I have endeavored to show not only that the end which the statute under consideration seeks is legitimate and within the scope of the constitution, but that the means employed by congress are appropriate and adapted to the end of raising and supporting armies, and therefore within the powers of congress under the constitution. Without entering upon a discussion whether the state may, in view of the legislation of congress, impose a penalty upon the citizen for withholding the money in question, and alone regulate and control contracts between citizens of the state in reference to compensation for such services as those by Fairchilds for Penrose, it will be recollected that a law of congress, if constitutional, prohibits and supersedes all state legislation on the same subject (1 Parker, Cr. R. 67); that while the state law might control in reference to these questions, in the absence of any exercise by congress of its constitutional powers on the subject, yet so far as congress does constitutionally act, the state laws are so far superseded, and the citizen cannot be punished by both sovereignties for the same offense. Sections 12 and 13 of the act of congress are held to be constitutional. The demurrer is overruled, with leave to the defendant to plead to the indictment.

Demurrer overruled.

Case No. 15,068.

UNITED STATES v. FAIRCLOUGH.

[4 Wash. C. C. 398.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1823.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—MANIFEST—SURPLUS OF CARGO—MISTAKE OR ACCIDENT.

1. Under the fifty-seventh section of the collection law, a surplus of cargo, equally with a deficiency of cargo, is a disagreement with the manifest, within the true construction of that section. But this proviso is co-extensive with the enacting clause, excusing from the penalty in all cases where satisfactory proof is made, as required by this proviso.

2. In an action for the penalty given by the fifty-seventh section of the collection law for a disagreement between the cargo and the manifest, the defendant, to obtain the benefit of the proviso, must not only satisfy the court that no part of the cargo had been landed, or unladen after it was taken on board, as specified in the report, and pursuant to permits duly obtained; but also that the disagreement was by mistake or accident.

This was an action of debt brought in the district court against the defendant [Robert Fairclough], master of the Placidia, a foreign vessel, to recover the penalty of $500, under the fifty-seventh section of the duty law (1 Story's Laws, 624 [1 Stat. 671]), for an alleged disagreement between the cargo on board and that reported in the manifest; there being found concealed on board twenty kegs of white lead more than were mentioned in the manifest.

The jury found a verdict stating that, upon the arrival of the vessel at this port, there were on board forty kegs of white lead, whereas only twenty kegs were reported in the manifest. That the twenty, so reported, were landed under permits, and the twenty not reported remained on board, and were discovered by the custom house officers, after the rest of the cargo was landed, were seized by them, and condemned as forfeited by the district court; and that no part of the cargo of said vessel was unshipped, landed, or unladen, after they were taken on board, except as was specified in the report, or manifest, and pursuant to permits regularly obtained. Upon this verdict the district court gave judgment for the defendant. [Case unreported.]

C. J. Ingersoll, U. S. Dist. Atty.

John Sergeant and Mr. Chauncey, for defendant.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. This case turns upon the true construction of the fifty-seventh section of what is called the duty law, passed on the 2d March 1799, which enacts, "that if any package whatever, which shall have been reported as aforesaid, shall be wanting, and not found on board such ship or vessel, or if the goods, wares, and merchandize on board such ship or vessel shall otherwise not agree with the report or manifest delivered by the master, or other person having the charge or command of any such ship or vessel; in every such case, the master, or other person having such charge or command, shall perfect and pay the sum of $500." The proviso declares, that the penalty shall not be inflicted, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, &c.; or, in case of trial for the penalty, to the satisfaction of the court, that no part whatever of the goods, &c. has been unshipped, landed, or unladen, since it was taken on board, except as shall have been specified in the said report or manifest, and pursuant to permits as aforesaid, or that the said disagreement is by accident or mistake.

It is contended by the defendant's counsel, that the case of goods found on board, which are not entered in the report, or manifest, is not one which is embraced by the enacting clause of the above section, the disagreement spoken of in that clause not applying to surplus cargo, but to a variance between the cargo and the manifest, in description merely. But I am clearly of a different opinion. There can be very little doubt but that the legislature considered this to be a case of disagreement, because they speak of a deficiency of cargo as such; for, after providing in respect to packages reported, and not found on board, the expressions are, "or if the goods, &c. on board such ship or vessel shall otherwise not agree with the report," &c. clearly showing that the case of deficiency in the cargo reported, was considered to be one of disagreement. Now, if this be so, it would require a very subtle casuist to maintain, that, if goods are found on board, which are not reported, there is no disagreement between the cargo on board, and that reported. But the latter part of the proviso removes all doubt upon this point, by requiring in all cases as aforesaid, a post entry to be made of goods omitted to be included and reported in the manifest, and forbidding the goods so omitted to be entered, to be unladen till such post entry is made; which part of the proviso is strictly applicable to that species of disagreement which is produced by the appearance on board of goods not mentioned in the manifest, although it also includes packages, &c. which disagree with the manifest in description merely.

But, although I consider every species of disagreement as being embraced by the enacting clause, I have no hesitation in deciding that the proviso is as broad as the enacting clause, and excuses from the penalty, in all the cases, where satisfactory proof is given, such as the proviso requires. But here the difficulty arises: What are the facts of which the master is required to satisfy the collector or the court? It is insisted for the United States that they are, not only, that no part of the goods has been unshipped, landed, or unladen, since they were taken on board, except as shall have been specified in the report, or manifest, and pursuant to permits, but also that the disagreement is by mistake or accident. On the other side it is contended, that, if satisfaction is given as to either of those matters, it is sufficient, the disjunctive "or" necessarily requiring this construction.

There are, I confess, strong reasons for believing that the former construction will best fulfil the intention of the legislature, to be discovered by what is expressed in another section of this act, as well as from the reason and policy of the provision itself. For it may fairly be asked, how does the proof that no part of the goods had been unladen, except as specified in the manifest, and according to permits, account for the circumstance of there being found on board goods not entered in the manifest? This might afford some satisfaction, if the disagreement arose from goods being reported which are not found on board; as a suspicion, in that case, might naturally be entertained that the goods, not found, had been illicitly unladen. In the other case, the reasonable way of accounting for the disagreement, would be by showing, that it was occasioned by accident or mistake. Nor is it unreasonable, in the case of a deficiency of cargo, to require of the party to account for it, not only by showing that the missing packages, &c. have not been unladen, but that it has arisen from mistake or accident, such as the decay of perishable articles, robbery, theft, destruction by rats, or in some other way.

But what presses still more strongly on my mind is the twenty-fourth section of this act, which is in pari materia with the fifty-seventh, and embraces expressly, though not exclusively, the case of goods found on board which are not entered in the manifest. That section extends also to disagreement between the cargo and the manifest, and consequently extends (if the former part of this opinion in relation to the fifty-seventh section be correct), to a deficiency in the cargo, as well as to a disagreement in description. The penalty imposed upon the master by this section, is the forfeiture of a sum equal to the value of the goods not included in the manifest, provided, that if he make it appear to the satisfaction of the collector, &c. or of the court, that no part of the goods has been unshipped after it was taken on board, except such as shall have been particularly specified, and accounted for in the report of the master, and that the manifests had been lost, or mislaid, without fraud, or collusion, or that the same were defaced by accident, or incorrect by mistake, the forfeiture shall not incur.

But this section is confined to the commanders of vessels belonging to citizens, or inhabitants of the United States. If the fifty-seventh section, which is general in its terms, also includes this description of persons, the incongruity between the two, if the latter be interpreted literally, would be striking. For not only would the master be subjected to a double forfeiture, but, in order to relieve himself against the first, he must satisfy the collector of both facts, which would be, in effect, to convert, as to him, the disjunctive in the fifty-seventh section, into the copulative, used in the twenty-fourth. I am inclined, however, to the opinion, that the former of these sections applies exclusively to the masters of foreign vessels. Still it must seem extraordinary that the guard against fraud, provided by the twenty-fourth section, in requiring the master to account satisfactorily for the disagreement between the goods manifested, and those found on board, should have been intentionally relinquished in the case of masters of foreign vessels.

It was contended by the defendant's counsel, that the case of surplus goods was not a disagreement which was intended to be included in the enacting clause of the fifty-seventh section, because, as those goods are liable to be seized and forfeited under the sixty-eighth section it was deemed unnecessary to subject the master to this pecuniary penalty. But it would seem that congress thought otherwise, when, in a case precisely the same, except as to the national character of the vessel, the penalty, as against the master, is distinctly provided for; and yet the goods are equally liable to forfeiture under the sixty-eighth section, as they are in this case.

The only remaining inquiry is, whether, as this section, the fifty-seventh, is penal, the court can give it a construction against its letter? I understand it to be an exemption from the rule that the penal statutes are to be construed strictly, that a departure from the natural signification of the words used, is proper, wherever an adherence to it would involve an inconsistency or contradiction, by reason of some other clause in the same, or another statute, indicating that the intent of the legislature was not that which the literal import of the words would lead to, and this is applicable as well to penal, as to other acts. In the case of U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 318, it was laid down that, if, from a view of the whole law, or of other laws in pari materia, the evident intention of the legislature is different from the literal import of the words employed to express it in; that intention shall prevail, because that, in fact, is the will of the legislature. This I take to be a general and well established rule of construction, applicable as well to penal as to other laws.

I am, upon the whole, of opinion, that the defendant cannot claim the benefit of the proviso, as he has failed to satisfy the court that the disagreement between the goods on board, and the report or manifest, was by mistake or accident. The judgment must be reversed.

Case No. 15,069.

UNITED STATES v. FANJUL.

[1 Lowell, 117.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1866.

INFORMER — MONEY PAID UPON RECOGNIZANCE.

1. The penalty of a recognizance for the appearance in court of a defendant charged with a crime under the customs act of 1799 [1 Stat. 627], is not a penalty recovered by virtue of that act.

2. It seems, that a fine imposed under that act goes, in part, to the informer.

3. But money paid into court by the sureties on a recognizance is not such a fine, and is not instead of a fine, though the alleged crime was one that might have required the imposition of a fine if the defendant had been convicted; and no part of it belongs to the informer.

The defendant was arrested on an indictment charging him with a criminal offence under the customs act of 1799, and gave bail for his appearance, but afterwards made default, and his sureties paid the amount of the bond into court. The petitioner alleged himself to be the person who first informed the collector of the crime committed by the defendant, and prayed that a moiety of the money in the registry might be paid out to him.

W. A. Field, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty., submitted the case without argument, excepting a citation of Ex parte Marquand [Case No. 9,100], and a statement of the practice which has followed that decision.

LOWELL, District Judge. In Ex parte Marquand [supra], it was decided that fines imposed on a defendant in a criminal case, under the statute of 1799, were to be distributed under section 91 of that act (1 Stat. 697), like penalties and forfeitures; and it is understood to have been the practice in all the districts, since that case, to admit informers to a share of such fines. But in this case the penalty, so called, which has been paid into court, is not a fine, penalty, or forfeiture recovered by virtue of that act, but the penalty of a recognizance taken by the court to insure the appearance of the defendant to answer the charge. The amount in which the bond was taken was estimated with a view to all the circumstances of the charge, including the possible fine; but it was in no sense a substitute for the fine. If the defendant, after his default, had appeared, or had been brought in by his bail, the court might have remitted to the sureties the whole or some part of the penalty of the recognizance, by virtue of the act of 1839 [5 Stat. 321]. Supposing the time for such action to be passed, and that the sureties have relinquished all claim to a remission, still if the defendant is found he can be tried, and if convicted may pay a fine, in which the petitioner may be interested; but as I said before, no such fine or penalty has yet been imposed or paid. It was once the law of England, in certain cases, that upon default of the principal, his sureties should take the punishment which he ought to have borne; and this is what the petitioner says we arrive at in a roundabout way by charging the bail. It may turn out to be true, in fact, that the government will be content with this payment, and make no effort to find the defendant; but any bargain to that end would be as illegal as it would be impolitic; and even if it were made, the result would not be that a fine had been paid for a breach of the statute of 1799. It is very doubtful whether an informer has any strict legal right to money paid by way of compromise for a breach of the act, even when the remedy is only of a civil nature. Here there is no evidence of any compromise, or of any payment on account of the breach of a revenue law.

Petition dismissed.

Case No. 15,070.

UNITED STATES v. FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb., 1866.

INTERNAL REVENUE — BANKS — LOAN AND TRUST COMPANIES.

[1. A loan and trust company which issues certificates of deposit and makes loans on stocks, bonds, and other securities, is subject to the payment of the license fee imposed by Act 1864, § 79, cl. 1.]

[2. Such company is "engaged in the business of banking," so as to be liable for the payment of a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per centum each month upon the average amount of its deposits, as provided by section 110 of said act.]

This case involved the important question to the government in the way of revenue, whether loan and trust companies were subject to the tax imposed by the act of congress of June, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], and as amended by the subsequent act of March, 1865 [Id. 469], which provides that banks shall pay a license, &c.; that every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated or other bank having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange or promissory notes, &c., shall be regarded a banker under this act.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. The defendants in this case are a corporation created by the legislature of the state of New York, and have an office or place of business in this city. Certain questions having arisen touching their liability to take out a license as bankers, and pay a monthly tax on their deposits and capital, an agreed statement of facts has been submitted to this court and its judgment invoked on the points in dispute. The charter of the company is made part of the agreed statement. The charter was granted in perpetuity, and created the corporation originally under the name of the "Farmers' Fire Insurance & Loan Company," with the power to loan money and insure property, as well as for some other purposes set forth in their charter. This charter (originally granted in 1822) was subsequently and at different times modified and amended by the legislature. It is not deemed necessary to refer specifically to its provisions here, inasmuch as the nature of the business of the company, and the manner in which it is transacted, must determine the questions affecting its liability under the internal revenue law. The agreed statement of facts sufficiently set forth, in terms, both the nature of the business and the manner in which it is conducted, and the act of congress has prescribed the rule by which the court must determine the extent to which the company is liable under our new system of taxation.

The first question to be settled is whether or not the defendants are bankers within the meaning of the internal revenue act. It is immaterial to the present inquiry whether or not they are bankers in the general popular or commercial sense. Congress in this act have seen fit to use the term banker in a specific sense, and have set forth in express language the rule by which we are to determine what that sense is. The clause of the act which relates to this point is the first part of the seventy-ninth section, which requires the payment of a license fee by those engaged in particular kinds of business. After providing that bankers shall pay such fee in proportion to their capital, as specified, the act proceeds to declare who should be deemed a banker within the meaning of the law, as follows: "Every person, firm, or company, and every incorporated bank having a place of business where credits are opened by the deposit or collection of money or currency, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check or order, or where money is advanced or loaned on stocks, bonds, bullion, bills of exchange or promissory notes are received for discount or sale, shall be regarded a banker under this act." This language is explicit, and for the purpose of ascertaining whether a given person or corporation is to be deemed a banker or not under this act it is only necessary to determine whether the business transacted by such person or company comes under any of the different branches of business described in the clause cited. In the present case the agreed statement of facts sets forth that the defendants are a corporation with a capital of $1,000,000, that this capital and a part of their deposits are invested permanently on bond and mortgage, government securities, and other stock securities. That their principal business is as trustee and receiver under their charter, and in those capacities they receive and keep the books of registry and transfer of various railroads and other corporations, and act as trustees in railroad mortgages and other fiduciary capacities. That they pay the interest and dividends in the matters in which they act as trustees to the parties entitled to the same by their checks on banks in which they keep their deposits. As a part of their general business the defendants receive money in trust under special contract for specified times and upon an agreed rate of interest to be allowed therefor, and in all cases give to the depositor a contract or certificate as follows: "New York,——, 18—. No. ——. This certifies that the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company have received of —— the sum of —— in trust; that said company will retain the same and allow interest thereon, at the annual rate of — per cent. for the term of —— from the date of this certificate, and at the expiration of that period will repay the same, with the interest accrued thereon, to the said——, or assigns, on the presentation of this certificate. ——, President."

It is also agreed that "the daily average amount of its deposits on hand for which contracts are outstanding varies from $200,000 to $500,000" and that "some part of these sums is loaned out by the defendants, as occasion offers, on stocks, bonds, and other securities." The agreed statement further declares, "that the defendants do not open credits by the deposit or collection of money, subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, check, or order, and do not discount or loan money upon bills of exchange or promissory notes." This last clause of the agreed statement merely goes to show that the defendants are not bankers in the ordinary commercial sense of that term; and had the act of congress used the term banker, and left its definition to the law merchant, the defendants would not have been included within the act. Both the agreed statement and the argument of the defendants would have been conclusive on that point. But the clause of the act cited declares that "every person, firm, or company * * * having a place of business, * * * where money is advanced or loaned on * * * stocks (or) bonds, * * * shall be regarded as a banker under this act." There is no room for official construction here. The language is so explicit, that I am bound to assume that congress intended its effect should be direct and precise. Its operation may be harsh upon these defendants, but this is a difficulty from which they can be relieved only by the power which enacted the law. Now, the agreed statement, while it shows that they are not bankers under the ordinary commercial understanding of the term, explicitly states that they have a place of business, where they, among other pecuniary transactions, loan money, as occasion offers, "on stocks, bonds, and other securities." Thus they are brought directly within the descriptive term of the law, and belong to that class of companies which congress declares shall be regarded as bankers under the act in question. They are bound, therefore, to take out a license as bankers, and pay such fees therefor as the act prescribes.

The other question is, whether the defendants are required to pay a tax on their deposits and capital under the 110th section of the same act. The first part of the section covers this point, and is as follows: "There shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per centum each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money subject to payment by check or draft or represented by certificate of deposit or otherwise, whether payable on demand or at some future day, with any person, bank, association, company, or corporation engaged in the business of banking; and a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per centum each month as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital of any bank, association, company, or corporation, or person engaged in the business of banking, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds." Here the argument of the defendants is met by the same insuperable difficulty. Congress having given an arbitrary meaning to the word banker as used in this act, it follows in strict logical sequence that they have extended the same meaning to the terms "business of banking." The act would be no more explicit if it had said that any person or company having a place of business where money is advanced or loaned on stocks or bonds, shall be deemed and regarded under this act to be engaged in the banking business. The agreed statement of facts brings the defendants directly within the plain letter of the law, while the law itself restricts and applies the letter, by descriptive terms, which excludes all doubts as to the sense in which it is used, and leaves no room whatever for the court to resort to the ordinary rules of definition or construction. The defendants have large deposits, which are represented by approved certificates, payable at some future day. They have a large capital, some portion or all of which is employed in what congress says shall be regarded as the business of banking under this act. And I see no way in which, so long as this act stands, they can be relieved from the prescribed duty on both. Judgment must, therefore, be rendered for the plaintiffs, subject to adjustment under a referee, as contemplated by the parties in their agreed statement of facts, submitted to this court, reserving all their rights touching an appeal or suit of error for the purpose of revising this decision.

Case No. 15,071.

UNITED STATES v. FARNHAM.

[2 Blatchf. 528; 11 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 161; 10 West. Law J. 289.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Jan. 21, 1853.

SHIPPING — PUBLIC REGULATIONS — SAFTY VALVE OF STEAMBOAT—NEGLECT TO RAISE—INDICTMENT FOR MANSLAUGHTER.

1. On an indictment for manslaughter, under the twelfth section of the act of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. 306), against the captain of a steamboat, it is not necessary for the prosecution to show wilful misconduct, negligence or inattention in the captain

2. The captain of a steamboat is responsible for the proper performance by the engineer the pilot and all the other officers, of their duties on board, unless their authority is expressly made independent of him.

3. The duties and responsibilities of the captain of a steamboat are the same as those of the captain of any other vessel; and, as to the relative duties and responsibilities of the different officers of steam vessels, there is no distinction between those which navigate inland waters exclusively and sea-going vessels.

4. The seventh section of the act above named makes it the duty of the master to see that the safety-valve of the boiler is raised when the steamboat stops.

5. Under that section, it is not sufficient to raise the safety-valve only when the pressure of steam is higher after than before the stoppage of the boat.

6. Nor is the safety-valve to be raised only when the pressure of steam becomes, during the stoppage, higher than that named in the certificate of the inspectors as the pressure the boiler will bear.

7. Nor can other methods of lowering the pressure of steam—such as opening the furnace-doors—be substituted for the raising of the safety-valve.

8. It is a culpable omission in the captain to leave it to the discretion of the engineer whether to raise the safety-valve during a stoppage or not.

9. The omission of the captain to give orders for the raising of the safety-valve when the boat stops, is legal evidence to support an indictment against him under the twelfth section of the act, provided the omission to raise the safety-valve was the proximate cause of the destruction of life.

This was an indictment against the defendant [Charles W. Farnham], under the twelfth section of the act of July 7, 1838, entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam" (5 Stat. 304), for manslaughter, in causing the death of several persons, who lost their lives by the explosion of the boiler of the steamboat Reindeer, while she was landing passengers at Bristol dock, on the Hudson river. The defendant was the captain of the steamboat. The substance of the indictment, and the facts put in evidence to sustain it, on the trial, which took place before BETTS, District Judge, sufficiently appear from the charge of the court.

J. Prescott Hall, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William Curtis Noyes and Dennis McMahon, for defendant.

[2] [BETTS, District Judge. In this case, gentlemen of the jury, you have heard with great attention the testimony offered for the prosecution and the defence, and the arguments of the public prosecutor and the defendant's counsel; and no doubt you are possessed of every fact essential to the merits of the case, both on the part of the United States and the accused. The indictment was originally framed against two persons, the master and engineer of the steamboat Reindeer; but, at the instance of the parties accused, the charges have been severed, and the proceedings are now carried on against the master alone. Although the character of the event which gives rise to this prosecution, is calculated to excite deep interest in the community, with which you, as citizens, must necessarily sympathize, we may, nevertheless, congratulate ourselves that the case is now presented under such circumstances that the court and yourselves can give to it a calm, dispassionate, and impartial consideration. It is not disputed but that Capt. Farnham was fully competent to the station in which he was employed. He was an experienced navigator. He had been, more or less, for a long period familiar with the use of steam machinery, and he was skilful and prudent in the discharge of his duties. There is no imputation against him of any improper command or omission, directly relating to this disaster, nor a suggestion that he was guilty of any act intentionally wrong. There was no designed culpability on his part, either of commission or neglect. Furthermore, although the occurrence was startling and deplorable in the extreme, causing the loss of numerous lives, and filling the whole community with alarm, yet happening more than one hundred miles from this city, and five or six months having elapsed since the shock was experienced, there is no reason to apprehend that you entertain unfavorable prepossessions against the defendant, or any other feelings upon the subject than such as are common to the public at large, and are compatible with an unprejudiced judgment upon this case. Nor is there any reason to suppose that you had friends or relatives involved in the calamity, whose sufferings or exposure may appeal to your sympathies to the disadvantage of the accused. The court, therefore, congratulate you that, on coming to the consideration of this case, you can examine the facts, and pass upon the whole transaction, in a calm and dispassionate frame of mind.

[1] [Reported by Samuel Blatchford, Esq., and here reprinted by permission. 10 West. Law J. 289, contains a condensed report.]

[In the first instance, a question of law was raised, in behalf of the defendants, whether this court, acting under the authority of the federal government, could take cognizance of the case. That question was properly addressed to the court, as entirely one of law. The court decided that the laws of the United States govern the subject, and have vested cognizance of it in this tribunal. You will, therefore, not regard that point as before you for consideration, and will proceed upon the issue before you, and dispose of it according to law and evidence, acquitting the accused, if you do not find the charge in the indictment satisfactorily fastened upon him, or condemning him by your verdict if your judgments are convinced that he has committed the offence created and defined by the law. It has been remarked, by counsel, that this court has no jurisdiction in the case other than what is conferred by the act of congress referred to. Such is the law. Unless congress had legislated on the subject, the offence, however heinous, could not be proceeded against here, but would have come under the authority of the state tribunals. Those judicatories might have cognizance of the offence, by force of the common law, without any act of the legislature. But the courts of the United States cannot look to any authority other than the written law, the act of congress, in relation to this subject, which creates the offence under prosecution, and appoints the mode and extent of its punishment. It may aid us, in passing upon the facts of the case, to take a slight survey of the objects which congress had in view in making these enactments. To this end we may profitably notice the state of navigation by steam in this country when congress passed the act of 1838. You are aware that, as an historical fact, steam had been employed for more than thirty years coastways, and in all the interior waters of the country, and that the use of it was accompanied by many startling disasters, particularly on the Western waters; and the destruction to property and the loss of life so agitated public feeling that congress undertook to enforce regulations in the equipment and navigation of vessels propelled by steam, which might tend to the preservation of life and property exposed to that mode of transportation. The purpose of congress manifestly was to reach the source from which these evils sprung, and establish rules for their prevention. In order to effect this, provisions were enacted requiring vessels propelled, in whole or in part, by steam, to be sufficiently strong to sustain the weight of the machinery used, directing precautions to be supplied against the hazard of fire in generating steam, and to enforce watchful precautions in the management of the machinery, both to avert explosions and disabling the vessel, as also to secure all practicable skill and prudence in navigating it.

[You will observe, from this general summary, the leading design of the act of 1838. To give efficacy to these provisions, the act requires every vessel belonging to citizens of the United States to be enrolled or registered, and that no vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam shall be registered without first complying with the conditions designated; and, to compel an enrolment, declares that no such vessel shall navigate the waters of the United States without it; and imposes a penalty of $500 every time a steam vessel is run without such enrolment. The act points out the particular qualifications necessary to obtain an enrolment, and, in order to ascertain the sufficiency of the vessel and her machinery, it created a board of inspectors for every revenue district of the United States, designating their duties with great minuteness. They are to examine the vessel, and determine whether she possesses sufficient strength and capacity, and also carefully examine the steam boilers, and see that they are sufficiently strong for the purpose they are to be employed in; and, if satisfied that the vessel and boilers are of sufficient strength, in their judgment, they give a certificate of such facts, without which the collector cannot grant an enrolment. In this way congress intended to provide for a rigid examination of vessels and machinery by officers appointed for that purpose, and thus secure a higher degree of confidence and safety in this most important mode of conveyance. The law was not, however, limited to measures looking to the strength and sufficiency of steamboats and their machinery alone, but it gave to those requirements the most stringent sanctions, pecuniary and personal, against owners and officers, in order to guaranty the safety of persons and property transported in such vessels. The regulations to insure the safety of property or remunerate for its loss, need not be specified at large, but will be hereafter adverted to, as explanatory of the penal enactments. They are contained in sections 7 and 12, which have been read to you.] [2]

The indictment in this case is founded on the twelfth section of the act of July 7, 1838, which is in these words: "And be it further enacted, that every captain, engineer, pilot or other person employed on board of any steamboat or vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and, upon conviction thereof, before any circuit court in the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor, for a period of not more than ten years." The seventh section of the act is to be taken in connection with the twelfth, as indicating the particular act of negligence on which the indictment is based. That section is as follows: "And be it further enacted, that whenever the master of any boat or vessel, or the person or persons charged with navigating said boat or vessel, which is propelled in whole or in part by steam, shall stop the motion or headway of said boat or vessel, or when said boat or vessel shall be stopped for the purpose of discharging or taking in cargo, fuel or passengers, he or they shall open the safety-valve, so as to keep the steam down in said boiler as near as practicable to what it is when the said boat or vessel is under headway, under the penalty of two hundred dollars for each and every offence."

The indictment charges on the master of the Reindeer the crime of manslaughter, because, by his misconduct, negligence or inattention at the time and place alleged, the lives of many persons on board were destroyed. The question at issue on the indictment is, whether the government has, by legal and sufficient proof, convicted the defendant of the crime of manslaughter.

The law does not require the public prosecutor to prove wilful mismanagement or malconduct by the accused. The inqury is not, whether he was guilty of intentional negligence or inattention, but only whether he did what is forbidden by the law, and whether the explosion and destruction of life charged in the indictment arose from either of those causes. To resolve that question, you must have a clear and accurate understanding of the meaning of the terms used by congress in the law.

By misconduct, negligence or inattention in the management of steamboats, mentioned in the statute, is undoubtedly meant the omission or commission of any act which may naturally lead to the consequences made criminal; and it is no matter what may be the degree of misconduct, whether it be slight or gross, if the proof satisfies you that the explosion of the boiler was the necessary or most probable result of it.

In order to possess a satisfactory apprehension of the language of the act, it is important to understand what are the duties of the captain of a steamboat—what responsibility he incurs personally—when his duty is merged in the duties of the other officers—and when the responsibilities of the other officers are independent of his. Was it the duty of the master to see to the state of the boiler, or that proper precautions were taken to relieve it from the pressure of steam when the boat was running or had stopped, or did that duty belong exclusively to the engineer? The practice and opinions of experienced officers and engineers on the subject have been testified to. It appears that a practice has grown up and become very common, to allot to the different officers separate and independent trusts and commands; and it is a general notion that it belongs to the pilot to navigate the vessel, independently of the captain, and that the engineer is, in his special department, not subordinate to the captain in the performance of his duties. If that were the true construction of the law, the captain would stand discharged of responsibility for all acts of the engineer appertaining to his particular department. There is no foundation in law for such distinction and restriction in the duties of officers of steamboats. They are the same in law as those of the officers of other vessels. The master is commander-in-chief. The law entrusts him with the control of the vessel and of every department of service on board; and the engineer has no more right to refuse obedience to his orders than has the mate. The captain is charged with responsibility for the right performance of all duties which appertain to the command and management of the propelling power of the vessel. If there be misconduct or neglect in the engineer's department, the captain is, by the maritime law, responsible civilly, and, by this statute, criminally for the consequences. But, if he procures competent persons, and gives them injunctions to perform the duties, the law will not impute guilt to him, if they, without his knowledge, neglect the duties assigned to them.

Although the captain may not select or engage the engineer, and the owners, as they have a right to do, employ him and fix the amount of his compensation, yet that circumstance in no way withdraws from the captain the rightful control over him, in every particular of his service on board, unless his authority is expressly made independent of the captain. This must manifestly be so, or there could be no unity of command or action in working the vessel. The notion expressed by some of the witnesses, that an engineer holds his place independently of the authority of the master, and that the latter has no power to restrain him, even if he is crowding the machinery with a head of steam beyond what the master deems to be safe or prudent, has no foundation in law. The master has supreme command in all respects, in directing the navigation of the boat, including control over the head of steam to be used. He is responsible for every misuse or neglect of that authority, and is, by the law in question, made a wrongdoer, answerable criminally on indictment, if he omits to interpose and suppress the danger. He is bound to see that all persons under his command do their duty properly; and this statute especially compels him, at his personal peril, to be actively awake to the safety of his passengers. It makes no difference in his favor, if the engineer be the more skilled and competent man in respect to the management of steam. The supremacy of authority is with the master, on general principles; and, in respect to specific duties imposed on him by law, he is responsible that proper measures be taken for their performance.

There is no distinction, in law or maritime usage, between the relative duties and responsibilities of different officers who serve on vessels propelled by steam, whether such vessels navigate inland waters exclusively or are sea-going vessels. The pilot cannot, at his discretion, take a course different from that directed by the master. Nor can the engineer raise the steam to or keep it at a gauge beyond what is prescribed by the master, whatever may be the desire or judgment of the pilot or engineer in those respects. It belonging to the master, of right, to dictate to his subordinate officers, it will be presumed that what is done by them, under his observation, is so done by his direction or assent, unless he proves his ignorance or that his directions have been disregarded.

The great question in this case is, whether the omission to raise the safety-valve when the vessel stopped at the dock at Bristol, was an act of misconduct, inattention or negligence in the captain, within the meaning of the twelfth section of the statute? This question arises on the seventh section of the same statute, which I have already read to you. The statute does not charge the engineer with the duty of raising the safety-valve, but it is imperative in respect to the master, and imposes the duty on him to see that the safety-valve is raised when the boat stops. The omission to do so thus becomes, in respect to him, a direct violation of the law, and has an important bearing upon the meaning and application of the twelfth section.

It is not a correct interpretation of the law, to understand it as requiring the safety-valve to be raised only in the contingency that the boiler has acquired, while stopped, a higher pressure of steam than was upon it when the boat was under headway; for that would permit the captain, without regard to danger, to keep the head of steam, during stoppage, the same as it was before coming to the dock. This would be, manifestly, in violation of the whole policy of the enactments, because a boat might thus be running under any head of steam, no matter how extreme and perilous, and yet the steam might be maintained at the same height while at the dock. The law was framed to promote the safety of the vessel and of the property and passengers on board. The whole purpose aimed at would be frustrated, if the boat could be allowed to retain, when stopped, any pressure of steam she could generate whilst in motion. The object of the law was to secure a low state of steam, at all events, when the boat stopped; and, to effect this, the safety-valve is required to be opened, so as to keep the steam down, at all events, to what it was when the vessel was under headway. This presupposes that she is running with no more steam than is safe and prudent in the condition of her boiler. It would be, in itself, an act of misconduct to keep, at any time, a gauge of steam on the boiler beyond its fair capacity to bear; and, in addition to that plain obligation implied in the provisions of the twelfth section, congress superadded, in the seventh section, the express duty of raising the safety-valve on stopping the boat.

The course of the defence would seem to imply that the accused was justified in carrying any amount of steam within the range of fifty pounds to the square inch, which the certificate of the inspectors suggests the boiler would bear. But, the inspectors have no authority, under the act, to dictate what amount of steam, whether forty or fifty pounds, more or less, may be used, or to compel steamboat owners or masters to follow their advice in that respect. It was wise and prudent in them to counsel parties on that subject. But this was only advisory and cautionary. They had no power to compel obedience. Nor was their opinion backed by facts which could give to it any special importance with the engineer or master. They had no authority to test the sufficiency of the boiler by steam or hydraulic pressure, to ascertain whether it could bear fifty pounds or ten pounds pressure to the inch. Moreover, these inspections are only periodical, and are required to be made at six months' intervals. In this instance, the period for re-inspection had nearly come around, and that should have been a further caution to the officers of the Reindeer to be vigilant and prudent, and not to rely upon the opinions of inspectors, given months previously, as to the present safety and sufficiency of the boiler.

The testimony also affords reason to believe that, during the time since the last inspection, the boat had been running in active competition with others, which would have tended to overstrain and weaken the boiler, and to render less and less liable and trustworthy the opinion of the inspectors upon its former condition and strength. This condition of things is necessarily incident, in a greater or less degree, to all boats in use; and, therefore, it is not to be implied that congress intended to take the height of steam put upon a boiler whilst a boat is running, as the measure of what may be retained when she is stopped. It would be to abrogate the beneficial object of this feature of the law, so to construe it. The whole scope of the enactment shows that congress intended that steam vessels should be, at all times, restrained to the use of no more steam than is compatible with entire safety; and the particular provision in question aims to fulfil that general intention, by guarding against an accumulation of steam when the vessel is at rest. Masters and engineers would be responsible, under the common and local law, for putting on an unsafe amount of steam in running boats. And congress, without giving further sanction to that law, by inflicting a fine or punishment, under the United States authority, for its violation, has applied its positive enactments, in this particular, by an absolute injunction that the safety-valve shall be raised whenever the vessel is stopped. It is hoped that the provisions of the new law, which goes into effect in a few days,—Act Aug. 30, 1852 (10 Stat. 61),—will prove more efficacious, both in ascertaining the actual strength of boilers, and in compelling a prudent use of them when the boat is in motion, than has been secured under the existing law; but its regulations have no application to this case.

The special question for the jury to consider and determine is, whether the vessel was under a prudent and safe head of steam at the time she was stopped at the landing, and whether the boiler had a sufficient supply of water; and next, whether the omission to open the safety-valve at that time was the cause of the explosion.

A ground of defence taken on this branch of the case is, that the safety-valve is required to be raised only as a means for lowering the steam in the boiler, and that the method pointed out in the act need not be adopted, if other and better means are employed for effecting the same end. In this view, it is contended that the accused has clearly proved, from universal practice and the judgment of skilful and experienced men, that, when coal is used for fuel, the steam in the boiler is more speedily and certainly reduced and made safe, by opening the furnace and flue-doors, than by raising the safety-valve. I do not, however, interpret the statute as leaving it optional with the master to adopt the course prescribed by the statute, or to substitute another. I think the statute is peremptory, and that the master has no right to deviate from its particular requirement. The plain language of the act must govern, and the master is bound to obey it. Congress has the like power to dictate in this particular as in that of the enrolment or inspection of steam vessels before they are allowed to run, and, in either case, to subject owners and masters to penalties for disobeying the prohibition.

The propriety of this enactment, or its fitness to secure the end proposed, or its inutility or inferiority to other methods, could not be determined with certainty by the opinions or theories of experts, if it were left an open question. This has been clearly evinced by the evidence on this trial. The statute is designed to obviate all obscurity or speculations on this point, and to supply a plain and determinate rule of action for the avoidance of a special hazard and peril, and, what is equally important, to ensure implicit obedience to its regulations. Engineers, like other professional men, naturally incline to give slight heed to legislative directions which stand in conflict with their own opinions and practices. But it cannot be necessary to say more on this head, than that theories and speculations can have no place here. Congress has the power to give the rule, and we must accept the national will, as expressed in the law, as fixing the method which must be observed and adhered to, without regard to its abstract reasonableness or usefulness. Besides, it is far from being made clear, upon the evidence, that the usage of opening the doors of the furnaces relieves the boiler sufficiently, or that the idea is an erroneous one which induced congress to require the safety-valve to be always opened for the discharge of steam when the boat is stopped. After an experience of twelve or thirteen years, congress appears to adhere to the same opinion; and, in a few days, a law will go into operation compelling steamboats to have, not only one but three safety-valves ready for use, one of which must be self-acting and out of the control of the captain or engineer, so that it shall open at a particular point of steam, no matter what other means are in use to keep the steam below that point. Nor do I think that the engineers express themselves decidedly of opinion that opening the doors of the furnaces and flues can always be relied upon as sufficient, nor but that, under many circumstances, it will be necessary to open the safety-valve also, especially if there be a deficiency of water in the boiler.

It seems to the court plain, that the object congress had in view, in the provision, was to compel the master to have the safety-valve opened when the boat stops, without regard to other measures which may be employed to prevent an exp'osion. If experience has demonstrated the law to be useless or improvident, and that additional danger is incurred by raising the safety-valve, the legislature should have been appealed to for a repeal or modification of the law, so that masters need not be compelled to use means calculated to increase danger instead of warding it off.

The legislative will must govern; and that declared by this law must be obeyed until a different one is substituted by congress. But, if we may judge by the late enactment on the subject, there has been no change of legislative opinion. It is no matter what may be the inconvenience or expense to the owners, or what delay it may cause in the progress of the boat. It is your duty, equally with that of the court, to hold captains of steamboats to a strict obedience to the direction of the legislature, and to regard an intentional deviation from it as a fault. Whether such neglect or misconduct be of a criminal character, will be more particularly considered hereafter.

The excuse set up for the master, in this instance, that he was occupied with other duties of his command, cannot avail as a defence, because it was in no way necessary that he should be personally at the engine and raise the valve with his own hand. He would stand acquitted of blame if he had laid express commands on the engineer and his assistants to see that it was done at every stoppage. He is not permitted to leave this duty to the judgment and discretion of the engineer, even if satisfied the latter has more skill and experience than himself.

The crime created by the statute does not rest upon any wrong intention of the officer who is subjected to indictment. As regards the defendant in this case, he is not accused of any wilful misconduct, or of any design to injure the vessel or any person on board or to put either in danger. The indictment is not placed upon that ground. You will examine the evidence, and see whether you can fairly imply from it that the captain had given proper orders for the safety-valve to be raised when the boat was stopped; and, if not, you must regard his omission to take that precaution as legal evidence of misconduct, negligence and inattention, tending to support the indictment. In order to convict him, the district attorney must prove some act of negligence or omission. It must be shown that the accused omitted to do something which it was incumbent upon him to do in fulfilment of his duty, or that he did something in violation of his duty. The mere circumstance of the valve's not having been raised, is not to be taken by itself as full proof of the crime charged against the captain. The essential question is, not whether the evidence shows that the captain was negligent of his duty, but whether the explosion was caused by the particular negligence proved; that is, whether the proof satisfies your judgment that the omission to raise the valve was the proximate cause of the explosion and of the death of the persons destroyed. And, in examining this point, it is important to ascertain what was the actual state of the boiler. If it was insufficient, from some inherent defect, at the time it was inspected, or had afterwards become so from ordinary use, and there was nothing discernible, by reasonable attention and diligence, to indicate any defect, and if, furthermore, it appears that such occult defect was the cause of the explosion, then the defendant cannot be made responsible criminally for consequences arising out of that condition of things. It is necessary that this branch of the case be carefully considered, and, if it appears upon the evidence that this boiler must, most probably, have exploded under a cautious use of steam, and that it was intrinsically unsafe under such circumstances, the omission to raise the valve on stopping the boat should not be regarded as adequate evidence that such omission caused the explosion, and the accused ought to be acquitted of the crime charged upon him by the indictment.

It is incumbent upon the jury to weigh considerately the proofs bearing upon this point, and to be satisfied there was no more than a reasonable head of steam upon the boiler at the time of the explosion; because, latent defects in that will afford the master no protection, if he allowed an improvident and unsafe pressure of steam to be then generated. The accused is called on to answer for his negligence or misconduct in allowing the boiler to be under a dangerous gauge and pressure of steam, but not for an explosion arising from other causes. The only direct proof of any act of misconduct, negligence or inattention by the defendant, is his omission to have the safety-valve raised at the time it was, by statute, made his duty to raise it; but, you must connect with that and consider all other circumstances in evidence attendant upon the catastrophe or directly preceding it, and judge from the whole evidence whether that omission was the productive cause of the explosion and homicide charged upon him. If, on consideration of all the facts and circumstances laid before you by the testimony, you are unable to determine, to the clear satisfaction of your judgment, what was the immediate cause of this disaster, and of the appalling destruction of life which attended it, or if, on such review, it remains doubtful in your minds whether the explosion was occasioned by any culpable inattention, or negligence or misconduct of the defendant, then he is entitled to your acquittal.

[In submitting this case to your judgment, the court, gentlemen of the jury, reposes the most entire confidence in your intelligence, discretion, and sagacity, and is persuaded that the issue, so deeply affecting the defendant and the public, will be determined by you according to the law and the facts.][2]

The jury, after retiring, came into court, and requested a further explanation of the seventh and twelfth sections of the act.

Judge BETTS read the two sections to the jury, and remarked that, the command of the seventh section being positive, that the master shall open the safety-valve on the stoppage of the boat, it is a culpable omission in him to leave it to the option of the engineer to open the valve or not, at his discretion. It is the duty of the master to give explicit orders that the statutory direction in this respect be strictly obeyed. The true construction of the law does not authorize the master to keep the safety-valve down while the boat is stopped, although the steam is no higher during the stoppage than when the boat was under headway, provided the pressure before she stopped was an unsafe one. The law does not authorize the master to keep on a head of steam when the boat is stopped, which was dangerous when she was under headway

The twelfth section does not declare that the particular act of misconduct or neglect, in keeping down the safety-valve when the boat is stopped, is a criminal offence; but it becomes so, under that section, if the omission to open the valve at that time causes the explosion of the boiler. If the jury are satisfied, upon all the evidence, that an improper and unsafe pressure of steam was kept on the boiler, and that it exploded from that cause, and of the further fact, that, if the safety-valve had been opened when the boat was stopped, the danger would have been avoided, then, as before remarked, the master's disobedience of the seventh section in that respect would be legal evidence against him under the twelfth section. That disobedience is not declared to be of itself a crime; but yet, if it causes the death of a person on the boat, it is competent evidence in proof of the misconduct or negligence which is made criminal by the twelfth section. [Whether it had that effect or not, is wholly matter of fact for the jury to decide.][2]

[The jury then returned to their room and, after an absence of one hour, returned into court, stating their inability to agree on a verdict. By consent of counsel, on both sides, the jury were discharged without rendering a verdict.][2]

Case No. 15,072.

UNITED STATES v. FARNSWORTH.

[1 Mason, 1.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1815.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—CONCEALMENT OF GOODS—RESISTING SEIZURE.

1. What constitutes a concealment of goods within the 69th section of the collection act of March 2, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 632; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22.]?

2. If an officer of the customs seizes goods, a party, who resists the seizure, is not guilty of concealment within the statute, merely by such act of resistance; although the goods are taken away, and wholly removed from the custody of the officer in consequence thereof.

This was a writ of error upon a judgment of the district court, in an action of debt brought by the United States against the defendant, to recover the penalty prescribed by the 69th section of the collection act of March 2, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws, 632; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22], for concealing goods, knowing them to have been unlawfully imported. At the trial in the district court, evidence was offered to show, that certain packages of goods were concealed in a stable of Mrs. Trask in Boston, and were there seized by certain custom-house officers; that at the time of the seizure, the defendant, with other persons, did attempt to rescue the goods so seized. threw a great part of them out of the window of the stable, and finally, by their resistance of the officers, and throwing the goods out of the window, succeeded in depriving the officers of the possession and custody of a great portion of the goods, so that they were never afterwards found.

The district attorney, upon this evidence, prayed the court to instruct the jury, "that, whether the defendant were or were not concerned in, or privy to, the original concealment of the packages of merchandise referred to, in the stable of Mrs. Trask, still if they should be satisfied, that the defendant was in fact knowingly concerned in impeding the seizing officer or his assistants in the execution of their duty, and in casting the packages from the window of the stable in the manner represented by the witnesses, whereby the seizing officer was deprived of his possession of them, and thus the goods were removed and put away, so that the said officer could not afterwards find or get possession of them, that this would amount, in point of law, to a concealment of the said packages and goods, within the true intent and meaning of the provisions of the 69th section of the act of March 2, 1799, c. 128 [1 Story's Laws. 632; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22]. But the court did, then and there, refuse so to direct or instruct the jury; and, on the contrary, did instruct the jury, that if they were not satisfied by the evidence adduced, that the defendant was concerned in the original concealment of the packages and goods in the stable of Mrs. Trask, or in a subsequent concealment; and if his only offence was in resisting the searching officer and his assistants, and in throwing the packages out of the stable window, in the manner stated by the witnesses for the United States, then he could not be lawfully convicted upon this suit under the 69th section of the act, though the officer was deprived of the possession of the goods by such proceedings on the part of the defendant, and could not afterwards recover the possession of said goods." [Case unreported.]

It was contended, on the part of the United States, that there was error both in the refusal, and in the direction of the district court.

G. Blake, for the United States.

W. Sullivan, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The question resolves itself into this, whether the mere acts of resisting the officers of the customs, and casting the packages of goods out of the window of the stable, whereby they were entirely removed from the possession and custody of the officers, constituted per se in point of law a concealment of the goods. I cannot yield to the argument, that endeavours to maintain the affirmative. Neither the act of resisting the officers, nor of throwing the goods out of the window, is of itself a concealment, although it may have led to a concealment within the statute. The defendant may have concurred in either or both of these acts, and yet may not have been party to the subsequent removal and concealment of the goods. On the other hand, a person may have concealed the goods, who did not concur in the previous resistance of the officers, or the removal of the goods from the stable. If this be true, then the conduct of the court, both in the refusal and in the instruction to the jury, was perfectly correct. It is quite another question, whether the evidence would not have warranted the jury to infer, that the defendant was a party to the concealment, as well before as after the seizure. This, however, was a fact exclusively for their consideration, and in respect to which the charge of the court did not at all interfere. On the whole, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

Case No. 15,073.

UNITED STATES v. FARRELL et al.

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. July 8, 1878.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—DESTRUCTION OF SPIRITS BY FIRE — TAXES THEREON — WHEN TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS ATTACHES.

1. The fact that distilled spirits placed in a distillery warehouse were destroyed by fire, because of the absence of the government storekeeper from the warehouse, does not release the bondsmen from liability for the amount of the taxes which were due on the spirits. The government cannot be made a loser by a neglect of duty by an officer.

2. The liability of a distiller for the tax on distilled spirits attaches so soon as the spirits are produced, and if he places them in a warehouse, giving bond for the payment of the tax on their removal and within one year from the date of the bond, and the warehouse and spirits are destroyed without any negligence on his part, this does not release him from liability for payment of the tax.

3. A destruction by fire is a "removal" within the meaning of the statute and the bond.

[This was a suit against De Witt C. Farrell and others, brought on a distiller's bond.]

Mark Bangs, U. S. Dist. Atty.

McCagg, Culver & Butler and S. D. Puterbaugh, for defendants.

BLODGETT, District Judge. This is a suit upon a distiller's warehousing bond, dated June 13, 1870, given by the defendant Farrell, as principal, and signed by the other defendants, as sureties, in the penal sum of $33,000, conditioned for the payment by Mr. Farrell, as principal, to the collector of internal revenue of the Fifth collection district of this state, of the tax on 449 barrels of distilled spirits, containing 32,184$^{89}/_{100}$ gallons of proof spirits, which were entered for deposit in the distillery warehouse attached to Mr. Farrell's distillery in Peoria in said district, before said spirits could be removed from said warehouse, and within one year from the date of said bond. It is admitted that on the 27th day of July, next after the spirits were deposited in the warehouse and the bond given, a fire broke out in a building not connected with the Farrell distillery or warehouse, by which Farrell's distillery and warehouse took fire, and the same were wholly destroyed with the contents, including the spirits described in the bond, without any negligence or carelessness on the part of Farrell or those in charge of the distillery. It is also shown by the proof, and not disputed, that the warehouse in question was in charge of the government storekeeper, who had the keys thereof, and that he was not present at the time the fire broke out, and for some time thereafter. And the proof tends to show that if he had been so present at the time it became evident that the distillery premises must burn, a portion, if not all, the spirits in the warehouse might have been saved, there being at the time in the warehouse about 2,000 barrels of spirits, and the spirits in controversy only amounting to 449 barrels. The defendants deny their liability for the tax upon the facts shown.

The first point insisted upon is, that the loss occurred by reason of the absence of the storekeeper from the warehouse at the time that the fire broke out, and until it was too late to remove the spirits therefrom. The fire occurred about noon, and the proof shows that the storekeeper had gone to his dinner, and the distillery was not then in operation, and his constant presence was not needed to superintend the operation of the distillery. I do not understand that any law or regulation requires the constant presence of the storekeeper at the warehouse and distillery when the distillery is not in operation; but even if it did, the rule is well settled that the government cannot be made a loser by the neglect of duty by an officer.

The defendants in this case claim, however, that the United States supreme court has, in the case of Clinkenbeard v. U. S., 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 65, held that the failure of an officer to perform his duty releases the distiller. An examination of that case shows, however, that that was a case where the United States itself, or rather the department itself, was at fault, and not the officer of the department, in which I think there is a clear distinction. The operations of the distillery were suspended in that case for a number of days by reason of the failure of the treasury department to appoint a storekeeper; and the suit was brought against the distillery for the recovery of the amount of tax which the distillery should have paid according to its capacity, or, in other words, for its capacity tax. And the supreme court simply held that during the time the operations of the distillery were suspended for the want of a storekeeper the capacity tax should not be charged against the distillery. The case is clearly placed upon the neglect of the government, and not upon the neglect of a subordinate officer of the government to perform his duty; that the distillery was not legally in condition to legally run during the time that there was no storekeeper, therefore there was no earning of the capacity tax.

But the main point insisted upon in the argument is, that the distiller is not liable on his bond until he asks and obtains a permit to remove the spirits from the warehouse; that the act of paying the tax and removal must be simultaneous.

It is sufficient to say, that I do not concur in this view of the law. Section 3,248, Rev. St., provides that the tax shall attach to distilled spirits as soon as the same is in existence as such; that is, the distiller becomes liable for the tax as soon as the spirits are produced; but by the warehousing system the distiller is allowed one year in which to pay the tax, or such time as he chooses within one year, by depositing the spirits in a warehouse, and giving a bond. He is a debtor to the government to the amount of the tax as soon as the wines are produced, but upon certain conditions, is allowed time for making payments. Sections 3,287, 3,293, and 3,294, when taken together, clearly show that the warehousing bond is taken solely for the purpose of securing the payment of the tax at the convenience of the distiller within one year. This view is further sustained by the provisions of law which fix the tax to be paid by the amount of spirits which are gauged into the warehouse, and not by the amount which are gauged out. If the tax was not fixed until the removal, that would be the time at which to gauge the spirits, and determine the amount of the tax; but instead of that, it is the amount gauged into the warehouse, and the amount which is at that time marked upon the barrels, which determines the amount of tax to be paid. The letter of the bond, too, provides for the payment of the tax on a fixed and certain quantity of spirits before such spirits shall be removed from such warehouse, and within one year from the date of the bond. By the terms of the bond the distiller must pay the tax on the removal of the spirits, it matters not whether the removal is caused by their evaporation or combustion from fire, or by the deliberate act of the distiller; in either case they are removed, and the condition of the bond is broken. This may seem a harsh rule but it is the only guide the court has to go by. The court cannot make the contract, but must construe and enforce that which is made by the parties.

This rule is clearly laid down in U. S. v. Keehler, 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 83; U. S. v. Prescott, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 578; and U. S. v. Dashiell, 4 Wall. [71 U. S.] 182. The view I take is much strengthened by the provisions of section 3,221 of the Revised Statutes, which reads as follows: "Sec. 3,221. The secretary of the treasury, upon the production to him of satisfactory proof of the actual destruction by accidental fire or other casualty, and without any fraud, collusion, or negligence of the owner thereof, of any distilled spirits, while the same remain in the custody of any officer of internal revenue in any distillery warehouse, or bonded warehouse of the United States, and before the tax thereon has been paid, may abate the amount of internal taxes accruing thereon, and may cancel any warehouse bond, or enter satisfaction thereon in whole or in part, as the case may be. And if such taxes have been collected since the destruction of said spirits, the said secretary shall refund the same to the owners thereof out of any moneys in the treasury not otherwise appropriated." Now the question naturally occurs here: Why clothe the secretary of the treasury with the power to abate the tax if none was due? Why give the secretary of the treasury the power to remit a claim against a person, if the government has no claim against him? The whole theory upon which that statute is based is to my mind clear that the tax was due upon the production of the spirits, and that, as an equitable consideration, the secretary of the treasury may, in his discretion, abate the tax, if he sees fit.

The questions involved in this case I admit are not entirely free from doubt, and I have not the light of much direct authority upon the question. No case, I think, has ever been decided by the supreme court of the United States directly involving the question here raised. There is the case of Insurance Co. v. Thompson, 95 U. S. 547, where it seems to me that the plain intimation of the court is in favor of the view of the law which I am now taking. In that case certain wines were placed in a bonded warehouse connected with the distillery; the parties interested in those wines insured them, and they not only insured the value of the wines themselves but the government tax thereon; they were destroyed, as the wines in question were, by an accidental fire, and suit was brought upon the warehousing bond and the amount of tax recovered on the warehousing bond. After the recovery of the amount of the tax and the payment of the judgment, as I infer from the record in the report, the parties who had obtained insurance, the owners of the wine and the parties interested, brought suit against the insurance company; and it was contended in that case that the amount of the government tax was not an insurable interest; the court below held that it was and rendered judgment, and the case was taken to the supreme court and affirmed. So that the argument from that case is that the party placing wines in a government warehouse or in a bonded warehouse, has an insurable interest, to the amount of the cost or value of the wines and the government tax, and can, therefore, insure for that amount. I know the fallacy that courts frequently are led into by following a case where the direct question is not decided, that is before the court, yet it seems to me that in the absence of authority, some force, at least, ought to be given to that case; and, though the case is not entirely free from doubt, yet my conclusion is, that the defendant was liable for the tax on these spirits from the time they were purchased, and they, like the importation of goods subject to customs dues, where the importer obtains a certain amount of indulgence of time for the payment of his customs duties, by placing the goods in a bonded warehouse, yet at the same time the duties are due the moment the goods are imported and arrive, and the destruction of the goods afterwards would not release him.

[There will be a finding for the plaintiff of the penal sum of the bond, and as damages, of the amount of the tax. You may make that computation, Mr. Bangs.

[I hardly think any special finding will be needed in the case, because the stipulation as to the facts is broad enough, and it will go up in the record, if the parties wish to take the case up. If a special finding is necessary, why counsel may have it. A certain finding will be necessary in regard to whether the storekeeper was there or not.] [3]

There will be a finding for the plaintiff.

This opinion was affirmed by the United States supreme court in 99 U. S. 221.

UNITED STATES v. FARRELL.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 13, 1837.

WITNESS—SLAVES—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CUMULATIVE SENTENCE.

1. Slaves are competent witnesses in criminal prosecutions, in Alexandria county, against negroes or mulattoes.

2. The act of Virginia passed on the 21st of January, 1801, is in force in that county, although it was to commence in force from the 1st of June, 1801, and although the jurisdiction of Virginia ceased on the 27th of February, 1801.

3. If a man be convicted of a second offence, while in the penitentiary under sentence for the first, the sentence for the second may be made to commence from the expiration or other termination of the period for which he was first sentenced.

Indictment [against Joseph Farrell] for forging a certificate of freedom for Mr. T. F. Mason's slave Sandy. The slave Sandy was offered as a witness for the United States.

W. L. Brent, for defendant, objected that the Virginia act of the 21st of January, 1801, by the 4th section of which it is enacted, that "any negro or mulatto, bond or free, shall be a good witness in pleas of the commonwealth, for or against negroes or mulattoes, bond or free; or in civil pleas where free negroes or mulattoes shall alone be parties," never was in force in the county of Alexandria, because it was not in force on the 27th of February, 1801 [2 Stat. 103], when congress adopted the laws of Virginia, as they then existed, and declared that they should "remain" in force in the county of Alexandria.

Mr. Key, Dist. Atty., contra, contended that congress intended that the district should have the benefit of all the state legislation up to the 27th of February, 1801. But it is not material whether the act of Virginia of the 21st of January, 1801, is or is not in force here, as the 5th section of the Virginia act of the 17th of December, 1792, admits negroes and mulattoes as witnesses in pleas of the commonwealth against negroes or mulattoes, and in civil pleas where negroes or mulattoes alone are parties; at least, such has been the construction which this court has always given to it. The words of that section are, "No negro or mulatto shall be a witness, except in pleas of the commonwealth against negroes or mulattoes, or in civil pleas, where negroes or mulattoes alone shall be parties." These words have always been construed to include slaves.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent), being of that opinion, permitted the slave Sandy to be sworn and examined as a witness.

Verdict, guilty. Sentenced to the penitentiary for four years, on the 13th of May, 1837.

NOTE. The prisoner was again convicted of a like offence, by forging a pass for negro Sam, another slave of Mr. Mason, at October term, 1837, and the entry of the sentence was: "And it appearing to the court that the traverser is in the custody of the keeper of the penitentiary of the District of Columbia, under the sentence of this court passed at the last term for a like offence, the sentence of the court, for the offence of which he is now convicted, is, that he suffer imprisonment and labor in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia, for the period of three years next after the expiration or other termination of the period for which he already stands committed to the said penitentiary."

CRIMINAL LAW—EFFECT OF NOLLE PROSEQUI.

A nolle prosequi, without the consent of the defendant, after the jury has been sworn, is equivalent to an acquittal, and may be so pleaded.

[Cited in brief in State v. Champeau, 52 Vt. 315; State v. Primm, 61 Mo. 168.]

Indictment for larceny [against John Farring].

The defendant had been indicted at this term for stealing two silver dollars, and an order drawn by Hoffman and Stephenson on ——— for $15. Upon the trial, the order, produced in evidence, was drawn by Hoffmans and Stephenson.

Mr. Key, for the United States, thereupon directed the clerk to enter a nolle prosequi, and the jury was discharged without the consent of the defendant, and a new indictment was found by the grand jury, reciting the order truly. A verdict of guilty was found upon this second indictment, subject to the effect of the nolle prosequi and discharge of the jury, as if specially pleaded. Motion in arrest of judgment for that cause.

Mr. Taylor, for defendant. It is only in cases of inevitable necessity that a jury can be discharged without the consent of the defendant. Wedderburn's Case, Fost. Crown Law, 22g; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 630.

Mr. Key, contra. It is now brought to a reasonable rule. Wherever it is for the benefit of, or is indifferent to, the prisoner, the jury may be discharged without his consent, as in the case of the sudden illness of a juror or witness, or where a witness is kept out of the way by the prisoner, or other accident. A mistake of a single letter in an indictment is an accident, like the illness of a witness or juror. 1 Chit. 631, note; 2 Johns. Cas. 275, 301; 2 Caines, 100, 304; Cogan's Case, Leach, 167. But this is not an indictment for the same offence. The order could not have been given in evidence upon the former indictment.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) arrested the judgment, being of opinion that the discharge of the jury without the defendant's consent was equivalent to an acquittal as to the dollars, and that the defendant might have pleaded it with an averment that the stealing of the dollars and of the order was one act of taking, if such an averment be necessary; which is doubtful, as the indictment charges it to be one act of theft, and upon a general verdict of guilty he would have been sentenced to the penitentiary.

CORONER—INDICTMENT FOR MAKING FALSE STATEMENT OF EVIDENCE—DUTY IN STATING EVIDENCE.

Neither at common law, nor by the statute of Virginia, is the coroner bound to put in writing the effect of the evidence given upon an inquisition, unless the offence be found to be murder or manslaughter.

The indictment charged, that the defendant [Abraham Faw], being coroner of the county of Alexandria, and having, upon view of the dead body of one Curran, taken an inquest, stating that, while opposing the lawful orders of a justice of the peace, the said Curran was killed by a brickbat thrown by some unknown person, but not finding the killing to be murder nor manslaughter, he, the defendant, "wilfully, injuriously, and unlawfully made a false statement of the evidence in writing, and suppressed material parts of the same; and annexed to the inquisition a false, colorable, and unfair statement, in writing, of the said evidence, under the false and colorable pretence of putting in writing and annexing to the said inquisition fairly and truly the effect of the said evidence, being material, in contempt of the laws of the United States, in violation of the duties and dignity of his office, and against the peace and government of the United States."

E. J. Lee, and F. L. Lee, for defendant, moved the court to quash the indictment. The coroner is not bound at common law to put down the effect of the evidence, in writing, in any case; and by the law of Virginia (page 125, § 11; Nov. 29, 1792), he is required to do it only in case the inquisition shall charge some person with murder or manslaughter, which this inquisition does not. 1 Bl. Comm. 346; 2 Inst. 31; 4 Inst. 271. This is an indictment at common law, and if he was not bound at common law to state the evidence in writing, it is no offence to state it imperfectly or incorrectly. And if it states no offence at common law, it may and ought to be quashed on motion. Rex v. Page, 1 Lev. 304; Rex v. Sellars, 3 Mod. 167; Rex v. Griffith, Id. 201; Rex v. Whitehead, 1 Salk. 371; Rex v. Hotch, 1 Strange, 552; Rex v. Lister, 2 Strange, 788.

Mr. Jones, for United States, contra. The coroner, at common law, has a right to take evidence in writing, and if he undertakes to do it, and does it unfaithfully, wilfully, and falsely, it is an offence at common law. The depositions may be used for various purposes, as in a question of bail, or to justify an arrest of some person, or to discredit a witness upon the trial.

THE COURT, at July term, 1808, quashed the indictment, being of opinion that it did not set forth an offence at common law, or under the statute; inasmuch as by the common law, the coroner was not bound to put down in writing the evidence, or the effect of it, and the statute required it to be done only when, by the inquisition, some person is indicted for murder or manslaughter.

JUSTICE OF PEACE—INDICTMENT FOR ILLEGALLY TAKING BAIL—GROSS IGNORANCE—INTENT.

A justice of the peace cannot discharge a prisoner who has been committed for trial on a charge of felony; nor can he take money in lieu of bail. But he is not liable for so discharging the prisoner, unless he did it contemptuously and wilfully, and with evil intent.

Indictment for misdemeanor in office of justice of the peace in taking the personal recognizance of Harry Allen, in the sum of one hundred dollars, charged with theft of goods to the amount of sixty dollars, and receiving one hundred dollars in cash in lieu of bail of security.

E. J. Lee and C. Lee, for defendant, contended that the justice acted judicially, and that it was an error in judgment for which he is not liable to answer criminally, and that he has a right to take the money; and cited Cro. Car. 446.

Mr. Jones, U. S. Atty., contended that it is not necessary to show a corrupt motive, but that the defendant is liable for gross ignorance. He acted ministerially, and if it be a palpably illegal act, he is punishable.

E. J. Lee, for defendant. A justice of the peace is not liable unless he acts from corrupt motives. Rex v. Jackson, 1 Term R. 653. He has a right to bail after commitment, and to discharge without habeas corpus.

C. Lee prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they should be satisfied by the evidence, that the defendant acted uprightly and without corrupt motives, he ought to be acquitted, and so unless they should be satisfied by the evidence that he did it contemptuously.

Mr. Jones, contra. The defendant had no right to discharge at all after commitment; and no authority to take money as a deposit in lieu of bail for a person charged with felony.

THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) said they had no doubt on those points. The justice of peace cannot discharge after commitment for trial, nor can he take money in lieu of bail.

THE COURT (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent) instructed the jury that unless they should be satisfied that the acts were done contemptuously, wilfully, and with an evil intent, they ought not to find the defendant guilty. (The words "wilfully" and "contemptuously" were used in the indictment.) The jury found a special verdict, that Faw acted illegally, in taking the money in lieu of bail, and in discharging the traverser from imprisonment; but he thus acted through ignorance and mistake of the law, and without any sinister or corrupt motive.

Judgment for the traverser on the verdict. DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent.

Indictment for not doing all in his power to prevent a riot, whereby a man was killed. [For prior proceedings in this suit, see Case No. 15,078.]

Mr. Jones, for the United States, prayed the court to instruct the jury, that neither the constable nor the magistrate had a right to break open the door of the house inhabited by a man, to arrest him upon a warrant for an assault and battery,

Which THE COURT refused (DUCKETT, Circuit Judge, absent).

RESISTANCE TO REVENUE OFFICER—AUTHORITY OF OFFICER—ENTRY WITHOUT WARRANT—INDICTMENT.

1. A person may be guilty, under section 3177, Rev. St., of the offense of obstructing and hindering an officer of internal revenue in the exercise of his authority, to enter any building or place where articles subject to tax are produced, for the purpose of examining such articles, although such person does not own the building or the articles subject to tax, and did not make, produce or keep them.

2. It is no offense to resist or obstruct an officer who is acting without authority, or who is exceeding his authority.

3. The right of resistance to illegal official action is essential, not merely to all free government, but to any government whatever.

4. Under section 3177, Rev. St., a collector, deputy collector or inspector of internal revenue, may, without process, enter any building where distilled spirits, subject to tax, are produced or kept, so far as may be necessary for examining the same, and under section 3453, Rev. St., may, without process, seize illicit distilled spirits.

5. An indictment, under section 3177, for hindering an internal revenue officer, without warrant, from entering a building where illicit distilled spirits, subject to tax, were kept, and from seizing said spirits, must aver that the attempt of the officer to enter, which was hindered, was made in the day time, or that it was made in the night season when the premises were open, and that such entry was necessary for the purpose of examining such distilled spirits, and that they were in the custody of some person who had the purpose of selling or removing the same, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or the design to avoid the payment of the taxes thereon.

Heard on demurrer to the indictment.

The indictment in this case was based on the last clause of section 3177, Rev. St. U. S. The entire section reads as follows: "Any collector, deputy collector or inspector may enter in the day time any building or place where any articles or objects subject to tax are made, produced or kept within his district, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose of examining said articles or objects. And any owner of such building or place, or person having the agency or superintendence of the same, who refuses to admit such officer, or to suffer him to examine such article or articles, shall, for every such refusal, forfeit five hundred dollars. And when such premises are open at night, such officers may enter them while so open in the performance of their official duties. And if any person shall forcibly obstruct or hinder any collector or deputy collector, or inspector in the execution of any powers vested in him by law, or shall forcibly rescue, or cause to be rescued, any property, articles or objects after the same shall have been seized by him, or shall attempt or endeavor so to do, the person so offending, excepting in cases otherwise provided for, shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars, or double the value of the property so rescued, or be imprisoned for a term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court." The indictment charged that the defendant did "forcibly obstruct and hinder one William W. Brown in the execution of a power and authority vested in him, the said William W. Brown, by law, to seach for and seize two packages of corn whisky, containing, in the aggregate, sixty gallons, said two packages of corn whisky then being distilled spirits, subject to tax, on which the tax had not been paid, said distilled spirits having been removed from the place of distillation to a place other than the distillery warehouse provided by law, said two packages of distilled spirits being then and there supposed to be kept concealed in the smoke-house of him, the said E. P. Fears, then and there being; he, the said William W. Brown, being then and there a deputy collector of internal revenue for the Second collection district of Georgia, in the execution of a power and authority vested in him by law, to search for and seize said two packages of distilled spirits, wherever found, and to enter said smoke-house, so far as it was then and there necessary, for the purpose of making such search and seizure."

The demurrer to this indictment was based on two grounds: (1) Because it was not averred that the defendant, E. P. Fears, concealed the said distilled spirits. (2) Because the authority under which the officer acted was not sufficiently set out.

H. P. Farrow, U. S. Atty.

S. A. Darnell, for defendant.

Before WOODS, Circuit Judge, and ERSKINE, District Judge.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The first ground of demurrer is clearly untenable. The offense charged is not the removal, nor concealment, nor keeping of distilled spirits contrary to law, but the obstructing of an internal revenue officer in the discharge of his duty. The distilled spirits may be kept by one person in his own building, and yet another person may obstruct or hinder the officer when he attempts to enter such building for the purpose of examining the spirits. The latter would clearly be amenable to the law, though he owned neither the building nor the spirits, and did not make, produce or keep them. To keep or conceal illicit spirits is one offense, to obstruct or hinder an officer from entering a building where illicit spirits are kept, is a distinct and different one. It is the latter which the pleader has attempted to charge in this indictment.

The second ground of demurrer is, we think, well taken. An indictment for obstructing or hindering an officer should show the authority under which the officer is acting. It is no offense to resist or obstruct an officer who is acting without authority or who is exceeding his authority. The pleader seems to have known the rule, and has made an attempt to conform to it. In this, we think, he has failed. There is no pretense that the officer was acting by virtue of any search-warrant or any other legal process. The theory of the prosecution seems to be that, under section 3177 of the Revised Statutes, the internal revenue officer may enter without process any building where distilled spirits subject to tax are made, produced or kept, so far as it may be necessary for examining the same; and that under section 3453, he may also, without process, seize illicit distilled spirits. This is true, but the authority exists only where the circumstances prescribed by these sections exist. The officer has the authority in the case pointed out by the statute, and in no other. To show his authority, it must appear that such a state of facts existed as are contemplated by the statute. By section 3177 the internal revenue officers are authorized in the day time or in the night, when the premises are open, to enter any building where any articles subject to tax are made, produced or kept, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose of examining said articles.

There is no averment in the indictment that the attempt to enter the smoke-house of the defendant and examine said distilled spirits was made in the day time, or made at night when the premises were open, nor that said distilled spirits were made, produced or kept on said premises, or that such entry was necessary for the purpose of examining said spirits. It does not appear, therefore, from the indictment, that the officer had authority to make a search or to enter the premises of defendant; and it does not appear that it was unlawful for the defendant to resist the officer in making such entry and search. If, for instance, the officer had attempted to enter the premises in the night season, when the door was shut, the defendant would have had the right to resist him, and would violate no law in so doing. Section 3453, Rev. St., authorizes the seizure of taxable articles by the internal revenue officers "which shall be found in the possession or custody, or within the control of any person, for the purpose of being sold or removed by him in fraud of the internal revenue laws, or with the design to avoid the payment of the taxes thereon." There is no averment in the indictment that the distilled spirits therein mentioned were in the custody of any one for any of the purposes mentioned in the section just quoted. The authority of the revenue officers to seize is, therefore, not averred, and it does not appear from the indictment that the defendant was guilty of any offense in obstructing or hindering such seizure.

As to both the attempted examination and seizure, from all that appears in the indictment the officer seems to have been a trespasser who might be lawfully obstructed and resisted. The right of resistance to illegal official action is essential not merely to all free government, but to any government whatsoever. All citizens of the United States are guarantied by the constitution security in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures. The right to resist an unauthorized search or seizure is a direct consequence of this guaranty. In order, therefore, to show that defendant was guilty of an offense in resisting the search and seizure of the revenue officer, the authority of the latter should have been set out. This the indictment entirely fails to do. It is, therefore, defective and bad, and the demurrer must be sustained.

Before MARSHALL, Circuit Justice, and TUCKER, District Judge.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This is a motion made to stay proceedings on a scire facias, which has been sued out of this court, by the attorney of the United States, against Feely and his security, requiring them to show cause, why execution should not be had against them, on a recognizance entered into by them, conditioned for the appearance of the said Feely, on the first day of the last term, to answer an indictment filed against him in this court. Feely did not appear, and his default was recorded. He appeared on the first day of this term, and is now in custody, on the motion of the attorney for the United States.

It is contended, on the part of the United States, that the court possesses no power over this recognizance; that being forfeited, it has become a debt due to the United States, which is no more subject to the control of this court, than a debt upon contract.

It is admitted, on the part of the United States, that in England, the court of exchequer exercises this power. But the statutes of 33 Hen. VIII. (chapter 39), and of 1 Geo. II., expressly delegate it, and it is contended, that from these statutes alone, the authority of the court of exchequer is derived. Mr. Bacon, in his Abridgment (volume 2, p. 150), says, that it is by virtue of 33 Hen. VIII., that courts of exchequer discharge recognizances, and his opinion is certainly entitled to respect.

It is contended by the counsel for the prisoner, that these statutes are made in affirmance of the common law. For this there is no dictum in the books. But if they do not simply give a statutory form to a rule of the common law, there is reason to believe that they permit a principle to be exercised, directly and effectively, which was before not absolutely unknown to the court. They authorise a discharge, or a compounding of recognizances, and, perhaps, without them, recognizances could not be absolutely discharged or compounded. But it does not follow necessarily, that the same effect might not be indirectly produced by a perpetual suspension. It is apparent, that the power given by statute is conferred on the court of exchequer only; consequently, the power exercised by the courts of common law, is derived, not from the statute, but the common law.

It is admitted by the prosecutor, that the power which the courts of common law exercised over recognizances in England, may, in the United States, be exercised by this court. Let us, then, inquire what that power is? The attorney relies upon the case of Reg. v. Lord Drummond, 11 Mod. 200. In that case, a motion made on the day of appearance to discharge the recognizance, because the cognizor was sick and unable to appear, was overruled by the court, notwithstanding the consent of the attorney for the crown, because the court could not grant the motion; but the time for appearance was enlarged. The officers of the crown are generally sufficiently attentive to its interests, and it is somewhat extraordinary, that one of them should consent to release a debt, which debt was absolutely beyond the power of the court. The expression employed by the judge, may be used in reference to the propriety of the order. But, admitting it to import a positive legal inability to grant the motion, it will be recollected, that the motion was for an absolute discharge of the recognizance. A declaration, that the court could not discharge it, was not equivalent to a declaration, that the court could exercise no power over it. In fact, the court did proceed to relieve the party from his default, by extending the time for his appearance. If the court possessed no power over the subject; if, upon failure to appear, the debt, according to the terms of the recognizance, became absolute, and was placed beyond the power of the court, it would be difficult to support the order which was actually made. The case of Reg. v. Ridpath, 10 Mod. 152, does not bring into view the power of the court. It did not, in any degree, turn on that point. The case of Rex v. Tomb, 10 Mod. 278, is vaguely reported, and its circumstances are omitted. In that case, however, the principle is expressly laid down, that "judges of oyer and terminer are the proper judges whether recognizances ought to be estreated or spared;" that is, that the court in which the recognizance is filed, decides after default made, whether the attorney for the crown shall estreat the recognizance, in order to put it in suit. It will be recollected, that in England, the recognizances of this description are filed in a court of criminal jurisdiction, and sued, not in that court, but in the court of exchequer. "No instance," says the book (Rex v. Tomb), "can be produced, of a certiorari to remove a recognizance for appearance from a court of oyer and terminer. It would be to take away a jurisdiction that properly belongs to them." "It is for the advantage of public justice, that it should be in the power of justices of oyer and terminer to spare the recognizance, if, upon the circumstances of the case, they see fit." This, then, is an express decision, that the court in which the recognizance is filed, may, if, upon the circumstances of the case, they see fit, after default has been made, and the recognizance is forfeited, refuse to permit it to be estreated, in order to be put in suit. It is a question exclusively for their decision, and no other court will control or inquire into the propriety of that decision. This power remains so long as the recognizance remains in court. When once estreated, the recognizance and all power over it are transferred to another tribunal.

In the United States, there is no separate court of exchequer; and recognizances are put in suit in that court in which they are originally filed. They are never estreated. The power which the courts of law in England exercise on the question, whether a recognizance shall be estreated or not, is exercised after default, and continues as long as the recognizance remains in court. It is dependent on the discretion of the court, and, according to Hawkins, is applied in relief of the cognizor, if the person who has forfeited it, shall appear at the next succeeding term and take his trial. The same power existing in this court may, it would seem, as in England, be exercised so long as the recognizance continues in court. If, when the default was recorded, it had been shown to the court that the accused was in custody of the law, then, according to the case in 11 Mod., the court might have extended the recognizance. Why may not the excuse be made as effectually at a subsequent day? The case of Rex v. Eyres, 4 Burrows, 2118, is also reported in a very unsatisfactory manner. It is not improbable that the case had been compromised in the court of exchequer. There is too much uncertainty in the report to rely much upon it.

The authority on which the court most relies is Mr. Blackstone. In his 4th volume (page 254) he says: "A recognizance may be discharged, either by the demise of the king, to whom the recognizance is made, or by the death of the principal party bound thereby, if not before forfeited, or by the order of the court, to which such recognizance is certified by the justices, (as the quarter sessions, assizes, or king's bench,) if they see sufficient cause." Upon authority, then it appears, that entirely independent of the statute, the courts of England exercise the power which this court is now required to exercise. It is not an unreasonable power. The object of a recognizance is, not to enrich the treasury, but to combine the administration of criminal justice with the convenience of a person accused, but not proved to be guilty. If the accused has, under circumstances which show that there was no design to evade the justice of his country, forfeited his recognizance, but repairs the default as much as is in his power, by appearing at the succeeding term, and submitting himself to the law, the real intention and object of the recognizance are effected, and no injury is done. If the accused prove innocent, it would be unreasonable and unjust in government to exact from an innocent man a penalty, intended only to secure a trial, because the trial was suspended, in consequence of events which are deemed a reasonable excuse for not appearing on the day mentioned in the recognizance. If he be found guilty, he must suffer the punishment intended by the law for his offence, and it would be unreasonable to superadd the penalty of an obligation entered into only to secure a trial. The reasonableness, then, of the excuse, for not appearing on the day mentioned in the recognizance, ought to be examined somewhere, and no tribunal can be more competent than that which possesses all the circumstances of the original offence, and of the default. Should the legislature think otherwise, the case may be provided for by statute. At present, the law is understood to be that this court possesses full power over the subject. All proceedings, therefore, on this recognizance may properly be stayed, until it shall appear whether the accused shall continue to submit himself to the law, or shall attempt to evade the justice of the nation. This recognizance will await the final trial of the cause. In the mean time, the court is of opinion, that an additional recognizance may be required, but not in such a sum as to amount to refusal of bail, or to be really oppressive. It is the direction of the court, that the prisoner stand committed until he shall enter into a recognizance himself, in the sum of $500, and one or more sureties in the same sum, conditioned as the law requires.

Case No. 15,083.

UNITED STATES v. FEHRENBACK et al.

[2 Woods, 175.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1875.

CRIMINAL LAW — LIMITATIONS — REVENUE LAWS.

1. Section 5440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which makes it a misdemeanor to "conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner, or for any purpose," etc., forms a part of the revenue laws of the United States.

[Cited in U. S. v. Dennee, Case No. 14,948. Distinguished in U. S. v. Sanche, 7 Fed. 718.]

2. The limitation for prosecutions under said section is declared by section 1046, Rev. St., and is five years.

The indictment in this case was predicated on section 5440 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which declares: "If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the United States, or to defraud the United States in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of said parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than one thousand dollars and not more than ten thousand dollars, and to imprisonment not more than two years." The indictment charges that the defendants [Edward Fehrenback and others], on the eighth of April, 1874, did unlawfully and fraudulently conspire among themselves to defraud the United States of the internal revenue tax of seventy cents per gallon on one hundred thousand gallons of distilled spirits, thereafter to be produced at said Edward Fehrenback's distillery, and that to effect the object of the conspiracy, Fehrenback did on the same day, with intent to defraud the United States, remove from his distillery to a place other than the distillery warehouse, twenty thousand gallons of distilled spirits, on which the internal revenue tax had not been paid. The second count was similar to the first, and laid the offense as having been committed on the first day of April, 1874. The indictment was returned into court by the grand jury on April 8, 1876. Counsel for defendants claimed that the prosecution was barred. On this point the court charged the jury as follows:

J. R. Beckwith, U. S. Atty., and John H. New, Associate U. S. Atty.

W. H. Hunt, T. J. Semmes, L. A. Sheldon, W. R. Whitaker, and J. D. Rouse, for defendants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. It is claimed for defendants that this prosecution is barred by the statute of limitations. Counsel for defense say that the conspiracy is alleged in the indictment to have been formed on the 8th of April, 1874; that the proof shows that if there was any conspiracy at all, the date laid in the indictment must be the correct one, and that under the statutes of the United States the prosecution is barred if not commenced within two years, and as the indictment was not returned into court until April 8, 1876, more than two years had elapsed between the offense and the finding of the indictment, and the prosecution therefore comes too late. The provisions of the Revised Statutes bearing upon this question are as follows: Section 1044 declares: "No person shall be prosecuted, tried or punished for any offense not capital, except as provided in section 1046, unless the indictment is found or the information is instituted within two years after the offense is committed." Section 1046 provides: "No person shall be prosecuted, tried or punished for any crimes arising under the revenue laws or the slave trade laws of the United States, unless the indictment is found or the information instituted within five years after the committing of such crime." The ground taken by the defense is that section 5440, on which this prosecution is based, is found in the Revised Statutes under the general title, "Crimes;" that the offense made punishable by it is conspiracy, and not the actual defrauding of the revenue; that consequently this is not a prosecution under the revenue laws of the United States, and therefore falls under section 1044, and is barred in two years.

Is this position tenable? This depends upon the answer to the question whether section 5440 forms a part of the revenue laws of the United States. This section is taken, as appears by the marginal note, from section 30 of the act of March 2, 1867, and is a reproduction of that section in letter and spirit. 14 Stat. 484. This act is entitled "An act to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, and for other purposes," and is devoted to the subject of internal revenue. It contains amendments of existing internal revenue laws, some new provisions, which all refer to the internal revenue, and in addition it contains section 30, and nothing more. Now when we find that section 30 of this act punishes a conspiracy to defraud the United States, and is found embedded in a law devoted exclusively to the subject of internal revenue, the conclusion is inevitable that it was at the time of its enactment a part of the revenue laws of the United States. Has it ceased to be a part of the revenue laws by its collocation in the Revised Statutes? This question is answered in the negative by section 5600 of the Revised Statutes, which declares: "The arrangement and classification of the several sections of the Revision have been made for the purpose of more convenient and orderly arrangement of the same, and therefore no inference or presumption of a legislative construction is to be drawn by reason of the title under which any particular section is placed." In my judgment, therefore, section 5440, on which this prosecution is based, is a part of the revenue laws, and prosecutions under it are not barred until the expiration of five years, as provided by section 1046. As the distillery of Fehrenback was not out in operation until January 12, 1874, and if there was any conspiracy, as charged in the indictment, it must have been entered into at or about that time, you need not trouble yourselves about the statute of limitations. Upon the conceded facts of the case, and upon the law as I have given it you, the defense that the prosecution is barred cannot be successfully made in this case.

UNITED STATES v. FEIGELSTOCK.

[14 Blatchf. 321.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept. 15, 1877.

INTERNAL REVENUE—WHOLESALE LIQUOR DEALER—SINGLE SALE—FORFEITURE.

1. Under section 3242 of the Revised Statutes, a person does not carry on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer without having paid the special tax as required by law, who, without having paid such special tax, sells, in quantities of not less than five wine gallons at one time, a single lot of spirits which he has taken for a debt.

2. Under that clause of section 3281 of the Revised Statutes which provides for the forfeiture of distilled spirits, the forfeiture does not operate when the statute is violated, but only at the time of the seizure of the spirits or wines.

[This was an action for forfeiture of fifty barrels of distilled spirits, Alois Feigelstock claimant. The judgment of the district court was in favor of the claimant. Case unreported. The case is now heard upon writ of error sued out by the United States.]

Roger M. Sherman, Asst. Dist. Atty.
Waldemar J. Tuska, for defendant in error.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. This case comes here upon a writ of error to the district court, to review its judgment, in an information of forfeiture, given upon the verdict of a jury against the plaintiffs, by direction of the judge, at the trial. A bill of exceptions, taken by the United States, presents the questions on which a reversal is asked. The first arises upon the facts, that one Kingston was a creditor of the Binghams, who were distillers in Patoka, Indiana, for goods sold, and for services rendered, and for money lent by him to them; that the spirits seized were, on the 10th day of May, 1875, sold and transferred by the Binghams to Kingston, on account of that indebtedness; that Kingston assumed control of the spirits, and procured them to be shipped from Patoka to the city of New York, and authorized Feigelstock, a wholesale liquor dealer, and the claimant, to sell the same on account of Kingston, in quantities of not less than five wine gallons at one time; and that Kingston did not pay the special tax payable, by the laws of the United States, by a wholesale liquor dealer. Upon these facts, it is claimed by the United States that the spirits seized were forfeited, under section 3242 of the Revised Statutes. But, the forfeitures created under that section are denounced against every person who carries on the business of a wholesale liquor dealer without having paid the special tax as required by law. This provision is found in chapter 3, of title 35, entitled "Special Taxes." Section 3232, which begins the chapter, enacts, that no person shall be engaged in, or carry on, any trade or business thereinafter mentioned, until he has paid a special tax therefor, in the manner thereinafter provided. Section 3244 provides, that "special taxes are imposed as follows: Fourth. Wholesale liquor dealers shall pay one hundred dollars. Every person who sells, or offers for sale, foreign or domestic distilled spirits, or wines, in quantities of not less than five gallons at the same time, shall be regarded as a wholesale liquor dealer." Taking the language of these sections together, it is plain, that those persons only are included who engage in, or carry on, a trade or business of liquor dealing, and that it does not apply to the case of an isolated sale. Even the definition of a wholesale liquor dealer, taken by itself, implies more than a single transaction—a trade or business of selling, as expressed in the other sections referred to. The case states a single transaction, in respect to a lot of spirits taken for debt, and that affords no ground to infer that this was in prosecution of any trade or business requiring the payment of a license under the statute.

No other question is presented which seems to me to need consideration, except that which arises upon section 3281. The Binghams carried on business, as distillers, with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by them, or of some part thereof, and, at that time, were owners of the spirits seized, as to which no fraud or illegality appears. Before the seizure the spirits had been sold to Kingston for an existing debt, and Feigelstock had made an advance upon them, in good faith, and they had been removed, under Kingston's direction, from Indiana to New York, to be sold by Feigelstock on Kingston's account. The forfeiture denounced by the section in question is, that "all distilled spirits or wines, * * * owned by such person, wherever found," shall be forfeited to the United States. The question is, whether the forfeiture operates at the time when the statute is violated, as the plaintiffs contend, or at time of the seizure, as the claimant insists.

This question has been decided adversely to the United States by the district court for the Southern district of New York, in the case now under review. A similar decision was made by the district court of Maryland, in April, 1876, in U. S. v. 100 Barrels of High Wines [Case No. 15,947], and, upon writ of error to the circuit court of the United States for that district, the judgment was affirmed, the circuit judge presiding. Under these circumstances, I think it suitable to follow those decisions without question; and I do so the more readily, because it leaves the case in a condition in which it may, if such is the pleasure of the United States, be reviewed with the least delay.

Let the judgment be affirmed.

UNITED STATES (FELIZ v.). Ssee Case No. 4,720.

Case No. 15,085.

UNITED STATES v. FENELON et al.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE—PENALTIES, HOW RECOVERABLE—INDICTMENT—EXPOSING UNSTAMPED ARTICLES FOR SALE.

[1. The penalty of $100 imposed by the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 296), §§ 167, 169, as amended by the acts of March 3, 1865 (13 Stat. 482), and July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 144), upon any person exposing for sale articles mentioned in Schedule C, without having affixed thereto the proper stamp denoting that the duties thereon have been paid, is recoverable by indictment, and a civil action is not necessary.]

[2. Persons selling these articles are bound to see that the taxes are paid before the article goes out of their shop; and whether, in the case of a partnership, the sale of an unstamped article is made by one or the other of the partners, or by their clerk, is immaterial, provided it was made by a person having authority to make the sale. In such case both partners will be liable.]

[3. It seems that, if an article is actually sold from the shop of a dealer without any stamp upon it, the same must be deemed to have been exposed for sale, within the meaning of the statute, even if in fact it had been taken from a package, and placed upon or near the counter, without any intent of then offering it for sale, and was afterwards sold to one offering to buy it, without any intent to violate the statute.]

This was an indictment under sections 167 and 169 of the act of June 30, 1864, c. 173 (13 Stat. 296, 297), as amended by act of March 3, 1865, c. 78, § 1 (13 Stat. 482), and by act of July 13, 1866, c. 184, § 9 (14 Stat. 144). The third count of the indictment alleged that on, etc., at, etc., the defendants [John J. Fenelon and others] "a certain article and commodity named in Schedule C of an act of the congress of the United States of America, entitled 'An act,'" etc., "approved," etc., "to wit, a certain bottle containing a certain extract, to wit, an extract to be used and applied as a perfume, to wit, 'Lubin's Extract, Jockey Club,' so called, did offer and expose for sale; and they, the said (defendants), on," etc., "at," etc., "said article and commodity, to wit, said bottle containing said extract, which said bottle, with its said contents, then and there exceeded the retail price and value of one dollar, and did not then and there exceed the retail price and value of one dollar and fifty cents, to wit, was then and there of the retail price and value of one dollar and twenty-five cents, to Frank H. Freeman did sell, before the duty thereon had been fully paid by affixing thereon the proper stamps, to wit, United States internal revenue stamps of the denomination and value of six cents, as provided by law, against the peace," etc. The government offered evidence that on the day named in the indictment Freeman bought of one of the defendants in their shop the article named in the indictment unstamped, which article at that time was exposed on the outside of a show case, and that the defendants were copartners. The defendants offered evidence that all such articles, when they arrived at their store, were placed on a table, and outside the show-case, prior to being stamped, and, after being stamped, were placed inside the show-case, and then only were intended for sale; and that one of the defendants was not present at the time of sale, and seldom visited the shop, but had charge of another place of business on another street. To rebut the defendants' evidence, the government offered evidence that, a few days after said sale, revenue officers visited the defendants' shop, and found many articles unstamped inside, as well as outside, the show-cases; and, upon asking one of the defendants how many revenue stamps he had on hand, he replied, after making search, "Not any."

D. H. Mason and F. W. Hurd, for the United States.

H. D. Hyde and M. F. Dickinson, Jr., for defendants.

LOWELL, District Judge (charging the jury). The only count of this indictment which is now relied on is the third out of the four which originally were found by the grand jury, the other three having been made to meet the construction of the law, which has not prevailed after argument, although it had a very fair coloring of right, undoubtedly, in its favor at the start. The court has decided—I have decided, as well as I might—(U. S. v. Houghton [Case No. 15,396]) that the acts charged in the first, second, and fourth counts are not punishable under the statutes; and therefore remains the third. The third is founded on the law, which has already been read to you. "that any person who shall offer for sale any of the articles named in Schedule C, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture, etc., shall be deemed the manufacturer, and shall be liable to the duties and penalties and the liabilities imposed by law in regard to the sale of domestic articles without the use of the proper stamp or stamps denoting the duty to be paid thereon." That refers back to another section, which is that "every manufacturer (showing what these people are to be liable to) who shall sell any of the articles mentioned in Schedule C, before the duty thereon shall have been fully paid by affixing a proper stamp, shall be liable to a penalty of one hundred dollars." Now, it has been held that that penalty, if incurred, may be recovered by an indictment. U. S. v. Abbott [Case No. 14,416]. That, again, was a question of some considerable doubt whether it should not be an action of debt or civil action.

Taking the whole statute together, and looking at the numerous penalties therein prescribed for various offences, and the mode of enforcing them, it was considered, on the whole, that it was the intent of congress that these penalties—most of them, this one amongst others—should be recovered by indictment. It is scarcely more than a question of the form of action, because it is very plain, on this statute, and it is admitted by both sides here, and urged by both sides here, that it is a penalty affixed for mere neglect, without any regard to any willfulness, any purpose, any intent to defraud the government; that for the mere neglect, if it be one, of selling one of these articles before the duty has been fully paid by stamp by the manufacturer, or by the seller, if the manufacturer has not done so,—before the duty shall have once been fully paid by affixing the proper stamp, —the penalty is incurred, whether there was any intention not to pay, or even any knowledge on the part of the seller that he or somebody else had not paid. Therefore, it is not really a criminal offence, and it was by a construction of the statute, from which the intent of congress was discovered, to enforce the penalty in this mode, rather than from any idea that the offence itself was criminal in the ordinary acceptation of the word, that this decision was arrived at. There are some indictments known to the common law for matters which are not really criminal, such as an indictment, as you may have heard, against a town for not keeping its bridges in repair, or something of that sort. Still they are rather rare. This is one of those indictments which lies to recover a penalty, which perhaps might more appropriately be recovered by a civil action. Still, this being so, the parties on the one side and the other, undoubtedly are put in the position, so far as the trial of the case is concerned, so far as the evidence is concerned, of a criminal action. The government are bound to make out their case beyond any reasonable doubt. And the charge here is that these defendants did sell a bottle of an extract, called "Lubin's Extract of Jockey Club," to Mr. Freeman, on the 22d of May, before the duty had been fully paid by affixing the stamp of six cents, or whatever it was; and that is the question to be considered. The law means, as I understand it, that the persons who deal in these articles, whether manufacturers or not, shall see to it that these taxes, which are undoubtedly very small, trifling in each particular instance, are paid, and that, if that is not done, the failure is punished by penalty —very large, undoubtedly, in this instance— in proportion to the loss which the government has suffered by the particular sale; but with that we have not much to do, at this time. The penalty is exactly no more and no less than $100. Persons selling are bound to see to it that these taxes are paid before the article goes out of their shop, and, whether the mistake is committed by themselves, or by one of them, or by their clerk, so it was committed by a person who had authority to make the sale, then it was committed by them, and the penalty has accrued. From that point of view, it is of no sort of consequence whether one or the other of the persons charged, if they are jointly interested in the business, made the sale, if the sale was made, or whether it was made by either of them if it was made by their authority. Now, it is not denied that this sale was made without the duty having ever been paid, either by the manufacturer or by any intermediate person, or by the defendants; not likely to have been paid by anybody else, because these articles are of foreign manufacture, and the foreign manufacturer does not care anything about our law, and never puts stamps on. And, if bought from the importer, the importer is not bound to put the stamps on, unless he breaks the original packages. It is not denied that the article was sold for the benefit and in the interest of these two defendants.

The only question, so far as I can see, though you are bound, of course, to pass upon all the facts, is whether, in respect to this article, they were under any obligation to stamp it. The charge in the indictment is that these defendants did offer this article for sale, and so are manufacturers, and bound to stamp it; and the defendants say they "did not. They never offered it for sale. Therefore they are not manufacturers. They are not quasi-manufacturers, put in the position of manufacturers, and bound therefore to stamp this article." That is to say, the argument, as far as I can understand it, is a question of fact in that aspect. The argument is that, without having ever offered the article for sale, without intending or meaning to sell it, Mr. Freeman came in there, and, taking up an article which was not offered, which nobody meant to sell, and nobody intended to sell, he did induce one of the defendants to let him have it for a price, and that it accidentally got out without being stamped for that reason; that their goods, when really offered or intended to be offered for sale, were always stamped, or at any rate were always intended to be stamped, and were used only after they were stamped; that very fact was denied by the government, and they say, as a matter of fact, that the articles that were intended for sale, were as much left unstamped as any other article. They take issue on the fact. But the government also say that, when a person does sell an article, he thereby offers it for sale. If he consents to sell it, he offers it to sell; and that, in my judgment, is the meaning of the law. Congress, when it says that persons who offer these articles for sale shall be in the position of manufacturers, and liable to the same duties, simply means to say that sellers of these articles should be in the same position as manufacturers, that is all. Well, then, if a person came to your house, and saw a bottle of cologne on your table, and induced you to let him have it for a price, it would not make you a manufacturer, nor a quasi manufacturer of that article. The intention is to define those people who are liable to see to it that these things are stamped. A person who merely by accident, not following the business, makes one sale, not being a dealer, if that is really the fact, has no duty to perform about it one way or the other, because that duty has already been performed, or left unperformed, before the goods ever came into his possession. It is no duty of a purchaser, who wants these articles for use, to stamp them; and, although he might be induced by a neighbor afterwards to sell, selling, I mean, strictly speaking, by accident, and without any previous intent, not being a dealer at all, he would have no duty to perform. But when it comes to a dealer, I suppose that the meaning is that you know him to be a dealer because he offers such articles for sale. Instead of saying "a dealer" in those articles, which congress thought might be a little ambiguous, they say "any person who sells" them.

The indictment, however, happens to confine the offering and exposing to this particular bottle, and then the question is whether the dealer was bound to stamp that bottle, whether he ever offered it for sale; because that is the allegation, that he did offer this for sale. Well, my impression is that, as applied to the dealer, that must mean pretty nearly the same thing as selling it, when he did sell it; that he could not have sold it without offering or exposing for sale as well. If a man carried it off first, and paid for it afterwards, and had taken it in such a way that the dealer could not know whether it was stamped or not, had not his attention been called to it, that might be a different matter; but, when a man goes in and buys a thing from a dealer in what appears to be the ordinary course of trade, I think it would be very difficult to draw the line, and say that, although sold, that article was never offered for sale. However, it has been argued to you as a question of fact, and, as such, I leave it with you, whether this article was ever offered for sale by these defendants,—that is to say, in the interest of their business, for that is all it means (it does not mean any personal act of theirs necessarily, but by any one authorized to sell their goods); and, if so, whether it was sold to the person named in this indictment, Mr. Freeman, on or about the 22d day of May last, without the duty having first been paid by affixing the proper stamp.

The jury returned a verdict of guilty against both defendants.

Case No. 15,086.

UNITED STATES v. FENWICK et al.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April 7, 1836.

RIOT—UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY—RIOTOUS ACTS—ACT OF VIOLENCE—PUBLIC EXCITEMENT—INDICTMENT—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an indictment for a riot, it is sufficient to state that the defendants assembled to disturb the peace, and being so assembled, did such and such unlawful acts.

2. It is an indictable offence, at common law, to incite others to insurrection, tumult, and riot; and the indictment need not aver that insurrection, tumult, and riot were thereby excited.

3. The defendants were permitted to give evidence, that Walker, a colored man, whose sign was pulled down by the mob, had recently said that the sign was cut down, at his request, to prevent further excitement.

4. If there is no evidence against one of the defendants, he may be examined as a witness for the other defendants.

5. If a large number of persons assemble, for the purpose of seizing a man on account of insulting language which he was reported to have used, and agree to accomplish that object, and attempt to execute it by tumultuously surrounding his house, and entering it with intent to seize him without legal authority therefor, this is a riot; and the jury may infer the intent from the acts done: and ought so to infer, in the absence of all contradictory evidence.

6. It is not necessary, in order to convict the defendants of a riot, that the intended act of violence should have been perpetrated, or that they should all have been present, doing the act.

7. It is not necessary that an act of violence should have been perpetrated.

8. Upon the count for inciting others to insurrection and riot, it is not necessary to prove an act of violence done in consequence of the incitement.

9. When either party, in a criminal prosecution, has asked an instruction to the jury, upon a question of law, and the other party has proceeded to argue the point before the court, and the court has given an instruction upon that question, the counsel has no right to argue the same question of law before the jury.

10. If either party does not join in the argument to the court, but insists upon arguing it to the jury, the court will require him to proceed with his argument and will, after the argument is closed, give or refuse the instruction prayed, or give such other instruction as the court shall think proper.

11. If three or more persons assemble, with intent, forcibly and violently to disturb the public peace in a tumultuous manner, and with intent mutually to assist each other against any who should oppose them in the execution of such purpose; and if, with force and violence, and in a tumultuous manner, they proceed to disturb the peace, either by a show of armor, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures, to the terror of the people, this constitutes a riot, whether or not they committed the particular act of violence charged in the indictment.

12. The marshal has a right to take the posse, and to call on all citizens to aid him in arresting the rioters; and the citizens have a right to arm themselves.

13. The public excitement is no justification of the intended force and violence.

14. An intent to seize a man by force, for uttering slanderous or offensive words, and to carry him by force, anywhere, even before a justice of the peace, without a legal warrant, is an unlawful intent.

15. All concerned in an unlawful assembly are equally guilty of the subsequent acts done by any of them, in furtherance of the common object of the assembly; and all who join them after the original meeting, and who were present at any subsequent act, and either active in doing, countenancing, or supporting, or ready, if necessary, to support the unlawful act, thereby become parties to the riot, and are equally guilty of all their subsequent acts.

Indictment for a riot. The first count charged that the defendants on, &c., at the county of Washington, did unlawfully, riotously, routously, and tumultuously assemble and gather together, to disturb the peace of the United States in the said county; and, being so then and there assembled and met together, did then and there make great noises, riot, tumult, and disturbance; and then and there unlawfully, riotously, routously, and tumultuously surrounded and entered the house of Snow & Walker, and destroyed their goods, &c., and remained and continued together making such noises, riots, tumults, and disturbances, for a long space of time, to wit, for the space of five hours and more, then next following, to the great terror and disturbance, not only of the good citizens of the United States in the said county, but of all other good citizens of the United States in the said county, there passing and repassing, in and along the public streets and common highways there, in contempt of the laws and against the peace and government of the United States. The second count was for inciting others to insurrection and riot. The defendants pleaded the general issue.

Upon the trial, Mr. W. L. Brent, for defendants, objected to evidence of any other act of violence than such as occurred at the house of Snow & Walker. The first count does not state for what unlawful purpose the defendants assembled, except to disturb the peace. It does not state any particular unlawful act that they assembled to do. 1 Russ. 267, and Reg. v. Gulston, 2 Ld. Raym. 1210, where it is said that aliquid illicitum, is too general.

Mr. Key, contra, cited 2 Chit. 485, 488, 490, and note.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) said that they had in some previous case, decided that it was sufficient that the defendants assembled to disturb the peace, and being so assembled, did so and so; and referred to the forms of indictment in the Crown Cir. Companion, 384–390.

Mr. Hoban, for some of the defendants, moved the court to instruct the jury, that the second count does not state an indictable offence. It charges the defendants with inciting others to insurrection, tumult, and riot. There is no such offence as "insurrection" in this country. "Tumult," is too vague, and so is "riot." Starkie, Cr. Pleading, 78; Rex v. Holland, 5 Term R. 625. It ought also to have averred that insurrection, tumult, and riot were thereby excited. Reg. v. Daniell, 6 Mod. 99, 101, 182; Reg. v. Collingwood, Id. 288.

Mr. Key, contrà, cited 2 Chit. 507, where there is a similar form of indictment.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to give the instruction.

Mr. Brent, for defendants, then offered to prove that Walker, a colored man, and partner of Snow, had, this morning, said that the sign was cut down at his (Walker's) request, to prevent further excitement.

Mr. Key, contrà, objected that Walker's declarations, now made, are not competent evidence to prove his request.

THE COURT, however (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contrà), overruled the objection, and permitted the evidence to be given.

The United States having closed their evidence, and there being nothing proved against Mr. Moore, one of the defendants, he was examined as a witness for the other defendants.

Mr. Hoban, for Beedle and Wetherall, two of the defendants, prayed the court to instruct the jury: (1) That if they do not believe, from the evidence, that they were present at the destruction of the property of Snow & Walker, on 6th street, or if present, not aiding and assisting thereat, the jury should acquit them. (2) That if the jurors believe, from the evidence, that the defendant Beedle was in company with a crowd, armed with clubs, and no act of violence or outrage proved, he should not be found guilty of a riot. (3) That to find the defendant guilty under the second count in the indictment, they must believe, from the evidence, that he actually persuaded, and tried to induce three or more persons tumultuously to assemble to break the peace, and do some act of violence.

Mr. Hoban contended: (1) That the act of violence, intended, must have been perpetrated; and that those only who were present, and did the act, can be found guilty. (2) That if no act of violence was perpetrated, it was no riot. (3) That, in order to convict the defendant, under the second count, there must have been an act of violence done in consequence of the incitement.

Mr. Key, contrà, cited U. S. v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 469, and contended that if the defendants assembled to do one unlawful act, and they do another unlawful act, they are guilty; and thereupon prayed the court to instruct the jury,—That if they believe, from the evidence, that the defendants, or any of them, assembled together with others, to the number of nearly one hundred, for the purpose of seizing one Beverly Snow, on account of insulting expressions which they had heard he had used, then such assembly of such persons, agreeing together to accomplish such object, and their attempting to execute such purpose by tumultuously surrounding his house, and entering it with intent to seize him, without legal authority therefor, if believed by the jury from the evidence, constituted a riot; and the jury may infer the intent from the acts done; and ought so to infer, in the absence of all contradictory evidence.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to give the instruction prayed by Mr. Hoban, and gave that prayed by Mr. Key.

After the court had decided the point of law which had been argued by Mr. Key and Mr. Hoban, Mr. Brent, for the defendants, other than those for whom Mr. Hoban appeared, offered to argue the same point of law to the jury, in opposition to the instruction which the court had given.

THE COURT said, that after a point of law had been argued by the counsel of the parties, and the court had, at the request of either party, instructed the jury upon the point so argued, they could not permit the question of law to be reargued to the jury, in opposition to the instruction given by the court.

Mr. Brent contended, that, as the jury had a right, in criminal cases, to decide the law as well as the fact, he, as counsel for some of the defendants, had a right to argue the law to the jury; and cited 1 Chase, Tr. pp. 5, 34; 2 Chase, Tr. pp. 59, 60; Croswell's Case, 3 Johns. Cas. 352, 376; Erskine, Speeches, 152; Van Horne v. Dorrance, 2 Dall. [2 U. S.]

307; State of Georgia v. Brailsford, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 4.

Mr. Key, contrà, contended that if there can be appeal from the court to the jury upon a question of law, it can be only in capital cases. Blunt v. Com., 4 Leigh, 689; Davenport's Case, 1 Leigh, 588.

Mr. Hoban observed that he appeared for two of the defendants only, Beedle and Wetherall; and that his argument in their defence ought not to prejudice that of the other defendants.

Mr. Bradley, who appeared, with Mr. Brent, as counsel for the other defendants, contended that the rule suggested by the court, applied only to cases where the defendants have asked an instruction to the jury, or have joined in the argument to the court, upon an instruction asked by the attorney of the United States, and thereby waived their right to argue the law to the jury; and stated that they had objected to the court's giving an instruction to the jury before they had argued the law to them.

THE COURT said that they had not heard any such objection, and had considered the counsel for all the defendants as joining in the argument upon the motions of Mr. Hoban and Mr. Key to the court for instructions to the jury. But as they had made such objection, although not so understood by the court, they were allowed to argue the whole law of the case to the jury; MORSELL, Circuit Judge, observing that the court never denied the power of the jury to decide the law as well as the fact, in criminal cases by finding a general verdict; but when either party has asked an instruction, and the other party has proceeded to argue the question before the court, and the court has given an instruction upon that question, the counsel has no right to argue the same question of law before the jury. If the party does not join in the argument to the court, but insists upon arguing it to the jury, the court will require him to proceed with his argument, and will, after the argument, give, or refuse, such instruction, or give such other instruction as the court shall think proper.

Mr. Key replied to the argument to the jury, and concluded by requesting the court to instruct them upon the whole law of the case; whereupon

THE COURT instructed the jury as follows: As the counsel for some of the defendants have argued before you upon the law as well as upon the facts of the case, and the attorney of the United States has requested the court to state to you the law upon the whole case, we will endeavor to do so. In criminal cases, the jury has a right to give a general verdict, and, in doing so, must, of necessity, decide upon the law as well as upon the facts of the case. As we have not taken notes of the evidence, not having had an expectation of being called upon to give an opinion upon the whole case, we leave the question of fact entirely to your consideration. But, as to the law, we say, that, if from the evidence you should be satisfied that the defendants, or any of them, assembled, to the number of three or more, with intent forcibly and violently to disturb the public peace in a tumultuous manner, and with intent mutually to assist one another against any who should oppose them in the execution of the purpose aforesaid, and they did thus assemble with force and violence, and in a tumultuous manner to disturb the peace, either by show of armor, threatening speeches, or turbulent gestures, to the terror of the people, then such assemblage, with such intent as aforesaid, so executed, constituted a riot, whether they broke into Snow's house, or not. That the marshal has a right to take the posse, and to call on all citizens to aid him in arresting the rioters, and that the citizens had a right to arm themselves. That the excitement, whatever might be the cause, was no justification of the intended force and violence. That the intent to seize Snow, by force, for uttering slanderous or offensive words, and to carry him, by force, anywhere, even before a justice of the peace, without legal warrant, if such case should be proved to the satisfaction of the jury, was an unlawful intent. That the intent may be presumed from the act; for every man is presumed to have intended to do what he has done, until the contrary is proved. That all concerned in the unlawful assembly are equally guilty of the subsequent acts done by any of them in furtherance of the common objects of the assembly; and all who joined them after the original meeting, and who were present at any subsequent act, and either active in doing, countenancing, or supporting, or ready, if necessary, to support, the unlawful act, thereby became parties to the riot, and are equally guilty of all their subsequent acts.

The jury found six of the defendants guilty, and recommended them to the mercy of the court.

When they were brought up for judgment, CRANCH, Chief Judge, said: "Before passing sentence upon the defendants who have been convicted in the cases of riot, the court has deemed it proper to make a few observations upon the nature and tendency of the offence. Civil society cannot exist without laws to protect the weak against the strong. These laws are of no avail unless supported by the strength of the whole society, or, at least, of a majority. They must be executed according to prescribed forms, by known, responsible, public functionaries, selected for the purpose. Our judicial tribunals, and their forms of proceeding, have received the sanction of many ages, and by them the laws have been administered, to the general satisfaction of the people under all the various forms of government through which we and our ancestors have passed. In a regular government no laws can be made, or executed, but according to the forms prescribed by the constitution and fundamental laws of the state or society. No voluntary association of individuals, unknown to the constitution, have a right to make or execute the laws, or to judge, condemn, or punish those whom they may deem to be offenders, and to punish whom they may suppose the law to be inadquate to, however pure or holy may be their motive; and if, in their fanaticism or their frenzy, they should take the life of their victim, they would be guilty of murder. Such, also, would be the judgment of the law if any unauthorized individual, or combination of individuals, should snatch from the officers of justice even a condemned murderer, and proceed themselves to execute the sentence. But the example of such an usurpation of judicial or executive functions, if unpunished, would be far more pernicious to society than the mere act of murder which would have been committed. The reign of terror would have commenced and no one could foresee the extent of its ravages. It is easier to create an excitement than to allay it; for every degree of excitement tends to pervert the judgment, to obscure the light of reason, and to sear the conscience. When a mob is once raised, no one can tell where it will end, and all who assisted in raising it are guilty of all the consequences. The more respectable the persons engaged in it, and the more desirable the end to be obtained, the more dangerous is the example; for if good men may use unlawful means to accomplish a good end, how can wicked men be restrained from using like means for an unlawful end? All good ends must be pursued by lawful means. The supremacy of the law is the only security for life, liberty, and property."

The defendants, who were convicted, were then sentenced to six months' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of fifty dollars and costs.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1839.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE—INSTRUCTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

It is error in a judge to instruct the jury that the evidence is sufficient to convict the defendant. The sufficiency is to be decided by the jury.

[Cited in Territory v. Kee (N. M.) 25 Pac. 926.]

Error to the criminal court for Alexandria county, in a prosecution for perjury.

The judge had instructed the jury that the evidence was sufficient to convict the defendant [Francis Fenwick], who objected to the instruction, and took his bill of exceptions.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) was of opinion that the judge should not have instructed the jury that the evidence was sufficient; that question is for the jury.

Judgment reversed, and venire de novo to be awarded.

Case No. 15,088.

UNITED STATES v. The FIDELITER.

District Court, D. California. Sept. 21, 1871.

SHIPPING—REGISTER—FRAUDULENT SALE—OWNERSHIP—ALASKA PURCHASE.

1. A, an American citizen, purchased a British ship, but procured the bill of sale to be executed to B, a British subject, by whom a British register was obtained. A, afterwards, under a power of attorney from B, made a bill of sale to C, a Russian subject, but no consideration was paid by C, and the vessel, from the time of the first purchase by A, remained in his exclusive possession, and under his control.

2. After the ratification of the treaty with Russia, A, as attorney for C, applied for an American register, took the oath prescribed by the act of 1792, and produced as further proof that the vessel was the property of a Russian, a Russian passport. The pretended sale to C was made for the purpose of giving to the vessel the appearance of Russian property, and thus enabling her to obtain an American register. Held, that the oath taken under the act of 1792 was not a false oath, as the ownership therein referred to is the legal ownership.

3. The vessel was not the property of a Russian inhabitant of Alaska, within the meaning of the treaty; she was not entitled to be registered as American, and the register was fraudulently obtained for a vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof

In admiralty.

Mr. Latimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Delos Lake and Milton Andros, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The libel of information in this case was originally filed in the district court of the United States for the district of Oregon. [Case No. 4,756.] Voluminous depositions were taken, and a decree of forfeiture rendered, the reasons of which were given by the learned judge of that court in an elaborate opinion. On appeal to the circuit court, it was for the first time suggested that no seizure of the vessel had been made at the time the libel of information was filed. The circuit court therefore held that the district court had no jurisdiction of the case. [Id. 4,755.] The vessel was thereupon reseized in this district, and a libel of information filed in this court. At the hearing of the cause it was agreed between the advocates for the respective parties that all the testimony as contained in the printed copy of the transcripts sent from the district court for Oregon should be considered in evidence in the case before this court, and also that all recitals and statements of the testimony contained in the opinion of the learned judge for the district court of Oregon should be received as if such testimony had been regularly copied into the transcripts.

The position assumed by the advocates for the claimants at the hearing before this court differs essentially from that taken by them before the district court for Oregon. At the former trial an attempt was made to cover up the true nature of the transaction by which the forfeiture is claimed to have accrued, and the acuteness of the learned judge was exercised and his ability displayed in stripping it of its various disguises and exposing its real character. At the hearing before this court, the facts, as found by the court at the former trial, were substantially admitted, but it was contended that they constituted no violation of the law. To present the point thus raised, only a brief statement of facts will be necessary, omitting all details which do not vary the essential character of the transaction. In June, 1866, the British ship Fideliter was purchased by one William Kohl, an American citizen, but the bill of sale was made by his direction to one John Dutnell, a British subject, who subsequently, by like direction of Kohl, caused her to be registered as a British vessel. On the sixth of June, 1867, Kohl, under an irrevocable power of attorney given him by Dutnell, executed a bill of sale to one Joseph Lugebil, a Russian subject, who received the title without the payment of any consideration therefor, and held the same in trust for Kohl, to whom he, on the same day, gave an irrevocable power of attorney, authorizing him to sell the vessel. On the ratification of the treaty with Russia, by the terms of which Lugebil became an American citizen, Kohl applied, as agent for Lugebil, for a register, and obtained the same from the collector at Sitka on making oath that Lugebil was the true and only owner of the vessel, and that no foreigner was directly or indirectly interested therein, etc., as required by the act of 1783.

It is not pretended that Lugebil had any interest in the vessel otherwise than as holding the legal title, nor can it be denied that the object of the parties in making the transfer to him was to convert the vessel into an American bottom, by availing themselves of the construction given to the treaty by the American government, under which any vessel owned by a Russian subject, resident in Alaska, might be admitted to American registry, irrespective of her previous nationality. The Russian owner of a British built vessel thus became entitled to privileges not enjoyed by the American owner of a similar vessel, and to obtain this advantage was unquestionably the design of the parties.

The questions presented, therefore, are—(1) Did Kohl, in swearing that Lugebil was the true and only owner of the vessel, swear to what was not true, inasmuch as Lugebil was merely the legal owner, but not beneficially interested in her? Act Dec. 31, 1792, § 4 [1 Stat. 289]. (2) Was the register "knowingly and fraudulently obtained for a vessel not entitled to the benefit thereof"? Act July 18, 1866, § 24 [14 Stat. 184].

At the former trial the counsel for the claimants seem to have omitted to call the attention of the court to the fact that the ownership referred to in section 4 of the act of 1792 has been decided to be the legal, and not the beneficial ownership. The existence of any direct or indirect interest in a foreigner, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, is provided against by the succeeding clause, which thus, not only carries out the policy of the law by excluding from registry any vessel in which a foreigner has any interest, legal, or equitable, but seems to imply that such equitable interests, if held by an American, need not be disclosed or denied, and that the oath may be taken by him who by bill of sale or otherwise has become the holder of the legal title. Weston v. Penniman [Case No. 17,455]; Hall v. Hudson [Id. 5,935]. If then this had been the ordinary case of an application for the re-registry of an American vessel, the statement contained in the oath that Lugebil was the true and only owner, and that no foreigner was directly or indirectly interested in the vessel, would have been literally true according to the legal effect and meaning of the oath. That the vessel was not the property of a Russian resident of Alaska, within the meaning of the treaty is, I think, clear. She was, therefore, not entitled to an American registry, and had the facts been known, it would probably have been withheld. Some further assurance that she was in reality Russian property than that afforded by taking the oath prescribed by the act of 1792, might reasonably have been exacted. But none was required, and the oath actually taken, though it failed, when its meaning and effect are understood, to furnish any guarantee that the vessel was the property of a Russian within the meaning of the treaty, was nevertheless true, inasmuch as the formal or legal title was in the person who was sworn to be the owner.

The libel of information, so far as it claims a forfeiture on the ground that the oath taken by Kohl was false, cannot be sustained. But a forfeiture is also insisted on the ground that the certificate of registry was knowingly and fraudulently obtained by Kohl for a vessel not entitled thereto. It has already been observed that the vessel could not be considered Russian property within the meaning of the treaty. Under its provisions, the Russian inhabitants of Alaska were secured "in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and religion." On the ratification of the treaty, the revenue officers at Alaska were instructed that, "every vessel belonging to a recognized inhabitant will be allowed to exchange her Russian for American papers, or on production to you of satisfactory evidence of such ownership, she will be entitled to American marine papers according with her tonnage. And, in order to be invested with all the rights and privileges of an American vessel, she will be required to take such papers, and, so far as practicable, to conform to existing laws and regulations until congress shall otherwise provide." General Instructions, Treasury Department, August 15, 1867. It is evident that the expression "property of a Russian inhabitant of Alaska," contained in the treaty and the words, "vessel belonging to a recognized inhabitant," contained in the instructions refer to an actual and bona fide ownership by a Russian, and not to a pretended and fictitious appearance of ownership, created by a sham sale without consideration, or change of possession, where the pretended vendor retains exclusive control of the ship. The collector was instructed to require satisfactory evidence of such ownership. This, had he been aware of its legal effect and meaning, he would not have considered as afforded by the applicant's taking the oath prescribed by the act of 1792, for that oath, as we have seen, only refers to the legal or nominal ownership. It did not furnish any evidence that the vessel was really "the property" of a Russian, or "belonged" to him within the meaning of the treaty or of the instructions.

The whole transaction which terminated in the obtaining of an American register by a vessel not entitled thereto was a fraud; facilitated, it is true, by the want of circumspection of the collector, who neglected to require the production of the "satisfactory evidence of ownership" as directed by his instructions, and who accepted as such evidence an oath which in fact afforded no proof whatever that the vessel belonged to a Russian in any sense which would entitle her to an American register. From the time of his original purchase from Brown, Kohl was the real owner of the vessel. The procurement of a British register to Dutnell as owner was therefore a fraud upon the British navigation laws. The pretended sale to Lugebil and the obtaining by him of a passport, reciting that she was "owned by the Russian subject, J. Lugebil," was a fraud upon the laws of Russia, if, as is presumed, vessels owned by foreigners, and in which Russian subjects have no interest save a nominal one, created by a fictitious sale, are not entitled to be registered as Russian vessels. The execution of the bill of sale to Lugebil was also a fraud upon the laws of the United States, for it was designed to give to the vessel the false and colorable semblance of Russian property, and thus obtain privileges to which that species of property was entitled under the treaty, when, in truth, she was not Russian property in any sense that would entitle her to an American register, and was owned, possessed, and controlled by an American citizen. The oath taken by Kohl was not strictly a false oath; but the execution of the bill of sale to Lugebil with intent to create a false appearance of Russian ownership of the vessel within the provisions of the treaty; the omission to disclose to the collector the real circumstances; the production to him of a passport which asserted her to be owned by a Russian subject, and therefore a Russian national vessel, which passport could only have been obtained in fraud of the Russian laws, and all this with the intent to impose the vessel upon the collector as Russian property within the meaning of the treaty, constitute, in my opinion, a clear case where a certificate of American registry has been fraudulently and knowingly obtained for a vessel not entitled thereto.

It has been held by the supreme court of the United States that a conveyance though made for the avowed purpose of transferring an interest so as to give the United States courts jurisdiction as of a suit between citizens of different states will accomplish that purpose if the interest be really transferred. But a conveyance without consideration, with a distinct understanding that the grantors are to retain all their real interest, and that the deed is to have no other effect than to give jurisdiction to the court, is to be treated as a fraud upon the court. Smith v. Kemeschen, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 216; Barney v. Baltimore City, 6 Wall. [73 U. S.] 288, and cases cited. If, then, the transfer to a merely "nominal and colorable" grantee, for the purpose of enabling him to sue in the United States courts is considered a fraud upon the court, although the object of the parties is not reprehensible, and the desired result would have been attained if the interest had really been transferred, how much more must the transfer in this case be held to be a fraud upon the laws of the United States, since it was not only made without consideration to a merely nominal and colorable vendee, but the object of the sale was to give to a vessel the false appearance of Russian property, and thereby induce the United States authorities to admit her to privileges to which she was not entitled.

A decree of forfeiture must be entered.

UNITED STATES v. FIELDS.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. May 26, 1859.

PRACTICE IN EQUITY—BILL OF REVIVOR.

Where a defendant in a suit in equity has neither been served with process nor appeared in the suit, a bill of revivor against his administrator, after his death, is not proper, and the court will not make an order reviving the suit against such administrator.

This was a bill in equity, filed by the United States against George A. Gardiner in his lifetime, and the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company. A subpœna and an injunction were served upon the trust company, as the depository of certain moneys sought to be recovered by the plaintiffs in this suit, the ground of the suit being that those moneys had been fraudulently obtained by Gardiner, under the Mexican claims commission. The plaintiffs having filed a bill of revivor against the administrator of Gardiner [Thomas C. Fields], now applied for an order reviving the suit against him as such administrator.

Charles H. Hunt, Asst. Dist. Atty., for plaintiffs.

Abraham B. Tappen, for defendant.

HALL, District Judge. As it appears that Gardiner, the defendant in the original suit, never appeared therein, and was never even served with process, I am of the opinion that a bill of revivor is not proper, and that the application for the order sought by the attorney for the United States must be denied. The following authorities are, I think, decisive of the case, and they will sufficiently indicate the course proper to be pursued: 3 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1673, 1698, 1707, 1708; 2 Barb. Ch. Prac. 36, 37; Crowfoot v. Mander, 9 Sim. 396; Stewart v. Nicholls, Tam. 307; Hardy v. Hull, 14 Sim. 21; Foster v. Foster, 16 Sim. 637.

The motion is denied, but without prejudice to any future application for leave to file a supplemental bill, or a bill in the nature of a supplemental bill, or to any motion which the United States or the defendant may think proper to make.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTEEN HOGSHEADS OF BRANDY.

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Nov., 1862.

APPEAL—FORFEITURE CASE—TRIAL WITHOUT JURY.

1. A seizure case, triable by a jury in the district court, cannot be reviewed in this court on an appeal, but can be reviewed only on a writ of error.

2. Where such a case is, by agreement of parties, tried by the district court without a jury, the record should be made up in form, as in the case of a writ of error, with the proper exceptions to the admission or rejection of testimony, or to the instructions of the court to the jury.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the Northern district of New York.]

In this case a libel of information was filed in the district court, for the forfeiture of fifteen hogsheads of brandy, for undervaluation. The case was tried in the district court, by the court without a jury [case unreported], under an agreement between the parties that the court should determine the law and render a verdict and judgment. This was done, and the court gave judgment for the libellants, and the claimants took an appeal to this court. The libellants now moved to dismiss the appeal.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. A seizure case, such as the present one is, in which the parties are entitled to a trial by jury, can only be reviewed on a writ of error. And, if a writ of error had been taken in this case, this court could not have entertained it, because there is no bill of exceptions; and there could have been none, as the court below was made the judge of both the law and the fact. The record should have been made up in form, as in the case of a writ of error, with the proper exceptions to the admission or rejection of testimony, or to the instructions of the court to the jury.

The appeal is dismissed for want of jurisdiction, but without costs.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY BARRELS OF WHISKEY.

[11 Int. Rev. Rec. 94; 3 Am. Law T. Rep. (U. S. Cts.) 59.]

District Court, D. Kentucky. 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—REMOVAL OF SPIRITS—ENTRY IN BOOKS—HOW AND BY WHOM TO BE MADE.

1. The requisition of the 26th section of the internal revenue act of 1866 [14 Stat. 154], that there shall be entered daily the number of proof gallons purchased or received, of whom purchased or received, and the number of proof gallons sold or delivered, is complied with as to entries made before the act of 1868 [15 Stat. 125], if the entries, although made in a continuous manner without anything to designate to what the figures refer, are a true statement of such transactions.

2. The provision of the statute that requires the wholesale dealer and rectifier to make these entries daily does not demand that they should make them with their own hand. The duty may be delegated to a clerk, but the dealers and rectifiers are responsible if the proper entries are not made.

At law.

BALLARD, District Judge (charging jury). The information contains four counts; but the third count, being substantially the same as the fourth, has been abandoned by the attorney for the United States. I shall, therefore, direct your attention to the first, second, and fourth counts. The first and second counts are founded upon the 45th section of the act of July 13, 1866. This section provides: "That any person who shall remove any distilled spirits from the place where the same are distilled otherwise than into a bonded warehouse as provided by law shall be liable to a fine," etc. "All distilled spirits so removed, and all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited to the United States," etc. The first count charges in substance that the 50 barrels of whiskey in contest were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid. The second count charges that the said distilled spirits were removed from the place where the same were distilled otherwise than into a bonded warehouse as provided by law. The fourth count I shall notice hereafter.

In order that you may understand the first and second counts, it is proper for me to say that the statute provides that all distilled spirits, when they are withdrawn from the cistern which the law requires to be connected with every distillery, shall be immediately inspected, branded, and removed to a bonded warehouse, either class A or class B. They cannot be taken to any other place. There is no way in which the tax can be paid on them until they are in a bonded warehouse. You see, then, why it is made an offence to remove spirits from a distillery to any other place than to a bonded warehouse. When the spirits are once in a bonded warehouse, they may be removed therefrom, after being inspected and gauged, on bond for export, on bond for transportation from one warehouse to another, or on bond for redistillation or rectification, or for changing into other packages, or on the payment of the tax. In case they are removed for redistillation, rectification, or change into other packages, the bond requires them to be returned into the same warehouse. When they are removed from or to a warehouse, they are required to be inspected, gauged, and branded by a revenue inspector. Of course they may be again taken from the warehouse on payment of the tax thereon. And now you see why spirits, found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, are forfeited.

It appears from the evidence, that on the 31st December, 1867, there were 40 barrels of highwines removed from the distillery of Eastman & Wood, in Peoria, Illinois, to the bonded warehouse, class B, of one Zell, after the same had been inspected, gauged, proved, and marked as required by law. It also appears that these same 40 barrels were, on the same day, regularly removed from the warehouse on the payment of the tax. These facts are established beyond controversy, for they are proven by the government officers who knew the facts and by the production of the proper vouchers. Now the claimants insist that the 50 barrels in controversy are rectified spirits and are the product of the 40 barrels above mentioned. If they have established this to your satisfaction, of course your verdict must be for them on the first and second counts. If, on the other hand, you should come to the conclusion that the 50 barrels are not rectified spirits, or are not the product of the 40—nay, if it is not established to your satisfaction that they are, you must find for the United States. The burden of proof is on the claimants to show that the requirements of law have been complied with. This is the provision of the statute, and it is founded on the principle that it is always in the power of the owner of spirits to trace them and to show that the requirements of law respecting them have been complied with. The burden being on the claimants, the case must not be left in equipoise. The property being found outside of a bonded warehouse, if the claimants had offered no evidence, your verdict must have been for the United States, and therefore your verdict must be in the same way unless you believe from the evidence adduced by the claimants, or rather from the whole evidence in the case, that produced by the claimants and by the United States also, that these spirits are the product of the 40 barrels removed from the distillery of Eastman & Wood on December 31, 1867, to the bonded warehouse of Zell, and removed from the warehouse on the same day on the payment of tax. You must consider the whole evidence in the case bearing on these points, and, after considering it, if you are satisfied that the spirits are the product of the 40 barrels, your verdict will be for the claimants on these counts, or for the United States if you are not so satisfied.

On the issue tendered on these counts, the claimants have produced one witness, Mr. Dunn, who has been examined before you and read two depositions. One of these depositions was given by the claimant Warner, and the other by Mr. Funke, United States inspector. All that Mr. Funke testifies to is the identity of the barrels seized with the like number he inspected for the claimants at their rectifying and alcohol establishment in Peoria, Illinois, on the 8th of January, 1868. He does not know or pretend to know anything in respect to the spirits in these barrels being the product of the 40 barrels, on which the tax was paid. The testimony on this point comes solely from the two witnesses, Warner and Dunn. These witnesses do swear positively that they saw the 40 barrels dumped into the receiving cisterns or rectifying tubs of Eastman & Warner, and that they saw the product withdrawn therefrom and put into the barrels now in controversy. But the district attorney insists that these witnesses are mistaken or are not to be credited. He relies upon many facts and circumstances, of the weight and force of which you must judge. First. That, notwithstanding the haste with which the 40 barrels were removed from the bonded warehouse (you will remember they were removed on the same day they were put into the warehouse), they were retained in the rectifying establishment, according to the testimony produced by the claimants, at least 8 days. Second. That it is not reasonable that the taxes would have been paid on the spirits if they were intended for rectification. It is a fact that the spirits, when withdrawn from the warehouse, amounted to 2,435 gallons, that the claimants might have removed the same in bond, and upon the return of the same they might have been credited by 3 per cent. as lost in the process of rectification. Now, 3 per cent. of 2,435 gallons is 73 gallons. On this amount the claimants might have lawfully escaped the tax by removing the spirits in bond, instead of paying the tax in the first instance. But there was nothing unlawful in rectifying the spirits after the tax was paid on them. The owner had the right to do with them as he pleased, and I believe it has been not an uncommon practice to pay the taxes on spirits in the first instance, that is, before rectification. Third. That the circumstances attending the alleged sale of the spirits are peculiar and suspicious. Fourth. That it is incredible that the spirits were sold as claimants insist at $2.28 per gallon, when spirits of the same kind rectified by the same parties, had been sold to the same party only a short time before at $1.90 per gallon. Fifth. That the manner of shipment is suspicious. You will remember the shipment was to W. L. Weller on account of T. W. Weller, and that there is no such person as T. W. Weller. Sixth. That the spirits were never rectified at all, and two experts have been introduced, who, you will recollect, expressed their opinion on this subject. Seventh. That there are discrepancies between Warner and Dunn and between Dunn's deposition and his testimony here, which render the testimony of these parties unreliable. Eighth. That Warner is interested in the result of the suit, that Dunn was his clerk, and that these circumstances affect their credibility.

Your own memory will doubtless supply other circumstances. You must consider all these circumstances and all others which the evidence has developed, and the explanations which claimants have offered respecting them. You must judge of the credibility of the witnesses. You should not arbitrarily reject the testimony of any witness. If he had opportunity of knowing what he testifies, and he testifies to nothing which is irrational, improbable, or which taxes your credulity, if he has delivered his testimony in a credible manner, if his character is unimpeached and his testimony not contradicted, both common sense and the law suggest that he should be credited. But, if he is contradicted, if his story is improbable, if his manner of testifying is not straightforward, if he has contradicted himself, you are authorized to disbelieve him, and if he is interested in the cause it affects his credibility. I am not attempting to tell you what is the character of the testimony before you. This is not my province. I have been simply endeavoring to give you some of the rules which the law has prescribed for determining the credibility of witnesses. Again, when two witnesses make apparently contradictory statements, it is not to be assumed that either witness has sworn falsely, but rather that one is mistaken. If the witnesses are equally credible and one may be mistaken, without imputing to him an intention to state a falsehood, and the statement of the other cannot be untrue without imputing to him wilful perjury, the rule is that the statement of the latter is rather to be taken; so a statement of a witness based upon knowledge derived from sight is ordinarily more reliable than a statement which is a mere expression of an opinion. But it may happen that the jury would be authorized to receive the latter statement, as in case the first comes from an unreliable witness or one who is contradicted by other testimony. In fact, gentlemen, the rules upon this subject are the dictates of common sense, and your judgment will teach you better what testimony to believe and what to disbelieve than any rule which can be laid down by the court.

I will now proceed to the fourth count. This count is founded upon the 26th section of the act of 1866. This section provides "that every rectifier or wholesale dealer in distilled spirits shall enter daily, in a book or books kept for the purpose, under such rules and regulations as the commissioner of internal revenue may prescribe, the number of proof gallons of spirits purchased or received, of whom purchased and received, and the number of proof gallons sold or delivered; and every rectifier or wholesale dealer who shall neglect or refuse to keep such record shall forfeit all spirits in his possession," etc. This count charges in substance that heretofore, to wit: on the 31st December, 1867, the spirits seized were in the possession of Eastman & Warner, who were then and there rectifiers of distilled spirits, and did purchase and receive and sell and deliver large quantities of distilled spirits; and that while said fifty barrels of spirits were in their possession they did neglect to enter daily, in a book kept for the purpose, the number of proof gallons of spirits purchased and received, of whom purchased and received, and the number of proof gallons sold and delivered, etc. The claimants have produced the book which Eastman & Warner professed to have kept. It does not appear from this book by whom it was kept or to whom it belongs. At the top of the left-hand page are written the words "Spirits purchased free and in bond," and at the top of the right-hand page are written the words "Spirits sold and bonded." Then on the left page are written, in a continuous account—First, a date; second, the name of some person; third, figures constituting a small number; and fourth, figures constituting a large number, which latter number is from fifty to sixty times the amount of the preceding number. There is nothing at the top of the page or at the head of the columns to indicate what these figures mean; but the witness introduced by claimants proves that one of the numbers indicates the number of packages, and the other the proof gallons. To this evidence the district attorney has objected. He insists that the book should show on its face whose it is, and that the entries themselves should show distinctly what they mean, and that parol proof cannot be used to explain them. There is much force in this objection; but as the commissioner had, at the date of these entries, adopted no rules or regulations for making them, except that they should be made in a continuous account, I am inclined to the opinion that the requisition that there shall be entered daily the number of proof gallons purchased or received, is complied with when it is shown that the entry made truly expresses the number of proof gallons purchased or received, and that it was made on the day of purchase or receipt, although there is nothing connected with the entry in the book to show that it refers to proof gallons any more than it does to wine gallons, or in fact that it refers to "gallons" at all. If the entries as made are respectively the true numbers of proof gallons purchased or received on the given days, if they contain respectively the true name of the person from whom purchased or received, and if they are respectively the true number of proof gallons sold or delivered, it seems to me the statute is literally complied with. There is nothing in the act of 1866, or in the regulations prescribed by the commissioner under it, which requires these entries to be made in the columns with appropriate headings, as seems to be contemplated by the act of 1868 and the regulations under it. I therefore instruct you, that if this is the book which Eastman & Warner kept for the purpose contemplated by the 26th section of the act of 1866, as before explained, and they did enter daily thereon the number of proof gallons purchased or received, of whom purchased and received, and the number of proof gallons sold or delivered, although they have to resort to parol testimony to explain the entries to the extent above indicated, they have substantially complied with the statute.

Again, it appears from the testimony that these entries were not made by Eastman & Warner personally, but by their clerk, and it is insisted by the district attorney that this is not a compliance with the statute. He insists that the statute requires that the entries shall be made by the rectifier himself, and that the making of them by a clerk is not a satisfaction of the law. To sustain his position he has called my attention to the difference between the language of the twenty-sixth section of the act of 1866 and the language of the forty-ninth section of the same act, as well as of the sixty-eighth section of the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 248], and the twenty-fifth section of the act of 1867 [14 Stat. 483], and the forty-fifth section of the act of 1868, and he has also shown me the opinion of Judge Blatchford on this point. Judge Blatchford does seem to say that the act of 1868 requires the rectifier and wholesale dealer to make these entries personally, and that they cannot delegate the making of them to another, and I do not see any substantial difference affecting this question between the act of 1868 and the act of 1866. But I am not certain that Judge Blatchford means more than that the rectifier or wholesale dealer cannot excuse himself from responsibility for the proper entries not being made, by showing that he employed some one specially to make them, and directed the person employed to make them. If this is what he means, I entirely concur with him. The entries must, undoubtedly, be made, or the rectifier or the wholesale dealer will incur the penalty; but it seems to me wholly immaterial by whom they are made. This is not the proper occasion for the discussion of this question; but I must say, however, that it would require something much more explicit than the difference between the language of the several sections of the several statutes before mentioned to induce me to hold that the provision of the statute which requires the wholesale dealer and rectifier to make certain entries daily means that they shall make them with their own hand. The consequences of such a construction are too serious. It would preclude every person who cannot write from being either a rectifier of or a wholesale dealer in distilled spirits. Every rectifier or wholesale dealer would be obliged to suspend business when sick or absent from his place of business. No, I cannot adopt this construction of the statute. The general rule of law is, that what a man does by another he does himself, and there must be something peculiar in the nature of the duty or specific in the requisition to demand more than the general rule exacts. In this case there is nothing, in my opinion, either in the nature of the duty exacted or in the language prescribing it, which requires anything more. I perceive no essential difference between the words that the "rectifier shall enter daily" and the "rectifier shall enter or cause to be entered daily." They are simply different forms of expressing the same thing, and every purpose of the statute is as well accomplished by the rectifier causing the entries to be made as by his making them himself. I therefore instruct you that it is wholly immaterial whether the entries were made by Eastman or Warner or their clerk. If the proper entries were in fact made, the law is satisfied. But it appears from the claimants' own witness that the book does not contain a correct entry of the number of proof gallons sold and delivered by them. The book shows as many gallons sold and delivered as were purchased, and it is conceded that there was a loss of at least three per cent. by the processes of rectification and redistillation. Mr. Dunn, who made the entries, tells you that he did not attempt to enter in this account the correct number of proof gallons of alcohol sold or returned to the bonded warehouse, that he entered as sold or returned the same number as was purchased or received, making no deduction for loss by evaporation in the process of redistillation, which he says was at least three per cent. It is conceded that the entry made January 2, 1868, is incorrect in this respect, and that it was made while the fifty barrels now in controversy were in possession of the parties whose duty it was to make the entries. I agree with the district attorney that for this cause the spirits are forfeited, and, as there is no controversy respecting the facts, your verdict must be for the United States on the fourth count. I have considered the proposition contended for by claimants' counsel, that the statute does not require spirits received by a rectifier in bond and returned in bond to be entered at all. They insist that all the statute requires to be entered are the spirits purchased and sold. But such has not been its construction, nor is it, I think, its true meaning. I think the statute requires the rectifier and wholesale dealer to make the entries respecting all spirits which come into their respective establishments from all sources whatever.

It may seem to you, gentlemen, hard that these spirits should be forfeited because the claimants entered in their books more proof gallons of spirits as returned to the bonded warehouse than were actually so returned. But the law, in requiring the entries to be made, it seems to me, demands that they be accurate. The statute does not make the forfeiture depend upon the entry being fraudulent or wilfully false, but upon the neglect or refusal to make the entry—that is, the correct entry, as I understand it. We cannot fritter away the statute because it seems harsh. The remedy for harsh legislation belongs to the legislative department. The judiciary have nothing to do but to interpret and enforce the statutes as they find them. But, if these were the only grounds of forfeiture, it might be my duty to certify the facts to the secretary of the treasury and his duty to remit the forfeiture. It is therefore desired by all parties that you shall, in your verdict, respond to the issue on each count of the information. As before stated, the third count has been abandoned, and your verdict must be for the United States on the fourth count, but it will be for the claimants or for the United States on the first and second counts accordingly as you shall find, upon the principles before announced, that the spirits in controversy are or are not rectified spirits, and are or are not the product of the forty barrels removed from the distillery of Eastman & Wood, December 31, 1868, to the bonded warehouse of Zell, and removed therefrom upon the same day. The whole controversy, I repeat, on these counts is reduced to a very simple inquiry. The burden of proof being on the claimants, they have staked the whole case on the proposition that the spirits in controversy are rectified spirits, and are the product of the forty barrels before mentioned. If they have proven this fact to your satisfaction, you must find for the claimants on these counts; if they have not, or if you are not satisfied after scanning the whole evidence, your verdict must be for the United States.

Case No. 15,092.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY-EIGHT THOUSAND EIGHT HUNDRED AND FIFTY CIGARS.

[21 Law Rep. 267.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1857.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—CONCEALMENT OF GOODS—TIME FOR ENTRY.

1. Under section 68 of the collection act of 1799 (1 Stat. 677), the concealment of goods which works a forfeiture need not be with the concurrence, knowledge, or consent of the owner or consignee.

2. Such forfeiture may be enforced before the time has passed for the owner to enter the goods. A subsequent offer within such time to enter them, cannot affect the forfeiture, though made as soon as the owner was aware of their arrival.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This was a libel of information founded on the sixty-eighth section of the collection act of 1799 (1 Stat. 677). The district court decreed a forfeiture [case unreported], and the claimants appealed.

In this court certain facts were agreed as follows: The bark Medora, Capt. Robey, of Portland, Maine, arrived in the harbor of Boston, from Havana, on the 11th of December, 1854, and her manifest was on that day produced to the boarding-officer, and endorsed by him. The vessel was reported at the custom house by the master, on the 12th of December, 1854, and the usual oath taken by the master. The vessel was loaded with molasses, consigned to R. C. Hooper, of Boston, and had also on board the cigars in controversy, to wit, 58,850 cigars, which were not on the manifest. There was also another lot of cigars, to wit, 7,000, entered on the manifest, shipped by Cabarga, consigned to the master, Robey; and an ullage thousand entered as ship's stores. On the said 12th day of December, William W. Parker, assistant deputy surveyor, Thomas P. Wilson, an aid to the revenue, with a boarding-officer and a boatman, went on board the vessel,—still lying in the stream, about a mile and a half from the wharf,—and made search, suspecting that cigars were concealed on board. The cigars mentioned in the information, were found separate from the residue of the cargo, in the following manner: The officers in search took up the floor of the lower cabin, in doing which they were obliged first to remove a wash-sink, which was fastened to the floor, and some other heavy articles. After taking up two or three of the boards composing the floor of the cabin, they discovered a double flooring, about a foot apart, between which and the upper flooring, they found four boxes of cigars, containing five hundred cigars in each box. The upper flooring was not nailed down; it rested on timbers. No trap-door or scuttle led to the place where these cigars were found, and the only way to get to them was to take up the floor of the lower cabin, as was done. The officers continued the search. On each side of the cabin, between the last berth and the bulkhead that divided the cabin and hold, was a door leading into a closet, the floor of the closet being even with the cabin floor. The door of the closet was not fastened. In one of these closets, piled up on the floor, were the boxes which contained the seven thousand cigars that were entered on the manifest, and the ullage thousand entered as ship's stores. These boxes were in open sight, and there was no appearance of any thing being concealed or deposited behind them. The partition of each closet was made of boards, painted, and matched together, and to all appearance were permanent partitions. On removing the floor in these closets, which was a rough flooring, and taking down the partitions, the officers discovered and took out, in boxes, fifty-eight thousand eight hundred and fifty cigars, about equally divided in number in each of the places last mentioned. There was no access to these places behind the partitions, either by door, window, slide, or otherwise; but on removing the floor and partitions, a space was discovered, extending under the deck of the vessel, and in these spaces on each side of the vessel, said cigars were found, in boxes of different sizes, with Spanish brands. The two closets were large enough to have held all the cigars which were found on board, without putting any behind the partitions. The officers seized the cigars found as above, and they are the same described in the information, and no duties have been paid on them. The manifest was dated December 2, 1854. The cigars were shipped on board of the Medora, November, 1854, at Havana, for Boston, by Antonio Cabarga, a merchant at Havana, and were sent by him to Albert W. Porter, for his account, and that of T. G. Mitchell. They were all shipped to A. W. Porter as the consignee, by orders from A. W. Porter and T. G. Mitchell, in Portland, to Cabarga, who was paid for the cigars partly by R. Morrison & Co., at Havana, for said Porter, and partly by proceeds of sales of goods that A. W. Thayer had sent out to Havana in the Medora. They were paid for before the Medora sailed. Edwin Parker, of Boston, a commission merchant, had been requested by S. W. Porter, of Portland, who was the principal owner of the bark, before her arrival, to take care of her when she arrived, on account of the captain being intemperate. Upon learning the fact of her arrival, he made immediate efforts to find the captain, but did not find him until the 14th of December. He then found him enfeebled in body and mind, intoxicated, and incompetent for business. Said Parker took charge of the vessel, went to the custom house on the said fourteenth day of December, and found that the cigars of the claimants were not on the manifest; and as their agent, and the agent of the captain, offered to amend the manifest, and to make a post or amended entry, and to pay the duties thereon—which offer was refused by the collector. Said Parker had not then received any invoice or bill of lading of the cigars. Afterwards he did receive the papers hereunto appended, marked "A." On the 18th of December, the molasses was entered by the consignee thereof, after which the unlading of the cargo was begun. The cigars seized were appraised at $1,690.95.

J. A. Andrew, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The objection made at the bar to the decree of the district court is that when these goods were seized the time had not arrived for the claimants to enter them; that it did not appear they were in any way connected with the concealment of the goods, or intended to defraud the revenue; and that in point of fact, their agent offered to enter and pay the duties on the goods, as soon as he was aware of their arrival. And it is urged that it was not the purpose of congress, nor required by the true construction of the section in question, to inflict a forfeiture upon an owner who was innocent of any fraud, and had not been guilty even of any laches. The sixty-eighth section of the collection act, on which the libel is founded, provides that "Every collector, &c., shall have full power and authority to enter any ship or vessel in which they shall have reason to suspect any goods, wares, or merchandise, subject to any duty, are concealed; and therein to search for, seize, and secure any such goods, wares, and merchandise; and all such goods, wares, and merchandise, on which the duty shall not have been paid, or secured to be paid, shall be forfeited."

It has been decided that the concealment here spoken of is a withdrawal of the goods from public view, on account of their being subject to duties, or from some fraudulent motive. U. S. v. 1,250 Chests of Tea, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 498. The question is, whether such withdrawal must be by the owner or consignee, or by his procurement, or with his concurrence. So to hold would be to require what the language of the act does not require. That makes the forfeiture depend solely on the concealment of goods on which the duties have not been paid or secured, without regard to the person by whom the concealment was practised. Nor are the subject-matter of the law, and the mischief it was designed to prevent, such as to call for a construction which would render the act or concurrence of the owner or consignee necessary. That subject-matter is a concealment of dutiable goods, with intent to avoid payment of the legal duties thereon, or some other fraudulent intent. Whether this be done by the master alone, or by him in combination with the consignee, the revenue is endangered. Congress might have provided that the forfeiture should not be inflicted unless the time had passed for the consignee to make entry of them. But this would have put it in the power of the consignee to avail of the concealment, and smuggle the goods, if opportunity should offer, after arrival, and before the expiration of the fifteen days allowed for their entry; and to enter them, and escape all punishment, if he should find he could not profit by the concealment. In other words, it would not have punished the mere concealment, which it was the manifest purpose of this section to prevent. So far from providing that there must not only be a concealment, but the time must have arrived for the consignee to act, this section sets up a different standard. It requires, to escape a forfeiture on account of concealment, that the duties should have been actually paid, or secured to be paid. Nothing short of this is sufficient; and this is inconsistent with the construction contended for by the claimants, when they insist that it is enough that the time had not arrived to enter the goods.

The argument derived from the alleged injustice of punishing the owner of the property for an act which he neither practised nor consented to, has been often addressed to the courts of the United States in similar cases, but has never induced them to insert in a law a substantive requirement which it did not contain.

It was pressed on Chief Justice Marshall in U. S. v. The Little Charles [Case No. 15,612], which was a libel for a forfeiture under the embargo laws. The answer he made was: "This is not a proceeding against the owner; it is a proceeding against the vessel, for an offence committed by the vessel; which is not the less an offence, and does not the less subject her to forfeiture, because it was committed without the authority and against the will of the owner." So in the case of The Malek Adhel, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 233, which was a libel to enforce a forfeiture on account of piratical aggression, the question was made whether the innocence of the owners could withdraw the ship from the penalty of confiscation under the act of congress; and, upon the ground that the act made no exception whether the aggression be with or without the co-operation of the owner; and that it was not uncommon, in cases under the revenue and other laws, to treat the acts of the master and crew as binding the interest of the owner, it was held that no co-operation by him need be shown. And though in that case the cargo was held exempt, it was because the act did not, by its terms, exact its forfeiture. (See also the other cases therein referred to.) Revenue laws should be so construed as effectually to prevent the mischief which they were designed to prohibit. Taylor v. U. S., 3 How. [44 U. S.] 197. To require the co-operation of the owner in concealing the property to be shown, would leave a wide opening for fraud. No doubt cases of hardship may possibly occur; but they are provided for by the power to remit the forfeiture, lodged with the secretary of the treasury.

I think I ought to say further that in this particular case, though the consignees may be entirely innocent, yet in the actual state of the proofs before me, the burthen of proof is upon them, and they have failed to support that burthen. Under the seventy-first section of the collection act, where probable cause for the prosecution is shown to the court, the burthen is on the claimant. Here the goods were not only found concealed under such circumstances as tended very strongly to show an intention to evade payment of duties, but they were imported without any invoice, bill of lading, or consular certificate, the absence of which directly implicates the owners of the goods, and affords a strong prima facie case of an intent to smuggle them, and this is not met by evidence on their part.

The decree of the district court is affirmed, with costs.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY-FOUR BARRELS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

District Court, E. D. New York. April, 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—REMOVAL OF SPIRITS—FALSE BONDS—MIXTURE—FORFEITURE.

In the case of the United States against Fifty-Four Barrels of Distilled Spirits, tried before BENEDICT, District Judge, in the E. D. New York, the spirits were seized on a charge of having been removed on false bonds in June, 1867, from the bonded warehouse No. 72 Walker street to the rectifying establishment of William Krone, whence they were taken to New York and sold instead of being returned to the warehouse, as the bond required. This action was brought to condemn the property as forfeited for the use of the government. It was shown by the evidence that Krone had received for redistillation 200 barrels on fraudulent bonds and thirty-four barrels on which the tax had been paid; that the two lots were mixed, and that from this mixture the spirits in court were drawn off. Held, that the payment of the tax on all the spirits not having been proven, there being a mixture of fraudulent spirits with spirits that had paid the tax, the whole lot was legally forfeited to the use of the government, and directed a verdict accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY-ONE DOZEN PIECES OF MERCHANDISE.

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1864.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — FORFEITURE — HOW FEES PAID OUT OF PROCEEDS.

At law.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, ruled that in cases of sales of property declared forfeit for breach of the revenue laws of the United States, under Act 1799, c. 22, § 90 (1 Stat. 696), the marshal is to pay into the registry of the court the gross proceeds of the sale, less the expenses attending the sale, and that the marshal's commissions for the sale of property and collecting and paying over the proceeds form part of the expenses so to be deducted, and that all other fees, charges, and expenses, whether of the marshal or any other officer or person, for services not relating to the sale, are to be paid by an order of the court from the proceeds after they are paid into the registry. The practice in prize causes is different, by virtue of the acts of 1862 and 1864. Act 1862, c. 50, § 4 (12 Stat. 375); Act 1864, c. 174, § 8 (13 Stat. 308). In prize sales, the marshal deposits the gross proceeds with the assistant treasurer, subject to the order of the court; and all costs and charges, whether of the sale or otherwise, are paid by order of the court on the assistant treasurer.

Case No. 15,095.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY-SIX BARRELS OF WHISKEY.

[1 Abb. U. S. 93; [1] 6 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 32; 4 Int. Rev. Rec. 106.]

District Court, D. Kentucky. July Term, 1866.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FORFEITURES — INNOCENT PURCHASER—ADMIXTURE.

1. A bona fide purchaser of personal property, which has been forfeited to the government by previous acts of the former owner, is not protected against the title of the government. The right of the government founded on the forfeiture must prevail over any title acquired by purchase subsequent to the forfeiture.

[Cited in U. S. v. Seventy-Six Thousand One Hundred and Twenty-Five Cigars, 18 Fed. 150.]

2. The general rule in respect to the time when a forfeiture takes effect, is, that when a statute denounces a forfeiture of property as the punishment of a violation of law, if the denunciation is expressed in direct terms and not in the alternative, the forfeiture takes place at the time when the offense is committed, and operates at that time as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government.

[Cited in U. S. v. Sixty-Four Barrels Distilled Spirits, Case No. 16,306; U. S. v. One Copper Still, Id. 15,928; Heidritter v. Elizabeth Oil-Cloth Co., 6 Fed. 141.]

3. No distinction exists, in this respect, between the operation of a statute which declares that, for a specified offense, the property designated shall be forfeited, and one which declares that the offender shall forfeit the property.

4. Where one who has purchased property,—such as spirits,—which had been previously forfeited to the government, has mixed it (although in good faith) with other property free from forfeiture, so that it can no longer be identified, the courts, in enforcing the forfeiture, can not make any division of the aggregate between the claimant and the government. All the forfeited property must be delivered to the government; and if this, by reason of the admixture, necessitates the delivery of the other, the claimant must bear the loss.

Trial of an information.

This was an information filed against fifty-six barrels of whiskey, and certain stills and other vessels, for a violation of section 68 of the internal revenue act of 1864 [13 Stat. 248]. The information contained two counts. The first count alleged, in substance, that one William E. Reed was the owner of the stills and other vessels in question, and used the same in the distillation of spirits continuously from September, 1865, until the seizure, and that he had used said stills and vessels in the distillation of the fifty-six barrels of whiskey seized; but he did not, from day to day, make, or cause to be made, in a book kept for that purpose, a true and exact entry of the number of gallons so distilled, or of the number sold or removed for consumption or sale. The second count alleged that Reed did not render to the assessor, or to the assistant assessor, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each and every month, or within five days thereafter, or on the first day of each month, an account in duplicate, taken from his books, of the number of gallons of spirits distilled, or the number sold or removed for consumption or sale. Twenty-two of the barrels seized were claimed by William H. Walker & Co., three were claimed by Gheens & Co., and the remaining thirty-one, together with the stills and other vessels, not having been claimed by any one, were condemned by default. The claimants filed separate answers, but the defense of each was substantially the same. Both denied every substantial allegation contained in the information, and both alleged that they purchased the whiskey claimed by them respectively before the seizure, bona fide, and that they paid for the same a full and fair consideration, without any knowledge or suspicion of the alleged forfeiture, or cause of forfeiture. They also both alleged, substantially, that the whiskey was, at the time of the purchase, regularly and legally branded by plaintiffs' inspector. The case was, by agreement of parties, submitted to the court upon the law and facts, a jury being waived.

BALLARD, District Judge. I shall neither state nor discuss the facts proven. My conclusion in respect to these is, that every substantial allegation of the information is true, and that no part of the matter set up in the answers, in support of the claims, is sustained by the evidence, except: (1) That the barrels of whiskey purchased by the claimants had been regularly branded by the United States inspector prior to the purchase. (2) That the claimants are bona fide purchasers, without any notice of, or cause to suspect, the alleged forfeiture.

These facts present the following questions for my decision, to wit: First. Does the information set forth a good cause of forfeiture? Second. Have the claimants supported their claims?—that is, do the facts alleged and proven by them constitute any reason why the forfeiture should not be enforced?

Sections 57 and 68 of the internal revenue act furnish a complete answer to the first question. Section 57 makes it the duty of "every person who shall be the owner of any still, boiler, or other vessel used * * * for the purpose of distilling spirituous liquors * * * and of every person who shall use any still, boiler, or other vessel as aforesaid, either as owner, agent, or otherwise, from day to day, to make a true and exact entry, or cause to be entered in a book kept for that purpose, the number of gallons of spirits distilled * * * and also the number sold or removed for consumption or sale."

The first count, we have seen, alleges a neglect of the duty here enjoined. This section also provides, that every such person, if he distill one hundred and fifty barrels of spirits per year, or more, shall render the assessor, or assistant assessor, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each and every month in each year, or within five days thereafter, an account in duplicate, taken from his books, of the number of gallons of spirits distilled, and also the number of gallons sold or removed for consumption or sale, and that he shall pay the taxes on such spirits at the time of rendering the duplicate account thereof. If he distill less than one hundred and fifty barrels per year, he may make his returns and pay duties on the first day of every month.

The second count of the information avers a neglect of this duty. Section 68 provides "That the owner, agent, or superintendent of any * * * still, boiler, or other vessels used in the distillation of spirits, on which a duty is payable, who shall neglect or refuse to make true and exact entry of the same, or to do, or cause to be done, any of the things by law required to be done as aforesaid, shall forfeit, for every such neglect or refusal, all the * * * spirits made by or for him * * * and the stills, boilers, and other vessels used in distillation, together with the sum of five hundred dollars * * * which said spirits, with the vessels containing the same, with all the vessels used in making the same, may be seized by any collector or deputy collector of internal duties, and held by him until a decision shall be had thereon, according to law. * * * And the proceeding to enforce said forfeiture of said property shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem." It is manifest that the information does, in apt form and in apt language, set forth neglects of duty for which a forfeiture is denounced by the express terms of this section. This is conceded by the learned counsel of the claimants. They admit that the property seized must be condemned as forfeited if the facts established by the claimants are not sufficient to show that, as to the property claimed by them, there never was any forfeiture.

In respect to the first fact established by the claimants, that is, that the barrels were regularly branded by the United States inspector before they purchased, it is clear that it furnishes no answer to any thing alleged in the information. Besides the duties which are enjoined by section 57, the neglect of which is alleged in the information, section 59 requires, "That all spirits distilled as aforesaid by any person licensed as aforesaid shall, before the same are used or removed for any purpose, be inspected, gauged, and proved by some inspector appointed for the performance of such duties." If the information had alleged a removal of the spirits distilled before inspection, the fact that the barrels were branded before removal would have been material. It, however, not only furnishes no answer to the charges set out in the information, that no entry was made from day to day, in a book kept for that purpose, of the number of gallons of spirits distilled, or the number removed for consumption or sale, and that no return was made to the assessor, such as is required by law, but it has not the slightest relation to either of them. This is conceded by the claimants. They do not rely on this fact as precluding a condemnation. They treat it simply as one of the facts which show that the claimants acted in good faith and are bona fide purchasers; and, as I have already announced that I am satisfied, upon the whole case, that the claimants are such purchasers, it is wholly immaterial for me to state what influence I have given to this single fact in arriving at the more general conclusion of the good faith of the claimants. If the barrels had not been branded by an inspector this would have been a most material fact, if an effort had been made to show bad faith; but no such effort has been made. That the claimants were innocent purchasers is established, and is not, in fact, contested by the United States, and, therefore, the fact of the barrels being branded is entitled to no consideration whatever.

This brings me to the consideration of the main question in the case: Does the fact that the claimants purchased the whiskey claimed by them bona fide, and without any knowledge or suspicion of the alleged cause of forfeiture, preclude a judgment of condemnation? This is a very important question, whether it be considered in reference to the citizen or to the government. It has been argued before me with great ability, and I have bestowed upon it much reflection. The general law of property is, that the true owner may recover it of any one who has it in possession, no matter whether the possessor be a bona fide purchaser or not. The law which protects bona fide holders of bills of exchange and other negotiable paper has no relation to property generally. Every purchaser of merchandise or other property risks, in a certain sense, the title of his vendor, and, if it turns out that his vendor has no title and the property be recovered of him, he has no remedy except on the warranty of the vendor. It follows that, if when Walker & Co. and Gheens & Co. purchased the whiskey claimed by them their vendor had no title—that is, if it had already been forfeited to the United States, the fact that they are bona fide purchasers cannot avail them. Their good faith cannot oust the claim of the true owner. They are exactly in the condition of every bona fide purchaser of property whose title fails and who is therefore obliged to surrender it to the owner. They must look to the warranty of their vendor.

Indeed, I have difficulty in perceiving that the bona fides of the purchase is at all material, or that it has any relation to the grounds of forfeiture alleged in the information. If the forfeiture took place prior to their purchase, it is undisputed and indisputable that the right of property was immediately transferred to the United States, and that the right of the latter must prevail over that of the purchaser, notwithstanding the purchase was made in good faith. The right of the United States in such case depends not at all on the conduct of the purchaser, but upon their own superior title, resulting from a forfeiture which took place prior to any inception of right in the purchaser. If there was no forfeiture prior to the acquisition of right by the claimants, whether the right was acquired by purchase for a valuable consideration or by gift, I am at a loss to conceive how there was any forfeiture at all. I cannot see how property, whether acquired by gift or purchase, can be condemned as forfeited for the offense of its former owner, which was not already forfeited at the time of the gift or purchase. If the acquisition be by pretended gift or pretended purchase, in such sense that the title is not changed, but really remains in the first owner, then, of course, his offense committed after the pretended gift or sale may work a forfeiture. But neither the internal revenue act nor any other act of congress forfeits property for the crime of a person which does not belong to him, or is not managed by him at the time of the forfeiture. Property is sometimes forfeited in consequence of the act of some person who manages or controls it other than the owner; but the forfeiture does not extend to property previously managed or controlled, and which, before being contaminated with the offense, is sold or otherwise parted with in good faith.

The question then comes to this: When does the forfeiture denounced by section 68 take place? Does it take place at the time the offense is committed, or at some subsequent time? The decisions are uniform, both in England and the United States, that when a statute denounces a forfeiture of property as the penalty for the commission of crime, if the denunciation is in direct terms, and not in the alternative, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offense is committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government. Robert v. Witherhead, 12 Mod. 92; 1 Salk. 223; Wilkins v. Despard, 5 Term R. 112; U. S. v. Nineteen Hundred and Sixty Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch, [12 U. S.] 398; The Mars, Id. 417; Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311; Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 362; Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 381.

The case of United States v. Nineteen Hundred and Sixty Bags of Coffee arose under section 5 of the nonintercourse act of March, 1809 (2 Stat. 529), which provides: "That whenever any article * * * the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall after May 20, be imported into the United States * * * or be put on board of any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with intention of importing the same into the United States * * * all such articles, as well as all other articles on board of the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage belonging to the owner of such prohibited article, shall be forfeited, and the owner shall, moreover, forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles." The claimants made precisely the same plea which Walker & Co. and Gheens & Co. make in this case; that is, they alleged that they were bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration. The case was most ably and elaborately argued; but the supreme court overruled the plea, and held that by the terms of the statute the forfeiture took place upon the commission of the offense, and the purchaser was not protected. It will be perceived that this statute does not fix the time at which the forfeiture is to take place in more explicit terms than does the statute under which the present case arises. The one declares that whenever any article shall be imported it shall be forfeited, and that the owner shall forfeit other property; and the other declares that the owner, agent, or superintendent, &c. * * * who shall neglect to make true and exact entry and report, or to do any of the things required by law, shall forfeit, &c. If the forfeiture under the act of 1809 takes place at the time of the commission of the offense, so as to override the title of all subsequent purchasers, and this, we have seen, the supreme court have expressly decided, I can conceive of no argument which would not refer the forfeiture under the act of 1864 to the same time, or which would not invest the forfeiture with the same consequences.

The case of Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311, involved a construction of the neutrality act of 1794 (1 Stat. 383), the third section of which declares a forfeiture of vessels fitted out and armed to be employed in the service of a foreign state in committing hostilities against the citizens, subjects, or property of another foreign state with whom the United States are at peace. The court say "the forfeiture must be deemed to attach at the moment of the commission of the offense, and consequently from that moment the title of the plaintiff would be completely divested, so that he could maintain no action for the subsequent seizure. This is the doctrine of the English courts, and it has been recognized and enforced in this court upon very solemn argument."

The case of Caldwell v. U. S. involved, in part, the construction of sections 66 and 68 of the collection act of 1799 (1 Stat. 677), the latter of which declares a forfeiture in the alternative, that is, of the goods or their value, and the former declares it without any alternative. The inferior court had instructed the jury, "that if the goods were fraudulently entered, it is no matter in whose possession they were when seized, or whether the United States had made an election between the penalties, and that the forfeiture took place when the fraud, if any, was committed, and the seller of the goods could convey no title of the goods to the purchaser." The supreme court say: "This instruction is partly right and partly wrong—right in respect to section 68, as the penalty is a forfeiture of the goods without an alternative of their value; wrong, as the instruction applies to section 66, the forfeiture under it being 'either the goods or their value.' In the first, the forfeiture is the statutory transfer of right to the goods at the time the offense is committed. If this was not so, the transgressor, against whom, of course, the penalty is directed, would often escape punishment, and triumph in the cleverness of his contrivance by which he has violated the law. The title of the United States to the goods forfeited is not consummated until after judicial condemnation, but the right to them relates backwards to the time the offense was committed, so as to avoid all intermediate sales of them between the commission of the offense and the condemnation. So this court said in the case of U. S. v. Nineteen Hundred and Sixty Bags of Coffee, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 398. It was said again in the case of U. S. v. The Mars, Id. 417; declared again, four years afterwards, in Gelston v. Hoyt, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 311, in these words: 'The forfeiture must be deemed to attach at the moment the offense is committed, so as to avoid all sales afterwards.' "

There is, we have seen, no alternative in section 68 of the internal revenue act of 1864. The forfeiture of the spirits, stills, boilers, and other vessels used in distillation, is by it directly declared. Its construction is, therefore, fixed by the decisions to which I have referred, almost as certainly and conclusively as if its provisions had been the direct subject of adjudication. The conclusion to my mind, then, is irresistible, that the forfeiture denounced by this section, to use the language of the supreme court, "takes place at the time of the commission of the offense, so as to avoid all sales afterwards."

It is just to the learned counsel of the claimants to say, that they concede this would be the correct construction of the section if it had, in so many words, declared that the spirits, &c., should be forfeited. They say that the statute does not declare that the spirits, &c., shall be forfeited, but that the owner, agent, or superintendent shall forfeit them, and that this difference of language requires a difference of construction. Their argument is extremely refined, and is difficult to state. If I understood them, they contend that there is a difference between the construction of a statute which denounces a forfeiture of specific property as the penalty of an offense, and one which declares that the offender shall forfeit it. In the first case they concede that the forfeiture takes place at the time of the commission of the offense, whilst in the latter they insist it does not take place until seizure, conviction, or judgment. No adjudged case or other authority has been cited in support of this distinction, and I am unable to conceive any good reason for upholding it. What ground is there for referring the forfeiture to the time of seizure? There must have been a previous forfeiture to authorize a seizure. The seizure is the consequence of the forfeiture, not the cause. Nor do I see any reason for referring the forfeiture to the time of conviction or judgment. The conviction and the judgment are simply the consummation of the proceeding that the law requires to be instituted to ascertain the fact or forfeiture of which the seizure is the beginning.

If the statute made the forfeiture the consequence of the personal conviction of the offender, in which case there is no seizure, or if it even required a personal trial and conviction to precede judgment of forfeiture, there might be some force in the argument of the learned counsel founded on forfeitures at common law in cases of treason and felony. I admit that, at common law, there was no forfeiture of the goods and chattels of a felon until he was convicted; but under that law, no penalty whatever could be inflicted for the crime of felony except in cases of suicide, flight, and perhaps a few other analogous cases, until after the personal conviction of the offender, and in the excepted cases the forfeiture related to the time of the offense. When the felon was convicted, death was the penalty, and judgment of death followed. A forfeiture of goods and chattels was a consequence of the conviction, and a forfeiture of real estate a consequence of the judgment; but forfeiture was no part of the judgment. Here, however, we are not trying the offender at all, or if at all, only incidentally. He is not personally before the court, and cannot in this proceeding be convicted. The statutes under which we are proceeding do not make the forfeiture the consequence of his conviction, but of his offense, which offense it authorizes to be inquired into by a seizure of, and a proceeding against, the property itself. Having ascertained that offenses were committed, I cannot in this proceeding render any judgment against the offender; I can only render a judgment of condemnation of property, which judgment is merely the judicial ascertainment of the fact that the property was previously forfeited.

When a statute declares that an offender shall forfeit property as the penalty of his offense, and authorizes a proceeding in rem to ascertain the forfeiture, I am satisfied that the forfeiture takes place at the time of the commission of the offense just as certainly as it does when the statute directs, not that the offender shall forfeit, but that the property itself shall be forfeited. There is a difference between common law and statutory forfeitures. Common law forfeitures, except in cases of deodand, suicide, flight, and perhaps a few others, were the consequence of conviction, or of judgment against the felon, and followed his personal trial; but statutory forfeitures are usually enforced by proceeding against the thing, and relate to the time of the commission of the offense. This distinction is recognized by the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 337, and other cases. They say: "When the forfeiture is given by statute, the rules of the common law may be dispensed with, and the thing forfeited may either vest immediately or on the performance of some particular act, as shall be the will of the legislature." When there is no alternative in the statute, when it directly declares a forfeiture, and no time subsequent to the committing of the crime is named at which the forfeiture is to take effect, the settled rule, we have seen, is, that it relates to the time of the commission of the offense.

Whether the statute declares a forfeiture of property as the consequence of crime, or that the person who committed the crime shall forfeit it, the effect is the same. In either case the immediate loss falls on the owner. Whether the forfeiture is in consequence of his own unlawful act, or of the unlawful act of some other person, respecting the thing forfeited, the loss is still his, and his only. It is he who in fact forfeits or loses, no matter in what language the forfeiture is declared. By the terms of the statute we are now considering, the agent or superintendent who uses stills, boilers, or other vessels in the distillation of spirits, and who neglects to do the things enjoined by law, forfeits as well as the owner. But the agent is not owner, and literally he cannot forfeit what he does not own. He may cause its forfeiture by his unlawful act, but he cannot lose what is not his. Therefore, when the statute declares that the agent or superintendent shall forfeit the stills, boilers, and other vessels, it must be understood to mean that these articles shall be forfeited in consequence of his neglect of duty. And if this be its meaning, even the learned counsel of the claimants would concede, that the consequence and effect of the forfeiture are that the title to the thing forfeited passes instantly upon the commission of the offense.

I observe that the learned judge of the Eastern district of Missouri treats section 68 as if it read, that the owner of the spirits shall forfeit them. And on this reasoning he seems to have founded his conclusion that the owner does not forfeit what he sells before seizure. He says: "That as 'the owner,' &c., shall forfeit, and not the purchaser, the owner can forfeit only what belongs to him." It may be conceded that the owner can forfeit only what belongs to him, but I do not see that this helps the argument; for if the forfeiture takes place, as I have shown it does, at the time the offense is committed, it is not necessary to claim that he forfeits more than what then belongs to him. If he forfeits that, the title of the United States immediately takes effect and prevails over that of all purchasers. U. S. v Three Hundred and Ninety-Six Barrels [Case No. 16,503]. An attentive examination of the section, however, will show that, by its terms, it is not the owner of the spirits, but the owner, agent, or superintendent of the stills, boilers, or other vessels in the distillation of spirits, who forfeits. It is the neglect to perform a prescribed duty by any one who uses stills, boilers, or other vessels in the distillation of spirits, whether as owner, or simply as agent or superintendent, which produces the forfeiture; and what are forfeited are the stills, boilers, and other vessels and spirits made by or for him. If the agent forfeits only what "belongs to him," he forfeits nothing, for the stills, boilers, and other vessels and spirits do not belong to him. They belong to the principal. But the statute says the agent who neglects, &c., shall forfeit these things, and there are no means of escaping a provision so express. The statute, then, must mean that these things shall be forfeited for the agent's neglect, or as to him it is inoperative, and has no meaning at all. And if they are forfeited for his neglect, surely the forfeiture takes effect the moment of neglect. There is no other period to which it can possibly be referred.

I have great respect for the opinions of the learned judge who decided the case of U. S. v. Three Hundred and Ninety-Six Barrels, above referred to. I have not ventured to differ from him until after the fullest consideration and the clearest conviction. I cannot but think his decision is based on a misreading of the statute, as well as on a misconception of adjudged cases. The conclusion to which I have arrived is, I think, sustained by an opinion of the learned judge of the Southern district of Ohio, in the case of U. S. v. Sixteen Hogsheads of Tobacco [Case No. 16,302], and by the uniform decisions of the supreme court of the United States; and I have not a doubt of its correctness.

I need not say that I have arrived at my conclusion reluctantly. I have examined every provision of the statute; I have attentively considered section 180, and every section which declares a forfeiture, and I think that the provisions of each and all of them confirm the construction of section 68 which is here adopted. It would be a much more pleasing task for me to order a restoration of the property seized to the innocent claimants than to adjudge its condemnation, if I could do so consistently with my sense of duty. I have been literally forced to a decision in spite of my personal inclination by a current of authorities which is irresistible. Judgment of condemnation must be entered.

The counsel of Walker & Co., however, ask that the judgment be limited to nineteen of the barrels claimed by them, and that the other three seized in their possession be restored. This motion is based on the following state of facts: The twenty-two barrels of spirits claimed by Walker & Co. are part of a lot of thirty-seven barrels purchased at the same time. Only thirty-two of the barrels were distilled by William E. Reed, mentioned in the information. Five were distilled by some one else; and as to them, there is neither proof nor allegation that there was any violation of law. If these five barrels remained and could be identified as among those seized, they would be restored, of course. But Walker & Co. mixed the whole thirty-seven barrels together in the process of rectifying, and, after rebarreling and selling a portion of the compound, the twenty-two barrels seized remain, so that it is now impossible to identify any of the spirits which were not distilled by William E. Reed. It is possible, and perhaps probable, that five thirty-seventh parts of the twenty-two barrels, or about three barrels in quantity, were not distilled by him. But it cannot be alleged, with absolute certainty, that any part of the five barrels remain. All that can be said is, that it is probable. And if any part of them remain, it is, of course, impossible to separate that part from the rest. If, then, I restore to Walker & Co. three barrels, those barrels will contain some whiskey which has been forfeited, and therefore belongs to the United States. I have no right thus to dispose of the property of the United States. I have no right to make an equitable division between them and the claimants. I am obliged to give to the United States all the spirits which are shown to be theirs. If the claimants, by mixing their own whiskey with that of the United States, have rendered it impossible to identify theirs, they must suffer the consequences of their own act. They made the mixture, it is true, in perfectly good faith, in the regular exercise of their trade and business, and believing that the whole of the whiskey belonged to them; still, by their act they have put it out of their power to give to the United States only what belongs to them. They are obliged, by force of a well known rule of law, to surrender to the plaintiffs all that belongs to them; although in so doing they may be obliged to give up some that belongs to themselves. If one intermixes his goods with those of another, without his knowledge or consent, so that they cannot be identified, the law does not allow him any remedy; but gives the entire property, without any account, to him whose original dominion or property is invaded. 2 Bl. Comm. 405. The order of condemnation must, therefore, include the whole of the thirty-two barrels. Nor does this decision work in this case any real hardship. The United States are actually entitled to thirty-two barrels of the whiskey purchased by Walker & Co. They claim in this suit only twenty-one, leaving with Walker & Co. ten, or the proceeds of ten, which are not claimed, and may never be claimed.

In concluding this opinion, I adopt what the supreme court of the United States said in announcing their decision in a similar case: "It is true that cases of hardship and even absurdity may be supposed to grow out of this decision; but, on the other hand, if, by a sale, it is put in the power of an offender to purge a forfeiture, a state of things not less absurd will certainly result from it. When hardships shall arise, provision is made by law for affording relief under authority much more competent to decide on such cases than this court ever can be. In the eternal struggle that exists between the avarice, enterprise, and combination of individuals on the one hand, and the power charged with the administration of the law on the other, severe laws are rendered necessary to enable the executive to carry into effect the measures of policy adopted by the legislature."

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY THOUSAND CIGARS.

[See Case No. 4,782.]

Case No. 15,097.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY-THREE BALES OF RAGS.

[19 Alb. Law J. 60.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan. 7, 1879.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURE—CLAIM OF RAILROAD FOR FREIGHTAGE.

The case of the United States against Fifty-Three Bales of Rags, decided by the United States district court for Massachusetts, was an information under Rev. St. § 3082, against certain bales of rags as having been clandestinely imported and brought from Montreal into some part of the state of New York without having been entered at the custom house and without payment of duties. The jury found most of the goods to be liable to forfeiture, and they were condemned and sold. The Boston & Lowell Railroad Company, from whose custody the goods were taken by the marshal, petitioned for the payment of $47.36 from the proceeds of the sale. This was claimed to be freight due for the transportation of the goods to Boston by the petitioners and connecting roads, all of whom were entirely innocent of the fraud on the government.

THE COURT held that smuggled goods were absolutely forfeited, and no intervening rights even of a bona fide purchaser could prevail against the title of the government which relates back to the illegal act. The goods were, at the time of their transportation, the property of the United States, and by the common law a carrier has no lien as against the true owner for the carriage of goods intrusted to him by one who had no authority to contract for the service.

Case No. 15,098.

UNITED STATES v. FIFTY-THREE BOXES OF HAVANA SUGAR.

UNITED STATES v. TWENTY-NINE AND ONE-HALF BOXES OF SUGAR.

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1870.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — UNDERVALUATION — SUGARS — FALSE GRADE—FALSE ENTRY—SMUGGLING —INNOCENT PURCHASER.

1. The consignee of goods, wares, or merchandise subject to duty, imported into the United States at an alleged fraudulent undervaluation, who has no knowledge of such fraud, and who, in good faith, makes advances to the consignor, and incurs expenses in the storage and management of the property, occupies the position of a bona fide purchaser, and his title will be protected.

2. A bona fide purchaser of such property, before the United States has elected whether to proceed for a forfeiture or sue for the value of the property, will hold the same as against the government claiming a forfeiture for fraud in the importation.

3. The fraudulent entry of goods at less than their actual value subjects them to forfeiture under section 1 of the act of congress of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 737], but that section, to constitute such a fraudulent entry as will subject the goods to forfeiture, requires that the entry should have been knowingly made on a false invoice.

4. Where the United States claim the forfeiture of sugars, on the ground that they were entered as of a grade which subjected them to a duty of three cents per pound, when they were of a grade subjecting them to five cents per pound, it must appear, by the evidence, that the importer had knowledge of the false grade, and that a fraud was intended; and, if this guilty knowledge and intent are negatived by the evidence, there is no ground for a judgment of forfeiture.

5. The entry of property at a custom-house, at a false valuation, does not subject it to forfeiture under section 4 of the act of July, 1866 [14 Stat. 179], "to prevent smuggling, and other purposes;" the scope and intent of said section being to prevent the clandestine introduction of property into the United States, to evade the payment of duties, known as smuggling, in the accepted sense of that term; and does not apply to a false entry at a custom-house.

King, Thompson & Avery and Collins & Herron, for claimants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. As these cases present substantially the same questions, they have been submitted together, and do not require a separate consideration. In the first named of these cases, one hundred and twenty-three boxes of sugar were seized, by order of the collector, at Cincinnati, as having been imported in violation of law. An information was filed in this court, claiming the condemnation of this sugar. James H. Laws & Co., of this city, intervened in the case, and filed a claim to seventy of the one hundred and twenty-three boxes of sugar as bona fide purchasers; and, upon the hearing of the case, it appearing that they had purchased the sugar in open market, without any knowledge or intimation of any fraud in the importation, and before any seizure or other proceeding by the United States for the condemnation of the sugar or the recovery of its value, it was decided by this court, without any reference to the question of fraud, that the claim of Laws & Co., as innocent purchasers, was sustained, and the seventy boxes were accordingly awarded to them. On an appeal to the circuit court, the judgment of this court was affirmed. [Case unreported.] The claim of the United States is now against fifty-three of the one hundred and twenty-three boxes, in one case; and in the other, against twenty-nine and one-half boxes, being a part of another consignment also seized by order of the collector. These lots are separately proceeded against by the government as forfeited. And the question in both cases is, whether the alleged grounds of forfeiture are sustained. The ground of forfeiture relied upon by the United States, in both cases, is, in substance, that the sugar was imported from Havana, in the Island of Cuba, and entered at the custom-house at New Orleans, upon a false and fraudulent invoice and entry, in which the grade or quality of the sugar, being subject to a specific duty, was described as not above No. 12, Dutch standard; whereas its true grade or quality, by such standard, was 20 or upward. As the result of this false classification of the sugar, it is alleged the government was defrauded of two cents duty on every pound of the sugar. The information, in both cases, alleges that the sugar in question is forfeited to the United States—First, as being invoiced and entered in violation of section 1 of the act of congress of March 3, 1863; and, second, as subject to forfeiture under section 4 of the act of July 8, 1866. Adolphus Wood & Co., Cincinnati, have intervened in the first case named, and assert a lien on the fifty-three boxes, on the ground that the sugar was consigned to them, as commission merchants at Cincinnati, for sale, by the house of F. W. Perkins & Co., of New Orleans, and that in good faith, without any knowledge of any fraud in its importation, or any reason to suspect fraud, they received the sugar, made large advances to the consignors upon it, and have also a claim for commission, storage, and other charges.

Before passing to the consideration of the question of fraud, it may be proper to remark here that there can be no question that the lien asserted by Wood & Co. is equitable and valid, and must be sustained unless it shall be held that the sugar is subject to forfeiture, as claimed under section 4 of the act of July 8, 1866. In that case the forfeiture, by operation of law, must be held to have occurred at the time the fraud was committed, and the asserted lien of Wood & Co. would not be available. On the other hand, if the court find there was fraud in the importation, and a ground of forfeiture under section 1 of the act of 1863, their claim must be sustained. They must be viewed as before the court in the light of innocent purchasers, and entitled to indemnity for their advances, commissions, etc., on the same principles that innocent purchasers would be entitled to protection. Their rights will therefore be dependent on the decision of a question hereafter to be considered. Perkins & Co. have filed answers in both the cases submitted, claiming the ownership of the sugar in question, asserting their claim as such, denying the fraud charged, or any knowledge of or participation in any fraud in the importation and entry of the sugar at the custom-house. The first question for consideration is, whether the allegation of fraud is proved, and whether, as a legal result, the sugar is subject to forfeiture. The questions arising in the cases have been ably argued, and are not, perhaps, wholly free from doubt.

If the sole question were whether this sugar paid the full duty imposed by law, I should not entertain any doubt. The evidence, I think, proves it was of a grade subjecting it by law to a duty of five cents per pound, whereas but three cents per pound was paid. It is true the evidence shows that a part of the two hundred and fifty-five boxes, of which the sugar in controversy was a part, was of a very low grade (No. 12), but what proportion was of this low grade does not appear. It was also proved that the sugar was graded by the custom-house officers, at New Orleans, according to a system of average then practiced there, and reported to the collector and the duty imposed as if it were of the minimum grade of No. 12, Dutch standard. While there are strong reasons for the conclusion that this average was erroneous, it is a proper inquiry whether the evidence so far implicates Perkins & Co. or Cavenna in any fraud in the entry of this sugar as will subject it to forfeiture under the law upon which the information is based.

This is the controlling question presented in this case. And, before adverting to the evidence, it will be proper to notice section 1 of the act of March 3, 1863, upon which the first charge in the information in both cases is framed. This section is of great length, very comprehensive, and very minute on the subject of the importation and entry of property from foreign countries. For the present purpose it will not be necessary to quote the entire section. It is clear, however, that the prevention of false and fraudulent invoices and entries of property, by undervaluation or false and fraudulent representations of quantities, quality, etc., is the prominent object of the section. After a minute specification of the legal requirements in the entry of property, it is provided "that if any owner, consignee, or agent of goods, wares, and merchandise, shall knowingly make or attempt to make an entry thereof, by means of any false invoice, * * * or any invoice which shall not contain a true statement of all the particulars hereinbefore required, * * * or any other false or fraudulent practice or appliance whatever, the property, or its value shall be forfeited." There is not, in my judgment, room for a doubt that the allegations of fraud in the invoice and entry of the sugar at a grade below the true grade, as charged in the information, brings the case within the scope of this provision. And as Perkins & Co., and Cavenna, are the only persons implicated in the alleged false invoice and entry, the question for the decision of the court is, whether the evidence sustains the charge as against them. The clause of the first section just referred to provides for a forfeiture as the penalty where the owner, consignee, or agent shall knowingly make an entry upon a false invoice. As Perkins & Co., and John L. Cavenna, were the only persons interested in the sugar, and the only persons connected with the invoice and entry, the inquiry is, whether they jointly or by collusion, or either of them, knowingly participated in the alleged fraud; in other words, whether they had a guilty knowledge that a fraud was perpetrated or intended. It is clearly incumbent on the government, in order to establish its right to a forfeiture, to bring the knowledge home to the parties charged with the fraud, as the basis of a judgment of forfeiture. It is clearly not enough for the government to prove that the sugar was entered upon an erroneous grade, and the duty paid less than that imposed by law. The fraudulent intent must also appear; and such intent must be fairly inferable from the facts proved, and can not rest upon mere suspicion.

The facts relied upon by the government to sustain the charge of fraud are the entry of the sugar at an erroneous grade, the supposed fraudulent collusion between Cavenna and Perkins & Co., and some circumstances connected with the disposition and sale of the sugar by that firm, as indicating their knowledge of the alleged fraud. Now it was undoubtedly competent for Perkins & Co., as the owners of the sugar, to adduce proof in rebuttal and explanation of the facts proved by the government, and thus to repel the charge of fraud. This they have done with a view to relieve themselves from any presumption of any fraudulent intent, or any knowledge of any fraud in the transaction.

I shall advert only to some of the material facts proved, bearing on this question. These facts are before the court, chiefly from the depositions of J. L. Cavenna and F. W. Perkins. From these it appears that in the latter part of March, 1869, Perkins & Co., at the request of Cavenna, addressed a letter to the house of Lawton Brothers, merchants at Havana, in which they say that Cavenna wishes, through them, to order two hundred and fifty boxes of grocery sugar; such as, on an average for the lot, would be about No. 12. They direct the Havana house to charge the sugar to their account, and to send the invoice to Cavenna. Lawton Brothers shipped the sugar pursuant to this order. Before its arrival at New Orleans, Cavenna, for reasons stated in his deposition, proposed to Perkins & Co. to become the purchasers of the sugar, to which they assented. The entry at the custom-house was, however, made by Cavenna in his name, Perkins & Co. advancing the funds to pay the duties. The sugar was entered as of a grade not exceeding No. 12, though Cavenna, in his deposition, says he had not examined the sugar, or seen any samples of the grades, but supposed it was of the grade and quality ordered. The usual forms at the custom-house were observed. The sugar was appraised and inspected, and a report made to the collector, who issued the necessary papers, and the sugar was withdrawn from the warehouse, and delivered to Perkins & Co., and by them shipped to Cincinnati, for sale. Both Cavenna and Perkins deny that there was any fraudulent collusion between them in the purchase of the sugar, or in the entry at the custom-house. They say, that supposing in good faith the sugar purchased was of the quality ordered, the entry was made as of a grade not exceeding No. 12. It appears, also, from the depositions of the custom-house officials, that the sugar was graded as not above that number, and that duty paid accordingly.

The question of the right of the government to the forfeiture claimed under section 1 of the act of 1863, seems to turn upon the credit to be given to Cavenna and F. B. Perkins as witnesses. And I am aware of no principle on which the court can arbitrarily pronounce them unworthy of credit, and wholly ignore their testimony. Cavenna has no interest in the event of these suits, and there is no proof of any fraudulent collusion between these parties in reference to this transaction. Perkins, though interested, is a competent witness, and unless proved to be unworthy of credit, his testimony can not be rejected. No attempt has been made by the government to impeach either Cavenna or Perkins, by evidence of bad reputation for veracity when under oath; and receiving their statements as credible, they disprove the allegation in the information that they, or either of them, knowingly, or as charged, with a fraudulent intent, caused the sugar to be invoiced and entered at the custom-house at a grade below the true grade. There are, undoubtedly, some reasons developed in the case, justifying the suspicion that there was a design to get the sugar through the custom-house upon a false invoice and entry. But it seems to the court that the transaction is explained by the evidence of Cavenna and Perkins, so as to relieve them from the charge of knowingly causing the entry to be made, as charged in the information. There was, obviously, a want of the care, vigilance, and exactness which may properly be looked for in such a transaction, but nothing that under the statute fixes the taint of fraud upon this sugar.

In this view of the case, the charge in the information, based on the act of 1863, is not sustained. The remaining question is, whether the case is within the operation of section 4 of the act of July, 1866. As noticed in a previous part of this opinion, the second charge in the information is framed under this section. It charges, in substance, that, by means of a fraudulent invoice and entry of the sugar, the full amount of the specific duty, imposed by law, was not paid, and that the said section 4 of the act of 1863 was violated, and the sugar subject to forfeiture under its operation. The question raised as to this charge in the information is, whether property imported, subject to duty, and entered at a custom-house, and which has passed under the scrutiny of the officers of the government, and has been delivered to the owner or consignee, without the payment of the full amount of duty chargeable, is an unlawful importation, within the meaning of said section 4, subjecting the property to forfeiture. Without quoting the section at length, it will be sufficient to notice that it provides that if any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States any goods, wares, or merchandise, contrary to law, a forfeiture shall be incurred; and, in addition, the offending party be subject to fine and imprisonment.

It is claimed by the district attorney that the entry of the sugar in question was fraudulent, and in violation of law, for the reason that the full amount of duty was not paid. I do not propose to discuss this question at length. The views of the court, as stated, seem to dispense with the necessity of this. It is clear that if, in the importation and entry of the property, there was no guilty knowledge of any fraud perpetrated or intended, the section referred to does not apply. And as, according to the views already stated, such guilty knowledge in these cases is not made out by the evidence, it is not within the terms of the section.

There is another objection to this second charge, namely, that the section was intended only to embrace the case of property brought into the country clandestinely, with the fraudulent purpose of evading the import duty, and does not apply where it is entered at a custom-house and the forms of law observed, but in respect to which a fraud is subsequently ascertained. In other words, that the section embraces only acts of smuggling, in the usual and accepted meaning of the word. The title of the act is, "An act to prevent smuggling," and this is significant of the intent of the statute, notwithstanding the addition of the words, "and other purposes," to the title. Terms and phrases occur in many sections of the statute, indicating clearly that congress had it specially in view to prevent the illicit introduction of dutiable goods, wares, and merchandise; and it may be suggested that one of the main objects leading to the enactment of this statute was to put a stop to smuggling along the extended lines dividing the United States from foreign coterminous countries on the north and southwest. Many of the phrases and terms indicate that overland smuggling was prominently in the minds of the legislators who passed the statute. The inference does not seem reasonable that congress intended to supersede or interfere with the prior provisions of law, for the prevention of frauds in the entry of taxable property at a custom-house at a false valuation, if subject to an ad valorem duty, or a false grade or classification when subject to a specific duty. This object had occupied the attention of congress from an early period of the government. Section 66 of the act of 1799 [1 Stat. 677], was full and stringent on this subject. The act of March, 1863, is more explicit and comprehensive in its requirements than the old statute, and seems to embrace every possible case of fraud in the entry of goods, wares, and merchandise at a custom-house. Without going more fully into the consideration of this subject, I can see no reason for the conclusion that it was intended by section 4 of the act of July, 1866, to change all the previous legislation on this subject, and to provide that any unlawful act committed in the entry of property, imported openly, and entered at a custom-house, and suffered to go into the market after the scrutiny and inspection of the proper officers as duty paid, is subject to forfeiture under the section referred to, upon the discovery that the entry was erroneous or fraudulent. Former legislation had fully provided for such a case, and there was clearly no necessity for anything additional on the subject. There are many other considerations that might be urged to sustain this construction of the section referred to, but I do not think it necessary to expand this opinion, already too long, by adverting to them.

The result of the views I have presented is: (1) That the lien asserted by Adolphus Wood & Co. on the fifty-three boxes is valid, and must be satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the sugar, now in the hands of the marshal. (2) That the grounds of forfeiture set forth by the government in the informations are sustained, and the sugar in both the cases submitted is not subject to forfeiture. The marshal will, within thirty days from this day, pay to Perkins & Co., or their attorney, the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the sugar, after deducting the amount due to Wood & Co., which amount, if not agreed upon by the counsel, shall be ascertained by a reference to a master.

In announcing the conclusion of the court, it is proper, perhaps, to suggest that, in my judgment, Perkins & Co. are justly indebted to the United States to the amount of two cents on the pound of the sugar in controversy, that being the deficiency in the duty paid, and that an action could be sustained against them for the recovery of this sum. But the court, in this proceeding has no authority to render judgment for that sum, or make an order directing the marshal to retain it out of the money in his hands. It will be for the district attorney to adopt such course in relation to it as he may think proper.

INTERNAL REVENUE—REPEAL OF STATUTE.

1. The provisions of section 2 of the act of March 31, 1868 [15 Stat. 59], which repeal sections 94 and 95 of the internal revenue law of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 264, 272], and acts amendatory thereof, do not operate to preserve prosecutions commenced but not carried to judgment before the repeal took effect.

2. Where the statute declaring an offense and its punishment is repealed, without a provision saving pending prosecutions, an indictment previously found, but not yet tried, should be quashed on motion. There is no longer an offense; and no one can be punished for what is not an offense at the time of punishment.

[Cited in U. S. v. Libby, Case No. 15,596; U. S. v. Barr, Id. 14,527.]

Motion to quash an indictment.

This was an indictment against John B. Finlay, for rendering false returns of manufactures of woolen goods. The facts of the case are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. Golden, Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Kerr, for the motion.

Mr. Baily, Mr. Carnahan, Dist. Atty., and Mr. Boggs, opposed.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. As both the government and the defendant are ready to proceed to trial, the brief space which has intervened since the argument has not afforded me time to elaborate an opinion upon the points submitted by the learned counsel for the defendant. It will be sufficient to state a few of the reasons for the conclusions at which I have arrived.

The defendant is indicted for making false returns of woolen manufactures, with intent to evade and defeat the assessment of taxes imposed by the internal revenue law. The taxes on woolen goods were assessed by virtue of section 94 of the act of March 2, 1867 [14 Stat. 474], which was amendatory of the act of June 30, 1864. By section 82 of this act of 1864, as amended, these returns were required to be made to the assessor of the district, and were required to be upon oath. By section 15, any person who shall deliver to the assessor any false or fraudulent return, shall, upon conviction, be subject to fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court; and by section 42, any person swearing falsely in any matter, where an oath is required under this act, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and be subject to the pains and penalties provided by the laws of the United States for such crime.

It is charged that from the month of June, 1867, to the month of March, 1868, inclusive, the defendant delivered, as true, false and fraudulent statements of the woolen goods sold and removed for consumption and use, which were manufactured by him, and upon which taxes were imposed by law. It is now moved to quash this bill, upon the ground that the act of congress upon which the defendant is indicted has been repealed by the act of March 31, 1868, exempting certain manufactures from internal revenue tax, and for other purposes. In considering this question, we are not driven to the necessity of inquiring whether this is a repeal by implication, or whether there is such a repugnance between the two acts that the former must give way to the latter. The repeal is in express terms, and without a saving clause as to offenses committed in violation of the repealed statute. Section 2 simply reserves the right to collect, under the old system, any tax which might accrue between the date of the passage of the act and April 1, 1868. Revenue bills are reported and discussed many months before their enactment into laws, and as by section 4 the first quarterly assessment under the new system was to be made in the month of July following, for the three months preceding, congress anticipated that there might be a hiatus or interval between the passage of the bill and April 1, to which neither law would apply, and therefore provided for it in this section. But there was no hiatus, for the act passed the day before, on March 31. This is the only provision in the act of 1868 that savors of a saving clause, and it is limited to taxes which may thus accrue. It can have no application here, for all those taxes had accrued before the passage of the bill.

What, then, are the provisions of the act of 1868? It declares that sections 94 and 95 of the acts of June 30, 1864, and all acts and parts of acts amendatory of said sections, be, and the same are hereby repealed. Section 4, in lieu of the tax of two and a half per cent. ad valorem, imposes a tax of two dollars per thousand on sales in excess of five thousand dollars, which shall be assessed and paid quarter-yearly, as other taxes are assessed and paid. This act is then a repeal and abolition of the tax and system of taxation upon woolen manufactures, which existed at the period when it is alleged this offense was committed. It is a repeal of the law under which the defendant is indicted. The crime and its penalty are abrogated. Where, then, is our jurisdiction? How can we try the defendant, and, if found guilty, punish him under a law that has no existence? The offense is gone, and no one can be punished for what is not a crime at the time of punishment. Nothing is more certain that that if a statute creating an offense be repealed, all proceedings under it fall. [U. S. v. Passmore] 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 373. The government alone is interested in the prosecution of criminal cases; it can terminate them at any stage by a nolle prosequi; it can obliterate the offense from the Penal Code; and provided it leaves the citizen his civil remedy for the injury that is peculiar to himself, it violates no right of property, and it offends no principle of justice. The law unquestionably is, that after the repealing act is passed there shall be no such offense as that for which this defendant is indicted. It is no longer an offense; it cannot be indicted, it cannot be punished, it is taken from the Penal Code absolutely. This was substantially the argument for the defense in Duane's Case, in 1 Bin. 601, sustained by the chief justice, afterwards by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, in [Ammidon v. Smith] 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 460, and by Mr. Justice Washington, who, in Anonymous [Case No. 475], says: "It is a clear rule, that if a statute create an offense, and is then repealed, no prosecution can be instituted for any offense committed against the statute previous to its repeal."

Such being the law, the present prosecution must fail. And suppose, as is certainly the case, that these internal revenue laws are not without obscurity, in the language of Chief Justice Tilghman, I feel myself on the safest and strongest ground, in adopting a construction which takes away the punishment.

Mr. Lawrence, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment against the defendant [John Fisher], charging him as carrier of the mail, with stealing letters, &c. A motion is made to quash certain counts in the indictment which charge the defendant with stealing a letter, without alleging that it contained no article of value. This is not necessary. A carrier of the mail is subject to a higher penalty where he steals a letter out of the mail, which contains an article of value. And when this offense is committed, the indictment must allege the letter contained an article of value, which aggravates the offense and incurs a higher penalty. But where the offense consists in stealing a letter, it may be so laid in the indictment, and the proof cannot go beyond the indictment. The motion is overruled.

The evidence being heard by the jury, he was convicted, and sentenced by the court.

Case No. 15,103.

UNITED STATES v. FISHER et al.

[1 Wash. C. C. 4.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1803.[2]

BANKRUPTCY—PRIORITY OF UNITED STATES.

Claim, by the United States, of priority of payment out of the effects of an insolvent and bankrupt debtor.

The action was brought to recover from the assignees of [Peter] Blight, a bankrupt, the amount of a protested bill of exchange endorsed by Blight, with damages, &c. as settled at the treasury. The bill was purchased by the cashier of the Bank of the United States, for the secretary of the treasury, and paid for by a warrant on the bank. It was protested, and notice given on the 11th of April, 1800. Blight having committed an act of bankruptcy, a commission issued against him on the 10th of April, 1801. On the 25th, a provisional, and on the 30th of May, an absolute assignment of his effects were made. Previous to these transactions, viz. in January, 1801, Blight had deposited a part of the cargo of the ship China with the collector of some port in Rhode Island, to secure the duties on that cargo; of which the commissioners having notice; they some time in April sent their messenger with a warrant to seize these goods as the property of Blight; and they gave notice of the claim of the commissioners to the collector and marshal of the district. On the 16th of June, 1801, an attachment was taken out in the name of the United States, and levied on the goods in the hands of the collector, for the debt due on account of the bill before mentioned; but they were afterwards delivered to the defendants, under an agreement that they should pay the debt due to the United States, if it should be decided that the United States were entitled to have the same first satisfied. An agreement has also been entered into on the part of the government and the defendants, that an action for money had and received should be brought, and the general issue to be pleaded, defendants to admit sufficient funds in their hands, of Blight's property, to pay the claim of the United States, but not enough to pay all his debts. The question to be, whether the debt due to the United States from Blight is first to be satisfied out of his money and effects, or any part thereof, in the defendants' hands, by virtue of the attachment in their agreement mentioned, or of any acts of congress. If judgment in the affirmative, to be entered in favour of plaintiff for $——; if in the negative, to be entered generally for defendants.

Dallas contended that the 5th section of the act of the 3d March, 1797 (3 Laws [Folwell's Ed.], 423 [1 Stat. 515]), gives a priority to the United States in cases of insolvencies, in all cases whatsoever of debts due to the United States; and that the 62d section of the bankrupt law clearly protects and secures this right of priority, so as not to be affected or impaired by that law. That the United States not being within the operation of the bankrupt law, the attachment gave a priority to the claim of the United States. He principally relied upon the case of U. S. v. King [Case No. 15,536], decided in the late circuit court for this state.

Ingersoll and Tilghman opposed this construction, upon the ground that the act of 3d March, 1797, gave no preference to the United States, except against public agents; and therefore they are not in other cases to have a priority.

After a very long argument by these gentlemen, WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, stopped Lewis, who was about to argue also for the defendants, and desired Dallas to conclude.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice (charging jury, after stating the case). The single question is, has the United States a right to be paid the whole of the debt due from the bankrupt out of his estate, in preference to the other creditors? This will turn entirely upon the construction of the act of the 3d March, 1797, and the bankrupt law; for I at once lay the attachment out of the case; because, unless the priority of the United States be established by those laws, the attachment, being laid after the assignment, could give no lien and no right of preference to the United States; for at that time the property belonged not to Blight, but to the assignees. This right of preference, upon prerogative principles, has been wisely disclaimed by the district attorney, who founds it upon a legislative grant solely. The 62d section of the bankrupt law [of 1800; 2 Stat. 36], declares, that "nothing contained in this law shall in any manner affect the right of preference to prior satisfaction of debts due to the United States, as secured or provided by any law heretofore passed, nor shall be construed to lessen or impair any right to or security in money due to the United States, or to any of them." Mr. Ingersoll seemed to suppose, that as the king is not within the operation of the bankrupt laws in England, this section was only intended to express, in regard to the United States, the same legal principle. Mr. Tilghman appeared to think that the United States had an election to come in under the commission and receive a dividend, or to refuse to do so, in which latter case the bankrupt's certificate would be no bar of her claim.

It is unnecessary to give any opinion, whether the United States may elect to come in under the commission or not, because this is not a question wherein they have put in any claim, or in which the bankrupt is endeavouring to protect himself by his certificate. The United States contend for a right to be paid the whole of their demand, and found this right on the section recited, and on the 5th section of the act of the 3d March, 1797 [1 Stat. 515]. The 62d section of the bankrupt law does not give a preference to the United States, but merely saves the right of the United States in cases where such a preference had by law been previously granted. This then brings me to the act of the 3d March, 1797, which, it is contended on behalf of the United States, gives them a preference in all cases of debts due to them, no matter by whom or on what account. The title of this law is "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money." The objects of the 1st section are revenue officers and persons accountable for public money, and directs who shall institute suits against such of them as are delinquents, and declaring what interest shall be recovered. The 2d section defines the kind of evidence to be received in such suits, for establishing the demand. The 3d section directs the trial of the cause to take place at the return time. The 4th section provides for the defendant, and points out the mode in which he is to establish his credits, if he claims any. The 5th gives to the United States a preference in case of insolvency; and the 6th is upon the subject of execution after judgment obtained. The 5th section declares, that "where any revenue officer or other person thereafter becoming indebted to the United States by bond or otherwise, shall become insolvent," the debt due to the United States shall be first satisfied. The words "or other person," are certainly broad enough to comprehend every possible case of debts due to the United States, and the court is now called upon to give to this section its proper construction. On one side it is said, that the words must have a literal interpretation, so as to extend to all persons indebted to the United States; and on the other, a limited interpretation is contended for, so as to confine the meaning of those words to persons accountable for public money.

Where a law is plain and unambiguous, using either general or limited expressions, the legislature should be intended to mean what they have plainly expressed, and no room is left for construction. But, if from a view of the whole law taken together, or from other laws in pari materia, the evident intention is different from the import of the literal expressions used in some part of the law, that intention ought to prevail, for that in truth is the will of the law-makers. So, if the literal expressions would lead to absurd or unjust consequences, such a construction should be given as to avoid such consequences, if, from the whole purview of the law, it can fairly be made. These rules are founded in law, and in plain honest good sense; and I think will give us light enough to pursue the present inquiry with success. Now what would be the consequence of a literal construction in this case? Not only a preference and inequality in favour of the United States, but such as no prudent citizen could guard himself against. As to public officers and agents, they are or may be known, and any person dealing with them does it at the peril of having his debt postponed to that of the United States—he acts with his eyes open. But if this preference be extended to all persons dealing with the government, there is no mode by which other citizens can be put on their guard against them, and consequently all confidence between man and man will be destroyed. If however the law is so, it must be submitted to. But we must see if such consequences may not be avoided, by a fair and reasonable construction.

The object of the law, as declared by the title of it, is to provide for the effectual settlement of debts due from accountable agents to the United States. To effect this, suits are directed, the species of evidence to support the claim pointed out, a speedy trial provided, and a preference given to the United States in case of a deficiency of estate to satisfy the judgments. Here then is one entire connected system; the different provisions constituting the links of the same chain—the members of the same body. The title, though it cannot control the positive expressions of the law, may assist other parts of the law in limiting the extent of their meaning. It is admitted that the three first sections of the law apply to those only who are declared by the title to be the objects of the law: the 4th section is the first which uses general expressions, without a reference to those who had before been spoken of; but when we come to the 5th section, the reference is again taken up, with the addition of the words "or any other person;" and we are to say, to what extent these general expressions are to go. In the first place, what necessity was there for departing from the mode of expression used in the 4th section, which for the first time is general, without particular reference to any of the persons before described? Would it not have been as well in the 5th as in the 4th section, to say, that "where any individual hereafter becoming indebted to the United States, shall become insolvent," &c.? What reason can be given for the specification of one of the persons mentioned expressly in the first section, and intended by words of reference in the 2d and 3d, unless to show, that if the primary object of the law had been interrupted by the 4th section, it was intended to be resumed in the 5th? Secondly: What necessity was there for the specification of revenue officers, if all persons whatsoever are comprehended, who are debtors of the United States? for those words would certainly have comprehended revenue officers. Unless they are construed to limit and restrain the generality of the other words, they are without any use whatever. If the preceding sections of the law had applied only to revenue officers, then, from necessity, we must have construed the words "any other person," as broad as their natural import would warrant; because we could derive no rule whatever, from the law itself, to limit the generality of the expression. But the law professing by its title to relate to all accountable agents, and the first section specifying amongst those accountable agents revenue officers, we have a rule by which to limit the generality of the expressions in the 5th section, viz. "or any other person accountable for public money," or, "or other person indebted as aforesaid." This construction renders the law uniform, and consistent with what it professes. And thirdly: The special wording of the 62d section of the bankrupt law, furnishes another strong argument in favour of this limitation of the 5th section of the law, more immediately under consideration. If the United States were entitled to a preference in every possible case of debts due to them, what necessity for speaking of "the right of preference to prior satisfaction of debts due to the United States, as secured and provided by any law heretofore passed"? This mode of expression was calculated to induce an opinion, that the legislature supposed there were some cases where the priority had not been provided for by law; for if otherwise, it would have been enough to declare, that the bankrupt law should not extend to or affect any debts due to the United States. Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the law is with the defendants.

The jury found a verdict for the defendants.

Upon an appeal, this judgment was reversed. U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 358, 396.

NOTE. In this case, the supreme court decided: (1) The acts of congress, securing to the United States a priority of payment out of the effects of their debtor, in all cases of insolvency or bankruptcy are constitutional. (2) The government is to pay the debts of the Union, and is authorized to use the means which appear to itself most eligible to effect that object. It has consequently a right to make remittances by bills or otherwise, and to take those precautions which render the transaction safe. (3) It is no objection to the claim of priority on the part of the United States, that it interferes with the right of the state sovereignties respecting the dignity of debts, and will defeat the measures they have a right to adopt to secure themselves against delinquencies, on the part of their own revenue officers. This result, so far as it may happen, is the necessary consequence of the supremacy of the laws of the United States, on all subjects to which the legislative power of congress extends. If the end be legitimate, and within the scope of the constitution, all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, and which are not prohibited, may constitutionally be employed to carry it into effect. Case No. 15,104.

UNITED STATES v. FISK et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1865.[1]

INTERNAL REVENUE—BANKERS AND BROKERS—TAX ON SALES.

[The provision in Act March 3, 1865, extending the definition of "brokers" given in Act June 30, 1864, § 79, subd. 9, which requires a license fee to be paid by brokers, so as to make it apply to persons negotiating sales of stocks or securities, whether "for themselves or others," does not apply to section 99 of the act of 1864, imposing certain duties upon sales by brokers.]

BY THE COURT. This is an action to recover an amount of duties upon the sales of government stocks by the defendants [Harvey Fisk and Alfred S. Hatch], under the act of congress of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], amended by the act of 3d March, 1865 [13 Stat. 469]. The defendants are bankers in the city of New York, licensed under section 79 of the former act. In the course of their business they buy and sell government securities on their own account, and for themselves, and not for others, or on commission. It is admitted that in the month of April last they sold, as such bankers, government stocks held and owned by them in their own right, the duties upon which, if they are subject to the payment, amounted to the sum of $1,000, under the seventy-ninth section of the act of 1864. The question involved in the case is, whether or not the defendants are liable to this tax?

The first subdivision of section 79 of the act of 1864 required bankers, employing a capital not exceeding $50,000, to pay a license fee of $100, and, for every additional $1,000, $2. It also defines the term "bankers" within the meaning of the act, as follows: "Every person, firm, &c., having a place of business — (1) where credits are opened by a deposit or collection of money, &c., subject to be paid or remitted upon draft, &c.; (2) where money is advanced, or loaned on stocks, &c.; or (3) where stocks, &c., are received for discount or sale." By subdivision 9, brokers are required to pay a license fee of $50. A broker is defined as follows: "Every person, firm, &c., except such as hold a license as a banker, whose business it is as a broker to negotiate purchases or sales of stocks, exchange, &c., or other securities." By subdivision 13, produce brokers pay a license fee of $10, and by subdivision 14, commercial brokers pay a fee of $20. Wholesale dealers in merchandise, &c., pay a license fee of $50 (subd. 2), and retail dealers a fee of $10 (subd. 3). The ninety-ninth section of the act of 1864 enacts that brokers, and bankers doing business as brokers, shall pay the following rates of duty: "Upon all sales of merchandise, produce, or other goods, one-eighth of one per centum; upon all sales and contracts for sales of stocks and lands, one-twentieth of one per centum on the par value thereof," &c, provided that any person, firm, &c., not being licensed as a broker, or banker, or wholesale or retail dealer, who shall sell, &c., any merchandise, produce, &c., "stocks, bonds, or other securities, not bona fide at the time their own property, and actually on hand, shall be liable to pay, &c., fifty per centum in addition to the foregoing duties." The law thus stood under the act of June 30, 1864, and, it is admitted, on behalf of the government, that, under the provisions of this act, neither the broker, or banker doing business as a broker, was subject to the duty of one-twentieth of one per centum, when doing business on their own account, or for themselves; but only upon sales made for others, or on commission; in other words, when acting in the character and capacity of brokers. This section 99, in terms, limits the tax to sales made by brokers, and bankers doing business as brokers. The word is familiar, and well understood, as used in statutes or in its legal acceptation. A broker is an agent employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade or business, usually for compensation, called brokerage. The difficulty in this case arose out of the amendments made by the act of 3d March, 1865. The first amendment bearing on the question is of the ninth subdivision of section 79, by adding to the words "other securities," "for themselves or others." This enlarges the definition of a broker, and makes the term embrace a person or firm negotiating purchases or sales of stocks &c., for themselves as well as for others. Since this amendment, it is insisted that the enlarged meaning shall be applied to the term as used in section 99; and hence the broker is liable, upon sales of stocks made in his own right and for himself, to the duty of one-tenth of one per centum.

There are several difficulties in the way of this construction. In the first place, this section was amended at the same time and by the same act, without at all effecting or even alluding to any change or intended change, in the meaning of the word "brokers" as originally used in it. In the second place, the words "brokers, and bankers doing business as brokers," in section 99, embrace produce and commercial brokers, who are subject to a tax of one-eighth of one per centum upon their sales. Now, it cannot be pretended that as to this class of brokers, they are subject to this enlarged meaning, that is, that they are liable for the duty or tax on sales made in their own right and for themselves. A special license is provided in case of such sales, as is seen in subdivisions 13 and 14 of the seventy-ninth section of the act of 1864, and which have not been altered or amended. The words, therefore, in section 99, as it respects this class, must be taken in their ordinary and legal acceptation, and not otherwise; and, in order to give the argument any force in favor of the transfer of the enlarged meaning of the terms to this section, we shall be obliged to hold that the same word possesses different and opposite meanings when used in the same section and in the same connection. And finally, in the third place, the proviso to section 99 forbids the construction claimed. That prohibits persons or firms from selling, among other articles, stocks or bonds, without a license as a broker or banker, unless, at the time, their own property bona fide, and actually on hand; clearly indicating, we think, that the sales contemplated in the enacting clause are limited to those made as brokers for others, and not in their own right and for themselves.

As we have seen, the amendment wrests from the word "broker" its true meaning, as known in law or commerce; and if this new meaning is to be extended beyond the immediate connection in which the word is found, especially in a statute regulating and establishing a system of taxation and revenue, it will lead to consequences never intended by the lawmakers, and involve contradictions and absurdities that it would be unjust to impute to them. The word, whenever used in the act of 1864, was used in its ordinary acceptation, and the object of the change of meaning in the ninth subdivision of section 79 by the amendment, is not apparent. It may have had reference to the license fee, or, in addition to this, it may have been made with a view to guard against an evasion by persons doing business as brokers. It is understood that in the negotiation of sales of stocks, in the several boards of brokers, the contract of sales is made in the name of the broker, and apparently on his own account, and for his own benefit, although, as between him and his customer, it is made for the benefit of the latter. The amendment prevents any advantage to be gained by setting up the apparent contract as the real one intended. The proviso to the ninety-ninth section would seem to have had in view the possibility of this practice on the part of the broker, and hence limits the sales exempt from tax by persons on their own account, and for their own benefit, to sales of their own property bona fide at the time, and which was then on hand.

We are quite aware of the difficulties and perplexities attending the construction of acts of the legislature as obscure and contradictory as the present one; but, after the best consideration, and for the reasons above stated, we have come to the conclusion that neither brokers, nor bankers doing business as a broker, are liable, under the ninety-ninth section of the act of 1864, to the duty claimed upon sales made in their own right, and for themselves, and not for others or on commission.

According to stipulation of the attorneys and counsel, judgment must be rendered for the defendants.

[The case was taken on a writ of error to the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed. 3 Wall. (70 U. S.) 445.]

NOTE. U. S. v. Robert L. Cutting et al. July 5, 1865. Nelson, Circuit Justice. For the reasons given in the case of U. S. v. Fisk and Hatch judgment must be entered for the defendants.

Case No. 15,105.

UNITED STATES v. FISLER.

[4 Biss. 59.] [1]

District Court, D. Indiana. Nov. Term, 1865.

COUNTERFEITING—POSSESSION OF FORGED TREASURY NOTES—INDICTMENT—COPIES.

1. An indictment for possessing forged treasury notes and postal currency with intent to pass them, must profess to give, and must actually give, exact copies of them, or allege a reasonable excuse for not doing so. Quære, whether in such a case it is sufficient to paste the forged instruments themselves on the indictment as a part of it?

2. To charge in the indictment in such a case, that the prisoner had in possession "divers" such forged instruments, it too indefinite. The number ought to be stated.

McDONALD, District Judge. This is an indictment for the felonious possession of forged United States treasury notes and forged United States postal currency, with intent to pass them. The prisoner [James Fisler] was tried by a jury at the present term, and a verdict of guilty was returned against him. He now moves in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the indictment is materially defective. There are two counts in the indictment. The first count charges the felonious possession of forged postal currency; the second avers the felonious possession of forged treasury notes. In other respects, the counts are alike.

In the first count it is charged that, on the 15th of November, 1864, in this district, the prisoner "unlawfully and feloniously did have and keep in his possession, and conceal, with intent to pass, utter, and publish as true, divers false, forged, and counterfeit fractional notes commonly called postal currency, in imitation of the postal currency, which, before the day and year aforesaid, had, by the secretary of the treasury of the United States, been furnished to the assistant treasurers and other depositories of the United States by him selected, called and known as fifty-cent stamps of the postal currency of the United States—which said false, forged, and counterfeited fractional notes, commonly called postal currency, each of them are in substance described as follows." Here is pasted on the indictment one of the supposed forged fractional notes.

The second count, in the same language as the first, charges the felonious possession of "divers false, forged, and counterfeit treasury notes, and each of them are in substance described as follows, that is to say:" Here is pasted on the indictment one of the supposed forged treasury notes.

It is objected that both these counts are bad, because they profess to give the substance of the notes only. And it is insisted that, in charging forgery, the indictment must not only set out, but must profess on its face to set out, an exact copy of the thing forged, or must state some valid reason for not doing so.

This objection is fatal to the indictment. There is nothing better settled than that the rule in such cases requires exact copies of forged instruments to be given, and to purport on the face of the indictment to be given. The indictment in such cases generally employs such language as this: "to the tenor and effect following;" or, "in the words and figures following;" and it will never do to say "in substance as follows." State v. Atkins, 5 Blackf. 458; Whart. Cr. Law, §§ 306, 308, 1468.

It is also urged as a ground for arresting the judgment, that both the counts are defective for not stating the number of the forged notes mentioned. Indictments ought to be characterized by a reasonable certainty of allegation. They should at least be as certain as a declaration at common law should be. It is a rule in civil pleading at common law, that when the action concerns different things, they must be described by quality, quantity, and number. Steph. Pl. 296. Unquestionably a declaration in trespass for taking or destroying divers chattels—for example, divers horses or cows—would be bad as not stating the number of them. Surely the reason is equally strong for requiring that the number of these forged instruments be stated. Yet the indictment does not attempt to give the number. It only says "divers false, forged, and counterfeit fractional notes"—"divers false, forged, and counterfeit treasury notes." It is not pretended that in either civil or criminal pleading, the evidence must strictly conform to the allegation of number. In most cases, we may aver one number and prove another without a fatal variance. But some number must, in such cases, be stated. To say the least, it is doubtful whether to paste the original forged instrument on the indictment as a substitute for a copy, as was done in this case, does not render the indictment defective. It is a slovenly, unlawyerlike practice, not to be encouraged by courts. It is held good in England only by virtue of the act of 7 Geo. IV., not in force here. Rex v. Harris, 7 Car. & P. 429. But at any rate, the attaching of the forged instrument does not aid the statement that it is "in substance as follows."

The judgment must be arrested The prisoner must be held in custody or on bail to answer to a better indictment.

WITNESS—ASSAULT AND BATTERY UPON WIFE.

Upon an indictment against the husband for assault and battery of his wife, she may be examined as a witness against him.

[Followed in U. S. v. Smallwood, Case No. 16,316.]

This was an indictment [against Thomas Fitton] for an alleged cruel assault and battery of the defendant's wife.

Mr. Key, for the United States, offered the wife as a witness against her husband.

Mr. Mason, for defendant, objected; but

THE COURT (nem. con.) permitted her to be sworn and examined. See McNal. Ev. c. 16, pp. 160–176; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 819; 1 Starkie, Ev. 84, 85, 705, 706; Davis v. Dinwoody, 4 Term R. 678; 2 Russ. 604, and the cases there cited. The wife's testimony was slightly corroborated, but strongly discredited by evidence of her habits and conduct.

Verdict for the defendant.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 203.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1832.

PURSER IN NAVY—DUTIES—DISBURSEMENTS — EXTRA COMPENSATION.

1. The duties of a purser in the navy, stationed at a navy-yard, are not defined by law, and are to be ascertained by the jury.

2. It is competent for the court to admit evidence of equitable claims by the defendant against the United States, which have been rejected by the accounting officers of the treasury.

3. A purser who disburses money for the United States, which it is not his duty, as purser, to disburse, is, in equity, entitled to a reasonable compensation therefor.

4. The pursers are bound by the regulations made by the commissioners of the navy in 1817, with the consent of the secretary of the navy, and approved by the president of the United States, and are thereby bound to make the disbursements required, without other compensation than their regular pay as purser, unless when the disbursements were made, there was an agreement or understanding between them and the secretary of the navy, or other officer competent to make such an agreement, that they should receive compensation therefor, other than their regular and fixed pay as purser.

This was a suit, docketed by consent, to recover from the defendant [Edward Fitzgerald] a balance of $5,035.68, stated by the accounting officers of the treasury department to be due from him, as a purser in the navy, to the United States.

That balance accrued by the rejection of the following items of debit claimed by him, viz.:

Mr. Swann, Dist. Atty., for the United States, after the evidence was closed, prayed the court to instruct the jury that there was no law which authorized the defendant to make these charges against the United States.

Mr. R. S. Coxe, contra. These are equitable claims against the United States, which he has a right to set off, according to the case of U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 143. The duty of paying laborers, &c., was assigned to him in 1817, and until 1829 he was allowed by the department a commission of one per cent.

Mr. Coxe then prayed the court to instruct the jury, in substance, that if they should be satisfied by the evidence that the disbursement of this money was not a part of his duty as purser, and he was requested by the United States to disburse it, he is entitled to so much money for that service as he deserved to have therefor.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused Mr. Swann's prayer, because it was not predicated upon any fact to be found by the jury; and because the court could not, as a matter of law, say what the duties of a purser were, or whether this disbursement was part of the defendant's duty as purser, independent of all facts to be found by a jury; as there is no statute defining the duties of a purser stationed at a navy yard.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) gave the instruction prayed by Mr. Coxe.

Mr. Swann, having given in evidence the rules and regulations made by the commissioners of the navy, with the consent of the secretary of the navy, and approved by the president of the United States in 1817, prayed the court to instruct the jury that they were binding upon the defendant as a purser, and that he was thereby bound to make the disbursement without any commission or other compensation than his regular pay as purser; which the court (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused, unless accompanied by the following qualification, namely, "unless the jury should be satisfied by the evidence, that when the disbursements were made, there was an agreement or understanding between the defendant and the secretary of the navy, or other officer competent to make such agreement, that he should receive a commission or other compensation for such disbursements beyond his fixed and regular pay as purser."

With that qualification, the court gave the last instruction prayed by Mr. Swann.

Verdict for the defendant. Mr. Swann took a bill of exceptions, which is not now with the papers of the case.

No writ of error has been issued.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE BARRELS OF WHISKEY.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—CONDEMNATION BY DEFAULT.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. Returns of process having been made, and no claimants appearing for any of the following described property, it was condemned by default: Five barrels of whiskey, found at No. 548 West Seventeenth street; one still, etc., found in a saloon at No. 145 Bowery; 47 half boxes manufactured tobacco, found at No. 80 Front street; 25 boxes of snuff in bottles, found at No. 104 Pearl street; 2,000 cigars, found in Liberty street; 15 boxes cigars, found at No. 148 Water street; and 12 boxes cigars, found at No. 75 Fulton street.

Case No. 15,109.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE CASES OF CIGARS.

District Court. S. D. New York. 1859.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—CIGARS—UNDERVALUATION.

Before BETTS, District Judge.

This was a suit to forfeit the cigars for being undervalued in the invoice, with intent to defraud the United States of the legal duty on them. The cigars were imported from Havana in October, 1857, in the ship Crosby, and were consigned to Mervin & Yeaton, of Philadelphia, by Cornell & Co., of Havana, who now claimed them. The cases contained, amongst others, 3,100 Regalias, Lord Wellington, and were invoiced at $19, and appraised at $26, and reappraised at $26; 11,000 Loudres Comercianti, invoiced at $18, and appraised at $25, and reappraised at $25; 17,000 2da, invoiced at $15, and appraised at $20, and reappraised at $22; 2,000 3a 6,000, and 6,000 invoiced at $12, and appraised at $18, and reappraised at $18; 4,000 Garatizada flor, invoiced at $13, and appraised at $20, and reappraised at $20; 1,500 2a, invoiced at $11, appraised at $17, and reappraised at $17; 1a, 10,100 of another brand, invoiced at $12, appraised at $18, and reappraised at $18; 7,900 2a, invoiced at $11, appraised at $15, and reappraised at $16; 21,000 Vegueritas, invoiced at $15, and appraised at $18, and reappraised at $20; 1,000 2a, appraised at $18, and reappraised at $20. The whole importation was invoiced at $1,308, and appraised at $1,846.40, and reappraised at $1,877.30. Several merchants and importers of cigars were examined for the prosecution, and testified that such cigars could not have been purchased at Havana, at the time they were imported, at anything like the prices at which they were invoiced.

For the claimants, several witnesses were examined, who testified that these cigars were invoiced at their fair market value, at the time, in Havana. Evidence was also adduced to show that similar cigars, invoiced at a similar price, had passed the custom-house in New York and Philadelphia. To account for the low price at which these cigars were purchased, it was alleged that the panic, which had then reached Havana, lowered the price of cigars, in many instances, $5 per thousand.

Verdict for the United States.

Case No. 15,110.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE CASES OF CLOTH.

[2 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 84.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 5, 1842.

NEW TRIAL—VERDICT AGAINST EVIDENCE.

Where a verdict was rendered turning upon the credibility of the witnesses, and it appeared that at the trial all the evidence was fully and fairly before the jury, and that they had been charged that the consideration of the credibility of the testimony belonged exclusively to them, the court refused to grant a new trial. It is only in cases imputing gross inattention, prejudice, or misconduct on the part of a jury that the court will interfere to disturb their verdict.

This was a motion for a new trial on a case made by the defendant [William Broadbent], and was submitted on written points. The circumstances of the case, and the point upon which his honor's opinion was sought, sufficiently appear in the adjudication.

O. Hoffman, for the United States.

S. Cambreleng, for defendant.

BETTS, District Judge. The defendant applies upon a case made to set aside the verdict rendered in this cause, and for a new trial, because the verdict is against evidence.

I am satisfied, from a reperusal of the proofs, that if the testimony is entitled to full credit, the verdict is clearly against the weight of evidence, and ought for that cause to be set aside. Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America [Case No. 7,921]; Judiciary Act, Sept. 24, 1789, § 17 [1 Stat. 73].

It appears to me, also, that there is no proof in the case which could shake my faith in the witnesses for the claimant; and, had it been submitted to my judgment as matter of fact, I should have found for him.

With this distinct statement of the position of the case, the point arises for decision whether the court is called upon or can properly interfere to disturb the finding of the jury. The gist of the information was that the goods were undervalued upon the invoices, with intent to evade or defraud the revenue. In reply to the testimony on the part of the United States, the claimant offered evidence to prove that he purchased the goods in England, and that they were charged on the invoices at the actual cost prices, and also that they were invoiced at their true market value abroad. The vendors of the goods were examined on commission, and testified that they sold the goods to the claimant at the prices stated in the invoices, and that he was the bona fide purchaser and owner of them. Each of these witnesses also swore the goods were charged at their true market value, and that like goods at the time could have been purchased at the same places at these prices.

Testimony was presented to the jury, on the other hand, to show that the goods were very greatly below the foreign market value, and a witness called by the claimant, although he rated the goods much lower than the public appraiser, yet, examining them two years after they were exported, appraised the market value at the time of their purchase at 19 per cent. above the invoices.

The points submitted to the jury were, whether the testimony established the cost prices of the goods, and they were charged by the court that if the goods were actually purchased by the claimant at the invoice prices, then they could not be condemned, whether that price corresponded with the market value or not. So, also, the charge was explicit that, if the goods were invoiced at their fair market value, the claimant would be entitled to a verdict, unless the government proved they had been purchased at higher prices; and the jury were instructed that the testimony on the part of the claimant, taken on the spot where the transactions occurred, being direct and explicit on both points in his favor, entitled him to a verdict if the witnesses were believed. The decision of the jury turned then upon the credibility of the witnesses swearing directly for the claimant, and that point was given to the consideration of the jury as belonging exclusively to them, with the instruction that the depositions were to be read and received with like effect as if the witnesses had made the same statement in open court.

No exception is taken to the charge of the court, and the single question is, whether the court, upon its own judgment of the bearing and credibility of the testimony, will set aside the decision of the jury upon that very point.

The courts have proceeded with great caution in granting new trials upon allegations that the verdicts are without or contrary to evidence, or against its weight. It will not be done because the case is a hard one (3 Burrows, 1306); nor that the verdict is contrary to the inclination of the court (2 Bin. 495; 4 Maule & S. 192); or opinion of the judge who tried the cause (3 Johns. 271; 3 Taunt. 232; 5 Mass. 353; Ex parte Hurst [Case No. 6,924]; Blagg v. Phœnix Ins. Co. [Id. 1,478]; 3 Bin. 317); nor that it is against the weight of evidence, unless manifestly and palpably so (4 Cow. 426).

The adherence to the finding of the jury in actions of a penal character, or where the question depends on the credit of witnesses, is still more strict, and the verdict will not be disturbed except in some very extraordinary case, importing gross inattention, prejudice, or misconduct on the part of the jury. 2 Bin. 495; Grah. New Trials, 394; U. S. v. Duval [Case No. 15,015]. The witnesses whose testimony was attempted to be impugned had sworn directly to two classes of facts,—the sale prices of goods and their market value. Evidence tending to contradict these witnesses as to the latter fact was submitted to the jury, and, if the jury were satisfied that fact was not correctly given, their testimony upon the other point might also be reasonably placed in doubt. At all events, it was legitimate means of impeachment, and courts must defer to the opinions of juries in matters of fact appropriately within their province to decide.

There is no palpable and flagrant disregard of evidence in this case, evincing any prepossession or prejudice on the minds of the jury. It is at most only allowing, in their estimate of the credibility of witnesses, a greater influence to contradictory testimony than the court might have been inclined to give. The law, however, supposes the jury the more competent tribunal to adjust and dispose of that matter, and I am not inclined to introduce a new rule of adjudication on this point, and assume the right to review the finding of a jury on the single question of the credit of witnesses, when all the evidence bearing upon the inquiry was fully and fairly before them, and they were charged to find their verdict according to their belief or disbelief of the witnesses.

New trial denied.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE CASKS OF FILES.

District Court, S. D. New York. Oct., 1840.

VIOLATION OF CUSTOMS LAWS—FALSE INVOICES—FORFEITURE OF GOODS—INTENT—WHO ARE MANUFACTURERS.

[1. The tariff law contemplates two classes of importers,—purchasers, and those who procure otherwise than by purchase. In their invoices the former class are to represent the actual cost of the goods, the latter, the actual market value.]

[2. A purchaser whose invoice truly states the actual cost is not subject to any forfeiture for this cause, although the valuation may be raised by the customs officers for the purposes of imposing the duty.]

[3. In the strict sense a "manufacturer" is the artisan by whose skill and labor the raw material is formed into an article prepared for sale or use; but, in a broader sense, and for the purposes of the tariff laws, a manufacturing importer is one who controls, directs, or superintends the artisans, or who is the general head or proprietor of an establishment in which articles are manufactured.]

[4. In determining whether a certain house in Sheffield, England, which imported certain packages of files into this country, were to be regarded as purchasers or as manufacturers, for the purpose of invoicing their goods, it appeared that, according to a practice in Sheffield, they did not themselves manufacture the files, or have them manufactured in a factory owned and controlled by themselves, but that they purchased and owned the steel bars from which the files were made, and placed them in the hands of makers of files, charging the steel to them, and crediting the files, when received back, in cash, and paying cash for the balance. Held that, if this charging and crediting was a mere form, while the steel bars and files remained the property of the importers, they were to be regarded as manufacturers; but if, when the steel was delivered, it belonged to the file makers, so that they might sell it, or the files made from it, to whom they pleased, then the importers were to be regarded as purchasers.]

[5. If, under this course of dealing the importers, under a misapprehension of the law, supposed themselves to be purchasers, when in fact they were manufacturers, and under this supposition invoiced the goods at the cost price, as in case of an actual purchase from the file makers, and such invoicing tended to evade or defraud the revenue, then an intent to defraud must be imputed to them, so as to require a forfeiture, though they in fact had no such intent.]

This was an information against merchandise, to obtain its forfeiture on several allegations: (1) That the goods, being procured otherwise than by purchase, were not invoiced at their actual value at the time and place where procured. (2) That the invoices were undervalued. (3) That by the invoice the goods were represented as owned by Joseph Ellison, who was not the owner, and that in each particular the invoice was made up with intent, by a false valuation, extension, or otherwise, to evade or defraud the revenue; contrary to section 4 of the act of May 28, 1830 [4 Stat. 410]. The goods were claimed by Joseph Ellison as consignee, who traversed the causes of forfeiture. The invoices were produced in evidence, and were made up with this heading: "Jos. Ellison bought of Wilson, Hawkshurst & Moss," and dated at Sheffield, in February, 1839. It was admitted that Ellison was only a consignee of the goods for sale, for the house of Wilson, Hawkshurst & Moss. The latter were extensive dealers in cutlery and steel at Sheffield. It appeared that the course of the trade in files at Sheffield was to sell by a tariff of printed prices, established some time ago, and the price at this time was designated by rates of discount from the tariff. The customhouse appraiser, on examination, reported the discounts in the invoice to be greater than the actual current prices at Sheffield; in some articles, ten per cent., in others seventeen, in others twenty, and, on an average, twelve per cent. Upon this the goods had been seized. Invoices of Wilson, Hawkshurst & Moss to other dealers in New York were produced at discounts confirming the appraiser's judgment. Some of the articles were marked with the name of W., H. & Moss; some with a mark used by them in files sent from their establishment at Sheffield.

On the part of the claimant, evidence was given that it was the course of business at Sheffield, with W., H. & Moss and others, in cases of consignment, to head the invoices in the manner in this case practised. Evidence also was given from Sheffield, by the manufacturers of the files in question, that they had sold the same to W., H. & Moss, at the prices stated in the invoice, and that was also proved by their clerk. These and other witnesses also proved that similar goods could be purchased at Sheffield by dealers there for cash, at similar prices. It also appeared that W., H. & Moss were not themselves manufacturers directly of the files; that they were dealers in steel; that it was the course of business of persons in their line at Sheffield to deliver steel to the manufacturers of files, which was charged at a cash price; that files were returned to them, made usually out of the same steel, at certain cash prices, and the balance was paid in cash; that the dealers to whom the files were thus returned were not themselves proprietors of the machinery, tools, or establishments where the files were made; that the actual manufacturers were often persons of small credit, whom the dealers would not trust, except with the steel to be paid by manufactured files; that the mark put on files was sometimes that of the maker, sometimes that of the purchaser for sale or exportation.

Mr. Lord, for the claimant, insisted that the house of Wilson, Hawkshurst & Moss were purchasers of the files, and had invoiced them at the purchasing prices; that they were not bound, nor, indeed, under the law, and the oath to be taken by the importer, warranted, in invoicing them at any other value; that they were not manufacturers; that, even if they might, in a constructive legal sense, be so deemed, yet this was one of those new and nice questions in which, if they erred, it was not evidence of intended fraud; that all their conduct and course was to the contrary.

Mr. Butler, Dist. Atty., insisted that W., H. & Moss were manufacturers, and not purchasers; that they were therefore bound by law to put the current actual value, instead of actual cost, in the invoices; that this was done understandingly, and not by any mistake of fact, and if the mistake was one of law, it was at their peril; that, if this was so, then the naming of Ellison in the invoice as a purchaser tended to mislead the officers of the customs, because, if true, it warranted an entry at the actual cost, when the duties ought to be levied on actual values.

BETTS, District Judge, charged the jury that the offence here proceeded for was a falsehood in the invoice, produced upon entry, with intent to defraud or evade the revenue. The falsity was alleged to exist in the heading of the invoices, and in the prices at which the articles were there valued; the intent, that of evading the revenue by passing the goods at a less rate of duty than they were in truth and by law subject to. That the invoices, it is true, were not controlling on the customhouse officers, but they might, nevertheless, raise the value, and charge the duties accordingly. But the invoice was one circumstance or document which the government exacted upon entry, for the information of its officers, and required it to be true, on penalty of forfeiting the goods. The forfeiture is not because the government is actually defrauded, but because the invoice has been falsely made to this effect.

The law contemplates two classes of importers,—purchasers, and those who procure otherwise than by purchase. The one class are to represent the actual cost, the other the actual value, in their invoices. If the actual cost be truly stated by the purchaser importing, then, although the valuation may be raised for the purpose of imposing the duty, yet the goods could not be for this cause forfeited. But, if the importer be not a purchaser, his invoice must show the actual market value, whatever may have been its cost of manufacture. Then, were W., H. & Moss, who are here to be regarded as importers, manufacturers or purchasers? If they were purchasers, then the evidence is clear that the invoice contains the actual cost, and there is no difficulty in the case. If they were manufacturers of these goods, then, if the invoice does not show the actual value, the goods are not properly invoiced. Whether manufacturers or not, is a mixed question for the jury, under the advice of the court as to what constitutes a manufacturer.

"Manufacturer" is a word not perfectly limited in its meaning. The artisan, by whose skill and labor the raw material is formed into the article prepared for sale or use, is, in a strict sense, the manufacturer. But he who controls, directs, or superintends the artisans, and the general head or proprietor of the establishment, is a manufacturer also, although he may not conduct any of the mechanical processes, nor indeed be acquainted with them. So, too, there are persons in a mixed position, being dealers in the raw material, selling all the articles made from it, and manufacturing some of the articles they deal in. In relation to the present case, if W., H. & Moss were originally proprietors of the material delivered to the file maker, and the latter was to return to him the same material in its manufactured shape, according to their orders, so that the material did not cease to belong to them, then they were manufacturers, although the mode of conducting the business was by charging the steel and crediting the files in cash, and paying cash for the balance. But if, when the steel was delivered to the file makers, it belonged to the latter, so that they might, at their pleasure, either sell it, or sell the files made from it, to whom they pleased, then W., H. & Moss would be rather purchasers than manufacturers of the files.

If the jury should, on the evidence, find that they were manufacturers, then the next question would be, whether the price in the invoice was the actual market value at Sheffield at the time; such as any ordinary purchaser would have to pay for the article in the market there. On this the evidence was conflicting, and was for the jury to consider. But if it was not the actual value, still the claimant contends that, if W., H. & Moss supposed that they were purchasers, and, under this supposition, inserted the actual cost, instead of actual value, they were merely mistaken in the law, and not guilty of an intent to defraud or evade the revenue. The court, however, is of opinion that this mistake of the law cannot be looked to in their exculpation. They are bound to know the law, and if, without mistake of fact, they make an entry in their invoice contrary to the law, it must be regarded as intentional; and, if tending to evade or defraud the revenue, that intent must be ascribed to the false invoice. The jury are not, in this particular, to inquire as to the actual private intent to defraud the revenue, but whether the importers were in such a relation of manufacturers as bound them to enter the goods, not at actual cost, but at actual value.

As to the representation of Joseph Ellison being the purchaser, instead of Wilson, Hawkshurst & Moss, if that was false, and with intent to evade or defraud the revenue, then that was also a ground of forfeiture.

The claimant's counsel excepted to so much of the charge as related to the intent under mistake of law.

The jury found a verdict for the claimant of the goods.

Case No. 15,113.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE HUNDRED AND EIGHT BARRELS OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

[5 Blatchf. 407; [1] 5 Int. Rev. Rec. 190.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. June 10, 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ILLEGAL REMOVAL OF SPIRITS — PERMIT OF COLLECTOR — SEIZURE — NEW TRIAL—FORM OF TESTIMONY TAKEN.

1. Under an information, on a seizure of distilled spirits, under the 45th section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 163), the burden of proof is on the claimant, to show that the spirits have been lawfully removed from the place where the same were distilled, or that they have been lawfully removed from the bonded warehouse of the distillery, and that the taxes on them have been paid.

[Followed in U. S. v. Six Barrels of Distilled Spirits, Case No. 16,294. Cited in Boyd v. U. S., Id. 1,749.]

2. A permit of a collector, to transport such spirits from the bonded warehouse of the distillery to a general bonded warehouse, is not evidence of a compliance with the prerequisites to a removal of the spirits, required by the 38th and 40th sections of said act.

[Cited in Boyd v. U. S., Case No. 1,749.]

3. Where the claimant fails to show such compliance, the court may, on the trial of the case before the jury, properly dispose of it as involving simply questions of law.

4. The adoption by the government of a seizure under the internal revenue laws, cures any defect, in the competency to seize, of the person who made the seizure.

5. In making up a case, on which to move for a new trial, oral testimony taken at the trial by way of question and answer must be reduced to the form of a narrative, or the court will refuse to hear the motion.

[6. Cited in Coffey v. U. S., 116 U. S. 433, 6 Sup. Ct. 435, to the point that the circuit courts have jurisdiction in suits in rem for penalties and forfeitures arising under the internal revenue laws.]

This was an information against certain distilled spirits, seized on the 8th of January, 1867, for a violation of the internal revenue laws. At the trial, the court directed a verdict for the government [Case No. 15,114], and the claimant now moved for a new trial.

Benjamin F. Tracy, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Sidney Webster, for claimant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BENEDICT, District Judge.

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The charge in the information in this case is, "that the said spirits were removed from the place where the same were distilled, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse, as provided by law; and, further, that the said spirits were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse of the distiller of the said spirits, the same not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid."

The 45th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 163), provides, "that any person who shall remove any distilled spirits from the place where the same are distilled, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse as provided by law, shall be liable to a fine of double the amount of the tax imposed thereon, or to imprisonment for not less than three months. All distilled spirits so removed, and all distilled spirits found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed from such warehouse according to law, and the tax imposed by law on the same not having been paid, shall be forfeited to the United States, or may, immediately upon discovery, be seized, and, after assessment of the tax thereon, may be sold by the collector for the tax and expenses of seizure and sale." In another part of the section, it is provided as follows: "And the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant of said spirits, to show that the requirements of law in regard to the same have been complied with." The 29th section of the act requires, that an inspector shall be appointed for every distillery established according to law, who shall inspect, gauge and prove all the spirits distilled, and shall take charge of the bonded warehouse attached to the distillery, which shall be in the joint custody of the inspector and owner. The 38th section requires the inspection, gauging and proving of the liquor, after the same has been drawn off into casks, &c., and the marking or branding of the casks, or barrels, in a particular manner; and no cask or barrel is to be taken from the warehouse unless it is branded in the manner prescribed. The 40th section provides that distilled spirits, inspected, gauged, proved and marked or branded, may be removed, without payment of the tax, from the bonded warehouse owned by the distiller, upon the execution of transportation bonds or other security, and may be transported to any general bonded warehouse used for the storage of distilled spirits, established under the internal revenue laws, and that, immediately after the arrival of such distilled spirits at the district of the collector to which they have been transferred, they shall be again inspected and placed in the bonded warehouse. The distilled spirits may be withdrawn from the bonded warehouse after being inspected, &c., and after payment of the tax, and, when so delivered, must be branded "U. S. Bonded Warehouse, Tax Paid;" or they may be removed from said warehouse without the payment of the tax, for the purpose of being exported, or for the purpose of being rectified, &c.; but the removal for rectification, &c., is allowed but once, and all spirits thus removed must be returned to the same warehouse and again inspected.

The five hundred and eight barrels, in the present case, were removed, as is claimed on the part of the defence, from the bonded warehouse of the distiller, in the city of Chicago, to a general bonded warehouse in the Third district of New York, C. C. Pratt, collector—the general bonded warehouse owned by John Croghan, in said district. The counsel for the claimant gave in evidence the permit of the deputy collector of Chicago, for the transportation of the whiskey from the bonded warehouse of the distillery to the general bonded warehouse in the Third district of New York, and insisted, that it furnished evidence of the regularity and sufficiency of all the preliminary steps to justify the removal. The prerequisites to a removal are: (1) The casks or barrels must be inspected, gauged, proved and marked or branded, as prescribed by law; and (2) the execution of a transportation bond or such other security as may be prescribed.

We are inclined to think that, upon the seizure of the goods for an alleged violation of the law, if the claimant relies upon a conformity with it, as a defence, he is bound to establish the affirmative by proof; and that it would be unreasonable, and not consistent with the rules of evidence, to call on the government to establish the negative. The means of furnishing the evidence are in the possession of the claimant. All the steps to be taken in order to justify a removal, as well as the removal itself, have been under his direction, or within his cognizance; and, especially are we bound to so hold, under the 45th section, which declares that the burden of proof shall be upon the claimant, to show that the requirements of the law have been complied with.

It was strongly argued, that the officer who seized the whiskey was not competent to seize within the particular district in which the article was found. But, without examining or deciding whether this be so or not, we are satisfied that the adoption of the seizure by the government cures any defect in this respect, which may have existed. Any person may make the seizure, as in the case of seizures under the customs, as the direction in this statute is no more specific than is the direction in that one, as to an officer of the customs being required to make the seizure, in case of a forfeiture.

The claimant wholly failed to show that he had complied with the requirements of the act, which he was bound to do, under the 45th section, and the court was, therefore, right in disposing of the case as involving simply questions of law.

There are other grounds upon which the verdict might be sustained, but we prefer placing the decision upon the one stated.

We feel bound to say, that the mode of making up the record of the evidence in this case, with a view to a motion for a new trial, is very objectionable. The whole of the testimony is taken by way of question and answer, and is carried along in detached parts, without much order, system or connection, so that is exceedingly difficult to make out of it the questions presented in the case. If the testimony at the circuit is taken this way, it should be reduced to the form of a narrative in the case made to be used on the motion for a new trial. In the Southern district, I have, in the circuit court, refused to hear such a motion in the form in which this case is presented. This is mentioned, that the error may not hereafter be repeated.

The motion for a new trial is denied.

Case No. 15,114.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE HUNDRED AND EIGHT BARRELS OF SPIRITS.

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—COUNTERFEIT BRANDS—BONDED WAREHOUSE—REMOVAL OF SPIRITS.

This was an action to forfeit the spirits for alleged violation of the internal revenue law. The matter was before the court once before, under an exception interposed on behalf of the government to the claim made by Hubbell & Tallent, who represented themselves to be the owners of the spirits. The court decided to allow the claim to stand and now the cause came on for trial on the merits.

The testimony for the government showed that the goods were seized on the 7th of January last in the cellar of No. 68 Water street. No. 66 Water street was then a bonded warehouse, and between the cellars of No. 66 and No. 68 an archway had been cut in the wall through which the barrels had manifestly been rolled from No. 66. In the cellar of No. 66 were found some stencil plate brands with paint and brushes, and shavings as if the tops of barrels had been scraped for rebranding. One hundred and ninety-eight of the barrels were branded as follows: "Highwines. M. D. Brice, Inspector, First District. Illinois, Oct. 5, 1866. Northwestern Distillery Co., Chicago, Ill. U. S. Bonded Warehouse. For transportation to Thirty-Second District, N. Y." The remaining 310 barrels were branded "F. A. Stevens, Government Inspector, Thirty-Second Collection District, New York, Dec. 27 and 31, 1866. French Spirits, rectified by C. Smith, New York." Mr. Stevens was inspector of the Thirty-Second district in December, but was not inspector of the Third district, yet it appeared that he branded the barrels at No. 66 Water street. There was no such rectifier as C. Smith in the Thirty-Second district, but the brand with his name was one of those found in the cellar, and the brands had the appearance of having been recently used. There were five entrances to

No. 66, and one of them, the cellar grating in the back yard, had on a government lock. No. 65 Water street was used as a warehouse by Mr. Crogan, who was also the lessee of No. 66, the bonded warehouse.

The testimony for the defence showed that Mr. Boyd, the agent in New York of Shufeldt & Co., who were the Northwestern Distillery Company in Chicago, sold 1,000 barrels of spirits to the claimant; that he got permission from the collector at Chicago to transport them to the Thirty-Second collection district of New York; that they all arrived and 800 of them were put in a bonded warehouse in that district; that application was then made to the collector for their removal to the Third district, which was refused, whereupon Boyd sent his permits back to Chicago, and obtained new ones to send the liquor to the Third district, and it was sent accordingly to No. 66 Water street—500 barrels arriving before Nov. 15 and the other 500 soon after. It also appeared that in October an application was made to Collector Pratt, of the Third district, to make No. 66 a bonded warehouse, and approved by him, and bonds given, but that the application was not approved by the secretary of the treasury till Dec. 29, subsequent to which time no entries had been made of any spirits for that warehouse. It appeared, however, that in November the goods were entered in No. 66 as a bonded warehouse, and bonds given; that afterward transportation bonds were given at the collector's office of the Third district for 500 barrels at one time from No. 66 Water street to California, and afterward similar bonds for 500 more, and that the collector in November appointed a man named Keith storekeeper for the place. Keith's testimony showed that the 508 barrels seized were part of the 1,000 barrels; that after the transportation bonds were given he authorized the cutting of the hole between the cellars and had not reported it till after the seizure, and that he had sometimes left parties in the building alone for hours together; that he had storekeeper's books, which were produced by the district attorney, but he would not swear that he had not made the entries in them all at one time and since the seizure, but they were taken from memorandums kept at the time.

On the close of the testimony, District Attorney Tracy claimed that the goods were forfeited, and that the court should direct the jury to render a verdict of forfeiture. First—They were forfeited under the 38th section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 187], because there had been placed upon them counterfeit and spurious brands. The brand purporting to have been put on by Stevens was spurious because he had no right to brand outside of his district, and the brand "Rectified by C. Smith" was spurious because there was no such rectifier. Moreover, the brands tended to show that the spirits were rectified and branded in the Thirty-Second district of New York, while they were rectified in Chicago. Second—They were forfeited under the forty-fifth section of the same act, because they were found elsewhere than in a bonded warehouse, not having been removed therefrom according to law, because (1) it did not appear that they were removed from Chicago according to law. The evidence showed a permit, but did not show that the proper bonds were given. (2) They were illegally removed from the bonded warehouse in the Thirty-Second district. Having been received there, the collector at Chicago had no right to issue a new permit to the Third district. (3) They were not branded for removal to the Third district, but to the Thirty-Second district. (4) No. 66 Water street was not a bonded warehouse when they were placed there. (5) They never were within the jurisdiction of Collector Pratt, never having been legally in bond in the Third district. (6) Conceding all the prior steps to be legal, Collector Pratt had no authority to authorize their transportation from the Third district to California, because the law gives no authority to transport spirits in bond, except from the distillers' bonded general warehouse to a general bonded warehouse. The district attorney also referred to section 29 of the act of July, 1866, and to section 48 of the act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 240], as amended by the act of 1866.

An important question came up during the testimony, as follows: The defendants offered in evidence permits given by Collector Pratt for the transportation of these spirits from No. 66 Water street to California. The district attorney objected to them on the ground that the spirits having been once removed from the distiller's bonded warehouse to a general bonded warehouse, the law did not allow of a second removal to another bonded warehouse, and that the permits therefore gave no authority for the removal.

THE COURT, after hearing argument, held that the law was as claimed by the district attorney, but admitted the permits as evidence of the intent under which the parties were acting in the removal of the spirits.

Sidney Webster, in reply, rapidly reviewed in order each of the sections, 29, 38, 45, and 48, upon which the district attorney relied, and in respect to the forfeiting clause of the 49th section, claimed (1) that this section only applied to spirits distilled subsequent to July 13, 1866, and that there was no evidence in the case on that point; (2) that the removal denounced was either from the distillery or the distillery bonded warehouse, and no other, and there was no evidence of such illegal removal in this case; (3) that the phrase "proper name or brand" referred only to commercial designation, as for example, calling spirits petroleum; and (4) that the forfeiture depended on prior criminal conviction of the offender. Under the thirty-eighth section, Mr. Webster contended that there was no evidence that "inspectors' brands or plates" had been used with "fraudulent intent," and that the phrase "counterfeit or spurious brands or plates" in the second clause referred only to brands or plates defined, prescribed and required by law, and not to mere trade marks, as substituting the words "French spirits" for Cologne spirits, or vice versa. He also claimed that this section applied only to spirits distilled subsequent to July 13, 1866, and the prosecution must in any event satisfy the jury of intent to evade the tax, and not an honest intent. This was for the jury and not for the court. He further claimed that the forty-fifth section referred only to spirits which, unlike those in controversy, had never been in a general bonded warehouse, as distinguished from a bonded warehouse; that under this section, spirits which have never been in a general warehouse, if found elsewhere than in a distillery warehouse, and proved to have been illegally removed and tax not paid, may be prosecuted for condemnation in court, or seized by the collector and sold under rules of distraint for taxes; and when the latter mode is elected, and not otherwise, is the burden of proof on the claimant to show the taxes paid, and that the forty-fifth section does not, in any case, apply to spirits on which taxes are secured by transportation bonds.

Mr. Webster claimed that under section 48, of 1864, as amended in 1866, the case could not, on the evidence, be taken from the jury; that, under this section, the prosecution must prove: (1) That taxes had been imposed on the spirits in controversy. (2) That the spirits were found in the control of certain persons identified and described. (3) That such person had at the time of such finding a purpose to sell and remove in fraud of law, and a design to avoid payment of taxes proved to have been imposed prior to the seizure, and that issue under this section is one of fact for the jury.

To the point made by the district attorney that the law of 1866 permitted but one removal to a general bonded warehouse, Mr. Webster cited the contrary decision of the department, its long acquiescence in it, its leading the public to suppose that any number of transportations could be made, and its recent sudden change of opinion. He contended that up to Jan. 16, 1867, the department had induced everybody to believe that transportation bonds could be canceled on payment of the tax, and that after a bond was accepted the owner could do what he pleased with the property therein described.

Mr. Webster also contended that under the doctrines laid down by the supreme court in The Favorite, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 347, and Three Hundred and Fifty Chests of Tea, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 586, spirits cannot be forfeited by acts done by other person than the owner or some person trusted by him, nor condemned for any removal proved in this case, made while taxes were secured by warehouse bonds, and added, that in no case is the burden of proof cast on the owner till the prosecution has established affirmatively an illegal removal or possession.

THE COURT—I do not propose in disposing of this motion to touch upon many of the questions argued; they may be, and perhaps are, all of them equally important in the case. I feel bound to put the case at present on the 45th section of the act of July 13, 1866. In my judgment the burden of proof under this statute is upon the claimants, and I think that that applies to all cases coming under the 45th section. That being so, I am of the opinion that there are no questions of fact which can go to the jury. It is my present opinion that the whole case must be held subject to review, when it may be argued more fully before a full bench; that this property was found outside of a bonded warehouse; that the claimants have not assumed the burden which the law casts upon them, and that the property must be forfeited under the 45th section. I think that is the wiser way of disposing of this case, in order that all those points may come up and be fully argued, and then disposed of by a full bench. If the views I entertain of section 45, or the views entertained by the district attorney of the other sections are erroneous, then, after a fuller investigation of the law, the case can be tried before a jury.

Mr. Webster—Does your honor take the case away from the jury also under the forty-eighth section?

THE COURT—I do not put it under the forty-eighth section at all; I leave that out of the case; I do not order judgment upon the forty-eighth section; I base my opinion upon the forty-fifth section. My present impression is it will have to go to the jury under the forty-eighth section. It must be a question of law under the other sections, and I will leave the district attorney the opportunity to sustain his verdict upon all the sections he can, except the forty-eighth section,—under that he cannot sustain it.

Mr. Webster—I ask your honor to instruct the jury that upon the first averment of the information in regard to the seizure there is no evidence before them sufficient to warrant the forfeiture of the property; that there is no evidence that the seizure of this property had been legally made. The first averment of the libel is that the deputy collector seized the following described property. That being the averment of the libel a legal seizure must be proved as an affirmative fact like any other proposition. There is no evidence that a legal seizure has been made, sufficient to go to the jury.

THE COURT—I will rule against you on that point.

Mr. Webster excepted.

Mr. Webster—Also that upon the evidence Dailey, the deputy collector, had no authority to seize.

THE COURT also refused this, and Mr. Webster excepted.

THE COURT—Gentlemen, in the aspect in which this case has turned, the claimants have failed to raise any question of fact for your disposition. The case turns upon a question of law. I, therefore, direct you to find a verdict for the government, condemning the goods.

THE COURT then allowed the claimants twenty days to make a case, or bill of exceptions, to be presented to the full court.

[Subsequently the claimant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. Case No. 15,113.]

Case No. 15,115.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE HUNDRED BARRELS OF WHISKY.

[2 Bond, 7.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1866.

DISTRICT ATTORNEY—PERCENTAGE—COMPROMISE.

1. A district attorney of the United States is entitled to two per cent. on all moneys collected, or realized, in any proceeding under the revenue or internal revenue laws of the United States conducted by him.

2. While a proceeding in rem, to forfeit distilled spirits for non-compliance with the provisions of the internal revenue laws of the United States, was pending in the United States district court, the owners of said spirits effected a compromise of the case with the secretary of the treasury by the payment of a large sum of money, and accrued costs, the case being dismissed and the property released to the owners by order of the secretary. Upon motion of the district attorney, for a retaxation of costs in the case, to include a commission to himself of two per cent. upon the sum paid to the secretary of the treasury: held, that, under section 11 of the act of March 3, 1863 [12 Stat. 741], the district attorney was entitled to receive from the United States two per cent. upon the sum paid by the terms of the compromise for the release of the property seized in said proceeding, as well as upon the sum paid as penalties incurred upon said property.

At law.

R. M. Corwine, for the motion.

A. F. Perry, for the United States.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This case is now before the court on the application of R. M. Corwine, attorney for the United States in this district. for a retaxation of costs.

The facts necessary to be noticed, in deciding the question before the court, are, substantially, that in September, 1865, five hundred barrels of whisky were shipped from Nashville, Tennessee, by the firm of Stephens & Stone, distillers of spirits in that city, consigned to H. L. Styles & Co., of the city of Cincinnati. After the arrival of the whisky here, it was ascertained by an inspector that the barrels containing the whisky were not branded as required by the internal revenue law, and that there was reason to believe the whole amount of duties chargeable on the whisky had not been paid a Nashville, and that it had been shipped from that place in violation of law. and was therefore liable to forfeiture. The inspector made complaint in due form, and the whisky was seized, and an information filed in this court praying for its condemnation. It is not necessary, in considering the question, to notice all the intermediate proceedings in relation to the whisky thus seized. Notwithstanding the certificate of the collector of internal revenue at Nashville, to the effect that the duties had been fully paid by the manufacturers, and that they had not been guilty of any violation of the law in regard to the whisky, such facts were presented to the commissioner of internal revenue at Washington as to induce the suspicion that the manufacturers had practiced a fraud upon the government; and for the ascertainment of the facts in relation to their transactions, Mr. Spooner, the collector for the First congressional district, and Mr. Kimber, an inspector for the same district, were appointed special commissioners by the head of the bureau of internal revenue at Washington, with authority to proceed to Nashville, and institute a thorough investigation of the doings of the firm of Stephens & Stone in connection with their business as distillers, and report the result to the department at Washington. This duty was promptly discharged by those gentlemen, who reported, after full investigation, that said firm had failed to make a full and fair report of the quantity of whisky manufactured by them, and consequently had subjected themselves to heavy penalties, and the forfeiture of all spirits owned by them, as well as their entire manufacturing establishment at Nashville. By this report, it appears that Stephens & Stone were in default in the payment of duties chargeable on the whisky made by them to the large sum of $77,740, and were liable, under the statute, to the payment of $52,260 on penalties incurred by them; making in the aggregate upward of $130,000. Upon this development, these parties repaired to Washington, and effected a compromise with the secretary of the treasury by the payment of the said sum of $130,000; and an order was therefore made for the discontinuance of the proceedings in this court against the five hundred barrels of whisky, and for the restoration of the same to Styles & Co., on the payment of accrued costs. As one of the conditions of the compromise, it was provided that the percentage due to the district attorney by law, for his services in filing and prosecuting the information in this court, should be paid by the treasury department at Washington. An order was therefore made for the discontinuance of the proceedings in this court, and for the delivery of the five hundred barrels of liquor to the said Styles & Co. On the presentation of his claim by the district attorney to the secretary of the treasury, he doubted his authority to pay it, and referred the question to the attorney general for his opinion. That officer decided, in substance, that the question was one involving the legal taxation of costs; was judicial in its character, and to be decided by the court in which the proceeding was brought. The secretary of the treasury thereupon declined to authorize the payment of the claim until there should be a judicial decision as to its legality. In this state of the case, the district attorney has very properly presented the question for the action of this court, on a motion to include his claim as an item in the taxation of costs. He claims, as legally taxable for his services in the case, two per cent. on $130.000, the sum paid into the treasury by Stephens & Stone under the compromise that has been referred to, amounting to $2,600. This taxation is opposed by the learned counsel who has been retained by the collector for the First internal revenue district, probably with the sanction and approval of the secretary of the treasury. The first position in his argument is, that it is not in the competency of the court to reform or amend the taxation of costs, after the dismissal of the information by order of the treasury department, and the payment of the costs taxed in the case by Stephens & Stone, according to the terms of the compromise. This point would be well taken, if the item now sought to be taxed, if allowed, would be chargeable to them. But, as they have fully complied with the conditions upon which the case was compromised, they are clearly not liable for any additional item in the taxation. It is now a question between the district attorney and the government. If the claim of the district attorney, in whole or in part, is allowed as a proper item of taxation, the government will be liable to pay it, and is willing to pay it, if it is adjudged to be legal. Indeed, it is within the spirit, if not within the letter, of the terms on which the secretary of the treasury ordered the dismissal of the information. And if the district attorney has not this remedy, there is no other course by which he can obtain compensation for his services.

In addition to the point suggested, the counsel resisting this taxation insists: (1) That there is no statutory provision under which compensation for the services of the district attorney can be included in the taxation of costs in this proceeding. (2) That if the district attorney's per centum is properly taxable, it can be estimated only on the proceeds of the whisky seized at Cincinnati, and within the jurisdiction of this court for adjudication, and not upon the whole amount paid into the treasury by Stephens & Stone, as due from them for unpaid duties and the penalties resulting from their violation of the law.

As to the first of the propositions, the court entertains no doubt that the district attorney is entitled to compensation in this case under section 11 of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 741). That section provides that there shall be taxed and paid to district attorneys two per centum upon all moneys collected or realized in any suit or proceeding arising under the revenue laws, conducted by them, in which the United States is a party. The words of this section are plain and intelligible. It gives to the district attorney two per cent. on all moneys collected or realized in any proceeding under the revenue laws, conducted by him. The argument of the counsel is, that this provision was intended for, and must be limited to, revenue cases arising under that statute, and can not be held to embrace a case arising under the internal revenue laws. But the language of the section does not require this restriction. It includes not revenue cases arising under that statute alone, but all cases arising under the revenue laws; embracing as well such as arise under the internal revenue laws as those that relate to import duties. If congress had not so intended, there would have been words used requiring the restricted interpretation contended for. It is argued that the title and subject-matter of the act impose this restriction. It is entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes." It is true the subject-matter of the act relates to external commerce, but the insertion of the words, in the title, for "other purposes," allows of provisions not immediately connected with that subject. And section 9 actually includes a subject wholly foreign to the general purpose of the act, namely, the renting of unproductive lands or other property of the United States acquired under judicial proceedings. I can not doubt, therefore, that section 11, before quoted, was intended to include, and from its phraseology does include, all cases arising under any revenue act, whether it relates to internal revenue or to duties upon imports. And this conclusion is fortified by the fact that the internal revenue laws contain, as I think, no provision for compensation to a district attorney, in the form of taxable costs, as a per centum on moneys collected or realized in proceedings to enforce forfeitures under those laws. And it would result, that if he can not tax the two per cent. authorized by section 11 of the act referred to, there is no provision of law for his compensation for services under the internal revenue laws, however laborious in themselves, or advantageous to the government.

As to the second point stated, namely, on what basis the percentage claimed shall be estimated, I concur with the views urged by the counsel resisting the taxation as claimed by the district attorney. The two per cent. to be taxed as his fees must be upon the moneys realized by the United States as the proceeds of the property seized by the process of this court, and within its jurisdiction. It is alleged by the district attorney, that the $130,000 paid by the Nashville distillers, for unpaid duties and penalties, was secured to the government by his vigilance and that of other government officials at Cincinnati, in seizing and retaining in the custody of the law the 500 barrels of whisky consigned to Styles & Co. And it is doubtless true, that the stupendous frauds practiced by Stephens & Stone would not have been developed except through the commendable zeal and vigilance of the district attorney and the revenue officials in this city. But I can not see that this fact affords any legal basis for a claim to a per centum by the district attorney on the gross sum paid by the Nashville firm for unpaid duties on spirits distilled, and the penalties resulting from their violations of law, at a place not within the jurisdiction of this court, and for which no decree of forfeiture could have been entered by this court. The jurisdiction of this court in this matter results from the accidental circumstance that a portion of the whisky manufactured was brought within the Southern district of Ohio, and here seized by legal process. Now, it is quite obvious that no per centum can be taxed to the district attorney except on the basis of the proceeds of the whisky seized, and for the condemnation of which the information was filed, and the penalties which, under the statute, attached to it. This will plainly appear from the consideration that if there had been no compromise between the government and the manufacturers, and the case had proceeded in this case to a decree of forfeiture, the district attorney's per centum could only have been taxed on the amount realized from the sale of the whisky. Although in this case there was no sale of the whisky, owing to the compromise made at Washington, and the consequent dismissal of the information filed in this court, yet as the amount claimed by the government was "realized," in the language of the statute, the district attorney is clearly entitled to two per cent. on the sum for which the 500 barrels would have sold in this market. And he is fairly entitled to his per centum on the proportion which the proceeds of the 500 barrels will bear to $52,260, being the sum paid by the Nashville firm to the government as the penalties incurred by them for violating the law. The government has "realized" the amount of penalties which attached to all the whisky manufactured, and I can not see any good reason why the district attorney may not claim a per centum on so much of the penalties as attaches to the 500 barrels proceeded against in this court. I shall direct the taxation to be made on the basis indicated. To make a specific taxation on this principle, the market value of the whisky must be ascertained, as also the proportion of the penalties which attached to the five hundred barrels under the terms of the compromise. And I would suggest the propriety of a reference of this matter to a competent person to ascertain the sum on which the two per cent. shall be estimated, unless counsel can agree upon the amount.

Case No. 15,116.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE HUNDRED BOXES OF PIPES.

[2 Abb. U. S. 500.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Michigan. April, 1870.

ADMIRALTY—JURISDICTION—CUSTOMS DUTIES—LIEN.

1. The admiralty jurisdiction of the district court in revenue cases, extends only to seizures for forfeitures under duty laws; as conferred by section 9 of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 76). The payment of duties can only be enforced by proceedings on the common law side of the court.

2. It seems where imported goods have been seized for an alleged violation of the revenue laws, and a decision has been rendered in favor of the claimant, that the United States is not deprived of its lien upon the goods for the duties unpaid.

Motion to rectify a decree.

This was an information in rem on a seizure for undervaluation. A decree on the merits was passed in favor of claimants, with a certificate of probable cause to the collector, and a writ of restitution to claimants, "upon payment of duties, or filing of a re-exportation bond." Motion was now made to strike out the words in quotations, requiring the payment of duties, &c.

A. Russell, for the motion.

A. B. Maynard, Dist. Atty., for the government.

LONGYEAR, District Judge. This case is in the admiralty; and it has been long since settled by the supreme court [U. S. v. 350 Chests of Tea] 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 486, that this court possesses no admiralty jurisdiction to enforce the payment of duties. Admiralty jurisdiction in revenue cases extends only to seizures for forfeitures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, as conferred by section 9 of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat 76). A suit to enforce the payment of duties must be on the common law side of the court, and not in the admiralty. This precise point was decided on mature consideration, by the supreme court, in the case of U. S. v. 350 Chests of Tea, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 486. That decision is of course conclusive upon the point, so far as this court is concerned. See, also, The Waterloo [Case No. 17,257].

In a case which was before the supreme court in 1809 (Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 281, 284), a decree seems to have been entered very much like the one in the present case; but the point here made does not seem to have been presented to or considered by the court, and the case is entitled to no weight as authority, as against the later decision (1827) in the same court, in the Tea Case, above cited; in which the point was presented and fully considered.

The motion is granted, and the decree must be modified accordingly.

As this decision is based upon a want of jurisdiction, the decree as modified, cannot, of course, in any manner affect any claim or lien which the United States may have for duties. Whether any such claim or lien exists, is a question so entirely outside this case that any consideration or decision of it here would seem to be out of place. I will, however, remark in passing, that by the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 186) § 31, the legal custody of the property seized has been and is now in the collector. If the duties have not been paid, they are of course still due and payable; and with the light that I now have, I can see no reason why they are not a lien now just the same as before the seizure. The doctrine of merger can no more be applied in this case than in the case of a mortgage held by a person claiming the title when it is for his interest to keep the mortgage alive; in which case, on the failure of the title, the mortgage lien can always be enforced. Neither can it be said that like a pledge, the lien is defeated by a voluntary relinquishment of possession, because the United States have all the time remained in full legal possession.

Motion granted.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE JUGS OF BRANDY.[1]

District Court, N. D. Florida. 1869.

VIOLATION OF CUSTOMS LAWS—FORFEITURE AND SEIZURE.

[The fact that foreign distilled spirits and wines are found in considerable quantity in an upper room of a private house, stored for safe-keeping, as alleged by the house owner, and not his property, justifies a seizure thereof, and places the burden upon the claimant to show that they were legally imported, and that the original packages had been inspected, marked, and branded, as required by law.]

Before FRASER, District Judge.

This was an information filed by the attorney of the United States, setting forth that the said liquors or spirits were fraudulently imported, and praying that they be condemned as forfeited to the United States. Held, that a considerable quantity of foreign distilled spirits and wines being found in an upper room of a private house, stored for safe-keeping, as alleged by the proprietor, and not his property, would justify a seizure. That such fact appearing, the burden of proof was upon the claimant to show that they were legally imported, and that the original packages had been inspected, marked, and branded, as required by law. Two witnesses for claimant having testified that the casks out of which the spirits and wines were drawn had an inspector's mark upon them, and one of said witnesses having stated that said inspector's mark was a curious mark, which he should not have noticed had not his attention been particularly called to it, and no other description having been given of said mark by said witnesses, or either of them, and it being in evidence that the said original packages were purchased in New York, and shipped direct to Florida, after verdict for the United States, and upon motion for a new trial, held, that the jury, being the judges of the facts, and of the credibility of the witnesses, did not exceed their province if they came to the conclusion, from the evidence, that the said original packages had no inspector's marks upon them, and that the said spirits and wines were fraudulently imported. Motion for a new trial was therefore denied.

UNITED STATES v. FIVE THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS IN SPECIE.

Circuit Court, D. Lousiana. April Term, 1870.

APPEAL—ADMIRALTY—TERMS OF COURT.

An appeal in a case of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction not taken to the next term of the circuit court after the rendition of the decree in the district court will be dismissed.

[Cited in The Chatham, 3 C. C. A. 161, 52 Fed. 397.]

Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.

The specie in this case was seized upon water and within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the district court. The court below having decreed in favor of claimant [case unreported], the United States appealed to this court. Thereupon a motion was made by claimant to dismiss the appeal.

Jos. P. Horner and W. S. Benedict, for the motion.

Alanson B. Long, U. S. Atty., contra.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. In this case, a motion to dismiss the appeal is made upon the ground that the appeal was not taken to the next circuit court of the United States, held within the district after the rendition of the decree. The record shows that the decree in favor of the defendant was signed on January 30, 1864. The law and records of this court show that the next circuit court for the district was held on the 25th of April, 1864.

An appeal was prayed and allowed on May 13, 1864, returnable on the first Monday of November, 1864, and the record was filed in this court on October 12, 1864. . The law says that appeals are allowed from final decrees in the district court, in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, to the next circuit court to be held in the district. 1 Stat. 83. This appeal was not taken to the next circuit court after the rendition of the decree, but one entire term of the circuit court was allowed to pass over, and the appeal was taken to the next following term. The causes referred to in the brief of appellee show that it is the practice of the circuit courts to dismiss appeals when not taken to the next circuit court. This practice is founded upon the statute, and seems to be in conformity with the policy of the law in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. That policy requires speedy administration of justice, and discourages delay. The statute says the appeal may be taken to the next circuit court, it authorizes an appeal to no other term. If we were authorized to depart from the wise rule laid down by the act of congress, there would be no limit to the delay which would follow in this class of cases. Because, therefore, the appeal was not taken to the next term of the circuit court held in the district after the rendition of the decree, the appeal must be dismissed.

UNITED STATES v. FLANAKIN.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1825.

COSTS — CRIMINAL CASE — WHEN PROSECUTOR LIABLE.

1. In all cases of trespass on the person or property of an individual, where the prosecution is carried on at the instance of the party aggrieved, he is liable for costs, and they may be adjudged against him.

2. The word "trespass," in the Criminal Code, has a technical and definite meaning, as is descriptive of offences of a lower grade only, such as misdemeanors, and does not mean crimes of a deeper dye, such as horse stealing, or the like, in which no prosecutor is necessary.

Indictment [against William Flanakin] for larceny.

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant, having been prosecuted for the crime of horse stealing, and, upon trial, acquitted by the jury, now makes, by his counsel, the following motion, namely: "That James Lemmons, the principal witness, and at whose instance the prosecution was instituted, should be subject to the payment of costs, as prosecutor." This question must be decided by the statute law. The only provisions upon the subject of which we are aware are to be found in Geyer, Dig. pp. 154, 155, and are as follows: "No bill of indictment for assault, battery, or any other trespass, shall be preferred to any grand jury, unless a prosecutor be endorsed thereon; and if the grand jury do in any such case return the bill, 'not a true bill,' it shall be the duty of the grand jury to decide, and cause the foreman to endorse thereon, whether the county or the prosecutor shall pay the costs; and where the indictment is returned by the jury 'a true bill,' and the defendant on trial is acquitted, the petit jury acquitting such defendant shall return, together with their verdict, whether the county or prosecutor shall pay the costs, and the court shall give judgment accordingly." "In all cases of prosecutions for assault and battery, or other trespasses, where the indictment or presentment shall be made from the knowledge of two or more of the grand jury, or upon the information of any public officer in the necessary discharge of his duty, or on the information of any other person other than he, she, or they, against whom the trespass is alleged to have been committed, it should be so stated at the end of the indictment or presentment, and no prosecutor shall be required."

From the preceding sections, it is manifest that a prosecutor is required only in one class of cases. In all cases of trespass against the person or property of individuals, a prosecutor is required where the prosecution is carried on by the person or persons aggrieved by the trespass; but even in these cases a prosecutor is not necessary, where the information is offered by any person against whom the trespass has not been committed. What, then, is meant by the word "trespass," as used in the statute? This is the only point upon which a doubt can arise. The word "trespass," when used in the Criminal Code, has a technical and definite meaning. It is descriptive of offences of a lower grade only, and is included in the term "misdemeanor." When the law defines the higher crimes,—crimes of deep atrocity,—other words than those of "trespass" or "misdemeanor" are employed. Treason, murder, robbery, and burglary, cannot be committed without committing a trespass, but no lawyer would contend that a conviction for murder could be had upon an indictment for trespass. Indeed, it is too clear to admit of doubt that the term "trespass" is used only to denote offences of a lower grade, and cannot be extended to embrace crimes of a deeper dye, designated and defined by their technical and appropriate appellations. As the word "trespass" does not include the offence of horse stealing, it follows that in the prosecution of that offence the law requires no prosecutor, and consequently this motion must be overruled.

Motion denied.

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLING—AUTREFOIS ACQUIT.

1. Where the defendants had been indicted under the twenty-third section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 153], for knowingly carrying on the business of a distiller, on June 22, 1867, without having paid the special tax, on which indictment they were tried and acquitted, the ground of the acquittal being that they were not the principals who were bound to pay the tax, and were afterwards indicted under the twenty-fifth section of the same act, for knowingly using a still for the purpose of distilling, in a certain dwelling-house, on June 22, 1867, the evidence on the trial of the first indictment showing that the place of the offence charged was this same dwelling-house:

2. Held, that a plea of autrefois acquit, founded on the acquittal under the first indictment, could not be sustained.

3. That the tests as to whether such a plea can be sustained are, whether the defendants could, under the earlier indictment, have been convicted of the offence embraced in the later one, and whether the evidence necessary to support the later indictment was sufficient to produce a legal conviction on the earlier one.

B. K. Phelps, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

J. Lux, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The defendants are indicted by an indictment found April 29, 1868 under section 25 of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866, for knowingly using a still for the purpose of distilling, in a certain dwelling-house situated at No. 189 Essex street, in the city of New York, on the 22d of June, 1867. They plead specially a plea of autrefois acquit, in this, that they have heretofore been indicted in the circuit court for this district, by an indictment found December 23, 1867, under section 23 of the same act, for knowingly carrying on in this district the business of a distiller, on the 22d of June, 1867, without having paid the special tax in that behalf required by the statutes of the United States, and that they have been tried on the indictment first found and acquitted. The earlier indictment specified no place where the business was carried on except this district generally, but it appears that the evidence given on the trial of that indictment showed that the place was the same dwelling-house specified in the later indictment, and that the ground of acquittal was, that the defendants were not principals in the business, and were not properly to be regarded as carrying on the business, and were not the persons bound to pay the special tax, and therefore were not within the twenty-third section. The twenty-third section provides, that if any person shall carry on the business of a distiller, without having paid the special tax as required by law, he shall for every such offence be liable to a fine of not less than double the tax imposed upon the spirits distilled by such person, or found upon the premises where the business is carried on in violation of the section, and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years. The twenty-fifth section provides, that no person shall use any still for the purpose of distilling in any dwelling-house, and that every person who shall use such still for the purpose of distilling in any dwelling-house, shall forfeit such still and all the spirits distilled, and pay a fine of one thousand dollars, or be imprisoned for not more than one year, in the discretion of the court.

I do not think there is any thing in the earlier indictment, or in the fact that the defendants were acquitted on it, to prevent their being indicted by the later indictment and being tried under it. The defendants could not, under the earlier indictment, have been convicted of the offence embraced in the later one, nor would the evidence necessary to support the later indictment have been sufficient to produce a legal conviction upon the earlier one. These are the proper tests as to whether the plea of a former conviction or a former acquittal is good or bad. Whart. Cr. Law (2d Ed.) pp. 196–199. Proof on the trial of the earlier indictment, that the defendants used a still for the purpose of distilling in a dwelling-house on Essex street, would not have been sufficient to convict them, under that indictment, of carrying on the business of a distiller, without having paid the special tax required by law; nor would it have been available to convict them, under that indictment, of having used a still for the purpose of distilling in a dwelling-house, because such earlier indictment contained no such charge. The offence created by the twenty-fifth section, is not a minor offence included in the offence created by the twenty-third section, as a greater offence so as to authorize, on an indictment for the offence created by the twenty-third section, a conviction for that created by the twenty-fifth section. The plea is, therefore, overruled.

Circuit Court, D. California. Sept. 4, 1876.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS — JURISDICTION AND DECREES — PURCHASERS — DECREE OF CONFIRMATION—ATTORNEY GENERAL —SURVEY.

1. The obligation to which the United States succeeded, under the stipulations of the treaty by which California was acquired, was political in its character, and provision was made for its discharge by the act of March 3, 1851 [9 Stat. 631]. By this act a special tribunal was created for the settlement of claims to land in California of Spanish and Mexican origin; and the jurisdiction conferred upon the tribunal and upon the courts empowered to review its decisions was, in its nature, exclusive.

2. Final decrees, touching the validity of such claims, rendered by these tribunals, are conclusive and final between claimants and the United States. Such decrees are not open to review in any court.

[Cited in Manning v. San Jacinto Tin Co., 9 Fed. 734.]

3. The frauds for which judgments are impeachable in courts of equity are collateral acts, extrinsic to the merits. They are acts by which the successful party has prevented his adversary from presenting the merits of his case, or by which the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon. Collusion between the parties to obtain a decision injurious to a third person; the purloining of an adversary's testimony; the service of process in such a manner as to defeat its purpose; false representations that the parties are really before the court; are examples of such frauds as render the judgment impeachable. But, where the matter involved has been once tried, or so put in issue that it might have been tried, the judgment rendered is the highest evidence that the alleged fraud did not exist, and estops the parties from asserting the contrary. The judgment settled the matter otherwise; it became res judicata.

4. Purchasers of lands under final decrees of confirmation cannot be disturbed upon charges of fraud in the prosecution of the claims confirmed and a vague allegation of notice of such fraud. Such purchasers have a right to rest in confidence upon the decrees.

[Cited in brief in U. S. v. San Pedro & Canon Del Agua Co. (N. M.) 17 Pac. 339.]

5. After the decision of the commissioners, the control of proceedings, whether to prosecute an appeal or to dismiss the same, rested exclusively with the attorney-general; and the propriety or legality of his action in any case was not the subject of review by any tribunal, and it could only be revoked by the appellate court upon his own application. In coming to a determination on the subject, he was not restricted to an examination of the transcript transmitted to him; he could look into the archives of the former government, the reports of officers previously appointed to examine into the subject of land titles in the state, the records of the land department at Washington, and any correspondence existing between Mexico and the United States respecting the title.

6. Where the United States enters the court as a litigant, it waives its exemption from legal proceedings, and stands upon the same footing with private individuals; and, therefore, if on a consideration of all the circumstances of a given case, it be inequitable to grant the relief prayed against a citizen, such relief will be refused by a court of equity, though the United States be the suitor.

7. In the absence of an act of congress, the power of the attorney general to institute proceedings to vacate these decrees of confirmation is doubtful

8. Whether the issue of a previous grant of eleven leagues to a claimant disqualifies him from receiving a second grant, is a question of law, and any error in its decision could be corrected only on appeal.

The three cases are suits in equity [by the United States against Benjamin Flint and others, S. R. Throckmorton and others, and H. W. Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, SAWYER, Circuit Judge, and HOFFMAN, District Judge.

FIELD, Circuit Justice. The case of U. S. v. Flint is a suit in equity, the main object of which is to set aside and annul the decree of the district court of the Southern district of California, confirming the claim of Teodocio Yorba to the rancho Lomas de Santiago, situated in the county of Los Angeles, in this state, and to recall and cancel the patent issued thereon by the United States. It is brought by the district attorney for California, and purports to be on behalf of the United States. It appears, from the allegations of the bill, and the record to which the bill refers, that in October, 1852, the claimant, who has since deceased, presented to the board of land commissioners, created under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, to ascertain and settle private land claims in California, a petition setting forth his claim to the rancho in question, and stating that the same was granted to him in May, 1846, by the governor of the department; that the grant had been approved by the departmental assembly; that juridical possession of the land had been delivered to him by competent authority, and its boundaries defined; and that he was then and had been previously in its peaceable occupation.

With the petition, and as part thereof, the claimant presented copies of the grant and act of juridical possession, accompanied by a translation of the same, and prayed that the grant be adjudged valid and confirmed to him. The board of commissioners considered the claim thus presented, and took the depositions of several witnesses in support of it, and, in August, 1854, rendered a decree adjudging it to be valid, and directing its confirmation. In November, 1855, a petition was filed on behalf of the United States, in the district court for the Southern district of California, for a review of the decision, alleging that the claim confirmed was invalid, and the decision of the commissioners erroneous; that the allegations of the complainant in his petition were unsupported by sufficient proof; and denying that he had any right or title to the land confirmed, or to any part of it. The claimant answered this petition, joining issue upon its allegations, and the court took jurisdiction of the case, heard it anew, and, in December, 1856, rendered its decree, affirming the decision of the commissioners, and readjudged the claim to be valid. An appeal from this decree to the supreme court of the United States was allowed, but the attorney general, after some months' deliberation, gave notice that the appeal would not be prosecuted; and thereupon the district court, upon the consent of the district attorney, vacated the order allowing the appeal, and gave the claimant leave to proceed upon its decree as a final decree in the case. A survey of the land was subsequently made under the direction of the surveyor general of the United States for California, and approved by that officer; and in February, 1868, a patent was issued to the claimant.

It thus appears that, after a contest for nearly sixteen years before officers and tribunals of the United States, the claimant obtained a patent from the government, an instrument designed to give to its holder security and protection in the enjoyment of the property covered by its terms. All the defendants acquired their interests in the land after the decree of confirmation, and two of them after the patent was issued. Nineteen years after the final decree was thus rendered and eight years after the patent was issued, the present bill was filed. And as grounds for setting aside and annulling the decree, and recalling and canceling the patent, the district attorney alleges upon information and belief: 1. That the grant and act of juridical possession were made subsequently to the acquisition of the country in 1846, and were fraudulently antedated, and that this appears on the face of the original papers on file in the Spanish archives in the custody of the surveyor-general of the United States; that the claimant fraudulently omitted to exhibit a complete record of the proceedings, and only presented extracts from them; and by this suppression the law agent of the United States was misled, the United States deprived of all opportunity to contest the confirmation, and the land commission and court were deceived into a confirmation of the claim; and, 2. That previous to the issue of the alleged grant, and as early as 1840, the claimant had obtained from the Mexican nation a grant of eleven leagues, situated in the counties of Sacramento, San Joaquin and Amador, which was subsequently confirmed by the supreme court of the United States; that by the laws of Mexico, a grant for more than eleven leagues could not be made to the same person, and that the claimant was therefore disqualified from receiving any other grant, and that the existence of this prior grant was fraudulently concealed from the law agent of the United States, the land commission, and the district court.

The district attorney also alleges in the bill, upon information and belief, that the approved survey is not in conformity with the boundaries given in the diseño, or map accompanying the grant and the act of juridical possession, but embraces a much greater quantity, and was made upon the fraudulent instigation and procurement of three of the defendants. The district attorney therefore prays that, in case he fail to obtain the annulment of the decree, and the recall and cancellation of the patent, the boundaries of the tract confirmed may be re-established and fixed in accordance with the views stated by him as to the location intended by the grant and act of juridical possession.

The first inquiry, which naturally arises upon the perusal of this bill, is as to what jurisdiction this court has to interfere with and review the determinations of the land commission and district court upon the validity of claims to land derived from Mexican or Spanish authorities, and of the land department in approving the surveys of the claims confirmed. The questions submitted to the commission and the district court were not within the ordinary cognizance of a court of law or a court of equity. They related to the obligations devolving upon our government from the concessions of the former government to its inhabitants. How far these concessions should be respected, and how far enforced, were the matters to be considered; and in their determination the tribunals were to be governed by the stipulations of the treaty, the law of nations, the laws, usage and customs of the former government, the principles of equity, and the decisions of the supreme court, so far as they were applicable.

By the transfer of California from Mexico to the United States, the rights of private property of the inhabitants were not affected. They remained as under the former government. The public property of Mexico and sovereignty over the country alone passed to the United States. This was in accordance with the rule of public law, which is recognized by all civilized nations when territory is ceded by one state to another. The obligation, therefore, to protect private rights of property devolved upon the United States, without any formal declaration to that effect. But, in recognition of this obligation, Mexico obtained from the United States, in the treaty of cession, an express stipulation for such protection. And the term property, as applied to lands, and as used in the treaty, comprehends every species of title, perfect or imperfect. "It embraces," says Chief Justice Marshall, "those rights which are executory as well as those which are executed." The United States, therefore, took California bound by the established principles of public law, and by express stipulation of the treaty, to protect all private rights of property of the inhabitants. The obligation rested for its fulfillment in the good faith of the government, and required legislative action. It could, therefore, only be discharged in such manner and at such times and upon such conditions as congress might, in its discretion, direct. In its discharge, such action was required as would enable the inhabitants to assert and maintain their rights to the property in the courts of the country as fully and absolutely as though their titles were derived directly from the United States. Where the titles were imperfect (and such was the condition of nearly all the titles held in the country), further action, by way of confirmation or release from the new government, was essential. With respect to all such titles, and, indeed, with respect to all matters dependent upon executory engagements of the government, the ordinary courts of the United States, whether of law or equity, were entirely powerless. They were without jurisdiction, and utterly incompetent to deal with them.

By the act of March 3, 1851, the legislative department prescribed the mode in which the provisions of the treaty should be carried out, and the obligations of the government to the former inhabitants discharged, so far as their rights respected the territory acquired; and thus provided the means of separating their property from the public domain. That act created a commission of three persons, to be appointed by the president, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, for the express purpose of ascertaining and settling private land claims in the state. It gave a secretary to the commission, skilled in the Spanish and English languages, to act as interpreter and to keep a record of its proceedings. It provided an agent, learned in the law and skilled in those languages, to superintend the interests of the United States, and it was made his duty to attend the meetings of the commissioners, to collect testimony on behalf of the United States, and to be present on all occasions when the claimant, in any case, took depositions. To the commission, every person claiming lands in California, by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican governments, was required, on pain of forfeiting his land, to present his claim, together with the documentary evidence and testimony upon which he relied in its support. The commissioners, while sitting as a board, and at their chambers, were authorized to administer oaths and take depositions in any case pending before them. The testimony was to be reduced to writing, and recorded in books provided for that purpose. The commissioners were obliged to hear every case, and decide upon the validity of the claim, and, within thirty days after their decision, to certify the same, with the reasons on which it was founded, to the district attorney of the district. The act provided also for a review of the decision of the commissioners, upon petition of the claimant or the district attorney, setting forth the grounds upon which the validity or invalidity of the claim was asserted. To the petition an answer was required from the contestant, whether claimant or the United States. Subsequently, in August, 1852, the act was changed in this particular, and, when a decision was rendered by the commissioners, they were required to prepare two certified transcripts of their proceedings and decisions, and of the papers and evidence upon which the same were founded, one of which was to be transmitted to the attorney-general, and the other filed with the clerk of the district court, and this filing operated as an appeal on behalf of the party against whom the decision was rendered. In case the decision was against the United States, the attorney-general, within six months after receiving the transcript, was required to cause a notice to be filed with the clerk that the appeal would be prosecuted, or it was to be regarded as dismissed.

Upon the review by the district court upon the petition or appeal, not merely the evidence before the commissioners was considered, but further evidence could be taken by either the claimant or the government; so that, in fact, the whole matter was heard anew, as upon an original proceeding. From its decision, an appeal lay to the supreme court of the United States.

As thus seen, the most ample powers were vested in the commissioners and the district court to inquire into the merits of every claim; and they were not restricted in their deliberations by any narrow rules of procedure or technical rules of evidence, but could take into consideration the principles of public law and of equity in their broadest sense. When the claim was finally confirmed, the act provided for its survey and location, and the issue of a patent to the claimant. The decrees and the patents were intended to be final and conclusive of the rights of the parties, as between them and the United States. The act, in declaring that they should only be conclusive between the United States and the claimants, did, in fact, declare that as between them they should have that character.

Here, then, we have a special tribunal, established for the express purpose of ascertaining and passing upon private claims to land derived from Spanish or Mexican authorities, clothed with ample powers to investigate the subject and determine the validity of every claim, and the propriety of its recognition by the government, capable as any court could possibly be made of detecting frauds connected with the claim, and whose first inquiry in every case was necessarily as to the authenticity and genuineness of the documents upon which the claim was founded.

We have a special jurisdiction of a like nature in the district court to review the decision made by the commissioner, and investigate anew the claim. We have principles prescribed for the government of both commission and court in these cases, and of the supreme court, upon appeal from their decisions, not applicable in ordinary proceedings, either at law or in equity, and as already stated, every person claiming land in the state was required to present his claim for investigation. The onerous duty thus thrown upon him was relieved of its oppressive characted by the accompanying assurance, that, when his claim was adjudged valid, the adjudication should be final and conclusive.

On principle, such adjudications cannot be reviewed or defeated by a court of equity, upon any suggestion that the commissioners and court misapprehended the law, or were mistaken as to the evidence before them, even if that consisted of fabricated papers supported by perjured testimony. The very questions presented by the present bill were necessarily involved in the proceeding before the commissioners and the district court, and the credibility of the testimony offered was a matter considered by them. Whether the grant produced by the claimant was genuine, and the claim resting thereon was entitled to confirmation, were the points at issue. The bill avers that the alleged grant was not genuine because it was ante-dated. But the genuineness of the document was the matter sub judice, and could not have been established, and the claim based upon it affirmed, except by evidence satisfactory to the commission and court, that it was made at the time stated.

It is to no purpose in such case to invoke the doctrine that fraud vitiates all transactions, even the most solemn, and that a court of equity will set aside or enjoin the enforcement of the most formal judgments when obtained by fraud. The doctrine of equity in this respect is not questioned; it is a doctrine of the highest value in the administration of justice, and its assertion in proper cases is essential to any remedial system adequate to the necessities of society. But it cannot be invoked to reopen a case in which the same matter has been once tried, or so put in issue between the parties that it might have been tried. The judgment rendered in such a case is itself the highest evidence that the alleged fraud did not exist, and estops the parties from asserting the contrary. It is afterwards mere assumption to say that the fraud was perpetrated. The judgment has settled the matter otherwise; it is res judicata.

The frauds for which courts of euity will interfere to set aside or stay the enforcement of a judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, must consist of extrinsic collateral acts not involved in the consideration of the merits. They must be acts by which the successful party has prevented his adversary from presenting the merits of his case, or by which the jurisdiction of the court has been imposed upon.

All litigants are equally entitled to justice from the tribunals of the country; they can claim equal opportunities of producing their testimony and presenting their case, and they can equally have the advocacy of counsel. Whenever one party by any contrivance prevents his adversary from having this equality with him before the courts, he commits a fraud upon public justice, which, resulting in private injury, may be the ground of equitable relief against the judgment recovered. Thus, if, through his instrumentality, the witnesses of his adversary be forcibly detained from the court, or bribed to disobey its subpœna, or the testimony of his adversary be secreted or purloined, or if the citation to him be given under such circumstances as to defeat its purpose, a fraud is committed, for which relief will be granted by a court of equity, if it produce injury to the innocent party. Any conduct of the kind mentioned would tend to prevent a fair trial on the merits, and thus to deprive the innocent party of his rights. So, if the litigation be collusive; if the parties be fictitious; if real parties affected are falsely stated to be before the court, the judgment recovered may be set aside or its enforcement restrained, for in all these cases there would be the want of the actual litigation which is essential to a valid judicial determination. To every such case the words of the jurist would be applicable: "Fabula, non judicium, hoc est; in scena, non in foro, res agitur."

The credibility of testimony given in a case, bearing upon the issue, is not an extrinsic collateral act, but is a matter involved in the consideration of the merits; and the introduction of false testimony, known or shown to be so, does not affect the validity of the judgment rendered. In every litigated case where the interests involved are large, there is generally conflicting evidence. Witnesses, looking at the same transaction from different standpoints, give different accounts of it. The statements of some are unconsciously affected by their wishes, hopes, or prejudices. Some, from defective recollection, will blend what they themselves saw or heard with what they have received from the narration of others. Uncertainty as to the truth in a contested case will thus arise from the imperfection of human testimony. In addition to this source of uncertainty may be added the possibility of the perjury of witnesses, and the fabrication of documents. The cupidity of some and the corruption of others may lead to the use of these culpable means of gaining a cause. But every litigant enters upon the trial of a cause, knowing not merely the uncertainty of human testimony when honestly given, but that, if he has an unscrupulous antagonist, he may have to encounter frauds of this character. He takes the chances of establishing his case by opposing testimony, and by subjecting his opponent's witnesses to the scrutiny of a searching cross-examination. The case is not the less tried on its merits, and the judgment rendered is none the less conclusive by reason of the false testimony produced. Thus, if an action be brought upon a promissory note, and issue be joined on its execution, and judgment go for the plaintiff, and there be no appeal, or if an appeal be taken, and the judgment be affirmed, the judgment is conclusive between the parties, although, in fact, the note may have been forged and the witnesses who proved its execution may have committed perjury in their testimony. The rules of evidence, the cross-examination of witnesses, and the fear of criminal prosecution with the production of counter testimony, constitute the only security afforded by law to litigants in such cases. A court of equity could not afterward interfere upon an allegation of the forgery and false testimony, for that would be to reopen the case to a trial upon the execution of the note, which had already been sub judice, and passed into judgment.

These views are in consonance with the adjudged cases. We have looked in vain through all those cited by the learned associate counsel in the Throckmorton Case for anything infringing upon them. In the Duchess of Kingston's Case [1 Leach, 146] the sentence of the spiritual court was held to be fraudulent and void, because obtained by collusion of the parties. And, in giving the opinion of the judges to the house of lords, Chief Justice De Grey observed that, although a judgment was conclusive evidence upon the point involved, and could not be impeached from within, yet, like all other acts of the highest judicial authority, could be impeached from without, and that fraud was an extrinsic collateral act which vitiated the most solemn proceedings of courts of justice.

In the Shedden Case, 1 Macq. 535, the question was whether a judgment of the court of sessions of Scotland against the legitimacy of the plaintiff, affirmed by the house of lords, could be attacked in another suit in the inferior court, and treated as a nullity for collusive suppression of proof which would have established his parents' marriage. The house of lords held that the judgment could be thus attacked, but that the allegations of fraud and collusion in the case were not sufficiently specific, pointed, and relevant to be admitted to proof. Opinions in the case were given by the chancellor and two of the law lords, Brougham and St. Leonards. The judgment of the house of lords, said Brougham, was to be "dealt with in the inferior court before which its merits were brought; that is to say, not the merits of the judgment, but the merits of the parties who had so fraudulently obtained it—the question being, was it a real judgment or not? For that is the only question in such cases, and that is the question in this case."

In Fermor's Case, 3 Coke, 77, the tenant continued to pay rent to his landlord after he had levied a fine with proclamation to bar the inheritance, and thus kept the latter in ignorance of that proceeding. The tenant attempting, after the expiration of the lease, to hold the property on the ground that the right of the landlord was barred by the lapse of time allowed by statute to make an entry or bring his action after the fine, the court, upon a bill filed for relief, held that he was not barred, by reason of the deception practiced upon him. The payment of the rent was in fact a declaration by the tenant that his relation to the landlord had not changed, and operated as a fraud preventing the latter from asserting his rights.

Great stress is placed by the learned associate counsel upon these last two cases; but it is evident, from the statement we have made, that the fraud alleged in both cases was an extrinsic collateral act which prevented the complaining party, in the one instance, from having the merits of his case considered, and in the other instance from taking proceedings for his protection. So in all the other cases, extrinsic collateral acts of fraud will be found to constitute the grounds upon which the court has acted. And on principle it must be so, for if the merits of a case could be a second time examined by a new suit, upon a suggestion of false testimony, documentary or oral, in the first case there would be no end to litigation. The greater the interests involved in a suit, the severer generally the contention; and in the majority of such cases, the recovery of judgment would be the occasion of a new suit to vacate it, or restrain its enforcement. If the present bill could be sustained upon the grounds alleged, and we should set aside the decree of the district court, a new bill might years hence be filed to annul our judgment and reinstate the original decree, on the same grounds urged in this case, that fabricated papers and false testimony had been used before us, which eluded the scrutiny of the counsel and escaped our detection. Of course, under such a system of procedure, the settlement of land titles in the state would be postponed indefinitely, and the industries and improvements, which require for their growth the assured possession of land, would be greatly paralyzed.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that there is no ground of fraud presented by the bill for the interference of a court of equity with the decree of confirmation rendered by the district court. It is upon that ground alone that the bill proceeds. It is not a bill of review for new matter, discovered since the decree. A bill of that character can only be filed by leave of the court; and that cannot be obtained without a showing that the new matter could not have been used in the original cause, and could not previously have been ascertained by reasonable diligence. It does not lie where the decree in the original cause was obtained by consent, or where objections to the decree rendered were subsequently withdrawn and consent was given to its execution. And it can only be allowed by a court possessing the power, upon a review of the case, to determine the rights of the parties to the property, or in the matter involved, or, at least, authorized to remit the case to a tribunal having adequate jurisdiction for that purpose. The present bill was not filed upon leave; and this court possesses no power to determine the right of the claimant, upon any review of the case, to a confirmation of his claim, and the only tribunal to which such a determination could be remitted has long since ceased to exist.

But there are other and equally potential grounds against the maintenance of the present suit. The land commission and the district court, though exercising a special jurisdiction, were invested with very large and extensive powers. They were not, as already stated, bound in their decisions to any strict rules of technical law, but could be governed by the principles of equity in their widest scope. The result of their inquiries was to guide the government in the discharge of its treaty obligations. Considerations, therefore, which could not be presented to ordinary tribunals, might very properly be regarded by them.

After the determination of the commissioners, if against the United States, the control of the proceedings was placed with the attorney-general. It rested with him exclusively to determine whether the appeal from the commissioners, taken by filing a copy of the transcript with the clerk of the district court, should be prosecuted or dismissed. So, also, when an appeal was taken from the decree of the district court, he could, in the same way, direct its prosecution or dismissal. Considerations of policy, as well as of strict right, might be deemed by him sufficient to control his action in this respect. In coming to a determination on the subject, he was not restricted to an examination of the transcript transmitted to him; he could look into the archives of the former government, the reports of officers previously appointed to examine into the subject of the land titles of the state, the records of the land department at Washington, and any correspondence existing between Mexico and the United States respecting the title. His power was unlimited, and the propriety or legality of his action in any case was not the subject of review by any tribunal whatever, and it could only be revoked by the appellate court upon his own application.

In the case of Yorba [unreported], the appeal from the decree of confirmation, rendered by the district court, was dismissed upon notice of the attorney-general that the appeal would not be prosecuted, and thereupon the decree became final. The decree was thus assented to by the highest legal officer of the government, specially charged with supervision over the subject. The validity of the decree, and of the grant upon which the claim of Yorba was founded, was thus forever put at rest. From that day it could never be successfully questioned in any form of procedure, or by any tribunal known to our laws. It was a closed question for all time.

But this is not all. The defendants purchased their interests after the final decree. They are charged in the bill, it is true, generally, with notice of the alleged frauds of the claimant, but when, or where, or in what manner they had notice, is not averred. The vagueness of the allegation gives it only the weight of mere clamor. But, assuming that the defendants had sufficient notice to put them upon inquiry, they had at the same time notice of the decree, which was an adjudication—the highest possible evidence—that the alleged frauds had no actual existence; and that to this adjudication the government, through its attorney-general, had consented. They had a right, therefore, to rely implicitly upon the decree, and rest in confidence upon the assurance of its finality, given by the only officer of the United States who could question it. They can, therefore, justly insist upon protection in the property purchased; and no court of equity, under the circumstances, would lend its aid to the commission of so great a wrong as the destruction of their title.

Where the district attorney of this district obtains authority to institute, in the name of the United States, a suit for that purpose, we are not informed. There is no law of congress which requires it or allows it; and we have sought in vain for the power of the attorney-general to direct it. That officer can, it is true, institute or direct the institution of suits for the revocation and cancellation of patents of lands belonging to the United States, issued upon false and fraudulent representations to the executive officers of the land department, or upon their misconstruction of the law. He is the legal adviser of the heads of the executive departments, and if they are fraudulently imposed upon, or have mistaken the law, he can take the necessary legal proceedings to recall the results of their action. But that is a very different matter from instituting or directing proceedings to vacate or recall patents founded upon decrees of a commission or court exercising a special and exclusive jurisdiction over the subjects investigated, where the law declares that such decrees shall be final and conclusive between the parties, and to which decrees the attorney-general in office at the time assented. Those decrees established the obligation of the United States to the claimants under the treaty; and if the legislative department, which authorized the proceedings before the commission and court, be satisfied with the result, it is difficult to see upon what pretense the attorney-general can seek to disturb it. If the attorney-general, by virtue of his office, possesses any such extraordinary power, as claimed in the case, to disregard the action of his predecessor, and to renew litigation at his pleasure respecting the titles of a whole people, upon a suggestion that false testimony may have been used in the original proceedings, the security which the holders of patents from the government issued upon such decrees have hitherto felt in their possessions is unfounded and delusive. We must have further evidence than is presented to us before we can admit the existence of a power so liable to abuse, and so dangerous to the peace of the community.

But if we admit that the attorney-general is authorized to direct the institution of a suit like the present, in the name of the United States, and that the district attorney has been thus directed, his power in this respect must be exercised in subordination to those rules of procedure and those principles of equity which govern private litigants seeking to avoid a previous judgment against them. The United States, by virtue of their sovereign character, may claim exemption from legal proceedings; but when they enter the courts of the country as a litigant they waive this exemption, and stand on the same footing with private individuals. Unless otherwise provided by statute, the same rules as to the admissibility of evidence are then applied to them; the same strictness as to motions and appeals is enforced; they must move for a new trial or take an appeal within the same time and in like manner, and they are equally bound to act upon evidence within their reach. And, when they go into a court of equity, they must equally present a case by allegation and proof entitling them to equitable relief.

Although, on grounds of wise public policy, no statute of limitations runs against the Uniter States, and no laches in bringing a suit can be imputed to them, yet the facility with which the truth could originally have been shown by them if different from the finding made; the changed condition of the parties and of the property from lapse of time; the difficulty, from this cause, of meeting objections which might, perhaps, at the time, have been readily explained; and the acquisition of interests by third parties upon faith of the decree, are elements which will always be considered by the court in determining whether it be equitable to grant the relief prayed. All the attendant circumstances of each case will be weighed, that no wrong be done to the citizen, though the government be the suitor against him.

The bill in the present case not only does not disclose, as already shown, any extrinsic collateral acts of fraud constituting grounds for equitable relief, but alleges that the antedating of the grant and act of juridical possession, which form the gravamen of complaint, appear on the face of the original documents on file in the archives in the custody of the surveyor-general of the United States. If this be so, the law agent should have shown the fact by the production of the originals. He should have inspected original documents in all cases where copies alone were offered by the claimant, whether suspicions were excited or not as to their genuineness. The law of Mexico with respect to the alienation of her public lands was well known at the time. It had been the subject of reports to the government by agents employed to look into the grants of the former government, and of consideration and comment by the courts in numerous instances. That law pointed out the proceedings required for the acquisition of titles of land from Mexico, and showed that a record of them was required to be kept. That record was in the possession of the United States, and should have been examined by the law agent of the government whenever any of its entries or documents were the foundation of a claim. He was appointed for the express purpose of looking after and protecting the interests of the United States. The allegation that the claimant was guilty of a fraudulent suppression in not producing all the documents in the archives respecting his title is puerile. He produced all that was necessary to present his claim, and if the law agent was not satisfied with them, he should have made his objection at the time. The archives were not in an "unsearchable condition," as alleged, until 1858; but even if they had been, the law agent could still have insisted upon the production of the originals for inspection.

After the archives were arranged and the alleged "unsearchable condition" ceased, nearly eighteen years elapsed before the present bill was filed, and no excuse is offered for this delay. During these eighteen years, which constitute a period equivalent almost to a century in other countries, great changes in the condition and value of real property in the state have occurred. During this period, the original claimant, who might perhaps have explained the alleged alteration of dates, has deceased, and third parties have acquired his interests, and, it is said, have made valuable and expensive improvements upon the property. Courts of equity will not entertain a suit to vacate a decree, even in case of palpable frauds, when there has been unnecessary delay in its institution, and the rights of third parties, as in this case, have intervened in reliance upon the decree. Considerations of public policy require prompt action in such cases, and if, by delay in acting, innocent parties have acquired interests, the courts will turn a deaf ear to the complaining party. This is the doctrine of equity, irrespective of any statute of limitations, and irrespective of the character of the suitor. It is essential that this doctrine should be vigorously upheld for the repose of titles and the security of property.

It only remains to notice the allegations of the bill with respect to a previous grant of eleven leagues, stated to have been obtained by the claimant from the Mexican nation in 1840, and the allegation that the approved survey of the claim confirmed was not in accordance with the map accompanying the grant, and the act of juridical possession.

Whether the issue of a previous grant to the claimant for the quantity designated would have disqualified him from receiving a second grant, was a question of law, to be determined by the commissioners and district court; and any error committed in its determination could only be corrected on appeal. And the allegation of fraudulent concealment by the claimant of the existence of the prior grant is an idle one in the face of the fact that the Mexican law, of which the court is bound to take notice, required a record of every grant to be kept, and that this record, with other public property, passed to the United States on the cession of the country. If there was any such grant as stated, so far from its existence being concealed by the claimant, the evidence of its existence was in the custody of the government, and its attention had been specially directed to the document by agents appointed to ascertain what grants had been made by the former government, who examined the records and reported a list of all grants found among them. Allegations thus in conflict with the public records and public history of the country need not be specially controverted any more than allegations at variance with the settled law. A fraudulent concealment by the claimant of a public record, never in his possession, but always in the keeping of the government, and open at all times to the inspection of the world, was a thing impossible. The bill might, with as much propriety, have alleged that the claimant concealed from the court one of the public statutes of the country.

As to the alleged error in the survey of the claim, it need only be observed that the whole subject of surveys upon confirmed grants, except as provided by the act of 1860, which did not embrace this case, was under the control of the land department, and was not subject to the supervision of the courts. Whether the survey conforms to the claim confirmed, or varies from it, is a matter with which the courts have nothing to do; that belongs to a department whose action is not the subject of review by the judiciary in any case, however erroneous. The courts can only examine into the correctness of a survey when, in a controversy between parties, it is alleged that the survey made infringes upon the prior rights of one of them; and can then look into it only so far as may be necessary to protect such rights. They cannot order a new survey, or change that already made.

It follows, from the views we have expressed, that the demurrer to the bill must be sustained; and as no amendment would reach the principal objection, namely: that the alleged frauds are not such extrinsic collateral acts as would justify the interference of equity with the decree of confirmation, the bill must be dismissed.

The principal objection to the bill in this case applies with equal force to the bills in the Throckmorton and Carpentier Cases, and the demurrers in those cases will also be sustained, and the bills dismissed. The allegation in the Throckmorton Case, that the defendant Howard had notice of the fabrication of the papers from the claimant, given in other proceedings before the board, and other allegations imputing guilty knowledge to him and to the other defendants, are too vague and general to merit consideration, made as they are in a bill not verified, and only upon information and belief. The district attorney should at least have stated the sources of his information and the grounds of his belief, that the court might see that the former was something better than idle rumor, and the latter something more than unfounded credulity.

The defendant Howard has filed an answer denying under oath, generally and specifically, every charge against him; but by stipulation on the argument, he is to have the benefit of the decision upon the demurrer.

As the questions presented in the several cases are of vast importance to the people of this state, the district judge, whose great experience in the examination of land cases gives weight to his views, will read a concurrent opinion with special reference to the Carpentier Case.

Our judgment is that the demurrers be sustained in the three cases, and the bills be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

HOFFMAN, District Judge, concurring. As the principal questions involved in these cases are the same, they have been argued and submitted together. For convenience of treatment, I have confined my attention, in this opinion, to the case of U. S. v. Carpentier; but the views expressed will apply to all.

The bill in this case in substance alleges that on the ninth of May, 1852, Victor Castro and Juan Jose Castro presented to the board of commissioners for ascertaining and settling private land claims in California, a petition praying a confirmation of their title to a certain sobrante or surplus of lands lying between the ranchos of San Antonio, San Pablo, Pinole, Moraga and Valencia. That in support of this claim, the defendant Carpentier, as attorney for the other defendants, presented to the board certain documentary proofs in the bill particularly mentioned.

That the board of commissioners considered the claim, and on the third day of July, 1855, rendered an opinion thereon, and, on the same day, rendered a final decree therein, adjudging "the claim of the said petitioners, Juan Jose and Victor Castro, to be valid, and decreeing that the same be and is hereby confirmed."

That afterwards, on or about the sixth day of February, 1856, a certified copy of said proceedings and decree was duly filed with the clerk of the United States district court for the Northern district of California.

That on the fourth of April, 1856, a notice was filed from the attorney-general of the United States, to the effect that the appeal from the decision of the board of commissioners would be prosecuted by the United States.

That on the sixth of April, 1857, a further notice from the attorney-general was filed, to the effect that the appeal would not be prosecuted by the United States, and on the same day a stipulation was signed by Wm. Blanding, Esq., district attorney, and by the attorney for the claimants, consenting that the appeal be withdrawn and dismissed. Upon which notice and stipulation an order was made by the district court, dismissing the appeal and giving leave to the claimants to proceed under the decree of the board of commissioners as under final decree.

That since said date no other proceedings have been had in said case or claim.

The bill further charges that the documentary evidence so presented to the board by the claimants was forged, fraudulent, antedated, and fabricated—in pursuance of a conspiracy entered into by Juan Jose and Victor Castro, Juan B. Alvarado and Francisco Arce, whose names appear on the said documents. That the said simulated petition and grant were so forged, fabricated, and antedated with the full knowledge and consent of the defendants, Carpentier and Adams, and that they have, from the date of said forgery, claimed and asserted title to the said sobrante lands, or a portion thereof.

The bill further charges, that in the proceedings before the board, the defendants, Carpentier, Adams and Castro, and their assistants, intentionally and fraudulently suppressed and failed to present to the said board the grants which had been made by the government of Mexico of the said ranchos of San Antonio San Pablo, Pinole, Moraga, and Valencia, with intent to conceal from the law agent and from the said commissioners the fact that the said pretended sobrante had been antedated as aforesaid, and that if said grants had been presented, it would have appeared that two of the said ranchos were not granted until several months subsequently to the date of the said pretended sobrante grant.

That by the said fraudulent misrepresentations, concealment, and suppression, the law agent was deceived and misled, and the United States deprived of all opportunity to contest the confirmation of said grant, on the grounds aforesaid, and the said commissioners were likewise deceived and misled, and induced to confirm the grant to the manifest detriment of the United States.

The bill further avers that the facts aforesaid were not discovered by the United States until long after the said grant had been confirmed, and not until within one year next preceding the filing of this bill, and "that said facts have been derived from the information of living witnesses, from an examination of the archives, from court records, and from other sources."

The prayer of the bill is that by the decree of this court the said grant be declared fraudulent and invalid, and that the confirmation thereof was obtained by fraud; that the dismissal of the appeal in the district court was obtained by fraud; that said grant and confirmation be annulled and set aside; and that said defendants, and each of them, be forever estopped from asserting any title to said lands under said pretended grant or decree of confirmation, purchase, or possession; and that the same are public lands of the United States.

The defendants have demurred to the bill on the ground that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit.

By the ninth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, it was stipulated "that Mexican citizens shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion, without molestation."

To enable the United States to fulfill this obligation, it was necessary to provide means for ascertaining what lands in the ceded territory were held in private ownership, and of what lands the title passed to the United States.

The means adopted were the instrumentalities and proceedings provided in the act of March 3, 1851.

Its title expresses its object. It is entitled "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in California."

The first section provides that, for the purpose of ascertaining and settling private land claims in California, a commission shall be constituted, consisting of three commissioners, etc. By subsequent sections, it is made the duty of the commissioners to examine the claims submitted to them, and to decide upon their validity, and rules are prescribed by which their decisions shall be governed.

The fourth section provides for the appointment of a law agent, whose special duty it shall be "to superintend the interests of the United States" in the premises, to attend the meetings of the board, to collect testimony in behalf of the United States, and to attend at the taking of depositions by the claimants; and no deposition is allowed to be read in evidence unless taken on notice in writing to the agent or to the district attorney, if the case is appealed to the district court. Other sections confer upon the district court jurisdiction to hear the cause de novo on appeal, and particularly prescribe the manner in which appeals shall be taken and the proceedings conducted; and finally the right of appeal to the supreme court is given to either party.

The final decrees rendered by the commissioners, or by the district or supreme courts, or any patent issued under the act, are, by section 15, declared to be conclusive between the United States and the said claimants, but shall not affect the interests of third persons.

The submission of their claims to the tribunal thus constituted was not left to the choice of the claimants.

By section 8, each and every person claiming lands by virtue of any right or title derived from the former governments of California, was required to present the same, together with the documentary evidence and testimony of witnesses relied on, to the board; and the thirteenth section declares that all lands, the claims to which shall not have been presented to the commissioners within two years after the date of the act, shall be deemed, held and considered as part of the public domain of the United States.

This act, although benevolently designed, has in its practical operation imposed a grievous, though perhaps unavoidable, burden upon the holders of Mexican titles in this state. They have been subjected to the expense and delay of a litigation which, after the lapse of more than twenty-five years, can scarcely be said to have terminated. To whatever criticisms the act of 1851 may be obnoxious, it certainly cannot be reproached for having failed to guard the interests of the United States in the amplest manner.

The appeals to the district court from the decisions of the board gave to both parties, in every case, the benefit of a trial de novo on the merits, with the unrestricted right to take further proofs. Six months were allowed to the party against whom the board had decided to determine whether or not the appeal should be prosecuted. From the decree of the district court an appeal was allowed to the supreme court, to be taken at any time within five years; and even when the cause had reached the supreme court, it might still be remanded for further proof, in case the evidence with regard to the validity of the claim was deemed to be unsatisfactory. U. S. v. Teschmaker, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 392; U. S. v. Pico, Id. 404; U. S. v. Vallejo, Id. 416; U. S. v. Cambuston, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 59.

Such were the means adopted by the political department of the government to enable it to discharge its treaty obligations with intelligence and justice. It, in effect, called to its assistance the courts, and for that purpose invested them with a jurisdiction in all respects special and extraordinary, and which, except for the act, they would not have possessed. Foster v. Neilson, 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 314; U. S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 742; Beard v. Federy, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 492.

The treaty is a contract made by the nation acting through the political branch of its government. Its execution is confided to that branch of the government alone. And until it has provided the means and ordained the mode of its execution, no court has authority to decide what cases fall within its provisions, or what titles the United States is bound to respect. A fortiori must the ordinary courts be without jurisdiction, when the political power has confided the whole subject to special tribunals, whose final decrees it has declared shall be conclusive.

In the case of U S. v. Arredondo, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 742, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall says: "Should we be called on to decide on the validity of a title acquired by any Spanish grant not embraced by these laws (i. e., the laws of 1824 [4 Stat. 52] and 1828 [Id. 284], which conferred the special jurisdiction), we should feel bound to follow the course pursued in Foster v. Neilson, in relation to the stipulation in the eighth article of the Florida treaty, that the legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for this court."

It is urged that a court of general equity jurisdiction may take cognizance of this bill, because of the fraud it alleges.

The fraud principally relied on is the presentation to the board of certain documentary evidences of title, which the parties presenting them knew to be forged and antedated.

But these documents were presented to a tribunal created for the sole purpose of investigating and deciding upon their validity; and of this, genuineness was the first and indispensable element. The question, therefore, presented to this court on the allegation of fraud, is precisely the question presented to the board and to the district and supreme courts, and of which the act gave to those tribunals exclusive cognizance; and the maintenance by this court of its jurisdiction in this case involves the assumption of jurisdiction to review and reverse the final decisions of the board, the district and the supreme courts, on the very issues presented for their determination.

Nor is this all. The jurisdiction of this court is not claimed to exist by reason of its relation to the district court as a superior tribunal, nor because the law has committed to it any authority to pass upon titles of this description.

Its inherent jurisdiction as a court of general equity powers is alone appealed to. But if it derives its jurisdiction from that source alone, no reason is perceived why the attorney-general might not, had he seen fit, have invoked the same jurisdiction in any state court to which similar powers have been confided. And the anomaly might thus have been presented of a state court determining the rights and duties of the United States under a treaty, and reviewing and reversing the decision of the supreme court of the United States on a subject-matter of exclusively national concernment, and of which the political department of the national government or the tribunals of its selection have exclusive cognizance.

The provision in the act of 1851, which declares the final decrees of the board and of the district and supreme courts to be conclusive as between the United States and the claimants, has already been cited.

It will not be disputed that, if the allegations in this bill are sufficient to show jurisdiction, every case heretofore decided under the provisions of the act may be re-opened for examination in this court on its merits, whenever the attorney-general or those to whom he may delegate his authority consider themselves justified in alleging that false and fabricated documentary evidence of title has knowingly been presented.

Before this can be allowed, we must first deprive the clause in the act, which declares that final decrees made under its provisions shall be conclusive, of all significance and effect.

It is urged, however, that all final judgments of courts of competent jurisdiction are conclusive, and that the conclusiveness attributed by the act to final decrees in this class of cases is no greater than that possessed by other final decrees. All may be impeached for fraud; for "fraud vitiates the most solemn judgments."

The general proposition may be conceded, but the question recurs: Is the fraud charged in this bill such as a court of general equity jurisdiction can take cognizance of under the circumstances of this case, and such as will destroy the conclusiveness of the final decree in the former proceedings?

The validity of an alleged Mexican or Spanish claim depends upon the genuineness of the title-papers, and upon their legal effect as translative of title.

The first is the more difficult, and frequently the only point in controversy.

To deny the conclusiveness of the decree on the question of genuineness is to deny it on the principle point submitted for adjudication.

If Mexico, solicitous to secure the rights of its citizens in the ceded territory, had demanded of the United States what means the latter would adopt for their maintenance and protection; and the United States had stipulated in the treaty that the means should be those provided in the act of 1851, and had further declared that the investigation should be conducted as between equal litigants before a court of justice, and that the result of the inquiry should be conclusive of the rights of both parties—would it be compatible with good faith for the United States to contend that under these stipulations there was tacitly reserved to itself a right, not conceded to its antagonist, to reopen and re-examine before a tribunal not mentioned in the treaty the identical questions which it had agreed should be finally determined in another mode; and that it could do this at any time, however remote from the date of the final determination, and no matter how ample had been its opportunities for investigation, on the plea that the statute of limitations does not run against the government, and that no laches can be imputed to a sovereign?

Could it maintain the true construction of the treaty to be that the final decrees of its tribunals adjudging grants to be genuine should be conclusive, provided the grants were genuine, and that that question it could always re-open before the ordinary tribunals?

It is believed that no representative of the political department of this government would contend for such a construction of the treaty stipulation supposed; and a similar construction of identical provisions in an act of congress must be equally rejected by the court.

To accept it would be to make the title of the act, "An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in California," a misnomer, and the pledge that the result of the proceedings it directs shall be conclusive a delusion.

By the treaty with Spain of February 22, 1819 [8 Stat. 252], the United States exonerated Spain from all demands in the future on account of certain specified claims of its citizens, and agreed to make satisfaction of the same to an amount not exceeding four millions of dollars. To ascertain the amount and validity of these claims, it was stipulated that a commission, to consist of three commissioners, etc., should be appointed "to receive and examine and decide upon the amount and validity of all claims included with the description mentioned."

With respect to the decisions of these commissioners, the supreme court says:

"The object of the treaty was to invest the commissioners with full power and authority to receive, examine and decide upon the amount and validity of the asserted claims upon Spain for damages and injuries. Their decision, within the scope of their authority, is conclusive and final If they pronounce the claim valid or invalid, if they ascertain the amount, their award in the premises is not re-examinable. The parties must abide by it as the decree of a competent tribunal of exclusive jurisdiction. A rejected claim cannot again be brought under review in any judicial tribunal. An amount once fixed is a final ascertainment of the damages or injury. This is the obvious purport of the language of the treaty." Comegys v. Vasse, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 212.

If we substitute for the word "treaty" in this extract the words "act of 1851," the language will admit of almost literal application to the case at bar.

The claims to be presented to the commission under the treaty with Spain were claims to indemnity for injuries. The claims to be presented to the board under the act of 1851 were claims to lands. In the former case, the treaty itself provided for the constitution of the commission. In the latter, the treaty stipulated in general terms for the protection of the inhabitants of the ceded territory in their rights of property, and an act of congress confided the duty of ascertaining those rights to a commission established by its own authority, with appeals to the national courts. But these differences make no distinction in principle between the two cases.

The authority of the commission in the one case, and that of the board of commissioners and the courts in the other, are alike exclusive. And the awards of the one and the decrees of the other are alike conclusive of the rights of the parties. The assumption of a jurisdiction by a court of equity to re-examine final decrees made under the act of 1851 involves in principle the assumption of jurisdiction to re-examine all awards made by special commissions constituted under treaties with foreign nations.

Among the great number of claims to lands in the territories ceded to the United States by France and Spain, it is not to be supposed that many fraudulent titles may not have escaped the scrutiny of the tribunals appointed to determine their validity. It is a significant circumstance, that in no case, so far as the judicial history of the country informs us, has the United States, on discovering the fraud, attempted to cause the re-examination before the ordinary tribunals of a finally confirmed claim.

In the Case of Sampeyreac, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 222, which is the only reported case where a re-examination was made, it was done by virtue of a special act of congress, which authorized the proceeding, not before the ordinary tribunals, but by bill of review in the special tribunal upon which the original jurisdiction over the cause had been conferred. Whether or not by virtue of that jurisdiction it might have entertained a bill of review to set aside its own decree, the supreme court does not decide. An act of congress seems to have been deemed necessary to confer the authority. But it is nowhere intimated that any court of equity powers, but upon which no authority to pass upon the validity of claims of that description had been conferred, could have entertained such a bill, or in any other form have re-examined the questions finally decided by the special tribunal.

The case was one of admitted forgery. But it was nevertheless contended by counsel, that the decree of the court being conclusive between the parties, congress had no power to authorize the review, or to disturb vested rights. The supreme court, without passing upon the general proposition, overruled the objection, on the ground that Sampeyreac was admitted to be a fictitious person, and that, therefore, there had been no real parties before the court between whom the decrees could be conclusive.

The position taken by counsel in this case may, perhaps, be extreme and untenable. In deciding the case at bar, it is not necessary to assert that, where a fraudulent title has been confirmed, the United States is entirely without remedy, nor that the political department of the government may not, if it sees fit, invest the courts with authority to re-examine the questions which, as the law now stands, remain finally decided in these cases. But, until congress has so expressed its will and conferred the requisite authority, it may confidently be affirmed that the ordinary tribunals are without jurisdiction.

The counsel for the United States has drawn a vivid picture of the avowed forger glorying in his crime, defying the justice he has duped, and demanding that the officers of the government shall, by issuing to him his patent, assist him in consummating his fraud.

In discussing a dry question of jurisdiction, such appeals are, perhaps, not quite appropriate. But, if the practical bearings of the questions to be decided are fit subjects for consideration, it may be observed that the question is not whether an admitted forger shall be allowed to enjoy the fruits of his crime (for the demurrer admits the truth of the allegations of the bill only hypothetically, and for the purposes of the argument), but whether every title in this state derived from the former governments shall be subjected to the ordeal of a new litigation whenever the attorney-general, or those who may obtain his ear by, it may be, false or interested representations, sees fit to allege in an unsworn bill that the documentary evidence on which the title rests is forged or antedated.

If, without the authority of congress, and on such representations, a cloud can be cast upon titles in this state, the effect would be little short of a public calamity. The repose of ancient possessions would be disturbed, and the security of titles, long since and after protracted litigation adjudged to be valid, would be menaced. A tremendous weapon of vexation, oppression, or extortion might be placed in the hands of unscrupulous persons, and the horde of professional witnesses which has so long infested the courts in this class of cases might resume their trade, and again find a market for their venal testimony.

Compared with evils such as these, the public benefits to be derived from the exposure of the few frauds which may have eluded the vigilance of the court or officers of the government would be insignificant.

It has not been thought necessary to enter into a detailed examination of the cases cited from the English and American reports which determine when and under what circumstances equity will relieve against a judgment obtained by fraud. The question before the court turns upon considerations so peculiar to itself that adjudged cases in England bear to it but a faint and remote analogy. None of them involve the question which is deemed the principal one in this case, and the correctness of the decisions in some may be open to doubt or discussion, "Nil agit exemplum litem quod lite resolvit." Perhaps the nearest analogy is that afforded in the case of a forged will decided to be genuine by a probate court. Even in such a case the supreme court, following the English authorities, has held that equity has no jurisdiction to avoid the will or set aside the probate. Case of Broderick's Will, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 503.

In the ordinary course of proceedings in probate courts, the will is often submitted by the executor in the absence of the parties interested to contest its validity, and the time allowed the latter to intervene is necessarily short. But in cases submitted to the board, in the compulsory litigation which the act of 1851 required, the opposing party is in court demanding the investigation of the genuineness of the claim, and consenting in advance to be bound by the decisions of tribunals of its own appointment.

To relieve against a fraud effected by the forgery of a will, as of any other instrument, falls within the ordinary scope of the powers of a court of equity. Its jurisdiction is ousted because the law has given to another tribunal exclusive jurisdiction over the subject. But in the cases at bar the jurisdiction fails, not merely because congress has confided to other tribunals exclusive jurisdiction over the subject, but also because this court would have no power, even if such exclusive jurisdiction had not been vested elsewhere, to decide what are the rights and duties of the United States under the treaty, and to what cases its stipulations apply.

The cases of Johnson v. Towsley, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 91, and Niles v. Anderson, 5 How. (Miss.) 366, are much relied on by the counsel for the United States. On examination, they will be found to have no application to the case at bar.

In Johnson v. Towsley, and the succeeding case of Samson v. Smiley [13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 91, note], it was merely held that when a party is deprived of his right of pre-emption, otherwise perfect, by a mistake of law or fact on the part of the land department, equity will relieve, and, if a patent has been issued, control it in the hands of the patentee for the benefit of the party rightfully entitled.

In the case of Niles v. Anderson, it was held that where a person had fraudulently obtained from certain United States officers certificates to an Indian deed, which were necessary to give it validity, equity would restrain him from prosecuting an ejectment suit founded on the deed against a party in possession holding under a prior equitable deed from the same Indian. It is obvious that these authorities throw no light upon the question of the conclusiveness of a final decree of confirmation under the act of 1851, or on that of the jurisdiction of this court, as a court of equity to set aside those decrees, or enjoin against their use. Where in the course of a proceeding before a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the controversy, a judgment is set up as an estoppel, and conclusive of the rights of the parties, its effect may be avoided by proving that it was procured by fraud and collusion. Such was the celebrated Case of the Duchess of Kingston, in which it was decided that a judgement obtained by fraud would not stand in the way of prosecution for bigamy—that the suit in the ecclesiastical court was a contrivance merely—a link in the chain of fraud and in truth no judgment—according to the phrase used by Lord Loughborough: "Fabula non judicium hoc est. In scena non in foro res agitur.

But here the jurisdiction of the house of peers to try the defendant for the crime of which she was accused, was undoubted. The judgment of the ecclesiastical court was relied on as judicially establishing that the alleged first marriage had not been contracted. The judgment was disregarded because it had been collusively obtained in a sham suit.

But in suits at bar there is no subject-matter of which the court has jurisdiction, in the trial of which the validity of the decrees now assailed is questioned collaterally or incidentally. The very object and prayer of the bills is to obtain a decree declaring the original grants fraudulent and invalid, the lands covered by them to be public lands of the United States, and that the decree of confirmation be annulled and set aside. In the brief filed by the counsel for the United States, he has disclaimed all right to demand the greater part of the relief prayed for in the bills. But he insists upon the right to a decree enjoining those defendants from availing themselves of the decree of confirmation, and from suing out a patent. He admits that as to innocent parties who may have purchased since the final decrees of confirmations, the decrees will stand, and he suggests that they may even obtain patents for their lands, in their own names or in those of the guilty defendants.

But this change in the form of the relief demanded leaves the force of the objections to it unimpaired. Before the court can grant it it must first pass upon the genuineness and validity of the original grants—a subject over which, as has been shown, it has no jurisdiction. In truth, stripped of all disguises, these proceedings are in effect appeals to this court from the decisions of the special tribunals, or they are bills of review to set aside the decrees for newly discovered evidence, and the allegations of fraud, which are supposed to give jurisdiction to the court, only reveal more clearly the true nature of the suits.

It is believed that the foregoing conclusively shows that this court has no jurisdiction to inquire into the fraud principally relied on, because:—

1. The inquiry would involve a re-examination of the very question, exclusive jurisdiction to decide which, has been confided to other and special tribunals;

2. Because the decisions of those tribunals are declared by law to be conclusive of the rights of the parties;

3. Because even if no such jurisdiction had been confided to special tribunals, this court would be without authority under its general equity powers to determine what cases fall within the protecting clause of the treaty, or when and in what mode the political department of the government should fulfill its treaty stipulations.

But waiving for the moment all considerations arising out of the special circumstances of this case, let us briefly examine the more general positions assumed by the counsel of the United States. It is in effect contended that where a party has been forced to commence a suit to establish the genuineness of a document, and the suit is tried on that issue, his adversary may omit to bring forward proofs of its fraudulent character which are in his own possession, and which by reasonable diligence he might have produced; and afterwards, when judgment has gone against him, may ask a court of equity to set aside that judgment and retry the same issue, not on the ground of newly discovered evidence which could not by reasonable diligence have been procured, nor on the ground of fraud practiced in the course of the proceedings, but on the allegation that the document adjudged to be genuine was in fact fraudulent, and that he believed in and was misled by the assertion of its genuineness made by his antagonist. And further, that this belief in the assertions of his adversary should excuse him for his laches in not producing proofs of the fraud in his own possession on the trial of the suit which he has himself compelled his adversary to bring to determine that very issue.

A statement of this position is its own refutation. It is believed that a bill to set aside a final judgment, and to obtain a new trial on such grounds and with such an excuse for laches, would be dismissed by a court of equity without hesitation. On the point whether laches with which a private party would clearly be chargeable, can in this case be imputed to the United States, some suggestions will hereafter be offered.

Again: the allegation in the bill chiefly relied on is, that certain title-papers were forged. But the same bill avers that they have been adjudged to be genuine by a court of competent jurisdiction in a proceeding instituted to try that very question. While that judgment stands, they are in legal contemplation genuine. The proceeding on which they were so adjudged was in the nature of a proceeding in rem to determine the status of the property as public or private land; and the decree, until set aside, "renders the fact what the court adjudicates it to be." 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 498. It is true that a decree may be avoided by showing that it was obtained by fraud. But there must be fraud in its concoction, such as collusion between the parties, or other circumstances which would establish that what seemed a decree was, in fact, no decree—that it was fabula non judicium. It cannot be shown by re-examining on its merits the very question decided by the decree.

To meet this exigency, the draughtsman of the bill has introduced some allegations, apparently intended to make out a case of fraud used in obtaining the decree, or in its concoction, that is, of collateral fraudulent acts extrinsic to the merits of the cause.

It is alleged that the defendants fraudulently suppressed and concealed from the board the grants for the ranchos of San Antonio, Pinole, San Pablo, Moraga, and Valencia, with intent to conceal from the board and the law agent of the United States the fact, which their production would have disclosed, that two of them were not granted until subsequently to the pretended sobrante grant. On this allegation it is to be observed:

1. That the fact alleged to have been concealed would have been wholly inconclusive if not immaterial. It is well known that in many cases ranchos were established and occupied under permissions to occupy or other provisional titles, and the rights of their owners recognized by the government in subsequent grants of adjoining lands, long in advance of the issuance of the final title. In some cases, the final title was never asked for nor obtained. A notable instance of this is found in the case of Alviso, whose claim was confirmed by the supreme court, on the strength of a permission to occupy, and a very ancient possession. [U. S. v. Alviso] 23 How. [64 U. S.] 318.

2. The documents alleged to have been suppressed were then and have ever since remained in the archives. They were, therefore, in the exclusive possession of the United States.

The allegation is thus, in effect, that the defendants concealed documents among the public records of the country, and suppressed them while in the exclusive possession of their adversary.

3. The very nature of the defendants' claim being for a sobrante resulting from the grants of certain specified ranchos, by inevitable reference directed the attention of the board and of the law agent to those grants, and rendered necessary an inquiry into the fact of their existence and their extent before the merits of their own claim could be determined.

4. The records of the board and of the district court show that in fact every one of these grants had been presented to the board for confirmation more than two years before the date of the decree in this case, and that all had been confirmed some months previously to that date, except one, which was subsequently confirmed on appeal by the supreme court.

But, even if the alleged fraud were undeniably such as would ordinarily vitiate a judgment for fraud in obtaining it, as in cases where the judge is interested or there has been collusion between the parties in a pretended, and not a real suit, fraudulent suggestions that the parties to the suit were before the court contrary to the fact, and the like, the complainant could not in this proceeding obtain the relief prayed for.

It is not enough that fraud in obtaining the decree be proved. The propriety of the decree must still be investigated (Story, Eq. Pl. § 426); in other words, the validity of the claim. The fact that a fraud in procuring the decree has been committed does not convert the land into public land of the United States, nor does the law punish such practices on the part of the claimant by a forfeiture of his estate. If the land was in fact private land at the acquisition of the country, the United States has not been injured by the fraud, however gross. Before, therefore, the court can declare the land to be public land, the validity of the claim must be investigated. And that question congress has conferred upon this court no power to determine.

If it be said that this court may set aside the decree, and restore the parties to their former situation, as is the practice of courts of equity (Story, Eq. Pl. ubi sup.), the answer is that that is impossible. For the board which made the decree has ceased to exist, and the act of congress confers no power on the district or supreme court to entertain bills of review to set aside their decrees in this class of cases; and, even if this fact were otherwise, it would be conclusive to show that the relief now prayed for must be sought in those courts, and not in this.

It is contended on behalf of the United States that the statute of limitations does not run against the government, and that laches cannot be imputed to it. The bill, however, alleges various facts in apparent excuse or explanation of any laches of which the government may have been guilty.

Whether these matters, if true, would constitute a valid excuse, and whether their truth is consistent with notorious facts disclosed by the records of the board, and of the district and supreme courts, and by the judicial history of the country, it is not necessary to inquire.

Nor is it necessary to determine whether the general principle that laches cannot be imputed to the government applies to cases of this nature. It may, however, be suggested as worthy of consideration, whether, if the act of 1851 be construed as tacitly reserving to the United States the right to reexamine and reverse in other tribunals the decrees which that act declared should be conclusive, the second proceeding should not be regarded as a part of, or a sequel to, the first, and that in it, as in the first, the United States has consented to be bound by all the rules which control the rights of equal litigants before a court of justice. It may also be suggested whether it is not a fundamental and inherent principle of the court of equity, at whose hands relief is now sought, to refuse to interpose in behalf of stale demands, not because they are barred by the statute of limitations, nor because laches can be imputed to the complainant, but because from the lapse of time and the nature of the case it is probable that justice cannot be done. If this be the true ground of the refusal of equity to interfere in such cases, no distinction can be drawn, between suits by the government and those brought by private persons. The ascertainment of the truth may be as impracticable in the one case as in the other. If this principle be applicable to any case where the government is a party, it would seem to be so to the case at bar—so far at least as the allegations of the bill are to be proved by oral testimony.

The grant, if genuine, was made in 1841, more than thirty-five years ago, when the country was sparsely inhabited, and knowledge of the transactions was necessarily confined to a small number of persons. To establish the genuineness of the grants, the claimants would have to depend upon the survival of these witnesses after so long a period, the accuracy of their memories, and their willingness under great temptation to speak the truth. They would labor under disadvantages nearly as great when called on to meet testimony in support of the allegation that the grant was fabricated in 1851.

But it is unnecessary further to consider this point, for I am of opinion that the objections to the jurisdiction would be insuperable, even if these bills had been filed on the very day on which the decrees of confirmation became final.

It is objected that the attorney-general has no authority, by virtue of his office, to commence this suit in the name of the United States. The court is not unmindful that the decision of the question whether the highest law officer of the government has exceeded the limits of his official authority involves grave and delicate considerations. In the view taken of the other questions discussed in this opinion, it is unnecessary to decide it.

But it may be remarked that the institution of these suits seems to commit the United States to a course of proceeding, and to the assertion of supposed rights in a case where it must be admitted that the political power has the exclusive right to determine what shall be the attitude of the government with regard to the claims, and whether this is an appropriate and expedient mode of asserting its rights and performing its obligations under the treaty. If all the titles of this state derived from the former governments were subjected to an indiscriminate attack, like that in the case at bar, diplomatic remonstrance or political complications might result, and the government might be compelled reluctantly to adopt or formally to disavow proceedings, on the propriety of taking which the political branch of it had never been consulted.

The relation of the attorney-general to the United States is not wholly dissimilar to the ordinary relation of attorney to client. That client is in these cases the legislative branch of the government, whose exclusive province it is to determine when and how the political obligations assumed by the nation shall be fulfilled. Until authority is given by that branch of the government, it may be doubted whether the general authority of the attorney-general to represent the United States in ordinary litigations is sufficient to enable him to institute suits like those at bar.

It will not be disputed that congress had the exclusive right to adopt any means it thought fit to ascertain and discharge its treaty obligations, whether by committees of congress, special commissions, or by invoking the aid of the regular national tribunals. If, before congress had taken any action on the subject, the attorney-general being of opinion that certain alleged titles were fraudulent, or so inchoate and incomplete that the claimants had no right of property which the treaty protected, had instituted ejectment suits in the name of the United States against the parties in possession, might it not be urged that he had no more authority to commence the suits than the court would have jurisdiction to try them? And may not the same objection be urged when, after exhausting the ample powers with which he is invested by the act of 1851, he commences, without the direction of congress, an analogous proceeding to attain the same object?

The force of these objections is not diminished by the consideration that, from the necessities of his position, the attorney-general is unable personally to examine into the merits of every suit that may be brought, and that he is forced to delegate the authority to use the name of the United States, in form, to the district attorney, but in fact to special counsel, who, in the cases at bar, has given bonds to pay the expenses of the litigation, and who may smite or spare or threaten any title in this state, at his discretion; or, assuming him to be actuated by the highest motives, according to the conclusion he may on investigation reach, as to the propriety of the final decree of the board, the district or the supreme courts, adjudging the title to be genuine. If this power should by chance fall into unworthy hands, it might afford the opportunity for enormous abuses.

It is objected that the bill is unsworn. If, however, the suit is properly brought in the name and by the authority of the United States, verification of the bill is unnecessary. But it may be observed that if the attorney-general has thought it his duty to authorize these proceedings, it would have been far more satisfactory to the court if the allegations of these unsworn bills had been authenticated by his own signature, affixed to them under the sanction of his personal and official character, and not merely by those of the district attorney, whom he has ordered to bring the suit, and of the special counsel, to whom he has delegated his authority. An assurance would thus have been afforded of the attorney-general's belief in the allegations in the bills, and in the existence of rights on the part of the United States which the bills seek to enforce; that the suits are really, and not merely nominally, brought by the United States to protect its rights, and not merely to promote the interests of private individuals or corporations; an assurance somewhat weakened by the circumstance that the attorney-general seems to have considered the rights of the United States so doubtful, or its interest so unimportant, that he has directed the district attorney to commence these suits "on the giving, by the said John B. Howard, security for, or depositing a sufficient sum to defray, all expenses which may be incurred in said legal proceedings." Bonds have accordingly been given by John B. Howard, special counsel for the United States, which contain the recital just quoted.

The lands covered by the grants in these cases are many thousand acres in extent. The bills pray that they may be adjudged to be public lands of the United States. It is not to be supposed that, if the attorney-general were persuaded that so large and valuable a property belonged to the United States, he would have made the assertion of its rights to depend upon the willingness or ability of private individuals to defray the expense of the litigation. The bill filed in the case of U. S. v. Throckmorton contains the following extraordinary "notice":

"And the said district attorney, in behalf of the United States, hereby gives notice that, in the event of a decree of this court that the said grant was false and invalid, and that the said confirmation thereof was obtained by fraud, and that the said grant and confirmation be annulled and set aside, * * * and the said lands are public lands of the United States, that the 'United States will in such case waive all her right and claim to that portion of said lands on which the town of New Saucelito is located, and also that portion of said lands on which the town of Old Saucelito is represented, as represented on said Exhibit A.'"

"The area and quantity" of these lands is stated not to exceed six hundred and forty acres. To whom this relinquishment of the title of the United States to a large and valuable tract of land is to be made, on what grounds, and by what authority, the bill does not state. It will surely not be claimed that the attorney-general, or his representative, has not only the right, by instituting these proceedings, to cloud every title in this state with the menace of a litigation, but also that he can waive, at his discretion, the rights of the United States to lands adjudged to be public lands. The power to donate the property of the nation is elsewhere vested.

The conclusions embodied in the foregoing may be summarized as follows:

The demurrer must be sustained because:

1. This court has no jurisdiction to determine the genuineness and validity of a Mexican land claim, that jurisdiction having been exclusively vested in other and special tribunals.

2. The final decrees of those tribunals are declared by law to be conclusive, not merely as concluding the litigation, but conclusive of the rights of the parties.

3. Even if no such exclusive authority had been conferred on the special tribunals, this court would have no jurisdiction to determine how the political department of the government shall fulfill its treaty stipulations, or to what cases those stipulations apply; and especially in cases where the grants are inchoate.

4. A court of equity cannot interfere to set aside a judgment for fraud in procuring it, when the fraud alleged is the presentation to the court in which judgment was obtained of false documents, and the sole or principal issue tried by that court was upon the genuineness of the documents so presented.

5. The allegations of fraudulent concealment and suppression, which might, if the allegations were true, be deemed to constitute "fraud in procuring the decree," are shown by the bill itself, and the nature of the documents alleged to have been concealed, to be destitute of foundation in fact.

6. That even if the bill showed that the decree had been procured by fraud of the grossest character, this court would still be without jurisdiction; for it has no authority to pass upon the propriety of the decree, i. e., to decide upon the validity of the claim, nor to remand the parties to any other forum where that question may be determined.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge, concurring. While the courts of California, state and national, are not unaccustomed to deal with cases of great magnitude, I deem it not too much to say, that no question has ever been presented in this state, so far-reaching in its consequences, as that involved in these cases, if the bills filed can be maintained. It is a startling proposition to those who hold patents to lands issued upon confirmed Spanish or Mexican grants, that after twenty-five years of compulsory litigation, intended, in the language of the various acts of congress, to "settle titles to land in the state of California," the holders of all such patents are liable to be called upon to relitigate their claims with the government in the ordinary courts of justice; and that the patent, instead of being conclusive evidence of a "settlement" of the title—the end of litigation—is but the foundation for the beginning of a new contest to unsettle it, in the tribunals of the country, which before had no jurisdiction whatever over the subject-matter. The very institution of these suits, in the name and by the authority of the government, was well calculated to produce, and, undoubtedly, did produce, a general distrust of such titles, and a widespread, if not a well-founded, alarm. If this court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter as now presented, and the bills filed present proper cases for its exercise, we are undoubtedly bound to entertain them, and adjudicate the matters at issue according to their real merits, as they may finally be made to appear. But I am fully persuaded that these cases are not of a kind to justify the assumption of a doubtful power, or the sustaining of bills which present but doubtful, as well as stale, equities.

Profoundly appreciating the importance of the principles involved in this discussion, and the grave responsibility resting upon the court in their adjudication, I have carefully considered the elaborate arguments of counsel, both oral and printed, and examined the numerous authorities cited, not merely with an earnest hope of reaching a correct solution of the questions presented, but with a desire, and a purpose, to present my own views in a separate opinion. I regret to say, however, that, since the argument, I have been constantly pressed by other official duties, which, together with the time necessarily consumed in a thorough examination of the questions argued, have thus far prevented the accomplishment of that purpose. But upon a full consideration of the opinions of the presiding justice and the district judge, I find that they have so thoroughly, and so satisfactorily, discussed the questions submitted, that I cannot hope to add anything to the force of their reasoning. I, therefore, with less regret, without further delaying the decision, content myself with expressing my entire concurrence in the conclusions reached, in the grounds upon which the decision is rested, and in the line of argument by which they are so conclusively maintained.

It is apparent to my mind, that it is impossible to maintain these bills without going behind the patents and decrees of confirmation, and re-examining the question as to the genuineness of the grants—the very question, the determination of which was exclusively committed to another tribunal; and which that tribunal, in a proceeding wherein the genuineness of the grants was the controlling question directly in issue, examined and adjudicated. To maintain that this court can re-examine that precise question, is to maintain the proposition, that a court may have exclusive jurisdiction of a matter over which another tribunal has concurrent jurisdiction—a proposition as impossible in law, as that in physics two bodies can occupy the same space at the same time.

But, conceding the jurisdiction, the matter is res adjudicata under the ordinary rules of law. The difficulty cannot be avoided by saying that the subject-matter now involved is fraud, and fraud vitiates all proceedings; for the fraud relied on, when we come to the substance of the cases presented, consists in presenting and maintaining fraudulent grants, without disclosing the falsity of the claim to the adverse party; but that is the very fact before in issue, litigated and determined, and not a fraud practiced upon the court in the course of the litigation, by which a real litigation was prevented, as distinguished from the fraud which was itself the subject matter of the litigation. If these bills can be maintained, it would be impossible to present a case wherein a question of fraud constitutes the real question in issue litigated between real parties before the court, and determined, to which the wholesome doctrine of res adjudicata would apply. Under such a rule, every case in which a false claim has been presented, and the question of genuineness litigated and adjudged, would be open to re-examination on the pretense of fraud, and there would be no end to litigation. If the principle maintained by the claimants can be extended to these cases, the doctrine of res adjudicata might as well be abolished.

[NOTE. Subsequently the case of United States v. Throckmorton and others was taken, on an appeal, to the supreme court, where the decree of this court sustaining a demurrer to the bill and dismissing it on the merits was affirmed. 98 U. S. 61.]

Case No. 15,122.

UNITED STATES v. FLOWERY.

[1 Spr. 109; [1] 8 Law Rep. 258.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Aug., 1845.

EVIDENCE—CHAIN OF EVIDENCE—CONVERSATIONS—SLAVE TRADE—NEW TRIAL—CIRCUIT COURTS.

1. Facts which, if standing alone, would be irrelevant, are admissible in evidence, upon the statement of counsel, that they constitute a part of a chain of evidence, which, as a whole, would be relevant.

2. The court may direct at what part of such proposed chain of evidence the counsel shall begin.

3. It is no ground for a new trial, that incompetent evidence was admitted without objection.

4. It seems, that where there is evidence tending to show that several persons are combined together in carrying on an unlawful enterprise, such as the slave trade, the conversations of some of them, in relation thereto, in the absence of others, may be given in evidence against such others.

5. Where a witness, in his direct examination, had testified that a certain person was reputed to be a man of large property, counsel were permitted, in cross-examination, to ask in what such property was reputed to consist.

6. A new trial will not be granted, merely because counsel have been indulged in too great latitude in arguing, as to the inferences to be drawn from the evidence.

7. Whether circuit courts of the United States may be holden by the two judges in the same district, at the same time, in different rooms,—quære.

R. Rantoul, Jr., U. S. Dist. Atty.

J. P. Rogers and P. W. Chandler, for defendant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge. Peter Flowery was indicted under the statute of 1818 [3 Stat. 450], for causing a vessel, called the Spitfire, to sail from the port of New Orleans, with intent to employ her in the slave trade. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and his counsel now move for a new trial, for several causes.

The most important, and that which has been pressed with the greatest earnestness, is, that evidence was admitted that the Spitfire, on a former voyage, carried a cargo of slaves from Rio Pongo to Cuba.

This was objected to, on the ground that Flowery had no connection therewith. The district attorney thereupon stated, that he should introduce evidence that Flowery had knowledge of such former voyage. It is now insisted that such evidence was not subsequently introduced, and that the testimony objected to should not have been admitted, upon the statement of the district attorney.

It is conceded to be the practice, in civil cases, to admit evidence under such circumstances; but it is urged that it ought to be otherwise in criminal cases. We know of no such distinction. The practice and the prinple, are the same in both. Where a chain of testimony is proposed, the links of which, unconnected, would be irrelevant, counsel must be allowed to begin somewhere, upon the expectation that the other links are to be afterwards supplied, and for this the court rely upon the statement of counsel, professional honor being a guaranty against abuse. But the order in which such evidence shall be introduced, is under the control of the court, who may direct the counsel to begin at any part of the proposed chain of evidence, as the purposes of justice may seem to require.

It is urged, that the court, after the evidence was closed, should have instructed the jury to lay this testimony out of the case.

In the first place, no such instruction was requested; and in the next, the evidence, subsequently introduced, justified the statement of the district attorney, upón which it was originally admitted, and rendered it proper to be submitted to the final consideration of the jury. The evidence tended to show, that the Spitfire was a schooner of about ninety-nine tons burden, built at Baltimore in the year 1841, and there registered in 1842, by the name of Caballera, as the property of one Gordon; that subsequently she was in the Rio Pongo, under his command, where a bill of sale of her was made to one Peter Faber, who had a slave factory on that river, from which, under the command of Gordon, she carried a cargo of slaves to Cuba, and there landed them, and immediately Gordon delivered up the schooner to some Spaniards.

This was supposed to be about the month of May, 1843. The name of Caballera was erased from her counter, when she took on board the slaves. The next that we hear of her, is in September of the same year, when she was at Havana, under the command of Flowery, by the name of the Spitfire, bound, as the shipping-articles state, on a voyage to Key West, New Orleans, and back to Havana. She proceeded on this voyage, with one John Scosure on board, as a passenger. On her arrival at New Orleans, she was stated, in the shipping list, to be for sale, but was carried to the opposite side of the river, where she lay for several weeks, undergoing extensive repairs; both masts were taken out, and new ones put in; she was coppered, painted, and some new sails and rigging furnished. Afterwards, a bill of sale was made, purporting to be from one Falker, of Key West, by one Anquera, as his attorney at New Orleans, to Peter Flowery, in consideration of $7,500; and a charter-party was made between Flowery and Scosure, for a voyage from New Orleans to Havana, and thence to the Rio Pongo, for which Scosure was to pay $5,000. The vessel could not be registered as American, because she had been owned by foreigners. The bill of sale and charter-party appear to have been executed at New Orleans, on the 20th and 25th days of November, 1844, and she sailed from New Orleans on the 26th, for Havana, with Scosure on board as a passenger, and thence proceeded to Faber's factory, on the Rio Pongo, where she was seized.

There was testimony that she was originally constructed with eight places for sweeps, quarter-houses, and a trunk on deck, extending partly over the main hold, and partly over the cabin, with holes in the sides, nine by twelve inches, for ventilation, and that in a former voyage there had been a bulkhead in the hold, to divide the male from the female slaves. There was also evidence, tending to show that the name, Caballera, had been painted in black letters on the taffrail, and that Flowery, while at New Orleans, caused them to be painted over, so as to conceal them.

The question is not, whether all this proves that Flowery knew of the former voyage, but whether there is anything to be submitted to a jury on that point; and in our opinion there is.

Flowery resides in New York, and formerly commanded a vessel running between that place and Havana. Not long after the termination of the first voyage, he is found in command of the Spitfire, at Havana. When, and under what circumstances, did he become connected with this vessel, owned by foreigners? Were there not indications of the business in which she had been engaged; the marks of the bulk-head in the hold, quarter-houses, row-locks, and especially the trunk on deck, peculiarly adapted to the slave trade, and to no other? Again, upon her arrival at New Orleans, why were such extensive repairs made upon a vessel, then only between two and three years old? If the purpose was to change her appearance, so that she should not be recognized on her reappearance on the African coast, we see a sufficient reason for the new masts, new sails, and new paint The importance of disguising her will be better appreciated, when it is recollected that her seizure was owing to her being recognized by Turner, who, having been mate on her former voyage, discovered her identity, notwithstanding the change she had undergone. Again, Flowery says that he became the purchaser of this vessel, at New Orleans, and gave the extraordinary price of $7,500. Would he have done this, without any inquiry into her previous history? And especially, would he have taken a bill of sale, declaring that she could not have the privileges of an American vessel, because she had been owned by a foreigner, without investigation? And further still, there was evidence that he not only knew of her former name, Caballera, but had himself caused it to be painted over and concealed. Upon the last point, there was, indeed, rebutting evidence of great force; but of the effect of the whole, it was the province of the jury to judge.

It is further urged by the learned counsel, that if Flowery knew of the former voyage, it has no legitimate bearing upon the question whether this was a slave voyage or not, and is, therefore, irrelevant.

We are to bear in mind that there were two propositions to be maintained by the government, both of which were denied by the defendant; first, that this was a slave voyage, and, second, that he had knowledge of, and intended to employ the vessel in it, when he sailed from New Orleans. One question was, whether the sale to Flowery was real, or colorable. If Flowery knew that she had been engaged in the slave trade, and liable to forfeiture, would he, bona fide, have purchased her, and paid the exorbitant price of $7,500? The knowledge of the former voyage tended to show that this sale was fictitious, and in this, as well as in other respects, went to the question of scienter and intent.

The second ground upon which a new trial is asked, is the testimony of one Smith, as to a conversation at Faber's factory between Faber and a Spaniard and a Frenchman, who went from Havana in the Spitfire. To this it is sufficient to say, that the evidence was not objected to; and although we are of opinion that the testimony as to conversations between the Spaniard, Frenchman, and Flowery, on the outward passage, and the part acted by them would, under all the circumstances in evidence in the case, have been sufficient to have authorized its introduction, if it had been resisted, we do not think it necessary to dwell upon it.

The third ground is, that the district attorney was permitted to ask, in what the property of Scosure was reputed to consist.

The facts are as follows: One McLellan, a witness for the defendant, after testifying that he knew Scosure, and that he resided at Havana, was asked by the counsel for the defendant whether Scosure was a man of property? To which the witness answered that he was reputed to be a man of large property; that he was reputed to own property to the amount of three or four hundred thousand dollars. The defendant's counsel then asked him whether Scosure was reputed to own property in this country; to which the witness answered that he was, to the amount of a hundred thousand dollars.

The district attorney, in cross-examination, asked the witness in what the property of Scosure consisted; to which he replied, that he did not know. He then asked in what it was reputed to consist. This question was objected to. The court ruled that it might be put, in reference to the property of which the witness, in his direct examination, had testified that Scosure was reputed to be the owner. The district attorney then asked, whether Scosure was reputed to be the owner of cargoes of vessels. The witness inquired whether he was bound to answer. The defendant's counsel objected to the question, and it was not pressed.

The question put by the district attorney was proper, in order to test the correctness of the original statement made by the witness, and is clearly within the established principles and practice of cross-examination.

The two following grounds are, that the district attorney was permitted to argue to the jury that Scosure had been previously engaged in the slave trade, and that certain passports found on board the Spitfire, were obtained for the purpose of protecting her against seizure. The objection is merely that counsel was allowed too great latitude in arguing, as to the inferences to be drawn from the evidence. If this were so, we should not, for that reason alone, disturb a verdict, rendered upon ample testimony, and with which the judge who presided at the trial, is entirely satisfied.

The course of argument to be allowed, must rest in some degree, at least, upon the judicial discretion of the court. A line of argument, clearly unfounded or irrelevant, would not be permitted. But there are many cases, and especially those which are voluminous and complicated, in which it may well be presumed that counsel perceive bearings and applications of evidence, which are not at once apparent to the court; and when it is made a question whether the evidence tends to a certain conclusion, the views of counsel, in other words, his argument, must be heard, before the court can be called upon to decide. This will be in the presence of the jury, and it will not generally be material, whether it be in form addressed to them, or to the court; but it will conduce to the convenience and despatch of business, that the argument should at once be addressed to the jury, and the court afterwards should give such instructions as they may deem proper.

But we think there was some evidence, slight perhaps, but still something before the jury, from which counsel might well be permitted to argue that Scosure had been engaged in the slave trade. But it has been urged that, if this fact were established, it would be immaterial and irrelevant. We do not think so. The defendant gave evidence that there was such a person as Scosure, possessing great wealth, in order to repel the suggestion that the charter-party was fictitious. Suppose they had been able to show that his business was a regular and legal course of trade between Havana and the Rio Pongo, would it not have been admissible, at least on the question of the scienter and intent of Flowery? And on the other hand, if the government could show that his business was the slave trade, between Havana and the Rio Pongo, it would be competent evidence to the same point.

As to the passports, it was contended, in behalf of the defendant, that they were perfectly innocent papers, intended merely for the personal protection of the individuals. On the other hand, it was insisted that the persons named in them, were not mere passengers, and that the passports were designed to conceal their true character, and prevent suspicions, if boarded by an American or English man of war, before reaching the Cape de Verde. That one of them was not a passenger, is certain; he was shipped as, and performed the duties of cabin-boy, throughout the voyage. The other two, a Spaniard and a Frenchman, performed most of the duties of mate, there being no person, in the shipping-articles, holding that station; they regularly stood watch, took observations, kept the run of the vessel, and marked her course, one on a French, and the other on a Spanish chart; and had books of navigation, in the French and Spanish languages, respectively. After arriving on the African coast, on seeing a British steamer, the Spaniard concealed certain papers and money, and the Frenchman, being in the boat, threw overboard a flag, appearing to be Spanish, declaring that, if the English found that, they would seize the vessel. On arriving in the Rio Pongo, both these persons went to Faber's slave factory, lived in his house, and were heard bargaining with him for a cargo of slaves. There was testimony that these two persons and Flowery, on the outward passage, had frequent conversations, in which they spoke of the voyage as a slave voyage; and of the amount they should make, if they succeeded in carrying a cargo of slaves to Cuba. All the passports were for persons going from Havana to the Cape de Verde, for which the Spitfire was cleared: yet she passed in sight of those islands, without touching.

We think this not only competent, but strong evidence, that the ostensible, was not the real purpose for which those passports were obtained; that the Spaniard and Frenchman, and the Spanish cabin boy, were represented as passengers, to prevent the suspicions that might arise, if they appeared to be a part of the crew of an American vessel; and that the district attorney had a right so to argue.

The last objection, rests on the supposition that there were two circuit courts, holden separately, by the two judges, at the same time. This is a mistake. Flowery was tried at the regular term holden by the district judge, by adjournment, in the usual manner, from day to day, in the court room. In the meantime the judge of the supreme court was, by agreement of parties, hearing a cause in another room. This was not intended to be a circuit court. No judgment or decree was passed. Had the result of the hearing called for any, it might have been, by consent of parties, afterwards entered in court. Upon this statement of the facts, the counsel, upon a suggestion from the bench, have forborne to press the objection; and we have no occasion to consider whether it be competent for the two judges to hold the circuit courts, in different rooms, at the same time, or not.

UNITED STATES v. FLYNN.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 14, 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLERY—SIGN.

Section 3279 of the Revised Statutes of the United States makes it an offence to work in a distillery on which no sign is placed and kept, as provided in that section, and provides a punishment for such an act.

This was in indictment under section 3279 of the Revised Statutes, charging the defendant [John Flynn] with working in a distillery on which no sign was placed and kept, as provided by that section. A motion was made by the defendant to quash the indictment, upon the ground that no punishment was provided for the act charged. The contention was, that the construction and punctuation of section 3279, and the provision therein for the forfeiture of all horses, &c., used in carrying such property aforesaid, compel the conclusion that there is an omission to provide any punishment for the act of working in a distillery on which no sign is placed and kept.

Louis F. Post, for defendant.

Before BENEDICT, District Judge.

THE COURT held that section 3279 makes it an offence to work in a distillery on which no sign is placed and kept, as provided in that section, and provides for such an act the punishment of a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or imprisonment not less than one month nor more than six months.

Case No. 15,124.

UNITED STATES v. FLYNN.

[1 Dill. 451.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1870.

CRIMINAL LAW—SALE OF LIQUOR TO INDIANS.

Under the act of congress of March 15, 1864 (13 Stat. 29), prohibiting the sale of liquor to any Indian under charge of an Indian agent, actual control, or immediate personal superintendence by such agent over the individual Indian to whom the liquor is sold, is not essential, if the tribe to which the Indian belongs is under the charge of such agent, and the Indian himself still maintains his tribal relations.

It is provided by the act of congress of the 15th day of March, 1864 (13 Stat. 29), that "if any person shall sell * * * or dispose of any spirituous liquors to any Indian, under the charge of any Indian superintendent, or Indian agent appointed by the United States," he shall be punished, etc., as provided by the act. Legislation of this character has been held by the supreme court of the United States, to be constitutional, and authorized by the power of congress to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. U. S. v. Holliday, 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 407; U. S. v. Haas, Id. The evidence shows that the Indian named in the indictment belongs to one of the bands of the Chippewa tribe of Indians, residing in the state of Minnesota; that the Indian to whom the liquor was sold still maintains his tribal relations, and receives his annuities from the United States; that the tribe to which the Indian belongs is regularly under the charge of an agent appointed by the United States. But the evidence also shows that the Indian named in the indictment has not for two years, or thereabouts, resided on the reservation occupied by the tribe, but has been for that period living away from the tribe, and off the reservation. Under these facts, the question arises whether the Indian named was, within the meaning of the act of congress "under the charge of an Indian agent" at the time when the liquor is alleged to have been sold to him.

C. K. Davis, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Heard, contra.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John F. Dillon, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and NELSON, District Judge.

PER CURIAM. It was held upon these facts, that the Indian to whom the liquor was sold was under charge of an Indian agent within the meaning of the act of congress, and that actual charge and immediate personal superintendence over the individual Indian by the agent, at the time, was not essential to maintain the indictment. This conclusion was considered to be supported by the nature of the previous legislation on the same subject; by the policy of such legislation as declared in the cases above referred to ([U. S. v. Holliday and U. S. v. Haas] 3 Wall. [70 U. S.] 407), and by the principles settled by the decisions in those cases.

Case No. 15,125.

UNITED STATES v. FOLSOM.

[Hoff. Dec. 42.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—CONFIRMATION BY BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

[If the board of commissioners, in confirming a claim, were misled by the compass marks, or by any other accurate representation on the diseño so that they described boundaries which, when run upon the ground, are found to include a different tract from that described in the grant and delineated on the diseño, the error should be rectified by the court when the survey is submitted for approval.]

[This was a claim by the executors of J. L. Folsom to the Rancho Rio De Los Americanos. The grant was confirmed by the board. Appeal taken by the government, but not prosecuted. Subsequently a motion was made that the survey made in conformity with the decision of the board be brought into court and confirmed. Case No. 15,127.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The grant in this case was for eight square leagues of land on the banks of the American river, bounded by the land granted to the colony of Señor Sutter, and by the ranges of hills to the east. In the petition the tract is described as bounded by the lands of Señor Sutter, as shown by the map thereto annexed: "Said place is on the bank of the American river, and consists of four leagues in length towards the east, and two in breadth towards the south." The decree of the board describes the land confirmed to the claimants as follows: "Beginning at an oak tree on the bank of the American river, marked as a boundary to the lands granted to John A. Sutter, and running thence south to the line of said Sutter, two leagues; thence easterly, by lines parallel to the general direction of the American river, and at the distance, as near as may be, of two leagues therefrom, four leagues, or so far as may be necessary to inclose in the tract eight square leagues; thence northerly, by a line parallel to the one above described, to the American river; thence, along the southern bank of said American river, and bounding thereon, to the point of beginning." The appeal from this decree having been dismissed by consent of the attorney general, a survey of the tract confirmed was made in May, 1857. This survey appears to have been acquiesced in by the United States until September, 1858, when instructions for a new survey were issued by the executive department, in accordance with the opinion of the secretary of the interior. A second survey has accordingly been made, and it is now before the court on exceptions.

The claimants contend that the first survey is substantially correct, and should be adopted by the court. If the petition, the grant, and the diseño be alone consulted, the intention of the governor and the true location of the tract would seem obvious and unmistakable. There can be no doubt that the land was to be a tract four leagues in length, by two in breadth, lying on the southern bank of the American river, and commencing at the eastern boundary of Sutter's land. The position of this boundary line is not disputed. The location of the tract would, therefore, seem certain and easy. But the terms of the decree of the board have given rise to a difficulty which, had the topography of the country been accurately ascertained, would not have occurred. On the diseño the American river is represented as running in direction nearly east and west, until at Alder creek, where it turns abruptly to the north. By the scale of the diseño, the four leagues which were to be the longitudinal extension of the grant terminate at or near Alder creek. It was therefore supposed that the two side lines would run in a north and south direction, perpendicular to the supposed course of the river, while the back line was to be run parallel to it, and in such a way as to include, when the meanderings of the river were computed, the required quantity of eight leagues. The course of the boundary line of Sutter, which was the western boundary of the tract, was admitted to be north and south. The decree, therefore, directed the opposite side line, or eastern boundary, to be also run due north and south, and parallel with the western boundary. On making the survey it was found that the general course of the river was not east and west, but southwest and northeast. The side lines, therefore, if run in a north and south direction, cannot be perpendicular, as supposed, to the general course of the stream. It has also been found that, if a line be measured from the western boundary, in a direction parallel to the general course of the river, to a point four leagues distant from the western boundary, and through the points of termination of this line a due north and south line be drawn for the eastern boundary, the latter will strike the river, not only far above Alder creek, but far above any portion of the stream represented on the diseño. For, the course of the river bending abruptly to the north a short distance above Alder creek, a due north and south line, drawn as described, will run, for a considerable distance, not far from parallel with the river, and the northeastern portion of the track will take the form of a long and narrow tongue of land, running for more than two leagues along the river and due east from it, instead of south of it, as contemplated in the grant, and of an average breadth of considerably less than a league. That the survey must assume substantially this form if the eastern line be run due north and south, in literal compliance with the decree, must, I think, be admitted. But, on the other hand, it is plain that the tract so surveyed will, neither in its shape nor location, resemble that delineated on the diseño, and evidently intended to be granted by the governor. On the diseño Alder creek is represented as lying on the extreme eastern edge of the shaded portion of the map, which indicates the tract solicited. Beyond this creek the river is represented as extending in a nearly northerly direction, but the portion of the stream so represented is in length only about one-fifth of the whole of its course from the western boundary to the eastern edge of the map. But the portion of the river above Alder creek, included in the survey, is in length about six and a half sixteenths, or more than one-third of the whole. Again, the diseño represents Buffalo creek, and a very distinctly marked bend of the stream, as situated about the middle of the tract; whereas, on the survey, it is at the distance of a mile, less than one-third of the whole distance along the river from the western to the eastern boundary.

It has already been remarked that the intention of the governor to grant a tract four leagues in length along the river is too clear to be mistaken. Taking the most liberal view for the claimants, we may construe the grant to mean that a tract of that length shall be measured along the river in its general course, without computing the bends or abrupt elbows. Adopting, then, this mode of measurement, it is found that, from the western point of commencement to the eastern termination of the survey, the distance along the river is sixteen miles, or about six leagues, while, if the whole river front be measured, and the lands meandered, the distance is very considerably increased. It is therefore apparent that the survey under consideration not only extends the grant along the river to a distance much beyond what was contemplated in the grant, but that the eastern line strikes the river at a point very considerably above and to the northeast of any portion of the stream delineated on the map. The tract, also, as surveyed, is in shape wholly dissimilar to the rectangular piece of land, four leagues long by two wide, lying on the south of the American river, represented on the diseño. For a distance of about two leagues it is located to the east of that river, and the width of this part of the survey is at no point greater than a league, and for a considerable distance less than half a league.

But it is contended that the decree under which the survey was made fixes the eastern boundary at a due north and south line drawn parallel to the western line; that the location of that line is, therefore, res judicata, and cannot now be disturbed. The decree of the board was drawn in advance of any survey, and without accurate knowledge of the course of the river or the topography of the country. The diseño was probably accepted as indicating, with tolerable exactness, the tract solicited; and as a north and south line would, according to the compass marks on the diseño, strike the river at about a right angle to its general course, such a line, drawn at the distance of about four leagues from the western boundary, was naturally fixed upon as the eastern boundary of the tract. But it having been found that the general course of the river is from northeast to southwest, and not from east to west, as indicated on the diseño, a north and south line fails, as we have seen, to strike the river at right angles to its general course, but will, if protracted until it reaches the river, run for a considerable distance nearly parallel to it, and will strike it far beyond the most easterly limits of the diseño. It appears to me, therefore, that the call in the decree for a north and south line as the eastern boundary should be construed to mean the north and south of the diseño; that is, perpendicular to the course of the river represented thereon as running from east to west. The decree itself refers to the grant and diseño for a more particular description of the tract. If, then, the diseño indicates a tract different in form and location from that surveyed, according to the description in the decree, there is an evident repugnance in the latter which is to be explained and reconciled by the court; that neither in this case nor in any other did the board mean to confirm the claim for any other tract than that described in the grant and delineated on the diseño, is clear, and if, misled by the compass marks, or by any other inaccurate representation on the diseño, they have described boundaries which, when run upon the ground, are found to include a different tract from that described in the grant and delineated on the diseño, the error should be rectified by this court when the survey is submitted for approval.

It was also contended by the United States that the Someiras, mentioned in the grant as the eastern boundary, are situated within and to the westward of the eastern line as surveyed. It is, however, clearly shown by the testimony of Goddard, and the accurate profile of the country exhibited by him, that a tract four leagues long and two wide may be laid off along the southern bank of the river, without passing beyond the range of foothills mentioned in the grant as the eastern boundary. It is also contended that the grant was, in fact, for six, and not for eight, leagues. Whatever force there may be in this suggestion, it is now too late to urge it. The quantity of eight leagues has been confirmed to the claimant, and the United States have recognized the correctness of the decree by dismissing the appeal from it, and consenting that the claimant proceed under it as under a final decree.

It is strenuously urged by the counsel for the claimants, and purchasers under them, that the original survey was long acquiesced in by the government; that sales have been effected and rights acquired on the faith of the admission of its correctness by the government; and that sales of public lands have even been made under the authority of the government or its agents, the purchasers under which would be injured if the survey is disturbed. But these considerations, though proper to be urged to the secretary of the interior, when solicited to approve the survey, cannot be regarded by the court when called upon under the act of 1860, to pass upon the correctness of a survey of a confirmed land claim. It is certainly to be regretted innocent parties have been injured by an incautious reliance on the correctness of a survey which, when their rights were acquired, had not received the final approbation either of the higher executive authority, or of the courts having jurisdiction on the subject. But the duty of the court, when the case is submitted, is clear, viz. to direct the survey to be made as in its judgment it ought to be done. It is proper to observe that the survey referred to in the foregoing opinion is the first official survey made in 1857, and approved by John C. Hays, surveyor general. The recent survey, made since the opinion of the secretary of the interior adverse to the Hays survey was delivered, is admitted by all parties to be erroneous.

My opinion is that the eight leagues confirmed to the claimant should be surveyed and located as follows: By drawing a line parallel to the general course of the American river through the center or main body of the tract, commencing at a point on the western boundary as established in both the surveys, and extending four leagues in length. Through the eastern termination of this line a line is to be drawn, at right angles to it, such line to be protracted until it reaches the river, and to extend in the opposite direction until it reaches a point two leagues distant along said line from the river. From this last-mentioned point a line is to be drawn to the termination of the western boundary, as laid down on the Hays survey, in such a way as to make the area of the entire tract included within the boundaries, eight square leagues and no more. There will thus be measured off to the claimants a tract four leagues long, by two wide, along the southern bank of the American, in a form not far from rectangular, and as near as may be such as the grant and diseño clearly show was intended to be given him.

Case No. 15,126.

UNITED STATES v. FOLSOM.

[Hoff. Dec. 44.]

District Court, N. D. California. June 25, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—CONCLUSIVENESS OF LOCATION.

[Where the decree of the board of commissioners, of the district court, or of the supreme court, locating a grant, is specific and plain, and it has long been accepted as finally and definitely locating the land, and large interests have been acquired on the faith of this finality, the location ought not to be disturbed, except in the case of manifest error, and on clear proof of the incorrectness of the location, and not on the mere ground that, if the question were new, the court might have located the land differently.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The official survey in this case having been brought into court under the provisions of the act of 1860, the cause was argued, and a decision rendered setting aside the survey, and ordering a new one to be made, as directed in the opinion. An application for a rehearing was thereupon made in behalf of the claimants and interveners, and the cause has been reargued and submitted. The survey for which the claimants contend is that made by John C. Hays, former surveyor general, in 1857. There can be no doubt that, if this survey be disturbed, the case would be one of singular hardship. It appears that, when the cause was pending before this court on appeal from the board of land commissioners, it was strenuously objected, on the part of the United States and of some other parties who have since intervened in this proceeding, that the decree of the board was erroneous, inasmuch as it required the survey to be made substantially as in the Hays survey, and so as to include Negro Bar and the town of Folsom. On this and other questions elaborate arguments were heard, and on the 23d of February, 1857, an opinion was delivered in this court [Case No. 15,127] declaring the claim to be valid, and directing a decree of confirmation to be entered for the land as described in the grant and delineated on the diseño. Whether the particular description of the land contained in the decree of the board was or was not in conformity with the calls of the grant and diseño, does not appear to have been discussed, or intended to be decided in the opinion referred to. No decree was entered pursuant to this opinion, but, on the 29th of April, 1857, a stipulation was made by the district attorney, pursuant to the instructions of the attorney general, by which it was agreed that the appeal should be dismissed, and that the claimants should have leave to proceed "under the decree of the board of land commissioners as under final decree." A consent order to this effect was accordingly entered, and a survey pursuant to that decree was made by John C. Hays, the then surveyor general. The correctness of this survey appears to have been acquiesced in by the United States from May, 1857, until September, 1858, when an opinion adverse to it was delivered by the secretary of the interior, in whom the right of final decision in such matters was then supposed to reside. In the meantime, lands outside of the survey, and which it is now sought to include within the grant, had been advertised and sold as public lands. The interveners, also, who had resisted the affirmance of the decree of the board, acquiesced in its finality, and large purchases were made, at a very heavy outlay, of portions of the tract included within the Hays survey, but which, up to the time of the final confirmation of the decree of the board, it had been contended should not be included. On the faith of the finality of this decree, the probate court having jurisdiction of the estate of the late Joseph L. Folsom ordered a sale of the land within the boundaries as described in the decree, and the supreme court of this state has in several suits sustained ejectments brought by persons, claiming under the grant, for lands embraced within the boundaries therein set forth. On the various sales effected by the executors of [J. L.] Folsom, his estate has received large sums of money; but, if the location be now altered so as to exclude the lands sold by them, the purchasers will be without title, while the estate will acquire a large body of land the title to which has always been disclaimed, and which has, to a considerable extent, been settled upon as public land. It is proper to observe that the executors have no wish to disturb the location as fixed by the Hays survey, the correctness of which they have so emphatically affirmed by their acts.

In the opinion recently delivered by this court, it was not assumed that the jurisdiction conferred by the act of 1860 enabled the court to set aside or correct a location definitely made by the final decree either of the board, of this court, or of the supreme court, in cases where such decrees declared and established boundaries. But it was held to be clearly within its power to construe and interpret such decrees, and that the petition, the diseño, the grant, and other documentary evidence of title on which the decree was founded, and to which it refers for greater certainty, were properly to be considered in ascertaining the true intent and meaning of the decree. If, therefore, the decree described a particular tract, but the petition, diseño, and grant, referred to in the decree, indicated a different tract, a repugnancy on the face of the decree would arise, which would give to the court the right to carry into effect the presumed intention of the decree by conforming to the title, and correcting the error in the description. [Case No. 15,125.] On referring to the petition, diseño, and grant, it appeared to the court that the intention of the governor to grant a tract four leagues long by two wide, on the American river, was manifest, and that the board directed the eastern line to be run due north and south, on the supposition that, as indicated on the diseño, the course of the river was from east to west, and that a line drawn north and south would be perpendicular to its general course. It is urged, however, that the board were in fact aware that the general course of the river was from northeast to southwest, and not from east to west, notwithstanding that the latter was stated by Mr. Bidwell to be its general course. If this be so, so much of the reasoning in the opinion of this court as proceeds upon the hypothesis that the board intended to make the east and west lines perpendicular to the general course of the river, and described as running north and south, because they supposed the river to run from east to west, must fail. But the question recurs whether, in thus locating the grant, the board have designated a tract different from that described in the title papers. It must be presumed that they intended to confirm to the claimants the tract granted, and none other. If, therefore, on referring to the title papers, we find the land granted to be different from that described in the decree, the title papers must control, especially as they are in terms referred to and made a part of the decree itself. And this repugnancy or inconsistency in the decree would authorize this court, in the exercise of the duty of construing it, to follow that part of it which refers to the title papers, rather than that part which defines the boundaries. But it is evident that the court, if confined to the mere right of construing the decree, could disregard the specific boundaries mention in it only where a plain and unmistakable repugnance existed between the description in the title papers and that embodied in the decree. That the board and the courts had, under the act of 1851, jurisdiction to determine "all questions as to extent, quantity, location, and boundary," has been expressly decided by the supreme court. [U. S. v. Fossatt] 21 How. [62 U. S.] 449. When, therefore, such questions have arisen and been determined, and the decree has become final and conclusive on all parties, this court cannot, under the power of construing the decree, waive it, on the ground that, in its judgment, the land might have been more correctly located. The repugnance between the decree and the title papers must be plain and irreconcilable before this court, if empowered only to construe, could be justified in disregarding the specific description by which the board have located the land. Even if, as is contended, the act of 1860 gave to the court jurisdiction to determine all questions as to location and boundary, and to disregard all determinations of those questions made in former decrees, either of the board, of this court, or of the supreme court, it is clear that, where those decrees are specific and plain, where they have long been accepted as finally and definitely locating the land, and where large interests have been acquired on the faith of this finality, the location ought not to be disturbed, except in cases of manifest error, and on clear proofs of the incorrectness of the location, and not on the mere ground that, if the question were new, this court might have located the land differently. I proceed to inquire, therefore, whether, in the location made by the board, there is such manifest error and clear repugnance to the description of the land as contained in the title papers as to make it the duty of the court to direct a different location to be made.

It has already been stated that it appeared to this court to have been manifestly the intention to grant a tract along the American river two leagues wide by four leagues long. It is objected that there is nothing in the petition, diseño, or grant to warrant this conclusion. The petition describes the land as bounded by the land of Señor Sutter, as explained in the map. "The place is situated on the bank of the American river, and consists of four leagues in length to the east and two leagues in breadth to the south." Both the decree of concession and the grant describe the land as situated on the banks of the river "called that of the Americans," but the only boundaries mentioned in the grant are the lands of Sutter and the low hills to the east. The diseño, according to the scale, represents a tract four leagues in extent from west to east and two leagues from north to south. As the diseño and the grant show that the land lay on the bank of the American river, and as the petition showed that it was to be four leagues in length to the east and two leagues in breadth to the south, it appeared to the court fair to conclude that the tract was to be four leagues along the river by two in width, especially as of the diseño the river was represented as running from east to west. When, however, it was found that the course of the river was from northeast to southwest it seemed to me reasonable to give to the tract an extension of four leagues in a direction parallel with the general course of the stream, and not in a due easterly direction. It is true that the description in the petition makes the tract extend "four leagues to the east" (por el este); but, as before observed, that direction appears to have been mentioned from its supposed conformity with the course of the river, and not because it was intended to fix the extent of the track by running a line in a course precisely east. The loose and confused ideas of the former possessors of this country with regards to the points of the compass, are well known, and the diseño before us shows how erroneous was the notion of the petitioner as to the course of the American river. When, therefore, he asked for a tract "upon the banks of the river, consisting of four leagues in length, towards the east, and two in breadth towards the south," and delineated it on a diseño whereon he represented the river as flowing from east to west, the inference seems almost irresistible that he intended to ask for a tract of those dimensions along the river, and running "towards the east," but in a direction parallel to its course. Such seems to have been the opinion of the board in framing the very decree the correctness of which is so earnestly defended. By that decree the eastern boundary is not required to be drawn through a point four leagues distant in a due east direction from the westerly point of commencement. On the contrary, the southerly or back boundary is required to be ascertained by drawing "lines easterly in a direction parallel to the general direction of the American river, and at the distance, as near as may be, of two leagues therefrom, four leagues, or so far as may be necessary to inclose eight leagues," etc. It will be perceived that neither the direction nor the length of this boundary is determined on the principle now contended for by the claimants. For it is required to be composed of lines drawn parallel to the course of the river, which the board seem to have thought would run "easterly," and its length was not to be four leagues at all events, but such as would include eight leagues within the tract. As the American river formed the northern boundary, and lines parallel to it at the distance of two leagues joined the southern boundary, which was to be four leagues in length, or so far as might be necessary to inclose eight leagues, I cannot perceive how it can be doubted that the board, like this court, considered the tract as extending four leagues in length along the river by two in breadth.

But the real question in the case is whether the eastern and western boundary lines should be run in a due north and south direction, or perpendicularly to the general course of the river. In the opinion heretofore delivered, the latter mode was held to be the more correct; and on the following considerations: (1) As the tract was to be situated on the bank of the river, and to extend four leagues in a direction parallel to its general course, it seemed that the side lines, if drawn perpendicular to the course of the river, would best preserve the rectangular shape which the diseño appeared to indicate, and would satisfy the terms of the petition, which described it as four leagues in length by two in width. (2) By running the eastern line in a dué north and south direction, a long tongue of land would be included, which, it was supposed, was not represented on the shaded portion of the diseño, and which gave to the land a river front of about six leagues, without computing the abrupt bends in the stream.

In reply, it is suggested that the location of the western line has never been disputed; that it commences at a marked oak tree on the Sacramento, and runs due south two leagues; that the court has felt compelled to adopt this line, and in that respect to depart from its own theory of location; and that, if the western line be run north and south, the eastern line should be parallel to it. (2) That, on the original diseño produced from the archives, the tongue of land referred to is represented, and the course of the river delineated from a point beyond the eastern limits of the Hays survey. (3) That the only boundaries called for in the grant are the lands of Sutter and the lomerias towards the east, and the Hays survey is within those limits. (4) That the grantee always claimed the lands as high up the river as the Hays survey extends, and that his first settlement was made at or near Negro Bar, which, under the opinion of the court, would be excluded. (5) That, by the Mexican ordinances, the measurements were required to be made from north to south and from east to west, and where the grant is made on the seashore, or on the banks of a river or large lake, such shore was to form the boundary on one side, from whence the measurements shall commence. Ordenanzas de Tierra y Agua, arts. 5, 6, 8. (6) That the land included in the Hays survey is wholly within the boundaries mentioned in the grant, viz. the banks of the river, the lands of Sutter, and the lomerias; and that the claimant has the right of electing the location within those limits. (7) That the grantee in his lifetime, and his representatives since his death, have in the most emphatic manner made their election; that the location directed by the court would give to the claimants six thousand acres of land which they have never claimed, and do not now claim, and would take an equal amount from parties who have purchased since the decree of the board became final,—lands for which they have paid a very large sum, which are worth several hundred thousand dollars, and on which not less than $30,000 have been paid for taxes within the last five years. (8) That even if, under the act of 1860, this court has full authority to review and correct any final decree of the supreme court, of this court, or of the board, so far as the same relates to boundary and location, yet it ought not to disturb such decrees where important interests have been acquired on the faith of their finality, except in cases of clear error or oversight, arising from the want of sufficient information as to the natural features of the country, and not merely on a difference of opinion, in a doubtful case, as to the most correct mode of locating the land. (9) That the final decrees of either of the tribunals mentioned, when they determine questions of location, boundary, and extent, are made in the exercise of jurisdiction decided by the supreme court to have been conferred on them by the act of 1851, and they are therefore conclusive on the United States and the claimants, especially where, as in this case, they have been accepted and made final by consent; and that, though this court, in interpreting them, may be required to be governed rather by the title papers than by the description of the land embodied in the decrees, yet it is not authorized to disregard such description, when plain and positive, unless where it is clearly repugnant to, and irreconcilable with, the terms of the grant and other documentary evidence of title, which is not this case.

I am much impressed with the force of these suggestions. I still think that, if the question were a new one, the more correct location would be to measure a tract four leagues in length, in a direction parallel to the general course of the river, and bounded on the east and west by lines perpendicular to it; or, if the western boundary along the land of Sutter be considered as established by the long recognition of it, then the tract might be measured four leagues in length in a direction parallel to the course of the river and the easterly line run to the river for quantity. Notwithstanding all that has been urged to the contrary, it is plain that, when the board directed the southern boundary to be run "easterly" by lines parallel with the general direction of the river, and thence northerly to the river, they supposed the course of the river to be nearly "easterly," and that the last line would be at, or nearly at, right angles to it. Nor could they have anticipated that a due north line would include within the tract the long tongue of land referred to, and increase so largely the frontage on the river. But it cannot be said that the survey, as made under the decree, is repugnant to, or inconsistent with, the terms of the grant. It is within the exterior boundaries mentioned in the title papers, viz. "the banks of the river," the "lands of Sutter," and the "lomerias"; and though its shape, and especially the extent of front along the river, render it liable to grave objections, yet, under all the circumstances, I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to disturb it. The survey as made by Mr. Hays is admitted to be substantially in conformity with the decree of the board. By modifying it in some comparatively unimportant particulars, it would be in precise accordance with the decree. That decree has been admitted by the United States to be correct. It has been accepted as finally determining the location and boundaries of the land. Large sums have been paid, and immense interests acquired on the faith of its finality, and in some instances by parties who only bought after exhausting all legal means to procure a correction of its alleged errors. It has been treated by the supreme court of this state, in several suits, as finally determining the boundaries and location of the tract. The representatives of the grantee have received large sums for lands which the proposed change in location would exclude; while the government of the United States has advertised and sold, as public land, lands which the same change would include in the grant.

After much consideration it has appeared to me that, under all the circumstances, it is my duty to approve the survey substantially as made by Hays under the decree, notwithstanding my conviction that, if the question were new, that survey is not such as this court would have directed to be made.

Case No. 15,127.

UNITED STATES v. FOLSOM.

[7 Sawy. 602.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June, 1859.

CALIFORNIA LAND GRANTS—JURISDICTION OF DISTRICT COURT—FINAL DECREES—CONFIRMATION OF SURVEYS.

[1. It seems that the decision of the supreme court in U. S. v Fossat, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 445, should not be construed as determining that none of the decrees heretofore rendered by the boards of land commissioners and the district courts are not final decrees because they do not embody and confirm an exact survey of the claims, or as deciding that final decrees, defining with precision the boundaries of the land, must be entered. The decision must, however, be understood as determining that, in all cases where a decree of comfirmation has been entered, and a survey under it has been made, on which a patent is about to issue, which survey is objected to as erroneous, it is the duty of the court to direct the survey to be returned to it, that it may hear and determine the questions of location and boundary which may be raised.]

[3. Settlers claiming under the United States must make their objections through the district attorney, and cannot be heard as separate parties. See U. S. v. Bidwell, Case No. 14,592.]

[This was an appeal by the United States from a decision of the board of land commissioners confirming the Rancho Rio De Los Americanos to the claimant, J. L. Folsom, now deceased, and represented by his executors.]

The proceedings in this case were supplementary to final decree, and arose under the decision of the supreme court in the case of

U. S. v. Fossat, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 445, in which the supreme court determined that the power of the district court over the cause, under the acts of congress, does not terminate until the issue of a patent, conformably to the decree. The case was argued on the part of the United States by Edmund Randolph, and on the part of the claimants by R. Aug. Thompson and John J. Williams; and the discussion, generally, was participated in by many other members of the bar. The argument was made before both judges.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. A decree having been entered at a former term, confirming the claim in this case according to the boundaries mentioned in the grant, the appeal therefrom was, by consent of the district attorney, acting under the instructions of the attorney general, dismissed. A motion is now made that the survey be brought into court to be examined and passed upon, and that a final decree be entered confirming to the claimants the lands so surveyed. This motion is made that the court may exercise the jurisdiction which, by the recent decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Fossat, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 445, it is supposed to possess. As the same proceeding may be taken in the case of every claim confirmed by this court, and as the jurisdiction the court is invited to exercise is one it was not by any one suspected to possess until the decision referred to appeared, an argument on the point was called for, in the hope that, on a full discussion, some of the difficulties and embarrassments which were felt on all sides to surround the subject might be removed. It would be idle to conceal the fact that the question presented and the doubts raised by the recent decision of the supreme court have been found, by this court and the counsel engaged in these cases, in the highest degree perplexing and embarrassing. No construction of the opinion of the supreme court was suggested by which all the difficulties could be obviated or objections answered. But, as the latest decision of the supreme court on a class of cases to us, in California, of vital importance, it is the duty of this court to endeavor to ascertain its true interpretation, and the principles it establishes, and to adopt those principles in all cases to which they are applicable, without pretending to judge of their correctness, or to inquire, except to arrive at its meaning, how far previous decisions of the same court have been followed or overruled.

A brief statement of the case of U. S. v. Fossat [supra], as it was presented to the supreme court, is necessary to a correct understanding of its recent decision. The original decree of this court confirmed the claim to land within four external boundaries mentioned in the decree. Three, only, of these boundaries were designated in the grant, but it appeared to this court that the fourth, or northern boundary, the existence and location of which was not disputed, was sufficiently indicated by the petition and the diseño, to both of which the grant referred, as well as by the name (Capitancillos) of the land granted. The land within these boundaries was found to exceed, by a fraction, the quantity of one square league. But, as that quantity was described in the grant as "one league of the larger size, a little more or less, as is explained by the map accompanying the expediente," and as the supreme court, in the case of U. S. v. Sutherland [19 How. (60 U. S.) 363], has declared "that, in Mexican grants, a square league seems to have been the only unit of estimating the superficies of land," and that "if 'more or less' was intended in the grant, it was carefully stated," it seemed to this court that the whole land within the boundaries, and including an excess of a fractional part of the unit of measurement, might reasonably be considered as intended to be conveyed by a grant which described the quantity as "one league, a little more or less." The supreme court, however, decided these views to be erroneous, and held that, as only three boundaries were mentioned in the grant, the fourth must be run for quantity, "which was the only criterion for determining that boundary furnished by the grant"; that the words "more or less" must be disregarded, "as having no meaning in a system of survey and location like that of the United States," and the precise quantity of one league be considered to be clearly expressed; that "if the limitation of the quantity had not been so explicitly declared," it might have been proper to ascertain the fourth boundary by referring to the petition, the diseño, and to evidence, to ascertain what land was included in and known by the name of Capitancillos, but that no such reference or inquiries were admissible in that case, as the grant was free from ambiguity or uncertainty. The supreme court accordingly affirmed the claim "for one league of land, to be taken within the southern, western, and eastern boundaries designated in the grant, to be located at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established for the location and survey of private land claims in California by the executive department of the government." It further ordered that the "external boundaries designated in the grant may be declared by the district court from the evidence on file and such other evidence as may be produced before it." U. S. v. Fossat, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 427.

The duty thus imposed upon it this court thereupon proceeded to discharge. It was not suspected by the court, or suggested by any of the counsel, that that duty extended further than to "declare the three external boundaries mentioned in the grant," i. e. to designate them, unmistakably, in its decree, and to decide the vexed and only disputed question in the case, viz. whether the southern boundary was the ridge known as the "lomas bajas," or the sierra behind it. The fourth boundary was, by the decision of the supreme court, to be determined by quantity alone; nor was this court required to declare it, for it was directed to declare only "the external boundaries designated in the grant, within which the land confirmed was to be located at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established by the executive department of the government. A decree was accordingly made by this court, in which the three external boundaries mentioned in the grant were "declared" and described with as much precision as was possible without a survey; and the only disputed question in the cause, as to what was the southern boundary (viz. the lomas bajas, or the main sierra), was elaborately discussed and decided. An appeal from this decree having been taken to the supreme court, it was dismissed as "improvidently taken and allowed." In its opinion, the court considers at large the nature and extent of the jurisdiction conferred on the district court by the act of March 3, 1851, and it decides that it possesses the power to inquire into and decide all questions of extent, locality, quantity, boundary, and legal operation which may arise in the cause. It further decides that, as, under the acts of 1824 [4 Stat. 52] and 1828 [Id. 284], it was the duty of the surveyor to fulfill the decree of the court, and the court had power to enforce the discharge of that duty, so, under the act of 1851 [9 Stat. 631], the duties of the surveyor begin under the same conditions, and the power of the district court over the same cause "does not terminate until the issue of the patent conformably to its decree."

It would seem that the right and the duty of the district court to control and correct surveys by the surveyor general, in all cases, could not be more explicitly declared. But the supreme court goes further. The appeal was dismissed because this court had not entered a final decree. And this court is directed to "ascertain the external lines of the land confirmed, and to enter a final decree of confirmation of that land." This direction, when taken in connection with the previous remarks of the court as to the power and duty of the district court, with respect to surveys, and also with the fact that this court had already declared the boundaries with as much precision as was practicable without a survey, can only mean that it must direct a survey to be made, and that said survey, when approved, must be embodied in a final decree of confirmation.

The decision of the supreme court is not based on the ground that this court has failed to execute any special mandate directed to it; for, as before stated, this court had been merely directed to declare "the external boundaries," not of the land confirmed, but "designated in the grant, within which the land was to be located at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established by the executive department of this government." As the three boundaries mentioned in the grant were not those of the land confirmed, but of the tract within which the one league confirmed was to be taken at the election of the grantee, subject to executive restrictions, and as this court was directed to declare only those three boundaries, it is clear that it performed all the duties enjoined by the supreme court, and that the case was not remanded because the court had failed fully to comply with the previous mandate of the supreme court. This fact is, by the supreme court itself, admitted in its recent decision. "The district court," it states, "in conformity with the directions of the decree, declared the external lines on three sides of the tract claimed, leaving the other line to be completed by a survey to be made." 21 How. [62 U. S.] 447. The defect in the decree of this court must have been other that a nonconformity with the mandate of the supreme court. I have been unable to give any other construction to the opinion referred to than that this court, after declaring the three boundaries within which the league confirmed was to be taken, at the election of the grantee, and after the grantee had made his election, subject to executive restrictions, should have caused or permitted a survey to be made, and should have, by its final decree, confirmed the land so surveyed to the claimant.

Such being the clear purport of the decision, with regard to the case before the court, we are next to inquire to what extent the principles laid down are to be applied to the other cases. The view generally taken by the bar regards the decision as laying down new rules by which all the land cases in California are to be governed; and the case is considered to decide that the decree of this court, or of the supreme court, by which the authenticity and general boundaries of a grant are declared, are not "final decrees," but that the court is, in all cases, bound to direct a survey to be made, or to revise and to pass upon surveys already made, and by its final decree to adopt a survey, and declare with precision the boundaries of the tract confirmed. In support of this construction, reference is made to that portion of the opinion of the supreme court which decides that this court has, under the act of 1851, jurisdiction to determine all questions of extent, locality, and boundary, as fully as it was possessed by the courts under the laws of 1824 and 1828; to the declaration that the decrees of this court, hitherto supposed to be "final," were not final decrees under the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], and that the supreme court has entertained appeals from them by "a relaxation of its rules," rendered proper by the "peculiar nature of these cases"; and to the order at the close of the opinion that the appeal be dismissed as improvidently allowed, and that this court "proceed to enter a 'final decree' of confirmation of the land confirmed."

If the language of the opinion of the supreme court be alone considered, it is perhaps not easy to avoid giving to it this construction. But the objections to it seem insurmountable. The thirteenth section of the act of 1851 prescribes the duties of the surveyor general with regard to private land claims in California. It is declared to be his duty to "cause all private land claims in California, which shall be finally confirmed, to be accurately surveyed, and to furnish plats of the same," etc. It is obvious, therefore, that the final decree of confirmation must precede the survey, for, until the claim is finally confirmed, the surveyor is not required or authorized to act. Again: The tenth section provides that, in cases of appeals from the decisions of the board of commissioners, the district court shall proceed to render judgment, etc., and shall, on application of the party against whom judgment is rendered, grant an appeal to the supreme court, etc. The authority to entertain such appeals is not explicitly given to the supreme court, but it results, by necessary implication, from the provisions above cited, and from the allusion in the fifteenth section to the "final decrees rendered by the said commissioners, or by the district or supreme courts of the United States." Unless, then, the decrees of this court which have been appealed from were in some sense "final decrees," it is not easy to perceive how the supreme court, by any relaxation of its rules, or from considerations of convenience, could have had jurisdiction to review them on appeal.

The fact that the supreme court has heretofore entertained, and will hereafter entertain, appeals from such decrees, must therefore be taken as proof that they regard those judgments and decrees as "final" and appealable under the act of 1851, though it appears that they are not final decrees under the judiciary act of 1789. It is also evident that such decrees must be final decrees of confirmation, and the lands confirmed must be deemed "finally confirmed," within the meaning of the thirteenth section; for, otherwise, the surveyor would have no authority, nor could he be required, under the provisions of that section, to survey them. A contrary construction would lead to the most important and perhaps disastrous consequences. It is well known that both the boards of commissioners, as well as both the district courts of this state, in common with all the gentlemen of the bar, have hitherto regarded the decrees by which the authenticity and validity and the general boundaries of a claim have been declared, as "final decrees" of confirmation, under which the survey was to be made and a patent issued. In no case has a survey first been made and adopted or embodied in any subsequent final decree of confirmation. In pursuance of such decrees, or similar ones, by the supreme court, many patents have issued. If, then, it should be held that none of those decrees were final, and that the lands confirmed by them were not "finally confirmed," in the sense of the act of 1851, it might follow that the patents have been irregularly issued, and are void, as having been issued without authority of law. There also may be cases in which no appeal has been taken from the decision of the board to the district court, or in which such appeals have been dismissed. If, then, the decisions of the board are not final decisions or decrees, it is difficult to perceive how final decrees in those cases can be made. For the board has ceased to exist, and the district court may never have acquired jurisdiction over the cause. I am persuaded that a construction of the opinion of the supreme court involving such grave consequences, ought, if possible, to be rejected.

By referring to the cases cited by the supreme court in its opinion, viz., those of Mitchel v. U. S., 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 52, and Sibbald v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 488, as instances where the court directed, by its mandate, certain lands to be surveyed, and "maintained and declared the duty of the surveyors to fulfill the decree of the court," it will be found that the decrees of the supreme court, requiring those duties to be performed, are expressly called, by the court itself, its "final decrees." In Mitchel's Case, the language of the court is: "On consideration whereof, this court is of opinion that the title of the petitioner, etc., is valid by the laws of nations, etc., and doth finally order, decree, determine, and adjudge accordingly; and this court doth in like manner, order, adjudge, determine, and decree that the title of the petitioner is valid to so much of a certain other tract as shall not be included in an exception hereinafter made." And it proceeds to give particular directions for ascertaining the land so excepted. In Sibbald's Case, after declaring the duty of the surveyor to fulfill the decree of the court, it orders "that the clerk of this court make out a certificate of the final decree heretofore rendered in the case of Sibbald v. U. S., and, also, a mandate according to such final decree, the opinion of the court in that case and on these petitions." 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 495.

It appears, therefore, that the decree of the supreme court by which the general validity of the claims in those cases was ascertained, and by which directions for a survey of certain tracts were given, were not only regarded by the court, but in terms declared, to be final decrees; although some proceedings subsequent to and in execution of the mandates were required to be had by the inferior court and by the surveyor, the latter of whom, it may be remarked, was, by the sixth section of the act of 1824, required to make a survey after a final decision in favor of a claimant. That the decrees under which the surveyor, by the act of 1851, was required to survey, were not by the legislature intended to contain or embody a precise description of the land, as ascertained by a previous survey, is further evident from the fact that the same section confers upon the surveyor general a certain provisional and quasi judicial authority to fix and settle disputed boundaries between adjoining ranchos. But if the final decree of this court, under and in obedience to which he acts, has already fixed with precision every line of the claim which is confirmed, the surveyor can never exercise the authority which the lawmakers have been at pains to confer. It would seem clear that the statute contemplated that the claim might be finally confirmed, and the surveyor called upon to survey it, under a decree affirming its validity and fixing its general boundaries, or those of the tract out of which the quantity confirmed should be taken, thus leaving to the surveyor the opportunity to exercise the authority with respect to interfering claims or boundaries which the lawmakers intrusted to him.

On the whole, I incline to the opinion that the decision of the supreme court ought not to be construed as determining that none of the decrees heretofore rendered by the boards, the district courts, and by itself, are final decrees; and that final decrees, defining with precision the boundaries of the land, must in all cases be entered. I am aware that this view is apparently in conflict with some expressions in the opinion, but it has seemed less open to objections than the other construction suggested, to adopt which would involve as consequences: (1) That no final decree has ever yet been made in any land case. (2) That the survey is to be made by the surveyor general of claims not finally confirmed, but which are finally confirmed only after survey, when the language of the statute is express, that the claims to be surveyed by him are those which shall be "finally confirmed." (3) It would leave the regularity and even the validity of all patents heretofore issued open to grave doubts. (4) It requires us to suppose that the supreme court have treated as final, and therefore appealable, decrees which were not final, and this by a relaxation of their rules, which, as the law only gives to that court jurisdiction of appeals from final decrees, it cannot be supposed that they would have felt themselves at liberty to make.

Assuming, then, that the decrees of this court, heretofore rendered, are to be deemed "final" in such a sense as that an appeal from them can be taken, and that the surveyor general, under the thirteenth section of the act of 1851, may be required to survey them, we are next to inquire what further jurisdiction over the case this court is, by the opinion under examination, declared to possess. That the Case of Fossat was remanded in order that a survey might be made, and a decree embodying such approved survey entered, is clear. It may be said, however, that such a proceeding is merely decided to be necessary in that particular case, and that it should not be taken except in cases precisely similar to that of Fossat, viz. where the question of boundary or location has been raised and decided in the regular course of the suit, and where the supreme court has remanded the cause in order that the location might be fixed. But this interpretation of the opinion is inadmissible. It has already been shown that this court had performed every duty required of it by the previous decision of the former court, and that the cause was not remanded because this court had failed to execute the previous mandate in the case. That the supreme court have, in their opinion, laid down principles generally applicable to all cases, I think, is evident.

In the first place, they discuss and decide the point whether this court has, by the act of 1851, any authority to decide questions of extent, location, and boundary. Such questions they declare may be "essential in determining the validity of a claim," and the power to decide upon "validity" involves the power to decide upon all questions of boundary. Secondly. In answer to the objections that this court has no means to ascertain the specific boundaries of a confirmed claim, and no power to enforce the execution of its decree, the supreme court decides that this court has such power, and that it is the duty of the surveyor to fulfill the decree of the court; and the court declares "that the power of the district court over the cause does not terminate until the issue of a patent conformably to its decree."

I am aware that, in a previous opinion, delivered in the same case,—[U. S. v. Fossat] 20 How. [61 U. S.] 425,—the same court declared that "the jurisdiction of the board of commissioners in the first instance, and the appellate jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, are limited to the making of decisions on the validity of the claim preliminary to its location and survey by the surveyor general of California, acting under the laws of the United States." No mode of reconciling this declaration with any construction of the last decision in the Case of Fossat, was suggested at the bar or has occurred to either of the judges. It must, therefore, be treated as overruled by the latter case. As, then, "the power of this court over the cause does not terminate until the issue of a patent conformably to its decree," and as it has jurisdiction to determine all questions of extent, location, and boundary which may arise, it is the duty of the court to exert this power, and to exercise the jurisdiction at the instance of a suitor. I therefore think that, in all cases where a decree of confirmation has been entered, and a survey under it has been made, on which a patent is about to issue, which survey is objected to as erroneous, it is the duty of the court to direct the survey to be returned to it, that it may hear and determine the questions of location and boundary which may be raised.

In coming to this conclusion, I have not overlooked the great difficulties of reducing it to practice. The first and most perplexing question is that of parties. By whom can objections to a survey be made? Every party entitled to object to the survey must have a right to take testimony in support of his objection, and a right to appeal from the decision of this court to the supreme court. It is therefore of the utmost consequence to determine who are the proper parties to the proceeding.

At first blush, the answer might seem obvious, viz.: That the parties to a proceeding to correct a survey, are only the original parties to the suit, viz. the United States and the claimant. But the solution of the difficulty is by no means so easy as it might appear. During the long period which has elapsed since the claims were first filed before the board, many changes of interest have occurred. Suppose, then, that the original claimant, has parted with all his interest, or it has been sold on execution. He may have no motive to dispute any location, however erroneous, and he may not be disposed to allow the use of his name to the present owner. Cannot the latter be heard to object to the location of what has become his exclusive property? Or, suppose that the original claimant, though really entitled to only two leagues, to be taken from a tract the boundaries of which contain four leagues, has, through error or fraud, sold out four leagues to two purchasers,—two leagues to each. He, therefore, has ceased to have any interest in the controversy. The real contest is between the purchasers, each of whom desires that the patent may cover the land conveyed to himself. Is neither to be heard? Or only he who has the good fortune to obtain the use of the name of the original claimant? The United States may have no objection to the survey. It will, therefore, be confirmed, unless objected to on the part of the claimant. Which of the parties, in the case supposed, has the right to object? If both have, what limits can be assigned to the rights of intervention? For, in some cases, the grantee may have sold to hundreds of purchasers.

Again: If the right of both subgrantees to be heard in the case supposed be admitted, ought not persons so immediately interested in the result of the inquiry to be heard, notwithstanding that the original claimant may not have sold out his entire interest? The part retained by him may be so situated that any possible location of the claim will include it. He has, therefore, no interest to object; on the contrary, he desires a patent to issue without delay. But the purchasers under him have a direct and vital interest in obtaining a location such as will cover the tracts conveyed to them respectively. Is the court to refuse to hear them?

Again: Grants, in most instances, have, as one or more of their boundaries, the lands of other parties. The court, in fixing the location of Rancho A, necessarily determines one of the boundaries of Rancho B, by which it is bounded. Ought not the owner of the latter to be heard to show what his boundary is? If he is not, he is excluded on the ground that the suit as to the boundaries of his neighbor determines nothing as to his rights. The result might thus be that, when the second rancho is before the court for location, the evidence in that case would compel it to adopt a boundary line different from that fixed in the first case. If the second location were the correct one, the claimant in the first case would lose his land. It would then be too late to extend his lines in another direction so as to give him the quantity mentioned in his grant. But the boundaries of Rancho B, in the case supposed, may involve an inquiry into the true location and boundaries of Rancho C, and several other circumjacent tracts. How, then, can the court, hearing each case separately, unassisted by topographical maps, and unable, except in rare instances, to visit the lands, hope to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion?

Again: Two or more grants are often made within the same general boundaries—an original, or first grant, and one or more sobrante grants. Ought not both grantees to be heard, that the court may, if possible, locate each of the grants, so as to satisfy the just claims of all the grantees? If all these parties have the right to appear, take testimony, and to appeal, it may reasonably be apprehended that the litigation upon which we are entering will be far more protracted than that which has already occurred respecting the validity of the claims. If these parties are excluded, how can justice be done? When we consider the immense interests involved in the location of grants, the vague and indeterminate character of the boundaries mentioned in the grants and delineated in the diseños, the opportunity afforded for plausible objections to any location which can be made, and how impracticable it is for a court to learn, through depositions, the natural features of a country it has never seen, and of which no topographical map is exhibited, and therefore how difficult it will be for it to render any decision in which the parties will acquiesce, or which will be satisfactory to itself, it may well be doubted whether the evident anticipation of the supreme court that few cases will reappear before it on appeal will be realized.

Before dismissing this subject a further observation may be made. The settlers claiming to hold under the United States are heard, if at all, through the district attorney. In many cases they may have just objections to a location which has been made so as to improperly include their claims. In many cases they may object to any location in order that the issue of a patent may be postponed, and that they may continue to enjoy the use of the land. The number of locations to be passed upon may be some hundreds. The district attorney, like the court, is unacquainted with the topography of the country. How can he determine, when objections supported by affidavits are presented to him, which he ought to urge in the name of the United States, and which he ought to refuse to make, as vexatious and intended for delay? May he not be driven to adopt the rule to make objections which seem plausible and are supported by an appearance of proofs? In such case, it is to be feared that the jurisdiction the court is about to exercise may be as often the means of delaying indefinitely the issue of a patent to a rightful claimant, and of plunging him into a new and protracted litigation, as of correcting errors of the surveyor general in locating claims. For these reasons I would gladly have declined the jurisdiction I am urged to assume. Under the recent decision of the supreme court I have not felt at liberty to do so.

With regard to the particular case more immediately under consideration, it follows, from what has been said, that this court cannot now proceed to examine the survey which has been made. The court, as already stated, regards the decree heretofore made as final, in a sense to authorize an appeal from it, or a survey of the lands as finally confirmed. It is not, however, exhaustive of its power over the case, for that does not terminate until the issue of a patent. The court does not, therefore, proceed, as of course, to enter a decree for the land as surveyed, which would be necessary if the decree heretofore made were only interlocutory. But it will hear objections to the survey. None are made in this case. The survey originally made is satisfactory to the parties now moving to bring it before the court. That survey has been disapproved at Washington by the executive officers of the government, and a new one directed to be made. When that shall have been done, the parties now moving may make their objections, and bring the questions involved before the court.

NOTE. Since the foregoing decision was rendered, Judge Hoffman has decided (in the case of U. S. v. Bidwell [Case No. 14,592], claiming the Rancho Arroyo Chico) upon the rights of settlers with respect to their standing in court. Judge Hoffman says: "In this case, as in all other cases, all persons who allege that any of the land included in a survey of a rancho is public land of the United States, must urge their objections in the name of the United States, and through the district attorney. To that officer is committed the duty of seeing that no public land is improperly embraced within a survey of a private claim. When he has no objections to interpose, the settler cannot be permitted to intervene in the proceeding. When he settled upon that land, and, notwithstanding that it was claimed under a Mexican title, chose to assume it to be public land, he was aware that the United States would assert her rights through her proper officers, and that the judgment of the courts, declaring that the land was not public but private land, would be final and conclusive on the rights of the United States and all claiming under them. When, therefore, the United States, through her officers, admits that the survey is properly made, or declines to make objections to it, no settler can be heard to contest it."

[For subsequent hearing upon the new survey ordered to be made, see Case No. 15,125. At a still later date the survey of 1857 was finally approved. Id. 15,126.]

Case No. 15,128.

UNITED STATES v. FOOTE.

[13 Blatchf. 418.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. June 17, 1876.

POST OFFICE — OBSCENE MATTER — "NOTICE" — INDICTMENT.

1. In an indict nent under section 3893 of the Revised Statutes, charging the defendant with depositing in the mail an obscene pamphlet, and also with depositing in the mail a notice giving information how an article designed for the prevention of conception can be obtained, it is not necessary or proper that the indictment should give a definite or detailed description of the pamphlet.

[Cited in U. S. v. Grimm, 45 Fed. 560.]

2. Sufficient information as to the particular article about which evidence is to be given can be obtained by an order for a bill of particulars, and for the exhibition to the defendant of the article itself.

[Cited in U. S. v. Bennett, Case No. 14,571.]

3. A notice in the form of a letter enclosed in a sealed envelope, if it gives the prohibited information, is within the scope of the statute.

[Cited in U. S. v. Gaylord, 17 Fed. 443; U. S. v. Huggett, 40 Fed. 637.]

4. A written slip of paper, without address or signature, giving the prohibited information, is a "notice," within the meaning of the statute, although not volunteered, but sent in reply to a letter asking for the information.

[This was an indictment against Edward B. Foote.]

Benjamin B. Foster, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Thomas Harland, for defendant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This case comes before the court upon a motion to quash an indictment. The questions argued by the counsel are presented to the court upon the indictment, and the bill of particulars filed by the prosecution, in which the accused is charged, under section 3893 of the Revised Statutes, with depositing, and causing to be deposited, in the mail, an obscene pamphlet, and, also, in a different count, with depositing in the mail a notice giving information how an article designed for the prevention of conception can be obtained.

The first ground of objection taken to the indictment is, that it fails to give a definite description of the pamphlet alleged to have been mailed. In respect to this ground of objection, I have only to repeat what I have had occasion many times to say in court, that, in cases of this description, it is neither necessary nor proper to pollute the record by a detailed description of obscene matter, and, where the grand jury omit a definite description of the matter, by reason of its obscene and filthy character, such omission furnishes no ground of objection to the indictment. Sufficient information as to the particular article about which evidence is to be given, can be obtained by an order for a bill of particulars, and for the exhibition to the defendant of the article itself. This practice has been repeatedly followed, and has been found adequate to the protection of the accused, while, at the same time, to a certain extent, it prevents the proceedings from being the vehicle of spreading obscenity before the public. The accused, his counsel, the district attorney, the jury and the court must necessarily have knowledge of the obscene matter forming the subject of the charge. Experience has shown that it is entirely possible to go through with a trial of this character without extending that knowledge beyond the limits indicated, and at the same time do full justice.

The next objection raises the question, whether a notice giving information when or how the prohibited articles may be obtained is within the scope of the statute, when such notice is in the form of a letter enclosed in a sealed envelope. The argument is, that no public information is given by such a letter, and that the subsequent mention in the statute, of letters on the envelope of which indecent matter is written, indicates an intention not to interfere with letters by reason of their contents, and shows that the word "notice" was not intended to cover a letter enclosed in an envelope. I cannot accede to this construction. The object of the statute is not to protect the morals of post office employees, but to prevent the mails of the United States from being the effectual aid of persons engaged in a nefarious business, by means used to distribute their obscene wares. To exclude from the statute all letters which, to the outward appearance, are harmless, would destroy its efficacy, for, everything would then take the form of a sealed letter. It is not the form in which the matter is mailed, but the character of the matter itself, which fixes the criminality of the act.

The last ground of objection rests upon the fact, admitted here, that the subject-matter charged in the indictment as a notice was a written slip of paper, without address or signature, mailed by the accused in answer to a letter received by him asking for the information which is given in writing upon the slip of paper. It is not disputed that the writing on the slip gives information as to how one of the prohibited articles may be obtained, but it is contended that such a writing is not a "notice," within the meaning of the statute, because it was not volunteered, but sent in reply to an inquiry. No such limited signification as is contended for can be given to the word "notice." "Notice" means "information, by whatever means communicated; knowledge given or received;" also, "a paper that communicates information." Webster's and Worcester's Dictionaries. The paper in question is within this definition. It gives the information specified by the act, and is plainly within the statute, for, by its terms, the statute covers every kind of notice, whereby is given, either directly or indirectly, information such as this slip affords.

It is said, that, unless some such limitation be given to the language of the statute, medical advice given by a physician in reply to the inquiry of a patient would be excluded from the mails. It is not seen that any considerable inconvenience would arise if such were the result, as other means of communication may be resorted to by physicians, while it is plain that any attempt to exclude information given by medical men from the operation of the statute would afford an easy way of nullifying the law. If the intention had been to exclude the communications of physicians from the operation of the act, it was, certainly, easy to say so. In the absence of any words of limitation, the language used must be given its full and natural significance, and held to exclude from the mails every form of notice whereby the prohibited information is conveyed.

Case No. 15,129.

UNITED STATES v. FORBES.

[Crabbe, 558.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. March 10, 1845.

SEAMEN—REVOLT—PILOT—INTOXICATION.

1. Wherever, by the overt acts of the crew, the authority of the master in the free navigation or management of his ship, or in the free exercise of his rights and duties on board, is entirely overthrown, and there is intentionally caused, by such acts, an actual or constructive suspension of his command, it is a revolt.

[Cited in U. S. v. Huff, 13 Fed. 637.]

2. But a mere disobedience of orders by one or two of the seamen, without combining with the others, or offensive or insolent language, is not a revolt.

3. The pilot is an officer of the ship when on board in the exercise of his duties, but the captain is still master of the vessel, and the pilot's orders are considered as the captain's.

4. Intoxication is rather an aggravation than an apology for a crime committed during that state; but if an habitual or fixed frenzy is thereby produced, it places the man in the same condition as if it were contracted, at first, involuntarily.

This was an indictment for revolt. It appeared that the ship Farewell sailed from Philadelphia on the 25th December, 1844. When below Chester, the pilot being still on board, the crew, most of whom were intoxicated, became very disorderly and wholly out of the master's control, and, when the officers attempted to seize the liquor in their possession, a portion of them, among whom [Thomas] Forbes was very prominent, refused to do duty. The mate of the ship in attempting to arrest Forbes was stabbed and killed by him, and it was only when he had been shot and wounded by the captain that the prisoner could be secured and sent to Philadelphia. The evidence also showed that Forbes was intoxicated at the time, but not so much so as to be unconscious of what he was doing.

The case came on to be tried, before Judge RANDALL, and a jury, on the 10th March, 1845, and was argued by Mr. Watts, Dist. Atty., for the United States, and by W. G. Smith, for Forbes.

Mr. Watts, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Revolt consists in the subversion of authority of the person in command of a vessel, if for a moment only; and so it has been defined by the courts having authority to describe it. U. S. v. Kelly, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 418; U. S. v. Hemmer [Case No. 15,345]; U. S. v. Haines [Id. 15,275]; Act March 3, 1835 (4 Stat. 2416). This crime may be committed on board a vessel not under sail, or in a place not on the high seas, if it be within the admiralty jurisdiction, wherein it differs from murder, which cannot be punished in any court of the United States, if committed within the jurisdiction of any particular state. If the evidence is to be believed, the prisoner is guilty of revolt within this description of it, and the fact of intoxication is no excuse or palliation.

W. G. Smith, for Forbes.

The evidence shows no attempt to commit the technical crime of revolt, which consists in a resistance of the authority of the master of a ship, with intent to subvert it. At the time of the disturbance, the pilot, being on board in discharge of his duties, was the master of the ship, and there is no evidence of resistance to his authority. Indeed, he himself says that all his orders were obeyed; the resistance was to the mate of the ship. As to the intent, it certainly could not have been to subvert the authority of the master. It is not to be supposed that such an intention could have existed when the ship was in the midst of the Delaware, and within a few miles of this city. None of the requisites of a revolt have, then, been made out, and if the prisoner's acts amount to any crime it is a mere affray. Thorne v. White [Case No. 13,989].

Mr. Watts, U. S. Dist. Atty., in reply.

The command of the mate is the command of the master, and a pilot is only a quasi master, the captain being still regarded as virtually in command. So far as concerns the intention with which the prisoner acted, a certain intent must be presumed from certain actions, and, whether that intent is absurd or not, it must be presumed that parties have weighed the probabilities of success before they act.

RANDALL, District Judge (charging jury). The crime of revolt is punished under the act of congress of 3d March, 1835, and by that act the courts are empowered to give a judicial definition of the crime. I shall give this definition, dispose of the legal points made, and leave the jury to determine whether the evidence for the prosecution does not meet the requirements of the law. A revolt is the overthrowing the legitimate authority of the commander, with intent to remove him from the command, or, against his will, to take possession of the vessel by assuming the command and navigation of her. U. S. v. Kelly, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 418. It is an open rebellion or mutiny of the crew against the authority of the master, in the command, navigation, or control of the ship. U. S. v. Haines [Case No. 15,275]. But a mere disobedience of orders by one or two of the seamen, without combining with the others to produce a deliberate disobedience, although it is highly censurable, and may be punished by the master on board the ship, or by forfeiture of wages,—is not a revolt; nor does mere offensive or insolent language constitute this crime. Wherever, by the overt acts of the crew, the authority of the master in the free navigation or management of the ship, or in the free exercise of his rights and duties on board, is entirely overthrown, and there is intentionally caused by such acts an actual or constructive suspension of his command, it is a revolt. Direct or positive force upon, or constraint or imprisonment of the master, is not essential. A positive refusal to perform any duty on board until he has yielded to some illegal demand of the crew, when it has produced a suspension of his power of command, or when, by a general combination, the crew refuse obedience to the lawful orders of the master, is a revolt. U. S. v. Haines [supra]. There may be a revolt without the appointment of another to the command. If the crew should compel the master, against his will, to navigate the ship or manage her concerns according to their directions, and prevent him from the free exercise of his own judgment, that would be an usurpation or the command and a revolt. U. S. v. Haines [supra]. The pilot is an officer of the ship when on board to pilot the vessel to or from the sea, and the crew are bound to obey his orders as such; but when the captain is on board he is master of the vessel, and the orders of the pilot are, in law, considered as the master's. U. S. v. Lynch [Case No. 15,648]. The artificial, voluntarily contracted, and temporary madness produced by drunkenness is rather an aggravation of than an apology for a crime committed during that state. A drunkard is a voluntary demon, and his intoxication gives him no privilege. If, however, an habitual or fixed frenzy is produced by this practice, though such madness is contracted by the vice and will of the party, it places the man in the same condition as if it were contracted, at first, involuntarily. The wisdom of the law in refusing to recognise drunkenness as an excuse for crime is plain; nothing is more easily counterfeited, no state so irregular in its operation. With these instructions on the law involved, the case is committed to the jury.

A verdict of guilty was rendered, and Forbes was sentenced to six years' imprisonment, a fine of five dollars and the costs, and to stand committed until the sentence was complied with.

Case No. 15,130.

UNITED STATES v. FORDYCE et al.

[13 Int. Rev. Rec. 77.]

District Court, N. D. Alabama. March 11, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE—PRODUCTION OF BOOKS AND PAPERS—AUTHORITY OF SUPERVISOR —CONTEMPT.

[1. A supervisor of internal revenue entered the house of a banking firm in Huntsville, Ala., and demanded to see their books and papers. The members of the firm, doubting his right to such inspection, asked time to first consult counsel. This was refused, and, on their failure to at once produce their books, the supervisor served them with a summons requiring them to appear before him at his "office at Huntsville" instanter on the same day. He had no regular office in that city, and no place was specified in the summons. The firm then consulted their counsel, who, though somewhat in doubt, advised them to permit the inspection. They then sought the supervisor to apprise him of their consent, but were unable to find him, and he left the town on the same night. Held, that the firm were not unreasonable in asking a short time to consult attorneys, that a compliance with the summons according to its terms was manifestly impossible, that the supervisor acted with undue haste, and that the members of the firm were not punishable as for a contempt for what they had done.]

BUSTEED, District Judge. The application made to me in this matter is that the respondents be punished as for a contempt for the alleged disobedience of a summons issued to them by Nathan D. Stanwood, supervisor of internal revenue for the state of Alabama, requiring them to produce books and papers, and to give evidence according to its exigence. The proceeding is based upon section 49 of the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 144], and section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 101].

It is contended, among other things, by the counsel for the respondents, that these acts, so far as they authorize a compulsory production of books and papers, and a compulsory examination of a party, are a violation of the fourth and sixth amendments to the constitution of the United States. It is also contended that a true construction of the law of July 20, 1868, limits the power of supervisors to inquiries touching the conduct of assistant assessors and other subordinate officers of the revenue. In disposing of the present application I do not find it necessary to examine or decide either of these points, and hence express no opinion upon them.

The facts in the case are these: On the 5th day of March, A. D. 1870, the relator entered the banking house of the respondents at Huntsville, and asked to see the charter under which they did business. He was told they had no charter of incorporation. He then demanded to see their books and papers. The respondents refused to allow him, stating it was not their habit to exhibit their business or its evidences to straners. Thereupon Stanwood disclosed his official character, and the respondents requested time to consult their legal advisers on the subject of his right, and that, if he were authorized by law to make the demand, they would at once exhibit to him their books of account and other papers. Stanwood, for answer, read from a book what he claimed was the law of the case, and said it was not necessary the respondents should consult their attorneys; that he knew more revenue law than all the lawyers in Huntsville. The respondents, nevertheless, insisted. The supervisor, in a few minutes afterwards, served the respondents with a summons requiring them to appear before him at his "office at Huntsville," on the 5th day of March, 1870, instanter, of the same day, then and there to produce all books of account and papers, containing entire details of business between the bank of Fordyce & Rison and all other persons, from the time of commencing business to the present time, March 5, 1870, and to give evidence, according to their knowledge, respecting the liability of themselves or others to an excise duty or tax under the internal revenue laws of the United States. This was at 20 minutes after 9 o'clock in the morning. The respondents immediately sought their attorneys. During the consultation, and an hour and a half after the service of the first, a second summons of the same tenor as the first was served. The only difference that I can discover between the two is that, while in the first there is no place within the city of Huntsville named as the office of the supervisor, and to which the books and papers of the bank were directed to be brought on the instant, the second summons supplies the deficiency and names room No. 10, in the Huntsville Hotel, as the supervisor's office. It is worthy of remark, as bearing on the legal rights of the respondents upon this hearing, that the supervisor himself relies upon the summons first served in support of the respondents' liability. He annexes a copy of it to his application to me for the warrant of attachment against them.

It is in proof that no less distinguished counselors of this court than L. Pope and Richard Walker, Esqs., examined the question of the supervisor's right to require the respondents to obey his summons, and while both expressed themselves in doubt, they yet advised their clients to yield the point. This was at 4 o'clock p. m. on the 5th of March. The respondents thereupon went to the room of the supervisor in the hotel to offer their compliance. Stanwood was not in. They then went to the office of the collector of internal revenue to see if the supervisor might be there. Neither official was there, but the respondents saw a deputy of the collector, and informed him they had come to give Stanwood their books and papers or invite him to their office to examine them at the banking house. Subsequent inquiry developed the fact that Stanwood left Huntsville on the night of the same day. It is now sought to punish the respondents for their conduct in the premises, and the power of this court is invoked for that purpose.

It is the clear duty of the citizen to obey the laws of his country. There can be no cavil here. It is presumed, also, that every man knows the law. It must be borne in mind, however, that laws are made for the safety of the citizen as well as for the security of the state, and that the right of the subject to have the assistance of counsel in all matters touching his well-being is founded upon the plainest principles of propriety and the manifest dictates of necessity. The demand of the respondents to confer with their lawyers before they complied with the requirements of the supervisor was a reasonable one, and the opportunity should have been given. They were not obliged to accept Mr. Stanwood's estimate of his own legal ability, or his construction of the statute, and their readiness in following the advice of the Messrs. Walker, while it was yet uncertain whether the supervisor had the right which he claimed, shows an excellent spirit, and entitles them to the commendation of the court. Upon the face of the summons the respondents would have been authorized to disregard it. It requires them to produce all the books and papers of a large banking house, without saying where they are to be brought. It requires this to be done on the instant. This was impossible of performance, and "lex non cogit ad impossibilia." If it had been possible, the requirement was oppressive. It requires the respondents themselves to be at a place not named, on the throb of time next after the moment of the service of the summons. This was impossible of performance, and "lex non cogit ad impossibilia." If this were possible, this requirement also was oppressive. It requires them to produce all their books and papers from the time of their commencing business to the 5th day of March, 1870. This may or may not have been authorized, accordingly as the respondents had been doing business for a longer or shorter antecedent period. The revenue laws have nothing to do with what was the "annual income" of the respondents before the laws imposing an income tax were passed. It did not officially concern the supervisor to know whether the business of Fordyce & Rison prior to the date of these congressional enactments represented "articles or objects charged with a special duty or tax." That in what the supervisor did he was actuated by an honest zeal I have no doubt, but his proceedings are marked throughout with irregularity and haste. By the 49th section of the act of July 20, 1868, he may proceed in the matter of the "annual returns," required to be furnished to the assistant assessor, as those officers themselves may proceed, and what they are authorized to do in relation to delinquents is plainly set out in the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866. The section is free from the least ambiguity, and the supervisor, if he undertakes to perform service under the act, must proceed in manner and form precisely as the assistant assessor is required to proceed, and in no other manner or form.

This matter appears to have given rise to considerable feeling. There should have been no pretext for this. The nonofficial must aid, not embarrass, the servants of the law; and the government official must challenge the consent of the citizen by consideration and courtesy, rather than provoke his opposition by incivility and harshness. Suavity of manners is something more than a personal accomplishment. It is an individual duty. The defendants are not in contempt, and are therefore discharged.

Case No. 15,131.

UNITED STATES v. FORREST.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 56.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec., 1826.

INDICTMENT—EMBEZZLEMENT—CERTAINTY—CHARGING IN WORDS OF STATUTE—CHECK—DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

1. An indictment under the sixteenth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 118], "more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and for other purposes," must state that the defendant was employed in the bank, or an office of discount and deposit, &c., in some state or territory of the United States.

2. The certainty required in an indictment is certainty to a certain intent; certainty to a common intent is not sufficient. Nothing material can be taken by intendment. From the averment, that the defendant was a bookkeeper in the office of discount and deposit, the court, upon demurrer to the indictment, cannot infer that he was a clerk or servant employed in such office.

3. A count upon the same section, for embezzlement, must aver that the thing embezzled came to his hands, or possession, by virtue of his employment. It is not sufficient to state that it came to his hands "as bookkeeper," or "in virtue of his office as bookkeeper," or "while he acted as bookkeeper." It must appear that he had authority from the bank to have it in his custody or possession, at the time of embezzlement.

4. It is not necessary that the thing embezzled should be the property of the Bank of the United States; nor is it necessary to aver it to be the property of any particular person; but it must be averred to have been fraudulently embezzled. "Feloniously" will not supply the place of "fraudulently." The offence must be charged in the words of the act.

[Cited in Holt v. State, 86 Ala. 599, 5 South. 794.]

5. A check is not, by name, made the subject of embezzlement; and quære whether, if it be a paid or cancelled check, it can be included in the description, "other valuable security or effects."

6. Quære, whether the District of Columbia was a territory within the meaning of the act.

Indictment under the sixteenth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825, c. 65 (Pamph. p. 65; 4 Stat. 118), "more effectually to provide for the punishment of certain crimes, against the United States, and for other purposes," for embezzling a check for $135.

The sixteenth section is as follows: "That if any person, who shall be employed as president, cashier, clerk, or servant, in the Bank of the United States, created and established by an act entitled," &c., passed on the 10th day of April, 1816, or in any office of discount and deposit established by the directors of the said bank in any state or territory of the United States, shall feloniously steal, take, and carry away any money, goods, bond. bill, bank-note, or other note, check, draft, treasury-note, or other valuable security or effects belonging to the said bank, or deposited in said bank, "or if any person, so employed as president, cashier, clerk, or servant, shall fraudulently embezzle, secrete, or make way with any money, goods, bond, bill, bank-note, or other note, draft, treasury-note, or other valuable security or effects, which he shall have received, or which shall come to his possession or custody, by virtue of such employment; every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall, on conviction thereof, be punished by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor not exceeding ten years, according to the aggravation of the offence."

The indictment contained fifteen counts, to which there was a general demurrer. The attorney for United States (Mr. Swann) abandoned the counts numbered 1, 3, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15. The second count charges that the defendant, [Charles W. Forrest,] "on the 7th of April, 1825, (he the said Charles being then a bookkeeper in the said office of discount and deposit,) with force and arms at the county aforesaid, feloniously did embezzle and make way with the sum of $135 of the money of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, which came to the hands of him the said Charles, in the office of discount and deposit aforesaid, and while he acted as bookkeeper aforesaid, against the form and effect of the statute in that case made and provided," &c. The fourth count charges "that the said Charles, on the 7th day of April, 1825, he being then a bookkeeper in the said office of discount and deposit, with force and arms at the county aforesaid, and in the office aforesaid, did fraudulently and feloniously secrete a certain check of one George McDaniel, upon said office of discount and deposit, for the sum of $135, which had been paid by the said office, and had become the property of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States; and had come to the hands and possession of the said Charles in virtue of his said office as bookkeeper aforesaid, against the form of the statute," &c. The fifth count charges "that the said Charles, on the 4th of May, 1825, he then being a bookkeeper in the said office of discount and deposit, with force and arms at the county aforesaid, did feloniously embezzle and make way with the sum of $100 of the money of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, which came to the hands and possession of him the said Charles in the office of discount and deposit, while he acted as bookkeeper as aforesaid, and in virtue of his office aforesaid, against the form of the statute," &c. The sixth count charges "that on the 3d of October, 1825, he being then a bookkeeper in the said office of discount and deposit, with force and arms at the county aforesaid, and in the office aforesaid, did feloniously embezzle and make way with the sum of $250 of the money of the president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, which came to his hands and possession in the office of discount and deposit, while he acted as bookkeeper as aforesaid, and in virtue of his office aforesaid, against the form of the statute," &c. The seventh count charges "that he, being a bookkeeper," &c., did "fraudulently and feloniously secrete a certain check for $100, drawn by Lewis Edwards upon the said office, which said check had become the property of the said president, directors, and company of the Bank of the United States, and had come to the hands and possession of the said Charles as bookkeeper aforesaid, against the form of the statute," &c. The eighth count charges "that on the 3d of October, 1825, he being then a bookkeeper in the said office of discount and deposit, with force and arms at the county aforesaid, did fraudulently and feloniously secrete a certain check for $250, drawn by one Lewis Edwards on the said office of discount and deposit, and which said check had been paid by the said office, and had become the property of the said Bank of the United States, and had come into the hands and possession of the said Charles as bookkeeper aforesaid, against the form of the statute," &c.

Jones & Key, for defendant, objected to the second count, that it does not charge that the defendant fraudulently embezzled the money, nor that he was employed by the bank, nor that he received the money by virtue of such employment, nor that he was "president, cashier, clerk, or servant" of the bank, nor that the money was the property of the bank. To the fourth count, that it states that the check had been paid by the bank, and was, therefore, not a valuable security. That it does not state that the defendant had been employed by the bank, nor that he had received the check by virtue of such employment, &c. That it does not specify the date of the check. They took the like exceptions to the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth counts, and cited 2 Hawk. P. C. bk 2, c. 25, §§ 71, 110; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 936, 980, 986; Rex v. McGregor, 3 Bos. & P. 106.

Swann & Lear, contra, cited 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 168, 173, in the notes; 2 Hawk. P. C. 320; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 979, 985, 1185.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. The persons liable to be prosecuted under the sixteenth section of the act of congress of March 3, 1825, c. 65 (4 Stat. 118), are persons employed as president, cashier, clerk, or servant, in the Bank of the United States, or in any office of discount and deposit established by the directors of the said bank in any state or territory of the United States. The offences under that section are: (1) Feloniously to steal, take, and carry away any money, goods, bond, bill, bank-note, or other note, check, draft, treasury note, or other valuable security or effects belonging to the said bank, or deposited therein; (2) fraudulently to embezzle, secrete, or make way with any money, goods, &c., (as above stated, but omitting the word "check,") "which he shall have received, or which shall come to his possession or custody, by virtue of such employment." None of the counts states that the defendant was employed either as president, cashier, clerk, or servant in the Bank of the United States, or in any of its offices of discount and deposit. The averment in each of them is, "being then a bookkeeper in the said office of discount and deposit." The word "employed" is not in any one of the counts. It is a very important word in the sixteenth section of the act; for it is the only word which connects the person with the bank as its officer, and designates his appointment and trust. A person may be a bookkeeper in an office of discount and deposit, and yet not be an officer appointed by the bank or by the office. The intention of this section of the act is clearly to punish frauds in the officers of the bank duly appointed and employed by the bank. Perhaps it might be sufficiently certain to a common intent to say that a bookkeeper, in an office of discount and deposit, means a clerk or servant employed in an office of discount and deposit. But certainty to a common intent is not sufficient in an indictment. It must be certainty to a certain intent. Rutland's Case, 8 Coke, 57a; Co. Litt. 303a; Long's Case, 5 Coke, 21a; Colthirst v. Bejushin, Plow. 26-35; Rex v. Stevens, 5 East, 257; Rex v. Mayor, etc., of Lyme Regis, 1 Doug. 158; 1 Chit. Pl. 235, 240; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 60; Rex v. Airey, 2 East, 33-35; Com Dig. "Pleader," C, 24; 1 Chit. Pl. 255, 308, 513, 514, 516-518. Every thing material must be positively alleged. Nothing material can be taken by intendment. Non constat by the indictment that a bookkeeper "in" an office of discount and deposit is a clerk or servant employed in such office. None of the counts avers that the things secreted or embezzled came to his hands or possession by virtue of his employment. Here the word employment means his authority from the bank. The thing embezzled must have come to his possession or custody by virtue of his authority from the bank, or he cannot be convicted under this statute. To say that it came to his hands while he acted as bookkeeper, as in the second and fifth counts, without showing that he so acted under an employment by the bank; or to say that it came to his hands in virtue of his office as bookkeeper, as in the fourth and sixth counts; or that it came to his hands as bookkeeper, as in the seventh and eighth counts, without showing that he was employed by the bank, that is, was authorized by the bank to act as bookkeeper, is not a sufficient allegation that it came "to his possession or custody by virtue of such employment." For these reasons we are of opinion that all the counts are bad.

There is another objection which goes to the whole indictment; but as we think the others sufficient and this doubtful, we shall give no opinion upon it. We mean the objection, that the office of discount and deposit at Washington is not established in any state or territory of the United States.

There are other objections also to particular counts. As to those which charge the defendant with embezzlement of money, it is objected that the money is not averred to be the property of the Bank of the United States; and although it is not necessary to constitute the offence of embezzlement under the second branch of the sixteenth section, that the things embezzled should be the property of the Bank of the United States, yet it is said that it must be averred to be the property of some person. This objection we do not think sufficient.

It is also objected that those counts do not aver that the defendant fraudulently embezzled, &c. This objection we take to be good; for it is a part of the description of the offence that it should be done fraudulently; and no allegation that it was done feloniously can supply the place of the word fraudulently; for it was not feloniously unless it were fraudulently done. 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, § 110. This objection applies to the second, fifth, and sixth counts.

To the fourth, seventh, and eighth counts, it is objected that it is not averred, that the check was a valuable security, or a draft; and a check, as such, is not within the words of the section upon which this indictment purports to be framed. A check, ex vi termini, is not, ex necessitate, a draft or a valuable security, especially after it has been paid by the party on whom it was drawn, and cancelled The offence must be charged in the words of the act. I think this also a valid objection. The majority of the judges, however, upon this last point, are of a different opinion.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, argued against the opinion of the court, upon the other points also, but concluded that he would not dissent.

Judgment for the defendant on the demurrer.

Case No. 15,132.

UNITED STATES v. The FORRESTER.

[Newb. 81.] [1]

District Court, D. Michigan. 1856.

SHIPPING—NAVIGATION LAWS—REGISTER—LICENSE—CHANGE OF OWNERSHIP—CUSTOM—IMPORTS.

1. A distinction exists, in the navigation laws of the United States, between registered vessels and vessels enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, as regards penalties imposed.

2. On the transfer of a registered vessel to a citizen of the United States she must be registered anew, or she loses her privileges as an American vessel; but a different penalty is imposed by the enrolling act for a neglect to renew a license granted by virtue of that act.

3. Where a vessel has been enrolled and licensed, and prior to the expiration of the time limited by the license is sold to a citizen of the United States, and continues running without a renewal of her license, she becomes liable to port fees and tonnage in every port at which she may arrive, the same as vessels not belonging to the United States; but the vessel does not thereby become denationalized.

[Cited in The Gala Plaid, Case No. 5,183.]

4. The existence of a custom under which purchasers of vessels previously enrolled and licensed have awaited the expiration of the time limited in the license before obtaining a renewal of the same, would not relieve such vessels from liability to the penalty provided by the enrolling act.

5. Custom will not modify an act of congress.

6. The laws of the United States in relation to commerce and revenue use the word "import" in its commercial sense.

7. The importation of merchandise into the United States implies bringing the goods and productions of other countries into the United States from a foreign jurisdiction.

This was a libel of information filed on behalf of the United States, claiming a condemnation and forfeiture of the steamboat Forrester, her tackle, apparel and furniture, to the government for an alleged violation of the revenue laws. The Forrester had been duly enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, while she was owned by E. B. Ward, a citizen of the United States. A short time after her license had been obtained she was sold by Ward to one Clement, who was also a citizen of the United States. Clement neglected to renew the steamer's license, for the reason, as it would appear, that a custom prevailed on the Western lakes and rivers of allowing vessels once enrolled and licensed to run until the expiration of their license, without regard to any change of ownership that might occur during the life of the license. It was claimed on the part of the government, that by the neglect of the purchaser to renew the vessel's enrollment and license, she ceased to be a vessel of the United States. The Forrester was engaged in the carrying of passengers and freight between Lexington and Detroit, in the state of Michigan, stopping on her trips at various ports in Canada, as well as in Michigan. On one of her trips from Lexington to Detroit, she took on board, at ports in Michigan, a quantity of shingles, wool and fish of the value of more than four hundred dollars, and carried the same to Detroit, where they were landed without a permit from the custom-house officers. On her voyage she touched, as usual, at Canadian landings, having the articles in question on board. It was insisted on behalf of the government, that this was an importation of merchandise into the United States from a foreign country, and that, as the Forrester had lost her American character by failure to obtain new license, after sale, such importation worked a forfeiture of the vessel to the government of the United States, under the provisions of the act of congress of 1817 [3 Stat. 351].

George E. Hand, U. S. Dist. Atty.

(1) By the neglect to renew the registry of the Forrester, after sale, she ceased to be a vessel of the United States. Act 1792, § 14 (1 Stat. 294). See this doctrine fully illustrated in U. S. v. Willings, 2 Pet. Cond. R. 20, 23. True, this act speaks of registered vessels, but vessels enrolled and licensed under act of 1831 (Gord. Dig. 773; 4 Stat. 487, § 3) are liable to the rules and regulations and penalties relating to registered vessels, and such is the construction held by the treasury department. As to what constitutes a United States vessel, see Act 1792, § 1 (1 Stat. 287, 288; Gord. Dig. 713, § 2478). No other vessels are qualified for the coasting trade or fisheries. Act 1792, § 4 (Gord. Dig.

[1] [Reported by John S. Newberry, Esq.]

715, § 2484; 1 Stat. 289), shows what is necessary to obtain a registry; and like qualifications and requisites are necessary for the enrollment as for the registry of vessels. See Act 1793, § 2 (1 Stat. 305; Gord. Dig. 771, § 2678). The Forrester having thus lost her American character by failure to obtain new license after her sale to Clement, and not being a vessel of any other country, by the act of importation of goods into the United States from Canada, a foreign province, became forfeited to the United States by Act 1817, §§ 1, 2 (3 Stat. 351; Gord. Dig. 713, §§ 2475, 2476).

(2) Was there an importation of goods by the Forrester? She came from a Canadian port into Detroit with goods on board. It may be said that there is evidence, on behalf of the claimant, that the goods in question were all shipped from American ports. If that were so, it would not save the forfeiture of the vessel. The goods were imported from Canada into the United States by the Forrester, she not being a vessel of the United States at the time. A voluntary bringing from a foreign country is an importation. The Boston [Case No. 1,670]; 3 Pet. Cond. R. 299; U. S. v. Lyman [Case No. 15,647; Dunl. Adm. Prac. 245. The act of congress of 1848 (9 Stat. 232; Gord. Dig. 770) evidently contemplates that every bringing of goods from a foreign place is an importation, and contains important provisions based on that assumption, as, for example, that foreign goods, on which duties have once been paid, should not, if shipped at an American port in a vessel that touched at a foreign port, thereby again be made to pay duty. If the goods were brought from Canada into the United States it is quite immaterial how the goods came to be in Canada. In whatever way they came to be there, they are, nevertheless, goods imported into the United States from a foreign place, not in a vessel of the United States or of Great Britain, within the act of 1817. The statute makes no distinction in favor of goods of American growth or origin. Whenever a distinction between goods of domestic and foreign production was intended, it is expressed in the statutes. Thus, in Act 1793, § 6 (1 Stat. 307), a vessel offending having domestic goods or products on board, is exposed to tonnage duties, but if the goods are of foreign growth or production the vessel is forfeited. Act 1831, § 3 (4 Stat. 487), uses the disjunctive or, and authorizes a vessel, under the same papers, to be employed, "either in the coasting or foreign trade," but does not authorize a vessel to be engaged in both trades at the same time; and trips made under that act to and from American and Canadian ports, are strictly foreign voyages, and must be conducted as such; and goods taken from an American to a Canadian port, and thence returned to an American port, must be treated the same as goods taken from New York to Liverpool and thence back to New York. The act of May 27, 1848 [9 Stat. 232], for the first time permitted the same vessel to be engaged, at the same time, in coasting and foreign trade, and that only on compliance with the proviso in the first section of the act. And this act treats every vessel that has "touched" at a foreign port as coming from a foreign voyage, for she must conform to the laws touching manifests of cargo and passengers, "and all other laws regulating the report and entry of vessels from foreign ports, and be subject to all the penalties therein prescribed." And in case a vessel does not comply with the terms of the proviso to section 1, she enjoys no privilege under this statute. The second section of this act provides that all vessels and their cargoes engaged in the trade referred to in the act, "shall become subject to existing collection and revenue laws, on arrival at any port in the United States." Such an arrival is clearly treated as an arrival from a foreign port, and "the collection and revenue laws" referred to, are none other than the existing collection and revenue laws pertaining to foreign trade; and it is to save certain classes of goods from the operation of "existing collection and revenue laws," to which they are made subject by the first clause of said second section, that the proviso thereto is introduced, saving those from import duties, to which, without such proviso, the "existing collection and revenue laws" would have subjected them. The "touching at foreign ports," alluded to in this act, is evidently intended as equivalent to entering a foreign port for the purpose of landing, and taking in thereat, merchandise, passengers, &c., which is making port for all commercial purposes, as fully as though such port was the only port of destination; and the arrival of a vessel from a foreign port so "touched at," is treated by this statute throughout as an arrival from a foreign country, and the cargo brought in such vessel is treated as imported from a foreign country and made subject (except when saved by the proviso to the second section) to the collection and revenue laws applicable to cargoes imported from foreign countries. The fact that the Forrester made certain Canadian ports, for all commercial purposes mentioned in the statutes, must, upon her departure thence and arrival in a port of the United States, bring her cargo within the statute definition of "imported"; and this, more especially when she came from a foreign, to a port of the United States, without the privileges conferred by the act of 1848.

(3) The bringing into the United States, by a vessel, from a foreign port, goods of the value of $400, and landing the same without a permit, is a distinct cause of forfeiture from the last, whether the importation be in American or foreign vessels, and whether the goods be dutiable or free. See Act 1799, § 50 (1 Stat. 665). The language of this statute is very explicit. The bringing from a foreign place and landing without permit, covers the whole ground.

John S. Newberry, for claimant.

(1) Act 1792, § 14, cited for the government, refers to registered vessels, and so far as this statute is concerned, it is sufficient to say that the Forrester never was a "registered" vessel. She is an "enrolled and licensed" vessel; and there is a broad distinction running through the laws in relation to the two classes of vessels. Assuming that the Forrester was subject to the act in relation to "registered" vessels, the district attorney, in support of his proposition, that a new registry must be obtained, at the time of the vessel's transfer, cites the case of U. S. v. Willing, 2 Pet. Cond. R. 20. This case, however, only decides that a new registry shall be taken out "within a reasonable time," and the facts of each case must decide what is the "reasonable time," and we insist, in behalf of the Forrester, from the evidence in the case, that her new papers were taken out within a reasonable time after the transfer. In order to connect "enrolled and licensed vessels," with the act of 1792, the act of 1831 (4 Stat. 487), is cited. This act provides that a vessel enrolled and licensed on our northern frontier, "shall be liable to the rules, regulations and penalties, now in force, in relation to 'registered vessels,' on our northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers." Now, we ask, what are the regulations in force on the frontiers described in relation to registered vessels? There are none. See Conk. Prac. (Ed. 1842) 329. On page 230 of the same book, two instances are cited to show that "enrolled" vessels, and "registered" vessels are not subject to the same provisions. There being no laws in force as to registered vessels on our northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers, except certain general laws which are of no importance in this case, we must look to other sources for the regulations in reference to enrolled and licensed vessels. The license itself shows under what laws the vessel is enrolled and licensed; they are the enrolling act of 1793, one passed in 1831, &c., &c. The Forrester was authorized to run under those acts, and in them are contained the regulations and penalties to which she is subject. In none of the acts referred to in the license, is there any provision that a transfer of a vessel, accompanied with an omission to take out new license, causes the vessel a forfeiture of her American character. There is a provision, however (section 5, Act of 1793), that by such transfer the license becomes void; and section 6 of the same act then provides that a vessel trading without license, becomes subject to port and tonnage duties, but this is the only penalty. Again, section 2 of enrolling act (1 Stat. 308) is cited on behalf of the government, which provides that vessels to be enrolled shall possess the same "qualifications and requisites" as are necessary for vessels to be registered. Now, this section does not enact that the licensed vessel shall be subject to all the "provisions" governing registered vessels. It simply refers to the qualifications, character, &c., of the vessel, prior to the enrollment; it has no reference to penalties, rules, &c., after enrollment.

(2) The Forrester is charged with "importing goods contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of 1817;" she is charged with "importing goods from a foreign country." It matters not what may have been the character of our vessel, unless we have been guilty of "importing goods," thereupon, "from a foreign country contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of 1817." We leave the meaning of that sentence to its usual, simple and commercial construction. We leave it for the court to decide, whether, under the facts of this case, there was an importation from a foreign country, in the true intent and meaning of the act of 1817, on board the Forrester, or not. She had the right to touch at foreign ports. 9 Stat. 232. This is conceded on behalf of the government; and it is also conceded that congress, in its legislation, has acted upon the supposition, that domestic goods might go into a foreign port, and be afterwards landed in American ports, without being liable to duty. Why, then, should we be condemned for acting under the same inference and supposition as congress itself? We contend: (1) That by no act on the part of the Forrester, has she lost her American character, or the privileges of an American vessel. (2) We have not been guilty of importing goods from a foreign country, contrary to the true intent and meaning of the act of 1817.

WILKINS, District Judge. This steamer was seized by the collector of the port of Detroit, for a violation of the revenue laws, on the 18th of October, 1854. The libel informs the court, that, at the time of the seizure, "she was not a vessel of the United States; nor a foreign vessel belonging to citizens of the country, from which the merchandise imported in her, at the time of seizure, were first shipped for transportation, or, of the growth, production or manufacture of that country." And also, "that her cargo, consisting of 10 barrels of fish, 128 bunches of shingles, and 25 bales of wool, being merchandise subject to duty, was brought and imported from a foreign place, viz. the province of Upper Canada, into the United States, at the port of Detroit." The answer of S. Clement, claimant, denies the allegations of this information, both as to the character of the vessel, and the importation charged, and sets forth that she was at the time, duly enrolled and licensed at the port of Detroit, and that the merchandise specified was not imported into the United States from a foreign place, but was shipped from ports and places within the United States.

It was in proof, on the trial of the issue thus made in the case, that the Forrester was built at Newport, in this state, by E. B.

Ward, in the month of June, 1854, and was by him enrolled and licensed for the coasting trade, on the 6th day of July following, "for one year from that date"; that on the 12th of July of the same year, only six days subsequent to her enrollment, Ward sold the Forrester to Clement, the conveyance being witnessed by the deputy collector of the port of Detroit, and placed on record in a book in the office, provided for that purpose, called volume A, on page 534; that Clement, the claimant of the Forrester, was at the time, and is still a citizen of the United States; that during the summer of 1854, the route of the Forrester, in navigating the rivers Detroit and St. Clair (a line through the middle of which streams constitutes the national boundary line between the Canadas and the United States), was from Port Huron, St. Clair county, to the port of Detroit; that in her trips she always touched at Port Sarnia and at Baby's Point, villages in the province of Canada, on the east bank of the St. Clair river, for the reception of passengers, baggage and whatever freight might offer; that on her downward trip from Port Huron on the 13th of October, 1854, the fish specified in the libel, was shipped from Port Huron, the wool from St. Clair, and the shingles from Lexington, all consigned to the port of Detroit, these ports being American ports, within the United States; that on the said downward trip, she stopped, as usual, for freight and passengers, at Ports Sarnia and Baby's Point, but took no freight in at either of those places, and that the fish, wool and shingles were not taken from the Forrester from the time they were shipped until they were landed at Detroit, but remained in the hold of the vessel, the steamer only remaining for a few minutes at the Sarnia and Baby wharves, and on the trip in question receiving no additional freight at those ports; that no other freight was landed at Detroit on the 13th of October, 1854, from the steamer, but the enumerated articles described in the libel; that no new license was taken out for the Forrester by Clement, the purchaser from Ward, nor had she been enrolled since the sale, but shortly after the vessel had been seized, Clement called at the customhouse and made application for a new license and enrollment, which was then refused.

With this demonstration in support of the answer, the government seeks the forfeiture of the goods and the vessel, on two grounds: (1) That the steamer forfeited her American character and lost her privileges as an American ship, in consequence of the neglect to enroll her anew after her sale to Captain Clement. (2) That her cargo, landed and seized at Detroit, was merchandise imported from the adjacent province of Canada. There is a very obvious distinction made in the law regulating the collection of the revenue of the United States, between registered vessels and vessels licensed and enrolled. The first class is governed by the act of December 31, 1792, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," and its provisions were designed to apply to vessels engaged in foreign commerce. The second class is governed by the act of the 18th of February, 1793, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," and the various subsequent statutory amendments, embracing only vessels in the coasting trade on the Atlantic, and on the northern, northeastern and northwestern frontier waters of the United States. Both statutes were enacted during the same session of congress; and both classes of vessels are restricted, by their respective certificates of registry, and their licenses of enrollment, to the species of navigation and trade described and defined in these documents respectively.

But it is contended that the second section of the enrolling act adopts the provisions and penalties of the registry law. In many respects the two statutes differ, and such enactment, on the very threshold of the statute, if so construed, would render much of the remaining thirty-two sections nugatory and unnecessary. For instance—by the sixteenth section of the registry law, the failure to report a sale to a foreigner works a forfeiture of the vessel; and by the thirty-second section of the enrolling act, the sale of a licensed vessel to a foreigner, whether reported or not, absolutely forfeits the vessel and her cargo. The provision is positive, "if any licensed ship or vessel shall be transferred to any person not a citizen of the United States, the vessel and her cargo shall be forfeited." Here the penalty is imposed on the forbidden act; while in the sixteenth section of the registry law the penalty attaches, not to the act of sale, but "on the neglect to make the same known" in the way indicated in the act. The same penalty is applied, but not under the same circumstances; the sale in the first being the penal misconduct, and the failure to report, the cause of forfeiture in the other. It is considered, therefore, that the provision of this second section of the enrolling act, is merely directory to the public functionary by and before whom the enrollment is to be made, as preliminary to the grant of the license. This is clearly inferable from the language employed. The section declares that "in order for the enrollment of any vessel, she shall possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites in all respects, shall be complied with, as are made necessary for registering ships by the registry law; and the same duties are imposed on all officers, with the same authority, in relation to enrollments, and the same proceedings shall be had in similar cases touching enrollments."

The same qualifications, the same requisites in all respects, and the same proceedings in similar cases, are directed to be observed; but which by no means embrace the penalties of the first act, as applicable to the cases of dereliction enumerated in the second. By the first law, on certain pre-requisites, a certificate of registry is to be given; and by the second, on the performance of similar acts, an enrollment is perfected, and a license obtained. But certainly it would be a forced construction so to interpret these words as to make the penalty prescribed on the omission, under the first statute to re-register, apply to the neglect to re-enroll and re-license. The fourteenth section of the registry law directs "that when any ship or vessel, which has been registered, shall be sold to a citizen of the United States, the said ship must be registered anew by her former name, otherwise she shall cease to be deemed a ship of the United States. And in every case, if she shall not be so registered anew, she shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel of the United States." And the sixth section of the enrolling act provides that "every ship found trading between different places in the same district, without enrollment or license as provided in the act, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port at which she may arrive, as vessels not belonging to citizens of the United States." Where a vessel has once been enrolled and licensed, and before the expiration of the time limited in the license, is sold to a citizen of the United States, and continues running without a renewal, she certainly occupies in relation to the law, the position indicated, of "a vessel trading without enrollment or license as provided in the act," and is amenable to the special penalty imposed, but to no greater. But "ceasing to be a vessel of the United States," and losing all the privileges of such, as a penalty, widely differs from being made liable to port fees and tonnage at every port she arrives at. In the one case, she loses her national character, and the protection which her certificate affords; in the other, she is made responsive to additional pecuniary obligations.

The object of both statutes, is the protection of the revenue against fraud, to encourage American enterprise, to preserve the rights of the citizen trader, to confine both classes of vessels to the restrictions imposed by their title papers, and to secure the collection of the public dues without confusion; notwithstanding the various transfers to which this species of property is ever subject during the season of navigation. In the commerce on the ocean with foreign nations, a voyage might continue for a year and more, before a return to the home port. In such cases, greater strictness was deemed essential, than in those of domestic trade on the coast, and on the lakes and rivers of the north, the northeast and northwestern frontier. When sold to a foreigner, the registered vessel, therefore, forfeited her national character, and when sold to a citizen, the same consequence ensued, unless the old registry was surrendered, and the vessel re-registered, according to her change of title. The intention is manifest. Why should a privilege solely conferred upon a citizen, be surreptitiously used with impunity by a foreigner? The same necessity did not exist in regard to the other class; it was not to be presumed that foreigners could successfully compete with citizens in the domestic trade, and the exigency did not demand the forfeiture by the American ship of her privileges of national character. So far, therefore, as the registry and enrolling statutes are applicable to the question of the penalties imposed by each, no embarrassment is felt in deciding, that the neglect to renew the license, does not denationalize the domestic vessel engaged in the navigation of our inland frontier waters. The question then arises, how far the subject is affected by the third section of the act of the 2d of March, 1831, which declares "that any vessel of the United States, navigating the waters on our northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers, shall be enrolled and licensed in such form as may be prescribed by the secretary of the treasury; which license shall authorize the vessel to be employed either in the coasting or foreign trade, and no certificate of registry shall be required for vessels so employed on said frontiers: Provided, that such vessel shall be in every other respect liable to the penalties now in force relating to registered vessels on our northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers."

Now, this proviso expressly embraces the penalties in force in 1831, relating to registered vessels navigating the northern, northeastern and northwestern frontiers. There is no escape from this conclusion. If then the penalty in question, namely, the forfeiture of national character and privilege, was applied at that time by any known provision of law, to licensed vessels; if this class was then, in that respect, synonymous with the former, this express language must control the court, whatever construction is given to the acts of 1792 and 1793. But, in vain it may be asked to what then existing penalties does the proviso refer? Not to the penalty prescribed in the old registry law; for that only applied to vessels engaged in foreign commerce. Not to any new penalty created since 1792, and prescribed to vessels registered for the inland trade. If so, where are they to be found? Professional research and judicial examination alike fail in their efforts to discover them. The difficulty can only be solved by that which seems (from taking the whole law into consideration), to have been the manifest intention of this act; and such clearly was, to enlarge in order to meet the growing wants of western commerce, the privileges of licensed vessels navigating the waters which form our northern, northeastern and northwestern national boundary, and enable them to engage in foreign and domestic commerce at one and the same time, under one set of papers, namely the enrollment and license, without the formality of a registry, and not exacting the restrictions, or enforcing the penalties imposed on registered vessels.

The case at bar exhibits the vessel which has been seized, as originally built and owned by a citizen of the United States, regularly enrolled by him, and having a license procured for the coasting trade covering one year from its date; and that, on the 13th of October, 1854 (a little better than two months after), she was seized for an infraction of the revenue laws, charged with the importation of foreign merchandise from a foreign port. Shortly after her enrollment by her owner, she was sold to the claimant, who was a citizen of the United States, of which sale the revenue officer was cognizant. Her purchaser neglected the renewal of her license, not deeming it necessary inasmuch as a custom prevailed, for purchasers of such vessels to await the close of navigation before any application for renewal. Under such circumstances, did this vessel lose her national character as a vessel of the United States? We think not. The registry penalty does not apply. But the penalty directed by the sixth section of the enrolling act, could with propriety have been enforced. The custom alluded to would constitute no defence. It was not a custom but a toleration, and as such was extended by the functionaries of the government to the owners of licensed vessels, but could not modify the law; nor would the time allowed be considered as the "reasonable time" comprehended by Chief Justice Marshall in the case of U. S. v. Willings [supra].

But, independent of this construction of the navigation acts, the libel must be dismissed, because the facts in proof do not amount to an importation within the true meaning and spirit of the act of March 1, 1817. That act specifies as an "importation" merchandise brought into the United States from any foreign port or place. The term used is "import" and legislation employed that term in its commercial sense, which is to "bring" from a foreign jurisdiction into this jurisdiction, merchandise not the product of the country. Its commercial meaning is directly contrary to the term "export." Both phrases have a technical meaning in the law. We "import," teas from China, wines from France. We "export" cotton, tobacco, pork and wheat. The one term signifies etymologically "to bring in," the other "to carry out." The act itself defines the word, viz. "brought into from any foreign port or place." It is in proof that the articles enumerated in the libel, "fish, wool and shingles," were shipped from American ports, within this district, and by respective bills of lading consigned to merchants in Detroit. When the goods were shipped they were stowed away and never removed until they reached their destination. Now, is the meaning of the word "import" to be changed under these circumstances, simply because the vessel freighted with these productions, and engaged in the navigation of the rivers St. Clair and Detroit, temporarily stopped on her downward voyage at Canadian ports for the purpose of receiving in the usual business of a steamer additional passengers and freight, or to take in fuel? Such would not be a fair, just and reasonable construction of the law, the chief intention of which is the imposition of duties, for the support of government, on foreign commerce. The literal signification of the words contained in the law does not admit of such an interpretation; it is contrary to the known policy of the navigation laws.

This libel must, therefore, be dismissed. But although there was no evidence to justify the condemnation of the vessel, yet the seizure was made under circumstances which warranted the suspicion of the officer, that the cargo discharged was imported from Port Sarnia in Canada. The captain called the merchandise "Port Sarnia stuff," and the vessel not having renewed her license under her new owner, and the doubt which existed as to her character, made it the duty of the officer to make the seizure. Libel dismissed, with certificate of probable cause.

UNITED STATES v. FORSYTHE.

[6 McLean, 584.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. July Term, 1855.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS—EMBEZZLEMENT—TREASURY TRANSCRIPT—REFUSAL TO PAY OVER—OFFER TO COMPROMISE.

1. To sustain an indictment under the sixteenth section of the subtreasury law, the proof must be clear that the defendant has violated some specific provision of the act.

2. A duly certified transcript from the treasury is made evidence and declared to be, prima facie evidence of embezzlement; but where the items of such evidence have been estimated and made up from hearsay, they are not admissible.

[Cited in U. S. v. Case, 49 Fed. 271.]

[Cited in U. S. v. Swan (N. M.) 34 Pac. 534.]

3. Where the expenditures of the collector's office are greater than its receipts, to convict, the evidence must show beyond a reasonable doubt, that he has used the money or refused to pay it over, in violation of the law.

[Cited in Goodrich v. Hooper, 97 Mass. 6.]

4. An offer to make a deposit of fourteen thousand dollars, to secure the government, for any balance that might be found against him, is nothing more than a proposed compromise, to avoid the prosecution, and cannot be received as evidence of indebtment to any specific amount.

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Spaulding & Backus, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant [James H. Forsythe] having been appointed collector of the customs for Port Miami, in the state of Ohio, gave bond and security, as the law requires, for the performance of his duty, dated 30th of September, 1848. He remained in office until the 11th of November, 1850, when he was removed, and his successor, Mr. Riley, was appointed. From the 31st of March, 1849, to the time of his removal, one year and seven months, he made no returns, and on this ground he was removed from office, and indicted under the sixteenth section of the subtreasury law. That section provides that if any one charged with the safe keeping of the public money and the disbursement thereof, shall convert to his own use, in any way whatever, or shall use, by way of investment in any kind of property or merchandise, or shall loan or exchange it for other funds, or deposit it in bank, or any failure to pay over or to produce the public moneys intrusted to such person, shall be held to be prima facie evidence of embezzlement, and he shall be sentenced to imprisonment, for a term not less than six months nor more than ten years, and to a fine equal to the amount of the money embezzled. And it is declared that a transcript from the books and proceedings of the treasury, shall be prima facie evidence of the balance in his hands. And it is further provided, that a refusal to pay any draft, order or warrant, whether in or out of office, of the treasurer, for any public money in his hands, shall be deemed as prima facie evidence of embezzlement.

A jury being sworn, it was proved that after his removal, being at Washington, the defendant proposed to deposit fourteen thousand dollars in the treasury to secure the payment of any amount of moneys which should be found in his hands. But the government officers refused to receive the money for the purpose proposed. From the returns entered upon the transcript, the government would appear to owe the defendant above twelve hundred dollars. A number of witnesses were examined who paid duties to the defendant, on imported merchandise from Canada. The transcript being offered in evidence was objected to, on the ground that the items were not set down from the returns of the defendant, but were returned by his successor, from talking with the persons who had paid duties into the office. The treasury transcript is made evidence when duly certified. There is no objection to the authentication of this document, but the items of which a considerable part of it is composed, though put into the transcript, are not evidence. They were not ascertained and established by the ordinary official action of the department, and consequently they are not evidence. Many of the items were put down by an estimate, and others had no better proof of their verity than hearsay, which is not admissible. The evidence of the payment of duties was not satisfactory, as it led to no certain result. The expenditure of the office was greater than its receipts, so that it does not appear that the money he had in his hands was greater than the sum he paid out. And the court instructed the jury, that as this was a criminal procedure, the proof must clearly show that he was guilty of appropriating money to his own use, or that he loaned it, or failed to pay it over when demanded. The transcript is no evidence for the reasons stated, nor does the parol evidence show, beyond reasonable doubt, that he has violated any specific provision of the act. The proposal by the defendant to deposit fourteen thousand dollars to secure the government in any amount that might be found due to it, was not an admission of any amount being due, but a proposal of compromise to avoid a criminal prosecution.

The prosecuting attorney has read the first section of the act of March 3, 1849 [9 Stat. 398], which declares that from and after the 30th day of June, 1849, the gross amount of all duties received from customs, from the sales of public lands, and from all miscellaneous sources, for the use of the United States, shall be paid by the officer or agent receiving the same, into the treasury of the United States at as early a day as practicable, without any abatement or deduction on account of salary, fees, costs, charges, expenses, or claim of any description whatever. This act was intended to take away all excuse from collectors to withhold payments into the treasury, under the pretense that they were responsible, as collectors, on various grounds, to individuals for services rendered, &c. This was the evil which the law was intended to remedy. And it was a regulation in civil cases and can have no direct application to the case before us. The law did not take effect, until three months after the default of the defendant is alleged to have commenced. Under the circumstances, it is not perceived how this act can have a serious or direct bearing in the case. It is not a paying office, and there is no evidence, that the defendant received any instructions upon the subject.

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. FORTY-SIX CASKS OF CALIFORNIA GRAPE BRANDY.

[5 Int. Rev. Rec. 161.]

District Court, D. California. 1867.

INTERNAL REVENUE—SEIZURE—TIME OF FORFEITURE—INT. REV. ACT JUNE 30, 1864.

Where brandy in casks is purchased from a distiller without having first been gauged and inspected as required by law, and is subsequently seized within the time prescribed by the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, § 68 [13 Stat. 248], and proceedings for its enforcement are commenced within the time required by section 68 of such act, the claimant takes nothing by his purchase, as the brandy at the time of the sale was forfeited to the United States.

[This was a proceeding for the forfeiture of 46 casks of California grape brandy (G. Sanguinnette, claimant), under the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864.]

DEADY, District Judge. Upon the facts proved in this case, the question of law arose as to whether the forfeiture denounced by section 68 of the internal revenue act of June 30, 1864, takes effect at the time the forfeiture occurs or not until the seizure is made. The claimant maintains the latter alternative, and rests his right to a return of the brandy on that ground. He is a purchaser between the commission of the cause of forfeiture and the seizure. That the goods were forfeited to the United States, or liable to be so forfeited, so far as the original owner and manufacturer is concerned, is not questioned by any one. They were by the manufacturer received from the distillery to the cellar where they were seized, without being gauged or inspected as required by law. The brandy was stored in this cellar, when purchased by the claimants, and at the time, the casks which contained the spirits bore no mark or evidence that the contents had been gauged or inspected. As to the manufacturer, the goods were also forfeited or liable to forfeiture, because such manufacturer refused or neglected to make true and exact entry of the spirits distilled by him during the time this brandy was his property. In the language of Judge Ballard in U. S. v. Fifty-Six Barrels of Whiskey [Case No. 15,095]: "The decisions are uniform both in England and the United States, that when a statute denounces a forfeiture of property as the penalty for the commission of crime, if the denunciation is in direct terms, and not in the alternative, the forfeiture takes place at the time the offense is committed, and operates as a statutory transfer of the right of property to the government." Numerous precedents are quoted in support of the statement. When the forfeiture is not denounced in the alternative, as of the goods or their value, the rule of construction is too well settled to admit of argument or controversy, that the forfeiture takes place at the time of the commission of the cause of forfeiture, and operates to transfer the property in the thing forfeited to the government so as to avoid all intermediate sales made between the commission of the act and the judicial sentence of condemnation. Indeed, the learned counsel for the claimant does not deny this doctrine, but seeks to avoid the effect or the application in this case, on the ground that the forfeiture is denounced in section 68, which reads as follows: "Provided that such seizure be made within 30 days after the cause for the same shall have come to the knowledge of the collector or deputy collector, and that proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall have been commenced by such collector within 20 days after the seizure thereof." The proviso does not prevent the forfeiture. It does not except the goods mentioned from the previous words of the section, which declare a direct and present forfeiture. It only operates, as the books say, to avoid the forfeiture by way of defeasance or excuse. In this case, by the terms of the proviso, such defeasance or discharge can only occur where it is shown that the seizure was not "made within thirty days after the cause for the same shall have come to the knowledge of the collector or deputy collector," and that legal proceedings were commenced thereon within the farther time limited for that purpose.

As it appears from the facts found in this case that the seizure and subsequent proceedings took place within the time prescribed by the proviso, it follows that the forfeiture which occurred prior to the purchase from the distiller by the claimant was never discharged or defeated, and that consequently the claimant took nothing by his purchase, the brandy being already the property of the United States. If, then, there was any question as to the true construction to be given to section 68, as qualified by the proviso thereto, it would be the duty of the court to reject the construction sought for by the claimant. Such a construction would put it in the power of every dishonest distiller to evade the payment of the taxes due upon his manufactures, by means of private sales to third persons. No seizure would be made, but a claimant would be found alleging that he was a purchaser in good faith; and whether he was or not, and most likely if he was not, he would come into court fortified with bills of sale and all the formal evidence of purchase and possession.

It would be impossible for the government to remove or penetrate the exterior seeming of legality and apparent honesty with which avarice and unscrupulousness would envelope and disguise the most deliberate and gross attempts to defraud the revenue, and, in the end, the law imposing a tax upon the distillation of spirits would become inoperative and of no effect.

At the time of the purchase the goods were the property of the United States. Judgment must be given accordingly, and against the claimant for the costs from the time of his intervention, and which were caused thereby.

Case No. 15,136.

UNITED STATES v. FORTY-THREE GALLONS OF WHISKY.

[19 Int. Rev. Rec. 158.]

District Court, D. Minnesota. May, 1874.[1]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—INDIAN TREATIES—RESTRICTIONS ON STATE SOVEREIGNTY.

[After a new state has been admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original states, the United States have no authority to abridge its sovereign powers over territory embraced within its limits, by making a treaty with an Indian tribe occupying the same, by the terms of which the acts of congress regulating trade and intercourse with the Indians and providing for the forfeiture of certain goods, stores, etc., of any Indian agent who is about to introduce spirituous liquors into the Indian country, are extended over the lands occupied by the tribe, to the exclusion of the state's jurisdiction.]

The United States has filed a libel of information against forty-three gallons of whisky, sundry peltries, and other goods and merchandise seized as forfeited by virtue of the twentieth section of the act of congress approved June 30, 1834 [4 Stat. 732], as amended by the act passed February 13, 1862 [12 Stat. 338], which, it is claimed, is now in force over the territory where this seizure was made. There are three special counts in the libel. The first, in substance, sets forth that on February 12, 1872, Bernard Lariviere, a white person of the village of Crookston, in the county of Polk, and state of Minnesota, did unlawfully carry and introduce into said village, which is located upon the territory ceded to the United States by treaty with the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Chippewa Indians, made and concluded October 3, 1863, the spirituous liquors particularly described, contrary to the treaty, and the act of congress above cited; that an Indian agent, duly appointed, having reason to suspect, and being informed that spirituous liquors had been introduced by said Lariviere into said county of Polk in violation of the act of congress, searched and caused to be searched, the goods, merchandise, peltries, etc., which he had in his possession at Crookston, in the ceded territory aforesaid; upon which search the whisky was found stored, packed and mingled with and in the packages, goods and peltries, and in the places of deposit of said Lariviere, and was so carried and introduced into the ceded territory, contrary to the form of the statute of the United States in such cases made and provided; and was seized and taken by the Indian agent as forfeited, together with all the goods and peltries, etc., so found. The second count sets forth that the whisky was introduced with the intent to sell, dispose of, and distribute the same to and among the bands and tribes of Chippewa Indians, under the charge of an Indian agent, who frequented the village of Crookston, and who lived upon the reservation near that place. The third count is abandoned. The information prays that the said goods, merchandise, peltries, etc., may be decreed and declared forfeited, and the forfeiture properly enforced. Lariviere and [Charles] Grant have filed claims to the property, and exceptions to the information, and demur thereto.

NELSON, District Judge. It is necessary, to a proper understanding of this controversy, to examine the act of congress admitting the state of Minnesota into the Union [11 Stat. 285], the twentieth section of the act of June 30, 1834 [4 Stat. 732], as amended in 1862 [12 Stat. 338], and the seventh article of the treaty of 1863 [Id. 1250], under which, it is claimed, this proceeding is properly instituted. The state of Minnesota was admitted into the Union May 11, 1858, and the locus in quo is within the boundaries prescribed by the act of congress authorizing a state government. The first section of the act declares: "That the state of Minnesota shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatever." There is no proviso or limitation in the act with reference to the jurisdiction of the state over any portion of the territory occupied by the Indian tribes within the boundaries prescribed by congress, and the constitution of the state nowhere intimates that this territory is withdrawn from its general jurisdiction.

If the jurisdiction of this court in this proceeding can be sustained, the fact being undisputed that the introduction of whisky was upon the ceded land, it must exist by virtue of the treaty made with the Chippewa bands of Indians in 1863. The seventh article is as follows: "The laws of the United States now in force, or that may hereafter be enacted, prohibiting the introduction and sale of spirituous liquors in the Indian country, shall be in full force and effect throughout the country hereby ceded, until otherwise directed by congress or the president of the United States." The law prohibiting the introduction of spirituous liquors contemplated by this treaty, is found in the second section of the trade and intercourse act of 1834, as amended February 13, 1862, viz.: "* * * And if any Indian agent * * * has reason to suspect, or is informed that any white person or Indian is about to introduce or has introduced any spirituous liquor * * * into the Indian country * * * it shall be lawful for such agent * * * to cause the boats, stores, packages, wagons, sleds, and places of deposit of such person to be searched, and if any liquor is found therein, the same, together with the teams, etc., conveying the same, and the goods, packages, and peltries of such person, shall be seized and delivered to the proper officer, and shall be proceeded against by libel in the proper court and forfeited," etc.

The only defence under the statute to the charge, is the introduction by order of the war department or some authorized officer. The county of Polk is a portion of the territory ceded by this treaty, and has been organized for many years, and all the civil officers recognized by the constitution and laws of the state of Minnesota are residing therein, and in the exercise of their full power and authority. The white settlements are increasing, and towns and villages are springing up with wonderful rapidity. Already a railroad authorized by the state and endowed by its bounty, traverses the entire county, and the village of Crookston, where this merchandise was seized, is one of the stations. The trade and traffic in that part of the state, although sparsely inhabitated, is quite large and the wants of a frontier settlement are supplied by the merchants living in the village.

The question, therefore, involved in this case, is one of no ordinary importance to the people of this state, and particularly the settlers in Polk county. The ultimate decision must depend upon the extent of the power of the federal government, through the executive and senate, to restrict by treaty stipulations with the Indian tribes in our midst, the political and sovereign rights of this state. Until the act of congress of 1871 (10 Stat. 566), the power of the government to make treaties with the Indian tribes residing within the limits of a state has never been questioned, and I will dismiss this part of the case by simply saying, that in my opinion, treaties with the tribes and bands of Indians in our state, by which cessions of wild and uncultivated but arable land are secured to civilization and settlement, were the fulfillment of implied obligations on the part of the United States to this state, when it was admitted into the Union on an equality with the original states. The authority to make treaties, and the subjects embraced therein, must have some limit. This power can not be exercised to override other parts of the federal constitution, or to overturn the fundamental principles of our government. True, the constitution of the United States declares a treaty to be the supreme law of the land, but it has no greater force or effect than a legislative enactment, and may even be annulled by a subsequent act of congress, provided the subject matter be within the legislative power of the latter. [Taylor v. Morton, Case No. 13,799.] It is conceded that treaties with the Indian tribes, although "domestic dependent nations," are of equal vitality with those with foreign nations, so far as the treaty making power acts within the constitutional limits. But it is important to understand, in this connection, that the rights of the Indians, the power of the federal constitution over them and over their property, and the stipulations in the various treaties with them, have never been recognized in the constitution of this state or the act of congress admitting it; so that at the time this treaty was concluded, the jurisdiction of the state over all the territory occupied by the Indians was undoubted, except so far as the regulation of commerce with them might give congress control.

It is claimed that the act of congress above referred to, with the assent of the state to the conditions imposed by the federal government, constitute a compact of guaranty, and limit the power of the United States to treat with the Indian tribes within the boundaries of the state, which would forbid insertion of a stipulation in a treaty, diminishing in any manner the sovereignty of the state without its consent. This treaty of 1863 ceded a large tract of land within the boundaries of the state of Minnesota and the territory of Dakota. So far as the seventh article attempts to interfere with the internal and domestic commerce of the state of Minnesota, or abridge the rights of its citizens, or withdraw its jurisdiction without its assent over the tract of land ceded, it is certainly an interference with the sovereignty of the state. The laws creating courts of justice for the protection of the liberty and property of its citizens would be thereby obstructed to the extent that the laws of the United States recognized by this treaty, may operate upon them. If the jurisdiction of the federal courts to enforce the penalties and forfeitures accruing under the law forbidding the introduction of spirituous liquor is once admitted, it necessarily excludes the jurisdiction of the state courts and all the police laws, and others recognizing the traffic in the interdicted article. It cannot admit of doubt that under such circumstances Minnesota would not stand "upon an equal footing with the original states." The federal government in the treaty with Great Britain, where the contract settled a disputed boundary question, would not undertake to divest any state of territory over which it claimed to exercise jurisdiction, without procuring the assent of the state, in advance, or making the validity of a particular stipulation conditional upon future favorable legislation by the state interested. See Ashburton Treaty, 8 Stat. 554; Lawr. Wheat. Int. Law, pp. 494, 876, and notes.

It has been urged by some writers that the acquisition of foreign territory under the treaty making power of the United States necessarily concedes that of alienating territory and abridging state sovereignty; but the correspondence of the commissioners and the final conclusion in the above treaty, would seem to deny the power to alienate without the consent of the state interested. The treaties cited by the United States attorney, all relate to the status of foreigners residing within the United States, or to their property. There can be no doubt about the power of the government by treaty to protect the persons and property of foreigners, and remove them from the operation of a particular law of a state, passed for the special purpose of reaching them. So in the case of tribes of Indians; their persons and property could have been protected by treaty stipulations, although within the limits of the state, any law of the state to the contrary. To make such stipulation is within the power of the government under the constitution, for upon congress is conferred the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and with the Indian tribes; and the general treaty-making power could properly contract with reference to these subjects. But to say that a barbarous semi-sovereign community under the protectorate of the United States, and within its geographical limits, can by treaty stipulate away any part of the sovereignty of a state guaranteed by the supreme federal government on its admission into the Union, is, in my opinion, inconsistent with the nature of our government.

I have arrived at the conclusion, therefore, that until the assent of the state of Minnesota is obtained, the seventh article of the treaty of 1863, is inoperative, to the extent of demanding a forfeiture of the spirituous liquor and other merchandise, for any acts charged to have been committed by the person named in the libel. The exceptions and demurrer are sustained, and the property must be restored. See U. S. v. Ward [Case No. 16,639]; U. S. v. Sa-Coo-Da-Cot [Id. 16,212]; U. S. v. Bailey [Id. 14,495]; Kansas Indians, 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 737.

Case No. 15,137.

UNITED STATES v. FOSSAT.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 211.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1857.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—"MORE OR LESS"—BOUNDARIES.

The genuineness of the grant in this case not disputed. The ruling in Estudillo's Case [Case No. 15,058], that the words "poco mas ó menos" are operative for such fractional parts of a league as may be in excess of the quantity named in the grant, re-affirmed. The southern boundary of the land granted to Justo Larios declared to be the main Sierra, and not the low hills or lomas bajas.

[This was a claim by Charles Fossat for one league of land in Santa Clara county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.]

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty.

A. P. Crittenden, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. At the hearing of this case, the court entertaining no doubt upon the points presented, expressed verbally its opinion. At the suggestion of the attorney for the claimants, I have committed to writing the substance of the views then expressed. The genuineness of the grant was not disputed. The only questions discussed were as to the extent and the boundaries of the tract granted. The land is described in the grant as known by the name of the Capitancillos, bounded by the Sierra, by the Arroyo Seco on the side of the establishment of Santa Clara, and by the rancho of citizen José R. Berreyesa, which has for a boundary a line running from the junction of the Arroyo Seco and Arroyo De Los Alamitos southward to the Sierra, passing by the eastern "falda" of the small hill situated in the center of the Cañada. The third condition states that the land herein referred to is one league de ganado mayor, a little more or less, as is explained by the map accompanying the expediente.

It had been urged to the court in previous cases, that where the conditions of a grant mentioned the tract referred to as of so many leagues "a little more or less," the latter words should be rejected for uncertainty, and the quantity of land should be limited to the number of leagues mentioned. But this construction the court had refused to adopt. It was considered that the inquiry in these as in other grants was as to the intention of the grantor, and that the court could not attribute to him an intention to grant so many leagues and no more, in the face of his declaration that he intended to grant the specified quantity, a "little more or less." It is not necessary now to recapitulate the various considerations upon which the court determined the question. It was of opinion that where the boundaries of the land granted were designated with reasonable certainty, the mention in the condition of a certain number of leagues, "more or less," as the quantity of land granted, should be considered as indicating an intention to grant the whole tract within the boundaries, provided the excess over and above the number of leagues mentioned was not so great as to indicate gross error or fraud; and that, as under the former government the ordinary unit of measurement was a league, the term "more or less" should at least be construed to embrace such fractional parts of a league as might be found within the boundaries, if no greater excess than some fraction of a league were found within them. It may deserve consideration whether such a mention of quantity should not be considered in all cases, except those of gross error or fraud, rather a conjectural estimate of the quantity previously granted than as a limitation of that quantity, and whether the grant should not be deemed, except in the cases referred to, a grant by metes and bounds, or by boundaries. It is enough, however, for the present to say that this court has decided that under the words "more or less" such fractional part of a league over and above the number of leagues mentioned will pass, as may be contained within the boundaries described in the grant. This point was not discussed at the hearing of this case, the district attorney being aware that it had already been passed upon by the court.

The questions more particularly debated were—1st, whether this court had any power by its decree to designate the boundaries of the tract confirmed to the claimant, or whether the language of the grant must be adopted, leaving the location of the boundaries and the identification of the natural objects called for to the surveyor general. Secondly, what were the boundaries called for.

As to the first point I entertain no doubt. The court is not, it is true, authorized by the act to designate the "extent, locality and boundaries" of the granted land. This, in the absence of a preliminary survey, would be impracticable; but the determination of the validity of a claim to a particular tract of land necessarily involves an inquiry, to a certain degree, into the boundaries or the extent of the tract, the validity of the title to which is in question. If the court decrees that the title of the claimant is valid to a piece of land, it should by its decree identify and designate that land, so that it may be known to what the claim is valid. But surely it is not only its right but its duty to construe by the aid of evidence and argument any ambiguity or uncertainty apparent on the face of the grant itself, and where the grant, as in this case, speaks of a "Sierra" as a boundary, to ascertain and declare what Sierra is meant, and to express in its decree that it confirms a claim to a tract bounded by a particular and specified Sierra, and not by such Sierra as the surveyor general may consider to have been intended. The supreme court, in many of the cases brought up on appeal from this court, have entered fully and freely into the question of boundaries, and appear to have considered their determination not only as within their jurisdiction, but as an appropriate and important part of their duties.

The remaining question to be considered is, what boundaries were intended by the grantor. The only one of those mentioned, the identity of which was debated, is the southern boundary mentioned in the grant as "the Sierra." The point to be determined is—what natural object was meant. The evidence shows that the tract called Capitancillos is a valley lying along an Arroyo or brook; on the southerly side extends a range of low hills, running from east to west. At their eastern extremity, where they are intersected by the Alamitos, these hills attain considerable elevation, but they decline in height towards the west, where they reach and are turned by the Arroyo Seco. Behind this ridge or Cuchilla the main Sierra or mountain chain raises itself to a great height, and is separated from the ridge of "lomas bajas," already spoken of, by the two streams mentioned. These streams rise at an inconsiderable distance from each other, and flowing in opposite directions between the Sierra and the lomas bajas, they turn the eastern and western extremities of the latter and debouch into the plain. Upon the slopes of the ridge of low hills, as well towards the valley on the north as towards the streams behind it on the south, the best or most permanent grazing is to be found, and on this ridge are situated the valuable quicksilver mines, the existence of which gives to this inquiry its chief importance.

The question is—Is the Sierra mentioned in the grant the mountain chain to the south of the lomas bajas, or is it the lomas bajas themselves? If there were no other means of determining this question, the word "Sierra" itself, by its necessary import as well as from the evidence which shows to which of these natural objects it was in fact applied, would leave little room for doubt. The natural and ordinary meaning of the term clearly points us to a great mountain chain, rather than to a ridge of low hills parallel to but separated from it. The evidence is conclusive that such was the meaning and use of the word with reference to these particular natural objects, and that while the mountain range was known as the "Sierra," the ridge of low hills was known as the "Cuchilla la Mina de Luis Chaboya," or as the "Lomas Bajas." The expediente furnishes more conclusive evidence on this point. The tract is described, as we have seen, as of one "league, a little more or less, as is explained by the map accompanying the expediente." On this map is found rudely delineated a mountain range, and this mountain range is inscribed "Sierra Del Encino," or "of the oak tree." The Sierra mentioned in the grant is therefore evidently the "Sierra Del Encino," for that is the only Sierra delineated on the map. The evidence discloses that there is on the main Sierra or mountain chain an oak tree of extraordinary proportions and striking appearance. Situated on a spur or ridge of the mountain, it is a conspicuous natural object from all parts of the valley and for many miles around. The photograph exhibited in court shows that its size and isolated situation are such as to strike the eye and arrest the attention of the most casual observer. Few who reside in that part of the country but are acquainted with the existence and situation of this tree, and it appears in the speech of many of the former inhabitants to have given a name to the Sierra on which it is situated. If then, as appears indisputable, the Sierra referred to in the grant be the "Sierra Del Encino," the Sierra on which this oak tree is situated must be the one.

A still further confirmation of these views is derived from the map accompanying the expediente of Berreyesa. The grant we are considering mentions as the eastern boundary of the tract granted, "the rancho of citizen José R. Berreyesa, which has for a boundary a line running from the junction of the Arroyo Seco and Arroyo De Los Alamitos southward to the Sierra," etc. This line thus dividing the two ranchos had previously been a subject of dispute between the colindantes or neighboring proprietors. It was finally settled, however, by the government before the grants were issued, and a dotted line, indicating the boundary agreed upon by the parties and fixed by the government, was made on the diseño of Berreyesa. This line is described in both grants in the same terms. That under consideration refers, as we have seen, to the rancho of Berreyesa as the boundary of the rancho of Justo Larios, and then describes the line as the boundary of Berreyesa's tract. The same inverted mode of description is used in the grant to Berreyesa. To determine what the boundary of Justo Larios' land is, we must, in literal compliance with the terms of the grant, ascertain the boundary of Berreyesa's land, and in ascertaining the latter we resort to the map on which the dotted line is marked. In Berreyesa's grant, as in that of Justo Larios, the line is described as extending to the "Sierra," and as the ranchos were coterminous and the eastern boundary of one is the western boundary of the other, the "Sierra" to which their common line of division extends must be the same. On recurring, then, to Berreyesa's map and the dotted line alluded to, all doubt is dissipated as to the range of mountains referred to. On this map two ranges of hills or mountains are rudely but unmistakably delineated. They are separated by a broad valley—far broader than that actually existing, but indicating by its exaggerated delineation the discrimination in the grantor's mind between the ridge of low hills and the Sierra, or mountain range behind it. The lower ridge is inscribed "Lomas Bajas," while the chain behind it and distinctly separated from it is inscribed "Sierra Azul," from the hue which the mountains assume at a distance. The dotted line which by the grant is to terminate at the "Sierra," is produced across the "Lomas Bajas," across the valley beyond them, and terminates at the "Sierra Azul." There can thus be no room for doubt that the Sierra intended was the main Sierra or mountain range, and as the western line of the land of Berreyesa extended to this range, the land of Justo Larios, which has the same line described in the same terms as its eastern boundary, must have the same extent. The Sierra referred to in Justo Larios' grant must necessarily be the same as that referred to in the grant of Berreyesa, and as to the latter, there can be, as we have seen, no question.

Other considerations in support of this view might be urged. I think it unnecessary. There seems to me no room for doubt that the Sierra referred to in the grant was the main Sierra described by the witnesses, and not the range of low hills which has been attempted to be assigned as a boundary.

[NOTE. From the decree entered in this case an appeal was taken by the United States to the supreme court, which rejected the words "more or less" in the grant, and confirmed the same for one league to be taken within the three designated boundaries, east, west, and south. The north boundary to be determined by quantity. 20 How. (61 U. S.) 413. The cause having been remanded, a continuance was granted the United States, in order to produce further testimony in the determination of the location of the boundaries, as designated in the grant. Case No. 15,138. Subsequently the location of the three designated boundaries was determined by the district court; the southern boundary, the one in dispute, being located as in the opinion above. Id. 15,139. From this decree an appeal was again taken to the supreme court by the United States. The appeal was upon motion dismissed, on the ground that the decree of the district court was not a final decree. 21 How. (62 U. S.) 446. At a later date, a survey was made, and returned into the district court, which approved the same, with modifications. Id. 15,140.]

CONTINUANCE — ADDITIONAL PROOFS — MEXICAN LAND GRANT.

Where a cause is remanded for further proceedings, involving additional proofs, the United States are entitled to a reasonable time in which to close their testimony.

This was an application by the district attorney for a continuance, in order to produce further testimony.

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty., for continuance.

A. P. Crittenden, against it.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This cause having been set for a hearing on this day, a continuance is moved for on the part of the United States, in order that further testimony may be produced. The motion is strenuously resisted on the part of the claimant. To determine whether the court, in the exercise of its discretion, should grant it, the previous proceedings in the cause should be adverted to. The transcript from the board of commissioners was filed in this court on the 2d of November, 1854. A notice of appeal by the United States was duly filed February 20, 1855. The cause remained pending in this court until August 13, 1857, —a period of two years and six months,— when the proofs on both sides having been closed, it was argued and submitted. No suggestion on either side was then made that the cause was not fully ready for hearing, nor any application for further delay, nor was it intimated by the parties that any further testimony was desired or could be obtained. The decree of this court was signed on the 17th of August [Case No. 15,137], and an appeal having been taken by the United States, it was heard by the supreme court at the last term. The mandate and opinion of the supreme court were filed in this court on the 17th of June, 1858. By the mandate the cause was remanded to this court, with directions to enter a decree in conformity to the opinion of the supreme court. [20 How. (61 U. S.) 413.] By that opinion it appears that, in entering the decree, "the external boundaries designated in the grant were to be declared by this court from the evidence on file, and such other evidence as may be produced before it."

The mandate and opinion having been filed on the 17th of June, a motion was made on the 23d of June, that a decree be filed designating the external boundaries, as directed by the supreme court. On the application of the district attorney, the hearing of this motion was postponed until June 30th. On that day the district attorney stated that he desired to produce further testimony on the part of the United States, and an order was made referring the cause to a commissioner to take proofs, with liberty to either party to move to set the cause for a hearing in default of due diligence on the part of the opposite side. Under that order various depositions were taken on the part of the United States. On the 3d of August, notice of a motion to set the cause for a hearing was given by the claimant, and on the 9th of August the motion was heard. It was thereupon ordered by the court, the United States attorney consenting thereto, as appears by the order and the minutes of the court, that the testimony on both sides be closed on the 21st of August, and the cause set for a hearing on the 24th of August. Depositions were accordingly taken by the United States on the 18th and 19th of August. On the 24th of August the district attorney again moved for further time to take testimony, which was opposed by the counsel for claimant. The court, after hearing argument, ordered that further time should be allowed, viz., until the 28th, and that the cause be set for a hearing on that day. The district attorney now moves (August 28th) for further time to take testimony. He does not state to the court the names of any witnesses he proposes to examine, their number, nor the facts intended to be established by them, that the court may judge of their materiality. He declines to indicate any time within which the proofs will be closed, but insists on the right to examine witnesses, so long as it shall appear to the court that he is proceeding therein without unnecessary delay.

On the part of the claimant it is urged that any further postponement of this cause will in all probability prevent its being heard by the supreme court at its ensuing term. It would be deeply regretted by the court if this litigation, so long protracted, and involving such vast interests, should not at the next term of the supreme court be determined. The question, however, for my consideration is, have the United States had such reasonable time for taking proofs as ought to be allowed them? It is to be observed that in the opinion of the supreme court, this court is directed to "declare the external boundaries of the grant from the evidence on file, and such other evidence as may be produced," etc. It is clear that this court was bound to afford a reasonable opportunity to take the further evidence on which its declaration of the boundaries was to be founded. From the 30th of June, the date of the order directing the evidence to be taken, the cause has been prosecuted by the United States with diligence. On the 18th and 19th of August depositions were taken, and on yesterday and the day before witnesses were examined both on the part of the United States and the claimant. Certainly no laches or unnecessary delay can be imputed to the district attorney. He now states that he has other witnesses, whose testimony he will proceed to take at once if the opportunity be afforded.

With the strongest desire to bring this cause to a termination, I do not feel at liberty under the directions given by the supreme court to refuse the application. If two years and a half was not an unreasonable time for the taking the original testimony in this court, less than two months can hardly be deemed sufficient when the supreme court have seen fit to send back the cause, in effect, for further proofs. The court is assured by the district attorney, in the most emphatic manner, that he has no wish to delay the cause, but that he only desires time to submit proofs important to the interests of the United States, and which are in readiness to be taken. I do not feel at liberty to deny him the opportunity of doing so. An order must be entered allowing the district attorney ten days further time to produce testimony in the case.

[For the subsequent proceedings in the location of the boundaries of this grant, see Case No. 15,139, and note.]

Case No. 15,139.

UNITED STATES v. FOSSAT.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 376.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1858.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—DETERMINATION OF BOUNDARIES.

The southern, western and eastern boundaries of the tract granted to Justo Larios declared, leaving the northern boundary to be determined by quantity. The former opinion [Case No. 15,137], with respect to the southern boundary, maintained.

[This was a claim by Charles Fossat for one league of land in Santa Clara county, confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States. Affirmed by the district court for one league, "more or less." Case No. 15,137. Upon appeal, the supreme court limited the grant to one league within the designated east, west, and south boundaries, the north boundary to be determined by survey. Case remanded. 20 How. (61 U. S.) 413. In the location of the designated boundaries a continuance was allowed the United States in order to take further testimony. Case No. 15,138. It is now heard upon the question of the location of the boundaries in conformity with the opinion of the supreme court.]

P. Della Torre, U. S. Atty., and A. C. Peachy, for the United States.

A. P. Crittenden, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. When this case was first submitted to this court on appeal from the board of land commissioners, it was considered that the four boundaries of the tract were indicated with reasonable certainty by the grant and accompanying diseño. It did not escape the observation of the court that only three of those boundaries were designated in the grant, viz., the southern, the western and the eastern; but it was thought that the description of the tract in the decree of concession as the "Cañada de los Capitancillos," and the delineation on the diseño of the two ranges of hills within which it was contained, sufficiently indicated the location of the northern boundary, the mention of which was omitted in the grant. The court was confirmed in this view by the representation of the petition, on the diseño, that the tract delineated upon it was of the extent of one league, a little more or less, indicating, as it seemed, that he solicited not a specified quantity, but a particular tract, the estimated area of which he declared to the governor. When, therefore, the governor granted to him the tract solicited, and described it as "of the extent of one league, a little more or less, as explained by the map," it seemed to the court necessary, to carry into effect the intention of the grantor, to confirm to the claimant the tract delineated on the map, even though, as anticipated by the governor, its extent might be "a little" more than one league; provided such excess did not exceed a fraction of the usual unit of measurement in colonization grants, viz., one league; or in other words, provided that the quantity over and above one league was such as might reasonably be deemed to have been asked for by the petitioner and granted by the governor, under the description "a square league, a little more or less." The clause in the third condition, by which the surplus was reserved to the nation, usually called the sobrante clause, was disregarded by the court, that clause being a formula generally, and almost invariably inserted in all grants, without reference to their nature, and being not unfrequently found in grants where all the boundaries are distinctly defined, and even in grants where no boundaries are mentioned, but which are for tracts of a specified length and breadth, where obviously no sobrante can remain.

On the hearing, the location or existence of a northern boundary was not brought in question, but the discussion chiefly if not exclusively turned upon the location of the southern boundary—the right of the court to locate which by its decree was denied by the attorney for the United States. In that view, however, the court did not coincide; but by its decree it defined and located the southern boundary, and thereby decided the most important if not the only point discussed on the hearing.

The cause having been appealed to the supreme court, the views of this court were in some particulars found to be erroneous. By the judgment of that court it is decided, not only that in the grant itself there is no call for a northern boundary, but that "there is no reference to the diseño for any natural object or other descriptive call to ascertain it; that the grant itself furnishes no other criterion for ascertaining it than the limitation of quantity expressed in the third condition, which thus becomes a controlling condition in the grant." The mention of quantity as "a league, a little more or less," the court regards (after rejecting the words "a little more or less," as having no meaning in a system of location and survey like that of the United States) as so explicit as to render improper any reference to the petition and the diseño, or any inquiry as to "whether the name Capitancillos had any significance as connected with the limits of the grant." As to the propriety of the location of the southern boundary by this court, the supreme court expresses no opinion, but the grant is confirmed for one league of land, to be taken within the southern, eastern and western boundaries mentioned therein, and the cause is remitted that this court may declare those boundaries from the evidence on file and such other evidence as may be produced before it. As this court had already declared the southern and only disputed boundary of the tract, the remanding of the cause, with the directions above stated, appeared to this court to be an instruction to review and reconsider its opinion on that point, and also to allow further evidence to be taken in relation to it. The cause having been originally heard with the consent of both parties, and without any suggestion that further evidence was desired or attainable, the application on the part of the United States for leave to take further testimony was resisted on the part of the claimant. It seemed, however, to the court, that the directions of the supreme court clearly contemplated that such testimony should be taken, if offered, and that the obedience due from this court to the mandate of its superior required it to permit either side to offer such further testimony as might be desired. Additional testimony has therefore been taken, and it now remains for the court again to declare the boundaries as originally declared in its former decree, or differently, if on reconsideration that decree should appear to be erroneous, or if the additional testimony is such as to induce it to change its opinion.

In the opinion heretofore delivered, it was observed—"The evidence shows that the tract called Capitancillos is a valley lying along an arroyo or brook. On the southerly side extends a range of hills, running from east to west. At their eastern extremity, where they are intersected by the Alamitos, these hills attain considerable elevation, but they decline in height towards the west, where they reach and are turned by the Arroyo Seco. Behind this ridge or cuchilla the main sierra or mountain chain raises itself to a great height, and is separated from the ridge of lomas bajas, already spoken of, by the two streams mentioned. These streams rise at an inconsiderable distance from each other, and flowing in opposite directions, between the sierra and the lomas bajas, they turn the eastern and western extremities of the latter and debouch into the plain. Upon the slopes of the ridge of low hills, as well towards the valley on the north as towards the streams behind it on the south, the best or most permanent grazing is to be found, and in this ridge are situated the valuable quicksilver mines, the existence of which gives to this inquiry its chief importance." To this description it may be added, that the range of low hills are not throughout their whole length entirely detached from the sierra, but are connected with it at one point by a spur or ridge running nearly at right angles to the general direction of the sierra and the lomas. This ridge is at its lowest point 1100 feet above the level of the valley. The height of the Almaden peak at the eastern extremity of the lomas is about 1500 feet above the level of the valley, but the lomas as they extend towards the west diminish in height, and are separated by various depressions, which permit easy access from the valley on the north to the Arroyo Seco at the base of the sierra. The average width of the ridge is one mile and four-tenths, and though at the Almaden peak the descent to the valley is abrupt, yet further to the west the diminished height of the hills, and the frequent depressions in the ridge, permit the valley to be reached at many points by easy and gentle declivities. It is proper to add that after the proofs were submitted, the judge, at the suggestion of the district attorney, and accompanied by that officer and the representative of the claimant, visited the premises in order by personal inspection to become acquainted with its topography, and to be able more accurately to understand and to appreciate the testimony.

The question, then, to be determined is—What is the southern boundary designated in the grant? The grant itself describes the land as bounded by the "sierra;" but the question recurs—What is the natural object so designated? Is it the main chain to the south of the lomas bajas, or is it the lomas bajas themselves? The natural meaning of the term "sierra" would seem to point to a great mountain chain, rather than to a range of hills parallel to it and separated from it, except at one point where the two ranges are connected by a narrow ridge or divide. On the diseño presented by Larios, the sierra is described as the "Sierra del Encino." The very remarkable oak tree from which this name was evidently derived is situated on the main chain of mountains, and is a conspicuous object from all parts of the valley. That the "sierra" mentioned in the grant is that on which this tree is situated, cannot be disputed; but still the question arises—Was the term "sierra" or "Sierra del Encino" used by the grantor to designate the lofty chain of mountains on which the oak tree is situated, as distinguished from the lomas bajas or lower ridge to the north of it? Or did he intend to include within it both ranges, and to apply the term as well to the lomas bajas as to the larger mountains behind them? In a certain sense the lomas bajas are evidently a part of the sierra with which they are connected, as has been explained; but the question is not whether they form a part of or belong to the sierra geologically or topographically, but whether they were so known and recognized and so treated by the governor when he described the tract as bounded by the sierra.

On the part of the claimant, numerous witnesses testify that the part of the Sierra Azul on which the oak tree is situated is called Sierra dei Encino, but that the low range of hills on the south of it and separated from it by the creeks was never known as the sierra. That they were, until the discovery of the mine, called lomas bajas, and subsequently "Las Lomas de Mina de Luis Chaboya," or "Cuchilla de la Mina de Chaboya." They describe the range known as the "sierra" as rising from the streams, and the latter as running between the sierra and the ridge known as the Cuchilla de la Mina. No less than nine witnesses, many of whom have lived in the neighborhood from twenty to forty years, testify to these facts, and to their testimony may be added that afforded by the diseño of Berreyesa, who at the time he presented it had been established in the cañada about nine years. On this map the two ranges of hills are distinctly delineated separated by a broad valley—far broader than the ravine actually existing. The lower range is inscribed "Lomas Bajas," while the upper is marked "Sierra Azul;" thus indicating that in 1842 and at the time when the petitions of both Larios and Berreyesa were before the governor, and before the question had any importance, a marked discrimination was made even in the rude diseño presented by the applicant between the ridge of lomas bajas, and the sierra behind it.

Since the case has been remanded, the testimony of three witnesses on this point has been taken by the United States. Antonio Suñol testifies that he never heard of the Sierra del Encino, nor of any range of hills called the "Cuchilla de la Mina de Luis Chaboya." That the mouth of the mine is in the "Sierra Azul." On his cross-examination he states that the ridge has been called "Lomas" or "Lomas Muertas de la Sierra Azul," and that after the mine was discovered, "we always said the mine of Chaboya which is in the Sierra Azul." José Maria Amador testifies that he does not know the Sierra del Encino, nor "La Cuchilla de le Mina de Luis Chaboya." That the mine is situated on the "Lomas Bajas de la Sierra Azul." "It is in the Sierra Azul itself. The sierra descends regularly; there is no breach nor separation in it. The mine is in a low loma. It is all known as the Sierra Azul, from the foot to the top of it." José Romero testifies that he does not know the Sierra del Encino, nor the Cuchilla de la Mina de Luis Chaboya. That the name of the mountain on which the mine is situated is the "Sierra Azul." On his cross-examination, in reply to an inquiry as to the name of the creek "which passes between the Guadalupe mine and the sierra," he states its name to be the "El Arroyito del Corral del Defunto Rafael." That he knows the loma where the Guadalupe mine is situated, and the sierra in which it is. That "loma and sierra mean the same thing with us."

It is unnecessary to comment on the testimony of these witnesses, for the preponderance of evidence is clearly against the accuracy of their statements, or their recollection.

If then we were to fix the southern boundary of this tract by the calls of the grant alone, the evidence would leave no room for doubt that the grantor meant by the term "sierra" in the grant the lofty chain of mountains on which the oak tree is situated, and which being for the most part covered with chemisal, presents an azure hue at a distance; rather than the lower and parallel ridge known as the "Lomas Bajas" or "Cuchilla de la Mina," and which is for the most part covered with wild oats and suitable for grazing. But the great difficulty in the case is presented by the diseño which accompanies the expediente of Justo Larios. On this diseño a single range of hills, inscribed "Sierra del Encino," is rudely delineated; from this range the two creeks are represented as debouching into the plain. If this sierra be the main sierra, the lomas bajas are entirely omitted on the sketch. I have been much impressed with the very able and elaborate argument on this point submitted by the counsel who appeared for the United States, as also by the testimony of many surveyors that, guided by this map alone, and crossing the valley in a southerly direction, they would stop or fix the southern limit of the tract at the foot of the first hills which rise from the valley—that is, at the foot of the "Lomas Bajas." It is urged that the southern boundary as shown by this diseño is a line drawn at the foot of the range inscribed "Sierra del Encino," and from one creek to the other, and not along the course of either. That if the range delineated was intended to represent the main sierra, the arroyos, and especially the Seco, would have been represented as running below or to the north of it, and not debouching from it; and that the lomas bajas would not have been omitted. It may perhaps be admitted, that if we were to be guided by the diseño alone, it would not be easy to avoid the conclusion so earnestly and ingeniously pressed upon the court in the brief submitted by the counsel for the United States. The indications, however, afforded by the diseño, are not free from all ambiguity. On that sketch the two streams are represented as debouching from the hills at points situated on a line nearly horizontal. The map of Lewis, exhibited on the part of the United States, shows that the Arroyo de los Alamitos, called on the Larios diseño Arroyo de los Capitancillos, issues from the foot hills or lomas bajas at a point considerably to the north of that where the Arroyo Seco turns the western extremity of those hills and debouches into the plain. If a line then be drawn from the point where the Alamitos debouches, to that where the Seco turns the lomas, it would depart considerably from a horizontal line. Again: The space inclosed between the creeks and the sierras is represented on the Larios diseño as not quite twice as long as it is broad. But if the sierra on the diseño be taken to mean the lomas bajas, the map of Lewis shows that the tract between the Alamitos and the Seco on the east and west, and the Capitancillos and the foot of the lomas on the north and south, is about four times as long as it is broad. Again: The Arroyo de los Capitancillos is represented on the Larios diseño as running towards the south-east diagonally across the valley, and then turning towards the south and running in a southerly direction perpendicularly to the valley, and nearly parallel to the Arroyo Seco for a considerable distance, until it reaches the sierra. But if the sierra which it reaches was intended to be the lomas bajas, it should be drawn as meeting them while running in a south-easterly or diagonal course. No part of its southerly or perpendicular course should be represented. The map of Lewis shows that the course of the stream from a point above or near the hacienda is delineated on the Larios diseño with tolerable accuracy, and that from that point it flows in a northerly direction perpendicularly to the valley for a considerable distance, and it is only after turning and leaving the lomas bajas that it takes a direction diagonally across the valley. If, then, the red line drawn on Lewis' map as the southern boundary of the tract were drawn on the Larios diseño to the corresponding point of the Capitancillos, it would strike the latter not far from the letter "A" on that diseño, and that portion of the stream flowing in a north and south direction would be excluded. Again: By looking on Lewis' map it will be seen that the Arroyo Seco, after running in a westerly direction along the base of the main sierra, and between it and the lomas, on reaching the end of the latter makes a sudden bend to the north and debouches into the valley at a point very near the base of the sierra; in other words, that at this point the flat or valley land extends nearly up to the base of the main sierra. If, then, a line be drawn from this point to the most southerly point of the Arroyo de los Alamitos, or Capitancillos on the diseño of Larios, it would nearly coincide with the base of the sierra as contended for by the claimant; and would moreover be almost a straight line, and in this respect correspond with the indications of the diseño better than the very sinuous and irregular line which is found by following the base of the foot hills which project into the valley. For it is to be observed that neither of the lines run by Lewis as the southern boundary of the tract follow what is claimed to be the boundary indicated by the diseño, viz., the base of the lomas; but run upon the sides of and over those hills at a considerable and apparently arbitrary distance from their base. The slightest comparison between the diseño of Larios and a map of the country shows the former to be in many other respects inaccurate and defective. The angle of the creeks at which the eastern boundary commences is not laid down, and the lomita which is also called for in the description of that line does not appear. It is therefore no very extravagant supposition that the lomas bajas were also omitted, particularly when the circumstances under which the diseño was drawn, as detailed by Petronillo Rios, are considered.

The foregoing observations, I think, warrant me in saying that the diseño of Larios does not afford those clear, certain and unmistakeable indications of the location of the southern boundary contended for by the counsel for the United States. But in determining this question we are not at liberty to confine our attention to the Larios diseño alone. The record shows that Justo Larios and Berreyesa had occupied different portions of the Cañada de los Capitancillos for many years before the date of their applications to the governor for their respective grants. Between them a dispute as to their boundaries had arisen. Before the grant to either was issued, they appeared before José Z. Fernandez and agreed upon the line which should form their common boundary. The description of this line, as given in the report of Fernandez, was inserted in both grants, and the line was marked by that officer on the diseño of Berreyesa "as being the more exact." In the grant to Larios the eastern boundary is described as the rancho of citizen Berreyesa, "which has for boundary the angle," etc., and in the grant to Berreyesa his western boundary is in like manner described as "the rancho of citizen Justo Larios, which has for boundary the angle," etc. The eastern boundary of Justo Larios is thus indirectly described in his own grant, but directly in that of Berreyesa; while the western boundary of the latter is in like manner indirectly described in his own grant, but directly in that of Larios. At the time of making the grant the governor had probably before him both diseños, but certainly that of Berreyesa, on which the boundary line described by him in both grants had been marked by Fernandez for his information. In determining therefore the boundaries of Justo Larios, it seems to me not only proper but necessary to recur to the grant of Berreyesa, where alone the boundary of Justo Larios is described as such, and to the diseño of Berreyesa, upon which it was marked "as being more exact." The governor did not grant to Justo Larios the tract delineated on his diseño, viz., the land between the Arroyo Seco and that of Capitancillos, or a line to the east of the latter. He granted the land between the Arroyo Seco and a line drawn from the angle of the creeks, passing by the eastern "falda" of the "lomita in the centre of the cañada to the sierra;" and this line was marked on the Berreyesa diseño, and at a considerable distance to the west of the Capitancillos or Alamitos. In declaring this boundary, therefore, which was different from that solicited by Larios and indicated on his diseño, we are compelled to resort to the diseño of Berreyesa, which becomes quoad hoc the diseño to which the grant refers. On the Berreyesa diseño the two ranges of hills are rudely but unmistakeably delineated. The first or most northern are inscribed "Lomas Bajas," while the higher ridge to the south is inscribed "Sierra Azul." The valley represented as lying between them, though its width is grossly exaggerated, yet serves to indicate by that very exaggeration the discrimination in the grantor's mind between the sierra and the lomas bajas. The dotted line commencing at the angle of the creeks is produced across the lomas bajas, across the intermediate valley, and the Alamitos represented as flowing through it to the base of the main sierra If this line be the eastern boundary of Justo Larios, as I think it must be considered, there can be no doubt as to the range of mountains intended by the term "sierra" in his grant.

It is urged that Berreyesa had applied not only for the Cañada de los Capitancillos, but for all the hills which pertain to it; whereas Justo Larios petitioned for a part of the cañada alone. That therefore in the grant to Berreyesa, and on his diseño, the line was extended so as to include the low hills solicited, but that such an extension ought not to be made in favor of Larios, who solicited the cañada alone. This argument assumes that the term cañada as used in these grants does not include the low hills at the foot of the sierra, but that it is bounded and limited by them. But the language of the petition of Berreyesa referred to seems to convey the contrary idea, for it speaks of the low hills "which belong or pertain to the said cañada." He does not ask for the cañada and also a portion of the sierra, but for the cañada and the low hills pertaining to it. It is surely not reasonable to say that he considered and asked for the low hills as not belonging to or a part of the cañada he solicited. Again: the governor, who with respect to Berreyesa, it is admitted, intended to grant the low hills, describes the tract granted to him "as a part of the place know as the Cañada de los Capitancillos," thus showing that in his apprehension at least the place known as the Cañada de los Capitancillos did include the low hills solicited. In the grant to Larios it is described as the "place known by the name of Capitancillos"—the word cañada being omitted in the grant though it is inserted in the decree of concession. Again: the governor, confessedly intending to include within the grant to Berreyesa the lomas or low hills, bounds his grant by the sierra. With both petitions and both diseños before him, and with his attention directed to the discrimination between the sierra and low hills belonging to the cañada, he nevertheless uses the same term "sierra" in describing the boundary of Larios. Can we infer that in the grant to Berreyesa he meant by this term one natural object, and in that to Larios another? I think not. The sierra referred to in both grants must be the same, and as that intended in the Berreyesa grant is unmistakeable, we are enabled to fix with corresponding certainty the sierra referred to in the grant to Justo Larios.

I have given to this case much attention. I have endeavored to decide it uninfluenced by the previous opinion of this court. Upon the best consideration I have been able to give to the questions involved, I have not been able to discover that that opinion was erroneous.

The remaining point to be considered is as to the form of the decree. In the opinion of the supreme court (20 How. [61 U. S.] 426), it is said: "The southern, western and eastern boundaries of the land granted to Larios are well defined, and the objects exist by which those limits can be ascertained. There is no call in the grant for a northern boundary, nor is there any reference to the diseño for any natural object, or other descriptive call to ascertain it. The grant itself furnishes no other criterion for determining that boundary than the limitation as expressed in the third condition. * * * If the limitation of quantity had not been so explicitly declared, it might have been proper to have referred to the petition and diseño, or to have inquired if the name Capitancillos had any significance as connected with the limits of the tract, in order to give effect to the grant. But there is no necessity for additional inquiries. The grant is not affected by any ambiguity. * * * The grant to Larios is for one league of land, to be taken within the southern, eastern and western boundaries designated therein, and which is to be located at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established for the survey and location of private land claims in California by the executive department of this government." The district court is there directed to declare the external boundaries designated in the grant. From the foregoing it is, I think, evident that the supreme court considered the southern, western and eastern boundaries were alone designated in the grant, and that as the limitation of quantity was explicit, and there was no ambiguity in the grant, the northern boundary was to be determined by quantity alone; and that it was "not authorized to depart from the grant to obtain evidence to contradict, vary, or limit its import." When, therefore, this court has, pursuant to the directions of the supreme court, declared those three external boundaries, it has declared "the southern, western and eastern boundaries of the land granted to Larios," and the remaining boundary is to be ascertained by quantity. It is urged on the part of the United States that the league is to be taken within the three boundaries named, but is not of necessity bounded by them; that its location within them is to be subject to the restrictions established by the executive; and that the northern boundary of the league is to be determined by the northern boundary of the tract within which it is to be located. The supreme court undoubtedly say that the league is to be located within the three boundaries mentioned. But a reference to the preceding part of the opinion dispels any doubt which might be suggested by this expression. It is said, unequivocally, that the southern, western and eastern boundaries of the land granted to Larios—not of the tract within which the league granted to him is to be taken—are well defined, and the supreme court explicitly declare that the northern boundary is to be determined by the limitation of quantity alone. "The grant itself furnishes no other evidence for determining that boundary than the limitation of quantity as expressed in the third condition. This is a controlling condition in the grant;" and they add that no additional inquiries to ascertain that boundary (the grant being free from ambiguity) are necessary or authorized by law. It seems to me that the import of this language is unmistakeable, and the land granted to Larios must be decreed by this court to be but one league of land, bounded by the three external boundaries mentioned in the grant, as the same are ascertained and declared in this opinion. The fourth or northern boundary to be ascertained by quantity, and to be run at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established for the location and survey of private land claims in California by the executive department of the government of the United States.

[NOTE. From the decree entered in this case an appeal was taken by the United States to the supreme court. The appeal was on motion dismissed, upon the ground that the decree of the district court was not a final decree. 21 How. (62 U. S.) 446. Subsequently a survey made and returned into the district court was, with modifications, approved. Case No. 15,140.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. By the decree of the supreme court of the United States, there was "confirmed to Charles Fossatt one square league of land, to be surveyed within the southern, western, and eastern boundaries designated in the grant, and to be located, at the election of the grantee or his assigns, under the restrictions established for the survey and location of private land claims in California, by the executive department of this government." The external boundaries mentioned in the grant this court was directed to declare, and the cause was remanded for further proceedings, in conformity with the opinion of the supreme court. Much testimony was taken, and elaborate arguments heard as to the location of the southern boundary, which, at that stage of the cause, was alone disputed. After great consideration, this court, by its decree, determined the location of that boundary, and directed the league of land confirmed to the claimant to be surveyed within that and the other external boundaries of the grant, as ordered by the supreme court. From this decision a second appeal was taken, but the supreme court declined to pass upon the question until an actual survey of the land should be made, and all the boundaries established and laid down in an official plat approved by a final decree of this court. A survey has accordingly been made and returned into this court for its approval. The objections to it are two: First, that the external boundaries of the grant within which the league is to be surveyed are not correctly established; second, that the land is improperly located within the exterior boundaries.

1. Of the three boundaries mentioned, two only are disputed. With regard to one of these, the southern, this court has fully expressed its opinion. The whole subject was elaborately discussed, and I have been unable to perceive any ground for doubting the correctness of the conclusion arrived at.

2. The location of the other boundary, which formed the agreed line of division between the rancho of Berreyesa and that of Justo Larios, has now to be determined. The valley of Capitancillos, a long and narrow tract of land lying between the pueblo hills on the north, and the Sierra Azul on the south, had, from an early day, been in the possession of two persons, of whom one, Galindo, occupied the western portion, and the other, Chaboya, the eastern. Justo Larios succeeded to the possession of Galindo; José Reyes Berreyesa, to that of Chaboya. Each of them obtained a grant,—Juste Larios for the lower, and Berreyesa for the upper, portion of the valley. Before either grant was issued, a dispute had arisen between the two occupants of the cañada as to their respective limits. It was caused by the abandonment by Larios of the old house of Galindo, and the erection of another house a short distance below the junction of the Arroyos Alamitos and Seco, and within the limits of the tract claimed by Berreyesa. Each presented to the governor a diseño, including the disputed tract, and a grant to either was withheld until the settlement of the controversy. The matter was, therefore, referred to the prefect, José Tenon Fernandez, before whom the parties appeared, and agreed upon a common line of division, which was traced on the diseño of Berreyesa, by a dotted line, and described in the grants subsequently issued to both. The location of the line so delineated and described is the question to be determined. The description of this agreed line first appears in the report of Fernandez to the governor. In this report Fernandez says: "The litigants have agreed before me that the boundaries of both in the direction of the east, as the sketch of Berreyesa shows, shall be by drawing a straight line from the angle, which the Arroyo de los Alamitos forms with the Seco, direction towards the south, the slope (falda) of the hill, situate in the center of the cañada towards the east, and until it reaches the sierra in such a way that, according to the said sketch, which appears more exact, the said line comes to be a parallel which I have marked with points for the knowledge of your excellency,—with which they have remained content and satisfied."

In the decree of concession in the Berreyesa case, the land granted to him is described as bounded on the west by the rancho of citizen Justo Larios, which has for boundary the angle formed by the Arroyo Seco and that of the Alamitos, the slope of the hill (falda de la loma), situate in the center of the cañada and the sierra. In the titulo, or final grant, the boundary is described in language which, literally translated, is obscure. The rancho of Larios is said to have for boundary "the angle formed by the Arroyo Seco and that of the Alamitos, direction towards the south, the falda of the hill situated in the center of the cañada, 'asi al este hasta llegar a la sierra.'" By the translation, or, rather, the construction, given to this phrase, the line would be described in English as "commencing at the angle of the creeks, running thence in a southerly direction along the eastern falda of the hill, and thence to the sierra." It appears to be admitted that the direction of the line was southerly, according to the points of compass, as laid down on the diseño, and the expression, "rumbo al sur," is construed to refer to the course of the boundary line. But the application of the phrase "asi al este" to the falda of the loma, thereby indicating the eastern slope of the hill, is strenuously disputed. The language of the grant is evidently very rude and inartificial. It may be that the words in question were intended to refer to the loma, and to designate the hill situated towards the eastern portion of the tract, as distinguished from another loma, situated on the west, and known as the "Mojonera del Pueblo," or landmark of the pueblo; or, it may be, that the words referred to the whole boundary line, and meant that the angle of the creeks and the falda of the loma formed the eastern boundary of the land of Justo Larios.

I do not deen it material to determine the true construction of this phrase, for, if the description in the grant be ambiguous, or wholly silent on the point, the diseño shows that the dotted line marked by Fernandez passed on the eastern extremity of the small elliptical figure which rudely, but not very inaccurately, represents the loma. This diseño, which Fernandez availed himself of as being the more exact, is drawn with unusual accuracy. The angle formed by the creeks, the lomita, the range of hills called "Lomas Bajas," and the main Sierra Azul are unmistakably represented. From the angle of the creeks, passing by the eastern end of the loma, cutting the range of lomas bajas, and reaching the sierra, the dotted line of Fernandez is drawn, and inscribed "Lindero," or boundary. On a mere inspection of the map, its location would seem indisputable. But it unfortunately happened that the draftsman of the diseño mistook the true position of the loma, situated in the center of the cañada, and represented it as situated to the eastward of its true position. In the then condition of the country the error was insignificant, but it becomes of great importance in view of the subsequent development of the quicksilver veins on the ridge known as the "Lomas Bajas." For, if the calls for the angle of the creek and the "falda of the loma," shown by the diseño to be the eastern extremity of that hill, be taken as controlling the location of the boundary line, the latter will deflect far to the east, and will leave on the westerly, or Justo Larios', side, almost the entire range of the lomas bajas, including the mining peak of New Almaden.

The question, therefore, arises: Is the direction of this line to be determined by those two calls alone, or should it be controlled by other calls and indications of the diseño of higher dignity, and concerning which a mistake was more improbable? It is evident, from the diseño, that the Cañada de los Capitancillos was supposed to run in a direction nearly east and west. As the dispute between Larios and Berreyesa only referred to the mode in which the valley should be divided between them, and as Berreyesa claimed that the recently erected house of Larios should be the boundary, it was most natural that, when the controversy was settled, a line should be adopted dividing the valley in a direction perpendicular to its length. Such a line was accordingly drawn on the diseño, and described in the grant as running towards the south, i. e. nearly at right angles to the general course of the valley. The object of Berreyesa was to resist the further encroachment of Larios on lands for which, eight years previously, he (Berreyesa) had obtained a provisional title from Figueroa; while the claim of Larios was derived from a purchase of the house (not including the lands) of Galindo, and he had, as observed by Berreyesa to the governor, "room to extend himself outside of the cañada," while the latter "had absolutely nowhere to enlarge." It is, therefore, highly improbable that Larios would have claimed, or Berreyesa assented to, a line which, running diagonally in a southeasterly direction across the valley, would take from the latter a large tract of land, being far to the eastward, not only of the angle of the creeks and the falda, but also of Larios' house, and assign to the latter almost the entire range of the lomas bajas expressly solicited by Berreyesa in his petition. It may, at all events, be confidently asserted that, had such been the intention of the parties, the universal desire of Californians to bound their ranchos by well-known natural objects would have induced them to fix upon the Alamitos creek as their common limit, and thus secure a certain and precise boundary, nearly coinciding with the imaginary line they are supposed to have adopted. That, up to a comparatively recent date, the mining peak as well as a large portion of the lomas bajos were generally recognized as belonging to Berreyesa may be inferred from the fact that, in the denouncement of the New Almaden mine, by Castillero, and in the act of possession, by the alcalde, Pico, it is formally alleged to be "on the land of the retired sergeant, José Reyes Berreyesa." The latter was present at or about the time when possession was given, and claimed to be the owner of the land. Some negotiations between him and the discoverers of the mine appear to have taken place, while neither Justo Larios, nor any one in his behalf, seems to have asserted or been recognized as possessing any rights whatever in the land on which the mine was situated.

3. But the diseño itself affords what has appeared to me incontestable evidence of the location of the line to which the parties intended to assent. On it the range of lomas bajas is distinctly delineated. At the eastern extremity of this range is a hill of greater elevation than the rest, which is turned on the east by the Alamitos. This hill is undoubtedly the mining peak or hill of New Almaden. The Alamitos is represented as issuing through a gorge between it and a mass of hills further to the east, and running across the plain, diagonally, to the junction with the Seco. If, on this diseño, the line as claimed by the representatives of Larios be drawn, it would pass to the eastward of the mining peak, and run in an east-southeast direction, nearly coinciding with the course of the Alamitos. But the line actually marked by Fernandez is essentially different. It is drawn in a nearly southerly direction, and it cuts the range of the lomas bajas at about one-fifth the entire distance from their western to their eastern extremity—leaving on the left, i. e. on the eastern, or Berreyesa, side, not only mining hill, but nearly four-fifths of the entire range. Nor does it at all coincide with the course of the Alamitos, but, on the contrary, makes, with the general course of that stream, an angle of perhaps 45 degrees.

Again: Behind, or to the south, of the lomas bajas, is represented the range of mountains called "Sierra Azul." On their western extremity is the peak known as Mount Umunhum; while, far to the east the lofty mountain now called Mount Bache, is distinctly delineated. If the line contended for by the claimants be drawn on the diseño, it would run in the direction and even to the eastward of Mount Bache. The line, as drawn by Fernandez, strikes the sierra at a point less than one-sixth of the entire distance between Mounts Umunhum and Bache, leaving five-sixths of the entire range of those hills on the eastern, or Berreyesa, side. It is, therefore, evident that, to treat the call for the falda as determining the course of the entire boundary line, we must sacrifice, not only the call for the course of the boundary line as expressed in the grant, but every other indication of the diseño. It does not appear that Fernandez visited the cañada before adjusting the dispute. The line was assented to by the parties, who must have been familiar with the natural features of the country. The direction in which their common line should cross the valley, the portions of the disputed tract to be assigned to each, the course of the boundary, whether towards Umunhum, so as to leave the greater part of the lomas bajas to Berreyesa, or towards Mount Bache, so as to leave nearly the whole range to Justo Larios; whether it was to cross the Alamitos, making a large angle with the general course of that stream, and leaving the gorge through which it debouches into the valley far to the east, or whether it was to run towards the gorge and in a course not far from parallel with that of the Alamitos,—all these were points which we must suppose to have been determined, and on which it is highly improbable that the diseño would have erroneously represented the agreement of the parties.

It is urged that the lomita was a well known and conspicuous object in the center of the valley, and that, in selecting its eastern falda as the western limit of Berreyesa's land, the litigants adopted the boundary concerning which there could have been no misapprehension or mistake. The observation is just, and a similar one can be made with regard to the angle formed by the two creeks also adopted as a boundary. But the mistake which occurred was as to the relative position of these objects. It was supposed that the angle of the creeks lay nearly north from the "falda," and that a line drawn through these two objects would run in a direction nearly southerly, and at right angles to the general course of the valley, and would, when produced, cut the lomas bajas, and strike the sierra at the points indicated on the diseño. The question, therefore, is not whether the calls for the angle of the creeks and for the falda shall be rejected, for these natural objects are undoubtedly agreed upon as fixing the limit of the two ranchos; but, whether we shall allow the subsequent direction of the line to be determined by their relative position, concerning which there was an evident mistake, and give to it, when produced, a course entirely inconsistent with the course specified in the grant, and clearly indicated by natural objects on the diseño.

The theory of the claimants is founded on a translation of the language of the grant, which by no means expresses its literal meaning. In the printed translation the words of the description are rendered as follows: "Bounded by the rancho of J. R. Berreyesa, which has, for a boundary, a line running from the junction of the Arroyo Seco, and the Arroyo Seco southward to the sierra, passing by the eastern base of a small hill situated in the center of the cañada." But this, though possibly a correct interpretation, is by no means a literal translation of the original. In the latter no line is, in terms, called for. The rancho of Berreyesa is said to have for boundary "the angle formed by the Arroyo Seco and that of the Alamitos, direction towards the south, the eastern falda of the loma, situated in the center of the cañada until the sierra is reached." It has already been observed that the application of the words "asi al este" to the falda, and the interpretation of them as indicating the eastern falda is disputed, and, perhaps, doubtful. But, admitting this interpretation to be correct, the words of the description seem merely to indicate two natural objects which formed the boundary, from the second of which a line was to be drawn to the sierra, in a southerly direction according to the compass marks on the diseño. It is certainly not explicitly stated, as in the translation, that the boundary was to be "a line running from the junction of the creeks southward to the sierra, passing by the eastern base of the hill," etc. The language of the report of Fernandez, however, may perhaps justify the interpretation that has been given to the words of the grant. Fernandez describes the common boundary of the litigants as "a line from the angle of the creek, direction south, the eastern falda of the lomita, and until the sierra is reached." That he supposed a line drawn from the junction to the falda, and thence produced, would be a straight line, cannot be doubted; but he also supposed it would run in a southerly direction, or in the direction marked south on the diseño, and that it would strike the lomas bajas and the sierra at the points thereon indicated. But he does not expressly state that the line from the falda to the sierra is to be the line from the junction to the sierra produced. If the position of the falda was to determine, absolutely, the course of the boundary beyond, Fernandez could hardly have supposed that he had removed all cause of dispute. The term "falda" does not indicate any point on a hill, but a part of it. It signifies the slope, or radex montis. It probably applies, in strictness, only to the lower slope, or that part lying between the plain and a line drawn midway between its base and its summit, though it seems sometimes to be applied to the entire slope. But, giving it the more restricted interpretation, it is insufficient to fix the direction of the line with any certainty. The lomita in question is situated at a comparatively small distance from the angle of the creeks. If the boundary is to be the production of a line drawn from the angle to some point on the falda, a variation of the position of the latter of perhaps a few yards will so change the course of the line, when produced, as to materially alter the dimensions of the tract. The boundary, therefore, would still have been left, within considerable limits, arbitrary and uncertain.

If it be said that the point on the falda intended to be adopted, is shown by the diseño, it may be answered, that the diseño also shows, by unmistakable natural objects, the direction of the line, and that its course is to be determined by those indications, notwithstanding that the parties erroneously supposed, and represented on the diseño, that the line so drawn would pass by the eastern base of the hill. The object of critically examining the language of the grant has been to show that it does not, in terms, require the course of the boundary to be determined by the falda, and that, from the indefinite character of that call it is highly improbable it should have been intended to have such an effect. We are thus compelled to resort to the diseño to ascertain its location, and we at once discover the nature of the error into which the parties fell, and discern what was their intention when the line was agreed upon by the parties. As to that intention, there is, I think, no room for doubt. It was designed to divide the valley between the disputants by a line drawn across or at right angles to its general course. On the north, it was to commence at the angle of the creeks; at the south, it was to terminate at a point opposite, crossing the lomas bajas, and striking the sierra at the points indicated on the diseño. The falda of the lomita was also adopted as the western limit of the flat land on the Berreyesa side; and it was supposed, erroneously, as now appears, that a straight line could be drawn between the points just mentioned which would cross the eastern base falda. As that is found to be impossible, it has seemed to me that the call for a straight line should be rejected, and the boundary fixed by drawing a line from the angle of the creeks to the falda, and thence across the valley to the points in the lomas bajas and the sierra to which the diseño shows it was intended to be drawn. Having thus ascertained the location of the three external boundaries of the grant, it remains to be determined how the league of land confirmed to the claimant shall be located within them.

It is contended by the New Almaden Mining Company that the tract should be located as far as possible on the flat lands of the cañada, and excluding, except so far as is necessary to make up the required quantity, the lomas bajas on the southerly side. The grounds on which this location is urged are: (1) That the name of the rancho, the nature of the land, and the occupation and cultivations of the grantee, clearly show that the tract of level land between the Capitancillos and the lomas, was that which he chiefly desired, and which constituted the principal value of the grant to a California rancher. That by compelling him to take what he asked for, no injustice will be done; while, on the other hand, it would be unreasonable to permit him to locate the greater part of his league on the lomas bajas, which are only valuable by reason of their metalliferous veins. (2) That the New Almaden Company, as owners of a grant for two leagues on the land of their mining possession, have the right to insist that the adjoining ranchos shall be so located as to permit the grant to them to be satisfied out of the sobrante.

It may be admitted that the level portion of the valley was chiefly desired by both Berreyesa and Justo Larios. But it does not follow that the value of the lomas was on that account overlooked. Berreyesa expressly states to the governor that "his petition had always been for two sitios from the house of Larios to the matadero, with all the hills that belong to the valley," and he is at pains to delineate, with great distinctness, these hills on his diseño. It is not clear that, as a range for cattle, the lomas were at all inferior to the more level land. Towards the west, especially, and within the boundaries of the Larios grant, they are of no great height, and slope towards the plain on the north and the arroyo on the south by gentle declivities. They are covered throughout their whole extent with a growth of wild oats, and during at least a portion of the year must afford more abundant pasture than the more level portions of the tract. That Justo Larios supposed himself the owner of all the tract included within the great natural objects which fix the limits of the cañada, cannot, I think, be doubted; and it is equally clear that, if a judicial delivery of the possession had been given, the officer would, under the grant of "a league a little more or less," have measured to him the whole valley including the inconsiderable fractional excess beyond one league comprised within its boundaries. By the decision of the supreme court the quantity confirmed is restricted to one league; but to compel the claimant to select that league in a particular part of the tract, such as we suppose he might have originally preferred, would be unjustifiably to narrow the right of election accorded by the judgment of the supreme court.

The claim set up by the New Almaden Company for two leagues of land was rejected by this court. In the opinion, however, of one of the judges who concurred, pro forma, in the judgment of the court, the claimants had an equitable title which the United States were not at liberty to disregard. That title was founded on a dispatch addressed to the governor of California by the minister of relations, in which the former was advised that the president had been pleased to accede to the petition of Castillero for two leagues of land on his mining possession, and the governor was directed to put him in possession in conformity with the colonization laws. By one of the judges, this dispatch was considered, under the authority of the case of Castillero v. U. S., 23 How. [64 U. S.] 469, as "operating to adjudicate the title," and as an order to the governor to make the formal grant, as required by the colonization laws, in case the land should be found to be vacant. To have treated it as constituting, per se, a grant of the land would have been to attribute to Castillero a fraud upon the Mexican government; for he was well aware that two leagues of land, measured in every direction from the mouth of the mine, would include a considerable portion of the lands long previously granted to Larios and Berreyesa. It was, therefore, considered as the official expression of the president's assent to the petition of Castillero, and a direction to the governor to make the grant in conformity with the colonization laws, i. e. out of vacant and ungranted public land. A dispatch somewhat analogous, and imposing a similar duty on the governor, had already been decided by the supreme court to "operate to adjudicate the title."

If this be the true construction of the dispatch it would have been the first duty of the governor to inquire whether the land asked for was vacant, or whether it belonged to any private individual, pueblo, etc. On learning that a part of it belonged to two adjoining rancheros, he would either have adopted their external boundaries as the limits of the grant to Castillero or he would have suspended the proceeding until their lands should be measured and their boundaries legally established. In the latter event it cannot, I think, be doubted that Larios would have been put in possession of the whole tract within his external boundaries, and the fraction of the unit of measurement in excess of one league would have been treated as passing under the words "poco mas ó menos." But, at least, if restricted, as now, to the precise quantity of one league, he would have been allowed to select its location. If it be urged that he is now seeking to locate it on mineral lands, whereas, his grant was for grazing land, it may be replied that the New Almaden Company are endeavoring, with less right, to attain a similar object. Their right to the mine, with the pertinencias allowed by law, was acquired by discovery, registry, and working. Their alleged grant of two leagues was solicited and bestowed merely to supply wood for their burnings. As between them and Larios it is at least as inequitable that, under a grant of this description, which, by Mexican law conveyed no title to the minerals beneath the surface, they should obtain the range of the lomas, in which several mines held under titles derived from Larios are now in operation, as to permit Larios or his assigns to elect to locate his league on the same land.

If the claim for the two leagues should be rejected by the supreme court, the New Almaden Company would cease to have any right or interest to control the survey of the Larios claim. But, even if it be confirmed, I have been unable to perceive any just ground for limiting the right of election of Larios or his assigns, which the supreme court have declared him to possess. But, if the conclusion arrived at as to the location of the dividing line between the ranchos be correct, this question is comparatively unimportant; for it will not be possible to locate a league within the southern, western, and eastern boundaries, without including the greater part of the level land of the valley. It can, therefore, be no longer objected that those lands are not embraced within the survey. The survey returned into court must, therefore, be modified in accordance with this opinion; that is, a league of land must be measured within the western and southern boundaries as established by the present survey and the eastern boundary as declared in this opinion, the last-mentioned boundary to consist of a line drawn from the angles of the creeks to the eastern falda of the lomita, and from thence to the sierra, in such a direction as to pass the lomas bajas and to strike the sierra at the points indicated on the diseño as near as may be, and the fourth line to be run for quantity, at the election of the grantee, or his assigns.

[2 Biss. 377;[1] 3 Chi. Leg. News, 113.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Oct. Term, 1870.

INDIANS—OWNERSHIP OF LANDS—TIMBER.

1. The Indians on the Oneida reservation have the right to cut and use the timber thereon, and to sell sufficient to support themselves and families.

2. They must be treated as owners of the land, their ownership however being subject to the rights of sovereignty of the United States.

3. The power of the United States to sell this reservation commented upon.

Replevin brought by the United States against the defendant for a quantity of logs which, it is alleged, were cut on the Oneida reservation, near Green Bay, in the state of Wisconsin.

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Smith & Stark, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. The facts of the case seem to be substantially as follows: On the 8th day of February, 1831, the Menomonee Tribe of Indians, by articles of agreement made with the United States, which were afterwards ratified by the senate with a proviso not affecting the question in this case, which thereby became a treaty between that tribe and the United States, ceded a certain tract of land to the United States for the benefit of the New York Indians. That tract included what is now known as the Oneida reservation. It would seem that at that time, the Oneida Indians were in possession of the Oneida reservation, and have continued in possession ever since. On the 4th day of January, 1836, the Oneida Nation made a contract of lease to Daniel Bread, one of their tribe, authorizing him to construct a dam and saw-mill on Duck creek, within the reservation, and to cut all the timber thereon necessary to build the dam and mill, as well as do lumbering thereat. Any one of the nation had a right to cut and draw logs to the mill, and one-half of the boards were to go to the mill, and the other half to him who cut and drew the logs. This condition as to the division of the property was to continue four years, and after that those who drew the logs were to be entitled to two-thirds of the boards. The lease concludes with this stipulation: "And the said Bread and his heirs and asigns shall have privilege to cut all logs necessary to keep the mill constantly running." By the terms of this lease this arrangement was to be perpetual. It appears the dam and mill were constructed by Bread, and that lumber has been manufactured there from that time up to the present, and that the defendant claims under this lease and is now and has been for some time in possession of the mill. On the 3d day of February, 1838 [7 Stat. 566], a treaty was made between the first Christian and Orchard parties of Indians, by which they agreed to cede to the United States all their title and interest in the lands set apart for them in the first article of the treaty with the Menomonees, already referred to; but by a second article of the treaty of February 3, 1838, there was reserved to the Indians from the foregoing cession, and to be held as other Indian lands, a tract of land containing one hundred acres for each individual, and it is this that is now called the Oneida reservation; and the Oneidas were a party to this treaty of 1838, by the name of the first Christian party of Indians. It will be seen, therefore, that by the terms of this treaty of 1838 the United States contracted with the Oneidas for the purchase of the land which had been ceded to them by the Menomonees in 1831, and that they reserved by express terms to the Oneida Indians what is now known as the reservation. There seems to be no controversy about these facts, and the Indians have been treated from that time as the owners and possessors of the land. Since the lease was made in 1836 it appears that the Indians have resided upon the land, and have cultivated it to a greater or less extent, and have been in the habit of cutting and hauling logs to the mill constructed under the lease. It is to be observed that this lease was made under the direct sanction of Mr. Boyd, the Indian agent of the United States at that time, as is manifest from his signature to a memorandum stating that fact, attached to the lease. The lumber has been cut and used in the manner already described, it would seem, with the acquiescence of the federal authorities.

Recently stringent instructions have been given to the superintendent of Indian affairs that no timber shall be cut upon the reservation, except what may be necessary for the personal use of the Indians. It appears by the evidence that about one hundred thousand feet of the lumber in controversy in this case was cut on the reservation by some of the Indians, and sold to the defendant.

[There is a statement made by the agent of the government that the defendant admitted to him that there was as much lumber at the mill as was replevied in this case which came from the reservation, but it does not distinctly appear who cut or sold the remainder of the lumber in controversy, exceeding the one hundred thousand feet already referred to.] [2]

But it does not distinctly appear who cut or sold the remainder. One of the questions that arise in the case is, whether for the lumber that was cut and sold to the defendant by the Indians themselves, the action of replevin can be maintained by the United States. And I am of the opinion that if it was cut and sold for the purpose of supporting the Indians or their families, the action of replevin cannot be maintained. The Indians were in possession and were the owners of the land, so acknowledged to be by the government of the United States. It is true they were in possession as other Indians, according to the language of the treaty of 1838; but the understanding seems to be that while the ownership of the Indians could not interfere with the rights of sovereignty on the part of the United States, as a nation, and that the Indians might be compelled to sell the lands to the United States, that for all purposes the Indians must be treated as owners of the land, with the right to use it for all the purposes of tillage; to take fuel, wood for building and fences, and for their ordinary support. If this is so, while, perhaps, there may be some question whether the Indians would have the right to commit waste, properly so called, upon the land, or to use the timber for the purpose of speculation, still there can be no doubt they would have the right to clear the land for cultivation; and, if so, it would seem, to sell the wood thus obtained from the land; and to say that they could have the right to cut and use the wood and timber for these purposes, and that they could not sell it to enable them to obtain necessary articles, such as nails and other materials for the construction of their buildings and fences, would seem to be making a very refined distinction and one not warranted under the circumstances of the case.

This land is the only means of support which these poor people have. At the time of the treaty of 1831 [7 Stat. 342], the tribe consisted of less than six hundred persons. There are now about twelve hundred. The contributions of the government to these people are comparatively insignificant, furnishing them really no sufficient means of support, and, therefore, they must rely upon the land itself, and what comes from the land; and to insist that in the case of failure of crops, even if it be contended that it is their duty to cultivate the land, they could not take the wood necessary for their support, would be something not warranted by the principles of equity, and certainly ought not to be sanctioned by a court of justice.

I am therefore of the opinion that these Indians had the right to cut this timber on their own land for the purpose of contributing to the support of themselves and families. It is proved that this right has been exercised for many years with the sanction of the government and with the express consent of the tribe itself in council.

It may be doubted whether this reservation can be sold by the United States in the present condition of the title, even by act of congress, without the consent of the Indians themselves, but it is certain that it cannot be without an express law; and if the precedents which have always existed in such cases should be followed, it cannot, and ought not to be sold by the government, until the rights of the Indians are purchased, and with their free consent.

Case No. 15,142.

UNITED STATES v. FOSTER.

[2 Biss. 453;[1] 19 Int. Rev. Rec. 5.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. Feb. Term, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE—BREWER—FAILURE TO KEEP BOOKS—PENALTIES—HOW ENFORCED.

1. To an information against a brewer filed under the 48th, 49th, 51st and 53d sections of the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 164–166], it is not a sufficient answer that the neglect to keep the prescribed books and accounts was through ignorance or carelessness, and that there was no wrongful or criminal intent.

2. The object of the law is to protect the government in the collection of the tax. The penalty is for the omission, and the very nature of this business demanded that the brewer should know his duty in the premises.

3. Nor is it a sufficient answer or excuse that he misconstrued the law, and drew erroneous inferences as to his rights.

4. Where the law prescribes as punishment for an offense both a money penalty and imprisonment, it is not true that the penalty can only be enforced by indictment. The government can maintain an action of debt for the money penalty.

5. The words "shall be liable to," &c., are permissive, and not compulsory; they mark the extreme limit of the penalty, and leave it discretionary whether the whole penalty shall be imposed.

This was an information as in a declaration in debt under the 48th, 49th, 51st and 53d sections of the internal revenue act of July 13th, 1866 (14 Stat. 163). The declaration contained two counts. The first alleged that the defendant was the owner and superintendent of a brewery at a place named, within the district, and that he did not keep books showing the amount of beer which he had manufactured and sold, and showing the amount of materials which he had purchased, and claimed the penalty of three hundred dollars, prescribed in the last clause of the 51st section. The second count was that the defendant did not pay the taxes on the beer sold in fractional parts of a barrel, and that they were removed without stamps being affixed, and five instances were charged and a penalty of one hundred dollars claimed in each case, under the last clause of the 53d section. The jury found a verdict for the United States, for the penalty claimed. Motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the verdict of the jury could not be sustained under the evidence. and because, under the law, the judgment could not be rendered under the verdict.

Levi Hubbell, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Smith & Stark, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge. There was an allegation in the first count showing that an offense had been committed under the first part of the 51st section, but the whole of the first count was in debt, and only claimed as a penalty the sum of three hundred dollars. The case did not show that the defendant had any wrongful or criminal intent in neglecting to keep the books as prescribed by the 49th section, but that he omitted to keep the books through carelessness or ignorance, and it is objected that in order to warrant the enforcement of the penalty against the defendant it is necessary that there should be some wrongful or criminal intent. This does not seem to be necessary in the law. The language of the law is, that a party shall forfeit and pay the sum of three hundred dollars if he neglects to keep the books, without any reference whatever to the motive which causes such neglect. It is for the act of omission. The object of the law is to protect the government in the collection of the proper tax from the brewer, and in order to accomplish this there devolves upon him the duty of entering, or causing to be entered, from day to day in a book to be kept by him for that purpose the account of fermented liquors, the description of packages and the number of barrels and fractional parts of barrels manufactured, and also the quantity sold or removed for consumption or sale, and an account of the materials purchased by him. It may be that a party would not be subject to the penalty for an unintentional error or mistake in making the entries, but the very object of the law was to compel the brewer to keep the books and to make the entries as heretofore stated, and it is no answer to the allegation that he has neglected or failed to do so, that he was ignorant of the requirements of the law. The very nature of his business demanded that he should know what his duty was in the premises, and the old and familiar principle so often cited must be considered applicable to this case, that he cannot be excused on account of his ignorance.

The allegation made in the first count of the declaration under the first part of the 51st section seems to be mere surplusage, as no penalty is claimed under that allegation and may therefore be rejected, the count not being framed to enforce the penal part of the law.

The proof under the second count shows that the defendant in several instances had not affixed to the fractional parts of the barrels the stamps as required by the 48th section. There was some evidence tending to show that the defendant was under the impression that he might divide the stamps, putting one part of the same stamp on one fractional part of a barrel, and another on a different fractional part of a barrel, contrary to the provisions of the law. The same rule is applicable here as in relation to the first count. The law is explicit on the subject and a defendant cannot protect himself under an erroneous inference which he drew as to his right to affix stamps, and it is not necessary in this count any more than under the first that what the defendant did should have been done with a wrongful or criminal intent. It is enough that he failed or neglected to do what the law required.

It is insisted that the penalty referred to in the last clause of the 53d section, can only be imposed by indictment, and that it is not competent for the prosecution to institute an action of debt for a violation of this part of the law, where a person refuses or neglects to affix and cancel a stamp required by law. The language of the clause is "that a person who neglects or refuses to affix and cancel a stamp shall be liable to pay a penalty of one hundred dollars in each case where such omission occurs and shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than one year," and it is urged that because the party is subject to imprisonment the penalty can only be enforced by indictment. The general rule, where a money penalty is imposed for the doing or omission to do a particular act, is that an action of debt can be maintained, and the only question is, whether, when imprisonment is added to the money penalty, the government thereby loses the right to maintain the action of debt. In this case the government proceeded only for the money penalty named in the 53d section and has waived the other penalty of imprisonment. There may be a question whether, when the action of debt is brought, any indictment could afterwards be maintained. Without deciding that question, I am of the opinion that the action of debt well lies in this case. The language of the law, it will be seen, is peculiar: "shall be liable" to pay the penalty of one hundred dollars, and shall be liable to imprisonment. The language of the law is not imperative, but permissive, and in looking through the internal revenue laws upon the subject of penalties, it will be observed that the language varies in different cases. Sometimes the law speaks imperatively, as that the party guilty of the offense, or performing or not performing the act, shall suffer in a particular way by a penalty or by imprisonment. In other cases the law speaks in a permissive form, as that the party may be subject or liable to a particular penalty, and it would seem as though there was some object in this different phraseology of the law. For example, where the law made it compulsory on the court to impose the penalty, there the court could not vary from the demands of the law. But where the law only declared that the party might be liable to such a penalty named, and might be liable to imprisonment, there the language of the law does not seem to make it compulsory upon the court to include both. It would seem, in such case, to be a matter within the sound discretion of the court.

Motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment overruled.

Case No. 15,143.

UNITED STATES v. FOULKE.

[6 McLean, 349.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. April Term, 1855.

CRIMINAL LAW—REASONABLE DOUBT—WHAT IS—EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL.

1. The jury are to weigh the evidence in every case, and where there is a conflict in a criminal case which creates reasonable doubt, they will acquit the accused.

2. These doubts should not arise from our sympathies or hopes, but from a deliberate consideration of the evidence.

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Upton, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant stands charged, gentlemen of the jury, with stealing a letter out of the mail containing money, he being a post-master. Mr. Chapman, who acts as special agent for the post-office department, states that the defendant was post-master at Moultrie, situated on the railroad to Cleveland. The witness mailed a letter at New Franklin post-office, Stark county, addressed to the post-master at Osnaburg, with a request that it should be returned to Cleveland. There was but one office, Paris, between New Franklin and Osnaburg. The letter contained a ten dollar bank note. This letter was received by the post-master at Osnaburg, which is thirteen miles west of Moultrie. Mr. Koons, the post-master at Osnaburg, states that he received the letter from Chapman and forwarded it the next day, the 21st July, to Cleveland. It had to pass through Paris and New Franklin before it reached Moultrie post-office, on the railroad. The letter was directed to one Milton, Cleveland, requesting him to make and forward to the writer a plow. A fictitious name was signed to the letter. Mr. Chapman states that on the evening of the 21st of July, he received from Cleveland, by the conductor of the train, the same ten dollar note he enclosed in the above letter. The post-master of Paris, which was the first office after it left Osnaburg, states that he took, on the 21st, no letter out of the mail which was not directed to his office. The post-master at New Franklin also stated that he took no letter out of the mail which was not directed to his office. The next was the Moultrie office. Mr. Cleland, the conductor of the train, states that, on the 21st of July, the defendant was post-master at Moultrie, and kept a tavern. He generally received the mail from the cars and changed it. On the above day, the defendant asked him to change a ten dollar bill, as he wanted small bills, and the witness gave him smaller notes for the bill which he identified, and that was the bill which he on the same day handed to Chapman, the agent of the post-office department. Mr. Grey, assistant post-master, at Cleveland, was requested by Chapman to look for the letter he had caused to be forwarded, which he did on the evening of the 21st of July, and for several evenings afterwards, but no such letter has been received at the Cleveland post-office. Mr. Meeker was present when Cleland, the conductor, changed the bill at the request of the defendant. Cleland at first objected to the bill as not good, but Foulke assured him it was good and that he would be responsible for it. Mr. Arnold saw Cleland and Foulke talking together on the above day, but did not hear the conversation.

Defendants' witnesses: Mr. Randolph, being called by the defendant, states that he saw defendant on the 21st of July, 1853, in Chambersburg. He was arrested about the 9th of August. On the 21st he saw A. Koons, the post-master at Osnaburg, at Root's, in Chambersburg. Mr. Root came across the street and spoke to defendant, taking him out of the crowd. Witness saw they had money passing between them, and the witness says the defendant got a $10 bill of Root, in the presence of three or four persons who witnessed the exchange. The bill received by Foulke was doubted at first. The witness had the $10 bill in his hand. The bill had two crosses near the letter B. The bill being presented to the witness, he believes it to be the same. Samuel Loder was at Chambersburg on the eve of the 21st or 22d of July, 1853, and heard Randolph, Foulke and Harris talking together, witness being present. They talked about the ten dollar bill. Witness on looking at it thought it was not good. He saw Root in close proximity with Foulke. Witness thought the bill was not good. Witness has known Root five years. Witness stood near Randolph. Mr. Harris was at Chambersburg on the 22d or 23d of July. He thinks Loder took up some work. Witness lived with Loder. Witness saw Mr. Root come down, call Foulke out and change some money with him; handed the bill to Randolph; Foulke had the note, but does not know the size of it; and witness saw Foulke give change for the note; heard Mr. Randolph say it was a base counterfeit. Mr. Thomas lives in Chambersburg. On the 22d of July, 1853, had some hands at work who came to his house on the same evening, and he made an entry of the date as above. Witness saw a bill in the hands of the defendant, who said it did not look like a good bill. Root said if it were not good he would make it good. Witness did not examine the bill, and did not know the amount of it. On the same evening a wagon and sulky were taken away by Mr. Randolph. Joseph Estel was the mail carrier about five months, and was the carrier at the above time, three times a week each way—Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays. Mr. Lever, Mr. Wallace, John McClury, Wm. H. Gill, Wm. W. Hamilton, Charles M. Austin, Judge Riddle, Joseph H. Quinn and Mr. Aster were sworn, all of whom testified to the good character of the defendant. They represented him as having filled various responsible trusts, and exercising great influence with the people of his county.

The plaintiffs called some rebutting witnesses. Mr. Root says he is the brother-in-law of Koons; that he had some dealings with the defendant the latter part of May or the beginning of June; bought a horse from defendant; paid thirty dollars, and gave a note for the balance; that he sold goods, and had more accounts against the defendant. Chambersburg was only a few miles from Moultrie. Mr. Koons says he was not at Chambersburg on the 21st of July; that he was there on the 20th, and a short time afterwards; that he never promised Root to change a bill for him with the defendant.

The defendant then called Mr. Eustine, who says, he heard Root say he had changed with Foulke a ten dollar bill, which was suspected; and that he promised to make it good if it were not so.

This is the substance of the testimony, gentlemen; and it is your duty to consider it well, and to come to a decision as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. If the postmasters of Osnaburg and New Franklin have sworn truly, the letter was mailed at Osnaburg, and, passing through the New Franklin office, in all probability was received at the Moultrie office: and, if the conductor of the train, Mr. Cleland, and the post-office agent, Chapman, remember correctly, the note which the latter endorsed to test, as he says, the Moultrie office, was received by the conductor from the defendant on the 21st of July, and handed by him to Chapman, the agent, on the same day. And, as the conductor was apprised by the agent of the experiment, both he and the agent would necessarily charge their memories with the facts and the date. These witnesses are not impeached.

The defense rests mainly on the fact alleged, that the identical note was received by the defendant from Roth on the 21st of July, the same day the conductor received the note from the defendant. The witnesses vary somewhat as to the time the note was received by the defendant from Roth. It was sometime in the afternoon. Now, if this note was not received until after the cars had passed the Moultrie office, the defense must fail. Chambersburg is but a short distance from Moultrie. Supposing the note received from Roth was the identical note passed to the conductor by the defendant, there is no question that he must have received it from Roth, and returned to his office before the cars arrived. It is said that the daughter of the defendant, in the absence of her father, generally opened the mail.

The attempt is openly avowed to implicate Mr. Koons, the postmaster at Osnaburg, in this transaction. The letter in question was enclosed to Mr. Koons by Chapman, open, and he stated the object. It is then suggested that Koons had the power to abstract the letter, hand it to his brother-in-law, Roth, who passed it off to Foulke with the view of entrapping him. Mr. Koons was not suspected by the agent of the postoffice department, nor is there any evidence, beyond what you have heard, to cause suspicion against him. Koons swears he was not at Chambersburg on the 21st of July, and the same is corroborated by the oath of Roth, his brother-in-law; and one or two of the other witnesses state, that it was on the twenty-second or third that the ten dollar note was passed to Foulke by Roth. But, several of the witnesses say that the note was passed to the defendant on the 21st; and they identify the note now presented to them by a mark which was observed at the time; and here, too, the witnesses state facts which would be likely to remain impressed upon their memory. The note was minutely examined by Mr. Randolph and others, as it was suspected to be a counterfeit; and several of them, on looking at the note now, are able to identify it by certain marks which were observed when they saw it at Chambersburg.

If this evidence be false, it has been most ingeniously contrived. But, such a supposition most seriously implicates the defendant's witnesses, who have not been impeached, and who appear to be respectable. It will be your duty, gentlemen, to reconcile the testimony if you can; but, if this can not be done, it will become your painful duty to weigh the facts, and decide where the truth lies. By a large number of respectable witnesses the defendant has shown a good character. This the law permits, from the infirmity of human testimony, and for the safety of the accused. Where an individual has so acted as to secure the confidence and good feeling of his neighbors, and of those with whom he has had intercourse or business, he will not be supposed, except upon the clearest evidence, at once to abandon so desirable an inheritance. There may be such instances, but they form exceptions to the general rule.

You, gentlemen, are to judge of the weight of evidence, and the credibility of witnesses. There is no tribunal but that before which we must all appear, which can rightly judge of the motives of human action. We have no such standard; and, at best, we can only determine matters of controversy, civil and criminal, on the highest probability of facts, from the evidence. But, in every criminal case, where a conviction is utterly ruinous to the accused, a jury will acquit, if they have reasonable doubts of his guilt; but, these doubts must not arise from our sympathies, but from a deliberate consideration of the evidence.

The jury found the defendant not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. FOUR CASES. See Case No. 4,986.

Case No. 15,144.

UNITED STATES v. FOUR CASES CUTLERY.

[1 Hunt, Mer. Mag. 166.]

District Court, S. D. New York. August, 1839.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — FALSE INVOICE — FORFEITURES.

Suit by the United States against four cases of cutlery, Edward Leon and Theodore Myers, claimants and defendants, trading as Edward Leon & Co. The amount of the invoice was £127. 13s. 9d.; the valuation of the custom-house appraisers, £191. 17s. 7d.,—difference, or supposed undervaluation, £64. 3s. 10d.

Various witnesses were examined, and a variety of opinions expressed, as to the value of the goods. The weight of testimony, however, converged to one point, namely, that on manufactured articles, of which labor constituted the principal value, and this fluctuating in price from ten to fifteen, and sometimes twenty per cent., and the articles, when manufactured, being frequently sold by small dealers at reduced prices to raise money, it was possible that the goods in question might have been bought at invoice prices, and more than probable that they were so.

BETTS, District Judge (charging jury). It is not enough for the government to show that goods are invoiced at a low rate, but they are bound to prove that the invoice is made out with the intent to defraud. It remains merely for the jury to decide: (1) Has this invoice been so made out? (2) Have the government shown this, either by proof direct or inferential? Or, (3) have the defendants shown that they were invoiced at their fair market value? It is a simple question of fact which they are to decide.

The jury retired, and made up a sealed verdict instanter for the defendants.

Case No. 15,145.

UNITED STATES v. FOUR CASES OF LASTINGS.

[10 Ben. 371.] [1]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1879.

FALSE INVOICES — FORFEITURE — BONA FIDE PURCHASER — REV. ST. §§ 13, 2864.

1. The act of March 3, 1863, c. 76, § 1 (12 Stat. 738), provided that in case of the knowingly entering goods by means of a false invoice, etc., the goods or the value thereof should be forfeited. In embodying this statute in the Revised Statutes (section 2864), the words "or the value thereof" were omitted, and the act of 1863 was repealed. By the act of 1875, c. 80 (18 Stat. 319), passed February 18, 1875, section 2864 was amended by restoring the words "or the value thereof." After the passage of the Revised Statutes, but before the passage of the amending act of 1875, certain goods were knowingly entered by means of false invoices:

[1] [Reported by Robert D. Benedict, Esq., and B. Lincoln Benedict, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

2. Held that, under the statute in force at the time of the entry, the forfeiture of the goods was absolute, and that it was not a case of a forfeiture of the goods or of their value at the election of the United States, and therefore a transfer for value to a bona fide purchaser or pledgee before suit brought gave no title as against the United States.

[Cited in U. S. v. Auffmardt, 19 Fed. 901.]

3. That, if the act of 1875 was a repeal by implication of Rev. St. § 2864, the right of the United States was not thereby defeated, although the act of 1875 contained no saving clause as to forfeitures already incurred, because that act is subject to the provisions of Rev. St. § 13, which provides that "the repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture or liability under such statute unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide."

At law.

George Bliss, for the United States.
James M. Smith, for claimants.

CHOATE, District Judge. This is a motion for a new trial for error of law after a verdict for the government. The suit was by information to enforce a forfeiture against the goods seized, among other grounds as having been entered by means of a false invoice, under section 2864 of the Revised Statutes. By that section, the forfeiture declared is the forfeiture of the merchandise simply, without the alternative remedy for the value thereof, which was the form of the forfeiture declared by the act of 1863, of which this section is, with some changes, a re-enactment. The alleged unlawful entry took place while section 2864 was in force, and an absolute forfeiture of this kind with no alternative has been held to vest the title to the goods immediately in the United States, although a seizure and judicial proceedings were required afterwards to enforce it; but when these were had, the title of the United States, by relation, takes effect from the time of the unlawful entry, thus excluding any right or title, afterwards and before the seizure, acquired in the goods even by a bona fide purchaser or pledgee for value. Henderson's Distilled Spirits, 14 Wall. [81 U. S.] 57. After the entry but before the seizure or commencement of this suit, the act of February 18, 1875, entitled "An act to correct errors and to supply omissions in the Revised Statutes of the United States," was passed, whereby section 2864 was amended by inserting the words "or the value thereof" after the word "merchandise," so that from the time of the passage of this act the nature of the forfeiture declared for this particular illegal act is not an absolute forfeiture vesting the title at once in the United States, but a forfeiture at the election of the United States, not taking effect so as to vest the title till by seizure or suit brought that election is made. Caldwell v. U. S., 8 How. [49 U. S.] 366. Under this later statute the intervening title of a third party acquired in good faith and without notice is protected. Caldwell v. U. S., ut supra. In this case the goods before the seizure had passed into the possession of the claimants, Field, Morris, Fenner & Co., auctioneers, who had made advances thereon to the consignee, and their good faith and entire want of notice of the illegal acts were not contested. The court was asked to instruct the jury that "if they believed that the claimants came into possession of the goods bona fide and without notice of any fraud on the government, the government cannot claim a forfeiture of the goods under section 2839 or 2864 of the statute after said goods came into the possession of the claimants." It is for alleged error in refusing this instruction that the motion for a new trial is made.

It is insisted by the learned counsel for the claimants that the act of 1875 repealed section 2864 of the Revised Statutes, substituting a new and different provision of law in its place, and that the repeal of a law imposing a penalty or forfeiture, even though the forfeiture is declared absolutely by the law repealed, takes away all remedy to enforce such forfeiture, unless the repealing act expressly saves the right to enforce such forfeiture accruing under the repealed statute. This familiar principle, as applied to the repeal of criminal and strictly penal statutes, has been also held applicable to statutes imposing forfeitures of the nature of that declared by the custom laws. The Rachel v. U. S., 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 329; Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch [9 U. S.] 281. See, also, Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 95; U. S. v. Passmore, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 372.

It is true that the act of 1875 contained no saving clause, and it may well be held to have operated as a repeal of section 2864 within the meaning of this rule; but it was subject to the provisions of section 13 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows: "The repeal of any statute shall not have the effect to release or extinguish any penalty, forfeiture or liability incurred under such statute, unless the repealing act shall so expressly provide, and such statute shall be treated as still remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any proper action or prosecution for the enforcement of such penalty, forfeiture or liability." Motion denied.

Case No. 15,146.

UNITED STATES v. FOUR CASES PRINTED MERINOES.

[2 Paine, 200.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1835.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — FRAUDULENT ENTRY — OWNERSHIP OF GOODS.

1. Upon the question whether goods were fraudulently entered, the court ought to be liberal in the admission of evidence which has a bearing, even in a remote degree, upon the point to be made out.

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

2. But circumstances which are offered to show the fraud, should be of a character fairly and reasonably tending to make it out. If irrelevant, or relating to a matter immaterial to the point of inquiry, they are not admissible.

[Cited in U. S. v. One Hundred and Forty-Six Thousand Six Hundred and Fifty Clapboards, Case No. 15,935.]

3. Goods were entered by one of the claimants, and the oath taken by him on entry, was the one prescribed by the act of congress to be taken in cases where the goods have been actually purchased. Afterwards, the goods were proceeded against under section 14 of the act of July 14, 1832 [4 Stat. 593], on the ground that the packages were made up with intent to evade and defraud the revenue. Evidence that the claimants were not owners of the goods at the time of entry, but only consignees, and that the real owners were the manufacturers of the goods, who resided abroad, was held irrelevant and inadmissible.

[Error to the district court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

[This was a proceeding by the United States against four cases of printed merinoes, Harvey & Stagg, claimants, on the charge of an intent to defraud the revenue. The district court rendered judgment in favor of the government (case unreported), and the case is now before this court on a writ of error to that judgment.]

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. The record in this case is brought up by writ of error from the district court for the Southern district of New York. It is an information filed under the 14th section of the act of July 14, 1832. The information contains three counts, but no question arises in this case under the two first counts. The third count claims a forfeiture of the goods under the allegation that the packages were made up with intent to evade and defraud the revenue of the United States. The entry at the custom-house was made by Joseph Harvey, one of the claimants; and the oath taken by him, was the one prescribed by the act of March 1, 1823 (7 Laws U. S. [Bior. & D.] 123 [3 Stat. 729]), to be taken in cases where the goods have been actually purchased. Upon the trial, it was offered on the part of the United States to prove that the claimants, Harvey & Stagg, were not the owners of the goods at the time of the importation and entry thereof, but that the said goods were then owned by Harvey, Tyrol & Co., the manufacturers thereof, who resided in England, and that the said Harvey & Stagg were merely the consignees of said goods. This evidence was objected to on the part of the claimants, and overruled by the court; and the only question in this case is, whether the evidence so offered was admissible. Upon the question whether the entry was fraudulent or not, the court ought to be liberal in the admission of evidence which has a bearing, even in a remote degree, upon the point to be made out. Generally, the fraud is to be made out by circumstances, but such circumstances must be of a character fairly and reasonably tending to make out the matter of fraud; if irrelevant, or relating to a matter immaterial to the question or point of inquiry, there can be no propriety in admitting such evidence. Under such a course of practice in the trial of causes, there would be no settled rule by which the court would be governed.

An admission of the truth of the fact offered to be proved, could have made no difference in the result; the evidence was irrelevant. As to the effect of the admission of irrelevant testimony, see 2 Grah. & W. New Trials, p. 603 et seq. See the following cases: The Isabella [Case No. 7,101]; The William Gray [Id. 17,694]; The Enterprise [Id. 4,499]; The Cotton Planter [Id. 3,270]; U. S. v. Nine Packages of Linen [Id. 15,884]; U. S. v. Morris [Id. 15,816]; The Active [Id. 35]; The Ann Maria [Id. 427]; U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [Id. 15,924]; Sixty-five Chests of Tea v. U. S. [Id. 12,916]. The point of inquiry was, whether the entry and oath were made with intent to evade or defraud the revenue; but the duties were the same whether the claimants were the real owners or only consignees of the goods, and no fraud upon the revenue could have been intended. The law requiring the invoice to be verified by the oath of the non-resident owner, and authenticated by a consul or commercial agent of the United States, can have no bearing upon the question of fraudulent intent to evade or defraud the revenue. The evidence was, therefore, properly rejected. The judgment of the district court is, accordingly, affirmed.

District Court, D. Rhode Island. 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FAILURE TO STAMP — FORFEITURE.

This is an information brought by the United States district attorney in a cause of seizure for violation of the internal revenue laws, made by the collector of internal revenue for the First collection district of Rhode Island, on the 6th day of December, 1869. The information alleged, among other things, that the owner evaded the internal revenue laws of the United States by not putting proper stamps upon his barrels of ale at the time of sale, and not paying the taxes imposed by said laws. Said property was taken possession of by the marshal, notice issued for claimants to appear, and, no person appearing to claim said property, it was de-cleared forfeited, and a warrant of sale issued to the marshal to sell the same, and make return thereof to said court on or before the 19th day of January, 1870.

UNITED STATES v. FOUR HUNDRED AND SIXTY-NINE BARRELS OF SPIRITS.

[10 Int. Rev. Rec. 205.]

District Court, E. D. Missouri. 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE — ORDER TO PRODUCE BOOKS —FORFEITURE.

Where the United States in proceeding against certain spirits for forfeiture obtained an order upon the claimants to produce their books upon the day set for trial, or on default thereof the prosecution might have judgment, held, such order can properly issue under the act of 1789 [1 Stat. 73], and failure to produce the books accordingly, unexplained, would entitle the United States to have forfeiture.

[Cited in U. S. v. Distillery No. 28, Case No. 14,966.]

At the commencement of the proceedings the district attorney asked for the books of the claimants [G. S. Matteson, of New Orleans, and E. R. Goodell, of Springfield, Ill.], for the production of which the court passed an order on the 4th of January.

Mr. Noble, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Ex-Senator Doolittle, Col. J. O. Broadhead, and Mr. Sharp, for claimants.

Col. Broadhead said that the notice of the production of the books was served on his partner, Mr. Sharp, and that he found it a few days ago amongst his papers. He overlooked the matter, and when his client, Mr. Matteson, came down a telegram was sent immediately to New Orleans to have the books sent by express. The order should, he thought, have been served on the parties themselves to entitle the government to any right growing out of the fact that the books had not been produced.

Gen. Noble—I hold I am entitled to a default, and a forfeiture of this property, unless they produce those books.

TREAT, District Judge. It was so held by this court, and the point was taken up to the circuit court, elaborately considered and affirmed. [Cases unreported.]

Gen. Noble said he was entitled to the books and could not open the case without knowing what evidence he had. He asked for the action of the court upon the order.

Mr. Doolittle said he understood the learned counsel for the United States contended that if those books were not produced upon the instant, under those circumstances he was entitled to a judgment against the parties for the whole amount of that property.

The District Attorney—I demand that, on the decision of the court affirmed by the circuit court of this circuit.

Mr. Doolittle supposed that if the court had made such a decision, it was where service had been made upon the party, and where the party was supposed to have been guilty of a contempt of the order of the court. There can be no contempt without knowledge. In this case it would seem a very extraordinary hardship, the first notice that the books were required, only having been brought home to the claimants two or three days since, a telegram being sent immediately and the books being expected to reach here. That such a harsh remedy should be sought by the United States, seemed to him a little extraordinary at least, as he supposed the great government of the United States desired to do justice. In such a case service of the order on the attorney was not sufficient; service must be on the party.

The district attorney argued that service on the attorney was sufficient. As for the matter of the justice, the great government of the United States is as much bound and restrained in this court by law as the most humble applicant for justice who appeared within these walls. All he asked was that all parties might be bound by the law as administered in that court, and not that a loose manner of proceeding should be allowed, and the government stagger into a case blindfolded.

Mr. Doolittle admitted that for some purposes service on the attorney was sufficient, but it was not where punishment of a party was asked for contempt.

TREAT, District Judge, said the point under consideration had been fully presented to the court some time ago, and after mature deliberation the court reached its conclusion with respect to it and acted accordingly; as he had said before, the matter was taken to the circuit court, where it was very well considered and an elaborate opinion given in regard to it. Under the act of 1789 a party may procure upon the other party in such proceedings an order of that character, which order has to be complied with, or an excuse given under oath for non-compliance with it. The consequences were determined by the statute itself. The sufficiency or insufficiency of the excuse has to be determined on the incoming of it. In the present case it seemed a matter of oversight to some extent. The difficulty was that the case was now before the court, and that on the incoming of such an excuse, if it was sufficient, it involved a postponement of that matter. The law in regard to it was that at the time of the trial the books must be produced or an excuse given under oath, by the party himself, why he did not produce them.

Col. Broadhead said that Mr. Matteson was expected that evening; he was detained by sickness in his family.

Gen. Noble to Col. B.—Will you produce the books?

Col. Broadhead—We will do so if we can get them.

Gen. Noble said he did not make the motion from frivolity and he desired nothing but that which the law which he invoked entitled him to.

THE COURT postponed further proceedings to allow the claimant to make an affidavit this morning in regard to the matter.

BONDS—PENAL ACTION—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—DIVISION OF DISTRICT.

1. Proceedings by libel were instituted upon a seizure of goods, and a bond given for their appraised value on the delivery of the goods to the claimant. Afterwards the libel was by amendment changed to an information, and the goods were condemned. On an application for an attachment against the obligors in the bond, it was held, that although the case was not regularly within the 89th section of the collection law, yet a compliance with the stipulations in the bond might be enforced by attachment against the obligors.

[Cited in U. S. v. Three Hundred Barrels of Whisky, Case No. 16,510; Todd v. The Tulchen, 2 Fed. 603.]

2. And the court held, that it made no difference that the obligors were only sureties, and had not themselves received the goods.

3. If the claimant is not a party to the bond, all the obligors are to be deemed principals.

4. The bond was taken in the district court of New-York, and under the statute dividing the district the proceedings were transferred to the district court of the Northern district, and by a subsequent statute to this court, where the condemnation took place. The condition of the bond was to pay the appraised value of the goods into the district court, if they should be condemned in that court: Held, that a condemnation in this court had the same effect to forfeit the bond.

J. O. Hoffman, for defendant.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice. On the 19th day of July, in the year 1813, Joseph Kauman, John I. Labouisse, and Nicholas M. Delonguemare, entered into a bond to the United States in the penalty of four thousand four hundred and seventy-six dollars, reciting the seizure and libel of certain articles of merchandise in the district court for the district of New-York; and that the goods in question in this case had, by consent of parties, been appraised at two thousand three hundred and eighty-eight dollars, and concluding with a condition, that the bond should be void if the obligors or either of them should pay into the district court the said sum of two thousand three hundred and eighty-eight dollars, in case the said goods should, by sentence and decree of the district court, be adjudged to be forfeited or condemned to the use of the United States, within twenty days after the sentence and decree should be pronounced. With some other stipulations in case of acquittal, not necessary here to be noticed. At the last term of this court a rule was granted, requiring the obligors in the bond to show cause why they should not comply with the stipulation contained in the condition of their bond. That rule has been served only upon Delonguemare, and he appears now, and presents his affidavit, alleging, that he was security only; that he never had the goods in his possession, or the proceeds thereof, and that he has no indemnity.

This appears to be a cause of long standing; and a brief statement of some of the leading circumstances attending it, may be necessary to a right understanding of the decision.

The libel was filed in April, 1813, as upon a seizure made on navigable waters, and the proceedings carried on according to the course of the admiralty. At this time the whole state of New-York was comprised within one district. The seizure having been made in the northern part of the state, it became necessary, under the act of congress dividing the state into two districts, to transfer the proceedings into the district court for the Northern district. And before the determination of the cause, the attorney of that district was appointed the judge of the court, which made it necessary, under another act of congress, to transfer the cause to this court. In September term, 1824, the libel was so amended, as to make it an information in rem, according to the course of the exchequer, in conformity to the rule laid down by the supreme court of the United States in the case of The Sarah, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 391, that in cases of seizures made on land, under the revenue laws, the district court proceeds as a court of common law, according to the course of the exchequer on informations in rem, and the trial of issues of fact is to be by jury; but in cases of seizure on water navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burthen, the court proceeds as an instance court of admiralty, by libel, and the trial is to be by the court.

The goods in the present case have been condemned in this court; and the question now arises, whether the effect of the decree or judgment of condemnation can be obtained upon the above mentioned bond; and this question divides itself into two considerations: (1) Whether this court has authority to enforce a compliance with the stipulations in the bond by attachment. (2) Whether Delonguemare under the circumstances of the case is exonerated from his responsibility. It was undoubtedly supposed when this bond was given, that it was authorized by the provisions of the 89th section of the act of 2d March, 1799, regulating the collection of duties, &c. (3 Laws, Bior. & D. 221 [1 Stat. 695]), and the whole proceeding in the district court, was under the impression, that it was immaterial whether the seizure was upon the land or water; that in both cases it was according to the course of the admiralty; and such is believed to have been the general, if not the universal course, until the decision in the case of The Sarah. It is equally certain, that this was not a case coming within the 89th section of the duty act. But it does not follow, that the bond is therefore void: It was voluntarily given: It was not in violation of any statute nor against good morals, or any general principles of law: It was for a valuable consideration; and I am not aware of any substantial objection to its validity, that could be made in a direct suit upon it at law. The taking of the bond was the act of the court, and not of the United States, or the custom-house officers who were the parties interested in the seizure; and the obligors in the bond, who have thereby taken the property out of the custody of the court, are estopped from setting up any informality in the taking of the bond. If the proceedings in this cause had properly been upon the admiralty side of the court, there could be no question as to the authority of the court to enforce a compliance with this bond in the manner now prayed for; nor do I think any substantial objection now exists.

In the case of The Alligator [Case No. 248], it was held that the district court, by virtue of its general admiralty powers, may deliver property on bail; and whether the security be taken by bond, or stipulation is immaterial; that on such security a summary judgment may be entered; nor is it material whether there be any statute authorizing the delivery on bond or not. The court having jurisdiction of the principal cause, must possess jurisdiction over all the incidents, and may, by monition, attachment, or execution, enforce its decrees, against all who become parties to the proceedings. So, in the case of The Struggle [Id. 13,550] a bond voluntarily given upon the delivery of property on bail, on the application of the claimant, was held good, although the condition was not in conformity to the 89th section of the duty act; and that the obligors in the bond were estopped from contesting the validity of the security.

The case of Burke v. Trevitt [Case No. 2,163] is still more applicable to the present. It is there held that the district court, as a court of revenue, has jurisdiction of all seizures, under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, and may entertain suits for the condemnation or acquittal of property so seized; and as an incident to such jurisdiction, may compel a re-delivery of the property, or its value, into the possession of those who may be ultimately entitled to it; and that it was immaterial, whether such a proceeding be enforced by way of original suit, or by a summary decretal order, in a cause already before the court. And the same principle has been fully sanctioned by the supreme court of the United States in the case of Slocum v. Mayberry, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 9, where it is said, that the judiciary act gives to the courts of the United States exclusive cognizance of all seizures made on land and water; and having cognizance of the seizure, may enforce a redelivery of the thing, by attachment or other summary proceeding against the party who should devest such possession. That this court has authority in a summary way, to enforce a compliance with the stipulations in the bond, is fully established by these cases.

2. And the next inquiry is, whether the present is a proper case for the exercise of such authority. Delonguemare seeks to exonerate himself on the ground, that he was surety only in the bond, and has no indemnity, and that he never had any of the proceeds of the goods. If there was any weight in the allegation, that he was only surety, there would be some difficulty under the circumstances of the case, in extending to him any relief on this ground. It does not appear by the bond, who were principals, and who sureties. And if we look into the libel and proceedings in the cause, one Handy, who is no party to the bond, appears to have been the claimant of the goods; and if so, Delonguemare, is as much a principal as any other of the parties named in the bond; all must be deemed principals. The bond is the substitute for the goods; and to permit a party to the bond, to set up that he had not the possession of the goods, would be in effect making such bonds mere nullities; and the surety would in no case be responsible. For it is presumed that the goods always go into the possession of the claimant. It is said, however, that the bond has not been forfeited; that the event has not occurred upon which the obligors in the bond became bound to bring the money into court, because the condemnation was in this court, and not in the district court, according to the letter of the bond. This objection is certainly not well founded. The true sense and legal construction of the bond must be, that the money was to be brought into court within twenty days after the legal and final condemnation of the goods; and when this is pronounced by the court having jurisdiction of the cause, it is all that could be required under the acts of congress in relation to the district courts in this state. This court, for the purpose of hearing and determining the present case, became substituted in the place of the district court. A state of things might have existed, when the obligors in the bond would not have been willing to have been bound by so literal a construction of the bond. Suppose the goods had been condemned in the district court, and the decree on appeal had been reversed, and the goods acquitted; there would have been a forfeiture of the bond, according to the strict letter; but no one would suppose that the money must, notwithstanding the acquittal, be brought into court. The court must be governed in the interpretation of the bond by its legal effect and operation; and the remedy upon it is the same as if the cause had remained in the district court, and the condemnation taken place there. No sufficient cause to the contrary therefore having been shown, the attachment must be issued.

Case No. 15,151.

UNITED STATES v. FOURTEEN PACKAGES OF PINS.

[1 Gilp. 235.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. March 5, 1832.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—UNDERVALUATION—FORFEITURE—TRIAL—JURY.

1. Where a seizure is made on land under the laws of impost, the claimant has a right to a trial by jury.

[Cited in Waring v. Clarke, 5 How. (46 U. S.) 486; U. S. v. Athens Armory, Case No. 14,473.]

2. On an information for forfeiture of goods, subject to ad valorem duty, the appraisement of the public appraisers is a necessary and preparatory proceeding and is prima facie evidence.

3. The assistant appraisers of goods subject to ad valorem duty, under the act of May 28, 1830 [4 Stat. 409], are in aid of those under the act of March 1, 1823 [3 Stat. 729], and an appraisement by each set is not necessary.

4. A false valuation in an invoice of goods subject to ad valorem duty, is a price charged in the invoice, less than the fair and just buying and selling prices, at the time and place where the invoice was made up.

5. To subject goods to forfeiture, for a false valuation, it must be accompanied by a fraudulent intent and design.

6. Where a new penalty is imposed, for a violation of the laws of impost previously defined, it may be enforced, though unknown to the claimant at the time of the violation.

7. Where, on an information for forfeiture, a claim and answer are filed by an agent and consignee, for the owner, and the jury are sworn to try an issue between the United States and the owner, the court will not, after verdict, grant a new trial, on the ground that the jury were incorrectly qualified.

[Cited in Seabury v. Field, Case No. 12,575.]

8. It is no invasion of the privilege of the jury for the court to present to them their views of the nature, bearing, tendency, and weight of the evidence.

[Cited in Nudd v. Burrows, 91 U. S. 439.]

[Cited in Territory v. Scott, 7 Mont. 407, 17 Pac. 629.]

9. The court are not bound to notice in the charge, a point of law embraced in the argument, unless their opinion upon it was explicitly required.

10. A juror ought to disregard his private knowledge, and to render his verdict solely on the legal and open testimony of the cause.

[1] [Reported by Henry D. Gilpin, Esq.]

On the 17th September, 1830, the attorney of the United States for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, filed an information against thirteen cases of pins, and one case of needles, imported into the port of Philadelphia, on the 4th August, 1830, from Liverpool in England, on board of the ship Alleghany. The information alleged, that the said goods were subject to ad valorem duty, and that the invoice thereof, and the packages themselves, were made up with intent, by a false valuation, to evade and defraud the revenue of the United States, whereby the same were forfeited; and due process of law for the condemnation of the goods in question, was prayed for. On the 12th November, 1830, William C. Cardwell and John Potter filed a claim to the said fourteen packages, as consignees of the same from, and for and on behalf of, their consignors Kirby, Beard & Kirby, of London, by whom, as they alleged, the said packages were in the regular course of business shipped from Great Britain and consigned to them. In answer to the information, the claimants denied that the invoice and packages were made up with intent, by a false valuation, to evade and defraud the revenue; and they submitted that if the allegation to that effect were true, it would not authorise a forfeiture, but only a reappraisement and increased duty under the act of congress of March 1, 1823. On the 8th April, 1831, the case came on to be tried before the district court, sitting as a court of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, under the provisions of the ninth section of the act of September 24, 1789 [1 Stat. 76].

Mr. Dallas, Dist. Atty., for the United States, offered evidence in support of the allegations set forth in the information. In the course of this evidence, it appeared that the fourteen packages had not been seized by the officers of the revenue, until after they had been landed, and that the first suspicion of fraud arose on an examination of them in the custom house stores.

Mr. Scott, for claimants.

Upon this evidence the case cannot be tried before the court, as one of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, but the claimants are entitled to a trial by jury. It is the place of seizure and not of committing the offence that decides the mode of trial. The ninth section of the act of 24th September, 1789, reserves to the parties the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it, which is the case here. 1 Story's Laws, 56 [1 Stat. 76]; U. S. v. La Vengeance, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 297; U. S. v. The Betsey and Charlotte, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 443; Whelan v. U. S., 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 112; The Sarah, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 394; The Margaret, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 427; Clark v. U. S. [Case No. 2,837]; The Isabella [Id. 7,101]; U. S. v. Nine Packages of Linen [Id. 15,884]; U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [Id. 15,924].

On the 17th June, HOPKINSON, District Judge, decided for the claimant, that as it appeared that the seizure in this case was made upon the land, it was to be tried by a jury. It was therefore ordered, that it be set down for trial by a jury, and that the information and claim be so amended as to be made conformable to an issue to be so tried.

On the 5th March, 1832, the case came on for trial before HOPKINSON, District Judge, and a special jury.

Mr. Gilpin, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

This information was founded on the fourth section of the act of congress of the 28th May, 1830, which is as follows: "The collectors of the customs shall cause at least one package out of every invoice, and one package at least out of every twenty packages of each invoice, and a greater number should he deem it necessary, of goods imported into the respective districts, which package or packages he shall have first designated on the invoice to be opened and examined, and if the same be found not to correspond with the invoice, or to be falsely charged in such invoice, the collector shall order forthwith all the goods contained in the same entry to be inspected; and if such goods be subject to ad valorem duty, the same shall be appraised, and if any package shall be found to contain any article not described in the invoice, or if such package or invoice be made up with intent by a false valuation, or extension or otherwise to evade or defraud the revenue, the same shall be forfeited." And the fifteenth section of the act of 1st March, 1823, and so much of any act of congress as imposes an additional duty or penalty of fifty per cent. on duties on any goods appraised at twenty-five or ten per cent. above their invoice, are repealed. 3 Story's Laws, 1887 [3 Stat. 735]; Pamph. Laws 1830, p. 106. Evidence was then given of the invoice of the goods in question, made by the manufacturers, Kirby, Beard & Kirby, on the 2d June, 1830, and their arrival in Philadelphia, and entry by Cardwell and Potter as consignees of the manufacturers and owners, on the 7th August following. It was also proved that one of the packages, on being opened and examined, was found to be falsely charged in the invoice, and therefore all the packages were examined and appraised by the public appraisers. On their appraisement being offered, it was objected to.

Mr. Scott, for claimants.

This appraisement is not evidence, because it is improperly made, and because it is no proof of fraudulent intent.

1. By the act of 1st March, 1823, two principal appraisers were appointed for this port, who are the persons by whom this appraisement was made. The act of 28th May, 1830, on which this information is founded, declares that the secretary of the treasury may appoint two assistant appraisers, whose appraisements are to be revised and corrected by the former. It evidently contemplates such a previous examination which did not take place in this instance. It is to give the merchant the benefit of appeal and revision. Though it is said these assistants "may" be appointed, it has been settled that such permission is compulsory in its character where the public have an interest in its fulfilment. 3 Story's Laws, 1887 [3 Stat. 735]; Rex v. Inhabitants of Derby, Skin. 370; Backwell's Case, 1 Vern. 152; Rex v. Barlow, 2 Salk. 609; Com. v. Gable, 7 Serg. & R. 426; Schaeffer v. Jack, 14 Serg. & R. 429; Newburgh & C. Turnpike Co. v. Miller, 5 Johns. Ch. 112; Malcom v. Rogers, 5 Cow. 188.

2. An appraisement is no evidence on a question of forfeiture; it is meant to ascertain what duties are to be charged; it is no evidence of value at the time and place of exportation.

HOPKINSON, District Judge, stopped the district attorney, who was about to reply, and admitted the evidence.

The act of 1st March, 1823, appoints two appraisers for this port; that provision of it has never been repealed expressly, but it is said to be virtually, by the section of the act of 28th May, 1830, which authorises the secretary of the treasury to appoint two assistant appraisers. I think not. The object of the last act was the public convenience; it authorised the appointment of four assistant appraisers in New York and two here. What are they to do, and what are their power and duty? To examine such goods as the principal appraisers may direct, should they be unable themselves to perform all that may be required, and need such additional aid. On the construction which has been given, the public business will not be assisted, but delayed. Every case may be subjected to a double examination. The business will not be distributed among the four officers, but must always pass under the notice of two in the first instance, with a correction or revision of the other two. By a double process the assistants are to report to the principals, and the principals to the collector. Such is not the intention of the law; these officers are to act for and under the principal appraisers when necessary; they are to be appointed by the secretary of the treasury when the public service requires an increased number of appraisers; but there is nothing compulsory upon him to make such increase, and nothing which makes them independent of, or distinct from the principal appraisers in the manner contended for. As to the second objection, it is sufficient to observe that this appraisement is required by the act of congress as the foundation of a forfeiture, as a preparatory step or proceeding in the course of forfeiture. It is therefore prima facie evidence, and as such properly introduced; but it is not conclusive; it may be rebutted or disproved by the claimants.

Mr. Gilpin, for the United States, in continuation.

The appraisement in question was then read together with a reappraisement by the same officers. The claimants being dissatisfied, a third appraisement was made by the same officers together with two merchants, selected by the claimants and approved by the collector, according to the provisions of the eighteenth section of the act of 1st March, 1823. This was also read; as was a smaller invoice or bill of sale of the same goods left at the custom house, as was alleged, by accident. Several witnesses, who had imported similar articles and received invoices, to which they referred, were examined to prove that the invoice in question was lower than the current market value at the time and place of exportation. 3 Story's Laws, 1888 [3 Stat. 736].

Mr. Scott, for claimants.

Testimony under a commission to England was read to prove, that the invoice prices were the actual value at the time when and place where it was made. But besides, it was said, the preparatory steps necessary to a forfeiture had not been taken. The appraisement by the merchants was under the act of 1st March, 1823. Where this act is inconsistent with that of 28th May, 1830, it is repealed pro tanto. The latter act prescribes a new mode of reappraisement where the owner is dissatisfied, the old mode is therefore repealed, yet it was adopted here. To sustain a forfeiture the law must be strictly complied with. To show that these goods are falsely valued, we must ascertain what the law means by a true valuation. This varies in the different acts relative to ad valorem duties. That of 3d March, 1817, 3 Story's Laws, 1633 [3 Stat. 369], fixes "the net cost of the article at the place whence imported" as the test; that of 20th April, 1818, 3 Story's Laws, 1680 [3 Stat. 433], "the actual cost;" that of 1st March, 1823, 3 Story's Laws, 1885 [3 Stat. 729], "the actual cost, if the goods have been actually purchased, or the actual value if the same have been procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time and place when and where purchased or procured;" that of 19th May, 1828, "the actual value at the time purchased, and place whence imported." The invoice, therefore, must contain the "actual value" of the goods to the manufacturers at the place of manufacture, and at the time they sent them to their agents here. It does so. We have their oath annexed to the invoice; and it is entitled to great weight. There is no evidence even attempting directly to disprove this. As to any fraudulent intent to violate the act of 28th May, 1830, it could not exist, for their invoice is dated 2d June, 1830, long before they could have known of its passage. Pamph. Laws 1828, p. 47; The Isabella [supra]; U. S. v. Nine Packages of Linen [supra]; U. S. v. Hayward [Case No. 15,336].

HOPKINSON, District Judge (charging jury). The information charges that the goods in question, being subject to an ad valorem duty, were imported into Philadelphia from Liverpool, in the ship Alleghany, and that the invoice and packages were made up with intent by a false valuation to evade and defraud the revenue of the United States. Two subjects or questions are thus submitted to your inquiry and deliberation: (1) Is the valuation of these pins, as it appears in the invoice, a false valuation? (2) If it is so, then, were this false valuation and the invoice made up with intention to defraud the revenue of the United States? The information is founded on the fourth section of the act of 28th May, 1830, which has been frequently referred to. The proof in support of the allegations of the information consists of official documents and parol testimony. You have before you a paper called the small invoice. It is dated at London, on the 2d of June; not at Liverpool, where the goods were shipped. It is for you to say what this paper is. Why was it prepared, and what use was to be made of it? It is said to be an estimate made for the export entry; but how could this be, as the particulars were not then known? You will make these inquiries and satisfy yourselves. The regular invoice is dated on the 24th of June. Both papers came with the ship. The first paper is not in form an invoice; the second is in the usual form. The first is like a common bill of sale, headed, "Messrs. Cardwell & Co. of Philadelphia, bought of Messrs. Kirby, Beard & Kirby." In it the valuation of the goods is higher than in the regular invoice. Why was this done? Does it afford ground for a reasonable suspicion, that the first paper contains the real value of the goods, and the price at which they were actually sold; and that the second was prepared for the custom house entry? It was on the second or regular invoice that the entry here was ordered, and the question is on this invoice. Does it exhibit a true or a false valuation of the goods? If it be true, then any suspicion arising from the other, is of no importance: for, if the goods were entered at their true value, by a true invoice, there has been no forfeiture or violation of the law. On the other hand, if this is a false invoice, then the character and object of the other invoice may be important in deciding upon the intention of the second. (The two papers were here referred to, and the prices particularly stated.) The first proceeding under the law, was the appraisement made by the official appraisers. Compare their valuation of the goods with that given in the invoice. The second appraisement was made by the special appraisers, to whom were added two others appointed by the consignees. This was done under the eighteenth section of the act of 1st March, 1823. From the appraisements, and from the evidence given to the jury by the appraisers, it appeared that extraordinary pains were taken to ascertain the value of the goods, and every means of information resorted to. The attention of the appraisers was particularly drawn to the proper inquiry, that of the value of the goods in the London market; they made all allowances for any change in the market, for any difference in the quality and weight of the pins. You will compare this with the previous appraisement, and can hardly fail to obtain a satisfactory knowledge of the true value of these articles, in the London market, at the time of their exportation.

In addition to these appraisements, numerous witnesses have been examined at the bar, dealers in the article, importers at the time of this importation, as well as before and after it. They produced their invoices, and stated the prices at which they made their purchases. Some of them made their importations at the same time with the claimants, from the same place, and even from the same manufactory. (The judge turned to the evidence of these witnesses, making observations explanatory of each.) You will also give due attention and weight to the testimony on the part of the claimants. It cannot have escaped your observation, that among the numerous importers of pins in this city or country, they have not produced one witness, to verify or support the prices of their invoice; not one importation or invoice; nor a single sale at these prices. They have a commission to England; but they have examined only two witnesses under it, although dealers in, and manufacturers of the article. They have not shown a single sale in London, or any part of England, of any pins of any quality, at the prices of their invoice, or near to them. You have, under this commission the testimony of Donald McIlvaine, with his opportunities of knowledge on the subject, as they appear from his own answers. His evidence, too, is hard to be reconciled with the letter of the claimants to John Bury, and their own invoice sent to him. The other witness, William Broughton, is a pin maker in the employ of the claimants; but says he has no exact knowledge of the prices. All the evidence which has been given of prices, or market value, or fair market value, or current value, or true value, or actual value, is to bring you to the same conclusion, to a satisfactory answer to the question you are trying, to wit, is the valuation of these goods in this invoice a "false valuation," which is the offence described in the act of congress of 1830, on which this information is founded? Were these goods really worth more in the London market? Were the buying and selling prices higher in that market than those charged in this invoice, at the time when this invoice was made up? However the phrases may vary in the different acts of congress, current value, actual value, or market value, the inquiry with you always is the same; does this invoice contain a true valuation of these pins, or a false one? The phraseology of the laws is important on this issue, only as it may assist you in answering and deciding the question whether these pins, or similar pins, were bought and sold in the London market, in June, 1830, at these prices? Or is the valuation false and untrue, and the prices not those at which such pins were bought and sold at that time and place? You are not to take a sale under particular circumstances which may have depressed or raised the price, but the fair and just price of buying and selling in the market.

If, upon a liberal and impartial view of the whole evidence, you shall come to the conclusion that the valuation in the invoice is false, it will then be your duty to inquire whether this has happened by accident, inadvertence, or mistake, or with intent to evade and defraud the revenue of the United States. The fact is not enough; it must be accompanied by the fraudulent intent and design. This is not often capable of direct, express proof, but the intention of the party, as in other similar cases, must be collected from all the facts and circumstances. In this inquiry, the amount of the undervaluation is important, because, if great, it is less likely to be a mistake, and because the difference offers a sufficient temptation in the diminution of the duties, to account for it. This is the part of the case peculiarly belonging to your office, and which you will make with all necessary caution, as the character of the claimants has been strongly pressed upon you to repel the suspicion of a deliberate, contrived fraud. How far these foreign manufacturers regard our revenue laws, or think there is much guilt in getting an advantage of them, you can better judge than the court. We have reason to believe that some dealers think every thing fair in a contest with a custom house, especially abroad. It is due to the consignees of this shipment, Messrs. Cardwell and Potter, to say that if there is any thing wrong in the business, they are not implicated in it. They entered the goods by the invoice which came to them with the goods.

The jury found a verdict for the United States.

On the 15th March, 1832, a motion was made on behalf of the claimants for a new trial, and the following reasons were filed:

I. Because the jury were sworn to try the issue between the United States and Kirby, Beard & Kirby, claimants, whereas no such issue exists upon the record.

II. Because the jury were incorrectly qualified.

III. Because the court erred: (1) In admitting in evidence the three several appraisements, for any other purpose than to prove the United States had taken the steps necessary to seizure (2) In admitting them in evidence for any purpose. (3) In admitting in evidence the invoices of John Siter, William Chaloner, Joseph Brown, and John Bury.

IV. Because the court, in the charge to the jury, erred: (1) In instructing them that there was nothing in the objection that the act of 28th May, 1830, was unknown to Kirby, Beard & Kirby, before they shipped the pins. (2) In instructing them that the appraisements were properly made, and the act of 28th May, 1830, did not, quoad hoc, repeal the section in the act of 1st March, 1823, relating to appraisement. (3) In instructing them that the paper called the small invoice was a suspicious paper, a false one, and such as to throw doubt on the transaction. (4) In instructing them that the appraisements were made with great care, and therefore entitled to great weight in their consideration. (5) In instructing them to consider John Siter's testimony as of special importance.

V. Because the court did not charge the jury on the rule of law pressed in argument by the counsel of the claimants, in reference to the testimony of Donald McIlvaine, viz. that he was entitled to belief unless impeached, and that no such attempt having been made, he stood before the jury entirely worthy of credit: but on the contrary, simply remarked, "it was strange he did not purchase at the prices named."

VI. Because the court told the jury that the claimants had known all the testimony of the United States for eighteen months, and yet produced none to contradict it; there being no proof of that knowledge given at the trial, and the court being entirely mistaken as to the fact.

VII. Because the general tenor of the charge of the court was such as to take away the question of fact from the jury.

VIII. Because the court remarked that it was extraordinary Kirby, Beard & Kirby, should have examined Broughton, a man in their own employ.

IX. Because the court erred in saying: (1) That the various expressions in the acts of congress on the subject of value and the computation of ad valorem duties, were unimportant in the case. (2) That to prove value at London, value at Manchester, Liverpool, and Warrington, could be a guide.

X. Because when the jury came in, and one of them asked whether, in making up his opinion, he was at liberty to avail himself of his own previous knowledge, the court replied "Your oath is to decide according to the evidence, this is the only proper guide for your decision."

XI. Because the court subsequently intimated to the same juror, that unanimity was not to be expected, and that he should endeavour to come to the opinion of his fellows.

On the 31st March, 1832, this motion was argued by Mr. Scott, for claimants, and Dist Atty. Gilpin, for the United States.

Mr. Scott, for claimants. The following cases were cited: Reniger v. Fogossa, Plow. 12; Partridge v. Strange, Id. 83; The Cotton-Planter [Case No. 3,270]; U. S. v. Nine Packages of Linen [supra]; Doebler v. Com., 3 Serg. & R. 237.

Mr. Gilpin, for the United States. The following cases were cited: 3 Bl. Comm. 375; U. S. v. Williams [Case No. 16,723]; Smith v. Parkhurst, Andrews, 321.

HOPKINSON, District Judge. Numerous reasons have been filed in this case against the verdict, and to support the motion on the part of the claimants, for a new trial. Some of them have not been touched, or insisted upon in the argument on the motion, and therefore will not require a particular attention from the court. Such as have been maintained in the argument will be considered and disposed of.

The first and second reasons are: "Because the jury were sworn to try the issue between the United States and Kirby, Beard & Kirby, claimants, whereas no such issue exists upon the record; and because the jury were incorrectly qualified." I have no doubt that the jury were properly sworn, both as regards the real parties in interest, and as they appear upon the record, but I shall put the dismission of this exception on another ground. The first four jurors called to the book were sworn to try the issue between the United States and Fourteen Packages of Goods, whereof Cardwell and Potter were claimants. The counsel for the claimants immediately interrupted the clerk, and observed to him that Cardwell and Potter were not the claimants, but the agents of the claimants, who were Kirby, Beard & Kirby, and that the jury should be so sworn. Under this direction, to which the district attorney assented, the four jurors were re-sworn according to it, and all the other jurors were also so sworn. It is now objected to the verdict, that the jury should not have been so sworn or qualified; that Kirby, Beard & Kirby are not the claimants on the record, but the issue was between the United States and Cardwell and Potter, claimants. Can it be imagined that a court, holding the power to set aside a verdict and grant a new trial, for the purposes of justice, would exercise that power under such circumstances, when the error, if any, was the error of the party who would now take advantage of it; and which is confessedly a mere matter of form, a pure technicality, having no influence or bearing on the merits of the case? It is impossible.

The next, or third class or head of reasons, relates to alleged errors of the court: (1 and

2) "In admitting the three appraisements to be read in evidence." This exception was passed over in the argument. Indeed I know not what could have been said for it, as the appraisements in question were not only a part of the proceedings directed in such cases by the act of congress, but were read to the jury on the express call of the counsel of the claimants. (3) "In admitting in evidence the invoices of John Siter, William Chaloner, Joseph Brown, and John Bury." As to the invoices of Siter, Chaloner, and Brown, they were neither offered nor given in evidence. These gentlemen had severally made importations of articles similar to those in question, and they were examined as to the prices they had paid for them. They did refer, without objection, to their invoices to assist their memory in ascertaining these prices; but the invoices were not read to the jury, nor, in any other manner, made a part of the evidence of the cause. No exception was taken or noted by the claimants to the decision of the court on the admissibility of the question, what were the prices paid by the witnesses for their articles, although the question was objected to; and as to the invoices, they were used in no other way than that mentioned. The invoice of John Bury was offered and read in evidence, and also the letter which accompanied it, because both the invoice and the letter came from the claimants, and were clearly evidence against them. If this were not so, their admission can afford no ground of exception to the verdict, as they were given to the jury without objection.

These are all the reasons founded on supposed errors of the court in the course of the trial.

The next class, the fourth, relates to alleged errors in the charge to the jury: (1) "In instructing the jury that there was nothing in the objection that the act of 28th May, 1830, was unknown to the house of Kirby, Beard & Kirby before they shipped the goods in question." I cannot withhold the expression of my surprise that this reason should be seriously urged to the court, however expedient it might have been to address it to a jury, to enlist their feelings for the claimants, on a supposed ignorance of the law they were offending. What are the purport and effect of the law of 28th May, 1830? Do they create a new offence, or make that unlawful, which was before lawful? Certainly not so. The offence committed was always a violation of the laws of the United States, visited by certain and severe penalties. But these penalties were found not to be adequate to prevent the offence: the temptations to cupidity were too strong to be restrained by an increase of duties on the goods which were falsely invoiced. The penalty was therefore enlarged to an entire and absolute forfeiture of the goods. The plea of the claimants is, we knew that by making up this false invoice, with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, we were violating a law of the United States, but we supposed that in case of detection we should suffer only by an increased charge upon our goods, and not by their forfeiture, and therefore, we are innocent: therefore we should be acquitted of all penalty, and the jury should so have rendered their verdict. This is a most extraordinary course of reasoning in law or morals. Besides, did Messrs. Kirby, Beard & Kirby require to have a knowledge of the enactments of the act of 28th May, 1830, to teach them that fraud and perjury are crimes every where, under all circumstances, and upon all subjects? Yet it was only by and through fraud and perjury that the offence, charged and proved upon them by the verdict of a most respectable and intelligent jury, could have been perpetrated. But, in their code of morals, fraud and perjury are nothing, unless they are to be followed by a forfeiture of goods. These remarks are reluctantly made; but they are rendered necessary by the perseverance and zeal with which this reason has been pressed, first upon the jury, and now again upon the court. (2) The second reason under the fourth head relates to the appraisements, and was not noticed in the argument. (3) The third reason under the same head, which relates to the small invoice, was also passed by in the argument. As to that paper, I told the jury, that there was a mystery about it, which had not been explained, not merely because it gave a different valuation to the goods from the regular invoice by which the goods were offered for entry, but that it purported to be a bill of sale from Kirby, Beard & Kirby, to Cardwell and Potter, when in truth no such sale was made, but the goods were sent to this country for and on account of Kirby, Beard & Kirby; and Cardwell and Potter were but the consignees, having no ownership in them and no interest but as consignees. I stated other circumstances which threw a cloud of suspicion over this part of the case, together with the explanations that were offered on the part of the claimants; and left the whole to the jury for their consideration with this observation; "The jury must say what this paper means, and whether it affords ground for reasonable suspicion of an unfair intention." (4) The fourth error, under this head, is "in instructing the jury that the appraisements were made with great care, and were therefore entitled to great weight in their consideration." As these appraisements were received in evidence, I cannot perceive in what was the error or the mischief, to say that they had been made with great care. The appraisers appeared before the jury, and made the same appraisements under their oaths taken here, as they had under their official oaths taken at the custom house. They explained particularly the time, which was several days, occupied in the business, and the means they took to obtain information, to assist them in ascertaining the true value of the articles at the time and place required by the law. Was there any error in telling the jury that appraisements thus made, for whatever purpose they were given in evidence, were entitled to their respect in proportion to the care with which they had been made? I think not. (5) The fifth point, under this head, has not been insisted upon; indeed it is a mistake in point of fact. The jury were told to consider John Bury's testimony of special importance, because it came from the claimants themselves; but this was not said as to evidence of the United States.

We come now to the fifth general head: "Because the court did not charge the jury on the rule of law, pressed in argument by the counsel of the claimants, in reference to the testimony of Donald McIlvaine, viz. that he was entitled to belief unless impeached, and that no such attempt having been made, he stood before the jury entirely worthy of credit; but on the contrary remarked, that it was strange he did not purchase at the prices named." If the judge had instructed upon this point, as the exception requires him to do, he might indeed have been charged with invading the rights of the jury. If there be any thing which peculiarly belongs to them in the trial of a cause, it is to judge of the credibility of witnesses, and it is not for the court to direct or instruct them who is entitled to belief or who stands before them entirely worthy of credit. As to the evidence of Donald McIlvaine, if I had told the jury my opinion of it, it would have been, that it was impeached by all the evidence of the cause, and by circumstances testified by himself. I repeat now what I said to the jury; it is difficult to reconcile the evidence of Donald McIlvaine with his conduct; it is difficult to discover why, if he were desirous of purchasing goods for himself, and had orders to do so from others, he did not take them at the prices he says they were offered to him for, as these prices were certainly lower than any other sales or offers we had any account of, and much lower than the actual sales made about the same time. It is difficult also to reconcile his testimony with the letter and invoice received by John Bury, from Kirby, Beard & Kirby, in which the pins are charged at a much higher price than Donald McIlvaine says the same house offered them to him for, at or near the same time, and which prices Kirby, Beard & Kirby assure Mr. Bury were their lowest. After these remarks I told the jury, that nevertheless, Mr. McIlvaine had sworn positively to the fact, and they would give the weight they thought proper to his testimony, under all the evidence and circumstances of the case. There is another answer to this exception to the charge of the court, which I mention, not because it is necessary in this case, but on account of its general importance. If the counsel in a cause desire to have the opinion of the court given to the jury upon any point or matter of law, it is their duty to state it explicitly, and to ask the opinion of the court, or they cannot make the silence of the court, or an omission to instruct the jury upon that point, a ground for a new trial. Misdirection is always a good ground, but not an omission to direct, when no direction is required. It is not enough to say, that the counsel "pressed a point in his argument." He must do more. No court is bound to give specific answers to, or notices of all the matters the counsel may think it expedient to press upon them in the argument. When a charge or opinion of the court is wanted on a particular point, it must be particularly stated and asked for. Such is the practice, and such it ought to be, or verdicts would be perpetually in danger from concealed objections.

The sixth general reason is, "because the court told the jury that the claimants had known all the testimony of the United States for eighteen months, and yet produced none to contradict it; there being no proof of that knowledge given at the trial, and the court being entirely mistaken as to the fact." The entire mistake as to the fact is found in the exception and not in the court. I speak not of my personal knowledge that this case was formerly heard before me, and proceeded on to the close of the testimony on the part of the United States, when it was dismissed on discovering that it was a case for a jury and not for the judge alone. But on this trial of the cause, the former hearing was repeatedly referred to by the counsel on both sides. Indeed in the cross examination of some of the witnesses of the United States, they were questioned by the claimants' counsel as to what they had said, and as to the evidence they had given on the former hearing. I reminded the jury of this fact, that there had been a former hearing at which these witnesses had been fully examined in the presence of the claimants' counsel and cross examined by them; and remarked to them that by this means the claimant had been made acquainted with the evidence by which he was now assailed, and had had full time to repel it, but that he had not produced a single importer of pins in the United States, to prove that he had purchased pins at the prices of his invoices, nor any manufacturer in England to say that he had sold them at such prices. I see no error or extension of the right of the court over the jury box in these observations, or departure from the evidence of the case.

The seventh reason is, "that the general tenor of the charge was such as to take away the question of fact from the jury." The generality of this exception admits only of a general answer, and might be dismissed for the reason that it specifies nothing; but I will take the occasion to state what I believe to be the right and duty of a court in charging a jury, beyond which not a step was taken in this case. That the question of fact should not be taken from the jury by the court," is too clear to be the subject of a discussion; but I hold it to be equally certain, that it is the right and duty of the court to give its aid to the jury in explaining the evidence, in collating its various parts; in drawing their attention to the most material facts in proof and their application to and bearing upon the important points of the case; in ascertaining, between contradictory testimony, which is best entitled to belief; with such comments as will clearly explain to them the views taken by the court of the case All that is necessary is, that the jury should distinctly and explicitly understand that such observations are to be received by them, merely for the purpose of assisting them in their deliberations, of recalling their recollection to the facts testified, and of turning their attention to the true points of inquiry; but that the decision to be made upon the evidence belongs altogether to them, and that no direction or authoritative instruction is intended to be given concerning them. These doctrines are fully recognised and strongly enforced by Starkie (1 Starkie, Ev. 440). That respectable author says: "The practice of advising the jury as to the nature, bearing, tendency, and weight of evidence, although it be a duty which, from its very nature, must be, in a great measure, discretionary on the part of the judge, is one which does not yield in importance to the more definite and ordinary one of directing them in matters of law. The trial by jury is a system admirably adapted to the investigation of truth, but, in order to obtain the full benefit to be derived from the united discernment of a jury, it must be admitted to be essential that their attention should be skilfully directed to the points material for their consideration." After some further remarks, this author adds that, "jurors unaccustomed, as they usually are, to judicial investigations, require, in complicated cases, all the aid which can be derived from the experience and penetration of the judge, to direct their attention to the essential points, and enable them to arrive at a just conclusion." Again, after saying that the jury should have "excluded from their consideration all such evidence as is likely to embarrass, mislead, or prejudice them in the course of the inquiry," he proceeds: "Much yet remains to be done of a nature which cannot be defined; to divest a case of all its legal incumbrances; to resolve a complicated mass of evidence into its most simple elements; to exhibit clearly the connection, bearing, and importance of its distinct and separated parts, and their combined tendency and effect, stripped of every extrinsic and superfluous consideration, which might otherwise embarrass or mislead a jury; and to do this, in a manner suited to the comprehension and understanding of an ordinary jury, is one of the most arduous as well as the most important duties incident to the judicial office." In this powerful delineation of what a charge to a jury ought to be, who is not reminded of the clear and luminous order, of the strong and satisfactory discriminations; of the admirable combinations of facts and circumstances, with which Judge Washington discharged this "most arduous as well as most important duty of the judicial office?"

I have quoted the opinions of this author, which he sustains by authority, thus at large, because I think them replete with good sense and practical utility; and that it is only by following them that the trial by jury will be attended by the invaluable advantages which belong to it. It is a solecism to say that a court may set aside the verdict of a jury, if, in the opinion of the court, it be contrary to evidence, and yet that it is an invasion of the right of the jury over the facts, if the court should present their views of the evidence in order to prevent the error instead of correcting it. In the case in question no instance has been pointed out in which the court exceeded or even filled the space here allowed. The evidence given on the trial was arranged in the order of the points to be considered and decided, but its effect was left fully and without prejudice to the jury. The witnesses were named, and the circumstances alluded to which might detract from or give weight to their testimony; but their credibility, positive and comparative, was distinctly submitted to the judgment of the jury; and finally the allegation of the exception that "the charge of the court was such as to take away the question of fact from the jury," has not been supported by any reference to the charge, or any part of it, found in the notes of the judge, or in those of any of the counsel, nor by the recollection of either as to any fact so taken from the jury.

The eighth reason is, "because the court remarked that it was extraordinary that Kirby, Beard & Kirby should have examined Broughton, a man in their own employ." If any such remark had been made by the court, it would be an extraordinary reason for setting aside a verdict. But no such remark was made. It was said that it was extraordinary they had not examined some other witnesses on the question of market value, but had relied upon him, especially as he knew nothing of the market price and value of the article, but was a workman or manufacturer, and neither a buyer nor seller of the article.

The ninth reason is, "because the court erred in saying, that the various expressions in the acts of congress, upon the subject of value and the computation of ad valorem duties, were unimportant in the case; and in saying that to prove the value in London, value at Manchester, Liverpool, and Warrington, could be a guide." We find in this exception the same error, which attends so many of those we have to consider in this case, that is, an entire mistake of what was said by the court. I will transcribe from my notes what I did say to the jury on this subject: "All the evidence which has been given of prices, or market value, or fair market value, or current value, or true value, or actual value, is to bring you to the same conclusion, to a satisfactory answer to the question you are trying, to wit, is the valuation of these goods in this invoice a 'false valuation,' which is the offence described in the act of congress of 1830, on which this information is founded? Were these goods really worth more in the London market? Were the buying and selling prices higher in that market than those charged in this invoice, at the time when this invoice was made up? However the phrases may vary in the different acts of congress; current value, actual value, or market value; the inquiry with you always is the same; does this invoice contain a true valuation of these pins, or a false one? The phraseology of the laws is important, on this issue, only as it may assist you in answering and deciding the question, whether these pins, or similar pins, were bought and sold in the London market, in June, 1830, at these prices?" I see no error in any part of these remarks. As to the other branch of this exception, that the court erred in saying "that to prove value at London, value at Manchester, Liverpool, and Warrington could be a guide," the jury were certainly kept in mind that they were to inquire into and decide upon the value at London, and that the prices and value at other places mentioned, of which evidence was given on both sides, were to be considered by them only as auxiliary to that purpose, and they might make it so, as the witnesses had stated what was the ordinary difference of prices in these markets, when any existed. Some illustrations were given to show that the evidence was not to be confined literally to the time and place of exportation, or it would tie us down to the hour, and to the exact spot on which the manufactory or warehouse might stand.

The tenth reason is, "because when the jury came in, and one of them asked whether in making up his opinion, he was at liberty to avail himself of his own previous knowledge, the court replied: 'Your oath is to decide according to the evidence: that is the only proper guide for your decision.'" The language used by the court to the juror was not precisely that stated in the exception; although the difference may not be important. I am willing to give to my answer its full and fair meaning; such as was probably understood by him. It certainly was not, nor was it intended to be, a prohibition to the juror to avail himself of his knowledge of the subject; to his giving his verdict on any ground or for any reason he might think proper, on his own responsibility; but it was a strong intimation to him, that it was his duty to render his verdict on and according to the evidence given in court, under oath, in the presence of the court, the parties and the public, and not to disregard such evidence in favour of his private knowledge or opinions, derived from more uncertain and unsafe sources. It would have been idle in the court to attempt to prohibit what it could not prevent, for a juror may give his verdict as he wills to do, and no body has a right to question him for his reasons. All the court can do is to inform him what the law expects and his duty requires of him, that is, well and truly to try the issue submitted to him, and a true verdict to give according to the evidence; and it cannot be doubted that the evidence, intended by the law and the juror's oath, is the evidence openly given on the trial before the court. Certainly this is the true theory of the open public trial by jury, by witnesses, by evidence, in the presence of the court, of the parties, of the public, with the benefit of cross examination; and the usefulness and safety of this admirable mode of trial will be greatly impaired, if jurors are to understand that it is no usurpation of power, no violation of their duty, when they get secretly, together in their private room, to put aside all the evidence of the cause, and bring together as the foundation of their verdict, all the opinions, prejudices, rumours and hearsays, which they may call their previous and personal knowledge of the subject. The same rule must be applied to criminal as to civil cases, and the accused can never be assured of safety, although the whole evidence given in his presence may testify his innocence, if he is to be tried secretly, by other evidence in the jury room.

These principles find ample support, and no contradiction from every authority in relation to them. In Tidd's Practice (page 936), speaking of the insufficiency of the writ of attaint as a remedy for a false verdict, it is said: "There are numberless cases of false verdicts, without any corruption or bad intention of the jurymen. They may have heard too much of the matter before the trial, and imbibed prejudices without knowing it." This hearsay and these prejudices are precisely what a juror might call, and conceive to be, a previous knowledge of the subject; and this error can be guarded against only by excluding them, as far as is practicable, altogether from the mind of the juror, and referring him, for his verdict, to the proper and legal evidence of the case. We find, every where, the principle sustained, that every thing which is to influence the verdict of a jury, should be openly delivered in the presence of the court. Thus in Hale's Pleas of the Crown (2 Hale, P. C. 306) it is said: "If a juryman have a piece of evidence, in his pocket, and, after the jury sworn and gone together, he showeth it to them, this is a misdemeanour in the jury." So, at page 307, it is said: "If the jury send for a witness to repeat his evidence that he gave openly in the court, it will avoid the verdict." The same law is laid down in the case of Metcalfe v. Deane, Cro. Eliz. 189. Again, it is said by Hale: "If the jury, after their departure from the bar, desire to hear the testimony of a witness again, they may be sent for into court, and the witness may be heard again openly, where the court or parties may ask what questions they think fit." In an anonymous case (1 Salk. 405) it is said: "If a jury give a verdict on their own knowledge, they ought to tell the court so, that they may be sworn as witnesses; and the fair way is to tell the court, before they are sworn, that they have evidence to give."

In the case before us, the question asked by the juror and the answer given by the court are thus stated on my notes. They were read, at the time, to the juror, in the presence of the counsel, and agreed to be correct. "One of the jurors asks, 'whether he may avail himself of any previous knowledge, he has of the subject, in giving his verdict.' The court replied, 'The question is answered by the oath of the juror, to try the cause, and a true verdict give according to the evidence.'" I think I added, although it is not on my notes, that the evidence of a cause is that which is delivered on oath, in the presence of the court and the parties. The question was suddenly put to the court, and immediately answered, as I now think, with too much reserve, and that I might, and perhaps ought to have been more decided and peremptory in my instruction to the juror, to disregard his private knowledge, and to render his verdict solely on the legal and open testimony of the cause.

I am confirmed in this opinion, not only by the cases already referred to, but by others I shall now notice. When a remedy for a false verdict, or a verdict contrary to evidence could be obtained only by attainting the jury, a very severe proceeding against them, every presumption or possibility was resorted to in order to support the verdict, and save the jury from a judgment of attaint. But a salutary and reasonable change has taken place in the law of setting aside verdicts, since the practice of attainting jurors has been disused, and their mistakes are corrected by the more liberal and efficacious remedy of granting new trials. In Bacon's Abridgment (3 Bac. Abr. 778), speaking of attainting juries, it is said: "But to attaint them for finding contrary to evidence is not so easy, because they may have evidence of their own cognizance of the matter before them, or they may find, on distrust of witnesses, on their own proper knowledge." This is the law of the text; and the old authorities are given for it; but in a note it is thus modified and corrected: "If a jury give a verdict on their own knowledge, they ought to tell the court so; but they may be sworn as witnesses; and the fair way is to tell the court, before they are sworn, that they have evidence to give." The anonymous case (1 Salk. 405), already referred to, is here cited. The modern doctrine is more explicitly stated in the first volume of Starkie on Evidence (page 405). He says: "Neither a judge nor juror can notice facts within his own private knowledge: he ought to be sworn and state them as a witness." A note informs us that the law was formerly otherwise; and the case of Partridge v. Strange, Plow. 83, is cited. The ancient doctrine was founded, as I have said, on the law of attaints. The note proceeds: "But this doctrine was again gradually exploded when attaints began to be disused, and new trials introduced in their stead. It is quite incompatible with the grounds on which new trials are every day awarded, viz. that the verdict was given without, or contrary to evidence." Afterwards, in the same volume (page 449), it is added: "It is now perfectly settled that a juror cannot give a verdict founded on his own private knowledge: for it could not be known whether the verdict was according to, or against evidence; it is very possible that the private grounds of belief might not amount to legal evidence. If such evidence were to be privately given by one juror to the rest, it would want the sanction of an oath, and the juror would not be subject to cross examination. If, therefore, a juror know any fact material to the issue, he ought to be sworn as a witness, and is liable to be cross examined, and if he privately state such facts, it will be ground of a motion for a new trial." In the third volume of Blackstone's Commentaries (page 374), the doctrine and reasons of Starkie are recognised as the law of that day. If such be the law, there was no error in the answer given by the court to the inquiry of the juror; at least, none of which the claimants can complain. The court might have been more explicit and direct, in cautioning the juror against making up his verdict on his previous or personal knowledge.

The eleventh and last ground of exception is a most striking misconception of the court, to wit, that the court intimated to the juror who made the foregoing inquiry, "that unanimity was not to be expected; and that he should endeavour to come to the opinion of his fellows." There is mistake in every part of this allegation. The remark which the court did make was addressed to the whole jury, and not to any particular juror. It arose on an occasion having no relation to the question asked as above by a juror; nor, according to my recollection, was it at the time when that question was put to the court, for the jury came in more than once before they gave their verdict. On one of these visits to the court, subsequent, as I think, to that on which the question was asked, but this is not material, one of the jurors expressed himself with much impatience, and in very strong terms, of the obstinacy of one of his fellows, alluding, as I suppose, to the very juror who had made the inquiry of the court. It was then that I remarked, that it could hardly be expected that twelve men would at once agree upon any subject of any difficulty, and that it was a duty they owed to each other to exercise patience and forbearance in their discussions; to listen calmly to one another, and truly endeavour to come at last to the same opinion.

In making this laborious examination of these reasons for a new trial, I have been governed, as may be seen, not by the difficulties I found in them, but by my respect for the counsel who has considered and treated them as matters of importance.

Rule to show cause why a new trial should not be granted, discharged.

Case No. 15,153.

UNITED STATES v. FORTY-EIGHT HUNDRED GALLONS OF SPIRITS.

[4 Ben. 471; [1] 3 Chi. Leg. News, 130; 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 52.]

District Court, E. D. New York. Jan. 10, 1871.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FORFEITURE — PLEADING — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE — EVIDENCE — PERSONAL PROPERTY.

1. The 96th section of the internal revenue act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 164), is to be construed to mean, that where the statute has attached no punishment to the doing or omitting of acts required or forbidden, such act or omission, when knowingly or wilfully committed, shall be punished by the infliction of the penalty and forfeiture provided by that section.

[Cited in U. S. v. One Thousand Four Hundred and Twelve Gallons Distilled Spirits, Case No. 15,960.]

2. Proof that tubs were so placed in a distillery that they could be used contrary to the internal revenue acts, is not sufficient to warrant the court in finding that they have been so used.

3. Where, in accordance with the practice in this district, in forfeiture cases, an information had been filed containing numerous counts, and the district attorney had before the trial filed a specification of the counts on which he intended to rely, but on the trial evidence was offered which it was claimed established an offence not embraced in the specification: Held, that the omission to include it in the specification was fatal.

4. Distilled spirits found on the premises on which the business of distilling is carried on, being the product of such business, are not "personal property used in the business" within the meaning of the 19th section of the act of July 20, 1868 (15 Stat. 133).

At law.

B. F. Tracy, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Veeder & Wood, for claimant.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem, to forfeit certain distilled spirits belonging to Mathew Brady, and seized at his distillery. The cause has been tried before the court without a jury, by consent.

The distillery used by the claimant, it appears, was formerly a grain distillery, but was surveyed and accepted, to be used by Brady as a molasses distillery. When used as a grain distillery, it had a mixing tub, placed above the mash tub, known as "tub M" in these proceedings, which was connected with the mash tubs by pipes. When the place was surveyed and accepted as a molasses distillery, this tub M, which, from its character, and location, could be used as a fermenting tub, was permitted to remain as it was, but was not described as a fermenting tub in any plan or description. There was also in the yard a cistern or receptacle, which could be used as a mixing tub for molasses, and which was connected by hose with tub M.

There was also in the cistern room a hole in the wall, through which hose could pass out of the spirit cistern, and also a sort of man hole in the roof, through which ingress could be had to attach the hose. The distillery was, therefore, so arranged, that, by using the cistern in the yard as a mixing tub, and the tub M as a fermenting tub, the capacity of the distillery would be increased beyond the capacity shown on the plan; while any increased production could be removed from the cistern by the hose. Moreover, the distillery was permitted to run for some time without any night watchman, and the day watchman never informed himself of the condition of the cistern room. These facts have been proved, as tending to show that the specific acts and omissions charged against the distiller were accompanied with the intent to defraud, and to conceal from the revenue officers facts required to be stated in his books. They are material only for that purpose, and do not of themselves work a forfeiture of the property in question, under any of the counts in this information. But there are other facts shown, and others offered to be shown, which, it is claimed, do work the forfeiture of the spirits proceeded against. In considering these proofs, it will be convenient first to determine the construction to be put, by this court, upon section 96 of the act of 1868, upon which section many of the present charges depend.

The ground taken on the part of the government is, that section 96 is to be construed as if it read thus: "If no other penalty or punishment is imposed, there shall be a penalty of $1,000; and the offender, if a distiller, shall forfeit all spirits owned by him, whether punishable otherwise or not." But I am unable so to read the law. As I view this section, it manifests an intent to cover, by a general provision, those instances in the statute where acts have been enjoined or forbidden, but no punishment attached. I do not find in the section any words indicating an intent to cumulate or to increase punishments; and in the absence of such words, I am of the opinion, that the section must be held to mean, what it appears to me to say, that, in cases where the statute has attached no punishment to the doing or omitting of acts required, or forbidden, such act or omission, when knowingly or willfully committed, shall be punished by the infliction of the penalty and forfeiture provided by this section. I am aware that different constructions have been given to the section, but, to my mind, the more weighty reasons are in favor of the construction I have here adopted. Quantity of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 11,495] Blatchford, J.; U. S. v. One Rectifying Establishment [Id. 15,952] Hill, J.; U. S. v. One Hundred and Thirty-Three Casks of Distilled Spirits [Id. 15,940] Hoffman, J.; U. S. v. Ninety-Five Bbls. Spirits [Id. 15,889] Lowell, J. This view of the effect of section 96 removes from consideration a large portion of the present information, and limits the inquiry, as regards the charges made under this section, to those unlawful acts and omissions for which no punishment is provided by any other section of the act.

Of this class is the charge that the distiller omitted to furnish to the assessor an accurate plan or description of the distillery, showing the number and contents of every mash tub and fermenting tub, as required by section 9 of the act of July 20, 1868. And also the charge that, contrary to the same section, there was an alteration made in the distillery, which was not disclosed by any supplemental plan.

These charges the government claim to have supported by the evidence as to the character, locality, and use of the tub M, which, it is conceded, was never designated on any plan as a fermenting tub.

I have carefully considered this evidence, and, although I think it clear that tub M could be used as a fermenting tub, I do not find it proved that it was, in fact, ever so used. There may be ground for suspicion that it was at times so used, but I cannot condemn property upon suspicion. This portion of the information must, therefore, fail for want of proof.

Again, it is claimed that this property must be forfeited, because it appears that the fermenting tubs were not emptied at the expiration of forty-eight hours after they were filled, that being the fermenting period of this distillery, as required by section 19 of the act of 1868. What should be the true construction of this portion of section 19 is not clear. It would not be unreasonable to hold that the words, "Every tub shall be emptied at the end of the fermenting period," should be taken in connection with the words, "emptied of ripe mash or beer," used in the first part of the paragraph, and the provision construed to mean that mash or beer, when fermented according to the distiller's notice, shall be emptied at the end of the fermenting period, if ripe. Such a construction would probably dispose of the charge under consideration, in the present position of the evidence. But any construction of this provision of the statute is rendered unnecessary in this case, inasmuch as an examination of the information discloses the fact that it contains no averment which will support the charge in question.

The practice in this district, in cases of proceedings in rem to enforce forfeitures arising under the revenue laws, has been, in the first instance, to permit an information to be filed containing numerous counts for violations of various statutes, charged for the most part, in the words of the statute, but to require the district attorney, before the trial, to file a specification of the counts on which he intends to rely, accompanied, when necessary, with a description of the offences intended to be proved, sufficient to inform the claimant of the particular charge which he will be called on to meet. This practice, which is analogous to the practice in certain classes of criminal prosecutions, has proved convenient and conducive to justice, and it has been followed in the present case.

The specification in this case designates the 15th count in the information as one of those relied on, and that under it the charge in question will be sought to be maintained.

Now the 15th count omits to charge any violation of that part of section 19, which requires the tubs to be emptied at the end of the fermenting period, and to remain empty for the space of 24 hours. The omission in this count of any allusion to any violation of that portion of the section on which the count is framed, is fatal. I therefore dispense with any consideration of the evidence which is claimed to show any omission to empty the fermenting tubs at the end of the fermenting period, or to allow them to remain empty for a period of 24 hours.

Again, it is contended that the property is forfeited by virtue of the portion of section 19 of the act of 1868, which declares that if any false entry be made, or any entry omitted from the distiller's book, with intent to defraud, or to conceal from the revenue officers any fact or particular, required to be stated and entered in the book, the distillery, distilling apparatus, and the lot or tract of land on which it stands, and all personal property of every kind or description on said premises used in the business there carried on, shall be forfeited to the United States; and it is insisted that the property in question, being distilled spirits seized on the premises belong to the distiller, are covered by the words "personal property on the premises." But these words are qualified by the subsequent words, "used in the business," and I do not consider that distilled spirits in casks, or in the cisterns of a distillery which has produced them, can be held to be personal property used in the business there carried on. These are the products of the business, and would naturally have been designated specifically, if intended to be within the provisions of the act.

I have thus disposed of all the counts in this information, upon which the government has relied, and the result is that the information must be dismissed, and the property discharged.

A certificate of probable cause for the seizure must be given.

Case No. 15,154.

UNITED STATES v. FOUR THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIVE CIGARS.

[25 Int. Rev. Rec. 132.]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. 1879.

INTERNAL REVENUE—ILLEGAL USE OF STAMPS—AUTHORITY OF COMMISSIONER.

[One who has cut the internal revenue stamps on boxes of cigars, and taken out and repacked the cigars in the same boxes, with intent to dispose of them, without adding new stamps, cannot justify himself therein on the ground that he had received permission to do so from the commissioner of internal revenue: for, even if such permission were granted, it would be in violation of law, and of no effect.]

[This was a proceeding for the forfeiture of 4,175 cigars because of an alleged violation of the internal revenue laws.]

BILLINGS, District Judge (charging jury). The testimony of the claimant in this case must necessarily terminate it in favor of the government. He testifies that, having received a letter from the late commissioner of internal revenue, giving him permission, he caused the stamps upon a great many boxes of cigars to be cut, and the boxes opened, and the cigars taken out, repacked, and put in the same boxes again, with the view of disposing of them without adding new stamps. It is not within the authority of the commissioner of internal revenue to authorize any such use of stamps. The whole effort of congress to prevent the use of stamps or stamped boxes more than once would be thwarted, and the whole matter left to the imperfection and uncertainty of parol evidence if this were permissible. My duty is therefore clear. I must direct you to find a verdict for the government. If the claimant has really relied upon any letter received from the internal revenue department, he can state that fact in an application for a remission of the penalty. And for that purpose I shall allow him thirty days, before the lapse of which time judgment will not be signed.

Case No. 15,155.

UNITED STATES v. FOX.

[Deady, 579: 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 36.] [1]

District Court, D. Oregon. May 15, 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE — PENAL ACTION — ORIGINAL PACKAGES—NEW TRIAL—VERDICT.

1. The verdict of a jury is presumed to be correct and should be sustained, if the evidence by any fair construction will warrant such finding.

2. Goods are sold "in the original and unbroken package" within the meaning of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 144), although the package is opened for inspection, if closed again before delivery without the contents being changed.

3. When the verdict of a jury is directly contrary to the evidence and the law applicable thereto, it is the imperative duty of the court to set it aside; and it makes no difference in this respect that the action is brought to recover a penalty given by statute.

4. What is called "the justice of the case" on a motion for a new trial is not affected by the fact that a moiety of the penalty recovered will go to the person who gave information of the violation of the law, whereby such penalty was incurred.

At law.

John C. Cartwright, for the motion.
David Logan, contra.

DEADY, District Judge. On February 11, 1869, the plaintiff commenced this action to recover from the defendants the sum of $1,300 penalties. The complaint contains three counts. The first charges that the defendants at Corvallis on July 8, 1868, sold twelve bottles of pomade, without the same being duly stamped. The second charges at the place and date aforesaid the sale of twelve bottles of hair oil, without the same being duly stamped; and the third count is upon the sale of two bottles of Lubin's Extract without being stamped. On March 10, 1869, the defendants answered the complaint, and thereby denied that they sold the several articles mentioned in the complaint without the same being duly stamped. On May 4, 1869, the case was tried before a jury, which resulted in a general verdict for the defendants. On May 5, the district attorney filed a motion for a new trial, which motion on the following day was argued by counsel and taken under consideration by the court.

On the trial the government witness—Leander Quivey—testified that at the time and place mentioned in the complaint, he purchased the articles therein specified of the defendant E. Fox, in the store of E. Fox & Bros., and that the same or any of them were not stamped. That at the time the witness, in company with one Culpepper, was traveling through the Wallamet and Umpqua valleys, purchasing these and similar articles at the various stores along the route, for the purpose of causing actions to be brought against the sellers, to recover the penalties given by law against the persons who sold perfumery, sardines, etc., without the same being duly stamped. That the witness was induced to this, in the expectation of obtaining a moiety of the penalties that might be recovered and for the purpose of compelling the defendants and others engaged in selling unstamped goods, to obey the law. The articles said to have been purchased by the witness, were produced by him before the court. These were a small wooden box containing 12 one ounce and a half bottles of hair oil, and a similar box, somewhat larger, containing 12 bottles of pomade, and 2 bottles of Lubin's Extract. None of the bottles produced were stamped or appeared ever to have been stamped. The boxes were evidently the original packages in which the goods were packed by the manufacturer. In the inscription upon the bottles and the brand upon the boxes there was evidence tending to show that the goods were of French manufacture, and therefore "imported articles." In relation to the circumstances of the purchase, the witness, Quivey, testified that he purchased these articles of the defendant E. Fox. That before the purchase was made, and while the witness was bargaining for the goods, E. Fox opened both the boxes, so as to enable the witness to examine one or two bottles in the small box and five bottles in the larger box. That at the suggestion of Culpepper, who was near by, witness asked Fox to take out three bottles from the larger box and replace them with three smaller bottles of pomade from an unpacked lot of perfumery in bottles, then on the store shelf. That Fox made the exchange as required, when the purchase was completed and Fox nailed up the boxes and delivered them to the witness, who paid him for them. At the same time the witness purchased the two bottles of Lubin's Extract, which Fox took from the shelf. The witness also produced a bill of these articles, made out to himself, dated "Corvallis, July 8, 1869," and receipted in the name of "E. Fox & Bros.," which he testified was written and delivered to him by Fox at the time of the purchase. In this bill, the pomade is charged in two lots—three quarters of a dozen at $3.50 per dozen, and one quarter of a dozen at $2.50 per dozen, thus corresponding to the statement of the witness, that there were nine large and three small bottles of that article. E. Fox, one of the defendants, testified that about July, 1868, at Corvallis, he sold Quivey two boxes of perfumery and two bottles of Lubin's Extract. That the boxes were similar to those produced in court, but could not say positively that they were the same ones. That he opened both the boxes that he sold to Quivey and showed him the contents and then nailed them up again. That before closing one of the boxes he took out three of the bottles and took three bottles off the shelf and put them in the box in place of those taken out. That the two bottles of Lubin's Extract and three bottles of pomade taken off the shelves were stamped, but that the oil and pomade originally in the boxes were not stamped. O. Fox, the brother of E. Fox, testified that he was employed in defendant's store at the time of purchase, and had been for three years previous. That he was not very near to his brother when the sale was made, but that he was in the store and saw that his brother was selling perfumery, some in boxes and some by the bottle. That he did not observe whether the bottles were stamped or not, but he was certain that they were, because he knew that all the bottles on the shelves were stamped.

This action is brought upon the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 144). It substantially provides that any person who shall make, prepare and sell, or remove for consumption or sale, among other things, any perfumery, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture, without affixing a proper stamp thereon, shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars for every such omission; and that any person who shall offer or expose for sale any such perfumery shall be deemed the manufacturer thereof: provided, that when imported perfumery shall be sold in the original and unbroken packages in which the bottle or other enclosure was packed by the manufacturer, the person so selling such article shall not be subject to any penalty on account of the want of the proper stamp.

The grounds of the motion for a new trial as stated therein, are: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict; and, (2) That it is against law, and contrary to the instructions of the court. For either of those causes, when the material rights of a party are substantially affected thereby, the court may and should, upon the motion of the party aggrieved, set aside the verdict. Code, Or. 197.

As to the second and third counts of the complaint, this motion must be denied. Upon the question of whether the two bottles of Lubin's Extract were stamped or not, there was conflicting evidence nearly balanced. The verdict of a jury is presumed to be correct, and should be sustained by the court, if the evidence by any fair construction will warrant such a finding. 3 Grah. & W. New Trials, 1239, 1240. Upon this conflict of testimony, the jury were entitled to decide this question of fact, and the court ought not to disturb their verdict, although it might have come to different conclusions from the same premises.

As to the twelve bottles of oil contained in the smaller box, there was no conflict in the testimony, and the verdict in this respect corresponds with the evidence and the instructions of the court. It was manifest that this box was an original package, within the purview and reason of the proviso to section 169. What constitutes such an original package, must depend in a great measure upon the circumstances of the particular case. It is apparent that the object of the proviso was to relieve the importer and jobber from the trouble and expense of opening the package immediately enclosing the bottle or other article, and stamping it, and then repacking it. But whoever sells these goods in broken packages, is not within the reason of the proviso. He can stamp them without any unnecessary inconvenience or expense, and he must do it or incur the penalty for the omission. Although the top of this box was taken off by the defendant Fox, it was only for the purpose of enabling the witness Quivey to ascertain the kind and quality of its contents, and before the sale and delivery to him it was put on again, with the contents unchanged in kind or quantity. Under these circumstances the defendant must be considered as selling an unbroken package, the contents of which were not then required to be stamped; and to this effect the court instructed the jury on the trial. Then the only remaining inquiry is, was the package imported? Upon this point the evidence was weak; but from the label on the bottles and the brand on the box, in the absence of anything to the contrary, the jury were warranted in finding in the affirmative of this question. But as to the count upon the 12 bottles of pomade, this verdict must be set aside. True, as to the three bottles which were taken from the shelf and placed in the box, there was a conflict of testimony, as to whether they were stamped or not. But as to the nine bottles, which were a part of the original contents of the package, there is no conflict of testimony. The evidence of the government witness and the defendant agree in every particular. The package was opened, and three bottles being taken out of it, it was sold with only the remaining nine bottles in it. This was a broken package, and so the court instructed the jury. In this respect, this verdict is directly contrary to the evidence and the law. It is therefore the imperative duty of the court to set it aside. But it is said that this is a penal action—for a penalty—and therefore the court should not disturb the verdict, however plainly against the evidence and law. The provisions of the Code, however, relating to new trials, make no such distinction, nor is there any good reason why they should. The rule prescribed is uniform, whether the action be for a penalty or upon a contract. If the evidence be insufficient to justify the verdict, or the same be against law, it should be set aside.

It may here be admitted, that what is sometimes called "the justice of the case," is also to be considered by the court upon an application for a new trial. But what is this "justice of the case," unless it be the rights which the law would give or withhold from the parties, regardless of any technical advantage which one may chance to obtain over the other. Considered in this light, "the justice" of this case is with the plaintiff, so far as the penalties arising from the sale of the nine unstamped bottles of pomade is concerned. The defendant, upon his own testimony, sold them in a broken package without stamps, and thereby incurred these penalties, which the United States has a good right to recover from him as he has to the profits of the sales of his goods. Nor is the "justice of the case" in any manner affected by the fact, that the United States has seen proper to provide, that a moiety of these penalties, when recovered, shall be given to the person who gave information of the violation of the law, by which they were incurred. With the policy or impolicy of imposing these penalties the court has nothing to do. Whoever has incurred them without fraudulent intent or gross negligence may have them remitted by applying to the secretary of the treasury. But, when in a court of law, the illegal sale of unstamped goods is shown, as in this case, by clear and unquestioned evidence, the verdict should be given accordingly, and if for any reason it is not, the court will not hesitate to set it aside as erroneous. Upon the power of the court to set aside a verdict in an action for a penalty, independent of the Code, see U. S. v. Halberstadt [Case No. 15,276].

An order will be made refusing the motion for new trial, as to the second and third counts, and setting aside the verdict as to the first count, provided that the plaintiff will file a written admission for the purpose of a new trial, that three of the bottles described in said count were duly stamped.

Case No. 15,156.

UNITED STATES v. FOX et al.

[1 Lowell, 199.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Jan., 1868.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLING—FAILURE TO PAY TAX—PROOF GALLONS—SPECIAL TAX—INDICTMENT.

1. In an indictment on section 23 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 153), for carrying on the business of a distiller of spirits, without paying the special tax, it is not necessary to set out the particular acts of distilling or the kinds of spirit.

2. "Then and there distilling and manufacturing spirits to a very large amount, to wit, to the amount and number of one thousand gallons of proof spirit," is a sufficient affirmative allegation that the defendant did distil.

3. Gallons of proof spirit in that connection means the same thing as the proof gallons of spirit mentioned in the statute, that is, the gallons, which if the liquor were of exact proof it would measure; and the evidence will not be confined to spirits which are actually of proof strength.

4. Such an indictment is not open to objection as multifarious if it charges in the same count that the defendants and each of them carried on the business.

5. Where the law substituting special taxes for licenses took effect upon distillers from and after September 1, 1866, and the charge was that the defendants carried on the business of distillers on the first of September, 1866, and thence to the tenth of December, 1866, without paying the special tax required by law, and under the former law licenses were issued for the business, to run from May to May, though for a smaller fee: Quære, Whether a person licensed under the old law, May 1, 1866, may not continue the business without further payment to May 1, 1867?

6. Such a person would not be indictable for continuing the business until due assessment of the additional fee, if any, had been made; and an indictment, which showed the business to have been begun under the old law and continued under the new, should negative the payment of the license fee, or of the additional fee, as well as of the special tax.

Indictment against two persons [John J. Fox and another] alleged that they carried on the business of a distiller on the first day of September, 1866, and on divers other days up to and until the tenth day of December of the same year, without having paid the special tax as required by law; they and each of them then and there distilling and manufacturing spirits to a very large amount, to wit, to the amount and number of one thousand gallons of proof spirit. After conviction they moved in arrest of judgment.

L. S. Dabney, for defendants. (1) The indictment ought to charge the particular acts which go to show that the defendants were distillers, with time, place, &c. (2) Then and there distilling and manufacturing is argumentative. (3) Both counts are multifarious, because they charge that the defendants and each of them distilled, &c. (4) The evidence should have been strictly confined to the manufacture of spirit of precisely proof strength, because the only charge is of making such spirit. (5) There should be a charge, either that the defendants began business after the new law went into effect, or that they had paid no license fee under the old law, because the licenses were from May to May, and would protect the business for the first eight months after September 1, 1866.

H. D. Hyde, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States. It is not necessary to negative the existence of a license, because, supposing one to have been granted, it would not protect this business after September 1. Section 80 of the new act (14 Stat. 122) provides that where any person has been assessed for a license before the passage of this act, and the amount so assessed is equal to the tax herein imposed for the business covered by such license, no special tax shall be assessed until the expiration of the period for which the license was assessed. This implies that where the tax is increased, as is the fact with distillers, the license does not protect. Besides, the allegation of time is immaterial, and this objection, therefore, comes too late. After verdict we may presume that the evidence proved the acts to have been done since May 1, 1867, the indictment having been found since that time.

LOWELL, District Judge. As I had occasion to observe in another case, the precedents prescribe a very simple form of charging such a crime as this and of negativing the authority or license. And in general, when the charge is, that a certain trade has been carried on, or that the defendant has sustained a particular character, as that of a barrator, scold, &c., it is not essential to set out the particular acts which go to make up the trading or course of life. It would be otherwise if each act were a crime; or if by the statute definition a fixed number of separate acts made up the crime. Under this law, the quantity of spirits distilled is important, because the minimum fine depends upon it; but not the kind of spirits, nor the separate acts of distilling. So as to the time. The acts being continuous, it is well to charge them as having been done on divers days between two certain days. Com. v. Tower, 8 Metc. [Mass.] 527; Wells v. Com., 12 Gray, 327 (per Metcalf, J.).

The objection to the expression "then and there distilling," &c., applies only to the first count; but it is not valid even to that; the legal intent of these words is, that the defendant did then and there distil. Turns v. Com., 6 Metc. [Mass.] 224. The charge that two persons and each of them carried on a business is well enough if they were partners or jointly concerned in the business. Rex v. Dixon, 10 Mod. 335. And this indictment clearly points to a joint trade. I do not decide that in a misdemeanor such an objection can ever be taken at this stage of the case.

It was urged with great apparent confidence, both at the trial and since, that the allegation of distilling one thousand gallons of proof spirit, confines the government to showing the manufacture of spirit at the exact strength of first proof, as established by another part of the statute, that is, one-half alcohol. I am of opinion, on the contrary, that this expression, "gallons of proof spirit," in the connection in which it is found, is not intended to be descriptive of the kind or strength of the spirit distilled, but only of the quantity, according to the statute standard. The mode of taxation, borrowed by congress from the excise laws of England, is to assess spirits by a conventional measure, depending upon the amount of alcohol which they contain. This measure is expressed in gallons, though the precise number of gallons taxed does not exist, excepting when the spirit is of exactly proof strength. Thus, for the purposes of taxation, that quantity, be it more or less, which contains ten gallons of pure alcohol, is twenty gallons of proof spirits. This has been found to be a very fair and convenient method, and it has led to the use of the phrases, proof gallons, gallons of proof spirit, gallons of spirit at the strength of proof, all of which mean the estimated number of gallons contained in the liquors spoken of, whatever their actual bulk may be. This use of terms I find in Ure's Dictionary, Muspratt's Chemistry, and other works of like character. Our statute taxes the proof gallon, and it is easy to understand what that is, though I have not found any general dictionary of the language that defines any such gallon. This indictment sets out the number of such gallons, in order to enable the court to impose the proper fine.

The last objection appears to be well taken. The indictment ought to show that the business was carried on without due payment. Now every thing here alleged may be true, and yet the defendants may have paid a license fee on the first of May, 1866, and the business may have been conducted under the license. The new act went into operation on the second day of September, and it does require a larger fee to be paid by distillers than was required by the statute of 1864; but it may well be doubted whether the assessors would be authorized to assess the increased amount before the following May, upon those who had licenses under the old act. I find nothing in the new act looking to any such action, excepting the proviso of the eightieth section, cited at the bar, which prohibits a new assessment in certain cases; the implication from that proviso is hardly strong enough to warrant me in adding a positive duty not elsewhere enjoined. I am informed that the practice of assessors has not been uniform in the different districts in this particular; and I can easily understand that this might be so. But of this I am clear, that it cannot have been the intention of the law to render a distiller liable to these severe penalties who was carrying on his business under license when the new law took effect, unless he had been duly assessed and called on to pay the additional fee, and had refused or neglected to do so.

It is said that the time is immaterial, and that on this motion it may be presumed that evidence was given of acts done since May 1, 1867. It is not material to prove the time precisely as alleged, but it is necessary that the time charged should be consistent with the offence charged, so that the indictment shall be good on its face. Thus to lay an impossible time, or one beyond the statute of limitations; or that a crime which can only be committed on Sunday was done on Monday, &c., would be bad. In motions for arrest of judgment, the time is presumed to be truly alleged (Com. v. Hitchings, 5 Gray, 485); and taking this to be so, this indictment shows that the statute had come into full operation only as to those distillers who began business afterwards, or who being assessed for an extra license fee had not paid it, and not as to all distillers; and these defendants should have been shown to be within its operation, by alleging either that they began the business under the new law, or that they were not licensed under the old law, or that having been so licensed and having been assessed an additional fee, they had not paid it. Judgment arrested.

2. A letter, containing money, deposited in the mail, for the purpose of ascertaining whether its contents were stolen on a particular route, and actually sent on a post route, is a letter intended to be sent by post within the meaning of the post-office act (4 Stat. 102).

3. The description of the termini, between which the letter was intended to be sent by post, cannot be rejected as surplusage, but must be proved as laid.

4. It is necessary, in an indictment for larceny from a letter under the 21st section of the act, to lay the property stolen on some person other than the prisoner.

[Cited in U. S. v. Laws, Case No. 15,579.]

[This was an indictment against Mark W. Foye for larceny from the mail.]

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The prisoner, being a mail carrier, was indicted for stealing a bank-note from a letter deposited in the mail of the United States, and intended to be conveyed by post. Having been found guilty by the jury, he has moved for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment. The first cause assigned for a new trial, is, that the defendant, not having been sworn, was not liable to be convicted as a mail carrier, under the 21st section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 102). This cause is not sufficient. The third section of the act expressly subjects persons employed in the conveyance of the mails to all pains, penalties, and forfeitures, for violating the injunctions of this act, though not sworn. The 21st section, by inflicting a penalty on the act charged in the indictment, must be considered as enjoining mail carriers not to commit that act; and consequently, if they do it, they are subject to the penalty provided in the 21st section.

The second ground of the motion is, that the jury were erroneously instructed concerning certain evidence. The indictment charges that the letter contained "a certain bank-note, of the denomination of five dollars, purporting to be issued by the Casco Bank of Portland, in the state of Maine; the said bank-note being an article and evidence of value, viz.: of the value of five dollars." Evidence was offered by the government, tending to prove that the person who inclosed the note in the letter, received the bill as of the value of five dollars; that the defendant, after taking it from the letter, paid it to a creditor, in discharge of a debt of five dollars; and a broker, who was much accustomed to receive bills purporting to be issued by the Casco Bank, having examined this bill, testified that it was like the bills he was accustomed to receive and pay. The jury were instructed that, if they believed this evidence, it was competent for them to find this note was a bank-note of the value of five dollars. In this instruction, we think there was no error. The act of the defendant, in passing this note in payment of a debt of five dollars, was equivalent to an affirmance by him, that it was what it purported to be. It is a familiar rule, that the indorser of negotiable paper is estopped to deny the genuineness of all signatures which precede his own. And though this rule is not applicable to paper passing by delivery only, and the defendant was not estopped, as against the United States, from showing this was not a bank-note, yet we have no doubt his uttering it as genuine was evidence to go to the jury to prove it to be a bank-note, and of the value of five dollars; and if so, it would warrant, in point of law, in the absence of all other evidence, a finding to that effect.

The next cause assigned is, that the particular letter proved did not support the allegation in the indictment, which charges that one J. Pike Stickney deposited in the post-office at Georgetown a letter, addressed to John Blake, Ipswich, "which was intended to be conveyed by post, and was then and there mailed, to be conveyed in the mail of the United States, to the town of Ipswich aforesaid." The evidence showed that Stickney was the postmaster at Georgetown; that in consequence of the loss of money from the mail on that route, he agreed with the postmaster at Newburyport to deposit in the mail a letter, containing money, addressed to John Blake, Ipswich; if the letter should arrive safely at Newburyport, it was not to be sent on to Ipswich, but was to be returned to Stickney. In pursuance of this arrangement, this letter and money were sent, arrived safely at Newburyport, and were returned to Stickney, who, the next day, remailed the same letter, and the bag containing it was committed to the prisoner, who was the mail carrier between Georgetown and Newburyport. The letter was mailed precisely like other letters; that is to say, a bill was made out, containing the usual entries; this bill and the letter were inclosed in a wrapper, and the packet addressed to Ipswich, and deposited in the mail-bag, with other packets.

The first objection is, that this was not a letter intended to be conveyed by post, within the meaning of the act, and of the indictment. And the prisoner's counsel relies chiefly on the decision of the judges on a question reserved, in the case of Reg. v. Rathbone, 1 Cromp & M. 220. But we consider that case distinguishable from this. By 1 Vict. c. 36, § 47, it is enacted, that "post letter shall mean any letter or packet, transmitted by the post, under the authority of the postmaster-general." The prisoner was indicted for stealing a post-letter. It appeared that an inspector placed the letter which was stolen, among some other letters, which the prisoner, who was employed in the post-office, was to sort, and inclosed in it a sovereign, to try the prisoner's honesty, which was suspected. This letter the prisoner stole; and it was held not to be a post letter, within the meaning of the act; for though, in fact, the letter was in the post-office, it had not come there in the course of business, and so was not transmitted by post, under the authority of the postmaster-general. In the case at bar, the only material difference between the letter stolen, and any others in the same bag, was, that it was not intended to be sent to its address. But it was intended to be conveyed by post from Georgetown to Newburyport, and was regularly mailed for that purpose. We do not think the purpose of the writer, not to have the letter go to its apparent destination, affects its character, or prevents it from being a letter intended to be transmitted by post, or takes it out of the protection of the statute.

But a far more difficult question arises under the other part of the objection. The indictment alleges, not only that this letter was intended to be conveyed by post, but describes where it was to be conveyed; it fixes the termini as Georgetown and Ipswich. The allegation is, in substance, that the letter was intended to be conveyed by post from Georgetown to Ipswich. The question is, whether the words, from Georgetown to Ipswich, can be treated as surplusage. It was necessary to allege, that the letter was intended to be conveyed by post. The words, from Georgetown to Ipswich, are descriptive of this intent. They describe, more particularly, that intent which it was necessary to allege. In U. S. v. Howard [Case No. 15,403], Mr. Justice Story lays down the following rule, which we consider to be correct: "No allegation, whether it be necessary or unnecessary, whether it be more or less particular, which is descriptive of the identity of that which is legally essential to the charge in the indictment, can ever be rejected as surplusage." Apply that rule to this case. It is legally essential to the charge to allege some intent to have the letter conveyed somewhere by post. Suppose the indictment had alleged an intent to have it conveyed between two places where no post-office existed, and over a route where no post-road was established by law. Inasmuch as the court must take notice of the laws establishing post-offices and post-roads, the indictment would then have been bad; because this necessary allegation would, on its face, have been false. Words, therefore, which describe the termini and the route, and thus show what in particular was intended, do identify the intent, and show it to be such an intent as was capable, in point of law, of existing.

And we are obliged to conclude that they cannot be treated as surplusage, and must be proved, substantially, as laid. We are of opinion, therefore, that there was a variance between the indictment and the proof; and that, for this cause, a new trial should be granted.

Case No. 15,157a.

UNITED STATES v. The FRANCIS F. JOHNSON.

[20 Niles, Reg. 137.]

District Court, D. South Carolina. April 6, 1821.

SLAVE TRADE — VIOLATION OF LAWS — LIBEL OF FORFEITURE.

[A vessel which cleared from Alexandria for New Orleans with a cargo of slaves, and which had on board two slaves engaged at the time of seizure, and long prior to shipping the cargo, in performing duty as members of the crew, but not rated as members thereof in the ship's articles or log book, held not subject to forfeiture under the statute relating to the slave trade, (4 Bior. & D. Laws 97; 2 Stat. 426,) because the said two slaves were not entered in the manifest as part of the cargo.]

[This was a libel of forfeiture against the brig Francis F. Johnson for alleged violation of the laws relating to the slave trade.]

DRAYTON, District Judge. The brig Francis F. Johnson departed from Alexandria in the District of Columbia, laden with negro slaves, to be transported coastwise, and destined for the port of New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana. All the slaves on board, except two, were entered on the manifest. One of those two acted as cabin boy, and the other as cook, and afterwards as an ordinary seaman before the mast. This vessel is libelled under the 9th section of the act prohibiting the importation of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States of America (4 Bior. & D. Laws, 97 [2 Stat. 426]), without having entered in the manifest the said two negro slaves; and the brig having been fallen in with by the United States vessel of war commanded by Capt. Lawrence Kearney, off the Salt Key Bank, in the entrance of the Gulf of Mexico, she has been sent in here for examination.

The claimants contend the vessel and negroes should be discharged, because the evidence will not support forfeiture under the statute, and upon this ground, I shall consider the case, as argued by Mr. Gadsden, district attorney for the United States, and Mr. Dunkin for the claimants.

The object of this act is to throw all proper difficulties in the way of the slave trade, and to close this with other doors of slave importation To that end, the 9th section of the act provides that no ship or vessel of the burthen of forty tons or more shall carry any negro, mulatto, or person of colour from one port of the United States to another for the purpose of transporting them, to be sold or disposed of as slaves, or to be held to service or labor, without the captain, master, or commander making out and subscribing duplicate manifests of every such negro, mulatto, or person of colour on board such ship or vessel; therein specifying the name and sex of each person, their age and stature, as near as may be, and the class to which they respectively belong, with the name and place of residence of every owner or shipper of the same; one of which manifests (executed under the forms prescribed in the act) to be retained by the collector of the port of departure and the other to be returned to the captain, master, or commander; with a permit specifying thereon, the number, names, and general description of such persons; and authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination. In failure whereof every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited to the use of the United States; and may be seized, prosecuted, and condemned in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof. Besides which, the captain, master, or commander of every such ship or vessel forfeits for every such negro, mulatto, or person of colour so transported or taken on board contrary to the provisions of the act the sum of one thousand dollars; one moiety thereof to the United States, and the other moiety to the use of any person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect. In addition to this act, an act of congress was passed on the 3rd March, 1819 [3 Stat. 532], entitled "An act in addition to the acts prohibiting the slave trade," by which the president of the United States is authorized to employ the armed vessels of the United States to cruise on the American coast, or coast of Africa, to enforce the acts of congress prohibiting the slave trade and American vessels employed contrary thereto in traffic or transportation of slaves, may be seized by such armed vessels, and brought into port of the United States for examination and adjudication. Under these acts the seizure has been made by Captain Kearney, in the performance of his duties; and the cause has been proceeded in before me, argued with much ability by the counsel who are concerned.

From the evidence it appears the two negroes who were the cause of the seizure have been acting on board of the brig Francis F. Johnson, one as cabin boy and the other as cook or ordinary mariner, for months past in the coasting trade of the Bay of Chesapeake, and were in that capacity when the vessel took her departure from Alexandria and was detained by the Enterprize. It also appears they were not entered on the manifest as part of the cargo; neither were they rated on the ship's articles or log book as part of the crew, by reason of which no document appeared on board, when the vessel was seized, exempting the said two slaves from the provisions of the act, or excusing them for not being on the manifest. On behalf of the claimants it was contended they ought not to have been entered in the manifest, as they were not transported for sale, but were acting on board as servants to the master or owner, and that in such capacities they were exempted by the first section of the act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchant service, passed July 20, 1790 [1 Stat. 131]. That they belonged to a citizen of Baltimore, in Maryland, who was agent of the owner of the vessel; and was either bargaining for, or had bargained for, the ownership of part of the vessel. The evidence also made known to the court that while the vessel was lying in the Potomac, ready for her voyage, the owner of the two slaves had intended to have gone in her to New Orleans, but, owing to sickness or some other cause, he did not. And that in a conversation on board he said, if one of those two negroes did not behave better, he might sell him at New Orleans. This was pressed by the district attorney as prima facie evidence they brought the vessel within the penalties of the act, and as a reason why the plea of exception should not be admitted.

I have considered this case with that attention which is due to its merits and to the mischiefs to be prevented; and being of opinion the case has not been sufficiently made out that these two negroes were to be transported to New Orleans for sale, or personal labor and service, but that they ought to be considered as part of the crew of the vessel, I must therefore discharge her and them from the seizure. I cannot, however, do so without previously mentioning that the conversation of the owner of the two negroes above alluded to throws suspicion on the case, and that, in all vessels engaged in transporting slaves from one state to another, all slaves acting as parts of the crew in any manner whatever should be noted on the vessel's articles as particularly designating them from the slaves on board as cargo, by which seizures, in a case like this, may hereafter be prevented. Captain Kearney has done nothing more than his duty in seizing the vessel and bringing her in for adjudication. It is therefore ordered and decreed that probable cause of seizure be certified; that the libel be dismissed; the costs, however, to be paid by claimants.

Case No. 15,158.

UNITED STATES v. The FRANCIS HATCH.

[4 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 289.]

District Court, D. Maryland. Dec. Term, 1864.

PRIZE — PROHIBITED TRADE — TREASURY REGULATIONS—EFFECT OF.

1. Under the act of congress of July 13, 1861, § 5 [12 Stat. 257], goods forming the cargo of a vessel proceeding to a point in the insurrectionary states are liable to forfeiture only while in transitu. And the vessel only while the contraband cargo is on board.

2. But under the regulations made by the secretary of the treasury by authority of the acts of July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 257], May 20, 1862 [12 Stat. 404], and July 2, 1864 [13 Stat. 375], a vessel engaging in trade with the insurrectionary districts is liable to forfeiture even after the termination of the prohibited voyage and the discharge of the contraband cargo.

3. The imposing of such forfeiture is within the power to make regulations conferred on the secretary of the treasury by the acts of congress. Congress has the constitutional right to confer such power, though quasi legislative, on the executive

4. Even if it be necessary for congress itself to exercise such power, it may be considered to have ratified and adopted such regulations by the act of July 2, 1864, § 3.

5. Therefore, where a vessel had been engaged in prohibited trade, but, before the libel was filed, had completed her voyage and discharged her cargo, a forfeiture was decreed by virtue of the regulations established by the secretary of the treasury.

Libel for forfeiture.

Addison & Thayer, for the United States.
Carter & Ridgeley, for claimants.

GILES, District Judge. The libel in this case has been filed by the district attorney of the United States, in which it is charged that the schooner Francis Hatch has conveyed passengers and merchandise from the city of New York to that part of the state of Virginia declared to be in insurrection by the president's proclamation, without a license or permit from the proper authorities. There are some nine counts or articles in the libel, propounding the matters relied on as grounds or causes of forfeiture, some drawn under the act of July 13, 1861; the others under the act of May 20, 1862, and its supplements, and the various rules and regulations of the secretary of the treasury, prepared under the authority given to him by said acts. At the commencement of the trial of this case, the various claimants of that part of the cargo which was brought from the city of New York to this city, having satisfied the court by competent testimony that they were entirely innocent of any intention to violate any of the laws of their country, and had no knowledge of the shipment of goods on board the Francis Hatch, to be delivered in Virginia; and this not being contested by the district attorney, the court said, when it passed a final decree in this case, it would dismiss the libel as to the said cargo, and award the same to the several claimants. Two claims were filed for the vessel: one by John P. Williams, claiming to be the owner of the same, and the other by Messrs. Capron & Co., of this city, claiming as bailees of the vessel by virtue of a mortgage and power of attorney from John P. Williams, dated the 14th day of January, 1864, and also as lien creditors for advances and disbursements, on account of said vessel, to a large amount.

In the answers filed by the claimants it was expressly denied that the said vessel had carried either passengers or merchandise to Virginia, as charged in the libel. But the testimony showed that on three voyages made by the Francis Hatch between New York City and this port, she put out into a yawl-boat passengers and merchandise, just opposite Gwyn's Island, in the Chesapeake Bay; that this was always done at night; and on the several occasions, a man who passed then under the name of Hayden, was one of the party so put out. Gwyn's Island is in the Chesapeake Bay, quite near to the Virginia shore, and just below the mouth of the Piankatank river. A large amount of testimony was given, which it will not be necessary for the purposes of this opinion to refer to, further than to say: it convinced the court that the passengers and goods so put out from the Francis Hatch in the Chesapeake Bay, were intended to be landed, and were so landed, either on Gwyn's Island or on the adjacent Virginia shore. The evidence also shows that the Francis Hatch was not seized until she had completed her last voyage in November, and when she was moored to the wharf and had been entered at the custom-house at this port. The counsel for the claimants contended that as the voyage was ended, and the cargo intended for a state in insurrection, no longer on board; and that as the vessel when seized was not proceeding to a state in insurrection, there could be no forfeiture in this case under the 5th section of the act of July 13th, 1861; and that there can be no forfeiture of the vessel under the act of May 20th 1862, and its supplement, and under the rules and regulations of the secretary of the treasury, because by neither the said act nor its supplement is the vessel declared to be forfeited; and although it is provided by the several series of regulations adopted from time to time by the secretary of the treasury, with the approval of the president, that a vessel violating the same shall be forfeited, such a provision is unconstitutional and void, the secretary of the treasury, under the power given to him by the said acts of congress "to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry into effect the purpose of said acts," had no authority to forfeit the vessel, &c., and that even if congress had intended to impart to him any such authority, they had no constitutional right to do so, as it would be the exercise of a legislative power by a branch of the executive department of the government.

I think I state thus briefly the substance of the learned and able defence made in this case by the counsel for the claimants. They referred the court to two decisions made in this circuit by the late chief justice of the supreme court. Upon the first point made by them they cited the decision of Judge Taney in the case of U. S. v. Two Thousand Bushels of Wheat [Case No. 16,589], Penn & Mitchel claimants, made last June, on appeal from the common law side of this court. That case was this:—The wheat had been brought to this port from St. Mary's county and consigned to the claimants, who stored it here for sale, and who made advances on it to the amount of its full value. They had no reason to suppose that it was not grown in this state, although it appeared from the evidence that it was brought from Virginia across the Potomac into St. Mary's county before being shipped to Baltimore. It was in store here ten days before it was seized. It was tried before a jury in this court, and I instructed the jury that, if they found these facts, their verdict must be for the claimants. From this decision the government took an appeal to the circuit court, and the decision of this court was affirmed. In delivering his opinion Judge Taney construes the act of July 13th, 1861, as follows: His language is: "Taking the different provisions of this law together, it appears to me that the forfeiture attaches to the goods when they are on their passage, and adheres to them while they remain in that condition, that is in transitu between the forbidden places, and no longer." In a subsequent part of his opinion, he says: "The words 'together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same' confirm this conclusion. The vessel is not forfeited unless the unlawful cargo is actually on board; and it would be a strained and unreasonable construction of these words to forfeit the vessel when it had a lawful cargo not liable to forfeiture. The vessel is forfeited when and while it is carrying on commercial intercourse between the United States and the interdicted places. The forfeiture adheres to the vessel while she is thus engaged, and no longer. It is only when the cargo is unlawful the vessel conveying the same is forfeited; and when that cargo is landed and separated from the vessel it cannot be said to be conveying the same, and is not forfeited by any provision of the said law."

Now, beside the respect which I should entertain for any opinion to which he gave the sanction of his great name, he was the presiding judge in this circuit; and his decisions, until reversed by the supreme court, are the law of this court and binding on it. In pursuance of that decision there can be no forfeiture of the Francis Hatch under the 5th section of the act of July 13th, 1861. Now can this vessel be forfeited for a violation of the rules and regulations of the secretary of the treasury? To oppose such forfeiture the counsel for the claimants have referred to the other decision of Judge Taney, mentioned above, which was made in the case of U. S. v. Box of Dry Goods [unreported], Geo. W. Carpenter, claimant. Now, in that case, the dry goods were intended to be carried from this port to the claimant, in Charles county, in this state, and were seized in this port by the collector on the charge that a fraud had been committed in obtaining the permit; and that in such case the goods were forfeited by the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, as well as by the act of May 20th, 1862. The chief justice held in that case that neither congress nor the secretary of the treasury had any constitutional authority to place any restrictions upon the internal trade of Maryland, as this was a subject-matter beyond the jurisdiction of congress, who, under the constitution, had power only "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes." He held, therefore, that so far as the regulations of the secretary of the treasury applied to the trade between Baltimore and the lower counties of this state, they were void; and that, therefore, the box of dry goods seized in that case must be restored to the owner. But the question that I am now called upon to decide has not yet been decided by any of the federal courts, so far as I have been able to learn. No case has been cited by the counsel on either side, and I have heard of none. It is presented, therefore, for the first time, and is a question of great importance, to which I have given my most careful deliberation. Neither the act of May 20th, 1862, nor that of July 2d, 1864, provides for a forfeiture of the vessel. But the act of May 20th, 1862, contains a provision forfeiting any goods, wares, or merchandise transported or attempted to be transported in violation of the said act, or of any regulation of the secretary of the treasury, established in pursuance of the authority given to him by said act. But both acts authorize the secretary of the treasury to establish all such general or special regulations as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of the acts. The language of the last act (July 2d, 1864) is: "That the secretary of the treasury, with the approval of the president, shall make such rules and regulations as are necessary to secure the proper and economical execution of the provisions of this act." And one of the provisions of said last-mentioned act was, "That no goods, wares, or merchandise shall be taken into a state declared in insurrection, or transported therein, except to and from such places and to such monthly amounts as shall have been previously agreed upon in writing by the commanding-general of the department in which such places are situated, and an officer designated by the secretary of the treasury for that purpose." Four series of rules and regulations have been made and published by the secretary of the treasury, and approved by the president, viz.: Those of the 28th August, 1862; those of the 31st of March, 1863; those of the 11th September, 1863, and lastly, those of the 30th July, 1864. I have not been able to obtain a copy of the first series, but the three last contain provisions for the forfeiture of a vessel found violating any of the said regulations. I shall quote (as far as it may be necessary) only the provisions or regulations of the last series. They were approved by the president, July 30th, 1864. 1st regulation is as follows: "No goods, wares, or merchandise will be allowed to be transported to, from, or within any state or part of a state, under restriction or declared in insurrection, except under permits, certificates, and clearances, as hereinafter provided." The 45th regulation is: "All vessels, boats, and other vehicles used for transportation, violating regulations and local rules, and all cotton, tobacco, or other products or merchandise shipped or transported or purchased or sold in violation thereof, will be forfeited to the United States." It is not pretended in this case that the "Francis Hatch" had on any of the three voyages mentioned, any permit to land goods in Virginia.

Now, the first question is, what power did congress intend to give to the secretary of the treasury, when it authorized him to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to secure the proper execution of the provisions of the act they passed? Did they authorize him to enforce the due observance of the regulations he might establish by penalties? This will depend upon the true meaning and import of the words "to regulate." Worcester, in the last edition of his dictionary, defines the verb "to regulate" as follows: "to reduce to order, to direct, to rule, to govern, to conduct," &c. And in the constitution of the United States, framed by some of the greatest men of their day, and a paper that will command the admiration of all time, this word "regulate" is used several times. In article 1st, section 8, subsection 3, power is given to congress "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states and with the Indian tribes." Under which grant of power congress has, from time to time, passed various laws to regulate our foreign and coastwise trade, and enforced their due observance with heavy penalties. No one, I believe, has ever questioned the constitutionality of such laws. Again, in same section, subsection 14, power is given "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces." Under this grant of power congress passed and adopted "The Articles of War," which, in many cases in time of war, provide the punishment of death. And in article 4th, section 3, power is given to congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Under this grant of power congress has, for more than seventy years, punished all crimes committed in the several territories of the United States until their admission as states into the Union. Without dwelling further upon this point, it appears to me, that the word "regulation" means something more than the mere preparation of a set of rules in reference to any particular subject. It includes the power to enforce the due observance of those rules by penalties and forfeitures. But, say the learned counsel for the claimants, while congress possess this power themselves, they cannot impart or delegate it to any branch of the executive department of the government. Now, I am free to admit that this is a question of some difficulty. But the rule which governs courts of justice, when deciding upon the constitutionality of an act of a co-ordinate department of the government, is, "that unless the contrary is clearly demonstrated, the presumption must always be in favor of the validity of such act. Now, we have four series of regulations to govern the commercial intercourse between the states in insurrection and the rest of the United States. The three first of these regulations were prepared and sanctioned by the late secretary of the treasury, a gentleman who is now placed at the head of the judiciary of the United States; and the last regulations prepared by the present secretary of the treasury—both gentlemen of large experience in the public service. In a case of doubt, therefore, it is the duty of the federal judiciary to uphold and maintain these regulations; as it would be their imperative duty, if their unconstitutionality was clearly demonstrated, to refuse to recognise or enforce them. I grant that the construction I give to the word "regulations" includes the exercise of a quasi legislative power. But this is nothing new in the history and operations of our government. The president, by and through the secretary of war, prepared the regulations for the government of the army; many of which prescribe punishments and define offences not specified in the articles of war. And the supreme court, in [Gratiot v. U. S.] 4 How. [45 U. S.] 117, say: "As to the army regulations, this court has too repeatedly said that they have the force of law," &c. In this state, as in most of the states, its constitution or bill of rights contained a provision that the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of the government ought to be separate and distinct from each other. Yet in a late case which came before the court of appeals of this state, in which the constitutionality of the Baltimore police bill came under review, a bill in which the power of appointing the commissioners was reserved to the legislature, the court maintained the validity of the said law, although the article in the bill of rights to which I have referred, was much relied upon in the argument. And also in this state, the legislature has again and again granted to municipal corporations of its own creation the power of imposing taxes, one of the highest powers belonging to the legislative department. And the exercise of this power by the municipal corporation has been sustained. This provision in the bill of rights to which I have referred is intended, no doubt, to prevent one department of the government from usurping the power confided to either of the other departments. It was so held in the case of Crane v. Meginnis, 1 Gill & J. 463, and in the case of Regents of the University of Maryland v. Williams, 9 Gill. & J. 410; and is not to be construed as a prohibition upon the legislative department from authorizing a branch of the executive department to exercise quasi legislative powers in a prescribed case. Speaking of this article in the bill of rights, Justice Tuck, in delivering the opinion of the court in the Police Bill Case, to which I have referred (15 Md. 457), says: "But this article is not to be interpreted as enjoining a complete separation between these several departments. Practically, it has never been so in any of the states in whose fundamental law the principle has been attested." And he further says: "Entire practical separation was not designed." And that it was designed to engraft this principle in our system "only so far as comported with free government, as an inhibition upon the exercise by one department of powers conferred on any other by the constitution." And in the case of State of Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge Co., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 429, the supreme court sustained congress in the exercise of what was certainly a quasi judicial power. The supreme court in a previous case (13 How. [54 U. S.] 518) had decreed that the Wheeling bridge was a nuisance, and should be removed. Since the passing of said decree congress had, by the act of August 31st, 1852, declared the said bridge to be a lawful structure in its present position and elevation. A bill was filed to enforce the decree for the removal of the bridge, and the supreme court, in 18 How. [59 U. S.] 429, refused to enforce it, and sustained the action of congress in the premises. Sustaining the law, it is true, upon the ground that it was the exercise by congress of the power to regulate commerce between the states.

There is another view of this question which seems to me to be very clear. If the authority of the secretary to enact these regulations and enforce their observance by forfeitures, be doubtful, congress possessed the power to ratify and adopt them. This doctrine is discussed by Judge Grier, in delivering the opinion of the supreme court in the Prize Cases, reported in 2 Black [67 U. S.] 679. The question in those cases was the validity of the blockade proclaimed by the president before the meeting of congress in 1861. That learned judge held that, if it were necessary to the technical existence of a war, that it should have a legislative sanction, such sanction was found in the various laws subsequently passed by congress for carrying on the war. Now congress, by the 3d section of the act of July 2d, 1864, provides for the disposition of money received from the sales of captured property, &c., or from fees collected under the rules and regulations made by the secretary of the treasury, and approved by the president respectively, 28th August, 1862, 31st March, 1863, and 11th September, 1863. Now each of these series of regulations contained a provision forfeiting any vessel engaged in their violation.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, to which I have referred, are valid, and that by them this vessel must be forfeited to the United States, and I will sign a decree to that effect. As I said before, the evidence has convinced me that this vessel, on her last voyage, conveyed passengers and goods on their way to Virginia, who reached there; that this was done with the knowledge of Hayden (whose true name is Snowden), and who was himself on board, and who was the real owner of the "Francis Hatch," the name of John P. Williams being used for the purpose of deception. I shall not now pass upon the claim of Messrs. Capron & Co. for advances under their power of attorney. This is not the proper time to do so. That claim, if it exists and can be maintained, must be filed under and subject to the requisitions of the act of congress of March 3d, 1863 [12 Stat. 759]. I shall not pass upon it now for another reason: Mr. Capron is, I understand, held in custody, charged with a violation of certain provisions of the act of July 2d, 1864, and may be indicted by a grand jury and tried on the charge. I would not, therefore, discuss the facts proved in relation to his connection with this vessel at this time, lest I might do him injustice, or prejudice any defence he might be able to make on such trial.

UNITED STATES v. FRANK.

[2 Biss. 263;[1] 3 N. B. R. 175 (Quarto); 17 Pittsb. Law J. 140; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 236.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. April, 1870.

BANKRUPTCY — INDICTMENT FOR FRAUDULENTLY OBTAINING CREDIT.

1. The forty-fourth section of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 539)] construed.

2. A man who, while carrying on a retail trade, buys large quantities of goods and ships them under the pretense of needing them in his regular business, but ships them off and sells them at wholesale at a sacrifice, is guilty under the act.

[1] [Reported by Josiah H. Bissell, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

In bankruptcy. This was an indictment found under the following clause of the bankrupt law: "If any debtor," etc., "shall within three months before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business, and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, obtain on credit from any person any goods and chattels, with intent to defraud," etc., "he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof in any court of the United States, shall be punished by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a term not exceeding three years."

J. O. Glover, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Silver & Willard, for defendant.

BLODGETT, District Judge. Gentlemen of the jury: To constitute the offense, the accused must (1) obtain goods and chattels from some person or persons, on credit, under the false pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade; (2) such credit must be obtained within three months from the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy; (3) such goods and chattels must be obtained on credit, as aforesaid, with intent to defraud.

The obvious purpose of this statute is to prevent a person from obtaining goods on credit, with the expectation on the part of those who give the credit that they will be disposed of in the ordinary course of business, when, in fact, he intends to dispose of such goods in some extraordinary or unusual manner, or knows that he is insolvent, and that the goods would go into the hands of his assignee in bankruptcy, and be disposed of for the benefit of his creditors generally, and not in the usual course of trade. It was to prevent men from abusing their credit, and imposing, by means of it, upon others, that this act was passed to compel, as far as law will do it, the observance of good faith in commercial transactions between business men.

In this case it seems from the evidence, and may be taken as undisputed, that during the latter part of 1866, and until the 6th of January, 1868, the firm of E. Frank & Bro. was engaged in business as retail dealers in boots and shoes at Springfield in this state, and that the defendant was the active, and so far as the evidence in this case goes, would seem to have been the principal member of the firm. About the 16th of October, 1867, the defendant appears, from the evidence, to have been in this city, and to have purchased on credit of from thirty to ninety days, from the several firms named in the indictment, quite considerable bills of merchandise, mainly in the direct line of his business, and with the statement that such goods were to be used for resale in his business at Springfield, stating to some that he expected to open another store at Alton, in this state. While making these purchases he made representations as to his financial condition, showing that, if true, he was then fully worthy of the credit he asked. And the witnesses testify that these goods were obtained upon the faith they placed in these representations, and with the belief and expectation that the goods so sold him would be retailed in due course of business at the store of said firm; that on the faith of these representations then made he continued to obtain still further bills of goods up to the 18th of December, 1867, the last bill amounting to $468.91, being ordered on that day from Hardenburg & Page, of this city, and shipped to him pursuant to such order.

It also appears in proof that on the 5th of October, 1867, defendant commenced shipping the goods from his store in Springfield, by express, to St. Louis, directing them in cypher, such shipments amounting to over seventy packages. And that on the 6th of January, 1868, the defendant applied to the United States district court for the Southern district of this state, for the benefit of the bankrupt act, rendering a meagre schedule of assets, and a much larger schedule of liabilities than he had represented at the time he had obtained the goods on credit; that Emil Frank, one of the members of the firm, could not be found, and had probably absconded about the time of the application for the benefit of the bankrupt act.

These are the main features of the case on the part of the prosecution.

There seems no dispute that the goods were obtained on credit under the pretense that the defendant was carrying on business in the ordinary way, and that these goods were to be used in the ordinary course of business —that is, for retail purposes from the store of E. Frank & Bro. The main question now is, were these pretenses false, and did defendant at the time he obtained these goods, or any of them, on credit, intend to use them in some different manner from that of his ordinary and apparent course of trade.

Usually we can only ascertain a man's intentions from his acts. Criminal intentions are not as a rule divulged except as they are to be inferred from the conduct of the parties, and developed thereby. There is no positive evidence showing the time when the idea of obtaining these goods from the firms in Chicago, for the avowed purpose of selling them at retail in his store at Springfield and in violation of that faith, shipping them off to St. Louis and selling them at wholesale was conceived. But from the circumstances surrounding the whole transaction, you are to infer what his probable intent and purpose was at the time he obtained the goods. In examining these circumstances you will properly note the short time that elapsed between the obtaining of the goods and the shipment of a large part of defendant's stock in trade to St. Louis to be disposed of in an extraordinary manner. The fact that this process of shipment was going on at the time, part of the goods were ordered and obtained, is evident, one lot of goods having been ordered on the 17th or 18th of December, when he was daily shipping his goods away by express.

The fact that he made false and conflicting statements to his creditors, as to his financial condition when he obtained the goods (if you shall believe them false from the evidence,) is also an important circumstance tending to show fraudulent intent. You will remember that in making statements of his means, he stated to some firms that he was worth $18,000, over and above all debts, and to others that he was worth $20,000, and did not owe a cent, and to others that he was worth $15.000, over all his debts; and that these creditors were put off by false pretexts when they personally visited him to investigate his affairs. Any subterfuges or acts resorted to, to keep creditors quiet while this process of depleting his stock was going on, are circumstances which you can consider, and from which, if cogent enough in your minds, you may infer an intent to defraud, reaching back to the time when the goods were obtained.

But you must at the same time be careful not to presume criminal intent, or an intent to defraud, without evidence. The law presumes every one innocent until proven guilty, and it is your duty in examining the conduct of the defendant in these transactions to give him the benefit of every reasonable doubt, and to construe circumstances in his favor rather than against him, if susceptible of two constructions.

The law makes you the especial judges of the weight of evidence, and the question of intent is a question of fact to be settled by you under the proofs. But while you are bound to give the defendant the benefit of every reasonable doubt, it must be a reasonable doubt, a doubt engendered by the insufficiency of the evidence for the prosecution to establish in your minds a belief of guilt. In other words you must deem it unreasonable to believe him guilty under all the proofs in the case. If, then, the evidence satisfies you that the defendant obtained any portion of these goods on credit, under the false pretense of carrying on business, when in truth he was not at the time carrying on business in due course of trade. but was then secretly shipping and selling them at a sacrifice at less than cost, and that said purchase was so made with intent to defraud, you will find the defendant guilty. But if the evidence does not establish these facts of false pretense of carrying on business and intent to defraud, you will find the defendant not guilty.

And I take occasion to say that if the proof is deemed by you sufficient to establish the facts which I have told you must combine to make out the offense, I hope you will not hesitate to say so by your verdict.

The interests of the community require that offenses of this character shall, when duly proven be condignly punished, and no feeling of sympathy for the individual should prevent the due visitation of the penalties of the law upon those who are proven guilty. You owe it to every business man, to yourselves, and the community, to punish offences of this character, which if suffered to go unpunished, would destroy the confidence of all men in the efficacy and majesty of the law, and to see to it that when a case is fully made out, punishment shall follow the offense. Men should be taught that it is as dangerous to commit crime, under the guise of commercial transactions as with the false key of the burglar, or the slung-shot of the midnight marauder.

If you shall, therefore, find that the prosecution has made out their case, you will simply find the defendant guilty. It will be for the court to fix the term of imprisonment, and whether it shall be at hard labor or without it.

The defendant was found guilty [and sentenced to the late county jail for sixty days.] [2]

CUSTOMS DUTIES — RELIQUIDATION — LIMITATION.

1. After the collector has liquidated the duty on imported goods, and the duty has been paid and the goods delivered to the importer, no part of the same nor any samples being retained by the collector, he has no power to make a reliquidation upon a subsequent report of an appraiser who never saw the goods.

[Cited in U. S. v. McDowell, 21 Fed. 564; U. S. v. Doherty, 27 Fed. 733.]

2. The year, within which, under Act 1874, c. 391, § 21 [18 Stat. 190], the collector can reliquidate the duty, runs from the time of the presentation to the collector of the "entry" by the importer, and not from the time of the first liquidation of the duty.

Nash & Holt, for defendant.

CHOATE, District Judge. These were two actions to recover balances of duties alleged to be due upon goods imported by the defendant [James Frazer] by virtue of an alleged reliquidation of the duties by the collector. The collector having, upon the report of the appraiser, liquidated the duty, the goods were delivered to the defendant and the duty thus ascertained was paid, not even samples of the goods remaining in the possession of the collector. Afterwards another appraiser, who had never seen the goods nor samples of them, made another report, classifying the goods differently, whereby, if the new classification was correct, they would be subject to a higher rate of duty, and thereupon the collector made what is claimed to be a reliquidation of the duty, and on this reliquidation the suits are brought. In one of the cases this attempted reliquidation was more than one year after the entry of the goods, but less than a year after the first liquidation.

The plaintiffs now move for a new trial, on the ground of a misdirection in matter of law, verdicts having been ordered for the defendant.

Upon a careful review of the briefs of counsel and of the cases cited, I adhere to the opinion expressed upon the trial, that there is no power in the collector after the goods are delivered to the importer, and neither the goods nor any part of them, nor samples, are accessible for examination for the purpose of appraisement or classification, to reliquidate the duty upon the report of an appraiser who never examined the goods. I think the cases of Westray v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 322; U. S. v. Cousinery [Case No. 14,878]; Iasigi v. The Collector, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 375; Watt v. U. S. [Case No. 17,292],—do not sustain the proposition of the learned district attorney that the collector has any such power. Acts 1874, c. 391, § 21 (18 Stat. 190), and 1875, c. 136, § 1 (18 Stat. 469), appear to recognize some authority on the part of the collector to correct mistakes in the liquidation of duties, but neither statute nor decision of any court is cited which extends that authority to a case like the present, and the exercise of such a power might introduce into the customs revenue system intolerable abuses, and would be in itself most unreasonable.

Whatever power of reliquidation the collector has, it seems to me that the year within which the exercise of this authority is limited begins to run, not from the first liquidation, but from the date of the presentation to the collector by the importer of the "entry." The words "one year from the time of entry," in Act 1874, c. 391, § 21, cannot, in my judgment, be construed, either from reference to other parts of the act or otherwise, as "one year from the time of liquidation." The language of the section shows clearly that the distinction between these two points of time was present to the minds of the legislators who framed this law, and the words used are too plain to call for construction by reference to extraneous considerations. Motions for new trial denied.

Indictment against the defendant [William D. Freeman] for the murder of one David Whitehead, on the high seas, on board of the brig Floyd, of which the defendant was master, and Whitehead a seaman, and one of the crew, on the 28th of April, 1827. The indictment laid the charge in two counts. The first stated, that the prisoner made an assault upon Whitehead, and threw him overboard, and he was drowned. The second stated, that the prisoner, being master of the brigantine Floyd, and Whitehead an ordinary seaman on board the said vessel, but in a weak state of body, and unable to perform the duty of a seaman, and the prisoner, knowing that Whitehead was unable to perform his duty, wilfully ordered and compelled him, without his consent, and against his will, to go aloft upon the mainmast and rigging of the vessel, and that Whitehead, by said compulsion, attempting to go up aloft, by reason of his weakness of body fell overboard into the sea and was drowned, whereby said Freeman wilfully murdered said Whitehead.

Six witnesses were produced and examined on the part of the government, all of them sailors on board of the brig at the time of Whitehead's decease, and who, together with Whitehead, the prisoner, and the mate of the brig, made up the complement of the brig's crew. These witnesses, together with the mate, who was examined on behalf of the prisoner, concurred in testifying, that the prisoner had uniformly treated the deceased with great severity and brutality. The following was the testimony of the first witness examined on the part of the government, which was confirmed by the other witnesses, and does not differ materially from the evidence given by the mate, who was examined on the part of the prisoner:

Thomas Richardson, of Southborough, was on board the Floyd, shipped in Charleston, S. C., went on board 10th of April, bound to Antwerp. The crew consisted of all that had been sworn as witnesses, and one more, also a young man named David Whitehead, who shipped as cook; nine in all, officers included. William D. Freeman, prisoner, was commander. Shipped at $18 a month, with small stores; Whitehead at $16. He was a young man about 23; had not been to sea long; don't know whether he was able to perform the duty of cook, for he had not a chance to try. The crew went on board the 10th, and sailed the 15th. Whitehead served as cook till the 23d or 24th. He then exchanged with John B. Davison, who had shipped at Philadelphia at $10 a month; understood that Whitehead agreed to take the $10. Witness never heard the captain agree to, or object to the exchange. Before they went over the bar, W. was beat and cuffed, so that he became so stupified, that he had no chance to do any thing. The captain was continually calling on him, beating him, cuffing, and pulling him by the hair. He never went into the cabin without being beat. Never had a chance to do any thing without being called upon, interrupted, and ordered to do something else. On the 25th, he was sent up, with another hand, to let a reef out of the foretopsail, and by accident he left one point untied, which, in hoisting the sail, split the topsail. When the captain came on deck and saw the hole, he asked how it came, and being informed, took Whitehead and beat him with his fist and a piece of rattling stuff, and kicked him. Witness afterwards saw marks, where the skin was broken, on his head, and black spots on his arms, and other parts of his body. The captain then sent him to the galley, and the next day lashed him to the ring bolt, where he was kept 24 hours, and afterwards lashed him 24 hours to the rail. His hands were lashed behind him with spun yarn, and he was lashed round his middle with a rope to the ring bolt. When he was lashed to the rail, the captain took a stick from the tar bucket, and put it into his lips, then laughed at him, and asked him where he had been stealing molasses. The weather at this time was very cold and severe. The captain asked him if he wanted a dram. He said he should like one. The captain replied, "I will give you a dram that will fix you," and then put two doses of tartar emetic into a glass of New England rum, and gave it to him. It made him vomit very much. The captain swore fifty times, that he would never be satisfied until he saw his end. Before being tied, the captain sent him up to scrape the main topgallant mast. He did not scrape to the captain's satisfaction, and he went up after him with a piece of rope in his hand, and took hold of the rigging and tried to shake him off, while he was holding by the mast with one hand and scraping with the other. When lashed to the ring bolt he had nothing to eat; and when lashed to the rail nothing but half a biscuit and about a pint of water, or half a pint. The biscuit was broken up and laid upon a cask, and he was obliged to eat it like a beast. The weather was cold, and the captain obliged W. to pull off one pair of trowsers, and he was exposed to the cold and wet with only a pair of duck trowsers on; the sea continually breaking over him. In the afternoon of the 27th, after taking the tartar emetic, the captain took off the rope, and asked him if he was able to perform his duty as cook. He said he was. The captain said he lied; took him by the hair of his head and whipped him; then holding up the rope to the crew, said, "Antwerp and Boston will uphold me in this." After he had done beating him, he tied him to the rail with an inch and a half or two inch rope, in the middle of the deck, so that he should have nothing to lean against, set him to watch the sea gulls, and asked him what colour their heads were, and when he answered, said he lied. Witness examined the spun yarn, having made it himself, was two or three yarn spun yarn; was tied by the captain as tight as he could draw it, and the hands of the deceased were very much swollen, and as black as a hat. Witness examined his hands previous to his going up aloft; they were stiff and much swollen, so that he could hardly close his thumb and finger. He was so weak, that when the vessel rolled he could not stand properly on his feet. On the morning of the 28th, the captain ordered the mate to make a large scrubbing brush, too large for any man to use, and with that ordered W. to scrub the deck on the weather side. He appeared then unable to do duty. Immediately afterwards, at 8 or 12 o'clock, the hands were called to hand the mainsail; five went on to the yard. Witness at the helm. W. being then scrubbing, the captain asked the mate why he did not send that damned soldier aloft to hand the mainsail. The mate replied, that he was not able to go aloft. Witness also told the captain, that so sure as that man went aloft, he would never come on deck again alive. The captain said, "Damn him, send him aloft;" and took up a piece of rigging and struck him, saying, "Damn you, start along. I never shall be satisfied until I do see the end of you. Now, damn you, away with you aloft." The man crawled up the rigging very slowly, and reached the yard. He went upon the lee yard, and had just got to the end of the yard. A man next to him said, "David, come try and hand me in the beck if you can." He attempted to get hold of the beck of the sail, and he fell overboard, not being able to hold on any longer. He struck upon the rail, and fell overboard. Witness heard him after he was overboard, luffed the vessel, made some attempt to get the jolly boat down, but found it would be of no use; and besides the sea was heavy, and it would have been dangerous to put to sea in it. The vessel was then a little to the westward of the Grand Banks, and there was no vessel in sight. The crew said, "The poor fellow is gone." The captain said nothing. Witness told the captain, he hoped he would now be satisfied, he had said he would be the death of him, and by his means he was now dead. The captain made no reply. Whitehead, on board of the vessel, was as civil a man as witness ever was with. Had not much skill as a sailor. In answer to a question, how he knew that the captain put two doses of tartar emetic in the drink that he gave to the deceased, said, that he told the mate, and mate told the witness. When Whitehead came on board, he was very hearty, strong, and lively. On being cross-examined: Whitehead, with Fearson, one of the crew, attempted to escape from the vessel before she left the harbor of Charleston, but they were retaken and brought back. The captain did not, on the voyage from Charleston to Antwerp, and thence to St. Ubes and Boston, strike any other of the crew, but used very harsh language to them. Witness had a quarrel with the captain about some twine. He had been, with the other witnesses, confined in jail for the last three weeks, to secure their attendance at this trial. When Whitehead was tied to the ringbolt, he was lashed down, in a sitting posture, so that he could not get up; when to the rail, he was standing, and at a distance from the rail, so that he should have nothing to lean against. There was some complaint of the cook, by the crew, before they left Charleston harbor, that he did not cook well.

Several very respectable witnesses were examined in the defence, who testified to the general good character of the prisoner, for many years previous to this event. Several other witnesses also testified, that some of the sailors, who were witnesses on the part of the government, had expressed to them, or in their presence, great enmity towards the prisoner, and one of them testified, that Richardson, whose testimony is given above, gave the witness an account of the transaction, and said, that the captain was a damned rascal, and ought to be hung, and that he meant to do the best he could to get him hung; that the crew had all sided against the captain, and he offered to bet with the witness ten dollars against five, that he would be hung. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

The trial was conducted by Mr. Blake, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the United States, and by Messrs. Sewall and Bassett for the prisoner. The former cited Act Cong. 1825, c. 67, § 3; 8 Laws [published by authority, 4 Stat. 115]; 4 Bl. Comm. 194; 1 Hale, P. C. 431; 2 Strange, 856; Palmer, 545; Fost. Crown Law, 32, 322; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 842, note; 1 Starkie, Ev. 506, 511; 2 Starkie, Ev. 959. It was admitted, that the brig Floyd was owned by American citizens resident in Boston, and was duly registered, and that the defendant, Freeman, was master on the voyage.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in the course of his summing up to the jury, stated his opinion as follows:

This is an indictment for murder on the high seas; and it is competent for the jury, upon a view of the whole matter, either to acquit the defendant of all guilt, or to convict him of the crime, as alleged in the indictment, or to find him guilty of manslaughter. There are some general considerations, upon which the arguments at the bar render it necessary for the court to bestow a passing comment. In the first place, the general good character of the defendant may be properly brought into the cause, and ought to have weight with the jury in all cases, where the facts are doubtful, or admit of different interpretations. But where the evidence is positive, and satisfactory to the jury, such good character certainly cannot overcome the just presumption of guilt arising therefrom; for such is the infirmity of human nature, that men, even of exemplary life and character, are sometimes suddenly betrayed into excesses, and hurried on, by their passions, to the commission of the grossest offences. Previous good character is therefore a circumstance entitled to the consideration of the jury, and ought to be thrown into the scale in favor of mercy; but if the facts, which establish the guilt of the party, are supported by proofs entirely credible and unexceptionable, there is no pretence to say, that a jury is bound to acquit the party merely because of such character In the next place, as to the position, which has been so strongly urged at the bar in defence of the accused, that common seamen are not entitled to belief, though their testimony is given under oath in a court of justice. There is no such rule of law in respect to this class of persons. Seamen, like other persons, if not interested or infamous, are competent witnesses in the trial of criminal as well as civil causes. The law has pronounced no general sentence of exclusion against them; and there is nothing, in their course of life, or general characters, which would warrant such a harsh and vindictive proceeding. They are competent witnesses, and their credit is to be left to the jury, to be judged of under all the circumstances of each case. Their testimony is open to every suggestion arising from their individual characters, their station in life, their manner of testifying, the nature of the facts related by them, their prejudices, and passions, and feelings, and indeed all the considerations which abate the force of evidence in every other case. They have a right to be heard in what they testify under oath, like other men; and the jury, who should wholly disregard their testimony, simply because they were seamen, and thus involve the whole class in one indiscriminate proscription of discredit, as contended for at the bar, would betray their proper duty, and supercede, instead of enforcing the law.

In the next place, as to the rights and duties of masters of ships, in relation to the crew, during the voyage. It is doubtless true, that the master has a right to require of them a prompt and ready performance of duty, and an habitual obedience to reasonable commands at all times. The safety of the ship and the success of the voyage essentially depend upon the due enforcement of this right. And in proportion as the urgency of the occasion, and the necessities of the sea service, require instant compliance with such commands, the duty of the seamen to obey becomes more pressing and obligatory. If obedience does not follow, the master may compel it by punishment, and the nature and extent of the punishment must be decided by the exigency of the case. The master may also apply punishment, by way of correction, for past as well as present offences, to preserve the good order and discipline of the ship. But, after all, however summary or strict may be his power, it is not unlimited, nor is it to be exercised in an arbitrary, cruel, or revengeful manner The authority of the master, on board the ship, is nearly allied to that of a parent, and is to be used with reasonable tenderness and humanity. No punishment can be inflicted unless for reasonable provocation or cause; and it must be moderate, and just, and proportionate to the nature and aggravation of the offence. The law does not permit the master to gratify a brutal and low revenge, or to inflict cruel and unnecessary punishments. It allows no excess, either in the mode, or the nature, or the object of the punishment. It upholds the exercise of the authority only when it is for salutary purposes, not when it arises from personal prejudice, caprice, or dislike, or from gross and vindictive passions. In every case, therefore, where punishment is applied, the master is responsible, both civilly and criminally, if he wantonly exceed the measure of justice.

In respect to the general principles of law, applicable to cases of homicide, there has been no controversy at the bar; and I am spared the necessity of expounding them beyond what has been read from approved authorities. But the circumstances of this case call for an explicit instruction to you upon the points made in the defence. These are: (1) That the death of Whitehead (the seaman, whose death is feloniously charged in the indictment), was solely owing to accident and misadventure in the course of his duty, the fall from the yard not being occasioned by his debility, but by circumstances which might have occasioned it to a healthy seaman. (2) If his death was not owing to accident or misadventure, but simply to his debility, yet the circumstances of the case do not show, that such debility was so known to the master, that the order, that he should go aloft, was unjustifiable or wantonly wrong. (3) That if the order was not strictly justifiable, still the act was not the result of personal malice to the deceased in particular, nor of brutal and malignant passions or feelings, which establish general malice, and, therefore, in no event can the facts justify a conviction of murder. (4) That it is not a case even of manslaughter; for there was not such a want of caution, or such gross negligence in the master, as would, in the absence of malice, justify a verdict of manslaughter.

The first inquiry proper for the jury then is, whether Whitehead came to his death by mere accident or misadventure; or whether it was occasioned by his debility and exhaustion, arising from physical infirmity at the time of his fall from the yard. If occasioned by such debility and exhaustion, the next inquiry ought to be, whether that state of debility and exhaustion was fully known to Capt. Freeman, when he gave the orders for his, Whitehead's going aloft. If so, were the circumstances such as, that Capt. Freeman must, and ought to have foreseen, that the enforcement of his order to go aloft would probably be attended, either by death or enormous bodily injury by falling, to Whitehead, so that the jury can justly infer, that it must have been persisted in from personal malice to the deceased, or from such a brutal malignity of conduct, as carries with it the plain indications of a heart regardless of social duty, and fatally bent on mischief. If so, it was murder. And it would not vary the case, that the moral force of the authority of the master to compel performance, instead of physical force, produced compliance with the order on the part of Whitehead, although the latter was sensible of his own extreme debility.

If the jury are not satisfied, that there was either actual malice to the deceased, or constructive malice, arising from brutal malignity, as before mentioned; still, if the circumstances of the case show, that there was gross heedlessness, want of due caution, and unreasonable exercise of authority on the part of Capt. Freeman, and that he ought to have known, and could not but have known, that Whitehead was unfit to go aloft, and that there was probable and immediate danger to his life in his so doing, then, notwithstanding the absence of such malice, the offence is at least manslaughter. For every act done wilfully, and with gross negligence, by any person, the known effect of which, under the circumstances, must be to endanger life, is, if death ensues, at least manslaughter.

(The judge then proceeded to sum up, and comment at large, upon the facts, in the various aspects thus presented of the case, and concluded by leaving it to the jury, upon the whole evidence, under the foregoing instructions as to the law.)

Verdict, guilty of manslaughter, and sentence accordingly.

Case No. 15,163.

UNITED STATES v. FREEMAN.

[1 Woodb. & M. 45.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term. 1845.

MARINE CORPS—DISBURSING OFFICER—RESPONSIBILITY FOR FUNDS—PAY AND ALLOWANCES.

1. If an advance of money is made to an officer of the marine corps, he becomes liable as a debtor for the amount, to be applied, and vouchers furnished as directed, or to return what is not thus accounted for; and he is not to be treated as a bailee of the money, and responsible for only ordinary care in respect to it.

2. If he deposits it in a bank, which afterwards fails, whether the bank was or was not a public depository, it does not exonerate him as a debtor without a special act of congress to that effect.

3. Where a captain in that corps acts as captain, and has charge of clothing, he is entitled to an allowance therefor: but while he acts as brevet lieutenant colonel, and is paid as such, he cannot, during the same period, receive either the pay or allowances attached to the duties of captain.

4. Such an officer, while in the command of a separate post, is entitled to double rations, if the post be one designated by the president as entitled to extra rations,—and a post so designated by the navy department, is presumed to be by direction of the president.

5. Additional brevet pay is not to be allowed to such an officer, at such a post, unless there be at it, at least, two organized companies of men with suitable officers, though the whole number of men present may average enough for two companies.

[1] [Reported by Charles L. Woodbury, Esq., and George Minot, Esq.]

This was an action of assumpsit for a balance appearing due on the books of the treasury, from the defendant to the United States, for money advanced to him as an officer in the marine corps, to be used in the Florida war, whither he was detached in 1836. There was an agreement by the counsel for the parties as to the facts, which were, in substance, as follows: That [William H.] Freeman received a draft from the paymaster of the corps, on the Commonwealth Bank in Boston, for the purpose aforesaid, in May, 1836, for $2500. That he drew the money thereon, and had it deposited to his credit in the same bank, without any designation that it was public money, or belonged to him in his official capacity. That he drew out all of it except $222.67. That the bank failed in January, 1838, and when Freeman was called on to pay said balance, he offered a check on the bank for the amount. That the bank, at the time of his deposit, was one of the banks selected by the government for holding its funds; but not knowing that Freeman considered this deposit as public, it did not sue or recover from the bank any thing on this account, though it did for what appeared to be public deposits. The defendant relied on these facts to exonerate him from paying the balance. Another sum of $73.10 had been charged against Freeman, by the comptroller of the treasury, which the quartermaster of the marine corps had credited to him on his books, and which Freeman contended he did not owe. No evidence was offered showing the impropriety of said credit. On the other hand, the defendant claimed certain allowances, and pay, and rations, under the following facts: He was appointed captain in the marine corps July 17th, 1821, and was made a brevet lieutenant-colonel February 30th, 1832, to take rank from July 17th, 1831, and was appointed major in the line from June 30th, 1834. His first claim was for responsibility for arms and clothing as a captain, from July 17th, 1831, to June 30th, 1834, amounting to $354, at $10 per month. This claim had been duly presented to the treasury, and disallowed, on the ground that he received during that period pay in the grade of lieutenant-colonel, and not as a captain. His second claim was for $1669, for double rations, while in command of the Boston station, from June 30th, 1834, to April 1st, 1842. His third claim of $1013.93, was for brevet pay and emoluments, as lieutenant-colonel in command of said station, from June 30th, 1834, to April 1st, 1842. These last two claims had also been presented to the proper officer of the treasury, and disallowed.

Some of the facts in this case have before been agreed on, and the opinion of the supreme court rendered on them, as reported in [U. S. v. Freeman] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 556. But more facts are now added, and some new points raised. Colonel Freeman has since died, and it is agreed by the counsel for his representatives and the district attorney, that the various documents and regulations there referred to, constitute a part of this case with the others now annexed to it. All the other facts necessary to a full understanding of the case appear in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Rantoul, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Mr. Aylwin, for defendant.

WOODBURY, Circuit Justice. The right of the government to recover the balance of the money advanced to the defendant, is the first question presented, and it seems well settled on principle. This was not a case of bailment of any specified article, to be kept, or to be used and then returned. In such cases, a borrower or bailee, unless a public carrier for hire, might not, as is argued for the defendant, be responsible for any loss, if he exercised ordinary care in keeping the property. Such care was probably exercised in this instance. Nor was the present transaction a mere fiduciary one, a trust of funds, to be kept, or invested, loaned out and returned, like that of guardians or administrators, as to the money of those they represent. In such cases only ordinary vigilance and prudence, in making loans or investments, are exacted. But in the present case, the advance was made in order to be expended, not invested, nor returned specifically. It was an advance, therefore, which created a debt or liability, to be extinguished by showing its proper expenditure, and repaying what was not thus expended. There was a promise implied in equity as well as law, to repay such amount as remained unexpended. Like the case of all other mere debtors, then, whether public or private, and whether liable on express or implied obligations, it constitutes no defence for the debtors if they have unsafely deposited their money, or lost it by the insolvency of those in whom they confided. The danger of collusion, and fraud, and neglect, in any other view, is great, and to be avoided; and is as great under implied as under express liabilities of this character.

In U. S. v. Prescott, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 578, the court go to the full extent of these principles in the case of an express contract or bond by a collecting officer, or receiver, and did not exonerate him from liability for public money under facts indicating even a robbery. Hence, if Colonel Freeman had been a regular disbursing agent, he would doubtless come within the analogy of that case, and be held responsible; and we see no difference in the principle between that and the present case, regarding both as they are, not bailments, but debts. Some reliance has been placed on the fact, that this balance was deposited by him in a bank selected by the government for its collecting and disbursing officers, and it is inferred, by the counsel for the defendant, that such officers so depositing are not answerable for losses by the insolvency of a public depository. Whether this would be the decision in such case, is not clear, and need not be decided here; though if held liable in law, when thus depositing officially, congress would probably consider such losers as entitled to equitable relief. But here Colonel Freeman was not an officer whose general duties were either to collect or disburse, and had no orders where to make his deposits; he did not make them in this case in any public capacity, and by such a course disabled the government, when it sued the bank, from knowing that this was public money, and regaining it under the indemnities and securities it held against the bank. His case is not so much like a bailment as that of Prescott's. We therefore think the defendant is liable for the $222.67.

For the other sum of $73.10, we see no reason to charge him again, he having been once credited for the amount by the proper officer, and no cause being shown why the amount has been recharged.

Our next inquiry must be in relation to the claims, made by the defendant in set-off. We think, that the first one, for responsibility and care of the clothing, ought to have been allowed under the ruling of the supreme court in this case, in [U. S. v. Freeman] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 556, if he had acted and been paid only as captain during the time. But it is admitted, that during the same period for services in which he makes this claim as captain, viz., from July 17th, 1831, to June 30th, 1834, he has already demanded of the government to consider him as acting in his brevet station as lieutenant-colonel, and to pay him, for doing duty as such, a higher compensation, and that this higher compensation has already been allowed to him. It seems to us, then, that he cannot equitably receive two compensations attached to different stations or commands for services performed only at one place and time. If he claims an allowance as only a captain in command of a company, or as attached merely to such a command, he should not have claimed an allowance during the same period as lieutenant-colonel, commanding more than a company, and doing duties, not of a captain, but of a higher grade. But, as he has insisted on the latter, and received extra pay as a lieutenant-colonel, doing duty as such by commanding more than a company during the period in which he now asks to be allowed extra compensation for duty as a captain, we think the two claims are inconsistent. And as that for extra pay has been granted, the other, founded on a different hypothesis as to the grade, extent and nature of his command during that time, must now be disallowed.

The second claim, which is for double rations, must be allowed or not, according as, during the period from June, 1834, to April, 1842, he was or was not in command of a separate post, where the president has directed that such rations shall be allowed. The claim is under the act of congress of March 16th, 1802, c. 9 (2 Stat. 132), in relation to the army, and which applies to the marine corps, by subsequent enactments. And the pertinent words in relation to it in that act are, "to the commanding officer of each separate post, such additional number of rations as the president of the United States shall from time to time direct, having respect to the special circumstances of each post." Id. § 5. It will be seen, that by the language of the act, both a separate post and the direction of the president are necessary to confer the right to double rations. Such, also, has been the decision in Parker v. U. S., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 293, 297. Colonel Freeman had the command of a separate post, but it does not appear that any allowance for extra rations was directed by the president there till June 30th, 1841. The only evidence of the last, even after that time, is an order to such effect, issued at that date by the navy department. We acquiesce in the opinion of the supreme court ([U. S. v. Freeman] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 556, 563) that such an order from the proper department is to be presumed to have been issued by the direction of the president himself. U. S. v. Eliason, 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 291, 302; Parker v. U. S., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 293. This order, though not a part of the case as originally submitted, is now by agreement to be considered as in it, and entitles the defendant to those rations from July 30th, 1841, to April 1st, 1842, valued, it is believed, at about $130.

His last claim is for pay as a lieutenant-colonel by brevet beyond that of a major, and is limited to the period from June 30th, 1834, to April 1st, 1842. During a part of this time he was at the same separate post near Boston, and had under him a number of men, ranging from forty and fifty to one hundred and sixty or more, and averaging near the latter number at the close of each month. But it is not shown that he had over one company organized as such, or more than one captain. The act of April 16th, 1818, c. 64 (3 Stat. 427), on which the claim depends, requires that brevet officers, in order to receive pay as such, must be then "on duty, and having a command according to their brevet rank, and at no other time."

What then constitutes a command according to their brevet rank? By the army regulations of 1825, which governed this question till 1836 ([U. S. v. Freeman] 3 How. [44 U. S.] 564) it was provided that a lieutenant-colonel by brevet must be considered to "exercise a command equal to his brevet rank," when he commanded a battalion. We entertain an opinion, that whatever meaning may at times be affixed to the word "battalion," it must, by the spirit of this regulation and the laws connected with it, be construed to mean here, at least two organized companies, with their requisite officers as well as men. Any other construction would lead to daily fluctuations and uncertainty, as the number of men might change from fewer or more than forty-two and twenty-eight, the number fixed at different periods for one company. The reason of the rule would cease in a great measure, without also such organization and subordinate officers; as without the latter, the mere increase of men would add nothing to the expenses of the lieutenant-colonel's station or command in intercourse and civilities with the officers of the corps. A battalion, then, should consist, however large the number of men, of nothing short of two organized companies and their officers; and as it does not appear that these existed there at that time, he is not entitled to the additional pay from 1834 to 1836, under the regulation of 1825. In 1836 a new order was issued by the war department, requiring a still larger command for a brevet lieutenant-colonel, in order to entitle him to extra pay, viz., "four companies instead of two, or to command as lieutenant-colonel to a regiment." A like construction must be given to the word "company" here, in order to come within the spirit and reason of the allowance. It should be an organized company, and have a suitable number of officers as well as men. Hence, as there is no evidence in the case of there having been four such companies under the command of the defendant at the Boston station, between 1836 and 1841, he cannot receive any extra pay as a brevet lieutenant-colonel for his services at that station during that period. But it is stated, that while detached from that station in Florida, after the spring of 1836, Lieutenant Colonel Freeman was in the actual command there as lieutenant-colonel of an organized regiment, or, at least, of four companies of men. The particulars on that point are not given, but may be added to the case, and for whatever period he may have exercised such a command in Florida, and has heretofore been allowed only the pay of a major, we think he is entitled to the additional compensation of a lieutenant-colonel. But it must be an actual command by himself, equal to his rank.

Upon these principles let the judgment on the case be made up.

First charge the defendant with only the	$222 67
Then deduct from this for double rations, to which he is entitled for parts of 1841 and 1842	130 00
This leaves to the United States..	$ 92 67

Allow him any sum found to be proper on the facts and principles stated, for services in Florida; and if it be less than the above amount, make up judgment for the balance against the defendant. If it be more, enter judgment generally for the defendant.

Case No. 15,164.

UNITED STATES v. FREMONT.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 20.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1853.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—SEGREGATION—SETTLEMENT ON LANDS.

1. It is a sufficient severance from the public domain, when the grant itself designates by unmistakable natural boundaries the limits of the district within which it is to be located, and where the particular land granted is specified by name.

2. The time for making a settlement on the lands granted is limited to one year. The danger from savages before and after the grant, is no excuse for not complying with that condition.

The claim was for ten square leagues of land granted to Juan B. Alvarado, and confirmed by the board of land commissioners. The United States appealed.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Dist. Atty.

V. E. Howard, Jones & Strode, and Lockwood, Tyler & Wallace, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case came up on appeal from the board of commissioners for ascertaining and settling the private land claims in California, by whom the claim of the petitioner was confirmed. The title of the claimant [John C. Fremont] is derived by a mesne conveyance, the execution of which is not disputed, from Juan B. Alvarado. The original petition of Alvarado upon which the grant issued, bears date February 22, 1844, and represents that being desirous of increasing his land and contributing to the spreading of agriculture and the industry of the country, he solicits the governor, according to the colonization laws, to grant him "ten leagues of land north of the river San Joaquin within the limits of the Sierra Nevada mountains, in the same direction as the river Chowchillas on the east, that of the Merced on the west, and the before mentioned San Joaquin, with the name of the Mariposas." He also represents that he is unable to present a plan or draft of said land, because it is on the confines of the wild Indians and a wilderness country. On the twenty-ninth of February, 1844, the grant issued subject to the approval of the departmental assembly and upon the usual conditions. The land granted is thus described: "The tract of land known by the name of Mariposas, to the extent of ten square leagues, within the limits of the Sierra Nevada, and the rivers known by the names of the Chowchillas, of the Merced, and the San Joaquin." The approval of the departmental assembly was not obtained, nor does the grant appear to have been submitted to that body. The genuineness of the grant is not disputed.

Among the conditions of the grant are the following: "(3) He shall solicit from the proper magistrate the juridical possession of the same, by virtue of this title, by whom the boundaries shall be marked: on the limits of which he (the grantee) shall place the proper landmarks." "(5) The tract of land granted is ten square leagues as before mentioned. The magistrate who may give the possession shall cause the same to be surveyed according to the ordinance, the surplus remaining to the nation for the proper purposes." No juridical possession was ever given by the magistrate, nor was the land surveyed during the existence of the former government.

It is objected by the district attorney that the claim cannot be confirmed, because the land was not segregated from the public domain before the change of sovereignties. But upon the assumption that the cases decided under the act of 1824 [4 Stat. 52] apply to the case now under consideration, the inquiry presents itself whether, under the rules of decision laid down by the supreme court, this claim must be rejected for vagueness of boundaries. The land is described in the grant as "the tract known by the name of the Mariposas, to the extent of ten square leagues, within the limits of the Sierra Nevada and the rivers Chowchillas, Merced and San Joaquin." The district of the country embraced by these exterior boundaries is shown to contain nearly one hundred square leagues. If the grant contained no other means of designating on what part of this extensive district the particular ten leagues granted were to be taken, I should strongly incline to the opinion that, under the decisions of the supreme court, it would be void for uncertainty. But the tract granted is called in the grant, "Las Mariposas." If, then, within the general exterior limits a particular tract by the name of "Mariposas" can be found and identified, that tract must be taken to be the subject of the grant. From the testimony taken, it appears that within the general limits mentioned in the grant a smaller tract, situated on the Mariposas creek, is well known, and seems to have been understood to be the tract granted to Alvarado. This tract, joining the valley of the Mariposas, is that delineated on the map of Pico, which, though merely a private map, and made from memory, yet when accompanied by a survey by the surveyor general, made in conformity with it, and taken in connection with the testimony, shows that there is a tract of land known as Las Mariposas, situated within the general limits of the grant, and capable of identification. The valley seems to be easily distinguishable, being narrow and shut in by high and barren hills. This, Gen. Vallejo swears to be the tract generally known to have been granted to Alvarado. In O'Hara's Case, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 283, the court say: "The place where the survey is to be made, must first be made certain; if not as to fixed boundaries, at least so certainly by evidence of general or popular apprehension, as to show what was the grantor's notion of the limits of country within which he intended to grant." In this case, not only are the general limits of the country specifically shown by the exterior boundaries mentioned in the grant, but the particular part is designated. In the case of U. S. v. Clarke, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 467, the grant was for "five miles square of land on the west side of St. John's river, above Black creek, at a place called White Spring," and this the supreme court held valid as to the whole land within its limits, as well that which had not been surveyed, as the 8,000 acres which had. I do not perceive that the description in that grant was more specific than that under consideration. In Boisdoré's Case, 11 How. [52 U. S.] 86, the claim was rejected for a vagueness of description, but in that case the quantity of land was not designated, and the uncertainty of the boundaries left it liable to be enlarged or diminished at the discretion of the surveyors.

In the case at bar, the quantity of land granted is fixed. The limits of the district within which it is to be located, are designated by unmistakable natural boundaries, and the particular land granted is specified by name. It does not seem to me that in directing a survey to be made in the valley of the Mariposas, or in adopting that already made, the court would be exercising the granting power, but rather be determining the extent and locality of land already severed from the public domain by the grant itself.

The other objection urged by the district attorney to the confirmation of this claim is, that the conditions of the grant have not been complied with, and therefore the title of the claimant being inchoate or imperfect, not having been approved by the departmental assembly, no equitable obligation rests upon the United States to perfect it. In the Case of Cervantes [Case No. 14,768] it was considered by this court, that the only solid equity which the claimant under an unconfirmed grant could urge upon the government was the fulfillment of the conditions, or the performance of those acts which, under the Mexican system, were the only motives and considerations for the grant—and that whereas in that case the conditions had been wholly unperformed, and the grant apparently abandoned for a great number of years, without an effort or an excuse, the claimant could not appeal to the justice of the government to confirm his claim, however much his application might commend itself to its generosity. In the Case of Reading [Id. 16,127] the efforts of the plaintiff to perform, and his excuses for his failure to perform completely, were deemed sufficient to entitle him to a confirmation within the rule laid down in Sibbald's Case [10 Pet. (35 U. S.) 313], to which it seemed most analogous. The facts in the case at bar are as follows: The grant was issued to Alvarado on the twenty-ninth of February, 1844, on condition, among other things, that "he should build a house within a year, and that it should be inhabited." Immediately on receiving his grant, Alvarado (as appears from his own testimony) applied to the governor for a military force to enable him to take possession, reminding him of the fact already known to him, that the country was infested with hostile Indians, and could not be occupied except with the aid of a military force. The governor, as Alvarado testifies, offered to erase the conditions from the grant, but this the petitioner declined, alleging his desire and intention to occupy and cultivate his land. The governor then agreed to furnish the necessary force, and a military post was soon after established on the San Joaquin, near the granted land. Owing to the depredations of the Indians, this post was after a short time abandoned. Shortly after there was a political revolution, and Gen. Micheltorena's affairs becoming embarrassed, no more troops were sent. This occurred during the year 1844. Alvarado further testifies, that in August, 1845, while commander at Monterey, he collected the cavalry and took them to his rancho, near Monterey, and was organizing them for the purpose of taking possession, by their aid, of the Mariposas. While thus engaged, he received orders from Gen. Castro to return to Monterey, there being rumors of war. From that time Alvarado made no other attempts to take possession—his military duties occupying all his attention during the war which immediately ensued. In the beginning of 1846 the war between the United States and Mexico broke out, and on the seventh of July of that year, the American flag was hoisted and the Mexican authorities deposed. On the fourteenth of February, 1847, Alvarado conveyed to Fremont, the present claimant. On receiving his conveyance, Fremont seems to have taken some measures to settle and cultivate his land, but being ordered home under arrest, he employed an agent to go upon the land, and cultivate and inhabit it. That agent was, by Fremont's direction, supplied with money, agricultural implements, provisions, etc.; but on going to the land in the spring of 1847, found the Indians so hostile that he was obliged to abandon the enterprise. The same agent twice visited the land during the following summer, but found the Indians so hostile that he was unable to make any settlement. The land was not finally settled until after Fremont's return from the United States in 1849. But since that time, the claimant has erected upon it numerous valuable improvements—consisting of dwelling houses, farm houses, machine shops, etc., and is now in possession of the tract. The whole testimony leaves no room to doubt but that the settlement was effected at as early a time as the hostility of the Indians, and the circumstances of the country rendered it practicable to do so without a large military force.

It is urged by the district attorney that hostility of the Indians affords no excuse for nonfulfillment of the condition, and in support of this position, the case of De Villemont v. U. S., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 266, is relied on. The Case of De Villemont bears the strongest analogy to the one under consideration. The concession was granted in consideration of the petitioner's intention and promise to establish a stock farm and plantation. It was made under the express condition that he should make the regular road and clearing, within the peremptory term of one year, the concession to be null if at the precise expiration of three years the farm should not be established. From the date of the grant, until the delivery of Louisiana to the United States, he had completely failed to comply with the conditions. In excuse, he showed that during all that time he was the civil and military commandant of the fort of Arkansas; that his presence there was constantly required by the threatening aspect of the Indian tribes by whom he was surrounded; and his correspondence with the governor showed that even a temporary absence from his post would not have been tolerated. He further showed that the hostility of the Indians prevented a settlement by his agents. It was also established by proof, that the common usage of the Spanish authorities was to insert the conditions, as to making a settlement and a road within a given time, mechanically, and as mere matter of form; that no land was ever forfeited under the Spanish government for noncompliance with these conditions; and the testimony on this point was confirmed by that of a judge of the supreme court of Louisiana, of great experience and reputation. It further appeared, that the claimant had, as in this case, attempted to make a settlement by an agent, but the hostility of the Indians prevented it. It is apparent that in almost every particular that case resembles the one now under consideration.

The court, in commenting on the duty of performing the conditions, say: "It was undoubtedly necessary that an establishment should have been made within three years—such being the requirements of the grant in concurrence with the regulations." The evidence of usage in that case was at least as strong as that relied on in this; and the attempt to settle seems to have been made in that case as in this, and to have been abortive for the same reason. The court was also in that case required to be governed in its decisions by the laws, usages, and customs of the government under which the claim originated. But the claim was rejected, notwithstanding the excuses offered, and the evidence of the uniform usage of the Spanish authorities. Boisdoré's Case is, if possible, stronger; for in that case there was a partial performance of the conditions; but the court held that inasmuch as the claimant had stipulated to remove his family to the land, and take there all his force of negroes, the occupation by a single mulatto, by whom some cattle were kept, and a few acres cleared, was wholly insufficient. With respect to the excuse that the state of the country and Indian hostilities prevented the settlement, the supreme court held as early as Kingsley's Case, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 483, that the excuse could not be received, if the same obstacles existed at the time of the concession; and the decision in De Villemont's Case but reaffirmed that doctrine. The Case of Sibbald, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 313, is relied on by the counsel for the claimant, as furnishing an instance analogous to that in this case, of a good performance cy prés. But the difference between the cases is obvious. The grant in that case was on condition that a mill should be established; and it declared, that until the petitioner should establish his mill, this grant should be of no effect. It was dated in 1816, but no specific time was limited by the decree within which the mill was to be erected and put in operation. It appeared that a mill was built in 1819, and carried away by a freshet, but that $5,000 had been expended in the construction; that in 1827, another mill was built and in operation, which was destroyed by fire in 1828; that in October of 1828, another was built, which went into operation in June, 1829, and had ever since so continued. The court held that the petitioner had begun the erection of the first mill in time to save a forfeiture, and that the other acts amounted to a compliance with the condition, according to the rules of equity.

But in the case at bar, the time for making the settlement is limited to one year. So far as appears, Alvarado never saw the tract he assumed to convey to Fremont; nor was any settlement effected by the latter until a year after the ratification of the treaty. It cannot be urged in this as in other cases, that the grant was not made complete by the assent of the assembly, owing to accident, or the neglect of the governor, for Alvarado himself says it could not be submitted to them without the diseño or plan, which on account of the hostilities of the Indians he was unable to furnish; and yet the danger from that source existed at the time of his application, for he assigns it to the governor as a reason why the diseño did not accompany the petition. It is urged that the political disturbances of the country contributed to prevent the settlement. But I think it clear from the evidence, that the principal, if not the only reason why it was not effected by Alvarado or Fremont, until after the treaty, was the danger from the savages; and that this danger existed to substantially the same degree before and after the grant.

Upon the whole, after a most careful consideration of this case, and with every desire to give the claimant the full benefit of every favorable consideration to which he is entitled, I have been unable to resist the conclusion that the Cases of Glen, of De Villemont and of Boisdoré, lay down for me rules of decision applicable to this case, and from which I am not at liberty to depart.

Case No. 15,165.

UNITED STATES v. FRENCH.

[1 Gall. 1.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term, 1812.

HABEAS CORPUS—STATE CUSTODY—BAIL.

The circuit court has no authority to issue a habeas corpus for the purpose of surrendering a principal in discharge of his bail, where the principal is confined in gaol merely under the process of a state court. Ex parte Cabrera [Case No. 2,278]; 1 Kent, Comm. 412. Nor will the court discharge the bail of such party, who have become bound by recognizance in the circuit court to answer, &c. merely on account of such impediment; but in their discretion the court will respite the recognizance.

[Cited in U. S. v. New Bedford Bridge, Case No. 15,867; Re McDonald, Id. 8,751; U. S. v. Van Fossen, Id. 16,607; Taylor v. Taintor, 16 Wall. (83 U. S.) 371; Re Fox, 51 Fed. 432.]

Information against the defendant [Jonathan French] for a misdemeanor, in loading merchandize in a sleigh, with intent to export the same to Canada, contrary to Act Jan. 9, 1809, c. 72 § 1; 9 Laws [Weightman's Ed.] 185 [2 Stat. 506]. At a former term the defendant had been arrested, and had recognised in court with sureties for his appearance to answer to the information.

Edward Cutts, Jr., and J. Mason, for the bail, moved for a habeas corpus to the sheriff and gaoler of Grafton county, to bring up the body of the defendant to surrender him in court in discharge of the bail, on an affidavit that the defendant was confined in the gaol in said county on mesne civil process, under the authority of the state of New Hampshire.

U. S. Dist. Atty. Humphreys, opposed the motion.

BY THE COURT. We have no authority in this case to issue a habeas corpus. The authority given by Judicial Act 1789, c. 20, § 14 [1 Stat. 81], is confined to cases, where the party is in custody under color of process under the authority of the United States, or is committed for trial before some court of the United States, or is necessary to be brought into court to testify. It does not extend to cases where the process is from a state court, and the object is to surrender the party in discharge of bail.

The counsel for the bail then moved to discharge the bail from their recognizance, on the ground that as it had become impossible to bring the defendant into court, without any default on his or their part, they ought not to be sufferers; and in support of the motion they cited 6 Term R. 50; Id. 247; 1 Tidd, Prac. (Ed. 1790) 149; 2 Sell. Prac. 126; 1 Sell. Prac. 183; 10 Mod. 279; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 15, "Bail," p. 179.

BY THE COURT. There is no sufficient ground for the application. There is no physical or legal impossibility of producing the defendant. The cases cited may be good law; but they proceed on the principle, that by operation of law the defendant had been discharged of the process, or had been placed beyond the reach of the bail. Nor can it be said that the defendant has been guilty in the present case of no default. His very confinement may have been the result of his own negligence or wrong. The circumstances of the case may furnish reasons for a respite of the recognizance to the next term, and a continuance of the information. How can the court foresee, that at another term the defendant will be in civil confinement? If the bail were now discharged, and the defendant should ultimately be released from his imprisonment, we have no means to prevent his escape from punishment under the act of congress Motion overruled.

[The government brought a suit to condemn premises for violation of the internal revenue law. [Case unreported.] The government appealed.] [3]

Edward B. Hill, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

Edward Salomon, for defendant in error.

WAITE, Circuit Justice. The issue made below was, as to whether the claimant was a distiller of spirits, within the meaning of section 3247 of the Revised Statutes; and the first error assigned here is upon the order of the court directing a verdict for the claimant, at the close of the evidence on the part of the government. That section of the statutes is as follows: "Every person who produces distilled spirits, or who brews or makes mash, wort or wash fit for distillation or for the production of spirits, or who, by any process of evaporization, separates alcoholic spirit from any fermented substance, or who, making or keeping mash, wort or wash, has, also, in his possession or use a still, shall be regarded as a distiller."

It cannot be seriously contended, that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a jury in finding that the claimant actually produced distilled spirits, or that he brewed or made mash, wort or wash fit for distillation or the production of spirits, or that he actually separated alcoholic spirit from any fermented substances. All that can be insisted upon by the government is, that there was evidence tending to prove that he had in his possession or use a still, and that he kept mash, wort or wash, within the meaning of this statute. The still he had in his possession was put up for the manufacture of acetic acid, and was duly registered as such. About this there is no dispute. To make one in possession of a still a distiller, because he keeps mash, wort or wash, the mash, wort or wash kept must be such as will produce spirits, on distillation. The evidence in this case was clear, to the effect that the substance complained of would not produce distilled spirits. It was intended for the manufacture of vinegar, and, when distilled, did not, and could not, yield spirits. It had already gone through such a process of fermentation in another place, where there was no still, as to render it impossible to convert it, or any part of it, into spirits, by distillation or any process of evaporation. This was the uncontradicted testimony of the only witness examined on that subject. The process through which it was to be put by the claimant was only for the purpose of cleansing it of impurities, and thus fitting it for use in the manufacture of vinegar. It was, in fact, a weak acetic acid, mixed with foreign substances, which must be removed before it could be converted into marketable vinegar. One who produces a substance which can be converted into vinegar by the use of a smaller quantity of spirits than is ordinarily employed, is not, necessarily, a distiller of spirits. To become such in law, he must actually produce spirits, or keep with the still he uses that which will produce them. Such was not the case here. Had the jury found, from the evidence, a verdict against the claimant, it would clearly have been the duty of the court, on motion, to set the verdict aside and grant a new trial. Under such circumstances it was not error for this court to direct a verdict in favor of the claimant.

If an order of the district court refusing a certificate of reasonable cause of seizure, under the provisions of section 970 of the Revised Statutes, can be reversed by the circuit court, upon a writ of error, it ought not to be done except in a clear case. The evidence which has been embodied in this bill of exceptions is not such as to satisfy me that any error was committed in this particular. The judgment of the district court is affirmed.

Case No. 15,167.

UNITED STATES v. FRICTION-MATCH MACHINERY.

[1 Hask. 32.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. Dec., 1866.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—PERSONAL PROPERTY.

1. A water-wheel, used for propelling machinery in the manufacture of friction-matches, is not personal property and liable to forfeiture under section 48 of the act of 1864 [13 Stat. 240], as amended by chapter 184 of the act of 1866 [14 Stat. 98].

2. Machines, used in a mill for such purpose, are implements and instruments within the meaning of the act, and are liable to forfeiture.

Information by the United States, claiming a forfeiture of tools and machinery used in the manufacture of friction matches, in violation of the internal revenue laws. The claimant alleged, that the articles seized were fixtures and not liable to seizure under the acts of congress as personal property.

George F. Talbot, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Irving W. Parker, for claimant.

FOX, District Judge. This is a proceeding in rem under the act of 1866, c. 184, against certain machinery, seized by the collector of internal revenue of the First district as forfeited under the provisions of the acts relating to internal revenue, being found on the premises of Mason & Smith in Buxton, with a large quantity of friction-matches, there manufactured and to be sold in violation of law. On the return day of the process, one Benj. M. Mason appeared and filed his claim for a portion of the articles seized, viz., one water-wheel, one lathe, lathe-bench and turning tools, one card-planer, one grindstone and bench, one lathe-machine, one machine for making match-splints, one face-planer for planing ends of match-blocks, and one plain crosscut-saw, alleging that he was a bona fide purchaser from Mason & Smith, of the mill and lot on which the above enumerated machinery was at the time of the conveyance, and that all such machinery passed as a part of the realty to him by the conveyance, which was valid Oct. 22, 1866, the seizure having been made on the 7th of Nov., 1866. It is admitted, that Mason & Smith procured this machinery and placed it in the mill for the manufacture of friction-match-blocks, the principal part of it being expressly adapted to that business, and that, previous to the conveyance to the claimant, the machinery had been used by Mason & Smith in manufacturing matches to be sold in violation of law, a large quantity of which was found in the mill with the machinery at time of seizure. This machinery was all driven by the water-wheel, being connected by bands and gearing, and can be removed without damage being done to the building.

The government claims, that this property was subject to seizure and forfeiture under the 48th section of act of 1864 [13 Stat. 240], as amended by act of 1866, c. 184 [14 Stat. 98]. The language is "and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever, in the place or building, &c., may also be seized by any collector or deputy-collector as aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited."

Were these articles "tools, implements, instruments," within the meaning of the act? I think most of them were. They were adapted to the business then carried on, and although ordinarily described as machines, yet they were "implements," "instruments," for the manufacture of friction-matches, and as such, were within the mischief to be reached by the law. I am aware, that the supreme court of Maine has decided, that articles, commonly designated as machinery, can not be deemed "tools" under the law of the state, exempting a debtor's "tools of trade" from attachment; and if "tools" had been alone used in the statute, I might have adopted that construction; but we are not restricted to that word; the statute forfeits all "implements and instruments;" lathes, grindstones, cut-saws, although driven by water or horse-power, are still implements and instruments, used in the production of these articles, in violation of law. And I think it is not a strained or forced construction of the statute, to hold them subject to its provisions, the same as smaller tools or articles worked wholly by hand. Under the law of distraint, "implements of trade" are exempt when in use; and I find looms, thrashing-machines and other things of like description have been exempted, and decided to be implements. I prefer to adopt this construction, and as this word is found in the act in question, to hold that all these articles of machinery, specially designed for the match business, are subject to seizure and condemnation.

It is contended that these articles had become parts of the realty, and so were not personal property, but passed under the conveyance of the mill to the claimant as fixtures.

In themselves they were still of a personal character, liable to be removed from the mill, and to pass, when so removed, by a common bill of sale, as any other article of personal property.

If Mason & Smith had given to another party a bill of sale of these articles, and afterward had conveyed the mill excepting these articles in the conveyance, can there be a doubt, that the purchaser would be entitled to them under his bill of sale? I think not. They were therefore still personal property for certain purposes, and I think for seizure and condemnation under the statute should be so considered, if the same in other respects would be liable.

A grindstone is ordinarily driven by hand, and would be liable to seizure and condemnation. Can it vary the case because it connects by a cord with the shaft and derives its power from the main wheel? A lathe is very commonly driven by a treadle, and if so would be liable to seizure. Shall it be exonerated because it is connected by belting and gearing with the main shaft of the mill?

I am well aware of the decision of the supreme court of this state in Parsons v. Copeland, 38 Me. 537, holding machinery in a woolen mill to be fixtures, although not permanently affixed, and that this decision is not found in Symonds v. Harris, 51 Me. 14; but these are local decisions which cannot control me in the construction of an act of congress, which should receive the same construction in every state of the Union. The supreme court of Maine probably would hold, that the machinery in controversy in this case would pass with the mill as a portion of the realty, if in the mill at the time of the conveyance, but it does not necessarily follow under the act of congress, that it would not be liable to seizure and forfeiture.

I think that the principle to be deduced from Hellawell v. Eastwood, 3 Eng. Law & Eq. 563, should govern this case. It was there decided as late as 1850, by the court of exchequer, that spinning-machines, which were fixed by screws, some into the wooden floor, and some into lead which had been poured in a melted state into holes in the stone for the purpose of receiving screws, had thereby become fixtures, so that they were not distrainable. I do not think the gearing made the machinery in the present case fixtures, not liable to seizure.

The water-wheel however, I do not consider as within this class of machinery. Judge Story more than forty years ago, held that the water-wheel of a factory and its gearing was a part of the realty, and I believe no one has ever questioned it since. Most of the other articles, I understand to have been machinery specially designed for the manufacture of matches, and in my view were within the provisions of the statute. Any other construction would tend to defeat the purposes of the act, whereas, by this construction, every inducement is held forth to manufacturers to comply with its provisions, and thereby avoid its penalty. Decree accordingly.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FERMENTED LIQUORS—DEALERS—STORAGE—PENALTY—ACT JULY 20, 1868.

Held, that the word "receive" as used in the forty-sixth section of Act July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 144], means "receive for sale," and that where a retail liquor dealer receives more than 20 gallons of spirits from any person other than one authorized by the act to sell such spirits, for storage only, and not for sale, he does not incur the penalty.

UNITED STATES v. FRINK.

[1 Brunner, Col. Cas. 90;[1] 4 Day, 471.]

Circuit Court, D. Connecticut. 1810.

CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESS—AFFIDAVIT.

Where a witness in a public prosecution having been summoned, and his fees tendered to him, refused to attend, the prosecutor moved to put off the trial in order to afford time for capias; the court ruled that the trial must proceed, unless the prosecutor would make affidavit that he could not, in his opinion, safely try the cause without the attendance of the witness.

This was an indictment [against Daniel Frink] similar to the one stated in the preceding case. [U. S. v. Phelps, Case No. 16,041.] Peleg Palmer, of Stonington, a witness in support of the indictment was summoned last September, and his fees tendered. He now refused to attend.

The district attorney moved for a delay of the cause in order to afford time for a capias.

Before LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, and EDWARDS, District Judge.

LIVINGSTON, Circuit Justice, said the trial must go on, and the party might apply for an attachment, or bring an action for damages. Such was the rule in England and in New York.

[1] [Reported by Albert Brunner, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The district attorney stated that it was usual in Connecticut to delay a cause to afford time to bring in a witness.

EDWARDS, District Judge, coming in at this time, it was ruled by the court, after a short consultation, that the trial must proceed, unless the district attorney would make affidavit that he could not, in his opinion, safely try the cause, without the attendance of Palmer. More witnesses are usually summoned than are necessary, and it would be unreasonable to put off a trial on account of the absence of a witness who was not essential, or who could state nothing further than other witnesses in court. Motion denied.

UNITED STATES v. FROST.

[9 Int. Rev. Rec. 41; 16 Pittsb. Leg. J. 196; 1 Chi. Leg. News, 129.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan. Term, 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—INCOME TAX—FALSE RETURNS—EVIDENCES OF DEBT.

1. Promissory notes, book accounts, etc., due during the year, are the evidences of debts.

2. Whether or not they are gains, profits or income for that year within the meaning of the internal revenue law, depends upon their value intrinsically or their convertibility into money, property or available assets. If they have only a nominal, and not a real value or convertible quality, and a man has realized nothing from them, and, therefore, does not return them as a part of his income, because he fairly and honestly believes they are not real gains or profits, he cannot be convicted of an untrue return.

The defendant [William E. Frost] was indicted for making a false return of his income for the year 1866, under the following state of facts: The defendant was a partner of William E. Hall (who was also indicted) and had returned as income for that year $10,075. The books of the firm showed that there had been entered as the profits of the business for that year $31,295.70, and to the credit of the defendant one-half of that sum, $15,647.85. There was a reduced assessment made against the defendant by the assessor of $3,730.33 (the original assessment being $5,568.84) on which the defendant had paid the tax—the assessor claiming the tax should be paid on all debts and accounts that were not actually carried to profit and loss. It appeared on the trial that the profits entered in the books were made up by adding to the assets of the preceding year all debts and accounts whether good or bad, as well as the receipts of the year 1866, and thus the profits were not all real, but some of them only nominal. When the defendant made up his income returns he included all debts which he considered absolutely good, and threw out those that he regarded as bad, doubtful or comparatively worthless, and thus accounted for the difference between the amount of profits on his books and his returns. It was clearly established that this was done because the defendant did not treat or consider such bad or doubtful debts as real gains or profits.

THE COURT, thereupon, instructed the jury upon the law of the case to the following effect: It might be true in many cases where a man made a charge on his books for debts due as the result of the year's business, they would constitute assets, and come within the definition of gains or profits. For example, instead of money, he might receive promissory notes, bills of exchange, bonds or mortgages, or different kinds of securities, and these, if good, might properly become a part of his income. Even treasury notes and national bank notes were not actually money, but only the representatives of money, though treated as such by the commercial world, and with them the government is carried on and alone supported, except by what gold is received through the customs. Many kinds of securities—as bonds of the United States, for instance—are considered as money or available assets, because convertible at once into money, and therefore when any of these are received as the result of a year's business, they are legitimately a part of a year's income. The rule would be the same, of course, if instead of them, it were property real or personal. In all these cases there are real gains or profits. But when a man, at the end of the year found upon his books amounts charged without having actually received any portion of the same or had bills receivable unavailable, it seemed to be a misnomer to call them gains or profits, which were not, and never might be realized. It was hard, certainly, a man should be convicted for a difference of opinion between himself and the government officer, as to whether he should, in his income returns, give in bad or doubtful debts. The rule of the bureau was understood to be that debts due in the year were to be included as income unless known to be absolutely worthless. It was often a difficult question to decide when that was so, particularly in this western country, and it gave too great a discretion to the party making the return. If a man has invested all his capital in starting a business, and his books at the end of the year showed large nominal profits in accounts and bills receivable, he might not in fact have the money to pay the government tax on those profits. Take another illustration: A man might have a promissory note of a thousand dollars, which was called good when he made his return, and thus pay a tax on it as so much income, and, in fact, it might be all the time worthless, and he would be obliged to pay for what he thought was good, but was not really so. It is said, indeed, that the practice is to allow deductions to be made from the succeeding income returns, but suppose a man never after has a taxable income, then he never is reimbursed. There had always seemed to be something wrong in the practical operation of this part of the statute; for while it would be proper to include as a part of a man's income what is treated as, or convertible into money, there seemed an injustice in making him pay a tax on book accounts or notes uncollected, and when it was uncertain whether or not they ever could be collected. But, of course, if a man should have good accounts on his books, which, if instead of collecting, he permitted to remain, or if they were real gains or profits, he could not evade the payment of what is justly due the government. The principle would be the same applied to any other kind of evidence of debt, as promissory notes, bills of exchange, etc. No one was permitted to evade the law when he did not realize merely because he would not. But the true rule would seem to be to impose and collect the tax on real gains, profits or income, and not on what was merely nominal. The law could certainly not require the payment of something for nothing.

These were some of the general views of the court on the law of this case, but whether they were all correct or not, for it was confessedly a difficult subject to treat with entire accuracy, THE COURT was of the opinion that the facts would not justify a conviction, and the district attorney acquiescing, the defendant was acquitted by the jury.

THE COURT, in commenting upon the revenue laws, in this case, said: The language of the law is that there shall be levied and collected a tax of five per cent. on the amount derived—over one thousand dollars—from the annual gains, profits and income of every person. The law declares what shall be included in estimating the gains, profit and income of a person; as income derived from interest on notes and other securities of the United States; profits realized from sale of lands, etc.; interest received or accrued on notes, bonds, etc., bearing interest, whether paid or not, if good and collectible. This seems to be the only place where the law speaks distinctively of interest accruing, but not paid. The law then mentions the amount of premium on gold and coupons, and of sales of the farm, except, etc.; and then adds: "All other gains and profits derived from any source whatever, and the share of any person in the gains and profits of all companies, whether divided or otherwise," with certain exceptions. The law, then, in giving the exemption of a thousand dollars, declares that there shall also be deducted the taxes paid within the year; certain losses actually sustained; the amount actually paid for rent of the house; the amount actually paid for repairs, etc. Now in all these deductions allowed the statute seems careful to exclude the amount due for taxes for labor, for rent or for repairs, but requires that they shall be paid. Among the various deductions allowed are "debts ascertained to be worthless." This is the only place where this word debts is used, and it may thence be claimed that debts not ascertained to be worthless are to be included as income, but it is clear, I think, that the debts must be gains or profits, and if hey are not they are no part of a man's taxable income. The language is, "ascertained to be worthless." By whom or how? The law is silent on this important point, and therefore there must be a discretion given to the person making his returns, and if that discretion is used fairly and honestly there would seem to be no just ground of complaint. It certainly can scarcely be contended that every debt must be ascertained to be worthless by a suit at law, or in equity, for that would be impracticable, and therefore such cannot be the meaning of the law. It is undoubtedly very difficult to lay down any rule of universal application to this class of cases, and yet the want of precision in the law may have led to this prosecution, and may lead to others, and, perhaps, on the whole, it would be better to give, by law, a clearer and simpler definition than now exists of the terms "gains, profits and income."

Case No. 15,173.

UNITED STATES v. FRYE.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 539.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1835.

MANSLAUGHTER — INDICTMENT — TESTIMONY — PUNISHMENT OF SLAVE.

1. An indictment for manslaughter need not contain the words "in the fury of his mind."

2. The jumping on board of a boat, then in custody of the prisoner, after being warned not to do so, and with intent to do the prisoner some great bodily harm, and actually assaulting him with such intent, and putting the prisoner in fear of such great bodily harm, will excuse the homicide; but the jumping on board the boat, under the circumstances stated, was not an actual assault on the prisoner, who was fifteen feet from the deceased at the time of the shooting.

3. A slave convicted of manslaughter is, by the law of Virginia and of the District of Columbia, to be burnt in the left hand and publicly whipped.

This was an indictment against [Henry Frye] a slave for the manslaughter of Robert Jackson. Verdict, guilty. Motion in arrest of judgment, and for a new trial.

Mr. Brent, for the prisoner, contended that the indictment was defective in not averring that the act was done by the prisoner "in the fury of his mind."

It was an indictment for murder, changed to one for manslaughter, by striking out the allegation of malice prepense, and the word "murdered."

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

THE COURT (nem. con.) overruled the motion in arrest of judgment, but granted a new trial, (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra,) upon the doubt whether the circumstances did not excuse the homicide.

Upon the new trial, the circumstances, as they appeared in evidence were these: Jackson, the deceased, and one Nightengale, had beaten the prisoner severely on shore, who escaped from them, and fled to his master's boat, which was then in his custody, and under his command, by the authority of his master. They followed him down to the wharf, and Jackson dared him to come on shore, that he might lay his hands on him again. The prisoner refused, and told Jackson to stand off, and not to come on board; and if he did, he would shoot him. The warning and threat by the prisoner were repeated. Jackson said, "shoot and be damned," and jumped on board. The prisoner, who was standing with a gun in his hand at his cabin door, about fifteen feet from Jackson when he jumped on board, instantly shot and killed Jackson.

THE COURT, at the prayer of the prisoner's counsel, instructed the jury (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) that if they should be satisfied, by the evidence, that the prisoner was and is a slave, and at the time when, &c., had the custody and command of the boat in which, &c., by the authority of his master; and that the deceased, Jackson, entered upon the boat after being warned by the prisoner not to do so, and with intent to do a great bodily harm to the prisoner; and, after being in the boat, actually assaulted the prisoner with intent to do him such great bodily harm; and that the prisoner had good ground to apprehend, and did fear, that the said Jackson would do him such harm, and that the prisoner then killed the said Jackson by shooting him, &c., such killing amounted only to excusable homicide. And also, at the prayer of the counsel for the United States, instructed the jury (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, doubting) that the jumping on board the boat, under those circumstances, was not an actual assault by the deceased, Jackson, on board of the boat.

MORSELL, Circuit Judge, thought that the assault and beating on shore, and the following of the prisoner to the boat, and the threats used by Jackson on the wharf, at the time he jumped on board, evincing the continued purpose of again beating the prisoner, were sufficient evidence of an assault on board of the boat.

The jury could not agree, and by consent were discharged, and the cause continued to the next term, when the prisoner was again tried and convicted. It being stated and admitted that the prisoner is a slave, the sentence was, "that he be burnt in the left hand, and publicly whipped with twenty-five stripes."

Case No. 15,174.

UNITED STATES v. FUERS.

[12 Int. Rev. Rec. 43.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. 1870.

INDICTMENT—FINDING BY GRAND JURY.

An indictment will not be quashed because sent up by the United States attorney, and found by the grand jury, without a previous information, hearing, and binding over; but process will be awarded for the arrest of the defendant, and he will be held to answer.

Catharine Fuers was indicted for carrying on the business of brewing, etc., without keeping the books required by law; selling beer in casks without stamps, and without cancelling stamps. Her brewery was seized by the collector, who reported the seizure and the grounds thereof to the United States attorney, by whom the property was libelled, and an indictment sent up against the owner, which was returned by the grand jury "a true bill."

J. Rose Thompson, who appeared for defendant, moved to quash the indictment, because it was not founded on a previous information, arrest, hearing, and binding over, but was sent up solely at the instance and in the discretion of the prosecuting officer of the government. He argued, and quoted numerous decisions of state courts, to show that defendant could not be held to answer unless a previous information had been made, and he had been confronted by his accuser, so as to have an opportunity to learn the nature of the accusation preferred against him, etc.

H. B. Swoope, U. S. Atty., replied that the practice in the federal and state courts was entirely different; that there were no private prosecutors in the courts of the United States; that all indictments touched matters of great and grave public concern, as the revenue, the post-office, the currency, the customs, etc.; that even in state courts the prosecuting officer of the people could, in such cases, send up bills without a previous information, hearing, etc.; that the practice in the federal courts was regulated by the common law, save in so far as it was changed by congressional enactment; that in England the king's attorney-general could, in all cases not capital, file an information without a previous oath, arrest, or hearing, on which the defendant was held to answer; that the fourth amendment to the constitution, which provided that no warrant of arrest could issue without probable cause being first shown, was not violated in any way by issuing a warrant of arrest after a bill found on sworn testimony by a grand jury; and that there was no force in the argument that defendant was entitled to a hearing in order to learn the nature of the charges preferred, because it was well settled that the United States attorney could send up a bill for an entirely different offence than that returned to him, if he thought he had evidence to support it.

PER CURIAM. We are very clear that this motion should be overruled. There is very little analogy between the practice of the federal and state courts in regard to the prosecution of offenders. It is but seldom that private interests are involved in bringing to justice those who violate the federal laws. Officers have to be appointed and commissioned for this purpose, and for all their official acts in the discharge of these duties they are amenable to the laws. The rights of defendants will be carefully guarded; but the officers of the government, acting under their official oaths, will not be required to go through all the forms and steps that are demanded of private prosecutors.

The question has been heretofore decided, and the motion is accordingly overruled.

Case No. 15,175.

UNITED STATES v. FULLERTON.

[6 Blatchf. 275;[1] 9 Int. Rev. Rec. 3.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 19, 1868.

CRIMINAL PRACTICE—DIVISION OF OPINION—POSTPONEMENT OF CASE.

1. The practice stated, in regard to certificates of division of opinion, in criminal cases tried in the circuit court, where the court is held by two judges.

2. The probability that difficult and important questions of law will arise on the trial of an indictment in the circuit court, will not ordinarily justify the postponement of the trial, so as to await the holding of the court by two judges, with a view to a certificate of division of opinion.

This was an application on the part of the defendant [William Fullerton] to postpone the trial of the indictment in this case, until such time as the associate justice of the supreme court assigned to the Second circuit, could sit in the circuit court with the district judge who was now holding it, on the ground that difficult and important questions of law would arise on the trial, so that, if a division of opinion should occur between the judges, the point or points could be certified to the supreme court, under the 6th section of the act of April 29, 1802 (2 Stat. 159), that being the only mode of sending questions of law, arising on the trial of a criminal case, to the supreme court for revision.

[2] [On the 19th of December, when the case of the United States against William Fullerton et al. came up before Judge Benedict on a motion to quash the indictment, an order of Judge Nelson staying proceedings in the case until further orders was received, and the case was taken off Judge Benedict's calendar.

[The affidavit upon which Judge Nelson made the order, is as follows:

["The United States v. William Fullerton et al. Southern District of New York—ss: William Fullerton, the defendant above named, being sworn, says that he has fully and fairly stated his case herein to Messrs. Charles O'Conor, D. D. Field, John K. Porter, Clarence A. Seward, G. T. Jenks and John E Burrill, the counsel of this defendant herein, and that after such statement made as aforesaid he is advised by his said counsel in the manner and to the effect herein after stated; that the indictment herein contains nine counts, which have been framed under and with reference to different and distinct statutes of the United States; that several important questions of law and some of great intrinsic difficulty are involved in the construction of the said statutes and of the said indictment, and will necessarily arise in the prosecution of these proceedings; that in view of the facts charged against this defendant, and the circumstances under which the said indictment has been found, it is desirable that it should be in this deponent's power to obtain, should it become necessary, the opinion of the supreme court of the United States thereon; that under the laws of the United States there is no mode of obtaining such opinion except upon a certificate of division, and that no such certificate can be obtained unless the cause shall be tried before one of the associate justices of the supreme court of the United States, sitting as circuit judge; that if the cause be tried before one of the district judges of the United States, there is no authority for such judge to associate with him any other district judge on the trial, and that even if the court were held by two district judges, such court would have no authority to make a certificate of division as before mentioned; that notice of motion has been given herein on behalf of this defendant to quash the indictment, but that if the cause can be tried before a full bench of a circuit court such motion will be withdrawn, and the defendant will seek a trial of the indictment.

[This deponent further says that great publicity has been given to the proceedings against this defendant, and the fact that an indictment has been found has been extensively circulated, and that such publicity and circulation has been brought about by those who instigated the said indictment. And he further says that the charges against this defendant have been much discussed in the newspapers of the city of New York and elsewhere, and that apparently great efforts have been made to create a public opinion in regard thereto unfavorable to this deponent. And he further says that he has reason to believe, and does believe, that those who instigated these proceedings against deponent have been influenced by personal feelings against this defendant on account of certain proceedings with which this deponent is professionally connected; that in the discharge of what deponent conceived to be his duty, arising out of the professional employment which he had undertaken, charges were made against the district attorney of the United States for the Southern district of New York, and by reason and on account thereof this deponent has incurred the personal ill-will and hostility of said district attorney; and deponent is justified in the belief which he entertains that the district attorney aforesaid is thereby influenced, even if it be unconsciously, to the prejudice of this deponent, and that the litigation in which this deponent has thus been involved has assumed a personal character to a degree in no wise favorable to the due administration of mere justice or public duty. Deponent further says that the result of these proceedings to deponent personally is of the greatest importance; that he has been a counselor at law, and in a close practice in this city and its vicinity for more than twenty years; that during that period, for most of the time, his professional engagements have brought him prominently before the community; that his character or reputation has never heretofore been assailed; that he has secured the confidence of those by whom he has been professionally employed, and, without solicitation on his own part, has been honored by an elevation to a high judicial position, and he feels that it is due to those to whose good will and confidence he is in a good measure indebted for whatever success may have attended his labors, as well as to himself and those whose interests are still more strongly connected with his own, to meet and disprove the charges made against him; he has perfect assurance that he will be able to exculpate himself from every charge which has been made, and he will be ready and willing to meet his accusers and go to a trial at any time whenever such trial may be had before the full bench of the circuit court of this circuit. In view of all the circumstances of the case, he believes it to be important and necessary to public justice and the public interest that the trial of the indictment herein be had before such a court, and so far as he knows or believes, no public interest can be in any wise prejudiced if his request in this regard be granted William Fullerton.

["Sworn to before me, this 19th day of December, 1868. Joseph Gutman, Jr., United States Commissioner S. D. of New York."

[On the 28th of December, Judge NELSON filed the following:][2]

NELSON, Circuit Justice. The practice in question has heretofore been confined, with few exceptions, to the trial of capital cases; and, even in those, I do not now recollect an instance where any division of opinion occurred on the trial, resulting in a certificate of a question to the supreme court. Generally speaking, motions in arrest of judgment, or for a new trial, which are liberally indulged, afford sufficient security against errors or mistakes at the trial. A division of opinion may be certified on a motion in arrest of judgment (U. S. v. Kelly, 11 Wheat. [24 U. S.] 417), though it cannot on a motion for a new trial. But, where there is a difference of opinion on a motion for a new trial, such a direction will be given to the case as will enable the defendant to obtain a certificate of a division under the statute. A new trial will be granted, and the cause will be again submitted to a jury in the presence of the two judges, and the question or questions will be regularly certified. This has occurred in a very few instances in the Northern district of New York, and also in the Southern district of New York, and, indeed, as far as I can remember, in every case where a serious and well-grounded difference existed.

I think that, under these guards and securities against error, on the trial of the current and ordinary offences against the laws, the contingency or possibility of a difference of opinion between the two judges on the trial does not present a case which would justify an interference with the trial of the cause in the usual way, in conformity to the practice in criminal cases.

Case No. 15,176.

UNITED STATES v. FULLERTON.

[7 Blatchf. 177.][1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 16, 1870.

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS TO ACQUIT.

On the trial of an indictment for a misdemeanor, after testimony had been given on both sides, and the evidence was closed, the court directed the jury to acquit the defendant, on the ground that the evidence did not warrant a conviction.

[Cited in U. S. v. Anthony, Case No. 14,459; U. S. v. Babcock, Id. 14,487.]

In this case, which was an indictment for a misdemeanor, after testimony had been given, at the trial, on the part of both the prosecution and the defence, and the evidence was closed, the counsel for the defendant requested the court to instruct the jury to acquit the defendant [William Fullerton], the ground of the request being that the evidence was such as not to warrant a conviction.

Edwards Pierrepont, Dist. Atty., and Benjamin F. Tracy, for United States.

Edwin W. Stoughton, John K. Porter, John E. Burrill, Grenville T. Jenks, and Clarence A. Seward, for defendant.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Samuel Blatchford, District Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

Before WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge, and BLATCHFORD, District Judge.

THE COURT, after hearing a discussion by the respective counsel as to the power of the court to give such an instruction in any case, and thus take the case from the jury, held that, inasmuch as the court would have the power, if the defendant were convicted by the jury on the evidence, to grant him a new trial, if it should be of opinion that the verdict was against the evidence, it had the power, if it was of opinion that a verdict of guilty would not be warranted by the evidence, to direct the jury to acquit the defendant on that ground. The court, being of opinion that the evidence did not warrant a conviction, directed the jury to acquit the defendant, which was done.

Case No. 15,177.

UNITED STATES v. FUNKHOUSER et al.

[4 Biss. 176.] [1]

District Court, D. Indiana. May, 1868.

INFORMERS—THEIR RIGHTS—SHARE IN PROCEEDS.

1. The information must be given to some government official who has the power and duty to act thereupon, and if several causes exist information of any one of them is sufficient.

2. The information must be a plain statement in writing of some one substantial cause, matter, or thing, whereby a fine, penalty or forfeiture shall have been incurred. And it should be sworn to, if required by the officer.

3. A party claiming to share in the judgment must be the first informer, and his information must be substantially true, and capable of proof.

4. Whether, under any circumstances, a special agent of the revenue is entitled to claim as an informer,—quære.

[Cited in U. S. v. Simons, 7 Fed. 714.]

5. The claim of an informer can only date from the time when he actually gave the proper formal information—not when he ascertained the facts.

6. The share of the informer must be taken from the net, not the gross, proceeds.

At law.

Hanna & Knefler, for claimant Little.

J. W. Gordon, for claimants Lamb and Chadwick.

McDONALD, District Judge. This was a proceeding for the adjudication of a forfeiture of a distillery, distilling materials, machinery and apparatus, and a large quantity of whisky, the property of Funkhouser & Co., of Lafayette, for violation of the internal revenue law.

The libel was filed September 27, 1867, and on the 20th of December following, a judgment of forfeiture of the property in question was pronounced. Under this judgment, the property has since been sold; and the proceeds remain in the hands of the marshal.

Several persons have preferred claims, as informers, to a portion of said proceeds. And the question to be decided is whether any of said claims—and, if so, which—shall be allowed.

Among the various claims preferred, there are only two which, according to the evidence, are entitled to the least consideration of the court,—that of George L. Little, and that of Charles Lamb and Rufus Chadwick. The contest is, therefore, between Little of the one part, and Lamb and Chadwick of the other.

The libel recognizes Little as the informer. It commences thus: "Alfred Kilgore, attorney," &c., "who prosecutes for the United States, as well as for George L. Little, the informer herein, exhibits this his libel," &c. And it concludes with a prayer of process against the property, and that all persons in interest be required to appear and show cause "why said forfeiture should not be decreed in manner and form as by law provided, one-half of the proceeds of sale for the use of George L. Little, the informer."

On the 15th of January, 1868, Little filed under oath what he calls "a supplemental claim and answer." In this he asserts that he is the first informer; that on the 9th of September, 1867, he proceeded to Lafayette "in the capacity of a special agent of the treasury department," to investigate the manner in which Funkhouser & Company carried on their business of distilling, and to ascertain whether they had violated the internal revenue laws; that he spent several days in that investigation, and ascertained all the facts on which the judgment of forfeiture was rendered; that, on the 12th of September, 1867, he embodied the result of said investigation in a report to the collector of the proper district, and promptly advised the internal revenue commissioners of said result; that, on the facts developed by said investigation alone, the seizure of the property was made, the libel filed, and the judgment of forfeiture rendered; and that Lamb and Chadwick furnished no information which led to these results.

On the 19th of December, 1867, the day before the judgment of forfeiture, Lamb and Chadwick filed their claim. In it they allege in general terms that they are the first informers and entitled to a moiety of the proceeds; and that Little is not the first informer, and is not entitled to any of the proceeds. And they pray the court to protect their interests and to allow their claim.

On the 20th of March, 1868, Lamb and Chadwick amended their claim by alleging that they discovered the frauds out of which said forfeiture arose before the first of September, 1867, and gave information thereof to the assessor and collector of the proper district before Little made his said investigation and discoveries at Lafayette, and before that investigation, gave to Little, in his character of a special agent of the treasury department, full and complete information of said frauds; and they aver that "said Little then and there undertook and faithfully promised, in consideration of said information, and the communication thereof by them to him, that he would see that their rights as informers against the said distillery of Funkhouser & Co. should be protected; and they say that, relying on said promise and undertaking * * * they took no steps to protect or secure their own rights as such informers, until they learned that said Little, in direct violation of his aforesaid promise and undertaking, had fraudulently and falsely set up a claim as informer" in the premises; and that, confiding in said promise, they were induced to give their claim no further attention till they discovered Little's said fraud on them, whereupon they immediately filed their claim.

It is understood that the district attorney takes no part in this controversy.

A great mass of testimony, in the form of depositions, has been filed by the contending claimants. This evidence, I think, establishes the following facts:

On the first of September, 1867, Little was, and has ever since continued to be, a special agent of the United States treasury department. In that capacity, he was employed at St. Louis early in that month. While there, he received from the treasury department a letter dated September 4, 1867, instructing him to proceed to Lafayette and investigate whisky frauds suspected to have been perpetrated there. He arrived at Lafayette about the 10th of December, and forthwith commenced said investigation. In a few days he discovered that Funkhouser & Co., who had carried on a distillery at Lafayette, had been guilty of divers frauds on the revenue, and had thereby forfeited said distillery and its appurtenances, with large quantities of whisky, to the government, and had defrauded the revenue to the amount of forty-nine thousand three hundred and thirty dollars. On the 12th of September, 1867, he made out a detailed written statement of said frauds and forfeitures, and delivered the same to Williams, the collector of the district in which the distillery was situate. At the same time, he telegraphed Hon. E. A. Rollins, commissioner of internal revenue, of the same facts. On the information thus given by Little, the property was seized by Williams, the collector, who thereupon forwarded to the district attorney the facts so communicated to him by Little. Little also had communication with the district attorney; and the district attorney, on the information above thus obtained through Little, framed the libel on which the judgment of forfeiture was rendered. Little's discovery of any of the causes of said forfeiture could not have been made earlier than the 10th of September, 1867; and he did not, in any sense, become an informer till the 12th of that month.

About the first of September, 1867, and certainly before the 10th of that month, Lamb and Chadwick, by a joint inquiry, discovered that Funkhouser & Co. were shipping whisky in barrels from their distillery in duplicate serial numbers, in violation of the 38th section of the internal revenue act of July 13, 1866, and immediately gave information thereof to Thomas W. Fry, assessor of the district, and delivered to said Fry a written statement of the serial numbers so duplicated, with the dates of the shipments. In July or August, 1867, Lamb and Chadwick gave like information and written statements to one G. W. Giesey, a special agent of the treasury department residing in Cincinnati, and then at Lafayette investigating these whisky frauds; but he, as it seems, made no use of the information they gave him. They also, before the 10th of September, 1867, wrote to the district attorney concerning these frauds; but they stated nothing with sufficient definiteness to enable him to act on it, and he did not act on it. About the 10th of September, 1867, while Little was making said investigation, and after he had discovered enough to effect said forfeiture, Lamb and Chadwick informed him that they knew of important facts relative thereto. He requested them to give him these facts. At first they refused. But afterwards, and before the 12th of September, 1867, they communicated to him the same facts in writing which they had, as aforesaid, given to Fry and Giesey; and Little embodied them in his said report to Williams; and these facts, as to duplicate serial numbers, were, among other causes, stated in the libel as grounds of the forfeiture aforesaid. Lamb and Chadwick both swear that they gave Little the said information in consideration that he then promised them to protect them in their rights as informers. But Little, under oath, denies this promise. The promise, I think, must be considered as proved.

The parties claim as informers, under the 179th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 145). That section provides that a portion of the judgment in cases like the present, "shall be to the use of the person, to be ascertained by the court which shall have imposed or decreed any such fine, penalty, or forfeiture, who shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred."

To entitle any person to a share of the judgment as informer under this section, I think the following things are necessary:

1. The information must be given by the claimant to some officer of the government on whom the law devolves the power and duty of acting on such information. Thus, I suppose that information to the district attorney, or to the proper assessor or collector, or to a special agent of the treasury department charged with the duty of inquiring into the matter to which the information given relates, is sufficient so far as the person to whom it is given is concerned.

2. The information must be a plain statement of some one substantial "cause, matter, or thing whereby a fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred."

It is certainly not sufficient to state a general suspicion or rumor of a fraud on the revenue, although such statement might lead to inquiries disclosing facts sufficient to incur the liability. Nor would a sound, positive statement that a fine, penalty or forfeiture had been incurred be sufficient without a statement of the "cause, matter, or thing" for which the same was incurred.

It is probable that, as a general rule, the information ought to be written; for officers of the revenue could hardly be expected to act on verbal assertions in such a case. Indeed, it appears to be the practice in some places to require the information not only to be in writing, but to be supported by affidavit. And I would think that the revenue officer would not be bound to pay any attention to information to which the informant, if required, refused to swear. But if he was not required by the officer to swear to it, I think it would not be invalid for not being under oath.

3. If several causes exist, by either of which a fine, penalty, or forfeiture is incurred, information of any one of them properly given to the proper officer, would entitle the informer to his claim, if he is the "first" informer.

4. None but the first informer is entitled to any share in the judgment. And the first informer is he only who, in the language of the act, "shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing whereby such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred."

5. The information thus first given must be true in substance and in fact; and it must be capable of proof. If it be false or if it cannot be proved to be true, it can be of no value to the government. The policy of the government is to reward the person who shall first furnish valuable information of the act of forfeiture. And if the information given be untrue or incapable of proof (which is the same thing in effect), it is of no value, and cannot, therefore, entitle the informer to a reward.

Against the claim of Mr. Little, it is insisted that whatever information he may have given, and how early soever he may have given it, his official position precludes his claim as being a common informer. The 179th section above cited gives the share to the person "who shall first inform," without excluding revenue officials or any other class of men. But it is objected that the claim of Mr. Little is precluded by the 9th section of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 101), amending section 5, act of June 13, 1864 [13 Stat. 224], in which it is declared that "any inspector or revenue agent, or any special agent appointed by the secretary of the treasury, who shall demand or receive any compensation, fee or reward other than such as are provided by law, for or in regard to the performance of his official duties, shall upon conviction be fined," &c. The 14th section of the act, March 3, 1865, provides for the appointment of revenue agents, "who shall be paid, in addition to the expenses necessarily incurred by them, such compensation as the secretary of the treasury may deem just and reasonable, not exceeding two thousand dollars per annum."

In a case very similar to the present, Judge Blatchford, of the Southern district of New York, has allowed a special agent of the treasury to make claim as a common informer; though it does not appear that any objection to his right to claim was made under the acts above cited. One Hundred Barrels of Whiskey [Case No. 10,526]. It is understood also, that in cases of forfeiture and penalties compromised before judgment, the treasury department has been in the habit of allowing assessors, collectors, and special agents of the revenue, as first informers, a share in the proceeds of the penalty or forfeiture.

In view of the acts of March 3, 1865, and July 13, 1866, above referred to, as well as of general principles and policy, I entertain great doubt whether a special agent of the revenue, who, in pursuance of instructions given him, first discovers facts working a forfeiture under the revenue laws, can by reason thereof be allowed to share in the proceeds of the thing forfeited. The act of July 13, 1866, seems to forbid it. Such agent is paid for his services, whether his investigation be successful or not, without this additional reward. It hardly seems good policy, after paying such special agent fairly for his services, to add the stimulus of a share in the spoils, thus making him a sort of speculator, and laying before him a temptation to carry things beyond just and reasonable bounds. Besides, when the special agent, by any means, discovers a "cause, matter, or thing" whereby a fine, penalty, or forfeiture has been incurred, has not the government at that moment, in legal contemplation, information of the fact? Is not the knowledge or information in the mind of the special agent identical with knowledge or information on the part of the government? If, at that moment the government can be said to be informed, how can the special agent be said first to inform? Is he entitled to the share because he informs himself? Will he be so entitled because, after he has made the discovery and the government has by consequence already received the information, he communicates the fact to some other revenue officer or to the district attorney? Can an informer be rewarded in any case where he gives information to the government after it is in possession of that information?

I know that there are cases in which acts of congress have expressly allowed revenue officers to share as informers. But in regard to frauds of the kind now under consideration, I am not aware of any act expressly making such provision. Nevertheless, as the usage appears to be so, and as this case may well be decided on other grounds, I make no decision on the point whether Mr. Little's claim is precluded merely because he is a special revenue agent.

It is urged by Mr. Little that the claim of Lamb and Chadwick cannot be allowed, because they are too late in preferring it.

We have seen that these gentlemen did not bring their claim to the notice of the court till the day before the final judgment was rendered, and then, not by asking to be made parties to the original proceeding, but by a petition to be allowed to share in the proceeds of the forfeiture.

In support of this objection, we are referred to the case of Francis v. U. S., 5 Wall. [72 U. S.] 338. In that case, the proceeding was under the act of August 6, 1861 (12 Stat. 319). The 3rd section of that act provides that "the attorney-general, or any district attorney of the United States * * * may institute proceedings of condemnation; and in such case they shall be wholly for the benefit of the United States. Or any person may file an information with such attorney, in which case, the proceeding shall be for the use of such informant and the United States in equal parts." In that case it was held that, under this provision, the informer must become a party to the proceeding in its inception, else the proceeding would "be wholly for the benefit of the United States." This was the necessary result of the words of that act. It made no provision concerning a first informer. It contemplates no controversy between different informers. And it provides that unless the information be filed with the attorney for the government, the proceeding shall be wholly for the benefit of the United States. No such provisions are found in the acts under which the present proceedings were had. As we have already seen, these only provide that the first informer—"to be ascertained by the court"—shall be entitled to share in the proceeds. I think, therefore, that the case in 5 Wall. [72 U. S., supra], is inapplicable to the point under consideration.

It is true that, since, in these cases, informers are liable for costs when the prosecution fails, it would be right to require them to become parties to the proceedings at an early stage. But I do not think that they are bound to be named in the libel. If so, there could be no such contention and decision between different informers, as seems to be contemplated by the 179th section of the act of July 13, 1866. For in that case, the person named in the libel must be taken to be the first informer, and no other person could contest the right with him.

Though Lamb and Chadwick came late into the case, I think they are not thereby precluded, especially as they seem to have been prevented from coming earlier by the promise of Little to protect their interests.

The only remaining question is, Who "first informed of the cause, matter, or thing whereby" the forfeiture in question was incurred? That Little, on the 12th of September, 1867, gave to Williams, the collector, the information on which the prosecution proceeded, and on which the judgment was pronounced, there can be no doubt. That he never at any earlier date, informed of the facts to any one, is equally certain. Nor can it be claimed that the mere ascertainment by him of the facts on which the forfeiture was adjudged, amounted to an information within the meaning of the act of congress. We must therefore consider him as having informed on the 12th of September, 1867, and not before.

Now, did Lamb and Chadwick, within the meaning of said act, inform before the 12th of September, 1867? It is certain that whatever information they gave was given before that date; and that prior to that time they informed Giesey, a special revenue agent, Fry, assessor of the district, and Little, another special agent of the revenue, in writing, of facts concerning said forfeiture. Were the facts, thus given in writing to these three revenue officials, such an information as is contemplated by the 179th section of the act of July 13, 1866? If so, they are the first informers. These facts, as we have seen, were a written statement to the effect that Funkhouser & Co. had shipped divers barrels of whisky in duplicate serial numbers in fraud of the revenue. The duplicate serial numbers and the dates of the shipments were stated in the writings; and the writing handed to Little was, under his directions, certified to be true by the party who took the numbers from the barrels.

Such a duplication of numbers is a violation of the 38th section of act of July 13, 1867, which requires that all casks or packages of distilled spirits manufactured in any distillery shall be numbered for the current year, beginning with number one for the first cask or package inspected on or after the first day of January; and that no two or more casks shall be marked with the same number.

This prosecution was founded on the 25th section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 483). It provides: "That the owner, agent, or superintendent of any still, boiler, or other vessel used in the distillation of spirits, who shall neglect or refuse to make true and exact entry and report of the same, or to do or cause to be done anything by law required to be done concerning distilled spirits, shall, in addition to other fines and penalties now by law provided, forfeit for every such neglect or refusal all the spirits made by or for him, and all the vessels used in making the same, and the stills, boilers, and other vessels used in distillation," &c.

Thus, we see that by this provision of law, any neglect to perform any requirement of law concerning distilling, operates as a forfeiture of the whole concern. The device of the duplicate serial numbers in question was undoubtedly such a neglect; for the parties not only neglected to number serially as the law requires, but falsely numbered the casks.

This false numbering, therefore, if alone averred in the libel and proved on the trial, would of itself have as effectually worked a forfeiture to the full extent to which it was adjudged, as it and the four other causes of forfeiture therein averred actually did.

It is clear, then, that the information given by Lamb and Chadwick was such information as is contemplated by the 179th section of the act of July 13, 1866; and, to my mind, it is equally clear that Lamb and Chadwick are the first informers within the meaning of that section.

A question has been made whether the informers' share shall be taken from the gross or net proceeds. I hold that it must be from the net proceeds. All the expenses of the litigation must be ascertained and deducted from the gross sum on hand. Then the share of Lamb and Chadwick must be proportioned according to the remaining net proceeds, pursuant to the circular of the secretary of the treasury, of August 14, 1866. And the matter is referred to the master to ascertain the share coming to Lamb and Chadwick according to the rules above laid down, and to the provisions of said circular; and he is ordered to report the result to this court.

Case No. 15,178.

UNITED STATES v. FURLONG.

[2 Biss. 97;[1] 9 Int. Rev. Rec. 35; 16 Pittsb. Leg. J. 213. 243.]

District Court, N. D. Illinois. Jan., 1869.

INTERNAL REVENUE—DISTILLER—FALSE RETURNS—ESTIMATES.

1. Under an indictment under the act of 1866 [14 Stat. 98], the government, claiming that a distiller must have used more material and manufactured more spirits than he returned, is bound to prove that such was necessarily the fact, and must exclude any other conclusion.

2. To sustain the theory that a given amount of material will produce a certain quantity of spirits, it must be shown that this is a necessary and unavoidable inference from the facts proved.

The defendant was a distiller in the spring of 1868. In accordance with instructions from the commissioner of internal revenue, two officers of the government visited his distillery on each of ten successive days, measured his tubs, and calculated how much spirits he should have made on the theory now incorporated into the act of July 20, 1868 [15 Stat. 125], that forty-five gallons of the meal and water combined represented one bushel of grain. This was an indictment for false returns. There was no evidence to impeach the returns other than the above calculations.

Jesse O. Norton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

George C. Bates and Leonard Swett, for defendant.

DRUMMOND, District Judge (charging jury). There is no question as to the amount of material reported, and the quantity of spirits returned. The questions are: 1st, whether defendant did not use in the distillation of spirits more grain than he reported, and, 2nd, whether he must not have made more spirits than appear by his returns. As to the first, the prosecution claiming that from the nature, character and number of the mashes proved he must have used more material than he reported, it is necessary that the testimony exclude any other conclusion than that insisted upon by them.

As to the second—the theory of the prosecution is that every bushel of material must produce and does produce at least twelve quarts of spirits. Various witnesses have testified that a certain quantity of material will generally produce a certain quantity of spirits, but the estimated produce of a bushel varies from seven to eighteen quarts. The general effect of the testimony is that the usual product is about thirteen or fourteen quarts, varying according to the character of the machinery, the state of the weather, and other circumstances. The reports of defendant show that he made about nine and a half quarts. If he actually made more than that, or has manufactured more than he has returned, of course he is guilty. The prosecution seeks to draw a certain inference from a given state of facts, and it is incumbent upon them to show that such inference is necessary and unavoidable from the facts proved. They must show that considering the machinery operated by defendant, the material used, and all the attendant circumstances, the product must necessarily have been greater than returned, and must effectually negative any other conclusion.

Verdict—Not guilty.

[The charge of DRUMMOND, District Judge, as published in the Chicago Journal, and reprinted in 9 Int. Rev. Rec. 35, was as follows:]

DRUMMOND, District Judge. The defendant was a distiller in the spring of 1868. The law at that time made it the duty of the defendant to make or cause to be made true and exact entries, in a book to be kept by him, of the number of pounds or gallons of materials used by him; the number of gallons of spirits distilled, and the proof thereof; the number of gallons sold, with the proof thereof, and the name and place of business or residence of the person to whom sold.

The first count in the indictment is that the defendant violated these provisions of the law in neglecting to enter in a book kept for that purpose, the true quantity of the number of pounds or gallons of material, and, also, that he neglected to enter in such book the number of gallons of spirits distilled; the number of gallons sold; the name and place of business or residence of the person to whom sold. The law also declared that the distiller should, on the 1st, 11th, and 21st day of each month, or within five days thereafter, render to the assessor or assistant assessor, an account in duplicate, taken from his books in the particulars hereinbefore recited, and verified by oath of all the facts occurring after the last day of the account preceding. The second count charges the defendant with having violated this provision of the law, in that he neglected to make to the assessor a true return on the 1st, 11th, and 21st days of each month, or within five days thereafter, from the 17th day of April, 1868, until the 1st day of May. The law also declared that if any person removed any distilled spirits from the place where the same were distilled, otherwise than into a bonded warehouse, he incurred a certain penalty, and was liable to punishment. The third count in the indictment charges the defendant with having violated this provision of the law. So that the offence charged in the indictment consists of these several items: In the first place, that he neglected to make the entry in his books, as required by law, of the amount of his material used, and the quantity of liquor that he distilled, and what he had sold, and the name and place of business of the person to whom sold; secondly, that in the particulars just named, to wit: in the quantity of material, and the quantity of spirits, and of the amount sold, true returns were not made to the assessor; thirdly, that he removed the spirits that he distilled to a place other than to a bonded warehouse.

The question is whether the defendant is guilty of all or any one of the offences charged in the indictment. Every defendant, when he is arraigned before a court of justice, is presumed to be innocent. It is incumbent on the prosecution to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt that he is guilty of some one of the offences set forth in the indictment; therefore it is incumbent on the prosecution in this case to satisfy you, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant is guilty in all or in some one of these particulars. The question for you to determine is, whether he is or is not guilty of all or any one.

It is alleged that he is guilty on two grounds: First, that he has not made a proper entry in his books as to the material that he used, because it is claimed that upon the evidence which is before you as to the mashes which were made, that it is a conclusion following from that evidence that he had more material than he has returned. Secondly, that he has not returned the proper quantity of spirits distilled, because if he had made the proper entries and returns, he would have shown that he distilled more spirits than there appears to have been returned, because the material which it is clear he used would have produced a greater quantity of distilled spirits.

You will observe that the prosecution seeks to draw an inference from a given state of facts. That inference, as I have already said, must be the necessary and inevitable inference from that state of facts, in order to warrant the conclusion. That is to say, it must necessarily follow that the product, under the circumstances which existed as shown by the evidence, under which this material was manufactured, that there ought to have been a greater product. As for example: Taking the distillery of the defendant, the machinery he operated, the material that he used, taking all these together, that the product ought to have been greater. If you think that the evidence tends to that conclusion, and there are certain circumstances which were within the knowledge and ability of the defendant to establish which might thrown light upon it, and he has not done so, then, of course, the inference would be against the defendant; as, for example, if it appeared that in a case where the same kind of grain was used, and the same sort of machinery, the product was greater than the defendant has shown that he produced on this occasion, then it would seem, if there was any special character connected with it which has not been shown, and which it was incumbent on the defendant to establish, and he has not done so, the inference would be against him, precisely as in the case of the prosecution.

If there is evidence which it is in the power of the prosecution to bring forward to indicate that the defendant has committed the offence which is charged in the indictment, and it has not been done, then, of course, the inference is against the prosecution. For example, if there were government officials examining the operations of this distillery and they had it in their power to see it operate, and what was going on and make manifest any wrong which the defendant was committing, and then have not done so, then the inference would be against the prosecution. The rule applies to the prosecution as well as to the defendant that if upon a given state of facts there are certain conclusions—necessary, inevitable conclusions—to be drawn, and there were other facts in the power of either party to produce, and they have not produced them, then these conclusions would follow. If there are any facts which would impair or affect those conclusions, and they have not been produced, then, of course, the conclusions would follow. But I mean by that, that the defendant should not be convicted without the conclusions necessarily follow from the nature and character of the evidence and beyond a reasonable doubt.

The jury returned a verdict of "Not guilty."

Case No. 15,179.

UNITED STATES v. The F. W. JOHNSON.

[18 Leg. Int. 334.] [1]

District Court, D. Maryland. Sept. Term, 1861.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—REBELLION AND SECESSION OF STATES—BELLIGERENT RIGHTS—PRIZE—ENEMY PROPERTY — ENROLLMENT AS EVIDENCE — BREACH OF BLOCKADE.

[1. Where states have assumed to secede from the Union, and the government has raised large armies, which are engaged in actual war in endeavoring to put down the rebellion, and the functions of the United States courts are entirely suspended in the rebellious territory, the government of the United States is entitled, by the constitution and by international law, to exercise belligerent rights, as determined by the rules applicable in cases of prize and blockade.]

[2. The fact that a vessel is enrolled in a port of a rebellious state is not conclusive that such port is the domicile of her owner, so as to make her enemy property; and it is competent to show that the owner is, in fact, a resident of another port in a loyal state, and thus avoid condemnation.]

[3. The domicile of the owner at the time of the capture of the vessel determines whether she is of a hostile character or not.]

[4. Where a foreign vesel, laden with railroad iron consigned to a port in a loyal state, was driven ashore on the coast of Virginia and wrecked, and thereafter a wrecking vessel was sent in good faith to rescue the cargo, and bring it to the port of destination, held that, upon the capture of the latter vessel while taking on cargo from the wreck, there was no ground for condemnation for attempted breach of blockade, although it was the intent to land the rescued property temporarily on the shore, until it could be conveyed to the loyal states.]

Prize.

GILES, District Judge. This is a libel filed on behalf of the United States to forfeit the schooner F. W. Johnson as a prize of war. The bill alleges that the said schooner was captured by a vessel of war of the United States, about twenty-five miles to the southward of Cape Henry, in the Atlantic Ocean, having on board at the time about twenty-eight tons of railroad iron; that the said cargo of railroad iron was saved by the said schooner for the use of the Norwegian bark Albion, which had been cast away about the 1st of May last, at the spot where the capture was made; that the said schooner belonged to the port of Norfolk, in Virginia, and was owned by citizens of said state, a state at that time claiming to have separated from the United States, and, with other Southern states, then waging open war against the United States by the various modes of warfare usual among hostile nations; and that the said schooner left her port in Virginia bound to some port south of Maryland, with intention to discharge her cargo in such Southern port.

Before I discuss the facts of this case, as presented to the court in the pleadings, answers to the interrogatories in preparatorio, and other evidence in the case, I will state what I believe to be the law of nations in reference to the first question which has been so ably argued by the learned counsel. It has been contended by the counsel for the claimants that in the present unhappy division in our country the government at Washington has no power, either under the constitution of the United States or by the recognized principles of the law of nations, to treat the inhabitants of the states which claim to have seceded, as enemies, and to exercise in reference to them those belligerent rights which all concede belong to parties engaged in a public war. And by a public war is here meant a war between independent sovereign states. Now, I am sitting in this case, in a prize court, and the supreme court said, in the case of The Rapid, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 155, and The Adeline, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 264, "that the law of prize is a part of the law of nations." And I am, therefore, to decide this question by the principles of that universal law to which all civilized princes and states acknowledge themselves to be subject.

In the first place let us see what is the character of the present contest in this country, and in what light it has been regarded by the executive and legislative departments of the government. In the face of all that is passing around us, it needs no argument to show that a civil war of gigantic dimensions is sweeping over the land. We are almost within sound of the cannon of two of the largest armies that have ever been marshalled in hostile array against each other on this continent. More than one-third of the confederacy has claimed to separate from the rest, and they are now fighting about the construction of the organic instrument of the government,—one side alleging that under a true construction of the constitution each state has a right to withdraw from the Union whenever its people so determine; the other, that no such right exists, and that to attempt to secede is rebellion, and not the exercise of any constitutional right. And in the states which have claimed the right to withdraw, there are now open no courts of the United States, and the laws of the United States cannot now be executed in those states by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings.

Is this not civil war? And has it not been so regarded by the executive department of the government? This is clear from the proclamations of the president of the 15th of April, of the 19th of April, of the 27th of April, and of the 3d of May and of the 10th of May,—all recognizing the fact that the civil power of the government is no longer capable of enforcing the laws, and calling to its aid the power intended to be provided by the acts of 1795 [1 Stat. 424] and 1807 [2 Stat. 443], and also, using the power of blockade, a war power belonging only to belligerents either in a civil or foreign war. And the legislative department has also recognized this contest as a war. For, during the last session of congress, it not only did so by the laws which it passed for the raising of armies and providing means for their support, but in express language, on four different occasions, as will be seen in reference to the laws of the extra session of July last. [12 Stat.] pp. 268, 274, 315, 326. And the last law (page 326) to which I refer, not only recognized a war as existing, but it approved and sanctioned all the proclamations of the president, thereby making valid the blockade declared by the president in his proclamations of the 19th and 27th of April, if the president alone, "as commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States," did not possess this power under the existing circumstances of the country.

The supreme court (Chief Justice Taney delivering the opinion), in the case of Luther v. Borden, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 45, say: "Unquestionably a state may use its military power to put down an armed insurrection, too strong to be controlled by the civil authority. The power is essential to the existence of every government, essential to the preservation of order and free institutions, and is as necessary to the states of the Union as to any other government. The state itself must determine what degree of force the crisis demands, and if the government of Rhode Island deemed the armed opposition so formidable and so ramified throughout the state as to require the use of its military force, and the declaration of martial law, we see no ground upon which the court can question its authority. It was a state of war, and the established government resorted to the rights and usages of war to maintain itself and overcome the unlawful opposition."

Now, what say the writers on the law of nations? Vattel says, in book 3, c. 18, p. 425: "When a party is formed in a state who no longer obey the sovereign, and are possessed of sufficient strength to oppose him, or where, in a republic, the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take up arms, this is called a civil war. Some writers confine this term to a just insurrection against their sovereign, to distinguish that lawful resistance from rebellion which is open and unjust resistance. But what appellation will they give to a war which arises in a republic torn by two factions, or in a monarchy between two competitors for the crown? Custom appropriates the term of civil war to every war between the members of one and the same political society."

And Wheaton, in his great work on International Law, says, on page 365: "A civil war between the different members of the same society is what Grotius calls a mixed war. It is, according to him, public on the side of the established government, and private on the part of the people resisting its authority. But the general usage of nations regards such a war as entitling the contending parties to all the rights of war as against each other, and even as respects neutral nations."

Judge Chase, of the supreme court, in the case of Ware v. Hilton, 3 Dall? [3 U. S.] 199, speaking of the effect of the act of the Virginia convention in June, 1776, and the declaration of independence by congress on the 4th of July following, says: "Before these solemn acts of separation from the crown of Great Britain, the war between Great Britain and the United Colonies, jointly and separately, was a civil war; but instantly, on that great and ever-memorable event, the war changed its nature, and became a public war between independent governments; and immediately thereupon all the other rights of an independent nation attached to the government of Virginia." Whether the learned judge be correct in his view, that the war became a public war after the declaration of independence, a view he may be excused for taking, if wrong, as his own name was appended to that imperishable document, we have the sanction of his great name to the doctrine that to such a contest there belonged all the rights of war. I am therefore clear in the opinion that as a blockade is an acknowledged belligerent right under the law of nations where war exists, the blockade of the Southern ports was lawfully proclaimed by the president.

In the discussion of this question I have said nothing in reference to sovereign rights of the government: whether it may not at the same time exercise both sovereign and belligerent rights. Such a question does not arise in the case. I have confined myself to the examination of the existence or not of belligerent rights by the government in reference to the present unfortunate state of the country. And Phillemore, in his Commentaries on International Law (volume 3, p. 740), gives us a simple rule by which to determine this question. He says: "In the case of a civil war, the English law furnishes a good criterion as to whether the country is to be considered at peace or at war—that whenever the king's courts are open it is a time of peace, in judgment of law." Judged by this standard, then, as the federal courts are closed in the Southern states, there is a state of civil war. And the government is remitted to its belligerent rights, to be exercised in accordance with those maxims of humanity, moderation and honor, which the law of nations has prescribed to be observed by both parties in every civil war.

Sitting in a court of the captors, adjudging a question of prize, I am to decide whether this vessel and cargo can be condemned upon either of the grounds alleged by the district attorney. He contends that the ship and cargo are to be condemned as enemy's property, and if not such, to be condemned because there was committed a breach of blockade. Now, as both these grounds involve questions of fact, as well as questions of law, let us see what are the facts of the case as presented in the pleadings and evidence. The schooner F. W. Johnson is owned by a certain Holder Almy, a resident and citizen of the state of Rhode Island. That he has been for the last five years largely engaged in the business of wrecking along the Atlantic coast, owning some other vessels, and was frequently called by his business to Portsmouth and Norfolk, in Virginia. That he married a lady in one of those places, and as his business permitted, passed much of his time there, but left there for his home in Rhode Island about the time of the bombardment of Fort Sumter. That he purchased the F. W. Johnson in Norfolk some five years since, and caused her to be enrolled in Norfolk on the 5th of July, 1856, and losing the certificate of that enrollment, he enrolled her again at the same port on the 29th of September, 1858, under which she has been sailing since. The last coasting license, which recites the enrollment of 1858, was taken out at Norfolk on the 2d of March last.

In the enrollment Holder Almy is mentioned as "of the city of Norfolk, state of Virginia," but he only swears "that he is a citizen of the United States." The said schooner was at the time of her capture, sailing under the flag of the United States, and her captain and crew were all citizens of Massachusetts or Connecticut. These are all the facts in reference to the question of ownership. The district attorney contends that, inasmuch as the enrollment recites Holder Almy as of Norfolk, Virginia, he cannot contradict it, so as to relieve his vessel from condemnation as enemy's property. Now, when this enrollment was made, Holder Almy was for a temporary purpose at Norfolk, where he purchased the vessel, and where it was perfectly legal for him to enroll her, if he was not absolutely required to do so by our registry and enrollment acts. See Act Dec. 31, 1792, § 11 [1 Stat. 292], and Act Feb. 18, 1793, § 2 [1 Stat. 305]. Norfolk was then a part of the United States, acknowledging its allegiance to the government, and where the officers of the government granted the license and made the enrollment which have been given in evidence in this case.

Now, is an enrollment anything more than prima facie evidence of ownership or of the residence of the owner? May not the true state of the facts be shown by the evidence—the question being, was the domicil of the owner at the time of the capture in an enemy's country, and not what may have been his residence at any former period? It is true, the owner who makes the oath in the custom-house, to enable him to obtain the enrollment, would not be heard in a court of justice to dispute the facts he had sworn to, but he could show any facts not inconsistent with the oath he had taken. For instance, he could show, that although he is named as sole owner, the equitable interest in a moiety of the vessel is in other parties (see case of Weston v. Penniman [Case No. 17,455]), or that since the enrollment his domicil has been changed. In the case of the ship Resolution and cargo, in the federal court of appeals in 1781, that court, in [Miller v. The Resolution] 2 Dall. [2 U. S.] 23, say (speaking of the ship's papers), "that every commercial country has directed by its laws that its ships shall be furnished with a set of papers called the 'ship papers.' And this criterion the law of nations adopts in time of war to distinguish the property of different powers when found at sea; not indeed as conclusive, but presumptive evidence only."

Bills of lading, letters of correspondence, and all other papers on board which relate to the ship or cargo, are also considered as prima facie evidence of the facts they speak. They say again, "if the papers affirm the ship and cargo to be the property of an enemy, there must be a condemnation, unless they who contest the capture can produce clear and unquestionable evidence to prove the contrary." It will be found on reference to the case of Dudley v. The Superior [Case No. 4,115], that Judge Leavitt (of the United States district court of Ohio) held that as the Superior had been enrolled at Buffalo, the enrollment was prima facie evidence that she belonged to the port of Buffalo at the time of her registry. He says: "It is true, in controversies between the owners of a vessel involving a question of title merely, the enrollment is not even prima facie evidence." "When offered to show title in the person making it, it is wholly inadmissible as evidence, for the reason that it is proof only of his acts, and cannot be received against other parties. But upon an incidental question, not affecting the title of the parties, it is competent evidence, and unless contradicted by clear evidence, will be held conclusive as to the port or place to which the vessel belongs." In the case of U. S. v. Brune [Id. 14,677], Judge Grier decided that in a criminal prosecution against one of the crew of an American vessel, the registry was not even prima facie evidence of ownership, to show the American character of the vessel. I therefore am of the opinion that in this case the enrollment and license were only prima facie evidence that Holder Almy, the owner of the said schooner, was a citizen of Virginia. As further authorities on this question, see the following cases: Bradbury v. Johnson, 41 Me. 582; Brooks v. Minturn, 1 Cal. 482; Stokes v. Carne, 2 Camp. 340.

Now, as I said before, the domicil of the owner at the time of the capture of the vessel, determines its character as hostile or not. In the case of The Ocean, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 91, Sir Wm. Scott decided that a British merchant settled in Holland, at the breaking out of hostilities, but taking early measures to remove, was entitled to restitution of his property seized as enemy's property. And the same doctrine was maintained by the supreme court in the case of The Venus, 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 253. Justice Washington, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, speaking of a domicil acquired in a foreign country: "But this national character which a man acquires by residence may be thrown off at pleasure by a return to his native country, or even by his turning his back on the country in which he has resided, on his way to another. To use the language of Sir Wm. Scott, it is an adventitious character gained by residence and which ceases by non-residence. It no longer adheres to the party from the moment he puts himself in motion, bona fide, to quit the country sine animo revertendi."

Now, tested by these decisions, this vessel belonged at the time of her capture to Rhode Island, for Capt. Stoddard swears in his claim and answer that Holder Almy left Norfolk about the time of the bombardment of Fort Sumter, and returned to his home in Rhode Island. And there is nothing in the case to cast the slightest suspicion on this statement. The cargo belonged to certain underwriters of the city of New York to whom it had been abandoned by the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. There cannot, therefore, be any condemnation of either the vessel or cargo as enemy's property.

Now, as to the other ground of condemnation alleged by the district attorney—the breach of blockade. What are the facts in reference to this question? It appears that some time previous to the 1st of last May, upwards of six hundred tons of railroad iron were shipped from England in the Norwegian bark Albion, bound to this port, and consigned to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, the purchasers thereof, and who had caused it to be insured in the New York insurance offices. That the said bark, while proceeding on her said voyage was, about the first of May, wrecked upon the Atlantic coast, about thirty miles south of Cape Henry, and lay there about one-fourth of a mile from the shore. Under these circumstances the railroad company abandoned it as for a total loss, and James Carey Coale, the agent of the New York underwriters, entered into a contract with Capt. Baker, the mate of said schooner, to send her down to the wreck to save as much of the iron as possible.

That the said schooner F. W. Johnson about that time came up to the port with a cargo saved from a wreck near Smith's Point, in the Chesapeake, and left here about the tenth of May to fulfill said contract, so made with the agent of the underwriters. That they went first to New Inlet for a harbor, and reached the wreck of the Albion about the 1st of June, and found it in a most exposed situation, liable to go to pieces in the first storm. That they proceeded to take iron from her, and had succeeded in getting twenty-seven tons on board when they were captured. That they intended to land said iron, as soon as they could get it out, at New Inlet, being the nearest land on which they could safely deposit it, until it could be removed to Baltimore, to which port they intended to bring it—as it was important, from the exposed condition of the vessel, to remove the iron from it as fast as possible. That New Inlet is an uninhabited part of the coast, one of those small inlets between the ocean and Pamlico Sound, and about twenty miles from the main land and seventy miles from the nearest port of entry, Edenton, in North Carolina. These distances I learn from an examination of the map of that state. It is at the north end of the Chickconacomo bank, that long ridge of sand thrown up by the Atlantic, and which separates it from Pamlico Sound. On a map exhibited in court during the trial, the water in New Inlet was marked 2½ feet deep; through which there is no passage for vessels into the sound, and I suppose it is gradually closing up by the sand washed up from the ocean, as I find, on examination of the map of North Carolina, that two inlets north of New Inlet, Currituck Inlet and Roanoke Inlet, are now closed.

Now it is perfectly clear from all the evidence in the case that there was no intention to violate the blockade by any party connected with the F. W. Johnson. They went there in good faith to save the wrecked property of loyal citizens, and every witness examined negatived the idea that there was any intention to carry this iron or any part of it into North Carolina. Now the purpose of a blockade is to prevent all commercial intercourse with the interdicted port. Says Phillemore (volume 3, p. 292): "The object of a blockade is to prevent exports as well as imports, and to cut off all communication of commerce with the blockaded place." Now, do the facts of this case show any breach of a blockade, as thus defined? Certainly it would not have been contended that any breach of the blockade had been committed if the master and seamen of the bark Albion had, on their being wrecked, with their small boats made the effort to save the cargo, and to enable them to do so, had carried it to the nearest place of safety with the intention of removing it to the port of destination, Baltimore.

Now, how is the case altered, when, instead of the ship's crew, the effort to save the cargo is made by professional wreckers employed by the owners? Is it not such a case of necessity as excuses the national offense. Says Phillemore (volume 3, p. 61), speaking of a decision of Lord Stowell: "The law of cases of necessity, he observes, is not likely to be furnished with precise rules; and whatever is reasonable and just in such cases is likewise legal. It is not to be considered as a matter of surprise, therefore, if much instituted rule is not to be found on the subject. A clear necessity is a sufficient justification for every thing that is done fairly and with good faith under it."

Now, tested by this standard, is it not reasonable and just that the owner of goods, cast upon the shores of a blockaded country by a storm of the ocean, should be permitted to make every exertion to save them for the purpose of carrying them to the destined port? The principle of excuse from necessity will be found to have received the sanction of the supreme court in the case of The Mary, 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 126. Chief Justice Marshall, and I can name no higher authority, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The Mary was forced into Waterford by irresistible necessity, and was detained there by the operation of causes she could not control. Had her departure been from a neutral port, and she had been thus forced, during the voyage, into a hostile port, would it be alleged that she had incurred the liabilities of a vessel sailing from a port of the enemy? It is believed that this allegation could not be sustained, and that it would not be made."

The same principle was sustained by Sir W. Scott in the case of The Charlotta, Edw. Adm. 252. That was the case of an American ship on a voyage from Boston to St. Petersburg, putting into the Texel, in distress and for repairs, Texel then being under blockade, That learned admiralty judge, on being satisfied that there was a necessity for her going into the Texel, restored the ship and cargo. He also maintained the same principle in the case of The Fortuna, 5 C. Rob. Adm. 27. I think that principle covers this case, and I will sign a decree restoring the vessel and cargo to the claimants upon the payment of the costs of the case. I charge them with the costs, because the enrollment, which was the only evidence the boarding officer had at the time, recited that the schooner belonged to a citizen of Virginia, and justified her capture and her being sent into a prize court for adjudication.

INDICTMENT—GAMING.

An indictment will not lie under the Virginia act, for suffering gaming in the defendant's house; because the act has given an action of debt to the informer.

Indictment for suffering gaming in his public inn, contrary to Act Va., Jan. 19, 1798, c. 2, § 3. This indictment was quashed, upon the same ground upon which the court instructed the jury in the case of U. S. v. Simms [Case No. 16,290]. UNITED STATES v. GALACAR.

[1 Spr. 545.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. October, 1852.

SHIPPING REGULATIONS — REPORTING ARRIVAL — BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The report required by St. 1790, c. 35, § 16 [1 Stat. 158], to be made by a master, of the arrival of his vessel, must be made at the office of the chief officer of the customs.

2. A report to an inspector, on board of the vessel, and in a shop on shore, is not a compliance with the statute.

3. In a prosecution for not making the requisite report, the burden is upon the government, to prove that it was not made at the proper office.

This was a libel or information, filed by the district attorney of the United States, to enforce the payment of a penalty of $1.000 by the master of the brig Baltic, for an alleged violation of the act of 1790 (chapter 35, § 16), which enacts:—"That within twenty-four hours after the arrival of any ship or vessel, from any port or place, at any port of the United States established by law, at which an officer of the customs resides, or within any harbor, inlet, or creek thereof, if the hours of business at the office of the chief officer of the customs at such port will permit, or as soon thereafter as the said hours will permit, the master or other person, having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, shall repair to the said office, and shall make report to the said chief officer of the arrival of the said ship or vessel." The only witness was the inspector, who testified that the vessel put into Edgartown on a Friday afternoon, and sailed early Monday morning, and that, in the course of Friday afternoon, he examined and certified the papers on board of the vessel, and again in a shop where he accidentally met the defendant, and that the defendant did not make a report at the custom house, or go there at all. But it appeared, on cross-examination, that the witness was employed in boarding vessels nearly all of the two days the brig lay there, and was not himself at the custom house, if at all, more than a few minutes, and that the defendant landed with his papers. The defence was rested on the ground that, by not summoning the collector who alone had personal knowledge whether the report was made, (it being a verbal report,) the government had failed to introduce satisfactory testimony of any default of the defendant; who must be presumed to have done his duty.

G. Lunt, U. S. Dist. Atty.

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging jury). It is the duty of the master, not merely to report his vessel within the time specified, but to report her at the office of the chief officer of the customs. His report may be verbal, and only of the fact of the arrival of the vessel, a fuller report being required after forty-eight hours. The duty of the inspector was to board all vessels, examine the manifests and certify them, which duty was performed, in this case on board of the vessel, and at a shop on shore. This was not a report answering the requirement of the statute. The only question for the jury is, whether the defendant did report his vessel, within the specified time, at the office of the collector. The burden is on the government to satisfy the jury that he did not so make a report.

Verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. GALBRAITH.

[Hoff. Op. 77; Hoff. Dec. 20.]

District Court, N. D. California. Jan. 22, 1861.[1]

CALIFORNIA LAND GRANTS—EXPEDIENTE AS EVIDENCE—ALTERATION OF TITLE PAPERS—FAILURE TO OCCUPY.

1. If the expediente be genuine, it affords evidence of the issuance of the grant far more satisfactory than the production of the title papers by the party interested: for the only safe and reliable documentary evidence in this class of cases is that afforded by the records found in the archives.

2. A fraudulent attempt to alter the date of a grant so as to obviate an apprehended objection to its validity, can have no effect to take away from a claimant any lands actually granted to him before the acquisition of the country by the United States. U. S. v. West's Heirs, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 319, followed.

3. The grant of the governor vests a title in the grantee which must be confirmed unless he has been guilty of such unreasonable neglect to comply with the conditions of the grant as justifies the inference that he abandoned it during the existence of the former government. But no such inference can be drawn from a neglect to occupy and settle before the conquest, where the grant was made less than a month before the capture of Monterey, especially as the disturbed condition of the country made it dangerous for the grantee to remain in the vicinity. U. S. v. Fremont, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 442, applied.

[This was a claim by James D. Galbraith to the Rancho Bolsa de Tomales, five square leagues, in Marin county, granted June 12, 1846, by Pio Pico to Juan N. Padilla; claim filed April 29, 1852, confirmed by commission April 11, 1854, by the district court December 1, 1854. Case unreported. Decree reversed by the supreme court, and cause remanded for further proofs. 22 How. (63 U. S.) 89. The case is now heard upon further proofs taken.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case was confirmed by the board, and by this court; but, on appeal, the decree of this court was reversed, and the cause remanded for further proofs. Further proofs have accordingly been taken, and the case is again presented for decision. The documents relied on by the claimants, are:

Title Papers.

(1) A petition of Juan N. Padilla to the governor, dated at Monterey, May 14, 1846, soliciting five square leagues of land, known as Bolsa de Tomales. (2) A certificate of Castro, prefect of the First district, stating the land to be vacant and grantable; also dated at Monterey, May 10, 1846. (3) A marginal reference for information, signed by Pio Pico, and dated May 20, 1846. (4) A decree of concession dated Los Angeles, June 12, 1846. (5) The borrador, or office copy, of the formal title delivered to the party, which is usually found among the papers remaining on file among the archives.

All the foregoing documents are found in the archives, and compose what is called the "expediente."

The claimants have also produced from their own custody, the original title delivered to the grantee, and a certificate of approval by the departmental assembly.

Frauds in Title Papers.

With respect to these last two documents, there can be no doubt that the first or formal title has been altered, the date having been changed from June 12th to February 12th, 1846. The certificate of approval is also evidently a forgery. No minute of any such action can be found in the journals of the departmental assembly, and the signature of Pio Pico, with which the court is very familiar, and the various forms of which, as shown by the archives, were considered at large in the case of Luco v. U. S. [23 How. (64 U. S.) 515], has, I am satisfied, either been forged or signed by him long subsequently to the date of the document.

Expediente Genuine.

The expediente, however, found in the archives, bears every mark of genuineness. The petition is partly in the handwriting of Arce, and partly in that of Padilla, the grantee. The marginal decree of concession and the borrador of the title are in the handwriting of Moreno, the secretary, and the signatures of that officer and of Pio Pico, the governor, are evidently genuine, and such as were used by them at the date of the documents. The certificate of Castro and his signature are also in his handwriting; and from an examination of the original documents in the archives, I can see no reason to doubt the genuineness of the entire expediente. Such is the opinion of Mr. Hopkins, the keeper of the archives, on whom, for his great intelligence, long familiarity with the archives, and unquestionable integrity, it is not too much to say that more reliance should be placed than on almost any number of the hackneyed and professional witnesses, who usually testify in this class of cases.

This opinion is corroborated by several facts.

1. On the back of the expediente is found an endorsement: "Bolsa de Tomales, concedido a Juan NePomunceno Padilla, No. 571." This endorsement is in the handwriting of Mr. W. E. P. Hartnell, by whom and Maj. Halleck the expendientes on file among the archives in 1847 were examined and numbered. The numbering was continued from the last number in Jimeno's index. Endorsements were made on the expedientes made up subsequently to the date of the last on that index, and a list similar to that of Jimeno was prepared. On that list the grant in this case is noted. and its number, No. 571, exactly corresponds with its date; No. 570 being dated a few days before the 12th of June, the date of this grant, and No. 572 a few days after. It has been frequently proved, and the fact is undoubted, that this numbering was effected by Mr. Hartnell, early in 1847, and the list prepared shortly afterwards. There can, I think, be no doubt of the existence of this expediente in the archives, in 1847.

There are some other, but slighter, corroborations of this conclusion furnished by the documents themselves. The petition, as has been stated, is dated Monterey, May 14th. The certificate of Castro is dated May 10th. Both purport to have been written at Monterey. They must therefore have been taken to Los Angeles to be submitted to the governor. On examining the marks or creases in the paper, it is evident that both documents were folded together, precisely as would have been the case if made into a single package and placed in one envelope. The appearance of the paper, the color of the ink, &c., in all respects correspond with other documents of unquestionable authenticity dated about the same time; and the handwriting of Castro, which is somewhat peculiar, bears a like resemblance to other official documents written by him about the same time. If, then, this expediente was in the archives in 1847, it follows that it must have been executed by Pio Pico before his flight from Los Angeles to Lower California, in August, 1846, for he did not return to this country until 1848, nearly a year after this expediente had been indexed and numbered by Mr. Hartnell. That Pio Pico was in Los Angeles on the 12th of June and even so late as the 16th of that month, is clear, from official communications, &c., to the ayuntamiento of that pueblo, signed by himself and Moreno, and dated on the 15th June; and I can see no reason for assuming that the grant was not executed on the day it bears date. It is to be remembered that although the date of the capture of Monterey has been in acts of congress and the decisions of the supreme court fixed, as the period of subversion of Mexican authority and the date of the conquest, its importance could not, in July, 1846, have been suspected. The capital of the department still remained in the hands of the Mexicans. The authority of the governor was recognized and enforced throughout all the southern portions of the department. The departmental assembly had not ceased to hold its sessions, and the most important conflicts which occurred in California took place after the capture of Monterey. Whatever reasons may exist for fixing the date of the actual or rather constructive conquest of the country, it can hardly be supposed that Pio Pico, when asked to sign a grant in July, would have suspected that he imparted additional validity to it by dating it in the preceding month. I am not aware that it has ever appeared that Pico actually signed any grant in July or August, and attached to it an earlier date, although several cases have occurred where the dates of documents, actually signed in those months, have since been altered, so as to make them appear to have been executed before the 7th July.

Some stress was laid upon the fact that the marginal order for an informe is dated May 20th, while the certificate of Castro giving the required information is dated May 10th, and must then have been before the governor. But I find nothing in this not susceptible of easy explanation. The usual marginal order may have been drawn, and the proceedings suspended until the informe was received, without adverting to the circumstance that the information was already furnished by Castro. Such an oversight is by no means improbable. And it is not until the 12th of June, when perhaps the attention of the governor was called to Castro's certificate, and he was urged to issue the grant, that he makes the decree of concession, and signs the formal title paper. If, then, the expediente be genuine, it affords evidence of the issuance of the grant far more satisfactory than the production of the title paper by the party interested. For, as has been so often remarked by this court, the only safe and reliable documentary testimony in this class of cases is that afforded by the records found among the archives.

The Fraud does not Injure Title.

The only question which can be raised is —does the fact that a certificate of approval by the assembly has been forged, and the date of the grant altered, forfeit the land to the United States, or—what is the same thing —prevent this court from confirming the claim? As the duty of this court, under the act of 1851 [9 Stat. 631], is to inquire what lands were private and what public at the date of the treaty of cession, it would seem obvious that the determination of that question cannot be affected by the circumstance that since that date a fraud has been attempted to be perpetrated. If the only evidence of the making of the grant, was the title paper itself, it might be that the court would be compelled to refuse to admit the altered paper in evidence, and then to reject the claim for want of testimony to support it. But we have the further and far more satisfactory evidence furnished by the archives; the petition, which shows that the lands were solicited; the informe of Castrô, which shows them to have been vacant; the decree of concession, which shows that the governor acceded to the petition, granted the land, and directed the formal title to issue, and the borrador or the office copy of the grant actually delivered to the party, in all respects the counterpart of that produced by claimants, except that in the latter the date has been altered from June to February. It is unnecessary, however, to further discuss the question, for the decision of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. West's Heirs, 22 How. [63 U. S.] 319, is a direct authority on the point. Under the ruling in that case, it must be taken as law that a fraudulent attempt to enlarge a grant —still less an attempt to alter it so as to obviate an apprehended objection to its validity—can have no effect to take away from a claimant, lands actually granted to him before the acquisition of the country by the United States.

With regard to the possession, the evidence is not satisfactory. The proofs, I think, show that Padilla, who was the owner of an adjoining rancho, drove his cattle upon the land now claimed, the pasture on his own having been consumed by fire. The same range was also frequented by the cattle of Bojorques, another adjoining ranchero, and a dispute having arisen between the two, it was decided by the alcalde that Bojorques should remove his cattle, and those of Padilla should remain. This occurred in 1845, and before Padilla had received any grant, or even applied for the land. The decision of the alcalde seems to have been founded on a previous permission to occupy the land provisionally granted to Padilla by the first alcalde. It would seem that the raqueros of Padilla constructed a small hut of poles and tules, to afford shelter while tending their herds. But there was no permanent settlement effected, nor any other occupation than such as has been mentioned. In the spring of 1846, Padilla, having become involved in the disputes between the Americans and his countrymen, was compelled to leave the northern part of the country, and his cattle were sold or withdrawn from the Bolsa de Tomales. It is clear that no possession was ever taken under the grant or as a fulfillment of its conditions. And the only occupation of the tract was such as has been described. But it has been decided that the grant of the governor vests a title in the grantee which must be confirmed unless he has been guilty of such unreasonable neglect to comply with the conditions as justifies the inference that he had abandoned his grant during the existence of the former government. U. S. v. Fremont, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 442. But no such inference can be drawn from a neglect to occupy and settle during the brief period which intervened between the date of the grant, June 12th, and the conquest of Monterey, July 7th, especially as the disturbed condition of the country, owing to the Bear Flag hostilities, and the relations between Padilla and the American settlers, who had risen against the California authorities, made it dangerous for him to return to that part of the country.

Under the views originally entertained by this court, the claim would have been rejected on the ground that the grant, not having been confirmed by the assembly, constituted but an imperfect or inchoate title, which the United States was not bound to perfect unless the claimant could show either some antecedent consideration, or an occupation and settlement effected under and on the faith of the grant, sufficient to give him an equitable right to demand its completion by the United States. But under the ruling in the case of U. S. v. Fremont [supra], evidence of occupation and settlement cannot now be exacted, nor is the inquiry into those facts material, unless it be alleged that there has been unreasonable neglect to fulfill the conditions, amounting to an abandonment. Under any circumstances, I should of course feel bound to govern my decision by the rulings of the supreme court. But in these cases, where the rules of decision as laid down by that tribunal, have long been known and accepted as the law, where the property has been frequently transferred and may have passed into the hands of bona fide purchasers for value, who have invested their money, relying upon the stability of the rules laid down by the highest tribunal of the country, it would be doubly improper in an inferior court to decline to decide in accordance with those rules, whatever might be its opinion as to their original correctness.

As, then, the proof shows that the grant issued on the 12th June, 1846, prior to the date of what has been regarded as the conquest of the country, and the final subversion of the Mexican authority,—as no unreasonable neglect can be imputed to the claimant,—the case appears to me one which, under the decisions of the supreme court, ought to be confirmed. A decree must be entered accordingly.

[The decree confirming the claim was reversed by the supreme court upon appeal by the United States. 2 Black (67 U. S.) 394.]

Case No. 15,183.

UNITED STATES v. GALINDO.

[1 Cal. Law J. 233.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1863.

MEXICAN LAND GRANTS—CLAIM REJECTED.

[An alleged grant made by a priest of the mission of Santa Clara, under authority given in certain communications from the governor and commanding general, rejected, where the only documents were the original deeds produced by the claimant, unsupported by the records of the mission or by any other evidence from the archives.]

[This was a claim by Juan C. Galindo, based upon an alleged grant from a priest of the mission of Santa Clara, for two leagues of land lying in Santa Clara county, Cal.]

OPINION OF THE COURT. The title of the claimant in this case is founded on an alleged deed to him from Padre Real, priest of the mission of Santa Clara. The authority for making this deed is claimed to have been conferred on Padre Real by a communication addressed to him by Jimeno on the 21st of December, 1844; by a communication dated June 16, 1846, from José Castro to Padre Real; and by an order of José Castro dated June 9, 1846, on the margin of a petition addressed to General José Castro, and dated May 12, 1845. The deed of Real to Galindo is dated June 10, 1846. In his letter of June 16, José Castro, after alluding to a copy previously transmitted to Real of a supreme order dated January 14, 1846, in which the commandants general were authorized to dispose of all the resources of their departments, transcribes a dispatch dated June 10, received by himself from the governor of California.

It is evident that neither the dispatch of Castro, dated June 16, nor the communication to him from the governor dated June 10, and which he transcribes for the information of Real, could have constituted the authority for making a deed on the 10th of June, the very day on which the governor's dispatch was written at the capital of the department. The communication of Jimeno of December 21, 1844, purports to be written by the direction of the governor and to order the priest to proceed to the designation and delivery of such lands of the mission as he may think it necessary to concede for the support of divine worship and the maintenance of his reverence, "making an entry in a book of the lands conceded, which book shall be kept in the archives, and which shall serve as a notice when the poblacion of Santa Clara shall be formed." Neither this communication nor that of José Castro to Real is found in the archives of the former government. Nor do we find any trace of the supreme order of January 14, 1846, referred to in Castro's letter, whereby the commandants general were authorized to dispose of all the resources of their departments. No book containing entries of the land conceded under the authority alleged to have been conferred by Jimeno's dispatch of December 21, 1844, is produced, nor do the archives contain any evidence of any other concession made by the priest by virtue of that order.

It is unnecessary to consider whether, under the colonization laws and regulations, the governor had the right to delegate to a priest of a mission the power of conceding public lands. For no clue of the documents by which he is supposed to have done so is found in the archives, or have any higher evidence of authenticity than their production by the claimants, with proof of the handwriting. The dispatch of Jimeno is evidently a mere authority to the priest to designate and deliver the possession of such lands as it may be absolutely necessary to dispose of for the maintenance of divine worship, with an implied promise that the government will respect the rights so conferred when the poblacion is formed and the lands distributed amongst the pobladores. But this authority seems never to have been acted on by the priest, even if the documents produced be genuine—for the deed to Galindo was not made until nearly two years afterwards. And Castro's communication shows that the dispatch it encloses was in answer to a recent application by Real for authority to sell the lands of the mission to pay its debts. It could not have been supposed by Real that all the authority he required was already conferred by Jimeno's dispatch of December 21, 1844. If the genuineness of these documents were undoubted; if it were shown that the mission was in fact indebted to Galindo, and if, acting on the authority conferred by the dispatches, the priest had conceded to Galindo a tract of land which he had occupied and improved, and of which, at the conquest, we had found him in the undisturbed possession, the case would have had strong equitable claims upon the consideration of the United States government, notwithstanding the technical objection that the governor had no right to delegate his authority to grant. It was, probably, on these grounds that the claim was confirmed by the circuit judge.

But the proof of the authenticity of the documents is unsatisfactory; and they are wholly unsustained by archive evidence, which, under the recent decisions of the supreme court, we are justified in exacting. There seems to be no reason why the borrador of Jimeno's dispatch to Real, or of the communication to Castro, and by him transcribed to Real, should not, if genuine, be found in the archives. The deed of Real to Galindo is subscribed by two witnesses, neither of whom has been called: it appears that Galindo never occupied the tract until 1847; nor is there any proof of a notorious and recognized claim of ownership by Galindo during the existence of the former government. An expediente from the archives containing a petition by Galindo for two leagues of land in extent, a marginal order of reference, and a favorable report, have been produced. But this petition, which is dated April 1, 1846, refers to an entirely different tract from that described in Real's deed, and it appears not to have been acted on. A petition of Galindo to José Castro, dated May 12, 1846, is also produced, in which Galindo prays that the debt due him by the mission may be paid by a grant of the land petitioned for by him two years before. On this petition is a marginal order by Castro, directing Galindo to apply to the priest that the latter may satisfy his claim, if just, by giving him a piece of land. This order is dated June 9, 1846.

But independently of the objection that Castro, as commandant general, had no authority to empower the priests to dispose of mission lands, the document has no sufficient evidence of authenticity. It is not found in the archives, but is produced from the custody of the claimant, and Mr. Hopkins testifies that the date appears to have been originally written July 9th, and altered to June 9th. If the document was, in fact, written in July, it could not have been the authority to Real for making a deed in June. I think that, under the proofs, the claim must be rejected.

INDICTMENT—ASSAULT WITH DANGEROUS WEAPON.

The twenty-second section of the crimes act of March 3, 1825 (7 Bior. & D. Laws, 401 [4 Stat. 115]), providing for the punishment of assaults with dangerous weapons, contemplates a misdemeanor and not a felony; and in an indictment under the act for such an offence, it is not necessary to charge that the assault was committed feloniously, or with intent to perpetrate a felony.

The prisoner was indicted under the twenty-second section of the crimes act of March 3, 1825 (7 Bior. & D. Laws, 401 [4 Stat. 115]). The indictment charged "that the prisoner, [James] Gallagher, on the high seas, with a dangerous weapon called a tormentor, (being a meat-hook,) held in his right hand, in and upon Isaiah Hartless did make an assault." &c. Moved, in arrest of judgment, that the indictment was bad, in not charging the assault to have been committed "feloniously," or with an intent to perpetrate a felony; that the mere use of a dangerous weapon, abstracted from the "intent" with which used, was not contemplated to have been made a "felony"; that the twenty-second section had in view the use of a dangerous weapon with a felonious intent, and intended generally to punish "felonious assaults." The phraseology indicated this classification. All the other assaults named were "felonies," and the word "other," in the sentence, "shall, with a dangerous weapon, or to perpetrate any other felony," supposes "the intent to commit a felony" as necessary to be charged on an assault with a dangerous weapon. In support of this construction, the view taken of the twenty-second section by the chairman of the judiciary committee, Mr. Webster (1 Gales & Sea. 330), was referred to, who remarks, "that no provision had been made for that class of offences called 'felonious assaults,' for want of which it had actually happened that a sailor, who cut the throat of his captain with 'a razor' from ear to ear, could receive no punishment whatever, because the captain had recovered." That the omission in the indictment was fatal, 2 Hale, P. C. 170, 184, and Starkie, Cr. Pl. c. 4, pp. 80, 242, were cited.

After advisement, the court, by THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, decided, that the phraseology of the twenty-second section was not free from obscurity; but the court were of opinion that the act contemplated a misdemeanor, and not a felony, in providing for an assault with a dangerous weapon. That the indictment, therefore, was well enough. The prisoner was, accordingly, sentenced.

NOTE. In North Carolina, the court may inflict a fine only upon one convicted of an assault and battery, with intent to kill; they are not bound to imprison. State v. Roberts, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 176. If one man deliberately kills another, to prevent a mere trespass on his property, whether that trespass could or could not be otherwise prevented, it is murder; and consequently an assault with intent to kill, cannot be justified, on the ground that it was necessary to prevent trespass on property. State v. Morgan, 3 Ired. 186. A man shall not even in defence of his person or property, except in extreme cases, endanger human life, or great bodily harm. Id. In criminal, as in civil cases, if there be an assault, it cannot be justified, other than by showing specially, all the circumstances which render the act rightful; and the sufficiency of the alleged justification is a matter of law. Id.

In Pennsylvania, an assault and battery with intent to commit a capital offence, as rape or murder, or an attempt to commit the crime against nature, offences in their nature infamous, would fall within the class of offences described in the fourth section of the act of April 5, 1790, as offences not capital, for which by the laws in force before the act to amend the penal laws of this state, burning in the hand, cutting off the ears, placing in the pillory, whipping or imprisonment for life, was or might be inflicted. Offences of this description might be punished by imprisonment at hard labor for any term not exceeding two years, at the discretion of the court, in pursuance of the fourth section of the act of April 5, 1790; and by the act of 4th April, 1807, the time is extended to a period not exceeding seven years. The court, in giving the opinion in Scott v. Com., 6 Serg. & R. 227, did not decide upon the proper punishment for an assault and battery with intent to kill, but simply determined that this offence did not subject the party to the punishment pronounced in that case. It was not usual in Pennsylvania, (nor ever, it is believed, exercised before the act for reforming the penal laws,) to inflict whipping, the pillory, or imprisonment for life, or other ignominious corporal punishments, for any assault, whatever the intention might be, unless committed with very atrocious designs on the person, as with intention to murder, ravish, or commit the unnatural crime; and, therefore, the fourth section of the act of April 5, 1790, and the act of 4th April, 1807, do not authorize imprisonment at hard labor to be inflicted for an assault with intent to steal from the pocket of another. Rogers v. Com., 5 Serg. & R. 463.

In Alabama, an indictment under the second section, fifteenth chapter of the Penal Code, for an assault with intent to kill, must, within the terms of the act, allege that the individual assaulted was a white person; and an indictment which does not contain that allegation, cannot be aided by a verdict finding the fact affirmatively. Nelson v. State, 6 Ala. 394. When a slave is indicted for an assault on a white person with intent to kill and murder, and the verdict is "guilty of an assault with intent to kill" only, it is considered a finding of guilty only so far as it is expressed, and not guilty of an assault with intent to murder. But it is a capital offence for a slave to assault a white person with intent to kill, although if the intention had been consummated, the killing would have been manslaughter only. Nancy v. State, 6 Ala. 483. In the case of a white person such a verdict only amounts to a conviction of assault and battery, and a sentence to the penitentiary is erroneous. An indictment which charges both cruel and unusual punishment of a slave is not bad for duplicity, although the statute declares that "no cruel or unusual punishment shall be inflicted on a slave," but it is not enough that the indictment should pursue the words of the statute; it must state what punishment was inflicted. 8 Ala. 313; 6 Ala. 664.

In Georgia, the black act of 9 Geo. I. is not in force, and an indictment for an assault with intent to murder, is the proper mode of prosecuting offences which, in England, came under that act. State v. Campbell, T. U. P. Charlt. 166.

In Tennessee, the statute of 1820, c. 9, does not limit prosecutions for assaults with intent to murder to twelve months from the commission of the offence. The superior court has jurisdiction of the latter offence; the statute of 1797, which gives exclusive jurisdiction to the county courts of all indictments for assaults and batteries, being held not to apply to such cases. State v. Sharp, 5 Yerg. 245; State v. Anderson, 2 Overt. 6. A conviction upon an indictment for an assault with intent to murder, cannot be pleaded in bar to an indictment for murder, for the offences are distinct in their legal character, and in no case, said the court, could a party on trial for one be convicted of another. The true test, said Chief Justice Shaw, to determine whether a conviction or acquittal upon one indictment is a good bar to another, is well expressed in East's Crown Law, as drawn from the case of Rex v. Vandercomb, 2 Leach, 708. "These cases establish the principle, that unless the first indictment were such as the prisoner might have been convicted upon by proof of the facts contained in the second indictment, an acquittal on the first can be no bar to the second." 12 Pick. 496; 19 Pick. 479. An assault with intent to commit murder, being made a felony by the Penal Code of Alabama, is an offence to which there may be accessories. Hughes v. State, 12 Ala. 458.

In Virginia, on an indictment for unlawful stabbing with intent to maim, disfigure, disable and kill, a verdict that the prisoner is "guilty of unlawful stabbing," will not authorize a judgment; but the court should direct a new trial. Marshall v. Com., 5 Grat. 663.

In an indictment under the statute in Mississippi, for an assault with intent to kill, the accused must be charged with having made an assault on a certain person, with intent to kill that person; and where the indictment alleges an intent merely to kill generally, judgment upon a verdict of guilty will be arrested. Jones v. State, 11 Smedes & M. 315.

In Pennsylvania, where the indictment for assault and battery alleged that the defendant maliciously, &c., did bite or cut off the ear of W. C., and with a certain knife the said W. did stab, &c., with intent him, the said W., wickedly, maliciously, and inhumanely to kill and destroy, it was objected that the charge was stated disjunctively—that he did bite or cut off the ear. But the court stated, that although this would be an objection not to be got over were this the charge alone, it is not material in this case, because the assault and battery is the offence, and the mode, the extent of the injury, and the intention with which it was inflicted, are merely circumstances of aggravation. The offence is the assault and battery with intent to kill, which is sufficiently described, and is punishable by law. Scott v. Com., 6 Serg. & R. 225.

In Missouri, on an indictment for a felonious assault and battery under the thirty-eighth section, second article, of the act concerning crimes and punishments, if the wound inflicted be a dangerous wound likely to produce death, it is sufficient, although the weapon be not a deadly weapon; and if the weapon be a deadly weapon, or likely to produce great bodily harm, it is not necessary that the wound should be a dangerous wound. Carrico v. State, 11 Mo. 579.

In an indictment for an assault with an axe, it will be inferred that it was a deadly weapon without such allegation. Dollarhide v. U. S., 1 Morris (Iowa) 233.

UNITED STATES v. GARCIA et al.

[1 Sawy. 383.] [1]

District Court, D. California. Nov. 3, 1870.

PRACTICE—FINAL DECREE—REEXAMINATION.

1. When the minutes of the former United States district court for the Southern district of California, showed that the judge delivered an opinion overruling exceptions and confirming a survey of a Mexican grant, but no decree appeared to have been made or written opinion filed, Held, that no final decree had been made and that the cause was still pending.

2. Held, further, that it was the duty of this court, which had succeeded to the jurisdiction of the late Southern district court, to enter a decree in the cause; but that on a showing, such as would justify an order for a new trial, or rehearing, or leave to file a bill of review, the cause might be re-examined.

[This was a claim by Maria de Jesus Garcia and others for Los Nogales, one square league in San Bernadino county, granted March 13, 1840, by Juan B. Alvarado to José de la Cruz Linares. Claim filed October 9, 1852; confirmed by the commission January 17, 1854, and by the district court January 16, 1857. Case unreported. It is Williams & Thornton and Geo. H. Smith, for claimants.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the records of the late United States district court, for the Southern district of California, that on the fifteenth November, 1859, the survey of the lands confirmed to the above claimant, was ordered into court for review. Exceptions to the survey were duly filed, and on the twenty-fifth May, 1860, an order was entered, by which the exceptions were in part allowed, the survey set aside, and a new survey ordered in conformity to minute and detailed directions embodied in the order. On the first of June, 1860, this order was opened up on motion of the attorneys for the claimant, and the cause was continued for a further hearing, until the succeeding term. On the nineteenth March, 1861, the cause was again argued and submitted, and on the twentieth March of the same year, an opinion was delivered by the court "overruling the exceptions to the survey, and confirming the said survey of the surveyor-general of the United States, for the state of California, now on file in this court." No formal order or decree in conformity with this opinion seems to have been entered. But on the fifteenth April following, an appeal was granted on motion of the attorney for the claimants "from the decision and decree of the court, confirming the survey of the surveyor-general of the United States and overruling the exceptions to the same." The district court for the Southern district of California having been abolished, and its records and pending suits transferred to this court, a motion is now made to set aside the order last referred to, and to open the case for further proofs, with a view to a rehearing on the merits.

This motion is founded on the record and proofs on file, and on affidavits setting forth facts tending to show the official survey to be grossly erroneous and unjust.

Two questions are thus presented for consideration: (1) Is the decision heretofore rendered, a final judgment or decree, which cannot now, after the lapse of nine years, be considered or disturbed? (2) If not a final decree in form, did the rendering of the decision in open court and its announcement to the parties constitute such a final adjudication of the cause, as to restrict the authority of the court at this time to the performance of the merely ministerial act of making and entering a formal decree in conformity with the decision already rendered? Or is the court at liberty on a showing such as would be regarded as sufficient on a motion for a rehearing, or to sustain a bill of review, to look into the merits, and make such final decree as may be just?

1. The only record of the supposed final judgment of the court is an entry in the minutes, to the effect that the judge delivered an opinion overruling the exceptions to the survey, and confirming the survey of the U. S. surveyor-general, "now on file in this court." No written opinion is found on file, nor any order or decree embodying this decision of the court. The minutes are not signed by the judge. The terms of the entry are not that a judgment was rendered, but only that "an opinion" was delivered to the effect stated. There can be no doubt, however, that the court intended to pronounce its judgment, and virtually to decide the case. The taking of an appeal at a subsequent day, and before any final decree was signed or entered, is explained by the fact that the idea generally prevailed among the gentlemen of the bar, that all appeals should be taken during the term at which the decision appealed from was rendered, and the appeal in this case was taken out of abundant caution, and to save the rights of the claimants. The act of 1860 [12 Stat. 34], under which these proceedings took place, evidently contemplates that the determination of a plat and survey the court, shall be by its "decree" (when the district court shall by its decree have finally approved said survey and location," etc., section 5), and it provides that the said plat and survey so finally determined by publication or decree shall have the effect and validity of a patent. The act of July 1, 1864 [13 Stat. 332], which in effect repealed the act of 1860, reserves from its operation, cases then pending, and provides, that "the court may in those cases proceed and complete its examination and determination, and its decree thereon shall be subject to appeal to the circuit court," etc. These provisions clearly contemplate something more than the oral announcement in court, by the judge, of his opinion or even decision in the case, of which a note or minute is taken by the clerk. The plat and surveys approved by the decree have the effect of a patent. The decree, with the plat annexed, operates, therefore, to convey the title of the United States to the land to the confirmee. But to effect this, it would seem indispensable, not only that a formal decree should be made and entered, but that the plat and survey approved should be attached to and made part of it, so that no doubt can remain as to what plat and survey were approved by the court.

In the former Northern district of this state, it was the invariable practice, after the court had rendered its opinion approving a survey, to make and sign a formal decree, to which the plat was annexed and of which it was made a part, and which was identified and authenticated by the written approval of the judge, signed by himself, and inscribed in the margin. It was never supposed that, until this was done, a final decree had been made in the cause. Substantially, the same practice is understood to have prevailed in the late court for the Southern district. Independently, therefore, of the general rules of equity practice in analogous cases, there are special reasons in this class of cases for holding the cause not to be finally adjudicated until a decree with the approved plat and survey attached has been signed and entered.

A question somewhat similar was presented to the supreme court in Silsby v. Foote, 20 How. [61 U. S.] 290. In that case, a final decision had been made by the court on the twenty-eighth of August, 1854, and an appeal duly taken on the fourth of September. The decree was special in its terms, and was not settled or signed by the judge until the eleventh of December, 1856, on which day a second appeal was taken. The question before the court was, which appeal was regular? It does not appear from the report in what form the first "final decision" was made—whether by announcement orally by the judge from the bench and noted in the minutes, or by the filing of a written opinion. The court held that an appeal might be taken in open court, during the term and within ten days after the decision is pronounced and entered on the minutes by the clerk, but that an appeal taken within ten days after the decree is settled and signed by the judge and filed by the clerk, would also be in time to stay the proceedings—that when the decree is special there is a propriety in waiting for the settlement before taking the appeal, and that "the time when the judgment or decree may be said to be 'rendered' or 'passed,' admits of some latitude, and may depend somewhat upon the usage and practice of the particular court." The court retained the first appeal and dismissed the second.

In the case of U. S. v. Gomez, 1 Wall. [68 U. S.] 691, it was contended that the appeal had not been taken within the five years allowed by law. An opinion confirming the claim of Gomez had been delivered on the fifth of June, 1857, and entry thereof duly made on the minutes with an order that a decree be entered up in conformity to the opinion. On the seventh of January, 1858, a decree was filed, which recited the previous proceedings and was directed to be entered as of the fifth of June, nunc pro tunc. On the fourth of February, 1858, the claimant obtained leave to amend this decree by substituting another, for a larger tract of land, in its stead. A decree in pursuance of this leave was entered on succeeding day. The appeal was taken on the twenty-fifth day of August, 1862. On this state of facts, the court says: "Argument can add nothing to the force of this statement as drawn from the record. Plainly there was no decree of any kind in the case until the seventh of January, 1858, and as that decree was ordered to be amended by substituting another in its stead, the final decree in the case was that of the fifth of February following. Five years therefore had not elapsed before the appeal was taken." It will be noted that in this case it appeared by the minutes that a decree was ordered to be entered in conformity with the opinion at the time when the latter was announced. In the case at bar, the minutes show that an opinion confirming the survey was delivered, but no order for the entry of a decree in conformity to it, appears to have been made. This decision of the supreme court is therefore conclusive as to the question under consideration. No final decree has ever been entered in the case. It is therefore a pending case within the saving clause of the act of 1854, and must be completed and determined by the entry of a final decree.

2. Is this court, which is now called upon to enter a final decree, bound by the opinion already delivered, or is it at liberty to examine into the merits, and enter such final decree as may be just? In the case of Dogget v. Emerson [Case No. 3,961] a cause had by consent been heard in chambers by the circuit judge, a written opinion delivered, and a decree drawn up and given to the reporter, to be filed in the clerk's office; but it did not reach that office until three days after the term had closed. In the meantime, the circuit judge (Mr. J. Story) had died. At the succeeding term a motion was made to enter and carry into effect the decree. It was held that the intervening death of the judge was no ground for a rehearing if an opinion was actually delivered; but otherwise, if only prepared. But that an opinion once pronounced or a decree once made may be altered if some obvious mistake of law or of fact be shown. That "there must be something tantamount to what would justify a new trial," and the court applies to this case the principles which govern in applications for a rehearing, or for leave to file a bill of review, or a bill in the nature of a bill of review.

In Life & Fire Ins. Co. v. Wilson's Heirs, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 291, it was held by the supreme court that the signing of a "judgment rendered in the case by the judge's predecessor in office, was a ministerial and not a judicial act, and that the judge might be compelled by mandamus to do so, unless in the exercise of his discretion he grants a new trial, and that as the successor of his predecessor he can exercise the same powers, and has a right to act on every case that remains undecided on his docket, as fully as his predecessor could have done.

There being no doubt, therefore, as to the power of this court as the successor of the late district court for the Southern district of California, to act on the case as fully as that court could have done, it remains to be considered, whether the claimants have shown such a case as entitles them to a rehearing. In considering this question, I shall confine myself to the undisputed facts disclosed by the record.

The long delay on the part of the claimants to move in the matter is explained, on the ground that they are Mexicans, ignorant of our laws and language; that they have continued to live on the land undisturbed until recently, and relying on the justice of the government to protect them in their undoubted rights; that the judge who rendered the decision, died shortly afterwards, and the sessions of the court held by his successor at Los Angeles, were rare and irregular. It does not appear that any rights of third persons have intervened. Nor is it easy to see how, in any view, such persons would be entitled to protection on the ground of any reliance placed by them on the finality of the supposed decision of the court. If that decision and the entry on the minutes amounted to a final decree, then the appeal taken from it was regular and the cause remained pending and undetermined until the appeal should be dismissed—which has not been done. If, on the other hand, the cause is to be deemed not finally decided until a decree has been signed and entered, then the record disclosed that no such decree had ever been made, and that the case was still pending and undecided. In neither view had third persons the right to treat the supposed decision as final and conclusive.

My opinion is, that it is the duty of the judge of this court to make such a decree as on full examination of the case shall appear just. The motion for a re-hearing is therefore granted, and the cause will be opened for further proofs.

Case No. 15,186a.

UNITED STATES v. GARDINER.

[2 Hayw. & H. 89.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 18, 1853.

FALSE SWEARING—FRAUDULENT CLAIM—EVIDENCE—FOREIGN LAWS—TRIAL.

1. It is not necessary in a case of perjury or false swearing that there should be positive evidence that the paper was sworn to by the prisoner; it may be proved by circumstantial evidence.

2. Papers filed by the prisoner to sustain the allegations contained in the original paper, if they tend to establish the charge made in the indictment, as to guilty knowledge, will be admitted in evidence.

3. Authenticated public documents, giving account of all the mines and all the abandoned mines in the state of Luis Potosi, are not evidence to prove that a certain mine did not exist.

4. A witness who was sent by the United States to Mexico for the purpose of getting a knowledge of the handwriting and seals of certain official persons, will not be permitted to testify as to his knowledge of the handwriting of the officers he saw make their signatures and the impression of the seals; the danger of concocting evidence is too great.

5. A foreign law, and the practice under the law, may be proved by one acquainted with the law and the practice under it.

6. Certain letters were submitted by the U. S. from C. Gardiner, brother of the defendant, a witness for said defendant, who neither admitted nor denied them to be his handwriting. A witness for the U. S. was called who believed they were in the handwriting of the witness for the defendant. Held, that the letters written after the crime was committed cannot be given in evidence as the act of a confederate; and that a witness cannot be called to prove handwriting to contradict another who has neither admitted nor denied that the letters were in his handwriting.

7. Acts or declarations of a witness, who was assumed to be a guilty agent, but made not in furtherance of the purposes of the crime for which the defendant stands accused, cannot affect the defendant directly.

8. Evidence in rebuttal must bear directly or indirectly upon the subject-matter of defence, and ought not to consist of new matter unconnected with the defence.

Philip R. Fendall, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Henry May, for the United States.

Joseph H. Bradley, James M. Carlisle, and B. F. Perry, for defendant.

It appears by the fourteenth and fifteenth articles of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the United States discharged Mexico from all claims of whatever amount, which citizens of the United States had against the republic of Mexico, and which arose prior to the date of the treaty; and they undertook to make satisfaction of the same, to any amount not exceeding three and one quarter millions of dollars. The act of March 3rd, 1849, was passed to carry into effect these treaty stipulations. It established a board of three commissioners, with a secretary and clerk, who were, during the two years to which the existence of the commission was limited, to receive and adjudicate upon all claims presented to them arising under the treaty. Before these commissioners in session at Washington, Dr. George A Gardiner appeared, and presented his claim by a memorial and an affidavit, accompanied by other affidavits, substantiating the statements in the memorial. The indictment sets out the memorial and affidavit, with the usual innuendoes, and then alleges. "That the said Gardiner swore falsely, maliciously, wickedly, wilfully, knowingly and corruptly before the said justice, touching the expenditure of public money, and in support of a claim against the United States; and that the said oath was material in order to enable the said Gardiner to obtain from the commissioners an award, touching the expenditure of public money, and in favor of the said claim of the said Gardiner, and from the United States a payment of the said claim." The principal allegations in the memorial were then negatived and set out to be false, and were known to be false by Gardiner at the time they were sworn to. The indictment was under the following statute: "Sec. 3. That if any person shall swear or affirm falsely, touching the expenditure of public money, or in support of any claim against the United States, he or she shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer as for willful and corrupt perjury." 3 Stat. 771 (March 1st, 1823).

March 14, 1853.

During the trial Mr. May, on the part of the United States, offered to read the memorial to the jury. Mr. Carlisle objected; citing Brady's Case, 1 Leach, 327, 330. Mr. Fendall cited the Case of Beute [Case No. 1,468a], convicted in this court of false swearing.

THE COURT said he would read the decision of the court in the Case of Beute. It was tried in the June term of the court, 1851. The decision of the court was read. No question was raised as to the admissibility of the affidavit, but one was raised as to the guilty knowledge of the accused of the falsity of the statements in the oath.

Mr. Fendall cited 3 Starkie, Ev. 1139; Rex v. Morris, 2 Burrows, 1189; Warden's Case, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 406; Silver v. State, 17 Ohio, 365; Price's Case, 6 East, 323.

Mr. May says no proposition could be more clear that that paper was admissible, citing Cole v. Hebb, 7 Gill & J. 20; 1 Show. 327; Rex v. Spencer Ryan & M. 97; Rex v. Benson, 2 Camp. 508; Bull. N. P. 239; Phil. Ev. 291, 454. Rose. Cr. Ev. 89, 190; Starkie, Ev. 836; Wheeler. Am. Com. Law, 483; Greenl. Ev. 520.

Mr. Bradley replied for the defence, and in support of the objection citing 3 Starkie, Ev. 1130; and Chouteau v. Eckhart, 2 How. [43 U. S.] 373.

THE COURT referred to the testimony of Justice Myer, and to the fact that the paper could not have been withdrawn; and upon the evidence said: I thought it my duty to overrule the evidence (memorial) at that time, because it was a non sequitur, and I said then that some recognition by defendant of the paper was necessary. Afterwards it was testified by Johnston, who was secretary to the board (of commissioners,) that this paper was one of those in relation to the claim of Dr. Gardiner; that it was filed in his office by W. Thompson, who, he said, was one of the defendant's counsel on the 29th of Nov.; that the defendant had a claim before the board, and that it could not have been withdrawn without the authority of the board, and that this paper was unquestionably before the board. Then he testified that the rules shown him were those of the board. Dr. Davis was called, said he had seen the paper before—probably a few days before the final award was made—as to the sum, because he was not appointed secretary until the 1st of April, and the awards were made on the night of the 15th of April. To-day Mr. Evans has been called, and states that he was one of the commissioners, and has no doubt at all that the paper was before the board. There is no mark of his upon it, yet he is perfectly familiar with its appearance. He said further that there was no other claim of Dr. Gardiner before the court, and no separate memorial but that one. He said further that Dr. Gardiner, either at the suggestion of the commissioners, or the counsel of Dr. Gardiner—he did not recollect which—was called before the board, in company with Gen. Waddy Thompson, Edward Curtis, Thomas Corwin and Robert Corwin, and perhaps Col. Allen, though he was not confident about his being present; was examined there at least one hour about his claim; was examined closely by himself and other commissioners, and was particularly questioned about his investments, &c., to which he gave certain answers. He says furthermore that these memorials are presented sometimes without being sworn to, either from negligence or otherwise, and in such cases are returned to the parties to be corrected. It appears furthermore that this memorial was sworn to on the 20th day of Nov., and was filed on the 29th according to the endorsement, but was received also on the 30th, a distinction which is a little awkward to me. Nevertheless he did recognize it, and a witness from the treasury department was about to prove what was admitted afterwards, namely, the receipt of this money by Dr. Gardiner or his attorney. On this point it was said the board did not require a signature, which I think they did, or something equivalent, that is, there must be proof or a signature, or it must be signed, one or the other. There is no other mode of procedure. This has been treated throughout as if it were a case of perjury. It is not a case of perjury. The act of congress creates an entirely distinct offence. It is to be punished as perjury, but the supreme court says distinctly, it is not perjury. The words of the law are: "If any person shall swear falsely, &c., (for the purpose of obtaining money from the United States) he shall suffer as for perjury." The cases cited on both sides appear to have related more to the sufficiency of the evidence than to its competency. The law is not here as it is in England, where the judge states the evidence on each side, and in terms almost directs the verdict or takes the case from the jury. Here it would be denied, and I should hold myself bound, but think myself restricted to answer on certain points of law, founded on facts, which the jury are to believe the law applies. Such was the law in this District and in Maryland, or at least used to be—I don't know how it is now.

In this case the filing of the affidavit in this suit and the date of the oath differ, but it does not strike me that, even unexplained, that would be very material. But it is not necessary that it oe put upon that footing. The jury may infer upon any facts whatever they think proper. They may infer it was a mistake, or that after the paper was filed this defect was discovered, and it was given back and corrected. That the oath was sworn to before it was "received," I suppose can hardly be doubted, for the rules say that no paper will be received unless sworn to. And the first thing the commissioners had to look to was to see that it was sworn to. It is further in evidence in this case that this paper was the foundation of the only claim which Dr. Gardiner had before the board. Before that could be considered at all it was necessary that the memorial should be "received," as they call it, and not only that, it must be sworn to, otherwise it could not be received. That reduces it to a certainty, whether there was any doubt about it before or not. It is not necessary, even if this was a case of perjury, that there should be precise, positive evidence that this was sworn to by Dr. Gardiner. It may be, however, by circumstantial evidence. If circumstantial evidence is not to be received in cases of this kind it would be a great obstruction thrown in the way of the punishment of crime. This paper I am bound to believe, therefore, was recognized as Dr. Gardiner's up to the very time the claim was allowed, and under all these circumstances I am of opinion that it must go to the jury.

March 29, 1853.

Question was as to the signatures of the governor on papers showing the mining title.

Mr. May called a witness who could not speak English, and did not know what would be done for an interpreter. There were one or two present who were competent, but they were witnesses.

THE JUDGE said an interpreter would undoubtedly be required, and it made no difference whether he was a witness or not.

The interpreter was requested to ask the witness to look at the paper, and examine the signatures of the governor.

Mr Bradley, to the interpreter: Don't repeat his answer yet, we object to the evidence.

Mr. Perry said he understood the object of this testimony was to show these papers to be forged.

Mr. May: That is the object.

Mr. Perry said he regarded this question as to the admissibility of this collateral evidence as one resting altogether within the jurisdiction of the court and cited 2 Russ. Crimes, 772. That no evidence can be admitted which does not tend to prove or disprove the issue joined. In criminal cases this rule is more strict, that the evidence must be confined to the point in issue.

Mr. May, in support of the admissibility of this evidence cited 1 Greenl. Ev. § 52; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 83, 87; and cases therein cited; Wheeler, Am. Com. Law, 138; State v. Houston, 1 Bailey, 300; Martin v. Com., 2 Leigh, 749; Hendrick v. Com., 5 Leigh, 708; 1 Camp. 48, and notes; U. S. v. Doebler [Case No. 14,977]; U. S. v. Wood, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 430.

THE COURT: It is proposed to prove that the papers, the mining title, and accompanying depositions are forged. The defendant's counsel objects to this course on various grounds: 1st. The indictment is pending and untried for the forgery of these papers. 2nd. That the alleged forgeries, if committed, were made eight months after the oath charged to be false was taken. 3rd. It was within the discretion of the court, which should be exercised to exclude the proof offered. I do not think the pendency of an indictment, charging the defendant with forging the papers, which it is now proposed to show are false, affects the question. Doubts existed formerly on this subject, but they have been removed, and never had any good foundation. It is said to be within the discretion of the court to admit or reject this evidence. True, but I prefer to be regulated by established rules and principles. The fabrication of the papers, if they have been fabricated, was, as it is said, subsequent to the swearing. The argument of the United States considers it to be immaterial whether the matter offered in evidence or fact proposed to be proved to show guilty knowledge, occurred prior or subsequent to the principal fact charged. This proposition, as asserted, is too general. I have had frequent occasion to consider this question, and have a record of an opinion delivered by me at the June term, 1847, in the case of U. S. v. Lee [Case No. 15,587]. This opinion contains the law of the question before the court. The possession of a counterfeit bank note or notes, at the time of the passing charged, or shortly before the passing for which he is indicted, has always been received. If subsequent counterfeit paper is found on the defendant's person, it must be in some way connected with the principal charge, or be of the same manufacture. This is the rule. Here the memorial, in the making of which the false swearing is charged to have occurred, states that the accused had a mine in the state of San Luis Potosi; that was the foundation of a claim, and filed as such, subsequently the papers which the United States say are false, and offer to prove to be so, were procured to sustain the allegation in the memorial that he had such a mine, and were the means of inducing the commissioners to augment the amount of the award, after the commissioners had decided that the claim was valid. Is it not then connected with the memorial, and the verification of it required by the commission, without which the claim could not even be considered? The memorial and proofs submitted with it were the grounds of the decree that the claim was valid for something; the mining title and accompanying depositions afterwards filed were, with other proofs, the foundation of the decree, fixing the amount due on the claim, and they were especially the means of increasing the amount previously thought of by the commissioners. The testimony offered, if made out to the satisfaction of the jury, would tend to establish the charge made, of which one of the principal features is guilty knowledge. It is a relation to the issue. The case of U. S. v. Wood, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 430, is a cogent authority on this question. The objection is therefore overruled.

March 31, 1853.

Mr. May offered in evidence to the jury an official, authenticated public document (one identified by the witness), dated Jan. 3, 1849, giving an account of all the mines and all the abandoned ones in the state of San Luis Potosi. Mr. Bradley objected to the admissibility of the paper.

After arguments by the counsels, THE COURT delivered the following decision:

Two papers are submitted by the United States as proper to go to the jury. They are offered as printed copies of a report, in relation to mines, in the state of San Luis Potosi, made by the governor of the state, and appended to a message of the governor to the legislature, and was handed in 1852, at the Government Hall, to Mr. Partridge, by the secretary of state. One of them has this certificate:

"I, the citizen Luis Guzman, secretary of the department of government of the state of San Luis Potosi, certify that in this present table are named all mines existing in this state, and that neither before the formation of these statistics, nor since then to the present time has any knowledge been had of any other. Luis Guzman, Secretary. San Luis Potosi, Nov. 20, 1852. [Seal.]"

The other of these certificates is:

"This report is really the one which was published during my administration, and I authenticate it with my original signature in order that it may have due effect, accordingly to the request of Mr. George W. Slocum. Julian de los Reyes. Mexico, March 5, 1852."

"The undersigned minister of foreign affairs, certifies that the foregoing signature of his excellency Don Julian de los Reyes, who was governor of the state of San Luis Potosi, is genuine. Jose F. Ramirez. Mexico, March 6, 1852. [Seal.]"

The certificate of our late minister to Mexico, that the signatures of Governor Reyes and Minister Ramirez are genuine, and were made in his presence March 6, 1852.

The certificate of Luis Guzman is not an authentication of the paper offered as an exemplification of the records in the office of state, but a certificate that in this present table are named all the mines existing in that state, and that neither before the formation of these statistics, nor since then to the present time has any knowledge been had of any others. The certificate is no better than that of any other man, in or out of office, of the facts it sets forth. It is no authentication of the paper, which if it were a report to a department of our own government, could not be received in evidence in the shape in which this paper comes. According to what is said by the supreme court, in Watkins v. Holman, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 56. The other paper is certified by Julian de los Reyes after he ceased to be governor of San Luis Potosi. He was then a private gentleman, without the power to certify to the verity or official character of any paper that might remain in the public offices of which he once had control. Is it aided by the certificate of Don Jose F. Ramirez, the minister of relations in the republic of Mexico? I think not. He certifies that the signature of Julian de los Reyes, who was governor of the state of San Luis Potosi is genuine. And our late minister to Mexico does not make the certificate any stronger. He states only that the signatures are of the proper handwriting of Governor Reyes and Minister Ramirez. Both of these papers are, in my judgment, altogether informal. But if they were regular and properly authenticated, I do not think they would be evidence. The mere fact of a paper being a public document does not make it evidence, if intrinsically it is not so. The journals of the two houses of congress, and all matters of state, here and in England, are evidence, and may be so even in criminal cases in the United States, in very few and peculiarly circumstanced cases, chiefly, if not exclusively, where the parties against whom they are sought to be used, or the act charged upon him is in some way connected with the document and not always then; in England, where men are indicted for seditious meetings and seditious libels, there has arisen frequent legal occasion for the admission of such evidence. The journals are evidence of what each house of congress does; that such a petition was withdrawn or presented, such a bill considered and passed or rejected. If a question whether a certain officer of either house was elected, and when, undoubtedly the journal would prove it, if properly authenticated. So, if the inquiry is, whether the president transmitted a message to congress, and in it treated of certain subjects, the record would be evidence; but suppose a man should be charged with a crime in any department of the government, will it be urged that the statement of it in a document would be evidence to go to a jury? Take the ten members of the British parliament who have been lately unseated for bribery; suppose they should be, as they ought to be, indicted for the bribery, it would scarcely, I imagine, be deemed proper in that country to adduce the reports of the committee of the house of commons, on which they were deprived of their seats, as evidence of their guilt. I can see no difference in the principle between that case and this, except that this is the weaker of the two, for the members, it may be presumed, appeared before the committee. An agent of the government in San Luis Potosi made a report in 1849 to his government, which is offered in evidence to show that the accused swore falsely, not because it states a certain fact, but because it does not contain one that is alleged by the defendant to exist. This report is not unlike the geological reports that are made to most of our state governments, and transmitted with the message of the governor to the legislature. If a man were indicted for obtaining money under false pretenses in saying he had a coal mine in a certain district, or if in the gold bearing states a gold mine, it would scarcely be allowed the prosecution to adduce one of these geological reports to show he had no such mine. They are, no doubt, very convenient to the government; it may be in reference to taxation, certainly as showing the real quality and wealth of the country. They extend knowledge and advance science, but I think those are their proper uses. The evidence is rejected.

April 1, 1853.

The United States offered to prove by Mr. Partridge that the signatures of Governor Reyes, Secretary Guzman and Francisco Fernandez, prefect of Rio Verde, to the mining title, &c., were forgeries on the following grounds, and in the following terms. We now offer the evidence of the witness (Mr. Partridge), as founded. 1st. On his testimony of having seen them several times sign official orders and papers in the usual course of their official duties, and which were not in any way connected with the commission. 2nd. On his knowledge derived from a correspondence between these persons and the commissioners of whom he (the witness) was one, which took place during their visit and during its period of ten days at San Luis, in December, 1852.

After argument by the counsel as to the admissibility or inadmissibility of said evidence, THE COURT says:

The modes of acquiring knowledge of handwritings are these: 1. By seeing a man write. 2. By correspondence with him, or by seeing papers frequently which the party has signed. This general statement embraces substantially the legitimate modes of acquiring knowledge of handwriting. The true manner of gaining this knowledge is in the ordinary course of business, or in the correspondence which passed between them regarding business, or in the indulgence of friendship, or in the use of papers, bank notes for instance, which the pay officer of a bank handles every day. The fact of the knowledge of the witness being obtained lately is not regarded as entitled to influence in this case, as to which decision Johnson v. Daverne, 19 Johns. 134, is very much in point. The person whose handwriting the offer respects are Mexican officers of high rank, whose handwriting must be extensively known. Witnesses certainly could be easily obtained who are and have been long acquainted with them, and in fact one such witness has testified. The question is, whether the United States can send a witness to Mexico, for the purpose of getting a knowledge of the handwriting of certain official persons? Mr. Partridge did go there, and those persons wrote their names more or less frequently to acquaint him with their handwriting, besides which he says he saw them write frequently in the discharge of their official duties, and saw letters or communications sent by them to the commissioners. The knowledge to make the evidence offered admissible must have been acquired, as Lord Brougham said, spontaneously, that is in the course of business or correspondence; and this requisite, it is argued, is to be found in this offer, because the witness saw communications from the officers, and saw them write in the ordinary discharge of business, as well as to sign their names to familiarize him with their signatures. The reason which prevailed with the court, in excluding testimony, founded on knowledge of defendant's handwriting, acquired shortly before the trial, in Stranger v. Searle [1 Esp. 14], was that the signatures might have varied from his general mode of signing, and that decision has been authoritative from that day to this. But it is contended that the exclusion of this testimony has taken place only when the defendant, a party has written to qualify the witness to testify. That would obviously, no doubt, impress the mind more strongly—would most frequently occur—but I do not see that such a distinction is taken. The court is again asked if the party writing or testifying can have any possible interest in the indictment or its result? I can see none; but this is not involved. The inquiry is, whether established principles and the danger of manufacturing testimony and making an opinion for the particular case do not exclude the evidence offered. The rule, whichever way it shall be settled, will govern not this case only, but all cases. The witness went to the official, who was told by him or some other gentleman with him, that he desired to see his signature—that was his errand; and although he saw several communications from the official, addressed to the commission, and saw him write at his desk in a public office at other times during a few days' visit in the city where the officer resided, he must always have seen him do so with the impression made by the signatures, if they preceded his other observations and the receipt of the several communications; or if they followed, would more or less efface that observation, and the effect of the letters in either case would be mixed up with them. If the witness had never seen the communications referred to, or the officer write, except when he desired him to do so, that he might be qualified to speak of it on this trial, there could be no question about it; it would be exactly like Stranger v. Searle, except that the handwriting there was that of the defendant. Can it make any difference that he saw about the same time an officer write at his official desk in the ordinary discharge of business, and saw communications signed by him? I think not; for his mind would still have the image of the signatures made on request before it. The great danger attending the admission of such evidence, the facility of concocting evidence which it would furnish, the danger of corrupt action to which it would open the door in any case in which it would become necessary to establish or to discredit handwriting, obliges me to overrule the offer.

April 2, 1853.

The United States offered to prove by Mr. Partridge, who had seen the original seal in the state department in San Luis Potosi, and impressions made there of it, and impressions of it on papers filed in that office, and dated in 1850, that the seals on the mining titles, &c., were forgeries. The defence objected, after argument by the counsel for the United States and the defendant.

THE COURT: The question is whether or not, by looking at the mining title, and from his (the witness') knowledge of these seals, he can say that the seal on the mining title is a forgery.

Mr. May: Here is the point; a seal cannot be removed, we cannot produce it, and the next best evidence of what it is is the evidence of the man who has seen it.

THE COURT: There is no doubt about all this, but it requires that the papers to which the seal is affixed should per se be in evidence. These documents are not in evidence. They cannot be received except for some legal purpose. The question is whether the document to which the seal is attached is in evidence. They are admitted not to be offered as such in regard to their contents, and are only asked to be admitted with a view of instituting a comparison between the seals. The objections taken by the defence are twofold: First, it is objected that these papers were obtained post litem motam; and secondly, that they are offered for the purpose of comparison. I do not think any further discussion on these objections is necessary. The court decided the other day that such papers could not be admitted as evidence, because of themselves they prove nothing at all, and if admitted could only be used for the purpose of comparison, in the same way as proving handwriting by comparison. I do not think the fact of the genuineness of these papers being proven makes any difference at all. The fact that Mr. Partridge saw them taken out of the office of the secretary of state cannot make a particle of difference. For these reasons the court must reject the papers. The effort of the counsel, if successful in this manner, getting in evidence as to the seal, would be but an entering wedge to admit similar testimony in regard to handwriting, and being secondary evidence, and mere hearsay, he objected to it as incompetent.

The counsel for the prosecution base their argument that there is a difference between the handwriting and the seal. In deciding this question the court must look to general principles and rules It would ill become the court to impute corrupt motives to any man connected in any way with the evidence offered. I have no right to think that any such motives exist The principle on which the decision of yesterday was made embraces this question. There is undoubtedly a difference between the uniformity of signatures, and that of seals, but the danger of concocting evidence, when the witness does so to qualify himself to testify is as great in the one case as in the other. The knowledge is not derived from ordinary business transactions. Many persons must be able to testify to this seal who were on the stand a few days ago, and they are best qualified, if others are at all qualified, to speak of the seal. The offer is overruled.

April 4, 1853.

The witness, through the interpreter, was asked by THE COURT if he was acquainted with the practice in the prefect's office. Does it rest upon any general law or not? If it be regulated by public laws, and they can be got, they are the best evidence. If they cannot be got, we must take the next best evidence, that is the evidence of those who understand them.

Mr. Carlisle: If the law had been there it certainly could have been got.

Mr. Fendall contrasted the rules formerly prevailing with those now existing. He referred to the case of Baron de Bode v. Reg. [8 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 208], in a note to section 487. 1 Greenl. Ev. In that note this case was cited for 10 Jur. 217, to the effect that it is now settled in England, upon great consideration, that a foreign written law may be proved by parol evidence of a witness learned in the law of that country, without first attempting to obtain a copy of the law itself. He cited also the Sussex Peerage Case, 11 Clark & F. 116; U. S. v. Certain Casks of Glassware [Case No. 14,764]; Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Ward, 4 Law Rep. 37; Herbert v. Herbert, 2 Hagg. Consist. 272; Middleton v. Janverin, Id. 441.

Mr. Bradley cited Cowen & Hill's notes to 2 Phil. Ev. 326, and the cases there collected.

Mr. Fendall read from Baron de Bode's Case, 8 Adol & E. (N. S.) 208, 286; after which he stated that the United States proposed to show by a practicing lawyer in Mexico what the practice in regard to mines was in San Luis Potosi, and what the duties of prefects were, which knowledge he had acquired not only from the study of the law, but also his practice as a prefect.

Mr. Redin, one of the counsel in the Kosciusko Case (Ennis v. Smith, 14 How. [55 U. S.] 400), stated at the request of the judge what its decision was.

THE COURT: The law formerly was very rigid in its requirements as to proof of the laws of foreign countries. It has lately been less so. The modern decisions have admitted parol proof of such laws. The Sussex Peerage Case and the Baron de Bode's Case are authorities for its admission. In 11 Clark & F. 118, the witness, Dr. Wiseman, proved the contents of a decree of the Council of Trent, as well as its construction. De Bode's Case is stronger. Here the witness on the stand is heritus virtute officii, and professionally skilled too. In the cases referred to the evidence admitted went to the statute law and the decrees, decisions or adjudications on it; that is, the witness stated what the law altogether was in France. How could he intelligently state what decisions had been made on a particular statute, without stating with more or less precision what the statute itself contained? The impression I had when this discussion was entered upon is not changed. I am of the opinion that the evidence offered is admissible.

On the calling of a witness to identify handwriting

Mr. Chew, consular clerk of the state department, was called to identify the handwriting of a consul.

April 18, 1853.

THE COURT. Mr. Robert S. Chew, a witness called by the defendant, having proved on Saturday that letters were received at the state department from T. W. Mather, acting as vice consul at Monterey, in Mexico, in the year 1850; that these letters were acted on, and were in his charge, as chief clerk of the consular bureau, that he had no exemplar of Mr. Mather's handwriting in his mind, any impression that might have been made respecting it being wholly effaced and gone from his general recollection; and that he had on last Friday evening inspected the letters so received, which did not however revive any former impression or image of the handwriting, his present capacity to speak of it arising entirely out of such inspection; it is proposed to ask him what is his belief as to the signature of Mr. Mather to a certificate produced, being or not genuine? This question is different from that heretofore offered and overruled, in relation to the signatures of certain Mexican officials. There the witness saw the officer sign his name on his (the witness') request, to enable him to testify, having seen him also about the same time write without request at his official desk, while the witness was in his office, and all this in the fall of 1852; neither is it the same with the testimony of another clerk from the state department, respecting the handwriting of the defendant. for there he had an image in his mind that he, too, examined the letters from which the image was derived. The present question presents a case of letters received in 1850, but leaving no trace of the handwriting in them behind their receipt. Nothing can now, by reference and inspection be resuscitated. So that the evidence offered is precisely as if the witness had never seen the handwriting of Mr. Mather until last Friday night, for he can speak, he informs the court, only from what he then saw. The question is one that calls for consideration, and is by no means so plain as the counsel for the United States think it. That very learned lawyer, Roscoe, in his treatise on Criminal Evidence, says: (See Rosc. Cr. Ev. 196, 162.) I have however examined the case of Smith v. Sainsbury, 5 Car. & P. 196, 24 E. C. L. 523, and find that it does not at all bear Mr. Roscoe out in the terms in which he states his position. In the case of Mudd v. Suckermore, 5 Adol. & E. 703, 31 E. C. L. 791, cited on a question similar to this, the court of queen's bench were equally divided. Lord Denman, C. J., and Williams, J., holding the evidence admissible, and Patterson, J., and Collridge, J., that it was not; and Mr. Phillips considers this case with ability, and contends for the admissibility of the evidence. 2 Phil. Ev. 260 et seq. I think however the danger of combination and corruption certainly imputable to no person in this instance, but the hazard of it on general principles must exclude the evidence offered. Good policy, in my judgment, requires its exclusion, and I do not find myself constrained to a contrary course by any reported decision that I have met with.

May 3, 1853.

The district attorney said that the United States offered papers, letters of John C. Gardiner, on two grounds: (1) To contradict the witness, and (2) on the ground of his being an accomplice.

Mr. Carlisle said that their objection went entirely clear of the contents of the letters. In support of his argument he cited Pain v. Beeston, 1 Moody & R. 20; Rosc. Cr. Ev. 183; and Smith v. Price. 8 Watts, 447; and to the decisions of the courts of the District in the cases of Alexander, Calder, Van Ness, and Camper [unreported].

The district attorney explained the grounds of the admissibility of the papers as evidence: 1st. To contradict the witness. Citing Pain v. Beeston, 1 Moody & R. 20; Long v. Hitchcock, 9 Car. & P. 619, were in conflict with the case of Crowley v. Page, 7 Car. & P. 791; 1 Greenl. Ev. 462–464; 2 Phil. Ev. 463; as to the right of the jury in certain cases to construe writing. See 1 Greenl. Ev. 49; 1 Starkie, Ev. (3d Ed.) 25. On the 2nd ground, that the witness is an accomplice. Mr. May says that the precise question to be determined on this application was whether certain letters, proved to be in handwriting of the witness, are competent evidence for the consideration of the jury. Cited Crane v. Morris, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 598; Carver v. Jackson [4 Pet. (29 U. S.) 1]; U. S. v. Wiggins [14 Pet. (39 U. S.) 334]; Scott v. Lloyd [9 Pet. (34 U. S.) 418]; Md. Dig. 656–662; Davis v. Barney [2 Gill & J. 382]; Mitchell v. Dall [2 Har.

& G. 159]; Cole v. Hebb, 7 Gill & J. 20; Bank of New England v. United States Bank [unreported]; 2 Phil. Ev. 516, 517.

Mr. Gardiner said he relied on the cases cited by the government to show that there is a distinction between the legal sufficiency of proof and the weight of evidence, and stated the progressive order to be: 1st. The admissibility of the evidence. 2nd. Its legal sufficiency, and these were questions for the court. 3rd. Its weight or credit; and this was exclusively for the jury. He referred particularly to the case of Cole v. Hebb, cited by Mr. May, and Parks v. Ross [11 How. (52 U. S.) 362], in the supreme court.

Mr. Bradley restated his proposition: 1st. The evidence is not rebutting if the witness was a confederate or agent. 2nd. The confederacy or agency must be first proved aliunde, and the proof cannot be eked out of these letters. 3rd. They are not admissible to contradict the witness. 4th. Certain of them are purely collateral.

May 6, 1853.

THE COURT: Several letters, dated 12th December, 1844, and from 8th May, 1851, to 8th September, 1852, having been submitted to John Charles Gardiner, a witness for the defendant in this cause, by whom they purport to have been written, and he having said that he neither admitted or denied them to be his writing, with perhaps the exception of No. 6. Col. Lorenzo Thomas was called by the United States, who testified that each of the said letters and writings marked L. T., and numbered from 1 to 15 inclusive, and the one of 1844, marked A. J. H., No. 31, were, as he believed, in the handwriting of the said J. Charles Gardiner, whereupon the United States offer the said letters and writings in evidence. To this proposition the counsel of the defendant object. The objection, it is contended, is well founded: 1st. For that the evidence offered consists of the mere declarations of a stranger. 2nd. If offered to discredit the witness, that the proper foundation has not been laid by the United States; that there is no denial of any one of these papers being of the handwriting of the witness. 3rd. That if they are considered the acts of an accomplice they cannot be received, because not done in furtherance of the common object, but are all, except the letters of 1844, subsequent to its attainment. 4th. That they are collateral. 5th. That they are not rebutting evidence.

The United States insist upon the competency of the evidence offered: 1st. To contradict the witness. 2nd. As the acts of an accomplice. 3rd. As the acts of the agent of the defendant.

There is an indictment against the witness for the same offence, in relation to the same transaction pending in this court. The question presented has been very much labored, but it lies within a nutshell, and will be considered on the ground that the defendant and the witness acted together in the preparation to support the claim of the former before the commission, and in procuring its allowance. Whether the claim be just or unjust, it belongs to the jury to decide. Assuming that they did act together, how stands the law? It is admitted by the United States that a statement of an alleged partner in crime, being a narration of past transactions, cannot be received against his fellow, but only such declarations as accompany the transaction during the conspiracy; and this could not be denied, for the unbroken current of decisions leave no room for controverting this well established doctrine. But it is argued that the supposed conspiracy between the defendant and the witness had for its object the use of the money obtained for the claim, that the desire is as strong now as it was when the original plan was laid, and kept the conspiracy alive to this moment; and second, that the object of the witness is to get his brother out of the scrape. Suppose this to be so, I do not see how it can be connected with an original conspiracy. The purpose of this was answered; an award was made; the money was paid to the defendant, or to his attorney in fact; the defendant had gone to Europe; and the witness was in Mexico. I presume from the date of one of the letters offered at this stage of the business there was nothing to conspire about. If a subsequent conspiracy took place in relation to the defence of the accused, it must have been concocted in the summer or fall of 1851, for the defendant was in England when the indictment now trying was found on the 17th of July, 1851, according to the evidence heretofore adduced. The indictment is for swearing in November, 1849. It was then complete, or the crime was not committed. How the acts of an accomplice, two years after the offence is charged to have been perpetrated, and months after its success was accomplished, can be lawfully used as substantive evidence against the defendant, I cannot perceive. The same point in a case not very unlike this, including even the brotherhood, U. S. v. White [Case No. 16,675] was decided in 1836 by the circuit court of this district. The indictment was for burning the old Treasury Building. The United States offered in evidence against the defendant, Richard H. White, the admission of Henry H. White, who stands charged with the same offence in a separate indictment, evidence having been offered tending to prove that both were in the city of Washington the day preceding the burning of the Treasury Building that both went away together in the evening, and that the defendant had told Henry to say nothing of burning the Treasury. The court (Thurston contra) refused to permit the declaration of Henry H. White, made after the supposed accomplishment of the common purpose, to be given in evidence against Richard (the defendant) in this trial, they having been indicted separately, and not charged with a conspiracy. U. S. v. White [Case No. 16,679]. I am of opinion that the letters cannot be received in evidence as the acts or admission of a confederate, so as to affect the defendant directly.

This would seem to dispose of the next question mentioned by only one of the counsel for the United States, and not pressed by him strenuously, but mentioned, as he said, only in case the court should not consider the witness as an accomplice, looking to the witness as agent of the defendant. Presumptions and implications of authority as agent are in general applicable to civil cases. 2 Starkie, Ev. 34. To be a guilty agent is to be an accessory before or after the fact, or an accomplice. To be an innocent agent, is to be generally a mere conduit pipe to convey intelligence, letters, or papers, to communicate messages, without knowing what they are intended to effect. A man may make himself criminally liable by the employment of such an agency. The law goes beyond what was stated in U. S. v. Gooding [12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 460], for not only may the agent be innocent, but in some cases it is necessary he should be so, to enable you to indict his employer or principal. In those cases, if the agent have guilty knowledge, the principal is only an accessory. Here the whole argument has gone on the assumption very much urged that the witness was a guilty agent, and as such, the court has already said that his acts or declarations made, not in forbearance of the purpose for which this prosecution has grown, was allowed and paid, cannot affect the defendant directly.

3. They are offered lastly to contradict the witness. The objection to this view of the offer is that the proper ground has not been laid for contradicting the witness. Has it? The rule requires when you intend to contradict a witness by evidence that he has made, declarations or statements inconsistent with his testimony, that you must lay a foundation for it, by asking him as to the time, place, and person involved in the supposed contradiction. If he admit that he has made such statements, the enquiry, so far as the evidence is concerned, is at an end; if he deny the imputed inconsistency, then it may be shown by the party desiring to weaken his testimony. If he neither admit nor denies, or says he does not remember, you cannot contradict him, as has been decided in England and by the circuit court of this District, in the case of Culder's, Alexander's and Travers' wills, and by this court, in compliance with those decisions, but against my individual judgment in Camper's Case. To this extent the law must be regarded as settled in this District. It is contended by the United States that the rule and these decisions do not apply to a contradiction by letters or writings. Phillip, Russell and Greenleaf, in prescribing the rule confine it to verbal statements. The judges of England, on the trial of Queen Caroline before the house of lords, gave it as their opinion, not that the rule applied to letters, but they could not ask the witness if he wrote a letter with such contents, or contents to the like effect, and that the proper course was to put the letter into the hands of the witness, and ask him if he wrote the letter. If he admit it, the letter may be read at the proper time, if competent evidence. If he deny it on principle, though the judges were not asked for their opinion in this particular, the handwriting may undoubtedly be proved aliunde. If he should not admit that he did or did not write the letter, the judges said a cross-examination of the witness would not be allowed as to the contents of the letter, because the paper itself is to be produced. How can it be introduced if the indecisive answer of the witness is conclusive? It can only be made evidence by testimony, tending to prove its genuineness, not absolute or positive proof, but enough to allow it to go to the jury as far as it lawfully may. The acknowledged rule in relation to verbal statements I think an injudicious one. It does not in my judgment belong, certainly not clearly or necessarily, as in case of oral declarations to letters or papers, and the court is unwilling to extend it. I am of the opinion that the course pursued in this case was correct, and that no other preliminary inquiry than those made was necessary to let in such parts of these letters as go to contradict the witness, leaving the proof of the handwriting an open question for the jury; the court merely saying by this opinion that enough has been proved to warrant the introduction, as far as stated, of the evidence. The letter of the 12th December, 1844, is collateral, and cannot be read. All the others are dated on or after 8th of May, 1851, and included, except the date of L. F. No. 6, as evidence that the witness was at San Luis Potosi on the 9th and 10th of November, 1851. The date of L. T. No. 11, dated 12th of November, 1851, and the passage in it, "Tell me the exact position of my brother's mines;" and the passage in the letter of the 8th May, 1851, L. T. No. 4, "My brother and I have bought a claim;" the particulars of the three letters are admitted. It is unnecessary to say how far this evidence ought to be excluded as not rebutting.

May 7th, 1853.

The district attorney, handing the witness (James R. Partridge) a paper, asked him: Is that the copy of the descriptive portion of the mining in the alcade's office at Laguinillas, to which you referred on yesterday?

Yes sir.

Describe the appearance of that original paper.

Mr. Bradley: Mr. Partridge has already been examined on this subject in the enumeration in chief.

THE COURT: A witness can only be recalled for the purpose of explanation. The question now is, whether this is or is not rebutting proof. The court is of opinion that the witness, having been cross-examined only partially as to seeing the deed, its appearance, etc., he may be examined, as rebutting evidence, and to meet the testimony adduced by the defendant in reference to the mining title, provided he has anything of that description to say which he has not already sworn to; but it must be confined strictly to the matter of defence; for the rule is that the evidence in reply must bear directly or indirectly upon the subject matter of defence, and ought not to consist of new matter unconnected with the defence, and not tending to controvert or dispute it. 2 Russ. Crimes, 919, 920. But the witness can say nothing of what the alcade or officer in charge of the paper communicated to him. That is pure hearsay. What has been adduced by the United States, in chief, must not be repeated. Witnesses have testified by the week, and if allowed to reiterate, the same circle may be traversed ad infinitum, which cannot be permitted. The evidence to be adduced must conform strictly to the defence, and meet what it has adduced. Cumulative evidence cannot be heard.

May 20th, 1853.

The jury was called, and after answering to their names was asked by the clerk: "Gentlemen, have you agreed upon a verdict?"

The foreman replied, "We have not."

THE COURT: In reflecting on the case, I have come to the conclusion to discharge you. You are therefore discharged.

Case No. 15,187.

UNITED STATES v. GARDNER.

[18 Int. Rev. Rec. 46; 5 Chi. Leg. News, 301; 5 Leg. Op. 95.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. March 17, 1873.

JURORS IN FEDERAL COURTS—QUALIFICATIONS—MODE OF SELECTION—STATE LAWS.

[1. The provision in the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), that jurors in the federal courts shall have the same qualifications and exemptions as jurors in the state courts, and shall be designated in the mode practiced in the state courts, does not require that jurors, to serve in the federal courts, shall be designated or selected by the state officers, but they may be selected by the national officers, as nearly as may be, in the same manner as they are selected by the state officers.]

[2. Neither the act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73), nor the act of 1840, in respect to the selection of jurors for federal courts, fix the number of jurors to be selected, but leave the matter in the discretion of the court, to be determined by rule, if the court deems it best to make a rule on the subject.]

[3. The act of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 196), which declares that the federal courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and modes and forms of proceeding prevailing in the state courts, has no reference to the designation or selection of jurors.]

[This was an indictment against William Gardner for alleged violation of the revenue laws. Heard on motion to quash the array of jurors.]

L. J. Gartrell, Peeples & Howell, and B. H. Hill, for challenger.

Mr. Farrow, U. S. Atty., Mr. Stone and Mr. Thomas, U. S. Asst. Attys., and Mr. Akerman, for the United States.

ERSKINE, District Judge. Before the perusal of the panel, composed of six white persons and six colored, defendant challenged the array on the ground that the jury was illegally constituted, and moved that it be quashed: "First—Because the United States jurors are required to be selected by the United States statutes, according to the laws of each state where said United States courts are held. Secondly—Because there is no authority of law for the United States court to appoint commissioners to select jurors. Thirdly—Because the rules of court under which said jury was selected and impanelled, limits the number of jurors to five hundred. Fourthly—Because the manner of selecting jurors heretofore practised by the United States courts in this state, has not been repealed by competent authority. Fifthly—Because the rule of court under which the said panel of jurors was drawn, selected, summoned, and impanelled is without sanction of law, and contrary to the statutes of the United States in such case made and provided. Sixthly—Because said panel of jurors was not drawn, selected and summoned according to law. (Signed) Gartrell & Stevens, Peeples & Howell, Defendant's Attorneys." Other objections—corollaries from the foregoing, were advanced during the arguments.

These authorities were cited and relied upon by counsel for challenger: Code, §§ 3842, 3858, and 3859; Const. Ga. art. 5, § 13; Act Feb. 15, 1869; 1 Brightly, 4 Dig. 220; Act Cong. July 20, 1840 [5 Stat. 394]; U. S. v. Woodruff [Case No. 16,758]; U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,737]; Clinton v. Englebacht, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 434; Act Cong. June 1, 1872 [17 Stat. 196]. The second paragraph of section 13, art. 5, of the state constitution of 1868, says: "The general assembly shall provide by law for the selection of upright and intelligent persons to serve as jurors. There shall be no distinction between the classes of persons who compose grand and petit juries." The third sentence refers to the compensation of jurors. On the 15th of February, 1869, the general assembly passed an act to carry this clause into effect. This act contains eighteen sections—I will give the substance of so much of it as is pertinently applicable to the subject now before the court. It makes it the duty of the ordinary of each county, together with the clerk of the superior court, and three commissioners appointed for each county by the judge of the superior court, to meet at the court-house on the first Monday in June, biennially, to select from the book of the receiver of tax-returns "upright and intelligent persons" to serve as jurors, and to make out tickets, with the names of the persons so selected, and place them in a box, which shall be locked and sealed by the judge. And no grand or petit jury shall be drawn but in the presence of the judge in open court. But (by section 3) if the judge should fail to draw juries, then the ordinary, together with the commissioners and clerk of said county, shall meet at the court-house, within a certain time, and there draw grand and petit juries, all of which shall be entered by the clerk on the minutes of the court and signed by the ordinary.

On reading the act just referred to, and which is entitled "An act to carry into effect the second clause of the 13th section of the 5th article of the constitution," will disclose the fact that although it provides that the persons selected to serve as jurors shall be "upright and intelligent," (using the words of the constitution;) yet it does not speak of the second sentence, which declares: "there shall be no distinction between classes of persons who compose the grand and petit juries." Was this a casus omissus? Looking to the title of the act, there would appear to be some possible ground for this. But does not this very sentence carry itself into effect without legislative aid? Is it not per se operative and to be obeyed; and was not this probably the opinion of the legislature? My mind has always been impressed, with reasons too cogent to be discarded, that, notwithstanding the omission, it was the purpose of the legislature, by this enactment, to carry the entire clause into effect, and not to give force to a part only.

During the first term of this court, after its organization, in framing the jury rule (to be considered presently) the substance of the second sentence was incorporated into it. If this sentence is dormant, and requires legislation to bring it into action, then I may inquire, was the embodying of the substance of the sentence in the rules of court, going beyond the pale of the act of February 15, 1869—giving to it a too elastic construction? If the practical working of the act, in this judicial district, until the making of the rule just alluded to, is to be the guide, it would be difficult, I apprehend, to answer this question in the negative.

By a rule of the United States district court (having circuit court jurisdiction) for this district, adopted at the March term 1871, the marshal was instructed to procure from the superior court clerk for each county, comprising this district, a certain number of names of the "most upright and intelligent persons," between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, to be taken from the jury lists of the county, without regard to race or color. Comment was made by counsel on both sides, during argument, on the insertion of the word "most" before and in connection with, "upright and intelligent," in the rule of the district court. Whether the word "most" was in the draft of the rule which I wrote, I do not now remember; if so, it was unadvisedly there. But what impediment could it have been to justice? Can either side complain? Was not the word, by fair intendment, to apply to each class, white and colored? At most the word but expressed moral fitness as necessary to the end proposed. But to return; nearly seventeen hundred names were forwarded to the marshal (before the abrogation of this rule) by these clerks, who responded to his request, and for which the government paid them. While this rule was of force, more than two hundred and fifty names were drawn from the jury box by the court, or its officers, the marshal and clerk; but strange as it may appear, every ballot drawn from the box contained the name of a white person. Now, as the ratio of the classes, in this judicial district, has been for years past, as eight white to five colored, or nearly so, it is obvious to the common mind that this mode of designating, or selecting the jurors, cast the entire burden of jury service in the federal court upon one of the classes only—white citizens; thus releasing colored citizens, who possessed the constitutional qualifications for jurors, from the performance of a duty, which they, equally with the qualified white citizens, owed to their country. Not only the constitution of this state, but the recent amendments to the national constitution, have made the colored man a citizen, habilitating him with all the rights, privileges and immunities enjoyed by the white citizen; therefore, he should perform his part of the public labor. On the 1st of June, 1872 [17 Stat. 196], congress passed an act taking away the circuit court power from the district court for this district, and establishing a separate circuit court. At the first term a rule of court was adopted, and it was under this rule that the persons now in the traverse jury-box were designated, summoned, and impanelled. But before passing to this rule it may not be wholly amiss to mention that it is a copy—mutatis mutandis—of the rule which met the sanction of, and was adopted by the United States circuit court for the Southern district of this state, at the last November term. The court was composed of WOODS, Circuit Judge, and ERSKINE, District Judge.

"Order of Court Amending Jury Rules. The court shall appoint three of the United States commissioners residing in the Northern district of Georgia, and the said commissioners, with the marshal for the district of Georgia and the clerk of the court, shall, within ten days after the adjournment of this court, select from the body of the Northern district of Georgia five hundred upright and intelligent persons, citizens of said district, between the ages of 21 and 60 years, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, to serve as jurors. And the clerk of the district and circuit courts for said district and the marshal shall place the names of the persons so selected in a box, from which they shall draw, within ten days after said names are so deposited, not less than forty-five nor more than fifty names, unless otherwise ordered by a judge, to serve as jurors in the circuit court, and not less than forty-five nor more than fifty names, unless otherwise ordered by the judge, to serve as jurors in the district court. And the first twenty-three names so drawn for each court shall be the grand jurors for such court unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order. And within thirty days after each succeeding term of said courts respectively, unless previously drawn by the court, it shall be the duty of the marshal and clerk to draw from said box, in the manner before stated, the same number of jurors to serve at the next succeeding term of said courts respectively, unless the number is changed by the judge. And if, from any cause, they are unable to procure from the district, as before required, the requisite number of qualified jurors, then, in that event, the names of those they have been able to obtain shall constitute the list from which said jurors shall be taken, and the names of those so drawn shall be placed in another compartment of said box, there to remain until all the names shall have been drawn from the first compartment. The said box shall be kept locked, except when opened for the purpose of drawing or revising the list, and the clerk shall keep the box and the marshal the key. If from failure to draw, as hereinbefore directed, or from any other cause, there shall be a deficiency in whole or in part, of regular jurors, the court may order that upright and intelligent persons from the body of the district shall be forthwith summoned as jurors or talesmen, as the case may be. If the court should not sit at any term, the jurors drawn for that term shall stand over for the next term that shall be held. The marshal shall summon jurors by delivering to each personally, or by leaving it at his usual residence, a written or printed summons. The marshal, the clerk, and any one of said commissioners shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of carrying into effect this rule. And a deputy marshal may, in any case, whether in selecting or drawing jurors, or otherwise in the premises embraced in this rule, do whatever the marshal may himself do.—December 16, 1872."

Amendment December 23, 1872. "Ordered —That the name of each juror selected in conformity to said rule, be written in full, together with the county of his residence, on a separate piece or slip of paper, and also entered on a book to be kept by the clerk of said court. Each ballot shall be so rolled that neither the name nor the county can be seen. The ballots shall then be placed in the box and thoroughly mixed, and when a ballot is drawn therefrom by the court, or by the officers appointed to draw, it shall be unrolled, read, and entered on the venire, or on a paper to be attached thereto."

Attention will be directed to the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394): (1) "Jurors," says the act, "to serve in the courts of the United States, in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter from time to time have and be entitled to, (2) and shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries now practised and hereafter to be practised therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof; (3) and for this purpose the said courts shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impanelling of juries in substance, to the laws and usages now in force in such state; (4) and further, shall have power, by rule or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which may be hereafter adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts."

For convenience in the endeavor to interpret and construe this act, the clauses have been marked 1, 2, 3, 4.

1. The qualifications of jurors, as mental capability, residence, age, etc. The second section of the first article of the constitution says: "All persons born in the United States and residents of this state are hereby declared to be citizens of this state." The requisite qualifications for persons to serve as jurors in the highest courts of law of this state, as declared by its constitution and laws, are, that they be "upright and intelligent persons; that they have resided in the county for six months immediately before they are called upon to serve" as grand and petit jurors; that they are "above the age of twenty-one years and under the age of sixty years." Code, §§ 3841, 3858. No property qualification is required in this state for a juror, and if it is not a mere rule of convenience for ordinaries, clerks, and commissioners, to select jurors from the book of the receiver of tax returns, and it be a necessary qualification that the juror must be a tax-payer, then that qualification is included in the qualification of age. Acts March 18, 1869, and January 19, 1872. To be "white" was another qualification for a juror, but this no longer exists. It is unnecessary to speak here of exemptions, under the state laws, from jury duty in the state courts, for the principle is that those who are exempt from serving on juries are not thereby, unless there be some statutory regulations, or perhaps usage, disqualified from doing so. The language employed by congress in this clause of the act of 1840 is direct and positive; it is also mandatory to the federal courts—that jurors to serve therein shall have like qualifications and be entitled to like exemptions as those of the highest courts of law in the state where the national court is held. Under this clause no discretion is given to the court.

Clauses 2, 3, and 4 may be considered together. They provide for the designating or selecting of jurors by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries as practised in the state wherein the federal court is being held, so far as such mode may be practicable in said courts, or its officers giving the power to said courts to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming and adopting the designation and impanelling of jurors, in substance to the laws and usages in force in the state at the time. Now, it was contended by counsel for the challenger that for the designating or selecting of qualified persons to serve as jurors in this court, state authority—for example, a board, comprising the ordinary of the county, the superior court clerk, and also three commissioners appointed by the judge of the superior court—is the proper agency to act in the premises; that it, and not the national court or its officers, is the touchstone to discover, and the agent to designate each particular juror to serve in this court, from the list on the books of the receiver of tax returns. The employment of state agency to designate or select jurors for the United States courts was not, in my opinion, contemplated by congress in making this law. The language of the act is that the jurors "shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries now practised or hereafter to be practised therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable, by the courts of the United States or the officers thereof." Is it not the plain meaning of this that the designation or selection is to be made by the national and not the state officers? But the argument of counsel in its tenor indicated that, at least, if the officers of this court are to designate or select its jurors, the names should be taken from the list of taxpayers in each county in the district found on the tax receiver's books. If jurors, as the rule requires, are to be taken from the district at large, this would be virtually impracticable. And even if it were practicable to thus select them, I do not think the statute requires it to be done. The legal object is to select persons who possess the qualifications; it is not the mode in which this is to be accomplished that is imperative upon the court; in this matter a large discretion has been bestowed upon it by the statute itself. The act says that the court shall have the power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impanelling of jurors, in substance, to the laws and usages in force in the state.

Objection to the rule was urged by counsel for the challenger, "because the rule of court under which the jury was selected and impanelled limits the number of jurors in this district to five hundred." I have looked into this question, and I find nothing in any of the laws of congress as to what number shall be designated or selected. The acts of 1789 [1 Stat. 73] and 1840 apply only to the mode of selecting jurors, and not to the number.

Counsel relied on the fifth section of the act of congress of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 196). This section declares (in substance) that the United States courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and modes and forms of proceeding in other than equity and admiralty causes, as they may exist in like causes in the courts of record in the state at the time of holding the United States court therein. The act has no reference to the designating or selecting of jurors; nor in my opinion has it any application to the practice, pleadings, or modes of proceeding in criminal cases, as practised in the state courts.

The case of U. S. v. Wilson [supra] was read and earnestly discussed. Two questions were before the court for decision. The first was the construction of the act of July 20, 1840. Speaking of the first clause of the act, Wilson, Jr., said: "So far as relates to the qualifications and exemptions of federal jurors, the courts have no discretion." And in construing other portions of the act, which he quotes from, "and for this purpose the said courts shall have the power to make all the necessary rules, etc." to the end, the learned judge said, "the courts from necessity were to exercise a discretion as to the practicability of designating and impanelling jurors according to the mode prescribed for selecting juries of the highest court of law in the state. They have the power and the discretion to change the mode from time to time. The court may exercise the power, or refrain to exercise it, as it may now deem practicable." The other question for decision was, whether where a grand jury, consisting of fifteen members, fourteen of them—the fifteenth being absent—return a true bill into court; the indictment was well found. The court held it was. But it further held, that if a grand jury has even one disqualified person on the panel, the whole jury is tainted and an indictment found by such a body would be void. And this has been the doctrine as to grand juries in England for the past four hundred years, and it prevails in this country. 2 Pick. 549; Doyle v. State, 17 Ohio, 222.

Counsel also relied on Clinton v. Englebrecht, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 434. This case arose exclusively under a law of the territory of Utah. The court there, proceeding on the theory that it was a court of the United States, issued an open venire to the marshal, acting apparently on the hypothesis that it was to be governed in the selection of jurors by the acts of congress. Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, held that the territorial court erred both in its theory and in its action, and that the making up of the lists, and all matters connected with the designation of the juries, were subject to the territorial laws.

Reliance was likewise placed by counsel for the challenger on the case of U. S. v. Woodruff [supra]. The defendant objected to a trial, on the ground that the jurors had not been selected conformably to the act of congress of July 20, 1840. The court (Mr. Justice McLean), in delivering the judgment, said: "By an early rule of this court the clerk is required to issue a venire facias, commanding the marshal to summon twenty-four persons to serve as traverse jurors. * * * By the act of Illinois of the 3d of March, 1845, for the selection of jurors, it is made the duty of the county commissioners to select jurors. Now this court cannot call upon the officers of the state to do this duty, but we are bound to conform, as nearly as may be, to the state practice. The venire under the above rules leaves the selection of the juries to the marshal as his convenience shall permit. This does not, therefore, conform to the state practice. The jurisdiction of this court extends throughout the state; consequently the jurors should be selected from the state at large, and their names should be inserted in the venire. The court will therefore adopt a rule requiring the clerk and marshal to select the jurors from the state at large, previous to each term, and to conform in doing so as near to the state practice as may be practicable."

The case of U. S. v. Wilson, instead of showing that the rule is not in conformity to the laws of congress, is, to my mind, an authority which sustains its legality.

The case of U. S. v. Woodruff is so directly applicable, so fully covers the whole question, and so clearly supports the rule, that no other authority need be adverted to or invoked.

The motion to quash the array is overruled.

Case No. 15,188.

UNITED STATES v. GARDNER et al.

[5 Mason, 402.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1829.

SEAMEN—ENDEAVOUR TO MAKE REVOLT.

If the crew combine together to refuse to do duty, and actually refuse until the master complies with some improper request on their part, it is an endeavour to make a revolt, within the crimes act of 1790, c. 9 (36), § 12 [1 Stat. 115; 1 Story's Laws, 85].

[Cited in U. S. v. Nye, Case No. 15,906.]

[1] [Reported by William P. Mason, Esq.]

Indictment for an endeavour to make a revolt on board the ship Ganges, in Boston harbour, founded on the crimes act of 1790, c. 9 (36), § 12 [1 Stat. 115; 1 Story's Laws, 85]. Plea, not guilty. At the trial it appeared, that the seamen had signed the shipping articles, and the ship was all ready for sea, and that the master directed the pilot to get the vessel under weigh for sea for the voyage. The whole crew (among whom were the defendants [Daniel C. Gardner and others]) utterly refused to obey the orders of the master, or to get the ship under weigh, unless the master would agree, that they should have a day watch below, in the forenoon, during the whole voyage. This the master refused to do, as being an unreasonable request; and it was proved by witnesses, that it was improper and injurious, and unknown as a regulation on board of ships. The defendants and the rest of the crew then separated themselves from the officers, and collected together by the forecastle, and steadily refused all obedience to the orders given, and acted together in concert. Application then was made for a warrant to arrest them, and they were taken on shore under it, and upon a hearing before the district judge, he explained the law to the seamen, and urged them to go on board again, and the owners agreed, if they would go on board and perform duty, this offence should be forgiven and forgotten. The defendants refused, and were then committed for trial.

Mr. Dunlap, for the United States.
S. D. Parker, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up the case, said: If the jury believe the facts to be as testified by the witnesses, the court are of opinion, that there was an endeavour to commit a revolt. There was a common combination by the crew, for a common and illegal object, and they refused obedience to the lawful orders of the master, and incited each other to persist in that disobedience, so as to overthrow his authority and command on board of the ship. We have already decided this point in the case of U. S. v. Harris [Case No. 15,313], which has just been tried.

Verdict guilty, and sentence accordingly.

Case No. 15,189.

UNITED STATES v. GARLINGHOUSE et al.

[4 Ben. 194;[1] 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 11; 2 Chi. Leg. News, 131, 139.]

District Court, N. D. New York. May, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—BOND—MARRIED WOMAN—LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS.

1. The defendant Garlinghouse, a warried woman, as principal, and the defendants Munger and Gulick, as sureties, executed, on the 9th of March, 1866, at Canandaigua, in the state of New York, a bond, conditioned according to the requirements of the internal revenue laws of the United States relating to bonded warehouses. To the declaration, which was in debt upon this bond, alleging breaches of the condition, the defendants severally pleaded that at the time of the making of the bond, the defendant was, and still continued to be, the wife of one Leman B. Garlinghouse. To the plea of the sureties the United States replied, that at the time of the delivery of the bond, the defendant G. was engaged in the business of a distiller at Canandaigua, on her separate account, and separate and apart from her said husband, and that she gave the bond in the proper carrying on of said business. To the plea of the defendant G. the United States replied, in addition to the allegations just stated, that for the successful prosecution of her separate business it was necessary for the defendant G. to have a bonded warehouse, under the laws of the United States; that she applied therefor; and that she executed the bond according to the requirements of those laws. The defendants demurred to these pleas, and issue was joined on these demurrers. Held, that a bond, voluntarily given to the United States to secure the performance of any corporate act, or the discharge of any public, official, or private duty, is valid and binding, if the United States, in their political and corporate capacity, have a legal pecuniary interest in the performance of the condition of such bond, although the bond is not expressly required or authorized by any act of congress.

2. The capacity of a party to contract depending on the law of the place where the contract is made, the validity of the bond in question, so far as it depended on the capacity of the defendant G. to make it, was to be governed by the law of the state of New York, and, under that law, was valid and binding upon her.

3. Under the laws of this state, G. was authorized to carry on the business of a distiller on her own account, and for her own benefit; and, the acts of congress having required that in order to make the warehouse of the defendant G. a legal bonded warehouse, under the laws of the United States, she should execute such a bond with sureties as was here in question, she acquired, by the very virtue of the acts themselves (even if she did not possess it without reference to them) legal capacity to bind herself by such a bond as she had made here, and the bond was valid under those laws by necessary implication.

The declaration in this case was in debt, upon a bond, in the penalty of $20,000, executed by the defendant Garlinghouse as principal, and by the other defendants as her sureties, on the 9th of March, 1866, at Canandaigua, in the Northern district of New York; and such bond was subject to the conditions, thereunder written, that if the said defendant, Martha A. Garlinghouse, should comply, in all respects, with the provisions and requirements of the warehousing and internal revenue laws of the United States, and the regulations of the treasury department made in pursuance thereof, and should not store, in the premises, described in the application made by her for a bonded warehouse, any goods, wares, or merchandise other than those manufactured or produced by her, and ordered to be placed therein by the collector, or his officer having charge thereof; and should pay to the said collector monthly the salary of the officer having charge of such goods, and should exonerate and hold the United States and its officers harmless therefrom or on account of any risk, loss, or expense of any kind or description connected with or arising from the deposit or keeping of any goods, wares, or merchandise in the said warehouse; and should not remove, or suffer to be removed, from said warehouse any goods, wares, or merchandise stored therein, without lawful permit, and without the presence of the officer having charge thereof; or, in case of such removal, should pay to the collector of internal revenue for the district the value of the merchandise so removed, and five thousand dollars as liquidated damages for such removal: then such obligation was to be void. The declaration assigned breaches of this condition. No question upon the form of the bond, or of the declaration, or the sufficiency of the assignment of such breaches, was made. To this declaration, the defendants [Merrick] Munger and [Egbert] Gulick—after oyer of the bond and condition, and after taking issue by their first plea upon the assignment of breaches—pleaded, secondly, that the said Martha A. Garlinghouse, at the time of the making of the said bond or writing obligatory, was, and still continued to be, the wife of one Leman B. Garlinghouse. The defendant Garlinghouse also pleaded her coverture, in the same form. To the second plea of the defendants Munger and Gulick, the United States replied, that, at the time of the execution and delivery of the said bond by the said defendants, the said defendant Martha A. Garlinghouse was, and for a long time previous thereto had been, engaged in and carried on the business of a distiller, at Canandaigua aforesaid, on her separate account, which said business the said defendant Martha A. Garlinghouse had maintained and carried on as and for her sole and separate use and behoof and profit, and as and for her separate trade, business, and occupation, separate and apart from her said husband; and that she gave, made and executed the said bond, at the time and in the manner aforesaid, in the proper carrying on of her said business, so carried on by her, on her separate account, as aforesaid. There was a similar replication to the plea of the defendant Garlinghouse; but the last-mentioned replication also contained further allegations, in substance, that in order to the successful prosecution of the said separate trade and business of said Martha A. Garlinghouse, it became necessary for her to have a bonded warehouse established, pursuant to the acts of congress in such case made and provided; and that she made application therefor, and was thereupon required to execute such a bond with sureties; and did thereupon execute such bond, with her said sureties, as by law required. To these replications the defendants demurred, and the plaintiffs joined in demurrer. Upon the argument of the demurrer, it was not denied that the principal in the bond, though a married woman, might, under the statute of the state of New York, lawfully carry on the business of a distiller, for her own separate use and benefit, and might lawfully make all ordinary contracts with private persons in respect to such business; nor was it alleged that such contracts would not be binding upon her, and upon her separate estate and property, or that she could not be prosecuted to judgment thereon, in the proper form of civil action at law, as much as if she had been a feme sole; but it was insisted on behalf of the defendants, that the bond declared on, being executed to the United States, must be governed by the common law, and not by the laws of the state of New York; and was void, as against both the principal and the sureties.

H. G. Cheesebro, counsel for defendants, made and argued the following points in support of this position:

First. The bond, being executed under the United States laws, is to be governed by those laws, and not by the laws of the state in which it chanced to be executed. Cox v. U. S., 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 172, 203, 204; Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506.

Second. There being no statute law of the United States, on the subject of the execution of bonds by married women, the courts of the United States must be governed by the rules of the common law, in deciding questions of that kind. 1 Kent, Comm. 341; Ludlam v. Ludlam, 26 N. Y. 361.

Third. By the common law the bond of a married woman is void; and, there being no other law to govern this case, the bond in question is, against Mrs. Garlinghouse, null and void. Fowler v. Shearer, 7 Mass. 14; Daniel v. Rose, 1 Nott & McC. 33; Martin v. Dwelly, 6 Wend. 14; 1 Pars. Cont. 286.

Fourth. The bond, being void as against the principal, is void as against the sureties. 1 Poth. Obl. pt. 2, c. 6, § 1, marg. pp. 366, 370, 377; Id. (2d Am. Ed.) marg. p. 196; Chit. Cont. 199.

W. Dorsheimer, U. S. Dist. Atty.

HALL, District Judge. The only question argued on this demurrer, and the only one it is intended now to decide, is whether, under the facts admitted by the pleadings, the bond declared on is void by reason of the coverture of Mrs. Garlinghouse, the principal obligor.

This question may properly be considered under two aspects: First, as presented under the common law and the laws of the state of New York alone, without regard to the effect of the act of congress under which it was executed; and, secondly, as presented under the provisions of the act of congress, in addition to the common law and the statutes of New York.

In considering this question, independent of the legislation of congress, as affecting the capacity of Mrs. Garlinghouse to bind herself by the bond declared on, it is proper first to dispose of the objection, urged upon the argument, that the United States cannot take a valid bond except under the express authority of an act of congress. I have lately had occasion to examine the question presented by such objection, and regard it as a well and firmly-established doctrine that a bond, voluntarily given to the United States to secure the performance of any lawful act, or the discharge of any public, official, or private duty, is valid and binding, if the United States in their political and corporate capacity have a legal pecuniary interest in the performance of the condition of such bond, although such bond is not required by any act of congress. The United States, the different states of the Union, and all municipal corporations, may legally take a bond, with sureties, for the faithful performance, by an individual, of all lawful contracts made with them, and in the performance of which they have a direct pecuniary corporate interest. In this respect, they may take the same measures for their security as might be taken by an individual for his own security in similar cases; and whenever any tax is legally imposed by the United States, they may take security, by bond, for the payment of such tax, or for the proper accounting therefor, by the officer who collects it, in the absence of any congressional legislation upon the subject of such security. In U. S. v. Maurice [Case No. 15,747], Mr. Chief Justice Marshall declared that the capacity of the United States to contract was co-extensive with the duties and powers of government; that every contract which subserved to the performance of a duty might be rightfully made; that a contract executed by an individual, and received by the government, was prima facie evidence that it was entered into by proper parties; and that the authority of an agent or officer of the government, employed in making the contract, is acknowledged by the individual when he makes the contract, and by the United States when the government asserts any right under it. These doctrines were substantially recognized by Mr. Justice Washington, in U. S. v. Howell [Id. 15,405], by the supreme court of the United States, in U. S. v. Tingay, 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 115, in U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 343, in U. S. v. Linn, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 290, and in Tyler v. Hand, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 573. Indeed, the validity of such bonds would seem to be unquestionable, even if there were no direct authority upon the question. No maxim is more clearly established in law, or in reason, than that wherever the end is required, the means are authorized (The Federalist, No. 44); and the taking of a bond, with sureties, is one of the ordinary means of securing the payment of a debt, or the performance of a duty. And sovereignties and states, as well as municipal corporations and individuals, have, unless prohibited by law, the right to take such security within the scope of their general authority, or in the just exercise of their constitutional or corporate powers.

Assuming, then, that the United States may properly take the bond of a feme sole, or other person, having capacity to contract, according to the law which must determine that capacity, it is proper to inquire by what law the question of such capacity is to be determined in the present case.

In the case of Cox v. U. S. [6 Pet. (31 U. S.) 172], cited by the defendants' counsel, as above stated, it was declared to be a well settled general rule, "that the law of the place where the contract is made, and not where the action is brought, is to govern in expounding and enforcing the contract, unless the parties have a view to its being executed elsewhere; in which case it is to be governed according to the law of the place, where it is to be executed." And it was declared that, admitting the bond in that case to have been signed at New Orleans, it was very clear that the obligations imposed upon the parties thereby looked for its execution to the city of Washington; that the accountability of the principal as a navy agent, was to be at the seat of government; that the bond was given with reference to the laws of the United States, which required such navy agent to account with the treasury department, at the seat of government; that he was bound to pay over such sum as might be found due to the treasury department, or in such manner as should be directed by the secretary; and that, in every point of view in which it could be considered, the contract of the obligors was to be executed at the city of Washington, and that, therefore, the liability of the parties must be governed by the rules of the common law, which were in force at Washington. The case of Cox v. U. S., and the case of Duncan v. U. S., 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 435 (which was a suit upon a paymaster's bond, and which, so far as the question under discussion is concerned, was decided upon the same principles as that of Cox v. U. S.), are, therefore, in entire accordance with the almost uniform course of decision upon such questions. Alves v. Hodgson, 7 Term R. 242; Smith v. Smith, 2 Johns. 235, 241; Thompson v. Ketcham, 4 Johns. 285; Lodge v. Phelps, 1 Johns. Cas. 139; Thompson v. Ketchum, 8 Johns. 190; Hicks v. Brown, 12 Johns. 142; Hyde v. Goodnow, 3 Comst. [3 N. Y.] 266.

But in most of these cases the obligation, or legal effect, of the engagement, rather than the capacity of the obligor to enter into the contract, was in controversy; and the question of capacity to contract depends upon the law of the place where the contract is made, rather than upon the law of the place where it is by its terms to be performed.

In this case the bond is alleged, and admitted by the pleadings, to have been made at Canandaigua, in the state of New York; and it bears upon its face an admission that that was the place of residence—the domicile—of the obligors. And the contract was by its terms to be performed in the state of New York. The domicile of the obligors, and the place of the execution of the contract, as well as the place where it was to be performed, being the same, the question whether the lex loci contractus or the lex domicilii is to determine the capacity of the parties to enter into the contract, (upon which the common law and most continental jurists disagree) does not arise; and the capacity of the obligors to enter into the contract, and the validity and extent of its obligations, are to be determined by the laws of New York.

Mr. Justice Story, in his "Conflict of Laws," has discussed this question and reviewed the authorities at great length, and with his usual ability; and in section 241, he says: "The law, which is to govern in relation to the capacity of the parties to enter into a contract, has been already fully considered. It has been shown that, although foreign jurists generally hold that the law of the domicile ought to govern in regard to the capacity of persons to contract, yet that the common law holds a different doctrine, viz.: that the lex loci contractus is to govern." Again in section 242, he says: "Generally speaking, the validity of a contract is to be decided by the law of the place where it is made." And, again, in section 263, he says, "that the law of the place of the contract is to govern as to the nature of the obligation and the interpretation of the contract."

Mr. Justice Story states some exceptions to these rules, among which is the one referred to in the case of Cox v. U. S., that the law of the place where the contract is to be executed (that is, performed) should govern in determining the nature and extent of its obligation. Sections 233, etc.

It would be idle to attempt to add anything to the discussion of this subject by Mr. Justice Story; but it may properly be said that the positions stated are fully sustained by later authorities. A few of these will be referred to.

"All questions of minority or majority, incapacity consequent on coverture, emancipation, and other personal qualities and disabilities, are governed by the lex loci contractus, or the law of the place where the contract is made or the act done." Levi, Merc. Law, p. 41, cl. 47, citing Walker v. Witter, 1 Doug. 6; Martin v. Nicolls, 3 Sim. 458.

Westlake, in his valuable work on Private International Law, says (pages 386, 387): "The validity of a contract, made out of England, with regard to the personal capacity of the contractor, will be referred in our courts to the lex loci contractus;" and Chancellor Kent (2 Comm. 455) says: "A contract valid by the law of the place where it is made, is, generally speaking, valid everywhere, jure gentium and by tacit consent. The lex loci contractus controls the nature, construction, and validity of the contract; and on this broad foundation the law of contracts, founded on necessity and commercial convenience, is said to have been originally established." At pages 457, 458, he says: "It may be laid down as a settled doctrine of public law, that personal contracts are to have the same validity, interpretation, and obligatory force in every other country, which they have in the country where they are made." And at page 458 he says: "So, also, the personal incompetency of individuals to contract, as in the case of infancy, and the general capacity of parties to contract, depend as a general rule upon the law of the place of contract." And see Thompson v. Ketchum, 8 Johns. 190; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 520; and Townsend v. Jamison, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 407, 414.

Under the authorities, and for the reasons already stated, the demurrers would be overruled, if there were no other ground upon which the validity of the bond declared on could be maintained. It may, nevertheless, be well to consider the case in the other aspect to which reference has been already made, and to determine the effect of the act of congress under which the bond was taken, upon the question of the capacity of Mrs. Garlinghouse to enter into the contract.

The laws of this state clearly authorized her to engage in and carry on the business of a distiller upon her own account, and for her sole benefit, separate from the business of her husband; and under such laws she might make with an individual any contract for the procurement or use of a warehouse to enable her to carry on such business. The act of congress, however, required that, before such warehouse could be legally established as a bonded warehouse, she should execute a bond, with sureties, as prescribed in that act; and the requirement of such a bond necessarily authorizes its execution, and also by implication, as a necessary consequence, renders such bond valid. By requiring such bond of a married woman who might carry on the business of a distiller for her sole and separate benefit, under the laws of any state, congress incidentally and necessarily conferred upon her (if she had not that capacity before) the legal capacity to bind herself by such bond, for otherwise the execution of the bond would be a nugatory act, and the object and purpose of congress in requiring such bond would be defeated.

It is, in principle, like the case of a contract of enlistment made by a minor, under acts of congress providing for enlistments without declaring the capacity of minors to enter into a contract of enlistment, or expressly authorizing their enlistment, but which, nevertheless, recognize the practice of their enlistment, without requiring the consent of their parents or guardians. In such cases, the acts of congress, authorizing or recognizing such enlistments, give to the minor, by necessary implication, legal capacity to enter into such contract, and establish their validity when made. U. S. v. Bainbridge [Case No. 14,497]. Upon the same principle it has been held that when a statute obliged an infant to indemnify a city, town, or county against the expenses of supporting his illegitimate child, and made it necessary for him to enter into a bond with sureties for that purpose, as the only means by which he could be discharged from arrest, such statute gave the infant legal capacity to make a binding obligation for that purpose. People v. Moores, 4 Denio, 518. And see People v. Mullin, 25 Wend. 698.

In Baker v. Lovett, 6 Mass. 80, Parsons, C. J., said, "Infants are bound by all acts which they are obliged by law to do," and I know of no good reason why the same should not be applied to the acts of a married woman.

The right of the United States to sue upon a contract made with it, without any express authority of an act of congress, was established as early as 1818, in the case of Dugan v. U. S., 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 172, 181.

In respect to the second point made by the defendants' counsel, it may be proper to remark that the courts of the United States are governed by the rules of the common law, because the common law is in force in the state or territory where the cause of action arose or is to be enforced, and not because the common law has been adopted by the United States, or has under the laws of the United States any binding force except as being the law of some state, territory, or district. In the case of Wheaton v. Peters, which was argued at great length by Mr. Paine and Mr. Webster for Mr. Wheaton, and Mr. J. R. Ingersoll and Mr. Sergeant for Mr. Peters, Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the opinion of the court, said (8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 638): "It is clear there can be no common law of the United States The federal government is composed of twenty-four sovereign and independent states, each of which may have its local usages, customs, and common law. There is no principle which pervades the Union, and has the authority of law, that is not embodied in the constitution or laws of the Union. The common law could be made a part of our federal system only by legislative adoption. When, therefore, a common law right is asserted, we must look to the state in which the controversy originated." And see Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 524; Lorman v. Clarke [Case No. 8,516]; and Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Co., 13 How. [54 U. S.] 518, 564.

The case of Cox v. U. S., ubi supra, so far as it adopted the common law as the rule of decision, therefore proceeded upon the ground that the common law was in force in Maryland at the time of the cession by that state of the territory in which the treasury department was situated, and continued to be in force in that part of the District of Columbia after such cession, and not upon the ground that the common law furnished the rule of decision in every state in all cases where contracts with the United States were in controversy. See Kendall v. U. S., ubi supra.

The conclusions already stated render it unnecessary to consider the other points made by the defendants' counsel. The United States must have judgment upon the demurrer, with leave to the defendants to amend their pleadings within twenty days, on payment of costs

Case No. 15,190.

UNITED STATES v. GASSAWAY.

[1 Hayw. & H. 174.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March 30, 1844.

INDICTMENT—FOLLOWING STATUTE—LARCENY FROM WAREHOUSE.

An indictment is good and sufficient under the act of Maryland of July, 1729, c. 4, § 3, if it alleges that the prisoner with force and arms, into a certain storehouse, feloniously did break and enter, and then and there chattels of a greater value of five shillings of the currency of the state of Maryland, feloniously did steal, take and carry away, &c.

[This was an indictment against Samuel Gassaway for house-breaking.]

This is an indictment, for breaking into a storehouse and stealing goods, under the act of Maryland of July, 1729, c. 4, § 3,[2] and is as follows: "The jurors of the United States, for the county aforesaid, on their oath present that Samuel Gassaway, late of the county aforesaid, a slave, on the 26th day of Nov., 1842, with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, into a certain storehouse of one James Thecker and one Henry Thecker, there situate, feloniously did break and enter, and then and there three pair of boots of the value of $10.50, and of a greater value than five shillings of the currency of the state of Maryland, and then and there one quarter box of segars, of the value of four dollars and fifty cents, and of a greater value than five shillings of the currency of the state of Maryland, of the goods and chattels of the said James Thecker and the said Henry Thecker, feloniously did steal, take and carry away, against the form and statute in such case, made and provided, and against the peace and government of the United States." On which indictment the jury, being empannelled and sworn to say the truth on the premises, said that the prisoner is guilty. Whereupon the said prisoner, by his attorney, moved in arrest of judgment upon the verdict. Because the indictment states a larceny by the prisoner, and not a stealing from the house or warehouse according to the terms of the statute, and for other reasons apparent on the record.

Pursuant to the act of congress of July 7, 1838 [5 Stat. 306], the motion and the questions of law were adjourned to the circuit court for its decision. The cause coming on to be heard on the transcript of the record of the criminal court of the District of Columbia for the county of Washington, on the motion in arrest of judgment and on the questions of law arising on said motion, was argued by counsel.

THE COURT decided that the judgment in this cause ought not to be arrested because the said indictment does not charge a stealing from the house or warehouse, nor for any other reason apparent on the record. That the offence charged in said indictment is sufficiently charged therein, and that the said indictment is good and sufficient in law. Whereupon it is ordered and adjudged by this court, that the motion in arrest of judgment in said cause be, and that the same is hereby, overruled, and that the same be certified to the said criminal court.

Case No. 15,191.

UNITED STATES v. GATES.

[2 N. Y. Leg. Obs. 8; 8 Law Rep. 465.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1845.

PENAL ACTION—FORMER CONVICTION.

A person who has been convicted and punished by fine and imprisonment for smuggling goods on shore in violation of the provisions of the act of August 30, 1842, § 19 [5 Stat. 565], is not liable to an action to recover the penalty imposed by the statute of March 2, 1799, § 50 [1 Stat. 665], for landing them without a permit,—the act complained of in the two cases being the same.

[Distinguished in Re Leszynsky, Case No. 8,279.]

This was an action under the 50th section of the act of congress of March 2, 1799, which provides that no goods brought in any vessel from any foreign place may be unladen within the United States but between the rising and the setting of the sun, except by special license of the collector, &c., nor at any time without a permit; and the landing thereof under any other circumstances is prohibited under a penalty of $400 against the person in command of the vessel at the time, and every other person knowingly concerned or aiding therein, and certain disabilities therein mentioned against such persons.

[2] "That if any person or persons shall, after the end of this session of assembly, break into any shop, storehouse or warehouse, although such shop, storehouse or warehouse, be not contiguous to or with any mansion-house, and steal from thence any goods, to the value of five shillings, and be thereof convict, by confession or verdict of a jury, such offender or offenders, shall suffer death as felons, without benefit of clergy, any law, usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." 1 Maxcy, Laws Md. p. 190.

The United States sued for the above penalty, alleging the landing of the goods [from the packet ship Oxford, from Liverpool, defendant being then in command of said ship] [1] in question without a permit. The defendant pleaded specially that since the landing of said goods he had been indicted by the United States in the circuit court of this district, under the act of 1842, for smuggling and clandestinely introducing said goods into the United States without paying or accounting for the duties due thereon according to law, and that he pleaded guilty to such indictment, and was by said court sentenced to pay a fine of two thousand dollars and be imprisoned thirty days; that he paid such fine and bore such imprisonment; and that the acts for which he was so indicted and committed and sentenced are the same acts for which this action is brought to recover the above named penalty. To this plea the United States demurred. The defendant joined in demurrer. The cause came on for argument before the Honorable S. R. BETTS, United States District Judge, on the 28th day of October, 1845.

The Hon. Benjamin F. Butler, attorney for the United States, with whom was F. A. Marbury, relied on the following points:

I. The facts set forth in the second plea, and which are admitted by the demurrer, constitute no valid bar to the action of the plaintiffs. (1) The unlading and delivery of goods without a permit from the collector (section 50, Act March 2, 1799) is an offence entirely distinct from the fraudulent introduction of goods into the United States (section 19, Act Aug. 30, 1842), for which the defendant has been indicted and punished as set forth in his plea. The former offence may be committed in respect to free goods; the latter only concerns such as are dutiable. A party might unlawfully unlade goods, and thus incur the penalties of the law of 1799, without that fraudulent intent which would be necessary to conviction under the law of 1842. The punishment attending the violation of the former differs from that prescribed in the latter. (2) The two statutes are at most only cumulative. The former is not repealed by the latter, neither being incompatible with the existence and operation of the other.

II. There is no merger. The ancient feudal doctrine of the merger of a private wrong in a felony is not applicable to the civil polity of this country, and has never been adopted in our system of jurisprudence. Plummer v. Webb [Case No. 11,234]. But, if this doctrine were recognized by our courts, it could not affect this case, as the law of 1799 was devised for the protection of a public right, and the infringement of its provisions is therefore a public wrong. Nor is the violation of the law of 1842 made felony; it is, on the contrary, expressly declared to be a misdemeanor

Charles A. Peabody, contra.

Though there are no cases in point which I have been able to find, yet, upon general principles, the defendant is not liable to this second action for another offence in the same act for which he has already been punished at the suit of the same party (the United States). The rights of the United States against the defendant have been satisfied, and his liability discharged, by a compliance with the former sentence of the court. In a suit for money, if a judgment were obtained for the same cause, and paid, the fact pleaded would be a good bar to a subsequent action for the same cause, however the action (as in this case) might differ in form. In criminal law the maxim is familiar, that "no man shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offence." Moreover, it cannot be supposed to have been the intention of congress that the two acts should be enforced in the same case, for one and the same offence. They could hardly have intended to cumulate penal consequences in this manner. On the contrary:

I. The statutes were intended for different cases, and the act of 1799 was intended to apply to those cases in which the landing was only in violation of that statute, but without any fraud or fraudulent intent upon the revenue of the United States. Whenever the fraud or fraudulent intent made a part of the offence, the act of 1842 applied, but the act of 1799 did not; and, on the other hand, when the landing was without such fraudulent intent upon the revenue, this act (of 1799) was violated, and the remedy provided by it was the legitimate remedy.

The counsel for defence admitted the position of the plaintiff, that the latter did not repeal the former statute, and also that the doctrine of the merger of the civil remedy in the felony was not a part of the common law of this country, it having had its origin in England, in the necessity of the case, where the entire property of any one convicted of felony was forfeited and confiscated, and the civil remedy of the individual lost. But the case at bar does not depend upon either of these positions. Neither this nor the former suit was for damages sustained. The case at bar is more nearly analogous to the doctrine of merger as applied to a lesser offence, where the acts constituting it go to make up a greater. He cited the cases of robbery, assault with intent to rob, and assault and battery. In every robbery there is an assault with intent to rob, and usually an assault and battery, and one guilty of the first is literally guilty of the one or both of the others; and yet it will not be contended that, in a case where all these concur, the offender, having been punished for robbery, is liable for an assault with intent to rob, or that, having suffered for the latter, he could properly be proceeded against for an assault and battery. The lesser would be merged in the greater offence, and, having suffered for the latter, he would not be liable for the former. On the other hand, if indicted for assault and battery, and on the trial the evidence should show death caused by the assault and battery, so that the accused was guilty of murder, the less would doubtless be merged in the greater offence, and on this appearing on the trial the proceedings under the indictment would be dismissed. The two remedies in the case at bar are in behalf of the same plaintiffs. Both are for the commonwealth. The offences complained of are against the rights of the same parties, and concur in the same act, and neither is for damages. The goods were landed without a permit (the offence forbidden in the act of 1799), and with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States (the offence prohibited in the act of 1842). In one suit he has been punished for the act with the intent. In this it is sought to punish (more mildly) for the act alone, without the wrong intent,—the mere landing, independently of any intent to defraud the revenue.

II. On general principles there can be only one punishment for the same act,—one satisfaction for one debt. The United States having enforced one remedy, their claim against defendant is satisfied,—extinguished. He has fulfilled the law by bearing the sentence thereof. The demand of the United States having been paid, they have no further claim on defendant for the single act which forms the foundation of both their claims. This doctrine is analogous to that of satisfaction of a debt or liability by payment in a civil suit, —a former conviction in criminal law. In this case the first suit was criminal in its form, but this is a civil action. The law in either case, being complied with, is satisfied.

On either of the above grounds the plea is good, and this action cannot be maintained.

BETTS, District Judge. The question raised by the demurrer in this case is substantially whether a person convicted and punished by fine and imprisonment for smuggling goods on shore in this port (thus landing them without a permit) is liable also to an action for $400 penalty for such landing. The act of March 2, 1799, § 50, provides that no goods brought in any vessel from any foreign place may be unladen within the United States, but between the rising and the setting of the sun, except by special license from the collector of the port and naval officer, where there is one, nor at any time without a permit from the collector and naval officer, if any, for such unlading, and, if goods shall be unladen from any such vessel contrary to the directions aforesaid, the master and every other person who shall knowingly be concerned or aiding therein, &c., shall forfeit and pay each and severally the sum of $400 for each offence; and shall be disabled from holding any office of trust or profit under the United States for a term of not exceeding seven years, and the collector shall advertise the names of such persons, &c., &c.; and all goods so unladen or delivered shall become forfeited and may be seized by any of the officers of the customs, and, when of the value of $400, the vessel, tackle, and furniture shall be subject to like forfeiture. The United States sue for the above penalty, alleging the landing of the goods in question without a permit. The defendant, by plea thereto, avers that he has since such landing, &c., been indicted by the United States therefor in the circuit court of this district, under the act of 1842, and has been by said court, on his plea of guilty to such indictment, sentenced to pay a fine of $2,000 and be imprisoned 30 days in punishment of said offence; and that the sentence in both particulars has been satisfied; and the acts for which he was so convicted and indicted are the same acts mentioned in the declaration in this case. To this plea the United States demur, and the broad question is whether an offender so circumstanced is liable to be proceeded against under the provisions of the two statutes.

On the argument the sufficiency of the plea to establish the fact that the transaction for which the two prosecutions were instituted was one and the same was objected to; but I think it sufficiently certain to a common intent, and shall consider the case as if the plea stood clear of all exception in alleging the identity of the acts involved in the two punishments. By the act of August 30, 1842, § 19, it is enacted, "If any person shall knowingly and willingly, with intent to defraud the revenue of the United States, smuggle or clandestinely introduce into the United States any goods, wares, and merchandize subject to duty by law, and which should have been introduced without paying or accounting for the duty, &c. &c., every such person shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $5000, or imprisoned for any term of time not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of the court."

It is manifest upon the comparison of these two provisions that the latter is not inconsistent in every respect with the former, nor is it so far applicable to a like state of facts as to import an intention in the legislature to repeal or supersede the prior enactment, because the acts which are subject to the operation of the respective statutes are not identical in all particulars, and furthermore because the forfeiture of the goods and vessel may still be inflicted. 1st. The offence under the act of 1799 is committed, though the goods landed be not subject to duty, but not where a permit is granted, although there may be deception or smuggling under it, nor unless the goods are unladen from some vessel. 2d. The offence, under the act of 1842, may be committed notwithstanding a permit for landing, but not for clandestinely landing goods which are not dutiable. The offence is also complete by bringing in clandestinely by any other means than landing from vessels. These instances, independent of others which may be designated, show that the 50th section of the act of 1799 may still be in force and operation in relation to many particulars without being touched or interfered with by the provision of the 19th section of the act of 1842. But, when both apply to identically the same state of facts, can both be enforced, or does the latter supersede the former and supply the whole law applicable to such particular cases?

In the case of U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils [Case No 15,924], Judge Thompson discusses the doctrine of the repeal of one statute by force of the enactment of a subsequent one on the same subject-matter. In most cases, he says, the question resolves itself into the inquiry, what was the intention of the legislature? Did it mean to repeal or take away the former law, or was the new statute intended as merely cumulative? 6 Davies, Abr. 594, § 9. The courts, in examining the questions as they present themselves on this subject have fixed upon various incidents as indicative of the legislative purpose, and rendered them probably legal presumptions, which are to be regarded as fixing the intent. 6 Dana, 591; 6 Bac. Abr. "Statute" D, M; Dwar. St. 674, 675; 21 Pick. 373; 5 Mass. 380. So Judge Thompson adverts to some criteria decisive of the purpose of the legislature to introduce a new law not cumulative to the former, but revoking and supplanting it, as when the latter act on the same subject-matter introduces some new qualifications or modifications, or is affirmative in its character [U. S. v. One Case of Hair Pencils, Case No. 15,924], though it is well settled that subsequent statutes, which add cumulative penalties merely, do not repeal former statutes (1 Com. 298, per Lord Mansfield). The act of 1799, § 50, prohibits the landing of goods, &c., under a penalty, and, moreover, denominates it an offence. Ordinarily mere statutory penalties are to be sued for and recovered by action of debt. 5 Dana, 243, 260; Jacobs v. U. S. [Case No. 7,157]. But information will also lie, when no method is prescribed by the statute for recovery of the penalty. Adams v. Wood, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336. And it would seem that the party may, at the election of the government, in place of a suit, be indicted and fined to the amount of the penalty (1 Chit. Cr. Law, 162), unless the special mode of remedy is pointed out by the statute (Bac. Abr. "Indict," E; Rex v. Sainsbury, 4 Durn. & E. [Term R.] 457; Hollingworth's Case, Cro. Jac. 577. If the defendant in the case had been before indicted on the 50th section and fined the amount of the penalty, and then this action for the penalty was instituted, it can scarcely be questioned that the plea sets up a complete bar to such proceeding; the averment of facts showing that the one case, in all its particulars, is involved in the other. It is laid down by Baron Gilbert that, if the party hath once been fined in an action on the statute, such fine is a good bar to an indictment, because by the fine the end of the statute is satisfied Bac. Abr. "Statute," E. It appears thus to be clearly the law, when the proceedings are founded upon the same statutory penalty, that the government is restricted to a single exaction of the penalty, whether enforced by action or indictment. It is not perceived that any distinction in principle can be drawn between inflicting punishment for the same offence, by different modes of prosecution under an enactment, or by applying to the case enactments in separate statutes, all having relation to precisely the same subject matter.

The principle upon which the plea autrefois acquit, or autrefois convict, is founded, is that no man shall be placed in peril of legal penalties more than once upon the same accusation. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, pp. 452, 462. And this applies to misdemeanors as well as felonies, except that, if the plea is found against the defendant in cases of felony, the judgment is respondeat ouster, but, in case of misdemeanor, is final. Id. pp. 451, 461, 462. The government will be restricted to one satisfaction for an offence, whether the punishment be pecuniary or corporeal, unless the legislature, in explicit and in indubitable language, exact a further one.

It is true the courts do not favor constructive repeals of statutes and look for some marked inconsistency between the two, before one is held revoked by implication by the other. 9 Cow. 437; 5 Hill, 221; Dwar. St. 675. But when one act points out a particular punishment for an offence, and a subsequent act prescribes a different punishment, the latter is held to control the former, and supply the sole rule to be administered. Nichols v. Squire, 5 Pick. 168; Com. v. Kimball, 21 Pick. 373; Rex v. Cator, 4 Burrows, 2026. In the first of these cases the court say when the legislature imposes a second penalty for an offence, either larger or smaller than the former one, the party cannot be allowed to sue for either, at his option. He is confined to the one last enacted. This, it is to be observed, was a civil action for a penalty. 1 Pick. 168. And the same rule obtains in all qui tam actions, or those sounding in tort. 3 Wils. 308, and cases cited. The supreme court of Massachusetts repeat the doctrine with emphasis, in the case of indictment for an offence punishable by fine. There the forbidden act was prohibited by the first statute under penalty of $20, and the second prohibited the same act under the penalty of not more than $20 nor less than $10, and the court held that the prosecution must be under the subsequent act alone. 21 Pick.

373. It is of no moment whether or no, in this case, the provisions in the act of 1842 be held a technical repeal of that part of the 50th section of the act of 1799 applicable to the subject. The latter enactment controls the former, and supplies the only punishment that can be inflicted for the offence pointed out by it. Howe v. Starkweather, 17 Mass. 243.

The facts declared upon as the foundation for the penalty demanded by this action, then, being the same for which the defendant has already been indicted and punished, I hold that the action cannot be maintained, and that the plea is a good bar thereto, both because, the United States having obtained judgment and inflicted punishment upon the defendant for an offence, they are prohibited by general principles of law from prosecuting him again for acts constituting the same offence, or, in other words, which, if proved, would call for his conviction of that offence, and because the punishment provided by the 19th section of the act of 1842 is not cumulative, and to be imposed in addition to that prescribed by the 50th section of the act of 1799, but is quoad hoc a substitution for, or repeal of, the latter.

Judgment is accordingly given for the defendant, and against the demurrant.

Case No. 15,192.

UNITED STATES v. GAUSSEN.

[2 Woods, 92.] [1]

Circuit Court, D Louisiana. April Term, 1875.[2]

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS — BOND — ADDITIONAL DUTIES AND LIABILITIES—DELAY.

1. Where the condition of the bond of a collector of customs was that he should faithfully discharge the duties of his office according to law, the law referred to was any law that was on the statute book at the date of the bond, or that might be passed during the collector's term, prescribing the powers and duties of his office.

2. Where the duties and responsibilities of a collector of customs were changed by law subsequent to the execution of his official bond, but the nature and general duties of his office remained the same, the sureties on the bond remained liable.

[Cited in U. S. v. McCartney, 1 Fed. 107.]

3. Where duties not required by law to be performed by him were imposed on a collector by the superior officers of the treasury department, he was still required to discharge his duties according to law, and the sureties on his official bond were liable for his failure to do so.

4. Delay on the part of the government in enforcing its rights cannot be set up as a defense.

This cause was an action at law against [Bessie Elgee Gaussen,] the executor of one of the sureties on the bond of Thomas Barrett, late collector of customs. It was heard upon a motion of plaintiff's counsel to strike out two of the answers of defendant as insufficient in law.

[In this case there had been a judgment in the circuit court in favor of defendant. Case unreported. This judgment was reversed by the supreme court, and a new trial granted. 19 Wall. (86 U. S.) 198. The cause is now upon the second trial.]

WOODS, Circuit Judge. This is an action brought on the official bond of Thomas Barrett, late collector of customs for the district of Louisiana against the defendants as executors of John K. Elgee, deceased, who was one of the sureties on the bond. It appears from the petition that Barrett was appointed collector on the 6th of July, 1844, and made his official bond of that date, in the penalty of one hundred and twenty thousand dollars with John K. Elgee and others, sureties, and conditioned as follows: "Now, therefore, if the said Thomas Barrett has truly and faithfully executed and discharged, and shall continue truly and faithfully to execute and discharge, all the duties of said office according to law, then the above obligation to be void; otherwise, it shall abide and remain in full force and virtue." The breach alleged is that Barrett, the principal, failed to account for and pay over the sum of $41,376.64, which was found to be due from him to the United States on the 12th day of October, 1845, on a statement of his accounts.

To the petition filed in this action, the defendant has answered, among other pleas, the following in substance:

(1) That subsequent to the date of the bond and during Barrett's term of office, the United States exacted from him the performance of duties and the assumption of responsibilities in regard to the receipt, custody and disbursement of moneys received by him as collector, different and varying from the duties and responsibilities in that regard legally incumbent upon him as collector, by the law in force at the date of the bond.

That during his said term, Barrett was relieved by the United States from the duty and obligation of paying out the public moneys in the mode required by law, and in lieu thereof was required by the United States to expend and disburse a large part of the public moneys received by him in payments to collectors and surveyors of other districts, for the construction of the new marine hospital and for the maintenance of existing hospitals, light houses, revenue vessels, etc., and for other purposes entirely beyond the scope of his duties as collector as fixed and defined by law; that he was required by the United States to receive and disburse, and during his term did receive and disburse under said requirements, large sums of money which he was not required by law to receive and disburse as collector.

That in this manner the risks and responsibilities of Barrett as collector were, without the consent of the sureties, enlarged and changed by the United States subsequent to the execution of the bond; therefore the sureties are discharged.

(2) That in 1846, Barrett died, leaving a large estate, more than sufficient to pay the plaintiff's demand; that four other persons who were sureties on said bond have died, leaving large estates; that the United States were entitled to priority of payment out of all said estates for any claim they might have against Barrett on his bond, and that having neglected to enforce the demand for payment out of said estates, it has lost its right against them, and in consequence of this laches the liability of the defendant's testator is discharged.

The plaintiff pursuant to the practice which has been recognized as not improper in this state, now moves to strike out these answers as insufficient in law to bar the plaintiff's right of action.

I shall notice these defenses in their order:

1. When the condition of the bond sued on declares that Barrett "shall truly and faithfully discharge the duties of his office, according to law," it is clear that the law referred to is any law that was then on the statute book or that might be passed during the continuance of his term of office, regulating the powers and duties of his office. Otherwise, every increase in the rate of duties, every change in the manner of conducting the office, or rendering accounts or paying out the public money would discharge the bonds of all the collectors of customs holding under the government. The same would hold true of the bonds of the army of internal revenue collectors, postmasters, or other officers who have any duty to discharge in collecting or paying out the public money. The case of Postmaster General v. Munger [Case No. 11,309], was an action on a postmaster's bond. Acts of congress had been passed subsequent to the giving of the bond increasing the rates of postage, and consequently the responsibility of the sureties. But it was held that as the undertaking of the sureties was general, that all postages should be paid over, and referred to no particular act explaining or limiting the rate of postage, and was not taken under any law defining its extent and operation, the sureties were not discharged. So in Boody v. U. S. [Id. 1,636], it was held that the sureties on the bond of a postmaster are liable for his noncompliance with subsequent as well as past laws or orders till his official term expires, if the orders be such as are justified by law. In Pybus v. Gibb, 6 El. & Bl. 903, the plaintiff being high bailiff of the county court of Northumberland, had appointed Gibb, one of the defendants, his bailiff, and the bond was by the bailiff and the other defendants, his sureties, conditioned to indemnify the high bailiff in respect of the conduct of the bailiff in office. Under color of a warrant against the goods of Edgar, Gibb the bailiff seized the goods of Thew, who recovered against the plaintiff, and the breach assigned was for not indemnifying the plaintiff against this. The plea by the sureties showed that the bond was executed when St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, was the act regulating the county court; it alleged that several acts came into operation after the execution of the bond and before the breach complained of. On demurrer to the plea, Campbell, C. J., said: "The question is, whether the nature and functions or the office or employment are changed; for if they are, it is not the same office within the meaning of the bond. The condition of the bond was for the due execution by Gibb of his office as bailiff, according to St. 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, not, be it observed, according to such acts of parliament as might be made respecting the office." And the acts passed since the execution of the bond having increased the jurisdiction of the court from £20 to £50, and in cases of consent of parties to any amount, and having conferred bankruptcy jurisdiction, and given power to arrest absconding debtors, the court held that the office of bailiff was substantially changed and the sureties no longer liable. It will be observed that this decision rested on the language of the bond, limiting the duties to be performed by the bailiff to those prescribed by a particular act, and that if the bond had been made for the due execution of the office according to law generally, the inference from the language of the court is that the bond would have been held good and binding on the sureties. See, also, People v. Vilas, 36 N. Y. 459.

The answer under consideration sets up three substantial facts as constituting a defense to this action:

(1) That the performance of duties and the assumption of responsibilities were exacted of Barrett different from those incumbent on him by the law in force at the date of the bond.

(2) That Barrett was excused from the obligation of paying out the public money in the mode required by law, and was required by the United States to disburse a large part of the public moneys received by him in payment, to other collectors, and in the construction of the new marine hospital, etc., and for other purposes beyond the scope of his duties as fixed and defined by law.

(3) That he was required to receive and disburse large sums which he was not required by law to receive and disburse as collector.

If the first branch of the answer under consideration means that the duties and responsibilities of Barrett were changed by law, subsequent to the execution of the bond, I am of opinion on the authorities cited, that the sureties on the bond of Barrett were not discharged by any such change, for the reason that the condition of the bond in effect bound him to perform the duties of his office according to the law as it existed at the date of the bond, or might be changed by subsequent legislation.

Again, if the meaning of this part of the answer is as just stated, the answer is not good for another reason: the court takes judicial notice of the legislation of congress, and the court judicially knows that during Barrett's term of office there was no legislation of congress which in any way materially changed the duties or responsibilities of his office. But suppose the plea to mean that new duties and responsibilities were imposed upon Barrett during his term of office by his superior in the treasury department: These superior officers imposed these new duties upon Barrett as collector, either with or without the authority of law. If by authority, it follows from the terms of the bond that the defendant is bound; if without, these requirements could not affect his duties as collector. He is still bound to discharge his duties according to law, and if he fails in this, he and his sureties are liable upon his bond. If the officers of the treasury have imposed upon him duties not required of him by his office of collector, neither he nor his sureties are bound for any failure to discharge such duties. But his duties as collector still remain, and he is bound to discharge them, and he and his sureties are liable for his failure to do so. These remarks apply to the first and third branches of the plea.

The second part of the answer alleges that Barrett was excused from paying out the public money in the manner required by law, and was required to disburse it to collectors and surveyors of other districts for the marine hospital, light houses, and for other purposes beyond the scope of his duties as collector.

This part of the answer presents the question whether the disbursement, by a collector, on the authority of the United States, of public money for the payment of collectors and surveyors of other districts for the erection of the marine hospital for light houses and revenue vessels, were payments authorized by the law in force during Barrett's term of office.

During Barrett's term, the act of March 2, 1799, "to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tunnage" (1 Stat. 627), was in force. Section 21 of this act declares that "the said collector shall at all times pay to the order of the officer who shall be authorized to direct the payment thereof, the whole of the moneys which they may respectively receive by virtue of this act." Now it does not appear by the answer under consideration that Barrett was required to pay out, or did pay out, any of the public moneys, except in the manner pointed out in this section. For what purpose they were paid out is entirely immaterial, provided they were paid to the order of the officer who should be authorized to direct the payment.

During Barrett's term of office, there was no law in force establishing an independent treasury for the United States. As soon as public dues were paid to a collector of customs they were, to all intents and purposes, in the treasury, and were subject to the order of the proper officer of the treasury. It is a mistaken idea to suppose that, before the enactment of the independent treasury act, a collector of customs could pay over the public money in his hands in only one way, and that by transmission to the treasury. "The duties of collectors of customs," says the supreme court of the United States, in Broome v. U. S., 15 How. [56 U. S.] 157, "have been much multiplied by other acts since the act of 1799 was passed. Scarcely an act, and no general act has been passed since, concerning the collection of duties upon imports and tunnage, without some addition having been made to the collector's duties. They are suggested from experience. The collector too has always been a disbursing officer for the payment of the expenses of his office, and may pay them out of any money in hand, whether received from duties or remittances for that purpose, when the expenses are not unofficial, have been sanctioned by law, and have been incurred by the direction of the secretary of the treasury. For such payments he may credit himself in his general account against the sums which may have been received for duties. He may retain his own salary or fees and commissions; pay the salaries of inspectors and other officers attached to the office; make disbursements for the revenue boats, light houses, buoys, etc., and apply money collected for duties to all expenses lawfully incurred by himself or his predecessors. * * * It has often been the case, and must be so again, as it is now, that the convenience of the government and the interest of its citizens require collection districts to be established which do not and are not expected at first to pay expenses. Remittances then must be made for such purposes. They are made to the collector, because it is under his personal supervision that the work is done or the goods are furnished for the government at the point of his office where the law requires him to reside." See, also, Converse v. U. S., 21 How. [62 U. S.] 463.

I am of opinion therefore that if the averments of the second branch of the answer were true, it would not discharge the bond of Barrett.

My conclusions are as follows:

1. That the collector was bound by the condition of his bond to discharge the duties of his office according to the law as it existed at the date of the bond or might during his term be changed by subsequent legislation.

2. That no change made by law in the rate of duties, the routine of the office, or in the method of conducting it, which did not change materially the character of the office, would discharge the sureties on the official bond of the collector.

3. That there was no legislation during Barrett's term which either changed the nature of his office or duties, or the method of performing his duties.

4. That everything alleged in the answer, as required by the United States to be done by him, was authorized by law at the date of the bond.

As the result of these conclusions, it follows that the answer under consideration is not well pleaded, sets up no good defense to the action, and must be stricken out.

As to the third answer, setting up laches on the part of the plaintiffs in prosecuting their claim, it is sufficient to say: "Nullum tempus occurrit regi." See Dox v. Post Master Gen., 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 318.

The motion to strike out both answers, as insufficient in law, must prevail.

[A writ of error was subsequently sued out, by the defendant from the supreme court, where the judgment entered in this case was affirmed. 97 U. S. 584.]

Case No. 15,193.

UNITED STATES v. GAY.

[2 Gall. 359.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1815.

RESISTING CUSTOMS OFFICER — PROBABLE CAUSE OF SEIZURE.

1. To justify a seizure, there must be probable cause of seizure, and if an officer of the customs seize without probable cause, no indictment on the statute of 2d of March 1799, c. 128, § 71 [1 Story's Laws, 633; 1 Stat. 678], lies for resisting him in the seizure. See The Invincible [Case No. 7,054], note.

2. What constitutes probable cause is, when the facts are given, a question of law.

This was an indictment for resisting one Johnson, an inspector of the customs, in attempting to seize two casks of merchandize and some other articles of trifling value. The casks had been brought from Vermont, and were deposited in the store of Gay, at Cambridgeport, a short distance from Boston, to which place they were destined. There appeared to have been no attempt at concealment, or opposition to search. The casks were accompanied by an invoice, on which was written a certificate or passport from the collector of the district of Vermont. This invoice was produced and shown to Johnson, and the marks and numbers in it corresponded with those on the casks. Gay informed Johnson, that the casks were to be transported to Boston, and there delivered to a person whose name and place of business he declared, and he offered that Johnson should accompany the merchandize, and ascertain at the custom-house the genuineness of the signature of the collector of Vermont. This offer Johnson refused, and insisted upon a removal of the property to the custom-house in Boston. Gay, thereupon, placed the casks in a cart, they having before been rolled out from the store by Johnson, and sent them to Boston.

THE COURT called upon the district attorney to show, that, upon these facts, there was probable cause of seizure.

Dist. Atty. Blake contended, that the mere production of the invoice or passport did not bind the officer, who had no means of knowing whether it was genuine or not. That the merchandize, being on its way from Vermont, and such as must have been imported, might reasonably be presumed to have been imported from the British colonies, and as such to be liable to seizure.

But THE COURT were of opinion, that the facts were not such as to justify the officer in insisting upon a removal of the property to the custom-house in Boston, though it might have been reasonable, that the property should be placed in a neighboring store, until the genuineness of the certificate could be ascertained.

STORY, Circuit Justice, directed the jury as follows:

In order to maintain this indictment, it is necessary that the resistance or impediment to the inspector should be, while he was in the execution of the duties of his office. It is the duty of the inspector to make seizures of goods imported contrary to law, and if resisted in the act of making such seizure, or in securing the property seized, it is a case within the statute. But it is not the duty of the inspector to make any seizures at his arbitrary discretion. He cannot lawfully seize goods, which have been lawfully imported, or which are liable to no reasonable suspicion of illegal importation. To justify him, it is not necessary to show, that the goods were liable to condemnation; but there must, at all events, be a probable cause for the seizure. S. P., Rex v. Akers, 6 Esp. 125, note 126. Otherwise, the power of an inspector would be most arbitrary and mischievous. It is true, that the law vests him with a discretion; but it is a legal discretion; and he cannot protect himself, if he acts wantonly, and without probable cause, for he is then a mere trespasser, and not in the execution of the duties of his office. What constitutes probable cause for seizure is, when the facts are given, a mere question of law, on which the court ought to instruct the jury. It is not a mere question of fact, of which the jury are the sole judges; and, therefore, the court are bound to direct the jury, whether upon the facts, there be probable cause or not. In the present case, I am clearly of opinion, that there is no probable cause shown for the seizure; and that the defendant ought, upon this ground, to be acquitted.

Verdict for the defendant.

Case No. 15,194.

UNITED STATES v. GAY'S GOLD.

[1 Woods, 55.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. June, 1870.[2]

FORFEITURE—TRANSPORTING GOLD TO TERRITORY IN INSURRECTION.

An attempt was made to transport without a license, and contrary to the 5th section of the act of congress of July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 257], and 3d section of the act of May 20, 1862 [Id. 404], property from the United States to the territory declared to be in insurrection. Held, that such property becomes subject to forfeiture to the United States, notwithstanding the insurrectionary district to which it was being conveyed was at the time in the possession of the federal forces.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.] At chambers.

Alanson B. Long, U. S. Atty.
Geo. L. Bright, for claimant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. This is a libel filed against $5,000 in gold seized on board the steamer Empire Parish, on the Mississippi river, in the port of New Orleans. The libel charges that the gold was being transported to Bayou Sara, in the state of Louisiana, a place declared to be in insurrection, contrary to the 5th section of the act of congress of July 13, 1861 (12 Stat. 257), and the 3d section of the act of May 20, 1862 (12 Stat. 404). The facts are, that the gold was taken on board the Empire Parish, by one Smith Freeman, for the purpose of carrying the same up the river, either to Bayou Sara, or to the residence of the owner of the gold, E. J. Gay, near the village of Placquemine, both Bayou Sara and Placquemine being in a section declared to be in insurrection. The defense seems to be, that the purpose of Freeman was to carry the gold to its owner [Edward J.] Gay, who resided a mile and a half below Placquemine, on the right bank of the Mississippi river, and that at the time Placquemine and its neighborhood were held by the Union forces.

Admitting all that the testimony for the claimant tends to establish, yet it is clear that this gold should be forfeited. There is no pretense that its transportation was authorized by any permit or license whatever. It is admitted that the purpose was to transport the same to a place declared to be in insurrection, and whether such place was held by troops of the United States or not can make no difference. The act of congress forbids the transportation of gold to any place declared to be in insurrection, whether held by Union troops or not, and the proclamation of the president, April 2, 1863 [13 Stat. 730] declares the whole state of Louisiana to be in insurrection, except the port of New Orleans. So it is clear that here was a transportation commenced of property from a section not in insurrection to a section declared to be in insurrection, contrary to the plain provisions of the act of July 13, 1861, and by that act declared to be forfeited to the United States.

I am satisfied from the testimony that it was the purpose of Gay, the claimant, to use this gold in the purchase of cotton in the insurrectionary districts. The pretense that he ordered his gold from its safe depository in New Orleans to his plantation, merely to hoard it, is too transparent to deceive any one. Let a decree be entered against the gold and the principal and sureties on the release bond.

UNITED STATES v. GEAR.

[3 McLean, 571.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Illinois. June Term, 1847.

TRESPASS—ORE LANDS—PERMIT—RENT RECEIPT.

1. A permit to enter on lands containing lead ore, may be shown in an action of trespass by the United States, not as a justification, but to show the nature and object of the entry.

2. A final receipt by an officer of the government, authorised to act in the premises, for rent, is a full discharge, being subsequent to the trespass alleged, although the officer may never have accounted for the money received.

At law.

Mr. Gregg, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Hardin & Campbell, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action was brought by the United States, for a trespass upon certain lands containing lead ore. The defendant [Hezekiah H. Gear] pleaded the general issue and notice, &c. [See 3 How. (44 U. S.) 120.] It was proved that defendant being in possession of certain mineral lands, had dug of lead ore about one hundred thousand pounds, which contained from sixty to seventy per cent. of pure lead. The mineral was worth from fifteen to eighteen dollars per thousand pounds. The defendant offered in evidence a permit from an authorised officer of the government to enter upon the land, which was objected to, but the court admitted it as evidence, as it explained the nature and object of his entry, and showed that it was not tortious. He also offered in evidence a receipt of John Flannigan, agent for the lead mines, for four hundred dollars, in full for rent of lead mines, dated in 1841, subsequent to the trespass laid in the declaration. This receipt was objected to on the ground, that the agent had never accounted for the money, but the court admitted it as evidence, and instructed the jury that unless there was fraud in obtaining the receipt, or a mistake, of which there was no evidence, that it was a full discharge. That the money having been paid by the defendant to the authorised agent of the government, the payment was good, though the agent may never have accounted for it. Verdict, not guilty.

BANKRUPTCY—OBTAINING GOODS ON CREDIT—FRAUD.

An insolvent obtained goods on credit from various parties, with the intent to defraud, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, and on a hearing before a commissioner he was held to bail in the sum of five thousand dollars.

[Cited in note to U. S. v. Frank, Case No. 15,159.]

[Before United States commissioner.]

Previous to July 21, 1869, the defendant and Wm W. Borden were engaged in the boot and shoe retail trade at No. 270 Greenwich street, in this city, under the name of Borden & Geary. On that day they filed a petition in bankruptcy in the office of the clerk of the Southern district of New York. They were subsequently adjudged bankrupts, and at a meeting of their creditors George G. Nason, of the firm of Cammeyer & Nason, wholesale boot and shoe dealers, of this city, was chosen assignee, and his appointment confirmed by the court. The assignee then proceeded to examine the defendant Horace P. Geary before Register Fitch, to whom the case had been referred, as to property of the bankrupts alleged to have been concealed or disposed of contrary to the provisions of the bankrupt law. On this examination the defendant, Horace P. Geary, testified, in effect, that on the 16th day of July, 1869, the bankrupts consulted their counsel, Messrs. Cheney & Dixon, and then decided to go into bankruptcy, and instructed their counsel to prepare their petition and the other papers necessary for that purpose. The defendant transferred to Cheney & Dixon a promissory note of A. McLean for two hundred and fifteen dollars, payable two months after its date, July 15, 1869, and two promissory notes of the same date, made by Henry V. Geary, the brother of the defendant,—the one for fifty dollars and nine cents, payable one month after date, the other for fifty dollars, payable two months after date,—and paid these notes and one hundred and seventy-five dollars in cash on the 20th of July, 1869 (the day before they filed their petition in bankruptcy), to their counsel for law expenses. The defendant also testified that Cheney & Dixon had been their counsel only for about a week previous, and that they owed their counsel nothing, except for services in the bankruptcy proceedings. It also appeared, from the testimony of the defendant, that previous to May 5, 1868, they had a retail boot and shoe store in Bleecker street, in this city, which on that day they sold out to Henry V. Geary, the brother of the defendant, and sold him goods on open account, but on no fixed time of credit; that on the 15th day of July there was a balance of about six hundred dollars due by Henry V. Geary to the bankrupts, and the defendant told his brother, Henry, that Borden & Geary were about to become bankrupt, and then took his twelve notes for the amount, payable monthly, and gave him a receipt in full. The affidavits also alleged that the books of the bankrupts showed that Henry V. Geary had a credit with them, not exceeding sixty days, and that the defendant, in extending the time for the payment of his debt, by taking from him those twelve notes running from one to twelve months, prevented the debt from coming into the possession of the assignee. The complainants further charge that, by the foregoing acts, the defendant, being a debtor or bankrupt, disposed of part of the estate of the bankrupts with intent to prevent it from coming into the possession of the assignee in bankruptcy, and to hinder, impede, or delay him in recovering or receiving the same, and made a payment, gift, sale, assignment, transfer, or conveyance of property belonging to their estate with the like intent, and did, with intent to defraud, willfully and fraudulently conceal from his assignee, or omit from their schedule, property or effects belonging to their estate. The affidavits further alleged that it appears from the books of the bankrupts that they were insolvent on the 21st day of April, 1869; that the books were kept by the defendant, Horace P. Geary, who is a practical bookkeeper, and himself kept the books in his own handwriting, and therefore knew the fact of their insolvency on that date. After which, and within three months before the filing by them of their petition in bankruptcy (on July 21, 1869), the bankrupts obtained on credit from various parties in this city goods or chattels with intent to defraud, under the false color and pretense of carrying on business and dealing in the ordinary course of trade, which, the complainants allege, was a further violation of the bankrupt law.

The defendant was held to bail by the commissioner in five thousand dollars.

UNITED STATES v. GEORGE et al.

[6 Blatchf. 37; [2] 7 Int. Rev. Rec. 51; 1 Am. Law T. Rep. (U. S. Cts.) 53.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Feb. 8, 1868.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES—DISTRIBUTION—INFORMER'S SHARE.

1. The provisions of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 546), in regard to the distribution of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the provisions of the laws relating to the customs, commented on.

[Cited in The Monte Christo, Case No. 9,720.]

2. Those provisions apply to the proceeds of a forfeiture incurred under the 3d section of the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 54, 55).

3. The provisions of the act of 1867, compared with those of the 89th, 90th, and 91st sections of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 695–697), in regard to the distribution of the proceeds of forfeitures for a breach of its provisions.

4. The proper practice, under the act of 1867, is for the court to pay to the collector the amount recovered, less the charges allowed, and for the collector to deduct duties and charges, where proper, and to pay the residue into the treasury of the United States, to be distributed, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, to the persons, and in the proportions, prescribed by the decree of the court.

5. Preparatory to such decree, the court, while in possession of the fund, will determine disputes between persons claiming to share in the fund, as informers.

In this case, which was an action of debt, commenced by capias, on the 21st of December, 1867, to recover the sum of $59,722 in gold coin, and $32,000 in United States currency, "as and for forfeitures, penalties, &c., incurred for violations of the revenue laws of the United States," the defendants [John W. George and others] submitted to a final judgment for the above amounts, and paid the same into court as the proceeds of such judgment. Those proceeds were in court, awaiting such disposition of them as might be required by law. They were the proceeds of penalties and forfeitures incurred under the provisions of the laws relating to the customs. The record of judgment showed, that the declaration in the suit charged the defendants with having unlawfully and fraudulently withdrawn and removed from a bonded warehouse, certain merchandise which was subject to duty by law, without the payment of the legal duties thereon, in violation of the 3d section of the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 54, 55), and claimed that the value of the merchandise, being the sums before mentioned, became thereby forfeited to the United States. Such 3d section provided, that, if any warehoused goods should be fraudulently removed from any warehouse, the same should be forfeited to the United States. A person who claimed to be entitled to an informer's share in such proceeds, now petitioned the court to ascertain and determine who was entitled to the informer's share

Christopher Fine, for petitioner.

Benjamin K. Phelps, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. The 1st section of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Stat. 546), provides, that, "from the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, incurred under the provisions of the laws relating to the customs, there shall be deducted such charges and expenses as are by law, in each case, authorized to be deducted, and, in addition, in case of the forfeiture of imported merchandise of a greater value than five hundred dollars, on which duties have not been paid, or, in case of a release thereof, upon payment of its appraised value, or of any fine or composition in money, there shall also be deducted an amount equivalent to the duties in coin upon such merchandise, (including the additional duties, if any,) which shall be credited in the accounts of the collector, as duties received, and the residue of the proceeds aforesaid shall be paid into the treasury of the United States, and distributed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, in the manner following, to wit: one-half to the United States; one-fourth to the person giving the information which has led to the seizure, or to the recovery of the fine or penalty, and, if there be no informer other than the collector, naval officer, or surveyor, then to the officer making the seizure; and the remaining one-fourth to be equally divided between the collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or such of them as are appointed for the district in which the seizure has been made, or the fine or penalty incurred, or, if there be only a collector, then to such collector." The section then provides for a different distribution where the information is given by the officer of a revenue cutter. The 4th section of the act repeals specially two sections of two former acts, relating to matters not involving any question arising in this case, and also repeals "all other laws, or parts of laws, inconsistent with, or supplied by, the provisions of this act," and then provides, that "the secretary of the treasury shall prescribe all needful regulations to carry out and enforce the provisions of this act."

These provisions of the act of 1867 are, to some extent, a substitute for provisions contained in the 89th, 90th, and 91st sections of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 695–697). The 89th section authorizes the collector, within whose district a seizure is made, or a forfeiture is incurred, for any breach of that act, to receive from the court in which a trial is had of any issue of fact, in any suit founded on any such breach, the sum recovered, after deducting all proper charges, to be allowed by the court, and requires him, on receipt thereof, to pay and distribute the same, without delay, according to law. The 90th section requires, that the proceeds of sales of property condemned by virtue of the act, and not previously bonded, shall, after deducting all proper charges allowed by the court, be paid by it to the collector of the district in which the seizure or forfeiture took place, as directed in the 89th section. The 91st section provides, that all fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered by virtue of the act (and not otherwise appropriated) "shall, after deducting all proper costs and charges, be disposed of as follows: one moiety shall be for the use of the United States, and be paid into the treasury thereof, by the collector receiving the same; the other moiety shall be divided between, and paid in equal proportions to, the collector, and naval officer of the district, and surveyor of the port, wherein the same shall have been incurred, or to such of the said officers as there may be in the said district; and, in districts where only one of the said officers shall have been established, the said moiety shall be given to such officer; provided, nevertheless, that, in all cases where such penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be recovered in pursuance of information given to such collector by any person other than the naval officer or surveyor of the district, the one-half of such moiety shall be given to such informer, and the remainder thereof shall be disposed of between the collector, naval officer, and surveyor, or surveyors, in manner aforesaid." The section then provides for a different distribution where any fines, forfeitures, or penalties incurred by virtue of the act are recovered in consequence of any information given by any officer of a revenue cutter. By the 7th section of the act of May 28, 1830 (4 Stat. 411), it is provided, that all forfeitures incurred under that act shall be distributed according to the provisions of the act of March 2, 1799. The 1st section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 738), provides that property forfeited under that section, or its value, shall be disposed of as other forfeitures for violations of the revenue laws. The act of 1846, which is the only act claimed to have been violated in the present case, contains no provision giving any share to any person of any forfeiture for a violation of that act, and no provision respecting the disposition of the proceeds of such forfeiture. I have been unable to find any provision by statute respecting the disposition of the proceeds of a forfeiture under the act of 1846, or respecting shares in the same except the provision in the act of 1867. The provisions of the act of 1799 refer solely to forfeitures for a breach of that act itself. The act of 1867, however, applies to the proceeds of all forfeitures incurred under the provisions of any laws relating to the customs. The act of 1846 is a law relating to the customs.

On comparing the provisions of the act of 1799 with those of the act of 1867, in the particulars above recited, the following results appear: In respect to the channel of distribution, by the former act, the court is to pay the net amount remaining, after the deduction of proper charges, to the collector of the district, and he is to "pay and distribute the same without delay, according to law;" by the latter act, it is not provided to whom the court shall pay the net amount, but it is provided that the net amount shall "be paid into the treasury of the United States, and distributed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury," in the proportions, and to the persons, designated by the act, the act not stating by whom it shall be paid into the treasury. The secretary of the treasury is required, by the latter act, to distribute the amount according to law, quite as much as the collector is required, by the former act, to distribute the amount according to law. The amount is required, by the former act, to be distributed under the direction of the collector, quite as much as it is required by the latter act to be distributed under the direction of the secretary of the treasury. The provision, in the latter act, that the secretary of the treasury shall prescribe all needful regulations to carry out and enforce the provisions of the act (the 2d and 3d sections of which relate to the seizure of books and papers in cases of fraud on the revenue, and to the enforcement of liens for freight on imported merchandise in the custody of officers of the customs), gives to the secretary no greater power, in respect to prescribing regulations in reference to the distribution of the proceeds of forfeitures, than the collector had in the same respect, under the former act, in subordination to his superior officers, or than the secretary himself had, under that act. The 4th section of the act of 1867 only repeals laws and parts of laws that are inconsistent with, or supplied by, the provisions of the act of 1867. In respect to forfeitures for breaches of the act of 1799, the provision of that act, which requires the payment by the court to the collector, of the net proceeds of such forfeitures, is not inconsistent with, or supplied by, any provision of the act of 1867.

In respect to such net proceeds, the proper construction of the act of 1867 is, that the court is still to pay to the collector, under the 89th and 90th sections of the act of 1799, the amount recovered, after deducting all proper charges allowed by the court. The collector is then to deduct, in proper cases, the amount representing duties, named in the act of 1867, and any other lawful charges, and is to pay the residue into the treasury of the United States. There is nothing, in the act of 1867, which takes away the right given to the collector, by the act of 1799, to receive from the court the proceeds of forfeitures for breaches of that act. So, also, with regard to forfeitures under the acts of 1830 and 1863, and under any other acts which adopt the mode of disposition of forfeitures prescribed by the act of 1799. In regard to the duties mentioned in the act of 1867, the collector is the proper person, and the only proper person, to ascertain the proper amount representing the duties, and it is impossible that that amount can be, as the act of 1867 requires, "credited in the accounts of the collector, as duties received," unless the collector receives the amount, so as to credit the United States with it in his accounts, as duties received. I think that the act of 1867 intends, that the collector shall receive from the court the whole amount, and not merely an amount equal to the duties. The act evidently recognizes the then existing practice, and assumes that the collector will receive from the court the proceeds, less the lawful charges and expenses which the court may allow to be deducted from the proceeds while in court, and in substance provides, that he shall ascertain the duties, if any, and retain them, and then, instead of distributing the balance himself, shall pay it into the treasury of the United States. And there is no reason for any different mode of procedure in the case of a forfeiture for a violation of the warehousing act of 1846, nor is there any thing in the act of 1867 to indicate that the collector is not to receive the proceeds of such a forfeiture. There may be duties to be ascertained and retained by the collector, in cases under the act of 1846, quite as much as in cases under the act of 1799, or under any other customs act. The effect of the change made by the act of 1867, in regard to the channel of distribution, is merely to substitute the treasury of the United States for the coffers of the collector, as a place of deposit for the money, when nothing is left to be done in regard to it but to distribute it, and to substitute the secretary of the treasury for the collector, as the ministerial agent of distribution. In regard to the distributees, both acts give the same quantum, one-half, to the United States; the act of 1799 divides the other half equally among the collector, the naval officer, and the surveyor, except that, where some person other than the naval officer or the surveyor is informer to the collector, such informer receives a moiety of such other half, and the other moiety thereof is divided equally among the collector, the naval officer and the surveyor; the act of 1867 gives one-fourth of the whole to the informer, and, if there be no informer other than the collector, the naval officer, or the surveyor, then to the officer making the seizure, and directs that the remaining one-fourth shall be equally divided among the collector, the naval officer, and the surveyor. Where an officer of a revenue cutter is the informer, the distributees and their shares are the same, under the two acts.

Such being the state of the law on this subject, and the money before named being in court, in this case, D. Henry Burtnett presents a petition to this court, setting forth that he is the person who gave the information which led to the recovery in this case; that he claims an interest, as informer, in said money; that five other persons, named Davis, Webster, Wiggin, Giles, and Hefflin, also claim to have given information of the character aforesaid, and claim to be informers herein; and that the petitioner has served notice of his claim, as such informer, on the collector and on the United States attorney. The prayer of the petition is, that the court will refer it to a commissioner of the court, to take proof of the facts, and of the respective claims and rights of the several persons claiming to be the informers herein, as such claimants, and report the same to this court, with his opinion thereon, as to who is or are the informer or informers herein. Notice of the presentation of the petition has been served on the United States attorney, and on the collector, and on the other persons named as claiming to be informers.

It is contended on the part of the petitioner, that the court has jurisdiction to determine the question, as to who is or are the person or persons entitled, as informer or informers, to share in the money. The attorney for the United States denies the jurisdiction of the court, and contends, that, under the act of 1867, the secretary of the treasury has the exclusive power to determine who is the informer.

On the part of the petitioner, it is urged that, independently of the act of 1867, the court has inherent jurisdiction to determine all claims to moneys which are in court, and that such jurisdiction is not taken away by the act of 1867; that, under the act of 1799, and kindred acts, it has always been held, by the courts of the United States, that they have jurisdiction to examine and decide contested claims to the proceeds of forfeitures under the act, while such proceeds are still in court, and to direct in what manner they shall be distributed; that, it having been so held in respect to the act of 1799, there is nothing in the act of 1867 taking away or affecting such jurisdiction; that the act of 1867 confers no authority on the secretary of the treasury to determine or adjudicate who the informer is, in case of a dispute; that, in such a case, a resort must be had to a proper judicial tribunal; that the secretary of the treasury has no judicial functions; and that the act of 1867 merely makes him, instead of the collector, the ministerial officer for paying over the money to such persons as the proper judicial tribunal declares are entitled to it under that act.

A similar question came before the circuit court of the United States for the district of New Jersey, in 1824, in the case of Westcot v. Bradford [Case No. 17,429]. In that case, there was a forfeiture decreed by the district court for New Jersey, of certain property, for violations of the act of 1799. While the proceeds of the forfeiture were in that court, Bradford presented to it a petition, setting forth, that the condemnation took place in pursuance of information given by him to the collector, and praying for the payment to him of the informer's share, one-quarter, given by the 91st section of the act. The district court made a decree, establishing the claim of Bradford, as informer, and directing that the money in court be paid to the then collector, to be disposed of by him as directed by the decree. The decree disposed, finally, of the whole fund remaining in court, as concerned all the parties interested in it—the United States, the collector who made the seizure, and the informer—leaving nothing to be done but to execute the decree. The collector appealed to the circuit court from the decree. The circuit court held, that the petition of Bradford was an original suit, from the decree in which an appeal would lie. An objection was taken, in the circuit court, to the power of the district court to direct a distribution of the proceeds of the forfeiture remaining in court. This objection was put on the ground, that the 89th section of the act of 1799, which authorized the collector to receive from the court, or its officer, the sums recovered, after deducting costs and charges, and enjoined upon him the duty of making the distribution, was imperative on the court, and ousted its general jurisdiction to make the distribution. But the court (Mr. Justice Washington delivering the opinion) held, that the 89th section merely pointed out the officer who was to receive the money from the court, and who was to distribute it, where no dispute existed respecting the distribution; that the jurisdiction of the court, to examine into contested claims to the money, while under its control, and to direct the collector in what manner it was to be distributed, was not taken away, or even impliedly affected; and that if, upon general principles, this could be questioned, the point was directly settled in the case of Jones v. Shore's Ex'rs, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 462. The decree of the district court was affirmed, so far as it directed how the funds in court should be distributed.

In the case of Jones v. Shore's Ex'rs the fund was in the circuit court, as the proceeds of a penalty or forfeiture, under the embargo act of December 22, 1807 (2 Stat. 451), and was required by the 6th section of the act of January 9, 1808 (Id. 454), to be distributed and accounted for in the manner prescribed by the act of 1799. A contest, as to shares in the fund, was brought before the circuit court. The case went to the supreme court, on a division of opinion. That court directed that the money in the circuit court be paid to the collector, with directions to him as to how he should distribute it. This was in 1816.

In the case of McLane v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 404, the supreme court say: "Where a sentence of condemnation has been finally pronounced, in a case of seizure, the court, as an incident to the possession of the principal cause, has a right to proceed to decree a distribution of the proceeds, according to the terms prescribed by law; and it is a familiar practice to institute proceedings of this nature, wherever a doubt occurs as to the rights of the parties who are entitled to share in the distribution." The same doctrine was held in The Josefa Segunda, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 312, 323, 324.

In Hooper v. Fifty-One Casks of Brandy [Case No. 6,674], the district court for Maine (Ware, J.) entertained the petition of an informer, for a share of the proceeds of a forfeiture, incurred under the act of 1799, the collector and surveyor being the adverse parties, and sustained the claim of the informer. The court, in its opinion, expressly upholds its jurisdiction, on the authority of the cases of Westcot v. Bradford and McLane v. U. S. [supra].

In the case of U. S. v. Fifty Thousand Cigars [Case No. 4,782], the district court for Massachusetts (Lowell, J.) entertained petitions filed by several persons claiming shares, as informers, in the proceeds, in court, of forfeitures incurred under the act of 1799, and made a decree that one of them was entitled, as informer, to one-fourth of the fund.

This jurisdiction being well established, there is nothing in the act of 1867 which takes it away, or which confers on the secretary of the treasury any more power to decide disputed claims to the fund than the collector had under the act of 1799. The judicial tribunal which has the custody of the fund, is the proper forum to entertain and decide disputes as to shares in the fund, and to direct how it shall be distributed, and to what persons, under the act of 1867, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, as a ministerial officer. To this end, it is proper to refer the matter to a commissioner of the court, for the taking of testimony on the part of all parties concerned, and for a report. On the coming in of the report, the court will make such decree as is warranted by the facts, in regard to the subject matter of the petition, and will direct the money to be paid over to the collector, and to be by him, subject to the provisions of the act of 1867, paid into the treasury of the United States, and to be then distributed, under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, to the persons, and in the proportions, prescribed by the decree of this court. The hearing before the commissioner will be on notice to all parties having any claim to the fund.

[Subsequently the controversy between the parties in regard to their respective rights to the fund in court was determined. Case No. 15,198.]

Case No. 15,198.

UNITED STATES v. GEORGE et al.

[6 Blatchf. 406.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 16, 1869.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FORFEITURES—DISTRIBUTION—AUTHORITY TO COMPROMISE—INFORMERS.

1. The proper course of practice, where claims are made by the United States, by customs' officers, and by informers, to a fund in court, paid in under the laws relating to the customs.

2. There is no statute of the United States which forfeits the value of dutiable goods which have been unlawfully removed from a bonded warehouse, without payment of the customs duties.

3. Customs' officers and informers are entitled to share only in fines, penalties, and forfeitures which are created by some law of the United States.

4. The authority to compromise, conferred on the secretary of the treasury by the tenth section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 740), is not an authority to compromise criminal prosecutions.

5. The authority so conferred, defined and explained.

6. The secretary of the treasury has no power, under any act of congress, to compromise criminal proceedings pending in court.

7. Duties are not simply a charge upon merchandise, to be collected only by means of the custody of the property, but are a personal debt against the importer, which may be collected by a civil action.

[Cited in U. S v. Boyd, 24 Fed. 691.]

8. Money in the registry of the court, which is shown to have been demanded by the United States as duties, to have been due as such, and to have been paid as such, must be distributed by the court as such.

9. The rights of customs' officers and informers are rights which should be carefully protected.

10. In a contest between informers, he is the informer, who, with the intention of having his information acted upon, first gives information of a violation of law, which induces the prosecution, and contributes to the recovery of the fine, penalty, or forfeiture which is eventually recovered.

This was a controversy between the customs' officers and certain informers on the one hand, and the United States on the other, and also between the informers, among themselves, in regard to the distribution of a certain fund, which originally consisted of $59,722 in gold, and $32,000 in currency, and which was paid into the registry of this court under the following circumstances: In the summer of 1867, the officers of the customs, having discovered that great frauds upon the government had been perpetrated by persons doing business in the city of New York, under the name of J. W. George & Co., by means of the withdrawal, without payment of duties, of dutiable merchandise, from their bonded warehouse, Nos. 290 and 291 West street, criminal proceedings were instituted against the offenders, in which several of them were arrested and held to bail for trial, and a civil action for duties, amounting to $400,000, was commenced in the district court, against one of them named Henry Hart, in which suit a large amount of real estate and personal property was attached. A quantity of segars, appraised at some $25,000, was also seized by the collector, as forfeited by reason of these frauds. Pressed by these proceedings, the offenders commenced negotiations with the officers of the government, which terminated in an agreement, made at Washington, with the secretary of the treasury, by which it was arranged that the offenders should pay to the United States the sum of $59,722 in gold, for the duties on the segars, brandy, rum, gin and wine withdrawn by them without payment of the duty, and also $32,000 in currency, as penalties for the illegal abstraction of such bonded merchandise; and that, upon such payment, the government should discharge all the property which had been attached or seized, and release the offenders from all civil and criminal liabilities relating to the illegal transactions. Accordingly, instructions were issued to the district attorney to carry into effect this arrangement, and the offenders proceeded to make the payment agreed on. This payment, however, by arrangement with the district attorney, was not made in the action for duties which was pending in the district court; but a new, and, in some sense, a friendly action of debt was commenced in this court, not for duties, but for penalties and forfeitures, amounting to the sum agreed on, namely, $59,722 in gold, and $32,000 in currency, in which action judgment was confessed on the same day, and the same was satisfied, on the payment into the registry of this court of the sums demanded. At the same time, the property attached in the action pending in the district court was released from custody, and all the criminal proceedings were stopped. The segars held under seizure by the collector were also directed to be released, on due entry and payment of the duties to the collector. There being thus $59,722 in gold, and $32,000 in currency, in the registry of this court, a controversy arose respecting the rights of the customs' officers and the informers in this fund, it being claimed, by the officers and the informers, that no part of it was duties, but that it was all penalties and forfeitures, and, as such, distributable, one-half to the government, one-fourth to the customs' officers, and one-fourth to the informers. [See Case No. 15,197.] A controversy also arose between the parties claiming to be the informers, in regard to their respective rights. One-half of the gold and one-half of the currency being clearly payable to the United States, was so paid, by consent, and one-half of the residue of the currency, admitted to be payable to the collector, was paid, by consent, thus leaving in the registry $29,861 in gold, and $8,000 in currency. To one-half of this $29,861 in gold the customs' officers laid claim, and the informers claimed the other half, as well as the balance of the currency. These several claims were set forth by petitions, under which, by order of the court, testimony in behalf of all the parties was taken by the clerk. Upon these petitions, and some 363 pages of testimony, with a mass of exhibits, the case now came before the court for its determination.

BENEDICT, District Judge. The course of procedure adopted in this matter appears to have been somewhat irregular. A more proper practice would have been, for the customs' officers and the informers to have set forth their claims to this fund by petitions, to which answers should have been interposed by the government, and, upon the issues thus framed, and the testimony adduced by the respective parties, in support of their allegations, a decree could have been rendered, with less danger of confusion and mistake. The respective parties petitioning here seem to have treated each petition as an answer to the others; and the customs' officers appear to have considered themselves entitled to prove their case under the petition presented by the United States. But, as all parties have spread out their case very fully in the evidence, and as all the points in controversy have been considered and argued by the counsel, without objection, as if duly pleaded, it appears unnecessary to direct the proceedings to be reformed.

In considering the questions thus presented, it will be convenient to examine, first, the claim made by the customs' officers and the informers to the portion of the fund consisting of $29,861 in gold. The claim in regard to this is, that the $59,722 in gold, of which the $29,861 remaining in the registry is a moiety, consisted of fines and penalties, and that a moiety of it is given by law to the customs' officers and informers; while, on the part of the United States, it is contended that the $59,722 was not fines and penalties, but duties, in which no person is entitled to share with the government.

The determination of this issue renders it necessary to consider, at the outset, the effect of the record of the judgment in favor of the United States, and against the offenders, which was entered on the 27th of December, 1867, and was satisfied upon the payment of this fund into the registry. This record, which it has been suggested, on this argument, must be conclusive in favor of the customs' officers and informers, would, as I view it, if held conclusive, deprive those persons of any right to any portion of this fund. This will appear from an examination of the record itself. The cause of action which the record sets forth, and which was admitted by the confession, is, that certain parties defendant unlawfully removed from the bonded warehouse dutiable goods, without payment of the duties, whereby, as it is averred, the value of the goods became forfeited to the United States, and the United States became entitled to have of the defendants $59,722 in gold, and $32,000 in currency. The record nowhere refers to any statute by virtue of which the alleged forfeiture arose, and no statute has been found which forfeits the value of goods for any such act as is set forth in the declaration, or which, upon the facts stated in the declaration, created a legal liability on the part of the defendants to pay to the United States this $59,722 in gold, and $32,000 in currency. Customs' officers and informers can claim to share only in fines, penalties, and forfeitures which are created by some law of the United States. If no statute exists, by virtue of which any particular sum of money, whether called a fine, a penalty, or a forfeiture, has been demanded and paid, no customs' officer or informer can share in the money. Here was no forfeiture of goods, for, no goods subject to forfeiture were proceeded against. The segars which were seized by the collector were released, without any other condition than that they should be duly entered, and the duties be paid; and the illegal acts charged in the declaration did not render the parties liable in a civil action, under any law of the United States, to such fines and penalties as were demanded. It may be that the $32,000 in currency, which formed part of the demand, can be held to be thirty-two fines of $1,000 each, incurred by virtue of the act of August 6, 1846 (9 Stat. 53), and that portion of the fund has been so treated by the government. But this would not affect the $59,722 in gold, which is now under consideration. If, then, the record alone were to be looked to as fixing the rights of the parties, it would seem to confer no right upon the customs' officers and informers to a distributive share of the gold in the registry. This difficulty has been realized on this proceeding, and, accordingly, the customs' officers and informers have not rested their claims upon the record of the judgment alone, but have, without objection on the part of the government, introduced much testimony to show the real nature of the claims made by the government against the offenders. The case being thus opened, evidence has been also introduced by the United States, tending to show the circumstances under which this money was demanded and paid. This evidence, therefore, thus introduced by the respective petitioners, and which discloses the actual liabilities which the parties who paid this money were under to the United States, and from which they sought to be discharged by the payment which they made, must be considered in connection with the record, in determining the character of the fund in question, and the rights of the parties to share therein. It is proper to say here, that, if the course of this proceeding had been otherwise, and the judgment entered on the 27th of December, 1867, had been relied upon as decisive of the character of this fund, it would, doubtless, have been incumbent upon the court—called on, as this court is by this proceeding, to distribute a fund in its registry—to require a fuller explanation than has yet been given of the circumstances under which that judgment was taken. On this argument, it has been treated by the counsel for the government as an inadvertence, and, perhaps, properly so treated; but, it is such an inadvertence as to require full explanation before I should feel justified in disposing of this large amount of money in accordance with its terms.

Looking, then, into the evidence as it has been given, it appears, that certain parties, doing business under the name of J. W. George & Co., perpetrated frauds upon the government, by removing for consumption, dutiable goods from a bonded warehouse, without payment of the duties; that criminal proceedings were commenced against them, and also a civil suit to recover some $400,000 of duties, in which suit a large amount of property was attached; that, thereupon, the offenders applied to the secretary of the treasury for relief, and then, plainly and deliberately, admitted themselves to be liable to the government for duties amounting to $59,722 in gold, which they promised to pay, together with the sum of $32,000, as thirty-two penalties for as many unlawful withdrawals, which they also admitted to have been made by them; and that, thereupon, the secretary agreed that all the parties implicated should be released from all civil and criminal liability relating to the transactions in which they had been engaged, upon the payment of such duties and penalties. In pursuance of this agreement, the parties did pay into the registry of this court the $59,722 in gold, and the $32,000 in currency, in question; and all the pending civil and criminal proceedings, were thereupon stopped by the district attorney. But the payment, instead of being made in the proceedings, pending at the time of the agreement with the secretary, was made in satisfaction of a judgment confessed by them in a friendly action, which they suggested should be commenced, as affording them a more satisfactory evidence of the payment of the money which they had agreed with the secretary to pay.

Upon the evidence, it is claimed, on the part of the government, that the agreement made by the secretary was a compromise made by virtue of the 10th section of the act of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 740), and, therefore, decisive of the character of the fund realized in pursuance of it. To this view I do not assent. The authority, conferred by the act referred to, is an extraordinary power, which the interests of the secretary of the treasury, as well as those of the government, require to be carefully guarded against abuse. The statute, therefore, confines the power to the compromise of claims in favor of the United States, and confers no power at all in regard to criminal prosecutions. It looks, also, to the attorney of the government, in charge of the claim, as the proper place of origin for arrangements looking to a compromise, and might well be held to confer no power in regard to claims not in suit; and it requires, as the basis, and the only legal basis, of action on the part of the secretary, a report of the attorney of the government, showing in detail the condition of the claim, and the terms of compromise proposed, and also showing the approval of the terms by the attorney. It also requires, in addition, that the solicitor of the treasury shall recommend the acceptance of the terms. The act thus provides for the creation and preservation of a complete record of all cases of compromise, showing the transaction in detail; and the voluntary assent of three different officials to the terms of any compromise which it is proposed to accept, is required to make it effective. Under the statute, the action of the secretary is confined to the acceptance or rejection of the terms recommended by the attorney. Here, the terms agreed to by the secretary were never reported or recommended by the district attorney, and the action of the secretary must, therefore, be held to be without sanction of law, and of no effect as a legal compromise. The present case, in which it is claimed by the government, that the recommendation, by the district attorney, of terms requiring a less sum than that finally agreed on with the secretary, warranted the secretary, under the statute, in accepting terms deemed more favorable, affords a good illustration of the result of any other than a strict adherence to the provisions of the act. For, it seems, as I understand the figures, that the terms agreed upon by the secretary, although apparently less favorable to the offenders than those recommended by the district attorney, were, in fact, more favorable, and the sum realized was several thousands of dollars less than the parties themselves had offered to the district attorney.

While considering the action of the secretary in making this compromise, I feel bound to notice another prominent feature in it, which is, that the secretary undertook to compromise the criminal proceedings which were pending in court. Neither the act of March 3, 1863, nor any other act that I know of, confers that power on the secretary of the treasury. The solicitor of the treasury may, perhaps, have power, in a proper case, and upon his own official responsibility, to instruct a district attorney to effect a discontinuance of a criminal prosecution, for offences arising under the revenue laws; but I know of no statute which permits either the secretary or the solicitor to demand money of a person accused of crime, in consideration of causing a criminal prosecution to cease, although the money may be demanded for the United States, as was the case here. Civil suits for penalties and forfeitures may be compromised or remitted by the secretary, in the manner prescribed by law; but I apprehend, that neither the power to determine the extent of punishment to be inflicted in a criminal proceeding, nor the pardoning power, has been entrusted to the secretary or the solicitor, or the collector. The action of the secretary, in regard to the criminal proceedings pending against John W. George, Henry Hart, and others, was, therefore, of no legal or binding effect whatever; and his action in regard to the civil suits against the same parties was unauthorized, for want of compliance with the conditions which the statute imposes upon his power of remission and of compromise. But, while the agreement made by the secretary has no effect, as a legal compromise, to determine the character of the fund in question, the admissions of the parties, made to the secretary, during the negotiation which ended in the agreement, are competent and very controlling evidence to show the liabilities of the parties to the government, and the real character of the fund which they subsequently paid in discharge of their liabilities. These admissions, with other uncontradicted evidence in the case, show, that the parties who paid this $59,722 in gold, were legally liable to the government, for duties upon segars and liquors, amounting to that sum. This cannot be disputed as to $34,834.50 of the amount; for, Henry Hart was the importer of segars on which the duties had been duly ascertained and assessed at that sum, and which he withdrew without payment of any duty. As to the remainder, being duties charged on rum, gin, brandy and wine, although the custom-house officials seem to have had difficulty in tracing the articles, the secretary had thirty-two orders on the bonded warehouse for certain specified withdrawals of such liquors, which were signed by these same parties, which quantities, it is proved, they withdrew without payment of the duties. The appraisers and other officers of the custom-house declare, that neither the records of the custom-house, nor the orders, nor both together, enable any one to say what amount of duties has been lost; but there is evidence tending to show withdrawals of liquors by these parties from this warehouse, without payment of the duties. This evidence, with the admissions of the parties as to the amount, is sufficient to show that this is not a case of simply calling a sum duties, which was, in reality, penalties, as has been contended, but that an actual legal liability to the government for duties existed, the exact amount of which the parties admitted and promised to pay.

It is said, that there could be no legal liability for duties, because no duties can be "collected, levied, and paid," as duties, unless the merchandise is in the possession and control of the government; that, as soon as property is fraudulently withdrawn, the power to collect duties ceases, and fines, penalties, and forfeitures are imposed. But the law is otherwise. Duties are not simply a charge upon the merchandise, to be collected only by means of the custody of the property. They are also a personal charge against the importer—a debt created by law, which may be collected by a civil action, wholly irrespective of the possession and custody of the goods. United States v. Lyman [Case No. 15,647]. Here, segars, on which the duty was $34,834.50, were actually imported by these parties, who were liable, as importers, for such duties, and who discharged that liability by the payment of the fund in question, while the liquors were bought by them in bond, subject to duties, sufficient in amount, as they themselves admitted, to make up the balance of the $59,722, and which they became liable to pay when they withdrew the merchandise for consumption, as they subsequently did.

Again, it is said that there was no liability for duties, so far as the liquors were concerned, because these goods had been taken out of the bonded warehouse on bonds to deliver them to a manufacturing warehouse, whereby the right to duties was lost; and that the only subsisting liability was for damages upon the bonds. But the evidence shows, quite plainly, that the ostensible transfer to the manufacturing warehouse, which was owned by these same parties, was simply a cover for the fraud. The real intention of the parties, when the goods were bought, was to withdraw them and put them upon the market, without payment of duties; and that intention was successfully carried out, by means of an ostensible transfer to the manufacturing warehouse. The whole was one single connected enterprise, namely, the withdrawal of these dutiable goods for consumption, without payment of the duties. Furthermore, if this $59,722 in gold be not duties, what is it? It is said to be penalties prescribed by the act of August 6, 1846. But, the penalties prescribed by that act are a fine of $5,000, or imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, and a penalty of $1,000 for opening the warehouse, and getting access to the goods, in the absence of the custom-house officer. If the latter penalty was ever incurred by these parties, which is by no means clearly shown, it forms the portion of the fund consisting of the $32,000 in currency, and is not the gold. Besides, what act prescribes a penalty in gold?

But, the fund in court is said to be a single amount, paid by virtue of the duress of the civil and criminal proceedings, and, therefore, no part of it duties. An exaction, not based on a legal liability, paid to avoid the exposure and punishment likely to follow a criminal prosecution, is what is characteristically termed, in common parlance, "hush-money." If such were the character of this fund, it would not avail the customs' officers and informers, for, they are, by law, entitled to a certain share of lawful fines, penalties, and forfeitures, imposed and collected by virtue of provisions of law. No statute gives them any right to any portion of irregular exactions. But, to suppose the secretary of the treasury, or the solicitor, or the district attorney, to have consented to such an exaction from offenders like these, is to impute a gross dereliction. No such supposition is necessary to determine the character of this gold, for the evidence sufficiently shows that it was demanded as duties, was due as such, and was so paid. It must, accordingly, be distributed as such.

In dismissing this branch of the case, I may properly add, that the action of the secretary of the treasury, in making the agreement which he did with these offenders, and which was severely criticised, on the argument, as an attempt to deprive the customs' officers and the informers of their legal rights, does not appear to me to be capable of such a construction. If such an intention were disclosed by the proofs, it would receive no support at the hands of this court; for, the rights which the law gives to informers and to customs' officers, in order to insure a better enforcement of the revenue laws, are rights which are entitled to be carefully protected, both by officials and courts. I discover no such intention, in the action of the secretary, but only an effort to obtain for the government as great a portion of the duties legally due to it as was possible by the method adopted. Whether a vigorous prosecution of the civil action for the $400,000 of duties supposed to have been lost, and a proper criminal punishment of the offenders for their crimes, together with an enforcement of the forfeitures incurred, would not have been a method more likely to secure obedience to the law in future, is, perhaps, open to question. It may be that such a course would have realized, in addition to these duties, a larger amount of penalties and forfeitures than the $32,000 which was paid. But the abandonment by the officers of the government of the prosecutions for penalties and forfeitures, although it may have been irregular or injudicious, can have no effect to change the character of a payment of duties, which is shown to have been made in discharge of a subsisting liability for such duties. My conclusion, upon this branch of the case, is, therefore, that the customs' officers and the informers have failed to show themselves entitled to a distributive share of the $29,861 in gold, now in the registry.

It remains only to determine who are the informers entitled to the $8,000 in currency, which has been substantially conceded to be penalties distributable to the informers, the other one-quarter of the $32,000 in currency having been paid over to the collector, as penalties in which he was entitled to share. The persons claiming to be the informers are J. W. Wiggin, D. H. Burtnett, and J. W. Hefflin, on the one hand, who claim one-quarter of the whole amount of penalties; and E. D. Webster, Rodman G. Moulton, and John S. Beecher, on the other. The latter persons do not present, for the decision of the court, any issue between themselves, but have consented that whatever may be found payable to any of them shall be paid to the attorney who represents them all. They do, however, dispute the right of Wiggin, Burtnett, and Hefflin, to any share as informers. I have examined with care the voluminous evidence bearing upon this question, and, while I am satisfied that Wiggin procured valuable evidence, and Burtnett and Hefflin evidence still more important, tending to make out a strong case against the offenders, without which, indeed, it is doubtful whether any considerable sum would have been recovered from them, and, although it seems to me not consistent with justice that Burtnett, who spent much time, and expended some money, in ferreting out the details of the fraud, and in finding the property, which was attached as the property of Henry Hart, should receive no reward, still I am unable to adjudge either Wiggin or Burtnett or Hefflin to be legally entitled to share in this fund, as informer. Their action cannot be said to have induced the prosecutions which were instituted. The fraud was discovered by others, proceedings were commenced in pursuance of that information, and the clue to the parties was obtained before either Wiggin or Burtnett or Hefflin gave any information. What they did was to furnish evidence tending strongly to confirm the truth of the statements of the informers. The informer is he who, with the intention of having his information acted upon, first gives information of a violation of law, which induces the prosecution, and contributes to the recovery of the fine, penalty, or forfeiture, which is eventually recovered. Sawyer v. Steele [Case No. 12,406]; City Bank v. Bangs, 2 Edw. Ch. 95, 105; Lancaster v. Walsh, 4 Mees. & W., 16. In the present case, information had been given of the frauds, upon which positive and effective action was taken, and which contributed to the recovery of the $32,000, a considerable period before either Wiggin or Burtnett or Hefflin gave any information at all; and such first informers, who were Webster, Moulton, and Beecher, are the legal informers, entitled to the informer's share of this fund.

In accordance with these views, a decree must be entered adjudging that E. D. Webster, Rodman G. Moulton, and John S. Beecher, are entitled, as informers, to the $8,000 in currency, in the registry, and that the United States are entitled to the $29,861 in gold.

Case No. 15,199.

UNITED STATES v. GEORGE et al.

[3 Dill. 431;[1] 2 Cent. Law J. 77; 22 Pittsb. Leg. J. 103.]

Circuit Court, D. Minnesota. 1874.

ACTION ON RECOGNIZANCE—AUTHORITY TO TAKE—REQUISITES OF DECLARATION.

1. Leave by the trial court to the plaintiff to amend his declaration upon a forfeited recognizance given in a criminal proceeding, held not to be erroneous.

2. Where a recognizance contains the usual provision that the party shall appear to answer to a particular charge "and not depart said court without leave thereof," it seems not to be essential to its validity that it shall on its face describe the particular offense with which the party is accused.

[Cited in State v. Edgerton, 12 R. I. 106.]

3. The recognizance in suit held to describe the particular offense with sufficient certainty.

4. In a proceeding upon a recognizance by declaration instead of scire facias, it is not necessary where the officer taking it has jurisdiction over cases of the general description named in the recognizance to aver the existence of the particular facts, which establish that the officer had authority to take it; following People v. Kane, 4 Denio, 530, and State v. Grant, 10 Minn. 39 [Gil. 22].

Error to the district court [of the United States for the district of Minnesota].

The action in the district court was upon a recognizance entered into by the plaintiffs in error as the sureties of one Hiram George, in the sum of $5,000, before by I. N. Cardozo, Esq. a commissioner for the circuit court for the district of Minnesota.

The condition of the recognizance appears in the following opinion of NELSON, District Judge, in the district court, on demurrer to the petition:

This action is brought on a recognizance entered into before a commissioner of the United States circuit court, by which Hiram George, as principal, Wm. H. Grant and Francis X. Brosseau, acknowledged that they owe the United States five thousand dollars upon the condition "that the said Hiram George shall be and appear at the district court of the United States, to be holden at Winona, in said district, on the first Monday of June, A. D. 1869, to answer to such matters and things as shall be objected to him on behalf of the United States for unlawfully, falsely and deceitfully uttering and publishing as true, certain false, forged and counterfeited writings for the purpose of defrauding the United States, then and there knowing the same to be false, forged and counterfeited, and not depart said court without leave thereof," &c. It is alleged in the declaration that the recognizance was filed for record, and that at the June term of the court, 1869, on the first day thereof, the defendant was called to appear, but that he failed to do so, and a default was entered against all the parties. A demurrer was filed by the defendants. The point presented by the demurrer and relied upon by the counsel for the defendants is, that no offense is charged in the recognizance over which this court can take jurisdiction.

The statute (14 Stat. 12) enacts "that if any person or persons shall utter and publish as true, any false, forged, altered or counterfeited bond, bill * * * or other writing, for the purpose of defrauding the United States, knowing the same to be false, forged, altered, or counterfeited, every such person shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and shall be punished," &c. The commissioner, in the recognizance, has followed the language of the statute without particularly setting forth the kind of writing with which the accused intended to defraud the government. The intent being the gravamen of the charge, and a necessary ingredient of the crime, the authority of the commissioner to act is apparent from the instrument; the offense is set forth with sufficient clearness to enable the accused to ascertain the principal charge he was expected to meet, and greater nicety in setting out the offense was, to say the least, discretionary; it was not required in the warrant of arrest, would have been unnecessary in the mittimus, and no good reason can be urged why it should be any more minutely described in the recognizance. In warrants of arrest some eminent criminal writers have claimed that it was unnecessary to set out the charge or offense at all, and none have deemed it necessary to set forth the offense alleged against the party with more than convenient certainty. The same rule would apply to the recognizance, and enough should be set out to show jurisdiction; no greater certainty is required. The case of U. S. v. Hand [Case No. 15,296], cited by the counsel for the defendants, is not inconsistent with the views laid down by us in regard to statutory offenses. In that case the defendants entered into a recognizance upon the condition "to answer a charge of wilful and corrupt conspiracy for burning the steamboat Martha Washington on the Mississippi river." It is an offense against the laws of the United States to enter into a conspiracy to burn a steamboat with intent to injure certain underwriters. The court sustained the demurrer on the ground that no offense could be committed over which the federal courts had jurisdiction, unless the conspiracy to burn had been entered into with intent to injure the persons named in the act of congress creating and defining the crime. The intent in the case before us is a necessary element of the offense, and is fully set forth in the recognizance. Without the allegation that the uttering and publishing as true, was with the fraudulent intent specified in the statute, no crime would have been set out. Any writing, without reference to its character, when uttered and published with the intent specified in the act of congress, will subject the party to a criminal prosecution under this statute (14 Stat. 12). So under the act of congress considered by the court in U. S. v. Hand [supra], it was not the name of the steamboat that entered into the offense created by the statute, but the intent with which the conspiracy was entered into.

Upon this view of the case I think the demurrer should be overruled, with leave to plead in twenty days.

On the overruling of this demurrer the defendants pleaded that at the time of making the recognizance the said Hiram George was unlawfully imprisoned by the said Cardozo and others in collusion with him, in the common jail, and was there unlawfully kept and detained until the said recognizance was executed to procure the release of the principal from such wrongful imprisonment. Issue was taken on this plea, and the case was by stipulation tried to the court, who found that the bond was not procured in the manner pleaded, and gave judgment against the defendants for the amount of the recognizance. To reverse this judgment, the sureties in the recognizance prosecute this writ of error.

Masterson & Simons, for plaintiffs in error.

Wm. W. Billson, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. 1. The recognizance in this case was sought to be enforced by a complaint or declaration, and thereto the defendants first pleaded, in effect, nul tiel record, and on this plea the cause was tried before the court, and after its submission the court "ordered that the plaintiff have until the first day of the next term to amend its complaint, and upon failure to do so that judgment be entered in favor of the defendants."

The action of the court permitting the plaintiff to amend the declaration is assigned as error. The record does not state that any exception to this ruling of the court was taken, and there is nothing to show that the court improperly allowed the declaration to be amended.

2. An amended declaration having been filed, the defendants demurred thereto, substantially on the ground that no offense is stated in the recognizance over which the court can take jurisdiction. The demurrer was overruled, and this ruling is now assigned as error. This objection assumes that it is essential to the validity of a recognizance that it shall specify or describe the particular offense with which the principal cognizor is charged—a proposition which I do not decide, though I do not wish to be understood as conceding it to be sound. It is perhaps sufficient that the papers filed in the principal case or proceeding, and the entries of record therein, show that the recognizance is one taken by a competent court or officer in a proceeding properly commenced, and within the jurisdiction of the tribunal or magistrate taking the obligation. State v. Randolph, 22 Mo. 474, and authorities cited. The recognizance in suit contains, inter alia, a provision that the principal should "not depart from said court without leave thereof," the effect of which, according to Hawkins (Hawk. Pl. C. bk. 2, c. 15, § 84), whose language is approved in the last case cited, is that the party shall not only appear and answer the particular charge, but also "be forthcoming and ready to answer to any other information exhibited against him while he continued not discharged." See, also, People v. Stager, 10 Wend. 431; Champlain v. People, 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 81.

I believe there are cases in this country holding that such a provision does not dispense with the necessity of the recognizance describing the particular charge for which the party is to answer, but I do not care to enter upon this inquiry, because, conceding for the purposes of this case, that the special offense must be described in the recognizance, my judgment is that in the case before me it is described with sufficient certainty. The reasons for this view are very satisfactorily stated in the opinion of the district judge in whose conclusion I fully concur, and whose judgment will be found supported by the following cases: State v. Randolph, supra; State v. Rogers (horse stealing), 36 Mo. 138; State v. Marshall (seduction), 21 Iowa, 144; Besimer v. People, 15 Ill. 439; Browder v. State, 9 Ala. 58; Hall v. State, Id. 827; Com. v. Nye, 7 Gray, 316; People v. Blankman, 17 Wend. 252; State Treasurer v. Bishop, 39 Vt. 353.

3. The next assignment of error is that the recognizance on its face, or in connection with facts stated in the declaration, does not show that the commissioner had any jurisdiction or authority to take it. And in argument it is insisted that it does not appear by the recognizance or such parts of the record as are before the court that the offense was committed by George within the district, or when committed, etc. It is not necessary that these circumstances should be shown on the face of the recognizance. In New York, where the proceeding is by declaration instead of scire facias, it has been expressly decided that in such a declaration it is not necessary to aver the special facts showing the officer had authority to take the recognizance in the particular case. People v. Kane, 4 Denio, 530; Champlain v. People, 2 Comst. [2 N. Y.] 81; and these cases have been expressly approved by the supreme court of Minnesota, as applicable to the proceedings in this state as to admitting offenders to bail. State v. Grant, 10 Minn. 39, 48 [Gil. 22]; U. S. v. Rundlett [Case No. 16,208]; U. S. v.

Horton [Id. 15,393]; Furgison v. State, 4 G. Greene, 302.

As none of the assignments of error are well taken, the judgment of the district court must be affirmed. Affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. The GEORGE DARBY.

[26 Law Rep. 566.]

District Court, S. D. New York. June, 1864.

SHIPPING — REGULATIONS — PROCEEDING ON VOYAGE.

A vessel has not proceeded or departed on her voyage, within the provisions of acts of congress of July 13, 1861 [12 Stat. 255], and May 20, 1862 [Id. 404], and the rules and regulations of the secretary of the treasury supplementary thereto, until she is outside the limits of the harbor of her port of departure.

In admiralty.

Mr. Smith, Dist. Atty., and Mr. Lowrey, for the United States.

Webster & Craig, for the vessel.

BETTS, District Judge. The collector of the port, on Sept. 26, 1863, seized the above vessel and cargo, anchored in the harbor, having commenced to depart from this port, destined on a voyage to Beaufort, N. C. The next day a libel of information was filed against the vessel and cargo in the cause, demanding the forfeiture of the vessel and cargo, and their condemnation to the use of the United States, because of the violation of the acts of congress of July 13, 1861, and May 20, 1862 (12 Stat. 257 and 404), and the proclamations of the president of Aug. 16, 1861 [Id. 1262], and May 12, 1862 [Id. 1263], and the rules and regulations of the secretary of the treasury of May 12, 16, and 23, and of Aug. 28, 1862. The Atlantic Navigation Company, a corporation established by the laws of the state of New York, intervened by their secretary and filed their answer and claim to the suit against the vessel, Oct. 1, 1862, claiming to be her true and bona fide owners, and taking an issue of general denial to all the charges inculpating the vessel in the matters alleged against her, the owners of the vessel not being owners of or claiming any interest in the cargo. Various parties, asserting interests in the property and merchandise laden on board, also intervened and filed claims and answers in full defence of the action implicating the cargo seized with the vessel.

The various issues were brought before the court for hearing in the December term of 1863, and were proceeded with for the prosecution and defence during five successive days, fully occupied in giving parol and documentary evidence, and in submitting oral arguments thereon, the counsel for the respective parties reserving the privilege also of supplying further explanations and discussions upon the entire controversy by written briefs and arguments. The last of these papers were delivered to the court during the March and April terms of the present year. On the final submission of the case, however, it was agreed between the parties that the decision of the court should be limited to the issue with the vessel alone, without affecting the claimants of the cargo or of the government in that branch of the suit affecting the cargo, the counsel for those claimants withdrawing themselves, with the consent of the United States attorney, from taking part in the issue in respect to the culpability of the vessel.

There seems to be no ground of controversy upon the proofs that the claimants of the vessel were, at the time the voyage was undertaken, bona fide owners of the vessel; that the port of Beaufort, in the state of North Carolina, though territorially within the enemy's country, was, under the statutes and regulations, in force in this respect, open and free to the lawful commerce of the United States in vessels duly cleared and licensed in the United States; that this vessel had been in proper form cleared and licensed at the custom-house at this port for the voyage intended to be made at the time hence to that port, and that the cargo discovered upon the vessel, and alleged to be contraband of war and unlawfully placed there, was laden on board without the actual knowledge of or notice to the claimants or their agents of any illegal or irregular act on the part of the vessel in respect thereto, other than what the clearance and permit granted the vessel at the custom-house at this port, previous to her effort to leave the port on her intended voyage, may have imported in contemplation of law. The gravamen of the charges against the vessel was, first, that she was carrying as part of her lading articles contraband of war; and secondly, that she was proceeding from this port to Beaufort, in violation of the provisions of the statute before referred to, as supplemented by the regulations of the treasury department, which are co-operating with the said statutes as an entire enactment.

The gist of the defence, except in the particular of fact, that the voyage complained of had not actually been entered upon and commenced when the vessel and cargo were seized, rests upon the proposition of law set up by the claimants, that the acts alleged to have been committed by the vessel were not unlawful, within any provision of the existing law. A succinct and connected statement of the terms of the acts of July 13, 1861, and May 12, 1862, together with the regulations appointed by the secretary of the treasury, will exhibit a satisfactory exposition of the purport of the enactments governing the subject in question. The act of July 13, 1861 (section 5), enacts that all commercial intercourse by and between the inhabitants of any state in a state of insurrection and those of the rest of the United States, shall cease and be unlawful so long as such condition of hostility shall continue, and all goods and merchandise coming from said states into the others by land or water, and all proceeding to the same, together with the vessel or vehicle conveying the same, shall be forfeited to the United States. The act of May 20, 1862, authorizes regulations to be adopted by the secretary of the treasury with respect to the transportation of goods from any foreign or domestic port for the use of the insurgents, those regulations having the same sanction and force as statutory enactments. The rules and regulations prescribed by the secretary of the treasury, admitted by the counsel for the claimants on the trial to be legally authenticated, were issued by the department in May and August, 1862, and are made in the libel of information substantive grounds of charge against the vessel in this suit. The true import of the act of May 20, 1862, is to empower the secretary of the treasury to apply by his regulations conditions to the trade to be after permitted with insurrectionary ports, of the same efficiency as if imposed by direct legislation of congress. And accordingly, violations of the rules restrictive of such trade are subject to like penalties as if the regulation was one of direct and positive legislation. But the overt acts, made criminal by the acts of congress referred to in the libel of information in the cause, are those of actual trading or intercourse with the ports or citizens and inhabitants of insurrectionary places, or the proceeding or departure of vessels to carry into effect such intercourse or trading. The libel nowhere alleges that the purpose and intention to carry on commercial intercourse at Beaufort, or with the rebels, or to supply them with articles contraband of war, in the contemplated voyage, subject the vessel to condemnation and forfeiture. The libel does not aver the purpose and intention per se of the owners of the vessel to prosecute an unlawful commercial intercourse with the enemy, or supply them with articles contraband of war, were a criminal offence, subjecting the vessel to forfeiture. The allegations are, that the ship is now at the port of New York, and was there seized as forfeited to the United States, "for proceeding to a state declared to be in insurrection against the United States, in violation of the acts of congress and regulations of the secretary of the treasury," &c. If the preparation of the vessel for the voyage she purposed performing was in violation of the regulations of the secretary of the treasury, or the provisions of the act of congress, it is not made by the libel the gravamen of the offence alleged to have been committed by her. The libel charges that "the said George Darby and cargo are forfeited to the United States for proceeding to a state," &c. The vessel was seized and detained in the harbor immediately after leaving her dock, and in the open body of the harbor. The blow was struck when the criminal act was under premeditation and fully resolved upon, perhaps, mentally by the accused party, so that the guilty deed was morally accomplished; but it yet lacked that physical perpetration necessary to constitute the derelictum which only is cognizable by civil law. The government detectives, who sedulously supervised in secret the outfitting of the vessel in this port, and watched every step in her preparation, were obviously cautioned that she could not be interfered with whilst moored in the harbor, and waited until she cast off from her dock to arrest her in the act of violating the law "in proceeding" from this port to Beaufort. The arrest of the vessel was virtually concomitant with her casting off from her moorings, as the seizing officers went immediately on board her, and she was brought to anchor immediately by their orders, and prevented from departing from this port or "proceeding" upon such undertaking.

The propositions of fact insisted on by the libellants are, in substance, that the liquors taken on board the vessel were contraband of war, and that permits and licenses therefor were fraudulently and evasively obtained at the custom-house, so as to make the clearances and permits therefor legally void; and that the vessel was seized proceeding on a voyage from this port to Beaufort, with a view to commercial intercourse there, in violation of the act of congress referred to, she not having obtained a lawful permit therefor.

The claimants contest these positions of fact and law, denying that the vessel, when arrested, was proceeding on the voyage alleged, or that she was lawfully seizable in this port on the allegations contained in the libel; that the cordial laden on board her was contraband of war, or that the ship was responsible for the liquor admitted on board under the permit of the custom-house, and insisting that neither the law nor the regulations of the treasury department make the vessel responsible for the liquors found on board of her.

I think the decision of the supreme court in the case of The Active, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 100, establishes the principle that the action of the schooner in this case, at anchor or in motion within the harbor, under way, with a view of pursuing a voyage to Beaufort, was not a proceeding or departure within the interdiction of the law, and does not authorize her arrest in this case. The vessel was not, in judgment of law, proceeding to the port of Beaufort in violation of law, until she had gone out of the port of New York. There had accordingly no right of action accrued in the case when the vessel was attached by warrant, and the libel must be dismissed.

Case No. 15,202.

UNITED STATES v. GEORGETOWN BRIDGE CO.

[3 Cranch, C. C. 369.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1828.

HIGHWAYS—REPAIRS.

The Georgetown Bridge Company is bound to keep in repair the road leading from Georgetown to the little falls bridge, notwithstanding the act of congress of the 13th of July, 1813 [3 Stat. 12], "to incorporate a company for making a certain turnpike-road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia."

Presentment against "the Georgetown Bridge Company for not keeping in repair the road leading from Georgetown to the little falls bridge." By the act of Maryland of 1791 (chapter 81), a company was incorporated, by the name of "The Georgetown Bridge Company," "to erect a bridge over the river Patowmack at or near Georgetown." This act says nothing of a road. By the act of Maryland of 1795 (chapter 44), the Georgetown Bridge Company is authorized "to open a road not exceeding sixty feet in width, from Georgetown to a bridge to be erected over the river Patowmack at or near the little falls;" and by the 2d section it is declared, "that the said road shall be a public highway forever, and kept in repair by said company." The road was opened accordingly, and the bridge erected. By the act of congress of July 13, 1813 (3 Stat. 12), "to incorporate a company for making a certain turnpike-road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia," a company was incorporated by the name of "The Georgetown and Leesburgh Turnpike Company," "for the purpose of opening, gravelling, and improving a road in the counties of Washington and Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, from the intersection of Falls street and Water street, in the town of Georgetown, to the boundary line of the District of Columbia, in the most direct and practicable route towards Leesburgh, conforming as nearly as shall be found advantageous and convenient, to the present main road leading from the said intersection towards Leesburgh, and through the counties of Washington and Alexandria as aforesaid." By the 5th section, commissioners were to be appointed, who were required, upon the request of the president and directors of the company, to "cause to be surveyed, laid out and ascertained, described and marked, by certain metes and bounds, the aforesaid turnpike-road, described in the first section of this act, not less than sixty feet in breadth, in such routes, tracts, or courses for the same respectively, as, in the best of their judgment, will combine shortness of distance with the most convenient ground, and the smallest expense of money." "And the said commissioners, upon completing the said survey of the said road, shall return a plat and certificate of such survey to the said clerk" (of the circuit court for the county of Washington), "and the same, being accepted by the said court, shall be recorded by the said clerk; and thereupon the said road, so laid out, shall be taken, used, and occupied as a turnpike-road and public highway forever." By the 11th section it is enacted, "That it shall be the duty of the said corporation to keep the said road in good repair; and if, in neglect of their said duty, the said corporation shall, at any time, suffer the said road to be out of repair so as to be unsafe or inconvenient for passengers, the said corporation shall be liable to be prosecuted," &c. The commissioners under this act surveyed and laid out a road from the bridge to the boundary line of the District, towards Leesburgh, but not from Georgetown to the bridge; and this company never made that part of the road, nor expended any money upon it.

Mr. Coxe, for defendants, moved the court to quash the presentment, and contended that as, by the act of congress incorporating the Georgetown and Leesburgh Turnpike Company, that company had a right to make the old road a turnpike, the defendants were relieved from the duty of keeping it in repair.

Mr. Swann, for the United States. There is no inconsistency in the two acts. The new company was not bound to occupy the old road as a turnpike, and could not so occupy it unless surveyed, and the survey returned to and accepted by the court. They could demand toll only upon that part of the road which was so surveyed. The old road was a privilege granted for the benefit of the bridge, and without which the bridge would be of no use to the public, or benefit to the proprietors.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to quash the presentment.

An indictment was afterwards sent up to the grand jury, who returned it ignoramus.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1834.

ROBBERY ON HIGH SEAS—PIRACY—CONTINUANCE—SEPARATE TRIALS—INDICTMENT—CONCLUSION—NEW TRIAL—EVIDENCE.

1. It is not a sufficient ground for a delay of the trial of a capital case, that the party wishes it, in order to procure papers from a foreign country, since this court cannot issue process, which will be effectual in procuring such papers.

2. Convictions for murder may take place, where the murdered body is not found.

3. The weight and character of circumstantial evidence.

[Cited in U. S. v. Macomb, Case No. 15,702.]

4. In order to affect all the officers and crew of a piratical vessel with guilt, the original voyage must have been undertaken with a piratical design, and the officers and crew have known and acted upon such design; otherwise those only are guilty, who actively co-operated in the piracy.

[Cited in brief in Com. v. Nickerson, 5 Allen, 525. Cited in State v. Furney, 41 Kan. 115, 21 Pac. 216; State v. Soper, 16 Me. 297.]

5. It would not be sufficient to affect them with guilt, if they had known, that the voyage was intended to be an illegal one, as in the slave trade, contrary to the laws of Spain.

6. The simple fact of presence on board the piratical vessel, where there was no original piratical design, is not sufficient per se to affect a party with the crime.

[Cited in State v. Furney, 41 Kan. 115, 21 Pac. 216.]

7. All, who are present, acting and assisting in the piracy, are to be deemed principals.

8. The prohibition in the constitution of the United States, "Nor shall any person be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," means, that no person shall be tried a second time for the same offence, after a trial by a competent and regular jury, upon a good indictment, whether there be a verdict of acquittal or conviction. Therefore, the circuit court of the United States cannot grant a new trial in a capital case, after a verdict regularly rendered upon a sufficient indictment. Davis, J., dissenting, held that the privilege, intended to be secured by the prohibition, might be waived by the prisoner.

25. It was proper to admit parol evidence to establish the time of the sailing of the Panda on her voyage, and to prove the course and termination of the voyage, without proving, that the log-book was missing or lost.

26. The rule, requiring the production of the best evidence, is applied to reject secondary evidence, which leaves that of a higher nature behind in the power of the party: but not to reject one of several eye-witnesses to the same facts, for the testimony of all is in the same degree.

Where the officers, attending upon the jury, under a mistake of duty, permitted them to read the newspapers,—the officers first inspecting them, and cutting out everything, that in any manner related to the trial,—and it appeared, that in point of fact the jury never saw anything in any newspaper relative to the trial, and, after the charge from the court, were not allowed to see any until they had delivered their verdict, held, that it was an irregularity in the officer, but not sufficient to justify the court in setting aside a verdict, and granting a new trial, or treating the matter as a mis-trial.

28. Nor would it be sufficient for this purpose, to show, that some of the jurors drank ardent spirits during the trial, when the prisoners' counsel consented in open court to this indulgence to those whose health might require it, unless it was also shown, that the indulgence was grossly abused, and operated injuriously to the prisoners.

34. Where the prisoners were placed within the bar, and within a reasonable distance from their counsel, who could constantly have free access to them, and to whom the court stated, that every delay of time for that purpose would be cheerfully given, and it was given, held, that to place the prisoners in the very front benches of the bar, by the side of their counsel, would have been an indulgence inconvenient and unnecessary, and that the court did not err, under the circumstances of the case, in refusing it.

35. The court did not err in refusing to have the order of the prisoners (twelve in number) changed, before the introduction of each of the witnesses for the government, who were excluded from the court room, and after the first of these witnesses had been examined and had retired.

36. The witnesses for the government were allowed, with the chart of the Mexican's course before them, to be asked the question, whether, under the circumstances stated of the supposed time of starting of both vessels, the Mexican and Panda would or would not be likely to meet at the point marked on the chart. Held, that this was a direct and proper question, and not leading.

37. The practice in this court in capital cases is for counsel to state the points of law, on which they wish instructions to the jury, at some time before the charge is given, that the court may have time to examine and consider them.

38. It would be improper to grant a new trial, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, proceeding from persons, who were charged as joint offenders with the prisoners, and were incompetent at the time of the trial, but have been acquitted.

Indictment against Pedro Gibert, Bernardo de Soto, Francisco Ruiz, Nicola Costa, Antonio Ferrer, Manuel Boyga, Domingo de Guzman, Juan Antonio Portana, Manuel Castillo, Angel Garcia, Jose Velasquez, Juan Montenegro, otherwise called "Jose Basilio de Castro," part of the officers and crew of the Spanish schooner Panda, for robbery on the high seas, committed on board the American brig Mexican. The brig Mexican belonged to Salem, and was owned by Joseph Peabody. It sailed from Salem for Rio Janeiro on the 29th August, 1832, under the command of Captain Butman; having on board a valuable cargo, and twenty thousand dollars in specie. On the 20th September, in 33° N. lat. and 34° 30' W. lon., she fell in with a suspicious-looking vessel, from which she made many efforts, but unsuccessfully, to escape. This vessel, a schooner, having come up with the Mexican, fired a gun, and the captain of the latter, seeing that the schooner was armed with one long and two small guns, and that her decks were crowded with men, felt himself obliged to submit, and accordingly hove to. He was then hailed, and ordered to come on board the strange vessel, which mandate he obeyed in his own boat, but on reaching the schooner, five men jumped into the boat, and ordered it to be rowed back to the brig. On arriving on board the brig, they directed the captain to accompany them into the cabin, where, brandishing their knives, threatening and beating him, they compelled him to give up the money which was in his possession. A communication was then made with their companions on board the schooner, who sent a launch and carried away the treasure. The party on board the Mexican then left, after confining the crew below, breaking the compasses, and destroying the rigging and tackle. They also set fire to the caboose, in which they placed a tub of combustibles, and lowered the mainsail in such a way that it would speedily ignite. A short time afterwards, however, the captain contrived to get upon deck, and extinguished the fire before it had caught the mainsail. They then repaired their damages as well as they were able, and returned to Salem, where they arrived on the 2d of October. Information of what had taken place was immediately disseminated throughout this and other countries, and reached the coast of Africa, where Captain Trotter, commanding the British brig of war Curlew, was then cruising. Circumstances led that gentleman to believe that the schooner Panda, then lying in the river Nazareth, was the vessel which had captured the Mexican. He immediately, therefore, proceeded to take measures against her. These measures resulted in the capture of the Panda, but the escape, for the time, of her crew. No ship's papers or logbook were found on board of her, although diligently sought for; and, owing to some accident, she shortly afterwards blew up, thereby killing several of the Curlew's men. Captain Trotter then sailed to other ports, still making efforts to discover the crew of the Panda, and at last succeeded in arresting the prisoners, and carried them into Portsmouth, England. By the British government, they were sent to this country for trial, the offence of which they were charged having been committed on board a vessel of the United States.[2]

[2] Upon the conduct of the British government, and Captain Trotter, the court, in summing up to the jury, remarked as follows:

STORY, Circuit Justice. There was another topic, on which he must say a few words, and that was the remarks, which had been made in relation to the manner, in which the prisoners had been brought here, and upon the circumstances of their capture. He should feel himself unworthy of the station he occupied, if he did not advert to this topic, because, if he rightly understood the prisoners' counsel, an attempt had been made to throw a great deal of doubt over the motives and actions of Captain Trotter, and even of the British government itself, for having sent the case for trial to this country. The British government, on this occasion, finding persons in England in custody of one of its own officers, accused of piracy on an American vessel, chose to send those persons here, where the best evidence could be obtained, and where the greatest facilities and advantages for their trial were to be found. Over piracy, all nations exercise equal jurisdiction, and the British government might justly have exercised it in this case. But they preferred, that the offenders should be tried by the citizens of that country against whom the offence had been committed. And I may say, that this conduct of the British government can scarcely receive too much praise from an American citizen. How could this case have been decided in England? None of the crew of the Mexican, or her owner, were there. How could the evidence heard before this court, and which occupied its attention during the three first days of the trial, have been heard in England? Let us look, too, at the conduct of Captain Trotter. He was an officer of the British navy, stationed on the coast of Africa, with directions to use his exertions in suppressing the slave trade. He was there discharging the particular duty, which had been assigned to him, and was under no obligation to trouble himself about pirates. But he receives information of the robbery of the American brig and that the pirate is supposed to be on the African coast, and immediately goes in quest of her. What motive could this gallant officer have had to interfere in this matter, but a sense of justice, and a desire to protect the rights of the whole world? He had nothing to gain, and he might encounter a great deal of peril, obloquy, and responsibility. Under these circumstances Captain Trotter does interfere. He goes in search of the pirate. And you know, gentlemen, it was no ordinary peril he encountered. Mr. Quentin has stated facts sufficient to prove to you the danger of the undertaking, even when the crew of the Panda were not on board to make resistance. Had the crew remained on board, and used the means in their possession, the loss of lives among the British, they being in open boats, must necessarily have been great. Now what inducement had Captain Trotter to encounter all this, but a

It appeared by the evidence of Jose Perez, one of the crew of the Panda, who had become a witness for the government, that the schooner Panda sailed from Havana on or about the 20th of August, 1832, with Pedro Gibert, master, and Bernardo de Soto, mate, bound for St. Thomas on the coast of Africa, with a cargo of new rum, about thirty bales of cloth, muskets, powder, &c.; that she fell in with the Mexican on the 25th of September, and robbed her of twenty thousand dollars. Of the prisoners, Ruiz, Boyga, Castillo, Garcia and Montenegro were identified as among those who went on board the Mexican, and actively co-operated in the robbery. The trial lasted fifteen days.

The prisoners were defended by George S. Hillard and David L. Child.

A. Dunlap, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

In the course of the trial, many points arose, and were considerably discussed. These appear in the motion for a new trial, which will be found in a subsequent page, and all received the consideration of the court in the full and learned opinion, which was given on that motion.

On the first day of the trial, Child addressed the court, in relation to a motion for the production of the log-book of the Panda, and read an affidavit from the mate of the Panda and others, stating that the log-book was in the possession of certain parties in Portsmouth, England; that the manifestos of the cargo, &c. of the Panda, were also at the Havana, and might be had by sending for them. Time was requested, in order that these necessary documents might be procured.

THE COURT overruled this motion, on the ground that it could not issue process, which would be effective in procuring the papers alluded to; it had no authority in Great Britain, or Havana. It was also stated, by an English officer, who was one of those, who boarded the Panda, that the log-book of that vessel had never been discovered.

The arguments to the jury, were confined very much to a review of the evidence. Hillard, for the prisoners, contended that the Panda had been fitted out for a slaving voyage, for which alone, doubtless many of the crew had shipped; and that if she had robbed the Mexican, only those who had been engaged in the robbery could be punished for it. He cited U. S. v. Jones [Case No. 15,494]; Kidd's Case, 14 How. State Tr. 123.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up the case at the trial, stated as follows. Before I proceed to the facts of the case, it seems proper to take notice of several cases, which have been cited at the bar, to show the danger in capital cases, of relying on presumptive evidence as sufficient proof of guilt. Those cases may be said to constitute the commonplaces of the law, in trials of this sort, always resorted to, to create doubts in the minds of the jury, and to shake our confidence in human testimony. If these cases (some of which, there may be reason to doubt, whether they are founded in truth or in fiction,) are brought to establish any thing, they are brought to establish these propositions on trials on indictments for murder (for they are all of this sort.) (1) That there ought to be no conviction for murder, unless the murdered body is actually found. (2) That men have been convicted of murder upon false testimony. The first proposition certainly cannot be admitted as correct in point of common reason, or of law, unless courts of justice are to establish a positive rule to screen persons from punishment, who may be guilty of the most flagitious crimes. In the cases of murders committed on the high seas, the body is rarely if ever found; and a more complete encouragement and protection for the worst offences of this sort could not be invented, than a rule of this strictness. It would amount to a universal condonation of all murders committed on the high seas. In regard to the second proposition, it is probable, that in some few instances, though they have been rare, innocent persons have been convicted, upon circumstantial evidence, of offences, which they never committed. The same thing has probably sometimes, though perhaps not more rarely, occurred, where the proofs have been positive and direct from witnesses, who have deliberately sworn falsely to the facts, constituting the guilt of the party accused. But to what just conclusion does this tend? Admitting the truth of such cases, are we, then, to abandon all confidence in circumstantial evidence, and in the testimony of witnesses? Are we to declare, that no human testimony to circumstances or to facts, is worthy of belief, or can furnish a just foundation for a conviction? That would be to subvert the whole foundations of the high sense of public duty, not merely to his own country, but to the commercial world. It is said, that there was something mysterious about the conduct of this brave officer. I have never observed any thing of the kind, gentlemen, during this trial; it remains for you to say, whether any thing of the kind exists. His station was on the African coast, and he could not leave it without orders from home. He made the capture, and communicated it, where he was in duty bound to do, to the heads of the admiralty. We know that he did this, because we find the British government taking cognizance of his act, and sending the prisoners to be tried here with reference to it. Suggestions had been thrown out, and questions asked, as to whether money had not been divided among the crew of the Curlew. This question no person could misunderstand for a moment. Now, I must say, as an individual, that, on the most careful examination, I have found nothing, done by Captain Trotter, that a man in his situation might not fairly do. The learned judge farther stated, in reference to this matter, that if, in this first instance of national reciprocity, British officers found themselves accused without sufficient reason, it would be, as it was the first, most assuredly the last time they would expose themselves to such consequences.

administration of public justice. If, on the other hand, such cases are addressed as a mere admonition to the judgment of the jury, requiring caution on their part in weighing evidence, in order to guard them against the impulses of sudden conclusions and slight suspicions, there is certainly nothing objectionable in the course, although under the solemn circumstances of the present case, it seems hardly necessary to enforce an appeal, the importance of which is so deeply felt by all, who sit on this trial.

I may, indeed, add another remark, which, strange as it may seem, has nevertheless been justified, as there is every reason to believe, by actual facts. It is not even certain, that criminals, who in capital cases plead guilty, and by confession of their guilt in open court, submit to the sentence of the law, are always guilty of the offence. Cases have occurred, in which men have been accused and tried and convicted of murder upon their own solemn confession in a court of justice, where it has been afterwards ascertained, that the party could not have been guilty, for the person supposed to be murdered was found to be still living, or lost his life in another place, and at a different period. And yet it never has been supposed, that a solemn confession in open court, was not a just ground to believe the guilt of the party accused. The truth is, that notwithstanding the admitted infirmity of human testimony, and the inherent defects of circumstantial evidence, they still are, and for ever must be, the only solid foundations, on which reliance can be placed, for the due administration of all civil as well as of all criminal justice. It is scarcely possible to take a step in the trial of any matter of fact, without directly or indirectly appealing to them, as unquestionable and satisfactory sources of human belief.

There are three questions in this case. The first is, whether a robbery was actually committed on the Mexican, on the high seas, as charged in the indictment. The second is, whether it was committed by the officers or crew of the Panda. The third is, whether, if committed by the officers or crew of the Panda, all of them are guilty, or a part only; and if a part, who in particular are guilty. Upon the first question, there is no controversy at the bar. The robbery was committed; and, indeed, is established, if any fact in the case is so, by entirely satisfactory evidence. Upon the second question, it is indispensable to go into a minute and accurate survey of the whole evidence, circumstantial and positive. (Here the judge went into a full examination of all the evidence, leaving all the facts to the jury.) If the jury shall be satisfied that the Mexican was robbed by the Panda, then, upon the third question, there are some principles of law, which require to be accurately considered, in order to arrive at a just conclusion, as to the guilt or innocence of any or all of the parties accused. And, here it is most important to ascertain, whether the original voyage of the Panda from Cuba was intended to be a piratical expedition or not. If it was originally intended to be a piratical expedition, then all of the officers and crew, who knew of such intended expedition, and acted upon it, are to be considered as equally guilty of the robbery of the Mexican, (if the offence was committed,) whether at the moment, they are proved to have been active in the acts then done, or not; for, under such circumstances, they must, in the absence of all counteracting evidence, be presumed to co-operate in furtherance of the original design, each doing the duty assigned to him. If, on the other hand, the original expedition was not intended to be piratical, then those only are to be deemed guilty, who knowingly co-operated in the act of robbery of the Mexican. Co-operation or combination may be express, or it may be implied from circumstances. All, who were present and acting in the robbery, are to be deemed principals. All who were present, advising, directing, encouraging or assisting in the accomplishment of the robbery, thus performing the part assigned to them in the common piratical enterprise, are to be deemed equally principals. But the other persons, whether they were of the officers or of the crew of the Panda, who did not know of the piratical design, and did not co-operate or aid or take any part in it, though they were present on board of the Panda, are not to be deemed guilty. In this view of the matter, the nature of the original enterprise, and of the outfit and voyage of the Panda from Cuba become most material for the consideration of the jury. It is not sufficient to affect all the officers and crew of the Panda with guilt, that they should have known, that the voyage was intended to be an illegal voyage,—as a voyage in the slave trade, contrary to the laws of Spain. The evidence must go farther, and satisfy the jury, that the voyage in contemplation by all of them, was to be piratical, as well as illegal. If the voyage was simply illegal, then those only are to be deemed guilty, who co-operated in the piratical act upon the principles above stated.

Let us now examine the evidence in the case, as applicable to all the persons accused severally, upon the supposition, that the original enterprise, is not shown to be piratical. (Here the judge went into a very minute examination of the evidence, remarking, that if any were guilty of the crime, Gibert, the captain, and De Soto, the owner and mate, must be; for they had the unquestioned command, and control of the ship and crew. He then summed up the evidence, as to the identity of those of the crew of the Panda, who went on board of the Mexican, and as to the acts done by them while on board; and their subsequent conduct and confessions. He added, that against Portana and Guzman, no direct co-operation was proved, unless the original enterprise was piratical, and so known to be by them; and that the sole evidence against Velasquez, was his assisting in burying the money, as testified to by Perez. In regard to Ferrer, the cook, he remarked, that he was a black man, and possibly might be a slave, and no act was proved against him. If he was a slave, he was entitled to a very indulgent consideration, for he could hardly, under the circumstances, be deemed master of his own will. As to Costa, the cabin boy, he suggested, that there was no evidence against him, and his youth and station ought to induce the jury to give his case a very indulgent consideration. Neither he, nor the cook, were likely to have been entrusted with the secret, that the voyage was originally intended to be piratical, if that was the fact, and no cooperation at the time of the robbery, was shown on their part.)

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty in favor of Ferrer, Costa, Portana, Velasquez, and Guzman, and as to the rest of guilty. After verdict and before judgment, the following motion for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment, was filed by the counsel for the prisoners:

And the said Pedro Gibert, Bernardo de Soto, Francisco Ruiz, Manuel Boyga, Manuel Castillo, Angel Garcia, and Juan Montenegro, prisoners here in the custody of the marshal, after verdict and before judgment, move the court that the said verdict be set aside, and that a new trial be granted, for the causes following, viz.:

I. Because said prisoners, since the rendering of the said verdict, have come to the knowledge, and are enabled to avail themselves, of new evidence, which they believe to be very material for their defence, and that the same, if submitted to a jury, would lead to a result different from the said verdict.

II. Because the said prisoners were not permitted by the honorable court to be tried separately on the indictment in said case.

III. Because the said prisoners were never arraigned upon the said indictment.

IV. Because no issue was joined between the said United States and the said prisoners, according to the course of the common law.

V. Because the said prisoners have never put themselves upon the country of and concerning the matters charged in said indictment, and were never inquired of how they would be tried.

VI. Because the said court overruled a question proposed on the part of the prisoners, to a witness produced by the government, on the ground that the said court could not perceive the object or bearing of the said question, and when the counsel for the said prisoners had stated to the said court that to explain would defeat the object of the said question.

VII. Because the said prisoners believe and respectfully suggest, that in the trial of said cause, the jury were misdirected in matters of law, by the said court, in the following particulars, viz. (1) Because the said court instructed the jury that one Jose Perez, a witness produced on the part of the government, was not an accomplice in the commission of the crime alleged in the said indictment. (2) Because the said court instructed the jury that they might, if they pleased, or they might not, if they pleased, entertain a presumption against the credibility of said Perez, by reason of the refusal of the counsel for the government to produce the written examination of said Perez, taken at Fernando Po; and, because the said court declined giving an instruction that the said refusal of the said counsel, after due notice on the part of the prisoners, to produce the said written examination, afforded a legal presumption, that if the said written examination were brought forward, the effect thereof would be unfavorable to the credit of said Perez. (3) Because the said court instructed the jury that the question of the liability of Henry D. Trotter for the loss and damages occasioned by the capture of the schooner Panda, and by the detention of her officers and crew, was immaterial on the trial of the issue upon the said indictment. (4) Because the said court instructed the jury that certain confessions of the prisoners, testified to have been made at Fernando Po, Sierra Leone, and on the passage of the said prisoners to England, and at other places, were proper to be considered by the jury. (5) Because the said court instructed the jury that the withholding by the counsel for the government from the prisoners on the trial, of certain writings containing the said confessions or a part of them, was a fact from which the jury might presume what they pleased, provided that they presumed nothing therefrom against the prisoners; and because the said court declined to give it in charge to the jury, that the suppression of said writings by the counsel for the government, afforded a legal presumption that if the same were brought forward, the effect thereof would be in favor of the said prisoners. (6) Because the said court declined to instruct the jury that by the waiver on the part of said prisoners of any legal exceptions, to which said writings might be liable, the counsel for the government ought to have put the said writings into the case, or the parole testimony of the same confessions which had been proved to have been reduced to writing, ought to have been wholly rejected and considered out of the case. (7) Because the said court instructed the jury that confessions, testified to have been made by some of the prisoners, without the same having been brought home to any of them individually and by name, might be considered by the jury in reference to the case generally, and to the identification of the said Panda as the piratical vessel mentioned in said indictment, and of her crew as the piratical crew; and that the jury must not consider such confessions as evidence upon which to convict any one of the prisoners in particular. (8) Because the said court declined to instruct the jury that the counsel for the government having produced a part of the papers and documents appertaining to the said Panda, and not having shown that any of the customary papers and documents, which should regularly belong to the said Panda, were detained or destroyed by the officers and crew of the said Panda; or were from any cause missing at the time and place of the seizure of those produced—a legal presumption arises that the log-book of the said Panda was taken at the same time and place, and by the same captors, and that they have it or have destroyed it. (9) Because the said court declined to instruct the jury that the non-production of said log-book on the part of the prosecution, gives rise under the circumstances aforesaid, to a legal presumption in favor of the prisoners. (10) Because parol evidence was admitted to prove the time of the sailing of the said Panda on her voyage from Havana to Cape Mount, and to prove the course and termination of said voyage, without evidence having been previously adduced, that the said log-book was missing from said papers and documents at the time and place of said seizure, or had since been casually lost. (11) Because the said court declined to instruct the jury that under the circumstances proved, resistance, flight, or the destroying of the said Panda by her officers and crew, would be exercising the right of self-defence on the part of the said officers and crew. (12) Because the said court declined to instruct the jury that the failure of the government to produce, in evidence of the attempt by said Ruiz to blow up the said Panda, the only witness who saw the match, as applied for that purpose, and who is testified to have removed it, affords a legal presumption against the truth of the alleged attempt by said Ruiz, to destroy the said Panda.

VIII. Because the jury were furnished with newspapers, and did read the said newspapers during the pendency of the trial.

IX. Because the said jury, while they had the said cause in charge, drank ardent spirits.

X. And the said prisoners move for a new trial, because the said verdict is manifestly against evidence and the weight of evidence.

And in case that the honorable court should not set aside the said verdict and grant a new trial, then said Gibert, De Soto, Ruiz, Boyga, Castillo, Garcia and Montenegro, move the court to arrest the judgment on said verdict, for the causes following, viz. (1) Because no legal offence is set forth in said indictment, and because the said indictment is uncertain, insufficient and not judicially intelligible (2) Because the said prisoners were never arraigned, and have never put themselves upon the country for trial. (3) Because no issue has been joined on said indictment according to the course of the common law.

The foregoing is a copy of the original motion. Subsequent to the filing of that, and before argument, the following additional causes were assigned for a new trial:

Because interpreters were admitted to interpret a part of the testimony of said Jose Perez, without being previously sworn to interpret truly and faithfully. Because the said prisoners were not allowed to be placed near their counsel on the trial, for the purpose of instructing said counsel in the conducting of the defence of said prisoners, when the said counsel had made an application to the said court for said purpose, and stated that in their opinion, such change of position was necessary for said purpose. Because the said court overruled a motion by said counsel, that the order in which said prisoners were placed at the bar on their trial should be changed, before the introduction of each of the witnesses for the government, who were excluded from the court room, after the first of said witnesses had been examined and had retired. Because the counsel for the government was permitted, upon objection made by the counsel for the prisoners, to lead the witnesses for the government, by means of a certain chart, upon which the voyage of the said brig Mexican was delineated, and upon which the point at which the piracy alleged in said indictment had been testified to have been committed, was distinctly marked; and upon a view of said chart by said witnesses, the following question was proposed to them by the said counsel for the government: viz. whether, if the said schooner Panda left the port of Havana on the 20th or 26th of August, bound to Cape Monte, on the coast of Africa, and the said brig Mexican left Salem on the 29th of said August, bound to Rio Janeiro, the said vessels would or would not be likely to meet? Because the said court declared to the jury, and delivered it as the opinion of said court, that the prisoners, by their counsel, had no right to pray instructions to the jury on particular points, after the delivery of the principal charge. Because the said court declined to instruct the jury that if they believed, upon the evidence, that the said schooner Panda, while lying in a certain river called "Nazareth," was suddenly assailed by a superior force, which advanced upon them in hostile array, without hailing or declaring their intention, the officers and crew on board the said Panda, had a right to resist, to flee, or to destroy the said Panda, or to resort to any other means of self-defence, which they might deem expedient.

These motions were argued at great length by George S. Hillard and David L. Child, for the prisoners, and by A. Dunlap, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

THE COURT, in pronouncing its opinion, went so fully into all the considerations urged as to supersede the necessity of stating the arguments, which occupied three days, and were concluded December 10th.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is an indictment for a robbery on the high sea, which is declared to be a capital offence and piracy by the statute of 1790, c. 9 [1 Stat. 113]. The prisoners having been found guilty, a motion has now been made for a new trial, upon grounds stated in a written motion submitted to the court. Upon the grounds thus stated, it is unnecessary for me to say any more at present, than that so far as they purport to be founded upon what took place at the trial in the presence of the court and jury, they are not admitted by the court, to present a full, accurate, or just representation of all the facts and circumstances. This remark is made simply to prevent any misapprehension from any silence or acquiescence of the court upon this subject.

The question now to be considered is, whether this court has, by the constitution and laws of the United States, authority to grant a new trial in a case circumstanced as the present is. And, in order to free the case as much as possible from any collateral and unimportant considerations, it is proper to state, that in examining this question, we shall, for the present, assume that the court had jurisdiction of the case; that there has been no mis-trial, in a legal sense, that is, no such irregularity, or error in impannelling the jury to try the cause, or in the other proceedings in the course of the trial, as would upon the face of the process and proceedings be fatal as matter of substance, and that the indictment is sufficient in point of law to found a just judgment against the prisoners in conformity to the verdict. In other words, for the purpose of the argument, we shall for the present assume that the jurisdiction is clear, that the indictment is good, and that the trial has been regularly had, and the verdict has been regularly rendered by a competent jury.

Under such circumstances, has this court authority, by the constitution and laws of the United States, to grant a new trial after a verdict regularly rendered of guilty against the prisoners?

The constitution of the United States has exhibited great solicitude on the subject of the trial of crimes, and has declared, that the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and has in some cases prescribed, and in others required congress to prescribe, the place of trial. And certain amendments of the constitution, in the nature of a bill of rights, have been adopted, which fortify and guard this inestimable right of trial by jury. One of these amendments provides that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury," (with certain exceptions not necessary to be mentioned); and it then proceeds—"nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." Now the question is, what is the true interpretation and meaning of this latter clause? When, in a constitutional sense, can a person be said to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb? If resort should be had to the grammatical structure and meaning of the words, the natural interpretation would certainly seem to be, that no person should be twice put upon trial for any offence, for which he would be liable, upon conviction, to be punished with the loss of life or limb;—for jeopardy means hazard, danger, or peril; and when a party is put upon trial for an offense punishable with the loss of life or limb, and he stands for his deliverance upon the verdict of the jury, he is thereby put in jeopardy, hazard, danger or peril of his life or limb. But, fortunately, in the present case, there is no necessity of resorting to mere general principles of interpretation; for the privilege thus secured is but a constitutional recognition of an old and well established maxim of the common law: and, therefore, we are to resort to the common law to ascertain its true use, interpretation, and limitation. The existence of this maxim as a fundamental rule of the common law in the administration of criminal justice, may be constantly found recognised by elementary writers and courts of justice from a very early period down to the present times. Thus Staundford, in his Pleas of the Crown (lib. 2 c. 36, pp. 105, 106), says—"Home, per common leye, ne mittera sa vie deux foits in jeopardie de trial per un mesme felonie, sinon que sort en ascun especial cas de quel jeo dirra apres." A man shall not by the common law put his life twice in jeopardy of trial for the same felony, except it shall be in some special case, of which I shall hereafter speak. And the excepted case, to which he here alludes, he states in the same chapter to be where there is not in the indictment sufficient matter to constitute felony in point of law. And he applies his doctrine directly to the case of a plea of a former acquittal, grounding the sufficiency of it as a bar upon the above maxim. And he then states, that if the acquittal was upon an insufficient indictment, it is no bar to a second indictment for the same offense (eo que in tiel cas il ne unque mittoit sa vie in jeopardie sur le matter), because his life has never been in jeopardy upon the matter. And the like doctrine may be traced up as early as the age of Bracton. 1 Staund. P. C. lib. 2, c. 36, p. 106. See, also, Fitzh. Abr. Corone, pl. 444. Hawkins, whose work on Crown Law is deservedly held in very high estimation, states the doctrine in the most unqualified manner: "The plea (says he) of autre fois acquit is grounded on this maxim, that a man shall not be brought into danger of his life for one and the same offence more than once.

From whence it is generally taken by all our books, as an undoubted consequence, that where a man is once found not guilty, on an indictment or appeal, free from error, and well commenced before any court, which hath jurisdiction of the cause, he may by the common law, in all cases, plead such acquittal in bar of any subsequent indictment or appeal for the same crime." Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 35, §§ 1, 8–10. And Lord Hale recognizes the same doctrine. See 2 Hale, P. C. 181, 220, 249, 250. See, also, Com. Dig. "Appeal," G. 9, G. 11. And not to multiply authorities on so plain a point, Mr. Justice Blackstone, in his Commentaries (4 Bl. Comm. 335; Reg. v. Carter, 6 Mod. 168), says: "The plea of autre fois acquit. or a former acquittal, is grounded on this universal maxim of the common law of England, that no man is to be brought into jeopardy of his life more than once for the same offence."

Hitherto we have been examining the doctrine with reference to cases of acquittal only. But the like doctrine, founded on the like maxim, will be found to apply to cases of conviction of a capital offence. And, here, in order to avoid any ambiguity, it may be proper to state, that conviction does not mean the judgment passed upon a verdict; "but if the jury find him, (the party), guilty, he is then said to be convicted of the crime, whereof he stands indicted. 4 Bl. Comm. 362; 3 Inst. 131. For there is, in point of law, a difference between the plea of autre fois convict, and autre fois attaint of the same offence; the former may be where there has been no judgment; the latter is founded upon a judgment." See 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 36, §§ 1, 10; Staunf. P. C. lib. 2, c. 37, p. 108; 4 Bl. Comm. 336.

Hawkins, after remarking upon the plea of autre fois attaint, and saying that one reason why it is a good bar for a second prosecution for the same felony is, "because the life of the defendant was in danger by the first; and it is against a maxim of law to bring a man into such danger more than once for the same offence," proceeds to say, "the plea of autre fois convict seems chiefly to depend on this reason, that the party ought not to be twice brought into danger of his life for the same crime." 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 36, §§ 1, 10, 15. He afterwards makes the known exception, where the verdict is erroneous either in respect of insufficiency of the indictment, or for a mis-trial, &c., so that the life of the prisoners was not in danger at the trial. 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 36, § 15. See, also, 2 Hale, P. C. cc. 31, 32, pp. 243, 251; Reg. v. Goddard, 2 Ld. Raym. 922; Armstrong v. Lisle, 1 Salk. 63; People v. Barrett, 1 Johns. 66; People v. Casborus, 13 Johns. 351. See the distinction between a mis-trial, and a new trial in Rex v. Fowler, 4 Barn. & Ald. 273. The same doctrine is abundantly established in the cases of appeals and indictments, reported in 4 Coke, 40–47; and especially in the cases of Richard Vaux and William Vaux, there stated (pages 40, 44, 45). In the latter case, the court held, "that the reason of autre fois acquit was because, where the maxim of the common law is, that the life of a man shall not be twice put in jeopardy for one and the same offence; and that is the reason and cause why autre fois acquitted or convicted of the same offence is a good plea; yet it is intended of a lawful acquittal or conviction, for if the conviction or acquittal is not lawful, his life was never in jeopardy; and because the indictment in this case was insufficient, for this reason, he was not legitimo modo acquietatus," &c. "So, if a man be convicted, either by verdict or confession, upon an insufficient indictment, and no judgment thereupon given, he may be again indicted and arraigned, because his life was never in jeopardy, and the law wants its end." And the same was ruled in Wigg's Case, 4 Coke, 45, 47. So in Armstrong v. Lisle, 1 Salk. 63, where there was a plea of autre fois convict to an appeal of murder, the court said: "At common law autre fois convict or acquit was a good bar to an appeal, for no man's life ought to be twice endangered for the same offence." See Smith v. Taylor, 5 Burrows, 2798; Com. Dig. "Appeal," G. 9. And, lastly, Mr. Justice Blackstone, in his Commentaries (4 Bl. Comm. 336), says: "The plea of autre fois convict, or a former conviction of the same identical crime, though no judgment was ever given or perhaps will be (being suspended by the benefit of clergy or other causes), is a good plea in bar to an indictment. And this depends upon the same principle of the former (autre fois acquit) that no man ought to be twice brought in danger of his life for one and the same crime."

Thus we see that the maxim is imbedded in the very elements of the common law; and has been uniformly construed to present an insurmountable barrier to a second prosecution, where there has once been a verdict of acquittal or conviction regularly had upon a sufficient indictment. Indeed, so strong has been the influence of this maxim, that it was for ages construed not only to apply to cases, where there had been a verdict given by a jury; but even where the party had been once put upon his trial before a jury for deliverance. And Lord Coke laid it down, that after a jury were once charged with a prisoner upon an indictment for treason or a felony, the jury could not be discharged, but were bound to give a verdict. 3 Inst. 110; 1 Inst. 227, 6. See, also, Kinloch's Case, Foster, Cr. Law, 28–37; 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 47, § 1. And though that rule has been broken in upon in modern times, and juries have been discharged from giving a verdict in capital cases in cases of pressing necessity; yet it has been done with extreme caution, and confined to cases of pressing necessity; and as we shall presently see, the exercise of it has been greatly doubted, and even denied in cases where the jury were unable to agree on a verdict.

This matter was very gravely discussed in the Case of the Kinlochs in 1746; and though the court upon that occasion did discharge the jury in favor of life, and so let the prisoners at their request into a new defence; yet the judges did it upon great deliberation and debate. And Sir Michael Foster on this occasion observed (and it illustrates the force of the maxim) that "it was not to bring the prisoners' lives twice in jeopardy, which is one inconvenience of discharging juries in capital cases, but merely in order to give them one chance for their lives, which, it was apprehended, they had lost by pleading to issue." So that even this humane judge felt that it was trenching upon the maxim, and that when once the party was put on his trial before the jury, if the jury were discharged he was subjected to be put twice in jeopardy for the same offence.

Hitherto we have been chiefly considering the case of a new indictment, to which the party pleads the former indictment and a verdict of acquittal or conviction. And it was fit so to do, in order to understand the full import and bearing of the language of the maxim. But the question now more directly presented is, whether the same maxim equally applies to the case of a new trial moved for in a capital case upon the same indictment. It is impossible, I think, to doubt that, in England, the maxim according to the doctrine of the English courts of justice does apply to and govern the case of a new trial. As soon as a capital case is fully committed to a jury, the life of the prisoner is in their hands, and he stands in jeopardy of his life upon the verdict of the jury. He is in the truest sense put upon his deliverance from the peril. When once the verdict is pronounced the case is fixed. If there is a verdict of acquittal, it is generally agreed that he cannot be put upon his trial again for the same offence. And why? Because it contradicts the direct language of this maxim of the common law. He would again be put in jeopardy of his life. And how does the case at all differ in principle in the case of a conviction? The fact is the same. He is again put in jeopardy of his life. He is again to be tried, and acquitted or condemned. If it be said, that it is for his benefit and in favor of his life to have a new trial, that may be true; but there is in the body of the maxim no such qualification or limitation of its meaning. It is nowhere laid down as a part of the maxim that if he is acquitted he shall not be tried again; but if he is convicted he may be allowed a new trial. And if the court are to assume the power in favor of the prisoner; why may it not equally assume it when it will prevent a manifest fraud upon the administration of justice to suffer his acquittal to remain? Cases may easily be put where an acquittal may have been produced by gross bribery of the witnesses, by false testimony fraudulently procured by the prisoner, by spiriting witnesses away, and even by means still more offensive and revolting to public justice. And yet no case has as yet been produced of a new trial granted against a prisoner upon such grounds. In Reg. v. Carter, 6 Mod. 168, Lord Chief Justice Holt stated a case where a rank perjury had gone unpunished from some defect in entering of the record of the former case, in which the perjury was alleged, for that (the first trial for perjury) was final, so as the party could never be tried thereon again. It is true, that in order to avoid difficulties of this sort, the courts in the reign of Charles II. (that reign of bad precedents) did sometimes go so far as to discharge juries before a verdict was given, where there was reason to believe that evidence was suppressed, or that there was not enough to convict the prisoner, or that there was reason to suspect malpractice. And even Lord Hale fell into this erroneous practice, and endeavored to justify it. 2 Hale, P. C. c. 41, pp. 294–296. But it has since been wholly repudiated, and it met the decided disapprobation of Sir Michael Foster. Kinloch's Case, Fost. Cr. Law, 16, 17. But in point of fact, there is no instance of any new trial having been granted by the English courts in capital cases, where the indictment is sufficient, and there has not been a mistrial, upon the plain ground that it would violate the integrity of this fundamental maxim of the common law. Indeed, for a great length of time the opinion prevailed, that there could be no new trial granted in any criminal cases, even where the indictment was for a mere misdemeanor, although it is manifest that the maxim does not apply except to capital felonies. Mr. Justice Blackstone has indeed in his Commentaries said: "In many instances where, contrary to evidence, the jury have found the prisoner guilty, their verdict hath been mercifully set aside, and a new trial granted by the court of king's bench; for in such a case, as hath been said, it cannot be set right by attaint. But there hath as yet been no instance of granting a new trial, where the prisoner was acquitted upon the first." Now, from the other citations already made, it must be manifest that the learned commentator was referring to cases of mere misdemeanors. And he cites in support of this doctrine the case of Rex v. Read, 1 Lev. 9; Rex v. Smith, T. Jones, 163; Rex v. Simons, 10 St. Tr. 416, 19 How. St. Tr. 680; 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 47, § 12; and see Mr. Curwood's note, Id.,—which were all cases of mere misdemeanors. Even as late as this very case of Rex v. Simons, it seems to have been deemed a very unusual course to grant a new trial in any criminal case, where the party was convicted. And in this very case the distinction, as to granting new trials between capital cases and other criminal cases was already recognized; and well it might be, as the maxim applies only to offences where the party is put in jeopardy of life or limb, which the defendant clearly is not upon an indictment for mere misdemeanors. In Rex v. Mawbey, 6 Term R. 638, Lord Kenyon lays it down expressly that "in one class of offences, indeed, those greater than misdemeanors, no new trial can be granted at all." In a note to the case of Rex v. Inhabitants of Oxford Co., 13 East, 416, note (see 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 47, § 12; and see Mr. Curwood's note, Id.), Mr. East, himself a most able and exact crown lawyer, says: "In capital cases at the assizes, if a conviction take place upon insufficient evidence, the common course is to apply to the crown for a pardon, upon a full report of the evidence sent in by the learned judge to the secretary of state for the home department. But I am not aware of any instance of a new trial, granted in a capital case; and upon the debate of all the judges in Tinckler's Case in 1781 [1 East, P. C. 354], it seemed to be considered that it could not be." And this is admitted to be the received and settled doctrine in England, by every elementary writer upon the criminal law, who treats of the subject. Thus Mr. Chitty says in his work on Criminal Law, that in case of felony or treason, it seems completely settled that no new trial can in any case be granted. But if the conviction appear to the judge to be improper, he may respite the execution, to enable the defendant to apply for a pardon. 1 Chit. Cr. Law (Eng. Ed.) p. 654; S. P. Christian's note to 3 Bl. Comm. 388. The like doctrine is stated by Mr. Russell, in his work on Crimes. 2 Russ. Cr. bk. 6, c. 1, § 1 (2 Lond. Ed.) p. 589. See, also, 2 Tidd. Prac. p. 820; Rex v. Fowler, 4 Barn. & Ald. 273; Rex v. Edwards, 4 Taunt. 309. And to show how inflexibly the doctrine stands in the jurisprudence of the common law, it may be added that in the report made to parliament by the commissioners on the criminal law, at the very last session, it is stated as a known fact, that parties charged with felonies "cannot have a new trial." Indeed, the total silence of the English books upon this subject during the last three hundred years, is as significant as any positive expression could be. Considering the vast number of capital trials, amounting to hundreds every year, during this long period, the total absence of any trace of a motion for a new trial, in any capital case for misdirection of the court, or upon the discovery of new evidence, or because the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or for any other causes not amounting to a mistrial, where the indictment was good, is perhaps the strongest possible proof, that the power was not supposed to exist in any of the courts.

This then was the actual posture of the common law on this subject, and this the received interpretation of the maxim, at the time when it was solemnly incorporated into the constitution of the United States, as an article of a bill of rights. If this clause does not in legal contemplation, prohibit the granting a new trial after verdict in a capital case, then there is nothing in the constitution which does prohibit it, even in cases of acquittal. It may be said, that in practice a new trial is never granted in any criminal case after an acquittal. And as a matter of practice, we know that such is the common course. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 47, § 12; and Curwood's note, 4 Bl. Comm. 361; Rex v. Mann, 4 Maule & S. 337. But in misdemeanors, it is perhaps still open to inquiry, whether the court do not possess the power, if it should choose to exercise it. See 1 Chit. Cr. Law (Lond. Ed.) 657, and cases there cited; Rex v. Reynell, 6 East, 315; Coventry & H. Dig. "Trial," IX., pl. 5, 6; People v. Olcott, 2 Johns. Cas. 301; Fost. Cr. Law, 22–40. At all events, if any clause of the constitution does not prohibit the grant of a new trial after verdict in capital cases, there is nothing to prevent congress from investing the courts of the United States, with the power of granting new trials in all criminal cases (capital or otherwise), as well in cases of acquittal as of conviction, a power which, I imagine, has never hitherto been generally supposed to belong to that body, and which is truly alarming, both in its nature and its exercise.

Let us now see, how the American authorities stand upon the same subject. And here, it is proper to state, that my researches have not enabled me to ascertain a single case, solemnly adjudged in the United States before the adoption of the constitution, in which after a verdict, regularly obtained, a new trial has been granted in a capital case.

In State v. Hopkins (1794), 1 Bay 373 (see also, State v. Duestoe, Id. 377), the prisoner was convicted of passing a ten pound bill, knowing it to have been forged; and he moved for a new trial; and it was granted by the court. There was another count in the indictment for forgery, upon which he was acquitted. It does not distinctly appear upon the face of the report, that the offence was capital, though the argument of counsel would lead us to that conclusion. But no point was made at the argument as to the power of the court to grant a new trial. It was silently taken for granted on all sides. Now, whether the laws of South Carolina, gave such a power to their court in such cases, is what I have no means of knowing. But it is material to state, that the constitution of South Carolina, contains no prohibition on the subject. There is no clause in it, like the prohibitory clause in the constitution of the United States. The point not having been made, the court did not even advert to it.

In U. S. v. Fries [Case No. 5,126], in 1799, which was a trial for treason in the circuit court of the United States for Pennsylvania district, before Judges Iredell and Peters, a new trial was actually granted. This is an authority directly in point, and its bearing cannot be overlooked. But there are circumstances in the case, which greatly weaken if they do not impugn its authority. The counsel for the prisoner contended, that though it was not usual, to grant a new trial in a capital case, it was unquestionably in the power of the court so to do; and for this they cited 4 Bl. Comm. 391 (probably intending page 361); 1 Burrows, 394; 2 Strange, 968; and 6 Coke, 14. Now, it will be found upon examination, that not a single one of these citations justifies the doctrine contended for. The citation from Blackstone (page 391, if the page be not miscited) contains not one word on the subject. If page 361 was intended, the doctrine (as we have already seen) applies only to misdemeanors. The case in 1 Burrows, 394, was a civil suit, and in which, Lord Mansfield discussed the right to grant new trials, with reference to such suits only. The case in 6 Coke, 14 (Arundel's Case), was upon a motion in arrest of judgment, because there was a mis-trial, the jury having in that case (murder) been drawn, not out of the parish, but from the vicinage of the city, or as it is phrased, that the venue ought to have been out of the parish, and not out of the city. And the court adjudged that "the trial was insufficient, and a new venire facias was awarded to try the issue again, for his (the prisoner's) life was never in jeopardy." This therefore was not a motion for a new trial, grounded upon matters, dehors the record, but for matters of error on the face of the proceedings, showing that there had been a mis-trial, or no lawful trial at all; in other words, not by lawful jurors. In Rex v. Gibson, 2 Strange, 968, the defendant was indicted for forgery (of what sort is not stated), and would have moved for a new trial (for what cause is not stated) without appearing in court; and the court refused to hear the motion, on account of his not being present. The same case is reported in 7 Mod. 205, where it is stated to be the forgery of a note, and it must have been a forgery at the common law, which was only a misdemeanor; for it appears that the offence, was charged in the indictment to have been committed in 1713; and it was not until the statute of 2 Geo. II. c. 25 (1729), that forgery of a note was made a capital offence. 4 Bl. Comm. 249. In Fries's Case, the counsel for the government, admitted the power of the court, to grant a new trial in capital cases, and argued solely against the validity of the grounds assigned for granting it in that case. The point was therefore not argued; the clause in the constitution of the United States was not even alluded to, much less reasoned out. The court did not, in giving their judgment, in any manner speak to the point, and the judges were divided in opinion, as to the propriety of granting a new trial, for the cause shown; but Judge Peters yielded his opinion, and acquiesced in granting the new trial. Now, under such circumstances, it is not too much to say, that the court might have been surprised into the decision; and certainly in a case of constitutional law, it ought to have no decisive influence, especially (as we shall presently see) that in the very state of Pennsylvania, in whose constitution a like clause exists, and where this cause was tried, the power has been solemnly denied to exist under stronger circumstances.

In Com. v. Hardy (1807) 2 Mass. 303, the supreme court of Massachusetts granted a new trial, in a capital case, because there had been a mis-trial, the prisoner having been arraigned before an incompetent tribunal, and therefore in legal interpretation, the trial was utterly void, as coram non judice. No one can doubt the propriety of this decision. But it stands wide of the present question.

In Com. v. Green, 17 Mass. 515, the very point of the right of the supreme court of Massachusetts, to grant a new trial in capital cases, after verdict, was brought before the court, and argued at large; and the decision was in favor of the power; but the new trial was denied upon the merits. In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Chief Justice Parker said: "It appears by the English text books, and by several decisions cited in support of the position, that in cases of felony a new trial is not usually allowed by the courts of that country. But whatever reasons may exist in that country for this practice, we are unable to discern any sufficient ground for adopting it here." Now, with the greatest deference for that learned judge, I cannot admit, that this language truly represents the state of the English common law doctrine on this subject. On the contrary, as I understand that doctrine, it is no matter of practice at all (usual or unusual), in respect to which the English courts are at liberty to exercise any discretion; but it is a matter of power, which a fundamental maxim of the common law prohibits the court from exercising, in all cases (subject to the exceptions already adverted to); and which disability, nothing but an act of parliament can remove. It is a matter of right of every British subject, which constitutes a part of his freedom, like other great rights secured by Magna Charta. If it were a matter of mere practice, there might be some ground for an American court to adopt or reject it. But if it is a great common law right, then it stands upon a very different foundation. The learned judge goes into a train of reasoning to show, why in cases of acquittal, no new trial should be granted, in relation to those, whose lives have been once put in jeopardy; and also, to show that in cases of conviction, the same reasons for denying a new trial, do not apply. But I cannot find that he anywhere denies, that if a new trial is granted in a case of conviction, the party is put a second time, in jeopardy of his life. But it is no part of my right or duty, to enter upon the examination of the reasoning of the learned judge in that case,

First, because, in the constitution of Massachusetts, there is no clause similar to that contained in the constitution of the United States; and it is for the supreme court of the state, and not for me to decide what portion of the common law is in force therein. And secondly, because the supreme court of the state, is the appropriate and exclusive judge of its own powers under the constitution and laws of the state; and it may well be, that it has complete power to grant new trials in capital cases, when no such power exists in the courts of the United States. If this were not (as I think it is) a question of constitutional law, under the constitution of the United States, but under the laws of the United States, I can read in the judiciary act of 1789, c. 20, § 17 [1 Stat. 83], that the courts of the United States have not a universal power to grant new trials, but only "power to grant new trials in cases where there has been a trial by jury, for reasons for which new trials have been usually granted in courts of law." As far as the reasoning of the learned judge goes, it may show that it may be of great public utility, to have the power to grant new trials, in cases of capital convictions, and not in cases of capital acquittals. But this reasoning must address itself to the framers of the constitution, and not to those who are called upon to administer its actual provisions.

A case has also been cited from Virginia (Com. v. Jones, 1 Leigh, 598), where a motion for a new trial was entertained by the appellate court in a capital case after a conviction; and upon the merits was denied. But to this case as an authority bearing on the present question, two objections may be properly made; first, that the point was not made at the argument, nor considered by the court; and secondly, that the constitution of Virginia contains no prohibitory clause bearing upon the point; and consequently the right to entertain such a motion was dependent wholly upon the local jurisprudence; and whether it was conferred upon the court was matter of local law, turning upon no general principles.

Another case has been cited from the Indiana Reports (Jerry v. State, 1 Blackf. 395), in which a writ of error was brought in a capital case from a judgment of an inferior court, refusing to grant a new trial to the prisoner after a conviction, which was moved for upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to evidence. The supreme court of the state ordered the judgment of the court below to be reversed, and the verdict set aside, and a new trial granted upon the ground that strong doubts remained, whether the testimony supported the verdict. Upon this case it may in the first place be remarked, that a writ of error for the refusal of a court to grant a new trial does not lie at the common law; and so it has been repeatedly held in the supreme court of the United States, the granting of such new trial in any case being a matter of discretion. So that the case must stand upon some peculiarity of the local jurisprudence. And in the next place, though the constitution of Indiana does contain a prohibitory clause, like that in the constitution of the United States, it is not even alluded to in the opinion of the court, short and unsatisfactory as it is; and therefore we cannot know whether the point has ever been argued in that state, or not. Under such circumstances the case can have no intrinsic authority here.

In no one of the cases heretofore cited has the clause of the constitution of the United States been brought under the review of the court, or its interpretation ascertained. But there are cases in other courts of great respectability in which the question has come solemnly in judgment; and the true intent and meaning of the clause has been severely sifted. If I do not greatly mistake, some of these cases will be found to carry an opposite doctrine far beyond the limits necessary for the decision of the present case. One of these cases is People v. Goodwin (1820) 18 Johns. 187, where the whole subject was most elaborately examined by the counsel and the court. It was an indictment for manslaughter, and the jury, after the whole cause was heard, being unable to agree, were discharged by the court without the consent of the defendant. The question was, whether under these circumstances the defendant could be again put upon his trial. On the part of the defendant it was contended that he could not, among other reasons, because the constitution of the United States had declared, "nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb;" and that putting the party upon trial was putting him in jeopardy of life and limb. The argument on the other side was, that this clause did not apply to state courts; and if it did, it was inapplicable to the cause, for if the cause was sent to another jury, the defendant would not be twice in jeopardy, nor twice tried, for there never had been a trial, in which the merits had been decided on. The court inclined to the opinion that the clause was operative upon the state courts; but at all events that it was a sound and fundamental principle of the common law, that the true meaning of the clause was that no man shall be twice tried for the same offence; that the true test by which to decide the point, whether tried or not, is by the plea of autre fois acquit, or autre fois convict; and, finally, (what is more direct to the present purpose), that in a legal sense "a defendant is not once put in jeopardy until the verdict is rendered for or against him, and if for or against him he can never be drawn in question again for the same offence." And the court accordingly held that the discharge of the jury before giving a verdict was no bar to another trial of the defendant. Soon afterwards (in 1822) the same question occurred in Pennsylvania, before the supreme court of that state, in the case of Com. v. Cook, 6 Serg. & R. 577; and what makes it still more direct, as an authority, there is a provision in the state constitution of Pennsylvania exactly like that in the constitution of the United States. The court held that the discharge of the jury, because they could not agree, was unlawful, and was not a case of necessity within the meaning of the rule on the subject. Mr. Chief Justice Tilghman on that occasion said, where a party "is tried and acquitted on a bad indictment, he may be tried again, because his life was not in jeopardy. The court could not have given judgment against him, if he had been convicted. But where the indictment is good, and the jury are charged with the prisoner, his life is undoubtedly in jeopardy during their deliberation." "I grant that in case of necessity they (the jury) may be discharged; but if there be any thing short of absolute necessity, how can the court, without violating the constitution, take from the prisoner his right to have the jury kept together until they have agreed, so that he may not be put in jeopardy a second time?" So that the opinion of the learned chief justice, á fortiori, manifestly is, that if a verdict has been once regularly given upon a good indictment, the prisoner could not be tried again. Mr. Justice Duncan was still more full upon the point. After adverting to the case of People v. Goodwin, and the construction there given to the clause now under consideration, he said, "I feel a strong conviction that the construction here (there) given to this provision of the constitution of the United States, engrafted into the constitutions of Delaware, Kentucky, and Tennessee, and made an article in the bill of rights of this state, is not the true one, and that the provision that no person can be put twice in jeopardy of life and limb, means something more than that he shall not be twice tried for the same offence. It is borrowed from the common law; and a solemn construction it had received in the courts of common law ought to be given to it," &c. "This is not the signification of the words used in their common use nor in their grammatical or legal sense. 'Twice put in jeopardy,' and 'twice put on trial,' convey to the plainest understanding different ideas," &c. "There is a wide difference between a verdict given and jeopardy of a verdict. Hazard, peril, danger of a verdict, cannot mean a verdict given. Whenever the jury are charged with a prisoner, where the offence is punishable by death, and the indictment is not defective, he is in jeopardy of life." And he accordingly held, that in that case the jury, having been discharged, without giving any verdict, for an unjustifiable cause and without necessity, the prisoner was not liable to be tried again. And here I might repeat, á fortiori, if the jury had given a verdict he could not be tried again.

The same question came before the supreme court of North Carolina in State v. Garrigues, 1 Hayw. (N. C.) 241, and very recently again (in 1828, in Re Spier, 1 Dev. 491) before the same court, where the jury in a capital case had been discharged without legal necessity and had given no verdict. The court held that the prisoner could not be again tried. Upon this occasion the cases in the supreme courts of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania were cited, and the court adopted that of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and affirmed the exposition of the clause given by that court, that no man shall be twice put in jeopardy, &c. for the same offence. Mr. Justice Hall said: "When the jury were thus charged with the prisoner he certainly stood upon his trial; his life was jeopardized;" and he afterwards proceeded to the exceptions of a discharge from necessity, and when the indictment is bad. Mr. Chief Justice Taylor delivered a more elaborate opinion, insisting that "twice put in jeopardy," and "twice put on trial," convey to the mind several and distinct meanings; for we can readily understand how a person has been in jeopardy, upon whose case the jury have not passed. The danger and peril of a verdict do not relate to a verdict given. When the jury are impannelled upon the trial of a person for a capital offence, and the indictment is not defective, his life is in peril or jeopardy, and continues so throughout the trial.

Now, whatever diversity of opinion there may be among these learned judges as to the right and power of the court to discharge the jury in a capital case from giving any verdict, except in cases of extreme necessity, all of them agree in this, that after a verdict once given by the jury in a capital case, upon a good indictment, the party cannot be again tried for the same offence; and that such an attempt would be a violation of the constitution of the United States. The judges in Pennsylvania and North Carolina go farther, and deem the case within the prohibition of the constitution, if the party is once put upon trial before a jury, and the jury is discharged without giving a verdict, except in cases of extreme necessity.

Upon the question of discharging a jury in capital cases, the supreme court of the United States have in the case of U. S. v. Perez, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 579, adopted the doctrine of the supreme court of New York. Upon that occasion the court did not go into any exposition of the clause in the constitution now under consideration; but simply stated that in the case of Perez, the prisoner had not been convicted or acquitted, and therefore might again be put upon his defence. But I think I may say, that it was never for a moment at that time understood by the court, that if there had been a verdict of conviction or acquittal, the prisoner could be again tried for the same offence. The point was not before the court, and was not at all examined.

In the very recent case of People v. Comstock, 8 Wend. 549, the supreme court of New York treated it as perfectly certain and settled "that in offences greater than misdemeanors, a new trial cannot be granted on the merits, even where the prisoner has been convicted;" and the court placed the doctrine upon the same basis on which the English cases already cited have put it. I am not unaware that there is some general language attributed to the court in People v. Stone, 5 Wend. 39, which may bear a different interpretation. But it was a mere obiter dictum, and stands overruled by the later and more exactly considered cases.

Now, in the face of these authorities bearing directly on the point, and in which the interpretation of the clause of the constitution was before the court, I confess myself greatly distressed in attempting to give a different interpretation, without reducing the words to an unmeaning formulary, vox et præterea nihil. I find that my brother, the late Mr. Justice WASHINGTON, in the case of U. S. v. Haskell [Case No. 15,321], where a jury had been discharged in a capital case, before verdict, on account of the insanity of one of the jurymen, held that there might be a new trial; and that the discharge was no bar to a further prosecution—upon that occasion, he said that the jeopardy spoken of in this article can be interpreted to mean nothing short of the acquittal or conviction of the prisoner, and the judgment of the court thereon. And he asserted this to be the meaning affixed to the expression of the common law. Upon this I should greatly doubt as a doctrine universally true, especially when I find that it differs from the doctrine maintained by Mr. Justice Blackstone in his Commentaries (4 Comm. 336), as well as in some other authorities (see, on this subject, Vaux's Case, 4 Coke, 44, 45; Wigg's Case, Id. 45, 46; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 36, §§ 13. 14, 19. But see 2 Hale, P. C. c. 32, p. 251; Id. c. 55, p. 391; Id., c. 31, p. 243); for, then, there would be no distinction between the plea of autre fois convict and the plea of autre fois attaint, of the same offence; and yet a distinction is manifestly maintained between them. And if it were even true that the plea of autre fois acquit or autre fois convict without a judgment, could not be pleaded technically as a bar to another prosecution or another indictment, it would not follow that it might not be a good bar to a new trial upon the same indictment, when there had already been one trial regularly had upon the ground of the maxim already adverted to; for upon the first trial the life of the prisoner was certainly in jeopardy. Mr. Justice Washington afterwards says, that the article does not apply to a jeopardy short of a conviction; which may be true, if we are to understand by conviction (as is certainly the legal sense), a verdict against or confession by the party of record. See 4 Bl. Comm. 362; 4 Coke, 46; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 36, § 9; 1 Chit. Cr. Law (2 Lond. Ed.) 462. But what with me is decisive against the construction of the clause of the constitution given by Mr. Justice Washington is, that he puts it as clear upon his interpretation, that after a verdict of acquittal in a capital case (upon a good indictment) the court might still award a new trial against the prisoner. And he puts the case (to illustrate this doctrine) of an acquittal of the prisoner procured by his own fraud. Now, I am not aware that the maxim has ever received such an interpretation from any other judge; and all the authorities which I have seen are against it. I confess my extreme repugnance to adopt any interpretation of the maxim, which shall lead to such consequences. It would remove the whole force of the prohibition, and submit the whole subject in criminal trials to the discretion of the court. I have always understood that the great object of this clause was, on the contrary, to take away all discretion, and to forbid all courts of the United States from trying a man twice upon a good indictment for the same offence. It has been supposed that in all cases of conviction there may be ground to grant a new trial, because it will always be in favor of the prisoner. If this were true, the difficulty would still remain, that the constitution does not provide for a new trial only where it is favorable to the prisoner. If the twice being put in jeopardy is referrible only to cases after judgment, and not after verdict; and before judgment, even a new trial may be granted, though it may be unfavorable to him. Cases of conviction may readily be conceived, in which a new trial may be injurious to the prisoner. If, after conviction, it may be granted at his request, it may also be granted without his consent. Suppose a man indicted for murder and convicted of manslaughter; can a new trial be granted at all, unless by putting him twice in jeopardy of his life? Suppose a robbery of the mail, charged in the indictment with being effected by wounding the carrier, or putting his life in jeopardy (which is a capital offence), and there is a conviction of the robbery without such aggravated circumstances, can a new trial be granted, upon the application of the government or of the prisoner? Many other cases of a like nature may be easily put, where the offence in an aggravated form is a capital felony, and without such aggravations not. Yet the power to grant a new trial in cases of conviction, if it exists at all, is general, and may be required by the government as well as by the prisoner.

Upon the whole, having given this subject the fullest consideration, I am, upon the most mature deliberation, of opinion that this court does not possess the power to grant a new trial, in a case of a good indictment, after a trial by a competent and regular jury, whether there be a verdict of acquittal or conviction. My judgment is, that the words in the constitution, "Nor shall any person be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb," mean that no person shall be tried a second time for the same offence, where a verdict has been already given by a jury. The party tried is in a legal sense, as well as in common sense, in jeopardy of his life, when a lawful jury have once had charge of his offence as a capital offence upon a good indictment, and have delivered themselves of the charge by a verdict. In this respect I follow the doctrine of the supreme court of New York; and the doctrine of the supreme court of Pennsylvania and North Carolina goes not only to the same extent, but includes cases where the party is once put upon his trial before the jury, and they are discharged from giving a verdict without extreme necessity. This too is the clear, determinate and well settled doctrine of the common law, acting upon the same principle, as a fundamental rule of criminal jurisprudence. I deem it a privilege of inestimable value to the citizen; and that it was introduced into the constitution upon the soundest principles of prudence and justice. But if it were otherwise, it is my duty to administer the constitution as it stands and not to incorporate new provisions into it. If this clause does not prohibit a new trial, where there has already been a regular trial and verdict, then it is wholly immaterial whether the verdict is of acquittal or of conviction of the offence; and the same party may, in the discretion of the court, be put upon his trial ten, nay, twenty times, if the court should deem it fit. It was (as I think) among other things, to get rid of the terrible precedents on this subject alluded to by Lord Hale, and even acted upon by him, in the reign of Charles II., in discharging juries from giving verdicts upon frivolous or oppressive suggestions, that this great maxim of the common law was engrafted into the constitution. The constitution has also in another clause declared, that "no fact once tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." The only modes of making this re-examination known to the common law, are by a writ of error and a new trial, and if by the common law there cannot be a new trial in a capital case, after a regular trial once had upon a good indictment, as seems to me to be conclusively established by the English authorities already cited, then this clause also carries in its bosom another virtual prohibition.

Lest I should be thought to have overlooked the case of U. S. v. Daniel, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 542, where the circuit court divided upon the motion for a new trial, I beg only to say that the point whether the circuit court had jurisdiction to grant a new trial in a capital case, was not before the court. It was a mere certificate of division of opinion of the circuit court; and the supreme court held that it had no jurisdiction to entertain the point certified, so far as it regarded a new trial.

If the language used by me in the Commentaries on the Constitution (3 Story, Const. c. 38, § 1788) should be thought to inculcate a different doctrine, I can only say that I do not so understand it. I have no doubt that there are cases where there may be a new trial; as in cases of a mis-trial by an improper jury. See People v. M'Kay, 18 Johns. 212; 2 Hawk. bk. 2, c. 36, § 15; Rex v. Keite, 1 Ld. Raym. 139; 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 27, § 104; Id. c. 47, § 42; Arundel's Case, 6 Coke, 14. But in the language there used, it should be considered that the author was not summing up his own private or judicial opinions, but only gathering together the opinions of others, which had come to his knowledge, to illustrate the text. But if there be any erroneous opinions inculcated in those Commentaries, which upon more deliberate examination I should deem unfounded, I trust that I shall be the last person to insist upon them as obligatory or correct. My duty, as a judge, is to pronounce such a judgment as my conscience dictates, without reference to any preconceived opinions. But I freely admit that I see nothing in that passage of the Commentaries, so far as relates to the granting of new trials, which I deem incorrect, or which I wish to retract.

It may be thought by some, that there may be great inconvenience in the establishment of this doctrine. But if there be, it is for those who possess the power to amend the constitution to apply the proper remedy. For myself, I entertain great doubts whether, in the actual administration of public justice, the present doctrine would not be far more safe and useful than an unlimited power to grant new trials in all capital cases, at the mere discretion of the court. It may be, that a court may sometimes err in the proper administration of the law; and it may also err in granting or refusing a new trial. But the consciousness that the trial is final, will always impress every court, mindful of its duty, with the utmost caution in all its opinions and judgments in capital cases, where the result may be unfavorable to the prisoner. It will naturally induce it to lean to the side of mercy; and it will look anxiously to the dictates of the law. But still if, after all, errors should intervene, it will be but the common infirmity of the administration of all human justice. And the prisoner, even in such a case, will not be wholly without redress. He may apply for a pardon or mitigation of the sentence, to the executive; and it cannot be doubted that the court itself, if conscious of any serious error, would cheerfully aid in his application. Hitherto this ultimate appeal to the pardoning power has been deemed satisfactory and safe in the land of our ancestors down to our own age; and it has been deemed equally satisfactory and safe in all those states whose jurisprudence does not permit a new trial in capital cases under like circumstances. But whatever might be my opinion as to the authority of this court to grant a new trial in capital cases generally, I shall, under the present circumstances go over all the grounds insisted upon by the prisoner's counsel (some of which being in arrest of judgment, are indispensable to be disposed of before judgment), because if any error in point of law has been committed by the court, injurious to the prisoners, or upon established principles of law, they ought (if the court could grant it) to have a new trial, I should feel it my duty to make a direct application in their behalf to the executive for a pardon, to redress the error. God forbid that any man in this country should suffer death against the law, from the mere infirmity of judgment of those who are appointed to preside at his trial.

The first cause assigned for a new trial is the discovery of new evidence. For the present I shall pass over this point, intending to examine it when all the other grounds shall have been passed under review.

The second cause is, that the prisoners were not permitted to be tried separately, although they made a motion for this purpose. Now, this has been long since settled by the supreme court of the United States to be a matter, not of right, but of sound discretion to be exercised by the court. So it was held in the case of U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480, upon the fullest consideration. The sole ground upon which the present motion was made, was that by means of separate trials, the prisoners wished and intended to make use of the testimony of each other in their defence. Now I was of opinion, and still am, that the reason assigned was wholly, in a legal point of view, inadequate to justify the court in the exercise of such a discretion. The charge was a charge of a joint piracy on the high seas, committed by all the prisoners, found by the grand jury upon their oaths, and therefore to be taken primâ facie to be well supported by competent evidence before them. There is no pretence now to say, when the trial has been had, that there was not a solid ground of probable cause to put all the prisoners in the indictment as confederates in the act, or that any of the prisoners were included upon mere false suggestions, to evade their testimony. It is clear by law that confederates in the same piracy, put upon trial at the same time, are not competent witnesses for each other. And I do exceedingly doubt whether in point of law the court possess the right to make witnesses competent in a trial by any act of their own, who would otherwise be incompetent. The government has rights as well as the prisoners. The government is not to be deprived of its rights merely because the prisoners request a separate trial. In a joint trial the government has a right to exclude all the prisoners from being witnesses. If the court deprive the government of this right, it is an exercise of power which may sometimes subvert the purposes of justice. It certainly does not necessarily promote it. It is no just cause of complaint on the part of prisoners, that they stand jointly indicted; for they can rarely be so, except where they have mixed themselves up with the criminal transaction in a manner which in the sober judgment of the grand jury implicates them in the common guilt. I have never before known a case, in which the sole ground for a separate trial has been to make the witnesses competent for each other. In the only cases in the circuit court in which a separate trial has been granted, there has been an express disclaimer of using the confederates as witnesses; and the defence has been exclusively placed upon several and distinct grounds. In the present case the main argument was at the trial, and now is rested upon a defence common to all the prisoners, viz. that the robbery was not by the Panda or her crew; but by some other vessel. If, therefore, the question were now to be decided over again, I should, under the circumstances, refuse to concur in a separate trial of the prisoners. I should doubt the legal right so to do, for the cause assigned. And I cannot but think that the granting it in a case of this sort (in which, if in any case, there ought to be a joint trial), would be an abuse, and not a just use of a sound discretion.

The third, fourth and fifth causes embrace in different forms the same subject matter. The prisoners, who are all foreigners and strangers to our institutions, and do not, as far as we know, speak or understand the English language, and with whom the court could communicate only by an interpreter, were, after the indictment was found against them, brought into court and were informed that they were entitled to copies of the indictment, and should be furnished with them two full days before they were required to plead; and that they were entitled to counsel to assist them in the defence, and that the court would assign such counsel as they desired,—and accordingly the learned gentlemen, who have since conducted the defence, were so assigned; and that at a subsequent time, after two full days, they would be arraigned and required to plead to the indictment. Accordingly, after this period had elapsed and the copies were duly furnished, the prisoners were brought to the bar, and in the presence of their counsel were arraigned, and upon their arraignment they severally pleaded not guilty. But, as is said, the clerk of the court upon this arraignment did not further proceed, upon their pleading not guilty, to ask the prisoners how they would be tried, so that they did not make the usual and common reply, "By God and the country." The district attorney then moved the court to assign a time for the trial of the prisoners, and accordingly, at the request of the prisoners' counsel, a particular day, named by themselves, was assigned for the trial. It was then stated to the prisoners, that they were to be tried by a jury, that the list of the jurors would be furnished to each of them (and they were accordingly furnished) two full days before the trial, that they might exercise their full right of challenge. Accordingly at the time assigned the prisoners were brought to bar for trial; they were then distinctly and in the usual manner informed by the clerk, that they were then set at the bar to be tried, and that the good men and true, whom he was then to call, were to pass between them and the United States at the trial; and that if they would object to any of them, they must do it as they were called, and before they were sworn. The jury were accordingly called, and not the slightest objection to the trial by the jury was intimated, either by the prisoners or their counsel; but the prisoners proceeded, with the assistance of counsel, to make their challenges, (amounting, I believe, in all, to thirty-six), and all the jurors sworn and impannelled were those to whom they declared that they had no objection. The whole cause was then most elaborately examined and heard; the fullest defence made; and the jury returned their verdict, as it appears upon the record. Now, the objection is, not that no similiter is joined (for it is admitted that this is not necessary) but that there is no issue to the country, until the prisoners have expressly put themselves, by the words already quoted, "upon God and the country;" and that until such an issue there can be no trial. In order fully to understand the nature of the objection it may be well to state the course of the proceedings at the common law in England; and this may be taken from the very ample account given by Mr. Justice Blackstone in his Commentaries (4 Comm. c. 25, pp. 322–331; Id. c. 26, pp. 332–341). See, also, 2 Hale, P. C. c. 43, pp. 314–322; Id. c. 28, pp. 216–225. When the prisoner is brought into court to answer the indictment, he is said to be brought in to be arraigned thereon; for "to arraign is nothing else but to call the prisoner to the bar of the court, to answer the matter charged upon him by the indictment." The indictment is then read to him, and when called upon to answer, he either stands mute or confesses the fact (which we may call incidents to the arraignment), or else he pleads to the indictment. Regularly a prisoner is said to stand mute upon being arraigned upon a capital felony, when he either (1) makes no answer at all; or (2) answers foreign to the purpose or with such matter as is not allowable, and will not answer otherwise, or (3) what is most material to the present purpose, upon having pleaded not guilty, refuses to put himself upon the country. If he says nothing, the court ought ex officio to impannel a jury to inquire, whether ne stands obstinately mute, or whether he be dumb ex visitatione Dei. If the latter is the case the court proceed to the trial, and examine all the points, as if he had pleaded not guilty. If he be found obstinately mute, in cases of treason and petit larceny and misdemeanors, his standing mute was deemed equivalent to a conviction, and he received the same judgment and execution. In other capital felonies the prisoner was not anciently deemed convicted, but for his obstinacy he received the terrible sentence of penance, or peine forte et dure (as it was called) which in substance was, that he was put into a low, dark chamber, laid on his back naked, and a weight of iron, as great as he could bear, placed on his body; he was to have no sustenance save only on one day three morsels of the worst bread, and on the second day three draughts of standing water that should be nearest to the prison door; and in this situation this should alternately be his diet till he died. And this remained the law in England, though rarely put in force, until 12 Geo. III. c. 20, when it was enacted that all persons who should stand mute on being arraigned for felony or piracy, should be deemed convicted of the offence and punished accordingly.

We next come to consider the general issue, as it is called, which is the plea of not guilty. When upon his arraignment the prisoner pleaded not guilty, the clerk immediately enters upon the record "Not guilty," or as it stood anciently abbreviated, "Non cul" for "non culpabilis"; and immediately the reply of the government, supposed to be [3] given viva voce, that the prisoner is guilty (and by Blackstone supposed to be indicated by the abbreviation "cul. prit."), though in point of fact such reply is never formally made. When this is done issue is then said to be joined; for Mr. Justice Blackstone informs us that, "immediately upon issue joined, it is inquired of the prisoner, by what trial he will make his innocence appear," which the clerk does by the words, "How wilt thou be tried." And indeed this must necessarily be so, for until an issue is virtually joined between the parties, there is nothing to be tried, and of course there can be no trial, until something is to be tried. And the question propounded becomes thus intelligible. So that the remark of the district attorney is critically correct, that there is a joinder of the issue, before we arrive at this stage of the arraignment. See 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 416. In order to ascertain why this inquiry is made, it is necessary to state that anciently in England the party accused had his choice of being tried in one of two manners, by battel, or by a jury. And in those times of course it was indispensable that he should be put to his election. If he chose the trial by battel, he was accustomed to say that he would be tried by God; if by a jury, that he would be tried by the country. But since the trial by battel was abolished (as it has been for ages upon indictments), there can be no trial but by a jury; and hence in England, where the old form was still retained, the refusal to answer that he would be tried by God and the country was treated as a refusal to put himself upon the inquest in the usual manner, and therefore as legally standing mute. Now in America, the trial by battel was never introduced at all; and the only trial since the first settlement of the country has always, in criminal cases, been by a jury; and could not be in any other manner. But in England the right of trial by battel in certain cases continued down to our own day, viz. in cases of appeals and approvements; and as late as the case of Ashford v. Thornton, 1 Barn. & Ald. 405, in 1818, was acted upon, though it has been since abolished by a recent statute. The continuation of the form in England may thus be easily accounted for; and though in America it has very probably been acted upon in many states, it would be proper only, where the common law rule that the party might otherwise be deemed to stand mute, was in force; for I believe that the punishment of peine forte et dure, never was adopted in any part of America. And it seems to me, that in all those states, where the constitution provides that the trial of all crimes shall be by a jury, and the prisoner pleads not guilty, it is a mere mockery to ask him how he will be tried, for the constitution has already declared how it shall be.

But be this as it may under the state governments, I am clearly of opinion, that the form is wholly unnecessary under the constitution and laws of the United States in the federal courts. The constitution has expressly declared, "that the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury." It is imperative upon the courts, and prisoners can be lawfully tried in no other manner. As soon, therefore, as it judicially appears of record that a party has pleaded not guilty, there is an issue in a criminal case, which the court are bound to direct to be tried by a jury. The plea of not guilty does import of itself a tender of a proper issue, and the attorney for the government, in demanding a trial of that issue, necessarily requires it to be by a jury. And so in point of fact, the plea of not guilty is always understood by the court. When the clerk enters it upon record, in making up the record he usually adds to it "and of this he (the prisoner) puts himself upon the country." And in misdemeanors this is the common course in England. And why? Plainly because in the case of a misdemeanor there never could be any other trial than by jury; and therefore, in cases of misdemeanor, the prisoner never is asked how he will be tried; but his plea of not guilty is of itself an issue to the country. The laws of the United States establish this to be the true view of the matter, at least in the courts of the United States.

The crimes act of 1790 (chapter 9, § 30) provides that if any person shall be indicted for treason, and shall stand mute or refuse to plead, or shall challenge peremptorily above thirty-five of the jury; or if any person be indicted of any other capital offence, &c., if he shall stand mute or will not answer to the indictment, or challenge peremptorily above twenty of the jury, the court in any of these cases, shall, notwithstanding, proceed to the trial of such person, as if he had pleaded not guilty, and render judgment thereon accordingly. And the act of 1825, c. 276, § 14 [3 Story's Laws, 2002; 4 Stat. 118], provides the like rule in regard to offences not capital, declaring that in such cases the court shall proceed to the trial of such person as if he had pleaded not guilty, and upon the verdict render judgment accordingly. Both of these statutes clearly establish that the party is not to be understood to stand mute, when he has pleaded not guilty; and that as soon as the plea of not guilty is put in, the cause must be tried by the jury. It is impossible, consistently with the language of these acts, for the court to adjudge that the party stands mute, when he pleads not guilty; and if he does not, in contemplation of law, stand mute after such plea, then the plea of not guilty includes every thing essential to put him on trial by the jury.

It ought to be added, that the present, being a charge of piracy on the high seas, was not originally or practically within the ancient rules of proceedings at the common law on land. On the contrary until the statute of 28 Henry VIII. (chapter 13), piracies on the high seas were exclusively triable in the admiralty according to the course of the civil law; and that statute first made them triable by a jury in the common form of jury trials. 4 Bl. Comm. 71, 269; 1 Hawk. P. C. bk. 1, c. 20, §§ 17, 18. So that the trial by battel was never applied to them; nor until the statute of Henry VIII. were the forms of arraignment consequent thereon at the common law. Besides, what is the reason, even at the common law, of asking the prisoner how he will be tried? It is to ascertain whether he consents to a trial by jury. If he does consent in any clear and determinate manner, it is manifest that he cannot object that the form has not been gone through, if the substance has been preserved. Now, in the present case there is the most ample proof of a consent, if consent were necessary, by the acts of the prisoners, and of their counsel before and at the trial. And if the prisoners had refused to consent, the trial must have been in the same manner precisely as it has been had. But I confess for one, that I deem it a little short of an absurdity in the courts of the United States to call upon the prisoners, after they have pleaded not guilty, to say how they will be tried, when the constitution and laws have peremptorily required the trial to be by jury. Suppose the prisoners had been asked, how they would be tried, and they had answered that they wished for no trial at all; must not the court have proceeded to try them upon the plea of not guilty? Suppose they had answered that they wished to be tried by the court, could the court have tried the cause otherwise than by jury? Suppose they had been silent as to how, and when, and whether, they should be tried, could the court have done otherwise than order a trial by jury? We have no authority to inflict the punishment of the peine forte et dure (and I trust our courts never will have it), and our laws manifestly contemplate no such thing as either legal or necessary. It appears that by a recent statute in England (St. 8 Geo IV. c. 28) it is provided that, if a person being arraigned upon an indictment for treason, felony, or piracy, shall plead thereto a plea of not guilty, he shall by such plea, without further form, be deemed to have put himself upon the country for trial. And this is precisely what our laws, in my judgment, do in effect prescribe. The provision was indispensable in England, since the refusal of the prisoner to state, after he had pleaded not guilty, how he would be tried, was deemed in law as standing mute. In our law he cannot be deemed to stand mute, when he has pleaded not guilty. The constitution decides how he shall be tried, independent of any election on his part. The plea of not guilty puts the party for all purposes upon his trial by jury. My judgment, therefore, is that there is nothing in this objection.

The sixth cause respects the overruling by the court of a question asked by the prisoners' counsel, the relevancy of which was not perceived by the court, and the counsel refused to state it. The fact afterwards came out (I believe) incidentally upon the answer to other questions. But at all events, the relevancy of the question not having been shown at the time (and indeed not even now at the argument), it is clear that there is no ground to say that it ought to have been put. It would otherwise happen, that the right of cross-examination might extend to everything, whether it were material or immaterial, which had occurred in the whole course of the witness's life.

The seventh objection relates to certain supposed errors in the instruction of the court. The first specification respects the supposed remark of the court that Perez was not an accomplice. What the court actually said was this—After stating to the jury that a conviction ought not to be upon the naked testimony of an accomplice, unless strongly corroborated by other evidence or circumstances, the court said, that it was not to be taken as a matter of course that Perez was an accomplice. That was for the jury to consider. Perez, in his testimony, utterly denied that he was an accomplice; the defence was, that the crime was never committed by any of the crew of the Panda; and if the crime never was committed at all, Perez could not be an accomplice. The government alone insisted that Perez was an accomplice. And under these circumstances, the jury were to say, whether he was an accomplice or not, upon the evidence. It is now argued (as I understand it) that Perez might have been an accomplice, although the crime was never committed. This appears to me, in point of law, wholly unmaintainable—and at all events, the court left the matter to the jury upon the whole facts, exactly as the evidence and circumstances placed it before them.

The next specification is to the supposed instruction of the court as to the effect of the non-production of the written examinations, under the circumstances. These circumstances took place in the presence of the court and jury. The counsel for the prisoners made a written demand of the district attorney to produce the examinations of Perez and several of the prisoners taken at Fernando Po; the district attorney offered to produce them, if the prisoners would read them, or suffer them to be read, to the jury. The counsel for the prisoners declined to receive them upon that condition. But they afterwards stated that the district attorney might, if he chose, read them to the jury, as papers produced by him; and they would waive any objection to the examination of Perez being under oath. The district attorney declined so doing, saying he was not in the habit of using the confessions of prisoners against them. Such was the substance of the proceedings—and the court were asked, under these circumstances, to instruct the jury that the suppression of the examination of Perez by the district attorney, afforded a legal presumption, that if produced, that examination would be unfavorable to the credit of Perez. Whether the district attorney was right or not in insisting upon the withholding of the examinations, unless upon the terms proposed by himself; and whether the counsel for the prisoners were discreet or not in their offer, which was not accepted, are matters with which the court had nothing to do, and upon which they were not bound to express any opinion; and with which I do not now intermeddle, for they are matters properly resting in the discretion of the counsel on each side. But the court left the whole matter to the jury, instructing them that they might draw such inferences from the circumstances in evidence as they pleased, and which were warranted by them, provided they were not unfavorable to any of the prisoners; and that they ought not to presume any thing from these circumstances against the prisoners. In this instruction I cannot now perceive any thing objectionable. And I know not how, consistently with the rules of law, the court could have told the jury that the circumstances afforded a legal presumption against the credit of Perez.

Another specification is the supposed instruction of the court as to Captain Trotter's liability for loss and damages occasioned by the capture of the Panda. At the trial a vast deal of argument was urged to the jury by the closing counsel for the prisoners, to establish gross misconduct on the part of Captain Trotter, and his liability to losses and damages for his acts; and thus to found imputations that he had a vital interest in this prosecution, and to influence the testimony of the witnesses. And upon the present motion, the same line of argument has been with even more zeal and earnestness pressed upon the court. At the trial the court said, that they did not perceive that these charges were made out by the evidence, but of that the jury would judge for themselves. But that the guilt or innocence of the prisoners at the bar did not depend upon the good conduct or malconduct of Captain Trotter. That Captain Trotter may have conducted himself incorrectly, and yet the prisoners may be guilty. And on the other hand, he may have had probable cause for the capture, and have acted bona fide, and with the most correct intentions, and yet the prisoners may be innocent. This instruction I then thought, and still think, entirely correct; and I cannot think that it was at all injurious to the prisoners.

Another specification is the supposed instruction of the court that certain confessions of the prisoners were proper for the consideration of the jury. It is to be observed, that none of these confessions were brought out by the district attorney against the prisoners upon the direct examination of the witnesses—but they were all brought out upon the cross-examination of the prisoners' own counsel. The court stated to the jury that these confessions were not to be viewed in any different light from their coming out upon the cross-examination, from what they would be, if they had come out upon the direct examination. But that these confessions, so far as they were not reduced to writing, were in the case, and were to be considered by the jury. And afterwards, upon the suggestion of the prisoners' counsel (whether rightly or not I do not now say in point of law) that the confessions, reduced to writing, and not now produced, ought to be disregarded by them, although they came out upon direct interrogatories of the cross-examining counsel. In this instruction I can as yet perceive no error; though I confess that upon farther reflection, I do doubt, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the court were right in directing the jury to disregard the confessions of the prisoners which were reduced to writing and not produced. But if there was any error in this direction, it was manifestly favorable to the prisoners.

The next specification referred to the same matter of the suppression of the said written examinations and confessions of the prisoners by the district attorney, under the circumstances above-mentioned, and called upon the court to instruct the jury, that, under the present circumstances, the suppression of these writings afforded a legal presumption that, if the same were brought forward, the effect thereof would be in favor of the prisoners. The court left the matter at large to the jury, in the manner above-mentioned, as matter of fact, and presumption of fact, to be weighed by the jury, but with the express direction that they ought not to presume any thing unfavorable to the prisoners. There was no matter of presumption of law in the case, but of presumption of fact only; and I am entirely satisfied that the court did all that it ought in law to have done in this direction.

The next specification is upon the same subject, and required the court to decide, that the district attorney ought to have put these writings into the case, or the parol testimony of the same confessions, which had been proved to be reduced to writing, ought to have been wholly rejected, and considered out of the case. The court did, under the circumstances (as above stated), direct the jury to disregard the parol testimony of any of the confessions which were reduced to writing. The district attorney did offer to put these writings into the case, if the prisoners' counsel required him to do it. So that there is no legal ground of complaint on this head.

Another specification respects the confessions, stated to have been made by the witnesses, or one of them, of some of the prisoners at the bar, without naming them, being allowed to go as evidence to the jury. Now, the confessions thus referred to, were brought out upon pointed interrogatories in the cross-examination: and the counsel for the prisoners did not follow up the cross-examination, and ask who the particular prisoners were. Upon examining my minutes of the testimony, I find that Domingo said, that he heard some of the crew confess to the captain of an English brig, that they had robbed an American brig. They had a Portuguese interpreter, who spoke English and Portuguese. The first five that were captured, confessed. Some of them are here. He afterwards stated, that some of them were examined on board, and some on shore, at Fernando Po: and he proceeded to give the names of those who confessed at Fernando Po, viz. Montenegro, Garcia, Castillo, Perez, Delgado, and Guzman. Now there was evidence, in other parts of the testimony, to show that the five who were first captured were Montenegro, Garcia, Castillo, Perez, and Delgado. Silveira (another witness), according to my minutes, testified to various confessions. Among others, he stated that he went in an English transport, with five others, viz. Delgado, Perez, Garcia, Montenegro, and Castillo, to Ascension; that some of the prisoners at the bar told him at Ascension, that they had robbed the Mexican. He stated, also, that they had confessed it to him, not once or twice, but several times; that the three of the prisoners, who were present at the governor's house at Fernando Po, said they had robbed the Mexican; that the day before they denied it, but this last day they all confessed it, and laid the blame to the captain and officers; that the declarations at the governor's house were not taken down in writing. Now these are but part of the confessions stated in the case, for Perez stated others; and the whole matter, as matter of evidence, was left to the jury under all the instructions in the case; and the court instructed the jury on this point, that if the persons who made the confessions at any time were not identified, but the statement was only that some did, or three did confess, not being named, and not being identified, such confessions could not be applied to any of the prisoners in particular as proofs of his guilt; but the evidence under such circumstances being in the case, might be weighed by them, so far as it applied to the identification of the Panda as the vessel which committed the robbery of the Mexican. Upon the most mature reflection, I am not persuaded that there was any error in this instruction.

The next specification is, that the court declined to instruct the jury, under the circumstances stated in the instruction prayed, that a legal presumption arose that the log-book of the Panda was taken at the same time and place, and by the same captors, and that they have it, or have destroyed it. Now, without dwelling upon the manifest impropriety of giving this instruction as asked, as it assumes certain facts, not admitted to be proved, the court, in my judgment, would not have been justified in giving any such instruction as a matter of law. But the testimony, so far as there was any evidence on the point before the jury, positively denied any possession of the log-book by the captors; and Mr. Quentin directly stated, that it was not on board at the time when he boarded and captured the Panda; and that he never heard of its having been obtained afterwards. And there was not a tittle of proof upon the other side that it had come to the possession of the captors. The court did, however, instruct the jury, that if they did believe that the log-book of the Panda had come to the possession or power of the captors, or of the government officers, their omission now to produce it was a circumstance unfavorable to the captors, and favorable to the prisoners. It appears to me that this was going to the extreme limits of the law in favor of the prisoners.

The next specification being to the same point requires no further notice. The court gave an instruction in favor of the prisoners, if the log-book was proved to be in the possession or power of the government prosecutors.

The next specification is, that the court admitted parol evidence to establish the time of the sailing of the Panda on her voyage from Havana to Cape Mount, and to prove the course and termination of the voyage, without proving that the log-book was missing or lost. This objection is, as I understand it, founded upon the notion that the log-book is not only evidence of these facts, but the only proper evidence, and the best evidence, if it can be produced. I do not so understand the law. The log-book is in no just sense proof per se of the facts therein stated, except in certain cases provided for by statute. It is not evidence under oath. It does not import legal verity. It could not, if it had been produced by the prisoners, have been per se admitted (if objected to) as evidence of the facts stated therein. It would be mere hearsay not under oath. It might be introduced against those of the prisoners, to whom it should be brought home as having a concern in writing or directing what should be contained therein, to contradict their statements or their defence. But I am yet to learn that parties can thus create evidence for themselves by inserting facts in a log-book. I know of no such rule of law; and no authorities are introduced to establish its existence. In the most common class of cases in which the log-book is used, those of insurance, the log-book has never, to my knowledge, been allowed (if objected to) as proof of the loss for the assured. The officers or others of the crew, constantly prove all the facts by parol. The log-book is often called for by the underwriters to contradict their statements on the stand; or to control or weaken the influence of these statements.

The next specification is, that the court declined to instruct the jury that under the circumstances proved, resistance, flight, or the destroying of the Panda by her officers and crew would be exercising the right of self-defence on the part of the said officers and crew. For myself, I confess that it is utterly inconceivable to me, how the court could give any instruction in the manner required by this prayer. What were the circumstances? They were matters of fact to be ascertained and fixed by the jury. The court could not affirm what they were, or, before they were ascertained, declare to what extent the right of resistance might go. The court cannot judicially know why and wherefore the flight of the Panda's crew took place. It may conjecture that the jury have thought that it was occasioned by a fear of being captured, as pirates. But we cannot say so. Neither can we, nor could we at the trial say why it was done, or whether it was done for other justifiable reasons. It did not indeed appear from any evidence in the case, that there was any resistance to capture by the Panda's crew. And the defence expressly denied that there was any intention to blow up the vessel. On the contrary, an elaborate argument was introduced to establish the contrary. It is a little difficult, therefore, to see why these ingredients should have been thought so essential to the merits of the case presented in behalf of the prisoners. But the court left the whole matter to the jury, and stated that if the Panda's crew did believe and act upon the ground, that there was an intended hostile attack by public enemies or by pirates, their right of resistance and self-defence in any manner which they might deem most beneficial, was not to be doubted. As I understood the application of the prisoners' counsel, the court enlarged the prayer from a mere hostile attack (which was supposed to mean an attack of public enemies) to an attack also by pirates. But in every view my opinion is that the court stated the law correctly, and could not properly have gone farther.

The next and last specification under this head is that the court declined to instruct the jury that the failure of the government to produce the witness, who (it was testified) saw the match applied for the purpose of blowing up the Panda, and removed it, afforded a legal presumption against the truth of the alleged attempt by the prisoner Ruiz to destroy the Panda. Now it appears to me, that if there was any presumption at all to be drawn from this failure to produce the witness, it was a presumption of fact, and not a presumption of law; and as a presumption of fact, it was most strenuously urged to the jury by the prisoners' counsel. The argument now is, that although Mr. Quentin, who was upon the stand, stated that he was on board at the same time with the witness, that he saw the smoke coming from the cabin, and the absent witness go down, and bring up the match, and many other circumstances to establish an intention to set the Panda on fire and blow her up; yet that his testimony was not the best evidence on this point, and ought to be rejected; and not only so, but the failure to produce the witness afforded a legal presumption against the truth of the alleged attempt to destroy the Panda. It appears to me that the whole basis of the argument is founded upon a mistake of the meaning of the rule of law as to the production of the best evidence. The rule is not applied to evidence of the same nature and degree; but it is applied to reject secondary and inferior evidence in proof of a fact, which leaves evidence of a higher and superior nature behind, in the possession or power of the party. Thus, if the party offers a copy of a paper in evidence, when he has the original in his possession, the copy will be rejected, for the original is evidence of a higher nature. So, oral testimony is inadmissible to prove the contents of a written instrument, when the paper is in the possession or power of the party; for it is not of so high a nature as the paper itself. But the rule does not apply to several eye witnesses testifying to the same facts, or parts of the same facts, for the testimony is all in the same degree; and where there are several eye witnesses to the same facts, they may be proved by the testimony of one only. All need not be produced. If they are not produced, the evidence may be less satisfactory or less conclusive, but still it is not incompetent. And to apply the principle to the present objection, Mr. Quentin was a competent witness to prove all the facts, which he knew, which went to establish an intention to blow up the Panda. That another witness might have proved more and other facts to the same purpose, which might have been more full and satisfactory and conclusive to the jury, does not render Mr. Quentin's testimony incompetent. The defects in the evidence, whatever they might be, are very proper matters of observation to the jury, to create doubts or justify disbelief of any intention to blow up the Panda. But the jury were to judge of all these matters in weighing the whole evidence on this particular point. A witness who has seen a party write several times is a good witness to prove his handwriting. But a clerk in the counting-room of the party, who has seen him write innumerable times, would be in many cases a more satisfactory witness to prove the handwriting. But nobody can doubt that each would be a competent witness of the facts within his knowledge to prove the handwriting.

Another cause assigned for a new trial is that the jury were furnished with newspapers in their room, and did read them during the pendency of the trial; and subsequently another ground was added in a supplementary paper, that the jury drank ardent spirits while they had the cause in charge. It is important to a right understanding of these objections, to state the real facts and circumstances attendant upon the trial. The trial lasted, I believe, about fifteen days, during which time the jury were kept together night and day in the custody of officers. Some of them were engaged in very pressing business, which required them to communicate with friends respecting that business; and one or more of them was in ill health during the trial, and was obliged to have the aid of a physician. These circumstances were stated in open court, and it was agreed between the counsel in open court, that the jury might have all reasonable refreshments during the trial, that they might communicate on business with their friends, and write and receive papers from their friends on business, the papers being previously examined, and the conversation witnessed and heard by one or more of the officers of the court. And the court requested the jury during the trial, and until the arguments were heard and the charge given, not to converse with each other on the subject of the trial, in order to keep their minds open to the last moment to all the merits of the cause. While the jury were thus kept together, they were allowed by the officers of the court attending them, to read the public newspapers, the officers first inspecting them and cutting out every thing that in any manner related to the trial. And it now appears, as well from the affidavits of the officers, as from the affidavits of the jurymen, that in point of fact they never saw any thing in any newspaper relative to the trial. The officers granted the indulgence to read the newspapers, under a mere mistake of their duty, and as soon as the charge was given by the court, the jury were not allowed to see any newspaper, until after they had delivered their verdict in open court. So far, then, as reading the newspapers went, there is not the slightest reason to believe that it could or did in fact in any manner whatsoever affect the verdict or influence the jury. The evidence, as far as it bears on the point, negatives any supposition of this sort. And, speaking for myself, I must say that considering the protracted nature of the trial, and the necessary privations of the jury, and the importance of keeping them when out of court from too constant meditation upon the subject of the trial while it was yet imperfectly before them, I do not doubt that the indulgence had a tendency to tranquillize their minds, and to keep them in a state of calmness and freedom from anxiety highly favorable and useful to the prisoners themselves. Without doubt it was a great irregularity in the officers of the court, for which they may be punishable, to have granted this indulgence without the express sanction of the counsel or of the court. I am not aware that any such sanction was given. But it is not every irregularity of officers, which would justify a court in setting aside a verdict and granting a new trial, or treating the matter as a mis-trial. The court must clearly see that it is an irregularity, which goes to the merits of the trial, or justly leads to the suspicion of improper influence, or effect, on the conduct or acts of the jurors. We must take things as they are in our days. Juries cannot now, as in former ages, be kept in capital cases upon bread and water, and shut up in a sort of gloomy imprisonment, with nothing to occupy their thoughts. It would probably be most disastrous to the administration of justice, and especially to prisoners, to attempt, in these days, the enforcement of such rigid severities, so repugnant to all the usual habits of life. And for one, I am not satisfied that the irregularity in the present case has been in the slightest manner prejudicial to the prisoners; but on the contrary, as far as the evidence leads me to any conclusion, I should deem it favorable to the prisoners. The indulgence ceased the moment when the charge was given, and the jury were then put upon their own solemn and exclusive deliberations on the case.

The other ground is, that the jury, while they had the cause in charge, drank ardent spirits. Now it is most material to state certain facts which took place at the trial, and which though wholly passed over in this motion, yet essentially affect its validity and force. After the charge was given by the court to the jury, one of the jurors in open court stated that he had been unwell for several days, and still was so, and that it was impossible for him under the circumstances to confine himself to water, without danger to his health; and he wished permission to use such spirit as might be required for his health. The counsel for the prisoners then assented in open court to this indulgence, and it was also assented to by the district attorney, who at the same time suggested that the like indulgence ought to be extended to any others of the jurors, whose state of health, from the great length of the trial, and their unusual confinement, might also require it. The counsel for the prisoners then gave their consent to this extension of the indulgence. It was accordingly stated to the jury in open court that it was so granted; but they were at the same time advised to use the indulgence as little as possible, and in as moderate a manner as practicable. Now upon this statement, where there was an express consent given by the prisoners' counsel in open court to this indulgence to the jurors, it seems to me impossible that the present objection can be sustained, unless it is shown, that the indulgence was grossly abused, and operated injuriously to the prisoners. Of this there is not the slightest proof, nor indeed was it even pretended at the argument. On the contrary, the only evidence in the case to establish the fact of drinking ardent spirits, comes from one of the jurors, who is said to have stated, after the trial was over, that he was sick and went down to the bar, and got a glass of brandy and water. The juror himself has not been examined. And this renders it wholly unnecessary to consider the authority and bearing of the cases cited at the bar on this subject; and especially the cases of People v. Douglass, 4 Cow. 26, Brant v. Fowler, 7 Cow. 562, and People v. Ransom, 7 Wend. 417, for they all turn upon very different circumstances.

The other parts of the original motion are in arrest of judgment, if the motion for a new trial should be denied. Some of the causes assigned for this purpose, viz. those respecting the arraignment, and that there was no joinder of issue, and no putting themselves upon the country for trial by the prisoners, have been already considered.

It only remains to take notice of the objections taken to the sufficiency of the indictment.

The first objection is, that no venue is laid in the indictment; that is, that no particular place is stated on the high seas at which the robbery was committed, but it is only alleged that it was committed on the high seas. And reference has been made to some indictments in cases of piracy, where the offence is stated with more particularity of place, for example, "on the high seas in a certain place distant about ten leagues from Cursheen, &c." and "on the high seas about a half league distant from Leghorn, &c." See 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 1130 et seq.; Id. (English Ed.) 1135. See, also, Kidd's Case, 14 How. St. Tr. 130, 147, 187–190. But there certainly are precedents which contain no such specification of place (see 3 Chit. Cr. Law, English Ed., 1135); and in all the indictments for piracy in this district (which have been numerous, and upon which convictions and executions have taken place) our researches have not detected a single one in which such locality of place is to be found. The indictment has usually charged the piracy to be committed upon the high seas within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, as it is charged in the present indictment, and without any further specification of place. And I am not aware that any different course of practice has been adopted in any other district. Now, it is certainly not sufficient proof that an indictment is bad substantially, to show that forms can be found which are more special and particular in their allegations of place; for such particularity may be adopted only ex majori cautela by the pleader. It will be necessary to sustain the objection to show some authorities, which establish the necessity of averring such special locality of the offence, or some principle of law, which leads to the same conclusion. No such authority or principle has been shown upon the present occasion. My opinion is that the objection is unfounded in point of law; and that the averment in the indictment, that the offence was committed on the high seas within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, is sufficient certainty for all the purposes of the indictment and trial, without any other particular designation or averment of the locality of the offence. If such particular designation or averment of locality had been put into the indictment, it could not have tied up the proofs to that particular spot; but proofs of the commission of the offence in any other place on the high seas, would have sustained the indictment. The doctrine of venue in indictments at the common law is inapplicable to cases of this sort. At the common law all offences were required to be tried in the county where the offences were committed; and as the jury were to come from the neighborhood of the place where the offence was committed (technically called the "visne" or "visinage"), it was farther necessary to state in the indictment the particular parish, vill, or other place within the county from which the jury might come. And, in criminal cases it seems true even at this day in England, that the right to challenge the panel for want of hundreders exists, though it has fallen into disuse. See 1 Chit. Cr. Law (English Ed.) 177, 189, 190, 194, 196, 197; 4 Bl. Comm. 303, 305, 306. But even at the common law, although this certainty of averment of place was required, yet it did not tie up the party in his proofs; for the offence, if proved to have been committed any where within the county, was sufficient to maintain the indictment. See 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 200. But the reason of the common law for laying the venue so particularly in offences on land, does not in any manner apply to offences on the high seas; for no jury ever did or could come from the visne or visinage on the high seas to try the cause; and no summons could issue for such a purpose. And even now in England, when offences on the high seas are cognizable and punishable under the statute of 28 Hen. VIII. c. 15, by the special commission court, and by a jury of the county for which the commission is issued (see 4 Bl. Comm. 269; 2 Hawk. P. C. bk. 2, c. 25, §§ 43–47), no venue of any parish, vill or other place within the county is included in the indictment. The allegation that the offence was committed on the high seas is sufficient of itself to found the jurisdiction, and all the incidents of the trial and judgment. But if it were otherwise at the common law, we are to consider that, in the jurisprudence of the United States, the present is a statute offence, and that the jurisdiction is given also by statute; and if the offence is so laid in the indictment as to bring the case within the language of the statute in point of jurisdiction and certainty of description, that is all which can properly be required in our country. The crimes act of 1790 (chapter 9, § 8) provides that if any person shall commit upon the high seas, &c. murder, or robbery, &c., he shall on conviction suffer death. And it farther provides that the trial of all crimes committed on the high seas or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may first be brought. And there are direct and positive allegations in the present indictment to all these facts. So that the jurisdiction is upon the face of the indictment made out in the most positive manner. And the judiciary act of 1789 (chapter 20, § 29), has provided for the manner of summoning juries for all cases of trials in the courts of the United States. So that there is in reality nothing upon which to suspend a legal doubt as to the sufficiency of the indictment in this respect. No further venue is necessary than what the indictment contains. It in no manner affects the summoning of the jury.

The other objection to the sufficiency of the indictment is, that it concludes in the plural, "against the form of the statutes of the United States in such cases made and provided." whereas it ought to conclude "against the form of the statute," &c. in the singular. It is admitted that the offence, as charged in the indictment, is within the act of the 15th of May, 1820 (chapter 113), and that if it is also within the crimes act of the 30th of April, 1790 (chapter 9, § 8), the objection is unmaintainable. Upon this point I profess not to feel the slightest doubt. There never was, as far as my knowledge extends, any judicial doubt breathed on any occasion that the act of 1790 (chapter 9) did apply to all murders and robberies committed on board of or upon American ships on the high seas. If the act did not apply to such cases, it is difficult to conceive to what cases it could legally apply. The general terms not only cover such cases, but many others. The only doubts that ever did occur, and were thought worthy of being considered by the supreme court, were, in the first place, whether murders and robberies, committed on the high seas on ships belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign state and then under the acknowledged jurisdiction of a foreign sovereign, came within the meaning of the act. The supreme court, in U. S. v. Palmer, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 610, thought they were not. Neither question was whether such offences committed on board of a piratical vessel, then in possession of pirates, and acknowledging the jurisdiction of no foreign sovereign, were within the meaning of the act. The supreme court, in U. S. v. Klintock, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 144, decided that they were. On this occasion the court said that the opinion in Palmer's Case might well be understood to indicate an opinion "that the whole act of 1790 (chapter 9) must be limited in its operation to offences committed by or upon citizens of the United States," which is the very case before the court. And indeed Palmer's Case necessarily leads to this result. And the case of U. S. v. Furlong, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 184, is direct to the same purpose, and covers the very case now before us. And, indeed, the language of the court upon this last occasion is express, that it is sufficient for the indictment in such a case to conclude against the form of the statute in such case made and provided (in the singular), although it might be equally within the act of 1790 (chapter 9) and the act of 1819 (chapter 77, § 5 [3 Stat. 513]), thereby laying down the broad principle that a conclusion against the form of the statute (in the singular) is sufficient in all cases where the offence is distinctly within more than one independent statute. But I am of opinion that the present case is equally within the act of 1790 (chapter 9) and the act of 1820 (chapter 113); and if so, then it is admitted that the conclusion is in the strictest sense right. And I am also of opinion, that if the offence was punishable by a single statute only, and the conclusion was against the form of the statutes (in the plural) that it would, in point of law, be a good conclusion. I am aware that there is some diversity of opinion in the books on this point; but having had occasion many years ago, in Kenrick v. U. S. [Case No. 7,713], to consider the question with great care, that was the conclusion to which my judgment deliberately led me; and I have since seen no occasion to change it upon principle or authority. Either way, then, the objection is unmaintainable.

These were all the causes or grounds contained in the original motion. At a subsequent day, however, other causes were assigned, which will now be considered.

The first is, that interpreters were admitted to interpret a part of the testimony of Perez without being previously sworn to interpret truly and faithfully. The facts were that Mr. Badlam was sworn as a general interpreter of Spanish at the trial, and in an early stage of his interpretation of some of the testimony, Mr. Child (one of the counsel for the prisoners, and who himself understood Spanish) objected to some of the interpretations as incorrect, and requested that two other gentlemen, whom he had selected, might be sworn as interpreters. This was objected to by the district attorney, who thought that it was his right to use such an interpreter as he had confidence in, leaving to the counsel for the prisoners to swear other interpreters in their own employ in the cause. The court then, upon the suggestion of the prisoners' counsel, allowed these two interpreters to sit near Mr. Badlam and the witness, and to suggest to Mr. Badlam any doubt or mistake in his interpretation, for him to consider and rectify. This was accordingly done; and whenever any such suggestion was made by these interpreters to Mr. Badlam (who did not profess to be well acquainted with Spanish nautical terms), he considered it, and I believe invariably adopted their interpretation, and then stated it to the court as his own interpretation. In a short time, however, it being perceived that the interpretation of nautical terms became very important in the cause, upon the suggestion of the court both of these interpreters were sworn, and one of them (Mr. Peyton) was afterwards, during almost the whole of the trial, used by the government as the exclusive interpreter. Now it is not, and it was not at the trial pretended, that ultimately any interpretation of the language of the witnesses by Mr. Badlam went to the jury, which was incorrectly given, without due correction. There was no dispute upon this head; and it could have been corrected in a moment, if it had been suggested, for Mr. Peyton was present throughout the whole trial. Under these circumstances the objection seems to me wholly groundless. Mr. Badlam gave every interpretation to the court under oath; and he had certainly a right to use the knowledge of others to assist his own judgment in any case of doubt, giving his own interpretation finally to the court. If there has been no mistake in the interpretation, what ground can there now be for any just complaint?

The next objection is, that upon the application of the counsel for the prisoners, the latter were not allowed to be placed near to the counsel, for the purpose of instructing the counsel in their defence, as they deemed necessary. Now the facts were, that though the usual place for prisoners, in all capital cases, is in the dock, or prisoner's bar, the prisoners in this case were all, for their own accommodation, and that they might hear the testimony, witness the proceedings, and have free intercourse with their counsel, placed within that portion of the bar, which is assigned for the use of counsellors at law, and within a reasonable distance from their counsel, who could constantly have the freest access to them; and to whom the court stated, that every delay of time for this purpose, would be cheerfully given; and it was accordingly given. But the counsel wished to have the prisoners placed in the very front benches of the bar, in places constantly assigned for gentlemen of the bar. The court thought such an indulgence inconvenient and unnecessary; and if it was yielded to in that case, it must form a precedent in all other cases, and that such a departure from the whole course of practice, usually adopted upon such occasions, would, from its nature, become liable to great objection. But the court added, that an interpreter should sit by the prisoners, and punctually state to them the proceedings, and questions and answers; and that they might communicate with their counsel freely, and as often as they wished. And this was accordingly done. Even this objection, such as it is, applied only to a short period of the trial; for when the court removed to another place (the temple), the prisoners were placed as near to their counsel as they well could be. Nor should it be put out of sight, that during this long and protracted trial, every indulgence, as to time and examination, was granted to the prisoners' counsel; that they had the fullest opportunity to communicate in court, and out of court, with the prisoners, upon all the matters in evidence, and to obtain their instructions. And we have not the slightest reason to doubt that such communications, as far as they were deemed useful by the counsel, were most freely and fully used by them. Nay, to this very hour, no suggestion has been made, that any material fact or disclosure was omitted, which could have aided in the defence. Under such circumstances, I can perceive no ground to sustain this objection.

The next cause is, that the court refused to have the order, in which the prisoners were placed at the bar, changed before the introduction of each of the witnesses for the government, who were excluded from the court room, after the first of these witnesses had been examined, and had retired. The court did so refuse; and I am yet to learn, that there is any principle of law or duty, which required them to act otherwise. The reason why the court did not yield to the request was, that it might otherwise seem, as if the court intended to cast some imputation upon these witnesses, as confederating out of court together to tell the same story, and charge the same persons, sitting in the same order with the crime. But the court said that it was open for the counsel of the prisoners, to make inquiries from each of the witnesses when upon the stand, whether they had had any such communication with the others out of court; or whether they had had any knowledge of the order, in which the prisoners were arranged. To some of the witnesses (if I rightly remember) such questions were put, and they negatived any such communications. Nor is there now any proofs, that any such communications were had, which could have influenced the testimony of these witnesses. The motion itself was new. It was a matter for the exercise of the sound discretion of the court; and there is no proof, that it operated injuriously to any of the prisoners. Without imputing fraud and wilful perjury to these witnesses, I cannot perceive how the objection can be sustained.

The next objection is, that the witnesses for the government, were allowed, with the chart of the Mexican's route on her voyage before them, to be asked the question, whether under the circumstances stated, of the supposed time of starting of both vessels, the Mexican and Panda would or would not be likely to meet at the point marked on the chart. The objection proceeds upon the ground that, under such circumstances, the question became a leading question; and ought not to have been put. My opinion is, that the objection is unfounded in law. The chart of the Mexican was already in the case, and it was proved by the mate that it contained her route on the voyage, and that he had marked that route from day to day, during the voyage on the chart, up to the point where the robbery was committed, and back again to Salem. For the purpose of asking the question, then, it might properly be taken as a supposed fact, that the Mexican was at a particular spot on the day of the robbery, having sailed from Salem on the 29th of August, and the question then to be asked of nautical witnesses, was whether a vessel sailing from Havana, bound to Cape Mount on the coast of Africa, on the 20th or 26th of August, would or would not be likely to meet her at that point. It seems to me, that this was not only a proper question to be asked of the witnesses, but in no just sense a leading question. It was a matter of nautical skill, experience, and opinion, and the examination of the chart was fit to enable the witnesses as well as the jury, with more accuracy and clearness, to examine all the elements which ought to enter into their opinion. The question was but coming directly to that very point, which, however circuitously, must have been aimed at, in the course of the inquiries, before the testimony could have any strong bearing on the case. Wherever the vessels might have met, if they could not have met at this very spot, where the proof stated that the Mexican was at the time of the robbery, the fact could have had no material influence on the case. If the vessels could not have met there, then the cause was clearly for the prisoners. If they could have met there, it would still remain to be shown that they did meet there. The real point, therefore, of the whole inquiry was to ascertain, whether these vessels might or might not under the circumstances, have met at the very point where the Mexican was. It was the true and appropriate question, which the witnesses were called upon to solve in the negative or affirmative, according to their own skill, judgment, and experience in nautical affairs. The form of the question could not lead them, and it could not mislead them. And the question, in this very form, was afterwards repeatedly asked on behalf of the prisoners' counsel of their own witnesses.

The next objection is that the court declared to the jury and delivered it as their opinion, that the prisoners had no right to pray instructions to the jury on particular points, after the delivering of the principal charge. The court did not give any such direction to the jury upon the subject. The court stated to the leading counsel for the prisoners, who was praying instructions at that stage of the cause and proceeding to reason them out at large, that he must be aware that it was wholly irregular, at that stage of the cause, to proceed in this manner. The regular course of practice in this court in all cases of this sort, is to state the points of law on which the counsel rely, and wish the instructions of the court in their argument to the jury, or at least at some time before the charge is given, that the court may have time to examine and consider them. It would otherwise happen, that the court might be surprised into the necessity of expressing opinions, before due time was allowed to deliberate on them. It is understood, that this objection, after the explanations which have passed at the argument, is not now insisted on.

The next objection is founded upon the supposed refusal of the court, to give an instruction to the jury, that under certain circumstances, at Nazareth, stated in the instructions, the crew of the Panda had a right to resist, to flee, or destroy the Panda, or to resort to any other means of self-defence, which they might deem expedient. In the actual form and qualified manner, in which this objection is now couched, that "if the jury believed upon the evidence that," &c., (stating certain facts,) I have not the slightest recollection, that the instruction was ever asked of the court. On the contrary, I then understood it to be asked in the manner and form in which it is expressed in the original motion, and not otherwise. And the circumstance that it was so asked, is strongly corroborated by the fact, that it is so stated in the original motion. But if it were otherwise, still I am of opinion that the court have given the instruction, as fully as the prisoners' counsel were entitled to require it, and in a manner quite as favorable to the prisoners. And indeed, the whole merits of this objection have been already considered in the preceding part of this opinion.

These are all the objections which are in the written motions, and which have been so elaborately argued at the bar, excepting those which respect the weight of evidence upon the trial, and the new evidence now offered. I shall now proceed with the consideration of these objections. And, first, it is said that the verdict is manifestly against evidence and the weight of evidence. My opinion is the other way. If the jury believed the evidence (and its credibility was a matter exclusively for their consideration), it appears to me, that their verdict was not contrary to evidence or against the weight of evidence, but coincident with both. And I apply this remark equally to the case of Boyga, Montenegro, Castillo, and Garcia; although certainly, the evidence was not equally strong against each of them.

The other point respects the new evidence now before the court. I lay no particular stress upon the affidavit of Dalrymple (which has been objected to) for two reasons—first, because he might have been produced as a witness on the stand at the trial, by the counsel for the prisoners, as Battis expressly pointed him out at the trial as having been spoken to by him; and, secondly, because I do not think, correctly considered, that any thing contained in Dalrymple's affidavit does impugn what Battis stated at the trial. The affidavit of Alexander Thomas is principally to collateral matters only. The other affidavits are of the prisoners who have been acquitted. They positively swear to certain facts, which, if true, are utterly inconsistent with the testimony and statements of the witnesses for the government. First, they utterly deny that they ever met or robbed the Mexican during the voyage. Secondly, they utterly deny any intention or attempt to blow up the Panda at Nazareth. Upon this last point they are opposed by the direct and strong testimony of Quentin, Domingo, and Silveira, all three of them disinterested witnesses. Upon the first point their testimony is irreconcilable with the strong and direct and disinterested testimony of the officers and crew of the Mexican (seven in number), and especially of those who speak positively to the identity of Ruiz, Boyga, and Delgado, if that testimony is not utterly unworthy of belief, and is not founded in the grossest and most extraordinary mistakes. It is also irreconcilable with the positive testimony of Domingo and Silveira, as to the confessions of several of the prisoners. And, if Perez is to have any credit, where he is confirmed by other testimony, it is utterly irreconcilable with the whole substance of his testimony. Besides these considerations, it cannot escape observation that these acquitted witnesses stand in a very delicate and peculiar predicament in relation to the case. They were embarked, if the evidence upon the trial is to be credited, and upon which their own acquittal mainly proceeded, on a voyage in the slave trade, a voyage prohibited by the Spanish laws and treaties, and of such a character, that under such circumstances, it cannot but detract somewhat from the confidence which we should otherwise repose in their perfect integrity and credit. To this it should be added, that they were incompetent witnesses at the trial. And I cannot but think it would be most injurious to the general administration of public justice to allow a new trial upon the merits, upon the evidence of persons charged as joint offenders after their acquittal, when they were incompetent witnesses at the time of the trial. The observations of the supreme court of Massachusetts upon this point, in the recent case of Sawyer v. Merrill, 10 Pick. 16, strike me as entitled to very great weight, and I entirely concur in them. Indeed, an acquittal is not always proof of actual innocence; and it is frequently little more than a declaration, that the guilt of the party is not established by the proofs beyond a reasonable doubt. But in a capital case, like the present, it appears to me, that the court ought not, upon general principles, to grant a new trial, unless the fullest credit is given to the new evidence, and the court is of opinion, that it outweighs in strength and clearness and force, the evidence on the other side. In short, my opinion is, that in a capital case a new trial ought not to be granted, if the court possess the power, unless, taking into consideration the new evidence, the verdict in the opinion of the court, ought to be the other way; and that, therefore, injustice has been done to the prisoners. There is much good sense in the remarks of the court upon this subject, in State v. Duestoe, 1 Bay, 377. And looking at the evidence produced at the trial by the government in this case, I cannot escape from the conclusion, that if the court were to grant a new trial upon the affidavits of the acquitted prisoners, it could scarcely be justifiable, except upon the belief that five at least of the government's witnesses were either perjured, or their testimony was grossly and culpably incorrect,—Butman, Reed, Quentin, Domingo, and Silveira; and that the others had rendered themselves incredible in their statements. To such a conclusion I should be slow to arrive under any circumstances, when the witnesses were disinterested and unimpeached in point of general character, and their credit had been fully sustained by the verdict of an impartial jury. But if I could arrive at such a conclusion in any other case, I could not arrive at it in this case, where the whole stream of evidence comes from persons, who were indicted as confederates in the offence, and who were then incompetent to testify. I cannot feel such confidence in such testimony as to lead me to the conclusion, that all is rank perjury or reckless delusion on the side of the government's witnesses. This ground, therefore, for a new trial, is in my opinion insufficient also to sustain the motion.

I have now gone over all the grounds offered for a new trial, whether they are matters of law or matters of fact, as briefly as I could, though many of them would have furnished topics for a much longer discussion, if the occasion had required it. My decided judgment, upon a deliberate survey of all these matters, is that the court ought not to grant a new trial, if we possessed the power to grant one. But being of opinion, that we do not possess the power under the circumstances, I am for overruling the motion altogether. I trust that I have a due and a deep sense of the responsibility thrown upon the court upon the present occasion. No person could have desired more anxiously than myself, that I might have been spared from this painful duty. With the private opinions of other men, not sitting in judgment under the solemnity of an oath, or called upon to express opinions upon a judicial survey of the whole evidence (which the learned counsel for the prisoners has thought fit to bring into the case), we have nothing to do. As little have we to do with the appeals made through the press during the pendency of this cause, or with the supposed popular excitements, which have been alluded to at the argument. I trust that this court is incapable of being influenced by any such considerations, or of being betrayed by them into an abandonment of its own proper duty. I trust, that while I shall never be insensible to human life or human sufferings, I shall always possess the firmness to follow out with an unshrinking fidelity the dictates of my own conscience, and the high commands of the law. I may err in my judgment, for I have not the slightest pretension to infallibility; but if I do err it shall not be an error forced upon me by private opinions, promulgated through the press or otherwise. My present judgment I cheerfully submit to the sober consideration of my country. It is my conscientious judgment, for which I am ready to assume the full responsibility belonging to my station, it having been the result of the best exercise of the powers of my understanding.

DAVIS, District Judge I concur with the presiding judge in the disposal of the motions before us, in this very serious case, which has so long engaged the devoted and solicitous attention of the court, counsel, and jury. With the grounds and reasons of that opinion my own views coincide, excepting in one point, and on that, from its important bearing, as a constitutional question, I consider it a duty to express my opinion. I refer to that part of the argument, which rests the denial of a power, in the courts of the United States, to grant a new trial, on the merits, in a capital case, though at the request of a person convicted, on the 5th article of amendments to the constitution, declaring, that "no person shall be subject, for the same offence, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." The case of a person convicted of a capital offence, put on trial again, would certainly be embraced by the terms of the article; and yet, in my view of the question, it would not present a case within its true intent and meaning. The article, in the amendments to the constitution, corresponding to a rule of the common law, according to the prevailing spirit and character of those amendments generally, was doubtless intended for the security and benefit of the individual. As such it may be waived and relinquished. That the request of a prisoner for a new trial, affording a chance of escape from death to which a previous conviction would assign him, should be rejected, from adherence to the letter of the rule, that his life would be again in jeopardy, would present an incongruity not readily to be admitted. It is true, that according to approved authorities, the plea of autre fois convict depends on the same principle as the plea of autre fois acquit, that no man ought to be twice brought in danger of his life, for one and the same cause. Bl. Comm. bk. 4, c. 26; 2 Hawk. P. C. 377. The doctrine establishes a right in the prisoner to resort to that defence, if it be attempted or moved, against his will, to subject him to a second trial. The case of a verdict of conviction set aside, at the request of the prisoner, is not suggested in those authorities, and would stand, in my opinion, on very different ground. The previous conviction would not, I apprehend, under such circumstances, be considered as a sufficient bar to a second trial. The concise manner in which many general maxims of the law are expressed, like general rules on other topics, admits or requires, in their application, distinctions, exceptions, and qualifications, all just, reasonable, and, in some instances, indispensable, not expressed in their terms. We have an instructive exemplification of this in an early case, in the supreme court of the United States, in which the meaning of the prohibition, in the constitution, of ex post facto laws, came in question. "I do not consider," said Mr. Justice Chase, "any law as ex post facto, that nullifies the rigor of the criminal law, but only those that create or aggravate the crime, or increase the punishment, or change the rules of evidence for the purpose of conviction." 3 Dall. 391. The benign spirit, ever pervading our law, which dictated that distinction, may, as appears to me, have a proper influence and application, in reference to the rule of law under consideration, and in other instances of analogous character. By the old common law, observes Sir W. Blackstone, the accessory could not be arraigned till the principal was attainted, "unless he choose it, for he might waive the benefit of the law." Comm. bk. 4, c. 25 And in People v. McKay, 18 Johns. 212, a case of murder, Chief Justice Spencer remarks: "We know of no case which contains the doctrine, that where a new trial is awarded, at the prayer and in favor of a person that has been found guilty, he shall not be subject to another trial." [4] On the whole, I am not convinced that the article of the constitution under consideration, would, in just and reasonable construction, be a bar to a new trial granted at the request of a person capitally convicted. I am not aware that there is any direct decision on this point. It is an open question. If a second trial in capital cases, be inadmissible, under the article, though at the request of the prisoner, then no legislative enactment can vary the law on the subject, without an amendment of the constitution. The question may thus become highly important, though the article should be binding only in the courts of the United States; still more so if, conformably to Chief Justice Spencer's opinion, it extend to decisions in the state courts. A decision on this point, however, is not essential, as this case stands, to a determination on the motion for a new trial, in which, notwithstanding a difference in opinion in reference to the constitutional question, we come to the same result. The discretion of the court on the subject of new trials is not unlimited. They are allowable "for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law," and with this statute direction, we are to bear in mind the 7th article of amendments to the constitution—"No fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined, in any court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law." Having reference to such directories, should the motion for a new trial in this case be allowed, there would, in my opinion, be a departure from the usages of courts of law, and from the principles manifested by the great current of decisions in cases of this description.

[4] McKay was convicted on an indictment for murder. Judgment was arrested, on motion in his behalf, for defect in the issuing and return of the venire. Agreeably to repeated decisions, there may be a new trial, in all cases, where there has been a mis-trial or mere irregularity in the former trial, vitiating or vacating the proceedings. But the question made by the counsel in that case, whether the arrest of judgment did not entitle the prisoner to be discharged, does not appear to have been met by the court on that ground. "It will be observed," says the chief justice, "that the judgment is arrested on the motion of the prisoner, an act done at the request, and for the benefit of the prisoner, we are clearly of opinion cannot exonerate him from another trial."

I agree with the presiding judge, in the views which he has expressed on the motion in arrest of judgment, as well as with those on the motion for a new trial, excepting in the instance which I have specified, and in the result, that the motions be overruled.

The decision of the court was then interpreted to the prisoners.

Mr. Child then begged leave to file a bill of exceptions, with a view of carrying the case before the supreme court, and urged that the case involved several important points of law.

THE COURT replied, that they must proceed to pass the sentence; but the motion of Mr. Child could be taken into consideration, and would be acted upon hereafter.

Mr. Child then earnestly pressed upon the court to respite the execution, to give time to send to Havana and England, to clear up this dark and mysterious affair.

THE COURT said it should be allowed, and if the time proved not long enough, the executive clemency would no doubt extend it, by a reprieve.

STORY, Circuit Justice, after hearing the several protests of innocence from the prisoners, on motion of Dunlap, Dist. Atty., proceeded to pronounce the sentence of the court, as follows:

Prisoners at the Bar: The motions made by your counsel for a new trial and in arrest of judgment having been overruled by the court, and all other matters disposed of, it is now my painful duty to pronounce the sentence of the law upon each of you, for the crime whereof you severally stand convicted. I shall do this in as brief terms as possible, being conscious of the difficulty of addressing you through the medium of an interpreter only. The sentence is, that you, and each of you, for the crime whereof you severally stand convicted, be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be pirates and felons, and that you, and each of you, be therefore severally hanged by the neck until you are severally dead. That the marshal of this district, or his deputy, do, on peril of what may fall thereon, cause execution to be done in the premises upon each of you on the 11th day of March next ensuing, between the hours of 9 o'clock in the forenoon and 12 o'clock at noon, of the same day, and that you now be taken from hence to the jail in Boston, in this district, from whence you came, there, or in some other safe and convenient jail within the same district, to be closely kept until the day of execution; and from thence, on the day of execution appointed, as aforesaid, you are severally to be taken to the place of execution, there to be hanged, as aforesaid, until you are severally dead. I earnestly recommend to each of you to employ the intermediate period in sober reflections upon your past life and conduct, and by prayer and penitence, and religious exercise, to seek the favor and forgiveness of Almighty God for any sins and crimes which you may have committed; and for this purpose I earnestly recommend to you, and to each of you, to seek the aid and assistance of the ministers of our holy religion of the denomination of Christians to which you severally belong. And in bidding you, so far as I can presume to know, an eternal farewell, I offer up my earnest prayers that Almighty God may in his infinite goodness have mercy on your souls.

The above sentence was then interpreted to the prisoners by a sworn interpreter.

David L. Child, of counsel for the prisoners, now (on the 23d day of December), in pursuance of a suggestion made by him a week before, and immediately after the opinion of the court overruling the motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, moved to file a bill of exceptions, and requested the court to sign the same, if found true. THE COURT said that the bill might be filed, if the counsel wished it, on the record; but it could not be allowed by the court. And it was accordingly filed, but without having been read, the counsel not wishing to read it, after the opinion of the court was stated.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This being the case of a capital conviction, when the counsel for the prisoners, a week ago, suggested an intention to offer a bill of exceptions, the court then stated, that it would be expected that he should show some authority to justify the court in allowing a bill of exceptions in a capital case. It is now admitted, that the counsel have no authority to cite, which affirms the power in this court. And it is believed by the court, that none exists. We have, however, in the interval between the suggestion and the present time, deliberately examined the point, and are fully satisfied, that no such power exists in this court; and therefore it has not been deemed necessary to examine the correctness of the exceptions stated in the bill, which has been proffered.

In the first place, no power is given by statute to this court, to allow any bill of exceptions in any criminal case whatsoever; and it seems impossible to infer it by implication from any provisions in the laws of the United States. The circuit courts have final jurisdiction of all cases of crimes; and no writ of error or appeal lies to the supreme court in any such cases. Now, the sole object of a bill of exceptions is to present the matter for the revision of some superior court; and if no revision can be had, then the authority to allow a bill of exceptions would be utterly nugatory. The only mode contemplated by the laws of the United States to revise the opinions of the judges of the circuit courts in criminal cases is, when the judges are divided in opinion at the trial; and then the point of division may be certified to the supreme court for a final decision under the judicial act of 1802 (chapter 31, § 6) There was no such division upon the present trial. If resort be had to the common law to aid us in examining this point, it will be found, that no bill of exceptions lies, in capital cases, even since the statute of Westminster II. (13 Edw. I. St. 1) c. 31, which first gave a bill of exceptions. And the better opinion certainly now is, that that statute is confined to civil proceedings, and does not extend to any criminal proceedings whatsoever. As the authorities are not all agreed on this point in cases of mere misdemeanors. it is not necessary here to decide it in regard to the latter. But in capital cases. in cases of treason and felony, it is universally agreed in England, that no bill of exceptions lies. This was solemnly settled in the case of Rex v. Vane, which was a case of high treason. It is reported in 1 Lev. 68, and in various other Reports. See Buller, N. P. 316; 1 Chit. Cr. Law (English Ed.) 622; Willes, 535, and note (b), which cites 2 Inst. 424, and Saville, 2. The very point was made, and according to Leving's Reports, it was held by the court, "that a bill of exceptions does not lie in criminal cases, but only in actions between party and party." The application was accordingly overruled, and Sir H. Vane was executed on Tower Hill. The same doctrine is laid down in Hawkins (2 Hawk. P. C. c. 46, § 198), who says: "It hath been adjudged, that no bill of exceptions is grantable on an indictment of treason or felony, the statute of Westminster, etc., having never been thought to extend to any such case." Lord Hardwicke, in Rex v. Inhabitants of Preston, Cas. t. Hardw. 251, 2 Strange, 1040, said: "Nor was it ever pretended, that in capital cases a bill of exceptions lay. In Vane's Case, it is not said to lie in any criminal case. But that point is not settled, and therefore I will give no opinion as to that." In Bacon's Abridgment (1 Bac. Abr. "Bill of Exceptions") it is said: "It is agreed that no bill of exceptions is to be allowed in treason or felony." And the same doctrine will be found in other elementary writers (see Buller, N. P. 316; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, English Ed., 622; Willes, 535, and note b, which cites 2 Inst. 424, and Saville, 2), and no authority to the contrary can be found. In People v. Holbrook, 13 Johns. 90, S. P. 6 Cow. 565, it was held by the supreme court of New York that no bill of exceptions lies in any criminal case; and this doctrine is not only supported by Vane's Case, but by Rex v. Barkstead, 1 Kreb. 244; T. Raym. 468; 1 Sid. 85.

There is then no pretence to say, that in capital cases this court can draw in aid the doctrines of the common law, as administered in England, to confer such a power. It is not implied from any statute authority. It is not implied in any reasoning at the common law, or under the statute of Westminster. We are therefore of opinion, that this court possesses no such authority; and we dare not assume what has never been confided to the court.

If this objection were not, as we think it is, conclusive, we think, that the bill of exceptions ought not now to be allowed, upon another and a distinct ground. It was not made or tendered at the trial, nor until a long time afterwards, and after a motion made and argued for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, and the opinion of the court deliberately had thereon. Under such circumstances, where the verdict was satisfactory, and the court feel no doubt about the law, it is our opinion, that the bill of exceptions ought not to be allowed. It is not within the general principles, which regulate rights of this sort. See 1 Salk. 288; 8 Mod. 222; 2 Tidd, Prac. 788. The government has its rights, as well as the prisoners.

Bill of exceptions not allowed.

Case No. 15,205.

UNITED STATES v. GILBERT.

[17 Int. Rev. Rec. 54.]

Circuit Court, N. D. Ohio. Jan. Term, 1873.

EMBEZZLEMENT BY POSTMASTER.

A postmaster who uses in his private business, and for paying his private debts, money received through the money order department, so that he is found upon examination to be without the amount of money required to balance his accounts, is guilty of embezzlement, under the statute (Act June 8, 1872, § 122), although he always intended to replace the same, and did, in fact, replace it shortly after his arrest, and before his preliminary examination before a commissioner.

[This was an indictment against Everett H. Gilbert upon the charge of embezzlement.]

Geo. Willey, U. S. Atty., for the Government.

G. S. Kain, for defendant.

SHERMAN, District Judge. The defendant in this case was indicted by the grand jury of the present term, under the 122d section of the act of congress approved June 8, 1872 [17 Stat. 283], entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the post office department." Upon the trial of the cause, the jury returned a verdict of guilty. The counsel for the defence now move for a new trial, alleging as a cause therefor the general reason, that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence and law in the case.

The facts as agreed upon by the counsel for the defence and district attorney are as follows: The defendant was postmaster at Smithville, Wayne county, Ohio, which post-office had been duly designated and was a money order office, duly authorized by law, and governed by the regulations prescribed by the postmaster-general. On the 29th day of November, 1872, a special agent of the post-office department, under instructions from that department, visited the post-office at Smithville for the purpose of examining into the accounts of the defendant, it being suspected that there was a deficit in his money order business. A full examination of his affairs showed a deficiency of five hundred dollars, which deficiency had run through several months, and which the defendant failed to pay over, even when demand was made by the special agent upon the spot. In fact it was not paid over for a week or more after the demand. The defendant stated that he did not have the money, that he had used it in his business in paying debts of a private nature, and in making some additions to his property in the town of Smithville, but that he expected to replace it in a few days from money due him. Upon the 5th day of December following, the special agent procured a warrant for the arrest of the defendant, under the 122d section above alluded to. Thereupon examination was had before the commissioner on the 20th day of December, 1872. It further appears, that between the time that the warrant was issued and the examination before the commissioner, the defendant deposited with the postmaster at Cleveland, Ohio, a sum of money equal to the amount which he is charged with having embezzled, the Cleveland post-office being the designated depository for the money order funds of the Smithville post-office.

On this agreed statement of facts it cannot be successfully claimed that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence. Section 122 of the act of congress provides as follows: "That any postmaster, assistant, clerk, or other person employed in or connected with the business or operations of any money order office, who shall convert to his own use in any way whatever, or loan, or deposit in any bank, or exchange for other funds, any portion of the money order funds, shall be deemed guilty of embezzlement. * * * And any failure to pay over or produce any money or funds intrusted to such person, shall be taken to be prima facie evidence of embezzlement." From these citations it is evident that an embezzlement, such as is contemplated by this section, may be proved in either one of two ways: First, by showing that in point of fact the postmaster has converted to his own use money order funds. Second, by his failure to pay over such funds when required, either by the law or regulations, or when demand is made by an officer authorized for that purpose. It would seem that the agreed statement of facts substantiates the embezzlement by both these methods, and although it is true that the funds were subsequently paid in to the Cleveland post-office, and although it may also be and probably was true that these funds when thus converted were intended and expected to be replaced, so that the government should sustain no loss, which go very far toward mitigating the offence, yet it is obvious that the enforcement of this section, in all its strictness, is essential to this class of government funds, and to the discouragement of postmasters from even temporarily using them for private purposes. The intention of replacing them, however honestly entertained, cannot be accepted as an excuse or apology for violating the law, as one may be disappointed by unexpected circumstances, and thus not only endanger the moneys of the government, but involve himself in difficulty and criminal prosecution. The law intends that funds of this character should be kept absolutely separate and sacred, as the best method not only of keeping the funds themselves secure, but of guarding the officers themselves from temptation and delinquency. The diversion of money order funds in any way whatever, prohibited by this section, or for any time however short, constitutes embezzlement under this act, and is punishable as such.

The motion for a new trial is therefore overruled, and the defendant sentenced to pay a fine of five hundred dollars, and the costs of this prosecution, and to be imprisoned for six months; but under the advice and concurrence of the post-office department, and under all the circumstances of this case, the execution of the sentence as to imprisonment is indefinitely suspended.

Case No. 15,205a.

UNITED STATES v. GILLIAM.

[1 Hayw. & H. 109.] [1]

Criminal Court, District of Columbia. Sept. 14, 1882.

HOMICIDE — KILLING BY SET SPRING-GUN — BAD CHARACTER OF DECEASED.

1. The court will allow evidence to be given of the previous bad character of the deceased, when the said deceased had been killed in the act of committing a felony. It is proper in determining the intent of the deceased and the offence of the prisoner, who is accused of killing the deceased.

2. The setting of spring-guns in open fields or outhouses, not within the privilege of the domicil, without notice, will not excuse or justify the homicide which might ensue.

The indictment contained two counts. One charging the murder to have been committed by means of a spring-gun set by the traverser for that purpose in a goose-house; the other that the murder was done by shooting. The prisoner [William Gilliam] plead not guilty.

P. R. Fendall, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

W. L. Brent, for defendant.

The counsel for the prisoner, insisted that the prisoner had a right to defend his property by such means. One of the witnesses examined on the part of the United States was questioned by the prisoner's counsel as to the general reputation of the deceased as a thief and a felon. The question was objected to by the counsel for the United States.

BY THE COURT. The prisoner, by his counsel, has asked the court to allow him to give evidence of the general character of the deceased as a common thief and felon, for the purpose of showing the felonious intent with which the deceased entered upon the premises of the prisoner on the night he was shot by the spring-gun, and insists that in all cases of meditated felony it is lawful to take the life of the felon. It has been ruled at the present term of this court that, to show a guilty knowledge in the receiver of stolen goods it is proper to allow proof that other stolen goods had been before received by the party charged, and in the case at bar the court will allow proof that the deceased had, on previous occasions, stolen the goods, either of the prisoner or other persons, as proper for the consideration of the jury in determining the intent of Payne (the deceased) and the offence of the prisoner. The setting of a spring-gun as a protection for property, though not in itself unlawful and indictable, is certainly undeserving of encouragement, and where no notice is given and injury or loss of life ensues, the party setting it is responsible as if he were present himself and fired the weapon. No man can do indirectly what he cannot do directly. He must also use his right as not to injure another. Where notice is given the sufferer is held to have brought the calamity on himself—to be his own executioner if life is lost, and to have himself pulled the trigger. Such was the reasoning of the court of king's bench in the case of Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 304.[2] All the judges in that case rest their judgment on the ground of notice.

It has been contended by the prisoner's counsel in this case, that if Payne, the deceased, entered upon the premises of Gilliam on the night he came by his death, with the felonious intent to steal Gilliam's property, the prisoner is entitled to acquittal in the absence of notice that the gun was set, and though the felony was unaccompanied by force and did not amount to burglary. The broad ground is assumed that in all cases of felony, the felon may be lawfully put to death in the execution of his meditated crime, and that this position is maintained by the reasoning of one of the judges in the case of Ilott v. Wilkes; I cannot sanction the doctrine thus asserted in the prisoner's defense. It arrogates for property higher immunities and privileges than are conceded to our dearest personal rights. The humane principles of the law do not thus lightly estimate human life. No language or manner, however reproachful or insulting, not even violence to the person of the most ignominious character, will justify the aggrieved in slaying the aggressor; he can only be justified or excused by showing his own life to have been in jeopardy. The law is that a man may oppose force with force in defense of his person, his family or property against one who manifestly endeavors by violence to commit a felony, as murder, robbery, rape, arson or burglary. In all these felonies, from their atrocity and violence, human life either is, or is presumed to be in peril. The principle does not apply to the thief who secretly steals your purse or other personal property in your fields or in buildings not within the privilege of the domicil. It does not apply to the felon who, by forgery, defrauds you of your money or goods. This distinction commends itself to your reason and common sense, and it is sustained by numerous authorities which have been cited in the argument by the counsel for the United States. When we find the books and the judges in some places in general terms speaking of the right to take the life of the felon in the execution of his meditated felony, we are to understand them as referring to felonies with force, of the character described. In no other way can we reconcile what would otherwise appear conflicting authorities and decisions. The setting of spring-guns, therefore, in open fields or outhouses, not within the privilege of the domicil, without notice, would not justify or excuse the homicide which might ensue, but the party setting them would be criminally responsible for the consequences of his act.

The counsel for the prisoner further contended that by the law as it stood prior to the statute of 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, § 13,[3] and as it now stands here, any outhouse within the curtilage, or same common fence as the dwelling house itself, was considered to be parcel of the dwelling house, on the ground that the capital house protected and privileged all its branches and appurtenances, if within the curtilage or homestall.

The counsel for the United States contended that on a fair view of the authorities on the subject of curtilages prior to the statute of Geo. IV., an outhouse, to be within the protection of the dwelling house, must be "occupied with and immediately communicating with it"; must be adjoining to it or at a reasonable distance from it, and that the communication must be regular and permanent, not merely casual or temporary, that the meaning of the word "outhouse" was the same before as after the enactment of the statute. In Rex v. Scully, 1 Car. & P. 319,[4] 11 E. C. L. 407, decided in 1824, several years before the statute, it was held that the henroost was not part of the curtilage.

[2] "A trespasser, having knowledge that there are spring-guns in a wood, although he may be ignorant of the particular spots where they are placed, cannot maintain an action for an injury received in consequence of his accidental treading on the latent wire connecting with the gun, and thereby letting it off."

[3] What buildings only are a part of a house for capital purposes: "That no building, although within the same curtilage with the dwelling house, and occupied therewith, shall be deemed to be part of such dwelling house for the purpose of burglary * * * unless there shall be a communication between such building and dwelling house, either immediate or by means of a covered and enclosed passage leading from one to the other."

In the further progress of this cause evidence was offered to prove that the goose house, in which the spring-gun was set by Gilliam, and in attempting to enter which Payne was killed by the discharge of the gun, was situated within from thirty-five to sixty feet of the dwelling house of Gilliam, in which himself and his family resided and slept; that the said goose house, and out-houses appurtenant to and used with the dwelling, together with said dwelling house, were enclosed by a common fence surrounding them, the whole premises not exceeding in extent one acre of ground; that there was an interior partition fence of stone, not laid in mortar, about three feet high, but with an opening in it about two feet wide, to let Gilliam's family pass through to the goose house, and that the said stone fence, with a rail upon the opening, was used to keep the cows from coming to the dwelling house.

Upon which said evidence, and the other evidence in the cause, the prisoner's counsel prayed the court to instruct the jury: That if they believe, from the evidence aforesaid, that the said goose house was appurtenant to, and used with Gilliam's dwelling house as one of the out-houses thereof, and that the whole were under one common enclosure, and that the said goose house was not more than sixty feet distant from said dwelling, then the said goose house was within the curtilage, and privileged as part of said dwelling, and the breaking and entering the same in the night time by the deceased with the intent to steal Gilliam's geese in said goose house, if believed to be true by the jury, was burglary, and if the deceased came to his death in the attempt to commit said burglary, by the spring-gun set there by Gilliam to protect his goose house, the prisoner is entitled to a verdict of acquittal.

Which instruction the court gave.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. GILLIES.

[Pet. C. C. 159;[1] 3 Wheeler, Crim. Cas. 308.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1815.

CITIZENSHIP—RESIDENCE IN FOREIGN COUNTRY—SHIPPING—MASTER—OWNER—CORRECTION OF ERRORS.

1. Whether a native citizen of the United States, who resides in a foreign country, does not by such residence forfeit his citizenship? Such a person may, under the act passed 31st December, 1792 [1 Stat. 287], command a registered vessel of the United States, without her right to the payment of domestic duties being affected thereby; but under the same act, he cannot be the owner of a vessel of the United States.

[Cited in Scanlan v. Wright, 13 Pick. 526.]

2. A citizen of the United States cannot throw off his allegiance, without a law authorising the same

3. Any irregularities committed by the jury relative to their verdict, ought to have been corrected in the court below, and they cannot be examined by writ of error.

This was writ of error to the district court [of the United States for the district of Pennsylvania]. The only question in the court below [case unreported] was, whether upon the facts stated in the special verdict, the defendant's vessel was liable to pay duties as a foreign bottom. Another error assigned, was, that the jury, after they were sent out, separated without leave of the court, in consequence of a deception they practised upon the officer, by saying they had agreed on a verdict; when in truth they had not done so. They afterwards assembled and found the verdict, upon which the judgment was rendered.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, stopped the counsel, as to this point, by observing, that if there was any such irregularity in the conduct of the jury, as ought to have set aside their verdict, it was in the discretion of the court below, to act as was proper on the occasion; and that the decision of that court, upon this point, is not examinable by this court upon a writ of error or otherwise. The question upon the merits was, whether the master of this vessel had forfeited his character of a citizen of the United States, and the privileges attached to it, under the act of congress of the 31st December, 1792 (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 313 [1 Stat. 287]).

The district attorney maintained the affirmative.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The court having disposed of the first error assigned in this record, I shall proceed to consider the only remaining question which has been discussed; this is, whether from the facts stated in the special verdict, John Shaw, master of the ship William P. Johnson, has forfeited his citizenship? If he has, then the judgment below must be reversed, and entered in favour of the United States; otherwise it is to be affirmed.

It appears by the finding of the jury, that Shaw is a citizen of the United States, by birth, and resided therein up to the year 1804, with the exception of two years; that he was abroad from the year 1804, to the present year; whether in England or on the Continent, or whether he was navigating the ocean, is not stated. It is found that he is married, and now has a family in London; but whether he married in England,

[4] "A person set to watch a yard or garden, is not justified in shooting any one who comes into it in the night, even if he should see the party go into his master's hen roost. But if, from the conduct of the party, he has fair ground for believing his own life in actual and immediate danger, he is justified in shooting him."

or in the United States, or whether his family is residing in England, or is there merely on a visit, is not stated. Upon such a case as this, it requires more ingenuity than I possess, to frame an argument to prove, that Shaw has not forfeited his privileges of a citizen of the United States. It would be like attempting to prove a self-evident proposition. But taking for granted, that the case appeared to be such as the district attorney supposed it to be, and argued upon; that is, that Shaw resided in England from the year 1804, to the year 1815, with his family, having married in that country; I am yet to learn, that an American citizen forfeits that character, or the privileges attached to it, by residing and marrying in a foreign country; though, during a part of the time, war should intervene, between that and his native country, he taking no part therein; unless such character or privileges should be impaired, by some law of his own country. I do not mean to moot the question of expatriation, founded on the self will of a citizen, because it is entirely beside the case before the court. It may suffice for the present to say, that I must be more enlightened upon this subject than I have yet been, before I can admit, that a citizen of the United States can throw off his allegiance to his country, without some law authorising him to do so. It is true, that a man may obtain a foreign domicil, which will impress upon him a national character for commercial purposes, and may expose his property, found upon the ocean, to all the consequences of his new character; in like manner, as if he were, in fact, a subject of the government under which he resides. But he does not, on this account, lose his original character, or cease to be a subject or citizen of the country where he was born, and to which his perpetual allegiance is due. The present case presents no question connected with the subject of domicil, but turns, altogether, upon the construction of a law relative to the navigation system of the United States.

The question, which the case I am supposing suggests is, does an American bottom, lose her privileges as such, on account of the master residing with his family in a foreign country, he being by birth a citizen of the United States? Let the act of congress made upon this subject, answer the question. It declares, that registered vessels of the United States, shall not continue to enjoy the benefits and privileges bestowed upon such vessels, longer than they shall continue to be wholly owned and to be commanded, by a citizen of the United States. The second section of the law, however, declares, that such registered vessel shall cease to enjoy the benefits thereof, if owned in whole or in part, by a citizen of the United States, who usually resides in a foreign country, during the continuance of such residence; unless under certain exceptions. But in respect to the master, no such qualification is to be found in this law, or in any part of our navigation system. Had this latter provision not have been made, in relation to the owner, I cannot perceive upon what principle, the court could have supplied it by construction; but being made by the legislature, it marks the intention of that body, to distinguish between the foreign residence of the owner, and that of the master; and it further proves the sense of congress, as to residence abroad, that it does not, without legislative provision, affect the character or privileges of a citizen.

There is a sound reason for the distinction which the legislature seems to have had in view. The profits of trade, necessarily incorporate themselves with the wealth of the nation where the trade is carried on; and these profits are increased, as the duties upon the trade are diminished. The policy therefore, which dictates discriminating duties, to favour our own merchants, would point out the necessity of applying the system, as well to citizens of the United States, settled abroad, as to other merchants; but the same policy is not applicable to the master of the vessel. If the owner of the vessel which he employs, resides within the United States, it is immaterial where the master resides. It is only necessary, that he should be a citizen of the United States. Judgment affirmed.

HINDERING AND ASSAULTING MARSHAL — PLACES OF ELECTION.

Rights of United States deputy marshals at the places of election. Limits of their power.

[Cited in Attorney General v. May, 99 Mich. 550, 58 N. W. 483.]

Indictment [against Adolphus Gitma] for hindering and assaulting a deputy marshal in the discharge of his duty at an election for a member of the house of representatives of the United States. During the progress of the argument before the jury in this case, the judge, in order to shorten the discussion, interrupted counsel with the following explanation of the law governing the case:

HUGHES, District Judge. There has been so much controversy and so much feeling on this subject that I think I ought to make use of this first occasion on which the court has been called upon to rule upon it, to set out its view of the law on the subject, so that officers of the United States will better know their duties and powers, from the only source competent to explain them in a binding and authoritative manner. It is useless to consider the constitutionality of the law of congress embodied in the Revised Statutes in regard to the duties of supervisors and deputy marshals of the United States during their attendance upon elections. Section 4 of the first article of the constitution of the United States provides that: "The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof, but the congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators."

There can be no doubt, therefore, of the constitutionality of the sections of the Revised Statutes about to be reviewed, so far as they apply to elections for members of congress. Their constitutionality is only brought in question when they are sought to be applied to elections for state officers. The election, for conduct at which Gitma, now under trial, was indicted, was held for the election of a member of congress. Deputy Marshal Archer was in the room of the judges of election at Petersburg, and was ordered out, and in that way, but not by violence, was put out by Policeman Gitma. Gitma stands indicted for the act. The question is, whether a deputy marshal had a right to be in the room of the judges by the law of the United States? The law makes a clear distinction between the powers of supervisors and the powers of deputy marshals during their attendance at elections. As to supervisors the language of section 2019 is that "they are authorized and directed, in their respective election districts or voting precincts on the day of election, to take, occupy, and remain in such position, from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot-boxes, as will, in their judgment, best enable them to see each person offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the maner in which the voting is being conducted," etc. Section 2017 gives the same authority in general terms. Thus, not only does the law in terms empower a supervisor to be in the room with the judges of election, but empowers him to be in any place or position in which, in his own judgment, he can best perform his duties. The act of congress which is thus specific in defining and complete in conferring these powers on supervisors, is the same one which prescribes the duties of deputy marshals. While it is thus express and full in regard to supervisors it is the reverse in defining the authority of deputy marshals. Section 2021 simply provides that "when required" to do so by the supervisors it shall be the duty of deputy marshals to "attend the polls" in their districts or precincts. The section gives the deputy marshals no authority except to be present at the polls. The same act of congress which expressly "directs" supervisors to place themselves before or behind the ballot-boxes as they may think proper, is silent in regard to deputy marshals, and gives them no such authority. Section 2022 defines the object of the appointment of deputy marshals, and defines their powers and duties. It makes it their duty to "keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors in the discharge of their duty; to preserve order at the voting-places; to prevent fraudulent voting, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and to arrest without process any person who commits illegal acts in their presence." It omits to give them authority to go behind the ballot-boxes and to place themselves in any position they please. This omission has much meaning, as showing that the powers and duties of marshals are different from those of supervisors. This same section 2022, while providing that the supervisors, in addition to their own powers, shall, in the absence of deputy marshals, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals, omits to give the reverse authority; and neither this section nor any other section of the law gives to marshals, in the absence of supervisors, the powers and duties of supervisors proper. Their duties, therefore, are not those of supervisors of elections, but merely those of conservators of the peace at the polls.

My conclusion, therefore, is, that unless for the purpose of suppressing actual violence or of preserving the peace when actually disturbed, or protecting the supervisor when actually needing protection, or preventing fraud actually attempted, in the room, the deputy marshals have no right to be in the room in which the judges and supervisors of election are performing their duties, or to go behind "the ballot-boxes" unless requested to do so by both judges and supervisors. If congress had designed that they should have that power (as it did design that supervisors should have it) it would have given it expressly (as it did give the power to the supervisors expressly). Unless it can be shown that their presence is required by the exigencies which have been mentioned, the judges of election have the same right to order deputy marshals out of their room as they have to order out any unofficial person. The object of sections 2021 and 2022 is to define the powers and duties of deputy marshals, while the object of section 5522 is to define the offence and fix the punishment of persons who hinder and obstruct these officers in the performance of duties required of or authorized in them; and when this latter section goes on to say that when a person obstructs them in doing what they are authorized by law to do, by specifying modes by which this obstruction may be committed, these latter clauses of the penal section of the law are not intended to give immunity and protection to deputy marshals in acts not authorized by sections 2021 and 2022. Though section 5522 therefore forbids any person from obstructing the deputy marshals or supervisors in doing acts which it names, and amongst others "from going to and from any room" where an election may be held; yet these words are to be construed in connection with all the rest of this law on the subject, and must therefore be treated as applying only to supervisors of election, as they only, and not deputy marshals, are allowed by those provisions of the law designed to define the powers and duties of such officers to "go to and from the room" in which the ballot-boxes are.

The following is, therefore, the ruling of the court: Unless it is shown that a disturbance of the peace has actually occurred, or violence is committed, or that one or the other is threatened, or that actual fraud is attempted, or that the supervisor is in actual need of protection, in the room of the judges of election, the deputy marshals of election have no right to be in the said room against the orders of the judges of election during the progress of the voting. But if there be actual disturbance of the peace, or other actual violence committed or threatened, or if the supervisor be in actual need of protection, or fraud be attempted in the said room, then the deputy marshal may enter the room for the purpose of discharging the duties imposed on him by section 2022.

Nolle prosequi was entered.

CIVIL RIGHTS — CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS — VIOLATION BY STATE OFFICER.

1. The rights secured by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the constitution are objects of legitimate protection by the law-making power of the federal government, and the power is expressly conferred upon congress to enforce the articles conferring these rights. Earlier prohibitions to the states were left without any express power of interference by congress; but in this case such intervention was contemplated and expressly authorized.

2. When state laws have imposed duties upon persons, whether officers or not, the performance or non-performance of which affects rights under the federal government, congress may make the non-performance of those duties an offence against the United States, and may punish it accordingly.

[This was an indictment against Archibald Given for violation of Act May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140). There was a verdict of guilty, and the case is now heard upon motion in arrest of judgment.]

STRONG, Circuit Justice. The defendant was indicted for a violation of the second section of the act of congress of May 31, 1870, entitled "An act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several states of the Union, and for other purposes" (16 Stat. 140). That section enacts "that if by or under the authority of the constitution or laws of any state, or the laws of any territory, any act is or shall be required to be done as a prerequisite or qualification for voting, and, by such constitution or laws, persons or officers are or shall be charged with the performance of duties in furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform such prerequisite, or to become qualified to vote; it shall be the duty of every such person and officer to give to all citizens of the United States the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite, and to become qualified to vote, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; and if any such person or officer shall refuse or knowingly omit to give full effect to this section, he shall for every such offence * * * be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall on conviction thereof be fined not less than five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not less than one month, and not more than one year, or both, at the discretion of the court."

At the trial a verdict of guilty was returned upon five counts of the indictment, and it is now moved in arrest of judgment that "the statute under which the indictment was framed is unauthorized by the constitution of the United States, and is in conflict therewith."

tant one, and I have given to it a careful consideration. I agree that the legislative power of the federal government is not unlimited, and I accept the doctrine that congress can enact no law which is not authorized by the constitution, either expressly or by necessary implication. But within its sphere the power of congress is as ample and complete as the necessities for its exercise require. A power is shorn of none of its extent by the fact that it is held by a branch of the federal government. The powers of that government are limited in number, but not in their nature. If, therefore, the grant of power can be found in the constitution, the validity of a law enacted under it is not dependent upon the extent to which the exercise of the power has been carried. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the constitution have confessedly extended civil and political rights, and, I think, they have enlarged the powers of congress. The primary object of the thirteenth, and of the first sections of the fourteenth and fifteenth was to secure to persons certain rights which they had not previously possessed. Thus the thirteenth amendment made the right of personal liberty a constitutional right. The fourteenth assured the right of citizenship to all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. And the fifteenth defined partially that which constitutes citizenship and which belongs to citizenship as such. It recognizes, as a right of citizenship, exemption from disability on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, in the determination of a right to vote. It practically declares that citizenship, irrespective of color or race, confers a right to vote on equal terms or conditions with those that are required for voters of another race or color. It places white and colored persons on equal footing as respects the elective franchise, and it protects race against discrimination as fully as it protects color or previous condition. In all the states the right to vote at elections is held under certain restrictions. Among these it was not an uncommon one that the voter should be a free white citizen, or that he should not be of the African race. And until the amendment was adopted, it was in the power of any state to deny to any person who happened to be colored, or who happened to be of German or Irish descent, any participation in the elective franchise. Mere citizenship did not of course secure a right to vote. It was to remove the possibility of such discriminations that the fifteenth amendment was adopted. It leaves to the states, as before, the regulation of suffrage and of the qualification of electors within their limits, with the single restriction that they shall not make color, or race, or previous condition of servitude, a reason for discrimination. It is true the amendment is in form a prohibition upon the United States, and upon the states, but it is not the less on that account an assertion of a constitutional right belonging to citizens as such. Surely it cannot be maintained that it conferred no rights upon persons. There are very many instances to be found in the constitution as it was before the recent amendments, in which rights of persons have been recognized and secured without any express grant. It is not uncommon to speak of them as existing, and to prohibit their infringement. The prohibition is itself an acknowledgment of the right. Thus, the provision that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it, is a constitutional recognition that such a privilege does exist. Indeed very many of the prohibitions mentioned in the 9th section, and those upon the states mentioned in the 10th section, imply corresponding rights and exemptions belonging to persons. It is not necessary to maintain that because there are constitutional rights, recognized as such by the organic laws, congress has power to protect them, in all cases, by affirmative legislation. Where rights result from prohibitions upon the states, there seems to have been no provision made for their enforcement by congress.

There is, however, one clause in the constitution that deserves particular mention, when speaking of indirect recognition of rights, and of the power of congress to protect them. I refer to the 2d section of article fourth, which ordained as follows: "No person held to service or labor in one state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." This has always been understood as securing the right of a master to the return of his fugitive servant. It gives no express power to congress to legislate upon the subject. And such power is not found in the 8th section of the first article, unless it is in the last clause, and there only by a very liberal construction. Yet by the act of February 12, 1793 [1 Stat. 302], congress enacted not only that the person to whom such rights were secured, the person to whom such labor or service might be due his agent or attorney, might seize such fugitive from labor, but that any person who should knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder the seizure, or rescue the fugitive, or harbor him after notice that he was a fugitive from labor, should be subject to a penalty, as well as to damages. This act was held to be a constitutional exercise of congressional power by the supreme court, as well as by state courts, in repeated adjudications. Prigg v. Com. [16 Pet. (41 U. S.) 539]. So on the 18th of September, 1850 (9 Stat. 462), another act was passed, with much more stringent provisions intended to secure this right of the master, imposing severe penalties for obstructing or hindering the exercise of the, right, and fixing a minimum of damages to be recovered in a civil action. This second enactment has also been held constitutional by the supreme court of the United States. Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506. The discussion of this subject in Prigg v. Com. is worthy of careful attention, for it bears directly upon the question how far congress could, under the constitution, as it was before its recent amendments, interfere to protect rights recognized by it. I can only quote briefly from the opinion of the court as delivered by Judge Story, but the whole is important. The argument commences with some general observations upon the principles to be applied in expounding the constitution. "It will," said the court, "probably be found, when we look to the character of the constitution itself, the objects which it seeks to obtain, the powers which it confers, the rights which it secures, as well as the known historical fact that many of its provisions were matters of compromise of opposing interests and opinions, that no uniform rule of interpretation can be applied to it which may not allow, even if it does not positively demand, many modifications of its actual application to particular cases. And perhaps the safest rule of interpretation after all will be found to be, to look to the nature and effects of the particular powers, duties, and rights, with all the lights and aids of contemporary history, and to give to the words of each just such operation and force, consistent with their legitimate meaning, as may fairly secure and attain the end proposed." The court then proceeded to say: "Historically, it is well known that the object of this clause" (that respecting persons held to service or labor) was to secure the citizens of the slave-holding states the complete right and title of ownership in their slaves, as property, in every state of the Union into which they might escape from the state where they were held in servitude. "How, then," said the court, "are we to interpret the language of this clause? The true answer is, in such a manner, as consistently with the words, shall fully and completely effectuate the whole object of it. If, by one mode of interpretation, the right must become shadowy and unsubstantial and without any remedial power adequate to the end, and, by another mode, it will attain its just end, and secure its manifest purpose, it would seem, upon principles of reasoning, absolutely irresistible that the latter ought to prevail. No court of justice can be authorized so to construe any clause of the constitution as to defeat its obvious ends, when another construction, equally accordant with the words and sense thereof, will enforce and protect them." The court then proceeded to show that if congressional legislation was not contemplated, if it was not legitimate, the right secured by the provision would, in a great variety of cases, be delusive and empty. Hence it was argued, that, if the constitution guaranteed the right, and required the delivery (as could not well be doubted), the natural inference was that the national government was clothed with the appropriate authority and functions to enforce it.

These principles reach much farther than is necessary to sustain the constitutionality of the 2d section of act of 1870. From the recognized existence of a constitutional right, and a duty not imposed in terms upon congress, power was deduced to protect the right by penal legislation. Said Chief Justice Taney: "I concur in all that is contained in the opinion concerning the power of congress to protect the citizens of the slave-holding states in the enjoyment of this right, and to provide by laws an effectual remedy to enforce it, and to inflict penalties upon those who shall violate its provisions." Thus it will be seen that the end to be secured was regarded as measuring the extent of the power existing to secure it. I am not, however, to be understood as holding that under the constitution, as it was prior to the recent amendments, all the rights therein recognized, or all of the duties enjoined, might have been protected and enforced by congressional legislation. Some, at least, if not all of the prohibitions upon the states, which imply personal rights, were left for enforcement to the federal judiciary, or to the comity and sense of right of the states themselves.

But the recent amendments have introduced great changes. If prior to 1870, when the fifteenth amendment became a part of our organic law, the right of a slave holder to the ownership of his fugitive slave in any state of the Union, and his right to delivery of such slave, was a right which congress was authorized to enforce and protect by penal legislation against individuals obstructing it, much more are the rights secured, recognized, and guaranteed by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments objects of legitimate protection by the law-making power of the federal government. Those amendments have left nothing to the comity of the states affecting the subjects of their provisions. They manifestly intended to secure the right guaranteed by them against any infringement from any quarter. Not only were the rights given—the right of liberty, the right of citizenship, and the right to participate with others in voting, on equal terms, without any discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—but power was expressly conferred upon congress to enforce the articles conferring the right. The second section of the fifteenth article ordained that "the congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation." Manifestly this section was adopted for a purpose. It must be so construed as to confer some effective power. But what meaning can it have if the first section, as contended by the defendant, is no more than an inhibition upon the United States, and upon the states as sovereignties, against discriminations? If the first section assures no rights to persons, how can congress enforce the article? Proprio vigore, the first section renders inoperative all adverse national or state legislation. To hold, therefore, that the second section was adopted merely to guard against national or state enactments, or to afford protection against ministerial or judicial acts of state governments, or of state officers acting in the line of their duty prescribed by a state, is to make superfluous and unmeaning all that was accomplished by the first section. And thus holding is to lose sight of the end sought to be attained by both sections, namely, the right to exemption from certain unfriendly discriminations. It is to subordinate that which is substance to mere form. I cannot think that such is a reasonable construction of this amendment. It was well known when it was adopted that in many quarters it was regarded with great disfavor. It might well have been anticipated that it would meet with evasion and hindrances, not from state legislatures, for their affirmative action was rendered powerless by it, or not from a state's judiciary, for their judgments denying the right were reviewable by federal courts, but by private persons and ministerial officers, by assessors, collectors, boards of registration, or election officers. And it might have been foreseen that by these agencies a right intended to be substantial could become incapable of enjoyment. Suppose, as is largely the case in Delaware, the state passes no unfriendly act, but neglects to impose penalties upon its election officers for making discriminations on account of race or color, and provides no remedy for such wrongs, of what value is the constitutional provision unless it means that congress may interfere? I think such intervention was contemplated and expressly authorized. It was not intended to leave the right without full and adequate protection. Earlier prohibitions to the states were left without any express power of interference by congress; but these later, encountering as they did so much popular prejudice and working changes so radical, were fortified by grants to congress of power to carry them into full effect —that is, to enact any laws appropriate to give reality to the rights declared. That the second section of the act of May 31, 1870, is appropriate legislation to secure those rights and to give effect to the thirteenth amendment is perfectly plain. I am therefore of opinion that its enactment was within the power of congress. The first reason urged in arrest of the judgment cannot be sustained.

The second reason assigned in support of the motion is "that the provisions of the act of congress are not applicable to the duties imposed by the laws of Delaware upon the defendant, as charged in the indictment." I understand this to mean that the defendant is not a person or officer charged by the law of the state with the performance of duties in furnishing to citizens an opportunity to qualify themselves for voting, or to perform some prerequisite thereto. To determine how this is requires an examination of the state constitution and laws. By the constitution several things are required as prerequisites to the enjoyment of a right to vote. Among these is the payment of a county tax within two years next prior to the election day, which tax had been assessed at least six months before the election. To enable the performance of this prerequisite the law of the state makes provision for an annual assessment of a tax, and for the appointment of a collector to receive it. The defendant is such a tax collector, and his duties as such are clearly defined by law. He is required to collect all the rates and taxes mentioned in his duplicate, and pay over the same, except so far as allowances may be made to him by the levy court for delinquencies, commissions, or otherwise. He is required to return to the levy court, on the first Tuesday of March next after the date of his warrant, a true account of all delinquents. If then an allowance be made to him for the tax of any one returned delinquent, the tax is extinguished, and he is not permitted to receive it. With the levy court is the power of making the assessment lists, but no assessment can be made after the last day of March; nor can any alterations be made in the assessment list after that time. From the assessment list the collector's duplicate is made. The levy court is required at its March meeting to examine and settle the delinquent list of each collector, and strike the name of each delinquent from the assessment list, and the collector's duplicate, if the delinquent be dead, or has removed from the state; otherwise it is to remain upon the assessment, and be entered on the collector's duplicate for the ensuing year. These are all duties imposed by the statutes. In view of them, it is very plain that a tax collector is a person charged by the laws of the state with the performance of duties in furnishing to citizens an opportunity to qualify themselves for voting. He, and he alone, can receive the tax which must be paid before a vote can be given. He makes the return of delinquents, and if that return be false, or if he return the delinquent dead, or removed from the state, thereby causing his name to be stricken from the assessment list, there can be no assessed tax the payment of which is by the constitution a prerequisite for voting. A false return is a breach of the duty with which he is charged, leading directly to the disqualification of the voter. If such a return be made, or if the collector refuse or omit to collect the tax, and if this is done because of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of any citizens, and with a purpose to make a discrimination against him, I have no doubt that the collector is within the purview of the act of congress. I think, therefore, the indictment is not faulty in this particular.

The remaining reason advanced in support of the motion in arrest of judgment is "that the defendant, being an officer of the state of Delaware, with no powers or duties but such as were prescribed by the constitution and laws of said state, is amenable only to said constitution and laws for any non-performance thereunder." If, by this is meant that a state officer, or a person deputed to perform duties on behalf of a state, is not amenable to the laws of the United States, that he owes no duties to such laws, and that he is not punishable for violation of them, I cannot assent to it. I agree that congress cannot impose upon state officers, as such, federal duties, but I fail to perceive that the act of 1870 has imposed any new duties upon any state officer. It is, I think, an exploded heresy that the national government cannot reach all individuals in the states. It cannot invade the state domain. It cannot take cognizance of offences against state sovereignty. But when state laws have imposed duties upon persons, whether officers or not, the performance or non-performance of which affects rights under the federal government (as, for example, to vote, the right of citizenship, or the right to vote, so far as it is secured). I have no doubt that congress may make the non-performance of those duties an offence against the United States, and may punish it accordingly. This is not invading the state domain. It has no reference to violations of state laws. They remain punishable in the state courts. Undoubtedly, an act, or an omission to act, may be an offence both against the state law and the laws of the United States. Any other doctrine would place the national government entirely within the power of the states, and would leave constitutional rights guarded only by the protection which each state might choose to extend to them. The fault of this objection to the indictment is, it fails to apprehend that the fifteenth amendment secured rights to every citizen, and that it gave congress power to protect them. It may be that congress cannot provide for the appointment of assessors, registers, or collectors, or for the existence of any officers who under state constitutions are necessary to enable persons to qualify for voting; but if they cannot, when such officers are appointed, provide that no constitutional discriminations shall be made, the thirteenth amendment is not worth the paper upon which it was written. I cannot construe the constitution in such a manner as to give it no effect. I am therefore constrained to hold that there is no sufficient reason for arresting the judgment in this case.

The motion in arrest of judgment is overruled.

An opinion was also delivered in this case by Bradford, District Judge, for which see [Case No. 15,211.]

UNITED STATES v. GIVEN.

[17 Int. Rev. Rec. 195.]

Circuit Court, D. Delaware. 1873.

CIVIL RIGHTS — VIOLATION BY STATE OFFICER — POWERS OF CONGRESS.

[1. The fact that the 15th amendment of the United States constitution merely prohibits the denial or abridgment of a citizen's right to vote on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, does not limit congress, in adopting legislation for the purpose of enforcing the amendment, to cases in which there has been actual legislation by the general government or by a state denying or abridging such right.]

[2. In adopting legislation for carrying into effect the 15th amendment to the constitution, congress has power to provide for the punishment of a state official who refuses to perform the duties necessary to qualify colored citizens to vote.]

[This was an indictment against Archibald Given for violating the second section of the act of May 31, 1870. There was a verdict of guilty against the defendant, and the case is now heard upon motion in arrest of judgment. For the opinion of Judge Strong, delivered in the same case, see Case No. 15,210.]

BRADFORD, District Judge. Taking up the first objection to the indictment, viz.: "For that the statute under which said indictment was framed, was not in pursuance of the constitution of the United States, and is in conflict therewith." We think the 2d section of the act of congress [May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 140)], on which this indictment is framed, is in pursuance of, and is authorized by the constitution of the United States, and not in conflict with the same. It is the result of the exercise of legislative authority, specially granted for the purpose of accomplishing the object contemplated by the fifteenth amendment, viz., the purpose of securing the right to vote of all citizens without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Without now considering the legality of the means to accomplish this result, we cannot appreciate the force of the argument, that there cannot be any legislation by congress under the authority of the fifteenth amendment, except that which shall be enacted against some "denial" or "abridgment" by the United States, or by the several states, of the right of citizens of the United States to vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The power specifically granted by the fifteenth amendment is to enforce by appropriate legislation the article in question. In my judgment the amendment carries with it the grant of a constitutional right. Indeed it is difficult to conceive of the constitutional prohibition, on the states and general government, from denying or abridging a constitutional right, without at the same time conceding the grant of the right; for such prohibition or denial appears to be an absurdity if the grant be not admitted, for otherwise there would be no subject matter for the denial or prohibition to work upon. Congress then (the grant of right being admitted) can select any means it deems appropriate to render available and secure this constitutional right to vote, and is not limited to such measures as may be directed to a denial or abridgment of the right by the general government or the states. If the enjoyment of the right is endangered from any other cause than a denial or abridgment by the general government or the several states, that danger is a proper subject matter of legislation; just as much in my judgment, as hostile legislation by the general government or states would be.

The right to vote, before this amendment to the constitution, was wholly granted or denied and regulated by the several states of the Union; and now the citizens of these United States have granted and guaranteed by national authority that which before they enjoyed—if enjoyed at all—at the will of the local or state governments. To make available the right to vote to all citizens of the United States without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude was the direct purpose of the fifteenth amendment. We cannot see therefore, how legislation which has this purpose directly in view cannot be appropriate because it was not directed against some denial or infringement by general or state legislation. The mode of the assertion of the constitutional right to vote in the fifteenth amendment is not altogether a novel feature in our constitution—as has been remarked on a former occasion during the trial of this cause. "The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless, when in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it." Section 9, art. 1, par. 2. This clause comprehends the constitutional grant of the writ of habeas corpus, under the form of an expression of denial of its suspension except in certain cases. Article 1st of the amendment to the constitution, is in these words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech; or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances." In this article it will be observed that the right to full liberty of religious faith, as regards any attempt to control it by the general government, secured to the citizen by the constitution of the United States, is granted under a form of expression, forbidding congress to make any law "prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" and that the right to a free press and free speech are granted under a form of expression denying their abridgment. So also with the right of the people to assemble and petition the government for a redress of grievances. Article 2d of the amendment is in these words: "A well regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed." This constitutional right, to keep and bear arms, is thus conferred by the declaration that it shall not be "infringed." In article 4th of the amended constitution, "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, is granted by the declaration that this right shall not be violated." It will thus be seen that the form of expression which contains the grant of the right to vote to the citizens is not at all unusual in the constitution.

The argument for the defence is that, as there is no express grant of right, but a prohibition of a denial or abridgment of the right by the general or state government, congress is limited in its exercise of legislative powers to those cases where there has been such denial or abridgment, and as there has been in the state of Delaware none such, the act of congress as regards this case is "ultra vires," is without constitutional authority. Now admitting, for the sake of argument (which otherwise I deny in toto), that the legislation of congress to carry into effect the fifteenth article must be confined to cases of abridgment or denial of the right to vote by the United States, or the several states, it must be conceded that any practical denial or abridgment existing at the present or apprehended in the future, can be made the subject matter of legislation, so as to guard against and defeat obstacles and hindrances in this form. If by indifference, refusal to pass such laws as harmonize with and aid in making available and secure to all citizens the right to vote, and by neglecting to punish the officers of its own state for a violation of their duty in affording to the citizens the prerequisites to voting, a practical denial and abridgment of that right are effected, congress, in my judgment, has full power under the fifteenth amendment to remove this evil, and to select such means as it may deem appropriate legislation. Nor is it necessary that there should be direct and hostile legislation by the general government or the several states. Suppose the qualifying process can be performed by none but officers acting under state authority, and there is no law, or disposition in state officials to punish the individual who by his own wilful act disfranchises citizens of the United States, is not the practical denial and abridgment as complete and as destructive of the purpose the fifteenth article was intended to accomplish, as if there was active hostile legislation? Whether, therefore, the scope of legislative action is extended, under the fifteenth article, to all appropriate legislation, for the purpose of making available and secure the right to vote granted by the article, or is confined to such legislation as will prevent a practical denial or abridgment thereof by the United States, or the several states, we think this 2d section of the act in question, on which the indictment is framed, is based on ample constitutional authority, and that therefore the first reason filed for arrest of judgment must be overruled.

2. "For that the provisions of the said statute are not applicable to the duties imposed by the laws of Delaware upon the said defendant, as charged in the said indictment." We suppose it is meant to be asserted by this second reason filed, that the collector of taxes was not intended to be embraced in the class or description of persons named in the act as "charged with the performance" of certain duties, etc. We fail to see any ground for such a conclusion. When we examine the provisions of the constitution of Delaware and of its statutes, imposing duties on the collector, the performance of which are pre-requisites to the citizen becoming qualified to vote, we cannot see how any person or officer could be more clearly and certainly embraced within the class or description of persons named in the act of congress, than the collector of taxes, the defendant in this indictment. I do not consider that this will bear an argument; the second reason is therefore overruled.

The third and last reason filed is in these words, viz.. "For that the said defendant being an officer of the state of Delaware, with no power or duties but such as were prescribed by the constitution and laws of the said state, is answerable only to said constitution and laws for any non-performance thereunder." This objection, stated in a different manner, is in substance this: "That the national government has no power to require or command a state officer to perform an act, which act is also required of him by state authority, and consequently has no power to punish for the non-performance of the act" The non-performance, it is said, is a breach of a duty to the authority under which the officer was appointed, and for that breach of duty he can be punished by no power save that under which he was appointed. If the duty of the collector as a qualifying officer was a duty which he owed to the state alone, and his act violated no law but that of the state under whose authority he acted, it may be conceded that there would be no warrant for the United States punishing, by fine and imprisonment, such a person under such circumstances. Congress, in legislating on this subject, found that the ability of the citizen of the United States to vote, depended on certain acts which could only be performed by certain persons holding office or authority under state governments, and unless there was a concurrence of the will of these officers with the action of the citizen, in qualifying himself to vote, the right of voting would be utterly destroyed. And supposing such a non-concurrence—and that it met no punishment in the several states—unless congress exercised a direct authority over, and punished the men who refused to perform their part in, qualifying citizens to vote, the fifteenth amendment would amount to nothing as a guarantee or security of right

The statute of the United States, then, under which this indictment was drawn, not only made a rule of action, superadded to that which was created by the state, but created a penalty, not for violating a state law, for that it could not punish, but for violating a United States law, or law protecting the constitutional rights of citizens of the United States. The fact of duty to state authority did not absolve the state official from duty to United States authority. The law-making power took these individuals just as it found them; invested with ability to carry into effect the fifteenth article, or to render it nugatory, and imposed a duty, by way of punishment, for the non-performance, impartially and fairly, of what was already required of them by state authority; they created no new duty, added no new act to be performed, made no new scheme, plan, or policy, different or other from that already required of the state officer, but only commanded him, as his action was vital to the exercise of right by the American citizen, to do impartially and fairly his duty.

But it is alleged, congress cannot impose a duty on a state officer to execute a United States law, and as it cannot impose such a duty, it cannot punish for violation thereof. The fallacy of this argument lies in not drawing the distinction between punishing a state officer for violating the laws of his state and violating the laws of the United States. Has congress the power to make it criminal for a state official to hinder and obstruct the exercise of this constitutional right to vote? This is the real question. I can have no doubt on that point. This power then granted—having committed the act of hindrance and obstruction—this defendant has made himself amenable to the laws of the United States, and incurred the penalty for their infraction. Now, how does his official character, or his duty to the state government, free him from this predicament. There are many cases where a man owes a double duty—to the state, and to the United States. For instance, among many others that might be named, the state, in the exercise of its undoubted rights of police arrangement and discipline, requires that its citizens shall keep the peace toward each other—shall not defraud each other by the circulation of spurious money; and yet when these crimes impinge on some duties due from the general government to citizens of the United States, they do not rely on the states for punishment, but legislate directly against the offenders, and punish by United States laws. Thus they will not leave the punishment of one who assaults a United States mail carrier with intent to rob, or who circulates spurious United States money, to the states, but punish these criminals by United States laws, leaving it optional with the states how far they will also vindicate their own broken laws. Justice Daniel, in U. S. v. Marigold, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 569, says: "With the view of avoiding conflict between the state and federal jurisdiction, this court, in the case of Fox v. Ohio [5 How. (46 U. S.) 410], have taken care to point out that the same act, might, as to its character and tendencies, and the consequences it involves, constitute an offence both against the state and the federal governments, and might draw to its commission the penalties denounced by either as appropriate to its character in reference to each." In [Moore v. People] 14 How. [55 U. S.] 15 Justice Grier rules that states might punish for harboring slaves in violation of their own laws, and that the same act might be a breach of the peace, and a transgression of the laws of both the United States and the individual states. Judge Nelson, in a case reported in American Law Review for January, 1873 [U. S. v. Wells, Case No. 16,665], where a person was indicted for passing forged U. S. treasury notes, and also indicted in the state court of Minnesota for the same offence, said: "The concurrent jurisdiction must be regarded as settled." Mr. Justice Johnson, in [Houston v. Moore] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 1, asks: "Why may not the same offence be made punishable both under the laws of the state and of the United States? Every citizen owed a double allegiance; he enjoys the protection, and participates in government, of both the state and the United States." Now, as there can be no valid reason why a man who violates a United States law in passing forged money should not be punished because he was forbidden by the laws of his state not to do that act, so there can be no valid reason why this defendant should not be punished for a violation of a United States law, because at the same time he violates the law of his state. A conviction for passing counterfeit money, and a sentence for the same, would undoubtedly interfere somewhat with the financial duties of a collector; yet no one supposes, for a moment, that his official position would constitute for him any protection, or that by his punishment the reserved rights of the state would in any constitutional sense be trenched upon; and yet they would be just as much in the one case as the other.

This claim made by the defence of immunity from punishment because it would interfere with the performance of official duty, would prevent the general government from punishing any state official who violates a United States law. I cannot, therefore, see that the record presents a case of an officer who had no duties but state duties, and therefore answerable only to state authority, but that a case is shown of a state official violating a United States law, which he was equally bound to obey and respect, with the law of his state.

I must therefore overrule the third reason filed for arrest of judgment, and the motion in arrest is denied.

Case No. 15,212.

UNITED STATES v. GIVINGS et al.

[1 Spr. 75.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. April, 1844.

SEAMEN—REFUSAL TO GO TO SEA—SEAWORTHINESS OF VESSEL—RESISTING ATTEMPT TO COMPEL GOING TO SEA—REVOLT.

1. If seamen really believe, upon reasonable grounds, that a vessel is unseaworthy, and ask for a survey, they are not bound to go to sea in her, till such request is granted. And this is so, although the jury in a very doubtful case, should incline to think that the vessel was, in fact, seaworthy.

2. If the masts are rotten and unfit for the voyage, the crew are not bound to go to sea, although the master makes a verbal promise that he will keep in certain latitudes, and carry certain sail, for which the masts are sufficient.

3. In such case, seaman may resist an attempt of the master to compel them to go to sea.

4. If, in making such resistance, an individual commits an unlawful act, he alone is liable therefor.

The prisoners [Henry Givings and others], fourteen in number, were indicted for a revolt on board the whale ship Hibernia, of New Bedford, while lying at Port Louis, in the Isle of France. From the evidence it appeared, that when the ship had been about twelve months out, and was nearly full of oil, the masts were discovered to be rotten, and were fished by pieces of a spare topmast, cut up for that purpose. Port Louis was the first port the ship made, after this discovery. On arriving there, a petition was presented to the American consul, signed by the three boat-steerers the carpenter, the cooper, and the blacksmith, and all the foremast hands, requesting that a survey might be had on the masts, before proceeding to sea. No notice being taken of this petition, several of the crew went to the office of the consul, who, however, refused to do anything in the matter, and treated the defendants very roughly. The men afterwards made another appeal to the master alone, who refused to call a survey, and asked the men why they did not run away. They continued to perform all their duty, until the master ordered them to heave up the anchor. They then refused, saying they would not go to sea, unless the masts were surveyed, and pronounced seaworthy. The master then ordered his officers to seize one of the men, named Dawson, who was the spokesman, and bring him aft. From this point, there was much conflicting evidence; but the facts appeared to be, that the officers attempted to seize Dawson, but were forcibly prevented from so doing by the men. The master then procured a sword, and repeated the attempt, but was again prevented, and the sword taken from him. After this, there appears to have been no further difficulty. The master called the men aft, and asked them, if they would go on the voyage, which they still refused to do, except upon the condition of a survey. The master, upon this, sent for a force of police, and had them all put in prison; and in a few days sailed for home without them. The men remained in prison forty-seven days, and were brought home for trial in another vessel. As to the condition of the masts, there was evidence that the vessel came home with her masts standing; and the master and officers testified that they bore a very heavy press of sail, in bad weather, without injury. But there was other evidence, showing that they were condemned and sold, on the arrival of the Hibernia, and that they were then very rotten, and unsafe for the purposes of a whaling voyage. It also appeared that the master made no offer to the men, to return home immediately in the ship, but insisted on their going on a cruising ground, which had the reputation of being stormy, making, however, certain promises, as to the latitudes within which he would keep, and the sail he would carry.

R. H. Dana, Jr., with whom was J. H. Prince, for the prisoners, rested the defence upon the right of the seamen to a survey, upon reasonable grounds of apprehension of unseaworthiness, and their right to refuse to go to sea without such survey.

Franklin Dexter, Dist. Atty. for the United States, argued, that, on the facts, the defendants were guilty of a revolt.

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging jury.) If the crew of a vessel, acting in good faith, and upon reasonable grounds of belief, refuse to go to sea, because of the unseaworthiness of the vessel, they cannot be found guilty of revolt, even though the jury should, upon all the evidence, be in doubt as to the actual seaworthiness of the vessel; or even, if they should, upon a measuring cast (Stat. July 20, 1840, c. 48, §§ 12–14; 5 Stat. 396; The Hibernia [Case No. 6,455], and cases there cited), be inclined to think she might have been seaworthy; for a reasonable apprehension, fairly entertained, takes away the element of "unlawful and wilful" resistance, necessary to constitute the offence. Full force should be given to the necessity of upholding the power of the master, and to the policy of requiring seamen to submit, in some instances, even to evident injustice, waiting for redress from the home tribunals; but a distinction should be drawn between cases of ordinary injuries, which can be compensated by pecuniary damages, and those where the wrong about to be done is of so serious a nature, as not to be measured by subsequent compensation in money; as when life or limbs are put in danger. The law regards life, and the safety of limbs, as of a higher value than the cost of surveys or repairs. Also, that if the masts were unseaworthy for the purposes of the voyage, the seamen were not obliged to go to sea, upon any merely verbal promise of the master, that he would keep in certain latitudes, and carry certain sail, even if the masts might be safe, in case these promises were complied with.

As to the charge of revolt, in resisting the attempt to seize Dawson; if the men were justifiable in refusing to go to sea without a survey, the master had no right to attempt to compel them; and if he used, or threatened, violence, upon the men, or any of them, apparently for the purpose of forcing them to go to sea, they had a right, in self-defence, to use such force as was necessary to resist his attempt. If the general object of resisting such attempt was legal, the particular acts of any one person, who might, in the course of the resistance, go farther than was necessary, being no part of the general object, others would not be responsible therefor. For such individual trespasses, the party committing them would alone be liable.

Verdict "Not guilty."

See U. S. v. Borden [Case No. 14,625]; Shorey v. Rennell [Id. 12,806]; Knowlton v. Boss [Id. 7,901].

[NOTE. Immediately after their acquittal, the defendants filed a libel for subtraction of wages against the Hibernia. The court decided that the refusal of the men to obey the master's orders was justifiable, and that the men were entitled to their full lays. Case No. 6,455.]

Case No. 15,213.

UNITED STATES v. GLAB.

[1 McCrary, 166.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. Oct., 1876.[2]

INTERNAL REVENUE—LICENSE TO FIRM.

Where a license for carrying on business as brewers was issued to the firm of A. & G. for one year, and before the year expired G. purchased A.'s interest in the business, and continued the business at the same place till the end of the year, and not elsewhere by either partner,—held, no violation of the law.

Error to district court [of the United States for the district of Iowa].

This is a civil action to recover the penalty imposed for carrying on the business of a brewer, without having paid the special tax therefor required by law. The answer sets up former acquittal and general denial. By stipulation, the cause was tried alone upon the general issue on the following agreed statement of facts: "That on the first day of May, 1874, Glab & Sness, a co-partnership, paid their special tax for carrying on the business of brewers of first class by the said firm, and took proper receipt therefor. That said firm carried on said business thereafter, until the first of August, 1874, when the said firm was dissolved, and the said [Adam] Glab purchased the interest of said Sness in said firm and business of brewing, and thereafter carried on the said business of a brewer of the first class, at the same place, during the remainder of the year covered by said license, viz.: To the first of May, 1875, without having paid a special tax therefor, other than that paid by said firm, and took out no license in his own name." The question raised, therefore, is this: Whether, under the circumstances, said Glab could carry on said business of a brewer at the same place, in his own name, for the remainder of the license year, without the payment of a special tax, in addition to that paid by the firm. The district court gave judgment for the defendant [case unreported], and to reverse this judgment the case is brought by writ of error to this court by the government.

[1] [Reported by Hon. Geo. W. McCrary, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

James T. Lane, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

T. S. Wilson, for defendant.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. As the same business was carried on in the same place by Glab, and not elsewhere by either partner; as no new member was introduced into the firm on the dissolution; as there is no express requirement in such a case that a new license shall be taken out by the successor, guided by the provision that "any number of persons doing business as a firm at any one place, shall be required to pay but one special tax" (Rev. St. § 3234); and by the spirit of the analogous cases as to succession in business provided for by section 3241, and influenced by the consideration that the government received its revenue on this business in this place for a year, and is not therefore deprived of any revenue in fact, and that within the limitations of this case no door is open for fraud, I am of opinion that, upon the special facts, the judgment of the district court was right. Affirmed.

[A writ of error was sued out from the supreme court, where the judgment of this court was affirmed. 99 U. S. 225.]

UNITED STATES v. The GLAMORGAN.

[2 Curt. 236.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1855.

APPEAL—WHEN TO BE TAKEN.

1. After a final decree has been made by a district court, sitting in admiralty, and the court has adjourned without day, the decree cannot be set aside, or opened so as to allow an appeal to the circuit court, a term whereof has intervened since the decree was made.

2. If an appeal from such a decree be not taken to the term of the circuit court, held next after the making of the decree, the right is lost.

[Cited in The Oriental, Case No. 10,570.]

In admiralty.

Mr. Hallett, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This was a libel of information for a forfeiture of the brig, by reason of her employment in the slave-trade. The district court decreed a forfeiture and sale of the vessel and cargo [Case No. 5,472], and on a return of the warrant of sale, and payment of the proceeds into the registry, at the September term, 1854, made a final decree, distributing the net proceeds equally between the United States, and the commander, officers, and crew of the brig Perry, a public armed vessel of the United States, who made the seizure of the Glamorgan, and ordering each moiety to be paid out of the registry accordingly; and it was paid, one moiety to the United States, and the other to the proctor of the private persons interested. Subsequently, the secretary of the navy not being satisfied of the correctness of this distribution, the district-attorney, at the following December term of the district court, applied to the judge to re-examine so much of the decree as made distribution. The judge heard the attorney, and upon that, made an entry on the record, that, having examined the order, and considered the same, he was of opinion it was correct, and therefore does not revoke or alter the same. An appeal was then claimed by the United States, and disallowed; and the question now is, whether the appeal should have been allowed? The 21st section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 83) allows an appeal from final decrees of the district court to the next circuit court to be held for such district. The final decree in this case was made on the 8th of September, 1854. The next term of the circuit court, held in this district, was on the 15th of October, 1854. This appeal was not claimed until the December term of the district court, and could not then be allowed, because it was too late to take an appeal to the term of the circuit court held next after the entry of the final decree. See Montgomery v. The Betsy [Case No. 9,734]; Norton v. Rich [Id. 10,352]; U. S. v. Certain Hogsheads of Molasses [Id. 14,766].

But it is argued, that the final decree was opened, at the December term, on motion of the district-attorney; and that the right of appeal is to be considered as thereby revived, or a new right created. Without intending to give any opinion as to what it was fit for that court to do, in respect to hearing an argument on that motion, and without knowing what it would have done, if it had come to the conclusion that the order of distribution was erroneous, I am of opinion that it is not in the power of the district court to open, or set aside a final decree, regularly entered at a former term of the court, and thereby confer a new right of appeal upon a party, or revive a right lost by lapse of time. The power of a court of admiralty over its final decrees, except in the cases provided for in the fortieth rule, made by the supreme court to regulate the practice in admiralty, is somewhat unsettled. It has been very little discussed in England, and until the decision of Doctor Lushington in The Monarch, 1 W. Rob. Adm. 21, it cannot be said that any thing respecting it, was determined, though the subject had been before the court of admiralty in the Vrouw Hermina, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 163, and before the court of appeals in The Elizabeth, 2 Act. 57. See, also, The Herstelder, 1 C. Rob. Adm. 119, note; The Fortuna, 4 C. Rob. Adm. 278; The Flora, 1 Hagg. Adm. 298, 304. It was discussed by Mr. Justice Story in The New England [Case No. 10,151]. In the case of The Monarch, Dr. Lushington held, that the high court of admiralty had the same power to vary its decrees, before they were enrolled, that were possessed by other courts of equity. So far as I am aware, no court, either of law or equity, has exercised a summary control over its judgments, or decrees, after their enrolment, and after the expiration of the term at which they were entered. In our practice, decrees in the admiralty, as well as in equity, being matters of record, are deemed to be enrolled, as of the term of the court at which they are finally passed. The New England [supra]; Dexter v. Arnold [Case No. 3,856]; Whiting v. Bank of U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 6, 13. And after a final decree has been drawn up and entered, and the court has adjourned without day, no further control can be exercised by the district court over it, save by force of the fortieth rule, already mentioned, or by a libel of review, respecting which I give no opinion.

In the case of The New England, Mr. Justice Story speaking of such a case, says: "There could be no appeal; and the mode of redress must have been, if any, by a libel of review," which he proceeds to consider. In Washington Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 424, the supreme court disclaimed all power to change its decrees after the expiration of the term at which they are entered. And in Bank of U. S. v. Moss, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 31, it was held, that the circuit courts could not set aside a judgment of a former term on motion, even for want of jurisdiction. A district court, sitting in admiralty, is within the same rule.

My judgment is, that the claim of an appeal was rightly disallowed by the district court; that this court has no jurisdiction over the case, and can pronounce no opinion on the merits.

Case No. 15,215.

UNITED STATES v. GLEASON.

[1 Woolw. 75.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. May Term, 1864.

FEDERAL JURISDICTION — KILLING OF ENROLLING OFFICER—DISCHARGE OF DUTIES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—INDICTMENT—ANIMUS.

1. If an officer, while engaged in the proper discharge of his official duties, have occasion to deal with a man who, under the influence either of a general feeling of hostility to the law, or of a violent temper, which is roused by no fault of the officer, or of a spirit of revenge, makes an assault which results in the death of the officer, a purpose in his mind to obstruct the execution of the law, is not necessary to constitute the offence a crime under the act.

[Cited in Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 279.]

2. But, on the other hand, if the officer should be employed in the discharge of such of his duties as did not bring him in collision with others, as when going through the country serving notices of a draft, and should become involved in a quarrel upon some matter having no connection with his official duties, but growing out of some personal difficulty of his own, and should be assaulted and killed, the author of the homicide would not be amenable to this act.

3. The object of this law was to prevent obstruction to its execution.

4. If it seek to draw to the federal jurisdiction offences against the person of a federal officer, simply on the ground that he is such officer, the act may be unconstitutional.

5. As it must be shown in proof that the animus of the assault was roused by the officer's discharge of his duties, the indictment must contain an averment to that effect.

This was a demurrer to an indictment.

Mr. Severe, in support of demurrer.

Mr. Baldwin, Dist. Atty., contra.

MILLER, Circuit Justice. This is an indictment for murder under the 12th section of the act of February 24, 1864 (13 Stat. 8), which provides: "That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrolment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrolment, or who shall aid or assist, or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed in making, or in aiding to make such enrolment, or employed in the performance, or in aiding in the performance, of any service in any way relating thereto, or in arresting, or aiding to arrest, any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof, in any court competent to try the offence, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of said punishments, in the discretion of the court. And in cases where such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be deemed guilty of murder, and upon conviction thereof, upon indictment in the circuit court of the United States for the district within which the offence was committed, shall be punished with death. And nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability, under proper indictment or process, for any crime against the laws of a state, committed by him while violating the provisions of this section." The indictment alleges, that the persons killed were enrolling officers, and were, at the time of the commission of the offence, employed or engaged in and about the duties of said enrolment; that while so engaged they were assaulted by the defendant, and wounded; and that the wounds so received resulted in death. To this indictment there is a demurrer. Among many other grounds alleged therefor, it is insisted that it is a fatal objection to the indictment, that it contains no allegation that the assault was made with the intent to hinder, delay, obstruct, or oppose in any manner, the execution of the duties in which the officers were engaged.

We are not prepared to hold that such intent is in all cases essential to an offence under this statute. If an officer, while engaged in the proper discharge of his official duties, have occasion to deal with a man who, under the influence of a general feeling of hostility to the law, or of a violent temper, which is roused by no fault of the officer, or of a spirit of revenge, makes an assault which results in the death of the officer, a purpose in his mind to obstruct the execution of the law, is not necessary, to constitute the offence a crime under the act. But, on the other hand, if the officer should be employed in the discharge of such of his duties as did not bring him in collision with others, as when going through the country serving notices of a draft, and should become involved in a quarrel upon some matter having no connection with his official duties, but growing out of some personal difficulty of his own, and should be assaulted and killed, the author of the homicide would not be amenable to this act. Offences against persons exercising these offices, and discharging the duties thereby imposed, must be punished; but if the offences are committed against them, not as officers, but in personal difficulties totally disconnected with their official duties, in which they may be right or wrong, and in which they may give or receive injuries, the guilt or innocence of the parties with whom they come in conflict must be otherwise determined than by the act before us. The object of that act was to prevent obstructions to the enforcement of the enrolment law, and to protect officers engaged in that enforcement from violence growing out of and connected with the performance of their duty. It was not intended to draw to the jurisdiction of the federal courts all offences of which such officers might be the objects. Indeed, it may be doubted whether congress has the constitutional power thus to withdraw from the jurisdiction of the state tribunals the cognizance of such offences, solely upon the ground that the party injured is an officer of the federal government, and at the time was employed in a general way in discharging the functions of his office. The true principle seems to be, that it must appear that the animus of the assault grew out of, or had some relation to, the discharge by the officer of his official duties. And if this is necessary to appear in proof, it is equally necessary that some averment of it should be made in the indictment. Nothing of the kind is found here. It is perfectly consistent with all that is alleged in the indictment, and perhaps a fair inference from it, that while the deceased was an enrolling officer, and engaged as such in the discharge of the regular duties of his office, the assault which resulted in his death had no connection whatever with those duties.

The demurrer is therefore sustained.

At the request of the district attorney, the prisoner was retained in custody, to await the action of the grand jury, then in session, which found a new bill. [See Case No. 15,216.]

Case No. 15,216

UNITED STATES v. GLEASON.

[1 Woolw. 128.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Iowa. Oct. Term, 1867.

FEDERAL OFFICERS—DISCHARGE OF DUTY—ARREST OF DESERTERS—INDICTMENT FOR MURDER—CASUAL RENCOUNTER—DYING STATEMENTS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. Parties employed by proper officers to arrest deserters, when, having come into a vicinage on such service, they are returning therefrom to another place, to obtain assistance to effectually discharge their duty, are employed in arresting deserters within the meaning of the act of 24th February, 1864.

[Cited in Re Neagle, 135 U. S. 57, 10 Sup. Ct. 665.]

2. It is not necessary that such parties be, at the time, in the immediate act of making an arrest.

[Cited in Re Neagle, 135 U. S. 57, 10 Sup. Ct. 665.]

3. The purpose of the act is to protect the life of the person so engaged, and this protection continues so long as he is employed in a service necessary and proper to the discharge of his duty in that behalf.

[Cited in Re Neagle, 135 U. S. 57, 10 Sup. Ct. 665.]

4. Parties charged by proper officers with the duty of arresting persons especially named, as deserters, cannot make their obedience to their orders dependent upon any inquiry on their part, whether the persons to be arrested be, in fact, deserters or not.

5. The protection which the law affords to parties executing it, does not depend upon the legal guilt of the persons charged as deserters.

6. If a person assault parties charged with this service when they are not engaged therein, he is not amenable to the federal laws, however malicious the deed may be, and even though it result in death.

[Cited in U. S. v. Yellow Sun, Case No. 16,780; Tennessee v. Davis, 100 U. S. 279; Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S. 660, 4 Sup. Ct. 156.]

7. In order to the guilt under this act of the person making the assault, he must be moved thereto by some motive having relation to the service in which the party assaulted was engaged.

8. It is not enough that the offence was committed in a casual rencounter, which would have occurred if the person assaulted had not been engaged in that service.

9. It is not necessary that the accused should have personally made the assault. It is enough if, with the spirit above mentioned, he brought it about, or aided in bringing it about.

10. The character of the dying statements of a person who has been killed, their consistency with established facts, and all the circumstances of the dying man, are to be considered by the jury in determining the weight to which his account of the transaction is entitled.

11. If a person, knowing himself to be suspected of a crime, makes contradictory statements with reference to it, the fact has not the effect, as in the case of an ordinary witness, of neutralizing his testimony.

12. It is reasonable to assume that if such person withholds the truth, he does so because it is unfavorable to his innocence.

13. The effect of statements made by a party against his interest, cannot be avoided by contradictory statements.

14. Before finding a defendant guilty of murder, the jury should be satisfied of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

15. Such doubt is not every possible doubt, however slight, or however unfounded, such as beset some minds on all occasions.

16. It should be founded on something connected with the case, as disclosed by the testimony, which leaves in the mind a rational uncertainty as to guilt not removed by any other matter in the testimony.

This was the trial before the court and jury of the defendant upon an indictment for murder. The provost marshal of the United States army, for the district of Iowa, with headquarters at Grinnell, in that state, employed J. L. Bashore and J. M. Woodruff to arrest Samuel Bryant, Joseph Robertson, and Thomes C. M'Intire, as deserters from the service. While proceeding on this service, these officers were met by the defendant, who expressed a willingness to aid them in their employment. He went at once to the place where the alleged deserters were. On the way, he declared to all persons whom he met his hostility to the law, and to the execution of it by the officers, whom he declared his readiness to kill. A large and excited crowd collected, and the officers, being unable to secure the deserters, started on their return to headquarters to procure the force necessary to execute the law. They were followed by the accused and two other persons, were overtaken, and killed. [See Case No. 15,215.]

Mr. Browning, Dist. Atty., for the Government.

Mr. Severe, for defendant.

MILLER, Circuit Justice (charging jury). After several days of patient and careful investigation in this case, and after the able arguments of counsel for the government and for the prisoner, it becomes the duty of the court to give you a statement of the law which should govern you in deciding concerning the guilt or innocence of the accused. Section 12 of the act of congress of February 24, 1864, under which the defendant is indicted, was passed for the purpose of protecting the lives and persons of the officers and agents of the government, when engaged in the discharge of the duties by that act imposed. Experience had proved this to be a dangerous service, on account of a disposition on the part of evil-disposed persons in various parts of the country to resist the due enforcement of the law for calling out the military force of the nation. That section, so far as applicable to the case before us, enacts, that if any person shall assault, obstruct, hinder, or impede any officer or other person employed in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States, if such assaulting, obstructing, hindering, or impeding shall produce the death of such officer or other person, the offender shall be guilty of murder, and upon conviction thereof, shall be punished with death. The defendant, Michael Gleason, is charged, in various forms, in this indictment, with assaulting J. L. Bashore and J. M. Woodruff, with intent to hinder and obstruct them while they were engaged in the business of arresting Samuel Bryant, Joseph Robertson, and Thomas C. M'Intire, who were deserters from the military service of the United States; and that said assault occasioned the death of the said Woodruff and Bashore.

Upon the question whether Bashore and Woodruff were killed by a violent assault made upon them at the time and place alleged in the indictment, you can experience no difficulty.

You are next to determine whether they, or either of them, were employed in arresting, or aiding to arrest, Samuel Bryant, Joseph Robertson, and Thomas C. M'Intire, or either of them, as deserters from the military service of the United States, when this assault was made. Upon the subject of their employment, you have the records of the provost marshal's office of the district in which the transaction occurred, and their statements of the business in which they were engaged, as declared by themselves to the prisoner, and as detailed by the prisoner to various persons.

It is claimed by the counsel for the defendant, that if the parties killed had been so engaged, and had come to that neighborhood with the purpose of arresting the supposed deserters, but at the moment of the assault, had abandoned the intention of making the arrests at that time, and were returning to headquarters at Grinnell, with a view to making other arrangements for arrest at another time, they were not so engaged as to bring the case within the law. But this is not a sound construction of the statute. The court instructs you, upon that point, that if the parties killed had come into that neighborhood with intent to arrest the deserters named, and had been employed by the proper officer for that service, and were, in the further prosecution of that purpose, returning to Grinnell with a view to making other arrangements to discharge this duty, they were still employed in arresting deserters within the meaning of the statute. It is not necessary that the party killed should be engaged in the immediate act of arrest; but it is sufficient if he be employed in and about that business when assaulted. The purpose of the law is to protect the life of the person so employed, and this protection continues so long as he is engaged in a service necessary and proper to that employment.

The counsel for the defendant also asks in this connection, that the court shall instruct you that the persons whom Bashore and Woodruff were employed to arrest, must be proved clearly to have been deserters, before you can find the defendant guilty. This instruction we must refuse. If those officers were ordered by their superiors to arrest persons specifically named as deserters, they were bound to use their best efforts to execute their orders. They had no right to make their obedience dependent upon any inquiry which they could make as to whether the persons to be arrested were deserters or not. The protection which the statute intended to throw around those officers does not depend upon the legal guilt of the parties charged with desertion. If it were so, the jury would be required to try two issues of guilt or innocence, depending upon totally different transactions, and involving parties not before the court. Such a construction would defeat the manifest intention of the law. We have only to suppose that congress intended that if persons who were engaged in arresting parties as deserters were killed as in the act set forth, the one committing the offence should be guilty of murder. This makes the language of the act consistent with its manifest purpose. In giving it this construction we do no violence to the language of the statute, and are fully supported by the necessity of giving effect to its spirit and meaning. It is therefore not essential to conviction to prove that, in point of law or fact, Bryant, Robertson, and M'Intire were deserters.

If you find, in investigating this branch of the subject, that Woodruff and Bashore, when they were assaulted, were not employed in arresting or aiding to arrest deserters, then, according to the principle already stated, however wicked and malicious may have been the act of homicide, the defendant must be acquitted; the laws of the federal government do not reach his case, and he is amenable only to the laws of the state of Iowa. But if you are of opinion that the parties killed were employed in arresting deserters, as charged in the indictment, according to the rules which we have stated to enable you to determine that fact, you will then inquire into the connection of the defendant with the transaction. On this subject you are instructed that, in order to find this person guilty, it is not enough that you should find that the assault was a mere casual rencounter, which would have taken place all the same, if the persons killed had not been employed in a business relating to the enrolment, or to the arrest of deserters. You must find that the assault was prompted by some motive which had relation to the service in which the deceased was engaged, and grew out of hostile feelings engendered thereby. You must also find that the accused contributed to the assault with this motive or sentiment. You must find that he, with such feelings, or with the object of obstructing or hindering persons engaged in the discharge of the duty of arresting deserters, actually and personally assaulted them, or one of them; or by some active means efficiently aided in bringing about the assault which resulted in the homicide. It is not necessary to the defendant's guilt that he should have made the assault personally. If, with the motive above mentioned, he intentionally brought about, or assisted in bringing about, the assault in which the deceased were killed, it is the same as if he had made it himself. If, on the other hand, he had no design or intention to hinder or obstruct these officers in the discharge of their duties, or if he was present by mere accident when the assault was made, and took only such part in the affair as he might reasonably do for self-defence, then he is not guilty.

The testimony which tends to develop the prisoner's connection with and relation to the transaction which resulted in the death of these officers, is largely composed of the dying declarations of Bashore, and of statements alleged to have been made by the prisoner himself. In both cases, these statements come to the jury through witnesses who profess to have heard them. With regard to them both, you are to consider the imperfection of human memory, and the lapse of time since the conversations occurred which are detailed; and you are also, in reference to any discrepancies in the detail of these conversations by the witnesses who heard them, to remember how seldom it is that every person present hears or remembers all that is said, or receives precisely the same impression from hearing the same conversation. Bashore seems to have been fully aware of his approaching dissolution, and to have made his statements with a full sense of the awful responsibility of his situation. It is true that the absence of cross-examination leaves out an important agent in ascertaining all the truth, but it is equally true that in his situation there seems to be nothing to detract from the probability that he desired to tell nothing but the truth. The clearness or obscurity of his statements, their consistency with each other, and with other facts proved in the case; the condition of his mind for accurate observation and for correct recital of the things observed; and as well, also, the fact that he is the only person, except the defendant, whose story of the immediate occurrences at the time of the homicide is known to us,—are all to be considered by you in determining the degree of credit to which his testimony is entitled. Of the importance of these statements there can be no doubt. The weight to be given them, in your estimation of the whole case, is for you, and not for the court, to determine. The accounts of these transactions, given by the prisoner at various times, differ from each other, and are, in some important particulars, contradictory; and the statements of what he did say are not always identical when detailed by different witnesses who profess to have heard them. Considering the lapse of time, and the exciting nature of the occasion, it is not remarkable that the witnesses should vary somewhat in their recollection of what was said. The defendant, however, was aware that he was suspected of the murder, and was under no obligation to make any statement about the matter. The fact that he voluntarily made contradictory statements, cannot, as in the case of an ordinary witness, have the effect merely of neutralizing his testimony, as is contended by his counsel. On the contrary, the jury must be left to draw such inference from it as, in view of all the circumstances, may seem just. It is reasonable to assume that if he withheld the truth, he did so because it might not be favorable to his innocence. It is also to be considered that when a party has voluntarily made statements against his own interest, which are always entitled to great weight, he cannot, by subsequently contradicting them, or by varying his account of the transaction, destroy the effect of such admissions. Nevertheless, the general looseness, inaccuracy, or contradictory character of the defendant's accounts of the transaction, may be taken by the jury for what they may be worth, as affecting the credence to be given to any part of his story.

Before you find the defendant guilty, you should be convinced of his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. But it is not every possible doubt, however slight or however founded, which should prevent a verdict of guilty. The doubt, to have that effect, must be a reasonable one; that is, it must be founded on something growing out of the state of the testimony, which leaves a rational uncertainty as to his guilt, and which nothing else in the case removes. The degree of conviction in the minds of the jury of the guilt of the prisoner, should be something more than a bare preponderance of belief; something more than the probability of guilt merely outweighing the probability of innocence. The mind should be able to rest reasonably satisfied of the guilt of the accused before a verdict of that character is given. On the other hand, mere possibilities of innocence, the doubts, however unreasonable, which beset some minds on all occasions, should not prevent such a verdict. If the whole testimony in the case produces in your minds this degree of conviction of the guilt of the prisoner, it is your duty to say so by your verdict. If it does not, it is your duty to say "Not guilty."

The jury retired, and after an absence of about one hour, returned with a verdict of "Guilty." At the request of the defendant's counsel, the jury were then polled, and each juror answered the usual question affirmatively. The convict was remanded to prison. Thereafter, being called to receive his sentence, he spoke for some minutes, professing to detail his connection with the death of Bashore and Woodruff, and declaring his innocence in the premises. Judge MILLER then pronounced sentence, as follows:

"Michael Gleason, you are charged at this bar, and before the country, with the crime of murder. A jury of honest and faithful men, after a full and fair investigation of your case, have said that you are guilty. You have had three years to prepare for this trial, and to secure, at the expense of the government, all the testimony which you could find in your behalf. You have had the aid of able, experienced, faithful, energetic counsel, who have done all that could be done in your defence. You have had a fair, an impartial, and conscientious trial. I have myself no doubt of your moral and legal guilt; and I feel authorized to say that the judgment of my associate, who has been with me through the trial of the case, concurs with mine. You met these two men, who confided to you their purpose to arrest deserters. You went immediately to a place in the neighborhood, where these deserters were, with a large crowd of other persons, many of whom were doubtless known to you as sympathizing with them. On your way you published to every person you saw, the presence of these officers in the neighborhood, and the object of their visit. You declared on each occasion your hostility to their purpose, and your readiness to join in resisting, even to death, although you had professed to them that you would assist them. When you reached the crowd, you proclaimed aloud in the hearing of all, the presence of these men, and the object of their visit; and declared that you would be one of three men to take or kill them.

Very shortly after this, you and two men of desperate character left the crowd, going in the same direction, and about the same time. You were next seen lying beside one of your victims, with your gun broken over his head; your pistol on the ground freshly discharged; and your other victim dead a few rods off. You were one of the three who killed those men, as you said you would be; and you killed them without any cause of offence against them personally. Your only motive was hostility to the law which they were charged to enforce. You are not a native of this country, but, as your counsel have stated, you had taken an oath that you were favorable to its government. You came from a country where men in your station in life complain, perhaps justly, that they are oppressed by laws which they have no voice in making. You have come to a country where your vote at the ballot-box is as potential in making or modifying the laws, as that of the judge who now addresses you. Not content with this peaceable mode of changing a law which you did not like, you permitted your hostility to it to incite you to murder the persons charged with its enforcement. Your present condition is a striking admonition that this cannot be permitted in a free country any more than in a despotism. The penalty which the law attaches to your offence is one which my private judgment does not approve; for I do not believe that capital punishment is the best means to enforce the observance of the laws, or that, in the present state of society, it is necessary for its protection. But I have no more right, for that reason, to refuse to obey the law, than you had to resist it. I therefore do pronounce upon you its sentence: That you be committed to the custody of the marshal of this district, by whom you shall be held in close imprisonment until the 27th day of December next; and that on that day you be hanged by the neck until you are dead; and may God, the wise Governor of the universe, who is equally the Father of the judge who pronounces this sentence, and the criminal to whom it is addressed, have mercy on you.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—ACTION ON BOND—FAILURE TO COLLECT.

In an action on the official bond of a collector of internal revenue, where the breach alleged was his failure to account for or pay over the sum of $64,000, it was held that dereliction of duty in not collecting said sum could not be shown in order to establish the breach.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William B. Woods, Circuit Judge, and here reprinted by permission.]

At chambers.

This cause was heard upon a motion for new trial, the ground for which sufficiently appears in the opinion of the court.

Geo. Flournoy, T. N. Waul, and J. Z. H. Scott, for the motion.

D. J. Baldwin, U. S. Atty., contra.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. This is an action of debt on the official bond of Frank W. Glenn, as collector of internal revenue for this district. The breaches assigned are, that Glenn did not faithfully perform his duties as collector, but received as such the sum of $64,000, which he never accounted for or paid to the United States. To the declaration was attached a copy of the bond, and a particular statement of Glenn's accounts at the treasury department, showing the balance claimed against him. But it was not pretended, on the trial, that he had actually collected all the items contained on the debit side of the account, but that, under the 34th section of the act of 1864 (13 Stat. 223), he had been charged with the whole amount of the assessor's list of taxes returned to him, together with the amount of unpaid taxes turned over to him by his predecessor, and it was contended that if he had not collected them, it was dereliction of duty on his part unless he showed a sufficient excuse.

We are of opinion that, under the breach set forth in the declaration, dereliction of duty in not making collections cannot be set up at the trial. It is not the same thing as collecting and failing to pay over. At common law, it is true, any failure of duty, to any amount, involved the forfeiture of the bond and the payment of the penalty. And considerable sums were shown to have been collected by Glenn. This evidence was competent, and would have been sufficient, under the rules of the common law which once prevailed, to make him liable for the whole amount. But the courts have long since adopted a more just rule, and give judgment only for the amount actually due. And, as a very large amount was embraced in the verdict which did not consist of moneys collected and unpaid, we think that the verdict must be set aside, but with leave to the district attorney to amend the declaration. Ordered accordingly.

Indictment for perjury, upon the insolvent's oath that he would "deliver up, convey, and transfer all his property," &c., but he did not deliver up a promissory note which he had obtained after having made oath to his schedule, and before his oath made before the judge.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, absent), at the request of Mr. Wallach and Mr. Dandridge, for the defendant, instructed the jury that a promissory oath could not be the subject of a prosecution for perjury.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—MARSHAL'S BOND.

The statute of limitations of six years (Rev. St. § 786) does not apply to suits brought on marshals' bonds by the United States.

This was a suit upon the official bond of Cade M. Godbold, late marshal of the United States, and William F. Cleveland, one of his sureties. The bond was executed June 3, 1854. The defendants interposed the plea of the statute of limitations of six years (Rev. St. § 786) to which plea the plaintiff demurred.

E. S. Daryan and Wm. Boyles, for defendants, cited Green v. U. S., 9 Wall. [76 U. S.] 655; U. S. v. Herron, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 251; Story, Const. bk. 3, p. 593; U. S. v. Union Pac. R. Co., 91 U. S. 72.

George M. Duskin, U. S. Atty., cited Dox v. P. M. General, 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 318; Smith v. U. S., 5 Pet. [30 U. S.] 292; U. S. v. Knight, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 301; Savings Bank v. U. S., 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 227; U. S. v. Herron, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 251; [U. S. v. Rand, (Case No. 16,116)].[2]

BRUCE, District Judge. This is an action brought upon the official bond of a United States marshal. A breach of the bond is alleged to have taken place. Among other pleas is the statute of limitations of six years, which is found in section 786 of the Revised Statutes, and in these words: "No suit on a marshal's bond shall be maintained, unless it is commenced within six years after the right of action accrues, saving, nevertheless, the rights of infants, married women and insane persons, so that they sue within three years after their disabilities are removed."

The question is, do suits instituted by the United States come within the influence of this section. The language is broad, and does not in terms except suits brought by the United States, and we must give the words their meaning, unless there is some principle upon which we can exclude the United States from the operation of the words, and from which we can justly conclude that congress, in enacting this section, did not intend to include suits by the United States, and did not include them in the broad language of the section. The district attorney invokes the maxim, "Nullum tempus occurrit regi," which is that time does not run against the sovereign power.

In the case of U. S. v. Herron, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 251, the principle is thus stated: "That the sovereign authority of the country is not bound by the words of a statute, unless named therein, if the statute tends to restrain or diminish the power, rights or interests of the sovereign." Now, the United States is not named in this statute, and under the rule of construction just stated, we must conclude that the United States is not bound by it, and that the congress, acting in view of this rule of construction, did not intend, in the use of the language, to include the government of the United States. But it is contended that the congress, in the enactment of the statute, had exceptions in view, and named the exceptions, to wit: infants, married women and insane persons, who might sue in three years after their disabilities were removed, and that, therefore, if congress had intended to except the government of the United States, it would have named it among the exceptions. It is true that enumeration is exclusion, because, when exceptions to a general rule are enumerated, it is a fair inference that no other exceptions are intended. It is to be observed, however, that the section of the Revised Statutes in question, together with the sections preceding it, are taken almost verbatim from an act relating to marshals' bonds, of April 10, 1806 (2 Stat. 374). It will be seen by an examination of this act, that its purpose was to afford persons who might be injured by a breach of the condition of a marshal's bond, a remedy by suit upon the bond. The second section of the act, which is carried into the Revised Statutes as section 784, gives the right to any person injured to institute and maintain a suit in his own name, and for his sole use, upon the bond; and section three, which is section 785 of the Revised Statutes, provides for repeated actions until the whole penalty is recovered; and then follows section four, which is section 786 of the Revised Statutes, now under consideration.

This review of the act of 1806, the provisions of which we find in the Revised Statutes as stated, shows the purpose of the act to have been to give a remedy in their own names to persons who might sustain injury by reason of the breach by the marshal of the conditions of his bond, and to limit the time within which the remedies might be pursued. The statute nowhere refers to suits by the United States, and section four must be held to refer to the same subject matter to which the other sections refer, to wit, the remedies by suit of injured persons upon the marshal's bond, and could not, therefore, have been intended by congress to impose any limitation upon the rights or remedies of the United States. The demurrer is sustained.

UNITED STATES v. GODDARD.

CRIMINAL PRACTICE—MULTIPLYING INDICTMENTS.

Nine cows, belonging to divers persons, were stolen by the defendant from the commons, in or about the city of Washington, and the grand jury found nine separate indictments. Six were averred to be on the same day. The court refused to quash any of them.

The grand jury found nine indictments against the defendant [Joseph Goddard] for stealing nine cows belonging to nine different persons. Six of them were charged to have been stolen on the same day, the 14th of October, 1833.

Mr. Z. C. Lee, for defendant, moved the court to quash the six indictments in which the thefts were charged to have been committed on the same day, insisting that the six indictments were all for one and the same offence; and cited 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 254. The defendant may be punished six times as much as if the whole were included in one indictment, and the United States will be charged $90 for attorney's fees in nine cases, when, in truth, there was but one theft, and one attorney's fee of $10 only should be charged.

Mr. Key, Dist. Atty., contra. It does not appear that it was only one theft because charged on the same day. If all had been charged in one indictment, the defendant might have objected; but he cannot object to their being separately charged.

Mr. Hall, for defendant, in reply. It is an application to the discretion of the court. If the attorney might have joined them in one indictment, they ought to be so joined.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra) refused to quash any of the indictments, because it did not appear to them that the cows were all stolen at the same time and place. It is true that they were all averred to have been stolen in this county, and six of them on the 14th of October, 1833; but as the day was immaterial, and perhaps could not be exactly ascertained in evidence, and it was competent for the United States to prove that they were stolen on different days, and, if so, were separate acts of stealing, and separate offences, the court could not say they were not, and would do wrong to quash them, especially as the cows belonged to divers persons. If they had all been contained in one indictment, the defendant might have objected to it, and perhaps have obliged the attorney of the United States to make his election as to which theft he would prosecute; and, if they had been charged in separate counts, as they should if they were separate offences, the punishment might be exactly the same as if they had been charged in separate indictments; for each offence must have its separate punishment, and the only difference would be in the costs. If one only of the six should be retained for trial, who should say which it should be? and perhaps the one selected might be the only one which the United States could not support. See U. S. v. Beerman [Case No. 14,560], March term, 1838.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 153.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1818.

LARCENY OF SLAVE — INDICTMENT — AVERMENTS.

An indictment will not lie, at common law, for stealing "a mulatto boy, called William Foote, of the price of 500 dollars, of the property, goods, and chattels of one F. T.," if he is not averred to be a slave.

Indictment at common law [against James Godley] for stealing a "mulatto boy, named William Foote, of the price of 500 dollars, of the goods and chattels of one Fanny Thomas."

Mr. Swann and Mr. Taylor, for the prisoner, moved the court to quash the indictment, and contended that it was no offence at common law to steal a slave, because slavery was not known at common law. It is made an offence, by the Virginia statute, in one case only, namely: when stolen from the possession of the owner or his overseer; and the courts of that state have decided that the possession of a person to whom the slave was hired, is not the possession of the owner or overseer. Com. v. Williams (in 1792) 1 Va. Cas. 15; Com. v. Hays (in 1798) 1 Va. Cas. 122. Those courts have also decided that an indictment at common law for stealing a slave cannot be supported.

N. Herbert and Mr. Mason, contra. Slaves in Virginia are goods and chattels, and it is felony at common law to steal goods and chattels, therefore in Virginia, it is felony at common law to steal a slave. Judge Lyon's opinion, 2 Wash. [Va.] 7. The Virginia statute is cumulative. The decision of the courts of that state are not conclusive upon this court. State v. Hall, 2 Hayw. N. C. 105.

THE COURT (nem. con.) quashed the indictment, because it did not aver the boy to be a slave.

Mr. Herbert, then moved that the prisoner should be recognized to appear at the next term to answer to a new indictment.

But THE COURT (nem. con.) refused; being of opinion that the decisions of the courts of Virginia, that an indictment at common law, for stealing a slave, cannot be supported, are conclusive upon this court.

UNITED STATES v. GOLDBACK.

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. April 6, 1877.

INTERNAL REVENUE—INFORMATION FOR VIOLATION OF SECTION 3430, REV. ST. U. S.

A parcel or package (in the sense of the clause of section 3437 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to lucifer matches) is a bundle put up in form and condition for handling or transportation, or delivery on sale from hand to hand; and, therefore, a match-box of capacity to hold less than one hundred matches, which contains two sliding drawers which are open on the top when drawn out, is but one package or parcel, inasmuch as each drawer is not of itself a parcel or package in the mercantile sense.

The defendant [Abraham Goldback] is a manufacturer of lucifer matches. As a novelty in his line of business, instead of putting up his matches in a box of one compartment, he provides two sliding drawers in each box, the drawers being open on top when drawn out, each holding about forty-two matches, and not large enough to hold by possibility as much as, or more than, fifty; the package holding from eighty to ninety matches. It is not pretended that there is any design on the part of the manufacturer to defraud the revenue. The information is in the nature of a friendly proceeding filed at the instance of the defendant, who wants the question of law tested and decided. Issues of fact as well as law are submitted to the court. Plea of not guilty.

L. L. Lewis, for the United States.

H. H. Marshall, for defendant.

HUGHES, District Judge. Section 3437 provides that friction matches, "in parcels or packages containing one hundred matches or less," shall be stamped with a one cent stamp on "each parcel or package." The device of this manufacturer is a package but little if any greater in size than the ordinary match-box; and it is so contrived that one-half of its contents may be used without disturbance to the other half. That, and its novelty, and not any design to defraud the revenue, are all that distinguish it from the ordinary match-box.

It is contended by the United States attorney that the two open drawers in each box are to be regarded as each a parcel or package, and that therefore the box itself should be stamped with two one cent stamps. A package, in the sense of section 3437, means a bundle put up for transportation, or commercial handling. It is a thing in form to become, as such, an article of merchandize, or transportation or delivery from hand to hand. A parcel is a small package; the word "parcel" being the diminutive of the word "package." Each word as used in section 3437 denotes a thing in form suitable for transportation or handling as an article of sale. Now the drawers in this match-box are not in that form. Taken separately, they are not in condition for mercantile shipment, or handling, or sale from hand to hand. These drawers therefore are not, each, parcels or packages in the meaning of section 3437. There has, therefore, been no violation of section 3430 of the Revised Statutes of the United States upon which this information is drawn, and there must be judgment of acquittal.

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. May, 1876.

CONSPIRACY — PROOF — TIME — TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES—ACTS OF CO-CONSPIRATORS.

1. A mere agreement or combination to effect an unlawful purpose, not followed by any act done by either of the parties to carry into execution the object of the conspiracy, does not constitute the offense of conspiracy.

2. To establish the guilt of a party accused of this crime it must be proved: That the conspiracy was formed to commit the offense described in the indictment. That the accused were parties to the conspiracy. That to effect the object of the conspiracy, one or more of the parties thereto did one or more of the acts alleged.

3. An act done by only one of the parties to effect the object, binds each and all the parties to the conspiracy and completes the offense as to all; for in that case the act of one becomes the act of all.

4. It is not essential that the conspiracy be shown to have been formed at the precise time or times alleged in the indictment.

5. Circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to prove a conspiracy.

6. Testimony of accomplices, though competent, should be received and scrutinized with great caution.

7. A mere intention to form a conspiracy, or a mere solicitation to others to unite in a projected conspiracy, does not constitute the offense.

8. When the existence of the conspiracy and the connection of the defendant therewith is established by independent evidence, he is bound by the acts and declarations of his co-conspirators.

9. The law of conspiracy fully discussed.

Indictment for conspiracy.

N. S. Murphey and G. B. Goodwin, for defendants.

DYER, District Judge (charging jury). Gentlemen:—It is charged in the first count of the indictment, that on the 24th day of July, 1875, the defendants, Philip Goldberg, Julius Jonas and A. M. Crosby, conspired together to wilfully take and carry away, with intent to steal and destroy, certain papers, documents and records known as "Returns of Gaugers of Spirits," form 59, and as "Rectifier's Notice of Intention to Rectify," form 122, and other papers and documents then filed and deposited with John M. Hedrick, a supervisor of internal revenue of the United States.

As acts to effect the object of this alleged conspiracy it is charged in this count, that on the 25th of July, 1875, the defendants Philip Goldberg and Julius Jonas, at Milwaukee, asked and demanded from Leopold Wirth, Henry Schanfield, Louis Rindskopf, William Bergenthal, Samuel Rindskopf, and Robert Kiewert, $50,000 with which to hire and induce certain persons to steal, take and carry away the said papers, documents and records; and that on the 26th of July, 1875, the defendants Philip Goldberg and Julius Jonas, at Milwaukee, did meet, consult and confer together, and with Leopold Wirth, Louis Rindskopf, William Bergenthal, and other persons, to devise plans and means to steal, take and destroy said papers, documents and records, and traveled from Milwaukee to Chicago, and on the 29th of July, 1875, returned from Chicago to Milwaukee, and on that day at Milwaukee consulted and conferred with Samuel Rindskopf as to the means to be adopted to take and carry away from the possession of John M. Hedrick said papers, documents and records.

The second count charges a conspiracy formed July 28, 1875, to wilfully take and carry away, with intent to steal and destroy, certain papers, documents and records in form required by regulations prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, and filed and deposited in the office of the collector of internal revenue for this district, which papers and documents were known as "Rectifier's Notice of Intention to Rectify," designated as form 122, a large number of which were given and made to the collector by Aaron Schœnfeld, as a rectifier, and a large number of which were given and made by Samuel, Elias, Jacob and Max Rindskopf, as rectifiers of distilled spirits to the collector.

As overt acts to effect the object of the alleged conspiracy it is charged in this count, that on the 28th of July, 1875, at Milwaukee, the defendants met, conferred and consulted with Samuel Rindskopf, Leopold Wirth, Henry Schanfield, William Bergenthal, and Louis Rindskopf, as to the mode and manner in which the papers, documents and records could be taken and carried away; and asked and demanded from those parties $50,000 as a reward for taking and carrying away the papers, documents and records, and proceeded to Chicago for the purpose of meeting and consulting with Louis Rindskopf, Leopold Wirth and Robert Kiewert, as to the means to be adopted; and at Chicago did meet and confer with those parties, and there devised opportunities and means to take and carry away the papers, documents and records, and on the 29th of July, 1875, proceeded from Chicago to Milwaukee for the purpose of taking and carrying the same away.

The third count charges a similar conspiracy, as formed July 28, 1875, to take and carry away with intent to steal and destroy, papers, documents and records, which were deposited with John M. Hedrick, supervisor of internal revenue, and which purported to be returns of spirits gauged by William H. Roddis in April, 1875, and in form required by regulation prescribed by the commissioner of internal revenue, and designated as form 59; also other papers, documents and records deposited with John M. Hedrick, supervisor, relating to the business of Simon Meyer, Aaron Schœnfeld, and of Samuel, Elias, Jacob and Max Rindskopf, as rectifiers, and to the business of other persons who were rectifiers in this collection district; also other papers, documents and records filed and deposited in the office of the collector of internal revenue, purporting to be returns of gaugers of spirits, designated as form 59, and filed and deposited in said office by John E. Fitzgerald, John S. Taft and William H. Roddis, as internal revenue gaugers, and other papers, documents and records deposited in the collector's office, and all of which were required by law and regulation to be there filed and deposited, and related to the business of certain persons who carried on the business of rectifiers of distilled spirits in the first collection district, in the months of March and April, 1875.

As acts to effect the object of the conspiracy, it is alleged in this count that on the 29th of July, 1875, at Milwaukee, the defendants asked and demanded from Leopold Wirth, Henry Schanfield, Louis Rindskopf, William Bergenthal, Samuel Rindskopf, and Robert Kiewert, the sum of $50,000, with which to hire and induce certain persons to steal, take and carry away said papers, documents and records.

It is also charged that on the 30th of July, 1875, the defendants at Milwaukee met, consulted and conferred together, and with Leopold Wirth, Louis Rindskopf, William Bergenthal and other persons, to devise plans and means to accomplish the object of the alleged conspiracy, and traveled from Milwaukee to Chicago and returned from Chicago to Milwaukee, and there consulted and conferred with Samuel Rindskopf, as to the means to be adopted to take and carry away the said papers, documents and records.

This is the substance of the several counts of this indictment, and I have thus particularly called your attention to the allegations of each count, because it is important that they be borne in mind by you in considering the evidence.

By section 5403 of the statutes of the United States, it is made an offense for any person to wilfully destroy, or attempt to destroy, or, with intent to steal or destroy, to wilfully take and carry away any paper, document or record filed or deposited in any public office, or with any public officer.

Section 5440 of the statutes provides that if two or more persons conspire to commit any offense against the United States, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to certain punishment.

The charge in this indictment then is the formation of such a conspiracy as is made punishable by section 5440, namely: a conspiracy to commit an offense against the United States, which offense is that named in section 5403. The question, therefore, to be determined in this case is, was the alleged conspiracy formed by any two of the defendants to wilfully take and carry away, with intent to steal or destroy, the papers, documents and records mentioned in the indictment, or any of them; and if such conspiracy was formed, did any or either of the parties thereto, to effect the object of the conspiracy, do either or any of such of the acts charged in the indictment as constitute acts to carry into effect such object?

This indictment is against three defendants. The present trial, however, does not, and your verdict will not, include the defendant Crosby. The defendants Philip Goldberg and Julius Jonas only are now upon trial. As I have stated, the charge is one of conspiracy; that the defendants conspired to commit a certain offense against the United States. The questions, therefore, requiring your attention, to state them more explicitly, and in proper order, are these:

1. Was there such a conspiracy as is alleged in any or either of these three counts, and if there was, were the defendants Goldberg and Jonas, or either of them connected with the conspiracy?

2. If such a conspiracy was formed and existed, were any or either of such of the acts charged in the indictment as constitute acts to carry into effect the object of the conspiracy, committed as alleged?

I direct your attention, first, to what is essential to constitute a conspiracy. A conspiracy is formed when two or more persons agree together to do an unlawful act—in other words, when they combine to accomplish, by their united action, a criminal or unlawful purpose; and the statutory offense is consummated when such agreement is made, or such combination is entered into, and one or more of the parties does any act to effect the object of such conspiracy. If two or more persons agree together that they will commit a certain offense against the United States, as that they will enter a public office of the United States, and take and carry away papers and records there deposited, with intent to steal or destroy them, and one or more of the persons so agreeing does any act to effect the object of such agreement, they are guilty of the offense of conspiracy.

It is not necessary, to constitute a conspiracy, that two or more persons should meet together, and enter into an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme, or that they should directly by words or in writing, state what the unlawful scheme is to be, and the details of the plan or means by which the unlawful combination is to be made effective. It is sufficient if two or more persons, in any manner or through any contrivance, positively or tacitly, come to a mutual understanding to accomplish a common and unlawful design. U. S. v. Babcock [Case No. 14,487].

Of course, a mere discussion between parties about entering into a conspiracy, or as to the means to be adopted for the performance of an unlawful act, does not constitute a conspiracy, unless the scheme or some proposed scheme is in fact assented to—concurred in by the parties in some manner, so that their minds meet for the accomplishment of the proposed unlawful act.

As I shall have occasion hereafter more fully to state to you, a mere agreement or combination to effect an unlawful purpose, not followed by any act done by either of the parties to carry into execution the object of the conspiracy, does not constitute the offense. There must be both the corrupt agreement or combination, and an act or acts done by one or more of the parties to effect the illegal object or design agreed upon, to make the punishable offense under the statute. Where there is an attempted attainment of an unlawful end by two or more persons, who are actuated by a common design of accomplishing that end, and who in any way, and from any motive, or upon any consideration, work together in furtherance of the unlawful scheme, each one of the persons becomes a member of the conspiracy.

To establish the guilt of the defendants on trial you must be convinced upon the testimony, that a conspiracy was formed, as alleged, to commit the offense against the United States, which is particularly described in the indictment; that these defendants, Goldberg and Jonas, were parties to that conspiracy, if any; and that to effect the object of such conspiracy, one or more of the parties thereto did one or more of such of the acts alleged in the indictment as constitute an act or acts to effect the object.

It is not essential that the alleged conspiracy be shown to have been formed at the precise time or times stated in the several counts of this indictment. It is sufficient, so far as time is concerned, if it be shown that at about the time or times charged, there was a conspiracy between any two or more of the persons who are alleged to have conspired together to wilfully take and carry away, with intent to steal or destroy, any of the papers, documents or records mentioned in the indictment.

To establish a conspiracy, it is not, as I have already said, necessary that there should be "an explicit or formal agreement for an unlawful scheme" between the parties, nor is it essential that direct proof be made of an express agreement to do the act forbidden by the law. It is as competent to prove an alleged conspiracy by circumstances as by direct evidence.

In prosecutions for criminal conspiracies, the proof of the combination charged must almost always be extracted from the circumstances connected with the transaction, which forms the subject of the accusation. Whart. Cr. Law, § 235.

The understanding, combination or agreement between the parties in the given case, to effect the unlawful purpose charged, must be proved, because without the corrupt agreement or understanding, there is no conspiracy, but, as I have just said, circumstantial evidence may be resorted to, to show the agreement or conspiracy. The acts of parties in the particular case, the nature of those acts, their declarations and statements, whether verbal or in writing, and the character of the transactions or series of transactions with the accompanying circumstances, as the evidence may disclose them, should be investigated and considered, as sources from which evidence may be derived of the existence or non-existence of an agreement which may be express or implied to do the alleged unlawful act. The government here affirms the formation and existence of a conspiracy to commit a particular offense against the United States, and that these defendants were parties to such conspiracy. The burden is therefore upon the government to prove what it thus affirms by legal and competent evidence, in order to ask a verdict in its favor.

Now I have said to you, that to constitute the offense which is made punishable by the statute, there must be not only the conspiring together by the parties, but the formation of the conspiracy must be followed by an act done by one or more of the parties to the conspiracy to effect its object. At common law it was an offense for two or more persons to merely confederate and combine together by concerted means to do that which is unlawful or criminal. But in settling the criminal liability of these parties, we have to be governed by the statute; and as, in order to convict, the statutory offense must be proved, it is not sufficient to show merely that a conspiracy was formed. Persons may conspire together to commit an offense against the United States; the conspiring together may be complete, yet if the proceeding stops with the mere agreement, and no act is done to carry into effect the object of the agreement or conspiracy, no criminal offense has been committed. Acts and deeds are the subject of human laws, not mere thoughts and intents unless accompanied by acts, and the theory of the law is, that when persons merely form a conspiracy and there pause in their proceeding, and do no act to effect its object, they are to be regarded as having repented of the act of conspiring, and are not to be punished for that alone. But the moment any act is done to effect the object of a conspiracy, that moment criminal liability is fixed; and this act to effect the object, though it be done by only one of the parties, binds each and all the parties to the conspiracy and completes the offense as to all, for in that case the act of one becomes the act of both or all. So, gentlemen, if you should find that the defendants conspired together as charged in the indictment, to wilfully take and carry away these papers, records and documents with intent to steal or destroy the same, you will then inquire whether the defendants or either of them, did any or either of such of the acts charged in the indictment as constitute acts to effect the object of the conspiracy.

The act must be one, you will observe, to effect the object of the conspiracy. That must be the character of the act. It must not be an act which is part of the conspiracy —it must not be one of a series of acts constituting the agreement or conspiring together, but it must be a subsequent, independent act following a completed conspiracy, and done to carry into effect the object of the original combination. To illustrate, two persons conspire to take the life of another. It is agreed that it shall be done. The conspiracy is complete, but there is yet wanting the act to effect the object of the conspiracy. One of the parties purchases or procures the weapon with which to do the deed; there you have an act to effect the object, and the punishable offense is fully committed. So if the parties subsequent to the formation of a complete conspiracy, following it up and as independent acts, hold consultations between themselves and others as to the means to be employed to carry the conspiracy into effect, or go from place to place and confer about and arrange as to the particular means or instrumentalities that shall be used or employed to effect the object of the conspiracy, these constitute acts to effect such object.

Now, if there was this alleged conspiracy, there must be proved such acts to effect its object as are alleged. Some one or more of the overt acts charged in the indictment must be proven, in order to sustain a conviction, and the acts as proven, if any, must be acts to effect the object of the conspiracy. There are three general classes of overt acts charged:

1. Demands of money with which to hire and induce certain persons to take, carry away and steal the papers and records in question, and as a reward for taking and carrying the same away

2. Journeys from Chicago to Milwaukee and from Milwaukee to Chicago for the purpose of holding conferences and consultations with parties named in the indictment, to devise means and opportunities to take and carry away the papers, records, etc.; and in the second count, there is an allegation of a journey from Chicago to Milwaukee for the purpose of taking and carrying away the papers.

3. Consultations and conferences with the persons named in the indictment as to the mode and manner in which and to devise means and opportunities by which the papers, documents and records could be taken and carried away.

The simple question upon this branch of the case is, were any or either of these acts done, by any or either of the defendants, and if so, were they acts independent of and to carry into effect a completed conspiracy formed by the defendants to take and carry away with intent to steal or destroy the papers, documents and records in question? Upon all the evidence and upon all the circumstances as disclosed to you, you are to determine the question.

I have stated to you, gentlemen, the general rules and principles upon the subject of conspiracy and overt acts, applicable to this case. There are some more particular considerations, to which I now direct your attention.

The offense charged, is a conspiracy to take and carry away with intent to steal or destroy the papers, records and documents mentioned. It is this conspiracy, therefore, that it is incumbent upon the prosecution to prove. Proof of a combination for any other purpose is not sufficient. Proof of a scheme to obtain by consent of a public officer having them in his custody, access to and inspection of the papers, documents and records, would not meet the requirements of this indictment, unless there was the purpose to take and carry away with intent to steal or destroy such papers and records.

It is claimed by the prosecution that the alleged conspiracy was formed by and between the three defendants Goldberg, Jonas and Crosby; that it was not a conspiracy between those defendants and the Milwaukee parties, but that first the conspiracy was formed between those defendants, and then, that what transpired between them or any of them and the Milwaukee parties, were acts to effect the object of a previously formed conspiracy.

It is claimed on the part of the defense that there was no such previously formed and completed conspiracy, and that what took place between the defendants and the Milwaukee parties were not acts to carry into effect any such conspiracy; that whatever was said or transpired between the defendants and the Milwaukee parties was but part and parcel of an incomplete, unperfected transaction between the defendants and persons in Milwaukee, and before completed was wholly abandoned. On this subject I charge you that if you find from the evidence that the alleged demands of money, conferences, consultations and journeys, if made and had, were part and parcel of an uncompleted transaction, combination or arrangement between the defendants and the Milwaukee parties, and were not preceded by such a perfected conspiracy between the defendants as is alleged, then such demands, conferences, consultations and journeys, if any, did not, nor did either of them have the necessary character of overt acts, and the offense charged is in that event not established. Further, if you find from the evidence that up to the time of the alleged meeting of one or more of the defendants with the Milwaukee parties, no conspiracy had been formed as alleged between the defendants, and you find that the defendants had one or more consultations with some, or any of the Milwaukee parties, wherein the project of stealing or destroying the papers and documents described in the indictment was talked over with a view to forming such conspiracy, but that the scheme was for any cause then abandoned, and no agreement, combination or understanding was made or concluded by and between the defendants or any two of them, to take and carry away said papers and documents with intent to steal or destroy the same, then and in that case no conspiracy is proven, and your verdict should be for defendants. A mere intention to form a conspiracy, or a mere solicitation to others to unite in a projected conspiracy, when as yet no conspiracy has been formed, does not meet the requirements of the law.

But if the defendants, or any two of them, formed a conspiracy to take and carry away these papers, documents and records, with intent to steal or destroy the same, and if upon the complete formation of such a conspiracy by and between themselves, either of the defendants made the journeys or demands of money, or held the consultations and conferences alleged, as acts to effect the object of a previously formed conspiracy, then the offense as charged was committed.

As the defendants on trial are indicted for conspiracy with another person named in the indictment to take and carry away the papers and records in question, with intent to steal and destroy the same, it is clear that the charge implies that they knew there was such a conspiracy, and with such knowledge became parties to the unlawful scheme, and the alleged guilty participation must be proved by the government. Guilty connection with a conspiracy may be established by showing association by the person accused, with others, in and for the purpose of the prosecution of the illegal object. Each party must be actuated by an intent to promote the common design; but each may perform separate acts or hold distinct relations in forwarding that design.

If two persons pursue by their acts the same object, one performing one act or part of an act, and the other another act or another part of the same act, so as to complete it with a view to the attainment of the object they are pursuing, the jury are at liberty to draw the conclusion that they have been engaged in a conspiracy to effect the object. 3 Archb. Cr. Prac. 622.

Co-operation in some form must be shown. There must be intentional participation in the transaction with a view to the furtherance of the common design and purpose. If parties in any manner work together to advance the unlawful scheme, having its promotion in view, and "actuated by the common purpose of accomplishing the unlawful end," they are conspirators. If a person, understanding the unlawful character of a transaction, encourages, advises, or in any manner, with a view to forwarding the enterprise or scheme, assists in its prosecution, he becomes a conspirator. Upon this subject I charge you in substance as asked by the defendants' counsel as to the defendant Jonas, that if you find from the evidence that a conspiracy was formed, as alleged, between the other defendants, but that the prosecution has failed to prove that the defendant Jonas intentionally participated in the transaction, knowing it to be such conspiracy, and with a view to the advancement of the common design, then your verdict as to him should be not guilty. As to both defendants on trial, it must be shown by the evidence (beyond reasonable doubt) that they knowingly and designedly assented to and united in the unlawful combination charged, if any such existed, in order to make them parties thereto; and the fact upon this branch of the case you must determine upon all the evidence before you.

Now I have said that in determining the question of the formation or existence of a conspiracy, the acts and declarations of the persons accused may, among other circumstances, be looked to and considered by the jury. Statements of one and in some instances of two of the defendants in the absence of the other defendant, and conversations with some of the witnesses, on the part of one or more of the defendants in the absence of the other, have been given in evidence. The individual letters and telegrams of the different defendants have also been introduced. It is proper that I should say to you that this evidence was admitted as bearing upon the question of the existence of a conspiracy and its nature, if any there was, and as shedding light upon the relation of the person so speaking to the transaction. These declarations, statements and communications were and are admissible as bearing upon the question of the existence of the alleged conspiracy, and as touching the alleged connection of the persons making the same therewith. If a conspiracy be shown to exist, the question then follows, were the defendants on trial, or either of them, connected with that conspiracy as parties thereto. To establish the connection of either of the defendants therewith, such connection must be shown, by facts or circumstances, independent of the declarations of others, or by his own acts, conduct or declarations. And until this fact is thus established, he is not to be bound by the declarations or statements of others. The principle of law and rule of evidence is that when once a conspiracy or combination is established, and a defendant's connection therewith is shown by independent evidence, then he is bound by the acts, declarations and statements of his co-conspirators, because in that event each is deemed to assent to or command what is done by any other in furtherance of the common object. 1 Whart. 702.

So in considering the testimony given as to the acts, declarations and statements of either one of the defendants when the other defendant or defendants was or were not present, you are to understand that that testimony was submitted to you for the purpose of showing in the first instance that there was a conspiracy formed and existing, and that the person or persons making the declarations, statements and communications were parties to it; that the alleged connection of any one of the defendants with the alleged conspiracy, if any existed, must be shown by facts or circumstances independent of statements of other defendants in his absence, and that when once that connection be thus shown, then he becomes affected and bound by the declarations and acts of other parties to the conspiracy, if any, made and done in the course of the prosecution of or pending the enterprise and during his connection therewith.

If you should believe from the evidence that any project was discussed or even a combination was formed by the defendants or any two of them to take and carry away with intent to steal or destroy the papers and records described in the indictment, and that such project or combination was wholly abandoned by the defendants before any act done to effect its object, then you should disregard and should not consider any statement, declaration or act of any one of the defendants as affecting either of the others made or done after such abandonment.

So, too, if you should find as a fact such abandonment under the circumstances just stated, and that thereafter Samuel Rindskopf individually employed the defendant Crosby to procure abstracts of evidence, or releases of property seized, or to do other acts as an employé for said Rindskopf or for Rindskopf Bros., and if you should find that any portion of the correspondence in evidence, between Crosby and Rindskopf, was subsequent to such abandonment, and that it related to such employment and business pertaining thereto, and that the defendants Goldberg and Jonas were not parties to and had no connection with such employment or arrangement between Crosby and Rindskopf; then that portion of such correspondence should not be considered by you as evidence against the defendants on trial.

Further, if you should find that there never was a conspiracy between the defendants to take and carry away with intent to steal or destroy the papers and records in question, but that the defendants Goldberg and Jonas understood that the acts to be accomplished by them and Crosby, were to procure abstracts of evidence in the supervisor's and collector's offices in a lawful way, and to furnish an attorney to defend the Milwaukee parties and to procure a release of goods seized by the government, or to procure a settlement or compromise with the government, and that Crosby, without the knowledge, direction or procurement of Goldberg or Jonas, said to the Milwaukee parties that he would or could get some one else to steal or destroy the papers or records, then, and in such case, the defendants Goldberg and Jonas should not be bound by such declarations of Crosby, in that regard.

If, however, the alleged conspiracy be shown and the defendants' connection therewith be established, then each party is bound by the declarations of the other made while the conspiracy is pending or is being prosecuted.

I have said that to establish a conspiracy, or the connection of a party therewith, direct proof is not indispensable, and that it may be shown by circumstances. Where the prosecution in a criminal case rely upon circumstantial evidence, that is, upon proof of the facts or circumstances which are to be used as a means of arriving at the principal fact in question, it is a rule that these facts or circumstances must be proved in order to lay the basis for the presumption which is sought to be established. Each circumstance essential to the conclusion must be proved to the same extent as if the whole issue rested upon the proof of such essential circumstance. When the facts and circumstances depended upon to establish the principal fact are thus proved, the circumstantial evidence thus produced may generally be relied upon with safety in arriving at a conclusion as to the guilt or innocence of the person accused. The burden of proof throughout is upon the prosecution to prove the guilt of the defendants. To what I have thus far stated it is proper to add, that in a case depending upon circumstantial evidence, the rule is that first "the hypothesis of delinquency or guilt of the offense charged in the indictment should flow naturally from the facts proved and be consistent with them all, and second, the evidence must be such as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis but that of his guilt of the offense imputed to him; or in other words, the facts proved must all be consistent with and point to guilt only, and must be inconsistent with innocence." People v. Bennett, 49 N. Y. 137.

Witnesses have been called in the course of the trial who testify to their own participation in fraudulent and criminal practices, and some of whom are under indictment for such practices in this court, and have pleaded guilty to the charges presented against them. There has been much criticism of their testimony, and considerable discussion of the question as to the weight to which their testimony is entitled. The court instructs you upon this subject, that it is the settled rule in this country that even accomplices in the commission of crime are competent witnesses, and that the government has the right to use them as witnesses. It is the duty of the court to admit their testimony, and that of the jury to consider it.

The testimony of accomplices is, however, always to be received with caution, and weighed and scrutinized with great care by the jury, who should not rely upon it unsupported, unless it produces in their minds the most positive conviction of its truth. It is just and proper in such cases for the jury to seek for corroborating facts and circumstances in material respects. But this is not absolutely essential, provided the testimony of such witness produces in the minds of the jury full and complete conviction of its truth.

You must be convinced beyond reasonable doubt that the defendants on trial have committed the offense or offenses charged, in order to convict them. Each and every fact necessary to constitute the offense, must be so proved—that is, beyond reasonable doubt. Until guilt is proven there is an absolute presumption of innocence. The law does not permit the defendants to testify, and this presumption of innocence stands in their favor, until by competent testimony it is overthrown and guilt established beyond reasonable doubt. It is the settled rule in criminal cases, that a conviction cannot be secured upon strong suspicion or probabilities of guilt, nor, as in civil cases, upon a mere preponderance of evidence, though the weight and character of the evidence are to be passed upon by you in determining whether the charge or charges are proven beyond reasonable doubt. By reasonable doubt is meant an actual, substantial doubt that arises and rests in the mind as testimony is weighed and considered—that results after the exercise of judgment and reason when fairly and candidly applied to an investigation of the evidence.

If the evidence convinces you beyond reasonable doubt that the defendants on trial are, or that either of them is guilty as charged in the counts of this indictment, or either of them, then you should so find. If all the facts essential to constitute the offense or offenses charged are not established, and guilt is not proven beyond reasonable doubt, then the government cannot rightfully ask a conviction, and it would be your duty to acquit.

The indictment charges that the three defendants, Goldberg, Jonas and Crosby, conspired together to commit the offense named. If you find that a conspiracy was formed by any two of the defendants named in the indictment, but that one only of the defendants on trial was a party to that conspiracy, and that the other was not, you should acquit the defendant so found not to be a party to it, and should convict the other, if found guilty

Verdict, not guilty.

Case No. 15,224.

UNITED STATES v. GOLDING.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 212.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1820.

POST-OFFICE — EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL — INDICTMENT.

1. In an indictment under the 18th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1810 [2 Stat. 597], "regulating the post-office establishment," against a person employed in a department of the general post-office, charging him with embezzling letters, with which he was intrusted, and stealing therefrom sundry bank-notes, it is not necessary to aver that the letters were intended to be conveyed by post, nor to describe particularly the letters, or the bank-notes, it being averred that the particular description of the letters and of the bank-notes, was unknown to the grand jurors.

2. It is not a valid objection to the indictment, that the embezzlement of the letters, and stealing therefrom the bank-notes, are charged in the same count of the indictment.

This was an indictment under the 18th section of the act of the 30th of April, 1810 (2 Stat. 597), "regulating the post-office establishment." It consisted of a single count, and charged that Richard Golding on the 10th of July, 1819, "was employed in one of the departments of the general post-office, to wit, at the post-office established at Washington City in the county of Washington, as a messenger and sorter of letters, and in virtue of his said employment, was intrusted by the postmaster of the said post-office, with sundry and great numbers of letters and packets, sent by mail to said post-office, addressed to the postmaster-general of the United States, and containing sundry and great numbers of bank-notes," &c., "belonging to the postmaster-general, and to him remitted, and by him to have been then and there received for the use of the United States; and that the said Golding, after the 30th day of April, 1810, viz., on the 10th day of July, in the year first aforesaid, with force and arms at" &c., "so being employed as such messenger and sorter of letters as aforesaid, and so being intrusted with, and having received in virtue of his said employment, at and from the said post-office at Washington, the said letters and packets so containing the said bank-notes," &c., "to be by him sorted, and duly filed, and placed in the said office, unlawfully, wilfully, injuriously, and fraudulently did secrete, embezzle, and destroy sundry and great numbers of the said letters and packets, so being addressed and directed to the postmaster-general as aforesaid, (the particular number, dates, purport, and description of the said letters and packets to the jurors aforesaid being yet unknown,) from sundry postmasters of sundry post-offices, (to the jurors aforesaid yet unknown,) and out of the said letters, unlawfully, injuriously, wilfully, and fraudulently, then and there did steal and take sundry and great numbers of bank-notes of great value, to wit, of the value of $405, lawful money of the United States, (the particular and respective numbers, denominations, marks, and descriptions whereof, are to the jurors aforesaid, yet unknown,) belonging to the said postmaster-general, and to him remitted, and by him to have been then and there received for the use of the United States aforesaid, to the great fraud and damage of the said postmaster-general, and of the United States, to the manifest fraud, breach, and violation of the trust so reposed in him, Richard Golding, by virtue of his said employment at the said post-office, as aforesaid, to the evil example of all others in the like case offending, against the form of the statute, and act of congress, in such case provided, and against the peace and government of the United States."

Mr. Key and Mr. Redin, for defendant, moved in arrest of judgment: (1) That the offence, by the statute, is embezzling letters "intended to be sent by post," but the indictment does not charge that the embezzled letters were intended to be sent by post. (2) That two offences, viz., embezzlement of the letters, and stealing the bank-notes are charged in one count. (3) That the charge of embezzling "sundry and great numbers of the said letters and packets, and of stealing sundry and great numbers of bank-notes," is too vague and uncertain.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, contra. (1) The indictment states that the letters and packets were actually sent by mail; they must therefore have been intended to be sent by post. It is not necessary that they should not have arrived at the place of their destination. But the charge of embezzlement is only inducement. The charge is, that having embezzled the letters and packets, he therefrom stole the bank-notes. The gist of the indictment is the stealing, not the embezzling; and the clause of the statute respecting the stealing bank-notes from letters, does not require that the letters should be sent, or intended to be sent by post; it is only necessary that they have "come to his possession." (2) It is no objection that both offences are charged in one count; one of them being charged as inducement of the other. It is the common and approved form to charge the defendant with all the offences which the statute enumerates alternatively in the same clause, and to convert "or" into "and"; as in forgery the form is, that he forged, and caused to be forged, &c. (3) "Sundry letters and packets," and "sundry bank-notes," is a sufficient description, when the grand jurors say that the number and particular description thereof is yet unknown to them. It is the best description they can give; and the number and particular description, are not of the essence of the offence.

THE COURT overruled the motion in arrest of judgment, and sentenced the prisoner to six months' imprisonment; and by the 22d section of the act, it is enacted that every person who shall be imprisoned by a judgment of court, under and by virtue of the 18th, 19th, 20th, or 21st sections of the act, shall be kept at hard labor during the period of such imprisonment.

Case No. 15,225.

UNITED STATES v. GOLDMAN et al.

[3 Woods, 187.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1878.

CONSPIRACY—INDICTMENT—CONGRESSIONAL ELECTIONS—FEDERAL JURISDICTION.

1. An indictment based on section 5520, Rev. St. U. S., for conspiracy to prevent by force, etc., a citizen lawfully authorized to vote from giving his support and advocacy in a legal manner in favor of the election of a lawfully qualified person as a member of congress, need not set out the acts of advocacy and support which the conspiracy was formed to prevent.

[Cited in U. S. v. Milner, 36 Fed. 891.]

2. The jurisdiction of a court of the United States to try persons accused of conspiracy under said section, is not ousted by the fact that the indictment charges that in carrying out their design the conspirators were guilty of a crime of which the state courts had exclusive jurisdiction, even though such crime were of higher grade than the conspiracy charged.

3. Section 2 of article 1 of the constitution of the United States, confers upon the electors in each state, who have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature, the right to vote for representatives in congress, and congress has the constitutional power to protect that right.

4. Power is conferred on congress, by section 4 of article 1 of the constitution, to regulate the time, place and manner of holding elections for representatives in congress. This includes the power to protect the electors in a free interchange of views, in making a free choice, and in expressing that choice freely at the ballot-box.

5. Congress had constitutional power to enact section 5520 of the Revised Statutes.

Heard on demurrer to indictment. The indictment was based on section 5520, Rev. St., which declares: "If two or more persons in any state or territory conspire to prevent by force, intimidation or threat any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote from giving his support or advocacy in a legal manner toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector for president or vice-president of the United States, or as a member of the congress of the United States, or to injure any citizen in person or property on account of such support or advocacy, each of such persons shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment with or without hard labor not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment." The indictment consisted of three counts. The first charged that [J. Carneal] Goldman and the other defendants, on October 12, 1878, at the parish of Tensas, "did conspire together, and with others, to the grand jurors unknown, to prevent by force, intimidation and threats Fleming Branch, Daniel Canada, Willie Singleton and others, whose names are to the grand jurors unknown, from then and there giving their support and advocacy in a legal manner towards the election of one J. W. Fairfax, a lawfully qualified person, as a member of the congress of the United States from the Fifth congressional district of the state of Louisiana, they the said Fleming Branch, Daniel Canada, Willie Singleton and others aforesaid, each and every one of them then and there being citizens of the United States and of the said state of Louisiana, duly and properly registered under the laws of Louisiana and lawfully entitled to vote. That for the purpose of effecting the object of the said conspiracy by force, intimidation and threats, as aforesaid," the said Goldman and others therein named, "did on the said 12th day of October, A. D. 1878, at and in the said parish of Tensas and state of Louisiana, assault and shoot and inflict great bodily injury upon the said Fleming Branch, Daniel Canada, Willie Singleton and others, as aforesaid, and upon each and every one of them, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. The second count charged that the defendants and others did feloniously conspire, at the same time and place stated in the first count, "to prevent by force, intimidation and threats certain citizens of the United States, and of the said state of Louisiana, residing in the parish of Tensas, in said state, and in the Fifth congressional district thereof, to wit, Fleming Branch, Daniel Canada, Willie Singleton and others, whose names are to the grand jurors unknown, from giving their support and advocacy in a legal manner, to wit, by convoking and holding public meetings; by the delivery of public addresses; by the organization of political clubs and societies, and by other similar and lawful means towards and in favor of the election at a general election thereafter, to wit, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in the month of November then ensuing, to be held under the laws of the state of Louisiana, in the said parish of Tensas, and at which said election a member of the congress of the United States for the said Fifth congressional district of the state of Louisiana was to be voted for and elected, of one J. W. Fairfax, a person then and there lawfully qualified, as a member of the congress of the United States for the said Fifth congressional district of Louisiana, they, the said Fleming Branch, Daniel Canada, Willie Singleton and others aforesaid, and each and every one of them then and there being lawfully entitled to vote at the general election so then about to be held as aforesaid." The second count avers the overt acts of the defendants in carrying out said alleged conspiracy in the same words substantially as the first, and concludes "contrary to the form of the statute," etc. The third count charged that the defendants did feloniously conspire among themselves, and each with the other, to injure Fleming Branch, Daniel Canada, Willie Singleton and others, to the grand jurors unknown, citizens of the United States, and of said parish of Tensas and state of Louisiana, and legally qualified voters, in their person and property, on account of the support and advocacy by them, the said Branch, Canada, Singleton and others aforesaid, then and there given in a legal manner, to wit, by convoking and holding public meetings; by the delivery of public addresses, and by the organization of political clubs and by other similar and lawful means towards and in favor of the election of a lawfully qualified person, to wit, one J. W. Fairfax, as a member of the congress of the United States for the Fifth congressional district of the state of Louisiana, at a general election to be held, to wit, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, A. D. 1878, according to the laws of the state of Louisiana, etc. This count then alleged the overt acts committed by the defendants in carrying out said conspiracy, in substantially the same terms as the first and second counts, and concluded "contrary to the form of the statutes," etc.

The defendants filed demurrers to each of the three counts on substantially the same grounds. The grounds pressed upon the attention of the court were: (1) That the counts were defective in not specifying the time, place and circumstances of the acts of advocacy and support of the election of said Fairfax as a member of congress by said Branch and others. (2) It was objected that in the execution of the conspiracy it was alleged that the conspirators shot the parties against whom the conspiracy was formed, and therefore the allegations as to the overt acts showed a merger of the lesser crime in the greater, and thus the indictment on its face showed a want of jurisdiction in this court. (3) It was objected that the act of congress on which the indictment is based was unconstitutional.

A. H. Leonard, U. S. Atty., for the United States.

T. J. Semmes, W. F. Mellen, and Julius Aroni, for defendants.

Before WOODS, Circuit Judge, and BILLINGS, District Judge.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. We shall notice the objections to the indictment in the order above stated.

1. With respect to the statements of the charge in an indictment for conspiracy, it may be observed that though it is usual to state the conspiracy, and then show that in pursuance of it certain overt acts were done, it is sufficient to state the conspiracy alone. And it is not necessary to state the means by which the object was to be effected, as the conspiracy may be complete before the means to be used are taken into consideration. Reg. v. Best, 2 Ld. Raym. 1167; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 1143. This is the rule at common law when the conspiracy is to commit some offense known to the law. It is only when the conspiracy is to commit some act not an offense that the indictment must show some illegal act done in pursuance of the conspiracy. Rex v. Seward, 1 Adol. & El. 706. Thus, where an indictment charged that the defendants conspired together, by indirect means, to prevent one H. B. from exercising the trade of a tailor, and it was contended that it should have stated the fact on which the conspiracy was founded, the means used for the purpose, Lord Mansfield, C. J., said: "The conspiracy is stated and its object; it is not necessary that any means should be stated." And Buller, J., said: "If there be any objection, it is that the indictment states too much; it would have been good, certainly, if it had not added, 'by indirect means,' and that will not make it bad." Note to Rex v. Turner, 13 East, 231. When the indictment charged that the defendant conspired by divers false pretenses and subtle means and devices to obtain from A. divers large sums of money, and to cheat and defraud him thereof, it was held that, the gist of the offense being the conspiracy, it was quite sufficient to state the fact and its object, and not necessary to set out the specific pretenses. Bailey, J., said: "When the parties had once agreed to cheat a particular person of his moneys, although they might not then have fixed on any means for that purpose, the offense of conspiracy was complete." Rex v. Gill, 2 Barn. & Ald. 204; State v. Bartlett, 30 Me. 132. But when the act only becomes illegal from the means used to effect it, the illegality of it should be explained by proper statements. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. [Mass.] 111. These rules of pleading throw light upon the first objection made to the indictment.

The first and second counts of the indictment charge a conspiracy to prevent certain qualified voters from giving their support and advocacy in a lawful manner towards the election of a certain qualified person as a member of congress, and allege certain acts done in furtherance of the conspiracy. The law makes such a conspiracy an offense. Now, as the support and advocacy which the alleged conspirators sought to prevent were, as stated in the first and second counts, to be given in the future, it is clearly not necessary to allege what shape that support and advocacy were to take. The defendants could conspire to prevent the advocacy and support, in a lawful manner, by the voters, of the election to congress of the person named, without knowing by what means that advocacy and support were to be carried on, and even before the means were agreed upon by the persons by whom the support and advocacy were to be given. Might not the offense of conspiracy, as was said by Justice Bayley, be complete before it was possible to know or aver what was the manner in which the support and advocacy were to be given? As an indictment for conspiracy to do an unlawful act need not show what were the means to be used, the offense of conspiracy being complete before the means to carry out the conspiracy are agreed on; so we say that a conspiracy to prevent by force, intimidation and threats any citizen entitled to vote from giving his advocacy or support in a lawful manner to the candidate of his choice, need not set out the acts of advocacy and support, for the crime of conspiracy may be complete before the form in which the advocacy and support is to be given is known to the conspirators, or even to the persons against whom the conspiracy is directed. Suppose, for instance, three persons meet together and enter into a conspiracy, by which they agree, in order to prevent an influential person of the opposite political party from giving his support and advocacy to a particular candidate, to arrest him and restrain him of his liberty until after the election, and actually carry their purposes into execution. It is clear that the conspiracy forbidden by section 5520 would be complete, and yet it would be impossible to aver and prove what acts of support and advocacy by the person so restrained were contemplated by him, or were prevented by the conspiracy.

We are of opinion therefore, that the first count, which does not state the acts of advocacy and support which the defendants are charged with conspiring to prevent, is not defective in that particular; and as the second and third counts do set out the acts which the conspiracy was directed to prevent, without, it is true, giving details of time and place, that a fortiori they are not open to the objection under consideration.

2. In support of the second objection to the indictment it is said that, under the law of conspiracies, should an overt act result in murder, the conspiracy is lost in the greater crime. The indictment, it is said, alleges that in the execution of the conspiracy the conspirators shot the parties against whom the conspiracy was formed, and it is claimed that these allegations show a merger of the lesser crime in the greater, and so, on the face of the indictment, show a want of jurisdiction in this court. It is sufficient to say, in answer to this objection, that, in the first place, the indictment does not disclose any crime committed by the defendants of a higher degree than the conspiracy charged, and if it did, it would not follow that this court would be ousted of jurisdiction to try the accused for conspiracy. Even if it were shown that the defendants had been guilty of murder—that being an offense against the law of another sovereignty, and not against the laws of the United States, and therefore not triable in the federal courts—this court would not be ousted of jurisdiction merely because it was disclosed that an offense of a higher grade had been committed against the laws of the state

3. The third objection to the indictment, which was the one most earnestly pressed, is that the act upon which it is founded is unconstitutional—or, rather, to state the objection more precisely, that congress was without constitutional authority to pass the act. In the case of Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch [10 U. S.] 187, Chief Justice Marshall said: "The question whether a law be void for its repugnancy to the constitution is at all times a question of delicacy which ought seldom if ever to be decided in the affirmative in a doubtful case. The court, when impelled by duty to render such a judgment, would be unworthy of its station could it be unmindful of the solemn obligation which that station imposes. But it is not on slight implication and vague conjecture that the legislature is to be pronounced to have transcended its powers and its acts to be considered void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." And in the case of Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 625, the same eminent judge said, speaking in reference to the constitutionality of a legislative act: "On more than one occasion this court has expressed the cautious circumspection with which it approaches the consideration of such questions, and has declared that in no doubtful case would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the constitution."

Guided by these words of caution, we shall consider the question now to be passed upon. The clauses of the constitution of the United States which it is claimed empower congress to pass the act in question are section 2 of article 1, which declares that "the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature," and section 4 of the same article, which provides that "the times, places and manner of holding elections for the senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof, but the congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators," and the last clause of section eight, article one, which declares that "congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." The question whether this legislation is supported by section 2 of article 1, above quoted, depends on whether that section confers the right to vote for members of congress on such electors in the state as are qualified by its laws, as electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature. If such a right is conferred, then it is a right which congress has power to protect by law. Rights and immunities created by, or dependent upon, the constitution of the United States, can be protected by congress. U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S. 217; U. S. v. Cruikshank, Id. 542. It is true, and has been so said by the supreme court of the United States, that the constitution of the United States has not conferred the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the United States have no voters of their own creation in the states. Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 178. But this language refers solely to voters at an election for state officers, and so far as such elections are concerned, the United States has no voters of its own. In the case of U. S. v. Reese, 92 U S. 217, the supreme court expressly reserves any opinion on the effect of article 1, § 4, of the constitution in respect to elections for senators and representatives. The constitution does not describe a class who, independent of state laws, are entitled to vote for members of congress. But section 2 of article 1 declares in the most unmistakable terms that members of congress shall be chosen by the people of the several states, who shall have the qualifications requisite by the state laws for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature.

Now, the question is, has an elector who is qualified by state law to vote for the most numerous branch of the state legislature, a right conferred upon him by this clause of the constitution to vote for members of congress? To us it seems clear that he has. Suppose a state should attempt by law, though without distinction as to race, color or previous condition, to exclude a certain part of those having the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature from the right to vote for members of congress. Would such an act be constitutional? Clearly not. And it is clear also that it would deprive the excluded citizen of a right derived from the constitution of the United States, which says to him if you are qualified to vote for the most numerous branch of the state legislature you are qualified to vote for members of congress, and the house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen by electors such as you. It seems to be clear that the language of the section under consideration could not have been intended merely to give a basis of representation; that was provided for by other clauses of the constitution. If this be so, it must follow that it was intended as a declaration as to who of the people of the states should have the right to vote for representatives in congress. As, therefore, the elector qualified by state laws derives his right to vote for members of congress from the constitution of the United States, congress has the power to protect him in that right. Section 4 of article 1, in effect, declares that the congress may at any time, by law, make regulations prescribing the time, place and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, except as to the places of choosing senators. The purpose of conferring this power upon congress was that the country might not be in danger of having no congress through the indifference of the states or their hostility to the general government. It was to place it out of the power of the states to prevent the election of a congress by obstructive laws or in any other way. The ultimate right of regulating the time, place and manner of choosing representatives, and the time and manner of choosing senators, was therefore given to congress, so that it might always be within the power of congress to secure the election of a senate and house of representatives. Story, Const. § 817.

The clause of the constitution under consideration does not confer rights or privileges upon the individual citizen. It is a clause framed to secure the existence of the government itself, and was made in the interest of all the people of all the states. Such being the object and scope, what is the power granted by it? It authorizes congress to regulate the time, place and manner of choosing representatives in congress. The terms "time and place" need no commentary. What is meant by the words "manner of holding elections?" An election is not simply the depositing of a ballot in a box. If the elector is forced to vote a certain ballot against his will it is not an election so far as he is concerned, and equally so if he is prevented by violence from voting at all. An election is the expression of the free and untrammeled choice of the electors. There must be a choice and the expression of it to constitute an election. Under our American constitution an election implies a free interchange and comparison of views on the part of the people who are voters, and finally an independent expression of choice. Any interference with the right of the elector to make up his mind how he shall vote is as much an interference with his right to vote as if he were prevented from depositing his ballot in the ballot-box after he had made up his mind. It is conceded that congress may declare that the elections for representatives shall be by ballot. Congress has so declared without objection or challenge from any quarter. Rev. St. § 27. What was the purpose of that enactment? Clearly that the elector might be free to vote according to his choice. If it is within the power of congress for such a purpose to regulate his method of voting, congress could adopt any other measures leading to the same result. It could say that armed men should not infest the vicinity of the polls; it could say that the voters should have the right of free interchange of views on the day of voting. All this would as clearly be regulating the manner of holding the elections as prescribing that the election should be by ballot. If congress could make such regulations for election day it could make them for any previous day. In short, in prescribing the manner of holding elections, it could protect the voter in making his choice, and afterwards expressing that choice at the polls, for both these things are included in an election. Suppose our method of elections were like that used in England, where the candidates appear upon the hustings and address the voters, and the vote is taken, as it often is, by a show of hands; would not an act of parliament making any violence offered to the candidates, while addressing the voters, a penal offense be a regulation of the manner of holding the election? With us the canvass sometimes lasts for weeks, but that does not change the principle. Any law the purpose of which is to enable the voter to make a free and intelligent choice, and to express that choice freely at the ballot-box, is a regulation of the manner of holding the election.

The act of congress under consideration was framed for that purpose in respect to elections for representatives in congress, and it seems to us is plainly warranted by section 4, art. 1, of the constitution. The first and fourth sections of article 1, taken together, it seems to us leave no doubt upon the question. The first declares that representatives shall be elected by the people of the states, and adopts the qualification of electors prescribed by the states for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature. The second authorizes congress to regulate the manner of holding such elections. The two sections are intended to place the election of representatives in the ultimate power of congress, so as to secure at all times a house of representatives, first by preventing obstructive legislation by the states, and, second, securing to the voter the protection of the general government.

We both concur in the opinion that the legislation under consideration is clearly within the constitutional power of congress, and our judgment is that the demurrer to the indictment should be overruled.

A United States commissioner, on proper complaint and proceedings before him, required a person charged with receiving stolen property of the United States, knowing it to be stolen, to give bail in the sum of $500 to appear at the next term, and the commissioner at the same time, on another charge of like nature, required the same person to give bail in the sum of $200 to appear at the next term, &c.; and one bond for $700 was taken; and the principal cognizor having failed to appear, it was declared forfeited. UNITED STATES v. The GOOD FRIENDS.

District Court, D. Delaware. May 5, 1812.

VIOLATION OF NONIMPORTATION LAWS—LIBEL OF FORFEITURE—ACQUISITION OF SPANISH TERRITORY BY UNITED STATES—UNAUTHORIZED ACTS OF PUBLIC AGENT.

[1. Where an American vessel was laden in England in 1811 with a cargo of dry goods of British manufacture, and cleared thence for Amelia Island, Rio Janeiro, and Philadelphia, and proceeded to Amelia Island, and lay there for about two months, without breaking bulk, after which she sailed direct to Philadelphia, held that, in view of these movements, and of certain letters found on board from the owner to the supercargo, which indicated an expectation that the cargo would be brought to Philadelphia, the same must be found to have been "put on board" the ship with the intent to import the same into the United States, within the meaning of the 6th section of the nonimportation act of March 1, 1809 (2 Stat. 528), and was consequently subject to forfeiture thereunder.]

[2. The nonimportation act of March 1, 1809, must be construed to prohibit the introduction into the United States of every article of British merchandise or manufacture for any use whatever, without any exception which would permit a shipowner to import any articles (such, for instance, as anchors, sheathing copper, charts, etc.) intended for his own use.]

[3. Act Cong. Jan. 15, 1811 (3 Stat. 471), authorizing the president to take possession of all or any part of the Spanish territory lying east of the river Perdido and south of the state of Georgia, etc., "in case an arrangement has been or shall be made with the local authority of said territory for delivering up the possession of the same, or any part thereof, to the United States, or in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof, by a foreign government," gave authority to acquire the territory only in a friendly manner, and by compact or negotiation without hostility, or the exhibition of military force, except in case of an attempt by a foreign force to occupy the same; and hence, in the absence of any such attempt, the action of the American agent in accepting a cession of Amelia Island from a party of armed people calling themselves "Patriots," who, by an exhibition of force, had, a short time before, compelled the Spanish authorities to capitulate to them, was without authority of law.]

[4. The term "local authority," as used in the foregoing act of congress, meant such authority as had the immediate government or superintendence of the territory to be surrendered, namely, the Spanish colonial authority, and no other.]

[5. The act of the agent of the United States, after thus acquiring possession of Amelia Island, in granting to American vessels then lying there clearances to ports of the United States upon giving bond for payment of duties on their cargoes, was wholly void in respect to a vessel laden with goods of British manufacture, and could not in any way operate to prevent a forfeiture thereof under the nonimportation act of March 1, 1809.]

[6. A bond given with a condition that obliges a person to bring goods of British manufacture into a port of the United States in violation of the nonimportation laws is void.]

[This was a libel of forfeiture filed against the ship Good Friends and cargo, charging a violation of the nonimportation act of March 1, 1809.]

FISHER, District Judge. The ship Good Friends, Robert Thompson, master, owned and claimed by Stephen Girard, merchant, of Philadelphia, registered on the 9th of March, 1804, laden with flour and carrying a sea letter dated 27th of July, 1811, sailed from the Capes of Delaware on the first of August, 1811, was bound for the port of Lisbon, in the kingdom of Portugal, and a market. She arrived on the 30th of August at Lisbon, and discharged and sold her flour agreeably to instructions. She left Lisbon after the sale of her outward cargo about the last of September. The supercargo landed in England on the 10th of October. Ten days afterwards the Good Friends arrived at London. At the time of the vessel's arrival at London, Mr. Charles Banker, on account of the claimant (who had already sailed for and had arrived in England), had purchased about 10,000 pounds sterling worth of her inward cargo. The purchases of the inward cargo were made from funds of the claimant already in England, in the hands of Baring Brothers & Co. These purchases closed about the middle of December in the same year. The ship left England on the 4th of January, 1812, laden with dry goods of best quality of British manufacture. Her clearance, dated 14th December, 1811, from the custom-house of London, is for Amelia Island, a Spanish port, Rio Janeiro, in the Brazils, a Portuguese port, and Philadelphia. On the 9th or 10th of February, 1812, the ship arrived at Amelia Island, after a direct voyage from London to that place. She lay there, without breaking bulk, until the 10th of April, when she sailed for the port of Philadelphia; and on the 12th of the same month, arriving in the waters of the Delaware, she was seized by an officer of the revenue for this district, for the violation of a law of the United States passed on the first of March, 1809, commonly called the "Nonimportation Act." The Good Friends, for this offence, was libelled by the proper officer on the part of the United States in this district, on the 5th day of May last, as forfeited. This cause was heard at great length at the November term last of this court, sitting at Newcastle.

The fourth section of the act of congress above mentioned prohibits the importation into the United States or the territories thereof, after the 20th of May following, of any goods, wares, and merchandizes whatsoever from any port situated in Great Britain or Ireland, or any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, or from any port or place in her actual possession. The same prohibition is by the same law enacted against France, but has been since dispensed with. All goods, wares, and merchandize being of the growth, product, or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, or of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, are by the same section prohibited from being imported from any port or place whatever; certain clearances for ports beyond the Cape of Good Hope, &c., only excepted. By the fifth section, the prohibited articles are, if imported into the United States or their territories, forfeited. The sixth section is the only one by which it is alleged the forfeiture accrues, in the present case, of the ship Good Friends to the United States The words are: "That if any article or articles the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall after the twentieth of May be put on board of any ship or vessel, boat, raft or carriage, with intention to import the same into the United States or the territories thereof, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and with the knowledge of the owner or master of such ship or vessel, boat, raft or carriage such ship or vessel, boat, raft or carriage shall be forfeited, and the owner and master thereof shall moreover each forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles."

It has been truly alleged in the argument, by one of the advocates of the claimants, that the fact of importation is, independent of the act of congress, no offence. It has, however, been made an offence by the legislative authority of the country, and it cannot be dissembled that the ship Good Friends has done the very act prohibited by the fourth section of the act aforesaid, and that she is forfeited, unless there exist such facts and circumstances in her case as will exempt her from the operation of the act. The duty prescribed to this court now is to determine whether this ship has had put on board of her British manufactures, and brought them into the United States, under such circumstances as will protect her from forfeiture. It has been contended by the advocates for the claimants, that there is no evidence in the present case of any intention on the part of the claimant or his agents to put on board the goods to import the same into the United States or the territories thereof, and that it is incumbent on the part of the United States to prove such intention.

It is in evidence in this cause that the claimant had vast funds on the continent of Europe, being the proceeds of several cargoes exported and sold there; that he had endeavored, and very successfully, too, to concentrate these funds in the hands of Baring Brothers & Co., a house in London; that, viewing the uncertain state of the relations between this country and Great Britain, he was very uneasy, lest he might fail in accomplishing the great purpose he held in view. His desire to be in possession of his funds, at such a juncture, was very laudable; especially as it would redound to his own security, as well as be adding to the resources of his country. The simple question on this part of the case is whether the claimant intended a commercial profit on the back of the funds which he thus wished to be in his own possession, by lading the Good Friends with British manufactures for the American market. The letter of instructions to the supercargo, Mr. Adgate, is dated at Philadelphia, on the 27th of July, 1811, four days anterior to the ship's putting to sea. In this letter it is remarkable that nothing is said in respect to the ulterior destination of the bulk of the inward cargo which was to be taken on board at London. From this letter it would seem as if a part, at any rate, of the inward cargo was intended to be imported into Philadelphia. This is to be inferred from sundry expressions contained in it, such as the following: "As it respects letters, I have no objection to take in my ships those from American supercargoes, masters, officers, and crew to their families or owners or their vessels." Speaking of the purchase of anchors for his new ship, I suppose on the stocks of this country, the claimant says, "And if they cannot be obtained in Portugal or Spain, you are to purchase them in England, &c." Again, "No matter if the anchors are forged in England, so they are well made, of good iron bars, &c." And, further, "Should I want any other articles from England, I will write you in time, care of Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., at London." There is, however, a clause in this letter of instructions, which strongly intended that the whole of the inward cargo was expected to be brought into Philadelphia. Speaking of the terms on which he engaged Mr. Adgate, he says: "3d. Five hundred dollars additional will be paid to you if the ship Good Friends proceeds from a port in Portugal or Spain to London, and there takes in a cargo on my account, as before mentioned, and arrives safe in this port." What port is meant to be arrived at? Why certainly, the one at which the letter is dated. Where is she to take in her cargo? Plainly and undoubtedly, at London. He further is desirous of purchasing on his own account a complete set of separate maps of that part of this continent from the south boundaries of the United States, including Mexico, all the way round Cape Horn, as far as it is navigable, &c. From these clauses of the letter of the 27th July it would seem as if the inward cargo, or at any rate a part of it, was destined at that time for the port of Philadelphia, the residence of the claimant.

It is now to be considered how far the effect of the above letter is done away by those which follow, of the 14th of October and the 29th of December, 1811. The letter of the 14th of October, was received by the supercargo on the 5th of December ensuing, at London, nine days only before the completion of lading and the date of the clearance. From the evidence of Mr. Adgate it seems that the purchases of the inward cargo closed about the middle of December. Must not, therefore, an inference arise, that before receiving the letter of the 14th of October a considerable part of the cargo was shipped under the letter of the 27th of July? But the letter of the 14th of October most clearly and unequivocally proves to my mind the destination to both Amelia Island and Rio Janeiro to be colourable, and not real. It is the first paper in this cause, in point of date, which mentions Amelia Island as the place of destination, and orders the ship to proceed "near enough to our capes to put letters on board to point out the destination" of the claimants. It appears, then, that his intention was thereafter "to be pointed out," although he in the same letter orders the clearance for Amelia Island. Could Amelia Island or Rio Janeiro be the place at which he wished his cargo to be unladen and sold? If either of them were, why speak in the letter of pointing out his intention, the continuance of the nonimportation acts, and of the orders in council? Neither of these governmental acts could affect the ship or cargo at either Amelia Island or the Brazils. Why wish her to come so near the Capes of Delaware, if her destination was bona fide for either the Spanish or Portuguese ports? The letter of the 29th of December is an after-act, and cannot have much weight in the decision of the present case. It was not received until after the arrival of the ship at Amelia Island, or until the day after. It was written in Philadelphia, after the shipment of the cargo at London, and but a short time before the ship left the British waters. Even this document proves only in his favour that the claimant did not wish to bring his ship into Philadelphia, and subject her and her cargo to forfeiture directly in the face of the nonimportation act. It is ascertained by this letter that she was not to unlade or break bulk at Amelia Island, but was to be kept in such manner as at any time to proceed with her cargo to such port as the claimant should point out. By the way, all this time there is no mention made of the voyage to Rio Janeiro; but there is to be gathered an evident avidity in the claimant, apparent on the face of this letter, on the first intimation that the restrictive act is repealed that the ship should come direct for the port of Philadelphia; and this, too, without advice from himself of such being the fact. It follows that this court is of opinion that the evidence of the intention of lading in London to import into the United States is manifest from the documentary evidence to which we have alluded; and we are further of opinion that this evidence is strongly corroborated, nay, concluded, by the London clearance. This document is the voluntary act of the captain, and presents, together with the act of since bringing them in, indisputable evidence of the goods being put on board with a view to the American market. In this paper Amelia Island, Rio Janeiro, and Philadelphia are named, and most probably named with a full intention and understanding among the parties of being filled up in the handwriting of the custom-house officers at London,—not in print, but in manuscript. To this paper it has been replied by the claimant's advocates that the ship might not have arrived with her cargo until the repeal of the restrictive acts, and for that event, and with that view, was the clearance filled up with the word "Philadelphia." I would ask if this be the course of transactions of this kind, and if there is any evidence in the cause to support such a supposition? Is the lying at Amelia Island upward of two months, waiting the result of the memorial to congress, presented by the claimant and others, in favour of special importations, evidence of such a position? There is, however, still further evidence of a part of the cargo being put on board in London with an intention to bring it into a prohibited port. I mean the memorial presented by the claimant to congress dated on the 9th of March, 1812. By this paper it appears that property in British manufactures amounting to 1,863 pounds 18s. sterling was shipped on board the Good Friends for the express purpose of being brought to and used in the port of Philadelphia, consisting of "three anchors, a quantity of sheathing copper, copper nails, a small bale of bunting, four night glasses, and several charts,"—thereby fulfilling, in respect of these articles, the wishes of the claimant expressed in his letter of the 27th of July. These articles, by the explanatory statement annexed to the memorial, are excepted from the general wish which the claimant had of being permitted by congress to order the ship round to Philadelphia as a place of safety, and of there entering her cargo for exportation. The captain, he says, has given bonds in England to land the copper and anchors in a port of the United States. From this document, then, as well as the letter last mentioned, it appears that these articles were intended for the use of the claimant himself; but it has been very ingeniously replied that if these anchors and the other articles composing this part of the shipment were intended for the use of the claimant, and not as articles of merchandize, their importation cannot influence a decision of the present case against him, if even put on board with intention of being brought here. In support of this principle a case has been cited from 3 Dall. 297, as being fully in point. This case has been attentively considered, and this court is of opinion that it does not go the length contended for by the claimant's advocates. It is true that an act of congress passed on the 22d of May, 1794 [1 Stat. 369], prohibiting for one year ensuing the exportation of arms and ammunition.

The La Vengeance was alleged to have exported these articles from the United States against the form of the act, but it appeared that the powder constituted a part of the equipment of the French frigate the Semilante, and did never belong to the United States, nor was it of their manufacture; and that the muskets mentioned in the information were the private property of French passengers on board La Vengeance, "carried out for their own use, and not by way of merchandize." It must be evident that the nonimportation act was made to prohibit the introduction into the United States of British merchandize for any use whatever, and thereby to strike at the interests of a nation whose government was heaping upon us vexations and injustice without number and without end. We are of opinion that congress intended to prohibit importations of every article with a view to the consumption of the country, otherwise the nonimportation system would be a laborious nullity and a dead letter; and surely, if congress had intended to let in British manufactures for any purpose or use whatever, the law would have contained an exception. We, however, find none; and as a matter of construction we can never sanction such a one of any law as would inevitably defeat the ends for which it was enacted. Such a construction is indubitably the wrong one. The whole mercantile class of the community might, under such a construction, enter into importations with the avowed object of being for their own use; and by such means the United States in the face of the legislative prohibition might become inundated with British manufactures. This court cannot adopt such a construction, as would, if sanctioned by the judiciary of the country, violate the plain intention of the act, and frustrate all the benefits intended from it. The act of May, 1794, was passed to prevent the United States being drained of those materials, by their exportation abroad, without which the country could not be defended; and the construction was perhaps a reasonable one, that twenty muskets, bought by individuals for personal defence, and not with views of mercantile profit or for other foreign markets, could not be considered a violation of the law. Very different, in the opinion of this court, is the importation of upwards of 1,500 pounds sterling worth of British manufactures, when our prohibitory act without exception forbids the introduction altogether of British merchandise, in terms the most broad and unequivocal.

Independently of the documentary, there is abundant other testimony in this cause of the cargo "being put on board" the Good Friends for importation into the United States. The claimant certainly never could intend to lay out nearly 67,000 pounds sterling in any goods for the purpose of being carried to an uncertain or a glutted market. His funds in England were in able, responsible hands, and his goods were purchased with monies taken up from Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co. in pursuance of his own orders. Importation to Amelia Island of British dry goods, to so great an amount, is inconsistent with the mercantile eminence and known acuteness of the claimant. He would have preferred bringing his money home in bills, or in any other manner, to bringing a cargo of such an amount to such a market. His supercargo swears that the whole of the inhabitants of Fernandina of all ages, sexes and colours, do not amount to 300, and that the land of Amelia Island is very poor and thinly populated. The whole of the wealth of this island was not sufficient for the purchase of this cargo. Besides, from the good understanding which has existed between the British and Spanish governments for some years past, it is reasonable to conclude that British manufactures were to be obtained in great abundance anterior to the arrival thither of the Good Friends. The British are sufficiently eager to supply, indeed to glut, every market open to their manufactures. The Good Friends arrived there on the 19th of February, and lay in the Spanish waters until the 10th of April, without breaking bulk, or exposing any part of the cargo to sale. Nor have we any testimony of its being consigned to any person to superintend its sale, and to account for and remit its proceeds. So far from any of these measures being taken, we have it from under the hand of the claimant that the vessel was "to be kept in such manner as at any time to proceed with her cargo to such port as he should point out." The conclusion from these facts is, that Amelia Island could not have been the real port of destination. But Rio Janeiro is another port of destination. It is, I believe, not mentioned in the claimant's letter of the 14th of October, nor in the original manifest, or the consular certificate, and must have been inserted on the suggestion of the master of the ship, or of some agent of the claimant. The manifest and consular certificate mention Amelia Island, &c. The clearance itself mentions Rio Janeiro. There does not appear to have been any obstacle to the ship's proceeding to that market, had such been her intention. That, perhaps, was not an empty market. The British trade there themselves, and it was but reasonable to conclude that an ample supply of their manufactures was on hand. No attempt was made to enjoy the Brazilian market, though an ample opportunity was afforded during the delay at Amelia Island. Indeed, according to my recollection, the claimant nowhere mentions this port as the one which in any event is to be the receptacle of his cargo. One of his advocates has urged as an excuse for not going to Rio Janeiro that the property would there have been seized as an indemnity for the seizure of Florida. It is hardly to be supposed that the Portuguese would proceed to such a length for any injury committed against the Spanish government. I am compelled to decide from these facts, united with the paper testimony heretofore considered, that the cargo of the Good Friends was put on board at London, not with a real destination for Amelia Island or Rio Janeiro, but for the port of Philadelphia in the United States. The last place presented every invitation which mercantile cupidity could hope for, because of the interrupted state of commerce which for some years had existed.

I might here close, and order the decree which would result from the foregoing convictions, but that several other questions of great magnitude have arisen and been discussed in this cause, which it may be thought incumbent on me to decide.

It is urged on the part of the claimant in this case that the ship is protected from forfeiture by the conduct of the government of the United States and their agents in receiving the cession of Amelia Island, and by the conduct of those agents subsequent to the cession. By a secret act of congress, passed on the 15th January, 1811, the president of the United States was authorized "to take possession of all or any part of the territory lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the state of Georgia and the Mississippi territory, in case an arrangement has been, or shall be, made with the local authority of the said territory for delivering up the possession of the same, or any part thereof, to the United States, or in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof by any foreign government." On the 26th of January, same year, General George Matthews and Colonel John M'Kee, were appointed by the president joint and several commissioners for carrying into effect the provisions of the foregoing act. It appears from the testimony that on the 16th of March last, the town of Fernandina, in Amelia Island, was summoned to surrender by a number of armed people, calling themselves "Patriots"; that on the 17th it capitulated, by striking the Spanish flag to that of the patriots; that on the 11th it was ceded by the patriots to General Matthews, as United States commissioner, who hoisted the flag of the United States in place of that of the patriots; that General Matthews took possession, at the head of fifty armed men, being a detachment of United States' troops. There were lying in the adjacent waters from five to eight United States gunboats, under the command of Commodore Campbell; that at the time of the cession these gunboats lay opposite the town, side to, with springs on their cables: that after the cession General Matthews appointed a judge, a collector, a harbour master, and a notary publick. On the 2d of April following, the ship Good Friends, theretofore lying in the waters of Amelia river, was cleared out for the port of Philadelphia from Fernandina, by the collector there, whom General Matthews had appointed, after giving bond for securing the duties on the ship and cargo. The clearance was accompanied by a letter from General Matthews to John Steele, Esquire, collector of the port of Philadelphia, stating the capitulation, surrender, cession, &c. of Fernandina and Amelia Island. On the 4th of April the government of the United States disavowed the conduct of General Matthews, revoked his powers, and committed them to another person.

These facts have given rise to several very important questions which were debated at the bar with great science and ability by the advocates of counsel for both sides. The first question raised is whether Matthews did or did not exceed the powers delegated to him by receiving the cession of Amelia Island in the manner he did receive it. The words of the act of congress from whence the whole authority to occupy East Florida originated are: "In case an arrangement has been or shall be made with the local authority of the said territory for delivering up the possession of the same or any part thereof to the United States." These words define the first casus in which the commissioners were to act, and to occupy the territory for the United States. The language of the letter of instructions to the commissioners is: "Should you find Governor Folk, or the local authority existing there, inclined to surrender in 'an amicable manner' the possession of the remaining portion or portions of West Florida now held by him in the name of the Spanish monarchy, you are to accept in behalf of the United States the abdication of his or of the other existing authority, and the jurisdiction of the country over which it extends. And, should a stipulation be insisted on for the redelivery of the country at a future period, you may engage for such redelivery to the lawful sovereign." In the fifth paragraph of the letter are the following words: "These directions are adapted to one of the contingencies specified in the act of congress, namely, 'the amicable surrender of the territory by the local ruling authority.'" From the plain meaning of all this language it would seem as if Matthews, in relation to the first contingency, was to act as a peaceful negotiator and in an amicable manner. In support of this idea the act speaks of an "arrangement" which has been or is to be made in relation to the surrender of the territory. The word "arrangement" here means something depending on and preparatory to a compact, and a compact, too, to be made in a friendly manner; that is, without any pre-existing hostility. The word "arrangement" and those which follow it must mean something voluntary on the part of the authorities ceding the territory, for no compulsion could be contemplated, as no force in this case was to be resorted to. We must therefore infer that the clear meaning of this casus was a voluntary or amicable surrender of the territory without the aid of force or the show of military authority. This idea is abundantly supported by the letter of instructions under which General Matthews acted. This paper was penned by the secretary of state, about ten days after the act passed, and, though there is a slight variance from the language, yet it follows the meaning of the act.

The letter uses these words: "inclined to surrender in an amicable manner the possession, &c." The obvious meaning of this language is, that the territory was to be acquired in a friendly manner, and by compact or negotiation without hostility or the exhibition of a military force.

2dly, as to the authority which was to make the surrender. With regard to colonies there are generally authorities of two kinds—the authority of the mother country by which the colony has been discovered, planted and settled, or acquired by conquest or treaty, and which retains and exercises many of the more important attributes of sovereignty; and the "local authority" of the colony, which is exercised for its immediate government, and in the colony itself. The latter is called from usage and propriety of language the "local authority," by way of contradistinguishing it from the former. The meaning of the words "local authority," as used in the act of congress, I am of opinion must be such authority alone as had the immediate, or, if you please, the "local," government or superintendence of the territory about to be surrendered, namely, the colonial authority, and no other. In this sense congress must have used the term. The authority of the mother country could not, in the nature of things, and never was intended to, be applied to for the cession. Governor Folk's name being mentioned in the instructions was a sufficient guide to Matthews as to the authority intended by the act and by the executive who issued instructions under it. The act uses the words "local authority"; the instructions vary in a small degree from these words; and probably, to meet the possible case of Folk's removal from office, uses the words in one place "local authority existing there," and in another "the local ruling authority." In both cases the instructions correspond with the true intent and meaning of the act. They both meant the local provincial or colonial authority. Did that authority make the surrender to Matthews? Was it made by Governor Folk, or even Don Lopez? Or was it made by the existing provincial or colonial authority? Was it made by that authority which existed when the law passed, or which had held the territory of the crown of Spain? Certainly by none of them, but by such an authority as had stepped in between the one congress had contemplated and General Matthews. Nor does the cession bear that voluntary and peaceful character which was desired and described by the legislative and executive department of our government. But in this case there is a summons by the patriot forces of the town of Fernandina, on the 16th of March to surrender on the next day. It capitulates and surrenders; both of which are measures of war, and the consequences of hostile movements.

Under this view of the subject, I am clearly of opinion that the first casus or contingency mentioned in the law did not arise; and that Governor Matthews in receiving the cession as he did, exceeded, and of course violated, both the letter and spirit of his powers; that he obtained the territory by usurpation, and not by compact, unless the second casus arose, in which force was to be used, and this brings us to examine whether the second casus did arise, in which possession was to be taken by force. On this part of the subject I shall attempt brevity, as not much contest has arisen at the bar upon it. It is not pretended that the force to which Fernandina capitulated was a foreign one; that force, therefore, is laid out of the case. Matthews, in regard to the second contingency, was to keep on the alert, "on suspicion of a foreign force being about to occupy the territory"; and he was to preoccupy it by force, only on the first undoubted manifestation of the approach of a force for that purpose. It is not in proof that such a force did approach for such a purpose. It follows that the possession which was obtained was unauthorized and illegal. The agent acted beyond the limits of his authority, and what he did of course was void.

But a second question on this part of the case is whether the bonding at and clearance from Amelia Island to Philadelphia was a forced or a voluntary act on the part of the agents of the claimant. Mr. Adgate, the supercargo, states that after the cession he felt very uneasy for the safety of the property, and waited on General Matthews, to know how he was to consider himself and the property under his charge. Matthews told him he might consider himself in the United States. The supercargo considered the property in imminent danger. Matthews agreed with him. He told the supercargo finally, he would give a clearance from the custom-house of Fernandina, on securing the duties. Matthews required a bond for this purpose in the sum of forty-six thousand and odd dollars, that the vessel and cargo should be delivered in charge to the collector of Philadelphia, until, as Matthews' letter expressed it, "the determination of the government of the United States be known, as relates to her case." Neither the testimony of the supercargo nor the letter of Matthews enforces conviction that there was any force used to give the bond or accept the clearance. The supercargo indeed implies, and very strongly, that he made the first overture to Matthews, in consequence of his own uneasiness in respect to the property. Matthews views the clearance in two lights: as a measure of justice, for which he gives no reasons; and as one of policy, lest the vessel and cargo "might invite the attack of piratical marauders." He seems a little suspicious lest she might bring trouble on his hands. George Turner deposes that the vessels were not compelled by the government of Amelia Island to depart, but were required to give bonds before they were allowed to depart; that the bonds required that they should proceed to their destined ports in the United States, and that the power de facto did not take possession of the ships and vessels in the harbour further than the general possession given them by the cession of the island. The only testimony that supports the idea of any compulsion to secure duties is that of James Girdon. He says "that all American vessels were compelled to secure the duties on their cargoes for the use and benefit of the United States at Amelia Island, by giving bond to the collector there." This, however, shows what he means by the word "compelled." We shall, however, presently see whether such bonds are compulsory. It further appears that the captains and supercargoes of several ships, and among them of the Good Friends, preferred a petition to Matthews, after the cession, on the subject of the ships and cargoes; that Matthews, in his answer, wished them to vary the form of the application. The first petition to him does not appear in the proceedings, but that pursuant to the form he advises does, and bears a contemporary date with his reply to the first petition. So it would seem that, so far from any compulsion being used, the arrival into the waters of the United States was, on the part of the agents of the claimant, voluntary and solicited. By the way, they state that they had been waiting at Amelia Island until they could be legally admitted to come hither, and state, in the same paper, Philadelphia as their port of destination. We do not discover any exercise of the vis major in this case. Had such been the fact, our opinion might and probably would have been different; for the coming into the waters of the United States would have been imputable to the compelling force, and not to the claimant or to his agents. But so far from the vis major, we find no exclusive possession taken of the ships which had been riding in the Spanish waters by the military occupants of the island or by the gunboats which were in its waters. The ships are as unmolested as before the surrender. The whole uneasiness in the case is with Mr. Adgate. He it is that applies to Matthews to know what to do. Matthews, fearing the Colibri, I suppose, which had been seen some time before in the offing, but which had gone further to the south, takes his bond, and clears him out for a port in the United States. There certainly then was no external force, or even the offer of it.

The next question which offers for our consideration is, can the bond be deemed compulsion in the case? The bond, we are told, was given with condition to come to the port of Philadelphia, and with a cargo of dry goods of British manufacture. We have before seen that such articles are forbidden to be brought here, and by the law of the land. It is clearly unlawful to bring in such a cargo. We are informed by our law that a bond given with a condition which obliges a person to do an act or to the performance of a thing which is unlawful, is void. 3 Bac. Abr. 703; Co. Litt. 206b; Cro. Eliz. 705. The inevitable conclusion is, the bringing in goods of British manufacture being unlawful, a bond with a condition to do that thing is void and of no effect. Such an instrument could never form the ground of a recovery in any court of justice in the United States. It could have no compulsory effect belonging to it, and in this view of the subject there was no compulsion to bring in the cargo, even according to the deposition of Girdon.

These are all the questions which I have thought it material to consider in this cause. I will now beg leave to remark that in a republican government like ours, which exists only by the force and obligation of its laws, it is of primary importance that those laws should be obeyed; that they should operate equally; that the obedience yielded to them may be cheerful and willing; that if one member of the community shall be exempted from their operation, every other is injured, and has a right to complain; and that in proportion as the laws become disregarded and ineffectual the government from which they emanate becomes enfeebled, and eventually is incapable of providing for its own security and the happiness of the people. It therefore certainly behooves every functionary of such a government, by whom the laws are to be expounded, to be cautious how he admits facts on principles virtually to do away the force and effect of a law. By admissions of this kind a judicial magistrate may usurp all the powers which belong to a free government. He may virtually, though he cannot formally, repeal a law. He may excuse, though he cannot pardon, an offence against the law; forgetting the wise maxim of the common law, "Sed est tutissima cassis sub clypeo legis nemo decipitur." On the other hand, it must be confessed that there are cases of violation of the laws where the offender ought not to suffer their penalties; but the great question in cases of this kind, in a well-regulated government, is whether he ought not rather to look up for indemnity to the executive authority than to the judicial magistrate. The one can listen to the suggestions of clemency in a hard case, while the other is the lex loquens,—the law speaking,—or the medium through which its penalties are pronounced against its violators. I do not mean by what I have said that a judge should be unmerciful; but merely that he confine himself to those functions which his government have conferred upon him.

I may do wrong to the claimant by the decision which I now make, but the wrong is unintentional on my part. If, however, I have erred, the error will hereafter be corrected by the great and learned appellate authorities before whom this cause will go when it shall have left this court; and a great consolation to me is that in cases of magnitude the final decision is not here. Were my judgment of this case to be formed according to my prepossessions which I have received of the claimants, very different indeed would it be from what it is. But I am bound by a tie which admits no personal partialities or animosities to mingle themselves in my decision. They can never form the grounds of my decrees. Let a decree of forfeiture be entered.

Case No. 15,228.

UNITED STATES v. GOODRICH TRANSP. CO.

[8 Biss. 224.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Wisconsin. June, 1878.

INTERNAL REVENUE—TRANSPORTING BARRELS WITH UNCANCELED STAMPS.

In an action to recover a penalty under section 3324 of the Revised Statutes, for transporting empty barrels upon which were uneffaced internal revenue stamps, held, that the defendant was bound to know whether or not there were stamps upon the barrels, which had not been effaced or obliterated.

Action to recover penalty under section 3324 of the Revised Statutes, for transporting empty barrels which had theretofore contained distilled spirits, and upon which, it was claimed, were internal revenue stamps not effaced or obliterated as required by law.

G. W. Hazelton, for the United States.

Murphey & Goodwin, for defendant.

DYER, District Judge (charging jury). Testimony has been given tending to show that the defendant received on board one of its boats at Green Bay, for transportation to Milwaukee, and that it transported empty barrels having thereon, uneffaced and unobliterated, certain stamps required by law to be placed on any cask or package containing distilled spirits. Testimony has also been given on the part of defendant tending to show that these barrels had been stored for a considerable time before such transportation, that they were old barrels, and that the heads of the same were covered with dust and dirt and water stains, so that the stamps were to some extent obscured and not readily discernible upon ordinary observation, and that they were received by defendant for transportation and were transported from Green Bay to Milwaukee, in connection with and as part of a large number of other barrels upon which the stamps had been effaced or obliterated.

Upon the state of facts presented by the entire testimony, I am asked by defendant's counsel to instruct you that if the defendant by its agents and employés exercised reasonable care and watchfulness in observing the condition of said barrels when they were received for transportation, and if in the exercise of such care, they failed to ascertain that the stamps upon the same were uneffaced and unobliterated, for the reason that such stamps were obscured from ordinary view by the presence of dirt, dust and stains upon the heads of the barrels where the stamps were placed, the defendant is not liable in this action. I must, in the view I take of the statute, decline to so instruct you.

The statute (section 3324, Rev. St.) provides, that every transportation company which receives or transports or has in possession with intent to transport, any empty cask or package having thereon any brand, mark or stamp required by law to be placed on any cask or package containing distilled spirits, shall forfeit three hundred dollars for each such cask or package so received or transported or had in possession with intent to transport. This is one of the most important provisions of the internal revenue law, and I am of the opinion that under a proper construction of its requirements the defendant was bound to know whether or not there were stamps upon these barrels that had not been effaced or obliterated. The statute is positive in its terms, and the question is, did these barrels have upon them stamps, uneffaced, as claimed; not, did the defendant discover them or could it discover them by the exercise of reasonable care and ordinary observation. It was the defendant's duty, before receiving them for transportation, to ascertain whether there were or were not uncancelled stamps upon these barrels, if it would escape liability under this statute, and as I have before said, it was bound to know what was the fact; and although the stamps may have been obscured as claimed, if they were upon the barrels uneffaced and unobliterated, and if the defendant received the barrels with the stamps upon them for transportation, and transported them as alleged, then it is liable in the present action to the extent of three hundred dollars for each such barrel so transported.

Verdict for United States for twelve hundred dollars.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—PALMETTA HATS.

Hats made of palmetta leaf are not hats made of straw, chip, or grass, within the act of 22d May, 1824, c. 136 [4 Stat. 25], and therefore pay only a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem.

[This was an action by the United States against F. H. Goodwin.] The case was referred to the decision of the court upon the following statement of facts, which was agreed upon by the parties: "It is agreed, that the goods in question, before they were imported into the port of Passamaquoddy, had been imported into St. Andrews, in the province of New Brunswick, and were lying in St. Andrews, and intended to be imported, or not imported into the United States, according as the duties should be found, on inquiry, to be an ad valorem duty of fifteen per cent. as on unenumerated articles, or an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. as on hats under the denomination of hats of straw, chip, or grass; that for the purpose of getting this information he, the defendant, went to the port of Passamaquoddy, and made the inquiry of the collector through the deputy collector; that said collector took time for the examination and to give the answer; that his deliberate answer, after mature examination and reflection, was, that an ad valorem duty of fifteen per cent. was to be paid, as on unenumerated articles; that upon this information, and in consequence thereof, he, the defendant, imported said goods into the port of Passamaquoddy, which he should not have done, had he been informed that a duty of fifty per cent. would have been to be paid; that said goods were duly entered, and the duties demanded, viz. fifteen per cent. as on unenumerated articles, were duly paid by the defendant, amounting to the sum of $40.49, and that a certificate was given by the deputy collector, under the seal of the custom-house, certifying that said goods had been imported into said port, and the duties thereon paid; that said hats are a species of hats fabricated of palmetta leaf."

The first question is, is not said certificate a discharge and release to the defendant from all liability for duties on said importation, whatever the duties may be?

If it be not such a discharge and release, the second question is, what duty does the law require in the importation of that species of hats? The law, on which the plaintiffs rely, is the statute passed the 22d of May, 1824, entitled "An act to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports." The section of the said act, on which the plaintiffs rely, is the 4th, and is in these words: "On all Leghorn hats or bonnets, and all hats or bonnets of straw, chip, or grass, and all flats, braids, or plats for the making of hats or bonnets, a duty of fifty per centum ad valorem: Provided, that all Leghorn hats and bonnets, and all hats or bonnets of straw, chip, or grass, which, at the place whence imported with the addition of ten per centum, shall have cost less than one dollar each, shall be taken and deemed to have cost one dollar each, and shall be charged with duty accordingly." "It is agreed, that these hats were imported into St. Andrews, and thence into the port of Passamaquoddy from Campeachy in the province Ytica, a province of Mexico. The question arising is, whether hats, which are fabricated of palmetta leaf, come under the denomination of 'hats of straw, of chip, or of grass.' If they do not, it is agreed that these palmetta leaf made hats pay only an ad valorem duty of fifteen per cent.; and that the ad valorem duties due thereon, have been duly paid. If hats fabricated of palmetta leaf come under the denomination of hats of straw, or chip, or grass, then it is agreed, that said hats are to pay an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent."

The case was shorty argued by Pearse, Dist. Atty., for the United States, and A. Robbins, for defendant; and by consent, an affidavit of a person acquainted with the palmetta tree was read.

STORY, Circuit Justice. Upon the first question the court is of opinion, that if by a mistake of the collector the full duty is not paid to the United States, they may maintain a suit against the owner for the deficiency. By law the duty on goods imported is a debt due to the United States.

As to the second point, we think it really admits of no doubt. The palmetta is a tree of a large trunk, and the hats are made of the leaves of that tree. Some of the trunks are at the bottom three feet in circumference, and grow to eight feet high. But it is decisive with us, that the hats are made of the leaf, and of no other part of the tree. The act of 22d May, 1824 (chapter 136), puts an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. on hats of straw, chip, or grass. A hat made of a leaf is not made of straw, chip or grass, in any common or technical sense. A chip hat is made of the ligneous strips of a tree. Straw and grass are too well known to require any description. Judgment must therefore be for the defendant. Judgment accordingly.

Circuit Court. D. Virginia.[1]

WITNESS—REFUSAL TO ANSWER—POSSIBILITY OF CRIMINATION.

[Cited in argument in U. S. v. Burr, Case No. 14,692e, to the point that a witness is not bound to answer a question which might possibly criminate him.]

Goosely was indicted for felony, under the 16th and 17th sections of the act of congress establishing the post-office and post-roads within the United States, for robbing the mail of some bank-notes.

On his trial, the attorney for the United States called Reynolds, an accomplice with the person, against whom an indictment for the offence had been preferred, but which had been found "not a true bill" by the grand jury.

[1] [Date not given.]

Randolph & Wickham, counsel for the prisoner, objected to his testimony, on the principle that the witness was not bound to give any evidence which might implicate himself.

The attorney admitted the general principle, but denied its application, and insisted that he might give evidence.

THE COURT determined, "that he was a competent witness;" but IREDELL, Circuit Justice, observed (and GRIFFIN, District Judge, concurred) that "he could not be compelled to answer a question leading to an implication of himself; and that it was very probable that the jury would pay but little attention to a fact, which they were satisfied was but partially related. He was asked, whether he knew of any bank-notes being taken out of the mail by the prisoner. He answered, none, but what he was jointly concerned in. The court said he was not bound to tell anything that might "tend to criminate himself."

The jury returned a verdict for the prisoner of not guilty, and he was discharged.

Case No. 15,231.

UNITED STATES v. GORDON.

[5 Blatchf. 18.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 8, 1861; Nov. 30, 1861.

CITIZENSHIP—SHIPPING—AMERICAN VESSEL—SLAVE TRADE—INDICTMENT—SENTENCE.

1. A person born abroad, on board of an American vessel, of parents who are citizens of the United States, and who are, at the time, in the foreign country, not with the design of removing thither, but only having touched there in the course of a voyage which the father has made, as captain of the vessel, is to be regarded as a citizen of the United States.

2. Where it appears that a vessel was built in the United States and belonged to American citizens, it is not enough, in order to show that she ceased to be an American vessel, to prove that she was taken abroad, and there sold and transferred by those American citizens, but it must also be shown that she was sold and transferred to a foreigner.

3. Where a vessel is shown to have been fitted out for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, her master, if he had control and charge of the vessel, in procuring the cargo, in stowing it and in shipping the seamen, is to be held chargeable, as matter of law, with a knowledge of the intended service of the vessel.

4. If such master conducts the vessel to Africa, remains in her, and starts to come back with her, she having there taken on board a cargo of slaves, such previous knowledge on the part of the master, is, on the trial of an indictment against him for engaging in the slave trade, to be taken into consideration by the jury, on the question as to the purpose for which he was found on the vessel, in Africa, when the slaves were put on board.

5. To sustain an indictment, under the 5th section of the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 601), for forcibly confining and detaining negroes on board of a vessel, with intent to make them slaves, it is not necessary to show that physical or manual force was exercised on board of the vessel, but it is enough if the negroes were under moral restraint and fear there, their wills being controlled by superior power exercised over their minds and bodies, it appearing that they were under restraint at the time by the persons who furnished them at the vessel's side and transferred them to the vessel, and that they came upon the deck of the vessel in that condition; and any person who participated in such sort of detention is to be regarded as a principal in the offence.

6. In such an indictment, it is sufficient to aver, that the defendant forcibly confined and detained the negroes, "they not having been held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States," without otherwise averring that they were not so held to service at the time of the commission of the offence.

7. An offence commenced to be committed on board of an American vessel lying at the time in a river which is an arm of the sea, on the coast of Africa, and continued uninterruptedly to a point in the Atlantic Ocean several miles from land, is within the jurisdiction of the United States and of a circuit court thereof.

8. Although a trial and conviction have been had for a capital offence before a circuit court when held by both of the judges thereof, it is competent for the same court, when held by only one of the judges, to pass the sentence.

This was an indictment against the defendant [Nathaniel Gordon], under the 5th section of the act of May 15, 1820 (3 Stat. 601), for forcibly confining and detaining, on the 8th of August, 1860, on waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and out of the limits of any state or district, on board of the ship Erie, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, a citizen or citizens of the United States, certain negroes, not having been held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negroes slaves, he being, at the time of the commission of the crime, one of the ship's company of the ship, and a citizen of the United States, and the Southern district of New York being the district in which he was apprehended and into which he was first brought. The trial took place before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge, and a jury.

E. Delafield Smith, Dist. Atty., for the United States.

Gilbert Dean, for defendant.

NELSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The 5th section of the act of May 15, 1820, under which the prisoner is indicted, provides, "that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining, on board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States," with intent to make him a slave, such person shall be adjudged a pirate, and, on conviction, shall suffer death. There are two counts in the indictment, to which we shall call your attention, and to which the observations that we shall make on the law of the case will be confined. The first count is, in substance, that the prisoner, one of the ship's company of the ship Erie, owned in whole or in part by American citizens, in the river Congo, did piratically, feloniously, and forcibly confine and detain eight hundred negroes on board, with intent to make them slaves. The third count is, that the prisoner, a citizen of the United States, one of the ship's company of the ship Erie, a foreign vessel, engaged in the slave trade, in the river Congo, did piratically and forcibly confine and detain eight hundred negroes on board such vessel, with intent to make them slaves. Under the statute which we have read to you, in order to make out the offence against the prisoner, it is necessary, on the part of the government, to prove, either that he is a citizen of the United States, or that the vessel on which he served, with which he was engaged in the slave trade, belonged, in whole or in part, to citizens of the United States. If the prisoner is a citizen of the United States, then the crime charged against him, of forcibly detaining these negroes, may be made out, if he was on board of a foreign vessel. But, if he was not a citizen of the United States, but a foreigner, then, in order to charge him with the crime, it must appear that it was committed upon an American vessel, or at least a vessel owned, in whole or in part, by citizens of the United States. Two questions, therefore, become material: First—Was the prisoner at the bar a citizen? Now, proof is given by two witnesses, that they knew both his father and his mother in Portland, Maine, before their marriage. They were both residents of that place. The witnesses also knew them after their marriage, in the same place, and knew the prisoner, the fruit of that marriage, when two or three years old. The question is, upon this testimony—Was the prisoner a native-born citizen, born in Portland or in the United States? It has been argued, by the counsel for the prisoner, that there is some evidence that the mother, after the marriage, was in the habit of going with her husband, who was a sea captain, upon foreign voyages; and it is insisted that, upon this state of facts, the prisoner may have been born abroad. Perhaps, the presumption being, upon the evidence, that he was born in Portland, a prima facie case being made out that he was born there, the burden would rest upon him, to show that he was born abroad. But we take it to be settled law, that, although he was born in a foreign country, yet if his father and mother were American citizens, and did not have the design of removing to the foreign country, but touched there in the course of a voyage which the father made as a sea captain, the child would still be regarded as an American citizen.

Next, gentlemen, as to the character of the vessel. Was she an American vessel, or owned, in whole or in part, by American citizens? It appears that she was built in the United States, and belonged to American citizens, and made a voyage from England to Havana; and, it is insisted that, after her arrival at Havana, she was sold and transferred by those American citizens. We have the account from Mr. Post, who owned three-fourths of her at the time of the sale. He states, that though he was not present at the time of the sale, yet one of the other part owners, Mr. Knudsen, was with the vessel as its master, and that he received from Havana, in March, 1860, the proceeds of the sale, and had no doubt that she had been sold and transferred. Perhaps, on this evidence, it would be difficult to deny that a sale and transfer was made of this vessel out of those American owners, so far at least as Mr. Post is concerned; and he says, also, that he accounted with the other part owners for their share of the price. The difficulty, in this part of the case, is, that it is not enough to show that the title to this vessel was conveyed by these American owners in March, 1860. That is not sufficient, because, before any change can be made in the character of a vessel, after it has been proved that she belonged to American owners, it must appear that the transfer was made to a foreigner. To whom this vessel was transferred, we have no evidence in the case. But, as I before said to you, gentlemen, it is not necessary, upon this branch of the case, that the prisoner should be a citizen, and, also, that the vessel should be an American vessel. It is sufficient, if either of these facts exists, for the commission of the crime charged in the indictment.

This brings us, gentlemen, to the merits of the case, and the question is, is the prisoner guilty or not, of forcibly confining or detaining the negroes on board of this vessel, in the Congo river, with the intent of making them slaves? This is the issue in the case, so far as the real merits are involved. Now, you have the evidence, on the part of the government, of Martin, Green, Alexander, and Hetelberg, four seamen on board of the Erie, who shipped in Havana, in April, 1860, a short time after this alleged sale and transfer. They have detailed to you the circumstances of their employment as seamen, the cargo with which the vessel was laden at that port—some 150 or more hogsheads of liquor, a number of barrels of pork and beef, bags of beans, barrels of bread and rice, and some 250 bundles of shooks, with a corresponding number of hoops, for the purpose of being subsequently manufactured into barrels or casks. Now, it may be material for you to inquire, in entering upon the consideration of this issue, whether this was a bona fide cargo, for lawful trade and commerce, or whether it was a cargo fitted out and intended to be used in the slave trade. The vessel was of some 500 tons. If this was a fitting out for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, and the prisoner at the bar had a knowledge of this intended service of the vessel, then that fact would accompany him to the Congo river, and will have its weight and its influence upon your minds, as to the connection that he had with the transaction that occurred there, in receiving these negroes on board and detaining them. It may undoubtedly be assumed, without any injustice, as a matter of law, the prisoner being the master of the vessel at the port of Havana, and for her voyage to the Congo river, that if this cargo was fitted out for that purpose, if it was a cargo not only proper for that purpose, but intended for that purpose, he, as master, who had the control and charge of the vessel in procuring the cargo, in stowing it, and in shipping the seamen, is chargeable with a knowledge of these facts. Now, these four witnesses, whom you have seen on the stand, have detailed the progress of the voyage from Havana to the Congo river, and the taking of these negroes on board, and the starting from the river on the return voyage to Havana. Their testimony has been so frequently referred to by counsel, and commented upon by them, that I shall not take up your time in going over it. The four concur in the account which they have given of the voyage. They state that, after they had been out some thirty days, and had discovered the provisions and freight on board, a suspicion arose, in the minds of the sailors, that the vessel might be intended for the slave trade, and that they disclosed this suspicion to the captain, assigning to him the reason and grounds of it. The captain, however, disclaimed any such purpose, rebuked the suspicion, and ordered them forward. They all concur in stating that, after the vessel arrived in the Congo river, and while the persons connected with her, and those who furnished the cargo of negroes, were engaged in putting the negroes on board, the captain continued in command of her, so far as they saw, and exercised the same control over the vessel, and her management, and the putting on board of these negroes, as he had previously exercised in the course of the voyage. They also state that, after the negroes were put on board, they were called aft, and were applied to for the purpose of ascertaining whether they would continue to serve as seamen on the return voyage, and were told that, if they would, they should be paid a dollar a head for every negro landed at Cuba. They also state, especially some of them, that the prisoner gave a direction for hoisting the anchor, and directed the course of the vessel when she came out of the river. These are the material facts which have been testified to by the witnesses for the prosecution. On the part of the prisoner, you have the testimony of the first and second mates, who, in all these respects, with, perhaps, one exception, contradict these four witnesses. They state that, after the arrival of the vessel and the discharge of the cargo, the prisoner no longer exercised any control over the management of the vessel, and the control of the vessel and her navigation were passed over to the hands of another person, first, to Mr. Hill, who died, and afterwards to Mr. Manuel, whom they regarded as the captain of the vessel; and that subsequently the prisoner had no management or control of her. One of them, the mate, I think, states that he was present when the seamen were applied to, with the view of ascertaining whether they would serve on the return voyage, and his statement differs from the account given by the seamen in this: He says, that the prisoner applied to the seamen, on behalf of the owners of the vessel, and that, as agent, or on behalf of the owners, holding a letter in his hand at the time, which purported to be an authority, he made this offer to them, for the purpose of engaging them. This is the only discrepancy, so far as regards that fact testified to by the seamen.

Now, as I before stated to you, if the prisoner at the bar, as master of this vessel, at Havana, had a knowledge that she was fitted out, equipped, and provisioned for a voyage to the Congo river, on the coast of Africa, for the purpose of engaging in the slave trade, then, in view of the fact of his entering upon that voyage, conducting the vessel to a foreign coast, remaining in her, and coming back with her, or starting to come back with her, before she was captured, this previous knowledge of the prisoner, and his engagement to navigate the vessel for that purpose, will have its influence as to the purpose for which he was found upon the vessel in the Congo river, at the time the negroes were put on board; and it is entitled to whatever weight you may think it deserves, in aiding or supporting the testimony of the four seamen, and will raise the question, for your consideration and decision, whether or not the transfer was a part of the original plan of carrying out this engagement of the vessel in the slave trade, and, if such, colorable and not bona fide. This, however, is a question for your consideration and determination.

Now, we have said that, in order to sustain the charge against the prisoner, it must appear that these negroes were "forcibly" confined and detained on board of that vessel, for the purpose of making them slaves—for the purpose of bringing them to Cuba, or elsewhere, to make them slaves. This word "forcibly," which is a material element in the crime charged, does not mean physical or manual force. Even the crime of robbery, in which force is a peculiar element of the crime, it being the taking violently the property of another from his person, need not be accompanied with or consist of actual force. Any conduct, on the part of the robber, putting the person deprived of his goods in bodily fear and terror, is equivalent to actual force. And so in this case. These negroes were collected at the place where they were put on board, in barracoons, and were there under restraint by the persons who furnished them at the ship's side. They were in bondage at the time, and under the control of those persons, who transferred them to the vessel. They came upon the deck of the vessel in that condition, and it would be strange, indeed, if it was made necessary by the law, that it should be shown that they made personal, physical resistance at the time, against being put on board and detained on board, under all these circumstances. It is sufficient that they were under moral restraint and fear—their wills controlled by this superior power exercised over their minds and bodies; and any person participating in that forcible detention, that sort of detention, is a principal, participating in the guilt of the offence.

Then, as to the intent of making them slaves. This, undoubtedly, is a question of fact for the jury. You must find it, but you can find it as an inference from the surrounding circumstances attending their being put on board and forcibly detained on board. If any other purpose, any lawful purpose, had been shown to you by the evidence in the case, undoubtedly it would have been pertinent and satisfactory for the purpose of rebutting such a presumption of intent. But, in the absence of any such evidence, it is for you to say whether the inference is warranted by the testimony.

These are all the observations that we deem it advisable to submit to you, but we will call back your minds to the material question, so that you may look into the case with intelligence and comprehend the real issue involved in the case, which is—Were these negroes, that were put on board of the Erie, in the Congo river, in August, 1860, forcibly detained or confined, with the intention of making them slaves, and did the prisoner, on board of that vessel, at the time, participate in that confinement and detention? If he did, he is guilty of this offence, under the statute. If he did not, he is innocent.

The jury found the defendant guilty. He subsequently made, before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and SHIPMAN, District Judge, a motion for an arrest of judgment and a motion for a new trial.

SHIPMAN, District Judge. We have carefully considered the point submitted to us, on the motions for an arrest of judgment and for a new trial, and the arguments of counsel thereon. In disposing of these motions, we do not deem it important to discuss any exceptions taken to the form of the indictment, except such as apply to the first and third counts, inasmuch as it was upon those two counts that we put the case to the jury. If either one of those counts is good, the indictment is sufficient to support the verdict.

The only objection taken to the form of the first and third counts is, that they do not aver, in the precise words of the statute, the condition of the negroes, as "not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States," at the time of the commission of the offence, the language of the indictment being, "not having been held to service, &c." It is argued that, if the defendant had been able to prove that they had been once held to service, at some time prior to the commission of the offence, this averment would have been negatived, and he would have been entitled to an acquittal. But this, we think, only proves that the language of the indictment, in this particular, is more comprehensive than was necessary. The indictment charges him with having forcibly confined and detained the negroes, they not having been held to service, &c., that is, not having been held to service at the time he so confined and detained them, or at any time previous. The fact that the terms of the averment are somewhat broader than those of the statute is not material, so long as they cover the offence described in the latter.

To the objection that there was no such proof that the vessel upon which the offence was committed, was "owned wholly, or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States," as would warrant a conviction on the first count, we cannot accede. The government proved that she was built in, and owned by citizens of, the United States. This fixed the national character of the vessel, and this character and ownership would be presumed to continue until they were shown to have been changed. To show such a change, the burden of proof was on the defendant. The evidence offered only tended to show that a sale was made of the vessel at Havana, but without showing to whom such sale was made. It is urged, by the defendant's counsel, that, inasmuch as the sale claimed to have been proved was made in a foreign country, the law will presume, until the contrary is shown, that it was made to foreigners. We think there is no foundation, in law or reason, upon which such a presumption can rest.

In support of that part of the indictment which charges that the defendant was an American citizen at the time of committing the offence, the government proved that his father and mother were residents of Portland, in the state of Maine, for many years, both before and after their marriage, and before the birth of the defendant, and while he was a small child. It also appeared, from the testimony of the same witnesses, that his father was a sea captain, and that sometimes his wife, the defendant's mother, accompanied him on his foreign voyages. The defendant's counsel claimed, that it appeared, from this evidence, that he might have been born abroad, and that, if he was, he was not a citizen of the United States, and, therefore, not amenable to those criminal laws of the United States which are limited in terms to its citizens. The court instructed the jury, however, that, even if the defendant was born during one of those voyages which the father made as a sea captain, without any intention of removing to, but merely touching at, foreign countries, he would still be regarded in law as an American citizen, although thus born abroad, provided his parents were American citizens. The defendant's counsel excepted to this part of the charge, on the ground that it did not lay down the correct rule of law applicable to children of American parents, born in foreign countries. Without here discussing the general principles of law applicable to that subject, it is a sufficient answer to the exception taken in this case, that the charge on this point, taken in connection with the facts in evidence to which it was to be applied, clearly referred to a possible birth of the defendant on board of his father's American vessel, while the latter was in a foreign country, in the course of the voyage. We are clearly of opinion, that there was no error in this part of the charge.

The only remaining objection that we deem it necessary to notice, is, that, if the Erie was a foreign vessel, even admitting the citizenship of Gordon, this court has not the jurisdiction to try him for an act committed on the river Congo, in the Portuguese dominions, and not on tide waters. There are two answers to this objection: First. There is no proof that the Erie was a foreign vessel, but the proof is clear and uncontradicted that she was an American vessel, owned by American citizens. Second. The allegation, in the indictment, that the offence was committed "in the river Congo, on the coast of Africa, on waters within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the United States, and within the jurisdiction of this court," is, we think, fully sustained by the proof. The proof is, that the negroes were taken on board in the Congo river, some distance from its mouth, but where it is several miles broad, and really an arm of the sea. The proof is clear and uncontradicted, that the offence of confining and detaining the negroes on board was continuous and uninterrupted, until her capture in the Atlantic Ocean, several miles from land. Of course, it was committed in the very mouth of the river, where its broad expanse is lost in the Atlantic, and where the jurisdiction of every nation, over its citizens or its ships, clearly extends. The other exceptions to these two counts and to the charge, are overruled Upon all these points, we are clearly of opinion, that there is no error in the indictment, and that none intervened on the trial, and that the jurisdiction of the court is beyond dispute. We are, therefore, constrained to deny the application for a certificate of division, which is asked for by the defendant, to enable him to carry the case to the supreme court. It is hardly necessary for me to add that these views are the result of consultation and are fully concurred in by Mr. Justice NELSON.

Sentence of death being about to be passed on the defendant by Judge SHIPMAN, holding the court alone, in the absence of Mr. Justice NELSON, it was objected by the counsel for the defendant, that this could not be done, because the trial had taken place before both of the judges. Judge SHIPMAN stated, that he and Mr. Justice NELSON had agreed, on consultation, that it was competent for the court, when held by only one of the judges, to pass the sentence.

UNITED STATES v. GORDON et al.

[1 Brock. 190.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. Nov. Term, 1811.

BOND—PENALTY—EMBARGO ACTS.

1. A statutory bond taken in a penalty greater than that prescribed by law, is void, whether the statute prescribes a specific sum as a penalty, or a standard by which that penalty is to be measured, so as to give a precise sum.

2. If, in the latter case, from the nature of things, the exact penalty could not be ascertained with absolute mathematical precision, and the variance should be so inconsiderable as to be entirely compatible with an honest difference of opinion, it would be a question for the jury to decide, whether, under such circumstances, the signature of the bond, without objection, by the obligor, would not import his assent to the estimate as the true value. But where the statute prescribed twice the value as the penalty, and the defendant pleaded that the bond was taken in more than thrice the value, and that it was obtained by constraint, and the plaintiffs demurred to the plea, thus admitting the allegations of the plea: the demurrer was properly overruled.

3. The plea was good, and the bond a nullity. This position, entirely sustainable as it is on general principles, must be especially true, in a case in which the person taking the bond would, in the event of forfeiture, be entitled, under the law, to half the penalty.

This was an action of debt, brought in the district court of the United States at Richmond, upon an embargo bond, executed by Salem Woodward, William Gordon, and John M. Shepherd, which bond was in the words and figures following, to wit: "Know all men by these presents, that we, Salem Woodward, master of the brigantine Essex of Newburyport, and owner, William Gordon, and John M. Shepherd, are held and firmly bound unto the United States of America, in the sum of $21,000, to be paid unto the said United States, for which payment well and truly to be made, we bind ourselves, &c. Sealed with our seals, and dated this 2d day of November 1808." "Whereas, the following goods, wares, and merchandise; that is to say, 800 barrels of flour, and 57 barrels of naval stores, as per manifest, now delivered to the collector of the customs of the district of Tappahannock, and intended to be transferred in the said vessel called the Essex, of Newburyport, burthen 108.13-95 tons, to the port of Newburyport, in the state of Massachusetts: Now, the condition of the above obligation is such, that if the abovementioned merchandise shall be relanded in the United States, at the port aforesaid, or at some other port of the United States, the dangers of the seas only excepted, the above obligation to be void, else to remain in full force and virtue." This suit was brought to recover the penalty of the above bond, which the plaintiffs claimed by reason of an alleged violation of the condition thereof. Process was issued on Gordon & Shepherd only, and the suit abated as to Woodward. The counsel for the defendants, craved oyer of the bond and condition, and pleaded several special pleas, to all of which the attorney for the United States demurred. The matter of defence contained in the plea, on which the judgment was rendered in the district court, was, that the bond was in a penalty "more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, mentioned in the recital and condition of the bond, to wit (embargo act of December 22, 1807, § 2 [2 Stat. 451], and supplementary embargo act of January 9, 1808, § 1. See 2 Story's Laws, 1071 [2 Stat. 453]), in the sum of $8,000 more than double the value thereof, and that the obligors were constrained to execute the said bond, by the refusal of the collector of the port of Tappahannock to clear, and permit the vessel and her cargo to depart from the port and district of Tappahannock, until the said bond was executed as aforesaid." To this plea the attorney for the United States demurred, and the defendants joined in demurrer. The district court overruled the demurrer, and gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiffs obtained a writ of error to this court.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. This cause comes on to be heard on several pleas, to which demurrers have been filed. One of these demurrers was overruled in the district court, and the first inquiry will be, whether this court concurs with that in the judgment on this demurrer. The plea states that the bond was given by constraint, in more than three times the value of the vessel and cargo, instead of double their value, the latter being the penalty prescribed by law, and the truth of this allegation is confessed by the demurrer. If the law had prescribed a penalty in $20,000, and the bond had been taken in a penalty of $30,000, all would admit that such bond could not be supported under the statute. I perceive no principle on which it can be maintained, that where the statute, instead of prescribing a precise sum as a penalty, prescribes a standard by which that penalty is to be measured, so as to give a precise sum, the officer can discard that standard, and substitute, in the place of it, his own will. Precedents for such a position may be searched for in vain, and such a proposition appears to me to be peculiarly unsustainable in a case, where the person, whose will is to be substituted in the place of the law, is to have half of the penalty. The attorney for the United States rests his argument, on this part of the case, on the difficulty of ascertaining precisely the value of a vessel and cargo, and on the honest difference of opinion which might prevail between different individuals on such a point. That there may be some difference of opinion on the question of value, will be readily conceded; and if the attorney ought to prove by this argument, that a bond ought not to be avoided in consequence of this variance, its weight would be acknowledged. This argument would be urged with irresistible force to a jury in a case where the penalty was objected to on grounds which admit its application. If, in the opinion of a witness, or a juryman, the estimate of the collector exceeded the real value so far only as was compatible with an honest difference of opinion, it would be for the jury to decide, whether in such a case, under all its circumstances, the signature of the bond without objection, might not be considered as an assent to the estimate or if this be inadmissible, as the real value. But by the demurrer, every thing of this kind is waived, and the fact is admitted that the penalty is not in the sum prescribed by law.

The estimate of the collector, it is said, must be conclusive. Had the law said so, the court could only have obeyed the law. But this is not its language. Instead of expressing its will in such a manner as to indicate an intention that the estimate of the collector shall be conclusive, the legislature has referred to a standard entirely distinct, and has, consequently, subjected his will to the control of the standard.

It is also contended, that the act is to be construed in like manner as if the words "at least" had been introduced; the effect of which would be, that the collector would have been at liberty to make a penalty, in which he was to participate, what he might please, provided it was not too small. But, certainly, this is a conjecture which neither the letter, nor the spirit of the law, would warrant. However determined the legislature might be on punishing offenders against the embargo laws, they never intended to surrender the right of regulating the extent of that punishment to their collectors. But it is said that a remedy for every oppression that might be practised by the collector is to be found in the power given to the secretary of the treasury to mitigate or remit penalties; and the court is reminded of its duty to give effect to the intention of the legislature, and not to employ itself on the policy of the law.

Nothing is more correct than this admonition. But how is the court to effect the intention of the legislature? Certainly not by inflicting a penalty of $30,000 in a case where the legislature has declared its intention to be, that the penalty should not exceed $20,000, nor by referring it to the secretary of the treasury to correct the judgment of the court, in a case in which it has transcended the law, because he has the power to remit a part where it has not exceeded the law. The discretion of the secretary may be exercised, in particular cases, where the court has rendered a judgment conformable to law, but this can never authorize the court to transcend the law, in order to give him an opportunity to display his clemency.

The judgment of the court is affirmed.

NOTE. It is apprehended, that this decision is not in conflict with that of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Speake v. U. S., 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 28; 3 Con. Rep. Sup. Ct. U. S. 244. That was an action of debt for $8,787, upon an embargo bond, dated April 14, 1808, taken by the collector of the port of Georgetown, conditioned to be void, if the brig Active should not proceed to any foreign port or place, and the cargo should be relanded in some port of the United States. The bond was executed by Speake, the master, and by Beverly and Ober, the owners of the cargo, in compliance with the provision of the first section of the act of January 9, 1808, cited above. The defendants pleaded various pleas, severally and jointly; to some of which there was a general demurrer and joinder. The circuit court for the District of Columbia, in which the action was brought, decided all the demurrers in favour of the United States, and the case was carried by writ of error to the supreme court. The second joint plea was as follows: "That the defendants ought not to be charged, &c., because they say, that the said writing obligatory was required and taken by one John Barnes," collector, &c., "by colour of his said office, and by pretence of an act of congress, &c., (the act of January 9, 1808), which said writing obligatory and the condition thereof were not taken by the said John Barnes, collector, &c., pursuant to the said act of congress, but contrary thereto in this, to wit: that the said writing obligatory was taken in a sum more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, in the condition of the said writing obligatory mentioned, by reason whereof the said writing obligatory became void and of no effect in law, and this the said defendants are ready to verify; wherefore, &c."

To this plea there was a general demurrer and joinder. Judge Story, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The second joint plea of the defendants alleges, that the bond was not taken pursuant to the act of congress, but contrary thereto, in this, that the bond was taken in a sum more than double the value of the vessel and cargo, whereby the bond became void. On demurrer to this plea and joinder in demurrer, the court below gave judgment for the United States; and we are of opinion, that the judgment so given ought to be affirmed. There is no allegation or pretence, that the bond was unduly obtained by the collector, colore officii, by fraud, oppression, or circumvention. It must, therefore, be taken to have been a voluntary bona fide bond. The value was a matter of uncertainty, and the ascertaining of that value was the joint act and duty of both parties. When once that value was ascertained and agreed to by the parties, and a bond executed in conformity to such agreement, the parties were estopped to deny that it was not the true value. If an issue had been taken upon the fact, the evidence on the face of the bond would have been conclusive to the jury; and, if so, it is not less conclusive upon demurrer. It would be dangerous in the extreme to admit the parties to avoid a sealed instrument by averring that there was an error in the value by an innocent mistake, or by accident, or by circumstances against which no human foresight could guard. A mistake of one dollar would be as fatal as of $10,000. Suppose the double value were underrated, could the United States avoid the bond, and thereby subject the parties to the penalties of the third section? Where the law provides that the penal sum of a bond shall be equal to the double value, and the parties voluntarily and without fraud assent to the insertion of a given sum, it is as much an estoppel as if the bond had specially recited that such sum was the double value."

The majority of the court affirmed the judgment of the court below. Marshall, Circuit Justice, said he was rather inclined to think that the plea was good, which stated that the bond was given for more than double the value of the vessel and cargo. If the bond was given for more than double that value, he thought it was void in law. He should not, however, have intimated his opinion on this point, if a dissenting opinion had not been given on another point in the cause, and his silence might have been construed into an assent to the entire opinion of the court, as it had been delivered.

In the above extract from the opinion of the court, Judge Story relies strongly upon the fact that the plea contained no allegation that the bond was obtained by the collector, by colour of his office, by fraud, circumvention, or oppression; from which it may be inferred that, had the plea contained such allegation, it would have been held good, and the demurrer overruled. But, in U. S. v. Gordon, above reported, the plea expressly charged, that the obligors were constrained to execute the bond, by the refusal of the collector, &c., to clear, and permit the vessel and her cargo to depart, &c., until the said bond was executed, &c. The United States carried the above reported case of U. S. v. Gordon to the supreme court of the United States, by another writ of error, but that court dismissed it for want of jurisdiction. 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 287.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Jan. Term, 1802.

SELLING LIQUOR WITHOUT LICENSE—INFORMATION.

1. In an information for selling spirituous liquors without license, it is not necessary to specify the kind of liquor, nor the person to whom sold.

2. All the acts of selling constitute one offence.

Information [against Robert Gordon] for selling spirituous liquors. Motion in arrest of judgment. 1st. Because the particular kind of liquor is not specified in the information. 2d. Because the person is not named to whom sold.

Mr. E. J. Lee, for defendant. The clause of the act of assembly upon which this prosecution is founded, is in the following words. Rev. Code, p. 212, § 4. "If any person, without such license, shall open a tavern, or sell by retail, wine, beer, cider, rum, or brandy, or other spirituous liquors, or a mixture thereof, to be drank in or at the place where it shall be sold, or in any booth, arbor, or stall, such offences shall be deemed a breach of good behavior, and he or she so offending, shall moreover forfeit and pay the sum of thirty dollars, to be applied towards lessening the county levy." By the fifth section, the offender, upon a second conviction, is to be imprisoned six months without bail or mainprise. Every selling is a distinct offence. If this was not the case, a conviction for the last selling would bar a prosecution for all the former offences. Rex v Robe, 2 Strange, 999; Davy v. Baker, 4 Burrows, 2471; Rex v. Mason, 2 Term R. 581; Style, 186.

Mr. Simms, on the same side. The information is not sufficiently certain to enable the defendant to meet the charge by counter evidence, or to plead it in bar of a subsequent prosecution. By the fifth section of the act, a higher penalty is annexed to a second offence, and in such case the indictment must state the prior conviction. A declaration, in trover as uncertain as this, would be bad (5 Bac. Abr. 272); a fortiori, an information, or an indictment. The court is bound, ex officio, to see that the information states sufficient to warrant a judgment. Rex v. Wheatly, 2 Burrows, 1127; 2 Ld. Raym. 1410; 2 Hawk. P. C. 332. The offence is alleged to have been committed on the 10th of August, 1798; and the information was not filed until April, 1800, more than twelve months after the offence committed, contrary to the act of assembly (Rev. Code, p. 113).

Mr. Mason, contra. The limitation of one year applies to the prosecution, not to the filing of a particular process. The presentment upon which the information was filed was within the year. The first step was the presentment, and that is the commencement of the prosecution. Rev. Code, p. 106, § 2. Circumstances which constitute the offence, must be set out. But where they are not of the essence of the offence, there, if set forth, they are only surplusage. Rex v. Horne, Cowp. 682. The words of the act are "spirituous liquors or a mixture thereof." It may be impossible for a man to say what kind of liquors constitute the mixture; and yet he may be certain that he is drinking spirituous liquors. Rex v. Gibbs, 1 Strange, 497. All the acts of selling spirituous liquors before conviction constitute but one offence Crepps v. Durden, Cowp. 640.

Motion overruled and judgment entered.

SELLING LIQUOR WITHOUT LICENSE.

Under the act of Virginia prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors without license, all the acts of selling before conviction constitute but one offence.

Indictment [against Robert Gordon] for retailing spirituous liquors. [For prior proceedings, see Case No. 15,233.] The judgment was arrested; because the indictment charged it as a second offence, before the defendant was convicted of a first; the court being of opinion that all selling before conviction constituted but one offence.

UNITED STATES v. The GORDON.

[N. Y. Times.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec. 14, 1862.

PRIZE—CAPTURE BY ARMY AND NAVY—THE BLOCKADE.

This vessel was captured in Beaufort at the same time as the Alliance. She was also of American build, owned by the same owners in this country, and transferred at the same time to the same English claimants, and entered the port of Beaufort seven days after the Alliance, having knowledge of the blockade, and was loaded there prior to Sept. 14, 1861, and documented for departure in substantially the same manner. She brought there from Liverpool 4,300 sacks of salt, and 112 tons of iron. The master, Jennings, knew the port was blockaded, but says the first blockading vessel he saw there was on Sept. 6 or 7. Most of her cargo was taken on board after that date. This master was put in command at Beaufort, after her former master, Gooding, left her. The steamer Nashville, coming in there, left a few days after the change, and Jennings says it was rumored that Gooding took command of the Nashville and went to sea in her, and he had not seen him since. One objection taken by the claimants was that at the time of the capture Beaufort was in the custody of the army of the United States, and a neutral vessel there was not subject to capture.

Mr. Upson and Mr. Andrews, for the United States and captors.

Mr. Edwards, for claimants.

HELD BY THE COURT: That the presumption from the fact is exceedingly cogent that the voyage was set on foot and prosecuted to its termination with full knowledge of the blockade and intent to invade it. No proof is found in the ship's papers or in the preparatory examinations repelling or displacing such presumption. That it is not shown that there was any co-operation between the land and naval forces in the arrest of this vessel on this occasion, nor any concert even in the proceedings leading to that end; nor does the army make claim to any interest in the capture. If the vessel and cargo were in delicto, and subject to condemnation for her acts, the claimants have no power to contest in the prize court the competency of the libelants alone to control the proceeds of the forfeiture. That Beaufort was an enemy port to the United States, and the acts of the vessel in going there and whilst in it were hostile to the United States, and impressed upon them the character of enemy property. That it is a legal cause of forfeiture for a neutral vessel to clothe herself in time of war with protective documents obtained from the enemy. That there is in these various particulars ample cause for condemnation of vessel and cargo. Decree accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. GORHAM.

[6 Blatchf. 530.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Aug. 11, 1869.

CLERK OF COURT—EXPENSES OF OFFICE.

Under the act of February 26, 1853 (10 Stat. 166), moneys paid by the clerk of a district court, during his clerkship, for expenses incurred by him, as clerk, for board and lodging at hotels, while attending, as clerk, at terms of the court held away from the place where he is required to keep his office, are not allowable to him as "necessary expenses of his office."

This suit was commenced in the district court [case unreported], and was removed into this court under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1821 (3 Stat. 643), on the ground that the judge of that court was so related to or connected with the defendant, as to make it improper for him to sit on the trial of the suit. The defendant [George Gorham] was the clerk of the district court, from June, 1861, to January, 1867. He was required to reside at Buffalo and keep his office there. The terms of the court were held at Albany, Utica, Auburn, Rochester, and Buffalo, and the clerk was required to attend at those terms. During his clerkship, the defendant paid out $577.25, for expenses incurred by him as such clerk, for board and lodging at hotels, while attending at terms of the court held away from Buffalo. In accounting to the government for the moneys received by him, as clerk, in excess of his maximum allowance, he withheld the $577.25. The government, in adjusting his account for services, as clerk, withheld $265.61 due to him for such services, and claimed that the defendant, as clerk, still owed to it $311.64. Under the act of January 25, 1828 (4 Stat. 246), the government withheld from the defendant the sum of $311.64, due to him for services rendered to the government as a United States commissioner. This suit was brought at the request of the defendant, made before he knew of the withholding by the government of the $311.64. The object of the suit was to recover the $311.64 claimed by the government to be due from the defendant, as clerk, and to determine the question, whether the defendant, as clerk, was entitled to be allowed that amount, so paid by him for board and lodging, as being "necessary expenses of his office," within the meaning of the act of February 26, 1853 (10 Stat. 166). The case was tried before the court, without a jury.

William Dorshemer, U. S. Dist. Atty.
George Gorham, in pro. per.

THE COURT (NELSON, Circuit Justice) held, that the expenses in question were not allowable, and directed a judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs.

UNITED STATES v. GORMAN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 550.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1835.

UNITED STATES DEBTORS—PRISON BOUNDS.

Debtors of the United States are not entitled to the benefit of the prison bounds in the District of Columbia.

Debt on a prison-bounds bond given to the United States in the penalty of $450, dated the 14th of June, 1830, and executed by Jacob Dixon, and the defendant [John B. Gorman], and another surety, with the following condition: "Whereas the above bound Jacob Dixon is confined in the prison of Washington county, and in the custody of the marshal of the District of Columbia, by virtue of a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, issued out of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county aforesaid, on a judgment rendered by the said court, for the sum of $200 fine, and $23.01 costs, at the suit of the United States aforesaid; and having prayed for liberty to walk out of prison and within the bounds thereof as fixed by law, which is granted to the said Jacob Dixon, he complying with the provisions of the statute in that case made and provided. Now, therefore, if the above bound Jacob Dixon shall continually keep, remain, and stay within the prison bounds aforesaid, that is, for the said county of Washington, as now marked or laid out, or as hereafter may be, from time to time, marked and laid out by order of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, in and for said county of Washington, and not depart therefrom until he the said Jacob Dixon shall, by due course of law, be finally discharged from the said prison and bounds, then the above obligation shall be void; otherwise to remain in full force and virtue in law." The declaration, after setting forth the bond and its condition, averred, as a breach thereof, that the said Jacob Dixon did not continually keep, &c., but departed therefrom, without being discharged in due course of law, whereby action hath accrued to the said United States, to demand and have of the said John B. Gorman, the said sum of $450, &c. To this declaration the defendant demurred generally.

Mr. Dandridge, for defendant, contended that every bond, given for ease and favor of a person in execution, is void, unless expressly authorized by law; and cited 1 Saund. 35, note; Thompson v. Bristow, Barnes, Notes Cas. 205; Vigers v. Aldrich, 4 Burrows, 2482; Da Costa v. Davis, 1 Bos. & P. 242; Blackburn v. Stupart, 2 East, 243; and Yates v. Van Rensselaer, 5 Johns. 363. By the 16th section of the insolvent act of March 3, 1803 (2 Stat. 237), (all the preceding sections having been occupied by provisions respecting insolvent debtors,) it is enacted: "That the said court may cause to be marked and laid out reasonable bounds of the prisons in the said district, to be recorded in the same court; and from time to time may renew, enlarge, or diminish the same; and every prisoner not committed for treason or felony, giving such security to keep within the said bounds as any judge of the said court shall approve, shall have liberty to walk therein, out of the prison, for the preservation of his health; and keeping continually within the said bounds, shall be adjudged in law a true prisoner." And by the seventeenth section it is enacted: "That the provisions of this act shall not be construed to extend to any debtor who is or shall be imprisoned at the suit of the United States." The defendant was a debtor who was imprisoned at the suit of the United States, and, therefore, was not entitled to any of the benefits of the act.

Mr. Key, contra, for the United States, contended that this bond is good as a voluntary bond, of which the defendant has had the benefit. U. S. v. Howell [Case No. 15,405]. But it is good, also, as a statutory bond, under the sixteenth section of the insolvent act. The seventeenth section refers only to the provisions respecting the surrender of the effects of insolvent debtors and the discharge of their persons from arrest and imprisonment on account of any debt contracted before their application for relief. And the reason why those provisions should not extend to debtors of the United States was, that congress, by the act of June 6, 1798 (1 Stat. 561), had made special provisions on the same subject; and it cannot be supposed that congress meant, by the seventeenth section of the insolvent act to deprive the debtors of the United States in this District of the benefit of the prison bounds, which they had expressly granted to all other debtors of the United States in civil actions by the act of January 6, 1800 (2 Stat. 4), and which, by the sixteenth section of the insolvent act, they had expressly given to all prisoners, except those committed for treason or felony. The words of the seventeenth section may be satisfied by applying them to the provisions of the act respecting the surrender of the property and the discharge of the person of debtors upon such surrender. And by that construction the incongruity will be avoided which would grant the privilege to all debtors of the United States excepting those residing in this District. And this is the construction which has been given to the insolvent act, in this respect, from the time of its enactment to the present moment. The consequence of a different construction would be, that prisoners committed for any crime, except treason and felony, would be entitled to the bounds, while simple debtors of the United States, instead of being committed for safe-keeping only, would be committed to the same close custody with condemned traitors and felons. The court had power to limit the bounds to the high brick walls surrounding the gaol. They have extended it further, but that cannot alter the construction of the act.

At November term, 1833. THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, contra,) ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant, upon the demurrer in this cause, and in twenty-four other suits on like prison-bounds bonds, given by persons who had been arrested on ca. sas. for fines for keeping public gaming-tables.

Case No. 15,237.

UNITED STATES v. GORMAN.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 574.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1835.

LOTTERIES—SELLING TICKETS—STATUTES—REPEAL.

The power, given to the corporation of Washington city, by its charter of 1820, "to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating" "vendors of lottery tickets;" and the power, given by the same section of the same charter "to restrain or prohibit" "lotteries," and the by-laws of January 4, 1827, and July 12, 1831, seem to have repealed the 2d section of the act of Maryland of 1792, c. 58 [2 Laws Md. 189], so far as it was in force in the city of Washington.

This was an indictment [against J. B. Gorman] under the 2d section of the Maryland law of 1792, c. 58, for offering to sell and actually selling a ticket in a lottery "not authorized by the legislature of the state of Maryland, nor by the congress of the United States, called the Delaware and South Carolina Consolidated Lottery," against the form of the statute, &c.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, contended that the charter of the city of Washington repealed the second section of the Maryland law of 1792, c. 58, adopted by the act of congress of the 27th February, 1801 (2 Stat. 103), concerning the District of Columbia, so far as it was applicable to the city of Washington.

By that section of the Maryland law, it is enacted, that if any person shall sell, or offer for sale, within that state, any ticket in any lottery not authorized by the legislature of that state, or by the congress of the United States, he shall forfeit for every such ticket sold, or offered for sale, £10 current money, to be recovered by bill of indictment.

By the seventh section of the charter of the city of Washington, power is given to the corporation "to provide for licensing, taxing, and regulating," "vendors of lottery tickets," and "to restrain or prohibit lotteries."

On the 4th of January, 1827, the corporation passed a by-law "to restrain and prohibit certain lotteries." The first section forbids private lotteries; the second prohibits the drawing of any lottery not authorized by act of congress, or of the corporation. The third section provides that no licensed vendor of lottery tickets, or other person, shall sell any ticket in any lottery not specially permitted and authorized by some law of some state or territory of the United States, or law of congress of the United States, or act of the corporation, under the penalty of the $50 for every offence, &c. The by-law of July 12, 1831, prohibits the exercise of the business of lottery-ticket vendor without license, for which $100 must be paid.

Mr. Jones cited Hawkins v. Cox [Case No. 6,243], in this court in June, 1819, and Thompson v. Milligan [Id. 13,969], in June term, 1820.

Mr. Key, contra. The charter of 1820 (section 7) has no negative words; it is all affirmative, and not inconsistent with the then existing law: both may stand together; both may prohibit the same thing under different penalties. The corporation has power to license and regulate vendors of lottery tickets; but only to restrain and prohibit, not license, lotteries. In the great lottery case of Clark v. Corporation of Washington [12 Wheat. (25 U. S.) 40], in the supreme court, it was admitted on all hands that the power given to the city did not repeal the law of Maryland. Congress might have repealed the law of Maryland, and might have given that power to the city; but the question is, have they given it, and whether the corporation has exercised it. Has congress given the city the power to license all sorts of lottery tickets? They could not mean to give the city the right to license the sale of illegal tickets, but only tickets vendible by law. There were tickets the sale of which was lawful. The same power is given over gaming, which this court has decided did not repeal the general law of the land against gaming, and that the power was cumulative, so that the party may be liable to the Maryland penalty and the city penalty both. If the corporation had the power to repeal the Maryland law, they have not yet exercised it. They have not said what tickets it should be lawful to sell. The corporation had only power to license and tax the business of a vendor of lottery tickets, not to authorize the sales of tickets the sale of which was prohibited by law. It is not like the case of tavern licenses, for in that case there was nothing left for the Maryland law to operate upon.

Mr. Jones, in reply. It is not necessary to contend that this charter repeals the Maryland law; the only question is whether the corporation has not the power to license the sales of such tickets in the city.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, not giving any opinion, as he wished to consider the several charters and by-laws, and the cases already decided by this court) stopped Mr. Jones, saying they were satisfied that the license of the corporation authorized the sale.

COUNTERFEITING—UTTERING—SCIENTER—POSSESSION OF COUNTERFEIT COIN AND NOTES.

1. In an indictment for passing counterfeit coin evidence of the possession of counterfeit bank notes is not admissible to prove the scienter.

2. But the possession of quantities of counterfeit coin of a different denomination from that laid in the indictment is admissible for such purposes.

This was a motion for a new trial, and was argued by Mr. Carnahan, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the government; and by Kopelin, Noon, Hampton & Swartzwelder, for the defendant.

McCANDLESS, District Judge. Satisfied with the verdict in this case, I do not feel disposed to disturb it, except upon substantial grounds. There is one point to which I have given much reflection, because it will be a precedent, and, if wrong, "many errors, by the same example, will creep" into this court. It is the admission in evidence of the fact that counterfeit bank notes were found in possession of the prisoner to prove the scienter; that is, that he knew the dimes he passed were counterfeit. The evidence was admitted, upon the authority of the text in Greenleaf, but the cases cited by the learned author do not sustain the position contended for by the government. As Lord Campbell says in 4 Eng. Law & Eq. 572: "It was evidence which went to show that the prisoner was a very bad man, and a likely person to commit such offences as that charged in the indictment; but, with regard to the scienter, it did not afford ground for a legitimate inference in respect of it." The possession of counterfeit bank bills does not necessarily show guilty knowledge of counterfeit coin. If the indictment was in the state court, and under the state laws, for passing counterfeit bank bills, the possession of other bank bills of a similar character would tend to prove the scienter. And so of coin. On an indictment in this court for passing counterfeit coin, the possession of other counterfeit coin, although of a different denomination, would go far to show guilty knowledge. Coin is money. Bank bills are the mere representatives of money, and a knowledge of the false character of one, does not imply a knowledge of the false character of the other. Holding the latter in common with the former may be suggestive of the occupation and purpose of the party; but counterfeiting the coin being a usurpation of one of the highest acts of sovereignty, and the "passing" being highly penal, no qualified evidence should be given to prove the guilty knowledge.

Although the court charged the jury that the proof upon this point was of little value, yet they may have been influenced by it, and the prisoner is entitled to the benefit of the reason assigned.

As to the other reasons, in the language of Chief Justice Gibson in the case of Rogers v. Walker, 6 Barr [6 Pa. St.] 375, "they form a reticulated web to catch the crumbs of the cause, and, as they contain no point or principle of particular importance which has not already been ruled by this court, they are dismissed without further remark." New trial granted.

Case No. 15,239.

UNITED STATES v. GOULD.

[8 Am. Law Reg. 525.]

District Court, S. D. Alabama. Spring Term, 1860.

SLAVE TRADE—POWER TO PROHIBIT—STATE SOVEREIGNTY—IMPORTATION OF NEGROES—INDICTMENT.

1. Congress has the constitutional power to prohibit the foreign slave trade.

2. That power is part of the power to regulate foreign commerce. It is commercial in its character, and has the same extent and application, and the same limits, as the power to regulate foreign commerce.

3. The several states have the general sovereign right to determine who may or who may not live within their limits, to fix the political and social status of each inhabitant, and to prescribe his rights and punish their violation within its limits

4. This portion of state sovereignty has not been wholly surrendered to the general government. It is surrendered only to the extent and for the purposes specified by the constitution. As respects negroes, imported as slaves, it is surrendered only so far as to allow the prohibition of such importation, and as a means to this, the removal of negroes unlawfully imported. The power to prescribe and to protect the rights of such negroes after the importation is entirely complete and ended, and they have become mingled with the mass of the population of a state, is exclusively in the state government.

5. It is settled, by repeated decisions of the supreme court, that the commercial power of the general government extends to and covers (exclusively of the interference of state laws,) the importation of either goods or persons, until the commercial transaction of importation is complete and ended, and no further. When the goods or persons imported pass out of the possession or control of the importer, his agents and employees, and become mingled with the mass of property or population of a state, they then become subject to the state jurisdiction and laws.

6. The laws of the United States prohibiting the foreign slave trade, are to be construed in reference to the mischief intended to be remedied, and to the nature, extent and limits of the constitutional power of congress over this subject.

7. The sole mischief intended to be remedied was the importation of negroes as slaves. It was not and is not, the manner in which either free negroes or slaves are regarded or treated in any state.

8. These laws extend to all persons who in any manner, directly or indirectly, participate, aid or abet, in the prohibited importation. They do not extend to offences committed in a state against the rights of a negro who had been previously unlawfully imported by some other person, after he has passed out of the possession or control of the importer and become mingled with the mass of the population of a state.

9. An indictment which only charges that the accused, within this state, did hold, sell, or otherwise dispose of, a negro or a slave, who had previously been unlawfully imported by some other persons, without alleging that the accused did participate, aid or abet, in the unlawful importation, is fatally defective.

10. The mode of procedure prescribed by the 7th section of the act of April 20, 1818, for enforcing the penalty for violating its provisions, is a qui tam action, and no other. Therefore an indictment does not lie under that section.

A. J. Requier, U. S. Dist. Atty.

George N. Stewart, Wm. Boyles, and Robert B. Armstead, for defendants.

JONES, District Judge. Mr. Gould is indicted under the 7th section of the act of congress of April 20, 1818 [3 Stat. 450], prohibiting the foreign slave trade. There are three counts in the indictment. The first count charges, "that Horatio N. Gould, late of said district, heretofore, to wit, on the first day of March, A. D eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, at Mobile county, to wit, in the district aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, a certain number, to wit, one female negro, whose name is to these jurors unknown, and who had, then and there, been lately unlawfully brought into the jurisdiction of the said United States, to wit, on the twentieth day of February, A. D. eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, at the county and district and within the jurisdiction aforesaid, in a manner and from a foreign place to these jurors unknown, by a certain number, to wit, one person, whose name is to these jurors unknown, did, then and there, to wit, at the time and place aforesaid, with force and arms, unlawfully and knowingly hold the said negro, so then and there unlawfully brought in as aforesaid, as a slave, for a certain time, to wit, for three days, contrary to the power of the statute in such cases made and provided," &c. The second and third counts are substantially like the first, except that the second count charges, that Gould did "sell" (instead of "hold";) and the third count charges that he did "dispose, otherwise than by selling her, of said negro," &c. The accused has demurred to each count in the indictment. This presents for decision the question whether this indictment charges in a legal and sufficient manner, an indictable offence against the laws of the United States. The objections urged against the indictment are: 1st. That it is too vague and uncertain, in this, that it does not state the name of the negro, or any description of her, except that it is a female, nor the names or description of a foreign place from which, or persons by whom, she is alleged to have been unlawfully brought in. 2d. That it does not show that Gould had any participation whatever in the importation of the negro; and that the law applies only to the importers, their agents or employees. 3d. That if the law was intended to apply to other persons than the importers, their agents or employees, it is to that extent unconstitutional.

Passing over the supposed want of sufficient certainty, in the description of the offence charged, I shall proceed at once to the more important question raised by the demurrer. It is conceded by the district attorney of the United States, that the indictment is under the 7th and not the 6th section of the act of 20th April, 1818, and that he does not charge, and does not expect to prove, that Mr. Gould in any manner participated in, or had any knowledge of the illegal importation. The charge then, when stripped of the legal phraseology of the indictment, is simply this, that Mr. Gould, without any participation in the illegal importation, did, within this district, hold, sell, or otherwise dispose of, as a slave, a negro who had been previously unlawfully imported by some other person. The material question is, whether this is, or is not, an indictable offence against the laws of the United States.

No case has been referred to in the argument, nor have I been able to find any case, in which this question has been decided by any court. It is a novel question, and recent events have rendered it one of much interest and importance. It has been the settled policy of our country, for more than fifty years, to prohibit, under severe penalties, the importation of slaves. The laws enacted to carry out this policy had the support and approval of the statesmen and people of all sections of our country. Within the last three or four years a few persons in the South have questioned the constitutional power of congress to pass these laws. Some others, admitting the power, have denied the policy of these laws, and earnestly urged their repeal. There have no doubt been some recent violations of these laws. The whole subject has been much discussed, and most men must have formed some opinion upon it. For my own part I have examined the subject very carefully. The result of that examination is a thorough and clear conviction that congress has the constitutional power to prohibit the importation of slaves; that it is wise, just and politic to prohibit it, and that the laws prohibiting it ought not to be repealed, but ought to be maintained, respected, and strictly enforced. As there are several similar cases pending in this court for the Middle district of Alabama, and this is the first which has been brought before me for decision, I think it due to the importance of the question, and to the parties interested in it, that the reason and extent of my decision should be stated as clearly as possible. This is the more proper, because (much to my regret) there is no appeal in such cases to any higher tribunal. Knowing that if I commit an error in deciding this question, it cannot be corrected. I have examined it carefully, and reflected on it maturely. If my opinion is erroneous, it is an error of judgment alone.

The proper determination of this question necessarily requires an examination of the nature and extent of the constitutional power of congress over this subject, and a construction of the acts of congress upon it. In construing both the constitution and statutes, the great object is to ascertain what was the true meaning and intention of those who framed them. The words of a statute are the principal, but not the only means of determining the meaning and intention of the legislature. There are many well settled rules and principles of construction of statutes resorted to by the courts to aid in arriving at the true intention. Two of the rules of construction I shall state and use in this case. The first is to consider the mischief intended to be remedied. The second is, never to give a statute such a construction as would render it unconstitutional, if it will possibly admit of any other construction which would make it consistent with the constitution. We will first inquire: What was the mischief intended to be remedied by the convention which framed the constitution, and by congress in passing this law? It is well known from the debates of the convention, and the contemporaneous history of the times, that the framers of the constitution considered the foreign slave trade as a great evil, which ought to be suppressed. That was the mischief which had been the subject of complaint, and which they designed to remedy. Nobody had complained of the manner in which free negroes were regarded and treated, in any of the states. That was never thought of by the convention. The same remark is equally applicable to congress, which passed these laws. The mischief which both the convention and congress intended to remedy, was, unquestionably, the foreign slave trade, and nothing else. This proposition I think too clear to admit of dispute, but as I considered it very important, I will refer to two instances, to show, not only that it has been recognized, but how it has been practically applied by the executive branch of our government, in the construction and execution of these laws. I refer to two official opinions given by Mr. Wirt, as attorney-general. They are not indeed binding authorities on the courts, but from his known ability as a lawyer, his official opinions, adopted and acted on by the government, are certainly entitled to much respect. The first section of the act of 20th April, 1818, provides that "it shall not be lawful to import or bring, in any manner whatever, into the United States from any foreign place, &c., any negro, &c. with intent to hold, &c., any such negro, &c., as a slave, or to be held to service or labor; and any ship, &c., employed in any importation as aforesaid, shall be liable to seizure, &c." In 1821 a Mr. McFarlane, brought into New York, from the Island of Tobago, (a foreign place,) on the schooner Sally, a negro boy, who was free in Tobago. The negro boy came voluntarily, and with the consent of his mother, as the servant of Mr. McFarlane. This was done with the knowledge of the captain of the schooner. The collector of the port of New York considered this a violation of the law, and seized the schooner. The case was reported to the secretary of the treasury, who referred it to Mr. Wirt, as attorney-general, for his opinion. It is manifest that the case came within the letter of the law. A negro was brought into the United States from a foreign place with intent to hold him to service or labor. It is equally clear that the case did not come within the mischief which the law was made to remedy. Mr. Wirt gave it as his opinion that this was not a violation of the law. 5 Op. Atty. Gen. 736. Soon afterwards a somewhat similar case was referred by the president to the attorney-general. The wife and children of Mr. Fayoll, of Charleston, embarked for France in 1820, taking with them as a servant a negro girl slave, belonging to Mr. Fayoll, intending to return in 1822. Mr. Fayoll wished the negro to return to the United States with his family. The question submitted was, whether this would be a violation of the law. It was a case where a negro would be brought into the United States from a foreign country, with intent to hold the negro as a slave. It was clearly within the letter of the law, and Mr. Wirt seems to have been conscious of this. He says, however: "I am of opinion that the case is not within the meaning of the law; that the legislature were not looking to the case of persons going abroad on a visit, or to sojourn for a short time, and taking a servant with them from the United States, which they were desirous of bringing back with them; that this was not at all the mischief which congress had in view; that they meant not to prohibit the return of a body servant with his master or mistress, but an original importation or bringing in to increase the stock of slaves in the United States." And he accordingly gave it as his opinion that the negro might be brought back without the violation of any law of the United States. 1 Op. Atty. Gen. 503. This opinion of Mr. Wirt was afterwards fully sustained by the decision of the supreme court of the United States in the case of U. S. v. Skiddy, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 73, in which the precise point was presented, and decided in accordance with Mr. Wirt's opinion. See also to the same point U. S. v. The Ohio [Case No. 15,914]. In construing the constitution and statutes on this subject we will be greatly aided by constantly bearing in mind that the foreign slave trade was the sole mischief which was intended to be remedied.

There are other principles of construction applicable to the constitution, which are now so well settled that they may properly be called political and legal maxims. The general government is a special and limited government. It has no other sovereign powers than those conferred upon it by the constitution. On the contrary, the several states are original sovereignties. Each state has all the rights and powers, usually appertaining to a sovereign state, except such as it has, by the constitution, conferred upon the general government. Among the rights and powers usually appertaining to every sovereign state, are, the power to determine who may or may not come into its territories from other countries, to fix and determine the social and political relations, in which all its inhabitants shall stand to each other, or in other words, the social and political status of every inhabitant; to determine the personal rights of every one within its borders, and to protect those rights and punish their violation. These principles are asserted and established by the supreme court in the case of City of New York v. Miln, 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 102. That the states have entirely surrendered all these sovereign powers to the general government has never been contended by the most latitudinarian construers of the constitution. Let us inquire to what extent these powers have been surrendered to the general government, so far as they apply to the slave trade.

It is well known that the regulation of foreign commerce was one of the principal inducements for the formation and adoption of the constitution. The African slave trade was then, and had long been, an extensive and lawful branch of the foreign commerce of our country. Some of the states at that time permitted and some had prohibited the importation of slaves. The question, whether the power to control or prohibit that trade should be given to the general government or not, was one of much difficulty, and was maturely considered by the convention. The result was, that by the constitution the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations," was given to congress in general and comprehensive terms. But in respect to the foreign slave trade, a special and particular provision was inserted in these words: "Sec. 9. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person." It is very plain, that the object and effect of this special clause are to define and limit the previous general grant of power over foreign commerce. The definition is, that congress, as to this particular branch of foreign commerce, shall have power to prohibit it; and the limitations are, that this prohibitory power shall not be exercised prior to the year 1808, and the duty imposed shall not exceed ten dollars for each person. The language of the constitution seems to me too clear to admit of a reasonable doubt, or to require reasoning or authorities to show its meaning. If such authorities were needed, the whole contemporaneous history of the country, the reported proceedings and debates of the convention and of the state conventions which adopted the constitution, and of the subsequent action of every department of the government from that time to this, all concur in showing that such was the true intent and meaning of that part of the constitution. I have no doubt or hesitation, therefore, in holding that congress has the constitutional power to prohibit the foreign slave trade, and to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution that power. I think it equally clear, from the nature of the subject, and the manner in which it is introduced and expressed in the constitution, that this power is part of the power conferred upon congress over foreign commerce. It was so considered in the debates of congress on the act of 1807 [2 Stat. 426], and by the supreme court in the case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 1, and in The Passenger Cases, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 283. See, also, 2 Story, Const. § 1337. In its nature, then, this power is commercial in its character. Having now ascertained what was the mischief intended to be remedied—that is, the foreign slave trade—and the nature of the power conferred upon congress on this subject—that is, that it is part of the commercial power—we will next proceed to enquire into the extent and limit of this power. In doing so I shall endeavor to follow what seem to me the clearest and safest precedents, afforded by our political and judicial records.

The first precedent to which I shall refer is, the old alien law passed in 1798 [1 Stat. 570], during the federal administration of the elder Adams. That law authorized the president, under certain circumstances, to remove aliens out of the country. It was strongly denounced by Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Madison, and all the statesmen of the state rights school of that day, as unconstitutional—a palpable usurpation of power by the general government—and a dangerous encroachment on the rights of the states. Why was it considered unconstitutional? Obviously, because it was an original inherent sovereign right of each state to determine who might or who might not live within its limits, and that power had not been surrendered to the general government. An alien in a state was under the jurisdiction, control and protection of that state. It was for the state to determine whether he might or might not remain within its limits, to prescribe his rights, and punish any violation of them. The alien law was an infringement on these rights of the states, and therefore unconstitutional. It is true, that the unconstitutionality of that law was never passed upon judicially by any court, so far as I can find; but it was most effectually passed upon by the people in the presidential election of 1800. They passed upon its authors a most righteous judgment of condemnation. Nearly sixty years have elapsed since the rendition of that judgment, and it never has been, and I trust never will be, reversed. What principle did it involve and settle? It was this, that the power to determine whether an alien might or might not live in the state, and to prescribe and protect the rights and fix the status of an alien, resident in a state, belonged to the state, and not to the general government; and the power to punish any violation of his rights, as a necessary consequence, belongs also to the state. This principle seems to me clearly applicable to the case now under consideration. When a negro is unlawfully imported, though the importer may intend him as a slave, the law considers and makes him a free man, by expressly providing that no person can ever acquire a legal title to him as property. The law also properly provides for his removal out of the country as one of the means necessary and proper to carry out the execution of the power to prohibit importation. So long as he remains in the possession, or under the control of the importer, or his agents or employees, he is under the power of the general government and its laws. But when the commercial act of importation is entirely complete and ended, and he has passed out of the possession or control of the importer or his agents or employees, and has been mingled with the mass of the population in a state, he is a free negro alien, resident in the state, and like any other free negro in the state, his status, his rights, and his remedies for injuries, are subjects of state jurisdiction and regulation; except (as has been stated) that the general government may remove him out of the country. While he remains here, however, he is subject to the state laws, and his rights are regulated and protected by them. Alabama has not neglected her duty in this respect. Her laws most amply provide for the protection of his freedom. If any person, knowing him to be free, should buy or sell him as a slave, such person would be subject to ten years imprisonment in the penitentiary, under section 3102 of the Code of Alabama.

The next precedent to which I shall refer is the case of Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 419, decided by the supreme court of the United States in 1827, after great consideration. This case, like the one before me, depended upon the extent and limit of the power over foreign commerce, granted by the constitution to the general government. Congress had passed laws laying duties on goods imported. The legislature of Maryland passed an act requiring every importer of goods into Maryland to pay a license tax of fifty dollars to the state, before he could sell the goods, though he had paid the duties upon them. The constitutionality of this Maryland act was questioned, on the ground that congress had exclusive power over foreign commerce, and the state could not, directly or indirectly, lay any tax on the importation. It was held by the supreme court, that while the imported article remained the property of the importer, in his warehouse in the form or package in which it was imported, it was not subject to state taxation; but when it has passed out of the possession of the importer, and become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it loses its distinctive character of an import, and becomes subject to the taxing power of the state. The same principle was again laid down by the supreme court in The License Cases (1847) 5 How. [46 U. S.] 504. In these cases the laws of New Hampshire, Massachusetts and Rhode Island, imposing a state license tax on the sale of spirituous liquors, under certain quantities, by the importer, were held to be constitutional. These two cases define, with much clearness, the extent and limits of the power of congress as to goods imported. Does not the same principle apply to persons brought into the United States from foreign countries? It was so held by the supreme court, in The Passenger Cases, 7 How. [48 U. S.] 283–573. The legislatures of New York and Massachusetts each passed acts laying a tax on passengers brought into any port of these states from a foreign country. The constitutionality of these acts was questioned, on the ground that the bringing in of emigrants is a branch of foreign commerce, exclusively under the control of the federal government. Several cases, arising under these acts, were taken up to the supreme court. The cases were ably and elaborately argued and re-argued at four different terms of the court, by some of the ablest lawyers in America. The judges of the supreme court were divided in opinion upon the question. Five of them, McLean, Wayne, Catron, Grier and McKinley, held the state laws to be unconstitutional; and four of them, Taney, Woodbury, Daniel and Nelson, held them to be constitutional. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering his opinion, after a course of very able reasoning, says: "I think it, therefore, to be very clear, both upon principle and the authority of adjudged cases, that the several states have a right to remove from among their people, and to prevent from entering, any person or class or description of persons whom it may deem dangerous or injurious to the interests and the welfare of its citizens; and that the state has the exclusive right to determine, in its sound discretion, whether the danger does or does not exist, free from the control of the general government." [Passenger Cases] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 467.

Judge McLean, one of the majority, said: "When the merchandise is taken from the ship, and becomes mingled with the property of the people of the state, like other property it is subject to the local law; but until this shall take place, the merchandise is an import, and is not subject to the taxing power of the state, and the same rule applies to passengers. When they leave the ship, and mingle with the citizens of the state, they become subject to its laws." [Passenger Cases] 7 How. [48 U. S.] 405. This case shows, then, that in this respect, the same principle applies to the importation of both goods and persons; that is, that until the commercial transaction of importation is complete and ended, they are subject to the commercial power and laws of the United States; but when the commercial transaction of importation is complete and ended, and the goods become mingled with the property, and the persons with the people of a state, they both then become subject to the state jurisdiction and state laws. It obviously makes no difference that the persons are negroes, and intended by the importer as slaves. Whether they are to be considered as slaves or free, as chattels or persons, the same principle applies to them. The cases referred to show the extent and limit of this power over foreign commerce. It covers and extends to the whole commercial transaction of importation; and, in respect to negroes unlawfully imported as slaves, to their removal out of the country. This is its extent and its limit. In my opinion, it never was the intention of the framers of the constitution, that the several states should surrender to the general government this power to fix the status, prescribe the rights and provide for the protection of free negroes, or any other inhabitants of a state. Suppose that a negro, unlawfully imported, is residing in Alabama, either as a free man, or wrongfully held as a slave, and that any person should beat, maim or murder such a negro in Alabama, what law would be violated, and under what law could the offender be tried and punished? Most unquestionably the state law. So, too, if he is wrongfully deprived of his freedom, it is the state law which is violated, and the state law under which the offender is to be punished. Such an offence has no connection with, or relation to foreign commerce, and is entirely without and beyond the power given to congress over any branch of foreign commerce.

Looking, then, to the mischief intended to be remedied, and to the nature, extent and limits of the constitutional grant of power over this subject, I think the proper construction of the law is, that it embraces and provides for the punishment of every person who, in any manner, directly or indirectly, participates, aids or abets in the importation of negroes as slaves. The capitalist who furnishes the money—the agents who build, charter or fit out a slave ship—the officers and crew who navigate it—those who procure the cargo, or who receive the negroes when landed, or carry them into the interior, or hold, sell, or otherwise dispose of them there, for the importer—are all participants in the unlawful importation, and guilty of an offence against the constitutional laws of the United States, and punishable under those laws. But after such a negro has passed out of the possession or control of the importer and his agents and employees, and has become mingled with the inhabitants of Alabama, if any person beats, murders, or otherwise criminally violates his rights, in this state, the offender is liable to indictment under the state law, and before the state tribunals alone. Whilst, as judge of this court, I shall always be ready and willing to maintain and enforce this, and all other constitutional powers and laws of the general government, it is equally my duty not to go beyond the limits of the constitution, or to encroach, in the slightest degree, upon the rights and jurisdictions of the states.

Under the construction which I give to the law, the indictment in this case is not maintainable. It does not allege that the accused had any connection whatever with the unlawful importation; nor does it allege any facts from which this could be legally inferred. It simply alleges that the accused knowingly held, as a slave, in Alabama, a negro, who had previously been unlawfully imported, by some other unknown person. This, I think, is not an indictable offence under the laws of the United States.

It is contended for the prosecution, that the 6th section of the act of 20th April, 1818, provides for the punishment of the importer, his agents and employees; and that the 7th section (under which this indictment is found) creates a separate and distinct offence, and was intended to embrace the case of a person who, without any participation in the unlawful importation, afterwards holds the negro as a slave. I concur with the district attorney, in thinking that the 7th section intended to create a separate and distinct offence from that created by the 6th section. It would be very unreasonable, if not absurd, to suppose that congress, after creating an offence by the 6th section, and providing that it should be punished by a forfeiture, not exceeding $10,000 and not less than $1,000, and imprisonment for not less than three nor more than seven years, immediately added another section, providing that the same offence should be punishable by a forfeiture of only $1,000. No doubt a different offence was created by the 7th section, but I do not think the difference is that supposed by the district attorney. By comparing the act of 1818 with the previous act of 21st March, 1807, on the same subject, and bearing in mind the state of things existing when each of these acts was passed, I think the real difference is apparent enough, though from the mere omission of a comma, it is not so clearly expressed in the act of 1818 as in that of 1807. At both of these periods slavery existed in Florida and Mexico, then belonging to Spain, and immediately adjoining the United States. Slaves might be brought into the United States from Africa or from Florida or Mexico. Congress manifestly considered that the person who seized a negro in Africa, and brought him to the United States, was guilty of a much greater offence than one who, living in the United States, near the Florida or Mexican line, should buy a slave from his neighbor in Florida or Mexico, and bring him into the United States. The fifth section ot the act of 1807 plainly refers to the first class of offenders, and the 6th section of that act, I think, refers to the latter class of offenders, and provides a milder punishment. The 7th section of the act of 1818 is obviously taken, almost verbatim, from the 6th section of the act of 1807, and, I think, was intended to apply only to the same class of offences. I can see no other sensible meaning and effect that can be given to the qualifying words, "immediately adjoining to the United States," used in each of those sections, and which are not used in the 6th section of the act of 1818. A comma is placed before these qualifying words where they occur in the act of 1807. Thus, "from any foreign kingdom, place or country, or from the dominions of any foreign state, immediately adjoining to the United States," etc.—thus making the words "immediately adjoining to the United States," apply to and qualify the words "foreign kingdom, place or country," as well as the words, "dominion of any foreign state." The very same words are used in the 7th section of the act 1818, omitting the comma between the words "state" and "immediately." This omission of the comma was, I presume, from an inadvertence of the writer, or a mistake of the printer. I cannot believe it was done purposely to change the character and extent of the offence. My construction of these sections of the act of 1818 is, that the 6th section was intended to apply to those who bring in negroes, as slaves from Africa, or other foreign countries, not immediately adjoining the United States. The 7th section was intended to apply to those who brought them in from Florida or Mexico. This, I think, is the difference between them as to the character of the offence. This construction brings the whole law within the constitutional limits of the power of congress. But even if this construction of the law is not correct, and that contended for by the district attorney is correct, still the indictment cannot be sustained under the 7th section. The offence created by it is not a common law offence. It is purely a statutory offence, created by that section of the act.

It is an established rule of criminal law, that if a statute creates an offence, and by the same clause prescribes a particular mode of proceeding, otherwise than by indictment, to enforce the penalty, the mode of procedure prescribed by the statute must be followed and an indictment cannot be maintained. Whart. Am. Cr. Law, § 10; 2 Burrows, 805; 1 Archb. Cr. Prac. & Pl. 2; 6 Humph. 17; 7 Spear, 305; 12 Ill. 235; 3 Ala. 375. The penalty prescribed by the seventh section for a violation of its provisions, is a forfeiture of one thousand dollars for each negro, "one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who may sue for such forfeiture, and prosecute the same to effect." The mode of procedure thus prescribed, for imposing the penalty, is not by indictment, or any other criminal procedure, but a civil suit, well known as a qui tam action. Upon this ground, also, the indictment cannot be supported.

It is unnecessary to examine the other more technical objections to the indictment. For the reasons stated, the demurrer to the indictment is sustained, and there must be a judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 15,240.

UNITED STATES v. GOURE.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 488.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1834.

RESISTING OFFICER — ARREST WITHOUT WARRANT — OFFICIAL DUTY.

A constable is not in the discharge of his official duty when searching for a man, (who is represented to him as, and whom he believes to be, a loose and disorderly person without visible means of livelihood, a night-walker and frequenter of bawdy-houses, and a keeper of false keys,) with intent to arrest him without a warrant, and carry him before a justice of the peace to be dealt with according to law; and it is not an indictable offence to threaten to kill the constable if he should attempt to arrest him.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The defendant [John Goure] was convicted upon the following indictment: "District of Columbia, Washington County, to wit: The jurors of the United States for the county aforesaid upon their oath present: That Richard R. Burr and Lambert S. Beck, being constables of the county aforesaid duly appointed and qualified, and acting in their said office as conservators of the peace of said county, upon information duly and lawfully to them made and given, that a certain John Goure, late of Washington county, yeoman, was a loose and disorderly person without any visible means of livelihood, a night-walker and frequenter of bawdy-houses, and a keeper of false keys, and knowing and believing the said information to be true, did thereupon, in the discharge of the duties of their said office, on the 13th of December, 1834, at the county aforesaid, proceed to search for the said John Goure, in order to arrest him by virtue of their said office and take him before a justice of the peace of said county to be dealt with according to law. And the said John Goure, well knowing the premises, and being such loose and disorderly person without any visible means of livelihood, and a night-walker, and frequenter of bawdy-houses, and a keeper of false keys, as aforesaid, and as such well knowing that he was liable to arrest as aforesaid, to be dealt with according to law; and intending to intimidate the said Burr and Beck, and to prevent them from the discharge of their duty as aforesaid, and to hinder and obstruct them in the discharge of their said duty in searching for and arresting said Goure, on the day and year aforesaid, with force and arms at the county aforesaid, did threaten to kill the said Burr and the said Beck if they should attempt to discharge their said duty in searching for and arresting the said Goure; to the disturbance of the peace, and the obstruction of public justice, and against the peace and government of the United States."

Mr. Bryce and Mr. Brent, moved in arrest of judgment, and contended that the constables were not in the discharge of their official duty in searching for a supposed offender without a warrant; and cited 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 12, § 18; Id. c. 13, § 7; 4 Bl. Comm. c. 10, § 3; 1 Burn. J. P. 103; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 14, 20–22, 24.

Mr. Bradley, for the United States, cited the Maryland law of 1715, c. 15, § 1 [1 Dorsey's Laws Md. p. 8], for the oath of a constable; and the by-law of the corporation of Washington (Rothwell, 64).

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra, and CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting,) arrested the judgment, the officers not appearing to be in the discharge of their official duty in searching for the man to arrest him without a warrant.

Case No. 15,241.

UNITED STATES v. GOURLAY.

[2 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 102.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Sept., 1823.

FEDERAL COURTS—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION—MURDER ON AMERICAN SHIP IN BAY OF CADIZ.

Quære, whether a United States court has jurisdiction to try a person who committed murder on board an American merchant ship in the Bay of Cadiz.

Dist. Atty. Tillotson and Mr Haines, for the United States.

Van Wyck, Baldwin, Scott & Blunt, for prisoner.

On Friday, the 10th of September, at 9 o'clock in the morning, commenced the trial upon an indictment found at the present term of the court against William Gourlay, for murder. The following jurors were examined and sworn, viz.: Calvin W. Howe, William Finch, Daniel Oakley, John S. Bradford, Nathaniel Rathbone, Smith Lane, Daniel Barnard, Samuel Maverick, Samuel Dixon, Dennison Wood, Lyman Fitch, and John Reid. The indictment was read, consisting of three counts, of which the first charged the offence to have been committed in a bay, the second in a haven, and the third on the high seas, near Cadiz, in the kingdom of Spain.

Mr. Tillotson opened the case for the United States, and observed that he deemed it proper to state explicitly, not only the facts and circumstances attending the offence which was charged, but also the law by which those facts were to be governed. In civil cases, questions of law were referred to the court; but in criminal trials the jury were made the judges as well of the law as of the facts. In this case, the grand jury had charged the prisoner with wilful murder; and if the fact of the killing be proved by the United States upon the prisoner, the law would presume it to have been done with malice. It would then rest upon the accused to produce such circumstances of mitigation as would reduce the crime from the highest grade of homicide. He should expect, in order to substantiate the charge, to show: 1st. The killing; 2nd. That it was done by the prisoner; and 3rdly. The facts, as he understood, were briefly these:

That on the 14th of June last, the ship Canton was lying in the Bay of Cadiz, in an open roadstead, where the sea was flowing in, on board of which the offence charged was perpetrated by the prisoner upon William Jones. The Canton was an American ship, of which the master was then on shore; the prisoner the first, and the deceased the second mate. In the afternoon of that day a quarrel had been sought, authority oppressively exercised, and a blow given by the prisoner. At the close of the evening, Jones went into the berth assigned him by the captain, which was in a single stateroom, the berths being placed the one over the other. Gourlay came down, and ordered Jones out of his berth. The latter refused, when Gourlay pulled off the clothes, and left him naked. Jones then jumped out, a struggle ensued which continued until they got out of the stateroom into the main cabin. Gourlay then cried "Murder!" and an indentation appeared from Jones' teeth. Jones, it would be proved, was about 21 years of age, a humble, tranquil, feeble young man; whilst the prisoner, as the jury would observe, was stout and athletic. After they had been disengaged from the struggle, Gourlay looked steadfastly for some time at the deceased, and then said, "By God! I'll shoot you," stepped back into his room, took his pistol, levelled it, and shot him dead on the spot. These were the facts, as Mr. Tillotson was advised, and he presumed no effort would be made to reduce the grade of the crime below that of manslaughter. Mr. Tillotson then cited various authorities to show from the cases found in the books that the present was not a case of manslaughter, but of murder. Among them were 1 East, 233; Notes to Chit. Cr. Law, and 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 730. The prisoner was indicted under the 8th section of the act of congress entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," passed April 30, 1790 [1 Stat. 112]. That section declares: "That if any person or persons shall commit, upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offence, which, if committed within the body of a county, would, by the laws of the United States, be punishable with death * * * being thereof convicted, shall suffer death." Should the jury, on the question of jurisdiction, entertain doubts whether the United States intended to punish murder in cases like the present, he presumed the jury would find the facts specially, so that the question might be revised and finally determined by the supreme court of the United States. Such a course would be decorous and correct, and it would be peculiarly proper, inasmuch as a general verdict (the jury being judges both of the law and the fact) would be conclusive, and could never be revised.

Captain Charles M'Cauley was sworn on the part of the prosecution. He commanded the ship Canton on the 14th of June, but was absent on shore at the time the affray happened. The ship lay about a mile from the molehead in Cadiz, and about two and a half miles from Fort Catalina, on the opposite side, which is fortified and now occupied by the French. It was far in from the chops of the harbour. It is about seven and a half miles from Rota to Cadiz, and about three miles from Fort Catalina to the Fort Escaronada (towards Rota), opposite Cadiz. The water is about five or six fathom. All within the point of Rota and the Fort St. Sebastian is called and occupied as the Bay of Cadiz. The Canton did not approach nearer Cadiz on account of the shallowness of the water. She came to anchor, unloaded, and loaded in that place. In the winter such ships go farther in. It is the usual place for mooring such ships. Had just discharged the ship the day of the affair. The king of Spain entered Cadiz the next day after. The Canton was an American ship. Her owners were Americans.

Thomas M'Cready identified and proved the register of the ship Canton, and its American character.

Jacob Smith was a carpenter on board the ship Canton on the 14th of June, in the port of Cadiz. About sunset he put away his tools. A lighter was alongside the ship, with salt; and as the ship was short of hands, and wished to discharge the lighter, witness laid to and assisted in taking out the salt. A little past 9 o'clock witness missed the prisoner, by whom he was soon after called down into the cabin. Knew not what Gourlay wanted, but went down. Gourlay addressed him, and said, "Carpenter, I have brought you and Vesey and the steward down to witness that I order Mr. Jones out of the berth." Does not recollect he said this or that berth. Deceased was then lying in his own berth. Gourlay repeated the order to Jones to get out. Jones replied he would not go out alive; that, he said, was the place appointed by the captain for him to sleep, and there he would sleep. Prisoner turned round and said, "Carpenter, haul that man out of his berth." Witness refused, stating that he was willing to obey his orders, but unwilling to drag the man out of his berth, for he didn't know the consequence. Prisoner then pulled the bedclothes from Jones, seized and dragged him into the dining room, where they had a clinch together, and in passing the mahogany table they nearly capsized it in the scuffle. Witness put his hand on the table, and held it till they passed it. He went on deck, leaving them scuffling, and asked the men to go down and part the two mates, or they would kill each other. A man named Jones (not the deceased) said, "Let them fight; it's none of our business." Whilst receiving this answer, "Murder!" was cried in the cabin, in about a minute after witness left it. Witness went down, and prisoner held up his hand, and said, "This man has bit me." It was on the left hand; a slight wound, which bled a little; also a small wound on the cheek. Gourlay and deceased were then clinched, Jones being partly down on his knees, and Gourlay above him, and had the command of him. There was a little place on the side of Gourlay's cheek, and the blood running from his hand. Witness, with his right, laid hold of Gourlay by his left arm, and Jones with his other by the shoulder, and thus separated them. Jones was a small man, five feet three inches high. Knows his height, for he made his coffin. Begged Jones to go on deck. Deceased said: "Where shall I go? Am I to be murdered?" Witness told Jones to go on deck, and sleep in Black's berth, in the forecastle. Black was then on shore. "You say you are going to leave the ship to-morrow. Gourlay (the prisoner) says he is going to leave the ship tomorrow. Go, and stay in the forecastle to-night. Gourlay is in a passion now, and in the morning, when the captain returns, all will be well." Jones was then standing with his back near the companion way, and the prisoner with his back to the stateroom door. They were about four feet apart, and the witness about four feet from them. Gourlay then said, "By God! I'll shoot you," stepped back a foot, reached back his arm, took down a brass pistol, cocked it, and shot him dead. Prisoner had two pistols, usually loaded, suspended over the berth where he slept. Witness took the candle, then standing on the table, looked upon Jones, and perceived he was dead; he did not stir; turned, and said, "Mr. Gourlay, you have killed the man." Gourlay replied: "I can't help it. He ought to have obeyed my orders." Witness, Wm. Vesey and George Brown were the only persons present at the time Jones was killed. The men on deck, hearing the report of a pistol, came below. They insisted upon prisoner's being immediately put in irons, and kept in that way until the captain returned in the morning. It was done, and he remained so until the morning, when, as soon as witness thought he could get into the city, he took a boat, went ashore, and found Capt. M'Cauley, to whom he related the facts. Captain M'Cauley, Captain O'Sullivan, the American deputy consul, and four Spanish soldiers came on board, took Gourlay ashore, took off his irons, and put him in prison in Cadiz, where he remained until the vessel was ready to sail. Witness supposes he was taken ashore by order of the deputy consul. In answer to questions by Mr. Tillotson, witness said he thought it was about two minutes from the time the struggle ended to the time that the pistol was fired and the deceased shot. In this time witness gave the advice above stated, and prisoner moved along in the meantime to near the stateroom, where the pistol was. The wounds of the prisoner were one on his knuckles, and one on his cheek. Does not know whether either was a bite or not. The deceased had no weapon of any kind in his hand.

Mr. Blunt, for prisoner, requested that the other witnesses be removed while the witness was under examination. The court granted the request.

Witness continued. In the afternoon previous to the alleged murder, at four o'clock, the deceased had three or four men in the hold, trimming or stowing salt. Deceased could not please the prisoner, who quarreled with him in the hold, and called him a "damned worthless scoundrel." Deceased came on deck, said he would have nothing more to do with the ship, and would quit when the captain came on board. A few words passed, when prisoner struck the deceased on the head. A scuffle ensued, and the parties were directly separated, and prisoner told witness to go below and get the irons, and put Jones in them. Witness went and got them, and came on deck, and found deceased with the cook's tormentors, or flesh fork, in his hands, and swore he would not be put in irons alive. Prisoner seized the deceased, to take away the instrument, but could not do it. Witness, by order, took hold of one end of it, but soon let go; thought he would let Gourlay get them away himself.

Gourlay then ordered Vesey to get the cutlass. Vesey got it. Gourlay received it, but soon afterwards put it away, saying: "I will not use such a thing against you." Prisoner then ordered a pair of pistols to be brought up. Vesey brought the pistols, and laid them down under the dripstone, aft of the companion. Did not know whether Gourlay knew the pistols were there. Prisoner succeeded in getting away the tormentors from deceased, and threw them overboard. From that time nothing further than words occurred until sundown. Had words after that. Jones was not put in irons. Deceased was shot under the left eye, near the nose. Died immediately. Did not move. Thinks the ball did not pass through the head.

Cross-examined by Messrs. Blunt and Scott: Witness had a little dispute with prisoner, but more with deceased. About three weeks previous he was about putting on the forehatch bar, and prisoner told him (witness) to go to hell, and struck him. Witness took up the handspike, but laid it down, and did not strike, an explanation having taken place.

Witness had always treated prisoner as a brother. Prisoner once took witness forward in a state of intoxication from the cabin. Witness was asleep, and didn't know whether he refused to go. It was some time before this affair,—three or four weeks,—while in Cadiz No illwill was entertained by witness against prisoner. He did not see the whole transaction. Went on deck and heard prisoner's voice cry "Murder!" and went down as before stated. Deceased did not strike prisoner in the eye previous to taking the pistol. Didn't notice that prisoner had a black eye. There was a black spot on his cheek. Does not know how it came. Saw the parties both looking at each other. The deceased was not in the attitude of fighting Deceased had nothing on but his shirt when dragged from his berth. Prisoner is an Englishman. Jones retired to his berth, refusing to do any more duty, while others were busy at work. Prisoner did not say, when he commanded Jones to leave his berth. "Come out, and do your duty;" but "Go out of this place; I am afraid of you." Prisoner expressed fear of his life if deceased remained there. Prisoner was quarrelsome, and deceased more so. The crew were busy at work three hours after deceased had quit labour. When the captain left the vessel his direction to prisoner was to get the salt aboard, that we might not be compelled to work on Sunday. It was then Saturday. It was not exactly an order, but he expressed it as his wish and expectation, and directed prisoner to give an extra glass of grog to get it finished. When prisoner said, "By God! I'll shoot you," deceased replied, "I can't help it." Witness was examined by the deputy consul, who is a Spaniard, and speaks broken English, and heard the examination read once or twice since his arrival here. He now speaks from recollection, and his testimony would be the same if he had not heard that examination read. He was examined on board the ship. No Spanish officer was present. He remembers the transaction perfectly well. Witness does recollect that prisoner ordered deceased to leave the cabin. After the cry of "Murder!" went down A little before he shot, he said "Get out of my sight."

William Vesey, a young man, apparently about 17 or 18 years of age, was next called. He was a mariner on board the Canton. Saw Gourlay, the prisoner, go into the cabin with a candle in his hand. It was about nine o'clock. Witness was in the cabin. Gourlay says: "Jones, come out of that cabin. You shall not sleep there to-night." Jones was then undressed, in his berth, where he had been, probably, about an hour. Gourlay added: "My life is not safe if you sleep there. Come out, and you shall have as good a bed as I have. But you shall not sleep under me, for my life is not safe." Deceased replied, "No, I'll not come out." Prisoner rejoined, "I'll make you." Prisoner then went on deck, called down the carpenter (Jacob Smith), the steward, and himself (Vesey), for witnesses, and said to us, "I call you down to be witnesses that I order Jones out of that berth." The prisoner then ordered him out again. Deceased replied he would not come out alive. Prisoner then directed the carpenter to lend a hand, who said, "No, he did not like to do that." Prisoner replied, "Then I must do it myself," and began pulling off the clothes, continuing to order deceased out. When prisoner had stripped the bed, deceased got up, and sat in the bed. Prisoner took him by the arm, and eased him out of berth. No violence was offered, and no resistance attempted. Both went into the cabin together. As they approached the cabin door, prisoner shoved deceased, but not so as to hurt him; and here they closed, and had a good deal of struggle. Prisoner cried "Murder!" and sung out: "O my God! he is biting me." The carpenter then rushed between, and parted them, begging deceased to go forward, and sleep in the forecastle. Deceased replied, "No;" he would not go forward, but would sleep in the place appointed by the captain. Jones then said: "What shall I do? Am I to be murdered?" This was just as they let go. Prisoner immediately upon that said, "By God! I'll shoot him" (not "you," as Smith stated), addressing himself, as witness supposed, to the carpenter, and, in the act of saying so, made a rush to the door, squeezing himself through it sidewise into the stateroom, took the pistol from his berth, and shot the deceased through the half door; for the cabin door, being open, half shut the stateroom door. Deceased died immediately. Thinks the pistols were previously cocked, for witness often made up prisoner's bed, and found them cocked, and half-cocked them himself. Gourlay had a pair of pistols. Did not see the other pistol,—whether it was cocked or not. Witness was of the opinion that not more than fourteen seconds elapsed from the time the prisoner uttered the words, "By God! I'll shoot him," before he executed the deed. It was not more than a minute from the parting in the scuffle to the time of the shooting. Gourlay was standing still, and looking at Jones, whilst Jones said, "What am I to do? Am I to be murdered?" Prisoner appeared to be in a great rage. In the course of the afternoon, Jones said he would do no more duty until he had seen Captain M'Cauley. Gourlay said Jones did not do his work properly. Gourlay struck him in the face, but left no mark, nor did it stagger him. Deceased doubled his fist, and said to prisoner, "Look out!" Gourlay said to Jones, "Go on shore." Jones said he would if Gourlay would let him have a boat. Gourlay said he wouldn't give him a boat. Gourlay then said, "I will put you in irons," and ordered the carpenter to bring the irons up. Deceased declared he would not be put in irons alive. Prisoner replied, "Well, see if I don't," and ordered witness to bring him a cutlass, which he brought, and Gourlay laid it on the hatch, but did not use it. Jones made a rush, and got a pair of tormentors. Gourlay, seeing it, came up, and, after considerable struggle got them out of Jones' hands, and threw them overboard. This was about 5 or 6 o'clock in the evening. They then parted. Witness brought up two pistols to prisoner, shook out the priming on his way, and placed them under the dripping stone. Did not hear Gourlay order Jones to leave the cabin after the scuffle; he had not time. It was over like a flash of lightning. Jones was small, but pretty strong. Gourlay was then sick of the liver complaint. Has seen Jones clinch a larger man than himself. Captain did not assign any berth, but Jones usually slept in that he lay down in.

Cross-examined by Mr. Baldwin: Gourlay quarrelled with the cook because cook let Jones have the tormentors, and ordered witness to get pistols to intimidate the cook. Witness brought the pistols, but shook the priming out, for which Gourlay afterwards thanked witness, and said he had lived thus long without murdering any one, and should be sorry to have that crime attached to his name. In the afternoon Gourlay said to the men, "Will you obey me?" They said, "Yes." He replied, "Then I order you not to obey that man," meaning Jones. The priming was knocked out before sundown. Gourlay took the pistols in the cabin with him, and probably primed them for the use of the ship again. Gourlay was mostly upon deck that afternoon and evening. He went down once to put on a shirt, his own being nearly torn off in one of the frays. The act of shooting was almost instantaneous after the separation. Gourlay's shirt collar was torn off.

George Brown, a black boy, who was steward on board the Canton, testified that Gourlay ordered Jones out of the berth. Jones refused. Gourlay then called for help, and the carpenter came, but refused to assist. Gourlay then took him out. They then struggled, and Jones bit Gourlay, and Gourlay called out "Murder!" and Jones let Gourlay go. Jones was biting Gourlay. Gourlay then stepped back, and said, "By God! I'll shoot you." Did not see the carpenter part them. They were struggling a couple of minutes. About a minute after separation. Gourlay shot Jones.

John Ray. The wound was on the left side of Jones' face, under the eye. Did not see the affray.

Here the prosecution rested. A recess of half an hour was given, when the prisoner's defence commenced.

Mr. Scott commenced the defence on the part of the prisoner, and occupied the floor nearly two hours. He adverted to the doctrine of homicide se defendendo; and although he did not place this case distinctly on that ground, yet he explained and enforced to the jury the authorities on that question, submitting to them whether a mutinous disobedience to the lawful authority of the prisoner, acting, in absence of the captain, as commander of the ship, would not justify his act, on the ground that he was authorized to use as much force as was requisite to carry into effect his lawful commands. 4 Bl. Comm. 183. Mr. Scott also insisted that the crime of which the prisoner was guilty at most was manslaughter, and not murder; and for this he cited the following authorities: 4 Bl. Comm. 193; 1 East, P. C. 224, 232; and Rowley's Case, and the case of the Scotch Soldier, 1 East, P. C. 252. He further contended that the court had no jurisdiction of the case. It was a crime, he said, committed in the harbor of Cadiz, within the jurisdiction and sovereignty of Spain; that sovereignty must, in its nature, be exclusive and absolute, and cannot be concurrent. He referred to and commented upon the following authorities: 1 Azuni, Mar. Law, 223, 233–235, art. 3; Hubner, p. 244; Vatt. Law Nat. 187, § 287, p. 236; U. S. v. Rice, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 246; [Ex parte Bollman] 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 136; s. p. Id. 144, 145; U. S. v. Palmer, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 633; U. S. v. Ross [Case

No. 16,196]; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 94, 95.

Don Thomas Stoughton, the Spanish consul, was then called and sworn. He defined what he considered to be the Bay of Cadiz, and gave it as his opinion that the Spanish authorities had always exercised jurisdiction over the waters, not only where the Canton lay, but all that extent within a line drawn from Rota to the castle of St. Sebastians, the extreme point of the peninsula of Cadiz. Had never heard it doubted.

Hugh Roberts was born in Cadiz, and resided there many years. Considered the Bay of Cadiz less extensive than last witness. Supposed it to be included within a line from Fort Catalina direct to Cadiz. The position of the Canton would still be in it. The outer part of the bay from the line referred to, he considered as open road.

Captain M'Cauley was called again, and stated the instructions he had given prisoner to have the salt taken in that afternoon. Considered all the waters within a line from Rota to St. Sebastians as forming the harbor of Cadiz. Gourlay was taken on shore by the American deputy consul, assisted by the Spanish authorities. Knew of no refusal on the part of the Spanish authorities to take cognizance of the offence. Jones had served on board the ship but two or three days. Gourlay had been employed but a few days. Had perceived neither of them to be quarrelsome.

The testimony here closed on both sides, and Mr. Haines, associate counsel with the district attorney, stated the authorities to be adduced in support of the points of law which the prosecution would assume.

Mr. Van Wyck, in summing up for the prisoner, expressed a confidence that he would receive at the hands of the jury the same measure of justice as if he were one of our own citizens And the melancholy case before them he observed, exemplified the feeble hold we have on life. Neither the prisoner nor the deceased were aware that in so short a period the latter would be precipitated into eternity. Whether the agency of the prisoner in causing that event was the result of premeditated malice and a hardened heart, or whether it was produced by the impulse of sudden passion, was the momentous inquiry which the jury were called upon to try Had he been tried by the Spanish authorities, no jury would have interposed; and whether the circumstance of falling into the hands of the American consul may have been favorable to him or not, yet, if this court has not jurisdiction of the offence, the jury were bound on their oaths to acquit. If the Spanish government had cognizance of this case, this court has not. It would not do to say that, because the Spanish authorities did not try him, therefore we will. The jury were acting as agents of the government, and were bound to administer justice according to law. The several states of the Union made a constitution, by which they delegated part of their sovereignty to congress. Whatever they did not impart, they retained By the eighth section of the constitution authority was given to congress "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." To felonies committed on the high seas, and to none other, is this authority derived from the constitution to be applied. But the act of 1790, in conformity to which this indictment is drawn, would seem to have reference, not merely to the United States, but to all the rivers, havens, basins, and bays in the whole world. But congress can legislate only for those persons who owe allegiance to the United States. The construction contended for would make it assume a jurisdiction over the bays, rivers, and harbors of all Europe. Such cannot be the true construction of the act. If it were to be allowed, our jurisdiction would extend up the Thames, the Rhone, and the Danube. Our government could not have the hardihood to claim it. Our system of jurisprudence was derived from England, and by the law of that realm offences were to be punished in the place where they were committed. It is competent for congress to give construction to the term "high seas" in our own, but not in a foreign, country. If they have not power to pass laws to punish crimes committed in the territories of Spain, they have not power to invest a court with that authority. This was not a crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, but of Spain. The act of the consul does not confer jurisdiction on this court. There was no power in Spain, unless that specially of the king, which could surrender and transfer the prisoner from the jurisdiction of that country. And what a precedent would such a decision create! Suppose a felony be committed on board an American ship lying in the Thames The accused is entitled to the benefit of testimony; and what shall be done? The witnesses, many of them perhaps Englishmen, are to be taken on board and brought to New York to attend the trial! Thus the ships of the United States are to be freighted back with felons and witnesses. Suppose a British ship is at anchor in the harbor of New York, on board of which a homicide is committed upon a custom-house officer, would we not claim jurisdiction, and try the offence? Or suppose the reverse, that a custom-house officer had killed a British seaman would we endure it that the offender, and all the witnesses to the act, should be transported to Great Britain for the trial of the accused? Or suppose, in the very case of the Canton, that the prisoner, on board that ship, in the Bay of Cadiz, had killed, instead of William Jones, a Spanish grandee, or a custom-house officer of Spain, would the authorities of that country have suffered him to be taken to America for trial? The vice consul, it is true, assumed the power of judge, jury, and police officer; but this assumption can give no jurisdiction to the court.

Mr. Van Wyck then commented ably and at large upon the facts as proved, which he contended did not make out the charge as set forth in the indictment.

Mr. Baldwin, on the same side, observed that there was certainly some difficulty in determining whether this case came under the jurisdiction of the court. It took place in the Bay of Cadiz, within the acknowledged jurisdiction of Spain; and to decide that it is subject to the authority of this court would necessarily involve the principle that a man may be tried twice for the one offence. This was abhorrent to our own laws and the laws of England. Piracy presents a different question. There, a first would be a bar to a second trial; for, it being a crime against all nations, each has the right to make its own laws to punish it. It will be objected that Great Britain assumes jurisdiction of offences committed on board her ships all over the world. But the parliament of Great Britain is said to be omnipotent. The constitution of the United States is limited and we cannot follow their example. Mr. Baldwin adverted to the differences in the definition of the "high seas," as construed by the common law and admiralty courts, and contended that, however the construction might be in relation to them, yet the true intent and meaning of congress in the act referred to was that the high seas were those waters over which all nations had the right of passing, but neither had the exclusive jurisdiction; and that the words "havens, bays," &c., were meant to provide for cases wherein—like the river La Plata—the mouth is so wide that jurisdiction cannot be exercised from the shore, or bays, like those of Bengal, Biscay, or Honduras. Mr. Baldwin commented, at considerable length, upon the construction of the law as applied to the case, and adverted to U. S. v. Ross [Case No. 16,196]; Ross' Case, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 200; and section 43 of Graydon's Digest, and concluded his remarks by an address to the jury upon the matters of fact in evidence.

Mr. Haines, on the part of the prosecution, contended for the positions which follow. Our limits preclude the illustrations and arguments by which they were enforced. He argued

(1) That the murder was committed on the high seas.

(2) That the 8th section of the statute of congress passed in 1790 clearly included the crime, even admitting that it was committed on the high seas

(3) That congress has the constitutional power to pass the law alluded to; and

(4) That the crime committed by the prisoner was murder, and not manslaughter.

Mr. Tillotson, Dist. Atty., concluded the argument in support of the prosecution, and confined his remarks principally to an exposition of the facts, and the grade of crime to which they necessarily pointed. His observations were perspicuous and liberal, and occupied the court until 11 o'clock in the evening.

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, and VAN NESS, District Judge.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, then addressed the jury, and presented to them the law and the facts, in a very able and clear point of view. At half past 11 the jury were sent out, and returned at 1 o'clock on Saturday morning, with a special verdict: "Guilty of murder in the Bay of Cadiz." This verdict leaves the question of jurisdiction, which was an important point in the trial, open for revision. The judge stated that he was not clear upon the point, and suggested to the jury the verdict they gave, should they be satisfied that the crime in its nature amounted to murder. The cause will be carried up to the supreme court of the United States.

SHIPPING REGULATIONS — CHANGE OF NAME — IDENTITY OF VESSEL—REBUILDING.

1. It is the policy of the admiralty law to discourage changes in the names of vessels.

2. Admiralty courts, therefore, will go very far in ruling that rebuilt vessels are in law identical with those from the material of which they are built, and in requiring them to be registered in the same names.

3. Where any substantial portion of the frame or skeleton of an old vessel is built upon and preserved intact, in constructing the new, the courts lean towards holding the vessel to be the same in law.

4. But where no such part of the frame or skeleton is left intact, but each timber of the old vessel is first dislocated before being used in the new, in such case the vessel is a new one, and may bear a new name, though having the model of the old vessel.

In admiralty. Libel for forfeiture.

HUGHES, District Judge. The United States brings this libel, demanding forfeiture of the steam tug Grace Meade, for an alleged change of name, under the act of congress approved May 5, 1864, passed "for the prevention and punishment of frauds in relation to the names of vessels." 13 Stat. 63, 64, Rev. St. § 4179, p. 811. A vessel of the same model, and partly of the same material, called the Agnes, had been blown up on the James river, a few miles above City Point, on September 10th, 1872; and the Grace Meade was completed and registered in August, 1874. The officers of the government erroneously supposed that the Agnes had been towed from the James river to Baltimore, and there rebuilt.

The facts were substantially as follows: The steam tug Agnes was built at Bordentown, New Jersey, in 1870 and 1871. She was brought to Richmond late in 1871, and was there sold to Mrs. Grace G. Lawrence, as her separate property. Captain Milton S. Lawrence, husband of the purchaser, became her master. While in charge of a tow, in September, 1872, a few miles above City Point, in James river, her boiler exploded, killing five men and sinking the vessel, which was considerably blown to pieces. Her sides were blown away; large openings were blown into both sides of her hull; the boiler was ruined; the engine much damaged; the hull broken into halves; the deck blown off, from the engine-room to the bow; most of the timbers of the vessel much shattered; all the ribs destroyed except three or four; the stern-post too much injured for reuse, and the wreck generally a very bad one. The vessel was first raised about October 1st, 1872, between two canal-boats, and was then drifted to the flats above City Point. The object at the time was, to take out of her such material as could be reused, and such machinery as could be removed. All of the machinery was got out except the shaft, the engine-frame, and the wheel, which could not be removed. The vessel was then left lying on the flats until May, 1873. Then a railway was made and sunk, and the wreck was lightened and lifted upon the railway by means of chains suspended between two barges. The model of the Agnes having been a very fine one, and that vessel very swift, it was the desire of Captain Lawrence to build a new vessel on the same model. For this purpose all the old timbers which could be found were gathered up, and these, as well as those already in the vessel, were tacked and battened together, so as to obtain in outline the model of the Agnes as nearly as practicable. The new vessel was built to the outline thus secured, moulds being taken from the old timbers for new ones, and once in a while the old timber used in the new vessel where it was sound and unshattered. During the construction of the new vessel, the old shaft, wheel, and engine-frame, which the wreckers had, in the fall before, been unable to remove, were left as they had been in the Agnes, and the new boat was built to them in their old relative position. In short, the model and general plan of the Agnes were studiously adopted and followed in building the Grace Meade, and the bulky machinery left, as just stated, in its old positions. Other parts of the old vessel were used as follows: The old stem was used, but was changed by deepening the rabbet for thicker planking. A new scarf was cut in it, and its upper part cut off and a new arch scarfed on it. A new keel was put in, and scarfed to the stem, and the stern-post was set into a piece of the old keel six or eight feet long, and the new keel scarfed to that Three new kelsons were put in—the Agnes had but one. The frame of the Agnes had been one-half of chestnut and one-half of white oak; of these timbers only such few of the white oak ones as had not been shattered by the explosion were used. The planking was all new, except a third of the garboard streak on the starboard side. Of the eight old beams only two were used in the Grace Meade. Of the deck, only a small part of the floor of the after cabin was made of the old timber. Of the sixty old stanchions only three were reused. The old waist was not used. Of the logging around the stem only half of the old was reused. The old transom was first used and then discarded. The old Samson post, forward, was used, and the old bits. All the old timbers that were put into the new vessel made up an aggregate of some 1,200 feet; the whole number of feet of timber used in the new vessel being upward of 30,000.

The new vessel was completed at City Point, in the summer of 1874; and Captain Lawrence brought her to Norfolk and applied to the collector of customs here for registration as the Grace Meade, in August. It seems that while the Agnes was in the James river trade, Mr. Currie had been her agent in Richmond down to the time of her sinking by the explosion of September, 1872. It seems also that while the new vessel was in process of construction at City Point, Mr. Currie applied to the collector of customs at Richmond for the registration of the new vessel in the name of the Grace Meade. The collector had written for instructions to the secretary of the treasury, stating in his letters that the Agnes had been towed to Baltimore and there rebuilt. Upon this statement, the secretary had declined to allow the registration in the new name, as without authority of law. The motive of Captain Lawrence in desiring the name Grace Meade to be given the vessel was, that that had been the maiden name of his wife, who, greatly shocked by the disaster that had befallen the Agnes, had soon after died. There was no claim against the Agnes of any sort, and it is not pretended that there was any motive inducing Captain Lawrence to desire the name Grace Meade to be given his vessel except the one which has been mentioned. There is no charge or suspicion of fraud. When Captain Lawrence applied, in August, 1874, at Norfolk, for the registration of the vessel, the special agent of the treasury here, Mr. Ira Ayer, Jr., instituted an inquiry into the facts of the explosion of the Agnes, the building of the Grace Meade, and the attempt which had been made a year before at Richmond for registering the vessel in the new name. The result of the inquiry was to convince the officers here that the vessel could lawfully be registered as the Grace Meade, and papers were accordingly given her, dated August 4th, 1874. This libel was brought February 20th, 1875; and I am to decide, upon the case as presented, whether the vessel is forfeitable under the act of congress of May 5th, 1864.

1. In point of fact it cannot be pretended that the Grace Meade is the same vessel as the Agnes. True, the model is the same; but one egg may fit in the mould of another without being the same egg. True, one-twentieth or one-thirtieth of the timber of the Agnes was used in constructing the Grace Meade; but it would be idle to pretend that in point of fact, the use of so small a portion of the material of one vessel made the new one the same as the old. The fact of the machinery being in great part the same in the two vessels, has no bearing upon the question of identity; it having never been pretended that the successive use of machinery by two vessels identified the vessels themselves as the same.

2. The real inquiry is, whether in point of law the Grace Meade is a new vessel, or the old vessel Agnes rebuilt. The policy of the maritime law, for reasons so obvious that they need not be stated, is very strongly to discourage a change of the names of vessels. Accordingly, it is held that a vessel, which in the course of time has undergone repairs to such an extent that her old material may have entirely disappeared and been replaced by other material, is still in law the same vessel. And generally, it may be held as a principle, that, where the keel, stem, and stern-posts and ribs of an old vessel, without being broken up and forming an intact frame, are built upon as a skeleton, the case is one of an old vessel rebuilt, and not of a new vessel. Indeed, without regard to the particular parts reused, if any considerable part of the hull and skeleton of an old vessel in its intact condition, without being broken up, is built upon, the law holds that in such a case it is the old vessel rebuilt, and not a new vessel. But where no piece of the timber of an old vessel is used without being first dislocated and then replaced, where no set of timbers are left together intact in their original positions, but all the timbers are severally taken out, refitted, and then reset, there we have a very different case. That is a case of a vessel rebuilt. There it is of little consequence how much of the old timber is reused. If none of the old timber is left undisturbed, if all of the timber used, whether old or new, is taken up, refitted, and reset, as was the case in rebuilding the Grace Meade, then I think the case is presented of a vessel built anew, and not of an old vessel rebuilt.

I think it is clear from the evidence that not one piece of the Agnes was used in the construction of the Grace Meade, without having been first taken up, and handled, before being placed in its present position. No part of the frame of the Agnes, not even the smallest, was used as a frame in the Grace Meade. I am clear, therefore, in the opinion that the Grace Meade was a new vessel, and not identical with the Agnes in the legal sense of the identity of vessels.

3. I think, moreover, that where the proper officers of the United States, after a full investigation of the facts of the building of a vessel, and where there is no fraud or concealment on the part of the owner, conclude that a vessel may be registered in a given name, a court of admiralty ought not to look with favor upon a libel for the confiscation of that vessel for bearing the name in which the government itself registered her.

I will sign a decree dismissing the libel at the costs of the United States.

A citizen of the United States cannot throw off his allegiance without a law authorizing the same 1321

CIVIL RIGHTS.

See, also, "Constitutional Law"; "Elections and Voters."

Congress is authorized to protect the rights secured by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments 1324

The civil rights act of 1866 was within the power conferred upon congress by the thirteenth amendment, on the subject of slavery, under which it had full power to pass all laws deemed proper for its entire eradication in any form..... 707

A railway employé who denies to a female passenger a right to ride in the only car in the train appropriated for the accommodation of ladies alone, solely because she is a person of African descent, is guilty under the civil rights law of March 1, 1875, whether he acts under the instructions of his employer or not..... 882

A colored female passenger may be required to ride in a car set apart for colored female passengers, where it is equally fit and appropriate in all respects with that set apart for the use of white female passengers 882

A crime inflicted upon a colored person, not by reason of his race, color, or previous condition, is not within the civil rights act of 1866 707

An indictment under the civil rights bill of 1866 should state that the offense charged was committed against the person injured, by reason of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude..... 707

CLERK OF COURT.

Expenses incurred for board and lodging at hotels while attending at terms of the court held away from the place where the clerk is required to keep his office are not allowable as "necessary expenses of his office." (Act Feb. 26, 1853.)..... 1372

COMMISSIONERS.

CONGRESS.

A contract by the clerk of the house of representatives, made with a person to furnish wood, where no appropriation has been made to pay for the same, is not binding on either party 833

CONSPIRACY.

Rev. St. § 5440, in relation to conspiracies to defraud the United States, does not extend to a case where the contemplated fraud was to depend entirely upon the passage of a future act of congress to make it effective 681

A mere agreement or combination to effect an unlawful purpose does not constitute a conspiracy, unless followed by an act done by one or more of the parties to carry the object of the conspiracy into execution 1342

The conspiracy need not be shown to have been formed at the precise time or times alleged in the indictment.....1342

Where the existence of the conspiracy, and defendant's connection therewith, is established by independent evidence, he is bound by the acts and declarations of his co-conspirators 1342

Every member of a conspiracy is responsible personally for the acts of every other member done in furtherance of its illegal purposes, whether he be present himself or not 213

Allegations of the overt act are not required to be us full and minute in an indictment for conspiracy as in an indictment for fraud without any conspiracy..... 944

If an overt act in violation of law is charged as in pursuance of a previous conspiracy, it is sufficient..... 944

An indictment for conspiracy to do an unlawful act need not aver the means agreed upon, whereby the conspiracy was to be carried into effect..... 818

An indictment charging a conspiracy to defraud the United States of the taxes due upon distilled spirits (Act March 2, 1867, § 30) need not allege the specific mode agreed upon by which the object of the conspiracy was to be carried out..... 944

It is sufficient to aver that there was a conspiracy to defraud the United States of taxes legally due, and that, in pursuance of such conspiracy, defendant committed a stated overt act 944

An indictment for conspiracy, under Rev. St. § 5440, which avers the conspiracy, and the overt acts done to carry it into effect, is sufficient, without stating the means agreed on to accomplish the purpose of the conspiracy 818

An indictment under Act March 2, 1867, § 30, is sufficient, if it charges an unlawful combination as actually made, and an act by one of the parties as an act intended to be relied upon to show the agreement in operation, although it does not appear in what manner the act described would tend to effect the object of the conspiracy..... 890

In the case of a conspiracy made punishable by law, the entire acts of the conspirators in relation to the subject-matter, both before and after the doing of the thing which was the subject of the conspiracy, are admissible 493

After prima facie evidence has been given of a conspiracy, the statements of those implicated, though not included in the indictment, are evidence 493

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

Where a constitutional grant or guaranty is that congress or the state legislatures shall not pass laws for abridging a certain right, congress has no power to legislate over the subject generally, but only to provide remedies for a violation of the prohibition..... 707

Congress is not limited, in adopting legislation for the purpose of enforcing the fifteenth amendment, to cases in which there has been actual legislation by the general government, or by a state, denying or abridging the right secured.....1328

In adopting legislation for carrying such amendment into effect, congress may provide for the punishment of a state official who refuses to perform the duties necessary to qualify colored citizens to vote...1328

When state laws have imposed duties, the performance or nonperformance of which affects rights under the federal government, congress may make the nonperformance of those duties an offense against the United States, and may punish it accordingly....1324

No person can be tried a second time for the same offense, after a trial by a competent and regular jury upon a good indictment, whether there be a verdict of acquittal or conviction.....1287

The circuit court of the United States cannot grant a new trial in a capital case after a verdict regularly rendered upon a sufficient indictment 1287

A new trial may be granted in a capital case where the jury has been discharged from giving a verdict, for in such case the party has not been put in jeopardy of his life 1287

The right to be secure in one's house is not a right, privilege, or immunity granted or secured by the constitution of the United States 701

Act June 22, 1874, § 5, providing for the production of books and papers, does not violate articles 4, 5, and 7 of the amendments to the constitution..... 868

Act July 20, 1868, § 44, which declares that real property employed in a violation of a revenue law shall be forfeited therefor, is not unconstitutional..... 866

A law which reserves property from sale on execution for one year, if two-thirds of the appraised value shall not be offered, is not unconstitutional as to prior contracts.. 598

Act March 3, 1825, § 23, which punishes a conspiracy to destroy a vessel or cargo with intent to defraud the underwriters, is within the power of congress to protect commerce, and applies to internal commerce... 493

CONTEMPT.

It is a contempt of court, under Act March 2, 1831, to call another a liar, openly, in the presence of the court, while in session 1012

An assault and battery committed in the hall of entrance into the court room, separated from it by a door, without panels, covered with cloth, is a contempt, either "in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice."..1012

A contempt in the piazza of the court-house, into which the windows of the court room open, is a contempt in the presence of the court..... 313

Where the return to a writ of habeas corpus is evasive and insufficient, the person to whom it is addressed, if present in court, will be committed until he produce the prisoners, or be otherwise discharged..... 775

A witness who refuses to answer proper questions before a grand jury may be fined for contempt of court, and be required to give security for his good behavior..... 350

An offer of a sum of money to a witness, to remove his objections to going without the jurisdiction of the court to testify, is not necessarily an attempt to contaminate the source of justice, and a contempt of court.. 41

The pendency of a criminal prosecution is no objection to the hearing of a motion for attachment for a contempt in the irregular examination of witnesses prior to the hearing 55

Contempts of court are crimes, and may be prosecuted as such..... 920

If the party purge himself on oath, the court will not hear collateral evidence for the purpose of impeaching his testimony and proceeding against him for the contempt; but, if perjury appear, he will be recognized to answer, etc..... 881

CONTINUANCE.

See, also, "Criminal Law."

It is not a sufficient ground for a delay of the trial of a capital case that the party wishes to procure papers from a foreign country, since the court cannot issue process which will be effectual in procuring such papers 1287

Where the execution of a commission to examine witnesses has been prevented by the acts or omission of the prosecutor or his agents, defendant is entitled to a continuance, even if he be guilty of laches in taking out the commission..... 917

Prosecutor required to make affidavit that he could not, in his opinion, safely proceed to trial without the attendance of a witness, on the ground of whose absence a postponement was asked.....1220

CONTRACTS.

Express acceptance of a proposition need not be proved, where both parties are shown to have acted on it..... 293

A verbal agreement to repay certain advances is a sufficient consideration for a substituted agreement made by correspondence between the parties..... 293

Where the time for delivery is extended, though no consideration is given therefor, the contract cannot be rescinded for nondelivery until the expiration of the extended time 833

CORONER.

The coroner is not bound to put in writing the effect of the evidence given upon an inquisition, unless the offense be found to be murder or manslaughter, and for false statements in other cases he is not liable..1052

CORPORATIONS.

A corporation which has purchased its own stock cannot vote upon the same in an election of directors by a trustee in whose name it is held..... 585

COUNTERFEITING.

On an indictment for passing counterfeit coin, possession of counterfeit bank notes is not admissible to prove the scienter.....1374

The possession of quantities of counterfeit coin of a different denomination from that laid in the indictment is admissible for such purposes 1374

Where the prisoner is connected with others, evidence is admissible that different parts of the machine employed in counterfeiting were found in the possession of such other persons 682

COURTS.

See, also, "Clerk of Court"; "Interpreter."

Comparative authority of federal and state courts: Process.

The federal circuit court will not surrender one charged with a capital crime for trial in another jurisdiction for a minor offense 658

Federal courts—Jurisdiction in general.

Jurisdiction of the federal courts is derived alone from the constitution and laws of the United States, and cannot be enlarged, diminished, or affected by state laws or regulations 908

Quære, whether a federal court has jurisdiction to try a person who committed murder on board an American merchant ship in the Bay of Cadiz 1382

An offense commenced to be committed on board an American vessel lying at the time in a river which is an arm of the sea on the coast of Africa, and continued uninterruptedly to a point in the Atlantic Ocean several miles from our shores, is within the jurisdiction of the federal circuit court.. 1364

A violation of a law of the United States, committed on board a steamboat upon the Hudson river within the ebb and flow of the tide, is within the jurisdiction of the federal courts, although the place is within the body of a county of the state of New York 554

A reservation on a cession of "concurrent jurisdiction" to serve state process, civil and criminal, in the ceded place, does not exclude the exclusive legislation or exclusive jurisdiction of the United States over the ceded place..... 781

The circuit court has jurisdiction over the offense of murder committed within a fort purchased by the United States by the consent of the state legislature (Act 1790, c. 9, §§ 3, 7), although in the cession the state reserved the right to execute its civil and criminal processes in such places..... 650 —— Grounds of jurisdiction.

The federal courts have jurisdiction in all cases of marshals' bonds, irrespective of citizenship 771

—— Circuit courts.

The jurisdiction of the United States court for the district of South Carolina extends throughout the entire state..... 213

The circuit court for the Eastern district of New York has jurisdiction for the indictment for an assault with intent to kill committed in the navy yard at Brooklyn. (Act March 3, 1825.) 887

Act March 3, 1851, transferring the Indian Territory to the Western district of Arkansas, did not deprive the court where an indictment was pending of the right to try and determine it..... 788

Quære, whether the circuit court has jurisdiction of common-law offenses against the United States..... 619

Page

The circuit courts have jurisdiction in suits in rem for penalties and forfeitures arising under the internal revenue laws.....1097

—— District courts.

The district court for the district of Oregon has jurisdiction to try a person charged with the commission of a crime in Alaska, where such person is found in the district of Oregon, or first brought there..... 303

The admiralty jurisdiction of the district court in revenue cases extends only to seizures for forfeitures under duty laws, as conferred by Act 1789, § 9.....1103

—— Administration of state laws.

The state laws of evidence are rules of decisions in trials at common law in the federal courts 938

The laws of the several states cannot be regarded as rules of decision in trials for offenses against the United States..... 187

—— Procedure.

The circuit court, under section 4 of the judiciary act, has power to devise the process for bringing any person before it who has committed an offense of which it has cognizance, without reference to the process given by the state law..... 187

In general.

Congress has power to punish for misdemeanors 692

Act 1790, c. 9, § 8, as well as Act 1820, c. 113, applies to all murders and robberies committed on board of or upon American ships on the high seas..... 1287

Where a statute declaring an offense and its punishment is repealed without a provision saving pending prosecutions, an indictment previously found, but not yet tried, should be quashed on motion..... 1085

Criminal liability.

An unlawful intent will be inferred from an unlawful act..... 767

An intent to seize a man by force for uttering slanderous or offensive words, and to carry him by force before a justice of the peace, without a legal warrant, is an unlawful intent 1062

Insanity directly caused by the immediate influence of intoxicating liquors is no defense on a prosecution for murder committed during such intoxication; otherwise where insanity is remotely occasioned by undue indulgence in spirituous liquors..... 913

It is a good defense that the prisoner, at the time of committing the act, was in such a state of mental insanity, not produced by the immediate effects of intoxicating drink, as not to have been conscious of the moral turpitude of the act..... 454

Intoxication is an excuse for crime where an habitual or fixed frenzy is produced thereby 1141

Principal and accessory.

The person charged as accessory may be tried and convicted, if the principal cannot be found; but, where the principal has been tried and acquitted, a person charged as accessory will be discharged on motion.. 691

Limitation of prosecutions.

Rev. St. § 5440, punishing conspiracies to commit any offense against the government, or to defraud it, is a part of the revenue laws, and prosecutions thereunder are limited to five years (Section 1046.)...946, 1057

Jurisdiction.

In the case of a homicide by shooting, the place where the shot takes effect, and not that from which it is fired, determines the jurisdiction of the offense..... 786

A shot from an American vessel in a foreign harbor killed a person on board of a foreign vessel lying in such harbor. Held, that jurisdiction of the offense belonged to the foreign government, and not to the courts of the United States, under Act 1790, c. 36, § 12..... 786

Preliminary hearing: Arrest, commitment, custody, and discharge of accused.

Criminal process will not be awarded on the mere motion and suggestion of the district attorney, unsupported by oath..... 1

On a preliminary examination, probable cause must be shown..... 2

The circuit court of the United States, sitting as a court, possesses the power to commit a person charged with an offense against the United States..... 25

The fact that the prosecutor has evidence to support an indictment, and the grand jury is in session, ready to receive it, is no ground for refusing to hear a motion to commit a person..... 25

On preliminary examination, prima facie evidence of guilt is sufficient to hold to bail until the offense may be examined by a grand jury 481

Proof furnishing good reason to believe that the crime alleged has been committed by the person charged, though not sufficient for a conviction, will suffice for commitment 2

Where a witness resides at a great distance, and there is no evidence that the materiality of his testimony was known to the prosecutors in time to have directed his attendance, the magistrate will act upon his affidavit 27

A person accused should be retained in custody, or required to give security for his appearance, while his examination is pending, but only on evidence sufficient to furnish probable cause..... 55

The question raised by a defense made in the nature of a plea autrefois acquit will not be determined on a preliminary examination to commit a person for high treason 201

Where a person, after an acquittal on an indictment for treason, is in the custody of the marshal, bound to answer an indictment for a misdemeanor, the court has no authority to send him to another district for trial for treason in the place where the crime was committed 187

A capias may be issued upon an indictment as the first process against the defendant 673

A capias is the proper process to bring an accused in to answer to an indictment for an offense against the laws of the United States 187

Where the accused is already in court, an order of the court will supply the place of a capias 187

Where the indictment has been quashed, defendant will be held in custody to answer a new indictment..... 944

Where the presentment of the grand jury is equivalent to the finding of "Not found," or "Not a true bill," the prisoner will be discharged 1003

Control of prosecution. Page

The president has no power to interfere with a public prosecution, except to put an end to it and discharge the accused. He has no power to change the proceedings, nor the place of trial..... 658

The secretary of the treasury has no power to compromise criminal proceedings pending in court.....1277

Arraignment and plea.

In capital cases the prisoner is entitled to a copy of the indictment, and a list of the jury, with their residences, to be delivered to him two entire days before his arraignment.. 901, Contra, 726

The arraignment is to be regarded as the commencement of the trial, and the day of delivery and the day of the arraignment are not computed in the time. (Act April 30, 1790, c. 38, § 28.).....901, Contra, 726

In cases not capital, the district attorney is not bound to furnish defendant with the names of the prosecutor and witnesses 213

The omission of the words "A true bill" on the copy of the indictment furnished defendant is waived where the prisoner makes no objection on that ground..... 650

Defendant will not be compelled to plead until the prosecutor's name is indorsed on the indictment 302

The court will permit the prisoner to retract his plea of guilty in a capital case, and to plead not guilty 872

The plea of not guilty will put the prisoners upon the country by a sufficient issue, without any further express words..1287

A nolle prosequi, without defendant's consent, after the jury has been sworn, is equivalent to an acquittal, and may be so pleaded 1052

Defendant will not be allowed to have the record amended after conviction so as to show that the plea of not guilty was never entered by him, where he failed to object when the record was read in open court... 594

An acquittal before a court martial cannot be pleaded in defense of an indictment in a court of law for substantially the same offense 318

In every case of a motion to the court for a cassetur, the facts on which it is grounded must be proved by affidavit..... 622

Time and place of trial.

The probability that difficult and important questions of law will arise will not ordinarily justify the postponement of the trial, so as to await the holding of the court by two judges, with a view to a certificate of division of opinion.....1224

The court has no authority to try a prisoner at a special session upon an indictment found at a regular session of the court 650

The prisoner may be tried at a regular session without any express adjudication by the court that there would be inconvenience in having the trial at a special session, where neither the prisoner nor the United States makes any application to the court upon the subject, or any objection to the time or place of trial..... 650

The court has no power to adjourn a stated general session from the place at which it is directed by statute to be held to another place, for the purpose of trying there a person indicted for a capital crime, in compliance with section 29, Judiciary Act 1789 650

A motion for a special session made after an indictment found at a general session is too late 650

The failure to move for a continuance until the next stated session of the court, which by law is required to be held at a place in the county where the offense was committed, is a waiver of the right to be tried in such county..... 650

Conduct of trial. Page

On a joint indictment against two for assault and battery, it is not optional with defendants to be tried separately..... 773

Whether prisoners shall be tried separately or together rests in the discretion of the court 1287

Separate trials will not be granted in the case of persons jointly indicted to enable one to have the benefit of the testimony of the others, as they are not competent witnesses for each other.....554, 1287

Proper location of the prisoners within the bar, where there were 12 in number.1287

A prisoner on trial for perjury, who persists in interrupting the district attorney during his opening address, may be removed from the court room during such address.. 773

Where there is any doubt whether witnesses for the prosecution will appear, they should be recognized..... 944

A witness whose name is on the back of the indictment need not be called by the prosecution, if not material..... 905

A question will not be allowed to be put to a witness which ought not to be answered 682

After the case and arguments were closed, the prosecution was allowed to introduce records and explanations thereof by the town clerk to show a conveyance of the locus of the crime as affecting the jurisdiction of the court. Held, that it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse to allow defendant to introduce evidence in respect to the incidents immediately preceding the crime..... 650

In capital cases, counsel should state the points of law on which they wish instructions to the jury, at some time before the charge is given, that the court may have time to examine and consider them.....1287

Counsel will not be allowed to argue to the jury a point of law which has been decided by the court.....673, 1062

Counsel will not be permitted to argue to the jury questions as to the constitutionality of the law under which the indictment is found 239

Evidence.

Any person charged with a crime in the federal courts has a right before as well as after indictment to the process of the court to compel the attendance of his witnesses.. 30

The court has no right to refuse its aid to motions for papers to which the accused may be entitled, and which may be material to his defense..... 30

An accused has the right, before indictment found, to compel, by way of precaution, the production of letters containing statements of his conduct, written by the person who is declared to be the essential witness against him..... 30

In Virginia a motion for subpœna duces tecum is to the discretion of the court, and, as a legal means of obtaining testimony, it cannot be regularly opposed by the opposite party, in his character as such..... 30

Where it does not affirmatively appear that letters and executive orders in the hands of the president, which may be material to the defense of an accused, contain any matter which it would be imprudent to disclose, a subpœna duces tecum will issue.. 30

In the case of a letter written to the president, and in the hands of the prosecuting attorney, the president alone can decide as to the propriety of withholding parts of it, and he cannot delegate his discretion 187

And in such case he is entitled to the production of the original letter, a copy not being sufficient 30

It is sufficient in an affidavit for the production of a paper in the possession of the prosecution to aver that it "may be material" to the defense..... 187

The accused has the right to show the spirit and temper with which the prosecution has been conducted..... 905
Letters written after the crime was committed cannot be given in evidence as the act of a confederate.....1245
Acts or declarations of a witness who was assumed to be a guilty agent, but not made in furtherance of the purposes of the crime for which defendant stands accused, cannot affect the defendant directly.....1245
On a separate trial of one of three persons jointly indicted for murder, it is not competent for him to give in evidence a conversation between the other two, when they were alone, inculpating themselves, and exculpating him from all participation in the crime 896
The log book of a vessel is not proof per se of the facts therein stated, except in certain cases provided for by statute.....1287
Where a letter is in the hands of defendant, it need not be produced, or notice given to defendant to produce it, before evidence is given of the contents of the answer..... 883
Where, on an indictment for forging and delivering bank notes, the forging of a large quantity, and the delivery of one note, are proved, evidence of the contents of the letter to an accomplice from defendant on the subject of counterfeit notes, which the accomplice believed had been lost, is admissible 883
A confession upon oath before a magistrate cannot be given in evidence against the prisoner 922
Confessions made to a justice of the peace on a preliminary examination are inadmissible, if obtained by any inducement held out by the justice..... 629
A confession made under the influence of hope or fear is inadmissible, and in such case subsequent confessions are equally inadmissible 409
Where confessions are once induced by improper influences, subsequent voluntary confessions are inadmissible, unless it be shown that the prior improper influence has been removed..... 629
A confession made on a preliminary hearing by a prisoner previously cautioned by the magistrate held inadmissible, where, 42 hours before, he had made a confession to one of the magistrate's officers, under the influence of false promises..... 404
Grand jurors may testify as to the confessions made by the prisoner before them upon oath, when under examination as a witness against another..... 409
The declarations of an alleged counterfeiter, when apprehended, that he had never been at the house where he was apprehended until such time, are admissible to repel any unfavorable conclusion which his silence might have warranted..... 682
Declarations of an alleged counterfeiter of the purpose for which he was going to the house where he was apprehended among counterfeiters are admissible in evidence... 682
The character of the dying statements, their consistency with the established facts, and all the circumstances of the dying man, are to be considered by the jury in determining the weight to which his account of the transaction is entitled.....1335
Evidence of the general bad character of defendant is not admissible, unless he first bring evidence to support his character... 310
The acts of the accused in a different district, which constitute in themselves substantive causes for prosecution, cannot be given in evidence, unless they go directly to prove the charges laid in the indictment 187
In a case of circumstantial evidence the jury must find the circumstances to be satisfactorily proved as facts, and that those facts clearly and unequivocally imply the guilt of the accused, and cannot be reasonably reconciled with any hypothesis of his innocence 896

Under doubtful circumstances of guilt, good character will lead to the acquittal of defendant 1013
A "reasonable doubt" must be a doubt for which a reason can be given..... 213
The reasonable doubt which should lead to an acquittal must arise from a deliberate consideration of the evidence.....1174
The reasonable doubt which should lead to an acquittal should be founded on something in the case as disclosed by the testimony which leaves in the mind a rational uncertainty as to guilt, not removed by any other matter in the testimony.....1335

Instructions.

It is error to instruct the jury that the evidence is sufficient to convict defendant.1065
Where the court is of the opinion that the evidence is not sufficient to warrant a conviction, it should direct an acquittal.....1225

Jury.

The court has power to discharge the jury, even in capital cases, whenever it is necessary for the purposes of justice.... 622

Verdict.

One good count in an indictment will sustain a general verdict of guilty..... 944
Where there are two or more counts upon distinct offenses, or upon different statements of the same offense, the jury may find a verdict upon any or all of such counts; and where they disagree upon any count, they may be discharged as to that, and it will stand for retrial..... 770
A verdict: "We, of the jury, say that A. B. is not proved to be guilty under this indictment by any evidence submitted to us. We therefore find him not guilty,"—is, in effect, a verdict of not guilty, and will be so entered on the record.. 55

Judgment: Sentence.

After conviction, a motion in arrest of judgment will not be decided where defendant has forfeited his recognizance, and does not appear in person.....1022
The objection that the district in which seamen indicted for endeavoring to make a mutiny and revolt were tried was not the district in which they were first brought and apprehended, cannot be taken for the first time on motion in arrest of judgment 692
On a trial and conviction for a capital offense before a circuit court held by two judges, it is competent for such court, when held by only one of the judges, to pass sentence 1364
If a person be convicted of a second offense while under sentence for the first, the sentence for the second may be made to commence from the expiration or other termination of the period for which he was first sentenced 1051

Bombazines, being goods of which wool is a component part, held dutiable at 30 per cent. (Act 1824, c. 136.).... 456

Invoice: Entry: Appraisal.
The term "ad valorem," as used in the customs laws, does not always mean the actual value of the article at the place of exportation 461
The cost of packages in which molasses was imported held to form a proper item of its value on which to charge ad valorem duties 461
Wool must pay duty on its weight on arrival, though the same was increased by absorption of moisture, where not exposed to or injured by sea water.... 420
Any money which is in common use as a medium of purchase and sale, though not of the coinage of the country, is a currency of the country within Act March 3, 1801.. 915
Where the invoice is made out in a currency other than that of the purchase with intention of taking advantage of a usage of the treasury officers, whereby less duties would be paid than those exacted if the currency actually used was stated, the invoice is falsely made up under Act May 28, 1830, § 4.... 915
"Actual cost" means the cost at the place of exportation, with the addition of all dutiable charges. The fact that the goods could be manufactured for the invoice price is immaterial 996
A manufacturing importer is one who controls, directs, or superintends the artisans whose skill and labor is used in preparing an article for sale or use, or who is the general head or proprietor of an establishment in which articles are manufactured 1095
An intent to defraud will be imputed to manufacturers who invoice goods at the cost price under a misapprehension of the law, supposing themselves to be purchasers, where such invoicing tended to evade or defraud the revenue, though they in fact had no such intent....1095
The collector may cause a re-examination and valuation of goods after an appraiser has passed the same.... 996
The assistant appraisers, under Act May 28, 1830, are in aid of those under Act March 1, 1823, and an appraisement by each set is not necessary....1182
After the duties have been liquidated and paid, and the goods delivered, the collector cannot make a reliquidation upon the subsequent report of an appraiser who never saw the goods 1207
The year within which the collector can reliquidate the duty (Act 1874, c. 391, § 21) runs from the time of the presentation to the collector of the entry by the importer, and not from the time of the first liquidation of the duty....1207

Lien for duties.
The United States is not deprived of its lien for duties unpaid by an adverse decision on an information in rem on a seizure for an alleged violation of law.....1103

Actions for duties.
Duties are a personal debt against the importer which may be collected by civil action 1277
In an action against importers to recover the difference between estimated and liquidated duties, evidence is not admissible to show that the goods were not of the kind as returned by the appraisers, where there had been no appeal to the secretary of the treasury.... 677
The importer or consignee of imported goods is personally liable for the duties charged thereon 878
The duties accrue at the time of the arrival of the goods at their proper port of entry, and not at the time of the subsequent entry at the custom house..... 878

Actions for duties paid.
Duties wrongly imposed, if paid by the importer voluntarily, and without protest or remonstrance, cannot be recovered from or set off against the United States..... 461
The decision of the collector as to the amount of duty to be paid is final in all cases except where there is an appeal to the secretary of the treasury, and suit brought to recover back the duty as provided in Act June 30, 1864, § 14..... 677
The collector's decision is final in the absence of payment, protest, and appeal, both in the case of an error of judgment as to the rate and amount of duties, and as to informalities and irregularities respecting the appraisal. (Rev. St. § 2931.)..... 410

Violations of law: Forfeiture.
A new penalty, imposed for a violation of laws previously defined, may be enforced, though unknown to the claimant at the time of the violation.....1182

A vessel is liable to forfeiture for landing without permit merchandise over the value of $400 (Act 1799, c. 128, § 50), whether the owner is innocent or not..... 716
Appurtenances or equipments of a ship, purchased bona fide for its use, may be landed without a permit under such act.. 391
A discharge of cargo into lighters is not an unloading of them. (Act March 2, 1799, § 50.).....1035
A conviction and punishment by fine and imprisonment for smuggling (Act Aug. 30, 1842, § 19) will bar an action to recover the penalty for landing the goods without a permit 1263
Goods will not be forfeited because of the absence of the manifest, where it appears that the same was inadvertently lost by the master before the vessel sailed, and that no part of the cargo had been unshipped after it was taken on board..... 364
A surplus of cargo, equally with a deficiency, is a disagreement with the manifest under Act March 2, 1799, § 57.....1037
Defendant in such case, to obtain the benefit of the proviso excusing from the penalty, must not only satisfy the court that no part of the cargo had been landed or unladen after it was taken on board as specified in the report, and pursuant to permits duly obtained, but also that the disagreement was by mistake or accident.....1037
The concealment which works a forfeiture need not be with the concurrence, knowledge, or consent of the owner or consignee. (Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 68.)..1072
Such forfeiture may be enforced before the time has passed for the owner to enter the goods, and is unaffected by a subsequent offer, made as soon as the owner was aware of the arrival of the goods.....1072
What constitutes a concealment of goods within such act.....1048
A resistance of the seizure of goods, whereby the same are removed from the custody of the officer, is not a concealment 1048
Goods found concealed on board after the master has declared that the whole cargo is discharged are not protected from forfeiture by the proviso in section 57..... 351
The mixing of charcoal with sugar, for the purpose of reducing its grade, where the fact is not disclosed, will subject the same to forfeiture, though the importer acted in good faith..... 288
Effect of the change of the contents of a cask of imported spirits without first obliterating the marks and surrendering the certificate required by law..... 987
A false entry does not subject the goods to forfeiture under Act July, 1866, § 4, "to prevent smuggling and for other purposes." 1081
A purchaser whose invoice truly states the actual cost is not subject to any forfeiture where the valuation is raised by the customs officers for the purposes of imposing duty 1095
A fraudulent entry of goods at less that than their actual value, where knowingly made on a false invoice, will subject them to forfeiture under Act March 3, 1863, § 1..1081
A false valuation in an invoice of goods subject to ad valorem duty is a price charged in the invoice less than the fair and just buying and selling prices at the time and place where the invoice was made up..1182
Goods are forfeitable for an undervaluation in the invoice, though not discovered until after they have passed inspection.... 996
An indictment for smuggling (Rev. St. § 3082), describing the goods as "six cases containing silk goods of the value of $30,000, a more particular description of which is to the jurors unknown," being dutiable goods introduced into the port of New York from France, held sufficient... 433
It is not a sufficient description of the illegality of the original importation to say merely that the goods had been imported and brought into the United States contrary to law..... 433
Where a seizure is made on land, the claimant has the right to a trial by jury..1182
On an information for forfeiture of goods subject to ad valorem duty, the appraisement of public appraisers is a necessary and preparatory proceeding, and is prima facie evidence 1182
If the entry does not contain a part of the goods consigned by the same invoice and bill of lading, it is prima facie evidence that the duties have not been paid..... 365
The court will be liberal in the admission of evidence bearing upon the point whether goods were fraudulently entered, but evidence clearly irrelevant is not admissible 1177
Where goods proceeded against on the ground that the packages were made up with intent to evade and defraud the revenue were entered on the oath of a claimant taken as in the case of goods actually purchased, evidence that the real owner was the foreign manufacturer, and the claimant only a consignee, held immaterial.....1177
Where the invoice price is shown to be far below the market price, the importer has the burden of showing the price actually paid 983
A bona fide purchaser of goods imported at a fraudulent valuation before the United States has elected its remedy will be protected 1081
The consignee of goods imported at a fraudulent valuation, who, having no knowledge of the fraud, made advances and incurred expenses in relation thereto, will be protected 1081
A transfer of goods entered under a false invoice after the passage of the Revised Statutes and before the passage of Act Feb. 18, 1875, amending section 2864, gives no title as against the United States.....1176
The claimant of liquors found stored in large quantities in the upper room of a private house has the burden of showing that they were legally imported, and that the original packages had been inspected, marked, and branded as required by law..1104
A conspiracy to conceal or destroy papers relating to imported merchandise (Rev. St. § 5443) sent by the consignor to the consignee, showing its fraudulent entry, is punishable under Rev. St. § 5440.....¢. 799
Sufficiency of indictment in such case... 799
If the customs officer acts without probable cause in making a seizure, an indictment will not lie for resisting him. (Act March 2, 1799, c. 128, § 71.).....1270
Under Act March 2, 1867, the amount of fines, penalties, and forfeitures recovered, less the charges allowed, should be paid to the collector, who should deduct duties and charges, and pay the residue into the treasury, to be distributed, under the direction of the secretary, to the persons and in the proportions prescribed by the decree of the court 1273
Preparatory to such decree, the court, while in possession of the fund, will determine disputes between persons claiming as informers 1273

Customs officers.

A bond given by a collector of customs under Act March 2, 1799, binds the sureties from the time he assumed office, though not executed until several months thereafter..1004

No change made by law in the rate of duties, the routine of the office, or in the method of conducting it, which does not change materially the character of the office, will discharge the sureties on the official bond of the collector.....1267

Where duties not required by law were imposed on a collector of customs by the superior officers of the treasury department, he is still required to discharge his duties according to law, and the sureties on his official bond are liable for his failure to do so 1267

Delay on the part of the government in enforcing its rights cannot be set up as a defense 1267

The sureties on a bond of a collector of customs appointed during a recess of the senate are not liable for his acts after he accepted a new appointment made by the president by and with the advice of the senate 1004

The bond of a collector of customs as a depositor of public money and fiscal agent of the United States under Act Aug. 6, 1846, does not apply to past transactions..1004

Bonding: Warehousing.

The proper rate of duty on brandy warehoused December 1, 1866, and sold at auction after three years for nonpayment of duties, held to be the rate imposed by law at the expiration of three years from the date of the warehouse bond, and an additional duty equal to 10 per cent. thereof.. 969

DEBT, ACTION OF.

A demand of one sum in the declaration does not prevent the recovery of a smaller sum, diminished by intrinsic circumstances.. 581

DISORDERLY HOUSE.

A person who keeps an open house for the sale of liquors to all persons at all hours of the day and night, which is frequented by drunk and disorderly persons, is guilty of keeping a disorderly house..... 589

The sale of liquor to negroes and slaves on Sunday constitutes the offense of keeping a disorderly house..... 675

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS.

The federal district attorneys have exclusive direction and authority over the prosecutions committed by law to their charge until the cases come under control of the court..... 658

A direction given by the attorney general to a district attorney in respect to his official action in regard to an indictment cannot control the court..... 773

The district attorney is entitled to 2 per cent. on all moneys collected or realized in any proceeding under the revenue laws conducted by him.....1101

Where a proceeding in rem to forfeit property is compromised by the payment of a sum of money by the claimants, the district attorney is entitled to commissions upon such sum. (Act March 3, 1863, § 11.)..1101

DOWER.

Under Rev. St. Ill. 1833, p. 624, declaring that any provision in the will bars dower, the amount must be such as to afford a reasonable presumption that it was given in lieu of dower..... 926

Where the widow accepts a devise in lieu of dower, not knowing the extent of the estate, she may renounce under the will, and claim, after the lapse of years.. 926

Where necessary, she may bring a suit to ascertain the true condition of the estate to enable her to make a proper election.. 926

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS.

Electors in a state, who have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature, have the right, under Const. art. 1, § 2, to vote for representatives in congress, and congress has the constitutional power to protect that right 1350

The power to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections for representatives in congress (Const. art. 1, § 4) includes the power to protect the electors in a free interchange of views, in making a free choice, and in expressing that choice freely at the ballot box.....1350

The right of suffrage is not guaranteed to a citizen by the constitution of the United States, but the states have exclusive right to prescribe the qualification of voters, with the exception that the right of suffrage shall not depend upon race, color, or previous condition of servitude..... 701

Under the fifteenth amendment, congress cannot legislate in reference to any interference with the right of a colored person to vote which does not proceed from his race, color, or previous condition of servitude 707

Congress has power to interfere for the protection of voters at federal elections irrespective of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the federal constitution.. 701

An indictment for a conspiracy to prevent the giving of support and advocacy to an election (Rev. St. § 5520) need not set out the acts of advocacy and support which the conspiracy was formed to prevent....1350

The jurisdiction of the federal courts is not ousted by the fact that the indictment charges that in carrying out their design the conspirators were guilty of a crime of

EMBEZZLEMENT.

See, also, 'Post Office."

"Embezzle," as used in Rev. St. § 5209, in relation to officers and agents of national banks, describes a crime which a person has opportunity to commit by reason of some office or employment, and which is some breach of confidence or trust 591

In an indictment under Act March 3, 1825, c. 65, § 16, punishing any one who shall "fraudulently embezzle," etc., the word "feloniously" will not supply the place of "fraudulently."..... 1144

An indictment under such act must state that defendant was employed in the bank or an office of discount and deposit, etc., in some state or territory of the United States 1144

In an indictment for embezzling a letter containing a bank note (Act March 3, 1825) it is not necessary to state the particular office held by the accused, or that the note was of an incorporated bank, or of any value 440

The proposal by defendant to deposit a certain sum to secure the government for any amount that might be found due is not an admission of any amount being due, but a proposal of compromise.....1152

The items in a treasury transcript, if estimated and made up from hearsay, are not admissible in evidence against a public officer 1152

EQUITY.

Courts of equity will refuse to interfere in the case of stale demands.....1107

ESTOPPEL.

An acquiescence for nearly 20 years in a boundary established by a government official in discharge of his duties, in conformity to which improvements have been made, will estop one of the owners to assert that the line is erroneous..... 323

EVIDENCE.

See, also, "Criminal Law"; "Witness."

Presumptions: Burden of proof.

All doubts will be resolved adversely to defendant, who failed to produce his books of account, which would have assisted his defense if made in good faith..... 386

The same rule applies where proof has been voluntarily destroyed, or placed beyond the reach of the party..... 386

All doubts are resolved against a party who stands by and makes no denial when testimony of a damaging nature is given.. 386

Best and secondary.

Admissibility of parol evidence of contents of papers in defendant's possession without notice to produce them..... 309

The testimony of one of several eyewitnesses to the same facts is admissible without producing the others.....1287

Declarations and admissions.

The declarations of the principal connected with transactions to which the contract of the surety relates are admissible against the surety 740

The effect of statements made by a person against his interest cannot be avoided by contradictory statements.....1335

Documentary.

The transcript of the books and proceedings of the treasury department (Rev. St. § 886) in relation to the accounts of persons accountable for public money, is prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, so far as the same are authorized by law.... 979

A transcript from the treasury, which contains sums charged in gross as balances, is not evidence as to such balances. The original items must be stated..... 977

The treasury transcripts are admissible in a suit in a case of delinquency of a revenue officer or other person accountable for public moneys 740

Parol evidence.

The contents of a warrant cannot be proved by parol unless its nonproduction is satisfactorily accounted for..... 419

Competency: Materiality: Relevancy.

Proof of previous good character, and that without compulsion defendant sought an investigation, is admissible..... 705

Reputation is competent proof of the name of a person, place, or house..... 879

Authenticated public documents, giving account of all the mines and all the abandoned mines in a certain place, are not evidence to prove that a certain mine did not exist 1245

Handwriting.

The question whether two or more signatures are written by the same person is a proper subject of expert testimony..... 754

A witness testifying as to the handwriting must have seen the writing which the one in question resembles, and must come to a conclusion in his own mind..... 905

A person who had seen the alleged author of a writing write but once, and had no other means of knowing his handwriting, held not a competent witness to prove his handwriting 705

The knowledge of an expert in handwriting cannot be tested by placing before him irrelevant papers for the mere purpose of contradicting his testimony as to the handwriting thereon 394

Page

The jury may compare the handwriting of documents properly in evidence, and proved to have been written by defendant, with the handwriting of the papers in dispute, to prove their authorship..... 394
Standard specimens of defendant's handwriting being in evidence, an expert may point out features therein identical with those displayed in the writing in question 394
On trial of an indictment for depositing scurrilous postal cards in the mail, evidence is admissible of other writings of defendant containing identical errors in spelling, to prove authorship..... 394

EXECUTION.

An execution will be held fraudulent, as respects a subsequent one, where the creditor allows the debtor to retain possession of property levied upon, for an unreasonable length of time..... 599
Act Ark. Dec. 23, 1840, known as the "Valuation Law," is constitutional, and its provisions must be followed in executing the final process of the district court in the state 598

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

See, also, "Office and Officer."

The head of a department has discretionary power to allow for a bona fide performance of service by a public officer, or a bona fide expenditure of money, though not so expressly authorized by law..... 953
The direction of the president will be presumed, where money is advanced by the direction of the head of a proper department 740
The regulations of a department in settling its accounts are subject to the revision of a court and jury, when they work manifest injustice to individuals..... 231

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS.

Stock held by a trustee is not assets in the hands of his administrator..... 745
Nothing is assets in the hands of an administrator, applicable to the payment of a demand against the estate, within Civ. Code Or. § 1103, but money..... 979
Executors and administrators may be sued in their representative capacity in the federal courts, and judgments against them may be enforced by execution against the property of the estate unadministered 908
Judgment may be rendered de bonis testatoris under the laws of Arkansas, and executions may be issued against the estate of the intestate, which may be sold to satisfy the same..... 908

EXTORTION.

Laboring to exact fees from one party after having received them from another is not extortion 419

EXTRADITION.

Independent of statutory provisions or treaty stipulations, courts of justice are not bound nor authorized to remand prisoners for trial to a foreign government, whose laws they are supposed to have violated.. 786
A murder committed on board a British ship of war is committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, under the treaty of extradition 631

Page

It is not a good plea to an indictment for bribery that defendant was brought into the jurisdiction of the court under an extradition treaty on a charge of forgery... 237

FALSE PRETENSES.

It is not an indictable offense at common law to obtain books of account from a merchant by means of false and fraudulent pretenses 293

FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER.

It is not necessary that it should appear upon certiorari that the inquest was taken on the spot where the force was used, nor that the jurors should appear to be qualified according to the requisites of the common law 889

FORFEITURE.

See, also, "Customs Duties"; "Informers"; "Internal Revenue"; "Shipping."

The forfeiture takes effect at the time when the offense is committed, if the denunciation is expressed in direct terms, and not in the alternative.....1075
A bona fide purchaser of personal property which has been forfeited to the government by previous acts of the former owner is not protected against the title of the government 1075
A carrier which transported smuggled goods has no lien on them for the freight, as against the government, though innocent of the fraud.....1081
The bond for value (Act 1799, § 89), where property under bond for duties is seized in a warehouse, should represent its full market value, duties included..... 285
The acceptance of a bond to answer a judgment against the claimants of property forfeited does not reinvest the title in them 862
Where a bond is given upon the return of goods libeled as upon a seizure, and the libel is afterwards, by amendment, changed to an information, and the goods condemned, a compliance with the stipulations in the bond may be enforced by attachment against the obligors.....1180
Where the claimant is not a party to the bond, all the obligors are to be deemed principals 1180
Where the evidence does not agree with the specification of the offense, it is fatal on an information of forfeiture.....1192
The marshal's commissions for the sale of property, and collecting and paying over the proceeds, form part of the expenses to be deducted before paying the proceeds into court 1075

FORGERY.

The act of knowingly uttering as true a false and forged letter requesting the person to whom it is addressed to pay to the bearer a sum of money, with intent to defraud any person, is an offense at common law 313
The delivery of a sealed forged letter to the clerk of a person to whom it is addressed, and whom it is supposed is authorized to open it, is an uttering of it... 313
An indictment for possessing forged treasury notes and postal currency, with intent to pass them, must profess to give, and must actually give, exact copies of

them, or allege a reasonable excuse for not doing so 1091
The charge that the prisoner had in possession "divers" such forged instruments is too indefinite 1091
No notice is necessary to produce a paper in the hands of defendant, an accomplice, or a third person, who secretes it to protect defendant, or that evidence of its contents will be offered at the trial, though such paper is not the subject of the indictment 883
After evidence that a note of the description laid in the indictment has been forged and passed, evidence may be given of delivering or passing other counterfeited notes on the same bank before or after the passing the one in question, irrespective of time 883

GAMING.

It is an indictable offense at common law to keep a common gaming house for the purpose of gain..... 872
A person who hires out his billiard room for two days is liable to the penalty of Act Md. 1798, c. 113..... 969
The penalty for keeping a faro table in a place occupied as a tavern (Act Md. 1797, c. 110) may be recovered by indictment...1034
A person who keeps a gaming table is equally guilty, under the statutes of Maryland, whether he acted as principal, or as agent or servant of the owner..... 595
An indictment for keeping "a gaming table called a 'faro bank'" is not good under a statute punishing the offense "of keeping a faro bank or other common gaming table." 623

GRAND JURY.

As to the power and duty of the court to instruct the grand jury as to the admissibility and competency of evidence to be offered 55
A paper to go before the grand jury must be relevant to the case, but the fact that it is referred to by a witness, and wanted by the grand jury, is sufficient to establish its relevancy 55
A challenge to the array of the grand jury cannot be made after the jury is organized and has entered upon its duties.. 213

GRANT.

See, also, "Public Lands."

The jurisdiction conferred upon the special tribunal created for the settlement of claims to lands in California, of Spanish and Mexican origin, and upon the courts empowered to review its decisions (Act March 3, 1851), was in its nature exclusive, and the decrees of such tribunals are not open to review in any court.....1107
The subject of surveys of confirmed claims is under the control of the land department, and its action is not subject to the supervision of the courts, however erroneous 1107
If the bill showed that the decree had been procured by fraud of the grossest character, the court would still be without jurisdiction, for it has no authority to pass upon the propriety of the decree.....1107
Whether the issue of a previous grant of 11 leagues to a claimant disqualifies him from receiving a second grant is a question of law, and any error in its decision can be corrected only on appeal.....1107
Where the district court had ordered a survey of a confirmed claim to land under a Mexican grant into court for examination (Act June 14, 1860), its jurisdiction over the entire subject-matter continued until the survey of the claim was finally disposed of, notwithstanding Act July 1, 1864 331
Act May 6, 1864, in relation to claimants of San Ramon rancho lands, does not give the district court power to revise a decree of confirmation rendered by it under an agreement between the claimant and the district attorney, in the absence of mistake 299
Purchasers of land under final decrees of confirmation cannot be disturbed upon charges of fraud in the prosecution of the claims confirmed, and vague allegation of notice of such fraud.....1107
An inchoate title, followed by juridical possession, presents an equity which the United States are bound to respect.....1014
A dividing line between two ranchos fixed in proceedings for the confirmation of one, to which the claimant of the other was a party, held, should not be disturbed on exceptions to the official survey of the latter rancho 821
Where it appears that the original petition was for half a league of land, a claim to a larger extent will not be allowed.... 809
A consent to occupy land under "a provisional license" given on a petition for a grant of land for pasturage will not give petitioners any right to the absolute fee which will be respected by the government.. 805
Construction of decree for the location of a lot under a Mexican grant, based upon the language used by a witness..... 802
A survey made on instructions by the government without consultation with the claimant, or allowance to him of an opportunity to make an election as to the land to be surveyed, will be set aside..... 679
In the absence of a grant, a long-continued, notorious and exclusive possession under claim of ownership, with definite boundaries and recognition of proprietary rights, is essential to entitle a claim to confirmation 371
A measurement and segregation from the public domain of the specific land granted within the boundaries designated was essential to a complete investiture of the title 331
It is a sufficient severance from the public domain when the grant itself designates by unmistakable natural boundaries the limits of the district within which it is to be located, and where the particular land granted is specified by name.....*1214
The danger from savages is no excuse for not complying with the condition of the grant, requiring settlement on the land to be made within one year.....*1214
A neglect to occupy and settle before the conquest, where the grant was made less than a month before the capture of Monterey, held not unreasonable.....*1237
A fraudulent attempt to alter the date of a grant so as to obviate an apprehended objection to its validity cannot take away from the claimant any lands actually granted to him before the acquisition of the country by the United States.....*1237
The nonproduction of the grant will not affect the validity of the claim, where its loss is proved, and long and notorious occupation of the land has been established.... 329
An election of location of a grant as shown by the erection of buildings, and by the cultivation of the land, will prevail as against a location shown by deeds of the tract 323
Under Act June 14, 1860, settlers can object to the location of a Mexican grant only through the United States district attorney 310, 1134

The Mexican governors of California had no authority to remove the disabilities of foreigners in respect to holding lands under the Mexican laws of 1836 and 1842... 266

After the passage of the Mexican law of 1842 relating to foreigners, no unnaturalized foreigner could receive a grant of land without the express license of the supreme government 266

As to the presumption in favor of the validity of a grant to one supposed to be a French citizen by the governor of California, shortly before the territory passed from his hands 266

After the lapse of many years, where large interests have been acquired on the faith of the finality of a decree, the location will not be disturbed, except in the case of manifest error, and on clear proof of incorrectness.....1131

Advantage will be taken of ambiguity or discrepancies in the language of a decree of confirmation to restrict the claimant to the land actually granted..... 803

Under the ordinances of the former government, all grants of public land were required to be measured in a square or rectangular form, or into a trapezium, where natural objects prevented the other measurement 810

The court has no authority to deflect and modify lines so as to exclude particular parcels, even where they have been settled upon by others in good faith..... 810

Where a survey made under a decree of confirmation is objected to as erroneous, before a patent issues the court must direct its return in order that the questions raised as to the location and boundary may be heard and determined.....1134

An error in running a survey so as to include a different tract from that described in the grant and delineated on the diseño will be rectified by the court when the survey is submitted for approval.....1128

A clear and definite call for a line as of a given course and direction will not be controlled by an indefinite act of possession 1015

The words "a little more or less" will be held to pass all the land included within the boundaries named, though in excess of the quantity named, where the description and the circumstances justify the belief that such was the intention.....1022

The words "a little more or less" held operative for such fractional parts of a league as may be in excess of the quantity named in the grant.....*1157

Under a grant of land "of the extent of two square leagues, a little more or less," the judicial officer has no power to confirm a tract of 3½ leagues..... 329

Under a grant of "three square leagues, a little more or less, as the respective diseño explains," held, that three leagues were granted to be taken anywhere within the tract bounded by the ranchos named.. 310

A survey referring to a tree as a live oak tree, where the only tree reasonably answering such description is a white oak tree, will not, on that ground, be overthrown 1015

Where a cause is remanded for further proceedings involving additional proofs, the United States are entitled to a reasonable time in which to close their testimony....1159

An alleged grant made by a priest of the mission of Santa Clara under authority given in certain communications from the governor and commanding general, rejected 1240

HABEAS CORPUS.

The federal circuit court cannot issue the writ for the purpose of surrendering, in discharge of bail, a principal confined merely under process of a state court, but in such case the court may respite the recognizance 1217

An Indian is a "person," within the meaning of the habeas corpus act, and may sue out the writ in the federal courts, when deprived of his liberty under color of authority of the United States, or when in custody for violation of its constitution, laws, or treaties..... 695

HIGHWAYS.

The road from Georgetown, D. C., to Little Falls bridge, held not a public highway, because the location thereof was not recorded among the public records.....1014

The Georgetown Bridge Company held bound to keep in repair the road leading from Georgetown to the Little Falls bridge 1286

A road officer in Virginia who has not been notified of his appointment is not liable for the penalty under Act Va. Jan. 5, 1786..... 739

HOMICIDE.

A master who, by physical force, compels a seaman to go aloft, when, by reason of great debility or exhaustion, he cannot do so without danger, is guilty of murder, where the seaman falls from the mast and is drowned.....1208

If the master acts without malice, the crime is reduced to manslaughter.....1208

The crime will be considered to have been committed with malice aforethought, however sudden the occasion, when the act is done with such cruel circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit..... 650

The order of a superior military officer to an inferior will not, of itself, justify the willful killing of another..... 306

Officers charged with the good order of a camp or fort will not be required to weigh with scrupulous decision the exact amount of force necessary to preserve order 306

The setting of spring guns in open fields or outbuildings, and not within the privilege of the domicile, without notice, will not excuse or justify a homicide which may ensue 1319

When homicide excused by the acts of deceased 1222

Intoxication at the time of committing a crime is no excuse or mitigation..... 650

It is no defense that one accused of murder was more ignorant, and somewhat more stupid, than common men of bad education, bad passions, and bad habits, if he was not deficient in understanding.... 650

No mere words applied by one to another will justify the use of a deadly weapon,

HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Under the laws of New York a married woman is authorized to carry on the business of a distiller, on her own account and for her own benefit; and she will be bound by a bond given to the government, conditioned according to the laws relating to bonded warehouses 1258

INDIANS.

Indians born of a tribe which has ceased to maintain its tribal integrity, who are subject to local taxation, are citizens of the United States and of the state of their residence, and possess the right to vote in national elections 1006
The right of expatriation is a natural, inherent, and inalienable right, and extends to the Indians as well as to white persons 695
Under the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, congress has power to prohibit all intercourse with them except under license 422
The power of congress to regulate commerce with the Indians does not necessarily cease on their being included within the limits of a state..... 422
Where the Indians occupy a territory of very limited extent within a state surrounded by a white population, and it becomes impracticable to enforce a law prohibiting intercourse, federal jurisdiction will cease 422
Congress has constitutional power to pass laws punishing Indians for crimes and offenses committed against the United States 414
Indians at peace with the government cannot be arrested and held for the purpose of removing them to and confining them on a reservation in the Indian Territory 695
The military power may be employed to effect the removal of a person from an Indian reservation in a proper case, but the person thus removed cannot be held by the military authorities..... 695
The commissioner of Indian affairs may remove from an Indian reservation all persons found thereon without authority of law, or whose presence may be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians.. 695
An Indian agent has a right to an allowance in addition to a salary as fixed by Act April 20, 1818, for such services or expenditures as are authorized by a general usage of the war department..... 953
Expenditures made by an Indian agent for the benefit of the Indians, and on a tract of land reserved and held by themselves, are not to be charged to the United States 953
Rev. St. § 2139, was only intended to prohibit the selling, giving, or bartering of spirituous liquors or wine to an Indian in the Indian country 906
The Indian need not be under the actual control or immediate personal superintendence of an Indian agent, to make the sale of liquor to him an offense under Act May 15, 1864, if the tribe to which he belonged is under the charge of such agent, and he maintains his tribal relation.....1128
The Indians on the Oneida reservation have the right to cut and use the timber thereon, and to sell sufficient to support themselves and families.....1171

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION.

See. also, "Criminal Law."

The crime of conspiring to injure or intimidate citizens in the exercise of their civil rights is an infamous crime, which must be proceeded against by indictment, and not by information..... 226
Offenses arising under the internal revenue laws, being misdemeanors merely, and not infamous, may be prosecuted by information filed by the district attorney... 972
Where the statute prescribes a particular mode of enforcing payment of a penalty, an indictment will not lie.....1004
An indictment will not lie for an offense under a statute which gives an action of debt to the informer.....1236
An indictment will not be quashed because there was no previous information, hearing, and binding over.....1223
When a presentment for a misdemeanor is found by the grand jury without the name of a prosecutor, the court will order an indictment to be sent to the grand jury upon the suggestion of the prosecuting attorney 922
An indictment will be quashed as irregularly found, where the grand jury received testimony of a person not under oath 622
In Mississippi it is not necessary that the minutes of the court should show the finding of the indictment, where the party is not under arrest, or on recognizance... 778
The finding of a grand jury need not be read in open court, but it is sufficient if the bill be handed to the clerk in open court, and the entry made by him on the record 213
A conclusion against the form of the statute (in the singular) is sufficient in all cases where the offense is distinctly within more than one independent statute....1287
A conclusion against the form of the statute (in the plural) is good even if the offense be punishable by a single statute only 1287
An indictment alleging a statute offense in the words of the act is not vitiated by a conclusion which calls the offense by a wrong name 1002
An indictment which fails to conclude "against the peace and dignity of the U. S." may be quashed..... 694
Query, whether an indictment will lie for assault and battery upon "a person unknown" without the addition "to the jurors." 774
Anything that forms part of the description of the crime is not a matter of form. (Rev. St. § 1025.)..... 591
A statement that defendant was a bookkeeper in a certain place held not equivalent to an averment that he was a clerk or servant employed therein.....1144

Where two allegations are sensible and consistent in the places where they occur, but are inconsistent with each other, neither can be rejected..... 901

Separate indictments will lie for the larceny of several cows from the same place at the same time..... 1341

Under Act Feb. 26, 1853, separate indictments against different persons cannot be consolidated, although the offense was joint, and they might have been jointly indicted 939

An indictment in which there is a joinder of offenses or offenders, so far as the jury are concerned, is to be considered a several one as to each of such offenses or offenders.. 770

The prosecuting attorney will not be required to elect between different counts which charge offenses of different grades of the same class connected with the same transaction 850

In an indictment for a misdemeanor, several offenses may be joined in different counts, and the prosecution cannot be compelled to elect between them..... 840

One or more good counts in an indictment will sustain a general verdict of guilty, though there are bad counts..... 207

The court will not stop the trial on the ground that the proof does not show a case clearly within the indictment, but will leave the prisoners to their remedy by motion in arrest of judgment..... 784

An indictment for receiving stolen goods, charging that the accused received the goods from the principal felon, is not sustained by proof that they were received from the person to whom the thief had delivered them 796

The defendant may be found guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged in the indictment..... 306

Upon an indictment for burglary the prisoner may be found guilty of larceny only.. 872

Upon an indictment at common law for an assault with intent to kill, defendant may be found guilty of a simple assault only... 701

An information may be amended by filling up the blank of the date of the commission of the offense..... 1034

INFORMERS.

He who, with the intention of having his information acted upon, first gives information of a violation of law which induces the prosecution, and contributes to the recovery of the fine, penalty, or forfeiture, is entitled to the informer's share..... 1277

The information must be given to some government official who has the power and duty to act thereon, and, where several causes exist, information of any one is sufficient 1226

A person claiming to share in the judgment must be the first informer, and his information must be substantially true and capable of proof..... 1226

The information must be a plain statement in writing of some one substantial cause, matter, or thing, whereby a fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred, and it must be sworn to, if required by the officer..... 1226

The claim of an informer can only date from the time when he actually gave the proper formal information, not when he ascertained the facts..... 1226

Customs officers and informers are entitled to share only in fines, penalties, and forfeitures which are created by some law of the United States..... 1277

The share of the informer must be taken from the net, and not the gross, proceeds.. 1226

An assistant assessor of internal revenue held entitled to the informer's share, where he gives information, leading to the indictment and conviction of an offender, which he acquired of his own motion, while in the discharge of his official duties..... 412

The penalty of a recognizance for the appearance in court of a defendant charged with a crime under Act March 2, 1799, is not a penalty recovered by virtue of such act, and the informer is not entitled to a share therein..... 1039

The informer is not entitled to a share in money paid into court by the sureties on the recognizance..... 1039

The additional duties of 20 per cent. ad valorem imposed for undervaluation (Act July 30, 1846, § 8) are not fines and penalties, and the collector is not entitled to a moiety of them..... 527

The reward given by Rev. St. Me. c. 121, § 11, must be apportioned by the court between the informer and prosecutor according to their respective merit..... 284

Distribution of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures incurred under the customs laws..... 1273, 1277

INJUNCTION.

Where the injury threatened is of a character not easily remedied, if the injunction be refused, and there is no denial that the act charged is contemplated, a temporary injunction should be granted, unless the case made by the bill is satisfactorily refuted.. 923

Query, whether a federal court is not forbidden by Act March 2, 1793, § 5, from granting an injunction to stay an execution sale in a state court of vessels on which the government has mortgage liens for advances made to build them..... 539

To entitle defendant to a dissolution of an injunction on the answer, the denial must be of facts, and not of conclusions..... 293

Insanity.

The rights of the United States to priority in the payment of its debts, and the remedies for its enforcement against assignees of debtors..... 447

The United States has no priority in payment of its debts, under Act March 3, 1797, § 5, unless the assignment by the debtor be a general assignment, or in the case of legal insolvency, where, by operation of law, the debtor's property is taken out of his hands to be distributed by others..... 447

Act March 3, 1797, § 5, does not give to one part of a debt due to the United States a priority over any other part, nor does it affect the right of the debtor to apply a payment of money in his hands to either of two debts to the United States..... 483

The assignee is liable only if he has notice of the debt to the United States, but the notice need be such only as is sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry.... 447

The priority of the United States does not entitle them to prior satisfaction by attachment and levy over prior attaching creditors 277

The United States are not entitled to a preference over firm creditors for the payment of the individual debt of a partner out of the assets of the partnership..927, 1033

The necessary expenses of administration are to be paid before a debt due to the United States..... 979

The administrator is bound to discharge taxes and funeral charges before satisfying the claim of the United States as a creditor 979

A debt due to the United States is to be preferred to the expenses of the last illness; but, where the same have been duly paid by the administrator without notice of the claim of the government, the priority of the latter is lost..... 979

A debt due from the administrator, and returned on the inventory as solvent, is presumed to have been collected, and is therefore assets in his hands applicable to the payment of a debt due from the deceased to the United States..... 979

The priority given to the United States (Rev. St. § 3466) is not a lien upon the property of the insolvents in the hands of the assignee or administrator, but only a right to a priority of payment out of the proceeds of such property after notice of the claim.. 979

The priority of the United States does not yield to the claims of any creditors, however high may be the dignity of their debts 927

The priority of the United States does not supersede a mortgage on land, nor a judgment made perfect by the issue of an execution and a levy on real estate..... 927

A bona fide conveyance, mortgage, or execution, before the right of preference in the United States has accrued by an act of insolvency, will pass the right of property freed from liability for debts due to the United States..... 811

The United States, not made parties to a bill in a state court for the payment of partnership debts out of its assets in the hands of the administrator of a partner who had died insolvent indebted to the United States, are not bound by the decree rendered therein..... 927

In case of the insolvency of surviving judgment debtors in a suit on a bond for customs duties, the United States may in equity recover the debt out of the assets of a deceased judgment debtor, whose estate was also insolvent, in virtue of their general priority... 734

Priority of payment of the United States out of the effects of an insolvent debtor stated in a charge to a jury.....1087

INSPECTION.

The penalty for not complying with an order to produce books and papers (Act June 22, 1874) is that the allegations in the motion shall be taken as confessed..... 868

INTERNAL REVENUE.

See, also, "Forfeiture"; "Informers."

Officers of internal revenue.

A collector, deputy collector, or inspector of internal revenue may, without process, enter any building where distilled spirits subject to tax are produced or kept, so far as may be necessary for examining the same (Rev. St. § 3177), and may without process seize illicit distilled spirits (section 3453)..1053

An officer who is acting without or in excess of authority may be lawfully resisted or obstructed.....1053

A person may be guilty, under Rev. St. § 3177, of obstructing a revenue officer in entering a building, etc., although he does not own the building or the articles subject to tax, and did not make, produce, or keep them 1053

Sufficiency of indictment under such section 1053

Officers' fees need not be immediately paid over to the internal revenue department, but may be accounted for in the semiannual returns of the officers..... 420

The sureties on a collector's bond are liable for the sum received by a collector under Act June 30, 1864, § 122, though there was no assessment or return made of the tax 412

On a prosecution of a collector for accepting a fraudulent bond, evidence of the acceptance of other forged bonds, and a delay to investigate after fraud was suggested, is admissible to show his participation in the fraud..... 260

Assessments and collections.

Evidence that the pecuniary circumstances of a distiller were apparently improved while engaged in distilling, during a period when such business was not profitable, is not admissible to show fraud..... 380

The assessor's original list, transmitted to the collector, is prima facie evidence of the amount of the tax due..... 227

Special taxes.

A "spirit medium," who performs various feats for pay, held liable to pay license as a "juggler"..... 492

The provision in Act March 3, 1865, extending the definition of "brokers" given in Act June 30, 1864, § 79, subd. 9, does not apply to section 99 of the act of 1864.....1089

A sale of intoxicating liquors without a license is a violation of Act June 30, 1864, § 73, although the person intended to give the proceeds to a charitable use..... 879

A sale of a single lot of spirits which have been taken for a debt, in quantities of not less than five gallons at one time, does not make the person a wholesale liquor dealer. (Rev. St. § 3242.).....1058

Where a license is issued to a firm, the continuing partner, on the dissolution of the firm, may carry on the business until the end of the year.....752, 1332

Distilled spirits.

To make one in possession of a still a distiller, because he keeps mash, wort, or wash, the mash, wort, or wash kept must be such as will produce spirits on distillation. (Rev. St. § 3247.).....1218

Page

Rectifiers and distillers must take the proper steps to ascertain what the rules and regulations are as to keeping of a book as required by Act July 13, 1866, § 26 951

Act July 13, 1866, § 26, as to the entries of purchases and sales or receipts and deliveries of spirits, is complied with as to entries made before the act of 1868, if the entries, although made in a continuous manner, without anything to designate to what the figures refer, are a true statement of such transaction.....1068

The duty of making such entries may be delegated to a clerk, but the principal is responsible if the proper entries are not made 1068

Spirits merely poured from the original packages into an open vat for rectification, need not be again inspected, gauged, and branded. (Act 1866, c. 184, § 43.)..... 982

A distiller cannot avail himself of any mistake of the officer in overgauging the spirits 951

Spirits once removed from the distiller's bonded warehouse to a general bonded warehouse cannot be again removed to another bonded warehouse.....1098

A permit of a collector to transport spirits from a distillery warehouse to a general bonded warehouse is not evidence of a compliance with the prerequisites to a removal of the spirits required by sections 38, 40, Act July 13, 1866.....1097

A distiller's bond for the payment of a tax (Act July 13, 1866) is not a penalty, but a contract or security, and is unaffected by the repealing act of January 11, 1868..... 951

The tax must be paid at the rate prescribed by the law in force at the time the bond was given..... 951

A conviction and sentence for violation of the law is no bar to an action on the distiller's bond, unless the sentence is actually fulfilled 717

A pardon operates the same as an actual fulfillment of the sentence, and completely releases the sureties from all liability for the acts or breach of duty charged..... 717

The destruction of spirits by fire while in a distillery warehouse, due to the absence of the government storekeeper, does not release the bondsman from liability for the amount of taxes due.....1049

Fermented liquors.

The terms "malt liquor" and "fermented liquor" are used synonymously in Act June 6, 1872, and the brewer is expressly required to enter all malt liquors in his book, whether sold to other brewers or the public 890

Ignorance or carelessness will not excuse the neglect of a brewer to keep the prescribed books and accounts. (Act July 13, 1866, § 49.).....1173

Tobacco: Cigars.

A person who keeps leaf tobacco for sale is a dealer, and a single sale is sufficient to fix his character as such, and to render him liable for the penalty of $500 for failure to keep a book, and make returns of purchases and sales. (Act July 20, 1868, § 76.) 752

A cigar manufacturer must not only return the sales of cigars manufactured by him, but of those purchased by him and resold 489

The punishment imposed for selling unstamped cigars (Act July 20, 1868, § 89) is not confined to importers and manufacturers, though they alone are required to pack the cigars and affix the stamp..... 976

Banks and bankers.

A loan and trust company which issues certificates of deposit, and makes loans on stocks, bonds, and other security, is subject to the payment of the license fee imposed by Act 1864, § 79, cl. 1.....1040

Such company is "engaged in the business of banking," so as to be liable for the payment of a duty of $1/24$ of 1 per cent. for each month upon the average amount of its deposits, as provided by Act 1864, § 110.....1040

The undistributed surplus earnings of savings banks, added during the year to their contingent funds, are subject to taxation, under Act July 13, 1866, § 9..... 887

It is immaterial that such fund is held as an authorized security for depositors.. 887

A banking firm held not punishable for a contempt in refusing to produce their books on the demand of a supervisor of the internal revenue, and in not appearing in response to a summons, where they asked a short delay to consult counsel, and there was no place of return in the summons 1143

Stamp taxes on specific objects.

Goods are sold "in the original and unbroken package" (Act July 13, 1866) although the package is open for inspection, if closed again before delivery without the contents being changed.....1194

A match box, holding less than 100 matches, containing two sliding drawers, held but one parcel or package. (Rev. St. § 3437.) 1342

Income tax.

Taxability of promissory notes, book accounts, etc., due during the year.....1221

Interest on bonds of a corporation held by nonresident aliens is not taxable under Act June 30, 1864, § 122, amended by Act July 13, 1866, § 9.....1019

Only one penalty is recoverable for all failures to make returns for taxation under Acts June 30, 1864, and July 13, 1866, prior to the commencement of a suit....1019

Violations of law, and punishment—In general.

Permission from the commissioner of internal revenue will not justify an unlawful act 1194

A person is not relieved from the consequences of a violation of law by the neglect of a revenue officer to perform a duty required of him by law..... 840

Act June 22, 1874, requiring the production of books and papers, applies to cases arising under the internal revenue laws.. 868

Under Act July 20, 1868, § 96, where the statute has attached no punishment to the doing or omitting of acts required or forbidden, such act or omission, when knowingly or willfully committed, will be punished by the infliction of the penalty and forfeiture provided therein.....1192

When the punishment prescribed for violation of the internal revenue laws is a pecuniary penalty or fine only, and the act fixes the exact amount, an action of debt will lie to recover it..... 973

Where the amount of the fine is not fixed, but left to the discretion of the court, the prosecution must be by indictment.... 973

Where the law provides that imprisonment either may or must be a part of the punishment, the prosecution must be by indictment 973

—— Grounds of forfeiture.

A vinegar manufacturer is liable under 15 Stat. 125, if, by the process used by him, he obtains alcohol from his mash, so that he is saved the expense of purchasing the alcohol necessary for the making of vinegar 852

Page

A distillery is subjected to forfeiture by the omission to make such entries in the distiller's books as the law requires, or by the making of false entries, or the refusal to produce them on proper demand. (Rev. St. §§ 3303, 3304.) 853

False brands placed upon tobacco caddies by a revenue officer without any complicity in the fraud by claimant is no ground of forfeiture 989

A failure to produce the books of claimant after an order duly served, where unexplained, will entitle the United States to a forfeiture 1179

The connivance of the government storekeeper in the frauds committed by the person who runs the distillery will not operate to destroy the forfeiture resulting from the acts of such person..... 854

The forfeiture of spirits, etc., provided for by Act March 2, 1867, § 25, is also imposed as a penalty for violation of Act July 13, 1866, § 31, in the neglect on the part of a distiller to make entry and return as required by that section..... 985

—— Property subject to forfeiture.

Property returned on bond after seizure is subject to forfeiture for causes subsequently arising, but its liability to condemnation in the suit in which it was bonded is not affected by the fact of its condemnation for the subsequent forfeiture..... 985

The adoption by the government of a seizure under the internal revenue laws cures any defect in the competency to seize of the person who made the seizure..1097, 1098

Where forfeited spirits have been mixed, though in good faith, with spirits which have paid the tax, so that they can no longer be distinguished, the entire amount is forfeited to the government.....1074, 1075

All tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever on the distillery premises are forfeited under Act July 13, 1866, § 9, irrespective of ownership or the purpose for which they are used..... 854

The forfeiture under Act June 6, 1872, § 12, for carrying on the business of a distiller after the time of suspension stated in a notice of suspension, is not limited to the interest of the distiller in the things which are made the subject of the forfeitures... 854

Connivance in the fraud of a distiller or knowingly suffering or permitting the business to be fraudulently carried on is not required to subject to a forfeiture an interest in the land on which the distillery is situated. (Act July 20, 1868, § 44.)..... 854

Act March 31, 1868, § 5, in declaring that a distiller shall forfeit the distillery and distillery apparatus used by him, means "shall subject to forfeiture."..... 854

Act July 20, 1868, § 19, in providing that the distillery, etc., shall be forfeited, forfeits the property, irrespective of the question of its ownership..... 854

Under none of such sections is a proof required of the actual complicity of the owner of the property to be forfeited in the fraud or other thing which causes the forfeiture 854

Distilled spirits found on the premises on which the business of distilling is carried on, being the product of such business, are not "personal property used in the business," within the meaning of Act July 20, 1868, § 19.....1192

A water wheel used for propelling machinery in the manufacture of friction matches is not personal property liable to forfeiture, under Act 1864, § 48, amended by Act 1866, c. 184.....1219

Machines used in a mill for such purpose are implements and instruments, within the meaning of the act, and are liable to forfeiture 1219

Pastures, orchards, and vineyards contiguous to a distillery, and under the same ownership, but in no other way connected therewith, are not subject to forfeiture with the distillery as a part of the lot or tract of land on which it is situated..... 366

Tobacco may be forfeited for fraud perpetrated by the manufacturer, even in the possession of a purchaser without knowledge of the fraud. (Act July, 1866, § 9.).. 989

A purchaser of brandy in casks, which has not been gauged and inspected as required by law, does not get a good title as against the United States, where the same is seized and forfeiture proceedings commenced within the prescribed time. (Act June 30, 1864, § 68.).....1154

Under Rev. St. § 3281, the forfeiture does not operate when the statute is violated, but only at the time of seizure.....1058

—— Forfeiture proceedings.

Where a forfeiture of tobacco is claimed in two distinct charges based on separate provisions of law, the district attorney will not be required to elect between them.... 989

Where spirits are found out of a bonded warehouse upon which the tax has not been paid, the burden is upon claimant to show that the requirements of the law have been complied with. (Act 1866, § 45.)..... 984

Proof by claimant that proper brands were upon the barrels is insufficient. He must show that the tax has been paid where such payment is a prerequisite to the removal 984

Under an information on a seizure of distilled spirits under section 45, Act July 13, 1866, claimant has the burden of showing that the spirits had been lawfully removed, and that the taxes had been paid....1097, 1098

Distillery books seized by a revenue collector under order of the department may be used as evidence on the trial of a libel for forfeiture filed against the distillery... 853

Proof that tubs were so placed in a distillery that they could be used contrary to the law is not sufficient to warrant a finding that they have been so used.....1192

—— Penalties: Actions therefor.

A retail liquor dealer who receives more than 20 gallons of spirits from any person other than one authorized to sell such spirits, for storage only, and not for sale, does not incur the penalty. (Act July 20, 1868, § 46.) 1220

Claimant has the burden of showing a compliance with Act July 13, 1866, § 31, where slight evidence is given showing a failure to comply therewith..... 985

A person transporting empty barrels is bound to know whether or not there were uneffaced stamps thereon. (Rev. St. § 3324.) 1362

The words "shall be liable to," etc. (Act July 13, 1866, § 53), mark the extreme limit of the penalty, and leave it discretionary whether the whole penalty shall be imposed 1173

Where both a money penalty and imprisonment are prescribed as punishment for an offense, an action of debt will lie for the money penalty.....1173 —— Offenses—In general.

Act July 13, 1866, § 23, is not repealed by Act March 31, 1868, § 5, which provides a more severe punishment, as the statutes cover different subject-matters..... 731

It is an offense under Rev. St. § 3279, to work in a distillery on which no sign is placed and kept as provided therein.....1127

Rev. St. § 5440, prohibits a conspiracy to defraud the United States, not only by committing an offense described in other sections of the original act, but in any manner whatever 818

The use of an inspector's brand with intent to defraud, though without the inspector's knowledge or connivance, is punishable under Act July 13, 1866, § 38..... 841

Act March 31, 1868, § 2, which repeals Act June 30, 1864, §§ 94, 95, and acts amendatory thereof, does not operate to preserve prosecutions commenced, but not carried to judgment, before the repeal took effect 1085

An acquittal on an indictment under Act July 13, 1866, § 23, for knowingly carrying on the business of a distiller, without having paid the special tax, held not a bar to an indictment under section 25, for knowingly using a still for the purpose of distilling in a dwelling house, it being the same place.....1106

On a prosecution for conducting a distillery without giving the necessary bond or paying the tax, ignorance on the part of defendant that the bond had not been given or the tax paid is no defense..... 876

Whoever aids in the act of illegal distilling is to be held responsible under the law, without regard to ownership of the still or its product..... 298

A person is liable to indictment for running a distillery upon which the special tax has not been paid, though he acted merely as the agent of another..... 778

An employé having no interest in a distillery or the product as a proprietor or partner, though he is paid in such product, is not subject to indictment, though he has knowledge that the special tax has not been paid..... 627

—— Same—Indictment.

A failure to take out a license and a neglect to affix stamps, as required by the internal revenue law, held indictable offenses 395

The penalty for exposing for sale articles without the revenue stamp affixed (Acts June 30, 1864, §§ 167, 169, amended by Acts March 3, 1865, and July 13, 1866) is recoverable by indictment.....1059

In the case of a partnership, both partners are liable where the sale is made by one, or by a clerk having authority...1059

An indictment for carrying on the business of a distiller of spirits without paying the special tax (Act July 13, 1866, § 23) need not set out the particular acts of distilling, or the kinds of spirits.....1196

"Then and there distilling and manufacturing spirits to a very large amount, to wit, to the amount and number of 1,000 gallons of proof spirits," held a sufficient affirmative allegation that defendant did distill 1196

A charge that the defendants, and each of them, did carry on the business, will not render the indictment multifarious..1196

An indictment which showed the business to have been begun under the old law, and continued under a new law, which substituted special taxes for licenses, should negative the payment of the license fee, or of the additional fee, as well as of the special tax.....1196

The words "as required by law," as used in an indictment for selling cigars not properly boxed and stamped, dispenses with the necessity of alleging that the cigars were not within the excepted classes 976

—— Same—Evidence.

Statements made by claimants in a proceeding against a distillery cannot be used against them in a subsequent criminal prosecution 868

The presence of defendants while the distillery was in operation is merely a circumstance to show their connection with it, and will not alone justify a conviction.. 876

Defendant, indicted for carrying on business without a license, and without having paid the special tax, and for failure to keep books required by law, has the burden of showing that he had a license, paid the special tax, and kept the books.....840, 843

The government, claiming that a distiller must have used more material and manufactured more spirits than he returned is bound to prove that such was necessarily the fact, and must exclude any other conclusion 1230

To sustain the theory that a given amount of material will produce a certain quantity of spirits, it must be shown that this is a necessary and unavoidable inference from the facts proved.....1230

Where the official records are not required by law to show the giving or not giving of a distiller's bond, the fact may be proved by the testimony of the officer.. 298

INTERPRETER.

A sworn interpreter may take advantage of the suggestions of others who are not sworn with regard to the proper interpretation of testimony, stating the result to the court as his own interpretation.....1287

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

In an information for selling without license, it is not necessary to specify the kind of liquor, nor the person to whom sold 1370

All the acts of selling constitute one offense 1370, 1371

An indictment will not lie against an inhabitant of the city of Washington for retailing spirituous liquor within the city.... 872

JAIL AND JAILER.

Debtors of the United States are not entitled to the benefit of the prison bounds in the District of Columbia.....1372

JUDGE.

The additional judge of the orphans' court of the District of Columbia appointed under Act May 25, 1838, holds his office for life, and not during the life of the judge.. 350

JUDGMENT.

Lien.

The judgments and decree of the circuit court of the district of Illinois constitute a lien throughout the state on the real estate of the party against whom they are rendered 927

Where a receiver is appointed of the rents and profits in a suit to remove an incumbrance on land, so that it may be sold under plaintiff's judgment, they are in equity subject to the lien of the judgment, the same as the land itself..... 210

Where the incumbrance is disposed of by settlement, plaintiff paying its amount, the land, and the rents and the profits accrued become subject to the judgment, and the latter are in equity immediately applicable 210

Operation and effect.

A joint judgment is no bar at law to a separate suit against one of the obligors on a joint and several bond, or against his personal representative..... 734

A judgment recovered between the same parties in another federal court, upon the same cause of action, may be pleaded in bar, irrespective of the time when the suit was commenced 847

Amendment.

The court will at a subsequent term correct a judgment entered by mistake for too large a sum.....1055

Relief against: Opening: Vacating.

Judgments are not impeachable in equity for matter which has been once tried, or so put in issue that it might have been tried 1107

The frauds for which judgments are impeachable in courts of equity are collateral acts, extrinsic to the merits.....1107

A decree entered by mistake, though final, may be vacated by the court after the term in which it was rendered..... 331

Actions on judgments.

An action at law on a judgment obtained on a joint and several bond in a joint suit against all the obligors will not lie against the administrator of a deceased obligor... 732

JUDICIAL SALES.

The purchaser at a judicial sale, who has paid the money to the judgment creditor, cannot, on discovering a defect of title, call on him for repayment, but his remedy, if any, is against the judgment debtor.... 927

JURY.

Act Sept. 24, 1789, c. 20, § 29, in referring to the state laws, applies only to the mode of selecting jurors, and not to the number to be summoned..... 901

The number of jurors to be selected for the federal courts is left to the discretion of the court, to be determined by rule....1254

Query, whether Act July 20, 1840, is applicable only to the mode of selecting the jury, or affects the questions involved in the right of challenging peremptorily or for cause 896

Jurors for the federal courts may be selected by the national officers as nearly as may be in the same manner as they are selected by the state officers. (Act July 20, 1840.) 1254

In the designation of jurors in the federal courts, a minute adherence to the state practice on that subject is not required by Act July 20, 1840..... 545

As to what is a substantial compliance with the state practice in the selection of jurors 545

It is a good ground of challenge to the array that the jury was summoned without any designation by the court of the part of the district from which they were to be summoned, and not according to the mode of forming juries to serve in the highest courts of law in the state..... 489

The fact that a juror was not warned to attend as directed by the statute is no ground of exception where he is regularly drawn, and attends the court..... 650

It is no objection to the verdict that the venire was issued and served before the indictment was returned, where the panel was returned for the trial of all causes pending at the term..... 650

Before a jury is made up, incompetent jurors, who have been summoned, may be discharged, and others summoned in their places 849

Act June 1, 1872, declaring that the federal courts shall conform as near as may be to the practice, pleadings, and modes, and forms of proceeding prevailing in the state courts, has no reference to the designation or selection of jurors.....1254

The array cannot be challenged on the ground of impartiality of the sheriff because a partial juror has been returned... 239

In Virginia, peremptory challenges are allowed only in capital cases..... 310

On an indictment for larceny in Alexandria, D. C., the prisoner is entitled to a peremptory challenge.....1273

Peremptory challenges are not allowed in a federal court except in capital cases, though they are allowed in other cases by the state law..... 673

Upon a trial for manslaughter, defendant is entitled to peremptory challenges... 682

No right of peremptory challenge exists in the circuit court for the Eastern district of New York, on the trial of an indictment for misdemeanor..... 840

Query, whether in the federal courts, in New York state, the government has the right of peremptory challenge where the panel is not exhausted by the challenges of the prisoner..... 896

As to the right of peremptory challenges on trials for various offenses under Act April 30, 1790, c. 36..... 901

The right of peremptory challenge need not be exercised until the opportunity of rejecting for cause is afforded; and, in presenting jurors for challenge, the government must first exercise its right..... 213

The government cannot ask a juror to stand aside until the panel is exhausted before challenging for cause or peremptorily.. 213

The prosecution may challenge a juror for cause 55

A foreigner in Virginia is entitled to a jury de mediate linguæ.....297, 312

It is no ground of exception that jurors were set aside because they were Quakers, without objection being made by either party, and upon their mere statement that they were such..... 650

It is a good cause of challenge to a juror that he voluntarily joined the Confederate army. (Rev. St. § 820.)..... 213

A formed and expressed opinion on the book in which alleged libelous passages occur will not disqualify a juror in a prosecution for seditious libel..... 239

Persons who have deliberately formed and delivered an opinion on the guilt of an accused are disqualified to serve as jurors 49

A man must not only have formed, but declared, an opinion, to disqualify him as a juror..... 55

The forming and delivering of an opinion that a person indicted for treason entertained the alleged treasonable designs, and retained them, and was prosecuting them, when the act charged was alleged to have been committed, is good cause of challenge 49

An opinion formed and delivered, not upon a full case, but upon a point so essential as to go far towards a decision of the whole case, and to have a real influence on the verdict, will disqualify the person as a juror..... 49

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

A justice is not liable for discharging a prisoner who has been committed for trial on a charge of felony, or for taking money in lieu of bail, unless he acted contemptuously, willfully, and with evil intent 1053

An indictment against a justice for taking insufficient bail need not state in what respect the bail was insufficient, nor set out the security taken..... 441

LARCENY.

Bank notes are not goods and chattels, and cannot be the subject of larceny at common law..... 297

A person who takes and carries away muskets with intent to appropriate them, or any of them, to his own use, or permanently to deprive the owner of them, is guilty of larceny; otherwise where the taking was with the sole intent to prevent the use of them upon himself or his associates 941

The taking by a person of an article delivered to him as a servant, to remove from one room to another, and converting the same to his own use, is larceny, and not embezzlement 480

The court has no jurisdiction on an indictment for larceny upon the high seas, under Act 1790, c. 9, § 16, where the taking was on board of a vessel while lying in the port of Savannah..... 784

The court does not obtain jurisdiction by the fact that the property was carried on the high seas from the port of Savannah to New York..... 784

A larceny committed in a place not under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States may be punishable under Act 1825, c. 276, § 3..... 781

Offenses are punishable under such section according to the state laws, where they are committed under circumstances or in places in which, before that act, no court of the United States had authority to punish them..... 781

An indictment for larceny under Act 1790, c. 9, must aver that the act was committed in a place under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.. 781

"Personal goods," in such statute, do not include choses in action..... 781

Sufficiency of indictment under Act Md. 1729, c. 4, § 3, for breaking into and stealing goods from a warehouse.....1263

An indictment for stealing "a mulatto boy, * * * the property, goods, and chattels of T.," is insufficient, where it does not aver that he was a slave.....1341

Upon the trial of an indictment for stealing a note of the Bank of the United States, no proof of its genuiness need be given other than by producing it..... 231

Evidence that the prisoner uttered, as genuine, what purported on its face to be a bank note, is competent proof that it was a bank note, though it is not otherwise shown that such a bank existed....1198

Where there is a reasonable presumption that the taking of the property was felonious, and against the will of the true owner, although such owner be unknown, a conviction will be sustained..... 784

LIBEL AND SLANDER.

To sustain a prosecution for a seditious libel against the president (Act July 14, 1798), there must clearly appear an intent to defame him, to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and excite against him the hatred of the good people of the United States 631

Actual hostilities, captures of vessels, and a prohibition of intercourse, although there has been no declaration of war, renders the statement "in time of peace" false, within the meaning of the act..... 631

Upon a prosecution for a seditious libel, subsequent publications or unpublished writings found in defendant's possession are inadmissible to prove the intent in publishing the libel charged..... 684

Admissibility and sufficiency of evidence to prove publication of a seditious libel.... 684

Page

Sufficiency of evidence to sustain a conviction under the sedition act of July 14, 1798, for the publication of a libel against the president 631

On a prosecution for seditious libel (Act 1798), it is for the court to assess the fine in case of conviction..... 239

Where the libel is founded upon a book, it is sufficient to set out the passages complained of without giving its title..... 239

The proof of justification must extend to the whole charge..... 239

An allegation of "tenor and effect" requires proof of the substance only, and not the precise words..... 239

LIENS.

See, also, "Customs Duties"; "Insolvency"; "Internal Revenue."

The rule that a party having a double fund to resort to will be required, as against other creditors, to first resort to that one on which he alone has a lien, will not be applied where it would operate to his prejudice 927

Where there are two liens on the same land of different date, which also cover other lands in the state, the court will order the lands to be sold, reserving the application of the proceeds for the order of the court..... 938

Priority of the United States is not affected by the local rule that lands consisting of different parcels, subject to a general incumbrance, are, in equity, to be charged in the inverse order of alienation of the separate fund..... 927

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

A statute of limitations does not bind the government unless it be specially named 780

The statute of limitations of six years (Rev. St. § 786) does not apply to suits brought on marshals' bonds by the United States 1240

LOTTERIES.

Construction of statutes relating to lotteries as applicable to the city of Washington, D. C.....1373

MANDAMUS.

A demand of payment and a refusal are not a condition precedent to the issuance of a mandamus to compel payment of a judgment obtained against a municipal corporation for overdue interest on its bond.. 998

Where a warrant on the treasurer of a county to pay a judgment creditor is refused payment, mandamus will issue to enforce the collection of a tax to pay such judgment, and the creditor is not bound to wait his turn among other warrant holders 676

MARSHAL.

Under Act April 10, 1806, it is optional with the injured party to bring suit on the marshal's bond in his own name, or in the name of the United States,..... 771

Allowance of marshal's fees and disbursements, and for constructive travel and attendance 487

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The authority of a municipal corporation to incur an obligation carries with it, by

NEUTRALITY LAWS.

Sufficiency of affidavit giving translation of letter and cipher, taken in connection with declarations of accused to justify commitment for setting on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace..... 2
The question whether a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace was really to depend upon war being declared will not be determined upon a preliminary examination 201
The setting on foot or providing the means of a military expedition against a nation with which the United States are at peace is an offense, notwithstanding it appear that war is inevitable, unless the prosecution of the expedition depended upon its taking place 201
A citizen cannot make the election, or anticipate his government's making the election, to consider as an act of war the taking possession by another nation of contested territory, arising out of a dispute as to boundaries 201
On the trial of an indictment for setting on foot a military expedition against a nation with which the United States were at peace, containing no allusion to a conspiracy, the declarations of third persons not forming a part of the transaction, and not made in the presence of the accused, are not admissible in evidence..... 187
Any legal testimony which shows the expedition in question to be military, or to have been designed against the dominions of the nation, as charged, is admissible... 187
The acts of accomplices, except so far as they prove the character or object of the expedition in question, are not admissible in evidence 187

NEW TRIAL.

See, also, "Criminal Law."

A new trial will not be granted because the jury was sworn to try an issue between the United States and the owner on an information for forfeiture, where the claim and answer were filed by an agent for the owner.....1182
The court should grant a new trial where it appears that a different result would follow from a second trial..... 382
A new trial will be granted where the verdict is only sustained by the testimony of two witnesses for the government, as against the testimony of nine unimpeached witnesses for defendants..... 382
It is only in cases imputing gross inattention, prejudice, or misconduct on the part of a jury that the court will interfere to disturb their verdict.....1093
Where a jury render a verdict against the plain principles of law as laid down by the court, and against clear and unquestioned evidence, the court will grant a new trial, notwithstanding the particular circumstances or general justice of the case.. 953
A verdict in favor of defendant in an action to recover a statutory penalty will be set aside if contrary to the evidence and the law applicable thereto.....1194
A new trial will be granted on proof that one juror has acted corruptly..... 382
In making up a case on which to move for a new trial, oral testimony taken at the trial, by way of question and answer, must be reduced to the form of a narrative, or the court will refuse to hear the motion..1097
In a case of great importance, involving large interests, cumulative testimony will be received on an application for a new trial 382

OATH.

See, also, "Affidavit"; "Perjury."

A justice of the peace has authority to administer to defendant an oath to an answer in chancery 680
Authority to a county clerk to swear petitioners resident in his county does not give him power to administer an oath to one who resides in another county..... 816
A commissioner for a state appointed by the federal circuit court therein to take depositions in a case pending in said court has authority to administer an oath under the laws of the United States..... 624

OBSTRUCTING JUSTICE.

It is not an indictable offense to threaten to kill a constable if he should attempt to arrest a person whom he is searching for, with intent to arrest without a warrant...1381
A state court judge who, in pursuance of a conspiracy, and in bad faith, releases on habeas corpus, without any ground therefor, a prisoner held on examination before a United States commissioner to await the action of the grand jury, together with the other conspirators, is guilty of obstructing process 891

No claim of a public officer for a credit can be admitted on a trial unless presented to and disallowed by the accounting officers of the treasury. (Act March 3, 1797.) A suspension is not a disallowance..... 953
In an action by the government against an officer or individual to recover moneys claimed of him, defendant is entitled to an allowance of all equitable demands of his against the United States which have been disallowed by the accounting officers..... 527
The liabilities of sureties on official bonds cannot be extended beyond the reasonable necessary import of the language of the bond 414
An official bond conditioned in the language of certain statutes cannot be held to include the liability of the officer under other statutes existing at the time the bond was given, and not referred to therein.... 414
The condition of a bond of a public officer to discharge the duties according to law refers to existing laws and those passed during his term of office.....1267
Where a balance is left in the hand of a public officer at the expiration of his first term, its illegal appropriation by him will not be presumed in favor of a surety on his second bond 970
The surety of a navy agent is liable for misappropriation of public moneys by his principal, though they were advanced to him contrary to law 740
The bondsmen of the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York are liable for moneys lost by his clerks while in his hands as an officer..... 227
The debt of a paymaster to the United States is created by the advances made to him, and not at the time of striking a balance of accounts against him on the treasury books; and his surety becomes a debtor as soon as the paymaster fails to account according to law..... 447
In an action on a bond of a disbursing officer, the sureties may prove that a disputed item of credit claimed has been presented to and disallowed by the proper accounting officers, though the treasury transcript does not show such fact..... 669
In such action defendant is entitled to a credit for moneys reasonable in amount paid by such officer, and for services rendered by him in good faith, in the proper discharge of his official duties..... 669
Where the breach of an official bond alleged is the failure to pay over or account for a certain sum, a dereliction of duty in not collecting such sum cannot be shown..1339

Act July 4, 1864, §§ 12, 13, limiting the fees of pension agents and attorneys, and making it a misdemeanor to take any greater compensation, is constitutional....1035
An agent is indictable under such act who withholds from a pensioner a pension granted under a later act..... 377

PERJURY.

See, also, "Affidavit"; "Oath."

An oath to do a certain thing in the future cannot be the subject of a prosecution for perjury 1339
To sustain an indictment for perjury, the oath must be administered by some one authorized 816
Whether perjury committed on a hearing on a criminal complaint before a district judge is punishable under Act April 30, 1790, c. 9, § 18, query..... 441
An indictment for subornation of perjury must aver that defendant knew that the testimony which he instigated the suborned witness to give was false, and that, in giving such testimony, the witness would commit the crime of perjury..... 817
The materiality of the facts sworn to must appear in the indictment either by averment or by a statement of facts which show their materiality..... 680
It must be shown that defendant was sworn in a matter where an oath or affirmation is required under a law of the United States, and that he knowingly and willingly swore to that which was false, to convict under Act March 3, 1825, § 13.... 624
The prosecution must show that the oath was administered to defendant by the person named, that he had authority to administer it, and that defendant swore with a wicked and corrupt intent, willfully false in regard to the matters alleged to be untrue 624

The statements of defendant which are made the basis of a charge of perjury must be disproved by two witnesses, or by one witness and corroborating circumstances.. 624

It is only necessary to prove so much of the testimony of the witness as relates to the particular fact on which the perjury is assigned 1022

A copy of the record in the cause in which the perjury was committed, where the court is the same, need not be produced 1022

Papers filed by the prisoner to sustain the allegations contained in the original paper, if they tend to establish the charge made in the indictment as to guilty knowledge, will be admittted in evidence.....1245

There need not be positive evidence that the paper was sworn to by the prisoner; it may be proved by circumstantial evidence..1245

PERSONAL PROPERTY.

Actual possession is not necessary to a transfer of personal property, nor is the want of it even an indicium of fraud, where from the circumstances, as in the case of goods at sea, it cannot be obtained 811

It is no objection to the vesting of the right of property in the consignee for value, or whose debt it is to secure, that the goods are, by agreement, to be at the risk and for account of the consignor..... 811

PIRACY.

The crime of piracy, as defined by the law of nations and the acts of congress, consists of robbery or forcible depredation upon the sea..... 399

In order to affect all the officers and crew of a piratical vessel with guilt, the original voyage must have been undertaken with a piratical design, and the officers and crew have known and acted upon such design; otherwise, those only are guilty who actively co-operated in the piracy.... 1287

The simple fact of presence on board the piratical vessel, where there was no original piratical design, is not sufficient per se to affect a party with a crime.....1287

Slave trade is not punishable as piracy 658

Parol evidence is admissible to establish the time of sailing, and the course and termination of a voyage, without proving that the log book was missing or lost.....1287

PLEADING AT LAW.

The plea of nil debet is improper where the action is founded on a deed; otherwise where the deed is only inducement to the action 725

A rejoinder must answer the replication, and tender an issue on a single point, else it is demurrable..... 725

POST OFFICE.

The postmaster general has no power under Act June 27, 1848, to impose a fine on a contractor for carrying the mails for delays, except for the causes specified in the act 539

A recommendation by the postmaster general to the secretary of the navy to make a deduction from the pay of a contractor, on the ground that a portion of a service was performed by a steamer not of the class stipulated for in the contract, is not the imposition of a fine within the terms of the act..... 539

The discretion of the postmaster general in granting or refusing extra allowance to postmasters for extra labor and expense in certain cases (Act June 22, 1854) is not subject to judicial review..... 776

No postmaster has a legal right to the allowance for the necessary cost of rent, fuel, etc. (Act July 1, 1864, § 5), until it is awarded him by the postmaster general.. 776

In an action on a postmaster's bond, defendant may counterclaim items which have been duly presented to the proper department for allowance and rejected..... 776

The sureties on a postmaster's bond are discharged where suit is not brought in two years after the defalcation..... 780

Act March 3, 1825, § 21, prohibiting mail carriers carrying letters or packets, does not prohibit their carrying a package containing executions only..... 392

The unlawful stopping of a passenger train by persons who are willing to permit the passage of the mail car detached from the passenger car is punishable under Rev. St. § 3995, as a willful obstruction or retarding of the passage of the mail..... 443

A postmaster who uses the money received through his office in paying his private debts, so that, upon examination, his accounts do not balance, is guilty of embezzlement (Act June 8, 1872, § 122), though he intended to replace the money, and made the same good shortly after his arrest 1318

After the deposit of a letter in the post office, no one except the writer or the addressee, or some one authorized by them, has the right, while it is there, to open it, for the mere purpose of ascertaining its contents 975

Neither the postmaster nor other officers have any authority to open it under the pretext that there might be something improper or even criminal therein..... 975

An indictment against a post-office employé for embezzling letters intrusted to him, and stealing bank notes therefrom (Act April 30, 1810, § 18), need not aver that the letters were intended to be conveyed by post.....1349

The embezzlement of the letters and stealing bank notes therefrom may be charged in the same count of the indictment 1349

A decoy letter, containing money, mailed for the purpose of entrapping an employé in a post office, who opens it, and takes the money, is within Act March 3, 1825, § 21 673, 1198

The description of the termini between which the letter was intended to be sent by post cannot be rejected as surplusage, but must be proved as laid.....1198

In an indictment for larceny from a letter under section 21, the property stolen must be laid on some person other than the prisoner 723, 1198

An indictment against a postmaster for embezzling bank notes from the mail must aver that the note was a thing of value... 723

An errand boy authorized to receive letters from the mail, who embezzles the contents of a letter so received, is not liable under Act March 3, 1825, § 22, as the taking was lawful..... 914

The delivery of a letter to an errand boy is a delivery to his employer, within Act March 3, 1825, § 22, and he cannot be convicted of opening the same "before it shall have been delivered to the person to whom it is directed."..... 914

Notes of a third person, sent by a depositary with notes of his own, and stolen from the mail, may be laid in the indictment as the property of the depositary.... 207

An indictment charging a mail carrier with stealing a letter out of the mail is sufficient without alleging that it contained an article of value.....1086
On a trial for larceny from the mail, the best evidence of mailing is that of the person who mailed the letter, and of its loss of the person to whom it was addressed.. 705
The postmasters through whose offices the embezzled letters were passed or distributed must be called as witnesses on a prosecution for stealing letters out of the mail 1013
Sufficiency of evidence to sustain conviction for robbing the mail..... 720
An indictment charging defendant with depositing in the mail an obscene pamphlet, and a notice giving information how an article designed for the prevention of conception can be obtained, need not give a definite or detailed description of the pamphlet 1140
Sufficient information as to the particular article about which evidence is to be given can be obtained by an order for a bill of particulars, and for the exhibition to defendant of the article itself.....1140
A notice in the form of a letter inclosed in a sealed envelope, if it give the prohibited information, is within the scope of the statute 1140
A written slip of paper giving the prohibited information is a "notice," within the meaning of the statute, although not volunteered, but sent in reply to a letter asking for the information.....1140

PRACTICE AT LAW.

Where the minutes of the court show that the judge delivered an opinion overruling exceptions, and confirming a survey of a Mexican grant, but no decree appeared to have been made or written opinion filed, held, that the cause was still pending, and a court succeeding to the jurisdiction might enter a decree, or, on proper showing, re-examine the case 1242
To support a motion made after a decision to correct an agreed statement of facts on which the case is tried, the moving party must not only show that the statement was actually erroneous, but that he had not been guilty of laches..... 230
A motion to the discretion of the court is a motion not to its inclination, but to its judgment, which is to be guided by sound legal principle..... 30

PRESIDENT.

A subpœna may issue to the president to compel his attendance as a witness, and an accused person is entitled to it of course... 30
A subpœna duces tecum may issue to the president directing him to bring any paper of which the party praying it has a right to avail himself as testimony..... 30

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY.

See, also, "Office and Officer."

Sureties who bind themselves jointly and severally as principals in a bond are equally liable in equity with the principal debtor... 734
A surety is released by any modification in the contract made without his consent by agreement between the principals, though in a particular not deemed essential by them 316
Sureties for the performance of a contract with the government to build a ship canal, and keep it open for a certain number of years, are discharged where the government accepts the work done in a different manner than as contracted 671
An assent by an heir of a deceased surety to the release of the principal debtor, without prejudice to the surety's liability, will not prevent the release from discharging the surety 732

PRIZE.

A person residing in the enemy country long enough to acquire a domicile there is subjected to all the disabilities of an enemy, so far as relates to his property.....1008
The domicile of the owner at the time of the capture of the vessel determines whether she is of hostile character or not. The fact that she is enrolled in a port of a rebellious state is not conclusive.....1232
A neutral flag constitutes no protection to enemy's property, and a belligerent flag communicates no hostile character to neutral property 1008
A vessel sailing under the flag of the enemy is considered as enemy property, and is liable to confiscation, jure belli.....1008
The sale of a vessel of war by a belligerent to a neutral during hostility is not valid as against the other belligerent.....1025
Under Act July 13, 1861, goods forming the cargo of a vessel proceeding to a point in the insurrectionary states are liable to forfeiture only when in transitu, and the vessel only while the contraband cargo is on board 1201
Under the regulations made under the authority of Acts July 13, 1861, May 20, 1862, and July 2, 1864, a vessel engaged in a prohibited trade is liable to forfeiture, even after the termination of the prohibited voyage and the discharge of the contraband cargo 1201
A vessel has not proceeded or departed on her voyage within Acts July 13, 1861, and May 20, 1862, and the rules and regulations of the secretary of the treasury supplementary thereto, until she is outside the limits of the harbor or her port of departure.....1284
The claimants of a vessel subject to condemnation cannot contest the competency of libelants alone to control the proceeds of the forfeiture.....1371
An application for further proof will be refused where the claim and test affidavit of the claimant are utterly at variance with his answers to the standing interrogatories..1008
An attempted breach of blockade cannot be predicated on the intention to land the cargo of a vessel wrecked on an enemy's coast temporarily on the adjoining shore, until it could be conveyed to a loyal port....1232

PUBLIC LANDS.

See, also, "Grant."

Sioux half-breed scrip cannot be located by other than the party to whom the scrip issued in person, unless the application be accompanied with a power of attorney from him 407
Sioux half-breed scrip cannot be located on land occupied by another..... 407
No patent can issue pending a contest before the register and receiver of the United States land office between a purchaser from the state, on a state selection, and a claimant under Sioux half-breed scrip location 407 to the city all sites or other parcels of land in such occupancy by the United States.. 304

An indictment for cutting oak on public lands cannot be sustained by evidence that defendant cut pine..... 767

The rule of proof on an indictment for cutting and removing timber from public lands is fixed by the statute. (Act March 2, 1831.)..... 767

A permit to enter on land containing lead ore may be shown in an action of trespass by the United States; not as a justification, but to show the nature and object of the entry 1271

A final receipt by a government officer authorized to act in the premises, for rent, where subsequent to the trespass alleged, is a full discharge, although the officer may never have accounted for the money received 1271

QUI TAM AND PENAL ACTIONS.

A declaration to recover a statutory penalty must demand a precise sum, although the statute declares that the penalty shall be "not more than" a sum stated.....1000

RAILROAD COMPANIES.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company did not become liable to apply 5 per cent. of its net earnings annually to the payment of the principal and interest of the government subsidy bonds, until the completion of its road as accepted by the president, October 1, 1874 354

RAPE.

It is not a fatal defect in an indictment for rape that it also alleges that the woman was gotten with child..... 849

RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS.

Stolen postage stamps sent by the thief to defendant were delivered up to a postmaster on written order of the thief, but were subsequently allowed to go forward, and to be delivered to defendant. Held, that they lost their character as stolen property 796

Recognizance.

See "Bail."

RECORDS.

The register of the orphans' court in Alexandria is entitled to the custody of the record books of wills of the old court of hustings. 817

REPLEVIN.

Property released to the defendant on a forthcoming bond is still in the custody of the court, and not subject to seizure under a writ issued out of another court..... 752

RIOT.

An assemblage for the purpose of seizing a man without lawful authority executed by tumultuously surrounding his house, and entering it, is a riot.....1062

All concerned in an unlawful assembly are equally guilty of the subsequent acts done by any of them in furtherance of the common object 1062

Page

In the indictment, it is sufficient to state that defendants assembled to disturb the peace, and, being so assembled, did certain unlawful acts.....1062

It is an indictable offense at common law to incite others to insurrection, tumult, and riot; and the indictment need not aver that insurrection, tumult, and riot were thereby excited 1062

It is not necessary, in order to convict defendant of a riot, that the intended act of violence, or any act of violence, should have been perpetrated, or that they should all have been present during the act.....1062

The marshal has the right to take the posse, and to call on all citizens to aid him in arresting rioters, and the citizens have a right to arm themselves.....1062

Where defendant's witnesses testified that they were of the party concerned in the riot, they will not be allowed to give evidence of their intention..... 939

SEAL.

A mark with ink, acknowledged by the maker of a deed, held sufficient to create a specialty 485

SEAMEN.

Protection and relief.

The penalty imposed for failure to provide medical stores, etc., may be recovered by the United States by a civil action, when brought in the circuit court for the district of Massachusetts.....1000

The contract of shipment.

An agreement with a seaman on a voyage from New York to a port in Mexico is required under the act of July 20, 1790, in the form prescribed and under the penalty provided by the act of June 7, 1872.. 429

The contract is not affected by the death, removal, or resignation of the original master, but the seaman must perform the voyage under the person lawfully substituted in his stead..... 321

Conduct of master or mate in respect to seamen.

The master is justified in using a deadly weapon to reduce a seaman to obedience only in cases of apparent necessity, such as the situation of the ship and the manifestation of a hostile disposition on the part of the crew..... 490

Offenses.

The crew are guilty of an endeavor to make a revolt where they combine together to refuse to do duty, and actually refuse, until the master complies with some improper request on their part. (Act 1790, c. 9, § 12.).....1258

A mere disobedience of orders by one or two seamen, without combining with the others, is not a revolt.....1141

It is a revolt where, by the overt acts of the crew, there is intentionally caused an actual or constructive suspension of the master's command 1141

If seamen really believe, upon reasonable ground, that a vessel is unseaworthy, and ask for a survey, they are not bound to go to sea in her until such request is granted..1331

The seamen may lawfully resist an attempt to compel them to go to sea in a vessel whose masts are rotten and unfit for the voyage, though the master promises that he will keep in a certain latitude, and carry certain sails for which the masts are sufficient 1331

Where the person substituted as master is grossly incompetent from want of skill or bad habits or profligate and cruel behavior, seamen are justified in refusing to do duty 321

On an indictment under Act March 3, 1835, § 3, the government must show that the act was without justifiable cause, and a willful departure from a known duty.... 740

To sustain an indictment for an endeavor to commit a revolt (Act 1835, c. 40, § 2), a confederacy or combination must be shown between two or more seamen to refuse to do further duty aboard ship, and to resist the lawful commands of the officers 321

On the trial of an indictment for endeavoring to make a mutiny and revolt, the American character of the vessel must be proved, but the title may be proved by parol 692

On a charge of revolt a copy of the shipping articles cannot be given in evidence to show that the prisoner was part of the crew, without proof of loss or destruction of the original 895

The original articles cannot be given in evidence unless the handwriting of the prisoner is proved..... 895

"Justifiable cause" for forcing a seaman on shore (Act 1825, c. 276, § 10) means a case of moral necessity for the safety of the ship and crew, or the due performance of the voyage, and not merely a cause justifying a discharge..... 485

Flogging is not a cruel and unusual punishment, within the meaning of Act March 3, 1835, § 3..... 545

The act abolishing the punishment of flogging (Act March 3, 1835) is not a penal law, and no indictment can be framed upon it 740

A whaling ship is a vessel of commerce within the act 740

Any punishment which, in substance and effect, amounts to corporal punishment by stripes inflicted with a cat, is within the provision of the statute, irrespective of its degree 740

SEIZURE.

See, also, "Customs Duties"; "Forfeiture"; "Informers"; "Internal Revenue."

A person is not liable for carrying away goods under seizure (Act 1799, c. 22, § 71) unless a seizure has been lawfully made and possession taken and continued by the officer, and the goods are carried away forcibly, knowing them to be under seizure.. 607

SHERIFFS AND CONSTABLES.

A constable having a warrant to arrest a man for assault and battery may break open the door of his dwelling house to arrest him 1053

An indictment lies for acting as constable without giving bond.....1034

The sureties of a constable's bond are not liable for money collected by the constable without legal process..... 692

SHIPPING.

Public regulation.

Where, in rebuilding a vessel, each timber of the old vessel is dislocated before being used in the new, the vessel is a new one, and must bear a new name, though having the model of the old vessel.....1387

An American vessel belonging to American citizens, and sold abroad to American citizens, does not cease to be an American vessel 1364

Page

A native citizen of the United States who resides in a foreign country may command a registered vessel without her right to the payment of domestic duties being affected thereby; but he cannot be the owner of such a vessel. (Act Dec. 31, 1792.)..1321

A registered vessel transferred to a citizen of the United States will lose her privilege as an American vessel unless she is registered anew 1147

A vessel does not become denationalized where she continues running without a renewal of her license after being sold to a citizen of the United States.....1147

The title to a British vessel purchased by an American was taken in the name of a British subject, and subsequently, without consideration, transferred to a Russian subject, inhabitant of Alaska. An American register was obtained on the taking of the oath prescribed by Act 1792. Held, that the register was fraudulent.....1065

A steam vessel usually employed as a towboat, which transports passengers from Buffalo to Canada, and back, for pay, held liable to the penalty for transporting passengers without a license. (Act July 7, 1838, §§ 2, 42.)..... 974

The report required to be made by the master of the arrival of his vessel (Act 1790, c. 35, § 16) must be made at the office of the chief officer of the customs.....1236

In a prosecution for not making the requisite report, the government has the burden of showing that it was not made at the proper office.....1236

The fines imposed upon the master by Act March 3, 1855, §§ 1, 6, for acts which are therein declared to be misdemeanors, are not made a lien upon the vessel.....1024

What facts will justify a conviction for packing for shipment or shipping gunpowder, not put up and marked as required by law. (Act Aug. 30, 1852.)..... 419

The penalty for the carrying of burning or explosive fluids by passenger steamers (Act Feb. 28, 1871, § 4) cannot be recovered by a proceeding in rem..... 353

An indictment under Act July 7, 1838, § 12, against the officers and employés of a steamboat, is sufficient if it charge them substantially in the language of a statute, with misconduct, negligence, or inattention to their respective duties, whereby the lives of passengers are destroyed..... 554

In such an indictment, several defendants occupying different stations of employment may be joined without showing that their acts were jointly destructive of the lives of those on board, or were joint in their commission 554

Where the captain has employed skillful and faithful subordinate officers and employés, he cannot be held guilty where the destruction of the lives of persons on board is directly caused by their misconduct, negligence, or inattention..... 554

A person who takes the place of the captain while he is sick, and exercises the authority and control, and discharges the duties, of that office, is a person "employed on board," within the meaning of the statute 554

The captain of a steamboat is responsible for the proper performance of the duties of inferior officers whose authority is not expressly made independent of him.....1042

The burning and loss of life must be shown to have been the direct consequences of the negligence or misconduct shown, but the degree of misconduct is immaterial 554

A willful or intentional mismanagement or misconduct is not of the essence of the offense, but it consists in an improper act of the kind designated, and having the results named.....554, 1042

An indictment will not lie for selling a negro or slave who was unlawfully imported 1375

After negroes imported in violation of the laws prohibiting slave trade are mingled with the mass of the population of a state, congress has no further power over them..1375

An American vessel on her outward voyage to the coast of Africa for the purpose of there taking on board slaves is forfeited under Act May 10, 1800, though her ownership is changed under a prior arrangement before the slaves are actually taken on board 332

Sufficiency of evidence to sustain an indictment for forcibly confining and detaining negroes on board a vessel with intent to make them slaves. (Act May 15, 1820, § 5.) 1364

Any interference by word or act for the purpose of favoring the escape of a fugitive slave arrested under Act Sept. 18, 1850, and tending to that result, is a violation of the act..... 481

Power of the circuit court of the District of Columbia to appoint commissioners under the fugitive slave law of 1850..... 646

STATES.

No state has a right to withdraw from the Union at pleasure with or without cause 344

After a state has been admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original states, the United States cannot abridge its sovereign power over territory embraced within its limits, by a treaty with an Indian tribe therein.....*1155

Where the purchase of land for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, or other needful buildings is made by consent of the state legislature, such land, under the constitutional provision, falls within the exclusive legislation of congress 646

The purchase of lands by the United States for public purposes within the territorial limits of a state does not of itself oust the jurisdiction of sovereignty of the state over such lands..... 646

STATUTES.

Page

Rev. St. § 5481, defining the crime of extortion under color of office, being passed after the cession of Alaska, is in force there from the time of its passage..... 303

Where a cause of action falling within the terms of Act 1823, § 2, arose after the passage of Act July 18, 1866, and before the passage of the Revised Statutes, no suit can be maintained thereon after the passage of the Revised Statutes..... 437

The fine provided by Act 1866, § 4, which is substantially identical with Rev. St. § 3082, cannot be recovered in a civil action 437

A statute revising another act, and embracing its entire subject-matter, with additional provisions, impliedly repeals the prior act 414

Act July 18, 1866, § 4, did not effect such a repeal of Act March 3, 1823, § 2, as took away the right of the United States to proceed thereunder upon a cause of action which arose before the act of 1866 took effect 437

In construing a statute, the facts and circumstances which led to and surrounded its passage, as derived from the congressional journals and debates, and documents laid before congress, will be considered... 527

Where a statute uses words whose meaning is well ascertained by the existing jurisprudence, they are understood in that meaning, unless another meaning is clearly intended 441

In the construction of a statute, other statutes in pari materia will be considered 527

Statutes creating crimes will not be extended by judicial interpretation to cases not plainly and unmistakably within their terms 458

In such cases the courts will not, by construction, ingraft words in one section upon those of another, unless the legislative intention be plain and clear..... 458

A foreign law and the practice under it may be proved by one acquainted therewith 1245

Printed statute books of the parliament of Great Britain, purchased of the queen's printer, are admissible as prima facie evidence of the laws contained therein..... 363

TREASON.

See, also, "Amnesty."

A person will not be held to trial for treason in levying war against the United States on an affidavit that he is enlisting men for such purpose, without proof of the actual embodying of men, where ample time is given to get such proof..... 2

The engaging or enlisting of men for levying war against the United States, not followed by a future embodying of such men, is not punishable as treason..... 2

The act of revolutionizing a territory of the United States, though only as a means for an expedition against a foreign power, is treason 2

An intention to commit treason against the United States by levying war, not carried out by the actual assembling of troops, is not punishable as treason 2

To constitute the assemblage of a body of men, for the purpose of making war against the government, an act of levying war, it must be a warlike assemblage, carrying the appearance of force, and in a situation to practice hostility 55

The fact of levying war may consist of a multiplicity of acts performed in different places by different persons, and any one of such persons, when leagued in the general conspiracy, is liable as a principal traitor.. 55

Either acts of hostility and resistance to the government, or a hostile intention in the body assembled, are necessary to convert a meeting of men with ordinary appearances into an act of levying war. A treasonable intent on the part of the leader, uncommunicated to the assemblage, is not sufficient 201

The fact that treason might incidentally arise in the attempt to embark troops against a foreign nation, with which the United States are at peace, will not affect a previous assemblage of troops, where the treason was neither committed nor intended 201

Query, whether a person who advises or procures a treasonable warlike assemblage, and does nothing more, is guilty of treason under the constitution 55

The ordinances of secession of the states in rebellion do not furnish any defense to their citizens for treasonable acts against the United States government..... 344

An indictment for levying war against the United States must specify an overt act, and the charge must be proved as laid.... 55

A person who advised or procured a warlike assemblage, charged as the overt act of treason, cannot be convicted of treason until after the conviction of one of those charged with the overt act..... 55

Where it is charged that a war was levied without striking the blow, the intention to strike must be plainly proved 201

Where defendant is charged with being present at the place of the treasonable assemblage, charged as the overt act, the proof must show defendant's presence with such assemblage, or his intention to join it at such place..... 55

The overt act of levying war must be proved by two witnesses before testimony is admissible relative to the conduct or declarations of the prisoner elsewhere, and subsequent to the overt act charged..... 55

Proof of procurement of a warlike assemblage, if admissible to establish a charge of actual presence, must be made in the same manner, and by the same kind of testimony, which would be required to prove actual presence 55

Query, whether, after proving a connection for some general object between persons accused of treason in levying war, the conversations of one with third persons may be given in evidence against the other to prove what that object was..... 201

On trial for treason in levying war against the United States, any proof of intention formed before the overt act charged, if relevant thereto, may be admitted before proof of the act itself..... 55

Proof of remote intentions may be relevant by proof of the continuance of the intention, and consequently is admissible.... 55

Facts out of the district may be proved after the overt act as corrobative evidence of the intention..... 55
