the latter. Indeed there is strong reason to conclude that they are not so great, since the one is a mere volunteer and the whole proceeding voluntary; whereas the other is appointed and controlled by a United States court, and governed by an act of congress. But it is enough for the purpose of this decision that the two stand in all respects upon an equality.

In my opinion, it is an error that an assignee in bankruptcy stands in all respects in the condition of the bankrupt, and represents him only. I think that, in the collection of assets, he also represents the creditors; and, as a general rule, may sue in every case in which they might have sued, if the debtor had not become a bankrupt. Upon the whole case, as made in the bill, the decree must be for the complainant.

NOTE. In a state where a mortgage is void as to creditors unless recorded, the assignee takes title as against an unrecorded instrument. Allen v. Massey [Case No. 231]; In re Wynne [Id. 18,117]; Brock v. Terrell [Id. 1,914]; Bank of Leavenworth v. Hunt, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 391; Harvey v. Crane [Case No. 6,178], and cases there cited. Nor can the mortgagee rely upon possession taken under his unrecorded mortgage. Harvey v. Crane, last above cited; In re Hussmann [Case No. 6,951]; In re Manly [Id. 9,031]; Foster v. Hackley [Id. 4,971]; Bean v. Amsink [Id. 1,167]; Seaver v. Spink [65 Ill. 441]; In re Morrill [Case No. 9,821].

As to what is a sale, in "the usual and ordinary course of business," consult In re Hunt [Case No. 6,881]; Rison v. Knapp [Id. 11,861]; Darby v. Lucas [Id. 3,572]; Judson v. Kelty [Id. 7,567.]

The assignee, as to parties claiming rights or liens against the estate, represents the creditors, and any transaction which would be void for fraud as against creditors if no petition had been filed, is void as against the assignee. He takes the title, and it is his duty to proceed legally to annul a fraudulent conveyance. In re Wynne [supra]; In re Metzger [Case No. 9,510]; Boone v. Hall, 7 Bush, 66; Bradshaw v. [Hempst. 64.] [1]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1828.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—PERSONAL PROPERTY ACQUIRED BY WIFE—PLEADING AT LAW—JOINDER OF WIFE.

1. Although a wife may live separate from her husband, and acquire property by her personal labor and exertions, or by gift, yet it belongs to the husband, and he alone must sue for any injury to it. The wife cannot join in the action.

2. It is not error to refuse to allow an amendment, by striking out the name of one of the plaintiffs in a suit.

Error to the Crawford circuit court.

[This was an action of trespass vi et armis by Benjamin Moores and Ann Moores, his wife, against Lawrence F. Carter, Frederick Thomas, and William Clark.]

Before ESKRIDGE and BATES, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The plaintiffs brought an action of trespass vi et armis against the defendants, and in their declaration aver, that the plaintiff, Benjamin Moores, is a private soldier in the United States army, and is stationed at Fort Gibson in this territory; and that he lived separate and apart from his wife, Ann Moores, who by her industry had become possessed of a small dwelling-house; and had furnished it at her own expense, and resided in it, separate and apart from her husband; that the defendants with force and arms, entered the dwelling-house, and threw her into great fear by their menacing manner, by breaking open her chests, searching all the private apartments, greatly disturbing her and injuring the property, and took and carried away various articles of property, of the proper goods and chattels of the plaintiffs. At the appearance term, on the motion of the defendants, the proceedings and declaration were quashed; and after the above order was made, the plaintiffs' attorney asked leave to amend the declaration, but his motion was overruled, and the suit dismissed.

Two questions are presented in this case: First, can the plaintiffs join in the action; and second, if they were improperly joined in bringing the suit, should the court have permitted the declaration to be amended. We have no doubt that the wife was improperly joined with the husband in bringing the action. Although she lived separate and apart from him, the marriage was in full force, and he was legally entitled to all the marital rights. The dwelling-house, and all the goods and chattels purchased or owned by the wife, belonged to the husband, and for an injury done to that property the husband alone must sue. This doctrine is too well settled to be controverted; and it is not necessary to support it by reference to authority. It has been argued, that she was the meritorious cause of action, and therefore had a right to join. If this was true, the consequence might follow; but she was not the meritorious cause of action in the sense contemplated by law. Every species of personal property which the wife may acquire by purchase, by her own personal labor, or by gift, during the coverture, belongs to the husband, and consequently an injury to that property, or the taking of it away, can only give a right of action to the husband, and not to the wife.

Upon the second question, as to the amendment, we have no doubt that the declaration could not be amended, by striking out one of the plaintiffs. It would have been more regular if the defendants had demurred, instead of moving to quash the declaration. But we are not inclined to regard an objection as to form only, since the motion was in the nature of a demurrer, and the judgment of the court was in substance the same.

It is true there is no judgment in favor of the defendants for costs in the court below; but of this the plaintiffs have no right to complain. Judgment affirmed.

TRADE-MARK—REGISTRY AS EVIDENCE—FORM OF BARREL.

1. The certificate of the registry of a trade-mark, issued to the claimant by the commissioner of patents, under the act of congress of July 8, 1870 [16 Stat. 198], is not conclusive evidence that the device claimed as a trade-mark, is, or can become, a lawful trade-mark, or that the claimant is the first appropriator, and entitled to its exclusive use.

[Cited in L. H. Harris Drug Co. v. Stucky, 46 Fed. 628.]

2. A barrel of peculiar form, dimensions and capacity, irrespective of any marks or brands impressed upon, or connected with it, cannot become a lawful trade-mark, or a substantive part of a lawful trade-mark.

Bill in equity [by C. P. Moorman and others against Walter Hoge and others], the object of which, is, to obtain a decree restraining an alleged infringement of complainants' trade-mark. From some time prior to 1857, till July 2, 1860, one J. H. Cutter, and complainant, Moorman, were doing business as partners at Louisville, Kentucky, under the name of "J. H. Cutter & Co." The firm was engaged in the manufacture and sale of whisky. Their whisky acquired throughout the country, and particularly in the state of California, a high reputation for excellence, and, was generally known as "Cutter Whisky." The said "J. H. Cutter & Co.," adopted for their California trade, a barrel of peculiar shape and size, in which their whiskies for said market, were put up, shipped and sold. The said barrel was adopted as a trade-mark, in part, to enable dealers in whiskies to more readily distinguish the whiskies of said firm, from those manufactured and sold by other parties. The said barrel is made of staves thirty-eight inches in length, and one and one fourth inches thick. It is twenty inches diameter at the head, has sixteen wooden, and four heavy iron hoops, and is of the capacity of fifty gallons; while ordinary whisky barrels are but thirty-two inches long, with staves of half that thickness, and fewer hoops, and have a capacity of only forty gallons. These barrels, thus used by said "J. H. Cutter & Co.," to contain the whiskies manufactured and sold by them, were branded on the head with the words, "J. H. Cutter, Old Bourbon," and "J. H. Cutter, Pure Old Rye." The words "J. H. Cutter," being in an arc of a circle, the words "Old," and "Pure," respectively being in a straight line within the arc under the words "J. H. Cutter," and, the words "Bourbon" and "Old Rye," on a straight line directly under the others, below the arc formed by the name. The initials, "J. H. C." were also branded on the barrel near the bung-hole, as a bung mark. In the year 1859, they added an English crown, as a part of the trade mark, which was branded on the head just below the centre, and under the words "J. H. Cutter, Old Bourbon," and "J. H. Cutter, Pure Old Rye." These barrels and marks were used by said J. H. Cutter & Co., in their whisky trade till on, or about, July 2, 1860, when said J. H. Cutter, for a valuable consideration, sold and transferred all his right, title and interest in the business, and to the trade-marks and brands, and the sole right to use, and sell the same, to the complainants in this case; and the said complainants under the firm name of "C. P. Moorman & Co.," have continued to carry on the said business, of manufacturing and selling whiskies at Louisville, Kentucky, and putting them up and selling them in said barrels, branded with said marks, from said date to the present time claiming the said barrel, and said marks as their trade-mark. In the month of November, 1870, the complainants filed, and caused to be recorded, in the United States patent office, at Washington, a verified statement and claim of said trade-mark, having annexed thereto a fac simile of the said barrel, together with the marks aforesaid branded thereon, and under the English crown, the further words in five elliptical lines, "A. P. Hotaling & Co., San Francisco, Sole Agents, for Pacific Coast." And on the other end in three lines forming an ellipse, the words "C. P. Moorman & Co., Manufacturers, Louisville, Ky.;" and, thereupon, the United States commissioner of patents issued to said complainants the certificate provided for in the act of congress relating to the subject. A true copy of the fac simile of said barrel, and of the said marks branded thereon, is annexed to the bill. Upon the issue, as to whether J. H. Cutter was the originator of said barrel, and whether he and his successors, the said complainants, solely used said barrel, and, whether it was generally known in the whisky trade, as the "Cutter Barrel," the testimony is very voluminous, and is in striking conflict. After a careful consideration of the testimony, the court found that J. H. Cutter did originate, and first use this peculiar barrel in the liquor trade; that the barrel was of unusual form and dimensions; that when the pattern was furnished, it was necessary to have staves, and other stock got out expressly for this barrel; that Cutter adopted it for his whiskies, and continuously used it for the California trade, till he transferred his interest in the business, barrel, and brand to complainants; that the complainants have continued to use it from that time till the present, claiming it as their barrel; that the said barrel has not been used by other parties, except occasionally, when it has been manufactured clandestinely, and used without the knowledge, or when known, against the protest and claim of the complainants, and their assignor; that especially for upwards of ten years last past, the complainants and their assignor, have shipped every year large quantities of whiskies in said barrel to California, and sold them on the Pacific coast under the name of "Cutter Whisky," and that no other person has, during that time, and prior to the acts of defendants complained of, shipped any considerable quantity of whisky in similar barrels; that the said barrel had become very generally known in the trade in San Francisco and on the Pacific coast, as the "Cutter Barrel," so much so, that, if a party familiar with the trade and this barrel, should see such barrel, even at a distance, as across the street, he would expect to find it contain "Cutter Whisky." The defendants are agents at San Francisco, California, for the sale of whiskies on the Pacific coast, for Jesse Moore & Co., a firm engaged in the manufacture and sale of whisky at Louisville, Kentucky. Within the two years next preceding the filing of the bill, said Jesse Moore & Co. shipped to defendants at San Francisco, several hundred barrels of whisky for sale, and the said defendants have sold, and they are now engaged in selling, said whiskies in California, and elsewhere on the Pacific coast. Said whiskies are put up in barrels, which are in all respects as to size, shape, and general appearance, so far as the barrel itself is concerned, a close imitation of the barrel which complainants use for their "Cutter Whisky." The appearance of the two barrels is manifestly alike, and any party looking at the two barrels, without regarding the marks on them, would at once pronounce them the same barrel. The defendants, doubtless, intended the barrels to be alike; for they directed their principals to send their whisky in such barrels, and that they might do so, sent them the measures of the barrel used by the complainants, and called the "Cutter Barrel." But the marks on the barrels are wholly different. The Bourbon whisky barrel of defendants has branded on one head in the centre, and within a circle burnt into the head, and in a circular form, the words, "G. H. Moore, Bourbon;" and within the circle formed by these words, the word "Old," in a straight line with a star above and below it. Over this centre brand are the words "E. Chielovich & Co.," forming the arc of a circle, and under these words, in three straight lines, are the words, "San Francisco, Cal., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast;" and at the bung, as a bung-mark, the initials "G. H. M." The rye whisky barrel has the words in a similar form and situation, "E. Chielovich & Co., San Francisco, Cal., Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast. J. Moore & Co., Old Rye Whisky;" and as a bung-mark, the initials "J. M." There is no similarity in the marks and devices branded on the barrels of the respective parties, or in the form in which the words are arranged. There is nothing in these marks or devices aside from the barrel that would lead a purchaser to mistake one for the other. The only similarity between the packages is the barrel itself, independent of the marks upon it, but in this particular the defendants' package is a clear imitation of complainants'. As there is no claim that there is any simulation of the marks or brands on the barrel, it will be unnecessary to more particularly describe them. The defendants sell their whiskies as Jesse Moore & Co.'s whiskies, and make no representation that their whiskies are "Cutter Whisky," other than so far as the fact that they use a similar barrel to that in which "Cutter Whisky" has been so long sold, as to become known as the package which ordinarily contains "Cutter Whisky," can be regarded as such a representation.

Wm. H. Patterson and Alex. Campbell, for complainants.

Hall McAllister and W. H. Rhodes, for defendants.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. The complainants do not claim that there is any infringement upon that part of what they claim to be their trade-mark, which consists of the words and devices stamped upon the barrel. The claim is that there is an infringement by the use of the barrel only. Is the plaintiff entitled to the exclusive use of a barrel of this peculiar form, construction and capacity, without regard to any mark or device impressed upon, or connected with it? Can a barrel of this description be appropriated as a trade-mark, or substantive part of a trade-mark, so as to exclude the rest of the world from using it in the same branch of business? If so, the complainants, in my judgment, are entitled to the relief sought, otherwise, not.

Complainants invoke the act of congress, of July 8, 1870, entitled, "An act to revise, consolidate and amend the statutes relating to patents and copy-rights." 16 Stat. 198. The seventy-seventh section provides, "That any person or firm domiciled in the United States * * *, and who are entitled to the exclusive use of any lawful trade-mark, or who intend to adopt, and use any trade-mark for exclusive use within the United States, may obtain protection for such lawful trade-mark by complying with the following requirements, to wit:" stating the conditions.

The seventy-eighth section provides that the party or firm, performing the statutory conditions, shall be entitled to use the trade-mark for thirty years, and that "no other person shall lawfully use the same trade-mark, or substantially the same, or so nearly resembling it, as to be calculated to deceive upon substantially the same description of goods."

The seventy-ninth section provides a remedy for violation of the right by imitation, etc., by an action for damages, and injunction. It, also, provides, that, "the commissioner of patents shall not receive and record, any proposed trade-mark which is not, and cannot become, a lawful trade-mark." The eightieth section makes the certificate of the commissioner under seal of the patent office, "evidence in any suit in which such trade-mark shall be brought into controversy."

It is not denied that the complainants have performed all the acts required by the act of congress to secure the protection contemplated, and that the certificate of the commissioner of patents was in form regularly issued. This being so, complainants insist, that the court can only look to the certificate, and the act of congress, to determine the question at issue; that the act of congress confers upon the commissioner jurisdiction to examine and determine whether the proposed trade-mark is, or, can become a lawful trade-mark; whether it was first used and appropriated by the claimant, or is not identical with a trade-mark appropriated to the same class of goods, and belonging to a different party, or already registered, or, received for registration; and whether it does not so nearly resemble any trade-mark registered or filed for registry, as to be likely to deceive the public; and, that having jurisdiction to determine these matters, his determination is conclusive, and the questions are not open to examination in this court. Rubber Co. v. Goodyear, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 796, and Eureka Co. v. Bailey Co., 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 492, are cited as sustaining the proposition.

I cannot assent to this view. The cases cited only go to the point, that a patent cannot be collaterally attacked on the ground that the extension and re-issue of the patents in question had been procured by fraud. It was held, that, if the patents themselves were to be avoided on the ground of fraud in their issue, the patents being otherwise good, it must be done by a direct proceeding in equity to vacate them. That is an entirely different question from the one now presented. The proceeding before the commissioner to obtain protection for a trade-mark under the act of congress, is purely ex parte. Other parties have no notice, actual or constructive. They have no opportunity to be heard, and their rights cannot be thus conclusively determined in a proceeding to which they are in no sense parties. The certificate of the commissioner of patents, I take it, can have no more conclusive effect as to the rights of third persons, than a patent issued under the patent laws by the same commissioner of patents. The commissioner in such cases is required to investigate the claim to the patent, and to determine whether the subject of the application is patentable; whether the applicant is the inventor; whether it is new, and useful, etc. While the patent is held to be prima facie evidence, that the machine is new and useful, it is nowhere held to be conclusive on these points, or upon the point whether the machine, or device, or article, is the proper subject of a patent. On the contrary, in every-day practice in the courts in patent cases, the very questions most frequently considered and determined, are, whether the thing patented is patentable; whether it is new, or useful, etc.; and, in the very cases cited to sustain complainants' position, the court determined questions as to the patentability of the articles involved in the patent. If the principle contended for could be maintained, there is not a barrel, or package of any kind in use in mercantile transactions, which could not be appropriated as a trade-mark, no matter how long, or how generally it had been in use, if a party could, in an ex parte application, by any representation, fraud, or other means, once procure it to be registered, and the certificate issued: for this would be conclusive upon all the world, upon the points that it could become a trade-mark, and that the applicant was the first to appropriate and use it, for that purpose.

This point, in my judgment, must be determined against the complainants.

This brings us to the great, and highly important question, whether a barrel of peculiar form and dimensions, without any marks, symbols, or devices of any kind impressed upon, or connected with it, can, in fact and in law, become a trade-mark, or a substantive part of a trade-mark, so as to invest the claimant with an exclusive right to use it. It will be observed that the statute, under which the claim is made, does not define the term, "trade-mark," or say of what it shall consist. The term is used as though its signification was already known in the law. It speaks of it as an already existing thing, and protects it as such. The thing to be protected must be an existing lawful "trade-mark," or something that may then for the first time be adopted as a lawful trade-mark independent of the statute. There must be a lawful trade-mark adopted without reference to the statute, and then, by taking the prescribed steps, that trade-mark so already created and existing, may receive certain further protection under the statute. This is apparent from the language of the seventy-seventh section, which speaks of parties, "who are entitled to the exclusive use of any lawful trade-mark, or who intend to adopt and use any trade-mark for exclusive use," etc., and, by the seventy-ninth section, which forbids the commissioner to receive and record any proposed trade-mark which is not, and cannot become a lawful trade-mark. It does not say what shall constitute a lawful trade-mark. We must, therefore, go to the law of the land, outside this statute, to ascertain what is, or what may become a lawful trade-mark; for the statute leaves the definition of a trade-mark to the law, as it before stood. The definition of a trade-mark, given by Mr. Upton, is as follows, to wit: "A trade-mark is the name, symbol, figure, letter, form, or device, adopted and used by a manufacturer, or merchant, in order to designate the goods that he manufactures, or sells, and distinguish them from those manufactured or sold by another; to the end that they may be known in the market as his, and thus enable him to secure such profits as result from a reputation for superior skill, industry, or enterprise." Upton, Trade-Marks, p. 9.

This is a good general definition, broad enough in its terms, probably, to cover every case to be found in the books, but it would not alone, perhaps, be sufficient as a test by which every individual claim of a device, as a proper trade-mark, can be tried and determined, without looking into the cases from which the definition is compiled, to see what names, symbols, figures, letters, forms, and devices have been recognized and protected as trade-marks. The words "form," and "device," for instance, are very broad terms, and they might, in a general and comprehensive sense, embrace the form of a barrel, or package, or of the article of merchandise itself sold. But the words of definition are all used in connection with the word, "mark," and the word "mark," in its first and usual signification is defined, by Webster, to be "a visible sign, made or left upon any thing; a line, point, stamp, figure, or the like, drawn or impressed, so as to attract the attention, and carry some information, or intimation; a token; a trace." And some such mark used in connection with, impressed, cut, or stamped upon, or attached to the article manufactured, or sold, in the ordinary course of trade, embraces the usual and ordinary idea of a "trade-mark." The primary and the sole object of the trade-mark, is to distinguish the goods as being a particular manufacture, or as belonging to a particular party. It is cut, stamped, engraved, impressed upon, attached, or in some way appended to the goods, the vessel containing them, or the covering wrapped around the goods for this sole purpose. The object of using a barrel, box, or other package, is to contain, carry, protect, and preserve the goods, or for their convenient handling; and form of some kind and dimensions, are essential in a box, barrel, or package, without which it can have no existence. But the size or shape of the barrel, box, or package can scarcely be considered a mark, nor can that be the sense in which the terms, "form" or "device," are used when employed as a definition of a mark, used for purposes of trade. So general is the idea that the symbol, figure, letter, form, or device, used for a trade-mark, must be a mark, impressed, cut, engraved, stamped, cast upon, or in some way wrapped around, or appended to, the article, or the package, as something independent of the article itself, or the package used to contain it, that it is carried into the statutes of some states, where it is, doubtless, only intended to adopt the common law definition.

Thus, in the statute of California, the language used is, "any peculiar name, letter, mark, device, figure, or other trade-mark, or name, cut, stamped, cast, or engraved upon, or in any manner attached to, or connected with, any article, or with the covering or wrapping thereof manufactured, or sold," etc. This indicates that it was not supposed that the barrel, package, covering or wrapping itself, which is used for another purpose could properly be used as a trade-mark, but that the trade-mark must be some mark of the kind indicated in some way, impressed, cut, cast upon, or connected with, such package, covering, etc., or the article itself.

The complainants in this case prior to the passage of the act of congress in question, filed their trade-mark in the office of the secretary of state, of California, and, in so doing, they omitted the barrel as a part of their trade-mark, although it had, long before that time been adopted and used by them in their California trade. The reason assigned for this omission by their counsel, on the argument of this cause, in answer to the suggestion that the omission constituted an abandonment of the barrel, was, that, under this statute of California, they could not adopt the barrel as a trade-mark, for that the trade-mark, under the act, must be cut, engraved, stamped, impressed, cast, etc., on the barrel, package, etc., and this, I apprehend, is the true idea of a trade-mark at common law with respect to this point.

I have examined with care a large number of cases involving infringements of trade-marks, including all the recent cases, which I have been able to find, so far as they bear upon the question in hand. It would be an arduous and unprofitable task to comment upon them all, and I shall content myself with stating briefly the result of my examination.

In every case there was a trade-mark proper, such as is indicated in this opinion, embracing some name, symbol, figure, letter, form or device, cut, stamped, cast, impressed or engraved upon, blown into, or, in some manner attached to or connected with the article manufactured or sold, or the package containing it, or the covering or wrapping thereof. Where the vessel containing the article was of glass, iron or other metal, whether of peculiar shape and dimensions or not, the trade-mark proper was often blown, or cast, in the vessel, sometimes on a shoulder, sometimes in the body of the vessel. There were various ways of impressing upon, or connecting with the vessel, package or article, the mark; but there always was a mark in fact, other than the shape or size of the vessel, or package. I find no case where the vessel, box, package, or whatever contained the article, has been held to constitute a trade-mark by reason of its peculiar form or dimensions, independent of any symbol, figure or device impressed upon, or connected with it for a trade-mark. I find no case where the use of a package of peculiar form and dimensions has been restrained without having imprinted upon, or connected with it, some other symbol, word, letter, or form, adopted as a trade-mark. There are numerous cases where the use of a bottle, or other vessel, or package, having upon it the device adopted as a trade-mark, has been enjoined, but, I find none restraining the use of the bottle, vessel or package without the device impressed upon, or connected with it.

A manuscript copy of a recent decree rendered by the court of chancery at Louisville, Kentucky, in the case of Wilder v. Wilder [unreported], has been furnished me by complainants' counsel, as a case in point. But in that case, the defendants were restrained from selling "any preparation or compound under the name and style of 'J. B. Wilder & Co.'s Stomach Bitters,' printed, stamped, or engraved upon the bottles, labels, wrappers, covers, boxes or packages thereof. Also, from using the bottle herein exhibited marked 'B. 2,' and from imitating or causing to be imitated in any manner, either the bottle or label of the plaintiff herein marked respectively, 'A. and B.'"

This case does not appear to be in any respect inconsistent with the view indicated. Here was a trade-mark proper in connection with the bottle, and, as the court restrained defendants from selling the compound in connection with the trade-mark, "printed, stamped or engraved upon the bottle," doubtless, the complainants' bottles referred to as exhibits in that case, had the trade-mark impressed upon, or blown into the bottles, and this being so, it would be impossible to use those bottles without their having the trade-mark on them, and, therefore, also using the trade-mark itself. The trade-mark, in such cases, constitutes a part of that particular bottle. If this is not the true state of facts, then the copy of the decree furnished me does not show what the exact case is. At all events, it does not appear to be an exception to the general rule before stated. There are numerous cases where the use of a particular bottle or package has been restrained, when the bottle or package had the trade-mark impressed upon or blown into its structure, making it a part of the package itself, and it was necessary to include the particular description of bottle in order to restrain the use of the trade-mark indelibly impressed upon it. But, as before stated, I find no instance where the use of a bottle, vessel or package of a peculiar form and size has been enjoined with the trade-mark of the complainant, or colorable imitation thereof, used upon, or connected with it, omitted.

Doubtless a bottle, vessel, or package of a peculiar form may be used as auxiliary to the trade-mark proper, and may be of use in solving a question of intent of a party, in imitating, or using an evasive simulation of another's trade-mark. As, for instance, a party may adopt a trade-mark, and imprint it upon, or connect it with, the package of peculiar shape containing the article of his manufacture. Another party might make a colorable simulation of the trade-mark so used, but so different as to render it doubtful upon a mere inspection of the simulation of such mark alone, whether it was intended to be an imitation or not, or whether it would be likely to mislead the public. But if the imitator should, in addition to this, use the peculiar shaped package adopted by the party entitled to the trade-mark, and impress upon, or connect with it, the simulation of the trade-mark, all doubt as to the intention and the effect would at once vanish. In this view, a peculiar package might be a valuable auxiliary to the trade-mark, although it could not, of itself alone, constitute a lawful trade-mark, or a substantive part of a lawful trade-mark. But its use would be in aiding to determine the character and effect of a colorable imitation of the trade-mark proper, and the use of the imitation, or the simulated trade-mark, or the use of the package with such simulation connected with it, would be the thing restrained. In this case, there is no pretence that there is any imitation, or colorable simulation, of the marks and brands upon the package, or barrel. The use of the barrel with a simulation of the complainants' trade-mark impressed upon it, would doubtless be restrained. But to extend the privilege of trade-mark to the barrel in question alone, without having impressed upon, or in any way connected with it, any of the other words, symbols, or devices claimed and used by the complainants as a part of their trade-mark, or any colorable imitation of it would, in my judgment, be to go further than any case heretofore decided, and extend the privileges of trade-marks to objects not recognized by any established legal principles applicable to the subject. After a careful examination of the question, my conclusion is, that the barrel in question, without any other marks, or symbols, is not, and that it cannot become, a lawful trade-mark, or a substantive or integral part of a lawful trade-mark, and that complainants have no exclusive right to its use as such. The result is, that complainants' bill must be dismissed with costs, and it is so ordered.

MORA v. FOSTER et al.

[3 Sawy. 469.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 22, 1875.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—GRANT TO CHURCH—DEPARTMENTAL ASSEMBLY—SALE—SUBSEQUENT GRANT—DAMAGES.

1. A claim to land made by the Catholic bishop, of Monterey, by virtue of a Mexican grant to the church for religious purposes, is "of a right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments," and is, by the terms of the act of congress one, the validity of which, the board of land commissioners was authorized to consider and determine.

2. The board of land commissioners having adjudged the claim to be valid, and its decree not having been subsequently set aside or impeached by any direct proceeding for the purpose, it cannot be collaterally questioned in an action to recover the land based upon such confirmed title.

3. The departmental assembly of California under the Mexican government, had no power to authorize the sale of any lands other than those of the department. It could not confer upon the government any power over the domain of the nation, its authority upon that subject being limited by the colonization laws to the approval or disapproval of grants made by the governor under those laws.

4. Where a grant made to the church for religious purposes in 1796, was finally confirmed by the board of land commissioners to the Roman Catholic bishop of Monterey, and another grant to another party embracing the same land by governor Pio Pico, in 1845, upon a sale made by direction of the departmental assembly, was also finally confirmed: Held, that the latter grant affords no defense to an action to recover possession of the land founded upon the former.

5. Where there is no evidence of the possession of the defendants at any time anterior to the date of the commencement of the suit to recover possession of land, only nominal damages can be allowed.

[6. Cited in Mora v. Munez, 10 Fed. 640, to the point that the patent issued upon a confirmed Mexican grant is the final, authentic, and conclusive record, which establishes the legal title in the patentee, which must prevail in an action at law against any party having no patent to the land, that it is conclusive and unassailable collaterally by any party having no patent.]

[This was an action of ejectment by Francis Mora against John Foster and others.]

Doyle & Barber, for plaintiff.

John B. Felton and E. L. Goold, for defendants.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and SAWYER, Circuit Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The questions involved in this case have been substantially determined by the supreme court in the cases of U. S. v. Workman [1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 745], and Beard v. Federy [3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 478], as will be seen by their examination. The present action is ejectment for the possession of certain church lands of the Mission of San Juan Capistrano in the county of Los Angeles, consisting of the church, churchyard, cemetery, garden, orchard and vineyard with the necessary buildings and appurtenances, the whole comprised within an area of forty-four acres and four-tenths of an acre. The plaintiff traces his title through Joseph S. Alemany, formerly Catholic bishop of Monterey, to whom a patent of the premises was issued by the United States on the eighteenth of March, 1865. The record of the proceedings before the board of land commissioners, which resulted in a decree confirming the claim, upon which the patent was issued, was introduced in evidence; and in the petition of the bishop it was averred, in substance, that at the time of the conquest and cession of California to the United States, the canon law of the Roman Catholic Church was recognized, and in force, as the law of Mexico, as it had been in Spain, when Mexico was a dependency thereof, in all things relating to the acquisition, transmission and disposal of property real or personal belonging to the church, or devoted to religious uses; that by the laws of Spain and Mexico thus in force in California, the title, control and administration of all ecclesiastical or church property were vested in the hands of the bishop and clergy of the diocese, who for such purposes were regarded as a body corporate; that at the date of the conquest and cession of California the Catholic Church had been in the actual and undisturbed possession of the premises in controversy since the year 1796; and that for the purpose of enabling the petitioner to hold the church property and administer the temporalities of the church and manage its estate and property, he had been incorporated as a sole corporation by legislation of the state of California, under the name and title of Bishop of Monterey. The claim thus asserted by the Catholic Church, through its bishop, to the lands in controversy, is "of a right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments," and is thus by the very terms of the act of congress, one the validity of which the board of land commissioners was authorized to consider and determine. Having considered it and having adjudged it to be valid, its validity not having been in any direct proceeding subsequently impeached, cannot now be questioned in the present action.

The defendants assert title under a grant of land made by Governor Pio Pico in 1845, upon a sale directed by order of the departmental assembly, which grant was confirmed under the act of congress of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631]. It is admitted for the purposes of this action that the confirmation has been followed by a survey approved by the surveyor-general of the United States. But this grant and confirmation cannot aid the possession of the defendants as against the patent under which the plaintiff claims. The departmental assembly possessed no power to authorize a sale of any lands other than those of the department. Its powers were very carefully considered by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Workman [supra], and it was there held that that body could not confer upon the governor any power over the domain of the nation, and that its own power in the alienation of public property of that character was limited, by the colonization laws of Mexico, to the approval or disapproval of grants made by the governor under those laws.

The counsel of the defendants feeling the force of the adjudication in that case, contends that the title to the church lands was never vested in the bishop, or in the Catholic Church, but remained in the Mexican nation at the time of the conquest and cession of the country; and that the patent to the bishop is not therefore evidence of any title anterior to its date, and can only be treated as a conveyance of the interest which the United States then possessed; and that the defendants' confirmation and approved survey, taking effect by relation as of the date of their petition to the land commission, carries an earlier title.

The obvious answer to this position is, that the adjudication of the supreme court that the departmental assembly had no authority to authorize the governor to sell any portion of the public domain, nullifies the effect of the confirmation. That confirmation does not of itself translate the title of the United States. As declaring the validity of an existing title it might operate to protect the estate of the confirmee. But the validity of that title having been assailed by the supreme court and overthrown, the confirmation can afford no aid to the defendants in their contest with the title of the plaintiff.

The patent is also something more than a mere conveyance of the government; it is evidence having the force and operation of a record that the title claimed was valid, or at least entitled to recognition and confirmation, at the time the sovereignty of Mexico over the country was superseded by the sovereign authority of the United States. It is evidence to that extent which is not open to dispute in an action of ejectment, except where the assailant comes into court possessed of a similar record or one of equal dignity. The defendants stand in no such position; they have no such record; their confirmation and survey being of a claim, belonging to a class adjudged invalid by the highest tribunal of the nation, furnishes no vantage ground to them in an attack upon an established and patented title, beyond that held by mere trespassers.

The plaintiff is therefore entitled to the premises. It is admitted that the defendants were in possession at the commencement of the action, but there is no evidence of their possession at any previous period. There is therefore no foundation laid for the recovery of any other than nominal damages, and none will therefore be awarded.

The plaintiff must have judgment for the possession of the premises with one dollar damages, and it is so ordered.

SEAMEN — VOYAGE CHANGED — DISCHARGE AND WAGES DEMANDED—FOREIGN SEAMEN—RIGHTS DETERMINED BY WHAT LAW.

1. A French seaman claimed his wages from a ship which had changed her voyage from that for which he originally entered. The court decreed his wages.

[See The Bee, Case No. 1,219.]

2. The case of a French seaman to be determined by the marine law of France.

3. What deviation from the original voyage will justify mariners in demanding their discharge.

[Cited in The Becherdass Ambaidass, Case No. 1,203.]

The libel in this case states, that Charles Moran the libellant entered as a mariner on board the ship L'Heureux at Nantz, in France, on the twenty-third day of October, 1786, under an engagement for a voyage from the said port of Nantz to New Orleans in the Mississippi, from thence to go to Martinique, and from thence to return to France. That Alexander Baudin the captain, had totally altered this voyage by repeated deviations, whereby the contract was broken, and thereupon the libellant prays a discharge and the amount of wages due. The circumstances of this case appear from the testimony exhibited, to be as follows: That this vessel sailed from Nantz the twenty-third of October, 1786; that the mariners understood and were informed that this voyage was to be to New Orleans first, thence to the West Indies and thence back to Nantz or to some port of France, and that it would continue from 10 to 15 or 16 months, and under this expectation the mariners were registered at the proper office at Nantz, according to the manner of registering seamen in France. That instead of pursuing this voyage, as designated to them, they were taken three times to New Orleans, twice to Martinico, thence to Aux Cayes, once to the Havannah and were now brought to Philadelphia. That in the course of these several voyages, the libellant and others of the crew made frequent complaints of the deviation from and prolongation of the originally intended voyage, and had applied to the intendants of some of the ports they were at, demanding to be discharged, or taken back to France, but were detained in the service of the ship by repeated assurances of the captain, that from the then next intended port they should be taken back to France. That in particular, when they were at Martinico the second time, the whole crew complained and demanded their discharge, whereupon the captain threw the boatswain and another sailor into prison, and that the boatswain wrote to the commanding officer of a frigate there, who sent for him on board, obliged the captain to pay him his wages and discharged him.

To this libel and testimony, the respondent hath urged in reply: That no contract or articles between the captain and crew at Nantz hath been exhibited or proved; that the libel itself is deficient in form, and that, let the deviations from the original voyage be what they may, the libellant hath for his part justified the whole by signing a process verbal on board the ship on the 30th of April last, certifying that the ship L'Heureux had suffered damage by storm, and consenting to put into the port of Philadelphia in distress, which verbal process, so signed, was exhibited in court. As there is no ordinance of the United States, or act of the legislature of Pennsylvania touching the present point, the claim of the libellant, who is a French subject, and was shipped in France, will most properly be determined by the marine ordinances of the country to which he belongs, and under which he engaged in the service of this vessel. These ordinances strictly prohibit any captain or master of a vessel from receiving on board his ship any mariner, as such, who is not entered on his role d'equipage, made up in the commissary's office, or bureau de classes, of the port where the vessel shall be. See Ord. de Marine, vol. 1, pp. 422, 715. Now, as it has not been controverted but that the libellant has served on board this ship ever since she sailed from Nantz, it is in vain to call upon him for proof of the contract made at Nantz, since the role d'equipage, or a transcript of it, is in the captain's hands, and never in the mariner's. Had no such engagement taken place as mentioned in the libel, or should the libellant demand larger wages than had been agreed upon, the captain would have shewn the role d'equipage in proof against him. As he has not done this, although in his power, it follows that the allegation of the libellant must be admitted as true. Indeed it is in positive testimony that the libellant entered on board at Nantz, and was to receive 50 livres per month, wages; which is sufficient proof of a contract.

The next point is to consider the repeated deviations from the original voyage, and how far this should operate in releasing the mariner from his contract. To lay it down as a general rule that the least deviation from a designated voyage, should invalidate the articles and discharge the mariners in a foreign port, would perhaps be construing shipping articles too strictly, and certainly very injurious to commerce. Shipping articles are not to be construed by the same rules with a policy of insurance, their object and ground of reason being quite different. Yet gross and unnecessary deviation shall free a mariner from his contract; but there is no occasion to fix a general rule now—this cause is to be determined by the positive laws of France, and there is an ordinance express to the purpose. Ord. de Marine, vol. 1, p. 548, art. 4. See 2 Pet. Adm. Append. p. 14. "If at any time after the arrival and discharge of the vessel at the port of her destination, the captain or master, instead of returning, shall freight or load his ship to go elsewhere, the mariner may leave her if he chuses, unless it has been otherwise determined by his special engagement." And this rule is further enforced by Valin's commentary on the article. There appears to me a strong presumption that the boatswain who was paid off and discharged at Martinico by order of the commander of a frigate there, claimed the benefit of this ordinance. It is said, indeed, that his mother was dead, and he had business in France: but this, I think, would hardly be admitted as a sufficient reason to discharge a mariner in the midst of a voyage. Such as it was, it is plain that Captain Baudin did not deem it sufficient, for he put the man in prison for demanding his wages and claiming his discharge.

The objections to the libel in point of form are not sufficient to exclude this cause from the notice of the court. It is indeed, not so precise as might be wished, but the substance of the complaint is alleged, viz. an engagement for a certain voyage, frequent deviations from the voyage proposed, and a citation prayed for, to shew cause why the wages accrued should not be paid, and the libellant discharged. The verbal process signed by the libellant on board the ship is the next circumstance relied on by the respondent; but this, I think, cannot have the operation expected. If the ship was really in distress as declared, there is no doubt but any mariner would sign his consent to put into a strange port, to avoid impending danger and refit the damaged rigging. But this deviation, occasioned, as it should seem, by necessity, cannot be deemed a justification of former deviations, where no such necessity appears, or is even pretended.

I am clearly of opinion, that if this cause was tried before a French court of justice, the libellant could not be refused the benefit of the marine ordinances of France, so expressly in favour of his claim. Therefore, I adjudge and decree, that Charles Moran have and receive from the respondent in this cause, his wages at the rate of 50 livres per month, from the 23d of October, 1786, to the date of the present libel, and that the respondent pay the costs of suit.

Case No. 9,786.

MORAN et al. v. SCHNUGG et al.

[7 Ben. 399.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Aug., 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — PRIORITIES — MORTGAGE — MECHANIC'S LIEN.

A mortgage recorded before the filing of a mechanic's lien is entitled to priority. When the bankruptcy court takes possession of property on which there are mechanics' liens, and sells it free and clear of the liens, it forecloses the liens, and the lien holders are not bound to renew or continue their liens, to preserve their rights against the proceeds of the property.

This was an action [against John Schnugg and others] brought by [James H. Moran and others] assignees in bankruptcy [of Leopold Bohm] to set aside certain mortgages and mechanics' liens upon the bankrupt's property, which the court had sold free and clear of both mortgages and liens. On the evidence the court held that the mortgages were valid. The question remained as to the mechanics' liens and their priority.

Abbott Bros., for plaintiffs.

Boardman & Boardman, W. B. Putney, L. B. Bunnell, and Otto Meyer, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. As between the mortgages and the mechanics' liens, the former are not only valid, but are prior in time. The former were recorded before any of the latter were filed. This gives priority to the former.

The mortgages must, therefore, be decreed to have validity and precedence, both as regards the mechanics' liens and the assignees in bankruptcy, the Schnugg mortgage for the full $10,000, and the Baerlein mortgage for $6,800.

As between the mechanics' liens and the assignees in bankruptcy, I think the liens are not open to any of the objections urged against them by the plaintiffs.

The bankruptcy court, within the year from the filing of the liens, took possession of the property, and sold it free and clear of the mechanics' liens, and put the proceeds of sale into the hands of its officers, in place of the estate so disposed of. It did this by virtue of the provisions of the 20th section of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 526)]. It thereby foreclosed the liens. It converted into money the property that was subject to the liens, and thereby prevented the lienors from ever taking measures to foreclose the liens. The lienors were not only relieved thereby from any duty to renew or continue their liens within the year, but they had no right to renew or continue a lien against property which the bankruptcy court had sold free from such lien.

As regards renewing or continuing the lien, so as to make it continue operative against the proceeds of the sale, it is sufficient to say, that at least from the commencement of this suit, which was within the year, the rights of the lienors were fixed, and whatever their rights as lienors were when this suit was brought, such they must be adjudged in this suit to be. As between the plaintiffs and the lienors, the fund must be administered and distributed as of the time when the plaintiffs came into this court and asked this court to administer and distribute it.

Case No. 9,787.

MORAN v. STRAUSS et al.

[6 Ben. 249.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Nov., 1872.

MORTGAGE—BY CORPORATION—REAL AND PERSONAL PROPERTY—CONSENT OF STOCKHOLDERS.

1. A corporation, incorporated under the general manufacturing law of the state of New York, executed a mortgage on real and personal property, and an assignment of two patents, as security for moneys due to the mortgagees from the company. The consent of two-thirds of the stockholders to the mortgage of the real estate was given. The holder of seventy-five shares, whose signature made up the two-thirds, had bought them at a sale ordered by the board of trustees, the stock having been held by two of the trustees, for the benefit of the stockholders. The purchaser of the shares at this sale, which was on credit, was a trustee. The sale was approved by the board. The assignee in bankruptcy of the company filed a bill to set aside the mortgage and assignment: Held, that the mortgage was consented to by two-thirds of the stockholders, and its consideration was advanced in good faith.

2. No consent was necessary to the mortgaging of the personal property, or the assignment of the patents.

3. The mortgage and the assignment could not be set aside, but must be regarded as security for the moneys due from the company to the defendants at the time, and moneys advanced by the defendants on the faith of them.

The plaintiff in this action filed this bill to set aside a mortgage. The bill alleged that, on March 19th, 1869, the Columbian Metal Works filed a petition in voluntary bankruptcy, and were adjudged bankrupt, and the plaintiff [James H. Moran] was appointed assignee; that the bankrupts were a corporation incorporated under the general manufacturing law of the state of New York, and were the owners of real estate in Morrisania, New York, and also of personal property, among which were two patents; that, on August 30th, 1867, they executed to the defendants a mortgage on all the real and personal property, except the patents, and also assigned to them the patents; that both the mortgage and the assignment were void under the laws of New York; that the money purporting to be the consideration of them was not paid, and the company was insolvent, and the written consent of the stockholders owning two-thirds of the stock was not obtained, inasmuch as seventy-five shares, purporting to be owned by one Freeman, one of the trustees of the company, who gave his assent to the mortgage, really belonged to the company; that the defendants [David Strauss and others] had foreclosed the mortgage by suit in a state court, in which the company had allowed a decree to be entered. The defendants answered, denying in substance the allegations of the bill, except as to the facts of the bankruptcy, the execution of the mortgage and assignment, and the decree of foreclosure.

W. H. Arnoux, for complainant.
J. M. Van Cott, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. In this case I have arrived at the following conclusions:

(1.) The petition in bankruptcy having been filed March 19th, 1869, the title of the assignee relates back to that date, and the decree of foreclosure made on the 26th of March, 1869, in a suit to which he was not a party, is of no effect to prejudice his rights.

(2.) If the mortgage was unauthorized and void, as being ultra vires, it was such a fraud on the general creditors of the corporation, that the plaintiff can impeach it.

(3.) The holders of two-thirds of the stock consented to the mortgage. The 75 disputed shares belonged to Pirsson, as surviving trustee. They had been originally lawfully issued as full paid stock, and passed from the parties to whom they were issued, and went into the hands of Pirsson and Freeman, as trustees, as working capital, for the benefit of the stockholders, to be disposed of under the direction of the board of trustees, in such manner as they should deem for the best interests of the company. Freeman had died. A sale of the 75 shares, on credit, to H. O. Freeman, was a lawful sale. It was approved by the board. It was made in good faith, according to the testimony. Even if the 75 shares could not be represented by H. O. Freeman, the consent of Pirsson, and of the other four members of the board of trustees was given to the mortgage, and so the 75 shares, as represented by Pirsson, or by the individuals composing the board, must be counted among the consenting shares.

(4.) The defendants, at the time the mortgage was given, owned only 28 shares, not enough to make the two-thirds, if the 75 shares be excluded.

(5.) The consideration of the mortgage, so far as appears, was advanced by the defendants in good faith, and went to the uses of the corporation.

(6.) The mortgage is not impeached as being in violation of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)].

(7.) Construing the consent as applying only to a mortgage of the real estate, no consent was necessary to enable the corporation to mortgage the personal property, or to assign the patents. The mortgage did not cover the patents. They were assigned by a separate instrument, and, even though it be taken that they were really assigned only as security, yet the corporation had power by law to convey its personal property, which power includes the power to mortgage, or to transfer as security. A mortgage is none the less a conveyance because it is defeasible. The greater includes the less, unless the less is expressly excluded.

(8.) The suit to set aside the mortgage wholly cannot be maintained, but it must be regarded as, together with the letters patent assigned, a security for such moneys, if any, as the corporation owed the defendants when the mortgage was given, and such moneys as the defendants paid for or advanced to the corporation on the faith of the mortgaged property and the patents. If it be doubtful whether such moneys, with interest, exceed the proceeds of the mortgaged property and of the patents, the amount due to the defendants must be ascertained on proof.

MORANCY et al. v. QUARLES et al.

[1 McLean, 194.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Nov. Term, 1833.

WILLS—DEVISE OF LAND — CHARGE — STATUTE OF FRAUDS—COMPROMISE UNDER SEAL—PAROL AGREEMENT FOR COSTS.

1. A devise of land to an individual, and in consequence of the great value of the land thus devised, the devisee was required to pay specific legacies, constitutes a charge on the land, though sold and conveyed to a stranger.

[Cited in Clyde v. Simpson, 4 Ohio St. 461; Nellons v. Truax, 6 Ohio St. 102.]

2. An agreement under seal which compromises a suit, does not prevent either party from setting up and proving a parol undertaking, that one of the parties should pay the costs that had accrued.

[Cited in Winn v. Chamberlin, 32 Vt. 321.]

3. Such an agreement does not contradict or vary the written agreement; but is distinct and independent of it.

In equity.

Mr. Wickliffe, for complainants.
Mr. Haggin, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The complainants [E. Morancy and others] have filed their bill against Quarles, and his sureties, as executor of Tunstall Quarles, and against Buford as purchaser and in possession of, certain lands, on which the complainants claim to hold a specific lien for certain legacies of five hundred dollars each, to the complainants, devised to them by Tunstall Quarles.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

The clause in the will under which the lien is attempted to be enforced is: "I devise to my son James Quarles, and his heirs forever, the tract of land I reside on, and also that part of Mrs. Walker's alias Mrs. Stephenson's dower, I purchased of Joseph G. Walker, which will more fully appear by reference to his bond. The said James Quarles takes this with the incumbrances devised to his mother, in the previous part of this will, and pays in consequence of the great value of the lands devised, at lawful age, or intermarries, twelve months thereafter, five hundred dollars each; I mean the children of Archibald Kirkhead, &c." This tract of land was afterwards conveyed by the devisee to Buford the defendant; and the question is whether the land in his hands is chargeable with the payment of the devises to the children of Kirkhead. And we can entertain no doubt that the devise of the land does constitute a specific lien for the bequests to Kirkhead's children. Such was undoubtedly the intention of the testator. He gives the land to James Quarles, subject to the incumbrances devised to his mother, and to pay the several devises of five hundred dollars. And the reason why this payment is to be made, is stated to be, the great value of the land devised.

Now it would not only be unjust, but in violation of the intention of the testator to permit the devisee to take this land, free from the lien of the specific devises, and by a conveyance of it, as in this case defeat them. The will was notice to the purchaser and he was bound to examine it and ascertain the extent of the right devised. We are therefore clear that the land in the hands of the defendant Buford, is bound for the payment of the specific devises; and unless the payment shall be made at a time to be fixed the court will order a sale of so much of the land, as shall amount to these devises.

At this stage of the proceedings, and before the final decree was pronounced, the defendant Buford asked leave to file a plea, on the ground, supported by affidavit, that he had fully satisfied and paid the demand of the complainants. And on leave being given he filed the following plea. "This defendant by protestation, &c., that on the 17th July, 1832, in the district aforesaid, the complainants by a certain Morancy, the attorney of the complainants, under their hands and seals for the consideration of sixteen hundred dollars to him paid, did release and acquit and among other things, did covenant to release and acquit this defendant from the demands in the bill of the complainants mentioned. Whereupon the defendant prays, &c." In the agreement exhibited there was no provision as to the payment of the costs, which had accrued in the suit. And the complainant obtained leave to amend his bill; and in which he alleged that at the time the compromise was made and the release executed, stated in the plea of the defendant, it was distinctly understood and agreed between the defendant Buford and the agent, that the former should pay whatever costs had accrued. To this amended bill there was an answer which relied principally on the ground that the parol agreement set up in the amended bill is contradictory to the agreement under seal, and cannot be received.

The principle is well settled, that a parol agreement cannot be received to vary or contradict a written contract. But the parol agreement alleged is in no respect contradictory to the written contract. It sets up a parol contract beyond the writing. So far as the written agreement goes it is conclusive, and not being of doubtful construction, no parol evidence can be heard to contradict or vary it. But this writing does not cover the whole ground. There is nothing said in it, as to the costs which had accrued, and the parol agreement is limited to the payment of these costs. There is then, no legal objection to the verbal agreement; as it must be considered separate and distinct from the contract under seal. And the court are satisfied from the proof in the case that it was the understanding of the parties to the compromise, that Buford should pay any costs, that had accrued in the case. But, it seems not to have been known, to the agent of the complainants, that suit had been commenced, or that any costs had certainly been incurred. The agreement was, therefore, conditional, to pay costs, if any costs had accrued. The court, therefore, enter the following decree.

It appearing to the satisfaction of the court, that defendant Buford has purchased the right of complainants to recover in the suit, and that the defendant, William Buford, as a part of the consideration of said purchase and compromise, agreed to pay the complainants the fee promised in the cause to counsel, and to pay the costs of the suit; and it appearing to the court that the fee agreed to be paid to counsel by the complainant is one hundred dollars, which the court deem reasonable. It is therefore decreed and ordered, that this suit, as to all the defendants except Buford, be dismissed without costs, and that it be dismissed as to him so far as the bill claims payment of legacies. And the court decree and order that Buford pay to the complainants one hundred dollars, and also the costs of this suit.

Case No. 9,789.

The MORAVIAN.

[2 Hask. 157.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. June, 1877.

CARRIERS—LIABILITY FOR DAMAGE—BILL OF LADING—HOW GOODS PACKED—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. A bill of lading, reciting, "two cases sewing machines shipped in good order and condition; quantity, condition and contents unknown; not accountable for breakage," is evidence of the good external condition of the cases when received by the carrier, and casts the burden upon the owner to prove that an injury to the machines resulted from the negligence of the carrier.

2. The fact, that the cases were in good order when received and broken when delivered, raises the presumption that they met with injury, while in the possession of the carrier, damaging their contents.

3. Evidence, showing that the injury would not have resulted in the common course of events, with proper care, in the absence of explanation, proves it to have been caused by negligence.

4. Shippers of merchandise of large experience, in absence of evidence to the contrary, are presumed to use the best method of packing the same to be carried over land or upon the sea.

In admiralty. Libel in rem against the steamship Moravian for damages to merchandise shipped by her at Liverpool, England, for Portland, Maine. The claim and answer alleged that the claimants were not liable by reason of the stipulations in the bill of lading, and because the damage did not result from any act of their own or of their servants, but from improper packing of the goods, and that it was inflicted before they came to their possession.

Emery S. Ridlon and Sewall C. Strout, for libellants.

John. Rand, for claimants.

FOX, District Judge. The libellant, Palmer, ordered from the manufacturer at a place in England, said to be about sixty miles from Liverpool, two sewing machines, to be forwarded to him at Portland by the Allan steamers. These machines, none of which are made in this country, are of a novel description, and are used for the sewing of boots and shoes, having an iron plate about two and one-half feet long, and ten to twelve inches in width. The machines were in pieces, packed in two pine boxes, one of which contained, with other portions of the machines, the two plates, which were secured by cleats at each end of the box.

These boxes, it is said, were taken by sail to Liverpool, then placed on board the Moravian about the first of last March. The vessel arrived here the thirteenth. Her cargo was placed in the sheds of the company, which are bonded warehouses. The libellant was notified of their arrival about the twenty-fourth of March, by the presentation of the freight bill; but it was not paid for about four weeks, the goods remaining in the shed until April twenty-fourth, when they were taken to the custom house for examination by the appraisers. On opening this box, the upper plate was found broken about ten inches from the narrow end, and this piece had evidently lapped forward upon the other portion of the plate, and, by its friction, had rubbed the paint, rendering the plate in spots quite bright. After the box had been opened, it was carefully examined, and the end next to the fracture was found to be split nearly across, originally a seamcrack, and much widened, and this split had extended across one side of the box for some distance. By handling the box, these cracks had been enlarged so that they now extend across the side and end, and the portion of the box above the cracks is entirely separate from that below. There is also an indentation on the end of the box near the plate, as if it had been caused by a blow from an iron bar.

To recover for the damages thus done to this plate the present libel was instituted. In the bill of lading for the merchandise, is found the ordinary language, "two cases sewing machines, shipped in good order and well conditioned;" but further on it is stipulated that "quality, condition and contents are unknown, and the ship owner not accountable for the same;" and in the margin is also found, "not accountable for breakage."

In Clark v. Barnwell, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 272, the bill of lading was substantially of a similar character. It recited that the goods were shipped to be delivered in like good order, etc., but there was also added "contents unknown." It was then decided by the supreme court of the United States that this acknowledgment of the master, as to the condition of the goods when received on board, extended only to the external condition of the cases, excluding any implication as to the quantity or quality of the articles, their condition at the time received on board, or whether properly packed in boxes or not.

Where, by the terms of the bill of lading, the ship is exonerated from liability for certain losses, it has also been decided by the supreme court, that, when such losses are occasioned by the negligence of the ship owner or his servants, the ship still remains accountable for losses so caused; but the burden of proof is changed, and the libellant must establish such negligence. New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank of Boston, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 344. The Invincible [Case No. 7,055].

The box with its contents were produced in court. From an examination of both parts of the broken plate, I can have no doubt that the fracture occurred before the goods left the ship. The paint is very much worn from the upper surface of the larger portion of the plate upon which the smaller portion chafed by the motion of the ship at sea, and the grains of the metal of the broken end are also worn down and smoothed, indicating that the movements of the one piece upon the other must have continued for a much longer time than merely while the box was being taken from the ship to the shed. I believe the counsel on both sides are satisfied with this conclusion of the court. The teamster who took the box to the custom house testifies that it was carefully done by him, so that the injury could not have then occurred.

It is said that the plate may have been broken before the box was received by the carrier, as it was transported sixty miles, more or less, by rail from the factory to Liverpool. The bill of lading, according to the decision of the supreme court of the United States, is evidence that the box, so far as its external condition would indicate, was in good order when received by the ship; and, as it was found to be split and broken at the end and on one side when received at the custom house, I think that the fair inference is that, while on board of the ship, or while in charge of those employed in her lading, it met with some injury which damaged the box and its contents.

The box being thus apparently in good order when received by the carrier, and found to be injured when delivered up by him, the burden is on the libellant under the terms of the present bill of lading to establish that the damage was occasioned by the negligence of the carrier. The rule of law laid down in the Exchequer, Scott v. London & St. K. Docks Co., 3 Hurl. & C. 597, is that, when the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as in the course of things does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care.

On the end of the box, which is not broken, there are a number of indentations worn quite smooth, and, as I think, clearly indicating that during the voyage this box stood on that end, resting upon the heads of a number of bolts which were pressed into the wood of the box by the weight upon it, or else that the box fell some distance, striking this end upon the bolts. The other end, as before stated, was badly split through, not entirely broken off when brought to the custom house; and there is also a dent in the wood just over the split, indicating a blow from some sharp, hard instrument; and it is strenuously contended that by such a blow the plate was broken, the force of the blow communicating to the plate through the cleat nailed to the end of the box and the iron protuberance upon the plate, which was fitted into a notch in the cleat to make steady and secure the plate. I do not feel certain that the injury was thus occasioned. I rather think it more probable that it was caused by heavy weights placed upon the box, or by rough handling from the stevedores and laborers when moving the box and storing it on board the ship.

The box being under the control of the carrier who was, by the bill of lading, informed as to its contents, and being apparently in good order, and such serious damage to such a package not ordinarily happening with due care, reasonable credence is afforded under the rule in Scott v. London & St. K. Docks Co., that the injury arose from want of due care, unless a satisfactory explanation is given in this behalf.

In the present case, no evidence is produced by the ship-owners as to the position of this box on ship-board, whether heavy articles were or not placed upon it, or whether it was at any time by accident or otherwise injured and broken by the servants of the ship-owners while under their control. For all that appears, it may have slipped from the slings when going on board and have fallen the whole depth of the hold, or have been thrown down with great violence, the servants of the carrier been guilty of the greatest negligence in their duty in this behalf, and the matter kept concealed from the court. There is certainly nothing to discredit any such theory.

From the marks upon the box and the damage it has sustained, it is quite apparent that it had not received that care and fair usage which a package of sewing machines should have received; and while there was nothing on the box to indicate the contents, as I have before stated, the carrier was fully advised in relation to it.

The claimants contend that the plate which was broken was not securely packed, and that for this cause they are not to be held accountable for the damage, even if they were otherwise negligent. A large number of witnesses have been examined upon this branch of the case by each side, and the matter is certainly not free from doubt. The manner in which this plate was placed in the box is beyond dispute. The two plates were a little larger than the box, and were laid in diagonally, resting upon cleats of wood which were nailed to each end of the box, the upper one, which was broken, being kept in position by a projection upon one end of the plate that fitted into a notch cut in the cleat at the broken end. The ends of the plate rested upon the cleats, and there was no other support under the plate; nothing between the plates; the ends of the plates did not touch the ends of the box, nor did the box cover rest on the plate; both plates were secure and immovable so long as they were unbroken.

It is said by quite a number of witnesses that this packing was defective because the plates were only supported at the ends with nothing around or between the plates to break the force of any blow or strain that might happen to the box; that if the plate had been enveloped in straw or shavings, it would not probably have been broken, or at any rate would have been much more likely to escape a fracture from any blow, or by any fall of the box. Other witnesses express an entirely different opinion, and say that the plate was well secured, in their judgment, so as not to be liable to injury if properly handled, and that the soft packing would not have protected the plate, if exposed to unreasonable violence. A number of witnesses of very extensive experience in the packing of sewing machines state that they have never known the manufacturer to use any kind of soft packing about these machines when fitted for transportation; that they are only secured in place by cleats, and they have sent them long voyages in safety thus packed; but none of these witnesses, I think, have had any acquaintance with machines having so large a casting as the present.

In this conflict upon the question, whether the box was packed with reasonable care and skill to protect its contents if fairly handled, I think the court may well take into consideration the fact that these manufacturers, Pitt Bros., had been so long and extensively engaged in this business that they had become so well known in this country that goods were ordered of them by parties on this side of the water.

If permitted to refer to their hand bills found in the box with the broken plate, it appears that they had been engaged in this branch of business more than twenty-five years. During all this time, we must believe that they must have shipped large numbers of these machines to various quarters of the globe, and by experience had ascertained the safest and best method of packing the same for transportation by land and by sea. If their machines were delivered in bad order, they certainly must have been informed of their condition; and it cannot be presumed that they would continue a practice which would thus endanger the safety of their merchandise and subject themselves to all the consequences attending a negligent or unskillful method of packing their goods. They would clearly be answerable for damages to the party injured, if they were not packed with due care and precaution, or if they were still the owners of the property, they would subject themselves to the loss occasioned by their own neglect.

I must presume that in twenty-five years they could not but have ascertained the safest method for packing these plates, and that in the present instance, as there is nothing to establish the contrary, they adopted it. Whether shavings or other soft material should have been used was expressly brought to the attention of the packer of this box, as it appears that some portions of the machine in this box were packed with shavings, manifesting that this material was at his command, and his judgment was applied to the determination of whether it was or not expedient that the plates should be thus packed, or whether the course adopted of securing them in the box, as was done, was on the whole the most judicious.

This view, I think, is quite persuasive and influences my opinion, so that I am brought to the conclusion that the libellant is entitled to recover for damages occasioned by the negligence of the carrier to his property. Decree for libellant.

MARITIME LIEN — DEFINITION — DISTINGUISHED FROM EQUITABLE LIEN.

[MAGRATH, District Judge, cites from The Young Mechanic, Case No. 18,180, the remark by Judge Curtis wherein he distinguished a maritime from an equitable lien, and adopted the definition by Pothier of an hypothecation, as an accurate description of a maritime lien under our law,—"the right which a creditor has in a thing of another, which right consists in the power to cause that thing to be sold in order to have the debt paid out of the price,"—and adds that a maritime lien, in general, gives no right to the creditor to take possession; that is executed by the suit in rem.]

MOREHEAD v. JONES.

[3 Wall. Jr. 306.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. Term, 1860.

PLEADING IN EQUITY—ANSWER—AMENDMENT BY STRIKING OUT ADMISSIONS—PATENTS.

In a bill for infringing a patent the defendants were allowed, under special circumstances, and there being no laches, to strike out an admission in their answer, that they had made certain articles, their making of which the complainant was seeking by the bill to enjoin.

[This was a bill by James K. Morehead against J. Hervey Jones.]

Morehead & Co., as assignees of a patent granted to one Sherwood for an improvement in door locks, filed their bill at the last term to restrain the respondents from infringing, and for an account. The defendants answered, admitting their use of the improvement, and claiming a right to use it by reason of a prior assignment to them by the patentee. They also filed a cross-bill, alleging their ownership of the patent, and praying for an injunction and account as against the complainants. After answer and replication, and when the parties were about to begin taking their testimony, the defendants, at the same term to which the bill was filed, made application to a judge of the court, by petition, for leave to amend their answer by striking out an admission that they had made door locks having substantially the improvements mentioned and specified in the patent, as stated in the complainants' bill, and inserting a modified admission, denying an infringement of any of the claims of the patent, except one of them, which was specified. They prayed for leave, also, to amend by taking an issue to the validity of the patent to Sherwood.

The ground of the application was, that supposing Sherwood to have a valid patent, they had purchased a right to use it; that after filing their answer they had discovered that it was not a good patent, and that the assignment made to them was bad. Accompanying their petition was an affidavit that the matters and things set forth in their proposed amendment had only recently come to their knowledge, and since they had filed their answer. The district judge to whom this application was made did not grant it when made to him, but adjourned the matter till the present term, when the motion was again argued before the court. In he meantime the testimony on both sides had been taken, and the case set for hearing at this term.

GRIER, Circuit Justice. That amendments may be allowed by the court after issue and at any time before final decree, when it is manifest that the purposes of substantial justice require it, is admitted. But while it is thus admitted that the courts have such authority in the use of a sound discretion, they must be very cautious in its exercise. When the object is to let in new facts and defences wholly dependent on parol testimony, the reluctance of the court is greatly increased.

As the bill in this case was filed to the last term, and as the application for leave to amend was first made before the testimony was taken, it is not subject to the charge of laches, or great delay. The defendants have sworn also that the matters and things set forth and contained in the said proposed amendment only recently came to their knowledge, and subsequently to the filing of their said answer. This can only refer to the last matter of amendment, to wit, the invalidity of the patent. As to the first and second. there is no allegation or proof of any mistake of fact or law in the answer first sworn to, or that the extent of their infringement was not as well known before as since the answer was sworn to. These amendments cannot be allowed.

The only question, therefore, is, whether the respondents should now be allowed to set up a matter of defence inconsistent with their first answer. Assuming their answer and affidavit to be true, the case stands thus: They purchased a patent right from the patentee; supposing they had obtained a valid patent: they make defence to the complainants' bill, alleging a previous purchase: after filing their answer, they discover that the patent is invalid and their title to it good for nothing. Why should they not be allowed to contest the validity of the patent, and show that the complainants, as well as themselves, have been defrauded by the patentee? For if, under such circumstances, the respondents should be enjoined from using the supposed invention, it would present this anomaly, that the respondents would be hindered from using that which belongs to the whole world. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, we think it would not be an abuse of the sound discretion of the court to permit the respondents to file a supplementary answer setting up this defence, on payment of costs which have accrued on the abandoned defence: 1st. Because there has been no laches or delay, the application being made during the term to which the bill was filed. 2d. The application was made as soon as the fact was discovered, and before any testimony was taken. 3d. If the defence be true, as we now assume, although the defendants might have discovered it before by proper diligence, yet believing their title to the patent better than that of complainants, their attention was not called to contest its validity till they discovered the invalidity of the title which has been imposed on them by the patentee. 4th. There is nothing contradictory or inconsistent between the answer as filed and the amendment proposed to be made: The first was made under the supposition that the patent, as well as the respondents' title to it, were valid. The new discovered defence admits they were doubly wronged by a bad title and by a worthless patent.

Whether this defence can be satisfactorily established is the matter to be tried.

[NOTE. There was a decision in this case in favor of complainant. Case No. 8,413. It was subsequently heard upon motion to treble the damages. Motion refused. Id. 8,414. The decree of the circuit court was for perpetual injunction and awarding $13,282.92 damages for infringement. From this decree an appeal was taken to the supreme court. The injunction was modified, and one dollar nominal damages awarded. 1 Wall. (68 U. S.) 155.]

Case No. 9,792.

MOREHEAD v. UNITED STATES.

[Hoff. Op. 404.]

District Court, N. D. California. May 26, 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—LOST GRANT—EXPEDIENTE REGULAR—SUSPICIOUS FACTS.

[1. The rule is that, before the contents of a paper alleged to be lost can be proven, satisfactory evidence must be produced to prove its execution and the loss. But in cases where three things are so intimately blended together, and there can be no question as to the contents, and no possible motive for withholding it, the contention being in reference to the execution, then the court will not be so strict as to evidence as to loss.]

[2. Where the archives show the expediente to be regular and its signatures genuine, and a grant to have issued thereon, and there is no evidence to show any fraud or tampering with the archives, the grant will be allowed, although there is evidence to throw doubt upon the fact that the claimant was at the place where the grant purports to have been signed and delivered to him.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The land claimed in this case consists of ten leagues, situated on the Sacramento river, at the place now called "Knight's Landing," in the county of Yolo. The claim was rejected by the board, for non-fulfillment of the conditions of occupation and cultivation. It appears, however, from the evidence, that Knight, the grantor, settled on the land in 1842 or 1843, and continued to occupy it until 1849, when he died, on the Stanislaus river, a distance of about one hundred miles. As early as June, 1843, Knight petitioned Governor Micheltorena for the land alleged to have been subsequently granted to him by Pio Pico, but in pursuance of Jimeno's recommendation, the proceedings on this, as on numerous similar applications, were suspended, until the governor should make his projected visit to the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys. On the 22d December, 1844, Micheltorena issued the document known as his "general title," whereby he granted to all the citizens who had solicited with reports in their favor from General Sutter, the lands described in their respective petitions and maps. As Knight had not only not obtained the favorable report of Sutter, but as the report of the alcalde of Sonoma to whom the application had been referred by Sutter, had declared the land to be occupied by Don Tomas Hardy, he was, of course, not embraced within the class of grantees mentioned in the general title.

The grant on which the claimant, [James G. Morehead,] who is the administrator of Knight, relies, is alleged to have been made by Pio Pico on the 4th of May, 1846. The original grant is not produced, and evidence has been offered to prove its execution, loss and contents. It is objected that the loss of the original is not sufficiently proved to justify the admission of secondary evidence as to its contents. "Where evidence of the contents of a writing alleged to be lost is proposed to be given, the natural order of making the proof is to show—First, that the original existed; secondly, that it has been lost; and, thirdly, its contents. It has been said, however, that unless proof is adduced satisfactory to the court, of the loss or destruction, evidence as to execution and contents can not be submitted to the jury." Jackson v. Frier, 16 Johns. 193; [De Haven v. Henderson], 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 424; 3 Har. & J. 219. "But these facts are frequently so intimately blended together, and have such a mutual relation to, and dependence upon each other, that it is difficult and often impossible to observe strictly the logical order of the proofs. The amount of proof of loss or destruction which will be exacted, depends in a great degree upon the nature of the case. If any suspicion hangs over the instrument, or that it is designedly withheld, a rigid inquiry should be made as to the reasons of its nonproduction. But where there is no such suspicion, all that ought to be required is reasonable diligence to obtain the original." Minor v. Tillotson, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 99, 101. "Where there is no ground for suspicion that the paper is intentionally withheld, nor any discernible motive for deception, courts are extremely liberal in regard to secondary evidence." 6 Vt. 399. "Where the paper is of that description that no doubt can arise as to proof of its contents, there can be no danger in admitting secondary evidence." [Renner v. Bank of Columbia], 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 581–587; U. S. v. Doebler [Case No. 14,977]. "Ordinary diligence is usually enough and it will ordinarily suffice that the paper has been sought for, where it might be supposed likely to be found or was usually kept and that the search was fruitless." 3 McCord, 322.

The above observations taken from the decisions of various courts apply with much force to the case at bar. The original grant is alleged to have been lost;—but the claimant produces from the archives the expediente containing the original petition with the marginal order of the governor, the decree of concession which directs the title to be made out, and a copy of that title as delivered to the party. If these papers are genuine, the existence and contents of the lost grant are sufficiently proved, and no motive can be suggested for its suppression. The copy produced shows it to have been in the usual form and with the usual conditions, and the description of the land is, as usual, taken from the petition.

The real controversy of the case is not as to the contents of the lost grant, but as to whether a grant was ever issued. As the court, before it can be satisfied that a paper has been lost or destroyed, must first be satisfied that it once existed, the proofs on the latter branch of the inquiry must first be considered. If, then, the evidence in this case is sufficient to establish that a grant was made on the petition produced from the archives, I am clearly of opinion that the proofs of loss are sufficient to meet the technical requirements as to the admission of secondary evidence. If, on the other hand, the evidence does not establish that a grant was made, then the claim must be rejected because the claimant has failed to make out his case; but not for the reason that he has not furnished sufficient preliminary proof of the loss or destruction of his title to allow secondary evidence of the contents to be given.

It is proper to add that though the objection as to the insufficiency of the proof of loss was taken, the arguments of the counsel who represented the United States were chiefly directed to an investigation of the evidence relating to the existence at any time before the conquest of any grant of the land. To this inquiry which is thus, in any point of view, preliminary, we will now address ourselves. The only witness who testifies that he knows the grant was made, is Jose Matias Moreno. He states that when he was secretary to the government in 1846, Knight petitioned for a tract of land on the Sacramento. The governor made a decree for a title to the land petitioned for, and the title was accordingly issued. He further swears that he believes the copy of the grant found in the expediente is a copy of the title issued to Knight. If this witness were entirely worthy of credit this testimony confirmed as it is by the expediente found in the archives would be sufficient to establish the facts to which he swears. This court has, however, on more than one occasion been compelled to reject as simulated and ante-dated grants, the genuineness of which was positively sworn to by Moreno. A careful investigation of all the testimony in the case is therefore necessary, notwithstanding his positive statements. J. M. Harbin swears that Knight was with him in the spring of 1846 at Los Angeles about three weeks. That the witness was there about a month and that he found Knight there, but he left the place before the witness; that Pio Pico, the governor, told him he had given Knight his papers, and that Knight also told him he had them, when he was getting on his horse to leave. Knight also told him that he was going to leave his papers with John Wilson of Santa Barbara, that he might obtain their confirmation by the departmental assembly. N. A. Den swears that he saw Knight in the spring of 1846, either in March, April or May, on his way to Los Angeles, and also on his return. On his return he stated that he had got his papers for his rancho, and a short time afterwards, in looking over the archives at Los Angeles, the witness saw evidence that he had done so. J. C. Davis swears that about the 5th of June he was in Col. Fremont's camp at the "Buttes," when Knight came in and informed them that all the Americans in California would be ordered out of the country by the government. Some one then remarked that he would, in that event, lose his rancho, to which he replied that he had just returned from the lower country, and had procured his title papers, at the same time producing some papers which he said were his title, but which the witness did not read.

Evidence has been offered on the part of the United States to show that Knight could not have been at Los Angeles in the beginning of May, as sworn to by Harbin, and that the relations which then existed between the Mexican authorities and the American settlers rendered it in the highest degree improbable that the government could have been induced to make him a grant. Knight's conduct and declarations are also relied on as showing that the only title papers he possessed were the Micheltorena papers of 1884. Major John Bidwell, after detailing the circumstances connected with Knight's first application to Governor Micheltorena, and his failure to obtain a grant from that officer, states that he returned those papers to Knight in 1844, and that he did not see them again until the spring or summer of 1847, when Knight brought them to him and asked him if anything more could be done with them, and if his title was a good one, as the papers then stood; that some persons were under the impression that the American governors had the same authority to grant lands as the Mexican governors had possessed, and that Knight made the inquiry of him whether anything could be done with the papers, because he entertained such views or understood that they were entertained. The witness states that at this time Knight exhibited no other papers than those which he (witness) had returned, unless, perhaps, a copy of the general title of Micheltorena; but he is positive that there was no formal title shown him, nor was any reference made by Knight to any other title papers for the land than those he exhibited to the witness. Major Bidwell also states that in the spring of 1846 a journey from the Sacramento valley to Los Angeles and back would have required some six weeks to accomplish, and that it was considered unsafe unless in companies of eight or ten persons. Riding and pack horses were necessary, with provisions and led horses; that the water courses were high, as they usually are in the spring, and that he (witness) was waiting in the spring of 1846—March, April and part of May—to make the trip, on account of the height of the water courses necessarily crossed in traveling in that direction. He further states that he thinks Knight was in the Sacramento valley, at his place, in the spring of 1846; that if he had been absent or far away he thinks he should have known it, because there were but few Americans in the country. "We knew each other, and if one had been absent I think I should have known it." That persons leaving the valley uniformly applied to General Sutter for passports. That Knight did not make such an application; that he (witness) was with General Sutter, kept his books, and did most of his writing. General Sutter testifies that he knows that in 1845 or 1846, probably in the fall of 1845, Knight went to Los Angeles to get a title for his rancho from Pio Pico; that he is doubtful whether it was in the spring of 1846, for the water courses, as is usual in the spring, were very much swollen: In a subsequent part of his deposition he states that in the winter of 1846, just before the Bear Flag was raised, he and Knight had a dispute about the quantity of land solicited by Knight; that Knight said he would not take a grant for less than ten leagues, and became so excited about it that he drew a pistol upon him (witness), and that subsequently they had no intercourse. He adds that Knight could not have been in Los Angeles in May, 1846, because he was then with Colonel Fremont. The testimony of this witness rather tends to establish the facts alleged by the claimants than to dis-prove them. He states positively, it will be observed, that Knight went to Los Angeles to get a grant from Pio Pico in 1845 or 1846; but he thinks it was in the fall of 1845. The conversation with Knight, which he says occurred in the succeeding winter, shows that at that time Knight did not have his grant. If, then, Sutter is right in saying that Knight went to Los Angeles at all to obtain a title from Pico, it would seem most probable that he went in 1846, and not in the fall of 1845.

J. P. Leese testifies that the marginal note on the petition to Micheltorena, dated January 26th, 1844, was written by him at the time it bears date, except the words, "una parte de ello," which were added subsequently at the solicitation of Knight and in the presence of Hardy; that these words were added at the time he made the certificate which is appended to the papers, and which was made October 8th, 1849; that Knight represented that he had been unable to get his title from the governor, because his (witness) report showed that the land had been granted to Hardy, and that he (the witness) thereupon added the words above mentioned to his report, and appended his certificate to the papers. He further states that Knight on this occasion brought all his papers to be examined by the witness, and that the only papers he recollects seeing were the Micheltorena papers. On his cross-examination, Leese modifies the foregoing statement in an important particular. He testifies that Knight informed him he had not been able to obtain a grant in the fall of 1845, and not in 1847, as he had previously sworn; and that Knight never made to the witness any declaration to the same effect subsequently. He also states that the words "una parte de ello," were added by him when he was going out of office in 1845; and, finally, that he cannot swear that those words were added by him at all.

From the whole of Leese's testimony, it may, I think, be fairly concluded that the words added to his report were, in all probability, placed there in the fall of 1847; but that the declaration of Knight that he had not obtained a title was made in 1845, before the date of the title now claimed to have been issued. D. M. Berrey testifies that he has heard Knight speak on several occasions of his title papers; that he abused Bidwell for not getting a grant for him from the governor; that he thought his claim would be doubtful in consequence; that he had the alcalde's papers, which were a shadow of title, and that Fremont or Bidwell had told him a shadow of title would be good; that in 1847 he refused to sell the witness a part of his rancho, fearing to weaken his title by dividing the land, and saying that when he got his grant or title to the rancho he would let him (witness) have as much as he wanted. William Gordon testifies that he saw Knight at his house, about eleven miles from Knight's rancho, in the early part of June, 1846; that he was then with the war party which shortly afterwards took Sonoma. He adds that Knight told him, after this campaign, that he had his papers "all regulated about right in his land affairs," but did not mention that he had been to Los Angeles to get them fixed. It will be observed that the date at which the witness saw Knight at his house (in the early part of June), is quite consistent with the hypothesis that Knight left Los Angeles in the beginning of May. As also with the statement of Davis, that Knight came into Fremont's camp at the "Buttes," about the 5th June. This witness also states that he does not remember having seen Knight at any time in the early part of 1846, before the month of June, although he may have done so. Major Gillespie, who was an officer of the marine corps "under special and confidential order from the president of the United States," testifies that he met Knight in the Sacramento valley early in the month of June, 1846; that he (Knight) joined the Bear Flag insurrection between the 26th May and the 1st June; that in the latter part of April and the month of May the country between Sutter's Fort and Los Angeles was overflowed, so much so that his courier, Sam Neal, was obliged to turn back, cross the Sacramento river at the fort, and go down by way of Sonoma; that it would have required to make the journey, under ordinary circumstances, about six weeks, but on express fifteen or twenty days. In reply to the twenty-first interrogatory, Major Gillespie states that he does not know the exact distance from Sutter's Fort to Los Angeles; that at that time it was computed by day's travel more than by miles. "By ordinary traveling, it took fifteen days; by express, from six to seven days." There is probably some error in reducing the deposition of the witness to writing, but as the distance between the two places is about seven hundred miles, it is probable that the last answer as to the time usually required to make the journey is the correct one. Gillespie further testifies that the rising of the American settlers in the Sacramento valley took place in the latter part of May, 1846; that its immediate cause was a proclamation of Castro requiring all who had not been a year in the country, and had not been naturalized, to leave California immediately, and that the settlers had heard that a military force had orders to march against them; that the hostile feeling had prevailed from the time of Fremont's attempt to pass through the country, in March, 1846, and that from that period the communications of American settlers with the lower parts of the country were precarious and doubtful. The witness states, however, that he made during the spring a journey from Monterey to the north of Klamath Lake and back to Yerba Buena (San Francisco), though he was "in constant fear of being picked up by the authorities."

With respect to this testimony, the same observation may be made as to the deposition previously noticed, viz: that the fact that Knight was with the insurgents about the end of May or 1st of June is entirely consistent with his having been in Los Angeles about the 4th of May preceding. He is stated by Major Gillespie, to have been "a famous horseman," and even of he enlisted on the 26th of May, he would have had more than twenty days to make a journey which Gillespie says could be performed in six or seven days. The United States have introduced, however, more positive testimony to show that Knight could not have gone to Los Angeles as alleged: William Bartee swears that during the months of April, May, and June, 1846, Knight was at his rancho; that he and the witness frequently hunted together, and that during those months not more than eight or ten days could have passed without his seeing Knight. The witness states on cross-examination, that he kept no memorandum of dates, but the men with him did so; and he recollects the dates well. But that Knight was not at his rancho during the month of June is clear from all the testimony in the case. All the witnesses, both those for the United States and those for the claimants, concur in stating Knight to have been with Fremont at the end of May or beginning of June, and that he was on the expedition to Sonoma, in the early part of the latter month. Colonel Fremont himself states that Knight was employed by him as a spy in May, and that his occupation led him to the neighborhood of the Bay. Bartee is thus clearly in error in stating that Knight was on his rancho during the month of June. John Grigsby testifies that he saw Knight at his house, on the Sacramento river, on or near the 1st day of May, 1846; that he was in pursuit of a mule which had been stolen from him "by a gentleman named Dr. Carter;" that the train in which Carter was, was to start, as he understood, on the 1st of May, and he therefore hurried on to recover his mule before they started; that Knight lent him a horse when he reached his rancho, but on reaching Feather river he learned that the train would not start until the 15th, and he employed Mr. Hardy to cross the Feather river and get the mule, as soon as the waters permitted; he then returned to Knight's rancho; that he was at home, and Hardy brought him the mule in about ten days. Samuel W. Chase testifies that he saw Knight on his rancho on the 18th or 20th of April, 1846, and that John Gordon was with him at the time. John Gordon's testimony is by no means explicit. He states that he, in company with Chase, saw Knight at his rancho, but he cannot remember the day or the month; he thinks it was in the spring of 1846, some four or five months before Fremont's party started for Sonoma; that from that time until the party started for Sonoma he saw him at intervals, sometimes, of three or four days, a week, or a month. If this witness is correct in stating that the time at which Chase and himself saw Knight at his rancho was four or five months before the expedition to Sonoma, then it must have been in January or February, 1846. Knight would thus have had ample time to make his journey to Los Angeles, and to reach Fremont's camp at the end of May or beginning of June. Nicholas Algier testifies that 1846 he lived about eight miles distant from Knight; that during that year he saw him nearly every week two or three times a week; that he saw him in March two or three times at Sutter's Fort, and at his own house, about the 10th or 15th of May; that he remembers this from the circumstance that he was ploughing to plant corn.

The foregoing testimony is chiefly relied upon by the United States, as showing that Knight could not have been at Los Angeles, as contended for by the claimants. It cannot, however, be considered as establishing the fact in a very satisfactory manner. Bartee, as we have seen, states that during not only April and May, but June, 1846, Knight was at home at his rancho; and yet it is clear that at the end of May he was at the Buttes with Fremont, and the latter testifies that he employed Knight as a spy during the month of May, and that his occupation led him to the neighborhood of the bay. S. W. Chase is not only contradicted by Gordon, by whom he says he was accompanied on a visit to Knight's rancho, about the 18th or 20th April, 1846; but in his affidavit, filed some months before his deposition was taken, he says that he saw Knight on his rancho on or about the last day of April of 1846; that he was mistaken as to one or the other of these statements is evident. It is not unreasonable to suppose that he may be mistaken in both, and that he has no distinct and reliable recollection of the date at which he saw Knight at his residence. Algier's statement, that he saw Knight at his rancho on the 10th or 15th May, 1846, is not inconsistent (if we adopt the latter date) with the hypothesis that Knight left Los Angeles about the 5th, and the witness states no fact which, after so large an interval of time, would justify us in concluding with any degree of certainty that the true date may not have been a few days later. Knight's presence at his rancho towards the end of May is entirely consistent with the theory of the case as presented by the claimants. Major Bidwell's testimony is much relied on by the United States, not only on account of the character of the witness, but because the reason he assigns for thinking Knight was in the valley during the spring of 1846 is such as, when the state of affairs in the country at the time is considered, to render it impossible that if he had been absent his absence should not have been noticed. "There were but few Americans in the country. We knew each other, and if one had been absent I think I should have known it." It is to be remarked, however, that Major Bidwell does not swear that he knows Knight was in the valley. He merely testifies in effect, that he does not remember that he was absent, and that if he had been he thinks he should have noticed it. But Major Bidwell's deposition shows that on other points his memory is by no means reliable. He states that Knight, in 1844, petitioned the alcalde of the Sonoma district for land; that the petition was acceded to by the alcalde, and was then referred to General Sutter, from whom a favorable report was obtained. A second petition to the governor was then made out, and both petitions were presented to the governor, and by him referred to the secretary of state. An examination of the Micheltorena papers shows this account of the proceeding to be entirely erroneous. The petition was addressed to the governor, and by him referred to the prefect. The prefect referred it to General Sutter, who referred it to the alcalde of Sonoma, and the alcalde of Sonoma reported unfavorably to the petitioner. There was thus no petition to the alcalde, no favorable report by him, no reference by him to Sutter, and no favorable report by the latter. When we find Mr. Bidwell's memory so treacherous upon points like these upon which he testifies with apparent confidence, it is surely unsafe to rely upon it on others where the probabilities of error would seem to be greater. General Sutter, as we have seen, to a certain extent corroborates the statement of the claimant's witnesses, for he swears that he knows that Knight went down in 1845 or 1846 to get a title from Pio Pico. He thinks, however, that it must have been in the fall of 1845, because in the spring of 1846 the water courses were much swollen. It is not pretended that Knight obtained a title in 1845, and the conversation with Knight, related by Sutter, which he says occurred in the winter of 1846, just before the Bear Flag was raised, shows that at that time Knight had no title. If he had at that time been to Los Angeles and failed to obtain it, it is not probable that he should have omitted to mention it and have left General Sutter ignorant, as he swears he is, whether he obtained it or not. It seems, therefore, most probable either that Sutter is mistaken in his positive statement that "he knows Knight went down to get a grant from Pico," or else, if that statement be true, Knight must have gone in the spring of 1846 after his conversation and quarrel with Sutter.

It is urged by the counsel of the United States that in this case the negative testimony of Bidwell that he did not know of Knight's absence, has all the force of positive statement; that the American settlers in the Sacramento valley were a small band, menaced with extermination or expulsion from the country, and driven to rely upon each other for protection; that at such a time the absence of a bold, active man like Knight could not have escaped observation, and that, therefore, Major Bidwell's statement that he did not know of his absence, is equivalent to a positive statement that he was not absent. There is undoubtedly force in the argument. It is to be recollected, however, that the actual rising of the settlers did not take place until the latter part of May, which was also the date of the decree or bando of General Castro, ordering all Americans who had not become naturalized, and not been a year in the country, to leave California. The settlers also heard about the same time that Castro and Vallejo were collecting horses to send to San Jose to mount their men. It is true that Major Gillespie states that the causes which produced the rising had been in operation from the time of Fremont's attempt to pass through the country in March. But it is evident that during the months of March and April no such measure could have been contemplated by the American settlers, for Fremont after remaining more than a month in the valley directed his march towards Oregon, which he assuredly would not have done had he supposed that he was abandoning his countrymen to the violence of the Californians. Even so late as the 22d of April, 1846, he left Lassen's rancho, the furtherest north of the American settlements, still continuing his march towards Oregon. It was only on the 9th of May, after being overtaken by Gillespie, that he counter marched, and returning reached the American settlements on the 24th. It was then that the settlers joined him and hostile operations took place. That Knight was with him then is clear; that his absence at that time could not have failed to be noticed is also evident. But I see no reason to conclude that the same observation can be applied to an absence during the month of April and the early part of May.

It is urged that Knight could not have made this journey by reason of the height of the waters in the streams. But Fremont found no difficulty in marching from Klamath Lake to Sacramento, between the 9th and 24th May, the upper waters, at least, of the Sacramento and San Joaquin being then low; and Major Gillespie, about the same time, made the journey from Monterey to Klamath Lake, and back to San Francisco. That the journey was attended with some difficulty may be admitted, but it cannot be affirmed that to a bold horseman like Knight it was impossible. It is urged that such a journey to an American would have been attended with great difficulty, owing to the hostile feelings of the Californian authorities and population; such, no doubt, was the fact. But Knight was a naturalized Mexican, married to a Mexican woman, and had resided a long while in the country. The bando of Castro only embraced settlers who had not become Mexican citizens, and who had not been a year in the country; and Fremont states that though Knight was a prominent actor in the rising, he was not "ostensibly so," and that he employed him as a spy—"an occupation which led him to the neighborhood of the bay, where he could communicate with the Mexicans and ascertain their movements." Knight must, therefore, have preserved his friendly relations with the Mexicans; and if his real sentiments were so little known that Fremont could, in May, and subsequently during the whole campaign, employ him as a spy, it is to be presumed that, in the preceding April, he could have had little to fear from the hostility of the Californians. It is urged that Fremont states that he does not know whether Knight was in Los Angeles in May, 1846, and that he would certainly have known it had he been there. But it would seem that this statement of Colonel Fremont furnishes as strong an argument for the claimants as against them. If Knight was in Fremont's employ, or with him, during the whole month of May, as contended for on the part of the United States, Colonel Fremont would have been able to state positively that he was not in Los Angeles during that month. His inability to state anything on the subject shows that Knight could not have been with him; nor was he acquainted with his movements during the period alluded to. It may also be observed that Colonel Fremont mentions that Knight brought him his papers just before his death; that he described them; but the witness does not recollect his description; that he does not recollect his saying anything of Micheltorena in connection with them; he thinks he spoke rather of Pico; and that he does not recollect that he stated that his papers were imperfect.

On the whole, after a careful consideration of the evidence on the point we have been considering, my opinion is that the United States have not established satisfactorily the fact that Knight was not in Los Angeles at the time mentioned by the claimants' witnesses. Many circumstances render it improbable; but it is positively sworn that he was there, and the statement may very possibly be true. I have been unable to bring my mind to the conclusion that the claim ought to be rejected as spurious, on the ground that he was not, and could not have obtained it at the time stated by the witnesses. The only testimony to show that the grant was in fact issued, to which we have thus far adverted, is that of Moreno and that of N. A. Den. If the case of the claimants rested on this testimony alone, I should not hesitate to reject it, for I should consider it too unreliable or too loose to justify me, under all the circumstances, in considering the issuance of the title as proved, but the claimants have produced from the archives an expediente, which if genuine establishes beyond doubt the facts of Knight's application for the land and of the grant made by Governor Pico. The expediente consists of a petition by Knight, a marginal order by Pico, a decree of concession signed by the same officer and the usual borrador or copy of the title delivered to the party. The signature of Pio Pico and Moreno as they appear on these papers are proved to be genuine, nor is any question made on that point. The signatures on the borrador or copy are not those of Pico or Moreno, as that instrument was a copy of the grant issued to the party, which was attached to other papers in the expediente on which the governor's signature was usually written or else copied by the clerk who prepared the borrador, but the marginal order, and the decree of concession directing the title to issue, bear the genuine signatures of the governor.

It is said that the existence of these papers in the archives proves nothing, for they may have been fabricated and placed there subsequently to their dates. The archives of the former government after Monterey was taken possession of by the United States, were transferred, as is well known, to Sutter's Fort, where they remained until the Spring of 1847. They were then returned to Monterey, and remained in charge of Governor Mason, and the officers under him, until February, 1850. Both Fremont and Major Halleck swear that while they remained in their charge they were carefully guarded, and Major Halleck testifies that while they were in his charge no paper was placed among the archives without placing a memorandum upon it giving the date at which and the person by whom it was deposited. That an expediente may, notwithstanding, have been foisted into the archives is possible, but not probable; but the indexes which were, during the year 1847, prepared by Hartnell and Halleck, show at that date at least this expediente was archived. Captain Halleck, who was secretary of state under Governor Mason, states that he was assisted in the duties of that office by W. P. E. Hartnell, and that early in the year 1847, Mr. Hartnell commenced arranging and numbering the expedientes in the office—that he before the month of June, 1847, had prepared an index of the expedientes on file. That subsequently in 1848, Mr. Hartnell and himself prepared a second index which was similar to the first except that a few expedientes were noted on it which had been overlooked by Mr. Hartnell when the first was prepared. A note of these was also inserted by Mr. Hartnell on his first index. Both of these indexes are now found in the surveyor general's office—they are identified by Major Halleck. On both, this expediente is noted not among the omitted expedientes but among those originally indexed. The expedientes found in the archives appear to have been numbered by the Mexican authorities from one to five hundred and twelve inclusive. This numeration was therefore continued by Mr. Hartnell and the remaining expedientes were numbered by him up to five hundred and seventy-nine. The number of the expediente was written on its back, and was also noted in the index made by him. On the back of the expediente produced in this case the name of the land "Carmel" with the number 550 appear, and the grant is mentioned by the same name and number in the index. The handwriting [of the] index, is proved to be Hartnell's. That the numbers were inscribed upon the expedientes before the index was made, appears probable, but it is certain that when the index was made this expediente must have been in the archives—and this for two reasons: first, that the note of it seems to be written with the same ink, and apparently at the same time with the rest of the index; and secondly, because it is numbered as its date requires. It is dated, as has been said, May 4th, 1846. It is numbered 550; No. 549 is dated May 2d, 1846; No. 551 is dated May 6th, 1846. It must, therefore, with the other expedientes, have been in the office when the index was prepared, and its number affixed to it. It could not have been subsequently deposited and a note of it inserted in the index, for in that case it would either have had no number, or there would have been two expedientes, both numbered 550. Unless, therefore, the testimony of Major Halleck be entirely rejected, and it has not been contradicted, we must believe that in 1847, when the index was made, there was in the archives an expediente for the grant of a place called "Carmel" to William Knight. It has been suggested that that expediente may not have been the one now produced. That the expediente on the outer sheet of which Mr. Hartnell placed the number 550, and which he noted in his index, may have been the expediente of the Micheltorena papers heretofore alluded to. But this conjecture or suspicion seems unsupported by facts.

First. It seems from all the evidence that the Micheltorena papers remained in Knight's possession from the time they were returned to him after his unsuccessful application to the governor. The tesimony of Leese is relied on by the United States to show that in October, 1847, he added his certificate and appended certain words to his report. They are now produced from the custody of Knight's administrator. No evidence whatsoever has been adduced to show that they were ever in the archives. And—

Second. On the back of the expediente and in the indexes the name of the land granted ("Carmel") appears. This name is in the handwriting of Mr. Hartnell. It appears to have been written at the time when the No. 550 was inscribed upon the document. Mr. Hartnell could only have known the name of the place from inspection of the papers; and the Micheltorena papers contain no designation of the place by name. The name "Carmel" for the first time appears in Pio Pico's decree of concession.

Third. Had the Micheltorena papers been contained within the cover of the expediente, the number 550 could not have been affixed to it. The latest of these documents is dated 1844. The expedientes were numbered by Mr. Hartnell in the order of their dates. It is impossible that he should have affixed to documents dated in 1844 the number 550, while he numbered a document dated May 2d, 1846, 549, and another dated May 6th, 1846, 551.

I think it clear, therefore, that at the date of making the index of Hartnell this expediente was on file in the archives. It is admitted that Pio Pico left California in August 1846, and did not return until July, 1848. As his signatures, as they appear on the documents contained in the expediente, are shown to be genuine, it follows that he must have made the grant either at its date, or subsequently, before his flight, or during his absence in Mexico.

It has been argued with great earnestness that it is in the highest degree improbable that Pico, with his known hostility to Americans, would have made this grant in May; but it is still more improbable that he would have made it in June, July or August, after the insurrection had broken out, or after Monterey had been captured. During all these months Knight was with Fremont, and he marched south with him at the close of June. It seems equally improbable that Pico could have made the grant during his absence in Mexico. Certainly he would not have done so unless some pecuniary or other inducement had been held out to him. The course of events surely had not tended to diminish any hostility to Americans he might previously have entertained. It does not appear that Knight had any pecuniary resource, nor did the nature of his employment leave him much time to enter upon and consummate such a negotiation with an ex-governor of California, residing in Mexico. Major Gillespie testifies that he remained on duty in the Sacramento valley until late in the fall of 1846. He then went south as a guide to Colonel Fremont, and arrived in Los Angeles about January, 1847, for the first time after the commencement of hostilities. He remained in Los Angeles about a month, and then went north as a bearer of dispatches. But the expediente, as we have seen, must have been in the archives at least as early as the middle of 1847. It seems, therefore, scarcely possible that Knight could, during this time, have procured the grant from Pio Pico, in Mexico, and subsequently have succeeded in placing the expediente in the archives before the index was made, and without the knowledge of either Hartnell or Halleck.

The counsel for the United States have dwelt with much force on the fact that Knight, so late as October, 1847, was procuring certificates from Leese and Hardy, and apparently relying solely on the Micheltorena papers. It is to be considered, however, that at that time, if Brannan is to be believed, Knight had lost the grant alleged to have been issued to him by Governor Pico. The archives which had been carried to Sutter's Fort, and there remained until the spring of 1847, had only a few months before been taken to Monterey. They were then, and for a long time afterwards, in much confusion. It is, therefore, possible that Knight may have regarded the loss of his grant from Pico as fatal to his claim, and turned his attention to the Micheltorena papers, with a view of making out some "shadow of title," which he had been advised would be sufficient. The fact that he was engaged on the Micheltorena papers in October, 1847, would seem to indicate that up to that time he was not aware that the expediente since produced was among the archives. If it had been fraudulently placed there already, the fraud must have been accomplished without Knight's knowledge, which is impossible. That it was among the archives at the end of 1847 we have seen has been proved.

After a most careful consideration I have been unable to resist the conclusion that the existence of this expediente in the archives in 1847 must be taken as proved, and that the hypothesis that it was placed there after its date and during the absence of Pico from California is not only unsustained by proofs but is extremely improbable. If this conclusion be correct, it follows that the execution and issuance of the title to Knight must be considered as established by proofs from the archives, in their nature far more satisfactory than would have been the production by the claimant of the title unsupported by such proofs—for the genuineness of a document of this kind produced by the claimant and unconfirmed by the public records is always open to suspicion. The evidence thus furnished by the archives is not in my opinion rebutted by the testimony already examined as to the whereabouts of Knight in May, 1846, the difficulty of making the journey to Los Angeles or the improbability that Pico would have made the grant, for the testimony on these points is inconclusive and unsatisfactory; while the evidence from the archives, if Maj. Halleck's statement with respect to the indexes be correct, is positive and reliable.

It is objected that the grant, even if made by the governor, is void, because the expediente does not contain any order of reference or "informe" by officers, which by the regulations the governor was required to obtain. In support of this position the case of U. S. v. Cambuston, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 62, is relied on. In that case no expediente whatever was produced, neither a petition, a map, a marginal order, reference for information, informe or decree of concession appeared to have been made; nor was any evidence offered to show that any one of the preliminary steps made requisite by the act of 1824, and the regulations of 1828 to a grant by a Mexican governor, had been observed. The recital in the grant itself, the supreme court declare "not to be conclusive or even satisfactory evidence of the facts when the question is raised whether or not the alleged grant was made in conformity with the requirements of law—in other words, whether the preliminary conditions had been complied with which enabled the governor in the particular case to make the grant, especially in respect to those preliminary proceedings which are required to be of record, and of which record evidence should have been produced or its non-production satisfactorily accounted for."

But the case at bar is essentially different. The record evidence is produced showing that a petition was presented—that a decree of concession was made—and that the title, a copy of which is contained in the expediente, issued. The decree of concession alludes to a report of the alcalde of Sonoma, which is not found in the expediente, and the petition states that a report of that officer is annexed to the petition. What has become of that report does not appear, but I cannot consider that the absence of that single document even unaccounted for, is sufficient to defeat the grant. The evidence that the governor complied with the preliminary conditions which enabled him to make the grant does not consist, as in the case of Cambuston, merely of a general recital that the customary investigations had been made, which recital is contained in a document produced from the claimant's custody, but it clearly appears that a petition was presented by the applicant, which purports to be accompanied by a report. This report is specifically alluded to by the governor in making his preliminary decree according to the petition, and all this is of record. It is also to be remarked that the regulations of 1828, while they require that a petition expressing the name, country, religion, etc., of the applicant, shall be addressed to the governor, merely direct the governor to obtain the necessary "information as to the land and the petitioner, in order that the application may be attended to—or if it be preferred the municipal authority may be consulted whether there is any objection to making the grant." It is clear that this regulation left it discretionary with the governor whether to consult the municipal authority or not. Nor does the direction to him to obtain the necessary information in terms oblige him to resort to any particular mode of ascertaining the facts. It would seem, therefore, that where the governor is from personal knowledge or oral information satisfied that the land is vacant and that the petitioner has the necessary qualifications and thereupon without requiring informes in writing accedes to the petition, the grant ought not to be avoided because no informes are found in the expediente, and such seems to have been the view of the supreme court in the subsequent case of U. S. v. Sutter [21 How. (62 U. S.) 171], the claim in which was confirmed notwithstanding that no informes were contained in the expediente.

After the best consideration I have been able to give this case, my opinion is that although there are some suspicious or rather improbable circumstances connected with the claim, yet on the whole the preponderance of proof is in favor of its genuineness, and that it ought to be confirmed. A decree of confirmation must therefore be entered.

Case No. 9,793.

MOREHOUSE et al. v. The JEFFERSON.

[1 Pet. Adm. 46.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1803.

SALVAGE—MASTER AND CREW TAKEN OFF—GREAT PERIL AND EXERTION—AMOUNT AWARDED.

1. The schooner William fell in with the Jefferson at sea, in great distress, and took her master and crew from on board her. She was then abandoned. On the following day some of the crew of the William went on board of her, and, after great peril and exertion, brought her into New York. The district court allowed one-half of the net proceeds as salvage.

[2. Cited in The Waterloo, Case No. 17,257, to the point that one-half of the net proceeds is the ultimatum of salvage to be allowed in cases of derelict.]

To the Honourable John Sloss Hobart, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the New York District: Humbly complaining, shew unto your honour, in this honourable court, Andrew Morehouse, James Ford, Elihu Carrington, and Rienhold Willenbrant, at present in the city of New York, in the New York district, mariners, for themselves jointly, and separately, and also for Nathaniel L. Griswold and George Griswold of the same place, merchants, Noah Pratt, Jesse Lyon, and Peter Jones, severally and respectively, according to their rights, interest, and claims as hereinafter and hereby particularly set forth and made manifest, and as the same shall be judged right and decreed in and by this honourable court. That the said Nathaniel L. Griswold and George Griswold were at all the times hereafter mentioned the true sole and lawful owners of the American schooner called the William, which said schooner sailed from the island of Tobago, in the West Indies, on or about the nineteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord 1803, bound to the city and port of New York, in the New York district, with a cargo of merchandize, the said schooner's crew consisting of the said Noah Pratt, who was master, your libellant Andrew Morehouse, who was mate, and the other libellants, James Ford, Elihu Carrington, and Rienhold Willenbrant, together with the said Jesse Lyon, who were seamen, and the said Peter Jones, who was cook of the said schooner William, for the said voyage. And these libellants further shew, and give the court here to understand and be informed, that on or about the fifteenth day of November in the year last aforesaid, while the said schooner William was on her said voyage from Tobago to this port of New York, and navigating as aforesaid, and in latitude by observation thirty-six degrees and fifty-five minutes north, at or about four of the clock in the afternoon, the said schooner William on the high seas fell in with a certain brigantine or vessel called the Jefferson of Newbury Port, commanded by one James Adams, which said brigantine, as the libellants were then informed, and believed to be true, was last from St. Bartholomews, and was bound to the port of New York, in the New York district, with a considerable cargo on board. And your libellants further shew and declare, that shortly after the said schooner William fell in with the said brigantine Jefferson, the said James Adams came on board of the said schooner William, and informed that the said brigantine some time previously, and on or about the ninth day of the said month of November, at night, and while it was very dark and disagreeable weather, had been run foul of by a Spanish or French ship of war, and that the said brigantine had thereby lost a great part of her sails, rigging and spars, and was very materially injured, wrecked and broken in the hull, all which these libellants afterwards discovered, and therefore aver to be true. And the said James Adams, then also declared, that he and the residue of the crew of the said brigantine were determined, for the preservation of their lives, to leave and abandon her, and desired a passage on board the said schooner William to New York, which was consented to on the part of the captain of the said schooner. And these libellants further shew, and give the court here to be informed and understand, that, in order to get a further supply of provisions and water on board the said schooner, so that the crews of both the vessels might have a supply on their passage to New York, your libellant Andrew Morehouse, together with two others of the seamen belonging to the said schooner William, went on board of the said brigantine, to endeavour to get such supply from her, especially of water; but, in attempting to get water out of the brigantine into the boat, the cask was unavoidably stove, which frustrated their intention in that respect. And your libellants further shew, and for truth declare, that at or about five of the clock in the afternoon of the same fourteenth day of November, being the fifteenth of that month by sea reckoning, the said James Adams, the master, and all of the crew of the said brigantine abandoned her and her cargo, and came on board the said schooner William, then on the high seas, bringing with them only the brigantine's boat, in which they came, with their chests of clothes and bedding, and a small quantity of provisions. And the said captain and crew of the said brigantine Jefferson then declared, they would not return to her, nor make any further attempt to navigate her into port. And these libellants further shew, and give the court to be informed, that, after the captain and crew of the said brigantine had so abandoned her, as aforesaid, and came on board the said schooner William, on the high seas, it was thought most advisable by the captain and crew of the said schooner, for them to endeavor to keep in sight of or near the said brigantine, during the night then ensuing, in order to see her situation in the morning; and, if opportunity offered, to attempt to save her and her cargo, or at least to endeavor to get a cask of water from her, and put on board the schooner William, as a further supply for the people then on board her, during the residue of the voyage; and, though this was attempted, they lost sight of the said brigantine during the night, and did not see her again until at or about the hour of eleven of the clock in the forenoon of the next day, when they saw her at as great a distance as she could be discovered, and considerably to windward, when the said schooner William was steered for, and about five of the clock, post meridian, came up with the said brigantine Jefferson, it being, by sea reckoning, the sixteenth day of November, and in latitude, by observation, about thirty-six degrees and fifty-five minutes north; but the sea being then rough, and the vessel rolling very much, it was deemed impracticable to get any water out of the said brigantine that night; it was, nevertheless, agreed upon, after consultation between the captain, mate, and crew of the said schooner William, that the mate and three seamen of the schooner should go on board of the said brigantine, if practicable, and examine her situation, and thereupon to judge of the expediency and propriety of taking possession of, and endeavouring to navigate her into port; whereupon, your libellants went on board the said brigantine, and, after the best examination they could make of her situation, they returned to the schooner; whereupon it was agreed between the captain and the rest of the crew of the schooner, and your libellants, that your libellants should go on board and take possession of the said brigantine, and use their best endeavours to navigate her into port. And that the said schooner should endeavour to keep company with the brigantine, and render her what assistance they could towards getting her into port; in consequence of which agreement, your libellants, the said Andrew Morehouse, James Ford, Elihu Carrington, and Rienhold Willenbrant, with the approbation of the captain, and the rest of the crew of the said schooner, went on board of, and took possession of, the said brigantine, taking with them their clothes, beds, bedding, and such other necessaries as they wanted, and could be spared from the said schooner William. And your libellants further shew, and give the court here to be informed, that they then took possession of the said brigantine, twenty-four hours or upwards after she had been abandoned by her former captain and crew, as before set forth; whereupon, after having so taken possession of the said brigantine, your libellant, Andrew Morehouse, took the command of her, and, with the assistance of the other libellants, made what sail they could upon the said brigantine, and with great difficulty, and imminent danger, navigated her into this port of New York, in the New York district, where they arrived on the second day of this present month of December, where the said brigantine, and all the cargo she had on board when these libellants took possession of her, as aforesaid, now are; the particulars whereof are not known to these libellants with certainty, but they were informed by the said James Adams, the former master of the said brigantine, before they took possession of her, as aforesaid, that the cargo consisted of eighty-three hogsheads of sugar, and two hogsheads of coffee; and these libellants know, from inspection, that a great proportion of the said brigantine's cargo consists of sugar, but they have not yet discovered any coffee on board as part of the cargo, the said cargo not having been yet landed. And these libellants further shew, and for truth declare, that said brigantine and schooner kept company, or in sight of each other, with great difficulty, until about five of the clock of the afternoon of the seventeenth day of November last, when they lost sight of each other in a violent gale of wind, and never came in sight of each other again until they respectively arrived in this port of New York: and these libellants further shew, and give the court here to understand, that the said Noah Pratt, the captain, and the residue of the crew of the said schooner, did all in their power to keep company with the said brigantine, and to render her and these said libellants assistance, until the said vessels were parted in a gale of wind, as aforesaid; when, having entirely lost sight of the said brigantine, and there being no reasonable prospect of again falling in with her at sea, the said schooner made the best of her way to the port of New York, being the port of her destination, where she arrived on the twenty-fourth day of November last. Wherefore, these libellants pray due process of law, against the said brigantine, called the Jefferson, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and all and singular the cargo so taken possession of and brought into port, and saved as aforesaid, and against all and every the owners and owner thereof, or any part thereof; and that they be duly cited to appear and answer the premises, and to perform such order and decree touching the premises as it shall seem meet to this honourable court to make; and that the said brigantine, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with all and singular her cargo so saved and brought into port, may be sold in pursuance of a decree or order of this honourable court; and that the proceeds of such sale or sales, or such part or portion thereof as shall seem just and equitable, may, by virtue of an order and decree of this court, be adjudged and paid over to your libellants, or to them and such other person and persons as by means of the premises shall be deemed and adjudged entitled to salvage or compensation out of the same; and that your libellants, and others interested in the said property, as salvors thereof, may have such further or other relief in the premises as law and justice may require, and as to this honourable court shall seem meet. And your libellants will ever pray. Riggs, Proctor. A. Hamilton, Advocate. New York, Dec. 7, 1803.

The answer and claim of Gilbert Robinson, of the city of New York, merchant, for himself and James Brown, his co-partner, together composing the firm of Gilbert Robinson & Co., consignees of eighty hogsheads of Muscovado sugars, shipped on board the brigantine or vessel called the Jefferson, for and in behalf of George Cruden and Company, of the island of St. Lucia, merchants, the owners of the said sugar, and for and in behalf of the underwriters and all others interested therein, to the libel of Andrew Morehouse, James Ford, Elihu Carrington, and Rienhold Willenbrant, for themselves, jointly and separately, and also for Nathaniel L. Griswold, and George Griswold, Noah Pratt, Jesse Lyon, and Peter Jones, against the said brigantine Jefferson, her tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo. The claimant, by protestation, saving to himself and all others for whom he claims all right of exception as well to the truth as to the sufficiency of the said libel, for answer thereunto, or unto so much thereof as it is necessary for him to answer, alleges and declares that the said brigantine, called the Jefferson, being at the said Island of St. Lucia, and bound on a voyage from thence to the port of New York, the said house of George Cruden and Co., did there ship and lade on board the same eighty hogsheads of Muscovado sugars, marked and numbered as follows, to wit, B. I. No. 1 to 80, for which a certain James Adams, the then master of the brigantine, did then and there, in the usual form, sign and deliver regular bills of lading, binding himself to deliver the same at New York to this respondent and his co-partner, by the description of Messrs. Gilbert Robertson & Co., merchants there. That the said George Cruden & Co. did shortly afterwards forward to this respondent and his co-partner, under the firm aforesaid, two of the said bills of lading subscribed by the said James Adams; and, by invoice and letter of advice bearing date respectively on the tenth and eleventh of October last past, did assign the same to this respondent and his said co-partner, under the firm aforesaid, to be sold for the account and risk of the said George Cruden and Company, as by the said bills of lading, invoice, and letter in the possession of this respondent, ready to be produced to this honourable court, may appear. And this respondent, further answering, saith that he hath been informed and believes that the said brigantine, having on board the said eighty hogsheads of sugar, did set sail and proceed on the said voyage, and, in the prosecution thereof, did fall in with the said schooner, called the William, and that she was navigated and brought to the said port of New York by the libellants, but under what circumstances of risk or danger this respondent is ignorant. And this respondent submits himself in the premises to the judgment of this honourable court, and humbly prays that the said eighty hogsheads of sugar may be discharged from arrest under the process of this honourable court and may be restored to the possession of this respondent and his said co-partner, for the use of the owners thereof, and that this respondent may be hence dismissed with his reasonable costs and charges in this behalf sustained. Gilbert Robinson. T. L. Ogden, Proctor for Claimants.

Sworn in open court this twenty-seventh day of Dec., 1803. Edward Dunscomb, Clerk.

Decree: The court having taken time to advise as to its decree, and as to the proportion and distribution of salvage in this case, doth now order and decree, that the said cargo of the said brigantine Jefferson, and every part thereof, mentioned in the libel filed in this cause, be and the same is hereby condemned, pursuant to the prayer of the said libel, and that the same be sold by the marshal of the district, at public auction in the city of New York, to the highest bidder, or for the best price that can be got for the same, after giving at least four days' notice thereof in a newspaper, entitled the Daily Advertiser, and one other of the public newspapers printed in the said city; and that the said marshal have the monies arising from the said sale, together with the writ at the next district court of he United States, to be held for the district of New York after such sale, and that he then pay the same to the clerk of this court. And it is further ordered, sentenced, and decreed by the court, that one moiety or equal half part of the net amount of sales of the said cargo (after deducting the duties on the cargo and the costs and charges which have accrued or may accrue in this cause, by reason of the libel, claim and petition filed in this cause) be paid to the libellants in this cause, or to them and the said Nathaniel L. Griswold, George Griswold, Noah Pratt, Jesse Lyon, and Peter Jones, or their proctor, by way of salvage; and that the same be distributed in manner following, that is to say, one equal half part of the said moiety or salvage to be paid to the said Nathaniel L. Griswold and George Griswold, the owners of the schooner William and part of her cargo; and to the said Noah Pratt, the master of the said schooner, and owner of the other part of her cargo, according to their respective interests therein; and that the other half of the said moiety or salvage be divided into two equal parts, the other one-half of which to be divided equally between the said Noah Pratt, the master of the said schooner William, and the said libellant, Andrew Morehouse, who acted as master of the said brig, and navigated her into the port of New York; and the other half to be divided into five equal parts, or shares, one of which to be paid to the said libellant James Ford, one to the said libellant Elihu Carrington, and one to the said libellant Rienhold Willenbrant, who were seamen on board the said brig at the time of her said arrival at the port of New York, but were formerly part of the crew of the said schooner William; and one other of the said shares to be paid to the said Jesse Lyon, a seaman on board the said schooner William, and the other said share to the said Peter Jones, cook, on board the said schooner William, or their proctor. And it is further ordered, sentenced, and decreed by the court, that the other moiety of the nett amount of the said sales be retained by the clerk of this court until the further order of the court respecting the same.

Case No. 9,794.

MORELAND v. MARION COUNTY.

[8 Chi. Leg. News, 25; 1 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 326.]

Circuit Court, D. Oregon. Oct. 4, 1875.

PLEADING UNDER CODE—EJECTMENT—DEFENSE—WHAT ANSWER MAY CONTAIN—SUIT AGAINST COUNTY—DISTRICT ATTORNEY—COUNSEL TO ASSIST.

1. In an action of ejectment the defense may consist of either a denial of the plaintiff's right to recover by controverting any or all of the material allegations of the complaint, or of an averment or plea of such an estate in the premises, or license, or right to the possession thereof, in the defendant, as is inconsistent with a present right of possession in the plaintiff, or both. Civ. Code Or. § 316.

2. The statement of new matter in the answer must be "concise," and it must constitute a "defense" to the action, and like the statement in the complaint of "the facts constituting the cause of action," it must be limited to the ultimate facts of such defense, and should not contain the evidence of them.

3. A defense which states in detail the circumstances by which it is claimed that a dedication of the premises was made to the defendant to certain public uses, is irrelevant as a pleading; it should have alleged a right of possession in the defendant, in pursuance of a dedication, for the purposes and time claimed as prescribed by statute. Civ. Code Or. § 316.

4. Facts stated in a defense do not amount to an estoppel, unless pleaded as such.

5. A plea of estoppel must allege that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from showing some fact or matter stated in the complaint, to which the estoppel is interposed, because of some other fact or matter alleged in the plea, which constitutes the estoppel.

6. A district attorney, by virtue of his office, is the attorney for the several counties in his district, and as such must prosecute or defend all actions to which any of such counties may be a party, without reference to the locality of the court in which they may be pending.

7. The county court may employ counsel to assist the district attorney in the prosecution or defense of a particular action, but the district attorney is entitled to control the proceedings in court, and the county cannot appear by any other attorney.

8. If the pleading of a county is not subscribed by the proper district attorney, it is not duly subscribed, and may be stricken out of the case. Civ. Code Or. §§ 79, 103.

[This was an action by W. W. Moreland against Marion county to recover the possession of certain real estate.]

H. Y. Thomson & W. Lair Hill, for plaintiff.

Reuben P. Boise, for defendant.

DEADY, District Judge. This action is brought by a citizen of the state of California, against the defendant, a county of the state of Oregon, to recover the possession of block 6 in the town of Salem in said county, alleged to be worth $130,000, together with the sum of $500 damages, for withholding the possession of the same. The answer of the defendant first denies the material allegations of the complaint except those concerning the citizenship of the parties and the value of the property. It also contains a second defense styled "a further and separate answer," which the plaintiff moves to strike out as irrelevant and frivolous, as well as the whole answer, because "the same is not subscribed by the defendant or its attorney."

The second defense is divided into 12 articles or paragraphs, and states substantially, that about the year 1844 William H. Willson and Chloe A., his wife, settled upon a tract of public land including the premises, since designated in the United States surveys as donation claim No. 44; that in July, 1853, the said Willson and wife having resided upon and cultivated said claim for four successive years, and otherwise complied with the provisions of the donation act of September 27, 1850 [9 Stat. 496], the surveyor general of Oregon, issued to them donation certificate No. 20, for said claim, designating therein the north half thereof, which includes the premises in controversy, as enuring to the wife, and the south half to the husband; that on February 4, 1862, a patent issued from the United States for said claim, to said Willson and wife; that between the years 1844 and 1850 said Willson, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, laid off the town of Salem upon said claim, and on March 22, 1850, recorded the plat thereof, and that upon said plat said block 6 was designated as a public square and dedicated to the use of the people of said county and town for the purpose of building a court house thereon; that said people, in 1852, with the knowledge and consent of said Willson and wife, took possession of said block and built a court house thereon, and by virtue of said dedication, have used the same for public purposes ever since, and that said Willson contributed largely to the building of the court house; that said Willson and wife, after they acquired title to said claim, sold lots with reference to said plat, and continued to recognize said dedication of the premises until the death of said Willson, in 1856, after which the said Chloe A. sold lots in said town with reference to said plat, and continued to recognize the dedication aforesaid up to the time of her death in 1874, and assented to the said dedication of said block; that, in 1872, the defendant erected a court house upon said block, with the knowledge and consent of said Chloe A., at a cost of $100,000; and that whatever interest the plaintiff has in the premises is derived from said Chloe and was acquired since the erection of said last mentioned court house and with a knowledge of these facts.

In an action of this kind the defense may consist of either a denial of the plaintiff's right to recover, by controverting any or all of the material allegations of the complaint, or of an averment or plea of such an estate in the premises, or license or right to the possession thereof in the defendant, as is inconsistent with a present right of possession in the plaintiff, or both. Civ. Code Or. § 316.

The answer of the defendant substantially admits that the plaintiff is the owner in fee of the premises, but undertakes to set up in bar of the action to recover the possession, a dedication of the same to the use of the defendant, by Chloe Willson, under whom it is alleged the plaintiff claims. This attempt to plead a license or right to the possession in the defendant consists of a detailed narrative of the settlement and occupation of donation claim No. 44, by William H. Willson and Chloe A. Willson, from 1844 to 1874, including their acts and doings with reference to the defendant and said block 6.

The motion to strike out the second defense as irrelevant must be allowed. Much of it is immaterial—even as evidence of a dedication by Chloe A.—while none of it is relevant as an allegation or pleading to the complaint. Lee Bank v. Kitching, 7 Bosw. 668. The statement of new matter in the answer is required to be "concise," and to constitute a "defense" to the action. Like the statement in the complaint of "the facts constituting the cause of action," it must be limited to the ultimate facts of such defense, and should not contain the evidence of them. Wooden v. Strew, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 50. Section 316, supra, provides that in an action to recover the possession of real property: "The defendant shall not be allowed to give in evidence any estate in himself or another in the property, or any license or right to the possession thereof, unless the same be pleaded in his answer. If so pleaded, the nature and duration of such estate or license or right to the possession, shall be set forth with the certainty and particularity required in a complaint." For instance, if the defendant relies upon a right to the possession of this property, arising from a dedication thereof by Chloe A. Willson to itself, for the purpose of building and maintaining thereon, forever, a court house, it should plead that fact as directed by this statute, and not what council may consider the evidence of it. This could be done in a few words, without burdening the record with a story of a dozen folios concerning the circumstances out of which the defendant claims such a right arose, or imposing upon the plaintiff the unnecessary hardship and disadvantage of replying in detail to this statement of these circumstances before any proof is offered in support of them, and thereby in effect convert the answer into a bill of discovery.

On the argument, counsel for the defendant claimed that the facts stated in this defense were also relied upon as a bar to the action by way of estoppel. But they are not pleaded as such. There is no fact stated in the complaint, which the defendant alleges the plaintiff ought not to be permitted to show. A plea of estoppel must allege that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from showing some fact or matter stated in the complaint, to which the estoppel is interposed, because of some other fact or matter alleged in the plea, which constitutes the estoppel. For instance, in an action of ejectment by the vendor of the premises claiming under an after acquired and superior title, the vendee and defendant might plead that the plaintiff ought to be precluded from showing that he was seized of the premises and entitled to the possession thereof, because on some day prior to the commencement of the action he had conveyed the same to the defendant with full covenants of warranty. Section 79 of the Oregon Civil Code provides that "every pleading shall be subscribed by the party or his attorney;" while section 103 declares that any pleading not "duly subscribed" may be stricken out of the case. In support of the motion to strike out the whole answer, upon the ground that it is not duly subscribed, counsel for plaintiff contends that the district attorney for the judicial district, including Marion county, is the attorney for the defendant. That he is appointed such attorney by means of a public election in the district held in pursuance of law, and that the defendant cannot disregard such appointment and appear in this action by another, and, therefore, this answer is not duly subscribed and is liable to be stricken out of the case. Section 945 of the Oregon Civil Code prescribes the duties of the district attorney, as follows: "He shall prosecute for all penalties and forfeitures to the state, which may be incurred in any county in his district, and for which no other mode of prosecution and collection is expressly provided by statute, and in like case, prosecute or defend as the case may be, all actions, suits or proceedings in any county in his district to which the state or such county may be a party."

The answer is subscribed by certain attorneys of this court as "attorneys for defendant." The motion is not made upon affidavit or other proof as to who is the district attorney for the Third district, which includes the defendant. I do not think the court can take judicial knowledge of the fact that any particular person is district attorney for that district, or that neither of the attorneys who have subscribed the answer is not such officer. On the other hand, the subscription to the answer does not profess to be made by a district attorney, as it should, if made by one. The motion asserts that the answer is not subscribed by defendant's attorney, and upon the argument it was substantially admitted that neither of the attorneys subscribing the answer is the district attorney for the district, including the defendant. Assuming then, that the answer is not subscribed by the attorney for the Third district, is it subscribed by the attorney of the defendant as required by statute?

Until the contrary appears, the court will presume that when one of its attorneys subscribes a pleading as the attorney of a party, to a proceeding before it, that he is authorized to do so. But in the case of a public corporation, like the defendant, which has a regular official attorney, appointed by law, there is no room for the presumption that any other attorney has authority to represent it. The voters of the various counties in the Third district have, by the election of the district attorney, constituted him the attorney of such counties, with authority "to prosecute or defend, as the case may be, all actions, suits or proceedings" to which any of them may be a party, during his continuance in office. Admitting even, what is very doubtful, that a county may authorize an attorney, other than the proper district attorney, to represent it in court, there is certainly no presumption that it has done so—the fact must be made to appear. Regularly this should be done by an order of the county court, and a copy of the same, under its seal, filed with the appearance of the attorney. The presumption is, that the defendant has an official attorney in the person of the attorney for the Third judicial district upon whom the law casts the authority and duty of defending this action. The court is therefore not at liberty to presume that the gentlemen whose names appear signed to the answer of the defendant were authorized to do so.

It is not doubted but that the county court may, with the assent of the district attorney, and it may be without his assent, employ counsel to assist him in the prosecution or defense of a proceeding to which it is a party; but even then the district attorney would be the attorney of the county and entitled to control the proceedings and required to authenticate the pleadings by his subscription. It may, also, as representing the county, control and direct the conduct of a cause to which the latter is a party the same as a natural person might do (Civ. Code Or. § 871); but unless there is a vacancy in the office of district attorney, it must appear in court by him. He may be assisted, but he cannot be ignored.

It has been suggested that this action is not within the purview of section 945, supra, because it is not prosecuted or defended "in any county" in the Third district. But it is quite certain from the language of the whole section that it was the intention of the legislature to make the district attorney the law officer of the county, and require him to appear for the county in any action to which it might be a party, without reference to the locality of the court in which it may be pending. It is true, this action is not prosecuted in the county of Marion, because this court does not happen to sit there, but the cause of action arose therein, and the county is a party to it, and this brings it within the statute which requires it to be defended by the district attorney of the Third district.

The motion to strike out is allowed on both grounds.

Circuit Court, S. D. Mississippi. Nov. Term, 1873.

INSURANCE—LIFE—NOTICE OF PREMIUM FALLING DUE—PROMISE OF AGENT—TENDER TO AGENT—RECEIPT.

1. A life insurance company is under no obligation to give notice to the assured when the annual premium is about falling due, of that fact, unless it has agreed to do so, even though it had been the practice of the company to give such notice.

2. The promise of the local agent of a life insurance company, that he would give the assured such notice, was only a personal contract of the agent, and not binding on the company, unless the agent was authorized by the company to make such promise.

3. Where the assured has been in the habit of paying the annual premium to the local agent of the company, and such payments have been accepted by the company without objection, although the policy provided for payment at the principal office of the company, a tender to such agent of the annual premium, on the day it falls due, is sufficient to prevent a forfeiture of the policy for nonpayment of the premium.

4. The failure of the insurance company to place the receipt for the premium in the hands of the local agent does not excuse payment or tender of payment on the day the premium falls due.

Action at law [by Sarah L. Morey against the New York Life Insurance Company]. Submitted to the court on the issues of fact, as well as of law.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

John Handy, for plaintiff.
T. J. Wharton, for defendant.

HILL, District Judge. This action at law was brought in the circuit court of Madison county, and removed into this court, to recover the amount of a policy of insurance, issued by the defendant on the first day of April, 1871, for the sum of five thousand dollars, payable to plaintiff upon the death of her late husband, John B. Morey, upon the payment of $197.90, then made, and the same amount to be paid thereafter on the first day of April, of each year during the continuance of said policy, with the usual condition annexed, that if said premium should not be paid on or before the first day of April of each year, the policy should become void, and all payments theretofore made become forfeited to defendant. The plea is that the policy became void under this stipulation by reason of the nonpayment of the premium due on the first day of April, 1873, to which the plaintiff replies: First, that when said John B. Morey made application for said policy, it was to one Morey, a local agent of defendant, doing business for defendant in the city of Canton; that at the time, he stated to said agent that he feared he would forget the time when the premiums would become payable, and fail to make them in proper time, and thereby the policy would become forfeited; that the said agent stated, as an inducement to said John B. to take said policy, that the company was in the habit of giving thirty days previous notice of the time, and that he would give the notice and save the forfeiture; and, secondly, that it was understood that payment would be made to the local agent in Canton; that at the time the premium fell due, the agent at Canton had not been furnished with the printed premium receipts, without which he was not authorized to receive payment; that the failure to give the notice and to furnish the receipt was a waiver of the right to a forfeiture of the policy. A jury being waived, the questions of both law and fact are submitted to the court.

The only facts shown by the proof, and necessary to be stated for the application of the rules of law, are as follows: Morey, the agent of defendant, did make the statements to John B. Morey at the time the application for the policy was made as stated in the pleadings; the advance premium was paid on the delivery of the policy; no notice of the time the premium fell due was given; John B. Morey died the 3d day of April, two days after the premium fell due, without having paid or tendered the same to any one. On the 5th, payment of the premium was tendered to the agent at Canton, and refused, for the reason that John B. Morey had died on the 3d. The premium receipt was not forwarded to the general agents at Vicksburg until the 4th, and not forwarded to the local agent until the next day. The question upon the pleadings and proof is, did the want of notice of the time of payment, and the absence of the receipt in the hands of the local agent, excuse the payment of the premium upon the day it became due, and thereby avoid the forfeiture stipulated in the contract? The policy, and the conditions annexed to it, constituted the contract, and must be held binding on both parties to it, unless its conditions have been waived by some act or omission of the party against whom it is sought to be enforced, or by the authorized agent of such party. The proof fails to show that the agent Morey had any authority to engage that notice should be given; indeed none such is claimed; but it is claimed that, being the agent, it was a fraud in him to make such a promise, as it misled the assured, and induced him to take the policy which he would not otherwise have done; but it is apparent from the proof that he did not make the promise as agent, or pretend to bind the defendant, but only made it as a friend and relative of John B. Morey; it was a mere personal promise, for the fulfillment of which he could only look to him who made it. Morey, the agent for this purpose, was more the agent of the assured than of the insurer; so that, upon the facts, this want of notice cannot avail the plaintiff.

The remaining question is, did the failure to place in the hands of the agent at Canton the premium receipt, on or before the time of payment, waive and excuse payment on that day? The conditions of the policy require payment at defendant's office, in the city of New York, unless a different place is stipulated for in writing between the parties, or to an agent having for delivery a printed receipt, signed by the president of the company or other officer mentioned. The advance payment was made to the local agent in Canton upon the delivery of the policy. The fact that the premium receipt for the second payment was forwarded to the local agent in Canton shows that that was the place where payment was expected to be made, and where it doubtless would have been made but for the death of said Morey. Such evidently being the understanding between the parties, I am satisfied that had the tender of the amount due been made to the local agent at Canton on the day and within the time stipulated, the forfeiture claimed could not have been maintained; but, unfortunately for the plaintiff, this was not done. I cannot accept the position as correct, that nothing can avoid the forfeiture but an agreement of waiver of payment made by the principal officers of the company in New York, or by actual payment or tender of payment there, or to a local or other agent having the premium receipt, signed as provided for. Where, by an express agreement or by the course of business between the parties, it is understood that payment will be made to the local agent, and no notice has been given in sufficient time that payment must be made at the office and principal place of business stipulated in the contract, a tender of payment to the local agent, whether received by him or not, will excuse the policy holder and prevent the forfeiture. To hold otherwise would open the door to the grossest frauds upon the part of these foreign insurance companies. It is said, and is in proof, that these receipts are furnished to the local agents through the general agency for the state; and if the agent's accounts at the principal office are not satisfactory, the receipts are withheld. The answer to this is, that it is a thing about which the policy holder is not presumed to know anything; it surely cannot be held that he is responsible, or to be affected by dereliction in duty of the company's agent, over whom he has no sort of control. John B. Morey is not presumed to have known of the absence of the receipt, and its absence could have had no influence upon his unfortunate neglect; and however much it is to be regretted that the widow and orphan will be deprived of the maintenance and support a kind husband and father intended for them, the rules of law must be applied to the facts, which being done, necessarily results in favor of the defendant. If the company, when its coffers have been in part filled with the hard earnings of the policy holders, could withhold the receipt from him who had been depriving himself and family of the comforts if not the necessaries of life for years, to provide, as he supposed, something for his helpless family when he should have been laid in the grave; and when he comes, perhaps on the last moment in which payment can be made, he is for the first time informed that he must pay in New York, or all he has paid will be forfeited—a thing which it is impossible for him to do—would be gross injustice. Judgment for defendant.

District Court, S. D. New York. July 5, 1867.

PRACTICE IN BANKRUPTCY—AMENDMENT—POWER OF REGISTER.

1. Where a petitioner in bankruptcy applied to the register for leave to amend the schedules attached to his petition, which the register refused, and certified to the court the questions: (1) whether registers had power to allow amendments; and (2) whether, if they had such power, the amendments should be made before the register, and certified copies filed with the clerk, or vice versa. Held, that under section 4 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 519)], and rules 5 and 7 of the general orders in bankruptcy adopted by the supreme court, the court has the power to allow such amendments, and, that for the purpose of allowing such amendments, where they are uncontested, the register is the court, and has power to allow them on a direct application to him.

[Cited in Re Blaisdell, Case No. 1,488; Re Heller, Id. 6,339.]

2. The co-ordinate power of allowing them rests with the judge; the original amendments permitted to be made should be filed with the clerk; in making them, general orders No. 14 and No. 33 should be observed; and when they are filed, the registers will act on them under general order No. 7 and rule No. 4 of this court in bankruptcy.

In this case the petitioner [Charles A. Morford] applied to the register for leave to amend the schedules to his petition, and the register denied the application, upon the ground and for the reason that the power of ordering amendments to the schedules rested entirely with the court, and that only the judge could allow such amendments. The register certified such question to the court, and stated the points on which the opinion of the court was desired to be these: (1.) Whether registers, to whom causes in bankruptcy are referred by order of the court, may allow amendments to be made to schedules filed with them. (2.) If the registers can allow such amendments, whether such amendments can be made directly before the registers, and certified copies thereof be filed with the clerk; or whether the original amendments permitted to be made should be filed with the clerk, and the registers thereafter receive copies from the clerk, as in the case of the original petition and schedules.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. By section four of the bankrupt act it is provided, that every register duly appointed and qualified shall have power, and it shall be his duty, to sit in chambers and despatch there such part of the administrative business of the court, and such uncontested matters, as shall be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct. By rule 5 of the general orders in bankruptcy, framed by the justices of the supreme court of the United States in pursuance of the tenth section of the bankrupt act, it is provided that the registers may conduct proceedings in relation to the following matters, when uncontested, namely (among others), ordering amendments of any proceedings. Among the amendments so referred to is unquestionably the amendment of a voluntary bankrupt's schedule of creditors and property, for, by section twenty-six of the act it is provided, that a bankrupt shall be at liberty, from time to time, upon oath, to amend and correct his schedule of creditors and property, so that the same shall conform to the facts; and, by rule 7 of the general orders in bankruptcy, before referred to, it is provided, that the court may allow amendments to be made in the bankrupt's petition and schedules, upon the application or the petitioner, upon proper cause shown, at any time prior to the discharge of the bankrupt.

These provisions apply as well to a case where the petitioner has not yet been adjudged a bankrupt, as to a case where he has. For the purpose of allowing such amendments, when they are uncontested, the register is the court, and has power to allow them on a direct application to him. Of course the co-ordinate power of allowing them in like cases also exists in the judge.

The original amendments permitted to be made should be filed with the clerk, and, in making them, rules 14 and 33 of the general orders in bankruptcy, before referred to, should be observed. When they are so filed, the register will act on them, in conformity with rule 7 of said general orders in bankruptcy and rule 4 of the rules of this court in bankruptcy.

BANKRUPTCY—PROOF OF DEBT—CORPORATION—DISSOLUTION.

M. was elected president of a corporation, incorporated under the act of the state of New York authorizing the formation of corporations for mechanical and other purposes. At that time he was a stockholder, but he afterwards ceased to be one. The capital stock was not all paid in within two years from its incorporation, as required by that act, but no proceedings were taken for the dissolution of the corporation. Thereafter M. went into bankruptcy, and, in the bankruptcy proceedings, a proof of debt was presented on behalf of the corporation, which proof was made by M., as president of the corporation, and was for moneys belonging to the corporation, which he had received as president: Held, that the corporation had the right to collect claims due to it; that the register had no power, on the re-examination of its claim to determine its right to continued corporate existence; and that M. was to be taken to be president of the corporation, for the purpose of the proof of the debt.

The register in this case certified to the court the following case:

The North River Petroleum Company is a corporation organized under the act of the legislature of the state of New York, authorizing the formation of corporations for manufacturing and other purposes, passed February 17th, 1848. The corporation was organized in 1865, and in that year Henry N. Morgan (the present bankrupt), a stockholder and trustee of said company, was elected president. Since such election no other election has been held. The petition for adjudication of bankruptcy was filed herein December 19th, 1874. The proof of debt under objection was made by said Morgan as president of said company, and is for the sum of $2,718.71, being for moneys received by him, belonging to said company, in his capacity as president, and in which sum he remained indebted to said company at the time of his bankruptcy.

Mr. Hutchins, for petitioning creditor, opposing said claim, having offered to prove that the company failed to pay in all the capital stock within two years from its incorporation, and to file a certificate thereof in the county clerk's office, required by sections 10 and 11 of the act of incorporation, passed in 1848, claimant's counsel objected to such proof as immaterial, and the register sustained the objection, to which the petitioner's counsel excepted.

And Mr. Hutchins, for petitioning creditor, opposing said claim, objected to the proof of debt: (1) Because, if such capital was not paid in, as required by statute, such corporation claimant was ipso facto dissolved; and (2) because Henry N. Morgan, who made the proof of debt, ceased to be a stockholder in said company, and, not being a stockholder, could not, according to the third and fifth sections of said act, be trustee or president, and, therefore, had no capacity to make said proof. He therefore asked the register to expunge the said proof of debt.

The register's opinion was as follows:

1. No proceedings have been had to dissolve the corporation, and, until proceedings and judgment for dissolution, its creditors may enforce their rights against it and it may collect its claims. The re-examination of a claim, on petition, before a register, under the 34th general order, is summary, and brings to view the subject matter of the claim. To hear and determine incidentally the right of a corporation claimant to continued corporate existence denied by the objector, upon account of failure to perform some act required by statute, is not within the province of the register

2. For the purpose for which Henry N. Morgan now appears in this proof of claim, he is to be taken as the president of the corporation. He was duly elected while a stockholder, and the mere fact of his ceasing to be such did not vacate his office, so as to make this proof of claim a nullity.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I concur in the views of the register.

for the bankrupt, as counsel for a creditor whose claim is under re-examination.

[This case was formerly heard upon the proof of debt of a corporation of which the bankrupt had been president. Case No. 9,797.]

The register in this case certified to the court that, on the re-examination of the claim of Yale & Co., alleged creditors of the bankrupt, Mr. Pelton, who had appeared in all the proceedings as counsel for the bankrupt [Henry N. Morgan], and was still acting as such, appeared as counsel for Yale & Co.; and that the creditor who had required the re-examination of such claim objected to such appearance for Yale & Co., by reason that such counsel occupied the antagonistic position of counsel for the bankrupt. And the register certified to the court this question: "Does any legal objection exist to Mr. Pelton's acting as counsel for the claimants, Yale & Co., on the ground that he is the counsel for the bankrupt?" with his opinion thereon, as follows: "The objection is one that it might be very material for the claimants to consider; but it is not perceived how the fact stated as the foundation of it can work injury to the objector, nor that the choice made by the claimants, is to be forbidden by the court."

EJECTMENT—ALTERATION IN PATENT—PROOF OF DEEDS AND WILLS—PROBATE COURT CERTIFICATE—ASSIGNMENT OF PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

[1. [Cited in Re Heller, Case No. 6,339.]

[2. The certificate of a probate judge to the copy of a will is not invalid for want of a seal, where that court, though formerly held to be a court of record, is now no longer such, which fact is certified by the judge with the statement that the court has no seal.]

[3. A certificate to the proof of the execution of a deed which fails to state that the subscribing witness was personally known to the officer taking the acknowledgment, as required by the Illinois statute (Rev. St. 1845, p. 107, § 20), is fatally defective.]

[5. Butterfield, Goodrich & Merriman, for plaintiff.

Powell & Peters, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an action of ejectment, to recover possession of twenty-three acres of ground. By a statute of Illinois, the fictitious forms and names of the action of ejectment are abolished. A patent for the land to John L. Bogardus, dated the 5th of January, 1838, was offered in evidence, which was objected to, on the ground that the name of the patentee appears to have been altered by scratching out a dot over the letter i, which made the name Bogardus, instead of Bogardies, as it now appears. The court overruled the objection, observing that it did not appear that the alteration was material, or that it had been made since the patent came into the possession of the patentee. It was proved that Bogardus, the patentee, died the 2d of June, 1838; and a copy of his will, and the probate thereon, was offered in evidence. This was objected to because the copy was not certified under the seal of the probate court. That court, formerly, was held to be a court of record, and had a seal. Now, it is not a court of record, and has no seal. This statement was made in the certificate of the judge of probate.

The act of 1845 requires the judge of probate to have a seal; and parol proof was offered to show there was a seal. The law makes a certificate without seal, valid where there is no seal. The court overruled the parol testimony offered, and admitted the certified copy of the will, etc. A deed was then offered in evidence, made by the executrix to Cole, dated 25th September, 1845, for the land in controversy. And also a deed from Cole to Frink for one-third of the fraction; and afterward a deed from the same to the same, for one-sixth of the fraction, dated 22d of May, 1846. Deed from Frink to Morgan, the plaintiff, 19th December, 1846, for one-half of the thirty-three and one-third acres. It is objected that the deed was made to Morgan, a citizen of another state, merely to give jurisdiction to this court. The money with which Frink purchased the land, he borrowed, which, it appears, was afterward paid by Morgan, at or before the time the deed was made to him. This should have been pleaded to the jurisdiction of the court, but it is not made to appear that there was any intention to commit a fraud on the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection is overruled. To show an outstanding title, the defendants offered in evidence a deed from John L. Bogardus to Bigelow and McClure, for the thirty-three acres and ninety-three hundredths, dated the 5th August, 1834. This deed was proved before the clerk of the court, by proof of the hand writing of the subscribing witness, and of the grantor.

The act of Illinois (Rev. St. 1845, p. 107, § 20) requires the officer who takes the acknowledgment of the grantor, or proof of the execution of the deed by a subscribing witness, to state that the grantor or witness is personally known to him. The certificate to the proof of this deed does not contain a statement that the witness who proved the deed was personally known to him, and this defect is fatal to the proof of the deed. Parol evidence was then called by which the signature of the grantor was proposed to be proved, proof having been given that the subscribing witness had left the country, and had not been seen or heard from for fourteen years. To this evidence, the plaintiff objected until proof of the hand writing of the witness was made.

The court said the order of proof was a matter resting in the discretion of the court. That proof of the hand writing of the party was esteemed more satisfactory than that of the witness. Valentine v. Piper, 22 Pick. 90. In Jackson v. Waldron, 13 Wend. 178, 183, 196, 197, proof of the hand writing of the obligor was held not regularly to be offered, unless the party was unable to prove the hand writing of the witnesses. And such is the decision of a majority of the cases on this point. But judges seem to have so decided because it had previously been so decided, without any inquiry as to the reason of the decision. Under this view, however, the proof is admissible, as the witness has left the country, and it does not appear that his hand writing can be proved. The evidence is admitted.

The act of Illinois, 3d March, 1845 [Rev. St. Ill. 1845, p. 102], provides, where a deed purports to convey a fee simple estate when the grantor has only an equity, he shall, on acquiring the legal estate, be considered as holding it in trust for the grantee. It appears that on the 4th of August, 1832, Bogardus applied for the pre-emption of this land to the register of the land office, for the land in question, which was granted. And that on the 15th November, 1837, he entered the land and purchased it. The conveyance to Bigelow and McClure was as follows: "I do hereby bargain, grant, sell and convey unto the said Bigelow and McClure, their heirs and assigns forever, two undivided third parts of all my right, title and interest in and unto the land, etc., and I do hereby covenant with the said Bigelow and McClure, that if at any time hereafter, I shall acquire an additional title to the said lot of land, the same shall enure to them in proportion to the interest hereby conveyed to them." On the 5th of August, 1834, Bogardus conveyed his right and interest in the whole of the land, to Isaac Underhill. These titles having been given by Bogardus before the emanation of the patent, under his claim of a pre-emption are objected to by the plaintiff as void under the law. The 3d section of the act to grant pre-emptions, of the 29th of May, 1830, provides, "that all assignments and transfers of the right of pre-emption given by this act prior to the issuance of patents, shall be null and void." This act was continued in force by the act of the 14th of July, 1832, on the same subject.

It is argued that the above act of the 29th of May, 1830, only declared the pre-emption right should not be assigned so as to obtain a right of purchase. We suppose after emanation of the patent, we can not go behind it, and examine into the assignments. And the court instructed the jury, that the deeds given in evidence to show an outstanding title, and thereby defeat a recovery by the plaintiff, did constitute an outstanding title.

Verdict for the defendant. Judgment, etc.

[NOTE. The case was taken, by the plaintiff, to the supreme court, on a writ of error. Upon examination, the transcript of the record was found to be imperfect, and, continuing the case, a certiorari was issued to this court to supply the omission, and furnish a full and correct record at the opening of the next term of the court. 19 How. STATES—ACTION TO RESTRAIN OFFICERS FROM ISSUING BONDS—COMMON INJURY—ADMINISTRATION OF GOVERNMENT.

1. A tax payer, who is liable to be assessed for the public taxes that will be necessary to pay the state debt and interest thereon, cannot maintain a private suit against the state officers to prevent them from executing and issuing bonds which the legislature has unconstitutionally authorized and required to be issued.

2. It is a general rule that an individual cannot maintain a private suit for an injury which he sustains in common with every other citizen.

3. The proper administration of the government in its several departments cannot be enforced by private actions brought by any tax payer or voter interested in the good government of the country.

Bill in equity heard on motion for injunction.

Miles Taylor, for complainant.
John A. Campbell, for defendant.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. In this case a citizen of New York, who is a tax payer of Louisiana, files his bill to restrain the governor of the state and other state officers from executing and issuing certain state bonds which the legislature has, by a special act, authorized and required them to issue. The grounds for the injunction are: 1. That the amendment of the state constitution, recently adopted, provides that prior to the 1st of January, 1890, the debt of the state shall not be so increased as to exceed twenty-five millions of dollars; and the state debt already exceeds that sum. 2. That the objects for which the bonds are to be issued are not such as the legislature has any constitutional authority to aid. The bonds are a donation to the New Orleans, Mobile and Chattanooga Railroad Company; and the legislature has no power to make such donations.

The bill assumes that a tax payer, who is liable to be assessed for the public taxes that will be necessary to pay the state debt and interest thereon, can maintain a private suit to prevent the state officers from executing and issuing bonds which the legislature has unconstitutionally authorized and required to be issued. I do not think that such a suit can be maintained. It is a general rule that a man cannot maintain a private suit for an injury which he sustains in common with every other citizen. To allow such actions would promote endless litigation. Every dissatisfied person in the community would institute an action for his supposed grievance. Public officers would be subjected to intolerable prosecution. They would be so harassed thereby, that no competent person would be willing to enter upon any office of general importance. It is not in this way that the public officers are to be called in question for a dereliction of their official duties. The proper administration of the government in its several departments cannot be enforced by private actions brought by any tax payer or any voter interested in the good government of the country. Without attempting to decide what remedy other than the force of public opinion, and liability to impeachment, may exist for the wrong which the complainant supposes is about to be committed; whether the bonds that may be issued will be void in the hands of the holders thereof; or whether the donee company may not hereafter be compelled to disgorge the money it may receive therefrom; it is sufficient to say in deciding this case that the complainant does not show any title to the relief which he seeks. The injunction must be denied, and the bill dismissed with costs.

NOTE. The proposition, that a particular individual cannot sue for a grievance which affects the entire public as well as himself, is sustained by the following cases: Doolittle v. Supervisors of Broome, 18 N. Y. 155; Roosevelt v. Draper, 23 N. Y. 318; Hale v. Cushman, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 425. But consult People v. Supervisors of Westchester Co., 57 Barb. 377; Hanlon v. NEGLIGENCE — DANGEROUS EXCAVATION — INJURY TO CHILD—BURDEN OF PROOF—DAMAGES.

1. The railway tunnel connecting the union depot in St. Louis with the Illinois and St. Louis bridge was, at a point where it was uncovered, and within the line of a public street, left unguarded, exposing a perpendicular wall fourteen feet in depth below the surface of the street. The petitioner, a boy four years of age, strayed away from his home, about two blocks distant, under circumstances not disclosed by the testimony, fell into this excavation, and sustained a fracture of the thigh bone. It appeared (1) that his parents were poor and unable to employ a servant to look after him; (2) that he sustained no other injury except physical pain and suffering; (3) that the tunnel was in custody of receivers of this court: Held, (1) that the unguarded excavation was a nuisance, the continuing of which rendered the receivers liable to pay out of the fund in their charge damages for any injury of which it was the proximate cause; (2) that the petitioner was in law incapable of negligence, and that the burden of showing contributory negligence on the part of the parents, such as, imputed to the petitioner, would bar a recovery, rested with the respondents.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

2. The mere fact that a child four years of age strayed a distance of more than two blocks from home, at play with other children, is not of itself evidence of contributory negligence on the part of its parents.

[Cited in Mayhew v. Burns, 103 Ind. 341, 2 N. E. 801.]

3. Damages may be given in such a case where there is no other substantial element than physical suffering.

This action was brought in the form of an intervening petition in a suit in equity which had been brought to foreclose a mortgage. This peculiar form of suit was necessitated by the fact that the property, the negligent construction of which produced the injury complained of, was in the hands of receivers appointed by this court. By consent of counsel, the petition was referred to Seymour D. Thompson, Esq., one of the masters in chancery of the court, who reported as follows:

"From the testimony I find the following facts: That on the 1st day of November, A. D. 1876, the receivers of this court, John P. Morgan and Solon Humphreys, were operating the structure known as the St. Louis tunnel, connecting the Illinois and St. Louis bridge with the union depot, in the city of St. Louis. That the said tunnel, as originally constructed, debouches from beneath the ground in the middle of Eighth street, in St. Louis, at the crossing of Clark avenue, and runs southwardly in the centre of Eighth street to Spruce street, which crosses it by means of a bridge; from which point said tunnel continues south a short distance, and then gradually deflects to the west, so that the western side of it crosses the western line of Eighth street at a point one hundred and forty-seven feet south of the Spruce street bridge. The uncovered portion of said tunnel thus runs within the limits of Eighth street for a distance of two blocks. The wall of said tunnel is surrounded by a flat coping of stone, about on a level with Eighth street, along which is built an iron railing, designed to protect men and animals traveling along the street from falling into it. At a point about three feet north from where the western wall of the tunnel intersects the line of Eighth street in deflecting to the west, as already stated, this railing, at the time of the accident in controversy, stopped. At the point thus left unguarded within the line of Eighth street, the distance to the bottom of the tunnel was about fourteen feet. Beyond the point where the western wall of the tunnel crosses the western line of Eighth street, the coping descends in the form of a stairway, at an angle of forty-five degrees. A rough sketch returned into court, marked 'Exhibit A to Testimony,' gives a fair idea of the geography of the tunnel, as thus described. The road which runs along the western side of the open tunnel in Eighth street is by this curve in the tunnel deflected to the west over private ground, and is a constantly traveled thoroughfare.

"On the date already mentioned, November 1st, 1876, the intervening petitioner, John Hagan, was between three and four years of age. He lived with his parents upon Clark avenue, near Ninth street—a little more than two blocks distant from the point where the western wall of the tunnel crosses the western line of Eighth street, as already indicated. His parents were poor. His mother was obliged to do her own house-work, and they were unable to employ a nurse or servant to take care of him. He strayed from home, and, while at play with other children upon the unguarded coping of the tunnel, at the point already indicated, just within the line of Eighth street, fell into the tunnel and received a simple fracture of the thigh bone. This fracture is well healed; the leg is not shortened, or the limb deformed, except by a slight callus, which will gradually be absorbed. I find from the evidence that the petitioner received no other injuries from this fall than physical pain and suffering.

"Upon this state of facts three questions would seem to arise:

"1. Were the receivers guilty of negligence in permitting a portion of the wall of the tunnel to remain unguarded at a point within the line of a public street constantly traveled, where the wall was perpendicular, where the excavation was fourteen feet deep, and through which trains were constantly passing? On this point I entertain no doubt. It seems to me clear that the tunnel company, leaving a portion of so dangerous an excavation unguarded at such a point, were the authors of a public nuisance, and that the receivers were continuers of it.

"2. Was there contributory negligence imputable to the plaintiff, such as should bar a recovery of damages? Children at the tender age of the plaintiff at the time of the injury complained of are in law incapable of negligence (O'Flaherty v. Union Ry. Co., 45 Mo. 70; Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615; Mangam v. Brooklyn R. Co., 38 N. Y. 455; North Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Mahoney, 57 Pa. St. 187); but the weight of authority is that the negligence of the parent, guardian, or other person lawfully in custody of a child which is injured, will be imputed to the child, so as to bar a recovery of damages (Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615; Waite v. Northeastern Ry. Co., 28 Law J. (Q. B.) 258; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stratton, 78 Ill. 88; Pittsburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Vining, 27 Ind. 513; Lafayette, etc., R. Co. v. Huffman, 28 Ind. 287; Karr v. Park, 40 Cal. 188; Fallon v. Central Park, etc., Ry. Co., 64 N. Y. 13; Mangam v. Brooklyn R. Co., 38 N. Y. 455; Callahan v. Bean, 9 Allen, 401; Wright v. Malden & M. R. Co., 4 Allen, 283; Munn v. Reed, Id. 431; Louisville & P. Canal Co. v. Murphy, 9 Bush. 522; Downs v. New York Cent. R. Co., 47 N. Y. 83; Drew v. Sixth Ave. R. Co., 26 N. Y. 49). Yet some courts deny this, and upon grounds which seem entitled to much consideration. Daley v. Norwich & W. R. Co., 26 Conn. 591; Government St. Ry. Co. v. Hanlon, 53 Ala. 70; Norfolk & P. R. Co. v. Ormsby, 27 Grat. 455; Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Long, 75 Pa. St. 257. Whatever may be the correct rule on this subject, it is clear upon authority that parents situated as the parents of the plaintiff were—poor, the father absent at his daily labor, the mother obliged to do her own house-work, unable to employ a nurse or servant to attend the child when upon the street—will not be deemed guilty of such negligence as will prevent a recovery of damages if the child is injured through the negligence of the defendant while straying upon the street unattended.

"3. In such a case, will damages be given on account of physical suffering where there has been no direct pecuniary loss? Upon this point I have some difficulty; but the tendency of the courts seems to be to sustain verdicts where the plaintiffs received no substantial injury except physical pain and mental suffering, unless the verdicts are so excessive as to create a presumption that the jury acted from passion or from prejudice—Sedg. Dam. (6th Ed.) 699, note 2; Trimble v. Spiller, 7 T. B. Mon. 394; Huckle v. Money, 2 Wils. 205; Beardmore v. Carrington, Id. 244; and whether such damages are called 'exemplary damages,' or 'smart money,' or 'compensation for injured feelings,' seems to be more nearly a debate about terms and definitions than about any substantial differences which are capable of being traced and maintained in the administration of justice (Hendrickson v. Kingsbury, 21 Iowa, 378; Detroit Daily Post Co. v. McArthur, 16 Mich. 447; Fay v. Parker, 53 N. H. 342, 381; McKinley v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 44 Iowa, 321). All the American courts seem agreed that physical suffering may be considered by the jury in estimating damages, even where the negligence was not gross or the injury so wilful as to warrant the giving of what are termed exemplary damages. Sedg. Dam. (6th Ed.) 699, note 2; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stables, 62 Ill. 313; City of Chicago v. Langless, 66 Ill. 361."

The report concluded by recommending a decree that the receivers pay the petitioner out of the funds in their hands $500 and costs. Exceptions were filed to the foregoing report by the receivers, and on those exceptions the cause was submitted to the court.

Glover & Shepley, for receivers.

A. R. Taylor, for petitioner.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The only exception to the master's report relied on by the counsel for the receivers, is that the master erred in not finding that the parents of John Hagan were negligent, and that such negligence defeats the right of the infant to recover the amount of the damages sustained by the negligence of the receivers. In the excellent report of the master, the principal cases upon the effect of the negligence of parents in defeating the right of action for a negligent injury to their child are collected. They cannot be entirely reconciled, although, when the facts of the particular cases are considered, the discrepancy is not as great as at first it would appear to be.

Upon the facts in this case, we entertain no doubt that the petitioner is entitled to compensation for the injury he sustained. The deep, unguarded excavation in the street was not only a public nuisance, but a dangerous one. The receivers ought not to have permitted it to continue. The natural instincts and habits of children lead them to play; and it is scarcely possible, and certainly not practicable, to keep them entirely off the streets, or under constant supervision. The injury here was not caused by any person or agency in the lawful use of the street. What right has the tunnel company to leave a dangerous pitfall in the public way, and then to insist that all the children in the neighborhood shall be imprisoned or kept off the street? If the petitioner's parents had lived immediately upon or very near this excavation, and, knowing the danger of permitting their child to go at large, had actually permitted it to go to the place of danger, or suffered this to be done through actual negligence, the case might present more difficult questions than now arise. The master does not find that the child was knowingly, or even negligently, permitted to go to, or remain in, the vicinity of the excavation. His parents lived over two blocks distant, and the finding is that he "strayed away from home," and was injured while at play with other children. It is not shown that the child was in the habit of going there; and as the receivers' negligence is positive and actual, and was the direct cause of the injury, and as the onus to establish the defence of contributory negligence is on the receivers (Railroad Co. v. Gladman, 15 Wall. [82 U. S.] 401), and they have failed to show such negligence, they are liable. It is not necessary, in this view, to go into the learning upon the subject of imputable negligence of parents to children, for in this case it is not shown that the parents were at fault in the child being at the place of the accident at the time when the accident happened. Some of the cases seem to make the liability depend upon the means of the parents, and to countenance a distinction as to contributory negligence between parents able to employ nurses or attendants and those who are not. This distinction may be doubted, for there is not, in this country, one rule of law for the rich, and a different rule for the poor. It extends its protecting shield over all alike. The common law is justly distinguished for its solicitude for the public safety, and any person or corporation that illegally imperils the lives, limbs, or health of the people is liable. The tunnel company has no more right, by having a dangerous excavation in the public ways, unnecessarily to impose upon the rich the duty to employ an attendant for their children than to impose upon the poor the impracticable duty of never allowing their children to escape from sight, lest they may be injured by its wrongful and illegal act. 5 South. Law Rev. 684. The exceptions are overruled, and an order will be entered in conformity with the report of the master. Ordered accordingly.

NOTE. " 'People in the situation of life of those who had custody of the child,' said Wagner, J., in a recent case, 'cannot always attend to it strictly; and if it escapes from them unawares, it must not be injured simply because it so escapes.' Isabel v. Hannibal, etc., Ry. Co., 60 Mo. 483. In another case the same learned and humane judge, discussing this question, said: 'To say that it is negligence to permit a child to go out to play unless it is accompanied by a grown attendant, would be to hold that free air and exercise should only be enjoyed by the wealthy, who are able to employ such attendants, and would amount to a denial of these blessings to the poor.' O'Flaherty v. Union Ry. Co., 45 Mo. 74. In a case very similar to this, another very learned and capable judge used the following language: 'The doctrine which imputes the negligence of the parents to the child in such a case as this is repulsive to our natural instincts, and repugnant to the condition of that class of persons who have to maintain life by daily toil. It is not the case where the positive act of a parent or guardian has placed a child in a position of danger, necessarily requiring the care of the adult to be constantly exercised, as where a parent takes a child into the cars, and, by his neglect, suffers it to be injured by straying off upon the platform. But here a mother, toiling for her daily bread, and having done the best she could, in the midst of her necessary employment, loses sight of the child for an instant, and it strays upon the track. With no means to provide a servant for the child, why should the necessities of her position in life attach to the child, and cover it with blame? When injured by positive negligence, why should it be without redress? A negligent wrong is done; it is incapable of contributing to it; then why should the wrong not be compensated?' Agnew, J., in Kay v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 65 Pa. St. 276. The same views are reasserted in Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Long, 75 Pa. St. 257.

"In Littlefield v. Atlantic & Pac. Ry. Co., (intervention of McAuley), the learned district judge, sitting in this court, awarded an old man $500 as damages on account of having been wrongfully expelled from a passenger train of the receivers by its conductor, and compelled to walk three miles, crossing a high and dangerous bridge, to get to his home. This was a case for exemplary damages. On the other hand, in West v. Forrest, 22 Mo. 344, the defendant, in beating a female slave, accidentally inflicted some blows upon her mistress, the plaintiff. There does not appear to have been any attempt to prove that the plaintiff had suffered any direct pecuniary loss. The court sustained a verdict for $400, saying: 'The plaintiff's case was fully made out before the jury, and by their verdict of $400 they exhibited their sense of such a wrong, and properly vindicated the injuries and wounded feelings of the plaintiff.' In Cracker v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 36 Wis. 657, a railway conductor kissed a female passenger. Here was certainly no direct pecuniary loss; but the company was compelled to pay $1,000 for it. The damages were expressly placed upon the ground of compensation. In McKinley v. Chicago & N. W. Ry. Co., 44 Iowa, 314, the plaintiff was forcibly and successfully resisted by a brakeman in attempting to enter a passenger car of the defendant. There is no statement of the evidence as to the loss of time incurred or actual injury received; but these appear to have cut no figure in the case. It was charged by the court below, and held by the court above, that it was not a case for exemplary damages. The discussion related to the propriety of an instruction that the jury might take into consideration and give damages for 'the outrage and indignity' put upon the plaintiff. The instruction was held correct. Twelve thousand dollars damages were held to indicate passion and prejudice; but the court ordered the verdict to stand, if the plaintiff would accept a judgment for $7,000. Beck, J., however, thought $12,000 not too much, and Day, J., dissented, holding that outrage, indignity, and mental suffering are not elements of compensatory damages. In City of Chicago v. Jones, 66 Ill. 349, an award of $1,000 to a servant girl for breaking her right arm was not deemed excessive. In Collins v. Council Bluffs, 32 Iowa, 324, $15,000 were awarded a married woman for the breaking of the bone of her left thigh, in consequence of ice accumulated on the sidewalk. It appeared that it made her a cripple for life. The court refused to disturb the verdict." (The foregoing is extracted from the master's report.)

Case No. 9,803.

MORGAN et al. v. MASTICK.

[2 N. B. R. 521 (Quarto, 163).] [1]

District Court, N. D. Ohio. 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—OBJECT OF ACT—PREFERENCES—INTENT—WHO MAY HAVE THE BENEFIT OF BANKRUPT ACT—DISCHARGE.

1. The object of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] is to compel an equal distribution of a debtor's assets among all his creditors.

2. A debtor cannot discriminate among his creditors and prefer any one of them, but under the thirty-ninth section commits an act of bankruptcy if he makes a payment to one creditor before another.

3. Two things are to be considered to make such payment fraudulent, first, the debtor must be insolvent; second, he must intend to prefer his creditor.

4. Insolvency is a present inability to pay debts when due, even when there is surplus property more than enough to pay them at some future time.

[Cited in Graham v. Stark, Case No. 5,676.]

5. Under English and Massachusetts law only traders could take advantage of the bankrupt act; but under the present law any person may.

6. The intent constitutes the offence, not morally fraudulent but merely made so by the act of congress.

[1] [Reprinted from 2 N. B. R. 521 (Quarto, 163), by permission.]

7. If a debtor honestly believes himself solvent and pays a just debt, such payment cannot be considered fraudulent, though bankruptcy ensue; otherwise, if he is aware of his insolvency.

8. Fraudulent payments may be recovered by bankrupt's assignee.

9. Debtor is not entitled to certificate of discharge if he makes a fraudulent payment.

10. The intent is to be proven as a fact, either by direct evidence, or as the necessary and certain consequence of other facts clearly proved.

[Cited in Re Gregg, Case No. 5,797.]

On the 15th of September, A. D. 1868, said petitioning creditors [Morgan, Root & Co.] filed their petition in involuntary bankruptcy against the said defendant [Erman E. Mastick], charging him with committing an act of bankruptcy under the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, within six months before the filing of the petition, which act of bankruptcy consisted in making while insolvent a payment of money to certain creditors, relatives of the bankrupt, with the intent to give them a preference over the general creditors.

The defendant, a young man about thirty years of age, was a retail merchant in East Claridon, Geauga county, Ohio. In May last his store and stock of goods were consumed by fire, on which, however, he had a policy of insurance for four thousand dollars, receiving for it upon settlement the sum of three thousand two hundred and fifty dollars. His debts amounted to nearly seven thousand dollars, including a debt of eight hundred dollars due his father, Nathaniel Mastick. The latter was also surety for him on obligations to the amount of one thousand six hundred dollars. The bankrupt's assets consisted of personal property, notes, and accounts, a house and lot, and his insurance money, all of which, according to his own valuation, amounted to about one thousand dollars less than his liabilities, including the debt of eight hundred dollars due his father, which, it was agreed by his father, he need not take into account. It was evident that if the defendant availed himself of the benefit of the exemption laws, his assets upon his own estimate would not pay all his liabilities. The defendant answered the petition by denying his bankruptcy, and demanded a trial by jury.

At the present term the case came on to be tried upon the petition and answer, during which the following testimony was given: D. W. Tinan, an agent of Gordon, McMillan & Co., called upon defendant to pay a debt of about two hundred and fifty dollars or secure the same, Mastick having then collected about one thousand dollars from the insurance company, and on the request of Tinan informed him that he had expended the whole sum in taking up notes on which his father was surety, but that he would collect the balance of his insurance money and assets, and promised to pay G., McM. & Co., as soon as he had done so. In September Tinan again called upon Mastick, and was informed that the balance of the insurance money had been collected, but that other creditors, relatives of Mastick, had been paid. Tinan pressed the defendant to secure G., McM. & Co.'s claim by notes or personal security; he refused, informing Tinan that the balance of his creditors would have to wait for their pay until he could collect or earn enough. Charles Rhodes, also agent for G., McM. & Co., visited Mastick and told him that what he had done would not stand as against other creditors. Mastick took the bankrupt act and read, informing Rhodes that he presumed he had got himself into a bad fix. He refused, however, to secure the debt, saying he would take legal advice.

The bankrupt being put upon the stand testified to the same facts, but did not remember having told Tinan that his creditors would have to wait till he could earn the money. He also testified that when Tinan and Rhodes were at his place, he supposed he was solvent. That he had paid some of his creditors, believing that he was able to pay them all. His father had advised him to pay first those debts that were drawing the highest rate of interest, which advice he followed. About half the debts he had paid were those on which his father was security. That when he paid the debts referred to he did not intend to prefer them, for he then intended and now intends to pay all. The plaintiffs' attorney claimed that the fact of insolvency was established, and that the payment of the debts referred to was, under the bankrupt law, preferring them, and therefore, an act of bankruptcy; and cited among other authorities, the case of Jones v. Howland, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 377, wherein Hubbard, J., says: "The result of these cases is the drawing of a distinction between an actual insolvency and a contemplated bankruptcy; between the payment of a just debt in the course of business, though insolvency exists and is known to the insolvent, and the design to give a preference in view of stopping payment. And in view of all the authorities we hold the law to be this: that though insolvency in fact exists, yet if the debtor honestly believes he shall be able to go on in his business, and with such belief pays a just debt, without a design to give a preference, such payment is not fraudulent, though bankruptcy should afterwards ensue; and on the other hand, if the debtor, being insolvent, and knowing his situation, and expecting to stop payment, shall then make a payment, or give security to a creditor for a just debt, with a view to give him a preference over the general creditors, such payment, or giving security, is fraudulent as against the creditors; and property that is transferred in making such payment, or giving the security, may be recovered by his assignee, and the debtor will not be entitled to a discharge under the statute. It rests upon the intent with which the act was done; and the intent is to be proved, as a fact, either by direct evidence, or as the necessary and certain consequence of other facts clearly proved."

Plaintiffs' attorney also claimed: First. That insolvency, as the term is used in the bankrupt law, means the condition of a person unable to pay his debts as they fall due, or in the usual course of trade and business, although he may be able to pay his debts at a future time, upon the winding up of his business. In support of which were cited Hil. Bankr. 2; Thompson v. Thompson, 4 Cush. 127; Lee v. Kilbourn, 3 Gray, 594. Second. That when a debtor is insolvent, and with knowledge of that fact, makes payment to one creditor, knowing that such payment will, in fact, and necessarily must, operate as a preference to such creditor, he is conclusively presumed in law to have made such payment with intent to prefer such creditor. Hil. Bankr. 336; Avery & H. Bankr.; Arnold v. Maynard [Case No. 561]; Denny v. Dana, 2 Cush. 172; Beals v. Clark, 13 Gray, 18.

Defendant's attorney claimed that if Mastick at the time he made the payment honestly supposed that he was able to pay all his debts and intended to pay them, he did not make the payment with the intent to prefer his creditors, within the meaning of the bankrupt act.

The difference between the attorneys was mainly that while the plaintiffs' attorney claimed, that being insolvent and making a payment in full to one creditor, which in fact resulted in a preference, the defendant was presumed to have intended what was the natural and necessary result of his act, and therefore was guilty of an act of bankruptcy, the defendant's attorney claimed and insisted that the intent to prefer could not be deduced as an inference from the fact of preference, and cited Hil. Bankr. 329; 1 Metc. [Mass.] 366; 8 Metc. [Mass.] 377.

SHERMAN, District Judge, held that the decision in 8 Metc. [Mass.] 377, was a correct statement of the law of the case, and as such read it in full to the jury.

The jury could not agree as to the intent; while all were unanimous as to the defendant being insolvent, ten of them regarded the intent as fraudulent, and two that it was not. They were therefore discharged.

Case No. 9,804.

MORGAN v. NEW ORLEANS, M. & T. R. CO. et al.

[2 Woods, 244.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1876.

CONTRACTS — FRAUD IN PROCURING — LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS—EXCEPTIONS—LEX REI SITAE.

1. Where charges of fraud and misrepresentation in procuring a contract, which has been partly performed, are made as the ground for setting it aside, and where a rescission would involve the upsetting of many large and important transactions, the proof should be made clear to justify a court in making the decree prayed for.

[Cited in brief in Flint v. Babbitt, 59 Vt. 194, 9 Atl. 365.]

2. As a general rule a contract is to be governed as to its interpretation, nature, obligation, performance or dissolution, by the law of the place where it was made.

[Cited in Marvin Safe Co. v. Norton, 48 N. J. Law, 415, 7 Atl. 421.]

3. The principal exception to this rule is where the contract is made in one state or sovereignty, to be performed in another; in that case it is to be governed by the law of the place of performance.

4. But where a contract is made in one state, to be partly performed there, and partly performed in several other states, the contract is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made.

[Cited in The Brantford City, 29 Fed. 390; Liverpool & G. W. Steam Co. v. Phenix Ins. Co., 129 U. S. 455, 9 Sup. Ct. 477.]

5. But in such a case where, in the performance of the contract, conveyances and transfers are to be made of property situate in several states, consisting of realty or other property subject to the local law, the conveyances and transfers should be made in accordance with the lex rei sitae.

[Cited in Marvin Safe Co. v. Norton, 48 N. J. Law, 415, 7 Atl. 421.]

In equity. Heard on pleadings and evidence for final decree. This bill was filed to obtain the rescission of a certain contract made between the complainant [Charles Morgan] and the New Orleans, Mobile & Texas Railroad Company, on December 12, 1871. The rescission was asked for on two grounds: First, on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation of facts by which the complainant was induced to enter into the contract; secondly, on the ground that the contract was a commutative one, and that the railroad company had not performed its part of it. The latter ground was based upon the peculiar law of Louisiana, by which, according to the Civil Code, arts. 2045, 2046, "the dissolving condition is that which when accomplished, operates the revocation of the obligation, placing matters in the same state as though the obligation had not existed;" and such "resolutory condition is implied in all commutative contracts, to take effect in case either of the parties does not comply with his engagements."

R. H. Marr, H. J. Leovy, and F. A. Monroe, for complainant.

John A. Campbell, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The contract in this case was made for the purpose of putting an end to a ruinous competition which was being carried on between the two parties to it, in the freight and passenger business between Mobile and New Orleans, and for uniting their interest in that business and in a projected railroad business between New Orleans and Texas. The complainant Charles Morgan was, and had long been, engaged in running a line of steamers between Mobile and New Orleans, the line being supplemented by a short railroad running from Lake Pontchartrain to the latter place, called the Pontchartrain Railroad, of which he owned the majority of the stock. He also owned a railroad called the Opelousas road which ran from the Mississippi river opposite New Orleans to the Atchafalaya river at Brashear City, where it connected with a line of steamers running to Galveston and other places on the Texan coast, being connected with the city of New Orleans by means of a ferry at that place. The complainant also had a charter for a continuation of his railroad from Brashear City westwardly and northwesterly to the Texas state line. The railroad company, at the time of the contract, had recently completed a railroad between Mobile and New Orleans, on which the opposition before referred to was maintained against the steamboat business of the complainant; and they had procured a charter for a railroad from New Orleans to the state line of Texas, and expected to obtain a charter for a continuation of the said road to Houston in that state; and had actually constructed a road west of the Mississippi, from opposite New Orleans, as far as Donaldsonville. Under these circumstances, it became evidently the interest of the parties in some way to compose their differences, and not to continue an opposition which must result in loss to them both. The transportation route betwen Mobile and New Orleans, being divided between two powerful interests, could not be a very valuable property to either of them unless some amicable arrangement could be made. By the agreement in question, an attempt was made to form such an arrangement. The general nature of it was as follows: Morgan, on his part, agreed to convey to the railroad company and the company agreed to purchase the property which he had in the line between Mobile and New Orleans, for the sum of $797,800, namely, certain wharves and wharf property at Mobile, two steamers, the Laura and the Frances, and his Pontchartrain Railroad stock, amounting to 5,078 shares, out of 7,500 shares, which constituted the whole capital. He further agreed to convey to the company, for the sum of $250,000 and interest thereon from April 15, 1870, his railroad rights and partly constructed road between Brashear City and Vermillionville, about sixty miles, and from thence west and north to the Texas line and to Red river; the company agreeing to complete said road by the time it should complete its main line from Vermillionville to the city of Houston. Morgan further agreed to subscribe to the stock and securities of the railroad company, the sum of $1,258,000, on the same terms as the other subscribers thereto had done, and the price of the property above named was to be taken as payment of his subscription as far as it would go; the balance to be paid by him in cash. The securities to be received by him for his said subscription were to be $899,000 first mortgage bonds of the company on its road west of the Mississippi, and $359,000 of second mortgage bonds guarantied by the state of Louisiana. He was also to receive (like the other subscribers) income bonds and stock of the company of each, to the amount of his subscription. It was also stipulated in the agreement that Morgan should have for the sum of $250,000 cash, that portion of the Pontchartrain Railroad running along the levee in New Orleans, and the new depot thereto attached. The purpose of the agreement was declared to be to put an end to the opposition in the passenger and freight business between Mobile and New Orleans, and to concede the whole business to the company; and Morgan agreed to take off his boats within fifteen days, and not to run or be concerned in steamboats on that line for fifteen years thereafter. It was further agreed that the gross receipts of the through business by railroad between New Orleans and Houston should, on the completion of the railroad through to the latter city, for seven years thereafter, be stocked and divided between the parties according to the length of railroad owned by each, namely, Morgan's road from New Orleans to Brashear City, and the company's road from New Orleans to Houston, including the branch from Brashear to Vermillionville. The agreement was made and executed in the city of New York, where Morgan and the officers and most of the directors of the company resided; and immediately after it was made, measures were taken to execute it and carry it into effect; and in the course of the following January, February and March almost every article was executed. Morgan subscribed the requisite amount to the securities of the company, in New York, namely, the sum of $1,258,000, and received the bonds and certificate of stock which the agreement called for, and conveyed and transferred to the company the several pieces of property which he was to convey and transfer, namely, the wharves and wharf property in Mobile, the steamers Laura and Frances, the Pontchartrain Railroad stock, and the railroad property and rights northwest of Brashear City; and paid the cash balance required to make up his subscription; and he also received a conveyance of the Pontchartrain Railroad track along the levee in New Orleans, and paid for it the sum of $250,000 in cash. In fact, within three months from the time of making the agreement, everything was done to effect a complete execution of it, except the construction by the company of the railroad to Houston, including the branch road from Brashear to Vermillionville. In addition to this, the firm of C. A. Whitney & Co., of New Orleans, who were the general agents of the complainant in that city, and had managed for him the business between Mobile and New Orleans, and were still managing his line between New Orleans and Texas, were appointed as the agents of the railroad company, and acted as such for several months, namely, from the date of the agreement in December, 1871, until the latter part of the following April, and Morgan and three or four persons named by him were elected directors of the company in place of others who resigned. In the summer of 1872, the complainant changed the gauge of his road from New Orleans to Brashear City, so as to correspond with that of the defendants, and to be thus prepared for the through business to Houston, and in July he received one installment of interest on the bonds received by him. The defendants on their part, during the spring and summer of 1872, did some work on the line of road between Brashear City and Vermillionville, but never laid any rails there, and entirely suspended operations before the first of September; and nothing further has ever been done on that branch, nor has the road been completed from Donaldsonville to Vermillionville, nor has any part of it been constructed between Vermillionville and Houston. The time when, by the act granting state aid to the company (on which great reliance was placed), and when by express agreement with the state of Louisiana, the railroad company was to complete its road to the state line, was the 7th of May, 1873; and it was to complete the line to Houston within six months thereafter if the requisite legislation could be obtained from the legislature of Texas. In consequence of the failure of the company to furnish funds to pay its debts in Louisiana, and to go on with the work of construction of the railroads in contemplation, Whitney & Co. resigned the agency of the company in the latter part of April, 1872, and they and Morgan resigned their positions as directors. But no formal demand to have the agreement rescinded was made by the complainant until he filed the bill in the present case, which was on the 30th of May, 1873, shortly after the expiration of the time for completing the road to the Sabine river. The bill states, and it is not denied, that the company failed to pay interest on its securities as early as October, 1872, and that the trustees of the first mortgage of the road between Mobile and New Orleans had taken possession thereof, and had received the sanction of the court thereto; and that proceedings had been commenced for a sale of the franchises and property west of the Mississippi. By an amended bill, it is stated that James A. Raynor and Edwin D. Morgan were in possession of the company's road east of the Mississippi, claiming to be in possession as trustees under their first mortgage on that part; and that Frank M. Ames was in possession of the road west of the Mississippi, under a like claim, as trustee under the first mortgage on that part; and they were made parties to the bill, and have severally put in answers setting up their respective claims under said mortgages.

The bill, after setting out most of the foregoing facts, alleges by way of gravamen, that in the negotiation which took place in New York preliminary to the making of the contract, certain statements and representations were made to the complainant by a committee of the directors of the company, respecting the condition of its affairs, which he was assured were accurate and true, but which he has since discovered to have been false. The bill states that the committee referred to exhibited to the complainant a certain paper (which is referred to as Exhibit E), containing a statement of the condition of the company at that time, showing that the assets of the company then in its possession and available for the construction and equipment of the main line of road to be built from New Orleans to Houston, Texas, and of the branch from Brashear City to Vermillionville, amounted to the sum of $7,551,000, being composed of $4,255,000 of bonds of the company at par, $4,140,000 of Louisiana state bonds, at eighty cents on the dollar, and $1,500,000 second mortgage bonds, at sixty cents on the dollar, and a balance of $488,000 of first mortgage bonds in the Calcasieu Division, all being subject to an amount of $1,404,000 that would be due to original subscribers to a certain fund of "two millions of dollars." Also, that the committee exhibited to the complainant another paper (which is referred to as Exhibit F), which was represented to contain new subscriptions of sums of money to be applied to the construction and equipment of the said main line from New Orleans to Houston; that it had sixty-six names, with an amount affixed to each name, making a total of $4,895,700; and that the subscribers were represented to be, with two or three exceptions, possessed of large means, and able and willing to pay; and that the committee represented that the subscriptions were made in good faith, to furnish the funds required to construct and equip the said railroad west of the Mississippi; and that with the said assets in hand and said subscriptions, if the complainant also became a subscriber for a liberal amount, upon the same terms as the other subscribers, the company would have ample means to construct and equip the said railroads and have them in operation at the period contemplated by the charter. The bill alleges that the representations were not true, and were made in bad faith, to deceive the complainant and induce him to act, in relation to said proposed arrangement, in error of facts as to the condition of the company in regard to the possession of the means requisite for the construction and equipment and putting in operation of the said railroads, and in regard to the immediate intent of the company to prosecute and complete the same. The Exhibits E and F were produced in the evidence taken in the cause, and are before the court. The fact that after the agreement was made, very little of these large amounts of money was forthcoming, even to pay the floating debt of the company, and that very little was expended during the following season on the works, and that the company was obliged absolutely to suspend operations in October, 1872, was sufficient, if the complainant understood the representations as stated by the bill, to raise in his mind the strongest suspicions that he had been deceived and duped. The answers furnish but little light on the subject. They are not sworn to, and consequently are not evidence. Those of the trustees of the several mortgages are filed by them as such trustees, and claim that they are not affected by any rights of the complainant growing out of the transactions between him and the company.

The evidence is more to the point. (Here the learned judge went into an elaborate discussion of the evidence. This discussion is omitted.)

In charges of this kind, laid as a ground for setting aside a contract where many things have been performed on both sides, and where a rescission would involve the upsetting of many large and important transactions, the proof must be very clear indeed of fraudulent misrepresentation or concealment, to justify a court in applying the judicial knife to the case. It must be clear that there has been such a misstatement of the facts as to mislead the injured party, and to induce him to enter into the transaction; and he must be prompt to avail himself of the objection as soon as it is discovered. He must not wait to experiment and see whether it may not, after all, turn out well. Acquiescence for a little time, in such cases, is condonation. I am not satisfied that there was any such misrepresentation of facts in this case as, under the circumstances, entitles the complainant to set aside the contract.

The next question is, whether the complainant is entitled to have the contract rescinded on account of nonperformance by the railroad company of their part of it. The demand for rescission on this ground rests upon the peculiar law of the state of Louisiana before referred to. If the contract is to be governed by that law, I should have no hesitation in saying that the complainant is entitled to the relief which he asks. The building of the railroad beyond Brashear City, so as to give the complainant a through connection between his Opelousas road and Texas, was undoubtedly a material consideration with him, amongst the other considerations moving to the contract. The contract was a commutative one. In that respect it fully met the definition of the Louisiana Code, which declares (article 1768): "Commutative contracts are those in which what is done, given or promised by one party is considered as equivalent to, or a consideration for what is done, given or promised by the other." It becomes material, therefore, to ascertain whether the contract is to be governed by the law of Louisiana. The general rule is, that a contract is to be governed as to its interpretation, its nature, its obligation, and its performance or dissolution, by the law of the place where it is made or entered into. In other words. "Lex loci contractûs est lex contractûs." The first and principal exception to this rule is, that if the contract is made in one state or sovereignty, and is to be performed in another state or sovereignty, it is to be governed by the law of the place of performance, because it will be presumed that the parties had the laws of the latter place in view when they entered into the contract. The rule and the exception have been fully discussed and commented upon by Mr. Justice Story in his Conflict of Laws, and by many other writers on private international law, and it is unnecessary to review those discussions here. In this case the contract was made in New York by persons who resided there. The railroad company, it is true, was a corporation originally chartered by Alabama, and subsequently capacitated by the laws of Louisiana and Texas to exercise all its faculties in those states; but its directors and officers mostly resided in New York and other Northern states, and its principal office was in New York, and the meetings of its directors were usually held there. In this case, all the negotiations which led to the contract were carried on in New York, and the contract itself was concluded and executed there. But, on the other hand, the interests, operations and property, which formed the principal object of the contract, were located in the Southern states bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, to wit: Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas, and largely in the state of Louisiana. The contract was made with reference to these interests, operations and property, but its direct object, that is, the things stipulated and agreed to be done and performed, were to be, or might be in part, done and performed in New York as well as in the states referred to. This will appear when we look at the contract a little more particularly. It is altogether a personal contract, providing for the doing of certain acts on the one side, and on the other. Its object was a settlement of controversies, and a discontinuance of business opposition between the parties. It is evident that many of the acts stipulated to be done could be, and in fact were, done in the city of New York. There Morgan executed and delivered to the company the various deeds and transfers of property which he had agreed to do; the conveyances of the property in Mobile, the bills of sale of the steamers, the transfer of Pontchartrain Railroad Company stock, the conveyance of the railroad rights north and west of Brashear City. There he made his stipulated subscription to the securities of the railroad company. There the company delivered to him the said securities, namely, the bonds and certificates of stock. But the discontinuance of the steamboat business between Mobile and New Orleans and the delivery of the property consequent upon the said conveyances were done in Alabama and Louisiana; and the building and completion of the railroad beyond Brashear City were necessarily to be done in the latter state. Now, by what law is such a contract to be governed, where it is executed in one state, and is partially to be performed in that state, and partially in other states?

I have no difficulty in saying that the conveyances and transfers to be made in pursuance of the contract were to be made in conformity with the laws of the states respectively in which the property, when consisting of realty, or subject to local law, was situated. And such conveyances and transfers, when executed, would be governed by the lex rei sitae. But that does not answer the question as to what law the principal contract is to be governed by. In Louisiana, nonperformance of a material stipulation renders the whole contract liable to be dissolved. But no one would apply that rule of Louisiana law to a contract not subject to its dominion, even though the breach should occur in Louisiana. The fact, therefore, that one of the acts to be performed in this case —the construction of the railroad—was to be performed in Louisiana, will not help to resolve the question, unless we can affirm that the entire contract is to be governed by Louisiana law. Does the fact, that a portion of the contract must necessarily be performed in Louisiana, subject it to that condition? If that does, then the like fact that a portion of the contract is necessarily to be performed in Alabama would subject it to Alabama law, and make it an Alabama contract. In this embarrassment, I do not know that I can do better than to fall back on the general rule that a contract is to be governed by the law of the place where it is made. The presumption, that where a contract is to be performed in a different jurisdiction, the parties must be intended to have in view the laws of the latter, seems to be repelled when the performance is to take place in several different jurisdictions. For when there are two equal and opposite presumptions, neither of them can prevail. The present case is still stronger; for much of the contract was performable, and actually performed in the place where it was made. I do not mean to say that where the main and principal part of a contract is to be performed in a state different from that in which it is made, the presumption will not arise that it is made in reference to the laws of such place of performance, even though some minor and incidental parts are required to be performed in still different states. Such may, very possibly, be the result in many instances that may occur. When they happen they will be governed by the force of their own circumstances. But I do not see that I am called upon to apply any such exceptional rule in this case. The building of the railroad in question was a very important consideration it is true; but the contract embraced many other considerations equally important, that were not necessarily to be performed in Louisiana.

The conclusion, therefore, to which I am forced to come is, that the principal contract, made on the 12th of December, 1871, between the complainant and the New Orleans, Mobile & Texas Railroad Company, was a New York contract, governed, as to its nature and obligation by the laws and jurisprudence of the state of New York; and as by these laws and jurisprudence, so far as appears, no such dissolving consequence follows from a nonperformance of part of the contract, as is claimed in this case, the claim is untenable, and the relief must be refused. As no relief can be granted on either of the grounds laid in the bill of complaint, the same must be dismissed with costs.

MORGAN v. The PHILIP DE PEYSTER.

[6 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 441.]

District Court, S. D. New York. 1848.[1]

COLLISION — LOOKOUT — VESSEL CLOSE HAULED — PRIVILEGED TACK.

1. The neglect of keeping a sufficient look-out in the day-time pronounced gross negligence. No custom contrary to the exercise of this precaution allowed weight.

2. A vessel close hauled on the starboard tack, when meeting one on the port tack, has the right to keep her wind and hold on, as a general rule, until the necessity of changing her course to avoid a collision, becomes apparent.

3. A vessel close hauled on the privileged tack has the right to suppose that the other is performing her duty in keeping a "look-out," and will avoid her.

4. Where the vessel on the unprivileged tack had no sufficient look-out, and was hailed from the other vessel, and the hail was not heard in time to avoid the latter: held, that the collision was attributable to the want of a look-out, and the vessel neglecting this precaution was answerable for the consequences.

[This was a libel by Charles Morgan against the schooner Philip De Peyster.]

The ship Emily, in the month of November, during broad day and fine weather, was beating up the bay of New York, tide flood, wind from N. N. W., and blowing a six-knot breeze, the ship had tacked on the east shore, about a mile to the southward of Governor's Island, and was standing to the westward. The schooner Philip De Peyster, a coasting vessel, was also beating up, and was standing close hauled on the larboard or port tack, and was seen from the Emily when half a mile off. On board the schooner, besides the man at the wheel, was another on deck, others were below. The attention of the men on board of the schooner was called to the ship by a hail from her, when she was seen by them for the first time, and on the lee-bow of the schooner. The helm of the schooner was at once put hard up (aport) and she kept away (fell off) so as to go into the ship abaft of midships, in an angular direction towards the ship's stern, doing great damage to the ship and making a wreck of herself, and was towed up to the city by a steamboat. The ship continued her course. There was some question and other proofs whether the ship had been about long enough to have steerage way on her; the clear weight of evidence, however, was that she had sufficient way to have gone in stays again.

E. Burr, C. Benedict, and W. R. Bebee, for libellant.

George Wood, Nelson Chase, and W. Q. Morton, for claimants.

BETTS, District Judge. 1. Upon the proofs it is found the Emily committed no fault in not taking measures to avoid the De Peyster previous to the hail. If she was without headway at the time, she had no power to do anything, and if she was under way and running six knots she had, by the usage of navigation, a right to hold her tack, until the necessity of changing it to avoid collision became apparent (2 Hagg. Adm. 174; Story, Bailm., 2d Ed., §§ 6, 11), and on the evidence, that was not until after ineffectual hails to the De Peyster.

2. It is further found on the proofs that after it was discovered the De Peyster did not observe the hails, the Emily could have made no movement that would have avoided the collision; for if she was running six knots and the De Peyster eight, they were approaching at the rate of fourteen knots and their distance, if supposed to be 80 or 100 rods would be run over in 15 minutes, and if they were only so many yards, instead of rods, distant apart they would meet in about three minutes (and the time of collision would conduce strongly to prove that the vessels could not have been 30 or 40 rods apart), and accordingly the Emily so situated could make no manoeuvre that would remove her out of the line of approach of the De Peyster, within the time necessary under either supposition.

3. The Emily had a right to suppose the De Peyster saw her, and though apparently coming close upon her, could and would avoid her; the practice of that kind of craft so to run is fully proved, and that the facility with which they are manoeuvred justified the Emily in holding her own tack, and relying upon the movements of the De Peyster until the hails were made, after that it is clearly shown she had no power to avoid a collision.

4. The De Peyster was guilty of a gross fault in keeping no look-out on the deck. The evidence is clear that the accident would have been avoided if a look-out had been kept. No custom or habit with such craft, however general, can dispense with the use of a precaution so necessary to the safety of other vessels as well as their own, and as the accident arose from that fault the schooner is answerable for its consequences. 2 Dod. 83, 85.

5. Upon the proofs I consider the injuries received by the ship to be at least $1,200, and I decree for the libellants to that amount with costs to be taxed. 1 Hagg. Adm. 109.

The above case was heard on appeal before Nelson, Circuit Justice, and further proofs introduced by the parties. The judgment of the district court was affirmed. [Case unreported.]

Case No. 9,806.

MORGAN v. RAILROAD CO. et al.

[1 Woods, 15.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. April Term, 1870.

CORPORATIONS—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER TO PREVENT INJURY — OFFICERS DERELICT — PROPER PARTY TO BRING ACTION.

1. Unless a party has a right to sue in the local courts, he cannot sue in the federal courts. The latter cannot create a right to sue, and can only take jurisdiction when the right exists by law, and the plaintiff and defendant are citizens of different states.

2. A stockholder in a business corporation cannot sue in equity for relief against an injury done or threatened to the corporation in which he is a stockholder without an averment that the corporation or its officers are derelict in their duty.

3. The appropriate party to sue for such injury is the corporation itself, acting by its legal officers and managers.

4. The ownership of stock does not give the stockholder any legal estate in the property of the corporation.

[Cited in Kilgour v. New Orleans Gaslight Co., Case No. 7,764; Sala v. New Orleans, Id. 12,246; Gottfried v. Miller, 104 U. S. 528; Irvine v. Dunham, 111 U. S. 334, 4 Sup. Ct. 504.]

This was a bill in equity, which was heard upon the motion of complainant for a preliminary injunction.

Miles Taylor, for complainant.

John A. Campbell, for defendants.

BRADLEY, Circuit Judge. The plaintiff in this case has filed a bill for an injunction against the New Orleans, Mobile and Chattanooga Railroad Company, to prevent its doing a threatened injury to the Pontchartrain Railroad Company, of which the complainant is a stockholder; which threatened injury, the complainant alleges, will greatly diminish the value of his stock. It is not pretended that the Pontchartrain Railroad Company, or its officers or directors, are not competent and willing to vindicate its rights; or that they are guilty of any complicity with the defendants, or even of any neglect to perform their proper duties, for the protection of the interests of their stockholders. The only apparent reason for the suit being brought in the name of the complainant is that he is a citizen of New York, and can maintain a suit against the defendants in the federal court; whereas the Pontchartrain Railroad Company, being a corporation of Louisiana, would be obliged to sue in the state court. This reason is not sufficient to give the complainant a right to maintain a suit. Unless he has a right to maintain a suit in the local courts, he cannot maintain one in the federal court. The latter court cannot create a right to sue; it can only take jurisdiction of such a right when it already exists by the state law. and when the complainant, at the same time, is a citizen of another state.

The demurrer in this case, therefore, raises the question, whether a stockholder of a business corporation can sue in equity for relief against an injury done, or threatened to be done, to the corporation of which he is a stockholder, without any averment that the corporation or its officers are derelict in their duty.

If such a writ has ever been maintained, it must have been at a period when corporations were much fewer, and when their powers and capacities were much less understood than they are at the present day; or because the objection was not taken to the proceeding.

The power to use a corporate name and seal, and to sue and to be sued by such name, is one of the essential and primary features of a corporation. Persons who are constituted a body politic or corporate lose, in respect of that association, their individual character and personality. A new and artificial person is created—totally distinct from the individuals who compose it. Its functions are not their functions; its property is not their property; its rights and liabilities are not theirs. Its officers and directors are not even trustees or agents of the stockholders, but trustees and agents of the corporation. The legal and equitable rights of the stockholders are, to vote at the stockholders' meetings, to participate in the profits, and to have the funds and property of the corporation devoted to their original use, and not diverted therefrom or otherwise wasted by the fraudulent act or willful neglect of the directors. For the vindication of these rights appropriate remedies exist, which act directly upon or against the corporation itself or the corporate officers who are charged with delinquency. And by and through the equity which the stockholder has against delinquent officers, he may often obtain relief against strangers combining with them. But in no other way can a stockholder prosecute a stranger for injuries done or threatened to the corporate property or franchises.

The appropriate party to sue for such injuries is the corporation itself, acting by its legal officers and managers. It is their duty to take care of the corporate interests. They are the only persons legally invested with the power to do it. The members of the corporation are clothed with a power to sue by the corporate name, and public policy requires that they should do so. The objects of the incorporation of the society would be largely defeated by allowing every member, at his discretion, to sue for real or supposed injuries to the corporate body. It would subject other parties to embarrassment. It would lead to an inconvenient multiplication of suits.

But, it is said that a stockholder has a direct legal interest in his stock, which may be affected by an injury to the corporation; and reference is made to the well known fact, that immense investments of capital are made in corporation stocks, which constitute a large portion of the funded property of the country; and that these stocks are really nothing but certificates of title deeds showing the proportionate interest of the holder in the property of the corporation itself. This is a specious statement of the case. But the conclusion aimed at is not true. The possession of capital stock does not give a person a particle of legal interest in the corporation property. Though he possess one-half the entire stock, he is not, therefore, one-half owner of the corporate property. The corporation still owns it all. There is no divided ownership in the case. Possession of the stock merely entitles the holder thereof to the incidental rights above enumerated—a right of vote, a right of dividend, a right of faithful appropriation of the funds. These rights are very different from the right of property. It is these rights which give value to the stock as a marketable commodity.

An injury to the corporate franchises or property will undoubtedly affect the market value of the stock; but that injury is so remote, indirect and consequential, that it can lay no foundation for an action or suit against the aggressor. The stockholder must rely on the corporation, which alone is directly affected by the injury, to obtain through its proper officers, the adequate redress. Should these officers refuse to perform their duty, then only can the stockholder appeal to the courts for aid against them, and through them for aid against the wrong doer. These principles are assumed as law in the cases of Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 341; Bronson v. La Crosse R. Co., 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 302; and Memphis City v. Dean, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 73. In the last case, the court say: "The judgment of the court in the case of Dodge v. Woolsey [supra] authorizes the stockholder of a company to institute a suit in equity in his own name against a wrong doer, whose acts operate to the prejudice of the interests of the stockholders, such as diminishing their dividends and lessening the value of their stock, in a case where application has first been made to the directors of the company to institute the suit in its own name, and they have refused. This refusal of the board of directors is essential in order to give to the stockholder any standing in court, as the charter confers upon the directors representing the body of stockholders, the general management of the business of the company. There must be a clear default, therefore, on their part, involving a breach of duty, within the rule established in equity, to authorize a stockholder to institute the suit in his own behalf, or for himself and other stockholders who may choose to join." A large number of cases to the same purport will be found collected in Abb. Dig. Corp. tit. "Stockholders." See, also, Grant, Corp. 290–292; Ang. & A. Corp. (6th Ed.) § 391.

This is decisive against the right of the complainant in the present case to maintain his suit. So far from showing any complicity of the directors of the Pontchartrain Railroad Company with the defendants, or even any neglect or default on their part in protecting the interests of the corporation, the bill exhibits the record of a suit brought by the company in the state court for precisely the same relief which is sought here.

Under these circumstances, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the motion for injunction must be denied, and the bill dismissed.

Let a decree be entered accordingly.

MORGAN v. TAPSCOTT et al.

[5 Ben. 252.] [1]

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1871.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION—POSSESSORY ACTION BY MORTGAGEE OF VESSEL.

Owners of a majority interest in a ship gave a mortgage on it to M. to secure advances. The mortgage having become due, M. took possession of the interest mortgaged, and claimed to hold the ship as majority owner. Thereupon S., the master, who was a part owner in the vessel, and T., another part owner, ejected M., and he thereupon filed a possessory libel against them and the vessel, to recover possession of the ship. Held, that the court had no jurisdiction of the action.

[Cited in The Grand Republic, 10 Fed. 399.]

This was a libel [by William D. Morgan,] to recover possession of the ship William Tapscott, and was filed against her and against James F. Tapscott, owner of eight forty-eighths of the ship, and James H. Spencer, master, owner of six forty-eighths of her. The libel alleged that James B. Bell, being the owner of thirty-three forty-eighths of the ship Wm. Tapscott, and being indebted to the firm of E. E. Morgan's Sons, on June 4, 1869, mortgaged that interest to the libellant to secure that indebtedness; that on April 19, 1871, the moneys secured by the mortgage had become due, and the libellant on that day took possession of the mortgaged interest, and became the absolute owner thereof, and majority owner of the ship, and entitled to hold the ship and the possession thereof against every one; and that on the 24th of April, the respondents violently ejected him from the ship. The respondents, claiming to be owners of thirty-three forty-eighths of the ship, besides answering to the merits, took an exception to the jurisdiction of the court, and the cause was heard on this exception alone.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for libellant.

R. D. Benedict and James K. Hill, for respondents.

BENEDICT, District Judge. I am of the opinion that the decision of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of The John Jay, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 399, is decisive of this case. According to the reasoning of the case of The John Jay, such an action as the present cannot be maintained in the admiralty. The principle of the two cases is the same, and I am bound therefore to apply here the rule laid down by the supreme court, and pronounce against the jurisdiction.

The same effect was given to the decision of the case of The John Jay [supra], in a case similar in many aspects to the present, by the learned Judge Ware. The Wm. D. Rice [Case No. 17,691]. The exception to the jurisdiction of the court, is, therefore, sustained, and the libel dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

MORGAN et al. v. TIPTON et al.

[3 McLean, 339.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. May Term, 1844.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — EXTENSION OF TIME GIVEN — FRAUD BY INDORSER — PLEADING IN EQUITY—ANSWER — NEW MATTER—WHEN ANSWER EVIDENCE—USURY.

1. If the indorsee give time to the maker of the note or the executor of a mortgage to receive the payment of it, the indorsers are discharged.

[See Bank of U. S. v. Lee, Case No. 921; Bank of U. S. v Hatch, Id. 918.]

2. If there has been fraud on the part of the indorsers, they may be made liable on that ground.

3. A defendant in his answer cannot introduce new matter in the nature of a cross bill, and require the plaintiff, and others under whom he claims, to answer it.

[Cited in Lockwood v. Cleaveland, 6 Fed. 724.]

4. Such is not the English practice, which we have adopted. Under the laws of Indiana, no notes except those given to banks are placed under the mercantile law.

5. On all other instruments, the maker must be prosecuted to insolvency, before he can have recourse to his indorser.

6. A mortgage given to secure the payment of an usurious note, the usury not being purged, is infected, and subject to the same rule as the note.

7. In Indiana, usury makes void the instrument.

8. If the holder of an usurious note, not known to be usurious by him when received, yet have a knowledge of the usury before the mortgage was taken, it makes void the mortgage.

9. Even without any notice, the mortgage having been given for an usurious debt cannot be enforced.

10. The defendant's answer is evidence, when responsive to the bill.

In equity.

Fletcher & Butler, for complainants.

Smith & Wright, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The complainants [Morgan, Buck & Co.] represent in their bill that they are merchants in Philadelphia, and that Job Eldridge and Thomas J. Cummings, being indebted to them in a sum exceeding four thousand dollars, Eldridge assigned to them a note given by Spear J. Tipton to Cummings, and by Cummings assigned to Eldridge, for three thousand three hundred dollars, dated the 17th of April, 1838, with ten per cent. interest, amounting at the time of the assignment to three thousand, seven hundred and sixty-two dollars, in payment to the complainants in part of their debt. That to secure the payment of said note, Tipton executed to Cummings a mortgage on one hundred and sixty acres of land, in Cass county, Indiana. And the complainants allege that Eldridge represented that the said sum was justly due by the said Tipton. That Cummings assigned to them the mortgage, and that a credit for the amount of the note was entered in the account of Eldridge & Cummings. That in May term, 1840, Tipton confessed a judgment on the note, including interest, amounting to the sum of three thousand nine hundred seventy-five dollars and fifty cents. That on the complainants agreeing to give a stay on the judgment of two years, Tipton executed a mortgage on several tracts of land, to secure the payment of the judgment, with seven per cent. interest thereon. And the bill states that the time for payment has long since elapsed, but Tipton has not paid the judgment or any part of it. And the complainants pray that the said Tipton, and also his co-defendants Eldridge & Cummings, may answer under oath and show why the complainants should not have the relief for which they pray. They allege that Tipton pretends that the aforesaid note was given for an usurious consideration, and also the judgment and mortgages, all of which are, consequently, void; but the complainants aver that this pretence is untrue in point of fact: and they pray, if such a defence shall be set up and sustained, by the said Tipton, that then a decree shall be rendered against Eldridge & Cummings for the amount of the note and interest. Among other interrogatories put by the complainants, the defendant Tipton is called to answer, "whether said defendant did not make and execute to said defendant Cummings the said note and mortgage, or either, and which of them, as is in the bill in that behalf named; and, if yea, whether the same were not made and executed for a good and valuable consideration and as evidence of and security for a just and subsisting debt, or for what consideration and purpose were they made and executed." Also, "whether Tipton and wife did not make, execute and acknowledge the said deed of mortgage to the complainants in their bill named, and upon the consideration and agreement therein named, or upon some other and what consideration and agreement." And the bill prays that an account may be taken of the judgment, &c., and that unless payment shall be made in a reasonable time the mortgage may be foreclosed and the lands sold, &c., and that if the said Tipton shall set up a good and equitable defence, the said Eldridge & Cummings may be decreed to pay the judgment, &c. Eldridge & Cummings demur to the bill, and the defendant Tipton, in his answer, admits the judgment, and the execution of the mortgage to secure the payment of it, as stated in the complainants' bill. And he further states, that on the 1st of May, 1836, being in great want of money he loaned from Cummings five hundred dollars for six months, for which he agreed to pay two hundred and fifty dollars interest. He accordingly executed his note for seven hundred and fifty dollars, payable in six months; and if payment should not be punctually made, ten per cent. interest, from the date of the note. When the note became due, being unable to pay it, the defendant loaned, in addition to the sum before borrowed, two hundred and fifty dollars; the former note being cancelled, he executed another note to the said Cummings for eighteen hundred dollars, payable in six months, and if not paid punctually, ten per cent. interest from the date. To obtain a further indulgence for a year, and on the cancelment of the note last given, the defendant executed another note for three thousand dollars, payable in twelve months, with ten per cent. interest, from the date of the note, if the payment should not be made punctually. When that note became due, not being able to pay it, the note was cancelled, and another note for three thousand three hundred dollars, payable in six months, was executed by the defendant, which, if not paid punctually, was to draw ten per cent. interest, from its date. To secure the payment of this last note the mortgage was executed first named in the complainants' bill, and which, after the mortgage was executed to secure the payment of the judgment to the complainants, was cancelled. And these facts are stated, as defendant alleges, in answer to the above interrogatory. The defendant having answered the bill, makes his answer in the nature of a cross bill, and the complainants, with his co-defendants, Eldridge & Cummings, are made defendants; and he prays that they may be required to answer the matters and things specified in his answers and he propounds several interrogatories. Eldridge & Cummings demur to the cross bill as set up in the answer; and the complainants answer the same.

The first question for consideration is, whether Eldridge & Cummings are proper parties to the bill. The demurrer which they have filed raises this question. They are not charged with fraud or combination to the injury of the complainants. On the contrary they allege that the charge of usury set up by Tipton is untrue. But they pray if they shall not obtain a decree against Tipton on the mortgage, that Eldridge & Cummings may be decreed to pay the judgment for which the mortgage was given. There is then nothing on the face of this bill, which might not be stated against the promisee and indorser of a note in every bill to foreclose a mortgage, given by the maker of the note. Unless there be some peculiar ground of equity stated, the remedy against these persons is a legal one, and this remedy cannot be invoked by the complainants until they shall have prosecuted the maker of the note to insolvency. Under the statute of Indiana the note is not negotiable as mercantile paper. Two years' indulgence was given on the judgment, on the defendants executing the mortgage in question. This would release from liability the prior indorser if the note be valid. Whether it would release Eldridge & Cummings from their original liability to the complainants, would depend upon the fact whether the note was assigned to them in payment of their account. If it were taken in payment, as from the statements in the bill would seem to be the fact, then the only recourse of the complainants would be on the indorsement of the note. And this recourse, as has been stated, is cut off by the indulgence given to the maker of the note. If the note were given for a fraudulent or usurious consideration, so as to render it void in the hands of the complainants, on that ground they would have recourse against the assignors. And this would be the case whether the liability was sought to be enforced at law or in equity. This ground is not only not taken in the bill, but it is expressly repudiated. There is then on the face of the bill no ground stated on which Eldridge & Cummings can be held liable, and their demurrer must, consequently, be sustained. Had the bill alleged a fraudulent combination between Cummings and Eldridge to assign to the complainants, in payment of a debt due to them, a valid note, the bill might have been sustained against them and Tipton also. The facts, that the note was given to one of the partners, by him assigned to the other, and by that other assigned to the complainants, in payment of the partnership debt, would require little, if any, additional proof, if the note be usurious, to establish a fraudulent intent. The demurrer being sustained to the original bill, necessarily disposes of the demurrer by Eldridge & Cummings, to the cross bill attempted to be set up in the answer. Now if there is nothing on the face of the original bill these defendants can be required to answer, they are not proper parties to the bill, and cannot be called to respond to the interrogatories propounded in Tipton's answer. But there is another ground equally fatal to this answer being treated as a cross bill. There is no such practice recognized in the courts of the United States. In Kentucky such a practice prevails; but the chancery procedure of the courts of the United States is governed by the English practice, which requires a defendant to file a cross bill, if he desire the answer under oath, of his co-defendant or the complainant. This proceeding is regulated by the rules lately adopted by the supreme court. In this view then, the defendant having no right to set up in his answer the matter of a cross bill, objection may be made to the proceeding on motion or by a demurrer.

Two questions remain to be considered: 1. Can Tipton avail himself of the usury, under the circumstances of this case? 2. If he can, has the usury been proved?

By the second section of the act of 1833, it is provided that no rate of interest exceeding ten per cent. shall be received; and by the third section, that any one who shall violate the second section, shall be liable to be indicted and fined. These sections are embodied in the revision of 1838. On the part of the complainants, it is contended, that the confession of the judgment and execution of the mortgage by Tipton, preclude him from setting up the usury as a defence. There is no evidence that the complainants had any notice of the usury when Eldridge assigned to them the note. But the proof is clear that they had notice, before the date of the judgment and mortgage. And it would seem that a knowledge of the fact of usury, as communicated to them by their counsel, induced them to indulge Tipton two years for the payment of the judgment. The confession of the judgment and the execution of the mortgage show a settled purpose by Tipton to pay the money. Acts of confirmation of a void contract could scarcely be stronger. Usury by the Indiana statute, as construed by the supreme court of that state, makes void the contract. Where A made an usurious note to B, who transferred it to C, for a valuable consideration, without notice of the usury, and thereupon A gave a bond to C for the amount, the bond was held not to be affected with the usury. 1 Term R. 390. A bona fide purchaser, without notice, under a sale duly made, pursuant to the statute (of New York), by virtue of a power of attorney contained in the mortgage, is not affected by usury in the original debt for which the bond and mortgage were given. 10 Johns. 195. An injunction will not be granted on the charge of usury, where the party seeks the discovery of the usury, and a return of the excess beyond the lawful interest, for the usury would have been a good defence at law, and no reason is given why the plaintiff did not make the defence at law. 1 Johns. Ch. 49. Where the plaintiff was sued at law on notes alleged by him to be usurious, and he suffered judgment to be had against him, without making a defence or applying to this court on a bill of discovery in due season, he was held concluded and not entitled to relief. These are the authorities relied on to show that Tipton is, by his acts, precluded from setting up as a defence usury in the note on which judgment was entered. That by giving the mortgage, he not only waived the usury, but procured a forbearance of two years, which of itself constitutes a valuable consideration. Whether the forbearance is a valuable consideration, must depend upon the validity of the demand. If that were void, by being usurious, it does not strengthen the cause of the complainants. The complainants had no notice when the note was assigned to them, but this, it seems, does not relieve them from the effect of the usury. In Lloyd v. Scott, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 228, it was held "that usurious securities are not only void, as between the original parties, but the illegality of their inception affects them, even in the hands of third persons who are entire strangers to the transaction." "A stranger must take heed to his assurance at his peril, and cannot insist on his ignorance of the contract, in support of his claim to recover upon a security which originated in usury." The same doctrine is laid down in the case of Lowe v. Waller, 2 Doug. 735, Cowles v. Woodruff, 8 Conn. 35; Wales v. Webb, 5 Conn. 154; Baldwin v. Norton, 2 Conn. 161. The note then in the hands of the complainants as assignees, if usurious, was void. It was not negotiable, though that fact is not noted as important in the cases cited. Do the judgment and mortgage purge the complainants' demand from the taint of usury?

In the case above cited from 10 Johns. 195, a sale under a mortgage was held good, and could not be affected by usury in the debt for which the mortgage was given. By the statute of New York such a sale was equivalent to a foreclosure by a decree in chancery. In the case under consideration there has been no sale, and this proceeding is on the mortgage and not on the judgment. In Lamme v. Saunders, 1 T. B. Mon. 266, it was held that to a scire facias on a judgment, obtained on an usurious contract, the party will not be permitted to plead the usury in avoidance of the judgment. The same doctrine is in Cro. Eliz. 585; Ord, Usury, 98. But in the same case the Kentucky court held that a note executed for the judgment, obtained on an usurious contract is void, and the usury may be pleaded, notwithstanding a judgment was rendered for the demand. In Wickes v. Gogerly, 1 Car. & P. 396, the court held that a security given in lieu of a former security, which was tainted by usury, is void, unless in the second security a deduction is made of all sums paid usuriously under the former security. And, Preston v. Jackson, 2 Starkie, 237, the court decided that a party cannot recover on a new instrument which operates as a security for any usurious interest, although it be founded upon a new settlement of the account between the borrower and the lender, and the original securities have been cancelled. That was a case between the assignee and maker of the note. In Roberts v. Goff, 4 Barn. & Ald. 92, the court set aside a judgment founded on an usurious security, without compelling the defendant to repay the principal and interest. There is no pretence that either on the confession of the judgment or the execution of the mortgage the usury was purged. And as before remarked, the complainants had notice of the usury before the date of the judgment and mortgage. The present bill is brought to foreclose the mortgage, an instrument infected with usury. In Lawless v. Blakey, 4 T. B. Mon. 488; 5 T. B. Mon. 394, 470, it was held the defendant may make his defence at law, or omit to do so and come into the court of chancery, either to enjoin the judgment, or to recover the money paid usuriously on it. But he cannot avail himself of both jurisdictions. If he make a defence at law, he must abide by it. Where usury has been sufficiently pleaded in an action at law, and on demurrer the plea adjudged bad and judgment rendered, the matter cannot be set up again in equity. The cause should be taken to the court of errors. Lamme v. Saunders, 1 T. B. Mon. 267. Where an unsuccessful defence is made before a justice of the peace, and an appeal taken to the circuit court which is dismissed for some fault in the justice or clerk, the party may still have relief in chancery, and this is a just exception to the rule that when the party makes a defence in one court he shall not apply to the other. Cave v. Davis, 5 T. B. Mon. 394; Pearce v. Hedrick, 3 Litt. [Ky.] 109.

There is nothing then in the confession of the judgment, or in the execution of the mortgage, which precludes the defendant from setting up the usury in his defence. The remaining question is, whether the usury has been proved. Cummings has been examined as a witness in the case before he was a party, but to every interrogatory which required him to speak of the usury he refused to answer, on the ground that he could not do so without subjecting himself to a criminal prosecution under the statute. A witness who fears no disclosures will never shelter himself under such a principle, where his character is involved. If, with truth, he could have denied the charge of usury he would, by his own oath, have denied it. The other witnesses show that Tipton was embarrassed, and that he was liable to be imposed on by money lenders. But these do not conduce to establish the usury. The defendants' counsel insist that it is established by Tipton's answer. If the statements of this answer be true, in the creation of the debt demanded there was a shameless exorbitancy, as reckless of principle as of public opinion. By the advance of the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, disconnected with any other operation, in little more than two years, by renewing the loan, it was increased to the enormous sum of three thousand three hundred dollars. And the proof of this usury it is insisted is found in the answer of Tipton. So far as that answer is responsive to the bill, it is not only evidence, but evidence which can only be overcome by witnesses, or one witness and strong circumstances. The important inquiry then is, whether, in regard to the usury, the answer is responsive to the bill.

The first interrogatory above stated, and to which Tipton is especially called to answer, involves the consideration of the note and mortgage given by him to Cummings, and "whether the same were not made and executed for a good and valuable consideration, and as evidence of and security for a just and subsisting debt, or for what consideration were they made and executed." This inquiry is as broad as language could well make it. It would seem as if the draftsman of the bill was desirous of eliciting not only the facts in regard to the justice of the debt, but a full explanation of all the circumstances connected with it. For he asks, if the bond and mortgage were not executed as "evidence of and security for a just and subsisting debt, for what consideration and purpose were they executed." Now, in reference to this interrogatory, Tipton states that the above instruments were not given as evidence of and security for a just debt, and he goes on to explain the facts in support of this denial. The debt is shown to be unjust by the unconscionable and illegal exactions made by Cummings. And this is clearly within the scope of the interrogatory. In 1 Johns. 582, it is said, where the complainant in his bill inquired into the consideration of the assignment of a note, but asked nothing as to usury; and the defendant in his answer alleged usury, the indorsement of the note was held prima facie evidence of a full and adequate consideration, and the answer of the defendant not to be evidence of the usury which ought to be proved. If this be law, it does not apply to the case under consideration. For Tipton is not only called to answer as to the consideration of the note, but also as to the justice of such consideration. He answers it was unjust because it was usurious. Now, can it be pretended that the term usury is not responsive to the bill, because he was not specially called to answer whether or not the note was usurious. Might not Tipton, if such had been the fact, have answered that the note was unjust, because it was forged, or was given without any consideration, or was fraudulently obtained. This is as much a question of common sense as of law. In Woodcock v. Bennet, 1 Cow. 711, 742, the complainant prayed a specific performance under certain articles of agreement, which had come to the defendant's hands, and called on him to answer as to the making of the articles, how they were disposed of, and when, where, and under what pretences, he got possession of them. He answered admitting the articles, but alleged that by consent of the parties, the articles were rescinded, and the seals torn off; the court of errors held that the answer being responsive to the bill and within the discovery sought, was legal and competent evidence. To the same effect is Mason v. Roosevelt, 5 Johns. Ch. 534, 542, 543. In McCaw v. Blewit, 2 McCord, Eq. 90, 101, 102, the bill charged that certain advances had been made for the use of the defendant, who answered that he had given his note for all advancements, and though this was an affirmative fact in avoidance, yet it was held conclusive until disproved. Where an affirmative fact is set up in avoidance of an express allegation in the bill, it must be proved. But where such fact is within the discovery sought for, it is evidence. Some decisions, it is admitted, have gone so far as to hold that the answer is not evidence where it asserts a right affirmatively, in opposition to the plaintiff's demand. 1 Munf. 395. In the nature of things there can be no fixed rule on this point. Its decision must depend upon the words of the bill and of the answer. If the bill requires the defendant to answer whether he did not execute a certain note or bond, and the defendant admits the execution of it, and alleges that he paid it, the payment, not being within the interrogatory, must be proved. But if the bill allege that the note was given on a valuable consideration, and for a just and subsisting debt, the answer must be as to the justness of the debt and the facts of the consideration. In Reeks v. Postlethwaite, Coop. Ch. 161, an explanation, essentially connected with the answer to the bill, is held to be evidence.

As the interrogatory in the case under consideration required the defendant to state what the consideration was, and whether the note and mortgage were not given to Cummings for a subsisting and just debt, no doubt is entertained that a full response by the defendant not only authorised but required him to state fully the nature of the consideration. This he has done, and there is no proof against the statement in the answer, consequently that statement, which establishes the usury, is evidence. The mortgage to the complainants, on which this bill is filed, was given to secure the payment of the judgment, which was founded on the note infected with usury, of which the complainants had full notice. As has been already stated the judgment included the usurious interest. That interest amounted to the sum of three thousand three hundred dollars, deducting therefrom the sum of seven hundred and fifty dollars, which was the amount advanced by Cummings. The two years' indulgence, and the confession of the judgment, and the execution of the mortgage, was manifestly a plan adopted to avoid the effect of the usury by the complainants. It was substantially the substitution of a new security for the usurious note, and as the security retains the usury it is as fatally infected with the vice as the original note. Under such circumstances Tipton would not be precluded from filing his bill against the complainants and the other parties to the note, to set aside the mortgage. And if he might have done this, it is clear that he may set up the usury on a bill to foreclose the mortgage. Where the usurer, by an action at law, attempts to enforce the obligation, which is usurious, the court will sustain the defence, and will not require the defendant to pay the amount loaned, with legal interest. But where the borrower seeks relief on the ground of usury, by filing his bill, the payment of the sum loaned, with legal interest, is made a condition of his relief. And here a question arises, whether in this case, the payment of the sum borrowed by Tipton, with ten per cent. interest, ought to be exacted of him. If this were a bill for relief by him, he would be required to state that he had offered to pay the principal and interest, and the court would require the money to be brought into court, before relief would be decreed. This is a salutary and just mode of proceeding; and I do not perceive why the same thing may not be done in the present case. In the case above cited, of Roberts v. Goff, 4 Barn. & Ald. 92, where judgment had been entered on a warrant of attorney, and where there had been an agreement to give time, it was contended that the execution and judgment ought to be set aside, if the court had no doubt as to the usury, until the defendant had paid the money advanced, with legal interest, and the case of Hindle v. O'Brien, 1 Taunt. 413, was cited in support of the position. But the court overruled the case cited, and held that the instrument being void, the practice of the court had been otherwise. That being a case at law, in regard to practice, is different from the one now under consideration. The answer of the defendant sets up the usury, and admits the sum loaned, there is no difficulty, therefore, as to the relief to which he is entitled. And the question is, whether in this suit the defendant shall be required to pay the sums loaned, with interest, or the bill shall be dismissed, and the complainants or Cummings left to seek recourse against him by an action at law. The mortgage being infected with usury is void, as also the note on which the judgment was entered; no action can be sustained on either instrument, but Tipton is bound to pay the sum loaned, with interest, in equity; and this equity, by the assignments, may be considered as vested in the complainants. To give them a recourse against Eldridge & Cummings, for the original consideration of the note assigned to them by Eldridge, it may not be necessary to prosecute this equity. Their recourse must be complete, from the fact that the note was void. But no doubt is entertained that the complainants, in equity, may recover from Tipton the sum he may be bound to pay to Cummings. Then why may not the defendant be required to make such payment to the complainants, in the present case? The specific prayer of the bill is, a foreclosure and sale of the mortgaged premises. But there is a general prayer, under which, any relief in the premises, to which the complainants may be entitled, can be given. By requiring Tipton, in this case, to pay the amount for which he is liable, a circuity of action is avoided, and this is a cogent reason why the power should be exercised. In addition to this consideration, it keeps clear of the statute of limitations and other defences, which do not go to the merits of the case.

Upon the whole, it is ordered and decreed, that the defendant, Tipton, do pay to the complainants, or into the clerk's office, by the first day of the next term, the principal loaned by him from Cummings, with ten per cent. interest thereon. The interest to be calculated up to the time of giving each note, as stated in Tipton's answer, and to be added to the principal; and interest on the entire sum, to the next note, &c. Let the calculation be made by a master.

Case No. 9,810.

MORGAN v. VAN DYCK.

[7 Blatchf. 147;[1] 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 45.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1870.

UNITED STATES—MONEY FOR DISBURSEMENT TO ARMY—ACTION BY DISBURSING OFFICER AGAINST TREASURER.

1. Under the 5th, 6th and 10th sections of the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 59), and the act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 249), and the two sets of circular instructions issued by the secretary of the treasury on the 27th of May, 1857, and the act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stat. 593), and the circular of the treasury department of October 27, 1862, and the act of May 2, 1866 (14 Stat. 41), and the act of June 14, 1866 (Id. 64), and the circular of the treasury department of November 10, 1866, moneys of the United States placed in the hands of an assistant quartermaster in the United States army, for disbursement by him as a disbursing officer of the United States, and deposited by him with an assistant treasurer of the United States, continue still to be moneys of the United States.

[Cited in U. S. v. Morgan, 28 Fed. 50.]

2. Such assistant treasurer is not liable in assumpsit to such depositor for such moneys.

[3. Cited in U. S. v. National Bank of Republic, 2 D. C. 293, to the point that the United States only can sue a bank which is a designated depository of public moneys for a balance due.]

This was an action of assumpsit [by Robert C. Morgan against Henry H. Van Dyck] tried before the court without a jury.

Horace M. Ruggles, for plaintiff.

Benjamin K. Phelps, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought to recover the sum of $2,321.33, which the plaintiff alleges to be due to him from the defendant, as the balance, in the hands of the defendant, of moneys deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant during the year 1867, subject to draft on demand. At the time of the deposit of the moneys in question, the plaintiff was an assistant quarter-master in the United States' army, and the defendant was assistant treasurer of the United States at the city of New York. The moneys deposited were moneys of the United States, entrusted to the plaintiff for disbursement, as such assistant quarter-master, in payment of claims against the United States. On the merits, the defendant claims that he paid out the $2,321.33 on drafts or cheques drawn on him by the plaintiff therefor, and the plaintiff claims that such drafts or cheques were some of them forgeries of his signature, and some of them altered to larger amounts than their true amounts. Independently of the merits, however, the defendant claims that there can be no recovery against him in this action.

The 5th section of the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 59), provides for the appointment of an assistant treasurer of the United States, to be located at the city of New York. The 6th section provides, that every assistant treasurer shall keep safely all the public money at any time placed in his possession and custody, till the same is ordered by the proper department or officer of the government to be transferred or paid out, and, when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties, as fiscal agent of the government, which may be imposed by that or any other act of congress, or by any regulation of the treasury department made in conformity to law. The 10th section provides, that it shall be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to transfer the moneys in the hands of any assistant treasurer to the treasury of the United States; and, also, to transfer moneys in the hands of any assistant treasurer to any other depositary constituted by the act, at his discretion, and as the safety of the public moneys and the convenience of the public service shall seem to him to require. The act of March 3, 1857 (11 Stat. 249), amends the act of August 6, 1846, by providing that every disbursing officer or agent of the United States, having any money of the United States entrusted to him for disbursement, shall deposit the same with the treasurer of the United States, or with some one of the assistant treasurers or public depositaries, and draw for the same only in favor of the persons to whom payment is to be made in pursuance of law and instructions, except when payments are to be made in sums under twenty dollars; and that, for a failure to safely keep all moneys deposited by any disbursing officer or disbursing agent of the United States, the treasurer of the United States, assistant treasurer and public depositaries shall be held guilty of the crime of embezzlement of said moneys. For the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of this last-named act, the secretary of the treasury, on the 27th of May, 1857, issued two sets of circular instructions. One of them was addressed to the disbursing officers and disbursing agents employed under the direction of the treasury department, and directs those officers to deposit all public moneys advanced to them for disbursement, in their hands, or which may be remitted to them, with the nearest or most convenient public depositary, to their credit, to be paid out by such public depositary only upon their drafts or cheques in favor of the persons to whom payment is to be made. It further directs, that drafts and cheques upon public depositaries, drawn by disbursing officers or disbursing agents, shall not be returned to them after payment, but be held by the depositary subject to the order of the treasury department, and that the disbursing officer or disbursing agent shall be furnished, on application to the depositary, but not more frequently than once a month, with an official statement of his deposit account. The other set of circular instructions was addressed to the assistant treasurers and other public depositaries, and directs, that whenever any money shall be offered for deposit with them by any disbursing officer or disbursing agent of the United States, they shall receive it, and place the amount to the credit of such officer or agent on their books, subject to the drafts or cheques of such officer or agent only in favor of the persons to whom payment is to be made. It also directs that, whenever any disbursing officer or disbursing agent shall die or resign, or be superseded or removed, further payment of his drafts or cheques shall be at once stopped, and states that specific instructions will be given in such cases as to the payment of outstanding cheques and the disposal of the balance deposited to the credit of such officer or agent. It also contains directions as to furnishing the disbursing officer or disbursing agent, on request, with statements in detail showing the sums received for his credit, and the amounts paid out on his drafts or cheques, and directions that the drafts or cheques shall not be returned to the disbursing officers or disbursing agents after payment, but shall be kept in such manner as to be accessible if required by the accounting officers in the adjustment of the accounts of such officers or agents. On the 17th of July, 1862, an act was passed (12 Stat. 593), providing, that any officer or agent of the United States who shall receive public money which he shall not be authorized to retain as salary, pay or emolument, shall render monthly accounts thereof to the proper accounting officer of the treasury, and shall, in default thereof, be deemed a defaulter, and be subject to all the penalties prescribed by the 16th section of the act of August 6, 1846. By a circular issued by the treasury department on the 27th of October, 1862, and addressed to the assistant treasurer at New York, the attention of that officer is called to the act of July 17, 1862, and a strict compliance by him with the requirements of that act is enjoined upon him. By the act of May 2, 1866 (14 Stat. 41), it is provided, that all moneys represented by cheques or drafts issued by any disbursing officer of any department of the government of the United States, upon any assistant treasurer, where such moneys are represented on the books of the assistant treasurer as standing to the credit of such disbursing officer, and such drafts shall have been dated before July 1st, 1863, and shall have been issued in liquidation of a debt due from the United States, and shall remain outstanding on the 1st of July, 1866, shall be deposited by the treasurer of the United States, to be covered into the treasury by warrant, and that the like course shall be pursued, at the close of every fiscal year, in respect to all drafts and cheques which shall then have remained outstanding for three years or more. The act of the 14th of June, 1866 (14 Stat. 64), provides, that it shall be the duty of every disbursing officer of the United States having any public money entrusted to him for disbursement, to deposit the same with the treasurer or some one of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and to draw for the same only as it may be required for payments to be made by him pursuant to law, subject to the power of the secretary of the treasury to specially authorize such public money to be deposited or kept otherwise, under certain circumstances. This act provides for the punishment, as a felony of a violation of its provisions. On the 10th of November, 1866, a circular was issued by the treasury department, amending the circular of May 27th, 1857, by providing, that cheques drawn by disbursing officers or disbursing agents, who may die, resign, or be superseded or removed, shall be paid from funds on hand to their credit, unless the same have been drawn more than four months before their presentation, or there are reasons for suspecting fraud, or circumstances which would lead a judicious officer to decline to pay the same.

It is quite apparent, from these provisions of law and these regulations made by the treasury department, that moneys of the United States which were placed in the hands of the plaintiff for disbursement by him as a disbursing officer of the United States, were not the less public moneys belonging to the government of the United States, after they came to the hands of the plaintiff, and after they were deposited by the plaintiff, as such disbursing officer, with the defendant, as assistant treasurer of the United States, than they were before they reached the hands of the plaintiff. The moneys were never the property of the plaintiff. He is bound, indeed, to account for them to his superior officer; but, if he shows that he has, in compliance with the laws and the regulations, deposited them with a designated depositary, and that he has not withdrawn them from the custody of such depositary, he does account for them. To an action brought against him by the United States for such moneys, it is a complete defence for him to show such a state of facts. If, as was suggested at the trial, the plaintiff has paid a second time into the treasury of the United States the moneys which he so deposited with the defendant, that circumstance alone cannot create in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant a right of action which did not otherwise exist. The moneys were not voluntarily deposited by the plaintiff or voluntarily received by the defendant. There was nothing in the nature of a contract or agreement between the parties, which could be broken so as to lay a foundation for an action of assumpsit. For a breach of duty by the defendant in not paying genuine drafts by the plaintiff for moneys deposited, the defendant is responsible only to the common superior of both parties—the United States. The obligation of the defendant was created by law and not by contract and was an obligation to the United States and not to the plaintiff. I find for the defendant and direct a judgment to be entered in his favor, with costs.

CONTINUANCE — ISSUE NOT MADE — REQUEST OF DEFENDANT.

If at the last calling of a cause for trial, the issue be not made up, and no rule to plead has been laid, the court will continue the cause at the request of the defendant, although it be the fifth term after the appearance term.

This was the fifth term after the appearance term. A rule to declare had been laid on the plaintiff at the last term. The declaration was filed at this term. No rule to plead had been laid. The cause was now called for trial, it being the last time of calling the cause, according to the rule of the court. The plaintiff insisted upon plea and issue instanter. The defendant contended for a continuance.

THE COURT continued it. CRANCH, Circuit Judge, doubting; thinking the plaintiff ought to be nonsuit under the act of assembly of Maryland.

BANKRUPTCY—AMENDMENT TO SCHEDULES—CLOSE OF FIRST MEETING—CONDITIONS.

1. A bankrupt cannot amend his schedules, by adding other names to the list of creditors, as of course, after the warrant, and after the close of the business of the first meeting.

2. The register may report provisionally as to the conditions on which the amendments should be allowed.

[In the matter of John Morganthal, a bankrupt.]

CADWALADER, District Judge. The petition of this bankrupt returns, of unsecured debts, in Schedule A 3, eleven items for, together, about six hundred dollars. He now applies to amend by adding to the list twenty other debts, for amounts together exceeding that sum in a small amount. He proposes, at the same time, to add, by way of amendment, six items of outstanding credits, not in the original schedules of his estate, to the amount of, together, $314.25, which is not a small proportional addition to the property at first disclosed. The register seems to be of opinion that amendments of this kind should be allowed, as of course, after the warrant, and after the close of the business of the first meeting. This would be a very dangerous practice, where such culpable laxity is indicated as this case exhibits. The clerk will send to him a copy of the register's and court's opinions, in the Case of Ratcliffe [Case No. 11,578], 2d and 23d November, 1867. The amendments asked for in the present case cannot be allowed, except upon such conditions as may prevent injustice to creditors. What those conditions ought to be may be reported provisionally by the register. There certainly must be a new list of creditors made out and sent to every known creditor, with a notice of the amendment of the schedule of property. Whether a new warrant will be necessary, depends upon the question, whether a new general notice by publication will be requirable. On this point the register's report will furnish the materials for a decision.

VOLUNTARY PETITION BY PARTNERS — CONSTRUCTION OF THE 14TH SECTION OF THE ACT OF 1841.

[In the matter of Moritz and Pinner, bankrupts.]

Various objections were interposed by creditors to a decree of bankruptcy being rendered, only two of which were particularly pressed in this stage of the case. The petitioners, many years since, were bankers and partners in Germany, where it is charged, they became insolvent fraudulently, and afterwards absconded to the United States. Their partnership was dissolved before they left Germany, and was never renewed in this country, nor have they contracted any joint debts here. All their partnership debts were contracted in Europe, to foreign creditors. The petition was joint and several, praying a decree of bankruptcy in their favor as copartners, and also in behalf of each partner, individually.

James F. Brady, for petitioners.

P. J. Joachemssen and Charles Edwards, for creditors.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The court did not discuss the point, whether foreign partners could become voluntarily bankrupt here in respect to debts, creditors, and estate, entirely foreign, but decided, that partners, as such, could not by voluntary petition be declared bankrupts, except under the 14th section; that, if the provisions of that section are applicable at all to the case of voluntary bankruptcy, they are so only in the case of those who, at the time the petition is presented, are partners; that no number less than the whole of a firm can petition for a decree of voluntary bankruptcy under the 1st section, and that it is at least doubtful whether the application of that section is not limited to cases of compulsory bankruptcy in respect to copartnerships; that in case of compulsory bankruptcy, the same reasons would not exist for restricting proceedings to cases of existing partnerships, and, accordingly, the decision in this case is not to be considered as prejudging that point. The court further decided that proceedings in bankruptcy as at law, and in equity, could not be conducted in the united names of parties who have no common interest, and do not seek a common decree, that individuals cannot associate and make a joint and several petition, with a view to a separate decree, in favor of each applicant, and that accordingly the petition, in this case being disallowed as to the two petitioners conjointly, could not avail them individually; and it was dismissed with costs; with leave, however, to amend it, if that could be done without varying its essential structure and statements, so as to retain it as the sole petition of one of the parties, at their election, between themselves.

CUSTOM DUTIES — MANUFACTURERS OF COTTON — LUSTRES — ARTICLES COMPOSED OF TWO OR MORE MATERIALS — STATUTES — REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

1. Linen lustres, camlet lustres, toile du nord, and lustres, composed of linen and cotton, are, under the tariff act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 42), chargeable with a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem, under Schedule D, as "Manufactures composed wholly of cotton not otherwise provided for."

[Cited in U. S. v. United States Tel. Co., Case No. 16,603; Cohen v. Phelps, Id. 2,964.]

2. They are subject to this classification, under the provision of section 20 of the tariff act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 565), that "on all articles manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of its component parts may be chargeable;" which section 20 is not repealed, either directly or by necessary implication, by the act of 1846.

[Cited in Lottimer v. Lawrence, Case No. 8,521; Barnard v. Morton, Id. 1,005; U. S. v. United States Tel. Co., Id. 16,603; Cohen v. Phelps, Id. 2,964.]

3. The effect of said section 20 is not to impose a duty on an article not provided for in the act of 1846, or a different duty from that act; but it simply gives a rule of construction, to determine under what schedule in the act of 1846 a given article shall be ranged for the purpose of charging the duty.

4. The act of 1846 is limited almost exclusively to establishing the rates of duty chargeable, leaving to laws then existing to provide for the assessment and collection.

5. A statute can be repealed only by an express provision of a subsequent law, or by necessary implication; the two must be so repugnant that they cannot stand together or be consistently reconciled, and then the later one will prevail.

lector of the port of New York, to recover back an excess of duties paid by the plaintiffs, on certain goods known in trade and commerce as linen lustres, camlet lustres, toile du nord, and lustres, and composed of linen and cotton. They were charged with a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem under Schedule D of the tariff act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 46), on the ground that by section 20 of the tariff act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 565), they were chargeable under said Schedule D as "manufactures composed wholly of cotton, not otherwise provided for." The plaintiffs claimed that they were liable to a duty of only 20 per cent. ad valorem, under section 3 of the act of 1846, as a non-enumerated article. A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on a case to be made.

J. Prescott Hall, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. It is admitted that, if the commercial designation is to govern, the articles in question in this case are not enumerated in any one of the schedules given in the act of 1846, and would of course fall within the third section of that act. But it is insisted, on the part of the defendant, that construing the act of 1846 in connection with the twentieth section of the act of 1842, the articles are chargeable with the highest rate of duty imposed by the former upon manufactures composed wholly of any one of the materials from which such articles are manufactured; and that, being composed of linen and cotton, they fall under Schedule D of the act of 1846, which charges a duty of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem upon manufactures of cotton.

That part of the twentieth section of the act of 1842 which is claimed to be still in force, is as follows: "And on all articles manufactured from two or more materials, the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of its component parts may be chargeable." This provision was first introduced in the tariff act of September 11, 1841 (5 Stat. 464, § 2), and reversed the general rule of construction adopted in favor of commerce, which was to rate the article according to that component part of it which was subject to the lowest duty.

It is insisted on the part of the plaintiff, that this twentieth section is either directly or by necessary implication repealed by the act of 1846, and must therefore be disregarded in expounding its provisions. The eleventh section of the latter act provides: "That all acts and parts of acts repugnant to the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby repealed." The first section declares: "That from and after the first day of December next, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, and on such as may now be exempt from duty, there shall be levied, &c., the following rates of duty." Then follows a list of schedules, extending from letters A to I of the alphabet, containg an enumeration of all articles subject to duty, with the rate to be imposed, and also of the free list exempt from duty. The third section declares, that there shall be levied and collected on all articles not specially provided for in the act, a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

It must be admitted, therefore, that every article imported into the country, which is chargeable with any duty to the government, is either specially enumerated in the several schedules in the act of 1846, or falls within the third section, as non-enumerated, and pays the duty there prescribed; and that, when it is claimed a duty is chargeable upon an article, as being particularly specified, that article must be found under some one or other of the schedules above mentioned. It was the policy of the act: 1. To enumerate all articles specially upon which different rates of duties were to be levied; and 2. To impose a uniform rate upon all articles not enumerated. This is quite obvious from a careful perusal of its several provisions.

But, admitting all this, it by no means necessarily follows that the clause referred to in the twentieth section of the act of 1842 is not still in force, or is repugnant to or inconsistent with the provisions or policy of the act of 1846. The effect of the clause is not to impose a duty upon an article which is not provided for in the act of 1846, or a duty different from the one there intended to be imposed. This was not the object or effect of it as applied to the act of 1842, in which it was incorporated. That clause enacts simply a principle or rule of construction, which, when applied to a dutiable article, determines within what class it should be rated. In other words, speaking with reference to the act of 1846, it determines under what schedule the article should be ranged for the purpose of charging the duty.

The article in question will illustrate our view. It is a manufacture of linen and cotton, and, as such, does not fall within any of the articles specially described in any of the schedules in the act of 1846. Of course, it would be charged, under the third section of that act, with a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem, as a non-enumerated article. But, if we apply the rule of construction provided for in the twentieth section of the act of 1842, namely, that on articles manufactured from two or more materials the duty shall be assessed at the highest rates at which any of its component parts may be chargeable, then it is an article enumerated under Schedule D of the act of 1846, being classed, by reason of such construction, as a manufacture "composed wholly of cotton, not otherwise provided for." It is proper to remark, that the words "not otherwise provided for" mean, "not otherwise provided for among the enumerated articles"; for, if the words were also intended to include the residuary clause embraced in the third section, the duty of twenty-five per cent. could not be charged even upon manufactures composed wholly of cotton.

Suppose this clause of the twentieth section had been incorporated in the act of 1846; there surely would not have been anything in it repugnant to or even inconsistent with the provisions of that act. On the contrary, it would have been in aid of it, prescribing a rule by which to determine under what enumerated head to range an article of a given manufacture.

It is true that, in many instances, the manufactured article consisting of two or more component materials is specifically enumerated and provided for in the act of 1846; and it has been argued, that this implies an exclusion of any other mode of ascertaining the duty chargeable upon articles of this description. But it will be seen, on looking into the act of 1842, in which the clause was expressly incorporated, that articles of a similar description were frequently specially provided for there; notwithstanding which, the clause was deemed material. Instances of that kind are not as frequent in the act of 1842 as in that of 1846, but they are sufficiently so to afford a full answer to the argument.

There are, too, many other sections in the act of 1842 still in force besides the one in question; and which are among the most essential in providing for the levying and collecting of the proper amount of duties chargeable on the imported article—such as the sixteenth and seventeenth sections.

The act of 1846 is limited almost exclusively to the establishment of the rates of duty chargeable on the goods, leaving to the laws already in existence to provide for the assessment and collection of the same. We must, therefore, distinguish carefully between those provisions of former laws that are repealed, and those that are not, in order to carry out the intention of congress, and ensure a full and complete operation of the revenue system.

The general principle is, that a statute can be repealed only by an express provision of a subsequent law, or by necessary implication. The two acts must be repugnant to each other, so much so that they cannot stand together, or be consistently reconciled with each other; then, the latter, being the latest expression of the will of the law-maker, must prevail.

There being no necessary repugnancy here, but the contrary, we perceive no ground for holding that the clause referred to in the twentieth section of the act of 1842 has been repealed. Consequently, the proper rate of duty on the articles in question in this case was that imposed and paid. Judgment for defendant.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—VALUE OF GOODS—APPRAISERS' VALUATION — TIME OF EXPORT — TIME OF PURCHASE.

Where, on an invoice of woollen goods from Paris, the appraisers took, as a guide to their valuation, the market price of the goods in the principal markets of France at the period of exportation, and, on their report, the value was raised 10 per cent. and more above the invoice value, and, for that cause, 50 per cent. on the amount of legal duties was added thereto, pursuant to section 17 of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), held, that under section 16 of the said act, the appraisers were required to appraise the goods at their value at the time of purchase, and that the appraisement was void, and that the duties on the increase in valuation, and the penalty, were illegally exacted.

[Cited in U. S. v. Doherty, 27 Fed. 733.]

This was an action brought in the supreme court of New York, to recover back an excess of duties, and a penalty imposed by the defendant [Cornelius W. Lawrence], as collector of the port of New York, on an invoice of fifteen cases of woollen goods, imported by the plaintiff [Charles Morlot]. It was removed into this court by certiorari.

The invoice was dated Paris, June 15th, 1845, and the entry was made at the custom-house, July 31st, 1845. On appraisement, the goods were valued at an average of 20¼ per cent. above the invoice prices, the appraisers, in valuing the various cases, putting the lowest difference at 10 $^{2}/_{10}$ per cent., and the highest at 35 $^{7}/_{10}$ per cent. They took the market price of the goods in the principal markets of France at the period of exportation to the United States, as a guide to their valuation. On the report of the appraisers, the value was raised 10 per cent. and more above the invoice value, and, for that cause, 50 per cent. on the amount of legal duties was added thereto, pursuant to section 17 of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 564). Against these charges a protest, with the proper distinctness and precision, was made in writing by the plaintiff, and he now sought to recover back all exacted of him beyond the legal duties on the invoice valuation.

BETTS, District Judge. The appraisement was void in law, and did not justify the defendant in imposing and exacting duties on a valuation higher than the invoice valuation, or in levying any additional duties thereto. The appraisers were required, by the 16th section of the act of August 30th, 1842 (5 Stat. 563), to appraise the goods at their value at the time of purchase, and the instructions of the secretary of the treasury did not authorize them to appraise the value at the time of exportation. The illegality having been specifically pointed out to the defendant by the protest, he is liable for the exaction made under the appraisement.

COLLISION—FOG—LOOKOUT—TOW-BOAT LICENSE—PASSENGER—DAMAGES—APPORTIONMENT—DETENTION—INTEREST.

1. What degree of care must be used on rivers in the navigation of steamboats, in order to avoid collisions?

2. Under the navigation laws of the United States requiring different licenses for passenger boats and tow-boats, a boat licensed as a tow-boat does not violate those laws by carrying a single passenger, and does not, for that cause, lose her redress for an injury done her by a collision.

3. A steam-tug is not within the rule prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors under the act of congress requiring a steamer when running in a fog to sound her fog whistle. But it may often be her duty to do so under general principles of admiralty law.

4. The rules prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors touching necessary care in navigation are not exclusive. Under the general maritime law there are many other rules equally imperative.

5. If the navigators of a vessel by their negligence directly contribute to her injury by a collision, her owner cannot recover the full amount of his loss. If both boats are in fault, the damage is apportioned.

6. It seems that, in navigating our rivers, a lookout at the stern of the vessel is not required, except when she is backing.

7. In measuring damages in a case of collision, all the direct and immediate consequences should be considered.

8. In settling the amount of the damages in a case of collision, the detention of the injured vessel while undergoing repairs ought to be regarded.

9. A steamer, while towing four barges laden with goods, suffered an injury by a collision with another steamer. The libel did not state to whom the barges and the goods they carried belonged. Held, that the libellant could not recover for the delay to the barges and their lading occasioned by the collision.

10. On damages sustained by a collision, interest should be allowed from the day on which the injury happened till the day when judgment is rendered for them.

In admiralty.

T. D. Lincoln, for libellant.

T. W. Gibson, for respondents.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is a proceeding to recover for a steamboat collision on the river Ohio. John Cobb, the libellant, charges that on the 31st of October, 1864, he was the owner of the steamer Crescent City engaged in the carrying trade on the rivers Ohio and Mississippi; that while in that business, and while his boat was being landed at Dixon's Bend, about three miles below the city of Evansville, the steamer Morning Star collided with the Crescent City, damaging her to the amount of eight thousand five hundred dollars; and that this collision was occasioned by the negligence of the managers of the Morning Star.

Zachariah Shirley, the president, and Joseph H. Bruce, the superintendent, of the Louisville and Evansville United States Mail Line Company, intervene for themselves and for the owners of the Morning Star, and answer, admitting the collision, but denying the negligence charged, and averring that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of the persons in charge of the Crescent City, and claiming that damage done to the Morning Star by that collision ought to be adjudged against the libellant.

The evidence in the cause is very voluminous, and, in several points, very conflicting. I gather from it the following facts:

On the night of October the 30th, 1864, both the boats lay at the Evansville wharf. Both were bound on voyages down the Ohio. The Crescent City had in tow four or five hay and coal boats. At about five and a half o'clock next morning, she pursued her way down the river about three miles into Dixon's Bend, where, discovering before her a heavy fog, she stopped her wheels preparatory to landing on the Kentucky side. She had been running about seven miles an hour.

Soon after her departure from Evansville, the Morning Star also followed, running about twelve miles an hour, and overtook the Crescent City about three miles below Evansville. The Crescent City was built for a tow-boat; the Morning Star was a very swift passenger boat. Each was duly licensed,—the one as a tow-boat, the other as a passenger boat.

From the time the boats left Evansville till the collision, no person on either boat saw the other boat till a moment before the accident. The morning was clear and fine. There was little fog on the river above the place of the collision. Both boats had a full complement of officers and men. Neither of them sounded a fog whistle before the collision. Neither of them had a stern lookout. On the Crescent City, Brasher, the pilot, was at his proper place, and Bush, the captain, was standing on the deck just before the pilot-house, both keeping a careful observation ahead. On the Morning Star, the pilot, Daulley, was the only lookout, and was at his proper place. It was at that hour the turn for Barr, the mate, to keep a lookout ahead; and on leaving Evansville he took his proper place for that purpose; but sometime before the collision he abandoned his post, went into the texas, and remained there till the accident happened.

The bank of fog in Dixon's Bend could plainly have been seen by the lookouts on each boat when they were from a quarter to a half mile above it. At the time of the collision, the Crescent City had been floating with her wheels stopped, in the upper edge of this bank of fog, about five minutes, and was in the usual channel, about one hundred feet from the Kentucky shore. At the moment of collision, the proper officer was just about to ring up the hands to land her. The river at that point was about a half mile wide, and the channel about three hundred yards wide. The Morning Star, without checking her speed, ran into this bank of fog; and at the moment of doing so, her pilot discovered the Crescent City just ahead, and instantly rang his bell to stop; but it was too late. The ringing and the collision were nearly simultaneous. The Morning Star struck the Crescent City with great force, five or six feet forward of the stern-post on the starboard side, carrying away the after-guard, staving in the hull a few inches above the water some twenty feet in length, carrying away the water-wheel beam, plummer block, gallows frame, and starboard wheel, and was checked up on the after end of the cylinder timbers. The disabled boat was immediately landed on the Kentucky shore, and the Morning Star, after pausing a few minutes, pursued her way down the river. Both boats were somewhat injured by the collision; but the injury to the Crescent City was far the greater.

I think that the evidence satisfactorily establishes all the foregoing facts. And from them two inquiries arise, namely: Did any fault on the part of the managers of the Morning Star directly contribute to the collision? Did any fault of those on board of the Crescent City directly contribute to it?

I. As to the Morning Star: We have seen that, though the Morning Star, in passing from Evansville to the place of the collision, must have been most of the time in sight of the Crescent City, and a part of the time very near her, yet no person on the former boat saw the latter that morning till a moment before the accident. How shall we account for this remarkable fact? The morning was bright. Daylight had dawned when the first boat rounded out from the Evansville wharf. There was scarcely any fog between that wharf and the place of the disaster. The river there is straight enough to give an unobstructed view in most places through a distance of a mile. At the sharpest bend there, the view of the channel is unobstructed for at least a quarter of a mile. The Crescent City was not in the fog over five minutes. The collision occurred about sunrise. In view of these facts, it seems to me certain that if any lookout on the Morning Star had diligently watched ahead, he must have seen the Crescent City nearly all the way down till she entered the fog bank. For a portion of the way, the boats, while yet both in a clear atmosphere, must have been in close proximity. To me it is evident that the only possible reason why the Crescent City was not seen, before she entered the fog, by the pilot of the Morning Star, is that he omitted properly to look ahead. If he had looked before him, he would undoubtedly have seen the Crescent City, and have avoided the disaster. The omission to do so was gross negligence, and contributed directly to the collision.

Now, it is clear that at the time of this collision, and for sometime before, the only lookout on the Morning Star was the pilot, Daulley. The captain, Bruce, was in bed, asleep. Barr, the mate, whose duty it was to be on the lookout, tells us himself that he "went into the texas when the boat got straightened down the river between the wharf-boat and the mouth of Pigeon creek." He "went in to change his boots." He left no one to watch in his place. He remained in the texas till the collision. He says he was in the texas before the accident while his boat ran half a mile; and I think the evidence shows it is a good deal more than half a mile from the mouth of Pigeon creek to the place of the collision; it is probably more than two miles. All this time he was neglecting his duty; and this neglect was manifestly a proximate cause of the disaster.

But even if Daulley and Barr had both been at their proper places and keeping a vigilant lookout, I think the Morning Star is chargeable with gross negligence in plunging into the fog bank at the speed at which she did, without giving any notice of her approach. The counsel for the respondents insists that the Crescent City was enveloped in dense, impenetrable fog; and so many of the witnesses swear. Is it careful navigation for any boat, even after she has sounded her whistle, to rush, as the Morning Star did, into an impenetrable fog bank at the rate of twelve miles an hour?

There is, indeed, much contradiction between the witnesses touching the density of the fog. But, so far as the duty of the Morning Star is concerned, I do not see how the truth on that point can make any difference. She was in fault whether the fog was dense or not. If it was very dense, she acted recklessly in running into it with such speed; if it was not dense, her managers, if they had kept a proper lookout, would have seen the Crescent City in time to have prevented the collision.

In taking this latter view, I do not consider as important the fact proved, that under an act of congress the proper board of supervising inspectors had promulgated a rule, then in force, to the effect that, "when a steamer is running in a fog or thick weather, it shall be the duty of the pilot to sound his steam whistle at intervals not exceeding two minutes." It is not important to inquire whether the Morning Star, at the time of this collision, was in a condition in which the spirit of this rule would reach her. For if no such special rule had existed, it would have been, on general principles of maritime law, a reckless and unjustifiable act thus to plunge into such a fog, at the rate of twelve miles an hour, without sounding the steamer's whistle or giving any other warning of her approach.

I conclude, therefore, that the negligence of the managers of the Morning Star directly contributed to the disaster in question. Moreover, both by the evidence and the law of the land, nothing is clearer than that the pilot alone is not a sufficient lookout ahead on steamers. The evidence of several of the witnesses shows that this is true. And a high American authority declares that "in respect to a lookout, it is not enough that a person is stationed in the pilot-house for that purpose; but a vigilant watch should be placed in the forward part of the steamer, so situated as to be able to discern vessels at the earliest moment." Pars. Mar. Law, 198, 199. And this is settled law in the supreme court of the United States. St. John v. Paine, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 557; The Genessee Chief v. Fitzhugh, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443. In the case of The Europa, 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 557, it was held that a steamer going at the rate of twelve and a half knots an hour, in a dense fog, seven hundred miles from land, must have the most complete lookout that can be adopted; and that merely one lookout on the bridge, a quartermaster on the top gallant forecastle, one at the wheel, and another at the con, was not a sufficient lookout. It may, indeed, be said that this last case differs from the one at bar, as being the case of a steamer navigating the ocean. But it may well be answered that there is more danger of collisions in navigating the Ohio amid a fog, where all passing boats must keep within a comparatively narrow channel, than on the ocean where the channel is as wide as the sea itself.

II. Did any fault of those on board of the Crescent City contribute to the accident? It appears by the evidence that this steamer was fully manned. Her captain was on the lookout before the pilot-house. Her pilot was at his post giving due attention. And her engineers were both at their places promptly responding to orders. The captain especially seems to have been acting with proper care. He swears that as they proceeded from Evansville "there was a light, misty fog on the river, but not so that we considered it dangerous to run. We could easily see either shore. When we got down into Dixon's Bend, there was a heavy bank of fog ahead of us about three quarters of a mile; and we ran close into the Kentucky shore, about seventy-five or one hundred feet from the shore, preparatory to landing. Our calculation was to stop and let her lose her headway, and then back her in. About a minute or a minute and a half after we rung our bell to stop, the Morning Star ran into us." This has the appearance of a simple, reasonable, truthful story. It is uncontradicted by any witness, and it challenges my belief. And indeed I cannot see that there is the slightest evidence of any fault on the part of the Crescent City, except in three particulars which are earnestly and ably urged by the respondents' counsel. To these we will now attend.

1. It is urged that at the time of the collision, the Crescent City was carrying passengers; that she was not licensed as a passenger boat according to the act of congress; that she was therefore unlawfully in the place where she was injured; and that, consequently, she has no legal right to demand redress for that injury.

If this boat was really a passenger boat within the meaning of the acts of congress on the subject of licensing steam vessels, it must, in view of the decision in the case of The Maverick [Case No. 9,316], be a very serious question whether the libellant can, under any circumstances, succeed in this cause.

But was the Crescent City "a carrier of passengers" within the purview of the acts of congress? It is certain that she was licensed merely as a tow-boat. It is in proof by Joseph C. Small, a witness for the libellant, that he was a passenger on her. He swears thus: "I was a passenger. I got on board at Louisville, and was going to Shawneetown. I had charge of the barges on the trip before." This is all the evidence touching passengers. Does it make the boat a passenger boat within the purview of the acts of congress? It does not appear that he paid for his passage. As he had been in charge of the barges on the last trip of the boat, it might be fair to infer that he was carried gratis. If what he relates makes the Crescent City a passenger boat, then every vessel, licensed merely as a freight or tow-boat, must at its peril see that no human being not an employé shall, under any circumstances, go a single mile on board of it. I have met with no authority on this point. But I think the act of congress should receive a more liberal construction. I think that no single individual passing on a tow-boat from one point to another on the line of its voyage, whether he goes gratis or not, would make it a passenger boat within the meaning of the law. "One swallow does not make a summer." I suppose the law, in mentioning boats "carrying passengers," means at least more than one passenger, and probably includes such vessels only as make the carrying of passengers a business, or at least hold themselves out to the public as such carriers. I think, therefore, that this objection ought not to prevail.

2. It is contended on the part of the defense that, under the circumstances, the Crescent City ought to have sounded her fog whistle. It seems pretty clear that the rules prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors under the act of congress which requires steamers when running in fog to sound their steam whistles, does not apply to tow-boats. See Act Aug. 30, 1852, § 43 (10 Stat. 61).

And if the act did apply to such vessels, it might be doubted whether the Crescent City, when she had stopped her wheels and was preparing to land, could be said to be running in fog within the meaning of said rule. Yet it may be urged with much reason that, without any special rule under said act, any vessel may be in such a condition as to make it her duty to give warning by sounding her steam whistle. Of this there can be no doubt. It were absurd to suppose that since the promulgation of the rules prescribed by the board of supervising inspectors, a due observance of all those rules includes every duty devolving on the navigators of steamers. When none of these special rules apply, the more general rules of admiralty law govern; and one of these rules is that "a plaintiff in a cause of collision must prove both care on his own part, and the want of it in the defendant." 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 529. And it is clear that if the plaintiff by his negligence substantially contributes to the collision, he must at least bear half the loss. Sills v. Brown, 9 Car. & P. 601.

It is, then, a grave question whether the Crescent City, under the circumstances of the case, omitted the exercise of proper care by not sounding her whistle, and thereby substantially contributed to the collision. What is proper care, depends on the particular circumstances of each case. In the case at bar, it appears that when the captain of the Crescent City discovered ahead of her a fog bank, he determined to land, and was, with reasonable diligence, preparing to do so. He stopped the wheels, ran, as he swears, "close into the Kentucky shore, about seventy-five or one hundred feet from the shore, preparatory to landing," and was about to ring up the hands for that purpose when the collision occurred. All this seems to have been proper care. But his boat was in the usual channel, and was in a fog; ought then the whistle to have been sounded? This must, I think, depend, to a great extent, on the density of the fog, as the captain and pilot then saw and judged of it. There is no doubt that these two men were keeping a proper lookout; nor is there any question as to their skill. One of them thought and spoke about sounding the whistle; and he swears that he did not deem the fog so dense as to require it. A number of witnesses in the defense, indeed, testify that the fog was extremely dense. And so it may have seemed to them, and may have been, at the moment when, and the point from which, they observed it. But, on the other hand, the captain, the pilots, the first and second engineers, the carpenter, and several other witnesses, all of whom were on the Crescent City, and seem to have had fair opportunity to observe, swear that the fog in which they were was not very dense, that they could see plainly all around them, and that they could see even the shores on both sides of the river. Now as I have said in regard to the witnesses on the defense, I suppose I may justly say in relation to these witnesses, what they thus state may have seemed to be the fact, and may have been the fact, at the moment when, and at the point from which, they observed the fog. Under these circumstances, the captain and the pilot at the wheel say that they judged the sounding of the whistle to be unnecessary. It may be that they would have judged otherwise if they had seen things as the witnesses for the defense say they saw them. It may even be that they judged unwisely. It can hardly be believed that they intentionally erred. They acted, I think, on good motives and on their best judgment. I suppose, therefore, that, under the circumstance, they are not chargeable with any negligence in not sounding the fog whistle.

3. It is urged in defense, that the Crescent City was guilty of carelessness in not having a lookout at her stern at the time of the disaster. Excluding from consideration the depositions on this point, taken since the submission of this cause, I think the weight of the evidence is, that the omission of a stern lookout was not, under the circumstances of the case, want of due care. Such a lookout is certainly unusual; and it appears that experts deem it unnecessary, except when the steamer is backing or running astern. Nor do I see how, if there had been such a lookout, he could have prevented the collision. I think there is nothing in this point.

It remains only to settle the amount of damages in which the Morning Star ought to be condemned. In measuring damages in a case of collision all the direct and immediate consequences are to be taken into consideration. 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 204. Whether damages ought to be allowed for the detention of the injured vessel while undergoing repairs, was formerly much questioned. And the United States supreme court once ruled against the allowance. Smith v. Condry, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 28. But the contrary doctrine is now settled. Barrett v. Williamson [Case No. 1,051]; Williamson v. Barret, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101; 1 Pars. Mar. Law, 204, note 2.

Whether, under the circumstances of the present case, anything ought to be allowed for the detention of the four boats which the Crescent City had in tow at the occurrence of the disaster, may be a question of doubt. The libel alleges that the libellant was the owner of the Crescent City; but it fails to tell us who owned the barges she had in tow. Its only averment on the point is, "that at the time of the said injury the said Crescent City had four barges in tow,—three loaded with hay, and one with coal,—which were being taken to Memphis to be delivered to the United States government there." From this language, I rather infer that these barges with their contents were the property of the government; and, if so, I think it clear that the libellant can not recover for their detention. Therefore, I shall allow nothing for the detention of the barges.

As to the detention of the Crescent City for necessary repairs, I have no hesitation in allowing damages. To determine how much ought to be allowed for this is, however, a little difficult. On this point there are but two witnesses, Capt. Bush, and the pilot, Brashier, and they differ both as to charter value per day and the time of the detention.

As to the value per day, Bush puts it at one hundred and twenty-five dollars, and Brashier at one hundred. They appear to be equally competent to judge of that question. Under such circumstances, I deem it best to follow Lord Bacon's rule, namely, that, in a question of doubt as to value, the lowest sum shall be taken. I shall therefore allow one hundred dollars per day for the time of detention.

Touching the time during which the boat was necessarily detained for repairs, Bush says it was thirty days, and Brashier swears it was about twenty. Bush superintended the repairs every day but one, and kept the accounts, and paid the bills; and being captain of the boat, he would be more likely to know the exact time than the pilot Brashier. I think, therefore, he is the more reliable witness as to the time, and I shall follow him on this point, and allow for thirty days' detention for necessary repairs.

Then, the amount of damages for the detention, to effect the necessary repairs, will be three thousand dollars. On this sum I will allow interest from the 31st of October, 1864, to this day,—two hundred and seventy-one dollars and fifty cents.

As to the expense of repairs, including work, materials, loss of time and boarding of crew, &c., Capt. Bush, who kept the account and paid out these expenses, is the only witness. He gives the various items in his deposition, and being uncontradicted, and apparently fair, I allow them as they stand on his testimony, at thirty-seven hundred and seven dollars and twenty-six cents.

On this sum I allow interest from December 1, 1864, to this day,—three hundred and sixteen dollars and forty-four cents. The aggregate is seven thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars and twenty cents. I therefore assess the libellant's damages at the sum of seven thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars and twenty cents. And the proper judgment will be rendered in favor of John Cobb, the libellant, for this amount, and also for the costs of this suit.

NOTE. At common law, if both vessels are in fault, neither can recover in the case, though the fault be ever so unequal; while in admiralty the loss is equally divided. See 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 525, 526, and note 1 et seq., for an exhaustive collection of authorities. If one of the colliding vessels is guilty of some fault, she must show fault in the other, and that her own negligence was not the cause of collision. Ward v. The Fashion [Case No. 17,154]; 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 529, and note 2. The proper position of a lookout is generally forward, but reference must be had in all cases to the question whether the lookout could not see as well where he was as in any other position. The Emma, Holt, Rule of Road, 209. If the collision was not owing to the absence of a watch the vessel will not be considered in fault. Mellon v. Smith, 2 E. D. Smith, 462. "Whether damages are to be allowed for the detention of the injured vessel while undergoing repairs, may not be certain; but the later, and we think the better, mode allows them." 1 Pars. The MORNING STAR.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 8, 1868.

SALVAGE — CORPORATION ORGANIZED TO PERFORM SALVAGE SERVICE—RATE OF COMPENSATION ALLOWED.

Where a corporation, having authority, by its charter, to own vessels to be employed in saving vessels wrecked or in distress, and to take all compensation and salvages which, by law and usage, enure to private persons, was employed by the owners of a vessel which had gone on shore in a fog, to relieve her from a situation of peril, and did so: Held, that compensation for the service ought to be allowed to the corporation on the principle of allowing a liberal compensation for the use of the apparatus furnished, and for the skill with which it was handled in the service performed, but not on the principles governing the rate of compensation in the case of a salvage service. In this case, the court allowed what it regarded as a reasonable compensation for the work and labor performed and the materials used.

[Cited in The J. F. Farlan, Case No. 7,313; The Stratton Audley, Id. 13,530. Cited, but not followed, in The Birdie, Id. 1,432. Cited in Baker v. Hemenway, Id. 770.]

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in rem, filed in the district court, to recover salvage for saving the steamship Morning Star, which ran aground on Deal Beach shore, New Jersey, about forty miles from the city of New York, on the 31st of July, 1863. The vessel was valued at $150,000, and her cargo at $200,000. The libellants were a corporation created under the laws of the state of New York, with authority to own vessels to be employed in "towing, aiding, protecting, and saving vessels and cargoes wrecked or in distress, wherever such wrecks occur, on the high seas, or in the various arms of the seas, rivers running to the same," &c. The act of incorporation also allowed the company, among other things, to "take all compensation, towages, and salvages which are customary and usual, and which, by law and usage, enure to private persons," &c. The district court awarded to the libellants $2,500, and interest, and the libellants appealed to this court.

Clifford A. Hand, for libellants.
Robert D. Benedict, for claimants.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The libellants were employed by the owners of the Morning Star to go down from the city of New York and relieve her from her perilous situation on the beach. This was done with expedition and skill, by the use of appliances kept on hand by the company. The vessel had gone on the beach in a fog, and, although there was a considerable swell upon the sea, the wind was light, and very little difficulty was encountered in towing her from the sandbar on which she grounded and setting her afloat. She sustained no injury.

The court below allowed, as compensation to the company, for the service rendered, $2,500, and interest. There is evidence in the case that the owners of the vessel, when applied to by the company to perform the service, had inquired as to the expense; and that, although no definite answer was given, $2,000 or $2,500 was suggested as the probable amount. There is no proof in the case but that this would be a reasonable compensation, as for work and labor; that is, there is no evidence to the contrary. As a salvage service, I think the sum allowed was inadequate, upon the principles governing the rate of compensation in that class of cases.

The learned judge below appears to have been strongly inclined against regarding this company as a salvor, within the reasons and principles which govern the admiralty, in awarding compensation for admitted salvage service. All the persons representing the company, engaged in the service in question, receive no part of the salvage money. They are employed at a permanent salary, or, if temporarily, for the given service, at day's wages. All considerations, therefore, of personal sacrifice or gallantry, in encountering imminent perils in rescuing vessels in distress, are necessarily excluded, in fixing the rate of compensation. If allowed by the court, all beyond the salaries or wages enure to the benefit of the company. I agree that a liberal compensation should be allowed for the use of the apparatus furnished, which was ample and well adapted to the purposes intended, by the present company, and for the skill with which it was handled in the service performed; but, in the sense of the law governing salvage compensation, I have great difficulty in awarding it to the libellants. As at present advised, I must deny it; and as, for aught that appears, the compensation allowed by the court was reasonable for the work and labor and materials used, the decree below is affirmed.

MORRELL v. CRAEFE.

[2 Wash. C. C. 380.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

EJECTMENT—POSSESSION FOR SIX YEARS—PENNSYLVANIA ACT—SHERIFF'S DEED.

The act of assembly of Pennsylvania, passed the 26th of March 1785 [2 Smith's Laws Pa. p. 301], which declares that no sheriff's deed, made bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, where quiet and peaceable possession has been had for six years, shall be adjudged defective for not producing any writ of fieri facias, &c., is a full answer to any objections founded on the process and its execution, under which the party acquired the title.

This was an ejectment for a house and lot in Philadelphia. The lessor of the plaintiff claimed under a sheriff's deed, made in virtue of a judgment, fieri facias, and venditioni exponas, against one Doyle. At the sale, the property was purchased and paid for by Mr. Ball, but intended for the family of Doyle, who remained in possession by permission of Ball, from the time of the purchase in 1770. In 1784, Ball sold so much of the entire lot as repaid his advance, leaving the part for which this ejectment is brought, which he conveyed to one Stewart, (who married Doyle's daughter,) and his wife, remainder to the heirs of the wife. The title was objected to, the return to the fieri facias, the inquisition, and the venditioni exponas, not being produced; and the purchaser not having obtained actual possession of the property.

BY THE COURT. The act of assembly, passed on the 26th of March 1785, which declares that no sheriff's deed, made bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, where quiet and peaceable possession hath been had of the same for six years, shall be adjudged defective, for not producing in court any writ of fieri facias, &c., or any returns thereon, is a full answer to the objection. The issuing of the necessary writs in this case, is proved by the docket of the court, and the possession of Doyle was the possession of Ball, under whom he held.

The defendant offered a deed from Mrs. Stewart to a person under whom he claims, made during her husband's life, whilst he was in Ireland, and which was given in order to raise money for her support. The court refused to let it be read, unless the death of her husband was proved, because, as the deed of a feme covert it was void.

The defendant then read a deed from Stewart, of his life estate, and contended that it was not clearly proved that Stewart was dead. The evidence was that he had not been heard of for many years. His wife married again, and two of the witnesses deposed, that they had heard some years ago that he was dead.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The whole cause turns upon the fact, whether Stewart is dead; because, if alive, the plaintiff who is only entitled to an estate in fee after his death, cannot recover. But the evidence in the cause, raises so strong a presumption of his death, that unless the contrary had been shown, the jury ought to consider the fact as proved

Case No. 9,820.

In re MORRILL.

[1 Hask. 542.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. April, 1874.

BANKRUPTCY — DISCHARGE — ASSENT OF MAJORITY OF CREDITORS.

A discharge should be granted to a bankrupt, under the bankrupt act of 1867 [14 Stat. 517], when a majority in number and value of the aggregate of both partnership and individual creditors, who have proved their debts, assent thereto, even though such majority of either class do not assent.

In bankruptcy. Petition by a bankrupt [Moses Morrill] for his discharge.

A creditor of the copartnership in which the bankrupt was a partner objected, because the assent of a majority in number and value of the firm creditors who had proved their debts had not been obtained, and the assets were not equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved.

Moses M. Butler, for petitioner.

Tobias T. Snow, for objecting creditor.

FOX, District Judge. Morrill was adjudged bankrupt individually and as a member of the firm of Thrasher, Blanchard & Co., and now moves for a discharge from his liabilities as a member of this firm, as well as from his individual indebtedness. The discharge is opposed by one of the creditors of the firm. Various allegations are set forth in the specifications of objections, all of which were abandoned at the hearing, with but one exception, and that is, that a majority in number and value of the creditors of the firm who have proved their debts have not assented in writing to his discharge, and that the assets of the estate are not equal to fifty per cent. of the claims proved against the estate. The certificate of the register states the whole number of the claims proved, upon which the bankrupt is individually liable as principal debtor, as sixteen, amounting to $17,272.14, and that thirteen of these creditors, whose claims amount to $17,095.08, have duly assented in writing to his discharge; that seven claims amounting to $3,507.11 have been proved against Thrasher, Blanchard & Co. and that none of the firm creditors have filed their assent. The assent therefore, of a majority in number and value of the aggregate of both classes of creditors, has been duly filed, but not of the firm creditors considered independently of the individual creditors, and for this cause, the discharge from the firm debts is opposed by a firm creditor on the ground that the rights of one class of creditors is not to be controlled or affected by the other class, but that in order to be discharged from his firm debts the bankrupt's estate should either be equal to fifty per cent., or the assent of a majority in value and number of the firm creditors who have proved their claims should be obtained.

A somewhat diligent and careful examination of the bankrupt reports does not show that this precise question has ever been before the court for adjudication under our present bankrupt law, and yet it can hardly admit of question that it has frequently arisen in the administration of the law.

The language of the 33d section of the act as it now stands is, "no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to fifty percentum of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as the principal debtor, unless the assent in writing of a majority in number and value of his creditors to whom he shall have become liable as a principal debtor, and who shall have proved their claims be filed, &c."

That partnership liabilities may be proved against the estate of one member of a firm was decided at an early day by Blatchford, J., in Re Frear [Case No. 5,074], and I am not aware that the decision has been questioned; but whether the creditor receives any dividend from the individual estate must depend on the application of the rules established for marshalling the assets. The language of the discharge, as provided in the 32d section is, that the bankrupt is "discharged from all debts and claims, which by said act are made proveable against his estate;" and it therefore follows that a discharge when obtained would relieve the party from his copartnership, as well as his individual liabilities. Such was the operation given to a discharge under the insolvent law in Massachusetts in Lothrop v. Tilden, 8 Cush. 375.

In a note to Horsey's Case, 3 P. Wms. 25, it is stated to have been decided as early as 1721, that "if there are two partners and one of them becomes a bankrupt, and on a separate commission his certificate is allowed, this not only discharges the bankrupt of what he owed separately, but also of what he owed jointly and on the partnership account; because by the act of parliament, the bankrupt when making a full discovery and obtaining his certificate is to be discharged of all his debts. Now the debts he owed jointly with another are equally his debts, as what he owes on his separate account, consequently he is to be discharged of both his joint and separate debts." In Re Leland [Case No. 8,228], Judge Hall says, "It will hardly be claimed, that a discharge properly granted to a bankrupt upon his separate petition, would not bar a debt against him, for which he was jointly liable with another."

It is conceded that the bankrupt is entitled to be discharged from his individual liabilities, as he has the assent of a majority in number and value of such creditors, and if the court is correct in its conclusion that the effect of such a discharge without any restriction or qualification would be to exonerate him from existing joint liabilities, and there not being found anywhere in the act any authority for such limited discharge, it would seem to follow, that the act does not contemplate the distinction of classes of claims here contended for, and that the assent of a majority of each class was not requisite before a discharge from the several classes could be granted.

Debts due from a firm are the debts of each of the individual members of the firm; each member is liable for them in solido, and they are to all intents and purposes his debts. By the terms of the act each one of the firm is liable for them as a principal debtor, and the holders of them are his creditors to whom he has become liable as a principal debtor.

The argument of the counsel for the objecting creditor is, "that the rights of creditors to prove their claims, and the right of the debtor to claim his discharge, are co-extensive and commensurate;" and he insists that the partnership creditors have no right to prove their claims against the individual estate; but this is hardly a correct statement of the rights of the parties. Proceedings in bankruptcy constitute but a single cause, one warrant only is issued all the creditors of the firm and the separate creditors of each member are allowed to prove their debts in such proceedings, and the assets are ordinarily apportioned among them according to the nature of the liability; but whether an individual debt shall receive any portion of the partnership effects, or whether a copartnership debt shall share in the individual estate, does not depend entirely on the nature of the debt itself, whether it is joint or several, but it is subject to the rules established by the act and courts of equity for marshalling the effects among the claims so proved. If the copartnership has no assets, and there is no solvent partner, a copartnership claim is entitled to share in the individual assets equally with the private debts of the copartners; and if the copartnership assets are more than sufficient to discharge all claims against the copartnership, the interest of the bankrupt in the surplus would go in satisfaction of his private debts; the debts therefore, whether joint or several, are all proveable in the proceedings, subject to the contingencies of payment from the one estate or the other, as they shall arise in the settlement of the estates.

The 36th section of the act relating to proceedings against copartnerships declares, that "the certificate of discharge shall be granted or refused to each partner, as the same would or ought to be, if the proceedings had been against him alone under this act; and in all other respects the proceedings against partners shall be conducted in like manner, as if they had been commenced and prosecuted against one person alone." This language confirms me in my view, that the present objection should not be sustained. The certificate of discharge is to be granted or refused, the same as if this proceeding was against Morrill alone. If upon the matter of his right to a discharge he is to be considered the only party to this proceeding, the effect of the proof of debts, whether joint or several, would seem to be, that they are to be all considered for this purpose as his debts, to form one common aggregate, to ascertain whether the requisite assent is obtained.

Partnership liabilities are as much debts of Morrill as his own individual debts; his whole estate has been taken from him by these proceedings, and whether the assets are applied to the payment of one claim or another should not affect his right to a discharge. The origin of the debt, or the joint liability of others for its payment, so far as respects the question here presented, are in my view of no importance. The assent of a majority of all who have legal claims upon him, and proved under the proceedings in bankruptcy, is requisite for his discharge; and when obtained, the court should not inquire whether some other party may or not be responsible for a portion of the demands from which a discharge is asked, it being always to be remembered that the liability of the other joint contractors can in no way be involved in such discharge. All the parties so assenting are creditors of the bankrupt. All have an equal interest in preventing his discharge, if he is not entitled to it; and the court does not perceive any sufficient reason for such a construction of the act, when it is clearly opposed both to its literal signification, and to the general purposes and design of the bankrupt law. Discharge granted.

[2 Sawy. 356; [1] 8 N. B. R. 117.]

District Court, D. Nevada. March 17, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—SURETY—SECTION 19 OF BANKRUPT ACT—CHATTEL MORTGAGE—POSSESSION IN MORTGAGOR.

1. A surety may pay the debt for which he is contingently liable, so as to satisfy the requirements of section nineteen of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 525)], by giving his individual note, if such note is expressly received as payment.

2. A mortgage fraudulent and void as to creditors, is so as to the assignee in bankruptcy.

3. By statute in Nevada, a chattel mortgage is void as to creditors, unless immediate possession of the mortgaged property is taken and retained by the mortgagee.

4. Independent of the statute, a mortgage of goods is fraudulent and void as to creditors, if the mortgagor is allowed to remain in possession of and sell and traffic with them as his own.

Petition filed by John Piper, praying that a security proved by him may be adjudged a valid lien upon certain personal property now in the possession of, and about to be sold by, the assignee. The material facts are these: In the fall of 1866, the bankrupt was the owner of a drug store in Virginia City, and being indebted to Hostetter, Smith & Dean, of San Francisco, conveyed the whole stock and business to them, with a verbal understanding that when paid out of the business they should convey the property back to him. In January, 1867, [George P.] Morrill went back into possession of the store and goods, and carried on business as agent of Hostetter, Smith & Dean, and so continued until May 1 of that year, at which time one Van Voorhies, a brother-in-law of Morrill, at Morrill's request, advanced $4,000 to Hostetter, Smith & Dean, and took from them a bill of sale, absolute on its face, but accompanied with a verbal understanding between Morrill and himself, that when he was paid he should deed back to Morrill. There was no change of possession at this time. Morrill remained in the store conducting the business, as he says, as agent of Van Voorhies. This continued until May 31, 1870, Morrill, in the meantime, making some payments out of the proceeds of the business to Van Voorhies. On the last named date, Morrill induced Piper, the petitioner, to join him in making a joint and several note to one Drexler for $1,200. The money so raised, being the balance due him, was paid to Van Voorhies, and under Morrill's direction he made a bill of sale to Piper. This bill of sale was absolute on its face, and purported to convey to Piper the whole stock of drugs, property used in carrying on the business, and fixtures. It was, however, accompanied with this verbal understanding: That Morrill should remain in possession, and carry on the business in his own name, until such time as Piper should please to take possession; that when Piper did take possession he was not to "sell out the business," but conduct it until he was paid, or the note on which he was liable for Morrill had been paid out of the proceeds. After this bill of sale, Morrill remained in possession, put up a sign bearing his own name, and carried on the business in his own name, buying, selling and dealing with the property, in all respects, as owner. Piper never attempted to take possession until October, 1872, when Morrill, fearing other creditors of his would put him into bankruptcy, sent word to Piper, by one Kaneen, a mutual friend, that he had better take possession, whereupon a new bill of sale of everything in and about the store was made by Morrill to Piper, and possession taken by him about a month before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy against Morrill. Piper took possession, in the language of Morrill, with the understanding that he was to carry on the business until the receipts paid him; he was not to sell out the business; and after Piper was thus paid, he was to deed back to him, Morrill. Before proving his claim, Piper gave Drexler his individual note in payment of the joint one of himself and Morrill, taking a receipt from Drexler, which shows that the new note was received in full payment of the old one.

Mitchell & Stone, for petitioner.
David Bixler, for respondent.

HILLYER, District Judge. Piper being, as between himself and Morrill, a surety, the assignee objects that he has not paid the debt for which he was contingently liable, as he is required to do by section nineteen of the bankrupt act, before he is entitled to prove his claim. Piper's individual note having been received expressly as payment, satisfied the original contract. Drexler's remedy upon it is gone. Piper, therefore, has paid the debt. Sheehy v. Mandeville, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 253; Downey v. Hicks, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 240; In re Ouimette [Case No. 10,622].

It was next argued very earnestly for Piper that, admitting the transfer to be fraudulent and void as to creditors, if it is good as between Morrill and Piper, the assignee in bankruptcy represents the bankrupt, takes the property subject to all equities existing at the time of commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and cannot avoid a transfer which the bankrupt could not. This is no longer an open question in this circuit since the decision of Sawyer, Circuit Judge, in Edmondson v. Hyde [Case No. 4,285], holding expressly that if a transfer of property is void as to creditors it is so as to the assignee; and since Judge Sawyer's decision the supreme court of the United States has upheld the same doctrine, saying that when a sale is fraudulent and void as to the creditors of the bankrupt, the assignee is authorized by the express terms of the fourteenth section of the bankrupt act to pursue the property so attempted to be transferred. Allen v. Masey, 17 Wall. [84 U. S.] 352.

The principal question in the case remains. If the conveyance to Piper is to be regarded, as it was on the argument, as a mortgage, is it a valid security as against the creditors of Morrill? It is not, for two reasons:

Firstly—It is invalid, except between the parties, because Piper did not take and retain possession as required by law. Section sixty-six of an act of the state of Nevada concerning conveyances contains this provision: "No mortgage of personal property hereafter made shall be valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless possession of the mortgaged property be delivered to and retained by the mortgagee." This provision is copied word for word from a statute of California, and, at the time of its adoption, had been construed by the supreme court of that state, so that it may be presumed the language was used with reference to the interpretation given it by the courts of the state whence it was taken. State v. Parkinson, 5 Nev. 15. The construction given by the supreme court of California is, that the delivery of possession must be immediate, and that a mortgage, void at its inception for want of such delivery, is not made valid by a subsequent taking of possession before a creditor acquires his lien. Chenery v. Palmer, 6 Cal. 121; Woods v. Bugbey, 29 Cal. 471; Edmondson v. Hyde, supra.

This, it seems to me, is the true rule, and carries out effectually the intention of the legislature. The weight of authority in this country seems to be that in these cases, in the absence of any statute law to the contrary, fraud is a question of fact for a jury, and that the retention or possession by a vendor or mortgagor is not per se fraud. Warner v. Horton, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 448. And, also, that a delivery of possession before a creditor acquires a lien on the goods is sufficient. Clute v. Steele, 6 Nev. 335, and cases there cited. The section in question is, then, not merely declaratory of the common law; it is remedial. In the first place, since the statute, the retention of possession by the mortgagor is fraud, per se, as to all persons except the parties, and no longer a question of fact for the jury. In the second place there must be a change of possession at the time the mortgage is made, thus curing that defect in the common law which allowed the mortgagor to remain in possession of the mortgaged property, notwithstanding the mortgage, and enabled him to appear as owner of the goods, to those dealing with him, and obtain a false credit upon the strength of this possession and apparent ownership. To hold that the mortgagee, after permitting the mortgagor to retain possession of the mortgaged property more than two years, can, as is argued, by taking possession a short time before the bankruptcy proceedings are commenced, make his mortgage good as against those who have become creditors of the mortgagor during those two years, will strip of all remedial force and practically repeal this statute, and this I shall not be the first judge to do. The case of Clute v. Steele, supra, in which the supreme court of Nevada held, upon a sale of personal property not accompanied with an immediate change of possession, "that a delivery before the attachment of any lien of a creditor will satisfy the law and validate the sale," is not decisive in this case. The court was dealing with other sections of the statute, the language of which differs essentially from section sixty-six.

Secondly—This mortgage is fraudulent and void as to creditors, independent of the statute. Taking the bill of sale and accompanying agreement together, it appears that, notwithstanding the mortgage, the mortgagor was to remain in possession of the goods and continue to sell and traffic with them as his own, so long as the mortgagee pleased. This was, in fact, done for over two years with the knowledge and acquiescence of the mortgagee. There is, on this point, a direct conflict among the state courts not to be reconciled. In some, as in those of Massachusetts, Maine and Michigan, the fact that the mortgagor is left in possession with permission to sell and deal with the goods, is considered presumptive evidence of fraud only, which may be explained by proof that the mortgage was in fact bona fide. The weight of authority, however, in the state courts appears to be that the fraud in such case is an inference of law, and that as to creditors the mortgage is void. Such is the rule in New York, New Hampshire, Ohio, Illinois and some other states, and which is decisive here in the supreme court of the United States. In Leavenworth v. Hunt, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 391, the mortgagors remained in possession of the goods, and the testimony tended to show that they continued to sell the goods with the assent of the mortgagee, and the court says: "If the facts were found by the jury, which the testimony tended to establish, the mortgage was fraudulent and void as to creditors," citing Griswold v. Sheldon, 4 Comst. [4 N. Y.] 581; and Wood v. Lowry, 17 Wend. 492. See, also, Lukins v. Aird, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 78; Paul v. Crocker, 8 N. H. 288; Catlin v. Currier [Case No. 2,518].

The second bill of sale to Piper was so clearly a void transfer under the thirty-fifth section of the bankrupt act, that all claim under it was abandoned on the argument. So much of Piper's proof as sets up a security must be expunged from the assignee's record of claims. It is so ordered.

MORRILL v. ARMSTRONG.

[4 Am Law Rev. 194.]

District Court, D. West Virginia. 1869.[1]

GRANTS—LANDS INCLUDED—EJECTMENT—FORFEITURE FOR FAILURE TO REGISTER FOR TAXATION—RELEASE OF FORFEITURE—BAR.

[This was an action by Lott M. Morrill against James Armstrong and others to recover a trust of fifteen hundred acres of land.]

The instructions given to the jury in this case, by Judge Jackson, embraced the following important points: A grant from the commonwealth of Virginia for land, made in 1796, upon a survey in 1795, including within its limits prior claims of others, not specified otherwise than by the mention of the estimated quantity, excludes, by the purport of the grant, lands previously granted, as well as those entered but not granted, within the exterior boundaries of the later grant. Where a person had adverse possession of the lands of another, which was forfeited for the failure of the owner to have the same entered on the books of the commissioner of the revenue, and pay the taxes thereon, and became vested in the commonwealth in 1836, the adverse character of the possession ceased; and when the commonwealth afterwards, by a special act of the legislature, passed in 1844, upon a redemption which was made in 1845, released the title to individuals, neither the possession before the forfeiture, nor that continuing while the title was in the commonwealth, can be added to that after the release took effect, so as to bar an action for the lands.

[From the judgment in this case in favor of the plaintiff a writ of error was sued out by the defendants, from the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed, Mr. Justice Strong dissenting. 14 Wall. (81 U. S.) 120.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1875.

BANKRUPTCY—EQUITY OF UNSECURED CREDITOR—DEFICIENCY—WAIVER.

1. If a mortgage, pledge, or lien be given by a principal debtor to secure his surety, and both principal and surety become insolvent, the creditors, whose claims the surety is bound for, have an equity to require the mortgaged property to be applied to the discharge of their debts specifically.

[Cited in Mathews v. Abbott, Case No. 9,275.]

2. This equity depends upon the equities between the parties to the mortgages, and if by negligence of the creditors the surety is discharged, or if the state of accounts between the parties is such that the surety has lost his lien, the creditors have no lien.

3. The creditors must first apply their security, and prove against either estate for the deficiency only.

4. If the holders of the claims secured by the mortgage to the surety prove in full, they waive their security.

5. Whether, if the estate of the surety will pay no dividend, the pledged property should not be surrendered to the assignee of the principal, quaere?

[Cited in Re Baxter, 12 Fed. 76.]

Doctrine of Ex parte Waring.[2]—In June, 1874, George F. Foye mortgaged his stock and fixtures to his brother, John W. Foye, to secure him for all liabilities he had assumed or might assume for the mortgagor. Within a few months both parties became bankrupt, and the petitioner was chosen assignee of both estates. He realized about $9,000 from the sale of the mortgaged property, and nothing of importance from any other assets in either case. Upon his petition, asking directions for the distribution of the assets, the register notified all creditors, and from his report and from the papers on file it appeared that John W. Foye had indorsed for his brother for more than $15,000, all of which debt was outstanding, and formed the bulk of the indebtedness of both estates; that the creditors, holding the notes, had proved against both estates, and most of them had voted for the assignee; that none of them had appeared before him at the hearing of this petition; that one general creditor of George F. Foye had appeared and filed a brief, which was sent to the court. The register reported that the money received for the stock and fixtures should be divided among the creditors of George F. Foye without distinction, because the holders of the notes had waived any equity they might have had, by proving in full, and voting under both bankruptcies; and because the assets of John W. Foye being insufficient to pay any dividend, his creditors had suffered and could suffer no injury from the indorsements, and therefore the mortgage had become inoperative.

LOWELL, District Judge. It is well settled that if a mortgage, pledge, or lien is given by a principal debtor to secure his indorsee or other surety, and both become insolvent, the holders of the notes or other debts for which the surety is bound have an equity to require the property to be applied to the discharge of their debts specifically. Many of the American cases upon this subject are reviewed by the late Judge Hall in Jaycox's Case [Case No. 7,242], and by the learned American editors in 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. (Ed. 1859) p. 163. The English decisions I have not seen fully collected, but have had occasion to examine them more than once.

[2] The peculiar equity discussed in this case is known in England by the name of the leading case, Ex parte Waring (19 Ves. 345).

Some of the more important of them are Ex parte Waring, reported in three places, 19 Ves. 345, 2 Rose, 182, 2 Glyn & J. 404; Powles v. Hargreaves, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 430; Ex parte Carrick, 2 De Gex & J. 208; Ex parte Copeland, 3 Deac. & C. 199; Ex parte Prescott, Id. 218; Inman v. Clare, Johns. Eng. Ch. 769; Bank of Ireland v. Perry, L. R. 7 Exch. 14; City Bank v. Luckie, 5 Ch. App. 773; Ex parte Dewhurst, 8 Ch. App. 965.

Under all these decisions, in both countries, the holders of the notes would prima facie have the equity which I have referred to. But this equity is obtained by subrogation, and depends upon the equities between the parties to the mortgage. Thus it has been held that if the surety has been discharged by the negligence of the creditors, or if the state of the accounts between the parties is such that the surety has lost his lien, the creditors have no equity: Hopewell v. Cumberland Bank of Alleghany, 10 Leigh, 206; Bibb v. Martin, 14 Smedes & M. 87; Vaughan v. Halliday, 9 Ch. App. 561; Ex parte Parr, Buck, 191.

It is further settled that the creditors must work out their equity, and apply their security so as to prove against either estate for the deficiency only: New Bedford Sav. Inst. v. Fairhaven Bank, 9 Allen, 175; Jaycox's Case [supra] per Hall, J.; Powles v. Hargreaves, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 430; Banner v. Johnston, L. R. 5 H. L. 157; Ex parte Joint-Stock Discount Co., L. R. 19 Eq. 1, 10 Ch. App. 198. There are many other cases, but none opposed to these. The reason is, that the equity is primarily that of the two estates, and the general creditors of each have a right to say that the security shall be applied before the debt is proved. Indeed, the decision of Ex parte Waring was put wholly upon the equities of the two estates, and several judges since have said that the secured or quasi secured creditors have no equity of their own; but this distinction has not been found useful, as the courts are bound to apply the equity, whoever may ask for the application, and they have found themselves obliged to apply it, in many of the cases, upon the petition of the secured creditors.

It results from this rule, that if the holders of the notes, or other privileged debts, prove in full, they waive their security: New Bedford Sav. Inst. v. Fairhaven Bank, 9 Allen, 175; Jaycox's Case [supra], per Hall, J. I desire, however, to make one or two remarks on those cases. In Jaycox's Case, Judge Hall said, very justly, that if the holders of the secured notes proved in full against the estate of the bankrupt principal, without the consent of the solvent surety, they would thereby release the surety to the extent of the value of the security, and at the same time abandon the security for the benefit of the estate of the principal. He had also said that the assent of the surety, or the fact that he was bankrupt, would probably make no difference, as it clearly would not, because the general creditors of the principal have a right to insist that full proof shall not be made against the principal's estate, except upon waiver of the security for their benefit. He, however, permitted the proofs in full against that estate to stand, apparently upon the ground that the resulting rights of the parties might be settled in another action, which is technically sound; but the bankrupt court has undoubted power, and it would sometimes be its duty to see that the property was actually surrendered, at least before dividends are paid upon the proofs. A court of law, in an action arising out of the very case before Judge Hall, refused to give the surety the benefit of such a supposed release: Merchants' Nat. Bank v. Comstock, 55 N. Y. 24.

In the case in 9 Allen, it was held, and very justly, that proof against both estates waived the security. The consequent equities were not considered, and no one appears to have asked for their determination. They would be that the surety's estate must surrender the security, and that the proofs against that estate must be reduced to the extent of the full value of the security.

In the present case, the proof having been made against both estates, the rule above indicated would be followed, but for the fact that there will be no dividend in the estate of John W. Foye, and therefore it is not worth while to go to the expense of reforming the proofs.

I am somewhat inclined to think the other reason given by the register for regarding the mortgage as valueless may be sound. The mortgage being for the indemnity of the surety, and the holders of the notes having no equity excepting through him, although it is perfectly clear that this equity does not depend on the surety's being personally damnified, or upon his having been damnified before his bankruptcy, yet I think it may be doubted whether the assignee of the principal has not a right to the security, when it is clear that no damage can possibly happen to the estate of the bankrupt surety. A doubt arises, on the other hand, from this consideration. Suppose the surety should not obtain his discharge, would he not have a right to say that the property ought to have been applied exclusively to his exoneration, and not to the general debts of his principal? This might be met, perhaps, by those creditors tendering him personally an indemnity, or, as they have a largely controlling voice in both bankruptcies, by procuring his discharge. It must be admitted too, that the American decisions seem to regard the equity as a positive one, subject only to the rights of the surety.

I place my decision, therefore, upon the ground that the creditors have proved in full, and acted as general creditors of the estate of George F. Foye, the principal, and thereby have waived the security.

The assignee is to divide the proceeds of sale, pro rata, among all the creditors of George F. Foye.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—BY DECREE OF COURT—COMPOSITION PROCEEDINGS—PECUNIARY CONSIDERATION TO CREDITOR.

No act done in composition proceedings, though of the description of the offence mentioned in the eighth clause of section 5110, Rev. St., can be set up against the discharge of a bankrupt by decree of the court.

Rule to show cause why the specifications of objections filed should not be stricken off as insufficient in law, and the said petitioners [Morris and Nathan Morganstern] be discharged.

Malcolm Hay, for opposing creditors.

S. Schayer, Jr., for bankrupts.

KETCHUM, District Judge. The specifications of objections to discharge in this case are filed under the eighth clause of section 29 of the act of March 2, 1867,—section 5110, Rev. St. [14 Stat. 531],—which reads as follows: "If the bankrupt, or any person in his behalf, has procured the assent of any creditor to his discharge, or influenced the action of any creditor at any stage of the proceedings by any pecuniary consideration or obligation, his discharge shall not be granted." It is charged that the petitioners, in proceedings in composition in this case, by pecuniary consideration or obligation, influenced certain creditors to contribute their votes to constitute the legal quorum to adopt the resolution. That the sum of eighteen hundred dollars was promised the said creditors on confirmation of the composition, and that said creditors voted for the composition. The composition failed for want of sufficient votes, and the bankrupts have gone through bankruptcy up to the application for discharge. Can the specifications, if true, defeat their discharge? Does the clause "at any stage of the proceedings" include the composition proceedings? Composition proceedings under the bankrupt law are, no doubt, proceedings in bankruptcy; but are they so to be considered with reference to the prohibitory clause denying the bankrupt his discharge for the causes therein set forth? Proceedings in composition constitute a mode of distributing pro rata the value of the estate of the debtor according to the estimate of a quorum of creditors, subject to the approval of the court. The proceedings are chiefly an amicable arrangement between the debtor and his creditors. The debtor has simply to pay what he has agreed to pay, and he is ipso facto discharged. No penalties are provided for punishing specified offences of the parties. The arrangement is left to the approval or non-approval of the court, looking only to the question: What is best for all concerned, according to equity and justice? If adopted and carried out, it ends the bankruptcy, and the bankrupt discharges himself.

Composition was not thought of when the section embracing the clause referred to was enacted. For more than seven years before composition was engrafted on our system of bankruptcy men were discharged by decree of the court; and all that time this section containing this clause was in force, and of course was only aimed at the offences specified as taking place in regular bankruptcy. There is nowhere in the law any provision extending this clause to things done in composition as if done in bankruptcy. It could not operate on discharge in composition if it were extended. Composition has its own discharge, which could not be reached by it. The clause is penal in its nature, and cannot be extended by mere implication.

Composition and bankruptcy are both complete systems looking to different modes of discharge. Neither requires the other, nor, after the original petition, is any part of the one proceedings in the other. The proceedings in bankruptcy of themselves alone, and excluding entirely the proceedings in composition, form the basis of the decree of discharge. Not without the most miscellaneous confusion of two entirely different proceedings can anything done at any time in composition proceedings be called "any stage of the proceedings" in bankruptcy resulting in a decree for a discharge. I do not think anything wrong done in composition proceedings, though of the description of the offence in this clause can be set up against the discharge of the bankrupts by decree of the court.

Rule absolute.

BANKRUPTCY—EFFECT OF SUPERSEDEAS—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT JUDGE—DEBTS PROVEN—LACHES—PRESUMPTION OF PAYMENT—NOTICE.

1. The effect of a supersedeas, lawfully ordered, is to annihilate a commission of bankruptcy, and to place the bankrupt with his estate and effects in the same situation they would have been in had it never existed.

[1] [Reprinted from 19 N. B. R. 111, by permission. 19 Alb. Law J. 281, contains only a partial report.]

[1] [Reported by William H. Crabbe, Esq. 1 Law Rep. 354, contains only a partial report.]

2. In England, the chancellor's authority, in bankruptcy, is without any precise boundaries, and is exercised on very broad and general principles, for the purposes of justice and the protection of parties.

3. In England, the authority of chancery, in bankruptcy, is derived from the bankrupt laws, either by express grant or by construction or implication, and not from the general power of the chancellor.

4. A district judge of the United States has power to supersede a commission of bankruptcy, by construction or implication from the bankrupt law of the 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [1 Stat. 197]), and without the express grant of such power therein.

[Cited in Re Hamlin, Case No. 5,994; Re Thomas, Id. 13,891; Allen v. Thompson, 10 Fed. 123.]

5. It cannot be inferred from Lucas v. Morris [Case No. 8,587], that the district judges possess no powers, under the bankrupt law, that are not expressly given to them.

6. Neither the English chancellor nor a district judge of the United States has any jurisdiction, in bankruptcy, virtute officiorum, but only from the statutes.

[Cited in Re Thomas, Case No. 13,891.]

7. A supersedeas may be issued after a bankrupt has obtained his certificate.

8. A decree, rightfully and deliberately made, and long acquiesced in by all parties interested, will not be revoked unless it be clearly shown that justice requires it.

9. The commissioners of a bankrupt's estate cannot allow a judgment debt, which has slept for thirty years, to be proved before them, unaccompanied by sufficient reasons for the neglect to prosecute it.

[Cited in Re Thomas, Case No. 13,891.]

10. The presumption of payment from lapse of time may be rebutted by circumstances which are for the consideration of a jury; but when a petitioner seeks to have a supersedeas of a commission of bankruptcy revoked, in order to allow him to prove debts against which there is a primâ facie presumption of payment, he must satisfy the court that he has a fair and reasonable expectation of rebutting the presumption, if the opportunity is afforded him.

11. What effect the bankruptcy and death of a party will have to prevent the barring, by lapse of time, of a judgment against him, is a question of law for the court to decide; as, also, the difference between a bond and a judgment with reference to the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time.

12. The fact that any interest, however small, will profit thereby, is not sufficient ground to revoke a decree; the preponderance of equity on the whole case will be looked to.

13. There is nothing unusual, illegal, or improper, in the bonâ fide assignee of a judgment becoming the purchaser, at sheriff's sale thereon; or in his giving a credit on the judgment for the amount of the purchase-money. Neither is it illegal in such a holder of a judgment to purchase, in his own name, but for the use of the representatives of the original defendant, a portion of the property sold.

14. An order of supersedeas will annul a commission of bankruptcy without a formal writ being issued.

15. The fact of certain creditors of a bankrupt residing in the city where the legal proceedings are had, does not entitle them to any more special notice of the various steps taken than those who live at a distance. The only notice required is by Gazette.

16. R. M., a certified bankrupt, died during the continuance of the commission, having first devised to his wife all his property, real or personal, which he then possessed or might afterwards acquire. Subsequently, M. M., the wife, died, having first devised all her estate, real and personal, to N., a daughter, and making H. M., a son, her executor. Real property of R. M. being afterwards discovered, H. M. had sufficient interest therein to entitle him to petition for, and obtain, a supersedeas of the commission.

17. It is doubtful whether a certified bankrupt, pending the commission, has such a possibility coupled with an interest in property discovered after his death, as will enable such property to pass under a general devise by him.

18. Where a petitioner, subsequently to filing his petition, acquires a new right, which is matter of record, and does not affect the merits of the controversy, and the opposing parties do not, within a reasonable time, object to his original right, or require him to show that subsequently acquired, they lose their ability so to object or require.

19. The bankrupt law (of 4th April, 1800; 1 Story's Laws, 732 [1 Stat. 19]), requires extraordinary promptness on the part of the creditors to bring the proceedings to a close, and countenances no neglect or delay.

[Cited in Re Robinson, Case No. 11,941; Re Thomas, Id. 13,891.]

On the 28th of July, 1801, a commission of bankruptcy, under the act of 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [1 Stat. 19]), was issued from the district court for the district of Pennsylvania, against Robert Morris; after various preliminary proceedings, and the proof of sundry debts, amounting in the whole to about three millions of dollars, the commissioners executed an assignment to John R. Smith, John Craig, and Nathan Field, on the 8th December, 1801, they having been elected assignees by the creditors. All proceedings then ceased, and, up to the year 1825, no action of any kind was taken in the matter. On the 21st November, 1825, Henry Morris, a son of Robert Morris, petitioned Judge Peters, the then district judge, to vacate and supersede the commission of bankruptcy; stating that Robert Morris was then dead; that the large estate left by him was being wasted and misapplied by means of the neglect of the creditors and assignees; and that it was no benefit either to the creditors or to the bankrupt and his heirs. A rule to show cause was granted on this petition, returnable on the 26th December, 1825, and the time subsequently enlarged to the 13th January, 1826. But the petition was then no further prosecuted. On the 15th January, 1830, the application was renewed, on behalf of Henry Morris, to Judge Hopkinson, who had succeeded Judge Peters.

Mr. Williams, for petitioner.

The power of acting under the bankrupt law is given to the judge, and not to the court. Act 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [1 Stat. 19], §§ 2, 3, 14, 19, 28); Lucas v. Morris [Case No. 8,587]. And this power remains under the repealing act. Act 19th Dec., 1803 (2 Story's Laws, 909 [2 Stat. 248]), Lucas v. Morris [supra]. There is no fixed rule in England or the United States as to the causes of superseding a commission of bankruptcy: it is an application to discretion. We do not mean to say that the district judge has in all cases the same power with the chancellor, but that he has in the case of a supersedeas. The commission of bankruptcy is considered, in England, as a species of execution, and, therefore, under the direction and control of the court by the authority of which it is issued. 2 Madd. 608, 609; Ex parte Poole, 2 Cox, Ch. 227; cited, 2 Madd. 616; Ex parte Donovan, 15 Ves. 8. After the length of time which has elapsed without any action on the part of the creditors, we are justified in supposing that they have abandoned the commission, or consented to its being superseded. Ex parte Duckworth, 16 Ves. 416. And see, also, Ex parte Proudfoot, 1 Atk. 252; Ex parte Lees, 16 Ves. 472; Troughton, v. Gitley, Amb. 630; Ex parte Wood, 1 Atk. 221; Ex parte Lavender, 18 Ves. 18.

No counsel appeared to oppose the petition.

On the 22d January, 1830, Judge HOPKINSON ordered that special notice of the application should be given to John H. Huston, the petitioning creditor; and a public notice, in the Gazette, to all creditors of the bankrupt, that the judge would proceed to hear and decide upon the petition on the 19th February. On that day proof was made that the notices, respectively, had been given in conformity with the order. The application then rested till the 17th September, 1830; and, on that day, no opposition having been made, it was ordered, "that the commission issued in the case be vacated and superseded, according to the prayer of the petitioner."

In March, 1791, a judgment was obtained by Joshua B. Bond against Robert Morris, and a testatum fi. fa. was issued thereon on the 1st February, 1798. Mr. Bond having died, his administrator issued a scire facias, to the use of William Rawle, against the representatives of Robert Morris, on the 1st April, 1830; and on the 6th December, 1830, judgment was confessed on the sci. fa. by the attorney of Robert Morris's representatives; a fieri facias was then issued and levied on certain lands, now in Schuylkill county, which were sold in October, 1831, under a venditione exponas to William Rawle, Jr., Esq., for $5,100.

On the 8th December, 1836, a petition was filed by William Sansom, praying that the supersedeas might be revoked. The petitioner set forth, that he was a creditor of Robert Morris, by a judgment, upon which there was due the sum of $9,484 12, with interest from the 23d December, 1805, and also by another judgment obtained by John Dunwoody, for a large amount. He recited the commission of bankruptcy against Mr. Morris, and his certificate of discharge, and said he had learned that a supersedeas had lately been granted, but that he had not been able to learn upon whose application, or upon what grounds. He represented that no notice was given to him, or, as far as he could learn, to any other creditor, of the application for the supersedeas; that he had a considerable interest in proceeding under the commission; and that he was advised, that if the power existed to take it away, it could not be exercised without due notice, and an opportunity to be heard. The affidavit verified the petition, particularly as to his having had no notice of the application for the supersedeas.

The case came on to be heard on the 30th December, 1836, before Judge HOPKINSON, and was argued by Mr. Wharton for the petitioner; and by Mr. Williams, who appeared for Henry Morris; Mr. Tilghman, who appeared for Wm. Rawle, Jr., Esq.; and J. S. Smith, who appeared for the representatives of Robert Morris, against the petition.

Mr. Wharton, for the petition.

There is no bona fide purchaser without notice, who has paid money for his purchase, whose rights will be affected by granting the prayer of the petitioner; but, if there was such a purchaser, as the proceeding of supersedeas was without the jurisdiction of the judge, the purchaser is not entitled to the same protection as if he had purchased under a judgment in a court of law, of which all must take notice. It may be urged that the petitioner is not entitled to be heard, because the debt on which he claims is to be presumed to be paid, on account of the time which has elapsed since it was last prosecuted. It is true, that after a certain period of time payment will be presumed on bonds, judgments, &c., but this is not a presumption overruling all objection, like that of cases within the statutes of limitation; it arises from circumstances, and may be repelled by other circumstances; and whether it is or is not so repelled is a matter for a jury to decide. 2 Starkie, Ev. 270, 824; Foulk v. Brown, 2 Watts, 209, 215; Summerville v. Holliday, 1 Watts, 507; Nickle v. McFarlane, 3 Watts, 165. And in this case the payment or non-payment is a question of fact for a jury under the 52d and 58th sections of the act of 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732; [2 Stat. 19]). The petitioner has four reasons to urge against the presumption;—the bankruptcy of Mr. Morris; his death; the difference between a judgment and a bond, non-payment of interest on a bond being strong ground for presuming the principal to have been paid; and the fact of the existence of property in Schuylkill county being unknown till recently. It may also be objected that the petitioner never proved his debt under the commission, but the objection is of no weight, as a creditor may prove at any time. Archb. Bankr. (5th Ed.) 124. We deny that such authority as is here claimed is vested in any judge exercising the powers given by the bankrupt law. All the power of this court, in bankruptcy, is derived either from the act of congress, or, by necessary inference, from the English system. The moment the party was declared a bankrupt the power to issue a supersedeas was lost, and there is no hint in the act of any such authority as has been here exercised, to deprive the commissioners of the property vested in them. Act 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [2 Stat. 19] §§ 3, 5, 8, 10, 11, 36, 45); Act 19th Dec., 1803 (2 Story's Laws, 909 [2 Stat. 243]). There is not a syllable of authority in England or America to supersede the commission, under such circumstances, after the certificate of discharge. A bankrupt law is to be construed more favorably to a creditor than an insolvent law, yet there is no supersedeas under the insolvent law. Power v. Hollman, 2 Watts, 218. The district judge has not the same power to supersede as the English chancellor. Lucas v. Morris [Case No. 8,587]. The refusal of the assignees to act did not revest the property in the bankrupt, but it remained in the commissioners. Willis v. Row, 3 Yeates, 520; Gray v. Hill, 10 Serg. & R. 436; Wickersham v. Nicholson, 14 Serg. & R. 118; Cookson v. Turner, 2 Bin. 453. There can be no equity shown for issuing the supersedeas; and the petition of Henry Morris for that purpose, together with the reasons assigned in it, is totally unprecedented.

Mr. Williams, against the petition.

The property is not vested in the commissioners, but remains in the bankrupt until the assignment. Doe v. Mitchell, 2 Maule & S. 446; Carleton v. Leighton, 3 Mer. 667, 672. There never has been any assignment; the instrument remained with the clerk of the commissioners, and the property with the bankrupt. It would be inequitable to revoke the supersedeas now, when third parties have acted on the rights it gave them.

BY THE COURT.—If the property remained vested in the bankrupt and his heirs, how could the supersedeas affect it; or affect those who had acquired a right to it, under him or his heirs?

Mr. Williams.—Although the legal estate was in the bankrupt, the beneficial interest was in his creditors, and would pass to the assignees when duly appointed and accepting. It is now as much too late for this application as it is for a writ of error or a bill of revivor in the matter. The San Pedro, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 132, 137; 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] Append. 771, 782; Ex parte Roffey, 19 Ves. 468. And Mr. Sansom, being neither a party nor a privy, has no right to make it. The debt on which the application is founded is barred by lapse of time, and could be resisted before a commission. Diemer v. Sechrist, 1 Pa. [1 Pen. & W.] 420; Power v. Hollman, 2 Watts, 218; Dewdney's Case, 15 Ves. 479; Cope v. Humphreys, 14 Serg. & R. 15; Nickle v. M'Farlane, 3 Watts, 167; Giles v. Baremore, 5 Johns. Ch. 545. As Mr. Sansom did not prove under the commission, he had no right whatever to any kind of notice. Ex parte Smith, 1 Glyn & J. 257; Alderman Backwell's Case, 1 Vern. 208; Ex parte Duckworth, 16 Ves. 416. The supreme court having adopted the English chancery rules, in the absence of others, the district judge should carry acts of congress into effect on the same rule and principle. Supposing Mr. Sansom had a right to be heard, has the judge exceeded his power in granting the supersedeas? If such a power did not exist, the difficulties would have been insurmountable, in the numerous cases and circumstances which would have arisen under the act, had it remained in force. In almost every case under the law, the district judge is put in the place of a chancellor with the same power that he has in bankruptcy, at least as to all powers necessary to carry the act into effect. A commission of bankruptcy is called here, as in England, a species of execution; and the authority which issues an execution has control over it and superintends it. No statute in England gave power to the chancellor to supersede a commission till the reign of Wm. IV.; it has always been an incidental power of the authority issuing the commission. Ex parte Freeman, 1 Ves. & B. 40, 41; Ex parte Matthews, 3 Atk. 816. All the books on bankruptcy show that the power to supersede a commission has never been doubted as an incidental power. When congress passed this act, they must have known of the construction which carried this power with it, and, using the same language, must have intended to allow the same construction. Lucas v. Morris [Case No. 8,587], decides that the district judge has not all the powers of the chancellor. To this we agree, but we contend that he has all the ordinary powers; he is continually exercising them; the petitioner himself asks an issue in this case, when an issue is only specifically allowed in three cases under the act of 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732, §§ 3, 28, 52 [2 Stat. 19]) and the petition does not come within one of the cases where an issue is allowed. Granting an issue, a supersedeas, or a bill of review, is an ordinary exercise of chancery power by the district judge, without express authority. There never has been a system of bankruptcy without a power of superseding, and, if it is not in the district judge, where is it? If there is no power of superseding the commission, the estate may be wasted and mismanaged to the end of time without any remedy.

It is objected that, even if the judge has the power, the fact of the bankrupt having obtained his certificate should have prevented the issuing a supersedeas. We can show cases where a supersedeas has been granted in England after certificate; and, as the objection concedes the power, this becomes merely a question of expediency. 2 Madd. 616; Ex parte Poole, 2 Cox, Ch. 227; Ex parte Moule, 14 Ves. 602. If the object of the commission has not been and cannot be answered, like an execution, it will not be permitted to stand. The debts originally proved against Mr. Morris amounted to three millions of dollars, but, by the neglect of the commission, they amount at this time to nine millions; a great injustice to the bankrupt, and an end very different from that intended to be reached by the appointment of the commissioners. Laches alone is a sufficient ground for superseding a commission. Ex parte Proudfoot, 1 Atk. 252; Ex parte Lees, 16 Ves. 472; Troughton v. Gitley, Amb. 630. And commissions have been superseded for the benefit of the bankrupt. Ex parte Wood, 1 Atk. 221; Ex parte Lavender, 18 Ves. 18.

Mr. Tilghman, on the same side.

Mr. Sansom must be considered as having been present at the time of the application of Henry Morris, and as not objecting when the supersedeas was granted, for the whole system of notice in bankruptcy, both here and in England, is such as was followed by the judge. Notice in the Gazette is all that is required. The same sort of notice is given to creditors who have judgment or mortgage on land sold by the sheriff; if they do not come in on that notice they lose their priority, as is also the rule in the orphan's court. Mr. Rawle has acquired rights on the faith of the supersedeas, and we protest against its validity being questioned now, especially by a person in Mr Sansom's position. Cope v. Humphreys, 14 Serg. & R. 15. If no supersedeas had been ordered, the commission of bankruptcy, being but a statutory execution, and no proceedings having been had under it for so long a time, this torpidity would divest the commissioners and assignees of the property, and the commission with all rights under it would expire by the lapse of time. The heirs of Mr. Morris could have recovered their lands in England had there been no supersedeas. Mr. Sansom and all the other creditors are to be presumed to have been paid, from the lapse of time, and payment is a sufficient ground for supersedeas in all cases. The act of 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [2 Stat. 19]), using the same words, must have been intended to give the same powers as the English statute.

J. S. Smith, on the same side.

This petition is unprecedented and anomalous. It is an application to a judge to reverse his own decree because he had no power to make it. If the judge had no power to order the supersedeas, it is void, the commission still exists, and this application is unnecessary. All powers given to the judge by the bankrupt law are of a judicial character. The power to issue the commission is confined to a judicial officer, and judicial power to issue implies power to control, refuse, or supersede the commission, for it is in the nature of an execution; and when power is given to a judicial person to issue an execution, it is an incident to the power that he may set the execution aside. The power of the chancellor under St. 13 Eliz. c. 7, § 2, is given to him in the same words as the power given to the judge by the act of 4th April, 1800, § 2 (1 Story's Laws, 733 [2 Stat. 19]). There is no power to supersede given to the chancellor by the English acts which is not given to the judge by our act. The English statutes give an express power to supersede in but two cases. St. 5 Geo. II. c. 30, § 24; Act 4th April, 1800, §§ 3, 28 (1 Story's Laws, 733, 741 [2 Stat. 22, 28]). The chancellor has no power in bankruptcy but what is derived from the acts of parliament, and when he supersedes, it is by virtue of the discretionary or incidental power given to him by those acts, in other cases than are therein expressly mentioned. 2 Madd. 609; Ex parte Freeman, 1 Ves. & B. 40; Ex parte Lund, 6 Ves. 782; Phillips v. Shaw, 8 Ves. 250. If the judge can supersede only in the cases specially mentioned, the commission might be perpetual, though fraudulent or collusive, and though all parties consented to the supersedeas, or the debts had been all paid. Very many judicial powers are given by the statute and exercised by the judge. Act 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [2 Stat. 19], §§ 2, 3, 19, 36, 47, 51, 52); U. S. v. Lawrence, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 42. It can only be inferred from Lucas v. Morris [supra], that the district judge has not exclusive jurisdiction over the entire execution of the bankrupt law, as the chancellor has in England; and the only point positively decided by the case was that the judge could not call the assignees to account. See Ex parte Cowan, 3 Barn. & Ald. 123. If the district judge acts judicially in bankruptcy, and the chancellor has no greater power under the acts of parliament than the judge under the act of congress; we may take the acts of the chancellor as a precedent. The power of the chancellor to grant a supersedeas appears to be conceded, except where a certificate has been issued. But a supersedeas has been granted after certificate. Ex parte Poole, 2 Cox, Ch. 227; Ex parte Moule, 14 Ves. 602. Where it has been refused after certificate, it has been for the benefit of the bankrupt, in order that, after conforming to the law, he shall not be exposed to the effect of his debts by superseding the commission and all that has been done under it; Ex parte Leaverland, 1 Atk. 145. If the judge has power to supersede, and has superseded, why should he now revoke it? The whole argument and inquiry now is as to the effect of the supersedeas upon certain lands in Schuylkill county, since purchased by a third party. Mr. Sansom has no right to ask that the supersedeas shall be revoked merely to let him in to prove his debt after he has had nearly thirty years to come in and has not done so, although living in the city where the commission sat. His interest in the property now discovered is but one-ninth of one per cent.; so trifling a proportion that it cannot be supposed he will seriously prosecute his claim, even if the commission should be reopened. The petitioner denies the judge authority to order a supersedeas, but asks him for a procedendo, when both powers must come from the same source. If a procedendo should be ordered, justice requires that it should be upon terms, so as not to affect rights acquired under the supersedeas.

Mr. Wharton, in reply.

We deny that the judge had power to grant the supersedeas. Jurisdiction and power have different meanings: the first has a general scope or bearing, the second is something that exists within the first. A general jurisdiction implies the power necessary to execute it. If the judge had general jurisdiction in bankruptcy, all general powers would exist within that sphere; but if the jurisdiction is given by statute, and is limited, then no power can be implied. In England there is no statute giving power to the chancellor; the first rise of his authority is unknown, but it is now as large as the whole broad and sweeping chancery jurisdiction, and of it his authority in bankruptcy is part. Wright v. Simpson, 6 Ves. 732; Eden, 449, citing Anon., 14 Ves. 451. The English bankrupt laws are framed with a view to the authority of the chancellor in the exercise of his ordinary jurisdiction. Ex parte Bradley, 1 Rolle, 202. But no such power or jurisdiction is given to the district judge; the district court has no equity jurisdiction but in granting injunctions.

BY THE COURT.—In the cases in 14 Ves. and Rolle, just cited, the chancellor did not claim the power he then exercised by virtue of his chancery jurisdiction, but by the interpretation and construction of the statutes of bankruptcy. He derives all his authority from the statutes and the inferences from them.

Mr. Wharton.—By confiding the execution of the bankrupt laws to the chancellor it was a reasonable inference that it was intended he might use his powers as chancellor to carry the laws into effect. But if the execution of the statutes had been confided to a common law judge, no such inference could have been drawn. The district judge here has no such powers as the chancellor, and, of course, the act of congress in referring to the district judge, intended only to let him exercise the powers in bankruptcy that he had in his ordinary jurisdiction; Lucas v. Morris [supra]. It is true that the judge has certain judicial powers under the bankrupt law, but they are limited, and cannot be extended beyond those limits. Even if the power of the district judge is commensurate with that of the chancellor, the chancellor himself is without power to grant a supersedeas in a case like the present. The fact of its being without precedent in the innumerable English bankruptcy cases is proof that the power does not exist. The chancellor would require the express affirmative consent of the creditors, both those who had proved and those who had not, before he would supersede a commission. 1 Mont. Dig. Bankr. 366, 369. The assent is assumed here, but such consent can only be shown by a writing signed by the creditors, and praying for the supersedeas. And consent cannot be implied from the mere fact of publication. 2 Mont. Dig. Bankr. 313. The real ground assigned for the supersedeas is not the consent, but the neglect, of the creditors. A totally unprecedented ground. It is contended that the legal interest has never been out of the bankrupt; but our law is different in this respect from that of England. St. 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 4, § 1; 13 Eliz. c. 7, § 2; 5 Geo. II. c. 30, § 37; Act 4th April, 1800 (1 Story's Laws, 732 [2 Stat. 19], §§ 5, 50). Both the legal and beneficial interests were in the commissioners, so continued if the assignees did not accept, and so continue, unless—inconsistently with law—they have been divested thereof by the supersedeas. It is not too late to make this application, as a bill of review will lie at any time within twenty years. 2 Smith, Pr. Eq. 50. It is alleged that there is a purchaser for a valuable consideration, on the faith of the supersedeas. The person claiming this position should show affirmatively that he has actually paid a valuable consideration in money, it not being sufficient if the judgment creditor has allowed a credit on the judgment for the amount of the purchase-money; and the party claiming as an innocent purchaser should also show that he had no connnexion with the petition for a supersedeas, and that he was ignorant of its invalidity. Harrison v. Southcote, 1 Atk. 538; Hardingham v. Nicholls, 3 Atk. 304.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. On the 28th day of July, 1801, a commission of bankruptcy was issued by the district judge for the Pennsylvania district, against Robert Morris, directed to John Hallowell, Joseph Hopkinson, and Thomas Cumpston, commissioners. The bankrupt being duly summoned, surrendered himself to the commissioners, and submitted himself to be examined; the commissioners having previously declared the said Robert Morris a bankrupt. On the 6th day of August the commissioners received proof of sundry debts. On the 26th of August proof of debts was received from about twenty-one creditors, and the choice of assignees postponed until the 12th day of September. On that day further proofs of debt were received from nearly forty of the creditors of the bankrupt. At several subsequent meetings of the commissioners proofs of debts were continued to be received, amounting in the whole to upwards of ninety, and whose aggregate amount of debt was about three millions of dollars. On the 8th day of December, 1801, the commissioners executed an assignment of all the estate and effects of the bankrupt to John R. Smith, Esquire, and John Craig, and Nathan Field, merchants, they being the assignees chosen by the creditors. Here the proceedings by and before the commissioners stop. The assignment still remains among the papers of the commission, never having been accepted by the assignees, nor any counterpart executed by them. No attempts were made by or on the part of the creditors to call upon the assignees to execute the trust, nor to have other assignees appointed to supply their place and take charge of the estate and effects of the bankrupt. It may be here remarked that the petitioner now before me made no proof of his debt before the commissioners, or took any part in the proceedings under the commission. The estate and effects of the bankrupt, whatever they were, were thus abandoned by the creditors; not only by those who had proved their debts, and neglected or declined to use the rights they had under the commission, but by those also who by not proving, exhibited even more indifference to his affairs. It cannot be believed, indeed it is not pretended that the petitioner, being in the city where these proceedings were going on, was not acquainted with them. At all events, he had the notice which the law required, and which was given to the creditors of the bankrupt generally.

Things remained in this situation, in a state of absolute inaction, and without any symptom of a revival, until the month of November, 1825, that is twenty-four years, within a few days. In the mean time, that is, in the month of ——, 1806, Robert Morris, the bankrupt, died. On the 21st day of November, 1825, Henry Morris, one of the children of Robert Morris, presented his petition to the Honorable Richard Peters, then judge of the district court of the United States, for this district, the same who had issued the commission, in which he recites the proceedings under the commission, and alleges that the assignees do not appear ever to have accepted the trust; nor have they executed any counterpart of the assignment; nor has there been, as he believes, anything further done in the premises. He states that the said Robert Morris, died in 1807 (1806), leaving a widow and five children, whereof the petitioner is one. He then alleges and sets forth, "That at the time of the said bankruptcy, the said Robert Morris was seized and possessed of a large estate, real and personal, which, in consequence of the neglect of the said creditors and assignees, in not duly prosecuting the said commission, has been wasted and misapplied, without benefit to the creditors or to the bankrupt." This allegation has not been disproved, nor as I recollect, denied to be true, from that time to the present. It is the ground and reason on which the petitioner, Henry Morris, prayed the district judge "that the said commission of bankruptcy may be vacated and superseded." This petition, as appears by an endorsement on it, was read, filed, and a rule granted to show cause, &c., returnable on 26th December, 1825. On that day the rule was enlarged till 13th January, 1826. No further proceeding was then had, for reasons which do not appear, nor does it appear to whom the rule to show cause was directed, nor that any service of it was made. On the 15th of January, 1830, the application on behalf of Henry Morris, was renewed to me; and Mr. Williams was heard as the counsel for the petitioner. No counsel appeared to oppose it. On the 22d of the same month, I ordered, that notice of the application be specially given to John H. Huston, the petitioning creditor; and a public notice, in the National Gazette, three times a week for two weeks, to all the creditors of the bankrupt, that the judge will proceed to hear and decide upon the petition on Friday, the 19th of February, 1830. On that day proof was given that the notices, respectively, had been given in conformity with the order. The application then rested until the 17th of the following September, during the whole of which time it cannot be doubted, that any application or argument, in opposition to the petition, would have been attended to. On the 17th of September, no opposition being made, either by the creditors who had proved under the commission, or by any other person claiming to be a creditor, or to have any right or interest in the estate of the bankrupt—the order was made "That the commission issued in the case be vacated, and superseded, according to the prayer of the petitioner." How far these proceedings were known to the creditors of Mr. Morris by the public notice given to them, I cannot say; Mr. Sansom, in a way which has not been satisfactory to the opposite counsel, has denied a knowledge of them, or rather as they say. that he had notice of them; perhaps this criticism is rather too close and verbal, as it would involve Mr. Sansom in an equivocation equal to an untruth, under his solemn affirmation, which ought not to be imputed to him, without a more satisfactory demonstration. The proceeding on the petition of Henry Morris, was not hurried. It was pending nearly five years. If in that time it was known to Mr. Sansom or any other of the creditors of Robert Morris, it was also known to them in law if not in fact, for the petition was open to them, that the application for the supersedeas was made on the ground that Robert Morris was possessed of a large estate, which in consequence of the neglect of the creditors and assignees, was wasted and misapplied; and it was also clearly understood, for otherwise the supersedeas would be fruitless, that something remained to be redeemed from the neglect by which so much had been lost, and which, if redeemed, would enure to the benefit of the creditors, if they would look after it; or to the family of Mr. Morris, if the creditors by abandoning it would suffer it to return to the representatives of the bankrupt, by superseding the commission. The effect of the supersedeas, if lawfully ordered, was to annihilate the commission, and to place the bankrupt with his estate and effects in the same situation they would have been in, had it never existed. He, or, in this case, his representatives, were fully restored to all their rights over his property, and resumed the management, control, and disposition of it. So they remained, unquestioned and undisturbed, until the 8th day of December, 1836—a period of more than six years. On that day the petition of William Sansom was filed, followed by his affidavit, on the 15th of the same month. The petitioner states that he was a creditor of R. Morris, by a judgment, upon which there are due the sum of $9,484.12, with interest from the 23d of December, 1805; and also by another judgment obtained by John Dunwoody, for a large amount. He sets out the commission of bankruptcy against Mr. Morris, and his certificate of discharge; says that he has learned that a supersedeas has lately been granted, but has not been able to learn upon whose application, or upon what grounds. He represents that no notice was given to him, or, as far as he can learn, to any other creditor, of the application for the supersedeas: that he has a considerable interest in proceeding under the commission, and is advised, that if the power exists to take it away, it cannot be exercised without due notice, and an opportunity to be heard: he therefore prays for a review of the proceedings, in reference to the alleged supersedeas, and that he may be heard by counsel in opposition to it. The affidavit verifies the petition, particularly as to his having no notice of the application for the supersedeas. I cannot forbear to remark that some of the allegations in this petition are rather singular, without meaning to say that they will have any weight in deciding upon it. The petitioner says, that although he has learned that a supersedeas has lately (six years before) been granted—he has not been able to learn upon whose application, nor upon what grounds it was done. He has not informed us how he learned that the supersedeas was granted, nor what means he took, after he was informed of it, to discover who was the applicant for it, or the grounds upon which it was granted. Certainly in the same office where he filed his petition, the petition of Henry Morris was filed six years before, and there remained, and that petition shows the ground of the application. The proceedings of the judge upon that application were filed in the same place, and were equally accessible to Mr. Sansom. It is true that he does not aver that he took any step or measure to obtain this information, unless such an averment may be inferred from his declaration that he had not been able to obtain it. The petitioner, as the ground, and, I may say, the only legal ground of his application to revoke the supersedeas, and restore the commission, alleges, "that he has a considerable interest in proceeding under the commission." It cannot be overlooked, that his interest in the commission was so inconsiderable in his own estimation, that although living in the city in which the commissioners sat, and where from time to time the creditors of the bankrupt were appearing and proving their debts, he never, for thirty years, during the pendency of the commission, thought it worth his while to give half an hour to the proof of his debt, or to the interest he had in the commission. How far an interest has since arisen which can assist him in this application, will be a subject of future consideration. At present I refer to these circumstances, not as impairing his legal rights, but as affecting his equity, if he shall be thrown upon that to support himself. This case is altogether one of the first impression here, and, in some of its features and aspects, without precedent in England, where so many volumes have been published upon their bankrupt laws. The counsel engaged in the argument on both sides, have given unwearied labor to their investigations, and although so many days have been appropriated to the hearing, my attention has been required and willingly afforded to every part of it. I may be tedious in developing my views of the leading matters and questions which have been discussed, but I would rather be so, than overlook what either party may deem to be important.

The first question which presents itself, is the jurisdiction or authority of the district judge of the United States over the subject-matter of the petition of Henry, Morris—that is—had he the power to grant the prayer of that petition, and to make the order to supersede the commission of bankruptcy, then in operation against Robert Morris. This question has been argued on the basis of the powers of the lord chancellor in England, under the British statutes of bankruptcy, and this inquiry was pursued in two divisions: (1) What are the powers of the lord chancellor, and from what source does he derive them? (2) Has the district judge the same powers in the execution of our act of congress, as are exercised by the chancellor? It is true that no case has been shown where the lord chancellor has superseded a commission of bankruptcy under circumstances like those of the present case; but these circumstances are really so extraordinary, that one may say they have never before occurred, and are not likely to occur again. We have here a commission taken out against a bankrupt, who was the possessor of an immense real and personal estate, laboring under incumbrances of unknown amounts. The commission proceeds so far, as that creditors having debts of three millions made the regular proofs before the commissioners. An election was duly held for assignees, and they were chosen—a large number of the creditors attending for that purpose. The assignees never accepted the trust—never executed a counterpart of the assignment, and the whole proceeding stopped. After the commissioners had executed their assignment, which was on the 8th of December, they met no more, nor was a movement made by any creditor of the bankrupt, who had, or had not, proved under the commission, to call the commissioners together, to have other assignees appointed, or to move one step further with the commission; and so it remained for five-and-twenty years, when the supersedeas was applied for; and so that application remained for five years longer, without a stir on the part of any creditor to proceed with the commission. We cannot be surprised that no such a case has been found in England, and we must therefore look rather to the principles on which the chancellor has raised his power in cases of bankruptcy, than for any precedent like this,—creditors to the amount of three millions, taking such an interest in the commission as to go through the trouble and formality of proving their debts, attending afterwards to choose assignees to take charge of those interests, and then suddenly abandoning the whole concern, and never, to this hour, returning to it. To ascertain the nature and extent of the jurisdiction of the lord chancellor, over cases of bankruptcy, we must inquire what is the source from which he derives it, and how he has drawn his powers from that source. I think an examination of the authorities on this subject will show, that all his powers are derived from the statutes of bankruptcy; that he has none as a court of chancery—not one that he has not drawn either from the express authority of those statutes, or by the constructions and implications he has thought he might fairly make, being found necessary for the just and full execution of those statutes, to give to them all the benefit to the bankrupt and his creditors intended by the legislature, and to prevent any wrong and injustice by the abuse of them. Numerous cases have been cited, which show, that the authority to supersede a commission of bankruptcy, which is exercised without question by the lord chancellor, extends over a large field; indeed, no precise boundaries appear to be marked for it. The chancellor interferes in this way on very broad and general principles, for the purposes of justice, and to prevent an abuse of the bankrupt laws, to the prejudice of the bankrupt, as well as of the creditors. They are both under his protection, and he takes care that the true intentions of the legislature in making the statutes, as he understands them, shall be carried into effect, and shall not be perverted, either by the bankrupt, or by his creditors, to the work of injustice. This is the broad principle on which he acts, and. without any express words in the statutes, he assumes that his powers are commensurate with these objects. But as this extent of power is not expressly granted to him by the language of the statutes, it is argued that he exercises it by virtue of his general chancery jurisdiction; that he takes this authority to himself because he is the lord chancellor, and holds the great seal; and not because he is the person or officer designated in the bankrupt laws to issue the commission: in short, that he has the authority only to issue the commission, with certain other powers, by the express grant of the statute, and that his subsequent control over it, except in the cases designated, is by virtue of his office and jurisdiction as lord chancellor. I am not of this opinion; and a brief recurrence to some of the leading cases will show that it cannot be supported; on the contrary, that all and every power he exercises over bankruptcy, is derived, either expressly, or by construction and implication, from the statutes: that he has none as a chancery court, or by virtue of his office as chancellor; that the two jurisdictions are entirely separate and distinct. The jurisdiction of the lord chancellor in bankruptcy is distinct from that of chancery. 6 Ves. 782. The jurisdiction is under a special authority, distinct from that of the court of chancery. 8 Ves. 250. It is a legal and equitable jurisdiction. 15 Ves. 496. The case of Ex parte Cawkwell, 19 Ves. 233, was a petition for an order on the bankrupt to produce to the commissioners a deed of trust. The order was made by Lord Eldon, who says: "It is in many instances difficult to state precisely the principle on which the jurisdiction stands, in which a bankrupt is often ordered to do that for which there is no express authority." Now if it might have been referred to the general jurisdiction of the chancellor, there could have been no difficulty about it; nothing could be more simple; the want of an express authority would have created none. Lord Eldon then adverts to Lord Hardwicke's opinion in these terms: "It is well we have Lord Hardwicke's authority for it; who took a very large principle as to the jurisdiction in bankruptcy; thinking that the legislature having committed to the lord chancellor the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, he had all the authority that he had when sitting in the court of chancery." Well might Lord Eldon say that this was a large principle to act upon in such a case. This opinion of Lord Hardwicke has been much relied upon by the counsel for the petitioner in support of his doctrine, that the chancellor derives his extraordinary powers over cases of bankruptcy from and by his general chancery jurisdiction. I confess, it appears to me to admit of no such conclusion; on the contrary, it is the very strongest case we have, to show that he does nothing by his general jurisdiction, but that he obtains all his powers from the statutes, but has thought himself at liberty to use, very freely, his discretion in construing the statutes, in order to get, by implication, the authority he thought necessary for the purposes of justice, and the due execution of the statutes. This opinion of Lord Hardwicke is truly the most copious stream of power that the chancellor has drawn from the statutes, the acknowledged fountain of all his jurisdiction in bankruptcy; and it is so far from restricting that jurisdiction to the cases expressly granted, that it sets us an example in the use of construction and implication to obtain powers, which has no limits but the discretion of the chancellor or judge. To return to Lord Hardwicke—on what ground does he assume the large principle which gives him so much power? Is it by his distinct independent jurisdiction as chancellor? By no means—he thought "that the legislature having committed to the chancellor the jurisdiction in bankruptcy, he had all the authority that he had in the court of chancery." This was his construction of the statute—his belief of the intention of the legislature—his inference from the language and objects of the statutes, and of consequence it is from them and from them only, that he assumes the jurisdiction. In the case in 14 Ves. 449, the question was, whether the commissioner could compel the bankrupt who had obtained his certificate to attend the commissioners. The chancellor said, "Without the existence of such a power, the mode of allowing certificates must be altered." He asserts that he has the power to compel the attendance of witnesses, admitting that there is no express authority given by the statute for that purpose. How then does he get it? Is it by his general chancery jurisdiction? By no means; but by implication; by construction of the meaning and intention of the bankrupt laws, which he says "were framed with a view to the authority with which the lord chancellor is intrusted in his ordinary jurisdiction." But the statutes do not say that they were framed with any such view, nor is there any reference in them to the general chancery jurisdiction for their execution. It is the mere inference or implication of the chancellor, as is the opinion of Lord Hardwicke, from the statutes themselves, from which, in some way, by construction more or less reasonable, the whole power of the chancellor in bankruptcy is derived. The case of Ex parte Smith, 19 Ves. 473, was a petition to supersede a commission of bankruptcy, because it was taken out by an attorney who was not a solicitor of chancery. No express power is given to supersede for this reason. The objection was overruled, not on the ground of a want of jurisdiction, but because "a commission of bankruptcy is a proceeding not in the court of chancery; and a solicitor in chancery has no more connexion with proceedings in bankruptcy, and is as much a stranger, as an attorney of king's bench or common pleas." And so is the chancellor as such. Eden, 449, quoting Mr. Christian, says, the jurisdiction of the lord chancellor in bankruptcy is "a subject involved in great obscurity and mystery." Why so, if it may be referred at once to the general chancery jurisdiction? He proceeds, "which can only be developed by attention to its history and progress, and to those general principles of the common law by which statutes are construed, and to those also which are applicable to every new commission emanating from the great seal by virtue of the authority of the legislature." The author then refers to the opinion of Lord Eldon in 14 Ves. 451, as "comprising everything necessary to be known upon the subject." In Ex parte Dufrayne, 1 Rolle, Abr. 333, it is said, the chancellor will supersede, if justice requires it, although the strict law would not.

The result of these authorities seems to be that the lord chancellor, taking the language of the statutes and the intention of the legislature for his premises, determines, by a process of reasoning and deductions from them, that he has certain powers in the execution of the bankrupt laws, which are not expressly given to him, but which he believes are incidental to the power given, and may be implied from the premises mentioned, that is, the language and intention of the legislature, and not from the great seal. Has the chancellor a broader discretion in the construction of a law, which he is called upon to execute, than the district judge in the same situation? They must both take the statute for their guide and authority as they conscientiously understand it. The British acts have named the chancellor as the person or officer who is to issue the commission and hold other expressed powers. Any other person or officer might have been named, and his powers would have been the same, provided the words of the statute would have afforded the same construction or implication. With us the district judge issues the commission, and has other express powers, and he has also all the powers which he may deduce by a fair and legal construction of the act of congress, and the intention of the legislature in framing that act. The sound and tenable reasoning on the subject appears to me to be this. Cases must occur in which justice to the bankrupt, justice to his creditors, the rights and interests of both, the whole scope and spirit of the bankrupt system, will require, that a commission issued ought to be revoked and superseded: that its continuance would afford a benefit to no one, would injure many, would countenance injustice, perhaps fraud. Can it be then that, because the act of congress has no enumeration of such cases, no special provision or grant of power, to prevent or arrest these evils, there is therefore no remedy for them, there is no authority over them? Such a presumption is insufferable. Where then should we look for the authority to perform this act of justice? To whom must we presume it was intended to be intrusted? Who is to recall the commission?—the authority which is thus abused, which every one must agree ought to be recalled by somebody? The answer would seem to be, that the jurisdiction which issued the commission ought to be, must be, in the absence of any other,—and no other exists,—that which shall revoke it. That the judge to whom the power is given to issue the commission has also the power to recall it, if, instead of answering the purposes for which it was issued, it is used as an instrument of fraud, of oppression, of injustice, for the destruction of the property and rights it was intended to preserve, without producing one of the benefits expected from it. If the judge should supersede, where he ought not to have done so by a false or forced construction of the law, taking by such means a power which he was not entitled to, the act will be a nullity; and any party injured by it can obtain ample redress. But if he has no authority to supersede his commission, the mischief will go on; and I know of no remedy for it. To apply this remark to the present case: if, as has been contended on the part of the petitioner, the supersedeas was ordered without any authority,—if the judge exceeded his jurisdiction in making the order,—it is obviously a nullity; it does not stand in the way of the rights or remedies of Mr. Sansom, or any other person, creditor or not a creditor, having proved or not having proved under the commission; but the commission, and every right and remedy under it, now stand in as full life as on the first day of its existence. Why does not the petitioner proceed as if the supersedeas had no existence? If his judgments will avail him in any way, or to any purpose, the supersedeas opposes no impediment to their operation. If, by lapse of time, or other means, he can have no proceeding by his judgments against the lands, which now seem to be the object of his pursuit, or against any other property of the bankrupt, then the revocation of the supersedeas would afford him no aid against that difficulty; it would not better his situation in the smallest degree. The supersedeas, on his argument of its invalidity, does not stand between him and these lands, or impair his remedies against them. If he has lost them, it is not by a void supersedeas. What course may he take if the supersedeas were revoked, according to the prayer of his petition? He may proceed under the commission, have new commissioners appointed, assignees chosen, the property of the bankrupt, wherever found, taken possession of and distributed among his creditors. What hinders his doing all this now, on the supposition that the supersedeas was unauthorized and is void? On this view of the case, on this ground for revoking the supersedeas, he has no interest in revoking it, because it works no injury to him or his rights. Nor can the holders of the new warrants, which, it is said, have been laid on the lands, —a part of them in Schuylkill county,—derive the least advantage from the removal of the supersedeas, be it valid or invalid. They may bring their ejectments. If the supersedeas be good and valid, they will have to encounter the title of Robert Morris, and no other; for the lands were sold as his property, and the purchasers hold them only by his title. If the warrant-holders show a better one, they will recover. On the other hand, if the supersedeas be ineffectual and void, still, the warrant-holder must meet and overthrow the same title of Robert Morris, for his creditors will defend under that title. The result then is that, whether the petitioner intends to pursue these lands under his judgments, or by the new warrants, in which he denies having any interest, or by proceeding with the commission, the supersedeas—if, as he contends, invalid—will put no difficulty in his way; and he may have its validity tried by any court of competent jurisdiction he may select.

Before I leave the question of jurisdiction, I must not omit to notice the case of Lucas v. Morris [Case No. 8,587]. A bill was filed in the circuit court of the United States, calling upon the defendants, as trustees, to account, and to compel them to carry into execution the trust which they had assumed as assignees of a bankrupt. One of the defendants pleaded in abatement to the jurisdiction of the court, alleging that the matters and causes of complaint belonged exclusively to the judge of the district court. Judge Thompson, of the circuit court, said that, if the bill embraces any matter of which the circuit court had cognizance, the plea must be overruled; for it claims for the district judge the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of all matters comprised in the bill. The judge says that he cannot discover that the act of congress has given "exclusive jurisdiction to the district judge over the entire execution of the law." Certainly it does not; nothing can be more manifest; and it is equally clear that, in the matter in question before the court, the act of congress did not, either expressly or by any reasonable implication, give the jurisdiction to the district judge, much less a jurisdiction entirely independent of the ordinary powers of courts of justice. It was claimed on the broad ground that the district judges were the sole organs to administer the bankrupt law. Now, there is a wide difference between the powers of the lord chancellor and our judges in this very matter of control over the assignees. In England the choice of assignees is subject to a control, the largest, most general, and unqualified, of any of the authorities given to the lord chancellor in bankruptcy. By the thirty-first section of St. 5 Geo. II. c. 30, the chancellor may remove assignees and appoint new ones; and this control over them carries with it the authority to compel them to account;—a refusal would be a good ground for their removal. By the eighth section of our act of congress, the power of removing assignees, and appointing others, is expressly delegated to the creditors, and excludes every implication of that power, or of any power incidental to it, in the district judges. No inference, then, can be drawn from anything that was said or done by Judge Thompson in the case of Lucas v. Morris [supra], that the district judges possess no powers over the execution of the bankrupt laws but such as are expressly given to them; nor even that they have not the jurisdiction of the lord chancellor, except where it is clearly limited by the provisions of the act of congress. To revert for a moment to the "large principle" of Lord Hardwicke, sanctioned in a manner by Lord Eldon, the argument (for it is but an argument), founded on the statutes, that, because the lord chancellor is named to issue the commission, &c., he may therefore bring his whole chancery jurisdiction into the execution of these statutes, is no better than to say that because the district judge is named in the act of congress for the same purposes, he may exercise all his judicial authority in the administration of that act; and then, by invoking the analogy, so often repeated, between commissions of bankruptcy and executions, the power of the judge will be ample enough. With great deference to such high authority, it appears to me that neither the chancellor nor the judge have any jurisdiction over bankruptcy, virtute officiorum, but obtain it directly from the statutes, by express grants, or by incidents to those grants drawn from the statutes "by those general principles of the common law by which statutes are construed." Eden, 449. Whether a district judge, in his discretion, would feel authorized to draw as largely on this fund as the lord chancellor has done, is another question. Whatever power they rightfully have is by virtue of the statutes, and not by virtue of their offices.

Some authorities have been cited to show that even in England it is too late for a supersedeas after the bankrupt has obtained his certificate. I think this principle has not been sustained. It is manifest that the power of the chancellor over the commission continues after the certificate, from the orders he has repeatedly made upon the bankrupt, witnesses, &c. It is true that Lord Eldon says, as quoted by Eden, 434, citing Ex parte Crowder, 2 Rolle, 324, "that he never knew an instance in which a bankruptcy was superseded after the bankrupt had obtained his certificate, on an objection to the debt, trading, or act of bankruptcy." This limitation of the objection to these objects affords some implication that it extends no farther; and we see a good reason why, after the proof of the debt of the petitioning creditor, the trading, and act of bankruptcy by the bankrupt, have been acquiesced in, until he has obtained his certificate, he shall not be deprived of it by objections to them. Eden, pursuing the subject, says that "it has been determined that a commission will not be superseded after the certificate allowed, unless the invalidity appear on the proceedings." For this he cites Ex parte Levi, Buck, 75. By turning to the case, it will be found that it is so far from changing the ground taken by Lord Eldon, that it is merely confirmatory of it, and by no means sustains this author in his general allegation that a commission will not be superseded after certificate allowed unless the invalidity appear on the proceedings. The case was, "a bankrupt had obtained his certificate, and then the petition to supersede the commission was presented, on the ground that he was not a trader within the meaning of the bankrupt laws; and that the commission was a concerted one." The vice chancellor decided that "unless it appears upon the face of the proceedings that the party declared a bankrupt is not a trader, the petition is precluded from going into evidence to disprove the fact of trading, without he can show that the commission was fraudulent." On this decision, being one of the special cases put by Lord Eldon, Mr. Eden has raised the general proposition, that "a commission will not be superseded unless the invalidity appear on the proceedings." In Ex parte Bass, 4 Madd. 270, the same doctrine is given in the same restricted terms. The bankrupt will not, after having obtained his certificate, be allowed to impeach the commission, upon the ground that he was no trader, but he was permitted to supersede the commission, after certificate, where the title of the assignees had been successfully opposed in an action, and the commission, therefore, becomes inoperative. In the same sweeping way, Eden lays it down, that "where a bankrupt has submitted to his commission for a considerable length of time, he cannot petition to supersede it." For this he cites Flower v. Herbert, 2 Ves. Sr. 326. This was not the case of a petition for a supersedeas, nor for anything that has any analogy to it. It was a motion for an injunction to stay proceedings in an action at law, brought by the bankrupt against his assignees. It was an action of trover. The bankrupt had surrendered; had submitted to an examination; he had himself petitioned for new assignees; and a year and a half after these admissions that the proceedings under the commission were right, he brought an action of trover against the assignees, denying that he was a bankrupt. The chancellor said, that no one would accept to be an assignee, if they were to be exposed to such suits by the bankrupt, notwithstanding his acquiescence. This was no petition for a supersedeas on behalf of the bankrupt, but a prayer for an injunction against him, in a suit he had brought, under such circumstances, against his assignee. It seems to me that the power and practice of the chancellor over bankruptcy, in all its stages, before and after the certificate, are not confined to any specified cases, but are exercised whenever, in his sound and judicial discretion, he finds his interference right and necessary, to carry into effect the due execution of the statutes, according to the intention of the legislature, and to prevent any abuse of them for the purposes of fraud, oppression, and injustice.

It is manifest from the course of my remarks, that if I were compelled to pronounce a decision upon the question of jurisdiction, I should, as now advised, sustain it as a necessary power for the just administration of the bankrupt law, according to the intention of the legislature, and to prevent great abuses and mischiefs which might exist if it could not be exercised. I think, however, that I am not now called upon to express any more absolute opinion upon this point. Were I to yield to the argument against the power of the judge to order his supersedeas, it would, of itself, be a sufficient reason for refusing the prayer of the petition. Why should I do that which will be of no benefit to him; which will add nothing to his rights or remedies? Why should I oppose an inefficient, useless revocation, to an inefficient, powerless order? I should not have the reluctance or hesitation of a moment to recall an error which would restore to a suitor any right of which the error had deprived him; but I should be unwilling to spread upon my records contradictory decrees, for no beneficial purpose or end to anybody. The chance of the petitioner, so far as he considers the success of the prayer of his petition to be important, is better, by admitting the power of the judge to order the supersedeas, and showing that the case was not one in which the order ought to have been made, and probably would not have been made, with a knowledge of all the circumstances. I will, therefore, proceed to examine the case on the supposition that the judge had authority to order the supersedeas; and the question then will be, whether the petitioner has shown good cause for revoking it.

In this view of the case the petitioner must put himself upon his equity, as opposed to the equity of those who resist his application. At his first step he must meet and overcome the objection to his application in the character of a creditor of Robert Morris, after having forgotten or disregarded it for so many years. The peace of society, the settled condition of property, are cardinal objects of every government. To preserve them the legislature, in some instances, by positive enactments, and. in others, the courts, by their judicial discretion, have raised barriers against stale and neglected claims, which may not be passed, whatever the rights may be that are excluded by them. Such are the limitations of time upon writs of error, bills of review, &c. I shall not hold the petitioner in this case to be interdicted from a hearing, even by the extraordinary number of years that have passed away, before he made a movement for the assertion of his claim, but consider the delay only as it affects his equity under all the circumstances of the case: I do not speak of his inattention to the proceedings for obtaining the supersedeas—he says he had no notice of them—but of his inattention to the commission, of which he certainly had notice and knowledge, and to reinstate which is the object of his present application. For thirty years he thought the commission of no importance to him; he had no right of interest in it or under it which, in his opinion, was worthy of his attention; and now he seeks, on the ground of that right and interest, to bring back this commission to existence. We may certainly say, that he must be prepared to show strong reasons for such an indulgence. I do not say that this neglect of the claim he now urges upon me has shut him out from a fair consideration of his case. I have heard him—he has been faithfully and ably defended, and I shall endeavor faithfully, at least. to do him justice, not overlooking the justice that may be due to others. I must here recur to his conduct during the progress of the commission. He saw the whole proceeding entangled, and finally stopped, by impediments he could have removed at once, but he stirred not. Having securities which put him in a better situation than other creditors, he let them struggle in endeavors which he thought would be fruitless, while he declines to share the labor, or put one dollar at hazard in the attempt. After a lapse of many years, the family of the bankrupt discover some property, or some interest which he had in property, which was going to waste and ruin, because there was nobody to attend to it. The creditors, and the petitioner among them, had for five-and-twenty years abandoned the whole concern, and there was no power in the family of the bankrupt, or in anybody, to make them or him return to it. What was to be done? Was the property, whatever was its value, to be lost, for want of an owner? If the creditors would not have it, if Mr. Sansom rejected all interest in it, should it not revert to the party who had assigned or tendered it to them, provided there was a power in the law to return it to him? Why did Mr. Sansom disregard, for so many years, the commission he now thinks of so much value to him? It was known to him—he was called on again and again to appear with his claims as a creditor before the commissioners. He did not—he would not appear. Nobody knew, officially, that he was a creditor—that he had any claims upon the bankrupt, or his effects—any interest in what was doing under the commission, or what might finally be done with it. After a lapse of twenty-five years, he wakes up—he comes forth from his obscurity, and presents himself here as a creditor of Robert Morris, having an interest in the commission of bankruptcy, which entitles him to the favor of the judge, by the revocation of an order deliberately made, in relation to that commission. He asks that this order may be expunged or revoked, in order that he may be allowed to enrol himself under the commission as one of the creditors of Robert Morris, for no other creditor asks for it; he now wishes to prove his debt before the commissioners, and to reinstate the commission with all its legal rights and consequences. He seems to be either one of the sleepers for whom the law will not watch; or one of the watchers who look quietly upon the labors of others without sharing them, but keep themselves ready to seize upon any benefit that may result from them. What reasons has the petitioner offered to justify or explain his long inaction in relation to his rights and interests as a creditor of Robert Morris? I have no reference now to any proceedings under his judgment, or to the validity of that judgment, as it may or may not be affected by time. He has offered some reasons which he thinks should rebut the presumption of satisfaction of his judgment by lapse of time, which may be hereafter adverted to. But that is a secondary question on this application, which is not for the revival of the judgment, or to authorize any proceeding under it. For my present object, I may consider that he has a debt, that might be proved under the commission. He asks that the commission may be reinstated, for the sole purpose of admitting him to that proof. He asks that an order which superseded that commission, and which in the present inquiry is assumed to have been authorized and valid, shall be revoked, that he may have the opportunity to present his claim to the commissioners, and make such proof there of the validity of his debt, as may be in his power. It is clear, then, that the delay, the neglect which he has to account for, is not of his judgment, but of the opportunities which were afforded to him, for thirty years, to do that which he now desires to do. I have no recollection that any explanation, legal or equitable, has been offered for Mr. Sansom's declining for so long a time to prove the debt he now wishes to prove. The four reasons for inaction were applied to his judgment—to his debt, to show that it was not lost by lapse of time. But none of these were used, or could be used, to explain his neglect of the commission, and his entire disregard of the rights under it which he would now recall and reassume. These reasons were—the bankruptcy—the death of Mr. Morris—the difference between a judgment and a bond—and his ignorance of the existence of the Schuylkill county lands. Granting that these may have been the motives for taking no proceeding under his judgment, and without anticipating how effectual they may be to preserve his debt from extinction under the pressure of thirty-five years, it is enough to say, that they do not account for, justify, or explain, his delay to prosecute his rights under the commission.

I will now suppose that this objection is removed or waived; still it is incumbent on the petitioner to satisfy me that he will gain some benefit—some substantial and adequate benefit—by obtaining the prayer of his petition. I will not revoke a decree rightfully and deliberately made, after so long an acquiescence by all interested in it, and most especially after rights have been acquired under it, unless it is clearly shown to me that justice to the petitioner requires it, and that justice will be measured, in part, by the advantage he is to gain by it. If it be clear he can gain nothing, he has no justice to support him—he will be a mere stranger intruding himself into a proceeding in which he has no interest. If his interest be but nominal, or so inconsiderable as not to be worthy of regard, the judge would not disturb a decree from a repose of six years, and, assuredly, will not put in jeopardy or doubt the interests of others, to gratify such an application. It is a maxim ever of the common law, that "de minimis non curat lex," and new trials have been refused, on the ground of the insignificance of the interest of the party, who otherwise would have been entitled to it. It is clear that, in this case, the petitioner can gain nothing by his petition and the order he prays for, but the opportunity to prove his debt under the commission, and to receive such a dividend of the Schuylkill county lands, which are all the property of the bankrupt known to us, as his debt will entitle him to. The inquiry, then, to which a judge, acting on a broad and equitable discretion, will turn, is, whether the petitioner can obtain this benefit by reopening the commission, and what will it be worth to him? The judgment, which is the evidence of his debt, is now nearly forty years old, almost double the period which the law allows to the existence of it as a debt. His last proceeding on it was in 1805—more than thirty years before his present application. Could the commissioners of the bankrupt admit such a debt to be proved, or such a creditor to participate in the distribution of the effects of the bankrupt? If it stood naked and alone, it is, in my opinion, most manifest, that either the bankrupt, if living—or his representatives, as he is dead,—or any of his creditors, objecting to the admission of such a debt, the commissioners would have no legal right to receive it; and if received, it would be expunged, as in the case in 15 Ves. 479. The examination of the numerous cases on this point has occupied a large portion of the argument of counsel on both sides. I forbear to examine them. The general effect of such a lapse of time upon a judgment is not denied; but it is alleged, that this effect, which is but a presumption of law, may be explained and rebutted by circumstances—by evidence, which, in the opinion of a court and jury, would keep the debt alive; and that the petitioner has a right to go before the commissioners, or to a jury, at his election, to satisfy them that he has such circumstances and evidence as would relieve him from this presumption—would account for his delay, in a manner to preserve his debt. This is true; but in order to induce me to grant his petition on this ground, it is incumbent upon him now, and here, to satisfy me that he has such evidence and such circumstances in his power, not as absolutely as might be required of him by the court, but sufficiently so to convince me that he has some fair and reasonable ground to go upon—some probable legal expectation of making out his case, if the opportunity is accorded to him. In an application to a common law court to open a judgment and let the party into a defence, the court will be well satisfied that he has an available defence, before they will disturb their judgment. It is not enough for him to say—give me the opportunity, and I will try what I can do with it—he must show to the judge for whose interference he applies in his behalf, what his reasons are, and that he has a good case to exhibit. In the present case, I do not think that, as matter of law, the facts and circumstances relied upon by the petitioner could avail him to avoid the consequences of the lapse of time upon his debt. Should he go to a court, I must presume that the judges would take the decision of the law upon themselves; and as to the facts, taking them to be just as the petitioner has represented them, they are altogether insufficient to entitle him to relief. I do not again repeat them, or go into the detail of my reasons for this opinion. It appears to me to be obvious, that neither the bankruptcy and death of Mr. Morris, nor the alleged difference in the law between a bond and a judgment, nor the petitioner's ignorance of the lands in question, are sufficient apologies for his neglecting to take the prescribed and ordinary means of keeping his debt alive, for any contingency that might be beneficial to him. Why should I open a commission for such a claim, which, with my opinion of it, I must believe would not be received by the commissioners, or by any other tribunal to which the petitioner might carry it? If I should refuse the prayer of the petitioner, if no reason were offered for his inertness for five-and-thirty years, I may, and ought also to refuse it, when the reasons offered to remedy this defect, are to me clearly insufficient: and particularly when those reasons are of a character that would fall under the dominion of the court, rather than of a jury, consisting of undisputed facts, and leaving the legal inferences from them only to be determined. The effect of the bankruptcy and death of Mr. Morris upon the lapse of time, are, in my opinion, clearly questions of law for the decision of the court, and not of a jury; so also is the supposed difference between a bond and a judgment, in this respect. The fourth reason—that is, the ignorance of Mr. Sansom of the existence of the land in question—is more of a mixed question; but I cannot suppose that either a court or jury would consider it as a good reason for such laches, or as avoiding the legal effect of time upon the debt. If he meant to take the chance of the discovery of property, he should have kept his judgment in a situation to avail himself of it; otherwise, we should, I think, have had heretofore, and shall have hereafter, the same defence set up in very many cases. If it is enough for a plaintiff to say that he did nothing under his judgment, because he did not know of any property to levy it upon, it is obvious how easy it will be to defeat the wise provision of the law which requires diligence of him. The reason is good, perhaps, for not taking out an execution, but certainly it does not account for the neglect to keep the judgment alive, by the inconsiderable trouble and expense of issuing a sci. fa. once in every five years. It must be understood, that I do not put my ultimate decision of this case upon this ground. It may be that I am mistaken on it; it may be that the commissioners, or a court and jury, would admit the proof of the debt, notwithstanding the lapse of time against it; it may be that they would deem the reasons of the petitioner for his inactivity sufficient to rebut the presumption of law; but it will be seen that my argument against the present application, is independent of the existence or non-existence of the debt of the petitioner; although, indeed, if he has no debt, it is, of itself, a sufficient reason for rejecting his petition. But if the judgment had been duly kept alive—if it were now a good and subsisting debt—the objection remains, which I think is fatal to this application to the equity and discretion of the judge, that the petitioner has neglected the matter for thirty-five years, during the whole of which time it was in his power to do that which he now desires to do, and to allow which, he calls upon the judge to review a proceeding of six years' standing, and to revoke a decree under which valuable rights have been acquired. This is the radical defect of his claim. There is no equity in such a petition

There is another consideration, of no imposing weight, in the legal aspect of the case, but which bears strongly upon its equity. If it were certain that Mr. Sansom will take upon himself to proceed with this commission—to have new commissioners and new assignees, who will accept the trust, appointed; and that the commissioners will admit the proof of his debt, and all this must be done, or he has no object or interest in the success of his petition—then I may inquire whether he will have such an interest in revoking the supersedeas, and restoring the commission, whether he can derive such a benefit from it, as will justify me, in the exercise of a sound and equitable discretion, in annulling a decree made so deliberately and so long ago, and in taking the hazard of the wrongs and injuries which it may inflict upon others who have put their faith in the permanency of the decree;—can I hesitate to see on which side the strongest, the preponderating equity lies? It is hardly credible, that the petitioner would proceed with this commission, when, from any calculation I have been able to make on the facts now before me, he could never receive from it one-half of the amount of the expense of his first step. He could not obtain the first meeting of the commissioners for twice the sum he will, if his whole claim is allowed, receive from them. I will not presume that he is struggling to gratify his pride or his resentment by a barren victory, which he never intends to prosecute to any result, but, having succeeded in annulling the supersedeas, will leave the commission as he found it. I confess, that nothing in this case, from the beginning, has been so obscure to me, as the object of the petitioner. It is admitted that his judgments cannot be aided, as their liens are certainly gone; and indeed no advantage is claimed or expected by him, but to prove his debt, under the bankruptcy, and I have shown what that is worth. It is no answer to say, that if he has any interest, however small, it is enough for this application. He addresses himself to the discretion of the judge, on the equity of his case, and it is the duty of the judge to look to other parties and their equities, which may be affected by his decision.

I might well stop here, but it will, perhaps, be more satisfactory and just to one of the parties who has opposed this petition to say a few words upon a part of the case which has occupied a considerable portion of the discussion, and excited much of its animation. I mean the interest of Mr. Rawle in the supersedeas, and in the lands he has purchased, since it was awarded. The facts are, that a certain judgment was rendered against Mr. Morris, at the suit of Joshua B. Bond, in March, 1797. On this judgment a testatum fi. fa. issued on the 1st February, 1798. Here it rested until April, 1830. In the mean time the plaintiff, J. B. Bond, died, and his administrator, for the use of William Rawle, on the 1st day of April, 1830, issued a scire facias against the representatives of Robert Morris, who was also dead, to revive the judgment. On the 6th of December, 1830, judgment was confessed on the scire facias, by Mr. Williams, who appeared as the attorney of the defendants. The original judgment being thus revived, a fi. fa. was issued which was levied on certain unimproved lands, now in Schuylkill county; they were sold under a venditioni exponas, in October, 1831, and William Rawle, Jun., Esq., was the purchaser for the consideration or sum of $5,100. It is evident that these proceedings, if they were objectionable, can have no direct operation or influence to help the petitioner if his case is defective in itself; so far, indeed, as he has been opposed by the claims of Mr. Rawle, as a bona fide purchaser on the faith of the supersedeas, he may inquire into the character and good faith of the purchase to resist the equity of that claim; beyond this it is of no importance what were the circumstances of that sale and purchase, or who are interested in them. But, in justice to Mr. Rawle, I ought not omit to take some notice of these proceedings. The allegations on the part of the petitioner are, that Mr. Rawle, in truth, paid no money for this purchase, and that the representatives of Mr. Morris are interested with him in the purchase, and that for part of it he is a trustee for them. Is there any force in these objections, either as they apply to the case before me, or for any purpose? If Mr. Rawle was a bona fide assignee, and holder of Mr. Bond's judgment, and that has not been questioned, there was nothing unusual, improper, or illegal, in his becoming the purchaser of the property at the sheriff's sale, nor in his being allowed to give a credit on his judgment for the purchase-money. If Mr. Sansom had any objection to this, legal or equitable, he might have called upon the sheriff to bring the money into court, and then the question would have been examined and decided by the proper tribunal, and not left for us on this petition. But he comes here to cure all his delays and delinquencies. It is clear that Mr. Sansom knew that this course was in his power, for the motion was made in the court of Schuylkill county, which refused to consider it for want of jurisdiction, as the process under which the sale was made, had issued from the supreme court. The motion then might have been renewed in the supreme court; and the right of Mr. Rawle to pay for the land in this way, with every other objection connected with it, would have been fully attended to and finally determined. I can see nothing in this objection; it does not impeach the legality or good faith of the sale and purchase. Nor is there anything more in the other objection, that Mr. Rawle is a trustee for the representatives of Mr. Morris as to part of the land. And why may he not be, for part or for the whole? Mr. Rawle appears at the sale, a good and lawful purchaser; he is the highest and best bidder; he is able and willing to comply with all the terms of the sale, and if he does so, is it any objection to his title, or the honesty of the whole transaction, that other persons, the representatives of the original defendant in the suit, are interested in the purchase, are to answer to him for a proportion of the purchase-money, and to share with him a portion of the land? I cannot see it; this is purely an affair between themselves, and is no more liable to objection than if Mr. Rawle, after his purchase, had sold a part of the land to the same persons. This trust, if it existed, had no effect upon the sale, for it is not pretended that it was known, and even now rests only on conjecture. If, however, it was an objection to the sale, it is now too late to make it; the occasion is gone by. "When the sheriff comes to acknowledge his deed, the court may, if there has been fraud or unfair practices, set aside the sale." Whart. Dig. 213. The interest which the representatives of Mr. Morris had in superseding the commission of bankruptcy, and that they expected to derive some benefit from the property which would be liberated by the supersedeas from the operation of the commission, has never been concealed. On the contrary, it was their open and avowed object; and their manner of obtaining it, if free from fraud and unfair practices, is of no moment. The supersedeas was ordered on the application of Henry Morris, one of the children of Robert Morris, and the ground of it was the waste and loss of property, which had taken place by locking it up under the commission, and the hope of rescuing what might remain. It was known that the effect of the supersedeas would be to annul the commission and all that had been done by, and under it, and to restore to the representatives of the bankrupt the property which had not been legally disposed of. Why did the children of Mr. Morris move in the thing, if they did not expect some benefit from it? Now these representatives appear here as distinct parties, to support for themselves, the order that was made on their petition; and if Mr. Rawle's equity as a purchaser, subsequent to the supersedeas and on the faith of it, were really liable to objection, it cannot affect the rights of the representatives of Mr. Morris, nor the property which has accrued to them by virtue of the supersedeas. Whether the lands purchased by Mr. Rawle constitute the whole property that has reverted to the bankrupt, I do not know, nor, perhaps, can it be certainly known by the parties; but if the commission is reinstated, that, as well as any other that may exist, will be wrested from them and brought back to the power of the commission. If, in superseding this commission, I transcended the powers delegated to me by the law, it is my consolation that it was a null and powerless act, which can do no injury to the rights of the petitioner. On the other hand, if that order was an authorized exercise of my authority and jurisdiction, it is a satisfaction to me, of great value, that I have given a close and attentive hearing to an able and laborious argument on behalf of the petitioner, in which learning and ingenuity were equally displayed, and that in deciding the case, I have omitted no means in my power, of reflection and research, to come to a sound and just conclusion. I order that the petition be dismissed.

On the 30th March, 1838, a petition was presented by N. Potts and Samuel Clement, assignees of the estate of Jacob Clement; Charles W. Smith and Jacob R. Smith, executors of the estate of James Smith; and S. and T. G. Hollingsworth, for the heirs of Jehu Hollingsworth. The petition stated the facts of the issuing the commission, the certificate of discharge, and the cessation of all further proceedings; it set forth the discovery of property belonging to the bankrupt, the death or disqualification of the commissioners, and prayed the appointment of new ones and for further relief. On the same day the court ordered a rule to show cause, on short notice, "why the prayer of the petition should not be granted. Notice to be given to the heirs and representatives of Robert Morris, the bankrupt." The hearing of the parties on the rule was subsequently postponed to the 17th November, 1838.

On the 10th November, 1838, the assignees of the estate of Jacob Clement, deceased, William Thaw, one of the heirs of Benjamin Thaw, deceased, and T. G. Hollingsworth, one of the heirs of Jehu Hollingsworth, deceased, filed a petition, in which they stated themselves to be creditors of Robert Morris, and reciting the issuing of the commission of bankruptcy and the granting a certificate of discharge. They stated that no further steps had been taken to render the property of the bankrupt available to his creditors, owing, as they supposed, to the belief that the unincumbered property was not sufficient to pay more than the expenses of the proceeding. The petitioners then averred that they had recently learned that certain real estate had been discovered, which was alleged to have been the property of Mr. Morris at the time of his bankruptcy, and which ought, therefore, to be applied to the payment of his debts; that they had learned also that a supersedeas of the said commission had been granted, upon the application of Henry Morris, stating himself to be one of the children of the bankrupt, but not alleging himself to have any interest in the estate; that, in fact, the said Henry had no interest in the estate, as would more fully appear by reference to the wills of the said Robert Morris, and his widow, Mary Morris, copies of which were annexed to the petition; that they had no notice or knowledge of the said application, or of the granting of the supersedeas until within the last three years, and that they or either of them neither knew or suspected that any proceedings to supersede the said commission had been commenced or were in contemplation. For these reasons the petitioners prayed for a review of the proceedings in reference to the alleged supersedeas, that it might be vacated and commissioners be appointed, the original ones having died or become disqualified; and for further relief. On the same day the court granted a "rule to show cause, on the 17th November, why the prayer of the petition should not be granted." Notice of the rule was accepted by the attorney of Henry Morris, and also by the attorney of Wm. Rawle, Esq., who claimed an interest in the property.

On the 17th November, 1838, the rules came on for a hearing before HOPKINSON, District Judge, and were argued by Meredith for the petitioners, and by Williams, who appeared for Henry Morris, and Tilghman, who appeared for Wm. Rawle, Esq., against the petitioners.

Mr. Meredith, for the petitioners.

The present petitioners appear on different grounds from the former petitioner, Mr. Sansom. He had not proved his debts under the commission, while the present petitioners have done so. At the time of Mr. Sansom's petition, Henry Morris was supposed and assumed to have an interest in the estate, when, in fact, he had none, for all Robert Morris's property was left to his wife; and this court would not have ordered a supersedeas knowingly on the petition of a stranger in interest. In order to show that Henry Morris had no interest, we must ask whether Robert Morris had a devisable interest in the lands recently discovered, and if not, whether he had a descendible interest in them. It is, however, sufficient for our purpose to show that he had a devisable interest, for which see Jones v. Perry, 3 Term R. 88; Fearne, Rem. 549; Ex parte Paddy, Buck, 235. The petitioners had no notice of the proceedings for the supersedeas. Sansom not being a known creditor —not having proved his debt—could have no notice but by publication; but these petitioners are known creditors, on record, and were entitled to personal notice. In a case like this there is a remedy in England without a supersedeas, as the commission of bankruptcy is a trust; in the first instance, for the creditors, and then for the bankrupt as to any surplus remaining after the creditors are paid. Lowndes v. Taylor, 2 Rose, 365; Hammond v. Attwood, 3 Madd. 158; Saxton v. Davis, 18 Ves. 81; Ex parte Wilson, 1 Atk. 218. It is an error to suppose that the commission is annihilated; it is not so. The judge has ordered that a supersedeas shall be issued, but it never has been issued, and the commission is now in full force, and will so remain till a writ of supersedeas be signed and sealed by the judge. Ex parte Freeman, 1 Ves. & B. 38; Ex parte Leicester, 6 Ves. 429; Ex parte Layton, 6 Ves. 439; 2 Madd. 612; Cooke, Bankr. Law, 536. A supersedeas could never have issued on Henry Morris's petition, as it would have been an order to the commissioners, who were not parties to the application, but were strangers out of court. The issuing of the supersedeas is necessary to give effect to the order for it, for the creditors can be acted upon by the judge only through the commissioners. If the commissioners are dead or disqualified, so that the supersedeas can not be served upon them, new commissioners should be appointed in order to make an effectual service on them, for there can be no supersedeas without the writ.

Mr. Williams, against the petition, commenced to answer the argument, urged on the other side, that a formal writ of supersedeas was necessary, but—

THE COURT stopped him, and desired that he would proceed to the other points, saying that no actual issuing of a writ of supersedeas was necessary here, the court doing by one act what the chancellor does by two; that it was entirely a question of practice which the court had a right to regulate; and that the clerk of the court had repeatedly issued certificates, under seal, of the order superseding the commission.

Mr. Williams continued—On the former hearing, the interest of Henry Morris was admitted, or not disputed, and it is now too late to disturb the proceedings on that ground. These petitioners swear they knew nothing of the proceedings until within the last three years, but admit that length of notice. They left the case on Mr. Sansom's petition, and neither made themselves parties to it, nor offered to do so, and the court having refused to reverse the order for a supersedeas on that petition, they come now, after the lapse of more than a year, to ask that the whole matter may be again reviewed. We are not bound to show title in Henry Morris now; it is at best a mere matter of form, and does not affect the merits of the case in any way whatever, and title will be presumed in him after this lapse of time without a denial. But if we are required to show his title, it is manifest—he was the son of the bankrupt, and he was the executor of the executrix of the bankrupt. The legal estate remained in the bankrupt till the assignment was perfected. Doe v. Mitchell, 2 Maule & S. 446. This right being in the bankrupt, if descendible and not devisable, it comes to Henry Morris as heir or one of the heirs; if devisable, then, as executor of his mother, he has sufficient interest in the estate to go into the orphans' court and ask an order of sale, &c., and to petition this court for a supersedeas. Cooper, Bankr. Law, 334; Attorney General v. Capell, 2 Show. 480. The estate remained in the bankrupt's possession over twenty years, and was thereby confirmed to him as against his creditors. Power v. Hollman, 2 Watts, 218; Diemer v. Sechrist, 1 Pa. [1 Pen. & W.] 420. The petitioners say that they were known creditors, but they were also to be presumed to be paid on account of the lapse of time. Peebles v. Reading, 8 Serg. & R. 484. And all Mr. Morris's property now remaining must be considered as surplus, for, from the lapse of time, all the debts must be treated as if paid by the bankrupt or released by the creditors.

Mr. Tilghman, on the same side.

It is now eight years since the supersedeas, during which time all things have been as if Robert Morris had never been a bankrupt. At the time of granting the supersedeas, personal notice was given to J. Huston, the petitioning creditor; and all other creditors were notified by advertisement. These petitioners are bound by this notice and by the decree of the judge precisely as though they had appeared and been heard against the supersedeas. Mr. Rawle became a purchaser, on the faith of the supersedeas; and, since the refusal of Mr. Sansom's petition, he has sold to other parties, who were present at the last hearing of this matter, and purchased on the faith of the decision then made thereon. Eighteen months after the rejection of Mr. Sansom's petition, the present petitioners come forward to disturb the security of these innocent purchasers. Fraud and falsehood in obtaining the supersedeas should be alleged and proved before it can be overthrown. Nothing new is pretended to be in the case now that has not been argued before, except that Henry Morris had no interest in the estate of the bankrupt. To this we answer: (1) The allegation comes too late, the subject has been passed upon; (2) Henry Morris was not alone interested in the petition, but the whole of the heirs of Robert Morris were concerned; (3) it is immaterial whether he had any interest or not, the object was simply to bring forward the question whether a commission should be superseded or not, and it was the duty of the judge to look to every person who had an interest in the application; (4) he had an interest, he was the executor of Robert Morris's executrix. Kline v. Guthart, 2 Pa. [2 Pen. & W.] 490.

Mr. Meredith, in reply.

The former order was made on the supposition of a state of facts which did not exist; and no notice was given to those who were entitled to it. We cannot doubt that, on our showing the real state of facts, the order will be reversed. The petitioners have an interest in the estate; they are creditors who have proved their debts under the commission. The interested parties—the commissioners or assignees—were not made parties to the proceedings which produced the supersedeas; and no personal notice was given to the creditors residing in the city where the proceedings were held, when, from their local position, they were entitled to it. In the opinion of the court upon Mr. Sansom's petition, Henry Morris is spoken of and considered as the representative and heir of Robert Morris. It now clearly appears that he had no interest. This is a new fact and a new state of things. As the petitioner had no interest in the estate, it is never too late to come in and show it. The objection of there being a bona fide purchaser extends to part only of the property, and that part was bought with full knowledge of all the circumstances. Parties claiming to be protected in this right must show that they have paid the full consideration money. The former decision was on the grounds: (1) That Mr. Sansom had no interest; (2) that Henry Morris had. But now the whole thing is reversed; the present petitioners have interests, and Henry Morris has not. First or last, this thing will be set right. It began in injustice and must end in retribution. This princely estate cannot be withheld much longer from the creditors of the bankrupt.

On the 6th February, 1839, HOPKINSON, District Judge, delivered the following opinion in the case:

The petitioners in this case are, the assignees of the estate of Jacob Clement, deceased, William Thaw, one of the heirs of Benjamin Thaw, deceased, and T. G. Hollingsworth, one of the heirs of Jehu Hollingsworth, deceased. They state themselves to be creditors of Robert Morris, formerly of the city of Philadelphia. The petition recites the issuing of a commission of bankruptcy against Robert Morris in July, 1801, and the granting of his certificate of discharge on the 4th of December of the same year; but that no further steps were taken to render the property of the bankrupt available to his creditors, owing, as the petitioners suppose, to the belief that the unincumbered property was not sufficient to pay more than the expenses of the proceeding. The petitioners then aver that they have recently learned that certain real estate has been discovered, which is alleged to have been the property of Mr. Morris, at the time of his bankruptcy, and which ought therefore to be applied to the payment of his debts. They state that they have also learned that a supersedeas of the said commission has been granted, upon the application of Henry Morris, stating himself to be one of the children of the bankrupt, but not alleging himself to have any interest in the estate of the bankrupt. That in fact the said Henry had no interest in the estate, as will more fully appear by reference to the wills of the said Robert Morris and his widow Mary Morris, copies of which are annexed to the petition. The petitioners say they had no notice or knowledge of the said application of Henry Morris, or of the granting of the supersedeas, until within the last three years, nor did they or either of them, at any time previous, know or suspect that any proceedings to supersede the said commission had been commenced, or were in contemplation. For these reasons the petitioners pray for a review of the proceedings in reference to the alleged supersedeas, that it may be vacated, and that commissioners be appointed, the original ones being dead or disqualified, and for such further relief as may be right and just. This petition was filed on the 10th of November, 1838, and a rule granted to show cause, on the 17th, why the prayer of the petition should not be allowed. Notice was accepted by the counsel of Henry Morris, and also by the counsel for William Rawle, Esq., who claims an interest in the property. In the March preceding, a petition was presented by the same petitioners, with one other, also stating the facts of the issuing of the commission, of the certificate of discharge, and the cessation of all further proceedings. It also sets forth the discovery of property belonging to the bankrupt, and the death or disqualification of the commissioners, and merely prays for the appointment of new commissioners, and for further relief. No reference is made to the supersedeas. On this first petition a rule was granted for a hearing, on a short notice to the heirs and representatives of the bankrupt, but no further proceeding was had upon it, or in relation to the subject, until the 10th day of November following, when the second, or additional, petition was presented and proceeded upon.

On a careful review of the opinion I delivered, with great deliberation, and after a most learned and elaborate argument on both sides, on the petition of William Sansom for a revocation of the supersedeas, I see no reason to change that opinion, as the case was then presented. I now repeat what I then said, that the entire novelty of the case, and the importance of the principles involved in it, gave rise to difficulties of a serious and embarrassing nature. I did then hope, as I now do, that the final disposal of it would not rest on my judgment, but that some proceeding would be had, as was intimated by the counsel, to bring the case before another tribunal. No such steps have been taken. The inquiry now is, therefore, limited to the question whether any matter of law or fact has been shown which was not brought into my view at the former hearing, and which, if known, would have produced, or ought now to produce, a different result. The subject of the want of notice of the petition of Henry Morris, and the proceedings thereon, was fully discussed and decided at that hearing; and I find nothing in the situation of the present petitioners to distinguish them, in this respect, from the petitioner in that case. The same supineness, the same inattention to the affairs of the bankrupt for five-and-twenty years from the bankruptcy, when the petition of Henry Morris was filed; an entire disregard of that petition and all the proceedings upon it from 1825 to 1838, full thirteen years; not even roused to it by the movement of Mr. Sansom in 1836, when the discovery of property was publicly disclosed, having the same notice which Mr. Sansom had of the occurrences prior to his application—the same and the only notice which the law required, or indeed was practicable in the case. On this question of notice they stand in a worse situation than Mr. Sansom. The endeavor to distinguish this case from that decision on the similar petition of Mr. Sansom, in reference to the notice, is this. It is said that these petitioners, having proved their debts under the commission, which Mr. Sansom had not, were entitled to personal notice of the application of Henry Morris; and, as a further claim to this privilege, it was urged that they resided in the city where the proceedings were going on, some of them within a short distance of the court. No authority of the law was shown for any such distinction in the rights of creditors. Neither the statute, nor any judicial adjudication, nor any practice, was shown, or is known to me, to give countenance to this argument. One manner of notice—that is, in the public gazette—is provided for all; and all are bound to attend to it, or the estate of a bankrupt never would or could be settled. In the equity and reason of the thing, the creditors residing in the same city, in the very neighborhood, where the proceedings are going on and the papers published, are less entitled to this personal regard than those who are at a distance. The fact that the present petitioners proved their debts under the commission only puts in a stronger light their subsequent abandonment of the commission and of all their expectations from it.

The ground mainly relied on to support this application to revoke the supersedeas is, that Henry Morris, on whose petition it was ordered, had no right or interest in the estate of the bankrupt, and, therefore, there was no party before the judge on whose behalf any petition could be received, or any order made in relation to that estate. This objection must be considered and decided. It is well, in the first place, to remark, that Henry Morris, in his petition, makes no false allegation on the subject of his interest. He states the fact of his relationship to the bankrupt, and no more, leaving the question of his interest to those who might choose to deny it, and to the judge whose right it was to decide it. He cannot, therefore, be charged with deceiving or misleading the judge by a false allegation. His petition was filed in November, 1825, nearly twenty years after the death of his father, and a considerable time before the death of his mother, Mary Morris. The will of Robert Morris was proved and recorded in May, 1806, full thirty years before the argument of the motion for the supersedeas, and, of course, during all that time was in the power of Mr. Sansom, and of the present petitioners, and of all and any of the creditors of Robert Morris, to be used by them, had they chosen to use it, to defeat the application of Henry Morris. The will of Mary Morris had been proved and recorded for nearly ten years at the time of the hearing, but no notice was taken of it. The right of Henry Morris as a petitioner was not brought into question by denial or objection. If the petitioner against the supersedeas could waive the objection, he did so; and the present petitioners never appeared to make it. Under these circumstances, the incapacity of Henry Morris, as a party to a proceeding affecting the property of Robert Morris, is certainly urged at this time by these petitioners with no claim to favor. Nevertheless, if the law gives them the right, they must have it. If, by the law, they may demand the revocation of the supersedeas, no minister of the law can refuse it. The objection is that Henry Morris had no interest whatever in the estate of his father, Robert Morris, and, therefore, could be no party to a proceeding to affect that estate; that the order for the supersedeas was made in behalf of a person who could take nothing by it, and had no right to intermeddle with it. Was this strictly and truly the case? Had Henry Morris no interest, present or contingent, sufficient to give him a standing before the judge on that question? Was he so absolutely a stranger to it that he might not be heard upon it? It is clear that Henry Morris, as one of the children of the bankrupt, after his death, had an interest in his estate, whatever it might be, unless that interest had been taken away from him by some legal act or instrument. The will of Robert Morris is relied upon for that purpose. But a preliminary inquiry is, whether Robert Morris, at the time of his death, had himself such a right and interest in this property as enabled him to devise it. The affirmative of this question is contended for by the petitioners; and it is argued that, if he had a descendible interest in the land, he had a devisable interest, and that if he had not a descendible interest, Henry Morris could derive none from him, and that, in either case, he had nothing to support his petition.

The case in which the principle relied upon by the counsel for the creditors is fully developed and reported is Jones v. Perry, 3 Term R. 88. The point decided is thus stated in the syllabus: "A possibility coupled with an interest is devisable." The case arose upon the construction of the statute of wills, which enables persons having an interest in lands, &c., to devise it. That a mere or bare possibility, unaccompanied by an interest, was not devisable, seems to have been admitted; and the question was as to the kind and degree of interest which, coupled with a possibility, may be the subject of a devise. It is not easy to fix a definite meaning to the word "interest," as here used. Some limitation is clearly intended to be put upon it, for it is said that that which an heir has from the courtesy of his ancestor is but a bare possibility, and has no such interest coupled with it as to be devisable. Yet, if a legal interest can be raised on a calculation of contingencies the most remote and impossible, as in the case before us, it can hardly be denied that the chance of an heir from the courtesy of his ancestor is something better than that of a stranger. I would say that his hope of succession is more rational, more likely to be fulfilled, than any that a bankrupt could have or entertain of the release of his property from the claims of his creditors, or of a return of it to him as amply as it left him, by a supersedeas of the commission which deprived him of it. From the argument of the judges, as well as the counsel, in the case of Jones v. Perry, we may consider that the principle now contended for was carried as far by the court as they would be willing to go with it. We shall see that the interest, the contingency, in that case, was by no means so remote or improbable as to bear any comparison with ours. It was this. A house and lot were devised to T., the brother of the testator, until his son John, or any of his younger sons, should attain the age of twenty-one years; if T. should have no younger son who should arrive at that age, but should have only one son living to that age, then until that son should attain that age. As soon as his said nephew John, or any other younger son of his brother T., should attain the said age, the testator gave the house, &c., to the said John, or such other younger son as for the time being should be a younger son of his said brother T.; and if the said T. should have but one son who should live to that age, then he devised the house, &c., to that son. The testator died, leaving his brother T. with two sons, the said John and Joseph. John died before his father, and before he was twenty-one years of age. Joseph attained that age, married, and died, having made his will, by which he devised, in the most broad and general terms, all his property and estate, &c., to his wife. The question was whether Joseph had such an interest in the house and lot mentioned in the will of his uncle as enabled him to devise it to his wife. It was decided that he had; and this is the possibility coupled wth an interest which is recognised to be devisable by that decision. Now, we clearly see in that case whence the interest of Joseph was derived, and what it was. It was given to him expressly, by the will of his uncle, the first testator, and not by a legal, uncertain, implication. The event on which the interest was to become vested, and the property his, was clearly described; and the event did actually happen. Nor was it so remote or improbable as to deserve to be called a mere possibility. It can hardly be said to have been improbable or unexpected. Thomas, the brother of the testator, had, so far as the case informs us, but two sons, John and Joseph, of whom John was the younger. If, then, John should die before attaining the age of twenty-one years, and Thomas, his father, should have no other younger son, the right of Joseph would be complete. This will was made in June, 1734, and John was not of age in 1751, when he died. Of course, he was but a child at the time of making the will, which lessened his chance of reaching twenty-one years. There was certainly nothing strange in the happening of the contingencies upon which the devise to Joseph would take effect, and, of course, his interest was neither remote or improbable; he had an interest in the estate, with a very fair chance of enjoying it. Can such a case be put in comparison with that under our consideration? Whence did Mr. Morris derive the interest in this property; and what was it which it is said he might dispose of by his will, when the commission of bankruptcy was in full force and operation? Not by any such condition, or contingency, or reservation, in the statute, nor in the assignment of the estate for the use of his creditors, as that by which it is now claimed for him,—not by anything that happened in his lifetime to bring back to him the rights he had wholly and absolutely lost by his bankruptcy. At the time of his death his estate, with all his rights in relation to it, all his interests in it, all his control over it, were entirely vested in others. In the case cited, both the grant and the condition on which it was to take effect were distinctly and expressly declared. Because there were in that case both a probability and an interest, can we say that it is so in ours? If this be no more than doubtful, should I upon it say that Henry Morris has no interest? Shall I refuse to hear him? Shall I take from him the means and the opportunity of having that question deliberately tried and decided by a competent tribunal of law and fact? Why should he not have the opportunity to try this grave question on his father's will? But, while the commission is in his way, he cannot do so. Let him and the creditors meet fairly on that question. If the objection urged against him is good and valid, it will prevail against him; for it was intimated, both on this and the former argument, that the petitioners would not be concluded by my decision, but could have their rights examined and restored to them elsewhere. It is certain that, after his bankruptcy, Mr. Morris had no interest in his property, recognised by the law, which made any act or agreement on his part necessary to the transfer of the property, with a perfect and unquestionable title. The statute immediately vested all his estate in the commissioners; and no conveyance by him was called for. The commissioners afterwards assigned it to assignees chosen by the creditors; and they might afterwards sell to whom they pleased. In all these proceedings the bankrupt has neither lot nor part; he is treated as a stranger, as one who has forfeited all his rights of property by what, legally speaking, was a fraud or an intended fraud upon his creditors. Where is the ground of the suggestion that the legal estate remains in him? Can we believe that, at the time Mr. Morris made his will, he had any view to this property, or to the event which has taken it from his creditors? It is true, he devises all the property, real or personal, which he then possessed or might afterwards acquire; but has this description any application to property which he did not possess? If indeed the commission had been superseded before his death, the property restored to him would be property afterwards acquired; but, to the time of his death, he possessed nothing, he acquired nothing. If, therefore, his intention is to have any influence in the construction of his will, no one, I think, can seriously contend that he looked to an event which would give what is now called a "princely estate" to his wife, in exclusion of all his children. It may be remarked, too, that this probability, this interest (if it may be so called), which is said to be coupled with the possibility, has to pass through two wills with the force and effect of a legal devise, under the general words of all the property, real or personal, possessed by Mr. Morris at the time of his death; and, in the case of Mrs. Morris's will, of all her estate, real and personal; for, if her devise to her daughter, Mrs. Nixon, does not embrace it, then she died without disposing of it, and Henry Morris, either as the son of the testator, or of Mrs. Morris, will have his share in it. May we not confidently say, too, of Mrs. Morris, that she had no idea she was giving to one of her children, most abundantly and happily provided for, a great estate, in no part of which did she allow her other children, most especially Henry, who did want it, to participate? She had no such thing in her mind. In the case of Jones v. Perry, on the contrary, the testator had distinctly and expressly in his view the contingency by which the estate would vest in his nephew Joseph; and, certainly, he did expect that it might happen, and therefore provided for it.

I am aware that on this argument I must encounter a formidable difficulty. If Robert Morris had no right or interest in this property, how have his children or representatives any, for it is said that whatever is descendible is devisable? In the first place, this objection does not reach all the parties who appear here, and who appeared on the former occasion, to sustain the supersedeas. Some of them are purchasers at a sheriff's sale, under judgments regularly rendered and prosecuted to execution and sale against Robert Morris; and who can have no title if the commission of bankruptcy is restored. They do not claim from or through the children of the bankrupt. In the second place, I refer to what I said in my former opinion, that "the effect of the supersedeas is to annihilate the commission, and to place the bankrupt, with his estate, in the same situation they would have been had it never existed." But if the bankrupt is not in existence, at the time of the supersedeas, it can have no effect upon him; it cannot change his situation in regard to the property. In another place I observed, that "the effect of the supersedeas would be to anul the commission, and all that had been done by and under it, and to restore to the representatives of the bankrupt the property which had not been legally disposed of." The supersedeas in this case, for the reason given, could have no effect on the bankrupt or his personal rights; it could operate only on his estate, for the benefit of his representatives. I do not consider their right as descending from him, but as being cast upon them by the law by an event which, occurring after the death of the bankrupt, vested no rights or interests in him. The right arose by and from the supersedeas, and had no existence before or without it. It has been likened to a bankrupt's interest in a surplus. I grant that the bankrupt had what may be called an interest in the surplus, if any, of his estate; although I should rather say that such surplus would enure to his benefit—would return to him. But this is not a surplus. It does not come to the bankrupt by the same event that would entitle him to the surplus, nor by the same proceedings, nor by virtue of the same legal principles that would restore to him a surplus after the payment of the debts charged upon his estate. The debts for which the property was taken from him being satisfied, the surplus remains without any claimant in law or equity but himself.

I have, perhaps with more labor than they deserved, given the views which occurred to me on this part of the case. I cannot say that they are altogether satisfactory to myself, nor that they have removed entirely the difficulties of the argument; I should hardly be content to rest a decision upon them. But I will nevertheless say, that I am still less satisfied with the argument to show that Mr. Morris had anything more than a bare possibility of getting back his property from his creditors by this, or any other, contingency; and that such a possibility gave him any right or interest in the property, which he could transmit to another, either by an assignment or a devise. Admitting the devise in the will of Robert Morris to be valid and effectual in relation to this property, has Henry Morris any interest in it, which will support him as a party in these proceedings? The objection raised against him is purely technical and formal, for the real and substantial questions upon the supersedeas, were as fully argued and considered with the creditors, or a creditor having the rights of others, on the one side and Henry Morris on the other, as they could have been with any other party. In such circumstances I shall look with a close and willing eye to discover enough of interest to give Henry Morris a standing before me, to give him a right to be heard on his application. "If the scale do turn but in the estimation of a hair," I shall be satisfied. It is by meting such a measure to him that his right is denied, and he may defend it in the same way. It should be recollected that the whole case was fully and ably argued and carefully examined; that the only creditor of Mr. Morris who appeared to assert any right to his property, chose to meet Henry Morris as a party to the cause, as his authorized adversary; that he made no objection to the original application for the supersedeas on the ground of a want of right or interest in Henry Morris to make it; that these petitioners, and all the other creditors of the bankrupt, had then an opportunity to appear and make this, or any other, objection to the supersedeas; but they left it all to the management of Mr. Sansom, and can we say now that this objection is entitled to any favor? If the hundred creditors of Robert Morris, who proved their debts under the commission, or the many hundreds who did not, may, year after year, or at intervals of many years, come forward singly, or in little parties of three or four, to start new objections to disturb and annul all that had before been solemnly and publicly done, it is impossible that this estate can ever be settled, or the rights of the family of the bankrupt, or of bona fide purchasers, be ever safe and at rest.

Without meaning to insist upon it as a substantial ground, but rather as a set-off, or equivalent, for the argument of the petitioners, we may ask whether Henry Morris had not something like an interest, something like a reasonable expectancy, under the will of his father? He gave all his property to his wife, Mary Morris, saying, that "no doubt she will make such distribution of it amongst our children as she may think proper." This is, at least, a strong recommendation, amounting almost to an injunction, that the property should be divided amongst the children. Henry Morris was one of them; and the probability of his obtaining a share under this recommendation, was not a right it is true, I will not say it was a legal interest, but it was a better contingency than that on which the petitioners rely. At the time Henry Morris filed his petition for the supersedeas, his mother was living, and he had no interest or expectation from his father's estate, but that which depended on the hope that his mother would carry out the recommendation of his father, by a distribution of it amongst their children. It would be enough for the present purpose if, as one of these children, he had a right to bring up the question whether the commission of bankruptcy against his father should continue in force, and whether the conduct of the creditors, and other circumstances of the case, did not warrant a supersedeas of the commission. But another claim, as a party to these proceedings, has been set up for him; to wit, as the executor of the mother, Mary Morris. His petition alleges "that the said Robert Morris, at the time of his bankruptcy, was seised and possessed of a large estate, real and personal, which, in consequence of the neglect of the said creditors and assignees in not duly prosecuting the said commission, has been wasted and misapplied." This allegation was neither disproved nor denied. Mary Morris, under the will of Robert Morris, was entitled to all the real and personal estate which belonged to him at the time of his death, and to whatever right and interest he had therein. Mary Morris died about the month of February, 1827, appointing her sons Thomas and Henry her executors. Can it be questioned that Henry Morris, as the executor of his mother, had an interest in the personal estate, at least, devised to her by her husband; and that he might be a party to any proceeding for the recovery or protection of that estate? Even in regard to the real estate, the laws of Pennsylvania, in certain circumstances and for certain purposes, give an executor an authority over the real estate of his testator. The answer given to this assertion of right is, that at the time Henry Morris filed his petition and commenced this proceeding, his mother was not dead, and, of course, he was not her executor. I see no force in this reply. A petition in a proceeding of this sort is not like a suit at common law, in which the party must have his right of action when he commences it. May not a person who acquires an interest in a suit depending in chancery, after its commencement, come in and be made a party?

Even to satisfy the most scrupulous form, it was only necessary that Henry Morris should file another petition, or in some way suggest to the judge, for there is no record, strictly speaking, of this proceeding, the new and additional capacity in which he presented his claim. The true questions or matters on which he prayed for a supersedeas of the commission were set forth in his petition, and the creditors had notice of it. No new matter of complaint was introduced, no surprise upon his adversaries, no new person as a party; but at the time of the hearing, a new right or interest had accrued to the petitioner, not in the least affecting the merits of the controversy—they remained the same. The creditors, or those of them who chose to appear on the notice, knew, for it was a matter of record and notoriety, of the death of Mary Morris, and the appointment of her executor. They go on to a hearing, without objection to the right or interest of the petitioner, without calling upon him to set out formally his claim in his new capacity, or inquiring in what right or capacity he was prosecuting it. Was not this a waiver of the form of filing a new petition? Did not they consent to meet his claim as it was in truth, and under any right he had to prosecute it? I think that, even if it were material, it has been waived. Such an objection could not be kept in reserve, to be resorted to if the petitioner should be successful. At the time of the hearing, and long before, Henry Morris had the right of a party in this proceeding, in fact and in law; his right was recognised by meeting and answering it without objection, and it would be a strange sort of equity if I were now to undo all that has been done on this ground. In answer to this objection the petitioner has urged that his petition was depending five years without any opposition or appearance by any creditor. The application of the petitioner was renewed in 1830, after the death of Mrs. Morris, and still no opposition to it from any quarter, and so it went on to the hearing and order thereupon, and so it continued for eight years after that order without objection; and so it was on the hearing of Mr. Sansom without any objection to Henry Morris as a party. Is it not obvious that if in Mr. Sansom's petition, in which he stood for the rights of all the creditors (for none came to join him), this objection had been taken, it would have been at once obviated by allowing Henry Morris to file a supplemental petition? It would be the grossest injustice to admit it now. Even in the more strict proceedings at common law, a waiver of an objection at the time it ought to have been made, will, in many instances stronger than this, preclude the party from a subsequent resort to it. Indeed, in the first petition filed by these petitioners, no suggestion is made of this objection, nor until eight months afterwards. Year after year, opportunity after opportunity, were afforded to these petitioners to oppose the petition of Henry Morris, on this or any other ground, but they do not move or speak, until more than ten years had elapsed from the date of the order of supersedeas, and then they appear, relying on the allegation that Henry Morris had no interest in the property when he filed his petition, not denying, for it could not be denied, that he had a clear interest at the time of the hearing and order. Is there any right that a man holds or enjoys by the law, that he may not lose by neglect; that he may not surrender by abandonment? Debts secured by the most solemn contracts, by official records; unquestioned titles to real estates, of any amount and value, even if they should be "princely," may be and have been irrecoverably lost solely and merely by the inattention of the owner. The peace and order of society, the security of the whole community require this, and no individual, who may suffer by it, has any just cause of complaint or reproach, except against himself. For seven-and-thirty years, not without warnings and notice, did these petitioners sleep over the rights they had acquired in the property of Mr. Morris, by his bankruptcy; and they now wake up and expect to find these rights fresh and unimpaired! Not much more than half of this time would have, with the same neglect, swallowed up their mortgages and judgments, their lands and tenements. I know not what there is in their right to a bankrupt's property that will preserve it from the destruction that would have buried their right to their own. The bankrupt law is so far from countenancing neglect and delay in the proceedings on the part of the creditors, that it requires extraordinary promptness to bring them to a close, that the bankrupt and his estate may not be wronged by an unreasonable delay. If the commission is not proceeded upon, in its preliminary proofs for declaring the party a bankrupt, in thirty days, the judge may supersede it. The assignees are directed to make a dividend of the effects within twelve months from the issuing of the commission; and the second dividend within eighteen months, which is to be the final dividend, unless there be a suit depending, or some part of the estate standing out, or other effects shall afterwards come to their hands. The whole proceeding is intended to be finished and closed in eighteen months.

As the counsel for these petitioners thinks that the proceedings by which the commission of bankruptcy against Robert Morris was superseded, "began in injustice, and must end in retribution," it is a consolation to me as well as to him, to know that, if I am mistaken in my views of the matter, "first or last they will be set right; and that the princely estate of the bankrupt cannot be much longer withheld from his creditors." I am by no means desirous that the grave questions which have arisen in the course of these proceedings, or any man's property, princely or mean, shall be finally disposed of by my judgment. It is, however, to be regretted, for it has produced much trouble and expense, that these creditors never thought this great estate, as it is now supposed to be, worth looking after for seven-and-thirty years; that they should have abandoned it; that no one of them, or of the other numerous creditors of the bankrupt, would hazard the expenses of executing the commission, to put them in possession of this principality. The assignees appointed refused to take it into their care and management; would not accept the trust which all thought so worthless; nor did the creditors think it worth their time or money to appoint other assignees. I shall dismiss both the petitions.

MORRIS, In re. See Case No. 7,303.

Case No. 9,826.

MORRIS v. BARNEY.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 245.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. July Term, 1805.

PLEADING AT LAW — AMENDMENT—MAKING NEW PARTIES.

The court will not permit an amendment making new parties.

Assumpsit by indorsees against the maker of a promissory note.

Mr. Caldwell, for plaintiff, moved to amend by adding the name of the payee of the note as plaintiff, for the use of Morris. This was done to avoid the allegation of the defendant that the words "or order" had been inserted by the payee after the note was made.

Refused by THE COURT; it being to make new parties.

Case No. 9,827.

MORRIS v. BARRETT et al.

[1 Fish. Pat. Cas. 461; 1 Bond, 254.] [2]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. March, 1859.

PATENTS—CLAIM AND SPECIFICATIONS—TWO IMPROVEMENTS IN ONE PATENT—EVIDENCE—EXPERT—PRODUCTION OF MACHINE.

1. In the construction of a patent, the patentee is not to be confined to the summing-up or "claim," but the specification, the whole specification, and the drawings may be referred to, to ascertain the extent of the claim of the invention, or the proper meaning of expressions used in the "claim."

2. It is competent for the patentee to embrace two improvements on the same machine in the same patent, and if the defendant has used both or either of the improvements, there is infringement.

3. M. claimed "the clamps, 6 6, to prevent end-expansion, and the levers, 7 7, working on fixed fulcrums," to prevent the wood from twisting. Held, that this was not a claim for the combination of clamps and levers, but for two distinct improvements in the art of bending wood.

4. A kind of evidence which is entitled to the highest credibility, is the machines themselves, as shown by the models, which, like figures, can not lie.

[Cited in Seymour v. Osborne, Case No. 12,688.]

5. The law permits the opinion of men, called experts, to be given in evidence, to determine questions of mechanical difference; and when such men are qualified, and free from bias, their testimony is entitled to great respect.

6. If the same result is produced by the defendant as by the patentee, but by means substantially different, there is no infringement, for a patent is not granted for a mere result; but otherwise, if the defendant produces the result by contrivances substantially the same in principle.

[See Crompton v. Belknap Mills, Case No. 3,406.]

This was an action on the case [by John C. Morris against Silas M. Barrett and Jabez M. Waters] tried before LEAVITT, District Judge, and a jury, to recover damages for the alleged infringement of letters patent for an "improvement in wood-bending machines," granted to plaintiff March 11, 1856. The machine consisted of a stationary form, around which timber was bent, by means of two levers, turning upon fixed fulcrums, and applied near the end of the timber. The timber to be bent was laid upon a metallic strap, having clamps or abutments attached to each end, which embraced the ends of the wood, and prevented any stretching of the fibers during the act of bending. These clamps were made to slide upon the levers as the wood was brought around the form. The claims of the patent were as follows: "I claim the clamps, 6 6, to prevent end-expansion, and the levers, 7 7, working on fixed fulcrums, when in operation, all substantially as, and for the purposes, set forth in the foregoing specifications." The defendants substituted radial arms with rollers to press upon the back of the wood, and used clamps which permitted a partial relaxation or stretching of the fibers, at the commencement of the bending operation.

G. M. Lee and S. S. Fisher, for plaintiff.

Bates & Scarborough and W. B. Caldwell, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). The plaintiff's patent is for an improvement in wood-bending machines, minutely described in the patent and specifications. In the conclusion or summing-up, he says: "I claim the clamps, 6 6, to prevent end-expansion, and the levers, 7 7, working on fixed fulcrums, when in operation, all substantially as, and for the purposes, set forth in the foregoing specifications." The practical purpose to be accomplished by these improvements he claims to be: 1. The clamps to prevent end-expansions; and 2. The levers working upon fixed fulcrums to prevent the wood from twisting. It was claimed in argument by defendants' counsel, that the plaintiff was confined, in construing his claim, to the summing-up; but the doctrine is well settled that the patent, the specifications, the whole specifications and the drawings, may be referred to in ascertaining the extent of the patentee's claim; and while it is true that we are to look at the summing-up to discover what parts of the machine he claims to have invented, still, if any thing is needed to enable us to determine the proper meaning of expressions used in the "claim," we must refer to the previous portion of the specifications for such explanations as may be necessary to understand the office and purpose of that which is claimed as new.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The plaintiff's claim is not for a combination but for two distinct improvements in the art of bending wood. It is, no doubt, competent for a patentee to embrace two improvements on the same machine in the same patent; and if, in the present case, the defendants have used both or either of the improvements of the plaintiff, they have infringed his patent.

On the subject of the identity of the two machines, it may be remarked, that we are not concluded by their mere form or appearance. The question is, are they the same in substance? Is the machine used by the defendants a mechanical equivalent for that patented by the plaintiff? In applying these principles to the facts of this case, the jury will remember that there is a kind of evidence which is entitled to the highest credibility, and that is the machines themselves, as shown by the models, and which, like figures, can not lie. In addition, as many persons would be unable, from a want of previous knowledge or experience, to determine these questions of mechanical difference, the law permits the opinions of men called experts, to be given in evidence; and, when such men are qualified and free from bias, their testimony is entitled to great respect. The following is a brief summary of the testimony of this class of witnesses in the present case:

Three experts were examined on behalf of each party. Those for the plaintiff testified in the order named: John Byrne says that he has been for several years engaged in the business of wood-bending. He describes the machines, and gives it as his opinion that they are substantially the same in principle. Finley Latta has been for twenty years a machinist. He thinks the fulcrums and cramps are substantially the same in both; and that the joint in defendant's lever is a mechanical equivalent for the sliding of plaintiff's clamp. Gardner Lathrop has devoted much attention to practical and theoretical machines. He thinks the machines are the same in principle; that the clamps are the same in both, and that the jointed lever is an equivalent for the sliding clamp.

On behalf of the defendants, the following experts testified: Orville Mathers says that the two structures are different in principle; that the defendants' have no fixed fulcrum, and that they do not prevent the expansion of the wood. The plaintiff insists that the statements of this witness should be received with caution, because of his interest in the subject-matter, as he is the inventor or constructor of the machine used by defendants. W. S. Rosecrans gives it as his opinion that the two machines are not the same in principle. He points out their difference of operation, and mentions the peculiarity of the defendants' machine, that it would bend non-elastic substances. He has had much experience as a teacher of mechanics, and testified with great intelligence. George H. Knight is a patent agent, and is acquainted with mechanics. He says, upon an examination of the plaintiff's specifications, that the machines are not the same in principle; that the most palpable difference between them is the entire absence of fixed fulcrums in the defendants' machine. He thinks the action of the clamps is substantially the same in both—that both are intended to prevent end-expansion.

This is the substance of the testimony of the experts on both sides. The jury will give to it such weight in their judgment as it is entitled to, and if, from the evidence, they believe that the same result as that claimed by the plaintiff is produced by the defendants, by contrivances substantially different, then there is no infringement, for a patent is not granted for a mere result; but if they find that the defendants produce this result by contrivances substantially the same in principle as those used by the patentee, they will find a verdict for the plaintiff. The object of the action is not so much to obtain damages as to sustain the patent. There is nothing in the case to call for exemplary damages, but if the jury find the plaintiff entitled to a verdict, it would be competent for them to give him an amount that would compensate him for the actual damage sustained by reason of the infringement.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, with $125 damages.

Circuit Court, W. D. Texas. June Term, 1876.

BANKRUPTCY—APPEAL—ACTION TO SET ASIDE CLAIM OF CREDITOR—MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL—TRANSCRIPT—TIME FOR FILING.

1. A proceeding in the district court in the nature of a suit in equity, brought by the assignee and creditors of a bankrupt to set aside the claim of an alleged creditor, and to abrogate the lien asserted by him on the bankrupt's property, is appealable to the circuit court under section 4980 of the Revised Statutes.

2. A compliance with general order in bankruptcy 26, in relation to the time of filing such appeal in the circuit court, is not necessary, to give the court jurisdiction.

3. But the order mentioned is a rule of practice in the circuit court, and if disregarded, the appellee has prima facie ground on which to move to dismiss the appeal.

4. A transcript of the proceedings of the district court is not required to be filed within the ten days prescribed for filing the appeal in the circuit court, but only a statement of appellant's claim and a brief account of what has been done in the district court and the grounds of appeal.

5. Where the decree of the district court disallowing a claim against a bankrupt estate was entered on January 21st, notice of appeal given January 27th, and the appeal bond filed in the clerk's office of the district court on January 28th; and before the next term of the circuit court, but not until May 22d, the declaration of appellant, setting forth his claim and the history of the proceedings was filed in the circuit court, at which time a transcript of the proceedings in the district court, was also filed, held that the circuit court had jurisdiction of the case and could hear it or not in its discretion, according as it might or might not be satisfied with the excuse offered for the delay in filing the papers.

6. A district judge sitting in the circuit court may in a proper case enlarge the time for filing an appeal in the circuit court.

This cause was heard upon the motion of plaintiffs, the appellees, to dismiss the appeal.

[2] [The appellee James B. Morris was duly elected assignee in bankruptcy of one Philip Dei, against whom a petition for adjudication of involuntary bankruptcy was filed on the 2d day of June, 1874. Among the debts proved against said estate was an alleged secured debt in favor of one S. B. Brush, who died pending the litigation, the appellants becoming his personal representatives. The assignee applied to the district court to have the proof of debt rejected, under Rev. St. § 5081, upon the following grounds: (1) Because of a fraudulent preference under Rev. St. § 5021. (2) Because of a fraudulent preference under Rev. St. §§ 5128, 5129. (3) Because both of said trust deeds were void, having been executed to defraud and delay the other creditors of the bankrupt. (4) Because of an alleged partnership between the bankrupt and Brush. (5) Because trust deed of March 12, 1874, was waiver of trust deed of May 12, 1873. Certain unsecured creditors also filed a like application, based upon the same grounds, and also because certain enumerated carriages, etc., of the alleged value of five thousand dollars and over, in the trust deed of May 12, 1873, were sold and removed by the bankrupt, with the consent of Brush, and, if not rejected, this amount should be charged to Brush on the secured claim. The assignee amended his application by setting up, as additional grounds for rejecting proof of debt: (1) That, from July 1, 1872, to March 12, 1874, the bankrupt was insolvent, and that Brush knew it, and also had reasonable cause to know it. (2) That the bankrupt retained full control of all the property covered by these deeds of trust. The answer of Brush's representatives set up: (1) A denial of any knowledge of any insolvency of the bankrupt on the part of Brush. (2) That most, if not all, the property described in the trust deed of 12th of May, 1873, was sold by Brush to the bankrupt, the trust deed being taken to reserve the purchase money. (3) That it was agreed, from the commencement of their dealings in 1872, that Brush was to be secured by deeds of trust on the bankrupt's property. (4) A denial of any partnership between Brush and the bankrupt. (5) That the trust deed of 1874 was a mere renewal of the trust deed of 1873, and did not affect the lien. (6) A further answer, in the nature of a cross action seeking to recover, from the assignee, the value of certain buggies, the property of Brush, and charged to have been converted, by the assignee, to the use of the estate. The assignee demurred to this last defense, as not a proper subject of inquiry in this proceeding. The cause was then tried, upon those issues, before the district judge, without a jury, and the following facts were proved: The bankrupt came to Austin in January, 1871, with little or no capital and credit, and commenced driving a hack, and bought carriages and harness from Brush, the latter always requiring security. He opened a livery and sale stable in April, 1873, and sold and traded as his own the property described in the trust deeds, Brush relinquishing the lien whenever a sale was made. The trust deed of 1873 covered about all the property of the bankrupt, as did also the deed of 1874, and the greater portion of it the bankrupt originally purchased from Brush. Brush knew nothing of the debts owing by the bankrupt in Missouri and Illinois, before coming to Texas. The Texas indebtedness was small. The bankrupt was making money when the bankruptcy proceedings were instituted, and Brush had no reason to suppose that the bankrupt would not be able to pay all his debts in time; but he knew that the bankrupt had made debts to the amount of several thousands of dollars since coming to Texas, and that the property representing the greater portion of this indebtedness was included in the trust deed of 1874. A good deal of the property in the trust deed of 1873 had been sold before the deed of 1874 was made. The latter covered the property in the deed of 1873 still undisposed of, and also such other property as the bankrupt had acquired from Brush and others since the deed of 1873 was made. The proceeds of sales were sometimes applied to the secured indebtedness, and sometimes used in making cash purchases from Brush. There was no partnership between Brush and the bankrupt. The trust deed of 1874 was intended as a renewal of the deed of 1873, under the original agreement as to security between the bankrupt and Brush. The trust deed of 1873 was past due, and, on March 12, 1874, a settlement was had, and the bankrupt paid Brush in cash all he owed over the five thousand dollars, and made the deed of that date to secure that balance. The bankrupt valued his assets, at the time of the seizure by the marshal, at fifteen thousand dollars, and returned them in his schedules at about thirteen thousand dollars. The debts proved up against the estate, exclusive of Brush's secured claim, amounted to ten thousand five hundred dollars about. The amount realized by the assignee in disposing of the assets was eight thousand nine hundred and four dollars.

[On the 21st of January, 1875, a decree was entered sustaining the assignee's demurrer to the cross action of Brush's representatives, and disallowing and expunging the said debt, deeds of trust, and liens, and declaring them null and void. On the 27th of January, 1875, notice of an appeal from this decree to the clerk, the assignee, and the creditors mentioned in the application, was filed, and the service of notice was accepted on the same day. On the 28th of January, the appellants, J. B. Barron and W. B. Brush, executors of Brush, filed their petition for allowance of an appeal reciting the proceedings had in the cause, and praying for a transfer of the same "to the next circuit court of the United States for said Western district of Texas, at Austin, to be held on the first Monday in June, 1875," etc., etc. The district judge allowed the appeal on the same day, and required an appeal bond to be given in the sum of five hundred dollars. On the 28th day of January, 1875, citation was issued on said appeal, and service thereof was accepted by the assignee and creditors. The appeal bond was filed on the 29th of January, 1875. A transcript of the record of said cause was filed in the circuit court on the 22d of May, 1875, as well as a declaration on appeal setting forth the facts relied upon by the appellants, and giving a general history of the proceedings in the district court, and praying for the relief desired, and the same was served on the appellee. On the 26th of May, 1875, the appellee filed a motion to dismiss the appeal, based principally on the ground that the declaration on appeal was not filed within the ten days prescribed by rule 26 in bankruptcy. No circuit justice or circuit judge held the circuit court until the June term, 1876, when the motion to dismiss was submitted.] [2]

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. [This is an appeal from the district court. The decree appealed from was made on the 21st day of January, 1875, upon the following case: Philip Dei was declared a bankrupt, upon a petition filed against him on the 2d day of June, 1874. S. B. Brush filed against the estate proof of a claim represented by two promissory notes for two thousand five hundred dollars each, dated February 12th, 1874, payable in ninety days, with interest at one and one-half per cent. a month, and secured by a trust deed given to Charles W. White, trustee, dated the 12th of March, 1874, and recorded in the Travis county records on the same day; the said notes being given in renewal of previous notes of a like or greater amount, dated 12th of May, 1873; and the said deed of trust being executed in place, and in renewal of, a former deed of trust, dated May 12th, 1873, given to secure the notes of the same date. The assignee of Dei, the present appellee, filed a petition in the district court praying to have the said claim of Brush disallowed, and the lien of the trust deed set aside, on the several grounds, generally summed up in the allegation, that the deeds of trust were made in fraud of the bankrupt laws, in fraud of the other creditors, and by way of fraudulent preference. Some of the other creditors also filed a petition of the same purport, and praying like relief. Brush having died, in the meantime, his executors, the present appellants, filed an answer sustaining his claim, and alleging that it was bona fide and just; also complaining that the assignee had taken possession of certain property belonging to Brush, which the bankrupt had in custody for sale on commission, worth to the amount of one thousand six hundred and sixteen dollars and eighty-seven cents, and had sold the same, and refused to return or account for the property or proceeds, and praying a decree for payment.

[The district judge made a decree disallowing the claim last set up, and declared the deeds of trust of May 12th, 1873, and March 12th, 1874, to be fraudulent and void, and disallowed and expunged the claim of Brush from the list of claims upon the assignee's record.][2]

The nature of this proceeding was that of a suit in equity, brought by the assignee and creditors to set aside the claim of Brush and to abrogate the lien claimed by him on the bankrupt's property. In such a case an appeal clearly lies under section 4980 of the Revised Statutes. The motion now made is to set aside and dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the appeal was not filed in the clerk's office of this court within the ten days after taking the appeal in the district court as required by the general order in bankruptcy 26. It is not disputed that the appeal was claimed and notice thereof given to the clerk of the district court, and to the assignee and creditors, within ten days after the entry of the decree, and that a bond was duly filed as required by section 4981 of the Revised Statutes. Nor is it disputed that the appeal was duly entered at the next term of this court, which was held after the appeal was taken, as required by section 4982 of the Revised Statutes. The facts are, that the decree was entered on the 21st of January, 1875, and notice of appeal taken on the 27th of January, and the appeal and bond were filed in the clerk's office of the district court on the 28th of the same month; but the declaration of the appellant, setting forth his claim and the history of the proceedings, was not filed in this court until the 22d of May, 1875, at which time the same was filed, together with a transcript of the proceedings before the district court, consisting of nearly two hundred pages. The next term of the circuit court was held on the first Monday of June, 1875, and after that, on the first Monday of January, 1876; but neither the circuit justice nor the circuit judge was present in the district from the time of taking the appeal until the present term, June, 1876.

The excuse offered by the appellant's counsel for not filing the appeal in this court until the 22d of May, 1875, is, that the proceedings were so voluminous that they could not obtain a transcript thereof at an earlier day; that they deemed the transcript a necessary part of the appeal; that no delay was occasioned in the progress of the case by their failure to file the appeal in January; and that the practice in this respect is uncertain. I think it clear that a compliance with general order 26, in relation to the time of filing the appeal in the circuit court, is not necessary to give this court jurisdiction. This was so held by Circuit Judge Woodruff in the case of Baldwin v. Rapplee [Case No. 802]. He considered the rule merely directory. As all the requirements of the statute were complied with in this case, the court has jurisdiction of the appeal, and can hear it or not in its discretion, according as it may or may not be satisfied with the excuse that has been offered for the delay. Although the rule is directory, merely, still it is the rule which governs the practice of this court, and if disregarded, the appellee has a prima facie ground of dismissal. And I think the counsel for the appellants is in error in supposing that the transcript of the proceedings in the district court is required to be filed within the ten days prescribed for filing the appeal in this court. It is not always in the appellant's power to compel an instant making out of the transcript. He may have to get orders from the circuit court as to what shall be certified, although it is the duty of the clerk of the district court to make it out with all convenient dispatch, when the proper conditions are complied with. What is required to be filed in the circuit court within ten days from the time of taking the appeal is the appeal, containing a statement of the appellant's claim, and a brief account of what has been done in the district court, and the ground of appeal. This is what is meant by the declaration in section 4984 of the Revised Statutes. This, in most cases, can easily be done within the ten days. But there has undoubtedly been some uncertainty in the practice. And, in view of this fact, and the fact that no injury could possibly arise from the delay in this case, as the court did not sit till June, and as there was no judge here who could hear the case; and as the delay does not seem to have proceeded from any desire to prolong the proceedings, I shall deny the motion to dismiss.

It is proper to observe, in conclusion, that I see no reason why the district judge, as judge of the circuit court, should not, in a proper case, enlarge the time for filing the appeal in the circuit court. This would be the better mode, when the parties are apprehensive that they will not have time sufficient to prepare the proper pleadings, as it would prevent applications to dismiss, and would restrain the attention of the parties to the merits.

[2][On June 17th, 1876, the cause was heard on its merits, before Hon. Joseph P. BRADLEY, and, after hearing the evidence, as above set forth, the opinion of the court was delivered orally, the judge observing that, in the absence of any actual fraud, the trust deed of May 12th, 1873, created a valid lien on the property described in it; that the fact that the bankrupt disposed of the property as his own did not vitiate the deed as to the other creditors, but was a matter that affected no one but Brush, and that the latter was not bound to apply the proceeds of the sales of the encumbered property to the secured debt; that the registration of the trust deed, in accordance with the laws governing chattel mortgages, took the place of delivery of possession, and took the case out of the statute of frauds; that the new notes and trust deed of March 12th, 1874, were not a satisfaction of the notes and trust deed of 1873, but merely a renewal of the same, and did not affect the validity of Brush's lien on the property embraced in the first deed of trust; that the deed of trust of March 12th, 1874, so far as it covered property not embraced in the former mortgage, was a prohibited preference, under the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], but that the fact that this trust deed was void, so far as the original property was concerned, did not affect the lien on the property described in it, and also embraced in the valid deed of 1873; that there seemed to be a disposition on the part of district courts to consider all preferences and securities as contrary to the spirit of the bankrupt law, and to construe this branch of the law strictly rather than liberally; that this view of the law was not adopted by the supreme court of the United States; and that it had, in several recent cases, taken occasion to state that the object of the bankrupt law was not to discourage vigilance on the part of creditors, except in particular and enumerated cases; but that the preferences and liens (except in those enumerated cases) were as much entitled to protection from the bankrupt courts as any other legal rights.

[Thereupon a decree was made ordering the assignee to pay to the appellants the net proceeds of the sales, made by the former, of the property embraced in both deeds of trust, and which came into his hands as assignee; and that said amount so paid be credited on the appellants' proof of debt, and that the same be ranked, for the amount of such balance, with the other unsecured creditors of the estate; and that each party pay his own costs.][2]

Case No. 9,829.

MORRIS v. CORNELL.

[1 Spr. 62;[1] 6 Law Rep. 304.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1843.

SEAMEN—MATE DISPLACED—ORDERED TO OTHER DUTY—REMOVAL TO FORECASTLE—RIGHT OF COMPLAINT TO CONSUL.

1. A second mate rightfully displaced from heading a boat in the whale fishery, is bound to perform other duty, and upon his refusal to do so, may be punished for disobedience.

2. The right given to seamen by statute of 1840 [5 Stat. 394], to lay their complaints before the American consul, in foreign ports, is one of great importance, which a court of admiralty will carefully guard.

3. A second mate, who contumaciously refuses to perform duty, may be removed from the cabin to the forecastle.

4. The second mate's being commanded by the master to desist from swearing, and retorting on the master, that he heard him swear, and stating the language, is no justification for the master's violently assaulting and inflicting a blow upon the second mate.

[See Backstack v. Banks, Case No. 711.]

The libellant, who was second mate of the brig Agate, on a whaling voyage, of which the respondent was master, alleged, that the respondent removed him from his office, confined him to his state-room for a long time, deprived him of proper and sufficient food, refused to permit him, at various times, to go on shore at different places, and communicate with the American consul—turned him into the forecastle, where his berth was unsuitable, and committed violent assaults upon his person. The answer denied some of these charges, and justified others. The facts in the case sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

E. Bassett, for libellant.

T. D. Elliot, for respondent.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. The most important inquiry in this case, relates to the removal of the libellant from office, or his refusal to do duty, which was the first difficulty, and probably the source of all the others. A material part of the duty of second mate is to head, that is command, one of the boats in taking whales. The master admits that he removed him from this part of his duty, and justifies it on the ground of incompetency.

The libellant insists that it was from malice, and without justifiable cause.

It appears that, after being out about six months, the captain on one occasion headed one of the boats, of which the libellant then acted as boat-steerer, and as such, it was his duty first to strike the whale, when the boat had been placed by the captain in a proper position for that purpose. After an unsuccessful attempt to capture a whale, they returned to the brig. The mate, in presence of the libellant, asked the captain the cause of the failure. The captain said in reply, that it was as good a chance as he wanted, to fasten to a whale's head. The libellant said he did not consider it any chance at all. This was repeated two or three times, and the captain then told him if he did not call that a chance, he should not go in the head of the boat again during the voyage. The libellant replied: "If I don't, I will not do any other duty." The captain then told him he would confine him to his state-room, and keep him on bread and water, till he did do his duty. The libellant replied: "Very well, do so." The captain then directed the mate to prepare a state-room, by clearing out certain articles, which being done, he ordered the libellant to go into it, and he did so.

It is urged, that this decision of the captain proceeded from passion, and not from any honest judgment as to the libellant's competency. It was certainly a very unfortunate and suspicious moment, in the midst of a contentious conversation, in which the parties had strongly expressed opposing opinions, for the exercise of so delicate and important a power. The manner and the occasion savor strongly of passion, and deprive the master of those presumptions in favor of the rightful exercise of authority which would arise, if it had been done with calmness and deliberation, and challenges the most jealous scrutiny into the justification alleged. That justification is the incompetency of the libellant, or at least the honest judgment of the master, that he was incompetent, after a fair trial.

Was he competent?

[2] [In May, both boats lowered for sperm whales, the larboard being headed by the mate, and the starboard by the libelant. The larboard boat struck and killed the whale; the school, from seven to twelve brought to, and the mate testifies that the libelant had as good an opportunity as he had, but did not take any. Clow, who steered the larboard boat, testified that Morris had a chance to take one, if he pulled when he ought, and adds; "I thought the man was crazy, he hallooed so. I did not think he knew much about whaling."

[In June, the boats were lowered again. In sperm whaling, it appears that the boat, in order not to be discovered by the whale, must approach him either head and head, as it is called, that is, directly in front, or go directly after him. In this instance it is testified by the mate, that Morris was approaching head and head, and he thinks that if Morris had continued pulling with his oars, he would have struck the whale; instead of which he stopped pulling, hauled on to the wind with his sail; the fish saw the boat, was frightened and escaped. On his return to the brig, he said that he thought the mate would strike the fish, as he was after him, if he, Morris, hauled out on the wind. The captain asked him why he did not take the whale. The mate thinks that Morris, in reply, gave the captain to understand that he could not be expected to do as well as an experienced hand, or as well as the mate. The captain "found considerable fault with him."

[Weeks, who was the libelant's boat-steerer on this occasion, says, that he thinks they "had a chance to go on to a whale if they had kept on pulling," but were ordered by Morris to stop.

[Clow, who was in the larboard boat, says, that they were in pursuit just behind the whale. Morris came down on the whale's eye quartering; the whale slewed round a little, saw Morris's boat, and went down. Morris hove up when he was a little way from him. If Morris had not pulled so near the whale, he thinks they could have got him.

[In September, Morris struck a large whale, which stove the boat, and threw the men into the water. The other boat picked up the men, but the whale was lost. The mate says he thought Morris had a good opportunity to take the whale, but did not approach him properly. Weeks, who was Morris's boat-steerer, says, that they fastened to the whale, he stove the boat, and they cut clear; that the boat was too near the whale; it was Morris's fault, because he did not lay the boat off enough; that when the witness stood up to throw the iron, the flukes of the whale were under the boat.

[These are the only instances in which Morris headed the boat in pursuit of whales. There is evidence, that in attempting to take blackfish, he in one instance had his boat capsized, and in another cut the line after fastening to a fish, owing to some mismanagement or error on the part of Morris or his boat-steerer. During the time he headed the boat he took two blackfish, but not any whale. The mate took one whale which made about twenty barrels of oil, and several blackfish—how many does not appear. On two other occasions, the captain headed the boat, and Morris acted as boat-steerer. On the first the captain placed the boat in a good position to strike the whale, but Morris did not succeed in doing so. He afterwards admitted that he had a good chance, but made a "muss" of it, as he expressed it to the mate. The other was the time which has already been adverted to, and which ended in the master's displacing him from the head of the boat.

[These facts would seem to raise a pretty strong presumption of want of skill, and to require of Morris the production of evidence to control them by showing his experience and ability. But as whale fishing is a business of a very peculiar character, in which failures often occur, the court would be very reluctant to decide such a question without aid from the judgment of those whose experience or means of observation at the time entitle their opinions to respect. Now, in this case, we have the testimony of the mate and two boat-steerers, who were all the officers excepting the libelant and respondent, and also of five seamen and the steward. The mate thinks that Morris had not had sufficient experience in sperm whaling, and both the boat-steerers express opinions one strongly and the other faintly unfavorable to his competency. Two of the seamen express the same judgment. The others, whose testimony was produced, were not questioned on that point. But we have it in evidence from the mate and others, that the opinion was general among the crew that Morris was not competent to head a boat, and that some of his men were afraid to go with him. No one who was on board the vessel has given a different opinion. The only evidence produced by Morris to show his competency, is the deposition of Captain Shackley, who had previous to this voyage given him a certificate that he was qualified to head a boat. He testifies that he shipped Morris in New Zealand, as third mate and boat-steerer, on board the whale ship Two Brothers, commanded by himself: that he was on board six months, and did his duty as well as any one could, and he thinks him qualified to head a boat. But it is to be remarked, that Captain Shackley never saw him head a boat, or had any knowledge of his doing so. He performed only the duty of a boat-steerer, and as such struck three sperm whales. The libelant was apprized by the answer of the respondent, that his competency was to be put in issue, and has had full opportunity to show his previous experience. He declared to some of the crew that he had never been sperm whaling before, although he had struck sperm whales, which accords with Captain Shackley's testimony, as the Two Brothers was engaged in right whaling. I am constrained, therefore, to believe that the only experience Morris had had in sperm whaling, was on board the Two Brothers.] [2]

By the shipping articles it was expressly agreed, that if any officer, after a fair trial of his ability, should be judged by the master to be incompetent, he might be displaced. It is unnecessary to inquire whether this varies the authority conferred by law, that is, whether it makes the judgment of the master, after a fair trial, conclusive, because, upon the evidence, the respondent had, I think, sufficient grounds for judging the libellant to be incompetent to head a boat, and that he is entitled to the benefit of that justification, notwithstanding the unfortunate time and manner in which that judgment was declared.

[Captain Gifford, an experienced master in the whale fishery, testifies that a competent master can very soon determine whether an officer has the requisite skill; that seeing him once attempt to catch a whale is sufficient, and that the opportunity afforded to Morris constitutes a fair trial. He further states, that from the facts testified to, he should think that Morris had not the requisite skill. No one has expressed a different opinion upon either of these points. The respondent had, I think, sufficient grounds for judging the libelant incompetent to head a boat, and that he is entitled to the benefit of that justification, notwithstanding the unfortunate time and manner in which that judgment was declared. It was not the first time he had expressed his dissatisfaction; and Morris's persisting in asserting that to be no chance to strike a whale, which the master himself saw and declared to be a good one, might go far to strengthen a conviction that he was not qualified to judge whether a boat was placed in proper position or not. The master had the inducement of personal convenience to retain Morris in the head of the boat, for by displacing him, he thereafter imposed that duty upon himself.] [2]

It is insisted that Morris was not bound to perform any other duty, even if rightly displaced; that he was thenceforth a "quasi passenger." To this doctrine I cannot accede. The services of every man on board are needed. Take the case of our merchant ships, to which the same law applies. The second mate is disrated for incapacity, and a foremast hand placed in his stead. Shall he by his own misrepresentations as to his qualifications, deprive the ship of the services of an important officer, and by making her shorthanded, increase the hazard and add to the labors of all others, while he eats the bread of idleness, and is only an incumbrance to the ship?

I have no doubt that Morris, when he shipped, thought he should be able to perform the duties of second mate. I acquit him of all designed deception. Still, it was obligatory on him to know his qualifications, and if in fact, found to be unfit for a portion of his duties, he was still bound to have performed others. In refusing all duty, therefore, he was wrong, and set an example of insubordination and disobedience, which the master had a right to punish. He had a right to coerce him to submission.

Was the punishment excessive? It was not sufficient to produce submission. Morris never performed or expressed a willingness to perform other duty. It is said he was confined to his state-room. It is true, he was not permitted to pass through the cabin, but there was a scuttle, through which he could, at any and all times go on deck, with little, if any, difficulty. The mate testifies, that on a former occasion, he occupied the same state-room, in the same manner for two months, on account of a sick man being in the cabin, and that he found no difficulty in passing through the scuttle. Morris was not allowed to go forward of the try-works. With this exception, his movements on deck were unrestricted. He was kept on bread and water for a week or a fortnight, and afterwards, without any submission or request on his part, he was allowed meat and a kind of pudding called "duff," as often as the officers in the cabin. Complaint is also made of the want of light in his state-room, on which point there is some conflict of testimony. His health did not suffer, and considered as a punishment for refusal of duty and continued resistance of authority, his confinement and privations were not excessive.

The next allegation against the respondent is, that he prevented the libellant at different ports, from laying his complaints before the American consul. This right is secured to every seaman by the statute of 1840 [Langtree's Ed.] c. 23 [5 Stat. 394, c. 48], and if the consul be an upright and independent officer, it may be of immeasurable value to the oppressed and friendless mariner in distant regions. It may be called the habeas corpus of the seaman, and the court will carefully and vigorously guard its inviolability. But in the present instance, there is not the slightest evidence that any request was made, or desire expressed, by the libellant to the respondent, to go on shore to see the consul, or to lay any complaint before him. The libellant not being in close confinement, had free intercourse, at his pleasure, with the mate and seamen. He could easily have communicated with the consul through them; and it appears that in one instance, he did without the captain's knowledge, write to the consul. The contents of that letter are not stated. But its existence, at least, was made known to the captain while on shore, and it is inferred that he made representations to the consul, which prevented his noticing it. That inference may be true, but there is no evidence that such was the fact.

Another ground of complaint is, that the libellant was not allowed to go on shore, at any of the various ports visited by the brig after he was displaced. The first port which she afterwards entered, was the Isle of Sol. The respondent there granted him leave to go ashore, but discovering that he had put his clothes into the boat, the respondent ordered them to be taken out, and kept on board the brig, and thereupon the libellant refused to go. He had previously declared his intention to escape, and such was evidently his purpose. Once after this, at another port, he asked permission through the mate, to go ashore, and was refused. No reason for the request was assigned.

Considering that he was in a state of continued contumacy, and had manifested an intention to leave the vessel, I do not think he was entitled to the indulgence of going ashore for his gratification. As to his removal to the forecastle, it was a rightful exercise of authority by the master, after his refusal to do duty, and I do not think it shown that his berth there was such as to render it wrongful.

There remain to be considered, the two assaults upon the libellant. While Morris lived in his state-room, and was ordered not to go forward of the try-works, he, on one occasion, went to the galley to light his pipe. The captain ordered him aft, and laid hold of him. One witness testifies that he seized him by the throat, and pressed him over the lashing that went over the galley, then let go, and Morris went to the after part of the try-works, and sat on a barrel; that after some words between them, which are not stated, the captain seized Morris again by the throat, pressed him against the try-works, and Morris was red in the face. The other three witnesses who speak to this assault, did not see the captain take him by the throat, but say that he collared him, and pushed him along. On a subsequent occasion, Morris in an angry conversation with Clow, was using profane language; the captain told him not to swear; he replied that he had heard him (the captain) swear; the latter asked him what? He answered he had heard him "damn the men's eyes!" The captain then in a rage seized him violently—in what manner in the first instance, is left doubtful; but there is no doubt, that before leaving him, he had him by the hair, a little of which was torn out, and inflicted a blow which left a mark on the eye. Morris acted only on the defensive.

These assaults are without justification, and the only question is the amount of damages. The conduct of the captain toward his crew seems to have been in other respects unexceptionable; and the mate, who has manifested no leaning toward Morris, testifies to the latter's "good disposition." These outbreaks may be attributed, in a great degree, to the continued irritation in which the parties were kept, by the unfortunate relation in which they stood to each other. Of this, Morris was the blameworthy cause. In passing forward of the try-works to the galley, he transcended the limits assigned to him, and was in fault. When properly checked for swearing, he was wrong in retorting upon the captain—but the provocation was not great. There was no exigency—no emergency. The captain was bound to suppress his passion. If unable to control himself, he is unfit to command others. He is to set an example of calmness and self-possession. Violence begets violence. Hasty words and rash acts on shipboard, often produce deplorable consequences, which a little forbearance would have prevented.

The bodily injury to the libellant was not very great, but he was subject to the indignity of unjustifiable violence to his person, and his feelings are not to be disregarded.

I shall decree $50 damages and costs.

MORRIS et al. v. GARDNER.

[1 Cranch, C. C. 213.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY — INDORSER ON NOTE — NOTICE — DELAY — KNOWLEDGE OF MAKER'S INSOLVENCY.

1. Notice to an indorser is necessary, unless he knew the maker to be insolvent at the time of indorsement.

2. Where the parties live within two miles of each other, nine days' delay is fatal.

3. A subsequent promise by the defendant to pay, made with a full knowledge of his discharge, will bind him.

Assumpsit against the defendant [John Gardner] as indorser of a note of Anderson; and for goods sold and delivered; and for money had and received; and upon an assumpsit in writing to pay seventy dollars for Anderson. The evidence was that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiffs [B. W. Morris and others] for goods sold; and gave and indorsed to the plaintiffs Anderson's note for a smaller amount than the debt due for the goods, which note was to be collected by plaintiffs, and when received, the money was to be applied to the credit of the defendant. The note became payable 9 and 12 July, 1802. The plaintiffs received on the 21st of July, forty dollars in part. No notice was given to the defendant of non-payment, until after the receipt of the forty dollars. The defendant lived in Washington. The plaintiffs' agent, who held the note, lived in Georgetown. Afterwards, and after the note was payable, and after the payment of the forty dollars, to wit, at last term, the plaintiffs recovered judgment against the defendant for the balance of the account of goods sold, after deducting the amount of the note. Gardner said, at the time of indorsing the note, that he expected that it would be difficult to get the money of Anderson, but the plaintiffs could get it better than he could.

Upon the first count, (which is on the note,) THE COURT gave the following instruction: That it is necessary for the plaintiffs to prove that a demand was made on Anderson, the maker, and notice of his refusal given to Gardner, the indorser, in due time, unless it should appear that Anderson was insolvent when the note was indorsed and delivered to the plaintiffs, and was known by Gardner to be so: That the defendant, Gardner, was discharged from his liability by the want of such demand and notice, but that his assumption would make him again liable, if made under a knowledge of the facts and of the law as to his being discharged: And, further, that if the jury should be of opinion, from the evidence, that the defendant lived in the city of Washington, and the plaintiffs' agent in Georgetown, the distance being about two miles, notice to the defendant, given nine days after the last day of grace, was not reasonable notice.

Verdict for plaintiffs.

MORRIS v. HUNTINGTON.

[1 Paine, 348; [1] 1 Robb, Pat. Cas. 448.]

Circuit Court, D. New York. April Term, 1824.

PATENTS — ACT OF 1793 — PREVIOUS KNOWLEDGE AND USE—NEW PATENTS—SURRENDER—OLD PATENT DECLARED VOID.

1. The first section of the patent law of 1793 [1 Stat. 318], construed in connexion with the other sections of the act, means that the invention should not be known or used as the invention of any other person than the patentee before the application for a patent.

[Cited in Whitney v. Emmett, Case No. 17,585; Reed v. Cutter, Id. 11,645.]

2. If the invention have got into use while the inventor was practising upon it with a view to improve it before applying for a patent, such use does not invalidate the patent; and the motive for the delay is a question for the jury.

[Cited in Treadwell v Bladen, Case No. 14,154; Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. (32 U. S.) 317; Jones v. Sewall, Case No. 7,495.]

3. One who has patented his invention cannot take out a new patent for the same invention, until the first is surrendered, repealed, or declared void.

[Cited in brief in Treadwell v. Bladen, Case No. 14,154. Cited in Mathews v. Flower, 25 Fed. 830.]

4. The obstacle of an invalid patent may be removed by having it declared void after a verdict against it, or by having a vacatur entered ex parte in the department of state on a surrender of the patent. But the provisions of the 6th section of the act, do not enable a patentee to declare his own patent void, and a verdict in a suit on the second patent in favour of such patent, does not avoid the first patent.

5. It seems that on surrendering a patent and taking out a new one, the latter should be for only the unexpired part of the fourteen years since obtaining the first patent.

6. Whether a new patent can be taken out where a patent has been declared void under the 6th section of the act? Quere.

[7. Cited in Wilson v. Rousseau, Case No. 17,832, to the point that a defective specification renders letters patent absolutely void, no matter how innocent of fraudulent design is the inventor, nor how beneficent his invention.]

This was an action on the case, brought by the plaintiff against the defendant, for infringements by him of a patent issued to the plaintiff May [15], 1822, for an improvement in the stopcock. The specification of the patent contained a clear description of the instrument, so that artists could make it from such description, and at its close, the improvements claimed under the patent were particularized. Evidence was given by the plaintiff showing the time of the invention to be September, 1815; that the plaintiff was the inventor; that the invention was useful; and that the defendant had made and sold instruments which were infringements of the patent. On a cross-examination of the plaintiff's witnesses, it appeared that the plaintiff had taken out a patent in 1816, for an improved block-tin stopcock, the specification of which was proved by the witness to describe the same instrument as the one described in the specification of the patent of 1822, with this difference, that in the former the particular improvements claimed were not stated. It appeared in evidence on the part of the plaintiff, that certain parts of the instrument, described generally as part of the instrument in both patents, but not claimed in the patent of 1822, as improvements of the patentee, had been in use prior to the patent of 1815. Upon this evidence,

C. D. Colden, G. Griffen, and G. W. Strong, for defendant, Moved for a nonsuit (opinion of Van Ness, J., No. 4 U. S. Law J.; Whittemore v. Cutter [Case No. 17,601]; Odiorne v. Amesbury Nail Factory [Id. 10,430]; Moody v. Fisk [Id. 9,745]; Coll. Pat. 70, 170; Gods. Pat. 200; Fessen. Pat. 50, 173), on two grounds: 1. That it appeared that the instrument had gone into use before the date of the patent of 1822; and 2. That the patentee had a prior patent for the same thing, which had not been repealed, surrendered, nor declared void.

Under the first point it was contended: That by the words of the first section of the patent act, the invention must not have been used before the application for a patent. That the other sections of the patent law, the phraseology of which was indefinite, should be construed in subordination to the first section. That this construction was fortified by the words of the first section of the law of 1800 [2 Stat. 37], extending the patent act to aliens. That the instrument having gone into the use or knowledge of the public, the inventor had no secret to disclose as a consideration for the grant by the public. That in England the law was unquestionably settled to this effect—and that the English decisions should be adopted here, inasmuch as they were founded in the nature of the subject, and as our courts had adopted English decisions on English statutes as applicable to the construction of statutes in this country, where there was much more difference in the phraseology, than existed between our patent law and the English statute. That the point in question had never been decided in this country under our present patent, before the decision of Judge Van Ness, which was in point in their favour. That very injurious consequences would result, if inventors might lie by, and after the public had got into the use of a thing, claim it by a patent.

On the second point it was contended: That the patent of 1816 was an estoppel to the plaintiff to take out another patent for the same thing, before the repeal or surrender of such prior patent. That the prior patent was not on its face void, but was voidable only, and that not by the plaintiff himself, but only by third persons. That to allow the plaintiff to allege his first patent to be void, would be embarrassing the court with the trial of two issues, in which it would be inconsistently thrown on the defendant to prove that the first patent was good and the second bad. That at any rate the plaintiff should have surrendered the first patent before taking out the second—the course in England being so. He should also in such case have taken out the second patent, not for fourteen years from its date, but for the residue of the time, computing from the date of the first patent. That on the plaintiff's grounds, patentees would, by taking out patents, insidiously defective, secure to themselves a perpetuity. That the acts in favour of Oliver Evans were a legislative decision on the subject; and that the case of Odiorne v. Amesbury Nail Factory [supra] was in point and decisive.

T. A. Emmet, S. P. Staples, and D. Lord for plaintiff,

In reply (Barrett v. Hall [Case No. 1,047]; Goodyear v. Mathews [Id. 5,576]; Woodcock v. Parker [Id. 17,971]; Davies, Pat. 448; Evans v. Weiss [Case No. 4,572]), contended on the first objection: That the 6th, 7th and other sections of the act showed that reference was to be had to the time of invention in considering the question of prior use. That the general phraseology of the act was inconsistent with a literal construction of the first section. That a literal construction of that section was felo de se, and it must therefore be construed in subordination to the rest of the act. That the policy of the patent act in England and its words differed from our law. That in England it went on the ground of a bounty from the crown; in this country on the ground of protecting the common law right of the inventor to his invention. That the point in question had been directly decided in Evans v. Weiss [supra], and in the case of Goodyear v. Mathews [supra].

On the second point: That the doctrine of estoppel did not apply; the grant was void so as to prevent any right from vesting. That the prior patent, on the state of the evidence, was void, not voidable: voidable implies that the thing is capable of confirmation, which the first patent is not. That a surrender of the first patent could not be made, there being no provision in the law to authorize it; as is the case in England, by the inherent power of the chancellor. That as the patentee had enjoyed no legal protection under the first patent, it should not be computed against him as part of the fourteen years, at any rate that the question of an extra extension of time could not properly arise until the lapse of fourteen years from the date of the first patent.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The questions presented by the facts in this cause are of great importance, and not unattended with difficulty, and deserve a more deliberate consideration than can be given them in the course of a trial.

The first question is, whether the fact that the invention was introduced into use by the patentee himself, as his invention prior to the application for the patent, rendered the patent invalid. It appears to be settled law in England, that if an invention had been introduced into use by the patentee himself, and known and used by others before the date of the patent, such disclosure and use will destroy the patent. There is however a difference between the English law and the acts of congress on this subject. In the English statute it is stated precisely from what period the fourteen years are to commence: they are to run from the date of the patent. But there is no such phraseology in the act of congress. The English statute speaks of the invention to be patented, being such as others, before the date of the patent, shall not use; and consequently if a patentee in England have so disclosed his invention as that it be put in use before the date of the patent, he is not entitled to the patent. Our act does not contain these provisions. There is some incongruity in the phraseology of our patent law of 1793, and it is inartificially drawn in several parts. A correct interpretation of it requires that the general scope and object of the law and all its clauses should be taken into view together. Were no other part of the act than the first section to be read, it would seem to preclude a patent for any invention used before the application for a patent. But taking a general view of the clauses of the act and of its object it seems to me that this section must be controlled by the other parts of the act. As it respects the patentee, the great object of the law is to secure to inventors the benefit of their invention for fourteen years. The third section, prescribing the oath to be taken, only speaks of the applicant's being the true inventor. It says nothing about the invention's not having been in use before the application. So also the sixth section which specifies the cause for which a patent may be declared void, shows the great object of inquiry to be whether there has been a prior use of the improvement: Prior to what? Prior to the invention of the patentee. The same remarks are applicable to the 10th section, and indeed such seems the fair import of all the sections of the act of 1793, but the first. I therefore think that the first section should be construed in connexion with the other parts of the act, to mean that the improvement or discovery should be unknown and not used as the invention of any other than the patentee, before the application for a patent.

The objection drawn by the defendant's counsel from the first section of the act of 1800, placing aliens on the same grounds, in certain respects, as citizens, is not a substantial one. This section first proceeds to extend the benefits of the patent law to aliens, equally as they are enjoyed by citizens, and under the same limitations. Aliens must take the same oath as to being the inventors, &c. Then comes the proviso requiring them to swear that the invention has not been known or used in this or any foreign country. This proviso is a limitation on the enacting clause according to the general rule of construction, and is to be construed as limiting and restraining the grant to which it is applied. It puts the alien on grounds somewhat different from those of a citizen, requiring an oath of something more than is required of a citizen: and this view strengthens the construction given above to the first section of the act of 1793. Then the close of the proviso goes on to state, that if it shall appear that the thing patented was known or used previous to the application for a patent, the patent shall be void. It seems reasonable to restrict an alien in this manner from taking out a patent, for what has been in use abroad, inasmuch as our own citizens cannot patent a foreign invention. Evils may undoubtedly exist under this construction of the law. Expensive machines may be made before a patent is taken out; and persons who have in this way innocently incurred expenses, may be stopped short in their undertakings. But I am inclined to think that under such circumstances, a patent should not be permitted to operate to the prejudice of persons thus situated, on the principle that innocent third persons are not to be injured by relation back, so as to deprive them of a right lawfully acquired. And if a person knowing of an invention proceeds to put it in use, the inventor not having secured his right by patent, the latter ought not to be permitted to take away that which was previously lawfully made. No man is to be permitted to lie by for years, and then take out a patent. If he has been practising his invention with a view of improving it, and thereby rendering it a greater benefit to the public before taking out a patent, that ought not to prejudice him. But it should always be a question submitted to the jury, what was the intent of the delay of the patent, and whether the allowing the invention to be used without a patent, should not be considered an abandonment or present of it to the public.

The next question is, whether it is not a valid objection to the second patent that the patentee has a prior patent for the same thing not surrendered, repealed, or declared void. I think this objection insurmountable. A prior patent must be got rid of before a second can be taken out. Why should a second patent be taken out before a prior one is avoided, although invalid, if the patentee is enjoying the full benefit of it? It is objected, that the patentee is in difficulty as to getting the first patent out of the way. But if the patentee should sue on the first patent, and the defendant should succeed in the suit, the patent could be declared void; and if the patentee had a right to the thing patented, the objection of a prior patent would be removed. Besides, I see no insuperable objection to entering a vacatur of the patent of record in the department of state, if taken out inadvertently and by mistake. All the proceedings in that department on the subject of patents are ex parte, except in the case of interfering applications. The department acts rather ministerially than judicially, and upon the representation of the applicant without entering into an examination of the question of right: and there seems to be no good reason why on a like ex parte application the patent may not be surrendered and cancelled of record, if no misconduct be imputable to the patentee in taking it out. And in such case as the exclusive right is not to exceed fourteen years, the second patent may be limited according to circumstances, and thereby secure both to the patentee and the public their respective rights. The only record evidence of the patent is that in the department of state, and in the letters patent in the hands of the patentee; and if the letters patent were surrendered and cancelled of record, the invention would be open to public use without hazard, so far as depends on such patent. And if the patentee does not choose to do this, he must have the patent made void in some other way by adversary proceedings. The provisions of the 6th section of the act of 1793, do not apply here so as to enable the plaintiff to treat his patent as void. The proceedings under this section are the acts of the defendant only, and the plaintiff from this section has no right to set up a defect in his own patent. This court cannot enter a vacatur on the first patent, and that patent is not void on the face of it. The plaintiff's difficulty here is, that the prior patent is too broad. This is good ground for the defendant to take according to the decision of the supreme court of the United States. For the patentee must take his patent for the improvement only. But I do not see how the verdict of the jury in this suit on the second patent, can avoid the first: that must be a subject of litigation and proof in every case which is tried under the second patent.

It is objectionable on general principles to allow a patentee in a court of law, to show his own patent void. It being issued on his own representation and according to his own specification, as to the extent of the right claimed, he is estopped by his own act. He certainly is not to be permitted to allege, that he obtained his patent fraudulently, or that there was any concealment or addition with respect to his specification with a view to deceive the public, or to set up his own misconduct in any other respect. And should he allege, that he had innocently and in ignorance of the law, procured a patent broader than his invention, he is not without the answer, that he is chargeable with a knowledge of the law, and cannot set up his ignorance of it to avoid his own act. Whether, after the first patent has been declared void, after verdict under the sixth section in a case free of fraud, a new patent can be taken out, is a question which does not here arise. But I am inclined to think that a surrender of the prior patent might be made, and that the secretary of state might grant a new one, under a statement of the circumstances, although not for the period of fourteen years from the date of the second patent, as the patentee has enjoyed the exclusive right for a part of the fourteen years. This construction, as to the effect of a prior patent, seems necessary to prevent a patentee from enjoying his exclusive right for a period longer than fourteen years, and indeed for an indefinite period.

As to the argument that fourteen years from the date of the first patent have not yet expired, so that the objection cannot be made, it appears to me untenable. The second patent is for fourteen years, and that being within the time limited by the act of congress, it is good upon the face of it. And the objection, that the patentee has enjoyed the benefit of the invention for a part of the fourteen years under a prior patent, not being amongst any of the objections which by the acts of congress may be set up by third persons to avoid the patent, the objection cannot be made after the expiration of the fourteen years, and so in this case the patentee would have the benefit of his patent-right for twenty years instead of fourteen.

On the whole I am of opinion that the second objection is fatal, and that a nonsuit must be ordered.

But the counsel of the plaintiff suggesting that it had been doubted whether a writ of error returnable in the supreme court would lie on a judgment of nonsuit, and praying the court to charge the jury on the points discussed, THE COURT accordingly directed a verdict for the defendant, with liberty to the plaintiff to move for a new trial on the points of law.

Case No. 9,832.

MORRIS v. HURST.

[1 Wash. C. C. 433.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1806.

ASSUMPSIT—ACCOUNT—DEBIT AND CREDIT ENTRIES—FOR WHOM EVIDENCE.

1. In an action of assumpsit, if one party relies upon an account delivered by the other party, without other proof to establish his demand; the party producing the account may discharge himself, by relying on the items of credit, on the other side of the account.

2. If the credit side of an account is taken to charge the person who delivered it, the items on the debit side must also be admitted as proved by the account.

This cause came on under a rule for a new trial, on the ground of surprise, and misdirection. The plaintiff, having delivered in an account before bringing the action, in which many years transactions between the parties were included, to a considerable amount; the plaintiff only proved one item, of a modern date, to the amount of about £230, being rents received by the defendant, which belonged to the plaintiff. The defendant attempted to meet this demand, by selecting out of the account, a credit to a larger amount, but without attempting to prove it; relying on it, as an admission by the plaintiff. The court informed the counsel, at the trial, that if he relied upon the credit side of that account, as evidence against the plaintiff, he must admit the debit side, unless he could falsify it by evidence. Upon this, the counsel let the jury go out, who found the £230, with interest, which had been established.

M. Levy, now contended, that after receiving the account, he expected the plaintiff would be obliged to go through the whole; and that he could not pick out one item, and upon proving it, recover to that amount; that therefore he was surprised at the trial. (2) That though a defendant may, by his answer, charge himself, his answer is not always sufficient to discharge him; and therefore, the account rendered, was good evidence against; but not for the plaintiff. Gilb. Ev. 152; 2 Vern. 194.

BY THE COURT. If a man is called upon to render an account for the purpose of enabling the plaintiff to establish a demand aginst the defendant, if he is obliged to rely upon this statement to charge him; the defendant is entitled to be discharged by it. If he is called upon to state, whether a particular sum is not due, and the defendant states, that it was to be paid on a condition not performed, you must take the acknowledgment altogether. An account is composed of items, and they are placed on the debit and credit side. If the defendant produces the account, you can no more take the items on the credit side to charge him, and reject the debits; than, in the case first supposed, you can take the acknowledgment of what was agreed to be paid, and reject what he states, with respect to the condition. The verdict therefore was right. Rule discharged.

MORRIS et al. v. LOWELL MANUF'G CO.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1866.

INJUNCTION—PRELIMINARY—PATENT CASE—WHAT CONSIDERED — INJURY TO PLAINTIFF—TO DEFENDANT—USED IN GOOD FAITH—NOTICE.

1. In granting or refusing a preliminary injunction, the court will carefully consider the situation of the parties. Its important office is to preserve the rights of the patentee pending the litigation of his title.

2. If the title of the patentee has already been fully established, or is otherwise so clear that no reasonable doubt of its validity remains, a court of equity would, in many cases, grant a preliminary injunction notwithstanding the injury which might result to the defendant. But when there is no danger of loss to the plaintiff, and great loss will result to the defendant, the case must be substantially free from doubt to justify an injunction.

3. It is a material circumstance, upon a motion for a preliminary injunction, whether or not the defendant is fully responsible for any profits or damages which may be decreed against him.

[Cited in Kane v. Huggins Cracker & Candy Co., 44 Fed. 292.]

4. It is also a material circumstance that the defendant does not make or vend the patented machine, but only uses it, so that the injury to the plaintiff is the loss of his royalty and not a damaging and constantly increasing competition.

5. While an injunction is of great use in preventing multiplicity of suits or repeated actions for successive infringements, it is no part of its legitimate office to stop litigation in the suit in which it is granted, or to force the compromise of a disputed right.

6. There are cases so clear that a court of equity will not permit further litigation; and there are others in which, upon a balance of the equities, and of the danger of serious injury, the plaintiff's rights decidedly preponderate. In such cases the results which would indirectly follow the granting of an injunction, could not be regarded.

7. If there has been a decision in favor of the plaintiff, and a motion for new trial, exceptions or an appeal are taken or made, and there appear to be questions of some nicety or importance, so that the action taken by the defendant can not be thought to be intended merely for delay, a court of equity will often wait for the final result before awarding an injunction.

8. One who is known to the patentee to be using his improvement, in apparent good faith, is entitled to definite and early information of the patentee's construction of his own rights, and of his intention to enforce them.

This was a motion [by Francis Morris and others] for a provisional injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing the letters patent for "improvement in the machine for ginning cotton and wool," granted to Stephen R. Parkhurst, May 1, 1845, extended for seven years from May 1, 1859, reissued February 12, 1861, and assigned to complainants. The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion of the court.

George Gifford and B. R. Curtis, for complainants.

C. L. Woodbury, for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the use, by the respondents, of the burring machine said to be invented by S. R. Parkhurst, and described in his reissued patent, dated February 12, 1861. The plaintiffs are assignees of that patent, and have obtained a decree in an equity suit in the circuit court for the Southern district of New York, before Mr. Justice Nelson, against Charles L. Goddard, the maker of the machine, for an injunction and account. The account has not yet been made up by the master, and it is said that Goddard intends to appeal from the final decree and carry the case to the supreme court. It appears that Goddard held an assignment of one-third of the machine, which it is admitted gave him a right to make and vend it during the existence of the original patent. That assignment was not before the court in the action against Goddard himself, and it is now contended by the respondents that by the true construction of its terms it grants a like interest for the renewed term. It further appears that the renewed patent will expire on the first day of May next, and that if the use of the burring machine is enjoined in this mill and the others in which it is used in this district, the necessary changes can not be made in the carding machinery with which it is connected, much, if at all, before the first of May, and that in the meantime a large number of workmen will be thrown out of employment, and a considerable part of the defendants' machinery will be stopped.

In granting or refusing a preliminary injunction, the court will carefully consider the situation of the parties. Its important office is to preserve the rights of the patentee pending the litigation of his title. If the title has already been fully established, or is otherwise so clear that no reasonable doubt of its validity remains, a court of equity would, in many cases, grant such an injunction, as it would a final injunction, notwithstanding the injury which might result to the defendant. But where there is no danger of loss to the plaintiff, and a great loss will result to the defendant, the case must be substantially free from doubt to require such action. In the present case, the defendants are admitted to be fully responsible for any profits or damages that may be decreed against them. This is a material circumstance Newall v. Wilson, 2 De Gex, M. & G. 282; Day v. Boston Belting Co. [Case No. 3,674]. Another is that the defendants do not make or vend the patented machine, but only use it, so that the injury to the plaintiffs is the loss of their royalty and not a damaging and constantly increasing competition. Forbush v. Bradford [Id. 4,930]; Neilson v. Thompson, Webst. Pat. Cas. 278.

It is said that the royalty demanded is so moderate compared with the injury to the manufacturers which would follow an injunction, that the controversy would practically end now if the motion be granted, while the expense of further litigation might be a serious consideration for the plaintiffs.

These facts have been urged by both sides. They do not furnish a conclusive argument for either. On the one hand an injunction is of great use in preventing multiplicity of suits, repeated actions for successive infringements, but it is no part of its legitimate office to stop litigation in the suit in which it is granted, or to force the compromise of a disputed right. On the other hand, there are cases so clear that a court of equity will not permit further litigation; and there are others in which upon a balance of the equities, and of the danger of serious injury, the plaintiffs' rights decidedly preponderate. In such cases the results which would indirectly follow the granting of an injunction which equity called for, could not be regarded. So that upon this point we are brought back to the title of the plaintiffs and the situation of the parties.

So far as any danger of serious loss or irreparable mischief is concerned, the plaintiffs have shown no cause for the court to interfere. Nor am I sure that their title is so entirely clear as to make it a matter of course to issue the injunction without regard to the damage it might do the defendants. If we grant to the decision which has been made in the plaintiffs' favor all the faith and credit which would be due to a like decreee in this circuit, yet even in such a case an injunction would not always be granted. If a motion for a new trial, exceptions, or an appeal are taken or made, and there appear to be questions of some nicety or importance, so that the action taken by the defendant can not be thought to be intended merely for delay, a court of equity will often wait for the final result before awarding an injunction. Neilson v. Thompson, Webst. Pat. Cas. 278, 286; Forbush v. Bradford [supra.] And this, even though the judge who tried the cause has but little doubt of the correctness of the first decision. I am inclined to think some of the questions involved here are of the character above indicated. But the turning point with me is that the inconvenience which it appears the defendants would suffer is not counterbalanced by any corresponding advantage to the plaintiffs, coupled with the fact that by the time they had at great expense and loss to themselves and their workmen, adapted their works to carding without the plaintiffs' improvements, they would have the right to change them back again to their present condition. In an important case before Judge Sprague, in which the plaintiffs' patent was not disputed, and in which his own opinion appears to have been quite clear upon the question of infringement, he refused to grant the absolute injunction on the ground that this course would prevent the defendants from using their own improvements, which were combined with those of the plaintiffs, the patent having some six months to run. "Howe's patent," says the learned judge, "will expire on the 10th of September next. It may or may not be extended. It is stated that the defendant has an establishment in which he is making these machines. If all the rights of Howe can be protected, and indemnity can be secured to him without stopping this manufacture beween the present time and the 10th of September. I think the court ought to give him and the manufacturers of the Sloat machine, the benefit of the contingency, that at that time they may be allowed to go on without a permission from Howe, if his patent should not be extended." Howe v. Morton [Case No. 6,769]. That case was stronger for the plaintiffs than this in some respects. The defendants were manufacturers of the machine; the patent had a little longer time to run; and the contingency of a renewal was not very improbable. Here the patent can not be extended further without a special act of congress. A similar decision was made by Mr. Justice Grier in Parker v. Sears [Id. 10,748].

No doubt there might be circumstances in the conduct of an infringer which would induce the court to interfere at the very latest period to stop a fraudulent, or even willful, use of a patent right. I find no such circumstance here. The defendants bought their machines of the person of whom they had been accustomed to buy them. It does not appear whether they were aware that the patent had been extended, and that the patentee denied the right of Goddard to continue to make and sell the improvement under the original agreement. In the absence of express notice I ought not to look upon their conduct as either fraudulent or willful. Without going the length of some English cases and saying that the defendant must be sued very promptly if a special injunction is to be asked for, I still must think there is much good sense in the general doctrine that one who is known to the patentee to be using his improvement in apparent good faith, is entitled to definite and early information of the patentee's construction of his own rights and of his intention to enforce them. The absence of such authentic notice is one circumstance to be considered by the court.

Upon the whole, I must refuse this motion on the authority and the reasoning of Howe v. Morton [supra].

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1853.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—APPRAISEMENT—PERIOD OF VALUATION—PENALTY—UNDERVALUATION.

1. Under section 17, Act Aug. 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), and section 1, Act March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 629), the appraisement of goods determines their dutiable value.

2. Act March 3, 1851, changes the period of valuation by appraisement, from the time of purchase to the time of exportation.

3. Section 8, Act July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), construed, in reference to the imposition of 20 per cent. penalty for the undervaluation of imports.

4. The authority to impose such penalty is not limited to cases where an entry has been made of the imports, or where the importer, on entry, has added to the cost or value given by the invoice.

5. Section 1, Act March 3, 1851, varies the provisions of section 8, Act July 30, 1846, only so far as concerns the period of time in reference to which the valuation of imports is to be made, and does not affect the question of the imposition of extra duties because of undervaluation.

The plaintiff [Joseph Morris], in August, 1851, imported into the port of New York, an invoice of needles from Liverpool, purchased by him in England. The invoice prices were raised, by appraisement and reappraisement as of the time of exportation, more than ten per cent., and duties on the increase and a penalty were levied accordingly. Those imposts were paid under protest, by the agent of the plaintiff, and this action was brought against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector to recover them back. The protest was the printed form used in Goddard v. Maxwell [Case No. 5,492], including also a written clause, "that 20 per cent. penalty, section 8 of tariff act of 1846, cannot be exacted except where the importer has added to his invoice price on entry."

BETTS, District Judge. The appraisement determined the dutiable value of the goods, under the provisions of section 17 of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 564), and of section 1 of the act of March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 629). Accordingly, there is no ground for a recovery because of any excess of duties levied. The act of 1851 changed the period of valuation by appraisement, from the time of purchase to the time of exportation, and the appraisers, on this occasion, adopted the latter period, in making the appraisal.

Section 8 of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), consists of two distinct provisions. One of them relates to the importing of purchased goods, with the privilege to the importer to make an addition, on his entry, to the invoice cost or value, for the purpose of raising it to the true market value of the goods. The other provision relates to the appraisal of such goods, and their liability to an additional duty or penalty of 20 per cent. The term "such imports," used in the second branch of the section, refers to the expression or description, "imports which have been actually purchased," employed in the antecedent branch, and is not limited to the circumstance or condition of an entry having been made of the imports, or of an addition, in the entry, by the importer, to the cost or value given by the invoice.

Section 1 of the act of March 3, 1851, varies the provisions of section 8 of the act of July 30, 1846, only in so far as concerns the period of time in reference to which the valuation of imports is to be made, and is not inconsistent with the imposition of extra duties, under that or any preceding act, because of an undervaluation of imports. And section 4 of the act of 1851, by implication, continues in force all anterior enactments to that end. Accordingly, the defendant was authorized to cause the extra duties in question to be levied in this case. Judgment for defendant.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 176; 2 Bond, 66.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. March, 1867.

PATENTS — REISSUE — WOOD-BENDING MACHINE — COMBINATION.

1. A construction or mode of operating a machine, described or distinctly referred to, but not claimed, in an original patent, may be claimed in a reissue.

2. Morris' patent of March 11, 1856, and the reissue thereof, dated May 27, 1862, for "improvement in wood-bending machines," defined, construed, and sustained.

3. The first claim of said patent held to be for a combination of a stationary form, clamps, and levers, whether said levers do or do not work upon fixed fulcrums.

4. The third claim held to be for the elements named in the first claim, in combination with hooks, or hooks and pins, to hold the bent wood to the form.

5. The novelty of Morris' patent is not impeached by the inventions described in Thomas Blanchard's patent of December 18, 1849, for "improved method of bending wood."

6. A machine employing a stationary form, clamps, and levers, in which the levers did not work upon fixed fulcrums, held to be an infringement of Morris' patent.

This was a suit in equity, brought [against Theodore Royer, Samuel T. J. Coleman, and John Young] to restrain the infringement of letters patent [No. 14,405] for "improvement in wood-bending machines," granted to John C. Morris, March 11, 1856, and reissued May 27, 1862 [No. 1,312].

The invention of Morris consisted of a stationary form or mold, around which wood could be bent into any required shape. The bending was effected by placing the center of a piece of wood, previously steamed, against the center of the mold, and clamping them together. Levers then pressed against the ends of the wood, and gradually forced them around the form; the levers being drawn together by cords wound upon a drum. In bending the wood, the inner fibers were condensed and the outer ones stretched. But while wood may be greatly compressed without injury, a slight stretching tears the fibers. To obviate this difficulty, the wood, before being bent, was laid upon a strap of flexible iron, and the ends were confined between two blocks of solid iron, called clamps or abutments, which were attached to the flexible strap. By this means the stretching of the outer fiber was prevented, and the entire change in the length of the fiber, caused by the bending, took place, by compression, in the inside of the curve.

The principal defense upon the issue of novelty, was founded upon a patent granted to Thomas Blanchard, December 18, 1849 [Patent No. 6,951], in which the wood was bent by attaching one end of the stick to a form which was rolled over the wood toward the other end.

The material portions of the specification and claims of Morris' patent were as follows:

"The machines for bending wood may be divided into two principal groups or classes—the first including all the machines in which the bending process commences at one end of the wood, and is continued in the direction of the other; and the second including those in which the form or mold is first applied at or near the center of the piece to be bent, and the bending process is continued from that point toward each end, which I call bending outward. I regard machines of the latter class as superior, from the fact that the change of the fiber of the wood, in the act of bending, goes on from the center toward the ends, in two directions, equalizing the strain, and distributing the compressed fibers more evenly throughout the curve.

"My improvements relate to the second class of machines. In my original patent, of which this is a reissue, reference was made to a previous use of levers, 'for bringing the piece to the required shape, by connecting said levers with a strap at each end, the strap being placed at the back of the piece required to be bent, and then drawing the ends of the levers together, which bends the piece around the form.' This reference was solely to a use of such a method which had been made by myself within less than two years previous to the application for my original patent.

"My improvements consist of devices tending to adapt the machines of the second class, as stated above, to the performance of good work, in an expeditious manner, and with the least loss of material. They are applicable to bending wood, to be used for any purpose, such as ship timber, wheel felloes, plow handles, chair stuff, and other articles. In some cases, as for bending plow handles, but one lever will be required, when the bending process will begin at the inner end of the curve, next to the portion of the piece left unbent, and will extend toward the outer end, bending the wood first in a large curve, and gradually reducing it smaller, until it conforms to the curvature of the mold.

"In bending wood around a form the outer fibers are stretched, while the inner fibers are compressed; but while wood may be greatly compressed without injury, comparatively little stretching or expansion will break the fibers of the outer curve. To prevent undue expansion, it is necessary to confine the wood between abutments placed at the ends, so as to counteract end expansion, by what is called in the art 'end pressure.' These abutments or clamps may wholly prevent end expansion, or may prevent it before or after a certain degree of pressure is reached in the process of bending.

"k k, are levers or handles for guiding the bending operation. They may work upon the fulcrums m1, m2, m3, m4, or their equivalents. These handles or levers support the clamps and serve to draw them, with the strap and piece to be bent, around the form or mold. They are operated by the cords n n and drum o. When the levers are thus used, the clamps or abutments connected to the strap g are adjusted so as to slide upon the sides of the levers, to allow the piece to be bent to accommodate itself to the form. Another mode of using the handles is to dispense with the fulcrum pins, so that in the operation of bending, while power is applied as before to the end of the handle, and the resistance is the unbent wood, the point of support is no longer fixed, but shifting, being found in the bending strap or point of contact of the strap and wood with the mold. In this method, which was that originally used by me, the abutments do not slide upon the handle, but may be made a part thereof, or attached thereto. The principal advantage of the fixed fulcrum is, that it prevents the wood from twisting in the process of bending, by reason of one side of the wood, or one of two pieces bent at the same time, being harder than the other. In such cases, without some rigid point of support preventing the levers from twisting or turning, it is difficult to make true work.

* * * * * * *

"Having thus fully described my improvements, I do not wish to be understood as claiming them in connection with machines for bending wood where the bending is effected by the rotation of the form, but what I claim therein as new, and desire to secure by letters patent, is

"I. A wood-bending form, to which timbers are made to conform by bending them from the center or inner end of the desired curve outward, when used in combination with abutments or clamps to prevent or regulate end expansion, and levers, or handles, or their equivalents, to guide the bending, substantially as described.

"II. A stationary or poised wood-bending form in combination with the cords, levers, and drum, or their equivalents, and the eccentric clamp, or its equivalent, in the manner and for the purpose set forth.

"III. In combination with the stationary form, levers, and abutments, I claim the employment of hooks, or hooks and pins, or their equivalents, that shall embrace the ends of the wood, to restrain the wood in shape, and permit the removal of the abutments after the completion of each operation."

S. S. Fisher, for complainant.
George M. Lee, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, charging, in the usual form, that the defendants have infringed the exclusive right of the complainant to certain improvements in a machine for bending wood, originally patented to him March 11, 1856, and for which he obtained a reissued patent dated May 27, 1862. The bill prays for an injunction and an account of profits.

In their answer, the defendants allege, as grounds of defense: First, that the reissued patent is fraudulent and void, as not being for the same invention claimed in the original patent; second, that complainant's patent is void for want of novelty in the invention; third, that defendants have not infringed the complainant's right under his patent.

I. As to the first ground of defense, namely, the invalidity of the reissued patent to the complainant, it is not alleged or claimed that there was actual fraud in obtaining it; but it is insisted that it is constructively fraudulent, as being an unwarranted modification or enlargement of the claim of the original patent. The argument is that the original patent provided only for fixed fulcrums for the levers used in the operation of wood bending; whereas, in the reissue, he provides for bending, not only by levers on fixed fulcrums, but also by straps connecting the ends of the levers, and bending the wood without fixed fulcrums. But a reference to the original patent will show clearly that both methods were in the contemplation of the invention, as suited to effect the object of his invention. He refers distinctly to the use of levers "for bringing the piece to the required shape, by connecting the levers with a strap at each end; the strap being placed at the back of the piece required to be bent, and then drawing the ends of the levers together, which bends the piece around the form." In the specification of the reissued patent, after referring to the patented machine as belonging to the class "in which the form or mold is first applied at or near the center of the piece to be bent, and the bending process is continued from that point toward each end, which I call bending outward," and describing minutely the devices by which the work may be effected by levers with fixed fulcrums, he says: "Another mode of using the handles (or levers) is to dispense with the fulcrum pins, so that in the operation of bending, while power is applied, as before, to the end of the handle, and the resistance is the unbent wood, the point of support is no longer fixed, but shifting, being found in the bending strap, or point of contact of the strap and wood with the mold." And this, he adds, "was the method originally used by me."

But without further reference to the claims and specifications of the two patents, in reference to the question whether the reissue is a departure from the original patent, in claiming the machine without the fixed fulcrums, I will refer briefly to the evidence, which is conclusive on this point. And it may be remarked here, that the identity of the invention claimed in the original patent and that claimed in the reissued patent, is a question to be decided by the evidence. If the case is at law, it is for the jury; if in chancery, for the court, as the facts proved may require. Now Mr. Clough, an expert witness for the complainant, in answer to an interrogatory put to him as to the claims of the original and the reissued patents, says: "The description of the apparatus described by Morris (referring to the original patent) is the same, and refers to the same drawings as are contained in the reissued letters patent." And in answer to another question, this witness says: "He (Morris) describes various modes of bending, including a mode in which the levers are not used on fixed fulcrums, but does not claim any mode except those in which fixed fulcrums to the levers are used." The same witness, in another part of his deposition, says: "In one mode described in Morris' specification, he dispenses with the fulcrum pin, so that the point of resistance is no longer fixed, but shifts in the bending strap or wood."

It is clear, then, as well by a comparison of the complainant's original and reissued patent, as by the testimony of the expert referred to, there is no such departure from, or expansion of, his invention as described in the original patent, as will invalidate the reissue on the ground of a constructive fraud. The complainant plainly describes the use of his bending machine without a fixed fulcrum, in his original specification, though he does not claim it as a part of his invention. In applying for a reissue, he distinctly claims this method of wood bending as a part of the combinations included in his patent. This he had an unquestioned right to do. The authorities on this point are numerous and explicit. O'Reilly v. Morse, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 112; Battin v. Taggart, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 83.

It is hardly necessary to add that the law is well settled by numerous adjudications, that there is always a strong legal presumption that a reissued patent is for the same invention described in the specification of the original patent. This presumption arises from the fact that upon the surrender of the original patent, and an application for a reissued patent with an amended specification, it is the duty of the commissioner of patents to see that the reissue is for the same invention described in the original patent, or if any part is not described, or inadvertently omitted, that, in fact, it was a part of the invention of the patentee. And in the latter case it is competent for the commissioner to receive testimony, and, on satisfactory proof, to treat it as a part of the invention, which may be properly claimed in the reissued patent. Allen v. Blunt [Cases Nos. 216 and 217]; [O'Reilly v. Morse] 15 How. [56 U. S.] 112. And it also seems to be well settled that the action of the commissioner of patents, in granting a reissue, cannot be questioned or impeached, unless on the ground of actual fraud in obtaining it, a palpable incongruity between the original and reissued patent, or an excess of authority on the part of the commissioner. [Battin v. Taggart] 17 How. [58 U. S.] 84; Law's Dig. p. 617, §§ 2–8. The exception to the complainant's reissued patent, on the ground of fraud, cannot therefore be sustained.

II. The objection to the complainant's claim in this suit, on the ground of the want of novelty in his patented invention, will now be briefly noticed. Evidence has been adduced by the defendant to prove the existence of several wood-bending machines, anterior to the date of the patent to the complainant, and which, it is insisted, embody all the elements of the several combinations claimed in his reissue. Models of several of these machines have been exhibited for the inspection of the court, and are referred to in the testimony of the experts. Among others, a patent to Thomas Blanchard, dated December 18, 1849, and reissued to him, November 15, 1859, for a wood-bending machine, is relied on as anticipating the invention patented to the complainant, Morris. I do not propose to describe the several machines relied on by the defendants to impeach the novelty of the complainant's combination. Whether they are substantially identical with the latter, is a question of fact, to be decided according to the evidence. And on this point, the testimony of several learned and reliable experts has been taken, which is remarkably harmonious, and entirely satisfactory to the court.

It is not necessary to refer minutely to the description of the complainant's machine, as set forth in his specification. It will be sufficient to refer to the first and third claims of his reissued patent, in order to a correct understanding of the testimony of the experts. No infringement of the second claim being alleged by the complainant, it is not necessary to refer to it.

The complainant, after describing his improvements, disclaims any connection with machines for bending wood by a rotating form. He claims: 1. "A wood-bending form, to which timbers are made to conform, by bending them from the center or inner end of the desired curve, outward, when used in combination with abutments, or clamps, to prevent or regulate end expansion, and levers or handles, or their equivalents, to guide the bending, substantially as described." 3. "In combination with the stationary form, levers, and abutments, I claim the employment of hooks, or hooks and pins, or their equivalents, that shall embrace the ends of the wood, to restrain the wood in shape, and permit the removal of the abutments, after the completion of each operation."

The first of these claims is, for the combination of a stationary form to which the wood is made to conform by bending from the center outward, with abutments and clamps to prevent or regulate end expansion, and levers or their equivalents to guide the bending. The third claim is a combination of the parts described in the first claim, with the addition of hooks, or hooks and pins, or their equivalents.

The witness, Renwick, an expert, examined by the complainant in reference to the Blanchard patent, says: "That the improvements specified in the reissued letters patent to John C. Morris are not anticipated by anything that is described or specified in the said Blanchard patent; but, on the contrary, the improvements described and specified in the Blanchard patent are substantially different from those described and specified in the Morris patent." He then proceeds, very fully and intelligently, to define the points of difference between the two inventions.

The witness, Clough, another reliable expert, testifying as a witness for the complainant, concurs fully in the opinion of Renwick as to the substantial difference between the principle of the Blanchard and Morris machines. And his attention being specially called to the various other models and patents for machines, claimed by the defendants as embodying the different elements of the Morris combinations, he says: "In my opinion, the combination set forth in Morris' first and third claims are not found in any of the exhibits referred to in said question."

The witness, Knight, another expert, thoroughly versed in mechanics and mechanical philosophy, called by the defendants, on his cross-examination in reference to the various patents, models, and exhibits referred to, after describing the combinations claimed by the Morris patent, says he does not find in any of them the same combination. This witness also testifies that the rotating form for wood bending, described and claimed by Blanchard, is not a mechanical equivalent for the stationary form claimed by Morris.

Another witness, Cotton, also called by the defendants, says, the two machines, Blanchard's and Morris', are widely different in the principle of their operation.

The conclusion from this evidence is irresistible, that the combination patented to the complainant is not anticipated by the evidence of any wood-bending machine known prior to the date of this invention; and it follows that the defense of want of novelty in his invention is not sustained.

III. The only other inquiry is, whether the five machines, which it is admitted were used by these defendants, are substantially identical with that patented to the complainant.

The defendants, as already noticed, are licensees of the assignees of the Blanchard patent. Models, which it is admitted truly represent the five machines used by the defendants, and which, it is contended by the counsel of the complainant, infringe his patent, are exhibited to the court. They are referred to in the testimony of the experts as "Models I" and "Model X," and described in the Exhibit A. In form and appearance these machines are altogether unlike the machines constructed under the Blanchard patent, and very nearly resemble the Morris machine. The only material variation in these structures, insisted on by the defendant's counsel, is that in the machines used by them, there is no provision for working them with a fixed fulcrum for the levers, in the operation of bending, and that they have no such fixed fulcrum. It is claimed that, as this material element is omitted in the defendant's machines, they do not infringe the first or third claim of the Morris patent. It is insisted that the Morris claim is for a machine operated by fixed fulcrums, and does not embrace a machine working without a fixed fulcrum. In a previous part of this opinion, a construction has been given to the claim of the Morris patent, on the point now under consideration, and the conclusion stated, that his patent includes not only the use of a fixed fulcrum, but also the use of levers for bringing the wood to the required shape, by connecting them with a strap at each end, and drawing the ends of the levers together, thus bending the wood around the form or mold. If this construction of the Morris claim is correct, it follows necessarily that the defendants are not shielded from liability by omitting the fixed fulcrum in their machine.

The identity of the machine claimed in the Morris patent, and those used by defendants, is a question of fact, the solution of which depends on the evidence. I will refer, briefly, to this evidence, which is quite conclusive as to the substantial identity of the machines. And, I may add here, that this testimony most decisively sustains the views indicated by the court, as to the scope of the claim of the Morris patent. The very intelligent and scientific experts agree, in saying, the machines used by defendants, though operated without a fixed fulcrum, are substantially identical with the machine described and claimed by Morris.

The witness, E. S. Renwick, says the model marked "X," before referred to, "represents a machine which would embody the improvements recited in the first and third claims of the reissued letters patent of John C. Morris." He then proceeds, at great length and with great clearness, to state the reasons for this conclusion. He says, among other things, that "the lever handle, in the model (X) is operated without a fixed fulcrum, and in this respect varies from the levers represented in the drawing; but this variation does not, in my opinion, make the lever handle of the model substantially different from the lever handle which constitutes a member of the combination (Morris') above referred to, because the former operates substantially in the same manner as the latter, * * * and because the patent provides for the operation of a lever without a fixed fulcrum as an alternate mode of construction." There are other portions of the testimony of the witness on this point equally clear and explicit, which it is not necessary to recite.

William Clough, complainant's expert, says: "The machine marked 'A' (being that used by the defendants) conforms in its principles and mode of operation to one of the modes described in the letters patent (Morris'), and includes all the elements of the combination in the first claim of said patent." And again: "In one mode described in Morris' specification, it dispenses with the fulcrum pin, so that the point of resistance is no longer fixed, but shifts in the bending strap or wood."

George H. Knight, another expert, called by the defendants, testifies that the claim of the reissued patent to Morris "describes a machine containing no fixed fulcrums. The machine represented by the model I is a substantial embodiment of said alleged modification."

And the witness, W. C. Hibberd, an expert witness for the defendants, being asked to point out the substantial difference between a machine constructed under Morris' claim, without the fixed fulcrum, and the machine used by the defendants, says: "I do not see that it (the latter machine) does differ materially" from the Morris machine. And adds: "I should judge that the language (referring to Morris' specification) was intended to cover just such a bending apparatus as is shown in model I."

The evidence as to the substantial identity of the machine used by defendants and that covered by the complainant's patent, is altogether conclusive; and the fact of infringement is therefore clearly made out.

All the issues made in the case being found in favor of the complainant, a decree may be entered accordingly, for a perpetual injunction, providing, if necessary, for a reference to a master, to ascertain the amount of damages to be awarded.

MORRIS et al. v. SHELBOURNE.

[8 Blatchf. 266; 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 377.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 27, 1871.

INJUNCTION — PRELIMINARY — PATENT CASE — IN WHAT CASES AWARDED—SECURITY BY DEFENDANT.

On a motion for a preliminary injunction, to restrain the infringement of a patent for a dredging machine, the validity of the patent was denied, on the ground of a prior public use, it had never been adjudicated upon, and the general allegation of public acquiescence, in the bill, and which was the only proof thereof, was denied. The defendant was constructing for his own use a single machine: Held, that the injunction ought not to be granted, provided the defendant should give security sufficient to protect the plaintiff against all loss and damages by reason of the construction and use of the machine, and to pay any sum which might be awarded to the plaintiff in the suit.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and by Samuel S. Fisher, Esq., and here compiled and reprinted by permission.]

[This was a bill in equity by Augustus T. Morris and James Cummings against Sidney F. Shelbourne to enjoin the infringement of letters patent No. 54,649 and 85,602, granted to Augustus T. Morris May 8, 1866, and January 5, 1869, respectively.]

George Gifford, for plaintiffs.
Keller & Blake, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant from completing and using a certain dredging machine, now in process of construction by the defendant, at the Continental Yard, in this city, upon the ground that it is an infringement of two patents belonging to the plaintiffs, one dated May 8th, 1866, and the other January 5th, 1869.

The use of the parts and combination claimed as patented is not denied, but the patents relied on are claimed to be void. These patents have never been adjudicated upon, the general allegation of public acquiescence contained in the bill, and which is the only proof thereof, is denied, and a prior public use and want of novelty is averred. There is no evidence showing the extent of the use of the plaintiff's patent, or the number of machines sold by them. The character of the machine, and the uses to which it is put, seem to indicate that the use has not been very extensive, while the affidavits contain some evidence of a prior public use of the patented parts, in connection with a former patent, which has expired. In view of the nature of the machine in question, and of the fact that it is not being constructed for sale, but is a single machine, which the defendant has constructed for employment in his own dredging operations, and for the use of which the plaintiffs can be fully compensated in the event of a decree in their favor, and it appearing that an injunction would be likely to cause serious loss to the defendant, without corresponding benefit to the plaintiffs, I am of the opinion, that a preliminary injunction should not be granted, provided the defendant, under the direction of the court, within five days, and on notice to the plaintiffs, gives security sufficient to protect the plaintiffs against all loss and damages by reason of the construction and use of the machine in question, and to pay any sum which may be awarded to the plaintiffs herein.

same done, when ordered, he is himself answerable for the loss, as if he was the insurer, and he is entitled to the premium.

[Cited in Manny v. Dunlap, Case No. 9,047; Marquardt v. French, 53 Fed. 606.]

At law.

THE COURT charged the jury, in this case, that if one merchant is in the habit of effecting insurances for his correspondent, and is directed to make an insurance, and neglects to do so, he is himself answerable for the losses, as insurer, and is entitled to a premium, as such. That the amount of loss, for which an underwriter who had subscribed the policy, would have been answerable, is the only measure of damages against him. If he can excuse himself, for not having effected the insurance, he is answerable for nothing; if he cannot excuse himself, he is then answerable, for the whole.

Verdict for plaintiff.

An exception was taken to this charge, and a writ of error sued; but in February 1809, the judgment was affirmed in the supreme court. [Case unreported.]

The MORRISANIA.

ADMIRALTY—MARITIME TORTS—DAMAGE FROM SWELL.

A vessel being properly and securely fastened to a pier in the East river, a steamboat passed by so near, and at such a rate of speed, that the swell she created threw the vessel against another one, and damaged the former: Held, that the steamboat was liable for the damage, because it was negligence in her to pass by so near, at such speed, the channel at the place being over one thousand feet wide, and open to her navigation, without obstruction, to that width.

[Cited in The Massachusetts, Case No. 9,258; The Southfield, 19 Fed. 842; The Drew, 22 Fed. 855; The Rhode Island, 24 Fed. 295; The Monmouth, 44 Fed. 812; The Majestic, Id. 814.]

Scudder & Carter, for libellants.

D. & T. McMahon, for claimant.

HUNT, Circuit Justice. On the 1st and 2d days of October, 1874, the bark A. J. Pope was moored at the end of the wharf between 10th and 11th streets, Long Island City, Long Island. She was fastened to the bulkhead by a chain cable from her bow, and by a chain cable from her stern, and, also, by a heavy hawser forward and aft. South of the pier at which her bow headed lay another vessel, and, outside of the pier, lapping both the Pope and this other vessel, lay another vessel, called the Hero. On the day first named, the steamer Morrisania, a passenger ferry-boat plying between Harlem and New York City, on her way to Harlem, passed by this dock where the Pope was moored. On the 2d of October, while going in an opposite direction, she again passed by this dock. By her swell and suction on each of these occasions, the Hero and the Pope were thrown against each other, and the latter vessel sustained damage. The channel of the river at this place is over a thousand feet in width, and was open to the navigation of the Morrisania, without obstruction, to that width. The Morrisania passed within a short distance of the shore—some of the witnesses say fifteen feet, others thirty feet, others, again, put the distance at three or four hundred feet—and at a speed of twelve or fourteen miles an hour. It is difficult to fix the precise distance, but I hold it to have been much nearer to the wharf and the vessels than care and prudence and good navigation on the part of the Morrisania justified. The bark Pope was properly and sufficiently secured to the pier and bulkhead, and there was no negligence in this respect.

In the case of The Daniel Drew [Case No. 3,565], I discuss at length the general principles applicable to this case. A reference to the opinion in that case is sufficient, without here repeating the argument. With the general principles on which the argument of the claimant's counsel is based, I agree. But, here, their application is modified by the negligence of the Morrisania. After a careful examination of the evidence, I see no reason to find fault with the manner in which the Pope was fastened, or the material with which it was done. Neither do I see cause to doubt that the swell which did the injury was caused by the Morrisania. In the first answer, it was averred that the swell was caused by the Sylvan Glen, which preceded the Morrisania. This was clearly disproved. The second answer then attributed it to the steamer City of Boston. Of this averment there is no reasonable evidence. The speed of the steamer is not seriously disputed. As to how near she passed to the wharf, there is great contrariety of evidence, and it is a matter upon which honest men might reasonably differ. The libellants' witnesses put the distance at from ten feet to forty or fifty feet. Some witnesses say she came very near, without specifying how near. The witnesses for the claimant put her distance at several hundred feet. They say that no serious damage would have been done by her passing within one hundred feet. The damage, however, was done, and, in my opinion, the Morrisania passed within much less than a hundred feet, but certainly near enough to do the injury. Her undoubted right to the navigation of the river is subject to the restriction that it must be exercised in a reasonable and careful manner, and do no injury to others that care and prudence may avoid. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

District Court, E. D. Missouri. Dec. 17, 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—BANK STOCK SECURITY FOR NOTE—RIGHT OF BANK THERETO—HOW CLAIM PROVEN.

1. A bank is entitled to certain shares of its capital stock, subscribed by the bankrupt as collateral security for his stock note, and also on his general indebtedness to the bank, and it has a right to hold such stock, although there is an indorser to the note.

2. The bank should prove its demand for the debt due as secured by the stock, and, by leave of court, have it sold, the proceeds to be applied to payment of the debt, and prove as a creditor of the estate for any balance that may remain.

In bankruptcy.

Slayback & Haeussler, for assignee.

Hitchcock, Lubke & Player, for the bank.

TREAT, District Judge. The question submitted to the court is, substantially, whether the West St. Louis Savings Bank is entitled to hold ten shares of its capital stock subscribed by bankrupt as collateral security for the bankrupt's indebtedness; first, on his stock note, and second, on his general indebtedness. The by-laws of the company provide that "no transfer of stock shall be made or assented to by the officers of the bank so long as the holder of the same is indebted to this bank for any balance unpaid on the stock, or otherwise, unless such indebtedness is satisfactorily secured." The certificate of stock recites that "no transfer shall be made without the consent of the corporation by any stockholder who shall be liable to the bank, either as principal, debtor, or otherwise." Independent of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], the question involved is settled in this state (9 Mo. 150; 45 Mo. 513,) and in the United States supreme court. [Union Bank of Georgetown v. Laird] 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 390, and [Brent v. Bank of Washington] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 610. The two latter cases are broad enough to cover assignments in bankruptcy. Although the bank may have indorsers to the paper, it still has the security on the stock, and may enforce the latter. But if the loan is made at a time when the stockholder is insolvent and the bank has reasonable cause so to believe, and it thereupon takes the security of an indorser, together with the pledge of stock, by force of the by-law, it has two sources to which to look. Money loaned with security taken in praesenti does not make the security taken a preference contrary to section 35 of the bankrupt act. It is not a security taken for past indebtedness, but for money advanced at the time. If, together with an indorser, the paper is secured by a collateral put up by the maker, equity would treat the collateral as for the benefit of the indorser—as against the person primarily liable for the demand. The bank has two resources, and if it should make the money out of the indorser, he would have an equitable right to the application of the collateral for his benefit, or he might require, in equity, that the collateral should be first applied. The rule established, independent of the bankrupt act, is this: that the bank has a right to hold the stock as collateral, despite the fact that there is also an indorser. Under the bankrupt act, when money is loaned and the security taken at the same time, no preference is given, then that security should, both in law and equity, be applied to the payment of the demand. Hence, in the case before the court, the bank should prove its demand for the debt due, as secured by the stock, and by leave of court have the stock sold, the proceeds to be applied to payment of the debt. If a balance then remains in favor of the bank, it can have that balance allowed as a creditor against the general estate.

MORRISON v. ALEXANDER.

[1 Hayw. & H. 68.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 6, 1842.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—TENANT DISPOSSESSED—ACTION AGAINST LANDLORD—INTENT—DAMAGES.

Where the lessor executes a lease, having made false representations to the lessee of ownership and seisin with intent to deceive and defraud the lessee, and the lessee is evicted by a third person claiming under the lessor, the lessee may recover damages rrom the lessor, and the question of intent is one to be determined by the jury upon consideration of all the circumstances of the case.

[This was an action at law by Alexander Morrison against Charles Alexander.]

The first count of the declaration stated that the defendant, representing that he owned and was seized of a certain tract with the buildings thereon, did lease the said premises to the plaintiff for the term of ten years from March 16, 1838, with the privilege of purchase by the plaintiff during the term for $200; that plaintiff entered into possession under his lease; that defendant had not the lawful right to make said demise, because he had theretofore and on the 29th of January, 1838, executed and delivered to a certain Henry Miller, a contract in writing whereby the said defendant bound himself to convey the said premises to the said Miller, &c.;

that said Miller had taken possession of said premises under said contract, and on the 16th of April, 1838, evicted the plaintiff therefrom. The second count sets up that during the four weeks the plaintiff occupied the premises $500 was by him (said plaintiff) expended in cultivating the said land; that the said defendant had concealed the fact from the knowledge of the plaintiff, that he had prior to the plaintiff's entry on said land delivered possession of the same land to said Miller, who was by reason of said contract entitled to the possession of said land as against this plaintiff, and afterward evicted the plaintiff therefrom, by reason of which he was otherwise injured and damaged to the amount of $2,500, &c.

A deposition read in evidence on the part of the plaintiff was as follows: "I prepared a lease for the parties to this suit at their request. It contained the agreement of both parties. It was never signed, because Alexander kept putting Morrison off, and at last sold the premises. I sent the plaintiff's goods and family down to the place described at the request of the defendant; that the said Alexander told me he had given the plaintiff and his family quiet possession of the place."

Brent & Brent, for plaintiff.

R. S. Coxe and Henry M. Morfit, for defendant.

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and THRUSTON and MORSELL, Circuit Judges.

On the part of the defendant THE COURT was asked to instruct the jury: That before the plaintiff can recover in this action it is necessary to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the defendant represented to the plaintiff at the time of his negotiation with him that he had a good title and right to the premises stated in the declaration, and that when he made such representation he knew the same to be false, and made it with the intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiff, or that he had with such intent to defraud and deceive the plaintiff concealed from the plaintiff the fact that he had prior to the contract with him sold the said property to Miller,—which was given by THE COURT, with this addition: That the question of intent as aforesaid is a question for the consideration of the jury under all the circumstances given in evidence.

Verdict for the plaintiff and judgment on the verdict for $175.

MORRISON et al. v. AMERICAN POPULAR LIFE INS. CO.

[5 Ins. Law J. 752.]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1876.

INSURANCE—LIFE—CONDITIONS OF POLICY—PAID-UP POLICY—RIGHT TO DEMAND.

The policy provided that on its delivery to the company, properly receipted and cancelled, a paid-up policy would be given, provided the last premium due should not have remained unpaid more than thirty days. The plaintiffs sent the sub-agent, who was not employed by the company, from whom the policy had been received, and to whom the premiums were paid, a notice of their desire to secure a paid-up policy, and to deliver, cancel, etc., the policy, with a request to forward the same to the company immediately for its action. The notice was delivered to the agent within about twenty days after the premium was due, and was answered by the company at the expiration of the thirty days, stating that the plaintiffs would perceive from their policy what was necessary to do, and when; whereupon a formal discharge of the policy was executed and delivered to the general agent, at the same time expressing a willingness to do whatever was necessary, and requesting a paid-up policy. Held, in equity, that the plaintiffs had sufficiently complied to entitle them to a paid-up policy.

This is a bill in equity brought by the complainants, who are residents of Manchester, New Hampshire, against the defendant corporation, which is established by the laws of the state of New York. The bill was originally filed in the state court, but subsequently was removed to the United States court by the defendant. The complainants set forth in their bill of complaint, that the company, on or about the 28th day of July, 1867, by their policy of insurance, in consideration of the representation made to it in the application for said policy; and the sum of one hundred and twenty-four dollars and twenty-two cents paid to the company by said Charles R. Morrison, and of the payment of a like amount to be made on or before the 26th day of July on every year, from and including the 26th day of July, 1867, during the life of said Charles, not exceeding ten annual payments in all, promised the plaintiffs to pay the sum of two thousand dollars to the said Susan F. Morrison in case she should survive her said husband. And in case she should not survive him, to his executors, etc., within ninety days after his decease, upon due notice and proof of the same; and the company also, in and by said policy, further promise, as expressed in said policy, that after payment of any of the premiums above mentioned, the said company will give to the assured a paid-up policy for an amount equal to its true value, as shall be estimated at that time by the actuary of the company, upon the delivery to it of the policy properly receipted and cancelled, provided the last payment of premium shall not have remained unpaid for more than thirty days. The plaintiffs further say that five of said annual premiums out of the ten were paid as required and provided by the policy, the last payment being on the 26th day of July, 1873, for one year from the 26th day of July, 1873, to the 26th day of July, 1874, and amounting in all to the sum of $621.10, and that on or about the 15th day of August, 1874, the plaintiffs sent to the "local" agent of said company, from whom said policy was in the first instance received, and to whom the said annual premium had been paid, one George Morrison, of Bath, N. H., a written notice that they desired to receive a paid-up policy for the just proportional amount, and receipt, cancel and surrender the original policy as therein provided, with a request that said local agent would forward the same immediately to said company for its action thereon. They maintain that the local agent did forward the notice, and it was received by the company, at its office in New York, on or before the 19th day of August, 1874, and long before the expiration of thirty days from the 26th day of July, 1874, when the last unpaid premium became due. The company did not make any reply until by a letter dated Aug. 26, 1874, and received by the complainants on the 28th, in which the defendant stated that the complainants would perceive by their policy what it was necessary to do, and when, in order to receive a paid-up policy. On receipt of the letter, plaintiffs, on the 28th day of August, made and executed a formal discharge of this policy expressed to take effect when they should secure their paid-up policy, and delivered the same to the defendant's agent for the state of N. H., and requested a proportional paid-up policy, and at the same time informed him that they were ready to cancel and discharge the original policy in any proper manner in which the company might direct. The complainants also by a letter mailed at Manchester, 28th of August, to the company, informed the company of the leaving the policy and discharge with Gage, and of their readiness to cancel the original policy which they have ever since been ready to do, as well as all things to be by them done in order to receive such policy, but the defendant refused to make out and deliver the same. The prayer in the bill is that the defendant may be required to answer, and to be ordered, and decreed to execute and deliver a paid-up policy for the just sum, or to refund to the husband the sums by him paid, and interest thereon, and for other just relief. The answer of the defendant admits the execution of the policy, the five annual payments, the last of which was made on the 26th of July, 1873, and avers that another annual premium became due July 26, 1874, which the plaintiffs have not paid. They deny that George Morrison was an agent of the company, general or local, and claim that Gage et al. were the only agents who received from the company, and sent to the complainants, the policy; they deny that any notice to George Morrison was notice to the company, and deny that they intended to prevent complainant from surrendering the policy, etc., but gave him information of what he should do in order to obtain a paid-up policy. They assert that the failure of complainants' compliance with the requirements of the company, as contained in the policy, is not attributable to the fault of the company, but to the carelessness of the complainants in not consulting their policy, all the time in their possession, and it was the complainants' and not the company's fault that notice was given to George Morrison, when the complainants knew that the proper and legal agent of the company was Gage et al. upon whom notice could be properly served, etc. They contended that delivery of the policy, properly receipted and cancelled, to the company, and that within the thirty days specified, are conditions precedent which must be performed by the plaintiffs before the company can be required and bound to give them a paid-up policy, and that these conditions were not complied with, and deny the policy was ever delivered to the company properly receipted and canceled, but take exception to the wording of the cancellation. They maintain also that the receipt and discharge not being properly executed, in the event of the death of said Charles R., after a paid-up policy should be given him, his wife, or in event of her death, her heirs, would not be legally barred from claiming under the original policy, and that whatever was done upon the 28th of August, was too late in point of time to entitle the plaintiffs to any paid-up policy, whatever may have been its form, or whatever might have been its effect if seasonably made.

Charles R. Morrison, for complainants.
Sargent & Chase, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge, after hearing the evidence printed with the case, decreed that the plaintiffs within thirty days from the 26th of July, 1874, had done sufficient to entitle them to an equitable paid-up policy, for an amount equal to its true value upon the basis of the payment of five annual premiums according to the terms of said policy, and that said company, within ten days from the date of the decree, shall make and execute to the complainants an equitable paid-up policy upon said basis, for an amount equal to its true value, to be estimated by the actuary of the company as of August 26, 1874. The case was referred to a master to report whether such policy as shall be produced by the company conforms to the decree, and has been duly executed and delivered; and further, that said complainants recover costs of suit.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 15, 1875.[2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—ACT 1864—SILK VEILS—CRAPE VEILS—TERMS USED IN TRADE.

1. The 8th section of the act of June 30th, 1864, (13 Stat. 210,) provides for a duty of 60 per cent. ad valorem on "silk veils," and for a duty of 50 per cent. ad valorem "on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for." The term "silk veils," in the absence of any other language in the statute, includes all veils made of silk, and the presumption is that

[2] [Affirmed in 96 U. S. 108.]

"crape veils," being manufactured of silk, are embraced within the term "silk veils."

2. But, if it be shown, that, in trade and commerce, "crape veils" are not "silk veils," that is, are contradistinguished from "silk veils," and are commercially known as different articles from "silk veils," and that the term "crape veil" is a distinctive term, which distinguishes the article called by that name from a "silk veil," then the term "silk veil" fails to designate a "crape veil," and "crape veils" are dutiable under the clause of the statute relating to manufactures of silk.

Benjamin L. Ludington and George D. Lord, for plaintiffs.

Henry E. Tremain, Asst. Dist. Atty., for defendant.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is an action of assumpsit, to recover moneys paid under protest for duties which were exacted by the defendant, as collector of the port of New York, upon crape veils imported by the plaintiffs in the year 1871. The defendant pleaded specially, that the moneys alleged to have been paid were had and received by the defendant, as said collector, "in payment for duties due from plaintiffs to the United States on certain importations from a foreign country into the port of New York," and that said moneys "constitute a part of the lawful duty of sixty per cent. ad valorem then due and owing to the United States by plaintiffs, for the duty at said rate on silk veils then and there imported as aforesaid, which said silk veils were dutiable accordingly under section eight of the act of congress entitled, 'An act to increase duties on imports and for other purposes,' approved June 30th, 1864," and that the said amount of duty "was and is the true and lawful duty on the said silk veils." The replication of the plaintiffs averred, that they ought not to be barred, &c., because "they say, that the articles imported by the plaintiffs were not silk veils, and were not, at the time of the importation and entry thereof, liable to a duty of sixty per cent. ad valorem, but the same were a manufacture of silk, and were crape veils, and, at the time of the passage of said act, approved June 30th, 1864, and before and at the time of their importation, they were commercially known, among importers and dealers, and were bought and sold, as crape veils, and never otherwise, and were liable to a duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem, as a manufacture of silk." To this replication the defendant demurred generally.

The portion of the 8th section of the statute of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. 210), which is material, is as follows: "That, on and after the day and year aforesaid, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected and paid, on the goods, wares, and merchandise enumerated and provided for in this section, imported from foreign countries, the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say, * * * on silk vestings, pongees, shawls, scarfs, mantillas, pelerines, veils, laces, shirts, drawers, bonnets, hats, caps, turbans, chemisettes, hose, mitts, aprons, stockings, gloves, suspenders, watch chains, webbing, braids, fringes, galloons, tassels, cords and trimmings, sixty per centum ad valorem; on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for, fifty per centum ad valorem." The question of law which is presented by the pleadings is—are veils which are not silk veils, but are a manufacture of silk, and are known commercially as crape veils, and not otherwise, liable to a duty of sixty per cent.?

The eighth section of the act of June 30th, 1864, was intended to be a comprehensive section, and to include all articles made of silk, or of which silk is the component material of chief value, by whatever name the articles are known, or for whatever purpose they are used. Congress intended to embrace in one section all the manufactures of silk, and to provide that all the articles which are specifically enumerated in the first clause which has been quoted should pay sixty per cent., and that all articles which are not specifically enumerated in the section should pay fifty per cent. Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 374.

Bearing in mind that the main object of the section was to classify articles according to the material of which they are composed, it is first important to determine the construction which should be given to the term "silk veils," as used in this section of the statute. Two facts are to be noticed—first, that general terms only are used in this section; and next, that it is not claimed that the term "silk veils" is a commercial term, or that it is a commercial designation of any one kind of veils which are made of silk. It is a term which is used in the ordinary signification which belongs to the words of which the term is composed, and, in the absence of any other language in the statute, includes all veils made of silk. "When general terms are used, the terms are to be taken and applied in their ordinary and comprehensive meaning, unless it is shown, (as, I understand, it is not claimed to be shown in this instance,) that they have, in their commercial use, acquired a special and restricted meaning." Lottimer v. Smythe [Case No. 8,523]. It is to be presumed that these words include any veil which is made of silk, although such veil is styled by the importer by a particular name which designates the class or subdivision to which the particular veil belongs. Thus, if the different styles of silk veils are called by different names, such as "Honiton," or "Brussels," or "Point d'Alençon," and are exclusively called by such specific names, their different classes or styles are still silk veils, and are included within the general term, which is used not for purposes of specific description, but as a comprehensive term to include all veils made of a particular material. Importers cannot withdraw their goods from the operation of the general terms of a statute, which classifies goods according to the material of which they are made, by imposing upon those goods specific names, which designate a particular kind or subdivision of the general class which is mentioned in the statute. "When the goods which are subjects of duty are designated by the material of which they are made or composed, the statute is to be construed as presumptively including such goods, by whatever subordinate or specific name they may be known, and though all in the commercial world are in the habit of using the specific name when they speak of the particular article in question. For example, if we have a tariff act which imposes a particular duty upon cotton goods, if that designation alone is used in the legislation pertaining to the subject of duty upon the importations, it presumably includes all cotton goods, even though importers, merchants, dealers and customers, all the country through, when they speak of a particular kind of goods made of cotton, always give the special name of the article; as, for example, under this attempted illustration, muslin, cambric muslin, cotton drilling, cotton shirting, cotton sheeting." Jaffray v. Murphy [Id. 7,172]. The presumption is, then, that crape veils, being manufactured of silk, are included in the general words of the statute, and are embraced within the term "silk veils," and that presumption will not be rebutted or weakened by proving, merely, that the term "crape veils" is used to discriminate between the kind of veils which is called by that name, and the various other kinds of veils which are made of silk, although it could be shown that the entire body of importers designated this particular article by no other name than crape veils. The mere name which is exclusively applied to the different species of veils is immaterial.

But there is another principle which is well settled in the construction of tariff acts, and which is, that congress must be understood, in the tariff laws, to class articles according to the general usages and known denominations of trade, and, generally, to recognize, in the tariff acts, the known commercial distinctions which are made in the usages of trade, unless congress has indicated, by the language of the statute, an intention to exclude any other classification than the one which it has adopted, or any modification of the classification which it has adopted. Inasmuch as this eighth section is a comprehensive section, intended to include all silk articles, if the first clause was the only clause of the statute which was applicable to veils, such an intention would perhaps be manifested. The statute would then be construed to impose a duty of sixty per cent. upon all veils which are made of silk. But, the statute also provides, that all manufactures of silk, not otherwise provided for, shall pay a duty of fifty per cent. The plaintiffs contend that their goods, being a manufacture of silk, have been, by commercial usage, expressly declared not to be silk veils, and that, in commercial language, they are not made of silk, and having been so declared, and the statute having provided that all other manufactures of silk shall pay a prescribed duty, that this case is brought within the principle which I have just stated. In this position they are sustained by the decisions which have been given both recently and formerly upon this subject.

In order to avail themselves of this principle, the plaintiffs aver, in their replication, that the goods which they imported were not silk veils, but were a manufacture of silk, known as crape veils, and not otherwise. If, under this replication, it is proved, that, in trade and commerce, crape veils are not silk veils, that is, are contradistinguished from silk veils, and are commercially known as different articles from silk veils, and that the term "crape veil" is a distinctive term, which distinguishes the article called by that name from a silk veil, then the term "silk veil" fails to designate a crape veil, and crape veils are dutiable under the clause of the statute which relates to manufactures of silk. If crape veils have thus, in commercial usage, been separated and set apart from the general class to which they presumptively belong, the law infers that congress did not intend to include them among the general class, there being another clause in the statute in which they may be placed. There is, then, a question of fact for the triers to determine, which is, whether these articles are known in trade and commerce as silk veils or not; in other words, are crape veils known in trade as a different article from a silk veil, and, commercially, are they regarded as forming a separate and distinct class of goods from silk veils, and, in commercial language, to be other than silk veils? Inasmuch as this issue of fact is directly presented by the replication, which avers that the veils are not silk veils, and is an issue which, if found in favor of the plaintiffs, is a successful answer to the defendant's plea, the demurrer should be overruled.

The principles which are involved in this case have recently been fully considered by the late circuit judge, in Lottimer v. Smythe [Case No. 8,523], and Jaffray v. Murphy [Id. 7,172], which cases also arose under the silk section of the act of June 30th, 1864. The general rule of law in regard to the effect of commercial usage and designations upon the construction of the tariff laws, is also declared in 200 Chests of Tea, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 430; Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 137; Curtis v. Martin, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 106; Maillard v. Laurence, 16 How. [57 U.

S.] 251; and U. S. v. Breed [Case No. 14,638].

The demurrer is overruled, with leave to the defendant to plead anew.

MORRISON v. BENNET et al.

[1 McLean, 330.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Dec. Term, 1838.

COURTS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION—CITIZENSHIP.

In this case the writ issued against Henry Bennet and one Stewart. It was returned served on Bennet; non est as to Stewart. The declaration averred that the plaintiff was a citizen of New York, and the defendant Bennet, a citizen of Ohio, and that the writ which had issued against Stewart was returned non est, &c., no averment being made in the declaration of his citizenship. A plea to the jurisdiction was filed. [The plea was overruled.]

[Cited in Doremas v. Bennet, Case No. 4,001.]

[This was an action by Hamilton Morrison against Bennet and others.]

Mr. Page, for plaintiff.

Mr. Powers, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The limited nature of the jurisdiction of this court gives rise to a great number of questions on that point. It is a well settled principle, that the court can take no jurisdiction in a case where there are several plaintiffs or defendants, unless each individual as plaintiff or defendant has a right to bring his suit in the court, or is liable to its process. And it is also settled, that if the declaration do not contain averments, showing that the court has jurisdiction, it is defective, and advantage may be taken of the defect by demurrer, motion in arrest of judgment, or on a writ of error. Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 382; Emory v. Greenough, Id. 369; [Turner v. Eurille] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 7; Abercrombie v. Dupuis, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 343. In this case it is contended that there is no averment in the declaration showing that Stewart is a citizen of Ohio, which is necessary to give the court jurisdiction between him and the plaintiff. And the statute of the state is referred to, which authorizes the plaintiff to proceed to judgment against the defendant on whom the process has been served, and afterwards make the other persons named in the writ, who could not be found, parties to the judgment by a scire facias. And that in this proceeding, the burden of proof is thrown on the defendants, as they are called on to show why they should not be made a party to the judgment. It is clear that the court can take no jurisdiction as between the plaintiff and Stewart. He may be a citizen of the state of New York, or of some other state than the state of Ohio, and in such case, the court have no jurisdiction. One of the parties must be a citizen of the state where the suit is brought or the process must be served on him within the state. And the declaration should show the citizenship of the parties. This being the case, if the proceeding against Bennet, on whom the process has been served shall prejudice the rights of Stewart, the plea must be sustained. If the court have no jurisdiction as between the plaintiff and Stewart, no proceedings can be had against him, under the statute, to make him a party to the judgment. And if this cannot be done, will the judgment against Bennet, in any respect, affect the rights of Stewart? Will not the case be as open to him to contest the validity of the obligation on which the action is brought, after this judgment as before it? This will not be controverted. Under the statute, the proceeding against Bennet is authorized, but further than this the plaintiff cannot proceed. A question somewhat similar to this arose in the case of Cameron v. McRoberts, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 591, in which the court decided that "where M., a citizen of Kentucky, brought a suit in equity, in the circuit court of Kentucky, against C. stated to be a citizen of Virginia, and I. and E. without any designation of citizenship, all the defendants appeared and answered, and a decree was pronounced, in the circuit court of Kentucky, for the plaintiff. And the court held that if a joint interest vested in C. and the other defendants, the court had no jurisdiction in the case; but if a distinct interest vested in C., so that substantial justice, so far as he was concerned could be done, without affecting the other defendants, the jurisdiction of the court might be exercised as to him alone. In the case of Craig v. Cummins [Case No. 3,331], Mr. Justice Washington decided, in a case situated in all respects like the present one, the jurisdiction could be sustained. And it is believed that the statute of Pennsylvania, under which the proceeding was had, was similar to the Ohio statute.

Upon the whole, the court think the jurisdiction may be sustained, as against the defendant Bennet, and the plea is overruled. Judgment for the plaintiff.

JOHNSON, District Judge. This is a motion by the complainant to direct the marshal or a receiver to hire out the slaves mentioned in the bill and in the mortgage, on the ground that the mortgaged property is wholly insufficient to pay the debt due the complainant. Substantially the application is for the appointment of a receiver before the hearing; and in such cases the court always reluctantly interferes, and upon some pressing necessity, which does not appear to exist on the present occasion. It seems to be well settled by the English chancery practice, that in a case like this a receiver will not be appointed. Lord Chancellor Eldon, in Berney v. Sewell, 1 Jac. & W. 647, uses the following language: "The rule about receivers is very clear; if a man has a legal mortgage, he cannot have a receiver appointed; he has nothing to do but take possession." And Chancellor Kent says, "the mortgagee may at any time enter and take possession of the land mortgaged, by ejectment or writ of entry." 4 Kent, Comm. 164. And Coote, in his treatise on Mortgages, 518, correctly asserts that a mortgagee may at the same time resort to and proceed on all his remedies at law and in equity; he may, for example, at the same moment bring his ejectment, file his bill to foreclose the mortgage, and proceed on the bond and other collateral securities. Doug. 417; 2 Ves. Sr. 678; 2 Atk. 343, 344. The English cases clearly sustain that doctrine; and to the same effect is the case of Jackson v. Hull, 10 Johns. 482. Coote, above referred to (18 Law Lib. 256), also says, that "if the mortgagee having the legal estate neglect to take the precaution of an agreement with the mortgagor for the appointment of a receiver, he cannot obtain such appointment by order of the court, but must proceed to eject the mortgagor." Now without adopting this rule to its fullest extent, it is proper to observe generally, that receivers in mortgage cases will never be appointed unless it is clearly shown that the security is inadequate, or that the rents and profits have been expressly pledged for the debt (Shotwell v. Smith, 3 Edw. Ch. 588), or that there is imminent danger of the waste, removal, or destruction of the property. There must be some very strong special reason for it. 16 Ves. 59; 1 Pow. Mortg. 295, 296, and cases there cited. The exercise of this power must depend upon sound discretion, and be governed to a great extent by the circumstances of each particular case (Verplank v. Caines, 1 Johns. Ch. 58); but I find no difficulty in saying that such an appointment should not be made where there is, as in this instance, another adequate remedy already pointed out, and where imperative reasons do not exist for this summary interference before the hearing of a cause. There is not such a showing here as would justify this sort of interference, and the motion is, therefore, denied.

TRADE-MARK—MEN'S SHIRTS—DEVICE AND WORDS.

Under section 77, etc., of the act of July 8, 1870, (16 Stat. 210, etc.) the words, "The Star Shirt," and those words with the device of a six pointed star used in connection therewith, and the device and words, "The * Shirt," used as a trade-mark in connection with the manufacture and sale of men's and boys' shirts, and taken by dealers as designating the shirts made by a particular manufacturer, are a lawful trade-mark.

[This was a bill by Thomas A. Morrison and others against Julius A. Case and others for an infringement.]

Calvin G. Child, for plaintiffs.

Charles E. Perkins, for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using a certain trade-mark upon men's and boys' shirts. The parties are both of them shirt manufacturers, selling their goods in the general market. The plaintiffs and their immediate predecessors have been engaged in the manufacture and sale of this class of goods for many years, during which the business has grown to considerable magnitude. For twenty years they have used the trade-mark in question, by stamping or labeling the same upon the shirts manufactured and sold by them, and upon their packages and advertisements. In March, 1871, the plaintiffs caused this trade-mark to be registered in the patent office at Washington, under the act of congress approved July 8, 1870 (16 Stat. 210, etc., § 77, etc.)

The trade-mark in question, as appears by the certificate of the commissioner of patents, and the fac-similes filed in his office in conformity to the act of congress, consists of the words, "The Star Shirt"; also, the words, "The Star Shirt," with the device of a six-pointed star used in connection therewith; and, also, the device and words, "The * Shirt"—either one, or all, being used, as convenience requires. Though this device or mark is in part arbitrary and, to that extent, would have no natural or necessary significance in connection with the article manufactured, apart from its use in that connection, yet, by such use of the plaintiffs, in connection with their manufacture and sale of these articles, it has become well known to the trade, and has come to be taken by dealers, as a peculiar designation by which the plaintiffs' goods are distinguished in the market. It is, therefore, both in its character and use, when taken together, a lawful trade-mark. It has long been employed by the plaintiffs and well understood, by dealers and the public, as designating such articles of their manufacture. They have complied with the requirements of the act of congress, and are entitled to protection. Their exclusive right to the use of this trade-mark is co-extensive with the limits of the United States.

The defendants have clearly infringed this right by using the words and device of the plaintiffs, both in the exact form, and in such near resemblance as is calculated to deceive. They have done this by so marking the shirts made by them, and by the labels used on their packages and packing boxes. A perpetual injunction must, therefore, issue, restraining them from any use of this trade-mark, either in the identical form in which it is registered in the patent office, or in any form in which it may be calculated to deceive, by confounding the goods manufactured and sold by the plaintiffs with shirts made and sold by the defendants.

SET-OFF—ACTION ON NOTE—DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF WARRANTIES—FRAUD.

Unliquidated damages for breach of warranty of the soundness of a horse, cannot be set off against a note given for the purchase of the horse. But fraud may be given in evidence; for it avoids the contract altogether.

Debt on a promissory note. Plea, owe nothing. The defendant offered evidence that the horse, for which the note was given, was not sound.

THE COURT said the defendant could not set off unliquidated damages for breach of the warranty, against the note, but the defendant might give evidence of fraud in obtaining the note. Fraud goes to the whole note; simple breach of warranty goes only to part of the consideration.

District Court, N. D. California. April 3, 1861.

CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS—CONDITIONS ON TICKET—MISCONDUCT OF OFFICERS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

[1. The printed conditions of a ticket inconsistent with a valid oral contract of carriage are not conclusive against the passenger.]

[2. Punitive damages are recoverable from a carrier for forcing a husband and wife, who have contracted for the exclusive use of a stateroom, to receive another male passenger therein.]

[3. The disappointment and irritation of a husband, and the discomfort and suffering of his invalid wife, resulting from assigning them to separate staterooms, in violation of the contract of carriage, are elements of damage.]

[This was a libel by Robert F. Morrison and wife against the steamship John L. Stephens for breach of a passenger contract.]

Jas. T. Boyd, for libellant.
Hall McAllister, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It is alleged by the libellant R. F. Morrison that, being desirous to procure a passage from New York to San Francisco, he applied at the office of the company in the former city. That he was anxious to obtain for himself and wife the use of a stateroom exclusively for themselves, and inquired of the agent whether he could not secure it by paying the full amount of passage money for two persons, but he was informed that it would be necessary to pay the full fare for three persons. After some negotiation it was finally agreed that the libellant should have the use of the entire stateroom on payment of five hundred and twenty-five dollars, the price of a single passage being two hundred and twenty-five. On arriving at Panama, the libellant was informed that the third berth in the stateroom, assigned to himself and wife, was to be occupied by a male passenger. Against this arrangement he remonstrated with natural indignation, and presented his ticket to Messrs. Knight & Wood, the agents of the company, strenuously insisting that he had paid for an entire stateroom, that his ticket called for it, and that he was entitled to it. He also represented the extreme debilitated condition of his wife, which rendered his personal attendance upon her indispensable to her comfort, and perhaps to her safety. The agents positively declined to accede to his demand.

The next morning he went on shore to see Mr. McLean, the principal agent of the company. Mr. McLean admitted the genuineness of the ticket, and, it would seem, made no question as to the right of the libellant, under it, to the exclusive use of a stateroom, but stated that the way bill, by which alone he was required to be governed, was different, and that the latter showed that Mr. and Mrs. Morrison were entitled each to a berth in the same stateroom, and that a male passenger was entitled to the third berth. After some negotiation, the agents of the company—sensible, no doubt, of the impropriety as well as the gross breach of contract involved in putting a male passenger and a stranger in the same stateroom with a husband and wife—effected an arrangement by which Mrs. Morrison was assigned a berth in a room with two other females, and the libellant a berth in a room with two other male passengers. For this breach of contract the libellants bring suit.

The answer of the claimants alleged that the libellant in fact purchased three tickets, one for each berth in the stateroom, and himself sold the third ticket, which entitled the bearer to the third berth. But in support of this allegation no proofs whatsoever are adduced; on the contrary, the evidence of the terms of the contract made by libellant with the agent are conclusively proved by the testimony of a friend who accompanied him to the office, and who, in fact, conducted the negotiation. It is positively testified by this witness that Mr. Morrison insisted on having a stateroom to himself; that he stated he would have one if it cost him all he possessed, and that the condition of his wife's health rendered it absolutely indispensable; that the agent, himself, offered to let him have the room on the payment of one hundred and twenty-five dollars over and above the price of two passages, to which Mr. Morrison assented, and he (the agent) thereupon sold to a bystander, for one hundred dollars, a ticket for a passage, but without any berth. I have no doubt whatever that such was the true nature of the transaction. The ticket received by Mr. Morrison was presented to the agents at Panama, as the evidence of the justice of his claims and the nature of the contract. No doubt seems to have been expressed or entertained as to its genuineness, or as to its expressing, on its face, that Mr. M. was entitled to "all" the stateroom. It is exhibited in court, and though not formally proved by evidence of the hand-writing of the agent who signed it, it is stated by a witness to be the same as that presented by the libellant to the agents. The witness, however, is unable, positively, to swear to it, as there is no mark upon it, but he expresses his firm belief that it is the same. A copy of it is appended to the libel, which is sworn to by Mr. Morrison. This, though not strictly evidence of the cause, is not to be wholly disregarded, especially where, as in the present case, the character and high standing of the libellant are known to the court, and recognized by the community. But, independently of the ticket, the nature of the contract, the amount paid by the libellant, and the consideration agreed to be given for the extra sum paid by him, are proved beyond doubt. And if to this we add the extreme improbability that a person with the feelings and sentiments which the condition in life of the libellant justify us in attributing to him would have consented that a stranger, and a male, should share the stateroom of himself and his invalid wife, we may conclude with absolute certainty that the breach of contract has occurred precisely as alleged. If the arrangement proposed, and for some time insisted on by the agents, had been carried into effect, and the libellant and his wife had been compelled to submit to the intrusion of a male passenger into their stateroom during the entire voyage, it would not be easy to assign a limit to the damages which should be awarded for so gross and outrageous a breach of contract. Happily, however, an arrangement was made, which, at least, involved no violation of the common decencies of life. The stateroom assigned to Mrs. M., with two other females, was situated on the gangway or passage leading into the cabin. In some respects it seems to have been a desirable room, as it was in the center of the vessel, and near a windsail, which descended into the passage. But in other respects it was of an inferior kind. It was of somewhat less than the usual size, an angle or corner being cut off where the passage opened on the guards. The passageway, owing to the very crowded state of the vessel, was constantly thronged with passengers, especially about meal times; and a tier of standee berths was erected at night along the guards, just opposite to its door. These and some other inconveniences incidental to its position, such as a water tank constantly resorted to by second-class passengers, made the room probably far less comfortable than some others farther aft, though it may, notwithstanding, have been preferable to those which opened inside on the saloon. On the whole, the evidence, I think, shows that the room assigned to Mrs. M. was perhaps such as, if it had been given exclusively to her and her husband's use, would have satisfied the terms of the contract, although it was by no means one of the best in the ship; but, on the other hand, it is equally clear that the inconvenience and discomfort which arose from the failure to comply with the contract, which the libellant had taken so much pains to make, were not mitigated or compensated for by the size, the situation, or any other extraordinary advantages of the stateroom his wife was compelled to occupy. It is also shown, by the testimony of the physician who attended her, that, at the time of her departure, Mrs. M. was suffering from painful chronic maladies. In fact, the voyage appears to have been recommended in the hope of benefiting her health, and with the same object her husband was induced to make extraordinary provision for her comfort by securing a stateroom for their use, where she might at all times command his services and society. It is testified by the passengers that during the voyage she seemed to be feeble and suffering, and that she very rarely left the stateroom, which, as has been stated, she shared with two other females.

It is not easy to measure by a pecuniary standard the damages which should be awarded to the libellants for the breach of contract which has been stated; nor is it possible to arrive at any precise estimate of the annoyance, the discomfort, and even the suffering Mrs. M. must, no doubt, have experienced from being compelled to make the voyage in a stateroom occupied by two other passengers, perhaps strangers, and necessarily deprived, except occasionally, of the society and services of her husband. To the husband, the mere personal inconvenience of having a stateroom assigned to him, with two other passengers, was not, of course, so great. But the disappointment and irritation at the failure to obtain the accommodations which he had been at such pains to provide for his wife, and the indignation naturally excited by the declared intention of the agents to place a male passenger in the same stateroom, constitute a grievance which our natural feelings will apprise us is of the most substantial kind. Dependent upon, and, so to speak, at the mercy of, the agents and officers of the steamers, as every passenger necessarily is, it is the duty of the courts, in cases like the present, of a clear breach of contract caused either by the grossest carelessness, or by reckless cupidity, to award such damages as will be an ample indemnity for the injury sustained. It is only by the firm and constant enforcement by the courts of the rights of passengers that the repetition of abuses like the present, wherein the cupidity of subordinate agents is stimulated by an unusual number of applications for tickets, can be prevented, and the serious consequences be averted which would be likely to follow, sooner or later, attempts on the part of the officers of the ships to compel, by force, a husband and wife, who have contracted and paid for a stateroom, to receive into it a male fellow passenger. A decree for damages must be entered in the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars.

Case No. 9,848.

MORRISON v. The PETALUMA.

[1 Sawy. 126.] [1]

District Court, D. California. April 13, 1870.

COLLISION — FOG — VESSEL AT ANCHOR — APPORTIONMENT.

Collision between a steamboat and vessel at anchor, in a fog. Damages apportioned, it appearing that the vessel had neither a bell nor a fog-horn, and that the steamer failed to moderate her speed.

[This was a libel by Daniel Morrison against the steamboat Petaluma, to recover damages sustained in a collision.]

McAllisters & Bergin, for libellant.

Sol. A. Sharp and Milton Andros, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The schooner William Hamilton, while on a voyage from Antioch to Oakland, on the third day of February, came to an anchor abreast the stone quarry near the southerly end of Angel Island. The tide was ebb, the weather very foggy, and there was no wind. She was obliged to anchor, as she had reached a point where she was liable to drift with the ebb tide towards the Heads.

She had on board a master and one man. They both admit that there was neither a bell or a fog-horn on board, but they state that at short intervals they endeavored to warn approaching vessels of their presence by shouting and by striking the brakes of the windlass with an iron bar.

About 5½ o'clock the steamboat Petaluma, bound from Petaluma to this city, collided with the schooner, inflicting such injury as to lead the men on board the latter to jump instantly upon the steamer to save their lives. The schooner was thereupon abandoned. She has since been recovered and is now on the beach at Sausalito.

It is not disputed that a dense fog prevailed at the moment of the collision. The schooner was first seen by the master, the pilot, the lookout of the steamer, and by several of the passengers, at a distance of from two hundred to three hundred feet; and as soon as under the circumstances she could possibly have been discovered, everything appears to have been done by the steamer which skill and diligence could suggest to avoid the collision.

On the part of the steamer it is urged that the schooner was in fault in not having and using a bell, or at least a fog-horn. Art. 10 of the "regulations for preventing collisions on the water," provides (Act April 29, 1864, 13 Stat. 60) as one of "rules governing fog signals," that "whenever there is a fog, whether by night or by day, the fog signals described below shall be carried and used, and shall be sounded at least every five minutes. Sailing ships under way shall use a fog-horn.

Steamships and sailing ships, when not under way, shall use a bell."

These provisions are positive and peremptory. There would seem to be more necessity for their observance by coasters and small craft navigating internal waters, frequented by steamers and other vessels, than by ships navigating the high seas. The schooner Hamilton was an enrolled vessel, and subject to the laws regulating the commercial marine of the United States.

She was, therefore, clearly in fault in not sounding a bell as required by law. It is not disputed that at the moment the schooner was discovered, the steamer was going at her usual rate of speed—probably with the ebb tide—from twelve to fifteen miles an hour. The 16th article of the regulations provides that "every steamship shall, when in a fog, go at a moderate rate of speed."

In excuse for non-compliance with this regulation, it is urged on the part of the steamer, that it is necessary in foggy weather to run by compass, and that the position of a steamboat can be known only by timing her, and thus estimating the distance, and that to do this it is necessary for her to run at her usual rate of speed. This excuse is but an attempt to justify a deliberate violation of the act of congress. A similar excuse was rejected, even before the passage of the act of 1864, by the supreme court, in the case of McCready v. Goldsmith, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 91. In that case the court observes: "A passenger on board who witnessed the collision, was struck with the impropriety of the rate of speed, and asked why they ran so fast in a fog, and was answered that it was necessary in order to enable them to keep their reckoning in going from place to place. And we learn also from the testimony of the pilot and some others, that they make no difference in the rate of speed in consequence of a fog; that they go slow when making land or a light, or in narrow passages, and when sounding the lead—as if the only precautions they were bound to observe, in the navigation, was as it respected the safety of their own vessel. We will only repeat what we said in the case of Newton v. Stebbins, 10 How. [51 U. S.] 606, 'that it may be matter of convenience that steam vessels should proceed with great rapidity—but the law will not justify them in proceeding with such rapidity, if the property and lives of other persons are thereby endangered.'"

A similar opinion to that referred to by the supreme court seems to be entertained by some of the steamboat captains in these waters. Captain Bromley, of the "Julia," in reply to a question of the court, says: "When I say it is safest to keep up the usual rate of speed—I mean for the steamboat. If we are going along looking out for vessels, of course we go slow; most of them have horns, and we have our steam whistles."

The latter course is precisely the one which the act of congress requires steamers to adopt. It is also urged that it is safer to go at a high rate of speed, because the course of a vessel can in that case be more suddenly deflected than if her rate of speed be low.

This, again, is an attempt to justify a deliberate violation of law; nor, though several witnesses have so sworn, does the reason assigned for maintaining a high rate of speed, appear to be well founded. Captain Bromley's testimony alone furnishes a sufficient answer to it, and the conduct of the Petaluma, as disclosed by the testimony in this case, shows that her officers did not act upon the theory that in a fog vessels can be avoided by a steamer more easily at a high than at a low rate of speed. The officers of the Petaluma testify that, when warned of the approach of the up-boats by their steam-whistles, they slowed down, and continued at a low rate of speed, until the boats were seen and passed; when their usual rate of speed was resumed.

I am satisfied that not only the law, but sound policy requires that all vessels should be held to an exact compliance with the regulations established for their governance by act of congress, and that their officers should be advised that for any violations of those regulations they will be held responsible, except in the cases contemplated by the 20th article of the regulations, and except that it appear by unquestionable proofs that the violation of the law in no degree contributed to the disaster.

Both vessels being thus found to be in fault, the damages must be apportioned. They will be ascertained by reference to the commissioner.

MORRISON et al. v. The UNICORN.

[5 Hughes, 79; 3 Quart. Law J. 333.]

District Court, D. South Carolina. July Term, 1858.

WORDS AND PHRASES—LOSS—AVERAGE—SALVAGE.

The construction and legal effect of the terms, loss, average, and salvage in maritime contracts.

[This was a libel by R. Morrison & Co. against the cargo of the brig Unicorn.]

MAGRATH, District Judge. The argument in this case relates exclusively to the construction of certain words in a maritime contract, between the libellants and the master of the brig Unicorn, in the port of Havana. By the written obligation, the sum loaned was £1,622 17s., 8d., sterling, at a premium of twenty-five per centum; its payment secured by the block, the cargo and freight, of the brig. She sailed from Havana to a port of discharge in the kingdom of Great Britain, calling at Queenstown for orders; put into the port of Charleston from stress of weather; was surveyed, ordered to be repaired, and then sold. The validity of the bond is conceded. The holders have libelled the cargo, which has been sold under a decree; and the proceeds of that sale, except so much as has been paid at the instance and with the consent of the proctors, the costs and other charges, now remain in the registry subject to the order of the court. That part of the contract submitted for construction, is the following clause: "In case of loss of said brig Unicorn, such an average as by custom shall have become due on the salvage." The amount in the registry is not sufficient to pay the principal and maritime interest due to the libellants. And it is now contended that the libellants are not entitled to receive the whole amount, but only a proportion; to be determined by the ratio which the loan (whether with or without maritime interest is not stated) bore to the value of the ship, cargo and freight, at the time of her departure from Havana. The argument is made to rest principally upon the opinion expressed in 2 Arn. Ins. p. 1203, in which he refers with approbation to the argument of Valin and the article 331 of the Code de Commercio, liv. 2, tit. 9.

There cannot be much doubt of what was the rule of the general maritime law. In the 18th article of the Ordonnance de la Marine, it is laid down: "S'il y a contrats a la grosse et assurance sur au meme changement le donneur sera preferé aux assureurs sur les effets sauvés du naufrage pour son capital seulement." 2 Valin, Comm. 20. The lender in such a maritime contract would recover in preference to the insurer, the principal sum; but not the maritime interest. And this rule is supported by Emerigon, who assigns as the motive of the preference, that the lender contributes directly and physically to the existence of the effects put at risk; whereas the insurer is a simple guarantor who inspires courage, it may be, but does not procure or furnish the thing itself. The lender, he adds, acquires, in the commencement, a lien on the thing put at risk; and it can not be annulled by the alienation, which an abandonment subsequently works towards the insurer. Emerig. Ins. c. 17, § 12. He is supported in this opinion by Pothier; but the rule is questioned by Valin. It is not necessary to enter upon that discussion which engaged these distinguished men. It was not directed, as this must be, to determine what is the law; a much wider field was opened in the consideration of what it should be. Valin tells us in his correspondence with Emerigon, that the latter submitted the question to the admiralty, and it considered his argument consistent with common rights; but that the maritime law followed the response of the Roman emperor: "Ego quidem mundi dominus, sed lex maris." 2 Comm. 30. Boulay Paty (3 tom., p. 229) says the admiralty of Marseilles was influenced by the argument of Valin; and the Code de Commerce adopted his opinion in the article which provides in such cases a division of the property saved, between the lender and assurer, in proportion to their several interests. The interest of the lender being the principal sum without the maritime interest; and that of the assurer, the amount which he has agreed to insure. In a question of maritime law, the Code de Commerce is regarded as a collection of regulations, municipal in their operation: but the Ordonnance de la Marine is described by Chief Justice Marshall, as compiled with great care by the first civilians of the nation, and with a view not only to all the ancient codes which are extant, but also to the customs and laws of all the maritime states of Europe. Selden v. Hendrickson [Case No. 12,639].

In this case I cannot discover the authority upon which, in the United States, that construction can be supported which maintains a division of the property saved, where it is insufficient to repay the lender the sum advanced. The terms in which the rule is recommended by Mr. Arnold plainly show that he did not understand it as adopted in Great Britain; and I think it equally clear that it never has been adopted in the United States. In [The Virgin v. Vyfhins] 8 Pet: [33 U. S.] 553, Judge Story, when he pronounced for the validity of the bond, added, as the legal consequence, that it must be upheld to the extent of the property pledged for its payment. The 18th admiralty rule provides that, in all suits on bottomry bonds, they shall be in rem only; unless the master has, without authority, given the bond, or by fraud or misconduct avoided it, or subtracted the property, or unless the owner, by his misconduct or wrong, has lost or subtracted the property; in which case the suit may be in personam. And this rule is declaratory of the rule of the general maritime law, as enforced in the United States. The nature of, and the obligation arising from, these bottomry contracts are well understood. In The Ann C. Pratt [Case No. 409], Judge Curtis says: "This is a contract of a peculiar character, distinguishable by very marked characteristics from an ordinary loan," and cites the language of Pothier that "it differs from all other contracts and forms a particular species by itself;" and that, also, of Boulay Paty, that "it is a contract having a specific name and character to itself." In Pope v. Nickerson [Id. 11,274], and in The Draco [Id. 4,057], Judge Story has thoroughly examined these contracts, and in the latter case, defines it, as a "contract for the loan of money on the bottom of a ship, at an extraordinary interest, upon maritime risk to be borne by the lender." And this definition is in accordance with Simonds v. Atlantic Ins. Co., 1 Pet [26 U. S.] 436, 3 Kent, Comm. 362. This contract is received as of great antiquity, varying in terms according to the laws or customs of the places in which it is used, but having two great tests; the exclusion of the personal liability of the owner and the assumption by the lender of the risks of the voyage. The total exemption of the owner, except in the cases mentioned in the 18th admiralty rule, is illustrated in The Nostra Senora del Carmine, 29 Eng. Law & Eq. 572, where the cargo having been taken out on bail and the fund proving deficient because of certain claims which had been interposed, the court refused an application to cause the owners of the cargo to pay in a further sum, the amount of the bail being assumed as the value of the cargo.

If the rule of an exemption of personal liability be so positively enforced, it is not obvious why the protection of the lender should not be equally considered, so far as it can be accomplished, by the application of the property to the debt, which it has been pledged to secure. These contracts are not forbidden; and although, as we shall presently see, subjected by Valin to severe criticism, are, nevertheless, with the guards placed around them, considered as important agencies in the advancement of commerce. Their operations may be controlled by the parties in the introduction of stipulations which modify, or, perhaps, wholly change them. In this case, then, if the parties to this contract have introduced conditions which qualify or limit the rights they otherwise would have had, they must submit to that consequence; every contract, as a general rule, is a law for the parties to it. By this contract, the brig Unicorn, freight and cargo, are assigned over for the security of the loan taken, by the master, and shall be delivered to no other use or purpose whatever, until payment of the bond be first made with the premium which may be due thereon, the time of payment is specified, and then follows the condition, in case of loss of the said brig Unicorn, such an average as by custom shall become due on the salvage.

Before I proceed, however, to the consideration of that part of this clause, which has been argued, there is another which requires also consideration. What is to be understood by the words "in case of the loss of said brig?" The construction of the other parts of the sentence succeeds that, which is the proper understanding of these words. The case of The Elephanta, 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 553, is a leading case upon this point. In that case the bond provided that if the vessel and her cargo should be lost, miscarried, or cast away, the sum loaned and the interest should not be recovered. By stress of weather the ship was forced into Algoa Bay; was surveyed, and found to require considerable repairs. For these repairs advertisements were made; but the attempt was unsuccessful, and the vessel was abandoned for a total loss. Part of the cargo was sold, and the proceeds remitted to London, and part was re-shipped and reached England. Dr. Lushington, after commenting upon the little aid he had received from adjudicated cases, proceeds to examine the terms, lost and miscarry; cast away, of course, had no application to the case. The explanation of "loss" he derives chiefly from the case of Thomson v. Royal Exchange Assur. Co. 1 Maule & S. 30, in which Lord Ellenborough held, that while the ship existed in specie, she was not lost; and although the expense of repairing was ruinous, yet she was not lost within the meaning of the bond, if existing in specie and capable of receiving repair. Accordingly the bottomry holder was held to be entitled to the goods reshipped to England and the proceeds of those sold at Algoa Bay. In Joyce v. Williamson, referred to in Park, Ins. 463 (reported in 26 E. C. L. 164), the bottomry bond contained a clause, that if the vessel should be taken by the enemy, cast away, miscarry or be lost, before her safe arrival at New York, it should be void. The vessel was captured by a privateer, retaken, and carried into Halifax, where part of the cargo was sold for salvage and repairs, and she afterwards arrived at New York with the remainder of her cargo.

The vessel was worth the amount of the bond, but not that amount with the repairs added to it. Lord Mansfield held the taking, not a loss intended by the bond; and the lender not liable for average or salvage. In the Catherine, 1 Eng. Law & Eq. 679, the same rule is laid down; and the circumstances of the case are so similar to those in the case before me, that its decision would be sufficient authority to guide me to a conclusion. In Pope v. Nickerson [Case No. 11,274], the rule is laid down with great clearness. "The bottomry holders," says Judge Story, "undertake the risk of the voyage and that the schooner shall be able to perform it, notwithstanding the enumerated perils which in the present case were fire, enemies, pirates, and other dangers and casualties of the sea and rivers. But they do not undertake that the vessel shall be able to perform the voyage without any repairs, and without any retardation: but only that the dangers and casualties of the sea and rivers, and the other perils shall not of themselves defeat the voyage. They are to be paid their money unless the voyage is defeated by such dangers and casualties, or other perils, and these alone. The case is not like that of an insurer, where the underwriters are liable for a particular loss, or for a total loss, either in fact or in a technical sense. In cases of bottomry there can be no such thing as an abandonment by which a loss not strictly total can be turned into a technical total loss." In Simonds v. Hodgson, 3 Barn. & Adol. 51, 23 E. C. L. 32, it was held that the bond might provide for the arrival of the vessel to any port, if she was unable to reach the port of final destination.

In the argument here, the case was rested upon a ground which would be applicable to an insurer. But the claim made is that of an owner; and there is no proof of any insurance. If there had been, no proof is before me of abandonment and acceptance. The argument of Valin is exclusively applicable to an insurer, and does not seem to have been considered by him as applicable to the case of the borrower. Recurring, then, to the construction of the "loss" in this case, it will be seen that the loan was made in Havana, in consequence of the damage which the brig had suffered. She was repaired, sailed from Havana, again experienced stress of weather, and came into the port of Charleston, where she was surveyed, and certain repairs recommended. She was not repaired; the estimates are said to have been too high. A sale was recommended in consequence of this; and it was made. I will not say how far these circumstances, as against an insurer, may be sufficient to make this constructively a total loss; but they do not constitute certainly a loss within the meaning of the bond. Pope v. Nickerson [supra]; 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 553. And I cannot find a better introduction to the reasons which support this conclusion, than in the language of Dr. Lushington: "If (says he) I should hold that the bottomry holder cannot recover under the existing circumstances, I apprehend that it must follow that no suit can be successfully maintained upon a bottomry bond where the ship was disabled from prosecuting her voyage; or the owners had a right and chose to abandon her; though the whole cargo may have been transhipped and brought in safety to the port of destination." 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 555.

The lender, in this case, had for his security an assignment of the brig, cargo and freight. If there is to be an apportionment as contended for, by the terms of the bond, it is confined to the loss of the brig. That a loss of the vessel, is not a loss of the cargo, so far as the security to the lender is concerned, is seen in The Elephanta. Here the vessel has been sold, and the proceeds are in the hands of the borrower or his agents. It is true that it is said, these proceeds have been applied to the payment of expenses. But I do not know anything of these expenses, and must hold them, therefore, to be such as affect the borrower. The cargo is not lost, or damaged, although the voyage is broken up. And the voyage is broken up, not because the cargo may not be transhipped, nor because the vessel may not be repaired; but because it is not profitable to the owner to do the one or the other. Can this, in any just sense, be termed "a loss?" If so, is it a loss from any of the perils or casualties which the lender in the bond consented to undertake? When the lender undertakes the risk of the voyage or the perils of the sea, it is a misapprehension to suppose that he does so for the benefit of the borrower. He is an insurer, not for the borrower, but for himself, to the extent of his loan. In fact, the borrower, to the extent of the loan, has no insurable interest; so perfect is the transfer, to the extent of the loan, that the lender may insure, but not the borrower. The personal liability of the owner is excluded, and the pledge of the thing, vessel or cargo, or both, substituted. If it is lost, the debt is not paid. But its arrival is not, if we speak with precision, the condition upon which the debt is to be paid; although it is a risk which, if it occurs, will defeat the payment. In contracts not of a maritime character, the lender may also bind himself to look to a certain security, and forego his personal action against his debtor; and if the security fails or is insufficient, his debt is lost, because he has no remedy.

In the same manner in these contracts, a loss of the thing pledged is a loss of the debt, because it is a loss of that to which the creditor agreed to look for payment. But this "loss" is the destruction of the property pledged, or its damage to a degree inconsistent with reparation. It is a loss, in fact, not by construction; and that loss occurring from the perils or casualties referred to in the bond. The obligation of this contract is as sacred as that of any other, and the general rule applies to this, that neither party can modify the terms or affect the rights of the other party, unless by consent. By this rule, as we have seen, Emerigon is guided in the denial of the right of the insurer to participate with the lender, because the abandonment by the insured, if it gives the insurer a share with the lender, is a variation of the contract, and affects the rights of the lender by circumstances occurring after the contract is executed, and for which no provision is made in the contract itself.

But open as is the argument for a participation in these proceeds, to this objection now stated; and which is an objection applicable to all contracts; yet perhaps to none would it be more productive of injury than the particular contract now before me. It begins by affirming a power in the borrower to deny the lender the benefit of his security, because it was constructively lost; although it actually existed in specie. This constructive loss results from the wishes and actions of the borrower, or his agents, and from it would arise benefit to the borrower and damage to the lender. He who before a constructive loss, was postponed to the lender, after he had made that loss, would participate with him. He who before that loss was entitled to the whole. Such a rule would involve a temptation to error, which in too many cases would be most urgent. In this case I have not any evidence, which suggests a suspicion of mala fides in the sale of the vessel; nor have I any evidence that its sale was necessary.

The repairs for which the bottomry bond was executed, had only been made within a recent period. The vessel had encountered heavy weather, but she was not disabled, and had not become unseaworthy. It may be true that the estimates for the repairs, which had been recommended, were high, and that the owners, if present, would have done precisely what the master did do. But, if so, I would have to ask, with Judge Story, upon what grounds is the bottomry not to be paid? Shall it be held that in addition to all other perils assumed by the lender, that of the convenience or profit of the borrower shall also be assumed? "It was a duty (says Judge Story) which the owners owed the bottomry holders, if the schooner could have been repaired so as to perform the voyage, to have made the repairs." Pope v. Nickerson [supra]. I can only regard the sale of this vessel as an act terminating the voyage, dispensing with the time and place mentioned in it for its payment, and entitling the lender at once to proceed to recover the sum loaned. The Draco [Case No. 4,057]. But assuming it to be otherwise and that the vessel was in fact lost, the argument that the lender must divide with the borrower seems to me to be wholly untenable. If it is to be so in case of loss, by the terms of the bond it must be confined to the vessel. That sale was made by the master, and the proceeds are held by the agents of the owners. It has already been seen that even where the cargo was mentioned in the bond, and the ship was sold, the cargo was adjudged to the lender. The principle laid down by Emerigon, that "the borrower can claim nothing from the effects saved, until the lender be satisfied," and that "the creditor never comes into apportionment with his debtor on the thing which is the pledge for the payment of the debt," is of obvious force and universal application; and if any case has been decided in Great Britain or in the United States, which can be considered as sustaining the principle contended for in this case, I have not seen it. The right of an insurer to participate has been maintained with great zeal; but they who denied this right of the insurer, did so upon the ground that he represented only the rights of the borrower; and they who maintained his right, denied that he should be considered as representing the borrower, but insisted that he should be regarded to the extent of his insurance as having contributed to the enterprise. Indeed, the argument of Valin is addressed to a consideration of the superior claim of the insurer over the bottomry creditor as an efficient and indispensable instrument in developing the extension of commerce; and his argument in part is specially rested on the ground that the increase of maritime loans with the heavy rates of interest attached to them, would extinguish it. This argument, however, is wholly inapplicable to the case of the borrower; and I do not know that in the objection which he makes to a bottomry contract he is at all supported.

In adopting the conclusion, that in this case, there has been no loss within the meaning of the bond, I might omit all reference to the other part of the bond to which the argument was specially addressed. Perhaps, however, it is well that I should express my opinion of the proper construction. "Average," in this connection, means proportion; "salvage" here signifies the thing saved. The average of the salvage is the share or proportion of the property saved. Such an average as by custom shall be due on the salvage, is such a proportion as by the custom or law of a place, is due out of the property saved. And the intention is simply to declare, that in case of loss, the property saved shall be divided according to the law or custom of the country, if there shall be a law or custom prevailing upon the subject.

In this case if the vessel exists in specie, I would not hesitate, upon a proper application, to give the lender the benefit of it, as a part of his security. I entirely concur with Dr. Lushington, "that the general maritime law of the world is directly opposed to the sale of vessels in the manner in which this has been done, and to the consequences attempted to be engrafted upon it." Nor am I disposed to favor this summary proceeding to confer a title against owners, and extinguish all claims and liens which may exist against a vessel. When such consequences are to result, it is proper, if it is practicable, to obtain a decree of a court for the protection of the owner and creditor whose title and lien are sought to be extinguished.

Ex parte MORROW et al.

In re YOUNG.

[1 Lowell, 386; [1] 2 N. B. R. 665.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1869.

LANDLORD AND TENANT—COVENANT AS TO FIXTURES—RIGHT TO REMOVE—FURNITURE—BANKRUPTCY—ASSIGNEE'S RIGHTS.

1. A stipulation in a lease that the premises should be occupied as a boot and shoe shop, and that all fixtures of every description should be put in by the lessee, and might be removed by him at the end of the term, provided he should have kept all his covenants, and not otherwise, and should not be removed during the term without the consent of the lessor, does not purport to give the lessor a lien on the mere furniture, though it should be fitted to the shop, if not annexed to the freehold.

2. It seems, that if such a stipulation did include furniture, it would not be valid against an assignee in bankruptcy before entry and possession taken by the lessor.

3. Such a stipulation creates a valid lien on trade fixtures annexed to the freehold, and the assignee can take them only on payment of the arrears of rent.

The bankrupt [J. B. Young] held a lease of a shop and cellar in Roxbury, rent payable monthly, and owed several months' rent at the time this petition was filed. The assignees [J. H. Morrow and others] surrendered the premises to the lessor, without prejudice to their claim for certain gas fixtures, shelving, and sets of drawers, put in by the lessee, and to which the lessor asserted a title. These were sold by consent, and the dispute was submitted to the court on an agreed statement, by which it appeared that the lease provided that the premises should be "used as a boot and shoe store, and all fixtures of every description are to be put into said premises by said lessee, at his own expense," with the right to remove at the end of the term such as could be moved without injury to the premises, provided the lessee should have kept all his covenants, but otherwise not, and that none of them should be removed during the continuance of the term, without the consent of the lessor.

J. D. Ball, for assignees.

The terms of the lease are intended to secure the landlord, but they cannot have that effect, because they amount to neither a mortgage nor a pledge, and the chattels remained in the possession of the lessee.

J. C. Park, for petitioner.

The meaning of the covenant is that all the fixtures put in by the lessee shall be a security for the rent, and this is binding on the assignee in bankruptcy, and applies to every thing now in dispute.

LOWELL, District Judge. I do not find that this lease purports to give the petitioner a lien on the furniture, but on the fixtures only. No doubt the word "fixtures" may be often used in a broad sense to include all fittings, whether affixed to the realty or not, but I do not consider such a meaning attaches to it in this case. The parties are stipulating concerning the demised premises, and they agree that the lessee shall put in the trade fixtures, and may remove them at the end of the term, if he can do so without injury to the freehold, and if all his covenants have been kept, but not during the term. It is easy to see that the lease was not written by a lawyer, but this clause is very well calculated to express the contract that the tenant's right to remove the fixtures should depend on his compliance with the covenant to pay rent. Taken in its ordinary sense, and in connection with the proviso that in case of breach, the petitioner might enter and expel the lessee and remove his "effects," it must refer merely to fixtures strictly so called. If the parties intended to give the landlord a lien on those articles which were merely fitted to the room but not affixed, they ought to have made this intent clear, and to have regulated the matter more carefully. But it is very doubtful whether such a covenant would have created a lien that could have been enforced against the assignee. Distress for rent has no place in the law of Massachusetts, and an agreement that chattels on the premises shall be at the disposal of the lessor as security for rent is not valid against creditors of the lessee before entry. Butterfield v. Baker, 5 Pick. 522. The bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] preserves all liens, but it does not undertake to enforce a mere covenant of this kind which by the law of the place creates no valid lien.

So far as the fixtures are concerned, I see no objection to the lien. The act of affixing them to the freehold takes them out of the category of chattels, and is notice to creditors and to all the world, that the right of removal will depend on the contract between landlord and tenant. The right of the tenant to remove trade fixtures may well enough be called rather a privilege than a property, and it is one that he may lawfully waive or modify by the terms of the lease, without the form of either a pledge or a mortgage.

Applying these rules to the evidence, it is found that the sets of drawers, which were carefully fitted to the shop, but in no way fastened to it, are furniture, and belong to the assignee; the other things, which are trade fixtures, he can take only on payment of the arrears of rent. So ordered.

BANKRUPTCY—PETITIONING CREDITOR—NOTE DUE AFTER PETITION FILED—AMENDED PETITION—ANSWER TO PETITION—LEAVE TO FILE.

1. An amended petition in involuntary bankruptcy cannot set forth, as part of the indebtedness to the petitioning creditor, a promissory note, endorsed by the debtor, which did not fall due until after the original petition was filed.

2. The district court overruled a demurrer to an amended petition in involuntary bankruptcy, without prejudice to an application for leave to answer, on showing satisfactory cause therefor. Such application was promptly made, with the proposed answer duly verified, alleging defences which the debtor was entitled to try and prove, but the application was refused: Held, that, in analogy to the practice laid down in rule 34 in equity it ought to have beeen granted.

BLATCHFORD, Circuit Judge. This is a petition praying for the review and reversal of an order made by the district court, March 11th, 1879, overruling a demurrer to an amended creditors' petition in bankruptcy, and ordering an adjudication in bankruptcy, and a reference of the case to a register. The original creditors' petition was filed by a single creditor, the Farmers' Bank of Fayetteville, August 9th, 1878. On the 5th of March, 1879, the district court made an order dismissing said original petition, with costs, unless an amended petition should be filed, within ten days from that date, by the said petitioning creditor and other creditors constituting the number and amount of creditors required by the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] to procure an adjudication in bankruptcy. On the 11th of March, 1879, the said petitioning creditor filed an amended petition, not joining any other creditor. The petition was verified March 10th, 1879. It sets forth, as the indebtedness to the petitioning creditor, three promissory noted endorsed by Morse, and alleges that Morse was duly charged as endorser on each of them. One of the notes, for $500, fell due June 14th, 1878; one, for $300, fell due July 14th, 1878; and the third, for $500, fell due August 14th 1878, which was after the original petition in bankruptcy was filed. The amended petition sets forth the filing of the original petition and the filing of an answer thereto by Morse, and alleges that it was held that the petitioner did not constitute the requisite amount to authorize an adjudication of bankruptcy, and that such amended petition is prepared as an amended petition. To said amended petition Morse interposed a demurrer, upon the grounds (1) that it appears that said petition is founded in part upon promissory notes endorsed by Morse, maturing and protested after the filing of the original petition in bankruptcy; (2) that said petition does not show or state an indebtedness upon which a petition in bankruptcy could be maintained at the time of filing the original petition in bankruptcy, or when the bankruptcy act was repealed. On the hearing, the district court made the said order of March 11th, 1879.

I have not been furnished with a copy of any decision giving the views of the district court, and am compelled to the conclusion that the order in question was erroneous and must be reversed. The statute in regard to involuntary bankruptcy (Act June 22, 1874, § 12; 18 Stat. 180) provides, that any person "owing debts, as aforesaid," who shall do so and so, "shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof, at least, in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable." The section goes on to provide for the filing, by the debtor, of a list of his creditors, with "the sums due them respectively." The expression, "owing debts, as aforesaid," refers to the words, in section 5014 of the Revised Statutes (Act March 2, 1867, § 11; 14 Stat. 521), "owing debts provable in bankruptcy)," or "owing debts provable under this act." The meaning of the statute is, not merely that the debts shall be of a provable character, or shall be at some time provable, but that they shall be debts provable at the time the petition is filed, and made provable at that time by the statute. The whole subject of provable debts is regulated and covered by sections 5067–5071 of the Revised Statutes. It was originally provided as follows, by section 19 of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 525): "All debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future day, a rebate of interest being made when no interest is payable by the terms of the contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt." It was held by judicial decisions, that the words, "at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy," meant "at the time of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy;" and that time was the time of the filing of the petition. Act March 2, 1867, § 38 (14 Stat. 535); Rev. St. § 4991. Accordingly, in section 5067 of the Revised Statutes, the above provision of § 19 of the act of 1867 was re-enacted in these words: "All debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, and all debts then existing, but not payable until a future day, a rebate of interest being made when no interest is payable by the terms of the contract, may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt." The same section 19 of the act of 1867 went on to provide as follows: "If the bankrupt shall be bound as drawer, endorser, surety, bail or guarantor upon any bill, bond, note or any other specialty or contract, or for any debt of another person, and his liability shall not have become absolute until after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the creditor may prove the same after such liability shall have become fixed, and before the final dividend shall have been declared." This provision was re-enacted as follows, in section 5069 of the Revised Statutes: "When the bankrupt is bound as drawer, indorser, surety, bail or guarantor, upon any bill, bond, note or any other specialty or contract or for any debt of another person but his liability does not become absolute until after the adjudication of bankruptcy, the creditor may prove the same after such liability becomes fixed, and before the final dividend is declared." It is declared, by section 5072, that "no debts other than those specified in the five preceding sections shall be proved or allowed against the estate." The present case does not fall within section 5070 or section 5071. It does not fall within section 5068, for, although an endorsement of a note by a bankrupt is a contingent liability contracted by him, it is "herein otherwise provided for," that is, in section 5069. In section 19 of the act of 1867, what is now found in section 5069 of the Revised Statutes preceded what is now found in section 5068 of the Revised Statutes. The endorsement of a note falls distinctly within section 5069. It does not become a debt, within the meaning of section 5067, until the liability of the endorser by reason of it becomes absolute or fixed. Until then it is not a debt "due and payable from the bankrupt." If the liability of the endorser does not become absolute or fixed until after the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, the endorsement cannot be a debt "due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy," nor can it be a debt "then existing but not payable until a future day," within the meaning of section 5067. The words, "the adjudication of bankruptcy," in section 5069, must be held to mean "the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy," as was the case with the like words in the clause of section 19 of the act of 1867 which is now found in section 5067 of the Revised Statutes. The endorsement which matured in this case on the 14th of August, 1878, became a provable debt then, under section 5069, if the endorser was then properly charged, but it was not a provable debt when the proceedings in bankruptcy were commenced. They were commenced when the original petition was filed. The amended petition is the original petition amended. It has relation to the time of the filing of the original. A new bankruptcy proceeding was not commenced by the filing of the amended petition. The proceeding commenced by the filing of the original petition was continued and proceeded with by the amendments made to it by the amended petition.

It is entirely clear, therefore, that the demurrer to the amended petition ought to have been sustained, on the ground alleged in the demurrer, that such amended petition was founded in part upon a promissory note endorsed by the alleged bankrupt, maturing after the original petition in bankruptcy was filed. The averments in the amended petition are to the effect that the debts set forth, of which such note is one, are provable under the statute against Morse, and that it requires all the debts so set forth to make up one-third of the debts provable under the statute.

An order must be entered reversing said order of March 11th, 1879, with costs to Morse in this court; and directing the district court to enter an order allowing, with costs to Morse in that court, the demurrer to the amended petition, and vacating the adjudication in bankruptcy and the reference to the register, and all subsequent proceedings founded thereon; and also directing the district court to take such further proceedings in the matter as shall be proper.

There is, also, a petition for the review and reversal of an order made by the district court, April 1st, 1879, denying a motion by Morse for leave to withdraw said demurrer and to answer said amended petition. The order overruling the demurrer stated that it was made without prejudice to an application for leave to answer, upon showing satisfactory cause therefor. The application was promptly made. I think that it should have been granted, in analogy to the practice laid down in rule 34 in equity. The proposed answer, duly verified, was presented in connection with the application and is in the record. It alleges defences which Morse was entitled to try and prove. An order must be entered reversing the order of April 1st, 1879, with costs to Morse in this court.

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE — NEGLECT TO SECURE PROPERTY—SALE FOR TAXES—PETITION FOR REMOVAL — COSTS.

1. A petition for the removal of an assignee alleged, among other things, that he had neglected to take proper measures to secure the bankrupt's property; had, under the advice of his counsel, refused to pay taxes on the bankrupt's real estate, and allowed it to be sold to pay the same. Held, that the allegations of the petition were duly proven, and gross neglect of duty on the part of the assignee shown.

2. Order entered removing the assignee, and directing him to pay out of his own funds within twenty days the cost of presenting and prosecuting the petition for his removal.

In bankruptcy.

HALL, District Judge. This is an application by a creditor of the bankrupt for the removal of Philetus R. Perry, the assignee appointed in these proceedings in February, eighteen hundred and seventy, after the resignation of Walter B. Beattie, the former assignee. From the papers used upon the hearing of the application, and the papers on file with the register in charge, it appears that the petition against the bankrupt was filed May twenty-sixth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, that he was adjudicated a bankrupt June fourth, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, and that Walter B. Beattie was appointed his assignee on the ninth of the succeeding month. On the twenty-eighth of September, eighteen hundred and sixty-eight, a bill was filed in this court by said assignee, to set aside various judgments and executions against the bankrupt, and on the first day of September, eighteen hundred and seventy, the case was finally decided in favor of the assignee, after a hearing upon exceptions taken by the defendants to the report of the referee therein.

The opinion delivered by the court was soon thereafter published in the Commercial Advertiser of Buffalo, and again in Beattie v. Gardner [Case No. 1,195], in January, eighteen hundred and seventy-one; but it now appears that no decree was ever drawn up or entered in accordance with such opinion. In January, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, it was stipulated by the parties to that suit, that the personal property of the bankrupt, which had been levied upon by the sheriff of Niagara county, by virtue of such executions, might be sold by the sheriff and the proceeds kept by him in the Erie County Savings Bank, subject to the further order or judgment of this court, which stipulation was sanctioned by this court, and such property sold as therein provided. On the twenty-first of February, eighteen hundred and seventy, a petition was filed by Walter B. Beattie, the assignee, stating that he was about to remove to the state of Iowa, and also stating the amount of his receipts and disbursements, and asking this court to accept his resignation as assignee. An order was made referring such petition to the register, with directions to report the name of a proper person for assignee, if in his opinion the resignation of such assignee should be accepted, and upon his report the resignation was accepted, and said Perry was appointed assignee. An order was then made referring the accounts and doings of said Beattie as assignee for examination and settlement. The assignee thus appointed accepted the trust, and assumed to act as assignee; but he has utterly failed to discharge his duties as such. I find no evidence that he ever made any effort to obtain possession of the bankrupt's estate which passed into the hands of the prior assignee, or which was in the hands of the sheriff of Niagara county, under attachments and executions issued in the suits in which the judgments declared void by this court were rendered, or the large amount of money which was realized by the sheriff upon the sale made under the stipulation hereinbefore referred to.

The neglect to take the proper measures to have a decree entered according to the decision of this court in the case hereinbefore referred to, and obtain the moneys in the hands of the sheriff for distribution among the creditors of the bankrupt, is without excuse, and would alone justify his removal; but the petition for his removal alleged in substance, that the said Perry had never made any inventory of the property which had come to his hands as assignee; that he had not made any dividend to the creditors of the bankrupt, and that he had grossly neglected his duty as assignee. It also alleged that the petitioner had obtained an order from the register requiring him to appear before the register on the twenty-ninth of April, eighteen hundred and seventy-two, to give an account of his stewardship in the premises, and that said Perry appeared according to such order and rendered his account showing that he had never received any money or property from said Beattie, his predecessor, but that he received possession of the bankrupt's real estate, and had leased the same, and had collected rents to the amount of four hundred and seventeen dollars and twenty-five cents, and that he had permitted the attorney for the petitioning creditors to collect and hold a part of the rents to the amount of two hundred and thirteen dollars. The petition also alleged that said Perry also stated that there were a lot of books of the bankrupt, and that he knew not where such books were, as he had taken no means to find them, nor had he taken any measures to ascertain what property and effects did belong to said estate in bankruptcy, except to take charge of the said real estate; that said real estate had been sold for taxes several times, and on being asked why he had not paid the taxes, he said his counsel advised him not to pay any taxes, and he therefore neglected to pay them. The petition also alleged that there was in the hands of the late sheriff of Niagara county, about one thousand four hundred dollars in cash, belonging to the creditors of the bankrupt who had proved their debts, besides the money in the hands of said Beattie and Perry's said attorney, and that the bankrupt had a life estate as tenant, by the courtesy to real estate, which was over three hundred dollars per year. The affidavit of the assignee in answer to the allegations of the petition is very unsatisfactory, and does not deny or avoid some of the most material allegations. He points out no specific inaccuracies in the statements in respect to the account which he gave before the register, except that he states that he did not then state that he did not know where the books then referred to were, but stated they were in the office of Wm. F. Farnell, although he says all of his statements were not taken down, and "there are inaccuracies therein in regard to some matters therein stated." He also stated in his affidavit that he understood that all of the property of the bankrupt which had been discovered, except the books mentioned in the petition, was involved in litigation, which was undetermined, though he states nothing in regard to the existence of any litigation, other than that which was finally decided in favor of the assignee more than twenty months before his affidavit was made, and he gave the pendency of such litigation and the advice of his counsel as his reason for not paying the taxes on the real estate of the bankrupt. In respect to the rents retained by his counsel, he says it was deemed proper that they should be so received with a view of their being so applied by way of a just and reasonable compensation for his attorney and counsel in conducting legal proceedings for the benefit of the estate; but he does not appear to have learned that in the account rendered by his predecessor it appeared that he had paid to said counsel and his partner one hundred and fifty dollars for their services in the suit against the judgment creditors, hereinbefore referred to, or that he had also paid them, (without any order of the court therefor,) one hundred and thirty-two dollars and sixteen cents for services in the bankruptcy proceedings, and twelve dollars and forty cents for necessary fees and disbursements advanced by them, in addition to twenty dollars paid the petitioning creditors for fees advanced to the same attorney and counsel, and some sixty-six dollars for other expenses and disbursements of the petitioning creditors.

All, or nearly all, the papers in the case which bear upon the question of the alleged neglect of duty on the part of the assignee, tend to show such neglect, and also gross ignorance of what he should have known in respect to such estate. For example, his own affidavit states that the amount of the debts proved against the estate is over nineteen thousand dollars, while the list of debts subsequently furnished and admitted by his counsel to be correct, show that they amount to only ten thousand fifty-eight dollars and thirty-one cents. I cannot resist the conclusion that there has been gross and culpable neglect of duty on the part of the assignee in this case, and I fear that there is great need that examples should be made of assignees who neglect their duties. It is time that some of them should be made to feel that they are not appointed simply for their own profit, but that as trustee for the creditors they are bound to exercise due diligence in collecting and disposing of the property of the bankrupt, and in distributing its proceeds among his creditors.

It is to be hoped that this case is not a fair sample of the manner in which assignees in bankruptcy in this district neglect their duties; if it be, this court may be usefully employed in taking measures for their removal and the substitution of others who will faithfully discharge the duties of their trust. There will be an order removing the assignee, and directing him to pay out of his own funds to the creditor who has filed the petition for his removal, the taxed cost of such petition, or in presenting and prosecuting such petition, and of the proceedings taken under the same within twenty days after the same shall be taxed by the clerk on due notice, and a copy of this order and of such taxed bill shall be served upon him.

District Court, E. D. Missouri.

BANKRUPTCY—NOTE INDORSED—NOTE IMPROPERLY APPROPRIATED—DEBT TWICE DEMANDED.

1. The Sectional Dock Company held two acceptances which its financial agent, without consideration, converted to the use of the bankrupts, a partnership of which he was a member. To do this, he indorsed the acceptances, without consideration, to the bankrupts, who indorsed the same and had them discounted for their own use, at the St Louis Savings Institution. The savings institution proved the demand against the bankrupt estate as second indorser, and the dock company also proved a demand therefor. The assignee objects to this, that the bankrupt estate cannot be compelled to pay thereon twice as much as it pays on any other demand. Held, that the savings institution could prove against the bankrupt estate the entire demand as against its indorsement, and whatever it receives therein is so much credit to be given; if after suit it recovers the whole amount from the maker or acceptor, it will stand as trustee to this estate for so much as it has obtained therefrom.

2. The dock company is entitled to prove its demand so far as the acceptances are concerned for so much money had and received to its use by the bankrupt.

3. A second item in the demand of the dock company arose as follows: Its financial agent executed, as accommodation maker, a note payable to the bankrupts, which the latter indorsed to M., who then indorsed and had it discounted and paid the proceeds to the bankrupts. When the note fell due, M. paid it as last indorser, and proved the amount thus paid by him against the bankrupt's estate, and also obtained judgment for the same amount against the dock company. The latter has not yet paid any part of the judgment, but seeks to prove the whole amount against the bankrupt's estate. Held, that this demand cannot be twice proved, and therefore M. will hold whatever dividends he receives as so much paid on the note, for which he must give credit on the judgment against the dock company.

The Sectional Dock Company has filed its claim against the bankrupt estate of Morse & Co., which, as to items hereinafter stated, the assignee disputes.

Mr. Garesche, for Dock Co.

Geo. W. Taussig, for assignee.

TREAT, District Judge. The dock company held two acceptances, which its financial agent, without consideration, converted to the use of the bankrupts, a copartnership of which he was a member. To do so, he indorsed said acceptances, without consideration, to the bankrupts, and they having indorsed the same had them discounted by the North St. Louis Savings Association, and received the proceeds of said discount for their own use. The copartnership of Morse & Co. having been adjudged bankrupt, and said acceptances not having been paid, and the liability of the indorsers having been fixed by protest and notice, said savings association proved the demand against said bankrupt estate as second indorser, and the Sectional Dock Co., to whom the acceptances belonged originally, has also proved a demand therefor. The objection interposed is that said bankrupt estate cannot be compelled to pay thereon twice as much as it pays on any other demand.

If the established doctrine, in Re Ellerhorst [Case No. 4,381], is to prevail—and it has been affirmed by the circuit court here—then the case is easy of solution. The acceptances belonged exclusively to the Sectional Dock Co., and were converted or misappropriated for the benefit of Morse & Co., who received therefor the proceeds of discount. To that extent at least the value of the choses in action so converted would prima facie appear, and thus the measure of damages would be, subject to rebutting proof, sufficiently established. But when to that fact is added that the Sectional Dock Company is charged as indorser, Morse & Co. must be held liable as if for money had and received from the dock company, or as for their value, for the whole amount of said acceptances. The title to said acceptances is now in the savings association, and as the case is presented, it is a bona fide holder for value. It may recover of the drawer or acceptor ultimately; and if it proves its demand against Morse & Co. as the last indorsers, certainly the assignee of the latter should be credited to the extent of the percentage he pays out of the fund recovered from the drawer or acceptor, provided the whole sum is collected from those primarily liable.

The case as between the dock company and the bankrupt estate is peculiar. The latter is indebted for the value of the converted choses, and is also liable as indorser thereon. If the savings association proves its demand against the bankrupt estate, which it has a right to do, whatever dividend it received is applicable to its demand on the paper; and when the bankrupt estate, as indorser, pays any sum on the acceptances, it will not be entitled to prove that demand against the dock company as prior indorser, which owed Morse & Co. nothing. The true view of the matter is this. The savings association can prove against the bankrupt estate the entire demand as against its indorsement, and whatever it receives therein is so much credit to be given; but as it cannot split its demand, in suing the prior indorser and maker and acceptor, if it recovers the whole amount from maker or acceptor, it will stand as trustee to this estate for so much as it has obtained therefrom. The doctrine sometimes asserted, that original demand is merged in judgment, so that no other recovery can be in the acceptances themselves, has been exploded; and, if ever applicable to an ordinary case on acceptances of this kind, it could not have any force where proof is made in bankruptcy against an indorser to obtain some percentage thereon. Thus, an allowance of a demand against the bankrupt indorser might, if the latter's estate paid in full, entitle his assignee to sue the prior parties to the paper; and the obligation to the former holder becomes discharged. But as it cannot be known until the bankrupt's estate is settled, how much will be paid, is the holder to be held fully satisfied because his demand is proved, so that the bankrupt's assignee can sue antecedent parties on the acceptances?

Without pursuing that inquiry, however, it is apparent that the Sectional Dock Company is entitled to prove its demand, on the facts agree, so far as the acceptances are concerned, for so much money had and received to its use by the bankrupt waiving the tort. It may be that the bankrupts will have to pay as indorsers to the holder also. With that the dock company has nothing to do. Any indorser may be so placed when the acceptor or maker fails to pay. His remedy over is solely against the latter. If the indorser were not in bankruptcy, and had paid as last indorser, could the bankrupts sue the dock company as prior indorser under the facts stated? As between them, the dock company was under no legal obligation to pay anything; but the bankrupts were, on the other hand, liable for the conversion. The bankrupts received from the savings association the proceeds of paper which it is bound as indorser to pay. The paper then would be in the bankrupts' hands, to which they have no legal right. It must account for and pay the value to the dock company.

The second item in the dock company's demand is as follows: Its financial agent executed, as accommodation-maker, a note payable to the bankrupts, which the latter indorsed to Manion, and Manion then indorsed and had it discounted in bank, the proceeds of which he paid to bankrupts. When the note fell due, Manion, as the last indorser, paid the same, and had the amount thus paid by him proved up in his own name against the bankrupt estate, and also obtained judgment for the same amount against the dock company. The latter has not yet paid said judgment, or any part thereof, but seeks to prove the whole amount thereof against the bankrupts' estate. Whatever Manion obtains from the bankrupts' estate will be for the benefit of the dock company. Had not bankruptcy intervened, there would be no difficulty in working out, through the law, the respective interests of the parties. The payee, as indorser, owed the holder—that is, he was bound to pay the holder, and if he did so he had no recourse against the accommodation-maker; for he had paid only his own debt. If the maker paid, he had a right to recover from the payee. Now, the holder sues both, and obtains from the payee, who was indorser, a prescribed sum. True, he proves for the whole amount due on the note, and receives his pro rata on the whole. Thus the bankrupts' estate has paid on its obligation all for which it is liable. The demand cannot be twice proved, in whole or part, against the bankrupt estate. Under the decisions referred to, Manion will hold whatever dividends he receives as so much paid on the note for which he is bound to give credit on the judgment against the dock company. The amount received by the bankrupts on the discounted acceptances will be allowed. The item on the Manion note will be rejected.

BANKRUPTCY—PARTNERSHIP—ONE OR MORE PROCEEDINGS—JOINT ASSETS—SEPARATE ASSETS.

1. It is of no consequence, excepting in the matter of expense, whether there are two proceedings by or against partners, or only one, for everything is conducted in the same way, and the rights of creditors and all others are precisely the same.

2. If a partner after a formal dissolution continues to carry on business under the firm name, with the consent of his co-partner, his trade assets should be treated as joint assets.

3. Where partners file separate petitions, the firm creditors must be postponed to the separate creditors, in the distribution of the separate estate, whether there are joint assets or not.

[In the matter of Edward P. Morse, a bankrupt.]

Perry & Creech, for assignees.

Bumpus & Johnson, for creditor.

LOWELL, District Judge. The question whether Jewett & Pitcher can prove a debt of eight thousand three hundred and eighty-three dollars and eighteen cents against the estate of Morse, is submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, which is somewhat meager. If I misunderstand the facts, there will be an opportunity to correct me. As I read the statement, Morse was a member of the firm of Morse & Haskell, lumber-dealers in Charlestown, and carried on, besides, a separate trade at Methuen. Both partners were made bankrupt, but by separate petitions, and the cases have been carried on together substantially as one.

It is of no consequence, excepting in the matter of expense, whether there are two proceedings by or against two partners, or only one; everything is conducted in the same way, and the rights of creditors and all others are precisely the same. It is agreed that at some time before bankruptcy the firm of Morse & Haskell was dissolved, but when this was done is not stated. It does appear, however, that no notice of dissolution was given, and that Haskell continued to trade as Morse & Haskell, and, I infer, with Morse's consent. Haskell has no separate creditors to any amount, and all the firm debts have been proved in his case, and a dividend has been paid.

Jewett & Pitcher hold a note of Morse & Haskell, which they have thus proved against Haskell's estate, and have received a dividend. They stand, therefore, like all the other joint creditors, and the question is whether they can share in the separate estate of Morse. It is said, in the agreement of facts, that there is no joint estate, and no solvent partner. If this were so, it would not, in my opinion, change the decision at all, for reasons I have given some years since, at large. But the fact is not so, or rather the inference from the other facts negatives this. If there was a formal dissolution as between the partners, and no notice given, and the name of Morse was continued with his consent, I think there was in law no dissolution, and that the creditors of the firm have the right, which it seems they have enjoyed, of proving against the goods which Haskell, so carrying on the business, had in that business. His trade assets have been treated as joint assets, and I think properly.

Joint creditors, then, on any interpretation of the law as applied to the marshaling of the assets, cannot share the separate estate of Morse until his separate creditors have been paid in full.

Proof suspended until separate costs have been paid in full.

PATENTS — ACTION AT LAW — SPECIAL PLEA — AGENCY—HYPOTHETICAL PLEA—DEFENSE.

1. In an action at law for the infringement of letters patent, by selling to others to be used the patented improvement, a special plea set forth that the alleged selling, if any such was made by the defendant, was made by him solely as the agent of another person, and not for profit or on the account of the defendant, and that the defendant derived no profit or advantage whatever therefrom: Held, on special demurrer to the plea, that it was bad, because it was hypothetical and did not admit the cause of action set forth in the declaration, but sought to avoid, without admitting, the same; and that it was also bad, because it did not state the name of the person for whom the defendant claimed to have acted as agent.

2. Semble, that the facts set up in the plea would not constitute a defence.

This was an action on the case for the infringement of letters patent for an improvement in grass harvesters. The declaration alleged, that the defendant [George Davis] "unlawfully and wrongfully, and without the consent or allowance and against the will of the plaintiff [Albert W. Morse], did sell and vend to others to be used, the said improvement, in violation and infringement of the exclusive right so secured" to the plaintiff, &c. To this declaration the defendant pleaded the general issue and two special pleas. One of these special pleas set forth, "that the alleged selling and vending to others to be used, alleged in said declaration, if any such was made by the said defendant, was made by him solely as the agent of another person, and not for profit or on the account of the said defendant, and that the said defendant derived no profit or advantage whatever from the said alleged selling and vending," &c. To this plea the plaintiff demurred, and assigned as special causes of demurrer—1st. That said plea was hypothetical and did not admit the cause of action set forth in the declaration, but sought to avoid, without admitting, the same; 2d. That said plea did not state or show the name of the person for whom the defendant claimed to have acted as agent, in the selling and vending therein mentioned; 3d. That the facts stated in the plea did not constitute a defence to the cause of action set forth in the declaration. The defendant joined in demurrer.

HALL, District Judge. The plea is clearly bad, for the cause first assigned. Conger v. Johnston, 2 Denio, 96; Commercial Bank of Buffalo v. Sparrow, Id. 97, 105, 106; Arthur v. Brooks, 14 Barb. 533; Steph. Pl. 387, 388.

I am inclined to think that the plea is also bad for the cause secondly assigned. If the defendant is entitled to shield himself from prosecution on the ground that he was acting as the agent of another, the rules of pleading which require certainty, fulness, and precision in the statement of the facts in respect to which the issue is tendered, so as to enable the opposite party to make due preparation for the trial of the issue, would seem to require the statement of the name of the party in whose behalf the defendant acted. The plea gives the plaintiff no information which will enable him to take the proper measures to produce at the trial the proof necessary to rebut a prima facie case of agency which may be made by the defendant. The great objects to be obtained by special pleading—narrowing the controversy to a single and distinct issue, and apprising the opposite party of the precise character of the defence set up, in order that he may properly prepare for the trial of the issue—would be defeated, if this form of pleading should be allowed. The plea alleges the defendant's agency as the ground of the defence set up, and is, therefore, somewhat in the nature of the defence when the defendant justifies his act because he was acting under the rightful authority of another. It has some, though perhaps not a very close, analogy to the case of a defendant who makes cognizance and confesses the taking of goods or cattle, as the bailiff of another person, for rent in arrear. In making cognizance, in such a case, no skillful pleader would fail to state the name of the landlord under whose authority the seizure was made. Steph. Pl. 333; Gould, Pl. c. 4, §§ 23, 24, 28. In an action of trespass de bonis, when the defendant justifies the taking from the plaintiff's possession by the authority of the real owner of the property taken, would any special pleader suppose that a plea setting forth that the defendant took and carried away the property mentioned in the declaration, as the agent, and by the direction and authority, of the true and lawful owner thereof, and who had, at the time, the right to take possession, &c., would be good, even if it were not otherwise objectionable, without setting forth the name of the true and lawful owner? I think not; and though the cases are not parallel, it would seem that as much strictness as is required in those cases may properly be required in this; for, the plea in this case is much like a plea in abatement, and should, like such a plea, give the plaintiff a better writ, by distinctly stating the name of the party against whom the plaintiff's suit should have been brought. Aside from these considerations and authorities, it would seem that, on general principles of pleading and evidence, the name of the principal should be given. There can be no legal proof of agency which does not show that the agent has a principal; and, as the name of that principal must be known to the agent, he should be required to disclose it by his pleading, whenever he seeks immunity as having acted under the authority of such principal.

It is not strictly necessary to discuss the main question suggested by the cause of demurrer thirdly assigned, and I do not intend now to express any decided opinion upon that question. If the matters set up in the plea constitute a good defence, it must be taken upon the ground that a sale of patented articles or improvements by one person, as the mere agent of another, is not a selling or vending which renders the agent liable to an action for an infringement. The defence set up by this special plea can, therefore, if it be a legal defence, be given in evidence under the general issue. For this reason, I have examined the question, whether the facts alleged constitute a valid defence.

It is somewhat remarkable, that the researches of the counsel have not led to the discovery of any reported case, either in this country or in England, in which this question has been expressly adjudicated. It is, however, probable, that it has generally been deemed for the interest of patentees to proceed directly against the principal, in cases where sales of patented articles have been made by shopmen, clerks, and other agents; and this may be the reason that the question has not been authoritatively settled. The cases of Sawin v. Guild [Case No. 12,391], Sargent v. Larned [Id. 12,364], and Delano v. Scott [Id. 3,753], cited by the defendant's counsel, do not determine this question. In Sawin v. Guild [supra], the action was brought for the infringement of a patent right of the plaintiff's for machinery for cutting brad nails. The facts were stipulated by the parties, and they agreed that the defendant, as a deputy sheriff, by virtue of his office and of an execution against the plaintiffs, "seized and sold, on said execution, the materials of three of said patented machines, which were at the time complete and fit for operation, and belonged to the plaintiffs," and that the whole infringement of the patent consisted in such seizure and sale. Mr. Justice Story held, that a sale of a patented machine, within the prohibitions of the statute, must be a sale not of the materials of a machine, either separate or combined, but of a complete machine, with the right, express or implied, of using the same in the manner secured by the patent; that the officer had neither sold nor guaranteed a right to use the machine in the manner pointed out in the patent right; that he sold the materials as such, to be applied by the purchaser as he should by law have a right to apply them; and that there had been no infringement by the sale by the officer, under the circumstances of that case. The plea demurred to in this case, if good in form, would admit that the defendant, as agent, did sell and vend to others to be used the plaintiff's patented improvement; and, therefore, the case of Sawin v. Guild [supra], does not decide the present one. Nevertheless, the opinions there avowed by Mr. Justice Story will deserve consideration, whenever the principles upon which the question of infringement must be determined are brought under discussion. In Sargent v. Larned [supra], the bill was filed for an account. One of the defendants was merely a workman in the employment of another, and it was very properly held, that no decree for an account could be had against him, because he had had nothing to do with any profits. The case, therefore, does not decide this case, nor is it of much importance in reference to the principles upon which the question of infringement should be determined. The case of Delano v. Scott [supra], did not present the precise question now under consideration. The language of the able and eminent judge who decided that case is, nevertheless, strongly in favor of the position maintained by the defendant's counsel, and it is most probable that he would have decided, if the question had been distinctly presented, that one who sold as the mere agent or clerk of another would not, under the statute under which that action was brought, be liable to an action for the treble damages which that act gave in cases of infringement. There were certainly some reasons for the construction which Judge Hopkinson was disposed to put upon that statute, which do not apply to a case under our present statute, which gives, by the verdict of a jury, only actual damages, and authorizes the court, in its discretion, to treble them.

There are, certainly, other cases and authorities which seem very strongly to sustain the position taken by the plaintiff's counsel in respect to the defence set up by this plea. This action is an action of tort, against the defendant as a wrong doer, and, certainly, as a general rule, a party cannot claim that no action shall be sustained against him for a tort, on the ground that he committed the injury as the agent of another. There is also a class of cases, where the principle involved is to some extent the same, and in which the course of decision has been uniform, that a sale by the agent is a selling by him, within the meaning of a statute making such sale criminal; and, if such construction is warranted in a criminal case, it would seem to be required also in a case of this character. In cases of indictments for selling spirituous liquors without license, it has been held to be no defence, that the defendant was acting as the agent of another. State v. Matthis, 1 Hill [S. C.] 37; Britain v. State, 3 Humph. 203; Com. v. Gillespie, 7 Serg. & R. 479; Com. v. Major, 6 Dana, 293; State v. Bugbee, 22 Vt. 32; Com. v. Hadley, 11 Metc. [Mass.] 66; Roberts v. O'Connor, 33 Me. 496; French v. People, 3 Parker, Cr. R. 114; State v. Bryant, 14 Mo. 340; State v. Haines, 35 N. H. 207. I confess that I think the principle of these cases will apply to that now under consideration; but I shall not decide the case upon this ground, as I prefer to remain at liberty to adopt such a conclusion upon the question, when hereafter presented, as further reflection and a fuller examination of the authorities shall then appear to require.

MORSE v. GODFREY et al.

[3 Story, 364.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1844.

BANKRUPTCY—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCE — MORTGAGE—ASSIGNMENT—NOTICE—BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

1. Where A mortgaged to B the whole of his stock in trade, and nearly all of his real estate, to secure a debt due from A to B, and on the same day, made oath to a petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)], and subsequently B assigned to the Cohannet Bank and others all his right, title and interest in the said stock and in the said real estate; it was held, that the mortgages were "in contemplation of bankruptcy," within the meaning of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, and were therefore void.

2. It was immaterial whether B did or did not know that a fraudulent preference was intended in his favor, if it were actually given.

3. Inasmuch as the bank had notice at the time when the assignment was made that A had failed, and only took it as collateral security for old claims upon B, it was not a bona fide purchase for a valuable consideration, without notice.

4. As the assignment by B was merely of his right, title, and interest, without covenant of title, the invalidity of his title destroyed all right of the bank.

5. To constitute a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, the sale must be for a new consideration; and the transfer of property merely as a new security for old debts and liabilities, without extinguishment or surrender of such debts, or of the old securities therefor, is not sufficient.

Bill in equity. The bill in substance stated: "That on the nineteenth day of March last, the said William Reed resided and did business in said Taunton, as a merchant or trader, and was then possessed of and entitled to certain real and personal estates of great value, and was indebted to sundry persons in large sums of money, exceeding in amount the value of his estates, and was insolvent, and in failing circumstances, and unable to meet his debts and engagements, as he the said William Reed then fully apprehended and knew; that the said William Reed was then indebted to the said Charles Godfrey in divers sums of money, and the said Godfrey was or pretended to be liable to pay as indorser, surety, or otherwise for the accommodation of said William Reed certain other sums of money; and that the said William Reed, on the said nineteenth day of March, being in contemplation of bankruptcy, and with the intent and for the purpose of giving to the said Godfrey a preference or priority over his general creditors, executed, acknowledged, and delivered to the said Godfrey, without any consideration, a certain deed, purporting to convey to him all the right, title, and interest which the said Reed had in and to any lands, buildings, and real estate in the county of Bristol, in said district, upon condition that the same should be void if the said William Reed, his heirs, executors, or administrators, should pay to the said Godfrey the amount justly due to him from said Reed on account, and should save him harmless and indemnified against all liabilities on account of his being indorser, surety, or acceptor for the accommodation of the said Reed; which said deed was recorded in the registry of deeds for the county of Bristol, on the same day. And on the same day, and at the same time, and with like intent and purpose, the said Reed made and executed to the said Godfrey a certain other deed, or bill of sale, purporting to sell and transfer to the said Godfrey all the goods, wares, and merchandise then being in the store occupied by him, on the southerly side of the Main street in said Taunton, upon a like condition, which said deed or bill of sale was on the same day recorded in the clerk's office of the said town of Taunton. That on the same nineteenth day of March, the said William Reed filed his petition in bankruptcy, and was afterwards declared to be bankrupt, and the plaintiff [Lovett Morse] was appointed assignee of his estates. That on the twenty-first day of March last, the said Godfrey made and executed a certain deed, or bill of sale purporting to transfer unto the said president, directors, and company of the Cohannet Bank, all his right, title, and interest in and to the said goods, wares, and merchandise so pretended to have been transferred to him by the said William Reed, conditioned to be void upon payment by the said Godfrey or Reed to the said president, directors, and company, of the principal and interest due and to accrue upon certain promissory notes described therein, made and signed by the said Reed, and indorsed by said Godfrey, which was, on the twenty-second day of March last, recorded in the clerk's office of said town of Taunton. That on the twenty-sixth day of May last, the said Godfrey made and executed a certain other deed, purporting to sell, assign, and transfer, unto the president, directors, and company, the said Institution for Savings, Samuel Blake, Samuel Caswell, Benjamin Caswell, Charles Johnson, Abigail Leonard, and Walter Leonard, all his right, title, and interest in and to the said goods, wares, and merchandise mentioned in said deed of mortgage, and the proceeds thereof, and all claims and demands, or causes of action which he had at law, or in equity, against the said William Reed, and one John Reed, or either of them, and all claims and demands which might accrue to him by reason of any liabilities he was under for them, or either of them, and appointed the said grantees his attornies to collect the same; and on the same twenty-sixth day of May the said Godfrey executed and delivered to the same corporaations and persons, a certain other deed, purporting to grant and convey unto them, all the right, title, interest, and estate, which he acquired in and to all and singular, the lands, tenements, and real estate of the same William Reed, by virtue of the deed of mortgage bearing date the said nineteenth day of March, hereinbefore referred to, which deed was acknowledged by said Godfrey on the thirtieth day of May last, and on the same day recorded in the registry of deeds for said county of Bristol. That the said defendants, or some of them, have taken possession of all the goods, wares, and merchandise, being in the store of the said William Reed at the time of the making of the said deeds of mortgage by him, the same being of great value, and have, as your orator is informed, sold and disposed of the same to divers persons to him unknown, and at prices greatly below its cost and actual value, and have received the proceeds thereof, without any right or authority on their part to make any sale or disposal thereof; and that on the seventh day of June last, the said corporations, and the said Blake, Caswell, Caswell, Johnson, Leonard, and Leonard, took possession of all the lands and tenements, and real estate of the said William Reed, situate in said county of Bristol, and have since been in receipt of the rents and profits thereof, and have received large sums of money as such, the said defendants claiming title to the said real and personal estates under and by virtue of the said deeds of mortgage made by said Reed, and of the assignments thereof made by the said Godfrey as aforesaid. That when the said William Reed made and delivered the said deeds of mortgage, on the nineteenth day of March last, he was insolvent, and unable to meet his debts and engagements, and that he was fully aware thereof; and that the said Godfrey knew thereof, or had reasonable cause to believe the same; and that the said William Reed contemplated bankruptcy; and that said deeds of mortgage were made and delivered in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving the said Godfrey a preference or priority over the general creditors of the said William Reed, and that the said deeds are, and each of them is void, and frauds upon the said act of congress. That he has been informed, and believes it to be true, that no consideration was paid to the said Godfrey upon the execution and delivery of the said several deeds of assignment hereinbefore mentioned, by the grantees therein named, or any of them, and that the same were, and each of them was made without consideration; and that the said grantees knew that the said William Reed had, before the execution and delivery thereof, filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt, and knew, or might have known, the time when, and the circumstances under which the said deeds of mortgage were made and executed, and that the same were made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the sake of giving a preference or priority, and were void and frauds upon said act of congress. That if the said deeds of mortgage were valid and effectual to convey and transfer to the said Godfrey the real and personal estates therein mentioned, that the plaintiff is entitled to redeem the same, and perform the conditions therein contained, and is entitled to receive of the said Godfrey, or his assigns, a true account of all the sums of money due or owing to him from said William Reed, intended to be secured by said deeds of mortgage, and of all the liabilities under which the said Godfrey labored in behalf of said Reed, and against which he was to be indemnified thereby, remaining unpaid or unextinguished, and of all sums of money paid by said Godfrey on account thereof—and of all sums of money received by him or his assigns, being rents and profits of the said real estates, and to have the said personal estates transferred or delivered to him, or their actual value in money paid to him, and to have the said mortgage upon the real estates cancelled and delivered up upon performance by him of the conditions in said deeds of mortgage expressed. And the plaintiff hoped, that when, by virtue of his appointment as aforesaid, all the property, and rights of property, of the said bankrupt were vested in him, the said defendants would relinquish all claim to the said real estates, and cancel the mortgage thereon, and account for the rents and profits thereof, and deliver over the said personal estates, or their equivalent in money. But that the said defendants, though requested, refuse so to do, and claim an adverse interest in the said real and personal estates of the said bankrupt, which are by law now vested in your orator. Whereupon the plaintiff respectfully prays your honors to decree, that the said pretended deeds of mortgage are null and void, and a fraud upon the said act of congress, and wholly ineffectual to pass to the said Charles Godfrey any title or interest in or to all or any of the real or personal estates therein mentioned or referred to, and that the other persons named as defendants herein, have no title or interest therein by virtue of the said deeds of assignment, and that the plaintiff is entitled to receive from all of the said defendants a deed of release of all their interest in and to said real estates, or to have a discharge of the said deed of mortgage entered upon the record thereof in the said registry of deeds, and to an account and payment of all and singular the sums of money received by them as the rents and profits thereof, and to the payment by the said defendants to him of the sum of six thousand seven hundred and thirty-three dollars and four cents, being the actual value of the said personal estates mentioned or referred to in said other deed of mortgage, and sold or disposed of by said defendants as aforesaid."

Godfrey, in his answer, states as follows: "That on the nineteenth day of March last past, William Reed, of said Taunton, trader, was indebted to him in the sum of sixty dollars and eighty-three cents, as nearly as he can ascertain,—and he had before that time been and become indorser, surety, and otherwise liable for said Reed, in and upon certain promissory notes then held by his several co-defendants in the complainant's said bill named. That on or about the first day of January next preceding, the said William Reed had, as he informed the defendant, taken an account of his stock in trade, and property, personal and real, and of his indebtedness and liabilities of every description, and ascertained that his said property was more than sufficient to pay all his said debts and liabilities, and the defendant relied thereon. And the defendant further answering says, that a short time prior to said nineteenth day of March, he was advised to endeavor to protect or secure himself against loss from the indebtedness of said Reed to him, and from his liabilities for said Reed; and thereupon, to avoid all possible loss that might thereafter arise to him, by reason of the said indebtedness of said Reed to him, and his said liabilities for said Reed, he did, on said nineteenth day of March, call upon said Reed, in company with counsel learned in the law, and demand and require of the said Reed to secure him from any eventual loss by reason of his said claim and liabilities, by a mortgage upon his stock in trade and real estate; and said Reed did then and there, after some hesitation and delay, yield to said demand and requisition. Whereupon a deed of mortgage of said Reed's stock in trade, and another deed of mortgage of the lands and tenements of said Reed, were, on said nineteenth day of March, duly made and executed by said Reed to the defendant. That the sum named in said deeds as the consideration therefor, was, as he believes, inserted therein by the counsel who drew said deeds, as being about the supposed amount of the debt due the defendant and of his said liabilities for said Reed; but neither said sum, nor any other sum of money, was paid by the defendant to said Reed on the execution and delivery of said deeds as the consideration therefor, but that the sole consideration therefor was the said indebtedness of said Reed to the defendant, and the defendant's liabilities for said Reed as aforesaid. That at the time of his demanding security of said Reed in manner aforesaid, he was led to fear that said Reed was, or would be troubled, and unable to meet and pay the sums due from him from time to time as the same fell due, but this defendant did believe that unless the said Reed should be compelled to submit to a sale of his stock in trade at a less than its prime cost, and to a sale of his interest in said real estate at less than what had theretofore been considered its true value, he, said Reed, would not prove, ultimately, unable to pay his debts. And this defendant denies that when said deeds of mortgage were so made to him as aforesaid, said Reed, so far as he knows, is informed or believes, contemplated stopping his said trade or business, or filing a petition in bankruptcy,—on the contrary, the defendant, at the time of the execution of said mortgages, expressly understood and believed that said Reed did not intend to stop his said business or to be declared a bankrupt. That he is informed, and believes it to be true, that said Reed, after the execution and delivery of said mortgages on the same nineteenth day of March, was informed that his property, real and personal, had been attached by several of his creditors, and then and thereupon, and by reason thereof, said Reed was induced to believe that he would not be able to prosecute his said business, and did, in consequence thereof, apply to counsel to draw a petition pursuant to said act, that he, the said Reed, might be declared bankrupt, which said petition the defendant has been informed and believes was signed and sworn to by said Reed on said nineteenth day of March, and that thereafterwards the same was, as this defendant is informed, duly filed in court on the twenty-first day of said March, and said Reed declared bankrupt, and said complainant duly appointed assignee of his estate and effects at the time and in the manner in said bill set forth, and that said complainant accepted and now exercises said trust. And this defendant further says, that on the twenty-first day of said March, the president, and company of the Cohannet Bank, one of the defendants to this bill, being the proprietors and holders of six several promissory notes of said Reed indorsed by the defendant, to indemnify the defendant against which, and all loss thereon, said mortgages of said Reed to the defendant were given as aforesaid, he, the defendant, did, on said twenty-first day of March, duly assign and convey to said bank in mortgage, all his right and interest in said mortgage of goods and chattels so made to him by said Reed, to be held by said bank as security for this defendant's liability on said notes to said bank. That on the twenty-sixth day of May, in the same year, the Institution for Savings in the town of Taunton and its vicinity, Samuel Blake, Samuel Caswell, Benjamin Caswell, Charles Johnson, Walter Leonard, and Abigail Leonard, who are made defendants to complainant's bill, were the proprietors and holders of the residue of said promissory notes, and the property of the defendant having been attached by several of said persons in suits founded on the defendant's liability on said notes, and at the request of said bank and of said other parties, defendants hereto, and as security for the defendant's said liabilities to them on said notes, the defendant did, on the said twenty-sixth day of May, make and execute and deliver to all said parties, a conveyance of all his interest in said real estate so mortgaged by said Reed to this defendant, and for the same purpose and at the same time did assign all his interest in the said personal property so conveyed to him in mortgage by said Reed, (and by this defendant theretofore conveyed in mortgage to said bank as aforesaid), and did also by the same instrument assign to said parties all his rights and claims against said William Reed, and against one John Reed. And said parties, on the same day, and as part of the same transaction, did execute with this defendant a written agreement, in and by which agreement said mortgage of said goods and chattels so assigned to said bank and the proceeds thereof, was declared and agreed to be held by said bank,—and also said mortgage of said real estate, and said claims and the proceeds thereof as security, and to be applied and distributed to and among said bank and said other parties equally and in proportion to their respective claims aforesaid against this defendant. And that neither said bank nor said other persons nor corporations, grantees in said deeds at the time of the execution and delivery of said deeds respectively, or at any other time, paid to this defendant any sum or sums of money as a consideration therefor. And that he is informed and believes that said bank, on or about the twenty-first day of March, did take possession of said goods and chattels, and that the same have been sold and disposed of; and as to the places where and times when the same were so sold, and as to prices and manner of such disposition and sales, and the proceeds thereof, this defendant says that he has seen and read, or heard, the answer of said bank filed in this case, and that the same is, so far as this defendant knows and is informed, correctly and fully set forth therein. That he is informed and believes that the said bank and the said other defendants, on or about the seventh day of June last, did enter upon and take possession of said real estate for condition broken, and that they have received certain rents and profits therefrom. And although this defendant cannot answer as to his personal knowledge, yet he has read or heard the answers of said bank and of said other defendants, filed in this case, and the statement therein contained in relation to said rents and profits, and in relation to the use and application of the same, and of the proceeds of said goods and chattels, is, according to his best knowledge and belief, true. And the defendant further says, that he has not, nor has ever had, any securities or means of payment and discharge of his said claims and liabilities for said Reed, furnished to him by said Reed, other than said mortgages so made and executed to him on said nineteenth day of March; and that he, this defendant, has paid on account of his said liabilities for said Reed, no other sum than the sum of eighty-two dollars and thirty cents, paid by this defendant for costs of certain suits brought against him, founded on his said liabilities for said Reed, saving and excepting such sums as have been realized by said other defendants out of the mortgages by this defendant assigned to them as aforesaid. And this defendant further answering says, that said assignment so made by him to said bank on said twenty-first day of March, is, by this defendant, supposed to be still in force and effect. And this defendant further answering says, that neither at the time of the execution and delivery of said other deeds of assignment bearing date said twenty-sixth day of May, by this defendant to said other defendants, nor at any other time, was it agreed or understood that said assignment so made by this defendant to said bank, should be, or was, revoked. or annulled; nor was any agreement or writing ever made or executed by this defendant, nor by said other defendants, so far as he knows, or is informed to that effect."

The answer also of the Cohannet Bank was as follows:

"That on the twenty-first day of March, now last past, one Charles Godfrey, of Taunton, in said district, trader, was, or pretended to be, the proprietor, and possessed of said goods, in mortgage, under and by virtue of a certain deed of conveyance thereof theretofore executed to said Godfrey, by one William Reed, of said Taunton, trader, bearing date the nineteenth day of the same month of March, which deed of conveyance had been theretofore, on said nineteenth day of March, duly recorded in the office and records of the town clerk of said Taunton, where the said Reed then, and has ever since, resided, pursuant to the laws of said commonwealth of Massachusetts regulating mortgages of personal property in said commonwealth. And the said Godfrey then and there held, or pretended to hold, in good faith, said goods and chattels in mortgage, and said conveyance thereof, free from all fraud or impeachment whatever. And said Godfrey was on the same twenty-first day of March, indebted or liable to this defendant, as indorser of certain promissory notes, signed by said William Reed, amounting together to the sum of three thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars. And this defendant, believing that the said Godfrey was in good faith the owner and holder of said goods and chattels, in mortgage, and that said recorded conveyance thereof was made fairly and without fraud of any kind, on the same twenty-first day of March, agreed with said Godfrey to take and receive an assignment and conveyance of said mortgage, and of said goods and chattels, in mortgage, and as security for the debts and liabilities of said Godfrey to said defendant, as indorser of said promissory notes,—which assignment was accordingly made and executed and delivered on said twenty-first day of March, by said Godfrey, to this defendant. That at the time said conveyance of said Godfrey to this defendant bears date, and was executed and delivered, said promissory notes, so indorsed by said Godfrey, were wholly unpaid. And this defendant doth also aver, that at or before the execution and delivery of said conveyance by said Godfrey to said defendant, this defendant had no notice whatever, that said deed of mortgage, so made by said Reed to said Godfrey, was made by said Reed in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the sake of giving a preference or priority to said Godfrey, or that the same was void, or a fraud on the act of congress entitled an 'Act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' or that the same was, or was believed to be, in any other manner or for any other cause, fraudulent, voidable, or void. And the defendant insists, that it is a bona fide purchase of said goods and chattels, in mortgage, as aforesaid, for a good and valuable consideration, and without any notice that the same had been conveyed in mortgage to said Godfrey, in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the sake of giving a priority to said Godfrey, or that the same can or could in any manner be deemed a fraud on said act of congress, or voidable or void on any ground. And the defendant admits, that at the time of the execution and delivery of said conveyance by said Godfrey to this defendant, this defendant paid said Godfrey no sum or sums of money as the consideration therefor. And the defendant denies that said conveyance, so made by said Godfrey to this defendant, was without consideration, or that this defendant, at the time of the execution or delivery thereof, knew that said Reed had before that time filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt. And the defendant admits, that he knew, from the date of said deed of mortgage by said William Reed to said Godfrey, and from the time of recording the same, as appeared on said deed and record, that the same was made, executed, and delivered on or prior to said nineteenth day of March; and was also informed, and believes, that the same was so executed on said nineteenth day of March; and this defendant denies that it knew or was informed, at or before the said assignment thereof to this defendant, of the circumstances under which the same was made and executed by said Reed to said Godfrey, except that the same was given to the said Godfrey as security for his said claims against, and liabilities for, said Reed. That on the twenty-sixth day of May, now last past, the said Godfrey was or pretended to be, seized in fee and in mortgage of and in all and singular said lands and tenements in said bill mentioned and described, under and by virtue of a certain conveyance thereof, theretofore executed by the said William Reed, bearing date the said nineteenth day of March last past. And the said Godfrey pretended to hold, in good faith, said lands and tenements in fee and in mortgage, free from all fraud and impeachment whatever. And the said Godfrey, on said twenty-sixth day of May, was indebted or liable to this defendant, as indorser of said promissory notes, signed by said Reed; and said Godfrey was, as this defendant was informed, and believed, and still believes, justly indebted or liable to said other defendants, as indorser or joint promissor with said Reed of sundry promissory notes, signed by said Reed, amounting together to the sum of four thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars. And this defendant, believing that said Godfrey was in good faith seized of said lands and tenements, in fee and in mortgage, and that said recorded conveyance thereof, so appearing to be made by said Reed to said Godfrey, was made fairly and without fraud of any description, nor subject to any impeachment or suspicion thereof, thereafterwards, on the said twenty-sixth day of May, did together with said other defendants, creditors of said Godfrey as aforesaid, agree to take and receive of said Godfrey an assignment and conveyance of said mortgage lands and tenements and of the said Godfrey's rights therein, and thereby secured as aforesaid, as security for the said debts and liabilities of said Godfrey to this defendant, and to said other defendants in said bill of complaint mentioned. And thereupon a certain deed of conveyance of said lands and tenements, bearing date the said twenty-sixth day of May, was duly made and executed and delivered on the said twenty-sixth day of May, by said Godfrey to this defendant, and said other defendants, whereby said Godfrey did convey to this defendant and said other defendants all the right, title, and interest that he, said Godfrey, had in and to said real estate, lands, and tenements, under and by virtue of the said deed of said William Reed, to him, said Godfrey, so executed, on said nineteenth day of said March, and in and by said deed or conveyance the said Godfrey did covenant with this defendant, and said other defendants, their heirs, successors, executors, administrators, and assigns, that he had good right to transfer and convey said premises and property to all said grantees, in manner as aforesaid. And on the same day, for the same consideration, and as a part of the same transaction, the said Godfrey did, by his certain other deed, bearing date the said twenty-sixth day of May, assign and transfer to the same grantees, all his interest in and to the said goods and chattels, theretofore by said Reed conveyed to him in mortgage, and by him assigned and conveyed to this defendant as aforesaid, and in and to all claims and demands which he had or might have against the said William Reed, and one John Reed, of said Taunton, or either of them, arising out of his liabilities or indorsements for or on account of said John and William Reed, or either of them. And on the same twenty-sixth day of May, a certain agreement, bearing date the said twenty-sixth day of May, was duly executed and delivered under the hands and seals of Godfrey and this defendant, and said other defendants, wherein and whereby, among other things, the said mortgage of said lands and tenements, real estate, and property, and the interest of said Godfrey in and to said goods and chattels, are conveyed to said grantees as security for the said debts and liabilities of said Godfrey to said grantees, and that the same were to be sold and applied accordingly, whereby this defendant also covenanted and agreed, that said goods and chattels and mortgage to this defendant, theretofore assigned and conveyed, on said twenty-first day of March, as aforesaid, and the proceeds thereof, should be held, applied, and distributed equally among and between this defendant and said other defendants, in proportion to their respective demands and claims, as aforesaid. And that at the time of the date, execution, and delivery of said conveyance, by said Godfrey to this defendant and said other defendants, of said real estate, lands, and tenements, said promissory notes, so held by this defendant, were wholly unpaid, and as this defendant is informed and believes, said amount, so due to said other defendants, was wholly unpaid; and this defendant doth also aver, that at or before the execution and delivery of said conveyance by said Godfrey to this defendant, and said other defendants, this defendant had not, nor had said other defendants, or either of them, so far as this defendant knew, was informed, or believed, or as he now knows, is informed, or believes, any notice whatsoever, that said conveyance or mortgage of said estate and lands, so made by said William Reed to said Godfrey, on said nineteenth day of March, was made by said Reed in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the sake of giving a preference or priority to said Godfrey, or that the same was void. And this defendant submits, that it is, together with said other defendants, a bona fide purchaser of said mortgage of said real estate, lands, and tenements, for a good and valuable consideration, and without any notice that the said mortgage was voidable, or void, on any ground.

"And this defendant admits, that at the time of the execution and delivery of said conveyance of said real estate, neither this defendant nor said other defendants, as far as this defendant knows, is informed, or believes, paid said Godfrey any sum or sums of money as the consideration therefor; but this defendant avers the same to have been made on good and valuable consideration, as hereinbefore set forth. And this defendant admits, that at the time of the execution and delivery of said conveyance by said Godfrey to this and said other defendants, it was informed and believed, that said William Reed had before that time filed his petition to be declared a bankrupt. And this defendant, further answering, admits that it knew and believes the said other defendants knew, at the time of the assignment and conveyance of said mortgage to it and said other defendants, as well from the date of said instrument, and of the record thereof, as from other information, that the same was made and executed on said nineteenth day of March. But this defendant denies, that at or before the assignment and conveyance of said mortgage to this and said other defendants, it knew or was informed, or that said other defendants knew or were informed, so far as this defendant is informed, or believes, the circumstances under which said mortgage was made by said Reed to said Godfrey, except that the same was given to said Godfrey as security for his said claims against, and liabilities for, said Reed. That said deeds of mortgage, so made by said William Reed to said Godfrey, were expressed therein to be, and were made for the purpose of securing to said Godfrey whatever was due from said Reed to said Godfrey on account, and to indemnify and save harmless the said Godfrey from all damage, cost, charge, and trouble, for and on account of the liabilities of said Godfrey, as surety or indorser for said Reed; and on all acceptances made theretofore by said Godfrey for the accommodation of said Reed. That on said nineteenth day of March, said Reed was, as this defendant is informed, and believes, indebted to said Godfrey on account in the sum of sixty dollars and eighty-three cents, and the said Godfrey was then and there under liabilities to this defendant for and on account of the said Reed, as indorser of his, said Reed's, promissory notes, in the sum of three thousand two hundred and ninety-five dollars. And said Godfrey was also then and there, as this defendant is informed and believes, under liabilities to said other defendants, as indorser, joint promissor, surety, or otherwise, for said Reed, in the respective sums, and upon the respective contracts. That on the said twenty-first day of March, one of the said notes, so indorsed by said Godfrey for the said Reed, bearing date the seventeenth day of January, last past, for the sum of eight hundred and fifty dollars, became due and payable, which said note was then and there the property of this defendant; and payment was duly demanded by this defendant of said Reed, who declined to pay the same; and thereupon due notice was on the same day given by this defendant to said Godfrey, and said Godfrey requested to pay the same, and suits had been instituted against said Godfrey, founded on his said liabilities for said Reed; and thereupon and after the said assignment and conveyance by said Godfrey to this defendant of said mortgage of goods and chattels, so made to said Godfrey by said Reed, on said nineteenth day of March, as aforesaid, this defendant took possession of said goods and chattels; and this defendant, with the consent of said Reed, in order to avoid the loss and injury that might otherwise arise from keeping said goods, and the depreciation thereof, did empower said Reed to sell said goods and chattels by retail, and at private sale, for the benefit, and as agent of, this defendant, as the holder of said mortgage so made thereof by said Reed, this defendant agreeing to allow said Reed a reasonable sum for his services and expenses therein. And said Reed did thenceforth, until on or about the first day of June then next, proceed to sell and dispose of said goods as aforesaid, and did receive therefor for this defendant the sum of one thousand and sixty-five dollars and forty-one cents, being on the average the prime cost of said goods, as this defendant is informed and believes. And this defendant did allow and pay said Reed for his said services and expenses during said period, the sum of one hundred and eighty dollars, and after the said first day of June then next, and after the expiration of more than sixty days from the period when said suits had been brought against said Godfrey, founded on said liabilities; and when said note of said Reed, indorsed by said Godfrey, for the sum of eight hundred and fifty dollars, became due, and payment thereof was declined and refused by said Reed, this defendant, with the consent of said other defendants, for whose benefit, as well as its own, said mortgage was then held by this defendant, did in the belief, as well that the residue of said stock would be most advantageously disposed of at public auction, and with least pecuniary loss, as in the exercise of what it considered, and now considers, its legal rights, proceed to sell and dispose of said stock at public auction, and in different parcels, in the towns of Taunton, Fall River, and New Bedford, in said district; and did receive, as the net proceeds of said sales, the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars and eighty-seven cents. And the defendant further says, that on the seventh day of said June, this defendant and said other defendants, did enter on, and take possession of, said real estate for condition broken, and that the sums received by this defendant, and said other defendants, as rents and profits of the real estate, since possession was so taken, amounted to forty-seven dollars and thirty-three cents, and no more. And that the sums thus received by this defendant, and said other defendants, from out the sales of said personal property, and from the rents and profits of said real estate, have been paid over and distributed, after deducting the sum of forty-two dollars and seventy-seven cents, actually expended in the sale and collections aforesaid, to and among this defendant, and all said defendants, in proportion to their respective claims aforesaid, except a small portion thereof, which amounts to less than the sum of one hundred dollars, all which sums, thus paid over and distributed among said creditors and this defendant, have been indorsed and applied towards the payment and discharge of said notes, so held by this defendant, and said other defendants, respectively. And that neither of the said liabilities of said Godfrey for said Reed, so held by this defendant, has been wholly extinguished and satisfied. Nor, as this defendant is informed and believes, has either of the liabilities of said Godfrey for said Reed, held by said other defendants, been wholly extinguished or satisfied. Nor has any part of the said liabilities, thus held by this defendant, or by said other defendants, so far as this defendant is informed, or believes, ever been diminished or paid, in part or in whole, except by the application of the said proceeds of said personal property, and rents and profits of said real estate, as aforesaid; nor has said Godfrey, so far as this defendant knows, is informed, or believes, any other securities or means given or furnished him by said Reed, for discharging said debts and liabilities. And that the said assignment and conveyance, so made to this defendant of said personal property on said twenty-first day of March, is by this defendant supposed to be in force and effect; and that it was not, as far as this defendant knows, is informed, or believes, ever supposed, understood, or agreed, that upon the execution of said deeds or assignments, bearing date the said twenty-sixth day of May, the said former assignment bearing date the twenty-first day of March, was revoked or annulled; nor was any assignment to that effect ever signed, sealed, or executed by this defendant, nor, so far as this defendant knows, is informed, or believes, by said other defendants."

The answer of the Institution for Savings was substantially the same. Afterwards Godfrey became bankrupt, and his assignee was made a party to the bill. The general replication was filed, and the cause came on for hearing upon the pleadings and evidence, and was argued by—

F. G. Loring, for plaintiff.

Mr. Bartlett, for respondents.

STORY, Circuit Justice. On the 19th of March, 1842, William Reed (the bankrupt) made the two deeds of conveyance on mortgage to Godfrey, which are now sought to be set aside as fraudulent and void, under the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9. On the same day, Reed signed and swore to a petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act, as a voluntary bankrupt; and his petition was filed in the district court on the succeeding Monday, (the 21st of March), and has been acted upon in the district court, and Reed has since, under the same, been declared a bankrupt. One of these deeds purported to convey to Godfrey "all the right, title and interest" which he (Reed) then had "in and to any lands, buildings and real estate," in the county of Bristol. The other deed purported to convey to Godfrey, "all the goods, wares and merchandise, consisting of woollen, cotton, linen, and other cloths, silks, ribbons, laces and handkerchiefs, hose, carpetings and rugs, and various other articles of dry goods merchandise, now in the store occupied by me," and situate in Taunton. In point of fact, the last deed comprehended all his stock in trade, and the other deed nearly all his real estate, leaving him in the possession and ownership only of his furniture and some other personal property, not included in the mortgage to Godfrey. Godfrey on the same 21st of March conveyed to the Cohannet Bank, in mortgage, "all the right, title and interest," which he then had "in and to all and singular the goods, wares, and merchandise, of every name and description in the store," etc., which he derived from the mortgage to him by Reed of the 19th of March. By subsequent deeds, on the 26th of May following, Godfrey conveyed "all his right, title and interest," as well in the goods aforesaid, as in the real estate aforesaid, so conveyed to him by Reed, to the Cohannet Bank, the Institution for Savings, and to Samuel Blake, and five other persons, who were his creditors in fee, as security for their debts; and thereby on, and in consideration thereof, the said creditors on the same day by their deed agreed to withdraw and discharge their attachments upon the property of Godfrey. Godfrey afterwards became a bankrupt and his assignee is made a party to the bill. The second section of the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, provides "that all future payments, securities, conveyances, or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any bankrupt in contemplation of bankruptcy, and for the purpose of giving any creditor, indorser, surety or other person any preference or priority over the general creditors of such bankrupt; and all other payments, securities, conveyances or transfers of property, or agreements made or given by any such bankrupt, in contemplation of bankruptcy, to any person whatsoever, not being a bona fide creditor or purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, shall be deemed utterly void, and a fraud upon this act."

The first and main question is, whether the conveyances so made by Reed to Godfrey come within the reach of this enactment. If they do, then another question will remain, whether the defendants claiming under Godfrey are entitled to protection, as being bonâ fide purchasers of the same for a valuable consideration, without notice. It does not strike me, that there is any substantial doubt upon the facts and circumstances resting on either point.

In the first place, nothing can be clearer than that Reed intended by the deeds in controversy to give a preference to Godfrey over all his other creditors. He conveyed to him all his stock in trade, and nearly all his real estate, leaving but a small residue, either of personal or real estate. Godfrey well knew of his embarrassments; and Reed himself admits that his whole property was about $24,000, and his debts and liabilities amounted to about the same sum. So it is plain beyond controversy, that a preference was intended to be given to Godfrey over the other creditors, in case of any deficiency; and Reed states, that he did not at the time suppose that he was able to meet all his engagements at their maturity. If it were necessary under such circumstances to rely upon authorities in confirmation of this doctrine, the cases of Harman v. Fishar, 1 Cowp. 117, 123; Thornton v. Hargreaves, 7 East, 544; Compton v. Bedford, 1 W. Bl. 362; Hooper v. Smith, Id. 441,—will be found to support it. Then, as to the conveyances being made in contemplation of bankruptcy, in the sense in which these words are used in the bankrupt act of 1841, c. 9, § 2, I have already had occasion to consider this subject in former cases, and especially in the case of Arnold v. Maynard [Case No. 561], and Hutchins v. Taylor [Id. 6,953]. In these cases, it was expressly decided that the words "in contemplation of bankruptcy," in the act, were not limited to, and did not mean the contemplation on the part of the bankrupt of committing an act of bankruptcy within the terms of the act, for which his creditors might proceed against him in invitum, or his own contemplation of voluntarily taking the benefit of the act; but that they properly meant the contemplation of a state of bankruptcy, or known insolvency and inability to carry on his business, and a stoppage of his business. In other words, that he contemplated a breaking up and failure and stoppage of his trade or business, and thus to become, in the sense of the old law, a bankrupt, or one whose trade and business is broken up, his counter or table being, in a figurative sense, bankus-ruptus. 2 Bl. Comm. 471, note e. In addition to the English cases cited in suport of this doctrine in the case of Arnold v. Maynard [supra], I might add the more recent case of Gibson v. Muskett, 4 Man. & G. 160, where Lord Chief Justice Tindal said, "Then the question is, whether this was not money paid in contemplation of bankruptcy, that is, under such circumstances that any prudent man, taking a reasonable view of his situation and the surrounding circumstances at the time, might fairly expect bankruptcy to follow." But I did not found myself on the cases of Arnold v. Maynard and Hutchins v. Taylor [supra], nor do I in the present case found myself, upon the construction of the words, as applied to the English bankrupt statute, but upon their true meaning and objects as used in our own act of 1841, c. 9. Reed must be presumed to have known the natural consequences of his acts in making these conveyances. He could not but have known, that these conveyances, transferring the bulk of his property, did give a preference to Godfrey, which was a fraud upon the bankrupt act, entitling his other creditors to proceed against him therefor in invitum, under the first section of the act. It was an attempt, on his own part, to divide his property among his creditors in a manner prohibited by the bankrupt act, at the very moment when he was about to fail in business, and when he knew that he must by those very conveyances break up and stop his whole trade and means of carrying it on. Nay, the present case demonstrates that he must at the time have had it in contemplation to take the benefit of the bankrupt act, as a voluntary bankrupt; for on the same day, and at most at a few hours after he had made these conveyances, he actually signed and swore to a petition to be filed for the benefit of the act, and that petition was immediately proceeded in, and he has been since declared a bankrupt accordingly. Such acts cannot be overcome or gainsaid by any declarations,—even if Reed had made them,—that he did not, at the moment of executing these conveyances, contemplate taking the benefit of the bankrupt act; but that it was an after-thought. The law will not tolerate such evasions of its obligations, nor permit any man to set up his own private and secret intentions to subvert the just conclusions to be drawn from his overt acts and notorious embarrassments, and stoppage of his business. The language of Lord Ellenborough in Thornton v. Hargreaves, 7 East, 544, 547, is very significant upon this subject; and in its circumstances it approaches very nearly to the present. See, also, Newton v. Chanter, Id. 138, 143. It would make no difference in the present case, that Godfrey was not aware, that the conveyances were made with an intention to give him an unlawful preference over the other creditors, and in contemplation of bankruptcy; for the act makes such conveyances under such circumstances utterly void, whether the grantee has such knowledge or not. But, in fact, it is not susceptible of any reasonable doubt, that Godfrey at the time was aware of the desperate circumstances of Reed, and he could not but know, that these conveyances, embracing the bulk of his property, necessarily amounted to a failure and stoppage in his business, and reduced him to a state of positive and immediate inability to pay his other debts. Without, therefore, going farther into the details of the case, it appears to me that the conveyances to Godfrey were fraudulent in the sense of the bankrupt act of 1841, having been made in contemplation of bankruptcy, and with intent to give Godfrey a preference over the other creditors.

In the next place, how stands the case as to the Cohannet Bank, upon the transfer to them, on the 21st of March, 1842, by Godfrey? It is suggested, that they are bona fide purchasers, without notice of the invalidity of the conveyances to Godfrey. Now, the answer of the bank does, in part, deny that at the time when the transfer was made to the bank by Godfrey, the bank knew, that the deed of conveyance of the same property by Reed to Godfrey was given in contemplation of bankruptcy, and to give Godfrey a preference over other creditors. But I do not find, that the bank denies, that at the time, that the transfer was so made to the bank, they did not know, that Reed had actually failed in business, and stopped payment, and broken up his business, and that the property therein stated was his whole stock in trade. Indeed, I should infer, that the bank must well have known all these facts, for the transfer was made to the bank solely, as the deed shows, as security for certain notes of Reed, indorsed by Godfrey; so that the apparent object was to get security for the payment of the notes of Reed, and not for any debts of Godfrey, due from him personally. If so, the bank was certainly put upon inquiry, and was bound to inquire into and to ascertain the true nature of the transaction between Reed and Godfrey.

And this leads me to remark, that the bank does not stand within the predicament of being a bonâ fide purchaser, for a valuable consideration, without notice, in the sense of the rule upon this subject. The bank did not pay any consideration therefor, nor did it surrender any securities, or release any debt due, either from Reed or Godfrey, to it. The transfer from Godfrey was a simple collateral security, taken as additional security, for the old indebtment and liability of the parties to the notes described in the instrument of transfer. It is true, that, as between Godfrey, and Reed, and the bank, the latter was a debtor for value, and the transfer was valid. But the protection is not given by the rules of law, to a party in such a predicament merely. He must not only have had no notice, but he must have paid a consideration at the time of the transfer, either in money, or other property, or by a surrender of existing debts or securities, held for the debts and liabilities. See Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 604a, 662, 805; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 177, 210–212; Stanhope v. Earl Verney, 2 Eden, 81; Mr. Butler's note to Co. Litt. 290–296, note 1, § 13; Willoughby v. Willoughby, 1 Term R. 763, 767; Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves. 246, 261. But here the bank has merely possessed itself of the property transferred, as auxiliary security for the old debts and liabilities. It has paid or given no new consideration upon the faith of it. It is, therefore, in truth no purchaser for value in the sense of the rule. Mr. Chancellor Walworth in Dickerson v. Tillinghast, 4 Paige, 215, seems to have gone somewhat farther, and to have held, that a transfer to a grantee in payment of a pre-existing debt, without giving up any security, or divesting himself of any right, or placing himself in a worse situation than he was in before, of an estate, upon which there was a prior unrecorded mortgage, of which the grantee had no notice, did not make him a purchaser, in the sense of the rule, for a valuable consideration; but that there must be some new consideration, in order to entitle him to a preference over the prior mortgagee. I do not say, that I am prepared to go quite to that length, seeing, that by securing the estate as payment, the pre-existing debt is surrendered and extinguished thereby. But here, there was no such surrender or extinguishment or payment; and the general principle adopted by the learned chancellor is certainly correct, that there must be some new consideration, moving between the parties, and not merely a new security given for the old debts or liabilities, without any surrender or extinguishment of the old debts and liabilities, or the old securities therefor. See, also, Coddington v. Bay, 20 Johns. 637. So that upon this ground alone the title of the bank would fail. The case of Swift v. Tysen, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1, does not apply. In the first place, there the bill was taken in payment or discharge of a pre-existing debt. In the next place, it was a case arising upon negotiable paper, and who was to be deemed a bonâ fide holder thereof, to whom equities between other parties should not apply. Such a case is not necessarily governed by the same considerations, as those applicable to purchasers of real or personal property, under the rule adopted by courts of equity for their protection.

But there is another ground, independent of this, and quite decisive against the bank. It is this, that the very deed of transfer, by its terms, purports to "sell, assign, transfer, and set over" to the bank, all the right, title, and interest of Godfrey, in and to the stock in the store, derived from the mortgage of Reed; and it contains no covenants whatsoever, as to the title or otherwise. So that it is a mere naked conveyance to the bank, of the very right, title, and interest, which Godfrey derived from the mortgage of Reed, and nothing more. The bank, therefore, took nothing but the "right, title, and interest," of Godfrey, subject to all its original infirmities, and can now claim under it nothing, which Godfrey himself could not claim against the assignee. This view of the matter ends the case, so far as respects the title of the bank under this deed.

The same objections, for the most part, apply to the deeds executed by Godfrey to the Cohannet Bank, and others, on the 26th of May, 1842. Each of them is a conveyance of all the "right, title, and interest" of Godfrey, derived under the mortgage deeds executed to him by Reed, on the preceding 19th day of March. There is this farther most important fact, that Reed had signed a petition on the same day (19th of March), for the benefit of the bankrupt act, that it was filed and acted on in the district court forthwith, and that Reed has under the proceedings been declared a bankrupt. The exact time when he was declared a bankrupt, does not appear; but I presume it was before the execution of those deeds, on the 26th of May. Now the pendency of these proceedings in the district court, at the time, would be constructive notice thereof, to all the grantees under those deeds. But they admit, that they had in fact actual notice thereof, at the time of the execution of the deeds. They were, therefore, put upon inquiry, and bound to know, that the very deeds under which Godfrey claimed, and the very "right, title, and interest," which he conveyed to them, were executed on the same day, that he signed his petition for the benefit of the bankrupt act. Under such circumstances, it is impossible for them justly to insist upon the defence, that the conveyances executed by Reed, on the eve of bankruptcy, conveying the bulk of all his property, real, and personal, to a single creditor, were not acts done in contemplation of bankruptcy, and with a view to give that creditor a preference over all others. It is true, that they surrendered their attachments upon Godfrey's property, and made other arrangements, by which the Cohannet Bank agreed to put the whole rights acquired by it, in the stock of Reed, by the deed of the 21st of March, into a common fund, and share, pro rata, with the other creditors, who were parties to those conveyances. But still, they bargained only for all the "right, title, and interest" of Godfrey, derived under the deed from Reed. Godfrey, by the same deed, assigned to the same grantee all his claims against William Reed the bankrupt, and also against John Reed, and "against the estates, or assignees, of the said William, and John." The surrender of their attachments might be a valuable consideration for the deeds of Godfrey to them, under certain circumstances, but not under circumstances like the present, where they had notice of the time and circumstances of the bankruptcy of Reed. And besides; they purchased, if, indeed, they could be called purchasers at all, only the "right, title, and interest" of Godfrey, in the premises, with all the infirmities, and subject to all the equities, belonging thereto. So that the case, as to these grantees, also falls back upon the validity of the conveyances to Godfrey by Reed, and must be treated as if Godfrey now claimed the property under those conveyances.

I am, therefore, of opinion, that it ought to be declared, that the said deeds made by Reed to Godfrey, and by Godfrey to the other defendants, ought to be declared void, as against the assignee of Reed; that the said Cohannet Bank, and the other defendants, be decreed to execute a release of all their right, title, and interest in, and to the real estate of the said Reed described therein, in such form as shall be settled by the master; and that the said defendants be required to account for, and pay over to the said assignee, the rents, and profits thereof, received by them; and also, that the said Cohannet Bank, and the other defendants, be required to account for, and pay over to the said assignee, all the proceeds of the said stock in trade, conveyed by the said Reed, to the said Godfrey, by the deed of the 19th of March, 1842, so far as the same shall have been sold, or otherwise disposed of, by the said bank and the other defendants respectively. And that it be referred to the same master, to take an account thereof, and to report to the court upon all the matters aforesaid. And all further orders are reserved until the coming in of the master's report, or the further order of the court in the premises.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. March, 1873.

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—DEBT OF ANOTHER—PROMISE OF BANK TO PAY CHECK.

A verbal agreement by a bank, made with the payee, on presentment of a check on the bank, the bank then having no funds of the drawer on deposit, to pay the check if the payee will deposit it in another bank, so that it shall be presented for payment through the clearing-house, is within the statute of frauds.

Actions at law by [Stephen Morse, Jr., and others, and Frank S. Fiske] the payees of certain checks drawn by one Beal on the defendant bank. The defendant demurred to the declarations, and the cases were heard on the demurrers.

George S. Hale and George S. Hillard, for plaintiffs.

Preston & Kimball and Converse & Kelley, for defendant.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. The declaration in each of these cases alleges that the plaintiff, on the twenty-ninth day of August, 1866, was the owner and possessor of a check drawn and signed by one B. Franklin Beal, whereby Beal directed the Massachusetts National Bank to pay to the order of the plaintiff the sum of ten thousand two hundred and ninety dollars; that the plaintiff on the same day presented the check for payment; and the defendants, in consideration that the plaintiff would deposit said check for collection in some other bank in the city of Boston, so that the same should be presented for payment through an association called and known as the Clearing-House Association, promised and agreed with the plaintiff, that, upon such presentation, they, the said defendants, would pay the same; and the plaintiff alleges that, in consideration thereof and in pursuance of the said request, he did agree to deposit said check in some other bank in Boston, that the same should be transmitted from said bank through the clearing-house for payment; and accordingly did deposit it in the First National Bank; and the check was, by the First National Bank, through the Clearing-House Association, duly presented to defendants for payment, and defendants refused to pay the same. Defendants demur to the declaration, and plaintiffs join in the demurrer.

There is no averment that, at the time of presentation of the check, the drawer had any funds on deposit in the defendant bank, or that defendant at that time was under any obligation to honor his checks.

The suit is brought by the original payee of the check, and not by an indorsee or subsequent assignee or bona fide holder for value. The question presented is, whether, when a check is drawn upon a bank by a drawer who has no funds on deposit to pay the check, the bank is liable upon its verbal promise to pay, if the holder would deposit the check in another bank and have it presented through the Clearing-House Association; in case the holder agrees to deposit, and does so deposit, the check in another bank, and have it presented.

The contract of a bank with a depositor is to pay his checks when presented for payment, if, at the time of presentment of the check, he has funds on deposit sufficient to pay the check. Cashiers of banks are held out to the public as having authority to act according to the general usage, practice, and course of business conducted by the bank; and their acts, within the scope of such usage, practice, and course of business, will in general bind the bank in favor of third persons possessing no other knowledge. Minor v. Mechanics' Bank, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 70; Merchants' Bank v. State Bank, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 604. To this extent the liability of the bank for the acts of its officers is recognized in the opinions of the dissenting justices, as well as in the opinion of the court in the case last cited. And in that case, where a cashier had certified as "good," checks of a drawer having no funds on deposit to pay the checks, it was held that it should have been left to the jury to determine whether from the evidence as to the powers exercised by the cashier, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the directors, and the usage of other banks in the same city, it might not be fairly inferred that the cashier had authority to bind the bank by such certificate. The certificate of the cashier of a bank that a check is "good," is a representation of a present existing fact, within his knowledge as cashier; and if that certificate be made by him in the course of his ordinary business as cashier, it will bind the bank in favor of innocent third persons, upon the principle of estoppel in pais, even if the certificate be not true and the drawer of the check has no funds on deposit in the bank. The ordinary duties of a cashier are well known. They are to keep the funds, notes, bills, and other choses in action, of the bank, to be used from time to time for the exigencies of the bank; to receive directly, and through subordinate officers, all moneys and notes of the bank; to surrender notes and securities upon payment; to draw checks; to withdraw funds of the bank on deposit; and, generally, to transact, as the executive officer of the bank the ordinary routine of business. But the ordinary duties of a cashier do not comprehend the making of a contract which involves the payment of money without an express authority from the directors, unless it be such as relates to the usual and customary transactions of the bank. Bank of U. S. v. Dunn, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 59; U. S. v. Bank of Columbus, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 364.

Defendant contends that it was not in the power of any cashier or other officer of a national bank to make a valid promise to pay a check not drawn against funds deposited in the bank, simply in consideration that the holder of the check will present it through some other bank, and have it pass through the clearing-house. If this point in relation to the authority of the cashier or teller, or other officer of the bank as such cashier, teller, or other officer merely, were open on the state of pleadings in this case, I should not find much difficulty in deciding that such a promise was wholly outside of the ordinary duties of a cashier or other officer of the bank, and would not bind the bank in the absence of proof of express delegation from the board of directors of power to make the contract. But the declaration in this case avers that the promise was made by the bank, not by the cashier or any other officer, and the demurrer admits the averment. Willets v. Phenix Bank, 2 Duer, 129. The case must, therefore, on the pleadings, be considered as presenting the question of the liability of the bank upon the promise declared upon as the promise of the bank.

There was no representation made in this case by any officer of the bank that the drawer had any funds in the bank when the check was presented. If such was the case, the bank was bound to pay the check on presentation. The refusal of the bank to do so, although accompanied with a promise to pay it at a future time, was in fact information to the holder of the check that the bank had no funds of the drawer on deposit at that time wherewith to pay the check. The case does not, therefore, fall within that class of cases like Pope v. Bank of Albion, 59 Barb. 226, in which it has been held that any language, whether verbal or written, employed by an officer of a banking institution whose duty it is to know the financial standing and credit of its customers, representing that a check drawn upon it is good, and will be paid, estops the bank from thereafter denying, as against a bona fide holder of the check, the want of funds to pay the same. Nor do the plaintiffs in these cases represent bona fide holders of the checks, who have purchased the same upon the strength of such representations. There does not appear to be any thing in this case to take the promise declared on out of the operation of the statute of frauds.

A check is merely evidence of a debt due from the drawer. Whether it shall operate as payment or not, depends on two facts: first, that the drawer has funds to his credit in the bank upon which it is drawn; and, second, that the bank is solvent, or in other words, pays its bills and the checks duly drawn upon it, on demand. Taylor v. Wilson, 11 Metc. [Mass.] 51.

There being no funds of the drawers of these checks in the bank, the bank received no benefit or advantage from the promise of the holder to deposit the checks in the other bank, and that the same should be presented through the clearing-house. The promisors lost nothing by such promise. They had seasonably presented the checks; were guilty of no laches; were not even obliged to notify the drawers of the non-payment, the drawee having no funds. They did not disable themselves from enforcing their debt against Beal, or promise to delay enforcing or collecting it. They were as much at liberty to collect their debts of Beal, while the unpaid checks were in the banks, or clearing-house, for collection, as if they were in fact, as they were in law, in their own possession.

The debt remained the debt of Beal. The promise of the bank to pay it was a promise to pay the debt of another, and void under the statute of frauds. This is not a case where the guaranty or promise which is collateral to the principal contract is made at the same time and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal or direct debtor. In this case, the collateral undertaking of the bank was subsequent to the creation of the debt, and was not the inducement to it, though the subsisting liability was the ground of the promise. There must, to sustain the promise and take it out of the operation of the statute, be some other and further consideration shown; for the consideration for the original debt will not attach to this subsequent promise. Wain v. Warlters, 5 East, 20; Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns. 31. The promise of the payees of these checks, as set out in the declaration, does not amount to such further and new consideration as to take the case out of the operation of the statute. It is contended that it amounts to a parol acceptance of the checks, and that a parol acceptance of a check is good. Authority may be found in many text-books of writers of high authority upon commercial law, for the proposition stated, without qualification or exception, that a parol acceptance of a bill is good. Vide 1 Pars. Notes & B. 285. But it is believed that an examination of the cases cited in support of this proposition will not sustain its application to the case of a parol accommodation acceptance of a bank check. A verbal acceptance of, or a verbal promise to accept, a check when the acceptor has funds of the drawer in his hands, is entirely without the operation of the statute, from the consideration that the drawee's engagement is, in fact, to pay his own debt to the drawer, the owner of the funds. But it is not perceived how any sound reason can be given why a verbal acceptance, or promise to accept, for the mere accommodation of the drawer, without funds or value received, should not be treated as within the statute. Browne, St. Frauds, §§ 172, 174; Quin v. Hanford, 1 Hill, 82; Pike v. Irwin, 1 Sandf. 14; Pillans v. Van Mierop, Burrows, 1663; Johnson v. Collings, 1 East, 98; Curtis v. Brown, 5 Cush. 488, and cases cited; Dexter v. Blanchard, 11 Allen, 365. Courts have frequently expressed their dissatisfaction that the rule with regard to implied as well as parol acceptances of bills has been carried as far as it has, and their regret, as stated in Boyce v. Edwards, 4 Pet. [29 U. S.] 122, "that any other act than a written acceptance of the bill had ever been deemed an acceptance." In Townsley v. Sumrall, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 170, which decides that a verbal accommodation acceptance is taken out of the statute by the circumstance that the party to whom the promise was made paid money on the strength of it, the whole opinion on this point in the case proceeds upon the assumption, that, without some new and original consideration moving between the parties to the collateral undertaking, a verbal accommodation acceptance is within the statute. The mischief of the rule holding parol acceptances of bills to be good was so apparent, that the subject has been regulated by statute in several of the states, requiring the acceptance to be in writing; and in England, by the statute 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 78, an acceptance of an inland bill must be in writing, and on the bill itself. But the reasons given for holding good a parol accommodation acceptance of a bill of exchange do not apply to the case of a bank check. The distinguishing characteristics of checks, as contradistinguished from bills of exchange, are, that they are always drawn upon a bank or a banker; that they are payable immediately on presentment without the allowance of any days of grace; and that they are never presentable for acceptance, but only for payment. Story, Prom. Notes, § 489, and cases cited in note. The promise declared on does not amount to an acceptance. If it be treated either as a promise to accept or a promise to pay, it cannot avail the plaintiffs. No consideration to support the promise is stated, or appears. The checks were not taken on the faith of such promise. The holder gave nothing, and relinquished no advantage for the promise. All the cases, including those before cited, which hold that a promise to accept amounts to an acceptance, put the doctrine on the ground that the holder has taken the bill on the faith of the promise. Coolidge v. Payson, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 66; Schimmepennich v. Bayard, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 284; Adams v. Jones, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 207; Russell v. Wiggin [Case No. 12,165]. The promise declared on must be considered as one without consideration, and therefore nudum pactum. Overman v. Hoboken City Bank, 1 Vroom [30 N. J. Law] 61, 68. Demurrers sustained.

MORSE et al. v. O'REILLY.

[4 Pa. Law J. Rep. 75; 6 Pa. Law J. 501.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Sept., 1847.

CONTRACTS — VIOLATION — IMPOSSIBLE OF EXECUTION—FORFEITURE—PRACTICE IN EQUITY —PATENTS.

1. The process of a court of equity will not be afforded for the purpose of enforcing a forfeiture.

2. When a contract has been violated in its essential terms, or when it has been made impossible of execution, equity will relieve, if it can do so without prejudice; but it never enforces anything in the nature of a forfeiture whether stipulated in the contract or implied from circumstances.

3. While the exclusive rights of a patentee are specially guarded from intrusion, the contracts which he makes to share them with third persons are interpreted and enforced in the same manner as other legal engagements.

[Cited in May v. Chaffee, Case No. 9,332.]

4. An injunction will not be granted against waste, where the title of the complainant is denied by the answer, and it is refused before answer, unless the defendant has had notice of the motion so as to enable him to make denial by affidavits.

This was an application for a special injunction. The bill was filed January 5, 1847. Upon the hearing, it appeared from the bill and affidavits read by the complainants, and the counter affidavits suffered by the court to be read on the part of the respondents, that on the 13th June, 1845, the complainants, who were patentees of Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph, entered into a contract with the respondent, Henry O'Reilly, in which he stipulated at his own expense to use his best endeavors to raise capital for the construction of a line of Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph to connect the great sea-board line at Philadelphia or at such other convenient point on said line as may approach nearer to Harrisburg in Pennsylvania, etc., etc., to Pittsburgh, St. Louis, and the principal towns on the lakes. In consideration whereof it was agreed on the part of the complainants, that when the said O'Reilly shall have procured a fund sufficient to build a line of one wire from the connecting point aforesaid to Harrisburg, or any point farther west, to convey the patent right to said line so covered by capital in trust for themselves, and the said O'Reilly and his associates on the terms and conditions set forth in the articles of agreement and association constituting the "Magnetic Telegraph Company," and providing for the government thereof with the following alterations viz: "The amount of stock or other interest in the lines to be constructed, reserved to the grantors and assigns, shall be one-fourth part only, and not one-half of the whole, on so much capital as shall be required to construct a line of two wires, but in all cases of a third wire, or any greater number, the stock issued on the capital employed for such additional wire or wires shall be equally divided between the subscribers of such capital and the grantors of the patent right or their assigns. No preference is to be given to the party of the first part and his associates in the construction of connecting lines, nor shall anything herein be construed to prevent an extension, by the parties of the second part, of a line from Buffalo, to connect with the lake towns at Erie; nor to prevent the construction of a line from New Orleans to connect the Western towns directly with that city; but such line shall not be used to connect any Western cities or towns with each other which may have been already connected by said O'Reilly." In case of a sale of the entire patent right to the government, the grantors shall be bound to pay the actual reasonable cost of the lines constructed under this agreement, with twenty per cent. thereon, and no more, to vest the government with the entire ownership of such lines; provided, as specified in the articles of agreement of the "Magnetic Telegraph Company," the purchase be made or provided for by congress before the 4th of March, 1847 (eighteen hundred and forty-seven.) "The tariff of charges on the lines so constructed, shall conform substantially to the tariff of charges on the great seaboard line before named, and in no case to be so arranged as to render the lines unequal in this respect, to the prejudice of either. Unless the line from the point of connection with the sea-board route shall be constructed within six months from date to Harrisburg, and capital provided for its extension to Pittsburgh within said time, then this agreement, and any conveyance in trust that may have been made in pursuance thereof, shall be null and void thereafter, unless it shall satisfactorily appear that unforeseen difficulties are experienced by said O'Reilly and his associates in obtaining from the state officers of Pennsylvania the right of way along the public works, and in that event the conditional annulment aforesaid shall take effect at the end of six months after such permission shall be given or refused. And any section beyond said last point, embraced within the provision of this agreement, which shall not be constructed by said O'Reilly and his associates, within six months after said parties of second part shall request said O'Reilly to cause such lines to be constructed, so as to extend the connection at least one hundred and fifty miles beyond said last point, and in like ratio during each succeeding six months thereafter; then, in relation to all such sections of the line, this agreement shall be null and void, provided that such request shall not be made prior to the 1st day of April next, 1846." "And the party of the second part shall convey said patent right, on any line beyond Pittsburgh to any point of commercial magnitude, when the necessary capital for the construction of the same shall have been subscribed within the period contemplated by this agreement, by reasonable persons, and not otherwise."

The following is the preamble to the articles of association referred to in Mr. O'Reilly's contract, and made a part thereof, viz.: "Whereas, Samuel F. B. Morse, Leonard D. Gale and Alfred Vail, by their attorney, Amos Kendall, and Francis O. J. Smith, in his own right, sole proprietors under the letters patent of the United States, of the right to construct and use Morse's electro-magnetic telegraph, on the main line of communication from the city of New York, through Philadelphia and Baltimore, to the city of Washington, have by deed of trust, bearing even date herewith, conveyed the same exclusive right to W. W. Corcoran and B. B. French, in trust, for the use of the said proprietors and the subscribers to the stock of the Magnetic Telegraph Company, with the limitations, under the conditions and in the manner set forth in said deed and in these articles of association, whose names are hereunto affixed, do hereby constitute ourselves into a joint stock company to be called the 'Magnetic Telegraph Company,' for the purpose of constructing and carrying on a line of said telegraph from New York to Washington, as aforesaid, according to the following principles and regulations."

The following are a portion of the powers vested in the trustees by those articles, viz.: "Article 9. The trustees shall have the power, and it shall be their duty forthwith to appoint the necessary agents, and take steps to secure the right of way to construct a line of telegraph, consisting of one or two wires, from New York to Philadelphia, and from time to time to call in such instalments of the capital stock as may be requisite for that purpose. After the company shall provide a treasurer, all moneys collected for or belonging to the company, shall be paid to the treasurer for the time being, who shall pay out the same only upon the written order of a majority of the trustees. But until a treasurer shall be appointed, the trustees shall perform the duties of treasurer. Article 10. They shall prepare forms of certificates and regulate transfers of stock, and audit all accounts for expenditures made in the construction or management of the telegraph, and generally to superintend the financial interests of the company. Article 11. They shall prepare a tariff of charges and a system of regulations for the management of the telegraph, which they shall submit to a meeting of the stockholders, to be called in due time before the line from New York to Philadelphia shall be ready to go into operation."

The only mode by which a board of directors could be constituted, is described in the following article, viz: "Article 17. Regular meetings shall be held annually or semi-annually, as the company may hereafter decide. At any regularly called meeting of this company it shall be competent for the company, in the manner of deciding any other proposition, to divest the trustees of all the powers herein vested, excepting the trust of the title of said letters patent, and the issuing of certificates of stock, and to transfer the same to and invest them in a board of directors, to consist of not less than five persons, to be thereafter elected at each annual meeting of the company, and to continue in office until new directors shall be elected; and thereafter such directors shall do and perform all the duties otherwise devolved upon the trustees as herein provided and generally superintend the administrative concerns of the company; and all officers and agents not herein specially provided and instructed, shall be subject to the direction of the directors."

It further appeared from an affidavit produced upon the call of the court after the argument had closed, that the complainants, on the 21st of December, 1846, before the filing of the bill, had formally conveyed to Eliphalet Case all their right of constructing and using the magnetic telegraph, with all its incidents, on the line embraced in Mr. O'Reilly's contract, and the assignment was recorded in the patent office two days after.

The complainants prayed for an injunction, upon the ground that the contract had become forfeited by a breach of its provisions, upon the part of the respondents, who had organized three several and distinct companies, appointed directors and other officers, and issued certificates of stock, without the consent and knowledge of the patentees, and without having first complied with the terms of the contract by having the property vested in trustees. It was also contended that O'Reilly had not, within the six months conditioned by the contract, provided funds for the extension of the line to Pittsburgh.

The respondents' affidavits did not deny the complainants' title, but asserted rights under it by force of the contract, which the respondents alleged they had substantially complied with.

Cadwallader, Miles & Williams, for the motion.

The respondents in this issue cannot question the title of the complainants, and the only ground, they have to stand on is the license they have obtained from the latter as patentees. See Baird v. Neilson, 8 Clark & F. 726. Such a license however does not protect them unless they are acting strictly under its terms. If they have failed to comply with any of its requisitions in point of time, which it is conceded on all sides they have, they cannot set it up in bar of this application. Withy v. Cottle, 1 Turn. & R. 78: Doloret v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. & S. 590; Coslake v. Till, 1 Russ. 376; Hagedon v. Laing, 1 Marsh. 514–518; M'Crelish v. Churchman, 4 Rawle, 26; Sparks v. Liverpool Water-Works, 13 Ves. 428; Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 374, 375; Payne v. Banner, 7 Jur. 1051. Time is particularly of the essence of this contract, seeing that the rights under it, by the provisions of the patent law are running out by time. A patentee has a peculiar right to call upon a court of equity for immediate relief when his patent right, during the limited period for which he is entitled to its exclusive benefit, has been invaded by a stranger. So far has this principle been carried that a court will grant an injunction, even though it may doubt the validity of the patent right. Boulton v. Bull, 3 Ves. 140; Harmer v. Plane, 14 Ves. 136; 6 Ves. 707; 3 P. Wms. 225, in note; Bonaparte v. Camden & A. R. Co. [Case No. 1,617].

Neither of the respondents, or any party claiming through them, can be here considered as an innocent purchaser without notice, since the legal title has throughout remained in the complainants. It was to be conveyed to the trustees under the article of agreement, until the completion of certain conditions. The title was never to be alienated from the trustees, and no stock could be created or certificate issued without them. The title being thus in the patentees, no right or title as purchasers could exist without notice to or inquiry of them. The governing principle is that a purchaser of an equitable interest must take notice of the outstanding legal interest, and of the equities arising from it. Shirey v. Kagg, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 48; Vatier v. Hime, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 271, 272; Boon v. Chilles, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 210–212.

If a party by his own act disables himself from performing his contract in the same manner and plight as that in which he has engaged to perform it, the other party may annul the contract within a reasonable time, after being fully apprised of what has been done, although the contract may have been partially executed. Litt. Ten. §§ 355, 358; Co. Litt. 228 a, b.; 10 Coke, 49b.; 3 Com. Dig. "Covenant," E. 2; 1 Sid. 48; Robinson v. Ant, Ld. Raym. 25; Rolle, Abr. "Condition." A, pl. 1; 5 Vin. Abr. 221, 224; Robson v. Drummond, 2 Barn. & Adol. 303; Smith v. Packhurst, 3 Atk. 141; Skilleen v. May, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 137; Ong v. Campbell, 6 Watts, 392; 1 Atk. 171.

Watts & Meredith, for respondents.

First. As to non-performance within the time specified. The complainants in order to avail themselves of this ground, must show a strict performance on their side of the agreement. The complainants themselves failed in establishing what was a condition precedent on their part, a point of connection at Lancaster. But, in effect, the condition on part of the respondents was substantially complied with by them within the proper period. Second. The organization of the Atlantic & Ohio Company is not in violation of the agreement between the parties. That agreement contemplates directly a general association, but it does not negative sectional associations. Such sectional associations were constantly instituted by complainants, and had become part of the general management of the patent. But the erection of such a subordinate association is nothing more than must necessarily take place under any general company of the character of that under the respondents' control. There must always be book-keepers, clerks and collectors, and it makes no matter what name may be given them. Third. As to the gratuitous issue of stock. There could be no injury to complainants by such gratuitous issue. They are entitled to just the same profits and same interest and same proportion in the capital, whatsoever be the issue of stock to others. Fourth. As to excessive cost. Such expenditures do not injure the patentees. On the contrary, if it is bona fide, it is beneficial to the patentees in proportion to its amount. But, generally, if this contract has been forfeited the forfeiture has been waived by the parties and the subsequent procedure of the respondents under it, ratified by the complainants.

KANE, District Judge. This case came before me, and has been discussed, as a motion for a special injunction at the instance of the proprietors of a patent right. The defendants' affidavits do not controvert the complainants' title, but they assert rights under it by force of a contract. The complainants, on the other hand, do not deny the contract, but allege that it has become forfeited by a breach of its provisions. This is the state of the case, as it appears upon the record, and substantially as it has been argued by the counsel on both sides. Essentially, therefore, the application is for the aid of the summary process of the court to enforce a forfeiture. I am not aware that such an application has been sustained by a court of equity in any case; and though called on by me, the counsel for the complainants have not found one. I am warranted in assuming, therefore, that the uniform chancery practice has been against such an exercise of jurisdiction, and this is certainly not a case of which the merits are so obvious as to invite innovations in its favor.

To escape from this, it has been contended that the defendants have incapacitated themselves from performing their contract or compensating for their default. This, however, is only another, and, as it seems to me, a less forcible form of alleging that they have forfeited it. Whether the contract has been violated in its essential terms, or whether it has been made impossible of execution; equity will relieve, if it can do so without prejudice; but it never enforces anything in the nature of a forfeiture, whether stipulated in the contract or implied from circumstances. Of course I do not refer to conditions precedent. It is a mistake of terms to speak of such conditions as affecting at this time the rights of these parties. Such conditions are at an end, when the right has become vested. They precede the operations of the grant; and the very reason why equity never relieves against them, is that it can only control the exercise of rights, and cannot confer them. The rights of Mr. O'Reilly vested to a certain extent on the execution of the written agreement of the 13th June, 1845; and they were absolutely fixed when he had "procured a fund sufficient to build a line of one wire from connecting point," with the seaboard line "to Harrisburg." From that time the condition precedent had performed its office, and his rights could be divested only by a forfeiture.

It did not vary the effect of his agreement, that the subject matter of it regarded a patent right. The exclusive rights of a patentee are specially guarded from intrusion; but the contracts which he makes to share them with third persons are interpreted and enforced just as other legal engagements. Nor is anything gained to the complainants, by assimilating the case to one of waste. An injunction is not granted against waste, where the title of the complainant is denied by the answer; and it is refused before answer unless the defendant has had notice of the motion, so as to enable him to make the denial by affidavits. 19 Ves. 147; 17 Ves. 110. In the case before me, the defendants assert that they are in possession under title, and the very issue is whether they are so or not.

I have thus considered the arguments of the counsel, as if the case were really between the proprietors of a patent right on the one side and the defendants on the other. But it is not so. The exhibit referred to in Mr. Kendall's affidavit which was produced upon the call of the court after the argument had closed, shows that the complainants have not, and had not at the time of filing their bill, any title to that character, so far as regards the subject of contest here. On the 21st of December, 1846, they formally conveyed to Eliphalet Case all their right of construction and using the magnetic telegraph, with all its incidents on the lines embraced in Mr. O'Reilly's contract and the assignment was recorded in the patent office two days after. The bill was filed on the 5th day of January, 1847. I need hardly say that this fact destroys the basis of the complainants' case. An injunction cannot be awarded at the instance of a stranger, and a patentee, who has assigned away his interest is nothing more.

For these reasons, the motion is refused. I may add, as the request has been made that I should express an opinion upon the merits of the controversy, that I have seen nothing in the facts that have been developed to call for a different conclusion from that to which abstract principles have directed me. Injunction refused.

Case No. 9,859.

MORSE et al. v. O'REILLY et al.

[6 West. Law. J. 102.]

Circuit Court, D. Kentucky. Sept., 1848.[1]

PATENTS—VALIDITY AND INFRINGEMENT—INJUNCTION.

[1. The Morse telegraphic patents, both original and reissued, construed, and held valid, as covering the result as well as the process, and an injunction granted against defendant as an infringer.]

[2. Where complainants have shown a possession acquiesced in for a long time by the public at large, and for some time by the defendant himself, they are entitled to an injunction, and under such circumstances it is not proper to permit defendants to continue the use of the infringing machine upon giving bond and security to account for the profits.]

This was an action by Morse and others against O'Reilly and others for infringement of the Morse patents for an electric telegraph. On motion for an absolute injunction.

The motion was made upon the bill of Morse, &c., exhibited, accompanied by copies of his patents, original and reissued, and sundry affidavits, as well to show the period of the invention as the infringement of his patent right by the defendants. Notice being given of the motion, the defendant, O'Reilly, appeared by his counsel, Hon. Henry Pirtle, Wm. Y. Gholson, Esq., of Cincinnati, and M. C. Johnson, Esq., attorney general of Kentucky, and produced his answer to the bill of complainants, accompanied by an additional affidavit, incorporating sundry documents, extracts from scientific periodicals, newspapers, and affidavits; all of which were read and considered without objection as to their competency. The motion was made on the 24th August, and a decision thereon given on the 9th September. The complainants were represented by P. S. Loughborough, Esq., district attorney, Hon. A. K. Woolley, and Hon. Ben. Monroe. The reading of the pleadings, and exhibits, and affidavits, &c., occupied seven days, and the discussion eight days. The utmost range of objection was taken by the defendants' counsel. It was contended that Morse was not the inventor of the telegraph; that Professor Steinheil, of Munich, in Germany, had, prior to Morse's application for a patent, invented and put in operation an electric telegraph; that the combined circuits which appear in Morse's first patent were not invented by him; that Edward Davy, of London, had obtained a patent in England for an electric telegraph, operating by combined circuits, and that Morse had obtained the idea from Davy, and on his return from Europe in 1839 had interpolated the principle of the combined circuit in his specification made under his application filed in the patent office in 1838, before he went to Europe, and upon which altered specification his first patent issued in June, 1840. Various objections were taken to the validity of Morse's first patent, and to reissues thereof in 1846 and 1848, as well as to his patent for an improvement upon his original invention issued in April, 1846, and the reissue thereof in June, 1848.

Among the objections urged to the main patent were—1. The alleged alteration of the specification. 2. The effect of Morse's having obtained a patent in France for the same invention in August, 1838. 3. That his specification claimed a monopoly of the use of the galvanic current for recording at a distance by machinery, other than specified in his patent. 4. That Morse claimed as part of his patented rights a system of signs for an alphabet, not properly the subject-matter of a patent.

In regard to the patent for the improvements, it was, among other things, objected, 1. That they covered a part of the subjects included in the first patents, being, in that view, an attempt to extend the period of the monopoly. 2. That the new patents did not sufficiently distinguish what was the improvement from what was embraced in the main patent. 3. That no patent could issue to a patentee for an improvement upon his own invention. 4. That some part of the improvement had been in public use, prior to the application for a patent, with the consent of the patentee. Many other objections were urged by defendants' counsel.

In reference to the infringement, it was contended by the defendants that the Columbian Telegraph used by them, said to have been the invention of Barnes & Zook, was a distinct, independent invention, and its use no violation of Morse's patented rights. On the part of the complainants it was insisted that the evidence showed that Morse invented the telegraph as early as 1832, and perfected and exhibited it in January, 1836; that he invented and put in operation early in 1837 the combined circuit; that Steinheil's telegraph invention was not published until September, 1838; and that there was no evidence that it was invented prior to that of Morse, and, whenever invented, it is not the telegraph which was patented to Morse; that, as to the combined circuit, embraced in the patent of Davy, under which his specifications were enrolled on the 4th of January, 1839, they were embraced in Morse's patent from the French government, granted in August, 1838, from which Davy might have obtained the idea. As to the validity of the patents, it was insisted that none of the objections taken by the defendants were available. And as to the infringement, it was contended by complainants that the machine used by the defendants was a violation both of the principle and process embraced in Morse's patent. The apparatus of Morse and that claimed as the invention of Barnes & Zook, called the "Columbian Telegraph," were exhibited before the judge, and fully examined, and the affidavits of scientific men read.

[1] [Affirmed in 15 How. (56 U. S.) 62.]

Explanations were also made by Mr. Barnes and Professor Morse.

Before MONROE, District Judge.

The judge occupied several hours in delivering his opinion, in which he stated the different points made by counsel, as well on behalf of the claim to an injunction as the objections of the defendants' counsel. As to the invention, he decided that the evidence was satisfactory to his mind that Morse was the true and original inventor of the telegraph; that the only evidence in regard to Steinheil's invention, (without considering whether it was the same as Morse's or not,) was a publication upon his authority, in September, 1838, in which he stated that he had built his line of telegraph from Munich to Bourgehausen, a distance of six miles, which had been in operation without repairs for more than one year. In regard to the principle of the combined circuit, he was also satisfied that it was invented by him early in 1837; Davy's specification of his invention not being enrolled earlier than January, 1839, after the issue of Morse's French patent, in which the principle was disclosed. As to the alleged alteration in the specification in Morse's first patent, though alleged by defendant in his answer, the evidence failed to establish it; and any question as to the effect of such alteration did not therefore arise, and, if proved, he was not prepared to say that it would vitiate the patent. As to the supposed effect of the patent issued in France upon the patent subsequently issued in this country, none could be perceived, unless the position contended for by defendants' counsel that the application for the patent in this country was altered, and that it should take the date of the alleged alterations, or of the request of Morse to issue the patent on his return from Europe, could be sustained. But if these positions could be sustained, the question would then arise, what would be the effect upon the patent issued for fourteen years, and whether its effect would not be only to limit the operation of the patent to the period of fourteen years from the date of the French patent. As to the general claim in the main patent of Morse, he did not consider the objections of the defendants well grounded; and even if it were too broad, it did not seem to him that the effect upon the validity of the patent would be such as the counsel for defendants contended. Other objections taken by defendants' counsel to the validity of the patents were noticed, and each overruled.

Upon the question of infringement, the judge expressed himself as fully satisfied that the instrument exhibited by the defendants, in its structure and mode of operation, violated the principle of Morse's patent, and the process and means described by Morse in his specifications, and, if the general claim of Morse was invalid, still he was of opinion that infringement was made out. As to the alleged prior use of some things in Morse's second series of patents, he did not find in the evidence any thing to warrant the conclusion that it had been of such character as to affect the validity of the patents. As to the propriety of granting the injunction, it seemed to him upon the whole case that the complainants had shown such ground as required that it should be awarded: first, because they had shown a possession acquiesced in for a long time by the public at large, and for some time recognised and acquiesced in by the defendant, O'Reilly, himself; and that it would be as unjust to refuse an injunction on a case clearly showing a right, as it would be to grant it in a case where no right was shown. The judge said that in some cases he had given to the defendants leave to continue the use of the machine, which was alleged to be used in violation of a patented right of a complainant, upon giving bond and security to account for the profit of the use; but that in this cause he did not deem it proper to do so, and that an absolute injunction would be awarded upon complainants' giving bond and security in the penalty of $5,000, with condition to indemnify defendants against any injury that might accrue to them in case complainant should fail to have the injunction perpetuated.

Injunction absolute awarded.

Remarks on the above case, from the National Intelligencer:

In another portion of this paper will be found an abstract of the decision recently made by the United States district judge in Kentucky, in the case of Morse against O'Reilly for an alleged violation of Morse's patents. More clearly to illustrate the scope of this decision, we have been furnished with the following additional information, viz.:

Morse's first patent, after describing the machinery by which he arrives at his result, concludes as follows, viz.: "I do not propose to limit myself to the specific machinery, or parts of machinery, described in the foregoing specification and claims, the essence of my invention being the use of the motive power of the electric or galvanic current, which I call 'electro-magnetism,' however developed, for making or printing intelligible characters, signs, or letters, at any distances, being a new application of that power of which I claim to be the first inventor or discoverer."

On behalf of Prof. Morse it was maintained that there are two distinct, general classes of patents—

1. Where an inventor has accomplished a result entirely new by any means whatsoever, his patent may secure to him that result, as well as his means of arriving at it. The result in such cases is, in truth, the invention; and if another person can step in and by other means arrive at the same result, he may deprive the inventor of the entire benefit of his study and labor. This is more likely to happen from the notorious fact, that the best system to accomplish a given result is seldom devised at once; and if the result could not be secured by patent, the original inventor would in almost every case be deprived of the benefit from his invention by those who have no other merit but that of devising some improvement in his machinery.

2. The second general class of patents is for new modes of arriving at the old results, in which the result forms no part of the invention. In such cases, patents are for machinery only, or for other processes for arriving at results already well known; and whoever invents a new and improved process may take out a patent for it, and supersede all prior patents for machinery or processes conducive to the same result.

Morse's patents embrace both the result and the process, both being entirely new; and although other persons may invent and patent improved processes or machinery, they cannot use them during the existence of Morse's patent, to produce the same result by the same power, without license from Professor Morse or his assigns. On the other hand, it was maintained that results are not patentable directly or indirectly; that all the patents, to be valid, must be for processes or machinery only. Very numerous authorities, both American and British, were adduced on both sides to sustain their respective positions. The injunction is upon the express ground that Morse's patent covers the result as well as the process, and is nevertheless valid.

[NOTE. The case was taken, on appeal, to the supreme court, where the decree of the circuit court was affirmed, except so much as decreed that the complainants recover costs from the defendants. Accordingly, it was ordered that each party pay his own costs, both in the supreme and circuit courts. Justices Wayne, Nelson, and Grier dissented to the judgment of the court on the question of costs. 15 How. (56 U. S.) 62.]

In equity.

KANE, District Judge. This case is before us on final hearing upon the pleading and proofs. Professor Morse, under whom the complainants hold, has three patents: The first dated 20th June, 1840 [No. 1,647], reissued on the 25th January, 1846 [No. 79], and again reissued on the 13th June, 1848 [No. 117]. It is called the "Magnetic Telegraph Patent." The second, dated 11th April, 1846 [No. 4,453], re-issued on the 13th June, 1848 [No. 118], referred to as the "Local Circuit Patent." The third, dated 1st May, 1849 [No. 6,420], referred to as the "Chemical Patent." The bill charges that the respondents have infringed all three of these patents; the answer denies the infringements, and controverts the validity of the patents.

The objections to the validity of the first patent, are stated in the defendants' brief, as follows: "(1) That it does not run from the date of Morse's French patent. (2) That the commissioner had no authority in law to re-issue a second time. (3) That the claims set out in the first re-issue are broader than the claims in the original patent; and the claims in the second re-issue broader than those of either of the former; and are not for the same invention."

1. The first of these objections founds itself upon the fact that Mr. Morse had obtained a patent in France for this same invention twenty-two months before his patent issued here; and it asserts, that under the 2d proviso of the 6th section of the act of 1839 [5 Stat. 353], his American patent should in consequence have been limited to the term of fourteen years from the date of the French patent; and that being otherwise it is void. Mr. Morse's application for a patent in this country was made in April, 1838, and was filed and acted on in the patent office before the 10th of that month. His French patent bears date the 18th of August following. There is therefore no room for questions, which were argued so elaborately, of the proper interpretation of this proviso in the 6th section of the act of 1839, and the 8th section, 2d clause, of the act of 1836, which was also invoked, in any possible bearing upon the case of Mr. Morse.

2. The second objection to the patent is that the act of congress makes no provision for a second surrender and re-issue. The 13th section of the act of 1836, which provides in certain cases for the surrender of a defective patent, and its re-issue in an amended form, regards the new patent as substituted for the old one, with just the "same effect and operations in law" as if the specification had been filed at first in the form which it takes in the re-issue. It is difficult to see why, if the original patent could be amended, its substitute, having all the legal attributes of the original, cannot be amended also.

3. We pass to the third objection, the supposed variance in the re-issue. It is not the meaning of the law that the patentee who applies for a re-issue must at his peril describe and claim in his new specification, either in words or idea, just what was described and claimed in his old one. His new specification must be of the same invention, and his claim can not embrace a different subject-matter from that which he sought to patent originally. But, unless we narrow down the connection which the statute contemplates till it becomes a mere disclaimer, it is not possible in any case to frame a corrected specification which shall not be broader than the one originally filed. To supply a defect, to repair an insufficiency, is to add—either directly or by modifying or striking out a limitation—in either form the effect is to amplify the proposition; in the case of a specification under the patent laws it is to amplify the description and enlarge the claim.

After a repeated and careful examination of the three specifications, with their respective claims, fully aided by the acumen of highly ingenious counsel, the court has not found any material difference of import between them. Mr. Morse's patent of 1840, in all its changes, asserts his title to two distinct patentable subjects,—the first, founded on the discovery of a new art; the second, on the invention of the means of practicing it.

1. That he was the first to devise and practice the art of recording language at telegraphic distances by the dynamic force of the electro-magnet, or, indeed by any agency whatever, is, to our minds, plain upon all the evidence. Mr. Morse's patent of 1846, as re-issued in 1848, claims the local or independent circuit in these words: "The employment in a certain telegraphic circuit, of a device or contrivance called the 'receiving magnet,' in combination with a short local independent circuit or circuits, each having a register and registering magnet, or other magnetic contrivances for registering, and sustaining such a relation to the registering magnet or other contrivances for registering, and to the length of circuit of telegraphic line as will enable me to obtain, with the aid of a main galvanic battery and circuit, and the intervention of a local battery and circuit, such motion or power for registering as could not be obtained otherwise without the use of a much larger galvanic battery, if at all."

It is beyond controversy that the local circuit patent has been infringed upon at some of the stations of the respondents' line; and it is the opinion of the court that it is also violated whenever the branch circuit of Mr. Rogers is employed. We have not been able to see the asserted difference in principle between the two devices. Both are equally well described as branch or as local circuits. They have the same purpose; they effect it by the same instrumentality, even in appearance to great degree; and they seem to vary only in this: that the one derives its electric fluid from a battery placed within a line of the main circuit; the other from a battery placed without it. The change may be for the better; or it may not; if it be, it is patentable as an improvement; but it can not be used without Mr. Morse's license, until after his patent has expired.

The third patent is for the chemical telegraph. The subject of it is clearly within the original patent of Mr. Morse, if we have correctly apprehended the legal interpretation and effect of that instrument. We will only say that we do not hold it to have been invalidated by the decision of the learned chief justice of the District of Columbia on the question of interference. The forms of the two machines before were not the same; and the leading principle of both having been already appropriated and secured by the magnetic telegraph patent of 1840, nothing remained but form to be the subject of interference.

MORSE FOUNTAIN PEN CO. v. ESTERBROOK STEEL PEN MANUF'G CO.

[3 Fish. Pat. Cas. 515.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. March, 1869.

INJUNCTION — PRELIMINARY — ADMISSION BY DEFENDANT—PATENTS—INFRINGEMENT—ESTOPPEL.

1. A verbal admission of infringement, and a promise to desist, is a strong circumstance against the defendant upon a motion for a preliminary injunction.

2. In the case of simple mechanism, a bare inspection is sufficient upon the question of infringement presented upon a motion for preliminary injunction.

3. The grant of a subsequent patent serves merely to indicate the opinion which highly respectable officers had formed on an ex parte examination of the subject. If the infringement be clear, an injunction should be granted, notwithstanding such patent.

4. Where defendants were making a pen which was afterward patented, and which, in their answer, they declared to be a new and useful improvement in the art of making pens known or existing at and prior to the invention thereof by the patentee, and where the complainant's pen and the defendants' pen were substantially the same: Held, that the defendants were estopped by their answer from averring by affidavits that pens substantially the same as their own or the complainants', had been made before the invention of either.

In equity. This was a motion for a provisional injunction to restrain the defendants from infringing letters patent [No. 73,255] for an "improvement in pens," granted to William A. Morse, January 14, 1868, and assigned to complainants. The invention consists in making the pen in two parts, consisting of a shank to fit the pen-holder, with a projecting tongue which unites it with the other portion of the pen containing the point. The union is formed by passing the tongue of the first part through a loop in the second, and then curving the end so as to form a chamber for the retention of a supply of ink. The claim of the patent was as follows: "I claim a fountain union pen made of two parts, A C and F, the same being adjustable and connected substantially as described and shown for the purpose specified."

J. B. Dayton and Henry Baldwin, Jr., for complainants.

Jonathan Marshall and George Harding, for defendants.

FIELD, District Judge. This is an application for a preliminary injunction to restrain the infringement of a patent for an improved fountain pen. The bill is in the usual form, setting forth the issuing of the patent, use and exclusive possession; and the infringement. It is sworn to by William A. Morse and Semmy Rosenthal, who compose the Morse Fountain Pen Company. Morse being the original patentee, and Rosenthal having acquired an interest in the patent to the extent of one-half, by assignment. Two affidavits have also been produced and read on the part of the complainants, in support of the application. One is by William A. Morse, the patentee. He states, among other things, that when he applied for his patent, he was familiar with the various kinds of steel pens in the market, and that there was not to his knowledge any such thing as a fountain pen amongst them. That when he put his pen into the market, he found the usual difficulty in introducing a novelty, but had gradually overcome it, and that now the demand for his pens was large and steadily increasing, and they had become a regularly recognized article in the stationers' trade. That in July, 1868, he first encountered a pen which he plainly saw to be a mere imitation of his patented pen; that upon inquiry he learned that it came from the Esterbrook Factory, at Camden, New Jersey. That he promptly wrote to them that the pen they were manufacturing was an infringement upon his patent, and unless they desisted from making it he would commence suit against them; that thereupon Mr. Richard Esterbrook, Sen., came over to Philadelphia to see him, and after examining his letters patent said it was plain to him that the pens they were making were an infringement of that patent, and that they would make no more of them unless Mr. Goodspeed, for whom they made them, would obtain a license from him, and that they would write to Mr. Goodspeed to that effect; that after this interview the defendants ceased making these pens; that it was not until November, 1868, that deponent became aware they had resumed the manufacture of them; that he again wrote to them to the same effect that he had done in July, and that the only answer he received was one stating that they were manufacturing those pens for Mr. Goodspeed, of New York, and that he had indemnified them, and that the question of infringement, therefore, was one with which they had nothing whatever to do. The other affidavit is by John Turner. He says he is one of the firm of Warrington & Co., steel pen manufacturers, Philadelphia; that he has been a pen-maker in England and in this country for about thirty years; that he has examined the letters patent granted to William A. Morse, January 14, 1868, for an improvement in pens, and believes he understands the invention therein described and specified; that he has also examined the two pens annexed to his affidavit and marked "Goodspeed's Fountain, No. 1 Patent," and "Goodspeed's Fountain, No. 2 Patent," and is of opinion that these two pens embody the improvement described and specified in Morse's said patent, each of them being a fountain pen, consisting of two parts, one of which parts is an ordinary pen, provided with slots or perforations, and raised edges to such slots so as to hold and retain the other part, which other part serves to retain the ink, or acts as a fountain, and is adjustable in the slots, all substantially as described in said letters patent; that his firm was at one time employed in manufacturing Goodspeed's pens, but being notified that such pens were an infringement of Morse's patent, and that they were liable to prosecution therefor, they examined the matter, and being satisfied that such pens did infringe Morse's patent, they advised Mr. Goodspeed, that they could not make any more of them, and discontinued making them accordingly.

Thus a very clear and strong case for an injunction has been made by the complainants. Has this been overcome by the affidavits which have been produced upon the part of the defendants? It has first been attempted to neutralize the effect of the affidavits of Morse and Turner, to which I have referred. For this purpose an affidavit of Richard Esterbrook, Senior, has been offered. He does not deny any of the statements made by Morse, in his affidavit, but says, when he expressed the opinion that the pen the defendants were making for Goodspeed, was an infringement of the Morse patent, he was under the impression that the complainants had a patent for the pen which was exhibited to him by Morse, and marked "Morse Fountain Pen Co., Patented January 14, 1868," but he has since "learned that the complainants have no patent for such pen." How or when he learned this fact he does not say; nor does he explain how or in what respect the pen so exhibited to him, differs from the pen patented by Morse. He also states, that at the time when this conversation with Morse took place, the pen, which he was manufacturing for Goodspeed, and to which reference was made, was marked "Goodspeed's Golden Pen, No. 1," and was like the one attached to his affidavit. Now does he mean to say that the pen which he is now making for Goodspeed, differs materially from the one he was then making, and that although the former was an infringement of the complainants' patent, the latter is not? He does not say so expressly, but this would seem to be a fair inference from his language. Unless he means this, I do not see the force or bearing of this part of his affidavit. But if this be his meaning, where is the evidence that the pens he was then making for Goodspeed, differ in any essential respect from those he is now making. And if this is what he means to say now, why was no reference to this fact made in his letter to the complainants of the 12th of February, 1869. It would have been so easy and so natural for him to have said, "the pens I am now making for Goodspeed are not the same as those I formerly made, and I do not consider them an infringement of your patent." But instead of saying this, or anything like it, he puts himself entirely upon the ground that as the defendants were manufacturing for Goodspeed, and were indemnified by him, they had no interest in the question of infringement.

The fact then sworn to by Morse stands uncontradicted, that Esterbrook, in July last, after examining Morse's letters patent, did admit that the pens that the defendants were then manufacturing for Goodspeed, were an infringement of that patent, and that he promised to desist from making them. And the attempt he now makes to break the force of this admission is certainly not a very successful one. When he made this admission, he was manufacturing pens for Goodspeed, and his interest would have made him desire to reach a different conclusion. At that time he could have had no doubt whatever upon the subject. His attention was particularly called to the matter; he examined the letters patent of Morse, and said it was clear the pens he was making were an infringement of that patent. Had his opinion undergone any change as late as the 12th of February, when he wrote the letter annexed to Morse's affidavit, and after he had resumed the manufacture of pens for Goodspeed? Certainly, if it had, he would have said so. The only reason he assigned for making these pens, after he had promised he would discontinue to do so, was that Goodspeed had indemnified him. It is but fair to presume he had no other.

Then we have another affidavit of John Turner, the same witness whose affidavit of February 24, 1869, was produced by the complainant. His first affidavit, as we have seen, was very full and explicit. He not only expresses a decided opinion that Goodspeed's pens are an infringement of the Morse patent, but he assigns such reasons for that opinion, that it is manifest he perfectly understood the nature and extent of Morse's patent, and the invention therein described, and that Goodspeed's pens did embody the same improvement therein specified. Now, he says that the pen referred to in his former affidavit, and which he concluded infringed Morse's patent, was a pen similar to the one attached to his second affidavit, and marked Goodspeed's pen. The same remark that was made as to Esterbrook's affidavit applies to this. If it means anything to the purpose, it means that the pens which the defendants are now making for Goodspeed, are essentially different from those which the firm of Warrington & Co., of which Turner was a member, were making at the time referred to in his affidavit. But there is no evidence to show that this is the case. At all events, he has not attempted to explain wherein that difference consists. There is, I think, therefore, in this affidavit nothing to weaken the force of the clear and positive statement made by him in his former one.

A number of other affidavits have been read on the part of the defendants; it is not necessary to go into a detailed examination of them. One of them is by Goodspeed, who although not nominally a party to this suit, yet is virtually the defendant. The others are by men who represent themselves to be penmakers, and who certainly express the opinion that the pens which the defendants are manufacturing for Goodspeed, are no infringement of Morse's patent. Edward Smith, for instance, says, that he has read a certified copy of the letters-patent granted to Morse; that he has also examined the pen marked "Goodspeed's Fountain, No. 1 Patent," and is of opinion that this pen does not embody the improvements described and specified in said letters-patent. And yet this witness is one of the firm of Warrington & Co., who were at one time employed in making pens for Goodspeed, but who, as Turner states, upon being satisfied that these pens were an infringement of Morse's patent, advised Mr. Goodspeed that they could not make any more of them. But the answer to all these affidavits is, that we have the pens before us, and can examine and compare them. And, although no doubt there are cases where such a comparison would involve more than the usual amount of mechanical knowledge, and might not therefore be satisfactory, yet it appears to me that in a matter so simple as this, a bare inspection of the pens patented by the complainants, and made by them, and the pens manufactured by the defendants, must be sufficient to satisfy any one that they are substantially the same pens. They may vary in form. The pen made by the defendants may in some respects be a better pen than that made by the complainants, but it embodies the same improvement as that described and specified in Morse's patent. What is this improvement? It is a fountain pen, which will hold a larger quantity of ink than pens formerly in use. It consists of two parts, one of which is an ordinary pen, provided with slots or perforations, and raised edges to such slots so as to hold the other part, which other part serves to retain the ink and acts as a fountain, and is adjustable in the slots. The invention, as described in the specifications, is not confined to this particular form of connecting the two parts, but it consists of a fountain union pen, made in two parts, the same being adjustable, and connected substantially as therein specified. Now where is the difference between the pen patented by the complainants, and described in the specification, and that made by the defendants? I can see none. Whether the fountain part or reservoir attachment is applied to the inside of the pen or to the back of it, can make no essential difference; for, as we have seen, the invention is not confined to any particular form of connecting the two parts. The variations between them are in form only, and not in substance. The improvement embodied in both is the same.

But it is said that Goodspeed has applied for a patent for his pen, and we have the affidavit of Mr. Frazer, who states that he has been employed by Goodspeed to obtain letters patent for his improvement on fountain pens; that the application was filed in the patent office on the 10th of June, 1868; that it was partially allowed on the 24th of that month; that it has since been pending in appeal until the 25th of February, when the patent was fully allowed, and went to issue; and that he is informed by the proper official clerk of the patent office, that the said patent will issue and bear date on the 9th day of March, instant. But suppose the patent had already been issued to Goodspeed; as said by Judge Kane, in case of Wilson v. Barnum [Case No. 17,787], the grant of a subsequent patent serves merely to indicate the opinion which highly respectable officers had formed on an ex parte examination of the subject, but was not conclusive, or even prima facie evidence. In that case, the judge being well satisfied of the fact of infringement, granted an interlocutory injunction, although a majority of the experts examined thought there was no infringement.

Let an injunction issue until the further order of the court.

A motion to dissolve the injunction was subsequently argued, which was denied in July, 1869. The opinion of the court was in substance as follows:

FIELD, District Judge. In the case of Morse Pen Co. v. Esterbrook Steel Pen Manufacturing Co., the motion to dissolve the injunction is denied. I have decided the case upon this point. In granting the injunction, I hold, that the pen patented by Morse was substantially the same pen with that which the defendants were manufacturing for Goodspeed. I may have been mistaken in that opinion, but I still adhere to it. If that opinion be correct, of course the motion to dissolve must be denied. For the answer of the defendants avers that Goodspeed has obtained a patent for the pens which the defendants were manufacturing for him, and that such pens were a new and useful improvement in the art of making pens, known or existing at and prior to the invention thereof by Goodspeed. If this be so, then the Goodspeed pen is a substantially different pen from that referred to in the affidavits read upon the part of the defendants. If the pen then patented by Morse be substantially the same pen as that which the defendants were making for Goodspeed, and for which he has obtained a patent, the defendants are precluded from averring that it is the pen referred to in the affidavits.

COLLISION—DUTY OF TUGS IN THE ARRANGEMENT AND MANAGEMENT OF TOWS—PLEADINGS—AMENDMENTS.

1. A tug is bound to the exercise of ordinary care in taking up, arranging and managing the tow.

2. Having full control of the vessels towed, she must direct as to the length of their lines, the order in which they shall be towed, and prudence requires that the heavier draft vessels should be placed behind those of lighter draft.

[Cited in Orhanovich v. The America, 4 Fed. 340.]

3. The tug is bound to know the channel, and to keep the tow in the deepest water.

4. If the ordinary lights or landmarks are obscured, the tug should provide for the emergency by slowing or stopping the engine, and sounding the channel.

[Cited in The Armstrong, Case No. 540.]

5. The vessel towed is bound to prevent a collision, if she can, or to make the damages as light as possible.

6. The allegations and proofs must coincide; and the court cannot consider evidence not in accordance with the issues made by the parties.

7. The court will allow amendments upon terms even on the hearing of an appeal.

Libel for collision. On the 30th of June, 1863, the tug Morton, Kimball master, was coming down St. Clair river, having in tow the four following vessels in their order: Superior, drawing 11 ft. 4 in., Chase master; Vanguard, 10 ft. 4 in., Davis master; Yankee and Bermuda. At sundown, they passed Jerry's Ranch and the range lights on the flats just after they were lighted. Before passing the lights, the Superior and Vanguard, which were carrying part of their sails, took all the sails in. The depth of water on the flats at the time and during the season was 12 ft. 6 in. or more, and vessels of that draft constantly went through in safety. The deepest water was to the westward of the range. The tug, before reaching the end of the dredged channel, got too far to the eastward and stranded the Superior. The master of the Superior sang out to the Vanguard an order to starboard and then to port. The latter order was immediately obeyed by the Vanguard. The tow line from the Superior to the Vanguard was about thirty fathoms long or the usual length. The Vanguard swung slowly, and struck the starboard quarter of the Superior with the bluff of her port bow, and drove her over the shallow place into deep water, and caused the injury complained of. The tug gave the vessel no warning and did not sound the channel or slow, stop or back her engine. The captain, mate and wheelsman were attending to the navigation of the tug. She had no lookout stationed forward. On the trial in the district court, the libel was dismissed, and the case appealed.

J. S. Newberry, for appellant.
W. A. Moore, for appellee.

SWAYNE, Circuit Justice (orally). In this case it is alleged on the part of the libellants: That there is no issue tendered by the pleadings as to any fault committed by the Vanguard, and no fault charged upon the Superior as to her conduct; that the proofs taken in regard to an issue not tendered by the pleadings are inadmissible, and should not be considered by the court.

The rule is well settled, that the allegations and proofs must coincide, and that the court cannot look outside of the pleadings to consider evidence not in accordance with the issues made by the parties. 2 Conk. Adm. 245–250; McKinley v. Morrish, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 343; The Rhode Island [Case No. 11,745]; Soule v. Rodocanachi [Id. 13,178]; The Boston [Id. 1,673]; The Sarah Ann [Id. 12,342]. It is equally well settled, that in order that substantial justice may be done, the court will allow amendments to be made, even at the hearing of an appeal, taking care that no injury be done to either party. And in case injury should be likely to ensue from allowing amendments, the case would be continued, to allow the party to take such evidence as he might deem material on the new issue. Id.; The Boston [supra].

In the view I shall take of this case, however, it will not be necessary to continue the case, but I shall consider the evidence precisely as if the amendments that the party might make were already made. In regard to the responsibility of tugs, when taking other vessels in tow, we hold that they are bound to use ordinary care and diligence in taking up, arranging and managing the tow, according to the exigencies of the business. That while engaged in such business, tugs, as well as passenger steamboats, are bound to have a competent lookout properly stationed and vigilantly employed. That in this case it is not certain that the collision was occasioned by the absence of such lookout. That the tug has the full government and care of the vessels towed; she must direct as to length of lines; the order in which they shall be towed; that good management and common prudence require that the heaviest draft vessel should be placed aft of those of lighter draft; and had that precaution been observed in the present case, the present collision would not have taken place. That ordinary care on the part of the tug requires them to know the channels through which they undertake to tow vessels, and where it appears there was a good draft of water, the tug is bound to keep in it. In this case there was 12 ft. 5 in., while the Superior was drawing only 11 ft. 6 in. Vessels drawing 12 ft. 4 in. went through that channel in safety the same day. It is clear that the tug got too far to the eastward, and thereby stranded the Superior, and was in fault therefor. Again, if for any reason the ordinary ranges, lights or landmarks are obscured, it is clearly the duty of the tug to take such other precautions as may be necessary, either by slowing, stopping or backing the engine, or sounding the channel. She has no right to dash blindly ahead, and rush into dangers she neither knows nor can avoid. The Rose, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 3; The Birkenhead, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 76, 81; The Perth, 3 Hagg. Adm. 414; Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 548.

Upon these considerations we hold the tug in fault, and grossly so. But this would not necessarily make the tug liable for the entire damages, for the Superior may also be in fault. The vessel in tow had also duties to perform. She is bound to prevent the collision if she can; and if she cannot, then she is bound to make the damages as light as possible. This is a rule of universal law. Abb. Shipp. 154, 341; Heckscher v. McCrea, 24 Wend. 304; Taylor v. Read, 4 Paige, 571; Emerson v. Howland [Case No. 4,441]; Miller v. Mariner's Church, 7 Greenl. 51. It is alleged that the master of the Superior gave the order first "starboard," then "port," and that the master of the Vanguard repeated the orders in the same way. The experts show very clearly that the proper order in this case was "port," and that the contradictory orders would probably lead to confusion. Yet Davis, the master of the Vanguard, and others, swear that the orders were given in instantaneous succession, and that the only order obeyed on his vessel was the order to "port;" that the helm was immediately put to port.

In considering the weight of evidence, it is a well settled and sound principle of construction that the direct evidence of what was done on one vessel is of much greater weight than the hypothetical evidence of experts or others giving their opinions as to what was done. Even if it was shown that a wrong order was given and obeyed, either on the Superior or Vanguard (which is not shown, however), under the exigency of the circumstances and light of authority, it could not be considered a fault. The Genesee Chief, 12 How. [53 U. S.] 461. We can find no fault on the part of the Superior or the Vanguard. But even in this case, were there fault on the part of the Vanguard, it would not prevent a recovery on the part of the owners of the Superior. The New Philadelphia, 1 Black [66 U. S.] 62. The decree below must be reversed, and the cause referred to a commissioner to compute the damages.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 1, 1862.

PATENTS—PATENTABILITY—DISCOVERY—MEANS OF USING—INVENTION—NATURAL ANIMAL FUNCTIONS.

1. At common law, an inventor has no exclusive right to his invention or discovery. Such right is the creature of the statute, to which he must look, to see if the right, claimed in a given case, is within its terms.

2. In its naked ordinary sense, a discovery is not patentable. A discovery of a new principle, force, or law, operating or which can be made to operate on matter, will not entitle the discoverer to a patent.

[Cited in Celluloid Manuf'g Co. v. Frederick Crane Chemical Co., 36 Fed. 113.]

3. It is only when the explorer has gone beyond the mere domain of discovery, and has laid hold of the new principle, force, or law, and connected it with some particular medium or mechanical contrivance, by which, or through which, it acts on the material world, that he can secure the exclusive control of it under the patent laws.

[Cited in Burke v. Partridge, 58 N. H. 352.]

4. He controls the discovery through the means by which he has brought it into practical action or their equivalent. It is then an invention although it embraces a discovery.

5. A discovery may be the soul of an invention, but it can not be the subject of the exclusive control of the patentee, or the patent law, until it inhabits a body, no more than can a disembodied spirit be subjected to the control of human laws.

6. The application of ether to surgical purposes was an effect produced by old agents operating by old means upon old subjects. The effect alone was new, and was a mere discovery; which, however novel and important, is not patentable.

7. The principles upon which the law of patents are founded are fixed, and uninfluenced by shades and degrees of comparative merit. They secure to the inventor a monopoly in the manufacture, use, and sale of very humble contrivances, of limited usefulness, the fruits of indifferent skill and trifling ingenuity, as well as those grander products of his genius which confer renown on himself and extensive and lasting benefits on society. But they are inadequate to the protection of every discovery, by securing its exclusive control to the explorer to whose eye it may be first disclosed.

8. Neither the natural functions of an animal upon which, or through which, the new force or principle may be designed to operate, nor any of the useful purposes to which it may be applied, can form any essential parts of a patentable combination with it, however they may illustrate and establish its usefulness.

[9. Cited in De la Vergne Refrigerating Mach. Co. v. Featherstone, 49 Fed. 917, to the point that the power of the commissioner of patents to issue patents, and the effect of them, are carefully defined by statute. By defining the conditions under which the power it confers shall be exercised, it necessarily excludes all others, except perhaps the correction of its own clerical errors.]

This was a motion for a new trial. An action on the case to recover damages for an infringement of letters patent [No. 4,848] for an "improvement in surgical operations," granted to plaintiff as assignee of Charles T. Jackson and William T. G. Morton, November 12, 1846, tried before Judge Shipman and a jury, had resulted, under the instructions of the court, in a verdict for the defendants. The patent was for the well-known and valuable discovery of the effect of sulphuric ether in producing nervous quiet and insensibility to pain, especially during surgical operations. The questions arising upon this patent, and discussed in the opinion of the court, are so important that the specification is given in full: "Be it known that we, Charles T. Jackson and William T. G. Morton, of Boston, in the county of Suffolk, and state of Massachusetts, have invented or discovered a new and useful improvement in surgical operations on animals, whereby we are enabled to accomplish many, if not all, operations such as are usually attended with more or less pain and suffering, without any, or with very little pain to, or muscular action of, persons who undergo the same; and we do hereby declare that the following is a full and exact description of our said invention or discovery: It is well known to chemists that when alcohol is submitted to distillation with certain acids, peculiar compounds, termed 'ethers,' are formed, each of which is usually distinguished by the name of the acid employed in its preparation. It has, also, been known that the vapors of some, if not all of these chemical distillations, particularly those of sulphuric ether, when breathed or introduced into the lungs of an animal, have produced a peculiar effect upon its nervous system; one which has been supposed to be analogous to what is termed intoxication. It has never (to our knowledge) been known until our discovery, that the inhalation of such vapors (particularly those of sulphuric ether) would produce insensibility to pain, or such a state of quiet of nervous action as to render a person or animal incapable, to a great extent, if not entirely, of experiencing pain while under the action of the knife, or other instrument of operation of a surgeon calculated to produce pain. This is our discovery; and the combining it with, or applying it to, any operation of surgery, for the purpose of alleviating animal suffering, as well as of enabling a surgeon to conduct his operation with little or no struggling, or muscular action of the patient, and with more certainty of success, constitutes our invention. The nervous quiet and insensibility to pain produced on a person is generally of short duration; the degree or extent of it, or time which it lasts, depends on the amount of etherial vapor received into the system, and the constitutional character of the person to whom it is administered. Practice will soon acquaint an experienced surgeon with the amount of etheric vapor to be administered to persons for the accomplishment of the surgical operation or operations required in their respective cases. For the extraction of a tooth, the individual may be thrown into the insensible state, generally speaking, only a few minutes. For the removal of a tumor, or the performance of the amputation of a limb, it is necessary to regulate the amount of vapor inhaled to the time required to complete the operation. Various modes may be adopted for conveying the etheric vapor into the lungs. A very simple one is to saturate a piece of cloth or sponge with sulphuric ether, and place it to the nostrils or mouth, so that the person may inhale the vapors. A more effective one is to take a glass, or other proper vessel, like a common bottle or flask. Place in it a sponge saturated with sulphuric ether. Let there be a hole made through the side of the vessel for the admission of atmospheric air (which hole may or may not be provided with a valve opening downward, or so as to allow air to pass into the vessel), a valve on the outside of the neck opening upward, and another valve in the neck and between the last mentioned and the body of the vessel or flask, which latter valve in the neck should open toward the mouth of the neck or bottle. The extremity of the neck is to be placed in the mouth of the patient, and his nostrils stopped or closed in such a manner as to cause him to inhale air through the bottle, and to exhale it through the neck and out of the valve on the outside of the neck. The air thus breathed, by passing in contact with the sponge, will be charged with the etheric vapors, which will be conveyed by it into the lungs of the patient. This will soon produce the state of insensibility or nervous quiet required. In order to render the ether agreeable to various persons, we often combine it with one or more essential oils having pleasant perfumes. This may be effected by mixing the ether and essential oil, and washing the mixture in water. The impurities will subside, and the ether, impregnated with the perfume, will rise to the top of the water. We sometimes combine a narcotic preparation, such as opium or morphine, with the ether. This may be done by any ways known to chemists by which a combination of etheric and narcotic vapors may be produced. After a person has been put into the state of insensibility as above described, a surgical operation may be performed upon him without, so far as repeated experiments have proved, giving to him any apparent or real pain, or so little in comparison to that produced by the usual process of conducting surgical operations, as to be scarcely noticeable. There is very nearly, if not entire, absence of all pain. Immediately or soon after the operation is completed, a restoration of the patient to his usual feeling takes place, without, generally speaking, his having been sensible of the performance of the operation. From the experiments we have made, we are led to prefer the vapors of sulphuric ether to those of muriatic or other kind of ether, but any such may be employed which will properly produce the state of insensibility without any injurious consequences to the patient. We are fully aware that narcotics have been administered to patients undergoing surgical operations, as we believe, always by introducing them into the stomach. This we consider in no respect to embody our invention, as we operate through the lungs and air passages, and the effects produced upon the patient are entirely, or so far different as to render the one of very little, while the other is of immense, utility. The consequences of the change are very considerable, as an immense amount of human or animal suffering can be prevented by the application of our discovery. What we claim as our invention is the hereinbefore described means by which we are enabled to effect the above highly important improvement in surgical operations, viz.: by combining therewith the application of ether, or the vapor thereof, substantially as above specified. In testimony whereof, we have hereto set our signatures, this twenty-seventh day of October, A. D. 1846. Charles T. Jackson. William T. G. Morton. Witnesses: R. H. Eddy, W. H. Leighton."

S. D. Cozzens and C. M. Keller, for plaintiff.

E. H. Owen and B. D. Silliman, for defendants.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is an action at law, brought to recover damages for the infringement of a well-known patent. The case came on to be heard at a prior term of this court, before a jury, and after some testimony had been taken tending to show an infringement by the defendants, the court, having doubts as to the validity of the patent, arrested the hearing of the evidence, and directed the counsel to argue the question of law arising on the face of the specification. This question—as will be obvious, at once, to any one familiar with the law of patents who reads the specification—is, is the subject matter of the alleged invention patentable? The question, after argument, was decided in the negative, and the patent was declared void. The same question is now again presented, on a motion for a new trial, before a full court.

The point is one of substance and not of form. It was discussed as such, and will be so decided. Any criticisms which we may make on the language of the specification, will be made only for the purpose of dealing with the subject which that language envelops; and, if at any time we appear to discard the phraseology of the instrument, it will not be because we complain of its terms, but only for the reason that we desire to strip the alleged invention and present it naked for consideration.

At common law an inventor has no exclusive right to his invention or discovery. That exclusive right is the creature of the statute, and to that we must look to see if the right claimed in a given case is within its terms. The act of congress provides, "that any person or persons having discovered or invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter not known or used by others before his or their discovery or invention thereof, and not, at the time of his application for a patent, in public use, or on sale with his consent or allowance as the inventor or discoverer," shall be entitled to receive a patent therefor. The true field of inquiry, in the present case, is to ascertain whether or not the alleged invention, set forth in this specification, is embraced within the scope of the act. Very little light can be shed on our path by attempting to draw a practical distinction between the legal purport of the words "discovery" and "invention." In its naked ordinary sense, a discovery is not patentable. A discovery of a new principle, force, or law operating, or which can be made to operate, on matter, will not entitle the discoverer to a patent. It is only where the explorer has gone beyond the mere domain of discovery, and has laid hold of the new principle, force, or law, and connected it with some particular medium or mechanical contrivance by which, or through which, it acts on the material world, that he can secure the exclusive control of it under the patent laws. He then controls his discovery through the means by which he has brought it into practical action, or their equivalent, and only through them. It is then an invention, although it embraces a discovery. Sever the force or principle discovered from the means or mechanism through which he has brought it into the domain of invention, and it immediately falls out of that domain and eludes his grasp. It is then a naked discovery, and not an invention.

These remarks are not made for the purpose of laying down sweeping general propositions. We are too well aware of the futility, or, we might say, mischief, of that practice of expounding the law of patents, to embark in it. But these suggestions are submitted for the purpose of showing the relation of the terms "discovery" and "invention," and especially the dependence of the former upon the latter, as used in the statute. Every invention may, in a certain sense, embrace more or less of discovery, for it must always include something that is new; but it by no means follows that every discovery is an invention. It may be the soul of an invention, but it can not be the subject of the exclusive control of the patentee, or the patent law, until it inhabits a body, no more than can a disembodied spirit be subjected to the control of human laws.

Now, that this patent contains the record of a discovery, there can be no doubt. And it is equally clear that, in a certain sense, it was new at or about the date of the patent. It is important here to ascertain precisely what that discovery was. It is described in general terms, in the first paragraph of the specification, to be "a new and useful improvement in surgical operations on animals." This is, at best, vague—not from any fault of the person who drafted the schedule, but from the inherent difficulties of his task, and the imperfect nature of human language as an instrument of thought. But we can clearly gather from the paper itself what the discovery was; and we are aided in this by those parts of the specification which state what was old and well known. The second paragraph recites: "It is well known to chemists that when alcohol is submitted to distillation with certain acids, peculiar compounds, termed 'ethers,' are formed, each of which is usually distinguished by the name of the acid employed in its preparation." The origin and existence of ethers, those wonderful agents that produce a harmless insensibility to pain, formed no part of the discovery. No one of them was brought to light by these patentees, for they were all well known before. The same paragraph further sets forth that "it has also been known that the vapors of some, if not all, of these chemical distillations, particularly those of sulphuric ether, when breathed or introduced into the lungs of an animal, have produced a peculiar effect on the nervous system, one which has been supposed to be analogous to what is usually termed intoxication." It was not, then, the fact that these vapors could be introduced into the air-passages and lungs that was discovered. This was as old as respiration, or, at least, as old as the existence of the vapors. Neither was it discovered that, when inhaled, these vapors produced an effect like that of intoxication, exhilaration, and more or less stupefaction. This, too, had long been known.

The next paragraph distinctly sets forth the real discovery that was made, namely, that this well-known inhalation of well-known agents (in increased quantities) would produce a state of the animal analogous to complete intoxication accompanied with total insensibility to pain. It appropriately adds: "This is our discovery." It is not important to inquire here whether this was the discovery of an increased and more perfect effect, the same in kind with that already well known, or whether it was the discovery of an entirely new effect. The effect discovered was produced by old agents, operating by old means upon old subjects. The effect alone was new, and to that only can the term "discovery" apply. That this mere discovery, however novel and important, is not patentable, needs neither argument nor authority to prove. This the specification impliedly concedes, for after thus clearly setting forth the discovery, a struggle is made to grapple it to something in active existence, and thus make the two, in this new special relation, a patentable invention. This is done by "combining it with, or applying it to, any surgical operation." "This is our invention." The beneficial effects described as resulting from the application, refer merely to the utility of the alleged invention, which is not in question, and may, therefore, be laid out of the case. The object of this combining the discovery with, or applying it to, surgical operations, is apparent. It was to shelter the discovery under those terms of the patent act which protect "any new and useful improvement on any art." It was clearly not the discovery or invention of an "art," or "machine," or "manufacture," or "composition of matter." Nor was it an "improvement" on any one of the last three. It was, therefore, called, in substance, an improvement in the art of surgery. But we can not change a thing by a name. In a certain general sense, it is an improvement in the art of surgery. So would the invention of a new and useful lancet, saw, forceps, or bandage be an improvement on the same art. But the patent securing the exclusive sale or use of such an instrument must rest exclusively upon the novelty of its construction. It could borrow no element of patentability from the art in which it was designed to be used, except merely the element of utility. Of this latter the art would furnish the test. Now this discovery of the effect of ether on the patient, in holding him motionless and insensible during the operation, has the same legal relation to the art of surgery that a machine or other mechanical contrivance for holding him would have. It holds him better, stiller, and with less discomfort and danger to himself than any mechanism could; but its office is to hold and protect the patient. It has no other relation to, or connection with, the art of the surgeon. We use the word "protect" as applied to the patient in the largest sense, and as including not only exemption from pain during the operation, but also from the shock which such operations often give the system. The only legal quality or aid, then, which this alleged invention can draw from the art with which it is connected in the specification, is that which relates to its utility. Of this it supplies undoubted evidence. The eminent surgeons who testified on the trial concurred in stating that its usefulness could not be overrated. We must, then, leaving the art of surgery to supply the evidence of its utility, contemplate the discovery as separated from the use to which it is applied. At this point the patent breaks down; for the specification presents nothing new except the effect produced by well-known agents, administered in well-known ways on well-known subjects. This new or additional effect is not produced by any new instrument by which the agent is administered, nor by any different application of it to the body of the patient. It is simply produced by increasing the quantity of the vapor inhaled. And even this quantity is to be regulated by the discretion of the operator, and may vary with the susceptibilities of the patient to its influence. It is nothing more, in the eye of the law, than the application of a well-known agent, by well-known means, to a new or more perfect use, which is not sufficient to support a patent.

But it was insisted on the argument that the claim at the close of the specification when properly understood, disclosed the true character of the invention, and furnished ground upon which the patent can stand. This clause declares, that "what we claim as our invention is the hereinbefore-described means by which we are enabled to effect the above highly important improvement in surgical operations, viz: by combining therewith the application of ether, or the vapor thereof, substantially as above described." The plaintiff's counsel insists that the true reading of the claim, in the light of the preceding part of the specification is not that which asserts a combination of the discovery with surgical operations, but rather an application of the discovery to surgical operations by the means described; "and that the means described, and the only means described, are the process of rendering the system insensible to pain by the inhalation of ether." But we do not discover that this exposition of the claim relieves the difficulty. What is the process which is here set forth? The process of inhalation of the vapor, and nothing else. To couple with it the effect produced by calling it a process of rendering the system insensible to pain, is merely to connect the results with the means. The means, that is the process of inhalation of vapors, existed among the animals of the geologic ages preceding the creation of our race. That process, in connection with these vapors, is as old as the vapors themselves. We come, therefore, to the same point, only by a different road. We have, after all, only a new or more perfect effect of a well-known chemical agent, operating through one of the ordinary functions of animal life.

It is curious and instructive to observe the perpetual struggle in the specification to draw from the surgical operation some support to the patent beyond that of its utility. "We are fully aware," says the paragraph immediately preceding the claim, "that narcotics have been administered to patients undergoing surgical operations, and, as we believe, always by introducing them into the stomach. This we consider in no respect to embody our invention, as we operate through the lungs and air-passages." An examination of this single passage in the specification will demonstrate the impossibility of sustaining this patent on any grounds known to the law. Now, suppose these agents had been fluids instead of elastic vapors, and their effect had been known, when taken into the stomach, to be the same as that now long known to have resulted from their inhalation, viz: a state of partial intoxication: would the discovery that an increased quantity of the fluid produced a more perfect effect, by rendering intoxication complete, accompanied with total insensibility to pain, have rendered the discovery patentable? We think clearly not. In this view of the subject, we here lay out of the case the application of the new effect to surgical operations. We will allude to that again in a moment. Now, a precisely parallel case is presented, by the actual facts before us, to the one just supposed. The inhalation of the ethers had long been known. By increasing their quantity it was discovered that a new or more complete effect was produced, by which the subject was rendered wholly insensible. This can be no more patentable than the discovery that the increased quantity of liquors, taken into the stomach, would produce a like result. In both cases there is only a naked discovery of a new effect, resulting from a well-known agent, working by a well-known process. This effect is a temporary suspension of sensibility and motion in the animal body. Here, what is new in the alleged invention begins and ends. The fact that the surgeon can operate upon the body in the condition to which it is thus reduced, forms no part of the invention or discovery. It simply furnishes evidence that it can be applied to at least one useful purpose; a fact quite independent of the other elements necessary to make a discovery patentable.

Before dismissing this case, it may not be amiss to speak of the character of the discovery upon which the patent is founded. Its value in securing insensibility during the surgical operation, and thus saving the patient from sharp anguish while it is proceeding, and mitigating the shock to his system, which would otherwise be much greater, was proved on the trial by distinguished surgeons of the city of New York. They agreed in ranking it among the great discoveries of modern times; and one of them remarked that its value was too great to be estimated in dollars and cents. Its universal use, too, concurs to the same point. Its discoverer is entitled to be classed among the greatest benefactors of mankind. But the beneficent and imposing character of the discovery can not change the legal principles upon which the law of patents is founded, nor abrogate the rules by which judicial construction must be governed. These principles and rules are fixed, and uninfluenced by shades and degrees of comparative merit. They secure to the inventor a monopoly in the manufacture, use, and sale of very humble contrivances, of limited usefulness, the fruits of indifferent skill, and trifling ingenuity, as well as those grander products of his genius which confer renown on himself, and extensive and lasting benefits on society. But they are inadequate to the protection of every discovery, by securing its exclusive control to the explorer to whose eye it may be first disclosed. A discovery may be brilliant and useful, and not patentable. No matter through what long, solitary vigils, or by what importunate efforts, the secret may have been wrung from the bosom of Nature, or to what useful purpose it may be applied. Something more is necessary. The new force or principle brought to light must be embodied and set to work, and can be patented only in connection or combination with the means by which, or the medium through which, it operates. Neither the natural functions of an animal upon which or through which it may be designed to operate, nor any of the useful purposes to which it may be applied, can form any essential parts of the combination, however they may illustrate and establish its usefulness. Motion for a new trial denied.

MORTON v. ROOT.

[2 Dill. 312.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1873.

EQUITY—CLOUD UPON TITLE—ADEQUATE REMEDY AT LAW—VOID SALE UNDER EXECUTION—DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

1. Equity has jurisdiction to remove a cloud upon the title to real estate where there is no adequate remedy at law.

2. A sale under an execution issued upon a judgment in which the land sold had not been attached, and where there was no service upon the defendant except by publication, is void.

[Cited in Levy v. Ferguson Lumber Co., 51 Ark. 317, 11 S. W. 286.]

3. In the description of a tract of land, an omission to state the course in one call, held to be supplied and rendered certain by the remainder of the description.

[Cited in Campbell v. Carruth (Fla.) 13 South. 433.]

This is a bill in equity to settle the title to certain real estate. The plaintiff in the bill alleges title in himself, derived as follows: 1. On the 27th of June, 1865, he sued Pierce in attachment in the district court of the then territory of Nebraska, for Douglas county, the writ of attachment issuing and being levied on the premises in question. 2. At the October term, 1865, judgment was entered, and also an order to sell the said lands and premises for the satisfaction of the said judgment. 3. On the 16th of May, 1868, an order of sale was issued commanding the sheriff to sell the said lands. 4. In pursuance thereof he, on the 29th of June, 1868, sold the premises to the plaintiff. 5. At the July term, 1868, the sale was confirmed by the court. 6. On the 15th day of April, 1869, the sheriff made the deed to the plaintiff. To show an adverse claim of the defendant the bill alleges that one Glass sued Pierce in attachment; that the writ was levied on property other than that here in question, and not upon the same; that Pierce was not served therein and did not appear thereto; that after the attached property was exhausted, a general execution was issued and the premises in question sold to Glass, who conveyed to the defendant. On the 2d of July, 1866, a deed, dated December 10, 1864, from Glass to Root, of said premises, was put upon the records of Douglas county. The defendant answers these allegations, saying that he believes them to be true, but the decree was void because it described no premises. To support the equity jurisdiction, the plaintiff alleges that the defendant is not in possession of the premises. This the defendant denies, and alleges that at the time when this bill was filed he was, and ever since has been, and now is, in the actual possession, under the deed from Glass, dated and recorded as above stated. The answer puts in issue the validity of the plaintiff's alleged title. The cause was submitted to the court upon proofs taken by the respective parties.

J. M. Woolworth, for complainant.

B. E. B. Kennedy, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The first question to be settled is the jurisdiction of the court. This is conceded in the arguments to depend upon the fact whether the defendant was at the time the suit was commenced in actual possession. If in possession, no reason is stated in the bill why the respective rights of the parties could not be determined in ejectment. The bill in this case was filed August 27, 1870. We find, upon a careful reading of the evidence, that no fences or permanent improvements of any kind have ever been made upon the premises; the acre and a half of potatoes were raised in 1871, and the weight of the evidence shows that the clearing off of the small quantity of land was in the fall of 1870, which would be after suit was commenced. Upon the proofs in this cause, the plaintiff could not have established possession in the defendant at the time this suit was brought; and the court has jurisdiction to determine the respective rights of the parties.

Both parties claim title under judicial sales against Pierce. The sale under which the defendant derives his right was void for the want of a valid judgment and execution Jurisdiction over the person or property is absolutely essential to a valid judgment, and as the property here in question was not attached, and as the judgment against Pierce was rendered upon constructive service by publication, there was no authority whatever to levy upon and sell this land.

This point is clear, and has not been contested by defendant's counsel in argument, but he has relied on the insufficiency or weakness of the plaintiff's title. We proceed briefly to notice his objections to this title.

It is urged that the court which rendered the plaintiff's judgment (under which judgment the plaintiff claims title), had no jurisdiction of the land in question. Although a portion of the papers in that action have been lost, yet the entries on the appearance docket, the order of sale, the return endorsed thereon, the appraisement, the notice of sale, the execution, the sheriff's deed to the plaintiff, all of which are produced, show that this objection is without foundation in fact.

It is also objected that the plaintiff's deed from the sheriff is void, because it and the precedent proceedings which it follows do not describe the land with sufficient certainty. The description is as follows: "Beginning at the northwest corner of section 28, thence south eight chains and five links, thence south eighty-five degrees, twenty chains and ten links, thence north nine chains and seventy links, west twenty chains, to the place of beginning, in township 15, range 13, east of the sixth P. M."

The only defect pointed out is the omission of the word east in the second call in the description. But the testimony of the two surveyors examined as witnesses satisfactorily shows that this omission is easily supplied by the data afforded by the description as a whole. The only uncertainty is whether the second course is eighty-five degrees east or west. As the last course is "west to the place of beginning," it is obvious that the course on the corresponding line on the south must be east. The testimony of Surveyor Wiltse puts this in a clear light. He says, "The description is defective in this, that in the second course from the place of beginning, the letter 'E' is omitted, running east. To determine whether it is east or west, I return to the place of beginning and reverse the courses and distances, until I arrive at the corner upon which this defective course must close, and I find that to close the survey, or retrace the boundary, the course must be south eighty-five degrees, east twenty chains and ten links." And to same effect is the evidence of George Smith, the only other surveyor examined to the point. The description is just as certain as if the word "east" had been inserted. The result is that the plaintiff is clearly the owner of the land in question, and is entitled to the relief prayed, which is to remove the cloud upon his title, and not for possession. Decree accordingly.

As to jurisdiction: Morton v. Smith [Case No. 9,867]. As to right to relief to remove cloud upon title to land: Bunce v. Gallagher [Id. 2,-133]; Craft v. Merrill, 14 N. Y. 456.

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1873.

EXECUTION SALE — REAL PROPERTY — DEFECTIVE ACKNOWLEDGMENTS—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE —LOCAL STATUTE CONSTRUED.

1. A levy upon real estate which is not sold for want of bidders does not render a subsequent sale of other land, on another execution, void.

2. Where a judgment is rendered upon service by publication only, a sale of land not attached, upon a general execution issued upon such judgment, is void.

3. Under the statutes of Nebraska in force in 1859, as to the acknowledgment and proof of conveyances of land, executed in another state, it was indispensable when these were not acknowledged before a commissioner appointed by the legal authorities of Nebraska, that the certifying officer should certify that the execution and acknowledgment is according to the laws of the state where the instrument is executed; and the record of a deed where this requirement is omitted does not operate as constructive notice of its existence.

Bill in chancery [by William S. T. Morton] to quiet title to a certain tract of land near Omaha, containing twelve and sixty-seven-hundredths acres, and for partition. Neither party is in actual possession. Both parties claim under one Roswell G. Pierce. The plaintiff's title is derived under an execution sale made in November, 1869, upon a judgment in his favor against Pierce, rendered at the June term, 1860. The defendant [George R. Smith] claims title in two ways: First, under an execution sale upon a judgment rendered by publication in an attachment suit by one Glass against Pierce; second, by conveyances from Pierce, independent of the judicial sale.

J. M. Woolworth, for plaintiff.

C. S. Chase, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. 1. The plaintiff's judgment against Pierce, and his execution sale thereunder, which was confirmed by the court, and followed by a sheriff's deed, gives him a title unless a better title is shown by the defendant.

The fact that a prior execution had issued upon the plaintiff's judgment and been levied upon other land which was not sold for want of bidders, does not amount to a satisfaction of that judgment and render the subsequent execution sale of the land in dispute void.

2 As to defendant's title. Prior to plaintiff's suit against Pierce, one Glass (January 10, 1860) commenced suit against Pierce by attachment, and levied the writ of attachment upon the undivided three-fourths of the land in controversy. Pierce was not served except by publication. Judgment was rendered upon constructive service, and the premises attached were ordered to be sold, and were sold, and the title under this sale is in the defendant. This sale is valid, and gives the defendant the prior and better title to the undivided three-fourths. After this sale, without any further service upon, or proceedings against, Pierce, the judgment creditor (Glass) caused a general execution to issue against Pierce, and this was levied upon the remaining undivided one-fourth, which was sold, and under this sale the defendant claims the title thereto. But there having been no attachment of this undivided quarter interest prior to the judgment, nor at any time, and no service upon Pierce except by publication, there was no authority to issue a general execution upon the judgment, and levy upon and sell property which had not been attached. That execution and sale were void.

But the defendant also claims title to this one-fourth in this wise: On the 12th of April, 1859, Pierce made a deed to one Ralph Marsh, which was filed for record before any of the judicial proceedings against Pierce had been commenced, and defendant claims by mesne conveyances under the deed to Marsh.

It is not denied that if this deed to Marsh conveys the same land and was duly acknowledged and recorded, that it defeats the plaintiff's title, for in such case Pierce had no interest in the land at the date of plaintiff's judgment, and execution sale.

No claim has been made in argument by the plaintiff's counsel that the deed insufficiently described the land in controversy, but he rests his case upon the proposition that the deed from Pierce to Marsh was not acknowledged and certified so as to be entitled to be recorded, and therefore the record of it was not constructive notice of its existence. There is no evidence whatever of actual notice to the plaintiff of this deed.

The deed from Pierce to Marsh was executed April 12, 1859, in the state of New York. It was acknowledged on that day before a commissioner of deeds in the city of New York, appointed by the authority of that state. A clerk of a court of record of the city or county of New York certifies under his seal that the commissioner is such officer as he represents himself to be, that he is well acquainted with his handwriting, and that his signature is genuine, as required by section 5 of the act of January 26, 1856 (Laws Neb. 2d Sess. 1856, p. 80), but he entirely omits to certify, as required by that section, "that the deed is executed and acknowledged according to the laws" of the state of New York. This is indisputably an essential requirement of the law then in force.

Another portion of the act requires this certificate to be recorded with the deed (sections 13, 14), and a subsequent section provides that deeds "shall not be deemed lawfully recorded unless they have previously been acknowledged or proved in the manner herein prescribed" (section 17). By section 16, "all deeds which are required to be recorded shall take effect and be in force from and after the time of delivering the same to the register for record, and not before, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers in good faith, without notice; and all such deeds shall be adjudged void as to all such creditors and subsequent purchasers, without notice, whose deeds shall be first recorded."

This deed not having been certified as required by law, the objection of the plaintiff to the admission of the record thereof as evidence was well taken, and it is void as against the plaintiff, a creditor of the grantor, and a subsequent purchaser under a judgment against him. The result is that the plaintiff owns an undivided one-fourth, and the defendant an undivided three-fourths of the land in controversy, and a decree will be entered accordingly. Each party to pay his own costs. Decree as above.

BANKRUPTCY—HOMESTEAD—PROCEEDING IN STATE COURT—ASSIGNEE TO BECOME PARTY THERETO.

Where a homestead was set apart to a family, ten days before commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, but from which judgment an appeal was then pending, the local statute declaring that the appeal suspends but does not vacate the judgment, held, the bankrupt court must respect the homestead right, though suspended, and will not take possession of the property for distribution to determine the validity or propriety of such judgment, but the assignee in bankruptcy will be directed to make himself a party to the proceedings in the state court, and first determine his right to the possession of the property, in that tribunal.

In bankruptcy.

ERSKINE, District Judge. About the middle of April, 1872, the families of the present bankrupts, respectively, instituted proceedings in the court of ordinary of Lowndes county, in this district, under the thirteenth section of the act of October 3d, 1868, commonly called the homestead or exemption law, to have set apart and adjudged for the use of the families of each of the bankrupts, the real and personal property exempted by the provisions of that law. The value of the realty that may be set apart for the wife and children of the bankrupt may be two thousand dollars in specie, and in personal property one thousand dollars in specie. The ordinary appointed appraisers to appraise and allot the exempted property. They acted and returned their actings and doings in the premises into the court of ordinary. On the 27th of April, 1872, the ordinary approved the returns and set apart the property so appraised to the families of the bankrupts. On the 1st of May, certain creditors of the bankrupts took appeals to the superior court of said county from the judgments of the court of ordinary, on the ground that the property set apart was of greater value than that placed upon it by the appraisers, and sanctioned by the decision of the court of ordinary. These several appeals are now depending and undetermined in the appellate tribunal—the superior court of Lowndes county.

An appeal brings up the whole record and is a de novo investigation. "The appeal," says the Code, § 3572, "suspends, but does not vacate judgment; and if dismissed or withdrawn the rights of all parties are the same as if no appeal had been entered." But, notwithstanding the case is to be tried over again, it is obvious, from the very words of the Code itself, that the decision or judgment pronounced by the inferior court remains of force, though the fruits of the judgment cannot be gathered by the parties in whose favor it stands until the appellate court shall have decided that there is no error therein. If, however, the court find that there is error in the judgment, it will reverse the same in whole, or, I apprehend, in part, and then enter such judgment, according to the justice of the case, as the inferior court—in this case, the court of ordinary of Lowndes county—ought to have entered.

As already seen, the appeals from the several judgments of the court of ordinary to the superior court were taken on the 1st of May, 1872. On the 6th of the same month and year, the creditors of Moseley, Wells & Co., filed their petition in this court, under the thirty-ninth section of the bankrupt act, thus initiating proceedings against them in involuntary bankruptcy; and, on the 5th of June, 1872, Moseley, Wells & Co. were, by judgment of this court, declared bankrupts.

Counsel for the creditors contended that on the filing of the petition in involuntary bankruptcy, on the 6th of May, 1872, the jurisdiction of the state courts over the proceedings then pending, by virtue of the state statute of October 3d, 1868, in regard to the several homesteads and exemptions, ceased, and the jurisdiction of this court attached—drawing to it for adjudication and distribution among the creditors all the estate of the bankrupts, and in which estate was included the property set apart for and adjudged to the families of the several parties declared bankrupts on the 5th of June, 1872. It was further insisted, that the judgments pronounced by the court of ordinary on 27th of April, 1872, were respectively but mesne process; and being rendered within four months next preceding the commencement of the proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy, were, by force of the fourteenth section of the bankruptcy act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 522)], dissolved. In support of this last point, counsel cited and relied upon the case Randell v. McLain, 40 Ga. 162. There a judgment had been rendered by the federal court of South Carolina, and upon which judgment a suit was instituted in the superior court of Chatham county, Georgia. Warner, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The judgment obtained in the state of South Carolina in the district court could not be collected in this state, except by a suit thereon at common law, or by process of attachment; and in either case the proceeding instituted to collect the amount of the judgment debt in this state is mesne process. There can be no doubt that a writ of attachment is mesne process, and if sued out within four months immediately before the defendant is declared a bankrupt it must be dissolved as provided by the bankrupt act. And as to the judgment upon which the action was brought to recover its contents, it was a mere chose in action, with many of the attributes of a promissory note or bill of exchange, and the proceeding instituted to collect it was also but mesne process, for all writs necessary to a suit between its beginning and end are mesne process. And this is the well-established rule of practice in courts governed by the principles of the common law; therefore, the latter is affected by the bankrupt act like the former—the process of attachment. Tommey v. Finney, 45 Ga. 155, was also presented. This case consisted originally of two—one a suit in a magistrate's court, appealed to the superior court; the other, a suit brought in the superior court after the magistrate's case had been appealed. Both accounts, it seems, were due when the suit on one was brought in the magistrate's court. Montgomery, J., in giving the opinion of the supreme court, said: "It is insisted by defendant in error that both accounts are, under the agreed statement of facts, but one, and should have been sued in the same action. * * * The reply is, that an appeal is a de novo investigation and the first action is a suit now pending (on appeal) in the superior court (Code, § 3571); and hence there is no judgment to bar." And the court held that the pendency of the first action as a defence to the account could not be taken advantage of by a plea in bar at the second term, but ought to have been by plea in abatement. It will be perceived that this case turned on a point of pleading and did not touch the legal status of the judgment rendered in the magistrate's court.

It was not questioned, I believe, that the court of ordinary had jurisdiction over the subject matter of the homestead. When the court of ordinary rendered its decisions on the homestead proceedings, the judgments were binding and effective, if no appeals had been taken to the superior court. Now, it is to the Code that attention must be directed to ascertain what effect each of the appeals had on the legal condition of the judgments rendered by the court of ordinary on the 27th of April, 1872, and appealed on the 1st of May following—six days prior to the commencement of the proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy. As previously stated, the 3572d section of the Code, says: "An appeal suspends, but does not vacate judgment." This language is too plain to need construction. I entirely agree with the counsel that the mere application for a homestead gives no lien on the property, and, also, that a lien, to have any standing in the bankrupt court, must be a lien at the time the party becomes a bankrupt. If, therefore, the judgments entered by the court of ordinary on the homestead exemption, in favor of the families of the parties since declared bankrupts, are not liens attached to the property allotted and set apart, then the property, by operation of the bankrupt law, is before this court for adjudication. Counsel cited the case of Woolfolk v. Murray, 44 Ga. 133; Seymour v. Morgan, 45 Ga. 201; and Inferior Ct. of Clark Co. v. Haygood, 15 Ga. 309, to show that no lien existed, notwithstanding the judgments of the court of ordinary in favor of the families of the present bankrupts. In Inferior Ct. of Clark Co. v. Haygood, Starnes, J., said: "By the provisions of our judiciary system, an appeal at common law vacates the judgment on the first trial, for all the purposes of a rehearing." If it was the intention of the court, as was insisted, to decide that when an appeal is entered from an inferior to a superior court, that that act vacates the judgment appealed from, then the reply is, that since the time of that decision the rule of law—if rule of law it was—has been changed by the code, which expressly declares that the judgment is suspended, not vacated. But still, I entertain doubts that the sentence just cited from the report of the case warrants a meaning so extended and strong as has been contended for. Counsel argued that the law of this state is now as it was at the time Inferior Ct. of Clark Co. v. Haygood was decided, and the case of Seymour v. Morgan was referred to. In that case McCay, J., in pronouncing the opinion of the court, observed: "One buying land after judgment against the owner, which has been vacated by an appeal, buys it with notice and subject to the final judgment, but he is no more a purchaser, after the judgment, than one who buys with notice of the vendor's lien, or with notice of any other fact which will make the land subject to a judgment against the vendor." If it was the purpose of the court to hold that an appeal vacated a judgment rendered in the court from which the appeal was taken, to my mind it seems directly repugnant to the very words and spirit of the 3572d section of the Code. If the word "vacated," as found in the report, is not there by mistake of the printer, or oversight, then it is manifest to the reader that a purchase, under the circumstances mentioned in the sentence quoted, would not find a judgment which has been vacated—made void—an impediment to the title. Woolfolk v. Murray—In this case the wife, after her husband had been adjudged a bankrupt and the property had passed into the hands of the United States marshal, made application to the ordinary to have a homestead set apart for herself and children, under the act of 1868. McCay, J., in giving the judgment of the court, said: "But it is very clear that until it (the homestead) is laid off there is no property or right of property in the family. * * * It is a right which depends for its existence upon the judgment of the court." And a like thought is expressed in a subsequent part of the opinion. That learned judge says: "It is clear to us, therefore, that this right of the wife is not title, lien or encumbrance upon the husband's property until it has been appropriated by a judgment." And as there was no judgment of the court of ordinary, or other court having jurisdiction, anterior to the adjudication of bankruptcy, the court held that the jurisdiction over the property sought to be exempted passed to the federal court to be there adjudicated. Lumpkin v. Eason, 44 Ga. 339.

A judgment is the sentence of the law, pronounced by a court or a judge thereof, upon a matter in issue in any cause before it. I am of the opinion that each of the appeals taken on the 1st of May, 1872, from the court of ordinary to the superior court, in nowise affected the decision or judgment of the former tribunal, further than to suspend or interrupt it from proceeding, until the cause appealed is reviewed and passed upon by the appellate court; in other words, that each of the judgments created a lien upon the property set apart to the families, respectively, of the present bankrupts, and each judgment so rendered remains intact, though for the time fruitless.

Whether the property set apart for the families of these bankrupts was partnership property (for this is a point in controversy)—property held in trust for the firm creditors, or whether, if partnership property, these families would be entitled to homesteads out of it, are questions that this court, in this proceeding, declines to pass upon. And the same may be said as to the other points presented in argument, or other questions which might arise out of the facts of the case. On none of these matters will the court anticipate an opinion.

I instruct the assignee forthwith to apply to the honorable, the superior court of Lowndes county, for leave to be made a party to the proceedings there pending on the several appeals taken from the court of ordinary of Lowndes county, and there contest the proceedings had in the inferior court and the constitutionality of the statute.

District Court, E. D. Michigan. Jan. 16, 1872.

BANKRUPTCY—INJUNCTION TO RESTRAIN TRANSFER OF PROPERTY—WHEN INJUNCTION TERMINATES—VIOLATION.

An injunction granted under section 40 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)] does not extend beyond the adjudication. Hence any proceedings to punish parties for contempt in violating an injunction after adjudication, must be dismissed with costs.

[Cited in Re Irving, Case No. 7,073.]

The injunction was issued under section 40 of the bankrupt act, on filing the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy. The petition was filed and injunction issued November fifth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine. An order was issued at the same time, requiring the alleged bankrupt [S. J. Moses] to show cause, as required by said section 40, returnable November sixteenth, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine, on which day an order of adjudication of bankruptcy was made, and an assignee was appointed December eleventh, eighteen hundred and sixty-nine. The acts alleged to have been done by Lang in violation of the injunction, are alleged to have been done January twentieth, eighteen hundred and seventy, more than two months after the adjudication of bankruptcy. Those alleged to have been committed by Hanaw appear to have been committed also after the adjudication, although no specific date is alleged. It is contended on behalf of Lang & Hanaw that by the express provisions of section 40, under which the injunction was issued, its operation and effect were limited to the period of time between the time of its service on them and the time when the hearing and adjudication were had upon the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, and therefore the acts complained of, not having been done within that period, are not within the purview of the writ.

Mr. Reilly, for assignee.

Mr. Peck, for Lang & Hanaw.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. So much of section 40 of the bankrupt act as is material to the consideration of the question presented, is as follows: "That upon the filing of the petition authorized by the next preceding section, if it shall appear that sufficient grounds exist therefor, the court shall direct the entry of an order requiring the debtor to appear and show cause, at a court of bankruptcy to be holden at a time to be specified in the order, not less than five days from the service thereof, why the prayer of the petition should not be granted; and may also, by its injunction, restrain the debtor, and any other person, in the meantime, from making any transfer or disposition of any part of the debtor's property not excepted by this act from the operation thereof, and from any interference therewith."

As a court of bankruptcy, this court possesses no general powers to issue injunctions. Its powers in that regard are derived solely from that portion of section 40 above quoted, and such powers are of course limited strictly within the scope of its provisions. The restraining power of the court then is limited in point of time to the period of time expressed by the words "in the meantime," which I have italicized in the quotation, and those relate manifestly to the period of time between the entering of the order to show cause and the time specified therein for the hearing, as provided in the first part of the quotation. I think the most extended construction that can be given to these words is, that they are intended to cover the whole period up to such time as a hearing and adjudication shall be had upon the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy. I can see no warrant whatever for extending their meaning beyond that. It is true that in this case the injunction is in the ordinary form and reads: "Until the further order of the court." But this clause must be read in the light of the authority under which the writ was issued, and being so read its meaning is as follows: "Until a hearing and adjudication shall be had upon the petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against Solomon J. Moses." If creditors, on filing petition for adjudication of bankruptcy, desire to restrain parties from interfering with the debtor's property beyond the time when an adjudication may be obtained, they must do so by invoking the general powers of a court of equity. This court does not possess such power. See In re Metzler [Case No. 9,512]; Irving v. Hughes [Id. 7,076]; In re Kintzing [Id. 7,833]; Creditors v. Cozzens [Id. 3,378]; In re Fuller [Id. 5,148].

The acts complained of in these cases having been done after the restraining power of the injunction had ceased to operate, the orders to show cause must be discharged, and the petitions and proceedings against the said Lang and Hanaw for contempt must be dismissed, with costs to the said Lang and Hanaw, including an attorney fee of twenty dollars (being ten dollars in each case), to be paid by the assignee out of the funds of the estate of the said bankrupt in his hands.

MOSES et al. v. BOYD et al.

[5 Blatchf. 357.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 28, 1866.[2]

GUARANTY — DAMAGE TO OTHER CARGO — CONDITION OF SHIP — LIABILITY.

1. Where a charterer of a vessel agrees with her master, on behalf of the vessel, to pay any damages that the vessel may be subject to, arising from lard in casks being stowed between decks and running on other cargo, the vessel is, notwithstanding this agreement, liable for damage caused to cargo in the lower hold by the leakage of lard from the casks and through the deck, if the deck is not well and sufficiently caulked.

2. Where such an agreement was made in view of the fact that the lard in the casks, while they were being stowed, was found to be leaking therefrom, and to be in an almost liquid state, and it appeared that the deck was well and sufficiently caulked: Held, that the vessel was not responsible for damage caused to cargo in the lower hold by the leakage of the lard from the casks and through the deck.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.]

This was a libel in personam, filed in the district court, to recover a balance of $1,779.27 alleged to be due on a charter party, made July 24th, 1862, by the libellants [Oliver Moses, Charles Owen, Frank O. Moore, G. C. Moses, and Albert Otis], as owners of the ship Robert Cushman, chartering her to the respondents [Robert R. Boyd, John J. Boyd, and Edward Hincken] for a voyage from New York to Havre, in France. The district court dismissed the libel, and the libellants appealed to this court.

Edward H. Owen and Stephen P. Nash, for libellants.

Erastus C. Benedict, for respondents.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The vessel sailed from New York about the 17th of August, 1862, and arrived at Havre on the 23d of September following. The cargo consisted chiefly of wheat, lard, and tallow. The wheat in bulk, and also some in bags, was stowed in the hold. A portion of the lard was stowed between decks. The dispute in the case between the parties arises out of damage occasioned to the wheat in the hold by the leaking of the lard between decks, with which the charterers were charged in Havre and which they paid. They now claim the right to retain the amount out of the freight money, insisting that the vessel is responsible for the loss. Some difficulty seems to have existed, in the court below, in reaching this question, on the pleadings; but, whatever may have been the merits of the difficulty there, it has been remedied by an amendment of the pleadings in this court, and the question is fairly presented. This lard between decks, when delivered at the ship to be taken on board, was leaking badly from the casks, and most of it seemed to be apparently in an almost liquid state. The weather was excessively hot, so that the hands engaged in the stowage had to be frequently relieved, and, on some days, to lie by in the middle of the day. The stevedore who had charge of the loading refused to take the responsibility of placing the leaking casks between decks, from the danger of damaging the wheat below in the hold, and required the direction of the master, who also objected to taking in the cargo, and made his objections known to the charterers. Thereupon, they gave him, in due form, an agreement, before he would assent to the stowage, "to pay any damages that yourself (master) or the ship may be subject to, on the discharge of the cargo at Havre, the said damage arising from the lard being stowed between decks and running on the other cargo either in the between decks or lower hold." This I regard as a modification of the charter party, and it has been so treated in the amended libel, and removes the technical embarrassment of the case in the court below.

It is admitted that the damage to the cargo in question arose out of the leakage of the lard casks. Some were entirely empty, and over three hundred were partially empty, when discharged at Havre; and the lard had dripped through the seams of the deck to the cargo below, heated and damaged the wheat, and spread over the between deck.

It is claimed, on the part of the respondents, that the between deck was not well and sufficiently caulked, and that, if it had been, notwithstanding the leaky condition of the casks, the lard would not have worked its way to the lower hold, and, hence, that the ship should be held responsible for the damage. I agree, that, if this aspect of the case can be maintained, upon the proofs, the decree should be for the respondents, because the guarantee should not be construed as exonerating the ship from being, in all respects, in a seaworthy condition to carry this description of cargo. I have, consequently, looked into the proofs on this point, and, though there is some conflict of opinion among the witnesses, I am inclined to think that the weight of the testimony does not sustain the allegation of the respondents. The witnesses who speak of the practice or usage of carrying leaking casks of lard between decks without danger to the cargo below, if the deck is properly caulked, generally qualify the remark as it respects lard in a liquid state in the casks, which, as is apparent from the proofs in this case, was the condition of a considerable portion of this lard when stowed; and, as the weather continued hot throughout nearly the whole of the voyage, this state of the lard must have increased rather than diminished. Indeed, the state of the casks when discharged, and of the between decks, goes far to confirm the evidence of the unusual leaking condition of the casks when put on board of the vessel, which led the stevedore and the master to object to them as not fit to be shipped; and the fact that the charterers, instead of insisting upon their right under the charter, chose to modify it, as respected the particular article, leaves an implication of its unfitness.

Some question was made upon a clause in the charter party stipulating that the vessel should be consigned to the charterers' friends in Havre, and under which she was consigned to the house of J. Barb & Co. This house received the bills of lading and collected the freight, and paid over to the master the amount due, excepting the balance in dispute. They obviously regarded themselves as acting in the interest, and for the benefit, of the charterers; and I cannot agree that the payment by them of the damages at Havre was a payment as agents of the ship, so as to conclude the owners. They dealt with the freight moneys not only as the friends, but as the agents, of the charterers, as is apparent from the accounts between the two houses. I think that the court below erred, and that the decree should be reversed, and a decree be entered for the libellants, for such balance.

[On an appeal by the charterers to the supreme court, the decree of this court was affirmed. 7 Wall. (74 U. S.) 316.]

MOSES v. DELAWARE INS. CO.

[1 Wash. C. C. 385.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1806.

MARINE INSURANCE—FACTS CONCEALED BY ASSURED—PARTICULAR KNOWLEDGE—GENERAL KNOWLEDGE.

Insurance on goods on board the Liberty, from Philadelphia to Charleston, lost or not lost. It was the duty of the assured, to communicate to the underwriters, a letter received by him, containing particulars of a hurricane which had occurred at Charleston after the vessel sailed; although the fact of there having been severe gales on the coast of Carolina, was known to the defendants. The knowledge of the plaintiff was particular, that of the defendants was general.

[Cited in Ruggles v. General Interest Ins. Co., Case No. 12,119; Sun Mut Ins. Co. v. Ocean Ins. Co., 107 U. S. 511, 1 Sup. Ct. 600.]

Action on a policy on goods, on board the Liberty, lost or not lost, at and from Philadelphia, to Charleston in South Carolina. The Liberty sailed from Philadelphia, on the 28th or 29th of August, 1804, and the policy was signed on the 22d of September, 1804. The vessel was found at sea, some time in September, turned bottom upwards. Great part of the cargo was thrown upon an island on the Carolina coast, and was sold, under a sentence of the district court, and salvage paid thereout. The defence was, that the plaintiff [Myers Moses] had concealed from the underwriters, a material fact, within his knowledge.

The evidence was, that on the afternoon of the 21st September, the plaintiff met with Mr. Steel in the street, who asked him if he had not shipped goods on board the Liberty, and whether he was insured. Being answered in the negative, Steel informed him, that he had that day received a letter from Charleston, dated the 9th, giving an account of a dreadful storm, which had happened there the day before, and that he communicated the contents of the letter to the plaintiff, every word, so far as he recollected. The words of the letter are, "Yesterday, the most dreadful storm happened here, that has ever been experienced; the damage amongst the shipping very great." Mr. Steel, who also was directed to insure the Liberty, applied at the different offices on the 21st, and was informed, that there had been severe gales on the coast, and much damage heard of. Most of the presidents disliked the risk. The Pennsylvania office spoke of asking seven per cent.; at the others, five was asked, which was double the usual premium. The president of the Delaware office informed him, that he had heard of the loss of the Patient Sally, which sailed on the 4th from Savannah, and which he should have to pay. The Sincerity sailed from Charleston on the 4th, and had arrived here, after experiencing great damage from the gale. The usual passage from here to Charleston, was proved to be ten to twelve days, but a vessel was not much out of time at eighteen days. It did not appear that the hurricane at Charleston, was known at any of the offices, until between ten and eleven o'clock of the 22d, after the arrival of the mail. The president of one of the offices declared in evidence, that after this account was received, no insurance could have been effected at his office, under fifty per cent., if at all. It was proved by the same person, and by one of the directors of the Philadelphia insurance office, that the accounts which came by this mail, did not state the storm in as strong language, as the letter before alluded to. After the arrival of the mail, the Liberty was insured at the Philadelphia office, at five per cent., though the account of the storm, as stated by this conveyance, was known: but the office calculated, that the Liberty had not been out long enough to reach that part of the coast, where the severity of it was felt. Upon reference to the papers, from the 15th to the 21st of September, it appeared, that very heavy gales had happened on the coast, and vessels and wrecks found in the latitude of Charleston. The plaintiff, on receiving the communication from Mr. Steel, on the afternoon of the 21st, expressed himself satisfied as to the Liberty, as she might not be affected by the storm at Charleston. On the evening, however, of that day, he called at the Delaware office, to insure this cargo, but the president was not within. Early on the morning of the 22d, he called again, and effected the policy; but, the instrument not being filled up, he called two or three times for it, and finally received it between eight and nine o'clock in the morning. On the same morning, he informed an acquaintance of his of the dreadful storm which had happened at Charleston, and expressed his satisfaction at having got his insurance effected.

The defendant insisted, that the policy was annulled, in consequence of the concealment of this letter. Park, Ins. 209; 2 N. Y. Term R. [2 Caines] 57, in point.

The plaintiff contended, that the existence of the storm was known to the defendant; and, therefore, need not be communicated. 1 Marsh. Ins. 354; 4 Burrows, 1905; Park, Ins. 185.

Mr. Philips and Moses Levy, for plaintiff.
Rawle & Condy, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, charged the jury. It is admitted, that the plaintiff did not communicate to the office, the information he had received of the storm at Charleston, or that there was a letter in town respecting it; but, it is contended, by the plaintiff, that this was unnecessary, since it was sufficiently known to the defendants, to render the communication unnecessary. The rule is, that the insured must disclose every fact, material to the risk, within his own knowledge, which the insurer does not know, or is not bound to know. They were not bound to know of the particular storm mentioned in this letter; and, there is no evidence which brings home to them, in any respect, a knowledge of it. The only question, then, is; whether the communication of the contents of that letter, was material to the risk, taken in connexion with the knowledge, which the defendants had obtained through other channels.

The defendants knew generally, that there had been heavy gales on the coast, in the latitude of South Carolina; that damage had been the consequence; that a vessel, which had left Savannah on the fourth, was lost; that another had experienced its violence, was damaged, but had arrived. But, the plaintiff knew of a particular storm, more violent than had ever been experienced, which had done great injury to the shipping at Charleston, the port to which the Liberty was destined. She had been out ten or eleven days previous to the storm, and the usual voyage is from ten to twelve days, but not much out of time if extended to eighteen. She might, or might not, be within the fury of this particular storm. Was there any material difference, between the general information, which the defendants possessed, and that which the plaintiff possessed, as it respected the fate of the Liberty? If there was, the latter should have been communicated. Would you, after seeing this letter, and being yet ignorant of the fate of the vessel, have deemed the risk increased, from what it would have been estimated, with the general information possessed by the defendants? What was the plaintiff's opinion on the subject? At the time he received the account from Steel, he was his own insurer. Though he seemed to think lightly of the information given in the letter, he yet applied to insure the same evening; repeated it the next morning; and, after evident marks of impatience, got it concluded before the arrival of the post. If you think, that this conduct was induced by the contents of that letter, then it is plain, that he at least thought the information very material; and, on this point, furnishes strong evidence against himself. What was the conduct of the insurance offices? Under the impression of the general information of gales on the coast, double premiums were though sufficient. After the news of the Charleston storm had reached one of the offices, they still insured at five per cent.; but they did not know, that it was as severe as the letter to Steel had stated it, and they calculated, that the Liberty had not reached the place where it happened. After it was known, it appears, that, at another office, the risk would not have been taken at fifty per cent., if at all. Now, if the information of this particular storm was material, the defendants ought to have known it, so as to have had an opportunity of deciding, whether to take the risk, and at what premium.

The plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

The MOSHER.

[4 Biss. 274.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct., 1868.

TOWAGE — REASONABLE DILIGENCE — SKILL — KNOWLEDGE OF CHANNEL—DUTY AFTER STRANDING.

1. The measure of a tug's duty is reasonable diligence and ordinary skill. The tug is not an insurer of the safety of the tow, nor held to the highest nautical skill.

2. The tug is bound to know the ordinary proper channel, but the responsibility is changed where the channel is shifting.

3. A schooner having taken the chances of entering in a storm, a harbor with a shifting channel, the tug is not to be held responsible, in the absence of proof of negligence, if the schooner touches some ridge of sand.

4. The tug is only bound to employ those means consistent with her own safety; she is not obliged to lay by the tow, when that would endanger herself.

Appeal from decree of the district court dismissing a libel filed by Sallie F. Dobbie and others, owners of the shooner Nicaragua, against the tug Mosher, to recover damage caused by the alleged negligence of the tug while towing the Nicaragua.

Miller, Van Arman & Lewis, for libellants.
George B. Hibbard, for insurance company.
Sandford B. Perry, for cargo.
Robert Rae, for respondents.

DAVIS, Circuit Justice. This case was argued at the last fall term by eminent counsel. I have since read all the testimony carefully, and although the case is not free from doubt, I am unable to see wherein the views of the district court are incorrect. I shall content myself with stating the ground on which I justify this conclusion.

The schooner Nicaragua, owned by libellants, on the 6th of August having encountered a heavy wind and high sea, which continued during the day, came to anchor, and shortly after, the tug Mosher took her in tow. The schooner furnished the tow line. The first broke; a second bore the strain. The vessel in the act of being towed into the harbor was stranded and ultimately lost. Is the tug responsible for this loss?

It is charged that the accident happened through the negligence and want of care of the officers of the tug, and that, at any rate, the disaster would not have been so ruinous, if these officers had used proper efforts to relieve the Nicaragua. The first question is, what degree of diligence and skill was required of the tug? The rule is well settled that reasonable diligence and ordinary skill is the measure of the tug's duty. The tug did not engage to insure the safety of the tow, nor for the use of the highest nautical skill. I think Judge Drummond stated the rule fairly, that the tug is bound to know the ordinary and proper channel into the harbor and to exercise reasonable skill under the circumstances, in towing the vessel.

As usual in cases of this kind the testimony is very conflicting and not easily reconcilable. It is claimed the schooner was kept windward of the tug. The weight of testimony is to the contrary. Neither do I think the tug went too far south. In my opinion the case turns on the condition of the channel at the time of the accident. The responsibility would have been very different if the channel was regular and established. Like the district judge, I do not wish to relax the need of caution of tugs in towing vessels nor establish harsh rules to make them insurers of property. There was no settled channel; it was in a shifting state. The old channel into the harbor had been substantially abandoned; it had been partly made in 1863–4, and about the time of this accident, whenever the dredging boats could work, they were dumping in one place and taking ground from another. The weather was changing, and during storms shoals would form. The channel was, in fact, a moving, changing channel. If an accident happened in towing a vessel through such a channel during a storm of several days' continuance, the tug, if it was managed with reasonable nautical skill and judgment, cannot be held responsible.

In what respect did the Mosher show less diligence and skill than required? The schooner having taken the chances of entering the harbor in a storm, the tug is not to be held responsible, in the absence of proof of negligence, if the schooner touched some ridge of sand. It is urged that she went aground on the old sand-bar. Although satisfied that she was ultimately wrecked there, I am not satisfied she first struck there. The winds and waves drove her south, and the probability is that her first position was changed.

But the tug is blamed for not using more effort than she did to get the schooner off the bar; in other words, is charged with fault in abandoning the schooner too soon. It is hard to get at the truth, for the witnesses on each vessel differ materially in their account of what occurred. At the argument it did seem to me that the tug left the schooner to her fate sooner than she ought to have done, but since reading the testimony, I cannot say that she did not employ all the means practicable and consistent with her own safety. The captain of the tug was not obliged to stay by the schooner if in good faith he believed he would endanger his own vessel. On both points he is supported by the testimony. I think the decree dismissing the libel should be affirmed.

The MOSLEM.

[1 Olcott, 289.]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1846.

SHIPPING—LEAKING VESSEL—SEAMEN EMPLOYED TO PUMP—SEAWORTHY CONDITION.

1. If seamen are shipped on a vessel unseaworthy at the time, they may rightfully abandon her or refuse to do duty on board.

2. When seamen know a vessel is leaking three or four inches the hour in port, and came in from sea in a leaky state, and they ship on board mainly to help pump her on her home voyage, they are not absolved from their contract because the leak continues or even increases on the voyage, if she was seaworthy when she left port.

3. Where a ship on a voyage from Manilla to New-York, went into Cape Town leaking, and there received partial repairs, and on survey was pronounced seaworthy, and shipped seamen for the home voyage, but in order to have the advantage of the trade winds, and smoother seas, and sooner to reach a suitable port for repairs, made for Pernambuco, that is not such a deviation as to discharge the seamen from their obligations to her. But if the master intended to take that course when he shipped the crew, or left Cape Town, he was bound to make it known to them.

4. It is no unreasonable service to require a full crew to keep a staunch vessel free of water which does not make exceeding four inches of water the hour; but if at the beginning of the voyage the crew become apprehensive of great danger, it is not disorderly or mutinous conduct for them, in a body, to apply respectfully to the officers, and urge that the ship be put back to port.

5. If, on that application, the master engaged to pay each man one dollar extra per day to continue the voyage, and work the pumps, and promised to sight the island of St. Helena, and to enter the port, if necessary, his failure to run in view of the island was not such a violation of contract as to release the crew from their obligation to the vessel, and justify them in refusing to do duty on board.

6. It was in the sound discretion of the master, in view of the safety of the ship and her company, to go into, or pass the island. Those who for that cause broke off work, and defied the authority of the master, were guilty of mutinous misconduct, and might be coerced back to duty, and also subjected to forfeiture of wages.

7. A punishment by abstraction of wages may be a partial or total withholding of them.

[See note to The Almeida, Case No. 254.]

8. If, on the arrival of the ship at Pernambuco, one of the crew claimed his right to leave the ship, because of her deviation, and refused to do further duty on board for that cause, but was afterwards subdued to the authority of the ship, such disobedience is not cause for the forfeiture of his wages.

9. The subsequent disorderly and mutinous behavior of the seaman, and obstinate refusal during the home voyage to do duty, deprives him of all claim to after wages, but does not retroact and forfeit those earned previous to arrival at Pernambuco.

Peter Scott, filed a libel against the ship Moslem, claiming the wages stipulated in his shipping articles; and also extra wages of one dollar per day on a voyage from the Cape of Good Hope to Pernambuco, and thence to New-York. After the action was commenced and the ship attached, John Rooney, Samuel Phillips and Thomas Channan united in this suit as co-libellants, making like demands of contract and extra wages. The pleadings on both sides are crammed with harsh and criminatory allegations and extraneous statements, by each party against the other. The substance of the charges and issues, which were the subjects of contestation on the trial and entered into the judgment of the court, related, on the part of the libellants, to the deception and misconduct of the master towards the libellants, in hiring them at the Cape of Good Hope, and taking them to sea, and in his unjust and cruel treatment of them on the voyage to Pernambuco; and in respect to Scott, his continued confinement in chains at Pernambuco and during the voyage from that place to New-York; and on the part of the claimants to the disorderly, insubordinate and mutinous conduct of the libellants on shipboard. The rate of wages at which the libellants shipped, and the period they were respectively with the ship, was not in dispute.

The case made by the averments of the libel is, that the libellants were shipped at Cape Town for a direct voyage to New-York. That the ship arrived at Cape Town from Manilla, leaking badly, and continued to leak at the rate of three or four inches the hour, during the period of two or three weeks she remained in that port. That after she put to sea, the leak increased to ten inches the hour. That the libellants, and the rest of the crew, respectfully requested the master to return to port, because of the unseaworthiness of the ship, but he refused to do so, and deviated from his voyage, and ran to Pernambuco. That because of their remonstrances against being forced to remain with the ship in her unseaworthy condition, and against the severe labor imposed upon them at the pumps, the master put them in close confinement on board, and deprived them of necessary food. That he engaged to pay them each one dollar a day extra wages from Cape Town to Pernambuco, but refuses to pay the same, or any part of their wages. The answer avers that the ship was seaworthy when the libellants shipped, and when she sailed on the voyage. It denies any deviation, and charges that the libellants forfeited their wages by insubordinate and mutinous conduct on the voyage. It is unnecessary to set forth with greater particularity the details of the pleadings. All that are material are comprehended in the issues above stated. Each libellant was examined as a witness for his co-libellants. The main facts which apparently entered into the judgment of the court are gathered from a mass of contradictory allegations, and exceedingly diffuse and rambling statements found in the depositions and oral evidence offered on the trial. They amount substantially to these:

The ship, on her return voyage from the East Indies, put into Cape Town in a leaky state. She lay in port three weeks. Some of her crew left her there. The four libellants shipped there for the home voyage to New-York, making up an extra complement to the ship's company. They knew the ship was in a leaking condition, and shipped with express notice that their services would be mainly required in pumping her on the voyage. The ship leaked two or three inches the hour when she went to sea. After being out about thirty hours, the libellants made known to the master that they were unwilling to proceed on the voyage because the ship was unseaworthy, and requested to be put back to Cape Town. There was nothing disorderly or disrespectful in their proceedings on that occasion. The rest of the crew united in that request. After consultation on board, the ship was put about, and an attempt was fairly made to work her into port. The wind and current being against her, it was found, after twenty-four hours effort, that she made no headway, and the master called all hands and told them he could make St. Helena easier than get back, and would run so as to sight the island, and would put in for repairs if the condition of the ship rendered it necessary; and if the leak did not increase he would make Pernambuco, and there have the ship hove out and fully repaired. To encourage the crew he engaged to give each man one dollar a day extra wages if they would work faithfully on the voyage. The chief work was at the pumps, the ship running free on the trade winds, exacted but slight labor in her navigation. The leak continued without intermission, and required heavy services at the pumps to keep the ship clear. The evidence varied widely between the men and sub-officers as to the degree of leakage and labor; the libellants, in their testimony, represent the leak to have increased to ten inches the hour, which would require, in the estimation of the mate, 4,500 strokes of the pump per hour to keep the ship afloat. He does not estimate the leak to have exceeded four inches the hour at any time, or to have required more than 750 strokes an hour to clear her. Several ship-masters, experienced in voyages to and from Calcutta, Manilla, &c., testified that they considered the ship seaworthy, manned as she was and running with the trade winds, if she made three or four inches of water the hour, and that 1,000 strokes the hour would be no extraordinary labor at the pumps, as she was manned and provided. The ship, after receiving partial repairs, had been surveyed at Cape Town before going to sea, and pronounced seaworthy. The leak was supposed to have been in her upper works.

The libellants, from the time the ship resumed her voyage, after the fruitless attempt to work back to Cape Town, became reluctant and slack in their work, and disobedient to the officers. Scott was the ring-leader, and was on different occasions insubordinate and insolent to the master, and acted as if determined to shirk all duty. After the ship passed St. Helena, the libellants openly refused to do duty, and went below in defiance of the officers. Scott declared himself an Englishman, and denied the authority of the master over him. They then sung Rule Britannia, in a rude and boisterous manner, and damned the American flag, and refused to come on deck and return to their duty. The master ordered them to be kept in confinement below and on short allowance of provisions for their disobedience and misconduct. They afterwards submitted to the authority of the officers and were again put to duty. When the ship arrived off the roadsteads of Pernambuco, the libellants became turbulent and insubordinate, and assaulted the master; a handspike was raised upon him by one, and Scott seized and held him fast, tearing his clothes. Scott was put in irons for the offence, and was frequently afterwards called upon to return to his duty. The other libellants submitted and went again to their duty. Scott, however, utterly refused to do so, and continuing mutinous and stubbornly insubordinate, was kept under confinement at intervals during the stay at Pernambuco, and then permanently until the arrival of the ship at this port.

The claimants gave direct and positive proof that before the suit was brought the wages of Rooney, Phillips and Channan were paid in full, and their receipt therefor was also given in evidence. Their proctor testified that the master and owners refused to pay any extra wages, and only paid what the captain asserted was the balance due them on the shipping articles, and the libellants denied that the account he made out of their wages was true. He was contradicted in this statement by the person who made the payments.

A. Nash, for libellants, insisted that the master deceived the men as to the condition of the ship when they shipped, overworked them cruelly at the pumps during the voyage, and had deviated from the voyage for which they shipped; that they had a right to refuse doing duty on board, and to leave the ship the first opportunity, and collect full wages to New-York; that they had not incurred a forfeiture of wages. That Scott was wantonly maltreated and imprisoned at Pernambuco and on the voyage thence to New-York, and that all the men were entitled to one dollar each per day extra wages for the full voyage home. He cited Sherwood v. McIntosh [Case No. 12,778]; Wood v. The Nimrod [Id. 17,959]; Snell v. The Independence [Id. 13,139]; 9 Johns. 158; 8 Law Rep. 70; Anth. N. E. Burr, for claimants, contended, on the facts, that the libellants established no right of action.

BETTS, District Judge. It will not be attempted in the examination of the merits of this case, to settle or discuss all the topics brought into the controversy in the multifarious evidence or protracted arguments of the parties. Four or five entire days have been exhausted on the hearing. The testimony upon various points in dispute cannot be reconciled, and the judgment of the court has not unfrequently been governed more by the strong probabilities surrounding the case, than the positive assertions of witnesses.

In respect to the condition of the ship when the libellants entered upon the voyage, I deem it less important to determine whether she was fully seaworthy than to ascertain the fairness of the dealing of the master with them. They were English seamen ashore, out of employment, and seeking an opportunity to leave the Cape. The ship lay about three weeks in the port undergoing repairs, and they had full opportunity to inform themselves of her state, so far as that could be known from external appearances and the degree of leakage, because, not only was her condition a fact of notoriety, but they were in intercourse with some of her crew who had left her at that port, and were themselves frequently about her, and, as it would appear, also on board her at her berth. The master explained her situation to them when they were hired, and engaged them expressly to aid in working the pumps, assuring them their general work in navigating her would be light, as he had shipped extra hands.

My attention has been carefully directed to this particular, as from the general heedlessness of sailors they are exposed to be drawn into improvident bargains; and these men, in a degree destitute, in that remote part of the world, where the opportunity to select their employment must be rare, would be eminently liable to imposition or disadvantageous engagements. But, looking watchfully at the whole evidence to this point, I am satisfied the libellants entered into this agreement with a plain understanding of its character and probable hazards, and that the officers of the ship practiced no deceit or improper influences with them in making the shipping contract. Still, if the ship was actually unseaworthy at the time, or proved to be so when she entered upon the voyage, the libellants were not bound by their contract, and could rightfully refuse to continue the voyage and compel the master to return with the ship to port. Porter v. Andrews, 9 Johns. 350; U. S. v. Ashton [Case No. 14,470]. The conduct of the libellants in requesting the master the first day out to go back to the port of departure, because of the leaking of the ship, was respectful and proper, and if not obeyed, provided the ship was unseaworthy, would have dissolved their obligation to remain with her and incur the hazard of a voyage on board. The master most properly submitted to their demand, and I think satisfactorily proves, he attempted in good faith to comply with it. His judgment, that greater danger was incurred by beating back against wind and current in her then state than by continuing his course upon the trade winds, is confirmed and justified by the judgment of several experienced shipmasters who were examined to that point on the trial. This was clearly explained to the crew at the time, and all hands went freely to their duty and put the ship upon her course. After this the libellants were bound to obey the orders of the master, and lend their services faithfully in the work of the ship.

I do not consider the statement of the master to the crew that he would run in sight of the island of St. Helena as a positive engagement to make that direction part of the route, so that a departure from it would constitute a deviation. The marine laws are peremptory that the master shall perform the voyage stipulated in the shipping contract, and holds the seamen discharged of their obligation to the ship if he deviates from it. Curt. Rights Seam. 25. But this duty respects the voyage, its inception, and its specified termini, and has no relation to the track or line of navigation pursued in accomplishing it. That must, from its nature, be contingent, or regulated at the sound discretion of the master. Had the libellants proved an express agreement of the master to run in sight of St. Helena, it would be no deviation, in a maritime sense, to have varied his route so as to fail of a literal fulfilment of such engagement. To keep intentionally away from the island would be a breach of the terms of such engagement, but it would be damnum absque injuria, if no necessity existed for resorting to that port. Of that necessity the master, from his position, must be judge, and if he acts in good faith and fairly upon the facts before him, his decision should be final. He considered the vessel capable of making Pernambuco, that she was under no exigency to seek St. Helena, and that there was no object in stopping there except to save the crew from imminent peril to their lives, as the ship could not obtain repairs at that port, and the interests and safety of the ship and crew required him to pursue the most direct course to Pernambuco. This conclusion is fully supported by the evidence in the case.

Nor under the facts can the claim of the libellants prevail, that they were absolved from all obligation of obedience and duty to the vessel because she was put upon the course to Pernambuco, and not directly to New-York. Ordinarily, the shipping contract is to be understood as contemplating a direct voyage from the port of departure to that of its termination, unless a different course is stipulated in the agreement, or is plainly made known to the seamen. The Minerva, 1 Hagg. Adm. 347; The George Home, Id. 372. But in this instance, after the ship left port, a departure from the shortest line to her port of destination would be justifiable on the fact that Pernambuco was the nearest accessible port at which the repairs needed could be obtained; and also because it was the surest and speediest route in the condition of the ship. A change of voyage which may discharge mariners from the obligation of their contract, must be wilfully made by the master, and enforced against their consent or acquiescence. Wood v. The Nimrod [Case No. 17,959]. This is a common course of navigation with vessels bound from the Cape to the United States, and might reasonably be implied as so understood by the libellants, as they were in the port, waiting and seeking the opportunity of a return to this country. They made no opposition or objection to this course of the voyage, when it was declared to them and was resumed, and the promise of extra pay had been given them. They grumbled afterwards, and were insolent and occasionally insubordinate, but their complaints were against the state of the ship and the labor exacted of them, and not to the course run, until they were carried past St. Helena. Then it was they refused to perform further duty on board unless the ship was taken back to the island, and persisted in the refusal until coerced by close confinement and privation of food to yield and return to their services.

These facts, I think, afford a satisfactory presumption, that if the master intended going to Pernambuco when the libellants were hired, they were apprised of it, or that if that route was fixed upon after getting to sea, they either acquiesced in it, or the change was one of probable necessity, and thus excusable in the master. Under either circumstance, the libellants were bound to a full obedience and faithful discharge of their contract, and their misconduct on that occasion, in my opinion, justly authorizes the owners of the ship to resist the demand for wages, and have, at least, judgment of forfeiture of the extra pay, being a proportion of the libellants' wages. The court is not compelled to pronounce a forfeiture of the entire wages, but may punish malfeasances or dereliction of duty at sea by such abstraction of wages or mulcts as will, in its judgment, supply an appropriate punishment. The Baltic Merchant, Edw. Adm. 86; The Lima, 3 Hagg. Adm. 359; Cloutman v. Tunison [Case No. 2,907]; Poth. Mar. Cont. art. 178; The Elizabeth Frith [Case No. 4,361].

The after submission of the men to the authority of the ship, and return to duty, with the acquiescence of the master, and their continuing to serve on board until her arrival at Pernambuco, should operate in equity to preserve the wages agreed in the shipping articles. I do not hold the transaction an entire condonation of their offence, yet I do not think the master should be allowed to inflict corporal punishment sufficient to bring the men back to duty, avail himself of their services, and then exact a confiscation of their whole wages for conduct, although highly disorderly and mutinous, yet based upon colorable grounds of wrong towards them, and of right on their part to hold themselves discharged of all obligation to the ship.

The point taken on the defence, that the engagement of the master to give the crew extra pay was obtained from him by duress, or unlawful compulsion, is not tenable. It was proposed spontaneously by himself, and in the exigencies of the ship and all her company, was reasonable and proper in itself, and would be upheld in favor of these men, had they not sacrificed their rights by their own after misconduct.

It is further insisted, that this claim was satisfied by the master after the termination of the voyage at this port, and was included in a receipt in full, taken by him on settlement with all the men except Scott. The testimony of the libellants' proctor, and a clerk of the claimants' proctor, in respect to that settlement, stands in direct conflict. Without deciding the question of credit between those witnesses, and independent of the other special grounds of defence, I shall place the denial of extra wages to these men, exclusively upon the right of the owners to their forfeiture. The proof is ample that their contract wages were fully paid, and that they became parties to this action solely to recover their extra pay.

It is therefore ordered, that the libel be dismissed in respect to Rooney, Phillips and Channan.

Although Scott had been the ringleader in the disturbances and mutinous conduct at sea on the passage from Cape Town to Pernambuco, yet I regard his restoration to duty by the master, on his confession of his faults and promise of good behavior, a remittance of the absolute forfeiture of wages he had incurred, and I shall not accordingly discriminate between his case and that of his fellows up to the arrival of the ship at Pernambuco roads.

The statements in the proofs of the transactions at Pernambuco in respect to Scott are entangled and equivocal, and lack that fullness and certainty which might enable the court to determine satisfactorily the true character and extent of his offences at that place. He was at times disorderly and dangerous, and was punished severely therefor, on shipboard and on shore, and it would appear that the master considered these punishments adequate and sufficient for the offences, as he offered to receive him back to his place in the ship. The other men involved with him in the misconduct accepted the pardon, and performed duty up to the arrival of the ship in New-York, and were there paid their wages in full. Scott maintained an unflinching refusal to submit, declaring he had been kept so long in irons he would remain in that condition to New-York, and be judged there, and he was accordingly confined in irons on board during the voyage home.

Scott addressed a letter to the master at Pernambuco, manifesting penitence and humble submission to his authority, promising to refrain from liquor and behave well thereafter. It is not clearly shown why that repentance was not accepted by the master, and it has not been made to appear distinctly that the letter was not written during his last confinement at that port, although much rambling and incoherent evidence was given tending to show that the letter was written long before the ship left the port, and that the conduct of Scott was constantly violent and refractory until her departure.

Scott insisted he was entitled to a discharge at Pernambuco, and that the master had no rightful authority over him there; and so far as he may be regarded acting under an honest belief in that right, his refusal to yield to the commands of the officers of the ship should be considered leniently, and his first offer to return to duty should have been accepted. The proofs, however, tend strongly to the conclusion that this submission was in fact offered and accepted on his first imprisonment, and that he immediately afterwards renewed his disorderly and mutinous conduct, and was imprisoned therefor on shore and in the ship. After he was brought back to the vessel, in irons, and on the homeward voyage, he was repeatedly urged by the master to return to his duty, but he peremptorily refused to do so. This conduct necessarily bars his demand for wages from Pernambuco to New-York.

Desiring to look as favorably as the testimony will admit at extenuating circumstances on the part of seamen, when a total forfeiture of wages already earned is sought for, I hold that the master has not given sufficient proofs to make the misconduct of Scott at Pernambuco, and from thence to New-York, forfeit his antecedent wages, and shall, accordingly, decree in his favor for the balance of wages due and unpaid, on the arrival of the ship at Pernambuco. I cannot collect from the proofs the true state of his accounts with the ship at the time he was imprisoned at Pernambuco, and, unless the parties agree upon the amount, it must be referred to a commissioner, to ascertain the sum then due him, deducting all payments made him.

The final decree will include all proper directions in respect to the details of the judgment and costs.

[The commissioner reported $15.42 as due to Scott. Exceptions were taken. The report was confirmed, but without costs to the libellant. Case No. 9,876.]

District Court, S. D. New York. July, 1846.

COSTS — ADMIRALTY — RULE — SEAMEN'S WAGES — FRIVOLOUS SUIT.

1. The prevailing party in admiralty suits is prima facie entitled to recover costs. The decree in his favor implies that he has been wrongfully delayed or prosecuted.

2. Still the common law rule to give costs in all cases to the successful suitor is not recognised in admiralty as the law of costs, and they are awarded at the sound discretion of the court, without regard to the ultimate termination of the action.

[Cited in brief in Lubker v. The A. H. Quimby, Case No. 8,586.]

3. A seaman will be denied costs in a suit for a small balance of wages due him, when payment of the balance has not been demanded of the master or owner of the ship, and no refusal to pay them has been made by either, and particularly if the seaman tacks to the debt other distinct and unsupported claims, and sues for the whole conjointly.

[Cited in The Boston, Case No. 1,672; Walsh v. The Louisiana, 4 Fed. 752.]

Upon the hearing and decision of this cause in March term last, the court ordered a reference to a commissioner to ascertain and report the precise date the libellant was imprisoned at Pernambuco the last time, in order to determine whether he rendered any services to the ship after that period. [Case No. 9,875.] The commissioner made his report pursuant to the order, and when filed, the claimants interposed exceptions to it.

E. Burr, for claimants.

A. Nash, for libellant.

PER CURIAM. The commissioner, pursuant to the order made in March upon the decision on the merits of this case, reported that the libellant was last imprisoned at Pernambuco, previous to the sailing of the ship for New-York, on the 2d day of April, 1845, and, computing his wages to that day, found the amount earned to be $33.44, and the balance due him $15.42, after all just deductions allowed against him. The claimants except to the report, and the point raised by the exception relates to the time to which the commissioner carried forward and credited wages to the libellant. The court, on the final decree, regarded the libellant entitled to wages to a certain period of the voyage, and that he had disabled himself claiming wages subsequent to that; but, upon the answer of the master and the proofs before the court, it was equivocal whether the libellant, after one imprisonment in Pernambuco by the local authorities at the instance of the master, and his subsequent return to duty with a virtual condonation of the offence, and substantially under a new engagement, had been again put in confinement by order of the master; and if so, when such imprisonment took place.

It not having been a prominent consideration in the contestation of the cause, to determine precisely the termination of the libellant's imprisonment at Pernambuco, the court decreed it proper, with a view to the final disposal of the case, to refer the subject to a commissioner to report what was "the time the libellant was last imprisoned and confined at Pernambuco previous to the sailing of the ship for New-York." In this way the court hoped to ascertain, satisfactorily, whether the libellant was all the time subject to his original shipping contract, or was to be regarded connected with the ship by a new engagement at Pernambuco.

The commissioner reported that time to have been the 2d of April, 1845, and returned the evidence upon which the report was founded. It appears that the ship arrived at Pernambuco about the 24th of February, 1845, and that on the 27th, Scott and his co-libellants were imprisoned on shore, because of their refusal to assist in unlading and repairing the vessel. They remained in prison until the 11th of March, when they were taken out and returned to duty on board, agreeing to continue with the ship to the termination of the voyage. The libellant, when intoxicated, proved insubordinate and disorderly, yet in the main conducted so far satisfactorily to the officers of the ship that he was retained at his work until about the 20th of April. Having that day been guilty of gross acts of violence towards the master, he jumped overboard and swam ashore to escape arrest by the officers, and the master states, in his answer, was confined on shore by the local authorities, and was the next day brought back to the ship by his orders. Rooney, a witness for the libellant, testified that Scott was put in prison a second time, three days after that release, and was confined six days, and that he was out of prison twelve or fourteen days on duty, when he was again put in irons. There is a good deal of obscurity in the testimony respecting the order of the transactions with Scott on shore and in the ship, but I think the more credible explanation of the circumstances is, that the day after the affray, on the 2d of April, Scott was brought back to the ship and flogged, but refusing to return to duty, he was put in irons on board, where the master and under officers endeavored to bring him to submit to their authority. The ship sailed the 6th of May, and Scott, persisting in refusing to obey orders on board, was continued in irons until his arrival in New-York. Neither the captain, in his answer, nor the second mate or steward, in their testimony, speak of the second imprisonment testified to by Rooney, nor does Rooney, the mate or steward give evidence of Scott's confinement on shore the first of April; but it is manifest, by comparing all the proofs, that the libellant was in prison ashore after his release on the 11th of March; and as it belonged to the claimants to prove that this was anterior to his being put in irons in the ship, and as this was a specific point of reference to the commissioner, I shall concur in the conclusion of the commissioner who examined this point carefully, that Scott was imprisoned in Pernambuco the day before he was put in irons on board the ship, and overrule the exception to the report on that point, and adopt the report that there is payable to the libellant the sum of $15 42 out of the wages due him on the voyage to Pernambuco.

The question of chief interest to the parties in this cause is that of costs, as they have accumulated to considerable magnitude from the course the litigation has taken. The court has already decreed costs in full to the claimants as against the co-libellants of Scott, and it remains to consider what are the equities in respect to this particular suit. The claims of costs between litigant parties, where there is usually much wrong, mingled with strong color of right on each side, more especially in actions for seamen's wages, present a class of questions of the most perplexing character, not readily settled upon any fixed principles. The common law rule of awarding costs invariably to the successful party is often marked with such manifest impropriety, not to say injustice, that courts of equitable authority reject it as a principle of decision, and assume to regard costs as one of the subjects of litigation, and dispose of them with a view to all the sound equities of the case. [Canter v. American, etc., Ins. Co.] 3 Pet. [28 U. S.] 319; 3 Hagg. 76; 1 Hagg. 83; 1 Wm. Rob. 21; Id. 124, 131, 215, 334, 447. In most of the cases cited, costs were decreed to the party prevailing in the action, and yet numerous decisions are found in the English and American admiralty reports where costs are awarded and withheld, irrespective of the result of the suit on the merits. 2 Hagg. 90; 1 Notes Cas. 305; 1 Hagg. Ecc. 210; Hutson v. Jordan [Case No. 6,959]; [Bingham v. Cabbot] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 34.

The court is accordingly bound, in determining the matter of costs, to weigh the relative rights and equities of the parties disclosed in the case, without being governed by the ultimate conclusion for or against either in the decision of the subject in controversy. The prevailing party is prima facie entitled to the costs of his suit or defence, the decree in his favor importing that he has been wrongfully delayed or prosecuted. This inference is, however, open in admiralty suits to be met and displaced by the general equities of the case.

This action was instituted to recover, and the libel demands wages for the entire voyage from Cape Town to New-York, and also extra wages of one dollar per day, apparently for the entire voyage, but with certainty from Cape Town to Pernambuco. The answer and claim of the master contests and denies the whole demand. It claims a forfeiture of the contract wages, because of the mutinous misconduct of the libellant, and denies the obligation of the special agreement at sea to pay wages, set up in the libel, and both parties take proofs at great length in support of their respective allegations. The court made a decree for a small part of the libellant's demand, and sustained the answer as to most of the particulars contested, and which embodied those branches of the case most strenuously litigated. The award of wages for part of the voyage was not upon the ground of the general meritorious conduct of the libellant; on the contrary, the court was constrained to declare his conduct on board during that period to have been often disorderly and mutinous, and his claim to wages was supported only because the court regarded the discipline inflicted by the master, the submission of the libellant and his after restoration to duty, as an equitable remission of the forfeiture which might otherwise have been enforced against him. Had the case accordingly presented no other question than the libellant's right to wages to Pernambuco, I am not prepared to say that the defence would not have been regarded bona fide as to that demand, and the authorities cited show that the court will not then necessarily give costs against the ship or owner, although the defence is unsuccessful.

The other features of the case, the demand for extra wages, and of contract wages for the entire voyage, compelled the owners to contest the suit, and they have clearly shown that it was unfounded and inequitable in relation to any claim beyond that of simple wages to Pernambuco, and these were saved only through an implied condonation of the offences which would have forfeited them. I think, then, it would be contrary to the usage of admiralty courts, and against the principle regulating their proceedings, to regard the small recovery of $15 42, as entitling the libellant to costs against the owners, when they have defeated claims of his mingled with it to several times that amount, and have proved his conduct in all respects from the time he undertook the voyage from Pernambuco to New-York mutinous and most injurious to their interests. Although I cannot, for these considerations, award the libellant costs, and although the proofs show his conduct to have been often turbulent and highly insubordinate, yet there are some particulars in the case evincing great hardship upon the libellant, and I am not disposed to subject him to any decree in favor of the master or owners for costs. As to the voyage to Pernambuco, there was strong color for his belief that he had been shipped on board a vessel no way seaworthy. And his disorderly and refractory conduct in that state of mind justly claims a lenient and forbearing consideration. And in the mixed and confused events connected with his conduct, and the dealings of the master with him at Pernambuco, I am inclined to think it must be understood that the old contract between them ended with that part of the voyage, and that his return to the ship at that port was upon a new engagement for the home voyage. From that time he plainly forfeited all wages for services he might have rendered on board before the ship sailed from Pernambuco, but the severity of treatment he underwent at the time and during the voyage ought to be regarded a sufficient punishment, without having added to it a decree for costs of suit. He was kept in irons on board of the ship more than a month at Pernambuco, and from that port to New-York, without evidence to show that this was necessary for the safety of the officers, the crew or the vessel. He also proves his repeated demand of the master to be discharged at Pernambuco, and having been shipped abroad and being a foreigner, the master was under no obligation to bring him to the United States.

Upon these considerations, I decree that the owners pay the libellant, or his proctors, $15 42, the wages due on the arrival of the ship at Pernambuco, and that each party pay his own costs in this action. Costs are withheld from the libellant on the recovery of the small balance of $15 42 found to be due him, because he had never demanded payment of that sum before suit brought, nor had it been refused him by the master or owner, but more especially because he made that balance the occasion of tacking to it in this suit unwarrantable claims, and driving the parties into an expensive and protracted litigation.

District Court. S. D. New York. April 23, 1879.

BANKRUPTCY — STOCK BROKER — MERCHANT OR TRADESMAN—FAILURE TO KEEP BOOKS —DISCHARGE.

The bankrupt was a stock and gold broker, but was not a member of the Stock Exchange. He took orders for the purchase and sale of stocks and gold, but conducted the business exclusively through the agency of other brokers, who were members of the exchange, and divided the commissions with them. Held, that he was not a merchant or tradesman, within the meaning of the act, and as such disentitled to a discharge for failure to keep books of account.

In bankruptcy.

B. Skaats, for bankrupt.

Chas. E. Crowell, for creditor.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is an application for the discharge of the bankrupt. The only specification is that, being a "merchant or tradesman," he kept no books of account. The bankrupt kept no books. The only question is, was he a "tradesman," within the meaning of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)]? The evidence as to the nature of the bankrupt's business is very confused; but, as nearly as it can be made out from his examination, it was as follows: He was a stock and gold broker, but without being a member of the Stock Exchange. He took orders for the purchase and sale of stock and gold, but did not himself execute the orders. He opened accounts in his own name, as "agent," with other brokers, who were members of the exchange, and they bought and sold for him upon his orders, and gave him half the commission usual in such transactions. He furnished those for whom he did the business a memorandum of each transaction immediately after it occurred. It did not appear whether his customers knew that he bought and sold exclusively through other brokers, nor was there any evidence of concealment. The debts contracted by him consisted chiefly of balances due the brokers through whom he acted, being in reality for excess of his losses over the margins deposited. There were also some debts for borrowed money, and some debts due to the customers who employed him, for balances on these stock transactions. Upon these facts, I think it clear that the bankrupt was not a "merchant or tradesman," within the meaning of the act, and as such disentitled to a discharge for failure to keep books of account. The careful discussion of the meaning of the word "tradesman" in recent cases makes it unnecessary to do more than refer to those authorities. BANKRUPTCY—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT—SETTING ASIDE CONVEYANCE BY ASSIGNEE.

[Cited in Re Hyde, 6 Fed. 594, to the point that the district court in bankruptcy has the power to set aside by summary process a conveyance executed by the assignee in bankruptcy which was improvidently, irregularly, or without due authority, executed by the assignee, or which was procured to be executed by fraud upon the court or upon the assignee, while the property so conveyed is still in the hands of the party to whom so conveyed by the assignee.]

It is next reported as heard in the district court upon application to set aside the sale by the assignee to Isaac C. Delaplaine of the bankrupts' interest in the estate of their grandfather John Hopper. The petitioners were allowed to move it into this court. Case No. 9,878a. It is now heard upon this removal.]

Judge Foote, for motion.

Mr. Betts, opposed.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. We have looked into the papers in this case, and are satisfied that the two orders entered by the district court, on the report of the general assignee, for a private sale of the assets of the bankrupts, on the 28th of February, 1860, were improvidently granted, and that they should be set aside, and, also, that the conveyance under them by the assignee to Isaac C. Delaplaine should be delivered up and canceled, and the monies paid by him, and deposited in the district court, be refunded to him, and those received by the assignee, and not so deposited, be refunded by the said assignee. We do not doubt but that the district court has full power and jurisdiction to make an order to the above effect. As to the prayer of the petitioners that conveyances of the property made by the assignee to Delaplaine be made to them, we are of opinion that the district court has no power to make such an order, or that it would be right or proper to make it, even if it had the power. In the existing condition of the matter in controversy, a proper and equitable disposition of them, in our judgment, would be an order directing a sale of these assets at public auction, giving ample notice of the time and place of sale, with a particular description of the nature, locality and boundaries of the property, it being real estate; or, at least, as full and particular a description as practicable. As to the question of the two years' limitation in the bankrupt statute, it has heretofore been adjourned to this court by the district court, and by this court held not to apply. Let the above be certified by the clerk to the district court.

[NOTE. Subsequently the administrators of Isaac C. Delaplaine petitioned to have the amount paid by him refunded to them. Case No. 9,879. At the public sale of this interest it was purchased by James M. Smith, Jr. A petition was filed to set aside this last sale. Petition dismissed. 6 Fed. 685.]

[Cited in Re Hyde, 6 Fed. 593.]

[This case was previously heard upon objections to petition of Jacob H. Mott to be decreed a bankrupt. Case No. 9,878b.]

This was an application to set aside a conveyance made by the general assignee in bankruptcy. Decrees of bankruptcy were rendered against both parties on January 27, 1843, and certificates of bankruptcy were granted to Jacob H. Mott on May 23, 1843, and to Jordan Mott on May 27, 1843. On February 28, 1860, the general assignee, to whom their estates had been assigned, filed a report in each case setting forth that application had been made to him to procure at private sale all the interest which the bankrupts had in the estate of their grandfather John Hopper, who died in August, 1819; that he had carefully examined the subject; and moved for an order authorizing him to sell that property. The order was entered, and the assignee sold the property at private sale to Isaac C. Delaplaine, for the sum of $800 for the property, and $200 to the assignee for his costs and expenses. Before the order authorizing the sale, Mr. Foot, as counsel of the Union Bank, of this city, applied to the assignee to sell the property to the bank for a nominal consideration and his costs; and he testifies that the assignee agreed to make such conveyance, and received $25 as his costs, and made the arrangement with Delaplaine in violation of that agreement. The bank thereupon filed a petition setting up these facts, and that they were creditors of both bankrupts, to a large amount, and prayed that the conveyance to Delaplaine should be rescinded, and that the assignee be compelled to fulfill his agreement with the bank. This motion on the petition and the opposing affidavits came on to be heard before Judge Hall on April 21, 1860, and he denied the motion, but "without prejudice to the rights of the parties, or to any other motion, suit, action, or proceeding in respect thereto." The motion is now reviewed on the same papers, together with a notice by the assignee of a dividend to be declared, published June 14, 1860, and a correspondence as to the terms on which Delaplaine would transfer his bargain.

HELD BY THE COURT: That the leave granted by Judge Hall gives no authority to repeat the motion on the same facts, and the additional papers do not touch the merits of the controversy, or tend to impeach the integrity or validity of the sale to Delaplaine or to strengthen the legal or equitable right set up by the petitioners in their original motion. That it is doubtful whether the petitioners are competent to prosecute any motion or proceedings in equity without having proved debts in their favor, under the bankrupt law [of 1841 (5 Stat. 440)], or whether they show any matter triable in this court under that law, which provides that no suit at law or in equity shall, in any case, be maintained by or against the assignee, unless the same shall be brought within two years after the declaration and decree of bankruptcy, or after the cause of action shall have first accrued. That the interests of the bankrupts under the Hopper will was not maintained in their schedules, nor indicated to the assignee by any of their creditors. No duty was imposed upon him by law to institute a search, or even an inquiry, in respect to an object so occult. When the matter was first brought to his notice by the counsel for the petitioners, it was asserted that it was of no value, and its transfer was asked, therefore, on a nominal consideration. Instead of enforcing a specific performance, the court would have held it a high dereliction of duty on the part of the assignee if he had so transferred it, having learned that it was of value to the United States. That the proceedings out of which the sale arose were conducted according to law, although the sale was not conducted with so vigilant an inquiry into the salable value of the interest as the court was entitled to expect from the assignee. That the petitioners establish no right to the interference of the court to cause a transfer of the property to them; but it appearing that there is color in the case for a more authoritative decision upon points of law of a general character, affecting the limitations of the bankrupt act and rights of parties under it, the case may, on motion, within ten days, be adjourned to the circuit court for adjudication upon such points, at the expense of the petitioners; otherwise the motion is denied, with costs.

BANKRUPTCY—RULES—DEBTS OF BANKRUPT—CONSIDERATION—ASSIGNMENT FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS.

[1. An order of court, accompanying the published rules and forms, providing that they shall govern proceedings in bankruptcy, requires that their substance shall be adhered to, rather than mere forms of expression.]

[2. A rule requiring petitions in bankruptcy to state the consideration or cause of indebtedness, as to the sums represented to be owing, is not violated by failure to state the consideration of a debt which has been converted into a judgment.]

[3. An allegation by a bankrupt that he had made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors some time before the date of his petition is not open to the objection that it fails to state what estate remains undisposed of, or that it fails to give the assignment itself, if accompanied by the sworn statement that the assigned property will not pay the debts it was conveyed to provide for.]

[In the matter of the petition of Jacob H. Mott to be decreed a bankrupt. Heard on objections to the petition.]

Before BETTS, District Judge.

Objections have been taken to the petition to be decreed bankrupt, because it is not in the form prescribed by the court, omitting the consideration or cause of indebtedness, as to various sums represented to be owing, and because it does not set forth the particulars of property assigned by the bankrupt in 1840 for the satisfaction of his then existing debts. The counsel for petitioner supposes the forms imposed by the court are not obligatory; and, if the court has such power to make them so, it has not exercised it in any notorious manner. The counsel is mistaken, as the published rules and forms are accompanied by an order of this and the circuit court that they shall govern proceedings in bankruptcy. The court, however, is not tenacious of words and phrases, but requires that the substance shall be preserved and adhered to, whatever deviations there may be from mere form of expression. The court has decided that when a debt no longer rests upon the personal undertaking of a bankrupt, but is converted into a judgment, it is unnecessary to give any other consideration, a judgment imputing the highest one in the law. So much of the objections as apply to judgments are therefore overruled. There are, however, various other items defective in alleging only an indebtedness to individuals, without any distinct disclosure of the consideration or grounds of indebtedness. A further objection is that the bankrupt alleges that he made an assignment in 1840 of all his estate and effects for the payment of his debts, but has not designated what his estate is, its location, &c. The court, in numerous cases, has decided that it is incumbent on the bankrupt to apprise his creditors and assignee what estate remains undisposed of, in cases of trust conveyance, and that this must be done by giving the assignment itself. These were, however, in cases where there was a resulting trust to the debtor manifestly unextinguished. The present case differs from those in this: that the petition and schedule nowhere represent that there is any residuary interest, as reserved to the bankrupt, and it does not therefore fall within the terms of those previous. This objection, at least, is an exceedingly sharp one, for the bankrupt swears explicitly that the assigned property will not pay the debts it was conveyed to provide for. Had the creditors charged that this reason was studied and intentional, and that the bankrupt knew that there was a contingent interest to his own benefit accompanying the assignment, and established the allegation by proof, the question as to the effect of the statement in its present form would be very different, for the matters of merit would be directly connected with the defect of form. This shows that the objections are all strictissimi juris. They involve no higher consideration than whether the petitioner has honestly and fully conformed to the forms prescribed by the court, and are undoubtedly well taken to the establishing a direction of that character. It is better that all parties should feel the necessity of adhering to an uniform course of practice, and that no deficiency or uncertainty of information to creditors should be encouraged in the framing of bankrupt papers, and therefore the court places this in the category of those where the party has made default in complying with the rules, and holds that the bankrupt cannot proceed on these papers without perfecting them by a proper amendment. This order, however, is not to carry any costs against the bankrupt.

Delaplaine of the interest of the bankrupts in the estate of their grandfather John Hopper. The court allowed the petitioners to move the case into the circuit court. Case No. 9,878a. BANKRUPTCY—CONTRACT WITH ASSIGNEE—APPLICATION TO HAVE AMOUNT PAID REFUNDED.

Where the general assignee of the bankrupt made certain conveyances of the real estate, the administrators of the grantee made application to have the amount paid on the contract of sale refunded, which was denied for the reasons that the contract of sale was not delivered up to be cancelled, and further that there was a failure to show that the transaction with decedent was made in good faith by the general assignee.

[In the matter of Jacob H. Mott and Jordan Mott, bankrupts.]

G. B. Goldsmith, for petitioners.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. When the questions in regard to the sales and transfers made to Isaac C. Delaplaine by the general assignee in bankruptcy in these cases were before the circuit court for this district in December, 1863, by adjournment from this court, Mr. Justice Nelson, in his opinion delivered in the matter, said that not only ought the orders of this court of the 28th of February, 1860, for the making of the sales in question, to be set aside, but the conveyances made under those orders by the general assignee to Delaplaine ought to be delivered up and cancelled, and the money paid by him and deposited in this court, amounting to $800, ought to be refunded to him, and the money paid by him to the general assignee and not so deposited amounting to $200, ought to be refunded to him by the general assignee, and that this court had power to make an order to that effect. [Case No. 9,878.] Judge Betts, in disposing of the matter in this court on the decision by the circuit court of the questions adjourned into that court, delivered a written opinion in which, after deciding that the proceedings to obtain the orders of sales were irregular, and that the sales were void, and ought to be set aside, he said: "If the purchase made by Delaplaine from the general assignee was bona fide, and in the belief that the power exercised on the occasion was rightly and fairly used by the general assignee in his behalf, it is competent for the court, if necessary, to afford the said Delaplaine relief against the erroneous proceedings, by compelling the restoration to him of the consideration paid by him on such void sale." It appears from the papers on file in these matters that on the 29th of February, 1860, the general assignee made conveyances to Delaplaine in pursuance of the sales, the conveyances being of interests of the bankrupts in certain real estate, and received from Delaplaine as the purchase money, $800, being $400 in each case, which sum of $800 was paid into this court, and is still in court, and also received from Delaplaine $200 for his "legal professional services" in the matters, which latter sum he has retained. It also appears from an affidavit made by Delaplaine on the 14th of December, 1860, that after his purchase from the general assignee, he employed a person by the name of Irving to ascertain the market value of the purchased property; that Irving had no authority to offer it for sale, but that having been informed by Irving of an offer he had made of it, he, Delaplaine, expressed his regret, but declared that as the offer had been made he would confirm what Irving had done. It also appears from the files of the court that Irving on the 14th of June, 1860, made a written offer on behalf of Delaplaine to sell for $20,000 what had been conveyed to Delaplaine by the general assignee.

An order was made by this court on the 17th of June, 1864, in pursuance of the decision of Judge Betts, before referred to, decreeing that the sale to Delaplaine was void, and that the orders of sale be revoked and annulled, and that the general assignee proceed in the due course of the administration of the duties of his office, and dispose of the assets of the bankrupts in his hands, and distribute the same according to law. The order made no provision in regard to paying any money back to Delaplaine, probably for the reason that Delaplaine made no application to court for that purpose, and still adhered to his purchase, as evidenced by the fact that he did not offer to deliver up for the purpose of cancellation, the conveyances which had been made to him by the general assignee. Delaplaine having died in July, 1866, his administrators now apply to this court by petition, praying for the refunding to them of the $1,000. But they do not offer to deliver up to be cancelled the conveyances made by the general assignee to Delaplaine; nor do they show that Delaplaine never assumed to dispose of what purported to be conveyed to him; nor do they show that Delaplaine never realized anything from a sale of the interests, or what disposition he made of them; nor do they show, in accordance with a view taken by Judge Betts in his opinion, that the purchase made by Delaplaine was bona fide, and in the belief that the power exercised on the occasion was rightly and fairly used by the general assignee in his behalf. The purchase for $800, with a fee of $200 to the general assignee, of what the purchaser less than four months afterwards held for sale at $20,000, would seem pretty conclusively to repel the idea that there could have been any bona fides in the transaction on the part of Delaplaine, or any belief on his part that the general assignee, in parting with the interests sold for $800, was exercising in a right and fair manner the powers of his office, which required him to realize as much as possible for the creditors of the bankrupts. The application, in the shape in which it is now made, is denied.

[NOTE Subsequently this same interest formerly purchased by Isaac C. Delaplaine was sold at public sale, and purchased by James M. Smith, Jr. A petition was filed to set aside this last sale. Petition dismissed. 6 Fed. 685.]

MOTT v. MARIS.

[2 Wash. C. C. 196.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1808.

BANKRUPTCY—ACT 1799—PREFERENCES—BOND FOR DUTIES—PAYMENT BY SURETY.

1. The sixty-fifth section of the bankrupt law of the United States, passed the 2d of March, 1799 [1 Stat. 676], does not repeal the provisions of the law of the United States, which give to the surety who pays bonds for duties, a preference over other creditors.

2. The provisions of the bankrupt law except from its general operation, not only the preference of the United States, but also the right of preference for satisfaction of debts due to the United States.

Judgment was agreed to be entered in this case for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on the following point: Whether a surety on certain custom-house bonds, having discharged the same after the date of the commission of bankruptcy, some of which were due before, and some after the date of the commission; can recover the amount so paid in the present action, and is entitled to a preference over the general creditors, to be first paid out of the effects of the bankrupt [Maris] in the hands of the assignee.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The only question is, whether plaintiff is entitled, under the sixty-fifth section of the act of March 2d, 1799, to recover against the assignees, the full amount of what he has paid to the United States, as surety for the bankrupt, in the custom-house bonds mentioned in the case. The only difficulty is, whether this section of the law, so far as it respects the preference given to the surety, be or be not repealed, by the general terms of the bankrupt law. It is admitted, that it is not repealed in express terms, although it is certain that the general terms of the law make no discrimination in his favour; and, in some respects, there is an apparent inconsistency between the provisions of the first, and those of the second law, in relation to such preference. On the other hand, it may be said, that the first law went very far to place the surety, who has discharged the debt, on the pre-eminent ground on which the United States stood, by authorizing him, instead of pursuing his common law remedy against the principal, to bring his action on the bond itself, though given to the United States; thus, in a measure, sheltering him under the high prerogative rights of the United States. It may be contended, that upon the principle admitted in courts of equity, the surety, if first resorted to, and obliged to pay may claim the advantage of all the securities which the creditor possessed against the principal, and which he might have enforced, had a recovery been had, in the first instance, against the principal; and that his situation ought not to be rendered worse, by the election made by the creditor, over whose conduct he had no control. It might further be said, that the sixty-second section of the bankrupt law, does not merely save from the general operations of that law, the preference due to the United States, but the right of preference to satisfaction of the debts due to the United States; that this was a debt due to the United States, entitled to certain privileges; and that, consequently, the bankrupt law never attached either to the right of the United States, or to the debt itself. We feel some doubt whether this be the correct construction of the law; but, as it has been adopted by the supreme court of this state, our respect for the talents of that court, and our wish that as little collision as possible, should take place between the decision of the federal and state tribunals upon the same questions, will induce us also to adopt the same construction. Judge PETERS entirely concurs in that opinion. Though, in the case referred to, the payments were made by the surety before the bankruptcy of his principal, still there is no difference between that and this case, if the right of preference of the surety remains unaffected by the bankrupt law. Judgment for the plaintiff for his full demand.

4. The recording or non-recording of the conveyance of a vessel, only affects the question of the priority of liens on the vessel. It does not affect the question of the personal liability of her owner.

[Cited in Secrist v. German Ins. Co., 19 Ohio St. 484.]

This was a libel in personam, filed in the district court, by [John H.] Mott against [Elisha B.] Ruckman, as owner of the brig Radius, to recover the sum of $274, for necessary stores and provisions furnished the vessel upon the order of her master. She was about entering upon a voyage from New York to Norfolk, Va., and thence to the West Indies, and credit was given for the bill of supplies until she should return from her voyage. Jennett, the master, who ordered the supplies, chartered her from Ruckman, on the 25th of September, 1851, for twelve calendar months from that date, at the rate of $200 per month, the charterer to keep the vessel in good repair during the term, and pay all bills and demands against her, and do all acts necessary to her safety and good condition, and deliver her up in good order at the expiration of the twelve months, ordinary wear and tear excepted. There was also a special stipulation in the charter-party, that the charterer should furnish the vessel with all the requisite stores and materials, and should also bear the expenses of her navigation, the vessel to be delivered into his possession for his sole use and disposal during the said term. The vessel had been purchased by Ruckman on the 25th of September, 1851. On the same day, the sale was recorded, the vessel was registered in his name, and the charter-party was entered into between him and Jennett. The supplies in question were ordered by Jennett on the 19th of September, although they were not delivered until the 25th. The question in the case was, whether or not the owner was liable for them under the circumstances. The supplies were furnished by the firm of S. & E. S. Bloomfield; but, in order that the members of that firm might be witnesses in the case, they assigned the demand to the libellant, and one of the members of the firm was the principal witness to sustain the action. Jennett, who was a witness for the defence, testified that, at the time he purchased the supplies, he informed the firm, that he had chartered the ship for the voyage above mentioned, and that he wanted the goods on credit until the vessel should return, which was agreed to. The vessel returned in February, 1852, and, soon afterwards, the bill was presented to him for payment, but was not paid. Bloomfield denied that Jennett informed the firm, at the time of the purchase, that he had chartered the vessel from Ruckman for the voyage; but admitted that Jennett told him, at the time, that Ruckman was negotiating for the purchase of the vessel, that the papers for the transfer had not been completed, but that they would be in a few days, and that he (Jennett) was to be the master. He further stated, that he delayed the delivery of the stores until Ruckman became the owner, for the purpose of securing his liability for the payment; and that he ascertained that the title of the vessel was perfect at the custom-house before the goods were actually delivered.

[This is the substance of the testimony in the case that has any material bearing upon the question involved, although the examination of the witnesses was extended in the court below to a most unreasonable and unprofitable length.] [2]

The court below decreed in favor of the libellant. The respondent appealed to this court.

John Cochrane, for libellant.
Edward Sandford, for respondent.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. Looking at the case in any aspect in which it can be viewed, it is quite clear, that, although Ruckman was the general owner of the vessel at the time the supplies were furnished, yet Jennett, who procured them, was himself the owner pro hac vice, by virtue of the charter-party, and hence the person exclusively responsible for them. Frazer v. Marsh, 13 East, 238; McIver v. Humble, 16 East, 169; Reeve v. Davis, 1 Adol. & El. 312; Abb. Shipp. (4th Am. Ed.) 22, and notes; Webb v. Peirce [Case No. 17,320]. He was not the master of Ruckman at the time, but the master of the vessel, representing his own interest as charterer. Ruckman had neither appointed him, nor held him out to the public as the master of a vessel over which he had any control; and hence Jennett possessed no power to bind him, as his agent.

This was admitted by the counsel for the libellant, on the argument; but it was insisted that, in the absence of notice of the charter-party to the persons who furnished the stores, it must be regarded as null and void, under the provisions of the act of July 29, 1850 (9 Stat. 440). But, assuming this to be so, I am satisfied that the Messrs. Bloomfield are chargeable with notice. Besides the positive testimony of Jennett, it appears that they made inquiry in respect to the fact of the purchase of the vessel by Ruckman and of the transfer of her title, of which vessel Jennett was to become the master. Having made this inquiry, they must have known the relation in which he stood as master of the vessel; or, if they did not, the failure must be attributed to their own negligence. After they took so much pains to ascertain the point of time when the negotiation for the vessel was concluded, and when Ruckman became owner, so as to charge him with the stores previously ordered by Jennett, and delayed the delivery till he could become the master, it is difficult to say that they were not cognizant of all the circumstances connected with the transaction, and consequently of the relation in which he stood as master of the vessel. I cannot doubt, therefore, that they are properly chargeable with notice of that relation, if the fact be at all material.

The act of July 29, 1850, provides, that no bill of sale, mortgage, hypothecation, or conveyance of any vessel, &c., shall be valid against any person other than the grantor or mortgagor, his heirs and devisees, and persons having actual notice thereof, unless the same be recorded in the office of the collector, &c. The second section provides for the recording; and the third, that the collector shall keep an index of such records, inserting, alphabetically, the names of the vendor or mortgagor, and of the vendee or mortgagee, &c. The argument is, that the charter-party in question is a conveyance, within the first section of the act, and, not having been recorded, is, therefore, void as to third persons who have not had actual notice of it, and hence is not in the way of the libellant. There is, undoubtedly, some plausibility in the argument, and some difficulty in answering it. And yet, the instrument in question is so common and well known in the business of commerce, and in the use and employment of vessels, that if congress had intended to embrace it, it would have been most natural to have mentioned it in terms. And the phraseology of "vendor" and "vendee," and "mortgagor" and "mortgagee," used in the third section of the act, to designate every description of conveyance specified in the first, is scarcely appropriate language to define a charter-party. But, be this as it may —and I do not intend to express any definite opinion upon it—it seems to me quite clear that, even conceding the construction contended for, the only consequence would be to subject the vessel to liability in favor of third persons, the same as if no conveyance had been made. Recording acts relate to conflicting interests, and liens acquired in and upon lands and chattels, and are designed to regulate the same. Thus, in the present case, if the Messrs. Bloomfield had had a valid lien upon the vessel for the stores furnished, a previous unrecorded conveyance by the master would be postponed. This is the extent of the act. In my judgment, it has nothing to do with the personal liability of the owner of the vessel. It is important when the question relates to an interest in or claim upon the vessel itself, but not otherwise.

In any view, therefore, that I have been able to take of the case, I think that the decree of the court below was erroneous, and that it must be reversed, with costs.

Their aggregate is $5,219.90. They are all dated at the city of New York, and are made payable at the Bank of North America in that city. These notes were executed by John Wright to the defendant, Williamson W. Wright, and were by him indorsed in blank.

Non-assumpsit is pleaded; and the trial of this issue is, by agreement, submitted to the court without a jury. It would be tedious to detail all the testimony. The following is the substance of the evidence:

The notes and their indorsements were produced in evidence. For some time before they were made, John W. Wright was largely indebted to Robert Ellis, of New York. The debt evidenced by these notes had been kept afloat by what are called "renewal notes" made to Ellis. Of these, the notes sued on are the last series. To procure them, Ellis sent his agent from New York to the residence of the maker and indorser in Indiana, with the notes then blank, to get them executed and indorsed. John W. Wright being then abroad, the agent called on Williamson W. Wright, the defendant, who, at the agent's request, indorsed the notes. Thereupon, the agent left the notes in this condition with D. D. Pratt, an attorney of Indiana, with the request to him that he should ask the said John W. Wright to sign them and forward them to Ellis, in New York. Pratt did so. John W. Wright thereupon signed the notes in Indiana, and forwarded them by mail to Ellis, in New York. When the notes respectively fell due a demand for payment was properly made, and notices of their non-payment were duly given, according to the law merchant.

By the law of Indiana, the indorser of such notes as these is not liable, in consequence of their non-payment and notice thereof, to pay them. Due diligence to collect them from the maker by a suit against him must generally be used in order to fix the liability of the indorser. 1 Gavin & H. St. 448; Kelsey v. Ross, 6 Blackf. 536. By the laws of New York, it is otherwise. There, such notes are governed by the rules of the law merchant; and the indorser is liable, as on an inland bill.

It becomes important, therefore, to ascertain whether the indorsements in question are governed by the laws of Indiana or the laws of New York. According to the evidence, if the Indiana law prevails, the plaintiff can not recover, because he does not appear to have exercised the diligence which that law requires. But if the law of New York is to govern in this matter, then it is plain that the finding must be for the plaintiff.

It is settled in Indiana that the indorsement of a note is a new, distinct contract, and is governed by the law of the state in which the indorsement is made, and not by the law of the place where the note was executed. Hunt v. Standart, 15 Ind. 33; Rose v. Park Bank, 20 Ind. 94. The only question, then, is, were these indorsements executed in Indiana or New York? The execution of an indorsement—and indeed of every written contract—includes, in legal contemplation, two essential things; the actual writing and signing of the instrument, and the delivery of it thus written and signed.

In the case at bar, it is very clear that the writings on the back of the notes were made by the defendant in Indiana. But to make those writings of any validity as a contract between the parties, they must have been delivered. Upon the evidence, were these notes, thus indorsed, delivered to Ellis in Indiana or in New York? It is a well-settled rule of law, that "a note has no binding effect until it is delivered. So, when indorsed by the payee. * * * No matter when or where notes are signed; they are made at the time and place, and by the act, of delivery accompanied by acceptance." Edw. Bills, 187; Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 Comst. [N. Y.] 266. The same rule must apply to the indorsement of notes, because the reason is the same. Well may we therefore say, that no matter when or where an indorsement of a note is made, in legal contemplation the indorsement is executed by the act of delivery to, and the acceptance of, the indorsee.

In this view, the discussion seems to be narrowed down to the following inquiry: Was the act of John W. Wright in inclosing the notes, filled up, signed by him, and indorsed by the defendant, in a letter directed to Ellis in New York, and in placing the same in an Indiana postoffice, a delivery of the notes and indorsements to Ellis, and an acceptance of them by him? In view of the evidence, I can not think that, in legal contemplation, it was. The notes, as indorsed, were "renewal notes." The acceptance of them would, I think, under the circumstances proved, have operated to extinguish the old notes in the place of which they were given. When they were received by Ellis, in New York, he might, so far as I can see, have refused to accept them, and held on to the old notes. But when they came to his hands and he determined to take them in satisfaction of the old notes, the new notes with the indorsements on them were, I think, then and there, in legal contemplation, delivered and accepted. And I am inclined to the opinion that neither the notes nor the indorsements on them had any legal existence till that moment.

It has been suggested by counsel for the defendant, that if these notes had been lost on their way to New York, the plaintiff might have sued on them as lost instruments. But this, I rather think, is begging the question. He might have sued on them, under such circumstances, if there had previously been a legal, valid delivery and acceptance of them; otherwise, not.

From the evidence, I conclude that the arrangement between Ellis and John W. Wright was substantially this: that if the latter would send to the former certain notes well indorsed, he would receive them in lieu of the notes he then held of John W. Wright; and that till he did so receive them, the arrangement was not consummated. Moreover, till Ellis had actually received these notes, he could not have negotiated them, as he did, to the plaintiff. The notes, as we have seen, were indorsed in blank, and were negotiated to the plaintiff by actual delivery. Indeed, they could not have been transferred to him in any other manner.

Besides, it may well be asked whether, if these notes had been lost on their way to New York, Ellis would have been bound to deliver up the old notes as satisfied by the receipt of the new. I think that, in such a case, he might have maintained an action on the old notes. It should seem unreasonable to hold that the old notes were extinguished before the new were actually received and accepted.

The case of Cook v. Litchfield, 9 N. Y. 279, appears fully to sustain the foregoing view. That case was much like the present. In both, the defendants were accommodation indorsers, and indorsed, out of the state of New York, notes payable in it. In the case referred to, the court say "the defendant indorsed the notes for the accommodation of the maker. This appears from the fact that the notes came from the possession of the maker and not of the indorser, and were first negotiated in New York, and apparently for the benefit of Carew, the maker. So long as they remained in Carew's hands, there was no liability on the part of the indorser. The indorser's contract, therefore, must be regarded as having been made in New York, where the notes were delivered to Ryckman (the first indorsee) and the indorsement first became effective. The law of Michigan (where the indorsement was made) has no application to the case. The contract having been made in New York, the law of New York governs the case with respect to the sufficiency of the notice."

With some doubt as to the justness of the views above expressed, I am inclined to think that, on the evidence, the law is with the plaintiff. Finding for the plaintiff accordingly.

NOTE. An assignment of a negotiable instrument is a new contract between the assignor and assignee, and is governed by the law of the place where it is made. McClintick v. Cummins [Case No. 8,699].

The doctrine of lex loci is thoroughly discussed by Judge Story in his work on Conflict of Laws, §§ 261–272, and §§ 316, 317, where he says that it is clear, upon principle, that the indorsement, as to its legal effect and obligation, and the duties of the holder, must be governed by the law of the place where the indorsement is made.

In the case of Williams v. Wade, 1 Metc. [Mass.] 82, which was an action in Massachusetts upon a note made and indorsed in Illinois, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover against the indorser, it not being shown that he had taken those proceedings against the maker which, in Illinois, are essential before a recovery can be had against the indorsee. Chief Justice Shaw, in delivering the opinion in that case, says: "The note being indorsed in Illinois, we think that the contract created by that indorsement must be governed by the law of that state. The law in question does not affect the remedy, but goes to create, limit and modify the contract effected by the indorsement. In that which gives force and effect to the contract and imposes restrictions and modifications upon it, the law of the place of contract must prevail, when another is not looked to as a place of performance."

In the case of a bill drawn and indorsed in New Granada, payable in New York, it was held in Everett v. Vandryes, 19 N. Y. 436, that as between the drawer and indorsee the law of the place of payment should govern, though as between indorser and indorsee the law of the place of indorsement would control. Consult also Aymar v. Sheldon, 12 Wend. 439.

The only case within our knowledge asserting a contrary rule is Roosa v. Crist, 17 Ill. 450, which was an action by the indorsee of a promissory note, payable to bearer, transferred by delivery in New York, where such a transfer is good and passes the legal title; by the law of Illinois the indorsement must be by writing and upon the instrument itself. The court held that the law of the forum must govern, and that the plaintiff could not sue in his own name. The court, however, in that case seem to overlook the distinction between the mode in which relief will be administered and the legal status of the parties, and one of the three judges, in a dissenting opinion, insists upon what is certainly the general rule and the current of authority, that the effect of the negotiation by delivery in New York was to transfer the legal title to the plaintiff, and by the law of comity he may sue in this state in his own name, adopting the forms of remedy afforded by the local law.

For further authorities that the place of contract and delivery is to govern, see 2 Pars. Notes & B. 327, note z.

Consult Trimbey v. Vignier, 1 Bing. N. C. 151, 159; 27 E. C. L. 584, where, in a suit by the holder of a bill of exchange made and indorsed in blank in France, but without the formalities required by the Civil Code, it was held that no recovery could be had in the English courts, as the contract was governed by the laws of France.

MOTTE v. BENNETT.

[2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 642.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. June, 1849.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TRIAL BY JURY—PATENTS—ACTION FOR INFRINGEMENT—INJUNCTION—PRACTICE IN EQUITY.

1. The seventh amendment to the constitution of the United States is a provision exclusively for cases at common law.

2. Section 14 of the act of July 4, 1836 [5 Stat. 123], is, in terms, exclusively for actions at law for damages, and the treble amount which the court may give, over the sum found by a jury, can not, in any case, be given by a court of chancery.

3. If each infringement of the patent were to be made a distinct cause of action, the remedy would be worse than the evil. The inventor might be ruined by the necessity of perpetual litigation, without ever being able to have a final establishment of his rights.

4. The plaintiff could have no preventive, at law, to restrain the future use of his invention injuriously to his title and interest.

5. By discretion is meant an obligation upon judges in chancery to determine each case, as nearly as it can be done, by what has been the course in chancery in like cases. It never means will or authority in the judge, but both restrained by decided cases or long standing rules.

6. The rules in respect to injunctions to restrain a party in a suit at law, whatever may be the character of such a suit—for instance, to restrain an action of ejectment—differ materially from those which govern courts in granting or refusing injunctions in cases of invention and copyright.

7. A jury trial of the alleged infringement has not been a prerequisite for the action of the court, in England, since 1761.

8. In England, for more than eighty years, injunctions, both provisional and perpetual, have been granted, in the first instance, in cases of copyrights and patents; and where they have been perpetual in the first instance, they have been made so without the intervention of a jury to try the question of title or infringement, in all cases where the court was fully satisfied with the proof, notwithstanding the defendants may have denied in their affidavits or answers the originality of the invention or the sufficiency of the specification. The practice in the courts of the United States, in respect to granting injunctions in patent cases, has always been that of the English chancery.

[Cited in Brown v. Hinkley, Case No. 2,012.]

9. In equity, where the case is clear and without reasonable doubt, where the bill states a clear right to the thing patented, which, together with the alleged infringement, is verified by affidavit, and where the plaintiff has been in possession of it, by having sold or used it, in part or in the whole, the court will grant an injunction and continue it till the hearing or further order, without sending the plaintiff to law to try his right.

[Cited in Brown v. Hinkley, Case No. 2,012.]

10. The rule as to injunctions applies as well to a bill brought by an assignee as to one brought by the original inventor.

This was bill in equity [by Joshua W. Motte,] filed to restrain the defendant [Washington J. Bennett] from infringing letters patent for an "improvement in the method of planing," etc., granted to William Woodworth, and more particularly referred to in the report of the case of Foss v. Herbert [Case No. 4,957].

W. H. Seward, for complainant.

Petigru & Memminger, for defendant.

WAYNE, Circuit Justice, after examining the question of infringement, and one or two preliminary points relating to local practice, proceeded as follows:

After the court had overruled the motion of the defendant's counsel to conclude the argument, Mr. Memminger proceeded in it, and stated three propositions.

First. "That by the seventh amendment to the constitution the alleged infringement should be tried by a jury." That amendment is a provision exclusively for cases at common law. It is: "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined, in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law."

That it is meant exclusively for suits at common law, has been several times ruled by the supreme court of the United States. Besides, all the legislation of congress concerning trials of suits in the courts of the United States, makes the same distinction between trials of suits at common law and of those in equity and admiralty. It could not be otherwise, as the distinction is made in section 2, art. 3, of the constitution, between "cases at law and equity." And every case in which a jury shall be called, in the courts of the United States, is provided for, either in the constitution as it came from the convention, or in the subsequent amendments. They are: "The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." Section 2, art. 3. "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury." 5th amendment. "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law." 6th amendment. The other instance is the seventh amendment, already cited. We will only further remark upon this point that section 14 of the act of July 4, 1836, which was cited on the argument in connection with the constitutional amendment, has no bearing upon it. That section is in terms exclusively for actions at law for damages, and the treble amount which the court may give over the sum found by a jury, can not, in any case, be given by a court of chancery. Indeed, if any one thing could show more plainly than another, that a trial by a jury in a patent cause was not thought the best way to compensate a patentee for an infringement of his patent, it is this legislative authority given to the court to give a threefold amount over the sum found by the verdict of a jury.

The second proposition, that the bill of the complainant could not be maintained, because he had an adequate remedy at law, can not be sustained.

The principle upon which courts of equity have jurisdiction in patent cases, and upon which injunctions are granted in them, is not that there is no legal remedy, but that the law does not give a complete remedy to those whose property is invaded; for if each infringement of the patent were to be made a distinct cause of action, the remedy would be worse than the evil. The inventor or author might be ruined by the necessity of perpetual litigation, without ever being able to have a final establishment of his rights. Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 223; Harmer v. Plane, 14 Ves. 132; Lawrence v. Smith, Jac. 472.

In addition to this consideration, the plaintiff could have no preventive at law to restrain the future use of his invention or the publication of his work, injuriously to his title and interest. Besides which, in most cases of this sort, the bill usually seeks an account, in the one case, of the books printed, and, in the other, of the profits which have arisen from the use of the invention, to the persons who have pirated the same. And where the right has been already established under the direction of the court, there this account will, in all cases, be decreed as incidental to the other relief which may be obtained prospectively by a perpetual injunction. Mit. Eq. Pl. (by Jeremy) 138; Hogg v. Kirby, 8 Ves. 223, 224; Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson, 6 Ves. 705, 706; Baily v. Taylor, 1 Russ. & M. 73.

This brings us to the third proposition in the argument. It was that a court of equity had no discretion to decree an injunction upon an alleged infringement of a patent unless that question had been first passed upon by a jury, and that such was the meaning of that provision in section 17 of the act of July 4, 1836, which gives to the circuit courts power "to grant injunctions according to the course and principles of courts of equity." By discretion, of course, is meant an obligation upon judges in chancery to determine each case, as nearly as it can be done, by what has been the course in chancery in like cases, as well as to prescribe the practice to be observed in each case, and the principles by which the right is to be determined between the parties in controversy. It never means will or authority in the judge, but both, restrained by decided cases or long standing rules.

The point then is, what have been the course and principles of courts of equity in granting injunctions for alleged infringements of inventions. It is not denied, nor can it be denied, that the infringement is regularly and fully alleged in this case, with all those substantial averments and affidavits which the practice in courts of equity requires.

Before showing what the course in equity has been, in granting such injunctions, it is proper to state what an injunction is, in the meaning and practice of a court of equity. It is either provisional or perpetual. The first being common or special—common, such as are granted upon the defendant's default either in appearing or answering, and are only applicable to restrain proceedings in the courts of common law—special, when granted upon the special grounds arising out of the circumstances of the case. Injunctions of this description are issued sometimes on the merits disclosed by the answer, sometimes on affidavits before the answer is filed, and sometimes even without notice and before the defendant has appeared. Beames, Orders Ch. 16; Perk. Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1810. A perpetual injunction is a part of the decree made at the hearing upon the merits, whereby the defendant is perpetually inhibited from the assertion of a right, or perpetually restrained from the commission of an act which would be contrary to equity and good conscience. Id. Such is the injunction sought for in this case.

From this statement of what an injunction is, and the different kinds of them for different purposes, it is obvious that, in any investigation on an application for one, the object of it must first be considered, in order to make to it a proper application of decided cases. The rules in respect to injunctions to restrain a party in a suit at law, whatever may be the character of such suit, for instance to restrain an action of ejectment, as was the case in Brown v. Newall, 2 Mylne & C. 571, cited by counsel, differ materially from those which govern courts in granting or refusing injunctions in cases of invention and copyright. In these there are requisites and allowances peculiar to themselves, which do not exist and are not permitted in any other case of an application for an injunction. Daniell, Ch. Prac. 186. It is asked in this case on account of an infringement of an invention. It can only be granted according to the course of equity, after the complainant in the case has brought his case within that course.

Is a jury trial of the alleged infringement a prerequisite for the court's action? It has not been so in England, as a rule, since 1761. In Dodsley v. Kinnersley, Ambl. 403, in which the expressed point was raised upon a bill for an injunction to restrain the defendant from printing Dr. Johnson's Rasselas, and for an account of the profits made by having printed it, Sir Thomas Clarke, master of the rolls, said: "I would have it understood that there is no impropriety in the application to this court. The method of proceeding in these cases has been changed. Formerly, in the case of a patentee, on opening the case, he partly was sent to law to establish his right, and then came back for an account." We see also, from an anonymous case from Vernon, cited by Drewry on Injunctions, a work relied upon by the defendant, that the practice had been as was stated by the master of the rolls in Dodsley v. Kinnersley. But we also see, in the same work, that at the present day it is not generally necessary that the plaintiff should establish his right at law, in order to come into equity, the right appearing prima facie on the record by the letters patent. Drew. Inj. 221, margin, for which he cites Mitf. Eq. Pl. 147, Hicks v. Raincock, Dickens, 647, and 1 Ves. Sr. 476. In truth, what was the practice in England in respect to patents, and for reasons which we shall state before we conclude, has not been the practice there for more than eighty years. Daniell, as we have shown Drewry does, says: "On both occasions of patents and copyrights, it was formerly the practice, on opening the case, to send the party to law to establish his right. But, on both occasions, the practice has been altered, and now, when the right of the patentee appears on the record, and the patent has been granted for some length of time, and the public has permitted the exclusive and undisturbed possession of it for several years, under such circumstances the court will interpose by injunction in the first instance without putting the party previously to establish his right in an action at law." For this he cites Boulton v. Bull, 3 Ves. 140; Harmer v. Plane, 14 Ves. 133; and Hill v. Thompson, 3 Mer. 622. In such cases, however, there must be satisfactory evidence of exclusive possession by the patentee, and where this is wanting, the court will not interfere without a trial at law. Collard v. Allison, 4 Mylne & C. 487. And what in England is meant by exclusive possession, we know from what was said in the case of Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson, 6 Ves. 689. There Lord Eldon denied the rule stated by the judges in Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burrows, 2377, as to injunctions, and referring to Boulton v. Bull, and several other cases, stated the principle, particularly in regard to patents, to be, that if a party gets his patent and puts his invention in execution, and has proceeded to a sale, that may be called possession under it. However doubtful it may be whether the patent can be sustained, equity will hold that possession under a color of title, is ground enough to enjoin and to continue the injunction till it is proved at law that it is only color and not real title." Of course, when the patent or the infringement of it is already before a jury, as was the case in Collard v. Allison, 4 Mylne & C. 487, equity will not interfere to enjoin while it is so.

We will now notice the cases which were cited by counsel in support of the practice for a jury trial. Some of them are inapplicable, because they do not relate to patents or copyrights, and we have shown that injunctions in such cases are controlled by rules exclusively applicable to them. When carefully examined, some of the other cases maintain the opposite doctrine to that contended for by the counsel for the defendant. No one of them maintains the practice of the right of a party charged with the infringement of a patent, when he denies it either by affidavit or by answer, to a jury trial, except the case of Millar v. Taylor, 4 Burrows, 2400, decided in 1769, which we have seen is an overruled case by several subsequent decisions, and is denied by Lord Eldon, in Hill v. Thompson, 3 Mer. 626, ever to have been the rule of practice in patent or copyright cases.

The cases of Lord Tenham v. Herbert, 2 Atk. 483, and of Brown v. Newall, 2 Mylne & C. 571, were for the trial of title, the first to an oyster fishery, the other to land. In the first, Lord Hardwicke refused to interfere by injunction to settle a right of fishery between the lords of two manors; and Brown v. Newall was an application for a common injunction to restrain proceedings at law in a case of ejectment. Boulton v. Bull, 2 H. Bl. 492, was an action on the case for infringing a king's patent and the court said, upon a point raised whether a model was or was not necessary for the purpose of showing an infringement, that it was not the province of a judge in a court of law to decide an infringement, but that it was a question for the jury, and that if they could understand the case without a model or drawing, there was no rule which made one indispensable. But it will be found also that the court, in that case, recognized the rule in chancery, "that when the right of the patentee appears on the record, and the patent has been granted for some length of time, and the public has permitted the exclusive and undisputed possession of it for several years, under such circumstances, equity will interfere by injunction, in the first instance, without putting the party previously to establish his right in an action of law." The case of Blanchard v. Hill, 2 Atk. 485, was a controversy about the use of the same stamp upon cards, the stamp being stated to have been appropriated by the complainant under a charter granted by King Charles the First. The injunction asked for was, of course, denied. It was the first application of the kind ever made to a court of chancery. It was a monopoly granted by the king, had never been sanctioned by an act of parliament, and, in these cases, as we will hereafter show, the court never granted an injunction until the right claimed had been established at law. The case of Motley v. Downman, 3 Mylne & C. 14, was another case of a party using upon his goods the mark of another, and not a patent case. It was a case, too, in which the complainant could not claim anything by patent or charter. It was, therefore, a pure legal right in controversy between the parties, in which nothing exclusive could be claimed until it was settled at law. In such case, before a court of chancery will interfere by injunction, it must appear that the party suffering from the usurpation of his mark by another, is suffering from the artifice, fraud, or misrepresentation of the latter, in selling goods with the mark of the former of an inferior quality, by which the first may be injured in his sales and manufactures.

The case of Sheriff v. Coates, 1 Russ. & M. 159, was not a patent case, though it was analogous, on account of the exclusive right given to calico printers in their designs. In that case the lord chancellor said: "It is essentially necessary that the party applying should establish the originality of the pattern in a court of law." But why? Because as the calico printers by the statute have an exclusive right in their designs for two months only, they can not have either that possession or that length of enjoyment which a patentee may have, from the longer continuance of his right, and which must appear before equity will restrain an infringement by an injunction. The case of Saunders v. Smith, 3 Mylne & C. 728, was a case altogether different from what the learned counsel who cited it in argument supposed it to be. It states, in terms, the practice of courts of equity in granting injunctions, coincidently with what we have said the practice is, and has been for almost a hundred years. "The office of the court is consequent upon the legal right, and it generally happens that the only question the court has to consider is, whether the case is so clear and so free from objection upon the grounds of equitable consideration that the court ought to interfere by injunction without a previous trial at law, or whether it ought to wait till the legal title has been established. That distinction depends upon a great variety of circumstances, and it is utterly impossible to lay down any general rule upon the subject by which the discretion of the court ought in all cases to be regulated. The court always exercises its discretion, as to whether it will interfere by injunction before the establishment of the legal title."

The case of Bacon v. Jones, 4 Mylne & C. 437, turned entirely upon the omission of the plaintiffs to apply for an interlocutory injunction for four years, while the cause was pending. And the lord chancellor stating what the course might be upon an application for an interlocutory injunction, says, as a matter of opinion but not as a rule of practice, that in such a case it is a more wholesome practice to direct the plaintiff to establish his title at law, suspending the injunction until the result of the legal investigation. But he concludes with this declaration in respect to what the practice is in such cases: "Which of these courses ought to be taken must depend entirely upon the discretion of the court according to the case made. When the cause comes to a hearing, the court has also a large latitude left to it, and I am far from saying that a case may not arise, in which, even in that stage, the court will be of opinion that the injunction may properly be granted without having recourse to a trial at law. The conduct and dealings of the parties, the frame of the pleadings, the nature of the patent right and of the evidence by which it is established—these and other circumstances may combine to produce such a result, although this is certainly not very likely to happen, and I am not aware of any case in which it has happened. Nevertheless, it is a course unquestionably competent to the court, provided a case be presented which satisfies the mind of the judge that such a course, if adopted, will do justice between the parties."

We have now shown what the old practice was in England in respect to a jury trial, before a court of equity would interfere to protect a patent by injunction, also the change which took place in that practice in England more than eighty years since, and that the practice now in England is in conformity with that change.

Before proceeding to show what the practice has uniformly been in the courts of the United States which have jurisdiction of patent causes, and that the old practice in England never prevailed in them, we would venture to suggest the causes which led to the old practice in England. When those causes ceased to exist, that practice was discontinued, and these causes never existed in the United States.

Besides the caution with which courts of equity have always used their power to grant injunctions of any kind, there has been at all times, in the chancery of England, a wholesome jealousy of all monopolies and patents granted by the king, on account of the legal abuse of this prerogative. It is a singular thing, but history shows, that while monopolies and special immunities contributed to revive commerce in Europe, it was the abuse of them which led to its freedom.

First, corporate bodies were formed to protect the interests of their members, then there were associations of towns for the same purpose, and the Hanseatic league was formed in the twelfth century for promoting commerce, and the interests of the cities in the league.

Godson properly says: "Europe was soon astonished by the wealth which it rapidly gathered, and the immense power, its inseparable concomitant, which it quickly obtained." England was in a great degree enlightened by it; and then began in England those privileges and monopolies which, aiding commerce for a time, became oppressive as soon as the kings of England supplied their pecuniary wants (which parliament refused to satisfy) by an abuse of prerogative in conferring exclusive grants. Elizabeth abused it more than any English monarch. But the complaint of her people compelled her to cancel the most oppressive patents which she had granted; allowing such only to be continued as time had shown were not hurtful to the public interests, and which did not restrain the sale of commodities in daily use.

Mr. Macaulay is not full enough in his account of this strife of liberty with usurpation: but he rightly says in his own compendious way: "The house of commons met in an angry and determined mood. It was in vain a courtly minority blamed the speaker for suffering the acts of the queen's highness to be called into question. The language of the discontented party was high and menacing, and was echoed by the voice of the whole nation. There seemed for a moment to be some danger that the long and glorious reign of Elizabeth would have a shameful and disastrous end." But the queen avoided the pressure by yielding to it in a great measure, being afraid that parliament would abrogate the exercise of such power, as it afterward did by St. 21 Jac. I., c. 3. By that statute it was so much lessened that the crown could only make a grant or exclusive privilege in cases of new inventions. That, it was conceded, the king could do by the common law, to secure to inventors the exclusive use and sale of their discoveries.

On the statute of James is founded all the law in England as to patents and inventions, both in the courts of common law and in equity. From the time of the passage of that act, notwithstanding the attempts which were made by Charles I. to disregard it, and to revive the exercise of the power in the crown to grant monopolies, the judges in England followed the lead of popular feeling so far as to place a jury between the exercise of prerogative and liberty, whenever they could do so with safety to themselves. It must be remembered that these offices were then held at the will of the crown. The statute had taken the investigation of patents from the star chamber. They were afterward to be heard, tried, and determined, "by and according to the common law of the realm and not otherwise." And thus came, as remedies for the infringement of patents, the action at law for damages, and proceedings in equity for an injunction and an account of profits.

Anciently, however, and before the star chamber was established, the chancellor had jurisdiction in cases of patents and charters according to the usual practice, without the intervention of juries. When the statute was passed, the practice in chancery, co-operating with the parliament to restrain the crown, was, without ever having been reduced to the precision of a rule, such as we shall now state.

If an injunction was applied for in a case of a monopoly or a patent, the first inquiry was, is the monopoly or patent a grant from the king or by act of parliament? If the former, before a court would grant it, the right to it was heard by a jury; if by parliament, and the right was not contested for any of those causes which, by the common law, would invalidate it, the court acted without a trial of the right by a jury, in this way aiding the parliament, during the reigns of James and Charles, to confine the privileges of the crown within the limits of the common law. And the courts did this with more constancy and courage in cases of the king's patents, because, by the statute, only such were good as were not contrary to the common law. But even then, in a clear case of the infringement of a king's patent, the chancellor would grant injunctions to restrain infringements, though the continuance of them was made dependent upon the finding of a jury, where the originality of the invention was denied, and the defendant asked that it might be tried by a jury. And that was done in one of two ways, either by sending the plaintiff to a court of law to establish his right, or by a feigned issue in the court of chancery. And so the practice was, as we have stated it, in respect to all actions in cases of patents, until the spirit of English liberty rose above all the restraints of prerogative over commerce, and was no longer apprehensive of such usurpation. The courts thereupon partook of this triumph, and as the practice in chancery, of trying the title under a king's patent, had been adopted more for protecting the public from usurpation than for the protection of individuals, it was discontinued in all cases of alleged infringements of patents where the title of the patentee was clear beyond a reasonable doubt, and where he had had the possession and use of his machine without other interference than such as had arisen from the wrongful use of it, or from the piracy of the whole under the pretense of some improvement or addition. And the records of the English chancery will show that for more than eighty years, injunctions, both provisional and interlocutory, and perpetual, have been granted in the first instance in cases of copyrights and patents; and that where they have been perpetual in the first instance, they have been made so without the intervention of a jury to try the question of title or infringement, in all cases where the court was fully satisfied with the proof, notwithstanding the defendants may have denied in their affidavits or answers the originality of the invention or the sufficiency of the specification.

It now only remains for us to state the course pursued in the courts of the United States in granting injunctions in patent cases.

The reasons for the early practice did not exist at any time in this country. That practice in England had been changed before the war began which ended in our separation from the mother country. The constitution of the United States was not formed until thirty years after that change had taken place. Under the constitution, courts have been established with jurisdiction exclusive, and concurrent with that of the courts of common law, in cases in which those courts can not give full remedies for the preservation of every equitable right. They have as large a jurisdiction as the courts of chancery in England. Their practice in all matters is the same, except where differences exist from legislation, or by the rules of the supreme court.

The practice in them, in respect to granting injunctions in patent cases, has always been that of the English chancery, always cautiously exercised, frequently followed, however, in every part of the United States, without injury to legal rights, and never complained of, as far as we know, until it was urged on the argument of this cause, that for the court to grant an injunction for the infringement of a patent, without a trial by a jury, when the infringement was denied by the defendant, was an invasion of the right of trial by jury.

If it be so, it is an evasion of very long standing, both in England and in the United States, and one with which the courts in this day can not be charged. We have shown that the practice has been the same, without any variation, in England since 1761.

Mr. Justice Washington said, in Ogle v. Ege [Case No. 10,462], decided in 1826: "I take the rule to be, in cases of injunctions in patent cases, that where the bill states a clear right to the thing patented, which, together with the alleged infringement, is verified by affidavit, if the patentee has been in possession of it, by having used or sold it in part, or in the whole, the court will grant an injunction, and continue it until the hearing, or further order, without sending the plaintiff to law to try his right. But if there appears to be a reasonable doubt as to the plaintiff's right, or the validity of the patent, the court will require the plaintiff to try his title at law." And Curtis, in his work on Patents (section 328), citing Neilson v. Thompson, Webst. Pat. Cas. 277, says: "It seems to be the result of all the authorities that there is a prima facie right to an injunction, without a trial at law, upon certain things being shown, namely, a patent, long possession, and infringement." The case of Ogle v. Ege [supra] is, in its particulars, the case at bar.

The case of Isaacs v. Cooper [Case No. 7,096], previously decided by the same learned judge in 1821, and cited in argument as against the rule subsequently laid down in the case of Ogle v. Ege, is so far from being so, that it in words anticipates the rule as laid down in that case. "The practice of the court of equity upon motions of this kind is to grant an injunction upon the filing of the bill, and before a trial at law, if the bill states a clear right and verifies the same by affidavit. If the bill states an exclusive possession of the invention or discovery for which the plaintiff has obtained a patent, the injunction is granted, although the court may feel doubts as to the validity of the patent. But if the defects in the patent or specification are so glaring that the court can entertain no doubt as to that point, it would be most unjust to restrain the defendant from using a machine or other thing which he may have constructed, probably at a great expense, until a decision can be had at law." And the injunction in that case was denied upon four separate grounds, each of them being within the rule stated in the case of Ogle v. Ege, all of which must appear to exist before the court will grant the injunction.

In the year 1812, the point we are here considering was discussed with as much precise learning as it has ever been, in the case of Livingston v. Van Ingen, 9 Johns. 507. Justices Yates, Thompson, and Kent, all concur in granting an injunction, without sending the plaintiff to a court of law, or awarding a feigned issue to try his right, on the question of infringement, by a jury. Mr. Justice Yates says: "The right being claimed under an express grant by the statute, creating the forfeiture, and no doubt remaining of the existence of the boats, the presumption was irresistible that they navigated contrary to the statute, and that the property was in the appellants." Then, after noticing the cases of Blackwell v. Harper, 2 Atk. 92, Anon., 1 Ves. Sr. 476, Boulton v. Bull, 3 Ves. 140, and Harmer v. Plane, 14 Ves. 130, he says: "From these and numerous other cases, no doubt can exist that the injunction in this case ought to have issued." Mr. Justice Thompson says: "Where the right is clear, an injunction is never refused; as when the right claimed appears on the record, or is founded on an act of parliament, it is a matter of course to grant an injunction, without first obliging the party to establish his case at law. In the case of Blanchard v. Hill, 2 Atk. 485, Lord Hardwicke said: "That in cases of monopolies, the rule that the court had governed itself by was, whether there was any act of parliament under which the restriction was founded. But the court will never establish a right of this kind claimed under a charter only from the crown, unless there has been an action to try the right at law. This will be found on examination to be a governing distinction running through the numerous cases cited in the argument. And whenever an injunction has been refused, the right was claimed under a patent from the crown, and that right considered doubtful." Kent, then chief justice, says: "If the legal right be in favor of the appellants, the remedy prayed for by their bill is a matter of course. Injunctions are always granted to secure the enjoyment of statute privileges of which the party is in the actual possession, unless the right be doubtful. This is the uniform course of the precedents. I believe there is no case to the contrary; and the decisions in the English chancery on this point were the same before, as since, the American Revolution." Then, citing many cases from the English books, from 1740 to the cases of Universities of Oxford and Cambridge v. Richardson, 6 Ves. 707, and of Harmer v. Plane, 14 Ves. 130, the learned judge says: "I cite these cases to show that the law has been settled in England for the last seventy years at least, and has been preserved in a steady uniform course under a succession of their ablest and wisest men. The principle is, that statute privileges, no less than common law rights, when in actual possession and exercise, will not be permitted to be disturbed until the opponent has fairly tried them at law, and overthrown their pretension."

The federal courts in this country have thought so, for under the patent laws of congress they have protected the right by injunction. The cases cited from the federal courts are those of Morse v. Reed [Case No. 9,860], decided by Chief Justice Ellsworth, in 1796, and of Whitney v. Fort [Id. 17,587], decided in the circuit court for the district of Georgia, by Mr. Justice Johnson, in the year 1806. In both of those cases injunctions were granted in the first instance, and subsequently made perpetual, without trials by jury. The last case is as decisive of what that eminent jurist, Mr. Justice Johnson, thought and adjudicated to be the practice in patent cases, as any other on record. In every particular of fact and pleading, that case and the one before us are alike, except that the defendants, in their answer in the former case, admitted that the plaintiffs had received a patent, but contested it for the want of originality. In this case the defendant does not deny that the plaintiff has received a patent, but puts him to the proof of it, and then denies its validity, alleging that the thing patented was not original. The cases then became alike, in that particular, so soon as the plaintiff in this case established that he had received a patent from the United States, nothing being left in controversy but the question of originality.

The counsel in Whitney v. Fort [supra], supposing from the answer that the denial of originality would induce the court to order a feigned issue to try the question, actually prepared and joined issue in one without having taken such an order from the court. But it was not tried, for the court thought that the patent, possession, and use made such a proceeding unnecessary, and Judge Johnson having granted an injunction, in the first instance, gave an order for a perpetual injunction, his associate, Judge Stephens, concurring. It certainly can not be necessary, with such an array of authority, to cite other cases from our own jurisprudence to show what has been the practice in the United States courts, in granting injunctions to restrain infringements of patent rights, or rather to show how much that practice was misunderstood on the argument of this cause, for, until that argument was made, we were not aware that the practice was considered doubtful by any portion of the profession in the United States. We can only account for the misapprehension of it in this instance, by supposing that the difference of proceeding in a patent case at law and in equity was overlooked. We are indebted to Phillips, in his work on Patents (chapters 20–24), for a more compendious, and, we think we may say, more accurate statement of these differences than has been given by any other elementary writer.

At law the question of infringement or no infringement is generally, if not invariably, for the jury. Phil. Pat. 431. The instances of exception, verified by cases, are well stated in that work, and we need not repeat them.

In equity, where the case is clear and without reasonable doubt, where the bill states a clear right to the thing patented, which, together with the alleged infringement, is verified by affidavit, and where the plaintiff has been in possession of it, by having sold or used it in part or in the whole, the court will grant an injunction and continue it till the hearing or further order, without sending the plaintiff to law to try his right. And the rule applies as well to a bill brought by an assignee as by the original inventor.

What, then, finally, is the case before us? It is a bill brought by an assignee, with proof of the assignment to him, for the exclusive use of it in Charleston district, of a machine originally patented to William Woodworth, subsequently renewed by a board of commissioners, in conformity with law, and afterward extended by an act of congress, under which the assignment to the plaintiff is made. He comes before the court, then, not only with a patent granted in the usual form, but with a statute right, which, having been brought to the notice of the court, the court must consider as conclusive of title. This and the other requisites of possession and use concurring from the testimony in the case, and the defendant having voluntarily abstained from going into any proof of the averments in his answer in respect to the originality of the patent, the want of a sufficient specification, and that the last specification attached to the patent is for a different machine from that first specified by the patentee, we are left without any alternative, as well from the proofs in the case on the part of the plaintiff, as from the omission of all proof by the defendant to maintain his case, except to award against him a perpetual injunction.

The originality of Woodworth's invention, like that of Whitney's cotton gin, from repeated trials in court, from the many attempts which have been made to pirate it, and from the work which it does, so efficiently and so differently from what was ever done before by any planing machine, is now almost a universally received opinion; so much so, that the language of Mr. Justice Johnson, in the case of Whitney v. Fort, is very appropriate. Two witnesses were, in that case, produced on the stand to prove that the invention was not original; one of them said he had seen in England, seventeen years before, "a teazer or devil" like it, the other that he had seen a machine like it in Ireland. The learned and lamented predecessor of one of us in this court said in reply to that evidence: "There are circumstances within the knowledge of all mankind, which prove the originality of this invention more satisfactorily to the mind than the direct testimony of a host of witnesses. The cotton plant furnished clothing to mankind before the age of Herodotus. The green seed is a species more productive than the black, and by nature adapted to a much greater variety of climate, but by reason of the strong adherence of the fiber to the seed, without the aid of some more powerful machine for separating it than any formerly known to us, the cultivation of it could never have been made an object. The machine of which Mr. Whitney claims the invention, so facilitates the preparation of this species for use, that the cultivation of it has suddenly become an object of infinitely greater importance than that of the other species ever can be. Is it then to be imagined that if this machine had been before discovered, the use of it would ever have been lost or could have been confined to any tract of country left unexplored by commercial enterprise?"

The last sentence is peculiarly appropriate to Woodworth's planing machine, for it now does, in every part of the civilized world, that which could not be done before with the same efficiency by machinery, and which is not here done in any degree by any machine which has been before the courts of the United States, unless by piracy of Woodworth's combination.

BANKRUPTCY—PRIORITY OF LIENS—FRAUD.

[In the matter of Moulton & Masson, bankrupts.] Motion by judgment creditor to dissolve injunction.

M. G. Cobb, for assignee in bankruptcy.
Thomas V. O'Brien, for judgment creditor.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. An execution levy upon judgment obtained without fraud or collusion in a state court prior to institution of bankruptcy proceedings gives a lien, under sections 14 and 20 of the bankrupt act [14 Stat. 522, 526], that must first be satisfied. Evidence that the judgment was against a partnership, though only one partner was served; that it was in favor of an assignee who had paid no consideration for the assigned accounts upon which the judgments were obtained; that the judgment creditor had offered one of the judgment debtors (subsequently bankrupt) 25 per cent. of the judgment to consent to an immediate sale under execution; that before entry of judgment another creditor threatened to put defendants (afterwards bankrupts) in bankruptcy unless the plaintiff would discontinue suit or divide proceeds, the plaintiff thereupon promising to discontinue (other evidence being offered to show that the conversation last mentioned between plaintiff and creditor took place after judgment and levy),—evidence of such circumstances does not establish such a case of fraud, under the bankrupt act, as would authorize interference of a court of bankruptcy. Injunction dissolved.

In re MOUNT.

[2 Hayw. & H. 44.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 25, 1851.

PETITION FOR THE SALE OF ALL THE INFANT'S REAL ESTATE.

Act Md. 1798, c. 101, subc. 12, § 10, allowing the guardian to sell a part of the real estate of the infant, does not authorize the court sitting in chancery to decree the sale of the whole of the said real estate.

Appeal from the orphans' court.
In equity.

C. G. Wallack, for petitioner.

Before CRANCH, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and DUNLOP, Circuit Judges.

"Petition of Sarah Ann Mount respectfully represents that she is the guardian of Sarah Ellen and James Henry Mount, infant children of James Mount, deceased. That it would be advantageous to her said wards, and indispensably necessary to their maintenance and education, that the real estate whereof the said James Mount died, seized, be sold by order of the court, in pursuance of the statutes in such case made and provided. That the said Mount died possessor of no personal property, except household and kitchen furniture, which is absolutely and indispensably necessary to be retained and kept together for the use, comfort and convenience of the said wards. That the real estate consisting of lots 17 and 18, in square 696, lot 32, in square 877, and lot 6, in square 1078, with the improvements, is entirely unproductive and yields no income, and she therefore prays that the same may be ordered sold," &c.

The order as prayed was thereupon granted. Subsequently the judge of the orphans' court set aside the order, as follows: "For reasons appearing to the court, the foregoing decree is set aside. One among others is that the law forbids all the real estate belonging to infants being sold, for the above purposes; this is according to an interpretation given by the circuit court for this district."

[1] [Reported by John A. Hayward, Esq., and George C. Hazelton, Esq.]

The following were the arguments used in favor of the original decree: "Chapter 101, subc. 12, § 10, Act Md. 1798: 'And the said court, if it shall deem it advantageous to the ward, may allow the guardian to exceed the income of the estate, and to make use of the principal and to sell part of the same under its order, provided nevertheless, that no part of the real estate shall, on account of such maintenance and education be diminished without the approbation of the court of chancery,' &c. This act does not, as I conceive, prohibit it in any manner, nor prevent the court from ordering the sale of the whole of the real estate; the words 'and to sell part of the same,' evidently being intended to apply to the whole estate, or principal of the estate, of which the whole of the real estate may be only a part, as in this case, the object of which is to sell the real estate, in order to retain for the use and comfort of the infants the household furniture, the balance of the principal within the meaning of the act. The court will perceive also, by reference to the list of property filed with the petition, that though it consists of more than one lot, yet it is entirely indivisible, for the reason that all but one of said lots are of mere nominal value. The act, so far as it regards real estate, merely prohibits the sale of any part thereof, without the approbation of the chancery court, and does not limit the chancery court to any portion thereof."

Under the rulings of the judge of the orphans' court, the petitioner was empowered to sell a part of the real estate, viz.: lot 32, in square 877, and lot 6, square 1078, provided the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Washington, sitting in chancery, shall, by its proper order, approve and confirm the same. Which was approved as follows: "Ordered that it be certified to the orphans' court, that the foregoing decree (empowering the guardian to sell a part of the real estate of the said infants) is approved according to the statute in such case provided."

MOUNT DIABLO MILL & MINING CO. v. CALLISON et al.

[5 Sawy, 439; [1] 9 Morr. Min. Reps. 616.]

Circuit Court, D. Nevada. March 19, 1879.

MINES—VEIN—LODE—LOCATOR OF LEDGE—MINING ACT—CLAIM—WORK ON CLAIM —FORFEITURES.

1. While metalliferous rock in place, not in a fissure, may be found under such conditions within clearly defined boundaries, as to require recognition as a vein or lode, as in Eureka Consol. Min. Co. v. Richmond Min. Co. [Case No. 4,548], a broad metalliferous zone having within its limits true fissure veins plainly bounded, cannot be regarded as a single vein or lode, although such zone may itself have boundaries which can be traced.

[Cited in Book v. Justice Min. Co., 58 Fed. 121.]

2. The language of a mining law being, that "the locator of a ledge shall be entitled to hold one hundred feet on each side of his ledge:" Held, that by virtue of a location of a certain number of feet along the ledge, without any distinct claim of side ground, the locator was entitled to hold one hundred feet on each side of the ledge so located.

3. Where a locator, in his notice of location, claimed "all the privileges granted by the laws" of the mining district: Held, that this was a sufficient claim of the one hundred feet on each side of his ledge granted to a locator by the mining law, admitting such claim to be necessary.

4. Section 3 of the mining act of May 10, 1872 [17 Stat. 91], recognizes as valid, locations of mining claims, made prior to its passage, and while the mining act of 1866 was in force, the surface lines of which included more than one vein or lode, and confirms the locators thereof in the exclusive possession of all the lodes which have their apex within the surface lines of such mining claims.

5. "Mining claim" is the name given to that portion of the public mineral land, which the miner takes up and holds, in accordance with mining laws local and statutory, for mining purposes, and the term includes the vein specifically located, all the surface ground located on each side of it, and all other veins or lodes having their apex inside the surface lines.

6. Work on a claim is work done anywhere upon the surface of it, within its surface lines, or anywhere below the surface, within those lines extended down vertically, and though it should be shown that the work done within the lines below the surface was also within a lode having its apex outside of such vertical surface lines, it will still be work on the claim within the meaning of section 2324 of the United States Revised Statutes.

7. Work done outside of a claim for the purpose of prospecting or developing it, is as available for holding the claim as if done within the boundaries of the claim itself.

8. The owner of several contiguous claims may form one general system adapted and intended to work them all, and when such is the case work in furtherance of the system is work on all the claims intended to be developed by it.

BY THE COURT (HILLYER, District Judge). This is an action to recover possession of a mining claim situated in the Columbus mining district, Esmeralda county, Nevada. The complaint alleges ownership of fourteen hundred feet of a certain quartz lode, called the Dinero lode, seven hundred feet easterly and seven hundred feet westerly from the Dinero location monument, "together with one hundred feet of surface on each side of said fourteen hundred feet of said lode," with all the dips, spurs, etc.; and also all that portion of the Dinero, and of all other lodes or veins, the top or apex of which lies within such surface lines, and end planes drawn north and south through points seven hundred feet east and west from a stake marked "Centre Mount Diablo Claim."

The trial has been by the court, a jury having been waived by a written stipulation of counsel. There has been a somewhat extended oral argument, and, in addition, a very full discussion of all the points in briefs. The point most discussed is as to the lateral boundaries of the Mount Diablo lode; the plaintiff contending that the Mount Diablo, Dinero and Callison, or "Mountain Boy" claims, are all on one and the same vein or lode, and the defendants that the Callison is a lode distinct from every other in that district. By agreement of parties, three scientific mining experts only were examined on each side. For the plaintiff, W. S. Keyes, Carl Davis and Dr. Blatchley are of opinion that the said claims are on one single lode. For the defendants, C. A. Luckhart, Professor W. F. Stewart and Charles F. Hoffman are of opinion that the Callison is a separate lode. All of these experts are men of large and practical experience in mining. Each one has examined the mining region now in question with care, and has, under oath, stated the facts upon which he bases his opinion. If the court is not now fully informed, such result is not due to the failure of the parties on either side to present their case thoroughly, but to the inherent difficulties to be found in the questions brought forward for decision.

We proceed now to a consideration of the first question stated, namely, whether the Mount Diablo and Callison claims are on the same or separate lodes. We find at the point where the claim in controversy is located a metalliferous belt, or zone, or district, extending east and west some two miles in length, the width of which has not, so far as appears in this case, been accurately ascertained. Scattered over this belt or zone, a dark rock stained with iron and manganese is seen, called by all the witnesses croppings. Looking west, from the Mount Diablo claim, the general course of the metalliferous region can be seen marked by these black croppings for about two miles. Along this line a great many claims have been located; in some cases several claims being parallel, or nearly so.

Describing this belt of country at the point where the claim in dispute lies, the experts tell us, that they find on the south of the Peru claim, and perhaps coming into that claim, a rock in place which they call variously, silicious, or stratified, or unaltered clay slate. (The Peru is a claim belonging to the plaintiff which lies immediately south of the Mount Diablo. Then follow, going north, the Mount Diablo, the Dinero, and lastly, the Mountain Boy, which covers on the surface nearly the same ground as the Dinero.)

Going north from the Peru; that is, across the belt, the experts find a rock which the plaintiff's witnesses name clay slate, and which they insist, notwithstanding some alterations in color and texture, extends from the stratified slate on the south to a belt of greenstone found about two hundred feet north of the Callison claim, or some eight hundred feet from the Peru south line. This rock is, according to the plaintiff's experts, for the most part a decomposed clay state. In many places, and especially near ore bodies, it is white, and without signs of stratification; in other places it becomes a hard and highly silicious rock of a dark brown color, also unstratified, but always, in their opinion, clay slate more or less altered and decomposed, and all a part of the Mount Diablo lode. On the other hand, the experts of the defendants name this prevailing rock in the Mount Diablo, Dinero and Callison claims, felsite porphyry and decomposed felsite porphyry; the former being the dark brown, and the latter the white clay slate of the plaintiff's witnesses.

Except in the names they give the rocks, and that they differ as to the presence of feldspar crystals therein, the witnesses on both sides agree in their description of such rocks as to color, texture and position.

The stratified slate on the south is barren, as is the greenstone to the north. Throughout this belt the ore bodies, the pay ores, have occurred quite irregularly, unless we except the Callison ore body, to be considered further on. The main tunnel of the Mount Diablo followed, for two or three hundred feet, a crack or fissure which Mr. Keyes at first took to be the fissure up through which the metals came to impregnate the neighboring rocks; but later concluded was a rent made after the deposition of the metals.

Along the line of this tunnel, for the first two hundred feet, the paying ores of the Mount Diablo have chiefly been found. From a point at the foot of an incline (No. 2) sunk from this tunnel, which point is near the center of the Mount Diablo claim, a drift, called the "connecting drift," has been run north two hundred and thirty feet to the Callison upper incline and ore body. At a distance of one hundred and fifteen feet from the foot of this incline there is encountered in the drift a belt of rock, called, by some of the witnesses, the "black dyke," which is from twenty-two to thirty feet in thickness. By whatever name called, clay, slate or porphyry, it is in every exterior quality presented to the sight or touch a different rock from that adjoining it on each side. About two hundred and fifty feet east of this, in the "blue drift," run from the foot of incline No. 3, a dyke of similar rock is found at a depth considerably greater than in the connecting drift, and appearing, from its position and physical properties, to be the same black dyke found in the connecting drift. This dyke, the defendants claim, is the hanging wall of the Mount Diablo lode. Assuming it to be continuous between the points exposed in the two drifts, it has a course east and west corresponding to the general course of the ore channels in the Mount Diablo and Callison claims. Going on north in the connecting drift from this dyke, we pass through some decomposed felsite porphyry or slate, some quartz and other rocks, not in place, just under the ravine which runs between the Mount Diablo and the Callison claims, and at ninety feet north of the dyke come to a stratum of dark, hard, flinty rock, which is about six feet thick; lying upon this next comes about fifteen feet of defendants' decomposed felspathic porphyry, or plaintiff's clay slate, which defendants call their foot-wall. Then comes the Callison ore body, from two to six feet thick, followed by a hanging wall of the white decomposed barren rock, extending on one hundred feet or more to belts of porphyry, greenstone and serpentine. From the Mount Diablo tunnel to the "black dyke," assays taken by Mr. Keyes every ten feet show from sixty-four dollars and ten cents, in one place twenty feet north of the tunnel, to three dollars and seventy-seven cents silver.

The black dyke is practically barren, though traces of silver are shown by some assays. The material passed through is none of it "pay ore," but is called "vein matter." From the north side of the dyke to the edge of the Callison foot-wall the assays of Mr. Keyes show from five dollars and sixty-five cents to traces of silver. The Callison foot-wall is entirely barren, except that traces of silver may be found on its outermost edges.

The Callison ore channel has been opened one hundred and seventy-seven feet in depth on its dip, and one hundred and eighty-six feet in length on its course or strike; throughout its whole extent the ore has lain on this barren white clay or porphyry, dipping with regularity to the north at an angle of about forty-five degrees. It is from two to six feet thick, and the hanging wall is this white material, before mentioned, extending on north one hundred feet or more. The ore bodies in the Mount Diablo are bounded by decomposed white rock, similar to the foot and hanging walls of the Callison, though no body so large and regular has been found as that in the Callison.

These are the leading facts, and upon them, though the question is not entirely free from doubt, we are inclined to think, and for the purposes of this decision shall assume, that the Callison is a vein or lode separate from the Mount Diablo, within the meaning of those words as used in the acts of congress, and as interpreted in the Eureka Case [Case No. 4,548]. In that case it was held that the terms, vein and lode, are applicable to any zone or belt of mineralized rock lying within boundaries clearly separating it from the neighboring rock.

It was considered in that case that the terms, vein and lode, as used by congress, for reasons there given, could not be restricted, always, to "aggregations of mineral matter in fissures of rocks"—that is to say, to typical fissure veins—but must be so extended as to include any other aggregation of mineral matter containing ores lying within clearly defined boundaries. Such boundaries were found in that case in the quartzite on the south, and the clay-slate on the north. Between those boundaries, however, no others appeared clearly dividing the included rock or vein matter; and it never was intended in that case to hold that every metalliferous zone of country to which boundaries could be found must be regarded as one vein or lode, for this would be to reduce all mining districts to one lode. Moreover, in this case we look in vain for clearly defined boundaries where the plaintiff claims the boundaries to be. Dr. Blatchley, a witness for plaintiff, says that on the south "the line of demarcation between the stratified slate which contains no mineral and that which is not so strongly stratified and does contain mineral (meaning gold and silver) is not very clearly defined." Again he says: "There is no distinct or definite line that can be drawn accurately." Mr. Keyes considers the stratified slate as the boundary between the Peru and a claim southwest of it called the "Stump and Adams." This division line is observable on the surface, but he has seen no boundary of unaltered slate below. Both he and Dr. Blatchley consider the south limit of the lode to be where the "impregnation" ends. To the north, where the greenstone is found, the boundary is still less clearly defined. Dr. Blatchley says the line of demarcation between the greenstone and slate "is not plain and clear, * * * to fix it exactly would be very difficult." Again he says, "they (the divisions) are all very vague and indefinite." Beyond the slate claimed to be the boundary on the south ore has been found, increasing the difficulty of fixing the limits of impregnation in that direction.

Looking, then, at this metalliferous zone as a whole, at the point where the claims in question lie, it is impossible to find clearly defined boundaries. There is, however, such a zone there, and there is, no doubt, a limit beyond which the rocks are not impregnated with silver, which limit is at present not clearly ascertained.

Having such a zone or district, when we find within it fissures like that opened by the Callison, filled with ore, we think we must regard them as veins or lodes. For, while metalliferous rock in place may be so found within defined boundaries as to require recognition as a lode, although not in a fissure, a broad metalliferous zone cannot be permitted to swallow up, under the name lode, true fissure veins found within its limits. We think the Callison claim must be regarded as being upon such a fissure, and as having unmistakable visible boundaries.

We have been unable to feel the importance of determining whether the prevailing rock in these claims shall be called decomposed clay-slate with the plaintiff, or decomposed felsite porphyry with the defendants. Nor do we regard it as a safe guide, in determining whether there is one lode or more here, that chemical analysis shows these rocks to be composed of the same ingredients. The same test would require us to pronounce plumbago, anthracite, coal, and massive diamond to be the same.

In these cases, where visible practical boundaries are the important things, the optical qualities of rocks seem to us a safer guide than chemical analysis. All the witnesses agree that true fissures may exist in this rock, whether slate or porphyry; and, be it what it may, we find at the Callison mine a fissure having foot and hanging walls, dip, strike, and a quite uniform breadth. Judging from exterior appearances, we at once pronounce the brown quartz, the stratified clay-slate, the decomposed material, and the "black dyke," different rocks. To the eye, the foot-wall of the Callison mine with its brown, flinty quartz, and overlying clay, is a plain line of demarcation between it and the country rock south of it. For the purposes of this decision, therefore, as before stated, we shall assume the Callison to be a separate vein or lode.

Assuming the Callison to be a separate lode, still the plaintiff claims it, under the operation of the mining laws of the Columbus district, by virtue of the Dinero location. Section 8 of those laws reads as follows: "Section 8. Each locator or claimant in any ledge in this district shall be entitled to two hundred (200) feet by location, and all the dips, spurs, angles, off-shoots, out-crops, depths, widths, and variations, and all the minerals and other valuables therein contained; and the discoverer and locator of any new ledge or lode, shall be entitled to one claim of two hundred (200) feet additional for discovery. The locator, or locators, of any ledge or lode, shall also be entitled to hold one hundred feet on each side of said ledge or lode, together with all minerals (whether in distinct ledges or otherwise) therein contained."

Under this section the plaintiff contends that when a party locates a given number of feet along a given lode, he holds, by virtue of such location, a hundred feet on each side of his lode, without expressly claiming it in his notice; or, in other words, that when a party becomes a locator, he is entitled to hold in that quality the one hundred feet on each side of his lode. The Dinero notice reads as follows:

"Notice.—Dinero Quartz Claim, One Thousand Four Hundred Feet. We, the undersigned, this seventh day of September, A. D. 1867, locate and claim one thousand four hundred feet (1400) on this Dinero quartz lode, together with all the privileges granted by the laws of this, the Columbus mining district, running seven hundred feet each side of this notice. Signed, A. Hanke, and five others."

Upon the strength of the claim in this notice of all the privileges granted by the district laws, the plaintiff further contends that if the quantity of surface ground claimed must be put in the notice of location, he has substantially and sufficiently complied with the law.

The requirements of the Columbus mining laws in regard to locating claims are, that "each claim located shall have a mound or stake placed thereon, on which shall be marked the name of the company, and the number of feet located and claimed;" and further, that "all notices of location shall contain the names of the locators or claimants." There is nothing requiring a marking out of the surface boundaries on the ground.

The construction placed upon the mining laws by the defendants is, that before a locator becomes entitled to hold this surface ground, he must claim it and give notice of his claim; that the miner cannot hold what he has not claimed, and that it is as essential to locate and claim the surface, and specify the number of feet on each side desired, as the number of feet along the lode. Further, that the claim of "all the privileges," etc., does not help the plaintiff, that claim being too indefinite to be of any validity.

After a careful consideration of the language used by the miners, the circumstances under which, and the condition of the district at the time the laws were made, together with the arguments of counsel, we are constrained to hold that the miners meant by section 8, to say, that when a person had become a locator by putting up his stake or mound, and his notice of the number of feet claimed on the lode, with the name of the company and the names of the locators, such person became, by virtue of such location, invested with a right to hold one hundred feet on each side of the lode he had located.

The language is, "the locator of a ledge shall be entitled to hold one hundred feet on each side of his ledge," not that he may locate that quantity of surface ground. This construction gains force from the language which follows that entitling the locator to one hundred feet on each side of his ledge, viz., "together with all minerals (whether in distinct ledges or otherwise) therein contained." This shows that the one hundred feet were to be held for something more that surface ground for convenience in working the claim. When the miners framed the law, doubts existed, doubts which have not yet been settled, as to the character of the ore deposits in the Columbus district.

Hence this privilege was intended to secure the locator a reasonable quantity of ground, whether his ore deposit should be called a lode or impregnation, or "otherwise." It was, as we think, a definition of what a location of feet along a lode or supposed lode should embrace.

But if we admit that there ought to be a claim and notice of the surface ground, aside from the location of the lode itself, then we consider the notice in this case to be a good and valid notice of the claim of Hanke and his co-locators to fourteen hundred feet along the Dinero lode, and to one hundred feet on each side of that lode.

If it is necessary to express in terms the number of feet the locator intends to claim on each side of the lode, would it not be equally necessary to claim, in distinct, express terms, all the dips, spurs and angles of the lode, which the mining law gives to the locator? We presume it would not be insisted that the locator should not be permitted to follow the dip of his lode outside his surface lines unless he had expressed his intention to claim that right in terms. Yet the right to dips, spurs, etc., is given by the mining law in the same terms as the right to one hundred feet on each side of the lode.

The object of any notice at all being to guide a subsequent locator, and afford him information as to the extent of the claim of the prior locator, whatever does this fairly and reasonably, should be held a good notice. Great injustice would follow, if, years after a miner had located a claim, and taken possession and worked upon it in good faith, his notice of location were to be subjected to any very nice criticism.

We agree with the defendants, that the locator should make his locations so certain that the miners who follow him may know the extent of his claim, and be able to locate the unoccupied ground without fear that, when they shall have found a paying mine, the theretofore indefinite lines of some prior location may be made to embrace it.

But id certum est quod certum reddi potest. When the miner has stated, as the rules require, the number of feet he claims along the lode on which he has set his stake, and has referred all whom it may concern to the laws of the district, by claiming all the privileges granted by the laws of the district, and those laws, in express terms, entitle each locator to hold one hundred feet on each side of his lode, then the length and breadth of his claim are fixed with reasonable certainty, because, by reading the laws of the district, with the notice referring him to them, the subsequent locator can make certain the exact thing claimed. See Gleeson v. White Mining Co., 13 Nev. 442.

It is true that a locator might, if he desired, take less than the one hundred feet, but in this case, Hanke and his associates did claim all the law allowed. And, after all, is it not the gist of the whole matter, that the miner actually takes possession and goes to work, thus giving publicity to his claim? That was done in this case. Plaintiff and its grantors have been on this ground, claiming it, prospecting and working it for years. The defendants cannot claim to have been misled by the notice in this case, for when they located the Mountain Boy, in February, 1878, they knew it was upon the Dinero claim, but insisted that the Dinero, for lack of the required amount of work upon it, had been forfeited.

Besides all this, in March, 1876, almost two years before the defendants located the Mountain Boy, the plaintiff had made a survey, and staked off the exterior boundaries of what it claimed, beyond all chance of mistake. This was done by placing stakes as follows: One at the center, one at the east, and one at the west end of the center line of the Mount Diablo claim; one three hundred feet north, and one three hundred feet south of both the east and west center stakes, thus plainly marking the center line and the four corners of ground claimed by the plaintiff, under the three locations made by Hanke and his associates. The Mountain Boy claim is almost wholly located within the lines marked by these stakes, and the ore body opened by the Callisons has its apex eighty-seven feet south of plaintiff's north line as thus marked.

We think the plaintiff, under the mining law quoted, became entitled to hold one hundred feet on each side of the Dinero lode, by virtue of the original location, unless, as is further urged by defendants, this section 8 was void for conflict with the act of congress of 1866 (14 Stat. 251). It does not appear to us necessary, at this day, to decide the effect of the act of 1866, upon locations made after its passage, and before the act of 1872. We think it by no means certain that the act of 1866 confined locations so that surface ground could not have been taken up, embracing more than one lode, although it is true that a patent under that act could have issued but for one lode.

For, be this as it may, the act of 1872 (17 Stat 91; Rev. St. § 2322) recognizes locations made prior to its passage, the surface lines of which included more than one vein or lode. The language is: "The locators of all mining locations heretofore made * * * shall have the exclusive right of possession, and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their location, and of all veins, lodes or ledges, the top or apex of which lies inside such surface lines." * * *

It is very clear that this language reaches the case of locators who had located claims while the act of 1866 was in force, the surface lines of which included the tops of more than one lode, and confirms their possession to all the surface, and all the lodes included within their lines. That is the case at bar.

The top or apex of the Callison lode lies within the surface lines of the Dinero, and within forty-seven and a half feet of the location monument which Hanke placed on the Dinero croppings; and it follows that the plaintiff is entitled to the exclusive possession of the Callison lode, unless for non-compliance with the law, a forfeiture of the Dinero claim has been incurred.

The evidence altogether refutes the idea that there was any abandonment in fact, or any intention to abandon the Dinero claim on plaintiff's part. There can be no doubt from the evidence that sufficient work was done on the Dinero claim to hold it down to 1876 and 1877. But however that may be, it is conceded that, under the statute, if sufficient work was done during the year 1877 to hold it, then there was no forfeiture. The whole question, therefore, on this branch of the case, is, whether in the year 1877 one hundred and forty dollars worth of labor was performed, or improvements made on the Dinero claim. If not, the claim was subject to relocation in February, 1878, by defendants, otherwise not.

On this point we find that a road was made during the year 1877 over the surface of the Dinero and Mount Diablo to be used in working the three mines, the Peru, Mount Diablo and Dinero, all at this time owned by the plaintiff, and to reach the Mount Diablo ore dump and the point on the surface of the Dinero, where the winze in the connecting drift would come out when raised as was then proposed. That portion of the labor on this road done on the surface of the Dinero claim was worth from fifty to seventy-five dollars.

A survey was also made to locate the point where the winze, when raised, would come to the surface, a point within the surface lines of the Dinero. In this year, Mr. Sweetapple located for plaintiff a proposed shaft at the point "R" on the Dinero ground, north of the ravine, and beyond the apex of the Callison vein. This projected shaft was to be a two-compartment shaft, and was to be sunk for prospecting the Dinero ground. An advertisement for bids was made, and six or eight were put in. The shaft was not begun in 1877 because, as Mr. Sweetapple testifies, the company being short of funds, decided to postpone sinking it until the following year.

All this was done on the surface of the claim; but it does not distinctly appear that the worth of it was so much as one hundred and forty dollars. It is evidence, however, of a continued purpose to hold the Dinero ground, and tends to confirm the claim of plaintiff, that all the work performed in this connection was intended to be applicable to all these three claims.

The plaintiff further shows that in prosecuting work from the main tunnel, which tunnel begins on the Mount Diablo ground, such as drifting and stoping out ore, some three thousand dollars' worth of labor was done during this year within the surface lines of the Dinero, if those lines are dropped perpendicularly down. This, the defendants say, was not, properly speaking, work on the Dinero claim, but within and on the Mount Diablo lode, which, in its downward course has pitched into the Dinero. The plaintiff, on the other hand, also insists that this and all other work was a part of a systematic plan applicable to all their claims.

This presents a question of practical importance for decision, which the consideration of a few additional facts may help us to do correctly. In the year 1867, the grantors of plaintiff Hanke and his associates, located three quartz claims at the point now in question, viz., the Peru, Mount Diablo and Dinero, all lying side by side, with the Mount Diablo in the center, the Dinero being the first location. The surface of each claim was two hundred feet wide. The plaintiff and its predecessors, from that time on, have been in the undisturbed possession of the mining ground covered by these three claims. During the years from 1867 to 1878, when the defendant entered, a large amount of work had been done by the plaintiff in and upon the claims, consisting of tunnels, drifts, winzes, cross-cuts, inclines, ore stopes, and all the labor usual in the development of such a mining claim. Over ninety-four thousand dollars have been expended by the plaintiff on the claims; much the larger portion within the lines of the Mount Diablo claim.

When Hanke located these three claims, he first located the Dinero, putting up a mound on the croppings; then going south, he located next the Mount Diablo, and last the Peru, putting a notice on the croppings of each. The three claims adjoin each other, and the surface area of the three together is just what the law of 1872 permits a locator to take on locating a single lode, unless the mining laws restrict him, namely, three hundred feet on each side of the center of the Mount Diablo claim. The Columbus laws do restrict the locators to one hundred feet on each side of the ledge located. At the time Hanke made his discovery and locations, he found upon the surface of all three claims black iron and manganese croppings. Ignorant of the real character of the ore deposits he believed he had found, and it being impossible, in the absence of developments beneath the surface, to determine whether these croppings were the signs of one lode or more, he made three locations. This he had a right to do. It was no more than any careful miner desiring to secure the fruits of his discovery, would have done. Subsequent explorations have shown that valuable ore deposits exist in each of the claims so located.

The mining law, providing for the peculiar mode in which the metalliferous deposits occur in the Columbus district, gave the locator a right to stick his stake at the point he supposed and claimed his ledge to be, and then entitled him to hold one hundred feet on each side, with all the ores and metals therein, thereby, in some degree, protecting the locator upon newly-discovered croppings, against his liability to mistake in selecting the spot to place his stake and notice.

These three claims, so located, the plaintiff has held and worked for more than ten years. The main tunnel, starting in the Mount Diablo, bears north until it penetrates the Dinero ground about one hundred and fifty feet. From this tunnel cross-cuts have been run south into the Peru and north into the Dinero, i. e., across the line dividing on the surface the Mount Diablo and Dinero claims.

Sometime in the year 1876 a cross-cut was made, north about forty-three feet towards the Dinero claim, some two hundred feet from the mouth of the main tunnel. From the north end of this cross-cut, an incline was sunk the same year, one hundred and forty-three feet, bringing the foot of the incline more than fifty feet into the Dinero ground. In 1877, drifting and stoping were carried on from and about this incline, and, according to Mr. Sweetapple, and the fact is not disputed, at least three thousand dollars' worth of this work was done on the Dinero, north of the Mount Diablo north line. A little north of the foot of this incline a cross-cut from the drift running north, was run, in 1877, twelve or fifteen feet west, at a cost of over one hundred and forty-four dollars. This cross-cut is wholly in the Dinero ground as marked on the surface.

This is the substance of the testimony on this point, and upon it we are called upon to decide whether the plaintiff in the year 1877 failed to comply with the conditions, as to labor on the Dinero claim, stated in section 2324 of the Rev. St., thereby leaving that claim open to re-location.

What, then, is a "mining claim," and what is "work on a claim?" It may be answered, to the first part of the inquiry, that a "mining claim," is the name given to that portion of the public mineral lands which the miner, for mining purposes, takes up and holds in accordance with mining laws, local and statutory. It must under the law of congress of 1872 (Rev. St. § 2320), be located upon at least one known vein or lode, but the vein or lode is not the whole claim.

"No claim," says the act, "shall extend more than three hundred feet on each side of the middle of the vein at the surface." A claim may therefore, if there is no restriction in the local rules, be six hundred feet wide, although the known lode to include which such claim is located is not twelve inches in width. The owners of such a mining claim have, in the language of the law, "the exclusive right and enjoyment of all the surface included within the lines of their locations." Rev. St. § 2322.

Applying the law to the case in hand, the Dinero claim consists of a tract of mining ground fourteen hundred feet long and two hundred feet wide. The Mount Diablo Company being the owner of the claim, had, in 1877, the exclusive right of possession to the whole tract, so far as the surface is concerned. Below the surface the possession was subject to such right as was given by statute to the owner of an adjoining claim to follow his lode downward across his line into the Dinero ground. Assuming this definition of a mining claim to be correct, the second branch of our inquiry is easily answered; work on a claim is work done anywhere within the lines upon the surface, and anywhere within those lines below the surface, when they are carried down vertically into the earth.

Had the Dinero ground been owned by another than plaintiff, and had this three thousand dollars' worth of work been done by such other owner at the point where it was in fact done by plaintiff, there could not be, it seems to us, any pretext for claiming a forfeiture against the Dinero owners on the ground that the work done, though on the claim, turned out to be within a lode which had its apex outside the Dinero surface lines. We think the fact that the plaintiff was the owner of both the Mount Diablo and Dinero claim, ought not to deprive it of credit for this work done on the Dinero. It is literally and in fact work done on the Dinero claim. If an outside lode dip into the claim, the work may also be done inside of that lode, but at the same time on the Dinero claim. A mining claim, as we have seen, is not merely the vein or lode, but that with a certain quantity of surface ground. The owner has the exclusive right of possession to such surface, as well as to the veins or lodes cropping out therein.

When the owner of a vein having its top outside the lines of such claim, follows his vein into an adjoining claim, he does so by permission of a positive law, without which he would have no more right to go upon his neighbor's claim below, than upon the surface. It is a sort of easement in, or servitude laid upon, the mining claim adjoining. We therefore conclude that when a miner does the necessary labor, anywhere within his boundaries upon the surface or below it, the condition of the mining law as to labor has been complied with. We cannot hold that he shall make no mistakes; that he is bound to ascertain at the risk of forfeiture, whether he is working on a lode having its apex outside his surface lines. The miner has perils and perplexities enough, without adding this. The ten dollars' worth of labor which the law requires the plaintiff to do on each one hundred feet of the Dinero claim, to save it from forfeiture, is too small to be of any practical consequence as a development of the claim. Congress plainly required this work to be done by way of a continuous, annual assertion, or renewal of the original claim and location, and nothing more. This being so, it would hurt our sense of justice did we feel compelled to say, that one hundred and forty dollars' worth of labor done on the surface, utterly valueless as a development of the claim, would have saved the claim from forfeiture, and that the three thousand dollars' worth of work done below the surface cannot.

It is also to be remembered that the plaintiff had long been the owner and possessor of these three claims; that the precise limits of the lodes, if more than one, and the nature of the ore deposit was, and may still be said to be, by no means free from doubt. A long tunnel was driven into this ground, a drift off to the south was run to prospect the Peru; on the north side inclines were sunk, and drifts run, some extending into the Dinero, some not. Wherever, in the Peru, Mount Diablo, or Dinero promise of ore appeared, there work was done, and when found the ore was stoped out.

At two different times, the last in 1874, notices were put up, and one of them recorded, notifying all that the work then being done was intended for the development of the three claims. Work done outside of the claim, or outside of any claim, if done for the purpose and as a means of prospecting or developing the claim, as in the case of tunnels, drifts, etc., is as available for holding the claim as if done within the boundaries of the claim itself. One general system may be formed well adapted and intended to work several contiguous claims or lodes, and when such is the case, work in furtherance of the system is work on the claims intended to be developed by it.

A general system of work for the exploration of the whole ground embraced in these three sets of contiguous claims seems to have been carried on by plaintiff. And we think that all work done was a part of that general system, and, as such, applicable to all the claims which had by purchase been concentrated in a single party, the plaintiff. Under the circumstances of this case it would be little short of downright absurdity to require the plaintiff to segregate his work, and proclaim the labor of removing one wheelbarrow full of earth from the common tunnel to be specifically applicable to the Dinero claim; another to the Mount Diablo, and a third to the Peru. The natural and reasonable presumption is that all the work is done as a part of the system, and as such applicable to all the claims.

Finally, when we consider that the plaintiff had been in unquestioned occupation of all these claims, for over ten years, prior to the entry of defendants, and the amount of labor altogether done on the ground, we have no inclination, and do not deem it our duty to strain for a construction of the law or of the facts upon which to declare a forfeiture. Forfeitures have always been deemed in law odious, and courts have universally insisted upon the forfeiture being made clearly apparent before enforcing it. Equity often interferes to relieve against forfeitures, but never to divest estates by enforcing them. Our conclusion is that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the demanded premises. Judgment must accordingly be entered in favor of plaintiff.

District Court, S. D. Florida. Nov. 3, 1851.

SALVAGE — IN DISTRESS — PERIL — NUMBER OF SALVORS—FORFEITURE.

[1. Compensation in the nature of salvage may be awarded for services rendered to a vessel in distress, although she was in no imminent peril of loss.]

[2. Other things being equal, the total award of salvage should vary with the degree of peril from which the property was saved.]

[Cited in The Calcutta, Case No. 2,298.]

[3. In fixing the total award, the number of salvors necessary to perform the services may be considered, but not the number actually employed.]

[4. The fraudulent employment by a salvor of an unnecessary number of assistants in order to magnify the importance of the services should cause a forfeiture of all compensation.]

[This was a libel for salvage by John H. Geiger and others against the ship Mount Washington and cargo (Blaisdell, master and claimant).]

Wm. W. McCall, for libelants.

S. R. Mallory, for respondent.

MARVIN, District Judge. The principal facts in this case are as follows: The ship Mount Washington (Blaisdell, master), while on a voyage from New Orleans to Bordeaux, about the 22d of August last, encountered a heavy gale, and lost her jib boom, foremast, and sails attached. When the gale subsided she came to anchor in about five fathoms water near the west end of the Quicksands, about forty miles west of Key West. The ship had leaked badly during the gale, and the cargo had changed its position, making her careen considerably. After the gale was over the master pumped out his ship, and did what he could to get the ship righted. He also erected a jury foremast and rigged jury sails and he was getitng ready to proceed to sea, with the view to go into the port of Key West or Havana for repairs, when, on the 24th of August, he was boarded by the libelant Geiger, master of the wrecking schooner Champion, who was then on a cruise for vessels in distress. The master of the ship employed Geiger to assist him in getting the ship to Key West, wanting his services as a pilot. The schooner Lafayette arrived at the ship about the same time. The direction of the ship being given up to Geiger, he got her under weigh, and stood towards the reef to the southward, and tacked and stood in again. On attempting to tack the second time, the ship misstayed, and it was soon ascertained she would not obey the helm, and, indeed, that the rudder post was split and broken. Geiger says that the ship was totally "unmanageable," attributing her staying at the first tack to a favoring tide and sea, and not to the efficiency of the rudder. Finding the ship would not stay, and the wind being ahead, so that it was necessary to beat the ship, making short tacks, he placed the schooners Champion and Lafayette ahead of the ship, and towed her. He subsequently placed the schooner Louisa also ahead, and finally the Euphemia, all employed in towing the ship. He arrived with the ship at Key West on the 27th. The winds were light, and the weather pleasant.

Such are the principal facts in the case. Geiger and the master of the ship do not materially differ in their relation of the facts; but Geiger alleges, as a matter of opinion, that, but for the services rendered by him and his consort, the ship and cargo would have been lost. He claims, therefore, salvage. The master admits the usefulness of the services, but alleges, as his opinion, that the ship and cargo would not have been lost, had no such services been rendered. It is very certain that Geiger and his associates are entitled to compensation for the services rendered, and whether this compensation is called "salvage," or simply "compensation," is really of no practical importance. It is true that salvage, in the legal acceptation of the word, and eo nomine, is allowed only for services which result in saving property from the perils of the sea. In this sense of the word, there must be, as a foundation for salvage, impending and imminent peril, and a saving from that peril. But compensation, larger or smaller, in the nature of salvage, is allowed by the court for services to property on the high seas, when such property is not in imminent peril, or perhaps in very little peril, of total loss; the amount of this salvage, or this compensation made, to vary with the varying circumstances of each individual case. So that the circumstances of each case must be considered, and a remuneration fixed either as a salvage eo nomine, or as a compensation in the nature of salvage. In fixing the amount of compensation for marine services, the various circumstances constituting the imminency of the danger to which the property was exposed, and from which it had been saved, the value of the property, the labor of the salvors in saving it, their gallantry, good conduct, and many other circumstances, all enter into the calculation, and are duly considered, as well as considerations of public policy, which prompts a liberal reward for salvage services, in order to advance the interests and promote the security of commerce generally. But in every case of a claim for salvage or compensation the great and important element in the calculation, in fixing the amount, constantly is, the condition and situation of the property in regard to its exposure to peril or danger of loss or destruction,—what was the peril or danger, if any, and the extent thereof; and according to the extent of this danger, all other things being equal, will the compensation or salvage be.

Let us now consider the question of danger in this case. Was this ship, at the time Geiger went to her, in peril of total loss? The true answer to this question will result from a consideration of her condition and situation. She lay at the west end of the Quicksands, at anchor in five fathoms of water, with an open sea to the southward, and no reefs so near as to interfere with his getting under weigh. Was there danger in this position? I do not see it. She had lost her foremast and jib boom. But the master had erected a jury foremast, and had got sail upon it. He had also rigged up a jib. Was she, in consequence of the loss of her foremast and sails, in danger of total loss? Her security may have been thereby somewhat diminished; but I do not think that it can properly be said that the ship, well manned and commanded as this ship was, is, in ordinary weather, in danger of loss simply because she has a jury foremast and a bad-fitting jib. But adding the further fact that her rudder was broken, and she steered badly, or would not steer at all, and still I think it cannot be said with truth that the ship was in danger of total loss. An experienced shipmaster like Captain Blaisdell knows very well how to repair or remedy the defects of a broken rudder, or how even to navigate the ship without a rudder, when necessary. It is very evident that this is the view which Captain Blaisdell himself took of the matter at the time. He wanted a pilot. He says he proposed to Geiger to pilot him, not that he considered his ship in any danger, but that it had become necessary, in consequence of the gale, to go into port, and the services of a pilot would be useful to him. He knew his position, and could himself navigate the ship into Havana or Key West without a pilot; but a pilot would be very useful to him, in giving him confidence, and enabling him to take advantage of tides, currents, &c.

It appears to me, upon a careful consideration of the facts and circumstances of the case, that this ship, at the time Geiger went on board, was in little or no danger of a total loss, but that the probability, decidedly, is that, had no person gone to the ship, Captain Blaisdell would himself, unaided, have navigated his ship into this port, or the port of Havana. Such I think must be the opinion, too, of all candid men possessing any considerable nautical experience. Indeed, when we consider that the gale was over, the weather good, the ship snugly at anchor, and not leaking badly, and that the ship had two good masts and a jury foremast, and was within forty miles of this port, with an experienced commander and an efficient crew, it may well be doubted whether it was not the duty of Captain Blaisdell to have declined altogether the services offered by Geiger, and to have carried out the purposes and views he entertained before the arrival of Geiger at the ship. But Captain Blaisdell thought he needed the pilot, and employed Geiger accordingly. I think the unconditional employment of Geiger under the circumstances, was probably excusable. It was evidently done in good faith, and, without doubt, it appeared to the master to be advisable and proper; and I think it was. But I do not think that a pilot, even, was indispensably necessary to the safety of the ship,—much less the employment of any vessels in towing the ship necessary to her safety. The rudder could have been repaired, or, if not, the ship could have been anchored in safety, and navigated to this port when the wind should become more favorable.

The very most, it appears to me, that can possibly be claimed, truly and fairly for Geiger's services, is that they were very proper, and, under the circumstances, allowable, and necessary to get the ship to this port in the shortest time, and with satisfaction to the master; but it cannot be said that they were necessary to the ship's safety, or that they contributed to save the ship, for I do not consider her as having been in danger. Salvage, therefore, eo nomine, is not due; but a fair and reasonable compensation for the services rendered. In estimating the value of these services, and fixing the amount of compensation to be allowed therefor, I consider the services of Geiger and the schooner Champion and crew as useful, and proper to be paid for, not that I consider either as necessary to the safety of the ship; but they were useful and necessary to get the ship into port in good time, and without too much labor and anxiety. The services of one vessel and crew are therefore to be paid for. The services of the Louisa, the Lafayette, and the Euphemia were no further useful than as they contributed to get the ship into port perhaps a day or two sooner than she would have arrived without them. These vessels did no hurt; they did some good; and there is no objection to their employment. But there is no principle or usage or practice of this court, or of any other, that indorses or in any way sanctions the idea of allowing a larger compensation in the nature of salvage, or a larger salvage, for services rendered by a larger number of salvors than would be allowed for the same services rendered by a less number. The compensation cannot be increased by increasing the number of salvors. On the contrary, it has been the steady practice of the court to adjust its amounts of salvage in each case with reference, not to the number of vessels and men actually employed, but with reference to the number necessary to do the service. In determining what number, in any particular case, was necessary, much, often, would have to be left to the judgment of the parties interested and on the spot. But in no case has this court ever increased the amount of salvage in consequence of there being a larger number of salvors, where it has been apparent at the time that a less number would be sufficient. I have above remarked that there is no objection to the employment of the Louisa, the Lafayette, and the Euphemia. They did no hurt, and did some good. Their employment ought not to diminish the compensation to be allowed for the service actually renuered; for their employment seems to have been in good faith, and the reasons assigned for it are satisfactory. But did the facts and circumstances of the case fully satisfy me that these vessels had been employed with the view to magnify the importance of the services, and to make out an apparently strong case of salvage, with a view to a larger compensation than the real facts would fairly warrant, there would be no doubt in my mind as to what the law would require me to decree. Such conduct works a forfeiture of all salvage or compensation. The law just as much exacts fairness and honesty in the salvors in presenting a claim of salvage to the court as it does fidelity and honesty in preserving the property from embezzlement. Salvors are not to impose on the master of the ship or vessel, nor on the court, but to conduct themselves fairly and honestly in regard to both.

To return to the question of compensation: The case of The Herman [Case No. 6,406], decided in this court in 1840, is somewhat analogous to the present case. That ship got ashore on Alligator reef, and drove over, knocking off her rudder. Bethel and Roberts piloted the ship into this port steering her by the sloop Texas. The court decreed $800. That ship was in as much danger as this. She was inside the reef, and without a rudder. In that case, however, the ship was to windward of the port, and could be more easily brought in. More time and labor were required to bring this ship in. Upon the whole, I think that $1,500 is a suitable compensation to be decreed for the services rendered.

It is therefore, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the sum of fifteen hundred dollars be allowed the libelants for their services rendered said ship Mount Washington as alleged by them in their libel, and that upon the payment thereof and the costs and expenses of this suit, the wharfage, storage, and bills for labor, the marshal restore said ship to the master, for and on account of whom it may concern. It is further ordered that the marshal proceed to advertise and sell at public auction a lot of old brass taken from the old rudder, and whatever other old material the master may desire to have sold.

COLLISION ON HUDSON RIVER — SCHOONER AND STEAMBOAT.

1. A steamboat, with a heavy tow at the end of a hawser, was going slowly up the Hudson river, close along the west shore, when a collision occurred between a boat on the port side in the tow, and a schooner. The schooner was scarcely doing more than drifting down with the tide, as the wind was very light. The steamboat, just before the collision, took a rank sheer to the east, and, when the schooner was just off her port bow, stopped her engine: Held, that it was the duty of the steamboat to keep out of the way of the schooner, and she must show that her failure to do so arose from no fault on her part.

2. The sheer of the steamboat was not justifiable, and she should have stopped and backed sooner.

In admiralty.

R. D. Benedict, for libellant.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for claimant.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This is a libel for a collision which occurred about 8 o'clock a. m. on the 1st of August, 1867, between the schooner Annie, owned by the libellant, and a canal-boat in tow of the steamboat Mount Washington, a short distance below the upper end of Wagner's Island, in the Hudson river. The schooner was bound down the river. The steamboat was going up close along the west shore, off Wagner's Island, having seventeen boats in tow—one on each side of her and fifteen on a hawser, astern, in three tiers of four each, and an extreme stern tier of three. The tide was ebb. There is a dispute as to how the wind was, but there is no doubt it was very light. The schooner was scarcely doing more than drifting with the tide. The speed of the steamboat was very small, as her tow was heavy. The port bow of the schooner struck the port bow of the extreme port boat, of the four boats in the first tier behind the steamboat, and the schooner swung around, so that her port side lay against the bows of the boats in that tier. She was finally shoved out, and claims to recover $200 for the damages she sustained and for loss of her time.

It was the duty of the steamboat to keep out of the way of the schooner, and she must show that she failed to do so through no fault on her part. This she has not, on the whole evidence, satisfactorily done. It is admitted, that, just before the collision, the steamboat took a rank sheer to the eastward, by putting her helm hard a-port, and that she and the boat on her port side went clear of the schooner, on the port side of the schooner. I am not satisfied that this sheer was justifiable, or that there was anything in the position or movements of the schooner, to call for it. The steamboat, on her own showing, was very close to the west shore, and it was not reasonable for her to suppose that the schooner would attempt to pass between her and the west shore. It was on that supposition alone that she acted, in porting where she did. Moreover, I think the steamboat did not soon enough stop and back. Her master says, that, when the schooner was nearly an eighth of a mile off, he thought she was going in to the westward of him, and that he, at that distance, hailed the schooner not to do so, but without effect. Yet he says, that he did not slow or stop his engine till after he had put his wheel hard a-port, and that, when he stopped his engine, the schooner was just off his port bow. I think, on the evidence, that, if the steamboat had not ported at all, and, certainly, if she had stopped and backed, when she hailed the schooner, there would have been no collision. There must be a decree for the libellant, with costs, with a reference to ascertain the damages sustained by the libellant.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1804.

INSOLVENCY—ACT 1774—DISCHARGE—POSTING AT CLERK'S OFFICE.

Under the insolvent act of 1774 (chapter 28), a discharge of the debtor is not valid unless a copy of the justices' certificate be affixed at the door of the county clerk's office.

Plea of release under the insolvent act of 1774 (chapter 28). General demurrer.

Mr. Mason, in support of the demurrer, contended that the release was not valid under the act of 1774. That act provides that a copy of the justices' certificate shall by the sheriff be affixed to the door of the clerk's office of the county, and at the door of the prison of the county. The prisoner must be confined in the county jail, and the debtor's property is to vest in the sheriff of the county. The plea states that the copy was put up on the door of the clerk of the corporation, and on the door of the jail of the corporation, and that the prisoner was confined in the jail of the corporation, in custody of the sheriff of the corporation. No power was vested in the corporation to have a jail. The justices met at the corporation jail.

Mr. Morsell, contra. The act of 1774, meant to apply to all cases of commitment for debt, where the debts did not amount to £200 sterling. It was not necessary that the commitment should be in the common jail of the county. The corporation jail, was a jail of Montgomery county. Georgetown was part of the county of Montgomery. The justices acted not as ministerial, but as judicial officers, in discharging prisoners. Their certificate, is, therefore, conclusive evidence of a compliance with requisites of the act of 1774. The power to have a jail is an incident to the judicial power over criminals vested in the court of the corporation, by the charter of Georgetown, 1787 (chapter 23). The alderman's executions were returnable to the mayor's court, who had a right to commit on non-payment. It was a case within the spirit of the act of 1774.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Circuit Judge, contra,) were of opinion, that the plea was bad, because a copy was not set up at the door of the county jail, but only at the corporation jail.

KILTY, Chief Judge, thought, also, that the county justices had no authority to command the corporation sheriff.

MOWATT v. BROWN.

[14 Betts, D. C. MS. 80.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 28, 1848.

SEAMEN — WAGES — DISABILITY CONCEALED AT TIME OF SHIPPING.

[A seaman who ships for a voyage, concealing from the master a long-standing disease, which incapacitates him from labor, is not entitled to wages.]

[This was a libel by John Mowatt against Joseph R. Brown for seaman's wages.]

PER CURIAM (BETTS, District Judge). The libellant shipped in this port the 7th of April last as an able seaman on the barque Adario for a voyage to the coast of Africa and back. He entered on board in a disordered state of body, and never regained his health and strength in the five months the vessel was absent, so as to be able to perform his duty on board. He now sues the master of the vessel for wages on the voyage and claims a balance of $31 and upwards. This is not the case of a seaman taken sick in the service of the ship, when, by the maritime law, he continues entitled to running wages, and also to be cured of his malady at the charge of the ship. Abb. Shipp. 733; Curt. Merch. Seam. 107; Id. 291. He was laboring under an old and fixed affection disabling him from performing the duty of a sailor, and it was a fraud upon the master and owner to ship as an able seaman under such circumstances. Pet. Adm. 263; Curt. Merch. Seam. 29. Had he been able to perform valuable services to any amount, he might obtain satisfaction pro tanto, the master having the right to make a reasonable deduction for his deficiency. Abb. Shipp. 734, note; 3 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 186. Under the proofs in this case it is made to appear that the libellant was disabled by an old infirmity, which he concealed from the master at the time of shipping, and which continued upon him, and disabled him from duty during the voyage, and therefore he cannot now sustain an action as for meritorious services. Libel dismissed, with summary costs.

MOWER et al. v. BURDICK.

[4 McLean, 7.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1845.

PLEADING AT LAW—PLEA—TRAVERSE—ARGUMENTATIVELY DENIED.

A plea which argumentatively denies a fact averred in the declaration, is demurrable. The traverse must be direct.

[This was a proceeding by Mower and Stevens against Burdick.]

Barstow & Douglass, for plaintiffs.
Joy & Porter, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought upon a sealed instrument, dated the 9th of June, 1839, in which the defendant agreed to indemnify the plaintiffs and save them harmless against the payment of a certain promissory note, made and signed by the plaintiffs jointly and severally, with one Samuel Mower, then of Michigan City, Indiana, for the sum of seventeen hundred dollars, payable in one year, for the benefit and use of the said Samuel Mower. And the plaintiffs aver, that on the 12th day of July, 1842, they paid the said note. The second count in the declaration was substantially the same on another note.

The defendant pleaded that the said Samuel Mower did himself take up and pay each of the said several promissory notes when they became due, without this, that the said plaintiffs paid the sums due upon the said promissory notes when they became due, or any part of all or either of them in manner and form, etc., which the said defendant is ready to verify. To this plea, the plaintiffs demurred. This plea is bad. The plaintiffs aver that they paid the notes after they became due; the plea alleges that Mower paid them when they became due, which is not a direct answer to the averment in the declaration. This may be a good argument to show that the plaintiffs could not have paid the notes as they allege, but it is an argumentative denial of the fact stated in the declaration, which should be traversed. Steph. Pl. 175–177, 181, 385. The case was discontinued.

MOWREY v. INDIANAPOLIS & C. R. CO. et al.

Circuit Court, D. Indiana. June Term, 1866.

INJUNCTION—NOTICE—CORPORATIONS—ACTS OF MAJORITY—CHANGES IN CHARTER—BY LEGISLATURE—OBJECTIONS — ESTOPPEL — COURTS — FEDERAL JURISDICTION.

1. The national courts can not order temporary injunctions, except on reasonable notice to the adverse party or his attorney.

2. It is a general rule, that the acts of a majority of a body politic bind the whole corporation, when confined to its ordinary transactions, and consistent with the original objects of its formation.

3. When, at the time of subscribing stock in a corporation, there are existing laws by which the charter of the body politic may be fundamentally changed, such subscription must be presumed to have been made with a view to such laws, and to changes which may possibly be made conformably to them. And in such case a majority of the stockholders may adopt such changes against the will of a minority.

[Cited in Mower v. Staples, 32 Minn. 286, 20 N. W. 226.]

4. Under the provisions of the national constitution, prohibiting the states from making any law impairing the obligation of contracts, and in cases not falling within the foregoing rules, no fundamental change, even though authorized by subsequent legislation, can be made in the charter of a private pecuniary corporation without the consent of all the stockholders, unless the legislature has provided otherwise in the charter.

5. If a member of a Board of Directors of a corporation be present at the adoption of a resolution and aware of what is being done, and makes no opposition to its adoption, he must be presumed to have assented to it. But if such proceeding be merely preliminary to a decision by a subsequent vote of the stockholders on the consolidation of the corporation with another corporation, which can only be ultimately decided by the vote of all the stockholders, and not of the board of directors, such consent so given by a member of the board of directors, who is also a stockholder, does not estop him from afterwards objecting to the consolidation.

6. To effect a consolidation of railroad companies subsisting under special charters not providing therefor, the consent of every stockholder must be given; and any one dissenting stockholder is entitled to an injunction against such consolidation.

7. In a suit against a corporation in the United States circuit court for the state, by a citizen of another state, service of process within the state upon a joint defendant, a citizen of a third state, gives the court jurisdiction over him.

In equity.

Bartley & Burnett and McDonald & Roach, for complainant.

G. E. Pugh and Hendricks, Hord & Hendricks, for defendants.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is a proceeding in equity for an injunction. The bill was filed on the 28th of May, 1866. On the same day, the complainant, without notice to the defendants, and in their absence, moved for a temporary injunction to operate till the motion could be fully heard on due notice on a day to be fixed by the court. As the bill stated facts indicating a pressing emergency, I then ordered that the defendants should be enjoined as prayed, till, on due notice to them, the motion could be fully heard on the fifth day of June, 1866. On the latter day, all parties appeared by counsel. The defendants then moved for a dissolution of the injunction already granted; and, at the same time, the complainant moved for a temporary injunction till the final hearing, or till the further order of the court.

The injunction ordered on the 28th of May was decreed without much consideration on my part. I followed a practice which had long prevailed in the courts of the state of Indiana. But, on further reflection, I think my order for a temporary injunction was premature. Equity would seem to demand that, in cases of emergency, where irreparable injury would follow unless an immediate injunction were ordered, the national courts should have power to grant temporary injunctions without notice of the application for them to the party enjoined. But the act of congress of March 2, 1793, forbids that any writ of injunction shall "be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same." 1 Stat. 335. In view of this act, as well as of the 55th rule in equity of the supreme court, it should seem that no special injunction can be granted by this court but on due notice. And in the case of New York v. Connecticut, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 1, the supreme court has decided that an injunction can neither be granted by the United States courts, nor any judge thereof, without due notice to the adverse party or his attorney. I, therefore, dissolve the injunction ordered on the 28th of May.

We proceed to consider the motion now made by the complainant for a temporary injunction. By the bill, it appears that Albert L. Mowrey, the complainant, is the owner of three hundred and thirty-one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars in the shares of the capital stock of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company; and that the defendant [Henry C.] Lord, is the president of the company. The corporation exists under a special charter from the Indiana legislature, granted before the adoption of the constitution of 1851.

The bill alleges that a negotiation has lately been set on foot to consolidate said company with the Lafayette and Indianapolis Railroad Company. To this consolidation it appears that the latter company has already consented. And it further appears that the board of directors of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company have called a meeting of their stockholders to obtain their consent to the consolidation.

The bill charges that, on the 10th of May last, certain articles of consolidation were agreed to and signed by H. C. Lord, T. A. Morris, and W. Wright, a committee on the part of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company, and by W. F. Reynolds, a committee on the part of the Lafayette and Indianapolis Railroad Company. A copy of these articles is exhibited; and they purport to be the work of the boards of directors of the two companies, "by and with the assent of their respective stockholders." Among other things, these articles provide for the issuance by the consolidated company of bonds to the amount of two million eight hundred thousand dollars, of which two millions and a half are to be delivered to said Reynolds in trust, first, to pay all the expenses of such trust; second, to pay all the legal liabilities of the Lafayette and Indianapolis Railroad Company for their stock; third, to pay such stockholders of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company as desire to exchange their stock for these bonds. The articles provide that, after these payments, the residue of the bonds shall be appropriated in various ways unimportant to the present decision to be stated.

The bill also charges that in 1865 a corporation was organized to construct a railroad from Indianapolis to the Indiana state line in the direction of Danville, Illinois, by the name of the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and Danville Railroad Company; that, at the instance of the defendant Lord, the complainant subscribed two hundred thousand dollars to the capital stock of that company, and other persons subscribed thereto one million eight hundred thousand dollars; that Lord, and the directors of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company, and the directors of the Lafayette and Indianapolis Railroad Company, are attempting to effect the said consolidation, with the fraudulent design to break down the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and Danville Railroad Company, and render the complainant's stock therein worthless; that by issuing said bonds, the defendants intend to buy up therewith all the stock so, as aforesaid, subscribed to the road last aforesaid, except the two hundred thousand dollars subscribed by the complainant; and that with a view to that object, the said Lord has already, as president of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company, actually bargained for a considerable portion of the stock of the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and Danville Railroad Company, agreeing to pay therefor said bonds when they shall be issued.

To all these doings the complainant objects as frauds on his rights; and he especially objects to said consolidation, insisting that the same can not be legally effected without his consent. I lay no stress on the averments in the bill touching the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and Danville Railroad Company. That company is not a party to this suit; and if it were, I think the matters relating to it and its stock are not proper subjects of consideration in a bill whose principal object, evidently, is to enjoin the consolidation of two other railroads. Indeed, I suspect that to unite all these matters in one bill might make it multifarious.

Nor do I deem material any inquiry into the policy of the proposed consolidation. Whether such a consolidation would be beneficial or injurious to the stockholders in general, or would favorably or unfavorably affect the complainant's stock in particular, are matters to be considered and determined by them alone. The only question for the court is a question of power. Have these corporations the power to consolidate against the will of one of the stockholders? If they have, we will not disturb them in the exercise of that power; if they have not, we are bound to forbid its exercise.

The statute of Indiana, on the subject of the consolidation of railroad companies, gives the power to consolidate in general terms, without any provision as to the consent of stockholders. 1 Gavin & H. p. 526. While, therefore, the general power of consolidation without doubt exists in this state, yet, whether such consolidation—especially in the present case—can be legally effected, without the consent of all the stockholders, cannot be determined by any Indiana statute, but must depend on general principles of law.

We have seen that complainant is a stockholder in the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company to the amount of three hundred and thirty-one thousand five hundred and fifty dollars. He insists that by virtue of this interest he is entitled to object to the proposed consolidation, though every other stockholder in the two companies should desire it. If in this he is right, the injunction must be granted; otherwise, not. And this is the great question in the case.

It is certain that the proposed consolidation, if effected, would work a material and fundamental change in the corporation in which the complainant holds his stock. Nay, it would extinguish that corporation; for it is well settled that the consolidation of two railroad companies under the Indiana statute extinguishes them both; and that the consolidated institution is a new corporation, distinct from both the old ones out of which it was formed. State v. Bailey, 16 Ind. 46.

I think the following propositions may be laid down as clear law:

1. It is not to be doubted that, as a general rule, the acts of a majority of a corporation are binding on the whole, when confined to its ordinary transactions, and consistent with the original objects of its formation. Troy & R. R. Co. v. Kerr, 17 Barb. 581, 604; 1 Kyd, Corp. 422; Ang. & A. Corp. (2d Ed.) pp. 53, 396.

2. In all cases, where at the time of subscribing stock in a corporation, there are existing laws by which the charter of such corporation may be fundamentally changed, such subscription must be presumed to have been made with a view to such laws and to changes which may possibly be made conformably to them; and in such case, a majority of the stockholders may adopt such changes against the will of a minority. Bish v. Johnson, 21 Ind. 299.

3. Under the provision of the national constitution prohibiting the states from making any "law impairing the obligation of contracts," and in cases not falling within the proposition last above stated, no fundamental change, even though authorized by subsequent legislation, can be made in the charter of a private pecuniary corporation, without the consent of all the stockholders, unless the legislature has provided otherwise in the charter. 2 Redf. R. R. 575, 576.

The defendants' counsel have argued that the case of Clearwater v. Meredith, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 25, is opposed to the last of these propositions. But I think that case sustains it. In Clearwater v. Meredith, the question of the consolidation of two railroad companies was discussed. Clearwater was a stockholder in one of these roads. And Mr. Justice Davis, who delivered the opinion of the court, said that "Clearwater could have prevented this consolidation had he chosen to do so."

The only American case which I have found, and which seems opposed to this proposition, is that of Lauman v. Lebanon Val. R. Co., 30 Pa. St. 42. This case decides that a single stockholder has no right to object to the consolidation of the company in which he holds stock, with another railroad company. The learned chief justice who pronounced this decision cites no authority in support of it. His reasoning on it seems to me not very satisfactory. It may be right under Pennsylvania laws touching railroad corporations. But it is singularly inconsistent with the judgment rendered in the case, which was that the complainant could not be made a stockholder against his will in the consolidated company; and that the consolidation should be enjoined till he was secured in the payment of the value of his stock. Why enjoin the consolidation at all, if he had no right to object to it. His objection in that case seems to have been pretty effectual.

There is, indeed, a dictum in the case of State v. Bailey, 16 Ind. 46, which seems to favor the Pennsylvania doctrine above mentioned. It is to the effect that in the case of the consolidation of two railroad companies, "those stockholders in the old who do not enter the new, are entitled to withdraw their shares in the capital stock, and may enjoin till they are secured." This may be true, if the objecting stockholder should choose to adopt that course. But is he bound to adopt it as his only remedy? Is he bound either to sell out his stock in this way, or to abandon it, or to become a stockholder in the consolidated company? Would not forcing him to either of these alternatives be a violation of his contract? Directly opposed to the case in 30 Pa. St., and to the dictum in 16 Ind., so far as these maintain the doctrine that a single stockholder has no right to object to a consolidation, is the well-considered case of Stevens v. Rutland & B. R. Co., 29 Vt. 545. This case expressly decides that any stockholder in a railroad corporation may have an injunction against the other corporators to prohibit any fundamental change in the original purpose of the act of incorporation, though the proposed change be authorized by an act of the legislature. And, in perfect agreement with this ruling, it is well settled in Indiana, that the consolidation of two railroad corporations, against the consent of a subscriber of stock to one of them, releases him from the payment of the stock thus subscribed. Sparrow v. Evansville & C. R. Co., 7 Ind. 369; McCray v. Junction R. Co., 9 Ind. 358. These cases proceed on the just view that the relation between a stockholder and the corporation is one of contract; and that every fundamental change in its charter, made against his consent though on the authority of a subsequent act of the legislature, is a violation of that contract, and is forbidden by the national constitution. Now if, as is the rule in Indiana, a consolidation against the will of a subscriber of stock releases him from paying it because it is a breach of his contract, it must inevitably follow that, if, as in the case at bar, the subscriber has already paid for his stock, such consolidation against his will is equally a violation of his contract. Everybody knows that if several men enter into a valid contract, it cannot be fundamentally altered but by unanimous consent. Why should a different rule prevail as between corporators?

Upon the whole, I think that if the case made by the complainant does not fall within either the first or second of the propositions which I have above laid down, and does fall within the third, he is entitled to relief in equity. It cannot be insisted that the proposed consolidation is within the first of these propositions. For, as already shown, the consolidation would not only fundamentally affect the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company as a corporation, but it would destroy its very existence.

The defendants, however, argue, that the case at bar is within the second, and not the third, of these propositions, both because the charter of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company has been so amended as to meet the complainant's objection, and because he has consented to the consolidation. I will consider these points separately.

First. As to the amendment of the charter of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company: The 35th section of that charter reserves to the legislature "the right at any time to alter or amend it, two-thirds of both branches concurring therein." Under this section there can be no doubt of the power of the legislature to amend the charter, even against the will of every stockholder. But it may be more doubtful whether under this reserved power, the legislature could consolidate this corporation with another against the will of the corporators. For that would be to destroy, not "to alter or amend," the charter. Be this as it may, however, if no amendment authorizing the consolidation in question has been made, it is obvious that the complainant's rights are the same as if the power to amend had not been reserved. But the defendants insist that an amendment altering the rights of the complainant has been made to the charter. The amendment to which they refer is the Indiana act of February 23, 1853,—a general law authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies. 1 Gavin & H. p. 526.

The Indiana constitution of November, 1851, prohibits the legislature from passing special acts of incorporation, and authorizes the passage of general laws of incorporation. Under this provision, the general railroad act of 1852 was passed. It provided rules under which any company of men might become a railroad corporation. Its 37th section reserved to the legislature the right to amend or repeal the whole act. And the supreme court of Indiana, I think, justly regard as an amendment of it, the above-mentioned act of February 23, 1853,—the only act in this state authorizing the consolidation of railroad companies. We must then regard the last-named act as being substantially part and parcel of the general railroad law of Indiana. We must bear in mind, however, that the charter of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company is a special act, passed before the constitution of 1851. And the question is, does the general railroad law above referred to effect such an amendment of this special charter as is contemplated by its 35th section, which reserves the power to alter or amend the charter? I think it does not. We may well suppose that the only object of the reservation in the 35th section of this special charter was to retain in the legislature a power, which, without the reservation, could not be exercised,—a power to amend the charter authoritatively and without the consent of the railroad company. On the contrary, the consolidation act of 1853 is a mere privilege, allowing—not obliging—railroad companies to consolidate if they please to do so. Such a privilege the legislature doubtless could have offered, and perhaps did offer, by the act of 1853, to the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company, just as well, and with exactly the same effect, without the said reservation in its charter, as with it. Besides, the privilege thus offered would be utterly inoperative as an amendment of the charter, till it was accepted by the company. Now the acceptance of this offered privilege would involve a fundamental change in the charter of the company accepting it,—a change which, if the doctrine already stated be true, could not be effected in the case of a corporation subsisting under a special charter, but by the consent of every stockholder. So far as appears, no such consent has ever been given by all the stockholders, or even by a majority of the stockholders, of the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company. I conclude, therefore, that the general law of 1853, permitting railroad companies, at their pleasure, to consolidate, has never become part and parcel of the charter of the company in question, either by legislative amendment or otherwise.

Second. Has the complainant consented to the consolidation under consideration? And is he by such consent now estopped to insist on his objection to the consolidation? It appears that he was one of the directors of this company on the 24th of May, 1866. On that day, the board of directors met to consider the subject of this proposed consolidation. He was present, and did not object. On the contrary, it appears by the minutes of the board, of that day, that the committees already mentioned then reported to the board the terms of consolidation agreed on by them; whereupon the board unanimously approved of the action of the committees reported, and the consolidation of the two companies upon the terms and conditions agreed to by the committees; and the board then and there recommended to the stockholders to consent to the consolidation, and they called a meeting of the stockholders to be held on a designated day in order that they might vote on the question of the consolidation. Immediately on the conclusion of these transactions of the board, the complainant resigned his office of a director. But the weight of the evidence before me strongly indicates that, so long as he remained a director, he made no objection to any of these proceedings, though he was present, might have objected if he pleased, and well knew what was going on. Under these circumstances, I think he ought to be considered as consenting to what was done. "Qui non prohibit quod prohibere potest, assentire videtur."

But does this consent, given under these circumstances by the complainant, estop him to urge the present objection to the consolidation? The proceedings of the board of directors as above detailed were merely prefatory and preparatory to the settlement of the question of consolidation. Certainly no decision of the board could effect the consolidation. To do that, required the decision of the stockholders. So the board understood it, else they would not have called a meeting of the stockholders to vote on the question. And the very articles of consolidation reported to, and approved by, the board at that time, recited that the consolidation was to be effected "by and with the assent of the stockholders." And as the board fixed a day for the taking of the vote of the stockholders, and as the board evidently meant to refer the settlement of the question to them, it must have been understood that if the stockholders voted against the consolidation the whole thing would fail. It may fairly be presumed that all these directors were stockholders. Under all the circumstances, it seems very clear that all these directors holding stock would have the right to attend on the day appointed and vote for or against the consolidation. If any of them proposed then to vote against it, no man would have had a right to tell him, "You must not vote so: you are estopped to do so, because you voted for the consolidation on the board." To such an objection, he might well answer: "I voted then not as a stockholder, but as a director, guided by the best light I then had. Now I exercise my right as a stockholder. Besides, I have changed my opinion. I think now that the proposed consolidation would be injurious to my interests; and so I shall oppose it."

I cannot conceive how any vote of the complainant as one of the board of directors could destroy his right to vote as he pleased as a mere stockholder. Surely there remained to him and to all the directors the locus poenitentiae. After their action on the board they may have changed their minds. They had a right to do so up to the moment of the final voting by the stockholders, just as a bidder at an auction has a right to withdraw his bid before the property is knocked off to him. In all he did on this subject, there appears to have been nothing fraudulent, nothing deceitful, nothing injurious to any other stockholder. And there is nothing in his conduct throughout the whole transaction bearing the slightest resemblance either to a legal or equitable estoppel.

It has been urged on the part of the defendant, Henry C. Lord, that this court has no jurisdiction over his person; and that therefore we can make no order enjoining him. This objection is made on the ground that he is not a citizen of Indiana. The bill states that the complainant is a citizen of New York; that Lord is a citizen of Ohio; and that the Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company is an Indiana corporation. It appears that Lord was served with process in this case in this district. Under these circumstances, I should think that we could not take jurisdiction of the person of Mr. Lord by virtue alone of the eleventh section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 78). But the act of February 28, 1839, must be considered in connection with the judiciary act (5 Stat. 32). A fair construction of both these acts, I think, gives us jurisdiction of the person of Mr. Lord in this case. I suppose that a citizen of New York may sue a citizen of Ohio in this court if he is served with process in the district of Indiana. This seems to be now the practice in the United States courts. Whether Mr. Lord is either a necessary or a proper party to this suit, is another question,—a question not necessary to be decided on the present motion.

In view, then, of the whole case, I am reluctantly led to the conclusion that the complainant's motion for a temporary injunction ought to be granted. Therefore, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that upon the complainant filing an injunction bond in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, with the usual condition and sufficient sureties to be approved by the court, the said Indianapolis and Cincinnati Railroad Company, its board of directors, officers, and agents, be enjoined, till the further order of this court, from proceeding any further to consummate the said proposed consolidation, or to issue any of the bonds mentioned in the complainant's bill, or to apply any of such bonds or any of the funds or property of said company to the purchase of stock in the Cincinnati, Indianapolis and Danville Railroad Company.

NOTE. In a case recently (July, 1874) heard at Madison, Wisconsin, before Judges Davis, Drummond, and Hopkins (Piek v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. [Case No. 11,138]), it was held that a provision of the constitution of the state, that railroad charters "may be altered or repealed by the legislature at any time after their passage," underlies all subsequent grants of rights and franchises to the railroad corporations of the state; that stock and securities in such corporations were taken and held subject to this paramount condition, of which, in law, all holders had notice; and that such corporations could not clothe their creditors with greater rights, as against the state, than it possessed itself; and that this principle was not changed by authority from the legislature to consolidate with other railroads.

The mere presence of a person at a lawful meeting does not make him responsible for a resolution there passed, if he protests against it; and where a director opposed a resolution, but, finding himself in a minority, insisted on the insertion of certain terms, believing that such insertion would prevent the plan of the majority from being carried out, held, that he was not responsible on the plan being carried out on those terms. In re Direct East & West Junction Ry. Co., 31 Eng. Law & Eq. 430.

The act of February 28, 1839, was passed to remedy the inconvenience under the settled construction of the judiciary act of 1789, by which, when there was more than one party, plaintiff or defendant, the court must have jurisdiction between each party, plaintiff and defendant, or the action could not be maintained. Taylor v. Cook [Case No. 13,789]. This act of 1839, however, wrought no change in the jurisdiction of the circuit courts, as respects the character of the parties; it only obviates difficulties arising from inability to join or serve those not liable to be sued by the plaintiff, or not within reach of process. Commercial Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 60.

This act relates solely to the non-joinder of persons who are not within the reach of the process of the court. It does not affect any case where persons having an interest are not joined because their citizenship is such that their joinder would defeat the jurisdiction; and, so far as it touches suits in equity, we understand it to be no more than a legislative affirmance of the rule previously established by the cases of Cameron v. McRoberts, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 591; Osborn v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 738; and Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 132; Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 141. If the absent defendant be a resident of the same state with the plaintiff, the jurisdiction cannot be sustained, as the suit would not be, as between them, a suit between citizens of different states. Bargh v. Page [Case No. 980].

Several of the above cases are commented upon in Louisville, C. & C. R. Co. v. Letson, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 497, in which case the court say (page 557): "We think, as was said in the case of Commercial Bank of Vicksburg v. Slocomb [supra], that this act was intended to remove the difficulties which occurred in practice, in cases both in law and equity, under that clause in the 11th section of the judiciary act, which declares that no civil suit shall be brought before either of said courts against an inhabitant of the United States, by any original process, in any other district than that whereof he is an inhabitant, or in which he shall be found at the time of serving the writ; but a re-examination of the entire section will not permit us to reaffirm what was said in that case,—that the act did not contemplate a change in the jurisdiction of the courts as it regards the character of the parties."

PATENTS—JURISDICTION OF COMMISSIONER—QUESTION OF PRIOR USE—WITHDRAWAL OF APPLICATIONS.

[1. The sixth section of the act of 1836 (5 Stat. 119) gives the commissioner jurisdiction to examine and decide the question of prior public use or sale, and to refuse a patent if he finds there has been such use or sale.]

[Cited in Ellethorp v. Robertson, Case No. 4,409; Wickersham v. Singer, Id. 17,610.]

[2. The withdrawal of an application and receiving back $20 of the patent office fee, pursuant to the act of 1836, § 6, is a final abandonment of the claim, and effects a final extinction of all protection, saving, and privilege under the act of 1836, § 7, and no claim to the same invention can be revived by filing a new application. If such new application is filed it will not relate back to the date of the original application so as to avoid the effect of an intervening public use.]

[This was an appeal by Charles Mowry from a decision of the commissioner of patents, in an interference between appellant and H. B. Barber, a prior patentee, whereby a patent was refused to the appellant.]

Barber, the appellee, held a patent for the invention dated July 8, 1856, No. 15,273.

J. S. Brown, for appellant.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge. The first reason of appeal is "because the commissioner of patents has no cognizance of the matter on which his decision was based." The facts in relation to this point are: In August, 1849, the appellant filed a caveat, and on the 1st of March, 1851, filed his application for a patent for improvements in machine for drawing water from wells, &c. This first application was examined and references were given; upon these the application was withdrawn by a letter from the appellant dated the 12th of April, 1852, in which, among other things, he says: "To the commissioner of patents: I hereby withdraw my application for a patent for improvements in a machine for drawing water from wells, &c., now in your office, and request that twenty dollars may be returned to me, agreeably to the provision of the act of congress authorizing such withdrawal." This was done as requested. That provision is to be found in the sixth section of the act of 1836, in these words: "In every such case, if the applicant shall elect to withdraw his application relinquishing his claim to the model, he shall be entitled to receive back twenty dollars, part of the duty required by this act, on filing a notice in writing of such election in the patent office." This, the commissioner states in his report, was, and now is, by the practice of the patent office, final, &c. The application in this case is dated on the 2d day of March, 1857, and filed on the 10th of April, 1857. This, so far as I understand it, is substantially a renewal of the former claim.

The commissioner states in his report, in reply to the reason of appeal already mentioned, that "the decision of the commissioner is based upon the fact of abandonment. The evidence clearly shows that Mowry had been manufacturing and vending said machine for more than two years prior to his present application. His former application (withdrawn in April, 1852) is only admissible as evidence as to priority of invention, but does not affect the question of abandonment." The duty and authority of the commissioner are declared by the various acts of congress, and it is true that he has none besides. Whether he could take cognizance of the matter objected to him in the first reason, as before stated, depends upon the construction of the seventh section of the act of 1836, in these words: "That on the filing of any such application, description and specification, and the payment of the duty hereinafter provided, the commissioner shall make or cause to be made an examination of the alleged new invention or discovery; and if on such examination it shall not appear to the commissioner that the same had been invented or discovered by any other person in this country prior to the alleged invention or discovery thereof by the applicant, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or in any foreign country, or had been in public use or on sale with the applicant's consent or allowance prior to the application, if the commissioner shall deem it to be sufficiently useful and important it shall be his duty to issue a patent therefor," &c. The first part of this section, though expressed in more general terms, contains an express condition precedent as to the same matter. This provision of the statute, it seems to me, is very explicit in its requirements, and equally so in its intended application to the right in its inchoate state. After the other previous requisites are complied with, and before the granting of a patent, it directs the commissioner to make the examination on the subject, and to decide (of course) on what shall appear to him to be the result, or otherwise it would be idle to require the examination. One part of the subject of his examination is expressly declared to be whether or not the alleged discovery had been "in public use or on sale." This, then, surely gives him cognizance or jurisdiction. If, then, the result of such examination should be that it appeared to him that the alleged invention or discovery had been in public use or on sale contrary to the provision of the statute, ought he, notwithstanding, proceed to grant the patent, that an opportunity might be afforded to the applicant to have the matter submitted to a jury in a court of law? I cannot think so. The same jurisdiction, I think, continues after interference declared and until the patent is delivered, unless otherwise decided on appeal.

In support of the proposition involved in his first reason of appeal, the appellant's counsel bases his argument on the authority of a decision made by Judge Cranch in the case of Heath v. Hildreth [Case No. 6,309], and Pomeroy v. Connison [Id. 11,259], and to the decisions there referred to. It will be seen upon examination of that case that Judge Cranch's allusion is the defense set up of a delay or general abandonment, of which, intention and special circumstances constitute the gist, and the authorities there referred to are of decisions made in cases brought for the infringement of patent rights in a court or courts of law in which, according to their fundamental establishment, the jury forms a constituent part for the trial of issues of fact. Such is not the case of trials before the commissioner. Judge Cranch says: "But the question of forfeiture or abandonment is for the jury upon a trial at law. The first invention is prima facie entitled to a patent, and the commissioner, as before observed, is bound to issue it under the seventh section of the act of 1836, if certain facts should not appear to the commissioner, as therein specified, which specification of facts does not include delay or abandonment; so that the question of delay or abandonment is not by that section submitted to the jurisdiction of the commissioner." It is not my intention to discuss this position of Judge Cranch at this time, or to express any opinion, because I do not think the question now before me requires it. What the commissioner means by the term "abandonment," as the ground of his decision, is the statutory disability in the appellant to assert his right to a patent because of the public use or sale by others, with his knowledge and consent, of said invented machine more than two years before his application for a patent in this case. These terms, as before particularly stated, are among those specified and enumerated in the statute. I think, therefore, that the commissioner had cognizance of the matter.

The second reason is in these words: "Because, even if he had cognizance of the matter, the act of the inventor in the premises was not an abandonment of the invention to the public within the meaning of the law, but, on the contrary, his acts as proved by the testimony in the matter of the interference between his application and Barber's patent show that he still asserted his right to the invention, and intended to secure it by letters-patent, if possible." Third. Because the failure of Mowry's first application having been caused by the act of the commissioner of patents solely, and by no fault on the part of the inventor, and thus the second application having become necessary by the said act of the commissioner of patents, the date of selling the articles by Mowry should be considered in relation to the first and not to the second application. To which the commissioner answers: "Asserting his 'intention to secure a patent if possible,' after he had withdrawn in 1852 and not offering until 1857, and then only upon learning that Barber had obtained a patent for the same thing, and having mean time manufactured and sold said machines for more than ten years prior to applying, appears to invalidate the second reason for appeal. Third. The usual office course was taken. The first application was examined, references were given, and upon these the application was withdrawn pro forma. This was and now is, by the practice of this office, final; and the application thus conditioned can only be (by the custom of this office) available as evidence of date of invention in any future contingency, and can only be again before this office, as such. A subsequent application for the same thing has no necessary connection with the former, except where a case is formally withdrawn to amend, or to represent within a reasonable time for affecting such amendment." These two reasons will be considered together. The question which grows out of them is, what is the effect of withdrawing the first application in this case under the circumstances of receiving back twenty dollars, part of the duty required by the act? Without qualification or any reservation, it seems to be considered in the law as a relinquishment of his (the appellant's) claim to the model. I think it must be considered as finally abandoning the further prosecution of the claim, and effecting an entire extinction of all protection, saving, and privilege under the act of 1839, section 7, and which cannot be revived by any new application for the same invention. If this be correct, then the rule as laid down by the supreme court in the case of Shaw v. Cooper, 7 Pet. 29, applies, which is: "Whatever may be the intention of the inventor, if he suffers his invention to go into public use through any means whatsoever without an immediate assertion of his right, he is not entitled to a patent; nor will a patent obtained under such circumstances protect his right." I agree with the commissioner that the evidence shows that Mowry had been manufacturing and vending said machine for more than two years prior to his present application, and that he is not entitled to a patent.

Case No. 9,893.

MOWRY et al. v. GRAND STREET & N. R. CO.

[10 Blatchf. 89; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 586.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June 25, 1872.

PATENTS — ASSIGNMENT — EXTENDED TERM — BRAKES FOR RAILWAY CARS—INJUNCTION.

1. T., having made an invention, and applied for letters patent for it, on a specification filed in the patent office, assigned to H., in 1852, "all the right, title, and interest whatsoever, which I now have, or, by letters patent, would be entitled to have and possess, in the aforesaid invention, the said invention being described in the specification as prepared and executed by me, or to be prepared and executed by me, for the obtaining of said letters patent, the whole to be held and enjoyed" by H., "to the full extent and manner in which the same would have been, or could me, held and enjoyed by me, had this assignment never been made," and authorized the issue of "the said" patent to H., "as the assignee of my whole right and title to the same, and to the new invention aforesaid." A patent was accordingly granted to H., on the invention, in 1852. In 1854, H. assigned to S. all his interest in any extended term of the patent. In 1866, the patent was extended to T.: Held, that, by the assignment of 1852, no right to the extended term passed to H., and, consequently, S. had no such right.

[Cited in Waterman v. Wallace, Case No. 17,261.]

2. Whether the claim of the letters patent granted, July 6th, 1852, to Henry Tanner, as assignee of Lafayette F. Thompson and Asahel G. Bachelder, for an "improved mode of operating the brakes of railway cars," namely, "to so combine the brakes of the two trucks with the operative windlasses, or their equivalents, at both ends of the car, by means of the vibrating lever, A', or its equivalent, or mechanism essentially as specified, as to enable the brakeman, by operating either of the windlasses, to simultaneously apply the brakes of both trucks, or bring or force them against their respective wheels, and whether he be at the forward or rear end of the car," is limited to a combination of two or more brake systems, as they are ordinarily found in the swivelling car-trucks of an eight-wheeled car, with each other and with the operative windlasses, by means of a vibrating lever, or whether it covers any combination of the brakes of a car with each other, and with the windlasses, by means of a vibrating lever, so that all the brakes can be applied simultaneously from either end of the car, even where the car has no swivelling trucks with separate brake systems, quere.

3. The latter construction of the claim not having been maintained in any judicial decision, or acquiesced in by the public, and its novelty, on such construction, being shown to be doubtful, an application for a provisional injunction against an arrangement which was no infringement except on such construction, was refused.

[Motion for a provisional injunction. Suit brought [by James D. Mowry and others, against the Grand Street & Newton Railroad Company] upon letters patent for "improved mode of operating the brakes of railway cars," granted July 6, 1852, to Henry Tanner, assignee of Lafayette F. Thompson and Asahel G. Bachelder, and extended for seven years from July 6, 1866, to Bachelder, in his own right, and also to him and George O. Way, administrator of L. F. Thompson, deceased.][2]

Samuel D. Cozzens, for plaintiffs.
Tracy, Catlin & Van Cott, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a motion for a preliminary injunction, to restrain the defendants from using upon their horse-cars a certain brake claimed to be an infringement upon what is known as the Tanner patent, which the plaintiffs are said to own. The motion was brought to a hearing before me on a former occasion, upon the plaintiffs' bill and moving papers alone, the defendants at that time interposing no denial of any of the averments in the plaintiff's papers. It is now before me upon additional papers on the part of the plaintiffs, and is now opposed by affidavits on the part of the defence.

One question now first presented in the case relates to the title of the plaintiffs. This question having been fully argued by counsel representing, for that purpose, the interest of Mr. Sayles, whose title is the one opposed to that of the plaintiffs, and having been fully considered, may be now disposed of, so far as my action is concerned.

The facts respecting the title to the patent are as follows: Prior to April, 1852, Lafayette F. Thompson and Asahel G. Bachelder had invented "an improved mode of operating the brakes of railway cars." Specifications presented by them were already before the patent office, which they were about to amend, and on which they were applying for letters patent. Before any patent was issued to them, they executed an assignment to one Henry Tanner, to whom, in pursuance of the statute, and in accordance with a requirement inserted in the assignment, and upon amended specifications made by Bachelder, and dated April 8th, 1852, a patent for the invention was issued, on the 6th of July, 1852. In March, 1866, Tanner assigned to Bachelder and George O. Way, administrator of Lafayatte F. Thompson, deceased, all the right, title, and interest which he then had in and to any extended term of the said letters patent, and, in July, 1866, the patent was extended, and a certificate of extension, dated July 5th, 1866, was issued to Bachelder and Way, from whom the plaintiff derives title. It appears, however, that Tanner, prior to his assignment, of March, 1866, to Bachelder and Way, and on the 13th of July, 1854, had assigned to Thomas Sayles all his right, title, and interest in any extended term of the patent, whence it results, that if, by the first assignment of Bachelder and Thompson to Tanner, in April, 1852, the right to the extended term was conveyed to Tanner, that right passed to Sayles by the assignment of July 13th, 1854, and the plaintiffs have no right thereto.

The question therefore is, whether the legal effect of the assignment of April 1st, 1852, from Bachelder and Thompson to Tanner, was to convey the right to the extended term of the patent in question to Tanner. The words of that assignment are as follows: "Whereas, we, Lafayette F. Thompson, of Charlestown, and Asahel G. Bachelder, now or late of Lowell, in the state of Massachusetts, have invented an improved mode of operating the brakes of railway cars, and have applied, or intend to apply, for letters patent of the United States of America therefor, now, therefore, this indenture witnesseth, that, for and in consideration of one hundred dollars in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, we have assigned and set over, and do hereby assign, sell and set over, to Henry Tanner, of Buffalo, in the state of New York, all the right, title and interest whatsoever, which we now have, or, by letters patent, would be entitled to have and possess, in the aforesaid invention, the said invention being described in the specification as prepared and executed by us, or to be prepared and executed by us, for the obtaining of said letters patent, the whole to be held and enjoyed by the said Henry Tanner, and his legal representatives, to the full extent and manner in which the same would have been, or could be, held and enjoyed by us, had this assignment never been made; and we do, by these presents, authorize the commissioner of patents to issue the said letters patent to the said Henry Tanner, and his legal representatives, as the assignee of our whole right and title to the same, and to the new invention aforesaid."

It is important, in determining the effect of this instrument, to notice, that, whatever else was the subject matter of the contract, it was not a share in the invention, nor a right restricted to any particular locality, and, further, that, at the time of its execution, no letters patent had been issued, but the inventors had an application for letters patent for the first term then pending in the patent office. At this time, therefore, the property of the inventors in this invention, capable of being the subject matter of such a contract, consisted of an inchoate right to a monopoly of their invention for a term of fourteen years, which right would be completed and secured by the letters patent for which they were then applying, and a further inchoate right to apply for and secure a monopoly for an extension of the term. Between these rights a distinction exists, arising from the fact that an extension of a patent is made dependent upon proofs of new and different facts. It is a new grant (Wilson v. Rousseau, 4 How. [45 U. S.] 646, 682), the right to which is capable of being transferred in the same manner as the inchoate right to the monopoly for the first term, by an agreement disclosing such an intention (Railroad Co. v. Trimble, 10 Wall. [77 U. S.] 367). But, being contingent and personal to the inventor, it cannot be held to pass as an incident to the invention and appurtenant thereto. Clum v. Brewer [Case No. 2,909]. In this posture of the law and the facts, the inventors of this improvement sold to Tanner what they described as "all the right, title, and interest whatsoever which we now have, or, by letters patent, would be entitled to have and possess, in the aforesaid invention." In this description, the words, "or, by letters patent, would be entitled to have and possess." as used, are words of limitation, and confine the grant to the right which would have been completed and secured by the letters patent for which the inventors were then applying. Clearly, it was not the intention, by those words, to extend the conveyance to all rights which would be secured by any letters patent whenever issued, and whether extended or not; for, subsequently in the instrument, the letters patent referred to are plainly designated as those for the obtaining of which specifications had been prepared and executed, and which were about to be amended. Extended letters patent are not issued upon specifications in that manner, and no other letters patent than those for the first term could be issued upon the pending application. These words, therefore, appear to me intended to limit the conveyance. They indicate that the subject matter of the contract, which was in the minds of the parties, was the monopoly which letters patent issued upon the pending application would secure, and show that the new grant which might be secured by the inventors upon a future application for an extension, but which could not be given upon any proofs then pending, or likely to be then in contemplation, was not intended to be covered by the contract. This conclusion is entirely consistent with the broad words of the habendum clause. The habendum says, "the whole to be held," &c. The whole of what? Manifestly, the whole of the right described in the granting clause, and no more. Moreover, I find, in this instrument, no words which import an intention to transfer both a present and a future interest; and words which imply that two inchoate rights, different in character, were intended to be assigned, are wanting. One such right is clearly described, and there is no allusion to any other.

Furthermore, it is highly improbable that the right to the extension would have been intended to be conveyed, for the reason, that an assignment of the right to the extension would in effect destroy the right, as extensions of patents are issued to inventors only, and are not granted to assignees. It cannot be supposed, that any part of the consideration expressed in this instrument was paid by the assignees for what would be valueless in their hands; and it is equally unlikely that the inventors would part with such a right without consideration. Such an intention, if entertained, it may be believed would have been expressed in clear and distinct language.

Nor do I see that a different conclusion can be arrived at, if the instrument be a conveyance of the whole invention, without words of limitation, in view of the repeated decisions, that a conveyance of the invention merely does not carry the right to the extension. These decisions the late decision of the supreme court in the case of Nicholson Pavement Co. v. Jenkins, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 452, which has been here relied on as declaring a different law, appears to me to confirm. That decision assumes, that an assignment of the invention, without words importing an intention to convey both a present and a future interest, will not pass the right to an extension. Such words being absent from the instrument under consideration, the intention must be considered as absent. It was easy to have inserted such words, but this was not done; and, in view of the right of the inventors personally, in certain contingencies, to apply for and secure an extension, their absence leads to the conclusion, that the parties did not contract with reference to it.

The question raised as to the title of the plaintiffs to letters patent having been thus found in favor of the plaintiffs, I proceed to consider whether the validity of the patent has been so well established by judicial determination, or so generally asquiesced in, as to entitle them to an injunction before a hearing of the cause; and here is met an issue which has been raised in respect to the invention intended to be secured by the letters patent in question. The claim in the patent is as follows: "What is claimed by us is, to so combine the brakes of the two trucks with the operative windlasses, or their equivalents, at both ends of the car, by means of the vibrating lever, A', or its equivalent, or mechanism essentially as specified, as to enable the brakeman, by operating either of the windlasses, to simultaneously apply the brakes of both trucks, or bring or force them against their respective wheels, and whether he be at the forward or rear end of the car." If this claim limits the invention to a combination of two or more brake systems, as they are ordinarily found in the car trucks of an eight-wheeled car, with each other and with the operative windlasses, by means of a vibrating lever, it is manifest that the defendants do not use the plaintiffs' combination, for they do not use cars running upon trucks whose systems are operated in combination with a vibrating lever and the windlasses. They use the ordinary four-wheeled horse cars, in which there are no trucks with separate brake systems, and, consequently, no free swivelling action by means of trucks or their equivalents.

The plaintiffs contend, that the patent is not thus limited, but that it covers any combination of the brakes of a car with each other and with the windlasses, by means of a vibrating lever, so that all the brakes can be applied simultaneously from either end of the car, and that the ordinary brake of street cars, such as is used by the defendants, is, therefore, within the scope of the patent, and an infringement. To this position the defendants answer, that, so understood, the patent is void for want of novelty, and has never been sustained by any judicial determination or acquiesced in by the public. I do not find it necessary, upon this motion, to determine whether or not the construction of the patent contended for by the plaintiffs can be maintained. It is sufficient, for this motion, to say, that such a construction of it has not as yet been maintained in any of the suits brought upon this patent, to which the plaintiffs refer. All these suits related to eight-wheeled railroad cars, having two truck systems combined and attached to the windlasses through a vibrating lever. No suit hitherto decided has involved the question which is here presented. The evidence given in those suits related to eight-wheeled truck cars, and the decisions rendered therein cannot be claimed to be judicial determinations in favor of the plaintiffs' patent as here sought to be construed. They appear to be entirely consistent with a construction of the patent in accordance with the views of the defendants, and in accordance with a conclusion that the defendants do not infringe the patent. The issue in this case, as to the validity of the patent, is, therefore, new; and, not only is the novelty of the invention, as now claimed, denied, but a fair doubt in respect to its novelty is raised by affidavits introduced to show a prior use, in the construction of a car, of a combination claimed to be substantially similar to the combination of the plaintiffs, as they now seek to have it construed. It is, also, made clear, that, while the patent, as understood by the defendants, and as limited to truck cars, has been acquiesced in by the public, there has been no public acquiescence in the claim now put forth, but the validity of the patent, so construed, has been constantly denied. I must, therefore, in accordance with well-settled rules, and without intimating an opinion as to the proper construction of the patent, refuse an injunction, until after final hearing, upon the ground, that there has been no judicial inquiry into the novelty of the invention now claimed by the plaintiffs, and no public recognition of the validity of the patent, as securing such an invention, but, on the contrary, its validity is in doubt.

Case No. 9,894.

The MOXEY.

[1 Abb. Adm. 73.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1847.

COLLISION — INJURY BY RUBBING AGAINST — BY WHOM CAUSED—MUTUAL CONTRIBUTION.

1. An injury received by a vessel at her moorings, in consequence of being violently rubbed or pressed against by a second vessel lying alongside of her, in consequence of a collision against such second vessel by a third one under way, may be compensated for under the general head of collision, as well as an injury which is the direct result of a blow properly so called.

[Cited in The Nora Costello, 46 Fed. 871.]

2. But to entitle the injured vessel to recover against her stationary neighbor, under such circumstances, instead of against her who was the original cause of the accident, such stationary vessel must be proved to have been in fault.

3. The rule of mutual contribution is not applied to cases of accidental collision from physical causes for which neither vessel is to blame; but each vessel in such case must bear her own loss.

This was a libel in rem, by Abner and John H. Davis, owners of the barge New London, against the brig Moxey and the schooner Avenger, to recover damages for a collision between those vessels and the New London. The libel stated, that on November 19, 1846, the barge New London, owned by libellants, was lying in one of the slips in the port of New York, engaged in delivering her cargo, and that she was well secured to the wharf, well manned, &c. That on the same day, the schooner Avenger lay at the end of the pier to which the New London was secured; and the brig Moxey lay within the slip, alongside of the New London, and quartering on her bow, and was fastened to the pier by one line from the bow, another line from the stern, which latter line passed across the New London, and by a third line fastened to the New London. That during the night a storm arose, and the Avenger, being carelessly and negligently fastened to the pier, broke loose from her moorings and floated around into the slip and alongside of the Moxey. That the Moxey, being negligently and carelessly fastened to the wharf, and, in particular, not having a line carried to the pier on the opposite side of the slip, as in such weather she ought to have had, was, by the collision of the Avenger, driven against the New London, whereby, and by being thrown up and down between the brig and the wharf, by the surging of the water, she received much damage. The answer denied all the charges of carelessness or negligence; and averred that the Moxey was well manned and well and properly secured; and that she had taken the position occupied by her at the request of those in charge of the New London, to accommodate them in delivering her cargo; and that every means was taken at the time of the collision by those in charge of her, to avoid injuring the New London. The answer also charged, that the New London was old and decayed, and that any injury which she suffered was ascribable, not to any neglect or want of care or skill on the part of the master and crew of the Moxey, but to her own decayed and unsound condition. The libel was originally filed against both the Moxey and the Avenger; but upon exceptions taken to the libel, it was held by the court, that inasmuch as it was not charged in the libel that the collision complained of was the joint act of the two vessels, or that it was made by them at the same time, or that they were under charge of the same crew or persons, or that the injury inflicted was upon the same part of the vessel of libellants, the libellants were not entitled to proceed against the two vessels conjointly in one action, but must elect to sue either the Moxey or the Avenger. In pursuance of this decision, the suit was discontinued as against the Avenger, and the libellants proceeded against the Moxey alone. The cause now came before the court upon the proofs taken against her. So far as the decision of the case turned upon matters of fact, the opinion of the court shows how far the respective allegations of the parties were regarded as sustained by the proofs.

S. P. Nash, for libellants.

I. By the general principles of maritime law, the vessel having the greatest facilities of movement is regarded as guilty of negligence if she does not employ those facilities for the protection of other vessels. Story, Bailm. §§ 611, 611b; Abb. Shipp. 234. Here the Moxey lay outside and was moved by sails. The barge was a tow-vessel, having no self-moving power; and she moreover lay inside, where she could not be moved out of danger. She was also the weakest vessel. Under such circumstances, the burden of proof is thrown upon the Moxey, to free herself from the presumption of negligence; and it does not devolve upon the New London to prove her guilty of it.

II. The fact that the New London was unsound could have no bearing on her right to an indemnity; it could only affect the amount of damages. A vessel has a right to be protected in her lawful position, whether she is sound or unsound.

Edwin Burr, for claimants.

I. This is not a case of collision. That term always implies a movement of one vessel through the water, and a striking against another, causing injury to her. 2 Condy's Marsh. Ins. 431. The barge, in this case, was moved up and down by the surging of the water, and was thus injured. The damage in no way resulted from any fault or negligence in navigating the Moxey.

II. Primâ facie, the injury is from the act of God, and the libellant must show a strong case of fault in the claimants, to rid himself of this conclusion and render the brig liable.

III. In ordinary cases of collision, the libellant must be held to strict proof that the injury was caused by a breach of some nautical rule or usage on the part of the crew of the brig, or some want of ordinary nautical skill, without such breach or neglect on the part of the libellants. Story, Bailm. § 611. In all cases of collision, the libellant must prove that the injuries complained of resulted from the fault of the defendant, there being no want of ordinary care on his own part. Abb. Shipp. 238.

IV. It is the Avenger which is chargeable with responsibility for the collision.

BETTS, District Judge. This clearly is not a case of collision within the nautical acceptation of that term, which imports the impinging of vessels together, whilst in the act of being navigated. Common usage, however, applies the term equally to cases where a vessel is run foul of when entirely stationary, or is brought in contact with another by swinging at her anchor. Jac. Sea Laws, 326, note; 1 Condy's Marsh. Ins. c. 12, § 2; Abb. Shipp. 238.

A loss under the circumstances of the present case is, moreover, a loss from the peril of the sea, (1 Phil. Ins. 249,) and it falls also within the class of losses adjusted, under many maritime codes, by mutual contribution of the vessels injuring and receiving injury. Thus Weskett says: "When two or more ships are lying at anchor, and another, in what manner soever it may happen, is in danger of coming too near, the master who lies foremost shall, if he can, make way, and be obliged, at the other's call, to weight anchor and remove; in failure whereof, he shall be answerable for whatever damages may ensue, especially if happening in a harbor where the water may ebb away and the ship be aground;—in case he who in this manner endeavors at the other's call to make way, shall receive any damage in ship or goods, he shall be indemnified by the other according to arbitration; but if in making way he shall happen to do any damage to the other ship or goods, he shall not be answerable for it." Wesk. Ins. tit. "Running Foul."

I do not think that the term "collision," as used in the maritime law, is to be construed with the absolute strictness contended for by the claimant's counsel. An injury received by a vessel from being violently rubbed by another, or pressed by her with force against a pier or wharf, as in this case, may, I am inclined to think, be recovered for in admiralty under the general charge of collision, as well as where the injury is derived directly from the headway of a vessel under navigation, or drifted against her.

But conceding that this description of injury, whether technically a case of collision or not, is still one for which the libellants could sustain an action in rem, I do not think the particulars essential to the support of such action have been established by the proofs.

The brig was placed alongside the barge at the request of those who had her in charge, and in such a way as to accommodate them in unlading cargo from their own barge into her. She was adequately secured in the mode usual in this harbor, and was manned and managed in her berth conformably to the usage of the port. The injury inflicted occurred during a violent gale of wind arising suddenly in the night. Whether that injury was occasioned by the swell of the waves rubbing the two vessels together as they were lifted up and down, or whether the causa causans was the drifting of another vessel, which had broken loose in the gale, against the brig, neither circumstance affords ground for imposing the loss upon the brig. No fault is proved against her in taking the place she occupied, or in any thing done on board of her conducing to the injury of the barge.

It is asserted that there was blameable negligence on the part of the brig, in not placing fenders between herself and the barge, and also in omitting to carry a line across the slip to the opposite pier, so as to ease off the pressure against the barge.

As to the first particular, it is to be remarked, that the duty of using fenders between the two vessels was mutual and reciprocal, the brig being by law equally entitled with the barge to the berth she occupied, and not bound to do more than the other vessel for their common protection. But there is proof that the brig had a competent supply of fenders, and used them on each side of her till they were broken up by the jamming of the two vessels in the severity of the storm. Indeed, the evidence renders it quite probable, that the efforts to protect the barge in this way led to her injury, as it would seem she was principally damaged at the points where fenders had been placed against her.

In regard to the second point, wherein it is asserted that the brig was culpably negligent in omitting to carry a line to the opposite pier, the city ordinances prohibit running lines in this manner across the opening of slips (Ordinance N. Y. City, 1839); but if it had been lawful to use one in the emergency of the case, it was as much the duty of the libellants as of the claimants to take that precaution. This was not a common culpable act, conducing to the collision, but a mutual omission to do an act on shore which might have prevented or lessened the injury, and neither party can make the other responsible to him for such an omission.

Two circumstances are to be regarded:—

1. The brig was entitled by the law of the port, to the berth she occupied; she had entered it without injuring the barge, and was secured there by the usual and competent fastenings. When, therefore, the peril of this storm came upon them, the barge had no right to require the brig to leave the slip, or to change her position, unless it be clearly shown that the change could have been made at the time and under the circumstances, without hazard to her.

2. The Avenger, another vessel, was driven from her fastening and into this slip against the brig by the gale; and as the wind crowded her directly upon the brig, and thereby increased the pressure of that vessel against the barge, the damage incurred by the latter would be attributable to the Avenger, her action being the direct cause of the injury. In legal contemplation, she was in fault in taking a berth in an insecure place, or in not using fastenings sufficient to hold her there, and adequate to protect her from being driven off by the storm.

The brig has no connection with that fault; and in so far as she participated in the injury inflicted upon the barge, the collision was by vis major, without negligence or blame on her side, and the loss must be borne where it falls. 3 Kent, Comm. 231.

Although the rule of mutual contribution may be adopted by our courts in cases of loss by collision at sea or in port, occurring by accident or through the mutual fault of both vessels, there would be no reason for applying it where there was no common fault, and where the management of the two vessels in taking their positions in relation to each other was by mutual agreement. On the contrary, where damage is incurred without fault on the part of either vessel, and by some irresistible force constituting a case of vis major or inevitable accident, the loss must be borne by the party upon whom it happens to fall, the other not being responsible to him in any degree. By the maritime law of both England and the United States, where a collision happens by inevitable accident and without fault of either vessel, each must bear the damage received by her, whatever it may be, and has no claim upon the other for contribution.[2] The Woodrop Sims, 2 Dod. 85; The Catherine of Dover, 2 Hagg. Adm. 154; The Shannon and The Placidia, 7 Jur. 380; The Ebenezer, Id. 1118, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 206; Reeves v. The Constitution [Case No. 11,659]; The Eliza and Abby [Id. 4,349]; Abb. Shipp. 238; Story, Bailm. § 608, and note 2; 3 Kent, Comm. 231.

In my opinion the action cannot be sustained, and the libel must be dismissed with costs to be taxed.

[2] This rule has since been laid down by the supreme court of the United States, in Stainback v. Rae, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 532. The same principle appears to be recognized in Scotland. Innes v. Glass, 4 Murray, 167. By the law of other maritime states, however, the aggregate damage to both vessels incurred through a collision for which neither was to blame, is apportioned equally between them.

MOXON et al. v. The FANNY.

[2 Pet. Adm. 309.] [1]

District Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1793.

PRIZE — VESSEL TAKEN IN NEUTRAL WATERS — VIOLATION OF NEUTRALITY LAWS—RESTORATION.

1. The brigantine Fanny was captured within five miles of Cape Henry, and brought into the port of Philadelphia. The owners of the Fanny claimed her, and prayed that she might be restored to them, she having been taken within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, but the court dismissed the libel for want of jurisdiction.

See Findlay v. The William [Case No. 4,790].

[2. Cited in The Gilbert Knapp, 37 Fed. 211, to the point that the admiralty has cognizance of matters on land if they are incidents to those at sea.]

[This was a libel by John Moxon and others against the brigantine Fanny (Michael Pile, master).]

The libel states: That the libellants were the true owners of the brig Fanny, now in the port of Philadelphia. That on the night of the seventh of May last, the said brig, being on her voyage from the island of Jamaica to Baltimore and near Cape Henry, was hailed in the English language, from a small schooner, who enquired if they wanted a pilot; that they answered in the negative, and not suspecting they were near an enemy, continued their course all night, and at daybreak next morning, found themselves within five miles of Cape Henry, when and where they were boarded and made prize of by sundry armed men, belonging to the armed schooner Sans Culottes, commanded by J. B. P. A. Ferey, and the officers and the crew of the said brig made prisoners. That the cargo enumerated in the libel was the property of the persons respectively therein named, being the libellants. That they do not admit that the said schooner was duly commissioned to capture British vessels or property. That the said brig at the time of her capture was on neutral ground, within the territorial jurisdiction and under the protection of the United States, who are now at peace with the king and people of Great Britain: and the said J. Ferey had no authority or permission from the United States to capture British vessels or property within that distance from the sea coast, to which by the laws of nations and those of the United States the right and jurisdiction of the United States extend. They, therefore, pray restitution of vessel and cargo, and damages for detention.

To this libel J. B. P. A. Ferey put in a plea to the jurisdiction of the court; and in his plea sets forth: That he was at the time of the capture of the brig Fanny duly commissioned by the French republic, as captain on board the armed schooner Sans Culottes, belonging to citizens of the said republic, to attack all the enemies of the said republic wherever he might find them, &c., which commission he is now ready to shew, &c. That so being commissioned he took as prize, the said brig, &c., belonging to British subjects, at open war with the French republic, and brought her as prizé into the port of Philadelphia, &c. That by the laws of nations, and the treaty of amity and commerce with France, it doth not pertain to this court to hold plea, &c. He, therefore, prays to be hence dismissed, and the brig and cargo discharged from arrest, &c. A copy of the commission, as stated in the plea, was shewn and by consent, was admitted.

The libellants reply, that the libel ought not to be dismissed, because: (1) That the brig Fanny and cargo were unlawfully seized and taken within the territorial limits of the United States, by the said J. B. P. A. Ferey, and divers citizens of the United States, the said United States then and now being at peace with the king and people of Great Britain. (2) That the said schooner Sans Culottes was unlawfully armed, manned, victualled and fitted out within the United States, with the citizens thereof on board her, to cruize within the domain and territorial jurisdiction thereof, against the king and people of Great Britain, and against the citizens and subjects of Holland, with whom the United States were then and now are at peace. (3) They deny that the said J. B. P. A. Ferey was duly commissioned; or that the schooner Sans Culottes belonged to the citizens of France, at the time of the pretended commission; or that the French republic then had any authority to grant a commission for her to cruize, as an armed vessel, against the friends of the United States. They, therefore pray sentence according to the prayer of the libel.

The defendant rejoins by protestation, &c. and relies on his plea as before stated. The several matters mentioned in the replication in addition to those in the libel were abandoned, or were not insisted on by the advocates for the libellants, and the cause put on the ground of the libel. The arguments were much the same with those in the former cause of Findlay v. The William [Case No. 4,790], with the addition of some new matter; and, therefore, I consider this in the nature of a re-hearing of the point determined in that cause.

The arguments, either explanatory or additional, seem to be: (1) That by the more ancient authorities (Lex Merc. 206, 207, 227; Inst. Adm. 7, 219; Molloy, 41, bk. 1, c. 2, § 21), it appears that, if at that day, the prize was carried into neutral territory, the admiralty might restore, and the owners were not divested of the property, if it were not carried infra praesidia of the captors, and condemned in a court of admiralty. It is allowed that the custom of selling prizes in neutral ports, has altered this law; but the authorities shew that, before the custom of selling, the courts had jurisdiction, and if the property were not changed, before this practice of selling took place, it is not changed here, because taken in neutral territory, and the capture unlawful; and, therefore, the courts here have the jurisdiction the admiralty possessed before this custom of selling prevailed. (2) That the act of taking being illegal, it can give no right. Every sovereign is owner of the soil of his country, and the jurisdiction over a certain extent of sea-coast, and this jurisdiction should be acknowledged by the whole world. And though it is not well settled how far territorial limits extend on sea-coasts, the most approved writers agree the distance to be three leagues. That within these limits there is no war; and, therefore, there can be no prizes lawfully made. That the laws of nations forbid fitting out privateers in a neutral country, or capturing within its limits, friends of the neutral. These acts are penal and liable to punishment. If the property is not restored and compensation made, it is a cause of war, as it also is if neutral territory is invaded by the nations respectively affected by either of these circumstances. And, if we shall be under the necessity of paying for the property taken in our territory, the captors will, in part, carry on their war at our expense. It is acknowledged, that we have no concern with captures lawfully made; but this is no lawful capture, and we have a right to exercise our jurisdiction in this case. The proper means to do this is through our courts of justice, who have cognizance of all invasions of our jurisdiction and territorial rights. (3) That we do not here investigate the question of prize, but pursue a remedy for a marine trespass, a subject evidently within the jurisdiction of our admiralty courts. (4) That, however it may be with the sovereignties of other nations, ours is divided into executive, legislative, and judiciary; and by the constitution, the judiciary have cognizance of all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. It, therefore, rests with them to give a remedy in all such cases, and this court is particularly by law vested with authority where an alien sues for a tort only in violation of the laws of nations, &c.—and this is a case falling under that description. (5) Much argument and discussion were used on the subject of Palachi's Case [1 Rolle, 175]. It was said that this case was originally a prosecution for piracy under a British statute; and therefore the reasoning and determination of the judges do not apply to it. But by the same case, as reported in Bulstrode [3 Bulst. 28], it appears that a prohibition was refused to the admiralty who took cognizance civilly and adjudged restitution. That the cases on which the report in the Exposition de Motifs, &c. was made were different from the present case; and, therefore the positions of those who made that report being founded on the cases under their consideration, do not, in any respect, apply to the case in question. It was, however, agreed that whatever be the proper decision as to legality of prize, or limits of territory, the question always recurs,—What department of government is vested with the power of enquiring into it, and giving the remedy? To these were added many arguments of inconvenience and policy. The prize here may be sold without inquiry, if this court will not make it; but in France their courts would examine into circumstances and prevent injustice. If the capture is wrongfully made, the captor will not carry it to France; and even there, in the case of the most valuable ship, there is nothing to which the injured party can resort but the privateer bond; therefore, if carried to France, restoration would be made if the capture is illegal. But here if the court will not take cognizance, it must be sold, and there is an end of redress. By bringing property into our ports captors submit to our jurisdiction. That the silence of the books is owing to admiralty cases not being published, and cases of plunder brought into neutral ports are uncommon.

On the part of the captors the arguments made use of in the case of Findlay v. The William [supra], were repeated, and much was said in answer to the reasoning of, and authorities produced by, the advocates for the libellants.

The doctrines laid down in the exposition, &c. were relied on as to the law of nations, and the treaty was called the sheet-anchor on which the captors depended. It was contended that the treaty forbids the courts from interfering, but the right of diplomatic interference was not denied; nor were the arguments on this side extended further than as the subject related to captures by one enemy from another. An objection was taken to the parties libellants, who, it was said, had no power to sue and recover on the point of violation of territory, which did not give rights to parties at war, but merely affected the neutral nation. It was acknowledged that a capture in a neutral territory was an offense to the neutral, and that the neutral government might order restitution. But this is a matter of state policy, not of judicial proceeding. If the United States were a party, it might alter the case; but here are only belligerent parties. That as to the Case of Palachi, in 3 Bulst. 28, it must be misreported, or some circumstances existed, not now appearing, as it differs in the general positions from those laid down by my Lord Coke in his Institutes, where civil as well as criminal proceedings are mentioned. That the authorities out of Sir Leoline Jenkins are all founded on references from the king to him, and he does not give judgment, but refers the remedies to royal authority.

The doctrine of infra praesidia was denied, and it was asserted that the property was vested by capture as to the enemy; that though it may be trespass as to the neutral, the taking vests the right in the captor, and the trespass done to the neutral is a subject for him to enquire into and obtain redress, but not for the party at war. And it appears by the British instructions to their privateers, that they are of opinion that a prize may be taken on neutral ground if the government of the neutral permits it. That if there are no adjudged cases in favour of the captors, there are none on the other side, and both are on an equal footing in this respect.

One of the advocates entered largely into the point of territorial limits, and shewed the uncertainty in which it was involved. It was said that these limits must be settled by treaty; and by treaty, if it were deemed right, a power in the neutral courts to judge of prizes taken in neutral bounds ought to have been vested, for it cannot be assumed without the consent of the sovereign of the party making the capture. The inequality of remedy was also insisted on; there can be no reciprocity, where the one party may be obliged to restore, but cannot have condemnation of the capture.

I have re-considered the arguments adduced on a former occasion as well as those brought forward in this case. I shall say nothing on the new ground taken in the replication, because it is not insisted on by the replicants. This being a public point, I have been desirous of hearing all that could be said upon it; If I am still of the same opinion I delivered in the former case, it is not because I indulge the petty and inflexible pride of consistency, but because I am not convinced that my former decree was erroneous. It is not with pleasure, that I continue to differ with the advocates for the libellants in this or the former cause: I have a sincere deference for their opinions in general, but my duty will always prompt me to follow the impressions the subject produces in my own mind. If these are erroneous they must be set right by an appeal to a superior tribunal, in whose decision I shall very cheerfully acquiesce. I shall be obliged to be more diffuse than, in common cases I wish to be, as the subject has been ably and extensively discussed by the advocates on both sides of the question, and it is a point of public consequence. I will avoid, however, as much as possible, going into minute investigation, and confine myself, chiefly, to general principles.

The doctrine, advanced on the part of the libellants, that it is necessary for the complete transfer of property to the captors, that the prize should be carried into their territories and there condemned, seems to present itself as the first object of investigation. It appears to me that much of the argument, founded on the authority of the old cases is built on this doctrine. I am not satisfied that this opinion was at any time well founded. If the old cases produced shew that prizes brought in solo amici, were considered as subjects of cognizance in neutral courts, because the capture was not complete, not being carried infra praesidia of the captors, I cannot be convinced that they should have the weight contended for, if they were not more explicit and certain than they appear to be. Lex Merc. 206, 7, 227. And I think that on a careful inspection of most of these cases it will be seen that the civilians (Molloy, 41; Inst. Adm. 219) then founded their opinions as to admiralty jurisdiction, in captures brought in solo amici, upon this principle. If this were the case, these authorities ought not to govern us; cessante ratione, cessat lex. To adduce them to shew that courts now have the authority exercised when the doctrine of infra praesidia prevailed, in cases of illegal captures, does not strike me forcibly; because, if the authority was then assumed on fallacious principles, it amounts to nothing more than to found one error upon another.

The general positions (Grotius, de Jure B. lib. 3, c. 6, § 3, note 3), that the property taken is not changed until brought into the ports of the captors, appears, even by the old authorities, merely to relate to the rights of postlimine and salvage, on re-capture. The instance of captures at sea, given by Grotius, recognizes the true reason on which ancient writers found their opinions, viz. that "the capture is then complete when all hope of recovery is lost." It is lost if carried within a fleet of the sovereign of the captor, or, "by the modern law of nations, it is sufficient if these kinds of things have been during twenty-four hours in the power of him who took them from his enemy." Freem. 40. Goods taken from an enemy on land and recaptured, shall be the property of the recaptor, unless re-taken the same day and claim put in before sunset. Bynker de R. B. lib. 4. Goods or ships must be brought into port and continue infra praesidia a night, "so that all hope of recovery be lost."

It is then, only required that "all hope of recovery be lost," to establish the principle; and the going into the territory, &c. are only mentioned as instances and not requisites; so that it does not appear by these authorities, some of which are cotemporary with Palachi's case, that it was essential to a complete capture, that it should be carried into the captor's territory. Burlamaqui, 233, 234. Burlamaqui has cleared up this point in his Principles of Politic Law (chapter 7, §§ 16, 17): "The prizes taken from an enemy become the property of the captor as soon as they are taken. The truth is, this distinction" (carrying or not infra praesidia) "has been invented only to establish the rules of the right of postlimine or the manner in which the subjects of the state, from whence something has been taken in war, re-enter upon their rights, rather than to determine the time of the acquisition of things taken by one enemy from another."

In the case of Goss v. Withers, in 2 Burrows, 683 (Just. Inst. bk. 2, tit. 1, § 17), this doctrine is discussed. It is there shewn, that the enemy acquire a property by the mere occupation, where all hope of recovery is lost. A case mentioned in page 694 of that book, was on a former occasion relied on, as bearing on the case in question.

Restitution to the British owner was decreed against a vendee or re-captor, in the time of Charles the Second, of a ship having been fourteen weeks in the possession of the enemy, and re-taken by a British privateer. Another is there cited from Lucas, p. 79, upon the same principles, against a vendee, after a long possession, two sales and several voyages. Yet Woodeson (volume 2, p. 441) expressly says, that "by alienation of a capture to subjects of a neutral power, the property is become irretrievable as to the original proprietors," and vide post, 443. But Lord Mansfield justly observes, that most of the rules on this subject are arbitrary, and not the object of reason alone. They are contrivances of nations in favour of their own subjects and to prevent too easy transfers to neutrals. Every nation (Burlamaqui, 224), for the benefit of its own citizens, makes what rules it pleases as to the recovery by the owner of the property re-taken. But what has a neutral court to do with such arrangements? They relate to the adjustment of salvage between subjects of the same nation, but have no operation between one enemy and another. For with respect to them, "the ship is lost by the capture though she be never condemned at all, nor carried into any port or fleet of the enemy." Goss v. Withers, 2 Burrows, 683. If then the ship is lost to the enemy, from whom it is captured (the mere capture being held sufficient to ground a claim of insurance) what new title can he acquire by coming into the port of neutral and becoming party to a suit for recovery of his former property? The court were of opinion, in the case first mentioned, that the question "whether by the capture the property was or was not transferred to the enemy," could only happen in two cases. 1st. Between the owner and a neutral purchaser. 2d. Between the owner and the recaptor. If a third case had existed, my Lord Mansfield was too accurate not to have added it, to wit—between the owner and his enemy in a neutral court. But he had given a contrary opinion, and knew no such case ought to occur. Vide Bynkers. de R. B. bk. 1, c. 15, p. 191.

It therefore seems to me that cases, grounded on the doctrine of infra praesidia, and condemnation in a court of admiralty of the captors, are not sufficient guides in this question. All that is said about this doctrine is not to be understood as relating to the parties at war; for, as to them, the capture is complete when made. But in support of the rights of postlimine, in cases of re-capture, this necessity of bringing into port, condemnation, &c. is asserted to settle the matter between the former owner and the recaptor. So that the salvage paid is different at the will of nations who make regulations obligatory on their own subjects, according to the time the prize had been in the enemy's possession. These are different in different nations. Vide 2 Wood. 441–443. A neutral subject has nothing to do with them, except he becomes a purchaser; he must then examine into them merely to see what situation he will be in as to his purchase, if it falls into the hands of the nation to whom the former owner is a subject. But how this right of postlimine would operate in such case is not the subject of enquiry in a neutral court. It has no relation to a dispute between enemy and enemy, and never can operate so as to warrant their carrying on against each other, in a neutral country, a war of suits. But whether a sale be or be not good, is not the present question: it is a capture by one enemy from another, which gives, at least, prima facie, the right. It is not material now, whether, as some contend, the person making a capture has only a possessory or an absolute right. 2 Burrows, 689. Be this how it may, as to the captor, the former owner is by the capture totally divested of his property; the captor takes it as a subject of a belligerent nation, and in the first instance for his nation. 2 Wood. 446, 447. The intervention of a court of admiralty of the captor is made necessary, not to give validity to the capture but to inquire into the circumstances, and give the captor his reward by transferring to him the right of the nation, and the court will not vest it in him if the capture is improperly made. This view of the matter shews in a stronger light, that the whole is a national concern. Neutral courts or private individuals, are not clothed with authority to vindicate or carry on national contests; but these disputes must be settled by sovereignties alone. The capture being originally for the nation at war, is national property, and as such, the neutral, anticipating the justice of the belligerent sovereign, whose subject has done the wrong, and at the same time vindicating the rights of its own sovereignty and neutrality, may seize and restore the prize when the neutral territory is invaded in making the capture, if the property is within its power: if not, he may demand restitution and satisfaction from the sovereign of the captors. If this demand is refused, he may obtain what he requires, by reprisals or war—modes of redress far beyond the reach of judiciary tribunals.

The reasoning founded on the supposed illegality of the prize is a petitio principii. For the question is how that is to be ascertained? The discussion about neutral territory is another question, which lies between the sovereign of the captor and that of the neutral nation. Grotius, de Jure B. lib. 3, c. 6, § 24. The rights of neutrality were not established for the benefit of belligerent parties. They only affect the neutral; and invasion of these rights is an offence to him and not to the party at war. When Cheline who had a commission from the French, then at war with the Dutch, took a ship of the latter near the port of Dublin, the capture was not held piratical, or as to the Dutch unlawful. But it was criminal and unlawful as to the English sovereign, who was a neutral, and the ship was lying under his protection. 2 Wood. 442; Sir L. Jenkins, 754. The party whose property is taken in a neutral country calls on the neutral sovereign to assert these rights, for the protection of those within the territory. If this cannot be done by negociation, it resorts to force, the only law among sovereigns where they differ upon public points. There seems, therefore, no small weight in the objection made to the party libellant. It does not seem proper that a suit, founded on the ground of invasion of neutral territory, should be maintained by a belligerent party. It is even allowed that it would be most conformable to the true point of the case if the suit was in the name of the United States. What effect this would have I do not determine.

As to the Case of Palachi, reported by Bulstrode (3 Bulst. 28), I leave it to be judged of from an inspection of it, and the principles I have before mentioned as prevailing among the civilians in England at that day. My Lord Coke's statement of it in his 4th Institute does not confine it to criminal proceedings under British statutes (4 Inst. 154). He says that if the Spaniards sue for the property taken civiliter in the admiralty, a prohibition should be granted. And yet in Bulstrode it appears that the prohibition was refused. The civilians and common lawyers of that day, held some opinions not accounted sound at this time. My Lord Coke might have thought that the British laws and statutes alone should be attended to; and that the admiralty had no jurisdiction because the goods were on land, intra corpus comitatus; and the civilians thought otherwise, because the capture was not carried into the enemy's territory. But both these opinions are now exploded: for the admiralty has cognizance of matters on land if they are incidents to those at sea; and the doctrine of the civilians, as before supposed, is confessed not to be the law of this day. Modern improvements in jurisprudence have abolished many ancient opinions, and we must act upon the law as it now is. This case of Palachi has been insisted on by both sides, as favourable to their opposite opinions. This, it must be allowed, does not shew its precision and certainty. It is to be presumed (because it is mentioned by Lord Coke in delivering the opinion of the court, or stating the case as Bulstrode has reported it) that Palachi, or Pelagus, being a Jew, and having drowned some Spanish prisoners, had some influence on this case. The Spanish ambassador was a formidable antagonist to the ambassador from Morocco. Gondemar governed King James, and royal influence was not unknown in the courts of justice. Political motives had their weight, and it was not as well settled then as it now is, that the Moors were to be treated on a footing with other nations. See 2 Wood. 425.

I do not think the worse of cases in general for their antiquity. But I do not follow them unless I am satisfied with the principles on which they stand. All the cases produced by the libellants, that I recollect, are a century old, and in this period it is singular that none can be produced expressly to their point. Those in Sir Leoline Jenkins do not shew any restitution by sentence of the court of admiralty. There appear to have been many proceedings in that court. One of them in Ireland evidently wrong; and another in which a prize was dismissed for trial in the proper jurisdiction, (Life of Sir L. Jenkins, 733, 727),—probably the court of the captor. But, by breaking bulk, she came under the notice of the court again, possibly for a breach of fiscal arrangements. In general, all that is to be found in Sir Leoline Jenkins, shews references from the king to him, and reports to the crown in consequence, to aid diplomatic enquiries. This seems to favour, rather than oppose, the opinions of the advocates for the captors in this case. There are a great variety of sentiments and opinions in these extra judicial reports of Sir L. Jenkins, of which I highly approve. Life of Sir L. Jenkins on this subject, passim. But I am not convinced that this court is the proper place to carry them into effect. If the court over which Sir Leoline presided could, in his opinion, have effected the objects of his correspondence with the king, we should have seen decrees and not letters on the subject from him to the crown. His opinion in page 751, is against the doctrine of carrying prizes infra praesidia.

As to the opinions in the "Exposition de Motifs," it is easy to say, as it is said by one of the advocates for the libellants, that they do not apply. It is as little difficult to say that they do. The cases on which the dispute originated, it is very true, are different from this. They were those of captures on the high seas, and the neutral ships brought into the ports of the captors, having the property of enemies on board. The commissioners appointed by the king of Prussia, composed a kind of court of review. But the principles laid down will apply to captures by one enemy from another. This may be seen by a reference to the books in which the exposition is to be found.

I do not extend these opinions farther, than to captures by one enemy from another. The treaty with France (Treaty of Alliance with France, § 17) insisted on by the captors, extends no farther than to such captures. This treaty has its due weight with me; but only in cases evidently comprehended in it. And it appears to me that this case is one of them, so far as judiciary, but not diplomatic examinations are concerned.

The idea that part of the sovereignty of this country is given to the judiciary for the purposes here required, is to me new. It should be well weighed before it is agreed to. I have not the same opinion in this point. I consider the judiciary as the expositors of the laws, and not partakers of the sovereignty for the objects of this suit. Their power is confined to matters of internal police; externally they have no power: they have none of the powers of peace or war. They have no right to command the forces of the country; and these are the means after negociation fails, by which sovereigns decide their disputes. The courts of England, though they decide freely on all matters of internal police, will not meddle with these rights of the sovereign. 2 Burrows, 765, 766. They will not even grant a habeas corpus in the case of a prisoner of war, because the decision on this question is in another place, being part of the rights of sovereignty. Although our judiciary is somewhat differently arranged, I see not, in this respect, that they should not be equally cautious.

The position, that in a neutral territory there is no war, and therefore there can be no legal captures is a good argument if used in the proper place. The reason is, that "he who acts against his enemy in the territory of a friend, acts also against the state who governs there." Lee, 122, 123. It is an offence to the neutral state. But still the question recurs—which is the proper department of the neutral state to inquire into and vindicate this offence? The weight of this argument, though it bears upon the point of outrage to the neutral, does not relieve us from the difficulties attending it. If this court would assume jurisdiction, and could ascertain our territorial limits and restore the property, the outrage would still remain for the nation to vindicate, if it should think proper. Therefore the court could afford but a partial remedy: and it is best to be settled where the whole can be accomplished.

The allegation that the libellants are not calling forth the powers of a prize court, but are seeking redress for a marine trespass, does not comport with the terms of the libel. But it is impossible to enquire into the question of trespass, without involving that of prize or no prize, and so "the original cause must all come over again." Doug. 612. The procedure here is in rem, and the object a specific restitution.

Damages may be superadded, but a proceeding for a marine trespass is different, as it is entirely a suit for damages, and not for the thing itself. Neither does this suit for a specific return of the property, appear to be included in the words of the judiciary act of the United States, giving cognizance to this court of "all causes where an alien sues for a tort only, in violation of the laws of nations, or a treaty of the United States." Judiciary Act, § 9 [1 Stat. 76]. It cannot be called a suit for a tort only, when the property, as well as damages for the supposed trespass, are sought for.

A variety of observations were made by the advocates for the libellants, on the general principles of government, the rights of sovereignty and neutrality, and the consequences flowing from an invasion of those rights, just in themselves, but not, in my opinion, necessary for me to determine upon. They will fall very properly under the notice of our government, when the subject is before them. I should very willingly relieve them from part of the burthens thrown upon them by the unhappy contests among other nations; but my views of the powers of this court forbid my interference.

I do therefore decree, order and adjudge, that the brigantine Fanny, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares and merchandize, mentioned in the libel, be discharged from arrest, and the libel be dismissed, the plea to the jurisdiction being relevant.

Circuit Court, E. D. Michigan. Dec. Term, 1877.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—WAIVER—FRAUD IN PROCURING SERVICE OF PROCESS—REPLEVIN.

1. The act of filing in a state court a petition for the removal of a case to the circuit court of the United States is no waiver of a fraud in procuring service of process.

[Cited in Woolridge v. M'Kenna, 8 Fed. 657.]

2. Accordingly where property was fraudulently decoyed within the jurisdiction of a state court and seized upon a writ of replevin, and the defendant at once removed the case to a federal court and moved to set aside the service of the writ: Held, the motion did not come too late.

On motion to dismiss suit and for the return of property replevied. This was an action of replevin [by Matthew J. Moynahan against James Wilson] commenced in the circuit court for the county of Wayne, on the 7th day of November, 1877, and removed to this court on the 13th. Upon the same day a certified copy of the record was filed in this court, and a motion made to dismiss the suit upon the ground that the property replevied [viz. the racing-mare "Bay Sallie"] [2] was decoyed within the jurisdiction of the state court by a fraudulent device or trick of the plaintiff.

L. T. Griffin, for plaintiff.

M. E. Crofoot, for defendant.

BROWN, District Judge. Most of the statements contained in the affidavits read upon this motion relate to the merits of the controversy, and, therefore, have no bearing here. It appears that the plaintiff and one Demass, when in Indianapolis, made a bargain with one Gosnell, the then owner of the mare, to bring her here with the intention of matching her against a horse known as "Tom Hendricks" and that five hundred dollars were deposited in Gosnell's hands, either as security for the safe return of the mare, or as a personal loan from the plaintiff. Gosnell claims that the agreement was to be cancelled if, in the mean time, he could sell the mare, and that he did sell her to Wilson with the consent of all parties, the money being returned to Demass. On the other hand, it is claimed by the plaintiff that he was to have the use of her for a year, to race her as he liked, and to divide the profits with Gosnell; that he knew nothing of the sale to Wilson, and that Demass received back the $500 after plaintiff had left Indianapolis, and without authority from him. All this is immaterial to the present controversy; so likewise are the affidavits with respect to the value of the mare, and to the propriety of driving her in harness. I am satisfied she is worth more than five hundred dollars, and consequently that the court has jurisdiction.

On Demass returning to Detroit, plaintiff, finding his agreement had fallen through, and that the mare had been sold to Wilson, the defendant, and had passed into his possession, wrote defendant the following letter: "I am very sorry that you took 'Bay Sallie' away from Demass, as I have made a match against Hendricks to pace next week for five hundred dollars a side; the money is up, and as John (Demass) says you would bring the mare if matched, please ship her at once to Detroit, as there will be a great betting race. Don't fail to send her; if you don't send her, I lose the money that is now up, so don't fail." To Gosnell he wrote a similar letter adding, "Write or telegraph me when she will be here, as we have not fixed the day to pace until I hear from you." Supposing that statement to be true, defendant at once shipped the mare to Detroit in charge of an hostler, and on arriving here, plaintiff took possession of her, paid for her transportation and sent her to a stable; he then took the advice of counsel and, acting upon such advice, returned her nominally to the possession of defendant, who soon after arrived here himself, then demanded her of him, and upon defendant refusing to deliver her up, took out this writ of replevin. It appears from the affidavit of Mr. Greusel, owner of the "Tom Hendricks," that his horse had not been matched against the mare at all, nor had he made any agreement with the plaintiff, to pace with the "Bay Sallie," nor had he nor any one for him, to his knowledge, put up any money for such a race. Indeed, Moynahan admits that the only foundation for his letter was, that he had some talk with the owner of "Tom Hendricks" about making a match if he could get his friends to put in with him, and stated that he would see plaintiff again, and that before seeing Greusel again he wrote the letters in question, although he says he had been informed by friends of Greusel there would be no trouble in making a match for five hundred dollars, and "deponent believes that such was the fact, and now expects that he will have no difficulty in making the match." In short, the letters were false from beginning to end, and were evidently intended as a device to get the horse to Detroit. I am satisfied, too, that the subsequent surrender to defendant was solely for the purpose of anticipating a writ of replevin from him, and getting her into his own possession under the writ in this case.

[1] [Reported by William Searcy Flippin, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 5 Reporter, 329, and 26 Pittsb. Leg. J. 16, contain only partial reports.]

It is perfectly well settled that where a defendant is brought within the process of the court by a trick or device of this kind the service will be set aside and he will be discharged from custody. Union Sugar Refinery v. Mathiessen [Case No. 14,397]; Wells v. Gurney, 8 Barn. & C. 769; Snelling v. Watrous, 2 Paige, 315; Williams v. Bacon, 10 Wend. 636; Metcalf v. Clark, 41 Barb. 45; Stein v. Valkenhuysen, El., Bl. & El. 65; Williams v. Reed, 5 Dutch. [29 N. J. Law] 385; Carpenter v. Spooner, 2 Sandf. 717; Pfiffner v. Krapfel, 28 Iowa, 27.

Though these were all actions in personam where the defendant was himself discharged, I see no reason why the same principle will not apply to a case of replevin where property is fraudulently decoyed within the jurisdiction of the court.

A serious question, however, remains to be considered: Plaintiff insists that filing the petition for removal in the state court was an appearance, and a waiver of any defect in the service of the writ. That the filing of a petition for a removal is an appearance within the meaning of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], requiring the petition to be filed "at the time of entering his appearance in the state court" was decided, I think correctly, in Sweeny v. Coffin [Case No. 13,686]. A like ruling was made by a majority of the court in the case of Chatham Nat. Bank v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 1 Hun, 702.

While I have little doubt that filing this petition is a sufficient appearance to answer the requirements of the judiciary act, my impression is it cannot be considered as a general appearance in the cause. An appearance has been defined to be a submission to the authority of the court in the case, whether coerced or voluntary, or an act importing that the defendant submits the determination of a material question in his case to the judgment of the court. Cooley v. Lawrence, 5 Duer, 610.

It has frequently been held that a motion to dismiss a case for want of jurisdiction is not an appearance, the very act of making the motion implying that the party does not submit himself to the authority of the court. Sullivan v. Frazee, 4 Rob. [N. Y.] 616; Decker v. New York Belting & Packing Co. [Case No. 3,727]; Commercial Bank v. Slocum, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 60; Ulmer v. Hiatt, 4 G. Greene, 439, 440. And I am strongly inclined to think that filing a petition in the state court, which, according to the better authority, requires no action on the part of that court, and deprives it instantly of its jurisdiction of the case, cannot be considered a general appearance in the cause.

But whether this be so or not, I am satisfied that the petition for removal should not be construed as a waiver of a fraud in procuring the service of the writ. While it is true that a general appearance is a waiver of irregularity in the writ or its service, none of the authorities go to the extent here claimed. In 3 Chit. Gen. Prac. 522–525, an important and suggestive distinction is taken between mere irregularities and such defects as render the proceedings a total nullity and altogether void; for although an irregularity may be waived, if not objected to within a reasonable time, it has been considered to be a general rule that a nullity or essential defect may be taken advantage of at any subsequent stage of the action. In Taylor v. Phillips, 3 East, 155, it was held "that service of process on Sunday was absolutely void by statute and could not be made good by any subsequent waiver of the defendant by his not objecting until after a rule to plead given." And to the same effect is Morgan v. Johnson, 1 H. Bl. 628. A large number of other cases are cited in Chitty, which apparently proceed upon the same ground. While I think the American courts would not go so far in holding that material defects could not be waived, the distinction between irregularities and nullities is noticed and approved in several American cases. In U. S. v. Yates, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 605, it was said, that leave to withdraw an appearance will not authorize a motion to dismiss for want of citation, nor for mere irregularity in its service, provided the appeal is in other respects regularly brought up and authorized by law. "The citation is merely notice to the party and his appearance in person or by attorney is an admission of notice on the record and he cannot afterwards withdraw it; but the appearance does not preclude the party from moving to dismiss for the want of jurisdiction or any other sufficient ground except for the one above mentioned." So in Carroll v. Dorsy, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 204, it was held that a defect in the writ of error or an omission to file a transcript of the record at the term next succeeding the issuing of the writ, were fatal errors, notwithstanding a general appearance. And the earlier case was cited and affirmed. The court held that the appearance of the defendants without making a motion to dismiss cured nothing but the defect in the citation. See, also, Buckingham v. McLean, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 150.

There is, undoubtedly, a class of cases which hold that where the state court has acquired jurisdiction by attachment of property the defendant, on removing, will not be permitted to claim that the case should be dismissed, because the federal court would not have had jurisdiction if the case had been originally commenced there. This was really all that was decided in Sayles v. Northwestern Ins. Co. [Case No. 12,421], though there are sentences in the opinion which seem to conflict with the views here expressed. So in Bushnell v. Kennedy, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 387, it was held, that after removal defendant could not defeat the action by showing it was not originally cognizable in the federal court. To the same effect is Barney v. Globe Bank [Case No. 1,031].

These cases hold that if the defendant, not being compelled to appear in the state court, does actually appear and remove the case, he thereby submits to the jurisdiction and cannot raise in this court a defense he could not raise in the state court; but in the case under consideration the defendant was compelled to make this motion somewhere or lose the benefit of the defense. If he allowed the case to go to judgment it would probably be too late, the fraud rendering the service of the writ not void but voidable. Advantage must undoubtedly be taken of the defect within a reasonable time, but it does not follow that an act which for some purposes may be considered an appearance and possibly sufficient to operate as a waiver of previous irregularities, should be construed as confirming a fraud in the service of the writ. It is a general rule for which numerous cases may be cited, that in order to confirm a fraud the party injured must not only do some act manifesting an intention to confirm, but must be aware of the legal consequences of the act. Indeed, there seems to be in cases of this class a well-settled exception to the general maxim "Ignorantia legis neminem excusat." Kerr, Fraud, 296; Murray v. Palmer, 2 Schoales & L. 486; Cockerell v. Cholmeley, 1 Russ. & M. 425; Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. v. Sherman, 20 Md. 117; Cherry v. Newsom, 3 Yerg. 369; Stump v. Gaby, 2 De Gex, M. & G. 623. If this rule be applicable here (and I see no reason why it is not) the case is freed from all doubt. There is not the slightest reason for supposing the defendant intended to waive the fraud by removing the case. Indeed, the promptness with which the removal was effected, and this motion made, precluded the idea either of an intention to confirm or a belief that such was the legal effect of his act.

Again: It seems to me inconsistent with the general scope and purpose of the removal acts to compel a party to litigate any portion of his case in a state court, or lose his defense pro tanto. Under the judiciary act, if the defendant had made this motion in the state court, he would thereby have waived his right of removal, since it was necessary to file his petition at the time of entering his appearance; and while, under the act of 1875 [18 Stat. 470], the removal may be made before, or at the term at which the cause could be first tried, and before the trial thereof, it is provided in section 6, that in case of removal the circuit court shall proceed therein as if the suit had been originally commenced in the federal court.

In Lamar v. Dana [Case No. 8,005], a suit was brought in the state court for an arrest made by the defendant, during the Rebellion, by authority of the president, and the plaintiff move to remand on the ground that the jurisdiction of the federal court over the case had been taken away by the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 558]. It was held that, notwithstanding this act, the parties could raise any question in the federal court after removal which they could raise if the cause had been originally commenced here, and it was said by Judge Woodruff, "the removal places the case in the same position here as if so (originally) brought. This operates in this case as in all other cases so removed. Had the cause been brought here in the first instance, all legal defenses would have been available to the defendant, whether they went to jurisdiction to inquire, or were in bar of the action on any ground. All that the removal has done is to change the tribunal which is to pass upon the questions involved." See, also, Gier v. Gregg [Case No. 5,406]; McLeod v. Duncan [Id. 8,898].

There is no doubt that this motion might have been made in the state court, and that the decision of the state court thereon would have been res adjudicata; but I think the defendant is not compelled to split up his defense in this way. There is no reason to suppose that the removal acts were not aimed at the possible partiality of local judges as well as local influence upon juries, and any construction which would deprive litigants of a judicial interpretation of the law in this court, as well as a determination of the facts involved, would, to that extent, defeat the intention of congress. The power of removal is not limited to cases where only questions of fact are involved, and this court would clearly not be called upon to remand if the sole question in the case were one of law.

Without deciding how far a petition for removal is an appearance, or how far a general appearance would operate as a waiver of a fraud in service of a process, it is sufficient here to say that I do not think that the petition for removal is a waiver of the right of the defendant to insist that the service of the process was procured by a fraudulent device or trick.

But I think the plaintiff has made his motion too broad, in asking that the writ itself be set aside, and vacated. Service of the writ must be set aside, and the plaintiff ordered to return the property to the defendant; and, as defendant came into this district after hearing that the plaintiff had replevied or treatened to replevy his property, and for the purpose of rescuing it, I think the service should be set aside also, as to him.

COLLISION — TUG AND BATH HOUSE — ENGINE CATCHING ON THE CENTRE—JURISDICTION.

1. The steam-tug B., having three barges in tow, went into the cove at the foot of 65th street, East river, to take up a fourth. In coming in, her engine caught on the centre and she drifted towards the rocks. The pilot, as soon as possible, turned her head out of the cove and went ahead, but before he could get out, she was carried by the tide so near the point as to run against the corner of a floating bath house which was moored to the shore there: Held, that the bath house was not a vessel;

2. The admiralty had jurisdiction of a libel filed by the owner of the bath house against the tug, to recover the damages caused by the tug;

[Cited in Snyder v. Floating Dry Dock, 22 Fed. 686; Homer Ramsdell Transp. Co. v. Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, 63 Fed. 848.]

3. The tug was not in fault for the engine's catching on the centre, or in her navigation otherwise, and the libel must be dismissed.

In admiralty.

D. McMahon, for libelant.

W. R. Beebe, for claimant

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a libel for collision between the steam-tug M. R. Brazos and a floating bath house belonging to the libellant, August Brown, which was at the time of the collision, moored to the westerly shore of the East river, near the foot of East 65th street. Between 56th and 64th there is a cove, into which the tug had gone with three loaded boats in tow for the purpose of taking in tow a fourth boat or barge, loaded with manure, at a pier near the foot of East 63rd street. She was bound from New York to Saybrook, Conn. At 64th street, the upper or northerly end of the cove, the shore sets out boldly into the river, forming a high point of rocks, against which the flood tide sets with considerable force. The libelant's bath house was moored to the rocky shore about sixty feet above this point, and it projected out into the river considerably further than this rocky point. It was framed with timbers and was about forty-nine feet long and thirty feet wide, and except for a short time at low tide it was wholly floating in the water. At low tide a small portion of it next the shore rested on the rocks under the surface of the water, the rest of it being afloat. It was secured to the shore by poles and chains, so arranged as to allow it to rise and fall with the tide, one end of the chains being fastened securely to the structure itself and the other end being attached to pins inserted in holes drilled in the rocks. Access to it from the shore was had over a gangway of planks. It was placed there by permission of the department of docks of the city of New York, for the purpose of being used as a public bath, but it lay outside the bulkhead line as established at that time. It was so constructed that the tide flowed freely through it. It was kept afloat in part by the buoyancy of its materials and in part by barrels underneath some of its outer timbers.

The collision happened about ten o'clock on Sunday morning, August 31st, 1873. The day was warm and fine and the river at the time was free from other vessels. The tug having gone into the cove for this fourth boat and come out without taking her up and proceeding on her voyage up the East river, came so near to the bath house that the barge, on her port side, struck against the outer and lower corner of the bath house, injuring and shattering it so that it fell apart and was carried off by the tide. The libel alleges that the collision was caused by the negligence of those in charge of the tug.

It is objected by the claimant, the owner of the tug, that the court has no jurisdiction of the cause, on the ground that the injury complained of was not on the water but on the land, within the meaning of the rule governing the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts in actions for marine torts. It is clear that the libelant's bath house, though described in his libel as a "vessel," was not a vessel constructed or used or intended to be used as an instrument of commerce or navigation. The test, however, of the jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty in respect to torts, is whether the place of the alleged injury was "on the water." The Maud Webster [Case No. 9,302], and cases cited. This structure cannot be said to have become a part of the land. Its connection with the shore was for a temporary purpose. The testimony shows that it was a movable structure, moored in this place in tide waters, for use as a bath house during the summer months, the design of the owner being to disconnect it from the shore in the autumn and float it away to some more suitable place for laying it up during the winter. The mode of its attachment to the shore was adapted to this purpose and was such that it could be readily disconnected. I do not see that the case is any different from what it would be if the bath house had been moored at anchor in the same place or out in the middle of the river. The case is clearly distinguishable from the case of The Maud Webster, cited above, in which it was held that the place where the derrick which was injured stood had become a part of the land. The libelant, therefore, has the right to have the case determined on the merits.

The defence set up by the tug is that the injury was the result of inevitable accident—that while the tug was properly and for a lawful purpose and without negligence attempting to back up to the pier in the cove to take in tow the boat loaded with manure, her engine, without fault on the part of the engineer, caught on the centre; that she used all proper diligence in prying the engine off the centre, and that in the situation in which she then was, having been drifted by the tide while thus helpless towards the rocks on the point at 64th street, the only proper and prudent course to avoid going ashore was to head out into the river and go ahead with all speed; that she did this with all possible expedition and thereby succeeded in avoiding the point, but the tide still setting her up towards the corner of the bath house after she cleared the point, she had not gained sufficient headway to clear the bath house, and that without fault on her part, the boat on her port side struck the corner of the bath house and did the injury complained of. This defence is, I think, made out. The testimony in this case shows very clearly that the catching of the engine on the centre is an accident which cannot, by the exercise of any degree of watchfulness be anticipated or by any precaution prevented, and that it does not show any defect in the machinery or want of care in the engineer. Up to the time the engine so caught on the centre the management of the tug was without fault. She had a perfect right to come into this cove to take the boat in tow. She lay there off the pier a short time, drifting slowly up with the tide, stopped, or almost stopped, and hailed those in charge of the boat to be taken up. Her attempted movement by backing to take up the boat, which was in an eddy setting down along the shore on the inside of the cove, was proper. The drifting of the boat towards the point while her engine was caught made it impossible for her to resume this movement. Her pilot immediately did what was obviously the only safe thing for him to do, turn her head to the river and go ahead as fast as he could. By doing so he cleared the point only by about fifteen feet. The evidence shows that when he thus started to go ahead he put his wheel a-port so as to head her out into the river; that she grazed so near the rocks at the point that it was necessary to put the wheel amidships in passing in order to throw the stern of the tow off from the rocks, and that when the stem of the tow had got by the bath house he attempted to keep the stern of the tow from coming in contact with the bath house by putting his wheel to starboard in order to throw the stern off. It was a very close thing between the force of the tide setting up the river and the headway of the tug driving her out into the river, and the force of the tide proved too strong. But the real cause of the collision was the catching of the engine on the centre and the consequent drifting of the tug and tow into a position where, with the exercise of all reasonable care and skill, it was impossible to avoid coming in contact with the bath house. There was no fault in the construction or motive power of the tug. She had no larger tow than she could properly manage. Her pilot was familiar with the navigation of the river; he knew the set and force of the tide and the nature of the navigation he had to encounter in going into this cove. It is true that he had not actually been to this pier before, but that is immaterial, as he was familiar by frequent observation in navigating the river with the tides at this place, and there was neither negligence in going into the pier nor want of skill in endeavoring to extricate the tow from the situation in which she was unavoidably placed while there. I have given no weight to the suggestion that the bath house was an obstruction to navigation. I do not perceive that, if that were so, the tug could justify her own negligence in running against it. Libel dismissed with costs.

DEMURRAGE—PROMPTNESS IN DELIVERING CARGO—CUSTOM OF UNLOADING.

1. An express stipulation for demurrage in a contract of affreightment is not necessary to entitle the owner of a vessel to compensation for the unnecessary or improper detention in loading or unloading.

2. Reasonable promptitude in delivering a cargo at its point of shipment, and in receiving it at its destination, is a duty implied in such contracts, and for a violation of it, damages in the nature of demurrage are recoverable.

3. Where it is the prevailing custom at the lake ports for grain-bearing vessels to unload in the order of their arrival, the ship owner must await his turn for a reasonable time, to be measured by the ordinary volume and the exigencies of trade at the place of discharge.

4. In view of so well established and so reasonable a custom, it is not within the province of a ship owner, by notice to a consignee, to define an arbitrary period within which his cargo must be discharged.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Western district of Pennsylvania.]

In admiralty.

F. F. Marshall, for appellant.
J. M. Stoner, for appellee.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. An express stipulation for demurrage in a contract of affreightment is not necessary to entitle the owner of a vessel to compensation for her unnecessary or improper detention in loading or unloading. Reasonable promptitude in delivering a cargo at its point of shipment, and receiving it at its destination, is a duty implied in such contracts, and for a violation of it, damages in the nature of demurrage are recoverable. This is too well settled in England and this country to need discussion or authority. Whether the consignee of a cargo, who is not its owner, is chargeable with such damages it is unnecessary to consider, because the respondent is admitted to have been the shipper of the cargo, and hence as a party to the contract of affreightment, is accountable for any breach of an obligation imported by it. The Hyperian [Case No. 6,987]. Was the vessel here subjected to unwarrantable delay in discharging her cargo? This is the decisive question in the case.

On the 20th of October, 1875, the respondent shipped on the libellant vessel, at Chicago, a cargo of corn, consigned to itself, at Erie, Penn. The vessel reached Erie on the 26th of October, and her master promptly reported to the respondent's agent, and was told that "we would unload him as soon as it came his turn; that there were four vessels ahead of him." The respondent has the control and possession of the only two elevators at Erie, and as soon as the vessels arriving before the Bacon were unladen, the discharge of her cargo was commenced, viz.: October 30, about 2 o'clock p. m., and was finished in the forenoon of the 31st. The libellant claims damages for four days, alleging improper detention. That it was the right of respondent to require the cargo of the vessel to be unloaded at the Erie elevator is unquestionable, and that the facility and dispatch of such method of discharge was advantageous to the vessel is obvious. If other vessels with the same consignment, arrived in port before her, and were awaiting the discharge of their cargoes, she was entitled to a berth at the elevators only in her turn, and her necessary detention for a reasonable time, under these circumstances, is not imputable to the respondent as a wrong. This is the result of the proofs as to the prevailing custom at the ports on the lakes, and especially at the port of Erie, and of accepted decisions by English and American courts. Upon this point the master of the Bacon testifies: "I don't know that it is the custom at all the lake ports for the first vessel at the elevator to be unloaded first." William Christie, another witness for the libellant, is more explicit: "It is customary for vessels loaded with grain to wait their turn to unload in the order of their arrival at the elevators; in fact, you have got to wait your turn wherever you go." And again, J. C. Van Scoter says: "It is the usage and custom throughout the lakes, for grain-bearing vessels consigned to the same elevators to wait their turns to be unloaded, in the order of their arrival; of course when an elevator is disabled, the consignee has more time." All the testimony on both sides is concurrent with this. Now, in view of so well established and so reasonable a custom, it is not within the province of a ship owner by notice to a consignee, to define an arbitrary period within which his cargo must be discharged. If he must unload in his turn, he must await it for a reasonable time, to be measured by the ordinary volume and exigencies of trade at the place of discharge, and it would be a solecism to affirm that the consequent necessary delay can be treated as a wrong, upon which to found a claim for damages.

The subject is fully discussed and the result of the cases touching it is clearly stated by Chief Justice Denio, in Cross v. Beard, 26 N. Y. 85. After speaking of the effect of an agreement for demurrage in a charter party, he says: "But the rule is somewhat different when no period of delay is fixed by the contract. There a reasonable time is implied, and this is to be determined upon by a regard to all the circumstances legitimately bearing upon the case, and is a question for the jury. * * * If it be conceded that the defendant had a right to require that the coals should be delivered upon his own deck, he was guilty of no fault or breach of contract in delaying the plaintiff's vessel until she came up to the dock by taking her turn among the other vessels which were also waiting to be discharged, unless he was guilty of some fault in suffering such an accumulation of craft laden with cargo for himself, for the same wharf, at the same time." See, also, Rodgers v. Forresters, 2 Camp. 483, and Burmester v. Hodgson, Id. 488.

The only question then is, was there a culpable detention of the vessel for an unreasonable time? She reported to the consignee in the afternoon of October 26, and the discharge of her cargo was completed in the forenoon of the 31st; four vessels had precedence over the Bacon. There is nothing to indicate that this number of vessels, consigned to the respondent, in port at the same time, was extraordinary, especially so near the period of closing navigation, nor that the delay in unloading the Bacon was at all unreasonable. On the contrary, all practicable dispatch seems to have been afforded her, and the respondent was not therefore in default.

And now, August 20, 1880, this cause having been heard upon the pleadings and proof, and having been argued by the proctors of the parties respectively, it is here adjudged and ordered that the decree of the district court be reversed, that the libel be dismissed, and the libellants and their stipulators pay to the respondent its costs in the district court, as well as in this court, to be taxed by the clerk.

SEDUCTION—ACTION BY FATHER—LOSS OF SERVICE—UNDER PROMISE OF MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE—FORM OF ACTION.

1. In an action upon the case for seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, per quod servitium amisit, the plaintiff may give evidence that the defendant promised to marry the daughter, as a means of the seduction.

2. An action upon the case will lie for seduction of the plaintiff's daughter, whereby he lost her service.

Action upon the case for seducing plaintiff's daughter, whereby he lost her service. Damages laid at $2,000.

Mr. Lear, for plaintiff, offered to prove a promise of marriage as the means of seduction.

The defendant's counsel, Mr. Marbury, objected, and cited 2 Phil. Ev. 159; Tullidge v. Wade, 3 Wils. 18; Dodd v. Norris, 3 Camp. 519, and Foster v. Scoffield, 1 Johns. 297.

But THE COURT, (nem. con.) permitted the evidence to be given for the purpose of showing the means by which the defendant accomplished the seduction; and the defendant took a bill of exceptions. See Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, pp. 1309, 1310; Peake, Ev. 355; and Elliott v. Nicklin, 5 Price, 641.

The defendant's counsel then prayed the court to instruct the jury that this action upon the case would not lie, and that the action had been misconceived.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused, saying that they might move it in arrest of judgment, if it were a substantial objection. See 1 Chit. Pl. 138; 2 Chit. Pl. 265, 271, 315, 422; 3 Starkie, Ev. (Am. Ed.) 1307, 1308, note 1; Bennett v. Allcott, 2 Term R. 167; Woodward v. Walton, 2 Bos. & P. N. R. 476; Macfadzen v. Olivant, 6 East, 387; Parker v. Elliotte, Gilmer, 33, 6 Munf. 587.

The defendant took his second bill of exceptions.

Verdict for plaintiff $2,000. There was no motion made in arrest of judgment, nor any writ of error issued.

District Court, E. D. New York. June, 1870.

SHIPPING—POSSESSION—MASTER—LIEN—LOADING VESSEL WHILE IN CUSTODY—BONDING AFTER DECREE—APPEAL.

1. The owners of a British vessel filed a libel, to recover possession of her, against the master who claimed to have a lien upon her, under the English law, and to hold her by reason of such lien; and, after the vessel had been seized by the master, under the process in the action, the owners, through a new master whom they had appointed, chartered the vessel, and by consent of the marshal, but without the permission of the court, began to load the vessel under the charter: Held, that the fact, that the master claimed a lien on the vessel, under the English law, furnished no ground for his refusal to deliver the vessel to her owners.

2. A court of admiralty has the right to decline to entertain jurisdiction, where all the parties are foreigners resident abroad.

3. The act of the owners, in interfering as they had done with the vessel, while in the custody of the law, would well justify the court in declining to exercise jurisdiction in the premises, but as that had been done with the consent of the marshal, and the rights of the defendant could be otherwise protected, the court would decree that the libellants recover possession of the vessel without costs, on their paying into court the inward freight collected by them, less the usual inward charges, including unloading and crew's wages, as security for the payment of any sum found due to the master, in an action to be brought by him within twenty days, if he was so advised.

4. After such decree was entered, the respondent gave notice of appeal, but took no steps to perfect his appeal for several days, and the owners applied to the court for leave to bond the vessel: Held, that the court would not grant leave to bond the vessel, but would direct that the decree be executed, unless the respondent perfected his appeal, and procured the cause to be transmitted to the appellate court within two days.

In admiralty.

Emerson, Goodrich & Wheeler, for libellants.

Beebe, Donohue & Cooke, for respondent.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is an action brought by the libellants William Muir and others, claiming to be the sole and only owners of the British brig Brisk, to obtain possession of that vessel from the defendant, Alfred Morine, who claims to hold the vessel as the master thereof, and denies the right of the libellants to remove him. The defendant by his answer puts the libellants to their proof of ownership, and sets up in opposition to the demand of the libellants, the fact that he has a claim against the owners for wages and advances as master, which the libellants have not offered to pay, and for which by the law of England, he has a lien upon the vessel and her freight, by reason of which he insists that this court should refuse the decree prayed for by the libellants.

The evidence of ownership introduced by the libellants, I consider to be sufficient to entitle them to the relief prayed for; certainly, in the absence of any countervailing evidence, or any suggestion that any other parties are the owners of this vessel. As to the fact that the defendant has an unpaid demand for wages and disbursements, for which the law of England gives him a lien upon the ship and freight, it is only necessary to say that, assuming the facts to be as set up, they afford no reason for refusing to the owners the possession of the ship, to which they are entitled as being the sole owners. A lien for wages and disbursements cannot give to the master a legal right to the possession of the vessel, as against his owners. Cases might be imagined, disclosing such equities and presenting such features of hardship in the dealings of owners with their master, as would justify a court of admiralty in refusing the aid of its decree in favor of owners who refuse to do equity, but this case presents no such features. These owners are not shown to be irresponsible—they offer to give the defendant security to pay any sum which may be due him, while they deny that anything is due. It would follow therefore that the libellants, upon such a state of facts, must be entitled to the decree, which they seek by this action to obtain. But a circumstance has been proved in the case which, considering that the vessel in question is foreign, and all the parties to the action foreigners residing in a foreign country, makes it proper in my opinion for this court, to decline to exercise jurisdiction in this case, except upon the condition hereafter to be stated.

The right of the court of admiralty, to decline to entertain jurisdiction, when all the parties are foreigners residing abroad, has been often declared. The Martin, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 293; Davis v. Leslie [Case No. 3,639]; Coote, Adm. 47.

The circumstance to which I allude is this, that since the seizure of the vessel by the marshal under the process issued in this action, at the instance of the libellants, and while the vessel was thus in the custody of the law, awaiting the determination of this court, the libellants without any permission from the court, have caused the vessel to be loaded with a cargo shipped for a foreign voyage, and she is now nearly full of cargo belonging to third parties, laden under a charter party executed by one Banks, who is the master whom the libellants seek to place in command of the vessel instead of the defendant.

This extraordinary mode of dealing with a vessel in custody of the law, on the part of foreigners who were seeking the decree of this court to put them in possession of the vessel, would well justify the court in exercising its privilege to decline jurisdiction in the premises.

No reason is seen why the aid of the court should be invoked by parties, who by their acts show that they do not consider any decree of the court necessary, to enable them to assume possession and control of the vessel. But it also appears, and the statement has caused me surprise, that the action of the libellants in loading their ship was with the knowledge and consent of the marshal. For this reason, therefore, and because the result of this action of the officer of the court, might be to work serious inconvenience and loss, if no decree were here pronounced, and inasmuch as all the rights of the defendant can be protected by making the payment of the freight into court a condition of exercising jurisdiction, that course will be adopted instead of absolutely declining to render a decree. If, then, the libellants deposit in the registry of the court the amount of the inward freight by them collected, less only the usual inward charges, including unloading and crew's wages, such freight to remain subject to the order of the court, as security for any sum which the defendant may recover against the owners of this vessel or said freight, in an action, to be brought within twenty days, in case he be so advised, the court will entertain jurisdiction, and a decree be entered in favor of the libellants without costs. If such freight be not so deposited within forty-eight hours, after notice of this determination, a decree will be entered dismissing the libel.

Upon the entry of the decree above mentioned, the defendant at once filed and served a notice of intention to appeal in the usual form, but for five days thereafter took no steps to perfect his appeal and gave no security. Upon these facts, and affidavits showing that the detention of the vessel would involve serious loss, the libellants moved for a release of the vessel on bail.

BENEDICT, District Judge. No reason is assigned for the omission to make this application at an earlier stage in the cause. One reason given for the application at this time, is that she is under a charter and loaded and ready for sea. This charter and loading of the vessel has been before alluded to in disposing of the cause upon the merits, and it is sufficient to say here, that the embarrassment growing out of the charter and loading of this vessel was caused by the libellants themselves, when they assumed to charter and load a vessel while in custody of the law, and can not be considered as one of the ordinary incidents attending a possessory action. Under the circumstances, the position of the vessel, arising from her charter, does not appeal very strongly to the consideration of the court. Furthermore an order to release a vessel on bail, is an interlocutory order made pending the determination of the court upon the issues raised, to avoid the expense and loss incident to delay in the determination of those issues. When therefore the court has made its decree, the reason for making such an order no longer exists, and it is not seen what form of security could well be taken from the libellants here, in an action like the present, after an absolute decree made in their favor, which it is the duty of the court to see duly executed. The delay sought to be protected against, is not delay in this court, but in the appellate court.

I do not say that a state of facts might not be presented, which would make it incumbent upon this court, to direct the release of a vessel, held in a possessory action, even after final decree in the cause, and before an appeal; but in the present case, the delay sought to be protected against, is not delay in this court, but anticipated delay in the appellate court; for notice of appeal has been filed, and the appeal can be perfected without delay, and the application can at once be made to the appellate court. The order which I propose to make, will enable relief to be obtained more speedily by an application to that court than by the present motion here, and, therefore, I do not consider the interposition of this court, in the manner proposed, to be necessary. An order can be made to prevent further delay in this court, and insure the transmission of the cause to the appellate court without further delay, by shortening the time usually allowed for perfecting the appeal. It is accordingly directed that the decree of this court be executed, unless the defendant perfect his appeal, and procure the cause to be transmitted to the circuit court, within two days from the making of this order.

PAYMENT—RECEIPT OF BOND OF THIRD PERSON.

A receipt of a bond of a third person "in part pay" of a precedent debt is conclusive evidence of payment to that extent, although the obligor was insolvent at the time of the receipt given.

Indebitatus assumpsit, for a desk and bookcase sold and delivered. The defendant produced a receipt from the plaintiff, for a bond of one Allison, for £16. 14s. 10½d., "in part pay on a desk and bookcase."

The COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent,) said it was conclusive evidence that the bond was received in part payment, although the bond might have been unproductive, and Allison insolvent at the time.

NOTES—NEGOTIABILITY—ACTION BY HOLDER.

The indorsee of a promissory note, not payable to order, but expressed to be "negotiable at the Bank of Discount and Deposit," may maintain an action upon it in his own name, against the maker.

[Cited in Bank of Sherman v. Apperson, 4 Fed. 29.]

Jenkins made a note for $250, payable to Stebbins, without the words "or order," but made "negotiable at the Bank of Discount and Deposit." Stebbins indorsed it to the plaintiff. There was a verdict for the plaintiff, and a motion in arrest of judgment, by Caldwell & Porter, the defendant's counsel.

Mr. Jones, for plaintiff, contended that a promissory note, without the words "or order," is a note within the statute of Anne, so as to enable the payee to maintain an action thereon under the statute. That if it is a note within the statute for one purpose, it is so for all other purposes; and that therefore an indorsee of a note, not payable to order, may maintain an action in his own name under the statute. Mr. Morsell, for plaintiff, in reply, cited Roberts v. Peake, 1 Burrows, 323, where the note was not payable to order, and was only payable upon an uncertain contingency; and the court decided that it was not a negotiable note, because the contingency was uncertain, without noticing the objection that it was not payable to order.

The COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contrà) overruled the motion in arrest, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, on the ground that it was the intention of the defendant to make a negotiable instrument.

MUIRHEAD v. ALDRIDGE et al.

[14 N. B. R. 249; 2 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 480; 33 Leg. Int. 213.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Jersey. March 28, 1876.[2]

HUSBAND AND WIFE—WIFE'S PROPERTY—ACCUMULATED BY HUSBAND—BANKRUPTCY.

Where the husband receives money from his wife, and engages in transactions in real estate, in her name, until he accumulates property of considerable value by his skill and energy, the property is liable to his assignee.

Appeal from the decree of the district court.

[This was a proceeding by William Muirhead, assignee in bankruptcy of Thomas Aldridge, against Thomas Aldridge and others to obtain a conveyance of certain property alleged to belong to the bankrupt.]

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The main purpose of the complainant's bill is to obtain a conveyance to him, as the assignee in bankruptcy of Thomas Aldridge, of certain real estate, described in the bill, the title to which is apparently in Mrs. Aldridge, but is claimed to be meritoriously in her husband. This real estate was acquired and conveyed to Mrs. Aldridge during her coverture, and so is alleged to be her separate property. By the laws of the state of New Jersey (see Dixon's Dig. 547), every married woman is invested with the capacity "to receive, by gift, grant, devise, or bequest, and to hold to her sole and separate use, as if she were a single female, real and personal property," independently of the control or disposal of her husband, and without liability for his debts. According to the obvious import of the statute, the courts of the state, in numerous decisions, have construed it to authorize the acquisition by a married woman of personal property and real estate, and to intercept the common-law right of her husband to reduce her personal property to possession, and to appropriate the rents, issues, and profits of her real estate as an incident of his initiate estate by the courtesy. And it has also been held that where a deed is made to a married woman she is, prima facie, to be taken as having paid the consideration stated in it out of her separate property, thus assimilating her as to this, to every other grantee, and placing her in a more advantageous position than is assigned to her by the courts of other states, in which similar laws exist. But as a mere presumption, the primary effect of which is to impose the burden of proof upon the party who gainsays it, it will not outweigh satisfactory evidence that her separate means were entirely insufficient, or even grossly inadequate, to pay the consideration of the conveyance. When, therefore, the title to real estate is conveyed to a married woman, she must be considered the bona fide owner of it, as if she were a single female. But it must be intrenched in the real good faith by which an honest acquisition is distinguished. If it is purchased by her or for her, no matter by whom, its validity cannot and ought not to be questioned. But if she has no separate estate, or that is disproportionately small, compared with the consideration ostensibly furnished by her, and her means are materially supplemented by her husband's contribution from resources, whether money or its equivalent, which he could not rightfully so apply, such a transaction does not specially invite, as it certainly does not deserve, any legal sanction.

These general principles seem to me to be the clear result of all the cases discussed on both sides in the argument, and the decision of the cause to depend, therefore, upon the solution of the question, whether the several parcels of real estate described in the bill were acquired by Mrs. Aldridge, by the appropriation of her own separate means to their purchase, or whether her husband ought to be regarded as their real owner, by reason of his having contributed the chief part of the consideration paid for them. It would involve unnecessary elaboration to discuss in detail the evidence in the record touching this inquiry. It is sufficient to say that, after a careful collation and consideration of it, I am convinced that the prayer of the bill ought to be allowed. During nine years, from 1861 to 1870, twenty-one pieces of real estate, of various kinds, were purchased for and conveyed to Mrs. Aldridge, for the aggregate consideration of about thirty-three thousand dollars. Of these properties, portions were sold and exchanged, and buildings were erected on some of them; and there remains, as the net result of these operations, property nearly equal to twenty thousand dollars in value, nominally belonging to her. Now, what was the extent of her agency in producing this result? A contribution to the purchase money in all of about three thousand dollars, probably considerably less than that. Whatever additional contribution was required was either supplied by her husband or was obtained upon the credit of the property purchased, by mortgages executed by both of them, and by re-sales at advanced prices. Nor was the money employed the most fruitful source of the accumulating profits accruing from these investments. They were obviously much more largely due to the skill and sagacity with which the selection of properties was made; with which negotiations in reference to them were conducted; with which contracts of purchase and modes of payment were arranged; with which resales and exchanges were affected; and with which improvements were devised and made, and to the discreet judgment and vigilance exercised generally in the management of these transactions. This efficiency was certainly not supplied by the wife. She was informed by her husband of the plans which he had conceived, and was consulted by him; but the degree of control and supervision over their execution, which she exercised was only such, in her own words, "as it was necessary and proper for a lady to do." Her husband devised and executed them, and it was almost wholly by reason of his skill, experience, judgment, diligence, and services, that they bore such fruit; and this remarkable consequence followed, that while the services of the husband were the chief agency in creating the wealth of the wife, and its proportions were steadily expanded under his vigilant and skillful manipulation, his debts were uncared for, and the earnings, to which his creditors had a just right, were diverted to swell the nominal acquisitions of his wife. And when he filed his petition in 1873, for the benefit of the bankrupt law [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)], his schedule was barren of any available assets. Laws for the protection of married women were not enacted to sanctify such results. If they can be so perverted they are instrumentalities of great injustice. They were never meant to afford any shelter for the misappropriated resources of a husband who is forgetful of his just obligations to others. They have a more benignant aim and operation. They were intended to provide a shield against the rapacity or improvidence of the husband, and against liability for debts not her own, and in which she ought not to be implicated.

[1] [Reprinted from 14 N. B. R. 249, by permission. 2 N. Y. Wkly. Dig. 480, contains only a partial report.]

A debtor cannot be compelled to labor for his creditors, but he cannot divert the product of it to his own substantial benefit, by putting it into the form of property only nominally acquired by his wife. As was said, with characteristic emphasis and force, by Mr. Chief Justice Black, in Keeney v. Good, 21 Pa. St. 349, 354: "But after supporting his family he must give the best exertions of his mind and body to his creditors. This is but his reasonable duty—a duty sanctioned by all laws, moral, civil, and divine. No effectual mode of evading it has yet been invented. The usual device of covering the property of the debtor, under the name of some friend or a member of his family, will only answer the purpose as long as it remains undiscovered. I need not say how deeply such shams are branded by the law with marks of its detestation." Nor will the nominal agency of the husband for the wife be any more effectual. Doubtless he may act for her in that capacity, in reference to her separate property, without thereby acquiring any interest in it or subjecting it to liability for his debts. But where it is employed as a device to cover his acquisitions under the name of his wife, it will prove unavailing. Again using the language of Chief Justice Black: "An arrangement to buy property on her credit, and have it managed and paid for by him, as her agent, is too unsubstantial and too easily shammed to be at all satisfactory. All these things can be done by mere words, and words are but breath."

The proofs in the cause convince one that the real estate claimed by the complainant is really the property of the respondent, Thomas Aldridge; that the title to it was vested in his wife, in fraud of his creditors, and that a decree ought to be entered for its conveyance by the respondents, according to the prayer of the bill. Let a decree to that effect be prepared.

[On an appeal, the cause was taken to the supreme court, where the decree of this court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the bill with costs. 101 U. S. 397.]

BANKRUPTCY — ASSIGNEE'S COMPENSATION — ATTORNEY.

1. An assignee in bankruptcy cannot be allowed anything, in addition to disbursements and the commissions provided for in section 5100 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except for the services and at the rates set forth in general order, No. 30, adopted April 12, 1875.

2. Nothing can be allowed him as "a reasonable compensation for his services" under section 5099.

3. The fact that the assignee is an attorney at law makes no difference.

[In the matter of Emile H. Muldaur, William S. Hall, and Edward A. Coburn, bankrupts.]

In this case the register certified that the assignee, who was an attorney at law, had presented a claim against the estate and asked to be allowed to retain out of moneys in his hands, as a reasonable compensation for his services, under section 5,099 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the sum of $1,485 in addition to the percentage and disbursements allowed by law.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. These bills are part of the accounts of the assignee. Under section 4998, subdivision 8, they are to be audited and passed by the register, in the first instance. Under the new general order No. 30, the assignee cannot be allowed anything, in addition to disbursements and the commissions provided for in section 5100, except for the services and at the rates set forth in such general order. Nothing can be allowed to him as "a reasonable compensation for his services," under section 5099. The discretion of the court to make such allowance is taken away by such general order. The fact that the assignee is an attorney at law makes no difference. Fees cannot be allowed to an attorney at law, under said general order, except where he is "necessarily employed by the assignee." Where the assignee is himself an attorney at law, he does not, as assignee, employ himself as an attorney at law. If he is a merchant, or banker, or engaged in any other occupation, or happens to be especially versed in any branch of business, his gifts or qualifications are incident to his personality, and he brings them all to the discharge of his duties as assignee. So, also, if he is an attorney at law. Moreover, where the assignee is an attorney at law, it is not, as a general thing, necessary for him to employ an attorney at law. These principles must be observed in auditing these accounts.

BANKRUPTCY—POWER OF REGISTER—EXPUNGING CLAIM—PRACTICE.

Under general order in bankruptcy No. 34, a register has no power to expunge or diminish the claim of a creditor, if the creditor objects, but must require the parties to form an issue, to be certified to the court for determination.

[This case was previously heard upon the application of the assignee to be allowed additional fees. Case No. 9,905.]

In this matter [of Emile H. Muldaur and others,] the register certified to the court that the assignee had presented to him a petition for the re-examination of the claim filed against the estate by Charles S. Baum; that he made an order for such re-examination, on which the creditor appeared, and evidence was taken on behalf of the assignee and of the creditor, which was submitted to the register for decision, and he thereupon, on the 15th of February, 1875, made an order expunging the claim; that, thereafter, counsel for the assignee applied to him, on notice to the creditor, to take further action in the premises, which the register, considering the order of February 15th as valid, declined to take; and that, on request of said counsel, he certified the matter to the court.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. I understand general order No. 34 to mean, that, if the creditor objects to having his claim expunged or diminished, the register cannot order it to be expunged or diminished, but must require the parties to form an issue, to be certified to the court for determination. If, therefore, the attorney for Baum, prior to the making of the order of February 15th, 1875, by the register, and after the testimony taken before the register was closed, took the ground, before the register, that the evidence taken did not justify the expunging or diminishing of the claim, the order of February 15th ought now to be vacated, and the proceedings ought to be resumed at the stage at which they were before such order was made.

PATENTS—CHAIN FOR NECKLACES—MATERIAL—GOLD TUBING.

1. The claims of the letters patent granted to Lewis J. Mulford and others, February 24th, 1874, for an "improvement in chains and chain links for necklaces, &c.," namely, "(1.) An ornamental chain for necklaces, &c., formed of alternate closed links A, and open spiral links B, substantially as shown and described; (2.) The open spiral links B, formed of coils of tubing, substantially as shown and described," cover new and patentable inventions.

2. The distinctive feature of the invention consists in constructing the open spiral link of annealed gold tubing, such link possessing a peculiar elasticity, and being easily separated and united to another link without any injury to itself or to the solid link into which it is sprung, and constantly preserving its elasticity and shape.

3. The first claim is not a claim for an ornamental chain composed of alternate closed links and open spiral links, without reference to the material of which the spiral link is made, but it is a claim for a chain composed of alternate closed links and open spiral links formed of one or more coils of gold tubing, as shown and described.

4. The process of making gold tubing was well known to manufacturing jewellers, and, therefore, it was not necessary to describe in the specification how it has to be made.

No. 5,774, granted to S. Cottle Feb. 24, 1874, the original letters patent No. 147,045 having been granted Feb. 3, 1874.]

Benjamin F. Lee and Alwyn A. Alvord, for plaintiffs.

Joseph C. Fraley and Henry Baldwin, Jr., for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. This is a bill in equity, alleging an infringement by the defendants of reissued letters patent which were issued to the complainants on February 24th, 1874, for an "improvement in chains and chain links for necklaces, &c.," and praying for an injunction and an account. The defendants, admitting in their answer the manufacture and sale of the patented article, deny the novelty or patentability of the alleged invention, and further insist that the patent is invalid by reason of the vagueness of the specification. The specification states, that the "invention has for its object to furnish an improved chain for necklaces, &c., having links of peculiar construction, which enable all the links to be finished separate, and then put together to form the chain. The invention consists in an ornamental chain, whereof the links are connected together by open spiral links B, finished before being connected together, the connection being made by springing the finished links into each other in the manner described. A and B represent the links of the chain. The links A are round and closed, and are made and polished or colored separately from the other links. The links B, which constitute the peculiar feature of my invention, are formed of one or more coils of tubing of the proper length, so as to form a double spring link. Into each end of the tube forming the link B is soldered a small shot, as shown in the drawing, which shot gives a finish to the link. The links B may then be colored or polished, and the chain is formed by springing the links into each other. * * * * By this construction, the links may be made and finished in quantities, and the chain formed from the finished links by springing them into each other, to produce any desired combinations of the links of the same or different kinds. Finishing the separate links in this way enables them to be more perfectly polished or colored, and with a greatly diminished expenditure of labor and time, and enables the links to be put together without injuring them in the least, however highly they may be polished or colored." The claims of the inventor are: "(1.) An ornamental chain for necklaces, &c., formed of alternate closed links A and open spiral links B, substantially as shown and described; (2.) The open spiral links B, formed of coils of tubing, substantially as shown and described."

Ornamental gold chains, formed of alternate closed links and spiral links, or of spiral links alone, have long been known. Chains composed of split rings which are "sprung" into each other, or into a solid link, are familiar articles, and there can be no novelty in the mere shape or form of the chain, or of the link which is shown in the drawings of the patent. The distinctive feature of the invention does not consist in the fact that the link is spiral, but does consist in the construction of the open spiral link from a specified material, viz., gold tubing. The article which is called tubing, in the jeweller's art, is made by drawing a strip of gold through a draw-plate, the gold strip having been placed around a copper wire in such a manner as to encase the wire. The copper wire, with the strip of gold around it, is then wound upon a mandrel and cut into proper lengths. The copper is destroyed by acid, leaving a hollow spiral link, which is bound with wire and annealed. The wire is then unfastened, and the link which is thus made possesses a peculiar elasticity not affected by the annealing, is easily separated and united to another link without any injury to itself or to the solid link into which it is sprung, and constantly preserves its elasticity and shape.

The discovery which led to the invention consisted in the discovery of the fact that links made of tubing possessed a peculiar elasticity which was unaffected by annealing. The invention was the application of this discovery to the production of a new and useful result, namely, the manufacture from tubing of ornamental chains which possess the following elements of novelty and utility: First. All the links can be completely finished and then put together without injury to the chain, and thereby the article can be produced at a much less expense than had previously been necessary. Gold chains which are constructed in any other manner must be finished or polished or colored after the chain is completely formed, which is a difficult and somewhat expensive part of the manufacture, while, inasmuch as their links are sufficiently elastic to be united together or sprung upon a solid link without injury to any part of the chain, the separate links can be made in quantities, and completely finished and polished before being united. Second. The elasticity of the spiral links is such that the chain can easily be separated by the fingers of the owner, and united in different forms and for different purposes, and reunited in the original chain, without detriment to the polish of the links, and with no loss of their elasticity. As has already been suggested, these features of novelty and utility do not result from the fact that the chain is made in part from a spiral link, but from the fact that the spiral link is manufactured from a material which possesses a peculiar quality of permanent elasticity. The invention consists in the fact, that whether the inventor was or was not the first person to discover the peculiarity, he first utilized the discovery, and applied the peculiar property of the material to a useful result in the manufacture of chains.

It being self-evident that chains composed of spiral links have been well known, it was insisted by the defendants that the chains heretofore in use possessed substantially the same qualities which are attributed to the patented article, and that the patented article has no advantage over the chains which were introduced as exhibits, and which were made of gold split rings, or split links, in various forms. But, it was satisfactorily proved, that the split rings which are manufactured from solid gold wire compressed in dies, and made elastic by hammering, are not sufficiently elastic to permit the chain to be joined without injury to the material into which the split link is sprung, and this injury renders necessary a repolishing or finishing of the completed article. Again, if the chain of split gold links is taken apart, the act of separation causes the coil to spring asunder, so that it loses its shape and its beauty, and, if a necessity of annealing arises, the process of annealing destroys its elasticity. The difference between the patented article and a chain made of split gold rings is clearly marked. It is a difference in kind and not merely in degree.

Testimony was also offered by the defendants to prove that chains of spiral links, made of tubing, had been in use prior to the date of the invention, but the evidence failed to satisfy me that chains of open and unsoldered spiral links, made of tubing, had been manufactured prior to the date of the patent. Links had been made of tubing, which, after being united in a chain, were soldered together, and thus a chain was made which could not be taken apart, and which required finishing and polishing after it was soldered together. The testimony did not show that the plaintiffs' invention of the open spiral link from tubing had been practically anticipated by others.

A large serpentine bracelet, made of a coil of gold tubing, to be worn upon the forearm, and to be kept in its place by pressure, was also introduced as an anticipating device. It manifestly is a very different article from a chain, and the fact that gold tubing was known and used in the manufacture of jewelry was conceded by the plaintiffs.

It was also suggested by the defendants, that the specification does not describe the process of manufacture of the spiral link with the exactness which is requisite. The manner in which gold tubing is manufactured is well known to all persons skilled in the art. After having been compressed around copper wire, it wound upon a mandrel, the wire is then removed by acid, and the coil of tubing, having been secured with wire, is annealed into the proper shape. This process is thoroughly understood by the manufacturing jeweller. It would have been a waste of words to explain the method of manufacture to a class of persons who are sufficiently informed, when they are told that the link is "formed of one or more coils of tubing of the proper length, so as to form a double spring link."

The first claim is not a claim for an ornamental chain composed of alternate closed links and open spiral links, without reference to the material of which the spiral link is made, but it is a claim for a chain composed of alternate closed links and open spiral links formed of one or more coils of gold tubing, as shown and described. The finish which is given to the chain by the shot at the end of the open link is not a material part of the invention.

There should be a decree for an injunction, and a reference to a master to take and state the account.

[NOTE. This case was subsequently heard upon exceptions to the master's report. The report was confirmed. Case No. 9,908. From the final decree entered an appeal was taken to the supreme court, where the patent was held void. 102 U. S. 112.]

In the case of a patent for an ornamental chain, as a new article of manufacture, where there is a difference in kind between the patented chain and prior chains, and where what was open to the public could not make a chain like the patented article in its peculiar characteristics, the patentee is not, in ascertaining the damages sustained by him by the infringement of his patent, limited to the advantage derived by the defendant from using the peculiar features of the patented chain over what advantage he would have had from using what was so open to the public.

Henry Baldwin, Jr., for defendants.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The defendants except to the master's report in regard to the amount of damages found to have been sustained by the plaintiffs, by reason of the infringement of their patent. The principal exception is stated in two forms—that, inasmuch as the defendants had a right to make chains of alternate links, and to use tubing for one link, provided it was soldered so as to make that link closed, the question to be determined by the master was, 1st, What advantage was derived by the defendants from using the open links over what they would have had in using closed links made of tubing? Or, 2d, What advantage have the defendants gained, by reason of having used open spiral links of gold tubing, over what would have enured from the use of open spiral links of solid wire?

The patented article was a new ornamental chain or necklace, a new article of manufacture, and the first claim has been held by this court to be a claim for a chain composed of alternate closed links and open spiral links formed of one or more coils of gold tubing. Mulford v. Pearce [Case No. 9,907]. The distinctive feature of the invention, it was held, did not consist in the fact that the link was spiral, but did consist in the construction of the open spiral link from a specified material, viz., gold tubing. The two elements of utility and novelty which the new article possesses are described in the opinion, in which it was shown that these elements did not exist either in a soldered chain of tubing, which could not be taken apart, and which required finishing and polishing after it was put together, or in a chain made of split gold rings of solid wire. It was said that the difference between the latter article and the patented chain was clearly marked and was a difference in kind. The patented and the unpatented articles are entirely distinct from each other. By the use of closed or soldered links of tubing, or links of solid wire, the manufacturer cannot obtain the result which is found in the patented invention, and, therefore, the principle which was decided in Mowry v. Whitney, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 620, and which is invoked by the defendants, is not applicable. That was a case of a new process of manufacture, and the court say that the proper inquiry was, what was the advantage in bringing the article by the patented process to a state of perfection, over bringing it to the same state by other processes open to the public, and which would be equally beneficial. In this case, the links of a chain which are open to the public, cannot, from their nature, make a chain which is like the patented article in its peculiar characteristics. The master might as well undertake to estimate the advantage which the patented article possesses over any other gold chains, as over those which the defendants have selected.

The master seems to me to have observed, in this case, the rules which have heretofore been sanctioned by the circuit and supreme courts. The cases of Buck v. Hermance [Case No. 2,082]; Pitts v. Hall [Id. 11,192]; Cowing v. Rumsey [Id. 3,296]; Livingston v. Jones [Id. 8,414]; Seymour v. McCormick, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 480, are in point.

In regard to the motion for treble damages, I do not perceive any adequate reason which calls upon the court to exercise its discretionary power to increase the actual damages.

The master's report is confirmed, and the exceptions are disallowed. The motion to increase the damages is denied.

[For another case involving this patent, see note to Mulford v. Pearce, Case No. 9,907.]

[The final decree entered in this case was reversed upon appeal by the defendants to the supreme court, when the patent was held void. 102 U. S. 112.]

[22 Law Rep. 276; 42 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 191.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Florida. 1859.

SALVAGE — APPORTIONMENT BETWEEN CARGO, FREIGHT, AND VESSEL—DESTRUCTION OF VESSEL—CARE OF PROPERTY SAVED—EMBEZZLEMENT — NEGLIGENCE — INNOCENT OWNER OF SALVOR VESSEL—SAVING LIFE.

1. Where a ship and cargo, accidentally stranded, are saved by lightening the ship, by carrying out anchors, or by other common or continuous labor or service, carried on with a view to the saving of both ship and cargo, the salvage expenses are properly to be apportioned upon the ship, freight, and cargo, in proportion to their respective values, as in a case of general average.

2. But where the ship is lost, and the voyage broken up, no such rule obtains; but each article of the cargo is charged with its own particular expenses of saving. The interests of the parties are sundered by the destruction of the ship, and the maxim "Sauve qui peut" applies.

[1] [42 Hunt. Mer. Mag. 191, contains only a partial report.]

3. By the maritime law, salvors are bound to exercise the same degree of diligence in keeping the property in their custody, that a prudent man ordinarily exercises in keeping his own property.

4. Embezzlement, or a fraudulent concealment, of any of the goods saved, works a forfeiture of the salvage of the guilty party.

5. Slight negligence in taking care of the property saved, diminishes the amount of salvage; gross negligence works a total denial or forfeiture of salvage, in the same manner as embezzlement.

6. Salvors are bound to use every reasonable degree of diligence to prevent plunderage by others.

7. The owner of a salvor vessel, himself being innocent, is entitled to compensation for the use of his vessel where a valuable salvage-service has been rendered, notwithstanding the negligence or misconduct of the crew.

8. The master and crew of a transient or trading vessel, which in the course of her voyage accidentally falls in with a vessel in distress or abandoned, and renders salvage-services, are not, while performing such services, acting within, but beyond, the scope of their employment, as the agents or servants of the owner. Consequently, he is not liable for loss or damage caused by their misfeasance or nonfeasance while thus employed.

9. But the master and crew of a vessel employed in the business of performing salvage services, as that business is conducted on the southern coast of Florida, are to be considered as the agents and servants of the owner, while engaged in such business. He is consequently, liable for loss or damage caused by their torts, frauds, collusions, negligences or ignorance in saving, preserving, or accounting for the property, or in any other matter within the scope of their employment.

10. Salvage for saving life, unconnected with the saving of property, is not allowed, except for saving the life of a slave.

11. If life is saved in connection with property, it is proper for the court, reasonably to enhance the salvage on that account.

12. If, in a case of shipwreck, one set of salvors saves life, but no property, and another saves property, each should be compensated out of the property saved, according to the merit of its services.

13. The sum allowed for saving life is in the nature of a general salvage charge upon all the property saved.

14. There is no implied obligation on the part of the owner of a transient or trading vessel, which in the course of her voyage, accidentally falls in with a vessel in distress or abandoned, and renders salvage assistance, that his vessel is seaworthy, or fit for that service. He is therefore entitled to salvage for the service rendered, notwithstanding the unseaworthiness of his vessel, and, is not liable for loss or damage caused by such unseaworthiness, there being no fraudulent misrepresentation, or concealment, on his part, as to its condition.

15. But there is an implied undertaking on the part of the owner of a vessel employed on the coast of Florida, in the business of saving shipwrecked property, that his vessel is seaworthy, and fit for the business she is engaged in. He is therefore liable for loss or damage caused by the leaky condition of his vessel; and is also liable to have his salvage diminished or forfeited, on account of his neglect to keep his vessel in good condition.

16. Salvage claimed for saving passengers, and refused to the owner of the wrecking vessel, on account of its leaky condition. Refused to the crew, on account of their being in such a state of intoxication as to be unfit for service, at a time when their services were needed. Fifty dollars allowed to the master, and twenty to the cook, of a wrecking vessel for saving the lives of twenty-six passengers.

17. The officers and crews of public vessels are entitled to salvage for their personal services, in the same manner as other persons. But as they risk no property, and their time is paid for by the public, they ought to be satisfied with a less rate of compensation than would be allowed to other persons for like services.

18. One hundred dollars allowed for saving the crew of the ship.

19. In a case of shipwreck and total loss of the ship, the court allowed salvage as follows: 5 per cent. for saving specie. 25 per cent. for saving dry dock cotton. 45 per cent. for saving cotton submerged under water, between decks; and 55 per cent. for saving cotton out of the lower hold, by diving in from eight to sixteen feet of water. Shares forfeited for negligence.

[Cited in Pent v. The Ocean Belle, Case No. 10,961.]

This suit was instituted by several distinct sets of salvors, numbering in all some one hundred and fifty or more persons, to recover salvage for their services in saving a considerable portion of the cargo and materials of the ship Mulhouse, Wilner, master, of and from New Orleans, and bound to Havre in France. The ship sailed from New Orleans laden with 2689 bales of cotton, and $25,500 in silver coin, and on the 26th day of March last stranded upon that part of the Florida reef known as the "Quick Sands," an exposed reef situated out of sight of land, and about thirty miles to the westward of this port. Before assistance could be obtained, the ship bilged, filled with water, and, a day or two after, drove into deeper water, heeled over and sunk so low in the water as to submerge her upper hatches, leaving her upper rail and bulwark, as she lay careened, out of water; all the rest of the ship was under water. The libellants and petitioners saved from the wreck,—the crew, twenty-six passengers, the money, and 2,102 bales of cotton. The more particular facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the court, which we are obliged somewhat to condense.

Winer Bethel, for libellants.

J. L. Tatum and W. C. Maloney, for certain petitioners.

MARVIN, District Judge. Where a ship and cargo, accidentally stranded, are saved by lightening the ship by carrying out anchors, or by other common or continuous labor or service, carried on with a view to the saving of both ship and cargo, the salvage expenses are properly to be apportioned upon the ship, freight and cargo, in proportion to their respective values, as in a case of general average. Moran v. Jones, 7 El. & Bl. 523; Bedford Ins. Co. v. Parker, 2 Pick. 1; 11 Pick. 90; Beran v. Bank of U. S., 4

Whart. 301; The Emma, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 315; Nelson v. Belmont, 5 Duer, 310. In this class of cases, each article of the cargo—whether it be of great value and little bulk, and so easily saved, as money or jewelry, or of great bulk and little value, as coal or lumber, and so saved with difficulty—is charged with the same rate of salvage as the ship or freight, or any other article of the cargo. Beran v. Bank of U. S., 4 Whart. 301; Abb. Shipp. pt. 4, c. 10, § 12 et seq. For the interests of all the parties being connected in a common enterprise, and in the service being a common or continuous service carried on for the common benefit, the law considers that the parties are benefited by the service in equal proportions, and that, therefore, they ought to be charged with equal proportions of the expense,—"Qui sentit commodum sentire debit et onus." But where, as in the present case, the ship is lost, and the voyage broken up, no such rule obtains, but each article of the cargo or invoice is to be charged with its own particular expenses of saving. The interests of the parties are sundered by the destruction of the ship, and the maxim "Sauve qui peut,"—"Save who can,"—applies. It is like the case of a fire, on land, where each person saves his own goods at his own proper charge, and without any connection with his neighbor. The Samuel, 15 Jur. 407; s. c., 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 581; Bridge v. Niagara Ins. Co., 1 Hall, 468; Emerigon, tom. 1, p. 612; Perkins' Abb. Shipp, pt. 4, c. 10, § 4, in notis; Marv. Wr. & Salv. §§ 164–167. In the present case, the ship being a general ship and accidentally lost, and the voyage broken up, it becomes the duty of the court to discriminate between the different articles saved, and to shape its decree in such a manner that each article shall be charged with its own separate salvage, determined in amount according to the labor expended and risk encountered in saving it, notwithstanding the fact that the master, as the common agent of all the shippers, claims the whole cargo by a single conjoint claim.

The sloop Beckwith, Parke, master, was one of the first vessels at the wreck. When the sloop arrived, there were six or seven feet of water in the ship's hold. More men and vessels were deemed necessary to save the ship and cargo. Captain Wilner, accordingly, determined to load the sloop, and proceed without delay to Key West for further assistance. He put on board the sloop sixty-seven bales of cotton, and five kegs, containing $25,500 in silver coin, and proceeded in the sloop to this port. Arrived at anchor in the harbor, at about ten o'clock at night, his business required him to go on shore and the master of the sloop and two of her crew took him in their boat and landed him. The master of the sloop went to his house, and remained there all night. The two men got intoxicated, and remained on shore several hours—precisely how long does not appear. Two men were left on board the sloop. Whether they continued awake or went to sleep does not appear. Between two and three o'clock in the night, some men from the shore went on board the sloop and stole one of the kegs containing $5,000. Before, however, they had succeeded in getting it on shore, Baker, Roberts, and Preston, three fishermen, who had risen early in the morning, in order to market their fish, missed their boat; and, while looking for it, they discovered a boat coming towards the shore, with three men in it. They hailed the men, and challenged the boat as theirs. They soon heard a plunge in the water, near where the boat then was, and thought one of the men had fallen overboard. The three men, however, landed on the wharf, and disappeared, without being recognized, in the dim starlight. About seven or eight o'clock in the morning, the fishermen, hearing of the loss of the money, suspected that the men who had taken their boat so unceremoniously, had taken the money also; and they thought it likely that the money might be found at the place whence proceeded the sound of the plunge. Acting on this idea, they soon realized the truth of their conjectures, and found the money sunk in seven or eight feet of water. They restored it to the captain of the ship. They claim compensation in the nature of salvage for this service.

Now, it is very plain, upon the foregoing statement of facts, that Parke, master and part-owner of the sloop, both as master and part-owner; Rand, mate; Noyes and Robinson, seamen; composing the whole crew who came up in the sloop from the wreck, and upon whom the duty of watching and taking care of the goods committed to their keeping was devolved, have forfeited their shares of the salvage, both upon the money and upon the cotton, on account of their neglect to take proper care of the money. Their duty was obvious. They were each and every of them, bound to take the same kind of care, and exercise the same degree of diligence in keeping the property placed in their custody, that a prudent man ordinarily takes and exercises in keeping his own property. Tested by this rule, it is plain that they were guilty, not of ordinary neglect merely, but of gross negligence—so gross, that it produces a suspicion that they were in collusion with the thieves. But it is not necessary to accuse them of larceny or embezzlement. Their shares are as much liable to forfeiture for so gross a neglect of duty, as for embezzlement or larceny. "The maritime law," says Justice Story, "demands most emphatically from salvors, scrupulous good faith and uprightness of conduct—giving them a liberal reward for fidelity and vigilance, and visiting them with severe reprobation and diminished compensation for every negligence." The Boston [Case No. 1,673]. "Salvors," says Judge Ware, "are not only bound to scrupulous honesty themselves, but while the property is in their custody, they are jointly required to employ every reasonable degree of diligence to prevent it from plunderage by others. Any negligence in this respect if not visited with an entire forfeiture of salvage, will be remembered in fixing the amount." The John Perkins [Id. 7,360]. The supreme court, in the case of The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240, reduced the share of the mate to that of a common seaman, because he had neglected to use due diligence to prevent pilfering from the cargo saved. To encourage good conduct, the maritime law, on grounds of policy, compensates the services of a meritorious salvor, where the amount of property saved is large, with a reward,—a gratuity,—something over and above a quantum meruit for ordinary work and labor. On the same grounds of policy, it diminishes, denies or forfeits the reward, according to the demerit of the salvor. The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240. The reason for this diminution or forfeiture is, not so much that the owner of the property saved may in this way, be indemnified, in whole or in part, for the loss or damage caused by the misconduct, though this is by no means overlooked, as that the misconduct impairs or destroys the merit of the delinquent and renders him unworthy of its reward. Accordingly, the extent of the diminution or forfeiture is measured, not so much by the amount of the loss or damage sustained by the owner of the property saved, as by the moral quality or degree of turpitude of the act complained of. The Cape Packet, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 122. Embezzlement or concealment of a penny's worth of the goods saved, works a forfeiture of the guilty party's share of the salvage, however large it may be (The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240; The Bello Corrunes, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 152; The Boston [supra]), though, at the same time his sincere repentance and tender of amends, will operate as a condonation of the offence, and restore him to his original rights. Laws of Oleron, art. 13; The Rising Sun [Case No. 11,858]; Perkins' Abb. Shipp. pt. 5, c. 3, § 4, in notis. In the present case, gross neglect—a serious offence—works a forfeiture of an amount of salvage exceeding any loss the owner of the money has sustained. In The Glory, 14 Jur. 676; s. c., 2 Eng. Law & Eq. 554, Dr. Lushington diminished the salvage two-thirds on account of the misconduct of the salvors, in preventing the employment of a steam-tug, though no loss or damage accrued to the owner of the property saved, on account of such misconduct. In The Cape Packet, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 122, he diminished the salvage, but how much does not appear from the report, on account of an error of judgment or slight carelessness of the salvors, by reason of which the vessel was got ashore a second time; and in The Duke of Manchester, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 470, he refused all salvage, on account of the vessel having been got aground a second time through gross negligence.

It is contended that the share of Shafer, the other part-owner of the Beckwith, ought, also, to be forfeited, not on the ground of any fault on his part, but on the ground of his legal liability for the faults of his crew. Admitting, for the present, that the owner of a wrecking vessel, like the owner of any other vessel, is liable to third persons for loss or damage caused by the negligence of his crew, yet it does not follow that in addition to this he is also, in such cases, to be denied all compensation for the use of his vessel. It is difficult to extract from the reported cases, any general rule on this subject. I think, however, that none of the cases conflict with the idea, that whenever a valuable salvage service has been performed by the master and crew—a real benefit done to the owners of the property saved—the owner of the salvor vessel, being innocent, is entitled, in equity and good conscience, to be remunerated for the use of his vessel, according to the actual service rendered and benefit conferred, notwithstanding any neglect or misconduct of the master or crew, working a forfeiture of their shares. His claim to salvage is founded on the equity of compensating him for the use of his vessel, when the owner of the property saved has been benefited thereby. It is not the use of the vessel alone that entitles him to be considered as a salvor, but its use producing a benefit to the owner of the property saved—making it thereby equitable that the latter should pay the former a reasonable compensation. Embezzlement of a part of the goods saved by the salvor crew does not work a forfeiture or diminution of the shares of the owner of the salvor vessel, without any fault on his part; for, notwithstanding such embezzlement, a real and substantial salvage service may have been and ordinarily has been rendered, for which it is just that he, being innocent, should be compensated. The Rising Sun [supra]; The Blaireau, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 240; The Boston [supra]. The decisions in the cases of The Duke of Manchester, 2 W. Rob. Adm. 470, The Cape Packet, 3 W. Rob. Adm. 122, and a few others of a similar character, in which the salvage was either wholly withheld or diminished in amount, both as to the owner and crew, on account of the misconduct of the latter, seem at first sight to be at variance with the rule as above stated. But upon a more careful consideration of these cases, I think this apparent conflict disappears. In the cases named, the salvors, through carelessness and negligence, got the vessels ashore a second time. Damage was incurred thereby, and further assistance was made necessary. Considering these facts, and taking into account the chances that the vessels might, possibly, have been relieved by their own masters and crews, had no assistance been offered, or that other persons, more careful, might have become the salvors, it becomes doubtful whether the owners of the property were really benefited at all, or more than a very little by the supposed salvage-services. If the consequences of the fraud, negligence, or carelessness, or ignorance, of the salvor crew, so immediately connect themselves with the rendition of the services, that the value of the latter is thereby greatly diminished or destroyed, little or no benefit is done the owner of the property saved by their services, little or no salvage is earned, and consequently, the owner of the salvor vessel is entitled to little or no compensation for the use of his vessel. But if, on the other hand, a truly valuable salvage service has been rendered, no misconduct of the master or crew ought to deprive the owner of a just reward for the use of his vessel.

In the present case, a real and valuable salvage-service has been performed by the master and crew of the Beckwith. Shafer, the part-owner, is innocent of any participation in their misconduct, either by concurrent connivance or subsequent acquiescence: Immediately on being informed of the loss of the money, he took vigorous measures to recover it, and to detect and punish the thieves. It is true the money was not recovered by means of his exertions; but he did what was his duty to do in the matter. I think that his share of the salvage ought not to be forfeited or withheld, but that he ought to recover a reasonable compensation for the use of his vessel. The men of the sloop's crew who remained behind at the wreck, at work, are, of course, innocent of any participation in the negligence here imputed to the others, and are entitled to their full shares of the salvage.

But it is argued, that whether the shares of Shafer should be forfeited or not, he is, at least, bound to make good the loss or damage occasioned by the larceny of the money; that is to say, to pay the sum which may be awarded to the three fishermen for finding and restoring it. Salvors are not common carriers; and if he is liable at all, it must be upon the ground that the owner of a vessel employed in the business of wrecking, is liable for damage caused by the misfeasance or nonfeasance of the master and crew, acting within the scope of their employment. It is a general doctrine of law, that the principal is held liable to third persons, in a civil suit, for the frauds, deceits, concealments, misrepresentations, torts, negligence, and other malfeasances, or misfeasances and omissions of duty, of his agent in the course of his employment, although the principal did not authorize, or justify, or participate in, or, indeed, know of such misconduct, or even if he forbade the acts, or disapproved of them. Story, Ag. § 452, and cases there cited. This doctrine obtains in the maritime as well as in the common and civil law. By the maritime law, the owner of a ship is considered as the principal, and the master and crew as his servants or agents. He is, consequently, held liable for damages or losses sustained by the shipper of goods, or other third person, caused by their fraud, negligence, unskillfulness, or tortious act, in the course of their employment. Chamberlain v. Ward, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 548; The Druid, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 391; Stone v. Ketland [Case No. 13,483]; Abb. Shipp. pt. 2, c. 4, § 1; Id. pt. 3, c. 1, § 1; Id. pt. 4, c. 5, § 3; Id. pt. 4, c. 6, § 1. Admitting the law to be so in ordinary cases of merchant or trading vessels, yet, nevertheless, it is argued that the maritime law does not impose so rigorous and so exact a responsibility on the owners of wrecking vessels; that they are not common carriers; are not bound by any charter-party, bill of lading, or other express contract; but are salvors; and that no decision has ever yet been made declaring the owner of a salvor vessel, as such and without an express contract, to be responsible for losses or damages caused by the fraud, negligence, or tortious acts of the salvor crew. It is admitted that within our knowledge, no such decision has been made. But the question now before the court for its decision, is not a general one; it is not whether the owner of every kind of salvor vessel is thus liable, but whether the owner of a particular kind of vessel—a vessel employed in the business of rendering salvage-services as a business,—is thus liable. It is obvious that this question could only arise in districts where wrecking is carried on as a business, as it is on this coast, and among the Bahama Islands. It has never been distinctly presented to this court for its decision, before the present time; and I am not aware that it has ever arisen in the vice-admiralty court of the Bahamas.

There is a plain difference between the nature and extent of the liability of an owner of a trading vessel, which in the course of a voyage accidentally falls in with another vessel, abandoned or in distress, and renders salvage-services, and the nature and extent of the liability of an owner of a vessel employed in the business of rendering salvage-services, as a business. In the case of a trading vessel, the master and crew are not acting within the scope of their employment while engaged in rendering such services, and consequently are not, quoad hoc, the servants or agents of the owner. Their employment is, to navigate their vessel and complete their voyage. And, although, they are permitted, in the master's discretion, to engage in a salvage enterprise which may present itself in the course of their voyage, yet such enterprise is wholly beyond and outside of the range of their employment, and not in the contemplation of the owner or themselves at the time of their engagement. Consequently, the owner is not liable for their misfeasances, or nonfeasances while engaged in such enterprise. But in the case of a vessel employed in the business of rendering salvage-services as a business, the performance of such services, the accomplishment of such enterprise, is the very object for which the master and crew are engaged by the owner. As this business is conducted on this coast, the owner furnishes and supplies the vessel, and appoints and removes the master, and through him, the crew. The salvages earned are divided among them into shares—the owner drawing one-half, the master and crew the other half. It is a regular business—a steady employment. But it is argued that inasmuch as according to this arrangement the owner does not pay the crew wages, and they work for themselves as well as for him, they are not his servants or agents, but are acting in their own right and upon their own independent responsibility. But I think it too plain for argument, that the payment of wages is not at all essential to the relation of master and servant. This relation grows out of the fact of the employment, independent of the mode of payment. The case is analogous to that of a privateer. The owner of a privateer, in time of war, fits out and supplies the vessel, and engages the crew. The object of their employment is, to capture the vessels of the enemy, as prizes of war. They are paid no wages, but are paid in shares of prize-money. They work quite as much for themselves, and quite as much in their own rights, and on their own responsibility, as the persons on board a wrecking vessel do; yet, by the universal maritime law, they are held to be the servants and agents of the owner of the privateer; so that if, in the execution of the business of their employment, loss or damage happens to any third person by reason of their torts, trespass, negligence, fraud, ignorance, or want of proper skill, the owner of the privateer is held liable. The Amiable Nancy [Case No. 331]; s. c., 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 546; The Nostra Signora de los Dolores, 1 Dod. 290; The Anna Maria, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 327; The Die Fire Damer, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 357; The Revenge [Case No. 3,877]; Perkins' Abb. pt. 2, c. 2, § 5, in notis. The case of a fishing vessel is also analogous; the owner being held liable for the negligence of the crew, though they are paid in shares of the earnings of the voyage. The Dundee, 1 Hagg. Adm. 109. Indeed, I think it would be a strange anomaly in the law, that the owner of a vessel employed in any kind of business, should not be held liable to third persons for the misfeasance and nonfeasance of the master and crew, acting within the scope of their employment, without any regard to the terms of hiring or mode of payment. His liability in such cases, is, however, limited by a late act of congress to the value or amount of his interest in the vessel. Act March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 635].

It follows from what has been said, that, the Beckwith being employed, at the time, in wrecking as a business, the owners would have been liable to the extent of the value of their interest in the vessel, for the loss of the money, had it not been found and restored. As it is they are liable for the actual damage, if any, caused by the larceny. But if we take into account the value of the forfeited shares (and I see no good reason why we should not) it will be seen that the owner of the money has suffered no loss by the larceny; but on the contrary, he has been gainer. The value of the forfeited shares, to be restored to the owner of the money, has been ascertained to be $605.62, and the sum intended to be allowed the three fishermen, for finding and restoring the money, is $250. The difference is an actual gain or saving to the owner of the money. But it is argued that he is entitled to the forfeited shares and also to the damages. However this may be as against the actual wrong-doers, I am not prepared to say that, this is true as against an innocent party. Forfeited shares are usually made to enure wholly to the benefit of the owners of the property; but not always. Sometimes they are made to enure to the benefit, in part or in whole, of co-salvors. What interest shall be benefited by the forfeiture, is a question of sound judicial discretion. So that the owner of the money is not entitled, of absolute right, to the forfeited shares. By their being decreed to him, in the present case, he is fully indemnified by the actual wrong-doers, against any loss or damage caused by their negligence. I cannot see the justice of his making a further demand upon the owner of the Beckwith, who is innocent of any blame.

The sloop Globe was among the first vessels at the wreck. She took on board and brought to this port, twenty-six passengers and their baggage, but no cargo nor materials. The schooner Tortugas brought off the ship's crew, when they became no longer of any use on board. Salvage is claimed for these services. Compensation for saving life, except the life of a slave unconnected with the saving of property, is left by the law to the voluntary bounty of individuals. The Aid, 1 Hagg. Adm. 84; The Zephyrus, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 330. Indeed, if no property is saved, no means are supplied by which the court can reward the salvor. A suit in personam, for salvage for saving the life of a free person, would be a novelty and probably could not be maintained, unless under very special circumstances, of an express contract. But if life is saved in connection with property, it is proper for the court to take notice of that fact, and increase the salvage accordingly. The Emblem [Case No. 4,434]; The Queen Mab, 3 Hagg. Adm. 242; The Aid, supra; Abb. Shipp. pt. 4, c. 12, § 5. The fact that the property has been saved by other vessels, does not Deprive the Globe and Tortugas of a right to a just compensation for their services in saving the lives of the passengers and crew. If this could be so—if any advantage in the salvage could be obtained by saving the property rather than the lives—a strong temptation would be held out to salvors, in many instances, to gratify their avarice at the expense of their feelings of humanity. In cases of shipwreck, if one set of salvors saves life and another property, each is to be compensated out of the property saved, according to the merit of their respective services. The Genesee Chief [12 How. (53 U. S.) 443]. As to the right to compensation it can make no difference, in principle, whether the set of salvors who saves life, saves property also or not; for the sum allowed for saving life, ought not to be charged wholly upon the particular goods, if any, that may happen to have been saved by the same salvors in immediate connection with the saving of life, but upon all the goods saved from the wreck, by all the different salvors, in proportion to their value. It is, in such cases, in the nature of a general-average charge.

As regards the demand of the Globe, the proof shows that she was in a leaky and unseaworthy condition at the time the service was rendered, and that the crew, except the master and cook, were unfit for duty, on account of their being in a state of intoxication. The passengers were obliged to keep the pump going, nearly or quite all the time, to prevent the vessel's sinking. Under these circumstances it may well be doubted whether reciprocal services were not performed—whether the passengers did not in fact, save the Globe, quite as much as the Globe saved the passengers. But, be this as it may, the owners of the Globe are not entitled to compensation for this service, on account of the unseaworthy condition of the vessel. In considering this point, it is necessary to revert to the distinction before noticed, between the liability of a transient or trading vessel, performing salvage-services in the course of its voyage, and the liability of the owner of a wrecking vessel employed in the business of rendering salvage-services. In the case of the transient or trading vessel, there is no implied understanding or obligation on the part of the owner, that his vessel is seaworthy or fit for the service. Wrecking is not his business. Yet, his vessel may be the only one which can be had to render the assistance required. Its employment may be the best or only thing that can be done. If, therefore, in the absence of a better vessel, and without misrepresentation or concealment, as to its condition, his vessel renders beneficial services, he ought to be compensated. Nor ought he to be held liable for damage to the goods saved caused by the leaky condition of his vessel, without any fraud or negligence on his part. But in the case of a vessel employed in the business of performing salvage-services, there is an implied undertaking on the part of the owner, that his vessel is seaworthy, and fit for the business she is engaged in. It was accordingly held by this court, in the case of the bark Pacific [Case No. 10,642], that the owner of a vessel employed in the business of wrecking was liable for damage happening to goods, taken on board from a wreck, caused by the leaky condition of his vessel. Indeed, he has no right, legal or moral, to engage in this business with an unseaworthy vessel. It is an act of recklessness and carelessness, wholly inconsistent with that good faith and meritorious conduct which entitle the salvor to a reward. The act of congress, too, requires the vessel to be seaworthy, before it can be licensed to engage in the wrecking business. The passengers concur in saying, that the master and Cook of the Globe were sober, and energetic in the discharge of their duties. I think it proper therefore, to allow the master, who had been but recently appointed, and who knew nothing of the unseaworthiness of the vessel, fifty dollars for his services in saving the passengers, and for his polite and kind attentions to them. And I allow the cook twenty dollars. Salvage to the rest of the crew must be disallowed, on account of their being unfit for duty, in consequence of their being drunk.

Touching the services rendered by the schooner Tortugas, in bringing the ship's crew to the port, it is to be remarked that this vessel was, at the time, a transport vessel belonging to the United States. This fact, however, does not deprive the master and crew of a right to a just compensation for their services, though it does diminish the amount below what would, ordinarily, be allowed for similar services performed by a trading or wrecking vessel. For, as they risked no property of their own, and their time was paid for by the public, a less sum than would be allowed other persons not so situated, for similar services, would be a reasonable compensation. They are entitled to no advantage from the use of the vessel, but the benefit of its use enures solely to the owners of the property saved. They are paid for their own personal services only. The Mary Ann, 1 Hagg. Adm. 158; The Wilsons, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 172; Robson v. The Huntress [Case No. 11,971]; The Amistad, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 518. Under the circumstances, I think one hundred dollars divided between the master and crew, is a reasonable salvage.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 20, 1869.

CONTEMPT—POWER TO DISCHARGE FROM PRISON—PARDONING POWER—APPLICATION TO PRESIDENT.

1. Where a fine was imposed upon a person by this court, as a punishment for a contempt of this court, committed by violating an injunction issued by this court, and it was ordered that he should stand committed until the fine should be paid, and he applied to his court to be discharged from imprisonment, on the ground that he was unable to pay the fine: Held, that this court would not exercise the power invoked, at least until the president should disclaim the power to relieve the applicant by a pardon.

[Cited in Fischer v. Hayes, 6 Fed. 73, 74. Disapproved in Hendryx v. Fitzpatrick, 19 Fed. 811.]

2. A contempt of this court is an offence against the United States, an adjudication by the court that the contempt has been committed is a conviction, and a commitment thereon is execution.

[Cited in Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 362, 33 Pac. 1113.]

3. This court has no power to discharge or remit the sentence, but it falls within the pardoning power vested in the president by the constitution.

4. The power of granting a pardon in such a case has been claimed by the executive department as a part of its constitutional prerogative.

5. Disobedience to lawful process of a court of the United States is, equally with misbehavior in its presence, as a contempt of court, within such pardoning power.

[Cited in Kirk v. Milwaukee Dust Collector Manuf'g Co., 26 Fed. 506.]

6. Where a fine is imposed by this court, as a punishment for a contempt, the case is none the less within the pardoning power of the president, because the amount of the fine is directed by this court, in the order imposing the fine, to be paid to the plaintiff in a suit in which an injunction was issued, a violation of which constituted the contempt, towards the reimbursement of his expenses in the attachment proceedings in respect of such contempt.

[Cited in Searls v. Worden, 13 Fed. 717; Wells v. Oregon Ry. & Nav. Co., 19 Fed. 23; Hendryx v. Fitzpatrick, Id. 811; Kirk v. Milwaukee Dust Collector Manuf'g Co., 26 Fed. 508.]

7. If the right to such fine be regarded as a vested private right in such plaintiff, existing in the shape of a judgment, this court has no right to discharge it.

[This was a suit by Henry B. Goodyear and others against William Mullee and John Miller for infringement of patent for improvement in manufacture of hard rubber. There was a decree and injunction for the plaintiffs. Case unreported. Attachments were subsequently issued against the defendants for violating the injunction. Case No. 5,577. Subsequently, the defendant Mullee was released upon his own recognizance. Case No. 5,578. At a still later date he was again arrested on attachment and fined $2,500. Case unreported. The case is now heard upon his application to be released from confinement.]

This was a renewal of an application, heretofore made to this court, to relieve the applicant from imprisonment.

John L. Overfield, for applicant.

William J. A. Fuller and Mr. Abbett, opposed.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. On a motion for an attachment against the applicant as a defendant in a suit in equity in this court, he was adjudged to have been guilty of a contempt of this court, by violating an injunction issued by this court, and, on the 27th of June, 1868, a fine of $2,500 was imposed on him, as a punishment for such contempt, and it was ordered that he should stand committed until the fine should be paid. After having been imprisoned for some time under such sentence, he presented a petition to this court, praying for his discharge, on the ground that he was unable to pay the fine. The decision of the court thereon was that it had no jurisdiction or power to grant the prayer of the petition, and that relief must be sought by an application to the president of the United States. I then said: "By the constitution (article 2, § 2, subd. 1) the president is invested with power 'to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.' No such power is conferred upon any other officer or upon any court. A contempt of court is an offence against the United States. In the present case, there is a judgment judicially declaring the contempt and offence. In Ex parte Kearney, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 38, 43, the supreme court says: 'When a court commits a party for a contempt, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence is execution.' After a conviction and a commitment for a contempt, the court has no more power to discharge or remit the sentence than it has in the case of a conviction and commitment for any other crime or offence against the United States. And such has been the practical construction of the provision of the constitution in regard to pardons. In the case of one Dixon, a fine was imposed upon him by the circuit court of the United States for the district of Mississippi, for a contempt of court. He applied to the president for a pardon. The attorney general, Mr. Gilpin, (3 Op. Attys. Gen. 622,) decided that the pardoning power extended to such a case, and that the contempt was an offence within the language of the provision of the constitution. I fully concur in this view; and it necessarily follows, that, if the power of relieving from the sentence imposed on Mullee falls within the pardoning power of the president, it is exclusive in the president, and cannot be exercised by this court."

After this decision was made, the applicant applied to the president for a pardon, and his application was entertained and denied. The denial was not put on any want of power in the president to grant the pardon asked for, but was based on the facts shown in the case. The application to this court to discharge the prisoner is now renewed. No new views are presented as to the power of the court to grant the relief asked, and I must decline to exercise the power invoked, at least until the executive department of the government disclaims its power to relieve the party by a pardon. From what took place in the Case of Dixon, and what has transpired in this case, I must hold that the power of granting a pardon in a case like the present is claimed by the executive department as a part of its constitutional prerogative. From the report of the Case of Dixon, it appears that the pardon was recommended by Mr. Justice McKinley, the associate justice of the supreme court of the United States whose circuit embraced at the time the district of Mississippi, and Judge Gholson, who was at the time the district judge of the United States for that district. As the report states that the contempt was committed by an affray between Dixon and another person in the presence of the judges of the circuit court of the United States, at Jackson, in the state of Mississippi, it must be inferred that Mr. Justice McKinley and Judge Gholson were those judges. The punishment they inflicted was a fine, and, as they recommended the case to the president as a proper one for a pardon, they must necessarily have been of the opinion that they had no power to relieve the party. Nor is there any distinction to be drawn between the Case of Dixon and the present case, growing out of the fact that, in the Case of Dixon, the offence was an affray in the presence of the court, while in the present case it was a disobedience to a lawful process of the court. By the 1st section of the act of March 2d, 1831, (4 Stat. 487,) misbehavior in the presence of a court and disobedience to lawful process of a court are placed on the same footing, in respect of being contempts of court. The inquiry made of the attorney general, in the Case of Dixon, was, whether the executive authority to pardon properly extended to that case. In his opinion, given to the secretary of state, in February, 1841, the attorney general says: "If we adopt, as the supreme court of the United States has decided we should do, the principles established by the common law respecting the operation of a pardon, there can be no doubt it may embrace such a case. A pardon has been held to extend to a contempt committed in Westminster Hall, under circumstances not materially different from those which occurred in the case submitted to the president. I am, therefore, of opinion, that, should the president consider the facts such as to justify the exercise of his constitutional 'power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States,' there is nothing in the character of this offence which withdraws it from the general authority."

In the Case of Rowan, 4 Op. Attys. Gen. 458, in 1845, Attorney General Mason concurred in the opinion of Mr. Gilpin in the Case of Dixon. In the Case of Drayton and Sears, 5 Op. Attys. Gen. 579, in 1852, Drayton and Sears had been indicted and convicted in the criminal court for the District of Columbia and county of Washington, under a statute, on seventy-four indictments, each of them founded on the transportation of a single slave. On these convictions Drayton was sentenced to be fined in the aggregate, with costs, $11,802.26, and Sears to be fined in the aggregate, with costs, $8,686.12. By the statute, one-half of the fine in each case was to be to the use of the master or owner of the slave, and the other half to the use of the county school or of the county. On the rendition of the judgments, Drayton and Sears were committed by the court to prison until payment of the fines and costs adjudged against them respectively. In pursuance of that commitment they were imprisoned in 1848, and they were still in prison when, in 1852, an application was made to the president for their pardon. The question being referred to the then attorney general, Mr. Crittenden, as to the constitutional power of the president to pardon the men and discharge them from the penalties and imprisonment therefor to which they were sentenced, he decided: (1.) That the pardoning power of the president extended over the whole case, and that by his pardon he might discharge them from prison and remit the fines for which they were imprisoned; (2.) That, if the president could not remit the fines because they had become private property, he could still pardon and release the offending parties from imprisonment, because such imprisonment was part of the proceedings against them as criminals, and at the instance of the United States, and was a thing distinct from any individual right of property in the fines; (3.) That the president might pardon the offence and imprisonment, with an exception or saving as to the fines, in which case the fines would remain as a debt to the United States, or to those to whom the United States had granted or transferred it, and would be recoverable accordingly by the appropriate legal remedies, which remedies the distributees of the fines would have if they were entitled to any absolute right or property in the fines. The statute, in the Case of Drayton and Sears, imposed only a fine, and the commitment to prison was ordered by the court to enforce the payment of the fines and costs. Mr. Crittenden examines the whole question with fullness, and adopts the view, that the imposition of the fines, into whosoever pockets they might go when collected, was a punishment inflicted, on a public prosecution, for an offence against the United States, and must be regarded as having for its primary, if not its sole, purpose, the vindication of public law and public justice.

I have referred to this Case of Drayton and Sears, because it was suggested on the argument, that, in the present case, the pardoning power of the president could not be invoked, for the reason that, by the judgment of this court, the fine imposed on the applicant is to be paid to the plaintiffs in the suit out of which the attachment proceedings arose. The judgment of this court was, "that the said William Mullee has been guilty of a wilful and persistent disobedience to the order and injunction of this court, and that he be fined therefor the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, the same to be paid to the complainants towards the reimbursement of their expenses in and about such attachment proceedings, and that he stand committed until the said fine be paid." In this particular, the present case is like that of Drayton and Sears. The contempt of court was an offence against the United States, and the fine was inflicted as a punishment therefor.

If the right to the fine should be regarded as a vested private right in the plaintiffs in the suit, existing in the shape of a judgment, this court would have no right to discharge it.

In view of the action of the executive department in the cases referred to, I must again refer the applicant to the president. If the president shall disclaim all right and power, as a part of his constitutional prerogative, to grant any relief in this case, the matter may be again brought before me.

In re MULLER et al.

[Deady, 513; [1] 3 N. B. R. 329 (Quarto, 86); 2 Am. Law T. Rep. Bankr. 33.]

District Court, D. Oregon. Jan. 11, 1869.

BANKRUPTCY—SECTION 40 OF ACT—WARRANT OF POSSESSION—INJUNCTION—CERTAINTY OF PETITION—CONSTRUCTION OF ACT.

1. The prohibition of "further proceedings" in the last clause of section 40 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)] applies only to the direct proceedings upon the petition, and not to collateral proceedings by or against third persons, or even the debtor.

2. Under a warrant to take possession of the property of the debtor, the messenger is authorized to take such property in whosoever hands he may find it; and if by mistake, or otherwise, he should take property not belonging to the debtor, it is no ground for discharging the warrant or vacating the order for its allowance; but the party aggrieved by such wrongful seizure has his remedy against the officer making it.

[Cited in Re Briggs, Case No. 1,869.]

3. Injunctions and warrants may be allowed and issued under section 40 of the bankrupt act without notice to the adverse party.

4. The court takes judicial notice of the acts of congress, and they need not be set forth or referred to in any proceeding before it.

5. The warrant provided for in section 40 of the bankrupt act may issue against the person and property of the debtor, or either of them.

6. The jurisdiction of the bankrupt court to enjoin third persons from interfering with the goods of the debtor, or to issue a warrant to take provisional possession of them, does not depend upon the service of a debtor of a proper order to show cause why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt, but upon the filing of a petition in bankruptcy against such debtor.

7. A petition which states that the debtor committed the alleged acts of bankruptcy, "within six calendar months next preceding the date thereof," and on or about a certain day therein, is sufficiently certain in this respect; and as to third persons, in collateral proceedings, the allegation is sufficient without the mention of a particular day.

8. The allegations in the petition concerning the existence of the debt, or the commission of the acts of bankruptcy, need not be made upon the personal knowledge of the petitioner; but semble, that the deposition thereto should be made upon the knowledge of the deponent, or disclose the grounds of his belief, or the sources of his information.

[Cited in Re Raynor, Case No. 11,597.]

[Cited in Re Butterfield, 6 N. B. R. 258.]

9. The bankrupt act should be construed so as not to permit a petition in bankruptcy to be maintained by a creditor, who became such after the commission of the act of bankruptcy complained of.

10. It is sufficient if the debt of the petitioner existed at the date of the commission of the act of bankruptcy, although not then due.

11. Upon a motion to dissolve an injunction in bankruptcy against third persons, such persons cannot be heard to object to the sufficiency of the petition or the proof of debt, or acts of bankruptcy.

12. The bankrupt act is remedial, and should be construed "with a view to effect its objects, and promote justice" between a debtor and his creditors.

[Quoted in Silverman's Case, Case No. 12,855. Cited in Re Carrier, 47 Fed. 442.]

[In the matter of Max Muller and Max Brentano, bankrupts.]

Lansing Stout, for the motion.

M. W. Fechheimer and William Strong, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. On December 7, 1868, a petition was filed in this court by Benjamin Price, a creditor of the above named M. and B. praying that they be adjudged bankrupts. The claim is stated to be for goods sold and delivered to the alleged bankrupts "within the last two years past," of the value of $3,907.

Three acts of bankruptcy are charged: (1) That said M. and B. being traders under the firm name of Muller and Brentano, and being bankrupt, etc., on November 7, 1868, sold, transferred, etc., their merchandise, accounts and assets to Baum and Wolgennant with intent to defeat, etc., the operation of the bankrupt act. (2) That said M. and B. on the date aforesaid, made the transfer aforesaid to B. and W. with intent to delay, defraud and hinder their creditors; and (3) That said M. and B. on November 10, 1868, paid John Anderson, one of their creditors, with intent to thereby give a preference to such Anderson, and defeat and delay the operation of the bankrupt act.

The proof of debt is made by the petitioning creditor, and states that the debt was due on and before November 23, 1868. The proof of the acts of bankruptcy is made by the attorney in fact of the petitioner (who resides in San Francisco), William J. Hyland. It states that on or about November 7, 1868, M. and B. had in store at Jacksonville, Oregon, merchandise of the value of $35,000, and that at the same time there was due them from solvent persons in the vicinity of Jacksonville, debts of the value of $12,000; and that on said last mentioned date, said M. and

B., with the intent and purpose alleged in the petition, fraudulently sold and transferred all their stock in trade and things in action to B. and W. aforesaid. That said B. and W. were the cousins of M. and B., and the latter was their clerk, and without means, save a small sum due him from M. and B. for services as clerk; and that the means of Baum were not at all adequate or sufficient to make the purchase aforesaid. That such sale and transfer was without consideration, except the small sum due Wolgennant, and that said B. and W. conspired with M. and B. by means of such pretended and fraudulent sale and transfer, to defraud the creditors of said M. and B. and defeat the operation of the bankrupt act. That said B. and W. are wholly irresponsible, that they are disposing of such merchandise below its value, and at auction, and are collecting the debts due M. and B.; and if not prevented, will dispose of said property, so that the creditors of said M. and B. will receive no benefit therefrom. That M. and B. are indebted to persons in San Francisco to the amount of about $35,000, and to other persons in the state of Oregon, a further large sum, to affiant unknown. That these parties all reside at Jacksonville, within a day's journey of California, and that if B. and W. are suffered to remain in possession of the property it will be disposed of, and the parties will leave the state and go beyond the jurisdiction of the court with the proceeds; and that said M. and B. are about to depart from the state and will do so, unless prevented by the order and warrant of this court.

On December 9, on the application of counsel for the petitioning creditor, an order to show cause—form No. 57— was allowed; and also an order directing the issuance of a writ of injunction, forbidding M. and B. and B. and M. from interfering with or disposing of the property and accounts of the alleged bankrupts, and also of a warrant commanding the marshal to take possession of such property, and keep the same until the further order of the court. On December 29, B. and W. by their attorney, filed a motion to dissolve the injunction, and to discharge the property from the warrant. The motion is made upon the papers already mentioned in the case, and the affidavit of O. Jacobs, of Jacksonville. The affiant states that he knows the parties, and that the injunction and warrant herein were served about December 15, 1868. That the goods and merchandise formerly belonging to M. and B., were at the service of said injunction in the exclusive possession of B. and W., as purchasers from said M. and B., and had been in such exclusive possession since November 7, 1868; and that said goods and merchandise were taken from the possession of B. and W. by the messenger, under the warrant aforesaid; and that they are of the value of about $25,000.

The grounds of the motion are set forth therein as follows: (1) There was no authority for the marshal or messenger to seize property in the hands of these parties. (2) The writ of injunction and order to take possession were issued without notice. (3) The order to take possession of goods was not made under any law of the United States. (4) The notice to show cause was and is returnable in January, 1868—a date prior to the act of bankruptcy complained of. (5) The petition fails to show at what time the act of bankruptcy was committed. (6) The charge of bankruptcy is made upon information and belief—there being no positive charge. (7) The proof of indebtedness does not show that the debt of petitioning creditor existed at the time the alleged act of bankruptcy was committed.

Counsel for the petitioning creditor objects to the hearing of the motion at this time, because, the order to show cause not being returned, there is no proof before the court that it has been served upon the debtors. In support of this objection, he cites the last clause of section 40 of the act. I do not think the clause supports the conclusion. The prohibition of "further proceedings" is intended of direct proceedings upon the petition and against the debtor, and not of collateral proceedings by or against third persons or even the debtor.

The only evidence before the court as to the service of the injunction or the execution of the warrant, is contained in the affidavit of Jacobs. Neither of these writs has been returned. The order to show cause is not returnable until January 7. The order allowing the warrant to take possession, to issue, speaks of the goods and effects of the alleged bankrupts, and not those of B. and W. The warrant, I presume, conforms to the order in this respect. I must also presume that the messenger has obeyed the warrant and taken into his possession, the goods and effects of M. and B. in whosesoever hands he found them, and not otherwise. If by mistake or otherwise he took the goods of another, he is liable to the party injured, upon his official bond. This is no more than the responsibility which the common law devolved upon every officer to whom an execution against property was directed. He had to determine at his peril what was the property of the defendant in the writ, and what was not.

Under section 40 of the act, the messenger, under the direction of the warrant, is "to take possession provisionally of all the property and effects of the debtor." And it makes no difference in whose hands he may find them. This is a question of fact for the officer to determine for himself, subject to his responsibility. Taking the affidavit of Jacobs, it appears that this property was in the possession of B. and W. when seized by the messenger, but it does not follow that it was not at the same time the property of M. and B. This question cannot be made or decided upon this motion. But certainly, upon the statements in the petition and accompanying proofs, it was not the property of B. and W. and the affidavit of Jacobs, considering what B. and W. are called upon to show, rather confirms this conclusion than otherwise. The first ground of the motion is thus disposed of.

The second ground is well founded in fact, but immaterial in law. Injunctions in bankruptcy, at least when issued in the primary stage of the proceedings, under section 40 of the act, may be allowed and issued without notice. The provision in the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334), forbidding the writ to be granted in a suit in equity, without notice to the adverse party, does not apply to proceedings in the district court under the bankrupt act. Ex parte Smith [Case No. 12,994]; Ex parte Carlton [Id. 2,415]; cited in Brightly, Fed. Dig. 456; Ex parte Donaldson [Case No. 3,981]; In re Wallace [Id. 17,094]. In re Wallace was decided in this court, upon able argument and careful consideration. Upon further argument the conclusion seems to be sound in principle and upon authority. The rule in the judiciary act requiring notice in all cases of injunction is an arbitrary and anomalous one, and if applied to the summary proceedings under the bankrupt act, would in most instances render it nugatory. Notice to B. and W. of the application for the injunction in this case, would have been notice to them to leave this jurisdiction with the property or its proceeds, which they could have done, if so disposed. Doubtless the court may require notice to be given to the adverse party, and even that the applicant shall give security for damages, whenever it thinks the ends of justice or the security of parties require it.

Possession of the goods was not taken under the order, but the warrant which issued pursuant to the order. To authorize the allowance of this order or the issuing of this warrant, notice to the adverse party was not necessary. On the argument nothing was shown in support of this objection, neither can there be.

In support of the third ground of the motion, counsel shows that the order allowing the issuing of the warrant, excepts from its operation such "goods as are exempt from the operation of the act of congress entitled, 'An act to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1868." There being no bankrupt act of this date, the conclusion is, that the order for the warrant to take possession was not made under any law of the United States. This is an extremely technical objection, and admits of a sufficient and equally technical answer. The order for the warrant does not profess to be made under the act of March 2, 1868, but it only excepts from the operation of such warrant the goods exempt by that act. There being no bankrupt act of such date, the exemption is nugatory, and the warrant to take possession is without qualification in this respect. But the recital of the title of the bankrupt act in any proceeding, is mere matter of form. The recital in this order gives the date of the act incorrectly—1868—for 1867. But this immaterial mistake can in no way affect the legality of the order. The order would have been sufficient without stating the title or date of the act. The court takes judicial notice of the acts of congress, and they need not be set forth or specially referred to in any proceeding before it.

In support of this ground of the motion, it is also urged that the act (section 40) does not authorize the issue of a warrant against the goods of the alleged bankrupt alone, but that the warrant cannot issue unless it be against his person, and also "to take possession provisionally of all the property and effects of the debtor," as well. This construction of the act does not seem to me to be warranted by the language or object of the section. If the showing be such as section 40 requires, the warrant may issue against the person and goods or either of them. The greater includes the less, and neither the alleged bankrupts or B. and W., can or ought to be heard to complain that the petitioning creditor has been satisfied to take process against the goods only, because he was entitled to it against the person also. If, in fact, the order and warrant had been for the arrest of both the person and goods, the latter might have been executed against both or either, as the petitioning creditor might direct.

The fourth ground of the motion is based upon the assertion therein, that the order to the debtor to show cause, is by mistake made returnable in January, 1868, instead of 1869. The order has not yet been returned, and there is no evidence before the court that it is returnable at an impossible date. Nor is it apparent, if it be admitted that the order is erroneous in this respect, how the fact can in any way affect the merits of this motion. The jurisdiction of the court to enjoin B. and W. from interfering with the goods of the debtor, or to issue a warrant to take provisional possession of them, is not dependent upon the service on the alleged bankrupts of a proper order to show cause.

As to the fifth ground of the motion, the petition avers that the several acts of bankruptcy complained of, were committed "within six calendar months next preceding the date of the petition," and on or about a certain day in November, 1868. This is sufficient; and, if it were not, to show the actual day, it certainly is, to show that they were committed within six months before filing the petition, and that therefore, this court has jurisdiction to adjudge M. and B. bankrupts on account of them. Whether the particular day within this six months is stated or not, does not matter so far as this motion is concerned. When the alleged bankrupts appear to make defense to this petition, the question can be made as to whether the particular day is sufficiently stated, and not otherwise or before.

As to the sixth ground of the motion, it is not well founded in fact. The charge of bankruptcy is not made upon information and belief. The allegation in the petition is positive and unqualified as to the transfer of the stock of merchandise and book accounts to B. and W., and also the payment to Anderson, with intent to prefer him. The same is true of the deposition to the acts of bankruptcy. True, the petition states that in addition to the merchandise and accounts, there was transferred "all the available assets" of M. and B. and this averment as to the assets is upon information and belief. This averment is a mere make-weight, and it is perfectly immaterial whether it is in the petition or not. The allegations as to the transfer of the merchandise and accounts, and of the payment with intent to give a preference, are all or either of them sufficient allegations of acts of bankruptcy. Nor is there anything in the act, or the orders and forms, or the nature of the proceeding, which requires that the allegations in the petition either as to the debt or the acts of bankruptcy, should be made upon the personal knowledge of the petitioner. The petition must be made by the creditor, and in most instances, can only be made upon information and belief. In addition to the petition there must be a deposition to the debt and the act of bankruptcy. In these it may be proper that the witness should speak from his own knowledge, or at least disclose the grounds of his belief, or the sources of his information. Much will depend upon the circumstances of the particular case.

By the seventh ground of the motion, it is asserted that the debt of the petitioning creditor was not in existence when the acts of bankruptcy complained of were committed. Under the English bankrupt act, it was held that a commission ought not to be granted on the petition of a creditor whose debt was not in existence when the act of bankruptcy was committed. 1 Bac. Abr. 558. This statute (6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 12), allowed the commission to issue upon the petition of any creditor or creditors of the alleged bankrupt (1 Bac. Abr. 552). The act of March 2, 1867, allows any creditor whose debt is of sufficient amount, and provable under the act to maintain the petition to have his debtor adjudged a bankrupt (section 29). A debt contracted after the act of bankruptcy is provable under the act (section 19). The letter of the English and American statutes is not materially different in this respect. Taken literally, they both would permit a petition to be maintained by a creditor whose debt arose after the commission of the act of bankruptcy complained of. The American statute ought, I think, to be construed as the English one, so as not to permit a petition to be maintained by a creditor whose debt was contracted after the act of bankruptcy happened. This is in accordance with the decision of this court in Re Burk [Case No. 2,156] that a creditor should not be heard to object to the discharge of a voluntary bankrupt for matters which occurred before he became such creditor. The construction is supported by the familiar principle, that no one ought to be allowed to complain of that which does not injure him. In case the act of bankruptcy was secret and unknown to the creditor at the time of contracting his debt, the rule might not apply.

The proof of debt in this case, and the petition substantially shows that M. and B., on November 23, 1868, and before, were indebted to the petitioner in the sum of near $4,000. The petition was verified on the last mentioned date, and the acts were committed some days before in the same month. The indebtedness arose upon the sale and delivery of goods prior to, and within two years of the date of the petition, to be paid for upon request. The allegations of the petition are framed upon the idea that the debt did not become due until payment was requested, and that the commencement of this proceeding was a request. This is probably a correct conclusion in the premises. But the question is not when the debt became due and payable, but when did it commence to exist. It commenced with the delivery of the goods, or any portion of them equal in value to the sum of $250. The proof and petition were made in San Francisco, and they are very slovenly and unskillfully prepared in this respect, as well as some others. But I think it a fair inference from the facts stated, and the nature of the transaction that the debt of the petitioner or at least $250 of it existed before November 7, 1868—the date of the first acts of bankruptcy.

This disposes of the motion. It is disallowed. I have considered this motion as if Baum and Wolgennant were entitled to make these objections. But as to the 4, 5, 6 and 7 grounds of the motion, I do not think they have any right to be heard. The questions raised on these points are between the petitioning creditor and the alleged bankrupts, and not B. and W. In the course of the argument, counsel for B. and W. have insisted that this is a special proceeding, purely statutory, and that the act must be taken most strictly against the creditor, and in favor of the bankrupt. In my judgment this view of the matter is not supported by reason or authority. The act does not attempt to punish the bankrupt, but to distribute his property fairly and impartially between his creditors, to whom in justice it belongs. It is remedial, and seeks to protect the honest creditor from being overreached and defrauded by the unscrupulous. It is intended to relieve the honest but unfortunate debtor from the burden of liabilities which he cannot discharge, and allow him to commence the business of life anew. The power to pass bankrupt laws is one of the express grants of power to the national government; and history teaches that the want of a uniform law on this subject throughout the states, was one of the prominent causes which led to the assembling of the constitutional convention and consequent formation and adoption of the federal constitution.

Such a statute is not to be construed strictly, as if it were an obscure or special penal enactment, and this was the sixteenth instead of the nineteenth century. The act establishes a system and regulates, in all their details, the relative rights and duties of debtor and creditor. Such an act must be construed—as indeed should all acts—"according to the fair import of its terms with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice."

Case No. 9,913.

MULLER'S CASE.

[20 Leg. Int. 301; [1] 5 Phila. 289; 5 Leg. & Ins. Rep. 146.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Sept. 14, 1863.

EXTRADITION—PUBLIC PROSECUTION—DEPOSITIONS TAKEN—CRIMES NAMED IN TREATY—DISCHARGE UNDER PREVIOUS APPLICATION.

1. The treaties between the United States and certain Europeon states for the mutual extradition of fugitives charged with certain crimes, do not require that an application for extradition shall have been preceded in the country of the government making it, by a charge, or public accusation, of equivalent effect with an indictment. It suffices that there has, within the jurisdiction of the country making the application, been an authorized proceeding under which evidence has been, or might lawfully have been, taken there, with a view to a criminal prosecution, or to deciding whether to institute one.

2. Depositions preliminarily taken there with such a view should, if certified according to the act of 22d June, 1860 [12 Stat. 84], or otherwise duly attested, be admitted in evidence if they would be receivable in evidence there in support of a charge of a crime cognizable under such a treaty.

3. The crimes are named in the treaties with reference to known definitions in the system of general jurisprudence. But the specific applications of the definitions are determinable in particular cases, by the jurisprudence and legislation of the respective places of arrest.

4. In the United States, the jurisprudence and legislation must, under a charge of the forgery of a private writing, be those of the state of the Union in which the arrest is made.

5. The application for extradition may be sustained under a law of the state enacted after the date of the treaty, but in force at the time of the commission of the offence, and at the time of the hearing under the application.

6. A discharge of the accused party, under a previous application for extradition upon the same charge, heard in another state, does not preclude the renewal of the application, where the case does not appear to have been fully investigated and considered under the former proceeding.

[1] [Reprinted from 20 Leg. Int. 301, by permission.]

[This was a proceeding in the case of Trangott Muller, a forger and fugitive from justice.]

CADWALADER, District Judge. Of the treaties now in force on the subject of extradition, the earliest is that of 1842, with Great Britain. [8 Stat. 576.] Its form has, in general, been followed in the others. An occasional recurrence to it will prevent their phraseology from being applied with too much latitude. But an adherence to it so close as to exclude reasonable cosmopolitan interpretation of them should be not less avoided as too narrow.

In this case, at the hearing in July last, the proofs of identity showed that the person arrested was the party against whom the charge is made on behalf of the government of Saxony. There could be no doubt that he was the person who, under a former application made on the part of the same government, on the same grounds, before the judge of like jurisdiction for the Southern district of Ohio, had there been discharged from custody. Except the proofs of his identity, the evidence offered there and rejected, was the same as that which has been adduced and admitted. The jurisprudence and legislation of Ohio on the subject of forgery, were, for all the purposes of the case, the same, in effect, as the jurisprudence and legislation of Pennsylvania. The sufficiency, also, of evidence, to justify an apprehension and commitment for trial, would, in each state, as may be assumed, have been determinable by the same rules, if the offence had been charged as committed within her limits. I was, nevertheless, of opinion that the discharge in Ohio had not precluded a renewal here of the application. But this opinion was not founded upon any such literal interpretation of the treaty as would make its meaning dependent upon simple and rigid analogies to cases of commitment for trial by magistrates here and in England, on preliminary charges of crime, after previous refusals of magistrates to commit. I thought, on the contrary, and still think, that the personal status of an inhabitant of, or a sojourner in, the United States, might be too irrevocably involved in the result of a question of extradition to make so narrow a rule of decision sufficient for the exigencies of such a question. I therefore thought that there might be a case in which the previous rejection of such an application by such a judge would perhaps preclude its renewal—especially in the same judicial district or in another judicial district of the same state—but that this was not such a case.

The other questions were those of the sufficiency of the charge, and of the sufficiency of the proofs.

How, and how far, the crime in question must have been the subject of a charge or public accusation, in the country whose government asks the extradition, does not appear distinctly in the treaties, or in any opinion of the supreme court of the United States. The subject has been discussed elsewhere, but not satisfactorily. Its difficulties are, in part, removed by the acts of congress of 1848 [9 Stat. 302] and 1860 [supra]. The argument that there must have been some authorized public accusation of equivalent effect with what is here, and in England, called an indictment, cannot prevail. To adopt such a rule, would interpolate in the treaties a condition requiring what might, in some countries, be considered objectionable as a partial prejudication of guilt in cases to be afterwards tried. The treaty with Great Britain certainly requires no previous indictment or presentment. Between the United States and that country, such a condition, if intended, would have been expressed. In Kaine's Case the only process had been a warrant issued in Ireland under an ex parte deposition. The warrant had not been executed, service of it having been successfully evaded. This warrant and a copy of the deposition, certified and attested under the second section of the act of 1848, appear to have been thought sufficient, together, to satisfy the requirements of the treaty. 14 How. [55 U. S.] 105, 108, 109, 115, 116. These requirements might, on either side of the Atlantic, be satisfied without even a warrant. Thus, in Pennsylvania, as in England, a constable or other officer may make an arrest for murder or robbery, on the spot, without a warrant, and may bring the party arrested at once before a magistrate, by whom depositions under the statutes of Philip and Mary may be taken forthwith. 6 Bin. 318; 8 Serg. & R. 49; Johnson v. Tompkins [Case No. 7,416]; 4 Coke, 40b; 9 Coke, 66a; Ld. Raym. 1297; Dougl. 358; 6 Barn. & C. 635; St. 1 & 2 Phil. & M. c. 13; and St. 2 & 3 Phil. & M. c. 10; 3 Bin. 621. The party thus arrested may, before any commitment, or any process against him, escape, and may afterwards be found on the other side of the Atlantic, within the jurisdiction of one of the contracting governments. Under the latter jurisdiction, the depositions, or duly attested copies, with proof that they were taken under such a summary proceeding, would sustain an application for extradition, if they sufficiently proved the commission of the offence. Copies of such depositions taken in England would, if certified under the act of congress of 1860, be receivable in evidence here, under this act, if not independently of it. So far as concerns mere accusation in the country whose government makes the application, any proceeding in that country under which evidence has been, or might lawfully be taken there, with a view either to a future criminal prosecution, or to deciding whether to institute one, satisfies the requirements of the treaty. Under the act of 1860, depositions preliminarily taken with such a view should be admitted in evidence here, if they would be receivable in evidence there. In this case, the proceedings in Saxony, through the verification of the Saxon authorities, attested by the consul general of the United States at Leipsig, were duly authenticated; and it sufficiently appeared that before the Saxon tribunals having cognizance of the question whether this party should be apprehended and committed for trial, the depositions of which copies were certified would have been receivable in evidence.

The remaining question was whether these depositions would, within the meaning of the treaty, have sufficed to justify his apprehension and commitment for trial under a charge of forgery, if the offence had been committed here. They fully sufficed to prove the act which was charged. Such an act, wherever punishable as a crime, is properly classed as a specific offence under the general head of "forgery." In the jurisprudence of Pennsylvania, at the date of the treaty with Saxony, this act would not have been punishable as a crime. But before its commission in Saxony, the Pennsylvania statute of March 31, 1860, § 169 [Laws, 1860, p. 423], had made such an act indictable and punishable as a misdemeanor. In the series of treaties which have been mentioned, certain offences, including forgery, are named with reference to their definitions in the system of general jurisprudence. But the treaties require the specific application of the definitions to be conformable, in particular cases, to the jurisprudence and legislation of the respective places where the parties may be arrested; and likewise require the application of local rules of decision as to the sufficiency of the evidence. The act in question—though generically forgery wherever criminal—might be specifically criminal in one place, but not in another. I thought that the question depended upon the law of Pennsylvania under the statute of 1860, and that the case, on the part of the Saxon government had, therefore been made.

There is no jurisprudence or common law of the government of the United States. See [U. S. v. Hudson] 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 32; [U. S. v. Coolidge] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 415; [Wheaton v. Peters] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 658; [Kendall v. Stoker] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 104. No legislation of their government, independently of the jurisprudence and legislation of the several states, can have been expected by those who made the treaties ever to give specific definition of certain crimes mentioned in them. No such legislation as to forgery or private writings, which is the offence here charged, can have been expected. As to crime, and others, local definitions and rules might be not less different in Ohio and Pennsylvania and in Scotland and in England, or might be more different. In framing the treaty of 1842 with Great Britain, these local differences must have been mutually considered by the governments of the two contracting nations. I thought that the decision of the case could not be affected by the date of the Pennsylvania statute. It was posterior to the treaty with Saxony, but anterior to the commission of the offence charged. Local specific definitions of an offence, which may be safely applied, are those in force, both when it was committed and at the time of hearing. If their application is not ex post facto, the question whether they were in force at the dates of the respective treaties cannot be material. Diplomatic arrangements whose effect may depend upon internal regulations of the contracting states are almost necessarily dependent more or less upon prospective legislation. Such regulations are almost always liable to change in the course of internal administration. They may also undergo modification in order to meet occcasional requirements of international comity, or of the conventional arrangements themselves. These requirements may be only honorary, and the legislation consequently optional. But the treaties require that such definitions and rules as are from time to time observable under the local jurisdiction of each contracting government shall be applied by it in favor of the other.

The questions which have been reviewed, whether difficult or not, were important; and upon one, if not more of them, differences of opinion were supposed to exist. At my request, the case has been reargued on all the points before the judge of the supreme court for the circuit and myself. The only question which has caused us any embarrassment is that of the effect of the party's discharge in Ohio. Had that been a decision upon the legal merits of the case, pronounced after full investigation and consideration of them, our opinion might probably have been that a renewal of the Saxon government's application should not be entertained. But the proceeding there, as far as we know, consisted in the mere summary rejection of the evidence offered, for what reason we are not informed. The same evidence, with the proofs of identity, has been, so far as appears, considered for the first time under the present application. The act of 1848 should be interpreted, and the regulations prescribed in it administered, with reference to the international character of the obligation of extradition. The conventional obligation is not fulfilled where an application for extradition is, in any mode or degree, slighted by one of the contracting governments, to which it has been properly addressed. This must be considered in a case like the present, where provisions of the treaty are executed through judicial organs of the latter government. We therefore think, that until a decision founded upon adequate investigation and full consideration, the proceedings under successive applications for extradition are, in effect, if not in character, analogous to successive preliminary hearings before local committing magistrates under ordinary charges of crime. On all the other points of the case we are of the opinion which I entertained at the close of the former hearing.

The prisoner was accordingly remanded into custody, to await the order of the president.

Case No. 9,914.

MULLER v. BOHLENS.

[2 Wash. C. C. 378.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1809.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—DEL CREDERE AGENT—REMITTANCE IN BILLS—LIABILITY.

The defendants sold goods consigned to them by the plaintiff under a del credere commission, and received in payment, for part of the sales, the bill of exchange of W. They were authorized by the plaintiff to remit in bills, and with the other proceeds of sales, they purchased a bill drawn by I. Both bills were protested. The court held the defendants liable for W.'s bill, it having been received in payment for a debt guarantied by them; but not for the bill drawn by I., which was remitted according to order.

[Cited in brief in Lewis v. Brehme, 33 Md. 421.]

The defendants received consignments from the plaintiff, and engaged to sell them on a del credere commission, and to guaranty the debts. He sold, to one Walter, part of the goods, and when the money for which the goods were sold became due, he took his bill of exchange for the amount, which he remitted to the agent of the plaintiff. The defendants also purchased another bill of a Mr. Imbert, which they remitted to the plaintiff, in part of the sales of his goods. Both bills were protested, and Walter and Imbert very soon after became insolvent, but the latter remained in good credit until he stopped. The defendants relied upon a receipt in full, and a discharge, given by one Muller, the attorney of the plaintiff, to the defendants, in which these two bills were charged to the plaintiff. But, having only a notarial copy of the letter of attorney, the court refused to let the copy be read. The law of this state authorizes the recording letters of attorney, upon their being acknowledged or proved before a notary; but this was neither.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The guarantee of the defendants extended no farther than to the sales and receipts of the money arising from them. As to Imbert's bill, therefore, there is no pretence for charging the defendants with that, as it was a bill purchased by the defendants from a man in good credit, and was purchased for the purpose of a remittance, as the defendants had been directed. But the guarantee extends to Walter's bill, which was not purchased with the proceeds of the plaintiff's goods, but was given by a purchaser of those goods instead of the money. If the defendants were bound to guaranty the payment of this debt when contracted, the guarantee continues, because a bill which is dishonoured, is no payment. The only objection to the plaintiff's recovery of the amount of this bill, is his neglect in not returning the bill, or giving notice of the protest, or rather, the defect of the plaintiff's evidence in accounting for this bill. It does not appear whether Walter's estate made any dividends; if it did, the defendants would have been entitled to come in, if the bill had be returned. This point is left to you, on the evidence.

Verdict for the plaintiff, for the amount of Walter's bill, and interest.

MULLER v. HENRY et al.

[5 Sawy. 464; 7 Reporter, 772.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. May 1, 1879.

INJUNCTION—CONTEMPT—ACTING UNDER AUTHORITY OF ORDINANCE.

1. Certain parties having been injoined from grading a street until the hearing of the cause, or the further order of the court, subsequently proceeded to grade the street under authority of a city ordinance, passed after the issuing of the injunction, without first presenting the ordinance to the court and procuring a dissolution or modification of the injunction: Held, that they were guilty of contempt.

2. A party can only be relieved from the operation of an injunction, absolutely prohibiting the performance of a specific act, by the court granting the injunction.

The bill, supported by numerous affidavits, alleged that the defendants [Joseph Henry and others], without lawful authority, were depositing earth upon certain streets in Napa City and filling them up in such a manner as to dam up water which comes from high ground beyond, upon complainant's lot, occupied as a residence, which water will, by such retention on the lot, create a nuisance, producing irreparable injury by destroying the flowers, shrubbery, and a large number of ornamental trees which have been some twenty years growing upon the lot, and by becoming stagnant and unhealthy, render the lot uninhabitable. The defendants answered denying the effect attributed to the work, and alleging that they were lawfully grading the streets in question in pursuance of an ordinance of the city of Napa. Upon the hearing of an application for a temporary injunction upon the bill, answer, affidavits and charter of the city, the court held that the proceedings of the board of trustees under which the defendants were doing the work were void, by reason of not having been taken in accordance with the requirements of the city charter, and that defendants were unlawfully filling the streets; and being of the opinion, from the facts disclosed by the pleadings and affidavits, that a private nuisance was likely to result from the work, injoined the defendants from "depositing any rock, earth, clay, gravel or other material" on said streets until the hearing, or till the further order of the court. After the issuing of the injunction the board of trustees passed another ordinance authorizing the doing of the same work, which for the purposes of the decision is assumed to have been done in pursuance of the provisions of the charter. Under the authority of these proceedings, without bringing them to the attention of the court, and while the injunction was still in force, the defendants again commenced to fill in the streets as they were doing before they were stopped by the injunction. Upon this proceeding instituted by the complainant [Hermon Muller] to punish them for contempt in violating the injunction, the defendants set up the said subsequent proceedings of the board of trustees as a justification.

B. S. Brooks, for complainant.

T. I. Bergin and Geo. W. Towle, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. After a full examination of the question submitted in this case, in the matter of contempt, and of the authorities bearing on the subject, I am confirmed in the impression, which I had at the hearing, that the parties are in contempt. The order of this court forbids the defendant doing certain specific acts, and those very acts they have performed.

The first question presented upon the application for the injunction, was, as to the validity of the ordinance authorizing the grading of the streets mentioned. The court held that ordinance to be invalid in consequence of a failure on the part of the board of trustees in passing it to pursue the methods prescribed by the statute. Then, there was another question, as to whether or not the work ordered by that ordinance to be done would create a private nuisance. The court was of opinion, from the evidence adduced, that the case was one in which an injunction should be issued until that question could be determined. After the injunction issued, the board of trustees of the city of Napa took proceedings (which, for the purposes of the decision, may be assumed to have been regular) to authorize the grading of the street—the thing which the defendants were prohibited from doing by the injunction of this court; and, under authority of that action on the part of the board of trustees, without moving this court to modify the injunction, or to release them from the restraints which it imposed, the parties proceeded with the work.

[1] [Reported by L. S. B. Sawyer, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 7 Reporter, 772, contains only a partial report.]

In Williamson v. Carnan, 1 Gill & J. 184, I find a case which I think is directly in point, and which fully sustains the impression which I had at the hearing, and which has been deepened and confirmed by subsequent investigation. In that case, the levy court, as it was called, had authorized, by proceedings had for the purpose, the closing of a public road which ran over the lands of the defendant in the injunction suit. The defendant was about to close the road, and an injunction was obtained from the Baltimore county court, sitting in equity, restraining him from so doing. A writ of certiorari had been issued, and a review of the proceedings of the levy court had in the meantime. It turned out that the proceedings of the levy court were invalid for want of formality, and, in consequence of that informality, the proceedings of that court were reversed. The parties interested then again applied to the proper court by petition, in the regular course, and obtained another order for the closing of the road, all the parties interested having notice of this application, and appearing to contest it. In pursuance of this authority, supposing that it would protect him from the operation of the injunction, the party injoined again proceeded to close the road. This, substantially, is an outline of that case. It is rather long, and I shall only cite sufficient of it to show that it is a parallel case with the one now before me. The chancellor says (page 194): "At the March term, 1828, the complainants again by their petition stated, that the defendant, disregarding the said injunction, did by his agents, servants and himself, cause the road mentioned in the injunction to be obstructed on or about the thirteenth of December last, by causing a fence, etc., to be erected, and placing other obstructions on and across the same, etc., as will appear by the affidavits filed at the last term. That although an attachment issued, and was duly served on the defendant, it had not had the effect of causing him to remove the obstructions then existing; but, as would appear by the annexed affidavit, he had additionally obstructed the said road, etc. Prayer for an attachment against defendant, and that he be compelled to place the said road in the same situation as it was previously to his closing the same on or about the thirteenth of December last. An attachment was again ordered and issued, returnable forthwith; and was duly served, etc. The defendant appeared and filed his petition, in which he stated, that the proceedings of the levy court, in reference to the said road having been set aside by the Baltimore county court, upon the hearing and examination thereof, under the writ of certiorari, which had been issued, etc., as will appear by a transcript of the proceedings exhibited, not upon the merits of the case, but for defect of form"—which is the ground upon which these very proceedings are held to be invalid—"as will appear by a copy of the opinion of said court. That the petitioner being advised that that part of the said road called the 'Garrison Forest Road,' mentioned in the proceedings, having become a public road and highway, he, together with other petitioners, taxable inhabitants of the county, made a new application to the levy court, to alter and close the said part of said road; and that the complainants had notice thereof, and attended a meeting of the commissioners appointed under the said application, and opposed the confirmation of the return made by the said commissioners. That on the thirteenth of December, 1827, an order was passed by the commissioners of the county, to whom the powers and duties, heretofore exercised by the levy court, have been transferred, that all that part of the before-mentioned road be shut up and closed; and that the petitioner, or any other person or persons, through whose lands the said old road may have been departed from, by such altering, etc., are authorized to shut up and close the same, as by reference to a copy of the said proceedings exhibited will appear. That the complainants had knowledge of said order of the said commissioners, and that the said order being final and conclusive, without appeal, and no writ of certiorari having been applied for, and the said road so authorized to be closed passing transversely through the farm of the petitioner; and the complainants, by the altering of the said road, having another, and a better and shorter road, and the petitioner being greatly aggrieved by the passing of the said road through his lands, and conceiving himself fully authorized to do so by the said order, he, by virtue of the said order, and not, as he avers, in contempt of the court, did proceed to close the said road; and that he shut up and closed the same without force, etc., and before any attachment had issued against him. That since he has closed the said road he hath removed his inner fences, and planted an orchard on either side of and through the bed of the said road; and that the removal of his fences will be attended with great and irreparable damage to him. Prayer that the said road may be suffered to remain closed, and that he may be released from custody, and that the attachment may be quashed."

There is a long opinion upon the case, of which I shall quote small portions. After stating the circumstances of the case, the chancellor says: "It appears, then, by the defendant's petitions of the third of January and twenty-second of April, that he had conceived himself fully and legally authorized to close this highway, by virtue of the order of the levy court, notwithstanding the injunction of this court, which had positively prohibited him from closing or obstructing it in any way whatever; or, in other words, that the final order he had obtained had virtually, yet effectually and completely, dissolved and annulled the injunction heretofore granted by this court. The defendant made no application or motion to have the injunction dissolved after the second of December, 1826, until the twenty-second of April last. He has not even deigned to speak of the injunction, in the body of either of those petitions, in which he acknowledges and attempts to justify the closing of the road; and yet, in the first, he asks to be permitted to file an amended answer, and to have the bill dismissed; and in the second, he prays that the road may remain closed, and that he may be discharged from the attachment. If the prayer of his first petition had been literally and fully granted, and the bill dismissed, yet that would not have dissolved the injunction, unless it had been so expressly ordered. By the second petition, this court is, in effect, gravely asked to make a most extraordinary transit over all its own proceedings, into those of the levy court; to approve, and act upon them, and totally disregard its own. For, an order of this court, as prayed, that the road should be suffered to remain closed, and that the defendant should be discharged from the attachment, most manifestly, could stand upon no other foundation than a complete affirmance of the proceedings of the levy court, and an entire disregard of all the previous proceedings of this court. I never before heard of such an indirect mode of obtaining a virtual dissolution of an injunction, by bringing to bear upon it a judicial decision of another and totally different tribunal, not exercising or having any appellate jurisdiction over the court whence the injunction issued. An injunction, emanating from a competent authority, is a command of the law; and the citizen is, as I have always understood, bound to yield implicit obedience, until the restriction has been removed by the authority which imposed it."

So, in this case, these parties were injoined from doing a specific thing—from grading this street and filling it up—and they go and get authority from another tribunal, the board of trustees of the city of Napa, to go to work and fill it up, which, if permitted, will virtually work a dissolution of the injunction of this court by the said board.

The court, in the case cited, proceeds to say: "But, if the position assumed by this defendant be correct, then, instead of obeying or moving to dissolve an injunction, a party may avail himself of various modes of getting around, or under, or over it, without being chargeable with the slightest contempt of the law. The judgment of this court, continuing the injunction, was founded upon the proof or admission of certain facts, after hearing both parties, as to the very point whether it ought to be continued or not. But, if it could be indirectly and virtually dissolved by a judgment of the levy court, upon a different case, then it might be evaded by one party without hearing the opposite party as to the former, or any new facts or equity, which he might be able to show, as a most solid ground for its further continuance. The court, commanding obedience to an injunction, might thus be brought into collision with another court, alleged to have sanctioned, or as this defendant has said, ratified the acts in disobedience of it, in which conflict of jurisdiction, the rights of persons and of property, it is evident, must suffer, while he who produced the scuffle might escape with the spoils. Surely, such principles, which, to say the least of them, lead so directly to disorder and confusion, ought not to be tolerated for a moment."

So, in this case, if these parties are to go to another tribunal and get an order which may be legal in itself, and thereby are enabled to "escape with the spoils," and are to experience no trouble from this injunction, certainly disorder and confusion must result from such a state of affairs. "There is absolutely nothing in the prayer of the bill, nor in the writ of injunction itself, which limits the prohibition to a shutting up under the order of the levy court, or under any other particular and specified authority whatever." So, in this case, there is nothing in the injunction that refers at all to the particular action of the board of trustees; it is simply an injunction preventing them from grading that street—"from depositing any rock, earth, clay, ground or other material on" said streets, is the language of the writ—no reference whatever being made to the order of the board. It is not limited to that; it is not an injunction restraining these parties from doing this work under that order, but an injunction positively and absolutely forbidding their proceeding with it at all.

The court proceeds: "Neither the terms of the prayer, nor of the writ, make any allusion whatever to any judicial proceedings of any kind then pending, or thereafter to be instituted. The restriction imposed upon the defendant is as general and comprehensive as it could well be expressed, the clear and unequivocal sense of which is, that the road shall continue to be considered as a public road or highway, which the defendant shall not be permitted to close until he shall produce and show to this court that he had obtained a legal authority to do so. Therefore, the only question now is, whether the acts done by this defendant are such as he was prohibited from doing by the injunction? These acts are the erection of obstructions upon this highway; now these are the very acts which this injunction does most positively and distinctly prohibit."

And so in this case, the injunction was to prohibit these parties from filling up the streets; that is what is stated in distinct terms.

The court continues: "It is true, that if the injunction had prohibited acts of one description from being done, and the party restrained had done acts of another description, he could not, as the defendant has alleged, be charged with a contempt. The injunction did not prohibit him or any other person from instituting any proceedings, or making any application for the purpose of obtaining a legal authority to close the road." So, in this case, the injunction did not prohibit the board of trustees from passing the proper order for the grading of this street. But they did not stop at that. The order having been passed, instead of coming to this court and presenting that order, and showing the fact that they were now in a position to proceed legally and regularly, and obtaining the order of this court allowing them to proceed, the defendants assumed the authority to go further, and, without the authority of the court, to do the very thing which this court enjoined them from doing.

The chancellor then proceeds to say: "Most unquestionably, this defendant cannot be allowed to do so, upon his obtaining an authority to close it, until he has first shown that authority to this court, and upon motion and notice to the opposite party, according to the established practice, obtained a dissolution of that general and unqualified restraint which has been imposed upon him by the injunction. This first cause shown by the defendant for his discharge, being based upon an assumed position not warranted by the proceedings, is therefore deemed insufficient. Indeed, the showing itself seems tacitly to admit the correctness of the charge of contempt, but for that qualification of the injunction which it has assumed, and which has, in fact, no real existence."

Now, that is precisely the position of this case. The parties were grading, or about to grade, this street, assuming to act under the authority of the city board of trustees. By injunction issued from this court they were restrained from carrying on the work—from doing a specific thing. They then went and got another order from the same authority under which they were first acting, as was done in the case from which I have just read; and then, without coming to this court and asking to be relieved from the injunction, on the ground that they now have proper authority, and are proceeding regularly, they undertook to go on and do the specific thing prohibited, and therefore dissolve the injunction granted by this court, by virtue of proceedings of the board of trustees of the city of Napa.

The injunction should be obeyed until it is dissolved by the authority which granted it. Undoubtedly, if a proper showing were made, if the court were satisfied that the injunction should be dissolved, it would be dissolved; but until that is done, the party himself has no right to determine the fact that he has authority to proceed, in violation of the injunction of this court, to perform the acts which have been prohibited.

For the purposes of this motion, it is assumed that the later proceedings of the board of trustees are regular in form—that the ordinance upon its face is valid. From an examination of the ordinance, and of the papers submitted, I understand that no provision has been made for draining off the water when this grade shall be carried out, and thus obviating what is claimed will be a nuisance. If such is the case, although the proceedings of the board may be regular in form, and an ordinance passed strictly in accordance with the provisions of the statutes, there still might result a private nuisance which the authorities of the city of Napa would not be permitted to create. That is one of the questions which is still left for the determination of the court, and the only question left for consideration in the case upon which the injunction issued. If it had been made to appear to the court, after the passage of this recent ordinance, that the grading of the street, without providing for drainage, would not create a private nuisance, the injunction would have been at once dissolved. The court granted the injunction, because it appeared that a private nuisance was likely to be created, and because it appeared that the work was not being done under proper authority; but it does not follow, that even the board of trustees of the city of Napa could take proceedings, even though regular in form, and passed in accordance with the modes provided by the statute, to create a private nuisance. In the case of Spokes v. Banbury Board of Health, L. R. 1 Eq. Cas. 49, the board of health, proceeding strictly in accordance with the terms of the law, proceeded to, and did, cut into a stream which ran through the land of a party below, drains which were necessary to the health of the town, to carry off water and filth, thereby rendering the said party's place uninhabitable. The injured party applied for an injunction, and the court held, in very decided terms, that even though the cutting of the drains were necessary to the health of the town, the authorities could not create such a nuisance, to the destruction of private property.

I only call attention to that case, at this time, in order to show that there are authorities holding that a private nuisance cannot be committed even by municipal authority, as that is one question still undetermined in this case, assuming the proceedings of the board of trustees to be regular in all other particulars. I leave this point open, however, till the hearing. The defendants must, therefore, be adjudged to be in contempt.

They, however, deny any intention of committing any contempt of this court, and assert that they resumed and proceeded with the work under advice of counsel that this later action of the board of trustees was sufficient authority to justify them in proceeding. I do not suppose that the contempt was willful, and I do not propose to be vindictive in inflicting a penalty. The question of punishment for the contempt was not particularly discussed on the hearing, and I do not know what the actual damage to the complainant has been, as there is no special evidence upon that point, and I am, therefore, not prepared at present to announce the penalty which should be inflicted. In order to enable counsel to prepare and produce evidence as to the amount of damage resulting from the performance of this work, which has been done since the issuing of the injunction, I will continue the matter until Monday, the twelfth instant, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

MULLER et al. v. The IGINIA.

[N. Y. Times, Jan. 7, 1863.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Jan., 1863.

CARRIERS—MARITIME TORT—DAMAGE TO CARGO—PRESUMPTION OF NEGLIGENCE—PRESSURE—PERIL OF THE SEA.

[1. Damage to cargo raises an inference that it was caused by the carrier's negligence, rather than by perils of the sea.]

[2. Pressure of one part of a cargo upon another is not a peril of the sea.]

[This was a libel by George J. Muller and others against the ship Iginia, her tackle, etc., for damage to cargo.]

This was a libel filed to recover the value of two casks of wine, shipped, with others, on board the vessel at Antwerp, consigned to the libelants at New York. These two casks, on the arrival of the vessel, were found to be empty. The bill of lading was in the usual form, having the usual exception of losses by perils of sea. These casks were stowed in the ground tier. The evidence was, that the casks themselves were sound, and that they did not shift on the passage over. The respondents proved that the vessel experienced heavy weather, which lasted most of the time for forty days, and that during this time the water brought up by the pumps had a smell of wine. The port warden here certified that the leakage was "apparently caused by working, or pressure of the cargo."

Kaufman, Frank & Wilcoxson, for libelants.

Dukes & Sullivan, for respondents.

Before SHIPMAN, District Judge.

HELD BY THE COURT. That the burden of proof that the loss was occasioned by the perils of the sea is upon the carriers. The Martha [Case No. 9,145]; Bearse v. Ropes [Id. 1,192]; The Emma Johnson [Id. 4,465]. That if the loss of the wine can be fairly attributed to the force of the gale, which the master of the vessel took every precaution to provide against, but failed from no fault of his own, then it falls within the exception of the bill of lading. That on the evidence the proximate cause of the damage was the too heavy pressure to which the casks were subjected by the weight of the cargo upon them. That this was a danger which could and should have been provided against, and the consequences of which must be charged to the ship, and not to the sea.

Decree for libelants for $170.25, the value of the wine, with interest from date of filing the libel.

PARTIES—ALIEN ENEMY.

An alien enemy cannot sustain a suit in the courts of the United States.

This was a bill in equity [by Joseph Mumford against Henry Mumford], upon the face of which it appeared, that the complainant was an alien enemy, to wit, a subject of the king of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, resident within the realm thereof. It was admitted by the counsel on each side, that the fact was truly stated, and thereupon THE COURT ordered the bill to be dismissed, being of opinion that an alien enemy has no persona standi in judicio, and cannot prosecute any suit in the courts of this country. Daubigny v. Davallon, 2 Anstr. 462. Bill dismissed.

EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF PARTIES—ACT MARCH 3, 1865, CONSTRUED.

A servant brought an action against his master for negligence, and during its pendency died. Under the statute of the state by which the action survived, his administrator was substituted as plaintiff, and the action continued in his name, and came on for trial. The servant, before his death, was fully examined, and cross-examined as a witness in his own behalf, and his examination was reduced to the form of a deposition, and, on the trial, was read in evidence to the jury by the administrator against the defendant: Held, under the act of congress of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 533), that the defendant should be allowed to testify on his own behalf as to the matters embraced in the deposition of the plaintiff's intestate.

This action was originally instituted by John Johnson in his life time, to recover for injuries caused, as alleged, by the defendant's negligence. The defendant was a contractor, under the government, for building locks in the canal near Keokuk, and Johnson was employed by him as a laborer. The defendant gave orders to fifteen or twenty men to lift a heavy box, or turntable, and remove it to a designated place, and, in the course of executing this order, Johnson was seriously injured. For the injury thus occasioned, this action was brought by Johnson. Johnson's deposition, after issues settled, was taken upon the whole case, and he was fully examined and cross-examined as to all matters in controversy. Subsequently he died, and, under the statute of the state, his administrator was substituted as plaintiff, and the cause proceeded in his name. On trial, the plaintiff Mumm, as administrator, read in evidence to the jury the above-mentioned deposition of his intestate, the said Johnson, and produced other evidence to the jury in relation to the accident, its cause, and the extent of Johnson's injury. When the plaintiff had rested, the defendant's counsel offered the defendant himself as a witness in his own behalf. The plaintiff's counsel objected, on the ground, that as the plaintiff was an administrator, the defendant was not a competent witness for himself.

[1] [Reported by John Gallison, Esq.]

Craig & Gibbons, for plaintiff.
Gillmore & Anderson, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. This action was brought by Johnson in his life time, for personal injuries to himself, caused by the alleged negligence of the defendant, and pending the action he died, and his administrator was substituted as the party plaintiff, and he seeks to recover for the same injuries for which the action was commenced by Johnson. Under the statute of the state, the action survives, as will be seen by the case of Shafer v. Grimes, 23 Iowa, 550.

It is to be noticed that this is not an action by the administrator, under the statute of the state, to recover damages for the death of Johnson; but it is the original action, brought by Johnson, which did not abate by his death, but, under the statute, survived to his administrator. Johnson, before his death, was examined as a witness in his own behalf, and his examination was reduced to writing, in the form of a deposition, and this deposition has been read in evidence by the plaintiff.

Now, is the defendant, under these circumstances, precluded from testifying to the matters covered by Johnson's evidence, as contained in the deposition read to the jury? Under the act of congress of July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. 351, § 3), and of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 533, § 1), it is my opinion that the defendant should be allowed to testify, if the plaintiff insists upon keeping the testimony of his intestate before the jury.

The first act above cited makes parties competent witnesses in all civil cases; and the second act does not pronounce an absolute disqualification against the living party when the adverse party is an administrator, but enacts that he "shall not be allowed to testify against the other as to any transaction with, or statement by, the testator or intestate, unless called to testify thereto by the opposite party, or required to testify thereto by the court." In this case, the intestate has testified, and his testimony is before the jury; to exclude the defendant from giving his version of the same transaction would be manifestly unfair, and in contravention of the purpose and spirit of the legislation of congress.

Evidence admitted.

MUNCASTER v. MASON et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 521.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1824.

EXECUTION — COUNTERMANDED AT REQUEST OF DEFENDANT—NEW EXECUTION.

If the plaintiff has countermanded his execution at the request of the defendant, to give him time, or if he has been delayed by injunction obtained by the defendant, he may take out a new execution after the expiration of the year and day.

Rule to show cause why four executions, in favor of John Muncaster against J. Mason and W. Jones, should not be quashed, because issued more than a year and day after judgment.

E. J. Lee, for plaintiff, showed for cause, as to two of the executions, that the plaintiff had been delayed by injunction obtained by the defendant Mason, and finally dissolved under a mandate from the supreme court of the United States, and, as to the two other executions, that the plaintiff had issued his executions in due time, but had countermanded them at the particular solicitation of the defendant. See Mitchell v. Cue, 2 Burrows, 660; Phillipps v. Lowndes [Case No. 11,103], in this court, Dec. term, 1805; Craig v. Johnson, Hardin, 529.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra), upon the authority of the cases cited by Mr. Lee, refused to quash the executions, upon the ground that the first executions had been countermanded at the request of the defendant, and by way of indulgence. MUNCH et al. v. The SUCKER STATE.

[4 Chi. Leg. News, 201.]

District Court, D. Minnesota. 1872.

COLLISION—OWNERSHIP OF VESSEL—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—REPAIRS—LOSS OF SERVICES.

1. The ownership of a boat, at least so far as to make out a prima facie case, may be proved in the same manner as of any other chattel.

2. The court states the facts relating to the collision, and finds that the steamer was managed with carelessness and must pay the damage.

3. The amount paid for repairs is a proper item, and the owners of the barge are entitled to recover damages for the loss of her services while she was undergoing repairs, and the court allows the highest rate of interest permitted in Minnesota during the time the barge was undergoing repairs, upon her value as a measure of damages for her detention.

[This was a libel by Emil Munch, Gustave Munch, and Adolph Stierle against the steamer Sucker State.]

H. J. Horn, for libellants.

C. K. Davis, contra.

NELSON, District Judge. The owners of the barge Eveline filed a libel against the steamer Sucker State, her engines, machinery, boat's tackle, apparel and furniture, claiming damages for a collision through the fault of the steamer whereby the barge was severely injured and rendered unserviceable for a long period. The barge was lying safely moored at the levee at the city of Hastings on the Mississippi river when the collision occurred. The steamer was coming down the river on Sept. 1st, 1870, at mid-day, and approaching the city of Hastings headed towards the shore, the current being rapid and the wind blowing fresh and quartering upon the levee, to effect a landing a short distance above the place where the barge was moored. It is claimed that owing to the gross negligence and mismanagement of the steamer, she swung around against the barge as her bow struck the shore with great force, and crushed and broke in her side, so that she rapidly filled with water and was only prevented from sinking by dragging her out upon dry land. The barge was clearly visible by those in charge of the steamer, and it is alleged that the collision took place without any fault of the barge or of her owners. Damages to the amount expended in making necessary repairs are claimed and loss of services at the rate of five dollars per day for forty-seven days. The steamer was arrested pursuant to the process issued and the claimants appeared and entered into a stipulation for an amount sufficient to cover the damages claimed. The claimants in their answer put in issue the ownership of the barge as claimed in the libel, and allege that the barge was old, rotten, leaky and unseaworthy, and they deny that any repairs were rendered necessary or that the libellants lost the use of her by reason of any act committed by the steamer. They allege that a landing was effected at Hastings skillfully and in a seamanlike manner, and that they run alongside of the barge carefully, and deny that the steamer swung around with such force as to crush the barge or injure her as stated in the libel. They charge that if any injury happened, it was owing to the fact that the barge was rotten, old and leaky and unseaworthy.

The right of libellants to enforce their claim as owners was raised on the hearing. The respondents objected to any parol evidence of ownership. An executory contract entered into in writing before the collision for the sale of the barge to two of the libellants was offered, and also the enrollment with a bill of sale accompanying it, but the bill of sale was dated subsequently to the time when the collision occurred. Parol evidence was then offered to show that the barge was really delivered at the date of the executory contract, and that the other libellant purchased an interest in her, and was part owner at the time of the injury. This testimony is admissible as also the further evidence that the bill of sale attached to the enrollment was dated by mistake to conform to the time of enrollment, instead of a period anterior to the collision. The ownership of the boat, at least so far as to make out a prima facie case, may be proved in the same manner as of any other chattel, and the testimony offered showed, unrebutted, a right in the libellants to maintain this action.

The witnesses on both sides testify that the steamer struck the barge in landing, and the weight of evidence sustains the charge in the libel, that it was with great force and accompanied with a crushing sound, that indicated a breaking in of the sides of the barge. The captain of the steamer appears to have appreciated the danger of attempting a landing above the barge, and cautioned the pilot about hazarding it, who in obedience to orders, backed her so as to pass below, but subsequently learning that freight was to be taken on at a warehouse just above, moved up ahead of the barge. In doing this the steamer, when her bow was turned out into the stream, touched the stern of the barge, swung in and lapped her. She struck, according to the testimony of those on shore, with such force as to attract their attention. The mail agent says: "She struck harder than she would have done on still water," but thinks the injury resulted from the barge being rotten and weak. The testimony of those on shore and near the barge, and who went to her assistance and relieved her from water with the pumps, is decisive upon the fact of damage done by the collision, and it is also clear that a landing could have been easily made above or below, without any difficulty, as the levee is some four hundred feet long. The barge also proved to have been unseaworthy. She was built of oak in 1867, just three years previous, and although leaking some, was serviceable, and capable of being used daily. She was safely moored at a public landing, and it was incumbent on the steamer to keep out of her way. By landing as she did she took all of the risk of damage. It was dangerous to swing the steamer against the barge with the wind blowing fresh upon the shore and the current running strong, and she must be held responsible for the loss sustained. The steamboat having the power to be moved and stopped at pleasure, was presumptively managed with carelessness, and must pay the damage.

I am not so clear upon the extent of the liability. The amount paid for repairs is a proper item of allowance, and is sustained as claimed.

Upon the claim for loss of service, there is great difficulty in laying down a certain and safe rule. The doctrine of restitutio in integrum must govern in all cases; but the difficulty is as to the proper application of the maxim. In the case of The Narragansett [Case No. 10,017], the court says: "That it is impossible to fix with exactness the time indispensable for the repair of the injured vessel or the value of her services during the period of her disablement. These particulars must necessarily rest in a great degree upon estimates," but an allowance was made and sustained by the appellate court, with the remark, "that such an allowance for loss of services while the vessel is undergoing repairs, seems proper according to the maritime law." It does not appear in this case, how the amount was arrived at. In the case of The Rhode Island [Id. 11,744], an allowance was made by the commissioner to whom it was referred of a per diem compensation for each day after the collision until after the damaged vessel was repaired, for an amount which, according to the evidence, would have enabled her owners to supply her place with a vessel to perform her work. No vessel to perform her work during the interval was hired, and that was the case here. The court sent the report of the commissioner back disallowed, and ordered six per cent. interest per annum upon the value of the vessel before the damage, to be allowed during the detention, instead of the former allowance. On appeal the action was sustained, and the court say: "The allowance was for a supposed or apparent loss incident to the damage done by the collision in regard to which no settled rule can be found; opinion being conflicting whether anything should be allowed, and if anything, by what measure the allowance should be determined. * * * We sustain it not because it was founded upon any established principles, but because no principle could be found that would justify the adoption of a higher measure of damages in the case." In the case of Williamson v. Barrett, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 101, which was a case at common law, and tried before a jury, in the court below, an exception had been taken to the charge of the court that in addition to damages for an amount expended in repairing the boat, the jury should give damages for the use of her during the time necessary to make the repairs and fit her for business. The court says: "The general rule regulating damages in cases of collision is to allow the injured party an indemnity to the extent of the loss sustained, * * * but there is a good deal of difficulty in, stating the grounds upon which to arrive, in all cases, at the proper measure of that indemnity. * * * The difficulty lies in estimating the damage sustained by the loss of the service of the vessel, while she is undergoing repairs." The question is discussed at some length, and it is said that "the market price for the hire of the vessel which can be determined by the demand in the market for vessels of the same description, and the price which the owner could or might have obtained for his vessel," is as fair a test as can be applied to ascertain the damage. This, no doubt is the ordinary and safe rule, but as was stated by Mr. Justice Catron in his dissenting opinion, "the supposition that the amount of damages can easily be fixed by proof of what the injured boat could have been hired for during her detention, will turn out to be a barren theory on our Western rivers." The claim for the service of the barge in this case, is too high, and I am not satisfied with the testimony offered to sustain it. Her value is fixed at eight hundred dollars as the highest figure. The damage for loss of service claimed, is nearly equal to one-fourth of this sum; and that too for only forty-seven days' service. I do not think it is sufficiently clear that her service was equal to such an amount. She was leaky before the collision and the oakum was out of the seams for some distance along her sides. She stood in need of thorough repair, although her owner might have used her in carrying lumber through the season of navigation. There was a loss of service, however, to the owners, and they are entitled to compensation. It seems to me to be a just and fair indemnity, inasmuch as her owners did not deem it necessary to hire any boat in her place to enable them to continue the business, to allow the highest rate of interest permitted in this state, during the time she was undergoing repairs, upon her value, as a measure of damages for detention. This recognizes the barge as so much capital unemployed and incapable of producing income on account of the collision. I regard this rule of damages justifiable on account of the insufficiency of the testimony to warrant any other estimate. The clerk will make the computation and enter a decree accordingly, with interest and costs.

Dickinson & Dickinson and George Gray, for petitioners.

L. S. Hodges, for respondents.

WITHEY, District Judge. Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co., petition to have Munger & Champlin, copartners, declared bankrupts. There are five acts of bankruptcy charged, which I shall consider as involving but three questions. The first act charged is, that respondents, being insolvent, sold and transferred to divers persons, from time to time, portions of their stock in trade with intent to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act, in this; they ascertained, January 3d, 1870, by taking account of stock, that their liabilities exceeded their assets by about sixteen thousand dollars, and thereafter, in January, February, March, and up to about the 18th day of April, they were endeavoring to effect a compromise of their debts, but were unsuccessful, and at the same time were selling goods from their store to customers in the ordinary way of trade. It is claimed that they thus conducted their business with intent to prevent proceedings against them in bankruptcy, and with intent to defeat the operation of the law. The proofs show that respondents were not only insolvent, but knew they were; that some time in February they endeavored to effect a compromise of their debts at fifty cents, and were not successful, and afterwards in March and April, they sought again to effect a compromise at thirty-five cents, during all which period they continued trading at their store in Kalamazoo as usual, selling to customers at retail from day to day. But there is no proof of intent to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act, unless that kind of management of their business raises the presumption of such intent. In my opinion it does not; on the contrary, their efforts to settle with creditors without going through bankruptcy in court, was entirely legitimate, not prohibited by any provision of the bankrupt law; and continuing to sell goods in the usual way of trade, pending such negotiations, was entirely proper and justifiable, and what they ought to have done, so long as their intention was not fraudulent. Undoubtedly if the proofs showed an intention by the debtors to so conduct their business as to avoid paying their debts, or to prevent their property being applied to the payment of their debts under the provisions of the bankrupt law; preventing proceedings in bankruptcy against them with a view to defeat the provisions of the act, then would be shown such an intent as to require that they be decreed bankrupts. But I find no such fraudulent purpose from the proofs in this case.

Then follows three distinct acts of bankruptcy, but as they raise but one question, I shall consider them together. That question is whether a transfer made by respondents of all their assets not exempt, to George M. Colt, on or about April 18th, 1870, Colt being liable for them as indorser, was with intent either to prefer Colt, or to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act. It is shown that when respondents failed to effect a compromise at fifty cents, they made an effort to get a settlement at thirty-five cents. To this end one of the firm went to New York City, secured a meeting of a majority of their creditors there, stated to them their assets and debts, and asked a settlement at thirty-five cents. Nothing definite was then accomplished, but some of the creditors thought the debtors better keep their store open for the time being, and keep their stock replenished, and do the best they could until something definite could be done. Not long subsequently to that visit to New York, Tefft, Griswold & Kellogg of that city, filed against them a petition to have them declared bankrupts, Mr. Hodges, of Chicago, being attorney for such petitioning creditors. After filing the petition and procuring an order against respondents to show cause, he went to Kalamazoo, saw respondents and Mr. Colt, as a merchant of that place, and then learned that Colt was willing to purchase their assets at a sum which should not exceed forty cents on a dollar of respondents' liabilities, by his notes at six and twelve months, provided respondents could be freed from all their liabilities. Colt was the father-in-law of the respondent Champlin, was fully advised as to their assets and liabilities, was indorser on some of their paper; no question is made but that Colt is perfectly responsible. Hodges thought that the debts could be arranged on that basis, and was employed by respondents to secure the best terms he could from creditors. He accordingly visited New York, Chicago, and other places, and obtained such terms from a portion of the creditors, that although some of them demanded full pay, the aggregate did not exceed forty cents on a dollar of respondents' liabilities. Hodges now visited Kalamazoo again, and informed respondents and Colt of the result of his negotiations, exhibiting his authority from most of the creditors who accepted less than one hundred cents on a dollar of their claims. The result was satisfactory to Colt, inasmuch as by paying a sum equal to forty cents of respondents' debts, they could be released from liability, and his title to the goods be thereby unquestioned. He accordingly took a transfer of their assets, gave his notes payable at six and twelve months to the respective compromising creditors, and agreed to settle with and pay all others of their creditors who had not made compromise terms. Munger & Champlin also signed the compromise notes. Hodges took the notes, transmitted them to creditors, and discontinued the proceedings in bankruptcy against respondents. Colt has settled, or arranged with all the other creditors satisfactorily, at least there is no proof of dissatisfaction on their part. The only difficulty arising out of that sale, and the transactions connected with it, and affording the foundation for this case is, that Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co., of New York, who bring forward this second petition against respondents, and on which this trial is had, authorized Hodges to take for their claim thirty-five cents cash, and Munger & Champlin's note for fifteen cents, making fifty cents; whereas, Hodges accepted thirty-five cents by Colt's and Munger & Champlin's notes at six and twelve months. Hodges informed Munger & Champlin and Colt of the terms named by these creditors on his second visit to Kalamazoo, but he was then and there shown a letter written by a Mr. Clark, from New York, to Mr. Colt, in which he states that Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co. had informed him, after Hodges left New York, that they would take thirty-five cents. Clark was a partner of Colt's, and this letter induced Colt to believe that these creditors had authorized a settlement of their claims at thirty-five cents. It also seems to have induced Hodges to accept that sum. Hodges now said to Colt, and to Munger & Champlin, who also knew of Clark's letter, that he was the attorney of Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co., authorized to act for them, and he would accept for them thirty-five cents in Colt's, and Munger & Champlin's notes at six and twelve months. Hodges received all the notes, and transmitted them to the respective creditors. The petitioners returned to Hodges the notes sent them, saying that they did not sanction the settlement, and should now expect payment in full, and they soon after filed their petition in this case.

The question is whether Munger & Champlin, in view of these facts, are shown to have intended, by their sale to Colt, either to prefer Colt or to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act. Hodges was agent for Munger & Champlin, for the sole purpose of receiving from creditors the best terms they would respectively make, and, if possible, such terms as would enable them to sell to Colt, and, with the proceeds of the sale, satisfy their entire debts. He was agent of Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co., to accept for them thirty-five cents cash, and M. & C.'s paper for fifteen cents. When he accepted anything less or different, his action did not bind them, and therefore it is undoubtedly true that there was no authorized settlement of this particular claim. Nevertheless, Hodges informed both the respondents and Colt that he was authorized to act for Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co. outside of the restricted terms he at first announced, and they believed him, and acted in pursuance of such representation in good faith. Are respondents guilty of an act of bankruptcy in making that sale to Colt, when they acted in the belief that the terms made by a large majority of their creditors would enable them to satisfy all demands against them? If so, it must be because they can justly be said to have intended thereby either to prefer Colt or defeat the operation of the bankrupt act. Mr. Justice Swayne, in Langley v. Perry [Case No. 8,067], says: "The innocence or guilt of the act depends on the mind of him who did it, and it is not a fraud within the meaning of the bankrupt law, unless it was meant to be so." Now the real question is, whether, in fact, Munger & Champlin meant to accomplish either of the guilty acts charged, or whether, in judgment of law, they must be held to have so intended, because the transfer necessarily had the effect to prefer Colt, or to defeat the operation of the law.

My opinion, as already intimated, is that, in fact, they had no such intention; on the contrary, they acted upon the representation of Hodges in good faith, and in the full belief that he was authorized to settle for Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co. at thirty-five cents, by Colt's notes at six and twelve months. And I am not able to say they must have known the effect of acting upon Hodges' representations that he was authorized to settle at thirty-five cents, would be to prefer Colt, or to defeat the operation of the law. If they had believed that Hodges was not authorized to take thirty-five cents for Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co., then, in judgment of law, they should be held to have known that the effect of this sale would be a fraud on the law. In no other view should such rule be applied to them. They cannot, therefore, as it seems to me, be held to have intended a fraud. How can they be said to have known that Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co. would not accept thirty-five cents, unless they first knew that Hodges was not authorized to settle for thirty-five cents? If they believed what Hodges represented as to his authority, how can they be said to have intended a fraud on the act in any particular? It might be claimed, as Hodges was acting as their agent in procuring terms of settlement from creditors, any fraud or misrepresentation on his part, by which one or more creditors were not settled with, would be the act or fraud of his principals, and the effect of the agent's fraud being to give a preference and to defeat the operation of the law, respondents should be held to have intended the act charged against them. But, if such be the rule, there are two objections in my mind to its application here. One I have already stated, that Hodges was not the agent of respondents in anything wherein he assumed to act for creditors. Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co. saw fit to authorize Hodges to accept a certain sum, viz., thirty-five cents cash and fifteen cents in notes, making fifty cents, by verbal authority. He was their agent to do this, and, when he exceeded his authority, he did not thereby become the agent of the debtors. He was the agent of both parties: for one to obtain the best terms he could; for the other to accept a stipulated amount; so that, if Hodges acted with a fraudulent intent in accepting thirty-five cents, he cannot be said to have been the agent of the debtors in so doing. When it came to the transaction of transferring the goods and taking Colt's paper in payment, Munger & Champlin acted for themselves. In accepting that paper for creditors, Hodges acted for those creditors whose agent he was, and not for the debtors. The other objection is, that the proofs do not show that Hodges intended any fraud; on the contrary, although he exceeded his authority, I incline to the opinion that he regarded Clark's letter as justifying his acceptance of thirty-five cents for Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co.

The remaining act of bankruptcy charged is that the transfer of Colt's notes to the compromise creditors, was with intent to prefer one or more of them. I have already stated that the notes given by Colt for the stock of goods were made payable to the respective creditors who had agreed to terms of compromise, and were passed over to Hodges by Munger & Champlin for those creditors, and that he did transmit to such creditors the notes. In turning such notes over to creditors, respondents were carrying out their proposed plan of settling their debts, and in the belief that thereby, and by Colt's assumption of the uncompromising debts, all their liabilities would be settled. If Curren, Goodwin, Walker & Co.'s debt had in fact been settled as respondents supposed it was, there could be no claim that a fraud on the provisions of the law had been intended, by preference or otherwise, for all debts would then have been satisfied or arranged for, on just the terms creditors had respectively seen fit to make. Now, clearly to my mind, respondents believed they had accomplished just that result. True they have not, as it turns out, settled their indebtedness to petitioning creditors, because the agent exceeded his authority in making terms, but there was good ground for them to believe that Hodges was authorized, and that this debt, like their other debts, was arranged. So that when they turned Colt's notes over to creditors, there was evidently no intent other than to consummate the arrangement of all their liabilities, on what they regarded as an agreed and accepted basis.

It should be remarked that there is no testimony tending to show that terms were obtained from creditors upon any misrepresentation or concealment; each creditor seems to have made terms without reference to the amount any other creditor was to receive. There is no evidence to show that any creditor was led to believe he was getting as much as others. There is no pretence that there was any such representation by Hodges or the debtors. A creditor may make as favorable terms with his debtor as he pleases, and if less is accepted, in view of the debtor's circumstances than others receive, the creditor is nevertheless bound by his settlement. This feature of the proof is not unimportant with reference to the questions in controversy, and has led me to regard the compromise and arrangements of the debtors with their creditors precisely as though each creditor had compromised at the same rate per cent. The charges are not, in my opinion, sustained. The petition is dismissed.

[Upon appeal to the circuit court the decree dismissing the petition was reversed, and an adjudication of bankruptcy ordered. Case No. 3,487.]

MUNGOSAH v. STEINBROOK.

[3 Dill. 418.][1]

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. 1875.

INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS—MODE OF CONVEYANCE.

The laws of the state of Kansas have no application to the mode of alienation of lands granted to the Miami Indians (10 Stat. 1093; 11 Stat. 430), so long as the title remains in the patentees. Case of Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 737, applied.

[Cited in U. S. v. Payne, Case No. 16,014.]

Ejectment. Plaintiff [James Mungosah] claims the title under a patent dated November 1st, 1859, issued to him in his Indian name as a member of the Miami tribe of Indians. The patent recites the 2d article of the treaty with the Miamis of June 5, 1854 (10 Stat. 1093), and contains the condition prescribed by the secretary of the interior under section 11 of the act of March 3, 1859 (11 Stat. 430), that the land patented "shall never be sold or conveyed" by the grantee without the consent of the secretary of the interior. The defendant [Daniel Steinbrook] is the grantee of the patentee under a deed made by the guardian of the grantee appointed by the probate court of Miami county, Kansas, and approved by the secretary of the interior November 5, 1868. The records of said probate court show that the guardian was appointed on the application of the grantee, who was a minor, and that the probate court ordered the guardian to make sale of the land; that the sale was reported to and approved by the probate court; but the said records do not show that the guardian executed a bond as required by the laws of the state in the case of the sale of the real estate of a minor.

A. Ennis and C. M. Foster, for plaintiff.

B. F. Simpson and Mr. Snoddy, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and FOSTER, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. Under the treaty and the legislation of congress applicable to the lands patented to the Miami Indians, it is our opinion that, as to the mode of alienation so long as the title remained in the patentees, the laws of the state had no application or operation. This is obvious from Case of Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 737, 757, 759. The regulations of the secretary of the interior in respect to the mode of alienation of these lands have been introduced in evidence; and the sale and conveyance to the defendant were made in conformity with those regulations and were approved by the secretary, whose approval appears on the deed. If the guardian of the minor had been appointed by the council of the Indians and the sale and deed had been approved by the secretary, it would have been sufficient. It is objected that the sale in question is void because the probate court did not require a bond of the guardian before making the sale; this objection might or might not be good if the validity of the sale depended upon the laws of the state, but it does not. Judgment for the defendant.

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1873.

BANKRUPTCY—NON-PAYMENT OF COMMERCIAL PAPER—DEFENSE—TRANSFER TO COPARTNER—SECRET PARTNER.

1. A man should not be adjudged bankrupt for non-payment of commercial paper if he has reasonable ground to believe that he is not liable upon it.

2. If he can satisfy the court that he has good reason for disputing his liability, especially where he is in fact solvent, and has paid all other just claims, this court should not entertain jurisdiction, but should remit the parties to the ordinary remedies.

3. A transfer of firm property from one member of a solvent firm to another is not an act of bankruptcy within section 39 of the act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 536)]. Such a transfer is not a fraud upon the creditors of the firm, nor does it hinder or delay them, or constitute a preference contrary to the provisions of the act.

4. In order to charge a secret partner for the debts of the firm, it is necessary to show that such debts were contracted in the name and business of the firm, or that he had an interest in the contract or profits.

5. Where the purchaser of a note did not know that there were any secret partners with the persons whose names appeared upon its face and for whose individual benefit it was given, and placed the proceeds to the credit of the holder, the secret partners would not be liable.

6. The fact that such purchaser afterwards proved his claim in bankruptcy against the signers of the note alone tends to show that he understood them alone to be liable, and discounted it upon their responsibility.

7. Where firms composed of different members were doing business under the same firm name, circumstances stated under which dormant partners may not be liable.

This was a petition in bankruptcy filed by the Cook County National Bank of Chicago, against the firm of Munn & Scott, alleging that such firm was composed of Ira Y. Munn, George L. Scott, George Armour, Albert A. Munger, Hiram Wheeler, Charles W. Wheeler, George H. Wheeler, James R. McKay, Perry H. Smith, and George L. Dunlap, and charging that those parties were indebted to the bank upon two notes of $5,000 each, executed by and in the name of Munn & Scott, one dated August 14, 1872, due in ninety days, payable to George R. Chittenden or order, the other bearing date on the 14th day of October, 1872, due in ninety days, payable to said bank, indorsed by Munn & Scott. The petitioner charged as acts of bankruptcy: 1. That the firm of Munn & Scott being traders, etc., had stopped payment of their commercial paper, the notes described, and had not resumed within a period of fourteen days, nor up to the time of filing the petition. 2. That the firm of Munn & Scott, on the 23d day of September, 1872, transferred its property and effects to George Armour & Co., a firm alleged to be composed of all the parties constituting the firm of Munn & Scott, except Ira Y. Munn and George L. Scott, with intent to delay and hinder the creditors of the firm of Munn & Scott. 3. That the firm of Munn & Scott, on the 23d day of September, 1872, transferred to George Armour and others, for its use, all its property and assets to hinder and delay the creditors of Munn & Scott. The prayer of the petition was that the firm of Munn & Scott, consisting of the parties named in the petition, might be adjudged bankrupts. All the parties named, except Ira Y. Munn and George L. Scott, appeared and filed answers denying their liability upon the notes set up, denying that they executed the notes, or that they ever were members of the firm of "Munn & Scott" who executed the notes, and denying all the acts of bankruptcy stated in the petition.

George C. Campbell, for petitioning creditor.

John N. Jewett, Wm. C. Goudy, and Wirt Dexter, for respondents.

Before HOPKINS and BLODGETT, District Judges.

HOPKINS, District Judge. By the testimony introduced, it appears that Ira Y. Munn and George L. Scott, previous to the year 1864, owned and were interested in various elevators in this city, and were doing, under the name of Munn & Scott, the business of receiving, storing, and selling grain, and a general commission business. It also appears that a portion of the other parties were doing a like business under other names, and different from Munn & Scott; that in September, 1864, Munn & Scott, and the parties owning and doing business at the other elevators in this city, entered into a contract whereby they agreed to "stock the use of such elevators and to engage as partners" in receiving, storing, and shipping grain, and to divide the profits of such business according to certain terms, mentioned in the agreement. That agreement relates only to the business of "receiving, storing and shipping grain," including the keeping in repair of the elevators and machinery, and paying the expense of such repairs, and the rebuilding of the elevators in case of destruction.

The business was to be carried on under two names: That at the elevators known as the Northwestern, the Munn & Scott, the Union and the City, in the firm name of Munn & Scott, and at the elevators on the north side of the river, under the name of Munger, Wheeler & Co. Receipts for grain received at the elevators first named were to be issued in the name of Munn & Scott, and the others in the name of Munger, Wheeler & Co.; the earnings of all to be treated as belonging to one firm, or "pooled," as it was called, and after paying the expenses of transacting the business, divided as agreed between the parties. It appears that the business of receiving, storing and shipping grain was done in that way by the firm of Munn & Scott, until the 23d of September, 1872, some new parties having been introduced into the firm from time to time, so that at the time of the date of the notes first mentioned in the petition, the parties named in the petition were members of and composed that firm. After the formation of the partnership to do the elevator business, Ira Y. Munn and George L. Scott continued to do business outside of the elevator business, and were engaged in buying and selling grain and produce, and in other speculations wholly distinct from the elevator business, and in which the parties composing the firm doing the business of receiving and storing grain at the elevators had no interest or connection whatever. It also appears that in 1865 or 1866, Munn & Scott entered into a partnership with other parties under the firm name of Munn, Norton & Scott, engaged in a general commission business. The firm of Munn & Scott, composed of Ira Y. Munn and George L. Scott, alone, continued to do business until the bankruptcy proceedings were commenced against the firm of Munn, Norton & Scott, on or about the first of November last. It does not appear that it was known outside of its members who composed the firm doing the warehouse and elevator business, until after bankruptcy proceedings against Munn, Norton & Scott. A portion of the warehouse receipts was signed "Munn & Scott," and another portion "Munger, Wheeler & Co." There is no evidence that the public or the dealers with that firm knew that any other persons were interested in that business than the parties whose names appeared upon the receipts, or that the two firms were composed of the same persons. Mr. Munn swears he never gave a note for that firm in the elevator business, or a note that he meant or understood bound anybody but himself and Mr. Scott, and Mr. Armour, another member of the firm, says none were given by Munn & Scott, to his knowledge, except two, one being for supplies and the other for machinery to be used in and about the business. Nor does it appear that the elevator firm ever did any other business or was interested in any business except the receiving, storing and shipping of grain, as mentioned in the articles of copartnership. So far as the evidence produced goes, that company never incurred any liability in any other manner or form than by giving warehouse receipts for grain stored in the elevators, except such as they incurred for freight on grain stored in the elevators, or for expenses incurred in conducting the business; while Munn & Scott, as a separate firm, were doing a business of buying and selling grain in the market, and in that way and business were using their firm and individual credit to quite a large extent, as was also the firm of Munn, Norton & Scott. Both of these firms were in good credit until the latter part of August last, when they became involved in a wheat "corner," which broke them up and rendered them insolvent.

These are the facts as established by the evidence in relation to the partnership of the respondents, and the business done by them as such partners. The evidence as to Perry H. Smith and Geo. L. Dunlap's connection with the firm is very slight, but in view of the course pursued upon the trial, it may, in the absence of any rebutting testimony, be considered sufficient. It is preferable, also, to dispose of the case upon its merits rather than upon a technical objection of that kind taken after the close of the trial. If the counsel for the petitioners had omitted to inquire of the parties as to Messrs. Smith and Dunlap's relation to the firm, under the impression that this had been proven, the court would have allowed him to do so even after the commencement of the argument in the case. From these facts it would seem that all the members of the elevator firm, except those whose names were used, were silent or dormant partners, and can only be held liable as such. On the face of these notes the only names are "Munn & Scott." The other respondents are strangers to the transaction. The contract of discount was made with Munn & Scott, and does not, per se, create any liability as to the others. The liability of a partner arises from pledging his name, if his name is introduced into the firm, thereby holding it out as a security to the community, or from receiving profits, if he be a silent partner. The principle upon which the liability of secret partners rests is essentially different from that of a known and open partner whose name appears in the business. A secret partner is liable not because credit is supposed to have been given to the firm by reason of his connection with it, but because he is one of the contracting parties, and is benefited by the profits of the contract, so that in order to charge a secret partner for debts contracted in the name of the firm of which he is a dormant member, it is necessary to show that such debts were contracted in the name and business of the firm, or that he had an interest in the contract or profits. Winship v. Bank of U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 529; 1 Pars. Cont. 167; Bank of Alexandria v. Mandeville [Case No. 851]. The evidence in this case shows that although they had been in business for about eight years, no commercial paper had ever been given by the firm in the name of Munn & Scott, except the two notes before referred to. It would seem from this that the business did not require the use of credit in that way, and that it was not within the general scope of the business to give such paper, so that the liability of the contestants, if ostensible partners, might be a question of serious doubt.

In view of these questions, can it be pretended that the contestants are guilty of an act of bankruptcy in not paying these notes within fourteen days after maturity? Had they not reasonable grounds to believe they were not liable upon these notes? If they had, the non-payment for a period of fourteen days does not bring them within the spirit or meaning of the bankrupt act. They deny in good faith, we think, their liability upon these notes, and their non-payment, under such circumstances, should not be deemed an act of bankruptcy as against the contestants, especially as it is shown they are worth at least $1,500,000. It would not be sufficient to defeat the operation of the bankrupt act to simply deny liability upon the notes, but the party must satisfy the court that he has good reason for disputing his liability, and that his liability is involved in doubt. The existence of a valid note or claim is fundamental. Without that the bankrupt court cannot proceed; and when a party shows there is reasonable doubt upon that point, accompanied with evidence of a condition of solvency in fact, and of the payment of all other just claims and commercial paper, and shows that the non-payment complained of was simply because he did not owe the note or was not liable upon it, and also the further fact (which appears in this case,) that no demand had ever been made for the payment, a court of bankruptcy should not entertain jurisdiction, but should dismiss the petition and turn parties over to pursue the ordinary remedies provided in cases to collect debts of solvent parties. A different construction would make it necessary for parties engaged in trade to pay every note presented, or upon which it might be claimed they were liable, at the risk of being thrown into bankruptcy during the trial and investigation of the alleged liability, to the utter destruction of their credit. Such a construction would be subject to great abuse and would often lead to a perversion of the true objects and intents of the act. This construction has been generally given by the other courts to the provisions of the act under consideration. This court also has heretofore so construed it, and this case it not of such a character as to induce it to change its previously expressed opinion. There is no necessity for extending or straining the construction to protect the rights of the parties here, as these contestants are abundantly able to pay the claim of the petitioners if it should be declared that they are liable for it, and the idea of adjudging such men bankrupts is asking of the court a judgment founded upon altogether too technical a construction of the bankrupt act. The courts have real bankrupts enough to deal with without extending their examination to include supposititious of fictitious cases. The contestants having shown, therefore, a sufficient reason for not voluntarily paying the notes described before their liability should be judicially determined, the suspension of payment on them for fourteen days is not an act of bankruptcy within the meaning of the bankrupt act.

The question of the contestants' liability is not intended to be absolutely determined in this case. The view taken of the bankrupt act renders that unnecessary. There was some evidence given tending to show that Chittenden, who procured the notes to be discounted by the petitioner, represented that the "elevator ring" were all bound, and that Mr. Munn so stated when the last note was given, and so Mr. Spencer, the president of the bank testifies. But Mr. Munn contradicts Spencer's testimony on that point. The evidence, therefore, as to what occurred between Mr. Munn and Mr. Spencer being balanced, and Mr. Chittenden not being called, we do not regard the fact as established. But if Mr. Spencer's account is correct, Mr. Chittenden did not disclose the names of the parties constituting the "ring," and there is no evidence that Mr. Spencer knew who they were. So conceding the facts to be as stated by Mr. Spencer, these parties, or a portion of them, were still silent partners; and as it appears that the proceeds of the notes did not go to the use of the firm of which they were members, and that they were not given for the benefit of that firm, nor in the business of that firm, it would not, in our opinion, materially change the question of the liability of such partners.

There are some additional circumstances calculated to excite a suspicion and raise a doubt as to the real business transacted by the elevator firm: Such as allowing Munn & Scott to keep the firm business in the same book in which they kept the other business of Munn & Scott; allowing the warehouse receipts to be signed in the name they used in their separate business. But they are not sufficient to authorize us to hold the other partners so clearly liable as to have required them to pay these notes without contest. We have considered these questions, but they have not impressed us as of sufficient importance to warrant us in holding that the respondents are liable so as to be proceeded against in bankruptcy for non-payment of these notes. It was very imprudent and hazardous on the part of the elevator firm to allow a portion of the business to be done under the circumstances in such a manner by Munn & Scott. It naturally provoked just such claims as this, which they might have anticipated. The petitioners themselves could not have supposed these parties liable, we think, until quite lately, for they proved up their claim upon these notes as against Munn & Scott in the bankruptcy proceedings against Munn, Norton & Scott. If the president, Mr. Spencer, had understood that the persons proceeded against in this case were liable, why prove up the claim against Munn & Scott alone, who were insolvent? This conduct of the president, who now undertakes to establish the liability of these contestants, bears very directly upon the question as to who he understood at the time were liable, and has a direct tendency to show that when he discounted the notes he supposed Munn & Scott alone were liable upon them. The counsel for the petitioners claimed as having an important bearing upon the question of liability, the fact that these contestants, under the name of George Armour & Co., took up all of Munn & Scott's notes, which had as collateral the warehouse receipts of Munn & Scott. He argued that by so doing they admitted their liability. They did, undoubtedly, as to those receipts. They took up the receipts held as collateral to the notes of Munn, Norton & Scott, and it might as well be claimed that they admitted their liability upon those. By so doing they admitted their liability on the receipts, but they dispute their liability on the commercial paper of Munn & Scott, and we think they have cast such a doubt upon their liability thereon as to take the non-payment of these notes out of the operation of the bankrupt act.

The other acts of bankruptcy are not proven as alleged. The allegation is that the firm of Munn & Scott, (meaning all the parties to this proceeding,) transferred its property and effects to the firm of George Armour & Co., another firm. The proof is that Ira Y. Munn and G. L. Scott transferred their interest in the elevators and other firm effects to George Armour for the use of the firm. It was a simple transfer, by two of the partners, of their interest in the firm property to the other partners. That does not support the allegation in the petition, and we do not see how such a transfer could be maintained as within the meaning of the bankrupt act. We are not prepared to hold such a transfer to be a fraud upon the creditors of the firm, or as hindering or delaying the creditors of the firm, or as constituting any preference contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt act, particularly when the firm or the members composing the firm are solvent. From these views it follows that the petitioner has failed to prove the facts stated in the petition and the proceedings must be dismissed with costs.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — MALICE — PROBABLE CAUSE—REASONABLE GROUND OF SUSPICION—EVIDENCE—SECONDARY—PAPERS—SUBSCRIBING WITNESS—DEPOSITION.

1. Action for damages, for a malicious prosecution—1. In charging the plaintiff with having stolen certain articles used in the manufacture of gunpowder, and causing the plaintiff to be imprisoned thereon. 2. In bringing a civil action against the plaintiff, and demanding excessive bail. 3. In causing the plaintiff to be indicted in the state of Delaware, as the receiver of certain articles used in making gunpowder, knowing them to have been stolen; all of which charges were alleged to have been maliciously made, and without probable cause.

prosecution—1. In charging the plaintiff before Alderman Keppele in Philadelphia, with having stolen a brass pounder, and three draughts of machinery; and causing the plaintiff to be imprisoned. 2. In bringing a civil action, and demanding excessive bail. 3. Causing the plaintiff to be indicted in the state of Delaware, as the receiver of five pieces of parchment sieves, knowing them to have been stolen. All charged to have been done maliciously, and without probable cause.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The plaintiff, having some skill in the mystery of making gunpowder, engaged with Brown, Page & Co. of Virginia, in November or December, 1808, to superintend a manufactory of that article, which they were about to establish near to Richmond; and with a view to obtain more complete information of the art than he then possessed, or to procure workmen, or certain parts of machinery, he came to the northward early in December. On the 9th, he put up at an inn called the Buck, within half a mile, or thereabouts, of the powder manufactory of the defendants, on the Brandywine [about four or five miles from Wilmington, in Delaware].[2] The powder of this manufactory had obtained great celebrity, and commanded the market, in consequence of the skill employed in making it, and probably from the use of certain parts of the machinery employed, particularly the parchment sieves. The plaintiff, immediately after his arrival at the Buck, opened a correspondence with some of the defendants' workmen, and had frequent interviews with them at the tavern; at which times he made them considerable offers to induce them to leave the service of the defendants, and to go to the manufactory at Richmond. He also made them pecuniary offers, to procure for him patterns or models of the different parts of the machinery used by the defendants, and particularly to procure for him a sight of one of the brass pounders, or a pattern of it.

The defendants, hearing of the plaintiff's conduct, called upon him at the tavern; and after offering considerable violence to his person, ordered him to quit the neighbourhood, which he did on the 14th. It is proper to remark, that pains were taken by the defendants to preserve the secrets of their art, and that strangers were not, without leave, admitted into the factory. Shortly after the plaintiff had left the neighbourhood, two of the defendants' workmen secretly went off, and at the same time, one of the brass pound ers was missing. The plaintiff came to Philadelphia, and a few days afterwards, the defendants arrived here. On the 22d, they applied to Alderman Keppele, for the warrant stated in the first count of the declaration, and, on their oath, valued the property charged to have been stolen, at 10,000 dollars. The officer to whom the warrant was delivered, met with the plaintiff the next day, and inquired of him, if his name was not Munns? The plaintiff denied it, and assumed a fictitious name. The officer, however, being satisfied that he answered the description, carried him to the house of the high constable, where he acknowledged himself; and after he was informed of the nature of the charge against him, he put to the officer this question: "If I was in the company of one who had stolen certain articles, am I guilty?" The officer declined giving an answer, and conducted his prisoner to the office of Mr. Keppele. There he was examined, and by order of the alderman, his person was searched; when certain letters were found in his pocket-book, from him to Brown, Page & Co., and from them to him; by which it appeared, that the plaintiff, previous to his arrest, knew that the defendants were in Philadelphia, and suspected that they were following his steps—that he had obtained all the information he wanted, to enable the Richmond, to equal the Brandywine powder manufactory; and that some of the hands, belonging to the defendants, had left them and gone to Richmond. The alderman committed the plaintiff to the jail of Philadelphia, having required bail to the amount of 15,000 dollars, which the plaintiff could not give. On the 27th, the plaintiff was carried before Judge Rush, on a habeas corpus, who reduced the bail to 1000 dollars; but this he could not get, and he was again committed. On the 29th, the defendants sued out the writ mentioned in the second count, for seducing the defendants' workmen and servants, and demanded bail in 6000 dollars, which, on citation before Judge Rush, was reduced to 600 dollars. The defendants, having obtained from the governor of Delaware, a requisition to the governor of Pennsylvania, for the removal of the plaintiff to the former state, as a fugitive from justice, he was, upon the warrant of the governor of Pennsylvania, removed, on the 6th of January, to the jail at New-Castle. The defendants discontinued their civil suit in Pennsylvania, and renewed it in Delaware, laying their damages at 4000 dollars. On the 4th of February, the plaintiff, upon a habeas corpus, obtained from the chief justice of Delaware, was discharged from confinement under the criminal charge, upon the ground, that he ought to have been committed under a warrant from some magistrate of that state, and not under the warrant of the governor of Pennsylvania, which only authorized his removal [from the one state to the other].[2] But he was remanded [by the chief justice of Delaware] [2] to answer [in the bail of 2,000 dollars] [2] to the civil action. Thinking now to correct this error, the defendants obtained a second warrant against the plaintiff, from a justice of the peace of Delaware; charging him with a suspicion of having stolen a brass stamper, and sundry other articles, of the value of forty dollars, or having caused the same to be stolen. It is admitted that the stamper is the same instrument with the pounder, mentioned in the warrant issued by Mr. Keppele. On the 11th of March, the plaintiff was again discharged upon a habeas corpus, on the ground, that by the law of Delaware no person can be committed by a judge or justice, who has once been discharged upon a habeas corpus from confinement, on account of the same offence. In May, a bill was sent to the grand jury, charging the plaintiff as the receiver of five pieces of parchment sieves, the property of the defendants, knowing them to be stolen. The jury found the bill, and the trial being postponed, upon the motion of the plaintiff, until December, (during all which time he remained in confinement,) upon a trial before the petit jury, the defendant was found not guilty. The attorney general, then moved the court to certify probable cause, in order to compel the plaintiff, Munns, to pay the costs of that prosecution, under the constitution of the state. But the counsel for Munns agreed that his client should pay the costs, if the court would not grant the certificate; in consequence of which, the certificate was not granted.

[2] [From 4 Hall, Law J. 102.]

The balance of the evidence, except such parts of it as will be more particularly noticed hereafter, relates to the plaintiff's sufferings, which, it must be acknowledged, were very great. But as to these, it is to be observed, that except where they were produced by the immediate agency or interposition of the defendants, no inference of malice can be drawn from them, to charge the defendants, although they may be considered in estimating the damages, if the plaintiff has made out such a case as to entitle him to a verdict for anything. For the assault and battery at the Buck, the defendants have been indicted and punished, by a fine of fifteen dollars each, so that that transaction is no otherwise to have influence on your minds, than as it may become an item in the account of malice charged upon the defendants. So, too, the high value affixed to the articles charged to have been stolen, in the Philadelphia warrant, and the low value fixed to the same articles, in the Delaware warrant, and the amount of damages claimed in the civil suit, brought in Pennsylvania, are only to be considered in relation to the question of malice. The question, then, is, are the defendants liable for damages, on account of the warrant issued by Mr. Keppele, and the consequent confinement of the plaintiff under it? and 2d, are they liable in consequence of the indictment in Delaware, and the injuries to which it exposed the plaintiff?

The question upon which this cause must be decided, is not whether the plaintiff has suffered from a charge of which the defendants were the authors, and which was not founded in truth, but whether the charge was made maliciously, and without probable cause. In trials of actions of this nature, it is of infinite consequence to mark with precision, the line to which the law will justify the defendant in going, and will punish him if he goes beyond it. On the one hand, public justice and public security require, that offenders against the laws should be brought to trial, and to punishment, if their guilt be established. Courts and juries, and the law officers, whose duty it is to conduct the prosecutions of public offenders, must in most instances, if not in all, proceed upon the information of individuals; and if these actions are too much encouraged,—if the informer acts upon his own responsibility, and is bound to make good his charge at all events, under the penalty of responding in damages to the accused, few will be found bold enough, at so great a risk, to endeavour to promote the public good. The informer can seldom have a full view of the whole ground, and must expect to be frequently disappointed, by evidence which the accused only can furnish. Even if he be possessed of the whole evidence, he may err in judgment; and in many instances a jury may acquit, where to his mind the proofs of guilt were complete. It is not always the fate of those to command success, who deserve it. On the other hand, the rights of individuals are not to be lightly sported with; and he who invades them, ought to take care that he acts from pure motives, and with reasonable caution. For the integrity of his own conduct, he must be responsible; and his sincerity must be judged of by others, from the circumstances under which he acted. If, without probable cause, he has inculpated another, and subjected him to injury, in his person, character, or estate, it is fair to suspect the purity of his motives, and the jury are warranted in presuming malice. But though malice should be proved, yet, if the accusation appear to have been founded upon probable ground of suspicion, he is excused by the law. Both must be established against him; viz. malice, and the want of probable cause. Of the former, the jury are exclusively the judges—the latter, is a mixed question of fact and law. What circumstances are sufficient to prove a probable cause, must be judged of, and decided by the court. But to the jury it must be referred, whether the circumstances which amount to probable cause, are proved by credible testimony or not. What, then, is the meaning of the term "probable cause?" We answer, a reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief, that the person accused is guilty of the offence with which he is charged. What, then, were the grounds of suspicion, upon which the defendants acted in relation to the warrant of Alderman Keppele, under which the plaintiff was apprehended and committed? The plaintiff was a stranger, and his character totally unknown to the defendants.

He took up his abode at an obscure tavern, in the neighbourhood of the defendants' manufactory, where he contrived to procure frequent interviews with the workmen employed there, for the purpose of seducing them from their engagements with the defendants, and of obtaining from them a knowledge of the machinery and process, used in the manufacture of gunpowder, which the defendants had carefully endeavoured to keep secret. He offers one of them in particular, Bowman, a reward for bringing to him a brass pounder, or a pattern of it. The pounder was brought, was afterwards concealed, and about the same time, Bowman secretly absconded. The plaintiff came to Philadelphia, and although he soon afterwards knew that the defendants were also in this city, and suspected that they were following his footsteps, as he expresses it in a letter to his employers, yet, when arrested by the constable, he denied his name, and put to that officer a question, by no means calculated to allay the suspicions which existed against him. The letters taken from him by the alderman, developed fully the objects which had carried him to the neighbourhood of the defendants, and contain allusions to the article of machinery which the defendants had missed.

Called upon to declare an opinion, whether these circumstances, if proved to your satisfaction, afforded a probable cause for the prosecution in relation to the brass pounder, the court feels no hesitation in saying, that they did; and still further, that the plaintiff has no person but himself to blame for that prosecution, and the sufferings it has produced. A man may undesignedly and innocently become the object of suspicion, and of unmerited, though justifiable prosecution. In such a case, he may with great propriety call upon his accuser to acquit himself, by strong evidence, from the charge of rashness and malevolence, before he can claim to be excused from the consequences of his conduct. But, if he has intentionally acted in such a manner as to connect himself with the supposed guilt, and has, in fact, participated in it, shall he be permitted afterwards to complain that he had become an object of suspicion, and to claim the assistance of the law, to compensate him for the losses to which he had thus exposed himself? In this case, the brass pounder was taken and carried away, at the instigation of the plaintiff; was in his possession, as he afterwards acknowledged; and was then concealed by the person who took it, and who afterwards ran off:—and does it now lie in the plaintiff's mouth to say, that the defendants had not probable cause for suspecting him as the felon? But, it is said, that still there is no proof, that a larceny was committed by any person; and the proof of this, is essential to the defence. Without determining conclusively upon the soundness of the doctrine contended for, we must be permitted to express the hesitation of the court, in approving it. It would seem to demolish the whole ground of defence, allowed to the defendant in this action; if, notwithstanding the strongest circumstances of guilt, the motives of the action should, upon a full examination of the evidence to be furnished by the person suspected, turn out differently from what they appeared;—if probable cause shall excuse, in relation to the person suspected, and yet afford no protection as to the offence supposed to have been committed. But, it is by no means to be admitted that a larceny was not committed, in relation to the brass pounder. Baron Eyre defines larceny to be "the wrongful taking of goods, with intent to spoil the owner causa lucri"; and what are the facts of this case? Bowman secretly took, and carried away this instrument, for a reward promised him by the plaintiff, as is proved in the cause; and he concealed, or otherwise disposed of it, so that it was lost to the owner. Whether his intention was to spoil the owner, or to convert the article to his own use, would be a proper subject of inquiry with a jury, upon all the circumstances of the case. But, it is proved by two witnesses, that the plaintiff afterwards acknowledged that Bowman had stolen the pounder; and whether, in technical language, he had done so or not, the plaintiff cannot, in this action, make it an objection, that in point of strict law, a larceny was not committed. As to the three draughts of machinery, charged to have been stolen by the plaintiff, it must be admitted, that the defendants proceeded not only without probable cause, but without any cause at all. It does not appear, by the evidence, that the defendants ever possessed such draughts, and consequently, they could not have been deprived of them. This charge, (which is certainly unfounded,) being connected in the same warrant with another which was founded, may or may not have produced injury to the plaintiff; and if in your opinion it did so, and was maliciously made a ground of prosecution, the plaintiff is entitled to a verdict on that account, for such damages as you may think right.

We shall notice the warrant taken out by the defendants in Delaware, merely for the purpose of observing, that it is not made a distinct ground of charge against the defendants, and is only relied upon as a circumstance to prove malice. Of course, no damages could be given on account of that prosecution, even if it had been made without probable cause; and if the defendants had probable cause for obtaining the first warrant, the grounds of suspicion had received additional strength, before the second was granted; the plaintiff having previously acknowledged that the pounder, or stamper, (which means the same thing,) had been stolen by Bowman, brought to him, and afterwards concealed.

2. The second ground of complaint is, the indictment against the plaintiff in Delaware, for having received five pieces of parchment, four of them perforated with holes, knowing them to have been stolen. How stands the evidence, in relation to these articles? It is in full proof, if the witnesses are believed, that Peebles, one of the workmen in the defendants' manufactory, by the plaintiff's procurement, cut from the parchment sieves belonging to the defendants, without their knowledge or consent, a number of pieces of different sizes, which the plaintiff afterwards had in his possession, and which were produced at his trial. And if this evidence required any support, the finding of the bill of indictment, and the agreement of the plaintiff's counsel to pay the costs of that prosecution, which the law excused him from doing, unless a certificate of probable cause was granted, are strong indeed upon the point of probable cause.

Upon the whole, if the jury think that the facts above stated are proved, the plaintiff is not entitled to a verdict, as to the two charges which respect the pounder and sieves; because, though he should have proved malice to your satisfaction, the defendants have justified themselves, by proving probable cause for those prosecutions. And as to the three draughts of machinery, you are to decide, whether that charge was maliciously made, and was productive of injury to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff suffered a nonsuit.

NOTE. One of the counts in the declaration, is for maliciously bringing a civil action against the plaintiff in Pennsylvania, and holding him to bail in 6000 dollars; to support which, the plaintiff offered the record, in which the writ appeared to be returnable to 1st March, 1809, whereas, the declaration stated it to be returnable the first Monday in December, 1809.

BY THE COURT. The evidence does not support the declaration; and, therefore, the record cannot be read, in order to support a claim for damages under this count. But it may be used as evidence of malice, in support of the other counts.

2. THE COURT refused to suffer a letter written by Peebles to Brown, Page & Co., to be read, to prove that the writer had offered his services to Brown, Page & Co., and thus to repel the charge, that he was seduced by the plaintiff; because it is not the best evidence, since Peebles might have been examined under a commission.

3. A commission to Delaware, was directed to two commissioners, nominated by the plaintiff, and to two or three nominated by the defendants. They met to execute the commission, and after having proceeded some length in the examination, the defendants' commissioners withdrew, and refused to go on with the execution of it. The other two executed and returned the commission.

BY THE COURT. The commission being joint, it could not be executed by two only of the commissioners, although the others refused to act.

4. The papers taken from the person of the plaintiff by the alderman, without the request or interference of the defendants, and which were used on the trial of the indictment in Delaware, were offered in evidence by the defendants, and objected to.

BY THE COURT. We give no opinion as to the propriety of the conduct of the alderman, in taking these letters from the person of the plaintiff. But, having been taken, and being in the defendants' possession, there is no reason why they should not use them.

5. The subscribing witness to an agreement between the plaintiff and Bowman, stated that he was called into the room to sign the paper as a witness, but did not see them execute the same, or acknowledge that they had done so; but they both told him it was their agreement. This was objected to, but admitted by THE COURT.

MUNRO v. ROBERTSON.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 262.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Oct. Term, 1821.

DEED—VALUABLE CONSIDERATION—EVIDENCE.

If a deed purports to be made "for a valuable consideration," it is competent, for a person claiming under it, to give evidence of a money consideration.

This was an attachment, under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56, levied upon the lands of an absent debtor [Samuel Robertson]. Part of the lands had been conveyed by the debtor, to certain trustees, to secure certain creditors, by a deed of bargain and sale, the consideration of which was stated in the deed to be "for value received," and in consideration of certain trusts in another deed mentioned to be performed by the trustees, &c. The deed referred to was not a legal conveyance, because not recorded in time, but it was upon a money consideration.

Key & Dunlop, for plaintiffs [Munro's executors], contended that the deed, being a bargain and sale, was void, because not stated to be in consideration of money paid, and cited 2 Bl. Comm. 296, 338, and Gittings' Lessee v. Hall, 1 Har. & J. 14.

Mr. Lear, for creditors secured by the deed, contended that it was competent for him to prove a money consideration. Cheney's Lessee v. Watkins, 1 Har. & J. 530.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to render judgment of condemnation, and said that, the consideration being stated in the deed to be "value received," a money consideration may be averred and proved; especially as the second deed refers to the first, in which a money consideration is stated.

[Subsequently the attachment was quashed. Case No. 9,928.]

MUNROE v. COCKE et al.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 465.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1824.

ATTACHMENT—AMOUNT OF DEBT—AFFIDAVIT.

In order to obtain an attachment under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56, the affidavit must be positive as to the amount of the debt.

[This was an attachment by Robert Munroe against the effects of Samuel Robertson in the hands of Buller Cocke and others. It was first heard as to the sufficiency of the attachment upon certain lands of the debtor conveyed by him to secure creditors. The deed was claimed to be void. Case No. 9,927.]

Attachment under the Maryland act of 1795, c. 56 (1 Dorsey's Laws, 320). The affidavit upon which the justice of the peace made his warrant to the clerk of this court to issue an attachment, states "that Samuel Robertson, not being a citizen of the District of Columbia, and not residing therein, is bona fide indebted to him, the said Robert Munroe, the sum of $2,053.37 over and above all discounts, and the said Munroe at the same time produces the account current which is hereunto annexed, by which the said Samuel is so indebted; and the said Robert likewise states that he has drawn on the said Robertson for the sum of $1,500, and also for the sum of $2,223.10, which drafts, though not due, the said Robert understands from the said Robertson, and verily [believes] will not be paid, and further, that the latter draft for $2,223.10 hath never been accepted by the said Robertson, and the said Robert had therefore allowed no credit or discount for said drafts. He further states that said Robertson informed him, some time ago, that he would be entitled to a charge against said Robert's account, for some loss that he expected would accrue in the sale of certain flour on their joint account; no account has been exhibited stating the amount of such loss, and therefore he had allowed said Robertson, in stating his account, no credit." The warrant of the justice of the peace to the clerk of this court, says, "upon the receipt of this, together with the annexed proofs, you are required to issue an attachment against the goods and chattels, lands and credits of Samuel Robertson, and for so doing this shall be your warrant, as witness my hand and seal," &c. Upon the return of the writ of attachment—

J. Dunlop, for plaintiff, moved for judgment of condemnation.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion, that judgment could not be granted, on account of the uncertainty and irregularity of the affidavit and warrant. Attachment quashed.

NOTES—DEMAND OF PAYMENT—PROTEST—NOTICE.

A demand of payment of a note on the third day of grace, after bank hours, and notice to the indorser and protest on the same day, are not too soon, if the note is in bank for collection, and the maker has been notified thereof; such being the usage of the banks.

Assumpsit [by Munroe's executors] against the defendants [R. & J. Mandeville], as indorsers of J. F. Caldwell's promissory note. The note was deposited in a bank in Alexandria, for collection. The maker had notice, before the expiration of the days of grace, that it was so deposited. Payment was demanded of the maker, after bank hours on the third day of grace, and notice given to the defendants, on the same day, that the maker had not paid. The general usage to deposit notes in the bank, for collection, was known by the defendants, and that bank hours closed at 3 o'clock p. m. The note was not made payable at any bank. It was protested on the third day of grace, after the demand and notice aforesaid.

Mr. Taylor, for plaintiffs, had cited Parker v. Gordon, 7 East, 385.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), after taking time to consider till the next term, rendered judgment for the plaintiffs, upon the case stated.

BAIL—PRINCIPAL DISCHARGED IN INSOLVENCY—SCIRE FACIAS.

Bail will not be exonerated upon scire facias, by the discharge of the principal under the insolvent act [2 Stat. 237], unless the discharge was before the appearance-day of the first scire facias returned executed, or of the second returned nihil.

The scire facias, in this cause, was issued on the 15th of September, 1818, returnable to the next November term.

At November term, 1819, Mr. Mason, for defendant, Towers, moved the court to discharge the bail because the principal, McLaughlin, had been discharged under the insolvent act, in Washington, on the appearance-day of the first scire facias, returned executed. That as the defendant was in actual custody in Washington during the whole of that term, and had petitioned for relief under the insolvent act, upon showing that fact the court might have ordered an exoneretur; and the court may now consider that as having been done, which might have been done. The court here would not have ordered the principal to be brought from Washington by habeas corpus to be surrendered here. 1 Bac. Abr. (Am. Ed.) 343, D; Colem. cas. 66; Donnelly v. Dunn, 1 Bos. & P. 450; Robertson v. Patterson, 7 East, 405, 3 J. P. Smith, 556.

Mr. Taylor, contra. The bail should not be discharged, unless they could have surrendered the principal at the time of his discharge under the insolvent act; and the appearance-day of the scire facias was too late. The act of Virginia, of the 12th of December, 1792, § 31, p. 79, is peremptory that the surrender must be before the appearance-day of the first scire facias returned executed, or the second returned nihil. The court would not have entered an exoneretur before the actual discharge of the principal because they could not know that he would be discharged.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to discharge the bail.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—AMOUNT INVOLVED—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

1. In a case removed by the defendant from the state court to the circuit court, on the ground that the defendant was an alien, the damages laid in the writ exceeded five hundred dollars, and bail to a much larger amount was given, which were held sufficient to give jurisdiction.

2. It has been frequently determined, that the damages laid in the declaration, give the jurisdiction as to the matter in dispute.

[Cited in Ladd v. Tudor, Case No. 7,975; Kanouse v. Martin, 15 How. (56 U. S.) 208.]

[Cited in Abbott v. Gatch, 13 Md. 335.]

3. The damages laid in the writ, and in the plaintiff's affidavit, are equally conclusive, as to the amount in controversy, for the purposes of jurisdiction.

This was an action brought in the state court, and sounds altogether in damages. The damages laid in the writ exceeded five hundred dollars, and bail to a larger amount was given there, and had been given here. The state court having, upon the petition of the defendant [Dupont de Nemours], directed the cause to be removed to this court, the defendant being an alien, the only question was, whether it ought to be received and docketed, the damages being uncertain.

BY THE COURT. It has been frequently determined, that the damages laid in the declaration, gives the jurisdiction as to the matter in dispute. The damages laid in the writ, and established by the affidavit of the plaintiff, on which bail has been taken, is equally conclusive, or else no suit could be removed from a state to a federal court, where the claim is for damages; since the petition to remove must be at the time of entering an appearance, before the declaration is usually filed. Action ordered to be docketed.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—APPRAISEMENT—CHARGE FOR COMMISSIONS—USUAL RATES.

1. Under section 16 of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 563), which requires "a charge for commissions at the usual rates" to be added, on the appraisal of goods, to make up their dutiable value, the rates of the commissions must be ascertained in the same manner as the value of the goods, and a collector has no authority, even under instructions from the treasury department, to charge an arbitrary rate of commissions.

2. The case of Lennig v. Maxwell [Case No. 8,243] cited and approved.

This was an action [by Henry H. Munsell and another] against [Hugh Maxwell] the collector of the port of New York, to recover back an excess of duties. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court on a case.

John S. McCulloh, for plaintiffs.

J. Prescott Hall, for defendant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. The plaintiffs imported an invoice of goods from China, in December, 1851, upon which were charged two per cent. commissions, and the entry was made accordingly. The defendant, under instructions from the treasury department, raised the commissions to two and one-half per cent., and exacted duties upon the difference, making an increase of duties upon the shipment, of about $2,000. The plaintiffs paid the duties so charged, under a protest sufficient in law, and brought this action to recover back the alleged excess.

It was clearly proved, on the trial, that the usual and established rate of commissions on goods purchased in China and imported into the United States had, for the last fifteen years, been two per cent., and no more. It was further proved that, since 1847, instructions had been given by the government to collectors, to charge, in all cases, two and one half per cent. commissions upon invoices on which less than that rate was charged.

It is directed, by the 16th section of the act of August 30, 1842 (5 Stat. 563), that "the appraisers, in making up the dutiable amount of an importation of goods and merchandise, shall add to the valuation in the entry a charge for commissions at the usual rates." These rates, by the plain implication of the act, are particulars "to be appraised, estimated and ascertained" in the same manner as the value of the goods imported. The 2d section of the act of August 10, 1846 (9 Stat. 96), authorizes the secretary of the treasury to prescribe general and uniform rules to appraisers, for the prevention of fraud or undervaluation. But that provision does not, in our opinion, impart a power to determine the usual rates of commissions prevailing in a foreign country, any more than a power to fix the values of the goods themselves in the foreign market. This direction to the collector to compute duties on a basis of adding two and one-half per cent. commissions, does not legalize a levy of duties on more than the usual rates of commissions. PATENTS—DUTY OF COMMISSIONER IN FURNISHING INFORMATION—TUCKING GAUGE FOR SEWING MACHINES.

[1. Munson's claim for a tucking gauge for sewing machines is anticipated by Nichols patent (No. 11,615) of August 29, 1854, which produces the same effect in substantially the same manner.]

[2. While the law imposes on the commissioner of patents the duty, yet it leaves it to his discretion to determine from the circumstances how often, and to what extent, he shall furnish information and suitable references to an applicant, to aid him in remedying a defective specification, or to assist him in deciding whether he will withdraw or persist in a rejected claim, and no supposed omission in the performance of such duty will furnish cause of appeal to the judge of the circuit court.]

[Appeal by George C. Munson from a decision of commissioner of patents denying him a patent.]

MERRICK, Circuit Judge. In this case, after carefully examining the models, drawings, and specifications, and reading the reasons of appeal, together with the commissioner's response and the written argument of the claimant's attorney, I also interrogated Examiner Baldwin, under oath, in presence of the claimant's counsel, touching the principles of the machine in question. A very great difficulty in the case has been to determine from the specifications what is the precise matter of novelty claimed in the instrument described by the applicant. Upon considering the original specification it would appear that the novelty relied upon consisted in the arrangement of the diagonal ridge, a, fitting into the groove, b, of the clamping surfaces, which occasions the cloth, urged on by the feed motion of the sewing machine, to bear up against the jaws, e, e, of the guide, thereby necessitating its passage under the needle in a line of undeviating parallelism to the outer edge of the guide, and hence sewing the seams of the tucks at a uniform distance from the outer edge of the fabric. The reference given by the office to the "binding folder" of I. B. Nichols, patented Aug. 29th, 1854, is a complete answer to the case in that aspect, the diagonal grooves and sliding or adjustable guide being both found in this reference, as was freely admitted by the counsel on the trial. Hence the amendment of Aug. 24th, 1859, in the specifications, by which, for the first time, the claimant advances as the distinctive feature of his invention that arrangement of the clamping surface by which they not only gripe the cloth at their front or lips where the diagonal ridge and groove are provided, but they also exercise a steady yet yielding hold on the material beyond and in the rear of the ridge and up to and especially at the exterior edge of the cloth in close proximity to the sliding guide, E, by means of which uniform pressure throughout the extent of that portion of cloth embraced by the clamps it is prevented from puckering; which puckering, if it occurred, would choke up the machine and defeat the whole operation when a very thin and flexible fabric is sewed. Upon turning again to the invention of Nichols, it will be discovered to possess this feature also. In his specification he uses these words: "The blade of the upper guide bar, A, is elastic, so that it accommodates itself to any variation in the thickness of the material, and holds it and the binding firmly in position while they are sewed together by the machine." An inspection of the instrument will make this manifest; for unless the binding and the edge of the cloth are pressed smoothly and firmly together by the clamping plates in the rear of the grooved lips, and to such a degree that the onward motion imparted by the feed wheel to the cloth is by that pressure communicated to the binding in contact with it, there is no operative force to carry the binding through the folder, and hence the cloth urged on by itself would be driven away from the binding as it left the guide, instead of being moved along, as it is, in perfect parallelism with, and in contact with the back part of the binding. In this connection it will be remembered that there is nothing in the structure or operation of Nichols' binding folder to limit its adaptation to fabrics which are rigid or thick, but it will effect the binding of ribbon or braid upon a fabric of silk as well as a worsted band upon a piece of felt; varying of course the size and thickness of the clamps as the size and strength of the needles and thread also would vary with the material used. The contrivance of Nichols has a further arrangement in the barrier which the turned edges of the clamps present against the escape of the binding towards the body of the cloth; but if the operation of the diagonal grooves with thin and flexible materials, as well as with stiff fabrics, be to force them up against the jaws of the guide (and this certainly is the principal feature in both inventions), then the most which can be said of these barriers is that they are useless, and their presence or absence does not vary the operation of the principle of the continuous pressure of the clamp from front to rear. There being then no other difference between the clamp of Munson and that of Nichols, than the little curve at the end of clamp forming this barrier, and the absence of this little curve not even being pointed out, much less relied upon as distinguishing the claim, I have failed to discover in the application any patentable novelty. The views above expressed are further sustained by the sworn explanations of Examiner Baldwin, taken at my instance, as already stated.

Besides the several reasons of appeal, which present substantially the one question of patentable novelty, above described, there are others, the 4th, 5th, and 6th, designed to submit to my consideration certain alleged errors or irregularities in the manner of examining and deciding this case by the office. I have, upon a former appeal (that of Matthew Chambers, in June, 1859), expressed an opinion which must control the present case, to this effect: That while the law imposes on the commissioner the duty, yet it leaves to his discretion to determine from the circumstances how often and to what extent, he shall furnish information and suitable references to an applicant to aid him in remedying a defective specification, or to assist him in deciding whether he will withdraw or persist in a rejected application, and, being a duty resting in sound discretion, that no supposed omission in its performance will furnish cause of appeal to a judge of the circuit court.

Now, for the reasons aforesaid, I hereby certify to the Hon. William D. Bishop, commissioner of patents, that having assigned the 1st of December, 1859, for hearing the above-entitled appeal, the applicant was fully heard by his counsel, and the reasons of appeal and the office response to those reasons were duly considered, together with all the papers and proceedings in the cause, and, being of opinion that there is no error in the decision of the commissioner, his judgment is affirmed, and a patent is refused to the applicant.

PATENTS—ANTICIPATION—TWO PATENTS TAKEN TOGETHER—AIR-BLAST APPARATUS.

1. A claim for: "The application and use of the meter-wheel with its case and contents as an air-blast apparatus, operated by weights or otherwise, not meaning to claim the method of using the meter for measuring gas," construed in connection with the specification, is not for a mere use or result, but for the meter itself.

2. Two prior patents which, taken together, would have made up the invention of the patentee, will not anticipate the patent, where neither of them alone shows the complete invention.

3. The fourth claim of letters patent No. 12,535, granted to John C. Pedrick, assignor of Charles Cunningham, March 13, 1855, for benzole vapor apparatus, held valid.

[This was a bill by Norman C. Munson and others against the Gilbert & Barker Manufacturing Company to restrain the infringement of certain letters patent.]

T. L. Livermore and G. W. Morse, for complainants.

William Stanley, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. Patent No. 12,535, dated March 13, 1855, was issued to John C. Pedrick, assignor of the plaintiffs through a chain of title not disputed. The inventor was Charles Cunningham, and we may say here that it is proved to our satisfaction that he made the invention as early as May 7, 1851. In the specification Cunningham begins with the statement that he has invented a new and useful machine or apparatus for driving a current of air through a reservoir containing benzole or other hydrocarbon for the purpose of generating an illuminating gas or vapor therefrom. He then says his invention consists in the use of a common gas-meter wheel, or its equivalent, revolving in water or other liquid, or of other equivalent apparatus, for forcing a current of air through a reservoir containing either of the aforesaid hydrocarbons or admixtures, etc. He then describes the mode of preparing and using the gas-meter by driving it with a weight or spring, and by admitting the air through an opening, A, of the meter-case, and forcing it out of the end thereof by a pipe into a reservoir. He then describes the mode of charging the current with the hydrocarbons and conducting it to the burner.

The first three claims are for combinations or parts of the machine, which are none of them used by the defendants. The fourth claim is for: "The application and use of the meter-wheel with its case and contents as an air-blast apparatus, operated by weights or otherwise, not meaning to claim the method of using the meter for measuring gas."

It is admitted that two persons in this country invented a similar mode of furnishing an air-blast for making illuminating-gas not far from the time of the patent. One of them was refused a patent, and with the other, who had obtained one before Cunningham's application was filed, an interference was declared, in which the patent office decided in favor of Cunningham as, in fact, the first inventor. This is the patent of O. P. Drake. From the evidence in the record we agree with the conclusion reached at that time, and are of opinion that the invention of Cunningham was earlier. Similar remarks will apply to Adams.

Two English patents are produced which, taken together, would have made up, perhaps, the air-blast apparatus of Cunningham. In Lowe's patent he recommends the use of a weight to drive a gas-meter; but his purpose appears to us to have been to increase and regulate the action of the gasometer, and not to make an air-blast apparatus. Critchett, on the other hand, admitted air into his apparatus for certain purposes, but did not have an air-pump at all resembling the plaintiffs'.

We think the slight change, obvious perhaps to an inventor, of admitting air into a meter, and using the meter-wheel as an air-pump, although it had before been used with similar machinery to increase the force of the gasometer, was a patentable invention.

The claim itself is attacked as too broad. It is said to claim a mere use or result. The language is not very well chosen, but we think, taking the claim and specification together, it is intended to claim the meter itself as described, and for the purposes set forth, as contradistinguished from an ordinary meter for measuring the flow of gas. Possibly it may have been intended to claim such a meter used as an air-pump in other combinations of machinery, if it should be found useful in any such, and there is nothing in the record to show that such a claim might not be supported. Infringement is clearly proved. The patent having expired, no injunction is asked for. Interlocutory decree for the complainants.

Case No. 9,935.

MUNSON v. LYONS.

[12 Blatchf. 539.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. June 15, 1875.[2]

RAILROAD COMPANIES—MUNICIPAL AID—VALIDITY—ESTOPPEL.

1. Bonds were issued, purporting, on their face, to have been issued by three persons as commissioners in behalf of the town of Lyons, appointed for that purpose by the county judge of Wayne county, in which such town was situated, and to be part of a series authorized by the determination of such county judge, duly rendered and entered of record pursuant to a petition of the taxpayers of the town, and pursuant to chapter 907 of the Laws of the State of New York of 1869, and the amendments thereto. The statute authorized the county judge to determine, on proof, whether the persons petitioning for the issue of the bonds represented a majority of the taxable property of the town. The bonds were issued in aid of the construction of a railroad. The petition contained conditions, that the terminus of the road should be at a specified point, and that the stock of the corporation which was to construct the road, which should be taken in exchange for the bonds, should include certain stock already taken by individuals residing in the town. In a suit against the town to recover the amount of unpaid coupons on the bonds, it was set up, in defence, that the bonds were void, because, as the petition contained said conditions, the county judge acquired no jurisdiction of the proceeding: Held, that, although the objection might be a good one, if raised on a direct review of the proceeding, it was of no avail in this suit.

[Cited in Bailey v. Lansing, Case No. 738; Smith v. Yates, Id. 13,131.]

[See Bailey v. Lansing, Case No. 738.]

2. When a petition is presented to the county judge, which sufficiently conforms to the statute to call for the exercise of judicial judgment, it is delegated to him to determine whether or not it is sufficient, and no error on his part can affect the validity of the bonds, when the question is raised collaterally.

[Cited in Rich v. Town of Mentz, 19 Fed. 726.]

3. The act of 1869 was amended by an act passed in 1871. The latter act introduced important changes in the proceedings, by amending various sections of the act of 1869, and substituting the new sections in place of the old sections, without in terms repealing the old sections. The proceedings in this case were begun before the act of 1871 was passed, and conformed to the old act up to the time of the passage of the new act, and after that were continued under the new act. It was objected, that the proceedings under the old act were deprived of all vitality by the passage of the new act: Held, that the objection was not a good one.

4. The town, having received and retained the stock which was issued in exchange for the bonds, cannot raise the objection, that the bonds and coupons were not made payable at the times directed by the statute.

On the trial of this action, the court ordered a verdict for the plaintiff [Edgar Munson] for $14,042.41 and reserved the case for further consideration. The plaintiff moved for judgment on the verdict, and the questions considered were presented upon requests on the part of the defendant, and exceptions taken upon the denial thereof.

[2] [Affirmed in 99 U. S. 684.]

W. F. Cogswell and S. C. Collins, for plaintiff.

H. L. Comstock and C. H. Roys, for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. This action is brought to recover the amount of certain coupons for payment of interest upon bonds issued in aid of the construction of the Sodus Bay, Corning and New York Railroad Company. The bonds, upon their face, purport to have been created and issued by David F. Cole and two others, as commissioners in behalf of the town of Lyons, appointed for that purpose by the county judge of Wayne county, and to be part of a series authorized by the determination of such county judge, duly rendered and entered of record, pursuant to a petition of the taxpayers of the town, and pursuant to chapter 907 of the Laws of the State of New York of 1869, and the amendments thereto. By the act of 1869, referred to, whenever a majority of the taxpayers of any municipal corporation, whose names appear upon the last preceding assessment roll of the corporation, as owning or representing a majority of the taxable property in the corporate limits of such corporation, shall, by a petition, verified, make application to the county judge of the county in which such corporation is situated, representing that such majority of taxpayers desire that the corporation shall create and issue its bonds to an amount specified, and invest them in the stock of a railroad company in the state, it shall be the duty of such county judge, after causing notice to be published, &c., to take proof as to the allegations in the petition, and, if it appear satisfactorily to him, that the petitioners do represent such majority, he shall so adjudge and determine, and cause his determination to be entered of record, and such judgment and the record thereof shall have the same force and effect as other judgments and records in courts of record in the state; and, if such county judge does so adjudge, it shall be his duty forthwith to appoint and commission three persons, taxpayers and residents of the corporation, to be commissioners, and thereupon such commissioners shall cause the bonds of such municipal corporation to be made and executed, and attested by their individual seals, and are empowered to subscribe, in the name of the municipal corporation, for the stock of the railroad company, and pay for the same by exchanging therefor the bonds so executed by them.

On the 6th of February, 1871, a petition was presented, duly verified, to the county judge of Wayne county, representing that the subscribers constituted the requisite majority of taxpayers of the town of Lyons, and desired that such town should create and issue its bonds to the amount of $150,000, and invest the same in the stock of the Sodus Bay, Corning, and New York Railroad Company, "provided that the terminus of said road be made at Nicholas Point, in the town of Huron," and praying that such proceedings be had for the purpose as are authorized by the statutes of the state in such case provided. The petition contained, also, this clause: "It is understood, that the stock so to be taken is to embrace and include the stock now already subscribed and taken by persons residing in said town of Lyons, amounting to the sum of $16,400." The county judge caused the requisite notice to be given, and proceeded to take proofs of the allegations in the petition, and, during the progress of taking the proofs, and, on May 12th, 1871, the legislature passed an act (chapter 925) to amend chapter 907 of the Laws of 1869, by which certain sections of that act were changed in important particulars, while, in other sections, no changes were made. None of the sections of the prior act were repealed in terms, but the sections referred to were modified by the words, "are amended to read as follows." All proceedings after the amendatory act was passed were conducted pursuant to the requirements of that act, and, on May 17th, 1872, the county judge adjudged that the allegations of the petition were proved, and appointed as commissioners the persons who executed the bonds, the coupons of which are those in suit. The act of 1871 required that the petition should be filed by the county judge, as part of the judgment roll, and that his judgment be entered of record in the clerk's office of his county. It also made provision for a review of the proceedings by certiorari, by which the appellate courts were authorized, "in appeals now pending, and in all future proceedings, to reverse, affirm, or modify the determination of the county judge, or remand the proceedings back to be reheard by him, or direct that he proceed de novo as if he had taken no action therein."

The statute under which the bonds were issued requires that they shall bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and bear interest warrants corresponding in number and amounts with the several payments of interest to become due. The bonds issued are dated May 17th, 1872, and were issued on that day. The coupons are made payable on the first days of April and October in each year, and are for $35 each. At the time of issuing the bonds, the commissioners subscribed for stock of the railroad company, and, when they delivered the bonds, received in exchange certificates of stock. The plaintiff purchased the coupons in suit after they became due.

It is insisted, on behalf of the defendant, that the bonds in question are void, because the county judge never acquired jurisdiction of the proceeding pursuant to which the commissioners were appointed, as the petition was not in conformity to the statute, in that it contained conditions which were unauthorized. Of these, one required the railroad company to locate the terminus of its road at a place named, and the other provided for the application of a portion of the bonds to be created to the purchase of stock then held by individuals resident in the town. Decisions of the courts of the state of New York are cited, which hold that the petition in such proceeding must be an unconditional one, and that, if it contains conditions, the entire proceeding is void. The decision of the court of appeals in the case of People v. Adirondac Co., countenances this position. It is there said, in the opinion: "If the petition is in a form not warranted, or is subject to any condition not authorized by the statute, it is simply void, and the officer acquires no jurisdiction under it." It is not to be denied, that this conclusion accords with the general doctrine, that all proceedings which, like the one under consideration, may impose a charge upon the property of the citizen without his consent, must be strictly pursued; and it is also to be conceded, that such conditions as were incorporated into the petition here are contrary to public policy, as they tend to subject measures which should be adopted solely from considerations of public welfare to the improper influences of personal or mercenary interests. Butternuts & Oxford Turnpike Co. v. North, 1 Hill, 518; Ft. Edward & Ft. Miller Plank-Road Co. v. Payne, 15 N. Y. 583. But, the cases referred to arose upon a direct review of the proceeding, and although, in the exercise of a revisory or appellate jurisdiction, it might well be held that unauthorized or vicious conditions in the petition were fatal to the proceeding, it does not follow that the county judge had no right to entertain the proceeding, and that his action under it was so wholly nugatory that his judgment was a nullity, and the bonds which were issued and negotiated void. It was not necessary so to decide; and such conclusion would seem to be antagonistic to the theory and spirit of the legislation under which such bonds are issued, and of the particular statute under consideration.

If it is true that the county judge never acquired jurisdiction because of the character of the petition, the bonds issued by the commissioners he appointed are invalid in the hands of innocent holders, because, in law, no commissioners were ever appointed, and no agents were ever empowered to represent the town. The supreme court of the United States has sustained, with steady hand, the rights of innocent holders of municipal bonds, which have been issued by agents in disregard of the limitations of their authority, but it has also recognized and enforced the distinction which exists between the want of power to act in behalf of the municipality and irregularities in the exercise of a power that has been conferred; and, if the bonds can be assailed collaterally, and defeated in the hands of innocent holders, whenever the officer upon whom jurisdiction is conferred to take cognizance of the proceeding errs in deciding that the proceeding is properly before him, this statute, and kindred legislation in many of the states of the Union, will prove highly discreditable, because, as will be seen, it is calculated to invite investment in these bonds with entire confidence in their validity, and this legislation will fail to meet the end for which it is designed, because the value of the bonds will be so precarious, that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to negotiate them advantageously. The object of such legislation is, to enable enterprises of public utility to be promoted, by obtaining the necessary means from municipal corporations interested in their success. As large sums are usually required, such legislation contemplates the creation of a class of obligations which will readily find their way to all the financial marts of the world, and will command the confidence of capitalists abroad and at home. As they are to be the obligations of municipalities of ample pecuniary ability to pay them, they will effectuate the end in view, if their validity is assured. To secure this, therefore, is a paramount consideration, for, otherwise, such legislation would be fruitless. Accordingly, by this legislation, these obligations are invested with ostensible indications of validity. They bear the attestation of public officers clothed by the legislature with apparent power to bind the municipalities of the state, whose malfeasance would cast dishonor not only upon the communities which they immediately represent, but also upon the state at large; and they bear the guaranty of a judicial determination that they are created in conformity with law. In short, these obligations are designed for negotiation, to a large extent, with those who are strangers to the merits of the particular enterprise for which they are created, and to the history of the particular proceedings under which they are issued, and who rely simply upon their value and their validity as obligations of municipalities of pecuniary ability, bearing the stamp of legislative sanction and official responsibility. To imply the intent that such obligations, after they are negotiated, shall be vulnerable to objections of the character here urged, would be to impute bad faith to the authors of such legislation towards those who are to be induced to invest in such bonds.

The provisions of the statute in question, as well as considerations of general application to similar legislation, favor the conclusion that all errors in the proceeding pursuant to which the bonds are issued are to be corrected in the proceeding itself. This statute invests the county judge, a responsible judicial officer, with power to determine whether the requisite majority of the taxpayers of a municipality within his county desire that it shall issue its bonds in aid of a railroad. It affords opportunity for a full investigation, by public notice to all who are concerned. It creates a proceeding capable of review by the highest tribunals of the state. It establishes ample safeguards for the protection of the taxpayers. These provisions invest the bonds, when issued, with high assurances of their validity, and they indicate the intent that all errors in the proceeding shall be detected and defeated in the proceeding itself. It is, therefore, a reasonable construction of the statute, to hold, that, when a petition is presented to the judicial officer who is invested with cognizance of the proceeding, which sufficiently conforms to the statute to call for the exercise of judicial judgment, it is delegated to him to determine whether or not it is sufficient, and, while any error on his part may be the subject of revision by the appellate courts, it cannot affect the validity of the bonds, when raised collaterally. The injustice and inexpediency of permitting such defects as are here involved to invalidate the bonds when issued, has received legislative recognition by the amendments incorporated into the statute in 1871, after some of the state courts had held that the insertion of conditions in the petition was fatal to the proceeding, by which it is provided, that the petition may be absolute or conditional, and that non-compliance with any condition in it shall not invalidate the bonds. For these reasons, a conclusion is reached adverse to the defendant, on this branch of the case.

It is urged, as another objection to the validity of the bonds, that the proceeding under which they were issued became defunct because of the act of 1871. That act introduced important changes in the legislation regulating the proceedings for bonding municipal corporations, by amending various sections of the preceding act. It did not, in terms, repeal the former act, but, by amending various sections, substituted them in place of those in the former act. It is contended, for the defendant, that, although the proceedings taken for bonding prior to the act of 1871 were regular and complied with all the requirements then in force, and although those taken subsequent to the new act were in conformity with its requirements, nevertheless, the former act, as to the sections modified, was repealed by implication, to the same extent as though the sections had never existed, and proceedings under them were deprived of all vitality. This position cannot be sustained. While, doubtless, the legislature could have accomplished such a result, their intent to do so is not to be presumed, for, no construction will be tolerated that will give a retrospective operation to a statute. If the act of 1869 had been repealed by express terms, of course, all proceedings taken under it would have been as nugatory as if the legislature had said that all proceedings pending should be arrested and annulled. The subject of legislation was procedure, which was in every stage of progress at the time the amendments were passed. Many proceedings were pending at that time, doubtless before county judges and in appellate courts; and, that the legislature did not intend to suspend or annul such proceedings, is evident from some of the provisions of the new act. It is there provided, that, in case of review, in "appeals now pending, and in all future proceedings," the appellate court may reverse or modify the proceeding, or remand it back to the county judge to be reheard and determined, and may direct that he proceed de novo, as if he had taken no action. If it was intended to arrest and annul all proceedings which had not been terminated, why was the power conferred to permit the county judge to rehear the case under the original proceedings? The effect of such amendments upon pending proceedings is very satisfactorily determined by the court of appeals of this state, in considering a statute relating to procedure, which was amended in a manner similar to the act in question. The part which remains unchanged is to be considered as having continued the law from the time of its original enactment, and the new or changed portion to have become law only at and subsequent to the passage of the amendment. Judge Denio says: "The rule contended for would lead to the grossest absurdities. Proceedings which were quite regular when taken would be made irregular or void by force of the subsequent statute; and confusion of every kind would be introduced." Ely v. Holton, 15 N. Y. 595. These considerations dispose of the second objection to the plaintiff's recovery.

The other defences which have been urged may be disposed of briefly. It is in proof that the defendant's bonds were delivered to the railroad company in exchange for stock for which the defendant had subscribed, and it does not appear that the defendant has ever offered to surrender the stock which it or its agents received. The defendant will not be heard to allege that it has not made its bonds, or the interest coupons, payable at the times directed by the statute, while it retains the stock it received in exchange for them. The doctrine of an equitable estoppel applies. Sedg. St. & Const. Law, p. 90. It results, that judgment must be entered for the plaintiff, on the verdict.

MURATI v. LUCIANI.

[1 Baldw. 49.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1827.

EVIDENCE — HANDWRITING — PROOF — COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING.

Difficulty of giving satisfactory proof of handwriting. Is a comparison of hands evidence in a civil case?

[1] [Reported by Hon. Henry Baldwin, Circuit Judge.]

The declaration in this case stated: 1. That in consideration of 600 dollars, advanced by the plaintiff [G. Murati,] to the defendant [T. Luciani,] the defendant undertook to send from Philadelphia, by the ships Florian and Langdon Cheves, to the plaintiff, then residing in Charleston, South Carolina, the value of the said 600 dollars in goods, on or before the 25th of December, 1826. Charges that he did not perform this promise. 2. For 600 dollars lent and advanced. 3. On a promissory note, dated 24th December, 1826, for 600 dollars, to be paid in April, 1827, given in consideration of 200 dollars received by the defendant from the plaintiff in August, 1825, and 400 dollars, the plaintiff's part of the profit in a mutual business carried on between them. 4. The same sum lent and advanced, paid, laid out and expended by the plaintiff for the defendant. 5. On an account had and settled between the parties.

Mr. Stroud, for plaintiff.

This suit is brought on two promissory notes; one for the delivery of goods, the other for the payment of money. These notes were given at Charleston on the 26th of November, 1826, at which time the plaintiff resided there, and the defendant was there on a visit.

Mr. Perkins, for defendant, denied that the signatures to the notes were genuine; they were not the handwriting of the defendant; said that the plaintiff never had the command of 60 dollars; that he arrived here from Europe in the fall of 1825, and had married the defendant's mother; that he was entirely destitute of money, and could not pay his passage. If the signatures are genuine, we shall show that there is a balance due from the plaintiff to the defendant of 1971 dollars 45 cents.

A great number of witnesses were examined, letters read, and other evidence given on the question of the genuineness of the signatures to the notes, the ability of the plaintiff to be possessed of so much property, &c.

Stroud & Ingraham, for plaintiff.
Perkins & Peters, for defendant.

HOPKINSON, District Judge (charging jury). In this case the labouring oar will be with the jury. There is no question of law to be decided; but you must endeavour to come at the truth of the transactions between the parties, from the evidence they have respectively laid before you. You have a considerable mass of incongruous testimony to separate and compare, and contradictory witnesses to reconcile, if you can, or to credit or discredit, as you shall believe or disbelieve them. It is one of the grievances that courts and juries may complain of, that men enter into transactions of business with a most unguarded confidence in each other, or a careless inattention to the forms and proofs which would at all times show the true nature of their dealings; and when afterwards, as it frequently happens, they fall out and criminate each other, they come to you to settle their differences and do justice between them, without bringing with them the means by which you can discover with any satisfactory certainty what is the real truth of their case. They assert and deny, they criminate and recriminate, with equal confidence and equal deficiency of proof, and ask from you a just decision, without affording the means of arriving at it. In this situation you must do the best you can between the parties, and will at least do them the service of putting an end to the controversy, which is, perhaps, the best part of the decision of nine cases in ten. This action is brought on two promises in writing: The first, dated the 24th of November, 1826, for the payment of 600 dollars in money; the other, dated on the 26th of the same month, for the delivery of goods at Charleston of the value of 600 dollars.

The defence consists of two parts: 1. A denial of the genuineness of the signatures to the notes: the defendant says they are not his handwriting; that he never signed or gave to the plaintiff any such notes. 2. An account against the plaintiff, as a set-off to his demand, which, if proved, will make a balance in favour of the defendant. The first ground is by far the most important, as it involves questions of the character of the parties of the most serious consequence. On the one side, it is neither more nor less than a charge of forgery; and the other, of a false and fraudulent denial of a true and genuine instrument to escape from the payment of a just debt. You must decide this grave question: Are these signatures, or either of them, in the handwriting of the defendant? Witnesses have been produced on the part of the plaintiff to prove the truth of the writing; and on the other hand, the defendant supports his denial also by the testimony of witnesses, and by circumstances which he alleges render it improbable, if not impossible, that he should have given these notes to the defendant, or could be indebted to him. For the plaintiff, Jacob W. Lehr has testified, "that he believes the signature to the note of the 26th November, for the delivery of the goods, is the handwriting of the defendant; that he has frequently seen his writing and copied it." The witness being shown a list of goods to be sent by the defendant to the plaintiff, dated 29th November, 1826, says, "It looks like the signature of defendant, but he is not certain of it; he will not say any thing about it:" so of the signature to the note of the 24th of November, it looks like his signature, but would not like to say any thing about it. You have observed that the plaintiff offered an application made by the defendant to the insolvent court, dated 12th January, 1824, having to it three signatures of the defendant; that the jury might compare them with the signatures to the notes. Farmers' Bank v. Whitehill, 10 Serg. & R. 110. This evidence was admitted to go to you, other evidence having been given in support of it; but I would not be understood to have expressed any decided opinion upon the question; it may be more deliberately examined hereafter should it be necessary. The plaintiff rested his proof of the genuineness of those writings on the testimony of J. W. Lehr, afterwards supported by Mr. Cope, and signatures of the defendant to his application to the insolvent court. The defendant has produced to you, in the first place, witnesses to prove the destitute poverty of the plaintiff on his arrival in this country in the fall of 1825; that he had no money to pay his passage, for which his goods were retained by the captain of the ship; with other circumstances indicative of poverty. A witness also proved the handwriting of the plaintiff to a note dated at Charleston, 27th November, 1826, payable to the defendant for 300 dollars. The same witness proved a certain memorandum to be in the handwriting of the plaintiff; that he saw him write it. It was a memorandum or list of goods that the defendant sent to Charleston by the plaintiff. The goods were put in the storehouse of plaintiff in Charleston, until a store was procured to put them in. Other goods were afterwards received from the defendant. The witness left Charleston in November, 1826, after the arrival of the defendant there. John Baker, captain of the Langdon Cheves, testified that he took the plaintiff a passenger to Charleston, with goods belonging to the defendant; that the plaintiff had no property in them; that plaintiff was supplied at Charleston with goods by the defendant; that the defendant paid for the freight of the goods, and for the passage of the plaintiff. Several witnesses testified their belief that the signatures to the notes were not in the handwriting of the defendant. All of which evidence is now before you, and from it you are to say whether these notes are true or false. Your task is a difficult one. The skill in imitating the writing of another is sometimes so perfect, that the most experienced are at fault in detecting the falsehood. You know that the bank notes are often so well imitated as to deceive the most wary, and that the officers of the very bank defrauded have been deceived, and received them as genuine. In a late interesting case tried in the state of New York, the question arose on the genuineness of the signature of the defendant to a promissory note, on which the action was brought. The defendant was a lady of the highest respectability and of independent fortune. Nearly one hundred witnesses were examined, comprehending clerks and cashiers of banks, particularly skilful in the examination of writing; also the intimate friends and acquaintances of the party, having long and repeated opportunities to become acquainted with her writing; and yet no certainty was arrived at, as the witnesses expressed contradictory opinions and belief, and were, if I recollect rightly, about equally divided. Such is the proof of handwriting, when made either by the direct testimony of witnesses professing to be acquainted with it, or by a comparison with other writing admitted to be genuine. But it is upon such proof that jurors are often called upon to decide, and they must do so by a careful consideration of all the evidence, and of the circumstances attending the transaction, weakening or strengthening the probability of the truth of the instrument, and keeping in mind, that the burthen of proof lies on the party producing the instrument.

The defendant has given in evidence some circumstances to support his denial of these notes, which will probably have no inconsiderable weight on your mind, if you shall not be satisfied by the more direct testimony. In the first place you have proof of the absolute poverty of the plaintiff, from his arrival in this country down to his passage to Charleston with Captain Baker, who took him to Charleston, then in the employment of the defendant, and taking his, the defendant's goods to be disposed of in that city; and but a short time before it is alleged that these notes were given. We have seen no means he had in that short period to acquire property. While in Charleston, even by his own account, he sold but little; hardly more than was required for his daily expenses. He could not pay some small bills, nor his passage, or the freight of the goods he took with him. His marriage does not relieve him from this difficulty, as we have no account of any property obtained by his wife; indeed, after his marriage, he writes that he is unable to get any money to remit. One of the items making up the note of the 24th of November, and expressly mentioned in it, refers back to the 25th of August, and the rest is said to have been the profits of the mutual business carried on by the plaintiff and defendant. But where did he get the 200 dollars first mentioned, and what was the business which produced him the remaining 400 dollars? We have no account of either. His journey to New York was, clearly, solely on Luciani's account. The case of the plaintiff is certainly very deficient in proof of the means by which the defendant could become indebted to him; but, nevertheless, if you are satisfied that the notes are true and genuine instruments, it will be enough for you, as they, prima facie, prove their own consideration. Another fact is a proof to you which thickens the mystery of these transactions, and increases your difficulty in comprehending them; I refer to the note for 300 dollars given by the plaintiff to the defendant, dated on the 27th of November, 1826. This was but three days after the first note, and one day after the second on which the plaintiff brings this suit! Why should the plaintiff give his note to the defendant for 300 dollars when he held his notes for a much larger amount? Why not credit the 300 dollars against these notes? The plaintiff charges this note as a forgery by the defendant: thus they charge each other. It is really unreasonable in these men to expect that you can discover the truth of their dealings, when they have involved them in so much contradiction and obscurity. If you shall fail to reach the justice of the case, they will have no reason to complain. So far, it would seem to me that on the question of the genuineness of these notes, the preponderance of evidence is against them; but another paper is produced which puts us all at fault again; I mean the list of goods dated the 29th of November, 1826; this has created the greatest difficulty to my mind. You will recollect that the note of the 26th of November is for the delivery of goods by the defendant to the plaintiff at Charleston, of the value of 600 dollars. The paper or list produced, dated three days after the note, is admitted to be genuine; it is signed by the defendant with his own proper hand. Is this, then, the invoice or list of the goods which he undertook to furnish to the plaintiff by the note of the 26th of November? If it is, then it proves the genuineness of that note, as they must be taken to be parts of the same transaction; yet even if this be so, it does not conclusively follow that the note for the delivery of the goods was given in consideration of the sum of 600 dollars paid and advanced by the plaintiff to the defendant. It affords proof of the genuineness of the note, but not of the consideration on which it was given. What does this paper allude to? How did it come into the possession of the plaintiff? It is headed, "What is to be received by the Langdon Cheves, in Charleston, before the 25th of December, 1826?" and is signed by Luciani. Now the note of the 26th of November promising to deliver the goods, also states that they shall be delivered before the 25th of December, and so far we have a connection between them. The defendant avers that it was nothing more than a memorandum of the goods he was to send, on his return to Philadelphia, to the plaintiff at Charleston, to be sold by him for, and on account of, him, the defendant. If this were so, why was it signed by the defendant? As a mere memorandum to govern him in the selection of the goods he was to send, this was not necessary. But the greater difficulty is, how came it in the hands of the plaintiff? for if it was to assist the memory of the plaintiff, he should have brought it with him to Philadelphia. The counsel of the defendant have charged the plaintiff with bold fraud in getting possession of this paper, they do not know how, and using it as the means of perpetrating the still bolder fraud in fabricating these notes. It is, they allege, by copying the signature of the defendant to this list of goods, that he has been able to forge the name of the defendant to the notes. This argument certainly assumes that the notes are false; and if they be so, it is of little importance by what means or assistance the forgeries were committed. This is the question submitted to you, with a remarkable deficiency of evidence to guide you in the decision of it for the one side or the other. If you shall be finally satisfied that these notes are genuine, and that they are bona fide evidences that the debts and claims mentioned in them are due from the defendant, you will then take up the account which the defendant has produced, under his plea of set-off, against the plaintiff, and strike the balance as it shall appear to you to be just between them. If you shall reject the notes as false and spurious, the defendant will then be entitled to your verdict for so much as you shall find to be due to him. You must do this, under the provisions of the act of assembly of this state, by finding a verdict for the defendant, and certifying the amount you find to be due to him.

Verdict for the defendant, with a certificate that there is due to him from the plaintiff the sum of 404 dollars 53 cents.

It would seem that the jury admitted that the notes were genuine, for the account of the defendant against the plaintiff was upwards of 1700 dollars, exclusive of the 300 dollar note.

MURDOCK et al. v. SHACKELFORD.

[1 Brock. 131.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1808.

WILLS—EXECUTORY DEVISE—CONTINGENCY.

A testator lent to his son W. a tract of land for life, "and if he has children, at his death, he may dispose of it to them as he thinks proper, reserving to his now wife the use of the land during her life, as long as she remains his widow; but if she marry, then she is to have only one-third part; the whole or part, whichever she has, is to be held without committing waste. If my son W. dies without heirs of his body, then the land, with the consideration above-mentioned, to go to my son Z.," &c. This is an executory devise to W. in tail, after an estate for life to himself, remainder in fee to his children living at the time of his death, which executory devise in tail is to take effect on the contingency of his dying without children living at the time of his death.

The complainants [Murdock, McDonald & Co.], English merchants, exhibited their bill in 1803, against the defendants, heirs of William Shackelford, deceased, stating that they had recovered a judgment in an action of debt against the said Shackelford, in the county court of King and Queen, in 1773, still remaining due and unsatisfied at the institution of this suit; that the said Shackelford died intestate on the —— day of ——, seized and possessed of a considerable property, real and personal; that the said Shackelford left a widow and several children, among whom his property was divided, and that his widow was still in possesion of a tract of land of which William Shackelford died seized. The bill further states, that letters of administration on the estate of William Shackelford had been granted to a certain John Harwood, who had removed from the state, and had since died. The plaintiffs also seek to charge the land of William Shackelford with the amount of a bond for £168 15s. 8d., executed by William Shackelford, and which they allege is lost or mislaid. The defendants denied all knowledge of the claim asserted in the complainants' bill, and pleaded the statute of limitations in bar of a recovery. They admit, that William Shackelford died intestate in 1783, possessed of a certain tract of land derived from his father, Richard Shackelford; but insist, that he had only a life estate in the land sought to be charged. They refer to the clause in Richard Shackelford's will, under which the title of William Shackelford was derived, in proof of the position, that the interest of William Shackelford was limited to a life estate; and they further deny, that they have ever derived any other estate, real or personal, from their intestate William Shackelford. The following opinion of the court contains the clause of Richard Shackelford's will, upon the construction of which the right of the plaintiffs to charge the land devised by it to William Shackelford, with his debts after his death, depended.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This cause depends entirely on the construction of the will of Richard Shackelford. The following is the material clause of that will:—"I lend to my son William during his life, the tract of land whereon I now live; and if he has children at his death, he may dispose of it to them as he thinks proper, reserving to his now wife the use of the land during her life, as long as she remains his widow; but if she marry, then she is to have only one-third part; the whole or part, whichever she has, is to be held without committing waste. If my son William dies without heirs of his body, then the land, with the consideration above-mentioned, to go to my son Zachariah; and if he should die without heirs of his body, then it is my desire, that it be equally divided between my two daughters, Elizabeth and Frances, to them and their heirs for ever." William died leaving children, and the question is, whether he took an estate for life, or in fee, in the lands devised to him. That the intention of the testator was to give William only an estate for life, has not been, and cannot, with any semblance of reason, be controverted. The will was most probably drawn by a lawyer, who appears to have sought for terms of art which should secure this intent. 1st. The estate to William is expressly limited to his life. 2dly. It is not given for that period, but is lent—a distinction to which some importance has been attached. 3dly. The rights of the wife are secured by giving her the whole estate, while she was his widow, and her dower in the event of a second marriage. It is seldom that the intent of a testator, that the first devisee should take only an estate for life, appears as conclusively, as in this case. It is apparent that the testator intended to give to William an estate for life, remainder to the wife of William during her widowhood, with the right of dower in case of marriage, remainder to the children of William in such proportions as he should appoint. Thus, William has an estate for life, with power to dispose of the whole estate among his children living at his death. If the will stopped with these provisions, the intent of the testator would be obvious; and as no rule of law would conflict with that intent, the suit would probably never have been instituted. But the subsequent provisions of the will are supposed to manifest a clear intent, incompatible with, and which must overrule the intent, so plainly expressed in the first clause, to give William only an estate for life. The words which are supposed to evidence an intent, which cannot stand with a limitation of the estate to William for life, are these: "If my son William, dies without heirs of his body, then the land to go to my son Zachariah." These words are said to create an estate tail in William. That it was the intention of the testator, to postpone Zachariah, until there should be a failure of the issue of William, is believed; and that in the event contemplated, William would have taken an estate tail, by implication, is perhaps the sound legal interpretation of the will. But what is that event? The obvious answer is, the death of William, without children. It is obvious, that the testator intended to prefer all the issue of William to Zachariah, and, therefore, that the issue of William, must be exhausted, before the remainder to Zachariah could vest. In that case, the issue of William, if not children, must take in tail, for which purpose, the estate tail must be in William, or it could not descend on them. But the words of the testator must be totally disregarded, if we do not admit, that the children of William, living at his death, are to take in preference to the issue of such child as may be dead. To enable those children to take, in the manner described by the testator, the estate to William, must be limited to an estate for life: to enable the issue to take, if there be no child, the estate of William must be enlarged to an estate tail. These two intents are said to be incompatible with each other, and it is contended, that the former must yield to the latter. If they are, indeed, incompatible, it would not follow, that the former must yield to the latter. The children living at the death of William, so far as the words of the testator are to be regarded, were the first objects of his bounty. They were preferred to the issue of such, as might then be dead, and as they might take an estate in fee, no good reason is perceived, why this superior object should be made to yield to another, which was, in the mind of the testator, inferior to it. But no incompatibility of intent is perceived. The devises may well stand together. This is an executory devise to William, in tail, after an estate for life in himself, remainder in fee to his children, living at the time of his death, which executory devise in tail, is to take effect on the contingency of his dying, without children living at the time of his death. This construction gives full effect to the whole intention of the testator, as expressed by himself, and is not perceived to be repugnant to any rule of law. This case very strongly resembles that of Roy v. Garnett, 2 Wash. [Va.] 11, which was very maturely considered, both by the bench and bar. The doubt, in Roy v. Garnett, was, whether in the event of the devisee for life, dying without male children, his estate would be enlarged by the implicative devise, so as to enable his issue to take before the remainderman; but it was conceded by the counsel for that issue, that if any male child, or children of the devisee for life, had been living at the time of his death, such male child or children must have taken under the will, and the estate of the devisee for life would not have been enlarged into an estate tail.

DECREE. This cause came on this day to be heard, on the bill and answer, and the last will and testament of Richard Shackelford, deceased, filed as an exhibit, and was argued by counsel; on consideration whereof, the court being of opinion, that the lands in the hands of the defendants are not chargeable to the plaintiffs, it is decreed and ordered, that their bill be dismissed, &c.

3. Such a debt is not annihilated, and may be proved by the assignor or else by the assignee.

4. Where the bankrupt had made an open and notorious conveyance of land to his wife to hold to her separate use, more than ten years before the bankrupt law was passed; held, that such conveyance could not be set up as a fraud to prevent his discharge in the absence of evidence to show that it was held on a secret trust for the bankrupt; nor was the omission of it from the schedule a concealment of property under that act.

[Cited in Re Boynton, 10 Fed. 280.]

5. Where it appeared very doubtful whether the bankrupt had any interest in a certain promissory note held by a third person, and there was no evidence of any wilful concealment, and the assignee had had all the benefit of the title; held, the bankrupt ought to be discharged, notwithstanding the note was not on his schedule.

Mrs. Eliza Ventriss, the sister of the bankrupt, [George A. Murdock,] was set down in the schedule as his largest creditor. After the petition was filed and before the first meeting of creditors, she sold the negotiable note which was the evidence of her debt, to George W. Ware, Jr., who did not prove the debt, but appeared to oppose the discharge of the bankrupt, which he did both on his own account and as attorney for Mrs. Ventriss.

E. Merwin, for bankrupt, contended that neither Mrs. Ventriss nor Mr. Ware could prove the debt, because neither could take the oath prescribed by the supreme court in form No. 22; and that even if the debt were provable it must be proved before the creditor could be heard.

J. S. Abbott, for creditor.

LOWELL, District Judge. I have repeatedly decided that a creditor whose debt is provable may oppose the discharge. It is to be regretted that the district courts should not agree upon the construction of the statute in all its parts; though considering the multitude of questions which arise in the administration of this new branch of jurisprudence, such disagreement can be no matter for surprise. We may rather congratulate ourselves that upon many of the most important points there has been great unanimity of opinion. I shall not state the reasons for my opinion at large, because there is a reported decision of Judge Hall, of the Northern district of New York, in which the arguments and authorities are collected and stated with great care, and the conclusion arrived at is the same that I have always acted on. Re Shepard [Case No. 12,753]; see acc. Re Boutelle [Id. 1,705]. On the other side, see Re Levy [Id. 8,297].

The argument is briefly this: A creditor who has not proved his debt has no standing in the bankrupt court for most purposes, because he has no interest in the settlement of the estate, in the dividend, or in the acts or omissions of the assignee. His assent is not necessary under sections 30, 33, [of the act of 1867 (14 Stat. 532)], but he is interested to oppose the discharge because he will be bound by it. He may have many sufficient reasons for not proving his debt; as, for instance, that he would be obliged to either relinquish or realize a security which, though inadequate, is not in a state to be advantageously sold. Yet he is bound by the action of the court, and is in effect a party to the discharge. On principle therefore he ought to be admitted to contest it. We may admit that "any creditor" in section 31 is ambiguous; but on its face it includes all creditors, and the ambiguity can only be raised by construction. Now the statute itself, at section 29, and the form prescribed by the supreme court, both contemplate notice to creditors who have not proved, for the former requires notice by publication, in addition to a written notice to all who have proved, and the latter notifies all creditors who have proved, and all other persons interested, to appear and show cause. But section 34 is to my mind quite decisive of the intent of congress, because it authorizes any creditor whose debt was provable, though not proved, to apply to the court and have the discharge set aside at any time within two years after its date, on proving certain frauds to have been committed, and that they were not known to him before the granting of the discharge. Now it seems a forced, not to say absurd, construction of the statute that the knowledge which could not be availed of by the non-proving creditor to oppose the discharge, should yet be a complete answer to his application to set it aside.

Of course the opposing creditor must have a provable debt, and must give evidence of that fact, and this brings us to the second point, which was so ably argued, that there is no such debt here, because neither of these supposed creditors can take the oath that the bankrupt was, both at the commencement of proceedings, and still is, justly indebted to him or her. I do not find any thing in section 22 to avoid a real and honest transfer of a negotiable debt made after the petition is filed, and without any purpose of influencing the proceedings, but rather an implication that it may be done if there be no such purpose. And I can conceive of no reason why it should not be. It is true that every thing is to be settled as of the commencement of the proceedings, and the rights of the parties are fixed at that time; and by the express language of section 20 a debtor of the bankrupt cannot buy up a claim against him after that time and use it in set-off; but a set-off is payment in full of the debt set off to the extent of the debt against which it is set off; and a creditor who obtains payment in full has an unjust advantage over the rest. There is nothing that I can discover in the statute or in its policy to restrain the negotiability of debts, or to require an honest debt to be annihilated because it has been honestly transferred; and this must be the result if neither party can take the oath necessary to prove it.

The form of oath prescribed by the supreme court does indeed appear to contemplate that there has been no transfer. It is: That the bankrupt was, at and before the filing of the petition, and still is, justly and truly indebted to the creditor. But this form is made for the most usual cases, and is not intended to change the statute, but may itself be varied to meet the exigency of different cases. Taken literally, it would exclude administrators or other assignees by mere operation of law, which certainly cannot have been the purpose. The oath required by the Massachusetts statute was like that prescribed by the supreme court, and I am informed that it was understood to prevent an assignee of a debt acquired after notice of the warrant was published from proving it, and that the practice in courts of insolvency was to advise the assignee of a debt to transfer it back to his assignor, who then took the oath and retransferred the debt. This was a circuitous way of arriving at justice, and one that required a false oath to be taken, and I am not aware that any superior court of the state ever passed upon the necessity of such action. The form of oath, at any rate, was prescribed by the law itself, and our law passed later has not adopted it. My own impression is pretty decided that the debt may be proved by the person who owns it at the time of proof, the oath being modified to conform to the fact. This precise point is not passed upon because both Mrs. Ventriss and Mr. Ware oppose the discharge, and I am clear that one or the other may do so.

[Another point I have often decided, but the decision appears not to have become generally known. I hold that any creditor who has a provable debt may oppose the bankrupt's discharge. In general, no one is a creditor who has not proved his debt; and such an one has no interest in the mode of settling the estate, nor in the dividend, nor in the acts or omissions of any of the parties to the proceedings. But he has an interest in the discharge, because if it is granted he will be barred. He may hold security which is inadequate for his full payment, and yet is not in a condition to be advantageously liquidated; or there may be no dividend expected; or he may have many other good reasons, or reasons which he considers good, for not proving his debt or concerning himself with the proceedings; and yet it may be of the greatest importance to him that the debtor should not receive his certificate. Upon principle, therefore, he ought to be heard on that issue. The statute evidently contemplates it, because it gives every creditor whose debt was provable, whether proved or not, the right to set aside the discharge within two years, on proving fraud, and that he had no knowledge of the fraud until after the discharge was granted. Now, it is very difficult to maintain that the statute debars a creditor from opposing the discharge before it is granted, when it allows him to do so afterwards, upon showing good cause why he did not do it before. I am aware that there are decisions both ways on this point, but my own was earlier than any of them, and I have seen nothing in the decisions opposed to this view which requires me to change it. Of course, the opposing creditor must show, as matter of fact, that he has a debt which is provable, and this will be one of the issues to be tried.

[This whole case was heard, and both parties argued the merits, and it is not improper that I should decide them, leaving the first point still open for consideration if it should arise in another case.][2]

The allegations of fact are that the bankrupt wilfully omitted from his schedule and concealed from his assignee the equity of redemption of a house and land in Pittsfield, and his interest in a certain promissory note. The house and land were conveyed to the bankrupt's wife in 1856, at a time when he swears he was solvent. The conveyance was open and notorious, and was well known to his sister. Such a conveyance does not stand on the footing of a mere voluntary conveyance to a stranger, or of one made on a secret trust for the grantor, and there is no evidence here of any such trust. The consideration is a good one, and its operation is not secret. No doubt the debtor has always had, and always will have, some advantage from this estate; but it would be a perversion of terms to say that there is any concealment about it. Whether the conveyance could be avoided by the assignee is a different question, and depends on facts not fully developed at this hearing. The conveyance, of course, cannot be alleged as a bar to the discharge, because it was made long before the bankrupt law was passed. The only question before me is that of concealment; and I do not find that any was practised.

The interest of the debtor in the note, if any, is equitable rather than legal, and I am not satisfied that there was any intentional concealment of it, or any evasion in his conduct or schedules or examination. Where property is in fact concealed in specie, or where the title is concealed by a colorable conveyance, the discharge should be refused; but there are many doubtful cases in which justice seems to demand that the assignee should be entitled to try his rights, but in which unfairness on the debtor's part cannot be made out. The assignee in this case has obtained full knowledge of both these interests, and has sold whatever title he has in them; and I do not see that the bankrupt has obstructed him at all in obtaining his full rights, or that he has wilfully concealed anything. Discharge granted.

MURDOCK v. The EMMA GRAHAM.

[3 Cin. Law Bul. 1,054.]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. 1878.

INSOLVENCY—DEED OF GENERAL ASSIGNMENT—CLAIM FOR DAMAGES—COLLISION.

Claim for damages for collision of craft passes to assignee under deed of general assignment for benefit of creditors under the Ohio statute.

[This was a libel by J. B. Murdock, assignee, against the steamer Emma Graham, to recover for injuries sustained in a collision.]

Moulton & Johnson, for exceptions.
Hooper & Dyer, contra.

SWING, District Judge. The libel in this case is to recover damages for injuries sustained by a float or barge collided against by the steamer Emma Graham. To this libel, the defendant or claimant, files exceptions upon the following grounds: That since the alleged collision the owner of the barge made an assignment under the laws of Ohio, and that his assignee cannot sue, as the lien is not assignable in admiralty. This brings up the question: Is it assignable, and is it within the terms of the assignment? There is no doubt of the assignor's right to sue for the injury to his personal property, but can the assignee sue? There is much conflict in the authorities upon this point. but I have finally come to the conclusion that a right of action for injuries to personal property may be assignable in connection with the property itself, and that in the case at bar, the assignee under the assignment for the benefit of creditors, may sue for this injury in a court of admiralty. It is different from a personal tort which dies with the owner. It would be very unjust and inequitable to say that this right is not assignable, and that the creditors should not have the benefit of the lien. See The Sarah J. Weed [Case No. 12,350]; Burrill, Assignm. 70, 355; Rogers v. Spence, 13 Mees. & W. 570. This right and lien is assignable, and together with the property passes to the assignee under the law of assignment for the benefit of creditors.

2. Does the assignment cover or include the right? Not in express terms. The words of his deed of assignment are "his real and personal estate," and this ought to embrace all his rights. If this is to be treated as an assignment under the laws of Ohio, it would convey all his rights and choses in action. See Rev. St. Ohio (Swan & Critchfield's Ed.) p. 697, § 11; Id. p. 709; Burrill, Assignm. 73, 354, 355; 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. 70–75. For some purposes it might possibly not be so taken, but in the present instance, I think, it comes fairly within the meaning of the statute. The exceptions to the libel are overruled, and leave given to answer.

MURDOCK et al. v. HUNTER.

[1 Brock. 135.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. May Term, 1808.

EVIDENCE — PROOF OF HANDWRITING — COURTS — ENGLISH ADJUDICATIONS MADE PRIOR TO THE REVOLUTION — ADMINISTRATOR — RIGHTS OF CREDITOR.

1. The subscribing witness to a bond being dead, proof of the handwriting of the attesting witness, if unaided and unopposed by other evidence, is sufficient to establish the execution of the bond.

2. The decisions of the courts of England, made prior to the Revolution, are of binding authority on the courts of Virginia. Those made since have not that character, but when they are reasonable, conformable to general principles, and do not change a rule previously established, they will not be entirely disregarded.

[Cited in Brewer v. Harris, 5 Grat. 293; Moon v. Stone's Ex'r, 19 Grat. 263.]

3. A bond creditor is not bound to pursue the personal assets of his debtor in the hands of others than his personal representative, if such pursuit threatens to be tedious, intricate, and unproductive. But if the personal estate is in the hands of legatees, who may be easily brought before the court, they ought to be made parties to the suit. See Corbet v. Johnson [Case No. 3,218].

[Cited in McLaughlin v. Bank of Potomac, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 229.]

This was a bill in chancery, filed in August, 1805, by the plaintiffs [J. Murdock & Co.], partners in trade, and subjects of the king of Great Britain, to subject certain lands in the county of Princess Anne, in Virginia, of which William Hunter died seized, in the hands of devisees, to the payment of a bond, purporting to be executed by one Thomas Claiborne, and the said Hunter. The bond was in the penalty of £316 9s., to be discharged by the payment of £158 4s. 6d., and bears date the 23d of September, 1774, payable on the 23d September, 1775, to Archibald Govan, and was attested by Andrew Ronald. At the period of the institution of this suit, both the obligors and the attesting witness were dead, and the plaintiffs adduced proof of the handwriting of Ronald, which was the only evidence offered of the execution of the bond. William Hunter died in 1777, having first made his will, appointing executors, who refused, or failed to qualify, and Elizabeth Tenant took out letters of administration, with the will annexed, of William Hunter; and after her death, Thomas Wishart qualified, as administrator of the estate of Hunter unadministered by Elizabeth Tenant. Wishart died, and Hancock qualified, but before this suit was brought, Hancock was also dead, and no subsequent administration was granted: so that at this period, there was no personal representative of Hunter.

William Hunter devised a tract of land in fee to James Tenant, lying in Princess Anne county, and containing by estimation, 517 acres, who died seized thereof. James Tenant devised the said land to Elizabeth Tenant, his mother, for life, remainder to his eldest sister, living at her death. At the death of Elizabeth Tenant, Elizabeth White, the wife of William White, became entitled to the Princess Anne estate, under the will of James Tenant, and when this bill was filed, the said Elizabeth and William White, the only defendants in this cause, were seized and possessed thereof. The plaintiffs in their bill, allege that the personal estate of William Hunter, deceased, was either exhausted, or could not be reached by the death of his administrators and their sureties, and the insolvency of some of them, and pray a decree for the sale of the said land, to satisfy their debt.

In their answer, filed in 1807, William and Elizabeth White say, that William Hunter died, possessed of a large personal estate, more than sufficient for the payment of all his debts, and refer to an inventory and appraisement of his estate, (which is made a part of their answer,) taken on the 15th day of September, 1777, by which the personal estate of Wililam Hunter is estimated to have been worth £2468 3s.: that many of the negroes of the estate were carried away by the British troops, during the Revolutionary War, and have never since been heard of, and that the residue of the personal estate has been long since distributed among the legatees of William Hunter. They deny the sufficiency of the proof adduced, to establish the execution of the bond by Wiliam Hunter. But if the court should be of a different opinion, they insist, that after the lapse of thirty years, the plaintiffs have no right to subject the real estate of which Hunter died seized, to the payment of this bond, since, at the time it became payable (September, 1775,) there was no legal impediment to the prosecution of this claim, Great Britain and her colonies in America being then politically united, and ever since the termination of the Revolutionary War, the courts of Virginia have been open to the prosecution of suits by British subjects, against citizens of Virginia: that there is now no legal representative of William Hunter, nor can any of his papers or books be found, from which a correct statement of his affairs can be made out; whereas, had the present demand been exhibited in due time, the responsibility now sought to be fixed on these defendants, would have attached to others. They admit, that the real estate which the plaintiffs now seek to subject to the satisfaction of this claim, was derived from William Hunter.[1]

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. In this case, two points are made at the bar: 1st. That the bond on which the suit is instituted, is not sufficiently proved. 2d. That the proper parties are not made.

1st. The bond purports to have been executed by Thomas Claiborne and William Hunter, is attested by Andrew Ronald, who is since dead, and the only proof offered, is that of the hand-writing of the subscribing witness. The question, whether this testimony is sufficient to establish the execution of the bond, without any proof of the handwriting of the obligor, has been argued on principle and on authority, and is of considerable importance in those old cases, which are frequently brought before this court. The general principle is, that the best evidence of which the nature of the case will admit, ought to be adduced. The subscribing witness himself being dead, the best proof that he attested the bond is, that the signature, purporting to be his, is in his hand-writing. This testimony, therefore, proves, that he subscribed his name to the obligation; but whether its execution shall be inferred from this fact, or must be proved by other testimony, so that proof of the death and handwriting of the subscribing witness, simply dispenses with the necessity of producing that witness, is a question, which, on principle alone, might be decided the one way or the other, and the decision would be supported by almost equal strength of reasoning. Positive proof of the execution of a bond is required, where that proof is attainable. Where it is unattainable, the law must be satisfied with circumstantial evidence. If the plaintiff, by proving the death and handwriting of the subscribing witness, was only let in to prove the execution of the bond by other testimony, it would seem to be sufficient to prove the death of the subscribing witness, and to identify his person by any other proof than that of his hand-writing, as, for instance, that he was the only person of that name, in a situation to render it probable that he could have attested the bond. Since it is not only necessary to prove the death, but to prove the hand-writing, of the subscribing witness, it would seem that something further than the mere permission to establish the execution of the bond by other testimony, was gained by this proof. This can only be the inference which is drawn by

[1] No lapse of time bars actions upon instruments, under seal, for the payment of money; but the lapse of twenty years creates a presumption of payment, which may be repelled like any other presumption. Jackson v. Pierce, 10 Johns. 414; Bailey v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 210. An acknowledgment of the debt within twenty years, or a demand of payment, or circumstances explaining satisfactorily why the demand was not made sooner, will repel the presumption; so, where for the portion of the time, the plaintiff was disabled to sue, that portion will be deducted. Id. This doctrine of presumption of payment, arising from the lapse of twenty years, is a very familiar one in our courts. Mr. Robinson has examined the Virginia cases on this subject, in his valuable work. 1 Rob. Prac. 113, 114, q. v. If a shorter period is relied on, the presumption must be corroborated by circumstances. Gordon v. Kerr [Case No. 5,611]. In Dunlap v. Ball, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 180; 1 Conn. 383, which, as regards the question of presumption of payment, is identical with the above case of Murdock v. Hunter, the suit was brought in 1802, upon a bond executed in 1773, by the defendant, a citizen of Virginia, to the plaintiffs, British merchants, residing in Great Britain. The case went to the supreme court, on a bill of exceptions to the opinion of the court below, instructing the jury, that from the length of time, stated in the facts agreed on, the bond in law, was presumed satisfied; unless they should find from the evidence, that interest was paid on the bond, within twenty years from the 5th of September, 1775, (the time of the last payment;) or that a suit or demand was made, on the said bond, within twenty years from the last mentioned time, exclusive (in both cases,) of five years, five months, and twenty days, taken out of the act of limitations. The supreme court said (Marshall, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court,) that the only circumstance which could create a question in the case was, that twenty years had not elapsed, exclusive of the period, during which the plaintiffs were under a legal disability to recover before the action was brought: that the doctrine of the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time, was a reasonable one, and might be rebutted by any facts that would destroy the reason of the rule. That no presumption could arise, during a state of war, in which the plaintiff was an alien enemy, was too clear to admit of doubt. But it was not so clear, that upon a bond so old as this, the same length of time, after the removal of the disability, was necessary to raise the presumption of payment, as would be required if the bond had borne date at the time of such removal. It being satisfactorily shown to the court, that it was the general understanding in Virginia that British debts could not be recovered there, earlier than 1793, when the first decision of the superior courts, establishing the right of recovery was rendered; the only question was, whether, in case of an old debt, the same time was required to raise the presumption, as in the case of a debt accruing since the impediments had been removed? In such a case, it was not easy to establish a new rule, and the court thought it best to adhere to the old decisions, that twenty years must have elapsed, exclusive of the period of the plaintiff's disability, and were of opinion, that the court below erred, in directing the jury, that payment ought to be presumed. The cause was remanded to the circuit court, to be there tried, with directions, that there was no presumption of the payment of the said bond, as directed by the said circuit court.

the law, that if the person who attested the bond was present, he could and would prove its execution. This, however, is only circumstantial proof, and may certainly be strengthened by other circumstances, as by proof of the hand-writing, or the acknowledgment of the obligor. I was, myself, at first, inclined to think that, on principle, this additional proof was indispensably necessary, but an observation made by the plaintiff's counsel in argument has considerable influence. It is, that if the obligor acknowledges, and thereby adopts the signature as his, in the presence of the subscribing witness, he is as much bound as if his name had been written by himself. It would seem, then, that the positive necessity of proving the hand-writing of the subscribing witness, although he be dead, would justify the opinion, that the law infers from this proof, that the subscribing witness would, if present, prove the execution of the bond, and that a naked case, standing singly on this proof, would be in favour of the plaintiff. But this evidence, which is merely circumstantial, may be met by other circumstantial evidence. Whatever deducts from it, may, and ought to be, weighed against it. It is, therefore, always advisable to support it by other testimony, if such other testimony be in the power of the plaintiff.

On passing from principle to authority, it may not be improper to premise, that as the common law of England was, and is, the common law of this country, and as an appeal from the courts of Virginia lay to a tribunal in England, which would be governed by the decisions of the courts, the decisions of those courts, made before the Revolution, have all that claim to authority, which is allowed to appellate courts. Those made since the Revolution, lose that title to authority, which was conferred by the appellate character of the tribunal which made them, and can only be considered as the opinions of men distinguished for their talents and learning, expounding a rule, by which this country, as well as theirs, professes to be governed. An opinion, avowedly changing a rule, would certainly deserve much less consideration, than one declaring the rule on a point which appears not to have been well settled.

The first decision of this question, which has been cited at the bar, is that reported by Viner, which appears to have been made at nisi prius, and is in favour of the opinion, that the proof of the hand-writing of the subscribing witness, who is dead, is sufficient, if unopposed, to establish the execution of the bond.[2] Previous to this, however, the point would seem to have been noticed by Lord Holt, at nisi prius, in a case reported in 1 Ld. Raym. 734. "A deed was produced, to which there were two witnesses, one of whom was blind. It was ruled by Holt, that such deed might be proved by the other witness and read, or might be proved, without proving that the blind witness is dead, or without having him at the trial, proving only his hand. And so it was done in this case." Wood v. Drury, 1 Ld. Raym. 734.

This report is too indistinct, and too short, to be satisfactory. It would rather seem, however, that the deed was proved, by proving the hand-writing of the blind witness. Perhaps, in addition to this, the execution of the deed was proved by the other witness, and that which would indicate the contrary, may be ascribed to the inaccuracy of the reporter. I am inclined to think it is. In the cases cited from Strange, Peere Williams, Atkyns and Douglass, supplemental proof was offered and received, but the question, whether without that supplemental proof the execution of the bond would be established, by proving the death and hand-writing of the subscribing witness, was not made to the court, nor decided. It would seem that considerable weight was given to this additional testimony. In 1790, in the case Wallis v. Delancey,[3] at nisi prius, Lord Kenyon decided this question directly, and decided it against the sufficiency of the proof of the hand-writing of the subscribing witness, if unaided by other testimony. The case of Barnes v. Trompowsky, 7 Durn. & E. [7 Term. R.] 265, which was decided in 1797, while Lord Kenyon was on the bench, turned upon the necessity of proving the hand-writing of the subscribing witness, not on the sufficiency of that proof; for in that case, the hand-writing of the obligor was proved. The case of Adam v. Kerr, 1 Bos. & P. 360, was decided in 1798, and dispenses with other proof than that of the hand-writing of the subscribing witness. Such proof was declared to be evidence of every thing on the face of the paper. In this case, the rule for a new trial was refused by the court of common pleas, so that the point was not permitted even to be argued. The case of Prince v. Blackburn, reported in 2 East, 250, and decided in 1802, was upon the question of the admissibility; not of the sufficiency of the proof. But Judge Le Blanc, before whom the cause was tried at nisi prius, reported the testimony, and takes no notice of any supplemental evidence. If none was given, this case confirms that of Adam v. Kerr. Whether it was given or not, does not certainly appear. In his Law of Evidence, Mr. Peake supposes the law to be now settled in England, in conformity with the decision of Adam v. Kerr. He states the determination to have been made in a case where the subscribing witness was dead; but does not say the law would be otherwise in any other case, where the disability of the subscribing witness was permanent, nor is there any reason for distinguishing such a case from one where he was actually dead.

[2] "Where there are two witnesses to a deed who are dead, if there be full evidence to prove one of their hands, and any evidence that endeavours have been used to find one to prove the other's hand, it is sufficient; for perhaps the witness might be a stranger, and it would be a hard task to prove his hand; per cur. Comb. 248; Pasch. Term 6 W. & M. in B. R., in case of Smart v. Williams," 12 Vin. Abr. 223, § 3, tit. "Evidence."

From this review, the law appears to be now settled in England, that if the subscribing witness be dead, proof of his hand-writing is sufficient to establish the execution of the paper he has attested; but it has been decided by cases since the Revolution, which are not authority in the United States. When, however, they are reasonable, are conformable to general principles, and do not change a rule previously established, such decisions cannot be entirely disregarded. The decisions upon this point appear to be of this character, and the court is inclined to the opinion, that in a case unsupported and unopposed by any other circumstance whatever, this proof would be deemed sufficient to establish the execution of the bond.[4]

In the case formerly decided in this court, there were circumstances which rendered the proof of the hand-writing of the witness unsatisfactory. It was proved that there were two men of the same name, and it could not appear from the hand-writing of the witness, by which of them the bond was executed. That there are in this case two obligors, does not seem sufficient to take it out of the rule. It is, however, possible, that a signature may have been added after the attestation, and consequently, circumstances less decisive may outweigh the inference drawn from the hand-writing of the subscribing witness, than would be required in the case of a single obligor. The face of the paper is not absolutely free from suspicion. The signature of Hunter bears such a resemblance to the character of the writing in which the bond is filled up, and with which the name of Claiborne is signed, as to excite some suspicion. If this circumstance stands alone, it cannot be much regarded, but if it should be aided by others, it may deserve consideration. In a case where the parties originally managing the cause are dead, and the person now looked to for testimony has been induced by his counsel to suppose that his testimony would not be required at this term, such light suspicion may induce a suspension of the decision until another term.

The second point is, that proper parties are not made in this cause. In the case of Corbet v. Johnson [Case No. 3,218], it was decided in this court, that a bond creditor was not bound to pursue the personal assets into the hands of others than the representative of the debtor, if such pursuit threatened to be tedious, intricate, and unproductive. This case is supposed to have established the principle, that in no case whatever, is the bond creditor bound to go beyond the legal per-

[4] The cases cited by the chief justice, with some more modern English decisions, have all been reviewed by Mr. Starkie, in his treatise on the Law of Evidence. 1 Starkie, Ev. (Metcalf's Ed.) 337–343, inclusive. He lays down the general rule, as deduced from that review, to be, that where there have been sufficient attesting witnesses, whose absence is satisfactorily accounted for (as that they are dead, out of the country, infamous, have become interested, &c.) the proper proof is by giving evidence of the hand-writing of the attesting witnesses; and it is usual, he says, in such cases, to give evidence also of the hand-writing of the obligor. And where there are two attesting witnesses, one of whom is dead, and the other out of the country (as in the case of Adam v. Kerr, supra), proof of the hand-writing of the deceased witness is sufficient evidence of the execution of the paper, without proof of the hand-writing of the absent witness, or of the obligor; so, where one of the attesting witnesses, after diligent inquiry made, could not be found, and the other had become interested since the attestation, it was held that evidence of the hand-writing of the latter witness was sufficient proof (Cunliffe v. Sefton, 2 East, 183); and where one was dead and the other denied his signature, Lord Holt admitted evidence of the hand-writing of the former (Blurton v. Toon, Skin. 639). For a reference to the leading American decisions, as to the proof of hand-writing of the subscribing witness, where he is dead, &c. and its sufficiency, see Mr. Metcalf's note 1, 1 Starkie, Ev. 342. See, also, opinion of Carr, J., in Gilliam's Adm'r v. Perkinson's Adm'r, 4 Rand. [Va.] 327, and of Green, J., in Gregory v. Baugh, Id. 636, and the authorities there cited. It is said in Spring v. South Carolina Ins. Co., 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 268, 5 Pet. Cond. R. 434, to be the practice of that court, to require proof of the hand-writing of both the dead or absent witness, and of the obligor. That this has not been, however, the invariable practice of that court, at least in the case of old bonds, is obvious, from the case of Coulson v. Walton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 62. In that case the genuineness of a bond thirty-five years old at the filing of the bill was drawn in question. The obligor and obligee, and one of the attesting witnesses were certainly dead, and the other attesting witness was supposed to have been killed by the Indians many years before. Three witnesses deposed to the hand-writing of the first mentioned witness, but no proof was offered of the hand-writing of the obligor, or of the other witness. The court cited the doctrine laid down in Barr v. Gratz, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 231, "that where a deed is more than thirty years old, and is proved to have been in possession of the lessors of the plaintiff in ejectment, and actually asserted by them, as the ground of their title in a chancery suit, it is, in the language of the books, sufficiently accounted for, and it is admissible in evidence, without regular proof of its execution by the subscribing witnesses:" and held the bond sufficiently proved, by the proof of the hand-writing of the deceased attesting witness. See, also, Winn v. Patterson, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 663; where, under the circumstances of the case, even a copy of a recorded power of attorney, forty years old when it was offered as evidence, (the loss of the original having been accounted for), was admitted on proof of the hand-writing of one of the attesting witnesses, the other being presumed to be dead after thirty years. The proof of the hand-writing was the deposition of the deputy clerk of the court where the power was recorded. The deponent stated that he was familiar with the hand-writing of the witness (who was a justice of the peace, and who signed it as such); that he was dead; that he must have believed the official signature of the witness to have been genuine at the time, or he would not have admitted the paper to record, and that the paper offered was a true copy from the record, he having compared it with the record of the original made by himself.

sonal representative of the debtor. In support of this construction of that opinion, the plaintiff relies on these expressions. "With respect to the creditor, unless it be for his advantage, the personal estate may be said to be exhausted, when there are no longer assets in the hands of the executor." These words are used with reference to general dicta, found in cases cited by the heir, which declare, that the personal estate must be first exhausted, before the creditor would receive the aid of a court of equity against the real assets, and are intended to show the sense in which those dicta ought to be understood. They do not lay down a substantive, independent principle. If, in the case of Corbet v. Johnson [supra], the personal estate, instead of being wasted, had been in the hands of legatees, who could with ease have been brought before the court, I should have directed them to be made parties to the suit, and if such was the fact in this case, the opinion delivered on that occasion, would not be considered as opposed to a similar direction. But such does not appear to be the fact. The answer of the heir does not allege personal property in the hands of the legatees. On the contrary, it seems to rely on the waste of that property, as an objection to the recovery of the plaintiff; because, the resort of the heir against the personal fund is lost. The fact of an existing personal fund is not proved, and if it was proved, we are not sure that the court could notice it, in contradiction to the allegations of the parties. The case then, appears to stand on the same principles in this particular, with that of Corbet v. Johnson, and the court adheres to the opinion given in that case. But no decree will be given at this term, because the court is not satisfied under the particular circumstances of the parties, to declare, that this is the deed of William Hunter, although, perhaps, the difficulty will not be deemed sufficient at the next term, to prevent a termination of the suit.

There is at present certainly one conclusive impediment to a decree, which has not been mentioned, because it is presumed, that the plaintiff is able to remove it, and because, should it be removed, the court would still suspend its decision on the obligation, for further proof from the defendants. That impediment is the want of title in the plaintiff. There is no evidence, that the bond was taken for his benefit.[5] An issue may be directed, if the plaintiff has no objection. If he has, it will probably be directed at the next term, provided the defendant then exhibits circumstantial testimony against its being the deed of William Hunter.

MURDOCK (WHETMORE v.). See Case No. 17,510.

[5] The bond purports to have been executed by Thomas Claiborne and William Hunter, in favour of Archibald Govan, and there is no assignment endorsed upon it to the plaintiffs, or to any other parties whatsoever.

MURDOCK et al. v. WOODSON et al.

[2 Dill. 188.][1]

Circuit Court, W. D. Missouri. June 16, 1873.[2]

RAILWAY MORTGAGE—POWER OF TRUSTEES TO SUE—JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURT OVER STATE OFFICERS — CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — SPECIAL ACTS—TITLE OF ACT—CONSTRUCTION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF MISSOURI AS TO RELEASE OF THE STATE'S LIEN ON RAILROADS.

1. The trustees in a railway mortgage for the benefit of numerous and widely scattered bondholders secured thereby, have sufficient authority and interest to enable them to bring a bill in equity to enjoin an alleged illegal proceeding which will injure the value of the bonds and cast a cloud upon the security, or a bill to have a controverted priority of lien settled before an irredeemable sale is made under another mortgage, which is claimed to be prior to that made to the trustees.

[Cited in Mercantile Trust Co. v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 51 Fed. 537.]

2. The circuit court of the United States may, in a proper case, enjoin the agents or officers of a state, whatever may be their grade, and this although the state may be the real party in interest; this doctrine applied in this case against the governor of Missouri acting as the special agent of the state in the foreclosure of a mortgage lien for the benefit of the state.

[See Bancroft v. Thayer, Case No. 835.]

3. In 1868, the state of Missouri, holding a first mortgage lien upon the Pacific Railroad of that state as indemnity for state bonds issued for the benefit of that company, passed an act by which, in consideration of $5,000,000, to be paid by the company to the state, and which was paid, the state released and discharged the company from the lien and all liability in respect of said bonds; and on the faith thereof the company mortgaged its roads to raise money to pay the state, undertaking to give the lenders a first lien. In 1873, the legislature of the state directed the foreclosure of the state's mortgage which had been released: Held (construing various provisions of the constitution of the state), that, under section 27, art. 4, of the constitution of the state, the act of 1868 was not invalid because it was a special law.

[Cited in Trask v. Maguire, Case No. 14,145.]

4. Under section 32, art. 4, of the state constitution, it was not invalid because it related to more than one subject; and it was also held that the subject was sufficiently indicated by the title of the act.

5. The state legislature was not prohibited by section 15, art. 11, of the state constitution, or by the railroad constitutional ordinance of the state from discharging its mortgage or lien on receiving the full value of its security, and of that value the legislature was the judge; so held in favor of bondholders who in good faith advanced to the company the money with which to make payment to the state.

[Cited in brief in State v. Chappell, 74 Mo. 337.]

6. It seems that the statutory lien reserved by the state was for its indemnity, and was under its control as between it and the holders of its bonds.

The case came before the circuit judge at his chambers on an application by the plaintiffs [Uriel A. Murdock and Luther Clark], trustees in a mortgage made by the Pacific Railroad of Missouri, dated July 15, 1868, for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendants—[Silas] Woodson, who is the governor, and [H. Clay] Ewing, who is the attorney general, of the state of Missouri—from advertising and selling the said Pacific Railroad and its franchises under a statutory lien thereon claimed by the state of Missouri. The bill is very voluminous, but the following abstract will suffice to show its general nature and scope. It sets forth that the plaintiffs are citizens of New York, and that Woodson and Ewing, named above, are governor and attorney general of the state of Missouri, and that the Pacific Railroad is a corporation created by and under an act to incorporate the Pacific Railroad, approved March 12, 1849, to construct and operate a railroad from St. Louis to a point near Kansas City, and that it did in 1851 commence the construction of the said road, and that now said road is two hundred and eighty-three miles in length; that during the progress of the work of construction the state loaned its credit to the company by issuing its bonds to the aggregate amount of $7,000,000; that of the bonds so delivered to the company the sum of $2,000,000 was under the act of February, 1851, entitled "An act to expedite the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and of the Hannibal & St. Jo. Railroad." The bill then recites the terms and conditions upon which the bonds were to be paid, and also the conditions upon which bonds were granted to the railroad in 1855, and also that by authority of acts of the legislature subsequent to the act of 1851, bonds to the amount of $5,000,000 were issued by the governor and delivered to the railroad company, and negotiated, the proceeds being used in the construction of the road—said bonds constituting a mortgage or first lien on the road and its appurtenances. It is stated that the entire amount of bonds thus issued was $7,000,000, the first $3,000,000 being redeemable at the pleasure of the legislature at any time after the expiration of twenty years from date of issue, and the remainder payable in thirty years from date of issue. The bill then sets forth the disastrous effect of the war of the Rebellion on the road, then completed from St. Louis to Sedalia, one hundred and eighty miles; that no work of construction was done between the years 1861 and 1864, nor was work resumed until after the legislature had empowered the company to borrow money to complete its line authorizing it to issue 1,500 bonds of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of seven per cent, payable in four, five, and six years after date, to secure the payment of which the company was authorized to place a mortgage constituting a first lien on the line of its road west of Dresden for a distance of sixty-five miles, it being required that the proceeds of said bonds should be applied to the completion of that part of the road. By the same act, the state of Missouri relinquished its first lien and mortgage, and right of forfeiture on all that part of the road west of Dresden, retaining, however, a second lien or mortgage thereon, with condition that on the payment of the $1,500,000 the state's second lien should become a first lien. By the provisions of the act it was made obligatory on the company to apply all its net profits to the extension and equipment of such part of its road until fully completed, reserving sufficient only for the payment of interest on the bonds actually issued by the company known as the Dresden bonds. The company obtained the money on these bonds, and was extending the line in 1864, when "a large army of insurgents" entered the state and marched along the line from Franklin, thirty-five miles from St. Louis, to the western terminus of the line at Warrensburg, a distance of one hundred and eighty-three miles, and destroyed bridges, cars, engines, and other property to an amount exceeding $1,000,000, rendering the road unfit for use for many months thereafter, and hence the road was not completed to the state line within the time, or at such reasonable cost as was contemplated by the Dresden bonds. In consequence of these serious losses, and the inability of the state to extend any more aid, the people of the city and county of St. Louis, by authority of law, loaned their credit, in 1865, to said company in the sum of $700,000, for which bonds of the county for that amount were issued, payable in twenty years from date, and delivered to the company on its obligation to pay the interest as it matured, and redeem the bonds themselves when due.

The road was finally put in running order to the western boundary of the state, in 1866, but the Dresden bonds and the county credit proved insufficient to pay for such extension and for the repairs and equipment, and at the time of the completion there remained due, chiefly to citizens of Missouri, a large floating debt, which in equity and good conscience, together with the loan by St. Louis county, possessed claims for payment not inferior to those possessed by the state under its statutory mortgage. In 1868, the said floating debt amounted to $1,092,848, besides an unaudited debt of $290,000, and the first installment of the Dresden bonds, $500,000, was not paid. At this time a large portion of the stock, $3,614,500, was held by citizens of Missouri, and by counties and cities therein—$2,280,000 being held by St. Louis city and county. So the company appealed to the general assembly and people of the state for protection—since if the governor sold the road, according to the terms of the bond acts, all of the stock would be foreclosed, and the purchaser would hold the road and appurtenances uncontrolled by the said stock, or any part of it, and a loss of over $3,500,000 would be inflicted on the state—and great losses on other people. The state came to the rescue, and proceeded to legislate on the subject of a settlement and payment by the company of all claims due the state, the foreclosure of its mortgage, and a sale and conveyance of its rights in the property. An act was passed in 1868, entitled "An act for the sale of the Pacific Railroad and to foreclose the state's lien thereon, and to amend the charter thereof," the first section of which required the governor to sell the Pacific Railroad according to the provisions of the act of 1851, it being provided that the price for which the road might be sold at public auction should not be less than $8,350,000, payable to the state treasurer in bonds of the state or in money, within ninety days from the day of sale, and if such sum should not be realized, the governor should buy the road for and in the name of the state. And it was provided that if any other person than the state should purchase the road, then the state should assume and pay the principal and interest due, or to become due, on the $700,000 bonds issued by the county of St. Louis, and also $650,000 of the floating debt of the company. The purchaser must also bind himself to change the gauge of the road its entire length within ten years from the date of sale, so as to conform to the gauge of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; it was further provided, that if the company should, within ninety days from April 1, 1868, pay into the state treasury the sum of $350,000 in bonds of the state or in money, then the governor should not advertise the road for sale—and on the payment of $5,000,000, in cash or state bonds, within ninety days thereafter, then the governor was to deliver to the road a release of all state claims. These amounts were paid at the time specified, and Governor Fletcher delivered the release as provided by law. The orators then declare that the price paid by the company in liquidation of the debt was largely in excess of the true value of the property mortgaged, and as a means of paying the Dresden bonds, of purchasing iron and rolling stock, and paying off the floating debt, and especially to raise the funds to pay the balance of the sum due the state, $4,650,000, the company, July 15, 1868, mortgaged to complainants and one James Punnett (now deceased), the entire line of the Pacific road from Fourteenth street in St. Louis, to Kansas City, to hold in trust for the use and benefit of the holders of the bonds to be issued according to conditions of the said mortgage, on condition that if the company should pay said bonds and interest, the mortgage should be void, but on failure to do these things, they should be authorized, on the written request of any one bondholder, to cause the property to be advertised and sold in St. Louis, for cash, on ninety days' notice. Said trustees accepted the trust, but since that time Mr. Punnett died, and his vacancy has not been filled. These purchasers, it is averred, would not have purchased said bonds had they entertained any doubt as to the constitutionality of the law authorizing them so to do—and the general assembly has held five sessions since that conveyance, and has raised no objections to the act aforesaid; and during that time the railroad bonds were being sold and transferred from hand to hand until half of them were gone; so the investment made by the complainants was made in full confidence as to the good faith of the state. The mortgage was executed to complainants in July, 1868, and since then the railroad company have issued other bonds amounting to $3,000,000, at seven per cent, the proceeds being used to make valuable improvements, besides which the company have purchased valuable real estate in the city of St. Louis, and made several other large expenditures in good faith.

The bill charges Governor Woodson and Attorney General Ewing, with combining and confederating with parties unknown to your orators, "how to injure and wrong your orators and the bondholders, whom they represent under the deed aforesaid, have threatened and do now threaten to cause the whole of said railroad to be advertised for sale, to satisfy supposed claims due the state under the acts granting aid as aforesaid; and that the governor's acts have already caused great decline in all the bonds and other securities issued by said company, and have aroused the most serious apprehensions and alarm among the holders thereof—all this on the ground that the lien of the state on said road exists in full force, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of the 31st of March, 1868; also pretending that the authority to advertise the road for sale as conferred by the act of 1851, is still in force, and that the act of 1868 only repeats its authority so to do. The orators declare that these pretensions are unfounded, as also is the claim that the company is indebted to the state for interest paid on the bonds of the state issued as aforesaid to the company. The governor also pretends he is authorized to sell the road by the provisions of a resolution passed by the general assembly, March 21, 1873, by which the attorney general is authorized to institute proceedings for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the law of March 31, 1868, before the supreme court of the state. And so the orators pray the court to grant them a writ of injunction restraining defendants from advertising or selling the road, or any part thereof, and to grant such other relief as the necessities of the case require. To this bill the governor and attorney general filed an answer, in substance, alleging that ten millions and a half of state bonds of Missouri were loaned to the Pacific Railroad Company, under the acts of 1851–53–55–57, some of them having twenty years to run, and others thirty years, with coupons attached for the payment of semi-annual interest, at six per cent per annum. That the company had never paid either principal or interest on said bonds; that the company had sold said bonds to bona fide holders, for value, in 1852-53-54-55-56-57-58, all of said bonds being secured by a first lien on said railroad and its appurtenances, the company being bound to pay all the coupons and the bonds when they respectively become due. That the state was not liable for any damage or loss of the company by reason of the war of the Rebellion. That the fifth section of the act of the 31st of March, 1868, is unconstitutional and void, being in direct conflict with the fourth section of an ordinance for the payment of state and railroad indebtedness, adopted by the convention on the 8th of April, and by the people of the state on the 6th of June, 1865, and also in conflict with the constitution adopted at the same time. That the bona fide holders of said state bonds could not be prejudiced by the said act of 1868, or any other act of legislation affecting the validity of a contract created by the said acts, loaning the said ten and a half millions of state bonds to the railroad company, secured by a statutory mortgage, which was the first lien upon the said Pacific Railroad and its appurtenances. That said bondholders were entitled to said first lien, and to insist that the road should be sold by the governor of Missouri to provide means for the payment of said bonds. That the five million dollars paid by the company to the state, under the act of 1868, should be applied to the liquidation of the interest then due the state on the coupons that had been paid by the state. That the interest due the state was then largely in excess of the sum of said five million dollars, and that the governor was bound to sell the said road and its appurtenances under the statutes of Missouri.

James Baker and John B. Henderson, for plaintiff.

H. Clay Ewing, Atty. Gen. of Missouri, and Hill & Bowman, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. In 1851, and at various times between that year and 1855, the general assembly of the state of Missouri passed acts loaning the credit of the state to the Pacific Railroad, to the Southwest Branch thereof, to the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad, to the Iron Mountain Railroad, and other railroad companies. The present case relates alone to the (Missouri) Pacific Railroad, whose line extends from St. Louis to Kansas City. The object of the legislation was to secure the completion of the roads. The form in which the aid was extended was this: The state made its bonds, promising to pay the amounts thereof to the company or its order, with coupons attached; and by the act "the faith and credit of the state were pledged for the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal of the said bonds." Act of February 22, 1851 (Laws 1851, p. 265).

The company was, by the act, to make provision for the punctual payment of the interest and principal of the bonds so issued by the state, so as to exonerate the state from advances of money for that purpose. To secure this undertaking on the part of the company, the act provided that the net tolls and income of the road should be pledged for the payment of interest, and that the acceptance of the bonds by the company "should become and be, to all intents and purposes, a mortgage of the road of the company, and every part and section thereof, and its appurtenances, to the people of the state, for securing the payment of the principal and interest of the sums of money for which such bonds shall, from time to time, be issued and accepted as aforesaid."

This was to be the first lien, or mortgage on the road, and it was further provided by the act that if the company should make default in the payment of either principal or interest, no more bonds should be issued to it, and it should be lawful for the governor to sell the road and its appurtenances, at auction, to the highest bidder, on six months' notice; or to buy in the same, at such sale, for the state, subject to such disposition of the road or its proceeds as the legislature might thereafter direct. Act of February 22, 1851.

Under these provisions as to security, it is admitted in the bill, that state bonds were, from time to time, issued for the benefit of the Pacific Railroad, to the extent of $7,000,000. The answer asserts that the amount thus issued was over $10,000,000. The acts of the legislature referred to would seem to show that about $10,000,000 of bonds were issued to the Pacific Railroad, but part of this amount was for the Southwest Branch (now the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad), and secured on that road alone, leaving $7,000,000 to the Pacific road proper. It is not regarded as necessary on this application to determine whether the averment of the bill or of the answer as to the exact amount of bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad is correct.

In 1864, the road not being completed, the legislature of Missouri authorized the company to borrow $1,500,000, payable in four, five, and six years, and to secure it by a first lien on the road west of Dresden—the state waiving, for this purpose, and to this extent, its priority of lien.

In 1866 the road was finished and put in running order to the west line of the state, but in order to effect this the company had, in 1865, received aid from St. Louis county to the amount of $700,000. On the 31st day of March, 1868, the act was passed the validity of which so far as relates to its fifth section is the only question which this case on its merits presents. At this time the road is stated in the bill to have been in bad condition as to repairs and equipments, and the company owed a floating debt of $1,092,848, an unadjusted debt of about $200,000, and the first instalment of the Dresden bonds, amounting to $500,000. Of its stock, $3,614,500 was held by citizens and municipalities of Missouri—over $2,000,000 by St. Louis city and county, or tax-payers therein. The company had failed, since July, 1859, to pay interest on the state bonds.

Meanwhile the new constitution of the state had been adopted, which went into effect July 4, 1865. In the body of the constitution (article 11, § 15), is this provision: "The general assembly shall have no power, for any purpose whatever, to release the lien held by the state upon the railroad." In addition to this a constitutional "ordinance for the payment of state and railroad indebtedness" had been adopted which went into effect June 6, 1865. This ordinance provided for the levy of a heavy annual tax upon the Pacific Railroad and other roads, to be "appropriated to the payment of principal and interest now due, or hereafter to become due, upon the bonds of the state, or the bonds guaranteed by the state, issued to the aforesaid railroad companies."

By the fourth section of the ordinance it is provided, that "should either of said companies refuse or neglect to pay said tax as herein required, and the interest or principal of any of said bonds, or any part thereof, remain due and unpaid, the general assembly shall provide by law for the sale of the railroad and other property, and the franchises of the company that shall be thus in default, under the lien reserved to the state, and shall appropriate the proceeds of such sale to the payment of the amount remaining due and unpaid from said company." And the fifth section of this ordinance provides that "whenever the state shall become the purchaser of any railroad, or other property, or the franchises sold as hereinbefore provided for, the general assembly shall provide by law in what manner the same shall be sold for the payment of the indebtedness of the railroad company in default, but no railroad or other property, or franchises purchased by the state, shall be restored to any such company until it shall have first paid in money, or in Missouri state bonds, or in bonds guaranteed by the state, all interest due from said company; and all interest thereafter accruing shall be paid semi-annually in advance, and no sale or other disposition of any such railroad or other property, or their franchises, shall be made without reserving a lien upon all the property and franchises thus sold or disposed of, for all sums remaining unpaid; and all payments therefor shall be made in money or in the bonds or other obligations of the state."

With these provisions of the constitution and constitutional ordinance in force, and in this condition of the company as respects its road and its indebtedness to the state and to others, the legislature passed the act of March 31, 1868. Laws 1868, p. 114. This act is entitled "An act for the sale of the Pacific Railroad, and to foreclose the state's lien thereon, and to amend the charter thereof."

"Sec. 1. The governor is hereby directed and required to sell the Pacific Railroad and its appurtenances, and all property belonging thereto, in accordance with the provisions of section 5 of this act, and an act entitled 'An act to expedite the construction of the Pacific Railroad and of the Hannibal & St. Joseph Railroad,' approved February 22, 1851.

"Sec. 2. Upon the sale of the road, as provided in the foregoing section, the price and the sum for which the same shall be sold shall not be less than eight millions and three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, payable to the state treasurer, in bonds of this state or in money, within ninety days from the date of sale. No bid, except the bid of the governor on behalf of the state, shall be accepted, unless there is paid to the state treasurer, who shall attend the sale, an amount of not less than three hundred thousand dollars in such bonds or money, as a part of the purchase money, to be paid when the road is stricken off; and such bonds or money shall be forfeited to the state in case the purchaser or purchasers shall fail to pay the amount of purchase money bid within the time above provided for. Such sale shall take place at the east front door of the court house, in the city of St. Louis, between the hours of ten o'clock in the forenoon and four o'clock in the afternoon.

"If said sum of eight millions three hundred and fifty thousand dollars is not realized at such sale, the governor shall, by himself or agent, buy in the same for and in the name of the state of Missouri."

Section 3 is not important in the questions before the court.

"Sec. 4. Upon the payment of all the purchase money as specified in section 2 of this act, and upon the delivery of an obligation in conformity with section 3 of this act, the governor shall execute a deed to the purchaser or purchasers, conveying all such right, title, and interest, in and to said Pacific Railroad, its franchises, appurtenances, and the property belonging thereto, as are subject to the lien of this state."

Then follows section 5, which is the one on which the principal question made in this case turns:—

"Sec. 5. If the Pacific Railroad shall, at any time within ninety days after the first day of April, 1868, pay into the treasury of the state the sum of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars, in the bonds of this state or in money, then, and in that event, the governor shall not advertise said road for sale; and if the said company shall, within ninety days thereafter, pay into the state treasury an additional sum equal to five millions of dollars in all (the same being either in cash or Missouri state bonds), the governor shall, upon the production of the receipts of the state treasurer for said amounts, execute and deliver to the said Pacific railroad company a deed of release for all claims, title, and interest, which the state of Missouri has in and to the said Pacific Railroad, its property and appurtenances; and the said Pacific Railroad Company shall, from and after the delivery of said deed, be fully discharged from all claims or debts due to the state, and all liability growing out of the issue of the bonds of the state to aid in the construction of said road, and no sale shall, in that event, take place under this act. If, however, for any cause, the said company shall be unable to pay the additional sum as herein provided, the governor shall proceed to advertise said road; but if the said company shall, during the pendency of said advertisement, pay into the state treasury the additional sum, with interest thereon from the first day of October, 1868, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, then, and in that case, no sale of said road shall take place, and the governor shall execute and deliver to the said Pacific Railroad Company the deed of conveyance and release provided for in this act, and the said Pacific Railroad Company shall be exempt from all the liabilities and obligations herein specified; but in case the said company shall, after the payment of three hundred and fifty thousand dollars above stated, fail to pay the additional sum specified (being the remainder of the five millions), then, and in that case, the sum first paid shall be forfeited to the state."

It is admitted that the company within ninety days paid into the state treasury the $350,000, and within ninety days thereafter, the balance of the $5,000,000, and received a deed from the governor in pursuance of the act releasing and discharging it and its property from all liens and claims on the part of the state, and from all liability growing out of the issue of the bonds of the state to aid in the construction of its road.

In order to retire the Dresden bonds and to raise the $5,000,000 to be paid to the state and to put its road in repair, the company, on July 15, 1868, made a mortgage to the plaintiffs as trustees, to secure $7,000,000 of bonds. This mortgage recites the act of March 31, 1868, and it was the professed intention to make it after the payment of the $5,000.000 to the state, and upon payment of the Dresden bonds a first lien on the entire Pacific road, its property and franchises. Subsequently, on July 1, 1871, a second mortgage was made by the company for $3,000,000, the proceeds of which it is alleged were exclusively used in improving the road and in purchasing rolling stock. Both of these mortgages are outstanding and unpaid, as also another mortgage for $800,000 secured upon certain lands in St. Louis purchased for depot purposes.

In March, 1873, the general assembly of Missouri adopted a concurrent resolution reciting that grave doubts had arisen as to the constitutionality of the act of March 31, 1868, and directing the attorney general of the state "to institute and prosecute all suits and other proceedings at law and in equity requisite and necessary for the purpose of testing and causing to be determined by the supreme court of the state of Missouri, the constitutionality of said act, and to institute and prosecute such suits and proceedings at law and in equity as may be requisite and necessary to protect and enforce all the rights, interests, and claims of the state against the Pacific Railroad (of Missouri)."

Under this authority, the governor, by the advice of the attorney general and his associate counsel, has resolved to proceed, not by suit, but by advertising the road and its appurtenances for sale under the original statutory lien in favor of the state. This proceeding on the part of the state authorities assumes that the fifth section of the act of March 31, 1868, is unconstitutional; that the statutory lien of the state is yet in full force, and that it is the first lien on the Pacific road, its property, and appurtenances; and if this assumption is well founded in point of law, the proposed sale, if made, would cut off the mortgage to the plaintiffs, and the rights of the holders of the seven millions of bonds secured thereby. On the other hand, if the fifth section of the act of March 31, 1868, is not unconstitutional, then the state has no lien to be enforced, and the proposed sale, if made, would be wholly nugatory.

On the merits, the controlling question in the case, therefore, is, whether the fifth section of the act of 1868 violates some provision of the constitution or constitutional ordinance of the state.

Before reaching this question, some objections of a preliminary nature to the case made by the bill must be determined.

1. It is insisted by the attorney general of the state and his associate counsel that the plaintiffs have no sufficient authority, interest, or title, to enable them to maintain this suit or ask the relief sought. The plaintiffs are the trustees of the bondholders under the mortgage of July 15, 1868, for $7,000,000. The bondholders are numerous and widely scattered, and the plaintiffs holding the title to the railroad and property mortgaged to secure the bonds have a right, as representing the bondholders, to apply for judicial intervention to have the respective rights of the state and of themselves settled before any sale is made or attempted. If they are right in the position they take in the bill the state is wrong, and has no right to sell the road or offer to sell it. The effect of advertising the road for sale by the governor, under the advice of the attorney general and the able counsel associated with him, could not be otherwise than seriously to depreciate the value of the bonds secured by the mortgage to the plaintiffs; and this injurious effect would be greatly increased if a sale were actually to be made in advance of a legal determination of the respective rights of the parties.

2. The next objection relates to the parties defendant.

It is insisted that "the governor and attorney general of Missouri cannot be enjoined in the federal court from proceeding under the statutes of the state to foreclose the state lien, unless those statutes are in conflict with the constitution of the United States."

This statement of the objection, taken from the brief of the learned counsel for the state, concedes, by implication, that if the statutes of the state do conflict with the federal constitution then the federal courts may, in a proper case, enjoin the agents or officers of the state. The mere fact that a state officer, whatever may be his grade, is a party, does not defeat the equity jurisdiction of the United States circuit court, although the state may be the real party in interest, and cannot, as such, be brought before the court. This was decided by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Osborne v. Bank of U. S., 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 783, and the doctrine has been frequently reaffirmed. It was asserted and applied by that tribunal during the present year, in the case of Davis v. Gray [16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 203]. The cases are there cited by Mr. Justice Swayne, and there is no call upon us to go over the same ground. In the case before us the state of Missouri is asserting simply the right of a creditor, or lien-holder, and not any right in her sovereign character. In the language of the supreme court of Missouri, "The governor, in the sale of the roads, is not acting in his political or executive capacity; he is not carrying out any of the powers delegated by the constitution; he is simply acting as a special agent, in obedience to power committed to him by an act of the legislature, which saw proper to intrust him with the particular function; but it might have devolved the duty upon any other person as well." State v. McKay, 43 Mo. 599.

If the fifth section of the act of March 31, 1868, is constitutional, it, and the proceedings had under it, and the deed of the governor, do constitute a contract between the state of Missouri and the company, which is under the protection of that provision of the constitution of the United States which prohibits a state from passing "any law impairing the obligation of contracts." Article 1, § 10. If that contract is valid, or the deed of the governor in 1868 to the company is effectual, any attempt by the governor, under the concurrent resolution of March 21, 1873, to enforce a lien which was satisfied, would be in violation of the rights of the company and its mortgage bondholders, and presents a fitting and proper case for the cognizance of the federal tribunals.

3. We are thus brought to the substantial question in the case, viz: the constitutionality of the fifth section of the act of 1868. We proceed to notice the several grounds upon which the state claims this section to be in violation of the constitution. It is urged that it is void because it was a special law, in contravention of the last clause of section 27 of article 4 of the constitution, by which it is provided that "the general assembly shall pass no special law for any case for which provision can be made by a general law, but shall pass general laws providing, so far as it may deem necessary, for the cases enumerated in this section, and for all other cases where a general law can be made applicable."

It is a sufficient answer to this objection to state that this is not one of the enumerated cases, and that the supreme court of the state of Missouri has recently decided that it is for the legislature, and not for the courts, to determine when a general law can be made applicable: State v. County Court of Boone Co., 50 Mo. 317. And such seems to be the prevailing view elsewhere taken: Cooley, Const. Lim. 129, note; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 26, and cases cited.

It is next insisted that the fifth section of the act of 1868 is void, because it violates section 32 of article 4 of the constitution of Missouri, which provides that "no law enacted by the general assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title; but if any subject embraced in an act be not expressed in the title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as is not so expressed." The title of the act of 1868 is, "An act for the sale of the Pacific Railroad, and to foreclose the state's lien thereon, and to amend the charter thereof." Similar provisions exist in many of the state constitutions, and they have been often construed to require only the general purpose (which must be a single one) of the statute to be fairly indicated by its title. Cooley, Const. Lim. 141–144; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 28, and cases cited. Different and incongruous subjects are not brought together in the act of 1868, but the provisions as to the sale of the road, and the foreclosure of the state's lien thereon, relate to but one subject within the meaning of the constitutional provision, and this subject is expressed in the title. The manner in which the lien of the state may be foreclosed will be considered hereafter.

It is next urged that the statutory lien in favor of the state was reserved by it, not exclusively for its own indemnity, but for the benefit of the holders of its bonds, and therefore the state, holding the lien merely as a trustee for its bondholders, could not release such lien while its bonds were outstanding, as they still are. None of the holders of these bonds are here, and it is not needful that we should inquire what equities they might have should the state refuse to pay them, and should they apply for relief against the railroad company or its property. I am inclined to think, however, that the form of the transaction indicates the intention of the parties. The state issued its bonds, and these were negotiated and taken upon the state's "faith and credit," without any accompanying security. To indemnify itself, the state provided for, and received, a mortgage upon the road of the company, and a pledge of its net tolls and income. Then comes the further provision that the companies shall punctually pay the interest and principal of the bonds, but if they fail to do so, the state may sell the road to others, or buy it in itself, to be thereafter disposed of as the legislature may direct.

It could not be maintained, we think, that if a sale were made by the state to a third person, that he would take it subject to a lien in favor of the holders of the bonds of the state. Such a view seems to be inconsistent with the provisions of the act under which the aid was given, and the lien reserved to the state, with the provisions of the fourth and fifth sections of the constitutional ordinance, as expounded by the supreme judges (37 Mo. 129, 134), and with the entire state legislation on the subject of disposing of roads purchased by the state under the lien reserved to it. The judges, in their answer to the governor, distinctly say, that "when the state becomes the purchaser of the railroad, under the lien reserved, both the lien and the former company are extinguished. The state remains liable for her own bonds, and owns the railroad, and the state may sell it without reserving a lien for the whole indebtedness of the former company, but only for the unpaid balance of the purchase money." 37 Mo. 134.

But the principal objection to the fifth section of the act of March 31, 1868, is, that it is in conflict with section 4 of the constitutional ordinance, and with section 15 of article 11 of the constitution, before quoted. The constitutional ordinance, in the event of the default therein specified, directs that "the general assembly shall provide by law for the sale of the railroad, and other property, and the franchises of the company that shall be thus in default under the lien reserved to the state." Section 15 of article 11 of the constitution is, that "The general assembly shall have no power, for any purpose whatever, to release the lien held by the state upon any railroad."

By force of these provisions, it is insisted by the counsel in the interest of the state: (1) That the state legislature is thereby prohibited from making or authorizing any sale, unless by public auction; (2) that such sale must be for the whole amount of the bonds of the state; and (3) that the sale or disposition to the company, under the fifth section of the act of 1868, of the interest of the state under its lien is a release of the lien contrary to the fifteenth section of the eleventh article of the constitution, above quoted, and that it would be so, even though the state should receive from the company the full value of the property and interests covered by its statutory mortgage.

In neither the fourth nor the fifth sections of the constitutional ordinance, nor in the body of the constitution, can be found any provision fixing the price at which the roads shall be sold, either to third persons or to the state, and if bought by the state, at what price they shall be resold to others. Of this opinion, it seems, were the state supreme judges, for, in their official answer to the governor, they say: "If the state could never sell the road without reserving a lien for the whole indebtedness of the former company to the state, she might never be able to sell at all, and so be in a worse condition than she was before." 37 Mo. 134. There being no restriction in the constitution or organic law as to the amount at which the roads might be sold, it follows that this was a matter wholly within the control of the legislature, and that counsel are mistaken in supposing that any sale by the state must be for the whole amount of bonds issued or guaranteed by the state, and the interest thereon. No such construction, so far as I can discover, has ever been adopted in any legislative act, but always the contrary one; and sales for vastly less than the lien of the state have been legislatively authorized or confirmed, and such confirmation approved by the supreme court. See, on this point, the case of State v. McKay, 43 Mo. 594, relating to the sale by the state of the Iron Mountain road. Accordingly this very act of March 31, 1868, provided, if $8,350,000 should not be bid or realized at the sale, that the governor should buy in the road in the name of the state; and the state, in case a sale was made, assumed $700,000 and interest due on the bonds issued by the county of St. Louis, and also $650,000 of the floating debt of the company. The state therefore authorized a sale of this road for $7,000,000 net, which was confessedly some millions less than the amount for which the company is liable on account of the state bonds. It can scarcely be doubted if such a sale had been made that the purchaser would have obtained, as against the state, a perfect title, and yet the state would have received but $7,000,000.

The practical effect of such a sale would have been to annihilate all the stock and all the interest of the stockholders in the road. The stock of counties and municipalities of the state, obtained in exchange for their bonds, would have been sacrificed, except the amount assumed for St. Louis county. The floating debt of the company, except the portion assumed by the state, would never have been paid.

But such a sale was not made, for by the fifth section of the act the company, in consideration of $5,000,000 paid to the state, received a "full discharge from all claims or debts due the state, and all liability growing out of the issue of the bonds of the state to aid in the construction of its road." This left the corporation in esse—preserved the stock and the interest of the stockholders—and gave to the unsecured creditors of the company the opportunity to obtain payment from it. If it were in the province of the court to pass judgment as to whether it were better to have sold to others outright for $7,000,000 net, with the consequences above pointed out, or to the company for $5,000,000, could we say that the legislature acted unwisely in adopting the fifth section?

In examining the transaction, we must look at substance rather than form—and in effect it was a sale of the state's interest to the company for $5,000,000. The legislature had the power to order a sale, and not being restrained by the constitution, it necessarily had the power to fix the price and terms of the sale. It could have authorized the sale for $5,000,000 to a third person—why not to the company for the same amount? There being no limitation in the constitution as to the price at which the general assembly might authorize the state to sell the road or to buy it in, or to re-sell it, the amount which the state would fix upon as the value of its security would, after all, depend upon legislative judgment. If the state had purchased for the $8,350,000 it might afterwards have sold it for any price it might see fit to take, whether more or less than that sum. The state agreed to take and did receive from the company the $5,000,000. The money was raised upon the mortgage and bonds which the present plaintiffs are here to protect. This mortgage was made and the money borrowed on the faith of the action of the state, and it was by this that the $5,000,000 were secured which was paid to the state and which it still retains. It was by this means that $1,500,000 of the Dresden bonds secured by a first lien on the west sixty-five miles of the road were paid. A second mortgage for $3,000,000 was made, and the money thus borrowed is alleged, and the answer does not deny the allegation, to have been used in ironing, repairing, and equipping the road. It is plain that this money was advanced on the faith of the legislation of 1868, and this appears on the face of the mortgage to the plaintiffs. These mortgages would have been worthless securities if it had been understood that the state still had a lien upon the road for the $7,000,000 and the nine or ten years' interest thereon, and this fact the state must be taken to have known when it received the $5,000,000, which was really the money of the bondholders and not of the company. Five sessions of the general assembly of Missouri met before any steps were taken to question the validity of the transaction in 1868; and it is manifest that that transaction cannot now be overthrown except by sacrificing the interest of men who have in good faith parted with their money on the strength of the legislation, acts, conduct, and acquiescence of the state. Looking back upon the transaction, I cannot say that the agreement to release the security of the state for $5,000,000 should, under the circumstances, and as respects the innocent mortgagees of the company, be held to be such a release as was forbidden by the constitution. The state had released or waived its first lien on the North Missouri Railroad, receiving no consideration therefor, and agreed to take a second lien. This was at or about the time the constitutional convention was in session, and undoubtedly it was such a transaction that was in the contemplation of the convention and the people when they adopted the provision prohibiting the state from releasing its lien on any railroad. It was not intended to prohibit the release of a lien for full value; and of such value the legislature was left to be the judge, and with its judgment the people of the state must be content. It is urged by counsel that this view makes the constitutional provisions of little value, since it leaves it in the power of the legislature to sacrifice the interests of the people by corrupt or injudicious bargains, and the court is appealed to to prevent the sacrifice which, it is claimed, the act of 1868 decreed. But we have only to deal with the question of legislative power; and the legislature, as the representative of the state as a mortgagee, and as the representative of her other interests, has full power except so far as restrained by the constitution. If it had been thought that the legislature could not have been trusted with the sale or disposition of the state's interest as to the amount to be received, undoubtedly additional restraints would have been imposed.

The state was not disabled from releasing its security on receiving full value for it, and of its value it was left by the constitution to be the judge—so left because there was nothing to restrain it.

I feel quite clear in the conviction that the equities of the bondholders under the plaintiffs' mortgage are superior to those of the state, and on this ground (reserving all questions of rights as between the company and the state), and on the ground that in case of controversy as to priority of lien, the priority ought to be settled before an irredeemable sale is made, I award a temporary injunction; but with leave to defendant to move to dissolve it before Mr. Justice MILLER and myself, should he be present at the September term of the court in St. Louis, or before Judge KREKEL and myself at the regular term at Jefferson City. Meanwhile, the issues may be made up and proofs taken under the rules.

NOTE. Provision of constitution requiring subject to be expressed in title of legislative act: State v. Miller, 45 Mo. 495; State v. Lafayette County Court, 41 Mo. 39; People v. Hills, 35 N. Y. 449; People v. Commissioners of Highways, 53 Barb. 70; Chiles v. Monroe, 4 Metc. (Ky.) 72; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 28, and cases cited; Cooley, Const. Lim. 81, 141, and cases cited.

The New York constitution of 1846 (section 4, art. 7) contained the following provision: "The claims of the state against any incorporated company, to pay the interest and redeem the principal of the stock of the state loaned or advanced to such company, shall be fairly enforced, and not released or compromised." In the case of Darby v. Wright [Case No. 3,574], this provision was construed, and subsequent legislation, authorizing, on certain conditions, a railroad company to issue its bonds to relay the road and complete certain improvements, and providing that such bonds should have priority of lien over the mortgage to the state, was sustained. The opinion of Hall, J., tends to sustain the conclusion reached in the principal case.

[NOTE. A perpetual injunction was granted. Case unreported. The cause was taken, on an appeal, to the supreme court, where the decree of this court, awarding the injunction, was affirmed; Messrs. Justices Miller and Davis dissenting. 22 Wall. (89 U. S.) 351.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1800.

PRIZE—CONDEMNATION IN FOREIGN COURT—REPLEVIN.

Replevin, for the ship Mt. Vernon. The defendant claimed property, under a capture and condemnation as prize; in the French court of prizes, established at the city of St. Domingo, in the island of St. Domingo, under the circumstances stated in the reports of the trials, relative to the same ship. Murgatroyd v. Crawford, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 491; Duncanson v. McLure, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 308.

CHASE, Circuit Justice, declared, that the whole transaction, between Murgatroyd and Duncanson, was a mere cover, to evade the laws of the United States; that the former was a mere trustee for the latter; and that, having been paid the full price for the ship, he had no property, on which the replevin could be maintained.

The plaintiff suffered a non-suit.

WILLIAMS v. SHALLCROSS.

[7 Wkly. Notes Cas. 147.]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Nov. 14, 1877.

AFFREIGHTMENT—PERIL OF THE SEA—FREIGHT—PARTIAL LOSS OF CARGO—BURDEN OF PROOF—"OUTPUT."

1. A claim for freight on a part of a cargo, ruined by sea water so as to lose its character entirely, not sustained; the libellant failing to show the quantity so ruined.

2. Quaere as to the liability of a consignee in such a case, where the quantity is ascertainable.

(1) Libel by Shallcross, owner and consignee of a cargo of potatoes, against the brig Muriel, for loss of a part of the cargo by wetting by sea water. (2) Libel by Williams, master, against the cargo, for freight. In December, 1876, Hyndman shipped a cargo of potatoes upon the brig, to be carried to Philadelphia, freight at the rate of twenty cents per Winchester bushel, payable on the "output" by consignee. The master signed bills of lading by their terms exempting the ship from liability for loss arising from "perils of the sea," and receipting for 8,390 bushels, "more or less." Upon arrival, the master delivered to Shallcross, who had purchased the bill of lading, 6,937 bushels in good condition, but the balance had become utterly destroyed by the action of sea water, and was a mere mass of mash. The consignee refused to receive this part or to pay freight therefor. The master then shovelled the mash overboard, without any measurement of its quantity, and sued for his freight. The suit for damage, being the first of the above actions, was first heard, and involved principally questions of fact in respect to storage.

Mr. Roney, for libellant in first case, and for respondent in second.

Mr. Flanders, for respondent in first case, and for libellant in second.

THE COURT (CADWALADER, District Judge). We have here a perishable cargo, with a voyage of extraordinary duration, and weather, which, however described by the witnesses, appears by the log to have been at a certain period tempestuous. The preponderating tendency of the proofs is that the cause of the damage suffered was wetting by water. The occurrences of the voyage suffice to explain this. The master of the vessel is therefore not liable to the merchant unless by reason of bad stowage. The question as to stowage is two fold: First. Was there proper and sufficient dunnage? On this point I do not think that the case of the libellant is made out on the law and the facts. Secondly. Is the proof of the grounding and shipping of water in the East river sufficient to show that the cargo therefore taken in was wetted so that it was improper to complete the lading without reference to that occurrence? On this point, if the decision depended on the examination in chief of the steward, the decree should, I think, be for the libellant. But in the steward's cross-examination, he says that he did not see any shipping of water, and the master and the mate testify that no water was taken in. The case of the libellant is one of great hardship, but the libel must be dismissed with costs.

Decree accordingly.

An appeal was taken, but subsequently discontinued, whereupon the suit for freight proceeded (being the second of the above actions).

Mr. Flanders, for libellant.

The purpose of the shipowner is to be paid for the space occupied, and for the transportation of the cargo. If its condition was unsound, that, it has already been decided, was no fault of the ship. And if its condition, whether arising from a peril of the sea, or from its intrinsic nature or character, is such that the quantity cannot be determined at the port of destination, then the criterion is, the quantity taken in at the port of shipment. Upon that quantity the freight is to be paid. Steelman v. Taylor [Case No. 13,349]; Dakin v. Oxley, 33 Law J. C. P. 115; Garrett v. Melhuish, 4 Jur. (N. S.) 943; Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Exch. 622; Frith v. Barker, 2 Johns. 327; 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 218.

Mr. Roney, for respondent.

The cargo not remaining in specie, and not having been lost by an intrinsic defect, but by a "peril of the sea," the vessel is relieved from liability, but the consignee is relieved in like manner from the payment of the freight.

April 12, 1879. THE COURT (BUTLER, District Judge), after referring to the former case, said, in substance:

We are now called upon to determine whether the respondent is liable for freight on this part of the cargo. He says it was not delivered, was lost on the voyage; that this rotten mass of slush was not in any sense potatoes. If this is true he is not liable. But the libellant denies that it is true. He contends that no part of the cargo was lost in the sense here involved, urging that the change in form and character of the part under consideration, and the consequent deterioration in value, is unimportant; that although the potatoes assumed a different shape, they, nevertheless, continued to be potatoes.

The legal principles involved are familiar and simple, but the novelty of the facts renders their application difficult. There is, however, a preliminary question to dispose of before this point is properly reached. As before stated, the freight was to be paid, at the rate named in the charter party, viz. twenty cents per Winchester bushel, on the "output." This involved a measurement at the port of delivery. The proofs show a measurement of only 6,937 bushels, on which the freight has been paid. The remainder (here involved) was shovelled into the river, without ascertainment of the quantity, neither party treating it as if liable to freight. It was susceptible of measurement —could have been weighed—without difficulty. How are we to ascertain the quantity? The able counsel for the libellant saw this difficulty, and very candidly acknowledged its seriousness on his attention being called to it. He endeavors to surmount it by taking the number of bushels stated in the bill of lading, and deducting therefrom the 6,937 which were measured here. The difference, he argued, represents the quantity that was not measured. To this there are two objections: First, that the bill of lading itself is indefinite. It states the quantity shipped to be 8,390 bushels, "more or less"; and, second, that the freight is to be paid, as we have seen, on the "output," giving to the shipper all advantages from shrinkage and diminution from every cause. If we knew the exact quantity shipped, we could not know or even approximate with certainty the quantity brought here, treating the decayed mass thrown away as potatoes. For, both in bulk and weight, there was serious decrease. Necessarily this must have been so.

The case of Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Exch. 622, is readily distinguished from this. There a quantity of wheat was shipped, to be paid for per bushel, without an exact ascertainment of quantity, but naming a given number of bushels as an approximate amount. Before reaching the port of delivery, it had so swollen from contact with water as to render ascertainment of the exact quantity shipped impossible. From the necessities of the case, the court was compelled to take the approximate amount named, and charge the shipper accordingly. Aside from other differences between that case and the one before us, it is quite sufficient that the necessity which called for and alone could justify what was there done does not exist. The extent of this cargo, as before observed, could readily have been ascertained.

No ascertained amount of "output" being shown beyond that already paid for, we may postpone a consideration of the important question first stated until its decision becomes necessary. The libel must be dismissed.

Decree accordingly, with costs. Oral opinion.

tions therein stated are not their answers, and were not assented to by them.]

On petition from superior court of Greene county.

Faircloth & Granger, for plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs in the above-named action, complaining of the defendant, allege:

1. That the plaintiffs, S. J. Murphrey and M. O. Murphrey, were on the 1st of July, 1874, and still are, partners, trading under the name and style of Murphrey & Co., and the plaintiff B. F. Murphrey was then and still is the trustee of the said M. O. Murphrey.

3. That on the first day of July, 1874, in consideration of the payment by the plaintiffs to the defendant of the premium of forty dollars, the defendant, by their agent duly authorized thereto, made their policy of insurance in writing, a copy of which will be filed as a part of this complaint, and thereby insured the plaintiffs, Murphrey & Co., against loss or damage by fire to the amount of two thousand dollars upon their stock of general merchandise, such as is usually kept in a country store, contained in a one and a half story frame shingle roof storehouse, occupied by said Murphrey & Co. as such, situated on what is known as the "Murphrey Farm," near Hookerton, Greene county, North Carolina.

4. That on or before said July 1, 1874, the plaintiffs, Murphrey & Co., made in writing, and filed with the defendant, an application for said policy of insurance, which is filed as a part of this complaint.

5. That at the time of making said application and insurance, and from then and until the fire hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs, Murphrey & Co., had an interest in the property insured as aforesaid, as the owners thereof, as follows: The said S. J. Murphrey one-half absolutely in her own right; the said M. O. Murphrey the other half absolutely as cestui que trust, and the plaintiff B. F. Murphrey holding the legal title absolutely to the latter half as trustee, for the sole use and benefit of the said M. O. Murphrey, to an amount exceeding the amount of said insurance.

6. That on the 24th of July, 1874, said storehouse, goods, and stock of general merchandise were totally destroyed by fire, the plaintiffs on their part having duly performed all the conditions and stipulations of said application and of said policy of insurance.

7. That the plaintiffs duly fulfilled all the conditions and stipulations of said application and of said policy of insurance on their part, and more than sixty days before the commencement of this action gave to the defendant due notice and proof of the fire and loss aforesaid as required, and demanded payment of the said sum of two thousand dollars, which was refused before this action was commenced.

8. That on said 1st of July, 1874, the property of the estate of J. T. H. Murphrey, deceased, independent of the property included in said insurance, was and still is more than sufficient to pay all debts and demands against said estate and the expenses of administering the same.

William F. Dortch, for defendant.

The defendant, answering the complaint herein, says:

1. That it is not true, as defendant is informed and believes, that the plaintiffs, S. J. Murphrey and M. O. Murphrey, were on the first day of July, 1874, and still are, partners. On the contrary, the defendant is informed and believes that they were then and are now married women, and the defendant is informed and believes that they have never become free traders. That defendant is informed and believes that the said S. J. Murphrey was on the first day of July, 1874, and is now, the wife of D. A. Murphrey, and that said M. O. Murphrey was at said date, and is now, the wife of B. F. Murphrey, her trustee.

3. That paragraph third is true, except that the payment of forty dollars was made by the plaintiff B. F. Murphrey, as defendant is informed and believes, and defendant insured, not the plaintiffs, but Murphrey & Co., whom the agent of the defendant supposed to be the said D. A. Murphrey and B. F. Murphrey, the latter having made the application for insurance, and having signed the same, and fraudulently concealed from said agent the fact (if it was a fact) that the said S. J. Murphrey and M. O. Murphrey were interested in said goods, and having further fraudulently concealed the fact that the title to one-half of said goods was in himself as trustee of said M. O. Murphrey, as defendant has been informed and believes he did.

4. That paragraph fourth is admitted to be true, except that defendant is informed and believes that the application was made by B. F. Murphrey, and was signed by him in the name of Murphrey & Co.

5. That defendant is informed and believes that paragraph fifth is not true. On the contrary, defendant is informed and believes that said property insured was, in part the property of the said D. A. Murphrey and B. F. Murphrey, and that a portion thereof belonged to the estate of J. T. H. Murphrey, who had recently died leaving a will, to which the said D. A. Murphrey qualified as executor.

6. Defendant believes it to be true that said storehouse, and the goods and merchandise which were then in said storehouse, were destroyed at the time stated; but defendant says it is not true that plaintiffs, on their part, have duly performed all the conditions and stipulations of said application and policy of insurance.

7. That no part of paragraph seven is true, as defendant is informed and believes, except that plaintiffs demanded payment, which was refused, before this action was commenced. Defendant admits that more than sixty days' notice was given, but says that due notice and proof of the fire and loss as required was never given.

8. Defendant is informed and believes that paragraph eighth is not true. On the contrary, defendant is informed and believes that the personal estate of the said J. T. H. Murphrey is largely insufficient to pay his debts.

10. Defendant further says, upon information and belief, that the plaintiff B. F. Murphrey, at the time of the application for said insurance, not only concealed the true ownership and value of said goods, but fraudulently represented the ownership thereof, and fraudulently represented the value thereof to be much more than they were really worth; that plaintiffs fraudulently claim to have lost goods by said fire, of much larger value than were in said store at the time of said fire. Wherefore the defendant demands judgment for costs, etc.

The plaintiffs ask the court to instruct the jury as follows: 1. That the delivery over to the plaintiffs of the goods bequeathed in the testator's will vested in them the title thereto, and this without regard to the sufficiency of personal assets to meet the testator's liabilities. 2. That the defendant, not being a creditor, nor having any interest in the testator's estate, cannot question the title as derived under the delivery and assent of the executor. 3. That the plaintiffs having the goods, and the right thereto, have an insurable interest therein entitling them to maintain the action. 4. That the plaintiffs had a perfect title, within the meaning of the conditions of the policy. 5. That if the jury believe that the defendant's agent, R. S. Shields, only made inquiry as to the name of the firm to be insured, and the value of the goods, and upon that prepared the application and policy, there was no misrepresentation or concealment vacating the policy. 6. That if no fraudulent representations or concealment were made, and the representations were honestly made as to the property insured and its value, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the value of the goods, not exceeding the sum insured at the time of the fire.

The defendant prays the court to instruct the jury: 1. That, under the contract contained in the policy of insurance mentioned in the complaint, the plaintiffs, Murphrey & Co., have expressly warranted that all the statements made in their application for insurance, filed with said complaint, are absolutely true. Bobbitt v. Liverpool & London & Globe Ins. Co., 66 N. C. 70. 2. That the burden of proving, to the satisfaction of the jury, that all of said statements are true, rests upon the plaintiff. 3. That if the jury find that any one or more of said statements were not true at the date of said application, to wit, on the 1st day of July, 1874, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. 4. That the plaintiffs having positively stated in their said application that an account of stock had been taken within four months just before the said 1st day of July, 1874, and having admitted on the trial that no such account had been taken since the month of February, 1873, they cannot maintain this action. 5. That the plaintiffs having positively stated in their said application that their title in the goods insured was "absolute," if the jury find that their said title was on the said 1st day of July in any respect less than absolute, they cannot maintain this action. 6. That what constitutes an "absolute title" is a question of law arising upon admitted facts, and the correctness of the copy of the will of J. T. H. Murphrey, introduced in evidence by the defendant, not being disputed, and the title to said goods being admitted to have been in the said J. T. H. Murphrey previously to his death, the plaintiffs' title in said goods was on the said 1st day of July not absolute, and they cannot maintain this action. 7. That the plaintiffs have not even offered to prove all the statements contained in the said application to be true, and must therefore fail in this action. 8. That the plaintiffs having, in their proof of loss, arrived at the value of the goods destroyed by a calculation which estimates the goods bought from Spiser to have been worth $3,200, when in fact they only cost J. T. H. Murphrey $2,200, which value they state in their said proof to have been $2,700, the defendant is entitled to have the said value reduced by $1,000, and in no case can the plaintiffs recover to exceed $1,700.

BOND, Circuit Judge (charging jury). If the jury find from the evidence that the title of the plaintiffs to the property insured was derived from the testator, Josiah T. Murphrey, who by his last will and testament devised the same to his son, B. F. Murphrey, to be held in trust solely for the use and benefit of Mary O. Murphrey, wife of said B. F. Murphrey, and her children by him, and, in case she should die without such children, then in trust for the rest of his children and their representatives at the time of such death, and shall further find that the plaintiffs, by their agent, represented in their application for said insurance that their title to the property insured was absolute, then the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover in this action; and if the jury find from the evidence that the said application for insurance was signed by the agent of the plaintiffs, though the same may be in the handwriting of the agent of the insurance company's agent, they are bound by it unless they can show that the answers to the questions therein are not their answers or those of their agent, and that he did not assent thereto. And the measure of damages is the value of the goods destroyed at the time of the fire, not exceeding the sum insured by the policy.

Verdict for plaintiffs of $1,500, with interest. On motion of defendant a new trial was granted, after which the case was compromised by payment of $800 and costs by defendant.

BANKRUPTCY—INSANITY—REOPENING THE ADJUDICATION.

Creditor of B. files a petition against him asking his adjudication in voluntary bankruptcy. The order to show cause was served on him, and on his default to answer he was adjudged a bankrupt, and after the appointment of an assignee, the property of B. was turned over to him, but no distribution among the creditors was ever made. Sometime thereafter, B. comes into court with a petition, supported by affidavits, showing that he was non compos mentis at the time the debts of the petitioning creditors were created, as well as at the time of the institution of proceedings and the adjudication, and until a very recent period. Held that under the above state of facts, the application to set aside the default and subsequent adjudication should be granted, and B. now allowed to show cause why he should not be adjudged a bankrupt.

[Doubted in Re Weitzel, Case No. 17,365.]

In bankruptcy.

TRIGG, District Judge. Creditors of Alonzo Murphy filed a petition against him, asking his adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy, some time in the year 1872. The order to show cause was served on him, and on his default to answer he was adjudicated a bankrupt, and his property turned over to an assignee. The property in the hands of the assignee has never been distributed among the creditors. Alonzo Murphy now comes in with a petition supported by affidavits, showing that he was non compos mentis at the time the debts of petitioning creditors were created, as well as at the time of the institution of proceedings, and the adjudication of bankruptcy, and until a very recent period. Under this state of facts, I cannot refuse the application to set the default and subsequent adjudication aside, and to allow Alonzo Murphy to show cause why he should not be adjudicated a bankrupt.

NOTE. A jury trial was subsequently had, and a verdict of insanity at the time of the adjudication rendered; whereupon the court ordered the assignee to restore the property to Murphy. [Case unreported.]

Circuit Court, D. Missouri, Oct. Term, 1867.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—CRIMINAL OFFENSES—EX POST FACTO LAW—CIVIL RIGHTS.

1. A person arrested in New Orleans in 1865, charged with offences committed in Mobile in 1863, and tried at St. Louis, must be discharged from confinement, in which he is held by sentence of a military commission, if the grand jury organized next after a list of prisoners so held is furnished to the judges, do not present him to the court for trial.

2. The act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 432), was intended to validate punishment of offenders, which would otherwise be invalid; to protect from civil process persons who, under the president's orders, had, in striving to suppress the Rebellion, rendered themselves amenable to prosecutions. The provision to secure the first of these objects is unconstitutional, because it is ex post facto.

[Cited in Moore v. State, 43 N. J. Law, 222.]

3. So far as that act relates to civil rights, and affords protection against civil suits, it was within the competency of congress. Per Miller, Circuit Justice.

The petitioner, William Murphy, was charged with the commission of grave offences in 1863 at Mobile, in Alabama, and in 1864 at Memphis. He was arrested in 1864 at New Orleans, and in 1865, at St. Louis, was tried by a military commission, found guilty, and condemned to imprisonment in the penitentiary of Missouri. The president approved the finding of the commission, and issued his order that the punishment be inflicted. After he was confined under this authority, a grand jury in the federal courts of the district had been organized and attended the term, and been discharged without a bill of indictment against the prisoner. At the succeeding term, he presented this petition for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the warden of the penitentiary. The above facts appeared by the return.

Mr. Noble, Dist. Atty., in support of the return.

Mr. Garesche, for petitioner.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. The prisoner is held by virtue of an order of the president of the United States, under and in conformity with the sentence of a military commission, which assembled in the city of St. Louis, in the fall of 1865, upon three charges. The first substantially charges him with having, in 1863, conspired, in the city of Mobile, Alabama, with sundry persons, to destroy, within the Federal lines, steamboats and other property. The second charges him with the destruction of the Champion, at Memphis, in September, 1864. The third charges him with the destruction of the Mepham, between Memphis and Cairo, in September, 1864. Upon the first two, he was found guilty, and sentenced to a servitude of ten years in the Missouri penitentiary. Upon the third, he was acquitted.

This class of questions has lately been thoroughly discussed by the supreme court, to the decision of which, this court, whatever be the individual opinions of its members, will ever pay the greatest respect. In the case decided last winter, of Milligan, Bowles, and others, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 2, the principles of the law relative to the trial of the citizen by a military tribunal were elaborately examined. The present, however, differs from that case in this particular—that the offences for which Milligan and his companions were tried had been committed in Indiana, where martial law had never prevailed, and where the courts were always open for the trial of offences. Here this is not the fact. The record shows that the offences for which Murphy was tried were committed, among other places, at Mobile, where the federal courts were then closed. They were open at the time and place of his arrest, that is, at New Orleans, and also at the time and place at which he is alleged to have committed one of the offences, that is, at Memphis. But in our view of the matter, this is unimportant here. This court must take notice of the fact that, at the time of his trial, the federal courts had resumed their functions, and in any of them the petitioner could have been tried for any of the offences of which those courts had jurisdiction.

The question, then, to be decided is, whether the offence charged comes within the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1863 [12 Stat. 755]. The supreme court of the United States unanimously concurred in the opinion that the act of 1863 authorized the president of the United States by proclamation to suspend, during the then existing Rebellion, the writ of habeas corpus in any portion of the United States. Previously he had exercised this power, and the contest had arisen as to whether it had been vested in him or in congress. By this act, congress intended to assert its own right. Conferring the authority upon the president to exercise the power, they intended to imply that they thought he did not possess it by virtue of his own functions. But the 2d section of the act limits the power conferred, and imposes conditions upon its exercise. It provided that while the president, in defence of the public safety, might arrest a person and not be required by a writ of habeas corpus to give the reason for the detention, yet such person was not to be detained beyond a limited period, unless proceedings in the courts of law were instituted against him. The secretaries of state and of war were required to furnish to the judges of the courts of the United States a list of the names of all parties, not prisoners of war, resident in their respective jurisdictions, who then were, or afterwards should be, held in custody by the authority of the president, and were citizens of the states where the courts were open. If the grand jury organized next after the list was furnished, failed to find a bill against a party confined upon the president's order, it was the duty of the court to discharge him. In the construction of this act, majority and minority opinions were given by the supreme court of the United States in the Milligan Case, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 2. I quote from the opinion of the minority, rendered by Mr Chief Justice Chase: "Indeed, the act seems to have been framed on purpose to secure the trial of all offences of citizens by civil tribunals, in states where these tribunals were not interrupted in the regular exercise of their functions."

The opinion of the majority of the court goes still further, and must be binding upon every member of that court, whatever be his individual opinion. It says: "The discipline necessary to the efficiency of the army and navy required other and swifter modes of trial than are furnished by the common law courts; and in pursuance of the power conferred by the constitution, congress has declared the kinds of trial, and the manner in which they shall be conducted, for offences committed while the party is in the military or naval service. Every one connected with these branches of the public service is amenable to the jurisdiction which congress has created for their government; and while thus serving, surrenders his right to be tried by the civil courts; and all other persons" (and these words are emphasized in the decision), "citizens of the states where the courts are open, if charged with crimes, are guaranteed the inestimable privilege of trial by jury." This petitioner was arrested at New Orleans in 1865, charged with offences committed at Memphis in 1864. In both of these places the courts of the United States were open, and perfectly competent to the trial of any offences within their jurisdiction. He was tried at St. Louis, in a state where the process of the courts had never been interrupted. Under the above construction of the act of the 3d of March, 1863, his discharge must be accorded to the petitioner, unless the point made by the district attorney, under the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1867 (14 Stat. 432), be valid. That act provides as follows: "All acts, proclamations, and orders of the president of the United States, or acts done by his authority or approval, after the 4th of March, A. D. 1861, and before the 1st of July, A. D. 1866, respecting martial law, military trials by courts martial or military commissions, or the arrest, imprisonment, and trial of persons charged with participation in the late Rebellion against the United States, or as aiders and abettors thereof, or as guilty of any disloyal practice in aid thereof, or of any violation of the laws or usages of war, or of affording aid and comfort to rebels against the authority of the United States, and all proceedings and acts done or had by courts martial or military commissions, or arrests and imprisonments made in the premises by any person, by the authority of the orders or proclamations of the president, made as aforesaid, or in aid thereof, are hereby approved in all respects, legalized and made valid, to the same extent and with the same effect as if said orders and proclamations had been issued and made, and said arrests, imprisonments, proceedings, and acts had been done, under the previous express authority and direction of the congress of the United States, and in pursuance of a law thereof previously enacted, and expressly authorizing and directing the same to be done; and no civil court of the United States, or of any state, or of the District of Columbia, or of any district or territory of the United States, shall have or take jurisdiction of, or in any manner reverse any of the proceedings had or acts done as aforesaid; nor shall any person be held to answer in any of said courts for any act done, or omitted to be done, in pursuance of or in aid of any of said proclamations or orders, or by authority or with the approval of the president, within the period aforesaid, and respecting any of the matters aforesaid; and all officers and other persons in the service of the United States, or who acted in aid thereof, acting in the premises, shall be held prima facie to have been authorized by the president; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." If this act be valid, the prisoner must be detained. It is evidently intended to make two provisions—the one, to validate the punishment of offenders, which would otherwise be illegal; the other, to protect from civil process the officers and others who, as subordinates of the president, have striven to put down the Rebellion, but whose acts have rendered them amenable to legal proceedings. So far as the first point is concerned, the law is unconstitutional; undoubtedly so. No clearer case of an ex post facto law could be framed. Its effect is to hold men in confinement for offences not punishable at the time they were committed, and to detain such persons in a servitude imposed by a court which had no jurisdiction to try them.

I had the honor of presenting the minority view in the cases decided last winter, generally known as the "Test Oath Cases." Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 382. In that opinion I entered into an exposition of the characteristics of an ex post facto law; and though I sought to qualify the positions held by the majority, yet, even under my views, as there expressed, this act, so far as its penalties are concerned, is clearly ex post facto. All laws which decree the punishment of an act not punishable at the time of its commission are ex post facto. The prisoner, up to the time of the passage of this law, was certainly illegally imprisoned, because tried by and held under the sentence of a court which had no jurisdiction of his person or of his offence. If he be remanded, it will be under an act passed subsequent to his offence, and even to his conviction. Can any law be more clearly ex post facto? However unpleasant it may be to declare an act of congress unconstitutional, yet, in a case so clear as this, we have no hesitancy as to our duty. We are of opinion that this petitioner is entitled to his discharge, and that the act of congress cannot be invoked to prevent it. But while declaring the invalidity of a part of that law, I deem it my duty, speaking only on behalf of myself, and not for any other member of the court, in order to prevent misapprehension, to say, that it is not necessary to the decision of the present cause to pass upon the validity of that part of the act of congress which gives immunity to the officers of the government. To that provision of the act, the views expressed in respect of its other provision have no application, and I am not required to pass upon it. My own impression is, however, that so far as it relates to civil rights, and affords a protection merely against civil suits, it was within the competency of congress to protect the officers of the government, by the exercise, as in this instance, of all its power. The prisoner will be discharged from the custody of the warden of the penitentiary. But inasmuch as the finding of the military court must be regarded by this court as prima facie evidence of his guilt of the grave offences with which he is charged, we will reserve the judgment until to-morrow, in order to enable the district attorney to inquire whether he should be remanded to the custody of an officer, to be sent to Tennessee or Louisiana for trial.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1833.

APPEAL—TERRITORIAL COURTS OF ARKANSAS—SUM UNDER ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS.

An appeal does not lie to the superior court in cases where the sum in controversy is less than one hundred dollars.

Appeal from Conway circuit court.

[This was a suit by Benjamin Murphy against Richard C. Byrd.]

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and CLAYTON, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an appeal from the Conway circuit court, and a motion has been made by the appellee to dismiss it on the ground that the sum in controversy between the parties being under one hundred dollars, the appeal was improperly granted, and this court has not jurisdiction. Whether this court has jurisdiction in cases in which the sum in controversy in the court below is under one hundred dollars, depends upon a proper construction of the several acts on the subject. The act of 1807, (Geyer's Dig. § 54, p. 261,) the act of congress of 1812, (Geyer's Dig. p. 34,) and the organic law of Arkansas, (Acts of 1818,) all in substantially the same language, provide that the superior court shall have appellate jurisdiction in all civil cases in which the amount in controversy shall be one hundred dollars or upwards. The language of the several acts cited are too plain to admit of a doubt. It is manifest that this court has not jurisdiction by appeal when the sum in controversy is under one hundred dollars. But it is contended that the act of congress of the 17th of April, 1828 [Bioren & Duane's Laws, vol. 8, p. 34], gives an appeal to this court in all cases without regard to the amount in controversy. The language of the act is, that "the party aggrieved shall be at liberty, by appeal, writ of error, or certiorari, to remove his suit to the superior court for further trial." This language, it is true, is very broad, but it is not incompatible with the provisions of the several acts before cited, and cannot be understood as having repealed them. The object of the act of 1828 was to legalize certain acts of the legislature of Arkansas, and to provide for the appointment of a fourth judge for this territory; and though the appellate jurisdiction of this court is provided for, it could not have been the intention of congress to repeal the act of 1807 regulating appeals, nor could it have been designed to repeal the provisions of the acts of 1812 and 1818 fixing the jurisdiction of this court in cases of appeal. This appeal must be dismissed. This court is governed in its proceedings by the rules of the common law and the act of 1807. The act of 1807 expressly allows a writ of error, as a matter of right. Cases in which the sum in controversy is less than one hundred dollars, may be brought to this court by writ of error, but not by appeal. Geyer's Dig. 263. Appeal dismissed.

MURPHY v. BYRD.

[Hempst. 221.] [1]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1833.

PLEADING AT LAW—PAYMENT—SURPLUSAGE—PLEA OF FRAUD.

1. A plea of payment referring to the instrument sued on, as a "supposed writing obligatory," is nevertheless good, and those words may be rejected as surplusage.

2. General plea of fraud is not admissible.

Appeal from Conway circuit court.

[This was a proceeding by Benjamin Murphy against Richard C. Byrd.]

Before ESKRIDGE, CROSS, and CLAYTON, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This case comes up by appeal from Conway circuit court. It is contended that the court below improperly sustained the demurrer to the defendant's two pleas of payment and fraud. The action is founded on a writing obligatory due the 11th of March, 1832, for the sum of one hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-two cents. By the defendant's plea it is alleged that "on the 11th day of March, 1832, in the county aforesaid, he paid to said plaintiff the said sum of one hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-two cents, according to the form and effect of said supposed writing obligatory." It is said that this plea is repugnant and inconsistent with itself, because it admits the writing by necessary implication, and afterwards denies it by referring to it as having only a hypothetical existence, and consequently the demurrer was properly sustained. Repugnancy will, in many instances, vitiate a plea, but not when the matter is nonsense, by being contradictory and repugnant to something precedent. In such cases the inconsistent matter will be rejected as surplusage. 1 Chit. 211; 1 Salk. 324. In the case before us, the allegation of payment in the plea, is a clear admission of the instrument upon which the action is founded, and the statement afterwards allowing it a supposed existence only, is contradictory and should be rejected as surplusage. It certainly could not be taken advantage of on a general demurrer, and special demurrers are not allowed under the provision of our statute. We think, therefore, that the circuit court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the plea of payment. A general plea of fraud has heretofore been decided by this court to be inadmissible, and clearly is so. Judgment reversed.

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1822.

JUDGMENT—SOUNDING IN FOREIGN MONEY—RATE OF EXCHANGE.

Judgment confessed, with liberty to the defendant at a future term to prove discounts. The judgment being for sterling money, the exchange is to be settled as of the day when the judgment was confessed.

Judgment was confessed in this case for $1100, Irish sterling, at the November term 1820 [see Case No. 2,226], with liberty to prove any discounts at a future session of the court. The plaintiff now admitted that the defendant was entitled to a credit against the judgment to the amount of $——, and the only question submitted to the court was, whether the rate of exchange should be settled as of the day when the judgment was confessed, or as of the present time. The court decided, that the rate of exchange when the judgment was confessed ought to govern.

MURPHY et al. v. EASTHAM et al.

[Holmes, 113; 5 Fish. Pat. Cas. 306; 2 O. G. 61; Merw. Pat. Inv. 130.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Feb. 23, 1872.

PATENTS—PRIOR INVENTION—EXPERIMENTS—DIFFERENT FORMS IN WHICH INVENTION MAY BE COPIED—RUBBER BRUSH-HEAD.

1. The fact that articles were constructed as experiments, but never made public, and ultimately abandoned and lost, does not affect the right of a subsequent original inventor of substantially the same article to take out a patent for his invention.

2. In contemplation of law, a patentee is deemed to claim the thing patented, however its form and proportions may be varied.

3. A patentee described and claimed a brush, having around the head, near the bristles, an angular groove, in which was placed a band of rubber made in the form of a parallelogram or rhombus, with one of its angles projecting outwards, so as to prevent the hard brush-head from coming in contact with the glass or other surface to be washed or dusted; the defendants' brushes had around the head, near the bristles, a semi-circular groove, in which was fitted a round rubber band, for the same purpose as the patentee's band. Held, that, as the operative part of the band could come in contact with the surface to be brushed only on one line in the periphery of the band, it was immaterial whether the band was round or angular in shape, or whether the groove was semi-circular, or polygonal, or triangular; and that the defendants infringed.

Final hearing on pleadings and proofs.

Suit brought [by Thomas E. Murphy and others against William W. Eastham and George G. Morris] upon letters patent [No. 98,787] for an "improvement in brush-head," granted to Francis McLaughlin, January 11, 1870, and assigned to complainants. The invention is fully described in the opinion, and is illustrated in the accompanying drawing, in which A represents the brush-head, and a, a, a, the band of rubber, with its projecting edge.

J. E. Maynadier and J. E. Newton, for complainants.

C. T. & T. H. Russell and H. W. Suter, for defendants.

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. Letters patent were issued to Francis McLaughlin on January 11, 1870, for an improved brush. The object of the invention was to obviate the danger of breaking glass and injuring the surface of the wood or other substance to be washed or dusted by contact with the brush-head. To obviate this difficulty, the patentee put around the brush-head or stock a circular band of rubber, in the form of a parallelogram or rhombus, with one of its angles projecting outward, and near the bristles or washing material. A groove was made in the brush-head or stock near the bristles, and in this groove was placed a circular band, the band being made in the form of a parallelogram, so that the ring fitting into the groove or furrow, which had a sharp angle in it presented a sharp angle outward.

The patentee claimed as his invention the combination and arrangement of the brush-head, constructed as described in his specification, and provided with an angular groove or furrow around the lower side, with the rubber ring fitting therein, as and for the purpose specified.

The defendants, in their answer, deny that McLaughlin was the first and original inventor of the improvement for which the letters patent issued. and which have been assigned to the complainants, and allege that the improvement claimed by him as new was described in letters patent granted in England to W. T. Monzani, June 25, 1854, and set forth in No. 1348 of the volume of specifications of English patents for that year; also in an application made by W. E. Williams to the United States patent office, rejected April 1, 1868; also in an application made to said office by J. H. Crittenden, rejected May 22, 1868. Defendants also set up prior knowledge and use by said Williams and Crittenden, and by the defendants themselves, and by the firm of Eastham, Harvey & Morris, of which defendants are members. The answer also alleges that the thing patented was in public use and on sale in this country more than two years before the application for the patent.

Monzani's patent was merely for covering with vulcanized rubber those parts of brushes or brooms which in their use are liable to be struck against places or things which are to be dusted or cleaned thereby. It was referred to and described in the specification of McLaughlin, and disclaimed by him.

Crittenden's specification described the same thing substantially as Monzani's. Crittenden claimed the application of rubber, felt, cloth, leather, or any elastic material to the ends and corners of broom and brush-heads, as set forth and described. This application was rightfully rejected. There is nothing in these patents or rejected applications to invalidate the McLaughlin patent. They were probably introduced in evidence only as illustrating the state of the art and aiding in the construction of the claims in the complainants' patent.

Respondents also offer evidence tending to show that, prior to the date of the McLaughlin invention, they made, in the fall of 1867, first, a brush with a block or head, with a projecting shoulder, by which a square vulcanized rubber band was attached upon the block for the purpose of keeping the head of the brush from injuring the wood-work; second, a similar brush, with a circular groove and a round band; and, third, a brush with a cork block or head inserted in a tin cover. Around the edges of this cover was a projecting shoulder, and round the edge of this cover, and held in place by this shoulder, a square vulcanized India-rubber band. Brushes made in the similitude of these three forms of brushes are put into the case. No brush made in either of these forms before the date of McLaughlin's invention is produced in evidence, and there is no reason from the testimony to believe that any one is in existence. The testimony is conflicting as to their form and structure; but it leaves no doubt on the mind of the court that, whatever they were, and whenever and howsoever constructed, they were mere experiments. They were never put upon the market; they never came into practical use; they were never sold; they were not even thought worthy of preservation; and can not now be found. Such brushes, if previously constructed in the form contended for by respondents, as experiments, and never made public or brought to the knowledge of McLaughlin, and ultimately abandoned and lost, could be no obstacle to his right to take out a patent.

Considering the patent of the complainants to be good and valid, we proceed to the consideration of the question of infringement. Respondents, by their answer and in the affidavits referred to in the answer, admit infringement by the sale of brushes with the angular groove or furrow, and with an angular rubber ring fitting therein. They also admit that they do make, and claim the right to make, brushes with a circular groove and band, as shown in Exhibit No. 3, which they claim do not infringe the complainants' rights under their patent.

The patentee, in his specification and claim, has only described one geometrical form of groove or furrow, and three geometrical forms for the rubber ring—i. e., the parallelogram, rhombus, and triangle. Perhaps a strict construction of the language would exclude the triangle from the list of forms of the rubber ring in the claim. The patentee does not, as is sometimes done, claim in terms the thing patented, however its form and proportions may be varied; but the law so interprets his claim without the addition of these words. In contemplation of law, after he has fully described his invention and shown its principles, and claimed it in a form which perfectly embodies it, unless he disclaims other forms, he is deemed to claim every form in which his invention may be copied.

Undoubtedly, in some cases the letters patent include only the particular form described and claimed, not for the reason that the patentee has described and claimed that form only, but because the invention consists in form only, and only in that form can be embodied, so that when the form is not copied, the invention is not used. Winans v. Denmead, 15 How. [56 U. S.] 343.

We must look, therefore, into the nature of the invention, and see whether its form and its substance are inseparable. If they are inseparable, then the respondents, having changed the form, do not copy the substance of the invention; but if they are separable, and the substance of the invention which the patent is designed to secure is to be found in the manufactures of the respondents, although copied and embodied in a form not described, or differing from the form described and specifically claimed by the patentee, then they have infringed. The invention, as described and claimed, is for a brush-head, provided with an angular groove or furrow, with an India-rubber band in that furrow. As the operative part of the rubber band can come in contact with the wood or glass to be dusted or brushed only at one line in the periphery of the band, it can make no difference in the result whether the shape of the rubber is circular or angular; whether a cross-section of the rubber band would be a parallelogram, a rhombus, or —what a circle practically is—a many-sided polygon; or whether the shape of the groove be semi-circular or polygonal or triangular. They would accomplish the same result, in the same manner, and by the same means. Cut away from the defendants' band a segment of the circle on both sides of the line in the periphery of the band where it touches the glass to be brushed, and you have only removed a superfluous and inoperative part; and the same principle, mutatis mutandis, applies to the band in the groove and the groove itself. One geometrical form as much as the other may embody the substance of this invention, and copy and use the invention itself. Decree for injunction and account.

MURPHY v. HOWARD.

[Hempst. 205.] [1]

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Jan., 1833.

COURTS — JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT — ACTION FOR DAMAGES—AMOUNT CLAIMED IN DECLARATION—AMOUNT AWARDED BY JURY.

In actions sounding in damages, those claimed in the declaration, and not those awarded by the jury, constitute the cause of action, and give the court jurisdiction.

Appeal from Conway circuit court.

Before JOHNSON, ESKRIDGE, and CROSS, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. [Benjamin F.] Howard declared in an action of assumpsit against [Benjamin] Murphy for the value of a certain keelboat, charged to be of the value of one hundred and fifty dollars, and laid his damages at that amount. Upon the trial of the issue joined, the jury by their verdict assessed the damages to twenty-five dollars, for which the court rendered judgment for Howard, from which Murphy has appealed to this court. The only ground relied upon by the counsel for the appellant for reversing the judgment is, that the circuit court did not possess jurisdiction of the case. By referring to the statute of 1828 (Acts, p. 34), it will be seen that the circuit courts are clothed with "original jurisdiction in all cases of one hundred dollars and upwards." Is this a case of one hundred dollars, or is it a case where the amount in controversy is less? To decide this question we must look either to the declaration or the verdict of the jury. By referring to the former, it will be seen that the amount in controversy is one hundred and fifty dollars, the damages claimed for a breach of the contract. According to the latter, the amount in controversy was twenty-five dollars, the damages assessed by the jury in their verdict. To which of these shall we refer in deciding the question now presented to the court? The doctrine is well settled that in actions sounding in damages, those laid in the declaration, and not those found by the jury, are the cause of action, and give to the court jurisdiction. Hulsecaup v. Teel [Case No. 6,862]; [Sims v. Irvine] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 441; 1 Bibb, 345. In these cases the doctrine is expressly laid down that the damages in the declaration furnish the rule to ascertain the jurisdiction of the court. "The absurd and inconvenient consequences that would result from a contrary doctrine, afford a strong argument against its propriety. If a verdict for less than one hundred dollars would oust the court of its jurisdiction, then it would seem to follow, that a verdict for the defendant would equally deprive the court of its jurisdiction, and that no judgment could be given that would bar a future action for the same cause, or that would award to the defendant his costs. In actions sounding in damages, if the verdict is to be the criterion of jurisdiction, in many cases it will be impossible for a plaintiff to know to what tribunal to apply for relief. If he estimates his cause of action either too high or too low, it will be equally fatal. But further, taking the verdict as the rule to ascertain the jurisdiction, and it may be easily conceived that cases may occur in which from a difference of opinion in the amount of damages between the jury and the justice of the peace, neither tribunal will exercise jurisdiction, and the party will be without a remedy. A doctrine resulting in such consequences cannot be correct." Singleton v. Madison, 1 Bibb, 342. Judgment affirmed.

Debt will not lie for a debt under forty shillings (2 Inst. 311, 112), yet the smallness of the sum must appear on the face of the declaration. 3 Burrows, 1592; Barnes, Notes Cas. 497. And though reduced by a set-off, it will not affect the jurisdiction of the court. 3 Wils. 48.

PATENTS—IMPROVED BRUSH HEAD—ANTICIPATION—INFRINGEMENT.

1. The patent granted to John Dwyer, administrator, etc., of Francis McLaughlin, deceased, January 11, 1870, for an improved brush head, provided with an angular groove, and a rubber ring fitted therein, held valid, and not anticipated by a door-stop provided with a rubber, fitted in an angular groove.

2. The patent held to be infringed by the defendants' brush head, which, though different in form, embodies the patented invention.

[This was a suit [by Thomas E. Murphy and others against Laurent Kissling and others] under letters patent [No. 98,787] for an improved brush, granted to Francis McLaughlin January 11, 1870, being the same patent that was involved in the suit of Murphy v. Eastham [Case No. 9,949]. The object of the McLaughlin invention was to obviate the danger of breaking glass and injuring the surface of wood or other substances to be washed or dusted by contact with the brush head. To this end the patentee proposed to form a groove in the brush head or stock, near the bristles, and in this groove to insert a rubber band, one edge or angle of which should project outward and prevent injurious contact between the brush head and the surface to be cleaned. The novelty of the invention and the scope of the patent were fully discussed in the case above referred to.] [2]

[2] [From 7 O. G. 302.]

SHEPLEY, Circuit Judge. This bill in equity is brought for an alleged infringement of the letters patent, granted for the invention, by Francis McLaughlin, of an improved brush. So far as the defence, set up, of want of novelty in the invention, relates to the evidence introduced by defendants of the Monzani patent, and the rejected applications of Williams and Crittenden, it has been fully considered in the case of Murphy v. Eastham [Case No. 9,949]. The defendant also sets up, as anticipating the invention of McLaughlin, a door-stop made, and used and sold, by D. C. Smart. Smart's door-stop had an angular groove in it, with a rubber ring fitting therein, in the same manner, as in the brush head in the McLaughlin invention. It was not new, at the date of the McLaughlin invention, to put a rubber ring into an angular groove. What was new, was, his combination of a brush head with an angular groove and a rubber ring fitting therein, whereby the elements of the combination, operated together, and jointly, in the function of the brush. The infringement, in this case, is clear. Defendants use a rubber ring fitting into an angular groove in the brush head, in the same manner as in the McLaughlin patent. They claim, that their rubber ring performs another function also; that, as they extend their rubber ring by a flange between the two surfaces of the two parts of the brush head, where they unite at the bottom of the groove, as their brush is constructed, the rubber forms a packing which makes the joint tight. This would be only an improvement, at best, upon the McLaughlin invention. But, if the groove in the McLaughlin brush, be made square, and an elastic band be used, fitting this square groove, it would act in the same way as a packing to exclude the water from the joint, if the joint was at the bottom of the groove. This is one of the forms of McLaughlin's invention, and is shown in Exhibit G. This is a clear case of an attempt to evade infringement by a change of form merely. Decree for injunction and account.

EXECUTION—UNAUTHORIZED BY JUDGMENT—MISTAKE—POWER OF COURT TO CORRECT.

1. An execution issued on a judgment which does not authorize it, may be quashed on motion, and the money made thereon ordered to be refunded; but where there is only a clerical mistake, this cannot be done, for the execution may be corrected by the court, so as to conform to the judgment.

2. The power of the court to correct errors and mistakes in executions is unquestionable, and necessarily belongs to every court of record.

Motion [by Benjamin Murphy against Eli J. Lewis and Daniel Mooney, executors of Samuel Mosely, deceased] to quash an execution.

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and SELDEN, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion by the defendants to quash the execution and have the money refunded, the amount having been collected by the sheriff and paid over to the plaintiff. We have no doubt the execution issued for a greater sum than the judgment authorized; for instead of six per centum as damages upon the dissolution of the injunction, the execution is for six per centum per annum, thereby making a material difference in the amount against the defendants. For the defendants it has been contended, that, as the execution is erroneous, it ought to be quashed, and the money made thereon refunded. We are, however, of a different opinion. If the judgment had not authorized the emanation of an execution at all; or there had been no judgment, then it would be irregular to sue out one, and in such a case the doctrine contended for would be correct. But when there is only a clerical mistake in the execution, it may be corrected by the court, so as to make it conform to the judgment. Of the power to correct errors or mistakes in executions, there can be no doubt. In the case of Smith v. Carr, Hardin, 308, the court of appeals of Kentucky say: "The power of correcting the ministerial acts of its own officers necessarily and incidentally belongs to every court, and has always been exercised, as well before as since the formation of the present constitution." The case referred to was one of an erroneous execution. In the case before this court, to order the whole of the money to be refunded, would be more than law or justice require. For what purpose should we require the whole of the money to be restored? That another execution might issue, and the true amount again be made and paid over to the plaintiff? We can perceive no good reason for a course of this kind, and no authority has been found to warrant it. We are therefore of opinion, that the mistake in the execution should be corrected, and that Murphy refund to Lewis and Mooney the amount which he has received above the sum for which the execution ought to have issue. Ordered accordingly.

Circuit Court, D. Michigan. June Term, 1847.

FRAUD—BILL TO RESCIND—OFFER TO RETURN—DEEDS—EXECUTED UNDER DEFECTIVE POWER.

1. A party who desires to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud, must offer to return the thing purchased, whether it be land or personal property.

[Cited in brief in Morrow v. Rees, 69 Pa. St. 372.]

2. The vendor must be placed by the vendee in the condition he was in before the purchase.

3. The deed being defective, being made under a defective power, the court will decree a conveyance, on the payment of the residue of the purchase money.

In equity.

Mr. Backus, for complainant.

Mr. Seaman, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This bill was filed, apparently, with the view of rescinding a contract for the purchase of a tract of land in Eaton county. The consideration agreed to be paid was the sum of four hundred and eighty dollars, and the complainant represents the land is not worth half that amount. That fraudulent representations were made to him by the vendor, as to the locality of the land, and its quality, which induced the complainant to purchase it. But there is no specific prayer for a rescission of the contract, no tender of a reconveyance, and no offer to surrender the possession. It is therefore clear there can be no decree, under the bill, to rescind the contract. The chief object of the bill would seem to be to procure an effective deed for the land. It was purchased by the complainant, and a deed was executed to him under an insufficient power of attorney. The defects in the power are stated to be, that it has but one witness, and is not under seal. These defects are radical, as they did not authorize the conveyance that seems to have been executed under it. A power of attorney, to authorize the conveyance of land in fee simple, must have all the solemnities and forms required to make effective the instrument to be executed. The statute requires two witnesses; of course, the power must have two witnesses. And as a deed is inoperative, as such, without a seal, it can not be executed under an authority without seal.

The court, therefore, will decree that a good and effective deed shall be executed by the defendant, of general warranty, and held ready to be delivered on the payment of the balance of the purchase money which remains due.

MURPHY v. PAYNTER et al.

[1 Dill. 333.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Nebraska. 1871.

EQUITY—DURESS—PERMANENT IMPROVEMENTS—DELAY.

1. Equity views with disfavor, unreasonable and unexplained delay in the assertion of rights, especially where the rights depend on oral evidence and the situation and value of the property affected have, in the meantime, greatly changed.

2. Accordingly, a bill to set aside a deed for duress, alleged to have been practised twelve years before, was dismissed,—the complainant being without sufficient excuse for the delay, and the defendant having made costly and permanent improvements upon the property, and the evidence as to the duress being conflicting and unsatisfactory.

The bill was filed on the 1st day of October, 1869, and sets forth that on the 17th day of July, 1857, the complainant entered, by virtue of a pre-emption, under the act of 1841, a tract of land in Sarpy county, Nebraska, and received a duplicate therefor, and that on the same day he was forced by one Jesse Lowe (husband of the defendant, Sophia Lowe), and by the defendant Paynter and others, by insolence and by threats of great bodily harm, to execute a deed therefor to Paynter and Sophia Lowe, on receiving, against his will and when under duress, the sum of one hundred dollars. It is alleged that the defendants were aided in their illegal proceedings against the complainant by members of the "Omaha Land Claim Club;" that from fear of this organization the complainant left the state, and was prevented from instituting legal proceedings to recover the land until after the death of Jesse Lowe, in 1868. The prayer is that the deed so made, on the 17th day of July, 1857, be set aside. The answer admits the complainant's purchase of the land at the land office, but alleges it was with money furnished to him by Lowe and Paynter, for whose benefit it was purchased. It denies any coercion, or duress, or fear of bodily harm, but alleges that the deed was voluntarily made in pursuance of a previous understanding between the parties, and in consideration of $100 paid therefor at the time. A large amount of testimony has been taken on either side. It is very conflicting, and many parts of it are incapable of being reconciled.

Baldwin & O'Brien, for complainant.

J. M. Woolworth, for respondent.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and DUNDY, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. In the spring of 1857, the complainant came to Omaha, and soon afterwards hired himself as a laborer, by the month, to Jesse Lowe. There is evidence of plaintiff's admission that he was to have so much per month for his services, and was to pre-empt for Lowe a piece of land. Lowe and Paynter were relatives by marriage, were in business together, and each had pre-emptions in his own name, on other land than that now in question. Hence, neither Lowe nor Paynter could pre-empt this land in his own name. The evidence is very satisfactory that the land now in controversy had been built upon, plowed, and, to some extent, fenced by Paynter and Lowe and those whose claim thereto they had purchased, and that these improvements were made in 1856, and before July, 1857. Lowe, while the complainant was in his service, sent him to this land a short time before July, 1857, and he continued in the service of Lowe down to the date of the entry.

The complainant testifies that this land was vacant when he went there, in May or June, 1857, that he plowed part of it, built a house on it, and bought the lumber therefor of Paynter. In all these particulars the weight of evidence and the circumstances, are strongly against him.

On the 17th day of July he entered the land, Paynter being his witness to prove up the pre-emption. The complainant says he purchased this land with his own money, with gold which he brought to Nebraska with him. On the other hand, the defendants claim that the complainant paid for the land with money furnished by Lowe and Paynter.

The complainant testifies that he paid for it with his own money. On the other hand, Paynter testifies that he saw Lowe pay Murphy the money with which to make payment at the land office, and that the money belonged to him and Lowe together.

The witness, Carlisle, here corroborates Paynter. He testifies that on the day Murphy proved up his pre-emption and made the entry, he saw Lowe give him the money, in Omaha, with which to make the payment at the land office. The payment was made and the certificate received in the name of the complainant. On the afternoon of that day occurred the transaction, in the course of which the complainant made the deed of the land to the defendants, which he is now seeking to have set aside because made under duress. Respecting this transaction the conflict in the testimony is painful and perplexing to the last degree. The complainant's version is, that on the same day on which he made the entry and received the certificate, he was passing the office of Lowe, in Omaha, when Lowe accosted him and demanded the duplicate and a deed, and that, upon complainant's refusal, Lowe, aided by Paynter and others, members of the Land Claim Club, forced him into his office, or forcibly kept him there, stripped and searched him, maltreated him, and threatened his life if he did not make the deed required of him; that they compelled him to receive $100 against his will, and that he received the money and made the deed only to save his life, or his person from great bodily injury.

I feel bound to say that I find some of the features of this version of the transaction not a little confirmed by other witnesses than the plaintiff. The defendant's theory of the transaction is this: that at the time in question the complainant was passing by the office of Lowe as he claims; that Lowe casually saw him and assumed, as a matter of course, that he would carry out the understanding and make a deed for the land; that on his refusal, a dispute arose; that the only crowd that gathered around was that which a dispute and conflict on the street would naturally assemble; that the stand taken by the complainant was, not that he would not make a deed for the land at all, but that he would not do so until he was paid by Lowe his wages in full, and the sum of one hundred dollars for his services in connection with proving up the pre-emption.

The defendants claim that though the complainant at one time endeavored to get out of the office and was forcibly detained by Lowe and some others, yet that he was not put in bodily fear, but on the contrary dictated the terms on which he was willing to make the deed, namely, payment for his services as a laborer for Lowe, and the receipt of one hundred dollars in addition; and that these terms were accepted by Lowe and the deed drawn accordingly, and voluntarily executed by the complainant, and the money voluntarily received by him.

In this account of the transaction the witnesses, Paynter, Miller, Carlisle, and Woolworth each substantially agreed. Against it, are the direct and positive statements of the complainant, in which, as to some particulars, though not in all, he is corroborated by the witnesses, Robertson, Knight, and Hannigan.

In this conflict of testimony, other circumstances must be regarded by the court in determining the cause. One of the most important of these, and, in my judgment, the controlling one, is the long delay of the complainant to seek relief. The deed which he is asking to impeach, was made by him, July 17, 1857. This bill was not filed until October 1, 1869, more than twelve years after the execution of the deed. This delay is not satisfactorily explained. The explanation given is that he feared the club, and was thus prevented from bringing suit until after the death of Lowe in 1868. The club ceased as an organization with the year 1857, and ever since then, if not always, it has been perfectly safe for the plaintiff to seek redress in the courts. This delay tends strongly to confirm the defendant's theory of the case, because if that theory be correct, the delay is consonant with it, while it is inconsistent with the plaintiff's theory of it.

But aside from this consideration, as affecting the probabilities of the transaction occurring when the deed was made, there is another which I confess has had much weight with me in reaching, after some hesitation, the conclusion that the bill must be dismissed.

During the lapse of this long period, not only has the land itself greatly advanced in value, but it has been largely improved by the defendant, Paynter, who has constantly cultivated it, and for the past few years made it his home. These improvements are permanent in their nature, and consist of houses, barns, fences, ditches, fruit trees, and plantations of other trees, &c., and cost and are worth about the sum of ten thousand dollars, an amount much exceeding, it is probable, the value of the land itself.

If the plaintiff gets the land, he gets these improvements as well, to which he has of course no equity, since he is not obliged and cannot be decreed to make any compensation therefor, and since he laid by, without adequate cause, and saw the defendant make them upon the faith of his deed.

From the view I take of the cause, after twice carefully reading all the proofs, I think it quite probable that the plaintiff might have had a decree if he had made the same case upon suit brought recently after the transaction. But where the delay is so protracted, the change in the situation of the property so great, and the conflict in the evidence so radical, engendering doubts so grave as to the real character of the circumstances under which the deed was made, and in view of the clear case which the law ever requires to be established in order to set aside the solemn deed of the party, I can see no course fairly open, but to order the bill to be dismissed. Decree accordingly.

At law. Appeal determined before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and SELDEN, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This was an action of replevin brought by [Benjamin] Murphy against [Thomas H.] Tindall, and upon the trial of the cause a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appealed to this court. The only question presented for consideration is, whether the court below erred in the instruction given to the jury, on motion of the defendant, which was that, "unless it was proved that the defendant took the property out of the possession of the plaintiff unlawfully, and against the plaintiff's consent, the jury must find for the defendant." We are clearly of opinion that this instruction was erroneous. It is true, that it was necessary to establish an unlawful taking from the plaintiff in order to support the action; but it was not necessary to prove the unlawful taking by the defendant. It was sufficient to prove it by any other person. This, we apprehend, is the doctrine of the common law, (1 Chit. Pl. 185,) and by reference to the statute of this territory, (Geyer's Dig. 333,) it is clear that the action of replevin is maintainable against any person in whose hands or possession the property may be found. We are of opinion, then, that the action of replevin lies against all persons in whose possession personal property unlawfully taken may be found, except officers of the law, who may have possession by virtue of legal process. In the opinion we have given we are supported by the authorities referred to in 1 Chit. Pl. 185, 186. Reversed.

BANKRUPTCY—DISCHARGE—PETITION FOR REVIEW—DELAY.

A discharge in bankruptcy was granted by the district court, June 22d, 1875. A creditor who had opposed the discharge instituted, on the 15th of November following, proceedings of review. His interest was $6,000 out of $300,000 of debts. On the faith of the discharge, the bankrupt, aided by friends, had resumed his former business, and had entered into contracts with a foreign government to transport mails: Held, that, as the delay was unreasonable, and had operated to the prejudice of the bankrupt, the petition of review must be dismissed.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. The bankrupts obtained a decree of discharge on the 22d of June, 1875, in the district court for the Southern district of New York, where they had been adjudged to be bankrupts on the petition of certain of their creditors. Certain of their creditors, namely, the Marine National Bank of the city of New York, C. C. Abel and Christian Bors, now apply to have the decree granting the discharge revised and reversed, upon certain grounds on which they opposed the granting of the discharge by the district court. The petition of review bears date October 15th, 1875, but appears first to have been brought to the attention of the court on the 13th of November, 1875, when an order to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted was made. This was served on the attorney for the bankrupts on the 15th of November, 1875, which must, therefore, be taken to be the time of the institution of the proceedings to obtain a review. In excuse for this delay it is alleged, that, on or about the 28th of July, 1875, the papers of the district court were removed from the old clerk's office in Chambers street to the new court house, and that, in the removal, the testimony in the case became mislaid and inaccessible to the petitioners, until a period after the time of the application for a review. This very statement, however, makes it obvious that there is nothing in the excuse, because, when the application was actually made, the same papers were lacking, and yet their absence did not make it either impossible or difficult to make the application for review. For the absence of these papers the discharged bankrupts were in no sense responsible, and, even if, on the petition of review, it had become necessary for the petitioners to apply for a postponement of the hearing, in order that an opportunity should be afforded to obtain the papers, the bankrupts would have had notice that such an application was pending, and might have governed themselves accordingly. The statute which gives the right to the circuit court of general supervision over proceedings in bankruptcy has not fixed any limitation of time within which its interposition must be invoked. In the cases in which appeals are allowed, the time to appeal is fixed at ten days. In the Southern district of Ohio, the circuit court adopted an express rule limiting the time for a petition of review to ten days, or such further time as might be allowed by the district judge, by an order made within the ten days. 2 Gazz. Bankr. Dig. 1128. In the supreme court of the United States, in Bank v. Cooper, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 171, that court declared that the review must be sought within a reasonable time, which should generally be fixed with reference to the analogy furnished by the period fixed for appeal. In the case of Littlefield v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. [Case No. 8,400], Judges Clifford and Shepley, in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts, say: "Discharge was denied on the 12th of May, 1869, and the petition was filed on the 30th of June in that year. Special injury is neither alleged or proved, and the court is of opinion, in view of all the circumstances, that the petition ought not to be rejected because it was not filed at an earlier day. Until some rule is adopted on the subject, the court will not deprive the petitioner of a hearing on that ground, unless the delay is manifestly unreasonable, or has operated to the prejudice of the respondent." Bump, Bankr. (8th Ed.) p. 351. The present case is, in my opinion, such a one as is contemplated in the opinion cited. The discharged bankrupts had a right to assume, in the absence of any notice to the contrary, that their discharge, although it had been opposed, was acquiesced in by their creditors. Acting on this basis, they have, with the assistance of their friends, engaged again in the business of shipping merchants, in which they had previously been engaged, and have entered into, and are performing, important undertakings, of a quasi public nature, in respect to the transportation of the West India mails, with a foreign government. Now to revoke the discharge which was granted to them in the regular course of the administration of the bankrupt law, would involve in misfortune, not only themselves, but others who, relying on their discharge, have aided them or entered into new business relations with them. Under these circumstances, and adverting, also, to the small interest of the objecting creditors compared to the total amount of their debts, some six thousand dollars out of at least three hundred thousand dollars, I think the discretion of the court will be wisely exercised in refusing to entertain the application for a review. The petition is, therefore, dismissed.

District Court, D. Maine. May, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY—DEBTS PROVABLE—THE PRICE OF LIQUORS TO BE SOLD IN VIOLATION OF LAW.

A claim, for the price of spirituous liquors, lawfully sold in the state of New York to a citizen of Maine, who intended them for sale in this state in violation of law, is here provable in bankruptcy, although it could not be recovered in the courts of this state.

In bankruptcy. Appeal by the assignee in bankruptcy of Murray, from the decision of Mr. Register Fessenden, allowing a claim against the bankrupt's estate for spirituous liquors sold in New York to the bankrupt a citizen of Maine, who intended them for sale in this state in violation of law.

Charles P. Mattocks, for appellant.
Melvin P. Frank, for appellee.

FOX, District Judge. This is an appeal from the allowance by the register of a claim in favor of W. E. Booraem, a citizen of New York, for the sum of $363.45. It is submitted for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the bankrupt was an apothecary, resident at Portland, and from time to time sent orders to Booraem at New York for spirituous liquors to be forwarded by steamer to the bankrupt at Portland, by him to be there sold in violation of the laws of Maine. The claim as proved and allowed is for the price of the liquors so furnished. It is further agreed that Booraem did not know that the liquors were to be sold contrary to the laws of Maine, and that by the laws of New York the contract and claim is and was legal and could be there enforced.

The bankrupt having ordered these goods sent to him from New York by the carrier, the delivery to the carrier for his use is a delivery to him, and the sale and purchase must be considered as made and constituted in New York. The case finds that such a sale is legal, and that the price of the articles sold could be recovered of the purchaser in that state.

It is claimed by the assignee, that under such a state of facts a recovery could not be had in the courts of this state for liquors so sold, and the case of Meservey v. Gray, 55 Me. 542, is relied on as sustaining this position; and it is true, that in that case it was decided, that "when contracts made in other states are designed or calculated to aid in violating the laws of the state, where they are attempted to be enforced, the courts of the latter state are not obliged to furnish a remedy;" and that under the act of 1858 [Laws Me. 1858 (No. 2) p. 40], which declares "that no action shall be maintained for intoxicating liquors purchased out of the state, with intention to sell the same or any part thereof in violation of this act," a party, selling liquors in New York to a citizen of Maine, was not permitted to recover for the liquors, although he had no knowledge of the purchaser's intention to sell the liquors in this state in violation of the law.

So long as the act of 1858 continues in force, it may be that the courts of Maine will be justified in denying to citizens of other states any redress on contracts of this nature, although the same are perfectly legal and valid by the laws of the state where the purchase is made; but the question still remains, whether the federal courts in this state are bound by this act and this decision of the court, and are at liberty to refuse all redress to a suitor, because he is thus debarred of remedy in the courts of the state. [The remedy here sought is one provided by the bankrupt act, is under a law of congress, and in one of the courts of the United States, and by a citizen of another state, against the estate of a citizen of this state.] [2] The bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 517)] declares all debts due and payable from the bankrupt at the time of the adjudication of bankruptcy may be proved against the estate of the bankrupt, and that in case of an appeal to the circuit court from the decision of the district court, proceedings shall be had in the pleadings, trial and determination of the cause, as in an action at law, commenced and prosecuted in the usual manner in the courts of the United States, and his discharge if obtained, is from all debts, which by the act are made provable against his estate.

If an action could be sustained on this claim before the circuit court on appeal, and if the discharge in bankruptcy could relieve the debtor from his liability therefor, then I hold that it is the duty of the district court to recognize and allow the same as a debt provable against the estate in bankruptcy, although the creditor might fail of a remedy if his action was pending in the courts of Maine; and from an examination of the decisions of the supreme court of the United States, I can entertain no doubt that the demand was provable, and could be recovered before the circuit court by reason of its legality in the place where the purchase was made.

In Suydam v. Broadnax, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 74, the court says, "A sovereign state and one of the states of the Union, if the latter were not restrained by constitutional prohibitions, might in virtue of sovereignty act upon the contracts of its citizens wherever made, and discharge them by denying a right of action upon them in its courts. But the validity of such contracts as were made out of the sovereignty or state would exist and continue anywhere else according to the lex loci contractus, and it may be laid down as a safe position, that a statute discharging contracts or denying suits upon them without the particular mention of foreign contracts does not include them. * * * The 11th section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 78] was intended to give to citizens of another state, having a right to sue in the circuit court remedies coextensive with these rights. These remedies would not be so, if any proceeding under an act of a state legislature, to which a plaintiff was not a party, exempting a person of such state from suit could be pleaded to abate a suit in the circuit court."

In Watson v. Tarpley, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 520, the court re-affirms this principle in the following language, "Whilst it will not be denied that the laws of the several states are of binding authority upon their domestic tribunals, and upon persons and property within their appropriate jurisdiction, it is equally clear that those laws cannot affect, either by enlargement or diminution, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States as vested and prescribed by the constitution and laws of the United States, nor destroy or control the rights of parties litigant to whom the right of resort to these courts has been secured by the laws and constitution."

In Union Bank v. Jolly, 18 How. [59 U. S.] 507, it is said, "The law of a state, limiting the remedies of its citizens in its own courts, cannot be applied to prevent the citizens of other states from suing in the courts of the United States in that state, for the recovery of any property or money there to which they may be legally or equitably entitled."

In Hyde v. Stone, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 175, the court says, "This court has repeatedly decided, that the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over controversies between citizens of different states cannot be impaired by the laws of the state which prescribe the modes of redress in their courts, or which regulate the distribution of their judicial power."

The citation of further authorities is certainly unnecessary. The legality of the purchase in the place of the contract being admitted, it appearing that a citizen of another state has in such state sold his property to a citizen of this state, for which he is now indebted, and which can be recovered of him if he is ever found in New York, unless he is discharged therefrom by his certificate in bankruptcy, and the proceedings in bankruptcy being by force and virtue of the acts of congress alone, which authorize proof of all legal accounts against the bankrupt's estate, the laws of the state, denying any remedy for the recovery of this account, cannot in any way control the proceedings of the bankrupt court, and it is therefore ordered: Appeal dismissed, claim allowed.

Case No. 9,955.

MURRAY v. AETNA INS. CO.

[4 Biss. 417.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. Oct., 1864.

AFFREIGHTMENT — TEMPORARY RETARDATION — WHETHER FREIGHT EARNED — MARINE INSURANCE—FREIGHT MONEY.

1. A temporary retardation, and subsequent sale of the cargo by the owner, does not constitute an abandonment, nor deprive the carrier of his right to the freight money; he therefore, cannot recover from the insurer of the freight money.

2. Where a vessel takes a cargo late in the season, for transportation around the Lakes, and is laid up by stress of weather, it is her duty to complete the voyage in the spring, if practicable, and carry the cargo to its destination.

3. If a cargo is necessarily unloaded at an intermediate point, and the owner sells it there, though the vessel might have carried it in the spring, the carrier has earned his freight.

Assumpsit [by James Murray against the Aetna Insurance Company of Hartford] for loss of freight money.

Robert Rae, for plaintiff.

DRUMMOND, District Judge. I am of opinion as a matter of law that the plaintiff cannot recover in this case.

The contract the defendant made was that the vessel should earn or be entitled to freight, and in the case of loss of freight or if the plaintiff was not entitled to receive freight in consequence of some accident or misfortune within the terms of the policy, then the defendant agreed to become responsible. The question is whether, according to the terms of the contract, the defendant is liable.

Fifteen thousand bushels of corn, in the fall of 1862, were shipped on board the schooner owned by plaintiff to be transported from Chicago to Kingston, and it was the freight list on this corn that was insured by defendant. A marine disaster happened to the vessel. She was dismasted and was towed into the port of Goderich, in Canada. The vessel lay there some time. The hatches were then taken off, and it was found that the corn was damaged more or less. Of course the schooner in the condition in which it then was could not proceed on her voyage without repairs. The corn was unloaded from the vessel, and placed in a warehouse, and the sound corn separated from the damaged corn. Shortly after it was so placed, it being in different stories of the warehouse, the warehouse broke down and the corn became again intermingled. There was a policy of insurance on the cargo by the Corn Exchange Company, and upon the receipt of intelligence of the disaster the agent of that company proceeded to Goderich with a view of determining what was to be done for the best interests of all concerned. The proof shows that about thirteen thousand bushels of the corn were in a sound condition when it was landed from the vessel, the remainder being more or less damaged. There is some conflict of evidence as to the manner and circumstances under which the corn was sold. The captain of the schooner claims that the corn was sold by the agent of the Corn Exchange Company. The latter, on the contrary, claims that the corn was sold by the captain. I do not think it is material which was the fact, but we will assume, what is undoubtedly true, that it was sold by the common consent of both. The plaintiff retained two thousand two hundred dollars, and the balance of the proceeds was paid over to the agent of the Corn Exchange Company. It is immaterial what was the fact as to the manner in which this money was paid or received. Of course if it was paid and received as freight it could not again be recovered; but, according to the view the court takes, it is immaterial whether it was or not. It seems to be conceded that there was no material injury done to the hull of the schooner; that the chief injury was to the spars and rigging. We have to assume, of course, under the finding of the jury, that the vessel could not have been repaired in the port of Goderich that fall, and there is no dispute but it could have been repaired in the following spring or during the winter, and that the vessel would have been ready upon the opening of navigation to proceed on her voyage. The question is, whether, under the circumstances of the case, it was not the duty of the captain to go on and complete his contract, which was to transport the corn from Chicago to Kingston.

When a vessel takes a cargo, as in this case, in the fall of the year to transport to a distant point, it is one of the incidents of the navigation that owing to variable weather or freezing up, she may not be able to reach her port of destination. The mere fact that the vessel is not able to do so does not relieve the carrier from completing his contract and thus becoming entitled to his compensation. Neither here does the fact that the vessel was dismasted and was obliged to make a port of safety and the corn had to be unloaded, relieve the carrier from the duty of completing his contract, provided by proper repairs the vessel could have proceeded in the spring of 1863. The corn was in such a condition that it could have been transported in whole or part in specie, and could have reached the port of destination.

This being so, then it follows as a conclusion of law that if the owner of the corn chose to take it or have it sold he could not deprive the plaintiff of the right to the freight.

There is no controversy but that the vessel could have been repaired in the winter of 1862 or the spring of 1863. There can be none under the proof but that the corn could have been transported in specie, in whole or in part at least, to the port of Kingston, in the spring of 1863. Those facts being admitted, upon well-settled principles of law I think the plaintiff cannot recover.

Among the numerous authorities which have been referred to, I will only advert to three. The first is the case of Anderson v. Wallis, reported in 2 Maule & S. 240. That was a case of insurance upon a cargo and in that respect was different from this. The ship sailed from London on the 16th of September, 1811, bound for Quebec. Having encountered heavy gales, so that she made a great deal of water, the master was obliged to return (having proceeded a considerable distance on the voyage) to the port of Kinsale, Ireland, and arrived there October 25th. On the arrival of the ship it was found necessary to make repairs upon the vessel before she could proceed on her voyage. These repairs were not completed until the 25th of March following. On examination it was ascertained that the cargo was damaged, and it was sold as a damaged cargo. Prior to this time the insured abandoned the cargo to the underwriter. The underwriter refused to accept the abandonment, so that the question arose whether there was a loss within the true construction of the policy. The court held there was not. Why? Because the goods were not lost, and because the vessel could have been repaired and could have proceeded on her voyage in the spring of 1812 to Quebec. The time that elapsed was from October 25 until March following, when the vessel should have so proceeded, and it was held—Lord Ellenborough delivering the opinion—that it was a mere retardation of the voyage. Now if in this case the cargo had been destroyed so that it lost its identity, and it did not in point of fact exist in specie, then, as a matter of course, it would have been a loss within the policy, and the court would have held that the insured was entitled to recover; but the cargo remaining in specie, although in a damaged state, the carrier having a right when the repairs were made to go on and complete the voyage, the property being sold as a damaged cargo, there was not a loss within the meaning of the policy.

The principle, although that was a case of insurance on the cargo and the case at bar is a policy on the freight, must necessarily be the same as to the question of loss. Here, as there, the agreement was to indemnify the plaintiff in case of loss—in one the loss of the cargo, in the other of freight—and in that case the court held that there was not a loss within the meaning of the policy, as we must hold here. The language of the court in that case has been cited with approbation in subsequent cases, and no court has ever yet decided that a temporary retardation is a total abandonment. Disappointment of arrival would be a new idea of abandonment in insurance law.

Here the question is, whether the loss of freight was in consequence of a peril of the sea or of the voluntary act of the master, and the answer is, it was the voluntary act of the master.

The next case to which I shall advert is the case of Jordan v. Warren Ins. Co. [Case No. 7,524]. That was a case of a policy upon freight precisely like this. The freight insured was a quantity of cotton, tobacco, and other articles of merchandise from New Orleans to Havre. The freight bill was nearly $10,000. The vessel proceeded from New Orleans down the Mississippi and on her progress to the Gulf of Mexico on the 7th of June she met with an accident which rendered it necessary for the vessel to return to New Orleans for repairs. The vessel was fitted again for sea on the 21st day of July following, a little over a month. On examination it was ascertained that the cargo was injured, and it was taken out; a large portion of it was sold at public auction for the sum of nearly $20,000. The residue, being in a sound state, was shipped for Havre in another vessel. Mr. Justice Story upon these facts says the ship was repaired and capable again of taking a part of the cargo at New Orleans within a reasonable time, and the master had a right to require that it should be so taken on board and carried on the voyage as soon as it might be in a condition to be safely re-shipped, and he had a right to wait until the cargo could be dried, sorted, re-packed and prepared for re-shipment; the delay arising thereby would be a mere retardation or temporary interruption or suspension of the voyage, and not an utter prostration or destruction (prostration is a bad word to be used in that connection I think). If, then, the freight has been lost, it has been lost by his own voluntary act, and not by the necessary operation of any of the perils insured against. The whole testimony shows the cargo could have been dried, assorted and re-packed for the voyage at the farthest within six months. It is true that the vessel was ready, so far as the repairs were concerned, within about six weeks; but he says the proof shows the cargo could have been ready in six months, and what was the consequence? That the party was entitled to his freight, and consequently the underwriter was not responsible as for a loss of freight. He proceeds: "Mere delay in the voyage or disappointment as to time never constitutes, as we have seen, any ground for the abandonment of the voyage."

The next case is Hugg v. Augusta Insurance & Banking Co., 7 How. [48 U. S.] 595. That was also a case of insurance on freight like this. It went up on a certificate of difference of opinion between the judges below. The vessel in that case took a cargo of jerked beef at Montevideo to be transported to Matanzas or Havana. It was the freight on this cargo that was insured against. The vessel met with a disaster, and was obliged to put into the port of Nassau. Some of the cargo was thrown overboard, and another portion of it was found in so offensive and damaged condition that the authorities at once refused to have it landed. Another portion of it was sold, and the question in this case was, whether the underwriter was liable as for a loss of freight. Various questions were certified to the supreme court. Upon the first question the court held that if the jury found that the beef was a perishable article within the meaning of the policy, the defendant was not liable as for a total loss of the freight unless it appeared that there was a destruction in specie of the entire cargo, so that it had lost its original character at Nassau, the port of distress, etc.

Admit that in the case at bar it was for the interest of the owner of the cargo or of all parties that it should be sold, still, if the vessel could have been repaired in the following spring, and have proceeded on her voyage from the port of Goderich, and could have transported the corn in specie to the port of Kingston, the plaintiff could not recover against the underwriter for a loss of the freight. The case last cited, and all the other cases, I think settle that.

As to whether it was a reasonable time or not. That question I think is also decided by the authorities and upon principle. Independent of authority the plaintiff cannot recover in this case, because if he could it would be substantially holding that where there was a detention of a cargo shipped in the fall, in consequence of stress of weather, or frost or other causes, so that the cargo could not arrive at the port of destination till the following spring, there was a loss of freight, and that the insured should proceed at once against the underwriter for the freight. That would be an exceedingly dangerous doctrine to hold, so far as the commerce of the Lakes is concerned. So that it resolves itself after all into, what was the reason there was a loss of freight, if there was such a loss? The only answer that can be given is, if there was a loss, it was in consequence of the voluntary act of the master, and not because of a peril of the sea; so that the verdict will have to be, as a matter of law, for defendant in this case.

See further that the master has a right to wait till the cargo is ready for forwarding, and in case of his failure so to do, the insurer is not liable. Herbert v. Hallett, 3 Johns. Cas. 93; Griswold v. New York Ins. Co., 1 Johns. 205; Saltus v. Ocean Ins. Co., 14 Johns. 138; Clark v. Massachusetts Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2 Pick. 104; M'Gaw v. Ocean Ins. Co., 23 Pick. 405; Lord v. Neptune Ins. Co., 10 Gray, 109; Mordy v. Jones, 4 Barn. & C. 394; Tio v. Vance, 11 La. 199; Adams v. Haught, 14 Tex. 243; The Ship Nathaniel Hooper, 3 Sumn. 542, Fed. Cas No. 10,032.

It seems to be universally held that the master has the power to forward the cargo in another vessel, if his own becomes unable to complete the voyage; but whether he is bound to do this, is unsettled in England, though American authorities hold the affirmative. See Hugg v. Augusta Insurance & Banking Co., supra; and a collection of cases in 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 234, note 2; Hugg v. Baltimore & Cuba Smelting & Mining Co., 35 Md. 414.

For a full discussion of right of the master to deliver the cargo at an intermediate point, on payment of freight for the full passage, and of his obligation to so do on tender of the freight, see 1 Pars. Shipp. & Adm. 231, notes 2 and 3.

Where the insurer voluntarily accepts the damaged cargo at an intermediate point, the master is entitled to freight pro rata itineris. The Mohawk, 8 Wall. [75 U. S.] 153.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 22, 1876.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE FOR UNDERVALUATION—ADDITIONAL DUTY—FORFEITURE REMITTED BY SECRETARY OF TREASURY—CLAIM OF COLLECTOR.

1. Imported goods were seized by a collector of customs, as forfeited to the United States for undervaluation. Their appraised value exceeded by more than 10 per cent. their entered value, and they thereby became liable to 20 per cent. additional duty. They were proceeded against and taken into custody by the marshal, under process. Under proceedings for a remission of the forfeiture, the secretary of the treasury remitted it, on condition that the importer should pay the costs and the duties on the goods, if they were due, or give bond to export the goods. He elected to give bond, but the collector refused to permit the goods to be delivered until the importer had paid the 20 per cent. additional duty. He paid it and brought this suit to recover it back: Held, that the exaction was illegal, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

---

2. Where a forfeiture is remitted by the secretary of the treasury, pursuant to the statute authorizing him to do so, the cause of forfeiture is released.

3. A fulfilment of the conditions imposed in a warrant remitting a forfeiture is equivalent to a satisfaction of the cause of action which constituted the ground of seizure.

[This was a suit by James H. Murray against Chester A. Arthur, collector, to recover duty alleged to have been illegally exacted.]

Stephen G. Clarke, for plaintiff.
George Bliss, Dist. Atty., for defendant.

WALLACE, District Judge. The plaintiff imported certain merchandise into the port of New York, the value of which in the principal markets of the country from which it was imported was found by the appraiser to exceed by more than ten per cent. the invoice or entered value. Thereupon the merchandise was seized by the collector of customs, proceedings were instituted for its condemnation, and it was taken by the marshal into custody, under process. The plaintiff then presented a petition to the district judge, praying a remission of the forfeiture, and, the same having been transmitted to the secretary of the treasury, the secretary, after consideration, issued his warrant, remitting all the right and claim of the United States to the forfeiture, upon condition that the plaintiff pay the costs of the proceedings for forfeiture, &c., and the duties on the merchandise, if any were due, or give bond to export the merchandise without the limits of the United States. The plaintiff elected to give bond to export the merchandise; the defendant, as collector, refused to permit the delivery of the goods until the payment of the penal duty of twenty per centum ad valorem, which accrued by reason of the undervaluation. It is now insisted, for the defendant, that the merchandise, after the remission, was subject, as before the seizure, to the additional duty. In support of this position, it is urged, that the secretary of the treasury had no power to remit this duty, because it was not a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, and that he had no power to authorize the merchandise to be entered or exported for drawback, because it had been withdrawn from the custody of the officers of the customs, and was in the custody of the marshal, under the process of the court.

The proceedings for the forfeiture of the plaintiff's merchandise were predicated upon the same grounds as those which subjected the merchandise to the additional duty. It is conceded by the counsel for the defendant, that, if these proceedings had been prosecuted to judgment and sale, no claim for the additional duty could thereafter have been maintained by the United States. This concession is fatal to the right to insist upon the additional duty, under the facts of this case; because, in my judgment, where the forfeiture is remitted pursuant to the statute authorizing the secretary of the treasury to do so, the cause of forfeiture is effectually released to the claimant. The statute which authorizes the remission proceeds upon the theory, that the property seized has become subject to forfeiture; and the power granted to the secretary of the treasury is given upon the assumption that the United States had acquired title to the property, which may be released to the claimant upon such conditions as the secretary may see fit to impose. The claimant, by petitioning for a remission, concedes that his title has been divested, and appeals to the discretion of the secretary. When he fulfils the conditions imposed by the latter, he is restored to his right of property and of possession, and is entitled to an order of the court, if necessary, to carry the terms of remission into effect. The fulfilment of the conditions of the remission is equivalent to a satisfaction of the cause of action which constituted the ground of seizure. Unless this is the legal effect of the remission, the claimant received his property subject to another proceeding for forfeiture for the same cause—a conclusion too unreasonable to merit discussion. The power conferred on the secretary of the treasury to remit a forfeiture, necessarily includes the authority to discharge the cause of action. If he had seen fit, he could have required the payment of the additional duty as one of the conditions of the remission. If he had done so, and the condition had been fulfilled, it would not be claimed that the merchandise, nevertheless, remained still subject to the duty. If the merchandise would have been released by the imposition and fulfilment of such condition, it is by the fulfilment of any other condition imposed by the secretary. The terms of the remission are confided to his discretion solely. Whether the additional duty be regarded as a penalty upon the importer, or as a duty not in the nature of a penalty, is not material. The power conferred upon the secretary of the treasury to release the cause of action upon such conditions as to him may seem meet, authorizes him to exact or to dispense with payment of penalty or duty. If he exacts it, the amount cannot be again exacted by the collector. If he dispenses with it, he has done so in the exercise of the discretion vested in him by the statute. Judgment is ordered for the plaintiff.

MURRAY v. BECK.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 677.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1826.

REPLEVIN — RETORNO BOND — RETURN OF PROPERTY.

If goods be taken in execution and replevied by a third person, the court, upon the return of the writ of replevin, will order a return of the property upon the usual retorno-habendo bond.

Replevin.

Mr. Morfit, for defendant [Joseph W. Beck], upon the return of the writ, moved for a return of the property. The defendant was a constable, and had levied an execution on a hackney coach and horses, in possession, and as the property, of Michael Murray. His brother Thomas (the plaintiff,) sued out this writ of replevin, claiming title to the property under a bill of sale from Michael, which was, in fact, executed three days after the fi. fa. came to the hands of the defendant, but was antedated fifteen days, with the confessed intention to avoid this execution and to secure a debt due from Michael to Thomas.

THE COURT ordered a return of the property upon the usual retorno-habendo bond.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra, being of opinion that the Maryland act of 1785, c. 80, § 14, did not apply, nor authorize a return in such a case, where an officer, acting under an execution, is defendant in replevin. Ideo quaere.

MURRAY v. DONNELLY et al.

[3 Leg. Int. 41.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Aug. 7, 1846.

PRACTICE IN ADMIRALTY—LIBEL IN PERSONAM FOR PERSONAL INJURIES—DOUBTFUL MERITS.

[The court will not take jurisdiction of a libel in personam for assault committed against a mariner by the officers of the vessel, if the case is of doubtful merits, and must be established by unquestionable proofs, but will remit libelant to his remedy at common law.].

[Libel in personam by John Murray, a mariner, against Donnelly, master, and Randall, mate, of the brig Rebecca, for assault.]

KANE, District Judge. I have considered this case, and have come to the determination to dismiss the libel. I am not satisfied with the evidence. It is, at best, doubtful, if not contradictory. I take the occasion to say to the gentlemen of the bar, and through them to those whom it may concern more directly, that I am strongly disinclined to favor proceedings like the present. The admiralty jurisdiction of this court, summary and potential as it is, in cases of personal wrong on the high seas, will be exercised impressively whenever a clear case shall be made out in evidence. But the case must not be one of doubtful merits, and it must be established by unquestionable proof. There must be no mutinous provocation on the part of the libelant, no apparent combination among the witnesses, nothing from which the mind can without violence infer an attempt to prostitute judicial forms to purposes of wrong. When the case is made doubtful by the character of the witnesses or the conflict of their testimony, there is safety in the intervention of a jury; and, where the primary investigation of it by the proctor gives him reason to anticipate such a state of things, he will wisely consult the interests of his client by referring him to the courts of common law.

MURRAY v. DOWLING.

[1 Cranch. C. C. 151.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1803.

WITNESS — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS — ATTORNEY.

An attorney at law cannot be compelled to disclose any fact the knowledge of which has been communicated to him by his client.

Replevin. Avowry for rent-arrear—plea in bar, no rent-arrear—general replication and issue.

Mr. Peacock requested a postponement of the trial on account of the absence of the person who had possession of the original lease.

Mr. Hewitt, for the plaintiff, pressed the trial.

Mr. Peacock waived his application for a postponement, and offered ready.

On the trial Mr. Peacock being sworn as a witness, Mr. Hewitt asked him whether there was a lease in writing. Mr. Peacock stated that his knowledge upon that subject was derived from his client, in his capacity as counsel, and prayed the opinion of the court whether he was bound to answer.

THE COURT was of opinion he ought not to be compelled to answer, and sustained the objection.

MURRAY v. DULANY.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 343.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1828.

WITNESS—MULATTO—PROOF OF FREEDOM.

In assault and battery, the plaintiff, being a mulatto, cannot, at the trial upon the general issue, be compelled to prove his freedom.

Assault and battery. The plaintiff [George Murray] was a mulatto.

Mr. Wise, for the defendant [Henry R. Dulany], contended that the plaintiff should prove his freedom.

But THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent) said, that the defendant had waived the objection to the person of the plaintiff by pleading the general issue.
