Under the view of the case taken by the district judge, it did not become necessary to pass upon the question, whether the claimant, Tyng, has shown a lien in respect to his advances to the owner, which would be protected in case of condemnation of the vessel. But although, according to my view of the case, a decree of condemnation has passed against the vessel, I cannot conceive on what grounds the claimant can be entitled to his claim for advances. His whole claim rests upon his setting himself up as the sole owner of the vessel, which has been thrown upon him by her former owners, by reason of the first sale made by him to Martinez & Co.; the purchase-money having been paid over by him to them. It is the interest, therefore, of the claimant which has been adjudged forfeited; and a decree in his favor for the advance made by him, which was the whole purchase-money, would be directly repugnant to the decree of condemnation. The grounds upon which condemnation has been pronounced is, that he was an offending party, and implicated, in the whole arrangement made touching the adventure; and if so, he comes with an ill grace to ask for the protection of his interest, after being defeated in his illegal undertaking.

Nor do I see how the seamen's claim for wages can be sustained as a lien upon the vessel, according to the view taken by the supreme court of this law, in the case of U. S. v. Morris [supra]. Although they have in their claim denied having any knowledge that the vessel was to be engaged in any unlawful enterprise, yet nothing has been shown by them in any manner supporting this denial; and the circumstances disclosed, certainly show a prima facie case leading to a contrary conclusion. The two seamen who have petitioned for an allowance of their wages, are William Michael and James Foxcroft. I do not find their names on the crew-list, or in the shipping articles; but assuming them to have been a part of the crew, they must have known that the vessel was going on a voyage to the coast of Africa. There is no pretence of any misrepresentation to them in this respect. The shipping articles describe the voyage to be from Havana to the Isle of Principe, or to trade to other ports on the west coast of Africa, and for a voyage not to exceed eight months. No mention is made of a return of the vessel to Havana or elsewhere. But, from anything appearing on the face of the articles to the contrary, their services were to terminate on the coast of Africa, and they left there, or that they expected to be retained on board the vessel, in whatever service she might be engaged at the end of the eight months. This latter expectation was most likely what they hoped to realize; and this affords very strong presumptive evidence that they understood, or had reason to believe, that the vessel was to be employed in the transportation of slaves; and if so, they were guilty of a criminal offence within the act of congress, now under consideration. Their claim for wages must, accordingly, be denied.

NOTE 2. The statutes of the United States, on the subject of the slave trade, are as follows:—Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, that no citizen or citizens of the United States, or foreigner, or any other person coming into or residing within the same, shall, for himself or any other person whatsoever, either as master, factor or owner, build, fit, equip, load or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel, within any port or place of the said United States, nor shall cause any ship or vessel to sail from any port or place within the same, for the purpose of carrying on any trade or traffic in slaves, to any foreign country; or for the purpose of procuring from any foreign kingdom, place or country, the inhabitants of such kingdom, place or country, to be transported to any foreign country, port or place whatever, to be sold or disposed of as slaves; and if any ship or vessel shall be so fitted out, as aforesaid, for the said purposes, or shall be caused to sail, so as aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, furniture, apparel and other appurtenances, shall be forfeited to the United States; and shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned, in any of the circuit courts or district court for the district where the said ship or vessel may be found and seized. 1 Stat. 347–349, § 1. That all and every person, so building, fitting out, equipping, loading or otherwise preparing or sending away any ship or vessel, knowing or intending that the same shall be employed in such trade or business, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or anyways aiding or abetting therein, shall severally forfeit and pay the sum of two thousand dollars, one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety thereof to the use of him or her who shall sue for and prosecute the same. Id. § 2. That the owner, master or factor of each and every foreign ship or vessel, clearing out for any of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or suspected to be intended for the slave trade, and the suspicion being declared to the officer of the customs, by any citizen, on oath or affirmation, and such information being to the satisfaction of the said officer, shall first give bond with sufficient sureties, to the treasurer of the United States, that none of the natives of Africa, or any other foreign country or place, shall be taken on board the said ship or vessel, to be transported or sold as slaves in any other foreign port or place whatever, within nine months thereafter. Id. § 3. That if any citizen or citizens of the United States shall, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, take on board, receive or transport any such persons, as above described in this act, for the purpose of selling them as slaves, as aforesaid, he or they shall forfeit and pay, for each and every person so received on board, transported or sold as aforesaid, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be recovered in any court of the United States proper to try the same; the one moiety thereof to the use of the United States, and the other moiety to the use of such person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same. Approved, March 22, 1794. Id. § 4. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America, in congress assembled, that from and after the passing of this act, it shall not be lawful to import or bring, in any manner whatsoever, into the United States, or territories thereof, from any foreign kingdom, place or country, any negro, mulatto, or person of color, with intent to hold, sell or dispose of any such negro, mulatto, or person of color as a slave, or to be held to service or labor; and any ship, vessel or other water-craft, employed in any importation as aforesaid, shall be liable to seizure, prosecution and forfeiture, in any district in which it may be found; one-half thereof to the use of the United States, and the other half to the use of him or them who shall prosecute the same to effect. 3 Stat. 450, § 1. And be it further enacted, that no citizen or citizens of the United States, or any other person or persons, shall, after the passing of this act, as aforesaid, for himself, themselves, or any other person or persons whatsoever, either as master, factor or owner, build, fit, equip, load or otherwise prepare any ship or vessel, in any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, nor cause any such ship or vessel to sail from any port or place whatsoever within the jurisdiction of the same, for the purpose of procuring any negro, mulatto or person of color, from any foreign kingdom, place or country, to be transported to any port or place whatsoever, to be held, sold or otherwise disposed of, as slaves, or to be held to service or labor; and if any ship or vessel shall be so built, fitted out, equipped, laden or otherwise prepared for the purpose aforesaid, every such ship or vessel, her tackle, apparel, furniture and lading, shall be forfeited, one moiety to the use of the United States and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for said forfeiture and prosecute the same to effect; and such ship or vessel shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction. Id. 451, § 2. And be it further enacted, that every person or persons so building, fitting out, equipping, loading, or otherwise preparing, or sending away, or causing any of the acts aforesaid to be done, with intent to employ such ship or vessel in such trade or business, after the passing of this act, contrary to the true intent and meaning thereof, or who shall in anywise be aiding or abetting therein, shall, severally, on conviction thereof, by due course of law, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, nor less than one thousand dollars, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for such forfeiture and prosecute the same to effect, and shall, moreover, be imprisoned for a term not exceeding seven years, nor less than three years. Id. § 3. And be it further enacted, that if any citizen or citizens of the United States, or other person or persons resident within the jurisdiction of the same, shall, from and after the passing of this act, take on board, receive or transport, from any of the coasts or kingdoms of Africa, or from any other foreign kingdom, place or country, or from sea, any negro, mulatto or person of color, not being an inhabitant, nor held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, in any ship, vessel, boat or other water-craft, for the purpose of holding, selling or otherwise disposing of such person as a slave, or to be held to service or labor, or be aiding or abetting therein, every such person or persons so offending, shall, on conviction by due course of law, severally forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding five thousand, nor less than one thousand dollars, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for such forfeiture and prosecute the same to effect; and, moreover, shall suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years nor less than three years: and every ship or vessel, boat or other water-craft, on which such negro, mulatto or person of color, shall have been taken on board, received or transported, as aforesaid, her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the goods and effects which shall be found on board the same, or shall have been imported therein in the same voyage, shall be forfeited, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for and prosecute the same to effect; and every such ship or vessel shall be liable to be seized, prosecuted and condemned in any court of the United States having competent jurisdiction. Id. § 4. And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons, whatsoever shall, from and after the passing of this act, bring within the jurisdiction of the United States, in any manner whatsoever, any negro, mulatto or person of color, from any foreign kingdom, place or country, or from sea, or shall hold, sell or otherwise dispose of any such negro, mulatto or person of color, so brought in as a slave, or to be held to service or labor, or be in anywise aiding or abetting therein, every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof by due course of law, forfeit and pay, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding ten thousand nor less than one thousand dollars, one moiety to the use of the United States, and the other to the use of the person or persons who shall sue for such forfeiture and prosecute the same to effect; and, moreover, shall suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding seven years nor less than three years. Id. 452, § 6. And be it further enacted, that in all prosecutions under this act, the defendant or defendants shall be holden to prove that the negro, mulatto or person of color, which he or they shall be charged with having brought into the United States, or with purchasing, holding, selling or otherwise disposing of, and which, according to the evidence in such case, the said defendant or defendants shall have brought in aforesaid, or otherwise disposed of, was brought into the United States at least five years previous to the commencement of such prosecution, or was not brought in, holden, purchased, or otherwise disposed of, contrary to the provisions of this act; and in failure thereof, the said defendant or defendants shall be adjudged guilty of the offence of which he or they may stand accused. Id. 453, § 8. And be it further enacted, that any prosecution, information or action may be sustained for any offence under this act, at any time within five years after such offence shall have been committed, any law to the contrary notwithstanding. Id. § 9. And be it further enacted, that if any citizens of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land from any such ship or vessel, and, on any foreign shore, seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy, or forcibly bring or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and on conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he may be brought or found, shall suffer death. Id. 600, § 4. And be it further enacted, that if any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for, or in behalf of, any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining on board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall, on board any such ship or vessel, offer or attempt to sell, as a slave, any negro or mulatto not held to service as aforesaid, or shall, on the high seas, or anywhere on tidewater, transfer or deliver over, to any other ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto, not held to service as aforesaid, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall land or deliver on shore, from on board any such ship or vessel, any such negro or mulatto, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold such negro or mulatto as a slave, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and on conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he shall be brought or found, shall suffer death. Id. 601, § 4.

NOTE 3. The facts in the case of U. S. v. Morris, cited supra, together with the opinion of the court thereon, were stated by Chief Justice Taney, as follows:—"This case comes before us upon a certificate of division from the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, in the Second circuit. The defendant, Isaac Morris, is indicted under the second and third sections of the act entitled 'An act in addition to an act entitled "An act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country,"' approved on the 10th of May, 1800. The first count of the indictment charges that the defendant did, on the high seas, from the 15th of June until the 26th of August, in the year 1839, voluntarily serve on board of the schooner Butterfly, a vessel of the United States, employed and made use of in the transportation of slaves from some foreign country or place, to some other foreign country or place, the said defendant being a citizen of the United States. The second count charges that the defendant did, on the high seas, from the 15th day of June to the 26th day of August, voluntarily serve on board of the schooner Butterfly, being a foreign vessel employed in the slave trade; the defendant being a citizen of the United States. It was proved on the trial, on the part of the prosecution, that the schooner Butterfly, carrying the flag of the United States, and documented as a vessel of the United States, sailed from Havana for the coast of Africa, on the 27th of July, 1839, having on board the usual and peculiar equipments of vessels engaged in the transportation of slaves from the coast of Africa to other places. Before she reached the African coast, and before any slaves were taken on board, she was captured by the Dolphin, a British brig-of-war, and carried into Sierra Leone; upon suspicion of being Spanish property, to be proceeded against in the mixed commission court at that place. At the time of her capture, Isaac Morris was in command of the vessel, and was described in the ship's papers and represented himself as a citizen of the United States. The court at Sierra Leone declined taking cognizance of the case, because the vessel was documented as an American vessel; and she was then sent to New York to be dealt with by the authorities of the United States as they might think proper.

"Upon the foregoing state of facts, the judges were divided in opinion upon the four following questions, which were presented on the facts aforesaid for their decision: (1) Whether it is necessary in order to constitute the offence denounced in the second section of the act of the 10th of May, 1800, above referred to, that there should be an actual transportation or carrying of slaves in the vessel of the United States, on board of which the party indicted is alleged to have served. (2) Whether it is necessary in order to constitute the offence denounced in the third section of the act of the 10th of May, 1800, above referred to, that there should be an actual transportation or carrying of slaves in a foreign vessel, on board of which the party indicted is alleged to have served. (3) Whether the voluntary service of an American citizen, on board a vessel of the United States, in a voyage commenced with the intent that the vessel should be employed and made use of in the transporting or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, is in itself, and where no slaves had been transported in such vessel, or received on board her, an offence under the said second section. (4) Whether the voluntary service of an American citizen, on board a foreign vessel, in a voyage commenced with the intent that the vessel should be employed and made use of in the transportation and carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, is in itself, and where no slaves have been transported in such vessel, or received on board her, an offence under the said third section. And these points having been certified to this court, we proceed to express our opinion upon them.

"The second section of the act of congress above mentioned, declares, 'that it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States, or other person residing therein, to serve on board any vessel of the United States, employed or made use of in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another; and any such citizen or other person voluntarily serving as aforesaid, shall be liable to be indicted therefor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding two years.' The first and third points certified from the circuit court, depend on the construction of this section. In expounding a penal statute the court certainly will not extend it beyond the plain meaning of its words; for it has been long and well settled, that such statutes must be construed strictly. Yet the evident intention of the legislature ought not to be defeated by a forced and overstrict construction. [U. S. v. Wiltberger] 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 95. The question in this case is, whether a vessel on her outward voyage to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of taking on board a cargo of slaves, is 'employed or made use of' in the transportation or carrying of slaves from one foreign country or place to another, before any slaves are received on board? To be 'employed' in anything, means not only the act of doing it, but also to be engaged to do it; to be under contract or orders to do it. And this is not only the ordinary meaning of the word, but it has frequently been used in that sense in other acts of congress. Thus, for example, the second section of the act of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 103], entitled 'An act to reduce into one, the several acts establishing and regulating the post-office department,' declares, 'that the postmaster-general, and all other persons "employed" in the general post-office, or in the care, custody, or conveyance of the mail, shall, previous to entering upon the duties assigned to them,' take the oath prescribed by that section. Here the persons who have contracted to perform certain duties in the general post-office, are described as 'employed' in that department, before they enter upon the duties assigned them. So, also, in the twenty-first section of the same law, various offences, such as the embezzling or destroying any letter, are enumerated, and the punishment prescribed, when committed by any person 'employed in any of the departments of the post-office establishment.' Yet it cannot be supposed that the party must be actually engaged in transacting his official duties when the letter was embezzled or destroyed, in order to constitute the offence described in this section. Again, Act July 29, 1813, § 8 (2 Story's Laws, 1353 [3 Stat. 49]), declares, that certain vessels 'employed' in the fisheries, shall not be entitled to the bounties therein granted, unless the master makes an agreement in writing or in print, with every fisherman employed therein before he proceeds on any fishing voyage. Here the vessel is spoken of as 'employed' in the fisheries, before she sails on the voyage. So, also, Act March 3, 1831 (4 Story's Laws, 2256 [4 Stat. 492]), entitled 'An act concerning vessels employed in the whale fishery,' authorizes vessels owned by any incorporated company, and 'employed wholly in the whale fishery,' to be registered or enrolled, and licensed in a particular manner, 'so long as any such vessel shall be wholly employed in the whale fishery.' The register or enrollment and license, must be obtained before the vessel sails on her outward voyage to the whaling grounds; and, consequently, in that voyage she must be 'employed' in the whale fishery, in the sense in which these words are used in the act of congress; otherwise, she would not be entitled to the register or enrollment and license authorized by this law. In like manner, the vessel in question was employed in the transportation of slaves, within the meaning of the act of congress of May 10, 1800, if she was sailing on her outward voyage to the African coast, in order to take them on board, to be transported to another foreign country. In such a voyage, the vessel is employed in the business of transporting and carrying slaves from one foreign country to another. In other words, she is employed in the slave trade. And any citizen of the United States, who shall voluntarily serve on board any vessel of the United States, on such a voyage, is guilty of the offence mentioned in the second section of this act of congress. It is hardly necessary to add, that 'voluntarily,' in this section, means, 'with knowledge' of the business in which she is employed. And in order to constitute the offence, the party must have knowledge that the vessel was bound to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of taking slaves on board, to be transported to some other foreign country. The same reasoning applies to the third section of the law, under which the second and fourth points certified to this court, have arisen. The vessel is 'employed in the slave trade' when sailing to the African coast for the purpose of taking the slaves on board. We, therefore, answer the first and second questions in the negative, and the third and fourth in the affirmative; and it will be certified accordingly to the circuit court.

Case No. 14,756.

UNITED STATES v. CATHCART.

SAME v. PARMENTER.

[1 Bond, 556.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1864.

TREASON—SECESSION ORDINANCES—UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION—SUPREME LAW.

1. The seceding ordinances of a portion of the states did not abrogate the constitution of the United States, or release the citizens of any state from their obligation of loyalty to the government of the United States, and a citizen or resident of any state may, therefore, be indicted and punished for treasonable acts against that government.

2. The government of the United States is not a compact between the several states, from which any state may withdraw at pleasure, with or without cause.

3. The constitution of the United States was ordained and established, not by the states in their sovereign capacities, but, as the preamble emphatically declares, by the people of the United States; and the government of the Union emanates from the people, and is a government for the people.

4. The government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action, and laws passed pursuant to the constitution, form the supreme law of the land.

[These were indictments against Charles W. H. Cathcart and against Catherine Parmenter. Heard on a demurrer, and on a motion to quash.]

Flamen Ball, U. S. Dist. Atty.

William M. Corry, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. In the first of these cases, a special demurrer to the indictment has been filed; and in the second, there is a motion to quash. The indictments in both cases are substantially the same in their structure; and the questions raised on the demurrer, and in the motion to quash, being the same, it will be unnecessary to consider them separately, as the judgment in one case will be decisive of the other. The views now stated by the court have special reference to the grounds of demurrer in Cathcart's case.

The indictment contains two counts. The first count avers that there is now existing an open and public war or rebellion, carried on with force and arms by the so-called Confederate States of America, against the government and laws of the United States; and that the defendant, owing allegiance to the government of the United States, in violation of such allegiance has levied war against the same by banding together with others in military array; and thus has committed treason against the United States. The second count, after reciting the existence of the rebellion or war, as averred in the first count, charges that the defendant knowingly and willfully conspired with others, and did assist and give aid and comfort to those in rebellion or war against the United States, and in the execution of his traitorous adhesion to the enemies of the United States, committed several overt acts of treason, which are specifically set forth, but which it is unnecessary here to recite.

The first count is based on the first section of the act of congress of July 17, 1862 [12 Stat. 589], to suppress insurrection, punish treason, etc., which provides that every person who shall hereafter commit the crime of treason against the United States, and shall be adjudged guilty thereof, shall suffer death, or fine and imprisonment, as the court may direct. The second count is based on section 2 of said act, which declares "that if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States or the laws thereof, or shall give aid and comfort thereto, or shall engage in, or give aid and comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, shall be liable to fine or imprisonment, or both, at the discretion of the court."

There are several exceptions to the indictment, which are set out in the special demurrer. The first one stated has been abandoned, and need not be noticed. The second exception is for duplicity in the second count in averring a conspiracy of several persons to aid in several distinct offenses. (3) Misjoinder of a count for felony, and for a misdemeanor. (4) No averment that the crimes charged were committed within any county in the Southern district of Ohio. (5) Repugnance in both counts in averring the crimes charged to have been committed against the government of the United States and also the people of the United States. (6) The crimes are charged to have been committed against the allegiance of the defendant, when they can only be against obedience, and because of the agreement of the state of Ohio, and of all the other states, to the constitutional compact binding on the citizens of Ohio and of each state, so long as the compact remained. (7) That treason or conspiracy against the United States after the refusal of some of the states to continue the constitutional compact, are no longer possible.

The sixth and seventh causes of demurrer, involved also in the motion to quash, are yet to be considered. They have been recited as set out in the demurrer, in a previous part of this opinion, and it is not necessary to restate them here. Both present substantially the same question, and may, therefore, be discussed together. They affirm, that from the facts alleged in the indictment, it is impossible that the crime of treason against the government of the United States can be committed. In a legal sense, the demurrer admits the truth of the facts alleged in the indictment. One of these facts is, that the United States is now engaged in a war for the suppression of a rebellion against the government by the people of certain states, aiming at the overthrow of the constitution and the establishment of another government. It is insisted that the states in rebellion have abrogated the compact by which they were bound to the Union, and that this compact being dissolved, by their ordinances of secession, neither a citizen of one of the states thus seceding, nor of any state not involved in the acts of secession, can commit the crime of treason against the government of the United States. In support of this position, certainly somewhat startling in its character, it is insisted that the constitution, instead of creating an actual and efficient government for the whole people of the United States, is a mere league or compact, from which any state, or any number of states, may at any time withdraw, with or without cause, and without or against the consent of the people of the other states, as caprice, passion, or interest may dictate; that the states, when they entered into the Union and became parties to this league or compact, were sovereign and independent; that the allegiance of the people of each state was due exclusively to the state in which the citizen had his domicile, and the allegiance being inalienable and indivisible, could not be and has not been transferred, in whole or in part, to the government of the United States, and remains, therefore, with the people of the individual states, whose obligations of allegiance are wholly due to the state in which they live; that when the people of a state, in any way they may see proper to prescribe, ignore, or repudiate such league or compact, they are thereby absolved from all obligation of obedience or allegiance to the government of the United States; and that, if they take the attitude of armed rebellion against it, with the avowed purpose of its overthrow, they can not be punished as rebels or traitors.

And as the necessary and logical result of this theory, it is urged that if a citizen or resident of a state, which has not seceded, but which remains faithful and loyal to the government, adheres to those thus in rebellion, and supports and sustains them in their criminal attempts, he is not guilty of treason and can not be held accountable for that crime, under the laws or authority of the United States.

These are in substance the points made by counsel in support of the two last grounds of demurrer. The argument has been greatly extended, and the domain of political metaphysics has been fully explored in its progress. I have listened patiently to the statement of the views of counsel, though not without some surprise that they should have been urged with such apparent gravity and earnestness, before this court, on a purely legal question, with the full knowledge that they were in direct conflict with the solemn and well-considered adjudications of the supreme court of the United Sates, and the views of numerous elementary writers of the highest reputation as jurists. I am at a loss to comprehend on what grounds counsel could have supposed this court would sustain a theory so entirely at variance, not only with the decisive authorities to which I shall refer, but with the uniform action of every department of the general government from its organization to the present day. It is obvious that the counsel throughout his argument has addressed himself to the question, what, in his judgment, the structure of our government should have been, and not what it is. It seemed, therefore, to the court, that however appropriate the peculiar views of counsel may have been, if urged in a popular assembly to rectify a supposed erroneous public sentiment, or in a convention to amend the constitution, or reconstruct the government, they were wholly out of place on the question, whether the averments and structure of the indictment in this case, were sufficient in law to put the defendant on trial before a traverse jury. The manner of counsel was, however, unexceptionably courteous, and his views were presented with seeming earnestness and sincerity. It is due, therefore, to the occasion, and to the position I occupy, that I should state some of the reasons why I can not assent to the principles he has urged upon the attention of the court. And, in the first place, I will refer to some of the adjudicated cases in which these principles have been discussed and settled by men whose intellectual power and profound knowledge of the structure of our government, entitle them to the highest measure of respect and veneration. And I may remark here, that in so far as these principles are embodied and propounded in the judicial decisions of the supreme court, they are positively authoritative on this court, as a subordinate court of the United States. In the case of Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. [14 U. S.] 304, 3 Pet. Cond. R. 575, the supreme court says: "The constitution of the United States was ordained and established, not by the states in their sovereign capacities, but emphatically, as the preamble of the constitution declares, by the people of the United States. There can be no doubt that it was competent to the people to invest the general government with all the powers, which they might deem proper and necessary, to extend or restrain those powers according to their own good pleasure, and to give them paramount and supreme authority." The opinion of the court in this case was delivered by Justice Story, and was concurred in by the whole court, including Chief Justice Marshall. In McCulloch v. State of Maryland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 316, Chief Justice Marshall delivering the opinion of the court, it is decided "that the government of the Union is a government of the people; it emanates from them; its powers are granted by them, and are to be exercised directly on them, and for their benefit." Again: "The government of the Union, though limited in its powers, is supreme within its sphere of action; and its laws, when made in pursuance of the constitution, form the supreme law of the land."

Judge Story, in discussing the question whether the constitution of the United States is a compact between the several states, remarks that there is nowhere found upon the face of the constitution any clause intimating it to be a compact, or in any wise providing for its interpretation as such. On the contrary, the preamble emphatically speaks of it as a solemn ordinance and establishment of government. The language is: "We, the people of the United States, do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." Commentaries on the Constitution (Abr. Ed.) 117. And again (page 119) the learned author says: "But that which would seem conclusive on the subject is the very language of the constitution itself. This constitution, says the sixth article, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." And he adds: "If it is the supreme law, how can the people of any state, either by any form of its own constitution or laws, or other proceedings, repeal, abrogate, or suspend it?" And again he says: "This of itself imports legal obligation, permanence and uncontrollability by any but the authorities authorized to alter or abolish it." And again, on this subject, the learned writer says (page 684): "It would be a perfect solecism to affirm that a national government should exist with certain powers, and yet in the exercise of those powers should not be supreme."

I will add to these references a brief notice of the case of Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 506, decided by the supreme court of the United States in 1858, which sustains fully the general doctrines affirmed by the prior decisions of that court. I make this reference with the more satisfaction because the opinion was written and delivered by Chief Justice Taney, a judge eminent for his profound legal learning, and who has never been charged with extreme liberality in construing the constitution of the United States, and defining the powers of the general government. In that case, a judge of a state court in Wisconsin had discharged a party on habeas corpus who was in custody under the authority of the United States. The supreme court of the state sustained the action of the lower judge; and the case was removed to the supreme court of the United States by writ of error, in accordance with section 25 of the judiciary act of 1789 [1 Stat. 85]. I shall give but brief quotations from the opinion of the court, indicating their views on the subject under consideration. On page 516, the court say: "Although the state of Wisconsin is sovereign within its territorial limits to a certain extent, yet that sovereignty is limited and restricted by the constitution of the United States. And the powers of the general government and of the state, although both exist and are exercised within the same territorial limits, are yet separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. And the sphere of action appropriated to the United States is as far beyond the reach of the judicial process issued by a state judge or a state court, as if the line of division was traced by landmarks and monuments visible to the eye." Again, on page 517, the court say: "The constitution was not formed merely to guard the states against danger from foreign nations, but mainly to secure union and harmony at home; for if this object could be obtained there would be little danger from abroad; and, to accomplish this purpose, it was felt by the statesmen who framed the constitution, and by the people who adopted it, that it was necessary that many of the rights of sovereignty which the states then possessed should be ceded to the general government; and that in the sphere of action assigned to it, it should be supreme, and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a state, or from state authorities. And it was evident that anything short of this would be inadequate to the main objects for which the government was established." And the court further say: "The language of the constitution by which this power is granted is too plain to admit of doubt, or to need comment. It declares that 'this constitution, and the laws which shall be passed in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.'" On page 524, the court further say: "Nor is there anything in the supremacy of the general government, or the jurisdiction of its tribunals, to awaken the jealousy or offend the natural and just pride of state sovereignty. Neither this government nor the powers of which we are speaking were forced upon the states. The constitution of the United States, with all the powers conferred on it by the general government, and surrendered by the states, was the voluntary act of the people of the several states, deliberately done, for their own protection and safety against injustice from one another." And they add (page 525): "Now it certainly can be no humiliation to the citizen of a republic to yield a ready obedience to the laws as administered by the constituted authorities. On the contrary, it is among the first and highest duties as a citizen, because free government can not exist without it. Nor can it be inconsistent with the dignity of a sovereign state to observe faithfully, and in the spirit of sincerity and truth, the compact into which it voluntarily entered when it became a state of this Union. And certainly no faith could be more deliberately and solemnly pledged than that which every state has plighted to the other states to support the constitution as it is, in all its provisions, until they shall be altered in the manner which the constitution itself prescribes."

A still more recent decision of the supreme court, in the Prize Cases, as they are called, 2 Black [67 U. S.] 635, strongly affirms the doctrines previously declared by that court. In the very able and lucid opinion of Mr. Justice Grier, giving the views of the court (page 673), he says: "Under the very peculiar constitution of this government, although the citizens owe supreme allegiance to the federal government, they owe also a qualified allegiance to the state in which they are domiciled." And it may be proper here to remark that the principles enunciated in the case just referred to, are pertinent to the questions before this court on this demurrer in another aspect. The argument of the counsel for the demurrant is, that a citizen of a state can not be guilty of treason against the United States by adhering to, or giving aid and comfort to those now in rebellion against the government, because it is a mere insurrection or civil war, waged by the seceding states against the government. But in the Prize Cases the doctrine is very impressively announced that the rebellion has all the attributes of a foreign or public war, and that all the duties, obligations, disabilities, and penalties incident to such a war attach to every citizen. In a word, that those who are particeps criminis in the rebellion are not the less traitors because they are rebels. In that case the court say: "It (the law of nations) contains no such anomalous doctrine as that which the court are now for the first time desired to pronounce—to wit: that insurgents who have risen against their sovereign, expelled her courts, established a revolutionary government, organized armies and commenced hostilities, are not enemies because they are traitors; and a war levied on the government by traitors in order to dismember and destroy it, is not war, because it is an insurrection." And again the court say: "When the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that the courts of justice can not be kept open, civil war exists, and hostilities may be prosecuted on the same footing as if those opposing the government were foreign enemies invading the land." And further on in the opinion, as descriptive of the true character of the present rebellion, the court say: "It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force; south of this line is enemies' territory, because it is held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power."

Such are some of the deliverances of the highest judicial tribunal of the Union. They repudiate emphatically the mischievous heresy that the union of the states under the constitution is a mere league or compact, from which a state, or any number of states, may withdraw at pleasure, not only without the consent of the other states, but against their will. They deny the assumption that full and unqualified sovereignty still remains in the states or the people of a state, and affirm, on the contrary, that. by express words of the constitution, solemnly ratified by the people of the United States, the national government is supreme within the range of the powers delegated to it; while the states are sovereign only in the sense that they have an indisputable claim to the exercise of all the rights and powers guaranteed to them by the constitution of the United States, or which are expressly or by fair implication reserved to them.

I might, perhaps close this opinion here. But the course of the learned counsel in his argument seems to justify, if it does not call for some additional views. And the first remark is, that apart from the light which the high judicial authorities to which I have referred has thrown on the subject under discussion, I should have arrived at the same conclusions which they announce. It is my strong conviction that the language of the constitution, in connection with the known history of its origin, formation, and adoption, leaves no room for a doubt as to the character and structure of the government which it created. Its history is well authenticated, and bears upon every page the indelible stamp of truth I can not, on an occasion like this, refer to or adduce the many facts which throw light upon the views and intentions of the eminent patriots and statesmen to whom we are indebted for our inimitable constitution. One thing is certain, the American people are in no danger of estimating their services too highly, or according to their memories a measure of honor which is not justly their due. With the illustrious Washington at their head, they entered upon the arduous duty of reconstructing the government under circumstances of deep depression and gloom. The confederation under which the Union had for some time existed, had proved a lamentable failure, and was on the verge of dissolution from its own inherent weakness. The hearts of the patriots who had toiled and bled in the revolutionary struggle for national liberty and independence, were stirred to their inmost depths, from an apprehension that their great achievements would prove fruitless of the results which they had anticipated. They felt deeply the truth that, in framing a new structure of government, they must avoid the rock on which the old one had foundered, and must, above all things, incorporate an element of power to bind the states in an indissoluble national union. This is plainly indicated in the preamble, which declares as one of the objects of the constitution, the formation of "a more perfect union," and is apparent not only from the debates in the convention, but from the language used throughout the entire instrument. After months of anxious toil and earnest deliberation, the present constitution was agreed to, and submitted to the people for their sanction and adoption. It was adopted by conventions in all the states, elected by the people for this purpose; and thus as the act of the people became the organic law. Its framers did not claim for it entire perfection; and contemplating the possibility that time would develop some necessary changes, wisely provided for its amendment by the same authority that had ordained and established it. It is not proposed to enter upon an extended discussion of the powers of the government, under the constitution thus framed and adopted. That it was designed to institute a government of the people, and for the people of the United States, and to confer upon it, within the powers granted or fairly implied, the attributes of sovereignty or supremacy, can not admit of a question. There is, in the language of the supreme court in a case before referred to, a qualified allegiance due to the state in which the citizen has his domicile, but it is subordinate to the allegiance due to the supreme government. The government, therefore, has a perfect right to exact, and has exacted from every one enjoying its protection, the duty of fidelity and allegiance. And it is certainly a fact, worthy of note, that there is not a word or phrase in the constitution of the United States which gives the least countenance to the theory that a state can obstruct or nullify the authority of the general government, exercised within its constitutional limits. Much less can the supreme folly of giving its sanction to the right of any state, or any number of states, to withdraw at will from the Union, be imputed to the constitution. Such a provision could not be viewed in any other light than as a solecism in the structure of a government. It would be substantially a provision for its own dissolution, without the sanction or agreement of the power which created it.

But I am not at liberty to extend this discussion. I may remark, in closing, that there were those in the convention which framed the constitution, and in the conventions of the states which ratified it, who objected to it because it created a national consolidated or supreme government of the United States. There was no difference of opinion then as to the character of the government which the constitution created, but the ground of its opponents was, that it did not conform to their views of what it should be. The counsel has referred in his argument to the resolutions of the legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky, passed in 1798, as giving sanction to the doctrine of the right of a state, at any time, to interpose its authority to prevent or provide a remedy for the unconstitutional exercise of authority on the part of the general government, and that they sanction what is called the right of nullification, or even of secession. I can not assent to the proposition that, properly understood, they justify such a conclusion. The history of these resolutions is well known to the American people. They were designed for a special political object, which was effected, in part at least, through their instrumentality. They affirmed that the states, being parties to the constitutional compact, "in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of powers not granted by the compact, have a right, and are in duty bound to interpose to prevent the progress of the evil." A distinguished statesman has well observed, in commenting on these resolutions, that "the sort of interposition intended was left in studied obscurity." But Mr. Madison, who was the author of the resolutions adopted by the Virginia legislature, in his report to that body in 1799, asserts distinctly that no extraconstitutional measures were intended. And thirty years later, during the administration of General Jackson, when certain prominent Southern politicians insisted that nullification was the proper remedy, in case of an invasion of the rights of a state, solemnly and earnestly protested against this construction of the Virginia resolutions. "He earnestly maintained that the separate action of an individual state was not contemplated by them, and that they had in view nothing but the concerted action of the states to procure a repeal of unconstitutional laws, or an amendment of the constitution." And in 1832, when Mr. Calhoun had succeeded in inducing South Carolina to pass an ordinance of nullification, on the avowed ground of the unconstitutionality of the laws imposing duties on imports, and that state was on the verge of open rebellion, the sturdy arm of Andrew Jackson was raised to crush it in the bud. Before resorting to force for this purpose, with a paternal anxiety for the people of that state who had been deluded by the false political teachings of their leaders, he issued his memorable proclamation, addressed to the people of that state. It is a document which well deserves to be cherished in the memories of the American people to the latest ages. It is alike remarkable for the earnest devotion of its author to the union of the states, the elevated patriotism which is exhibited in every line, and its able and unanswerable exposition of the true principles and theory of the government. The fallacies of the nullification party were held up as dangerous political heresies. Its effects upon the whole country were electrical. It was clothed with the power of truth, and carried conviction to the minds of all men of all political parties whose intellects were not so constructed as to be impervious to the voice of reason, or dead to the impulses of patriotism.

But though the iron will and sturdy sense of President Jackson had thoroughly rebuked and arrested the heresy for the time, the deadly poison was not wholly eradicated from the Southern mind. After the lapse of thirty years, its baleful effects have appeared in a new and more malignant form. That which was nullification in 1832, is secession in 1860. The political leaders in the Southern states, by means which I do not care to recite, have so far succeeded in their treasonable machinations as to induce those states madly to leap into the fiery vortex of secession. They have gone through the mockery of passing ordinances, in which they declare they are no longer parties of the solemn compact of government, and repudiate all allegiance to it. They have inaugurated war against that government and have been in armed rebellion against it for nearly three years. If successful, the overthrow of the government is the inevitable result, for secession, having no warrant in the constitution, is revolution. The authorities charged with the solemn duty of preserving and perpetuating the government, have found it imperatively necessary to meet force by force, and have adopted measures to repel and subdue the criminal designs of those in rebellion. The country is in a state of war—a war which the adjudications of the supreme court have declared to be lawful and constitutional. A struggle is in progress which, at one time, jeopardized the very life of the government. In such a crisis, it is now gravely urged in a court deriving its being and authority from a constitution which the judges are sworn to support, that a citizen of the patriotic and loyal state of Ohio, charged with criminal complicity in the rebellion, can not be guilty of treason, because the revolted states had a right to withdraw from the Union; and, as a logical and legal result, have virtually destroyed the entire fabric of the government, and absolved the people of the United States from all obligation of allegiance to it! As a judge, and as a citizen of the United States, I am constrained to enter my protest against such a dangerous perversion of the principles of the constitution. To sanction such a position, under circumstances now existing in our country, implies, in my judgment, a most unenviable condition of intellect, and the possession of a measure of courage, physical and moral, to which I can lay no claim. The character and tendencies of this doctrine are not now to be settled by unmeaning abstractions and metaphysical speculations. The period when these could have been available has gone by, and the bitter fruits of this sad error are now fully developed in its practical results. It has plunged those who have been its deluded victims into one of the deadliest conflicts the world has ever witnessed. Its blighting influences are now frightfully apparent in the wide-spread suffering, desolation, and ruin, which it has brought upon the states which have so madly raised the banner of revolt. The loyal states, too, have laid liberal offerings on the altar of sacrifice. In their patriotic devotion to the government of their fathers, and impelled by a stern, unconquerable purpose of defending, preserving, and perpetuating it, they have cheerfully borne a severe trial of their energies, and profusely lavished their treasures and poured out their blood. The sacrifice, though costly, we may well hope, will be fully repaid by the end to be achieved.

I have now only to say, that upon none of the grounds urged, can the exceptions to this indictment be sustained. The demurrer, as also the motion to quash in the case of Catherine Parmenter, are therefore overruled.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1803.

CONTEMPT—REFUSAL TO TESTIFY BEFORE GRAND JURY.

It is a contempt of court in a witness to refuse to answer proper questions before the grand jury, for which he may be fined, and required to give security for his good behavior.

[Cited in U. S. v. Anonymous, 21 Fed. 770.]

Attachment of contempt on complaint of the grand jury, signed by their foreman, that Caton had refused to answer questions, and behaved in an insolent manner, and had threatened some of the grand jurors. Upon examining on oath two of the grand jurors, and the facts being proved, he was fined five dollars and ordered to give security for his good behavior for one year, himself and one surety in fifty dollars each—or himself in fifty dollars with two sureties in twenty-five dollars each.

UNITED STATES v. CAUSIN.

[1 Hayw. & H. 37.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May 1, 1841.

OFFICERS—TERMS OF OFFICE—JUDGE.

By the act of congress of May 25, 1838 [5 Stat. 229], the additional judge of the orphans' court appointed under that act held his office for life, and the office was not vacant on the death of the judge he was commissioned to assist.

The petitioners, Richard Wallach and others, by their counsel, J. M. Carlisle and Henry May, pray that a writ of quo warranto be awarded, and directed to Nathaniel P. Causin, commanding him to be and appear before the court to exhibit the right and authority under and by virtue of which he exercises the powers, functions, and authority of judge of the orphans' court.

The facts as stated in the petition are as follows: In 1838 the office of judge of the orphans' court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, was held by Samuel Chase, who, by reason of his age and infirmities, became disqualified from performing the duties of the office. That congress, on the 25th of May, 1838,[2] provided for the appointment of an additional judge of the orphans' court; that under this act the president appointed and commissioned N. P. Causin to the office created by said act; that Samuel Chase since died. The petitioners hold that the office of the judge of said orphans' court has become vacant, and show that the [2] Act May 25, 1838, c. 85: "Whereas, the judge of the orphans' court in, &c., is, by reason of age and infirmity, disqualified for the due and proper discharge of the duties of his office.

"Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be appointed in and for the county of Washington, an additional judge of the orphans' court, who shall take an oath for the faithful and impartial discharge of the duties of his office, and who shall have the same powers, perform the same duties and receive the same salary, as are exercised, performed and received by the present judge of the said orphans' court.

"Sec. 2. That during the life or continuance in office of the present judge of the said orphans' court, the powers of the said orphans' court shall be vested in the said two judges jointly, or may be exercised by the said additional judge separately, as provided in the foregoing section, and that after the death or resignation of the present judge, the said orphans' court shall consist of a single judge as heretofore."

public good requires that the question thus presented should be settled by the court.

The following rule was served on the respondent: That you show cause why a writ of quo warranto shall not be issued directed to Nathaniel P. Causin, commanding him to be and appear before this court, then and there to exhibit the right and authority of which he exercises the powers, functions, and authority of the judge of said orphans' court, and submit to such order or decree and judgment as the court shall deem right and proper in the premises.

The respondent answered that there is no tenure in the act of February 27, 1801 [2 Stat. 103], authorizing the appointment of a judge of said court, by which the judge shall hold his office, but the tenure of said office has always been understood from that time hitherto to be during good behavior, and the tenure of which is prescribed by the constitution of the United States (article 3, § 1), and the respondent relied on such contemporaneous exposition of the act organizing said court as well as on the uniform subsequent interpretation thereof for forty years, for the purpose of showing that the office is held under the constitution by the tenure prescribed by said article 3, § 1, of the constitution of the United States.

The counsel for the petitioners contended that under the act of 1838 the tenure of office was limited to the life of Judge Chase, and that his decease caused a vacancy in the office of judge of the orphans' court.

J. M. Carlisle and Henry May, for petitioners.

Joseph H. Bradley and Brent & Brent, for respondent.

THE COURT, without an argument from the counsel for the respondent, decided that there was no vacancy in the judgeship, and that the appointment of Nathaniel P. Causin as judge of the orphans' court of the county of Washington, District of Columbia, was during good behavior, or, in other words, for life.

Case No. 14,760.

UNITED STATES v. CAVE.

[3 Hall, Law J. 176.]

District Court, D Pennsylvania. Jan., 1809.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — FORFEITURE FOR EVADING — CONCEALED GOODS.

The proviso in the fifty-seventh section of the "Act to regulate the duties and tonnage" (4 Laws [Folwell's Ed.] 374 [1 Stat. 671]), does not protect from forfeiture goods which are found concealed on board, after the master has declared that the whole cargo is discharged.

This was an action of debt against the master of the schooner Two Brothers, to recover a penalty of $500 under the fifty-seventh section of the impost law, the goods on board not agreeing with the report or manifest delivered by the defendant at the customhouse, inasmuch as 25 bags of coffee, not reported, were found by the inspectors concealed in the vessel, some days after the master had declared that the whole cargo was discharged.

The disagreement was clearly proved at the trial, under such circumstances as excluded every idea that it arose from accident or mistake. But Mr. Condy, the counsel for the defendant, contended that, as the goods had never been landed until they were seized and sent to the custom house by the inspectors, the penalty, by virtue of the proviso to the section of the act of congress on which the suit was founded, could not be inflicted.

After a general answer from Mr. Dallas, the jury gave a verdict for the United States, subject to the opinion of the court on the point of law.

PETERS, District Judge. The point to be determined by the court arises on the meaning and construction of the fifty-seventh section of the "Act to regulate the duties on imposts and tonnage" [1 Stat. 671]. Twenty-five bags of coffee were found hidden on board the schooner Two Brothers, whereof the defendant was master, not included in the manifest delivered at the custom house, after seven bags had been before discovered under similar circumstances; for which latter a post-entry had been permitted, a caution given to the master that he must enter all on board, and asseverations by him that there were no others in the vessel. The whole circumstances were attended with strong suspicious appearances. But it is unnecessary to detail them, as the jury have passed upon the facts, and satisfied themselves, and, I must add, to the satisfaction of the court, so far as it has any opinion to give in that part of the case. I shall, however, detach my mind from such considerations, so, nevertheless, as to regard what is necessary to developing the intention of the act, and its spirit and meaning. For, though true it is that penal statutes are to be construed strictly, yet equally true is it that "such construction ought to be put upon a statute as does not suffer it to be eluded." 6 Bac. Abr. 391, and authorities cited. The question here is as to the 25 bags of coffee "not agreeing with the report or manifest delivered by the master" to the collector; that is, they were not contained in it, but concealed on board, and not delivered till the vessel was thought to be unladen, and the inspecting officer had left her. The penalty of $500 is indisputably incurred, unless saved by the proviso in the fifty-seventh section.

It is insisted on by the counsel for the defendant that the fact of their being so found on board (no matter what was the intent of the master) is sufficient to acquit him, under one of the provisos or savings in the fifty-seventh section, from being amenable to the penalty imposed thereby. No construction is to be given to this (as it is contended) out of the very words, under the rule of interpretation of penal statutes. Now, these words are: "Provided it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, etc., or, in case of trial for the said penalty, to the satisfaction of the court, that no part whatever of the goods, wares or merchandize of such ship or vessel has been unshipped, landed or unladen, since it was taken on board, except as shall have been specified in the said report or manifest, and pursuant to permits as aforesaid." It appears to me, then, that the very words of this proviso, in the strict construction contended for, do not relate merely, and cannot reasonably or on any rule of construction be confined, to the goods which shall happen to be found on board. The law certainly could not be so construed, with any rational attention to the intent of the legislature. And it is also a rule, in the interpretation of all statutes, penal as well as others, that they shall be so construed as to effectuate the intention of the legislature. It requires no further or other proof to satisfy the collector or court that these goods were not, at the time of discovery, "unshipped," etc., than that of their being actually on board. But proof is expressly required, when it is discovered that "the goods on board do not agree with the manifest," to satisfy the collector or court that not only these goods, but that "no part whatever of the goods, etc., of such ship or vessel, has been landed," etc.; clearly, in my opinion, embracing all other goods of the ship, and throwing (from the necessity of such suspicious cases) the proof on the party, that no goods, others as well as those discovered, had been landed, etc. If this construction is deemed strict, it is certainly warranted by the doctrine contended for as to penal statutes. But it appears to me not to be a rigid or forced construction. It is one perfectly in conformity with the rule before mentioned, to wit, that "the construction shall be such as not to suffer the statute to be eluded." And nothing could open a wider field for frauds and evasions than that the very fact which creates strong suspicions of other violations having been committed should be established by the legislature as an excuse, not only for the one in which the party was detected, but as a protection against a penalty imposed to compel proof that there had been no smuggling of other parts of the cargo. This would seem like "a saving in an act contrary to the body of it" (1 Coke, 47c), which Lord Coke declares to be void. It would be almost as extraordinary (I do not mean any personal allusions) as would be a law for punishing theft, but excusing a felon caught with the mainor, that is, with the goods in his hands, because he had not parted with them, though perhaps from want of opportunity, and permitting him to escape on delivery of them to the owner. So, here, a post-entry is to wipe away all the penalty, if the goods not being landed is not enough, and free the party from all obligations of proving what the law, in cases of disagreement of the cargo on board with the manifest delivered, requires. This never could have been the legislative intention.

Should this view of the subject be deemed irrelevant, the construction of the proviso contended for by counsel, who always makes the best defence his case admits, would at any rate give every encouragement and means of "eluding the statute" to those inclined to defeat the objects of the law. Among these objects, evidently, are those comprehended in the provisions which enforce the necessity of returning fair and true accounts of all goods, not only then on board, but of furnishing proof, when required, as to those which had been "any part whatever of the goods of such ship or vessel." No proof whatever had been adduced to make it appear that there were in the vessel or had been no goods landed, since they were taken on board, other than those entered, and those discovered after such entry. The captain's declarations on this subject have been proved to be false, by the testimony of witnesses and the discovery of the goods. I am, therefore, of opinion, that neither the words nor manifest intention of the proviso relied on justify the defence set up in this cause, in point of law; and, of course, judgment must be entered for the United States.

Case No. 14,761.

UNITED STATES v. CAZARES.

[Hoff. Land. Cas. 90.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—VALIDITY—NATURALIZATION.

The validity of this claim not doubted.

Claim [by Antonio Cazares] for two leagues of land in Marin county [the Rancho Cañada de Pogolome], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

Halleck,[0] Peachy & Billings, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the documentary evidence in this case that James Dawson, the deceased husband of the present claimant, on the twenty-seventh of December, 1837, presented a petition to the commanding general, setting forth that he, together with McIntosh and one James Black, had obtained a grant for the place called "La Punta del Estero del Americano;" that he had built a house upon it, and planted a large vineyard and an orchard with more than two hundred fruit trees, and had placed upon it cattle, horses, &c. He further represented that the grant had been obtained in partnership with the two persons mentioned, but that McIntosh was attempting to eject him. He therefore prayed that he might be protected in his rights. The petitioner, though he had long resided in the country, does not appear to have been naturalized at the time of making this petition, but the documents show that letters of naturalization were obtained by him on the twenty-ninth of December, 1841. On the eighteenth of September, 1843, he renewed his application to be put in possession of the land, and the governor to whom this second petition was addressed referred it to the secretary for information. By the report of that officer it appears, that although the petition for the land had been in the name of the three applicants, yet the grant had been made to McIntosh solely, as he alone possessed the essential requisite of being a naturalized Mexican citizen. The secretary therefore suggests that although the request of Dawson cannot be granted, yet inasmuch as he had since been naturalized, and had married a Mexican woman, his application for another piece of land should be favorably considered. The governor, in accordance with this suggestion, on the twenty-first of October, 1843, ordered the proceedings to be returned to the party interested for his information. It is presumed that it was in this way that these documents came into the parties' possession, and are not now found among the archives. It does not appear that Dawson petitioned for a grant before his death, which occurred very soon after; but a grant is produced in which it is recited that his widow, the present claimant, having sufficiently proved the right of her deceased husband to petition for the land which she then occupied, and in consideration of the great losses sustained by her husband on separating himself from McIntosh, and the favorable reports, &c., the governor grants to her the land solicited, known by the name of the "Cañada de Pogolome," to the extent of two square leagues, a little more or less. It is this land which is now claimed by the appellee. This grant was issued on the twelfth of February, 1844, and it appears to have been approved by the departmental assembly on the twenty-sixth of September, 1845. The genuineness of the above documents is fully proved; and it is also shown that the land was long occupied by Dawson before his decease, and since then by the present claimant. Although the expediente for this grant is not among the archives, yet, as observed by the commissioners, "its notoriety, the long possession, and the circumstances surrounding it, relieve it from any suspicion of fraud or forgery." The boundaries, as well as the extent of the land, are specified in the grant, and indicated with evident precision on the map to which it refers. We think, therefore, that the claim is valid and ought to be confirmed.

Case No. 14,762.

UNITED STATES v. The C. B. CHURCH.

[1 Woods, 275.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1872.

ACTIONS—DEBT—PENALTY FOR CARRYING PETROLEUM ON PASSENGER STEAMER.

The penalty for a violation of the 4th section of the act approved February 28, 1871 (16 Stat. 440), which forbids a steamer engaged in carrying passengers from carrying as freight any burning and explosive fluid, cannot be recovered by a proceeding in rem. An action of debt against the offending parties is the proper action.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

J. R. Beckwith, U. S. Atty.

Given Campbell and Wm. Grant, for claimant.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. This is a libel of information for an alleged violation of the first and fourth sections of the act of congress, approved February 28, 1871 (16 Stat. 440). It is alleged in substance in the first count, that on the 28th day of September, 1871, the said steamer Charles B. Church, being a passenger steamer, and engaged in carrying passengers on the Mississippi river, between Cairo and New Orleans, carried on board, between said points, as freight, fifty barrels of refined petroleum, the same being an explosive and burning fluid. The second count, which seems to be based on the first section of the act, charges that the Church, being a vessel propelled by steam, and engaged in carrying passengers between the aforesaid points, was navigated without complying with the terms of the act of congress aforesaid, in this, that she carried as freight between said points fifty barrels of petroleum, the same being an explosive and burning fluid. The purpose of the libel is to enforce the penalty of five hundred dollars, prescribed by the act of congress for the violation of the sections named.

The claimant excepts to the libel, because the proceeding, being in rem, is not authorized by the statute, and the court has no jurisdiction in rem against the steamer for the causes alleged in the libel. This exception presents the only question for the decision of the court. The 4th section of the act of congress referred to provides, among other things, that no refined petroleum shall be carried as freight on any steamer carrying passengers, with an exception not necessary to notice here, but the section does not provide any penalty for the violation of the prohibition. The 68th section of the act declares that the penalty for the violation of any provision of the act not otherwise specially provided for shall be a fine of five hundred dollars, one-half for the use of the informer. If these were the only sections to which this libel could be referred, it would be clear that the proceeding in rem would not lie. This would not be an admiralty cause, and without express authority an action in rem would not lie. Whenever a remedy in rem is given in the act, it is expressly provided. See section one. The usual and proper remedy for a penalty is the action of debt. Debt lies wherever a sum certain is due the plaintiff, or a sum which can readily be reduced to a certainty; a sum requiring no future valuation to settle its amount. Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 542. When a penalty is given by statute and no remedy for its recovery expressly provided, debt will lie. Jacob v. U. S. [Case No. 7,157]. And when a statute creates a new offense and affixes a pecuniary penalty, appropriating one-half to the informer, it adopts by implication those remedies by which alone the informer can sue. Rex v. Robinson, 2 Burrows, 803; U. S. v. Simms, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 252. The 4th and 68th sections have not provided for the collection of the penalty by a proceeding in rem, and as they have not expressly provided how the penalty should be enforced, I am of opinion that the action of debt is the proper remedy. But counsel for the United States claims that the averments of the libel bring it within the provisions of the first section of the act. This section declares that "no license register or enrollment shall be granted, or other papers issued by any collector or other chief officer of the customs to any vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, until he shall have satisfactory evidence that all the provisions of this act have been fully complied with; and if any such vessel shall be navigated without complying with the terms of this act, the owner or owners thereof shall forfeit and pay to the United States the sum of five hundred dollars, one-half for the use of the informer, and for which sum the steamboat or vessel so engaged shall be liable, and may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense." The 2d, 3d, 7th, 8th, 9th and 10th sections prescribe the equipment and furniture of the steamers referred to in the first section, declaring what pumps, buckets, axes, pipes, hose and life preservers they shall be supplied with, and regulating the stairways, tiller ropes and bell pulls. Section 4 names the hazardous kinds of freight that shall not be carried in such steamers, and it is claimed that the carrying of any of these forbidden articles would be a navigating of the vessel without complying with the terms of the act, and therefore a violation of the first section. But it seems to me this is a strained and unwarranted construction. The first section says that no license shall issue until the collector shall have satisfactory evidence that all the provisions of the act have been complied with, evidently referring to the equipment, etc., of the vessel, and when the section at once proceeds to declare, "and if any such vessel shall be navigated without complying with the terms of this act," the evident meaning is, without being equipped and furnished in such manner as would entitle her to registry and license, and without keeping up such equipment and furniture. I am satisfied that the punishment for a violation of section 4 is prescribed by section 68 and not section 1, and this opinion is strengthened by section 21, which provides that if the master or owner shall refuse or neglect to comply with the requirements of the local inspectors, or shall contrary thereto employ the vessel by navigating her, etc., the master and owners, and the vessel itself shall be liable to the penalty as prescribed by the first section of the act. If the law maker designed that a violation of section 4 should be punished in the manner provided in section 1, why did he not adopt the language used in section 21? Instead of doing this, no penalty whatever is provided in section 4, and it seems to be left to the operation of section 68. I am of opinion therefore, that an action in rem is not authorized for a violation of section 4 of the act; that the penalty and the mode of enforcing it prescribed by section 1 does not apply to the act, and things made unlawful by section 4; that the penalty for any of the acts forbidden by section 4 is prescribed by section 68, and must be recovered in an action of debt against the persons who are guilty. This action in rem is therefore misconceived and the libel must be dismissed.

Case No. 14,763.

UNITED STATES v. CENTRAL PAC. R. CO.

[4 Sawy. 341.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. California. Oct. 15, 1877.[2]

RAILROADS—CENTRAL PACIFIC—SUBSIDY BONDS—ACCEPTANCE OF ROAD.

The Central Pacific Railroad Company did not become liable to apply five per centum of the net earnings of the Central Pacific Railroad annually to the payment of the subsidy bonds and interest thereon, issued to said company by the United States in pursuance of the acts of congress authorizing the construction of the said road, till October 1, 1874, the date of the completion of the road as accepted by the president of the United States, and the day upon which it was in fact completed, in accordance with the requirements of said acts.

Action to recover five per centum of the net earnings of the Central Pacific Railroad Company from July 15, 1869. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, upon stipulation of the parties. The court found the following facts: By direction of the president of the United States, a board of engineers and men familiar with railroads was convened, to consider and report a standard for the construction of the Pacific railroads, by which the companies should be governed in building the roads, and the commissioners appointed under the acts of congress for the purpose, in their examinations and reports upon the roads constructed. In February, 1866, this board reported a standard, which was approved and afterward acted upon by the president. In their report, the board, among other things, say:

"Culverts and abutments for bridges and drains should be of stone, whenever a durable article can be obtained within a reasonable distance—say from five to eight miles—depending upon circumstances; provided that temporary trestles may be adopted upon assurances, to the satisfaction of the commissioners, that stone abutments will be substituted immediately after the line shall be opened, so that stone can be transported thereon. * * * A railroad cannot be considered complete until it is well ballasted. If composed of gravel or broken stone, it should be from twelve to twenty-four inches thick, depending upon the lower material. In view of the settling of new embankments, which require time and rains before ballasting can be properly placed, and also in view of the number of miles required by the law to be constructed annually, the perfect finish of the road-bed, in this respect, must be progressive and the work of time. Yet it is the opinion of the board that such work of perfecting the ballast must proceed as usual on first-class railroads; otherwise subsequent sections should not be accepted, because the whole work is not then being carried forward as a great Pacific railroad, such as the law contemplates."

The report also specifies what should be required as to location, grades and curves, embankments and excavations, cross-ties, rails, sidings, rolling stock, buildings, etc. The report recognizing the impracticability, as a business transaction, of completing a long line of road like the Pacific Railroad in sections of twenty miles each, so that each section shall be brought up to the standard of a first-class road as soon as constructed, clearly made a distinction between a provisional and absolute completion, and this distinction was recognized and acted upon by the president, subsequently, who accepted the sections when constructed up to the temporary standard provisionally, for the purpose of issuing the bonds to enable the companies to proceed with the work, but with the understanding that the deficiencies should be supplied so as to ultimately bring the whole road, as an entirety, up to the standard of a first-class road before a final acceptance as absolutely completed as a whole. As each section of twenty miles or more of the road was constructed, the president of the company filed a statement, under oath, in pursuance of the statute, to the effect that the section, describing it, had been completed as required, specifying the particulars in the language of the statute, and asking that the commissioners appointed under the statute might be notified, and that they might examine and report upon such section. Upon a favorable report by the commissioners, the president accepted the section provisionally, and issued to the company the bonds authorized by the statute. This was the course of proceeding till 1868, when it was found that the government might advance all the subsidies upon a road only provisionally accepted in sections, and have no security for its absolute completion, as a whole, up to the standard of a first-class road. The question of the propriety of this course was submitted to the attorney-general, who rendered an opinion on September 5, 1868, which was to the effect that the course before pursued by the government was in accordance with the law, and that the president had authority to appoint commissioners to review that portion of the road which had been accepted provisionally, and to refuse a final acceptance of the road, as a whole, until all deficiencies should be supplied; and that sufficient subsidies might be withheld, or other guarantees be required of the company, to secure absolute completion. The opinion is reported in 12 Op. Attys. Gen., at page 477, and is referred to as a part of this statement of facts. The president thenceforth acted upon this opinion of the attorney-general, and accepted each section when provisionally completed, leaving the question of the absolute completion of the road, as a whole, to be determined upon examination and report of commissioners to be specially appointed for that purpose.

On September 25, 1868, the president, in pursuance of the opinion of the attorney-general, appointed a commission of civil engineers to examine the entire road, so far as then provisionally completed, and report upon it in accordance with instructions to be furnished by the secretary of the interior. Instructions were prepared, in which, after referring to the standard adopted by the president, a pamphlet copy of which was furnished, the secretary of the interior says:

"This standard had obvious reference, in the first instance, to a provisional completeness, but assurances were given by the companies that the road, in structure, equipments, and every other particular, should be brought up with all practicable dispatch to the standard prescribed by congress. The rapid construction of this great national thoroughfare being deemed vitally important, it was not originally considered that in the early stages of the enterprise the standard of absolute completeness of each section should be exacted as a condition precedent to the payment of the subsidy. As the government has made such munificent advances, it becomes the duty of the executive, in the present advanced stages of the work, to require that all past omissions shall now be supplied, and that in lieu of temporary structures, those which are permanent and substantial shall be erected, and to secure from the companies a strict compliance with all the requirements in regard to the appurtenances of the road. It is believed that the time has now arrived for a thorough revision of the work. * * * It is proper to state, however, that the department expects that you will make a thorough personal examination of the road so far as it has been built. You will fully report in regard to its location, road-bed, cross-ties, track-laying, ballasting, rolling stock, repair-shops, station-buildings, culverts, bridges, viaducts, turnouts, and all other appurtenances, and what amount of expenditure will be required in order that the road, so far as built, may be rendered in these particulars equal to a full completed first-class railroad."

These commissioners, having completed their examination, made their report on May 14, 1869, in which they point out specifically many particulars in which the road, as constructed, fails to come up to the standard of a first-class road; and they report an estimate in detail showing that, in their opinion, to supply such deficiencies on five hundred and fifty-one miles of road eastward from Sacramento will require a further expenditure of $4,493,380. They say, in their report, with reference to one deficiency, that "east of Truckee station, and especially up the Humboldt valley, the road for almost its entire length is wholly without ballast." On April 10, 1869 (16 Stat. 56), congress passed a joint resolution by which the president was "authorized to appoint a board of eminent citizens, not exceeding five in number * * * to examine and report upon the condition of, and what sum or sums, if any, will be required to complete each of said roads (the Union and Central Pacific roads) for the entire length thereof to the said terminus as a first-class railroad, in compliance with the several acts relating to said roads." The president was thereby, also, "authorized and required to withhold from each of said companies an amount of subsidy bonds authorized to be issued by the United States, under said acts, to secure the full completion as a first-class road of all sections of such road upon which bonds have already been issued, or, in lieu of such bonds, he may receive as such security an equal amount of first mortgage bonds of such company." In default of giving such security, the president was authorized to direct the attorney-general to take such proceedings as might be necessary to protect the interests of the United States in such road, "and to insure the full completion thereof as a first-class road, as required by law and the statutes in that case made."

In pursuance of this joint resolution the president of the United States appointed a board, which has since been known and styled as in the resolution, the "Board of Eminent Citizens." The connecting rail uniting the Central and Union Pacific Railroads was laid on May 11, 1869, and soon thereafter regular through passenger trains between San Francisco and Omaha, carrying the United States mails, and through freight trains were placed upon said roads, and such trains have run regularly between said points ever since. Afterward, in the month of September, 1869, and subsequent to the provisional acceptance of the last section on July 15, as hereinafter stated, the said "board of eminent citizens" commenced the examination of said Central Pacific Railroad, in pursuance of said joint resolution and the instructions given by the secretary of the interior. The board, among other things, was furnished with a copy of the said instructions given to the said previous board of engineers and of their report, and directed to be governed thereby in their examinations, and were further instructed as follows: That you will "not only ascertain and report upon its condition, but will also state what sum or sums, if any, will be required to complete it, for the entire length thereof, as a first-class railroad, in compliance with the several acts of congress relating thereto." After completing their examination the board made its report on October 30, 1869, in which it gives a detailed estimate of the cost of work necessary to be done on the Central Pacific Railroad from Sacramento eastward, in order to complete it in accordance with the acts of congress, amounting in the aggregate to $576,650.

Pending the action of the said former "commission of civil engineers," on March 22, 1869, the secretary of the interior, to secure the proper completion of said railroad as required by law, issued an order to the commissioner of the general land-office to withhold all patents for lands to the defendant until further orders, and soon thereafter, as further security, required the said defendant to deposit with the secretary of the treasury $4,000,000 of its first mortgage bonds; which order the defendant complied with, in the months of May and June, 1869; and in connection with the deposit of said bonds on June 28, 1869, executed and delivered to said secretary an instrument in writing, wherein it is, among other things, agreed that "the four millions of dollars of first mortgage bonds of said company which it has this day deposited with the government * * * are and may and shall be held by the government as security for the completion of the structure and equipment of the road of said company, according to the provisions of the statute * * * until the president of the United States, on a proper examination of the actual completed road and equipments, shall be satisfied that the same are so completed as a first-class railroad according to law." And further, on failure to so complete the road, "the said bonds shall be held by the government, and shall be disposed of, and the proceeds thereof, if disposed of, applied to the proper completion of said road, its structure and equipments, as the government of the United States shall by law direct and provide. And it is further agreed, that the lands granted as a portion of the subsidy of said company, for which patents have not been issued, shall also be held in like manner by the government of the United States as security for the completion and equipment of the said railroad as aforesaid," etc. [6]On July 15, 1869, the secretary of the interior transmitted to the president the report, dated May 15, 1869, of the commissioners appointed to examine and report upon a section of twenty and three-tenths miles of the Central Pacific Railroad, this being the last section constructed by said defendant. In his letter transmitting said report to the president for his action, the secretary says: "I respectfully recommend the acceptance of the same, and that bonds be issued to the company thereon in accordance with the agreement made with the company, which is to the effect that they deposit their first mortgage bonds with the secretary of the treasury to such amount as may be deemed necessary to secure the ultimate completion of the road agreeably to the provisions of the act approved July 1, 1862." The agreement referred to is the agreement hereinbefore referred to, of date June 28, 1869. Which letter and report were returned to the secretary of the interior by the president, with an indorsement thereon as follows, to wit: "The recommendations of the secretary of the interior are approved, and the secretary of the treasury and himself are hereby directed to carry the same into effect. U. S. Grant."

Recommendations in all respects similar to the last had been made by the secretary of the interior to the president, as to the reports made upon several preceding sections of the roads, and a similar approval was indorsed thereon by the president. Upon the same day, July 15, 1869, the secretary of the interior made a similar recommendation as to the section commissioners' reports upon the last sections of the Union Pacific Railroad, in which he recommends a similar provisional acceptance of the section, and adds: "Provided, however, that no bonds or patents shall in any event be issued until such security shall be deposited with the secretary of the treasury necessary to secure the ultimate completion of the road, agreeably to the acts mentioned in my letter to you of the 27th of May last." This recommendation was approved by the president, and the secretaries of the treasury and interior directed to carry the same into effect. These constitute the last conditional acceptances of sections as provisionally completed, and is the point of time at which the government now claims the roads to have been completed, for the purpose of entitling it to recover five per centum of the net earnings of the roads.

Subsequently, in September, 1869, the secretary of the treasury denied an application of defendant to withdraw the $4,493,380 first mortgage and government bonds deposited and withheld as security as aforesaid, and declined to surrender any security so held until the "board of eminent citizens should report." On November 3, 1869, the said board having in the meantime reported, and it appearing by their report that the amount required to supply deficiencies and complete the work up to the required standard had been reduced since the last commission's report from $4,498,380 to $576.650, the secretary of the interior so modified his order of March 22, 1869, suspending the issue of patents to land as to allow patents to one-half the lands —every alternate odd section—to be issued, and soon after allowed the withdrawal of said first mortgage and other bonds, still retaining as security the other half of the lands. On November 15, 1869, the secretary of the interior, in his annual report to the president, states the condition and circumstances of said railroads; points out particulars wherein deficiencies in the construction still exist; reports the amount necessary to be expended in completing the road up to the required standard; states the securities held for the purpose of insuring its completion, and adds: "It will thus be perceived that the government has ample means to secure from the companies the faithful performance of their respective engagements." On March 27, 1871, the secretary of the interior refused an application by defendant to modify the order of November 3, 1869, continuing the suspension of the issuing of patents to one-half the lands. He concludes his letter of denial as follows: "Before modifying the order suspending the issue of patents on one-half of the lands, I desire a report showing the erroneous location to have been corrected, and that the deficiencies have been supplied. Whenever the company shall express a desire for a further examination of the road, commissioners will be appointed for that purpose." There were other refusals to issue patents by the secretary of the interior.

In 1874 there was a bill pending in the senate which had passed the house, in response to demands of the people of the several states interested, providing that the title to the lands granted for railroad purposes should at once be vested in the grantees, in order that the states might tax them. On June 9, 1874, the chairman of the senate committee on railroads, by direction of the committee, transmitted a copy of said bill to the secretary of the interior, requesting his views and suggestions with reference to the advisability of the proposed legislation. On June 17, 1874, the secretary responded, setting forth the proceedings of the various commissions and the reports of deficiencies; the reservation of one-half these lands by Secretary Cox's order as security for completion of the road; that "the executive had no official information that the deficiencies had been supplied"; that the subsidy bonds had been received in full, and that "this moiety of lands withheld is the only security of the government for the completion of the road as required by law." He then points out a provision in the bill, which, he says, "ipso facto repeals the said order of Mr. Cox," and suggests that it be so changed as to make the mandatory order of the commissioner of the land-office to issue patents "contingent on the executive being satisfied that all the deficiencies reported by the said 'eminent citizens' have been supplied, and that the roads are completed as required by law."

On August 2, 1874, the defendant addressed a communication to the secretary of the interior, in which it is stated that "the Central Pacific road is now completed and in successful operation," and it "requests that commissioners be appointed to examine the road with a view to its final acceptance by the United States government." In pursuance of said request, the president appointed commissioners, and in a letter of instructions to the commissioners, dated September 21, 1874, among other things, the secretary of the interior says: "On the 30th of October, 1869, 'five eminent citizens,' who were appointed commissioners by the president under joint resolution of the 30th of April, 1869, reported certain deficiencies in the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad. The vice-president of the company that constructed the road applied on the second ultimo for its re-examination to determine whether it has been completed as required by law and the report of said commissioners. * * * It will be your duty to examine said road with special reference to the deficiencies above referred to, and to report whether they have been substantially supplied. * * * If they have been, and the road is completed substantially, as required by the law and departmental instructions, you will ascertain as near as possible and report the date of the completion. * * * If it be not yet completed, you will state what, in your judgment, is necessary to such completion." Copies of the report of the preceding commissioners and of the pamphlet, showing the standard adopted by the department, were furnished the commissioners as a part of their instructions.

On November 2, 1874, the said commission reported that the defendant had completed its railroad in conformity to the requirements of the law, and that the date of such completion was October 1, 1874, and further reported that between the date of the report of the last preceding commission, October 30, 1869, and said October 1, 1874, said defendant had expended, in making the improvements specified, $5,121,037.23. On November 12, 1874, the secretary of the interior transmitted to the president the said report, together with a communication, stating the action of the several commissions, and closing as follows: "Regarding the order of Mr. Secretary Cox, of November 3, 1869, as a conditional acceptance of said road, and finding that the conditions have since been amply and fully complied with, I respectfully recommend that the secretary of the interior be authorized to issue patents to the company for the lands inuring to it, and that said order withholding them be revoked." Upon which communication the president, on November 14, 1874, made and signed the following indorsement: "The within recommendations are hereby approved, the authority asked for conferred, and the order of the 3d of November, 1869, is revoked." On November 18, 1874, in accordance with said order, the commissioner of the general land-office was informed by the secretary of the interior of the revocation of said order, and directed to issue to defendant patents to the remaining lands due.

Upon other evidence than the action of the government and its officials, and the report of said several commissions, the court also found, as facts, that the said Central Pacific Railroad was not, in fact, completed up to the standard of a first-class railroad till the 1st day of October, 1874; that five hundred and fifty-one miles of said railroad was built during the first five months of the year 1869, in a very hasty and imperfect manner; that cuts and embankments had to be subsequently widened; temporary structures replaced or perfected; the line straightened in some instances, and several new tunnels constructed; that this part of the road was unballasted; that ballasting up to the standard of a first-class railroad is a gradual, progressive work, requiring time to settle the road-bed, and rains to compact and consolidate it; and that to ballast this road, at that time, up to the required standard under the existing conditions, would have been wholly impracticable; and that no road can be called first-class until well ballasted. Also, that the defendant, between October 30, 1869, and October 1, 1874, in fact expended in construction, in bringing the road up to the standard of a first-class railroad, equipments, etc., $5,657,854. Of this sum $1,014,681.34 was for wharves and depot buildings at Oakland and San Francisco; $241,490.87 for improvements of depot grounds at Mission Bay, San Francisco, and $105,906.60 for steamer Thoroughfare for ferrying cars across the bay. The remainder was expended in various improvements along the whole line, additional equipments, and other work necessary to make it in all respects a first-class road.

John M. Coghlan, U. S. Atty.

S. W. Sanderson and S. M. Wilson, for defendant.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge (after stating the facts). Upon the facts of the case as found and stated, two questions have been raised and fully argued: (1) At what point of time was the road so fully completed as to make it obligatory upon the defendant to apply five per centum of the net earnings of the road to the payment of the bonds issued by the government, and the interest thereon? (2) What constitutes net earnings within the meaning of the act?

Upon the first question the government insists that the road was completed, and the obligation to set aside five per centum of the net earnings arose on July 15, 1869, the date of the provisional acceptance of the last section; while the defendant maintains that the road was not completed as a whole until October 1, 1874, the date at which the whole road was accepted by the president as having been fully completed.

The act of congress, and the acceptance by the defendant constitute a contract between the parties by the terms of which the defendant was required to build and complete such a road as is prescribed in the act—a road "supplied with all necessary drains, culverts, viaducts, crossings, sidings, bridges, turnouts, watering-places, depots, equipments, furniture, and all other appurtenances of a first-class railroad;" in other words, in all respects a first-class railroad, with all appropriate equipments and appurtenances. Such a road the defendant was bound to build and fully complete, and until so built and completed as a whole, it was not entitled to be discharged from the obligations of the contract to complete the road, or to receive the full consideration which the government, on its part, undertook to give. So, also, in addition to constructing the road, another obligation was imposed on defendant; for the act provides that "after the said road is completed, until said bonds (bonds issued by the government) and interest are paid, at least five per centum of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof." And this is the clause under which this action is brought. It is plain that the point of time at which the defendant becomes liable to thus apply five per centum of the net earnings, is the point of time when it has fully completed the construction of the road as a whole, as an entirety, so that its contract is fully discharged so far as the construction is concerned, and the defendant has thereby become entitled to receive all the consideration therefor which the government undertook to give —the point of time when it becomes entitled to all the lands granted and all the bonds and other subsidies promised. The clause is "after said road is completed"—not a part or section, but said road. When the road is completed for the purpose of casting the obligation upon defendant of applying five per centum of the net earnings of the road to the payment of the government bonds and interest, it is also completed for the purpose of entitling it to have the road accepted, and of exonerating it from any further liabilities for construction, and for the purpose of entitling it to receive all the lands and other aid given by the government. The construction of the statute as to the time when the road is completed, must be the same when it operates in favor of the defendant as when it operates in favor of the government. If the road was completed on July 15, 1869, so as to make it the duty of the defendant to apply five per centum of its net earnings to the payment of the subsidy bonds and interest, it was completed for the purpose of exonerating the defendant from expending further sums in the construction of the road, and for the purpose of entitling it to all the lands granted.

But the statute authorized the president, upon the report of commissioners appointed by him, to determine when the road should be deemed completed. Upon the completion of a section of forty, afterward twenty miles of road, the president of the United States was authorized by section 4 of the act "to appoint three commissioners to examine the same, and report to him in relation thereto; and if it shall appear to him that forty consecutive miles of said railroad and telegraph line have been completed," etc., "patents shall issue conveying the right and title to said lands to said company," etc. The commissioners were to report "to him"—the president—for his information, and if "it shall appear to him" that the section is completed, then the defendant is to be entitled to the corresponding part of the subsidy. This provision clearly devolves the duty upon the president of determining when the road is completed. This was so held by Mr. Attorney-General Evarts, in an elaborate opinion given to the president for his guidance in 1868, and I think correctly. 12 Op. Attys. Gen. 477. And this determination of the president I think conclusive, at least, upon the government. If so, it settles the question, for there can be no dispute as to what the action of the president and of the secretary of the interior, acting under his directions, actually was. The acceptance of sections from time to time, as constructed, was manifestly provisional—all the later ones being expressly so in terms upon their face. The whole action of the government is in harmony with this view, and utterly inconsistent with any other, as will be seen by a brief recapitulation of the facts, which speak for themselves. So early as September 25, 1868, the president appointed a commission of civil engineers to examine the entire road so far as then provisionally accepted, and to report wherein it was not completed up to the standard required by the statute. This commission made a thorough examination, and on May 20, 1869, which is subsequent to laying the connecting rail uniting the two roads, made a minute and exhaustive report, showing that it would require $4,493,380 to bring the five hundred and fifty-one miles of the provisionally completed road examined by them up to the required standard. Without waiting for the action of the commission, the secretary of the interior, on March 22, 1869, for the purpose of withholding the lands as security for the completion of the road according to the statute, issued an order suspending the issue of all patents to lands due on completion of the road. At this time but a small portion of the lands belonging to the sections provisionally completed had been patented to the defendant, so that this order, in fact, withheld nearly all the lands to which the defendant was entitled, provided the road was so far completed.

In April, also, congress authorized the appointment of another commission of eminent citizens to re-examine the road and report deficiencies, and in express terms authorized the president, as further security for the completion of the road, to withhold subsidy bonds, or require the delivery of first mortgage bonds, or the return of subsidy bonds already received, sufficient to insure a full performance of the contract. Under this authority, so late as June 28, 1869, more than six weeks after the laying of the connecting rail, and after the favorable report of the section commissioners upon the last section constructed had been made, and only two weeks before its conditional acceptance by the secretary and approval by the president, the secretary required the defendant to deposit $4,000,000 of its first mortgage bonds, and to enter into an agreement that the bonds, together with the lands still unpatented, should be held as security for the completion of the road, and it was upon this deposit and agreement that the last section was conditionally accepted, and the subsidy bonds issued, as expressly appears in terms in the recommendation of the secretary, which was approved by the president. In this condition matters stood till the "board of eminent citizens" re-examined the road and reported October 30, 1869, that it would require only $576,650 to complete the road according to the acts of congress. After this report, the secretary of the interior deeming one-half the lands ample security for the completion of the road, on November 3, 1869, modified the order of March 22, 1869, so as to permit the alternate sections of lands granted to be patented, retaining the other alternate sections as security; and soon after delivered to defendant the said bonds deposited and withheld as security. Subsequently, on March 24, 1871, the secretary of the interior denied an application of the defendant to modify the order of November 3, 1869, whereby one-half of the land was withheld as security for the completion of the work, on the ground that it did not yet appear that "the erroneous locations have been corrected and that the deficiencies have been supplied;" but he offered to appoint another commission whenever the defendant should desire it. Other applications for patents were denied. Again, so late as June 17, 1874, the secretary of the interior objected to any legislation by congress affecting his right to withhold these lands as security, until the executive should be "satisfied that all deficiencies reported by said 'eminent citizens' have been supplied, and that the roads are completed as required by law." Upon application of the defendant another and, as it proved to be, a final commission was appointed September 21, 1874, to report upon the road, and if completed, the date of such completion, which commission examined the road, and on November 2, 1874, reported the deficiencies supplied and the road completed; and that the date of its completion was October 1, 1874. Upon the recommendation of the secretary of the interior, the president, on November 14, 1874, approved this report and the secretary's recommendation, and thereupon vacated the order of November 3, 1869, suspending the issue of patents to one-half the lands. This recapitulation of the facts shows that at the times mentioned, neither congress, nor the secretary of the interior, nor the president, regarded the road as completed; that the acceptance of sections was conditional and provisional only, for the purpose of issuing bonds and enabling the companies to proceed with the work; that the government required a subsequent completion up to the standard required by the statute, and at all times retained in its possession and under its control ample security for the completion of the road; that it was not accepted as completed up to the standard required by the statute till November 14, 1874; and that the date of the completion as fixed by the report of the commission accepted and approved by the president, is October 1, 1874. No argument can add force to this simple statement of the facts, or shake or qualify the conclusions resulting therefrom. If the road was completed on July 15, 1869, as now claimed by the government for the purposes of this action, then the government wrongfully withheld from the defendant all the lands granted to it (except the small portion before that date patented) from July 15, 1869, till November 3, 1869, together with $4,498,380 first mortgage and subsidy bonds deposited in May and June, and otherwise withheld; and further wrongfully withheld, thereby depriving the defendant of their use, one-half or every alternate section of the lands due, till November 14, 1874—a period of more than five years after the completion of the road, as now claimed by the government. This is the necessary result, unless we adopt one rule of construction as to what constitutes a "completion of the road," when it is beneficial to the government, and another when the rights of the defendant are considered. It results, then, that if the president of the United States was authorized to determine the question as to when the road was completed, that determination was not made till November 14, 1874, and the time of the completion was October 1, 1874, at which time the liability of the defendant to be called upon to apply five per centum of the net earnings of the road commenced.

But if the decision of the president and action of the government are not conclusive upon the United States upon this point, it is still found as a fact that the said railroad was not, in point of fact, completed and equipped up to the standard of a first-class railroad, as required by the statute, till October 1, 1874. Five hundred and fifty-one miles of railroad were constructed eastward from the Sierra Nevada Mountains during the five months ending May 11, 1869, to a great extent through a desert, and during the greater part of the year, including all except the earlier part of the period of construction, a rainless region. The testimony of the engineer shows, as also does the report of the engineers appointed by the president to recommend a standard for the construction of the road, that to bring a railroad up to first-class, as a practical business proceeding, requires time after the mere laying of the rails; that a road of one or two thousand miles' length cannot, as a practical business transaction, be completely ballasted, equipped and supplied with all the conveniences and accommodations of a first-class road as a whole, in sections of twenty miles each, hastily constructed, so that each section, when so constructed, shall be so complete in construction, equipment and appointment, as to fill its place as a part of the whole completed first-class road; that in such cases ordinary practical business economy requires temporary structures to be gradually replaced as they become unfit for use; and ballasting to be a progressive work, affording time for the embankments to settle by use, and to be rendered compact by rains. As a practical business undertaking it would manifestly be preposterous to expect that five hundred and fifty-one miles of road should be constructed up the Humboldt river, through a rainless desert, in the year 1869, and prior to the fifteenth day of July of that year, and be properly ballasted, and "supplied with all necessary drains, culverts, viaducts, crossings, sidings, bridges, turnouts, watering-places, depots, equipments, furniture and all other appurtenances of a first-class railroad;" and no such feat was in fact performed. It is true that this number of miles of road was constructed, so as to be capable of use; and it was in fact in constant use from that time on; but the law requires something more than a road capable of use. It requires in all particulars a first-class road, and the government was not bound to accept anything short of a first-class railroad.

The construction of this road was pushed forward with unprecedented energy and haste for the purpose of getting it open for traffic. When this object was accomplished, the defendant, subsequently, acted upon sound, practical, economical business principles, and brought the road up to the standard required, by correcting locations, widening cuts and embankments, substituting permanent for temporary structures, ballasting, furnishing water stations, depots, sidings, equipments, etc., by degrees, in the same mode as the testimony shows is usual in the construction and equipment of other extensive first-class roads. The defendant was at that time under no legal obligation to make any greater haste in bringing the road up to the proper standard than was required by sound, practical, economical business principles. The law gave defendant nearly seven years after July 15, 1869, within which to complete the road; and the government held in its own hands ample securities to insure its completion, and lost by the delay nothing to which it was entitled under the law or the contract; and the road is, doubtless, better for being gradually brought to the required standard. The road was finally completed and accepted nearly two years before the time required by the statute, and the government cannot complain that the completion was not in due time. It is earnestly urged on behalf of the government that the road was so far completed as to enable the defendant to make a profitable use of it, and, since this is so, it ought to be held to be completed, for the purpose of requiring the defendant to apply five per centum of the net earnings to the payment of the subsidy bonds and interest. Unfortunately for the argument and the government, the statute does not make the point of time at which the road is capable of use the one at which the liability of the defendant to apply five per centum of the net profits to the payment of the subsidy bonds attaches; but the completion of the road—such a road, and no other, as the statute required and the defendant undertook to build—such a road as the government was bound to accept in full satisfaction of this part of the contract. And the defendant is entitled to stand on the terms of the contract. A very inferior road is capable of use, and sometimes of a profitable use, and this road, although as good as could reasonably be expected under the circumstances at that stage of its progress toward completion, was certainly in many particulars an imperfect one on July 15, 1869, and for a considerable time thereafter. It was not then completed up to the standard required by the act of congress, and was not such a road as the government was bound to accept as completed. It was not, in fact, a road completed in any just sense. It is manifest, from the testimony, that the report of the "eminent citizens," of October 30, 1869, is extremely favorable to the defendant; yet this report required the sum of $576,650 to be expended to complete the road; and the government very properly insisted upon the expenditure being made before it would accept it as completed; and it retained in its hands ample means to insure a full performance of the contract on the part of the defendant.

That this report was not unjust to the defendant is evident from the circumstance that defendant did in fact, between the date of said report and October 1, 1874—the date at which the road was accepted by the government as complete—expend the sum of $5,657,854.40, being more than four millions over the sum reported. It is by no means probable that this large sum was unnecessarily expended, and the testimony shows that is was, in fact, required to bring the road up to the standard of a really first-class road, as required by the statute. This is much more than the amount sought to be recovered by the government, and so far as the mere discharging of the contract to build the road is concerned, independent of other considerations, the defendant might well have afforded to pay the $1,800,000, now claimed as five per centum of net profits, if the government had accepted the road as completed on July 15, 1869, and relieved the defendant from the payment of these five millions of dollars and over to complete the road, and had delivered up the bonds and patented the lands withheld as security, to which it would then have been entitled. It was manifestly not contemplated by the statute that the defendant should be called upon to apply five per centum of the net earnings of its road to the payment of the subsidy bonds, so long as it required any portion of its resources to be expended in the work of construction so as to complete the road up to the standard required by the act. The fact that the defendant, by an energetic prosecution of the work, so far constructed the road as to enable it to be used profitably several years before the time provided for its completion, and before its actual completion up to the required standard, has no bearing upon the question at issue. If it did, it would, also, be found that the government was equally benefited, for it had the use of the road for all the purposes contemplated by congress in passing the act during the whole time it was available to the defendant, and as an entirety for more that six years earlier than was called for in the act of congress; and this direct pecuniary profit to the government, by reducing its expenditures in various ways, if the official reports of the railroad committees of congress are to be relied on, amounted to several millions of dollars per year—nearly or quite enough to pay the interest on the subsidy bonds. The government, therefore, has lost nothing by this early use of the incompleted road, but, on the contrary, has been the gainer of several millions of dollars a year during the whole period of such use. But the question here is not as to the comparative advantages derived by the parties from the building and use of this road; or whether the government did not make a more liberal grant than was necessary; or whether it might not have made a better bargain in other respects; or whether the defendant has, or has not, obtained a more profitable contract than it ought to have had. Whatever considerations of this character may be urged elsewhere, when the parties come into a court of justice to seek an adjudication of their rights, they stand upon their contract as it is, and the simple dry question is, what is the contract, in fact and in law, and what are the rights of the parties under it? If this were a contract between two natural persons—private citizens—it does not seem possible that there could be any controversy as to the construction to be given to the words "after said road is completed," in relation to the question under consideration; and that the construction would be, completed as a whole up to the standard prescribed by the contract, so as to require an acceptance from the other party and a discharge of the party building from any further liability for the purposes of construction. If this would be the natural and proper construction, as between private parties, a different one certainly cannot be claimed, or, if claimed, admitted, because the government on the one side and a corporation on the other happen to be the parties to the transaction, and the contract chances to be found in a statute.

It has been further urged, with some earnestness and apparent sincerity, that the defendant is estopped from denying the completion of the road on July 15, 1869, in consequence of presenting its statements of completion, and its claim to have the road accepted as completed; and because it has accepted so much of the consideration from the government as it was able to obtain. But many elements of an estoppel are wanting. The government did not rely upon this statement, and accept the road. The statement was only filed in pursuance of the statute, as a basis to set in motion the commissions appointed under the act to examine and report to the president. It was the examination and report of the commission upon which the president was authorized to act, and upon which he did in fact act. In this case he not only acted, but refused to accept the road as completed in accordance with the statute until November 14, 1874, when he, for the first time, accepted the road as complete, and released the securities held to insure completion, which had till that time been withheld from the defendant, and which were fully ample to protect the government in case of defendant's default.

My conclusion is, that the defendant's liability to apply five per centum of the net earnings of the road to the payment of the subsidy bonds issued by the government and the interest thereon, did not accrue till October 1, 1874; and that the government is not entitled to recover any portion of the net earnings accrued prior to that date. The five per centum of the net earnings accrued since October 1, 1874, had not become due at the time this action was commenced. They are to "be annually applied" only. The demand in this case, made by the secretary of the treasury on defendant, was on November 14, 1874, and the suit itself was commenced on April 20, 1875, the former within two, and the latter within seven months after the completion of the road. As to the portion of the net earnings now due, therefore, this action is premature.

There is, also, a wide difference between the claims of the parties on the other point suggested, as to what constitutes "net earnings" within the meaning of the statute. When it becomes necessary to determine this question, it is quite probable that neither party will be found to be wholly right in its construction of the words "net earnings." But under the view I take, it will be unnecessary to consider that point now.

Let there be a finding and judgment for the defendant.

Case No. 14,764.

UNITED STATES v. CERTAIN CASKS OF GLASS WARE.

[4 Law Rep. 36.]

District Court, S. D. New York. March, 1841.

EVIDENCE—PROOF OF FOREIGN LAWS.

Printed statute books of the parliament of Great Britain, purchased of the queen's printer, are admissible as prima facie evidence of the laws contained therein.

[Cited in The Pawashick, Case No. 10,851; Dundee Mortgage & Trust Inv. Co. v. Cooper, 26 Fed. 669.]

On the trial of this cause before BETTS, District Judge, and a jury, Mr. Hoffman, district attorney, offered to read in evidence printed acts of parliament, 5 & 6 Wm. IV., and 1 & 2 Vict., in relation to the exportation and drawback duty on glass, and called a witness who testified that he was in London in 1838, and went to the parliament printing house, to procure the said acts of parliament, but was referred to the queen's printer as the only one who could furnish them; that he accordingly went to the store of the queen's printer, and there purchased the acts in question.

Mr. Patterson, for claimants, objected to the admissibility of the statutes as evidence, contending that the district attorney must prove them by producing exemplifications under the great seal of England, authenticated by the secretary of state for foreign affairs or by a sworn copy compared with the rolls of parliament; and he cited several cases to that effect.

BETTS, District Judge. The ancient strictness of the rule respecting the proof of foreign laws has been much relaxed in England, and more so in the United States, of late years. The cases cited by the counsel show what the law has been on the subject, and also indicate some of the modifications of its former rigor, which have become incorporated in the modern practice; and it may be added, that in this state, until comparatively a recent period, not only was such strictness of proof exacted in respect to the laws of foreign nations, and of our sister states, as foreign laws, but even the statutes of our own legislature could not be read, of right, from the statute book. At this day, it is believed that in most of the states, and in the courts of the United States, the public laws are read from the printed statute books of the respective states, and such publications are accepted as at least prima facie evidence of the law. See Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Ward [unreported]. I am not aware of any higher authority than a like usage and general acquiescence in it, for reading the acts of congress in this court from the statute book, nor why, if the rule adverted to is to be administered as it was formerly laid down, the district attorney should not be driven to produce exemplifications of every statute of congress offered in evidence here. In whatever terms the rule may be sometimes expressed, it seems to me, such cannot be its spirit; and if executed according to the letter, clearly the highest or best evidence would not be an exemplification under a foreign seal, but the oath of the king himself, perhaps, who sanctioned the law, or of the public functionaries who were present when it was enacted or passed through all the forms rendering it completely a law. The cases speak of foreign laws as facts to be proved by the best evidence; but certainly the spirit of the cases, particularly in the courts of the United States, regard the promulgation or publication of the foreign laws as the fact to be proved, and not the formula of their enactment or registration. It is no less the law if the law-giver declares it by proclamation or insertion in a newspaper, than if inserted in the roll of the tower, and accordingly it would seem that the only essential matter to be proved, is, whether it has been published and promulged as the law of the country. The fact of publication may be proved by evidence competent to establish any other fact in pais. The act being that of a sovereign, does not necessarily demand a different order of proof, than if it was the declaration or ratification of a private person. In this point of view, I think the evidence is admissible. But in my opinion, foreign statutes in relation to the navigation, exports and imports of the country may be read in evidence as history of its policy, and upon the same principle that its annals are read to prove changes of succession, changes of dynasty, or other political events, and facts of a public and notorious character. If the offer of the proof rested upon the statutes only, I should receive it as sufficient prima facie evidence, because, if the rule in this behalf is yet unsettled and dubious, it is time that the highest tribunal of this land should declare and determine it. And I may add, I should regret to see the United States behind England in recognising and administering this rule of evidence, upon liberal and philosophical principles, and that whilst the public laws of this country are read there, in the first instance, without question, we should exclude from our courts like proof of the laws of England.

UNITED STATES v. CERTAIN CIGARS, ETC.

[1 Woods, 306.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Louisiana. Nov. Term, 1873.

FORFEITURE — LOST MANIFEST — CARGO NOT UNSHIPPED.

On the trial of a libel for the forfeiture of certain goods imported into the United States, because the vessel had no manifest of her cargo on board, it was shown that no part of the cargo had been unshipped after it was taken on board, and that a manifest had been delivered to the master by the consignors on the day the vessel cleared, but had been inadvertently lost by him before the ship sailed; held, that the case fell within the proviso of the 24th section of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 646), and that the goods ought not to be condemned.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana.]

J. R. Beckwith, U. S. Atty.

T. J. Semmes and E. C. Billings, for claimants.

WOODS, Circuit Judge. The 24th section of the act of March 2, 1799, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage" (1 Stat. 646), provides "that if any goods, wares and merchandise shall be imported or brought into the United States in any ship or vessel whatever, belonging in whole or in part to a citizen or citizens, inhabitant or inhabitants of the United States, from any foreign port or place, without having a manifest or manifests on board, * * * or which shall not be included or described therein, or shall not agree therewith, * * * all such merchandise not included in the manifest belonging or consigned to the master, mate, officers or crew of such ship or vessel, shall be forfeited; provided, always, if it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the collector, naval officer and surveyor, or to the major part of them, * * * or to the satisfaction of the court in which a trial shall be had concerning any such forfeiture, that no part of the cargo of such ship or vessel had been unshipped after it was taken on board, except such as shall have been particularly specified and accounted for in the report of the master, or other person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, and that the manifests had been lost or mislaid without fraud or collusion, or that the same was or were defaced by accident, or incorrect by mistake, in every such case the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred."

The libel in this case is filed for the forfeiture of certain cigars and brandy alleged to have been fraudulently imported into the United States from the island of Cuba, about the 25th of November, 1871, on a vessel called the Frank Atwood, said goods being consigned to the master, mate, officers and crew, and not being disclosed or included or described in any manifest of the cargo on board the said vessel, and because the said vessel had no manifest of her cargo aboard. The answer of claimants denies that the goods were consigned as in the libel alleged; denies they were fraudulently imported, but admits that at the time of the arrival of the vessel at the port of New Orleans, the Frank Atwood had no manifest on board, but avers that when she left Havana, from which port she sailed direct to New Orleans, she had a complete manifest of the cargo, with every feature that the law required; that no part of the cargo was unshipped after it had been taken on board, and that the manifest had been by the master lost or mislaid. This answer presents a perfect defense to the libel. Does the evidence sustain it? It is established that the Frank Atwood sailed from Havana direct to New Orleans, and that no part of the cargo was unshipped during the voyage. It further appears in evidence that a manifest of the entire cargo was made up in the office of Bances & Co., in Havana, and with all the ship's papers put in an envelope and handed to the captain, on the day the ship cleared, which was the 12th of November, and on the 13th she sailed. This testimony is uncontradicted, and I have been unable to find anything in the record to throw suspicion upon it.

It is claimed by the district attorney, however, that there is no evidence to show that the manifest was ever on board the schooner; that if it was lost by the captain before he sailed as there is some evidence tending to show, the defense is not made out. I do not so understand the law. It is an attempt at fraudulent importation that the law punishes. If the captain of the vessel, between the office of the consignors and his ship loses the manifest, and sails supposing it to be among the ship's papers, and the fact of such loss is made to appear, the cargo is protected by the statute. The loss of the manifest is made probable by the fact that under the circumstances of this case, there was nothing to be gained by sailing without one, or by destroying it after sailing. I think the claimants have brought themselves within the protection of the proviso of section 24, and that this libel must therefore be dismissed.

Case No. 14,766.

UNITED STATES v. CERTAIN HOGSHEADS OF MOLASSES.

[1 Curt. 276.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct. Term, 1852.

APPEAL—TERM—CUSTOMS DUTIES—EVIDENCE OF DUTIES NOT PAID.

1. An appeal from the district court is properly entered at the term of the circuit court, begun next after the entry of the decree in the district court, although the term of the district court, during which the degree was entered, had not been ended when the term of the circuit court was begun.

[Cited in U. S. v. The Glamorgan, Case No. 15,214; The Major Barbour, Id. 8,984; The Oriental, Id. 10,578.]

2. If an entry does not contain a part of the goods consigned by the same invoice and bill of lading, it is prima facie evidence that the duties have not been paid.

[Appeal from the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

This was a motion to dismiss an appeal from a decree of the district court on an information in the admiralty for the reason that the term of the district court at which the decree was entered had not ended when the term of the circuit court, at which the appeal was entered, was begun.

Mr. Lunt, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Bell, for claimant.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The question depends upon the construction of the twenty-first section of the judiciary act [1 Stat. 83], for although the act of March 3, 1803 [2 Stat. 244], also gave an appeal from the district to the circuit court, yet it has been held by the supreme court (U. S. v. Nourse, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 496), that the act made no change in respect to such appeals, except to reduce the necessary sum from three hundred dollars to forty dollars.

In The Montgomery v. The Betsey [Case No. 9,734], Mr. Justice Story says the appeal should be to the circuit court held next after pronouncing the decree. The precise point was not before him for adjudication, but on examining the language of this section of the judiciary act, and especially the proviso, it is quite clear his interpretation was correct. Motion overruled.

The appeal having been heard on its merits, the following opinion was pronounced by CURTIS, Circuit Justice. The district attorney having filed an ex officio information in the admiralty against this property, founded on the sixty-eighth section of the collection act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 677), the district court decreed a forfeiture, and the claimant appealed. That section provides, that any merchandise, subject to duty, and on which the duty shall not be paid, or secured to be paid, which shall be concealed in any vessel or other place, shall be forfeited. The first question is, whether this merchandise was concealed, within the meaning of the act. I am of opinion it was. It did not appear on the manifest, or invoice of the cargo. It was not entered at the custom-house, or in any manner made known to the collector, or any officer of the customs, by the consignee or master; nor did the consignee at any time manifest any intention to enter it, or to correct any mistake in his entry of the residue of the cargo. He gave to the stevedore, whom he employed to discharge the cargo, directions to discharge only one hundred and eighty-three casks, the amount entered for duties, and no more, and to go down to the skin, leaving the residue in the ends of the vessel, and when this amount had been discharged the hatches were put on as if the cargo had been all out. I am satisfied the consignee knew the invoice did not contain all the molasses, before the discharge of the cargo was commenced, and there is much reason to believe that part was omitted by his own express direction to the consignor; yet, instead of making, or taking any step to make a port entry, he gives directions to leave the residue of the cargo in the ends of the vessel, has the hatches replaced, and the vessel is about to be warped to the flats, for the purpose of scraping her bottom, as if her discharge had been completed, when she is stopped by an officer of the customs.

Several points have been taken in behalf of the claimant. First, it is said a seizure is necessary, and none is proved. It is not necessary to decide whether an actual seizure by an officer of the customs is one of the prerequisites of a forfeiture under this section, because, in this case, such a seizure is admitted by the answer which avers it was made without probable cause.

It is further argued that it does not appear that the goods were dutiable, or if so, that the duties had not been paid, or secured to be paid. That molasses imported from Porto Rico was dutiable, is known to the court as matter of law The claimant entered for duties 183 casks, as imported from that island in this vessel. These 183 casks must have been put on board after the residue, from their place of stowage. It is therefore a fair, not to say necessary presumption, that the whole was on board of the vessel when it sailed from Ponce, and was brought from thence; and if so, the presumption is, it was there shipped, and was the produce of that island, and the burden is on the claimant to prove the contrary. Of this there is neither proof nor the slightest probability. The information properly contains the negative allegation, that the duties had not been paid, or secured to be paid, on these goods, and it must be supported by the requisite prima facie evidence. The entry made by the claimant is produced, and it covers only the 183 hogsheads. This is sufficient prima facie evidence that he had not paid or secured the duties on the residue, for he could do neither without entering them.

It is further urged that it does not appear that the goods seized were not part of the 183 casks entered, and on which duties were paid. But it does appear, that those seized were what were left in the vessel after 183 casks had been discharged; and the claimant having entered for duty that number of casks, and regularly discharged that number under the inspection of the officers of the customs, as being the merchandise entered by him, it is too late for him now to suggest that what he so landed was not entered, and what he concealed on board was entered. Let the decree of the district court be affirmed, with costs.

UNITED STATES v. CERTAIN PIECE OF LAND.

[1 Sawy. 84:[1] 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 126; 17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 128.]

District Court, D. California. March 31, 1870.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FORFEITURE—EXTENT OF—REAL ESTATE CONNECTED WITH DISTILLERY—USE.

The lot or tract of land, as intended in sections 6–8, 44, of the Act of 1868 [15 Stat. 126], of which a description is to be given, or which is required to be unencumbered, or for the value of which a bond is to be given, and which it is forbidden to encumber, and which under section 44 may be forfeited, is, as declared in section 7, the real estate and premises connected with the distillery, that is used in connection therewith to facilitate the carrying on of the business and conducive to that end, and does not include such pastures, orchards and vineyards as are in no other way connected with such distillery than that they are contiguous and under the same ownership.

[This was an action for forfeiture of a certain piece of land claimed by V. Spreckens.]

F. M. Pixley, for the United States.

J. J. Williams, for claimant.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This action is brought to enforce a forfeiture under the forty-fourth section of the act of 1868. The section provides, in substance, that any person who shall carry on the business of a distiller, etc., without having paid the special tax, or without having given bonds as required by law, shall forfeit all the right, title and interest of such person in the spirits, wines, stills, apparatus, etc., owned by such person, and the personal property found in the distillery or rectifying establishment, or in the store or other place of business of the compounder, or any building, room, yard, or enclosure connected therewith and used with or constituting part of the premises, and all the right and interest therein of such person in the lot or tract of land on which such distillery is situated.

At the trial, the violation of the law was clearly proved, and the only question that arises is as to the extent of the forfeiture under the last cited clause of the act. It appears that the claimant is the owner of a tract of land or farm one hundred and thirty acres in extent. It is variously cultivated, and consists of fruit orchards, vineyards of several varieties of grapes, a pasture lot, barley field, and a mountainous and wooded tract not under cultivation.

It is claimed on the part of the United States that the whole of this farm is forfeited as constituting the "lot or tract on which the distillery is situated." It is apparent that if the statute is to be so construed in this case, it must receive the same construction in all cases, notwithstanding that the tract of land may be a rancho many square leagues in extent. The statute would thus be construed to impose a forfeiture of all the real estate owned by the offender, of which the site of the distillery formed a part.

The operation of such a law would not only be harsh but unequal—for it would make the amount of the forfeiture depend, not on the value of the distillery establishment and the presumed magnitude of its operations, but upon the accidental circumstance that the illicit distiller happened to own a large tract, on the corner of which a still, perhaps of insignificant proportions, was erected.

In section 7, the forfeiture for failing or refusing to give bond is, "of the distillery, etc., and all real estate and premises connected therewith." There would seem to be in this section an intention to limit the forfeiture to such real estate and premises as were used in connection with, or as auxiliary to, the illicit business.

The statute not only punishes the offender personally, but it regards the instruments and apparatus he has used in the commission of the offense, or which are conducive to the carrying on of the business, as tainted with the crime, and confiscated. But real estate, pasture, orchard, or wood lots, the homestead of the family, etc., which have no connection with the unlawful business, which were not used in it, or contributed in any degree to facilitate its prosecution, are not by the 7th section declared to be forfeited.

The 8th section provides that no bond of a distiller shall be approved unless he is the owner in fee of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated, or unless he shall file the written consent of the owner, mortgagee, judgment creditor, etc., that the lien of the United States for taxes and penalties shall have priority, etc.

In case the distillery is on leased premises, a bond may be substituted, of which the penal sum is to be the appraised value of said "lot or tract of land," together with the buildings, distilling apparatus, etc.

If, under this section, the owner of a rancho several square leagues in extent, should offer his bond for approval, would the assessor be required to reject it, if it should appear that a tract of a few hundred acres, perhaps five or ten miles distant from the distillery, was under mortgage? Or if a leaseholder were to make a similar application, should he be required to give a bond of which the penal sum must be the appraised value of the entire rancho?

The same question is presented under section 6. By that section the distiller is required to give "a particular description of the lot or tract of land on which the distillery is situated." Is he, under this section, to give the boundaries of his whole rancho, and to include all the real estate owned by him not separated by intervening property from the spot on which the distillery is erected? By the 7th section, the distiller is required to give bond that he will not suffer the "lot or tract of land on which the distillery stands, or any part thereof, to be encumbered by mortgage, judgment or other lien." Is this to be construed as prohibiting him from mortgaging, or perhaps even selling any part of the farm or rancho within the exterior boundaries in which the distillery is situated?

It seems to me that to these questions but one answer can be given. The lot, or tract of land of which a description is to be given, or which is required to be unencumbered, or for the value of which a bond is to be given, and which it is forbidden to encumber, and which under section 44 may be forfeited, is, as declared in section 7, the real estate and premises connected with the distillery; that is, used in connection therewith, to facilitate the carrying on of the business, and directly or indirectly conducive or contributory to that end. It will include all buildings, yards, enclosures, offices, stables, wine-cellars, etc., used in the illicit business. But it ought not to include dwelling-houses, pasture or sowing lots, etc., or village lots and houses, which, though owned by the offender, are not in any way employed in his business as a distiller, which may be occupied or rented by other persons, and which, so far as the illicit manufacture is concerned, might as well have belonged to any one else.

The language of the statute is "lot or tract" of land. The latter word may have been used as synonymous with the former and to indicate a village or town lot which, being of definite boundaries and usually of limited size, might not unreasonably be deemed to be used and occupied for the purposes of the illicit business. An adjoining lot, though owned by the offender, would not under this provision be forfeited. It would be strange if the circumstance that the distillery was situated on an extensive farm in the country, should involve in the forfeiture, pasture, grain and wood lots, orchards, vineyards, dwelling-houses, and even it might be village lots, remote from the scene of operations of the distillery and having no connection with it.

In the plat of the survey of the farm sought to be forfeited in this case, there is laid down a tract of land a few acres in extent, adjacent to the distillery, and including that building, the wine-shed, tank, etc. It is separated by a road from a vineyard of table grapes, which lies on the west; on the north, by a road running near or along a brook, from a barley field; on the east, by a fence, from a pasture lot; and on the south it is bounded by the exterior boundaries of the farm. It seems to me that to this tract the forfeiture should be limited. A judgment to this effect will be entered.

Case No. 14,768.

UNITED STATES v. CERVANTES.

[1 Hoff. Land Cas. 9.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. June Term, 1853.[2]

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — CONCESSION — APPROVAL OF DEPUTATION—CONDITIONAL GRANT.

1. To constitute a definitively valid or complete title two things are necessary—First, a concession by the governor; and secondly, the approval by the territorial deputation, or, in the event of their refusal, by the supreme government.

2. Where the condition of a grant, which had not been approved by the deputation, required a house to be built and the land cultivated within one year from its date, and no house was built or cultivation made within six years, held, that the claimant had, under the rules of decision laid down by the supreme court, no equities which entitled him to a confirmation.

Claim [by Cruz Cervantes] for [the rancho of San Joaquin or Rosa Morada] a tract of land within boundaries supposed to contain two sitios of ganado mayor, granted to appellee on the first of April, 1836, by Nicolas Gutierrez, superior political chief, ad interim, of California. The claim was confirmed by the board of land commissioners. The United States appealed.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Jones & Strode, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. This case comes up on appeal from the decree of the board of commissioners to ascertain and settle private land claims in California. Could I have consulted my inclinations, I should have refrained from expressing opinions upon any of these cases, and would willingly have contented myself with affirming pro forma every decision of either the former or the present board, and remitted the case to that tribunal by whose decisions alone these questions will be finally determined. But I have not felt at liberty to shrink from this part of the duties imposed by law upon this court, nor to withhold the expression of its opinions, however immaterial, as regards the final results, its decisions may be. If these opinions shall, on some points, differ from the conclusions to which the board of commissioners has in this case arrived, it is with the full knowledge that their opportunities for examination and consideration have been far greater than my own, and that in dissenting from them I may fall into error. Were the consequences of my decision more serious, it would not be without great regret that I should find myself led to a conclusion differing in any respect from the opinions of so able and learned a tribunal.

By the fifth article of the rules and regulations of November 21st, 1828, prescribed by the general government, in pursuance of the sixteenth article of the general colonization law of 1824, it is provided "that grants to private persons or families shall not be held to be definitively valid without the previous consent of the territorial deputation, to which end the respective expedientes shall be forwarded to it." In this case, no approval of the territorial deputation is shown.

It is clear, from the very terms of the law, that to constitute a "definitively valid" or complete title, two things were necessary,—First, a concession by the governor; and secondly, the approval by the territorial deputation, or, in the event of their refusal, by the supreme government.

It is contended that the original grant or concession by the government passed a perfect title or estate in fee to the claimant, subject only to the condition that it might be annulled by the refusal of both the territorial deputation and the supreme government to confirm it. I have been unable, after much consideration, to assent to this construction of the regulations of 1828. The concession does not, on its face, purport to be an absolute grant; for the land is declared to be "the property of the petitioner, subject to the approval of the deputation." The right of granting being by law vested in the governor, with the approval of the deputation, or, in case of their refusal, that of the supreme government, I do not perceive how, without such approval, the complete title can be deemed to have passed. If the refusal of the deputation is considered merely a condition subsequent, which on its happening would divest a fee previously vested, the effect attributed to it is precisely that of the other conditions in the grant, admitted to be conditions subsequent. But these conditions operated on an estate supposed to have become "definitively valid." Can it be said that that which the law declares necessary to the "definitive validity" of a grant is identical in its effect with a condition which, on its happening, will divest an estate already "definitively valid?" That the grant by the governor had some validity is not denied. It was the performance of a part, perhaps the most important part, of the acts necessary to complete the title; but it was not the performance of all, nor did it purport to be. Until, then, either the territorial deputation or the supreme government had given their approval, the grant remained not "definitively valid," or in other words, inceptive and incomplete; and a confirmation and patent by the United States are necessary to pass the absolute title to the claimant.

Any other view of this question would, it seems to me, deprive the deputation of the important functions entrusted to them. Their right was not merely a qualified right to take from a petitioner land already absolutely granted to him, but it was the right to say whether or not the land should be granted to him at all; and until they or the supreme government had consented to the grant, the absolute or complete title cannot be deemed to have passed out of the Mexican nation. The title, then, of the claimant being found to be inchoate or imperfect, his right to a confirmation and perfection of it by the government of the United States must be tested by the principles laid down in similar cases by the supreme court. Had he gone on to perform the conditions, and confer the benefits on the Mexican nation, as stipulated for in his grant, no objection could be urged why this government, succeeding, as it does, to all the rights and duties of Mexico, should not perfect his title. That the settlement and cultivation of the vacant lands of the republic formed the sole consideration of these grants is not disputed; and in this particular case the ability of the petitioner to render this equivalent for his concession seems to have been the subject of particular investigation, for the governor is at pains to inform himself whether or not the petitioner had, as he alleged, any stock to put on the land, or the means of getting any.

The grant bears date on the first of August, 1836—and is made on condition, among other things, that the petitioner shall within one year, at farthest, build on the land a house, which shall be inhabited. It is subsequently provided that should he contravene these conditions, "he shall lose his right to the land, and it may be denounced by another." The juridical possession which the grant directs him to solicit of the respective judge, was never applied for until the year 1841; and no occupation or cultivation of the land by him is distinctly shown until 1846, ten years after the grant. The witness Godey testifies that in 1846 he saw the claimant residing on the rancho; and adds, that the house he lived in seemed to be several years old. Pacheco, the only other witness on this point, states that he does not exactly recollect the time when the claimant began to reside on his rancho, but thinks it was about two years after the revolution of Chico and Gutierrez. So far, then, as appears, there was a total neglect on the part of the claimant to comply with any of the conditions of the grant for a period of from five to eight years. If, then, we are right in regarding the title he has received only as inchoate or imperfect, the necessary authorities not having concurred in making the grant, the inquiry presents itself, has he a right to demand of the United States that they should go on and perfect it? There is no doubt that under the treaty, as well as by the laws of nations, such title as the claimant had acquired when the sovereignty was changed, was secured to him as private property, and the question is, what was that right, according to the laws and usages of Mexico at the time of the cession? If the title is to be decreed, and a patent awarded, it must be on the same grounds as those on which the Mexican authorities would have been bound to decree it had a perfect title been solicited from them. De Villemont v. U. S., 12 How. [53 U. S.] 267; Glen v. U. S., 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 257.

The rule as laid down in U. S. v. Kingsley, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 484, is, "that the United States succeeds to all those equitable obligations which we are to suppose would have influenced the former government to secure to its citizens their property, and which would have been applied by it in the construction of a conditional grant to make it absolute; and further, that the United States must maintain a right of property, under the treaty, by applying to it the laws and customs by which those rights were secured before the cession of the country, or by which an inchoate right of property would, by laws and customs, have become a perfect right." The inquiry is not so much what would the Mexican authorities, had there been no change in the circumstances of the country, or in their policy, have in point of fact done, as what they were, by their laws and customs, and in equity and good conscience, bound to do. Were they bound to confirm and perfect the title of this claimant? or were they at liberty to consider his rights as abandoned and lost, and refuse to accept, after so long a delay, his performance of the conditions of his concession, and treat the land as having reverted to the public domain, to be disposed of as present circumstances or policy might require? Grants or concessions of land upon condition have been repeatedly confirmed by the supreme court. It will, it declares, liberally construe a performance of conditions, precedent or subsequent, in such grants; nor will it "apply, in the construction of their conditions, the rules of the common law." U. S. v. Kingsley, ubi supra. Thus, where the full performance of the condition must have been a matter of indifference as well to the king of Spain as to the United States, after the cession of Florida, it appearing that a performance had been commenced within the time limited, the grant was confirmed. Arredondo's Case, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 691. So, when the grantee had in good faith begun to build his mill (which was the condition of his grant)—expended five thousand dollars towards it—had his horses and negroes stolen, while his mill was being built—had his mill dam carried away by a freshet—rebuilt his mill in 1827, which was destroyed by fire the same year—and the year after built another, of seventy horse power—the court determined that the claimant had shown a sufficient performance of the condition, cy prés—and the acts he had done amounted to a compliance with the condition, according to the equitable doctrines governing such cases. On the other hand, where, by the condition of the grant, one year was allowed for making the improvements required by the regulations, and three years for making an establishment on the premises, and the claimant never took possession of the land until long after the cession of the country, the court rejected the claim, disregarding the excuse offered by him, that hostility of the Indians, and official duties, prevented him; and observing that as to the first, he took his concession subject to that risk; and as to the second, that he held his office when the concession was made, and knew its duties. The court even went so far as to say, with reference to the condition, "that it was undoubtedly necessary that an establishment should be made within three years—such being the requirement of the concession, in concurrence with the regulations." In U. S. v. Boisdoré [11 How. (52 U. S.) 63] the consideration of the grant was, that a stock farm should be established on the land solicited, and that such an establishment was to be "for all the family" of the petitioner; and on it he was to employ all his force of negroes. The evidence showed an occupation of the land for forty years; that it had been cultivated, to some extent, from the date of the grant, and that stock had been kept there, but that such occupation had been by only a single mulatto; and that the petitioner had abandoned the idea of taking his whole family to the place, and employing all his negroes there. The court considered it altogether inadmissible that such trifling occupation, in utter neglect of Boisdoré's promises to the Spanish authorities and the duties imposed by his grant, fastened an equity on the conscience of the king of Spain to complete the grant. It may be proper to remark, however, that it is stated in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McLean, that the grant was rejected by the majority of the court for want of certainty in its calls.

It is urged with much earnestness and ability by the counsel for the claimant, that the only penalty attached to a nonperformance of the conditions of the grant was that the land was liable to be denounced by another—and that upon such denouncement it might have been regranted, if then vacant; but that no denouncement having been made, nor the Mexican authorities availed themselves in any way of their right to treat the land as having reverted to the public domain, and the petitioner having gone on to perform the conditions, with the acquiescence of the government, he ought not now to be disturbed. I am deeply impressed with the force of these considerations. But if the view taken of the effect of the absence of the approval of the deputation be correct, the land cannot be deemed to have been at any time finally alienated by the Mexican authorities; and the question is not whether a forfeiture should be insisted on, but whether the United States are bound to complete a transfer of their property which has as yet been only partially made. It cannot, I think, be denied that after the expiration of the year from the date of the grant, and up to the time when the claimant performed the conditions, the land, by Mexican law and usage, might have been denounced and regranted. Such was the express condition of the grant. But that condition also provides that in the event referred to, the petitioner shall lose his right to the land. Whether or not in the case of a complete and final grant the Mexican government could only take advantage of the forfeiture by the process of "denouncement," it is not necessary to inquire—for this is not a complete grant. It would seem far more reasonable to suppose that it could. The condition provides that the petitioner shall "lose his right to the land" in case of its violation. If, upon denouncement of the land, it could have been regranted, it would seem that the government must have had the right to make any other disposition of it which any change in their policy or circumstances might require. Whether such regrant or other disposition would have been made without a previous inquisition into the fact of forfeiture is not very clear. By the eleventh article of the regulations of 1828, it is provided that the governor shall designate to the new "poblador" a suitable time within which he shall occupy and cultivate the land under the conditions, and with the number of families stipulated for, with the understanding that if he shall not do so the grant shall be null. In this case, at least, it would seem that the title vested in the government ipso facto on the happening of the breach. But the inquiry in the case at bar is immaterial, for the full title has never passed out of the Mexican government; and the question is not whether the United States acquired, by the treaty, a right to enforce a forfeiture, but whether the claimant has a right to require this government to complete his title. No facts appear upon the record which serve to explain or excuse the long delay of the claimant; nor is there any very distinct proof of the nature of the occupation he finally took, or at least of the extent of the cultivation or amount of expenditures made by him upon the land. Had the Mexican government, at the date of the cession of this country, found itself in the precise position of the United States, with its interests, its policy, and the circumstances of the country radically changed, it is more than doubtful whether it would or ought to have felt itself bound to complete this grant, as the United States are now urged to do. If there was no obligation upon them to do so, and they were at liberty to refuse or comply, we are in the same situation, and the confirmation of this title must be obtained from another department of this government. Were I at liberty to follow blindly the dictates of my own judgment, I might, perhaps, have confirmed this title. But governed as I am bound to be by the principles established by the supreme court, I have been unable to resist the conviction that a confirmation of this claim would be a departure from the spirit, if not the letter of the rules of decision laid down in the more recent cases. If those rules are hereafter to be modified or departed from, it must be by the tribunal by which they were established. And if, in this case, the equities of the claimant can receive at its hands a more liberal construction and a more favorable consideration than I have felt at liberty to give them, no one will acquiesce in the result more cheerfully than myself.

Since the above was written, I have been informed by Señor Covarrubias, an intelligent Mexican gentleman of this country, that the revolution of Chico and Gutierrez occurred in the year 1836. The "revolution" seems to have been one of those transient and slight disturbances so common in this country, and more to be likened to the outbreak of a mob or a riot in a city than one of those historical events of which judicial notice could be taken. But assuming that the court is judicially informed of the date of its occurrence, the claimant has still, under Pacheco's testimony, failed to comply with the conditions of his grant for more than one year after the expiration of the term limited for their performance; nor does he prove, allege, or pretend the slightest excuse for so doing. But the testimony of Pacheco is inconclusive. That witness says he does not exactly recollect the time when claimant commenced residing on his rancho, but believes it was about two years after the revolution of Chico and Gutierrez. The evidence, however, shows that judicial possession was not applied for till 1841, five years after the grant. Pacheco was one of the assisting witnesses on that occasion, and he does not say that at that time even the claimant had ever built a house or cultivated the land. If the witness who, in 1846, saw a house on the rancho which seemed to be "several years old," is to be believed, the fair inference is that the house could not have been built before 1842 or 1843, six or seven years after the grant. On the whole, I conclude that there having been no performance or attempt at performance until long after the expiration of the term limited, and no excuse being suggested or pretended, I am not at liberty, under the rulings of the supreme court, to confirm the imperfect title of the claimant. Upon the other questions made in this case it is unnecessary to express an opinion.

[Cal. Law J. & Lit. Rev. 71.]

District Court, N. D. California. Oct. 31, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—ABSENCE OF GRANT—NOTORIOUS AND EXCLUSIVE POSSESSION—PROOFS.

1. To entitle a claim to confirmation where there has been no grant, clear evidence must be presented of a long-continued, notorious, and exclusive possession under claim of ownership of a tract of land of definite boundaries, and of the recognition of the proprietory and possessory rights of the claimant by his neighbors and by the authorities of the former government.

2. The proofs in this case fail to show an exclusive occupation or possession by the claimant of the tract claimed, or any general recognition of his rights thereto, as proprietor, by his neighbors, or by the Mexican authorities.

The claim in this case was originally confirmed on uncontradicted testimony, which seemed to establish beyond doubt the occupation and possession of the land, by permission of the Mexican authorities, since the year 1837. [See Case No. 14,770.] The cause having been opened for further proofs as to the boundaries and extent of the land occupied by [Pedro] Chaboya, additional testimony was taken. On the second hearing, it was objected that the claim had not been presented to the board, but that the petition and proofs presented to that tribunal, and the decree from which the appeal had been taken, referred to another tract of land. On examination, this objection was found to be well taken, and the cause was dismissed for want of jurisdiction. Application for relief was thereupon made to congress, and a law was passed empowering this court to take jurisdiction of the cause, and to decide the same on its merits. It has therefore been submitted on the testimony originally taken, and also on that taken under the order of the court reopening the case for further proofs on the subject of boundaries.

It appears that, in the year 1837, Pedro Chaboya entered upon a piece of land adjoining the pueblo of San Jose. Whether this entry was first made by permission of the authorities of the pueblo is not clear. Pico swears that Chaboya occupied the land by permission of the ayuntamiento, and Fernandez states that "the judge loaned it to him." But these witnesses may, very possibly, refer to a subsequent permission to occupy, given by the alcalde, which will hereafter be noticed. The land upon which Chaboya settled was universally recognized as part of the "ejidos," or common lands, of the pueblo, and his occupation of it appears to have provoked immediate opposition on the part of a considerable number of the pobladores. On the 21st of December, 1837, Manuel Pinto, J. Anto. Sepulveda, Dolores Pacheco, and others presented to the ayuntamiento a remonstrance against putting certain persons in possession of sitios which, in the opinion of the remonstrants, were the common property of the pueblo. Chaboya, notwithstanding this remonstrance, appears to have continued in possession, and on the 29th of June, 1838, the same persons again address the ayuntamiento on the subject. In this last document the remonstrants state that, "having learned that Pedro Chaboya has presented a memorial soliciting the place named La Posa, for the purpose of building thereon a house and corral, and for the purpose of agriculture, although he agrees to inclose his fields, it is not our pleasure that the said señor, or any one else, should occupy said places, as they are so close to this community; the water and pastures, in the most rigorous season of the year being the most abundant, and very necessary for the use of our cattle and horses. It is, therefore, our desire that said land may be preserved for the community without there being placed upon the same the buildings or establishments of any individual. If the said Chaboya has a mind to unite himself to this community, it will be more agreeable to us that he should make his house in the pueblo, etc. The said place (paraje) of La Posa has for some time been occupied by Pablo Parra, and not without much prejudice to this community. One of the reasons is that his fields are without fences, for which reason our cattle cannot be left in the neighborhood of said place. And as a further reason why he should not occupy said place, information was taken by the present juez de campo which will give sufficient grounds for the removal of said place."

From this document, it would seem that Chaboya had petitioned the ayuntamiento for the place called La Posa for the purpose of building thereon a house and corral, and that he had offered to inclose his fields, so that his cultivations might not prevent the cattle of the inhabitants of the pueblo from resorting to the spring for water. This the remonstrants opposed. It appears, also, that the place had already been occupied for some time by one Parra, to the great prejudice of the community.

BY THE COURT. The testimony, in some particulars, confirms the statements of the remonstrance. It is stated, by several witnesses, that the land near the Posa was occupied by Parra, who built a small house, covered with tules and plastered with mud, into which Chaboya moved when it was left by Parra, in consequence of the opposition made by the pueblo to his making a house there. The records do not disclose what reply was made by the ayuntamiento to the remonstrance of the pobladores. No permission to Chaboya to occupy the land, emanating from the ayuntamiento, is produced, nor is it claimed that any was given. The place called La Posa, or La Posa de San Bautista, is described by nearly all the witnesses as a marsh (cienega), or watering-place for cattle, to which all the stock of the inhabitants of the pueblo resorted. The terms of the remonstrance clearly indicate that the land to which reference was made was not a rancho of one or two leagues in extent, but a piece of ground near the common watering-place of the pueblo, for it states that the "said place" had been occupied for some time by Parra, and it is not pretended that he was ever in occupation of the whole tract up to the limits of the nearest rancheros. The offer of Chaboya to inclose his fields, which is referred to in the remonstrance, and was no doubt contained in his memorial to the ayuntamiento, would also seem to show that he was soliciting a small piece of ground of the ejidos of the pueblo, for the purpose of building on and inclosing it. It does not appear, however, that Chaboya was expelled from the place upon which he had thus settled; and on the 10th of May of the ensuing year (1839), Chaboya addressed a petition to the governor, soliciting the grant of a tract of the extent of two leagues, "between the boundaries of the Señores Bernals, the Señor Narvaez, of Joaquin Higuera, Antonio Chaboya, and five hundred varas on the side of the pueblo."

In this petition Chaboya asks the ownership of the land which he actually possesses with his house and cattle, with the permission of the prefecture of the district, and he states that the reclamations addressed against him to the government have been made by only four or five evil-disposed citizens, and are absolutely destitute of justice. The permission given by the prefecture, alluded to in this petition, is not produced; but it would seem, from the terms of Castro's report, to whom the petition was referred, that some proceedings before the prefect had already been had. On the 20th of May the governor directed the prefecture to report, and in the meantime that it should arrange that the interested party should be conserved in the possession in which he finds himself of the land solicited so long as the necessary procedure is going on. On the 25th of May, Castro, the prefect, reports that the petitioner ought to be excused from the usual procedure, as the prefecture had already taken and perhaps dispatched it, conformably to his solicitation, and that the reclamations of the residents of the pueblo, of which he had already informed the governor, really had no other design than to drive Chaboya from the place he had occupied for many years, and were absolutely destitute of justice. It appears that, at the time this report was made, the prefect had already fulfilled the governor's order directing Chaboya to be conserved in his possession. On the 22d of May, two days after the governor's order, Castro addressed to the alcalde of San Jose the following:

"You are directed not to move the citizens Jose Parra and Pedro Chaboya from the place where they are established until the ejidos of this poblacion are regulated.

"God and liberty.

"S. Juan de Castro, 22d May, 1839.

"Jose Castro.

"Senor Alcalde del Pueblo de Alvarado."

No further proceedings before the governor appear to have been taken, and it is admitted that no title was ever issued to Chaboya. In pursuance of the order of the prefect, an arrangement appears to have been made between the alcalde of the pueblo and Chaboya, which was embodied in the following document:

"Citizen Dolores Pacheco, Justice of the Peace of the Pueblo of San Juan de Alvarado: By superior order of the Hon. prefect of the First district, it is granted to the citizen Pedro Chaboya that he may dwell in the place called La Posa de San Bautista without building any house on foundations, or, still less, erecting substantial structures, for the term of two years, subjecting himself to pay annually six dollars; and he must aid the work of bridges, or any other that may be beneficial to him. Dolores Pacheco.

"Pedro Chaboya.

"S. Jose G. de Alvarado, February 29, 1840."

As the claim of Chaboya is founded on an alleged equity, arising from a long occupation, by permission of the former government, of a tract of land with definite boundaries, it is essential to ascertain, if it be possible, to what land this permission to occupy referred. We have seen that, in his petition to the governor, Chaboya asks the ownership of what he "actually possesses." In a subsequent part of the petition he gives the boundaries of the land he solicits. They include a tract of about two square leagues in extent. The governor directs the prefect to arrange that the interested party may be conserved in the possession in which he finds himself of the land solicited. Two days afterwards, the prefect orders the alcalde not to remove the citizens, Jose Parra and Pedro Chaboya, from the place where they are established until the ejidos of the poblacion are regulated. It is urged, on the part of the claimant, that this permission to occupy by the governor, enforced by the order of the prefect, referred to the whole tract included within the boundaries mentioned in Chaboya's petition. Such would undoubtedly be the natural construction of the governor's order, and Chaboya's statement that he was actually in possession of the whole tract, by permission of the prefecture, seems to be confirmed by the report of Castro, that the prefecture, in his charge, had already dispatched the proceedings conformably to Chaboya's situation, and that the opposition to him was unjust.

On the other hand, the order of Castro to the alcalde refers not to Chaboya alone, but also to Parra, the latter of whom is stated, as we have seen in the remonstrance of the residents of the pueblo, to have been occupying the land for some time at the date of Chaboya's memorial to the ayuntamiento, against which they protested. Had the prefect intended that Chaboya should not be disturbed in the possession of the whole tract, or sobrante, between the pueblo and the lands of adjoining rancheros, it is not easy to see why Parra was included in the order to the alcalde. The language, too, of the prefect's order seems to imply merely a prohibition to remove Chaboya and Parra from the particular spot where they had established themselves, rather than a direction that they, or either of them, should be permitted to occupy exclusively a tract nearly two leagues in extent of the common lands of the pueblo. "You shall not remove the citizens, Jose Parra and Pedro Chaboya, from the spot (del punto) where they are established, etc.,"—seeming to indicate that they were merely to be allowed to reside on and cultivate the place which they then occupied. But the license of the alcalde to Chaboya, which the latter signed and apparently accepted, admits of no misconstruction. "By superior order of the Hon. prefect, it is granted to the citizen Pedro Chaboya, that he dwell (que habite) in the place (en el parage) called Posa de San Juan Bautista, without building any house on foundations, or erecting permanent structures, for two years, subjecting himself to pay six dollars annually, etc." The remonstrance of the pobladores had been directed against the occupation by Chaboya, or any one else, of the land near the Posa, as they desired that no buildings or establishments of any individual should be placed there. The alcalde, however, by order of the prefect, gave to Chaboya the right to reside or dwell on the place for two years; but he was to make no permanent establishment upon it, as it belonged to the ejidos of the pueblo, and it was expected to be included within them when their limits were assigned. That this was the meaning and effect of the license is proved by Jose Fernandez. This witness states that he was secretary of Pacheco, and that he wrote the license; that it was signed by Chaboya; that no boundaries were given to him, the object being merely to give him permission to reside at the edge of the Posa.

It is urged by the counsel for the claimant that the description of the tract on which Chaboya was authorized to dwell as the place ("el parage") called La Posa de San Juan Bautista, shows that a large tract was intended, the term "parage" being equivalent to "sitio," or "rancho." It is true that that expression is frequently used to indicate the large tracts of land solicited by and granted to the former possessors of this country. But it is an expression of very indefinite import, and may as well signify the small piece of ground where Chaboya had his house and inclosures as the large tract he now claims. The same term is applied in the remonstrance of 1838 to the land occupied by Parra, and it is not pretended that his occupation extended to the whole tract now claimed by Chaboya. Several of the claimant's witnesses say, in general terms, that the place called La Posa de San Bautista, was bounded by the rancho of the Bernals, that of Narvaez, that of Antonio Chaboya, and by the pueblo, but they are unable to describe its boundaries, except by reference to those of the surrounding ranchos. They evidently suppose that it included all the sobrante lying between those ranchos and the pueblo, wherever the boundaries of the former might be. On the other hand, Antonio Bernal, Anto. Ma. Pico, Francisco Bernal, and Jose Fernandez testify that the place known as Posa de San Juan Bautista was a spring or marsh designated by that name, where the cattle of the vecinos of the pueblo went for water; that the name was never applied to any tract of land; that Chaboya never had any recognized limits, and never was recognized as having any greater rights than any other individual vecino. Fernandez, who was almost constantly in office from 1839 to 1850, says that he never knew of any boundaries known and recognized as those of Chaboya. Had there been such they would certainly have been known to him; that the land now claimed by Chaboya was never recognized as his by the pueblo or its authorities, and that he never had possession of the lands within the boundaries now claimed by him. All the witnesses called by the United States concur in the statement that the lands between the three ranchos named in Chaboya's petition to the governor were always recognized as pueblo lands, and even the witnesses for the claimants admit that they were of the ejidos of the pueblo, and used and occupied by the community in common. Even Jose Noriega, though he states that "all that corner" was called La Posa, is unable to say how much land it contained; and he admits (answer to question 42) that "it had no limits."

It is unnecessary further to recapitulate the testimony on this point. After a careful perusal of it, I have been unable to discover that the term Posa de San Juan Bautista was ever applied to a tract of any definite and recognized boundaries. Chaboya himself, though he asks in his petition to the governor for all the land bounded by the ranchos of the Bernals, the Narvaez, Joaquin Higuera, Antonio Chaboya, and five hundred varas at the side of the pueblo, does not apply to the tract solicited the name of La Posa, or any name whatever. The fact seems to be that Chaboya settled near the spring or marsh of that name, much to the dissatisfaction of some of the residents of the pueblo; that he applied for a grant for all the sobrante between the pueblo and the adjoining ranchos, which he failed to obtain, but was, by order of the prefect and license of the alcalde, allowed to continue his residence on the spot where he had established himself, under certain restrictions. But it is, perhaps, less important to inquire what were the limits of the tract known as La Posa, if any it had, than to ascertain whether Chaboya did in fact occupy and have the exclusive possession of any tract of determinate boundaries, of which he was the recognized owner, or, at least, occupant.

On this, the vital point to be established by him, the proofs are, unfortunately for his pretensions, too plain to admit of doubt. It cannot be contended that Chaboya ever had exclusive possession of the land he now claims, except of such portions as he cultivated and enclosed. The whole tract seems to have been considered and used as the common lands of the pueblo. The cattle of Chaboya were not brought to the Posa until 1842 or 1843, and then only to the number of some six or eight hundred. They undoubtedly ranged over the tract now claimed by him, and also at times wandered upon the adjoining ranchos. But so also did the cattle of the inhabitants of the pueblo, which were many times more numerous. That Chaboya cultivated various pieces of land in the vicinity of the Posa, and elsewhere, is admitted by all the witnesses. But it appears that several others of the vecinos of the pueblo had similar cultivations in various parts of the tract now claimed by him. Fernandez swears (answer 38): "The Posa was always occupied by the cattle of the pueblo during this time (i. e. from 1839). I saw cultivations in front of the Posa, about three hundred varas from it, in 1841, of one Buitron, of Miguel Mesa, of Gervacio Chaboya and Cruz Chaboya. I saw these four there cultivating a good-sized patch of corn and watermelons. The land was open to all as common land, but notice always had to be given to the alcalde." Antonio Bernal testifies that he has known the land since he was old enough to know any thing. That he was not acquainted with the boundaries of Pedro Chaboya. "He had no boundaries." The land was known and used as pueblo lands. "We had cattle there, the Pachecos, the Flores, the Pintos, Jose Feliz, the Sepulvedas and their brothers, the Mesas, and the people of the pueblo of San Jose. The Posa never was a rancho. It had no boundaries. Parra, Francisco Garcia, Sepulveda, Jose Bernal, had cultivations about a mile from Chaboya's house. They sowed there for two years by authority of the pueblo, but were turned out because they interfered with the cattle who came to drink at the Posa. I have attended Rodeos at the neighboring ranchos. Never knew the Posa considered as a rancho belonging to Pedro Chaboya. For all my lifetime I have considered it as belonging to the pueblo. He never had any boundaries respected and known as such by the pueblo or any one else. Jose Noriega, Jose Antonio Alvisu, Justo Larios, Pedro Zepeda, P. Mesa, witnesses for the claimant, all acknowledge that the lands claimed in this case were part of the ejidos or common lands of the pueblo; and most of them admit that they were free to all the vecinos for occupation for pasturage or cultivation by license of the municipal authorities. Jose Noriega (answer 52) says: "That Pedro Chaboya, having no title, could not have prevented the vecinos of the pueblo from grazing their cattle and cultivating the lands." Question 57: "Could not any of the vecinos who desired to do so have cultivated portions of said land, provided they did not interfere with or trespass upon the lands actually enclosed and cultivated by others?" Answer: "All the world could do it, though some asked the judge." Antonio Alvisu states that the land Chaboya was authorized to occupy, by permission of the pueblo, was all he could occupy with his cattle. He occupied all the plain. The witness admits, however, that the cattle of the people of the pueblo ranged over the same lands. Justo Larios, in reply to question 28, "Would not those lands have been free for the occupation of any of the vecinos of the pueblo, either for the purposes of grazing or cultivation by a license of the municipal authorities, except so far as they were actually occupied and cultivated by other vecinos under a similar license?" says, "I believe so." Pedro Zepeda (answer to question 40) makes the same statement, as does also Pedro Mesa (answers 31 and 32). I am not aware that any witness disputes the fact. That the large extent of land now claimed by Chaboya was not recognized as a rancho belonging to him by any title either legal or equitable, and that his right to the possession of it was not respected by his neighbors, nor admitted by the government or the pueblo, is not only positively stated by numerous witnesses, but in some degree proved by evidence from the archives. In none of the grants of adjoining lands, or of the documents relating thereto, is Chaboya mentioned as a colindante or adjoining occupant. The Narvaez grant was made in 1844, and the pueblo is named as bounding it on the side which adjoins the tract now claimed by Chaboya. If the rights, either possessory or proprietory of Chaboya, were generally known and recognized, it is strange that none of the diseños, the informes, or the grants of the ranchos up to the boundaries of which he now claims, make the slightest allusion to them. It also appears that, in 1844, Chaboya petitioned for two leagues of a tract called "Los Cerritos." This he failed to obtain. But if he was already in possession of a tract of nearly the same extent, his title to which was recognized and respected, his motive for applying for another tract whereon to place the 600 or 800 head of cattle he possessed, is not easily understood.

The statements of several of the witnesses principally relied on by the claimants to show the possession and occupation by Chaboya of the tract claimed are in some respects contradicted by their acts. It appears that, in 1847, the authorities and inhabitants of the pueblo determined to divide up and distribute their common lands among the vecinos, in lots of 500 acres each. Among these lands was included the tract now claimed by Chaboya. In the proceedings to effect this object, Jose Noriega and Antonio Sunol assisted, so far as appears, without objection or protest against violating the rights of Chaboya, and they each, together with Pedro Zepeda, another of the claimant's witnesses, obtained lots which they have since sold. In 1849 Chaboya himself appears to have protested against an intrusion on his land by Salvador Castro; but he did not then or at any time pretend to have obtained a title, and bases his rights upon what he calls his tranquil occupation for more than ten years, and "the concession made by the political chief under the imposition of a rent," evidently referring to the license to occupy, given by the alcalde by order of the prefect. What the nature of that occupation was we have already seen.

It is urged, on the part of the claimant, that, though other persons cultivated portions of the land claimed by Chaboya, none of them had fences or made settlements upon the land. They all lived in the town. It is not stated, I believe, by any of the witnesses, that these cultivations were fenced; nor is it stated that they were not. As it is admitted that the cattle of the pueblo and of Chaboya ranged over the whole plain, it is extremely improbable that any one would have attempted to make cultivations unless they were protected by a fence. That they resided in the town may be admitted. Chaboya did not, because, contrary to the wishes of the remonstrants in 1838, he had obtained a license to dwell in the place called La Posa. But I am unable to see how this circumstance even tends to show that he was the recognized possessor of all the land lying between the pueblo and the adjoining ranchos. It is also strenuously urged that the fact that the cattle of the pueblo ranged over the land claimed by Chaboya, and that portions were cultivated by others, is of no importance to establish an adverse possession, for the cattle also roamed, and even some cultivations were made, on lands admitted to belong to adjoining ranchos. But the point is not whether the United States have shown an adverse possession by the pueblo, but whether the claimant has shown such an ancient, generally recognized, and undisputed exclusive possession of a tract of land, the boundaries of which were definite and respected by his neighbors, as will, in the admitted absence of a grant, entitle him to confirmation.

It is said that this claim must be confirmed on the authority of U. S. v. Alvisu, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 318. But the cases seem to me radically different. Alvisu applied in 1838 for a grant of land and for permission to occupy while the proceedings were pending. This permission was granted. In 1839, the order of the governor was exhibited to the prefect, who agreed to reserve the land, and that the claimant might occupy it. In 1840, the administrator of the mission of San Francisco reported that the land was unoccupied, and that it did not belong to the mission or any private person. The testimony showed unequivocally, that Alvisu had occupied the land since 1840, that he had cultivated and built a house upon it. The supreme court, in confirming the claim, observe: "No objection was made or is suggested why he should not have been a colonist of that portion of the public domain. And no suspicion exists unfavorable to the continuity of his possession and claim. He has been recognized as proprietor of this land since 1840." But in the case of Chaboya, strenuous and determined opposition to his obtaining a grant, or even residing on the spot he had selected, was made by the authorities of the pueblo from the beginning. Although Castro reported that this opposition was unjust, yet for some reason the governor refused to grant. And though by order of the governor, the prefecture "arranged" that he should be conserved in his possession, yet the license given by the alcalde and accepted by Chaboya was only a permission to dwell at the spot, without erecting a house or permanent fixtures on the land. It does not purport to be a permission to occupy a large tract with specified boundaries; and the testimony establishes, by a decisive preponderance of proof, that the place or "parage" called La Posa was not known as a rancho of definite limits. The exclusive occupation by Alvisu of the tract of which he obtained possession, and his recognition as its proprietor since 1840, were not disputed. The evidence in this case shows that Chaboya had no exclusive occupation whatever; that the cattle of the pueblo roamed over the land; that portions of it were cultivated by the vecinos; that it was universally regarded as part of the ejidos of the pueblo, and free, as his own witnesses admit, to be occupied by any of the inhabitants, by permission of the judge, for purposes of grazing or cultivation. That his failure to procure a title did not result from indifference or carelessness, may be inferred from the fact that his license to reside at the Posa was obtained nearly a year after the date of his petition to the governor, and that nearly five years afterwards he contested with Pacheco the right of the latter to "Los Cerritos," and, failing in his suit, applied to the governor for a grant of the sobrante of that rancho. It is not to be supposed that he would, when thus anxious to obtain land, have omitted to secure, had it been possible, a grant of the tract for which he petitioned in 1839, and to have quieted forever all disputes between himself and the pueblo, with which, as the witnesses say, "he was always in question."

In all the testimony I have been unable to discover any satisfactory evidence of the recognition of Chaboya's title, either by the government, the pueblo, or the adjoining rancheros. He was not, as Sunol says, molested by the pueblo, but he does not appear ever to have asserted or attempted to enforce any exclusive rights to the tract now claimed, except to the portions which he, like any other vecino, cultivated and enclosed. With that exception, the land was used and considered as part of the "ejidos," nor does Chaboya ever appear to have given a rodeo, which would necessarily have involved the recognition of his boundaries as against the pueblo and the adjoining rancheros. Had the facts of the case been as supposed when the cause was first before the court, I should have had no hesitation in confirming this claim. But, after a very attentive consideration of the testimony, and with the strongest desire to regard in the most favorable manner the pretensions of the claimant, I have been unable to see how the fact that he was permitted to live at the Posa under the license which has been produced, and the circumstance that he, in common with the inhabitants of the pueblo, permitted his cattle to roam over the plain, and cultivated portions of it, constitute, in the absence of any grant whatever, such an equitable title as either the former or this government is bound to respect and to perfect. The title of Chaboya to the 500-acre lot assigned to him when the pueblo lands were distributed, I understand to be not disputed by the United States. It includes his house and the larger portion of the land enclosed and cultivated by him. For that portion of his claim a decree of confirmation may be entered.

I much regret that, when disposing of the question of jurisdiction, I expressed views of the equitable rights of the claimant which may have induced him to apply to congress for relief. Those views were founded on the original testimony in the cause. The further testimony subsequently taken was not examined or considered, the attention of the court being exclusively directed to the question of jurisdiction. Under the act of congress it has become my duty to consider all the evidence, and decide the case on its merits. This I have endeavored to do unaffected by any previous expressions of opinion, into which, under an imperfect view of the facts of the case, I may have been betrayed.

Case No. 14,770.

UNITED STATES v. CHABOYA.

[Hoff. Op. 59; Hoff. Dec. 107.]

District Court, N. D. California. 1859.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — LONG AND CONTINUOUS OCCUPATION—VALIDITY.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. It appears from the proofs in this case that on the 11th of May, 1839, Pedro Chaboya presented a petition to Gov. Alvarado, asking for a concession of the land which he then occupied by the permission of the prefecture of the district, and stating that the reclamations against him, addressed to the prefecture by the residents of the pueblo, were absolutely destitute of justice, as he in no way prejudiced their rights, and the land was vacant. On the 20th May, 1839, Gov. Alvarado, by a marginal order, referred the matter to the prefecture, and directed that the interested party "should continue in the possession in which he finds himself, while the suitable procedure is going on." On the 25th May, 1839, the prefect reports that the petitioner ought to be excused from the usual procedure, as the prefecture had already taken, and perhaps dispatched, it conformably to his solicitation. The prefect then goes on to observe that the reclamations which the residents of the pueblo have made, and of which he had verbally informed the governor, had no other design than to remove Chaboya from the place he had occupied for many years, on account of antipathy or prejudice. With this report, the pro expediente terminates. In May, 1844, Chaboya appears to have made a second application for two leagues of land, which, however, seems to have been a different tract from that upon which in 1839 he had already been living several years. The expediente in this last case terminates with a report by Francisco Guerrere, dated February 14, 1846, and the grant seems never to have been issued. The claim before the court is for the lands first petitioned for, and which the governor gave him permission to continue to occupy.

It appears by the testimony of Antonio Suñol that he has known the claimant for forty years; that he (claimant) has lived at the rancho called "Posa de San Juan Bautista," where he now resides, ever since 1837; that in that year he had two or three houses upon it, and 400 or 500 acres fenced in, which he has continued to cultivate up to the present time; that he now resides in one of the houses then upon the land, and that he has lived there to this day with his wife and seven or eight children. The witness states with some exactness the boundaries of the land occupied by Chaboya; that they were well known and recognized by his neighbors, the Bernals and Narvaes; that at the "rodeos" of the adjoining ranchos the boundaries of the ranchos were mutually recognized and respected; and that during all the time the pueblo never molested him or denied his title. On his cross-examination, the witness states that he knows the boundaries of Chaboya's land by knowing those of the surrounding ranchos; and that when he (witness) had cattle on Bernal's rancho, they never, when giving a rodeo on the latter rancho, crossed the boundary line of Chaboya. James Alexander Forbes testifies that he recollects when Chaboya occupied his land two or three persons opposed his doing so, on the ground that it belonged to the pueblo of San José; that the dispute was referred to the prefect, who settled it in favor of Chaboya, on the report of the subprefect Suñol; that after this Chaboya was not molested, and has continued to occupy the land to this day. None of the facts testified to by these witnesses are denied or disputed; at least no testimony has been taken to contradict them. The case presented therefore is: Has the claimant by the permission to occupy, given by the governor, followed by his long occupation and cultivation of the land, such an equity as the United States ought to respect? It appears to me that he has. When the United States forces took possession of California in 1846, Chaboya was found, with his wife and family, living upon, cultivating and claiming to own a small piece of land (for Suñol swears it is about a league in extent), of which he had the undisputed possession for about nine years. Though he had never obtained a formal concession, yet he had occupied it first by permission of the prefect, and then by the permission of the governor, obtained seven years before. The governor himself testifies that he would have given Chaboya a definitive title if he had asked for it; thus negativing the idea that Chaboya failed to obtain it by reason of the governor to grant. From Chaboya's first occupation of the land to the present time, a period of twenty-two years has elapsed, during which he has been living on it with his wife and numerous family. It seems to me that such an ancient possession the United States are bound to respect.

If the equities of the case be alone considered, this claim has a far more substantial foundation than many of the claims which, under decisions of the supreme court, this court has felt itself obliged to confirm. It cannot be pretended that the bare reception of a title paper signed by the governor for lands which the petitioner never, until long after the conquest, occupied, or, perhaps, even saw, could create so strong an equity as the ancient occupation and cultivation, by permission of the authorities and with the acquiescence of all the neighbors, which are proved in this case. I therefore think that the claim should be confirmed for the tract of land occupied by the claimant, according to the boundaries thereof, as shown in the deposition of Antonio Suñol. A decree must be entered accordingly.

[For a subsequent proceeding in this litigation, see Case No. 14,769.]

Case No. 14,771.

UNITED STATES v. CHAFFEE.

[4 Ben. 330.] [1]

District Court, N. D. New York. Oct., 1870.

WITHHOLDING PENSION — CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE—PLEADING—GUARDIAN.

1. The last clause of the 13th section of the pension act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 389), is not limited to offences under that act, and an agent who withholds from a pensioner a pension, granted by an act passed subsequent to the act of July 4, 1864, is indictable under it.

2. Where a pension agent was found guilty, under that clause of the act of July 4, 1864, under an indictment, which alleged that two minor children were pensioners, and that the accused had been employed as agent of V., the guardian of the minors, to collect the pension, and that the pension had been paid to him, and that it was his duty to pay the same to the guardian, which he had refused to do; and the pension certificate, which was in evidence, showed that the pension was "payable to V., as guardian of the minors;" and a motion was made to arrest the judgment: Held, that the guardian might perhaps, on the certificate, be properly considered as the pensioner, in her representative capacity; but that this motion must be determined on the language of the indictment, and as the indictment alleged that the minors were the pensioners, and did not allege a withholding of the pension from them, but from V., it did not state any offence against the act, and the judgment must be arrested.

[This was an indictment against La Fayette Chaffee. Heard on motion in arrest of judgment.]

W. Dorsheimer, U. S. Atty.
Oscar Folsom, for defendant.

HALL, District Judge. The defendant was tried, at the present term, upon an indictment charging him with wrongfully withholding moneys received by him, as the attorney or agent of the guardian of two minors, in payment of the pension granted to such minors by the United States. He was found guilty, and thereupon moved in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the case is not within the 13th section of the act of July 4, 1864, on which the indictment is founded, because the act under which such pension was granted was not passed until after the passage of the act of 1864; and also on the ground that the indictment is insufficient to bring the case within the provisions of that section.

The indictment contains but a single count, by which the grand jurors, upon their oaths, present that one Stephen Williams was heretofore a private soldier, in the service of the United States of America; that on the 8th day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, said Stephen Williams died, by reason of wounds received and diseases contracted while in the service of the United States, as aforesaid, and in the line of duty, as aforesaid; that the said Stephen Williams, at the time of his death, as aforesaid, left two minor children, him surviving—to wit, John C. Williams, who will be sixteen years of age on the 8th day of December, A. D. 1871, and Emma J. Williams, who will be sixteen years of age on the 17th day of June, A. D. 1874; that one Julia Voelker, at the time of the finding of this indictment, was, and for more than two years prior thereto, has been the guardian of said minor children, duly appointed and qualified, and acting as such guardian of said John C. Williams and Emma J. Williams.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that, by reason aforesaid, the said minor children, John C. Williams and Emma J. Williams, and each of them, on the 8th day of May, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, became and were entitled to have and receive a pension from the United States of America, at the rate of eight dollars per month, and an additional sum of two dollars per month, for each of said minor children, until sixteen years of age, pursuant to, and by virtue of, an amendment to an act of congress, approved on the 14th day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two [12 Stat. 566], entitled 'An act to grant pensions.' That, on the 17th day of July, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, said pension, payable semi-annually at the rate aforesaid, to which the said minor children were entitled as aforesaid, had been duly granted and allowed by the United States of America, to said minor children. That on the fourth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, became and was justly entitled to have and receive from the United States of America a payment of said pension, amounting to the sum of two hundred and twenty dollars, and the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, had a just and lawful claim against the United States therefor, pursuant to the act of congress aforesaid.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that heretofore, to wit, before the 4th day of March, A. D. 1868, said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, did employ and authorize one La Fayette Chaffee, of Lockport, as her agent and attorney, and the said Julia Voelker did then and there duly execute and deliver to the said La Fayette Chaffee a sufficient power of attorney, to enable him to obtain and receive, from the said United States, said two hundred and twenty dollars, due to said minor children, and to said Julia Voelker, as aforesaid; and the said La Fayette Chaffee did then and there undertake and agree to and with the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, to obtain and receive the moneys aforesaid, due and payable as aforesaid, to said minor children, and to said Julia Voelker, by reason thereof, and to pay over and deliver to the said Julia Voelker the amount of the said pension due and payable to said minor children, and to her as aforesaid, and it was the duty of the said La Fayette Chaffee to pay over and deliver to said Julia Voelker, such guardian, as aforesaid, the amount of said pension, due and payable as aforesaid, when the same should be paid to him, said La Fayette Chaffee, pursuant to the act of congress, as aforesaid, and the power of attorney aforesaid.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that afterwards, to wit, before the eighth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, the said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent and attorney, as aforesaid, did make out, and cause to be executed, the papers necessary to enable said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, through her agent and attorney as aforesaid, to obtain and receive said two hundred and twenty dollars, such pension, due as aforesaid, and such proceedings were duly had in the premises, by the said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent and attorney, as aforesaid; that heretofore, and on the 8th day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, said two hundred and twenty dollars, due and payable, as aforesaid, to said minor children, and to said Julia Voelker, was duly paid by the United States to the said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent and attorney, as aforesaid, as and for and being the aforesaid pension, which the said minor children, and the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, was, as aforesaid, duly and justly entitled to have and receive, as aforesaid, from the United States of America; and it then and there became, and was, the duty of said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent and attorney, as aforesaid, to immediately pay over and deliver to the said Julia Voelker, such guardian, as aforesaid, said sum of two hundred and twenty dollars, such pension, as aforesaid, as he, the said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent, as aforesaid, then and there well knew.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that heretofore, and on divers days, and at divers times, between said eighth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, and the finding of this indictment, the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, at said Lockport aforesaid, duly demanded of and from the said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent and attorney, as aforesaid, the payment of the said sum of two hundred and twenty dollars, the said pension, due and payable to the minor children, and to said Julia Voelker, as aforesaid, but that the said La Fayette Chaffee, such agent and attorney, as aforesaid, has hitherto, and during all said times, refused, and still refuses, to pay over or deliver or to account to the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, the said sum of money, or any part thereof, except the sum of twenty dollars.

"And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that the said La Fayette Chaffee, of Lockport, of Niagara county, with force and arms, etc., heretofore, to wit, on the eighth day of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight, at said Lockport, of Niagara county, in said Northern district of New York, and within the jurisdiction of this court, and at divers and sundry times, between that day and the finding of this indictment, and while the said La Fayette Chaffee was such agent and attorney of the said Julia Voelker, guardian of said minor children, as aforesaid, did feloniously and wrongfully withhold from the said John C. Williams and Emma J. Williams such pensions, as aforesaid, and from the said Julia Voelker, such guardian, as aforesaid, a part of the aforesaid pension, so as aforesaid allowed, and due and payable, as aforesaid, to wit, two hundred dollars of said two hundred and twenty dollars, which had been so, as aforesaid, paid by the United States of America to the said La Fayette Chaffee, as said agent and attorney, as aforesaid, as and for the said pension of the said minor children, such pensioners, as aforesaid, and which was so, as aforesaid, due and payable to the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, and which it was the duty of him, the said La Fayette Chaffee, as such agent and attorney, as aforesaid, to have paid over to the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid, he, the said La Fayette Chaffee, agent and attorney, as aforesaid, at the time of his so withholding the aforesaid part of the said pension then and there, to wit, at Lockport aforesaid, in the district and within the jurisdiction aforesaid, well knowing such last-mentioned withholding of the aforesaid pension to be wrongful and unlawful, contrary to the statute of the United States of America in such case made and provided, against the peace of the United States and their dignity."

The act of July 14th, 1862, referred to in the indictment, provides for granting pensions in certain cases, and the act of July 4, 1864—which is entitled, "An act supplementary to the act of 1862"—also provides for granting pensions in some cases not provided for in the act of 1862; but neither provides for the grant of a pension to the children of a deceased soldier, after the marriage of his widow who had been entitled to receive a pension during her widowhood.

After several sections, modifying, in several respects, the then existing laws in regard to pensions, the 13th section of the act of 1864 provides, "that any agent or attorney who shall directly or indirectly demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act than is prescribed in the preceding section of this act, or who shall contract or agree to prosecute any claim for a pension, bounty, or other allowance, under this act, on the condition that he shall receive a per centum upon any portion of the amount of such claim, or who shall wrongfully withhold from a pensioner, or other claimant, the whole or any part of the pension or claim allowed and due to such pensioner or claimant, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall, for every such offence, be fined, not exceeding three hundred dollars, or imprisoned, at hard labor, not exceeding two years, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravation of the offence."

On the 3d of March, 1865 [13 Stat. 499], by an act entitled, "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," it was provided (section 4), "That if any officer or other person named in the first section of an act entitled, 'An act to grant pensions,' approved July fourteen, eighteen hundred and sixty-two, has died since the fourth day of March, eighteen hundred and sixty-one, or shall hereafter die, by reason of any wound received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States, and in the line of duty, his widow, or if there be no widow, or in case of her death or marriage, without payment to her of any part of the pension hereinafter mentioned, his child or children, under sixteen years of age, shall be entitled to receive the same pension as the husband or father would have been entitled to under said act, had he been totally disabled, to commence from the death of the husband or father, and to continue to the widow during her widowhood, or to the child or children until they severally attain the age of sixteen years, and no longer. Provided, that when such pension has been, or shall hereafter be, paid to the widow, such child or children shall only be entitled to receive the pension, to commence from the death or marriage of such widow, and to continue as aforesaid." It was under the provisions of this act that the pension referred to in the indictment was granted.

Under the several statutes above referred to, it was insisted, by the counsel for the defendant, that the judgment ought to be arrested, on the grounds before stated. These grounds will be considered in their order.

It is very clear that the 13th section of the act of 1864, before alluded to, is limited in its operation, so far as the first two classes of the offences punishable under that section are concerned; but this results from the fact that, in respect to each of these classes, the words "under this act" are appropriately and expressly used for that purpose. These words are omitted, ex industria, in that part of the section under which the indictment in this case was intended to be framed; and there are no other words of limitation or restriction to limit its operation to pensions granted under the same act. The term "pensioner" is general, and as there is no limitation or restriction in this part of the section (as there was in the other parts of it), the withholding of a pension granted under an act subsequently passed is clearly an offence under this section, as much as if it had been granted under the provisions of the act of 1864.

The other question is a more serious one, and may not be entirely free from doubt. So far as the offence of withholding a pension is concerned, the 13th section of the act of 1864 provides for the punishment of a party who wrongfully withholds, from a pensioner, the whole or any part of the pension allowed and due to such pensioner, and does not in any way provide for any other case of withholding a pension. Now the indict ment, in this case, in the statements made by way of inducement, avers that the minor children of the deceased soldier became and were entitled to the pension therein mentioned; that it had been duly granted and allowed by the United States to such minor children; and, although there is some lan guage in this portion of the indictment which would indicate that the person who drew the indictment had some vague idea that the indictment might be supported upon the ground that Mrs. Voelker, the guardian of the minor children, was a claimant, and had a claim against the United States, which the defendant had withheld, the portion of the indictment which directly charges the offence, only charges the offence of withholding from the pensioners and their guardian a part of the pension before referred to, and not the wrongfully withholding of a claim from the guardian, as a claimant. Withholding the pension from the pensioners is therefore the offence, if any, charged in the indictment In directly charging the offence, it is alleged that while the said La Fayette Chaffee was such agent and attorney of the said Julia Voelker, guardian of said minor children, "he feloniously and wrongfully withheld from the said John C. Williams and said Emma J. Williams, such pensioners, as aforesaid, and from the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian," a part of such pension, which (the indictment alleges) was due and payable to the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid; and which (as the indictment also alleges) it was the duty of him, the said La Fayette Chaffee, as such agent and attorney aforesaid, to have paid over to the said Julia Voelker, as such guardian, as aforesaid. The indictment had before alleged, by way of inducement, that the defendant was employed as the attorney and agent of such guardian (not of the minor children); that said Julia Voelker (without adding as such guardian) executed and delivered to said defendant a power of attorney to enable him to obtain and receive such pension; that the pension had been paid to him as such agent and attorney; that it was the duty of the defendant to pay the moneys received to such guardian. The demand of payment alleged is a demand to pay to her, as such guardian, and the refusal to pay alleged is a refusal to pay to her as guardian. If, then, as is expressly stated, both by way of inducement, and in directly charging the offence, it was the duty of the defendant to pay the moneys received to the guardian, it was not his duty to pay them to the pensioners. There could be no wrongful or unlawful withholding of the pension from the pensioners; for, upon the face and frame and language of the indictment, they were not entitled to receive it from the defendant, or even otherwise, except as it might be paid to them by a guardian appointed by and responsible to the state authorities.

It is suggested, in the written brief or argument furnished by the second assistant of the district attorney, since the oral argument of the motion, and since the above was written, that, "by the express terms of the pension certificate, introduced in evidence, the pension was payable to Julia Voelker, as guardian of the minor children;" that the guardian was the only person who could authorize an agent to procure the pension money from the United States, and the only person who could properly demand, from the agent, the money in question; and that she was the only person to whom the agent was authorized to pay the money; and that the words, "and Julia Voelker, such guardian, as aforesaid," in the charging clause, may be rejected as surplusage, as the indictment expressly charges that the pension money was withheld from the children.

The fact in regard to the terms of the pension certificate may be as stated; and perhaps the guardian may, in that case, be properly considered as the pensioner, in her representative capacity; but if so, it can make no difference upon this motion. The motion in arrest must necessarily be determined upon the allegations of the indictment alone. The indictment, as has been seen, alleges that the minor children were the persons entitled to the pension, and that it was granted to them, and not to their guardian; and they are expressly designated as the pensioners throughout the indictment. If the indict ment had been differently drawn, in accordance with the fact suggested, a different question would have been presented; but, as the case now stands, the judgment must be arrested.

Case No. 14,772.

UNITED STATES v. CHAFFEE et al.

[2 Bond, 110.] [1]

District Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1867.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTION OF FRAUD.

It is not competent for the government to prove as a fact from which fraud may be presumed, that the pecuniary circumstances of a distiller were apparently improved while engaged in distilling during a period when such business was not profitable.

This was a suit by the United States, in which a large amount was claimed for unpaid duties on whisky manufactured by defendants [Highland D. Chaffee and others] at Tippecanoe, in Ohio, which it was alleged was sold by them in fraud of the internal revenue laws. A great mass of testimony was introduced, and the case occupied the court and jury for upward of five weeks. The charge of the court was necessarily of great length, and would occupy too much space for a full report. One question arose in the progress of the case believed to be novel in its character, which the reporter thinks it proper to publish. That question was, in substance, whether in a suit charging fraud in a distiller in failing to pay the legal tax on manufactured whisky, it is competent for the government to prove as a fact from which the alleged fraud may be presumed, that the defendants, in a comparatively brief period, while distilling was unprofitable, amassed sufficient wealth to produce a marked change in their pecuniary circumstances. The court overruled the inquiry, and stated the following as the grounds of its decision.

Durbin Ward, Dist. Atty.

Job E. Stevenson and John Dunlevy, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is a new question, so far at least as this court is concerned, and no authorities have been produced which throw any light upon it. The question is asked of the witness upon the stand, whether within a given time stated to him, the business of distilling, honestly conducted, was profitable or otherwise. And the district attorney has stated that this question, if admitted, is to open the door to further investigation in regard to the pecuniary circumstances of these defendants at one period of their lives as compared with their circumstances at another time. And the question is, whether this line of investigation shall be gone into. It is to be observed in the first place, that though this is a case in the name of the government of the United States, the rules of evidence which must control the action of the court and jury are precisely the same as in a controversy between individuals. The government is entitled to no immunity from the operation of principles of law applicable to judicial trial. It is incumbent on the government to substantiate the allegations set forth in the declaration upon which it seeks to hold the parties implicated liable. There are, in the declaration under which this case is proceeding, certain allegations of fraud committed by these defendants, with a view to evade the just payments of duties owing from them as manufacturers of whisky. We have heard much of whisky frauds committed in various parts of the country, and there is no doubt that they have been very extensive, and have operated greatly to the injury of the finances of the government, as well as prejudicially to others who are honestly pursuing that business. These considerations, however, have no relevancy to the strict legal question now propounded to the court. However desirable it may be (and I concur fully with all that is said in regard to the desirableness of exposing these frauds and holding those responsible who have committed them), the rules of evidence, as recognized by courts and applicable to judicial proceedings, can not be departed from for the purpose of reaching such cases. It is better that parties charged with these frauds should escape than that the well-settled rules of law in regard to judicial trials should be violated. The objection—and as it seems to me a conclusive one—against the investigation proposed is this: that it involves a clear infraction of a rule of evidence applicable to judicial trials, which is that mere collateral issues are to be avoided. And this rule is founded not only on principle, but upon expediency. It must necessarily lead to investigations that would be almost interminable in their duration, if evidence is admitted outside of the merits of the case, or which, if it bears at all upon the issue, is so remote in its operation that it would be entitled to no weight with the jury. Courts invariably exclude that kind of testimony. Now the objection to going into the inquiry whether these defendants have made money in their distilling operations is that it would lead to collateral investigations which would be without end. In this case there are four individuals charged as implicated in this fraud. The investigation proposed would necessarily lead to an inquiry into the pecuniary concerns and business transactions of each of these four individuals, and it would lead, furthermore, into a general inquiry as to the profits of distilling. This would also necessarily open the door to the examination of all the distillers in this region upon the point whether the business within certain periods of time was profitable or otherwise. Now, in the view I have suggested, it seems to me that this line of investigation can not be entered upon. It would moreover necessarily lead to the inquiry whether these defendants had other sources of profit arising from other business, or from speculation; whether in fact they had other means of accumulating property independent of their distilling operations. I freely concede to the counsel for the government that there might be indications so clear and so marked, that to a certain extent evidence of this kind might be adduced. These parties, however, are not charged criminally. They are not charged with embezzlement. That crime is where an individual fraudulently and feloniously appropriates property belonging to another to his own use; that is the definition of that offense; but clearly there can be no pretense that that charge is involved as against the defendants. The property in question was theirs, subject, of course, to the claim for the duties and taxes imposed by law; but it was their property, and within their control, under certain statutory limitations, and there can be no pretense of a charge of embezzlement against them. Now, the case referred to by the United States attorney, and of which I have an indistinct recollection, having seen it briefly reported in a paper, I believe, was an indictment against a quartermaster for embezzling the property of the United States, and appropriating it to his own use and benefit. The district attorney is right in saying that in that case the court before which it was tried admitted evidence to show that this quartermaster had been previously in limited pecuniary circumstances, and that very suddenly his position with regard to pecuniary matters seemed to be changed, and instead of living in an humble, and economical way, the proof was, if I remember right, that he had taken a very expensive house in the city of New York; that it was superbly furnished; that he kept a carriage, and had outriders, and was living in a style altogether beyond the reach of one who received but a limited salary. Under these circumstances it is not strange that the court should have received the testimony upon a charge of embezzlement of public property, but it is quite clear that the principles of that case are not applicable to the present. This is, in form at least, a civil action; and as I observed before, the government is bound to prove the allegations upon which it predicts the charge of fraud. It must furnish data to the jury, by which they can estimate the amount due the government from the defendants charged with having fraudulently reported the amount of whisky they have distilled; and the mere circumstance, if it be true, that these parties have accumulated a fortune within the last few years, seems to me so remote in its bearing upon the issue presented to the jury as to be inadmissible. There is an objection, and a very decided one, to the admission of testimony as to public rumor, in regard to the pecuniary circumstances of these defendants. Public opinion and mere rumors are wholly unreliable as to the pecuniary circumstances of men. There is a very strong tendency in the public mind, for some reason that I can not wholly explain, to overrate the wealth and the pecuniary condition of men in the community; and such testimony, I think, should never go to a jury to establish that fact. Upon the whole, without going further into the consideration of this question, on the ground I have indicated, that it must involve, necessarily, collateral facts and issues not pertaining to the issue upon which the jury are to pass, I consider that the evidence is not admissible.

The general principle on this subject is very clearly stated by Mr. Greenleaf in treating of the admissibility of evidence. He lays it down as a rule that all evidence must be pertinent to the issue; and evidence of collateral facts, which affords no reasonable presumption or inference as to the principal fact or matter in dispute, must be excluded. The principal fact, or matter in dispute here, is the alleged fraud charged against these defendants—that they have been fortunate in their business operations, or otherwise, it seems to me, is so remote from this issue as not to be admitted as evidence.

Case No. 14,773.

UNITED STATES v. CHAFFEE et al.

[2 Bond, 147.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1868.

NEW TRIAL—VERDICT AGAINST EVIDENCE—JOINT ACTION—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE—CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE—CORRUPT JUROR.

1. A motion for a new trial is an appeal to the discretion of the court, and if there are any grounds for the apprehension that injustice has been done to the defendants, by a verdict for a large amount found against them by the jury, and that a different result would follow from a second trial, it is the duty of the court to grant it.

2. If, in a joint action of tort, a verdict is rendered against all the defendants, when as to one there was no evidence, it is a verdict against evidence, and may be set aside on that ground.

3. Where, in an action in tort, against several defendants, they sever in their pleas, and assert different defenses to the suit, if a verdict is returned against all, and there is no testimony against one, the case may be non prossed as to him, and judgment entered against the others.

4. There are authorities that where the plea is joint this may be done, but as to that point there is some conflict. If this was the only ground of exception to this verdict the court would overrule it, and refuse a new trial upon the agreement of the district attorney to enter a nolle prosequi as to William M. Chaffee.

5. Where a jury give credence to the testimony of two witnesses for the United States as against the testimony of nine unimpeached witnesses for the defendants, they decide against the weight of the evidence, and it is a ground for a new trial.

6. The doctrine is, that testimony merely cumulative does not, in general, afford a sufficient ground for a new trial, but in a case of great importance, involving large interests, courts have given a liberal construction to the rule, and received such testimony on an application for a new trial.

7. The law does not tolerate the slightest taint of corruption, or the least impropriety of conduct on the part of a juror, and proof that one juror has disregarded the obligations resting upon him and has acted corruptly so infects a verdict with fraud as to make it a nullity.

[This was an action of debt by the United States against Highland D. Chaffee and others for the penalty for the illegal manufacture of whisky. See Case No. 14,772. There was a verdict in favor of the United States for $253,200. Case unreported. The case is now heard upon motion for new trial.]

Durbin Ward, Dist. Atty.

Job E. Stevenson, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is a motion, by the defendants, to set aside the verdict returned in this case, and for a new trial. There are numerous grounds stated as the predicate of this motion. In stating the conclusions of the court, it will not be necessary to notice, in detail, all the grounds set forth in the motion on file. I shall refer only to those that seem to be conclusive as to the proper action of the court.

It may be remarked, preliminarily, that the suit was instituted jointly against the defendants, for an alleged fraud committed by them, in failing, as distillers, to make due returns of, and pay the duties upon, whisky manufactured by them at their distillery at Tippecanoe, in this state, whereby they incurred a penalty of four dollars a gallon on the spirits which they did not return, and on which they did not pay the legal duty. On the trial, the district attorney abandoned the first and second counts of the declaration, and the case was submitted to the jury on the third count only, which alleged, in substance, that, between February 1, 1865, and September 1, 1866, the defendants manufactured and had on hand twenty-four thousand nine hundred gallons of distilled spirits, subject to a duty of two dollars on each gallon, which they fraudulently sold or disposed of, without making a return of the same, and without paying the legal tax thereon; whereby they incurred a penalty of four dollars on each gallon, amounting in the whole to $99,600. The defendants joined in a plea of not guilty, and the case was submitted to the jury on that issue. After a prolonged and laborious investigation of the facts, and extended arguments of counsel, the jury returned a verdict against the defendants for $253,200. It may be aptly remarked here that on a motion to set aside a verdict for so large a sum, involving, as it does, the entire pecuniary means of all the defendants, and so largely in excess of the amount claimed by the United States, on the count of the declaration upon which the case was put to the jury, the court is under stringent obligations to exercise some measure of liberality in passing on the motion for a new trial. The motion is an appeal to the discretion of the court, and if there are any grounds for the apprehension that injustice has been done to the defendants in the large amount found against them by the jury, and that a different result would follow from a second trial, it is the duty of the court to grant it.

One reason prominently urged by the defendants' counsel as a ground for the present motion, is that the verdict is excessive, and against the weight of the evidence. In support of this reason, it is urged, first, that against William M. Chaffee, one of the defendants, there was no evidence implicating him in the alleged fraud; second, that as against the other defendants, the verdict is greatly in excess of the amount for which the defendants, from the weight of the testimony, can be held liable. In reference to the verdict as against the defendant, William M. Chaffee, it is not controverted by the counsel for the United States, that there was no evidence which connected him with the alleged frauds. It is clear from the testimony that the evidence did not justify a verdict against him, and that as to him the verdict should have been not guilty. In its charge to the jury, the court distinctly stated that if they found the evidence of the fraud charged did not prove the fact as to one or more of the defendants, and that the other defendants were guilty, they were authorized to return their verdict to meet that case. The jury, acting on the principle, as the court is advised, that as all the defendants had joined in a plea of not guilty, all were jointly responsible if fraud was made out against any of them, returned their verdict, without any discrimination in favor of William M. Chaffee. Now, the law is, that if, in a joint action, a verdict is rendered against all the defendants, when as to one there was no evidence, it is a verdict against evidence, and may be set aside on that ground. But it is proposed by the district attorney in case the verdict shall not be set aside, to enter a nolle prosequi as to William M. Chaffee, and take a judgment against the other defendants. The question whether a nolle prosequi can be entered, and judgment taken on the verdict against the other defendants, has been investigated by counsel, and many authorities have been cited in their briefs. I do not propose to notice the numerous references made to the books touching this question. I have, however, carefully looked at the authorities, and find they are not harmonious on the point. Where, in an action in tort against several defendants, they sever in their pleas, and assert different defenses to the suit, if a verdict is returned against all, and there is no testimony against one or more, the case may be non prossed as to such, and judgment entered against the others. There are authorities that where the plea is joint this may be done. But as to that point there is some conflict.

If this was the only ground of exception to this verdict, the court would overrule it and refuse a new trial, upon the agreement of the district attorney to enter a nolle prosequi as to William M. Chaffee. I shall now consider the question whether the verdict is against the weight of evidence as to all the defendants. And, on this point, it may be proper to observe that the question is not whether the United States, on the evidence, was entitled to a verdict, but whether, in estimating the evidence and finding so large an amount against the defendants by the jury, their verdict is not against the preponderance of the testimony.

As before stated, the claim of the United States is that the defendants, between the dates mentioned, manufactured whisky largely in excess of the quantity returned for taxation, and on which the duties were paid. And evidence was offered to the jury of large quantities shipped by them to various points by railroads and by canals. The quantity thus shipped greatly exceeded the quantity returned for taxation. This excess, as claimed by the district attorney, was about 1,245 barrels, and he contended that the defendants were liable to the penalty of $4 per gallon on the quantity. It must be conceded that the evidence on which this estimate was based was not of the most conclusive character. The government resorted to the only mode by which the shipments could be proved, namely, the freight books of the canal collectors and the books and papers of different railroad offices, and of the commercial houses to which the whisky had been consigned. From the character of this evidence, the liability to a duplication of the shipments, and other errors liable to occur from the extent of the transactions, it was obvious to the court that it was not of the most reliable character. The jury supposed they were justifiable in the conclusion that the quantity of whisky shipped by defendants was greatly beyond that returned as made, and on which the duties were paid, and for this excess they returned their verdict, estimating such excess at $1 per gallon, producing a total of upward of $250,000. On the trial, the government, in offering testimony in chief, examined two witnesses upon the question whether the defendants had any whisky on hand in the fall of 1865. In their defense, the counsel for the defendants assumed that the defendants at that date had a large quantity on hand, which had been duly inspected, but was retained by them for sale in expectation of a more favorable state of the whisky market. And they claimed that the quantity thus proved to be on hand, deducted from the excess of shipments above the quantity returned for taxation, and on which the taxes were paid, would leave but a small deficiency on which the tax had not been paid. And they claim on this motion that the jury erred in not estimating by their verdict the whisky on hand, and in returning a verdict for the whole difference between the whisky shipped and that on which the tax had been paid, and that thus the amount of the verdict was excessive and unjust. Without reviewing the authorities on this point, it is only necessary to say, it is not only within the just discretion of the court to grant a new trial, but its imperative duty to do so, if the jury have misconceived the testimony in the matter referred to, or returned a verdict against the weight of that testimony. Now, as to the whisky on hand in the fall of 1865, as before noticed, two witnesses were examined by the United States. One testified positively there was none, and one negatively that he saw none. There were some unimportant facts urged to the jury, as corroborative of this evidence. On the other hand, there were eight or nine witnesses for the defendants who testified that they saw a large quantity on hand upon the premises of the defendants. The estimates of the witnesses as to this quantity varied from 1,000 to 1,500 barrels. With one exception, there was no attempt to impeach the credibility of these witnesses.

It would seem the jury, in making their verdict, made a deduction of 190 barrels, as on hand in November, 1865, and rejected the testimony of the defendants proving a much larger quantity. Now, from the above statement, it is obvious in doing this they decided against the weight of evidence on the point adverted to. They seem to have given credence to the two witnesses for the government, while they repudiated the testimony of the nine for the defendants. Where this was probably the case, it is a ground for a new trial. 27 Me. 357; 16 Ill. 495; 3 Grah. & W. New Trial, 1208; 5 Ohio, 245; 13 Mass. 507. In connection with the objection to the verdict, that it is against the weight of the evidence as to the quantity of whisky on hand at the time referred to, it may be proper to add that on this motion for a new trial, the defendants have offered the affidavits of some ten or fifteen persons, residents of Tippecanoe, where the distillery is located, or its vicinity, to the effect that having the opportunity of knowing the fact, there was on the premises of the defendants a large quantity of whisky prior to, and in the autumn of 1865. These persons were not witnesses at the trial, and their statements may be said to be cumulative in their character, and, therefore, not to be considered on this motion. The doctrine is assented to, that testimony merely cumulative does not in general afford a sufficient ground for a new trial. But in a case of great importance and involving large interests, courts have sometimes given a liberal construction to the rule, and received such testimony on an application for a new trial. If its effect, in the present case, is to show beyond any reasonable doubt, that the defendants had a large stock of whisky on hand in October, 1865, it may be considered on this motion. 3 Grah. & W. New Trial, 1055, and the authorities there cited. Every principle of justice seems to sustain this doctrine as applicable to the motion before the court, and leaves no doubt in the mind of the court that a new trial ought to be granted in this case.

There are other facts disclosed by the affidavits filed by the defendants in support of this motion, which are entitled to consideration, and are not without weight in its decision. To these I propose briefly to advert: It appears from the affidavit of Christopher Huffman that he was summoned and examined on the trial, as a witness for the defendants, and stated that he did not then recollect of any liquor being in the back grain-room; that after he left the witness-stand he remembered the fact that there was grain in that room, and requested to be recalled, and the defendants wished him to remain in the city till next morning for that purpose; that having been severely injured by the railroad accident near Lockland, and fearing his family would be anxious about him, he returned to his home at Tippecanoe, intending to come back to Cincinnati in time to be re-examined; but after getting home his wound became so much worse that he was unable to return. The affiant accounts for his failure to remember the fact adverted to, when examined as a witness, from his excitement and his severe bodily pain at the time. It is impossible for the court to know what influence the testimony of the witness might have had on the minds of the jury. But the fact which he failed to remember when examined, was pertinent to the issue and important for the defendants. Without any negligence or default on their part they were deprived of the benefit of the witness' testimony by the occurrence of a providential event, beyond their control. Under such circumstances, even a possibility that his evidence would have produced an effect with the jury favorable to the defendants, affords a strong reason for giving them the benefit of his testimony on a retrial of the case. The affidavit of John Gunn also discloses facts tending clearly to the conclusion that justice demands that the case should be submitted to another jury for consideration. The affiant states that he was summoned as a witness by the United States, and examined as such on the trial; that after his examination he was summoned by the defendants as a witness in their behalf; that in coming from his home at Tippecanoe, he was so severely injured by the railroad disaster near Lockland, that he was unable to appear in court during the progress of the trial; that he would have sworn as a witness that in the fall of 1865, and for some time previously, the defendants had a stock of whisky on hand, though he can not state precisely how much. This is another instance of the defendants being deprived of what may have been very important testimony in their behalf, as the result of the railroad accident, and without any negligence on their part.

There is also an important fact appearing from the affidavits of Truman L. Trask and H. R. Landmier, composing the firm of Landmier & Trask, who, in 1866, were commission merchants in Cincinnati. On the trial, Landmier was examined as a witness for the government, and proved a shipment of 150 barrels of whisky to the house in July, 1866, by the defendants. He was not then able to state the date when the whisky was received, the canal-boat on which it was shipped, or any other particulars relating to the transaction. He now states that since his examination as a witness, he is enabled to remember the date of the receipt of the whisky, the canal-boat on which it was shipped, and the quantity received. He also distinctly remembers that the 150 barrels of whisky shipped to his house by the defendants was bonded whisky. Trask says in his affidavit that he bought the whisky of the defendants on July 17, 1866, as in bond; that it was shipped on the canal-boat Marie Louise, consigned to Grotenkemper & Co., of Cincinnati, who had a bonded warehouse, and received a few days after the date named; that the 150 barrels, after being inspected, were sold. This affidavit also states that during the latter part of the trial of this case, he was ill and away from home for two weeks, and was unable to attend to business until the trial was closed. There is every reason to suppose that on the testimony submitted to the jury, they included in their estimate of whisky shipped by defendants, on which the tax was unpaid, the 150 barrels purchased by Landmier & Trask, being bonded whisky, and which was consigned to the bonded warehouse of Grotenkemper & Co., and which, after being inspected, was sold. It could not be sold without the tax being first paid; and if paid, it was clearly erroneous to charge the defendants with the penalty of $4 per gallon on this whisky. This would be an item of about $36,000, to which, upon the supposition that the tax has been paid, the defendants were not liable. If there are reasonable grounds for the inference that this error has occurred in the verdict of the jury, if there were no other grounds for a new trial, it would, of itself, be sufficient reason for a retrial of the case. The facts disclosed by the affidavits may be classed under the head of newly discovered evidence, which, when material, is always a ground for a new trial. 1 Grah. & W. New Trial, 492; 3 Grah. & W. New Trial, 1049, 1057.

It is unnecessary to pursue this view any further. Motions for new trials are addressed to the sound discretion of the court; and this discretion, by all the more modern decisions, is more liberally exercised than formerly. At this day the courts grant new trials freely where it appears reasonably certain that the verdict is against the weight of evidence, or a party has been surprised at the trial, or has been deprived of his evidence by accident or other similar cause. And this is especially the case in suits where the amount involved is large, or the character of parties implicated. Kohne v. Insurance Co. of North America [Case No. 7,921]. In the case just cited—Kohne v. Ins. Co. of North America—the remarks of Mr. Justice Washington on the subject of new trials are very clearly stated and are cheerfully adopted as the views of this court. The learned judge says: "I certainly shall always respect the opinion of the jury, so far as not to set aside their verdict in a doubtful case, because I might have drawn a conclusion different from what they have done. But, if the verdict be plainly against evidence, or if, in a case of great consequence, as this certainly is, where some doubt might exist as to the correctness of the conclusions drawn by the jury, it would seem right that the case should be more deliberately argued and considered by another; it is certainly most consistent with the objects of justice to afford such an opportunity. I can not conceive how the granting of a new trial can impair the benefits of a jury trial. If by setting aside the verdict the consequence would be a judgment contrary to it, the position would be correct, but this is not the case. The cause is merely reheard before a new jury, when it may be more deliberately considered." As, in my judgment, a new trial should be granted on the grounds referred to, it is wholly unnecessary to refer to or consider all the other reasons stated in the motion of the defendants' counsel.

There is one other ground urged by the defendants for a new trial, to which it will be proper to advert. This is, the alleged corrupt attempt of one of the jurors to procure from the defendants a pecuniary reward as a consideration for his influence and efforts to obtain a verdict favorable to them. I do not propose to notice the facts before the court in reference to this charge. I am gratified in stating that there is no direct imputation of corruption as against any other member of the jury than the one referred to. And I am clear in stating that if the facts alleged against him are satisfactorily proved, it would be a sufficient ground for setting aside the verdict. The law does not tolerate the slightest taint of corruption or the least impropriety of conduct on the part of a juror, charged under oath to render a just verdict according to the law and the evidence. And proof that even one juror has disregarded the solemn obligation resting upon him, and has acted corruptly, so infects a verdict with fraud as to make it a nullity. But in looking at the facts before the court, touching the conduct of the juror referred to, the charge is not so clearly established as to justify the conclusion of his guilt. While there are certainly grounds of suspicion against him, the circumstances proved leave his guilt so doubtful as not to afford a proper predicate for the action urged by the defendants' counsel in relation to the pending motion. And as other reasons stated are sufficient in the judgment of the court to set aside the verdict and award a second trial, there is no necessity for a more extended notice of the ground now referred to.

I will just add, in conclusion, that the features of this case seem to require the exercise of liberality in passing on the motion for a new trial. The verdict of the jury is for a very large amount, and implicates the defendants as guilty of an enormous fraud upon the government. If there is any reasonable ground for the inference that upon a second trial the defendants can show that their liability has been exaggerated, and relieve their characters from the dark shadow now resting upon them, it is but just and equitable, for the reason indicated, that they should have the opportunity of doing so. The government will suffer nothing by the delay resulting from a second trial. It should ask for nothing from any of its citizens to which it is not justly and legally entitled; and if a wrong has been committed these defendants, the representatives of the government should rejoice in having it rectified. There can be no ground of complaint in awarding a new trial, in which the case may be submitted to another impartial jury. A new trial is awarded on payment, by the defendants, of all the costs which have accrued in the case. These costs to be paid within thirty days.

[NOTE. Upon the new trial the jury found a verdict against the defendants for the sum of $235,680. Case No. 14,774. From the judgmet entered upon this verdict a writ of error was sued out in the supreme court, which reversed the judgment and remanded the case for a new trial. 18 Wall. (88 U. S.) 516.]

UNITED STATES v. CHAFFEE et al.

[17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 116; 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 110.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1870.[1]

EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS—INTERNAL REVENUE—ACTION FOR PENALTY.

1. Evidence which is in itself inconclusive derives a conclusive quality from mere defect of proof on the part of the adversary, or of the accused. Thus, where the government prosecutes for the penalty for the nonpayment of a tax on a quantity of whisky manufactured, and the testimony of the government did not amount to an absolutely conclusive character; was such, in fact, that the defence, if made in good faith, would have been assisted by the production of the books of the concern, and they were not produced, the law presumes against such party, and the jury is authorized to resolve all doubts adversely to his defence.

[Cited in Currar v. Munger, Case No. 3,487.]

2. The same rule is applicable where a party once had proof in his power which has been voluntarily destroyed, or placed beyond his reach.

3. When testimony of a damaging nature is given and defendant is by and makes no denial, all doubts are resolved against him.

The defendants were distillers at Tippecanoe, Miami county, Ohio, and the firm was composed of H. D. Chaffee, since deceased, Rue P. Hutchins, and Sidney L. Chaffee. This suit was an action in debt, brought by the United States, to recover of the defendants the sum of one million of dollars penalty, under the 48th section of the act of June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof, for having in their possession, and unlawfully selling, large quantities of distilled spirits, with intent to evade the payment of the duties imposed by law thereon. The declaration contained three counts, two of which were abandoned by the plaintiffs upon the trial, and the third count was the only one upon which the counsel for the government relied for a verdict.

[At the former trial of this case the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the United States for the sum of $253,200. (Case unreported.) Upon motion the court set aside this verdict, and granted a new trial. Case No. 14,773.]

Follet & Wright, for defendants.

EMMONS, Circuit Judge (charging jury). I have no doubt that it will cause common congratulation that this very long and tedious trial is drawing so near its close. We have detained you only some eleven and a half working days, enabling the court and the jury in the intervals, I trust, to be relieved, not only from the irksomeness of the trial, but the disadvantages of continuous absence from other duties. High praise is due to counsel for this. Much has been gained in time by concessions which we had no right in law to call upon them to make, and it is gratifying to the court, in looking over the trial, to feel entire confidence that no one fact has been omitted which more time would have developed. We know just as much about the case as if we had, as on the former trial, consumed five weeks in its investigation. Certainly, the zeal and the untiring industry of the defendants' counsel exclude every complaint on the part of their clients; and I need not say that I think the government has nothing to complain of, in view of what its learned counsel has done.

The issues before you are very much simplified by the mutual admission that the time within which this wrong has been committed was between October, 1865, and September, 1866, a period of about ten months. It is also conceded that the amount of whisky on hand in October shall be credited to the defendants. That is, the government must show not only that they have sold more during the ten months than they paid tax on, but also than this amount when added to that which they had on hand. It is not quite so simple as this, because you will take into consideration whether, at the expiration of this period, they still had on hand some portion of that which they possessed in October, 1865. In round numbers, I think, the proof clearly shows, and perhaps it may be stated as a concession, that the tax has been paid on about 6,000 barrels. The government claims to show a sale of about 9,000, showing a surplus of some 3,000 barrels, or, in round numbers, some 188,000 gallons, on which the claim of the government for tax and penalty is about $750,000. That is the government's claim. The defendants reply that it is admitted they have paid taxes on some 6,000; that they proved they had on hand some 2,000 or 2,500 barrels; and although this would leave a balance of illicit whisky to be accounted for, still they insist the government has failed to show the manufacture of the whole amount of 9,000 barrels, and that, after a fair balancing of testimony, the jury ought to find that the defendants sold no whisky whatever in violation of law.

In a general way the government have shown by the consignees' testimony some 6,000 barrels, and by the way-bills and canal books some 3,000, making up the 9,000. They claim to show by the mash book the capacity of the distillery to be somewhere in the vicinity of double that necessary to produce the quantity which they actually paid a tax on. By consultation of this book it seems the average run of the distillery during the ten months, as reported, was about four hundred bushels; and turning to the earlier stages of its operations we find many months when it was seven and eight hundred, and more, bushels. It is for you to say, from the testimony, whether the capacity of the distillery was or was not what the government claims it to be. If you so find it, you will then come to the conclusion that there was power on the part of the defendants to commit the offence with which they are charged. It is claimed that the evidence of these consignees, and especially the testimony of the way-bills, is very delusive; that it tends to duplication, and that you will be very likely to charge these defendants twice over with the same amount. So far as the nature of this testimony is concerned, there has been, in modern times, a very great change of opinion, and I do not know that if I should search all the books I ever read, or call to mind all my experience at the bar, I could select a more fitting instance to illustrate my own opinion of the respective values of these two classes of testimony than the contrast between the persuasive effect of memoranda, made in the ordinary course of business, by those who have no motive to falsify, whose duty it was to record them at the time the transactions took place, on the one hand; and, on the other, the grossly conflicting verbal testimony given in this case as to the amount of whisky on hand in October, 1865. Compare the two, and see upon which, in its own nature, as men of common sense, you can repose your credence with most confidence. The one is plain, simple and direct, without a motive of falsification. The other presents a spectacle like this: a phalanx of twenty men swearing on their oaths to some two thousand barrels of whisky at a given time in a given place; and two-thirds as many, equally intelligent and equally respectable, with equal opportunities of knowledge, swearing there are not fifty barrels there. It is a hopeless conflict, leaving the mind in uncertainty, with nothing whatever to rest upon.

It is, however, before you, and you will look carefully over its details, give due weight to the ingenious and able criticisms which have been made by the distinguished counsel for the defendants, give the same consideration to that which has been given by the learned counsel for the government, and resting there, stopping with the proof put in on the part of the government, say whether, if the defendants had given no proof whatever, you believe a plausible, reasonably proved case was made out. Would you have felt at liberty, on your oaths, to have acquitted the defendants if they had given no proof whatever? If you will pursue this order of investigation it will enable you, I think, more easily to follow that course which, in my estimation, is demanded by well settled principles in the law of evidence. The first question which arises is, do you believe the consignees? They are wholly unimpeached. We have no suggestions made by the defendants, either by argument or by evidence, that they swore untruly. The only liability to error is the danger of duplication.

The way-bills, the railroad shipments, the canal books, are attacked, not so much on account of what they say as the danger that they may speak twice upon the same subject. But it would seem to me that such a mistake is wholly unnecessary. The date, the quantities shipped, the shipments themselves, the consignees' names, all unite in preventing confusion. After much reflection, I am unable to call to mind any direction whatever which it is my duty to give you in estimating this testimony. I am asked for none whatever on the part of the defendants. It seems plain and direct. The utmost which counsel have said of it is, that it lacks that demonstrative certainty, that it is not that full proof which the law demands in an action so highly penal as this. Gentlemen, this may be most fully conceded, and still the government be entitled to your verdict. The proof in the outset may be defective; it may not be sufficient to enable you, without any doubt or hesitation, to find against the defendants, and still it may be your duty, nevertheless, so to find. For, although I instruct you fully, that the case must be made out beyond all reasonable doubt in this, as well as in criminal cases, yet the course of the defendants may have supplied, in the presumptions of law, all which this stringent rule demands. In determining, therefore, in the outset, whether a case is established by the government, you will dismiss from your minds the perplexing question whether it is so made out beyond all doubt. It need not, in the exigencies of this case, be so proved in order to throw the burden of explanation upon the defendants if, from the facts, you believe he has within his reach that power. In the end, all reasonable doubt must be removed, but here, at this stage, you need say only, is the case so far established as to call for explanation? Then the defendants assume the burden of proof. If, then, you conclude that, unexplained and uncontroverted by any testimony, the opening proof would enable you to find against the defendants for the claim of the government, or any material part of it, you will then take up their testimony in view of the principle which has been so much discussed, and which the court announced at an earlier part of the trial. Although the counsel for the defence, when this principle was announced, with spirit and energy sufficient, certainly, to demonstrate his sincerity, begged leave to differ with the court, in reference to the effect of not producing the books and not swearing the defendants, still the presumption of law is, that client and counsel have deliberately, and with full knowledge of the law and all its presumptions, elected to withhold this proof, and you will not, in the smallest degree, abate the full application of the principle on any notion that it may have been misapprehended. The rule is one which I am confident will commend itself to your common reason. It is this: Without exception, where a party has proof in his power, which, if produced, would render certain material facts, the law presumes against a party who omits it, and authorizes a jury to resolve all doubts adversely to his defence. The same rule is applicable in a case where a party once had proof in his power which has been voluntarily destroyed, or placed beyond his reach.

This brief announcement of a rule is all which is usual from the bench to a jury, the law assuming that it will be received with unquestioning confidence. But I have a motive, which it is unnecessary to explain, for reading it as described and applied by a few authors and judges. They have been selected with reference to their applicability to this cause. Not that you, gentlemen, are concerned with them, but for the convenience of counsel only, I will announce the books and pages from which I read. Starkie, Ev. 819: "In all criminal cases the guilt must be most fully proved. No weight of preponderance is sufficient unless it generate full belief of the fact beyond all reasonable doubt." This strong rule, gentlemen, is applicable in the case before you. But the author adds, on the following page, 820: "In criminal cases, the proof should be of a conclusive character. But here it is to be observed that it frequently happens in criminal, as in civil proceedings, that evidence which is in itself inconclusive derives a conclusive quality from mere defect of proof on the part of the adversary, or of the accused." And in the next paragraph he says: "A party being apprised of evidence and having the means of explanation in his power, and who does not make it, the strongest presumption arises that the charge or claim is well founded. It would be contrary to all experience of human nature and conduct to come to any other conclusion." In Clifton v. U. S., 4 How. [45 U. S.] 242, in a revenue case, and in reference to circumstances much like these this jury has to consider, it is said: "Under these circumstances the claimant was called upon by the strongest considerations, personal and legal argument, to bring to his defense the best evidence under his control." They add (page 248): "Practical illustrations of this rule are witnessed daily in criminal cases, and are too familiar to require more particular reference."

In a recent case in the Southern district of New York (Quantity of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 11,494]), when, in a similar case, the defendant had refused his books and neglected to testify, Judge Blatchford said to the jury: "If a party has the power of clearing up a doubtful point and does not do it, but instead resorts to all sorts of evidence except the direct evidence he himself could give, any doubt must be resolved most strongly against him." He then proceeds to apply the rule to the refusal of defendants to testify in reference to imputed conversations, because, he says, they could testify in their own case.

Illustrations from criminal trials were given of how proofs creating only strong suspicion of guilt deserved that degree of conclusive-ness demanded by the law for conviction if a prisoner failed to make explanation when such explanation was in his power.

His honor then proceeded as follows:

As Judge Blatchford applies this principle to a defendant who, in a case strikingly like this one, refused to contradict, under oath, a witness who swore to his confessions, I will, in connection with what he says, although somewhat out of the order I am following, ask your attention to what one of the government witnesses testified in reference to the defendant's admissions. He said the defendant told him, at the distillery, that he had little or no whisky there, some time in 1865. He testifies that in open court. The defendant sat by and heard it, but made no denial. It is not a matter for the jury to say that they will indulge in vague surmises in reference to the possibility of the witness being mistaken. The law, acting upon well settled principles of common reason, says that when such testimony is given, and the defendant is by and makes no denial, all doubts are resolved against him.

Mr. Follett—I would wish to state to your honor right there that this testimony was given in rebuttal, if your honor will recollect.

COURT—That makes no difference whatever. That testimony could not have been put in in chief, because it was not then applicable to the exigencies of the case. It was put in in rebuttal, as the learned counsel well suggests, and to rebut what? They had introduced some twenty-three witnesses who testified vaguely and loosely to estimates of whisky on hand, referring to anterior periods, endeavoring to recollect the observations which they then made; and to rebut that, the government called a witness, who said, "I conversed with the defendant at the distillery, and he told me he had little or no whisky there." Whether it is put in in rebuttal or in chief, has no significancy whatever in reference to the application of this principle of presumption.

It is for you to say whether the defendant did, or did not, keep books of account. The testimony, however, upon this point, seems to be uncontradicted, and that they consisted of day books, journals and ledgers. You will act upon your own business knowledge of what in all probability those books contained. The presumption of law, I charge you, is that the defendant did keep the accounts usual and necessary for the correct understanding of so large a business, and the accurate accounting, from time to time, between the several partners interested in it. I say to you that the books of the firm of which H. D. Chaffee was a member, he being dead, belonged of right to, and are assumed to be in the possession of, the surviving partners. The law presumes, also, the books to be in existence and accessible to the defendant, S. L. Chaffee, and his co-defendants, unless the contrary is shown by the evidence. The declaration of counsel that they are in Buffalo is not evidence of that fact, and, if it were, would in law constitute no excuse for their non-production, without further proof that, upon diligent inquiry and effort, they could not be produced. If you believe the books were kept which contained the facts necessary to show the real amount of whisky in the hands of the defendants in October 1865, and the amount which they had sold during the next ten months; or that the defendants, or that either of them could, by their own oath, resolve all doubts on this point—if you believe this, then the circumstances of this case seem to come fully within this most necessary and beneficent rule.

And now, in the light of this rule, let us proceed briefly to consider the defendants' case. And first, I repeat, for the purpose of explanation only, that it is claimed, on the part of the defendants, the evidence of the government is uncertain, and may lead to duplication. Although you are to resolve all doubts against the defendants, this does not mean that because the plaintiff makes a prima facie case for $750,000, you are to write that down inexorably, and stop there. It means only that, if you believe such case is made, you are to start with that, and then carefully consider all the testimony; and, so far as you can, from any source, without any doubt or hesitation, mark out any, or all of it, that you will so do. Where there is certainty, this rule has no application. It is only where it is vague and doubtful that it comes in to relieve you from the doubt and perplexity which the silence of the defendants occasions. I have recurred to this again solely for the purpose of making this explanation.

Let us proceed, then, with the defendants' case. They say, grant what the government asserts, that we sold eight or nine thousand barrels of whisky during this time, we show you that we paid tax on six thousand barrels, and that we had two thousand or three thousand on hand. How is this proved? Two intelligent parties, whom you are warranted in presuming must know with certainty this great leading fact, refuse to testify. The law accords to them liberty to speak, and yet they remain silent. The books are also withheld. As a substitute for these sources of certainty there are produced as witnesses some neighbors of the defendants, grocers, physicians, day laborers, and farmers, who visited this distillery socially, or on business. All these witnesses speak, and to this I ask your particular attention, of subsequent estimates made from recollection, by endeavoring to call to mind quantities which they saw at past periods. They differed greatly in their general aggregate, and still more so in the amounts which they testified to as being at different places on the premises. Had these twenty-three men professed to have visited this distillery for the purpose of making an examination, and while there, with the property before them, counted the tiers of barrels, and then and there estimated the quantity on the premises at two thousand five hundred barrels; and twelve others, equally intelligent and capable of observation, had sworn that they, too, went there for a like purpose; and, after diligent search, could find only some twenty-five in all, some of them working in the rooms, others storing property in them, and still others removing floors from the very apartments where these conflicting oaths located the greatest amounts of whisky, then there would be no room for reconciliation, or charity. The conflict would be too gross to call it misapprehension. Perjury beyond all doubt would have been committed. But you have no such case before you. Neither party professes to have made an estimate then and there, with the property before them, but each witness relies upon recalling what he had neither duty nor interest to observe at the time, and make measurements, and form opinions as to the quantities, only from what he remembers of the past. There is much liability for mistake on both sides in all such instances. Had this case been less important, and the expense and trouble of its retrial less, I am not at all certain but that I should have excluded this testimony altogether, trusting that a higher court would have upheld my decision in reference to what I concede would be a new step in practice. And now, gentlemen, in view of this state of facts, what should be your application of the rule of law that doubts should be resolved against the defendants? You certainly, it would seem to me, will be unable to fix, with entire confidence, upon any specific amount of whisky on hand in October, 1865. It certainly presents a case where you cannot say but there is doubt. It is a doubt in the power of the defendant to remove. If he does not do so, the law pronounces what your duty is. (Here the court called for the mash-book kept by the defendants.) There is a matter, which at one time I had though I was at liberty to omit, but subsequent reflection has convinced me that it is my duty to call your attention to it. If you believe that there have been any additions made, by or with the concurrence of the defendants, to this book, for the purpose of creating proof contrary to the truth, it also, perhaps, in an equal degree with any other facts in the case, raises a strong presumption against them. Here is an entry at the foot of the page: "Stopped this day; 2,056 barrels on hand in cribs and building." That is wholly exceptional. There is no other entry in the book like it. Its whole theory seems to be at war with the entry. You will observe the first one, which says 227 barrels on hand, is but a few months before, in December, 1863. Why "in cellar" should be added to several of these entries, when at this very period it is claimed there were several thousand barrels in the other departments, is not shown. By looking back in the book you will find blanks left all the way through, where these entries in red ink might have been made for any distance back. It is just in this period that the exceptional entry is made, and nowhere else; and to that I deem it my duty particularly to call your attention.

Gentlemen, a long experience of thirty odd years at the bar, in the contests of which I have always entered with very considerable zeal, must necessarily have fixed upon me the habit of earnestness, and, in some degree, unfitted me for concealing those proclivities which it is impossible for any intelligent judge not to have when he tries a case. In going over the facts in this compendious way, simply for the purpose of applying the abstract principles of law, which it is my sworn duty to state to you, I may, unconsciously, and I doubt not I have, more or less, indicated which way, were I a juror, I would find. But that is your province. If, in my zeal, I have, unconsciously, bowed a little too far over the fence which separates the field of your labors from mine, it is no disrespect for you to bow back again in the full consciousness that its cultivation is alone for you. That it is so I concede most fully, and do not ask the slightest consideration on your part for anything I may have said, which intimates what your duty in that regard should be. But as to the principles of law, and the presumptions which it makes from ascertained facts and conceded conditions, these you will take from the court, and inexorably apply, as they have been given you in charge.

The jury rendered a verdict for the government, and assessed the damages at $235,680.

[NOTE. From the judgment entered in this case a writ of error was sued out in the supreme court. Mr. Justice Field, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "The instruction sets at naught established principles, and justifies the criticism of counsel that it substantially withdrew from the defendants their constitutional right of trial by jury, and converted what at law was intended for their protection—the right to refuse to testify—into the machinery for their sure destruction." The judgment was reversed, and the case remanded. 18 Wall (85 U. S.) 516.]

Case No. 14,776.

UNITED STATES v. CHAIN CABLE.

[2 Sumn. 362.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1836.

FORFEITURE—LANDING WITHOUT PERMIT—SHIP'S CABLE.

Appurtenances or equipments of a ship, as a chain cable, or other articles, purchased bonâ fide for the use of the ship, are not "goods, wares, or merchandise," within the meaning of the revenue act of 1799, c. 128, § 50 [1 Story, Laws, 617; 1 Stat. 665, c. 22], which require a permit before they are landed.

[Cited in The Gertrude, Case No. 5,370; Weld v. Maxwell, Id. 17,374. Followed in U. S. v. Fry, 48 Fed. 714; The Conqueror, 49 Fed. 105.]

[In error to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

Information of forfeiture and seizure on land of one chain cable, for having been unladen and delivered from the ship Marathon, at the port of Boston, without a permit, against the collection act of 1799, c. 128, § 50. The cause was tried in the district court, at September term, 1835, upon the general issue, by a jury, and a verdict was found for the defendant. [Case unreported.] At the trial a bill of exceptions was filed by the district attorney, the substance of which was as follows: It was proved, that the cable in question was purchased at Liverpool by the master of the ship Marathon, during the last season, to supply the place of a steam hempen cable, which had become unseaworthy before the arrival of the ship at Liverpool, that the purchase was made bona fide, with the intention of using said cable for that ship, and not to sell as merchandise. That the cable was stowed in the usual place, without any concealment, and on the arrival in Boston, the ship was secured by the said cable to the wharf. A few days after the arrival of the Marathon, the same claimant, William Eager, had another ship about to be launched at Medford, and a list of articles was furnished by the ship's carpenter to be used in the launching and bringing said vessel to Boston, among which were a chain cable, sails, blocks, &c. &c. The mate of the Marathon, who then had charge of her, agreed, with the knowledge and concurrence of said Eager, to loan from the Marathon, said chain cable, sails, blocks, &c. to be used for the purpose aforesaid, but afterward to be returned to the ship as soon as the launching was over; and he, the mate, accordingly caused the said chain cable to be landed, to be taken to Medford by the wagoner, as also the other articles referred to from the ship. The next day, or the day after, the teamster took the said sails and blocks to Medford on one team, he being unable to carry the chain cable on the same load, and, on Saturday following, about noon, loaded the chain cable into his wagon, carried it out to Medford; and while he was landing it at Medford, and before it was entirely out of his wagon, the said chain cable was seized by the custom house officers, and brought back to Boston. The said chain cable was soon after bonded, and put on board the Marathon. And the attorney for the United States requested the honorable judge to instruct the jury, that the cable could not lawfully be loaned or used for the purpose aforesaid, and that the collector of said port had authority to make the seizure. But the judge refused so to instruct the jury. On the contrary thereof, the jury were instructed, if they believed the purchase of said cable was bona fide, and necessary, and proper, the mere casual loan of it, to be used for the purpose before stated, would not subject it to be seized, unless they believed the proposed use was colorable merely. He further instructed the jury, that although the cable was to be considered a part of the ship, yet if it was separated from it with an intention of selling or using it for another purpose, and not restoring it to the ship, that might be an unlawful use, which might subject it to seizure. But he left it for the consideration of the jury, whether, at the time and place when the cable was landed, or when the seizure was made, they could infer that there was any such intention of diverting, permanently, the use of the cable, and separating it from the ship Marathon. The said attorney further requested his honor, the judge, to instruct the jury, that if it were lawful for the claimant to loan or use said cable, for the purpose aforesaid, it could not be legally landed for that purpose, without a permit from the proper officers of the port aforesaid. But the said judge refused so to instruct the jury: On the contrary, the jury were instructed, that the claimant had the right to make a temporary loan of the cable, for the purpose aforesaid, without any permit, and that the mere casual temporary loan of the cable for any such purpose as the one supposed, no more required a permit, than to carry a sail to a sailmaker to be mended, or a chain cable to the smith for the same purpose, or any other part of the ship's tackle or apparel, which required repairs. But it was for the jury to consider, whether the loan of the cable for the purpose aforesaid, was, or was not, colorable upon the evidence in the case.

Judgment being rendered according to the verdict, the present writ of error was brought to the circuit court.

Mr. Mills, Dist. Atty.

J. P. Cooke, for claimant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. In my judgment the whole point in this cause resolves itself into this; whether the chain cable in controversy was, at the time of its arrival and importation into the United States, bona fide, a part of the equipments and appurtenances of the ship Marathon. If it was, then it is clear to me, that no forfeiture is incurred. If it was not, then the case must be treated as an attempted evasion of the revenue collection act of 1799, c. 128, and the forfeiture consequently attaches. It appears from the evidence, that the chain cable was purchased at Liverpool, in England, to supply the place of a steam hempen cable of the ship, which had become unseaworthy; and the purchase was made, bona fide, for the use of the ship, and not to sell as merchandise; and it was used for the ship on her arrival at the home port. Now, the question of bona fides was directly put by the learned judge of the district court to the jury, and they have affirmed it by their verdict. The only ground, then, open to controversy, is, whether the directions given by the court, and the refusal of the instructions prayed by the district attorney at the trial, were correct and justifiable in point of law. I think they were correct and justifiable. If the chain cable was bona fide purchased, and bona fide an appurtenance of the ship, at the time of the arrival and importation thereof, it is clear, that the owner might lend it and loan it, as he should please, without any permit. The provisions of the revenue laws do not require any permit to be given before the landing of any of the ship's appurtenances or equipments. If a new sail had been necessarily purchased abroad for the ship's use, to supply an old sail, worn out, or lost on the voyage, it will scarcely be pretended, that it required a permit in order to be landed, or that though composed of dutiable articles, before it was made up, the sail would, upon the ship's coming to the home port, be liable to duties.

It is possible, that evasions of the revenue laws may sometimes occur, under color of procuring new sails, or rigging, or equipments of our ships in foreign ports; and thus, the party may escape from the payment of the proper duties on the articles thus imported, and introduced into the country. But, the defect, if any, is to be cured by legislation, and not by the courts of law. Until congress shall declare, that the new rigging or equipments of a ship, procured abroad, are dutiable, or not to be landed without a permit, it seems to be difficult to conceive, how courts of justice can treat them as "goods, wares, or merchandise," within the meaning of the general revenue laws. The "goods, wares, and merchandises," within the provision of the 50th section of the revenue collection act of 1799, c. 128, are such only as are designed for sale or to be applied to some use or object, distinct from their bona fide appropriation to the use of the ship; in which they are imported. Upon any other construction, not only every sail, rope, yard, or other appendage of the ship, purchased for the immediate use of the ship, and from an obvious necessity, in a foreign port, would be liable to the ordinary duty acts; but even the common tables, chairs, wares, and provisions, for the daily accommodation of the ship and her crew, would fall under the like predicament, and could not be landed without a permit. It is impossible, in my judgment, to contend, successfully, for such a construction of our existing revenue laws. And yet I know not, how, upon principle, to distinguish between the case put, and the case now at the bar. Upon the whole, my opinion is, that the judgment of the district court ought to be, and hereby is affirmed.

Case No. 14,777.

UNITED STATES v. CHALONER.

[1 Ware, 214.] [1]

District Court, D. Maine. June Term, 1831.

POST-OFFICE—PROHIBITION OF PRIVATE CARRIAGE OF MAIL—PACKETS.

The 21st section of the post-office act of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 107], which prohibits persons concerned in carrying the mail, from carrying letters or packets, does not prohibit their carrying a package containing executions, and nothing else. By the term packet, in this section, is meant a packet containing letters, and not a package containing other articles.

This was a suit brought by the United States to recover a penalty of fifty dollars against the defendant, for an alleged violation of the act of congress of March 3, 1825, entitled "An act regulating the post-office establishment." It was submitted to the decision of the court on the following agreed statement of facts: "That the defendant was a mail carrier from Machias, through Eastport, to Calais, and that on the day specified, his driver took from Eastport certain packages, containing executions, and nothing else, and carried and delivered them to the persons at Calais named in the writ—judgment to be entered in favor of the United States, if in the opinion of the court, the action, on these facts, is maintainable—and if not, then for the defendant."

The District Attorney, for the United States.

George W. Pierce, for defendant.

WARE, District Judge. This action is brought to recover a penalty under the 21st section of the post-office act of March 3, 1825, c. 275 [3 Story's Laws, 1991; 4 Stat. 107, c. 64]. The terms of the penal clause are that, "if any person concerned in carrying the mail of the United States, shall collect, receive, or carry any letter or packet, or shall cause or procure the same to be done, contrary to this act, every such offender shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding fifty dollars." This section contains no description of the offence. It is the naked enactment of a penalty, and the nature of those acts by which it is incurred must be sought in other provisions of the law. The 20th section of the act directs the mail carriers, on receiving any way letters, and they are bound to receive them if presented at a greater distance than one mile from a post-office, to deliver them at the first post-office at which they shall afterwards arrive. It was not contended that these packages which contained executions and nothing else, without any letter accompanying them, fall within the letter of this section. The 14th section provides, "that no stage or other vehicle which regularly performs trips on a post-road, or a road parallel to it, shall carry letters, nor shall any packet-boat or other vessel which regularly plies on a water declared to be a post-road, except such as relate to some part of the cargo. For a violation of this provision, the owner of the carriage or other vehicle or vessel shall incur the penalty of fifty dollars." The prohibitive words of the section apply to all carriages of whatever kind which perform regular trips on a post-road, and must be understood to include carriages employed under contracts with the postmaster-general, for carrying the mails, as well as others not so employed. But the prohibition is restricted to the carrying of letters. There is nothing in this section which, taken at the letter, renders it unlawful for a mail or other coach to carry packets. It is, however, contended that this section is to be interpreted in connection with the 21st, and other parts of the act, and that by the true construction of the law, taken in all its parts, packets as well as letters are included within the prohibition. By the 21st section, a penalty is incurred by carrying packets, and unless the prohibition of the 19th is extended to packets, this word in the 21st will become inoperative. Packets also are, it is said, as much within the reason of the act, as much within the mischief intended to be prevented, as letters. If by simply including two or more letters in one envelope, the law may be eluded, the whole policy of this section of the act may be defeated and the prohibitory clause rendered a dead letter. The intention of the law is, to prohibit the conveyance, especially in the mail coach, of all letters and packets which may by law be carried in the mail, which includes all packets, of whatever description, weighing not more than three pounds. Section 13. The 6th section is referred to in support of this view of the law. That directs every master or manager of a steamboat which shall pass from one port or place to another port or place in the United States where a post-office is established, to deliver all letters and packets addressed to a resident of such place, to the postmaster there, under a penalty of thirty dollars. Why should a steamboat be required to pass packets through the post-office, if a stage is not? The reason is apparently quite as strong in the latter case as in the former.

The answer given to this argument by the counsel for the defendant is, that in the penal clause of the 21st section, on which this action is founded, the meaning of the word packet is restricted to packets of a single kind, that is, those which contain letters. It is very clear that the word is not uniformly, or indeed most usually, taken in this restricted sense, in the act. In the 13th section, which establishes the rates of postages, packets are mentioned containing four or more pieces of paper, or one or more other articles, and are charged with quadruple the postage of a single letter; and in the 21st section, the word occurs four times where it is manifest that the meaning cannot be restricted to packets of letters. Packets containing articles of any description may be conveyed in the mail, provided their weight does not exceed three pounds. The argument for the plaintiff is, that wherever the word is used without qualification, it is to be taken in its most general sense, and that when the meaning is intended to be restricted to packets of letters, the qualifying word, letters, is used, as in the 6th and 13th sections. Admitting this to be the true construction of the statute—and if it be not conceded, I think it would be difficult to maintain it—it will still remain true that the court, to inflict the penalty in this case, must extend, by implication, the operation of the 19th section. Packets are not within the words of the prohibition, at least packets containing other articles than letters. A packet containing, in an envelope, several letters, is clearly within the intention of the act, and I think fairly within the letter. But this question is not before the court, as it is admitted that the packets, in this case, did not contain letters. But it appears to me that instead of interpolating the word "packet," in the 19th section, to make this conform to the 6th, the ordinary rules for the interpretation of penal statutes would lead us to restrict the meaning of the term in the 6th section, to packets of letters. That this is the true meaning of the term in this section, and not a mere juridical refinement to curtail the operation of a penalty, appears to be morally certain from the last clause of the section. In the first clause, the master of a steamboat is required to deliver all letters and packets to the postmaster, on his arrival at a place where there is a post-office, and in the last clause it is provided that every person employed on board any steamboat shall deliver every letter and packet of letters intrusted to such person, to the master, for the purpose of being delivered to the postmaster. Here the persons employed on board of a steamboat, other than the master, are required to deliver to him only such packets as contain letters. All other packets, therefore, they are permitted to take charge of and deliver, without passing them through the post-office. If the owner may do this, why should the master be prohibited from it? The language of the last clause ought to be taken as the interpretation of the word in the first, where it is used without qualification. This construction of the 6th section renders the prohibition of that, coextensive with that of the 19th, and by interpreting the word packet in the 21st, to mean packet of letters, it places all the parts of the statute in harmony with each other. It appears to me that this interpretation coincides with the policy, and fulfils all the intentions of the law. It can hardly be supposed to be the intention of the legislature to impose a charge of postage on all small packets which it may be convenient for the citizens to transmit from place to place in stages and steamboats; at the same time, when the owners choose the conveyance by mail as most certain, or most safe, they are protected while in the mail by the same penalties, and charged with the same postage as letters.

This view of the law is confirmed by comparing the 19th section with the corresponding section in the previous postoffice laws. It is taken, but with material alterations, from the 16th section of the act of 1810, c. 54 [2 Story's Laws, 1160; 2 Stat. 596, c. 37]. This provides that if any other person than the postmaster-general, or the person by him employed, shall be concerned in setting up any horse or foot post, stage, &c., on any established post-road, or one parallel or adjacent to it, or from one post town to another, or any packet-boat or other vessel, to ply regularly from one place to another, between which a regular communication by water shall be established by the United States, and shall receive and carry any letter or packet, other than newspapers, magazines, or pamphlets, the owner shall forfeit for every offence the sum of fifty dollars. This section of the act of 1810 is borrowed without alteration from the 12th section of the act of 1799, c. 149 [1 Story's Laws, 691; 1 Stat. 735, c. 43]; and that again from the 14th section of the act of 1794, c. 23 [1 Stat. 360]; and this, with unimportant alterations from the first general act regulating the post-office establishment, in 1792, ch. 7 [Id. 232]. From the commencement of the post-office establishment, or rather from the date of the act of 1792, it has been unlawful for stages performing regular trips on a post-road, to carry from place to place any other packets than those containing newspapers, magazines, or pamphlets. In the revision of these laws by the act of 1825, the word packet is dropped. There appears to be no reason to doubt that it was omitted ex industria, and not unlikely for the purpose of making law conform to what is understood to have been the universal usage from the first existence of the post-office establishment. At all times the stages have been accustomed to carry, for the citizens living on mail routes, small packages of merchandise. This practice is of very considerable convenience to the citizens; it can impair but in a small degree the revenue of the post-office, for if these packages were charged with postage they would ordinarily not be sent by the stages, and it does not, therefore, appear to be opposed to the policy of the law. On the facts agreed on in the case, my opinion is that judgment must be rendered for the defendant.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—HANDWRITING—OTHER WRITINGS—COMPARISONS—EXPERT TESTIMONY.

1. On the trial of an indictment for depositing scurrilous postal cards in the mail, the cards put in evidence displayed characteristic instances of misspelling, and it was held to be competent to prove other writings of the defendant's, containing identical errors in spelling, for the purpose of connecting the defendant with the cards which formed the subject of the charge.

2. It was, also, held to be incompetent to test the knowledge of an expert in handwriting, by placing before him irrelevant papers, for the mere purpose of contradicting his testimony as to the handwriting thereof.

[Cited in Springer v. Hall, 83 Mo. 698.]

3. It was, also, held, to be competent for the jury to compare the handwriting of documents properly in evidence, and proved to have been written by the defendant, with the handwriting of the cards in dispute, for the purpose of ascertaining the origin of the cards.

4. It was, also, held, that, standard specimens of the defendant's handwriting being in evidence, an expert might point out to the jury features in the writing of such specimens, identical with those displayed by the cards in question.

This was an indictment [against Moses Chamberlain] tried before BENEDICT, District Judge, for depositing scurrilous postal cards in the mail.

The cards put in evidence displayed characteristic instances of misspelling, and it was held to be competent to prove other writings of the defendant's, containing identical errors in spelling, for the purpose of connecting the defendant with the cards which formed the subject of the charge.

It was, also, held to be incompetent to test the knowledge of an expert in handwriting, by placing before him irrelevant papers, for the mere purpose of contradicting his testimony as to the handwriting thereof.

It was, also, held to be competent for the jury to compare the handwriting of documents properly in evidence, and proved to have been written by the defendant, with the handwriting of the cards in dispute, for the purpose of ascertaining the origin of the cards.

It was, also, held, that, standard specimens of the defendant's handwriting being in evidence, an expert might point out to the jury features in the writing of such specimens, identical with those displayed by the cards in question.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT — SUTTER GENERAL TITLE.

The validity of claims under the Sutter general title affirmed in U. S. v. Hensley [unreported].

Claim [by Claude Chana] for four leagues of land in Yuba county [the Rancho Nemshas], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

William Blanding, U. S. Atty.

Thornton & Williams, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claim in this case rests upon what is known as the "general title" of Governor Micheltorena. The validity of that title has already been affirmed by this court in the case of U. S. v. Hensley; and the only inquiries that arise are whether the person from whom the claimant derives title was one of those for whose benefit the title issued—whether he has performed the conditions, and whether the land intended to be granted is sufficiently indicated. On the first point the evidence leaves no room for doubt. The documents contained in the expediente and the evidence on file clearly show that Pedro Teodoro Sicard was one of those who petitioned the governor, on whose applications Gen. Sutter had reported favorably, and for whose benefit the general title issued and was delivered to the latter. The copy of the general title which Gen. Sutter delivered to each petitioner in whose favor it had issued is produced, with the certificate of Sutter showing it to be a copy of the original. The board does not seem to have entertained any doubt as to the fact that Sicard was intended to be one of the grantees under the general title. The evidence also shows that the conditions of occupation and cultivation were fully complied with, and the situation and boundaries of the land are indicated with great precision in the petition and diseño which accompanies it. The claim was confirmed by the board, and the case has been submitted without argument or objection on the part of the United States to its validity.

We are of opinion that a decree affirming the decision of the board should be entered.

UNITED STATES v. CHAPEL.

SAME v. CROSBY.

[26 Law Rep. 22.]

District Court, W. D. Michigan. Nov. 11, 1863.

INTERNAL REVENUE — FAILURE TO TAKE OUT LICENSE—TO AFFIX STAMPS—INDICTABLE OFFENCES.

A failure to take out a license or a neglect to affix stamps as required by the internal revenue law, are indictable offences.

BY THE COURT. The motion to quash the indictment against Jared Chapel, for being engaged in the business of a lawyer without a license, and the demurrer to the indictment against Lysander Crosby, for making three promissory notes, each for more than twenty dollars, without being duly stamped to denote the duty imposed thereon, I will dispose of together. Both motion and demurrer have been argued, upon the distinct ground that the remedy by indictment does not exist, and that the only method of proceeding for a violation of the statute is by action or information of debt, to recover the penalty. There is this difference, however, between the two cases: to the pecuniary penalty imposed for being engaged in any business named in the section 64 of the internal revenue law, without a license, a subsequent statute has added punishment by imprisonment upon conviction; whereas, the provision requiring stamps to be placed on instruments imposes, for a violation, only a pecuniary penalty.

In order that we may intelligibly investigate and consider the question presented, we need, first, to look at the nature and purpose of penal statutes. "An offence," says Mr. Wharton, "which may be the subject of criminal procedure, is an act committed or omitted in violation of public law, either forbidding or commanding it." 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 1. Misdemeanors at common law comprise all offences less than felony, which may be the subject of indictment, and these are divided into two classes—those penal at common law, and those penal by statute. Id. § 3. There are two sorts of penal statutes which create offences; one where the statute enjoins or forbids an act, without declaring the omission or commission of the act indictable; the other, where the omission or commission is made specifically indictable. Whart. Cr. Law, § 10. It is a well-settled rule of criminal law, that a statute which enjoins or forbids an act, that is not at common law a misdemeanor, and imposes a pecuniary penalty for its violation, creates, technically, an offence. U. S. v. Mann [Case No. 15,718]. But, is it an offence which is indictable? I regard this question as put beyond controversy by the authorities. Mr. Wharton says (section 10, same volume): "If a statute prohibits a matter of public grievance, or commands a matter of public convenience, all acts or omissions contrary to the prohibition or command of the statute, being misdemeanors at common law, are punishable by indictment." See section 1, before referred to; also, 1 Russ. Crimes, p. 49.

Now, there is this distinction to be observed—some penal statutes simply prohibit or command an act, without imposing any penalty or punishment for a violation thereof, and without prescribing a mode of punishment; other statutes prohibit or command an act, and impose a pecuniary penalty upon any person committing an infraction of its provisions—sometimes prescribing a mode of recovery, and sometimes not naming any remedy. There is no disagreement in the authorities, that where a public statute enjoins or forbids an act without imposing any penalty or punishment, a violation of its provisions is a misdemeanor, for which the person can be indicted and convicted, and, consequently, punished by imprisonment. 1 Russ. Crimes, p. 49; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 10; Rex v. Wright, 1 Burrows, 543; Lord Mansfield's opinion, p. 4; Rex v. Harris, 4 Term R. 202, all the judges concurring; Lord Kenyon, C. J.; Ashhurst, Buller, and Grose, JJ.

The next consideration is the United States statute, under which the indictments are drawn. It cannot be claimed that the statute has made the acts complained of in either indictment, viz.: making promissory notes without stamps, and being engaged in the business of a lawyer without license, specifically an indictable offence; that is, the statute does not expressly declare that either shall be the subject of indictment. The statute which requires lawyers to pay a license of ten dollars is as follows: "Sec. 57. And be it enacted that from and after the first day of August, 1862, no person, association of persons, or corporation, shall be engaged in, prosecute or carry on either of the trades or occupations mentioned in section 64 of this act, until he or they shall have obtained a license therefor, in the manner hereinafter provided." Section 64 mentions the occupation of a lawyer; then section 58 enjoins the duty, upon every person desiring to obtain a license, of registering with the assistant assessor his name, occupation for which he desires a license, and the place where he proposes to carry on the same; and section 59 enacts that every person, who shall carry on such occupation without taking out a license as in that behalf is required, shall, for every such offence, respectively, forfeit a penalty equal to three times the amount of duty or sum imposed for such license—one moiety to the use of the United States, the other to the person who shall first discover or give information of the fact whereby said forfeiture was incurred. 12 Stat. 453.

I need spend no more time to show that the rule in reference to penal statutes unquestionably is, that it is an indictable offence to violate a public statute which enjoins or forbids an act; and if so, it is such indictable offence to engage in any business, trade or occupation, forbidden by section 59 of the act of congress in reference to internal revenue. That section simply forbids the act, and does not declare any penalty, or prosecute any remedy; and so with section 58. If Chapel desired to obtain a license, and willfully failed to register his name, etc. with the assistant assessor, and was afterwards found practising law without a license—which would be evidence that he did desire a license—he has violated another plain command of a public statute, and thereby committed an offence which all the authorities agree is indictable. The law, as contained in Russell on Crimes (volume 1, p. 49), and in the other authorities to which I have referred, cannot be questioned, viz.: "Where the statute commands or forbids the doing of a thing, the doing or omission of that thing wilfully, although without corrupt motives, is indictable." But the 59th section expressly provides that the person who carries on such occupation, etc. as is named in section 64, shall forfeit a pecuniary penalty; and a subsequent act adds to that penalty, on conviction, imprisonment, in the discretion of the court, not exceeding two years. Whatever might be said as to the remedy by indictment, under the provisions of section 59, in the absence of the later statute imposing imprisonment on conviction, it is clear that this latter provision establishes the intention of the law makers to be, that carrying on a business without license, when one is required, is not only an offence, but one punishable by indictment. For there can be no judgment or sentence of imprisonment in a civil proceeding; and hence, by necessary implication, if not expressly, the remedy by indictment is given by congress for a violation of section 59. It will result from the views already expressed, that the motion to quash the indictment against Jared Chapel, for engaging in the business of a lawyer without a license, must be denied.

Let me briefly recapitulate. The indictment and the law in Chapel's case are regarded in this wise: First. One count of the indictment charges a violation of section 59, which section forbids the act complained of; the section nor act prescribes no punishment or remedy for an infraction of this section, and so: Second. Another count charges a violation of section 58, and this section enjoins the act, for not doing which the charge is brought. The remedy for an infraction of either of these sections is clearly by indictment, as the authorities agree. It will be noticeable the statute gives no penalty, punishment or remedy for a violation of either section; and being a public statute, one provision forbidding, the other commanding the doing of certain things, the sole remedy is an indictment for an offence, and the punishment imprisonment. And, third, one other count charges a violation of section 59. This section imposes a pecuniary penalty if certain business is exercised or carried on without a license. The remedy here is two-fold, by an action or information of debt, because section 31 expressly gives the right to recover, by action or other appropriate form of proceeding, and by indictment, because the subsequent statute of March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. 727, § 24), clearly gives, by necessary implication, this remedy.

I will now turn more particularly to a consideration of the demurrer to the indictment against Crosby:

The arguments made and authorities adduced in the two cases, by the respective counsel for the respondents, were not fully answered or refuted; and in the absence of existing authorities, I confess, I took the papers in this case not wholly free of doubt, because of the seemingly direct authority read to sustain the demurrer on the principal point, viz.: That where a statute imposes a pecuniary penalty for the doing of a particular act, the remedy by indictment will not lie, but only a civil action to recover the penalty, unless the statute expressly give indictment.

I will recur to the principal authorities cited by counsel for Crosby, and some of the leading authorities, declaring what I regard the correct rule of law governing the question.

There can be little doubt, I think, but the usual and almost universal practice, in the courts of the United States, has been to enforce the payment of pecuniary penalties, given by statute, by civil and not criminal proceedings. And so Judge Story, in the case of Matthews v. Offley [Case No. 9,290], says: "Upon general principles, when a pecuniary penalty or forfeiture is inflicted for a public offence or money, it seems clear that the action to recover the penalty or forfeiture must be brought in the name of the government, and not in the name of a private party, unless some other mode for the recovery is prescribed by some statute; and the usual remedy, in cases of a pecuniary penalty, is an action or information of debt by the government itself." Such was claimed to be the practice on the argument, and I am satisfied that such has been the usual practice.

The case of Adams v. Wood, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 336, does not go the extent claimed for it, viz.: authority that an indictment does not lie. The court says: Almost every fine or forfeiture under a penal statute may be recovered by action of debt as well as by information. I do not see that this is even negative authority. Neither can I regard the case of U. S. v. Mann [Case No. 15,718], and the case of Ex parte Marquand [Id. 9,100], as changing the former settled rule; though Judge Story refers in the case of U. S. v. Mann, to Rex v. Malland, 2 Strange, 828, where he says it is laid down as law "that where a pecuniary penalty is annexed to an offence, and no mode of prosecution is prescribed, an indictment does not lie therein, but only an information of debt on the exchequer."

It is true that the statute we are considering would seem to be within the rule of Rex v. Malland, as adopted by Judge Story. But, on further examination, we shall find Rex v. Malland to stand quite alone, and opposed to many other cases in the English courts; and, inasmuch as the question of the indictability of an offence, under a penal statute, was not argued or averred in the case decided by Judge Story, it cannot fairly be claimed that the rule quoted from a single case, which is opposed to many other authorities, should be controlling. And what is said by the same eminent judge in Ex parte Marquand, that an indictment does not lie in such cases, is sustained by reference only to Rex v. Malland and Adams v. Wood—the latter of which does not at all involve the question. The judge in the subsequent case to which I have referred, Matthews v. Offley [supra], which was an action of debt to recover a pecuniary penalty, for violating a public statute, says: "It has been held that a suit will not lie by a common informer, for such penalty, unless power is given to him for that purpose by statute; neither will an indictment lie for such a penalty unless also specially allowed by statute, for it is properly recoverable as a debt in a court of revenue by government, and is in no sense a criminal proceeding." The language of Judge Story, in the two last cases to which I have referred, is broad enough to overturn what was before a well-settled doctrine, provided what he says is to be regarded and held as law. Inasmuch, however, as Mr. Justice Story does not refer to the authorities, long existing, on which a contrary rule rests, thus showing that he did not himself consider that he was differing with authorities on the question, I cannot think it was intended to go so far as the language imports, in opposition to a well-settled rule of law governing penal statutes.

Indeed, well-settled rules of law, resting firmly on time-honored authority, are not overturned by the opinion a court may express on points either not within the case under consideration, or, if so, not without taking some notice of the former authorities on which the contrary doctrine rests. I will recur to a few authorities, to show the law to be otherwise than the language of Judge Story would indicate it to be. And first, I read from Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law (page 96): "Where a statute prohibits an act to be done under a certain penalty, though no mention is made of indictment, the party offending may be indicted and fined to the amount of the penalty; but where it is merely provided, that if any person do a certain act, he shall forfeit a certain sum to be recovered by action of debt, no indictment can be supported." If a statute enjoins an act to be done without pointing out any mode of punishment, an indictment will lie for disobeying the injunction of the legislature. And I refer to, as fully sustaining these views, 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 162; Cro. Eliz. 635; 2 Just. 131; 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 10; 1 Russ. Crimes, pp. 49, 50; Rex v. Wright, 1 Burrows, 544, 545; Rex v. Harris, 4 Term R. 204, 205.

I wish to notice one further distinction in reference to penal statutes, before adverting to the sections of the statute in reference to stamps on notes, &c. viz.: "Where a statute prohibits an act which was before lawful, and enforces the prohibition with a penalty, and a succeeding statute, or the same statute in a subsequent substantive clause, describes the mode of providing for the penalty different from that by indictment, the prosecutor may, notwithstanding, proceed by indictment upon the prohibitory clause as for a misdemeanor at common law, or he may proceed in the manner pointed out by the statute, at his option; but if the manner of proceeding for the penalty be contained in the same clause which prohibits the act, the mode of proceeding given by the statute must be pursued, and no other." And the reason is said to be, that the express mention in the same clause of any other mode of proceeding impliedly excludes that by indictment. 1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 10, par. 3; 1 Russ. Crimes, pp. 49, 50, and the authorities last before referred to. But I regard the case of U. S. v. Bougher [Case No. 14,627], as fully an offset to Judge Story's opinion, and as giving a just and correct rule, viz.: "In all cases where an act is declared to be unlawful, and a punishment or penalty is annexed to the doing of the act, it pertains to the sovereignty of the state, through the agency of the judicial department, to punish it by indictment. And it does not require any express statutory authority to warrant such a proceeding."

If we now carefully read sections 94 and 95 of the statutes, it will not be difficult to determine whether an indictment can be sustained on those sections. As I have said, it was argued that there was no prohibition against making instruments in writing, without paying the duty or fixing thereon stamps, but only a penalty imposed for doing so, which could be collected in a civil action alone. If we remove from section 94 words that do not affect its sense or meaning for our present purpose, and retain only those words that are necessary to our present examination, it declares as follows, viz.: "That * * * there shall * * * be paid, for and in respect of the several instruments * * * mentioned in schedule B, * * * by any person * * * who shall make * * * the same * * * the duty or sum of money set down in figures, against the same, or otherwise specified or set forth in said schedule." That does not mean merely, a person may do so, but it declares he shall, that is, it positively requires and commands every person who makes a note for over $20 to pay the duty imposed thereon. And the law is, that a wilful violation of that command is an offence, and may be punished by the statute, as will be noticed, not fixing any punishment or mode of proceeding. Section 95 declares, substantially, that if a person makes a note, etc. without the same being stamped for denoting the duty imposed thereon, or without having thereon an adhesive stamp to denote such duty, such person shall incur a penalty of fifty dollars; but does this section not prohibit the act by imposing the penalty upon those who shall make the instrument, as clearly as though by direct word of prohibition? I think so, and that the remedy, under this section, comes under the rule in Sedgwick on Statutory and Constitutional Law, and the other authorities cited. At the same time, an action or information of debt may be brought to collect the penalty, at the option of the prosecutor; and, indeed, section 31 clearly gives a civil action to recover any pecuniary penalty named in the act.

It will be further noticed, that section 95 provides the penalty, but does not give the mode of recovery; and hence, the remedy by indictment, under the distinction clearly made (1 Whart. Cr. Law, § 10, par. 3) and supported by ample authority, that where the remedy is not provided in the same clause that gives the penalty, but in another substantive clause, the prosecutor may elect to proceed as for a misdemeanor, at common law or by civil suit.

I am entirely satisfied that the rule of law governing statutory penalties is well defined and established, not only by elementary writers, but by adjudicated cases of high authority, and to be in accordance with the views I have expressed. Whatever may be said of the policy of adopting the remedy by indictment, rather than to collect the penalty by civil action, there is no doubt as to the right. And I may add that I see no objection to the government taking the remedy by indictment; for, if the action of debt, in all cases, was resorted to, it is fair to presume that in half the cases the government would be beaten on the execution. There being no imprisonment for debt, those without pecuniary responsibility might violate the statute with impunity, and the government would practically, in such cases, be remediless; there would be no use suing in debts where there could be no collection of the penalty and costs of suit, for want of property in the defendants.

I see no objection, therefore, to the remedy by indictment. If a man will violate a public statute, which exacts no more of him than duty and patriotism demand, he has no right to complain, if the government, whose laws he has broken, adopt a mode of prosecution that is sure to prove effective.

The demurrer is overruled, with leave for defendant to plead to the indictment, and, as before intimated, the motion to quash in the other case is denied

Case No. 14,782.

UNITED STATES v. CHAPELS et al.

[Brunner, Col. Cas. 444;[1] 2 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 205.]

Circuit Court, D. Virginia. July, 1819.

PIRACY—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

The crime of piracy is defined with reasonable certainty by the law of nations, and by the acts of congress, and consists of robbery or forcible depredation upon the sea.

[2] [The following preliminary remarks are explanatory of the case.

[The constitution of the United States confers on congress the power "to define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations." Article 1, § 8. "The Federalist" (No. 42) says this power "belongs with equal propriety to the general government; and is a still greater improvement on the articles of confederation. These articles contain no provision for the case of offences against the law of nations; and consequently leave it in the power of any indiscreet member to embroil the confederacy with foreign nations. The provision of the federal articles on the subject of piracies and felonies, extends no farther than to the establishment of courts for the trials of these offences. The definition of piracies might, perhaps, without inconveniency, be left to the law of nations; though a legislative definition of them is found in most municipal codes."

[On the 30th April, 1790 [1 Stat. 112], congress passed "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States." (among others, the crime of piracy,) the 8th section of which is in these words: "And be it enacted, that if any person or persons shall commit upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offence which if committed within the body of a county, would by the laws of the United States be punishable with death; or if any captain or mariner of any ship or other vessel, shall piratically and feloniously run away with such ship or vessel, or any goods or merchandise to the value of fifty dollars, or yield up such ship or vessel voluntarily to any pirate; or if any seaman shall lay violent hands upon his commander, thereby to hinder and prevent his fighting in defence of his ship or goods committed to his trust, or shall make a revolt in the ship; every such offender shall be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be a pirate and felon, and being thereof convicted shall suffer death: and the trial of crimes committed on the high seas, or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may first be brought."

[At the February term of the supreme court of the United States, 1818, however, there came on the case of U. S. v. Palmer [3 Wheat. (16 U. S.) 610] certified from the circuit court for the Massachusetts district. Palmer and others, citizens of the United States, had gone upon the high seas, entered and robbed the Industri Raffaelli, a Spanish ship, of various articles. In this case, the question arose, (to use the language of the chief justice,) "whether this act extends farther than to American citizens, or to persons on board American vessels, or to offences committed against citizens of the United States. The constitution having conferred on congress the power of defining and punishing piracy, there can be no doubt of the right of the legislature to enact laws punishing pirates, although they may be foreigners, and may have committed no particular offence against the United States. The only question is, has the legislature enacted such a law? Do the words of the act authorize the courts of the Union to inflict its penalties on persons who are not citizens of the United States, nor sailing under their flag, nor offending particularly against them?" The court finally came to the decision, that "the crime of robbery, committed by a person on the high seas, on board of any ship or vessel belonging exclusively to subjects of a foreign state, on persons within a vessel belonging also exclusively to subjects of a foreign state, is not a piracy within the true intent and meaning of the act 'for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States,' and is not punishable in the courts of the United State."

[To supply this omission, a new provision was deemed to be necessary; and it is understood, that with this intention the last congress adopted the 5th section of the "act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy," passed on the 3d of March, 1819 [3 Stat. 513]. The 5th section is in these words: "And be it further enacted, that if any person or persons whatsoever, shall, on the high seas, commit the crime of piracy as defined by the law of nations, and such offender or offenders shall, afterwards be brought into, or found in, the United States, every such offender or offenders shall, upon conviction thereof, before the circuit court of the United States for the district into which he or they may be brought, or in which he or they shall be found, be punished with death."

[2] [From 2 Wheeler, Cr. Cas. 205.]

[On Monday, the hall of the house of delegates was filled by a large concourse of spectators. The court was opened; the chief justice on the bench. Mr. Stanard, the United States' attorney, appeared on the part of the United States; Messrs. A. Stevenson, and W. Wickham, on the part of the prisoners; Messrs. Gilmer and Bouldin, the two other counsel whom the court had added to the defence, being prevented from attending—the first by indisposition, the last by absence. The prisoners William Chapels and others, (twenty-one in number) had been variously charged in three different indictments; one (under the act of 1819) was for robbing a Spanish vessel; another, under the same act, for robbing a Dutch vessel; the third, under the act of 1790, for robbing an American vessel. Samuel Poole was first put to the bar, under the first indictment charged with having piratically and feloniously set upon, boarded, broke, and entered "a certain Spanish vessel or brig, belonging to certain persons whose names are, as well as is that of the said brig, unknown," and robbed her of Spanish milled dollars. The prisoner being arraigned, and the jury impannelled, seven witnesses were sworn in.

[Evidence:

[Samuel Stanly, a youth of 18, gave a clear and particular statement of the transaction. He stated, that he had belonged to the armed vessel the Irresistible; that while she was lying in the port of Margaritta, about a mile from shore, about 1 o'clock in the morning, she was cut out by the crew of the privateer Creola. Such of the crew of the Irresistible, as wished to go ashore, were permitted to do so. The crew of the Creola said they were going to continue the cruise. They did go on a cruise. They went off St. Domingo, where they did but little; but off Cape Antonio, in the island of Cuba, they met with several vessels. Q. What colours did you assume? A. No particular ones; sometimes one flag, sometimes another; flags of different nations. Q. Who appointed the officers, and how? A. They were appointed by the crew of the Creola; (but witness could not tell particularly the manner of their appointment.) They brought to a Spanish vessel off Cape Antonio, from whom they took $2300. During all the time of the cruise, he was on board of the Irresistable; towards the last of it, he was made master's mate, before which time he had been before the mast. Q. Did you board a number of vessels? A. We did. Q. Were they also plundered? A. Some of them were. Q. What became of the money found in the Spanish vessel? A. It was shared among all hands. Q. Did you come into the waters of the United States, into the Chesapeake Bay? A. We did. Q. What became of the vessel? A. Com. Daniels sent down and took possession of her. Witness said the crew had abandoned and dispersed. (One of the jurymen.) Was it from apprehension? A. I cannot tell that. Being asked to specify the different flags under which they had sailed, he mentioned the Spanish, Buenos Ayrean, and English. The Buenos Ayrean flag was flying when she took the Spanish vessel. On cross examination, Stanly said that he had sailed in the Irresistable about six or seven months before she was taken by the crew of the Creola; that she had sailed from Baltimore, to make prizes under a commission from Gen. Artigas. Q. Did you not take vessels under the flag of Buenos Ayres? A. No. Q. Did you not conceive you had a right to take them? A. No; we could have taken them many a time. Q. Would you not have taken the Creola if found out of port? A. No. Q. Were you not apprised of there being a war between Buenos Ayres and Gen. Artigas? A. I was. We had it in our power to take Buenos Ayrean privateers from Baltimore, but we did not attempt it. Q. While in the Irresistable, what prizes did you make? A. A ship and schooner belonging to the Portuguese. Being interrogated farther, he stated, that when the Irresistable was taken at Margaritta, he was in her asleep, and so were her crew; that fifty or sixty of the crew of the Creola had boarded her. Q. Do you know Poole? A. Yes. Q. Did you see him that night? A. No; not till the morning. They drove us below, and we had no chance of seeing till morning. He stated that the Irresistable was the strongest vessel; she mounted sixteen guns; the crew of the Creola had boarded her with two boats. Q. Had you no sentinel? A. Yes; but all were gone asleep. Q. How did you know then you were boarded with boats? A. I heard the captain say so, as well as several of the people. Q. How many were there in the crew of the Irresistable? A. About 25 or 30. Q. Was the prisoner very active? A. He was. Q. Who seemed the leader among them at that time? A. Ferguson, who was afterwards appointed captain. Q. Did you observe Black? A. He was first lieutenant at first, but they broke him. Being further questioned, in a desultory way, he stated that some of the old crew of the Irresistable were not willing to join; that when told they might go ashore, it was too late, being as much as fifty miles from land; that in the course of the cruise, they spoke about thirty or forty vessels, English, French, American, Dutch, Danes; that they boarded an American vessel bound to St. Jago; searched her trunks, and took jewelry from them. Q. When you boarded vessels, did you hear an order to take Spanish or Portuguese property, but no others? A. No. Q. But in boarding the American vessel, were orders given to respect American property? A. Yes. Upon being interrogated particularly how he came to call the vessel they took a Spanish vessel, he said she had a Spanish flag and Spanish crew. Q. Did you go on board of her? A. No; but they brought the crew on board of us to search their vessel. She was bound from Campeachy to Havana—she had four or five in her crew, besides officers and passengers; was a very small vessel. Her captain told our captain in French he was a Spaniard. The witness, being interrogated, said he did not himself understand French or Spanish. Soon after he got to Baltimore, the witness said he was put in jail, and promises were held out to him that he should not be punished if he gave evidence in the case; that he was taken in the vessel in the Patuxent by the revenue cutter. His share of the money from the prize was $29; as to the jewelry, it was set up and sold in the vessel, and the proceeds shared out, of which he received $7 more. They had also plundered a Dutch vessel, from whom they had taken some hampers of gin; as also one of Petion's schooners, from whom they took clothes, money, watches, &c., which plunder was divided among the crew. Being asked by a juryman, if they were to take Spanish and Portuguese property only, why they robbed the American, he replied that they robbed the passengers only of jewelry, but did not rob the vessel. Q. Was the jewellery Spanish or American property? A. I do not know. Q. Why did you take gin from the Dutch vessel? Was that a Spanish vessel? A. No; but because we wanted it.

[Samuel Beaver: Was one of the crew of the Irresistable, when she was seized at Margaritta, in the month of March last; when taken, the boarding crew loosed her sails, and stood out to sea; hove to at daylight, and sent those ashore who chose to go; they said at first she was coming home to Baltimore, but they went a cruising; she carried the Margaritta flag generally; but when boarding vessels, they used different flags; they boarded eight or ten, Dutch, French, American, two Spaniards; one a Spanish brig off Cape Antonio; took from her $2,300. From the American vessel (the Superior) they took a cask of water and jewellery. The money they took was shared among the crew; they sold the jewellery and divided out the money. When they arrived in the Chesapeake Bay, the crew was called together, and divided; those who were for going out again went to one part of the vessel, the rest to another; the strongest party was for coming in, and the vessel was brought into the Patuxent. Q. Had you orders to respect particular vessels? A. No: we boarded one and all. We were prepared to take specie wherever we could find it. Q. What was the station of the prisoner in the Irresistable? A. He was captain of fore-top, and master's mate. Cross examined, he stated, that eighteen of the crew of the Irresistable were set ashore at Margaritta; that he did not try to get ashore, because he did not wish to be drowned, the boat being leaky and full of men and clothes; that he was below and drunk when the vessel was taken; that Captain Ferguson had told them at first he had a commission; but two days after he told them he had not; that after they found there was no commission, then they determined to board everything. Q. When you went on board of a vessel, were you not told to take nothing but Spanish or Portuguese property? A. Yes; but if we saw any specie, it was ours. Q. Had you orders to take money wherever found? A. Yes. He stated, that he was arrested in Baltimore, and was told he should get a dollar and a quarter a day while attending as a witness.

[John Donald: Was one of the crew of the Creola; shipped at Baltimore under the Buenos Ayrean flag, for a 90 days cruise; at Margaritta the vessel was sold, and they had none to return home in, and were told the governor of Margaritta meant to press them. Captain Daniels had told some of the crew, whom he wished to enlist with him in the service of Venezuela, to which he had become attached, that if they did not join him, he would have them put into the fort, and fed on bread and water. Donald said, when he was asleep below, one of the crew of the Creola, who rose upon the vessel, came down to his berth, and threatened to blow out his brains if he did not join them in going against the Irresistable. They went in two boats, and seized the latter vessel; secured the men, and hoisted sail. The officers of the Creola were confined during the mutiny. Ferguson and Black were the leaders. Ferguson was proposed on the quarter deck of the Irresistable as captain—no one objected, and he was appointed officer. They had boarded a Spanish vessel, with logwood on board, and took from her (as he understood) $3,700 in specie. They boarded several vessels under the Buenos Ayrean flag; came across one of Petion's vessels, sent a boat aboard of her, took out jewellery, [there were several articles of it on the table of the court;] understood that this vessel was a pirate, and had no papers. They paid for the water taken from the American vessel, but does not know whether they paid for onions taken from the Dutchman. Q. You never thought of putting a prize-master on board of any of the vessels you saw? A. No;. we would not have disturbed the vessel. Being cross examined, said there were orders to respect American property, and only to take Spanish and Portuguese.

[John M'Fadden: Was first lieutenant on board the Creola when she was seized; gave the particulars of that transaction; on the 24th of March the mutiny took place; they seized all the small arms; threatened to blow out the brains of the officer on deck. M'Fadden was below; when he went on deck, he found fifty men armed; tried to pacify them and quell them; they said they were not going to take our brig, but Captain Daniels', ours not sailing fast enough; he thought at one moment he should have quelled the mutiny, but Black told them they would be strung on the beach, and hung like dogs, they then sung out, "as we have begun, let us go through with it"; they took all the small arms from the Creola; they said all might stay who chose; they wished none but volunteers; only four or five remained behind; Captain Daniels' other vessel tried to pursue the Irresistable next morning, then in sight (about 20 miles off) from the mast head. Being further interrogated, said the Creola had a commission from Buenos Ayres; she was regularly commissioned; the crew shipped at Baltimore; cruise was finished at Margaritta. They did not think themselves authorized to take a vessel under the Artigas flag; on the contrary, he had known the two flags cruise together.—Mr. Stanard: Q. Does not the commission expressly restrict you from taking South American Spanish property? A. Yes; it is against the property of the subjects of the king of Spain.

[Henry Child: Had been the first officer of the Irresistable; was below when the Creola's crew came on board; he attempted to go up with a cutlass, but was taken and confined; they told him, as soon as things were arranged, they would give him the boat, and let him go ashore. Word was passed fore and aft for every one who wished to leave the vessel to go in the boat; he and nineteen men left it; the boat was in a leaky condition—much baggage in it, but had any more been willing to go with him, the baggage would have been thrown overboard. They overhauled his and Captain Daniels' trunks for the vessel's commission, but finding none. Ferguson said he could easily make papers for himself. When the Irresistable first arrived at Margaritta, the captain had taken all the papers on shore, to deposit them at the government house.

[Captain Paul: Was the commander of the Creola; was asleep in the cabin when the alarm was given; was suffered to go to the upper step of the gangway; was told they did not intend to injure his vessel, but to taken possession of the Irresistable; after leaving his vessel, he had fired at them, then went on board Captain Daniels' other vessel, which chased them eight hours in vain. Captain Paul being asked the date of his commission, said the original had been sent to Buenos Ayres, but a copy he had of it bore date in September, 1814. It did not justify him in taking any but Spanish property.

[Captain Daniels: Was the commander of the Irresistable; after the alarm was given, he was ordered by the governor to pursue her, but to no purpose; her boat returned to shore with twenty officers and men. The Irresistable had been engaged by the governor to sail to Venezuela in two days.

[The evidence being gone through, the court directed the jury to be kept together, and adjourned till next morning. On Tuesday morning the argument commenced. Mr. Stanard addressed the jury about an hour. On the part of the prisoner, Mr. Wickham spoke about half an hour, and Mr. Stevenson about an hour. Mr. Stanard closed on the part of the United States.

[The counsel on the part of the United States laid down the law, and analyzed the evidence. He called upon the jury, among other things, to lend their aid in cutting down that system of brigandage which was tarnishing the reputation of our country, and demoralizing our seamen. He cited the following passage from Bynkershoeck, to show what was piracy as defined by the laws of nations: "We call pirates and plunderers those who, without the authorization of any sovereign, commit depredations by sea or land," &c. &c.

[The counsel on the other side contended, that the words of the act of congress were too vague and loose to authorize the jury to dip their hands in the blood of a fellow citizen; that piracy was a general term, not clearly nor sufficiently defined in the laws of nations; that the great father of the church to whom you would look for a definition, gave no satisfaction upon it. What says Grotius? Not one syllable. Puffendorf? Profoundly silent. What Barbeyrac? Domat? Rutherford? Montesquieu? Wolfius? Vattel? Not a solitary word by way of definition: and the reason was, that it had been left to the municipal laws of different countries to define it, and, therefore, the law of nations had not. We have only the definition of one Dutchman, Byndershoeck; and even with that his commentator, Du Ponceau, had expressed his dissatisfaction. And yet the jury were to say upon their oaths that piracy had been defined by the law of nations. Why did not congress do their duty, in the exercise of their constitutional powers, and make a rule which might be understood by the judiciary of the country? If they had failed in doing their duty, it was their own look out; but surely no jury would take upon themselves to say by their verdict the law had been defined, when it was not; or upon such vague, general expressions, take the life of a fellow citizen. The counsel, by way of analogy, attempted to show that if congress had referred to other cases as defined by the law of nations, as territorial jurisdiction, the right of search, &c. how discordant the writers, and how unsettled the doctrines are upon the subject. Men, too, highly distinguished in this country, had differed upon the definition of piracy. The gentleman who presided in that court, had in another place, (in congress,) in the Case of Robins [Case No. 16,175], declared that not only an actual robbery, but cruising on the high seas without a commission, and with an intent to rob, was piracy. Whereas now, the United States' attorney says actual robbery is necessary to constitute the offence. Reference was also had to the constitution, by which congress is to define piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations, to show that the former are distinguished from the latter, as if not ranked among the "offences against the law of nations." The evidence was then analyzed, and commented on. It was the testimony of accomplices, (always suspicious,) and here brought from duress of a jail, taking its colour from the hopes and fears of the witnesses. It was attempted to be proven that they had contradicted themselves, and each other—that there was no satisfactory evidence of this being a Spanish vessel as charged in the indictment—that this act of congress was passed but ten days before they left Margaritta: they could not have known of it; and therefore it is as to them in the light of an ex post facto law, &c. &c. A particular and pathetic appeal was made in favour ot Poole, who had served gallantly in the navy of his country during the late war.

[Mr. Stanard replied to both gentlemen at considerable length. He denied the vagueness which was ascribed to the law of nations on the subject of piracy, and the other points touched upon. He supported the authority of Bynkershoeck. Vattel (Law Nat. bk. 1, c. 19) had denounced "all villains who by the quality and habitual frequency of their crimes, violate all public security, and declare themselves enemies of the human race. Thus pirates are brought to the gibbet by the first into whose hands they fall!" Blackstone, the vade mecu n of all the lawyers, says, "A pirate is an enemy of the human race." Even if writers on the law of nations had adopted different definitions of piracy, where was the definition of it that would not embrace the case of these men—whose lawless depredations came up to any definition of it which had ever been given? After developing this idea with great force, and ridiculing the pretensions that had been suggested, that these men had the right, under the commission belonging to the Irresistable, to capture Spanish property, he returned to the analysis of the testimony; he showed why the testimony of accomplices should be received; otherwise the most atrocious offences might escape with impunity. He concluded by a strong appeal to the jury in favour of the law—that the honour of our country required that the law should be put in force against brigands who not only sailed from its waters to collect plunder but returned to them as the scene for its partition, and as a sanctuary where they expected to escape the punishment of their crimes.] [2]

Mr. Stanard, U. S. Atty.

A. Stevenson and W. Wickham, for prisoners.

THE COURT then charged the jury in substance that the prisoner at the bar was indicted for cruising on the high seas without any commission, and boarding and plundering a Spanish vessel, or vessels belonging to some power to the jurors unknown; and piratically taking out of such vessel a sum of money, which the crew divided among themselves. The essential objects of inquiry were, whether the prisoner at the bar was engaged in such cruise without a commission: whether the robbery charged in the indictment was committed by him and others so cruising as aforesaid, and whether the fact amounted to piracy under the act of congress.

The fact of cruising and plundering the Spanish vessel was proved by the testimony of accomplices, and it was contended by the counsel for the prisoner that they were totally unworthy of credit. It is undoubtedly true that the testimony of accomplices is to be heard with suspicion; and if their testimony should be improbable, or contradicted by circumstances, or by other testimony, the jury might justifiably discredit it; but if all the circumstances of the case, circumstances which could not be mistaken or misrepresented, corroborated the testimony of the accomplice, and in fact were merely connected by that testimony, it would be going too far to say that the facts supplied by the witness were to be disregarded because he was an accomplice. But in this case, one of the witnesses, Donald, had been acquitted by the grand jury because he was forced on board the vessel, and his testimony concurred with that of the other witnesses in all that was material.

If the robbery was committed, their next inquiry would be, whether the vessel committing it sailed under a lawful commission. There was not only no testimony whatever of a commission, but all the facts given in evidence were totally incompatible with the idea of sailing under any authority whatever. The crew of one vessel had mutinied, seized another vessel, and proceeded on a cruise under officers elected by themselves.

The question whether the case came within the act of congress was one of more difficulty. It was impossible that the act could apply to any case if not to this. The case was undoubtedly piracy according to the understanding and practice of all nations. It was a case in which all nations surrendered their subjects to the punishment which any government might inflict upon them, and one in which all admitted the right of each to take and exercise jurisdiction. Yet the standard referred to by the act of congress, as expressed in that act, must be admitted to be so vague as to allow of some doubt. The writers on the laws of nations give us no definition of the crime of piracy. Under the doubts arising from this circumstance, the court recommended it to the jury to find a special verdict, which might submit the law to the more deliberate consideration of the court.

The jury retired but for a few moments, and brought in a special verdict.

A jury was then impaneled, and the case of ten others of the crew (charged in the same indictment) was, with their consent, submitted at once to trial; the evidence gone through, and the jury returned the following special verdict:—

We of the jury find that the prisoners,

Bailey Durfey, William Chapels, alias William Chapel, Daniel Phillips, James Thomas, alias James West, Daniel Livingston, Luke Jackson, Stephen Sydney, Peter Nelson, Isaac Sales, and Peter Johnson, were, in the month of March, 1819, part of the crew of a private armed vessel called the Creola (commissioned by the government of Buenos Ayres, a colony then at war with Spain), lying in the port of Margaritta; that in the month of March, 1819, the said prisoners and others of the crew mutinied, confined their officers, left the vessel, and in the said port of Margaritta seized by violence a vessel called the Irresistable, a private armed vessel lying in that port, commissioned by the government of Artigas, who was also at war with Spain; that the said prisoners and others having so possessed themselves of the said vessel, the Irresistable, appointed their officers, proceeded to sea on a cruise without any document or commission whatever, and while on the cruise, in the month of April, 1819, on the high seas, committed the offense charged in the indictment, by the plunder and robbery of the Spanish vessel therein mentioned. If the plunder and robbery aforesaid be piracy under the act of congress of the United States, entitled "an act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy," then we find the said prisoners severally and respectively guilty. If the plunder and robbery above stated be not piracy under the said act of congress, then we find them not guilty. John G. Gamble, Foreman.

THE COURT then adjourned.

[NOTE. This cause was certified to the supreme court, where it was argued at the February term, 1820, Justice Story delivering the opinion. It was decided that the offense charged in the indictment amounted to the crime of piracy, and was punishable under the act of congress entitled "An act to protect the commerce of the United States, and punish the crime of piracy." Case No. 14,783.

UNITED STATES v. CHAPMAN.

[4 Am. Law J. (U. S.) 440.]

District Court, W. D. Pennsylvania. Jan. Term, 1851.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSION—PROMISE OF FAVOR.

A confession made by a prisoner against himself on a hearing before a committing magistrate, although previously cautioned by a magistrate not to criminate himself, held to be inadmissible because it appeared that forty-two hours before he had made a confession to one of the magistrate's officers under the influence of false promises.

The defendant, J. L. Chapman, was indicted for robbing the United States mail. It was proved that after defendant's arrest, promises of favor were held out by High Constable Hague, and under these the prisoner confessed. He was detained forty-four hours in the watch house, and being brought before the mayor, his examination was taken in writing, under the statute of Philip and Mary, and duly signed. The mayor knew nothing of the previous confession to Hague, and gave to the prisoner no more than the usual caution, which was not to answer any questions unless he pleased, telling him also that he was not bound to criminate himself.

The examination was offered by the district attorney, J. B. Sweitzer, and objected to by S. W. Black, counsel for prisoner.

Mr. Black stated the general rule in regard to admitting confessions in evidence. Every species of confession to be admissible must be voluntary and free. Any promise of favor, any threat or undue terror, operating on the mind, is sufficient to exclude the testimony. Archb. Cr. Pl. 117; 2 Hale, P. C. 235; 2 East, P. C. 659; 1 Phil. Ev. 104; 2 Starkie, Ev. 27; 2 Russ. Crimes, 645; Reg. v. Bosnell, 1 Car. & M. 584. The rule, said the counsel, is inflexible, and the confession must come from a free and willing mind, else the court is bound to reject it. And if it appears that any improper impression has been made upon the prisoner's mind by either magistrate or constable, it must be entirely effaced before a subsequent confession can be received. If inducements have been held out, and confessions obtained within a reasonable time before the official examination, the attention of the prisoner must be called to his prior confession and then explicit warning must be given not to rely on any expected favor. The loose and general caution "not to criminate himself" is far from sufficient. Inducements being once held out and confessions procured, the burden of proof is on the prosecution to show that they have been entirely removed, and that perfect freedom prevails in the mind. The presumption of law is that the influence still remains until by clear and satisfactory proof it is shown that every vestige is removed and the mind again set free. The proof, whether positive or circumstantial, must be ample and satisfactory. 2 East, P. C. 658, 659; Archb. Cr. Law, 118, 119; 2 Starkie, Ev. 27; State v. Roberts, 1 Dev. 259; Peter v. State, 4 Smedes & M. 31; Com. v. Knapp, 19 Pick. 507; Reg. v. Hewett, 1 Car & M. 536; 1 Phil. & A. Ev. 430.

It was contended by J. B. Sweitzer, U. S. Dist. Atty., that although the confession made in the first instance to the officer who made the arrest, had been induced by promises of favor, and was therefore inadmissible in evidence against him, still the subsequent statement made before the mayor, after the defendant had been duly cautioned not to criminate himself, was not liable to the same objection, and should therefore be admitted —that the influence of the motives proved to have been offered, could not be supposed to continue after the subsequent warning of the mayor, and "that where an inducement has been held out by an officer or a prosecutor, but the prisoner is subsequently warned by the magistrate that what he may say will be evidence against himself, or that a confession will be of no benefit to him, or he is simply cautioned not to say any thing against himself, his confession afterwards made will be received as a voluntary confession." The following authorities were referred to in support of the position assumed: 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 267; Rex v. Howes, 6 Car. & P. 404; Rex v. Richards, 5 Car. & P. 318; Nute's Case, 2 Russ. Crimes, 648; Joy, Conf. 27, 28, 69, 75; Rex v. Bryan, Jebbs' Crown Cas. 157; Rex v. Cooper, 5 Car. & P. 535; Com. v. Harman, 4 Barr [4 Pa. St.] 269; Com. v. Dillon, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 114: Peter v. State, 4 Smedes & M. 31.

Mr. Black, in reply, said there was no reliable authority which justified the opinion that a simple caution by the magistrate "not to say any thing against himself" was sufficient when a previous confession had been unduly extracted. If we were without decisions, reason and principle would reject a rule so loose and insecure. If a prisoner has confessed, as in this case, under a promise and hope of advantage, the caution "not to say any thing against himself" would induce him to repeat the confession, because he had already believed that this course would help and not hurt him. It is venturing very far to say that a rule laid down by Greenleaf is not sound, not supported by authority. Nevertheless, I am persuaded it is the case here, and the reference which the learned gentleman, who represents the government has made, is not law. To support this position, Mr. Greenleaf refers to Rex v. Howes, 6 Car. & P. 404, and Rex v. Richards, 5 Car. & P. 318. These cases not only do not support but they overturn this doctrine. In Rex v. Howes, the magistrate stated that he told the prisoner "he need not say anything before him unless he pleased." But it seems Chief Justice Denman was not satisfied with this, for he questioned him farther, and when the magistrate said he had told him "his confession would do him no good, but he would be committed to prison to take his trial," then and not till then did he admit the testimony. Surely this does not look as if a simple caution not to say any thing against himself was considered enough. Does it not rather look as if the prisoner's attention must be called to his previous confession and explicit warning be given not to rely on any expected or promised favor? The case of Rex v. Richards in no wise supports the rule contended for, but by strong implication conflicts with it. Mr. Justice Bosanquet refused to admit the statement until it clearly appeared the inducement to confess had come to an end and the previous threat could not possibly have influenced her mind before the magistrate. The case of Rex v. Bryan, Jebbs' Crown Cas. 157, quoted by Mr. Greenleaf, it is sufficient to say is not authority in this court. But even it only seems to sustain the view taken. For no confession was made to any one having authority, until the prisoner's statement was made to Mr. Barry, the magistrate. Mr. O'Flaherty, the priest, presented the only temptations which were offered, and he is not such a person as the law contemplates, who could hold out inducements sufficient to exclude a subsequent confession. But, in other cases, English judges of acknowledged eminence and authority have declared the law to be precisely as I have stated. Mr. Baron Gurney, in Rex v. Green, 5 Car. & P. 312, uses this strong language: "A prisoner ought to be told that his confession will not operate at all in his favor; and that he must not expect any favor because he makes a confession; and that if any one has told him that it will be better for him to confess or worse for him if he does not, he must pay no attention to it. And that any thing he says to criminate himself will be used as evidence against him in his trial." And in Rex v. Arnold, 8 Car. & P. 621, Chief Justice Denman states what he conceives to be the proper course of proceeding. "A prisoner is not to be entrapped into making any statement; but when a prisoner is willing to make a statement, it is the duty of magistrates to receive it; but magistrates before they do so ought entirely to get rid of any impression that may have before been made on the prisoner's mind, that the statement may be used for his own benefit, and the prisoner ought also to be told that what he thinks fit to say will be taken down, and may be used against him on his trial." The case of Com. v. Dillon, in 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 116, proves nothing against us, because it seems that all importunities and threats were resisted by the prisoner, and he made no confession until he was brought before the mayor, and then according to the language of the court, it was "freely made and openly received."

The counsel has referred to Com. v. Harman, 4 Barr [4 Pa. St.] 270. This case, I think, helped him less, if possible, than 5 & 6 Car. & P. Chief Justice Gibson does not say that warning is sufficient to remove first impressions, but he does not say there, as we say here, that the presence of the constable as well as the "continuance of the same scenery which surrounded the prisoner at the first confessedly inadmissible confession, was calculated to produce on the mind of the prisoner the same influence at the latter period that existed at the first." Within forty-four hours of the first confession, so unduly obtained, in the same building and under the same roof, and the same scenery surrounding him, with Hague, who had tempted and beguiled him still at his elbow, who can say the second statement of the prisoner was free?

IRWIN, District Judge. As the confession in the first instance made by the prisoner to the constable who arrested him, was obtained by inducements which are excluded by law, and could not be received in evidence, the question remains, whether the same confessions subsequently made, and taken in writing by the mayor of the city, signed by the prisoner, having previously been cautioned not to criminate himself, should be permitted to go to the jury.

It appears that the prisoner was arrested on the 10th of December last, between 9 and 10 o'clock in the morning, and taken to the mayor's office in this city. About two hours afterwards, from inducements held out to him by the constable who arrested him, he made a full confession of his guilt to that officer. He was afterwards removed to another part of the building, and there confined for forty-two hours, and from thence again taken to the mayor's office, either by Officer Hague, who arrested him, or some other constable. Here, the mayor, not having been informed of his previous confession, examined the prisoner and received his confession as above mentioned. During this examination, Constable Hague passed several times into and out of the office. Had the mayor been apprised of the previous confession, it would have been his duty to have told the prisoner, previous to his examination, in addition to the usual caution, that the promises made by the constable were delusive, and unauthorized, and to make him clearly understand that any thing he was about to confess, must not be with the hope or expectation of having the slightest favor shown to him in case of conviction. Without such information to the prisoner, may it not be a rational conclusion, that the confession which followed was made under the influence of the promises which had preceded and induced the previous confession? It is immaterial what length of time may have elapsed between the two confessions, if there had been no change in the circumstances or situation of the prisoner. Had he been at liberty, among friends, with opportunity for advice and reflection, a voluntary confession afterwards made would probably not be liable to legal objection; but after some hours of close confinement, he was taken to the room in which he made his first confession, and under the eye of the police officer to whom it was made, he repeats to the mayor all he had confessed to the police officer, without any knowledge by the mayor of that confession, and without any reference to it. Before such confession can be received in evidence, the court must be convinced that the mind of the prisoner was entirely free from the undue influence under which he made his first confession. But the circumstances of this case afford no room for such conclusion; on the contrary, they leave strong reason to infer that the last examination was but intended to put in due form of law the first confession, and that the promise of favor continued as first made. This conclusion may be repelled by evidence on the part of the prosecution; but in the absence of such evidence, the legal presumption is that the influence which induced the confession to Hague, continued when it was made to the mayor. The paper offered in evidence purporting to be the confession of the prisoner before the mayor, must therefore be rejected.

No other evidence appearing against him, the jury acquitted the prisoner.

PERJURY — BANKRUPT SCHEDULE — INDICTMENT — ITEMS OF SCHEDULE.

1. In an indictment for perjury under the bankrupt law, in not giving a true and full account of the property of the petitioner, the items on the schedule need not be stated in the indictment.

2. The allegation that the property was omitted, with intent to defraud A. B. and the other creditors, is sufficient.

[Cited in U. S. v. French, 57 Fed. 389.]

Motion to quash an indictment.

Mr. Butterfield, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Logan & Field, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment for perjury under the bankrupt law. The defendant being an applicant under the bankrupt law, presented a petition, which is set out in the indictment; and a schedule was annexed, which was sworn to by the petitioner. The indictment charges that the schedule did not exhibit a true account of all his property; that he owned a certain real and personal property, which is stated, and which he omitted to set down in his schedule, corruptly, fraudulently, &c. The second count states the same charge, and that the petitioner had conveyed the property to his mother, in trust. A motion is made to quash this indictment. 1. That the schedule was not stated at large in the indictment. This is unnecessary. No more of the items of property need be stated, than those charged to have been fraudulently and corruptly omitted. 2. That the allegation that the said property was withheld to defraud one of the creditors, naming him, and others, is insufficient, as all the creditors should be named. The allegation is sufficient. All the creditors need not be named in the indictment. In this respect we think the indictment is good. The motion to quash is overruled.

PUBLIC LANDS—SIOUX SCRIP LOCATION—OCCUPIED LAND—CONTEST—PATENT PENDING—PREEMPTION — STATE LOCATION.

1. In the location of Sioux half-breed scrip, the rules and regulations of the United States land-office require that in all cases where not located by the party to whom the scrip issued in person, the application to locate must be accompanied with a power of attorney from said party authorizing the same.

[Cited in Chapman v. Polack, 58 Cal. 555, 5 Pac. 232; Lee v. Justice Mining Co., 29 Pac. 1024, 2 Colo. App. 112.]

2. While a contest between a purchaser from the state, on a state selection, and a claimant under Sioux half-breed scrip location, arising under the provisions of the act of congress of July 23, 1866, is pending and undetermined before the register and receiver of the United States land-office, no patent can properly issue.

3. The act of congress under which the Sioux half-breed scrip was issued does not permit it to be located on land occupied by another; and the land in this case being occupied by the holder of a state title, with valuable improvements thereon, was not subject to location by said scrip.

[Cited in Chapman v. Polack, 70 Cal. 492, 11 Pac. 767; Polack v. Gurnee, 66 Cal. 267, 5 Pac. 229, 610.]

4. At the time the state agent applied to select the land in question, January 15, 1868, there being no pre-emption or other valid claim thereto, the state selection was good as one made on surveyed lands.

Proceeding to set aside patent.

Walter Van Dyke, for complainant.

George A. Nourse, for plaintiff.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. This is a proceeding on the part of the government, at the instance of Mrs. Mary Polack, to set aside a patent for the quarter section of land described in the bill, on which the Geyser Springs and hotel are located, in Sonoma county. The patent was issued to Daniel Freinere, and is based upon a location, or attempted location, of Sioux half-breed scrip. Mrs. Polack claims the same land under a state selection, as a portion of the five hundred thousand acre grant. In April, 1854, one Archibald C. Godwin employed the county surveyor of Sonoma county to make a survey for him, the land being then unsurveyed public land, and he located, or assumed to locate, two school land warrants for three hundred and twenty acres each on the tract of land so surveyed, including the premises in controversy, for said Godwin, who was then the owner of said warrants. Said warrants were issued by the state of California under the act of May 3, 1852, to provide for the issuing and sale of school land warrants for the five hundred thousand acres of land granted to the state by act of congress of September 4, 1841. By proper mesne conveyances and assignments the right and title of said Godwin to said premises and the warrants located thereon became vested in Mrs. Mary Polack (then Mrs. Hart) in May, 1862. Her immediate grantor and assignor before that time had instituted an action in the district court for Sonoma county to oust some parties who had intruded into said premises, to wit: Godwin, Levy and Ewing, in which action a judgment had been rendered in favor of the plaintiff against said defendants. A writ of possession was issued on this judgment, and in May, 1863, the sheriff of Sonoma county put Mrs. Polack, as successor in interest of the plaintiff in that action, into possession and turned out the intruders. From that time till December 31, 1869, it is admitted that Mrs. Polack, by herself and tenants, had the exclusive possession and control of said premises and was in the actual occupation thereof; that during this period she had expended in adding improvements to the place between three and four thousand dollars, and that the value of the improvements purchased and added was over twelve thousand dollars.

In September, 1862, Mrs. Polack took steps to have a resurvey of the premises she had purchased and relocation of said warrants thereon, so as to adjust the lines according to the system of surveys adopted by the United States, in accordance with the act of the state, passed April 18, 1859. This act requires that the applicant for a survey and location should make an affidavit containing, among other things, a statement that there was no adverse claim to the land sought to be located.

In the affidavit filed by Mrs. Polack it was stated that there was no valid adverse claim, and it is contended that this was not a compliance with the statute. The affidavit, however, refers to the matter of the action by her grantor against the parties who had intruded into the premises, stating that it had been finally decided in favor of her title, and says that it is the only claim adverse to hers. This, it would seem, is a substantial compliance with the law, for this claim had already been finally adjudged invalid, and it was so stated; and this being the only adverse claim, and having already been declared void, it necessarily results that there was none within the meaning of the act, and it so appears in the affidavit. In my judgment the affidavit is sufficient. In the view taken of the case, however, it is not necessary to pass finally upon this question.

The map of the United States survey of township 11 N., embracing the land in question, was filed in the United States land-office January 14, 1868. On the next day, January 15, 1868, the state locating agent filed an application on behalf of the state of California for Mrs. Polack, and on her application to him for that purpose—for the location of said school land warrants—he located them on surveyed lands nearest conforming to the lands on which they had been located, to wit: the north half of section 13 and north half of section 14 of said township. This application was received and approved by the register of the United States land-office, and thereafter, on April 14, 1868, the said register of the United States land-office issued a certificate certifying that at the date of said filing and selection on the part of the state there was no evidence shown by the records or files in his office that any pre-emption, homestead or other right had attached to said land.

The record of the Sioux scrip in the United States land-office for 1868 shows entries up to July, and no entry for the application of Daniel Freinere for the north-east quarter of section 13—land in controversy—and also shows an erasure of the entries down to July 18, 1868, and then the insertion of the application of Daniel Freinere as of January 14, 1868, and the erased names and applications carried below. In explanation of this it is said the scrip in the name of Freinere for 444 E., the one in question, was mislaid in the office, and not entered on the books till the time it was found in July. It appears that W. S. Chapman, the defendant, had attempted to locate the same scrip on this land in 1866, before the United States survey of the land. Inasmuch as the Indian, or half-breed, never lived on the land or resided in the state, the land being unsurveyed, no such location could then legally be made.

There is indorsed on the application to locate this Sioux scrip the words: "Power to locate with R. R. No. 7, S. F. land-office," meaning that the power of attorney of the party to whom the scrip was issued, Freinere, authorizing Chapman to make the location, was with another piece of scrip issued to the same party, to wit: "The piece of scrip No. 444, letter B," which had been previously located in the same land-office on another tract of land, and had been indorsed in said office "R. & R. No. 7." This latter piece of scrip with the application to locate the same, it appears, was returned to Chapman through Britton & Grey, his attorneys at Washington, in 1868, on account of some defect in the location, and subsequently located in the United States land-office at Stockton on another tract of land. The power of attorney found with this scrip, as so located at Stockton, was only a special power to locate that particular scrip. There was no power shown to locate the scrip 444 E., the one attempted to be located on the land in question. The rules and regulations of the land-office, require that in all cases where not located by the party to whom the scrip issued in person, the application to locate must be accompanied with the power of attorney authorizing the same. The officers of the local land-office having recognized said scrip as having been presented for location January 14, 1868, although not then entered on their books, a contest arose as between it and the state selection.

The act of congress of July 23, 1866, [14 Stat. 209,] to quiet land titles in California, provides, that in cases where the state had theretofore made selections of any portions of the public domain in part satisfaction of any grant made to said state by act of congress, and had disposed of the same in good faith under her laws, the lands so selected were confirmed to the state; and where such selections were on unsurveyed lands when marked off and designated, they were to have the force and effect of a pre-emption right, and if the lines of the location and United States survey did not agree, the selection should be so changed as to include those legal subdivisions which nearest conform to the identical land included in state survey and selection. The holder of the state title is allowed the same time after the township plat is filed in the local land-office as a pre-emptor to present and prove up his purchase and claim, and the location was in time.

The state locating agent, in his application of January 15, 1868, on behalf of Mrs. Polack, based the claim of the state on this act of congress, as well as under the act of 1841, providing for the selection on surveyed land. On the motion of Chapman, the register of the United States land-office cited the state to appear at a hearing before that officer, to determine the respective rights between the state selection and the scrip location.

The attorney of Mrs. Polack holding the state title, and Chapman's attorney for the scrip location, appeared and entered on the trial July 9, 1868. The case having been adjourned to the next day, the United States surveyor-general notified the register that the township plat embracing this land was suspended, and thereupon the hearing was also suspended, and continued so suspended until August, 1874, after the suspension of the township plat had been removed. In the meantime, while the contest was pending and undetermined, and while the survey and trial were thus suspended, by some inadvertence, a patent was issued to Daniel Freinere, June 1, 1869, for the scrip location, and came into the possession of Chapman through his attorneys at Washington. As soon as the attention of the department was called to the fact, that the contest between the state selection and scrip location was still pending, the commissioner of the general land-office, on May 17, 1870, demanded a return of the patent, which was refused.

The purchaser of the state title under the act of 1866, has a right to have his claim to the land, selected under the state laws, fully passed upon by the United States land-office: "The register is to examine his claim, the character, the right asserted and the certificates under which he claims." Huff v. Doyle, 93 U. S. 563. No patent could properly issue to an opposing claimant for the same land while this hearing was regularly pending and remained undetermined.

In addition to this, as already stated, at the time it was attempted to locate the Sioux scrip, the land was occupied by Mrs. Polack and her tenants, and there were valuable improvements thereon belonging to her. The act of congress under which the scrip is issued does not permit it to be located on occupied lands, except in the district in the then territory of Minnesota mentioned in the act, and on behalf of the party in occupation. Hence, this land at the time was not subject to location by such scrip; and there being no pre-emption or other valid claim, the state selection of January 15, 1868, was good as a selection on surveyed lands.

I am of the opinion, therefore, that the patent was improperly issued, and that it should be set aside, and it is so ordered. Decree accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. CHARLES.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 76.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. June Term, 1813.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS—INFLUENCE OF HOPE OR FEAR—WITNESS—GRAND JUROR.

1. A confession, made under the influence of hope or fear, cannot be given in evidence.

2. Grand jurors may testify as to the confessions made by the prisoner before them, upon oath, when under examination as a witness against another person.

[Cited in brief in Bressler v. People, 117 Ill. 427, 8 N. E. 62.]

3. Subsequent confessions, after having confessed under the influence of hope or fear, cannot be given in evidence.

Indictment for arson. Mr. Lufborough, the magistrate before whom the prisoner was brought, told him there was evidence enough to commit him at all events, and therefore he had better confess the whole truth, and that probably he would fare the better for it.

THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to suffer the confession to be given in evidence against the prisoner. Peake, Ev. 13; McNal. Ev. 42.

Mr. Jones, for United States, then called some of the grand jurors to testify as to what he swore when examined by the grand jury as a witness against negro Jacob Bruce.

Mr. Key and Mr. Morsell objected, that what he swore cannot be given in evidence against him. McNal. Ev. 47.

But THE COURT overruled the objection.

Mr. Rapine, one of the grand jurors, testified that the prisoner was not told that he need not answer any questions tending to criminate himself.

Mr. Key objected to the evidence for want of such caution to the prisoner.

But THE COURT said that the prisoner was presumed to know the law in his favor, without such caution.

Doctor Ott testified, that on the day after the examination of the prisoner by Mr. Lufborough, he was examined by Doctor Ott and Mr. Lufborough as a witness against Jacob Bruce; and after being told that if what he had before stated was not true, he might retract, made the same declaration.

Mr. Key objected, that the prisoner might have been influenced by the hope and fear excited by Mr. Lufborough on the former day. McNal. Ev. 43.

But THE COURT overruled the objection.

The jury found the prisoner guilty, but recommended him to mercy on account of his youth and apparent candor.

On the next day the counsel for the prisoner moved for a new trial, because the confessions of the prisoner, made upon oath, in his examination before the grand jury as a witness against negro Jacob Bruce, were permitted to be given in evidence against him by the testimony of grand jurors.

Mr. Key, for prisoner. There is no case in the books in which a grand juror has been permitted to give such testimony. 12 Vin. Abr. tit. "Evidence," H, pls. 20, 38. Judge Foster refused to suffer a grand juror to disclose the evidence, because sworn to keep secret, &c. So the clerk of the grand jury shall not be allowed to reveal that which was given in evidence before the inquest. McNal. Ev. 253.

Mr. Jones, contra. The rule of law that a witness is not bound to answer any question tending to criminate himself, would be useless if his declarations upon oath could not be given in evidence against him. The same rule applies to an examination before a grand jury. McNal. Ev. 246, 250, 253, 254. General Wilkinson, in Burr's trial, was protected by the rule from testifying anything which might criminate himself; and grand jurors were sworn to testify what General Wilkinson testified before them, to discredit his oath in court. U. S. v. Burr [Case No. 14,692a]. The grand juror's oath only prevents a disclosure of confidential communications by the public functionaries, or by a grand juror to his fellow jurors; it does not prevent him from disclosing when called upon in a judicial manner. The grand jury may hear evidence at the bar (2 Hale, P. C. 159, 160); and it is the practice of the general court in Virginia, in cases of difficulty before the grand jury, to call them to the bar, and have witnesses examined, and to instruct them upon the evidence, as in trials at bar. The grand jury are only to keep secret the king's counsel.

Mr. Key, in reply. The reason of the rule is the confidential nature of the communication. It is on the same reason that the magistrate, or counsel, shall not disclose what is committed to them. The oath of the grand juror forbids him to disclose any thing. It is all "the counsel of the United States." It is a high misdemeanor in a grand juror to inform the accused of the evidence which has been given against him before the grand jury. 4 Bl. Comm. 126, Tucker's note. The oath in Virginia is different, and that is the reason given by the chief justice, in Burr's case, for permitting Mr. Tazewell, one of the grand jurors, to be examined. The case of a popish priest, is a case of private confidence only; it is not imposed by the law of the land.

If the prisoner has been once induced to confess, by a promise or threat, it is the common practice to reject a subsequent confession of the same, or like facts. In one case it was admitted by Buller, J., but he observed that there must be very strong evidence of an explicit warning by the magistrate not to rely on any expected favor on that account; and it ought most clearly to appear that the prisoner thoroughly understood such warning before his subsequent confession can be given in evidence. 2 East, Crown Law, p. 658, c. 16, § 94.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) granted a new trial because the first confession of the prisoner had been made under the impression of fear and hope excited by the observations of the magistrate, (Mr. Lufborough.) And no subsequent confession of the same facts ought to be given against him, according to the law as stated in 2 East, Crown Law, c. 16, § 94.

Upon the new trial he was convicted, and pardoned by the president. See the case of U. S. v. Bruce [Case No. 14,676.]

Case No. 14,787.

UNITED STATES v. CHASE et al.

[25 Int. Rev. Rec. 161.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. May 26, 1879.[1]

CUSTOMS DUTIES—PROTEST—ACTION TO RECOVER BALANCE.

1. Act June 30, 1864, § 14, Rev. St. § 2931 [13 Stat. 209], making the decision of the collector of customs of the port where merchandise is entered final and conclusive as to the rate and amount of duties on such merchandise unless the importer pays the amount claimed, and duly protests, appeals, and brings suit for its recovery, applies not only in cases where such collector errs in judgment as to the proper rate and amount of such duties, but also where there are informalities and irregularities on the part of the customs officers respecting the appraisal of such merchandise, such as would enable the importer to recover his money back if he had duly protested, appealed, and brought suit therefor.

2. In this case it appeared that the collector did not designate on the invoice the requisite number of sample bales for examination, nor did the appraisers make proper examination of the merchandise in question, and the said merchandise was in fact erroneously classified to the prejudice of the importer; but the appraiser made a certificate of appraisal in due form, and the collector made final liquidation of the duties on the basis of the appraiser's report, and the importer, having already paid the estimated duties, refused to pay the balance demanded. Held, that in a suit by the government against the importer to recover such balance, the importer could take advantage of none of the above facts in his defence.

This was an action of debt to recover a balance of duties alleged to be due on certain manufactures of jute, most of which are commonly known as "double warp bagging" or "Dundee bagging," imported into the port of Boston from Liverpool at various dates in 1870. The invoices showed that the merchandise in question was a manufacture of jute valued at over ten cents per square yard.

It appeared in evidence that from the time of the passage of the act, similar merchandise had paid a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem under the provisions of Act June 30, 1864, § 7, cl. 1 (13 Stat. 209); and at the time of the entry of the goods, duties were estimated on that basis, and paid by the defendants [Henry S. Chase and others], and the merchandise delivered to the importers. On each invoice the collector designated certain packages for examination, but on none of them did he so designate one package in ten, nor in any case was one package in ten sent to the appraiser's store for examination. In but one of the importations was any package sent to the appraiser's store which contained double warp bagging, and the sample packages in every instance were in a few days thereafter sent to the importers, and all the goods were speedily sold. There was no evidence of actual examination of any of these goods by the appraisers in person, but the testimony tended to show that the assistant appraiser made some examination; and upon the invoices he reported as had previously been done in respect to double warp bagging, that the merchandise was a manufacture of jute under 30 cents per square yard, and dutiable at 35 per cent. ad valorem. He then handed the invoices with his report thereon to the appraiser for final action.

The appraiser appeared to have delayed final action for several months, and testified that he, before such action, ascertained that double warp bagging was then extensively in use for cotton bagging; and being satisfied it had theretofore been wrongly classified, he made appraisement and report as to double warp bagging as follows directly under the report of the assistant appraiser: "Manufacture of jute suitable for the uses to which cotton bagging is applied exceeding 10 cents per square yard, change from 35 per cent. to 4 cents per pound;" thus reporting the merchandise as being dutiable under clause third of the section above named. The appraiser at the same time made certain additions to the invoiced and entered value of other merchandise imported with the double warp bagging. These certificates of the appraiser appeared to have been made without any examination of the goods by him, and without reference to examination by his assistant, and long after the sample packages had left the custom house, and all the goods had been sold and gone into consumption. The invoices with the above certificates were thereupon sent to the collector's department, and notice of the above advances in values was sent the importers on May 17, 1871. No appeal was taken to merchant appraisers. A few days later, the final liquidation of the several entries above named based on the appraiser's report was made by the collector, and notice thereof was duly posted and special notice thereof sent the importers on the same day. They denied the right of the collector to impose these additional duties, but made no formal protest or appeal; and the said suit was brought to recover a balance of $1,403.67, alleged to be due on the double warp bagging whereof the classification was changed as above stated, and a balance of $180.35 on the merchandise whereon the value had been advanced by the appraiser.

It was not denied on the part of the government that the appraiser was in error in classifying the double warp bagging as being suitable for the uses to which cotton bagging was applied, and that the collector was in fault in neglecting to designate on the invoice for examination one package in ten of each importation, and that neither the appraiser nor his assistant in fact had made such examination of the merchandise as the law requires in order to render an appraisement value; but it was claimed that the collector's decision as to the rate and amount of duties was final under section 14 of the said act, and that the defendants had neglected to take advantage of their only legal remedy for these errors and irregularities since they had not paid the amount claimed, and duly protested, appealed, and brought suit against the collector for its recovery.

The defendants contended that there had been no legal decision of the collector in this case; that the collector had no jurisdiction of the question until there had been an appraisement, and that there not only had been none in this case, but that the collector could but know it, since he had failed to specify on the invoice the sample packages requisite to make a valid appraisement possible; and that his decision therefore was wholly void.

It was replied in behalf of the government that the statute on its face gave the collector jurisdiction to determine the rate and amount of duty, provided there was an entry of merchandise through the custom house of which he was in charge, and that on the entry of merchandise he could determine the rate and amount of duty without any appraisal, and the remedy of the importer would be by protest and appeal and bringing of suit, or possibly by an action for damages against the collector; but that if an appraisal was necessary in order to give the collector jurisdiction, the appraiser's certificate in due form (like an officer's return on a writ) was such evidence to the collector of an appraisal as to give him jurisdiction; that the cases of U. S. v. Frazer [Case No. 15,161], in the United States district court for the Southern district of New York, and U. S. v. Rodocanachi [unreported], in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, cited by the defendants, were not applicable to the state of facts in this case, since in both these cases the collector had undertaken to revise a final decision and liquidation already duly made; that if the decision of the collector was absolutely void where there had been no valid appraisal, it would not be necessary to set out the irregularities complained of in a protest even in suits against the collector, whereas the cases of Burgess v. Converse [Id. 2,154], s. c., 18 How. [59 U. S.] 413, and Schmaire v. Maxwell [Case No. 12,460], expressly held that such informalities as were here complained of could only be taken advantage of where properly set out in such protest.

After the evidence was all in, it appeared that there was no dispute as to the facts, but that the only question was the question of law, whether the collector in this case had decided the rate and amount of duty within the meaning of section 14 above referred to.

P. Cummings, Asst. U. S. Atty.
C. L. Woodbury, for defendants.

NELSON, District Judge, thereupon said in substance that he had given the matter careful consideration in order to see if any valid defence existed against the government claim, since it appeared that the collector had in the final liquidation assessed a heavier duty on the merchandise imported than was imposed by the law properly construed. That the cases of Westray v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 322, and U. S. v. Cousinery [Case No. 14,878], which both parties to this controversy conceded to be law, were to the effect that the decision of the collector was final where the appraiser and collector had made errors of judgment in determining the rate and amount of duties on imports, and where all the proceedings were regular in form; but that in this case there were irregularities in the mode of procedure of those officers as well as an error of judgment, yet that the provision of law making the decision of the collector final unless there be due protest, appeal, and bringing of suit, was intended to apply also to informalities and irregularities such as were here complained of; that it was the misfortune of the defendants that they had failed to avail themselves of the statute remedy thus provided, but that in this action they were without defence; and he instructed the jury to find for the United States in the whole amount claimed with interest.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,318.02.

[Upon a writ of error the circuit court affirmed the judgment. 9 Fed. 882.]

INTERNAL REVENUE — ACTION ON COLLECTOR'S BOND—PAYMENTS TO COLLECTOR.

[This was an action on a collector's bond by the United States against Harry Chase and others.]

Mr. Willey, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Mr. Sherman, Asst. U. S. Atty.

E. Bissfil, Geo. R. Haynes, and R. Waite, for defendants.

WELKER, District Judge. This was an action on an official bond, and the learned judge in substance said:

The defendant Chase, was collector of internal revenue for the Tenth district of Ohio, and as such officer received from the Toledo, Wabash and Western Railroad Company the sum of $24,823.87, being 5 per cent, reserved by said company on the payment of their coupons in the months of August, October and November, 1867, under section 122, of the act of June 30, 1864, and amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866, and which sum he failed to pay over to the government. The company did not make return to the assistant assessor of the district of the said amount of said five per cent tax, but did make out such return and handed it to the collector to be by him delivered to the assistant assessor, which was not certified by the oath of either its treasurer or president. The company on the 1st day of June, 1868, and at the time said return was handed the collector, paid to the collector the amount of said tax, and the collector gave the company a receipt therefor signed by him as such collector. The return so made by the company and handed the collector was never delivered to the assistant assessor. On the trial it was claimed by the defendants, who were sureties of Chase on his collection bond, that they were not liable, because the return of said company was not made to the assistant assessor as required by law, and that therefore there was no proper or legal assessment of said tax so as to make the payment thereof to the collector a receipt of public money by him for which the sureties are liable. That it was a mere voluntary payment of said company to the collector, and not authorized by law.

Held: 1st. That the requirement of said section 122, that railroad companies shall deduct and withhold five per cent. of the amount of coupons, and pay the same to the government as a tax on such interest so received is a charge of a certain sum on the railroad company, and without assessment makes the company a debtor to the government for the sum prescribed. 2nd. That the collector was authorized to receive such tax without a return thereof having been made by said company to the assistant assessor as directed by said section. 3rd. That when the company made out and handed the collector to be given to the assessor a statement of amount of such reservation of five per cent. of interest received, it was such a fixing and acknowledgment of amount due the government, as made that amount received by the collector public money, and covered by the official bond of the collector, and for which sureties thereon are liable. 4th. That the supreme court of the United States in Re Savings Bank v. U. S., 19 Wall. [86 U. S.] 227, having decided that five per cent. undistributed earnings of said bank is a charge upon the bank, and without assessment, makes the bank a debtor for which a suit may be brought by the United States for its recovery, the principle of the decision applied to this case determines that the five per cent. due from the railroad company is such a debt due and payable to the United States, and that the collector being the only officer authorized to receive it, he having so received the same, it was public money in his hands.

Judgment for plaintiff for $35,725.65 and costs.

UNITED STATES v. CHASSELL.

[6 Blatchf 421;[1] 9 Int. Rev. Rec. 177; 1 Chi. Leg. News, 314.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. May 26, 1869.

INFORMERS—SHARE OF FUND—REVENUE OFFICER.

An assistant assessor of internal revenue, who, of his own motion, and by his own diligence, while in the discharge of his official duty as such assistant assessor, acquires information of facts on which to base a proceeding by indictment for a violation of the internal revenue law, and imparts such information to the district attorney, with the intent that such proceeding shall be instituted upon such information, is, if such information is the first information so imparted, and if it leads to the indictment and conviction of the offender, entitled to share, as informer, in a fund in court arising from a fine imposed by the court, and paid on such conviction.

This case came before the court upon a motion for the distribution of a fund in the registry, arising from a fine imposed upon the defendant [Frederic Chassell]. The proceeding against the defendant was an indictment found against him for carrying on the business of a retail liquor dealer, without having paid the special tax required by law. Upon that indictment he was tried and convicted, and a fine was imposed by the court, which was paid, and constituted the fund in question. One-half of this fund was now claimed by Brewster Wood, as informer. In support of his claim, Wood produced a certificate of the district attorney, to the effect that he was the person who first informed of the cause, matter, and thing, whereby the arrest and conviction of the defendant were procured. To this he added his own oath, showing that he first informed the district attorney of the facts upon which the prosecution was based, and also that he had no knowledge or information that any claim was made by any other person to have first informed of such matter and thing. On the part of the government, there was produced the written admission of Wood, that he obtained the information which he imparted to the district attorney, while in the discharge of his official duty as assistant assessor of the Third collection district of the state of New York.

BENEDICT, District Judge. On the facts in this case, a single question is raised, namely, whether the circumstance that Wood obtained the information, on the communication of which he bases his claim as informer, while in the discharge of his official duty as assistant assessor, debars him from claiming a share of the fine, as informer. My opinion is, that it does not, and for the following reasons: It was long since held, that an inspector of the customs might become entitled to receive an informer's share, by reason of information given by him to the collector of customs, and was not debarred from that right by the fact that he was employed by the government in the enforcement of the revenue laws, under a salary. Hooper v. Fifty-One Casks of Brandy [Case No. 6,674]. This decision was acquiesced in, and has since controlled the distribution of forfeitures under the customs laws.

If the early provisions of the internal revenue laws be examined, they show clearly an intention on the part of congress to continue this feature of the customs laws in the laws relating to the internal revenue. Thus, the act of July 1, 1862, in the 31st section (12 Stat. 444), makes it the duty of a collector of internal revenue to prosecute for the recovery of any sums forfeited by the act, and declares that all fines, penalties, and forfeitures shall be sued for in the name of the United States or of the collector, and that one moiety of the recovery shall be to the use of the person who, if a collector or deputy collector, shall first inform of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby such fine, penalty or forfeiture was incurred. This provision was re-enacted in the 37th section of the act of March 3, 1863 (Id. 730), and substantially the same provision appears in the 179th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 305). By the act of March 3, 1865 (Id. 483), section 179 of the act of 1864 is amended by striking out the words, "if a collector or deputy collector;" and the note to an edition of this act, which was then published and distributed by the government, declares that thereafter a moiety of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures is to be paid to the informer, "whether officer of the revenue or a private citizen." These enactments indicate an unmistakable intention to permit officers of the revenue to participate, as informers, in the distribution of fines, penalties, and forfeitures. The various subsequent acts disclose no change of intention, but have always left this right open to be claimed by any person; and they have been passed with full knowledge that revenue officers were constantly being paid large rewards as informers, and in the face of treasury regulations which clearly recognize their right to claim such rewards. There is no reasonable doubt, therefore, that congress intended, by the present act—what seems to be said by the act—that any person whosoever may share in a fine, penalty, or forfeiture, provided it be made to appear that such person first informed of the cause, matter, or thing, whereby such fine, penalty, or forfeiture shall have been incurred.

The intention to include officers of the revenue in the general words used by the act, and to enable them to participate in the distribution of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, is reasonable; for, this mode of stimulating the zeal of officials, by the hope of additional compensation, is a common practice in revenue laws, and the small fixed compensation which is attached to many offices tends to confirm the supposition that it was expected that such compensation would be increased by the rewards of diligence.

As there exist, in the act, no words of limitation in regard to the persons who may become informers, so, also, there is no limitation in regard to the method by which the information shall have been acquired. Any person may become entitled to share as an informer, by reason of any information which contributes in a substantial way to recover the fine, penalty or forfeiture which is finally imposed, provided such information has not only been acquired, but also properly imparted. To whom imparted, the act does not say; but its fair import is, that the information must be imparted to some one authorized to, and who does thereupon, take official action to recover the fine or penalty, or to enforce the forfeiture, which the information discloses to have been incurred: and the information must be imparted with the intention of having it so acted upon. It must, also, be the first information so imparted. These restrictions can be fairly gathered from the words of the act, and I am unable to see that any other limitations can be reasonably inferred from any thing contained in the act.

According to this construction of the law, it clearly appears, that the present petitioner is entitled to a distributive share in the fine in question; for, it appears, that, of his own motion, and by his own diligence, he acquired information, which, being acted on by the proper officer, led to the conviction of the offender. This information he imparted to the district attorney, who, and who alone, was authorized to institute the proceedings which resulted in the imposition of the fine, and he so imparted his information with the intent that such proceedings should be instituted upon his information, and his was the first information so imparted. These facts, unattended with any countervailing circumstances, entitle him, according to my view of the law, to be adjudged to be the legal informer, entitled to a distributive share of the fund in court.

In thus disposing of the case, I have not omitted to notice two recent cases arising under this same provision of law. U. S. v. One Hundred Barrels of Distilled Spirits [Case No. 15,946], and In re Four Cutting Machines [Id. 4,987]. But I find nothing in the actual adjudications of those cases, upon the facts of those cases, as I understand them, which leads me to a different conclusion from that at which I have arrived in this case.

Case No. 14,789a.

UNITED STATES v. CHA-TO-KAH-NA-PE-SHA et al.

Superior Court, Territory of Arkansas. Oct., 1824.

INDIANS—CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OVER—HOW FAR INDIAN TRIBES INDEPENDENT.

1. Congress has the constitutional power to pass laws punishing Indians for crimes and offences committed against the United States.

2. Indian tribes are not so far independent nations as to be exempt from this kind of legislation.

[Indictment against Cha-to-kah-na-pe-sha and Wa-na-she-shinger, Osage Indians, for murder.]

Before JOHNSON, SCOTT, and TRIMBLE, JJ.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is a motion for a new trial, and the grounds relied on are (1) that the verdict is contrary to law; and (2) that it is contrary to and without evidence. In support of the first ground, it has been contended that the Osage Indians are a sovereign and independent nation, possessing the right to declare war and commence hostilities against the United States, or any other nation; that the facts stated in the indictment constitute an act of war against the United States; and that the prisoners cannot be made amenable to the civil tribunals of this country. Even if this position was sound, which is not the fact, still the proof in the case shows that the Osage Nation were in amity with the United States, and had no intention of going to war by the murder of which the prisoners are found guilty. It was an attack upon our citizens by a party of Osages, for the purpose of robbery and plunder, unauthorized by the Osage Nation. The nation, in fact, has disavowed the act and surrendered the accused, together with others, to be tried. Does this court, then, possess the power? Congress has passed a law expressly giving this court jurisdiction of offences committed by Indians, such as the one charged against the prisoners. That the act alluded to is constitutional we have no doubt, and we are bound to carry its provisions into effect. With regard to the other ground, that the verdict is contrary to evidence, it is sufficient to remark, that the proof satisfied the jury of the guilt of the prisoners, and it was so strong no reasonable doubt exists in the minds of the court, of the justice and propriety of the verdict which the jury have rendered, and the motion for a new trial must be overruled. Motion denied.

The counsel for the prisoners then moved the court in arrest of judgment, on the following grounds: (1) It does not appear in the indictment that the offence was committed on lands belonging to the nation or tribe of Indians, as by law it ought to do; (2) the offence with which the prisoners are charged, is not set forth with sufficient certainty; (3) it does not appear from the indictment with sufficient certainty, that Curtis Wilborn was killed and murdered by the Indian chiefs and warriors.

But after the argument THE COURT overruled the motion, and sentenced the prisoners to be executed by the marshal, by hanging, on the 21st of December, 1824, between the hours of 12 o'clock m. and 4 o'clock p. m. of that day, and they were executed accordingly.

STATUTES — REPEAL BY IMPLICATION — ASSISTANT TREASURER'S BOND—LIABILITIES OF SURETIES.

2 of the act of December 25, 1862 (12 Stat. 632), and repeals the latter section.

4. Subsequent to the passage of the act of congress of June 30, 1864, to provide internal revenue, etc. (13 Stat. 223), the assistant-treasurer of the United States and treasurer of the branch mint at San Francisco, gave an official bond in pursuance of sections 6 and 7 of the act of August 6, 1846, to provide for the reorganization of the treasury, etc. (9 Stat. 60), and conditioned in the language of said sections; also referring to the act of May 23, 1850, providing for a bullion fund (9 Stat. 436), but not containing the conditions prescribed for stamp agents' bonds by section 170 of said act of June 30, 1864, and not making any reference to said act or duties; which bond was accepted by the secretary of the treasury: Held, that the sureties on said bond, given as assistant-treasurer and treasurer of the branch mint, are not liable for any default of their principal occurring in the performance of the duties of stamp agent, in pursuance of the provisions of said section 170 of said act of June 30, 1864.

At law.

A. P. Van Duser, U. S. Atty.

Latimer & Morrow, for defendants.

Before FIELD, Circuit Justice, and SAWYER, Circuit Judge.

SAWYER, Circuit Judge. This is an action on the official bond of D. W. Cheeseman, as assistant-treasurer of the United States, and treasurer of the branch mint at San Francisco.

The eighth article of the complaint alleges, as one breach, that the principal in the bond failed to account for a certain amount of internal revenue stamps supplied him for sale by the commissioner of internal revenue of the United States under authority of acts of congress. The defendants claim that there is no liability under the conditions of the bond and the statute, for any delinquency of the assistant-treasurer, as internal revenue stamp agent; that for this reason the deficiency alleged in article 8 does not constitute a breach in the condition of the bond, and that the matter alleged is therefore immaterial; and, on that ground, they move to strike it out in accordance with the practice under the State Code of Procedure. The bond sued on bears date July 2, 1864.

The act of August 6, 1846, provided for the appointment of assistant-treasurers of the United States at certain cities. 9 Stat. 60, § 5. Section 6 provides: "That the treasurer of the United States, the treasurer of the mint of the United States, the treasurers, and those acting as such, of the various branch mints, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs acting also as collectors, all assistant-treasurers, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, all post-masters, and all public officers of whatsoever character, be, and they are hereby, required to keep safely, without loaning, using, depositing in banks, or exchanging for other funds than as allowed by this act, all the public money collected by them, or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered, by the proper department or officer of the government, to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the government which may be imposed by this or any other act of congress, or by any regulation of the treasury department made in conformity to law; and also to do and perform all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the executive departments of the government, as agents for paying pensions, or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of these departments may be required by law to make, and which are of a character to be made by the depositaries hereby constituted, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon them."

Section 7 provides that all the treasurers and assistant-treasurers named in the act "shall respectively give bonds to the United States faithfully to discharge the duties of their respective offices according to law."

On July 3, 1852, "An act to establish a branch mint of the United States in California" was passed, section 7 of which provides as follows: "That the said branch mint shall be the place of deposit for the public moneys collected in the custom houses in the state of California, and for such other public moneys as the secretary of the treasury may direct; and the treasurer of said branch mint shall have the custody of the same; and shall perform the duties of an assistant-treasurer, and for that purpose shall be subject to all the provisions contained in an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better organization of the treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue,' approved August the sixth, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six, which relates to the treasurer of the branch mint at New Orleans."

The defendant, Cheeseman, was appointed treasurer of said branch mint, and as such gave the bond in suit. The condition of the bond follows the language of the said act of August 6, 1846, before cited, and will be set out in the course of this opinion.

It also adds "to be substituted for present bond of four hundred thousand dollars by virtue of act of May 23, 1850" (9 Stat. 436). This act relates to a bullion fund set apart to pay for bullion received at the mint before it is coined; and provides for the increasing of bonds of treasurers to cover the increased responsibility under the operation of the act. No reference is made in the condition of the bond in suit to stamps, stamp agents, or to any other act of congress, than those just cited.

By the act of July 1, 1862, as one source of revenue, congress provided that certain merchandise and certain instruments should be stamped, with stamps to be furnished by the government; and by section 102 the commissioner was authorized to furnish any person such stamps upon payment of the amount of duty represented by such stamps less a commission of five per cent. when the amounts taken were fifty dollars or more. It also provided for the return of such stamps so furnished, as should become unfit for use, or for which the purchaser should have no use. 12 Stat. 477, § 102. This act was amended December 25, 1862, by which the commissioner of internal revenue was authorized to supply the assistant treasurer at San Francisco with stamps "without requiring prepayment therefor," provided, "that no greater commission be allowed than is now provided by law"—that is to say, no greater than was allowed private parties, who received stamps upon payment, as provided in the statute before cited. 12 Stat. 632, § 2.

On June 30, 1864, congress passed another act, which covers the whole subject of internal revenue taxation, and especially that portion relating to stamp duties. Section 173 of this act repeals by direct reference nearly all the acts upon the subject, and then adds a general clause, "together with all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith." Section 161 of this act, like section 102 of the act of July 1, 1862, authorizes the commissioner of internal revenue to supply any person with stamps upon payment of the amount represented less commissions allowed for selling, or otherwise, and for the return of those not used; and to supply certain designated manufacturers with stamps "without prepayment therefor, on a credit not exceeding sixty days," upon "such security as he (the commissioner) may judge necessary to secure payment," etc. Section 170 provides as follows: "That in any collection district, where in the judgment of the commissioner of internal revenue, the facilities for the procurement and distribution of stamped vellum, parchment, or paper, and adhesive stamps, are or shall be insufficient, the commissioner, as aforesaid, is authorized to furnish, supply, and deliver to the collector and to the assessor of any such district, and to any assistant treasurer of the United States, or designated depositary thereof, or any postmaster, a suitable quantity or amount of stamped vellum, parchment or paper, and adhesive stamps, without prepayment therefor, and shall allow the highest rates of commissions allowed by law to any other parties purchasing the same, and may in advance require of any such collector, assessor, assistant treasurer of the United States or postmaster, a bond with sufficient sureties, to an amount equal to the value of any stamped vellum, parchment or paper, and adhesive stamps, which may be placed in his hands and remain unaccounted for, conditioned for the faithful return, whenever so required of all quantities or amounts undisposed of, and for the payment monthly, of all quantities or amounts, sold or not remaining on hand. And it shall be the duty of such collector to supply his deputies with, or sell to other parties within his district who make application therefor, stamped vellum, parchment, or paper, and adhesive stamps, upon the same terms allowed by law, or under the regulations of the commissioner of internal revenue, who is hereby authorized to make such other regulations, not inconsistent herewith, for the security of the United States and the better accommodation of the public, in relation to the matters hereinbefore mentioned, as he may judge necessary and expedient. And the secretary of the treasury may from time to time make such regulations as he may find necessary to insure the safe-keeping or prevent the illegal use of all such stamped vellum, parchment, paper and adhesive stamps." 13 Stat. 297, § 170.

These are the only statutes brought to the attention of the court bearing upon the question presented by the motion to strike out. The bond in question was given after the passage of the last named act of June 30, 1864. This act clearly operated as a repeal of the act of December 25, 1862, although the latter act is not specifically referred to in the repealing clause. But the latter embraces the entire subject-matter of the prior act on this subject, making changes on the point in question and adding other provisions, and was manifestly intended as a substitute for it. In such cases it is well settled that the operation of the later act is to repeal the one for which it is substituted. Murdock v. City of Memphis, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 617; U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. [78 U. S.] 88; Henderson's Tobacco, Id. 652; Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 537; Com. v. Cooley, 10 Pick. 37; Pierpont v. Crouch, 10 Cal. 315; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 126; Butler v. Russell [Case No. 2,243]; Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. [54 U. S.] 438. The act of 1862, therefore, need not be considered.

The liabilities of sureties cannot be extended by implication or construction. The surety cannot be bound beyond the scope of his engagement. He is entitled to stand upon the strict terms of his contract. His liability is strictissimi juris, and cannot be extended beyond the reasonably necessary import of the language of his bond. Miller v. Stuart, 9 Wheat. [22 U. S.] 703; U. S. v. Boyd, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 207-209; Legget v. Humphreys, 21 How. [62 U. S.] 76; Morton v. Thomas, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 317; Smith v. U. S., 2 Wall. [69 U. S.] 235.

Is the default alleged in article 8 of the complaint fairly within the terms of the condition of the bond? The condition of the bond is in the language of the act of 1846, which was passed long before there was any act relating to stamps in force. One of the conditions is in the language of section 7 of said act that the principal "shall truly and faithfully continue to execute and discharge all the duties of the said office according to the laws of the land." These duties were specifically defined by section 6 of the same act, and another condition of the same bond follows substantially the language of that section, and is, that "he shall truly and faithfully continue to execute and discharge all the duties of the said office, according to the laws of the United States, and moreover has well, truly and faithfully kept and shall well, truly and faithfully keep safely without loaning, using, depositing in bank or exchanging for other funds than as allowed by the act of congress hereinafter specially referred to and described, all the public money collected by him, or otherwise at any time placed in his possession and custody, till the same has been or shall be ordered by the proper department or officer of the government to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment have been or shall be received, has faithfully and promptly made, and shall faithfully and promptly make the same as directed, and has done and shall do and perform all other duties as fiscal agent of the government, which have been or may be imposed by any act of congress, or by any regulation of the treasury department made in conformity to law; and also has done and performed, and shall do and perform all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the executive departments of the government, as agent for paying pensions, or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of these departments may be required by the law to make, and which are of a character to be made by a depositary constituted by an act of congress, entitled 'An act to provide for the better organization of the treasury, and for the collection, safe keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue,' approved August 6, 1846, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon him; then this obligation to be void and of none effect," etc.

The language of the statute and of the condition is very broad, but the words must be taken as having reference to such duties only as have some natural relation to the ordinary duties imposed upon the particular officer, who gives the bond. The language prescribing the duties is the same for "all collectors of customs, all surveyors of customs acting also as collectors, all assistant treasurers, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, all postmasters and all public officers of whatsoever character." All these officers are provided for in the same section. It can hardly be supposed that congress intended that the words "all other duties as fiscal agents of the government which may be imposed by this or any other act;" in the section prescribing the duties of the officers mentioned and which is inserted in the treasurer's bond, in suit, should include the duties of collectors of customs, receivers of land offices and postmasters in case congress should, after giving the bond, see fit to impose the duties of such officers on the assistant treasurer.

If so, then the duties of all officers, who have anything to do with the moneys of the government, might be imposed on an assistant treasurer, and the liabilities of his sureties extended far beyond anything contemplated at the time of the execution of the bond. We think these words only intended to include such duties as naturally and ordinarily belong to the particular officer giving the bond, or have some obvious relation to such duties, and such as the sureties acquainted with the duties of the various public officers as usually devolved upon them by law, might reasonably be expected to contemplate at the time of executing the bond, as likely to be imposed upon their principal in case the exigencies of government should require it; and not those duties which are usually imposed upon, and more appropriately belong to, an entirely different class of officers. Thus the duties of treasurers are usually to keep safely, and pay out upon lawful authority the public moneys, not to act as collectors of customs, postmasters, receivers of land offices, or other officers engaged in collecting the different branches of the public revenues. Treasurers are ordinarily understood to be keepers of the public funds collected by other classes of public officers to whom those specific duties are specially assigned. We do not think the words of the treasurer's bond under consideration would cover the duties of collectors of customs, etc., imposed by the act of congress or a regulation of the treasury department after the giving of the bond. The sale of stamps required by act of congress to be used upon certain specified merchandise and written instruments, is one mode of raising and collecting revenue; and the furnishing of stamps to the assistant treasurer for sale to other parties in pursuance of section 170 of the act of 1864, is but making him an agent for the sale of stamps, and collection to the extent of sales of that branch of the public revenue. The stamps themselves are not money. There is no natural or necessary connection of this service with the ordinary duties of that officer, as treasurer. The service is more appropriate to other officers, whose duties are to collect revenue, and it was at first imposed on that class of officers. Section 102 of the act of July 1, 1862, as has been seen, authorized the commissioner to "supply collectors, deputy collectors, postmasters, stationers and other persons (without naming assistant treasurers), at his discretion with adhesive stamps," etc., "upon payment at the time of delivery" of the amount of duties "said stamps represent;" and to allow five per cent. as commission, providing also for a return of such as were not used. Section 161 of the act of June 30, 1864, made a similar provision as to similar parties, the supply to be made upon payment, and, also authorized the delivery of stamps to certain manufacturers, without payment upon giving satisfactory security for payment within sixty days. Section 170 of the same act authorized the commissioner of internal revenue in those districts where in his judgment the facilities for distribution of stamps were insufficient, to furnish to the collector and assessor of the district, and to any assistant treasurer, or any postmaster, a suitable quantity of stamps "without payment therefor," and to allow the highest rates of commission allowed other parties purchasing the same; and provided that the "commissioner may in advance require of any such collector, assessor, assistant treasurer of the United States, or postmaster, a bond with sufficient sureties to an amount equal to the value of any stamped vellum, parchment or paper and adhesive stamps which may be placed in his hands and remain unaccounted for, conditioned for the faithful return, whenever so required, of all quantities or amounts sold or not, remaining on hand."

Thus it will be seen that under section 161, the stamps were to be supplied to certain officers and persons only on prepayment of the amount represented by the stamps, less commissions, to certain manufacturers on credit upon giving security, and under section 170 they might be supplied for sale on similar commissions to certain officers named without prepayment, in the discretion of the commissioner, but he was authorized to require security and the condition of the bond is prescribed. Some of the officers mentioned in both sections are the same, as postmasters and collectors. It seems to be a fair inference from these sections that congress intended that there should be in all cases either prepayment of the value less commissions, or special security given for the faithful performance of this particular duty.

Why require prepayment of collectors and postmasters in section 161, if their official bonds as collectors and postmasters already given covered the duty? or why authorize the supply of stamps to these same officers in section 170 of the same act, and require other special security, if it was contemplated that their bonds as collectors and postmasters already given protected the government? These officers, like assistant treasurers, give bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties which are prescribed by section 6 of the act of 1846. If the assistant treasurer's bond under that act covers the liabilities by reason of the provisions of section 6, the same must be true of the collectors' and postmasters' bonds. It seems very evident to us that congress intended that the specific bond authorized by section 170 of the act of 1864 should be given to cover the specific duty devolved upon the stamp agents provided for in that section, that is to say, when stamps are delivered without prepayment. The language is not that an "additional" bond shall be required, but that "a bond with sufficient sureties" may be required. If congress had contemplated that a bond as assistant treasurer should cover this duty, there would have been no need of this bond, or if it had supposed the bond already given insufficient, it would naturally have authorized an additional bond as in case of the bullion fund with a condition covering all duties instead of limiting the responsibility to that particular duty. The bond in question was given after the passage of the act of 1864, yet it does not contain the condition prescribed by section 170 to cover the duties of the assistant treasurer as stamp agent, and makes no reference to it. It does, however, refer in terms to the act of 1846 and to the act of 1850 relating to a bullion fund, and purports to have been executed in pursuance of those acts. It seems to refer specifically to all duties intended to be covered. "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius." The parties executed the bond, and the secretary of the treasury accepted it in this form. If it was intended to cover the duties of the assistant treasurer, as stamp agent under the act of 1864, it is reasonable to presume that the secretary of the treasury would have required the conditions prescribed by section 170 to be inserted, or at least to have required some reference in the bond to those duties, or to that act. The secretary prescribes the form of the bond.

We think the reasonable conclusion is, that congress intended to require a distinct and separate bond containing the conditions prescribed in section 170 of the act of 1864, to cover the duties of stamp agents provided for in that act; that as the bond in suit was given since the passage of the act of 1864, and does not contain the conditions prescribed by that act, and makes no reference to the act, but only refers to the acts of 1846 and 1850, the sureties might have reasonably supposed, and were entitled to suppose, that another bond would be given to cover the service of stamp agent, should the commissioner exercise his discretion, and require that service of the person acting as assistant treasurer, and that their liabilities upon the bond were limited to the duties of assistant treasurer and treasurer of the mint, and such duties as usually pertain to that office, and as they existed under prior acts of congress; and that they are not liable on the bond in suit for the delinquencies set out in article 8 of the complaint.

The result is that the averments of said article are immaterial, and should be stricken from the complaint, and it is so ordered.

Laboring to exact fees from one party after having received them from another is not extortion, and whether it is an indictable offence, quære. The contents of a warrant cannot be proved without producing it, or accounting satisfactorily for its non-production.

This was an indictment [against Elijah Chenault] for laboring to exact fees from the plaintiff, after having received them from the defendant, on a warrant before a justice of the peace in the case of Carlin v. Weston.

THE COURT refused to instruct the jury that the offence charged was not indictable; but told them it was not extortion.

THE COURT also refused to suffer parol evidence to be given of the contents of the warrant without producing it, or accounting satisfactorily for its non-production.

SHIPPING PROHIBITED ARTICLES ON STEAMBOATS—GUNPOWDER—WHO LIABLE.

1. Act August 30, 1852 [10 Stat. 61], which prohibits the shipment of gunpowder and other ignitible articles on board of steamboats, punishes by fine or imprisonment, for putting up such articles for shipment, except they be put up and marked as required, or for shipping the same.

2. An individual who has not put up the articles, is not liable for shipping the same, if the articles have not been actually shipped on board of the vessel

Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Mr. Taft, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This is an indictment against the defendants for shipping gunpowder, in violation of the act of congress of the 30th August, 1852. By the 8th section of that act, gunpowder and other materials which ignite by friction, are required to be packed in a particular manner, and distinctly marked on the outside with a description of the articles; and any one who shall pack or put up for shipment any of the above articles, or shall ship the same, except as above provided, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and punished by fine or imprisonment, &c.

The defendants having pleaded not guilty, a jury was sworn, &c. A. H. Bayless, a witness, stated that three casks containing kegs, which he supposed to be gunpowder, were deposited on the wharf of Cincinnati, for shipment on the —— day of ——, 1853. The dray tickets represented the casks to contain merchandise. The head of one of the hogsheads was out, and witness saw kegs which he supposed contained gunpowder. Capt. Halderman states, that in November last he went to the wharf, and found at the landing three bacon hogsheads, marked R. R., Florence, Alabama. He had the head taken out of the third hogshead, and found they contained powder. A man by the name of Ross said he had shipped them, and on being told it was contrary to law, said he was not aware of it, and that he had been in the habit of shipping powder. The kegs which contained the powder were of the usual size, and contained each about twenty-five pounds. Each cask contained from seven to ten kegs. The defendants were engaged in the commission and forwarding business. Ross said the hogsheads had been carried to the Steamboat "Royal Arch." Robert Kennedy, says he was clerk to the St. Louis mail boat, that the hogsheads were marked as containing oil cake, he received the hogsheads the evening before from defendants. In rolling the hogsheads to put them on board the steamer, the head fell out of one of them. Capt. Pearce spoke to one of defendants, who had the head put in. Thomas Gwynne; the witness drives a powder wagon; he hauled the casks from the powder house. Saw when the head came out, the hogsheads contained kegs of gunpowder. Capt. Pearce, saw the cask with the head out, and saw that it contained kegs of gunpowder. A motion was made to overrule the evidence, but the court refused to take the evidence from the jury. It appeared that the hogsheads had been forwarded to the defendants for shipment in the ordinary course of their business; and there was no evidence to show that they had any knowledge of the contents. The hogsheads appeared to have been used for pork or bacon hams, from the marks which they bore.

THE COURT instructed the jury that there being no evidence to show that the defendants had packed the gunpowder for shipment, in violation of the act of congress, they could only be convicted, under the act, for shipping the article. It does not appear that defendants had any knowledge that the casks were brought from the powder house, from which a presumption might arise that they had knowledge of their contents, but if such a presumption could be raised, it would not go to convict the defendants of packing the powder. This being the case, the jury will enquire whether the articles were shipped. The words of the law are "if any one shall put up for shipment, on board of any such vessel, except as before directed, or shall ship the same," he shall be deemed guilty, &c. The articles were not shipped by the defendants, although they were brought to the wharf for that purpose. Before the hogsheads were actually shipped on board the vessel, the head of one of them was taken out, and the gunpowder was discovered, which prevented the shipment of them within the meaning of the law.

[2] [Reported by Hon. John McLean, Circuit Justice.]

It is admitted that the shipment of gunpowder or other articles specified, as prohibited by the act, should be punished; as such act endangers the lives of passengers and the property on board, as well as the boat itself. But however aggravated the act, no one should be convicted, unless it be shown he is guilty of the offense within the statute.

The jury found the defendants not guilty.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—EXCESS IN WEIGHT—ABSORPTION OF MOISTURE.

This was a suit to recover duty upon the alleged weight of a quantity of wool imported by the defendants [Pierre Choteau and others]. The custom house weighers made returns showing an excess over the weights specified in the invoice, which would amount to about $300.

Mr. Joachimsen, Asst. U. S. Atty., produced witnesses to prove that the weight of the wool on its arrival here exceeded that specified in the invoice.

Messrs. Porter & Sanford, for defendants, produced evidence to show that wool, by absorbing moisture while at sea, becomes heavier from one to five per cent.; that the wool in question was weighed in England, and the weighers gave the weight mentioned in the invoice; that the wool was kept here in a dry place after its arrival, and so decreased in weight that it was sold at a less weight than that mentioned in the invoice.

THE COURT (BETTS, District Judge) charged the jury that although the increased weight may have accrued from moisture, or any other action of the elements,—except being exposed to or injured by sea water,—the wool was liable to pay duty at this port on the weight here.

The jury brought in a sealed verdict for plaintiff.

Mr. Joachimsen moved for a reference to ascertain the amount of duty to which the wool was liable, and named Mr. Bridgham as the reference.

INTERNAL REVENUE—FEES OF OFFICERS—HOW ACCOUNTED FOR.

Officers' fees in revenue cases need not be immediately paid over to the internal revenue department, but may be accounted for in the semi-annual returns of the officers. And in certain other causes of information, for forfeiture, as also in certain actions of debt, etc.

[These were actions for forfeiture of certain cigars late in the possession of Edward Bolin.] Heard upon motion for order to pay the whole fund in the registry of the court in each of the causes (including the fees, costs, charges and expenses of the officers of the court) to the local collector of internal revenue.

John K. Valentine, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the motion.

A. Sydney Biddle, contra.

Before McKENNAN, Circuit Judge, and BUTLER, District Judge.

BUTLER, District Judge. This motion contemplates a change of practice, respecting officers' fees, in revenue cases. Heretofore, the fees in these, as in all other cases, have been retained by the officers when collected and received, and accounted for in their semi-annual returns. Now, it is claimed, that the amount should be paid over to the internal revenue department, through the collector, and the officers look to the treasury for its return. That the practice heretofore pursued conformed to the law, as it existed prior to the act of June 30, 1864 [13 Stat. 223], re-enacted July 13, 1866,—Rev. St. § 3216 [14 Stat. 98],—is not, I believe, open to doubt. The act of February 26, 1853,—Rev. St. §§ 823, 828, 839, 842 [10 Stat. 161],—prescribes what fees shall be allowed to the clerk, district attorney and other officers; and sections 839, 842 and 844 show, with great distinctness, that these fees are to be retained by the officers, when received, until the limit fixed, as the maximum of their compensation, is exceeded. Each one of these sections 839, 842, and 844, recognizes this right to retain, in plain terms, the last declaring "that every district attorney, clerk and marshal shall at the time of making his half-yearly return to the attorney-general pay into the treasury * * * any surplus of the fees and emoluments of his office, which said return shows to exist, over and above the compensation and allowances authorized by law to be retained by him." Section 856 provides that "the fees of district attorneys, clerks and marshals, * * * in cases where the United States are liable to pay the same, shall be paid on settling their accounts at the treasury." And on this language, and that of the act of July 13, 1866 (Rev. St. § 3216), the argument in support of the motion is based. The "cases where the United States are liable to pay" (referred to in section 856) are not, however, suits in which the fees are collected from its antagonists; but others, in which it is an unsuccessful party; and also where services are required (such as the act specifies), for which no fees are taxed to the defendant. Where the United States is successful, and the fees are recovered from the defendant, it is not liable to pay, and the case does not fall within this section. This construction is reasonable, and conforms to the language employed; while any other would bring the section in conflict, not only with the several sections before referred to (which provide, as has been seen, for the officers' retention of their fees), but also with the section immediately following it (857), which directs that "the fees and compensation of officers and persons hereinbefore mentioned, except those which are directed to be paid out of the treasury, shall be recovered in like manner as fees of the officers of the states respectively for like services are recovered." The distinction in the mind of the draugntsman, which, without this section, would have been plain, is thus put beyond doubt. The fees, other than those which are to be paid out of the treasury, are those which are taxed and collected in suits; and these are to be recovered as like fees are recovered by similar officers of the state. In Pennsylvania such fees are recovered by taxation and execution, if not voluntarily paid; and when recovered belong exclusively to the officer. The plaintiff in whose suit they are collected has no claim upon nor responsibility respecting them. Beale v. Com., 7 Watts, 186. In this case Chief Justice Gibson says: "He who orders the service is also liable on an implied contract. Down to the receipt of them (the fees), by the sheriff, he certainly is; but it cannot be doubted that payment to the agent of the creditor, by the debtor ultimately liable, discharges the collateral liability of the intermediate one. If the money be lost in the sheriff's hands, it is lost to him whose property it was at the time; for a loss which would not have happened without some degree of negligence must be borne by him whose inattention occasioned it, and it is the business of the officer to see that the sheriff pay over his fees."

The act of July 13, 1866,—which provides "that all judgments, and moneys recovered or received for taxes, costs, forfeitures and penalties, shall be paid to collectors as internal taxes are required to be paid,"—effects no change in the existing law, except to require the costs, which belong to the government, to be paid into a different department, in internal revenue cases. These costs consist in expenditures made by it, during the progress of suits, and taxed to, and recovered from, defendants, on its account. And this manifestly, was the only purpose of the act. It does not require the officers' fees to be thus paid over; and no proper object is discoverable for such a requirement. The fees belong to the officers as the emoluments of their offices. Conceding that congress might require the payment, and send the officers to another department to recover back, such a purpose will not be attributed to the statute in the absence of plain terms to that effect.

This interpretation gives full force to the language of the statute, and, I have no doubt, to its purpose. The distinction between costs to which a successful party is entitled, and fees belonging to an officer, is well understood by the profession; and is judiciously stated by the court in Musser v. Good, 11 Serg. & R. 248, and again in Beale v. Com., before cited. In the former case the court says: "Costs are an allowance to a party for expenses incurred in conducting his suit; fees are a compensation to an officer for services rendered in the progress of the cause." The act of 1866, manifestly, recognizes this distinction, and was not intended to affect the officers referred to, by taking possession of their fees, but simply to turn the money coming to the government, in the form of costs, from revenue cases, into another department, more appropriate for its reception. The entire amount collected in the cases referred to has been paid into court; and we regard this as a proper practice, as it affords all persons interested an opportunity of contesting the officers' claims. The motion is therefore denied.

McKENNAN, Circuit Judge. The statutes referred to in the opinion of the district judge apply, as well to the disposition of money collected, or paid under proceedings in the circuit court, as to money in the custody of the district court. Hence it was desired that the circuit judge should sit with the district judge at the argument of the motion. The questions involved in it were argued with great fulness and ability, and the foregoing opinion is the result of our concurrent judgment. It is to be understood, therefore, as practically an adjudication by both courts, and as establishing the rule by which similar applications will be determined by the circuit court.

INDIANS — POWER OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE INTERCOURSE AMONG — RESERVATION INCLUDED WITHIN STATE LIMITS — FEDERAL CRIMINAL JURISDICTION.

1. Under the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, congress have power to prohibit all intercourse with them, except under a license.

[Cited in Oliver v. Liverpool & L. Ins. Co., 100 Mass. 537; Territory v. Guyot (Mont.) 22 Pac. 134.]

2. This power is the same as the power to regulate commerce among foreign nations, under which embargo laws have been enacted, and also laws of non-intercourse.

3. Under the treaty-making power, certain political relations have been established between the United States and the Indian tribes.

4. The laws regulating intercourse with the Indians, were intended to operate on communities, somewhat remote from a white population.

5. The exception in the act of 1802 [2 Stat. 139] refers to Indian tribes at that time surrounded by white settlements, as the remnant of tribes in Connecticut, Massachusetts, and other states.

6. The power of congress to regulate commerce with the Indians does not necessarily cease on their being included within the limits of a state.

7. The federal relations should be withdrawn from the Indians within a state, by the concurrent acts of the federal and state governments.

8. But if no such acts take place, and the Indians occupy a territory of very limited extent, surrounded by a white population, which necessarily have daily intercourse with the Indians, and it becomes impracticable to enforce the law, the federal jurisdiction must cease.

[Indictment against Jonathan Cisna.]

Mr. Swayne, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Parish, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant, having been indicted at the present term, for stealing a horse within the reservation of the Wyandott tribe of Indians, of the state of Ohio, of the goods and chattels of Henry Jocko, a friendly Indian, filed a demurrer to the indictment, which brings before the court the question, whether they can exercise jurisdiction in the case?

The indictment is founded on the fourth section of the act of congress, "to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," passed 30th March, 1802 [2 Stat. 139], which provides: "If any citizen or other person shall go into any town, settlement, or territory belonging or reserved by treaty of the United States to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit robbery, trespass, or other crime, against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which would be punishable if committed within the jurisdiction of any state against a citizen of the United States, or, unauthorized by law or with a hostile intention, shall be found on any Indian land, such offender shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding twelve months; and shall also, when property is taken or destroyed, forfeit and pay to such Indian or Indians, to whom the property taken or destroyed belongs, a sum equal to twice the just value of the property taken or destroyed, &c."

The Wyandott reserve is twelve miles square, and is situated in Crawford county, which for some years has been regularly organized as a county. And at the last session of the legislature of Ohio, a law was passed which declared, "that all white inhabitants, now or hereafter resident in said Wyandott reservation, shall be, and they are hereby made subject to the laws of the state of Ohio for the purpose of taxation, and for all civil, criminal, and military purposes, as other white citizens are now, or hereafter may be, in the different townships in the said county of Crawford, any law or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." Before the passage of this law the legislature had not, by express enactment, extended the jurisdiction of the state over this reserve; but in the general laws respecting crimes and punishments, it is not excepted from their operation. This reserve is surrounded by a dense white population, and public roads lead through it in various directions. It is admitted to be as much frequented by the white population as any other part of the county; and it would be extremely inconvenient, if not impracticable, for the citizens of the county to avoid entering the reserve in pursuing their ordinary and daily avocations.

On the 9th of January, 1789 [7 Stat. 28], the United States entered into a treaty with the Wyandott and other nations of Indians, in which it was agreed that if any citizen of the United States, or other person not being an Indian, shall settle on their land, such person shall forfeit the protection of the United States, and the Indians were at liberty to punish him or not, as they please. And all citizens or inhabitants of the United States were prohibited from hunting or destroying the game, or even entering on the Indian lands without a passport. Certain stipulations were made for the punishment of offences, such as horse-stealing, robbery, &c., and the Indians agreed to surrender the offenders among their tribes, who were to be punished equally with the citizens of the United States. At the time this treaty was formed, the Wyandott tribe owned a very extensive territory of rich and fertile country; but treaties of cession have been made from time to time, until their territory is restricted to twelve miles square.

By the act of 1802, above referred to, which regulates trade with the Indians, all citizens or residents of the United States are prohibited from entering into the Indian lands without a license, and penalties are provided for hunting on them, or committing depredations upon the property of Indians. Murder, by a white person, of an Indian, is punished with death; traders without license forfeit their merchandize; and a penalty is incurred by purchasing from an Indian a gun, any instrument of husbandry, a horse, or other specified articles of property. Jurisdiction is given to the superior courts in each of the territorial districts, and the circuit courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal cases in each district of the United States in which any offender under the intercourse law shall be apprehended, or may be brought for trial. The peculiar relation which a tribe of Indians, that resides within the limits of a state, bears to the federal and state governments, renders every exercise of jurisdiction over their persons and property, by the federal government, a matter of great delicacy and importance. The federal government is one of limited and specific powers. It cannot exercise jurisdiction by implication, but is confined to the special grants of power in the constitution; and in carrying into effect these grants, the most appropriate means should be adopted, and no means beyond what are necessary to give effect to the power, can be legitimately used. All powers not delegated to the federal government, are reserved to the states and the people. The power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes, is given to congress in the constitution. And under this and the treaty making power, numerous treaties have been formed and laws enacted, to regulate commercial intercourse with the numerous Indian tribes which live within the federal limits. The validity of these treaties and laws, it is believed, has not been questioned, so far as they act upon the Indian tribes and our own citizens, beyond the boundaries of any state. But serious questions have arisen, and are likely again to arise, between the federal and state authorities, respecting the jurisdiction of the former, under these laws, over the territory of Indians situated within a state sovereignty.

Within this state no collisions on this important subject have occurred; but the principle on which jurisdiction is exercised by the federal government, must be the same, under the same circumstances, in every state. The supreme court of Ohio have not decided whether offences under the state laws, if committed within the Wyandott reserve, by a white person, may be punished; but a circuit court of common pleas have decided that no punishment can be inflicted in such a case. No one can read the laws for the regulation of our intercourse with the Indian tribes, without perceiving that they were designed to operate on and protect communities of Indians, remotely situated from our own population. In the act of 1802 is a provision that it shall not be so construed "as to prevent any trade or intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States, and being within the ordinary jurisdiction of the individual states." This provision applied to the condition of Indians at the time the law was passed; and at that time the Wyandott tribe was not only far more numerous than it now is, but its territory was extensive and remote from a white population. They did not reside within the ordinary jurisdiction of any state. The exception was applicable to remnants of tribes which resided in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and other Eastern states. No express provision has been made in treaties or by act of congress, at what period or under what circumstances the power of the federal government to regulate commerce with the Wyandott or any other tribe of Indians, living within a state, shall be terminated.

This is a question whether it shall be decided by the federal or state authorities as important as it is delicate; and it is much to be regretted that some rule on the subject has not been adopted which would prevent collisions of jurisdiction. A concurrent action by the federal and state governments, in regard to this matter, would seem to be the most appropriate method of withdrawing the regulation of the general and substituting that of the local authority. But the federal government has not acted on the subject, and the duty is now imposed upon this court to determine, whether the power to act belongs to the judicial branch of the government.

The question of jurisdiction which is raised by the demurrer is, whether the law under which this indictment has been found, can be carried into effect within the Wyandott reserve. Whether this is properly a judicial question may admit of some controversy. If the period at which the law shall be suspended could be fixed, at the time the state government was organized, there would be no difficulty on the subject. But the Wyandott tribe of Indians required as much the fostering care and superintending power of the federal government, for the protection of its trade in 1803, when Ohio was admitted into the Union, as for some years prior to that period—and the white population was almost as remote from the Indian settlements as it had been for years; and the state jurisdiction was not extended over the Indians, nor was there any difficulty in giving effect to the intercourse law of 1802. In addition to these considerations, the supreme court have decided, that this law is not necessarily suspended within the limits of a state. If the provisions of the act of 1802 shall not apply to the case before the court, it must be upon the ground that they were unconstitutional when adopted, or have become inoperative by the progress of time and change of circumstances.

The former branch of this enquiry is strictly the exercise of a judicial power; but the latter, in most cases, at least, would seem to belong to the legislative department of the government. So far as it regards the policy of the federal government towards the Indians, within its constitutional powers, it is exclusively a question for the legislature; but as it respects any question of power between the federal and state governments, in whatever form it may arise, the judicial power is competent to decide it. During the whole course of our connection with the Indian tribes, we have recognized in them a power to make treaties, and certain political relations exist growing out of treaties between the federal government and almost every distinct tribe of Indians within our national limits. These relations may be extended by treaties as far as a sound policy, in the discretion of the treaty making power shall admit, where the Indians reside beyond the limits of a state; but within those limits neither the treaty making power nor the legislative power can be exercised so as to abridge the rights of a state.

Congress can exercise no power on this subject, beyond that of regulating commerce with the Indian tribes. The same power is given to congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states. Under this investiture of power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, a wide scope of legislation has been exercised. But the regulation of commerce among the several states has been limited principally to certain prohibitions and the equalization of duties. Congress cannot effectually regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, without adopting such provisions by law, as shall preserve those tribes from an indiscriminate commercial intercourse with our own citizens; such is their inferiority in the business of commerce while in an uncivilized state, that their interests would be sacrificed, if left to an unrestricted intercourse. It was on this ground that the act of 1802 prohibited white persons from entering upon the Indian territory without a license, and further to give protection to the Indians, government agents were appointed to reside among them, and penal laws were enacted, as has been stated, against citizens of the United States for committing depredations upon the territory, the persons or the property of the Indians. The exercise of the power to prohibit any intercourse with the Indians, except under a license, must be considered within the power to regulate commerce with them, if such regulation could not be effectual short of an intercourse thus restricted. Under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, congress have passed non-intercourse, embargo and other laws, which restricted or altogether prohibited any commercial intercourse with those nations; and as the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes is given to congress in the same clause of the constitution, and in the same words, it would seem to follow that the power may be exercised to the same extent in the one case as in the other. There is nothing in the condition of the Indians, when under the exclusive jurisdiction of the federal government, nor in the constitution, which can operate against this construction. The power to regulate commerce among the several states is limited by other provisions of the constitution, by the nature of the power and the sovereignty of the states.

The law of 1802 is constitutional, and so the supreme court have decided. That this act had a constitutional operation upon the Wyandott Nation admits of no doubt; and it remains to be considered whether the situation of this tribe has become so changed as to render this law inoperative as to them. The territory of the Wyandotts, as before stated, is limited to twelve miles square, and it is surrounded by a dense white population, which have daily intercourse with the Indians. Stores and taverns are kept within the reservation by the Indians or those connected with them, which are as much resorted to for trade and other purposes, by the surrounding white population, as similar establishments in any other part of the country. The treaties made with this tribe have not been abrogated, and they hold their possessory right to the soil on the same tenure as other tribes with whom treaties have been made. And a sub-agent of the government still resides among them, through whom the government holds its official intercourse with the tribe. The Wyandotts have made rapid advances in the arts of civilization. Many of them are very intelligent; their farms are well improved, and they generally live in good houses. They own property of almost every kind, and enjoy the comforts of life in as high a degree as many of their white neighbors.

On a community of Indians situated in so limited a territory, and mixed up with and surrounded by a white population, which carries on with them almost every kind of commerce incident to their condition, can the acts which regulate intercourse with the Indians operate? For years past, as if by universal consent, they have not been enforced over this territory. They are wholly unsuited to the condition of the Wyandott tribe, and it would be impossible to give them a practical operation. And it may be said that the federal government by restricting the territory of this tribe, and encouraging their advances in civilization, has mainly contributed to produce this state of things.

But it is insisted that the larceny charged in the indictment may be punished under the act of congress cited, as it was committed within the reserve, and on the property of one of the Wyandott Indians. And how does congress derive power to punish this offence, when committed within a state? The answer must be, from the power to regulate commerce with the Indians. But if this tribe of Indians is so situated as to render the exercise of this power wholly impracticable, must it not of necessity cease? And does not the incident fall with the principal power? If congress had power to punish offences committed on the persons or property of Indians, generally, there could be no objection to the exercise of it without reference to circumstances. But when the power to punish is derived exclusively from the power to regulate commerce, it is perfectly clear, when the power to regulate commerce ceases, the power to punish must also cease. To exercise the power to punish for a violation of a regulation necessary to maintain a commercial intercourse with the Indian tribes, as the Wyandotts are now situated, and within their territory, would be a usurpation of power by the general government, and a direct infringement upon the rights of the states.

This conclusion cannot be resisted. And it is immaterial whether the intercourse law of 1802, has been expressly repealed as to the Wyandotts, or rendered inoperative by the force of circumstances. That the law cannot be enforced in this reserve is clear; and this state of things having been produced by the conjoint acts of the federal and state governments, it may be presumed that the former intended, as to this tribe, to abrogate the law. No other presumption can be raised from a state of facts, wholly incompatible with the provisions of the act. An act may be repealed as well by adopting subsequent and incompatible provisions, as by express enactments. And in this view the act of 1802, so far as it regulates trade with the Wyandott Indians, must be considered as substantially repealed. Has not the state jurisdiction to punish offences committed by its own citizens within the Wyandott reserve? Of this, I can entertain no doubt. Ever since the state government has been organized, it has had power to punish its own citizens for offences committed within its limits; whether within an Indian territory or not; and if there be no constitutional prohibition, the state has power to punish its own citizens for offences committed beyond its own limits. The laws of a state cannot operate extra-territorially; but having jurisdiction over its own citizens, the legislature if not prohibited by the constitution, could make certain acts committed by them beyond its own limits, and without the limits of any organized government, an offence. No process could be issued to arrest an offender beyond the state boundaries, but if he comes voluntarily within the state, he would subject himself to its jurisdiction.

By the first section of an act of the British parliament of the 31st Geo. III., passed in 1803, it is provided, "that from and after the passing of this act, all offences committed within any of the Indian territories, or parts of America not within the limits of either of the said provinces of Lower or Upper Canada, or of any civil government of the United States of America shall be, and shall be deemed to be offences of the same nature, and shall be tried in the same manner and subject to the same punishment as if the same had been committed within the provinces of Lower or Upper Canada." Many years ago, the state of Georgia punished its own citizens for depredations committed upon the Indian territory within the state, and no one has ever questioned the legality of such a procedure. The state of New York has not only punished its own citizens, for offences committed within the Indian reserve in that state, but has extended its jurisdiction in criminal cases, over the Indians. The jurisdiction of the federal government over the Indian territory within a state, under the most favorable circumstances for the exercise of the power is limited to the mere purposes of trade, and cannot prevent a state from punishing its own citizens for offences committed within such territory. The exercise of this power by a state, would not be incompatible with the exercise of the power vested in the federal government. There are many offences, such as counterfeiting the gold and silver coin of the country, the notes of the Bank of the United States, &c. which are punishable as well under the laws of the state as those of the Union.

But as it regards the case under consideration, all objections are obviated by the fact, that the regulations of congress respecting commerce with the Indian tribes, have not been enforced within the Wyandott reserve for years, and cannot for the reasons stated be now enforced. It may be admitted that property stolen in an adjoining state and brought into Ohio, would not subject the offender to a prosecution in this state. The offence having been committed in a distinct sovereignty, could not be punished in Ohio; but such a case would, in no respect, be similar to the one under consideration. The Indian territory within a state cannot be considered as a foreign jurisdiction. Under certain circumstances, it has been decided that a state cannot extend its laws over the Indian territory, within it, and especially when those laws are incompatible with constitutional regulations by the federal government. But the jurisdiction is not foreign. If the state have the fee of the Indian lands, it may dispose of that fee subject to the Indian right of occupancy. And in every other respect may the state exercise a jurisdiction over the territory which shall not be incompatible with the constitutional regulations of the general government.

In the course of the argument by the district attorney, several adjudications of the supreme court, and a decision of the circuit court for the Eastern district of Tennessee, were referred to, as sustaining the jurisdiction in the present case. But the facts in this case are wholly dissimilar from those in the cases referred to, and they are not more so than the principles which apply to those facts. It is gratifying to reflect that the state laws will afford a more ample protection to the Wyandotts, as it regards their property, than the laws of the federal government. For the laws of the state punish with greater severity the offence charged in the indictment, than the laws of congress. And as it respects the Indians, no doubt can exist that their complaints will receive as prompt attention and as adequate redress, as those which are made by citizens of the state.

These considerations cannot enter into the question of jurisdiction; but they show that a decision against the jurisdiction of this court, will not leave the Indians unprotected, or lead to a failure of justice. The demurrer must be sustained.

It being suggested to the court by the district attorney, that prosecutions in the state court would be instituted against the defendant and the others against whom indictments had been found, for similar offences, the court directed the marshal to deliver over the defendants to the state authorities to answer, &c.

Case No. 14,796.

UNITED STATES v. CITY BANK.

[6 McLean, 130.] [1]

Circuit Court, D Ohio. Oct. Term, 1854.

BANKS — ILLEGAL DEPOSIT — ACTION TO RECOVER — DRAFTS — GOVERNMENT AGENTS — EVIDENCE.

1. No bank, under the sub-treasury law, can become a depository of the public money.

2. The law prohibits such a deposit, and inflicts a severe penalty on the public officer who makes it.

3. But a state bank may engage with the secretary of the treasury to transmit a draft to New Orleans or elsewhere.

4. This does not render a deposit necessary.

5. The same draft received by the bank may be transmitted, or having the specie at the place, the bank may draw on it and pay the treasury at New Orleans.

6. This accommodates both parties, without expense.

7. Where the money of the government is improperly placed in a bank, the illegality of the transaction is no bar to a recovery.

8. The agents of the government do not bind the government, when their powers are transcended.

[Cited in State v Sooy, 39 N. J. Law, 149.]

9. The money, in such a case, would be received wrongfully, and without any authority from the assent of the government.

10. It could be recovered by the government, if not on the contract, on the general counts.

11. And in such a case the writing would be evidence to charge the bank.

At law.

Ewing, Corwine & Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Stanbery, Swan & Andrews, for defendant.

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is brought by the United States to recover one hundred thousand dollars from the City Bank, which were received by it under a contract to convey the same from New York to New Orleans. The first count in the declaration charges that on the first of November, 1850, the City Bank of Columbus contracted with the United States to transfer the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, monies of the plaintiffs, from New York to New Orleans, to be deposited in the treasury of the United States at that place, by the first of January, 1851; and the said defendant, then and there, received the said sum, and promised to transmit and deliver the same to the treasury of the plaintiff in New Orleans, etc. And that the said defendant did not transfer the said sum of money by the 1st of January, 1851, nor at any other time, but converted the said sum of money to its own use. To this count a general demurrer has been filed.

On the argument of the demurrer, it was insisted by the counsel for defendant, that the contract was void, as against the policy and the provisions of the act of congress, of August 6, 1846, to provide "for the collection, safe keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue" (9 Stat. 59).

Argument of Counsel:

"This act requires all receipts and expenditures of the government to be made in coin or treasury notes. Section 18. It declares certain rooms in the treasury building at Washington, in the mint at Philadelphia and New Orleans, and in the custom houses of Boston, New York, Charleston, and St. Louis, to be the treasury of the United States; and provides for the appointment of four assistant treasurers, at the four last-named places. Sections 2–5. Section 6 requires all public officers to keep safely, without depositing in banks, etc., all public money, till the same is ordered to be transferred or paid out; and when orders for transfer are made, to make such transfers. Section 10 authorizes secretary of treasury 'to transfer' the monies in the hands of any depository to the treasury, or to any other depository, as the safety of the monies, or the convenience of the public service, may require. Section 13 allows to public officers all necessary expenses for safe keeping, transferring, and disbursing public monies. Section 16. That all officers, and other persons, charged by this or any other act, with the safe keeping, transfer, or disbursement of the public monies, are required to keep an entry of each sum received, and of each payment or transfer. And if any one of the said officers 'shall use, loan, exchange,' or 'deposit in any bank,' any public money entrusted to him for safe keeping, disbursement, transfer, or any other purpose, every such act shall be deemed an embezzlement, punishable by indictment, imprisonment from 6 months to 10 years, and to fine equal to the sum embezzled. And the provisions of this act shall be construed to extend 'to all persons charged with the safe keeping, transfer, or disbursement of the public monies,' whether such persons be indicted as receivers or depositaries of the same; and the refusal of such person, whether in or out of office, to pay any draft, etc., for any public money, no matter in what capacity received, or to transfer or disburse any such money, shall be prima facie an embezzlement.

"It is manifest that the intention of this act is to divorce the government from the banks, and to prohibit all bank agency in its fiscal arrangements. It prohibits all public officers from so much as using a bank as a place of deposit, and it declares that the deposit in a bank of monies entrusted to a public officer, or other person, for safe keeping or transfer, shall be construed an embezzlement. In the face of those provisions, it is absurd to say that a bank may be an agent to make a transfer, or that the contract of a bank for such a purpose is valid. The act of transferring the money involves a receipt and custody of the money, and its transportation to the place of delivery. For the time being the entire control of the money is in the person charged with the transfer. Such a custody or control over public money by a bank is contrary to the policy of this act, which proceeds on the idea of its insecurity. The simple act of depositing money, whilst in a course of transfer in a bank, is declared to be an embezzlement, and amounts to a high offense. If a bank cannot be used by a person charged with a transfer, so much as a place of temporary deposit or safe keeping —if that is forbidden by such a severe penalty—how can it be argued that the entire custody and control of the money, its receipt, transportation, and delivery, may be lawfully entrusted to such an agency?

"It may be very well maintained that this law considers the business of transfer as an official business, just as much as the receipt and safe keeping of the money. The sixth section requires the public officers to make the transfer. The thirteenth section allows to officers all necessary expenses for transferring. It is only in the sixteenth section that any provision appears which indicates that other persons than public officers can be charged with the business of transfer; but this provision applies as well to the safe keeping and disbursement (by other persons) of the public monies, as to their transfer, and these acts—i. e., the safe keeping and disbursement, are clearly official acts. It is difficult to imagine how a private individual can be charged with the safe keeping and disbursement of public money. It is also provided that all persons charged with any of these duties, are to make an entry of every payment or transfer. This carries the idea of official duty, the keeping of office books and accounts. So also does the last clause of the section, which provides that it shall apply as well to persons in as out of office. Persons out of office are clearly those who have been in office, but whose term of office has ceased in some way before their official duties were closed, and, therefore, for the finishing of their official duties, they are treated as officers, though denominated 'other persons.' But if the act is capable of being so construed as to allow this business of transfer to be matter of individual employment and private enterprise, and there was nothing in the act which, as matter of public policy, would prevent the employment of a bank as a transfer agent; yet, on another ground, a bank could not be so employed. The only guards provided in the act for the safe keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public monies, are these two—the official bond of the public officer, which secures the performance of the duty civiliter, and the prosecution for embezzlement, which secures it criminaliter. In one, if not in both these modes, the public treasure must always be secured. If the business of transfer can only be entrusted to an officer, then the security is in both modes; but if a person, other than an officer, can be so employed, then the security, the only sort provided, is the liability to a prosecution.

"A corporation, such as a bank, cannot be prosecuted in the mode provided by this act. It does not come within the purview of the law as a person capable of undertaking the duty of transfer, for the reason that it cannot be made liable to the provisions of the act intended to enforce and secure the performance of the duty. Nor can it be claimed that the public is secured under such a contract with the corporation, by the liability of the individual members or servants of the corporation, to a criminal prosecution. It is the corporation which makes the contract, and which is entrusted with the money, not the individual members or servants of the corporate body. 'Whenever a corporation makes a contract, it is the contract of the legal entity; of the artificial being created by the charter; and not the contract of the individual members.' Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 13 Pet. [38 U. S.] 587.

"The City Bank not capable of making this contract: The terms of the contract, as they are expressed, bind the bank to transfer $100,000 of the public money from New York to New Orleans, to be deposited in the treasury of New Orleans, by the 1st of January, 1851, free of charge. It is clear from the whole scope of the sub-treasury act, that a transfer of public money from one depository to another, involves simply the transportation of the money in specie, i. e., of the very money. It is in the nature of a bailment, a contract to carry and safely deliver the identical money entrusted to the agent. Every one knows that such was understood to be the meaning of this law, and that one great objection to the law, was the unnecessary cost of transporting coin between distant points, when transfers by means of drafts or bills of exchange would be so cheaply and readily made. Notwithstanding these objections, the law was so framed as to exclude all such paper or bank facilities, and there has been an annual appropriation to meet these extraordinary expenses. Vide Appropriation Act 1849 (9 Stat. 363), $15,000. The use, loan, investment, or exchange of public money for other funds, is expressly forbidden, as to all officers or persons entrusted with it for safe keeping or transfer. Section 16. This being the nature of the contract, we maintain that this bank had no capacity to make it.

"The City Bank is a corporation chartered by the state of Ohio, which, in addition to the ordinary incidents of a corporation, is expressly limited by its charter as follows: 'To loan money, buy, sell, and discount bills of exchange, notes, and all other written evidences of debt, receive deposits, buy and sell gold and silver coin, and bullion, collect and pay over money, and transact all other business properly appertaining to banking.' 43 Laws Ohio, p. 44, § 51. It is too clear for argument, that such a transaction as this does not come within any of the enumerated powers. It is not a loan of money, a buying, selling, or discounting, a deposit, a purchase, or a sale of coin, or a collection and paying over of money. Nor does it come under the general provision of business properly appertaining to banking; for it is certainly no proper banking business to transport bullion or any other commodity, either for hire, or as in this contract, without charge. It is simply a bailment, a contract to carry and safely deliver, without any use of the thing. That the subject matter of the contract is coin, or money, does not make it any more a banking business than if it were corn or any other specific article. The only plausible ground on which such a contract could be put as properly appertaining to banking, would be to suppose that the bank might receive and use the coin in New York, and by means of drafts or bills of exchange, effect the payment of a like sum in other coin at New Orleans, and so have the incidental benefit in the rate of exchange, or otherwise, between funds at New York or New Orleans. That would, in effect, be a dealing in coin or in exchange. But such a dealing is expressly forbidden to persons entrusted with the transfer of the public money. It can neither be bought, sold, or exchanged. It must be kept without use, and transferred without use, and cannot, in any way, or by any device, be made the subject of dealing or traffic, by individuals, or, most emphatically, by banks.

"The foregoing points arise on demurrer to the first count of the declaration, which sets up a contract with the bank."

The entire written argument by the counsel for the bank is given, in order that the strength of the grounds assumed may be shown.

Many of the arguments, in behalf of the defendant, are admitted. It was, no doubt, intended by the sub-treasury act, as it is usually called, to separate the moneyed action of the government from the banks. Although the bank of the United States had for nearly twenty years acted as the fiscal agent of the government, transmitting and paying public money at all points in the Union, when required, without loss or expense, the bank was rendered unpopular, and the deposits were withdrawn from it, and temporarily, state banks and other places were used for deposits, until the sub-treasury law was passed. This change has caused a heavy charge on the treasury, besides the losses that have been incurred; but it has been sustained until this time, by the popular voice. No deposit of public money can be made by a public functionary in a state bank, without a violation of the sub-treasury act. And it may be admitted that the act speaks of the sub-treasury officers, as making transfers of public monies, when ordered by the secretary of the treasury. These transfers to disbursing agents are not necessarily to be made in specie. The twentieth section of the sub-treasury act provides, "That no exchange of funds shall be made by any disbursing officers or agents of the government, of any grade or denomination whatsoever, or connected with any branch of the public service, other than an exchange for gold and silver; and every such disbursing officer, when the means for his disbursements are furnished to him in gold and silver, shall make his payments in the money so furnished; or when those means are furnished to him in drafts, shall cause those drafts to be presented at their place of payment, and properly paid according to the law; and he shall make his payments in the money so received for the drafts furnished, unless, in either case, he can exchange the means in his hands for gold and silver at par."

From the above provision, drafts were authorized to be transmitted in making disbursements, and these drafts may be exchanged for gold and silver. There is no prohibition in the act against the employment, as an agent to transmit funds, either an individual banker or a bank. And it is believed that under the present system bankers have frequently been employed to transmit the funds of the government, from one part of the country to another. During the war with Mexico, and for some time after its termination, the heavy disbursements were necessarily made at the West. New York, from its large importations, was the principal depository of the government; it was therefore necessary to transmit money from New York, where it was received, to New Orleans and other places in the West, where it was to be disbursed. Drafts on New York will readily command specie at New Orleans. Now, the secretary of the treasury, it appears from the declaration, being desirous to transmit one hundred thousand dollars from New York to New Orleans, draws a draft for that amount on the sub-treasurer of New York, which is received by the defendant, under an agreement to pay it into the sub-treasury at New Orleans. The very draft received by the defendant, may be transmitted to New Orleans, and there exchanged for specie, or the defendant, having specie at New Orleans, may draw on it in behalf of the sub-treasurer in New Orleans, in payment for the New York draft. Such a transaction would be the safest, the most expeditious, and the least expensive mode, of remitting the money. No one can be so competent as the secretary of the treasury to direct these exchanges, as he necessarily has a knowledge of the fiscal action of the government, including all places of deposit, and the amount of disbursements necessary at different points. That this may be done by the secretary, under the law, is clear.

But it is argued that the City Bank, by its charter, has no power to transmit coin from one point to another. That it might as well undertake the transportation of corn or anything else, which not being within the charter, would not bind the bank. But this does not meet the question. The question is not as to the transmission of coin, or any other commodity; but the City Bank is authorized to deal in bills of exchange. Of this there can be no doubt. The bank has power, as declared in its charter, "to loan money, buy, sell and discount bills of exchange, notes, and all other written evidences of debt." This is ample for the purposes of this case. Having funds in New Orleans, or the means of making a deposit there, the bill in question may be supposed to have been received by the bank, to meet obligations incurred in New York, or to constitute a fund there on which drafts may be drawn. This, in effect, is a mere exchange of a fund in New Orleans, for a deposit of the same amount in New York. By this transaction the government is accommodated without expense, and also the bank.

There are numerous cases, where two persons enter into a contract in fraud of the law, and against its policy, the rights of no third party being involved, in which neither a court of chancery nor of law will give relief as between the contracting parties. He who has gained an advantage will not be required to account, as the wages of iniquity are not adjustable at law or in chancery. But this rule does not hold, where the government is a party. The agents through whom the government acts, possess a limited authority, which, if transcended by them, does not bind the government. The contract or writing in such a case would be evidence of the receipt of the money, and having come into the possession of it without right, the illegality of the transaction would be no bar to a recovery. The possession of the bank would be wrongful, and without the assent of the government. And in such a case the contract would charge the bank, if not on a special on a general count in assumpsit. And the stockholders of the bank, having received the money through their agents, would be legally bound to refund it. But in the present case there was no illegality, as the contract with the bank was not a deposit of money, but a matter of exchange, which both parties might enter into. The demurrer is, therefore, overruled.

[There was a judgment in this case in favor of the defendant, which was affirmed in error by the supreme court. 21 How. (62 U. S.) 356.]

Case No. 14,797.

UNITED STATES v. The CITY OF MEXICO.

[11 Blatchf. 489;[1] 1 Cent. Law J. 191.]

Circuit Court, E. D. New York. Feb. 19, 1874.[2]

SHIPPING — PENAL ACTION — EMPLOYING SEAMEN WITHOUT SIGNED ARTICLES—MEXICAN VOYAGES—STATUTES.

The 14th section of the act of June 7th, 1872 (17 Stat. 265), provides, that, "if any master, mate, or other officer of a ship, knowingly receives, or accepts to be entered on board of any merchant ship, any seaman who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this act, the ship on board of which such seaman shall be found shall, for every such seaman," be liable to a penalty not exceeding $200. The 13th section of the same act provides, that every agreement with a seaman shall be signed by him in the presence of a shipping commissioner, and be acknowledged and certified under the hand and official seal of such commissioner. The 12th section of the same act provides, that the master of every ship bound from a port in the United States to a foreign port, shall make an agreement with every seaman of his crew, in a form prescribed by that section. By the act of January 15th, 1873 (17 Stat. 410), it is provided, that the 12th section of the said act of 1872 shall not apply to masters of vessels when engaged in trade with Mexico. The 1st section of the act of July 20th, 1790 (1 Stat. 131), provides, that the master of any vessel bound from a port in the United States to a foreign port, shall make an agreement in writing or in print, with every seaman on board, declaring the voyage or term of time for which such seaman shall be shipped. Held, that the said act of 1873 had no effect to modify the provisions of the said 13th section of the act of 1872, and that, notwithstanding the said act of 1872, the master of a vessel making a voyage from New York to a port in Mexico was required, under the said act of 1790, to make the agreement therein required, and was also required to see that such agreement was signed, acknowledged, and certified before a shipping commissioner, in the manner prescribed by the said 13th section of the said act of 1872, and that such vessel was liable to the penalty provided by the said 14th section of the said act of 1872, if her master received a seaman on board who had been engaged otherwise than under an agreement so signed, acknowledged and certified.

[This was a libel for a penalty against the steamship City of Mexico for a violation of the shipping act of June 7, 1872. The district court condemned the steamship in the sum of $200 and costs. Case No. 2,756. Claimants appeal.]

WOODRUFF, Circuit Judge. The libel in this case is founded on the provisions of the 14th section of the act of congress of June 7th, 1872, entitled, "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners by the several circuit courts of the United States, to superintend the shipping and discharge of seamen engaged in merchant ships belonging to the United States, and for the further protection of seamen." 17 Stat. 262, 265. That section imposes a penalty upon any ship, not exceeding two hundred dollars for each offence therein specified, and it separately specifies offences which shall subject the ship to penalty, by two distinct clauses: "First, if any person shall be carried to sea as one of the crew on board of any ship making a voyage as hereinbefore specified, without entering into an agreement with the master of said ship, in the form and manner, and at the place and times, hereby in such cases required, the ship shall be held liable, and for each such offence shall incur a penalty not exceeding two hundred dollars: provided, always, that the ship shall not be held liable for any person carried to sea," &c., &c. (describing certain cases of secretion on board without the knowledge of any officer of the ship, or false personation, &c.). "Secondly, if any master, mate, or other officer of a ship, knowingly receives, or accepts to be entered on board of any merchant ship, any seaman who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of this act, the ship on board of which such seaman shall be found shall, for every such seaman, be liable to and incur a penalty of a sum not exceeding two hundred dollars: provided, further, that, in case of desertion, or of casualty resulting in the loss of one or more seamen, the master may ship * * * and report the same to the United States consul at the first port at which he shall arrive, without incurring such penalty." Here are described two separate penalties, in distinct clauses of the section, and, as will presently be seen, the inquiry why both were inserted is very important and significant. For, the cases mentioned therein do not, on their face, seem to differ. Looking at the description of the cases, without consulting any other provisions of this or other statutes or requirements of law, it may well be suggested, that no person can be carried to sea, as one of the crew with the knowledge of the officers of the ship, without being received, accepted, or entered on board; and, hence, the two clauses would seem to be tautological or repetitious, prescribing two penalties for the same violations of law, one for each offence, not exceeding two hundred dollars, and the other for every such seaman, not exceeding two hundred dollars. But, this declaration in these separate clauses will, I think, be found a significant and important aid to the construction of the statute, when the facts of this case, the other provisions of this statute and the former law, and the claims here made by the counsel for the parties, are more fully brought into view.

From as early as the year 1729, the statutes of England, for the protection of seamen as well as the security of ship owners, have required, under penalty, that no master bound to parts beyond seas shall carry any seaman or mariner to sea, without first coming to an agreement with such seaman or mariner for his wages, time of service and other particulars specified, which agreement shall be in writing, &c. (Act 2 Geo. II. c. 36, § 1), and providing expressly that the seaman shall sign such agreement (Id. § 2). By subsequent statutes, having the interest and protection of seamen constantly in view, the provisions of the act referred to have been enlarged and carried into greater detail, and, down to the present time, the policy and even the necessity of such agreements have been recognized, and this requirement kept in full force.

The subject very early engaged the attention of the congress of the United States, and, by the act of July 20th, 1790 (1 Stat. 131), it was enacted, that, from and after the first day of December then next, "every master or commander of any ship or vessel bound from a port in the United States to any foreign port, or of any ship or vessel of the burthen of fifty tons or upwards, bound from a port in one state to a port in any other than an adjoining state, shall, before he proceed on such voyage, make an agreement in writing or in print, with every seaman or mariner on board such ship or vessel, (except such as shall be apprentice or servant to himself or owners,) declaring the voyage or voyages, term or terms of time, for which such seaman or mariner shall be shipped. And, if any master or commander of such ship or vessel shall carry out any seaman or mariner, (except apprentices or servants, as aforesaid,) without such contract or agreement being first made and signed by the seamen and mariners, such master or commander shall pay to every such seaman or mariner the highest price or wages which shall have been given at the port or place where such seaman or mariner shall have been shipped, for a similar voyage, within three months next before the time of such shipping; provided such seaman or mariner shall perform such voyage; or, if not, then for such time as he shall continue to do duty on board such ship or vessel; and shall moreover forfeit twenty dollars for every such seaman or mariner, one-half to the use of the person prosecuting for the same, the other half to the use of the United States; and such seaman or mariner, not having signed such contract, shall not be bound by the regulations, nor subject to the penalties and forfeitures, contained in this act." Other provisions follow, designed to secure both the seaman and the master or owners to the performance of their reciprocal duties. The act of April 14th, 1792 (1 Stat. 254), among other things, provides for the return of seamen, bound by agreement to serve, to their home, in certain cases, through the consuls of the United States. Other and subsequent acts exhibit the desire of congress to watch over and protect the interests of seamen.

In 1872, the act under which this proceeding was instituted was passed. It provides for the appointment of a shipping commissioner, and makes numerous and extensive provisions for carrying out the intention expressed in its title, above recited. Section 12 relates to ships bound from a port in the United States to a foreign port, or from a port on the Atlantic to a port on the Pacific, or vice versa; and provides that the master of every such ship "shall, before he proceeds on such voyage, make an agreement in writing or in print, with every seaman whom he carries to sea as one of the crew, in the manner hereinafter mentioned; and every such agreement shall be in the form, as near as may be, as hereunto in table 'D,' in the schedule annexed, and shall be dated at the time of the first signature thereof, and shall be signed by the master before any seaman signs the same, and shall contain the following particulars, that is to say:" Here follow numerous particulars, including all that were contained in the act of 1790, and very many which were not required by the law of 1790, or otherwise, in respect to other vessels than those in this section specified, and the form of agreement annexed, table D, contains many other specific details. Provisos to the section authorize the master to perform the duties of a shipping commissioner, as provided in a previous section, when in a port for which no shipping commissioner has been appointed; and, further, that this section should not apply to masters of vessels where the seamen are, by custom or agreement, entitled to participate in the profits or result of a cruise or voyage, nor to masters of coastwise nor to lake-going vessels that touch at foreign ports. It will thus be seen, that the duty of the master to enter into a written or printed agreement with the seaman is continued; and that, as to ships bound on certain specified voyages, the agreement must contain the details specifically mentioned in this section, while the masters of other vessels not included in this section satisfy their duty by making an agreement in writing, signed by the seaman, containing what was prescribed in the former law. The masters of all ships described in the act of 1790 must make the agreement with the seaman in writing or in print, some in the form prescribed by that act, others in the much more detailed form prescribed in this 12th section, but none are permitted to go to sea without a written or printed agreement with the seaman. Hereupon follows section 13, which declares that the following rules shall be observed with respect to agreements: "First. Every agreement, (except in such cases of agreements as are hereinafter specially provided for,) shall be signed by each seaman in the presence of a shipping commissioner. Secondly. When the crew is first engaged, the agreement shall be signed in duplicate, and one part shall be retained by the shipping commissioner, and the other part shall contain a special place or form for the description and signatures of persons engaged subsequently to the first departure of the ship, and shall be delivered to the master. Thirdly. Every agreement entered into before the commissioner shall be acknowledged and certified under the hand and official seal of such commissioner, and shall be indorsed on, or annexed to, such agreement, * * *" and the form of acknowledgment and certificate is given. It is claimed, that the words, "every agreement," in the first clause of this 13th section, mean only those agreements which masters of certain specified vessels named in the 12th section are, by that section, required to make. But, that is not the literal reading of the section. If that had been its intent, nothing was easier than to have so expressed it. Throughout the act, wherever it was intended to limit a provision to the voyages described in the 12th section, the limitation is made in express terms. Sections 8, 22, 24, 35, 36, 40, 58, and others which are connected therewith in their provisions. Nor is there anything in the design and object of the law, which implies such a limitation. If there were no other provisions in the various sections of the statute, except such as relate to the particular vessels included in the 12th section, much plausibility would be given to the claim, but many of the sections, probably the greatest number of them, are general, referring alike to other seamen as well as to those named in the 12th section. Sections 9, 11, 23, 25, 26, 31, 32, 43-50, 51-

54, 61–63, and others. Section 15 is especially significant, and the special exception in section 13 of "agreements hereinafter specially provided for," greatly strengthens this interpretation. For, when, after the use of the terms "every agreement," congress declares certain agreements to be excepted, the presumption is against any other exceptions. Nor does the nature of the provisions in the 13th section indicate such an intent. The purpose of the act is fittingly declared, in its title, to be for the protection of seamen. They need protection against being compelled or seduced to sign agreements to serve, without properly understanding the provisions of the agreement, the term of service, the nature of the voyage or voyages, the compensation they are to receive, and the times of payment. They are frequently in danger of being approached and led into engagements when intoxicated. All this congress knew, and wisely provided that every agreement should be signed by them in the presence of the commissioner, and be duly acknowledged. Certainly, this court cannot say that this was not as important, in reference to the agreements which are required by the act of 1790, as to those specified in the 12th section.

The two clauses of the 14th section, above recited, apply to this construction of the 13th section with especial significance. The first clause refers to the crew of a ship "making a voyage as hereinbefore specified," i, e., making the voyages mentioned in the 12th section, and annexes the penalty to taking to sea without an agreement "in the form," &c., hereby, "in such cases," required. The form hereby required is prescribed in the 12th section, and is required only in the cases therein specified. The vessel here was not condemned under that clause. But, the second part of the section is more general. It refers, in terms, to the officers of "any merchant ship," and to "any seaman" who has been engaged or supplied contrary to the provisions of the act. There are several provisions relating to that subject, and, probably, none more important than the 13th section, which provides for their signing agreements to serve for a voyage, in the presence of the commissioner, and so guards them from imposition and deception therein, as the case may be, when they are in a condition wholly unfit to take care of themselves. Sailors are so often likened to children, in reference to the ease with which they can be deceived or influenced, and to their recklessness and inability to protect themselves, that the value of this provision needs no further illustration. Unless this second clause is to have such general scope and effect, extending beyond the 12th section, and to cases not within it, it is difficult to assign to it any useful meaning. The cases arising under the 12th section are provided for in the first clause. These considerations lead to the conclusion, that not only the agreements mentioned in the 12th section, but all other agreements with seamen, required by law to be in writing (though not included in the 12th section), must be signed by the seaman in the presence of the commissioner, or the penalty declared in the second clause of the 14th section is incurred by the ship.

To apply this conclusion to the case now under consideration: By an act of congress passed on the 15th of January, 1873 (17 Stat. 410), the act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners, now under consideration, was amended, by adding to the above mentioned 12th section a further proviso, namely: "Provided, further, that this section shall not apply to masters of vessels when engaged in trade between the United States and the British North American possessions, or the West India Islands, or the republic of Mexico." By this proviso the number or class of vessels whose master is required to make with seamen the written or printed agreement specified in that section is greatly reduced. The voyage of the steamship City of Mexico, for which seamen were shipped without their signing an agreement, as required in the 13th section of the said act, was, as proved on the trial of this cause, "from the port of New York, via Vera Cruz, and one or more ports in Mexico, and back to New York, with privilege of touching at any intermediate ports." This was a case within the proviso introduced by the amendment of 1873, so that section 12 of the act has no application thereto. So far as this voyage is concerned, the act and the amendment are to be read together, and the master of the City of Mexico was under no duty to make, with his seamen, an agreement, in the form and with the numerous details, of its contents and time of signing by the master, which the 12th section prescribes. But, applying to the case the conclusion herein above stated, the master was within the section which requires that every agreement shall be signed by the seaman in the presence of the shipping commissioner, unless it can be shown that he was under no legal obligation to make any written or printed agreement whatever with his seamen. That proposition cannot be maintained. Upon that point I concur fully in the reasoning of the judge of the district court. The effect of the amendment was to withdraw the voyage of the City of Mexico from the operation of the 12th section, and to leave it in the same condition, and subject to all the duties and obligations to which it would have been subject, if the 12th section of the act had been originally passed in its now amended form.

An actual intention, in the minds of the legislators, to withdraw a very large proportion of our seamen from the protection of written shipping articles, which it has been the intention and policy of England, for more than one hundred and fifty years, to provide, and which this country adopted in its earliest history, and has since consistently maintained, will not, I think, be, for a moment, contended. The argument is, that whatever we may suppose to have been in the mind of our legislators, we are bound by what is involved in the words and legal effect of their enactment. And thereupon it is claimed, that, when the terms of the 12th section of the act of 1872 were, as originally passed, made broad enough to embrace the voyage in question, that operated by implication as a repeal of the act of 1790, so far as relates to such voyages, and, hence, when, in 1873, congress withdrew such voyages from the operation of the 12th section, that act necessarily left such voyages wholly unprovided for by any existing law; and that, although it is possible to say that this legislation created a casus omissus, which the legislators did not probably, in their minds, contemplate, the court is, nevertheless, bound to construe statutes according to the meaning and legal effect disclosed by the statutes themselves, and not by any speculative inquiry into the actual intention of the legislators. This may be conceded, but, if it is claimed that the legislative intent may not be gathered from the nature of the subject, the consequences which would flow from a proposed construction, and the admitted policy of the government, the claim goes too far. Whenever the construction of statutes and their legal effect is doubtful, or susceptible of a double interpretation, these considerations are of great force, and often conclusive.

The act of 1790 (with some few exceptions) applied to the masters of all vessels. Section 12 of the act of 1872 selected some of those vessels, and applied to them its more stringent and particular provisions. From these latter provisions, the voyage now in question was, by the amendment of 1873, relieved. Now, I do not deem it very material to say whether the voyages to the West Indies were always under the operation of both statutes, and so, when relieved from the operation of the 12th section, were simply left under the influence of the statute of 1790; or, whether the 12th section operated as a technical or constructive repeal of the act of 1790, in respect to such voyages, but that the amendment operated to revive the act of 1790 thus constructively repealed. Either view works the same result. Repeals by construction are not favored. There was no repugnance or inconsistency between the requirements of the act of 1790 and the requirements of the 12th section of the act of 1873. To the requirements of the act of 1790 that 12th section added others, in special cases. When the voyage now in question was withdrawn from among those cases, it remained under the operation of the act of 1790, as fully as if the act of 1873 had not been passed.

It follows, that the City of Mexico incurred the penalty declared in the second clause of the 14th section of the act of 1872, for which the decree was pronounced in the district court [Case No. 2,756]; and it must be so here decreed, with costs.

Case No. 14,798.

UNITED STATES v. CLAFLIN et al.

[13 Blatchf. 178.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 5, 1875.

INDICTMENT — DESCRIPTION — CERTAINTY — SMUGGLING.

1. Section 4 of the act of July 18th, 1866 (14 Stat. 179), reproduced in section 3082 of the Revised Statutes, provides, that, "if any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any merchandise, contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment or sale of such merchandise, after importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law," "the offender shall be fined," &c. An indictment founded on this section described the merchandise as "certain goods, wares and merchandise, to wit, a large quantity of silk goods, to wit, six cases containing silk goods, of the value of $30,000, a more particular description of which is to the jurors unknown," and stated that the goods were dutiable goods introduced into the port of New York from France: Held, that the indictment was not open to the objection, that the goods were not sufficiently identified, and the description of them not sufficient to enable the defendant to prepare his defence.

2. It is not necessary to describe property in an indictment with such particularity as will obviate all necessity for proof outside the record to support a plea of once in jeopardy.

3. A reasonable amount of detail in describing property is all that is necessary in an indictment, and, if more detail is required, a bill of particulars may be demanded.

4. An indictment under the said section need not set out the offence committed in the original importation, with the same particularity of time, place and circumstances that would be required in an indictment for the original offence.

5. Whether the said section applies to any other case than that of smuggled goods, quere.

6. The indictment having alleged that the illegality in the original importation of the goods was, that they had been "smuggled and clandestinely introduced into the United States," the charge must be confined to such illegality.

7. The averment that the goods were smuggled and clandestinely introduced into the port of New York from the republic of France is a sufficient averment to enable the court to say that the original importation was illegal, within the meaning of the statute.

8. The meaning of the word "smuggle," defined.

9. When technical words are used in an indictment, they must be taken to be intended to have their technical meaning.

10. In an indictment under the said 4th section of the act of 1866, it is not a sufficient designation of the illegality of the original importation, to say, merely, that the goods had been imported and brought into the United States contrary to law.

receiving, and concealing of goods illegally imported. Heard on motion to quash the indictment.]

Benjamin B. Foster, Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty. William M. Evarts, for defendants.

BENEDICT, District Judge. This cause comes before the court upon a motion to quash the indictment. The provision of law under which the defendants are charged, is section 4 of the act of July 18th, 1866 (14 Stat. 179), reproduced in section 3082 of the United States Revised Statutes. It is as follows: "If any person shall fraudulently or knowingly import or bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any merchandise contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment or sale of such merchandise, after importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law," "the offender shall be fined, &c.," the offence being a misdemeanor. The indictment contains four counts. In the first the charge is that of concealing, in the second, that of facilitating the transportation, in the third, that of facilitating the sale, of certain merchandise. These three counts are similar in form, and the objections now to be considered apply to each of them. The fourth count is different, and will be considered by itself.

The first objection which I examine is, that the goods, forming the subject of the transaction charged, are not sufficiently identified. The language used to identify the goods is as follows: "Certain goods, wares and merchandise, to wit, a large quantity of silk goods, to wit, six cases containing silk goods, of the value of $30,000, a more particular description of which is to the jurors unknown." There is also the additional statement that the goods were dutiable goods introduced into the port of New York from France. The rules by which the sufficiency of an indictment is to be determined have been too often stated to require repetition. These rules, as they have been understood and applied in the adjudged cases, are to be applied here. Their operation cannot be extended because of any embarrassment under which these defendants lie, because of the great extent of their business, and the large number of transactions, similar in character, which their dealings involve. Judged thus, the description under consideration will be found sufficient. Plainly, the language used shows the subject of the transaction to be within the scope of the statute creating the offence, for the statute in terms includes all kinds of merchandise. It is also clear, that the description in the indictment, together with such evidence as a trial must necessarily furnish, will fully protect in any future prosecution for the same offence. It is not necessary to describe property with such particularity as will obviate all necessity for proof outside the record to support a plea of once in jeopardy. Says the court, in Reg. v. Mansfield, 1 Car. & M. 140: "There must be some parol evidence in all cases, to show what it was that he was tried for before." The requisite notice of the offence charged is also to be found in the language used. The rule requiring notice of the offence charged is never so applied as to compel a description calculated to be fatal to the prosecution. A reasonable amount of detail in description is all that can be demanded for the purpose of informing the defendant. If, in any case, such reasonable detail prove insufficient to enable the defendant to prepare his defence, all possibility of injustice is removed by a bill of particulars, to which the defendant is entitled upon making oath that further particulars are necessary to enable him to defend. While speaking of a bill of particulars, it may be remarked, that the objections to a bill of particulars in a criminal case, because it cannot be certainly known that the bill of particulars describes the goods to which the attention of the grand jury was drawn, is an obvious one, and has been often urged, but has not been deemed of sufficient practical importance to overcome the advantages, both to the defendant and the prosecution, which follow from the practice. I have never heard a motive suggested as calculated to induce a public prosecutor to omit the presentation to the consideration of the grand jury of the goods that he must prove before the petit jury in support of the indictment which the grand jury find: and it cannot be presumed that the official representative of the United States, when called on to furnish a more detailed description of the goods presented by him to the consideration of the grand jury, would place on file a description of other goods. Experience has shown that the opposite presumption is sufficient to prevent injustice, and the practice seems established by the authorities. The description under consideration is not so deficient in detail as to be fatal to the indictment. It states that the articles bought were cases containing silk goods imported from France. It is true, that no numbers or marks are given; but marks and numbers may have been absent from the cases, and that for the purposes of concealment. The voyage of importation is not given, nor the name of the ship, nor that of the consignee; but such particulars are not necessarily disclosed by the cases of the goods, and are often wholly unknown; and, to require the various species of silk goods in the cases to be set forth, would open too wide the door for the defeat of the prosecution upon a question of variance. To demand the statement in the indictment of such particulars of description is to push the rule beyond reason. Furthermore, the grand jury have stated, in the indictment, that a more particular description is unknown to them.

That I do not go beyond the bounds of precedent in holding this description to be sufficient for the purpose of identifying the goods and enabling the defendants to prepare a defence, is made apparent by referring to some of the descriptions which adjudged cases show to have been approved. The words "one sheep" do not go far towards enabling an extensive grazier to prepare a defence. Such charges as "ten domestic fowls," "woolen cloth," "hay," "twenty-two pounds' weight of tin," "certain goods," "one post letter, the property of the postmaster general," "one leg of mutton," "one book of the value of $3," "divers goods," will all be found to have been considered sufficient to identify the subject of the charge in an indictment.

I pass, therefore, to consider the next objection—that the illegality in the importation of these cases is not properly stated. In support of this objection, the proposition is advanced, that an indictment for buying goods which have been brought into the United States contrary to law must set out the offence committed in the original importation, with the same particularity of time, place, and circumstances that would be required in an indictment for the original offence. Such a proposition cannot be maintained. The offence of knowingly buying smuggled goods is similar in character to that of receiving stolen goods, so much so that it has been conceded that the rule applied to indictments for receiving stolen goods may be properly applied to this indictment. The concession is fatal to the objection under consideration. The rule applying to indictments for receiving stolen goods is thus given by Roscoe: "It is not necessary to state in the indictment the name of the principal felon, and the usual practice is merely to state the goods to have been before then feloniously stolen." Rosc. Cr. Ev. 885. See, also, 2 Whart. Cr. Ev. §§ 1899, 1900. Archbold gives the form thus: "One silver tankard, goods and chattels of J. N., before then feloniously stolen." In Rex v. Jervis, 6 Car. & P. 156, it was expressly adjudged unnecessary to say by whom the principal offence had been committed. The same rule has been applied in cases of other offences than that of receiving stolen goods. Thus, in a prosecution under the English statute which makes it an offence to "receive any post letter, * * * the stealing, or taking, or embezzling, or secreting whereof shall amount to a felony under the post office act, knowing the same to have been stolen, taken, embezzled, or secreted," the indictment, as given by Archbold (Archb. Cr. Pl. 441) charges, that "one post letter, the property of the postmaster general, before then from and out of a certain post-letter bag feloniously stolen, J. S. feloniously did receive and have, knowing," &c. So, under 16 & 17 Victoria, where the offence is being in company with more than four others, "with any goods liable to forfeiture under this or any act relating to the customs," the indictment, as given by Archbold (Id. 869) charges that J. S., "being then in company with divers persons to the jurors unknown, to the number of five or more, was found feloniously with certain goods then liable to forfeiture under and by virtue of a certain act, to wit, an act," &c.

I next consider the position taken in support of this motion, that the indictment, to be good, should not only confine the charge to the dealing in smuggled goods, that is, goods secretly run into the United States without passing through the custom house, but also should state facts from which the court can determine such to have been the character of the importation referred to. It seems unnecessary to determine, in this case, whether section 4 of the act of 1866 can be applied in any case other than that of smuggled goods, for, whether the general words of the act are intended to cover other cases or not, this indictment is confined to such a case. Here, the pleader having, by the use of the words of the act, brought the charge within the scope of the statute, has proceeded to limit the charge to a dealing in smuggled goods. The illegality of the original importation is, in express terms, stated to consist in this, that said goods have been smuggled and clandestinely introduced into the United States. The case of U. S. v. Thomas [Case No. 16,473] is authority to show that the effect of adding such words to the words of the act is to confine the charge to the illegality thus described. Thus the indictment itself furnishes an answer to the first branch of the objection under consideration; and this language of the indictment has been here relied on by the prosecution as answering the argument made to show that section 4 of the act of 1866 is confined to cases of smuggled goods.

The second branch of the objection in hand is, that averring the goods to have been smuggled and clandestinely introduced into the port of New York from the republic of France, is not giving such a statement as enables the court to say that the original importation was illegal, within the meaning of the act of 1866. But, as already shown, the particularity of the statement respecting the act of importation required in charging the smuggler, is not required in charging the buyer of smuggled goods. In the case of the buyer, the act to be proved is the buying of certain goods, and the guilty knowledge which makes the act criminal is knowing the goods to have been smuggled. Here, the act of the defendant intended to be proved is stated with particularity of time, place, and subject-matter, and the guilty knowledge required by the act is shown by the averment that the defendants knew the goods to have been imported contrary to law, as aforesaid, that is to say, in this, that they had been smuggled into the United States.

The word "smuggle" is a technical word, having a known and accepted meaning—"a necessary meaning in a bad sense." It implies something illegal, and is inconsistent with an innocent intent. The idea conveyed by it is that of a secret introduction of goods with intent to avoid payment of duty. As such it is used by itself alone, and in the statutes even. It is used in section 4596 of the Revised Statutes, in a provision relating to seamen, where an "act of smuggling" plainly is supposed to mean such an act as above described, and none other. The word is used in the same technical manner in the English statute (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, § 244), where it is deemed sufficiently descriptive of a particular illegal employment in a ship, to designate it as "a smuggling ship." This technical meaning of the word has taken the form of a statutory definition in the moiety act of June 22d, 1874 (18 Stat. 186), where it is declared, that the act of "smuggling shall be construed to mean the act, with intent to defraud, of bringing into the United States, or, with like intent, attempting to bring into the United States, dutiable articles, without passing the same, or the package containing the same, through the custom house, or submitting them to the officers of the revenue for examination." What is smuggling for the informer when he claims his reward must also be smuggling for the goods as to which he informs.

But, it is asked here, and the question is one which can be asked with equal significance in many cases—How does it appear that the goods which the grand jury have designated as smuggled are smuggled goods, within the legal acceptation of the word? The answer is, that, when technical words are used in an indictment, they must be taken to be intended to have their technical meaning. In an indictment for uttering counterfeit money, it is sufficient to say that the defendant "uttered" the money, without stating the circumstances which are supposed to amount to an uttering. Under the statute making it an offence "to impair the queen's current coin," it is sufficient to use the words "did impair;" and, under another statute, to say, "did deface." Archb. Cr. Pl. 748, 749. Where the act reads, "shall import or receive into the United Kingdom counterfeit coin," it is sufficient to say, "did import from beyond the seas." Id. 751. The present indictment is within the principle of these precedents.

The real difficulty of the defendants does not lie in the form or the matter of the indictment, but in the fact that the charge made does not conform to the proofs which they suppose the government to have, and, upon the argument, this was put forth as matter of complaint, and the district attorney was challenged to admit that none of the goods referred to in the indictment were smuggled goods; but, it cannot in this way be made to appear that the indictment is bad. Nor is a motion like the present adapted to secure relief from such a difficulty.

I have now considered the objections urged against the first three counts of the indictment. It remains to consider the fourth and last count. This count is likewise based upon section 4 of the act of 1866. The difference between it and the other counts is, that, in assigning the illegality of the original importation, it uses simply the words of the statute, averring only that the goods had been imported and brought into the United States contrary to law. If the act of 1866 is confined in operation to a single form of illegality, it might be questioned whether a count like this, in an indictment for a secondary offence, would not be supported by the authorities already referred to; and, certainly, there is weight in the argument derived from the repealed provisions of section 16 of the act of 1842 [5 Stat. 563], the provision of the moiety act of 1874, and the general features of the revenue laws, to show that illegalities and frauds committed in regard to the value, description, invoice and ascertainment of the amount of duties to be paid upon goods which come into the custody and under the supervision and scrutiny of the officers of the customs, are excluded from the operation of the act of 1866. But, there are other forms of illegality, as, for instance, the introduction of prohibited goods, where the intent to avoid payment of duties does not exist, the introduction of goods packed in prohibited methods, and the like, which do not appear to be so excluded, and, if several forms of illegality are intended to be covered by the words of the act, it would seem that the illegality should be designated with more particularity than is afforded by the words "imported contrary to law." When the language of a statute comprehends, under general terms, divers forms of illegality, having different characteristics, it may well be considered proper to require something more than the words of the act. In cases of receivers, it is usual to state whether the goods received were goods stolen or goods obtained by false pretence. For this reason, and because such a count, based upon this same statute, has been condemned in a reported case in this circuit—the Case of Thomas, above referred to—I am of the opinion that the fourth count of this indictment should be rejected.

My determination upon this motion, therefore, is, that the fourth count of the indictment be quashed and that, as to the other counts, the motion be denied.

UNITED STATES v. CLAFLIN et al.

[14 Blatchf. 55;[1] 22 Int. Rev. Rec. 395.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Nov. 29, 1876.[2]

STATUTES — REPEAL — REVISED STATUTES — FINE — HOW RECOVERABLE — ILLEGAL IMPORTATIONS.

1. The decision of the supreme court in Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall [80 U. S.] 531, was, that the 4th section of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 179), did not effect such a repeal of the 2d section of the act of March 3, 1823 (3 Stat. 781), as took away the right of the United States to proceed under said 2d section, upon a cause of action which arose before the act of 1866 took effect

[Cited in U. S. v. Jordan, Case No. 15,498.]

2. As to causes of action falling within the terms of the 2d section of the act of 1823, which arose after the passage of the act of 1866, and before the passage of the Revised Statutes of the United States, no suit can be maintained brought after the passage of the Revised Statutes.

[Cited in The T. W. Eaton, Case No. 8,612; Thommasen v. Whitwill, 12 Fed. 903.]

3. No recovery can be had under said 2d section in respect of any acts done after the enactment of the Revised Statutes.

4. The fine provided for in section 4 of the act of 1866, which is substantially identical with section 3082 of the Revised Statutes, cannot be recovered in a civil action, but must be imposed after a conviction on a trial for a crime.

[This was an action for a penalty by the United States against Horace B. Claflin and others.

[For an indictment against the same defendants, see Case No. 14,798.]

The opinion of the district court (BLATCHFORD, District Judge,) was as follows:

"It is quite clear that the 2d section of the act of March 3, 1823 (3 Stat. 781), must be regarded as having been repealed by section 5596 of the Revised Statutes, (even if it had not been previously repealed,) on the ground that some portion of that act is embraced in the Revised Statutes, the provisions of the 1st section of that act being embraced in section 3099 of the Revised Statutes, and the provisions of the 2d section of that act not being embraced in any section of the Revised Statutes. The effect of such repeal is to destroy the right of the plaintiffs to recover under said 2d section in respect of any acts done after the enactment of the Revised Statutes. Therefore, counts 7, 9, 11 and 13 of declaration No. 2 are bad.

"By section 5597 of the Revised Statutes, it is provided, that the repeal of the several acts embraced in the Revised Statutes shall not affect any right accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil cause before the said repeal, but all rights and liabilities under the said acts shall continue, and may be enforced in the same manner as if said repeal had not been made; and, by section 5598, it is provided, that, all offences committed, and all penalties or forfeitures incurred under any statute, embraced in the Revised Statutes, prior to said repeal, may be prosecuted and punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if said repeal had not been made. Thereupon, the question arises, whether the 2d section of the act of 1823, on which the counts for double the value of the imported goods are founded in these cases, was in force at the time of the enactment of the Revised Statutes, or whether it had been superseded and virtually repealed by the enactment of the 4th and other sections of the act of July 18, 1866 (14 Stat. 179). It was decided by the supreme court in Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 531, that the penalty of double the value of the imported goods, imposed by the 2d section of the act of 1823, was not repealed by the 4th or any other section of the act of 1866. This decision was made at the December term, 1871. Yet, the 2d section of the act of 1823 is not found in the Revised Statutes, and, as has been shown, must be regarded as having been repealed by section 5596 of the Revised Statutes, even if it were not previously repealed. What is the effect of the omission to include it in the Revised Statutes? Section 5595 of the Revised Statutes declares, that the revision embraces the general and permanent statutes which were in force on December 1st, 1873, as revised and consolidated by the commissioners; and section 5596 declares, that all parts of acts passed prior to December 1st, 1873, which are not contained in the Revised Statutes, have been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts, or were not general and permanent in their nature, and that all acts passed prior to December 1st, 1873, no part of which is embraced in the Revised Statutes, shall not be affected or changed by the enactment of the Revised Statutes. As was pointed out by the circuit court for this district in Re Stupp [Case No. 13,563], the purport of the foregoing provision of section 5596 is, that, if any portion of a particular act is embraced in any section of the Revised Statutes, the parts of the same act which are not contained in the revision have been repealed or superseded by subsequent acts, or were not general and permanent in their nature, but that, if there be an entire permanent and general statute which was in force on the 1st of December, 1873, and no part of it is to be found in the Revised Statutes, it is to be regarded as still in force. As a portion of the act of 1823 is embraced in section 3099 of the Revised Statutes, and as the provisions of the 2d section of that act are not contained in the Revised Statutes, and as those provisions were general and permanent in their nature, it follows, that congress has declared by section 5596, that the provisions of the 2d section of the act of 1823 were repealed or superseded by a subsequent act. This declaration was made by congress after the decision in Stockwell v. U. S. [supra] was made, and in view of that decision; because, the only subsequent provisions of law by which the 2d section of the act of 1823 could have been, or were claimed to have been, repealed or superseded, were the provisions of the 4th section of the act of 1866, in connection with the provision of the 43d section of that act, repealing all parts of acts conflicting with or supplied by the act of 1866, and the provisions of the 4th section of the act of 1866 are found embodied in section 3082 of the Revised Statutes, and, in the marginal note to that section, the case of Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 531, is referred to.

"The force of the legislative declaration contained in section 3596 of the Revised Statutes, in respect to this subject, has been recognized by the supreme court in two cases. In Murdock v. City of Memphis, 20 Wall. [87 U. S.] 590, 617, the question arose as to whether any part of the 25th section of the judiciary act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 85), remained in force after the enactment of the 2d section of the act of February 5, 1867 (14 Stat. 386), or whether the later section had taken the place of the prior one, there being no express repeal of the prior one. Other provisions of the act of 1789 are incorporated in the Revised Statutes, but the 25th section of that act is not incorporated in them, and the 2d section of the act of 1867 is incorporated in them. The court came to the conclusion that the 25th section of the act of 1789 was technically repealed, and that the 2d section of the act of 1867 had taken its place, although the act of 1867 had no repealing clause, nor any express words of repeal. The opinion of the court then proceeds: 'This view is strongly supported by the consideration, that the revision of the laws of congress, passed at the last session, based upon the idea that no change in the existing law should be made, has incorporated with the Revised Statutes nothing but the 2d section of the act of 1867. Whatever might have been our abstract views of the effect of the act of 1867, we are, as to all the future cases, bound by the law as found in the Revised Statutes, by the express language of congress on that subject; and it would be labor lost to consider any other view of the question.'

"In the case of Smythe v. Fiske, 23 Wall. [90 U. S.] 374, the supreme court, in construing certain sections of tariff acts passed in 1842 [5 Stat. 548], 1846 [9 Stat. 42], and 1864 [13 Stat. 202], refers to the manner in which those sections, as reproduced in the Revised Statutes, are worded, and says that such wording is 'a legislative declaration that such was the state of the law on the 1st of December, 1873,' that is, prior to the enactment of the Revised Statutes, and 'is necessarily a construction of the last clause of the 8th section of the act of 1864, in accordance with that which we have given to it,' and that 'it was the declared purpose of congress to collate all the statutes as they were at that date, and not to make any change in their provisions.'

"In accordance with these views it must be held, that the omission to enact in the Revised Statutes the 2d section of the act of 1823, while another portion of that act is enacted in the Revised Statutes, is a legislative declaration by congress, that, on the 1st of December, 1873, and prior to the enactment of the Revised Statutes, the 2d section of the act of 1823 was not in force, but had been repealed or superseded. It could have been repealed or superseded only by the act of 1866; and it must be held that congress has declared, by statute, that, notwithstanding the decision of the supreme court in Stockwell v. U. S. [supra], the 2d section of the act of 1823 was superseded by the act of 1866, and was not in force after the act of 1866 was enacted.

"The authority of congress to declare, by statute, the existing state of statutory law, has been recognized and upheld by the supreme court. In Bailey v. Clark, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 284, the question arose as to the meaning of the words 'capital employed' by banks or bankers, in the 110th section of the internal revenue act of June 30th, 1864 [13 Stat. 277], as amended by section 9 of the act of July 13, 1866 (14 Stat. 136), as applicable to questions of taxation which arose in 1869 and 1870. Congress, by section 37 of the act of June 6, 1872 (17 Stat. 256), enacted that the words 'capital employed,' in such 110th section, 'shall not include money borrowed or received from day to day, in the usual course of business, from any person not a partner of, or interested in, the said bank, association or firm.' In reference to this enactment, the court says: 'This enactment was evidently intended to remove any doubt previously existing as to the meaning of the statute, and declare its true construction and meaning. Had it been intended to apply only to cases subsequently arising, it would undoubtedly have so provided in terms.'

"The question thus presented, as to whether causes of action falling within the terms of the 2d section of the act of 1823, and which arose prior to the enactment of the Revised Statutes, on the 22d of June, 1874 [18 Stat. 186], can be prosecuted on or after the latter date, has been heretofore ruled by me in favor of such prosecution, on the ground that the supreme court had held that the act of 1866 did not repeal the 2d section of the act of 1823. But the views above presented as to the effect of section 5596 of the Revised Statutes, in the particulars referred to, were not as fully considered as they now have been. It follows, that all the odd numbered counts, in both of the declarations, must be held bad.

"As to the even numbered counts, all those in suit No. 1, and counts 2, 4, and 6 in suit No. 2, are founded on section 4 of the act of 1866, while counts 8, 10, 12 and 14 in suit No. 2 are founded on section 3082 of the Revised Statutes. These sections are substantially identical. It was decided by the supreme court, in Stockwell v. U. S., that the 4th section of the act of 1866 was designed to punish as a crime that which before had subjected an offender to only civil liability or quasi civil liability. Besides the forfeiture of the offending merchandise, the only penalty imposed is, that the offender shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $5,000, nor less than $50, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both. This fine is manifestly a fine not to be recovered by a civil action, but to be imposed after a conviction on a trial for a crime, as a punishment for which the court may, in its discretion, inflict imprisonment, either with or without the imposition of a fine. No such imprisonment can be inflicted as the result of a civil action.

"Moreover, this is an action of debt, and, in each of the even numbered counts, the plaintiffs claim the sum of $5,000 as a debt. But the statute does not impose a penalty or fine of $5,000, or of any other definite sum, or of any sum which can be reduced to a certainty otherwise than by the discretion of the court in fixing such sum after a verdict on a trial. There can be no verdict for any definite sum. Debt lies only when a sum certain is due to the plaintiff, or a sum which can be reduced to a certainty, so as to form the basis of a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for a sum certain.

"It follows, that all the even numbered counts are bad. The demurrers are sustained."

William M. Evarts and Elihu Root, for defendants in error.

JOHNSON, Circuit Judge. After examining the case of Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 531, I am constrained to think that the supreme court did not intend to hold that the second section of the act of March 3d, 1823, there in question, was not, to any intent, repealed by the 4th section of the act of July 18th, 1866, but only that no repeal was thus effected which took away the right of the United States to proceed under the former section, upon a cause of action which arose before the act of 1866 took effect. That was the case which stood for judgment, as matter of fact, and that was the limitation stated at the end of the prevailing opinion of the court. The general tenor of the argument would seem to lead to the broader conclusion, that no repeal, in any sense, was effected by the act of 1866; but this rather strengthens the force of the limitation upon the conclusion, which was expressed, certainly not by any accidental phrase, in the opinion of the court. It is true, that we are left without any indication of the ground of the discrimination. That, however, is not necessary to be ascertained for the purpose of the present case; for, so far as the question of the repeal of the act of 1823 may be supposed to affect transactions occurring before the passage of the Revised Statutes and after that of the act of 1866, that question seems to be controlled by the provisions of the Revised Statutes. In the views expressed by Judge Blatchford, and upon the grounds stated by him on this point, I concur.

In this connection, it ought to be observed, that, quite evidently, the views expressed by Judge Blatchford were those entertained by the commissioners to revise the statutes, and by the congress which enacted them. The commissioners reported to congress, in their draft of the revision, both section 4 of the act of 1866 and section 2 of the act of 1823, consolidated into one section. Revision of the United States Statutes, as drafted by the commissioners appointed for that purpose (volume 2, p. 1480, tit. 36, c. 10, § 636). This appears to have been done by the commissioners, not because they so construed the law, but because of the supposed effect of the Stockwell Case, to which they refer in a foot-note to the proposed section. The section, as reported by the revisers, is as follows, (a note, which accompanies it, stating that the words in italics are new, and the words in brackets [parentheses] are found in the existing law, but are recommended to be omitted): "Sec. 636. If any person shall fraudulently or knowingly bring into the United States, or assist in so doing, any merchandise, contrary to law, or shall receive, conceal, buy, sell, or in any manner facilitate the transportation, concealment or sale of such merchandise, after importation, knowing the same to have been imported contrary to law, double the value of such merchandise shall be forfeited, (and) or the offender shall, (on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in any sum not exceeding five thousand dollars, nor less than fifty dollars, or be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, or both, at the discretion of such court) be punishable by a fine of not more than five thousand dollars nor less than fifty dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both." The revisers' foot-note to this section is as follows: "Section 2 of the act of March 3, 1823, c. 583 (3 Stat. 781), is substantially incorporated in the text, pursuant to the decision in [Stockwell v. U. S.] 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 531. It provided 'that, if any person or persons shall receive, conceal, or buy any goods, wares or merchandise, knowing them to have been illegally imported into the United States, and liable to seizure by virtue of any act in relation to the revenue, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares or merchandise so received, concealed or purchased.'" Congress, with the whole subject thus fully spread before it, and the question of the scope and effect of the decision in the Stockwell Case thus fairly and formally presented, struck out from this proposed section all that was incorporated into it from the act of 1823, and left in section 3082 of the Revised Statutes only the provisions of the act of 1866, with slight verbal alterations.

Upon the other sets of counts, I do not think it necessary to add anything. The judgment must be affirmed.

[This case was subsequently carried by writ of error to the supreme court, which affirmed the judgment of this court. 97 U. S. 546.]

WITNESS—INTEREST—OWNER OF STOLEN GOODS—RELEASE OF INTEREST IN FINE.

Upon indictment for larceny under the act of congress [of 1790 (1 Stat. 112)], the owner of the goods stolen is a competent witness after having released to the United States his half of the fine.

Indictment [against John Clancey], under the act of congress, for stealing the goods of Luke O'Dea.

The attorney for the United States offered the owner of the goods as a witness. The counsel for the prisoner objected, because, by the act of congress, half of the fine is to go to the owner.

The witness executed a release to the United States of his half of the fine, whereupon he was sworn.

EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL — EMPLOYE OF POST OFFICE—INDICTMENT—BANK NOTE.

1. In an indictment under the act of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 102], for embezzling a letter containing a bank note, it is not necessary to state the particular office held by the accused.

2. Neither is it necessary to allege the note to have been of an incorporated bank, or of any value.

This was an indictment [against Eben H. Clark] under the twenty-first section of the act of March 3, 1825 (3 Story's Laws, 1991), for embezzling a letter containing a bank note.

The case came on to be tried, before Judge RANDALL, and a jury, on May 25, 1846; and was submitted without argument by Mr. Petit, district attorney, for the United States, and by Mr. Wheeler, for Clark, except a suggestion, by the prisoner's counsel, that the indictment was defective as not stating the particular office held by Clark (who was postmaster at Cherry Ridge, Wayne county, Pa.), or alleging that the note was of an incorporated bank, or of any value. The words of the indictment were "that * * * one Eben H. Clark, late of the district aforesaid, Yeoman, then and there being a person employed in the department of the post office establishment, did secrete and embezzle a letter, to wit, etc., * * * the said letter then and there containing a bank note for the payment of ten dollars, contrary, etc."

RANDALL, District Judge. The indictment charges that the accused, being a person employed in the department in the post office establishment, did secrete and embezzle a letter, etc., containing a bank note for the payment of ten dollars.

It is objected, in the first place, that the indictment does not state what particular office the accused held; and precedents of indictments under St. 7 Geo. III. c. 50, show that the particular office is named. Appropriate precedents are certainly entitled to respect, and when they have been uniformly acted upon will be considered of authority; but the English statute names a variety of officers in the post office who shall be liable to the penalty, while the act of congress merely says "any person employed in any of the departments of the post office establishment," and the precedents in this court have been uniform with this one. The fact of such employment is a question for the jury, and I do not think the objection has any force.

It is next alleged that the bank note is not stated to have been of any incorporated bank, or of any value; and the case of Stewart v. Com., 4 Serg. & R. 194, is said to support that objection. It may be a sufficient answer to say that the case of Stewart v. Com. was decided on a local statute then in force, but since, as to that part of it, repealed, confining the larceny of bank notes to those of an incorporated bank; and that the act of congress, under which the present indictment is framed, makes no such distinction. In an indictment for larceny it is necessary to state the value of the article stolen, as well to ascertain the degree of the larceny, so as to enable the court to pass sentence of restitution. No such necessity exists in this case. The offence charged is secreting and "embezzling a letter." The punishment for this offence depends upon whether the letter contains any of the securities mentioned in the twenty-first section of the act of 1825, the first of which is "any bank note." The amount or value of the note does not alter or change the offence, and is therefore immaterial. The object of the law is to insure a faithful discharge of the duties of the office by every one in any way connected with it. It therefore prevents all temptation to crime by punishing the embezzlement of one dollar as severely as that of ten thousand.

HOMICIDE—SLAVE—MANSLAUGHTER—PUNISHMENT.

In Alexandria county, a slave guilty of manslaughter was punished by burning in the hand and whipping with ten stripes.

[Cited in U. S. v. Frye, Case No. 15,173.]

The defendant [John Clark], who was a slave about thirteen years old, was indicted for the murder of another slave, named Burdet, about fifteen years old. The deceased was larger and stronger than the defendant, and struck him several times, till the latter drew a knife and told the deceased that if he did not leave striking him, he would stab him; the deceased continued to strike him, and he stabbed the deceased in the left breast, of which wound he died instantly.

The jury found him guilty of manslaughter, and THE COURT sentenced him to be burnt in the hand, and whipped with ten stripes.

JUSTICE OF PEACE—PROSECUTION FOR TAKING INSUFFICIENT BAIL—INDICTMENT.

In an indictment against a justice of the peace for taking insufficient bail in a criminal case, it is not necessary to state in what respects the bail was insufficient; nor to set out the security taken; nor to aver that the defendant ordered the offender to be discharged from the arrest. Motion to quash refused.

[Cited in Mattingly v. U. S., Case No. 9,295.]

This was an indictment [against Robert Clark] for corruptly taking "insufficient security" for the appearance of George Milburn, who was arrested on a capias ad respondendum, and in custody of the marshal upon an indictment for keeping "a certain gaming-table called a 'faro-bank,'" against the form of the act of congress of the 2d of March, 1831 (4 Stat. 448), which makes it a penitentiary offence, whereby the said George Milburn was released from the custody of the marshal, and escaped; and also by means whereof he did not appear at the said court, and therein made default, and hath not since appeared to be dealt with according to law, to the great hindrance of public justice, in contempt of the laws, and against the peace and government of the United States.

The counsel for defendant moved the court to quash the indictment: (1) Because it does not state in what respects the security taken was insufficient; whether it was insufficient because the sum was too small, or because the persons taken as bail were insufficient to answer the amount of the recognizance, or because the form in which the security was taken was insufficient; and because it does not set out the security taken, so that the court can judge whether it was regularly taken, and in an amount adequate to the offence, and in due form. (2) Because it does not aver that the defendant ordered Milburn to be discharged from arrest.

CRANCH, Chief Judge. Upon comparing this indictment with the form of an indictment for a similar offence in 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 244, the court is of opinion that it is in substance a good indictment, and is sufficiently certain to require the defendant to plead to it. The motion to quash it is, therefore, overruled. The other indictment against the same defendant for taking insufficient security in the case of Henry Miller, is even more full and formal than the other; and the motion to quash it is also overruled.

PERJURY—HEARING BEFORE DISTRICT JUDGE—STATUTE.

G. Blake, for the United States.

Mr. Pitman, for defendant.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The grand jury have found an indictment against Stephen G. Clark for perjury. The indictment charges the offence to have been committed on the hearing of a certain complaint against Henry Bancroft and others, for piracy, "depending before the Honorable John Davis, then and ever since being judge of the district court of the United States for the aforesaid district of Massachusetts, and a magistrate of the said United States," and concludes, "against the form of the statute in such case made and provided." A motion has been made to quash the indictment, because the offence is not within the purview of any statute of the United States; it not being charged to have been committed in any oath or affirmation, taken in any court of the United States; or in any deposition taken pursuant to the laws of the United States. It is very clear, that the indictment does not, in terms, charge the offence to have been committed in any court of the United States, nor in any deposition taken pursuant to its laws. The act, on which the indictment is founded (Act April 30th, 1790, c. 9, § 18) provides, that "if any person shall, wilfully and corruptly, commit perjury, or shall, by any means, procure any person to commit corrupt and wilful perjury, on his or her oath or affirmation, in any suit, controversy, matter or cause, depending in any of the courts of the United States, or in any deposition taken pursuant to the laws of the United States," he shall, on conviction, be punished. The hearing before the district judge was under the authority of the judiciary act of September 24th, 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 73], which provides "that for any crime or offence against the United States, the offender may, by any justice or judge of the United States, or by any justice of the peace or other magistrate of any of the United States, where he may be found," be arrested, imprisoned, or bailed for trial, before the competent court of the United States.

It is contended by the district attorney, that every act done and proceeding had by the district judge, in his official capacity, is an act of the district court of the United States; and that the hearing before him was in his official capacity. If this argument were true, the substance of the objection would still remain; for it is nowhere alleged that he acted in his judicial or official capacity, much less is it averred, that he acted as a court of the United States. Now no rule is better settled, than that criminal statutes are to be construed strictly, and that no conviction can be had for a statute offence, unless it be charged in such a manner, as to bring the case within the terms of the statute. The statute does not punish every perjury, but only a perjury, done in a court of the United States. Plainly, therefore, it is of the very essence of the offence, that it should be charged as committed in such court. Now under the authority of the United States there are but three courts known in law, the district, circuit, and supreme court; and as congress alone can, by the constitution, ordain and establish courts, none can exist but such as they create and name. The offence is not charged to have been committed before either of these established courts; and we cannot, by intendment and inference, make out what ought to have been directly averred. But the argument itself is not correct. The district judge is not the district court, though he is the presiding officer thereof. A court is not a judge, nor a judge a court. A judge is a public officer, who, by virtue of his office, is clothed with judicial authorities. A court is defined to be a place in which justice is judicially administered. Co. Litt. 58; 3 Bl. Comm. 23. It is the exercise of judicial power, by the proper officer or officers, at a time and place appointed by law. The officers exist independent of the exercise of such appointed jurisdiction; though the court may not, in general, be holden independent of its officers. This last position, however, is not always strictly true; for a court is considered so much as an assemblage of mere abstract judicial powers, to be organized and exercised at stated times and places, that by our laws, it may be adjourned without the presence of a judge. Act Sept. 24th, 1789, c. 20, § 6. There are many powers, which the officers of a court, collectively or individually, may and do exercise, exclusive of their organization as a court. Indeed what they shall do in either the capacity of an officer, or of a court, depends exclusively upon the provisions of the law. It is not true, therefore, that every act done by the district judge is, in point of law, the act of the district court. In some instances, powers are confided to him, which he may exercise either in court, or, by virtue of office, out of court. In other instances, powers are given to him in one capacity, which are denied in the other. The power to issue writs of habeas corpus is an example of the former kind. Act Sept. 24th, 1789, c. 20, § 14. The power of the district judge to appoint and hold special district courts, of the latter kind. Id. § 3. In his capacity as a court, he may try certain offences and suits of common law and admiralty jurisdiction. In his capacity as a judge he has no such authority. In his capacity as district judge, he is a constituent member of this court. It would be absurd to contend, that when he holds the circuit court, he yet holds the district court. Nay, the very case before us is a very strong illustration of the distinction. As a district court, or rather, holding the district court, he has no cognizance of the offence of piracy; it is expressly excluded by statute (Id. § 9) and consequently the complaint would have been coram non judice. As a judge of the United States, he has complete cognizance for the purpose of commitment for trial. If, therefore, the offence had been laid, as committed before the district court, on a trial or complaint for piracy, it would have been a fatal objection. It cannot be necessary to pursue the argument on this head further; it is utterly insupportable.

It is further argued by the district attorney, that the indictment may well be supported, as charging a perjury in a "deposition taken pursuant to the laws of the United States," because, in a large sense, a verbal oath or affirmation may be considered as a deposition. If this were true, I do not perceive how it would help the indictment. It would still be a fatal defect, that it was not so charged. The indictment would not bring the case within the terms of the statute, and no argumentative inferences will supply the want of direct averments of material facts. 2 Hawk. P. C. p. 249, § 10; Id. c. 25, § 110; 1 Saund. 135, note 3; Bac. Abr. "Indictment," H, 3. But is this the true exposition of the statute? I have already stated the general rule, as to penal statutes, that their construction is strict; a rule that, in cases of doubtful meaning, always inclines the court to that, which is most favorable to the defendant, unless it be repelled by the context. For myself, I confess that I think, that the language of this statute is not only not doubtful, but obviously pointed against the construction contended for. The words, stripped of unnecessary appendages, admit of but two readings, viz. "if any person shall wilfully and corruptly, commit perjury, in any deposition taken pursuant to the laws of the United States;" or "if any person shall, wilfully and corruptly, commit perjury, on his or her oath or affirmation, in any deposition," &c. Read the language either way, there is an obvious distinction between an oath and a deposition; and in the latter way, which in my judgment is the true reading, the distinction becomes irresistible. Besides, the ordinary and usual meaning of the word "deposition" is confined to written testimony, at least in legal proceedings; and in legislating upon this subject, congress must be presumed to use the language in its legal sense. I believe there will not be found an instance in our laws, where the word is used in a different sense. In the act of September 24th, 1789, c. 20, § 30, in which congress have provided for the taking of depositions of witnesses under certain circumstances, the language is, that "the deposition of such person may be taken;" and throughout the whole section the word is used to denote the written testimony of witnesses, in contradiction to oral testimony. This act was contemporaneous with that, on which the indictment is founded; and as the terms "deposition" and "taken" are used in both in the same connexion, it seems to me impossible to doubt, that they ought to receive the same interpretation, more especially, as the depositions taken under the judicial act must have been immediately within the purview of the prohibition.

The indictment, therefore, cannot be supported upon the footing of the statute. It is certainly a most unfortunate omission in our laws; but I am afraid it is not the only class of cases, in which legislation in detail has unintentionally clogged the administration of justice. But although the indictment cannot be supported on the statute, it may be, nevertheless, good at common law: and if so, the conclusion against the form of the statute will not vitiate it. 2 Hawk. P. C. 251, § 115; 4 Term R. 202; 5 Term R. 162; 1 Saund. 135, note 3; Com. Dig. "Indictment," G, 6. We are, however, precluded from considering this question as at common law, because the supreme court have held, that this court has no common law jurisdiction over offences. I am bound to acquiesce in that decision, though I have never been able to satisfy my judgment of its accuracy. Had the point been fully argued, instead of passing subsilentio, I should have felt a greater satisfaction in the decision. It is, however, to be considered as settled, unless that high tribunal should hereafter choose to review the question in a more deliberate argument. I should not regret it, however, if a division of the court is made on either point, because it will bring the questions solemnly before the court of the last resort.

DAVIS, District Judge, did not concur in this opinion, with a view to a solemn decision in the supreme court, and therefore the cause was certified to the supreme court, as upon a division of the court.

OBSTRUCTING PASSAGE OF MAIL — STOPPING PASSENGER TRAIN CARRYING MAIL—RES GESTÆ.

1. The act of congress [Act 1872; 17 Stat. 312] which makes it criminal to obstruct or retard the passage of the mail applies where the mail is carried by rail in a passenger train which is unlawfully stopped by persons who are willing to permit the passage of the mail car detached from the passenger cars of the train.

[Cited in Re Grand Jury, 62 Fed. 843.]

2. Words used by such persons may be act of obstruction when they constitute part of the wrongful business in question.

The defendant [Edward Clark] was indicted under section 3995, Rev. St., for knowingly and wilfully obstructing and retarding the passage of the mail and of the carriage carrying the same. The evidence on behalf of the prosecution was that the defendant was one of a number of persons who assembled at the depot of the Lehigh Valley Railroad at South Easton, in this district, on the morning of the 27th of July last; that on the arrival of the mail train from Mauch Chunk to Philadelphia, at the depot on that morning, the defendant, who had no connection with the train, said to persons having charge of it, that the mail car could go on, but not the rest of the train; and that he afterwards got on the train and with others placed it in a siding, where it remained for several days.

Benjamin L. Temple, for defendant.

CADWALADER, District Judge (charging jury). The defendant is charged with retarding the transportation of the mail. The first question is, whether anybody committed the offence; and the second question, whether the defendant participated in its commission. It would be convenient to consider those two questions separately. The mail, in point of fact, was retarded, as the postmaster testifies, two or three days. The occurrence which retarded it, according to the tendency of the proofs, was that several persons were assembled at the depot at Easton, for no lawful purpose, and that one or more of them declared that the mail might go on, but the passenger train should not. They uncoupled the mail, and afterwards coupled it for the purpose of carrying it, as they did, to a siding. If that was the fact, and their purpose was to retard the train which transported the mail, it matters not in point of law whether they were or were not willing that the mail car or baggage car, or the particular vehicle carrying the mail, should go on. I had occasion, a week ago, to define the law on that subject; and when I had reached my home in the evening I found that the afternoon mail had brought me the Chicago Legal News, containing Judge Drummond's opinion on the same subject; and although I cannot recollect the words which I used, the words are so nearly identical that I cannot now discriminate between what I said and what he said. The substance of it is that from the foundation of the government of the United States, under the present constitution, the mails have been carried in the same vehicles or trains which also transport passengers. The public authority, and no private person, regulates the method of transportation. As Judge Drummond said: "In relation to the transportation of the mails by means of railroads it is true that it appears by the evidence in this case that these defendants were willing that the mail car should go, but it must be borne in mind that the mail car can only go in such a way as to enable the railroad to transport the mail where there are other cars accompanying it. It is not practicable, as a general thing, for a railroad to transport a mail car by itself, because that would be attended by serious loss, so that while nominally they permitted the mail car to go, they really, by preventing the transit of other passenger cars, interfered with the transportation of the mails."

There is a familiar proposition of law that where a person is concerned in performing an unlawful act, he is responsible for other unlawful acts which he commits in the course of the wrong that he intends to commit. If a man intends to strike A with a stick, and he strikes B and breaks his head, he cannot get off by saying to B, "I did not mean to strike you, I meant to strike the other man." That the purpose was here not to delay the mail is of no importance if the act done was an unlawful act, and its effect was to retard the transportation of the mail. This question came before the judges of the supreme court of the United States about nine years ago. [U. S. v. Kirby], 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 486. They said that if a man stops the mail when he is doing a lawful act, such as arresting a criminal who is a passenger, that is not obstructing the mail. The supreme court, however, added these words: "When the acts which create the obstruction are in themselves unlawful, the intention to obstruct will be imputed to their author, although the attainment of other ends may have been his primary object." These propositions are not disputed in the present case. I believe counsel candidly admitted the law to be so. But when we come to consider the facts presently, it will be found useful to have thus ascertained how the law is laid down. If you believe the evidence, there is, I think, no reasonable doubt that the offence in question was committed by somebody; that the transportation of the mail at this place, and from it, was unlawfully retarded.

Then the second and the main question is, whether the defendant was a guilty participant. If he participated in any wise intentionally in what brought about the result, he is guilty. It may become in this case material to define another rule of law, which is to determine when words spoken are acts. A witness who says a man did nothing, may nevertheless prove that he did something by words. It thus becomes important to know when spoken words constitute either acts of guilt or evidence of guilt. In some cases it is, in other cases it is not, a difficult question. In the present case I can state the rule in a simple and intelligible way, and it will be for you to apply it, or to reject its application. The rule is, that where words constitute part of the business, rightful or wrongful, which is in question, they are acts. If, therefore, one of the crowd there said, in defining their purpose, that the mail might go on but the passenger train should not, if such words were uttered when the transaction was in progress, and as a part of it, the man who uttered those words committed a wrongful act if the jury find that such was his intention. Let us apply the evidence in this case. But before doing so I will make another discrimination, so as to simplify the question which we are ultimately to reach. It is contended by the defendant's counsel that, if, for any reason, whether for protection of the mail or any other cause, it was taken out of the car which was pushed into the cut, from that time there was no offence to be committed, that from that time the progress of the offence was ended. Consider that a moment. If, for the safety of the mail, or for the purpose of assorting it, or for any other purpose, it was temporarily taken out of the car, how is it the less retarded if the unlawful act prevented it from being taken back to the car and carried forward? Mr. Dawes, the postmaster, has testified that the mail was delayed three days. At what point of time was it delayed? Suppose somebody had gone and locked or unlocked the door in execution of the general design, would that not have been part of the act of delaying? The question, therefore, is, not where the mail was, but whether it was delayed.

And now we come to the particular evidence which is to determine the guilt or innocence of the present defendant. The weight of the evidence, I think, is in his favor on one point; and that is that the original uncoupling of the car had occurred before he reached the place. The witnesses on his part so testify; and although the apparent tendency of some testimony of witnesses for the prosecution was, as one would first listen to it, the other way, yet I see no necessary contradiction; and we may take it that according to the weight of the evidence he did not arrive there with his two companions until that part of the act committed was consummated. But that he was there before the car was wheeled to the siding, the evidence on this part tends also to prove; and if that is so, and, if Mr. Lewis is correct in stating, as he did twice in his evidence, that the defendant himself said that the mail car should go no further, then there is sufficient evidence in law for the conviction of this defendant, if you find it sufficient in fact. Mr. Lewis's testimony is distinct. He said: "I recollect the train; the 27th of July; when it came in a big crowd there mounted the train; said it should not go further; saw defendant there, heard him give orders, heard him say that the mail car should go but not the rest of the train." Whether that occurred before or after the actual taking out of the mail, if it was in part execution of the whole transaction, it retarded the mail for two or three days. If, I say, you find, without any reasonable doubt, that the words which Mr. Lewis has uttered here were really uttered by the defendant, and were uttered with the object and purpose of preventing, by intimidation or otherwise, the progress of the mail, then, as I said before, the evidence is sufficient in law, if it satisfies you in point of fact without any reasonable doubt. If you have any reasonable doubt you will give the defendant the benefit of it and acquit him; but if, as men of business, you have no reasonable doubt, you should find a verdict conformable to your real belief.

There is some evidence tending to show that, in ordinary times, persons mount these passenger trains, or other parts of the train, and perhaps also baggage and mail trains, in order to go from one side of the river in Pennsylvania to the other in New Jersey, and that is allowed without charge. If you believe that that was really the errand of this defendant, you should give him the benefit of it as a strong reason of presumption in his favor. But you should also recollect that, according to the evidence, there was a large crowd there, some of whom had already declared that the train should not proceed with the passenger part of it; and you will recollect that the period when, according to the evidence, this defendant mounted the train, if he did mount it, was after it had been declared that the train should go no further, and after it had been uncoupled, if you so find; but if you also find that he was a participant in moving it to the siding, whether the mail was in it or not, provided that part of the acts was in execution of the general purpose of retarding the mail, then that part of the evidence would be of much less importance. You will give it such weight as you think it is entitled to.

The district attorney states that I have made a mistake. He says that the mail, according to the evidence of Mr. Dawes, was sent on the same afternoon, that instead of being delayed two or three days it was delayed only say two or three hours. But that would make no difference in point of law if the evidence convinces you that it was willfully delayed. The main question, I think, for you, is, whether the defendant was one of those who declared, as Lewis testifies, that the passenger train should not go on though the mail train might.

The counsel for the defendant understood the evidence as though it were a regular thing to take the train to this cut or siding. If he is right, give the defendant the benefit of that view of the evidence. But the testimony is that the train was coupled after having been uncoupled, and that it was carried to the siding and left there.

I believe, gentlemen, I have said all that occurs to me as necessary.

The jury rendered a verdict of "Guilty."

BANKRUPTCY—INDICTMENT FOR FRAUDULENT DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—OMISSION OF PROPERTY IN SCHEDULES—INDICTMENT.

1. Whether congress has power to punish a fraud committed by a debtor on his creditor, both residing within the same state, unless the act is done in contemplation of bankruptcy or in connection with some other matter within the federal jurisdiction, quære?

2. Section 44 of the bankrupt act [of 1867 (14 Stat. 539)], punishing bankrupts who, within three months before their petition is filed, dispose of goods otherwise than in the due course of trade, with intent to defraud, does not refer to an intent to defraud only the original seller of the goods thus disposed of.

[Cited in U. S. v. Penn, Case No. 16,025; U. S. v. Myers, Id. 15,848.]

3. The crime of fraudulently omitting property or effects from a bankrupt's schedule is complete when the false schedule is filed.

[Cited in Huntington v. Saunders, 64 Fed. 480.]

4. An indictment for omitting property and effects from the schedule need not allege that the bankrupt took the oath of allegiance prescribed by section 11 of the bankrupt act.

Indictment [against Hugh Clark] for a misdemeanor under the bankrupt act. After a verdict of guilty, the defendant moved in arrest of judgment.

M. F. Dickinson, Jr., Asst. U. S. Dist. Atty.

E. Avery, for defendant.

LOWELL, District Judge. The third count of this indictment charges that the defendant, within three months next before the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, did dispose of, otherwise than by bona fide transactions in the ordinary way of his trade, certain of his goods and chattels, described, which he had obtained on credit, and which remained unpaid for, with intent to defraud a certain creditor. It is objected that congress cannot legislate for frauds committed by a debtor on a single creditor within the same state, unless the act relates to bankruptcy or to some other matter within the federal jurisdiction; and that it has not in fact so legislated in this case. Without now passing upon the constitutional question, which, however, seems to me well taken, I may say that on the construction of the clause under consideration I am of opinion with the defendant, that the scope of the act is to punish frauds on the creditors generally, and not on the particular creditor who sold the goods, nor any other single creditor, and that this count, which charges a fraud on one creditor only, cannot be sustained. If the goods were obtained on credit with intent to dispose of them to raise money, the fraud on the seller would be the most obvious one; but the statute seems to be directed against frauds upon the creditors as a body, and it does not refer the intent to the time of the purchase, but to that of the disposal of the goods out of the usual course of trade, and at that time the fraud could not injure one creditor more than the rest.

But the verdict cannot be set aside, if either of the other counts is good, for it was a several finding on each of the three charges. The first and second counts both allege specified omissions of property and effects from the schedule of assets filed by the defendant with his voluntary petition in bankruptcy. It is urged that all the acts and omissions mentioned in the first part of section 44 [of the bankrupt act (14 Stat. 539)] must take place after the proceedings are begun; whereas, the filing of the schedules in voluntary petitions is contemporaneous with the beginning of the proceedings. Upon a careful reading of the section, it appears by no means necessary to hold that the clause beginning, "or shall, with intent to defraud, wilfully and fraudulently conceal from his assignee or omit from his schedule," is qualified by the original limitation of time. It is a new division of the subject, and one which requires no such limitation, because the prohibited acts cannot be committed before bankruptcy. The offence is complete if a bankrupt fraudulently omits from his schedule any property or effects, with the designated intent. An English case was cited to show that a bankrupt ought not to be held guilty of omission and concealment until he had passed his last examination. But that case was decided under St. 6 Geo. IV. c. 16, § 112, which punishes a bankrupt who shall not, upon his examination, deliver up his estate, books, &c., and it was held that he had a locus penitentiæ until his last examination. Under our act, his duty is to file accurate schedules at the outset, and if they are fraudulently inaccurate he is punishable. We have no last examination of bankrupts, nor any examination at all, unless specially ordered. The whole system is so different in this respect, that the case cited has no relation to the subject of inquiry.

Another objection is, that the indictment does not sufficiently show that the bankrupt court had jurisdiction, and that the proceedings were regular and sufficient. Under this head, again, there was much reliance placed upon the English cases. It is hardly necessary to consider now how far an indictment must go in this direction. We have never adopted the English practice of requiring in every action tried by an assignee evidence of every fact necessary to show that he is rightfully such. The assignment is conclusive evidence of his right; and the bankrupt court is a superior court whose acts are presumed to be regular. In this case, however, enough is pleaded to show that the district court, sitting in bankruptcy, had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the person, and that proceedings were duly begun. The absence of an allegation that the defendant took the oath of allegiance is more especially relied on. To this there are two answers: First, that the omission of effects from the schedule with intent to defraud might be complete before the oath of allegiance was taken; because, although the prescribed form contemplates that the oath shall be annexed to the petition, yet it cannot be doubted that under section 11 it might lawfully be filed at any time afterwards and before further proceedings are had, with precisely the same effect as if annexed. It may be doubted, too, whether the bankrupt can take advantage of the omission of his duty in this respect. Another answer is, that neither the law nor the prescribed form requires that the petition should state whether the bankrupt is a citizen of the United States or not; and this indictment does not show this defendant to be a citizen; and as the statute is equally applicable to resident aliens, while the oath is to be taken only by citizens, there is nothing on the face of this indictment which calls for an allegation that the oath was taken. If the defendant was a citizen, and neglected to take the oath, he must show it in defence. The indictment, in setting out the petition, follows the form of petition prescribed by the supreme court, and actually adopted in this case.

Motion denied.

[The defendant was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the jail of the commonwealth at Dedham, in the county of Norfolk, for the space of fifteen months.] [2]

Case No. 14,807.

UNITED STATES v. CLARK.

[1 Paine, 629.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New York. Oct. Term, 1826.

UNITED STATES—PRIORITY—ASSIGNMENTS—INSOLVENCY—NOTICE—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—ASSUMPSIT.

1. An assignment under the act of congress of 1797 [1 Stat. 512], to entitle the United States to their priority, must be an assignment of all the debtor's property; that is, the assignment must be a general one as opposed to a partial assignment, or an assignment professedly of a part only of the debtor's property.

[Cited in U. S. v. Langton, Case No. 15,560; Allen v. U. S., 17 Wall. (84 U. S.) 209.]

[Cited in King v. McGilliard, 76 Ind. 31; Mussey v. Noyes, 26 Vt. 474.]

2. Where there is an omission of an article of property in an assignment which purports to be general, but which does not show that the intention was that the assignment should be a partial as opposed to a general one, it does not take the case out of the act.

[Cited in Winner v. Hoyt, 66 Wis. 247, 28 N. W. 390.]

3. If the assignment does not on its face appear to be general, the onus probandi is on the United States.

4. The priority of the United States does not attach by the mere concealment of their debtor while insolvent. The "legal bankruptcy" mentioned in the act applies only to cases of legal insolvency, where by operation of law the debtor's property is taken out of his hands to be distributed by others.

[Cited in U. S. v. Wilkinson, Case No. 16,695.]

5. An assignee is not liable under the act until notice of the debt due the United States. But the notice need not be given by the United States, nor is a judgment or suit against him necessary in order to charge him with notice. The notice must be such as is required in ordinary cases of trustees, and enough to put a prudent man on inquiry.

[Cited in U. S. v. Eggleston, Case No. 15,027.]

6. Where the debtor, at the time of making the assignment, informed the assignee that he was surety on a bond to the United States, and that he believed the bond was broken, it was held sufficient notice to the assignee.

7. The bond on which he was such surety was a paymaster's bond, conditioned that the latter should well and truly account for and pay over all monies received by him as such paymaster. Held, that the debt of the paymaster to the United States was created by the advances made to him, and not at the time of striking a balance of account against him on the treasury books; and that the surety became a debtor as soon as the paymaster failed to account according to law.

8. And it was held, that it was not necessary that the debt of the surety should be ascertained by a judgment against him in order to make the assignee chargeable with its payment; but that the latter might in the action against himself have the benefit of any reduction to which the surety was entitled.

9. Where the United States are entitled to a priority, they can bring an action of assumpsit against the assignee for monies received by him under the assignment.

10. The article omitted in the assignment was a debt from the assignee to the debtor of the United States, growing out of a previous partnership between them. After the making of the assignment the assignee gave the debtor his bond for the debt. Held, that if the bond was given for monies of the debtor in the assignee's hands at the making of the assignment, the amount might be recovered in assumpsit, but not if it grew out of unsettled partnership concerns.

11. Where assumpsit is brought against an assignee, and he has funds which cannot be reached by the action, it seems that he is not entitled to a deduction for his expenses incurred in the preservation of the property, and the execution of his trust.

12. Where a part of the assigned property had been sold at auction under the direction of the assignee, it was held enough prima facie to show that he had received the price for which it was sold.

This was an action of assumpsit for money had and received, to recover of the defendant [Daniel P. Clark] certain funds of Gilbert Stuart, a debtor of the United States, which had come to the hands of the defendant; the United States claiming the funds by virtue of the priority given by the fifth section of the act of March 3, 1797. The defendant pleaded the general issue.

Gilbert Stuart and another became sureties on a bond to the United States, with Joseph B. Stuart, the principal, a paymaster in the army, on the 10th of July, 1813. The bond was joint and several, in the penalty of

[2] [From 4 N. B. R. 59 (Quarto, 14).]

[1] [Reported by Elijah Paine, Jr., Esq.]

$7,000, conditioned, that the said Joseph B. Stuart, the paymaster, should faithfully perform the duties of paymaster of the —— regiment, and should account for and pay all monies which should come to his hands as such paymaster. By transcripts from the treasury department, it appeared that the paymaster's account was dated December 20, 1819, and a balance of $18,000 and upwards was then due by him to the United States. All the items both of charge and credit were prior to the 15th June, 1815. On the 28th of August, 1819, Gilbert Stuart kept concealed to avoid arrest by his creditors, being deeply insolvent. On the said 28th of August, 1819, Gilbert Stuart being thus insolvent, made an assignment of his property to the defendant and John Stuart, Jr., providing for all his creditors to be paid according to certain priorities. The schedules containing the specification of the property conveyed, were entitled: "Of the Real Property of Gilbert Stuart;" "Of the Personal Property of Gilbert;" "Bonds and Mortgages of Gilbert Stuart;" "Notes and Accounts of Gilbert Stuart;" "Contracts for Sales of Lands of Gilbert Stuart." The schedules contained a minute detail of all the property. A notice was advertised immediately after the assignment, stating, that Gilbert Stuart had assigned his real and personal estate to John Stuart, Jr., and Daniel P. Clark, for payment of his debts, according to the terms of the assignment. At the time the assignment was made, it was declared by Gilbert Stuart to John Stuart, Jr., that it was to contain all his property, and after the execution of it that it did so contain. Within a few days before the assignment, John Stuart, Jr., asked the defendant Clark, the other assignee, if he did not owe Gilbert Stuart, to which he answered, "No, not a dollar." Gilbert Stuart declared the same thing. On the 20th of September, 1819, a settlement took place of certain previous concerns between the defendant and Gilbert Stuart, growing out of a partnership between them, which had ceased long before, the funds of which had been used by defendant in his own business; and on that settlement the sum of $7,400 was found due by defendant to Gilbert Stuart, for which he gave his bond. This bond was afterwards reduced by payments to Gilbert Stuart by the defendant, and allowances by the former to the latter, to $3,000, in April, 1820. On this last settlement the bond for $7,400 was given up, and a new obligation given by defendant to Gilbert Stuart for $3,000, in which he had, however, inserted as a condition, that he was to be indemnified against his liability to the creditors under the assignment, for a certain sale to one Joanna Stuart, of furniture of Gilbert Stuart, comprised in the assignment. The whole amount of property proved to be sold was, furniture $2,556. A further sum of $90 was received by defendant. In May, 1821, suit was brought by the United States on the bond against Gilbert Stuart, and judgment rendered in the same month for the amount of the bond. It appeared, that at the time the assignment was made, on the 28th of August, 1819, Gilbert Stuart informed the defendant of the bond to the United States, but told him that he, Gilbert Stuart, was not liable, because he had not been duly notified of the default of Joseph B. Stuart. It further appeared, that on the 20th of September, 1819, the date of the first settlement, the defendant knew of the bond and of the default of Joseph B. Stuart, but thought Gilbert Stuart not liable.

R. Tillotson, Dist. Atty., S. A. Foote, and D. Lord, for plaintiffs, contended:

That by the indebtedness of Joseph B. Stuart, all accruing before the 15th of June, 1815, the condition of the bond was broken, and Gilbert Stuart was a debtor to the United States, within the meaning of the act, on and before the 28th of August, 1819. That by the concealment of Gilbert Stuart, he being insolvent, an act of legal bankruptcy had been committed within the act of congress of March 3, 1797, which entitled the United States to a priority of payment out of Gilbert Stuart's estate. That the assignment of the 28th of August, 1819, was an assignment by the debtor, Gilbert Stuart, of all his property within the meaning of the same act. That the debt of $7,400 having been left out of the assignment through mistake or fraud, or not then being ascertained, this circumstance did not prevent the assignment from being a general one, within the meaning of the law. That an action for money had and received would lie, for the proceeds of the assigned property, and also for the amount of the reserved debt, on which the priority was alleged to have attached on the 28th of August, 1819. That no payments after the 28th of August, 1819, or at farthest after the 20th September, 1819, should be allowed to defendant.

T. A. Emmet and R. Emmet, for defendant, contended:

That the condition of the bond not being for the payment of a specific sum of money, the indebtedness of Gilbert Stuart as surety, did not arise until the extent of his liability was ascertained and defined by a judgment on the bond, or, at least, until the commencement of a suit upon it; and at all events, that no such indebtedness could have arisen or existed in law prior to the settlement of the paymaster's accounts in December, 1819. That the defendant, as assignee of the surety, could not be charged with notice, nor had the plaintiffs a right to inquire into his acts as assignee previous to the legal existence of the surety's indebtedness to them. That the defendant's knowledge of the paymaster's default, at the time of the assignment, was not sufficiently proved, and even if it had been, that such knowledge and the knowledge of Gilbert Stuart's suretyship, could not bind him, prior to a judgment against Gilbert Stuart as such surety, inasmuch as Gilbert Stuart might have had a good defence, which would have discharged him in an action brought against him as surety. That the assignment was not an assignment of all the debtor's property within the meaning of the law, and even if it were so, that the totality of the assignment and the keeping concealed to avoid arrest, were not circumstances of which the United States could avail themselves to create their priority, unless there was an ascertained and strictly legal indebtedness by Gilbert Stuart to them at the time, which could not be the fact, as the paymaster's accounts were not even finally made up, and his defalcation ascertained, until after Gilbert Stuart had made his assignment and kept himself concealed. That even if the priority of the United States did attach from those circumstances, they had no right to enforce it by an action against the defendant. That the act of 1797, under which the United States claimed priority in this case, creates no personal responsibility of an assignee, nor gives any right of action against him, while the act of 1799 [1 Stat. 627], giving a like priority in cases of debt for duties, expressly declares that an assignee who shall pay a debt due to another, before the debt for duties to the United States has been paid, shall be answerable in his own person and estate, and that the use of such express words of liability in the latter act, and the omission to use them in the former, shows, that such personal liability of an assignee, to be enforced by an action at law, was not contemplated nor intended in cases like the present. That a preference only being acquired by the act of 1797, the United States must resort to the same mode of proceeding that any common creditor would have to pursue, to get at the property of a debtor, viz. by obtaining a judgment against such debtor, and issuing execution; and in case such judgment and execution should prove ineffectual, owing to an assignment made by the debtor, then by filing a bill in equity against the proper parties, to compel a discovery and production of the property, and to establish their preference in the distribution of it. That in any case an action for money had and received would not lie against an assignee by a creditor not claiming under the assignment, and that for want of such privity between the United States and the defendant it could not be maintained in the present case. That even if the action would lie, it would only be to recover such money as the plaintiff could prove to have been actually in the hands of the defendant as assignee when the suit was brought, but not to make the defendant accountable for any monies which he might have received and paid to other creditors, even although such payments had been made by him with full knowledge of the preference claimed by the United States. That the defendant was at all events entitled to be allowed for all payments made by him before he had notice of the debt due by Gilbert Stuart to the United States, and of its ascertained amount, and that such notice must have been given expressly by the United States themselves.

THOMPSON, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Some observations have been made to you, in relation to the act of congress under which the United States claim a preference over other creditors of Gilbert Stuart, which are calculated to divert your attention from the matters proper to be submitted to you. It has been treated as a harsh and severe law, and one that is not entitled to the favourable consideration of the court and jury. With the policy or fitness of this law, we have no concern; it is a valid and constitutional law, and has been so adjudged by the highest tribunal of the country. It is, therefore, binding and obligatory upon us; and must govern the rights of the parties in this case, so far as the question of preference is concerned. Most of the questions which have been agitated in the course of the trial are questions of law, upon which I have already intimated an opinion; but to which exceptions have been taken, and to enable the parties to avail themselves of such exceptions, it may be proper for me again to notice the various questions that have arisen.

The first inquiry is, whether Gilbert Stuart was a debtor to the United States, within the meaning of the act of 1797 (2 Bior. & D. Laws, 595 [1 Stat. 515]), and at what time he became so indebted. The language of the act is very broad, and applies to all persons thereafter becoming indebted to the United States by bond or otherwise. It appears that on the 10th day of July, 1813, Gilbert Stuart and Moses Willard became bound with Joseph B. Stuart to the United States by a bond in the penalty of $7,000; conditioned, that Joseph B. Stuart should perform the duty of paymaster in the —— regiment of the ——, and well and truly account for, and pay over all such monies as should be received by him as such paymaster.

It is contended on the part of the defendant, that Gilbert Stuart did not become a debtor to the United States, until judgment was recovered against him on this bond; or at all events not until suit brought. This I think is not a correct view of the law. Gilbert Stuart became a debtor to the United States whenever the condition of the bond was broken. The condition of the bond is not to account when called on, but well and faithfully to account; that is, to account according to law, and to pay over the balance. Joseph B. Stuart was bound according to law to account every three months: and it appears by the abstracts from the treasury books, that all the charges and credits to Joseph B. Stuart are prior to 15th of June, 1815. At that time, a balance of more than the amount of the bond appeared due by Joseph

B. Stuart, as paymaster, to the United States.

It is urged, however, that no balance was struck against him until 29th December, 1819, and that the debt of Joseph B. Stuart did not accrue till then. But this cannot be so considered. The striking the balance on the treasury books, does not in any sense create the debt, it only ascertains the amount due. The debt is created by the advances made, and Joseph B. Stuart was as much a debtor before the balance was struck as afterwards. The last credit given him was on the 15th of June, 1815, and whatever amount the treasury books then showed due from him, was the debt due, and which he was bound to pay; and not having been paid or accounted for in any manner, the bond became forfeited, both as to the principal and his sureties; and Gilbert Stuart from that time became a debtor to the United States.

But it has been contended, that admitting the priority exists, still no right of action at law accrues to the United States; and on this subject a distinction has been attempted to be drawn between the act of 1797, and the duty act of 1799. The act of 1799 is confined to bonds given to secure duties and has no concern with the act of 1797, and is not to affect the construction of it. It is said that by the act of 1797, the United States acquire merely a preference, and that this preference is to be exercised through a judgment and execution, and not by any action at law. This construction would render the act nugatory. It has been settled that the priority does not give a lien to the United States; that it does not overreach bona fide purchasers; and therefore the property would seldom be reached by an execution. This therefore cannot be the manner of enforcing the priority. The act not having prescribed the mode, it is left to the ordinary rules of law to carry the priority into effect, according to the circumstances under which it is sought. If the United States needed the aid of a court of equity, they could file their bill, as in compelling the execution of a trust; but if circumstances are not such as to require the interposition of a court of equity, then the United States are not obliged to go there.

Suppose the defendant is proved to have received the whole amount of the bond in cash from Gilbert Stuart at the time of the assignment, would the United States be driven into a court of equity to recover it? Would not an action for money had and received lie in such a cause? The case is the same, if such a state of facts exists here as shows that the defendant has received money of Gilbert Stuart's estate, under the assignment. If a trustee has received money out of his trust estate which he is bound to pay over to a creditor, that creditor may maintain this form of action and may sue at law. If questions arise as to the rate of distribution among a number of creditors entitled to a portion of the insolvent's estate, then the aid of a court of chancery may be necessary. But here the United States have an exclusive right, and are entitled to full satisfaction. Of course, a resort to a court of equity to settle the distribution of the funds cannot be necessary; and if the jury are satisfied that the defendant has received the money in contemplation of law, then there is no need of resort to a court of equity, and this form of action at law is maintainable.

The next point to be considered is, whether such a state of facts existed in this case that the priority of the United States attaches. It has been contended on the part of the plaintiffs, that the concealment of Gilbert Stuart to avoid arrest by creditors, was an act of legal bankruptcy, and that this act alone gives the right of priority to the United States. There is in this part of the law some little obscurity. The general object of the act is to give a preference to the United States. This presupposes a distribution of the debtor's property. The idea of preference is inapplicable while the property remains in the hands of the debtor and subject to his control. How could such a preference be enforced? Only by the ordinary course of a suit against the debtor and execution thereon, all of which exists by the ordinary course of law, and supposes no preference. A preference necessarily implies that the property is put out of the control of the debtor and to be distributed by others or by operation of law. A mere insolvency so long as the debtor retains the management and control of his property, does not allow of the application of the law. The act looks to a legal insolvency, where the property is taken up by the law for distribution among the creditors of the debtor. There is no difficulty in the construction of the act until we arrive at the last phrase "legal bankruptcy." What is "legal bankruptcy"? In 1797, when the act of congress was passed, we had no bankrupt law; and therefore these words can have no reference to bankruptcy under a bankrupt law. The words seem in their connexion to have reference to the previous cases put in the section, and to point out some legal insolvency or some mode of proceeding by which the property of the debtor is taken out of his hands and to be distributed by others.

I know of no mode of enforcing a preference while the debtor is going on in the management of his own affairs: the only mode of proceeding in such a case is, to commence a suit against the debtor and go on to judgment and execution in the ordinary way. The concealment, therefore, of itself, would not be such a circumstance as to make the act apply and give rise to, the attaching of the priority of the United States, if Gilbert Stuart had remained in the possession and management of his property. But in this case there has been a voluntary assignment by the debtor of his property, on the 28th August, 1819, within the meaning of the law. The supreme court of the United States have decided, that the assignment must be of all the debtor's property: by which I understand, that it must be an assignment of all, as contradistinguished from a partial assignment, or professedly an assignment of part only of the debtor's property. The case put of a fraudulent omission of a part is not the only exception, but is mentioned by way of illustration. Where an assignment purports to be general, and is understood and intended so to be, the omission of a trifling article through mistake or accident, would not surely take the case out of the act. This would be inadmissible on every sound principle of construction. The true distinction is that which has already been suggested: that where the omission does not show that the intention was that the assignment should be a partial one as opposed to a general one, the act applies, and the priority of the United States attaches. Here the assignment purports on the face of it to be a general one. The schedules are headed "Of the Real Property"—"Of the Personal Property." The vouchers for his debts and all the various descriptions of property of Gilbert Stuart are set out with every possible particularity. If the assignment does not on its face appear to be general, the onus probandi lies certainly on the United States. But here they have proved the generality of the assignment in the most satisfactory manner. When the assignment was executed, it was given out by the parties to be general. It was understood by John Stuart, Jr., the other assignee, and so declared by Gilbert Stuart, that all his property was to be included. John Stuart, Jr., tells him that all his property must be included. Gilbert Stuart says that he has done so. The defendant, immediately previous to the assignment, tells John Stuart, Jr., that he does not owe Gilbert Stuart a dollar.

The defendant is concluded by all this from now disputing the generality of the assignment, and setting up the omission of the $7,400, which he has since acknowledged he owed Gilbert Stuart at the time of the assignment, for the purpose of defeating the priority of the United States. If this debt was reserved by fraud, then the priority is not defeated; if, because it was not deemed a legal debt, but only an honorary one, or was omitted by mistake, then also the priority attached; and in either case the omission of this debt is no objection to the right of priority on this ground. The right of priority, therefore, is put on the ground that this is a general assignment. As to the insolvency of Gilbert Stuart at the date of the assignment, it is abundantly proved, and is not in fact disputed.

When then did this priority take effect, as regards the present defendant? It has been contended on his part, that it takes effect only on obtaining judgment against himself, or at most, from the time of suit brought against him. As to this point, the act is entirely silent. It is to be put, therefore, on the general principles of law relative to the liability of trustees. They are not liable until notice. And if there had been no notice until after the bringing of this suit, the defendant would not, in this action, have been liable at all. Had then the defendant that notice of the debt of Gilbert Stuart to the United States which would charge him, and when had he such notice? In all cases of this kind, to protect a trustee, he must act bona fide in disposing of the property; and when such circumstances come to his knowledge, as should reasonably put a prudent man on inquiry, this is all the notice which is required. It has been said here that no notice would be available unless it came from the United States, they being the creditors. This is not correct. It is enough if the trustee be in possession of such facts as that a faithful and fair discharge of his duty would put him on inquiry.

It appears in evidence, that at the time of the assignment, the defendant was informed by Gilbert Stuart that he was surety for Joseph B. Stuart in a bond to the United States, and that he believed the bond was broken. This was sufficient notice, and he is from that time chargeable with the duty which the law imposed on him, to give a preference to the United States in the distribution of Gilbert Stuart's property. It was his duty to make inquiry at the proper office, to see what the debt was, and to pay it. It has been said that this would be imposing on the defendant great risk and hardship; that if he had been called into a court of chancery by the creditors, provided for in the assignment, he would not have been excused by reason of this bond, from accounting for all the funds he had in his hands. But this I apprehend is a mistake. The defendant would by presenting the circumstances before the court of chancery, have been protected by it until the actual amount of the debt could have been ascertained and paid. He was in this respect in no jeopardy. As to the objection urged on behalf of the defendant, that until judgment against Gilbert Stuart the surety, the defendant could not know the amount for which Gilbert Stuart would be liable, as the amount might be reduced by Gilbert Stuart on the trial; the defendant in this action may now have the same benefit. He might, if he could, show the debt of the United States reduced to any extent, in the same manner as Gilbert Stuart could have done in the action against him.

The amount of the recovery is a question resting with you, under the rules of law heretofore stated, and such as may be hereafter laid down. The liability of the defendant to the priority of the United States arose, as I have already decided, at the time he had notice of Gilbert Stuart's debt; and such notice was given at the time the assignment was made. He was therefore from that time bound to apply to the debt of the United States the whole of what he should receive under the assignment, until the debt was paid. He was bound to pay the proceeds of the assigned property as the law directs. He comes under this obligation by assuming the trust, and is legally bound to pay over the money he receives to those by law entitled to it. In the present case the United States were so entitled. Whenever the money was received by the defendant, he received it to the use of the United States. This being an action for money had and received, it is necessary for the plaintiffs to show that the defendant has in fact received money to which they are entitled, or such facts must be proved as to afford a fair and reasonable presumption that money has been received. From the evidence in this case it appears, that certain furniture which had been assigned by Gilbert Stuart to the defendant, was sold under his direction, at public auction, for $2,356; and it is not unreasonable to presume, that he has received the money. It is at least enough, prima facie, and throws on the defendant the burthen of rebutting this presumption, by proof on his part. And unless he has done so to your satisfaction, that amount, deducting the commissions and auction duties, is recoverable in this action.

With respect to a part of this money, the proof is very satisfactory, that it has in fact been received by the defendant; and he has also had credit upon his bond to Gilbert Stuart for another part. Whatever you think the evidence will warrant you in concluding that he has received, or had the benefit of in paying his own debt, he is responsible for. The defendant claims that he is entitled to a deduction of $621, for expenses incurred by him in the preservation of the property assigned to him, and in the discharge of his trust, and this seems to have been conceded on the part of the plaintiff. Had it not been, I should entertain some doubt whether he was entitled to such deduction. If the recovery in this case could reach all the proceeds of the assigned property, it would seem reasonable that the expenses necessarily incurred in and about the preservation of the property should be first paid, and perhaps the priority of the United States would not overreach such expenses. But as it appears that the defendant has funds that cannot be reached in this action, I should have inclined to the opinion, that the expenses incurred in the execution of the trust, should fall on such funds. If, however, this is yielded on the part of the plaintiff, you can make the deduction.

It is claimed, on the part of the United States, that they have a right to receive the full amount of their debt out of the bond given by the defendant to Gilbert Stuart in September, 1819, for $7,400. Whether the defendant in this action, for money had and received, can be made responsible for any part of this bond, is a question by no means free from difficulty. The circumstances in relation to this bond are involved in considerable obscurity. Whether it was given for a real debt due from the defendant to Gilbert Stuart, may be doubtful from the evidence. If given for such debt, it is a part of the trust fund, and for which the defendant might be made accountable in equity: Whether in this action, or not, will depend on the question, whether it was given for money which the defendant had in his hands at the time of the assignment, belonging to the estate of Gilbert Stuart, or whether it grew out of some unsettled partnership concerns: If the latter, I should think it could not be reached in the present action. Of this you will judge from the evidence, and render your verdict accordingly.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiffs for $1,760.81.

UNITED STATES v. CLARK.

[2 Spr. 55;[1] 25 Law Rep. 345.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Dec., 1862.

ARMY — INDICTMENT FOR ENTICING SOLDIER TO DESERT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where the prisoner, in order to induce one H. to enlist, made representations to him as to the means and facilities of deserting, and, after he had enlisted, received the whole of his bounty money, and at the times when he made such representations, and received the money, he believed they would be likely to cause H. to desert, and they did cause him to desert, the prisoner may be deemed to have procured or enticed him to desert, within the meaning of the statute of 1812, c. 14, § 17 [2 Stat. 673].

2. It is not necessary, in order to warrant a conviction, that the prisoner should have wished or intended that H. should desert.

This was an indictment under the statute of 1812, c. 14, § 17 (2 Stat. 673), charging the prisoner with having enticed and procured a soldier by the name of Hayden to desert. It appeared that early in November last, Hayden enlisted as a soldier, received a bounty of twenty-five dollars from the United States, and one hundred dollars from the city of Boston, and was immediately mustered into service and sent to the camp in Cambridge; he there remained doing duty as a soldier about a fortnight, and then deserted. There was evidence tending to show that just previous to the enlistment the prisoner, in a conference with Hayden, told him that, if he would enlist, he could obtain the bounty and avoid serving as a soldier by deserting; that he could either obtain a furlough and then desert, or that the prisoner would come to the camp and take him away in a wagon; that immediately after this conversation, Hayden went with the prisoner to the rendezvous, enlisted, received the bounty, and immediately delivered the whole amount to the prisoner. There was also evidence tending to show that the prisoner was to hold a part of the bounty for Hayden, and keep the residue for his own use.

T. K. Lothrop, Asst. Dist. Atty., for the United States.

B. F. Russell, for prisoner.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, in charging the jury, among other things instructed them as follows: That if the prisoner procured Hayden to enlist believing at the time that he would probably desert, still if the prisoner did not say or do any thing which would be likely to cause him to desert, or if what was said and done by the prisoner did not in fact cause Hayden to desert, then the prisoner is not guilty of the offence charged; but that it was not necessary, in order to establish the guilt of the prisoner, that the government should satisfy the jury that he wished or actually intended that Hayden should desert. It may be that his wishes and purposes went no further than to cause Hayden to enlist, and thereby to obtain for himself the reward for furnishing a recruit, and a part or the whole of the bounty money. It may be that he would have really preferred that Hayden should not be able to escape from the service. Still, if in order to induce Hayden to enlist to accomplish his own purpose of gain, the prisoner made representations and gave assurances to Hayden as to the means and facilities of deserting, and, after Hayden had enlisted, received from him his bounty money, and at the time when such representations were made, assurances given, and bounty money received, the prisoner believed that they would be likely to cause Hayden to desert, and they did cause him to desert, then the prisoner may be deemed to have procured or enticed him to desert within the meaning of the statute.

[4 Cin. Law Bul. 49.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1879.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — ELECTIONS — INDICTMENT AGAINST JUDGE OF ELECTION FOR NEGLECTING TO PERFORM DUTIES.

The United States election laws constitutional.

On motion to quash the indictment against Gus. Clarke.

BAXTER, Circuit Judge. The defendant was a judge of the election held recently in Cincinnati, at which members of congress were voted for, appointed by the state authorities, and stands indicted, under section 5515 of the Revised Statutes, for unlawfully neglecting to perform certain duties enjoined on him as such judge by the laws of Ohio. He appears, and moves to quash the indictment, not because it is not within the purview of the act of congress under which it is framed, but upon the ground that section 5515, declaring such neglect of duty an offense against the United States and punishable by indictment in the federal courts, is unconstitutional and void. And in support of this position, learned counsel have referred us to the case of Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How. [65 U. S.] 66. We have been familiar with this case for a long time, and at the request of defendant's counsel have re-examined it with considerable care. The facts are that the governor of Kentucky had, in pursuance of the act of congress in that behalf enacted, made a demand on Gov. Dennison, then governor of Ohio, for the apprehension and surrender of an alleged fugitive from the former state, but Gov. Dennison refused to comply with that requisition. Thereupon an application was made by the commonwealth of Kentucky to the supreme court of the United States for a mandamus to compel Gov. Dennison to perform the duty imposed upon him by the law. The court refused the mandamus, and said: "The act does not provide the means to compel the execution of this duty nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the executive of the state; nor is there any clause or provision in the constitution which arms the government of the United States with such power. Indeed, such a power would place every state under the control and dominion of the general government, even the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the federal government, under the constitution, has no power to impose upon a state officer, as such, any duty whatever and compel him to perform it; for, if it possessed this power, it might overload the officer with duties that would fill up all his time, and disable him from performing his obligations, and might impose on him duties of a character incompatible with the dignity to which he was elevated by the state."

We recognize in this decision an authority binding on us. And if that case and this are alike, defendant's motion must prevail. The duty of providing by law for the arrest and return of fugitives is imposed by the constitution exclusively on congress. And in exercising the power thus conferred congress saw fit to impose the duty of causing fugitives to be arrested and surrendered to the demanding state, on the chief executive of a state in which the fugitive might be found. The duty thus enjoined on the governors of the states was generally exercised by them in all proper cases. But in the case of Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison [supra], the latter declined to act, and the supreme court, as we have already seen, when applied to for a mandamus to compel him, held that the federal government could not require him to perform such a duty. The language of the court was, of course, employed with reference to the facts of the case then before it.

But the duty of providing for the election of members of congress is a matter in which both the federal and state governments have an interest. "The times, places and manner of holding the elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the congress may at any time, by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing senators." So it will be seen that the obligation to provide for the election of members of congress is one that attaches to both the general and state governments. And under the legislation upon the subject the states hold the elections through officers of their own selection. But this duty is not left entirely to state supervision. It is performed under and in pursuance of the laws of both powers. The federal government does not assume to overload a state officer with duties inconsistent with his dignity, or with "his obligations to the state." Nor does it undertake to compel such officer to perform such duties which, under the constitution, are imposed exclusively on the federal government, as was true in the case of Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison, but commands a faithful compliance on the part of such officer, in any matter pertaining to the holding of such elections and certifying returns, etc., that he is required by the state laws to do and perform. And any willful refusal or neglect to do any one or more of the things thus required, is declared to be a crime against the United States, and made punishable by indictment in the federal courts.

We think the law is within the constitutional powers of congress, and a very proper and delicate exercise of the national authority. The law being, as we think, valid, this court has jurisdiction of the offense charged in the indictment, and plaintiff's motion to quash will be disallowed.

INSANITY — DEFENCE TO CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.

A prisoner should not be found guilty, if, at the time of committing the act, he was in such a state of mental insanity, not produced by the immediate effects of intoxicating drink, as not to have been conscious of the moral turpitude of the act

The prisoner [Michael Clarke] was indicted for the murder of his wife by shooting her with a musket upon her return home in the evening from church.

Mr. Key, for prisoner, prayed the court to instruct the jury that if they should be satisfied, by the evidence, that the prisoner, from long and settled habits of intemperance, had become disordered, both in body and mind, and subject to fits which affected both his mind and body, and that, by reason thereof, he was generally, and at all times, when not under the influence of liquor, of unsound mind, then the prisoner cannot be found guilty of killing the deceased with malice.

Which instruction THE COURT (nem. con.) refused to give, but instructed the jury that if they should be satisfied, by the evidence, that the prisoner at the time of committing the act charged in the indictment, was in such a state of mental insanity, not produced by the immediate effects of intoxicating drink, as not to have been conscious of the moral turpitude of the act, they should find him not guilty.

Verdict, "Guilty." Sentence of death.

ACTION OF COVENANT — DEFENCES — ACCORD AND SATISFACTION—UNPERFORMED AGREEMENT.

1. Different defences which may be made in an action of covenant.

2. An accord must be executed before it can amount to satisfaction. An unperformed agreement is not sufficient, and cannot be pleaded in bar.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

[2] [Reported by Samuel H. Hempstead, Esq.]

[This was an action by the United States against Lorenzo N. Clarke, James Pitcher, and Charles P. Bertrand. Heard on a demurrer to pleas.]

S. H. Hempstead, U. S. Dist. Atty.

F. W. Trapnall and John W. Cocke, for defendants.

JOHNSON, District Judge. This action of debt is founded on a contract in writing, under a penalty of twenty thousand dollars, conditioned to perform certain articles of agreement entered into at the same time, namely, the 8th of December, 1837, between Lorenzo N. Clarke and the government, to furnish rations to the Chickasaw Indians. The penal bond, with the conditions thereunder written, and the articles of agreement, constitute but one agreement, upon which the United States have brought their action.

The defence disclosed by the defendants,—seventh, eighth, and ninth pleas, to which the district attorney has demurred,—is a subsequent agreement by the defendant Clarke with the plaintiffs, obligating himself to deliver to the United States rations of beef, corn, and salt, at a specified price, for all the Seminole Indians who should emigrate west during one year after the date of the contract, and stipulating that he should be entitled to a credit of five and a half cents for every ration of subsistence so delivered upon his indebtedness under the contract upon which the present suit is based.

The defendants fail to aver in their pleas that any rations were in fact delivered under the latter contract; but they do allege that this latter agreement was received by the plaintiffs in full satisfaction and discharge of the covenants and stipulations contained in the contract referred to in the declaration. By adverting to the terms and provisions of the latter, it appears manifest that it was not the intention of the parties that it should operate by way of discharge and satisfaction of the obligations incurred by the first agreement, for it provides expressly that for each and every ration delivered by Clarke, he should be entitled to a credit of five and a half cents on the first contract, so that he might liquidate and pay his debt due to the plaintiffs under the same.

The contract set out in the pleas affords intrinsic evidence not to be mistaken, that the parties to it never intended it as a discharge and satisfaction of the previous contract, but, on the contrary, they manifestly intended that the first contract should remain in full force, and only provided that it might be satisfied, paid, and discharged by the delivery of a sufficient number of rations of subsistence. When delivered, they should operate to liquidate and discharge it. That was the object, and nothing beyond it. The averment in the pleas, that the latter contract was received by the plaintiffs in full discharge and satisfaction of the former contract, cannot be regarded, because it is inconsistent with the terms and provisions of the contract itself, as well as the clear intention of the parties. It may be further remarked, that the amount of rations to be furnished by the defendant Clarke is left wholly uncertain and entirely dependent upon the number of Seminole Indians that might emigrate during the year. It rested on that contingency. It seems to me that it can admit of no serious doubt, that a contract thus uncertain and unperformed in any part, cannot be legally pleaded as an accord and satisfaction of a previous liability. 1 Com. Dig. "Accord," b, 3, 201. The pleas are not sufficient in law to bar the action, and the demurrer to them must be sustained. Demurrer sustained.

The seventh and eighth pleas having been amended by leave of the court, the district attorney again demurred, for this, among other causes, that "the pleas did not show that the accord had been executed, without which it could not be a bar to the action."

OPINION OF THE COURT. This action is in substance for the recovery of damages for a breach of covenant, and is governed by the rules applicable to that action. To an action of covenant, the defendant may set up various defences in bar of the action. He may deny that he ever made the covenant, by putting in the plea of non est factum; or he may plead a fraud practised upon him in its execution, and so avoid it. He may plead that he has performed the covenant stipulated on his part to be performed, or that he is discharged from performance by the failure of the plaintiff to perform a condition precedent. He may plead an accord, which Blackstone defines to be "a satisfaction agreed upon between the party injuring and the party injured, which, when performed, is a bar to all actions upon this account." 3 Bl. Comm. 15; 1 Bac. Abr. "Accord," 54.

The question arises in this case, to which of these classes of pleas do the seventh and eighth amended pleas belong? Are they pleas of accord and satisfaction, or of covenants performed? It seems to me that they are not pleas of the latter class, because they fail to aver performance. It is true that they aver part performance, and a readiness and an offer to perform fully, which was refused by the plaintiffs. The defence then is, part performance and a legal excuse assigned for failure to perform fully. A part performance, and a readiness and offer to perform the residue, is not in all cases equivalent to an actual, full and complete performance. For example; if A. covenants with B. to do any specific act, as to deliver certain property upon the demand of A. at a certain place, and B. is sued by A. for a failure to deliver the propery, B. may show that he could not deliver it, because A. never made the demand, and so bar the recovery of damages, on the ground that he was prevented from performing the contract by the fault of A., and not by any fault of his own. But suppose the action should be brought by B., can he recover the same amount of A. that he would be entitled to, in case he had actually delivered the property and fully performed his contract? Clearly he could not. He could recover no more than the damages he had sustained by reason of the failure of A. to make the demand, so as to enable B. to comply with his contract. B. never having in fact delivered the property, would not be entitled to recover its value. The property is still his own, and he could only legally recover of A. the damages occasioned by the breach of the contract on the part of A. Thus it appears that part performance and readiness to perform in full does not give a party the same rights.

These, then, are not pleas of covenants performed. To what class do they belong? It appears to me that they can only be considered as pleas of accord, and are they, in the form pleaded, valid? I think not; for it is not averred that the accord was received and accepted in satisfaction of the contract sued on; but it is averred that performance of the new agreement was to operate as satisfaction. Full performance, as already remarked, is not alleged; and according to the best authorities, an executory agreement unperformed cannot be set up as a valid accord and satisfaction. 1 Bac. Abr. "Accord and Satisfaction," A, 55; 1 Ld. Raym. 122; 6 Wend. 390; 16 Johns. 86; 2 H. Bl. 317; 5 Term R. 141.

The demurrer to the seventh and eighth amended pleas is sustained. Demurrer sustained.

NOTE. Performance of part and tender of performance of the residue is not a good plea. Shepherd v. Lewis, T. Jones, 6; 1 Bac. Abr. "Accord," A, 59. If an accord be to do two things, and the defendant do one, and not the other, this is no bar to the action, because the plaintiff has no remedy for that which is not performed. 1 Bac. Abr. "Accord," A, 58; Rolle, Abr. 129. The accord must be executed. 9 Coke, 79, b; 1 Salk. 76; T. Raym. 450; 2 Keb. 332; T. Jones, 158, 168; 7 Blackf. 582. Part payment and an agreement to take the residue at a future day cannot be pleaded as satisfaction in bar. Cro. Eliz. 304–306. To constitute a bar to the action, the accord must be full, complete, and executed. 6 Wend. 390; 16 Johns. 86; 3 Johns. Cas. 243; 5 N. H. 136, 410; 1 Com. Dig. B; 4, 201, tit. "Accord." Bacon says: "Accord is an agreement between two persons, to give and accept something in satisfaction of a trespass, etc., done by one to the other. This agreement, when executed, may be pleaded in bar to an action for the trespass; for in all personal injuries, the law gives damages as an equivalent; and when the party accepts of an equivalent, there is no injury or cause of complaint, and therefore present satisfaction is a good plea; but if the wrongdoer only promise a future satisfaction, the injury continues till satisfaction is actually made, and consequently there is a cause of complaint in being; and if the trespass were barred by this plea, the plaintiff could have no remedy for the future satisfaction, for that supposes the injury to have continuance." 1 Bac. Abr. tit. "Accord and Satisfaction," 54. If the defendant pleads a concord between himself and the plaintiff, that he should pay the plaintiff £3 in hand, and should undertake to pay the plaintiff's attorney's bill, and avers that he had paid £3, and was always ready to pay the attorney's bill, but he never showed him any; this is no good plea, because the accord is not shown to be fully executed. 1 Bac. Abr. 59; 3 Keb. 690; 1 Com. Dig. "Accord," B, 4. To make a plea good, both accord and satisfaction must be shown. Maze v. Miller [Case No. 9,362].

CUSTOMS DUTIES—BOMBAZINES—HOW CLASSIFIED.

Under the tariff act of 22d of May 1824, c. 136 [4 Stat. 25], bombazines, being goods of which wool is a component material, are liable to pay a duty of 30 per cent.

[Cited in Lawrence v. Allen, 7 How. (48 U. S.) 791; U. S. v. United States Tel. Co., Case No. 16,603.]

[Error to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts.]

The original action was debt on a bond for duties on goods imported in the Mercury, Birt master, from London, in the common form. The bond was dated on the 5th of September, 1826. Plea of a tender of $151.18 on the day of payment of the duties, in full of the duties, specifying the goods, and the duties payable on each kind, and among them bombazines of the value, with the charges, of £67. 0s. 10d., on which the duties amounted to $65.49; that is to say, 20 per cent. ad valorem increased by the addition of ten per centum of said amount in value. Replication, that the bombazines were a manufacture of which wool was and is a component part, and are by law subject to a duty of 33½ per cent., with the addition of ten per cent., &c. Demurrer and joinder. Judgment for the defendants [Edward Clarke and others], on which the writ of error was brought.

G. Blake, U. S. Dist. Atty.

F. Dexter, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. This is a writ of error from a judgment of the district court of Massachusetts district, in a suit on the common bond given to secure the duties on certain foreign goods imported in the Mercury from London. It is unnecessary to consider the pleadings, because the parties have agreed, that the cause shall be decided upon its merits; and in this view alone has it been argued at the bar. The whole controversy turns upon the question, what duty is payable on bombazines of foreign manufacture imported into the United States under the act, commonly called the tariff act of 22d May, 1824, c. 136. That act imposes "on all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, except worsted stuff goods and blankets, which shall pay 25 per cent. ad valorem, a duty of 30 per cent., ad valorem." &c. In a subsequent clause of the same section, it imposes "on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material, coming from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, a duty of 25 per cent. ad valorem; on all other manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material, 20 per cent. ad valorem." Non-enumerated articles pay a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem.

It has been suggested at the bar, that this fabric may fall under the class of non-enumerated articles. It does not strike me, that such can be the just, legal conclusion, upon the facts admitted at the argument, unless the act itself involves a repugnancy. Bombazine is a fabric, (as was admitted at the argument,) composed of worsted and silk, that is, a fabric of which wool is a component material, and silk is also a component material. It is therefore clearly comprehended in the above enumerated description of goods paying an ad valorem duty, and the only question, which can properly arise, is, to which class does it, with reference to duties, in the contemplation of the legislature, appropriately belong. The language of the first clause is, that "on all manufactures of wool, or of which wool is a component material, except worsted stuff goods," &c. a duty of 30 per cent. shall be paid. If there had been nothing more in the act, there would be little ground for doubt. Bombazines are not in the commercial sense worsted stuff goods, for that description is understood, and indeed not questioned at the bar, to apply only to the lighter sorts of goods composed wholly of worsted, such as bombazetts, plaids, bindings, &c. Such was the contemporaneous exposition given by the treasury department to the language of the act, and it has never to my knowledge been controverted. The exception indeed is carved out of the preceding description; but it does not thence follow, that it is to be construed as co-extensive with, or applicable to, all the kinds of goods, which that description was intended to include. The terms "of which wool is a component material," necessarily suppose, that there were other materials in this class of fabrics than wool; for otherwise the specification would have been wholly superfluous, as the preceding words, "all manufactures of wool" would comprehend all, of which wool was the exclusive material. The exception of "worsted stuff goods" is therefore an exception out of these latter words, and in no just sense a limitation upon the natural meaning of the other words.

As, then, bombazines are not worsted stuff goods, and as they are goods of which wool is a component material, they are liable to the 30 per cent. duty, unless it can be shown, that in some other part of the act there is an implied exception, or a necessary repugnancy, which defeats the duty. It is said, that the succeeding clause does create such an exception, because it lays a duty of 20 per cent. "on all manufactures of silk, or of which silk shall be a component material;" and silk is a component material of bombazines. If the fact is so, (and indeed it is undeniable,) it seems to me to create, not a case of exception out of the preceding clause, but of repugnancy to it. Different duties are laid in different parts of the act on the same fabric; and as it would be impossible to say, which ought to prevail, neither could prevail. The act quoad hoc would be a nullity. The fabric could not strictly be deemed a non-enumerated article, which the legislature designed should be liable to pay a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem only, for it is doubly enumerated in the act; but the repugnancy of the clauses would lead to that as the necessary judicial conclusion. If this would be the legal result, upon the argument, it certainly deserves great consideration, before it is adopted; for the legislature ought not to be presumed to create such a repugnancy, unless the conclusion be inevitable.

My opinion is, though it is not given without hesitation, that a construction may be adopted, which will give effect to each clause without involving such a necessary repugnancy. It is this. The first clause respects manufactures, of which wool is a component material, and was designed to embrace all goods, which fall within the general description, without any exception. If any particular fabric had been intended to be excepted, it would have been incorporated into the exception or proviso of that clause. This being assumed as the legislative intention, every subsequent clause is to be construed in subordination to it. When, therefore, the next succeeding clause laid a different duty on goods, of which silk is a component material, there is an implied exception of all such goods as were already provided for in the preceding clause, that is to say, of all such goods as embraced wool and silk as component materials, leaving all other goods, of which silk was a component material, to the full operation of the duty of 20 per cent. In this way a natural and rational exposition is given to both clauses, and no repugnancy arises. And I think this construction greatly fortified by considerations derived from the other articles of cotton, flax, and hemp, in the second clause, in respect to which the same difficulty must arise, when they are in combination with wool. Nor should the observation be omitted, that this was the contemporaneous construction given by the treasury department, and it has hitherto silently prevailed without any legislative interference to cure the supposed defect in the act, or correct the supposed error of judgment in the department. The tariff act of 1828 [4 Stat. 270], just passed by congress, has been referred to by the counsel for the defendant, to show that bombazines are specially named therein. This is true, but they are enumerated as a fabric, of which wool is a component part, and as an exception from a class, which is to pay a duty of 40 per cent. ad valorem. But the same act places a duty on goods, of which silk is a component material, without excepting bombazines. So that this act plainly indicates a legislative opinion, that bombazines fall within the description of goods, of which wool is a component material, and are liable to pay duties as such, without the slightest suspicion, that it was necessary to except them from the clause respecting silks.

The judgment of the district court must therefore be reversed with costs.

UNITED STATES v. CLAYTON.

[2 Dill. 219;[1] 19 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 737; 4 Chi. Leg. News, 50; 5 West. Jur. 550.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Arkansas. Oct. Term, 1871.

ELECTIONS—GOVERNOR OF STATE—"ELECTION OFFICER"—RULES FOR CONSTRUING STATUTES.

1. The governor of a state is not "an officer of election" within the meaning of section 22 of the act of congress of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 145), which makes it criminal for any "election officer" fraudulently to make any false certificate of the result of any congressional election.

2. Rules by which courts arrive at the intention of the legislature in construing criminal statutes, stated and applied.

3. Statutes creating crimes will not be extended by judicial interpretation to cases not plainly and unmistakably within their terms.

4. In statutes creating and defining criminal offences, the courts will not, by construction, engraft words in one section upon those of another, unless the legislative intention be plain and clear.

5. The relations of a state to the general government, and of the governor to both, referred to as showing the improbability that congress would (if its power be conceded), provide for the trial and imprisonment of this officer for omitting or fraudulently performing election duties prescribed by state laws.

The indictment in this case was presented at the April term, 1871, and is founded upon section 22 of the act of congress of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 145). A demurrer thereto is filed. The indictment is, in substance, as follows: That on November 8, 1870, an election was holden under the laws of Arkansas in the several counties (naming them) constituting the Third congressional district of the state, to elect a representative in the congress of the United States; that Thomas Boles and John Edwards were respectively candidates for that office, and voted for at said election, that abstracts duly made and certified by the county clerks of the said counties composing the congressional district, of the returns of said election in the various election districts (duly made to said county clerks by the judges and clerks of said election), showing the number of votes cast respectively for Boles and Edwards, were filed in the office of the secretary of state; that on said 8th day of November, 1870, and for four months thereafter, the defendant [Powell] Clayton, was the governor of the state of Arkansas, charged with the duty of making and granting the certificate hereinafter mentioned; that during said period one Robert J. T. White was secretary of state; that December 1, 1870, said White, in the presence of the defendant, Clayton, as governor, did duly cast up and and arrange the said votes from the said several counties so returned as aforesaid; that on February 20, 1870, the defendant, as governor, did willfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently make and grant, under the seal of state, and deliver to said Edwards, a certificate, stating therein "that it appears from the returns made to the office of the secretary of state, that at an election held, etc., John Edwards was duly elected in the Third congressional district to represent the state of Arkansas in the Forty-Second congress of the United States." The indictment then alleges that the said certificate was false and fraudulent, and that, "in truth and fact, it did not appear, at the time it was made, by and upon said returns so made as aforesaid, that said Edwards was elected; but, on the contrary, it did, then and there, as aforesaid, appear by said returns that the said Boles was duly elected by a majority of one hundred votes, all of which said Clayton well knew, contrary," etc.

The election laws of the state of Arkansas, in substance, provide that the governor shall appoint registrars of election; that the board of registrars shall appoint the judges of election, and the judges, the clerks of election. The judges certify to the number of votes given to each person which is attested by the clerks. The judges are to transmit the poll books to the county clerks "within three days after the closing of the polls." "On the fifth day after the election the county clerks are to open and compare the returns and make abstracts of the votes given for the several candidates, and send certified copies of the abstracts to the secretary of state." The act provides that "it shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, within thirty days, or sooner if all the returns are received, to cast up and arrange the votes from the several counties for the persons voted for for members of congress; and the governor shall, immediately thereafter, issue his proclamation declaring the person having received the highest number of votes to be duly elected to congress, and shall grant a certificate thereof, under the seal of the state, to the person so elected." Laws Ark. 1868, pp. 314, 325.

In support of the demurrer, it was argued by the defendant's counsel that the indictment is insufficient in law: (1) Because it does not allege that the defendant was an election officer. (2) Because it does not allege what the result was of the casting up and arranging of the votes by the secretary of state, and that the certificate issued to Edwards was false according to the result ascertained by the secretary of state, the only allegation in this regard being that it was false as appears by the returns on file. (3) Because, within the meaning of section 22 of the act of congress of May 31, 1870, upon which the indictment is framed, the defendant, being the governor of the state, was not an officer of the congressional election mentioned in the indictment. (4) Because it is not within the constitutional powers of congress to provide for the punishment of the defendant, the chief executive officer of the state, in respect of acts and duties performed by him as such executive under the laws of the state.

Mr. Harrington, Dist. Atty., with whom were Messrs. Whipple, Thompson, and Barnes, for the United States.

Messrs. Wilshire, Gantt, Warwick, and Yonley, for defendant.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and CALDWELL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The indictment against the defendant, who was at the time of issuing the certificate of election to Edwards, the governor of the state of Arkansas, is founded upon section 22 of the act of congress of May 31, 1870 (16 Stat. 145). The amendatory act of February 28, 1871 (16 Stat. 433), does not apply to the case, since the indictment is for an act committed before its passage, and is not based upon section 20, which this last-named statute amends, but alone upon section 22, abovementioned. This section provides "that any officer of any election at which any representative or delegate in the congress of the United States shall be voted for, whether such officer of election be appointed or created by or under any law or authority of the United States, or by or under any state, territorial, district, or municipal law or authority, who shall neglect or refuse to perform any duty in regard to such election required of him by any law of the United States, or of any state or territory thereof; or violate any duty so imposed, or knowingly do any act thereby unauthorized, with intent to affect any such election, or the result thereof; or fraudulently make any false certificate of the result of such election in regard to such representative or delegate, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a crime, and liable to prosecution and punishment therefor," by fine or imprisonment, or both.

The indictment necessarily proceeds upon the theory that the defendant, although the act charged against him was one required by the laws of the state to be done by him in the capacity of governor, was, within the meaning of the act of congress just quoted, an officer of election, and as such, issued and delivered to Edwards the certificate of election, which is alleged to be fraudulent. Accordingly, one of the counsel for the government well observed on the argument that the decisive question here was, whether the defendant, within the intention of congress, was, or was not, an election officer, and acting as such in making and delivering the election certificate set out in the indictment. If he is not an election officer, it was admitted that the indictment against him would not lie. To this fundamental inquiry, then, we first direct our attention; for, if this question be resolved against the government, that is an end of the case, and it is unnecessary to consider whether congress has the constitutional power to provide for the punishment of state officers in respect of acts performed by them as such, under state authority. And so, in this event, it would be equally unnecessary to determine whether, if the defendant were an election officer, the indictment sufficiently avers it, or charges the offence with the particularity required by the rules of criminal pleading.

The act of congress, in the section under consideration, provides for the punishment of "any officer of election" who shall "fraudulently make any false certificate of the result of any election in regard to a representative" in congress. The question is one as to the meaning of the phrase "officer of election" or "election officer." What was the scope of the legislative intention? Undoubtedly, this language was designed to include, and does appropriately include, local judges and clerks of election at which a representative in congress is voted for. But did congress mean, by this language, to include the chief executive officer of a state? Did it mean to include in any case an official act of the governor of a state, and to provide for his punishment if he shall neglect or refuse to perform any duty imposed by state laws in respect to elections for congress, or shall violate any such duty? Did it mean to include by this description an official act of the governor, which in any case cannot be done until thirty days or more have elapsed since the election was holden and the polls closed, and which, in the case made by the indictment, was not done by him until nearly four months after the election had ended? Is the act of the governor of the state, in granting the certificate of election, the act of an election officer?

This is, as above observed, a question of legislative intention. Now, in what manner do the courts ascertain the legislative will? We answer, that it is ascertained primarily and chiefly by the language the legislature has used to express its meaning. We must suppose in the enactment of statutes, particularly statutes so important as the one under consideration, that congress weighed well the words it employed. In the office of interpretation, courts, particularly in statutes that create crimes, must closely regard and even cling to the language which the legislature has selected to express its purpose. And where the words are not technical, or words of art, the presumption is a reasonable and strong one that they were used by the legislature in their ordinary, popular or general signification. Statutes enjoin obedience to their requirements, and, unless the contrary appears, it is to be taken that the legislature did not use the words in which its commands are expressed in any unusual sense. For these reasons, whose cogency is obvious, the law is settled that in construing statutes the language used is never to be lost sight of, and the presumption is that the language is used in no extraordinary sense, but in its common, every-day meaning. When courts, in construing statutes, depart from the language employed by the legislator, they incur the risk of mistaking the legislative will, or declaring it to exist where, in truth, it has never had an expression. The legitimate function of courts is to interpret the legislative will, not to supplement it, or to supply it. The judiciary must limit themselves to expounding the law; they cannot make it. It belongs only to the legislative department to create crimes and ordain punishments. Accordingly, courts in the construction of statutable offences, have always regarded it as their plain duty cautiously to keep clearly within the expressed will of the legislature, lest otherwise they shall hold an act or an omission to be a crime, and punish it, when, in fact, the legislature had never so intended. "If this rule is violated," says Chief Justice Best, "the fate of the accused person is decided by the arbitrary discretion of the judges and not by the express authority of the laws." Fletcher v. Lord Sondes, 3 Bing. 580.

The principle that the legislative intent is to be found, if possible, in the enactment itself, and that the statutes are not to be extended by construction to cases not fairly and clearly embraced in their terms, is one of great importance to the citizen. The courts have no power to create offences, but if by a latitudinarian construction they construe cases not provided for to be within legislative enactments, it is manifest that the safety and liberty of the citizen are put in peril, and that the legislative domain has been invaded. Of course, an enactment is not to be frittered away by forced constructions, by metaphysical niceties, or mere verbal and sharp criticism; nevertheless the doctrine is fundamental in English and American law, that there can be no constructive offences; that before a man can be punished his case must be plainly and unmistakably within the statute, and if there be any fair doubt whether the statute embraces it, that doubt is to be resolved in favor of the accused. These principles of law admit of no dispute, and have been often declared by the highest courts, and by no tribunal more clearly than the supreme court of the United States. U. S. v. Morris, 14 Pet. [39 U. S.] 464; U. S. v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76; U. S. v. Sheldon, 2 Wheat. [15 U. S.] 119. And see, also, Ferret v. Atwill [Case No. 4,747]; Sedg. St. & Const. Law, 324, 326, 334; 1 Bish. Cr. Law, §§ 134, 145.

In view of these acknowledged rules of law, the question occurs: Did congress mean, by the use of the words "officer of election" or "election officer," in the section of the statute on which the indictment is framed, to include the governor of a state? Is the governor an election officer? It seems to us not. These words are apt and usual words to describe the clerks and judges of the election, but not to describe the governor of a state. Such is not their ordinary or usual meaning. To make them apply to the executive of a state in respect to an act done a month or more after the election is closed would be a forced and unnatural meaning, and one which is not necessary in order to give the statute effect or operation. We hazard nothing in saying that in popular use no one would naturally infer that the words "officer of election" included the chief executive of a state.

Other considerations fortify the conclusion that congress did not intend to provide for the indictment of the governor of a state. The states are integral and indestructible parts of the general government, without which it cannot exist (Texas v. White, 7 Wall. [74 U. S.] 700), and in view of this relation, and of the high position and important relation of the executive of a state to the United States, as well as to the state itself, it would seem very improbable that congress would undertake to punish the governor for omitting or fraudulently discharging the duties enjoined by the laws of his state. The punishment by imprisonment would result in depriving the people of a state of the executive officer they had elected, and prosecutions of this kind, if authorized, could not fail frequently to lead to agitation, and disturb that harmony which should exist between the state and its people and the general government. Under the constitution (article 1, § 4), congress has the undoubted power to provide its own officers for the holding and conduct of congressional elections, and it would most probably exercise it, if it deemed it necessary, in preference to undertaking to make or treat the governor of a state as an election officer, and to punish him through the national courts for malfeasance or nonfeasance in office. Kentucky v. Dennison, 23 How. [64 U. S.] 66. And especially would this seem to be so in view of the fact that the certificate of the governor is not binding upon congress, each house of which is, by the constitution, made the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Const. art. 1, § 5.

Admitting, for the occasion, the power of congress to provide for the punishment of the executive of a state, as claimed by the prosecution, we repeat, that in view of the foregoing considerations, it seems to be improbable that it would undertake to exercise the power. At all events, it is impossible, on legal principles, that any such intention should be held to exist from the use of the general words "election officers."

We have carefully considered the very able arguments which have been addressed to us to show that the governor is embraced in the more general language of sections 19 and 20 of the same act, and that, if so, these words, supposed to include the governor, should, though omitted by the legislature, be inserted by judicial engraftment into section 22, on which the indictment is founded. In answer to the argument, we deem it necessary only further to observe that the governor is not in terms named in either of those sections; that it is far from certain that they intended to embrace any official act of this officer, and, if they did, we could not, after the judgment of the supreme court, delivered by Chief Justice Marshall, in U. S. v. Wiltberger, supra, enter upon the dangerous and unauthorized work of incorporating the provisions of one section of a law into another. We could never be sure that we did not put in what congress may have purposely left out. The bill charges no indictable offence, and the demurrer thereto must be sustained. Demurrer sustained.

Case No. 14,815.

UNITED STATES v. CLEMENT et al.

[Crabbe, 499.] [1]

District Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. March 27, 1843.

CUSTOMS DUTIES — "AD VALOREM" — VALUE OF PACKAGES—DUTIES VOLUNTARILY PAID WITHOUT PROTEST.

1. The term "ad valorem," used in the various revenue laws of the United States charging a duty on imports, does not always mean the actual value of the article at the place of exportation.

2. The 7th section of the act of 14th July, 1832 [4 Stat. 591], directed that goods should be appraised at their actual value at the time of purchase and place of exportation; the act of 29th May, 1830 [Id. 409], fixed the duty on molasses at five cents per gallon; the 1st section of the (compromise) act of 2d March, 1833 [Id. 629], directed that in all cases where duties imposed on foreign imports should exceed twenty per cent on the value thereof, one-tenth of such excess should be deducted biennially, &c. Molasses being imported under these acts, the cost of the packages in which it was contained formed a proper item of its value on which to calculate the twenty per cent.

3. But if, in addition to including the value of the packages in that of the molasses, a separate duty had been charged on them, it would have been wrongly imposed.

4. Duties wrongly imposed, if paid by the importer voluntarily and without protest or remonstrance, cannot be recovered from or set-off against the United States.

5. Payment to a public officer, if unaccompanied by remonstrance or protest, which need not be written, is a voluntary payment.

[Cited in Northrup v. Shook, Case No. 10,329.]

This was an action on a custom-house bond, No. 1294, dated 30th June, 1841, conditioned for the payment of $793, on the 30th December, 1841, that sum being part of the duties charged on an invoice of molasses, imported by the defendants [Clement and Newman] from Cuba into Philadelphia. The act of 29th May, 1830 (4 Story's Laws, 2211 [4 Stat. 409]), fixed the duty on molasses at five cents per gallon; the act of 14th July, 1832, section 7 (4 Story's Laws, 2323, 2324 [4 Stat. 591]), directed that goods should be appraised at their true and actual value at the time of purchase and place of exportation; and the (compromise) act of 3d March, 1833, § 1 (4 Story's Laws, 2328 [4 Stat. 629]), enacted, that in all cases where duties imposed on foreign imports should exceed twenty per cent. on the value thereof, one-tenth of such excess should be deducted biennially until the 31st December, 1841, after which day one-half the residue of such excess should be deducted, and that the remainder thereof should be deducted after the 30th June, 1842. On the arrival of the molasses, for part of the duty on which this bond was given, the custom-house officers at Philadelphia, in accordance with their instructions and usual custom, calculated the duty on the number of gallons at five cents per gallon, and also on the gross value, including that of the hogsheads, tierces, &c., in which the molasses was contained, at twenty per sent. ad valorem; they then deducted from the result of the first method of calculation four-tenths of its excess over that of the second method (it then being in the fourth biennial period), and so fixed the amount of duty to be charged, thus:—

Duty on 36,031 galls. at 5 cents per gall.		$1,801 55
Value, including packages, &c.	$6,309 00
Twenty per cent. thereon	1,261 80
Excess at 5 cents per gall.	539 75
Deduct four-tenths of this excess		215 90
Net duty		$1,585 65

[1] [Reported by William H. Crabbe, Esq.]

For this amount of $1,585.65 the defendants gave two bonds,—the one on which this suit was brought, and the other, of similar date and condition, for $792.65; they were, however, of opinion, that the value of the molasses should have been appraised exclusive of the packages in which it was contained, and therefore, in order to test the question, allowed the bonds to remain unpaid and suit to be brought thereon. The defendants' method of calculation was as follows:—

Duty on 36,031 galls. at 5 cents per gall.		$1,801 55
Value, excluding packages, &c.	$4,663 82
Twenty per cent. thereon	932 76
Excess at 5 cents per gall.	868 79
Deduct four-tenths of this excess		347 51
Net duty		$1.454 04

—Being $131.61 less than by the custom-house calculation.

The invoice contained the following statement of the cost and charges:—

Original cost of molasses		$4,031 1rs.
Charges.
Export duties	$ 264 3rs.
Cost of casks	1,616 5½
" " bbls.	28 4
Hire " casks	37 1
Cartage, storage, and gauging	177 2	2,123 7½
Commissions on $6,155.0½ at 2½ per cent.		153 7
		$6,308 7½

The defendants claimed to set off against the demand of the United States both one-half of the sum of $131.61, alleged to be an overcharge on this importation,—the present bond being for one-half the gross duties,—and also the sum of $345.22, being an alleged overcharge, under similar circumstances, paid by them on a former importation. A claim for the repayment of these sums had been disallowed by the treasury department.

Mr. Watts, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Though the amount claimed here is but small, the principle involves the restoration of an immense sum,—not only nineteen or twenty thousand dollars heretofore paid by these defendants, but millions to other importers throughout the United States, paid by them voluntarily and without protest. The execution of this bond is not denied, but it is contended on the other side that the defendants are entitled, in the first place, to a credit of $65.80½, one-half the difference between the two methods of calculating the duties on this importation, and, secondly, to one of $345.22, arising, in a similar manner, on a previous importation, and then paid by these defendants. To oppose these credits we rely on the compromise act of 1833, and especially on its fifth section, which shows that since the passage of that act the policy of government has been to abolish specific duties and adopt the ad valorem system, which we shall see embraces all charges in the estimate of value. We also rely on the acts of 29th May, 1830, imposing a specific duty of five cents per gallon on molasses, and of 14th July, 1832, section 15, prescribing the method of assessing duties on goods under the ad valorem system, and requiring that all charges but insurance shall be included in the estimate of value. The ninth section of this last act authorizes the secretary of the treasury to establish regulations to carry out the law, and thereunder the treasury circular of 20th April, 1833 (Book of Treasury Circulars, 71), directs that, as to articles subject to specific duties, the comparative ad valorem rate, under the act of 1833, is to be calculated according to the system of the law of 1832, and other laws imposing ad valorem duties. It is conceded by the defendants that where the duties are ad valorem, all charges are included in the appraisement, but they contend that in estimating the comparative ad valorem rate as to articles subject to specific duties, it is merely on the value of the article itself; this we deny, and insist that an ad valorem rate can mean but one thing, and be calculated in but one way. The defendants, in their sworn invoice, have themselves assented to the system adopted in this case, by giving us there the cost of the hogsheads as part of the charges in Cuba. Those charges being shown by the invoice, the only method of calculating the duties by the laws just cited, and by the treasury instructions under them, is to ascertain, first, the specific duties, next, what they would be at twenty per cent. ad valorem, including all charges except insurance, and then, if there is any excess in the former over the latter, to deduct four-tenths of that excess (being then in the fourth biennial period) from the whole amount of the specific duty, and charge the remainder thereof as the proper rate. This disposes of the first credit claimed.

To the second credit defendants ask for, we reply, first, that it is covered by the same objections as the other, and, second, that the duties on which it is founded were paid voluntarily and cannot be recovered by the defendants, they having given no proof of compulsion or protest. Act March 3, 1839, § 21 (9 Bior. & D. Laws, 1012 [5 Stat. 348]); Mowatt v. Wright, 1 Wend. 355; Clark v. Dutcher, 9 Cow. 674; Lowry v. Bourdieu, Doug. 470; Ripley v. Gelston, 9 Johns. 201; Greenway v. Hurd, 4 Term R. 553; Whitbread v. Brooksbank, Cowp. 69; Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144; Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Washington, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 8.

Mr. Cadwalader, for defendants.

Our defence in this case is founded on a belief that there has been an overcharge of duties on this importation, amounting to $131.61, which has arisen from a mistake in the method of calculating the comparative ad valorem rate, and therefore, while we admit the execution of the bond, we claim to set off against it both the sum of $65.80½, one-half that overcharge, and also one of $345.22, heretofore paid by these defendants under similar circumstances. The methods of imposing duties on imports are two: ad valorem and specific. Under neither system has it been the policy to charge a duty on the packages containing the article imported—indeed, in some instances, it has been the policy to encourage certain descriptions of packages—and under the specific system the duty is expressly charged on the goods themselves. Under the ad valorem system, however, it was enacted that all charges but that of insurance were to be included in the estimate of value; this soon gave rise to great dissatisfaction, which was finally settled by the adoption of the compromise act of 1833, by which duties were gradually reduced to a horizontal scale of twenty per cent. on their home value, and this reduction is to be accomplished by comparing the specific rate with one of twenty per cent. on the value, and regulating the former by the latter. The question here simply is whether, in calculating the rate on the value in order to ascertain the amount of specific duty to be charged, we are to include the cost of packages, although it is admitted that they are not chargeable with specific duties. The process at the custom-house is to calculate the specific duty on the article itself, and an ad valorem duty on the article and the packages containing it; thus, while the law of 1833 directs a reduction of four-tenths when the duties exceed twenty per cent. on the value of the article, the officers manage to add to the duty four-tenths of twenty per cent. on the value of the package. The law says that the specific duty shall bear a certain proportion to twenty per cent. on the value of the article, but the custom-house construes this to mean, not the real value of the article, but a fictitious value, assigned to it according to a peculiar system, adopted where the duties are not specific but ad valorem. In this case they gain for the United States thereby, four-tenths of twenty per cent. on nearly $1,700 more than the real value of the molasses.

It is admitted by the district attorney that the packages themselves are not dutiable. But he also says that, since the act of 1833, the policy of the government has been to bring the duties to an ad valorem standard. That is true and not true. The policy, since then, certainly was to come to a duty on the value, and in facilitating and regulating that process to have a constant reference to the value of the article, but not to the foreign value. The law of 1833 has reference to the real value of the article, "the value thereof" is its expression; but the term "ad valorem" has a peculiar meaning attached to it by the revenue laws. It means something more than the intrinsic value of the article: it is that value with an addition. The officers of the custom-house, however, construe value and ad valorem as the same thing, thereby indirectly defeating the intent of the law, and preventing the specific duty from bearing the prescribed proportion to twenty per cent. on the value of the article. The act of 1832 itself, which the district attorney relies upon to support the custom-house method of calculation, plainly recognizes this difference of meaning. In the second section, it speaks of the value of wool under which it shall be free of duty, and in the fifteenth section, directs various charges to be added to the value to appraise the ad valorem rate. This distinction may also be seen in the eighth and ninth sections of the act of 19th May, 1828 (4 Story's Laws, 2116–2118 [4 Stat. 273]). It seems clear therefore that the twenty per cent. of the act of 1833, cannot be ad valorem, but on the value—the intrinsic value—of the article.

We are not to be governed in our construction of the laws by the directions of treasury circulars. The act of 1832 certainly allows the secretary of the treasury to make regulations for carrying the laws into effect, but it requires that it must be "not inconsistent with law;" and such has been the decision of our courts. Karthaus v. Frick [Case No. 7,615], in the circuit court of the United States for the Maryland district; Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 137. Both our claims for credit or set-off rest on these reasons, but the second is met by the additional objection that it was a voluntary payment without protest, and is, therefore, not recoverable against the United States. We reply that there is evidence of a protest to go to the jury, and that it was not a voluntary payment. It was required as a preliminary to entry, and was exacted colore officii, and is therefore not voluntary, and may be admitted as a set-off. Act March 3, 1797, §§ 3, 4,—1 Story's Laws, 464 [1 Stat. 512]; U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 144; U. S. v. Bank of Metropolis, 15 Pet. [40 U. S.] 377; Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 137; Morgan v. Palmer, 2 Barn. & C. 729; Ripley v. Gelston, 9 Johns. 209; Clinton v. Strong, 9 Johns. 377.

H. D. Gilpin, for defendants.

This is a simple case of construction of language, by which we are to infer the intention of congress. In cases where two constructions may be given, the United States uniformly and on principle adopt that which will produce the most duty, nor is such a course open to any great blame so long as the decisions of courts are, as they have been, generally adverse to the construction adopted by government. The construction of the various laws affecting this importation which the custom-house has adopted produces a duty to the United States of $1,585.65, and that which the defendants think right gives them but $1,454.04, being a difference of $131.61, a small sum in itself, but involving, as the district attorney has truly said, the propriety of the payment of immense ones. Between these two constructions it is now to be decided.

The whole question is as to the propriety of charging duty on the packages containing the molasses, the value of which was $1,645.18; or, in other words, whether that sum is to be added to the value of the molasses. Under the laws regulating duties on this importation, they were to be charged at the rate of five cents per gallon thereon, provided that charge did not make the duty amount to more than twenty per cent. on the value of the article imported, and if it did exceed twenty per cent. on "the value thereof" then four-tenths of that excess was to be deducted. But the article imported was the molasses, not the package which contained it, and therefore the value meant must have been that of the molasses alone. This is very apparent from the words of the act of 1833 itself, and also from its well-known intention to prevent complicated calculations, to fix a horizontal standard, and to reduce the duties. How far the duties would be reduced under the system of calculation adopted at the custom-house may be easily seen. Suppose an importation of flour: 196 lbs. at a half cent per lb. would be 98 cents per barrel; the value of the flour is $4.50 and of the barrel $1.50, in all $6.00; but twenty per cent. on $6.00 is $1.20,—an increase of duty, not a reduction; while, on our system of calculation, the specific duty being 98 cents, twenty per cent. on $4.50, the real value of the article, is 90 cents,—a reduction of 8 cents per barrel. The distinction between "value" and "ad valorem" may be seen from the opposite meanings attached to them in various acts of congress. Acts March 2, 1799 (1 Story's Laws, 626 [1 Stat. 627]); 27th April, 1816 (3 Story's Laws, 1588 [3 Stat. 310]); 20th April, 1818 (3 Story's Laws, 1680 [3 Stat. 433]); 1st March, 1823 (3 Story's Laws, 1884 [3 Stat. 729]); 22d May, 1824 (3 Story's Laws, 1942 [4 Stat. 25]); 19th May, 1828 (4 Story's Laws, 2113 [4 Stat. 270]); 14th July, 1832 (4 Story's Laws, 2317 [4 Stat. 583]). The act of 1832 offers us a strong case to show the error committed by the custom-house in construing the "value" of the article to be the same as that on which duty is assessed "ad valorem." By that act, wool, the value whereof does not exceed eight cents per pound, is free, but when its value is over eight cents per pound, it pays forty per cent. ad valorem; now if 100 lbs. of wool, worth seven and a half cents per pound, are imported in a wrapper costing fifty-six cents, and the value is taken by the custom-house system, this wool must pay forty per cent. duty, though it is really worth only seven and a half cents per pound, and therefore, by the express words of the law is free.

Another objection to which this custom-house calculation is open is, that it really charges a duty of four-tenths of twenty per cent. on the packages, though it is admitted that they are not dutiable. It does indirectly what is forbidden if directly attempted. That such is its real effect can be easily shown. We have seen that, while the custom-house deducts but $215.90 from the specific duty, as the required four-tenths of its excess over the twenty per cent. on the value of the molasses, the defendants would deduct $347.51, and that by this means the custom-house gives the United States $131.61, in addition to the specific duty, when reduced by four-tenths of its excess over twenty per cent. on the real value. What is this $131.61? It is four-tenths of twenty per cent. on the value of the packages in which the molasses is contained. This is not denied. The custom-house calculation is, therefore, two operations combined in one, and when shown at length, will appear in this form:—

Specific duty, at 5 cents per gall. on 36,031 gals.		$1,801 55
Value of the molasses...	$4,663 82
Twenty per cent. thereon	932 76
Deduct four-tenths of this 20 per cent.		347 51
Duty on molasses		$1,454 04
Value of the packages..	$1,645 18
Twenty per cent. thereon	329 03
Add four-tenths of this twenty per cent.		131 61
Whole duty on molasses and packages		$1,585 65

The action of the custom-house officers, therefore, is simply an imposition of duty forbidden by law and decision. Karthaus v. Frick [supra].

For these reasons we claim to set off $65.80½, one-half the overcharge on this importation.

The second set-off we urge arises from past payments by the defendants of similar overcharges, and amounts to $345.22. The laws of the United States have been very careful to allow any equitable credits, provided they have been presented and disallowed at the treasury as these have been. Act Sept. 24, 1789, § 26 (1 Story's Laws, 62 [1 Stat. 87]); Act March 3, 1797, §§ 3, 4 (1 Story's Laws, 464 [1 Stat. 512]); U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 144; U. S. v. Macdaniel, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 12, 16; U. S. v. Ripley, Id. 25; U. S. v. Fillebrown, Id. 48; U. S. v. Mann [Case No. 15,716]. If these charges were wrongfully imposed, there must be a right to have them refunded, and this right will found an equitable set-off. It is said, however, that the payment of this amount was voluntary and without protest, and that as it could not be recovered under such circumstances, it cannot be set off. We answer:—That there is evidence for the jury, that the payment was not voluntary, and that there was a verbal protest; a written one being unnecessary. That there was no payment to the United States at all in strictness of law. The charges were illegal, and the officers of government may not receive any payment but such as is according to law; the money, therefore, was never properly in the treasury. That a payment demanded and made under the instructions of a treasury circular is by compulsion. That an erroneous payment to a public officer is never voluntary, and that, even if this were not law, where there is an evident error, and the question is between original parties, equity will interfere. Dew v. Parsons, 2 Barn. & Ald. 568; Morgan v. Palmer, 2 Barn. & C. 734–738; Ripley v. Gelston, 9 Johns. 209; Astley v. Reynolds, Strange, 915; Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. [21 U. S.] 215. As to Elliott v. Swartwout, it was not a case between parties having a right of mutual set-off, but it was against an agent for wrongly paying over. So of Bank of U. S. v. Bank of Washington, and the case in 9 Cow. 674. The act of 1839 was never intended to apply to set-off; it is a mere regulation of finances. The questions to be decided, then, are simply: what is meant by "the value" of the article imported, and whether the law allows a charge of duty both on that article and on the package containing it.

Mr. Watts, U. S. Dist. Atty., in reply.

The defendants take two positions: First that "ad valorem" and "value" have a different meaning, and, second, that because the custom-house officers did not recognise this difference, the defendants were wrongfully obliged to pay excessive duties, which they now ask on equitable grounds to set off against the United States. Under the first position they claim credit for $65.80½, under the second for $345.22. He who claims equity must do equity. As to the second credit, the defendants, if they have been wrongfully charged, have been repaid by the consumers to whom they sold, and if they are now allowed to set off prior payments, will really have been twice paid the amount they set off. They are not out of pocket by their payments heretofore, and have no equitable position before this court, at least so far as regards the claim for $345.22. Other objections also apply to that set-off, which we shall take up hereafter. The other credit, for $65.80½, is based upon an alleged misconstruction of law at the custom-house, and the assertion that "value" and "ad valorem," have different meanings. We think those expressions are identical; government thinks so, according to the treasury circular; people generally think so, according to the common use of the terms; the defendants themselves think so, according to their own invoice, which sets forth all possible charges, except insurance, as part of the value. The intention of the act of 1833, was merely to make a reduction on the excess of duty over twenty per cent.; not a reduction of specific duties; not to bring the duties at once to a low level, but to do so gradually. It is not denied that the reduction applies to duties on foreign imports, and it is fixed by law that the value of foreign imports shall include all charges except insurance. Undoubtedly, before the act of 1833, the value of packages was not included in that of articles which paid specific duties, but the law of 1833 changed this and prescribed a home valuation, which must include the value of packages, and other charges.

The decision of Chief Justice Taney in Karthaus v. Frick [Case No. 7,615], was under the law of 1832, and decides, as we have said, that under that law no duty was chargeable on the packages containing goods liable to specific duties. The act of 1833, however, imposes duties on the value—ad valorem duties on articles before subject to specifics; it prescribes a new method of calculation founded on both systems, and a sort of mongrel between them. Not being an act for specific duties, the decision in question does not apply to it. The fifth section expressly says, that its object is to reduce duties theretofore specific, to a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem.

If we are right in this answer to the first set-off, we have also disposed of the other, for both rest on the same argument; but, even should we fail in that, the second set-off is liable to other and graver objections. Beside the want of equity we have before urged, we allege that it was a voluntary payment. The question on that is one purely of fact, and the jury will judge whether there has been any evidence of compulsion or protest worthy of notice.

RANDALL, District Judge (charging jury). This action was brought to recover the amount of a bond dated June 30, 1841, conditioned for the payment of $793 on the 30th of December, 1841, that being a moiety of the duties charged on a shipment of molasses imported by the defendants, in the brig Augusta, from Trinidad, Cuba, and entered at the custom-house on the day of the date of the bond. The execution of the bond is admitted, but it is alleged that the amount of the duties has been improperly assessed, and the sum of $131.61 overcharged on this shipment. By the act of May 29, 1830, it is enacted, that from and after the 30th of September, 1830, the duty on molasses (which by the act of 1828 was ten cents per gallon) should be "five cents for each gallon, and no more." By the act of March 2d, 1833, commonly called the "Compromise Act," it is provided that from and after the 31st December, 1833, in all cases where the duties which had been imposed on foreign imports by the act of 1832, "or by any other act," should exceed twenty per centum on the value thereof, one-tenth part of such excess should be deducted; on the 31st of December, 1835, another tenth; on the 31st December, 1837, another tenth; on the 31st December, 1839, another tenth; and from the 31st December, 1841, one-half the residue of such excess; and from and after the 30th of June, 1842, the residue of such excess.

The controversy in this case arises out of the mode of ascertaining what was the value of the molasses on which the duty is to be assessed. On the part of the United States it is alleged, that the value is to be ascertained in the same way that the value of articles subject to an ad valorem duty is ascertained; while the defendants contend that such is not the true construction of the act. That the term "ad valorem," as mentioned in the various revenue laws of the United States, charging a duty on imports, does not always mean the actual value of the article at the place of exportation, is evident from an examination of some of the acts. The act of 1818, § 4 (3 Story's Laws, 1680 [3 Stat. 433]), directs that ad valorem rates of duty shall be estimated by adding twenty per cent. to the actual cost thereof, if imported from or beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and ten per cent. on the actual cost if imported from any other place, including all charges, except commission, outside packages, and insurance. The acts of 1823, § 5 (3 Story's Laws, 1884 [3 Stat. 729]), and of 1828 (4 Story's Laws, 2117 [4 Stat. 273]), provide, that to the actual cost or value the same percentage shall be added, and as to the charges only excepts that of insurance. The act of 1832 (section 15) directs that to the actual cost or value, all charges except insurance shall be added, but section 4 abolishes the addition of ten and twenty per cent. The seventh section of the act of 1832, directs that goods shall be appraised at their true or actual value, at the time of purchase and place of exportation, "any invoice or affidavit to the contrary notwithstanding." The third section of the act of 1833, provides that from and after the 30th of June, 1842, the duties required to be paid by law on goods, wares and merchandise, shall be assessed upon the value thereof at the port where the same shall be entered, under such regulations as may be prescribed by law: this section, however, was not in operation when these goods were imported. A letter of instructions from the secretary of the treasury, directing the mode of estimating duties under the law of 1833, has been given in evidence, and relied on by both parties, as supporting their view of the case: but such instructions, although they may be a justification for the officer enforcing them, are not binding on the citizen, unless they contain a correct interpretation of the law.

What, then, under these several acts of congress, was the true and legal duty chargeable on this invoice by the Augusta? It is said by the defendants that in addition to the value of the molasses, the custom-house officers have charged a duty of twenty per cent. on the hogsheads or casks in which it was contained. If they have done so, it is an error.

The various acts of congress imposing duties on the importation of foreign merchandise, have always had reference to the package, vessel or article in which such merchandise is imported, but in no instance have they imposed a separate or distinct duty on such article; thus, for instance, by the act of 1832, a duty of six cents per gallon is imposed on red wines of France imported in casks, while the same wine imported in bottles is subjected to a duty of twenty-two cents per gallon. By the same act a specific duty is imposed on bottles; yet it will not be pretended that the wine imported in bottles shall pay a duty of twenty-two cents per gallon, and the bottles in which it is contained a separate and distinct duty. The distinction is, that wine in bottles is sold with the bottle, and is thus of greater value than wine in casks; the duty is charged on the article in the state or condition in which it is exported.

Have, then, the duties on this invoice been charged on a sum greater than the value of the molasses at the time and place of exportation? The defendants contend that the duties are chargeable only on the first cost of the molasses, and if they could have exported it at that price they are correct, and the charge for the hogsheads should not be added. But was the value of the molasses at the time of exportation no more than when purchased at the plantation? Could it have been exported without the hogsheads or casks? Did not its being placed in these increase its value to the extent of the sum mentioned in the invoice? If so, the duties are correctly charged, as they are to be levied on the value and condition at the time and place of exportation, and not on the original cost of the article in the interior of the country. But if the jury should think that, in addition to the value of the molasses, the custom-house officers have charged a distinct and separate duty on the hogsheads, the defendants will be entitled to a credit on one-half of such excess in this suit, the bond being only for a moiety of the duties on this importation, and no part having as yet been paid.

The defendants also claim an allowance for a similar charge, amounting to $345.22, on sugar and molasses imported in the Hercules, which they have paid. If the jury believe that the value of the sugar or molasses embraces all costs and charges at the place of exportation, including the costs of hogsheads, barrels, boxes, &c., necessary to enable the parties to export it, then it will be unnecessary further to consider the question; should they think otherwise, then a new question arises for their consideration, and that is, were the duties on this shipment paid voluntarily and without objection, in consequence of the parties mistaking the law; if they were so paid, they cannot be recovered back or deducted from the claim of the United States. It has been argued that a payment, to a public officer, cannot be considered as a voluntary payment, as he holds the compulsory power in his own hands: this may be so where the party paying objects, at the time of payment, to the propriety and legality of the charge. It is not necessary there should be a formal written protest, but there must be some objection, some notice that the claim is disputed, as the ground of objection or dispute may be removed or agreed to; but if paid without such objection, merely on a mistaken construction of the law, it is binding and cannot be recovered back, or set-off against another demand. Was there then any such notice or objection by the defendants at the time of payment? The only evidence on their part is that of Mr. Newman, who says there was no formal protest, but Mr. Clement informed him there was a mistake in calculating the duties, and that he (Mr. Clement) had been talking to Mr. Kern about it. Mr. Kern, who was a deputy collector, is since deceased, his testimony was not taken in his lifetime, and no witness is produced who heard the conversation. On the other side, Mr. Howell, deputy collector, Mr. Martin, the cashier, Mr. Bell, the ascertaining clerk, and Mr. McAdam, the bond clerk, have all been examined, and each of them say they never heard of any complaint by the defendant, and Mr. Howell states that if such complaint had been made, it would have been within his peculiar duty to examine it, but he knows of none.

Still, this is a question of fact for the jury, and it is their province to decide it, the burden of proof being on the defendants. If you are satisfied that a duty was charged on the boxes or hogsheads, over and above the value of the sugar or molasses at the time and place of exportation, and that such excess was paid by the defendants, they at the same time protesting or complaining against the justness or legality of the demand, then they are entitled to deduct the amount of such excess from the sum claimed in this suit. If, however, you believe that no such excess was charged, or if charged, that it was paid voluntarily and without complaint, it is binding on the defendants, and they will not be entitled to the deduction.

On the 28th March, 1843, the jury returned a verdict for the United States against Clement for $851, Newman having been discharged under the bankrupt law.

UNITED STATES v. CLEMENTS.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 30.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1811.

BASTARDY—RECOGNIZANCE—HOW TAKEN.

A recognizance in a case of bastardy cannot be taken by a justice of the peace, in Virginia, unless upon the application of the overseers of the poor.

This was a recognizance taken by a justice of the peace in Alexandria in a case of bastardy.

E. J. Lee, for defendant, moved the court to quash it because it was not taken at the request of the overseers of the poor, according to the act of assembly of Virginia of 26th December, 1792, p. 183, § 13.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) ordered the recognizance to be discharged, unless the overseers of the poor should appear at this term and show cause to the contrary.

UNITED STATES v. CLEMENTS.

UNITED STATES v. REID.

[3 Hughes, 509; [1] Howison. Cr. Tr. 89.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Virginia. May 19, 1851.

WITNESS—JOINT INDICTMENT—NEW TRIAL—AFFIDAVIT OF JURORS.

1. In joint indictments one of the accused is not a competent witness for the others, unless he have been acquitted.

2. On motions for new trial in criminal cases affidavits of jurors ought not to be received to impeach their own verdict.

On the 4th of February, 1850, the schooner J. B. Lindsey, Captain S. S. Riggs, came into the port of St. Thomas, West Indies, with signals of distress, and on landing, the captain and two men, who composed the whole crew, reported that while at sea near Trinidad, the mate, John Heeney, and a passenger named John Walker, had been murdered by two of the crew, named Edward Clements and Thomas Reid, who had afterwards left the schooner in an open boat, and they were supposed to have landed somewhere on the Spanish main. The American commercial agent at St. Thomas, Charles H. Delavan, Esq., took prompt measures for their discovery and arrest. He had handbills printed and extensively circulated in which the men were described, and a reward of two hundred dollars was offered for their apprehension. Mr. Delavan addressed a letter to Louis Baker, Esq., American consul at Laguayra, Venezuela, inclosing one of the handbills, and earnestly asking his attention to the subject. In a very short time the following letter was received by the chief of police at Laguayra from the custom-house officer at Higuirote, a small port on the Atlantic, not far from Laguayra: "(Translation.) Custom-House, Republic of Venezuela, Comptroller's Office. Higuirote, February 11th, 1850. The Mayor of the County, Laguayra: I have passed to the honorable secretary of state on this day, under the number of 73, a communication where I inform him that a boat had reached this port with two Englishmen, who stated they came from Maracaibo in five days of navigation, and as they have not presented any document that will justify what they say, or the place they started from, and it being very strange that a small boat should have made such a long navigation as that from Maracaibo to this port, and having stated that their voyage was for Laguayra, this custom-house has ordered the two Englishmen to pass to the port of Laguayra in the Venezuelan sloop, St. Johns, captain Elestino Ganis, and that they be presented to the mayor, so that they may be examined, and that their consul may make convenient investigation, for no civil authority whatever is in this port now that could do it. The boat, with it appurtenances, remains in this port, which you will dispose of, though said Englishmen have offered it for sale for the sum of forty dollars. I remain your obedient servant, Juan Jose Ferrai."

When these men arrived in Laguayra, Consul Baker saw them, and, comparing them with the description in the handbill, was convinced they were the same therein mentioned. He immediately wrote to Mr. Delavan, who communicated with Commodore Parker, of the United States West India squadron, and the sloop-of-war Germantown, commander, Charles Lowndes, was sent to Laguayra. In the meantime, by request of Mr. Baker, the boat, with two pistols, a dirk knife, and some other things found in it, was sent from Higuirote to Laguayra.

On the arrival of the Germantown, Lemuel Franklin and James Jackson, two of her crew, recognized the two men as Edward Clements and Thomas Reid, with whom they had served aboard the United States sloop Saratoga at Norfolk. Judicial examinations were made by the Venezuelan authorities; the tribunal of justice took the depositions of witnesses, and certified them to the office of the American consulate. In one of these depositions James Jackson testified: "Que habiendo ahora dias ido á la carcèl le preguntaron duos individuos que se decia a bordo de ellos; que si sabia lo que les harian; que el esponente entonces les pregunto si era cierto que habian matado el piloto y el pasajero, y Clements le contesto; qui si no hubiera sido por tres botellas di brandi que tenian a bordo no habiera sucedido nada; pero como el piloto le pego con un pasador, lo mato con un cuchillo; que entonces el pasajero corrio á auxiliar al piloto, y como estuviese Reid gobernando el timon lo dego, y corrio sobre el pasajero y lo hecho á el agua;" que el declarante, "then asked them if they had wounded the captain, and they replied they did not know he had been wounded; they had no such intention, as the captain was a very good man." On the 10th of April, 1850, by order of the president of the republic, transmitted through the governor of the province, the two men were placed at the disposal of Consul Baker, together with the boat and its accompaniments. The Germantown sailed with them for the United States, and on the 5th of June, 1850, they were brought into Norfolk by the United States steamer Vixen, lieutenant commanding, Ward, to whom they had been transferred from the Germantown. After examination they, the two men, were sent to Richmond for trial in the United States circuit court.

William T. Joynes, U. S. Dist. Atty., for the prosecution.

William P. Byrd, William A. Cocke, and Joseph M. Carrington, for Clements.

Wednesday, November 27th, 1850.

The prosecution was under the act of congress, 30th April, 1790, art. 3168,—Gord. Dig. 929, 930 [1 Stat. 112]: "If any person commit upon the high seas, or in any river, haven, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery, or any other offence which, if committed within the body of a county, would, by the laws of the United States, be punished with death; or if any captain or mariner of any vessel shall piratically and feloniously run away with such vessel, or any goods or merchandise to the value of fifty dollars, or yield up such vessel voluntarily to a pirate; or if any seaman shall lay violent hands upon his commander, thereby to hinder and prevent his fighting in defence of his ship or goods committed to his trust, or shall make a revolt in the ship, every such offender shall be deemed, taken, and adjudged to be a pirate and felon, and being thereof convicted, shall suffer death; and the trial of crimes committed on the high seas or in any place out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, shall be in the district where the offender is apprehended, or into which he may be brought."

The indictment contained five counts, charging the prisoners jointly with the murder of John Heeney, on the 27th of January, 1850; the murder was charged as done "piratically, wilfully, feloniously, and of their malice aforethought," on the high seas, not within the jurisdiction of any state, or of any of the United States, but within the jurisdiction of this court. (1) The first count charged the murder as committed with a pistol, discharged by Reid, Clements present, aiding and abetting. (2) The second charged the murder as committed with a pistol discharged by Clements, Reid present, aiding and abetting. (3) The third charged the murder as committed with a dirk, held by Reid, Clements present, aiding and abetting. (4) The fourth charged the murder as committed with a knife held by Clements, Reid present, aiding and abetting. (5) The fifth charged the murder as committed by both, with instruments and weapons to the (grand) jurors unknown. The indictment farther said, that the Eastern district (Fourth circuit) of Virginia, is the district and circuit to which the accused were first brought.

The prisoners elected to be separately tried, and the case of Edward Clements being ready, his trial proceeded. He appeared to be from twenty-five to thirty years old, had light-brown hair, high cheek bones, light-gray eyes, and rather well-shaped features; his height was probably five feet nine inches. He pleaded "not guilty" to the indictment. The arraignment was joint, and each prisoner pleaded the same plea.

THE COURT (HALLYBURTON, District Judge). A question may arise as to the mode of obtaining the jury. I am of opinion that I might proceed according to the law now in force in this state, but as it has been heretofore held in full court that a prisoner is entitled to his peremptory challenges, and as I do not wish, sitting alone, to change the rule, I will allow the usual number of peremptory challenges, and then proceed to organize the jury according to the existing state law. This course will be most favorable to the accused.

The following were the jury: Peter Crew, Robert P. Richardson, Leonard Slater, W. L. McMinn, J. B. Dupuy, John A. Lancaster, William Boothwright, John D. Shell, Alex. Garrett, Charles Stebbins, Peyton G. Bayley, E. M. Porter.

For the United States:

Solomon S. Riggs, sworn.—I was captain of the schooner J. B. Lindsey during the past winter; the prisoner was on board as a sailor before the mast. On the 27th day of January, Sunday morning, we came out to sea from Port of Spain, Trinidad; we got out between 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning; things went on pretty well during the day; that afternoon a pistol was fired on deck; I was lying in my berth; I was alarmed and went on deck, and asked the mate what the pistol was fired for? He said he did not know, he would go forward and see. The mate, John Heeney, then went forward, and after awhile returned and said he would soon give me an account of it. I went to my cabin; in a short time the mate handed me two pocket-pistols; I took them and said: "They are more of men than I took them to be." My watch was out at 8 o'clock; Clements and Castello were in my watch; Reid was in the mate's watch, which was from 8 to 12. Before I left the deck I said to Clements: "Keep a good lookout, will you?" He spoke kindly and said: "Yes, sir." It was a fine moonlight night; I left the passenger, John Walker, at the wheel; the mate was also on deck; I went to the cabin and turned into my berth. Between 10 and 11 o'clock I was awakened by a sound—it may have been a pistol-shot or a shrill scream. I jumped up, caught in my hands two small pocket-pistols, and ran upon deck; the cabin had two doors, each opening to the stern; the starboard door was shut; the larboard open. When I got on deck I saw persons on the starboard side running forward, half bent, between the cabin-house and the side of the schooner. I found the mate lying by the wheel, a stream of blood running from his body to the larboard; he was groaning and crying: "Lord! have mercy on me!" I tried to encourage him and to get him into the cabin; presently I heard some persons running aft on the larboard and starboard sides of the cabin-house; I don't know who was on the starboard, but the man on the larboard was Reid; I saw him, and saw the flash of his pistol as he fired at me; I felt myself hurt and staggered back, and fired my left-hand pistol, but missed him; I got into the cabin and sought to close the door; the cook was with me; I found my shirt bosom was all bloody; immediately afterwards three heavy blows were struck on the starboard door, and a voice, which I took to be Clements's cried: "Cook! come out and be murdered!" I think this was only to draw my attention, for instantly Reid again fired at me through the open door; I returned his fire, and when the smoke cleared I saw him lying on the deck; I think my ball struck him somewhere between the mouth and the eyes. I said to the cook: "I have got one down," and I think I said: "Now don't you look pretty, you old pirate," or something like that; I told the cook to look for my powder; I thought it was in my chest, which was opened, but presently I found it in my pocket, and loaded both my pistols; in the meantime the man lying on deck got up and went away; the cook took the two little pistols that had been handed to me by the mate, and loaded them. I put some brown paper on my throat and breast, and drank vinegar during the night; I bethought me of a small after-cabin, behind and lower than the chief cabin; I said to the cook we would get in there and defend ourselves; I slipped aside the slide, and got in and left the slide open one or two inches. We staid there until after day. Some one came on the top of the cabin-house; I went into the cabin and tried to shoot him through the stovepipe hole, but I could not get a chance, and could not see who it was. The cook and I remained in the cabin and after-cabin during Monday. In the afternoon I saw Clements in the forecastle; I could see through the run, under the cabin-deck, and a plank was off the bulkhead of the forecastle; about dusk, the cook was in the after-cabin; he cried out: "Captain! they are coming aft;" I heard one of his pistols snap, and then he fired another; we heard a noise in the hold; after awhile the cook came out and loaded his pistol, and we kept guard over the open (larboard) door. The next morning (Tuesday), at about daybreak, we saw some birds, "large landbirds," sitting on the taffrail; thinking from this that nobody could be near, the cook stepped out and shut the door, and we secured it with a lanyard. After this we heard a pistol fired in the hold, the ball from which, as I afterwards found, struck the forward bulkhead of the cabin. About 9 o'clock I looked through a crack in the forward folding door of the cabin, and saw Clements walking up and down from the mainmast forward with a horse pistol in each hand. He was too far for me to shoot him. I did not then see Reid, but after awhile I saw him on deck, with his face tied up in a handkerchief and a pistol in each hand. Presently I heard Clements cry out to me: "Give us the boat; if you don't give us the boat we will scuttle the vessel." I made no reply that I remember. In a short time the man Castello came aft with a cutlass in his hand to the starboard cabin-door, and said something; I did not hear what he said, I was so eager to shoot him; I raised up the binnacle door and levelled my pistol at him, close at his head; the pistol snapped! Castello left and went forward. The boat was hanging astern at the davits; Clements cried out: "What do you say, can we have the boat?" I said: "Take the boat if you will go off and leave us alone." He asked: "Won't you shoot us?" I said: "No, I will not shoot you," but nevertheless I intended to shoot them through the binnacle-holes when they came aft; I thought, under the circumstances, I was justifiable in doing this. As they came aft, I saw Reid with his face tied up and a pistol in each hand. Clements and Castello had no arms that I saw. One whom I did not see shut the binnacle-slides with the muzzle of a pistol, so I could not see them; I heard the boat fall into the water; they carried her forward. Through the crack in the forward cabin-door I saw them take two coffee-pots and a tea-kettle and a pan from the galley, and I saw them cut the foot-rope of the square sail yard. I sat on my chest feeling very sad. I suspected that they would scuttle the vessel. I heard two blows struck, and thought they were scuttling her. I said to the cook, that if they scuttled her we would rush on deck and kill or be killed—that was our only hope. After this, all was quiet for a time; I heard some one running aft; it was Castello; he seemed frightened; he said: "Captain, the boat is astern!" He pulled at the door; I said: "If you pull open that door, I will kill you, if my pistol will fire." He pushed aside one of the binnacle-slides and said: "Captain, the boat is astern, if you don't believe me, look out!" I ordered him forward; he obeyed and then I opened the door and saw the boat about three hundred yards astern with Clements and Reid in it. I came out, and as Castello approached me I presented both my pistols at him, and said: "Your life is in my hands." He said: "Captain, I am innocent of this killing." (Stopped by prisoner's counsel.) I asked if he had any arms. He said he had one pistol, which he gave to the cook, who fired it off to leeward. The boat seemed to be pursuing us; we got up part of the mainsail and got under way; the last I saw of them and the boat they were bearing off easterly. Our schooner was of 119 tons, and with only two men and myself disabled we had much difficulty, but we got safely into St. Thomas.

By Joynes.—Reid, the mate, and the passenger were on deck when I went below Sunday night; I saw Walker at the wheel at 8 o'clock that night, and have never seen him since. I saw Clements in the forecastle Monday. The cabin-house is above the deck, and from its forward door you could see the whole deck forward. A pistol was fired Tuesday morning. Clements was walking backwards and forwards from the mainmast; he had two horse-pistols (here two were produced), these are like them. The binnacle for the compass is abaft the cabin and has lights, so that when the hanging door inside is open the cabin is lighted from the binnacle. The aft larboard door had been hooked back, and remained open until Tuesday morning; before it was closed we had seen large birds sitting round on the taffrail, probably drawn by the body of the mate, which was becoming offensive. After the boat was nearly out of sight I had the body moved; it looked badly and was very offensive; I did not examine the wounds; I felt badly; it is probable the rudder ropes had chafed the legs, they had black marks upon them. I told Castello to sew him up in a hammock, and put a bag of sand to his head and feet. I read a prayer over him, and told them to commit him to the deep. I turned my back and did not see them. I never saw Castello during the affair until Tuesday morning. There were but two men in the boat; they were Clements and Reid. I got on deck about 10, and at 12 o'clock got an observation of the sun; I think my latitude was 13° 32'. When I left the deck Sunday night we were under mainsail, foresail, jib, and flying jib; when I came up the foresail was hanging, torn to pieces; I suppose the peak lashing gave way, and the throat lashing held on, and so, the gaff dropping, the sail swayed from side to side and was torn. The J. B. Lindsey hails from Norfolk, and is owned by Daniel E. Simonds, of Norfolk, William W. Simonds, of Elizabeth City, and Wallace Bray, of North Carolina.

Cross-examined by Byrd.—There were seven persons on board at 8 o'clock, Sunday night, Heeney, Walker, Reid, Clements, Castello, Smith the cook, and myself. When I was aroused and came on deck, I do not know how many persons were running forward on the starboard; I did not see Castello; the cook was in the cabin; I was in such circumstances of excitement that I could not tell how many persons were on the starboard.

Cross-examined by George Blow.—(Mr. Blow had been counsel in Norfolk and attended during part of the trial, but did not stay to argue the case before the jury.) I shipped Reid and Clements at Elizabeth City; I had found Castello aboard the J. B. Lindsey when I took her; she had just returned from Boston. Reid and Clements acted well in the cruise to Trinidad; I liked them and spoke highly of them. At Trinidad they went ashore, and two black men came alongside and said these men had sent them to work in their places. The day we sailed, a white boy, about eighteen years old, was brought aboard without my knowledge; I thought it wrong and had him sent off. Clements after that offered to pay his passage; he said he was an acquaintance of his, and he wanted him to go to the United States; Clements and Reid went ashore with this boy. We ballasted the 26th; I thought they looked and acted "a little suspicious" then; when the mate handed me the two pistols, Sunday afternoon, and I said "they were more of men than I thought," I little thought they had a chest almost full of arms; I don't say a chestful, but I think five pistols are part of a chestful at least. When I ran out I was in my drawers, bareheaded and barefooted, with a pistol in each hand; I was alarmed because of the noise, and because I heard a man crying, "Lord! have mercy on me." I can't tell anything of the distance between the wheel and the house; the cabin floor was three steps under deck, and the top was high enough for a man to stand upright with his hat on; the larboard door was fastened back by two nails, one in the door and the other in the house. No, sir, I did not fire my pistol first at the man, at the corner of the house; he fired first; I fell back upon the wheel; I did not strike my throat on the nail in the door; I do not know that the surgeon of the Germantown ever examined me; when the pistol was fired, I did not think I was shot by the ball; I thought it probable 'twas the powder; I have never felt the ball, but it may have clipped my neck. At 10 o'clock I suppose Reid ought to have been at the wheel; with the sail that I left on the schooner if the wheel had been left she would probably have run up into the wind's eye, and shaken; I did not hear anything of this sort while in my berth. When Castello came to the door with the cutlass in his hand, I did not trust him. We found a mashed ball in the cabin, which had passed through the lid of my chest; I have no doubt this was the second ball of the two that Reid fired at me.

Re-examined by Joynes.—I did not find any more pistols, but saw balls which were brought to me from the forecastle—they were large; the mashed ball we found had too much lead in it to have been a pocket-pistol ball. After I had shot Reid and he fell, Clements cried out: "Give us the boat." I told him he should not have her, I wanted to shoot another of them. I felt encouraged having Reid down. I bought these pistols in Trinidad; I felt suspicious after the lad was found aboard, and I heard—(stopped.) I bought them because I felt suspicious. At Elizabeth City, Clements and Reid came aboard together, and Clements asked if I could give them a berth; I told them I could give one; he said one could not go without the other, so, as another man whom I had expected had not come, I shipped them both. The mate, when I found him wounded, made no statements as to who did it. The J. B. Lindsey sailed under the "Stars and Stripes." We went into St. Thomas with colors at half-mast and Union down. Many persons boarded us, the American consul among them.

Thursday, November 28th, 1850.

Thomas Castello, sworn.—I was aboard the J. B. Lindsey. We sailed on the 27th of January, which was Sunday, from Five Islands, Port of Spain. In the afternoon, between two and four o'clock, while I was at the wheel, a pistol was fired forward. Captain Riggs was lying down in his berth; he came on deck and said something to the mate; the mate went forward; I looked forward and saw Clements with a small pistol in his hand, and one of his fingers was bleeding. In a short time Clements came up and gave the mate two small pocket-pistols, and said: "I am very much obliged to you." Nothing else occurred till about eight; Clements was at the wheel from six to eight. At eight the passenger, John Walker, took the wheel. I went forward, and Reid and Clements stood just about amidships; they had a bottle and very politely asked me to take something to drink; I took the bottle but did not drink anything. I went to the forecastle and turned in to sleep. Some time during the night I was awakened, I suppose, by the noise of pistols; I can't say what time of night it was. I got out of my berth and was going on deck, but found the forecastle doors shut; in this hot climate I generally slept with them open. I made some noise and tried to open them, but found them fastened. Presently Clements came to the forecastle with a pistol in his hand, and said if I would stay below and make no noise I would not be hurt. I did not then see Reid, but he came afterwards and told me to keep up a good heart, I should not be hurt; Clements came and talked the same way, and they kept running, first one and then the other, to the forecastle to see if I was there. I tried to get out by knocking a plank off the bulkhead of the forecastle, which had been started at sea, but finding I could not pass I lay down in my berth and took it coolly. Soon afterwards Reid came into the forecastle and said: "My God! I am shot;" Clements came directly afterwards, and stood on the steps; Reid said: "Go on deck and avenge my death, shoot somebody!" Then he said: "My pistol-ball, which I fired at the captain, was enough to knock down a horse, and yet his ball knocked me down." After awhile he said he did not believe he was as much hurt as he thought he was, and he got up, tied a handkerchief round his face, and went on deck. I then asked Clements what this row had all been about; he told me, after I came into the forecastle, Captain Riggs came on deck and told him to sway up the sails; he said he would do it about 12 o'clock; then Captain Riggs told the mate to knock him in the head with a handspike. Clements then asked me what I was willing to do; before I could answer Reid called Clements on deck; nothing further occurred until Monday morning; I continued in the forecastle until, about 8:30 or 9 o'clock, they told me I could come on deck When I came up I saw the passenger, John Walker, lying in a pool of blood between the mainmast and the galley; I judged he was dead; Clements and Reid both had arms; each had a large pistol, and a cutlass was lying near; a small pistol was on one of them; Clements and I had quite a long conversation; I asked him who killed the passenger; he said—(here Byrd objected: We are not now on the alleged murder of Walker but of Heeney. The court said it was admissible evidence as part of the res gestæ and as illustrating the motive)—that Reid stabbed the passenger, and that he came very near getting Reid overboard and would have but for his assistance. I asked him where was the mate; he said he was abaft the house, dead! I asked who killed him; he said: "Reid stabbed him and I fired a pistol at him." Clements then told me that if I tried to go aft Captain Riggs would shoot me as quick as he would them. He then said that they wanted me to have nothing to do with the killing until they had killed the captain, then I was to kill Smith, the cook. He asked me if I was willing to join them and not try to go aft. To save my own life I told them that I would; our conversation stopped there. Nothing remarkable occurred till about 1 o'clock, when Clements asked me to help to bring the passenger forward; I went and helped; he was dead; Clements cut both the pockets of his trowsers out; there was nothing in them but a piece of tobacco and a knife. Clements asked me to help to put him on the rail; I helped, and when the body was on the rail he took him by both feet and flung him overboard. In the afternoon they asked me what I thought they had best do; I told them I thought the best thing they could do would be to take the boat and leave the vessel. Clements was the man who talked most, Reid had very little to say at any time. Towards dark Clements told me he wanted me to go down and get the boat-sails out of the hold; we went down into the hold; a pistol was fired from aft; I was about abreast of the mainmast. We came on deck again. Afterwards Reid went down into the forecastle; Clements took a seat not far from me and said he was going to sleep; he handed me a large pistol; I sat on the end of the windlass about an hour; I judged Clements was asleep; Reid was in the forecastle; I put the muzzle of the pistol within a few inches of Clements's head and pulled the trigger; the cap exploded, but the pistol did not fire! Clements jumped up and asked me what I snapped at; I told him I thought I saw somebody aft. As soon as the cap went off, Reid came on deck; Clements took the pistol and went into the forecastle; I don't know what he did; when he came up he and Reid sat down together and told me to go to sleep, but I did not! Nothing more occurred until Tuesday morning. We heard a noise in the cabin as if Captain Riggs was nailing something; Clements said he would go ask him for the boat; he went down into the forecastle and called to the captain, but we did not hear any answer that we could understand, and Clements could not understand either. He came on deck, gave me a cutlass (the same I had seen before), and told me to go aft and ask the captain for the boat. I went aft and asked Captain Riggs to let me come into the cabin; he made no answer; I suppose he could have shot me, as my head was where he might have blown it all to pieces. I heard no pistol snapped. I went aft and told them the captain said they might have the boat. Clements and I went down into the hold and brought up the boat-sail and rigging. He then took the fore peak-halliards and made them fast to the painter of the boat, which was hanging at the davits; he came forward and we then all went aft, and Reid got upon the house and shoved to the binnacle-slides; Clements and I cut the boat adrift; I used a small pocket-knife which I had; while we were there, Clements picked up from the larboard side of the deck a knife all covered with blood and handed it to Reid, who took it; no remark was made about it. Yes, sir, it was like this one, I think it was the same. (The knife shown in court was a dangerous weapon, with a dirk blade, about six inches long, fixed in the handle.) As soon as we cut the boat adrift we went aft and hauled her forward; the boat was on the starboard side; the schooner would come up to the wind and touch and fall off again; she was in a manner hove to. Reid went below and handed up his and Clements's clothes, mine were not touched. Clements and I rolled the water-cask forward; they sent me into the galley to bring out coffee-pots, a tea-kettle, and any victuals that might be there; I went to the galley and brought out two coffee-pots, a tea-kettle, a pan, with hardly enough of provisions for one man for a day. They filled the coffee-pots and kettle with water; Clements went down into the forecastle, and while he was there I heard a pistol fired, I suppose, by him. He soon came out; he said: "We will commence scuttling the vessel, that will entice the captain out, and we will shoot him;" I did not believe he would do it; he was all talk and gas. Previous to this I had taken the axe and hidden it behind the water-cask. Reid went into the boat, Clements and I passed in their clothes and all the other things. Clements stood behind me with a pistol in each hand; I got over the rail; Clements passed into the boat so far that he could not get back; I jumped back on board, seized the axe, and struck at the painter (boat-rope); the first blow I missed it—the second I cut it in two. I then fell down flat on the deck, so that if they fired they might not shoot me, because of the bulwarks. They had asked me if I wanted my clothes. After lying awhile I rose and saw the boat astern; I went down into the hold, and sung out to the captain that I had cut the boat adrift, and she was astern. I heard no answer; I then went aft, turned aside the body of the mate, eased off the main sheet, and put the wheel amidships; then went to the cabin and said to Captain Riggs that the boat was astern; the captain came with a pistol and told he to go forward or he would shoot me; I went forward, eased off the jib-sheets, hauled them aft, and hoisted all I could of the foresail. I then walked aft; Captain Riggs and Smith were on deck, each with a brace of pistols; the captain said: "I have a great mind to shoot you;" I told him I had nothing to do with the row, and stated to him what I have stated here to you. He asked if I had arms; I gave him a small pistol which Reid had given to me; the cook fired it off. Some time afterwards the captain told me to take the body of the mate forward and sew it up in a hammock; one arm was in the sleeve of a large overcoat, the other sleeve was off; the coat was bloody and smelled badly; I took it off and hove it overboard. The mate's body was so offensive that I could not examine it, but I saw clotted blood on the left breast and right side; it was swelled so much that I could not make a large navy hammock meet around it. The task made me so sick that I vomited. The sides of the vessel were covered with large birds, called "boobies" in the West Indies; I did the best I could; I put a bag of sand at the head and one at the feet; the captain read a prayer, and Smith and I committed the body to the deep.

By Joynes.—I next saw these men, Clements and Reid, in the City Hall, Norfolk. I never saw them have arms before, except a small pistol; it is very common, however, for seamen to have a small knife, a dirk-knife, and a small pistol. The white boy Captain Riggs has spoken of, was at the Crown and Anchor, Port of Spain, Trinidad. Reid and Clements staid there; the mate and I sometimes went there; the boy had sometimes shown us round; he said he wanted to go to the United States; mate told him perhaps, if he asked, the captain would let him go. Reid and Clements came off Thursday night with this boy. I did not tell the captain, because I know that most rows and bad-blood aboard ship are caused by tales carried backwards and forwards between the forecastle and the cabin. The mate asked me if the boy was aboard; I told him to go and see. A black boy brought them off; I did not see any clothes. At Trinidad Reid and Clements were a good deal ashore, and they had two negro men to work in their places. The J. B. Lindsey's house was about four and one-half feet high; standing abaft I can see over the house; it may be three feet or more from the house to the wheel. I don't know who was at the wheel from 8 to 12, but I know Walker was there at 8; if nothing had occurred, my watch would have been from 12 till 4, and the captain and Clements would have been with me; I was in the forecastle from five to six minutes after 8 until Monday morning; I am sure I did not go out; when my pistol missed fire Monday night, if it had gone off it would certainly have blown Clements's brains out. It was within a few inches of his head.

Cross-examined by Byrd.—It was Clements who said they would scuttle the vessel and draw the captain out to shoot him. I had no right to believe or disbelieve whether they would scuttle her or not. I hid the axe with a view to cut the painter and cast them adrift; when the captain came on deck, I think the boat was so far astern that a pistol-shot would have done no harm. They may have gotten ashore sooner than we; we made almost as much leeway as progress. The mate and Clements were not on very good terms; the mate told me he did not like Clements because he had too much talk; he was generally called "Gassy Clements."

Captain S. S. Riggs, recalled by Joynes.—Aboard the J. B. Lindsey I had a little less than $500, in dollars, and a Colonial Bank bill for $1,154. This was known to the crew; I had cut off a third of the bill and sent it to the United States by the schooner May Flower; the crew did not know this.

Daniel J. Smith, sworn.—I was aboard the J. B. Lindsey the 27th of January, Sunday. I turned into my berth in the cabin at about 8 o'clock; the first thing I heard was, I suppose, a shriek from the mate; the captain ran on deck with his pistols; as he went up I heard a pistol fire; a short time afterwards I hear another, and the captain came running back and said he was wounded; he said to me: "I wish you would get my powder;" I went to look in the chest for it; in a short time I heard a voice which I took to be Clements's and several knocks at the starboard door; nearly at the same time I heard two reports of pistols; the captain fired one and, I suppose, shot Reid; I saw a man lying on deck whom I took to be Reid. After this, not much happened that I saw until Tuesday morning, when Clements called out to the captain to let them have the boat, and Tom Castello came aft with a cutlass in his hand; and not long afterwards he called to us that they were astern, and we went on deck and saw the boat with Clements and Reid in it.

By Joynes.—On Monday night, I think, I fired at somebody about the mainmast in the hold; my first pistol snapped, the second went off; this was the only pistol I fired until we came up; there was, I think, a pistol fired in the hold on Tuesday. I understood Clements to say to me, "Cook, come out and be murdered;" the door on the larboard side remained open until Tuesday morning, when I shut it, and the captain and I made it fast with a lanyard; the binnacle-slides were open, but we saw them closed Tuesday morning. When we came up, I saw the mate's body; I did not examine it at all. I always slept in the cabin. In Trinidad I saw two small pistols in Clements's possession, which he offered to sell to the mate. I have seen such a knife as this (shown to him); it was lying on the deck with a couple of small pistols while we were in Trinidad; nobody had them. At Trinidad I heard Clements say, "What did the captain say about my sending off men to work?" I said, nothing. He said he had better not say anything, or he would wring his neck or his nose. In Trinidad I heard Clements say something to Castello about the freight, and heard something said about the money for the freight.

Cross-examined by Byrd.—I think the captain fired two or three times; I can't say whether he fired as he ran on deck. I was a good deal frightened: I crept into the after-cabin with the captain; when we came up, the boat was about a hundred yards astern; the boy who came aboard talked pretty good English.

Castello, recalled.—The boy was Irish; I saw no private conversation between Clements and Reid and this boy; I thought it was only for fun they had him aboard; he was about 18 or 19 years old. I don't know that he was a sailor; he attended at the bar of the Crown and Anchor.

The evidence for the prosecution closed.

For the defence, Thomas Reid was offered as a witness for the accused, who was jointly indicted with him.

Joynes.—He is incompetent.

Carrington, to sustain Reid's competency, cited Rosc. Cr. Ev. 141; 2 Starkie, Ev. 16, 17; Hawk. P. C. 4.

Joynes.—The cases relied on are either where the accomplice was a witness against the accused, or where the parties were separately indicted; I think no case can be found where the parties are jointly indicted, in which one (unless he has been acquitted) is competent for the other. Campbell v. Com., 2 Va. Cas. 314; 1 Hale, P. C. 903; Com. v. Marsh, 10 Pick. 57.

Byrd replied, citing Brown v. Com., 2 Leigh, 769; Russ. Crimes, 597; 2 Starkie, Ev. 21.

THE COURT.—If this were a new question, I should be inclined to admit the evidence. I confess I do not see much distinction in principle between cases of several indictments for the same offence and joint indictments. But the decisions are express that in the latter case the alleged accomplice is not competent for the defence unless he has been acquitted. I must exclude Reid's testimony.

The evidence closed.

Joynes, for the United States.—Rosc. 580. Where a homicide is proved to have been committed, the law presumes it to be murder, and it devolves upon the accused, from the evidence adduced either for or against him, to show that it is either manslaughter or justifiable or excusable homicide. He argued that the facts of this tragedy proved a combination between Reid and Clements, and that even though Clements had not struck a blow or raised a hand to fire a pistol, yet if he was present, ready to help, aiding and abetting, he was guilty of murder.

William A. Cocke, for the defence.—The accused is not guilty of piracy according to its legal meaning (act of congress, 1790), and according to the definition of piracy under the law of nations and the civil law. Story, Const. 405. He cannot be convicted of "making a revolt," because he is not so indicted. The act of congress makes murder on the high seas piracy, but the evidence does not make out a case of murder; it is manslaughter only at most, and that is a separate statutory offence, by act of congress. See article 3178, Gord. Dig. 933. Not being indicted for manslaughter, he cannot be convicted at all.

J. M. Carrington, for the defence, addressed the jury for an hour, commenting upon the law and the evidence.

Byrd assailed the testimony of the captain and Castello; and argued that if the jury believed a part of Clements's statement they ought to believe it all, and if they believed that the mate struck him with a handspike there was ample provocation to make the killing manslaughter. He spoke two hours, not concluding until Friday, November 29, 1851.

Joynes closed for the prosecution. He argued that there was nothing to prove that the mate struck the accused before the fatal blow was given; he vindicated the captain and Castello, and ended by an earnest appeal to the jury, fair alike to the accused and the United States.

The jury retired at about ten minutes past one, and in a quarter of an hour, returned with a verdict of "guilty."

United States v. Thomas Reid.

The prosecution and indictment were the same as in the trial of Edward Clements. The accused appeared to be from thirty to thirty-five years old, and about five feet, eight inches high; he had dark hair and eyebrows, and a dark complexion; a slight scar was visible on his face, near the nose and eyes; his expression was not forbidding, though firm. He pleaded "not guilty" to the indictment, as before stated.

The following were the jury: James H. Gardner, William M. Sutton, William Slater, Hiram Bragg, Ira Tichenor, Edward D. Eacho, Charles G. Thompson, R. M. Allen, Thomas W. Keesee, James Phillips, Franklin Stearns, Hugh Rileigh.

William T. Joynes, for the United States.
R. G. Scott, T. P. August, and A. Judson Crane, for the prisoner.

Upon request of the prisoner's counsel, the prisoner's affidavit was taken to certain statements, upon which the court directed a writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum to issue to the jailor of Henrico county jail to bring up three persons confined there, viz., Franklin Allison, Joseph J. Hall, and Edward Curtis.

Friday, December 13th, 1850.

Solomon S. Riggs, sworn.—I had some suspicions of these men in the Port of Spain. I arrived there the 17th of January, sold my cargo, went aboard the vessel, got my papers and got my cargo entered at the custom-house, engaged a large lighter called a "go-bar," and nearly loaded her; on the 18th we went on discharging. In the evening, after supper, Clements and Reid asked me for permission to go ashore; I gave it, but told them to be back by gun-fire. They were not aboard the next morning; I remarked I expected Reid and Clements were in the "calaboose." While we were working, two black men came alongside and said they had sent them to work in their places. After awhile I went ashore; at the landing Reid and Clements met me; Clements asked me how the men they had sent worked; I said: "Quite well;" Clements asked me if I would go up and take a glass of porter; in the afternoon they went aboard before I did; when I came aboard, the cook said to me he was afraid I would have trouble (stopped by Mr. Scott). On the 25th we went to Five Islands, and ballasted before sundown the 26th. In the course of the day Clements kept up a "monstrous hallooing and to do;" I thought it didn't look right; I told the mate we would go to sea early the next morning. As I was sitting aft, inclining my head near the (dacey?) I saw Reid, who seemed to be filing something; he was sitting forward on the windlass; every now and then he seemed to be peeping around the foremast at me; I did not see what he was doing, but heard the sound. These things made me a little wakeful; I did not sleep much that night.

Joynes.—Captain Riggs, where and by whom was the vessel owned?

August.—We insist that Captain Riggs cannot be permitted to prove these matters by his verbal statement; the best evidence of ownership is the register, and it ought to be produced.

Scott.—I remember that this question was before Chief Justice Marshall in a case in which I had the honor to be counsel. It was in the trial of a Chilian, accused of murder aboard a vessel which, I think, was alleged to be owned in New Bedford. The prosecution sought to prove that this vessel was owned by American citizens in New Bedford; the chief justice said the ownership must be proved, and that as the acts of congress required registry, that was the best evidence, and none secondary could be introduced. Roscoe, i; Gilbert's Ev.; Buller's Nisi Prius. I take the principle to be this, that the law has fixed what shall be evidence of title to the vessel, and this is required to be written and matter of record in the custom-house. If the J. B. Lindsey had papers, they ought to be produced; if she had none, then when she passed upon the high seas she was not an American vessel or not entitled to peculiar protection as such.

Joynes was about to reply.

THE COURT (stopping him).—This point has been frequently raised before me, and, I believe, always in criminal cases. Suppose no registry acts had ever passed and a murder had been committed on the high seas aboard an American vessel, would it not have been punishable according to the laws of the United States? I think it would. Then, as to the registry acts; they were intended to encourage and protect our commerce; but I think that an American vessel not registered is still a vessel of the United States, and that crimes committed on board of her would be punishable according to the acts of congress. But admit that she was registered, is there anything in the acts of congress or the general rules of law making the register the highest evidence of ownership? The registry is merely the oath of a party that the vessel is owned by certain persons, reduced to writing and recorded in the custom-house. It does not seem to me to be higher evidence than the oath in open court of a witness who knows the ownership. The objection is overruled.

Witness.—She was the property of (as before stated). I think she was built in North Carolina.

Cross-examined by Scott.—I cleared for Martinique; I think I went thither and then to Trinidad for a market; I had no money going out, except five or six dollars. In the voyage out I did not observe that Reid and Clements had any arms; they behaved and worked well. They paid the black men for working; I did not. When Clements hallooed so much Saturday, it surprised me, because he had not done it before, but it is not unusual for seamen in hoisting to halloo; he made a great noise. In Trinidad I received about $500 in specie, and brought it aboard in a little bag; this was late Friday evening. Clements and Reid were in the boat with me when I brought it off. The pistols handed to me by the mate I afterwards gave to another mate who shipped with me at St. Thomas; I gave them to him in Ocracock Inlet. I delivered my own pistols to the United States commissioner at Norfolk. There were eight berths in the cabin; the cook and I both lay in berths, he on the larboard, and I on the starboard side, but I don't know that any one outside could have seen either of us. When I ran out the mate was lying on the starboard side, his head towards the rudder, his feet under the wheel-ropes; I was on the larboard side, with my head resting on a spoke of the wheel, when I heard them running back aft. I made no remark; I did not say, "Who is there?" had not time; I fired after Reid fired; yes, sir, I was alarmed; I got into the cabin as fast as possible. The second time he fired, he came round the corner of the house; his ball, as I afterwards found, struck the facing of the door and passed through the lid of my chest; I was right in front of a stand which comes out eighteen inches from the bulk-head. I fired back and he fell, with his feet near a ring-bolt in the deck.

Thomas Castello, sworn.—Reid said nothing when we were throwing the body of the passenger overboard; it took place about 1 o'clock Monday.

Cross-examined by Scott.—The city of Norfolk is my present residence. I shipped the 19th of November, 1849, at Boston, with the mate, John Heeney, aboard the J. B. Lindsey, Captain Hathaway. I have been a seaman twelve or thirteen years; when Captain Riggs sailed, we went first to San Dominique, then to Martinique, then to Tobago, then to Trinidad; there was a difficulty at Trinidad between the captain, Clements, and the cook, Smith; Reid and I were neutral; I can't say as to the day of the month; I did not keep the log-book. I introduced the passenger, John Walker, to the captain; I have seen Reid, Clements, and the passenger all pretty drunk together; when I saw them once, the passenger was beastly drunk and under the table, and Reid and Clements were fighting. The passenger said he was an Englishman and wanted to come to the United States. I must now mention what I omitted to state on my former examination. In Trinidad Clements asked me how much money there was aboard; I said five hundred dollars; he told me I was a damned liar, there was at least eighteen or nineteen hundred dollars.

Scott.—Why did you not state this before?

Witness.—Because I forgot it—it did not come to my mind. (Here a sharp colloquy took place between Mr. Scott and the witness.) I have never said since Clements's conviction that I came here to convict him, and was glad he was convicted. I deny it entirely. I never said it or anything like it, and I challenge anybody to show it.

By Joynes.—Clements's question about the money was on Monday; Reid, Clements, and I were then all standing together.

Saturday, December 14th, 1850.

Daniel J. Smith, sworn.—In Trinidad I heard Clements talk about the money; I never heard Reid say anything particularly one way or another; I heard Clements say to Reid, "I should like to take the vessel and get the money;" Reid made no reply, Clements said it would be a pretty good raise if they could get through with it; in the same conversation he said it would be all right if they could get me; they would put Tom Castello to death and I must kill the captain. I never heard Reid say anything more than "umph, umph." One evening I went ashore; Castello set me ashore in a boat; Clements and Reid asked us if we would take something to drink; Castello said a little beer would do. They wanted me to go up to a woman's, named "Yankee Lize;" after we got up there, they asked me if I would drink a little sweet wine; I said I didn't care, sweet wine would do as well as anything else. They sent out for a bottle; Clements was mixing a dose; I thought he might be going to poison—(stopped). After awhile they introduced me to "Yankee Lize," and I went with her; they went away.

Cross-examined by Scott.—I shipped aboard the J. B. Lindsey at Elizabeth City. 'Twas in January, I think. I shipped one day and was off the next. I am from South Carolina. We had been three or four days at Trinidad before I heard Clements say anything about the money. Some of our cargo was out. I don't guess they thought I heard them; I was standing near and heard. I did not state at the former trial that I heard Clement say all this about the money and taking the vessel, because I was stopped; I was commenced in the middle and stopped in the middle. Scott.—Who stopped you? Witness.—All hands and the cook. Scott.—Who? Witness.—I don't know who stopped me; I knew all this then and would have stated it, but I was stopped. Captain Riggs and I have had strife, but it is all over, and I suppose nothing is to be said about it now. The captain did once try to shoot me, but I suppose he was out of his head; he snapped one of his pistols at me the Friday after the Tuesday we came on deck; I think he must have been out of his head; at St. Thomas, the captain put me in irons, but I was taken aboard when we left and did my duty to Elizabeth City.

By Joynes.—He put me in irons because I got somewhat intoxicated; I don't know any other reason. When he snapped the pistol at me I think he was certainly out of his mind; he had been asleep not long before; I got up out of my berth and was going out when he roused up and snapped a pistol at me.

By a juror.—He said nothing, not a word was said. He gave me the pistols immediately afterwards, and told me to put them into his chest; I put them and a knife he had into his chest, and locked them up and kept the key. The captain was very unwell; he suffered a good deal from his wound; he did very little duty before we got into St. Thomas.

BY THE COURT.—I never saw any symptoms of derangement in him before.

Castello, recalled.—I do not know whether the captain snapped the pistol at Smith or myself or a tarpaulin. The man was not rational, sir. This was on Saturday, the 2d February. He had been suffering much from his wound; I think he was not rational from his manners, his actions, his eyes, everything about him. He was often in a high state of fever. He did little or nothing in navigating the vessel; he tried to take an observation from the sun, and he made the latitude 17° 12′ when we were certainly in 17° 38′. Sunday night Smith and I were obliged to take the vessel from him. We got in on the 4th of February; the captain was taken ashore by a physician.

The evidence for the prosecution closed.

For the defence:

John R. Tucker, lieutenant United States navy, sworn.—I know Reid, the prisoner; he sailed with me about twenty-eight months in a voyage to the East Indies in the United States ship St. Louis. His character was very good; he was very quiet, industrious and attentive to his duties. From all my opportunities of knowing him, I believe he had a kind and tractable disposition. We left the United States in 1843, and got back in 1845. I think he was stationed in the foretop during the whole voyage. I do not think he knew anything of navigation; I should probably have found it out if he had known anything of it. His character and conduct must have been more than ordinarily good from the fact that in so long a cruise I heard no complaint of him.

Charles F. McIntosh, lieutenant United States navy, sworn.—I know Reid well; he was in the United States frigate Saratoga with me some twelve or fifteen months in 1847 and 1848. It was in the Gulf of Mexico; I believe his character was very good; he was a very quiet, good man, and I think a great favorite with the crew. He talked very little; I may say that Reid, like all other seamen, would sometimes go ashore and get drunk, and then he was a very reckless man, but when sober he was remarkably quiet and peaceable; he had no knowledge of navigation, I think.

Franklin Allison, sworn.—I have had some conversation with Castello in the jail. The day Clements came last from court I saw Castello and Smith; I asked Castello what was the result; he said Clements was convicted and it was what he (Castello) went for, and that if his evidence would convict Reid he would do it.

Cross-examined by Joynes.—Clements was upstairs; I was downstairs; I have the privilege of going up and down stairs: I have been confined about twelve months; I am charged with horse-stealing, have never been tried; never had any conversation with Clements about this trial; I spoke to both Smith and Castello, but don't know whether Smith heard; I think I mentioned this talk to Reid; I think some of the other persons heard me talking; I never mentioned it to Mr. Winston, the jailor, and never afterwards talked to Castello. This conversation was at the lower window; I don't know whether any person was at the window above. I mentioned this to Reid the same evening; I did not like to talk to Clements because he seemed low-spirited.

Joseph Hall, sworn.—I knew Castello in St. Thomas; he was a seaman aboard the J. B. Lindsey; I went aboard the third day after his arrival and conversed with him; I remember he showed me the place on the rail where he cut the painter; he said he struck two blows. I heard some talk in the jail between Allison and Castello at the window; I understood Allison to ask him how Clements came out at his trial. Castello answered: "I have convicted Clements, and intend to do the same for Reid if my oath will do it."

Cross-examined.—Curtis and I were standing at the stove; 'twas not in a room, 'twas in a passage; the stove was three or four feet from the window; I saw Castello's face, but saw nobody with him. I told Clements and Reid about this conversation the same evening; I said nothing to others, because Reid asked me not to, as he wished to have me as a witness. Joynes.—Why are you in prison? Witness.—For refusing to work without food. Four others were convicted at the same time. I was in no vessel in St. Thomas. I had been shipwrecked and was in charge of the United States consul; I came to the United States in the schooner Joseph Barker.

Edward Curtis, sworn.—I have heard Castello speak of Clements; two weeks ago last Friday, Allison, Hall and I were in the passage by the stove; Castello passed by the window; Allison asked him how Clements's case had gone; Castello said he had convicted Clements, and would do the same for Reid if his oath would do it.

Cross-examined.—I did not see anybody with Castello; I sluyed round and went upstairs: Allison and Hall did not follow me immediately; I went up and told Clements, and he said he hoped I would remember the words; I never mentioned it to Reid or anybody else. I have been in jail about a month for refusing to eat salt beef. I don't exactly know what the charge was; five of us were convicted at the same time.

At this point Mr. Joynes, at the suggestion of the court, and in justice alike to the witnesses Hall and Curtis and the United States, stated that they had been convicted at Norfolk, under the act of congress, for "conspiring and encouraging each other to disobey orders."

The evidence closed.

Mr. Joynes, for the prosecution, addressed the jury from a quarter to 2 until 3 o'clock.

Mr. Crane, for the prisoner, spoke from 4.15 to 5.30 o'clock, p. m.

Mr. August, for the prisoner, spoke on Monday, December 16th, from 10.30 a. m. until 12.15 p. m.

Mr. Scott, from 12.15 until 2.10.

Mr. Joynes closed at about 5 o'clock.

The jury retired, were kept together during the night, and returned into court on Tuesday, December 17th, 1850, at 2.30 o'clock, with a verdict of "guilty."

Thursday, December 19th, 1850.

A motion for a new trial in Clements's case was made and argued at length. The grounds assigned were: (1) That Reid's testimony ought to have been admitted. (2) That evidence had been admitted of the murder of Walker, another and a distinct offence, and the subject of a distinct indictment. (3) That the jury ought to have been charged as to manslaughter as well as murder; the prisoner's counsel, Byrd and Carrington, insisting that under this indictment he might have been convicted of manslaughter. (4) That new and material evidence had come to light since the trial (referring to the evidence of Allison, Hall, and Curtis).

Friday December 20th.

The court overruled the motion for a new trial.

Saturday, December 21st.

The prisoners were brought up for sentence. On being asked if they had anything to urge, Edward Clements said, in substance, that he had no hope that what he said would prevent the sentence, but he wished to make a statement: "At 8 o'clock my watch was out; I left Heeney and Walker on deck; Castello had gone to the forecastle; as my custom was, I took my blanket aft and laid down on deck to sleep; I was awakened by the mate, who punched me in the side with a handspike, and told me to get up and sway up the foresail; I told the mate it was not my watch, that there were two of them, and that in my watch I would do what it was my duty to do; John Walker said, if he had command of the watch, and if he were the mate, he would knock my brains out; the mate then said: 'Get up or I'll knock your brains out,' and struck me on the arm. I said I would report to the captain; a struggle took place, and I stabbed him with my sheath-knife, and he fell at my feet; the passenger interfered, and Reid killed him."

The court sentenced them, and appointed the last Friday in January as the day of their execution.

Thursday, January 16th, 1851.

A motion for a new trial in Reid's case was made by his counsel on two grounds: (1) That after the jury were sworn, and before they rendered their verdict, a copy of the Dispatch newspaper which contained a statement of the evidence, was read by several jurors without the consent or knowledge of the court or counsel. (2) That Reid ought to have been admitted as a witness for Clements and Clements for Reid, under section 21, c. 199, Code Va. (page 752), which reads thus: "No person who is not jointly tried with the defendant shall be incompetent to testify in any prosecution by reason of interest in the subject-matter thereof." This statute seems to have escaped the attention of the counsel for both prisoners until both trials were over. They now contended that it gave the rule in the United States courts.

Joynes.—I shall insist that the jurors are not to be heard to prove any facts by which their own verdict is sought to be assailed.

This question was fully argued, the counsel for the prisoner relying chiefly on McCaul's Case, 1 Va. Cas. 306; Kennedy's Case, 2 Va. Cas. 510.

Friday, January 17th.

THE COURT.—It is undoubtedly true that the courts have not admitted without great reluctance and caution the affidavits of jurors, in order to attack their own verdict. In civil cases, involving only pecuniary interests, the public inconvenience which would result from hearing such affidavits is sufficient to exclude them, but in criminal, and especially capital cases, I think the favor of the law to life and liberty is more than the argument from inconvenience. I shall therefore hear the affidavits of the jurors.

Several jurors were sworn and testified. Among them—

Charles G. Thompson, sworn.—I saw a paper in the hands of some of the jury; I don't know what paper it was; it contained a statement of the evidence in Reid's case. I probably read a quarter of a column.

By Joynes.—I think what I read was a statement of the captain's testimony; I was not at all influenced by what I read; I do not think that report was entirely accurate; I think we had heard the evidence but not the argument; I believe I read the paper before the court was opened in the morning.

Hugh Rileigh, sworn.—I read a copy of the Dispatch containing a statement of the evidence in Reid's case. I read some part of it here and some part in the jury-room. I had the paper in my pocket; I do not know that it was read by any other juror; I think it was once spoken of; the report I thought accurate, but I did not read it particularly.

By Joynes.—I got the paper at my store; I am a subscriber for it, and pay by the week. I was not at all influenced by what I saw in the paper.

BY THE COURT.—I sometimes referred to it for the purpose of refreshing my memory, but if I found there any statement which I did not recollect at the trial, it had no influence on me; I read more from curiosity than otherwise. My impressions were not altered as to the question of "guilty" or "not guilty" from first to last.

The motion for a new trial was elaborately argued for the prisoner by Scott and Crane, and for the United States by Joynes.

THE COURT.—As these cases and the questions that have been raised are of great importance, I shall not now decide the motion, but shall adjourn it to the next term, when it is probable the chief justice may be sitting here. In the meantime I shall set aside the judgments.

Friday, May 14th, 1851.

Hon. ROGER B. TANEY, Chief Justice of the United States, and Hon JAMES D. HALLYBURTON, District Judge, sitting.

The motion for a new trial in Reid's case came up for reargument.

Joynes.—I shall again insist that the jurors ought not to be heard at all against their own verdict, but for convenience and for the purpose of saving time this question may be argued with the others that arise.

TANEY, Chief Justice.—If it will not disturb too much the course of argument for which the prisoner's counsel have prepared themselves, the court would prefer that this question as to the admissibility of the juror's statements shall be argued first in order.

Crane.—1. As to the admission of the jurors' affidavits. 5 Bac. Abr. 369; Metcalfe v. Deane, 1 Cro. Eliz. 189; Com. v. McCaul, 1 Va. Cas. 306; Overbee's Case, 1 Rob. [Va.] 756; 5 Pick. 296; 13 Mass. 217.

As to the competency of Reid for Clements and of Clements for Reid, I cite first our statute, Code Va. 1849, p. 752. The construction of this seems plain, and I suppose if this prosecution were in the state court, the question would be promptly decided. Does this act give the rule of evidence in the United States courts? I insist that it does. Section 34, Judiciary Law 1789 [1 Stat. 92]; Gord. Dig. p. 125, § 534. The laws of the several states are rules of decisions in trials at common law. Burr, Tr. 481, contra; [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 1; [Polk v. Wendal] 9 Cranch [13 U. S.] 98; [The Orleans] 11 Pet. [36 U. S.] 175; [McNiel v. Holbrook] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84; Hamilton's Argument on the Judiciary in the Federalist.

3. As to the effect of the jurors' evidence in vitiating the verdict; Wheat. Cr. Law, 644, 645; 5 Bac. Abr. (Ed. 1844) 369; 2 Hale, P. C. 296; 2 U. S. Dig. 1849, p. 695; 5 Supp. U. S. Dig. 435; Overbee's Case, 1 Rob. [Va.] 756; 12 Pick. 496; 1 Pick. 337; 13 Mass. 217; Com. v. McCaul, 1 Va. Cas. 306.

Joynes.—1. The affidavits of jurors ought not to be admitted to prove their own misbehavior. This is the settled English rule, commencing with Vasie v. Delaval, 1 Term R. 11; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 655; Grah. New Trials, 111; Straker v. Graham, 4 Mees. & W. 721; Burgess v. Langley, 5 Man. & G. 722. The same rule prevails generally in the United States. Whart. Cr. Law, 655. It is the rule in criminal as well as civil cases. Rex v. Wooller, 6 Maule & S. 366; State v. Freeman, 5 Conn. 348; Com. v. Drew, 4 Mass. 398; Suttrel v. Dry, 1 Murphy, 94; State v. McLeod, 1 Hawk, 344. In Tennessee such affidavits were held admissible in criminal cases in Crawford v. State, 2 Yerg. 60; but the practice has since been regretted and characterized as dangerous, and a disposition expressed to restrict it. Norris v. State, 3 Humph. 333. Commented on, McCaul's Case, Kennedy's Case, and Overbee's Case. In all of them affidavits of the jurors were either accompanied by other evidence or designed for their exculpation. See Cochran v. Street, 1 Wash. [Va.] 103; Moffet v. Bowman, 6 Grat. 219; Price v. Warren, 1 Hen. & M. 385; Shobe v. Bell, 1 Rand. [Va.] 39; Harwell v. Bennett, Id. 282; Harnsbarger v. Kinney, 6 Grat. 287.

2. As to the competency of the accused for each other. Section 21, p. 752, Code Va., gives no rule in this court. [Wayman v. Southard] 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 49; U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480; U. S. v. Shive [Case No. 16,278]; U. S. v. Wilson [Id. 16,730]; U. S. v. Insurgents [Id. 15,443]; 2 Burr, Tr. 481; Chase, Tr. 165, Append. 34. The thirty-fourth section, Gord. Dig. p. 334, adopts only rules of property. [Swift v. Tyson] 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 1. See McNiel v. Holbrook, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 84. If it adopts rules of evidence in criminal cases, then there will be no uniformity, and a man accused of piracy would be acquitted in one state and convicted in another. But if section 21, p. 752, Code Va., gives the rule here, still I insist it has not altered the common law which excludes accomplices for each other. This section only applies to witnesses in support of the prosecution. 1 Rev. Code, 581, 582; Acts 1847–48, p 124; Rep. Revisors, 987. The construction of this act insisted on for the prisoner would deprive this court of its discretionary power as to granting separate trials to parties jointly indicted. See U. S. v. Marchant, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 480.

4. As to the facts said to be proved by the jurors. They are no ground of new trial. Thomas' Case, 2 Va. Cas. 479; McCarter's Case, 11 Leigh, 633; 12 Pick. 496; 1 Hill. 207; 6 Leigh, 1; U. S. v. Gibert [Case No. 15,204]; Trial per pais, 218, 223, 225, 229; Grah. New Trials, 47; Rex v. Woolf, 1 Chit. 401.

Scott replied, commenting upon the authorities cited by Joynes, and citing Grah. New Trials, 109, 161; 5 Pick.; Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. 712. If the state law does not give the rule of evidence, a negro would be competent in the Southern states to testify against a white man in the United States courts!

THE COURT heard the statements of such of the jurors as were willing to make them, as to the reading of the Dispatch and its effect upon their minds.

Monday, May 19th.

TANEY, Chief Justice. Judge HALLYBURTON and myself differ as to two points arising upon this motion. (2) He thinks Reid's testimony admissible upon a proper construction and application of section 21, c. 199, Code Va. I should concur with him if I regarded this a mere question of evidence, but I think it goes deeper, and affects the discretionary power of this court as to granting several trials upon joint indictments. This rests in the sound discretion of the United States courts, but if this act of Virginia applies as contended for the prisoner would have a right to insist upon separate trials. I think, therefore, the act does not apply. (2) Judge HALLYBURTON also thinks a new trial ought to be granted on the statements of the jurors. I do not think affidavits of jurors ought to be received to impeach their own verdict, but even if received the statements of the jurors in this case seem to me no ground for a new trial. Upon a certificate of this division of opinion between Judge HALLYBURTON and myself the question in these cases will go to the supreme court of the United States for decision.

Circuit Court E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1827.

LARCENY — STEALING BY SERVANT — EVIDENCE — EMBEZZLEMENT.

1. Indictment against a person employed as a servant of the Bank of the United States, for stealing notes, the property of the bank. What evidence is necessary to convict the defendant.

2. The taking by the defendant of an article delivered to him, as a servant, to remove from one room to another, and converting the same to his own use, is larceny, and not embezzlement.

[Cited in Com. v. Berry, 99 Mass. 430.]

The defendant was tried upon two indictments; one for stealing bank notes from the Bank of the United States, and the other for embezzling bank notes, the property of that bank. All the counts in the first indictment charge that the defendant was, at the time the offence was said to have been committed, a person employed as a servant in the Bank of the United States. The offence stated in the first count is, that, on a certain day, he did feloniously steal from the said bank two notes of Stephen Girard for $1,000 each, being the property of the said bank. The other counts state the notes according to their tenor. The evidence is stated in the charge.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The defendant is charged in the indictment with a felonious stealing of two notes of Stephen Girard for $1,000 each, from the Bank of the United States, being the property of that bank, and also for stealing from the said bank, two notes of the said Girard for $1,000 each, the precise tenor of which notes is stated. To warrant a conviction of the defendant on that indictment, it must have been proved to your satisfaction that the notes described in these counts, or in some of them, were stolen by the defendant, he being, at the time, a person employed as a servant in the Bank of the United States.

The evidence is, that the defendant was employed by the Bank of the United States as captain of the watch, and porter. That the tellers of that bank were in the habit of always sending the defendant in the morning into the vaults to bring to them the notes of other banks which had been labelled and deposited there the preceding evening. That on the morning of the 11th of May last, these notes were brought out as usual, and, upon counting them, two notes of Stephen Girard for $1,000 each, Nos. 353 and 354, were missing. Payment of them was immediately stopped at all the banks in the city. In the course of that day, one of these notes was presented at the Commercial Bank to be exchanged, but was refused. This note, Mr. Sylvester has proved he received from the defendant, and that he delivered it to Freeman, a notary, to take to Mr. Girard's bank to demand payment of it there. The loss of the two notes at the Bank of the United States, being known at Mr. Girard's bank, the cashier of this latter bank retained possession of the note, and returned it to the Bank of the United States. The identity of the note, No. 353, presented by Freeman to Mr. Girard's bank for payment and retained, is fully established by the cashier of that bank.

The defendant having been called upon by the assistant cashier and the president of the Bank of the United States, to account for his conduct, denied that he had stolen the notes, but acknowledged that he found them under the counter of the bank, and that he took them, believing that if he did not do so they would be swept out and lost. When this confession was made, the notes were not shown to the defendant, nor were they in fact in the immediate possession of the bank. They were always spoken of to the defendant as "those notes," or "that money."

It is for the jury then to say, upon this evidence, whether the note, No. 353, the tenor of which is described in one of the counts, is sufficiently identified by the testimony of Sylvester and the cashier of Girard's bank, in connection with the other evidence of the defendant's general confession that he had taken two notes which he found under the counter of the bank. If this be not proved, yet, if they are satisfied that the defendant feloniously stole a note signed by Stephen Girard for $1,000, the property of the bank, that will be sufficient under the general count in the indictment.

[1] [Originally published from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

If the jury are satisfied that the confession of the defendant applies to either of the notes so described, it is sufficient to convict him; because, whether he found the notes under the counter in the bank, or on the counter, if he converted them to his own use, it was a felonious stealing of the property of the bank, within the words and meaning of the sixteenth section of the crimes act of the 3d of March, 1825 [4 Stat. 118].

As to the indictment for embezzling, there is no evidence on which the defendant can be convicted. These bank notes were not entrusted to the defendant to keep, but merely to convey from one part of the banking house to another, to those persons to whom the custody of them was confided. 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 918. If the jury so understand the evidence, they ought to find the defendant not guilty on that indictment.

Verdict, guilty on the indictment for stealing, and not guilty on the other indictment.

UNITED STATES v. COBB.

[4 Am. Law J. (N. S.) 145; 8 Leg. Int. 150.]

District Court, N. D. New York. Oct. 20, 1857.

CRIMINAL LAW—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—EVIDENCE—RESISTING FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

[1. On preliminary examination, prima facie evidence of guilt is sufficient to hold to bail, until the offence may be examined by a grand jury.]

[2. Where a fugitive slave is arrested and lawfully restrained of his liberty under the provisions of the act of Sept. 18, 1850, all interference by third parties by word or act, for the purpose of favoring his escape, and tending to that result, is a violation of the act, rendering the offender amenable to its penalties.]

[This was an indictment against Ira H. Cobb, Moses Summers, James Davis, Stephen Porter, William L. Salmon, Harrison Allen, William Thompson, and Prince Jackson, for aiding in the escape of a fugitive from labor.]

CONKLING, District Judge. The specific charge on which the prisoners have severally been arrested and brought before me for examination, is that of having unlawfully aided in the escape of an alleged fugitive from labor, after he had been apprehended, and while he was yet in custody, in virtue of a warrant issued in a proceeding for his restoration to the person, a citizen of Missouri, to whom it was alleged his labor was due. In proceeding, now, as it is my duty to do, to decide upon the legal effect of the evidence before me, it is proper to premise that there is no testimony tending to fix upon the defendants the guilt of any higher offence than that just named. This, indeed, I understand to be tacitly conceded by the attorney for the United States. There is no evidence of previous combination and arming for the purpose of "levying war against the United States;" nor does it appear that the defendants and their associates had any object in view beyond that of defeating the execution of the law in a particular instance. These are therefore to be considered and treated as cases arising under the seventh section of the act of September 18, 1850 (chapter 60) entitled "An act to amend, and supplementary to, the act entitled 'An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters,' approved February twelfth, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three." The section referred to is in the following words: "And be it further enacted, that any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct, hinder or prevent such claimant, his agent or attorney, or any person or persons lawfully assisting him, her, or them, from arresting such fugitives from service or labor, either with or without process as aforesaid, or shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, such fugitive from service or labor from the custody of such claimant, his or her agent or attorney, or other person or persons lawfully assisting as aforesaid, when so arrested, pursuant to the authority herein given and declared; or shall aid, abet, or assist such person so owing service or labor as aforesaid, directly or indirectly to escape from such claimant, his agent or attorney, or other person or persons legally authorized as aforesaid; or shall harbor or conceal such fugitive, so as to prevent the discovery and arrest of such person, after notice or knowledge of the fact that such person was a fugitive from service or labor as aforesaid, shall, for either of said offences, be subject to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding six months, by indictment and conviction before the district court of the United States for the district in which such offence may have been committed, or before the proper court of criminal jurisdiction, if committed within any one of the organized territories of the United States; and shall moreover forfeit and pay, by way of civil damages to the party injured by such illegal conduct, the sum of one thousand dollars for each fugitive so lost as aforesaid, to be recovered by action of debt, in any of the district or territorial courts aforesaid, within whose jurisdiction the said offence may have been committed."

The accusation is that the defendants, in direct contravention of the act, did, on the first of October instant, at the city of Syracuse, "aid, abet, or assist" the fugitive to escape from the custody of Mr. Allen, the deputy marshal, by whom he had been apprehended. The defendants are not now on trial for the purpose of ultimately determining whether they are to be subjected to punishment. This is but a preliminary inquiry to ascertain whether they ought to be held to bail, or in default thereof to be committed to prison, for the purpose of securing their presence at the next stated session of the district court, to answer further in the event of their being indicted by a grand jury; and it is a settled principle of law that for this purpose, prima facie evidence of guilt is sufficient. At the close of the examination on Saturday afternoon, although I then saw no ground for serious doubt concerning my duty in the premises with respect to either of the defendants, I deemed it proper nevertheless to hold the case under advisement until this morning. A careful consideration of the evidence has confirmed my original impression of its entire sufficiency to establish the guilt of each of the defendants for the purposes at least of this inquiry. Indeed, with the exception, at most, of Stephen Porter, their culpability appears to be placed beyond a reasonable doubt. The only witness against him is Page Newton, an intelligent and apparently honest and trustworthy man, of whose evidence it can at most only be said that the cry which it imputes to Porter, may possibly have been uttered by another; while on the other hand it appears very highly probable, from Porter's previous language and conduct, not only that the witness is not mistaken in this particular, but that Porter's interference was not limited to a single cry designed to urge on the more active assailants.

The proceedings on the part both of the commissioner and of the deputy marshal, appear to have been entirely regular. The fugitive was therefore lawfully restrained of his liberty by due process of law, and all interference by third persons, by act or words, for the purpose of favoring his escape, and tending to that result, is a violation of the act rendering the offender amenable to its penalties. The interposition of the defendants and their numerous coadjutors who have not been identified, was direct, palpable and unequivocal; its motive, if not in every instance openly avowed, was too obvious to admit of doubt; it was adapted to the unlawful end in view, and terminated in its accomplishment. My duty towards the defendants is therefore plain and imperative. They must severally be required to give bail for their appearance at the next term of the court to be held at Buffalo, on the second Tuesday of November, or, for want of sufficient bail, be committed to prison.

It is unnecessary to say more, and under ordinary circumstances, it might be impertinent to do so; and yet I would fain avail myself of the occasion, further to discourage, so far as my voice may be potential for this purpose, the repetition, in this district, at least, of the disgraceful scenes of lawless violence and outrage described by the witnesses in these cases. They must have been the fruit either of gross delusion or of wanton contempt of law and social order. For the purpose of effecting the liberation of a person from custody under process issued and executed in conformity with express and well known provisions of the constitution and laws of the United States, a building in the midst of a populous city was partially demolished, and deadly weapons were recklessly used, to the imminent jeopardy of human life, and to the grievous injury of several persons. The least reprehensible motive by which the aggressors can be supposed to have been animated, is the belief on their part that slavery is unjust and immoral; and that the laws by which it is upheld, may therefore be rightfully resisted by force. It must be the hope of all good men that the time may eventually come, when injustice and oppression in every form, including human slavery, if such be its character, will have been banished from the earth. But these wrongs exist, and are likely to endure, in other forms besides that of slavery; and if we have nothing better than lawless violence to rely upon for their removal, they will never cease. It is to advancing civilization alone that we can look for their gradual extinction. Wise men understand this, and shape their course accordingly. Bigots and fanatics are too blind to see it, or too impatient to heed it; and in their headlong zeal to redress particular wrongs, 'real ,or fancied, regardless of all other consequences, they commit other wrongs more aggravated and intolerable. Such is the grave error into which these defendants have fallen. Regardless of their civil and social duties, they have broken the public peace, set the law at open defiance, and with deadly weapons assaulted and wounded its officers while executing its mandates. In thus insulting the majesty of the law, did they expect to escape its vengeance? If so, their folly was equalled only by their criminality. What is the law in this country, but the declared will of the majority, to which, when thus expressed, all are bound, by a fundamental principle of the government, to submit, and which all its ministers are sworn to enforce. It often happens that laws are enacted contrary to the judgments, and sometimes to the moral sense of thousands of our citizens; and this must unavoidably continue to be the case. But no sane man imagines that he is therefore absolved from the obligation to obey them; still less that he has a right forcibly to prevent others from doing so. If he cannot submit to them consistently with the dictates of his conscience, he may seek a residence in some other country, if he can find one where he thinks he would suffer less from misrule; but so long as he continues to be an inhabitant of the United States, he must submit to the laws or pay the penalty of his disobedience. When this ceases to be true; when every man may transgress a law with impunity because he dislikes it, our government will have become a vain mockery, not worth preserving, for it will have ceased to afford protection to the rights either of property or of life.

The act in question has unhappily been fruitful of bigotry and fanaticism; and it is due to candor and truth to add, that it seems to have bewildered the judgments and consciences of others besides the class of citizens to which the defendants belong. I am happy to be ignorant of the existence in this part of the state of New York of any of those persons—few I trust in number, anywhere—to whom I allude. The manly spirit and love of fair play, prevalent here, are an effectual antidote to the unhappy delusions under which these persons seem to labor. I doubt, also, whether they are to be met with in the states where slavery is tolerated; for I have always understood that our Southern brethren, whatever may be their faults in other respects, are likewise distinguished for the virtues I have mentioned. Judging from the language of these enthusiasts, more blind than amiable, on a recent occasion, one would be led to conclude that they suppose it to be the bounden duty of those who are charged with the execution of the fugitive slave act, as often as their powers are evoked for the restoration of an alleged fugitive from labor, to take care that he shall at all events be delivered to the claimant; and to that end, to take care also, so to interpret the law, as, at all events, to ensure this result. It may not be amiss to remind these well meaning people that the law, in the application of its provisions, is no respector of persons, and that judges are bound to administer it as they find it, intelligently, firmly and impartially. The day, I trust, is far distant when the rights vouchsafed by law even to a fugitive slave, will be less secure under the guardianship of American judges than of his master.

Case No. 14,821.

UNITED STATES v. COCHRAN et al.

[2 Brock. 274.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. North Carolina. Spring Term, 1825.

UNITED STATES—PRIORITY—DEBT DUE FROM REVENUE OFFICER—APPROPRIATION—SURETIES ON BOND—PAYMENT.

1. An act of congress—Act March 3, 1797, § 5 [1 Stat. 515]—declares, that where a revenue officer, indebted to the United States, shall become insolvent, the debt due to the United States shall first be satisfied, and that this priority shall extend to cases where a debtor, not having a sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall make a voluntary assignment thereof. Held, that although this act gives to a debt due to the United States a priority over debts due to individuals, it does not give to one part of a debt due to the United States a priority over any other part of it; nor does it vest the property absolutely in the United States, though it gives them a right to pursue it for the purpose of appropriating it in payment; nor does it affect the right of the debtor to apply a payment of money in his hands to either a bond debt, or a debt due by open account by him to the United States.

[Distinguished in Leggett v. Humphreys, 21 How. (62 U. S.) 77.]

2. Therefore, where a collector of the revenue at a port, had given bond with sureties in the penalty of $10,000, for the faithful discharge of his official duties, and being largely indebted to the United States, had made a deed of his property for their benefit, but previously thereto, had transferred $10,000 to his sureties, and directed them to apply that money to their exoneration, and the sureties accordingly did so apply it, by paying it into the treasury, and receiving from the treasury their obligation, without any knowledge at the treasury that the money so paid had been transferred by the collector himself to his sureties; it was adjudged that by applying that payment to the extinguishment of the bond, the sureties were discharged.

An information was filed in the circuit court of the United States for the district of North Carolina, against Robert Cochran, late collector for the port of Wilmington in that state, and J. E. and J. W., his sureties, to recover from the sureties the sum of $10,000, that being the penalty of Cochran's official bond. The information charged, that the said Cochran being largely indebted to the United States beyond his ability to pay, viz., in the sum of $145,361, two several suits were instituted, the one against Cochran, the principal, and the other against his sureties, and that judgments had theretofore been obtained against each in the circuit court of the United States for the district of North Carolina; that the judgment against the sureties (for $10,000) had been satisfied by them, but the execution sued out on Cochran's judgment had proved unproductive; that Robert Cochran, intending to defraud the United States, &c., on the 25th of September, 1820, conveyed by deed of that date, to W. W. J. and J. W., (the latter of whom was one of his sureties) all or nearly all of his visible property in trust, for the benefit of the United States, but that nevertheless the said Cochran was possessed of a large sum of money, which he placed in the hands of J. W., one of his sureties, or others, upon a secret trust, out of which the judgment against the sureties was satisfied. The information charged, that the original liability, by reason of the defalcation of their principal, was unimpaired by the payment by them of $10,000 out of the funds of Robert Cochran, and prayed for relief, &c.

The answers of Cochran and his two sureties disclosed, inter alia, the following state of facts, viz.: That on the 18th of August, 1820, in order to indemnify his sureties, Cochran had put up, in bills of North Carolina banks, the sum of $10,000, in two separate packages of $5,000 each, sealed up and addressed to the sureties respectively, which were placed in a trunk, and the trunk was deposited in the bank of Cape Fear, at Fayetteville, of which bank J. W., the surety, was cashier. Cochran, in his answer, insisted that he was thus divested of all right and title to the said money, though he admitted that he did not inform his sureties of the said transfer, believing it to be complete without any such communication. He farther answered, that he did not, at the time of making the transfer, contemplate the execution of the deed of the 25th of September, 1820, referred to in the information, or committing any other act of legal bankruptcy, by absconding or otherwise, but that the appropriation of the $10,000 and the subsequent execution of the deed, were totally distinct transactions in fact and in design: That a few days after the transfer of the money, he went to Wilmington in the execution of the duties of his office as collector, and having there received official notice of his reappointment, by which he was required to renew his bond in the sum of $30,000, in pursuance of the act of congress, and being resolved not to involve his friends by giving a new bond, the propriety of making an assignment of his property then first occurred to him, and without the counsel or knowledge of any person whatever, he executed the deed on the day of its date, at Wilmington. That he carried the deed with him to Fayetteville early in October, 1820, and deposited it in the trunk in the bank of Cape Fear, containing the package of money: That having determined to retire from office, and under the influence of feelings too poignant to endure the shock among his friends, which would be produced by the publication of his default, he determined to go to the North. From Baltimore he addressed a letter to J. W., one of his sureties, and cashier of the bank of Cape Fear, informing him that he had deposited the two packages of money in the trunk before referred to, and desiring him to deliver to his co-surety, J. E., the package superscribed with his name, and to retain the other. The sureties, in their answer, averred, that this letter was received, and the money applied to the satisfaction of the judgment against them accordingly, and that their bond was thereupon surrendered by the treasury.

MARSHALL, Circuit Justice. In this case Robert Cochran, collector at the port of Wilmington, being very largely indebted to the United States, made a deed of his property for their benefit. Previous to the execution of this deed, he deposited $10,000, the amount of the bond executed to the United States, for the faithful performance of his duty, in a trunk which was placed in the bank, and absconded. From Baltimore he addressed a letter to his sureties, requesting the trunk to be taken out of the bank, and the money to be applied to their exoneration. The money was received at the treasury and the bond given up. It being afterwards discovered that this was the money of the collector and not of the securities, this suit is brought to compel the securities to pay the amount of the bond, considering the money received as constituting no equitable discharge to them.

It is contended on the part of the United States, that the insolvency of Cochran, vested all his property, including this $10,000, in the United States, and that this sum being theirs could not be applied in exoneration of his securities. The act of congress declares, that where any revenue officer, &c., indebted to the United States, shall become insolvent, the debt due to the United States shall be first satisfied, and that this priority shall extend to cases where a debtor not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, shall make a voluntary assignment thereof. Act March 3, 1797, § 5. See 1 Story's Laws, 465 [1 Stat. 515]. This act does not transfer the property itself to the United States, but subjects it to their debt in the first instance. The assignee holds it as the debtor would hold it, liable to the claim of the United States, and if he converts it to his own use, or puts it out of reach of the United States, he is undoubtedly responsible for its value. But the property thus liable to the United States, is liable for the whole debt; for one part of it as much as for the other. It is as applicable to the bond in which the sureties are bound, as to that part of the debt for which the principal alone is responsible. No person will doubt the legal capacity of the United States to apply any sum of $10,000, to the discharge of the bond-debt, leaving the residue unpaid. Such an application of a payment would undoubtedly never be presumed from any equivocal act; but a plain and positive appropriation of a payment to the bond, could not afterwards be set aside. But the power of the debtor to apply his payments, is co-extensive with that of the creditor, and is to be exercised in the first instance. This principle has, it is believed, never been denied. If it be correct, then the power of Mr. Cochran to apply this sum of money in discharge of the bond, and in exoneration of the sureties to it, is co-extensive with that of the United States to make the same application of it. If, then, Mr. Cochran had, without any assignment of his property, paid this money into the treasury, with a direction that it should be applied to the bond, he would have exercised a right which the law gives to every debtor. If the money should be received under this direction, no doubt can be entertained of the obligation to apply the payment as directed. If it should be rejected, it might be tendered in due form, and to suits brought on the bond, and on the open account a tender might be pleaded to the suit on the bond, unless some distinction can be taken between this bond, and the common case of a bond given for part of a debt. The court has reflected on this distinction, and cannot perceive any legal difference between the cases.

Does the transfer of this money to the sureties change the law of the case? We think not. The sureties have paid it into the treasury in discharge of their bond, which has been delivered up. Had this transaction taken place, with the full knowledge of the treasury department that the money had been received by the sureties from Mr. Cochran, no question could have arisen respecting it. Is the payment the less valid because it was made without communicating this circumstance? If the United States have sustained any injury by the concealment, equity will relieve against that injury, and place them in the situation in which they stood before the payment was made. If, with full knowledge of the circumstance, the money might still have been legally applied in discharge of the bond, then, the fact that it was not communicated cannot change the law.

It has been very properly argued, that the act of congress gives to the debt due to the United State priority over debts due to individuals, but not to one part of the debt due to the United States over any other part of it; nor does it vest the property absolutely in the United States, though it gives them a right to pursue it for the purpose of appropriating it in payment. It would seem to follow, that the right to apply payments while the money is in the hands of the debtors, is not affected by the act of congress, but remains as it would stand, independent of that act. If, then, the sureties had declared to the treasury department that the money was received from Mr. Cochran, to be paid in discharge of their bond, and had tendered it in payment thereof, we think the tender would have been valid, and might have been pleaded to a suit on the bond.

We are of opinion, therefore, that this suit must be dismissed as against the sureties.

[Bee, 140.] [1]

District Court, D. South Carolina. May 10, 1799.

DEED—SEAL—WHAT SUFFICIENT.

A mark with ink, acknowledged by the maker of a deed to be his seal is sufficient to create a specialty, though no wax, wafer, or other similar substance be used.

This was an action of debt on a customhouse bond. An exception was taken to the validity of the seal which was in the following form (L. S.) No wax or wafer had been used; but the bond had been duly delivered, and that mark acknowledged by the obligor to be his seal.

It was contended for the defendant [Ebenezer Coffin] that as the ground of action was an obligation declared to be under the hand and seal of the party, and as the profert did not support this, debt would not lie, and the plaintiff ought to be nonsuited. That the action of debt must be founded on a specialty, to create which a seal was necessary. That the court would take as the seal of the party any substance on which an impression might be made; but that none such existed here. That if the reason of the law requiring a seal had ceased, the mode, perhaps, ought also to be done away; but that the power of dispensing with it rested with the legislature, and not with the judges, who must take the law as they find it. 2 Comyn, 635, 637; Esp. 96; Co. Litt. 35–37; Dyer, 13.

ELLSWORTH, Circuit Justice, delivered the opinion of the court that the seal in this form, having been acknowledged by the party to be his, was sufficient.

Objection overruled.

UNITED STATES v. COFFIN.

[1 Sumn. 394.] [1]

Circuit Court. D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1833.

SEAMEN—INDICTMENT FOR MALICIOUSLY FORCING ON SHORE—JUSTIFIABLE CAUSE.

Indictment for maliciously and without justifiable cause forcing a seaman on shore, in a foreign port, against the crimes act of 1825, c. 276, § 10 [3 Story's Laws, 1999; 4 Stat. 115]. "Maliciously," in the statute means wilfully, against a knowledge of duty. "Justifiable cause" does not mean such a cause, as in the mere maritime law might authorize a discharge; but such a cause, as the known policy of the American laws on this subject contemplates, as a case of moral necessity, for the safety of the ship and crew, or the due performance of the voyage.

[Cited in U. S. v. Taylor, Case No. 16,442; Wiggin v. Coffin, Id. 17,624; Re Ah Tie, 13 Fed. 293.]

Indictment [against Thaddeus Coffin] for maliciously, and without justifiable cause, forcing a seaman of the ship Fabius on shore in a foreign port, to wit, at the Sandwich Islands, contrary to the crimes act of 1825, c. 276, § 10 [3 Story's Laws, 1999; 4 Stat. 115]. Plea, general issue, not guilty.

Mr. Dunlap, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Bartlett, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up to the jury, said: In this case, it is admitted, that the ship Fabius is an American ship, and Frederick Daniels was one of her crew, and the steward of the ship on a whaling voyage to the Pacific. It is also admitted, and indeed is proved beyond all controversy, that he (Daniels) was forced ashore by the direct orders and instrumentality of the master, at the port of Mahee, in one of the Sandwich Islands, against his will, and landed on the beach there with his chest, without any means of subsistence, for the purpose of finally separating him from the ship for the voyage. He (Daniels) is by birth a Dane, and (it is said) has been naturalized; but that fact is not proved by the proper record evidence. Under these circumstances, it is contended, in the first place, that by the act of 1813, c. 184 [2 Story's Laws, 1302; 2 Stat. 809, c. 42], foreign seamen cannot be lawfully employed as part of the crew of an American ship; and in the next place, if they can, that the act of 1825, c. 276, § 10 [3 Story's Laws, 1999; 4 Stat. 115], on which the present indictment is founded, applies only to seamen in American ships, who are citizens. My opinion is, that the argument is not well founded in either respect. The act of 1813, c. 184 [2 Story's Laws, 1302; 2 Stat. 809, c. 42], declares, indeed, that after the then war with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ on board of any public or private vessels of the United States any persons, except citizens. But the tenth section of the same act suspends the operation of the act, as to the employment of seamen, who are subjects of any foreign nation, which shall not by special treaty with the United States have prohibited the employment on board of her public or private ships of white citizens of the United States. Denmark has made no such treaty stipulation; and, therefore, the clause, as to subjects of that country at least, remains inoperative.

Then, as to the act of 1825, on which the present indictment is founded, its language is general, and equally applicable to all seamen constituting a part of the crew of an American ship, whether foreigners or natives; and I can perceive no public policy, which would justify the court in construing the words as confined to the latter. So long as foreign seamen are permitted by our laws to be employed on board of American ships, they must be deemed admitted to the protection of those laws; as they are certainly responsible both civilly and criminally for any violation of them. It would be a most extraordinary predicament to hold them liable for the latter, and at the same time to deny them all benefit of the former. No such invidious distinction is at present established in our legislation. The language of the tenth section is: No master, &c., "shall during his being abroad maliciously and without justifiable cause force any officer or mariner of such ship or vessel" (not any American officer or mariner) "on shore, or leave him behind in any foreign port or place, or refuse to bring home again all such of the officers and mariners of such ship or vessel, as he carried out with him, as are in a condition to return, and willing to return, when he is ready to proceed on his homeward voyage," &c. Now, it is plain, that the home here referred to is not the particular home of any seaman, native or foreign; but the home port of the ship for the voyage.

Then, what is to be deemed a "justifiable cause" in the sense of the act? It is argued, that whatever misbehavior would, by the general principles of the maritime law, constitute a sufficient cause to discharge a seaman in a foreign port, is a "justifiable cause" in the sense of the act. But it seems to me, that this is laying down the rule much too broadly. It is not, indeed, every offence committed by a seaman, which will, even by the maritime law, authorize the master to discharge him in a foreign port. It must be some offence of a high and aggravated character; or long and habitual disregard of duty; or other continued misconduct, unrepented of and unchanged. But the laws of the United States, from motives of an enlarged policy, have circumscribed the authority of the master, in cases of discharge, within much more narrow bounds. It is well known, that in former times the government were put to very great expenses for the relief and maintenance of sick, disabled and other seamen, who were discharged, or left abroad by masters of American ships under various pretences, often exceedingly frivolous, and sometimes from a spirit of revenge or passionate excitement. The evil became so extensive, and so burdensome, that by a statute passed in 1803—Act 1803, c. 62, § 1 [1 Story's Laws, 883; 2 Stat. 203, c. 9]—masters of ships on foreign voyages were required to give bonds with security for the due return of all the seamen who were engaged for the voyage; and by a proviso in that statute it was declared, that the bond so given should not be forfeited on account of the master's not producing any of the crew, who might be discharged in a foreign country with the consent of the American consul, or other commercial agent, in writing; nor on account of any of the crew dying, or absconding, or being forcibly impressed into another service. And another section of the act (section 3) provided for cases, when the vessel is sold, or a seaman is discharged with his own consent in a foreign country. Now, looking to the obvious policy of this act, it is impossible not to feel, that congress meant to admit no excuses under the bond, except in extreme cases, where the consul authorized the discharge, or the seaman died, or absconded, or was impressed. The present case does not fall within either of these classes of cases. But I am not prepared to say, that others may not exist, not mentioned in the statute, which yet would constitute a justifiable cause of a discharge. But I think the right to discharge seamen can result only from what may be deemed a moral necessity, analogous to the cases put in the statute. Suppose for instance, a seaman should make a revolt on board of a ship, or endeavour to make such a revolt; and should persist in his misconduct, so that his farther continuance on board would be hazardous to the master and crew, and the objects of the voyage; it seems to me, that it would constitute a good cause for a discharge. So, if a seaman should commit a manslaughter, or assault any of the officers or crew with an intent to kill, or otherwise conduct himself in such a malicious and gross manner as to render his presence on board dangerous to the crew and the safety of the ship; the same result would follow. And I am not prepared to say, that even long continued, obstinate, and malicious disobedience of orders, or neglect of ship's duty, indicating a mutinous disposition, and deliberate intent to subvert the ship's discipline, and the government of the crew, would not equally justify a discharge; although it is not expressly within the purview of the statute. But I think the right arises only under extraordinary emergencies and in extreme cases, where otherwise the safety of the officers or crew, or the due performance of the voyage, or the regular enforcement of the ship's discipline, would be put in jeopardy. The mere convenience of the master would not justify a discharge; much less such offences, as could be ordinarily suppressed by the common punishments administered in the sea service.

But it is not sufficient, that there should be a want of justifiable cause, to bring the case within the statute. The act must be maliciously done. Now, "maliciously," in the sense of the act, is not limited to acts done from hatred, revenge, or passion; but it includes all acts wantonly done, or wilfully done, that is, against what any man of reasonable knowledge and ability must know to be contrary to his duty.[1] Now, every man is presumed to know, what the law ordinarily requires of him in point of duty; and he cannot shelter himself from liability by any pretence of ignorance of that, which, in his station, every man must be presumed to know. Still, if the circumstances are such, that a master of reasonable judgment, acting bona fide, and not from passionate excitement, might fairly deem it his duty to discharge the seaman, he will not be guilty of the offence intended by the act. Every master in a foreign voyage cannot but be presumed to know, what the obligation of the bond given by him, to bring home the crew, who go on the voyage, imports. And he cannot but know, what are the excuses allowed by the act. If he goes beyond them, he acts at his peril, and can justify himself only in a clear case of moral necessity, such as I have stated.

Let us apply these principles to the present case. That the master forced the seaman on shore at the Sandwich Islands is (as I have said) admitted. The onus probandi, then, is on the master to establish, that the act was for a justifiable cause; for in the absence of such cause the law will presume, that he did it maliciously, until the contrary is proved. The defence is here mainly rested on the fact, that after the seaman (who was steward of the ship) was tied up to the rigging, and flogged with a cat-of-nine-tails, he never did any duty, until he was discharged; that is, from June to November, 1831; and that this arose from his wanton obstinacy and malice, and determination not to do duty, and not from inability. The answer on the other side is, that the flogging produced a rupture or hernia in the abdomen; and that the seaman was thus rendered wholly incapable of performing duty, and was really, not pretendedly, an invalid. Which of these statements is true? (Here the judge recapitulated the evidence.) If the jury believe, that the seaman was not injured, as he pretended, by the flogging; but was able to do duty, and obstinately and maliciously refused to do duty, in order to revenge himself, and to destroy the ship's discipline, and to incite others of the crew to disobedience, then the defendant ought to be acquitted. If he was in fact disabled; and the master by reasonable inquiries might have ascertained it; and he chose to act upon his feelings of disgust with the seaman; or rashly upon his own suspicion; then it seems to me, that he ought to be found guilty.

Verdict guilty. Judgment accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. COGSWELL.

[3 Sumn. 204.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. New Hampshire. May Term. 1838.

MARSHAL—ACCOUNT—FEES—TRAVEL—INTEREST—RENT.

1. In an account of the marshal for the district of New Hampshire against the United States, an item of two dollars was allowed for the service of each venire on the town clerks; also, an item for rent paid for an office, for the clerk of the courts of the United States; with interest on both these items. The court disallowed certain items, being the expenses incurred by the marshal, for the purpose of establishing and settling his accounts with the government; also, a charge for constructive travel and attendance at the monthly rules, held in the clerk's office.

2. Quære, how it would be, where the marshal actually travelled and attended at the rules.

Debt on the official bond of the defendant, Pearson Cogswell, late marshal of New Hampshire. The defendant prayed oyer of the condition of the bond, which latter was as follows:—"The condition of the above-written obligation is such, that, whereas the above-bounden Pearson Cogswell is appointed marshal of the United States, within and for the district of New Hampshire, for the term of four years, from and after the fifteenth day of March, eighteen hundred and thirty-two. Now if the said Cogswell shall well and truly, faithfully and impartially, execute the duties of the said office, so that the United States, or any person, shall not come to any damage on account of the proceedings of the said Cogswell, in his said official capacity, as marshal, then the above-written obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force." The defendant then pleaded, that he ought not to be charged, &c., because, he says, "That at the time of the commencement of this action, there was due and owing, from the said Cogswell, to the plaintiff, by virtue of said writing obligatory, according to the decision of the accounting officers of the treasury of the United States, aforesaid, the sum of five hundred sixty dollars and fifty-seven cents, and no more, and that the said United States, at the commencement of this action, was and still is indebted to the said Cogswell, in a much larger sum of money, than the money so due and owing from the said Cogswell, to the said United States, by virtue of the said writing obligatory, and the condition thereof, to wit, in the sum of four thousand one hundred forty-eight dollars twenty cents, for services done and performed by him, the said Cogswell, in his said office of marshal as aforesaid, to and for the said United States, and for moneys paid, laid out and expended by him, the said Cogswell, to and for the said United States, by the request, order and direction of the said United States, or the proper officers thereof, to wit, at Portsmouth aforesaid, on the day last aforesaid, out of which said sum of four thousand one hundred forty-eight dollars and twenty cents, the said Cogswell is ready and willing, and hereby offers to set off and allow to the plaintiff, so much money as will be sufficient to satisfy all the money due by virtue of the said writing obligatory, and condition, and all damages sustained by occasion of detaining the same." To this plea, the United States by their attorney, replied, that they ought not to be precluded from having and maintaining their action against the said Cogswell, because they were not nor are indebted to the said Cogswell, in manner and form as he hath alleged. And upon this replication, issue was joined.

At the trial, the only questions which arose were upon the set-off claimed by the defendant, a particular account of the items whereof was filed in the cause, and was laid before the jury. (1) One item was for the service of sundry venires on the town clerks of the several towns, from which the marshal (the defendant) was, by the grand venires (so called) directed to him by the circuit court, from time to time required to cause the grand and petit jurymen to be drawn from the jury-boxes of those towns, to attend the circuit courts. (2) Another item was for the travel and attendance of the defendant, as marshal, at the monthly rules, held in the clerk's office. (3) Another was the payment of office rent, for the use of an office for the clerk of the district and circuit court. (4) Another item was for the expenses of certain copies of papers from the clerk's office, as vouchers, to enable the defendant to settle his accounts at the treasury in Washington. (5) Another item was his, the defendant's, expenses to Washington, to settle his accounts at the treasury. On all these items the defendant claimed interest, from the time when they respectively became due. All these claims were presented to, and rejected by, the treasury department.

Mr. Hale, U. S. Dist. Atty.
E. Cutts, for defendant.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The first item depends upon the construction of the first section of the act of 1799, c. 125, § 1 [1 Story's Laws, 569; 1 Stat. 624, c. 19], by which it is provided, that the compensation of the marshals of the districts of the United States shall (among other things) be, "for summoning each grand and other jury, four dollars; provided, that in no case shall the fees for summoning jurors to any one court exceed fifty dollars; and in those states where jurors, by the laws of the state, are drawn by constables, or other officers of corporate towns or places, by lot, the marshal shall receive, for the use of the officers, employed in summoning the jurors, and returning the venire, the sum of two dollars, and for his own trouble, in distributing the venire, two dollars." Now, the latter part of this proviso, applies directly to the mode of drawing jurors in the district of New Hampshire, according to the state laws, which have been adopted by the act of congress, of May 13, 1800, c. 61 [1 Story's Laws, 792; 2 Stat. 82]. By the state laws, jurors are to be drawn from the jury boxes of the town by lot, at a meeting to be called for that purpose, in the presence of the official functionaries of the town. The respective venires for jurors from each town, are to be served on the town clerk. And by the practice of the courts of the United States, a grand or general venire, is addressed to the marshal, to serve the proper subordinate venires on the respective clerks of the towns. The item, now claimed by the defendant, and controverted by the United States, is for the service of these venires on the town clerks. Upon this statement, it seems difficult to find any real ground for controversy. The statute seems to us to provide directly for the very case; and, therefore, we are of opinion, that the claim ought to be allowed.

The next item, is for rent paid for an office for the clerk of the courts of the United States. This seems to us, a just charge against the United States, as an incidental expenditure, connected with the holding of the courts of the United States, and the due administration of justice.

The next item, is for travel and attendance at the monthly rules, held in the clerk's office, under the rules of the supreme court of the United States, passed at February term, 1822. It is admitted, that the defendant, as marshal, did not, in fact, either travel to, or attend these rules at the clerk's office; and, therefore, his claim is for a constructive right, or a constructive travel and attendance, at the rules. But we are of opinion, that this charge, whatever might be its validity, if the marshal had actually travelled and attended at these rules is, under the circumstances, wholly inadmissible. To justify the charge, an actual travel and attendance are, in our judgment, indispensable.

The remaining items require no commentary. They are the mere personal expenses of the marshal, incurred by him for the purpose of establishing and settling his accounts against the government. They may, for aught we know, constitute a very sound claim upon the abstract justice and equity of the government, but they are not such as can be taken notice of, or enforced, by courts of justice.

Of course, upon these items, which are allowed by the court, the defendant has a fair title to interest. This, indeed, is not objected to on the part of the government.

Upon this intimation of the opinion of the court, a verdict was taken for the defendant, subject to the final audit of the account, upon a reference to the clerk of the court, as an auditor.

INTERNAL REVENUE—VIOLATION OF LAWS—FRAUDULENT CIGAR RETURNS.

Solomon Cohn was charged with having made false returns of cigars made by him in August, 1866, under the law as it then stood. His return was 50,000 a month, at $12 per thousand. The government proved by the entries in his books, which they had seized, that he had sold one man more than 150,000, and that none of his sales were for less than $20 per thousand. Parties who bought of him were also called, and testified to the same rate of sales, and produced his bills. It was further proved that Cohn had had a quarrel with his wife, and that he had said that he did not dare to leave his books at home for fear his wife would get them. The defense claimed that it was not necessary under the law to include in the return sales of cigars bought by Cohn, but only sales of such as he manufactured. They did not, however, prove that these were sales of cigars that he had bought, and THE COURT (BENEDICT, District Judge) held that return of such sales must be made as the law then stood.

The jury found a verdict of guilty.

[1 Car. Law. Repos. 346.]

District Court, D. New York. August, 1812.

SUMMONING OF JURY—DUTIES OF MARSHAL.

[A challenge to the array is properly sustained when it appears that the marshal summoned the jury without any designation by the court of the part of the district from which they were to be summoned, and not according to the mode of forming juries to serve in the highest court of law in the state.]

It has been the practice of the marshal of this district to select the jury, both as to the individuals who were to serve on it and the part of the district from which they were to come, at his own pleasure. In other words, it was completely in the power of the marshal to return at any time just such a jury as would answer the purposes of government, or of any of the officers of government having an interest in the cause to be tried. This power in the hands of a marshal disposed to use it for improper purposes is so manifestly dangerous to public liberty and private security that congress actually legislated on the subject, and directed that juries should be returned from such part of the district as the court should direct, so as should be most favorable to an impartial trial, and to avoid unnecessary expense, or unduly burthening the citizens of any part of the district with such services; and that they should be designated in each district respectively, according to the mode of forming juries to serve in the highest courts of law therein, so far as such mode should be practicable. Notwithstanding these plain and positive directions of the act of congress, the marshal has for years persevered in summoning such jurors as he at his pleasure thought fit, and from such parts of the district as suited his own views of propriety or convenience.

In the causes of the United States against Mr. Coit, for an alleged breach of some bonds executed by him as surety, during the first embargo, and which were noticed for trial at the above court, the counsel for the defendant, upon the district attorney's moving to bring on one of the causes, filed a challenge to the array, because the marshal had summoned the jury of his own mere arbitrary will and pleasure, without any designation by the court of the part of the district from which they were to be summoned, and because the jury had not been summoned according to the mode of forming juries to serve in the highest court of law in this state, altho' it was practicable so to have summoned them. To this challenge the district attorney demurred, and the defendant's counsel joined in demurrer.

Sandford, Dist. Atty., D. B. Ogden, and Baldwin, for the United States.

Messrs. Brinckerhoff, Wells, Colden, Hoffman, and Emmett, for defendant.

The question was very fully argued by the counsel on both sides; and VAN NESS, District Judge, having taken time to consider of it, delivered his opinion in favor of the challenge, upon both points. The array was accordingly quashed and the jury discharged. The judge had reduced his opinion to writing. It was very ably drawn up, and the subject examined and discussed with remarkable clearness, precision and force. He shewed, not only from the acts of congress particularly applicable to this subject, but from a view of the whole judiciary system of the United States, that it was the intention of congress to conform the proceedings of the United States courts as nearly as possible to those of individual states respectively. By this decision, the valuable right of an impartial trial by jury, than which none is of more vital importance to the administration of justice, is secured to the citizens of this state in the district court, whose rights are no longer left to depend upon the will of an individual, but on the due execution of those laws, which, calculated to guard against abuse and oppression, have provided in our state courts for the selection of juries by ballot from all those who are qualified to serve.

It is proper here to add, in order to avoid mistake, that the counsel for the defendant did not impute to the marshal any improper conduct or design in summoning the jury in question, nor did the challenge involve any objections to the individuals composing the jury: It proceeded wholly upon the ground that the mode by which the jury had been summoned and returned was wrong in principle, and that the practice which had hitherto prevailed, was in violation of express and positive laws, whose strict observance was a matter in which even the humblest individual in the community had a deep interest.

Case No. 14,830.

UNITED STATES v. COLBY.

[1 Spr. 119;[1] 8 Law Rep. 496.]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Nov., 1845.

SEAMEN — ASSAULT UPON BY MASTER — USE OF DEADLY WEAPON—WHEN JUSTIFIABLE.

1. The master of a ship, at sea, is justified in using a deadly weapon, to reduce a seaman to obedience, only in cases of necessity.

2. The circumstances of each case must determine whether such necessity exists.

3. Among these are, the situation of the ship, and the manifestation of a friendly or hostile disposition, on the part of the crew.

4. If the circumstances are such as to induce a master of ordinary firmness and discretion, in the exercise of an honest judgment, to believe the danger to be imminent, and to require the use of a dangerous weapon, to reduce to obedience a seaman in open mutiny, with deadly weapons in his hand, and therewith threatening the lives of the officers, and the master should make use of a deadly weapon from good motives, he will be justified in so doing, although subsequent events make it appear that less severe and dangerous measures might have answered the purpose.

Indictment for an assault with a pistol, upon one Fuller, a seaman. The evidence was somewhat contradictory, but the main facts appeared to be as follows;—Upon a late voyage of the ship, under the command of the defendant, Fuller, a seaman, was engaged in mending a sail, under the direction of the captain, on the quarter deck, when Fuller made some reply to Captain Colby, which the latter deemed insolent, and thereupon reminded Fuller that he must give him no insolent answers. Fuller replied, "I give you no more insolence than you give me." The captain struck Fuller with his hand Fuller immediately seized his sheath knife, which lay by his side, and threatened to stab the captain; the latter thereupon called to his mate to secure the man. The first and second mate came to the assistance of the captain, and were met by Fuller, who made two dangerous passes at each with his knife, threatening to run them through, if they approached him. The defendant ordered his mate to knock Fuller down with a capstan bar, if he could not otherwise disarm him. Fuller thereupon retreated to the forward part of the ship, and seizing the cook's axe, placed himself underneath a boat, which was raised, upside down, and supported athwart ships, about seven feet from him, and swore he would cut down the first man that came near him. There was evidence tending to show that some of the crew were inclined to render assistance to Fuller. Fuller was repeatedly ordered by the captain and officers to put down his axe and knife, and go to his duty, but refused with an oath. The officers all testified that, from his appearance and manner, they were afraid to approach him, or attempt to disarm him; that, in their opinion, it would have been dangerous for any one so to do. The captain then went to the cabin, loaded his pistol with shot, came forward where Fuller was, and twice or three times ordered him to lay down his axe and go to his duty, or he, the captain, would fire upon him. This, each time, Fuller, with an oath, refused to do. The captain thereupon fired, and the shot took effect in the face and head of Fuller, by which he lost one eye, and the other, at the time of the trial, was much affected. It appeared, also, that the man at the wheel left his station, and that the ship, during the affray, caught aback. The case was submitted to the jury without argument.

R. Rantoul, Jr., U. S. Dist. Atty.

G. T. Bigelow and M. S. Clarke, for defendant.

SPRAGUE, District Judge (charging jury) The law, gives to a captain of a ship, at sea, a power entirely unknown on land, out of the military service and places him in a situation, in respect to those under his control, quite different from that of a master towards his servant or apprentice, or that of an employer towards those employed by him. This authority is conferred for the preservation of the lives and property committed to his care, and is often as essential to the safety of the crew, as of the officers and ship. Hence the law has ever required of the seaman prompt and respectful obedience to all lawful orders of the captain. Even though the captain be in the wrong, or gives his orders in a harsh and insolent manner, or punishes without sufficient cause, still the seaman, while at sea, must submit to the wrong, and wait for redress till his return to port, rather than resort to violence, unless the wrong threatened to be done will work an irreparable injury. A seaman is not bound to submit to a permanent injury, for which no adequate redress can be given, such as the loss of a limb, an eye, or any enormous bodily harm, before resisting his superior officer; for the courts cannot afford complete redress for such wrongs. If the wrong threatened or done is such that it can wait for redress, the seaman is bound to wait, and will not be excused in forcible resistance to official authority For the use of this unusual power, the captain is amenable to the law; and for all abuse of it, whereby a seaman suffers, a remedy is provided upon his return to his country. In the case at bar, a dangerous weapon was used by the captain, whereby a lasting injury was done to a seaman. And the rule of law is, that no officer is authorized to use such a weapon, unless in case of necessity. This alone will be a justification. In the present case, the defence is distinctly placed on that ground. It is obvious, that the circumstances of each case must determine the question of necessity. The captain must not use a deadly weapon from anger, from pride of authority, or from passion, nor upon any occasion, when the circumstances are such that he can safely wait for the passion of the seaman to subside, and reason to resume its control, so that he may be able to induce, or compel, the mutinous person to return to his duty, by the use of milder means. It must be remembered, however, that the captain is to judge of his duty at once, with no time to wait and nicely weigh probabilities, and oftentimes with no time at all for deliberation or counsel. He cannot stop to inquire into suspicious circumstances, nor can he, at all times, be confident of the obedient dispositions of his men. The officers are generally the weaker party, and hence it becomes necessary for the captain to quell a mutinous disposition, before it has spread so far, as to be beyond his control. Hence the rule of law is, that if the captain, acting as a man of ordinary firmness, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and judging honestly from the circumstances, as they appeared to him at the time, did sincerely believe that the danger was imminent, and did require the use of a dangerous weapon to reduce to obedience a seaman actually in mutiny, and made use of such a weapon from honest motives, then he is justified in so doing, although subsequent events should make it appear, that less severe and dangerous measures might, perhaps, have accomplished the purpose. In such cases it becomes important to inquire, what was the situation of the ship, and what were the indications on the part of the crew If the captain saw his men hastening to the assistance of his officers, and manifesting a disposition to reduce the mutinous person to obedience, it would be a circumstance to show, that the use of a deadly weapon might not be required. If the crew left their stations, without openly manifesting such a disposition, even though they made no attempt to assist or encourage the mutinous person, still the captain might honestly regard that as a suspicious circumstance; because a seaman, in time of difficulty between the officers and any of the men, ought not to leave his station unbidden, unless he intends to render active assistance to the officers. In the case at bar, several of the men left their stations, and hurried towards the scene. And though they might have done so from honest motives, still the captain, at that moment, had the right to judge, from appearances, whether or not they came with hostile designs. A very important circumstance was, that the man at the wheel left his station, and the ship caught aback, and lay at the mercy of the waves. One other man, also, openly encouraged the mutineer, who was resisting the authority of the officers, armed with a dangerous weapon. There was some evidence tending to show, that at the commencement of the matter, an order had been given to seize Fuller up, and that it was in resistance of this order that he seized the axe, to prevent its execution. It is well known that this order precedes, and is usually preparatory to, the infliction of corporal punishment. Still it is not always inflicted, although the man is actually made fast to the rigging. Often he is released upon his promise of obedience, after he has been admonished by the seizing up, that he is in the power of the officers. This order, therefore, would not justify Fuller in using a dangerous weapon.

If the jury, then, believe that Fuller was brandishing a deadly weapon, and threatening the officers with it, and that there were indications that others of the crew were about to co-operate with him, and that all the circumstances were such as to induce a captain of ordinary firmness and discretion, to believe that the use of a pistol was necessary to suppress a mutiny, and that the captain in this instance did so believe, then the defendant at the bar would be justified; but, if no such necessity, or apparent necessity, existed, then he would not be justified.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

District Court, S. D. New York. 1865.

INTERNAL REVENUE—LICENSE—JUGGLERY—SPIRITUAL MEDIUMS.

The indictment charges Chas. J. Colchester with "practising as a juggler without license." The act of congress under which the defendant is indicted provides that every juggler shall pay a license fee of $20, and further "that any person who performs by sleight of hand shall be deemed a juggler." The defendant denies that he is a juggler. It appears that he offered to take out a license as a "spiritual medium," but the government officials refused to give him a license unless he would take out such license as a juggler, in other words consider himself a juggler. This the defendant absolutely refused to do, but offered the assessor to pay him whatever he might ask for a license as a spiritual medium, or to be known by any other appropriate appellation the official might choose to apply to his calling. The officer, however, refused to grant a license to him, other than as a juggler. The defendant declined the terms of the government officer, whereupon he was arrested, indicted, and the trial of the case transferred to this city. The defendant, upon being arraigned before the court, pleaded "not guilty" to the charge contained in the indictment, whereupon a jury was empaneled.

Josiah Cook and George B. Hibbard, for the defence.

[The following is a report of District Attorney Dart's address to the jury:]

"The prisoner at the bar, Charles J. Colchester, stands indicted for the offence of practising the trade or profession of a juggler, without having procured a license therefor, as required by the 'act to provide internal revenue, to support the government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved June 30, 1864. The case seems to be one simple of solution, and involving no great public concern, and such I apprehend will be its result. The performance of singular and extraordinary feats of rappings, answering questions inclosed in envelopes, and the like, publicly, and for fee and reward, will not be seriously contested, perhaps admitted. The peculiar defence of the prisoner I can only gather from newspaper reports and public rumor, which assert that the prisoner will prove, or attempt to prove, that in the performance of these feats of apparent legerdemain, he is the mere passive instrument of spiritual control, and that he does not practice sleight-of-hand. I see assembled here a great multitude, not 'the spirits of just men made perfect,' but of men and women in their corporeal form. While I concede the inestimable value of the press, I cannot forbear the remark that it has been made the instrument of magnifying this case into undue proportions, and to cause the public to believe that it is a contest between the United States and a large body of citizens calling themselves spiritualists, and an endeavor on the part of the former to crush out a religious sect, and to expose its heresies, if it has any, and that the result of this trial will establish the fact whether spiritualism is true or false. Nothing can be further from the truth. The result of this trial can accomplish no such thing. It is a simple inquiry whether Charles J. Colchester is practising sleight of hand under the guise of spiritual control; and if he is, it is quite as important to professed spiritualists that he should be exposed, as it is to the public, whom he is deluding, and to the government, which he is defrauding. I trust, therefore, should there be a believer in this faith upon the jury, he will not look upon me as a persecutor, but will go hand in hand with me in my endeavor to expose his impositions if he is an impostor, and to compel him, if a juggler, to contribute his proportion to support the government, to pay interest upon the public debt, and for other purposes. There are and ever have been tricks in what used to be known as the 'Black Art,' a jugglery, which has baffled the inquiries of the curious, and are known only to the practisers of that art, and I will proceed to adduce evidence to prove that the prisoner is a disciple of that school."

[The case was tried before HALL, District Judge.]

After a lengthy trial, during which several witnesses versed in diablerie were examined, the case was submitted to the jury, who soon returned a verdict of "guilty." This, in fact, determines "paying mediums" like Mr. Colchester, to be jugglers within the meaning of the excise law, and as such liable to license.

Case No. 14,832.

UNITED STATES v. COLE et al.

[5 McLean, 513.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1853.

CONSPIRACY TO DESTROY VESSEL—EVIDENCE—ACTS DONE—DESTRUCTION OF VESSEL—WITNESSES—GUILT—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. The 23d section of the act of congress of the 3d of March, 1825 [4 Stat. 122], which punishes a conspiracy to destroy a vessel or cargo, with the intent to defraud the underwriters is constitutional.

2. The object of the act is, to protect commerce, and the protection to underwriters is incidental.

3. The act applies to our internal as well as to our foreign commerce.

4. The mischief is as great in the one case as in the other.

5. And the opportunities to commit the offense, are much greater in our internal, than in our foreign commerce.

6. This congress has as full power to do, for the protection of commerce among the several states, as for the protection of commerce with foreign nations.

7. After prima facie evidence has been given of a conspiracy, the statements of those implicated, though not included in the indictment, is evidence.

[Cited in Cuyler v. McCartney, 40 N. Y. 244.]

8. This is, on the principle, that where a combination of individuals has been formed, to commit an unlawful act, they have assumed an individuality in doing the wrong, and the conduct of each one in doing or promoting the act, is chargeable on the whole.

[Cited in People v. Marble, 38 Mich. 130; Spies v. People, 122 Ill. 230, 12 N. E. 976, and 17 N. E. 898.]

9. The burning of the vessel is not necessary to complete the offense.

10. Any combination of two or more persons to destroy the vessel or cargo, consummates the offense under the law, though neither the vessel nor the cargo is injured.

11. The act strikes at the incipient stages of the crime.

12. In its object it is preventive, by punishing the design to do the act.

13. Circumstantial evidence may be as satisfactory to a jury as positive. Sometimes it may equal positive proof.

14. The destruction of the vessel by the defendants, or by any one of them, identified with the defendants as conspirators, would be conclusive against them.

[Cited in People v. Richards, 67 Cal. 415, 7 Pac. 830.]

15. The burning of the vessel is not punishable under the act of congress, but it operates as evidence, against the defendants.

16. The testimony to show the unlawful combination does not end at the destruction of the boat.

17. After, as well as before that event, the acts of the confederates may be examined to show their guilt.

18. Their entire acts, in relation to the subject matter of the indictment, which conduce to show a guilty purpose, may be proved.

19. The jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of witnesses

20. The manner in which a witness testified, the opportunity he had of knowing the facts he swears to, and his whole deportment in making his statements, will necessarily have an effect with the jury, in giving or withholding their confidence in his statements.

21. In coming to a conclusion of guilty or not guilty, the jury will weigh the evidence and exercise their best and most deliberate judgment.

22. They will not convict unless their minds are clearly convinced of the guilt of the accused.

23. But if so convinced, they will not be deterred from a conviction of the defendants, in whole or in part, as the evidence may require, from the consequences which may follow.

24. We have, in this trial, only to look at the facts and the law. With consequences we have nothing to do.

25. But if the jury are not satisfied of the guilt of the defendants, beyond reasonable doubts, an acquittal should follow.

[This was an indictment against Lyman Cole, William Kissane, John N. Cummings, George P. Stephens, William H. Holland, Benjamin W. Kimball, James W. Chandler, James G. Nicholson, Adams Chapin, Amasa Chapin, Rufus Chapin, and Lorenzo Chapin, charging them and one Lucius L. Filley, deceased, with entering into a combination and conspiracy to burn the steamer Martha Washington, and with afterwards setting on fire and burning said boat. Heard first upon motion to quash indictment, afterwards upon trial and charge to jury.]

Mr. Stanbery, Mr. Morton, U. S. Dist. Atty., and Mr. Ware, for the Government.

Ewing, Walker, Swayne, Pendleton & Ward, for defendants.

OPINION OF THE COURT. Before the jury were called, a motion was made by the defendants' counsel to quash the indictment. The main ground upon which the motion to quash was urged was, that the act under which the indictment was found, applied, exclusively to offenses committed on the high seas, and not on our rivers and lakes. It was also urged that the act was unconstitutional, if it was intended to apply to our internal commerce. These points were argued elaborately, on both sides, and with ability.

In deciding the motion, McLEAN, Circuit Justice, said, that the court would proceed to give its impression upon the case, which had been so ably argued. The law under which the prosecution was commenced, is embodied in the 22d section of the act of the 3d of March, 1825. It provides, "that if any person or persons shall, on the high seas, or within the United States, willfully and corruptly conspire, combine and confederate, with any other person or persons, such other person or persons being either within or without the United States, to cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy, any ship or vessel, or procure the same to be done, with intent to injure any person or body politic, that hath underwritten, or shall thereafterwards underwrite, any policy of insurance thereon, or on goods on board thereof, or with intent to injure any person or body politic, that hath lent or advanced, or thereafter shall lend or advance any money on such vessel, on bottomry or respondentia," &c.

The first position of the counsel who concluded the argument on the motion was, that the act was unconstitutional and void. He contends that the object of the law was, to protect insurance companies, and that congress has no power to pass such an act.

This act does not purport to be for the protection and regulation of insurance offices. It is clear that congress can exercise no power over contracts of insurance. It has been decided that when a policy of insurance was on a ship on a sea voyage, as the policy operated upon the water, and not on the land, that it was a marine contract. This is contrary to the English doctrine, as it requires the contract to be made on the water to give it the character of a marine contract. The courts of common law, in England, have been strongly opposed to the admiralty jurisdiction. And the rule is well settled there, that it cannot be exercised within the body of a county. It can be exercised over no water where the tide does not ebb and flow. The supreme court of the United States have adopted a more reasonable doctrine, long established by the civil law, that a maritime jurisdiction may be exercised over navigable waters. Navigableness is the true test, and not the flowing of the tides. It is known that in England there are few if any rivers navigable higher than the flowing of the tide, and this is generally the case with the rivers in the Atlantic states. This, was, no doubt, the cause why the English rule was first followed by our courts in this country. There seemed to be no good reason why the same rule should not be applied in both countries, as the navigable waters of both were made navigable by the tide. It was a convenient term, at first used to describe the extent of navigable waters in England. We have adopted the fact rather than the definition of it. Wherever commercial crafts may float between two or more states, the maritime jurisdiction extends. But independently of this view, under the constitution, congress has the same power to regulate commerce among the several states, as with foreign nations. As regards the present case, no distinction need be stated, if any exist, between the regulation of our foreign and domestic commerce.

Is the scope of the act in question to protect policies of insurance? What is clearly the object of the law? The conspiracy charged is against a vessel and her cargo, upon a river under the protection of the commercial power of the Union. The protection of commerce is the object of this law; the protection of insurance policies is merely incidental. Congress might have punished the burning of the vessel, but it was not thought proper to do so; it has leveled its enactment at the incipient stages of the offense. The law in its object is preventive; by inflicting the penalty on the determination to commit the crime. It does not go behind the overt act to the motive, as the laws of omniscience; but it strikes at the first manifestation of the intent. Whether the conspiracy is formed on the high seas, or within the United States, is of no importance. The offense is so far consummated as to come within the act when the conspiracy is formed. It was wise to strike at the first step, as it gives time for reflection and repentance. The words of the section apply as forcibly to vessels on our rivers and lakes, as on the high seas. The mischief is as great in the one case as in the other. But the opportunities and motives to commit the offense against our internal commerce are much greater than against our foreign commerce. Under such circumstances can any court hesitate to consider the law according to the express language used, as punishing the offense, whether committed on our internal or foreign commerce. The invoices are alleged in the indictment to have been false, and if they were really so, it is argued there could be no conviction, as the conspiracy charged is to destroy the cargo.

Can the defendants claim an exemption from the penalty of the statute, by committing a double fraud? A fraud in having false bills of lading, and another fraud in conspiring to destroy the cargo. False invoices or bills of lading would establish the fraud charged. If a party is not liable under the act of congress when the shipment is fictitious, he would be protected from punishment by his own fraud. This is inadmissible in any code of morals, and especially is it against the law. We have not time to read the indictment through, but our impression is, on hearing it read, that it is sufficient. The defendants can avail themselves of any fatal defect in the indictment at a future stage of the proceeding. The motion to quash the indictment is overruled.

The jurors being called, Messrs. Morton and Stanbery, on the part of the government, demanded the exercise of their peremptory challenge after the defendants had challenged.

Judge Walker had never heard of the violation of the rule that the government should challenge first, and then the defendants exercise their right, except in two instances.

THE COURT decided that the challenge should be exercised alternately.

Counsel for the government had no objection to the jury if the defendants had not. They waived the first challenge.

Judge Walker proposed to propound the following question to each of the jurors: "Have you, by conversation with others, or by the reading of newspapers, acquired such a bias as will prevent you returning an impartial verdict according to the law and the evidence?"

THE COURT allowed the question to be put.

Mr. Van Slyke answered that he had formed an opinion unfavorable to the defendants; and for that he was excused for cause. The other eleven replied in the negative.

Judge Walker challenged a juror peremptorily. Dr. Mœller was called to fill the vacancy, and begged to be excused because he had formed an acquaintance with Kissane, as physician to the jail. Further discussion took place between counsel. Juror was interrogated by THE COURT. He replied that his sympathies had been somewhat excited for Kissane—had had conversations with him with respect to this case on one or two occasions. Had not such a bias as would prevent his returning an impartial verdict. Had patients that needed his attendance.

THE COURT excused Dr. Mœller.

Mr. Slocum was called to fill the vacancy.

Judge Walker put the question he had before propounded to the other jurors, to Mr. Slocum.

The juror had no bias.

Judge Walker challenged another juror peremptorily.

A. J. Clark was called. Question put by Judge Walker, and answered in the negative.

Judge Walker asked the defendants whether they desired he should make any further challenge.

Mr. Stanbery now claimed to exercise the right to peremptory challenge for the government.

After consultation between the judges, THE COURT allowed it.

A. J. Clark was challenged by Mr. Stanbery.

Judge Walker challenged the juror who was called in Mr. Clark's place.

Benj. Tresenrider was called to fill the vacancy. Question put and answered in the negative.

Mr. Slocum was challenged for the defendants.

John R. L. Seegur was called. Question as to bias put and answered in the negative.

Dr. Toland was challenged by counsel for defendants.

James L. Farren was called. Question put as to bias by Judge Walker.

Juror:—"Know nothing about the case—would rather be excused from serving—just stepped into the court five minutes ago to see who Judge McLean was. Had no idea of being called as a juror."

Mr. Miner was challenged for the defendants.

Henry Wellhamer was called, and came in crying—I wish to be excused, judge.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice: Very likely—but for what reason?

Juror:—I have just set out on a journey.

Mr. Wellhamer was excused for that reason by the court.

Mr. Taylor called. Question put as to bias—answered in the affirmative, and was therefore excused.

William Blynn called. Question put as to bias—answered in the negative.

Another juror challenged by Judge Walker.

Geo. W. Slocum called. Question put—answered "no."

Another juror was challenged.

A. McCrea was called. Question put—answered: he had read the preliminary trial and formed an opinion. Excused.

A. Tyler called. Question put—answered in the negative.

Mr. Tyler was challenged.

There being no prospect of completing the panel, the court adjourned.

Friday, October 21, 1853.

The calling of jurors to complete the panel was proceeded with. Some jurors were excused on the plea of sickness or inability to endure the confinement attendant on the trial. The jury, as finally constituted, stood as follows: Joseph Newell, Levi J. Haughey, Wm. L. Brown, E. B. Sacket, Jas. L. Farren, Geo. W. Slocum, Wm. Aston, S. V. Martin, John Miller, F. C. Sessions, C. W. Kent, Henry Miller.

Mr. Morton, Dist. Atty., opened the case for the United States, as follows:

The grand jury of the United States, for the district of Ohio, at the last April term of this court, returned as a true bill, a bill of indictment against Lyman Cole, William Kissane, John N. Cummings, George P. Stephens, William H. Holland, Benjamin W. Kimball, James W. Chandler, James G. Nicholson, Adams Chapin, Amasa Chapin, Rufus Chapin and Lorenzo Chapin, charging them and one Lucius L. Filley, deceased, with entering into a combination and conspiracy to burn the steamer Martha Washington, and with afterward setting on fire and burning said boat. The time and place of the conspiracy is laid as of the fifteenth day of December, A. D. 1851, at Cincinnati, in the district of Ohio. The burning of the boat is alleged to have taken place on the fourteenth day of January, A. D. 1852, near Island Sixty-Five, in the Mississippi river, about sixty miles below Memphis. The object of the conspiracy was to injure and defraud underwriters who should thereafter underwrite policies of insurance upon the hull and cargo of said steamer. The first count charges the conspiracy in general terms in the language of the statute, without specifying any overt act. The remaining seven counts charge the offense in the same manner, together with divers overt acts, done and performed by some or all of the defendants in furtherance of the common design. All of the remaining counts particularly set forth and describe policies of insurance, which were obtained by the defendants, and the sixth count alleges that divers other policies of insurance were procured by the defendants from underwriters to the grand jury unknown.

Nine only of the defendants are now on trial. James G. Nicholson, the clerk of the boat, was arrested before the finding of the indictment, and was discharged on bail. He did not appear, and his bail bond was forfeited at the last term of this court, and he is still at large, as also are Stephens and Chandler. Although the most diligent search has been made for them, they have not been found. The others (save Filley, who died before the indictment was found) are now on trial. To this indictment the defendants have plead not guilty, and you are now impanneled to try the issue between them and the government. It is the duty of the government to preserve the peace and good order of society, and for this purpose laws are enacted defining those acts which constitute a crime, and fixing a penalty for its perpetration. When a person is legally accused of a crime or misdemeanor he must be tried, and if found guilty, must suffer the penalty of the law. The welfare of the community, the very existence of civilized society depends upon the due administration of law. But it is also a high and sacred duty of the government to protect the innocent and unoffending in the enjoyment of their rights, and when a man is accused in the courts of justice, it is incumbent upon the officers of the law to afford him every possible means of establishing his innocence, and to prevent any unfairness to be practiced in procuring his conviction. The high character of the judges who compose this court, and the distinguished ability and learning of the professional gentlemen who appear on behalf of the defendants, and (if I may be permitted to allude to it without giving offense) the number of counsel employed, is a sufficient guaranty that they will have a fair and impartial trial, and if innocent will certainly be acquitted. You, gentlemen of the jury, are too well informed of your duty as jurors and the obligation of the oath you have just taken to permit any thing but the truth as it shall be given you in evidence, to affect your judgment or influence your verdict. You will direct your attention to the law and the testimony, and carefully exclude from your consideration every statement or rumor which you may have heard or read, calculated to prejudice these defendants. You have already discovered that this investigation is to be a protracted and laborious one, and will call for the exercise of all the patience and candor of which you are possessed. That such an accusation as is contained in this indictment should be allowed to pass without legal investigation, or that after conviction the offender should escape the severest penalties of the law, would be an everlasting stigma upon our institutions of government. A distinguished lawyer and statesman of Ireland, speaking of the administration of law in the courts of England, said that with a coach and six any man could drive through an act of parliament. For the honor of my country I hope the time may never come when this may ever be truly said of the courts of the United States. Of the courts of republican America let it ever be said that here the stream of justice flows ever pure and uninfluenced by affection, unintimidated by power, and undefiled by corruption.

Let us inquire now for the law upon which this indictment is founded. What is the mischief designed to be prevented by it? It is to prevent combinations and conspiracies to burn any ship or vessel with intent to defraud any underwriters. Three things must exist to constitute the offense—the confederation or agreement of two or more persons, to burn a ship or vessel, for the purpose of defrauding underwriters. If the conspiracy be proved and the intent be established, viz: to defraud underwriters, yet if it be to burn a house it would not sustain this indictment. The fraud which this law is intended to prevent is that alone which can be effected by the burning of a ship. We can clearly see then that it was that great department of the business of the country which is carried on by means of ships or vessels, that is intended to be protected by this act.

Several important inquiries arise upon the law of this statute, but this is not the proper stage of the investigation for their examination. It is sufficient to say, "ita lex scripta est." Thus the law is written. We must observe the law without enquiring into the reasons of it. But the necessity of this law is obvious. We are a commercial people, made so by our vast industrial and agricultural resources. Our rivers furnish exhaustless supplies of power for propelling machinery as well as do our mountains of coal and great forests. The mineral wealth of the country needs not to be transported to great distance to be manufactured, for here both the raw material and the motive power are found in the same region of country. But of what use are manufactories without a market? and there is no market without commerce. Our own wants are already supplied in every species of product of our own industry. We must exchange our own for those of other nations or we derive no profit from our labor. Consider next the agricultural wealth of this country. Here is the granary of the world, the Egypt of modern times. Here lie the rich valleys, the fertile hills, the broad plains and illimitable prairies of the Great West, all teeming with the luxurious products of the soil. But what of all these, and of what value are they to us if we have not commerce? Our richest treasures turn to ashes in our hands if we can not carry them to the people who inhabit less favored regions of the earth. But we have the means ample and sufficient for all these wants. We have steamers, we have sail vessels, we have the stately ship and the humble navigator of the creek and canal. Every river and lake, every pond and basin from Newfoundland to Mexico, from the Alleghenies to the Rocky Mountains, is agitated and kept in motion by these vehicles of commerce. Byron said, in describing the movements of a ship, "she walks the water like a thing of life." I would improve the simile by saying that these instruments of commerce make the very waters instinct with life and action.

The amount and value of property daily floating upon our navigable waters is vast almost beyond the reach of calculation. To those not engaged in commercial pursuits, and not accustomed to study commercial statistics, a statement approximating any where near the truth would be considered exaggerated and wildly extravagant. But commerce is a hazardous pursuit, peculiarly so. Out of the necessities of this immense commerce associations of underwriters or insurance companies have sprung up all over the country. Some have been fortunate and successful; others have been overwhelmed by losses, and those engaged in them brought from affluence to poverty. Their office is to protect commerce by assuming its hazards and risks. The influence of these associations of underwriters has been in the highest degree salutary to the commercial interests of the country. When the merchant or the producer embarks his entire fortune upon a frail ship for a distant market, these associations are ready to assume all the hazards of the voyage, and to guaranty its safe arrival at the port of destination, for a small proportion or per centage of its entire value. In case of a loss, the calamity, instead of falling with crushing weight upon the owner, and consigning himself and family to beggary, is distributed upon a great number, who, by a contribution of small proportions, are enabled to restore to the owner the entire value of his property, generally without serious damage to any one. Thus the loss is assessed upon the whole commercial community—a worthy and enterprising member of it is saved from ruin, and his business is continued without interruption. Thus, by means of the principle of insurance, a pursuit in itself the most hazardous, is rendered entirely safe, and greatly facilitated and encouraged. The protection and fostering care of the government has been extended to these associations, whose prosperity has justly been considered a matter of great national concern. The people in the formation of the constitution of these United States took care to remove this subject beyond the reach of the cupidity and selfishness of individual states, and entrusted it to the keeping of the national government. Hence the passage of the law by congress upon which this indictment is founded. The court has decided that congress has power to pass this law; if it could not elsewhere be found in the constitution, it seems to me it might properly be referred to the general grant of power to pass all laws necessary to the exercise of the power expressly granted. But this is not the time to discuss, nor is a jury the proper tribunal to pass upon that question.

The voluminous nature of the testimony, the multiplicity of the facts involved, render it impossible that I should at this time communicate to you a particular and detailed statement of the proofs which will be adduced on the part of the government in support of the indictment. I shall content myself with merely pointing out to you under general heads, the nature and kind of proof which will be adduced in testimony before you.

I. The relations of the defendants to one another will be shown. It will appear that a part of them were on the river Rio Grande, during the Mexican war, not as soldiers, but as followers of the camp, in pursuit of private gain. That they were intimately associated and closely connected together, while in that country. Those who were thus engaged on the Rio Grande, are Cole, Cummings, Holland, Stephens, Chandler, Nicholson, and two of the brothers Chapin. After the close of the war, they are found congregated at Cincinnati. Subsequently Kissane, and the two other brothers Chapin, and Filley, a partner of the Chapins, are admitted to their fraternity, and often seen in their company at divers places in and about Cincinnati, at unusual hours, and with no apparent business. They were often engaged in private consultation, the object of which was concealed from all but themselves. Save Filley and the Chapins and Kissane, none of them were engaged in any ostensible business, and some of them were strangers, sojourning only temporarily at Cincinnati. These interviews and consultations took place frequently before and for some time after, the burning of the boat.

II. It will appear that the defendants, in December, 1851, concocted the purchase of the steamer Martha Washington, an old and dilapidated boat, and caused her papers to be made out in the name of Lewis Choate, who was in no way interested in the purchase. The reasons for this purchase, and for the adoption of the name of a fictitious owner, it will be important for you to ascertain. For the prosecution it will be contended that this was the scheme of fraud intended to be perpetrated upon the insurance companies.

III. In order to procure policies of insurance and advances from consignees, the defendants pretended to ship large quantities of merchandise on board said steamer, and procured from the captain and clerk of the boat (who are charged as conspirators in this indictment) false bills of lading by means of which they succeeded in obtaining policies of insurance and advances to a very large amount. Most of these were effected upon the sixth and seventh days of January, and from that time up to the 12th of January, 1852, in the short space of six days and at numerous places in parts of the country remote from each other.

IV. The boat left Cincinnati on the night of the 7th of January, 1852. While on her way down the river, goods were put off at different ports which were marked as consigned to New Orleans and more distant ports. The boat was burned near Island Sixty-Five, about sixty miles below Memphis, on the Mississippi river, at half-past one o'clock on the morning of the 14th of January, 1852. The captain, mate, and clerk of the boat were all up, neither having yet retired to their berths, and neither of them were on duty at the time.

V. After the burning of the boat the defendants entered upon a concerted course of action to render each other mutual aid in effecting the payment of the policies thus obtained by means of false papers and false oaths. The insurance companies demanded proofs of quantities and values of the goods on board at the time of the burning. These defendants made false invoices to one another in order to consummate the fraud on the companies, and added the crime of perjury to that of conspiracy, arson and murder. Consignments of inferior articles of trifling cost, described as being articles of a superior kind and great cost, will be shown to have been made by these defendants upon this boat. Some of the defendants failing to produce original bills of purchase, pretended that the same had been destroyed as papers possessing no value. It will be shown that the amounts of property pretended to have been shipped by these defendants are incredible, considering their limited means and credit. The quantities of particular kinds of goods are incredible for any one house or person to be possessed of at that time in the year and state of the market with reference to supply and demand. They were pretended to be shipped from Cincinnati to New York, when they were actually worth and would command a higher price, if they had them to sell, in Cincinnati than in New York, and the goods were of a kind to meet a ready sale for cash, as there was a scarcity in the Cincinnati market. The goods I now refer to are hides and leather, of which it is claimed immense quantities were shipped by some of these defendants on board of this ill-fated boat. We shall offer proof to show that if the goods which these defendants procured to be insured had been on board, she could not have floated them and the goods actually shipped by other persons. It will appear that there were goods on board of this boat which were lost but they were not the goods of these defendants and upon which these insurances were effected.

VI. Having thus proved to you that the defendants are guilty of this unlawful combination and conspiracy by the testimony to which I have alluded, we shall then produce the confession of Lucius L. Filley, one of the conspirators, now deceased, made in his life time, in which he gives the details of this horrible crime, and fully discloses all the parties engaged, and the part which each performed in the tragedy, which resulted in the destruction of a large amount of property, and the lives of sixteen at least, innocent, unoffending human beings.

Thus, gentlemen, I have briefly stated the kind of evidence relied upon by the government for a conviction in this case. By keeping these general divisions in view, I believe you will be enabled to perceive the application of all the testimony which will be submitted on the part of the prosecution.

After a large number of the witnesses in favor of the prosecution had been called and sworn, the counsel for the defendants observed to the court, from the nature of the prosecution, and the circumstances attending it, they deemed it important to have the witnesses separated, so that they should not hear the statements of the one under examination. This was not objected to by the counsel for the prosecution; and it being a motion often made, rarely objected to, and never denied in a criminal case, the court entered the order.

The witnesses for the prosecution were then called and examined in the following order:

Robert McGrew, Sen.—Stated that he lived in Cincinnati in 1851, on 7th street, between Main and Walnut. He knew Holland, Kissane, Cole, Nicholson, and Stephens. In October or the beginning of November of that year, Stephens and Edwards came to his house to board. Holland came next; was brought to his house by Stephens. Young Cole was introduced by Holland. Cole and Kissane came to see Holland. Cummings was brought to his house to dine by Holland. Capt. Cummings and Kissane were often there. Never saw Cole, the defendant, there but once. Saw Holland at Kissane's pork house. Holland said he became acquainted with Cole and the Chapins in Mexico, on the Rio Grande. Holland, Edwards, and Stephens, with Cole, and some others, were engaged in running a steamboat on the Rio Grande. It was here objected that the statement of Edwards, who is not a party on the record, could not be received as evidence against the other defendants. THE COURT stated that the conspiracy must be proved, before the statements of those who were engaged in it, but were not indicted, could be received as evidence against the defendants. But as the prosecution proposed to prove the combination, the court would, for the present, hear the witness.

In a few days after the above, the witness states that Edwards and Stephens left the house of witness, as they said, for New Orleans. Edwards said he was going in January on the Martha Washington, to take command of a boat on Red river. Holland returned after the burning of the Martha Washington. Sometime afterward Stephens returned. Stephens first came to the house of witness, and afterwards, brought Holland to the house. Stephens remained three or four weeks. Holland remained longer. Saw Nicholson once when he called to see Holland. He appeared to have no business. Stephens said he came to receive the insurance for the goods lost on the Martha Washington. Heard Kissane say that he had never known Holland or Stephens, until he saw them at the house of witness. On cross-examination, witness says, that when Kissane called at his house, he saw the persons above named in the public room. He talked about having some tanks, and requested Stephens to call and see the tanks. At the time Holland was at the house of witness, the river was frozen over.

William Northup—Witness lived in Cincinnati in 1851. His place of business was corner of Court and Walnut. In 1842 the witness lived on Fourth street. In the winter of 1851, before Christmas, saw Kissane call frequently on Cummings.

Robert McGrew, Jr.—States substantially, facts, as related by his father. Mr. Walker, one of the counsel for defendants, made the objection again that no confessions of a party, not in the indictment, should be received to inculpate the defendants, until the conspiracy shall be established. 2 Starkie, Ev. 327, was cited. 2 Russ. Crimes, 700, and Rose. Ev. 417, were read to show that the declaration of a stranger to the record could not be received as evidence THE COURT stated it was a matter of practice in such a case, whether the court would hear the confessions of persons not on the record, to implicate the defendants, when an assurance was given by the prosecution that they would connect the person with the conspiracy. But THE COURT observed, that the better and safer rule was, not to hear such confessions, before prima facie evidence was given to connect the witness with the conspiracy. 3 Greenl. Ev. 58, 34 Eng. Com. Law, 400; 2 Russ. Crimes, 677. The witness, McGrew, further stated, that Stephens paid his father for the board of Edwards, and also furnished Edwards with some clothing. Edwards had no boxes of merchandise at his father's. Holland, when he returned, had but little property, after the boat was burnt—a carpet bag was all.

Mr. Penniman—Witness lives in Terre Haute. In 1851–2, lived in Maysville, Kentucky. He was acquainted with several of the defendants. The winter before witness was acquainted with Nicholson at the City Hotel in Cincinnati. Nicholson spoke to witness at Maysville; said he was on his way to see his wife at the Esculapian Springs, in Kentucky, before the Martha Washington sailed. Said he had purchased that boat. Witness boarded at the Walnut Street House, in the spring of 1852, and saw Kissane, Nicholson, and Cummings walking on the street. Also he saw Nicholson and Cummings at Kissane's place of business. Had some conversation with Capt. Cummings, who said the boat took fire on the larboard side.

Mr. McGregor—Was one of the owners of the boat Martha Washington. Saw an advertisement saying some persons were desirous of buying a steamboat; addressed a letter to Mr. ——, as directed, and received in reply a letter from Capt. Cummings. Witness told him that he owned one half of the boat. Sold both halves eventually for nine thousand dollars; asked at first ten thousand. Capt. Cummings had only three thousand dollars. Finally, Capt. Cummings was to pay on the return trip, nine thousand dollars. On his return he paid six thousand dollars. Capt. Cummings said he had left his money, two thousand dollars, with Kissane. Kissane promised to pay the two thousand dollars, and promised to loan Capt. Cummings one thousand dollars Kissane offered a draft by Cole, on Boston, which witness did not take. Witness loaned seven hundred dollars to Capt. Cummings, and paid for him a bill, for stores, bought of Cassilly, for three hundred dollars. When the purchase of the boat was first made, Capt. Cummings said he had bills maturing for ten thousand dollars. The boat was four and a half years old; carried six hundred and forty tons. Witness shipped on board the boat the fourth or fifth of January, 24 hogsheads of bacon; 87 barrels of whiskey; 123 barrels of pork, and other freight. Witness recommended Kissane to ship on board the Martha Washington, who said he would if he could. Afterwards Kissane told him the Capt. had refused to take any more freight, and that he had shipped on another boat fifty hogsheads.

Capt. Pierce—Was on the levee when the cargo was being put on board the Martha Washington. Saw her at sun-set the day she left; appeared to be about half loaded. The vessel measured by enrolment 290 tons, but she actually measured more than that. He thinks she had not more than 350 tons on board. Does not recollect whether any persons, at the time he saw the boat, were engaged in loading her. A boat loaded in the stern would elevate the prow of the boat. He thinks the boat was worth seven thousand dollars. Nosing of the boat is that which is a prominence on a level with the lower deck.

Lowel Fletcher—Shipped on board the boat 104 barrels of whiskey, amounting to about 15 tons. Saw a great deal of freight on the landing about 3 o'clock of the day the boat left.

Franklin Calliday—Was at Cincinnati, January, 1852. Went to Louisville; the Martha Washington was then there, the 8th of January; left Cincinnati the 7th. Witness went on board the Martha Washington, at Louisville. Saw Capt. Northup in the cabin. Capt. Cummings said he did not go on as a fog was rising on the falls. The boat was not fully loaded. Cummings said he waited for insurance—that he had about two-thirds of a load.

Lewis Clawson—Witness in 1852 lived in Cincinnati, was secretary of an insurance company. On the 9th of January, 1852, insured $8,000 worth of merchandise on board the Martha Washington. Did not describe the kind of merchandise. The papers being called for: 1st. Bought of Lyman Cole articles amounting to $6,359.50. 2d bill—bought of Smith & Kissane $248.80. Bought of ——, 13 casks of brandy, &c., $708.80. The bill of lading was in the handwriting of Kissane & Smith, beef and pork packers, manufacturers of candles, also of lard oil. The color of the ink of the signature of the bill of lading, was different when he first saw it from what it now is. An open policy—thirty-three insurances—all except the above, of business in which the insured were engaged.

Mr. Carter—Lived in Cincinnati in 1852. Was agent for Fireman's Insurance Company, —also the Etna of Hartford. Mr. Stephens insured six boxes of merchandise, $5,361. Witness took the insurance. After the loss of the boat, Stephens called; witness told him he must produce the invoices and bill of lading. Copies were afterwards furnished, but not the originals, purporting to be of goods purchased from John Edwards, $5,361. The bill of lading was signed by Capt. Cummings. Witness inquired of Stephens when Edwards had gone South. Stephens referred him to Kissane and Capt. Cummings. Kissane said he had known Stephens a good while, and that he was an honest man, and all right. Capt. Cummings said about the same thing. Witness did not pay the amount of insurance. Cole issued an attachment, and summoned the company as garnishee. It has expended money in procuring testimony, &c. Burton was employed, witness understood, to attend to the business. On the cross-examination, the witness said he believed several insurance companies agreed to pay something to look up evidence. The company in which witness was engaged, paid $500. If the same amount were paid by all the companies, would make the sum of $3,000. Josiah Lawrence, president of the company, was rather opposed to this arrangement. Did not think that Kissane could have committed the fraud.

Mr. Love—Shipped on board the Martha Washington merchandise to the amount of 9½ tons.

William Emerson—Shipped 100 barrels of pork, making 15 tons.

Mr. Leahmer—On 200 barrels of lard oil, amounting to 30 tons, advanced $4,709.65. It was destined to Philadelphia. Lard manufactured by Smith & Kissane, January, 1852, $4,400. On candles, &c., witness also advanced. Charged five per cent. for advances. The bill of lading was signed by Nicholson.

Mr. Mack—Was agent for the Insurance office of Hartford, and made insurance for merchandise on board the Martha Washington for Stephens, 76 cases of boots, shoes, and hats, $3,369.50. Stephens said he bought the goods from Lyman Cole. Had invoices which witness said were unnecessary. After the Martha Washington was burnt, Stephens called to know what papers were necessary to claim the insurance. He had certified copies of the invoice and bill of lading. The originals were required, and they were afterward produced. Invoice of goods shipped, amount $3,372.75, 7th Jan'y, 1852. Stephens referred to Cole, and he spoke well of him.

Zenas Knowlton—Lives in Hamilton county. Knows Lyman Cole. Keeps a tavern. Saw Cole and Cummings at his house in 1851; thinks it was in the fall; might have been in 1850. Had seen Capt. Cummings on the road to Oxford. Saw a good many people travel on the same road.

John Shultz—In January, 1852, lived in Cincinnati. Shipped on board the Martha Washington 203 barrels of flour. Went on board the boat on the evening of the 7th January, 1852. The guards of the boat were two feet out of water. Passengers were at supper. Saw but very little freight on the shore. 25 or 30 boxes were on deck, near the social hall. Does not recollect whether there was a wharf boat or not, near the Martha Washington.

Samuel W. Smith—Witness is of the firm of Smith & Co. They shipped on board the Martha Washington 100 barrels of whiskey.

John S. Brown—Lived at Cincinnati in 1852. He shipped on the Martha Washington 56 barrels of lard oil; 25 boxes of cheese; 2 hogsheads of bacon sides, amounting to 3 tons. Witness saw Chandler; requested National insurance; 4 boxes of revolving pistols, &c.

Mr. Ray—Shipped 264 barrels of red oil, and from 370 to 80 barrels of oil, not red.

Mr. Page—Lived in 1852 at Evansville, Indiana. The Martha Washington, in descending the river, landed at his wharf, and the following articles of freight were put on board of her there: 37 bbls. of lard; 25 bbls. of turnips; one hundred pounds to a barrel; 942 sacks of corn; 140 bbls. of ——, 2½ bushels in each; 332 sacks of corn. Bills of lading signed by Nicholson as clerk. Names on two bills of lading, Smith and Kissane erased, and Nicholson's name inserted.

Samuel P. Hibbart—Witness is a steamboat agent. Engaged freight for the Martha Washington. In 1852 lived in Washington. Capt. Cummings told him not to engage any more freight, as he had engaged a large amount. Witness engaged 525 tons, one hundred barrels not shipped. It is usual for captains to engage freight. Kissane said he had shipped 600 boxes of candles; 600 boxes to another person.

Mr. Morse—Lives in Cincinnati. Was secretary for National Insurance Company. Was applied to for James W. Chandler. Insured $2,200 worth of merchandise on the Martha Washington. At the time of application no invoice was presented. But when payment was claimed after the loss of the Martha Washington, certain papers were in the hands of Chandler, who was arraigned before the commissioner, but discharged by him. Since that time he has absconded. He proposed to prove copies of the papers he took with him, which was admitted. Chandler said he bought these goods from Crane, living on Fifth street, as a boarder; no such man is known to have lived there. Objection being made by defendants' counsel, THE COURT held that before a person, not a party on the record, can by confession charge the defendants, he must be shown, by prima facie evidence, to have participated in the conspiracy. On the cross-examination of Morse, he said that Chandler did not speak of Crane as a fixed resident in Cincinnati. Mr. Raul came with Chandler to the office. Raul is a respectable merchant. Chandler brought Southgate afterward, who gave an affidavit that he saw the boxes that were shipped by Chandler. The witness states that the fund of five hundred dollars paid by his company, was not contributed to aid in a criminal prosecution.

Mr. York—Identified a document.

Mr. Brown—In January, 1852, lived in Covington. Stated no fact of importance.

Mr. Duval—In January, 1852, witness lived in Memphis. The 13th of January, the Martha Washington landed at Memphis, and put off there 15 barrels of lard oil, and 40 boxes of candles. Nicholson, the clerk, left them in care of witness, until he should call for them. The boat was burnt sixty odd miles below that place. After the boat was burnt, Nicholson called for the articles, and sold them to witness for $636.70. Paid cash $90, and a note for the balance, which was cashed by a broker in the town.

Doct. L'Hommedieu—In 1852 witness resided in Cincinnati. Went to the Walnut Street House in 1851; Cole was boarding there, and Nicholson was there. Kissane was there with them frequently. Witness says Kissane came to see them. Was not personally acquainted with Cole. Cole and Nicholson were said to be sporting men, and his attention was attracted by Kissane, a business man, being with them.

Charles Flournagler—Lives in Kentucky—deals in boots and shoes. Witness was at Cincinnati in the winter of 1851. He bought of Chapin's, red sole leather, 17th Nov., 1851, 150 boxes of boots. He purchased between fifty and a hundred sides of sole leather. He bought no kip boots; wanted two or three cases of them.

Mr. Murphy—Lives in Meigs county, Ohio. Was at Chapin's store, 1st Nov., 1851. Called to examine their stocks; he wanted different kinds of articles. They had some red sole leather; their stock was not large. Witness purchased shoes of others.

Mr. Ward—Proves a bill of lading. Between the 1st and 5th of January, 1852, Mr. Dupler called to purchase 10 casks of brandy, and afterwards he bought five more. The first he paid 65 cents per gallon; for the last, 25 cents. Two of the casks of brandy were returned; could not be received on the Martha Washington. Kissane paid for 13 casks $578.90, in soap and candles. The bills for the candles were in Kissane's handwriting. The brandy was directed to be sent to the Martha Washington. The two casks were returned by the drayman, who said that the boat would receive no more freight.

Mr. Casselly—In 1852, the Mechanics' Fireman Insurance Company, at Madison, insured an invoice of goods bought of Lyman Cole, on 1st January, 1852, for 13 barrels of brandy, $1,792.25. After the boat was burnt application was made at the office for payment, and the amount was paid. On the cross-examination witness says he does not know of any arrangement with the insurance offices in Cincinnati, to pay Burton any money. Being again examined in chief, the witness said; a short time after the insurance was paid, he felt suspicious that something was wrong. Lawrence was then alive. Company had a meeting, agreed to pay persons to investigate the matter. Mr. Ross and Mr. Scarborough were employed.

James Chew—In January, 1852, witness was agent for the Utica Insurance Company. Nicholson insured on his for five hundred dollars, and six hundred dollars on two boxes of merchandise. Mr. Laws, who insured for Nicholson, said the boxes contained ladies' cloaks.

Mr. Cranis—Witness in 1852 lived in Cincinnati, and carried on the leather business. He was a creditor of Chapins. He held their notes for $832. He was through their establishment about the time they sold to Cole. White sole leather is tanned with chesnut-oak bark, and it is better than red sole leather. There was a good demand for white sole leather in 1851-2. Did not know of two hundred rolls of sole leather in the city unless Taylor had them. When he went through the establishment of Chapins, did not see any white sole leather. He saw about 20 dozen of sheep skins. On a cross-examination—Chapins gave their note, payable in 60 days; said they had insurance on a large shipment. Their establishment was more extensive than any other in Cincinnati. One hundred and fifty men were employed in the factory, beside outside laborers.

J. K. Thomas—Witness shipped 20 barrels hams on board the Martha Washington.

Mr. Zimmerman—Lives in Lexington, Kentucky; is in business there, and makes his purchases in Cincinnati. In 1851, bought some small bills of Chapins. The next spring bought from them 100 cases of boots, and 10 cases of a different quality. But in Lexington such articles could be purchased lower than in Cincinnati. On the cross-examination, witness said the stock of the Chapins did not appear to be heavy, and in the spring of 1852, it was very small. Burton called on witness to know what he could prove.

John H. Ballance—Lives in Cincinnati. Tans sheep skins. There was a demand for them in the winter of 1851–2. 1600 dozen of sheep skins; never saw so many together. In a bale there are from 200 to 240 pounds.

Wm. Parvin—Witness lives in Cincinnati, and is engaged in the trunk business, which requires the use of sheep skins. In 1851–2 several such establishments in the city who use sheep skins. Never saw a lot of 1600 dozen of sheep skins at one time.

Samuel J. Raney—Has been engaged in the leather business fifteen years. In December, 1851, and January, 1852, the market was heavy. White sole leather was very scarce. Two hundred bales of white sole leather would require 1200 sides. Witness had no knowledge of that amount of white sole leather in Cincinnati. Red sole leather is worth 16 cents; white, 20 cents.

Mr. Thornton—Is a manufacturer of sheep skins and morocco; calf skins. In 1851–2 knew no one who had 1200 dozen of sheep skins.

Mr. Kesler—Witness is a leather dealer and manufacturer of leather. White and red in Cincinnati and New York. Two hundred bales would be a large amount to have in the fall. Witness never saw two hundred dozen sheep skins at once. He has known the firm of Chapins for some years.

Mr. Caton—In 1851–2, was reporter to the chamber of commerce. Took an account of all the freight, and recorded it. Such a report THE COURT held was not evidence unless sworn to.

John Sheier—Witness is a map publisher in Cincinnati. He shipped on the Martha Washington three boxes of charts. Nicholson inquired if he had not better send on board of some other boat. He said that he was part owner of the boat. He said he had invested every thing he had. Said he was insured, and would make a spoon or spoil a horn. Nicholson said he owned the bar.

Mr. Crammond—Witness was on the river, in January, 1852, about one hundred miles below where the Martha Washington was burnt; stopped at the place Saturday night; next morning went on board the wreck. On Monday went on board as wreckers. Commenced their work on Tuesday, and continued Wednesday. Found on board, oil, soap, grease, oil kegs, and butter. Found no rolls of leather, or sole leather; no pistols. The bow of the boat was lying up the stream. Witness asked the mate how the boat took fire. He said he supposed it must have caught in the brooms piled on the larboard side of the boat from the chimney. The deck was burnt. Witness found 20 bbls. of pork; 50 kegs of lard; five or six barrels of flour; five or six kegs of butter; five or six barrels of whisky; some soap grease. Not one of the barrels bore the marks of fire; nor the sacks of corn which they found. Holland ordered the wreckers to desist, but they refused, and said he had no right. The other party of wreckers,—for there were two parties,—carried away the property, with a good many threats. Chandler made his appearance at the wreck, and claimed to be agent, and exhibited some papers. He remained two or three hours, and then left. Chandler claimed no property; only claimed to be agent.

Mr. Burdell—Witness lives in New York; is a part of the firm of R. H. Burdell & Co. Messrs. Smith & Kissane shipped to the company 300 barrels of pork. Witness proposed he should ship it at $12 per barrel. Said they had shipped on board the Martha Washington. Insurance was taken at $15 per barrel. Worth that at New York.

Mr. Taggart—Lives in Arkansas, near the wreck. Found on the boat, whisky, pork, oil, &c. Nicholson requested witness to take possession of the property saved from the wreck. Chandler and Cummings came together in a skiff. Chandler took charge of the property for New Orleans. Heard Capt. Cummings call Chandler by name. The property was to be left with a man called Jordan at New Orleans if Chandler should not be there. On his cross-examination, the witness says, Cummings called Chandler by name. Heard nothing of any other individual called by the same name. Did not know Chandler. He was to reclaim the property wherever it could be found. McNeal was to go with Chandler. Cummings sold some of the pork, which was not good, the brine having leaked out of it. He sold it at $11 per barrel. It was seven or eight days after the burning before Capt. Cummings came to the wreck.

Mr. Wheeler—Lives in Boston. Secretary of an insurance company. Took a risk on board the Martha Washington, through the instrumentality of James Lee & Co. Property insured, 250 barrels of mess pork, 100 tierces of oil. Total, $5,347 50,—for Lyman Cole. The bill of lading or invoice was in Kissane's handwriting. Shipped also, 167 barrels mess pork: 6th Jan. Smith & Kissane, 83 barrels mess pork, 100 tierces of lard. Papers in the handwriting of Kissane. Mr. Lee accepted; papers were handed over when the insurance was paid.

M. L. Neville—In 1852, witness was secretary of Fireman's and Mechanics' Insurance Company. Insured for Capt. Cummings, $2,500, payment made by Casselly to McGregor. Paid some to Kissane. Cummings said he lent the money to him. This company refused to contribute any thing for the investigation of the case.

Mr. Davenport—Lives in Boston, and is a manufacturer of boots, and shoes, &c. Received a letter from Capt. Cummings, dated 15th October, 1851, for certain cases of boots, &c. 150 dozen sheep skins were insured by witness for Filley & Chapin; loss paid to the acceptor of their bill. The letter stated the loss was total. Amasa Chapin was authorised to collect debts due Filley & Chapin.

Mr. Tabor—Witness lives in New Bedford, Massachusetts. On the 8th of January, 1852, he received a letter from Lyman Cole, dated at Cincinnati, requesting an insurance on goods on board the Martha Washington, to about $2,000, on 100 tierces of lard; the bill of lading was signed by Lyman Cole, but was in the handwriting of Kissane. On the 26th January, witness received a letter from Cole; wrote another letter dated Oxford, complaining that he had received no answer.

Mr. Riley—Witness saw Nicholson a short time after the boat was burnt, at New Orleans. He asked McDano, captain of a steamer, to bring some freight down from Memphis, on the bow of the boat. Witness said, on his cross-examination, since 1832, he had been on the river as pilot and captain. He stated that the Martha Washington carried a large amount of freight when loaded down to the guards, and, in addition, could carry one hundred and fifty tons.

John S. Tappan—Lives in Brooklyn. Was vice president of Union Insurance Company in 1852. Mr. Kemble came to his office, 12th January, 1852, and applied for an insurance; said he had $10,000 to insure, and witness concluded to take the risk to New Orleans. 26,000 pounds of white sole leather, 200 rolls, in his own name. He held his hand over the names of Filley & Chapin and Lyman Cole. Kemble said he did not insure to New York, because the freight might be sold at New Orleans. On the 16th January, 1852, saw in the Courier and Enquirer of New York, that the George Washington had been wrecked, and that the Martha Washington had been burnt. On the 31st of January, 1852, received a letter from Kemble, stating the loss of the Martha Washington. A despatch of the loss from Capt. Cummings was received by Kemble, and an inquiry was made whether they would pay; the witness answered no. Kemble stated to witness once his interest in the cargo was equal to his insurance. At another time he said it was not, and that some one else was concerned with him. He never showed to witness that he was entitled to this property, except the invoice covering the names signed. Cole had an interest, and another person. Kemble refused to state the other name. Said he would write to Cincinnati; but did not. On the cross-examination, witness said the articles invoiced were, as appears from the paper, 26,000 pounds of sole leather, and 1,600 dozen of sheep skins. The writing was rather a bill of sale than a consignment.

Eliza Martin—Was chambermaid on board the Martha Washington, and was in bed in the last berth but one in the ladies' cabin. Late at night heard the cry of fire. Went to the folding doors; saw fire in the gentlemen's hall—inside of it. Witness went to the hurricane deck. Carswell helped her from the deck to the land. The boat was landing when she got off.

Mr. Whitney—In January, 1852, witness was secretary to the Madison company. Agent of that company at Louisville took a policy. A. Chapin took the insurance; 200 cases kip boots, signed Filley & Chapin. More than a month after the loss, Mr. Chapin called at the office in Madison. The amount of the insurance was $4,200, which witness did not pay.

Mr. Jones—In New York, in January, 1852, witness was an underwriter in the Atlantic Insurance office. On the 7th of January, 1852, took an open policy—300 bbls. of pork, $4,500; 264 bbls. of pork. Smith & Kissane shippers of the first, Ray of the latter.

J. B. Wilson—In March, '51, witness was assessor. Stock of Filley & Chapin assessed at $3,500.

Mr. Clark—Lives in Cincinnati. Knew Filley & Chapin. Made them temporary loans in the fall of 1851. Made to them weekly loans from one to three hundred dollars. He had difficulty in collecting the loans, &c.

Mr. Lane—Mate of the steamboat Martha Washington at one time. She would carry 550 tons.

Mr. Scarborough—Lives at Cincinnati. Had two invoices in his charge, as counsel for investigation. Insurance on the invoices amounted to $5,458. The Chapins said Cole was interested. Had frequent interviews with one of the Chapins, but received no explanations with which witness was satisfied.

Mr. Shepard—Knew Chandler in Covington. Was a sportsman. Saw him in March, 1852, in New Orleans. As witness was walking the street Chandler came out of a house to see him. Stated that he was on board the Martha Washington. Reached the land by a line on the stern of the boat. Said that he had been employed by Capt. Cummings, at $5 per day. Witness said that Chandler had consulted him as counsel, and that he was not bound to disclose.

Mr. Morton, Dist. Atty.—Read a copy of a letter from Kissane to Nicholson, after his arrest, and was about to state the circumstances under which the letter was abstracted from his papers, when the defendants' counsel objected that such statements could not be received as evidence.

THE COURT—As the abstraction of the letter was a penal offense, for which the person taking it was liable to be indicted and punished if found guilty, the act of purloining the letter could not be received as evidence; but they said, as explanatory of the transaction, and to show the motive of taking the letter, they would hear the statements of the witness.

Mr. Morton then proceeded to state that the original letter, the copy of which he had just read, was with his other papers, carefully tied up and left in his desk, the door of his room being locked, while he took a short ride in the country. On his return he found that his papers had been handled—were in confusion, and the original letter of Kissane had been abstracted. And other facts were stated, conducing to prove that Kissane took the letter. In the absence of the witness the chambermaid probably entered the room.

Mr. Taylor—Lives in Cincinnati. Has been engaged in the leather business, and carries on the largest establishment in the city. White sole leather is more valuable than red; the white is tanned with chestnut oak bark, and will weigh from eighteen to twenty pounds a side. In the winter of 1851–2 white sole leather was scarce and in demand. Witness had no idea that there was any thing like 200 rolls of that leather in the city, or that there were 1,700 dozen of sheep skins. On being cross-examined, the witness says that leather would sink when saturated with water, also sheep skins would sink under similar circumstances.

Mr. Walker—Walker & Co. shipped on board the Martha Washington in 1852, 100 bbls. of whisky and 360 bbls., as per bill. Delivered the 7th January.

Mr. Polard—In January, 1852, shipped on board the Martha Washington, merchandise, soap, candles, tobacco, ½ bbl. of butter, 2 doz. brooms, 4 bbls. rectified whisky, 2 do crackers. On 7th January, 1852. Copy of invoice: Kissane & Smith, 7th January, 1852. Amount $3,360. Destined to Freeman & Sons.

Mr. Carpenter—Lives in Cincinnati. Business, loaning money. Loaned money up to the time of the failure of Filley & Chapin. When they failed they owed him $250. Went to them and bought $750 worth of goods. Witness settled with Cole, who required him to buy as above.

Mr. Pomroy—Lives in Cincinnati. Firm of Robins & Pomroy. Engaged in shoe business. Manufacture in Massachusetts. In the summer and fall of 1851 purchased 599 dozen sheep skins. Packed up at other places than their own house. White sole leather, witness thinks, was scarce in 1851. (A bill of lading read, signed by Nicholson. Shipped for Cooper 25 tons of goods.)

Mr. Hubbard—Is the superintendent of the House of Refuge. Did the stitching of boots for the Chapins. In Nov. stitched 559 cases or dozens. In December, 257 doz. In October, 100 doz. Witness was at the Chapins' store almost every day. Did not see large quantities of leather on hand. On his cross-examination, witness said he never was in the cellar more than once or twice. Never in the two upper stories of the building.

Mr. Chew—Capt. Cummings applied for an insurance on the steamboat Martha Washington for $4,500, in the name of Lewis Choate, which was taken by the witness. After the boat was burnt, sent Charles Ross as an agent to look after the interest of the insurance company. In February following, Capt. Cummings and Capt. Choate demanded the insurance money. At the request of witness, certain deck hands were sent to the insurance office to give an account of the loss of the boat, who were examined in the absence of Capt. Cummings and Holland. Capt. Cummings referred witness to two deck hands on the boat who could give him information. They came and had a communication with the witness. A part of the conversation was in the presence of Cummings and Holland. Objection being made, THE COURT held that the statement of these hands in the presence of Cummings and Holland might be received, but that part which was made in their absence was not evidence. The statements received as evidence had no material bearing in the case. The reference to the deck hands was not such as absolutely to bind Capt. Cummings to whatever they might state.

Mr. Lee—Lives in Cincinnati. Shipped on board the Martha Washington 100 barrels pork and 200 barrels of flour, amounting to 37 or 38 tons.

Mr. Shellito—Shipped on board the Martha Washington 100 bbls. red oil, 50 bbls. soap—25 tons.

Capt. Irwen—Once commanded the Martha Washington. When loaded within six inches of her guards might have 450 tons. Loaded to the water, 500 tons. Carried 517 tons.

Mr. Cotral—Is a partner or agent in the City Manufacturing Company. Cole introduced Mr. Stephens, who bought brandy of witness—a number of barrels—and paid for it in staves.

Mr. Caton—Is agent of the chamber of commerce, and his duty is to take an accurate account of all shipments, &c. He presented his record of entries made of articles shipped by the Martha Washington. He could not state positively whether he took the list of articles from the agent of the Martha Washington for freight, or from the second clerk of the boat. His memory being refreshed by examining the book of the agent for freight, but he could not distinctly recollect where he got the items. THE COURT held that the entry of the articles could not be received in evidence. The witness was not able to say where he got the items, and much less could the court or jury decide this fact, on which the admissibility of the evidence rested.

Mr. Carswell—Belonged to the boat. He was asleep in a berth in that part of the boat called Texas. The bell being violently rung by Capt. Choate, the pilot, waked him. He heard also violent stamping on the hurricane deck. This was about one o'clock at night. Witness saw the chambermaid and carpenter. Helped the chambermaid down to the lower deck, then the carpenter, and then the witness got down. Saw the fire extending back to the stern of the boat. The bank at which the boat landed was high. The boat was not fastened to the shore, the rope being frozen, and it soon floated from the shore. The Charles Hammond came along in about an hour. The passengers generally got on board of her, wet and almost frozen. The chambermaid, cabin boys, &c., got on board of the James Shillinger, which was going up the river. The fire took place about five miles from the wood-yard. After the alarm of fire it was not more than ten minutes before the boat was in a blaze through the cabin No power could control the hands. Every one escaped for his life.

Mr. Murray—Lives in Cincinnati. Is a drayman, and was engaged in the same business in 1852. He run from six to eight drays. He hauled for the Chapins. Hauled six loads for them. Load of sheep skins; red sole leather. There were four or five large loads of leather, and some boxes.

Charles Gibson—Worked in the establishment of the Chapins about five years, including October, 1851. The store was the corner of Pearl and Main.

R. C. Lepper—In 1848 witness was clerk on board the Martha Washington. The witness recollects once she carried 585 tons.

Capt. Ross—Witness for many years has been on the river as captain or pilot. He was appointed agent for the underwriters, and proceeded to the place where the boat was burnt. It floated down the river about six miles from that place and sunk. Witness went on to New Orleans. Was referred to McGregor, at New Orleans, as the agent of the boat. He was twenty-four hours in finding Jordon, the consignee of the cargo. Nobody seemed to know him. He was a dealer in pamphlets. He could give witness no information. Jordon said Chandler had nothing to do with the cargo. He did not know him. By the bill of lading Chandler was the shipper. Another bill of lading was to Jordon. The Martha Washington will carry 575 tons. Witness got no satisfaction from Jordon.

Mr. Wheeler—Worked nearly three years with the Chapins. His business was to put bottoms to boots. Worked in January, 1852, and he thinks, in February, for Cole. Worked for Filley & Chapin through the summer of 1851. In September boots did not sell as fast as they were made. Never worked white leather in kip boots—put white sole leather in calf boots. Never saw sheep skins, except what were necessary for use.

Mr. Carswell cross-examined—While at the boat, the impression was that the fire was accidental. Heard nothing to the contrary until about two months afterward. Capt. Cummings appeared like a crazy person, by his gestures and exclamations at the loss of lives.

Mr. Remur—Remur & Sons, of Baltimore, made an advance for 600 boxes of candles, $2,360. Insured to New Orleans. From the insurance witness paid his advance, and the balance was paid to Kissane.

Mr. Wheatley—Was a clerk of Smith & Kissane. Witness accompanied the latter to swear to the shipment of 600 boxes of candles, and witness swore to it, not knowing any thing about it, and this was known to Kissane. After they left M'Guffey, the person who administered the oath, Kissane said to witness he would never hear of it again. Afterward witness swore to the same fact before a commissioner. He was in the habit of getting bills of lading. He did not see Kissane tear out this bill of lading from the book.

John Phillips—Worked as a boot bottomer for Filley & Chapin. Was in the store every week. Used red sole leather and white. No more leather of either kind was necessary to carry on their business.

Mr. Ford—Witness worked for the Chapins in September, 1851; left them the latter part of that month. Had worked for them three years before that time. Don't know that he saw a large stock of leather while there.

Mr. Butler—Worked for the Chapins three years ending in the fall of 1851. Hands pushed to send boots to Louisiana. There were three crimpers employed.

Lewis Choate—Was pilot at the time the boat was burnt, and was on watch. While at the wood-yard he was in the social hall. Capt. Cummings and Nicholson were there also. He remained there until the wood was in, and then ascended to the pilot-house. Capt. Cummings came up; stood in front of the pilot-house; turned round and came into the pilot-house. The boat had not proceeded more than five or six miles from the wood-yard before he smelt paint burning. Witness said to Capt. Cummings, there was fire. He ran down fronting the pilot-house, looking over the hurricane deck, and said, You are mistaken. Witness replied he was not. Capt. Cummings then ran down to the cabin deck. The mate (Holland) was on the hurricane deck. Said the wood taken on board was very dry, and said he would go down. Witness rang the bell violently and stamped; made a good deal of noise. In a very short time after smelling the fire (a minute or two) the fire burst out. Heard no noise in the social hall. The clerk (Nicholson) said he was sitting in the social hall, with boots off and sleeping. Did not know of the fire till witness gave the alarm. He then alarmed the passengers. The fire was bursting some of the windows. While the boat was at the wharf at Cincinnati, Capt. Cummings introduced witness to Nicholson, and said he had promised the clerkship to him at the Springs, in Kentucky. Witness communicated to Capt. Cummings something he had heard said of Nicholson, not favorable. Capt. Cummings went to the person who had made the remark, and inquired of him about the matter, and, on his return, said he could ascertain no definite facts. Cross-examination—Capt. Cummings owed $1,500 in New Orleans, and was afraid the boat might be attached; and it was on this account that the title to the boat was vested in witness. Witness advised Capt. Cummings to leave Cincinnati late at night, as he would gain more by doing so than by remaining. The boat was about three hundred yards from the shore when he first saw the flames. Thinks the fire could not have been extinguished. He had no suspicions at the time that the boat had been set on fire. Such a suspicion was not uttered by any one. Witness heard Capt. Cummings call Ross agent, and proposed to pay over to him the money, and show him the invoice of the sales of the freight saved from the wreck. Ross said he did not feel himself authorized to receive the money. Witness called with Capt. Cummings for the insurance on the boat. On the second call Chew said he had received a letter from Capt. Ross, who advised the company not to pay. Witness saw the board of underwriters, and before them insisted that the parties on the boat should be arrested. A second time witness insisted that the parties should be arrested, in order to bring the matter to a full investigation. Mason charged Capt. Cummings with burning the boat. Shortly afterward when the Capt. met Mr. Mason at the Burnet House, he knocked him down, &c. The Underwriters said their object was to protect themselves. Witness did not think Capt. Cummings was guilty of burning the boat. Since the above witness has seen some things which he did not like as to the boat being burnt—not in reference to Cummings. Where the chimney rests on the boiler fire may be communicated. In thinking there was something wrong witness referred to Nicholson.

Mr. Favor—Witness came up the river on steamboat Breakland. Capt. Cummings, Capt. Choate, and Nicholson, were on board. All on board of the Emperor. Had some conversation with Nicholson, who said when the fire broke out in front, he first heard the alarm. Ran into the ladies' cabin. Said the boat was well sold. This was the 25th, 26th, or 27th of January, 1852. (Other witnesses who knew Nicholson, and who came up on board the said boat, said he was not on board.)

Mr. Chew—Holland said to witness, after the boat had wooded, and as she was rounding out, he went into the social hall, where Nicholson was sitting asleep. Sat half an hour. Went to the bar, drank something. After some time saw fire in a state-room where mattresses were deposited. Boat was turned toward the shore, was made fast, and the passengers were taken off. That he was left in charge of the wreck. As property was taken on shore it was stolen; there was only one honest man there. The line was not made fast, and when the starboard engine ceased working the boat swung out into the river. On his cross-examination, the boat was insured for $4,500. At the meeting of the company it was not intimated that the boat had been burnt designedly. Choate said that if there was fraud the defendants should be arrested. Nicholson remained in the social hall asleep, as Holland stated, until the fire burst out.

Mr. Traner—Lives in Cincinnati. Engaged in the shoe business in November and December, 1851. In November bought seven bills, one a case of kip boots, of the Chapins. In making these several bills, witness was in the Main street store and cellar. Saw three bales of white sole leather, 29th November, 1851. Saw sheep skins in the upper rooms; five bales at one time. White sole leather fluctuates. On being cross-examined, witness stated the cellar under the Main street store was dark, and that there might have been rolls of leather in the cellar which he did not see. There were 408 cases in the lower store or room.

J. A. Dugan—Was at New Orleans; saw Nicholson there.

Here an objection was made by defendants' counsel, that after the boat was burnt the act was consummated, and that the confessions of one can not afterwards implicate the other defendants. And it was urged that the boat, to charge the defendants, must have been burnt with a fraudulent intent, to injure the insurance offices. And it was insisted if the insurance companies resist the payment of the money, and the defendants shall fail in the recovery, the offense charged would not be sustained. And to sustain the points urged, there was cited Whart. Ev. 6; L. 261–263; 8 Car & P. 297; 1 Phil. Ev. 97; 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 136, § 111; 3 Greenl. Ev. p. 88, § 94. The prosecution contended that the partnership or combination was not ended until the money was obtained, and cited 2 Starkie, Ev. 32; 1 Greenl. Ev. 111; 11 East, 584; [American Fur Co. v. U. S.] 2 Pet. [27 U. S.] 364; 4 Wend. 261. THE COURT held that it was not necessary to prove the burning of the boat to sustain the indictment against the defendants. If they conspired to burn the boat to defraud the insurance offices, the offense was consummated. In this we see the wisdom of the law. The crime was committed before the perpetration of the overt act. The punishment of the conspiracy to do the act makes the incipient stages of the offense as criminal, and by that means intends to arrest the consummation of the crime. The act of burning the boat is evidence in the case, as it may, connected with other facts, show a conspiracy, or conduce to show it. But this is not a point in the evidence beyond which the prosecution can not go. The conspiracy may be inferred from attempts to obtain the money. The entire transaction is a matter for investigation, by which the innocence or guilt of the defendants may be shown. As the burning of the boat is not, necessarily, an act to consummate the offense, it can have the effect only, like any other fact which conduces more or less to show the nature of the transaction. The witness may proceed in his statement.

Mr. Dugan continued—Nicholson said that he had been in bed; heard a roaring; got up and saw the fire.

A. Jones—Lived in Cincinnati in 1851–2. Is a relation of Filley, the partner of Chapin. Filley died the 28th of October, in the year 1851.

Mr. Mason—Lives at Buffalo. Was at Cincinnati in the spring of 1852. Called on Nicholson to ascertain the facts of the loss of the boat. He said he got up about midnight at the wood-yard where the boat stopped to wood, and paid for the wood. He said that he sat down in the social hall; fell asleep, and was awaked by the ringing of the bell. At first saw nothing, but soon discovered fire bursting from the state room near the chimney. Witness wished a memorandum of articles, which he could not give. Nicholson introduced witness to Capt. Cummings, who knocked witness down. Davis & Co.'s bill of lading, 11,477 lbs.

Mr. Carson—Lives in Baltimore. The insurance, according to the invoice, one hundred dollars more than the amount and upwards of five hundred dollars above the amount advanced to Smith & Kissane. The surplus was paid over to them.

Mr. Johnson — Witness is a confectioner. Was cook on board of the Martha Washington. When loaded at Cincinnati her guards were from six to ten inches out of water. Nicholson kept the Esculapian Springs, in Kentucky. He and Cummings agreed to purchase a boat, and the Martha Washington was purchased. The fire occurred in the room aft the chimney on the larboard side. The carpenter was in the same room with the witness. The clerk's office was on the starboard side—partition between the room and chimney. Nothing in the first room aft. Was awakened by the ringing of the bell, and stamping. Looked through the inner door—saw fire in the social hall. Waked the carpenter, who was sleeping in the same room. Passed through the social hall into the cabin. Saw Nicholson running (towards the hall) in the cabin. Witness then went down to the lower deck—there saw Holland and Nicholson. When witness first saw the fire it was about four feet at its base, and its blaze ascended to the ceiling. Boxes were piled up on the larboard side of the social hall—on these boxes were piled several bundles of brooms, and of brown paper. The fire was burning on this paper three or more feet. Nicholson kept quiet. Capt. Cummings in great distress returned to the boat. He was without hat or coat, and used great exertions to rescue the passengers. A man could not live more than two minutes in the water, the cold was so intense. The witness believes the fire was communicated to the boat from the chimney.

Mr. Heartwell—A bill of lading of Smith and Kissane, dated early in March, 1852, appeared to have been written only a few hours before, signed by Nicholson, was presented. When he first saw the bill the ink was blue and fresh; afterward it became black. Burton at this time was not known to the underwriters. Loaned Burton $2,000, indorsed by Dennison. Afterward made another loan of $1,000. No interest has been received. The note has been twice renewed. Insurance offices agreed to take the notes without indorsements. In January, 1853, the company advanced $850. Subsequently advances amounted to a little more than $4,000.

Mr. Lee—Lives in Boston, and was engaged in the commission business in 1852. In pursuance of a request of L. Cole, witness insured for him, for mess pork on board the Martha Washington, $5,000. Insured 10 per cent. profit. Register of the Martha Washington given in evidence, specifying it to be 350 tons, &c.

Mr. Burton—Lives in Ohio City. He became acquainted with two of the Chapins in 1846, within which year they failed. He knew L. Filley, the partner of Rufus Chapin, and did business with them and continued to do business with them until the 3d December, 1851. He sold to them 160 dozen, of sheep skins, and deposited with them 182 dozen. A short time after witness returned home, Rufus Chapin came to Cleveland, and calling on the witness, said he wished to procure a note discounted for six hundred dollars. Witness went with him to the bank, but could not procure the discount of the note. Chapin wanted to buy white sole leather. Witness went with him to a large leather dealer in Cleveland, but he would not sell on the terms offered. Witness again went to Cincinnati about Christmas Eve. Called on the Chapins the next morning, and found Lyman Cole with them. He inquired for the 182 dozen sheep skins which he left on deposit, and with the view of securing the Chapins for a note they had indorsed for him. He applied for the sheep skins, Cole being in possession of the property. Cole said: Let Burton go to the devil with the rest of the creditors. Filley, and Burton, and Earl, witness says, made an estimate of the stock, amounting to the sum of $8,500. Witness saw all the Chapins at R. Chapin's, and also Kissane. Cole and Capt. Cummings were at the Chapins. They had not 200 rolls of white sole leather. Saw a very small amount of that article. Witness also met Adams Chapin. The witness was greatly displeased that the bales of sheep skins which he left on deposit were not delivered to him, and threatened to bring suit. It was arranged that witness should be made secure through one of the insurance offices. This was after the loss of the boat. The insurance in the name of Kimball was the office designated. Adams Chapin promised that the insurance papers should be ready. Having received the papers, witness went to Owego to Kimball. Witness found him keeping an eating house near the railroad. He walked with him some distance and sat down on a log. Witness informed Kimball that he had come to get his money from the Chapins, and if he did not pay him in fifteen minutes he would blow up the whole plot. Kimball said if he did he would blow up $60,000. Kimball agreed to meet him in New York and pay him his demand, if the insurance money could be obtained. But he failed to obtain the money. Witness again threatened, and said he would expose the whole transaction. Kimball said Cole was never yet caught. Some time after this he saw Capt. Cummings, the Chapins, Cole, Kimball, and others, and told them that they had got to pay him. The Chapins complained that the offices would not pay. Witness asked for bills of purchase. Was informed that the bills had been burnt by Chaney, the purchaser from Cole, supposing they were of no importance. This was the forepart of June. Chaney was a brother-in-law of L. Cole, and had bought out Cole, and was carrying on the business at the same place. Adams Chapin said Filley & Chapin had put $5,400 in the boat. Witness saw Scarborough and had some conversation with him respecting the transaction. Also had some conversation with Filley, after his father had been out to see him. Cole and Kimball had an interest in the shipment. Witness told the Chapins they had never shipped the sheep skins. The next visit the witness paid to Cincinnati his life was threatened. Amasa and Lorenzo Chapin came into his room at the Dennison House, and inquired what he was going to do with or to them. This was the 20th October, 1852. Witness replied that he was going to take them through. They said they were too hard for that. The witness replied, we will see. The witness received letters from Filley & Chapin, asking him to forward to them sheep skins. At the time the witness sold to the Chapins 160 dozen of sheep skins, he deposited with them 182 dozen, which were stored. Chapins gave him a note for his accommodation, to pay for the skins sold by him. The defendants said they had not bought 50 dozen of sheep skins, except from him. This remark was made by Adams Chapin, Filley, and Rufus Chapin. On cross-examination, the witness said that the 160 dozen were all the skins which witness sold to the Chapins the last time. Paper presented, signed by witness, for 112 dozen afterward. Witness took 2,900 dozen sheep skins in the years 1849-50 to New Orleans; 5,000 dozen during the spring and summer of 1850; 6,000 dozen in 1851. He says 100,000 dozen might have been manufactured in Cincinnati in 1851. The firm of Filley & Chapin, at the time of its failure, owed the witness $2,560. Adams Chapin asked him of whom they got the sheep skins. Said they got them from the witness, and the witness answered it was right. The witness, then inquired of whom they got the sole leather. They replied, from different persons. Witness asked in regard to several sums of money alleged to have been received by him from certain insurance offices, which question was objected to; but the court held that the witness might be called to explain the facts attempted to be proved, as to moneys received by him, as such facts were intended to be used against him. The witness admitted the receipt of $5,500 from the insurance offices, and, in addition, $7,000, which had been advanced by his brother, who lives in Vermont, as a loan.

Mr. Darr—In Milne's office payment was made for the Martha Washington. A deposit was made, to secure the purchase, in Milne's bank. The following sums were paid: By McGregor, $1,000; check of Smith & Kissane, $1,000; by Capt. Cummings, $1,100; in currency, $1,700; transferred credit to McGregor, $2,000.

Capt. Ross—Boat was registered in the name of Choate, because there was a judgment of fifteen or sixteen hundred dollars against Capt. Cummings in New Orleans. One trip in the name of Choate.

Mr. Bretonhall—In 1851 lived in Cleveland. In the winter of 1851 Chapin applied to him for white sole leather, and said he could not get white sole leather for use. Said he could not get it at Cincinnati. This was before Christmas.

The testimony on the part of the prosecution having closed, Mr. Ewing, of counsel for defendants, moved that Kimball be discharged, on the ground that no evidence had been given which inculpated him, in any respect.

The defendant rose as soon as his counsel had closed his remarks, and expressed a wish that the motion made by the counsel should not be insisted on. That he would abide the fate of those who were associated with him in the indictment. The counsel then waived the motion.

The counsel for the defendants called their witnesses. Many of them answered to the call—others did not. An inquiry was then made of the court by the defendants' counsel, whether it was necessary the witnesses should be sworn, to entitle them to claim their fees. The court intimated that it might be considered necessary for the witnesses to be sworn, by the accounting officers of the treasury, and that it would be the safer course to swear them. At the same time the court said they did not consider it necessary. The counsel then observed that they did not intend to examine all the witnesses summoned, but only those that were considered the most important. And as it was near the adjourning hour, the defendants' counsel stated that if the court would adjourn for dinner, it being within thirty minutes of the time, the counsel would so arrange their testimony as to shorten the time of examination. On that condition the court rose until two o'clock.

After the close of the testimony by the United States, Judge Walker, in the defense, made the following statement:

May it please the court: The duty of making a preliminary statement of the points for the defense has been assigned to me. And, as I am, in this, to speak for all the counsel, and all the defendants, it became necessary, as I thought, to reduce this statement to writing, and submit it to my associates for their approbation. The same reason makes it proper that I should confine myself now to what I have written. I therefore ask leave to read to the jury what I have now to say. I think this course will conduce both to brevity and precision.

Gentlemen of the Jury: You have listened to the preliminary statement on the part of the government, and have seen how far the promises then made have been performed. You are now to hear from the other side, and in the theory of jury trials, your minds are still as open and uncommitted as when you first entered that box. This is the theory; and I trust it is the fact. I hope and trust that you are prepared to listen to our defense patiently, candidly, earnestly and without bias. The parental government under which we live desires no victims. These defendants are as much her children as you and I; and she has deputed you, their brethren, to try them, under a solemn injunction to presume them innocent until guilt is proved. The burthen of this proof she takes wholly upon herself, giving to the accused the benefit of every doubt. For it is better, far better, that ninety-nine guilty persons should escape human punishment, than that one innocent person should suffer it. The meaning of "verdict" is a "true word"; and this true word you have sworn to pronounce as to each of these prisoners. You are not required to find the same verdict as to all. You can convict some and acquit others, if the testimony so requires; but you can convict no one unless your minds are forced to that result by evidence which is irresistible. I do not say that you must find innocence impossible; but I do say that you must find guilt morally certain. It must be one of those strong probabilities, bordering so closely upon certainty, that in any of the most grave concerns of life, you would treat it as a certainty, and as such, stake your life or liberty upon it, if the occasion required. Your verdict is to be in form positive—"Guilty" or "Not guilty." But in practice this does not mean that you feel absolutely sure of guilt, or sure of innocence. If you say "Guilty," it implies that the evidence so clearly preponderates that way, that you do not find room for a reasonable doubt. If you say "Not guilty," it implies that guilt is not satisfactorily proved—not that the defendants are necessarily and undoubtedly innocent; but that they may be innocent—perhaps are innocent. It means what the Scotch verdict of "not proven" means—that government has not performed what it undertook, namely, to convince you of guilt.

I shall make no appeal to your sympathy, but only to your perception of truth, and sense of justice. Be sure of guilt before you pronounce the irrevocable word, for, so far as you are concerned, that word will remain irrevocable until the day of judgment; and not only be sure of guilt, but of the particular guilt charged in the indictment. No matter what other acts, whether criminal or illegal, these defendants, or some of them, may have committed, if they are not proved guilty of this very crime, they must be acquitted.

What, then, is the charge perferred against these men? It is, that they conspired together to burn this boat with intent to injure underwriters. You have been told that the offense is complete, when the conspiracy is formed,—that no overt act is necessary, and the like. This is true. But then the conspiracy must be definitely found to have been formed for this object, namely, to burn the boat; and with this intent, namely, to injure underwriters. A conspiracy for any other object, or with any other intent, is not within the indictment. You might, for instance, be satisfied that there was an intention to commit fraud; but if it were against any other persons than underwriters—as creditors, for example,—or against underwriters by any other instrumentality than the burning of the boat, you could not convict. You are tied down by the statute and the indictment, to the fact of a conspiracy for this single object, with this single intent. You are to find that all these men, or so many of them as you convict, actually agreed together to burn this boat with this intent. It need not be proved that they all met together at any one time, or in any one place; or that they wrote their names or plighted their oaths to this agreement. But, in some way or other, and at some time or other, before the burning of the boat, all who can be charged as conspirators, must have actually entered into this specific agreement; and this great leading fact as the soul and body of the offense, must be established by such definite and cogent proofs, as leaves no room for any other conclusion. I would lay great stress upon this position; and, therefore, I repeat that the actual formation of this specific agreement and none other—including this very subject, object, and intent—must be substantively and conclusively proved.

Now the proof offered in this case is wholly circumstantial. No eye saw, no ear heard them actually conspiring together. No two of them were ever seen together under circumstances not entirely compatible with perfect innocence. I mean precisely what I say. No witness ever saw any two or more of these men together, when their being so, created in his mind the slightest suspicion that they meditated crime. They met as acquaintances, openly and publicly, and chatted as acquaintances, and that was all. The evidence, then, is wholly circumstantial, and, in the strictest sense of the word, not merely not positive, but the farthest from it possible. And although I do not deny that a verdict may properly be found on circumstantial evidence alone, if it be strong enough, yet I do not aver the settled rule to be, that in weighing circumstantial evidence, every circumstance is to be rejected, as proving guilt, which can exist consistently and compatibly with innocence.

There is another important rule with reference to the amount of evidence, which is, that it must be proportioned to the enormity of the offense. You would not convict for murder upon as slight evidence as for assault and battery, or petty larceny. This rule proceeds upon the idea that men are not fiends or devils—that in the most depraved there is still some good left, something to which stupendous crime is still abhorrent. Now, the charge here is of a stupendous crime—one of the deepest dye imaginable. When you come to analyze it, you can hardly conceive that men stamped with the form of humanity, could concoct or perpetrate it. And hence you will require the very strongest evidence to make you believe it—almost the ocular proof—for the first impulse of every person, not utterly depraved, is to say, "it is incredible—I cannot believe it—it is too monstrous for belief—I should almost doubt my own eyes," and the like strong expressions.

There is one error which jurors not accustomed to weigh circumstantial evidence, are very liable to fall into. It is, to have regard for the number of the circumstances rather than their nature. And upon this the prosecution appears to have calculated largely. Now, circumstances are not like faggots, where each faggot adds just so much more to the bundle, but rather like the separate links of a chain, where the strength of the chain depends not upon the number of links, but upon the strength of each individual link. We might not be able, and certainly cannot be required to break this entire bundle of faggots, which government has tied so industriously together. But in this chain of evidence, which has been so long and so laboriously forging, we may be expected, and certainly shall be able to break many of the links, and so, we trust, sunder the entire chain. And in what manner we expect to do this, it is now my province to inform you.

Previous acquaintance.—We expected to satisfy you that this acquaintance was not general, but quite limited; that each was not acquainted with all the rest, but some were strangers down to the time of arrest, never having even seen each other. But the fact that some, who are proved to have met, were acquaintances, so far from being cause of suspicion, would fully account for their occasional meetings. It was the most natural thing in the world, that they should meet, and meet often; and it is therefore, most strange, and indicative of a desperate case, that this fact of previous acquaintance, should be turned against them.

Relationship.—The four Chapins are brothers, and Cummings and Kimball married their sisters. But what has this to do with proving a conspiracy? I submit to any juror, looking into his own heart, to say whether the last person whom he could make a confidant of crime, would not be his own brother—whether some hallowed memories would not cry out against it. But, however this may be, the fact of being brothers entirely accounts for their being together so often, and acting so much with and for each other.

Meetings—Much time has been taken up in proving that some of these parties did, several times, meet and talk together—at McGrew's boarding-house—at the Walnut Street House—at the store of Law—and at the store of Filley & Chapin—not that all or so many as half, even, did meet at any one time or place,—or in any secret or suspicious place—any den, dark room, or cavern,—or that they kept a watch or spoke in whispers, or wore disguises, or started at strange sounds, as conspirators would be likely to do, but simply that they met in open day, in the most public places, and talked politics, and laughed and joked, like any other persons. This is the whole extent, and it looks like arrant trifling, unless more were proved. It may show, that being thus together, and knowing each other, they could appoint meetings somewhere else, to form a conspiracy, if so disposed; but it does not even tend to show that they were so disposed, or did meet elsewhere, or did conspire. I would refer you, as a specimen of this whole class of witnesses, to L'Hommedieu, the president of a bank, who came all the way from Cincinnati to testify, that while boarding at the Walnut Street House, he saw three or four of these defendants, talking together three or four times—two certainly—exactly as they talked with all their acquaintances, and as all other people talk together.

Motives—When a great crime is charged, we naturally look for an adequate motive; and where several persons are charged with committing it, we expect an equally powerful motive as to all. This proceeds upon the idea that the veriest human monster, not absolutely insane, will not gratuitously and in mere wantonness, commit a great crime. Now the only motive here presented is, gain by false insurances—and this could only apply to those who had effected insurances either wholly fictitious or greatly overvalued—and could not apply, either to those who had no insurance, or had insurance under the actual value; because they must inevitably be losers by the destruction of the boat. And we submit that there is no sufficient proof that any one of the defendants had an insurance wholly fictitious, or overvalued. At the very most a suspicion only is created in any instance; and although it is impossible, generally, to prove a negative, we expect to come so near to it, as to remove any suspicion which has been thrown over these insurances.

As to the insinuation that here was a joint stock concern, or co-partnership, in which all were to share the gains in some agreed propositions, it is a mere insinuation, unsupported by a particle of proof. There is no evidence which even tends that way.

Purchase of the boat.—It is claimed that this was the first overt act in pursuance of a conspiracy, previously formed. But we expect to satisfy you, that in this there was nothing in the slightest degree suspicious—that Cummings was the sole owner, though Choate's name was used, to avoid a seizure at New Orleans—that he paid $9,000, which was all the means he had, and raised at the moment with no small difficulty—a difficulty which all the alleged conspirators together could not have experienced—that the value was less than first asked, and not an extravagant one—that the season was one of the best, and she would probably have paid for herself in three or four trips—that so far from being consummated in a hurry, the negotiation was postponed for one whole trip, to get the means together, and, in short, that every thing connected with the purchase, had the appearance of a fair business transaction—and so with the insurance. The boat was only insured for half her cost, $4,500, and the freight list for about two-thirds, or $2,500, which last would have been considerably less, but for the advice of McGregor and Choate.

The alleged false shipments.—The proof by the government is wholly of a negative character. Dealers in leather do not believe Filley & Chapin had 200 sides of white sole leather; nor dealers in sheepskins that they had 1,600 dozen of them. Those who casually visited their store and factory, do not believe they had so many boxes of boots, &c., as purport to have been shipped. McGrew and his son think Edwards must have been a pauper dependent upon Stephens, and Stephens an adventurer without much means. These are fair specimens of this whole class of evidence. Now, we expect to meet this negative testimony, as to all who are here upon trial, by positive evidence that the goods were there. In this we shall not assail the veracity of the government witnesses, because they swear to no facts. But we shall satisfy you that one affirmative is worth a hundred such negatives. With respect to Filley & Chapin, we do not deny that they were attempting to place their property beyond the reach of their creditors. This, though not proper, is what many men in failing circumstances have done before; and so far from tending to prove a conspiracy, it actually explains many circumstances which might otherwise appear suspicious. It accounts for the sale to Cole, their largest creditor, which was a real transaction. It accounts for their consignment to Kimball, and for the shipment by Adams Chapin. They were threatened with executions, and were determined to keep in their own hands the means of compounding with creditors. We do not contend that this was right, but we shall satisfy you that it was the fact. And, that in this view they did not regard a little loss by shipping to an Eastern market. To them it was not like sending coals to Newcastle.

The capacity of the boat.—Here again we shall array positive against negative testimony. We shall show that the boat was loaded to her utmost capacity; and that, too, by the advice of the pilot, that she might run better through the floating ice. We shall also show that her capacity was fully equal to all that was claimed to be on board, whether we regard weight or bulk.

Developments of the wreck.—It is claimed that as no remains of leather, or skins, or boxes, were discovered, they never could have been on board. If we had not positive proof to the contrary, as we have, this inference would not be justified, because we shall satisfy you of the probability, at least, that what was not consumed by the flames, was washed out and sunk, before the wreckers took possession. As to the conduct of Holland in leaving the wreck as he did, no one can blame him; and even if he deserved blame, it does not either make a conspiracy or prove one. The same remarks apply to Chandler, who received the savings by order of the captain, and offered to pay over the proceeds, but was refused. As to Holland, he certainly appropriated nothing to himself, but lost all. His life was threatened by those land pirates. He had no suitable clothing or shelter, and he could do no good by remaining. As to Cummings, he came to the wreck by the first boat, and did all he could through Taggart & McNeil. He put nothing in his own pocket, but simply made the things saved pay the salvage. The rest was placed in charge of Chandler, who is not here to answer for his conduct. He may have pocketed some of the savings, but this is no proof of a conspiracy. He certainly was not on or near the boat when burned, but came up with Cummings from New Orleans.

The suspected insurances.—I presume it is evident that no investigation was ever conducted with greater pecuniary means, or with more zeal, industry, and ability—which money can always purchase—than this. And yet, with all this outlay, there has not been discovered a single instance of double insurance, or a single instance of over insurance, or a single instance of simulated freight. By this last I mean, that nothing of cargo has been found which was not what it purported to be—no barrels or boxes filled with bricks, or stones, or scraps of iron, or sand, or any other false contents. Yet, any one who has read the cases of conspiracy to defraud, either by false shipments or false insurances, must be aware that these are the contrivances generally resorted to. While here, the insurances are either wholly real, or wholly fictitious. There were no effigies. The goods were all there, or none there; and there was no seeming substitute. There was the actual thing, or nothing. This is one very remarkable feature of the case; and another is, that most of the insurances are proved by the government to have been real. The insurance on the boat was real, and for only half her actual cost. The insurance on the freight list was real, and for much less than its actual amount. Cummings would have had it about one-third, but was persuaded by McGregor and Choate to put it up to $2,500, which was still much below its real value. So the bar insured by Nicholson in his own name—not in the name of Laws, as was testified by Chew—was a real thing; and no one who has traveled on steamboats can doubt that $500 was a small valuation for the right to the bar, and the fixtures and liquors. Kissane's insurance was all the way to California—a useless waste, if the boat was never to reach New Orleans. The same remark applies to the ample outfit of the boat, and the supply of wood immediately before the burning. Conspirators for money would have been more saving.

The letter of Kissane.—I trust you will read this letter very carefully, and more than once. I have done so; and it seems to me to be the natural outpouring of an almost broken-hearted, but innocent man. It has the hope and faith of an innocent man. Its caution to Nicholson, not to be arrested at present, and to take care of his papers, are justified by his own experience, when arrested, manacled, and searched, "like a dog," as he says; and by the public clamor then so rife against all concerned. Its reference to Pugh and Gallagher does not in any way implicate those gentlemen, and simply looks to a fair trial, conducted by a prosecutor not hostile, and before a jury not packed. Its reference to the Chapins, though not altogether kind, is entirely harmless, referring only to placing their property beyond the reach of creditors. In short, there is not a word in it which an innocent man, whether under accusation or not, might not write to a friend who was under such an accusation as this; or such a suspicion as is referred to in the beginning of the letter—I mean that of the forgery—which may have been the object of writing the letter. As to obtaining possession of this letter, it is manifest that he considered its interception an outrage, which justified its recaption in any manner, and in this he will find many to agree with him. This violation of letters, for any purpose, is in itself a high crime.

Burning of the boat.—This is charged as the object of the alleged conspiracy. The boat was actually burned, and you are asked to infer that the burning was by design—that she was set on fire purposely, and in pursuance of a previous agreement. This is the whole strength of the case made by the prosecution. If it fails here, it fails altogether. But why are you required to draw this inference? Certainly not from the mere fact of burning. Hundreds of boats have been burned before, and the same boat has been on fire fifty times in a year—so says Captain Irwin—and no such inference was drawn. But it is said the circumstances indicate design; and I admit that if this be so—if this boat was designedly and not accidentally burned—then some of these defendants ought to be convicted; but, on the other hand, if this boat was accidentally and nor designedly burned, then there is not proof enough to create even a suspicion of guilt. Here, as I said, is the turning point of the case. Now, no eye saw how the fire originated. The evidence is wholly circumstantial, and the conclusion must be drawn from a comparison of probabilities. The time was shortly after midnight. The weather was the coldest ever known. The place was the middle of the river, where the water was fifty feet deep, and the distance to the shore some 300 yards. That shore, too, was a steep, bluff bank, almost perpendicular, and with no shoal water. If the tiller rope should take fire, the boat would never reach the shore. If it did reach the shore, there was no place for fastening, and she could not be stranded. If any should plunge into the river, to save themselves by swimming, they must be chilled instantly. In a word, when the fire was first discovered, the probabilities were a hundred to one, yes, a thousand to one, that not one soul would escape. Nothing but the wonderful self-possession and precaution of the pilot—first, in turning the boat to the shore when he smelt fire before he saw it; and secondly, in directing the engineer to keep one of the engines working after the boat reached the shore, in order to keep her there, when she could not be fastened, because the rope was frozen—together with the blessed escape of the tiller rope from the rapid flame—nothing but this saved one soul from perishing. Besides, if the boat was to be burned, there was no occasion for doing it then and there, but everything—even the horrors of suicide and murder—suicide of the three conspiring officers, and murder of all the rest, passengers and crew—against the selection of that time and place. The boat had just wooded; been locked to the shore for nearly an hour. Why not fire her then; when all the persons who might detect the act were busy on shore, and when every soul on board might escape? Why so uselessly heap up crime; murder upon arson, and both upon conspiracy? Why create the necessity of those heroic acts, by which, after the burning wreck reached the shore, the captain and mate would have lost their lives, but for the accident of a skiff from a flat boat coming to their deliverance? Why play a game of hazard against such tremendous odds? Why not avoid gratuitous murder, which was committed if they burned the boat, and motiveless suicide, which was in the highest degree probable? We expect to satisfy you, beyond all doubt, that the burning was accidental, and that there was not even a rumor of suspicion to the contrary, until got up by the insurance companies long after.

The absence of three of the accused.—The government endeavors to make something out of the fact, that three of the accused are not here to stand their trial. Stephens has never been arrested, and we know not where he is. Chandler was arrested, but discharged upon the preliminary examination, and not again arrested. We know not where he is. So that neither of these can be truly said to have absconded. Nicholson, it is true, has forfeited his bail, and we know not where he is. But, as to these three, we assume these positions: First, the other defendants, who are here, are in no way responsible for their acts, any further than they are, by other evidence, connected with them; and, secondly, as a consequence of the first, they can not be expected to explain those acts. It is enough for them to be required to explain their own, or such of them as are susceptible of explanation. But acts, in themselves innocent, require no explanation. And as to the acts of the absent, it is enough to say, that any explanation by us is not to be expected, for want of the means of information. It would be requiring us to do the impossible.

The presence of nine of the accused.—If the absence of three of the accused affords any presumption against them, then the presence of the nine affords an equally strong presumption in their favor. We expect to show you that long before their first arrest they were apprised of the suspicions whispered against them, and might have fled without involving bail. That Holland, hearing of the arrest of others, gave notice where he might be found and arrested. That Adams Chapin, Rufus Chapin, and Kimball, never were arrested, but voluntarily surrendered themselves. That all the nine, except Kissane, have been on bail ever since, and he remained on bail until reasons not connected with this case, recently deprived him of this privilege. Yet these nine, with the most ample opportunities for escape, are all here to meet the gravest charge ever preferred against men. And because they are here, under these circumstances, we claim for them the benefit of the very strong presumption thus created in their favor. For, unless conscious of innocence, why are they here?

Combinations against them.—We expect to satisfy you that the merit of standing trial, although conscious of innocence, is greatly enhanced by two considerations. In the first place, a large and influential portion of the press—not all, for there have been some noble exceptions—has, from the first hour of arrest up to this hour, pursued them with a malignity and pertinacity wholly unexampled—piling up surmise upon surmise, rumor upon rumor, and falsehood upon falsehood, day after day, and month after month, until a public opinion has been manufactured which might well appal the stoutest heart. That this persecution has followed them into this very court-house, and poured forth its venom upon court and counsel, for the sole reason that in order to secure a fair trial, these poisoned influences were excluded from this room; yet these men thus hunted down and pre-condemned, are, nevertheless, here. In the second place, there is a combination back of these newspapers, not a whit less, but even still more formidable—a conspiracy among numerous corporations, wielding millions of capital, and reaching all over the Union, to procure the conviction of these men—some of them too poor to pay either counsel or witnesses; in pursuance of which conspiracy, venal newspapers have been subsidized, and agents of all sorts from respectable down to base and basest, hired at large expense to effect their purpose. Yet, these men, who might have been elsewhere, have dared to defy this tremendous moneyed power, exerting itself through these most formidable agencies. Why have they not long ere this placed themselves where no extradition treaty could reach them?—as, indeed, the district attorney, at the last term, predicted they would—and said that nothing short of Omnipotence could keep them here, if out on bail. Yet these men are here!

Sueing the insurance companies.—Much stress appears to be laid on the fact that, in every instance where the insurance money has not been paid, suit has been brought. We expect to satisfy you that this is a circumstance wholly in our favor—that it is precisely the course which honest men would and do take. Had they refrained from prosecuting when payment was refused, and the reason stated, viz; the intentional burning of the boat, it would have looked as if they feared to face an investigation. But, by commencing suits, and thus defying the insurance companies, they have either exhibited a foolhardiness which is inexplicable, or a consciousness of innocence which is irresistible. No one can doubt that if these claims had been given up, this prosecution would never have been gotten up. This is manifest from what transpired at the meeting of the underwriters, as testified by Choate. All they wanted was to avoid payment. Public justice was nothing to them then, and they even now say they have been opposed to this prosecution.

Conduct of the defendants.—The general character of the defendants has not been put in issue, and is not therefore a subject of comment. But their previous position in society, and their conduct generally, from the time when the conspiracy is alleged to have been formed, up to the present moment, are in issue, and are fair subjects of proof and comment; and in this connection I desire to call your attention to several points. Most of them are heads of families, occupying respectable positions, and for whom they reputably provide,—and have wives and children who love and depend upon them. Most of them have been engaged in regular business, which they have pursued attentively and industriously, until they came to meet you here. In their transaction of business, connected with the lading of this boat, there are some matters which the government thinks suspicious; but so do not I. For instance, Kissane, without any disguise of handwriting, or otherwise, filled up some of Cole's invoices, he being better acquainted with such transactions, and having made sales to Cole. So Cole used Filley & Chapin's blanks, after his purchase, striking out their names, and inserting his. In like manner, some of Smith & Kissane's blank bills of lading were used on this boat for other persons, by striking out their names, and inserting others. Now, these things are precisely what conspirators, watchful to cover up every track, would not have done; and yet precisely what innocent men, thinking no evil, and therefore taking no precaution, would be very likely to do. And the same remark applies generally to the perfect openness and apparent unconsciousness which characterize all their conduct. It is to be remembered, that from a period not definitely fixed, but certainly anterior to the purchase of the boat, according to the hypothesis of government, each of these defendants had become the depository of a guilty secret—a horrid and horrible secret—one which the human heart was never made to hold—which would struggle for utterance continually—through every word, and look, and act, and if the possessor were one instant off his guard, must and would betray him; and yet, although by the most wonderful retrospection ever brought to bear upon the past, the behavior of these men during that awful period has been scrutinized, as it were, with an universal eye, not one word, or look, or act, has been discovered which indicates the hiding of so tremendous a secret. Think of this, gentlemen, more especially after the boat had started—could those who were left behind, in dread suspense, sleep as usual, eat as usual, or work, or talk, or act, as usual? It is not possible. The good God never made his creatures to be capable of such "seeming."

But this is not all. The boat was burned, many of the insurances paid, and then suspicions were excited. At first they were only whispered in the secret conclave of the underwriters. To that they were to be confined, and the conduct of the suspected most carefully and secretly watched. But there was one noble-hearted man—himself afterwards most treacherously charged, and then discharged—I mean Capt. Choate—who demanded an open proceeding by arrest, or he would make known the secret charge. The open proceeding was declined, and he did make known the accusation and machinations of this conclave of underwriters, of which one Mason was the most prominent actor. The first result was that Cummings chastised him. This would be the first impulse of an innocent, but the last of a guilty man. If the accusation was false, the verdict of every manly heart would be, "served him right." Most innocent men would right such a wrong in some way or other. They chose this way. But I am not here to defend the charge of assault and battery. However much Mason was battered, he has his remedy elsewhere. What I wish you to observe is, that from the moment of the first promulgation of suspicion—nay, from the moment it came to be secretly entertained, down to this moment—the conduct of these men has been watched with more than the eyes of Argus—not by retrospection, as before, but by direct and most concentrated vision. And yet I aver that since that time, and down to this, there is not one look, or word, or act, of any of the defendants here on trial, which is not consistent with perfect innocence. If there be, you will be able to put your finger on it. But I am entirely confident that their behavior will stand the severest scrutiny. They have not behaved like guilty men, and do not now behave so. I am satisfied that you must have expected to meet a very different sort of men, when you came to try so grave a charge.

General aspect of the evidence.—I think, gentlemen, that you must have been disappointed, as I certainly have been, in the kind of evidence upon which you are asked to find a verdict of conviction. The learned counsel has repeatedly said in your hearing that the evidence would "grow up" as the case progressed. I presume he meant as "tall oaks from little acorns grow." We have had enough of the little acorns to plant a forest, but I can not see one of the tall oaks. It seems to me that the spirit and vigor of the attack have not at all come up to the lofty phrase of the manifesto. Considering the long time for preparation, the vast expenditure of money and labor to get up the case, and the consummate ability of all sorts employed, to say nothing of some of the means—I say, considering all these things, it would not be unreasonable to expect some very clear and definite proof, both of the actual formation of the conspiracy to burn the boat, and of the actual burning of the boat by design, in pursuance of such conspiracy. For this conspiracy, as charged, is a very distinct and definite thing. It must have had a subject, object, and intent,—a beginning, middle, and end. Some one must have first suggested it to some other one, and he to another, and so on, until all were initiated as conspirators. There must have been a time, place, and manner of doing all this. And there must have been some momentous details to be arranged—as how many and who were to be let into the perilous secret.

Should passengers be received for gratuitous murder? Should cargo be taken on board for gratuitous destruction? To what extent should useless supplies be taken, or useless insurances be effected? When and where should the boat be burned, and who should apply the torch? All of these and many more details entered into the idea of this conspiracy, if there was one. And yet there is not a single item in this vast account as to which you have any definite proof. You can not say with whom, or when, or where the conspiracy originated, or how it was formed, or how it was to be executed. All is vague, shadowy, and uncertain. Instead of that clear light by which you might see the truth unmistakably, you are asked to grope along, through mist and fog, and feel your way from fact to fact, until you get through this "mighty maze," without a plan. You are asked to construe negative testimony into positive—possibilities into certainties—proof of what men could do, into proof of what they did—to supply from imagination what is wanting in the testimony—in short, to convict these men upon private suspicion and public clamor, all got up and fomented by interested corporations—bodies politic and corporate, but without souls. Are you prepared for this? I trust not, and I think the evidence now to be introduced will make clear the innocence of the defendants.

The witnesses for the defense were then examined in the following order:

Isaac Cough—Was the partner of Capt. Choate. He was asleep on the starboard side, in the front room. Looked over the larboard side when waked by the ringing of the bell and stamping of Capt. Choate, and saw the fire breaking up near the chimney. Went down on the derrick to the lower deck, where he found the hands in great confusion. Capt. Cummings was without a coat, exerting himself to the utmost to rescue the passengers. The cold was intense.

Mr. Williams—Was on board the Martha Washington in 1848 and 1849 as mate. The boat was apt to take fire. It was on fire fifteen or twenty times while witness was mate. The boat was liable to take fire on the larboard side from the chimney. Witness never knew a boat sink from overloading. The fires spoken of by witness generally took place from the chimney on the larboard side of the boat, the same where the fire occurred when the boat was burnt. The boat will carry 650 tons. On being cross-examined, the witness stated that in the last up-river trip of the boat, she took fire three times in one day, from the same chimney. This was on the Mississippi river under the command of Capt. Irwin. Never knew fire to take place on the starboard side from the chimney.

Andrew Wilson—Witness has been on the river since 1841. Has been a mate on other boats. The Martha Washington will carry 700 tons.

Jesse Campbell—Has been on the river ten or twelve years. The steamboat Charles Hammond is the same size as the Martha Washington. The Charles Hammond can carry 700 tons. After her guards are reached by the water, the Charles Hammond could carry 150 tons. Witness says it is a common occurrence for boats to take fire from the chimney. The Daniel Webster took fire from chimney, and thirty persons on board of her were lost. The witness was at the place where the boat was burnt. It was a most unfavorable place for landing. The banks were high and steep—in some places almost perpendicular.

John Bergamire—Witness was assistant engineer on board the Martha Washington. Was on her two months before as third engineer. Saw candle boxes piled up on deck on both sides—extended back to wash house on the larboard side. While fires were being made at the wharf in Cincinnati saw persons engaged in carrying sole leather on board the boat. The witness thinks from seventy-five to one hundred rolls were taken in, noticed or observed by him. Witness don't remember that he ever saw a boat more heavily loaded than the Martha Washington. Was sleeping in the second room; was awakened by the cry of fire; saw fire on the larboard side; went down to the lower deck on the starboard side; jumped from the bow to reach the log in the river, which extended to the shore; did not reach it and fell into the river; the boat was some twenty or thirty feet from the shore; swam to the shore. The witness was cross-examined as to the sole leather. Did not count the rolls; estimated them.

Mr. Painter—The Martha Washington would carry 650 tons and upwards. Twenty tons in addition would have little effect. Witness has been a mate; says the mate directs the loading to be put on board. Fires on boats are common; generally from the chimney. The Charles Hammond will carry rather more freight than the Martha Washington.

C. E. Nourse—In December, 1851, the stock of Filley & Chapin was large; three rooms fifty or sixty feet deep; contained boxes filled with boots and shoes. The Chapins owned, as they said, $40,000 or $50,000 worth of stock. Witness advanced them money at different times. They owed witness between two and three thousand dollars. They paid him in March, 1852. Witness did not look into the boxes—they were piled upon each other. Chaney made the arrangement for loans, after Cole's purchase.

Mr. Titus—From the 26th December to the 6th of January, 1852, witness was through the houses of Chapins. Made an estimate of the stock at from $20,000 to $25,000. Witness had several conversations with Burton. He said he thought they would fail. Said they had sold their stock to Cole. They had stock in the second and third stories.

James F. Painter—Was mate on the Martha Washington four or five months. Has seen the boat take fire around the chimney outside the casing; also from below. The Martha Washington could carry 650 tons; might carry more, but can't tell. Witness was never on a boat which was not liable to take fire. Tin cased the chimney, but it cracked in 1850, so that one could see on the bulkhead.

John Lynch—Was on the Martha Washington under Capt. Cummings as bar keeper. Is now employed on one of the Lake Erie boats. There were piled up in the social hall of the Martha Washington, boxes, rolls of paper, and brooms. The witness slept next door to the office. When he awoke the social hall was on fire. Witness knows Brown, owner of the America, on which boat witness is engaged on Lake Erie. Never told Brown he believed the boat was set on fire, nor that he could do the defendants no good. Never heard any suspicion expressed, about the time of the fire, that the boat had been set on fire.

Wm. Grady—Lives at St. Louis. Followed the river five or six years. He was pantryman on board the Martha Washington. Saw sole leather carried down about dark, before the boat left the wharf at Cincinnati. The leather was put down the hole. Boxes were piled up in and outside the social hall; paper bundles were laid on them, and brooms were laid on the paper. There was plenty of provisions on board for the trip to New Orleans. The boat was loaded within six inches of the guards. When witness first heard the bell he saw the blaze through the green slats near the chimney, extending to the social hall. These slats were on a false door on the larboard side, near the chimney. The witness says the blaze was through the slats, but the paper was not then on fire. Witness saw sheep skins piled up nearly to the roof. Saw delivered to the boat, at Cincinnati, three or four dray loads of white sole leather.

J. C. Waller—Witness lives near Louisville, Ky. Went down the river as a passenger on board the Martha Washington, on business, to St. Joseph. He slept on the second berth of the gangway; went to bed about eleven o'clock. Heard the bell ringing, and stamping on the deck, and a cry of fire. The boat was very heavily loaded—passengers complained of it.

John Snethen—Witness is a farmer. Was four years on the river, and was fireman on the Martha Washington the last trip. Witness saw leather brought on board at Cincinnati, in the afternoon and after night. When the alarm of fire was given witness went forward. Saw the fire at the chimney on the larboard side. He took the cable on shore; jumped to a log and fastened the cable to a tree. The boat was loaded very deep. Heard no suspicions that the boat had been set on fire. On cross-examination, witness was inquired of whether he had been with Clark, the attorney. Witness said he had been twice to see Kissane, but had not been with Clark. He saw white sole leather on board; was piled pretty nearly over all the freight. Sheep skins were stowed on deck, and in the hold. Hands sat upon the sheep skins—some of the firemen ate there.

Mr. McLaughlin—Witness helped load the boat; was hired for that purpose the 6th or 7th of January. Large quantities of candle boxes were brought on board, and also large quantities of leather in rolls—some of these rolls were put in the engine room, more in the hold. One hundred bales of sheep skins, more or less, were brought on board. The hands were loading the boat until eleven o'clock at night. On cross-examination, witness said white sole leather was put on board at Cincinnati.

Robert Lemon—In 1851 witness was employed by Filley & Chapin. The hands made a week from 100 to 150 pairs of boots; never less than from 70 to 75. The usual amount of sole leather on hand was from one to three thousand sides—kept in the second and third stories of the building occupied by them. In the stores the leather was kept in the cellar. They had an unusual quantity of calf skins. They had the largest stock he ever saw. The witness has been at Cincinnati four years. There were on hand twenty-five or more bales of sheep skins, and as much more stored. This witness prepared for the shipment, early in January, 1852, 200 cases of boots. The hands were busy in preparing the shipments. Remembers that the 200 cases of boots were let down from the second story of the building. Two persons nailed the boxes. Twenty-five rolls of sole leather were also let down. There was a much larger quantity in the cellar of the store. There were twenty-five or thirty bales of sheep skins at the factory. After the shipment there was very little of the stock left. There was nothing left in the Main street store. Mr. Chaney carries on the same business. One half the sole leather was white, or, at least, there was that proportion of white sole leather. On cross-examination, the witness says the sheep skins were brought down the river about the same time. Saw a man marking the boxes which contained the boots. Lyman Cole bought out the establishment about the middle of December.

Benjamin Earl—The witness has lived in Cincinnati nine years. Was the salesman of Filley & Chapin a year, and up to the sale to Cole. The firm owed witness five or six thousand dollars. To secure this sum the Madison policy was assigned to witness. Witness believes that by the sale to Cole, and the shipment, they intended to cheat their creditors. Witness having borrowed, on his own credit, $1,200 from Kissane, for Filley & Chapin, and to secure the payment, he assigned to Kissane, on the above policy, $1,500. When the loan was made it was to be returned in a few days. Filley & Chapin had borrowed money from Cole, and the sale was made to him to pay the borrowed money. Burton never went with witness through the rooms of the factory or other buildings occupied by the Chapins, and if Burton went through the rooms it must have been after the sale to Cole. The Chapins had rising of twelve hundred sides of sole leather. They dealt largely in sheep skins. The shipments were made by the Chapins to get the money into their pockets. Kissane got boots from the company. The books of the firm were not kept as the witness would have kept them. Soon after Cole took possession, bought great quantities of sole leather, white and red. He remembers fifty bales were bought at once, which was the largest purchase at one time. Burton left the 182 dozen of sheep skins—took notes, which he was to protect, if skins should not be sold. Ninety-eight cases of boots the greatest number sent to the store in one week. There were employed in the establishment from 150 to 175 hands. Two hundred rolls of white sole leather (by drayman's certificate) and 1,600 dozen sheep skins were sent on board the Martha Washington. Ninety odd cases of boots and shoes were sent. Fifty cases were directed to Horace Cole, California. Two hundred boxes of boots were shipped for Adams Chapin from the factory. Witness did some of the marking on the above boxes on the sidewalk. Of the boxes letter C was marked shipped to Brownsville, Texas. A variety of hats, shoes, boots, &c., above seventy cases. Burton told witness that they (the Chapins) had offered him six or eight thousand dollars. Said he could get the money if he had the bills of purchase. Burton came into the store and said he had Filley's dying confession; that he would fix them. Witness replied that it was as false as hell; not one word stated by him (Burton) was true. Burton then said he was only waiting a telegraph to fix the irons on him. Witness (to use his words) told him that he was a damned old scoundrel, and observed to him, have me arrested. Witness then said he should do his duty, regardless of threats; that if the Chapins were guilty they ought to be arrested; and the witness further said he hoped if the boat was purposely burnt, the guilty persons would be punished. Afterward the witness went to the Dennison House with Burton. On their way he proposed if the witness would come out and show fraud he should have $2,500. Burton offered to secure him $2,000, and said he would set him up in business. That Carpenter would take him into partnership. On being cross-examined, whether he had not said to Dr. Case that he could send the Chapins to the penitentiary, witness replied that he could not say whether he had said so or not. He was also asked whether he had not said to the same person that the defendants had shipped to ——, of Texas, articles of no value. Witness replied he had not said so, and explained that articles had been sent to Texas which were not saleable in Cincinnati, and which had been purchased by Chapin in New York, and which were saleable in Texas, particularly low quartered shoes for women, &c. Cole said he would sell on time. In regard to Stephens' purchase, witness says he became acquainted with him, and shortly afterwards he inquired for a room in which to deposit stores. Had no room. Stephens purchased between two or three thousand dollars worth. His boxes were marked G. P. S.; not positive there was an S.; directed to the care, the witness thinks, of some one in New Orleans; cases weighed about fifty pounds each. Cooley's shipment—witness says Cooley was not at Cincinnati at the time of the shipment. Horace Cole's shipment—brother of L. Cole, defendant: 200 bales of white sole leather were shipped. The leather was principally taken from the cellar under the store. The cellar was dark—the leather could not be seen except by candles. Sixteen hundred dozen sheep skins were shipped. Sold the red sole leather at Louisville. Three drays were loaded six or eight times with sole leather. The principal part of the sole leather was sent on the 7th of January, 1852. The sole leather was piled up in the cellar under the store, extending two sides and several rolls in depth. The assignment of the Madison Insurance office was dated back some twelve or twenty days. The sales of white sole leather were weighed. Some of it in the second and third stories of the factory, the other part in the cellar of the store. This he stated on cross-examination. Also, he said he never knew Filley & Chapin to purchase sole leather which was not in rolls, except leather brought to the factory or bought in the city. The marks on the boxes the witness has described as nearly as he can.

J. S. Oliver—Was in the employ of the Chapins. They had one hundred and fifty hands, and made between seventy-five to eighty cases of boots weekly, each case containing one dozen boots. In the cellar of the store, on the left hand as one entered, the white sole leather was laid five or six rolls high, and extended thirty feet. This was the cellar of the Main street store. Ladies' shoes were in boxes in the second story. In the third story there were hats. The witness speaks of the last of December, 1851, and the first of January succeeding. In the first story of the store there were boxes of boots and shoes. The store was about sixty feet deep; five or six boxes high extended round the room, 120 feet inside the elbow. The boxes contained boots and shoes. About the time of the shipment saw the hands lowering sheep skins from the store. On cross-examination, witness said he had been at the jail a number of times. When the shipment was being made, witness carried a message from Cole to Kissane, about shipping pork and lard that day on the Martha Washington.

George Burris—Witness is a ship carpenter. On the 14th of January, 1852, was on a flat-boat near where the Martha Washington was burnt. This was near the foot of bend Sixty-five, on the Mississippi. Came near with the flat-boat while the Martha Washington was on fire; jumped into a skiff, and rowed round the boat. The wind blew from the Arkansas shore. The bow of the boat had been at the shore, but was floating out into the river. The flames caused witness to row off. Saw seven or eight men—some of them jumped into the yawl, and appeared to be greatly excited. Witness saw Capt. Cummings trying to climb up to the stern. Witness asked him to get into the skiff, which, after some time, he did, and witness took him to the shore.

Mr. Conine—Knew Capt. Cummings. Saw him on the Rio Grande. He was doing business as a merchant, and had a respectable establishment.

Capt. Kendrick—The Martha Washington was worth $10,000. The trip down worth at least $4,800.

Mr. Bruck—Purchased, at Cincinnati, flour, corn meal, and bread, amounting to at least $36.

John Henry—Lives eight miles from Cincinnati. Was fireman on board the Martha Washington. There were many boxes on board; white sole leather—does not remember the quantity of white sole leather. Witness helped load the boat: there was a large amount of sole leather; great numbers of boxes. Witness speaks of the burning as other witnesses. He fell into the river. Capt. Cummings pulled off his coat and gave it to him. Capt. Cummings went on board anxious to save some children that were on board.

Col. Austen—Knew Capt. Cummings in Mexico, selling goods. Saw him frequently.

Charles Smith—Also knew Capt. Cummings in Mexico—engaged in selling goods.

Mr. Huhilt—Witness lives in Newport, Ky. Engaged in freighting. The Martha Washington would carry from 650 to 700 tons. She was apt to take fire from her chimney. Witness has seen a boat loaded so deep that a current ran across her. Letters from New Bedford read, recommending the shipment of pork and lard to that place, dated 3d Dec., 1851.

John Myers—Shipped 125,400 cigars for California, the 7th January, 1852, on board the Martha Washington.

Andrew Lytle—Witness has been on the river since 1846. The Martha Washington will carry 650 tons, and 150 tons might be put on her after her guards touch the water. When the chimney becomes red hot the fire may be communicated to the bulkhead, through the case which surrounds the chimney.

Mrs. Thayer—Is sister to the Chapins. She left Massachusetts and arrived at Cincinnati on the 9th of January, 1852, with the intention to go down to New Orleans with Capt. Cummings, her brother-in-law. But the boat having left Cincinnati on the 8th, she did not go.

Mr. Kebler—Cole called, with Filley & Chapin, on the witness. The company were desirous to assign certain merchandize, a schedule of which was presented. Witness wrote a bill of sale, and filled up notes for the purchase money, after deducting between six and seven thousand dollars, the whole amount being eighteen thousand dollars. Cole came to the office and requested witness and Judge Walker, who practice in partnership, to garnishee Stephens' insurance. An attachment was issued, and the insurance company was garnisheed for the debt due by Stephens to Cole, for goods purchased from Cole. Some time after Burton came to the office to see paid the money on the insurance at New York by Kimball, and it was suggested that $8,000 be paid on that policy. Burton was anxious to get an assignment of the policy, so that he might obtain the money. Kimball refused to make the assignment. Burton sought evidence to show the fairness of the shipment. After Kimball refused to assign the policy, Burton said he did not believe the goods were shipped. Witness spoke often to Burton afterward respecting the matter; the shipment was made on the 8th. Burton said he arrived on the 9th, and was at Chapins' store and saw no such property as is alleged to have been shipped. Cole made insurance at a Detroit office, with the agent at Cincinnati. The agent would not settle unless an adjustment should be made. The assured were determined to prosecute. Suit was commenced on the policy, has been continued and not pressed. The branch of the office has been withdrawn from Cincinnati. Mr. Scarborough requested to see the books of the firm and papers. Witness offered the books which he declined. Afterward he called for the books, which witness refused to produce. White sole leather they got, as witness understood, down the river and from the canal, by exchanging made-up articles, &c. The witness stated the number of notes given by Cole on the purchase, and the notes being produced he identified them.

James Riley—The witness is second mate. The Martha Washington and the Charles Hammond are about the same size. The Charles Hammond carries seven hundred and twenty or twenty-three tons.

Lieut. Moore—Capt Cummings was engaged in the merchandizing on the Rio Grande.

Wm. Trumper—Saw Nicholson at the Walnut St. House. He was treated as a gentleman.

Mr. Defray—In 1852 was at the Walnut Street House. Saw nothing peculiar in Capt. Cummings, Nicholson and Kissane.

Mr. Duffler—Bought 1849 gallons of brandy, 13 casks for Kissane, to be paid for in candles, for which witness received five per cent. At Smith & Kissane's candle factory there were made daily one hundred boxes of candles.

Mr. Meader—Lives in Cincinnati. Is a creditor of Filley & Chapin. A person from Kentucky represented he had a large quantity of white sole leather to sell. The man said he would ship it to New York if he could not sell it in Cincinnati. Witness directed him to Chapins, but does not know whether he called, nor whether they purchased his leather. Witness saw on the floor above the cellar many boxes. The weather was cold the latter part of December, so that the river was closed. Witness supposed the goods on hand amounted to between twenty and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. Cliff—Was drayman on the 7th of January. Hauled six or seven boxes of cigars, and brandy to the Martha Washington, from Kissane's factory. Also candle boxes and lard in barrels. He was engaged in hauling as much as four days. At the same time two other drays were employed in the same business. Twelve hundred boxes of candles were hauled from the same place to the Martha Washington, and 13 casks of brandy.

F. Gilgress—Lives in Cincinnati. Is a drayman. Hauled one cask of brandy; also two other casks to the Martha Washington. This was about dark on the 7th of January. Hauled boxes for Filley & Chapin—fourteen perhaps more. Knew another person that hauled boxes of candles. Hauled also from pork house to the Martha Washington. Three or four other draymen were also hauling lard oil, &c., and candle boxes for Kissane to the Martha Washington.

John S. Powers—The witness was flour inspector in Cincinnati in the fall of 1849. He knew Horace Cole. Was one of the deputy sheriffs at San Francisco. Has a strong likeness to his brother, Lyman Cole. Witness was acquainted with Perkins, firm Perkins & Ingart. Witness returned from California July 7th, 1851. Kissane told witness he was desirous of shipping goods to California to his old friend Perkins. Witness advised him to ship boots of a certain kind, called Hungarian boots, and shoes. This was in the fall of 1851 and January, 1852. About New Year the river opened. From the 5th to the 7th of that month noticed a large amount of shipping going on. Lard and pork and candle boxes. Understood from the defendants that they were shipping by the Martha Washington lard oil in addition to the above. Witness saw half a dozen drays at Kissane's pork house, and also the same number at the candle factory. Boots sold in California at $48 per pair. Kissane shipped 300 bbls. mess pork, 600 boxes of candles, and 600 boxes again of do. Witness saw the bill now in evidence torn from the book. It contains 13 casks of brandy, 6 boxes of cigars, 155 boxes of boots, &c. The above were shipped to California. Letter handed by Kissane to Lawrence, introducing Capt. Cummings to Smith & Kissane. After the boat was burnt heard Kissane regretted it very much, as if his goods had gone to California he would have done well.

A. M. Holman—In 1851 witness was employed by Filley & Chapin, and afterwards was employed by Chaney. He took to Lexington a large number of boots and shoes, and sold them. He was never on board the Martha Washington. Witness swore to certain papers, does not now know what.

John Arnet—In 1851–2 witness worked in Kissane's candle factory. From 75 to 100 boxes of candles were made a day. Lard oil and red oil were also manufactured. Remembers the Martha Washington was burnt. There was shipped from 1,000 to 1,200 boxes of candles, 400 or 500 barrels of oil. Seventy-five barrels of oil made a day. Three hundred sheep skins in one tank. Had four tanks. Sometimes they killed two thousand hogs a day; at other times two or three hundred. The witness says there were shipped from Kissane's establishment 1,200 boxes of candles, 400 or 500 bbls. of lard, 200 bbls. of lard oil, about New Year's.

Charles Matthews—Is a teacher in Cincinnati. By accurate measurement the Charles Hammond will carry 796 tons.

Philip Patt—Witness worked for Smith & Kissane. In the early part of January, 1852, candles were shipped. Nailed up the boxes, but can not state the number of them.

John Owens—Is a drayman. Nine drays engaged with witness. Three hundred boxes of candles; witness got the tickets. This was late in the evening (near supper time) on the 7th of January, when the boxes were delivered on board the Martha Washington.

Wm. Mowry—Is a plasterer. The first week in January, 1852, met Anderson, a drayman, hauling boxes and barrels, several days. There were engaged with him ten or fifteen drays. Anderson said they were hauling for Kissane to the Martha Washington. This was objected to as the mere statement of Anderson. THE COURT admitted the evidence as competent; was a part of the res gestæ, when the work was being done, and when there could have been no motive to misrepresent.

John Arthur—Lives in Cincinnati. Kept two drays four or five days engaged in hauling to the Martha Washington from the different pork houses. Eight or nine drays went down the last load to the Martha Washington. This was in the evening.

James Burns—Lives in Cincinnati. Was draying for Thos. Anderson. Hauled from the candle factory. Kissane had fifteen or twenty drays. Three or four loads, perhaps more.

Daniel Sheets—Is a drayman. Hauled 5th of January from candle factory, one load of lard oil Patrick Crow—Is a drayman. Hauled lard from Smith & Kissane's steam house. Oil one load. Three or four others.

Thomas Bradley—Is a drayman. Hauled one load same time with Crow from Kissane's steam house.

Martin Reese—Drayman. Hauled for Anderson to the Martha Washington from Kissane's factory.

Henry Neiter—Is a cooper. Made for Kissane & Smith five or six hundred pork barrels the latter part of December, 1851.

Patrick Keeley—Worked in Smith & Kissane's pork house in January, 1852. Many barrels of pork were shipped.

William Kirkpatrick—Good pork was packed at Smith & Kissane's pork house.

Smith Anderson—From fifteen to thirty drays were employed in hauling for Smith & Kissane articles for shipment in the fore part of January.

A. C. Cooper—Lives in New Harmony, at Mt. Vernon, Ia. Hailed the Martha Washington as she descended the river, when she came to. Witness wanted to freight twenty-five tons and upwards. The boat was heavily loaded; water run on the lower deck. Capt. Cummings hesitated whether he would take any more loading. Went on the upper deck, returned and said he would take it. Went some miles below and took on board 1,000 bags of corn. Was the last loading taken on board. After midnight on the morning of the 14th of January, while in his berth, witness heard the bell ringing violently. Sprang out of his berth, ran into the ladies' cabin, met the chambermaid, who appeared to be stupefied, and said nothing. Saw Holland, the mate, immediately after, who was knocking at the doors of the cabin and crying fire at the bow. Witness returned to his berth, snatched up a part of his clothes, retreated to the starboard side, got on the lower deck, and saw the blaze in the social hall. The fire seemed to run through the boat as lightning. Witness saw the boat was nearing the shore. He stood on the lower deck and was the first or among the first to jump to the shore. He ran up some distance on the land as he was apprehensive that gunpowder was on board. He returned to the fire. Capt. Cummings was there, without a coat, raising his hands and exclaiming, "O Lord! where are the children?" He was greatly affected.

Moses Parmely—In January, 1852, was engaged in draying. Saw Anderson's drays delivering pork, lard and lard oil. A great deal of loading was on the wharf near to and opposite the Martha Washington.

E. J. Wood—Witness knows Anderson was draying for Smith & Kissane. He employed a great number of drays on an emergency.

Samuel Bebee—Draying in Cincinnati. Draymen exchange works in cases of emergency. Witness hauled four loads from the factory of Kissane to the Martha Washington shortly after the river broke up.

Thomas Anderson—Followed draying in 1852. The principal house he drayed for was the house of Smith & Kissane, and McGill. He hauled twelve hundred boxes of candles from the candle factory to the Martha Washington. He had some eleven or twelve drays under his direction. Hauled two hundred barrels and tierces of lard, also three hundred bbls. and tierces in addition, two hundred and fifty bbls. of pork, from the pork house. Six or seven days drays were engaged in hauling. Three hundred bbls. of pork were at first directed to be hauled to the Statesman steamboat. It refused to take more freight. The witness was then directed to haul the same to the Martha Washington. Fourteen casks of brandy, 250 bbls. of pork for Cole were hauled. Saw the boxes, &c., at the Martha Washington, being loaded. Also, there was hauled to the same boat, 300 bbls. of beef, in doing which witness was not employed.

Henry Chapin—In January, 1852, witness went to the 4th story, with his uncle, Rufus Chapin, where he saw ten or fifteen bales of sheep skins let down, which were sent on board the Martha Washington. There were no other skins at that time in fourth story. Witness knew other skins had been there and had been removed.

Mr. Powers—Has made a strict calculation of the measurement of the freight on board the Martha Washington, which amounted to 720 tons; and he has measured the capacity of the boat, according to the most approved rules of measurement, and he finds that the boat could carry from 30 to 50 tons more than was on board of her.

Mr. Riddle—Stated that a short time after this case was heard by the commissioner, before whom Burton was sworn as a witness, and who testified that he had received no compensation and expected none for his efforts in relation to this prosecution, Burton said to witness, in a conversation, afterward, that he did not expect to lose a dime. Witness understood him to say that he expected to be saved from expense by the insurance offices.

Mr. Brown—Several packages of sheep skins being brought into court, the witness stated that No. 1, 9 lbs., 16 dozen in a bale, which would weigh 144 lbs., and which multiplied by 100, would make 14,400 lbs., being 7 tons.

Rebutting evidence was called by the prosecution.

Dr. Kates—Lives in Cincinnati. Is acquainted with B. Earl. He frequently said to witness that the Chapins were all concerned, and that he could send them to the penitentiary, and would do so. The witness was asked by a juror as to Earl's general character for truth, and he answered that he had never told him a falsehood.

B. Earl—Being called and examined in relation to the statement made to the above witness, states that he had borrowed money from Dr. Case for Filley & Chapin—some two hundred dollars. The witness was engaged to be married to a lady in the East, and was obliged to postpone it, because he could not get money from Filley & Chapin which they owed him. That at this disappointment he was displeased and disappointed, and if he made the threat against the Chapins, as stated by Dr. Kates, it was in reference to the conveyance of their property to defraud their creditors, which he supposed was punishable. Witness had been in the practice of borrowing money for the firm.

Mr. Barnum—Being called by the prosecution, was asked in relation to Burton's general character for truth and veracity.

The defendants' counsel objected to this evidence on the ground that the general character of the witness had not been assailed. By the prosecution it was insisted that general character for truth may be given in evidence, where proof has been given of contradictory statements made by a witness. THE COURT admitted the evidence. The witness stated that he knew nothing against the truth of Mr. Burton, and would believe him under oath. To the same import were the statements of Mr. Hughes, Mr. Powell, and Mr. Paine, all of whom are acquainted with the witness, and some of them live in his neighborhood.

Several of the defendants' witnesses, when called, were asked by the prosecution whether they had been examined by Clark, and their testimony taken down and signed by them. These questions were objected to by defendants' counsel. They avowed the fact that Clark, being one of the counsel of the defendants, had been requested to ascertain the facts within the knowledge of the respective witnesses, in order that they might be classified, and called so as to produce to the court and jury a connected relation of the facts. And they alleged that the counsel concerned in court, from the great number of witnesses, could not ascertain the necessary facts so as to examine them intelligibly. And they insisted on the right, as professional men, to understand from the witnesses to what points they could testify. The prosecution alleged that it was training the witnesses, and would necessarily influence them favorably for the defendants.

THE COURT directed Clark to be called, and being sworn, he stated that being a member of the bar, and employed as counsel for the defendants, he had taken down the statements of facts to which they would testify, from several of the witnesses, which they had signed, and which statements he had given to the defendants' counsel, in order that they might know how to call them for examination. He further stated that he had asked the witnesses no leading questions to influence their statements, but had put down on paper what they said voluntarily. That in two or three instances these statements had been taken down in the presence of two or three other witnesses.

THE COURT remarked that they could not control the intercourse between the defendants' counsel and their witnesses, unless they have been guilty of unprofessional conduct. That they supposed it was not improper in counsel to ascertain from the witnesses, facts, especially in a case like the present, where hundreds of witnesses were in attendance, that they might shorten the examination by calling the witnesses who had a knowledge of the same facts. The witnesses, or at least many of them, had been examined before the commissioner originally, their testimony taken down and published in a book, which is in the hands of both parties.

THE COURT further observed, that under the circumstances of the present case, they would direct the counsel, Clark, not to take down the statements of the witnesses, and no further statements were taken, known to the court, except a short one by one of the counsel engaged in court, which was presented or offered to be handed to the opposing counsel, but was waived by them, no objection being stated.

The testimony being closed, the counsel for the prosecution asked the court to suspend further proceeding in the case until the arrival of rebutting witnesses, which they expected from Cincinnati. That they had requested the witnesses by telegraph to come, and they were expected. This was about twelve o'clock, the usual time for adjourning the court, and the court observed that they could not suspend the proceedings in the case on account of the absent witnesses. And they stated that public notice had been given, in open court, before the adjournment of the court the day before, that the defendants would close their testimony by twelve o'clock the ensuing day, which afforded ample time to bring the witnesses. That one train of cars, after the notice, on the same evening, passed down to Cincinnati from Columbus, and that two trains of cars had arrived that morning from Cincinnati, in either of which the desired witnesses might have come. That no other train would arrive until after dark, and that as the witnesses had not come in the morning trains, it was not certain that they would be up in the evening. That three weeks had been taken up in the examination of the witnesses, and that the cause could not be suspended under the circumstances.

Other objections might have been added, as a reason why the case should not be delayed. If the witnesses were summoned and were paid by the government, unless their absence was with the consent of the prosecution, a motion for an attachment should have been made, on which the court would, as a matter of course, delay the cause and send for the witnesses. The witnesses were not absent with the consent or knowledge of the court, but if the prosecution permitted them to be absent, they were not liable to an attachment, as they were not absent in contempt of the process of the court.

Before the examination of the witnesses for the defendants commenced, on their being called to be sworn, it was distinctly announced in open court, by one of the counsel for the defendants, that only such of the witnesses would be examined as were most important; and that they were called and sworn that their per diem might be allowed them. And on the same day, before a witness was examined for the defendants, the leading counsel for the defense, in the presence of the presiding judge, observed to the leading counsel for the prosecution, that they would not take up more than a week, as they should examine only their important witnesses. And during the recess of the court, at twelve o'clock, the day before the testimony closed, in conversation with the presiding judge, in the presence of the leading counsel for the prosecution, the counsel for the defendants observed that they would close the testimony by twelve o'clock the next day. This is admitted by the leading counsel. The witnesses were telegraphed, but failed to come. There was time to have brought the witnesses more than three times the distance of Cincinnati.

There was no intimation made to the court on the part of the prosecution, that the rebutting evidence was material in the case, nor to what facts or persons it could apply. Nor was there any suggestion of surprise by any of the facts proved. There would seem to be no ground for such a suggestion, as the testimony of all the principal witnesses had been written down before the commissioner and published, and during the trial was in the hands of the counsel on both sides. These circumstances, connected with the extraordinary effort and ability with which the cause had been prosecuted by the counsel who represent the government, induces the court to believe that the evidence referred to could not be deemed important.

But, in addition to all these considerations, no court, except under very peculiar circumstances, could permit the proceedings to be suspended. If the prosecution is to be indulged to send for witnesses, after the close of the testimony, the defendants could claim the same privilege, and this would extend the investigation for any length of time the parties might desire. No such rule has been recognized by any court.

At the meeting of the court in the afternoon, Mr. Morton, the district attorney, commenced his opening argument, and continued it that afternoon and the following day. After the close of his argument, Mr. Ewing, in the defense, made known to the court, that they would submit the cause to the jury, without argument, on the charge of the court.

Mr. Stanbery, on the part of the prosecution, stated to the court the submission was altogether on the part of the defense; for the prosecution they desired to argue the case.

THE COURT observed that they regretted the course, in this respect, of the counsel in the defense. That the court could not control the counsel in the discharge of their duties to their clients. But when no argument has been made in the defense, and the prosecution, by the district attorney, has had a full opening, commenting at large on the testimony, which occupied the court a day and a half, further argument on that side could not be heard. The court said that they would charge the jury the next morning.

McLEAN, Circuit Justice (charging jury). The indictment in this case is found under the 23d section of the act of the third of March, 1825. It provides, "that, if any person or persons shall, on the high seas, or within the United States, willfully and corruptly conspire, combine and confederate, with any other person or persons, such other person or persons being either within or without the United States, to cast away, burn, or otherwise destroy, any ship or vessel, or procure the same to be done, with intent to injure any person or body politic, that hath underwritten or shall thereafterward underwrite, any policy of insurance thereon, or of goods on board thereof, or with intent to injure any person or body politic that hath lent or advanced, or thereafter shall lend or advance, any money on such vessel, on bottomry or respondentia, or shall within the United States, build or fit out, or aid in building or fitting out any ship or vessel, with intent that the same shall be cast away, burnt, or destroyed, for the purpose or with the design aforesaid, every person so offending shall, on conviction thereof, be deemed guilty of felony, and shall be punished by fine, not exceeding ten thousand dollars, and by imprisonment and confinement to hard labor, not exceeding ten years."

The defendants are charged with having wilfully and corruptly conspired to burn and destroy the steamboat Martha Washington and her cargo, with the intention to injure certain underwriters who had insured the same. Two or more of the defendants must be found guilty, or the conspiracy charged will not be established. To consummate the offense, under the statute, it is not necessary to prove that boat was burnt, or that the insurance offices were injured. It is enough to show that the defendants conspired to destroy the steamboat, with the view of injuring those offices. A conspiracy is rarely, if ever, proved by positive testimony. When a crime of high magnitude is about to be perpetrated by a combination of individuals, they do not act openly, but covertly and secretly. The purpose formed is known only to those who enter into it. Unless one of the original conspirators betray his companions and give evidence against them, their guilt can be proved only by circumstantial evidence. This kind of evidence often satisfies a jury of the guilt of the accused. But in such a case the circumstances must be so strong as to be inconsistent with the innocence of the accused. It is said by some writers on evidence, that such circumstances are stronger than positive proof. A witness swearing positively, it is said, may misapprehend the facts or swear falsely, but that circumstances can not lie.

The common design is the essence of the charge; and this may be made to appear, when the defendants steadily pursue the same object, whether acting separately or together, by common or different means, all leading to the same unlawful result. And where prima facie evidence has been given of a combination, the acts or confessions of one are evidence against all. This rule of evidence is founded upon principles which apply to agencies and partnerships. And it is reasonable that where a body of men assume the attribute of individuality, whether for commercial business or the commission of a crime, that the association should be bound by the acts of one of its members, in carrying out the design.

To sustain the prosecution the conspiracy must be proved, and that it was entered into to injure the underwriters. This it is insisted has been done: (1) By evidence showing prima facie, that the defendants being known to each other and associated in this enterprise, formed the combination as charged. (2) By using false bills of lading and invoices. (3) By obtaining insurances thereon. (4) By representing a greater amount of tonnage on board the Martha Washington than its capacity could carry. (5) By burning the vessel.

That the defendants have endeavored to recover the insurance money, is not controverted, nor that the boat has been burnt. The destruction of the boat is not punishable under the act of congress, but if it appear from the evidence that it was destroyed by the defendants, or by one who had combined with them, it is strong, if not conclusive proof of a conspiracy to do so. So if it appear that the bills of lading were false, it shows a combination to injure the underwriters. Stephens, Nicholson and Chandler are included in the indictment, but they are not parties to this proceeding; still, if they entered into the conspiracy with the defendants their acts and confessions while carrying it out are evidence in this case.

It appears from the evidence of Robert McGrew, who keeps a boarding house on Seventh street, in Cincinnati, between Main and Walnut, that Stephens, Holland, and one Edwards, boarded with him—that Cole, Capt. Cummings and Kissane called to see them occasionally; and from their conversations it appeared that they became acquainted with each other on the Rio Grande. That Cole and Holland had been engaged in running a boat on that river. They had no private conversations to the knowledge of the witness, but appeared to be ordinary visitors, sitting in the public room. In the winter of 1851, William Northrup, who lives in Cincinnati, saw Kissane, Cummings, Cole and Nicholson frequently together. Mr. Penniman saw Nicholson in the fall of 1851, at Maysville, who said he was on his way to the Esculapian Springs, in Kentucky, to visit his family, before he left on the Martha Washington, which boat he had purchased. Other witnesses proved that the defendants above named associated with each other, and that they were intimate with the Chapins. Mr. McGregor sold to Capt. Cummings the steamboat Martha Washington, which was owned by the witness and the Messrs. Irwin, for $9,000, which sum Capt. Cummings was to pay on her return trip. The insurances charged to have been made on false bills of lading and invoices, will now be stated with the evidence applicable to the same. Wm. Kimball, of New York, insured in the Union Mutual Insurance Company of the city of New York, $5,200 on leather, and $4,800 on sheep skins. This insurance covered two hundred rolls of white sole leather, and sixteen hundred dozen of sheep skins, which it is alleged were transferred to him by Filley & Chapin, in December, 1851. In the same month Lyman Cole is alleged to have purchased from the same firm boots and shoes, amounting to the sum of $18,000. The consideration is represented to have been borrowed money in part, and for the residue notes were given, which are in proof. Cole claims to have shipped two hundred and fifty barrels of mess pork, two hundred tierces of lard, ninety-seven cases of boots to Cooley, fifty-four cases of boots to Horace Cole. Adams Chapin claims to have shipped two hundred cases of boots.

Several witnesses have been examined to show that Filley & Chapin, or Cole, their assignee, had not the articles in their store stated in these bills of lading.

Mr. Burton, a witness, states that on the 3d December, 1851, he sold to Filley & Chapin one hundred and sixty dozen sheep skins, and deposited with them one hundred and eighty two dozen. He returned home and shortly after one of the Chapins called on him at his residence and wanted him to assist in procuring the discount of a note for six hundred dollars. He also wanted to purchase white sole leather. Witness went with him to a large leather dealer, but he would not sell to him on the terms offered. Nor could the witness procure a discount of the note. Witness went to Cincinnati about Christmas. Made application for the skins he had deposited. Cole was then in possession of the property and refused to give up the sheep skins. Filley, Burton and Earl, the witness says, made an estimate of the property on hand, which amounted to eight thousand five hundred dollars. Chaney, the brother-in-law of Chapin, purchased the stock on hand, and carried on the business, to some extent, in which Filley & Chapin had been engaged. Witness told the Chapins, that the number of sheep skins stated had never been shipped. The witness received letters from Filley & Chapin requesting him to send them sheep skins. When he sold to the firm one hundred and sixty dozen sheep skins, and deposited the one hundred and eighty-two dozen, the firm gave him a note for his accommodation, to be secured by the skins deposited The Chapins informed the witness that they had not purchased fifty dozen of sheep skins except from him. In the year 1849–50, witness purchased twenty-nine hundred dozen of sheep skins. In the year 1850 he sent to New Orleans fifty hundred dozen.

Mr. Taylor, a witness, is the largest manufacturer of leather in the city of Cincinnati. The white sole leather is more valuable than the red. In the winter of 1851–2 white sole leather was scarce and in demand. Had no idea that there was in the city two hundred rolls. He also deals in sheep skins, and had no knowledge of sixteen hundred dozen being in the city. Several other witnesses were acquainted with Filley & Chapin, had been in their stores and manufactory, and had seen little or no white sole leather, and not many bales of sheep skins.

Benjamin Earl, a witness for the defendants, was salesman for Filley & Chapin, up to the time of the sale to Cole. Burton never went with witness through the rooms of the boot and shoe factory, or of the stores. If he passed through the rooms it must have been after the shipment. The firm had rising of twelve hundred sides of leather in 1851. They dealt largely in sheep skins. Soon after Cole took possession, great quantities of sole leather, white and red, were purchased. The largest purchase made at once, within his recollection, was fifty rolls. The firm of Filley & Chapin employed from one hundred and fifty to one hundred and seventy-five hands. The witness prepared the articles for shipment, and he says that he forwarded to the Martha Washington, on drays, two hundred rolls of white sole leather, and sixteen hundred dozen of sheep skins, shipped to New York in the name of Kimball. The witness thinks that this shipment to New York, and the sale to Cole were designed to place the property of Filley & Chapin beyond the reach of their creditors; they having failed in business. The witness shipped on board the Martha Washington about one hundred and fifty pairs of Hungarian boots for Kissane. The witness also states that he shipped to Horace Cole, in California, at the instance of Lyman Cole, fifty cases of boots and shoes; ninety odd cases he shipped to Cooley; on Red river. Two hundred boxes of boots were shipped from the factory by Adams Chapin. To Stephens, of Brownsville, in Texas, Cole shipped a variety of hats, shoes, &c., about seventy cases. These shipments were all made under the superintendence of the witness, who saw the boxes and other articles, a part of which he marked. He did not see the articles delivered on board the Martha Washington, but he has no doubt they were delivered, from the dray tickets which were returned to him. He says that the white sole leather was principally deposited in the cellar under the store, which was dark, and could only be seen by candle light. It was piled up, about five rolls deep, against the wall, on the left hand in entering the cellar, and extended some thirty feet or more. Other rolls were in the factory, and other places. A great number of bales of sheep skins were in the same cellar. Other bales were in the factory building. The witness states that from seventy-five to near one hundred cases of boots were made in the factory weekly, each case containing one dozen pairs. The largest number that was made and sent to the store in one week, amounted to ninety-eight cases. Earl having borrowed twelve hundred dollars of Kissane, for Filley & Chapin, he assigned to Kissane in full payment, fifteen hundred dollars on the Madison insurance, which Adams Chapin had assigned to him for that purpose. This witness has been impeached by the testimony of Dr. Kates, who says he has been for several years acquainted with Earl. His intercourse with the family of the witness was almost daily. Several times the witness loaned money to Earl, on his responsibility, for the benefit, as witness supposed, of Filley & Chapin. Witness wanted the money and requested Earl to pay it. He complained that Filley & Chapin owed him at the time of the failure $——. He said he could send the Chapins to the penitentiary, and would do so if they did not pay him. Dr. Kates also says that Earl informed him that he had put a case or cases of articles that were worth little, and forwarded them to Texas, &c. On his examination in chief, Earl being questioned as regards this conversation with Dr Kates, says that if he stated that he could send the Chapins to the penitentiary, he was under excitement, and spoke with reference to the conveyance of their property to defeat the claims of their creditors. He stated that he was disappointed in not being able to go eastward, on a matrimonial engagement, which, for want of funds, he was obliged to postpone. In regard to the case or cases of articles sent to Texas, he referred to the articles being unfashionable in Cincinnati, and consequently unsaleable. They consisted of Hungarian boots and low quartered shoes for ladies, which were not worn in Cincinnati, but which were good articles and saleable in Texas. Dr. Kates, on being asked by a juror, what was the character of Earl, answered it was good—that he had never told him a lie.

Robert Lemon was employed by Filley & Chapin as foreman in the factory. The usual quantity of sides of sole leather was from one thousand to three thousand sides, kept in the second and third stories of the building. At the stores such leather was kept in the cellar. They had the largest stock the witness ever saw. He prepared for shipment two hundred cases of boots, each case containing a dozen pairs. After the shipment there was but a small amount of stock left. Cole's purchase was made about the middle of December.

Smith & Kissane claim to have shipped on board the Martha Washington twelve hundred boxes of candles, three hundred barrels of pork, one hundred and fifty-five cases of California boots, ten hundred and forty-nine gallons of brandy, and two hundred barrels of lard oil. Witnesses have been examined to prove that these articles were shipped on the Martha Washington. Mr. Cliff says that he hauled, with several other draymen, for Smith & Kissane, candle boxes and barrels of lard. He was engaged, as he thinks, four days. He believes twelve hundred boxes of candles were hauled to the above steamboat on and before the 7th of January, 1852. He also states six casks of brandy were hauled to the boat, at another time six casks, and one another, making thirteen casks.

F. Kilguss was also engaged in the above service as drayman—he hauled one cask of brandy to the boat. Also, he hauled thirty-three boxes of candles for Smith & Kissane. He also hauled from the pork house lard oil; from the factory candle boxes—there were three or four other drays engaged at the same time.

John Arnet, a drayman, says there were shipped from one thousand to twelve hundred boxes of candles, four or five barrels of lard, two hundred barrels of lard oil to the steamboat. Several other draymen corroborate the above statements. Thomas Anderson, a drayman, who did the hauling for Smith & Kissane, employed other drays when his own could not do the work required. He states that from the candle factory of Smith & Kissane, twelve hundred boxes of candles were hauled to the Martha Washington. Also, two hundred barrels of lard oil. From the steam house two hundred barrels and tierces of lard, one hundred of which were shipped by Cole to Lee, Boston; and one hundred to Taber, New Bedford. Two hundred and fifty barrels of pork belonging to Cole, and in addition, three hundred barrels of pork which the draymen were directed to take to the Statesman boat, but as that boat could not receive them, its cargo being completed, they were taken to the Martha Washington. He also states that fourteen casks of brandy were hauled for Smith & Kissane from Ward's, a liquor dealer, to the Martha Washington. He saw the above articles on the wharf opposite the Martha Washington, and hands were engaged loading them. This was in the evening. The above articles are similar to those claimed by Smith & Kissane to have been shipped on board the Martha Washington. And also two hundred and fifty barrels of pork, included in the shipment of Cole. Also, one hundred tierces of lard, and about one hundred and fifty cases of Hungarian boots, and six boxes of cigars. This, with the evidence before given, purports to cover the entire shipments of Cole and Kissane, also of Kimball and Adams Chapin. And about seventy cases of shoes and boots to Stephens, thirteen barrels of brandy were sold by Cotteral, a witness, to Stephens, in exchange for stoves. This leaves six boxes of merchandize unaccounted for, which were said to contain ladies' cloaks, but there is no evidence where they were purchased, or as to their value.

Nicholson's insurance covered his liquors for the use of the bar and two boxes of merchandise. The bar is stated to have been well supplied with liquors. Of what the two boxes of merchandise consisted no account is given. Chandler's shipment consisted of two boxes of merchandise, but the contents of the boxes are not known. Chandler was discharged by the commissioner, but he was included in the indictment. Neither Chandler, Nicholson nor Stephens are before the court, and it may be owing to that circumstance that the articles shipped by them, or at least a part of them, are not in evidence.

Mr. Powers, a witness, states that after his return from California, in the summer of 1851, he recommended Kissane to ship to California Hungarian boots, and other articles, to Perkins & Engard, who were personally known to Kissane. Boots, the witness said, were selling there at $48 a pair.

The shipments made below Louisville are important only in regard to the capacity of the boat to carry the amount of freight stated. It appears that insurances were effected on the above shipments—by Stephens for $10,702 04; by Capt. Cummings on the boat $4,500, and to cover freight $2,500, making the sum of $7,000; by Kimball, $10,000; by Lyman Cole, $5,458; by Kissane, $8,000; by Chapin, $4,200; by Nicholson, $1,200. If these insurances were made on false invoices or bills of lading, it would afford conclusive evidence that the intention was to injure the underwriters. And it would authorize a presumption against the defendants, that they had done any thing necessary to be done to effectuate their object. And if the insurance was greatly beyond the probable value of the articles shipped, at the place of consignment, it would be ground on which the fairness of the transaction might well be questioned.

By the bills of lading, and other evidence, does it appear that there was a greater amount of tonnage on the boat than its capacity could carry? This is assumed as proved by the prosecution, and on this ground it is contended that there was fraud in the shipment. Witnesses differ as to the amount of tonnage the Martha Washington could carry. Mr. Powers, by measurement, ascertained that the cargo amounted to seven hundred and twenty tons. And it appears from the mathematical calculation of Mr. Matthews, that the Martha Washington could carry, in addition to that amount of freight, more than thirty tons When the Martha Washington left the wharf at Cincinnati, the tops of her guards were from six to eight inches above the water line.

After her freight was all on board, the water, as some of the witnesses state, was over her railing at midships. It will be for you, gentlemen, to consider and determine, from the evidence, the fact as to the amount of freight.

It will be for you to determine, gentlemen, whether the Martha Washington was burnt accidentally or by design. This is a most important inquiry in the case. As before remarked, the burning is not necessary to establish the conspiracy charged, but if the fact be proved, that it was burnt by design, and by one of the defendants in this case, or by one clearly shown to be concerned in the incipient stages of the transaction, it will be very strong, and perhaps, conclusive evidence to establish the conspiracy charged. If the shipment was bona fide, yet if the conspiracy was to burn the boat, with the view to charge the underwriters, the defendants are guilty. The offence charged is of the highest criminality. It not only tends to destroy all confidence in commercial transactions, but in carrying out the intention, it must often involve the destruction of human life.

Lewis Choate was pilot of the Martha Washington. He was on watch at the time the fire occurred. The boat had wooded a short time before, and while thus engaged, the evening being intensely cold, he was in the social hall warming himself; he resumed his place as soon as the boat was ready to move. Capt. Cummings came up, stood in front of the pilot-house, but soon turned and came into the pilot-house. After running five or six miles the witness smelt paint burning, and so stated to Capt. Cummings, who ran down fronting the pilot-house, looking over, said the witness was mistaken. Witness said he was not mistaken. Capt. Cummings then ran down to the cabin deck. Holland, the mate, was on the hurricane deck, said the wood was very dry, and that he would go down. Witness then rang the bell violently, and stamped. In a very short time after smelling the fire, a minute or two, the smoke appeared, and fire. Heard no noise in the social hall. Nicholson, the clerk, said that he was sitting in the hall, his boots off, asleep. Did not know of the fire till witness gave the alarm. When he awakened the passengers, the fire was bursting some of the windows. The boat was about 300 yards from the shore when witness first saw the flames. He thinks no effort could have extinguished the fire. The boat was thrown to the land by the action of the starboard wheel in a few moments, and the passengers on deck jumped to the shore. One of them fell in the water. Capt. Cummings pulled off his coat and gave it to him. He and the mate were seen in the yawl at the boat, aft the wheel, where a passenger was standing on the guard, the fire around him. He was forced into the yawl, which moved toward the stern of the boat, when Capt. Cummings and the mate were seen on the guard, endeavoring to ascend into the ladies' cabin. Holland, with the aid of Cummings, got on the upper deck, and was forcing open the doors of the ladies' cabin. The smoke and fire filled the cabin. The yawl, shortly after it was left by the captain and mate, pushed off. The two persons in it, from excitement or alarm, could not manage it; and it floated down the river. The boat not being fastened at the bow, floated a considerable distance from the shore. Such was the progress of the flames, that the mate and captain must have been destroyed in a few minutes, if a skiff, which belonged to a flat boat, had not taken them from the burning wreck. The captain was often besought by persons on the shore to get into the skiff and save himself, but he seemed to be so determined to rescue some children on board, that he paid no attention to his personal safety, until the fire forced him to get into the skiff. So intensely cold was the weather, that no one could swim more than a few feet. When the captain came to the shore he was frenzied by excitement and was constantly raising his hands and exclaiming, "O! Lord! Where are the children?" The fire was first seen in the social hall, on the larboard side, opposite the chimney. There was there deposited a number of candle-boxes, and on them bundles of brown paper, and on them bundles of brooms were laid. Opposite the chimney there was the appearance of a door, the upper part of which was made of painted Venetian blinds. The cabin of the Martha Washington was taken from the Era. It was old, and had been frequently painted. Around the chimney there was a case of tin or sheet-iron to prevent the heat of the chimney from setting the boat on fire. Several of the witnesses say, that the boat was liable to take fire from the larboard chimney. That on its trip up the river a short time before, it had taken fire from the chimney three times in one day. One of the witnesses, who had been employed on board of the boat, had known her to be on fire nearly fifty times. Another witness says when he saw the fire first, the flames were seen in the slats of the false door. Nicholson, from his own confession, was in the social hall when the fire broke out, asleep, and was wakened by the bell. Seeing the fire, he awakened the passengers.

As to the burning of the boat there is no positive evidence; and in such a case, unless circumstances raised a probability of guilt, the jury may well inquire into the motive of Nicholson or of some other individual, to do the act. Admit that he owned half the boat, and had an insurance that would cover the liquors in his bar, and two boxes of merchandise, still his interest would not lead him to burn the boat. It was insured for only one-half of the sum paid for it, so that his loss would greatly exceed the amount of his insurance. Men are seldom, if ever, prompted to commit a crime, except from motives of gain or revenge.

There are a great many circumstances connected with this case, which have been brought to bear upon it, and which may have no direct relation to its merits. The clerk of Kissane, who now states that he swore, without objection on his part, to a bill of lading, not knowing that the articles had been shipped, affords no evidence of intentional fraud, if the proof be clear that the articles were shipped. The copy of a letter of Kissane, charged to have been taken surreptitiously from the papers of the district attorney, is in evidence. Some testimony has been given as to the abstraction of that letter, but as the act of taking it as charged is an indictable offense, you cannot in this case convict him of the act. The court permitted the evidence to show the motive, with which the letter must have been taken. There can be no doubt, from the history of this case, the defendants were acquainted with each other, and that in the purchase of the boat, and in the shipment of the cargo from Cincinnati, they were engaged in the commercial enterprise. Their shipments were made, as appears, not for the benefit of the whole, but for the benefit of the shippers individually, as stated in the bills of lading. But, notwithstanding this individuality of ownership, if they united in a conspiracy to burn the boat, in order to charge the underwriters, they are guilty under the act of congress. But in this, as in all other cases, guilt cannot be inferred by vague surmises arising from acts which had not a direct tendency to form the conspiracy or carry it out. If the jury shall be satisfied from the evidence that shipments were made according to the bills of lading and invoices furnished, the injury to the underwriters can only arise from the conspiracy to burn the boat.

It is the province of the jury, and not of the court, to decide on the credibility of witnesses. Earl, who is the principal witness, so far as the Chapins and Cole are concerned, is a man, as the jury must have perceived, of intelligence. He being the salesman of the house of Filley & Chapin, had a much better opportunity of knowing the facts stated by him than any other witness. He is unimpeached, except by Dr. Kates, which is explained by Earl in his evidence in chief. Mr. Burton and he differ in the fact, that an estimate was made of the stock on hand by them and another individual. The discrepancy between these witnesses may be explained without an impeachment of either, if the principal view of the stock by Mr. Burton was after the shipment, or if he did not enter the dark cellar, where the white sole leather, as stated by Earl, was stored. Mr. Kepler, a witness, says, that Burton came to Cincinnati on the 5th of January, the day after the shipment was made.

You will examine, gentlemen, and weigh the evidence, and decide this great case, under the law, as your judgment shall sanction. I know of no higher function which a citizen can be called to discharge, than to sit in judgment on his fellow-creatures. It should remind us all of that day when we shall be judged. In the discharge of a duty so awful, how careful should we be to examine ourselves and see that no lurking prepossession or prejudice should influence our judgment. Ke know the case only as it has appeared to us on this trial. Whatever may have been said in regard to it elsewhere, is unfit to be considered here. Even those sympathies so honorable to our natures, are not to influence us here. Nothing but the facts and the law, should govern you. You will not convict, if you have reasonable doubts. But if such doubts have no place in your judgment, your verdict will be against the defendants, or such of them as you may find guilty.

The jury, before they retired, requested to have, in their retirement, the charge of the court. The counsel having no objection, the court handed the charge to the jury, but afterward withdrew it, that it might be printed for the use of the jury. The printed copy, corrected by the judge, was handed to the jury the same evening.

The jury, after being absent a considerable time, including the Sabbath, returned into court, with a verdict of not guilty.

Case No. 14,833.

UNITED STATES v. COLLIER.

[3 Blatchf. 325.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. Oct. 2 and Nov. 30, 1855.

SPECIAL VERDICT—COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTE — PROCEEDS FROM SALE OF SEIZED PROPERTY — LIABILITY FOR STOLEN MONEY—RECEIVERS OF PUBLIC MONEY.

1. A special verdict, which seemed to be incongruous in finding that, in any event, a defendant was entitled to certain items of allowance, and yet declaring that such allowances depended upon questions of law to be submitted to the decision of the court, construed as not restricting the authority of the court to pass upon the whole subject matter, including those items.

2. The act of March 3, 1849, "To extend the revenue laws of the United States over the territory and waters of Upper California and to create a collection district therein" (9 Stat. 400), construed, in reference to the compensation of the collector of the district of Upper California, appointed under it

3. In the construction of a statute, the court will look out of it to other statutes in pari materia, or of a similar purport, especially in respect to revenue laws, which, although made up of independent enactments, are regarded as one system, in which the construction of any separate act may be aided by the examination of other provisions which compose the system.

[Cited in The Viola, 59 Fed. 635.]

[Cited in Ketcham v. Hill, 42 Ind. 72.]

4. The facts and circumstances which led to and surrounded the passage of the said act of March 3, 1849, as derived from the journals of the two houses of congress, the documents laid before congress, and the debates in congress, considered, in construing the said act.

5. Contemporaneous, antecedent, and subsequent enactments on the same subject matter, considered, in construing the said act.

6. Where the United States, in adjusting the accounts of a collector appointed under the said act, treated him as having acted as collector under said act until the 14th of January, 1851, and adopted his acts until that time as being official, held, in an action against him to recover an alleged balance in his hands as such collector, that the United States were estopped from claiming that he was not entitled, during the whole time he so acted as such collector, to the compensation provided by said act of 1849, notwithstanding the passage of the act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. 508).

7. Such collector was entitled, during the whole time he so acted as such collector, to a salary of $1,500 per annum, and also to the fees and commissions prescribed by the thirty-fourth section of the act of February 18, 1793 (1 Stat. 316), and by the second section of the act of March 2, 1799 (Id. 706), notwithstanding the passage of the said act of September 28, 1850.

8. Where such collector seized, as forfeited to the United States, certain liquors, as being imported contrary to law, and, without procuring any condemnation of them by legal process in Louisiana or Oregon, under section 5 of said act of March 3, 1849, because such proceeding was impracticable, sold them, with the assent of their owners, and received the proceeds, and the United States, with notice of such want of condemnation, received, to the use of the United States, the one-half of the proceeds of such sales, and entered the usual credits, in such collector's accounts, for such amounts, held, that such collector was entitled, under section 91 of the act of March 2, 1799 (1 Stat. 697), to retain to his own use the one moiety of such proceeds.

9. Such collector was entitled to such moiety, although the secretary of the treasury had, on the application of the owners of such liquors, made allowances to them as and for the cost and value of such liquors before their importation.

10. Where such collector took bonds to the United States, on the delivery up of seized vessels and goods, and, on leaving office, returned them into the treasury department, and they had not been collected, nor had any proceedings been taken by that department to collect them, and it appeared that, if they had been collected, such collector would have been entitled to the one-half of their amount, held, in such action against such collector, that he was not entitled to a credit for such one-half.

11. A collector's right to a share in seized property applies only to the proceeds obtained from its condemnation and sale, and does not attach to the property itself.

12. The additional duties of 20 per cent. ad valorem, imposed for undervaluation by section 8 of the act of July 30, 1846 (9 Stat. 43), are not fines or penalties. Held, therefore, that such collector was not entitled to a moiety of them.

13. Such collector was not chargeable with a sum of money stolen from the deputy collector at Monterey, appointed under the said act of March 3, 1849, such sum having been stolen without neglect or default on the part of such collector, and having been disallowed to him as a credit at the treasury department.

14. The legal relation between public officers and their sworn assistants, even when they are acting directly in connection, is generally not that of master and servant, or principal and agent; and the liability of the official superior for defaults of his assistants arises only in case of his own misconduct or neglect.

15. In an action by the United States against a disbursing officer or agent, or other individual, for the recovery of moneys claimed of him, the defendant is entitled, on the trial, to the allowance of all equitable demands of his against the United States, if the same have been submitted to the proper accounting officers of the government and disallowed by them.

16. A balance equal to the amount of the money so stolen from such deputy collector at Monterey, having, as the result of the principles so settled in this case, been found to be due to such collector from the United States, the court ordered such balance to be certified, without allowing interest to either party.

17. The treasury department acts in a judicial capacity, in determining the charges to which a collector is subject, and cannot vary that adjudication subsequently, to his prejudice.

18. Where the treasury department made up five statements of the account of such collector, three before suit brought, and two afterwards, and did not claim interest against the defendant in any of them except the last, which was made up after such collector had paid to the government, in settlement, an amount which the court found overpaid the government, and the balance stated in each of such accounts was more than was due from such collector, and the action was brought upon the first account that was made up, and it appeared that the account was, in effect, open and running until the fourth account was made up, and that that account was grossly erroneous, held, that the United States were not entitled, in such suit, to charge the defendant in account with interest on the balance in his hands when such suit was brought.

19. The first section of the act of March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. 512), subjecting a receiver of public money to the payment of interest thereon, if he neglects or refuses to pay into the treasury the balance reported to be due to the United States upon the adjustment of his accounts, does not apply to the case of such collector.

This was an action commenced on the 10th of May, 1852, to recover from the defendant [James Collier] a balance alleged to be due from him to the United States on his official bond as collector for the district of Upper California. He acted as such collector from the 3d of April, 1849, until the 14th of January, 1851. The defendant filed a plea of the general issue, and a notice that he claimed against the plaintiffs various specified credits, which exceeded their demand, and had been presented by him to the accounting officers of the treasury and disallowed; and he claimed that he was entitled to have a balance certified in his favor upon the whole accounting. At the trial, before Betts, J., in April, 1854, the jury found a special verdict, and the case now came before the court on a case made, which contained the evidence given on the trial, and the special verdict, and various exceptions taken on the trial to rulings of the court.

Charles O'Conor, for the United States.

Daniel S. Dickinson and John A. Collier, for defendant.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. We do not consider it necessary to go out of or beyond the facts found by the special verdict and the documents adopted by it, in stating the reasons for our judgment in this case.

The jury find, that the treasury department made up and stated the account of the defendant five several times, to wit: on the 7th of June, 1851, in which they claimed a balance of $791,065.31; on the 24th of September, 1851, in which they claimed a balance of $789,925.35; on the 26th of December, 1851, in which they claimed a balance of $750,933.80; on the 7th of March, 1853, in which the commissioner of customs made up the balance at $216,712.43, and the auditor stated it at $181,797.00; and fifthly, on the 22d of September, 1853, in which a balance was claimed against the defendant of $241,329.47. Each of those five several balances, as thus stated, the defendant, by letter from the treasury department accompanying the statement of account, was required to pay to or deposit with an assistant treasurer of the United States. The account of September 22, 1853, contained no credit for the sum of $118,546.05, paid on the 16th of September, 1853.

This disaccord in the treasury statements of the defendant's account does not result from the admission or rejection of items on the exhibition of new evidence, but is owing chiefly to changes in the principle upon which charges and credits are inserted or withdrawn or modified, on the various reconsiderations of those statements. We shall, therefore, limit our observations to the particulars charged by the plaintiffs and objected to by the defendant, or submitted and claimed by him and disallowed at the treasury department, without undertaking to readjust the account and determine the result. That will be more conveniently and accurately done at the department, when it is possessed of our decision.

The disputed particulars consist substantially of five items, four of which take the form of claims of credit on the part of the defendant, the other being a direct debit charged against him by the plaintiffs. Still, the largest item, and that which has been the main subject of contestation between the parties, is of a compound character. It relates to the compensation the defendant is entited to receive, and is brought forward in a double aspect, partly by the plaintiffs, in the way of charges against the defendant for official fees and commissions received and retained by him exceeding a certain maximum, and directly by the defendant, as an entire credit to which he is entitled.

The finding of the jury embracing the particulars of compensation is, that the statement made up at the treasury department on the 7th of March, 1853, gave no credit to the defendant for his compensation, except the sum of $1,745.56 for salary, and no credit for any of his claims for commissions; that he officiated as collector of the district of Upper California, from the 3d of April, 1849, to the 14th of January, 1851, and, during that period, collected and received, for duties on imports and tonnage, $2,108,365; that, of that sum, he received, after the passage of the joint resolution of congress of February 14, 1850 (9 Stat. 560), and before the passage of the act of September 28, 1850 (Id. 508), $1,027,719.33, and, after the passage of the last-mentioned act, $625,656.27; that the defendant was credited in the account of September 22, 1853, with the sum of $30,831.58, as a commission of three per cent. on the sum received between the passage of the said joint resolution and of the said act, and also with the sum of $2,524.83, for his salary, at the rate of $10,000 per annum, after September 28, 1850, and, on account of his compensation prior to February 14, 1850, with the sum of $1,300; that neither of those sums had been previously credited; and that, in any event, he is entitled to those allowances, in the account to be stated pursuant to the verdict. The jury further find that, previous to the passage of the said joint resolution, the defendant received, as emoluments of his office (exclusive of the commissions aforesaid), the following sums, to wit: between the date of his entering upon said office and the passage of said joint resolution, the sum of $4,500; between the passage of said joint resolution and the passage of the said act of September 28, 1850, the sum of $11,250; and, after the passage of the last-mentioned act, the sum of $5,250. And the United States claim, that the defendant is bound to account for and pay over to the United States all the excess of the emoluments received by him beyond an amount sufficient to make his maximum compensation $3,000 per annum, except during the period between the passage of the said joint resolution and of the said act. The special verdict also declares, that inasmuch as the allowances or disallowances of the items in dispute between the parties depend upon questions of law which are proper to be submitted to and decided by the court, it is agreed that the verdict and finding of the jury shall be entered in the case after the decision of the court, and conformably to such decision. The defendant, on his part, claims that he should be credited, on his compensation account, with a fixed salary, at the rate of $1,500 per annum, during the whole period he served in the office, and with all the fees and commissions allowed by law which were collected by him. The seeming incongruity in the special verdict, in finding that, in any event, the defendant is entitled to certain specified particulars of allowances, and yet declaring that the allowances and disallowances in controversy in the account depend upon questions of law which are submitted to the decision of the court, is not, in our judgment, to be so construed as to restrict the authority of the court, or place any impediment in its way, in passing upon the whole subject matter, including those specified items.

The solution of the point in question depends upon the true meaning and effect of the act of congress of March 3, 1849, entitled, "An act to extend the revenue laws of the United States over the territory and waters of Upper California, and to create a collection district therein" (9 Stat. 400).

The treasury department, in stating the defendant's account, have considered his compensation to be subject to the limitations of the tenth section of the act of May 7, 1822 (3 Stat. 695), by which it is provided, that whenever the emoluments of any collector of the customs (other than those particularly excepted) shall exceed $3,000, after deducting therefrom the necessary expenses incident to his office in the same year, the excess shall be paid into the treasury, for the use of the United States. The defendant claims that the compensation allowed to him by the act of March 3, 1849, is independent of all previous limitation, and is to be determined conformably to the meaning and effect of that act.

It is enacted by that law (section 1) that the revenue laws of the United States be, and they are hereby extended to and over the main land and waters of all that portion of territory ceded to the United States, heretofore designated and known as Upper California; that (section 2) all the ports, harbors, bays, rivers and waters of the main land of the territory of Upper California, shall constitute a collection district, by the name of Upper California, and a port of entry shall be and is hereby established for said district, at San Francisco, on the bay of San Francisco, and a collector of customs shall be appointed by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, to reside at said port of entry; that (section 3) ports of delivery shall be established in the collection district aforesaid, at San Diego, Monterey, &c., and the collector of the said district of California is hereby authorized to appoint, with the approbation of the secretary of the treasury, three deputy collectors, to be stationed at the ports of delivery aforesaid; and that (section 4) the collector of said district shall be allowed a compensation of $1,500 per annum, and the fees and commissions allowed by law, and the said deputy collectors shall each be allowed a compensation of $1,000 per annum, and the fees and commissions allowed by law.

If the defendant's compensation is subject to limitation by any antecedent statute, we perceive no legal reason why the act of May 7, 1822, should be applied to the case, and the posterior act of March 3, 1841 (5 Stat. 432), should be disregarded. The fifth section of the latter act provides, that no collector of customs "shall, on any pretence whatsoever, hereafter receive, hold or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than $6,000 per year, including all commissions for duties, and all fees for storage, or fees, or emoluments, or any other commissions, or salaries, which are now allowed and limited by law." It is manifest, that collectors whose compensation had been restricted by the prior statute to $3,000 a year, would, after the passage of the act of March 3, 1841, be relieved from that limitation, and be entitled to retain from their receipts a compensation of $6,000 annually; and the defendant can be placed in a no more disadvantageous position, by a constructive limitation implied under the act of March 3, 1849, than was incident to the office by the positive provisions of law in force when that act went into operation. In our opinion, therefore, if the defendant is restrained to a specified amount of compensation, under the laws in force when the act of 1849 was enacted, it would be to the latter and larger sum, and not to that first appointed, the act of 1841 being the latest expression of the legislative will on the subject. The condition in which the defendant is placed in this respect, depends, therefore, upon the purport and scope of the act of 1849; and we shall proceed to state concisely our views of its true construction and effect.

Generally, a statutory enactment controls all prior usages and laws, and establishes the rule which governs the subject matter; and its language is to be understood according to its natural and ordinary import. 1 Kent, Comm. (7th Ed.) 462, 463. The intention which forms the governing principle of the law is to be extracted from the entire enactment (Strode v. Stafford Justices [Case No. 13,537]); and, to ascertain the legislative will, courts not only search all the provisions of the particular statute, but may look out of that to others in pari materia, or of a similar purport, especially in respect to revenue laws, which, although made up of independent enactments, are regarded as one system (Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 342, 363), in which the construction of any separate act may be aided by the examination of other parts and provisions which compose the system. This doctrine is in furtherance of the general principle, that the statute itself must furnish, primarily and essentially, the indications of the will of the legislature; and, should the provisions in respect to the compensation of the collector be found to be obscure, the interpretation most favorable to him should be adopted. U. S. v. Morse [Case No. 15,820].

The act of March 3, 1849, creates new offices within a territory first brought by that statute under the revenue laws of the United States. The whole body of those laws is extended to and over the main land and waters of Upper California. We do not consider it necessary, in the examination of this case, to go into the inquiry, whether the transfer of the revenue laws embraced also the entire legislation of congress in relation to agencies and means employed or authorized for the purpose of collecting revenue from imports, and especially in relation to incidental advantages and benefits allowed to revenue officers; for, in respect to the point in hand, the 4th section of the act of 1849 recognizes, as a part of the laws so extended, those which relate to fees and commissions to collectors.

The provisions appointing fees to collectors for their services under the revenue laws, are contained in the thirty-fourth section of the act of February 18, 1793 (1 Stat. 316), and in the second section of the act of March 2, 1799 (Id. 706). The particulars and amounts of the fees and commissions claimed to be payable under those laws, are not in dispute in this action, nor is it disputed that the defendant has retained the proper sum, and is entitled to credit therefor, provided the act of 1849 bestows them upon him without limitation. The question of restriction or qualification is the one in controversy between the parties. In that view, the fourth section of the act of 1849 is to be read as if the fees and commissions enumerated by the acts of 1793 and 1799 had been repeated in terms in that section; and the grant of compensation would then be direct and positive, both of the fixed sum of $1,500 per annum and of those specific fees and commissions. The general reference is equivalent to and of the same effect as the reiteration of the particulars, that being certain in law which may be reduced to a certainty; and, the tariff of fees and commissions being fixed, the collection of them would render this branch of compensation equally determinate with the other.

It is not denied that the act of 1849 means, that the defendant shall take, as his own property, the fees and commissions allowed by law. It is not directed that they shall be applied in satisfaction of his salary. The act guarantees the salary, with the possible implication that, if it is not obtained from other means in his hands, it will be paid him by the treasury. The question raised is, whether such direct devotement of fees and commissions is charged with the condition applied to antecedent grants of compensation to collectors, that salary and perquisites conjointly shall not exceed $6,000 per year. That limitation is supposed to be imparted by extending the revenue laws to California. We do not enter into that discussion; for, if such restriction might be implied, in the absence of any expression of the intent of congress, we think that the language of the fourth section of the act, establishing the compensation, indicates plainly that no limitation was meant to be applied in this case.

The act creates Upper California a collection district, and establishes a port of entry at San Francisco. It also establishes three other ports of delivery, and authorizes the appointment of a deputy collector to be stationed at each. It then declares, that the collector of said district shall be allowed a compensation of $1,500 per annum and the fees and commissions allowed by law, and that the said deputy collectors shall each be allowed a compensation of $1,000 per annum and the fees and commissions allowed by law. The same language is used in each of these paragraphs, and they are reasonably to be supposed to have been employed in a common sense. There is certainly no ground for an inference that congress designed to make a provision for the deputy collectors more advantageous to them than that applicable to the collector. The grant to them is not only affirmative and positive, but was an original one—that class of officers not being entitled, under the then existing revenue laws, to fees or commissions, or coming within the restrictive clauses of the acts of 1822 and 1841. The enactment must, accordingly, be understood as conferring on them absolutely, in addition to their salaries, the fees and commissions they collect, as making up their compensation, irrespective of whether the total produced be $6,000, or ten times that amount. The latter clause of the section thus manifesting plainly the purpose of congress to give to deputy collectors their salaries, together with all fees and commissions, the same expressions, used simultaneously in defining the compensation of the collector, must carry the same signification, unless restrained or extended by other language in the act. U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 556.

This construction deduced from the natural force of the enactment, may be considered as being corroborated by the particulars contained in the case, showing the facts and circumstances which led to and surrounded the passage of the act. Documents were laid before congress showing the exorbitant expenses to which the officers in charge of the revenue service in California would be subjected, and the necessity of immediate legislation extending the revenue laws to that territory. Executive Documents, 30th Cong. 2d Sess. Ineffectual efforts had been made by congress to organize the territory, and, at the close of the session, the act in question was pressed to its passage at the last hour of that congress, as being of urgent emergency, and was framed in general terms, to avoid the hazard of specific enactments and amendments. House Journal, 30th Cong. 2d Sess. p. 514; Senate Journal, 30th Cong. 2d Sess. p. 338; Congressional Globe, 30th Cong. 2d Sess. pp. 691, 692. The act was adopted only as a provisional measure, to be displaced at the next session by one adapted to the state of the country and its commercial business. No evidence was furnished at the time showing the extent of income to be expected from that collection district, or that all the fees and commissions received by the collector would afford him an unreasonable compensation; and it is fair presumption that congress intended, in leaving the collector to the chance of receiving no more than $1,500 a year, to give him the advantage of the contingency of the whole emolument of fees and commissions which might be collected.

This presumption is justified by contemporaneous, antecedent and subsequent enactments on the same subject matter, in which congress has cautiously avoided, by positive provisions, leaving the subject of compensation open to hypothetical augmentations or diminutions. In acts approved the same day with the one in question, congress excludes, by explicit language, all implication on the subject of compensation, and signifies its design to make the limitation in plain words, when one is to accompany the grant of pay. In the second section of the "Act to establish the collection district of Brazos de Santiago, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 409), it is provided, that the collector shall be entitled to a salary not exceeding $1,750 per annum, including in that sum the fees allowed by law, and that the amount he shall collect in any one year for fees exceeding the sum of $1,750, shall be accounted for and paid into the treasury of the United States. And, in relation to the deputy collector, it is provided, by the sixth section of the same act (9 Stat. 410), "that the compensation of the said deputy collector shall be the usual fees of office, and nothing more." So, in the second section of the act declaring Fort Covington in the state of New York a port of delivery, and authorizing the appointment of a deputy collector to reside at Chesapeake City in the state of Maryland, approved March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 414), it is provided, "that the compensation of the said deputy collector shall be the usual fees of office, and nothing more." The omission of those qualifications in the California act becomes more significant, in connection with the fact that two of the last-cited enactments were passed in the senate on the same day with the act in question, and the other one on the day preceding. Senate Journal, 30th Cong. 2d Sess. pp. 297, 305, 315, 327.

The presumption referred to is forcibly strengthened by the third section of the act of September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. 509), which makes applicable to the collection districts in California the provisions of law in relation to the payment of expenses incidental to the collection of the revenue from customs, existing prior to the act of March 3, 1849 (Id. 398), entitled "An act requiring all moneys receivable from customs and from all other sources, to be paid immediately into the treasury, without abatement or reduction, and for other purposes." This manifestly imports, that congress did not consider the mere extension of the revenue laws to California as carrying with it the restrictions or directions of the prior act of March 3, 1849; for, it would be supererogatory and tautological to re-enact a provision already in force. And, that such was the judgment of congress, is also inferable from the fact, that the act of September 28, 1850, does not renew the extension of the revenue laws to the state, but they are treated as in force there by virtue of the act of 1849 making that extension.

So, also, in acts passed prior to 1849, it seems to have been assumed, that an appointment of salary or fees, or of the two together, to revenue officers, would operate without limitation of amount, unless restricted by the express language of the enactment, notwithstanding the existing acts of 1822 and 1841; and, accordingly, congress, in repeated instances, declared such limitation in positive terms.

The second section of the act to establish a port of entry at Saluria and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1847 (9 Stat. 182), gives to the collector of Saluria a salary not exceeding $1,250, including in that sum the fees allowed by law, and requires the excess collected above that sum to be accounted for and paid into the treasury. The third section appoints specific salaries to several surveyors; and, to the deputy collector at Aransas, the legal fees on the business he may transact, and no more. The fifth section gives to the collector at Galveston a salary not exceeding $1,750, including in that sum the fees allowed by law, and directs the amount of fees collected exceeding that sum to be paid into the treasury.

This series of legislative acts appears to us to be a plain recognition by congress of the principle, that every appointment of compensation to revenue officers will have effect according to the terms of the enactment; and that limitations or restrictions as to amount are not to be presumed, but, on the contrary, to take effect, must be expressed in direct terms, or be connected with the grant by necessary implication.

We think, also, that the act subsequently passed, creating additional collection districts in California, approved September 28, 1850 (9 Stat. 508), rests upon the assumption that, to restrain the right of the collector of that district to retain all the fees and commissions collected by him, there must be a different disposition of those emoluments by positive law. The second section gives to the collector and other officers resident at San Francisco, salaries not exceeding a specified sum; and to the other collectors in the state definite salaries, with an additional maximum compensation of $2,000 each, should their official emoluments and fees provided by existing laws amount to that sum. The sixth section gives the collector of Mackinac a salary, together with such commissions and fees as are authorized by existing laws. The eighth section provides a salary to the collector of Minnesota, with the declaration, that he shall not receive any other compensation whatever, in the shape of extra allowance or fees of any description whatever.

So, also, the provisions of the act to create additional collection districts in the territory of Oregon, approved February 14, 1851 (9 Stat. 566), are drawn up in view of the same import of a general grant of fees. The second section grants to various collectors $1,000 each per annum, with an additional maximum compensation of $2,000 each per annum, should their emoluments and fees provided by existing laws amount to that sum; and allows to various surveyors, in addition to the fees authorized by existing laws, a compensation of $1,000 each per annum. The third section directs the appointment of several surveyors, whose compensations, in addition to the fees authorized by existing laws, shall not exceed $1,000 each per annum.

This course of enactments at periods before and after and concurrently with the act in question, denotes, in our judgment, that congress contemplated that a grant of fees, emoluments or commissions in positive terms, was free from the limitations and restrictions of the acts of 1822 and 1841, unless brought within those qualifications by other plain provisions in the law. We also think that the joint resolution of congress adopted February 14, 1850 (9 Stat. 560), if it has a bearing upon this case, is declaratory of the understanding of congress that the act of March 3, 1849, would be executed in that sense at the treasury.

The act of March 3, 1849, being the last statute applicable to the case of the defendant, we consider it to be the expression of the legislative will as to the amount and mode of the defendant's compensation in that service, and are of opinion that it is to be carried into effect conformably with its terms.

It is insisted, for the plaintiffs, that that act was superseded by the act of September 28, 1850, and that the defendant can claim for his services thereafter, until the time he was displaced in 1851, no compensation that is not authorized by the last-mentioned statute. The position is not taken, in terms, that the prior act is abrogated by the later one, but such is the legal import of the objection; and, no doubt, on general principles, the last enactment goes into immediate operation, and thus annuls and repeals all preceding ones inconsistent with it. Matthews v. Zane, 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 164; 1 Kent, Comm. (7th Ed.) 455.

It might, perhaps, be an open question, as respects third persons, whether the defendant could perform any official acts after the passage of the last-mentioned act, or maintain a claim at law, for his compensation. But we do not think that the plaintiffs in this action can avail themselves of that objection; and we are not called upon to consider what effect that act may have upon the rights of other parties than the United States, in their claims upon or dealings with the defendant. The plaintiffs, in adjusting his accounts at the treasury, and also in this action, proceed upon the assumption that he was clothed with the authority and responsibility of collector in respect to the government, so long as he continued to act in that capacity, without notice that his authority was rescinded. In exacting from him, up to that period, the services and responsibilities of collector, under the law authorizing his appointment, the plaintiffs must be held chargeable to him for all the rights and recompenses secured to him by that law, until he became apprised that his powers had ceased. The plaintiffs, by adopting the acts of the defendant between September 28, 1850, and January 14, 1851, as official and as within his legal competency, have sanctioned them, and rendered them valid, in so far as the claims arising therefrom in favor of the defendant and against the United States are concerned. In that point of view, it may probably be deemed, that the first organization of the collection districts in California, and the appointment of the defendant as collector, remained in force until the act of September 28, 1850, was put into execution. The act of March 3, 1849, extended the revenue laws of the United States over the territory of Upper California. The object and effect of that law have not been abrogated or suspended by express legislation; and it is not to be presumed that an interregnum in the administration of it was contemplated by congress in the enactment of the act of 1850—otherwise, there must have been a period in which no law for the imposition and collection of duties in that territory or state existed. The reasonable intendment would probably be, that the existing law was to remain in force until the new system or authority was put into operation in its place; and, in our opinion, the case of Cross v. Harrison, 16 How. [57 U. S.] 164, recognizes and applies a like principle to facts essentially analogous to that feature of the present case. But, whether this be so or not, we think that, in a transaction between the government and the collector, touching the adjustment of his accounts, the plaintiffs, by continuing an account with him as an officer duly acting under the law of 1849, have ratified those acts, and are concluded from denying his claim for a proper compensation therefor; and that the provisions of that act, being the one under which his services were rendered, afford a certain and appropriate measure of that compensation.

It is to be observed that the act of September 28, 1850, makes no different provision for the compensation of services rendered under the act of March 3, 1849, and cannot, accordingly, be construed as withdrawing the former provision, and substituting a new one for the compensation of those services. If it be apposite to the subject, it takes away all allowances in that respect, for it transmutes the single collection district created by the act of 1849 into six districts, each having all the officers and authority of an independent collection district, to each collector in which is appointed a specific compensation. There is no language in the act of 1850 indicating that any one of those allowances affords a rule for determining the pay to which the defendant would be entitled for performing duties over the entire state; and, if the provisions of that act were in any way applicable to this case, the reason of the thing would seem to require that the whole amount allotted to the six collectors for the same territory over which the authority of the defendant was exercised, should be allowed to him, rather than either of the separate sums designated. We do not, however, propose to discuss this point, because we place our decision on one of a broader bearing, and which renders this special topic unimportant.

The defendant was placed in charge of an important service, in a remote section of the Union, and where notice of the cessation of his office was not and probably could not be made known to him before January 14, 1851. A public necessity accordingly existed for the continuance of his functions up to that period. In performing those duties, he received and disbursed moneys, and charged and credited them to the plaintiffs, in the capacity of collector. The treasury continued its accounts with him in that character. It not only debited him, as collector, with receipts, and credited him officially with payments, until January 14, 1851, but it carried forward the accountings in that character until September 22, 1853, when the final balance was struck against him for his official indebtment. This action is prosecuted to recover from him moneys collected officially and retained by him to cover credits which he claims in his character of collector; and the plaintiffs, under the facts, might be held, after so dealing with him, to be concluded from denying that he was collector de facto and de jure, under the act of 1849, until the time when his office was transferred to a new officer, on the 14 of January, 1851, and that he is entitled to compensation until that period conformably to the provisions of the act of March 3, 1849. The plaintiffs establish no legal title to the moneys demanded, except in subserviency to that principle. The treasury transcript would be nugatory as to all doings of the defendant out of office, and could afford no foundation for the recovery of a debt incurred by him after the passage of the act of September 28, 1850. The full rights of either party cannot be adjusted in this action on any footing other than the assumption that the act of 1849 virtually governed the entire transactions until that of 1850 was put in actual operation.

We think, accordingly, that the defendant is entitled, on legal considerations, to retain from the various moneys in his hands as collector, the full compensation granted to him by the act of 1849. And it matters not, to the just determination of this cause, whether the decision be placed upon the ground that that act remained in force to this end, as between these parties, or whether a proportionate part of the salary of $1,500, together with the fees and commissions which accrued between September 28, 1850, and January 14, 1851, be adopted as measuring the quantum meruit of his services. We accordingly decide, that the defendant is entitled to be credited, on his accounting with the treasury department, with his salary at the rate of $1,500 per annum, and with the fees and commissions allowed by law, during the whole period in which he continued to perform the duties of collector in California; and we direct the special verdict to be entered accordingly.

We proceed to dispose of the questions of law arising under the following finding of the special verdict: "And the jury further find, that the said James Collier, as such collector as aforesaid, during his said official term of service, seized, as forfeited to the United States, certain liquors imported into the district of Upper California contrary to the revenue laws of the United States under such circumstances; and that, unless the want of a judicial proceeding to ascertain and enforce such forfeiture, or the circumstances herein or in the case to be stated, shall be deemed an impediment to such right, he, the said James Collier, by virtue of the ninety-first section of the act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, of 1799, would be entitled, as such collector, to one moiety of the said forfeitures. The jury further find, that it being impracticable, without an expenditure which would have consumed the whole value thereof in costs, to institute any regular judicial proceedings touching such forfeitures, the said James Collier caused the said seized liquors to be sold; that the proceeds of such sales were ninety-four thousand seven hundred and four dollars and sixty-six cents; that the costs and expenses of storing, preserving, and selling said liquors, amounting to twenty-four thousand eight hundred and seventy-three dollars and eighty cents; and that the nett proceeds of said forfeited goods, which came to the hands of said James Collier, amounted to sixty-nine thousand eight hundred and thirty dollars and eighty-six cents, of which the said James Collier claims the one half, being the said sum of thirty-four thousand nine hundred and fifteen dollars and forty-three cents. And, whether the said James Collier is accountable to the United States for all or any part of the proceeds of said liquors, or whether he is entitled to a credit, as collector, for the one moiety or half part thereof, being the last-mentioned sum, is submitted to the court. In each of such seizures, the said James Collier obtained from some owner, or from the carrier, master, or consignee, or other most accessible person, acting as agent for the owner in the importation of said liquors, or having the charge and custody thereof for the owner, a certificate, consent, or abandonment, similar in character to the certificates of abandonment which are inserted in the case as having been given in evidence on the trial.

He gave credit to the United States, in his periodical official returns to the treasury, for the gross sums so received on such sales, charged the said costs and expenses, and returned the appropriate vouchers to the treasury department, which returns were received without objection by the treasury department, from time to time, during his entire official term; and he claims to be entitled to retain to his own use a moiety of the said nett proceeds. After the commencement of this suit, the secretary of the treasury, assuming to act under the first branch of the fourth section of the act first above in this finding referred to, received applications on behalf of persons claiming to be owners of the said seized liquors, for remission of the said forfeitures, and made allowances to them, not as and for the proceeds of said sales, but as and for the cost or value of such liquors before their importation. A schedule of such allowances, with a statement of the amounts awarded or allowed as aforesaid, and of the amount paid out of the treasury of the United States under such allowances, and of the amounts remaining to be paid on demand and exhibition of power to receive the same, was given in evidence, is to be inserted in the case, and is to be deemed a part of this verdict."

We do not enter into the question whether, in the condition of things and under the exigencies stated in the special verdict at the time those moneys were received and paid into the treasury by the defendant, his proceedings constituted a legal forfeiture and disposal of the liquors seized and sold, or of their proceeds, as against the lawful owners. The precise question presented by the special verdict legitimately extends only to the inquiry, whether the United States have a right or title to the moiety thereof retained by the defendant, which enables them to collect from him or control that moiety. The special verdict presents considerations sufficiently direct and weighty to show that the official conduct of the defendant in the course taken by him in respect to those liquors, was based upon intentions to subserve the rights and interests both of the United States and of the owners of the property, and to exonerate him from all charge of a wanton misapplication of his powers and authority; and it shows, moreover, that the treasury adopted and ratified, so far as it was competent for that department to do so, the acts of the defendant in that behalf. In this posture of the case, it is not easy to produce any rule of law or equity which will enable the plaintiffs to disavow, at an after period, their approval of those acts, and hold the defendant responsible to them for the entire avails of the property. Nor are we satisfied that the United States acquired such title to the moiety retained by the defendant, as to enable them to maintain an action for its recovery against him.

We have put the decision of this point on the facts before us showing that the owners of the liquors seized, or their agents, assented to the sales by the defendant without the intervention of any court of law, and have never withdrawn or repudiated such assent, and that the treasury department, with full notice that no recourse had been had to the courts of the United States in Oregon or Louisiana, to obtain condemnation and sale of the property, received, to the use of the United States, the one-half of the proceeds of such sales, and entered the usual credits, in the accounts of the defendant, for such amount.

The proceeding by the secretary of the treasury to restore those proceeds to the owners of the liquors, after this suit was commenced, could not divest the right and title of the defendant to the one moiety which had been for a long period in his actual possession, and was received, as between him and the plaintiffs, in a manner tantamount to that of a formal distribution of the proceeds after condemnation by order of court. The authority of the secretary of the treasury to remit forfeitures under the revenue laws, has been determined to embrace also the interests of the officers entitled to share in the forfeitures; and such authority to remit may be exercised after judgment of condemnation. U. S. v. Morris, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S. 246; Id., [Case No. 15,816]. But the power ceases after the share of the forfeiture is received by the collector for distribution among his co-officers. Id. As the collector, in this instance, acted without the co-operation of a naval officer or surveyor, the entire moiety received by him was his legal share of the forfeiture, and is in his hands, with the same right on his part to the whole of it, that he would have possessed to his aliquot part of it, if it had been required by law to be divided between him and other officers. In our opinion, therefore, if the award of these moneys by the secretary of the treasury to the owners of the liquors seized, had been strictly in the form of a remission, under the authority of the first section of the act of March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. 506), it would be inoperative and void as to the defendant, after the moneys had publicly gone into his hands, and were held as his own property. The Hollen [Case No. 6,608].

The same principles would apply if the secretary of the treasury had acted under the fourth section of the act of September 28, 1850, and had directed the technical remission of the forfeitures; and this without respect to any question as to whether, the seizure and confiscation having been anterior to the passage of that act, it was not necessary, under the proviso to that section, to show the seizure to have been improper on the part of the collector.

Nor does it seem to us that a mere order of restoration of the proceeds of those forfeitures to the former owners, at the discretion of the secretary, without the concurrence of the defendant, or notice to him that such an order was applied for or was intended to be made, can be regarded as a remission, within the provisions either of the act of March 3, 1797, or of that of September 28, 1850.

We are of opinion, accordingly, that the defendant is entitled to retain the sum of $34,915.43, being the moiety of such proceeds, and to receive credit for the same in his accounts.

The claim of the defendant to a credit of $12,300, being the one-half of the amount of bonds received by him for certain vessels and goods seized as forfeited, was disallowed by the treasury department. The special verdict as to that claim finds, "that the sum purporting to be secured by three certain bonds to the United States, set forth with the evidence in this case, taken by the said James Collier for seized vessels or goods delivered up, and which are in evidence, being the vessels or the cargoes of the Ocean, Calloony, and Lallah, was twenty-four thousand six hundred dollars; that the said bonds were returned by him, said James Collier, on leaving office, into the treasury department of the United States, and have not been collected, nor have any proceedings been had or attempted by the treasury department for the purpose of collecting the same; and they further find, that if the said last-mentioned sum had been collected and received, the said James Collier would have been entitled to the sum of twelve thousand three hundred dollars, being the one-half part of the amount of the said bonds; and the said James Collier claims a credit for that amount in his accounts, the same having been disallowed."

In our opinion, the defendant is not entitled to have those bonds regarded as money actually paid into the treasury. They were not accepted by the treasury in satisfaction of the value of the property forfeited, so as to raise an equitable credit, on that footing, in favor of the defendant. He received the bonds and transmitted them to the treasury department, to be dealt with there under their authority and not under his; and, even a laches by the government, if one may be imputed to it, in not enforcing the bonds, would not authorize him to treat those securities as so much money received by the treasury. He gives no evidence that the obligors are or were responsible sureties for the amount, nor that he demanded any action on the part of the government to enforce payment of the bonds. No higher right to the value of the bonds can be claimed by the defendant, than he would have possessed to the vessels or merchandise which they represent, had such property been detained, by order of the treasury department, under arrest and without adjudication; and it is plain that the collector's right to a share in seized property applies only to the proceeds obtained from its condemnation and sale, and in no way attaches to the property itself. There is no evidence before the court authorizing it to act upon those securities as money proceeds of the seized property. We are, therefore, of opinion, upon the finding of the jury, that this claim was properly disallowed by the department.

The special verdict finds, "that of the moneys so received by the said James Collier, twenty-eight thousand dollars was received for the additional duties of twenty per centum ad valorem, prescribed to be levied, collected and paid, by the eighth section of the act reducing the duty on imports and for other purposes, passed July 30, 1846, one-half of which sum the said James Collier claims as a credit in his accounts, the same having been disallowed." We consider the case of Ring v. Maxwell, 17 How. [58 U. S.] 147, as determining that the sum so demanded by the defendant did not accrue from fines or penalties, but was composed of duties chargeable by law on the merchandise imported. Accordingly, the defendant has no legal claim to that sum.

The special verdict finds, that "the said James Collier, in rendering his said periodical accounts, charged himself, as a part of a larger amount, with the sum of eight thousand one hundred and ten dollars and twenty-nine cents, received to the use of the United States by the deputy collector at Monterey, which forms a part of the debits so claimed against him by the United States in the several stated accounts. The said sum was stolen from the said deputy collector without neglect or default on his part, or on the part of the said James Collier, and the said James Collier, in the same account in which he returned the said last-mentioned sum as a charge against himself, claimed a credit per contra, against the United States, for the last-named sum thus stolen."

The deputy collector at Monterey was not made subject to the removal or control of the collector of the district. The collector had no other connection with his appointment than that of proposing him to the secretary of the treasury for his approbation; and the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1849, secures to the deputy a compensation independent of the collector, and gives to him, in his section of the district, the same standing, in respect to fees and commissions, as the collector had at San Francisco. This would rather render the deputy collectors in California agents of the government than of the collector personally. Whether this be so or not, the legal relation between public officers and their sworn assistants, even when they are acting directly in connection, is generally not that of master and servant, or principal and agent; and the liability of the official superior for defaults of his assistants arises only in case of his own misconduct or neglect. Dunlop v. Munroe, 7 Cranch [11 U. S.] 242; Story Ag. §§ 321, 322; Bailey v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 3 Hill, 531; Wiggins v. Hathaway, 6 Barb. 632.

Even if the defendant stands in law responsible for the conduct and liabilities of the deputy at Monterey, and is to be regarded as the holder, for the benefit of the United States, of the funds purloined, still, it being found, by the verdict of the jury, that the money was stolen, the defendant, upon well-established principles of equity law, would be exonerated from all liability for them. Spence, Eq. Jur. 437, and cases there cited.

In an action by the United States against a disbursing officer or agent or other individual, for the recovery of moneys claimed of him, the defendant is entitled, on the trial, to the allowance of all equitable demands of his against the United States, if the same have been submitted to the proper accounting officers of the government and disallowed by them. Act March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. 515, § 4); U. S. v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. [19 U. S.] 135; U. S. v. Jones, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 375; U. S. v. Robeson, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 319; U. S. v. Hawkins, 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 125.

On the finding of the jury, the charge in question must be rejected from the account against the defendant.

On a careful consideration of the whole case we shall order judgment to be entered therein to the following purport:

1. The defendant is entitled, under the fourth section of the act of March 3, 1849, to a credit, as compensation for his services as collector, to $1,500 per annum, and the fees and commissions allowed by law, without limitation or restriction, from the date of his appointment under the said act, and during the continuance of his services as such collector, down to the 14th of January, 1851, when he surrendered the custom-house to T. Butler King, who then appeared and took possession of the same, and entered upon the discharge of the duties of his office as collector under the act of September 28th, 1850, which organized the territory of California into six collection districts, and provided for the appointment of a collector in each district.

2. The defendant is not entitled to a credit for a moiety of the $28,000 received as additional duties of 20 per cent. ad valorem, under the eighth section of the tariff act of July 30, 1846.

3. The defendant is not entitled to a credit for a moiety of the $24,600 secured by bonds given upon the release of vessels seized for a violation of the revenue laws.

4. The defendant is not liable for the $8,110.29 charged against him, which was received by the deputy collector at Monterey, and which was stolen from him without default on his part or that of the collector.

5. The question of interest is reserved until the account is stated between the government and the defendant conformably to the principles here settled.

Subsequently, the case was submitted to the court upon the reserved question of interest, and upon an agreed exhibit of the counsel for the respective parties, showing that, upon the accounts stated conformably to the decision of the court upon the merits, there was a balance due to the defendant of the sum of $8,110.29, being the sum of money allowed to him by the special verdict as having been stolen from the deputy collector at Monterey; and the counsel were heard upon the question, whether either party was entitled to an allowance of interest upon any and which particulars of the account.

Before NELSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

BETTS, District Judge. We are of opinion that no interest be allowed to either party, and that a balance of $8,110.29, as due to the defendant, be certified in favor of the defendant against the United States, according to the terms of the special verdict.

In the argument before the court in support of the claim to interest, the counsel for the United States conceded that, according to the principles laid down in the opinion of the court on the case at large, the defendant had overpaid the government, unless he was chargeable with interest. The proposition maintained for the plaintiffs is, that the account should, under the decision of the court, be stated as follows:

Balance, as computed without interest, in the account made up on the 7th of March, 1853.....		$216,712 43
Deduct, by order of the court:
One-half of nett proceeds of seized liquors	$34,915 43
Commissions	63,250 95
Money stolen at Monterey	8,110 29
		106,276 67
		$110,435 76
Interest on this sum from January 14, 1851, to 16th September, 1853, at 6 per cent.....		17,721 88
		$128,157 64
Deduct payment, 16th September, 1853		118,546 05
Balance		$9,611 59

It is admitted that, applying the payment of $118,546.05 to the account, the debit side, independent of interest, is satisfied, with a balance over in favor of the defendant; but it is contended that the balance of interest remaining unpaid forms, from the time of such payment, a new capital, on which interest should be computed to the time of the judgment. On that hypothesis, the plaintiffs claim to be entitled to judgment for $9,611.59.

The jury find "that five several statements of the defendant's account were made up by the treasury department, and that the balance stated as due from the defendant to the United States in each of said five accounts was not due, a less amount, if any thing, being in fact due, and that none of the said accounts, except the last, contained any claim for interest, and, in the last of said accounts, interest was claimed, as therein stated." The last statement there referred to was made up September 22, 1853. This action was commenced in May, 1852, upon the indebtedness charged in the account stated June 7, 1851.

It is at best questionable whether the comptroller had any authority to restate and augment the debit side of the account, at any time after the first statement had been adopted and repeated in the subsequent treasury statements of September and December, 1851, and March, 1853. Ex parte Randolph [Case No. 11,558]; U. S. v. Kuhn [Id. 15,545]. More particularly would the right of accounting officers to change the treasury statement, by adding a claim of interest, after a payment had been received from the defendant which overpaid the principal really due upon the account as it stood when the payment was made, be open to exception; for, it is the addition of interest to the demand after the 16th of September, 1853, when the defendant paid into the treasury $118,546.05, which produces the balance of $9,611.59, claimed to be due on the statement of September 22, 1853. The technical objection to varying the account is, that it creates a new cause of action after suit brought; but, one more vital to it on the merits is, that the treasury department acts in a judicial capacity in determining the charges to which the defendant is subject, and is not competent to vary that adjudication subsequently, to his prejudice. The decision of the department, within the rules prescribed for the exercise of its powers, is, in effect, final. U. S. v. Jones, 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 375. We think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to set up a charge of interest made in the restatement of the defendant's account on the 22d of September, 1853, and to renew that charge in this action.

But, if this objection is disregarded, and the right to interest is placed upon the footing that the defendant is liable, under the direct provisions of the first section of the act of March 3d, 1797 (1 Stat. 512), for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money—or on the general principle of law, that a running account is to be deemed liquidated, so as to form a basis of liability for interest, from the time of its adjustment and statement at the treasury—or on the ground that a trustee is chargeable with interest on all sums in his hands, from the time they are received until they are paid over or applied to the use of the cestui que trust—the plaintiffs, in our opinion, fail to bring this case within the purview of either of those principles.

The statute subjects a receiver of public money to the payment of interest thereon, if he "shall neglect or refuse to pay into the treasury the sum or balance reported to be due to the United States upon the adjustment of his account." Act March 3, 1797, § 1 (1 Stat. 512). The imposition of interest is made by the statute dependent on the refusal of the delinquent to pay into the treasury the sum or balance reported to be due. Upon the finding of the jury by their special verdict, the sum or balance reported to be due in the five different adjustments and statements of the defendant's account, was, in no instance, due; and this verdict relieves the defendant from the obligation to pay into the treasury either sum or balance reported to be due by him. It would be oppressive to exact a deposit of $791,065.31 in the treasury by the defendant, at the risk of his being subjected to the payment of interest upon any balance which might chance to be reserved out of a vastly surcharged account, during the indefinite period in which the subject might be kept in litigation.

There is strong reason for understanding the provisions of the act as being directed against wilful defaulters, whose delinquency is made clear. Interest in the nature of a penal infliction may then be carried into the account and enforced against them. This is not the position in which the defendant is placed by the proofs. There was no delinquency on his part in bringing his accounts to an adjustment. The evidence is full to show that his accounts and vouchers were promptly transmitted by him to the treasury department, and that the department was beset by himself personally, by his agents, and by correspondence, from the date of his return from California, with importunate urgency, to bring his accounts to an adjustment. The impediment to the completion of the accountings was in no respect with him. The fluctuations of balances in the successive statements, descending and ascending, between $791,065.31 and $181,797, and finally resting at $216,712.43, upon which he paid into the treasury $8,110.29 more than is found to be due to the United States, resulted from the varying views, among the accounting officers, of the proofs, which, from the beginning, had been one and the same before them. We do not wish to be understood as saying that, if the suit had been brought upon the statement of March 7, 1853, a jury might not, in passing upon the rights of parties embraced in a complicated and indeterminate state of accounts, have awarded interest on the sum paid in September, 1853, and which was found sufficient to extinguish the debt. But, in our judgment, the treasury statement so made up, is not to be accepted as a liquidated adjustment, fixing an indebtedness upon the defendant, and stands in law, when in contestation, and found to be grossly erroneous, no more privileged to claim interest, than running demands between parties, consisting of moneys advanced on one side and disbursements and services upon the other. We consider the accounts as open and running, in effect, until the plaintiffs and the defendant accepted the one of the 7th of March, 1853, made up during the pendency of the action, as that upon which the rights of the parties were to be determined. This charge was fully satisfied and extinguished by payment, and, had it included a charge of interest, we should have considered the plaintiffs entitled to interest, from the time the balance was ascertained, until its discharge. As that account contained no such charge, and no undertaking of the defendant to pay interest is proved, we place the demand on the same ground of an unliquidated account, which it previously held.

To have our conclusions distinctly apprehended, it is proper to observe, that the plaintiffs gave in evidence, in support of their action, no other adjusted statement of the defendant's accounts than the one first made up, that of June 7th, 1851, and that the subsequent statements were given in evidence by the defendant.

This case was taken to the supreme court by writ of error, and the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed by a divided court. For that reason, the case does not appear in the Reports of the Supreme Court.

Case No. 14,834.

UNITED STATES v. COLLINS et al.

[4 Blatchf. 142;[1] 21 Law Rep. 37.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. April 1, 1858.

JUDGMENT—EXECUTION SALE—MORTGAGES—INJUNCTION—GOVERNMENT CONTRACT TO CARRY MAIL—LIENS.

1. Under the facts of this case, the government of the United States had no right to withhold from a party who had contracted with it to perform a mail service by sea, a portion of the pay provided for by the contract.

2. Under Act June 27, 1848 (9 Stat. 241), the power of the postmaster general to impose a fine on a contractor for the transmission of mails to and from foreign countries, for any unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the departure of the mails, or in the performance of the trips, is limited to the cases and for the causes specified in the act.

3. A recommendation made by the postmaster general to the secretary of the navy, to make a deduction from the pay of a contractor, on the ground that a portion of the service was performed by a steamer not of the class stipulated for in the contract, is not the imposition of a fine, within the terms of that act.

4. Where the creditor of a steamship company was proceeding to sell its steamers under an execution issued by a state court, and the government of the United States applied to this court to restrain such sale, on the ground that it had liens on the steamers, under chattel mortgages for advances made to build them, and a sale under the mortgages required a prior notice of six months: Held, that the rights of the execution creditors were superior to those of the government, so far at least as to allow them to sell the vessels subject to the lien of the government.

5. Whether the granting by this court of an injunction to stay such sale, is not forbidden by section 5 of the act of March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334), which prohibits the courts of the United States from granting an injunction to stay proceedings in any court of a state, quere.

[Cited in Yick Wo v. Crowley, 26 Fed. 208.]

This was an application for a provisional injunction against [Edward K. Collins] William Brown and others, creditors of the New York and Liverpool United States Mail Steamship Company, who had obtained judgments upon their demands against that company, in the courts of the state of New York, and had issued executions thereon to the sheriff of the city and county of New York, to restrain and prevent the sale, under such executions, of the mail steamers Atlantic and Baltic, upon which vessels it was claimed that the United States had liens, under certain deeds of trust or chattel mortgages, for moneys advanced towards building and completing those vessels.

Theodore Sedgwick, Dist. Atty.

Charles O'Conor, Francis B. Cutting, and Clarkson N. Potter, for defendants.

HALL, District Judge. It is not alleged that the judgments upon which the executions were issued were fraudulently obtained, or that there is any reason to doubt, that the demands upon which they were rendered, were legally and justly due to the plaintiffs in such executions. Indeed, no collusion whatever is alleged, and neither fraud nor bad faith is imputed to any of the defendants. The claim of the United States is based on the allegation, that they have a lien for advances upon the steamships named; and the equitable ground upon which the motion for an injunction is based, may be very briefly stated, in the very language of the bill. That language is as follows: "And the plaintiffs further show, that they have reason to believe, and do believe and apprehend, that if the said steamships are sold, any purchaser or purchasers of the said steamships will have the power to remove, and may remove, the same out of the jurisdiction of this court and of the United States, and in that case the plaintiffs would be wholly remediless."

The defendants, by their affidavits and by other papers read in opposition to the motion, strike at once at the foundation of the plaintiffs' rights, and insist that there is no longer any legal or equitable lien upon the Atlantic and Baltic, under the deeds of trust or chattel mortgages, because the lien for such advances has been, or should be, fully cancelled by the secretary of the navy. That officer has, as they allege, withheld from the owners of such steamships an amount due to them for mail service rendered to the government, much larger than that now claimed by the United States; and they produce a copy of an opinion of Mr. Attorney General Black, dated June 4th, 1857, and given at the request of the secretary of the navy, in which, after an elaborate examination, he decides that, upon the case presented to him, and which certainly was not a stronger one against the government than that presented upon this motion, the amount now claimed by the steamship company was improperly, and without authority, withheld. After a careful reading of this opinion of the attorney general, I cannot but assent to his conclusion, that the deductions made from the sums claimed by the steamship company for mail service, have not been legally made.

Perhaps I might properly refuse the injunction in this case without stating any reasons for my judgment beyond those furnished by the very full and elaborate opinion of the learned attorney general; and certainly a court of equity should require very clear and satisfactory evidence that the attorney general had mistaken either the facts or the law of the case, before interposing, by injunction, to prevent the due execution of the final process of another court, issued in behalf of an honest creditor, to enforce his adjudicated and admitted rights, upon the mere ground that the execution of such process, and the enforcement of such rights, might possibly, or would probably, prevent the government from taking legal or other proceedings to enforce a claim which its highest law-officer had deliberately declared to be unfounded. It may, however, give more satisfaction to the parties and their counsel, if I state some of the reasons on which I base my opinion.

It is unnecessary to state in detail the terms of the original contract for the building of the steamships which have been known as the steamships of the Collins line, or even to give at length the deeds of trust, or chattel mortgages, under which the United States now claim. It has not been contended that the bill in this case can be sustained upon the ground that there has been a failure to perform the agreements contained in the original contract, and that the government has become entitled to an uncertain sum by way of damages; and the claim now made by the government is based entirely upon the assumption that there is a balance due the United States for the moneys advanced under such deeds of trust, or chattel mortgages. Those deeds of trust were severally intended as security for the advances made under them in pursuance of an act of congress authorizing such advances, and requiring the repayment thereof to be secured by a lien on such ships, in such manner as the secretary of the navy should require. They have been regarded as mortgages, as they are in substance; and it is alleged in the bill that they have been duly and annually filed in the office of the register of the city and county of New York, as required by the laws of New York, to make them valid and continuing liens, as chattel mortgages, against judgment creditors and subsequent incumbrancers. By the first of those deeds of trust, the then owners of the steamships Pacific (since totally lost at sea) and Atlantic, did bargain, sell and convey the said steamships, with all their tackle, apparel and furniture, to the trustee therein named, upon trust, nevertheless, that the said owners were to retain the possession of such steamships, and employ them in carrying the mails, &c.; and if, after the expiration of one year from the commencement of their employment in the mail service, under the existing contract with the United States, being required thereto in writing by the secretary of the navy, they should fail to repay in money, or to refund out of their compensation for mail service, for one year, or out of the value of said vessels, if, before the expiration of one year, they should be taken into the service of the United States, such outstanding balances as might be due on account of such advances, and the interest thereon, then the said trustee, being required so to do by the secretary of the navy of the United States, should, after advertising, for six months, in two newspapers published in the city of New York, the time and place of such sale, proceed to sell at public auction, for cash, the said steamships, &c., and, out of the proceeds of said sale, pay, first, the expenses of executing such trust, and secondly, such unsatisfied balances of advances, &c. This is the substance of the provisions of that deed of trust, so far as the same appear to me to be material to the questions presented upon the present motion; and the provisions of the deed of trust in regard to the Baltic, though somewhat different in form and language, are, in substance, very nearly the same. By those provisions, the rights and the remedies of the United States as against the vessels are precisely declared and limited; and, although it may now be seen that more summary proceedings for enforcing the repayment of the advances, by the sale of the ships mortgaged, would be more beneficial to the United States, if its claim for the large balance now demanded could be sustained, a court of equity cannot reform the contracts and introduce provisions which were never assented to by the parties, or intended by them to be embraced therein.

The United States insist that there is a balance of $115,500 due for advances made under those deeds of trust; and the defendants insist that there is a larger amount due to the steamship company for mail service in the year ending on the 31st March, 1857, which they are entitled to set-off, and which the government is legally and equitably bound to set-off, against the balance now claimed, so far as such set-off may be necessary, in order to extinguish the alleged indebtedness to the government. The government, on the other hand, insists, that the secretary of the navy has fully paid for the mail service rendered, and that nothing is now due therefor. The mail service for which compensation is so claimed, was agreed to be rendered by a contract made with the secretary of the navy, by which Collins and his associates agreed to build certain steamers—each to be of at least two thousand tons burthen and one thousand horse power—and with such steamers to carry the mails between New York and Liverpool, according to the terms of the contract. The mail service required to be performed by the contract, and the compensation therefor, were afterwards increased in pursuance of subsequent acts of congress, and the five steamers provided for in the contract, were, it is conceded, built by Collins and his associates, and those claiming under them, and were accepted by the navy department as having been built in compliance with the contract. Unfortunately, however, two of the steamers have been lost at sea. No fault has been imputed to Collins or his associates, in respect to either of those losses. In consequence of the loss of the Arctic, and the unexplained delay in the arrival of the Pacific —justifying the belief that she had gone down at sea—the owners of the remaining steamers were unable to transport the mails to and from Liverpool and New York in such steamers as were, by the contract, to be employed in that service. Under these circumstances, Mr. Collins, on the 17th of March, 1856, applied to the secretary of the navy, and solicited "permission to take a steamship to supply the place of the Pacific," and asked a telegraphic dispatch in reply. A favorable answer was communicated by telegraph, and, on the 22d of the same month, Mr. Collins inclosed to the secretary of the navy a duplicate of his letter of the 17th, and informed him that, in accordance with his telegraphic dispatch, they had chartered the Ericsson. In the same letter, he requested the secretary to write him confirming the telegraphic dispatch. On the 24th of the same month, and in reply to Mr. Collins' letter of the 22d, the secretary, having been thus apprised of the character of the Ericsson for the purpose of supplying the place of the Pacific, in the transportation of the mail, wrote to Mr. Collins as follows: "Navy Department, March 24th, 1856. Sir: In reply to your letter of the 22d instant, the department hereby confirms its dispatch to you by telegraph on the 19th instant, consenting to your supplying the place of the Pacific by substituting another steamship. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, J. C. Dobbin. E. K. Collins, Esq., No. 56 Wall Street, New York." On the 18th of April, 1856, Mr. Collins again wrote to the secretary of the navy, advising him of the launch of the Adriatic, and asking permission, in the event of the non-arrival of the Pacific, to substitute another steamer in her place, until the Adriatic should be ready for sea; and, on the 21st of the same month, the secretary wrote the following, in reply: "Navy Department, April 21st, 1856. Sir: In reply to your letter of the 18th inst., the department consents to the substitution of another steamship, in the place of the Pacific, supposed to have been lost, until the Adriatic is ready to be placed on the line. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, J. C. Dobbin. E. K. Collins, Esq., No. 56 Wall Street, New York." This correspondence is, in my judgment, sufficient evidence of the unqualified and unconditional consent of the secretary of the navy, that the Ericsson, or some other steam vessel, competent to the performance of the mail service required of a vessel of the Collins line, should be substituted for the lost Pacific, in the performance of mail service, not only for the trip referred to in the first letter of Mr. Collins and the telegraphic dispatch in reply, but also until a reasonable time to prepare the Adriatic for sea had elapsed. It is idle to suppose that the secretary intended to require that the service should be performed by a steamship built in pursuance of the original contract for such mail service, or equal in all respects to the other vessels of the Collins line; for it is safe to assume, upon the affidavits read and the admissions made by the district attorney upon the argument—and it might almost be assumed as a matter of public history, of which the court was bound to take judicial notice—that the secretary, as well as Mr. Collins, well knew no such vessel could be obtained for the service. If, then, it was intended to qualify such consent by a condition that a reduction in the amount of mail-pay should be submitted to, at the discretion of the postmaster general, or the secretary of the navy, or otherwise, the condition should have been expressly and distinctly made.

I shall not stop to inquire whether the secretary of the navy had authority to consent to this substitution for the purpose of mail transportation, but shall assume, as the postmaster general, the secretary of the navy, the attorney general, and the accounting officers of the treasury appear to have assumed, that he had such authority. Upon that assumption, large sums have already been paid for the mail service rendered by the Ericsson, and the authority of the secretary to make the arrangement was not questioned on the argument. The claim on the part of the government is not that the parties represented by Mr. Collins were not entitled, under their contract, to payment for such services, but that the government, or its officers, have a right to make a reduction from the stipulated compensation, or to impose a fine or penalty upon the contractors, upon the ground of inferior service, or delay, in the transportation of the mails. It is conceded that no provision, in the original or any subsequent contract, authorizes, either expressly or by necessary implication, the deduction made, or the imposition of any fine or penalty, under the circumstances of the present case; and, the contract having expressly provided that there should "be a forfeiture of the pro rata pay for the trip, either from New York to Liverpool, or from Liverpool to New York, when the trip is not made and the mails delivered," and having fixed no time within which the trips should be run, a forfeiture or deduction because one steamer was fourteen days making a trip, whilst another was able to make it in twelve, would not, of itself, subject the contractors to either fine, penalty or forfeiture. If these contracts and this correspondence were the contracts and correspondence of private parties, I should certainly hold that the full amount of mail-pay might be legally claimed for each of the trips of the Ericsson, and the same measure of justice must be applied between the government and its contractors as between private parties to like contracts.

It was, however, very ably argued by the learned district attorney, that the deductions made were made under the provisions of the act of congress approved June 27, 1848 (9 Stat. 241); and that, that statute having vested in the postmaster general the power to impose fines on contractors at his discretion, subject only to the limitations prescribed in the act, his action was conclusive, and could not be reviewed in a court of law or equity. And it was insisted that the learned attorney general had omitted in his opinion, to refer to the provisions of that act; and that, therefore, the claim of the government might be sustained, and the injunction asked for might be granted, without repudiating the principles of the attorney general's opinion. It was also insisted, that the postmaster general's action was conclusive upon the parties and upon the court, and that he had the power of considering and determining, in the absence of the parties to be affected by his decision, and without appeal, not only the amount of fine or reduction, but whether the circumstances of the particular case justified the exercise of the power to impose a fine, or order a deduction, under the provisions of the act.

Waiving entirely the discussion of the question whether the congress of the United States can, by law, change the terms of an existing contract to which the United States government is a party, and not stopping to inquire whether the doctrine of this court, that one who invokes the exercise of its equitable jurisdiction must himself do equity, may or may not be applicable to the case, and not considering that this court, as a court of equity, does not lend its aid to enforce penalties and forfeitures, although it may, perhaps, relieve against penalties when they have been imposed under a mistake in regard to the facts of the case, and the parties interested have not been afforded an opportunity to be heard in opposition, there is, I think, a conclusive answer to the argument of the learned attorney for the United States. That answer is, that no fine has ever been imposed under the provisions of the act referred to; and, probably, for the simple reason, that no case has arisen justifying such action on the part of the postmaster general. The act referred to enacts, that, "to secure the regular transmission of the mail to and from foreign countries, the postmaster general be and he is hereby authorized and required to impose fines on contractors, for any unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the departure of such mails, or in the performance of the trip; provided, that the fine for any one default shall not exceed one-half of the contract price paid for the trip." Now, the whole action of the government assumes, that the trip was made by the Ericsson under the contract with Collins and his associates, and, if I am right in the conclusion, that the secretary of the navy, on behalf of the government, unqualifiedly and unconditionally consented to the substitution of that vessel for the Pacific, in the performance of the mail service required under the existing contract, the only question remaining open, and certainly the only one so far as the right to impose a fine under this statute is concerned, is, whether there was unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the departure of the mails sent by the Ericsson, or in the performance of her trips. No such delay has been shown. It has not been pretended that the mails did not depart at the proper time, nor has it been insisted that the Ericsson was not run with reasonable rapidity. Indeed, it was shown by affidavit, and virtually conceded, that the contractors, or those claiming under them, had procured as good a steamer, in respect to speed, size, &c., as could be procured for the service, and had, in good faith and with commendable energy, diligence and skill, earnestly endeavored to carry out their contract. There was, therefore, no case for the exercise of the power of the postmaster general under the act, and it is clear that he never, either in form or substance, assumed to exercise it in the case of the trips of the Ericsson, at least so far as the facts have appeared upon the hearing of this motion. The power to impose a fine is limited to the cases and for the causes specified in the act; and the power, though an administrative power, is so far judicial in its character, that it must appear that the officer clothed with the power has assumed to exercise and has in fact exercised it. It must, therefore, appear that the postmaster general has imposed a fine for the prescribed cause—that he has completed the exercise of the power in the particular case, not that he has advised the head of another department to make a deduction from the pay of a contractor, on the ground that an inferior service has been performed.

In this case, no order or adjudication of the postmaster general imposing a fine has been shown, and the only evidence of the action of the postmaster general, which has been furnished on this hearing, is a copy of a letter addressed by that officer to the secretary of the navy, under date of June 30th, 1856, and the statement, in the opinion of the attorney general, that such a letter was at that time addressed by the postmaster general to the secretary. That letter is in the following words: "Post-Office Department, Washington, June 30th, 1856. Sir: The certificates on the files of this department show that the Collins line of steamers have performed twelve trips between New York and Liverpool, carrying the United States mails, (six outward from New York and six inward,) from the 23d of April to the 22d June, 1856, inclusive. Four of these trips (two outward and two inward) having been performed by the Ericsson, an irregular steamer, and not of the class stipulated for in the contract, I advise, by reason of the inferior service which has been given, that there be allowed $15,000 per round trip, or $30,000 for the four trips performed by the said steamer. The prices paid by government for each round trip performed by the Bremen line is $16,666.66, and by the Havre line $12,500, and fifteen thousand dollars a round trip is therefore considered a liberal compensation for the Ericsson. It is, therefore, recommended, that the sum of thirty-six thousand dollars ($36,000) be deducted from the mail-pay of the present quarter. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant, James Campbell. The Hon. J. C. Dobbin, Secretary of the Navy." It will be observed, that the postmaster general, in this letter, entirely fails to notice the important fact, that the Ericsson had been unconditionally substituted for a regular steamer of the Collins line, in the performance of this mail service, by the consent of the secretary of the navy. A fact so important to the recommendation made would, as it strikes me, have been referred to by the postmaster general, if it had been within his official knowledge; and, if such fact had been duly considered by him, it is not probable that such a recommendation would have been made. But a more important feature of this letter is to be noticed. That is, that the postmaster general does not state that there has been any unreasonable or unnecessary delay in the departure of the mails, or in the performance of any trip; that he does not state that he has imposed or intends to impose any fine for any such delay; that he only advises and recommends that the secretary of the navy allow $30,000 for the two round trips performed by the Ericsson, deducting $36,000 from the contract price of such trips; and that he bases such advice and recommendation, not on the ground of unreasonable or unnecessary delay, but on the ground of the inferior service given, the trips having been performed by an irregular steamer, not of the class stipulated for in the original contract. The fact that he did not assume or attempt to exercise any power conferred by the act of 1848 before alluded to, is sufficiently evidenced by these circumstances, and by the fact that the deduction recommended exceeded by $3000 the highest fine which he could have imposed under that act. It appears, from the opinion of the attorney general, that this letter of the postmaster general was sent from the navy department to the fourth auditor without any direction or remark, and that the auditor struck off $36,000 accordingly. A like similar deduction, on substantially the same grounds, was afterwards made.

When this action of the postmaster general was made known to Mr. Collins, he addressed a letter to the secretary of the navy, remonstrating against the deduction, insisting that the substitution of the Ericsson had been consented to without any intimation that the government would withhold any part of the mail-pay, and stating that, having acted upon the absolute permission to employ another steamer, without any terms or conditions being imposed, he trusted that the secretary would reconsider the matter and direct the balance of the last quarter to be remitted. On the 16th of the same month, Mr. Collins transmitted to the secretary of the navy a duplicate of his letter of July 5th, and requested an early reply. On the 17th, the secretary of the navy acknowledged the receipt of the last-mentioned two letters, and added: "No reply has been given to the first, because it is still under the consideration of the department. When the matter has been decided, you shall be informed of the result." It is shown, by affidavit, that no notice that the matter had been finally decided by the navy department has ever been given. The attorney general's opinion shows that it was pending before him as late as June 4th, 1857, on which day —some months after Mr. Secretary Dobbin had left the department—he gave an opinion in favor of the contractors; and no evidence has been furnished that any final decision has since been made by the secretary of the navy. If such a decision has ever been made, the neglect to give the promised notice to Mr. Collins has probably been occasioned by the retirement from office of the secretary who promised to give the notice, and by the circumstance that the fact that such a promise had been made had never been communicated to his successor. It will thus be seen—although the fact, in a legal point of view, may not be of much significance—that there is no direct evidence that the secretary of the navy has not concurred, or will not concur, in the opinion of the attorney general.

Nor has it been shown that the secretary of the navy has, in writing, required Collins and his associates, or those claiming under him, to refund the balance now claimed on account of advances made on said steamships, in money, or out of the compensation due for mail service, as required by the provisions of the deeds of trust before referred to—the letters of the district attorney, written under the instructions of the secretary of the navy, not being a strict and technical compliance with the conditions of the deeds of trust. But I do not choose to rest my decision upon any technical ground, being entirely satisfied that the defendants have a right to insist that there is a larger sum due for mail service than that yet remaining unpaid on account of the advances secured by the trust deeds, and also to insist, in this court, that one claim shall be set off against the other.

If, however, I could reach the conclusion that there would still be a balance due to the government, upon the equitable adjustment of its accounts with the Collins line, I should be unable to find any solid ground on which to rest a decision in favor of the United States, upon the present motion. The execution creditors have a present right to proceed to sell the Atlantic and Baltic, subject to the lien, if any, which the government has thereon; and, if that lien is good and valid as against those execution creditors, a sale under such executions must necessarily be subject to such lien. The execution creditors have a present right to sell under their executions. Such is the remedy given them by law. The United States have at best but a right to sell after a notice of six months, according to the express terms of their contract. Both are strictly legal rights. Certainly the rights, and even the equities, of the execution creditors, would even then be superior to those of the United States, so far, at least, as to allow them to sell the steamships, subject to the liens of the government. That they may be sold to some unknown person, that such person may possibly take them beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, and the existence of a vague fear that the claim of the United States may be endangered thereby, is no sufficient ground for postponing the claims of the execution creditors until the expiration of the six months required to perfect a sale under the deeds of trust or mortgages. This court cannot order a present sale of the steamers under the deeds of trust, and the neglect of the United States to provide, by those instruments, for a more summary proceeding to enforce their rights, and for taking possession of the property, upon a failure to repay the advances according to the terms of the contract, furnishes no equitable ground for relief against the execution creditors, whose rights, such as they are, are absolute and may be legally and equitably carried into immediate execution. I am, therefore, entirely clear, that the United States have shown no equities superior to those of the execution creditors, and that they are not entitled to the injunction prayed for.

It must not be supposed that, in thus expressing a decided and confident opinion against this motion, I intend to intimate that it was improper to present this case for the consideration of this court. The questions presented are judicial in their character, and properly belong to the courts of the United States; and the head of an executive department and the district attorney may, therefore, well decline, in a case of the magnitude and importance of that presented by the bill in this case, to take the responsibility of deciding, as administrative officers, against a claim of the United States which can be readily made the subject of judicial investigation.

It may be proper, also, to state, that if I had reached a different conclusion in regard to the equities of the parties, I should have felt bound to ask an argument upon, and to have seriously considered, a question not raised at bar, before ordering an injunction in this case. Section 5, Act March 2, 1793 (1 Stat. 334), prohibits the courts of the United States from granting an injunction "to stay proceedings in any court of a state." This term "proceedings" may properly, and, I think, must necessarily, include all steps taken by the court, or by its officers, under its process, from the institution of the suit until the close of the final process of execution which may issue therein. Cropper v. Coburn [Case No. 3,416]. But, as this question has not been argued, I do not rest my decision upon this ground.

The motion for a preliminary injunction is denied.

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Dec. Term, 1809.

BASTARDY—WITNESS—LIKENESS OF CHILD TO DEFENDANT—CONFESSION—JUDGMENT—BOND OF INDEMNITY.

1. The mother of a bastard is a competent witness for the United States on an indictment of the supposed father, under the Maryland act of 1781 (chapter 13), and may be cross-examined as to her connection with other persons.

2. Evidence of a likeness of the child to its supposed father is not admissible.

3. The confession of the defendant having been given in evidence, he was not permitted to give evidence of his declarations at the same time, that others also had had connection with her.

4. The only judgment which the court can give upon a conviction under the statute is, that the defendant give security to indemnify the county from any charge for the maintenance of the child.

5. The order for paying £30 a year can only be made by a justice of the peace, under the act of 1796 (chapter 34).

Indictment [against David Collins] for not supporting a bastard child, under the act of Maryland of 1781 (chapter 13). The mother was received as a competent witness, although she was to be relieved from the charge of maintaining the child, by convicting the defendant.

Mr. Jones, for the United States, objected to the cross-examination as to her connection with others.

THE COURT limited the inquiry to a period not more than twelve months nor less than six before the birth of the child. But permitted the examination within that period.

THE COURT refused to admit the testimony of witnesses to prove the likeness between the defendant and the child.

[1] [Reported by Hon. William Cranch, Chief Judge.]

The confession of Collins being given in evidence against him,

F. S. Key, for defendant, asked whether Collins did not at the same time say that other persons also had had criminal conversation with her.

THE COURT refused to permit the question to be put.

The jury found the defendant guilty.

THE COURT ordered the traverser to give security in $250 to indemnify the county; and for want of such security, committed him to the custody of the marshal. The next day he offered bail, and the counsel for the prosecution had included in the condition of the recognizance a clause that the traverser should pay £30 per annum to the mother so long as she should have the custody of the infant; but the court ordered it struck out, that being a matter within the exclusive jurisdiction of a justice of the peace, under the Maryland act of 1796 (chapter 34).

SEAMEN—INDICTMENT FOR FLOGGING—CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT.

Flogging is not "a cruel and unusual punishment," within the meaning of the third section of the act of March 3, 1835 (4 Stat. 776). The defendant should have been indicted for beating and wounding the seaman.

[Cited in Riley v. Allen, 23 Fed. 48; U. S. v. Trice, 30 Fed. 492.]

This was an indictment against [Walter Collins] the master of a vessel of the United States, under the act of March 3, 1835 (4 Stat. 776), for inflicting on one of the crew a cruel and unusual punishment. The case opened by the district attorney was that the defendant had inflicted the punishment of flogging, abolished by the act of September, 1850 (9 Stat. 515).

Dist. Atty. Brown, for the United States.

Mr. Potter, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. I do not think you can maintain this indictment by proving the case opened. The act describes four distinct offences. Beating or wounding, imprisoning, deprivation of suitable food and nourishment, infliction of any cruel and unusual punishment. Each of these is a substantive criminal act, when proceeding from malice, and without justifiable cause, and one of these offences cannot be properly described in the indictment by words used in the act of congress to describe another offence. If the defendant inflicted the punishment of flogging, from malice, he should have been indicted for beating and wounding the seaman, not for inflicting a cruel and unusual punishment. That clause was not designed to include the punishment of flogging, which was not an unusual punishment when the act of 1835 was passed. On the contrary, it was the kind of punishment then most usual, and known to and sanctioned by the law. However unjustifiably it may have been inflicted, it is not a kind of punishment against which these particular words in the act were directed, and consequently the defendant must be acquitted.

[1 Woods, 499; 18 Int. Rev. Rec. 69; 5 Chi. Leg. News, 525; 5 Leg. Op. 93.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia. April Term, 1873.

JURY — SELECTION OF GRAND JURY — FOLLOWING STATE PRACTICE—SELECTION BY COMMISSIONERS —INCRIMINATING TESTIMONY—OFFICERS.

1. The act of congress of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat., 394), prescribing how jurors in courts of the United States shall be designated, does not require a minute adherence to the state practice on that subject by the United States courts.

[Cited in Brewer v. Jacobs, 22 Fed. 234; U. S. v. Richardson, 28 Fed. 69.]

2. It is not necessary, under said act, for the United States courts to employ state officers to perform for them any part of the duty of designating jurors. They may and should impose that duty entirely on their own officers.

3. The law of Georgia required that the names of jurors should be taken from the book of the receiver of tax returns; held, that this requirement was not binding on the courts of the United States. Those courts were only required to take care that their jurors had the same qualifications as jurors in the state courts.

4. A rule of the United States court for the Southern district of Georgia, which prescribed that the names of five hundred persons, having the qualifications of jurors under the state law, should be selected from the body of the district by the marshal and clerk and three United States commissioners, to be designated by the court, and that the names of grand and petit jurors should be drawn from such list by the marshal and clerk, by lot, is in substantial accord with the law of Georgia prescribing how jurors shall be selected, and is a compliance with the act of congress on the subject.

5. Where a charge of misconduct is made against an officer, whether amounting to an indictable offense, or only to his discredit as such officer, which might furnish grounds for his removal or impeachment, he is not bound to be a witness against himself.

6. An inquisitorial examination, under oath, of a party charged with an offense or misconduct, would infringe the spirit if not the letter of the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States, and would be repugnant to the principles of personal liberty embodied in the common law.

[Cited in U. S. v. Hammond, Case No. 15,294.]

7. One of the officers appointed to select the names of five hundred persons from whom jurors were to be drawn, applied to a reputable citizen of a distant county for the names of proper persons residing in his vicinity to be placed upon the list. The names furnished, in compliance with this request, were submitted to the board of officers whose duty it was to make out the list of five hundred names, and some of the names so furnished were put upon the list: Held, that this was a substantial compliance with the rule which required the selection of the names to be made by the board of officers.

8. A public officer cannot, by subsequent declarations, invalidate his own official act.

A motion was made in this case to quash the indictment, on the ground that the order of the court under which the grand and petit juries were selected and drawn, was illegal, not being in conformity with the requirements of the act of congress on that subject. The act of congress governing the subject is that of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394), and provides as follows, namely: "That jurors to serve in courts of the United States, in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter from time to time have and be entitled to, and shall be designated by ballot, lot or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries now practiced and hereafter to be practiced therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof; and for this purpose the said courts shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impaneling of juries in substance to the laws and usages now in force in such state; and further, shall have power, by rule or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which may hereafter be adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts." On the 7th of December, 1872, the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of Georgia (Judges WOODS and ERSKINE holding the court), revised its rules respecting the mode of selecting and impaneling grand and petit jurors; and, in pursuance of these rules, on the 10th of January, 1873, the officers appointed by the court to that duty made out and returned the jury list, from which the grand jury was drawn that found the indictment in this case. The defendant moved to quash, on the ground that the mode of designating and impaneling jurors prescribed by the revised rules does not correspond to that used in the state courts, and that the qualifications of jurors are not the same as the state laws prescribe. For the defendant, it was contended that the act of congress required strict conformity to the state laws in these respects.

R. F. Lyon and Julian Hartridge, for the motion.

H. P. Farrow, U. S. Atty, and A. T. Akerman, contra.

Before BRADLEY, Circuit Justice, and WOODS, Circuit Judge.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. A motion is made to quash the indictment in this case on the ground that the grand jury, by which it was found, was illegally selected and impaneled. The process and procedure of the courts of the United States are, of course, subject to the sole regulation of congress and of those courts. They are entirely independent of state laws and usages, except so far as these may be adopted, or followed as a matter of convenience. There is no fundamental principle which requires a conformity thereto. Undoubtedly the convenience of the legal profession, and the habits of the people will be best consulted by a general conformity as far as circumstances will admit. That is all. On the subject of selecting and impaneling jurors in the United States courts, congress at its first session, in the twenty-ninth section of the judiciary act, directed that they should be designated by lot, or otherwise, in each state, according to the mode therein practiced at that time, so far as practicable; and that they should have the same qualifications as required for jurors in the highest courts of the state; and should be returned from such parts of the district as the court should direct. This rule was subsequently modified and, in 1840, it was so framed as to adapt it to the changes which might, from time to time, be made by state legislation. By the act of July 20th, of that year, which is the law now in force (5 Stat. 394), it was provided "that jurors to serve in the courts of the United States in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter from time to time have and be entitled, and shall be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries, now practiced and hereafter to be practiced therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof; and for this purpose the courts shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impaneling of juries, in substance, to the laws and usages now in force in such state," with power to make such changes in these respects as the legislature of the state may adopt.

It is pertinent to observe that congress does not adopt the respective state laws, but only requires conformity to them in certain respects, and then gives the courts power to make rules for the attainment of such conformity, in substance as far as practicable, in their different circumstances. The question now to decide is, whether the rules which have been adopted by this court on the subject, conform to the requirements of the act of congress. There is nothing in the act that requires a slavish or minute adherence to the details of the state practice; and nothing which hints at the incongruous notion that the courts of the United States in the designation and impaneling of jurors are to employ any officers or agencies except their own, and those under their control. The great object is to obtain jurors of like qualifications, and to designate and impanel them in substantially the same way as in the state courts. And, of course, this is to be effected by the courts of the United States themselves and their officers, and not by the agency of state courts or their officers; for the act, in speaking of the mode to be followed, expressly says, "in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof." It would be an inconvenient mixture of jurisdictions, and might seriously embarrass the proceedings of the courts, if they had to depend on the action of state officials, over whom they have no supervision or control. This disposes in limine of the objection that the jury list was not taken, and that the rule does not require them to be taken from the lists made by the state authorities. As state officials make up the jury lists for the state courts, even strict parallelism of practice requires that the United States officials should make them up for the United States courts. The harmony of the state and federal jurisdictions requires that each should act freely and independently of each other.

The question then recurs, whether the rules adopted by this court in reference to jurors accords with the act of congress, in adopting the state practice, so far as the courts of the United States and the officers thereof, independent of the aid of the state courts and officers, can practicably conform to such practice in the respects required by the act. Conformity is required by the act in two respects: First, in reference to the qualifications and exemptions of jurors; secondly, in reference to the mode of designating and impaneling jurors, as by ballot, lot or otherwise, which mode is to be conformed, in substance, to that pursued in the highest court of the state. It will be observed that the act does not require the court to make any rules with regard to the qualification of jurors, but only with regard to the mode of selecting them. Qualifications have respect to the juror personally, and may relate to his age, his property, citizenship, or anything else belonging to his personal character or standing. In the state of Georgia the only qualifications of jurors, expressly required by the constitution and laws, are that they shall be upright and intelligent jurors between the ages of 21 and 60. There is an implied qualification that they shall be tax payers, and therefore citizens, as the statute of February 15, 1869, requires that they shall be selected for the state courts in each county from the book of the receiver of tax returns. Of course, the placing of a man's name on the receiver's book is not a qualification; for it is the act of another man. It implies a qualification, however, namely, that of being a tax payer, or a person liable to pay taxes and to have his name placed on said book. Now all these qualifications are required in jurors by the rule of this court. The officers appointed for the purpose are to select from the body of the district five hundred upright and intelligent persons, citizens of the district (and of course tax payers), between the ages of 21 and 60 years, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, to serve as jurors. As before remarked, it was not necessary that the rule should have specified these qualifications. Jurors not having them could be objected to by a challenge to the polls without any rule of court on the subject. But the rule has specified them, and in doing so has adopted the qualifications which the state laws require. On this point the objection to the rules cannot be sustained.

The next question is, whether the rules of this court have in substance adopted the mode of designating and impaneling jurors, which is prescribed by the state laws, as by ballot, lot, or otherwise. The act of congress requires that they shall "be designated by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode of forming such juries," practiced in the highest court of law of the state, "in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States, or the officers thereof, and for this purpose" (that is, for the purpose of securing the designation of jurors by ballot, lot, or otherwise, according to the mode practiced in the state courts), the courts of the United States "shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impaneling of juries, in substance, to the laws and usages" of the state. From this language of the act it is obvious that all that is required is, that the mode of designating and impaneling be substantially the same; not that the officers to carry it into effect shall be the same either in rank or in number; nor that the same kind of jury boxes, or material of which the boxes are composed, whether wood or iron, shall be the same; nor that they shall be kept and guarded in the same manner; nor that the same number of names shall be placed in the box; nor that in any other matter of detail, a minute imitation of the state practice is to be observed. In these matters the courts of the United States may exercise their discretion as to the best mode of securing the main object of the law, which is, to secure the service of properly qualified juries, selected and impaneled substantially according to the mode pursued in the state courts. Now, what is the mode pursued in these courts? The constitution of the state (article 5, § 13, par. 2) simply declares that "the general assembly shall provide by law for the selection of upright and intelligent persons to serve as jurors," and that "there shall be no distinction between the classes of persons who compose grand and petit jurors." Not every person, not every citizen, is to be placed on the jury list. A selection is to be made; and the object of that selection is to procure those who are upright and intelligent. Who is to make this selection is left to the legislature to prescribe. Now, can it be possible that state or county officials may be vested with this power of selection, and that United States officials must be denied this power? Can it be the meaning of the act of congress that the courts of the United States must only take jurors whom the state officials may have selected? The considerations before referred to respecting the necessary independence of these courts upon the action of state officers and state courts, seem to afford a complete answer to these questions. On looking at the act of assembly before referred to, passed to carry the constitutional clause into effect, we find that it provides substantially as follows: That the ordinary of each county, together with the clerk of the superior court and three commissioners appointed by the presiding judge of the superior court (and removable at pleasure) shall meet at the court house on the first Monday in June, biennially, and select from the book of the receiver of tax returns, upright and intelligent persons to serve as jurors, and make out tickets with the names of the persons so selected, and put them in a box having two apartments, to be locked and sealed by the judge and placed in the care of the clerk, and the key in the care of the sheriff; and no grand or petit juror shall be drawn but in the presence of the judge in open court, and no person shall open the box, or alter the names placed therein. It further provides that at the close of each term, the judges of the superior court, in open court, shall unlock the box and break the seal, and cause to be drawn from apartment No. 1 not less than 18, nor more than 23 names, to serve as grand jurors at the next term; and then 36 names to serve as petit jurors—which names are to be deposited in apartment No. 2 until all are drawn from No. 1, and so on alternately. Directions are then given for issuing a precept to the sheriff to summon the jurors so drawn. Provision is also made for summoning talesmen in case of necessity.

Now with these regulations let us compare the rules adopted by this court. They are as follows: "Order of Court Amending Jury Rules.—The court shall appoint three of the United States commissioners residing in the Southern district of Georgia, and the said commissioners with the marshal for the district of Georgia, and the clerk of the court shall, within thirty days after the adjournment of this court, select from the body of the Southern district of Georgia, five hundred upright and intelligent persons, citizens of said district, between the ages of 21 and 60 years, without regard to race, color, or previous condition, to serve as jurors. And the clerk of the district and circuit courts for said district, and marshall, shall place the names of the persons so selected in a box, from which they shall draw within ten days after said names are so deposited, not less than forty-five nor more than fifty names, unless otherwise ordered by a judge, to serve as jurors in the circuit court, and not less than forty-five nor more than fifty names, unless otherwise ordered by the judge, to serve as jurors in the district court. And the first twenty-three names so drawn for each court shall be the grand jurors for such court, unless the court or a judge shall otherwise order. And within thirty days after each succeeding term of said courts respectively, unless previously drawn by the court, it shall be the duty of the marshal and clerk to draw from said box in the manner before stated, the same number of jurors to serve at the next succeeding term of said courts respectively, unless the number is changed by order of the judge. And if from any cause they are unable to procure from the body of the district, as before required, the names of the requisite number of qualified jurors, then in that event, the names of those they have been able to obtain shall constitute the list from which said jurors shall be taken, and the names of those so drawn shall be placed in another compartment of said box, there to remain until all the names shall have been drawn from the first compartment. The said box shall be kept locked, except when opened for the purpose of drawing or revising the list, and the clerk shall keep the box and the marshal the key. If from failure to draw, as hereinbefore directed, or from any other cause, there shall be a deficiency in whole or in part of regular jurors, the court may order that upright and intelligent persons from the body of the district shall be forthwith summoned as jurors or talesmen as the case may be. If the court should not sit at any term, the jurors drawn for that term shall stand over for the next term that shall be held. The marshal shall summon jurors by delivering to each personally, or by leaving it at his usual residence, a written or printed summons. The marshal, the clerk, and any one of said commissioners shall constitute a quorum for the purpose of carrying into effect this rule. And a deputy marshal may, in any case, whether in selecting or drawing jurors, or otherwise in the premises embraced in this rule, do whatever the marshal may himself do."

It seems to me very difficult to perceive any substantial difference between the mode of designating and impaneling jurors prescribed by these rules, and that prescribed by the state statute, after making due allowance for the different circumstances of the two jurisdictions and the practicabilities of the case. In the first place a selection is to be made by officers designated for that purpose, in order to obtain upright and intelligent men. This selection is to be made from the body of citizens of the district, without regard to race, color, or previous condition. This is certainly in substantial conformity to the state law. It needs no argument to make it plainer than it is, by the mere statement of the fact. The qualification that the selection shall be made without regard to race, color, or previous condition, is in accord with the spirit of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendment to the constitution; by which all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens and entitled to full equality before the laws.

But it is objected that the marshal is substituted for the ordinary in the constitution of the board of commissioners, and that the ordinary is a judicial officer, whilst the marshal is not. There can be nothing in this objection. The conformity required is in substance only, and only as far as practicable for the courts of the United States and the officers thereof. The United States have no such officer as the ordinary. No officer could be more appropriately appointed than the marshal. But the comparison need not be minutely made between the officers. A board of responsible and suitable officers is constituted for the purpose of making the selection of jurors from the body of citizens. This is in substantial conformity to the state law. The disposition of the names when selected is the same. They are placed in a box on separate pieces of paper, and from that box the panels of grand and petit jurors are drawn from time to time as occasion requires, substantially in the same manner as in the state courts, due regard being had to the convenience of the court and the circumstances of the case. The objection that the drawing is to be made by the marshal and the clerk, within thirty days after each term, and not as in the state court, on the last day of term in open court, goes to a matter of practice and detail, and not to the substantial mode, of designating, or empaneling the juries, in the respects demanded by the act of congress. The mode adopted is the same. It is the drawing of the names by lot. The designation of the officers by whom it shall be done is left to the discretion and judgment of the court.

It seems to me, after a careful consideration of the objections which have been so ably urged, that the regulations adopted by this court are in substantial compliance with the act of congress. As it may be doubtful whether the question raised by this motion can be carried to the supreme court, and as the matter is one of great interest to this and other states, I shall avail myself on the first opportunity, of consulting the views of my associates on the supreme bench, and if any different result should be arrived at, this court will cheerfully modify its rules. As they now stand, whilst they seem to us entirely unobjectionable in point of law, they are in the most practicable and convenient form for the due administration of justice and the performance of the business of the courts.

The motion to quash the indictment for the cause now alleged is overruled.

In another case which came up after the foregoing decision was made—being the case of Rich v. Campbell—the panel of petit jurors was challenged on the ground taken in the previous case, and on the further ground that the officers appointed to designate and impanel the jurors for the United States courts had not complied with the rule, but had selected jurors from improper motives and for a special purpose. Evidence was taken on the challenge.

Before BRADLEY, Circuit Justice, and WOODS, Circuit Judge.

BRADLEY, Circuit Justice. The array of jurors in this case is challenged by the defendant for several causes. One class of causes assigned consists of objections to the legality of the mode, adopted by this court by its general rule of the 7th of December last, of designating and impaneling jurors. This question has already been examined in the case of U. S. v. Collins [Case No. 14,837], and the objection was decided to be without foundation.

The other causes of challenge assigned are, that the jurors were not designated, selected and drawn in accordance with the rule, but that contrary thereto, they were designated with reference to their race, color and condition; and that they were selected, not by the persons appointed by the court for that purpose, but upon private information from irresponsible persons; and not from the body of citizens of the district, but from certain classes thereof, under private instructions from some of the persons appointed to make the selection as to the status, color and political bias of the persons whose names were to be furnished to make up the panel.

The challenge being traversed, evidence was adduced for the purpose of sustaining the charges made in the challenge. Amongst other witnesses the defendant called to the stand the marshal of the United States for this district, who is one of the officers appointed by the court to select and make up the list of jurors for the district, according to the rule made on the 7th of December last, and whose official conduct in that matter is impeached by the challenge. We refused to compel him to testify, for the following reasons: Where a charge of misconduct is made against an officer, whether amounting to an indictable offense, or only to his discredit as such officer, which might furnish grounds for his removal or impeachment, he is not bound to be a witness against himself. To compel him to be so would infringe the spirit, if not the letter, of the fifth amendment to the constitution of the United States, which expressly declares that no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself. An inquisitorial examination, under oath, of a party charged with an offense, is repugnant to the principles of personal liberty, which are embodied in every fibre of the common law. The French system of procedure, which allows the defendant to be examined as to his whole previous history, and as to the private motives by which he was governed in all the transactions of his life, is abhorrent to our feelings of justice and fair play. I should regret ever to see that system obtain a footing in this free country. If the party chooses to waive his right and submit to an examination, it may be admissible where public interests will not thereby be affected. But even then, the practice may, in certain cases, be against the public interest and contrary to public policy. If the party stand upon his rights, it raises an implication, however unjustifiable, that there is some good reason (unfavorable to him) for his refusal to be examined. Such an implication ought in no case to exist. The immunity is founded on principles of public policy and a regard to the just liberties of every citizen; and, when claimed, ought to be regarded and claimed as a fundamental right which cannot be properly assailed.

Applying these principles to this case, it is apparent that the conduct of the officers concerned in the designation and impaneling of jurors is seriously impeached by the challenge, and that to subject them to an examination under oath upon the matters charged would be, in effect, to compel them to testify on a criminal charge against themselves, and would, therefore, be a subversion, not only of their rights, but an invasion of the rights of all good citizens.

The other evidence offered by the defendant was in substance as follows: He proved by Elijah Bond, the postmaster at Macon, that at the request of the marshal he made out a list of names for jurors from the county of Bibb, which was partially adopted by the officers as a part of their list for the district; that he conferred with one or two other gentlemen on the subject, one of whom was the ordinary of the county; that he tried to get good men, and thought he did; that he received no instructions from the marshal as to the manner in which he should select, except a request to furnish the names of good and substantial citizens; that he endeavored to do so without regard to color; that he avoided those who had been engaged in the late election riots, it is true, and tried to select men who were not extreme men either way, but fair men; that he had lived in Macon since 1839, and was an officer in the Presbyterian church in that place; that Mr. Swayze, one of the commissioners appointed by the court to select jurors, and who resided in Macon, was absent at the time out of the state, and he had no conference with him on the subject. This was the substance of his testimony as far as it was material.

From this testimony the defendant's counsel argued, that the officers appointed by the court to select jurors did not make the selection themselves, but left it to others; and that this rendered the list illegal. But it was very pertinently answered by the counsel for the officers, that the giving of information was very different from official action. Four of the officers—the marshal, the clerk of the court, and two commissioners, Messrs. Wilson and Wade—on the 9th and 10th of January last, met in Savannah (the clerk, marshal and commissioner Wilson having held a preliminary meeting about a month previous) and proceeded to execute the powers conferred upon them by the court, and formed a list of five hundred names of persons selected from the body of citizens of the district, and certified and returned the same to the court, as directed by the rule. This they did officially, on their official responsibility; and in their return they certify that the names designated and returned by them, were the names of upright and intelligent persons, citizens of the district, between the ages of twenty-one and sixty, selected from the body of the district without regard to race, color or previous condition. This official certificate of these officers must be regarded by the court as conclusive evidence that they have properly performed their duty, unless the contrary be clearly proven. The only effect of Mr. Bond's evidence is, to show that they took proper means to get the requisite information as to the proper persons to select, by applying to the most competent and reliable persons for such information. It was conceded that a more upright and reliable man than Mr. Bond, the witness, could scarcely be found. What other means the officers may have employed to corroborate the information received from Mr. Bond does not appear. It could not be expected that the officers should be personally acquainted with the entire male population of the district, consisting of more than eighty counties. They were necessarily obliged, in many cases to rely on information derived from others. If they acted in good faith in getting the best information they could, and made their selection accordingly (and nothing appears to the contrary, but that they did this), their action cannot be impeached or held invalid. Impossibilities cannot be required of any officers. We see nothing in the evidence of Mr. Bond to impeach the jury list; but the contrary.

Some further evidence of a very unimportant character was adduced, which it is unnecessary to notice.

The defendant's counsel, however, produced and read an article published by Mr. Swayze, one of the commissioners appointed to select jurors, in a newspaper called the Macon Daily Enterprise, on the 7th inst., vindicating himself and the commission from attacks made against them in other newspapers. From this article the defendant's counsel asks us to gather by inference the conclusion that the jury commissioners had a purpose in making their selection of jurors, of selecting such persons as would carry out a certain result, namely: the indictment and conviction of certain persons charged with being concerned in the Macon riot last October; or more generally, the furtherance of government prosecutions in the district. Now we have examined this article, and can see no such fact implied in it. So far as it bears on the point under consideration, the whole pith of it is, that the jurors as before selected, being taken from the lists prepared by the county officials, ignored the enforcement act altogether, and refused to find a bill—no matter what the evidence—against a single person out of some forty, who had been bound over on the charge of participating in the election riot before mentioned, in which some persons were killed; and that the court made the new rule for the purpose of obtaining jurors, who would regard their oaths and recognize the law of the land; and that the jurors selected are men of that character. If this were proper evidence in the case at all, it would only go to show that jurors were sought who would act fairly and honestly, and in obedience to the laws; not that those were sought who would do any man's bidding, or who would aim at any result other than the truth and the right. This is a very different thing from packing a jury-box for the purpose of attaining a particular result in a particular case. But it is not evidence in the case at all. The declarations of Swayze, made after the list was selected and returned, are nothing but hearsay. They cannot affect the list in the least. The truth of this proposition is so obvious that it is unnecessary to discuss it. A person cannot by mere declarations made subsequently, invalidate his own deed or official act. Untold mischief would ensue if such a doctrine were established. Besides, it appears from the return that Mr. Swayze did not act with the other commissioners in making the selection, although he subsequently appended a certificate that he had examined the list and approved of it. He appears to have been absent from the state when the selection was made. This circumstance is an additional reason, if any were needed, for disregarding his published article as evidence for any purpose in the case.

It seems to us that the challenge has not a shred of evidence to support it; and so far as appears from the characters of the persons composing the grand and petit juries of the present term, the selection has been eminently judicious and proper. The challenge is not sustained.

At the March term, 1873, of the United States circuit court for the Northern district of Georgia, several of the same questions decided in the foregoing cases were argued before ERSKINE, District Judge, in the case of U. S. v. Gardner upon a challenge to the array of petit jurors.

B. H. Hill, L. J. Gartrell, and C. Peeples, made arguments in support of the challenge.

H. P. Farrow, U. S. Atty., George S. Thomas, Asst. U. S. Atty., A. T. Akerman, and A. W. Stone, contra.

ERSKINE, District Judge. Before the perusal of the panel, comprising six white persons and six colored, defendant challenged the array on the ground that the jury was illegally constituted, and moved that the array be quashed: "First. Because the United States jurors are required to be selected by the United States statutes, according to the laws of each state where said United States courts are held. Second. Because there is no authority of law for the United States court to appoint commissioners to select jurors. Third. Because the rules of court under which said jury was selected and impaneled limits the number of jurors to five hundred. Fourth. Because the manner of selecting jurors heretofore practiced by the United States courts in this state has not been repealed by competent authority. Fifth. Because the rule of court, under which the said panel of jurors was drawn, selected, summoned and impaneled, is without sanction of law, and contrary to the statutes of the United States in such case made and provided. Sixth. Because said panel of jurors was not drawn, selected and summoned according to law." Other objections—corollaries from the foregoing—were advanced during the arguments. These authorities were cited and relied upon by counsel for challenger: Code, §§ 3842, 3858, 3859; article 5, § 13, State Const.; Act Feb. 15, 1869; Judiciary Act, § 29 (1 Stat. 88); Act July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394); U. S. v. Woodruff [Case No. 16,758]; Same v. Wilson [Id. 16,737]; Clinton v. Englebrecht, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 434; Act June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 196). The second paragraph of section 13, art. 5, of the state constitution of 1868 says: "The general assembly shall provide by law for the selection of upright and intelligent persons to serve as jurors. There shall be no distinction between the classes of persons who compose grand and petit juries." The third sentence refers to the compensation of jurors.

On the 15th of February, 1869, the general assembly passed an act to carry this clause into effect. [Laws Ga. (1869) p. 139.] This act contains eighteen sections—I will give the substance of so much of it as is applicable to the subject now before the court. It makes it the duty of the ordinary of each county, together with the clerk of the superior court, and three commissioners appointed for county by the judge of the superior court, to meet at the court house on the first Monday in June, biennially, to select from the book of the receiver of tax returns "upright and intelligent persons" to serve as jurors, and to make out tickets, with the names of persons so selected, and place them in a box, which shall be locked and sealed by the judge. And no grand or petit jury shall be drawn but in the presence of the judge in open court. But (by section 3) if the judge should fail to draw juries, then the ordinary, together with commissioners and clerk of said county, shall meet at the court house, within a certain time, and there draw grand and petit juries, all of which shall be entered by the clerk on the minutes of the court and signed by the ordinary. On reading the act just referred to, and which is entitled "An act to carry into effect the second clause of the 13th section of the 5th article of the constitution," it will disclose the fact that although it provides that the persons selected to serve as jurors shall be "upright and intelligent" (using the words of the constitution); yet it does not speak of the second sentence which declares: "There shall be no distinction between classes of persons who compose the grand and petit juries." Was this a casus omissus? Looking to the title of the act, there would appear to be some possible ground for this. But does not this very sentence carry itself into effect without legislative aid? Is it not per se operative and to be obeyed; and was not this probably the opinion of the legislature? My mind has always been impressed, with reasons too cogent to be discarded, that, notwithstanding the omission, it was the purpose of the legislature, by this enactment, to carry the entire clause into effect, and not to give force to a part only. During the first term of this court, after its organization, in framing the jury rule (to be considered presently), the substance of the second sentence was incorporated into it. If this setence is dormant, and requires legislation to bring it into action, then I may inquire, was the embodying of the substance of the sentence in the rules of court, going beyond the pale of the act of February 15, 1869—giving to it a too elastic construction?

By a rule of the United States district court (having circuit court jurisdiction) for this district, adopted at the March term, 1871, the marshal was instructed to procure from the superior court clerk for each county, comprising this district, a certain number of names of the "most upright and intelligent persons," between the ages of twenty-one and sixty years, to be taken from the jury lists of the county, without regard to race or color. Comment was made by counsel on both sides, during argument on the insertion of the word "most" before and in connection with, "upright and intelligent," in the rule of the district court. Whether the word "most" was in the draft of the rule which I wrote, I do not now remember; if so, it was unadvisedly there. But what impediment would it have been to justice? Can either side complain? Was not the word, by fair intendment, to be applied to each class, white and colored? At most the word but expressed moral fitness as necessary to the end proposed. But to return; nearly seventeen hundred names were forwarded to the marshal (before the abrogation of this rule) by these clerks who responded to his request, and for which the government paid them. While this rule was of force, more than two hundred and fifty names were drawn from the jury box by the court, or its officers; but strange as it may appear, every ballot drawn from the box contained the name of a white person. Now, as the ratio of the classes in this judicial district has been for years past, as eight white to five colored, or nearly so, it is obvious to the common mind that this mode of designating or selecting the jurors cast the entire burden of jury service in the federal court upon one of the classes only—white citizens; thus releasing colored citizens, who possessed the qualifications for jurors, from the performance of a duty which they, equally with the qualified white citizens, owed to their country. Not only the constitution of this state, but the recent amendments to the national constitution have made the colored man a citizen; habilitating him with all the rights, privileges and immunities enjoyed by the white citizen; therefore, he should perform his part of the public labor. On the first of June, 1872, congress passed an act taking away the circuit court powers from the district court for this district, and establishing a separate circuit court. At the first term a rule of court was adopted, and it was under this rule that the persons now in the traverse jury box were designated, summoned and impaneled. But, before passing to this rule, it may not be wholly amiss to mention that it is a copy—mutatis mutandis—of the rule which met the sanction of, and was adopted by the United States circuit court for the Southern district of this state, at the last November term. The court was composed of WOODS, Circuit Judge, and ERSKINE, District Judge.

Attention will be directed to the act of July 20, 1840 (5 Stat. 394): (1) "Jurors," says the act, "to serve in the courts of the United States, in each state respectively, shall have the like qualifications, and be entitled to the like exemptions, as jurors of the highest court of law of such state now have and are entitled to, and shall hereafter, from time to time, have and be entitled to, (2) and shall be designated by ballot, lot or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries now practiced and hereafter to be practiced therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States or the officers thereof; (3) and for this purpose the said courts shall have power to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming the designation and impaneling of juries in substance, to the laws and usages now in force in such state; (4) and further, shall have power, by rule or order, from time to time, to conform the same to any change in these respects which may be hereafter adopted by the legislatures of the respective states for the state courts." For convenience in the endeavor to interpret and construe this act, the clauses have been marked 1, 2, 3, 4. 1st. The qualifications of jurors, as mental capability, residence, age, etc. The second section of the first article of the constitution says: "All persons born in the United States and residents of this state are hereby declared to be citizens of this state." The requisite qualifications for persons to serve as jurors in the highest courts of law of this state, as declared by its constitution and laws, are that they be "upright and intelligent persons;" that they have resided in the county for six months immediately before they are called upon to serve as grand and petit jurors; that they are above the age of twenty-one years and under the age of sixty years. Code, §§ 3841, 3858. No property qualification is required in this state for a juror, and if it is not a mere rule of convenience for ordinaries, clerks and commissioners to select jurors from the book of the receiver of tax returns, and it be a necessary qualification that the juror must be a tax payer, then that qualification is included in the qualification of age. Acts March 18, 1869, and January 19, 1872. To be "white" was another qualification for a juror, but this no longer exists. The language employed by congress in this clause of the act of 1840 is direct and positive; it is also mandatory to the federal courts—that jurors, to serve therein, shall have like qualifications and be entitled to like exemptions as those of the highest courts of law in the state where the national court is held. Under this clause no discretion is given to the court. Clauses 2, 3 and 4 may be considered together. They provide for the designating or selecting of jurors by ballot, lot or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries as practiced in the state wherein the federal court is being held, so far as such mode may be practicable by said court, or its officers, giving the power to said courts to make all necessary rules and regulations for conforming and adapting the designation and impaneling of jurors, in substance, to the laws and usages in force in the state at the time. Now, it was contended by counsel for the challenger that, for the designating or selecting of qualified persons to serve as jurors in this court, state authority—for example, a board comprising the ordinary of the county, the superior court clerk, and also three commissioners appointed by the judge of the superior court, is the proper agency to act in the premises; that it, and not the national court or its officers, is the agent to designate each particular juror to serve in this court, from the list on the books of the receiver of tax returns. The employment of state agency to designate or select jurors for the United States courts was not, in my opinion, contemplated by congress in making this law. The language of the act is, that the jurors "shall be designated by ballot, lot or otherwise, according to the mode of forming juries now practiced and hereafter to be practiced therein, in so far as such mode may be practicable by the courts of the United States or the officers thereof." Is it not the plain meaning of this, that the designation or selection is to be made by the national and not the state officers? But the argument of counsel, in its tenor, indicated that, at least, if the officers of this court are to designate or select its jurors, the names should be taken from the list of tax payers in each county in the district found on the tax receiver's books. If jurors, as the rule requires, are to be taken from the district at large, this would be virtually impracticable. And even if it were practicable to thus select them, I do not think the statute requires it to be done. The legal object is to select persons who possess the qualifications; it is not the mode in which this is to be accomplished that is imperative upon the court. In this matter a large discretion has been bestowed upon it by the statute itself.

Objection to the rule was urged for the challenger, "because the rule of court under which the jury was selected and impaneled limits the number of jurors in this district to five hundred." I have looked into this question, and I find nothing in any of the laws of congress as to what number shall be designated or selected. The acts of 1789 and 1840 apply only to the mode of selecting jurors and not to the number.

Counsel relied on the 5th section of the act of congress of June 1, 1872 (17 Stat. 196). This section declares (in substance) that the United States courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings and modes and forms of proceeding in other than equity and admiralty causes as they may exist in like causes in the courts of record in the state at the time of holding the United States court therein. The act has no reference to the designating or selecting of jurors; nor, in my opinion, has it any application to the practice, pleadings or mode of proceeding in criminal cases as practiced in the state courts.

The case of U. S. v. Wilson [supra], was read and earnestly discussed. Two questions were before the court for decision in that case. The first was the construction of the act of July 20, 1840. Speaking of the first clause of the act, Wilson, J., said: "So far as relates to the qualifications and exemptions of federal jurors, the courts have no discretion." And the learned judge also said: "The courts from necessity were to exercise a discretion as to the practicability of designating and impaneling jurors according to the mode prescribed for selecting juries of the highest court of law in the state. They have the power and the discretion to change the mode from time to time. The court may exercise the power, or refrain to exercise it, as it may now deem practicable." The other question for decision was, whether where a grand jury, consisting of fifteen members, fourteen of them—the fifteenth being absent—return a true bill into court, the indictment was well found. The court held it was. But it further held, that if a grand jury has even one disqualified person on the panel, the whole jury is tainted, and an indictment found by such a body would be void. And this has been the doctrine as to grand juries in England for the past four hundred years, and it prevails in this country. Doyle v. State, 17 Ohio, 222.

Counsel also relied on Clinton v. Englebrecht, 13 Wall. [80 U. S.] 434. This case arose exclusively under a law of the territory of Utah. The court there, proceeding on the theory that it was a court of the United States, issued an open venire to the marshal, acting apparently on the hypothesis that it was to be governed in the selection of jurors, by the acts of congress. Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court, held that the territorial court erred both in its theory and in its action; and that the making up of the lists and all matters connected with the designation of the juries were subject to the territorial laws.

Reliance was likewise placed by counsel for the challenger in the case of U. S. v. Woodruff [Case No. 16,758]. The defendant objected to a trial, on the ground that the jurors had not been selected conformably to the act of congress of July 20, 1840. The court, Mr. Justice McLean, in delivering the judgment, said: "By an early rule of this court the clerk is required to issue a venire facias, commanding the marshal to summon twenty-four persons to serve as traverse jurors. * * * By the act of Illinois of the 3d of March, 1845, for the selection of jurors, it is made the duty of the county commissioners to select jurors. Now this court cannot call upon the officers of the state to do this duty, but we are bound to conform, as nearly as may be, to the state practice. The venire under the above rules leaves the selection of the juries to the marshal as his convenience shall permit. This does not, therefore, conform to the state practice. The jurisdiction of this court extends throughout the state, consequently the jurors should be selected from the state at large, and their names should be inserted in the venire. The court will therefore adopt a rule requiring the clerk and marshal to select the jurors from the state at large, previous to each term, and to conform in doing so, as near to the state practice as may be practicable."

The case of U. S. v. Wilson, instead of showing that the rule is not in conformity to the laws of congress, is to my mind, an authority which sustains its legality. The case of U. S. v. Woodruff is so directly applicable, so fully covers the whole question, and so clearly supports the rule that no other authority need be adverted to, or invoked.

The motion to quash the array is overruled.

Case No. 14,838.

UNITED STATES v. COLLYER et al.

[Whart. Hom. 483.]

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. 1855.

JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—HUDSON RIVER—REGULATION OF STEAM VESSELS—DESTRUCTION OF PASSENGERS — INDICTMENT FOR MISCONDUCT AND NEGLIGENCE—JOINT AND SEPARATE TRIALS.

[1. A violation of a law of the United States, committed on board a steamboat upon the Hudson river, within the ebb and flow of the tide, is within the jurisdiction of the federal court, although the place is within the body of a county of the state of New York.]

[2. An indictment based on section 12 of the act of July 7, 1838 (5 Stat. 304), against the officers and employés of a steamboat, is sufficient if it charges them, substantially in the language of the statute, with misconduct, negligence, or inattention to their respective duties, whereby the lives of passengers are destroyed. It is not necessary that the particular acts of misconduct, negligence, etc., should be specifically set forth, or that the acts should be charged to have been committed feloniously.]

[3. In such an indictment, several defendants occupying different stations of employment, such as the captain, engineer, pilot, etc., may be joined, without showing that their acts were jointly destructive of the lives of those on board, or were joint in their commission.]

[4. If a number of persons jointly indicted be granted separate trials this does not entitle the first person tried to have the benefit of the testimony of the others; and hence the incompetency of such witnesses, in the case of a joint trial, is no ground for granting separate trials.]

[5. It is not necessary to a conviction under the statute to prove that there was willful or intentional mismanagement or misconduct on the part of the accused. It is not the intent which constitutes the essence of the offence, but it is an improper act of the kind designated, and having the results named, though such act be unaccompanied with any evil intent.]

[6. It is not sufficient, under the statute, to show misconduct, negligence, or inattention on the part of the accused, and that there was a burning of the vessel, which caused loss of life, but it must further be shown that such burning and loss of life were the direct consequences of the negligence or misconduct shown.]

[7. By "misconduct, negligence, or inattention" in the management of a steam vessel the statute means the omission or commission of any act which may naturally lead to the consequences made criminal; and it is immaterial what may be the degree of misconduct, whether slight or serious, if the proofs show that the destruction of the lives of persons on board was the necessary or most probable consequent of it.]

[8. To be a person "employed on board," within the meaning of the statute, it is not necessary that one should be employed under pay to perform any particular duty; but the statute applies to any one actually engaged in performing the duties of an officer or employé, as where, the captain being sick, another takes his place, and acts as captain, exercising the authority and control, and discharging the duties, of that officer.]

[9. If a captain has employed skillful and faithful subordinate officers and employés, then any act of misconduct, negligence, or inattention on their part, or the part of any one of them, is not imputable to him, and he cannot be held guilty under the statute, though such act directly results in destroying the lives of persons on board.]

The lamentable accident wherein the steamboat Henry Clay was destroyed on the banks of the Hudson river, and about eighty-five lives destroyed, is of too recent occurrence to need any particular recital of the same to bring it to the memory of our readers. This vessel started from Albany about 7 o'clock a. m. on the 28th July, 1852, with a large load of passengers and freight, bound for New York, to stop at most of the intermediate landings, and there to receive and land passengers and freight. The steamboat Armenia started from the same place, bound on a like voyage, with a smaller load of passengers, at about the same hour. It was alleged that shortly after starting from Albany, and somewhere in the neighbourhood of Hudson, which is thirty miles below Albany, and about one hundred and seventeen miles from New York, a contest of speed arose between the two boats, wherein the greatest exertion was made use of by the two boats to surpass each other in speed. The result of this contest was that at a point a little north of Kingston, the two boats came in collision, and it was alleged and believed by the public the Henry Clay endeavoured to crowd the Armenia on shore. This contest created excessive alarm on the part of the passengers, especially the females, on board of both boats. It continued until about Kingston, whereat the Armenia hove to for the alleged purpose of cooling her boilers and engine, which it was averred were overheated; but nevertheless, after a time the Armenia followed the Henry Clay, which latter proceeded on her course down the river, but with diminished speed, until her arrival in the vicinity of the Forrest House, two miles below Yonkers, and about fifteen miles from New York, when fire was discovered proceeding up from the fire room. Attempts were made to put it out, but without success, and finally the vessel was headed to the shore, and was beached, but unfortunately the progress of the fire was such that most of the passengers were prevented from reaching the shore, by the fire intercepting their passage through the gangways and over the promenade deck. They were gradually driven off the stern of the boat by the devouring flames, and all, or nearly all, who were at the stern perished. On the voyage down, it appeared that the captain was confined to his stateroom from sickness, occasionally giving an order. It was alleged that Collyer, who was principal owner of the boat, and who was on board, was in command, or had the principal charge and direction of the boat. The other officers were at their posts, and remained so until the vessel was beached, when they rushed in and endeavoured to save the lives of the passengers who were drowning. Many of them were saved by their exertions. It appeared, also, that before the boat reached the shore, numbers of the passengers plunged into the river, and the master of a boat who was near at hand went to their assistance, and saved a few. Many of them, however, were drowned.

Complaint was made in the public press, also, against the pilot of the boat, because of his beaching his boat at right angles to the shore, instead of in an oblique position. If the latter had been done, it was maintained that all might have escaped. Much indignation was expressed at an order which was said to have been given to the passengers by some one in authority, just before the vessel reached the shore, for them to go aft, which order was generally obeyed, and many of them who went aft were consequently destroyed. It was also charged that the vessel was insufficiently provided with boats, water buckets, life preservers, and pumps; that, if the vessel had been so furnished, all, or nearly all, would have escaped, or the flames would have been mastered. A coroner's inquest was held at Yonkers, a place about three miles from the place of the calamity, and was in permanent session for about ten days after the event, whereat evidence was taken of a very exciting and inflammatory nature. In New York, Dutchess, and West Chester counties, the grand juries of those counties were respectively charged by the judges of the supreme court, to take action in the premises. But the United States court first proceeded, and arrested the principal owner, Collyer, and the others above named, on the ——•day of August, 1852, and held them to bail in $10,000, to answer any indictment which might be found against them, under the section of the act of congress of 1838 [5 Stat. 304], which is as follows: "That every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board of any steamboat or vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof before any circuit court in the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labour for a period not more than ten years." After their arrest at the instance of the United States courts, and bailing out, as above stated, the West Chester authorities, on the finding of the coroner's inquest, preferred a complaint against them for murder, under the following section of the New York Revised Statutes, viz. 2 Rev. St. (4th Ed.) p. 843, § 5. Such killing, unless it be manslaughter, or excusable or justifiable homicide, as hereinafter provided, shall be murder in the following cases: (1) When perpetrated from a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, or of any human being. (2) When perpetrated by any act imminently dangerous to others, and evincing a depraved mind, regardless of human life, although without any premeditated design to effect the death of any particular individual. (3) When perpetrated without any design to effect death, by a person engaged in the commission of any felony.

The defendants were arrested and held in custody by the sheriff of West Chester county, but, before they could be removed to West Chester county, a writ of habeas corpus was sued out at the instance and on the petition of Dennis McMahon, Jr., who appeared as counsel for all except Collyer.

This habeas corpus was argued and discussed before his honour, Mr. Justice Edmonds, in the month of September, 1852, by Mr. McMahon, for all the defendants excepting Collyer, by Mr. Cutting and Mr. O'Conner, for defendant Collyer, and by District Attorney Wells, of West Chester county, and Mr. Lockwood, for the state authorities.

The argument and decision are reported. People v. Sheriff [1 Parker, 659]. The learned judge overruled the charge of murder, but held them to answer on the charge of manslaughter in the first degree, and held them in bail in $10,000. Shortly after this decision, the grand jury summoned to the United States district court in New York found an indictment for manslaughter against all the defendants, under the aforesaid section of the act of 1838. After the finding of this indictment, an oyer and terminer was subsequently held in West Chester county by the state court, and an indictment was there found against all the defendants for manslaughter in the first degree. To this indictment the defendants Tallman, Germaine, Hubbard, Jessup, Elmendorf, and Merrit, pleaded to the jurisdiction. To that plea the district attorney demurred. The other defendant, Collyer, pleaded not guilty. The demurrer to the plea of jurisdiction was never brought on for argument; the state authorities concluding to await the issue of the trial on the United States indictments.

The plea was as follows:

"In the Court of Oyer and Terminer held in, and for the County of West Chester. The People, &c., v. John F. Tallman, James L. Jessup, John Germaine, Charles Merrit, Edward J. Hubbard, James Elmendorf, imp'd with Thomas Collyer. And the said defendants, impleaded as aforesaid, come into this court of oyer and terminer, held in and for the county of West Chester, and having heard the indictment now here read, say that the said court of oyer and terminer ought not to have or take cognizance of the said offences in the said indictment against them preferred, because, protesting that they are not guilty of any of the said offences, they say that the same were committed on the waters of the Hudson river, near Yonkers, and within the county of West Chester, within the ebb and flow of the tide. And they aver that at the several times when the said supposed offences set forth in the several counts in the said indictment were, as therein alleged, committed, the said John F. Tallman was captain or master of the steamboat or vessel hereinafter named, and the said John Germaine was engineer thereof, and the said Edward Hubbard was pilot thereof, and the said James L. Jessup, Charles Merrit, and James Elmendorf were persons respectively employed on board thereof. And the said steamboat Henry Clay was at the several times when the said supposed offences, set forth in the several accounts of the said indictment, were as therein alleged committed, a vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, duly enrolled and licensed under the enrolment and navigation laws of the United States of America, and engaged in the navigation of the navigable tide waters of the Hudson river, between the cities of Albany and New York, stopping at the intermediate places, on said river, at and above Sing Sing. And the said several persons mentioned in the several counts of the indictment now here, whose lives, as therein alleged, were destroyed, were persons respectively on board of said vessel at the time of the commission of the said supposed offences. And they aver that the said supposed offences were committed after the 7th day of July, A. D. 1838, to wit at the several times in the several counts of the said indictment declared. Wherefore they say that the circuit court of the United States, within and for the Southern district of New York, had at the several times when the said supposed offences set forth in the said several counts of the said indictment were as therein alleged committed, and have now, the sole and exclusive right to entertain cognizance of, and jurisdiction over, the offences in the said indictment described and set forth, and this they are ready to verify. Wherefore they pray judgment whether the said oyer and terminer ought and will further proceed against them. D. McMahon, Jr., attorney for defendants Tallman, Jessup, Hubbard, Germaine, Elmendorf, and Merrit."

"State of New York, City and County of New York.—John F. Tallman, James L. Jessup, Edward Hubbard, John Germaine, James Elmendorf, Charles Merrit, being duly sworn, say that the aforesaid plea is true in substance and matter of fact.

"Sworn to before me this 25th day of November, 1852, John Germaine. Allen Hand hurst, Justice of the Peace.

"Sworn to before me this —— day of December, 1852, by Benedict Levis, Jr., Commissioner of Deeds. John F. Tallman."

In January, 1853, the defendants Tallman, Germaine, Hubbard, Elmendorf, Jessup, and Merrit were called upon to plead to the United States indictment, when their counsel made a motion to quash the indictment, on the following grounds, namely: (1) That the indictment was defective in form. (2) That the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth counts were defective in form. (3) That the different counts of said indictment charge the offence in the words of the statute, without setting forth with sufficient minuteness the offence and the circumstances constituting the same. (4) That it does not charge the offence as having been committed knowingly or feloniously, or with intent to injure any person on board the vessel. (5) All the counts want the fulness and precision required by law in describing a criminal offence; and connecting any person with it. (6) It does not describe any of the defendants as having been engaged in the actual navigation of the vessel at the time the lives were lost; nor does it describe that their duties were such as that a neglect thereof or inattention destroyed the lives. It indicts jointly for the same offence, in the same count, several different defendants, occupying different stations of employment on the boat, for a negligence or inattention to, and a misconduct in executing, their respective duties, without showing how, or in what manner, their different acts were joint in bringing about directly the destruction of the lives alleged to be lost.

The following is a synopsis of the indictment in question: First count. That Collyer, Tallman, Germaine, Hubbard, Jessup, Elmendorf, and Merrit, on the 28th day of July, 1852, on the navigable waters of the United States, and within the ebb and flow of the tide on the Hudson river, &c., were persons employed on board of the Henry Clay, propelled by steam, which vessel was then owned by persons, citizens of the United States, unknown, and did then and there, by their misconduct, negligence, and inattention to their several and respective duties, in their several and respective employments on board of said steamboat, cause the lives of Stephen Allen, Abraham Crist, A. S. Downing, Geo. F. Whittock, Julia Hoey, and divers other persons then being on board, to be destroyed. Second count. That the same persons, on the 28th July, 1852, on the Hudson river, &c., were persons employed on board the steamboat Henry Clay, which was then owned by William Radford, Thomas Collyer, and John F. Tallman; and did then and there, by their misconduct in their several and respective employments on board of said vessel, cause the lives of Stephen Allen, &c., and others unknown, on board of said steamboat Henry Clay, to be destroyed. Third count. Same as second count, except it uses the word "negligence" instead of "misconduct." Fourth count. Same as third count, except it uses the words of the statute, viz. "inattention to their several and respective duties in their several and respective employments." Fifth count. That said persons, &c., on the 28th July, 1852, in the navigable waters of the United States, and within the ebb and flow of the tide, that is to say, on the Hudson river, in the Southern district of New York, were persons employed on board of a steamboat propelled in whole by steam, called the Henry Clay; that is to say, Thomas Collyer, as part owner, and acting for the captain in command of the boat, Tallman, as captain, Germaine, as engineer, Hubbard, as first pilot, Jessup, as clerk, Elmendorf, as second pilot, Merrit, as assistant engineer, of said boat, which was then and there owned by Thomas Collyer, William Radford, and John F. Tallman, citizens of the United States, and did then and there, by the misconduct of the said persons in their several and respective duties, in their before mentioned and described employments, on board of said steamboat Henry Clay, cause the lives of Stephen Allen, Abraham Crist, and divers other persons unknown, on board thereof, to be destroyed. Sixth count. Same as fifth count, except it uses the word "negligence." Seventh count. Same as fifth count, except it uses the words of the statute thus: "By the inattention of them, &c., to their special and respective duties, in their before mentioned and described employments," &c. Eighth count. That said persons, on the 28th July, 1852, on the river Hudson, commonly called the "North River," within the ebb and flow of the tide, and within the Southern district of New York, &c., being then and there persons employed in the following capacities; that is to say, Collyer, as part owner, in command, the said John F. Tallman, as captain, the said John Germaine, as engineer, the said Hubbard, as first pilot, Jessup, as clerk, Elmendorf, as second pilot, Charles Merrit, as assistant engineer, on board of a steamboat propelled in whole by steam, called the Henry Clay, not regarding their several and respective duties, in their aforesaid respective capacities, did then and there, by inattention to their said duties, so negligently navigate, control, and steer the said steamboat, called the Henry Clay, as to cause one Julia Hoey, then and there, being a passenger on board said steamboat Henry Clay, to be overwhelmed by the waters of the said river Hudson, and in and by said waters she was drowned, and did die; and so the jurors say that the said Thomas Collyer, John F. Tallman, &c., the life of the said Julia Hoey by their negligence and their inattention to their said several duties feloniously did destroy, &c. Ninth count. Same as eighth count, except it charges "so inattentively navigate and manage the said steamboat Henry Clay, and manage and regulate the steam and furnace on board said steamboat, as to cause the said steamboat to take fire; by means whereof Stephen Allen and Abraham Crist, and divers other persons, were overwhelmed," &c.; and charges that the lives of said Allen, &c., were destroyed by the inattention of the defendants to their several duties, as aforesaid. Tenth count. Same as last count, excepting it calls Collyer "acting captain." It uses the words "misconduct and negligence, and by inatten-tion to their respective duties, and so inattentively manage, regulate, and conduct the fires and steam on board said Henry Clay, as to cause her to catch fire, whereby they were cast and thrown from, and out of, the steamboat, into the water of the Hudson river; and that by their misconduct and negligence, and inattention to their respective duties, the lives of the said persons were destroyed." Eleventh count. Same as tenth count, except it uses the words "feloniously disregarding their respective employments, did so negligently and inattentively navigate, control, and manage the steamboat Henry Clay, and so negligently and inattentively manage and regulate the fires and steam, &c.," which said steamboat was then and there under the guidance and control of the said defendants, that by their misconduct and negligence the said lives were destroyed. Twelfth count. Same as eleventh count, except it uses the words "by misconduct and negligence, and by inattention to their respective duties, as aforesaid, so inattentively manage, navigate, and control the said steamboat Henry Clay; and so inattentively manage, regulate, and control the fires and steam on board said steamboat Henry Clay, as to cause said steamboat to take fire, by means whereof one Inock Simons, then and there being on board, was burned, and from such burning died; and charges his destruction to their misconduct and negligence, and inattention to their respective duties." Thirteenth count. Same as second count, except it charges the life of Inock Simons to be destroyed. Fourteenth count. Same as last count, except using the word "negligence" instead of "misconduct." Fifteenth count. Same substantially as fifth count, excepting it charges the death of Inock Simons, having been caused by fire, by reason of their inattention to their respective duties.

Argument was heard at great length on this question before his honour, Mr. District Judge BETTS, and a similar case, that of The Reindeer, was heard at the same time. In the latter case the defendants had pleaded to the indictment, but having faith in Mr. McMahon's motion, united with him in it on the part of their clients.

The following are the arguments of the defence and of the United States on that motion.

Mr. McMahon, for the six defendants above named, argued:

1. The circuit court of the United States of America has no jurisdiction of the offences described in the indictment, because: (1) It describes the offence as having been committed on the Hudson river. The court can take judicial notice that the Hudson river ends at New York Bay. All above New York Bay is entirely within the limits of the state of New York. Peyton v. Howard, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 322. (2) In U. S. v. Bevans, 3 Wheat. [16 U. S.] 336, it was decided that the courts of the United States have not jurisdiction of offences under the admiralty until congress have legislated on the subject. (3) Congress have no right to legislate respecting offences committed on navigable waters entirely within the limits of a state; and the Hudson river is a navigable stream entirely within the limits of the state of New York. The jurisdiction of the state of New York extends to low-water mark on the Jersey shore. Com. v. Peters, 12 Metc. [Mass.] 387; [The Genesee Chief v. Fitzhugh] 12 How. [53 U. S.] 443. (4) The act of 1838 does not, in terms, extend the jurisdiction of the United States courts to the navigable waters wholly within a state. It merely authorizes the general admiralty jurisdiction to apply, to take cognizance of what it describes to be an offence, and the general admiralty jurisdiction does not apply to waters within the body of a county, or fauces terrae. U. S. v. Wildbore, 5 Wheat. [18 U. S.] 76, 103, 104; S. C. Crimes Act, March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 115], April 30, 1790, § 12 [1 Stat. 115]; United States v. Grush [Case No. 15,268]. (5) The court should be extremely chary of extending the act to apply to offences committed on the Hudson river, because, if the admiralty has jurisdiction, it is exclusive, and is a serious attack upon the rights of state sovereignty. This point is pressed in sober earnestness, as it happens that both the state, county, and the United States courts have here assumed jurisdiction, and intend to exercise it.

2. This indictment is defective in form, and describes no offence whatever: (1) It follows the words of the statute of 1838, in describing the offence, without stating in what way the defendants were guilty of misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, or what were the respective acts of misconduct, negligence, or inattention constituting the offence. In any event, the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth counts are bad for that reason. (2) The offence being a felony, such a particularity is required, both at common law, and by the decisions of our courts. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, § 22; Archb. Cr. Pl. 50, 64; Starkie, Cr. Pl. 235; Reg. v. Barrett, 2 Car. & K. 343; Car. & P. 156; U. S. v. Mills, 7 Pet. [32 U. S.] 142; State v. Raines, 3 McCord, 533; Hampton's Case, 3 Grat. 590; Com. v. Stout, 7 B. Mon. 247; People v. Allen, 5 Denio, 76. (3) As the terms "misconduct, negligence or inattention" are very broad and indefinite, by the use of them alone no indication is given to the defendants of what they are guilty, and to meet such a charge they must be in great danger of conviction, because of their not knowing what description of misconduct, negligence, or inattention, they are to combat. Reg. v. Barrett, 2 Car. & K. 343; State v. Fields, Mart. & Y. 137. (4) The offence is not set forth as having been committed feloniously, or with intent to injure any person or persons on board said vessel. Archb. Cr. Pl. 64. (5) It sets forth that the misconduct, negligence, or in-attention to their respective duties, &c., caused the lives of, &c., to be destroyed, without showing that such acts directly destroyed the said lives; and, under the principle of causa proxima non remota spectatur, the indictment shows no offence under that statute. Howel v. Com., 5 Grat. 664; Anthony v. State, 13 Smedes & M. 263.

3. The indictment is defective in substance because: (1) It indicts jointly, for the same joint offense, in the same count, several defendants occupying different stations of employment on the steamboat, for a joint misconduct, negligence, or inattention to their respective duties, without showing that their acts were jointly destructive of the lives of those on board, or became or were joint in their commission. (2) The statute of 1838, under which this indictment is framed, does not contemplate a joint negligence, because the phrases of the act are disjunctive or distributive, thus, every captain, &c., by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention, respecting duties, &c. (3) The words "misconduct, negligence, or inattention" mean omission or ill conduct that is passive; action is not implied. The terms amount to an absence of will in what they do or omit to do, because, if there is will, then malice would be inferred, and they would be guilty of murder. If no will, then there is inertness of the mind, which in each one is separate, because the inertness of the mind of the captain is different from the inertness of the engineer, their duties being distinct, and the exemplification of that inertness being different.. The captain's misconduct, negligence, or inattention has reference only to his respective duty as captain. So with the engineer, so with the pilot, and so with the others. Each is guilty in his respective sphere. Their guilt is different, and the manifestations of that guilt are different, and in no sense are their acts, or causes conducing to those acts, joint. Where several commit a joint act, not of itself illegal, but which becomes so by reason of some circumstance applicable to each individual severally, and not jointly, they must be indicted separately. 2 Hawk. P. C. c. 25, § 89; Barb. Cr. Law, p. 338. Thus several partners cannot be indicted jointly for exercising their trade without having served an apprenticeship. 1 Salk. 382; 1 Strange, 623; 2 Strange, 921; Barb. Cr. Law, 338; 1 Burrows, 2, 4, 6. When several persons are engaged in publishing a libel, and the publication of each be separate, they must be severally indicted. Barb. Cr. Law, 338. So, on a joint charge for receiving stolen goods, a joint act of receiving must be proved. Proof that one received in the absence of the other, and afterwards delivered to him, will not suffice. Rex v. Messingham, 1 Moody, Crown Cas. 257. See Russ. & R. 344. See Vaughan v. State, 4 Mo. 530; Weinzorpflin v. State, 7 Blackf. 186. The motion to quash is the proper way to moot these points, for, if the matters alleged in the indictment are not punishable by law, the indictment will be quashed. Whart. Cr. Law, 131; Archb. Cr. Law, 64. So the court may quash, in its discretion, for such insufficiency as will make any judgment erroneous, given upon any part of it against the defendant. Betts, District Judge, in U. S. v. O'Sullivan [Case No. 15,974], citing authorities; U. S. v. Goodwin, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 460.

The United States district attorney, J. Prescott Hall, in rising to oppose the motion to quash the indictment in this case, said that he should not consider it any part of his duty to occupy much of the time of the court in discussing the exceptions taken to the indictment, because he knew his honour was familiar with the law and the principles laid down in several discussions in similar cases. Knowing the judge's general preparation in all matters, he would merely state, first, in answer to the objections as to jurisdiction, that the law was sufficiently explicit in bringing this offence within the terms of the act of congress, and that the objection was at an end, provided there is nothing in the law inconsistent with the constitution of the United States. The learned counsel then referred to the act providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on vessels which are propelled in whole or in part by steam. The twelfth section provides, that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board any steamboat, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention life is destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter. Yet it may be that congress had no right to pass the law. If so, there would be an end to the question; but he (the district attorney) took it for granted, that no court, at nisi prius, would take upon itself to assume that congress had violated the constitution of the United States, unless it clearly appear that it had done so. It would be enough for him (Mr. Hall) to show that congress have that authority, not only by the words of the constitution, but by express adjudications of the supreme court. It does not follow, as a logical deduction, that, because the states have jurisdiction over certain crimes, congress therefore has not. It does not follow that, because congress has jurisdiction over certain crimes, the states have not. The district attorney then referred to the case of Fox [v. Ohio], charged with counterfeiting, reported in 5 How. [46 U. S.] 434, and remarked that his honour, Judge Betts, had given the same construction to the act concerning the counterfeiting of coins which had been put upon it by the supreme court of the United States, in Marigold's Case, 9 How. [50 U. S.] 560. Even before that case was decided, the supreme court held, in those cases, that, although the states might have jurisdiction over certain crimes, yet, that congress might also exercise the same power in cases within their jurisdiction. In relation to the matter now before the court, he submitted that it was not important whether it was exclusively under the authority of congress or not. It is part of that jurisdiction in which is included the power to regulate commerce, and that, also, includes the power to regulate navigation. If congress had the power to regulate navigation, they have the right to regulate it everywhere. The power extends to the land, as well as the sea. As to the point about the flow and ebb of the tide, that has been long since exploded. He referred to the case of the Ohio bridge, in which it had been decided that the admiralty power extends to the lakes, and the power of congress extends to the land, as well as to the sea, in matters of commerce. It is a question of power, not of discretion. If congress have a right to regulate navigation, there is no limit upon their discretion. It is for congress to say how, and in what manner, the regulation shall be made and exercised. But this is not a matter open for construction. The supreme court has expressed its opinion upon this very act, and has decided that it is applicable to all steam vessels, whether navigating the rivers, the ocean, or the lakes; and that its commands must be obeyed by all persons within its description and enumeration. The district attorney here cited and commented at great length upon the following cases, which he insisted had set the matter of jurisdiction at rest. New Jersey Steam Navigation Co. v. Merchants' Bank, 6 How. [47 U. S.] 394; U. S. v. Coombes, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 72; Waring v. Clark, 5 How. [46 U. S.] 461–465. In this last case, the supreme court say that the act of July, 1838, in all its provisions, is obligatory upon the owners and masters of steamers navigating the waters of the United States, whether navigating on waters within a state or between states. Then, as to the forms of the indictments, the district attorney insisted that they were sufficient in all particulars, and conformable, not only to precedents, but to express adjudications. In setting forth a crime created by statute, it is sufficient to describe the offence in the words of the statute itself, and this rule has been followed in some of these counts, while in others, the particular mode in which the terrible calamity overwhelmed men, women, and children in one common ruin are particularly set forth. In some counts, death is attributable to the direct action of fire and steam; in others, water, in which the sufferers sought refuge to escape the still more dreadful ravages of flame. The district attorney then commented upon the objection made that there could be no such thing as joint negligence, and insisted upon it that, in practice, such inattention might exist, as in cases where two men are stationed at one point to keep common watch, and both neglect their common duty by gross acts of negligence. But in this case joint misconduct is charged, and in the Henry Clay's Case the indictment sets forth that he, Collyer, the owner, was acting as master; that the captain was also acting in conjunction, not only with him, but with the engineer, pilot, clerk, and others of the crew; that all these were acting together, each in his own department, the object being to surpass the Armenia in speed; that each and all were reckless; and that the consequence of this recklessness was the burning of the boat, and the destruction of her passengers. He insisted, therefore, that, both in theory and in practice, the indictments were good, and ought to be sustained, and he cited and commented upon many cases in support of his positions. The argument of the district attorney occupied upwards of two hours.

Mr. McMahon replied on the part of his clients. In the course of his argument, the judge interrupted him, saying that he would not take into consideration the question whether the law was unconstitutional. The only question he would entertain was whether this court had jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. McMahon then continued his argument, and was followed by Mr. Noyes, on behalf of the parties implicated in the Reindeer catastrophe. The court then adjourned, the judge reserving his decision until morning.

THE COURT, after advisement, delivered an oral opinion, in which he considered at some length the objections, but finally overruled them, and ordered the defendants to plead to the indictment. The defendants all plead not guilty.

D. McMahon, for defendants Tallman, Jessup, Elmendorf, and Merrit.

Henry G. Wheaton, for Germaine.

George N. Betts and Ambrose L. Jordan, for Collyer.

J. Prescott Hall, late Dist. Atty., and Mr. Dunning, for the United States.

The prosecution moved on the trial of the defendants together. The counsel for the defence, on affidavits, asked for separate trials, principally because the defence of the defendants were antagonistic to each other, and that no fair trial could be had of all the defendants together, and that the evidence of the defendants was reserved for each other. This separate trial was opposed at much length by the prosecution.

After a long discussion, INGERSOLL, District Judge, decided against the separate trial, remarking as follows, viz.: "It appears to me that a great many topics have been discussed here which it is unnecessary to consider in disposing of this motion. They will properly be considered when the case goes to the jury; and as to what weight will then be given to them, under the instruction of the court, I do not think it necessary to intimate an opinion. The act of congress provides: 'That every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board any steamboat or vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life of any person or persons may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter.' Now, the indictment at present under consideration is founded upon this act of congress, and it charges the individuals named in it with this misconduct and negligence. It charges them with a joint misconduct, and that by such misconduct and negligence they are all liable. It is not necessary for me to determine any questions which may have been had up before Judge BETTS heretofore, or to intimate what I think of his opinions; but, undoubtedly, I should have concurred in his opinion, after due consideration had by me. The question now is, whether the court will order a separate trial to Mr. Collyer, before the other defendants are tried, because it is evident that the object is to have Mr. Collyer tried first."

Mr. Jordan: "So far as we are concerned, we never asked anything of the sort, nor do we wish it."

INGERSOLL, District Judge: "It makes no difference whatever. The object is to have one tried before the other, and why? The reason is, and there can be no other legitimate reason, that unless there is a separate trial, there cannot be a fair trial; and then the question comes up, that being the reason, has there anything transpired by which it is made to appear that these parties cannot have a fair trial if they are tried jointly? And, if there is no reason made to appear that they cannot have such a fair trial, then it is the duty of the court not to order a trial separately. But if it is made to appear that they cannot be fairly tried jointly, then, as I conceive, it is the duty of the court, although it has often been said to be in their discretion, to order a trial separately. What are the reasons which are urged to induce me to believe that the defendants cannot be tried jointly? They are two. The first is that the defence of some of these defendants is so antagonistic to each other that they cannot have a fair trial; and, secondly, that they cannot be tried fairly without having the testimony of their codefendants in their behalf, as I understand it, and that, therefore, they should be ordered to be tried separately, so that they could have the testimony of their codefendants adduced in their behalf.

"One word as to this latter reason before I consider the first. Is there any ground, for that reason, that I should order a separate trial to be had in this case? Whether Mr. Collyer were tried first, or the captain, or the engineer, it is said that the one who is thus tried first ought to have the benefit of the testimony of the other, and could not have it, and it follows that it should be granted for that reason; and the question is, could he do it? This question has been often before the courts, not only in the states, but before the courts of the United States. It has been before the supreme court, in a case reported in Johnson, in a case in Massachusetts, of Pickering, where a separate trial was ordered, and where the party who was first tried offered the testimony of his codefendants, and it was refused, because the codefendant was not a witness. Two years ago the same subject was had up before the supreme court of the United States. It was a case that went up from Virginia, where two individuals were indicted for murder upon the high seas, and where a separate trial was ordered, and where the one first tried offered the testimony of the other one who was indicted, and not upon trial, and the question went up to the supreme court whether he was a competent witness for the one first tried, and the supreme court decided that he was not; although in the state of Virginia a law had been passed, prior to the time that the trial was had in the circuit court, that where a separate trial was had, the one first tried might have the benefit of the testimony of the other. The supreme court decided, although it was so in the State of Virginia, yet in the courts of the United States the one first tried could not have the benefit of the testimony of the other who was indicted with him, and therefore this reason which has been urged is not well sustained; for if this defendant was tried separately, the object would not be obtained, for he could no more have the testimony of those indicted with him upon that trial, than he could have upon a joint trial.

"Now, as to the other reason. Is the defence so antagonistic that the defendants cannot be fairly tried? I certainly do not think so. If I did, I should be inclined to grant a separate trial. It is not that any one who is acting as captain, or mate, or engineer, and him only, shall be liable under the statute, but it is any person; and in reference to the ground urged by the last counsel, that it is necessary for him to implicate the witnesses, in order to excuse the captain, whom he represents, I do not understand it so at all, if what he says is true, that the captain was sick, so that he was not able to attend to his duties on board the vessel, and did not so attend to them, and the command devolved upon the next officer. If he was sick, and could not attend to his duties, he has done nothing. If that is made to appear, then, as I view the case, unless there is something more in it, and this misconduct happened during his sickness, and he could not attend to it, then, in my judgment, he will be free, because he will not be implicated in that misconduct. His sickness would excuse him. I do not therefore see any reason, upon each of the grounds to which I have alluded, that the defence of the defendants is so antagonistic that they cannot have a fair trial if tried together."

Mr. Dunning, the associate district attorney, opened the case for the prosecution. He said: "The defendants have been indicted under the provisions of the twelfth section of the act of congress, approved July 7, 1838, entitled, 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.' That section says, 'And be it further enacted, that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board of any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof before any circuit court in the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labour for a period of not more than ten years.' The indictment in this case contains various counts, and in substance charges that the defendants, on the 28th day of July, 1852, were the persons having charge of, and employed on board the steamboat Henry Clay, a vessel propelled by steam; that John F. Tallman was the captain, John Germaine, engineer, Edward Hubbard, pilot, James L. Jessup, clerk, James Elmendorf, second pilot, and Thomas Collyer acting as captain; that by their misconduct, negligence, and inattention to their respective duties, the lives of Stephen Allen, A. J. Downing, Abraham Crist, and divers other persons, were destroyed. It will appear that on the morning of the 28th July, 1852, the Henry Clay left Albany, freighted with human beings, having more than four hundred passengers on board, bound for this city. While on her passage down the river, at about three o'clock in the afternoon, when nearly opposite Yonkers, she was discovered to be on fire, and so rapidly did the flames spread that they soon gained the mastery, and it was found to be impossible to extinguish them. The boat at this time was near the middle of the river, but was soon headed for the shore, which she succeeded in reaching, her bow being run aground, her stern remaining in deep water. Then ensued a scene of horror that baffles all description. At the time the vessel reached the shore, most of the passengers were on the after part of the boat, having been directed to go there by those in command. The wind was blowing from the shore, and the fire, which originated near the middle of the boat, was raging to such an extent as to render it almost impossible to pass it. In their attempts to reach the shore, more than eighty of the passengers on board, with scarce a moment's warning, were hurried into eternity. The fearful alternative of perishing by the flames or the waves was presented to many of the unfortunate passengers of that ill-fated vessel; and each element, the fire and the water, received its share of victimes. No age, sex, or condition in life escaped. The mother and her infant, the old and the young, the man of four score years and the youth, shared a common fate. For a time the sad tidings of this catastrophe spread a gloom over the land, and well they might, for they brought sorrow and anguish to many a heart, and desolation to many a home. It is charged that this sacrifice of human life was caused by the negligence, carelessness, and inattention of the defendants, and it will be for you to say whether this charge is well founded. Your position therefore, gentlemen of the jury, is an important and a responsible one,—important for the defendants; important for the community. You stand between the living and the dead; for, although your verdict cannot reanimate the dead, it may save the living, may prevent the occurrence of similar calamities, may teach a lesson to those who have the charge and management of steamboats, much needed to be taught, that the safety and lives of passengers committed to their charge are not to be trifled with or taken with impunity. The frequency of occurrences of this character may well excite alarm. Scarcely a day passes but we receive intelligence through the public prints that life has been destroyed by the recklessness—the criminal recklessness—of those having charge of our railroad locomotives and steamboats. And where shall we look for a corrective, if not to a jury, when a proper case is presented for their consideration? Let the law be rigidly enforced, and such occurrences will cease. Let courts and jurors, ministers of justice, falter in the proper discharge of their respective duties, and such occurrences will be more frequent still.

"I have said thus much, gentlemen, to show you the importance of the position you occupy. I ask you to weigh the evidence for the prosecution calmly and dispassionately, and render such a verdict as will satisfy your minds, under the circumstances. I shall not attempt any minute statement of the evidence that will be introduced. I prefer that you should listen to the statements of the witnesses, and take the evidence as it shall fall from their lips, rather than any statements or conclusions of my own. We shall produce as witnesses many passengers who were on board, and saw the whole occurrence. We insist, and I think it will appear from the evidence, that on the 28th July, 1852, the day on which this awful calamity occurred, the Henry Clay was engaged in a fearful race—a trial of speed—with the Armenia, and that from that cause the catastrophe resulted. The vessels left Albany at nearly the same time; the Henry Clay being a few minutes in advance of the Armenia. That there was a race, we shall call a variety of testimony to prove. The witnesses will detail the occurrences that took place on that passage; and that the race for supremacy was contemplated before the vessels left Albany will also be apparent. So evident was it to the passengers on board that the boats were racing, and so much were their fears excited, that they remonstrated with the officers and Mr. Collyer; the captain being sick, and not on deck; they besought them to desist; but in vain. Their remonstrances were unheeded, and the race continued.

Many of the passengers who had paid their passage to this city landed at Poughkeepsie, and other points of stopping, being fearful to proceed further in the boat, and pursued their journey by other conveyances. This apprehension of the passengers, this desertion of the boat, would scarcely have occurred unless they were satisfied that there was a race. We shall show, also, that the boat that day did not make all her usual landings. They were so anxious to succeed in the race, that they passed the landings, to which some of the passengers had paid. The vessels were in such close proximity that at one time the Henry Clay ran into the Armenia. One of the firemen who went up to Albany on the Henry Clay on the 27th, refused to return on the 28th, fearful of the occurrence of some such calamity as actually happened. That the boats were engaged in a fearful contest for supremacy will, I think, abundantly appear from the evidence; and that each and all of the defendants contributed their efforts to enable the Henry Clay to succeed, will also be fully established."

Mr. Dunning then proceeded to state the other facts that he would adduce in evidence for the prosecution; that the race was continued notwithstanding the remonstrances of the passengers; that the vessel was certified to carry thirty pounds of steam to the square inch, and that she had much more; that the vessel was not provided with the necessary means of escape,—with life boats, life preservers, or the usual number of buckets, in case of fire; that each of these was deficient in number, and that the catastrophe resulted from a want of care in this respect; that the vessel was on fire the day before this catastrophe; that she was on fire at an earlier period on the same day; and that she had been frequently on fire before the 28th July,—and these facts, though not bearing on this case, go far to show a criminal negligence. They were notified, not only at an earlier hour on the same day, but they had been frequently notified previously. The passengers would tell the jury of these facts, and that some of them counted the number of revolutions the vessel made, though they may not be able to tell the exact speed she was going at. That, however, is not material. It will be for the jury to determine whether the defendants caused this destruction of lives. They would perceive that, by the statute, while the punishment may be ten years' imprisonment, it is within the discretion of the court to reduce it to one day. It was not necessary for the prosecution to show that the defendants, or any one of them, intended this calamity. It was enough for them to show that it was the result of misconduct, carelessness, or negligence. The learned gentleman then referred to the able and elaborate charge of his honour, Judge Betts, in the case of U. S. v. Farnham [Case No. 15,071], in which he says: "The indictment charges on the master of the Reindeer the crime of manslaughter, because, by his misconduct, negligence, or inattention at the time and place alleged, the lives of many persons were destroyed. The question at issue, on this indictment, is whether the government have, by legal and sufficient proof, convicted the defendant of the crime of manslaughter. In the first place, the law does not require the public prosecutor to prove willful mismanagement or malconduct by the accused. You are not to inquire if he was guilty of intentional negligence or inattention, but only if he did what is forbidden by the law. The point of inquiry before you is whether he was guilty of misconduct, negligence, or inattention, and whether the explosion and destruction of life arose from either of those causes. In order to determine that, we must have a clear and accurate understanding of the meaning of the terms used by congress in this law. By misconduct, negligence, or inattention in the management of steamboats is undoubtedly meant the omission or commission of any act which may naturally lead to the consequences made criminal; and it is no matter what may be the degree of misconduct,—whether it is slight or gross,—if the proofs satisfy you that an explosion of the boiler was the necessary or most probable result of it."

Mr. Dunning concluded his address, which was listened to with marked attention by a crowded court, by saying that "it was neither the duty nor the inclination of the prosecution to urge the conviction of the defendants, unless the evidence we shall be able to introduce shall satisfy your minds of their guilt. We are not here to urge the conviction of the innocent. The law neither needs nor seeks such victims. It will be our purpose to introduce such evidence as is under our control and which, in our judgment, clearly tends to establish the guilt of the defendants. We shall strive to state the case fairly between the government and the accused, and, having done so, we shall have discharged our duty, and it will then be for you, gentlemen, to discharge yours."

Much evidence was given in on the part of the United States (the trial occupying fourteen days) to support the propositions of fact in their opening. The facts appeared in proof pretty much according to the previous statement, excepting that witnesses of the prosecution were principally unacquainted with steamboats and their management, and two or three whom they called, who were experts in navigation, approved of the conduct of the pilot of the vessel in putting her ashore.

The defence was opened by Mr. McMahon, who said:

"Before opening the case, I beg leave to submit to your honour one or two authorities and one or two propositions of law, in answer to the cases which have been cited very frequently by the prosecution.

"The first proposition is, 'that, under the act of congress of the 7th July, 1838, it must appear that the deaths or the homicides must result directly and proximately from the misconduct, the negligence, or inattention complained of. In support of that proposition, I refer to the 12th section of the act, that 'every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board of any steamboat, or vessel propelled in whole, or in any part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person, or persons on board said vessel may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and upon conviction thereof, before any circuit court of the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labour for a period not more than ten years.' The act declares that the death must be caused directly and proximately by misconduct and inattention to their respective duties.

"The second proposition is that mere negligence or misconduct, or mere inattention, although it be sufficient to charge the officers in a civil suit for damages, does not subject the defendants to this indictment, and that an error in judgment, such as putting this boat on shore, or in the confusion that ensued on that day, when the fire was discovered, in ordering the passengers aft, does not constitute the misconduct, &c., as used in the 12th section. It must be such negligence, or such misconduct, or such inattention, as would, when committed, be likely, in itself, directly to cause the homicide; thus, in a case of bursting boilers; for the engineers to put extra weight on the safety valves, or for the captain to engage in a race with a rival boat, and in such race his boilers would collapse from the extra strain put upon them; and the act of omission must be such as that its performance or nonperformance would be a notice to the officer doing, or omitting to do, the act, that he was guilty of criminal dereliction of duty. Rex v. Allen, 7 Car. & P. 153; Rex v. Green, Id. 156.

"The third proposition is nearly involved in the second; that the negligence, misconduct, or inattention must not be merely omissive, but it must be such gross negligence as is akin to fraud, under the law of bailments, or, as Judge Betts expresses it, 'intentional negligence.' 3 East, P. C. 265.

"My fourth proposition is that, under this indictment, it is necessary to show that each of the defendants, in the performance or nonperformance of his respective duty, was guilty of such misconduct, neglect, or inattention as that thereby they all directly caused the injury complained of, and that their acts converged to, and had in view, some great personal injury to the passengers. Now, with regard to the inferior officers of that vessel, for instance, the captain's clerk, it is necessary, we suppose, under this indictment, that the prosecution must show that he was guilty of such misconduct in the performance of his duties, in selling and taking tickets, so that they directly converged to this fire: because, under this 12th section, the homicide must be occasioned by the misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties. So with the assistant pilot, and so with the other officers of the vessel.

"The next proposition is that, even if there be, as claimed by the prosecution, a general concert of action towards this race, yet, under this act, the officers of this vessel, not in command, and not in charge of the fire, cannot be held responsible for the fire. I am assuming the claim of the prosecution, admitting nothing; for although, as claimed by the prosecution, they might be guilty of misconduct in assenting to the race, yet their misconduct had reference to the race, and not to the fire; and, in the absence of any evidence, as in this case, on the part of the prosecution, to show that this fire was a direct consequence of that race, they must be acquitted. One word as to the opinion of Betts, District Judge, in the case of U. S. v. Farnham [supra]. I happen to know something about that case, although I was not one of the counsel who tried it. The boilers of that vessel exploded on the North river, at Malden landing, and it was shown, affirmatively, on the part of the prosecution, that there was a violation of the act of congress on the part of the officers of that vessel, in not causing the safety valve to be raised at each landing place; and the prosecution claimed, and direct affirmative testimony was given to show, that that collapsing of the boilers arose from the pressure of steam, which pressure was occasioned, in a great measure, by the negligent act of the officers of that vessel, in not doing that which they are enjoined to do by the act of congress. I state these facts with reference to this opinion, in order that the court may see that it is entirely a distinctive case from the present. There was evidence to show that the collapsing of these boilers arose from the want of a performance, by the officers of that vessel, of the duties enjoined upon them by the act of congress. This was a charge to the jury. It was not brought up in any authoritative way, so that counsel upon both sides could discuss this particular question of law. The case was entirely distinctive from the present case, and I do not think that any more weight should be attributed to it than to those English cases which I have cited, and which were determined upon in solemn consideration by a bench of judges. May it please the court, gentlemen of the jury, the duty has now devolved upon me, to open this case on the part of all the defendants charged in this indictment. I represent, in fact, only four of these defendants; but, my colleagues not wishing to trifle with your patience in having three openings of this case on the part of the defence, the duty devolves upon me of representing all the defendants. It is with the most profound emotion that I rise to address you upon this occcasion: We have here upon trial six men of the utmost respectability, who are charged here, after all, for nothing more than negligence, by the prosecution; and they are charged with an offence of the gravest magnitude, the effect of which will be to consign them to what would be worse than death to them,—a living tomb. I feel, gentlemen, the responsibility of the task which I assumed here in opening this defence. I look upon the one side, and observe two prosecutors, who, by their acts in this case, have shown their determination to convict these men of the offence with which they are charged before you,—an offence of the gravest magnitude. But yet, when I look to my clients, I feel reassured by the innocence of their looks; and, thus imbued with this profound conviction of their innocence, I rise to address you upon this occasion. Now, what is the offence with which they are charged here before you? So far as regards the act of congress under which they are charged, or so far as regards the particular indictment under which they are brought to trial before you, there is no fact—no circumstance—which would give any notice to these gentlemen of what they are to meet in this case, nor had they any notice, in point of law, of what they were to rebut, until the evidence was given on the part of the prosecution. I say, therefore, that they are bound to consideration in that respect. Men charged with the consequences of negligence, how difficult it is to show exactly, step by step, every act which they did upon that day. Yet this act of congress is very comprehensive. It is very general in its provisions. The indictment is equally general. It does not allege any duty which they are called upon to perform, nor any breach of that duty, except in most general terms; and, so far as regards the act of congress and the indictments, the defendants knew nothing, until they were brought into court, of what they were to meet. Now, gentlemen, on the 28th of July, 1852, a most appalling catastrophe occurred upon the North river, by which a number of human beings were sent into eternity. So awful and dreadful was this catastrophe, that immediately the public papers took it up, and the public jumped to the conclusion that these men were necessarily guilty of misconduct or negligence. It was spread through the land, and, when this case was referred to, it was called 'The Henry Clay murder'; and whenever it was brought up in any court of justice, the 'Henry Clay murder' was a constant expression. But, gentlemen, very fortunately, fifteen months have elapsed since that occurrence, public excitement has, to a great degree, died away, and, very fortunately for these defendants, they now stand before twelve men who are unprejudiced, and who come to this cause with no bias in their minds.

"Gentlemen, it is a fortunate circumstance, and one which these defendants rejoice in, that they are enabled, for the first time, to spread forth their defence before the public, and to justify themselves in the eyes of the world. What must have been the feelings of these men during the last fifteen months? How dreadful, how agonizing, must have been their thoughts, when at every turn they were charged with the most heinous of offences? But truth will prevail at last, and I appear before you now to develope what we conceive to be the truth in this case, and to justify every one of these men in what they did. We deeply deplore the calamity that ensued, but we will show you, by evidence and by facts that will not lie, that they are innocent of any guilt in the premises. The prosecution here claims that on the 28th of July the Henry Clay started from Albany a little in advance of the Armenia, and that, shortly after, a race occurred between those two boats. They claim, further, that that race was the cause of a fire which ensued some eighty-five miles below, where these vessels were shown to be in close proximity to each other. No evidence has been introduced here by scientific men, by engineers, or by any one who, by reason of their vocation, ought to know,—no evidence has been introduced,—to show that the fire was legitimately the result of that alleged racing. Let us suppose there was racing on that day. Does it follow that the vessel was set on fire by that racing? If the boiler had burst upon that, it would be perfectly legitimate to infer that the boiler burst from the race. But it does not by any means follow that, because there was a race eighty-five miles above the scene of the catastrophe, of necessity, that fire originated from that race. Now, gentlemen, in order to rebut any possible conclusion or inference upon your minds by the evidence which the prosecution has here introduced, we will put upon the stand engineers of the greatest respectability, who will show, by their scientific testimony, that this fire could not have occurred from any racing; that this vessel might have been driven to its extremity of speed upon that day, yet the boilers of the vessel were so arranged, water bottomed, the fire surrounded on every part by water, that it was impossible, in the nature of things for the fire to originate from that racing.

"We will not put upon the stand a man brought from Yonkers, who knew nothing about steamboats, nor had been engaged in any capacity on board a steamboat, but we will put upon the stand scientific men, who know what they are talking about, and to whose evidence you are bound, gentlemen, to give the utmost reliance. Was there any racing on that day? I shall not go over the evidence of the prosecution, for it is out of place in the opening of a case for a counsel to recapitulate in minute terms the evidence introduced upon the other side. I will merely generally allude to it. You have all heard the evidence of these excited passengers (Mr. Minturn and so forth), from the commencement to the end, a great many of whom differ in the details of this occurrence. One of them makes this collision one and a half miles from the western side of the river, another makes it almost on the western side of the river, and a third places it just reaching Kingston dock. A number make it four or five miles above that place, and one goes so far as to say eight or ten miles above Kingston dock. We will put upon the stand pilots of long experience on this river, who will develope to you the channel of that river, and who will show you how devious and winding that channel is from Hudson down, and that it runs from one side of the river, and goes again to the other, until it reaches Kingston; and what struck these excited passengers as being racing, from the fact that the Henry Clay came out to meet the Armenia, was nothing more than the Henry Clay pursuing the natural channel in her navigation. We will put upon the stand pilots who will explain to you about the collision of these two vessels; that it arose from the principle of suction, and that, when two vessels of a class, or nearly of a class, as the Armenia and Henry Clay, are in close proximity, the principle of suction is such as would bring them together; and that what the officers of the Henry Clay did upon that day was perfectly proper, under the circumstances of the case. They had excited passengers on board, crying out, 'What must we do?' The Armenia was in their way. We will put upon the stand passengers who will show that the Armenia came out and met the Clay, and that the Clay endeavoured to avoid the Armenia, and for that purpose, on one occasion, run inside of a sloop, not a great distance from the eastern shore, in order to avoid her (the Armenia). We will put upon the stand witnesses to show that on that day the Henry Clay was not making her ordinary speed; who will prove that she could make twenty-seven and twenty-eight revolutions of her wheel in a minute, and that her speed was from twenty-one to twenty-two miles an hour; and, further, that at different landing places upon the river she was behind her time. When you connect that fact, gentlemen, with the fact that at the time she was run ashore she was an hour or an hour and a quarter behind her time, can you arrive at the result that there was racing on that day? It is absurd to talk about it. There was no racing on that day, and, for fear that there should be racing, an agreement was entered into between the owners of the two vessels, before she went on her trip to Albany, that there should be no racing, and that the Armenia should keep behind the Clay on the up trip and down trip. Yet, gentlemen, for fifteen months has it been bruited throughout the land that these vessels were engaged in a deadly strife, that pitch and tar were used, and that the utmost means were resorted to by the officers of that vessel to beat the Armenia. Why, gentlemen, it was, as stated by one of my colleagues, a 'cripple's race.' One witness testifies that he got on board the boat at Hudson, which is thirty miles from Albany; that he started a little before seven; and that she was going fourteen miles an hour. One witness gets on at Poughkeepsie at 12 o'clock, which is seventy-two miles from Albany, and she was then going about fourteen and a half miles an hour, and, at the time she was run ashore, it was from three and a quarter to three and a half o'clock p. m., being eight hours from Albany, a distance of one hundred and thirty-five miles, which would make her rate of speed from fifteen to sixteen miles an hour. If they had been going twenty-one or twenty-two miles an hour, for eight hours, they might have reached Sandy Hook.

"Thirty years ago, for a steamboat to go eight or ten miles an hour was considered extraordinary speed; but such has been the force of American energy and go-ahead-itiveness, that from that time to the present, improvements upon improvements have been made in the speed of vessels, and it is well known that there are now in our harbours vessels that go from sixteen to twenty-three miles an hour. But the prosecution says that in order to race they made extraordinary fires; that these extraordinary fires were made seven times hotter, in order to keep up the steam; and the safety valve was bound down, in order to run this vessel at the extraordinary speed of sixteen miles an hour. For that purpose, they have introduced some passengers who stood, on a hot day, on the promenade deck, in the vicinity of the engine room and her steam drum, and they found it hotter than they ever found it before. What they meant by that, gentlemen, does not appear before you, as these witnesses are not shown to have had any experience on steamboats. It is absurd and ridiculous for the prosecution to send six men to the state prison upon evidence like that. We have to meet that evidence, however ridiculous and absurd the testimony is, but we shall be able to place upon the stand witnesses who will put a quietus upon it. We shall show, in reference to the construction of the Henry Clay, that this steam drum or chest on the promenade deck was uncovered, and the reason of its being uncovered was for greater security against fire. It was found by one of the owners of this vessel that another steamship belonging to him had taken fire from the steam drum being covered, and, consequently, on this boat a different regulation was made use of. It would very naturally happen that persons standing on the promenade deck, with the steam drum uncovered, on a hot day, and but little breeze above the highlands, would feel very warm.

"Now, as to the subject of extraordinary fires. When steamboats intend to race, they take on board an extra quantity of coal, they employ extra firemen, they break them up into many watches, and do a great many things in order to carry out the race; but we will show you that on that day no more coal was taken on board than usual, and that there was no tar, pitch, or rosin on board. Lackawanna coal was used, and that of the best quality; and no extra hands were employed besides the regular men. We shall show that there was but a little breeze above the highlands, and, further, that from the commencement of the voyage until Catskill, the pressure of steam, as indicated by the gauge, was much less than she was allowed to carry by law. One word upon that subject. They have introduced upon this stand an aged man, who, from his testimony, has shown his liability to make mistakes, for the purpose of proving that the certificate of that vessel only allowed her to carry thirty pounds of steam; but we shall show to you, by a number of witnesses, although that certificate has been consumed by the flames, that that certificate allowed her to carry thirty-five pounds of steam; and, further, that it was perfectly safe for the boilers of that vessel to bear fifty pounds of steam, and that they were built with the intention of carrying seventy-five pounds; but for greater security, and at the request of the engineer himself, the certificate was narrowed down in one year from sixty pounds to thirty-five pounds, and the reason was, not as Curtis stated, because he saw some defect in the furnace, but because, although the boilers could bear sixty pounds with safety, yet it might not be with safety to the other parts of the machinery of that vessel, for in the spring of 1852 an alteration was made in her spring cylinder, and a larger one was put on board. We shall show that the fire room of that vessel was better constructed than that of any other vessel of her class on the North river, and that with her boilers below deck, she had greater precautions against fire than any other vessel of her class. We shall show that she had—which few vessels were furnished with at that time—a steam cock, for letting off the steam, in order to extinguish the flames. We shall show that these boilers were properly covered with the usual covering; that they were far back, where no fire could reach; that the fire broke out on the starboard side of the starboard boiler, immediately under the grating, on the side of the vessel where no fire could reach. We cannot account for this fire. We did not set the vessel on fire, because, gentlemen, it would have been too great a loss to the owners of this vessel. They will lose by this catastrophe $200,000. It is a deep and abiding calamity to them. This fire occurred either from accident or design. If it occurred from accident, it was no accident that happened through the acts of any one of the firemen or the officers of that vessel. We can imagine how it occurred, but we are not called upon to show how. We could refer to the testimony of Mr. Wilkes, who was so prophetic upon that day, but who has never been so prophetic since. We could show that a lying, drunken fireman was discharged from his employ, and a great many other facts; but it is enough for us to show that on that day it occurred through no negligence, misconduct, or omission upon our part.

"The prosecution claims that, if the pilot had put that vessel ashore in an angular sidelong position, the passengers could all have escaped. For fifteen months has this been bruited about in the public prints of the United States. Men knowing nothing of steamboats have discussed eloquently upon this subject. That is one of the most cruel things that has ever occurred in this case, and I say that the pilot, instead of being indicted, should have received from those passengers who now malign him a testimony for his good conduct in putting the vessel on shore. That pilot is one of the best men of his class in the state of New York. He has a rough exterior, but a kindly heart; for, although his pilot-house was in flames, and the boards crackling at his feet, and although he ran the risk of being crushed by the steam pipe and walking beam, yet, like a Roman sentinel, he stood at his post, and did not abandon it. We shall produce evidence to show that, had the vessel been run ashore in an angular or sidelong position, she would have shot off into the stream, and every soul on board would have perished. We shall show, by the most competent witnesses, that the vessel was put on shore in the most proper and scientific manner. We shall put upon the stand, if we deem it necessary, the pilot of the Hendrick Hudson, who was run into by a sloop, and, in attempting to run his vessel sideways on shore, came very near losing her and all the passengers he had on board.

"It has been claimed by the prosecution, that if the officers on board the vessel that day had performed their duty, and had they given directions to the passengers what to do, the lives of all would have been saved; and it has been harped upon, in the course of the trial, that there was an order given to the passengers to go aft. Now, supposing that it was so, it was a perfectly proper order, as will appear by our evidence. This vessel was going to the shore head on, as was right and proper. If it had been a rocky bottom at the place where it struck, the effect would have been that the vessel would have been broken in two. If this had happened, her boilers would have collapsed, and all those who were forward would have lost their lives. Another circumstance was, the bow of of that vessel could not, by any possibility, hold a quarter of the passengers upon it. Suppose, then, that the order had been given to rush forward. In a body of four hundred excited passengers, having the fear of death before their eyes, how many of them would have found a place of security there? Why, as it was, when the vessel reached the shore, there was not standing room even for those who were already there. You would, therefore, have enacted there the same scene that takes place where a theater is burned, and the doors are shut, and no one can get out. The same fears, the same struggle to get out and get forward, would have ensued; and yet the prosecution, in their ignorance of what they were talking about, got up and introduced testimony in order to poison your minds. But we shall show that so intense was the excitement that, even before the vessel had reached the shore, between thirty and forty (and some say as many as fifty) persons leaped off into the river. In such a state of things, there was absolutely no use in trying to restrain them. Many of us, indeed, did try to do so. The officers tried it, but it was found impossible to succeed. The passengers were panic stricken, and, like every panic stricken crowd, rushed they knew not whither. It was, as described by one of the witnesses for the prosecution, a beehive. Now, gentlemen, what could the officers have done on that occasion? Mr. Hubbard, the pilot, was in the pilot house. He did not abandon his position. We shall show you that Mr. Collyer, Mr. Elmendorf, the engineer, and the barman, were all engaged in pouring water down the fire room, in order to check the fire. We will show that one of the officers was on the lower deck, and ordered all to go forward; that persons were sent to the crowd to tell them that when the boat reached the shore, they should go forward; and that, when the vessel did reach the shore, every officer in the vessel, as soon as they saw persons struggling in the water for their lives, sprang forward to save them Now, for the last fifteen months, the brunt of this offence has been charged on Mr. Collyer. Every one has united in condemning that gentleman, and yet no one exerted himself more than that same Mr. Collyer. As soon as the vessel reached the shore, he did not spend his time in hunting after his carpet-bag, or standing on the shore, crying 'Oh dear!' but he sprang to a fence, broke it down, rushed with it into the water, placing boards within the reach of all that it was possible to approach, and was the means of saving fifteen persons. He rescued so far as man could by his own unaided exertions. What did the engineer do? He was in the water likewise; but, for a part of the time, he was endeavouring to scuttle the vessel, thinking that by sinking her the fire could be put out, or the flames quenched, or that the vessel might be made to touch the bottom, and the lives of the passengers be thus to some extent rescued. Captain Tallman had on that day been confined to his berth from an attack of the cholera morbus, and unable to be on deck, except at intervals, for the purpose of breathing fresh air. Though he was taking calomel, a kind of medicine which rendered it exceedingly dangerous for him to go into the water, yet he sprang in, got hold of a boat, made two voyages in it, and was the means of taking to land some nine or ten ladies. No efforts made to save the passengers! Why, their efforts were superhuman. They did all that men possibly could; and when Capt. Tallman reached the shore, he had to be carried on board the Armenia, almost insensible, and was obliged to be immediately put to bed. What as to the pilot? He was in the water, and I could relate to you several touching incidents of his acts, when his kindly nature was aroused. Mr. Jessup was up to his neck in the water, doing all he could, though he was unable to swim. Mr. Elmendorf, too, was making exertions. There was not an officer on board that boat, whether engineer, assistant engineer, pilot, or assistant pilot, captain, or Mr. Collyer, that did not make more than human exertions in order to save the lives of those passengers. Why did not the prosecution ask Mr. Minturn whether anything was done to save the lives of the passengers? They did not; and, if they had, it would have let us understand what they were endeavouring to set up, and we could have elicited that on that day Mr. Collyer made most superhuman exertions.

"But it is said that the vessel was not seaworthy. On this subject I will make a few remarks. We will introduce evidence to show that the vessel was built by one of the most talented shipbuilders in the United States, Mr. Collyer; that she was built with a view to rapidity of motion in the water, and also with a view to safety. We will introduce evidence to show that the witness Edwards, who said he saw wood around the smoke chimney charred, must have lied, because there was no woodwork touching it. On the contrary, there was such an opening that there was at least a foot of space between the chimney and the wood, and, besides that, there was a protection of canvas on each side. I will show, too, that the vessel was built in every respect with an eye to security, and especially to safety from fire. We will show that she had twenty-four buckets for water on her hurricane deck, and two boats, capable of containing fifty passengers, and four chain buckets on her forward deck, that she had a steam cock to let off the steam, for the purpose of extinguishing any flame, steam being the best extinguisher known; that we had one of the most experienced masters on the river, who, however, on that day was unfortunately sick, and confined to his berth; that we had one of the best pilots on the river, one, also, of the best engineers,—the man whom Cornelius Vanderbilt would not go to sea without,—and one of the most scientific and careful pilots in the craft; that we also had a good second pilot, and a good clerk, who was selling tickets, and is now claimed by the prosecution to have set the vessel on fire. We shall prove that it was a steamboat of the most improved model, and we will show, on the part of the officers of the vessel, the best possible character for care, skill, and caution.

"Now, in conclusion, let me beg of you not to listen to the voice of prejudice. For fifteen months have these men been pursued with public odium, their characters maligned in every possible way, standing under this indictment; in another county actually charged with murder; fortunately, however, able to quash that; then charged with manslaughter, actually, under that indictment, in another county, pressed vigorously, too, by the prosecution for fifteen months. Nor were the public, notwithstanding, satisfied with that. During the whole period, the officers of the steamboat and the owners were pursued with public odium. The matter was spoken of as the steamboat so and so, commanded by Captain Tallman, and piloted by Edward Hubbard. During the entire period, they suffered intensely and agonizingly from the attacks upon their character, many having wives and children, most of them having those who were near and dear to them depending on them for their subsistence, and suffering the most intense anxiety for the result of this prosecution.

"I beg of you, gentlemen, in conclusion, that you will not listen to the voice of prejudice, but that you will calmly and dispassionately consider the testimony submitted to you. When we get through, we will scotch the snake; we will put an end to the malignity of the prosecution."

Evidence at great length was introduced by the defence to prove the facts contained in their opening.

The case was summed up by Mr. Jordan, for Collyer, and by Mr. Wheaton, for Germaine. Mr. McMahon, after their summing up, declined to speak. Mr. Wheaton then commenced summing up for the defence. As it had been remarked by the counsel who opened the case, it was one undoubtedly of very great importance in its results, both to the public, who feel a deep interest in it, as well as the defendants themselves. Most certainly it was so to the latter, for on this occasion the jury had before them men who had not heretofore been charged with crime; men who had, up to the time of the destruction of this boat,—he might say up to the present time,—held as high a position in society, and had had the confidence of the public perhaps as much as any of their fellow citizens that could be selected from this city. They were men accomplished in the employments in which they were individually engaged, and their employments were such as the public had the deepest interest in having responsible or skilful men employed to perform. They were arraigned upon a high charge, with being the criminal authors of the most extraordinary destruction of human life that has occurred for some time. If the crime which has been alleged against them shall have been proved, it will expose them to one of the highest punishments known to our laws; they being liable to be consigned to the state prison for a period even of ten years, their characters, of course, too, to be destroyed in the estimation of the public, and themselves to be cut off from society, and even be deprived of their liberty. The jury saw, therefore, that the case was of the utmost importance, but still they came into court, and presented their defence with the utmost assurance, and the utmost confidence that, after a fair examination of the evidence that had been produced on the part of the defendants, the jury would be satisfied, not only that they were not guilty of the crime which had been charged against them, but that there was not the semblance even of a crime made out against them. There was no doubt this was a case in which the public had felt a deep interest, arising, as it did, out of an almost unparalleled destruction of human life; and a feeling had got abroad that the whole case should be thoroughly investigated, and, beyond a question, it was peculiarly proper that a thorough search should be made, to ascertain, if possible, whether any one was the criminal cause of the destruction of human life in question. But they must act against individuals only upon evidence, and he did say that, if there had been no more evidence before the grand jury, on which to ground their presentment against the accused, he was amazed how it was possible that they could have come to the conclusion of there being prima facie evidence against the defendants. But they all knew how investigation before coroners' juries was conducted; that only one side of the case was presented for consideration, and that the defendants had no opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses, or of discussing the testimony, as to whether it was sufficient to ground an indictment upon it, or even presented a case that was proper for investigation.

He would next call the attention of the jury to the statute upon which the indictment was framed; see what it was the defendants were charged with, what testimony would be required for conviction, and then look at the evidence in the present case, to see whether really there was a single fact on which the prosecution could rely for the purpose of obtaining a verdict. This indictment was founded on the 12th section of the act of congress, entitled "An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam"; and he called their attention particularly to the wording of the section. "And every person employed on such steamboat, propelled wholly or in part by steam, by which misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be sentenced to confinement with hard labour, for a period of not more than ten years." The first thing to be found upon this was whether the persons charged with the offence were employed on board such a boat, and had some distinct and particular business on it to perform. Then, what misconduct, negligence, or inattention to their respective duties had they been guilty of. Then, you must find a particular act, in each instance, against each of the defendants charged. In the case of an indictment arising out of a boiler explosion, Judge Betts laid down that, by the misconduct, negligence, or inattention in question, was undoubtedly meant the omission or commission of any act, the necessary or most probable result of which was the loss of human life; and, no matter what amount of misconduct the parties were guilty of, it must be shown, clearly and distinctly, that the misconduct led to the destruction of human life in question. Let them now apply that to the present case. The jury had heard about the inspector's certificate, but the inspector had not power to compel obedience. He could only give a recommendation as to the quantity of steam, and the parties might follow it or not, just as they chose. Great stress had been laid by the counsel for the prosecution upon the fact, which they strove to establish, that the limit was thirty pounds, but there had not been a particle of proof that at any time during the whole distance between Albany and Yonkers, she had carried an ounce of steam beyond thirty pounds; but, moreover, the weight of evidence was most decidedly in favour of the defendants' position, that the amount of steam fixed was thirty-five pounds. There was to this point the testimony of one of the firm of Radford & Co., and several other witnesses, to that effect. Even from one of their witnesses' testimony, it was as likely that it was thirty-five pounds, as thirty pounds.

Let them take the different officers, and see what they had been guilty of. What misconduct, for instance, had been proved against the engineer? Had he not managed, in the most skillful manner, so far as his part was concerned, up to the moment that the boat struck the land? He challenged the counsel for the prosecution, when he stood up, to point out any act of his which was criminal,—any omission to perform his special duty. If he could not show this to the jury in letters of living fire; if he could not show it to them so plain that the wayfaring man, though a fool, could see it; if he could not point it out to them so plainly that the human eye could not be deceived,—then, appealing to the true spirit of our law, that a man is not to be presumed to be guilty until his criminality is clearly and satisfactorily established, he should ask them with confidence for their verdict on the part of the defendants. Then, what had been proved with respect to the pilot? The prosecution had, indeed, only attempted to urge one fact against him, and that was that, crossing over to his landing place at Kingston, he had run his vessel in contact with the other, and that this was a culpable act on his part; he having at the time the control of the helm. Well, even supposing the jury had found that this had been a wrong act, though undoubtedly his vessel had been chased by the Armenia, either in the endeavour to make the landing first, or to get into the suction of the Henry Clay, this act could not be said to have any connection with the burning of the vessel. It was eighty-five miles from the place where the fire had been first discovered, and the contact had been appropriately described by one of the witnesses as a blow, and then separate. The Clay had not been injured at all; not even had her paint been rubbed. All the time of the accident, much excitement had prevailed, and every slander that human ingenuity could suggest had been thrown out against the accused. Indeed, to such an extent did the excitement go, in relation to the matter, that, looking back at it now, and considering it coolly, they could only regard it with astonishment. The catastrophe was undoubtedly an awful one, and the public, in their indignation, did not stop to examine whether this person or that person was guilty, but with one general voice exclaimed against all the officers: "They are guilty; punish them." A victim was demanded, and the voice was, "Let us pay back life with life;" but the laws were not now so vindicated. This had gone out with paganism. The time had been when, if the wind blew unpropitiously, the oracle was consulted, and the answer was that the storm should be appeased by the sacrifice of human life; but that time has passed. Punish the guilty by all means, but let them take care that it was the guilty they punished.

The defendants were charged with bearing on the waters a precious burden of men, women, and children; but let them punish the innocent, and what would the navigator say? That it made no difference, let him be as careful as he could, when the public indignation was raised, and a victim called for, it took the innocent, as well as the guilty. It was a happy thing in the administration of our laws, whenever there was a great deal of excitement prevailing against an individual charged with a crime, to put it off until the public mind had settled down under the excitement. In the present case they had waited until the excitement was in some measure subdued, and the consequence was that, instead of having the court crowded with spectators, there was only a small gathering, for the purpose of gratifying their curiosity, rather than from revenge He would now read from Starkie (page 478) a distinction in criminal cases, as contradistinguished from civil ones: "The distinction between mere proof and mere preponderance of evidence is very important. In all criminal cases it is essential to a verdict of condemnation that the guilt of the accused should be fully proved. Neither a mere preponderance of evidence, nor any weight of preponderant evidence, is sufficient, unless it generates full belief of the fact, to the exclusion of every reasonable doubt." It was laid down in the 507th page that the conclusion to be drawn should be fully established; that if the basis was unsound, the superstructure could not be sound; that the party upon whom the burden of proof rested was bound to prove every single circumstance which was essential to the conclusion, in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if the whole issue rested on the proof of such individual and single circumstance.

An attempt had been made in this case to prove that there had been racing, and inferences were sought to be drawn from this; but, before this could be done, they must first be convinced of the existence of the fact that there was racing. But not only was there no evidence as to this, but every fact and circumstance went to show that not even was there any attempt at it; that, even if the racing had been proved, it was not shown that the fire in question had resulted from it.

The evidence of Mr. Belknap went to show that the furnaces were surrounded with water, and that, consequently, it was utterly impossible to raise the heat to such an extent as to set fire to the woodwork by radiation.

(Counsel then proceeded to review the evidence produced for the defence, and concluded by saying): "With respect to Mr. Ridder, I shall say nothing, in consequence of the fact of their having disparaged his testimony, by showing that he told a very different story at the indignation meeting. From the appearance of the man, and the circumstances that transpired during the examination, I apprehend that he was a little desirous of making a speech there which would satisfy his hearers, and, in all human probability, he said things then that he was unwilling to corroborate under oath. He was making a speech to an excited meeting, that would not listen to any vindication of the officers, and I apprehend that he told stories then which he was not afterwards willing to corroborate under oath. I will therefore pass over his testimony.

"With respect to that of Mr. Van Buren, which there can be no reason to disbelieve, instead of there having been anything criminal on the part of the pilot of the Henry Clay, in what he did, it would appear that he did nothing more than what was right for a vessel under such circumstances to do, in order to obviate what the Armenia was endeavouring to accomplish by dragging herself along in the Henry Clay's suction, in trying to make the landing at Kingston before her.

"I appeal to you, in conclusion, whatever else may happen, whatever may be the strifes or disputes, only keep sacred the altar of justice. Let the sword be wielded only by the hands of a pure and honest jury, and then when it strikes, the public voice will say 'Amen,' and when it acquits 'Amen.' It reverberates through the halls of justice, and will reach the utmost corners of our Union; and, that it may continue to be venerated, I call upon you on this occasion, if you are not satisfied of the guilt of these men, to say so promptly. There is a great deal in promptness. Let not the public think that you have doubted, because of a long continuance in deliberation. The facts are few, though so much time has been spent in this voluminous evidence. When you come to winnow out the wheat from the chaff, how much is there of the wheat left? How much out of the whole mass of evidence is there that bears upon any of the questions upon which you are to satisfy yourselves, before you pass your verdict upon the case which is now before you? Has there been a culpable omission on the part of either of these defendants? If there has, can we say, clearly and distinctly, that that act which we have marked down as culpable was the cause of the destruction of this vessel, and, consequently, the cause of the destruction of human life? Gentlemen, ponder upon these things, if you have doubt. If you have no doubt, let me ask you, in favour of these men, whom you would be proud to honour, and whom the very kindness of your hearts would prompt you to favour, say to them promptly, and in that pure, energetic language, consisting of these words: 'In our opinion, you are not guilty of the charge brought against you.'"

Mr. Jordan, counsel for Mr. Collyer, then proceeded to address the jury on behalf of his client. "If," said he, "I had the power, gentlemen of the jury, of taking the vote of the jury, whether they would hear any more on the part of the defence, I should feel very well satisfied, in my own mind, that any remarks which I am about to make would be excluded. It appears to me that such is the nature of the case, and such the demonstrations of innocence of all the parties concerned in this indictment, that it would be unnecessary to spend time in any further discussion. I did not expect, until recently, for reasons personal to myself, and therefore not necessary to mention, to take part in this discussion; but, feeling a little more like a man to-day than I have for the last three or four days, I shall endeavour to show you, beyond all doubt, that my client, Mr. Collyer, the only person with whose defence I am particularly charged, is entirely beyond the scope and pale of this indictment, and that to punish him, under the act of congress, is entirely out of the question; and, if I undertake to submit my views upon the general subject, which has been ably and eloquently discussed, they will be very general indeed. My object is, more particularly, to perform a dissecting process upon some of the testimony. I intend to show that all the witnesses who have sworn to facts relative to Collyer have so exhibited themselves before you as to entitle them to no credit or consideration; not that I intend to charge them with untruthfulness, but that they were so excited that they were unable to discriminate as to the facts which they swore to. It is one of the noblest efforts of the human mind to endeavour to raise itself above prejudice and error, and to arrive at truth; because truth is always the foundation of justice, and falsehood and fiction always the basis of every error. Courts of justice are instituted for the purpose of arriving at the truth. They were framed for that purpose. Facts are frequently coloured by men's feelings and prejudices, but when we come into a court of justice, where the balance is held equal and even, and where the judge sits with that equipoise which is necessary to the calm investigation of truth, it is there alone that we can arrive at the truth of the subject in controversy. It is that which distinguishes courts of justice from mobs. It is that which distinguishes courts of justice from those indignation meetings we have heard of; not that I feel disposed to cast any blame upon those persons who assembled at the Astor House for the purpose of passing resolutions upon this subject, because I know, under the impulse of their feelings, it was the only vent their human nature had to let off, so that, under the pressure and agony of their feelings, something might go forth to the community; and, though it was rather of a vindictive character, and the circumstances under which they were assembled unfavourable to the investigation of truth, yet it was a relief to them, which I have no disposition to find fault with.

"I shall proceed, first, to consider whether Mr. Collyer is implicated in the indictment, admitting that all the rest are to blame; and, secondly, I shall proceed to make a few general observations, for the purpose of gleaning a few facts. I will demonstrate to you that Collyer is not implicated; and, further, notwithstanding the efforts of the able prosecutor, which will be continued up to the death, I will show that all these defendants in this case are equally innocent with Mr. Collyer, who had nothing to do with the matter, and is not implicated in this transaction at all. You will recollect that this is an indictment under the statute of an act of congress, but it is not an indictment at common law, for no such an indictment at common law would lie. It is therefore under the act of congress alone that these parties can be indicted and punished, and they must be brought within the terms of that act of congress, one and all of them, in order to find a verdict against them. That act of congress, being a penal statute, must be strictly construed, and they must be strictly brought within it before they can be punished according to the penalties inflicted by the twelfth section. I will once more refer to the twelfth section of the act of congress, not generally, but for a particular purpose, which I have now in view: 'Every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed,' (it is the word 'employed' which I wish to call your attention to) 'and who shall, by any misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his or their respective duties, destroy the life of any person on board, shall be guilty of manslaughter.' Now, the first question is, was Mr. Collyer employed on board this vessel? I beg to call your attention strictly to the section, and to impress upon you that no man can be convicted unless he comes within the meaning of the word 'employ,' and I shall ask his honour—which, I think, will be his obvious duty—to charge the jury that to convict Mr. Collyer, or any other person here, it must appear that he was employed on board the vessel at the time of the happening of this accident. Mr. Collyer was one of the owners; but the act of congress has nothing to do with owners of a vessel, and it has purposely omitted them. It would be unjust and improper to make the owners of a vessel responsible, in a criminal prosecution, for the negligence, misconduct, or inattention of those engaged in the navigation of the vessel. But if the owner goes on board, and takes charge of the vessel,—if any third person goes on board and takes charge,—if any man should substitute himself in the place of the captain, and, in case of illness, or from some other cause, assume the command of the vessel, he would, I am willing to admit, be within the true interpretation of the act of congress. The question, then, is, was Mr. Collyer in that situation? Mr. Collyer was a shipbuilder in the city of New York, carrying on such business here, and he constructed this boat as he had many others. He was the owner of five-eighths of her, and I shall show that he had performed his duty as owner by providing one of the best vessels that was ever built in this port, or that ever ran upon the Hudson river, and, so far as he was concerned, together with his co-owners, he provided one of the best set of men who were ever employed upon this river; all young, active, intelligent, vigilant, men. It has been satisfactorily proved that this vessel was fully equipped with boats and buckets, and that the hull of the boat was one of the most substantial kind; and one of the witnesses, a pilot, tells you that her running up on to the beach in the manner she did, and remaining unbroken, was an evidence of the substantial qualities of the frame of that vessel."

The learned counsel then proceeded at great length to dissect the evidence of Minturn, Gilson, Gourley, Connor, Hubbard, and Shelmore. He contended that, even supposing their testimony to be worthy of credence, Mr. Collyer did not lie under the imputation sought to be sustained by the prosecution, of having in any manner engaged in the control or management of the Henry Clay on the day of the calamity, and that, therefore, the twelfth section of the act of congress did not, in the slightest degree, apply to his case. He commented with particular severity on the contradictions in Mr. Gilson's evidence. The facts which Gilson attributed to have taken place in regard to

Mr. Collyer, at the time of the collision, were all facts which took place with regard to Mr. Ridder, and that this appeared plain and conclusive, there could be no doubt; for, when he (Mr. Jordan) pointed to Mr. Ridder, and asked Gilson if that gentleman was Mr. Collyer, Gilson said it was he. From this fact alone there could be no doubt but that Gilson did not know what he was talking about. Gilson might be an honest man, but he was a very unfortunate one. He (Gilson) was a man who looked across a gangway ten feet wide, and through an engine twenty feet wide, and saw forty marked on the gauge-rod of the engine, which had no number at all upon it. Gilson was determined to leave an impression upon the mind of the jury that the vessel was carrying forty pounds of steam, and the reason was because the carrying of this forty pounds of steam was a violation of duty, and beyond the amount allowed by the certificate. It was a maxim that a lie would stick to a man as well as the truth, but that fortunately it did not prevail in a court of justice. This was the description of evidence, in infinitesimal doses, by which the prosecution sought to prove that Mr. Collyer was managing the boat on July 28th; but he (Mr. Jordan) would as soon think of fattening an ass on the east wind as endeavour to fix Collyer as controlling the action of the boat on the day of the accident by such desultory and unsatisfactory testimony. At this point of the learned counsel's speech, the court adjourned until ten o'clock the next day.

Mr. Jordan resumed his address to the jury this morning. The counsel for the defense had been aware, from the commencement, that they would have little occasion to make use of Mr. Ridder's testimony, that it was a plain, simple, continuous narrative of the whole journey from Albany to the fatal spot, unembellished, unadorned, uncontradicted, but in fact corroborated by everything in the case. All he said had in fact been proved by other witnesses, so that they had little occasion to make use of his testimony. He (Mr. Jordan) should use it but little, although his learned associate had thought proper to abandon anything like a justification of the conduct and position of Mr. Ridder, and to give him up a prey to the district attorney, to be pounced upon as a lamb is pounced on by a vulture. He (Mr. Jordan) would now say a few words in his defence, not because his clients needed Mr. Ridder's evidence, but because he thought it unjust that any person should be so treated, who, by process of law, had been compelled, whether he willed or not, to come into court and give his evidence. He would show that the assistant editor of the New York Daily Times had not contradicted Mr. Ridder in any essential particular; but, first, he would express his regret that the counsel for the defence had not pertinaciously objected to the questions put by the district attorney, and doubtless, the decision of his honour would have been to rule against it. In answer to the questions of Mr. Hall, Mr. Ridder said: "I cast no blame upon the officers. I said nothing about their firing up to a dangerous extent." Now let them see what it was that the assistant editor of the Times swore it was Mr. Ridder did say. He expressed an opinion as to the cause of the fire, attributing it to an unusual firing. "They made a hotter fire than was usual or necessary." Thus the jury would see that, while the witness said: "I cast no blame upon the officers. I said nothing about their firing up to a dangerous extent," all the assistant editor maintained was that Mr. Ridder "expressed an opinion" that there had been too much fire. He did not maintain that Mr. Ridder distinctly said so and so. Mr. Ridder could no more state the cause of conflagration than any one else could. No one could do more than surmise whether it arose from a match being thrown down there, or a cigar, or whether it was that some fiend in human shape had thrown down camphine, which, running along the heated timber, would account for the flames firing up so suddenly,—no one could do more than surmise,—or whether by the engineer opening the doors of the furnace to damp the fire, instead of pulling the safety-valve. Whether these things were so, Mr. Ridder and they all alike were in the dark, and could only surmise. Besides the assistant editor did not swear that Mr. Ridder said the firing up, if he ever did speak of such a thing, had been done by the order or with the knowledge or consent of the officers. Where then, after all, were the mighty contradictions? Mr. Hall next asked the witness: "Did you say anything about their continuing to race after remonstrance?" His reply was, "I did not." Now mark the words of the assistant editor: "He said that the officers were remonstrated with after racing." Mr. Hall's question, if it had been answered in the affirmative, would have been: "I said there was racing after they had been remonstrated with." The assistant editor only said: "Mr. Ridder said they had been remonstrated with after racing." Neither he, nor any one else, denied that there was racing at one particular point, but it had no connection with the catastrophe which caused the loss of life. The next question of Mr. Hall was, "Did you not say there were no buckets there to extinguish the flames?" The reply was, "No, sir; I did not say exactly that. I said he used all the buckets there were." That answer might certainly imply that there were buckets, and doubtless they were used until it was seen that they were of no use; and, if there had been ten thousand buckets there, they would not have been of any use, for the steamboat went off almost like a charge of gunpowder.

So much for Mr. Ridder,—a man who certainly had told a plain, consistent, orderly, narrative of the transactions of that lamentable day; so far as he (Mr. Jordan) could discover, without passion or prejudice in heart, he being, to a great extent, one of the sufferers, although he had not lost his daughter. Doubtless, however, he had not considered it just that those men should, without cause, be so universally condemned, particularly when he saw the meeting so gravely passing a resolution, sending forth to the world a statement that they had not been contented with the usual firing up on board, but had burned tar and resin, and pitch, and other combustible material. It was for opposing that resolution, too, that the engineer, who, having been down to the boilers after the catastrophe, and seen the marks of the quenched anthracite coal, knew that there was no other fuel used, was threatened to be thrown out of an upper story window. He (Mr. Jordan) did not know who led that indignation meeting, but he had been informed that it was a particularly precious individual for such occasions, though he would not mention his name; and, doubtless, if a resolution had been proposed which alleged that the officers had got the devil from hell chained down below, vomiting up fire and brimstone for the burning of the steamboat, it would have been passed; and, if it had, it would have been just as reasonable as the infernal one that the murderers—for such they would have been—of the Henry Clay had been firing up with tar and resin, and God knows what. He then proceeded to comment upon the evidence for the prosecution, saying, in the course of his allusions to the different witnesses, that he did not like the cut of Mr. Minturn's jib. That gentleman had attempted to impress upon the jury that a passenger was refused to be landed at Bristol, because of the boat being in such a hurry; whereas, on cross-examination, it turned out that he was nothing more than a drunken loafer, who was making a disturbance on board, and had made no demand at all to be landed until after the boat had passed the place. Dr. Wells he designated as a "do-no-harm do-no-good sort of a man;" and declared that he (Mr. Jordan) could, from personal trial, contradict his statement about the particles of anthracite coal as large as peanuts. He had tried with a newspaper to brush away such pieces, and could easily remove them in that way; "nay, I could do so with a cambric handkerchief." But he could not remove flat pieces of coal, such as might be naturally expected to pass from any smoke-pipe, and which were doubtless the kind that were blown over the decks and the awning of the Clay on the day in question. He held out to the jury, as a guiding polar star in this case, the consideration that they must positively find that the deaths in question were occasioned by the act complained of, though it might not be necessary that the act complained of should have been perpetrated just at the time of death; still the last must be clearly traced to it,—as clearly as ever the effect was traced to the cause. He maintained at some length that this could not be done in the present case, even according to the evidence for the prosecution. He concluded by expressing a hope that the magnanimity of the district attorney's nature would, despite his employment by the government, compel him not to do any injustice, even though he possessed the power, to those men who would stand that day in peril, if it was not that they relied upon the intelligence of the jury.

Mr. McMahon, after the able and eloquent addresses of his associates, declined addressing the jury.

Mr. J. Prescott Hall, for the United States, closed summing up, and said:

"May it please the court, gentlemen of the jury: This is now the fourteenth day that you have lent your attention patiently to the investigation of the facts in this case. I will not abuse that patience by any protracted examination of the testimony, but will endeavour to state, as briefly and clearly as I can, the law which is applicable to the case which is now before the court and the jury, and the evidence which the prosecution has adduced to support it. In endeavouring to discharge my duty, gentlemen, I shall make no effort to go beyond the proper limits, although I shall, on this occasion, discharge it without pain, because I, as a man, think that gross misconduct exhibited itself on the part of the officers of the Henry Clay on the fatal 28th of July, 1852. I will not endeavour, by any effort, to strain the testimony, nor shall I be willing to fall one inch short of it, for I conceive that by my duty to the government, as prosecuting officer, I am required, without fear and without favour, and without regard to the particular individuals who are charged, that I should discharge that duty in the best manner I am capable of. By the constitution of the United States, the commerce of the whole country is placed under the control of congress. The supreme court of the United States have, on many occasions, decided that the word "commerce," as used in the constitution, included navigation also, and that therefore the whole navigation of the United States, as well as the whole commerce of the United States, are under the jurisdiction and supervision of the people's representatives in congress assembled. At the time the constitution went into effect, and for many years thereafter, the mode of propulsion adopted on the rivers of the United States was such that the intervention of the powers of the law was not called for to check any abuses, or to guard people in their rights; but, after the discovery of that mighty and potent engine, which was thereafter to be used on all the navigable waters of this country, and perhaps of the globe, after these potent energies had been brought out, and applied to the propulsion of steam vessels, it was discovered by experience that great want of care had been exhibited on so many occasions that the people of the United States were not safe, in the prosecution of their ordinary business upon the water courses of the United States, unless they were in some degree protected from the acts of those who were their transporting agents. And so serious had this whole matter become, that congress, in 1838, passed a law upon this subject, which is significant in its very title. It is entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam.' It proceeds, then, to give a set of rules, which are to govern the conduct of those who are charged with guarding the lives of passengers on board of the vessels which they control, and which rules they have no right to disobey or disregard. And, in order that the utmost vigilance should be exerted, it is provided, after the passing of this act, that no vessel shall be permitted to navigate the waters of the United States, unless they take out a license, under the conditions which are imposed by the statute; that, in the first instance, the district judge should appoint competent persons to inspect the boilers and all hulls of the steam vessels; that the hulls of the steam vessels shall be inspected once in twelve months, and that the boilers shall be inspected once in six months; and to disregard this is visited with the severe penalty of the law. He then referred to that section of the act which made it the duty of the officers of vessels to let off steam at every landing place, or whenever the headway of the vessel should be stopped; and, in support of this, he cited Judge Betts in the case of The Reindeer [supra], to show that it was imperative, and that the captain had no discretion. But congress, not deeming the act stringent enough, passed the following statute: 'Section 12. And be it further enacted, that every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person, employed on board any steamboat or vessel propelled in whole or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his, or their respective duties, the life or lives, of any person, or persons on board said vessel, may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter; and, upon conviction thereof, before any circuit court in the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labor, for a period not more than ten years.' If this statute is to be applied to the poor fireman or deckhand, much more is it to be applied, to masters and owners on board the vessel, who take part in the navigation, and to the pilot in the wheelhouse, and the engineer in the engine room. Upon these persons rests the responsibility, and, respectable as they are, intelligent as they are, there is less excuse for their neglect of any duties which the law casts upon them, to have been the cause of this terrible calamity. What, because Mr. Collyer's shipyard is to be shut up, is he to be held irresponsible for such acts?

"The whole theory of this case, rests upon the charge of mismanagement and negligence. I will state the theory that has been adopted by the prosecution in this matter. We suppose that this terrible accident occurred in consequence of the misconduct of those having charge of this vessel on the 28th of July.

"It is in evidence here that the steamboat Reindeer, which used to be the Racehorse, upon the North river, with the Henry Clay, had become disabled, and it was necessary to have some boat take her place. The Armenia, a boat of about equal speed with the Henry Clay, was selected for that purpose. She was to sail on the 27th of July, bound from New York to Albany; but, with a very cunning regard to their own interests, the owners of the Henry Clay had made a secret contract with those who were to navigate the Armenia that the Armenia, was to lie behind the Henry Clay, and that the Henry Clay was to be permitted to go to all the docks ahead of the Armenia, take in the passengers that first offered themselves, carry them to Albany, and deliver them there, and that on the return down the same course of conduct should be pursued. It is in evidence that this arrangement became displeasing to the charterers of the vessel. They therefore took Capt. Smith from his command, and gave the vessel in charge of Capt. Polhemus, and placed another individual on board to direct him in her management. After the vessel had departed from Albany, it was supposed, on the part of the officers of the Henry Clay, that this same arrangement was to be persisted in, and there was no reason to suppose that this arrangement would not be kept up until after the Henry Clay came to Hudson. When she came to Hudson, it was then discovered that the Armenia, in apparent violation of the arrangement which had been made between these vessels, instead of following the Henry Clay to Hudson, had gone down the west passage, avoiding the landing at Hudson, and made directly for Catskill. The instant the Henry Clay discovered this, it became the subject of conversation between the passengers, and it was so admitted that, when Mr. Collyer was asked whether the Armenia would pass the Henry Clay, the answer given by Collyer was that he thought she would not."

The learned counsel here entered upon a critical examination of the testimony introduced, and contended that the prosecution had clearly proved that the vessels were engaged in a fearful contest of speed, the results of which were the destruction of the Henry Clay, and the fearful loss of life. Such being the case, he called upon the jury to pronounce a verdict of guilty against the defendants, particularly Collyer and Tallman, who were in a position of life which should have prevented them from doing that which they knew was contrary to law. The question which the jury had to determine was one of the greatest importance to the community, who were looking with intense anxiety to the result of the present trial. Mr. Hall wished to ask whether there was any validity in an act of congress, or whether it was null and void. If the former proposition was correct, the defendants must be convicted; if the latter held good, they would be acquitted.

INGERSOLL, District Judge (charging jury). There is a prospect that we shall now bring this protracted trial soon to a close. It has occupied a very considerable portion of your attention, but not, in my judgment, more than was due to the transaction which had to be investigated. I am glad to be able to say, gentlemen, that you have thus far exhibited that patience, and given that attention, which the case requires. It has been intimated, during the progress of the trial, that injustice had been done to these individuals under trial from the fact that they were not enabled to have separate trials, for the reason that, if they had had separate trials, the testimony of those not on trial might have been used in defence of the others who should be tried. In the examination of this question, when the motion was made for separate trials, I gave my reason why separate trials should not be granted, and I will again state, in this place, gentlemen, that, as they have been indicted by the grand jury jointly, if they had been permitted to have had separate trials, the one who should have been tried first could not have called upon the others to testify in his defence. That is the law. It has been so decided, upon solemn argument by the supreme court of the United States, and to that decision we must all bow. I therefore say, gentlemen, that if they had been permitted to have had separate trials, the one who should have been first tried would not, in law, be permitted to call upon the others to testify in his defence. In the year 1838 the congress of the United States, in view of the many startling disasters which had happened upon the waters of the United States to vessels propelled by steam, by which great loss of life had been occasioned, passed a law, the object of which was, as appears by its title, to protect the lives of passengers on board vessels of that description. That law, among other things, provides: "That every captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board of any steamboat or vessel, propelled in whole, or in part by steam, by whose misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his, or their respective duties, the life or lives of any person or persons on board said vessel, may be destroyed, shall be deemed guilty of manslaughter, and, upon conviction thereof, before any circuit court in the United States, shall be sentenced to confinement at hard labour, for a period not more than ten years." The indictment which you have to pass upon is founded upon this violation of this act of congress. It charges that Thomas Collyer, John F. Tallman, John Germaine, Edward Hubbard, James L. Jessup, and James Elmendorf, the parties now on trial, in July, 1852, were employed on board the Henry Clay, a vessel propelled by steam, and navigating the waters of the Southern district of New York; and that, while they were thus employed, the lives of several passengers on board the vessel were destroyed by their misconduct, negligence, and inattention to their respective duties. To the charges set forth in the indictment, the individuals named therein, and against whom the charges were made, have severally pleaded that they were not guilty.

The question, then, at issue, and upon which you, upon your oaths, have to determine, is whether they are guilty, as charged in the indictment; and, to enable you to come to a correct result, it is necessary that your attention should be directed to certain inquiries which are involved in the question at issue. These inquiries are: First. Whether the lives of the persons named in the indictment, or the lives of any of them, have been destroyed? Secondly. Whether they have been destroyed by the misconduct, negligence, or inattention of any one? Thirdly. Whether the individuals against whom the charges in the indictment are made were employed on board the Henry Clay at the time such lives were destroyed. And, fourthly, if they were thus employed, whether such lives were destroyed by his or their misconduct, negligence, or inattention to his, or their respective duties? And in considering the case now to be submitted to you for your determination, it is important that you may come to a just conclusion, to bear constantly in mind certain rules of law, which should govern trials in all cases involving in their consequences a punishment that is infamous; which should govern them in all criminal investigations, and particularly in those investigations which are of an aggravated character. These rules are, that every one accused of crime, whether the offence charged be one of commission or omission, whether it be criminal or culpable neglect, shall be presumed to be innocent until the contrary appears. He should be considered as innocent until his guilt is made to appear manifest by evidence given in court; and, when upon evidence given in court there is in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, no matter what the charges may be, he who is accused should have the benefit of that doubt. By the law which governs this court, and which also governs all well-regulated courts, he who is in an indictment charged with crime is not called upon to establish his innocence. That duty is not imposed upon him. His innocence is considered to be established until, by convincing proof brought forward in court, that presumed innocence is destroyed. It is the duty of the government to convince the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the guilt of him who may be indicted, and not the duty of the accused to convince them of his innocence; and, if the jury are not convinced beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt, then it is the duty of the jury to acquit. The disaster which gives rise to this prosecution, at the time at which it occurred, deeply excited the feelings of the community, and the public mind, for a considerable period, was in such a state, that, if the trial of those implicated—or, I should rather say, of those supposed to be implicated—had taken place soon after it happened, there would have been some danger, and, I may add, there would have been great danger, that that calm and dispassionate investigation might not have been given to the investigation of the truth which is due to all subjects of inquiry in a judicial tribunal, and particularly to a subject demanding so much impartial investigation as the one now to be submitted to your determination. But that excitement has now passed away, and you, as impartial jurors, sworn to a faithful discharge of your duty, have been selected to pass between the government and the accused, and I have no doubt that the duty which devolves upon you will be faithfully performed.

I have told you what duty devolved upon the government before they could claim a conviction. It is also incumbent upon me to state what is not required of them, and what is no part of their duty, in conducting the prosecution. It is not required of them to prove willful or intentional mismanagement or misconduct on the part of the accused. In a prosecution of this kind, it is not the intent which constitutes the essence of the offense, but it is an improper act, although unaccompanied with any evil intent or negligence, in the performance of a proper act, or inattention to any duty imposed upon any captain, engineer, pilot, or other person employed on board any steamboat or vessel, propelled in whole or in part by steam, when by such improper act, or negligence in the performance of a proper act, or inattention to any duty imposed upon such captain, engineer, pilot, or other person, the life of any person on board such vessel is destroyed. But there must be some improper act inconsistent with the faithful performance of duty, or negligence in the performance of a proper act, or inattention to some duty imposed upon such person, and the death of some person on board a vessel in consequence thereof, before there can be a conviction. There must be not only such improper act, or negligence, or inattention, but there must also be a death of some person on board, as a consequence of such improper act, negligence, or inattention; and, if these are proved, it is unnecessary to inquire whether or not the accused had any wrong intention. But, although such improper acts and negligence, inattention, and death are proved, yet, if such death was not in consequence of such improper acts, or negligence, or inattention, there can be no conviction. To make myself understood, gentlemen, the law of congress makes it necessary, or rather makes it the duty of every captain, at every landing place, to blow off steam. If he does not blow off steam, that is misconduct or negligence, or inattention to his duty. But if, subsequently to that time, a death occurs on board of a boat, and it is not attributable to that cause, although there may have been misconduct, negligence, or inattention, there can be no conviction, for the death is not connected with the act complained of, and which is said to be misconduct or negligence. And if there were death, and such a death were in consequence of some misconduct, negligence, or inattention by some one employed on the vessel, if these defendants are not chargeable with such misconduct, negligence, or inattention, and if there is not proved to your satisfaction that they have been guilty in this respect, there can be no conviction. In other words, if there has been a death, and such death has been occasioned by the misconduct or negligence of some other person other than those, if those persons have not been guilty of negligence or such misconduct or negligence as caused that death, or contributed to it, then they cannot be convicted.

Those who conduct this prosecution do not claim that these defendants, or either of them, intended the death of any one on board the vessel. There is no necessity that they should. They are not accused of any willful design to take the life of any one. The indictment is not pressed upon that ground, but, as I have before intimated, it is pressed on the ground that the lives which have been lost were lost by the misconduct, negligence, or inattention of the defendants. In an action in favour of any passenger on board the Henry Clay, at the time of the disaster, against the owners or captain of the boat, for any injury to his person, or to his property, the mere fact of such injury, caused by the burning of the boat, would be sufficient, if there was nothing else in the case, for the jury to say, and they would be bound to say, that the boat was destroyed by negligence, so as to make the party defendant liable for the damage claimed in consequence of such burning. In such a case, from the fact of burning, negligence and misconduct are presumed, and the defendants would be liable for the negligence, unless they proved affirmatively, that the fire was not caused by negligence or misconduct; for from this fact the law takes it for granted that the defendants are guilty, and, to prevent a verdict against them, they must prove their innocence. This, gentlemen, is the rule in a civil case, where a party brings a suit for the recovery of damages; but this is not the rule in a criminal case, such as you are now about to determine. In a criminal case there is no such presumption against the defendants which they must remove, but all the legal presumptions are in their favour, until the contrary is proved; and the death claimed to be in consequence of any misconduct or negligence must be proved to be, before a conviction be had, the direct consequence of the mismanagement and negligence complained of, and if it is not the direct consequence of the misconduct or negligence complained of, a conviction cannot be had. As in the case cited by the counsel from the books, where an individual places a loaded gun in the corner of the room and another person not knowing that it was loaded, takes it up and innocently snaps it, by which it is discharged, and causes the death of some one, there would be a death, and there would be negligence on the part of him who placed the loaded gun in the corner of the room. If there had not been that negligence, there would not have been a loss of life, but that negligence would not be the immediate cause of the death. The negligence did not directly produce the death. It could not produce it without the act of some other person, and, as the death was not intended by the person who was guilty of the negligence in so placing the loaded gun, and as the death was not the immediate consequence of such negligence, and would not have taken place but for the act of another person, the party guilty of such negligence would not be responsible for that death. But if the negligence or improper act complained of be the sole cause of the death, if it cause or produce the burning of the vessel, and such burning of the vessel cause the loss of life, then such loss of life is the direct consequence of such negligence or improper conduct, and the party guilty of the same is liable to the punishment imposed by the act of congress, upon which this prosecution is founded.

An error of judgment merely, gentlemen, is, however, not sufficient to fix such misconduct or negligence upon the person against whom such error of judgment is proved. The law of congress did not intend to punish a mere error in judgment. What was meant by misconduct, negligence, and inattention, in the law of congress, upon which this prosecution is founded, is well expressed by the learned judge, in his charge to the jury, in the case of U. S. v. Farnham [Case No. 15,071]. I, in substance, use his language. "By misconduct," he says, "negligence, or inattention in the management of steamboats, is undoubtedly meant the omission or commission of any act which may naturally lead to the consequences made criminal; and it is no matter what may be the degree of misconduct, whether it is slight or serious, if the proof satisfy you that the setting fire to the boat was the necessary or most probable cause of it." Bearing these rules of law in mind, you will turn your attention to the issue of the question which must be determined by you, in order that a correct decision may be had of the issue which has been framed between the government and the parties now on trial.

The first question is, were the lives of any persons on board the Henry Clay destroyed by the disaster which happened to her on a trip from Albany to New York in 1852? It is admitted, and the proof is full, that there were a number of those who were passengers on board the boat perished in consequence of the sad disaster, the details of which have been repeated during the progress of the trial. Some were destroyed by the fire, and some, attempting to escape from this devouring element, perished in the water.

The next question is, were these defendants persons employed on board the boat, having duties to perform connected with her management and navigation? For, whatever negligence or mismanagement there may have been, and however much the death of the persons destroyed may be connected with any negligence or misconduct, which may be claimed to be chargeable to the defendants, or to any one else, these defendants are not responsible for such misconduct or negligence, unless they were persons employed on board the boat, having duties to perform connected with the management and navigation of the boat. It is admitted that John F. Tallman was the captain of the boat. The captain has generally the command of the boat. All on board performing duties are under the authority of the captain, whoever he may be, and they are subject to his orders. It is admitted that James L. Jessup was the captain's clerk, and, among his duty or duties, was the collecting of fare and giving tickets, and of acting as the assistant to the captain, under him. John Germaine was the engineer of the boat. His duty was confined to attending to the engine, regulating and directing it, and having control of the fireman. Edward Hubbard was the pilot of the boat, and his duty was to direct the course of the boat. James Elmendorf was the assistant pilot, and his duty was to assist the pilot, to act under him, and in his absence to take his place. But it is claimed that Mr. Collyer, a part owner of the boat, and on board of her at the time of the disaster, was not a person on board of her having duties to perform connected with her management and navigation, and, if he was not, he cannot, under any circumstances, be liable to this prosecution. It is claimed, on the part of the government, that he was such person, who at the time of the disaster was on board, having such duties to perform, and that he was, for the time being, the captain of the boat. It is unnecessary, by the law upon which this prosecution is founded, to make a person come within its meaning, that he should be employed under pay to perform any particular duty; but, if any person acts as captain for the voyage, or for any particular time is engaged or acting as captain, or for any cause takes the place of the captain, and for the time being acts as such, he is, within the meaning of the law, the captain of the boat, upon whom is imposed the duties of captain.

The question, then, is, did Mr. Collyer, on the trip from Albany, on the 28th of July, 1852, act for the time being as captain of the boat? Did he take the place of the regular captain? If he did, he was employed, within the meaning of the law, as captain on board the boat. Proof that certain things were done upon his advice, or upon his suggestion merely, would not be sufficient to establish the fact that he was for the time being acting as captain. Nor is it sufficient that he should have passed an opinion, whether asked or unasked, as to the safety or risk of a particular movement of the boat, or of the danger of the mode by which the boat was managed. He must, at least, assume to exercise the control and the authority of the captain to take the command, and no opinion which he may pass, or suggestion that he may make, unless he has a duty to perform on board the boat, will make him an officer, or a person on board of the boat having duties to perform, within the meaning of this act of congress. The government say that they have proved, upon the trip in question, that Collyer was captain of the boat, and they rely upon certain witnesses whom they have called. The principal witnesses are Minturn, Gilson, Gourley, Connor, Hubbard, and a witness from Philadelphia, whose name I do not remember. Most of these witnesses do not speak of any order which Collyer gave. Mr. Minturn speaks of an opinion which he (Collyer) gave as to the danger of the boat; and others speak of suggestions which he may have made as to the bell, and others speak of his being on board the boat, displaying great activity. This, gentlemen, will not amount to much to prove that he was captain; and, according to my recollection, there was only one witness, and that was, I think, the witness from Philadelphia—I may be mistaken, and, if I am, bear it in mind, (addressing the counsel)—who says (turning to the jury) that Mr. Collyer on that occasion admitted himself to be captain, and it is claimed on the part of the defence, that this individual is not to be credited. But if, without particularly pointing out the testimony which is relied on upon the one side or the other, you should be of opinion that he was, for the time being, captain of the boat, having control of the same, and having command of the same, he would, if the boat was destroyed by negligence, and those lives were lost, be responsible under this act of congress.

The next question, and the great question in this case, is, was there misconduct, or negligence, or inattention to duty, on the part of those who had the management of the boat? Were the officers justly chargeable with misconduct, negligence, or inattention to their duties as such officers, by which the disaster took place, and in consequence of which the numerous lives were lost, which were destroyed on that occasion? To justify a conviction, a neglect of the duty imposed upon the defendants and which it is incumbent upon them to perform, or some misconduct in the performance of that duty, must be proved, by which, as a consequence, this disaster took place. . It must be proved that they have done that which they ought not to have done, or done improperly, and in a negligent manner, that which they ought to have done in a proper and careful manner, or that they neglected to do that which they ought to have done, by which the disaster occurred, and which disaster would not have occurred if it had not been for such misconduct or negligence of duty. And if the fire occurred by the neglect of a particular person on board the boat, in the performance of his particular duties, and not by the neglect of duty or misconduct of others, he only by whose misconduct or neglect of duties the disaster occurred is responsible for the consequences. The government claim that there was negligence of duty and misconduct upon the part of each of the defendants, by which the disaster took place, and, as a consequence, the loss of life that took place. They claim this misconduct and negligence in two particulars: First, in so conducting, and in so neglecting to conduct, before the fire, that the fire on board the Henry Clay took place as a consequence thereof. They claim, in the second place, that there was negligence and misconduct in these defendants, in their conducting after the fire took place, in running the boat on shore, and in neglecting to attend to the safety of the passengers after the boat was turned to the shore, and after she had already reached the shore, and also by the order that was given to go aft, and that by such latter misconduct and negligence the loss of life took place.

By the testimony of Mr. Belknap, a most intelligent witness,—as intelligent as any witness that I have ever seen upon the stand in a court,—it appears that the Henry Clay was one of the best boats recently built in the city of New York. By his testimony, it appears that her hull was built in the most substantial manner; that she was so constructed that there was as little danger from fire as there would be on any boat navigating the North river; that she had one of the best engines and boilers, and, as, admitted by the government counsel, she was officered by men whose character and whose skill stood fair in the community and deservedly high. She had a skillful and prudent captain, it is admitted; she had a skillful and competent engineer; an experienced and competent pilot and assistant pilot. She was well officered and manned, as it appears, by four firemen, and there is no claim but that that number was her full complement. On her trip from Albany she took fire, as has been stated, near a place thirteen or fourteen miles from the city of New York, and the question, gentlemen, is whether that fire was caused by the negligence of these individuals now on trial, or the negligence of any of them. If it was caused by the negligence of one, and him only, he alone is responsible. If it was caused by the negligence of the whole of them, they all are responsible. If it was caused in a manner that is not accounted for, unless it is proved to your satisfaction that it was caused by the misconduct or negligence of these defendants, then it would become your duty to acquit. What is the theory on the part of the government? The theory is that from Hudson, on that day, the vessel was put under an excessive rate of speed,—in other words, that she was engaged in a race with the Armenia,—and, to produce that excessive rate of speed, an excessive quantity of fuel was applied to the furnaces; and that in consequence of that excessive quantity of fuel thus applied, and the manner that it was applied, by the negligence of these defendants, as a consequence of that, this boat took fire. Now, gentlemen, when they arrived at Kingston, it is evident that there was a great alarm on board this boat in consequence of that collision. But can you trace that collision as a cause for the burning of the boat eighty-three miles below? If you can not say that anything that took place was the cause of the burning of the boat eighty-three miles below, then, although you should be of the opinion that there was misconduct or negligence, these defendants would not be responsible, unless you can say that the burning of the boat was in consequence thereof.

But the government go further, and if their theory is right, then it would undoubtedly follow that the burning was attributable to the causes assigned by them. The government claims, gentlemen, that at Hudson the racing commenced; that this intense fire was then applied; that it was kept up down to Kingston; and that, after the boat left Kingston, it was continued, in order to keep up the race; and that it was so continued up to the time it was discovered that the boat was on fire, and then it had arrived at such a heat that the fire was communicated from the furnaces in some way to the boat, by the misconduct or negligence of these men. They claim there was a race. If there was no race, then the theory of the government fails, and the question for you to determine is, was there a race at the time that the fire was discovered, or for any considerable portion of the time previous thereto? If there was a race six or eight hours before, and if you cannot connect the fire with that race six or eight hours before, then you cannot say that these defendants are guilty under this act of congress. It is not claimed, on the part of the government, that there was any combination beforehand to have this race. Indeed, it is affirmed that the understanding between the boats was, at the time they went up, that the Clay should take the lead, and that the Armenia should follow, and that no one had any idea of race. If this is the true theory, I do not see what reliance can be placed upon the testimony of one witness examined here,—I mean the fireman who left the boat. He purposes showing that it was intended to be a race in coming from Albany to New York, and he testified that Capt. Tallman, as he went up from New York to Albany, said, when the Armenia came out of the dock, that "he would beat her going up and coming down." There must be some mistake on this subject. If there was an understanding that there should be no race in going up at that time, and no race in coming down, and if the theory of the government is that the race selected is from Hudson, what that witness said as to the fear he had in going up, and as to what he said to Mr. Tallman when the boat was leaving the dock at Albany, would have little weight; because, from the theory of the government, at that time the race was not contemplated.

Was this race continued, and the fire kept up, so that it was in an improper manner communicated to the boat? We are not able to ascertain exactly how much steam was carried on this occasion down to New York. One witness said he thought he saw forty pounds marked up, one said it was seventeen or twenty pounds; and, to my mind, it was not very satisfactorily accounted for what it was. If Mr. Belknap, the builder of this boiler, is correct in his statement that the vessel could not carry more than thirty-one pounds of steam without the steam blowing off, then it follows she could not have had more than that, unless the government make out that the safety-vale was tied down, so that the steam would not blow off. What is the proof upon the subject that the Clay carried an excess of steam? The fact is well established, as I understand it, that her ordinary time of arrival was at three o'clock, or soon after. This accident happened thirteen, fourteen, or fifteen miles above there, a little after three o'clock. Then, if three o'clock was the ordinary time of her arrival in New York, at her ordinary speed, there could not have been very extraordinary speed in driving her down as far as Yonkers at the time she ordinarily arrived in New York. What is the evidence upon the subject of this negligence? for there may be negligence, even without an extraordinary rate of speed. The fire was discovered in a certain part of the boat that has been pointed out She had a short time before been inspected. In June previous, the hull inspector declared her to be complete, so far as the hull was concerned,—a complete and safe boat for the navigation of the Hudson. The inspector also declared her boilers complete and sufficient for the thirty pounds of steam which Mr. Curtis says he allowed her to take. She was then declared by these men as a competent boat. How did this fire originate? You have only the testimony of one of the firemen, but the other is all surmise. He tells you how it was. You may believe other witnesses rather than the fireman, but you have got to establish the fact that it was in consequence of the misconduct of these defendants, before you can convict them. It was discovered at a particular point. Efforts were made to put it out, but these efforts were unavailing, and the result was such as has been testified to. I will not occupy more time on the subject whether the negligence was proved or not; it is emphatically a question for your determination. If there was no negligence or misconduct, then, of course, these defendants cannot be guilty of misconduct or negligence. If there was negligence or misconduct by others, and in consequence of that the fire was communicated to the boat, these defendants would not be responsible for that negligence. For instance, to make myself understood, here is a pilot whose duty is to direct the course of the boat. He is a faithful man. He is intrusted with the boat, to direct her in her course; but for some reason or other, he willfully drives her upon a rock, and lives are lost. That would be misconduct in him, but it would not be misconduct in the captain, for the captain has done all that a prudent man could do to employ a competent pilot, with a good reputation. So it is in case of a fireman. If a captain has employed competent and faithful firemen, and if they, by their negligence, cause a fire, then, in my judgment, the other officers would not be responsible for it, because the captain has done everything a prudent man can do. He has appointed faithful and reliable men, and, if those men abuse their trust without any fault on his part, the captain, in my judgment, would not be liable under this law. He and every one is responsible for his own negligence. But in the case I put of a pilot who was employed as a faithful man, if he abuses the trust confined in him, the captain would not be liable for that abuse, but the pilot himself alone.

Was there any further negligence in running this boat ashore, and in so conducting matters after the boat had struck the shore, that the lives of these passengers were lost? The proof is abundant that this boat was run ashore in the best possible manner. All the witnesses agree upon that subject. All the nautical men,—landsmen would not understand it as well,—all the nautical men brought on the part of the government, say that the vessel was run on shore in the best possible manner. Were these defendants then guilty of negligence or misconduct after the Clay got on shore? There was an order given to go aft, and it has been explained to you by the defendants why such was a reasonable order. She struck the shore, and it seems that those who had presence of mind about them, who were aft at the time she struck the shore, escaped; and I was never more struck in my life with the necessity of presence of mind than I was when some of these witnesses were testifying, particularly Dr. Wells, who says he was aft in obedience to the order, and that he remained aft until she struck the shore, and the females whom he had under his charge had passed forward, and escaped to the bow, and he then passed on. Mr. De Peyster did the same, and probably others. But others were panic-stricken, and most people are so on an occasion when they are every moment in danger of perishing either by the water or flames.

Then, gentlemen, it appears that these defendants, when the vessel struck the shore, were in the water, endeavouring to save lives. Were these officers guilty of any misconduct or negligence in not saving more lives? Upon this subject, I will say, as I said in opening my charge, that an error of judgment merely would not make then culpable. The evidence is abundant that they exerted themselves to save those who were in the water. What men generally would have done, under such circumstances, we do not know. Whether they directed their attention to save this class or that class, we are not certain. If you think that in what they did there existed an error of judgment, then, gentlemen, you cannot convict them. If, however, they were guilty of misconduct or negligence, or inattention to their duties, such as I have described it to you to be, then, gentlemen, you will be authorized to convict.

With these remarks you will take the case under your consideration, and return such verdict as you, in your proper judgment, may think proper.

One thing I have omitted to notice: It is admitted, on the part of the prosecution, that these defendants were perfectly skillful in their several professions, and their private character was good. This circumstance, although it will not overcome evidence when it is positive, yet, in balancing the case, it will go a great way to turn the balance in favour of the accused. The case rests with you, gentlemen.

The learned judge concluded his charge at ten minutes past three o'clock, after which the jury retired to consult. At twenty-eight minutes to four the jury returned, when their names were called over by the clerk of the court:

The Clerk. Have you agreed upon your verdict, gentlemen?

The Foreman. Yes.

The Clerk. How do you find?

The Foreman. Not guilty.

Case No. 14,839.

UNITED STATES v. COLT.

[Pet. C. C. 145.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April Term, 1818.

ACTION OF DEBT—AMOUNT CLAIMED—STATUTE—AMOUNT RECOVERED—EMBARGO BOND.

1. Debt on an embargo bond. The declaration demanded 20,000 dollars, and recited the statute which authorises the United States, to demand a sum, not exceeding 20,000 dollars, and not less than 1,000 dollars; which it averred that the defendant owed and detained. The jury found a verdict for 4,000 dollars. Upon a motion to arrest the judgment, this declaration was held to be good.

2. A declaration in debt, claiming no precise sum to be due, is without precedent; but the demand of one sum in the declaration, does not prevent the recovery of a smaller sum, diminished by extrinsic circumstances.

[Cited in Washington v. Eaton, Case No. 17,228; Dillingham v. Skein, Id. 3,912a; Re Rosey, Id. 12,066; Stockwell v. U. S., 13 Wall. (80 U. S.) 543.]

[Cited in brief in Lea v. Hopkins, 7 Pa. St. 494. Cited in Western Union Tel. Co. v. Scircle, 103 Ind. 229, 2 N. E. 605.]

This was an action of debt, brought upon an embargo bond, in the district court, to June, 1811; and the declaration demanded twenty thousand dollars, which the defendant was alleged to owe and detain. It then recited the embargo law, laying the breach, by the defendant; "whereby the United States are entitled to demand a sum, not exceeding twenty thousand dollars, and not less than one thousand dollars, viz. twenty thousand dollars;" which it averred to be due to the plaintiffs and detained from them by the defendant. Upon nil debet pleaded, the jury found a verdict for four thousand dollars. [Case unreported.] The defendant took out a writ of error, returnable at April sessions 1812, of the circuit court; and the case now came on for decision.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. The question in this case is, whether the action is maintainable. The objection to the action of debt, where the penalty is uncertain is, that this action can only be brought to recover a specific sum of money, the amount of which is ascertained. It is said, that the very sum demanded, must be proved; and on a demand for thirty pounds, you can no more recover twenty pounds, than you can a horse, on a demand for a cow. Blackstone says (3 Bl. Comm. 154) that debt, in its legal acceptation, is a sum of money due, by certain and express agreement; where the quantity is fixed and does not depend on any subsequent valuation to settle it; and for nonpayment, the proper remedy is the action of debt, to recover the specific sum due. So if I verbally agree to pay a certain price for certain goods, and fail in the performance, this action lies; for this is a determinate contract. But if I agree for no settled price, debt will not lie, but only a special action on the case; and this action is now generally brought, except in cases of contracts under seal, in preference to the action of debt; because, in this latter action, the plaintiff must prove the whole debt he claims, or recover nothing at all. For the debt is one single cause of action, fixed and determined; and which, if the proof varies from the claim, cannot be looked upon, as the same contract of which performance is demanded. If I sue for thirty pounds, I am not at liberty to prove a debt of twenty pounds, and recover a verdict thereon; for I fail in the proof of that contract, which my action has alleged to be specific and determinate. But indebitatus assumpsit is not brought to compel a specific performance of the contract; but is to recover damages for its non-performance; and the damages being indeterminate, will adapt themselves to the truth of the case, as it may be proved; for if any debt be proved, it is sufficient.

The doctrine laid down by this writer, appears to be much too general and unqualified; although to a certain extent, it is unquestionably correct. Debt is certainly a sum of money due by contract, and it most frequently is due by a certain and express agreement, which also fixes the sum, independent of any extrinsic circumstances. But, it is not essential, that the contract should be express, or that it should fix the precise amount of the sum to be paid. Debt may arise on an implied contract, as for the balance of an account stated; to recover back money which a bailiff has paid more than he had received; and in a variety of other cases, where the law, by implication, raises a contract to pay. 3 Com. Dig. 365. The sum may not be fixed by the contract, but may depend upon something extrinsic, which may be averred; as a promise to pay so much money as plaintiff shall expend in repairing a ship, may be sued in this form of action; the plaintiff averring that he did expend a certain sum. 2 Bac. 20. So, on promise by defendant, to pay his proportion of the expenses of defending a suit, in which defendant was interested, with an averment that plaintiff had expended so much, and that defendant's proportion amounted to so much. 3 Lev. 429. So an action of debt may be brought for goods sold to defendant, for so much as they were worth. 2 Com. Dig. 365. So debt will lie for use and occupation, where there is only an implied contract, and no precise sum agreed upon. 6 Term R. 63.

3 Wood. 95, states, that debt will lie for an indeterminate demand, which may readily be reduced to a certainty. In Emery v. Fell, 2 Term R. 28., in which there was a declaration in debt, containing a number of counts for goods sold and delivered, work and labour, money laid out and expended, and money had and received; the court, on a special demurrer, sustained the action, although it was objected that it did not appear that the demand was certain, and because no contract of sale was stated in the declaration. But the court took no notice of the first objection, and avoided the second, by implying a contract of sale, from the words which stated a sale. These cases prove, that debt may be maintained upon an implied, as well as upon an express contract; although no precise sum is agreed upon. But the doctrine stated by Lord Mansfield, in the case of Walker v.

Witter, 1 Doug. 6, is conclusive upon this point. He lays it down, that debt may be brought for a sum capable of being ascertained, though not ascertained at the time the action was brought. Ashurst and Buller say, that whenever indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable, debt is also. In this case two points were also made by the defendant's counsel; first, that on the plea of nil debet, the plaintiff could not have judgment, because debt could not be maintained on a foreign judgment; and secondly, that on the plea of nul tiel record, judgment could not be entered for the plaintiff, because the judgment in Jamaica was not on record. The court were in favour of the defendant, on the second point, and against him in the first; by deciding, that debt could be maintained on a foreign judgment, because, indebitatus assumpsit might; and that the uncertainty of the debt demanded in the declaration, was no objection to the bringing of an action of debt. The decision therefore given upon that point, was upon the very point, on which the cause turned. But, independent of the opinion given in this case, is it not true, to use the words of Buller, "that all the old cases show, that whenever indebitatus assumpsit is maintainable, debt also lies." The subject is very satisfactorily explained by Lord Loughborough, in the case of Rudder v. Price, (1 H. Bl. 550,) which was an action of debt, brought on a promissory note payable by instalments, before the last day of payment was past; in which the court, yielding to the weight of authority, rather than to the reason which governed it, decided; that the action could not be supported, because the contract being entire, would admit of but one action, which could not be brought until the last payment had become due, although indebitatus assumpsit might have been brought. But his lordship was led to inquire into the ancient forms of action on contracts; and he states, that in ancient times, debt was the common action for goods sold, and for work and labour done. Where assumpsit was brought, it was not a general indebitatus assumpsit; for it was not brought merely on a promise, but a special damage for a nonfeasance, by which a special action arose to the plaintiff. The action of assumpsit, to recover general damages for the non-performance of a contract, was first introduced by Slade's Case, which course was afterwards followed. In the case of Walker v. Witter, Buller also stated, that till Slade's Case, Trin. Term, 44 Eliz., 4 Coke, 92b. a notion prevailed, that on a simple contract for a certain sum, the action must be debt; but it was held in that case, that the plaintiff might bring assumpsit, or debt at his election.

Thus it appears, that in all cases of contracts, unless a special damage was stated, the primitive action was debt; and that the action of indebitatus assumpsit succeeded, principally, I presume, to avoid the wager of law; which in Slade's Case, was one of the main arguments, urged by the defendant's counsel, against allowing the introduction of the action of assumpsit; as it thereby deprived the defendant of his privilege of waging his law. Buller seems therefore to have been well warranted in the case of Walker v. Witter, in saying; that all the old cases show, that where indebitatus assumpsit will lie, debt will lie. The same doctrine is supported by the case of Emery v. Fell, 2 Term R. 30, which was an action of debt, in which all the counts of indebitatus assumpsit are stated; where the objection to the doctrine was made and overruled. So in the case of Herries v. Jamieson, 5 Term R. 557, Ashurst refers with approbation, to the opinion delivered in the case of Walker v. Witter. That debt may be brought for foreign money, the value of which the jury are to find, had been decided before the case of Walker v. Witter; as appears by the case of Rands v. Peck, Cro. Jac. 618; and in Draper v. Rastal, Id. 88, the same action was brought, though in different ways, for current money, being the value of the foreign.

Com. Dig. tit. "Debt," p. 366., where he enumerates the cases in which debt will not lie, states no exception to the rule that where indebitatus assumpsit will lie, debt will lie, but one for the interest of money due upon a loan. But the reason of that, is explained by Lord Loughborough in the case of Rudder v. Price; who states, that until the case of Cooke v. Whorwood, 2 Saund. 337, upon a covenant to pay a stipulated sum by instalments, if the plaintiff brought assumpsit, after the first failure, he was entitled to recover the whole sum in damages; because he could not in that form of action, any more than in the action of debt, support two actions on an entire contract. Until that decision, the only difference between debt and assumpsit in such a case, was, that the former could not be brought, until after the last instalment was due; and, in the latter, though it might be brought after the first failure, yet the plaintiff might recover the whole, because he could not maintain a second action on the same contract.

I proceed with the doctrine of Judge Blackstone before stated. After stating what constitutes debt, he observes, "that the remedy is an action of debt, to recover the special sum due." It is observable, that he does not say, that the plaintiff is to recover the sum demanded, by his declaration; and no person will deny, but that he is to recover the special sum due. After stating what constitutes a debt, and prescribing the remedy, Judge Blackstone proceeds to the evidence and recovery; and says, "the plaintiff must prove the whole debt he claims, or he can recover nothing." On this account he adds "the action of assumpsit is most commonly brought; because in that, it is sufficient if the plaintiff prove any debt to be due, to enable him to recover the sum, so proved, in damages." If this writer merely means to say, that where a special contract is laid in the declaration, it must be proved as laid; the doctrine will not be controverted. If debt be brought on a written agreement, the contract produced in evidence, must correspond, in all respects, with that stated in the declaration; and any variance will be fatal to the plaintiff's recovery. Such too is the law in all special actions in the case; but if Judge Blackstone meant to say, that in every case, where debt is brought on a simple contract, the plaintiff must prove the whole debt as claimed by the declaration, or that he can recover nothing; he is opposed by every decision, ancient and modern. The old cases before mentioned, in which debt was brought and sustained, are all cases, where it is impossible to suppose that the sum stated in the declaration, was or could in every instance be proved; any more, than it is, or can be proved, in actions of indebitatus assumpsit. They are in fact, actions substantially like to actions of indebitatus assumpsit in the form of action for debt. The action of debt for foreign money, is and can be for no determinate sum; because the value must be found by the jury, either upon the trial of the issue, or upon a writ of inquiry, where there is judgment by default. Rand. Peake. The case of Sanders v. Mark [3 Lev. 429], is debt for an uncertain sum, in which the debt claimed, was for fifteen pounds eighteen shillings and six pence, and the defendant's proportion of the whole sum, was averred to be fifteen pounds eighteen shillings and eight pence; yet the action was supported. This is plainly a case, where the sum due could not be certainly averred; because the yearly value of the defendant's property might not be known to the plaintiff, and could only be ascertained, with certainty, by the jury. In the case of Walker v. Witter, Lord Mansfield is express upon this point. He says, that debt may be brought for a sum capable of being ascertained, though not ascertained at the time of bringing the action; and he adds, that it is not necessary that the plaintiff should recover the exact sum demanded. In the case of Rudder v. Price, Lord Loughborough, who has shed more light upon this subject than any other judge, says "that long before Slade's Case, the demand in an action of debt must have been for a thing certain in its nature; yet, it was by no means necessary, that the amount should be set out so precisely, that less could not be recovered." In short, if before Slade's Case, debt was the common action for goods sold, and work done; it is more obvious, that it was not thought necessary to state the amount due, with such precision, as that less could not be recovered; for in those cases, as the same judge observes, "the sum due was to be ascertained by a jury, and was given in the form of damages." But yet the demand was for a thing certain in its nature; that is, it was capable of being ascertained, though not ascertained, or perhaps capable of being so, when the action was brought. Whence the opinion arose, that in an action of debt on a simple contract, the whole sum must be proved, I cannot ascertain. It certainly was not, and could not be the doctrine prior to Slade's Case; and it is clear, that it was not countenanced by that case. However, let the opinion have originated how it might, Lord Loughborough in the above case, denominates it an erroneous opinion, and says, that it has been some time since corrected.

In the case of M'Quillin v. Cox [1 H. Bl. 249], the sum demanded was five thousand pounds; which was fifty more than appeared to be due by the different sums. The objection was made on a special demurrer, that the declaration demanded more than appeared by the plaintiff's own showing to be due. The court did not notice the alleged variance between the writ and declaration, or the misrecital of the writ; but overruled the demurrer, because the plaintiff might, in an action of debt on a simple contract, prove and recover a less sum than he demanded in the writ. From this last expression it might be supposed, that the court meant to distinguish between the sum demanded by the writ, and that demanded by the declaration; but this could not have been the case, because the sum demanded by the writ, and that demanded by the declaration was the same; viz. five thousand pounds. There was, in fact, no variance; for, though the declaration recites the writ, yet the sum demanded, and which the declaration declared to be the sum which the defendant owed and detained, was the same sum as that mentioned in the writ; and the objection stated in the special demurrer, was made to the variance, between the sum demanded by the declaration, and the sum alleged to be due.

The distinction taken in the case of Ingledew v. Cripps, 2 Ld. Raym. 815, Salk. 659, runs through all the above cases, and appears to be perfectly rational, viz. that where debt is brought on a covenant, to pay a sum certain, any variance of the sum in the deed will vitiate. But, where the deed relates to matter of fact extrinsic, there, though the plaintiff demanded more than is due, he may enter a remittitur for the balance. This shows, that debt may be brought for more than is due, and that the jury may give less; or if they give more than is due, the error may be corrected by a remitter.

Thus stands the doctrine in relation to the action of debt on contracts; and if debt will lie on a contract, where the sum demanded is uncertain, it would seem to follow, that it would lie for a penalty given by statute, which is uncertain, and dependent upon the amount to be assessed by a jury. For, when they have assessed it, the sum so fixed becomes the amount of the penalty given. This however stands upon stronger ground than mere analogy. The point is expressly decided in the case of Pemberton v. Shelton, Cro. Jac. 498. That was an action of debt brought upon the first section of the statute 2 Edw. VI. c. 13, which gives the treble value of the tithes due, for not setting them out. The declaration claimed thirty-three pounds, as the treble value; and in setting forth the value of the tithes, the whole amount appeared to be more than one third of the sum demanded; so that the plaintiff claimed less than the penalty given by the statute. Upon nil debet pleaded, the jury found for the plaintiff twenty pounds, and a motion was made in arrest of judgment, for the reason above mentioned. The court overruled the motion, upon the ground afterwards laid down in the case of Ingledew v. Cripps. They held, that there was a difference when the action of debt is grounded on a specialty, or contract, which is a sum uncertain; or upon a statute, which gives a certain sum for the penalty; and where it is grounded on a demand, when the sum is uncertain, being such as shall be given by the jury. In the former, it was agreed, that the plaintiff cannot demand less than the sum agreed to be paid or given by the statute; but in the latter, it is said, that if the declaration varies from the real sum, it is not material; for he shall not recover according to his demand in the declaration, but according to the verdict and judgment, which may be given for the plaintiff. It cannot be said, that this doctrine was laid down in consequence of the court considering this as a statutory action, to which it was necessary to accommodate the recovery, by changing general principles of law applicable to other cases; for it will appear, by a reference to the statute, that it prescribes no remedy for enforcing the penalty; and that debt was brought upon the common law principle, that where a statute gives a penalty, debt may be brought to recover it. In this case the statute gives the action of debt, and I cannot perceive in what other form, than this one which has been adopted, the declaration could have been drawn. Had it claimed the smallest sum, it might have been less than the jury might have thought the United States entitled to recover; and yet, judgment could not have been given for more. I know of no precedent for a declaration in debt, claiming no precise sum to be due and detained, nor any principle of law, which would sanction such a form. On the other hand, I find abundant authority for saying, that the demand of one sum, does not prevent the recovery of a smaller sum, where it is diminished by extrinsic circumstances. Rule discharged.

Case No. 14,840.

UNITED STATES v. COLUMBIAN INS. CO.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 266.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1821.

CORPORATIONS—ELECTION OF OFFICERS—SUPERSEDEAS—MANDAMUS.

1. The Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria cannot, by a trustee, vote in an election of directors of the company, upon stock of the same company, purchased by the company, and held for their use in the name of the trustee.

2. A writ of error to the judgment of the circuit court of the District of Columbia, awarding a peremptory mandamus, is a supersedeas, and if the peremptory mandamus be issued after the filing of the writ of error, and within ten days after the rendition of the judgment, it will be quashed

On the 12th of December, 1821, John Wheelwright and five others, filed their petition, supported by the affidavit of Wheelwright, praying for a rule on the judges of the election of directors of the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding the said judges of election to return the petitioners as duly elected directors of the said company, and also for a rule upon the said company to admit the petitioners as directors. The petitioners state that they are, and have been for twelve months and upwards stockholders of that company. That on the 31st of July, 1821, the then board of directors passed an order that 1233 shares of the stock of that company, the property of one Edward Lloyd, should be purchased; and that the sum of $8,500 should be borrowed, upon stock owned by the said company in the Bank of the United States, to assist in the payment for the same; all which was done and the shares were transferred by Lloyd to Joseph Mandeville in trust for the Columbian Insurance Company. That the annual election of directors took place on the 5th of November, 1821. That there were two lists of directors voted for, one of which included the petitioners, and that the directors named on that list were duly elected, if the said Joseph Mandeville had no right to vote upon the 1233 shares there standing in his name, as the trustee of the company. That his right so to vote was denied by the petitioners at the election, and a written notice of the objection was delivered to the judges of the election in due time, and before the election was closed; but they received the vote which gave the preponderance to the opposing ticket. A rule was granted, according to the prayer of the petitioners, to show cause, &c., on Saturday, the 15th of December, 1821; which rule, upon hearing, was made absolute, and writs of mandamus nisi, were issued returnable on the 22d of

December. The Columbian Insurance Company returned the writ on that day, and for return said, "That the said John Wheelwright ought not to be admitted as a director of the said company, because they say that at the election of directors in the said writ mentioned, the said John Wheelwright was not duly elected a director of the said company, and that at the said election, the said Joseph Mandeville, whom they are required to remove, was duly elected a director of the said company." This return being traversed by the United States, and issue thereupon joined, the jury found a special verdict, in which they set forth the act of congress of February 16, 1818 (6 Stat. 198), incorporating the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, and the original articles of association, under which the company transacted its business before its incorporation. They also found that at a meeting of the board of directors of the said company on the 31st of July, 1821, they made an order that 1233 shares of the stock of the company, the property of one Edward Lloyd, should be purchased for the use of the company, at 80 per cent.; and that the president of the company should be authorized to obtain a discount at the office of discount and deposit at Washington, for the use of the company, of $8,500, upon the pledge of eighty-five shares of the stock of the Bank of the United States, the property of the company. That the said shares were purchased according to the order of the board, and were on the 1st of August, 1821, transferred by the said Lloyd to Joseph Mandeville, "as trustee of the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria." That an election of directors was holden on the 1st Monday in November, 1821, by the commissioners duly appointed by the board of directors on the 1st day of November in the same year. That Mandeville voted upon the 1233 shares of stock so held by him in trust, with the knowledge and consent of the commissioners of election who were apprised of the circumstances, and were of opinion that he had a right so to vote, and received his vote accordingly. That Wheelwright was not present when the vote was given in, but afterwards came in, while the election was going on, and before the votes were taken out of the ballot-box to be counted, and delivered to the commissioners the following written notice: "I object to the vote of Joseph Mandeville, as trustee for the Columbian Insurance Company on 1233 shares of stock bought by the company of Joseph Mandeville, as trustee for the Columbian Insurance Company. John Wheelwright." That the said shares were contracted to be sold by the said Lloyd to the said Mandeville, on the 8th of June, 1821, with a view that the company should afterwards become the purchaser thereof. That the said Mandeville gave his note, indorsed by Newton Keene and James Sanderson, to the said Lloyd, for $9,864, payable in 60 days from the 8th of June, for the said stock. That the said shares had been duly and regularly subscribed and paid by one or more original subscribers to the said company, and had been duly and regularly assigned to the said Lloyd, before the purchase and transfer from him to the said Mandeville, and as such, were entitled in the hands of the said Lloyd, at the time of such purchase and transfer, to all the advantages, profits, and privileges of shares regularly forming component parts of the capital stock of the said company. That on the 5th of November, 1821, before the election was opened, at a meeting of the board of directors, duly convened, it was by the board resolved that the said Joseph Mandeville as such trustee, should be instructed, and he was by such resolution instructed, to vote upon the said stock as such trustee, at the said election, for certain persons in the said resolution named as such directors; and that he voted accordingly. That the said John Wheelwright, although then a director, was not present when the ballot was taken to instruct the said Mandeville to vote as aforesaid.

The jury conclude by finding that if the said Mandeville had not a right in law to vote upon the 1233 shares, then the said John Wheelwright, and the others on the same ticket were duly elected directors of the said company; but if he had a right to vote on those shares, the said Joseph Mandeville, and the others on the same ticket, were duly elected. This special verdict was rendered on the 1st of January, 1822, and on the 3d, the court rendered judgment upon the verdict in favor of the petitioners, that a peremptory mandamus should be issued.

Upon this judgment the petitioners, respectively, sued out their several writs of peremptory mandamus, on the 10th of January, 1822, before the expiration of the ten days allowed by the 23d section of the judiciary act of 1789 (1 Stat. 73) for filing a writ of error, which writs of mandamus were in the following form:—

"(L. S.) District of Columbia, to wit. The United States of America. To the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, greeting: Whereas at a late election of directors of the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, on the 5th day of November last, pursuant to the act of congress, in such case provided, John Wheelwright was duly elected by the stockholders, or proprietors of the said corporation, and by a plurality of votes actually given, a director of the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria; you, nevertheless, the said Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, lightly regarding the premises, have wrongfully, injuriously, and unlawfully, and without reasonable cause, refused to admit the said John Wheelwright, as a director of the said Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, to the no small damage and grievance of the said John Wheelwright, as by his complaint we have understood. We, therefore, being willing that due and speedy justice be done in this behalf, as is reasonable, command you that immediately after the receipt of this, you admit the said John Wheelwright as duly elected a director of the said Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, at the time and place of election aforesaid; and that you remove Joseph Mandeville, who is alleged to have been unduly and wrongfully admitted as aforesaid; with all liberties, privileges, and pre-eminences to that office belonging or appertaining; and that you make return of this writ to our United States circuit court of the District of Columbia, for the county of Alexandria, immediately on the receipt thereof. Witness the Honorable William Cranch, Chief Judge of our said Court, this 10th of January, 1822. Edmund J. Lee, C. C."

These writs were, on the 11th of January, served on the company, who refused to obey them; and on the 15th of January, the petitioners obtained a rule upon the persons returned as directors of the company, to show cause why an attachment should not issue against them for not obeying the peremptory mandamus. This company, at the same time obtained a rule upon the petitioners, to show cause why the writs of peremptory mandamus which had been issued, should not be quashed. Before the expiration of the ten days after the judgment of the court upon the special verdict, the company took out, and served upon the adverse party, a writ of error, with the requisite security to operate as a supersedeas, if a writ of error will lie in the case; notwithstanding which.

Mr. Fendall, for the relators, now moved the court, the ten days not having yet expired, to order the clerk to issue a writ of peremptory mandamus, upon the judgment which the court had rendered upon the verdict. He contended that no writ of error would lie in a case of mandamus, and if it would, it would not be a supersedeas, and therefore the relators need not wait the expiration of the ten days, before they took out their peremptory writs of mandamus. And he cited 4 Bac. Abr. 522, 543; St. 9 Anne, c. 20, § 2; Case of Dean and Chapter of Trinity Chapel, Dublin, 8 Mod. 27, 1 P. Wms. 348; 2 Brown, Parl. Cas. 554; 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 178; and the Virginia act of assembly of Jan. 22, 1799. p. 392, c. 253, which gives a right to traverse the return of a mandamus in all cases, and the right to recover damages and costs in the same manner as in an action upon the case, and if judgment shall be given for the complainant either on verdict, or demurrer, or nil dicit, or for want of replication or other pleading, he shall recover his damages and costs, and shall have execution therefor, and a peremptory writ of mandamus shall be granted without delay, as if such return had been adjudged insufficient. This act seems to be but a new edition of the English statute of 9 Anne, c. 20, § 2, as it had been construed and practised upon in the English courts. It says nothing of a writ of error.

Mr. Swann, on the same side, contended, that if a writ of error will lie in a case where there was a traverse, yet it would be only to the judgment on the verdict, and would be no supersedeas to the peremptory writ of mandamus. Case of Dean and Chapter of Dublin v. Dowgatt, 1 P. Wms. 348. The act of Virginia says that the peremptory mandamus shall issue without delay.

Mr. Taylor and Mr. Jones, contra.

The cases cited are only applicable to cases of mandamus, at common law, where the return was conclusive, and could not be traversed; and where the only remedy for a false return was by a special action upon the case. But, in the Dublin Case it is expressly stated by the court that if the return had been traversed, a writ of error would lie. In the present case, a writ of error has been actually issued. The act of congress gives a writ of error upon every final judgment, where the matter in dispute is of a certain value. An award of a peremptory writ of mandamus is a final judgment; nothing remains to be done but to execute the judgment. A peremptory mandamus cannot be issued after a writ of error filed. There cannot be a writ of error to part of a judgment. It issues for the whole or for nothing.

THE COURT said that the judgment of the court was for a peremptory mandamus. We have no jurisdiction to decide whether the defendants have a right to a writ of error. That question can be decided by the supreme court only. A writ of error has been issued; if we give any opinion upon the defendant's right to issue it, it will be extrajudicial. No opinion was given.

The petitioners then, respectively, sued out their several peremptory writs of mandamus, on the 10th of January, 1822, the ten days not having yet expired; and on the 11th, served them on the company, who refused to obey the writs; and on the 15th, the petitioners obtained a rule upon the persons returned as elected directors of the company, to show cause immediately why an attachment should not issue against them for disobeying the writ; and the company, at the same time, obtained a rule upon the petitioners to show cause immediately why the writs of peremptory mandamus should not be quashed.

Mr. Jones, for the defendants, in showing cause, contended, that the writ of error is a supersedeas to the judgment of this court. The right to the writ of error is as perfect as the right to have the judgment of the court below. There is a difference between England and this country as to prerogative. In England the writ of mandamus is a prerogative writ. He admits, that in England, no writ of error will lie to a peremptory writ of mandamus, at common law. But, in this country, it is a judicial writ, given expressly by the statute of Virginia. It is a civil, not a criminal process. The Dublin Case, 8 Mod.

27; 2 Brown, Parl. Cas. 554; 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 178; 1 Strange, 536. The judicial authority in this country is not derived from the executive authority, as in England, but is carefully separated from it. By the 8th section of the act of congress of Feb. 27, 1801 (2 Stat. 103), "any final judgment, order, or decree," in this court, "where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, shall exceed the value of one hundred dollars, may be re-examined, and reversed or affirmed in the supreme court of the United States, by writ of error or appeal." An order for a peremptory mandamus is as much a final order as an order for execution upon a scire facias to revive a judgment. So, upon habeas corpus, an order, remanding the prisoner, is a final order, upon which the supreme court may exercise its appellate jurisdiction, as in the cases Ex parte Burford, 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 447, and Ex parte Bollman, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 75; and in the case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch [5 U. S. 137] the supreme court said they had only appellate jurisdiction in cases of mandamus. In England, in a case circumstanced as this is, a writ of error will lie. It is not merely a judgment between the king and a subject. A case under the statute of Anne is a civil cause for the trial of private rights. At common law, the return was conclusive; and the only remedy for a false return was a special action upon the case. In that action damages and costs were recovered; and upon that judgment for damages and costs, a writ of error would lie both to the judgment for damages, and to the award of a peremptory mandamus.

In answer to the objection that the tenure of office, being only for a year, would expire before a judgment could be had upon the writ of error, it was observed that the supreme court would sit the next month, and would, no doubt, take up the cause out of its turn, upon being informed of the circumstances. The statute of Anne and the statute of Virginia have changed the whole ground of the action by mandamus. It is now a civil action to try a private right. It would be absurd to say that the judgment for damages and costs should be reversed, and yet the order for a peremptory mandamus should be executed. A writ of error in an action upon the case for a false return, is a supersedeas to a peremptory mandamus. Ruding v. Newel, 2 Strange, 983. In the Dublin Case there was no traverse. The peremptory mandamus was issued upon the return being adjudged insufficient by the court; and in that case it is admitted, that where an issue has been tried, a writ of error will lie.

Mr. Swann, contra.

The object is to evade the decision of this court until the year shall expire. A writ of error is a statutory right. If not given, in this case, by statute, it does not lie. In cases respecting mills, roads, probate of wills, &c., the appeal is given by statute only. The Virginia statute respecting mandamus does not give an appeal or writ of error. The preamble of that statute (Jan. 22, 1799, p. 392,) complains of the delay which attended the old proceedings on writs of mandamus; and if a writ of error will lie, the object of the statute will be defeated. To prevent this delay, the statute expressly directs, that if a verdict shall be found for the person suing out the writ, "a peremptory writ of mandamus shall be granted without delay," "as it might have been if the return had been adjudged insufficient." The case of Ruding v. Newel is reported very shortly by Strange, who only says it was held to be a supersedeas, but does not say by whom. But, in the Dublin Case, as reported in 1 P. Wms. 351, Parker, C. J., said "that a mandamus, since the late statute (9 Anne, c. 20), was in the nature of an action, special replications and pleadings therein being admitted, and costs given to either side that prevailed; and that a case had happened in the king's bench, where judgment was given upon special pleadings, upon the late statute, for the mandamus, and the defendant brought error, and it was admitted error lay; yet this was held to be no supersedeas to the peremptory mandamus; for that such a construction would quite defeat the end of the statute, and prevent the officer, who was chosen annually, from having any fruit of the mandamus." "And King, C. J., took notice that the words of the statute were that in case judgment were given for the mandamus, a peremptory mandamus should be granted without delay." In the present case, no damages are given. The only judgment of this court is for costs, and that a peremptory mandamus should issue.

Mr. Jones, in reply.

It is contended that the judgment is divided, and that a writ of error to one part is not a supersedeas to the other. But if that could be the case, the writ of error itself and the judgment of the supreme court thereon, in case of reversal, would be wholly defeated. This court would take from that court the power of doing justice. The statute of Virginia only means that such a writ shall issue after verdict in favor of the mandamus, as the court would have issued if it had adjudged the return insufficient, without the intervention of a jury. The Dublin Case was not a case under the statute of Anne. It was a mandamus at common law; and the court in Ireland had adjudged the return insufficient, in law, and had issued a peremptory mandamus. What is said by Parker, C. J., is only obiter dictum.

The act of congress of Feb. 27, 1801 (2 Stat. 103), gives the supreme court of the United States appellate jurisdiction of every final order of this court, where the matter in controversy is of a certain value; and if that value does not appear upon the record, that court will ascertain it by affidavits. That jurisdiction is given by an authority paramount to the state laws, and in the cases of Wilson v. Mason, 1 Cranch [5 U. S.] 91, and Young v.

Bank of Alexandria, 4 Cranch [8 U. S.] 395, the supreme court of the United States decided, that, even if the state law declared that no appeal or writ of error should lie from the judgment of the inferior tribunal, it would not deprive the supreme court of the jurisdiction given to it by the constitution and laws of the United States. A writ of error removes the whole record, and is a supersedeas if taken in proper time, which, in England, is four days; and, by the act of congress, ten days.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, contra), was of opinion that the writ of error is a supersedeas to the writ of peremptory mandamus, and refused to award an attachment, and quash the peremptory writs of mandamus which had been issued before the expiration of the ten days.

See 7 Wheat. [20 U. S.] 534. The supreme court determined that a writ of error would lie to reverse the judgment of this court awarding a peremptory mandamus, and directed Mr. Jones to produce affidavits as to the value of the matter in controversy. But it not appearing that it amounted to $1000, the sum required to give appellate jurisdiction to the supreme court from the final judgments or decrees of this court, the supreme court decided that a writ of error could not regularly issue in this case, and ordered the writ of error to be quashed.

At May term, 1822, of the circuit court, a mandate from the supreme court was produced, showing that the writ of error was dismissed: whereupon the circuit court granted a peremptory mandamus to admit the petitioners, Wheelwright and others, to their seats as directors, &c.

Case No. 14,841.

UNITED STATES v. COLUMBUS.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 304.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.

KEEPING DISORDERLY HOUSE—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An indictment, charging that the defendant kept "a certain unlawful, disorderly, and ill-governed house," "as a common tavern," "without license," "and kept a common tippling house," and therein openly sold spirituous liquors to all persons calling for the same, and allowed the same to be drunk in and about the house at all times both at day and night and on Sundays and permitted certain idle and ill-disposed persons to assemble and continue drinking and tippling, to the common nuisance, &c., is a good indictment, at common law, for keeping a disorderly house.

[Cited in Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Whalen, 149 U. S. 157, 13 Sup. Ct. 824.]

2. And evidence, that the defendant kept an open house for selling spirituous liquors, and that such liquors were sold to other persons than boarders and lodgers, and that the house was kept open, and such liquors there sold, on Sundays and at late hours of the night, that persons intoxicated were seen in and coming out of the house drunk and disorderly, is sufficient to support the indictment.

3. The court will not permit counsel to argue to the jury against an instruction given in the cause.

[Cited in Stettinius v. U. S., Case No. 13,387.]

The indictment [against Charles Columbus] was in these words: "District of Columbia, Washington county, to wit: The jurors of the United States for the county aforesaid upon their oath present, that Charles Columbus, late of the county aforesaid, yeoman, on the fifteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and thirty-six, at Washington county aforesaid, and on other days and times between that day and the day of taking this inquisition, with force and arms, kept a certain unlawful, disorderly, and ill-governed house in the city of Washington in the said county, as a common tavern, without any lawful authority or license therefor, did take upon himself to keep and maintain: and the said house did then and there, at the days and times aforesaid, keep as a common tippling-house; and did therein openly sell spirituous liquors to all persons calling for the same, and allow the same to be drunk by such persons, in and about his said house at all times, both at day and at night, and on all days, both Sundays and other days; and did permit certain idle and ill-disposed persons, to the jurors aforesaid unknown, to assemble together in his said house, and then and there continue drinking and tippling, to the common nuisance of the good people of the United States, to the evil example of all others, the corruption of the public morals, and against the peace and government of the United States. F. S. Key, United States Attorney, D. C."

To this indictment the defendant demurred, first, because it does not aver that the defendant kept a common disorderly house; and, second, because it charges the keeping a tavern without license, but does not aver that he kept a common tavern. All the precedents, the defendant's counsel said, use the word "common;" a single instance of disorder is not sufficient. Reg. v. Pierson, 2 Ld. Raym. 1197; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 678; 1 Russ. Cr. 300.

Mr. Key, U. S. Atty., contra, contended that it was sufficiently averred to be a common disorderly house. The indictment charges that the defendant undertook to keep a disorderly house as a common tavern without authority therefor, and did keep the same as a common tippling-house, and therein sold spirituous liquors to all persons calling for the same, to be drunk in and about the house at all times, day and night, Sundays and other days; and permitted idle and ill-disposed persons there to assemble and continue drinking and tippling to the common nuisance, &c. The offence charged is the keeping of a common disorderly tippling-house.

THE COURT (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting) overruled the demurrer; being of opinion that it sufficiently appears in the indictment, that the offence charged is the keeping of a common disorderly house.

Upon the trial, Mr. Key prayed the court to instruct the jury, that if they believe, from the evidence, that the defendant kept an open house in the city of Washington for selling spirituous liquors, and that such liquors were sold and drunk in the said house to other persons than boarders and lodgers; and that the said house was kept open on Sundays, and such liquors there sold and drunk by such persons on Sundays, and also at late hours of the nights both of Sundays and other days; and that persons intoxicated were seen in said house and coming out of said house at late hours of the night, drunk and disorderly, such evidence is sufficient to support the indictment.

Which instruction THE COURT gave, having yesterday, in the absence of CRANCH, Chief Judge, given a similar instruction in the case of U. S. v. Bede, published in the National Intelligencer of the 23d of June, 1837.[1]

W. L. Brent, for defendant, being about to argue to the jury against the instruction just given, was stopped by the Chief Judge, and informed that the court could not permit him to argue the point of law to the jury against the instruction which the court had given to them.

Mr. Brent contended, that as he had not asked the opinion of the court upon that point, he was not precluded from arguing it to the jury. That in criminal cases the jury are judges of the law as well as of the fact, and, therefore, the law ought to be argued to them.

CRANCH, Chief Judge, observed, that this court had always refused to permit counsel to argue the question of law after it had been decided by the court, in the cause. That the jury has a right to find a general verdict, which includes the question of law as well as of fact; but the jury has no right to decide the question of law, disconnected from the fact. That this point had been decided early in the existence of this court, upon full argument; and that such had been the uniform decision and practice of the court from its commencement, more than thirty years ago.

Mr. Brent then prayed the court to instruct the jury, that notwithstanding they might be of opinion, from the evidence, that the tavern of the defendant was kept open on Sunday, the selling of liquor (in a legal point of view) upon Sunday, is no more an offence for which the defendant could be indicted than the selling upon any other day, according to the laws and constitution of Maryland as in force in this part of the District of Columbia.

Which instruction THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) refused to give.

Verdict, guilty

[1] In the case of the U. S. v. Bede [Case No. 14,558] the indictment was in the same form as that of U. S. v. Columbus. The following is the instruction moved by Mr. Key, and given by the court in the absence of Cranch, C. J.: "That if the jury believe from the evidence that the traverser kept a public and open shop in this city in which he sold liquors to persons not lodgers or boarders in his house, at times to persons who were drunk, at times to persons who came in drunk, and drank there, and went out drunk; sometimes to persons who came out and went away from his house in a noisy manner and sky-larking in the streets; that his shop was generally kept open on Sundays, and that persons, not lodgers or boarders, bought and drank spirituous liquors in the shop, on Sundays; and that he had no accommodations for travellers or boarders, neither beds nor stables for such accommodation; and that he had no license for keeping a public house from the corporation; then the charge of the indictment is sustained."

UNITED STATES v. COMMANDANT OF FORT DELAWARE.

[1 Am. Law Rev. 576.]

District Court, D. Delaware. Nov. 17, 1866.

MARTIAL LAW—MILITARY COMMISSIONS—POWER TO TRY AND SENTENCE—HABEAS CORPUS.

Four men, three being citizens of South Carolina and one of Georgia, were tried by a military commission convened at Charleston, by orders from the headquarters of the department of South Carolina, dated Dec. 26, 1865, on charges and specifications alleging, in substance, that, being actuated by hostility to the United States, and with intent to oppose the military forces of the United States, on Oct. 8, 1865, at Brown's Ferry, S. C., whilst martial law was in force by authority of the president, did voluntarily associate with an armed band, and, acting therewith, with unlawful force, did attack and kill a military guard. The prisoners were found guilty, and sentenced to be hung; the president commuted the sentence, July 26, 1866, to imprisonment for life at the Dry Tortugas, whither they were sent; and they were removed thence, on the following 6th of August, to Fort Delaware, in Delaware. A writ of habeas corpus was issued for them, directed to the commandant of the fort, who brought them into court, and made return of the facts substantially as above.

HALL, District Judge. The competency of the military commission to arraign, try, and sentence the prisoners upon the charges and specifications against them, is the single point for consideration. If the commission had jurisdiction, the proceedings are conclusive; if it had not, they are void. To sustain the proceedings of the commission, the case of Rex v. Suddis, 1 East, 306, has been cited for the admission of Mr. Erskine, that, in the absence of all civil judicature, the military may try offenders, assuming that the condition of South Carolina afforded ground to presume the absence of all civil judicature to try offenders. But public documents of which the court must take notice do not permit this presumption. The Rebellion had ceased, and the authority of the United States was acknowledged in that state; so that, the 30th June, 1865, the president issued his proclamation appointing a provisional governor, with authority to exercise all the powers to enable the loyal people of that state to restore it to its constitutional relation to the United States, directing that the district judge of the district in which South Carolina is included proceed to hold courts within said state, according to the provisions of the acts of congress, and that the attorney general instruct the proper officers to libel, and bring to judgment and sale, property subject to confiscation, and enforce the administration of justice, within the said state, in all matters within the cognizance and jurisdiction of the federal courts, &c. Under this provisional governor, the institutions of the state were in operation; the people of the state elected a governor, who entered upon his duties Nov. 29, 1865; and the provisional governor, having fulfilled his office, was relieved Dec. 22, 1865; so that, before the issuing of this commission, Dec. 26, 1865, the state was, in fact, in the exercise of its civil functions. Besides, if the commission had been issued because of the absence of civil judicature to take cognizance of the crimes, it would, indeed it must have been, so suggested in some part of the proceedings; there being no such suggestion evinces there was no such ground for this commission; nor would a temporary abeyance of civil judicature give jurisdiction to a military commission to try and sentence, however the military might be justified in arresting and detaining for the proper tribunal. The place to which Mr. Erskine's remark in 1 East, 306, applied was Gibraltar, a distant fortress, purely military; the subject, a soldier; the decision has no application. Transactions in our army in Mexico have been referred to. Mexico was a foreign country, conquered, its language and institutions unknown; South Carolina, a state of the Union rescued from rebellion, its laws and institutions restored. Acts Cong. 1863, c. 75, § 21 [12 Stat. 735], and 1864, Acts Cong. c. 215 [13 Stat. 356], have been relied upon for giving jurisdiction. The purpose of these acts is apparent on their face,—to enlarge the powers of the commanding general for executing, pardoning, or mitigating sentences of military commissions or courts martial, not to enlarge their jurisdiction. The commission derives no authority from these acts; congress intended no such thing. The ground on which this commission proceeded appears in the charges and specifications. It is, that the crimes were committed against a guard of the forces of the United States, composed of duly enlisted soldiers, on duty. The assumption is, that in cases of alleged offences by citizens against a guard of the army of the United States, detailed and on duty, and against enlisted soldiers on duty as such guard, it is competent to issue a military commission to arraign, try, and punish the offenders; the gist of the assumption being, that, of alleged offences by citizens against soldiers, soldiers should be the judges. Is this position in accordance with sound reason, or the fundamental principle of our laws? In so small a body, comparatively, as the army, so associated, with so much in common, so sensitive, there must be an esprit de corps that will not allow us to expect impartial justice from them in collision with citizens, while the broad ground of citizenship is not liable to this objection. This aspect of the case exhibits nothing favoring trial by military commission of alleged offences by citizens against soldiers: on the contrary, all sound principles are opposed to subjecting the accused to the disadvantages of such a trial.

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1879.

EMBEZZLEMENT—WHAT CONSTITUTES—INDICTMENT—MATTERS OF FORM—DESCRIPTION OF CRIME.

1. The word "embezzle," in Rev. St. U. S., is used to describe a crime which a person has an opportunity to commit by reason of some office or employment, and which is some breach of confidence or trust.

2. Rev. St § 1025, provides: "No indictment . . . . shall be deemed insufficient . . . . in matter of form only." Held, that anything that form a part of the description of the crime is not a matter of form.

Indictment under Rev. St. § 5209, relative to embezzlement by national bank officers, clerks, etc. On motion to quash an indictment.

LOWELL, District Judge. [2] [These indictments are drawn under section 5209 of the Revised Statutes: "Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk or agent of any association" (that is, national banking associations, which are mentioned in this chapter), "who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds or credits of the association, or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association, or who, without such authority, issues or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, makes any acceptance, assigns any note, bond, draft, bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment or decree; or who makes any false entry in any book, report or statement of the association, with intent in either case to injure or defraud the association or any other company, body politic or corporate, or any individual person, or to deceive any officer of the association, or any agent appointed to examine the affairs of any such association; and any person who, with like intent, aids or abets any officer, clerk or agent, in any violation of this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor."

[The principal points that have been taken appear to be objections to the mode in which the indictments charge this crime. That may be subdivided, and there are two principal objections: One is that the facts to show an embezzlement, as distinct from some other crime—for instance, larceny—are not sufficiently set out in the indictment, and has been very fully and ably argued from what may be called the foundation. The leading idea of the argument is that the word "embezzle," by its own force, describes something which was known to the common law, and now by statute, like the words "murder" and "steal;" and that the sense in which the word "embezzle" is already well known in our laws must give the interpretation to the word in this statute. That is a very important point, and I have given it such attention and consideration as I might. I have come to the conclusion that there was no common-law definition of embezzlement when our constitution was formed. There was a very ancient statute, which was in force in some of the states and not in others—that of Henry VIII.—at least it has been decided not to be in others, though I should have supposed it was in all; but I must take the decisions, of course. But if there was any such statute, which by reason of having been passed as early as Henry VIII. was in force here, it does not define the word "embezzlement" in this statute.] [2]

There was no common law definition of the word "embezzlement," there never has been, and there is not now. Some elements of the crime are probably common to the statutes, and also to the familiar meaning of the word; that is to say, the word appears to mean, whenever used to distinguish a crime which a person has the opportunity to commit, by reason of some office or employment, which may include, in its signification, some breach of confidence or trust, some misuse of an opportunity of that sort. That is about all, I think, that can be found of a general nature in the meaning of the word. I do think, however, that there is one mode of comparison,—one source of comparison,—and that is by the various statutes which make up the body of the Revised Statutes, all passed on a certain day of 1874, and all forming one body of law. Examining the word "embezzle," as used in these various statutes, which are all contained in this very large volume now, I think it will be found that the only general idea which runs through the whole use of the word "embezzle" generally, is the one that I have stated.

[2] [The crew of any merchant vessel may commit the crime of embezzlement in regard to the cargo or stores of the vessel. That cargo and those stores are not in their possession, and not intrusted to them in any technical sense. They are not in law in the possession of a seaman. He has an opportunity, being a member of the crew, to steal them. Undoubtedly it would be larceny at common law, but it would be embezzlement by the statute, if he took them fraudulently to convert to his own or some improper use. Any person who receives public money from any agent of the United States—some agents being designated by a particular name, and also a general word being used—without authority, not being a duly authorized depositary, commits the crime of embezzlement in receiving that money. He becomes a sort of agent, and cannot say he was not an agent, and is guilty of embezzlement, for the statute says: "Every banker, broker or other person not an authorized depositary of public moneys, who knowingly receives from any disbursing officer, * * * any public money on deposit, or by way of loan, * * * is guilty of an act of embezzlement." There are many other statutes. The word, as used in the post-office laws, applies only to agents, clerks, etc, of the United States. But if I remember rightly—I have not looked at all the statutes, but I have a very strong impression, for I have tried a good many of the cases—it does not depend upon the letter being intrusted to the particular officer or clerk or agent, under the circumstances which would constitute embezzlement under many of the statutes. Any officer of the mint or assay office may embezzle coins, medals or moneys in his charge, or of which he assumes charge, or any other moneys, medals or coins in his office.

[It is very apparent, I think, from an examination of these various statutes, which were re-enacted on the same day, and which before that time formed a body of law enacted at various times, that the word is not used generally in the statutes. I do not know that it is at all in the United States in so sharp and technical a sense as it has been construed to be under some statutes, and of course the definition of the crime must be followed by the courts. There is no definition of it here or in any of the statutes of the United States, but the word is used in such a way as to show the meaning which I have mentioned, and therefore I think, though I do not find it necessary to decide, that it will not be found, when the point comes to be decided, that in those cases those rules that have been laid down in some courts—and the courts have differed as the statutes have—those sharp lines would be found to be drawn about the word "embezzle" in the statutes of the United States. But I do think—and this is a point of law, not pleading—I do think that the intent here governs the whole fraud. It is not a perfectly clear point. In the only case that is cited on either side, the pleader averred that the acts had been done with intent, as I gather from the report. There are several counts. In one, for instance, an embezzlement with intent was charged. In the next, abstracting with intent. In the next, willful misapplying with intent. It was conceded, therefore, in that case by the prosecuting attorney representing the government, that the intent governed the whole cause. The court carefully say that they do not decide that point, evidently seeing ambiguity and doubt which had not been argued to them, and therefore, perhaps, having quite as much weight as if it had been argued, as showing how a person reading the statute would say there was a doubt on this point. But when taken with the original statute, in which there are no semi-colons, and if it is taken with the remainder of the section—"Every person who with like intent aids or abets any officer, clerk or agent in any violation of this section"—I think the better opinion is—and of course we must decide the doubtful points as well as the clear ones—that that governs the whole section. There are reasons for it, also, as was said by the counsel in argument.] [2]

[2] [From 2 Nat. Bank. Cas. (Browne) 148.]

A person may wilfully misapply money without doing any wrong in fact, and without intent of any. For instance, he may pay Mr. "A." instead of Mr. "B.," both being honest creditors. It is a misapplication, and it might injure or not the employer. "Abstracts;" that is rather a tender word. That might possibly be held to be committed without wilful intent, and even without actual injury. That is a matter that is a good deal discussed in the case of U. S. v. Taintor [Case No. 16,428], assuming that the intent is necessary. The meaning and importance of the intent is a good deal discussed on the supposition that it is a part of the statute. The word "embezzlement" of itself would hardly seem to require any such qualification, because I think that would carry in any sense,—I mean in any sense in which it could be used,—would carry with it some intent. But when we look back to one of the statutes I have cited, it will be seen that the mere receiving of public money is embezzlement. There is embezzlement without intent, and without injury, in fact. So that as to the meaning of the word "embezzle"—taking, as I do take, the meaning of that word from the statutes of the United States themselves, it might be necessary (in the opinion of congress, I mean, for I have nothing to do with that) to say that that crime could not be committed without the positive intent to "injure," or "deceive," or "defraud," for all three words are used, and at any rate, as to the two words "abstract" and "misapply," there is an obvious reason for it.

[2] [I think I can see why the semi-colons were put in, and that is to meet another argument made that the words "such authority" govern the whole sentence. It is very clear they do not. This section is carefully parted off by the semi-colons, and by the sense also. "Every president, director, cashier, teller, clerk or agent of any association, who embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, or credits of the association;" "or who, without authority from the directors, issues or puts in circulation any of the notes of the association;" and that must be done with intent to defraud, or injure or deceive; and then, repeating the words "without such authority," and it is repeated because they meant to repeat it. "Or who without such authority issues, or puts forth any certificate of deposit, draws any order or bill of exchange, mortgage, judgment or decree." Now, in the next clause of the sentence they omit the words "without authority," so that it is perfectly clear, I think, from the statute, that whenever they meant to say "without authority," they do say so, and when they do not say so they do not mean so to do. They put these words in twice, and leave them out of all the others, and they part off the sentence carefully with semi-colons so as to show to what portions of it these words are intended to refer, and that is the reason why the semi-colons were put in. I have consulted Judge NELSON about it, and he agrees with me. That being so, I think that the only counts which are sufficient, are those for making false entries.] [2]

To be sure the statute says (section 1025): "No indictment * * * shall be deemed insufficient * * * in matter of form only." That "only" is important. It must be a "matter of form," and in construing that in this circuit we have been very liberal. I have no sympathy with the extreme technicality of the ancient criminal law,—do not like it, and do not believe in it. At the same time, I have to administer it as I find it, and anything which forms a part of the description of the crime does not seem to me to be a matter of form. In this particular case it might turn out to be a matter of very little importance. Undoubtedly, the intent might often be presumed from the fact; but when congress sees fit to make the intent part of crime, I do not think the courts have any right to say it is a mere matter of form. So far as "misapplying" and "abstracting" are concerned, that is a very important part of the substance. I do not think that this statute means that we should find out what is an important point of the substance, but only an important point of form. I do not mean to say that the matter of substance may not be very loosely stated, and if the substance of the offense is loosely stated—badly stated—imperfectly and ungrammatically stated, still, if the meaning is clear, that is a matter of form; but it is not a matter of form to state the substance of the crime.

[2] [From 2 Nat. Bank. Cas. (Browne) 148.]

Indictment quashed.

UNITED STATES v. CONKLIN.

[17 Int. Rev. Rec. 76.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. 1873.

CLAIM AGENT—INDICTMENT FOR RETAINING ILLEGAL FEES.

The defendant [Jerome B. Conklin] was indicted under the seventh and eighth sections of the act of congress, approved July 8, 1870, for retaining a greater compensation for his services as claim agent than was allowed by law. He had obtained a father's pension for an old man named Porter, amounting with the back pay to some six hundred and sixty dollars; from this amount he retained $330, or one half. The indictment was found in October, 1872. On the 26th of October the defendant was arraigned, and entered a plea of not guilty. By permission of the court the plea of "not guilty" was withdrawn, in order that the defendant might file a motion to quash the indictment. The motion to quash was heard and overruled, and by consent of both parties the case set down for trial. The defendant was found guilty upon three counts of the indictment, and he now files several motions, the most important of which is one to amend the record by striking out the entry, showing that the defendant had re-entered the plea of not guilty.

Henry Hooper, and Channing Richards, Asst. U. S. Attys.

L. H. Bond, for defendant.

SWING, District Judge, held: The record in this case shows that the defendant had been arraigned, and had entered a plea of not guilty. Subsequently the plea was withdrawn by leave of the court, and he filed a motion to quash the indictment, which was heard and overruled. The record shows that on the 19th of December, 1872, the plea of not guilty was re-entered, a jury sworn to try the issue, and the cause submitted to the jury, who found the defendant guilty.

He now files a motion to amend the record by striking out the entry of the plea of not guilty, as he never entered it himself; and, consequently that the jury had no issue to try, and that the verdict cannot stand. The facts outside of the record are: That on the day of the trial the clerk, sua sponte, or by direction of the assistant United States attorney, re-entered the plea and made up the issue. When the case was called, the assistant attorney for the government opened the case to the jury, and the defendant's counsel opened the defence and stated emphatically that his client was not guilty. The defendant had challenged jurors and otherwise exercised his rights in the proceeding. The second day of the trial the clerk read in open court the record as it now stands, of the plea and the issue; and the defendant and his counsel were present and took no exception to its truth, but called witnesses, asked for certain charges, and submitted the case to the decision of the jury. Under these circumstances ought the court to permit the defendant to have the record amended in order that he may get a new trial or have the judgment arrested?

No case precisely similar to this can I find in any of the books. The nearest to it is the case of Fernandez v. State, 7 Ala. 511; but even there a statute permitted the court to enter the plea. In People v. Frost, 5 Parker, Cr. R. 52, the court held that the conduct of the defendant in demanding a trial, challenging jurors, etc., amounted to a plea of not guilty, but as that was by virtue of the statute, the case has no application here. The cases are unanimous that, if the record does not show an arraignment and plea, an issue for the jury to try on the verdict cannot stand. It must be set aside. And the court cannot supply the plea after verdict. See Sartorious v. State, 24 Misc. 609; Douglass v. State, 3 Wis. 820.

The record in the case at bar is perfect, and, consequently, these cases do not apply. Can the defendant waive the right of entering the plea himself? The old authorities say he cannot waive any of his rights, but that was at a time when the defendant, as a matter of right, could neither have counsel or witnesses. Our criminal jurisprudence secured to the defendant every privilege in favor of life and liberty. The reason for the old rule is gone. It has been settled that both in civil and criminal cases he may waive certain rights, such as the challenge of jurors. See 1 Bish. Cr. Proc. 425; Parks v. State, 4 Ohio St. 234.

We cannot lose sight of the facts that he was once arraigned and pleaded not guilty; that for his benefit he was allowed to withdraw this plea. The case was set down for trial upon a consent day; he appears in person, challenges the jury, is defended by counsel, calls witnesses to maintain his defence, and, telling the jury he is not guilty, submits to their decision. There is also another important fact in the case, viz. that on the second day of the trial he heard the record read in open court as it now stands, he made no objection to it but went on with his defence. Under these circumstances it seems to me that he waived his right to enter the plea or to have the record altered. He was silent when he ought to have spoken; and he must now be silent when he would like to speak. It is admitted that he has had an impartial and fair trial, and that he has suffered no injury by the entry in question.

The motion to amend the record must, accordingly, be overruled.

THE COURT also overruled the motion for a new trial and a motion in arrest of judgment.

Upon a motion of the assistant United States attorney, the defendant was sentenced to pay a fine of $250 and costs of prosecution.

GAMING—OWNER OF TABLE—WHO MAY BE INDICTED.

1. Upon an indictment for keeping a gaming-table in a booth upon a race-field, contrary to the act of Maryland, it is not necessary to prove that the traverser was the owner.

2. He is equally guilty, whether he acted as principal, or agent, or servant of the owner.

Indictment for keeping a gaming-table, to game with dice, at a booth, on the race-field, contrary to an act of assembly of Maryland.

THE COURT instructed the jury that it was not necessary for the United States to prove that the traverser was the owner of the table, if he played at it as owner, and appeared to be the person who set it up. And that it was of no importance whether the traverser acted as principal or as agent or servant for the owner of the table. In each case he was equally guilty.

[Cited in Ex parte Bradley, 48 Ind. 553; Joy v. State, 14 Ind. 153.]

[This was an indictment against Henry W. Conner for perjury.]

Mr. Bates, U. S. Dist. Atty.

OPINION OF THE COURT. The defendant was indicted for perjury under the bankrupt law, and was found guilty by the jury at the last term, the presiding judge being absent. The indictment contained but one count, charging the defendant with having furnished a false inventory of his property, in not including his interest in a house and lot, his interest in a grocery store, and in certain choses in action. The verdict was general, and a motion being made at the last term for a new trial, it was continued to the present term.

This motion is opposed on the ground that the circuit courts of the United States have no power to grant new trials, in any case of felony; that the common law must be their guide, and that, at common law, no new trial in a criminal case can be granted, except in cases of misdemeanor. This question was considered and decided in U. S. v. Keen [Case No. 15,510], and it will not be again examined. There can be no doubt that the court may, on cause shown, grant a new trial in any criminal case. The principal ground relied on for a new trial is, the charge to the jury on the fact proved, that the schedule being made out on the advice of a lawyer, a full statement of the facts being submitted to him, did not exempt the defendant, if any property was withheld from his schedule, from the charge of perjury.

The maxim is admitted, that ignorance of the law constitutes no excuse for the commission of a crime. But the intention with which the act is done must give a character to the act. A man may innocently commit homicide. If, in doing a lawful act, he should unintentionally kill a fellow creature, he is in no sense guilty of a crime. A bankrupt is bound to exhibit a true schedule of all his property, and if he fail to do this, wilfully and fraudulently, he is guilty of perjury. But if he, being unacquainted with the requirements of the law, shall be advised by his counsel, after the facts have been fully stated to him, that certain items of property are not required to be stated on his schedule, and he omits them, he is not guilty of perjury. He acts fairly in submitting the facts to his counsel, and, by acting under his advice, he shows a desire to conform to the law.

To constitute perjury under the law, the false schedule must have been made corruptly, by the bankrupt, and with the intent to defraud his creditors. The falsity of the schedule being established, the mitigating circumstances must be shown by the defendant; and if no excuse be proved, the fraudulent intent will be inferred from the act, it being, prima facie, in violation of the law.

A new trial being granted, a nolle prosequi was entered.

UNITED STATES v. CONVERSE.

[21 Law Rep. 593.]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. 1858.[1]

OFFICERS—EXTRA COMPENSATION—COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS—DISBURSEMENTS.

1. The act of August 23, 1842, § 2 (5 Stat. 580), provides that no officer whose salary is fixed shall receive any additional compensation, "unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation." The act of March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 367), makes an appropriation for superintendents' commissions on disbursements for light-house purposes, and repealed the following proviso in a previous act of the same year: "Provided that no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid to any person who receives a salary as an officer of the customs, and from and after the first day of July, 1849, the said disbursements shall be made by the collectors of the customs without compensation." Held, that the repeal of this proviso neither repeals the second section of the act of 1842, nor satisfies its requirements by an explicit appropriation to pay an extra compensation for an extra service. The effect of such repeal is merely to restore the power of appointing others than collectors to make the disbursements, and, if collectors shall be appointed, leaves their rights to commissions to depend on the law as elsewhere found.

2. For disbursements made not as superintendent for a certain district, but under special orders from the secretary of the treasury for the whole lighthouse service, the act of 1849 makes no provision

3. If the repeal of the proviso enabled collectors to participate in said commissions, the act of 1822, § 18 (3 Stat. 696), limits their extra compensation to $400 a year.

4. The acts of September 30, 1850 (9 Stat. 533), March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 608), and August 1, 1852 (10 Stat. 86), deprive every collector whose compensation exceeds $2,500 of all participation in these commissions, though they are required to render the service of superintendents of lights, or disbursing agents, in procuring supplies for them.

[This was an action at law by the United States against James C. Converse, administrator of Philip Greely, Jr., deceased.]

Mr. Hallet, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Choate and C. T. Russell, contra.

CURTIS, Circuit Justice. This is an action for money had and received to the use of the United States, by Philip Greely, Junior, the defendant's intestate, while collector of the customs for the port of Boston and Charlestown. A number of items were in question when the case was opened, but in the progress of the trial, all were disposed of to the satisfaction of both parties, save a charge made by the intestate, of $17,968.92, as commissions on disbursements made by him under the orders of the secretary of the treasury, in the purchase of oil and other materials for lighthouses. The question is whether the collector was entitled, by law, to make this charge against the United States for that service. Mr. Greely held the office of collector from May 1, 1849, to May 1, 1853.

By the act of March 3, 1841, § 5 (5 Stat. 432), it was enacted, that "no collector shall, on any pretence whatever, hereafter receive, hold, or retain for himself, in the aggregate, more than six thousand dollars per year, including all commissions for duties, and all fees for storage, or fees or emoluments, or any other commissions, or salaries which are now allowed by law." The act of August, 23, 1842, § 2 (5 Stat. 510), is as follows: "That no officer in any branch of the public service, or any other person whose salary, pay, or emoluments is or are fixed by law or regulations, shall receive any additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation in any form whatever, for the disbursement of public money, or for any other service or duty whatsoever, unless the same shall be authorized by law, and the appropriation therefor explicitly set forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation."

It being admitted that Mr. Greely was an officer, whose salary, pay or emoluments was or were fixed by the law, and that he had received its full amount of six thousand dollars, independent of the charge in question, it is incumbent on the defendant to show, not only that the service was authorized by law, but also that the appropriation for that service explicitly sets forth that it is for such additional pay, extra allowance, or compensation. It is not enough to find an act of congress authorizing a service and making an appropriation to pay for it. This would be sufficient, provided the person rendering the service were not an officer or other person entitled to a fixed compensation. If he be, and he claims an extra compensation for an extra service, he must produce an appropriation which explicitly sets forth that it is made for such additional compensation; that is, he must show not only that congress contemplated and provided for a service and payment therefor, but that they contemplated and explicitly provided that if it should be rendered by one already entitled to a fixed compensation he should nevertheless receive, in addition thereto, the compensation provided for such service. And the addition of such compensation to a fixed compensation is not to be inferred from any equitable considerations, but must be found explicitly declared in the law itself. Such in my judgment is the fair interpretation of the language of this act, and the history of the legislation of congress upon this subject of the extra compensation of officers, makes this interpretation, if possible, still more plain and necessary.

The defendant relies on the following clause in the appropriation act of March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 367): "For superintendents' commissions, at two and one-half per cent. on the four hundred and sixty-six thousand nine hundred and thirty dollars and eight cents, appropriated above for light-house purposes, eleven thousand six hundred and seventy-three dollars and twenty-five cents. And the proviso contained in the act making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the government, for the year ending the thirtieth day of June, 1849, and for other purposes, approved, &c., which proviso is in the following words: 'Provided, that no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid to any person who receives a salary as an officer of the customs, and from and after the first day of July, 1849, the said disbursement shall be made by the collectors of the customs without compensation, is hereby repealed.'" The argument of the defendant's counsel is, that the express repeal of this proviso is equivalent to an explicit declaration that parts of the sum appropriated by this act might be paid to persons who received salaries as officers of the customs, and that it was not to be disbursed by collectors without compensation. But, certainly, this appropriation does not "explicitly set forth that it is for additional pay, extra allowance or compensation." If this appears at all, it is only inferentially, and the inquiry is whether it be a necessary inference that some part of this sum was appropriated as additional pay, or extra compensation to collectors who should perform the service of superintendents of lights. Now, the proviso which was repealed, consisted of two parts. The first related exclusively to commissions in the disbursement of the appropriation for light-house expenses made for the fiscal year ending on the thirtieth day of June, 1849; and it prohibited the payment of any commissions out of the sum thus appropriated, to any officer of the customs who received a salary. The second part of the proviso positively required the service of making disbursements as superintendents of lights to be performed by collectors of customs, after July 1, 1849, without compensation. It left no discretion with the secretary of the treasury to appoint any other person to discharge this duty. The repeal of the proviso left the right of officers of the customs to participate in the commissions for disbursing the appropriation made for the year ending June 31, 1849, to stand upon the law as elsewhere found; and restored to the secretary of the treasury the power to appoint persons other than collectors to make the disbursements, and if collectors should be appointed it left their right to commissions to depend on the law as elsewhere found. It must be admitted that this repeal might, under some circumstances, indicate an intention to have collectors participate in these commissions. If they have been for the first time deprived of them by the proviso, its repeal would quite clearly show that their former title was restored. But the contrary is true. Independent of the proviso they had no title to this or any other extra compensation, and by force of the act of August 2, 1842, could have none, unless explicitly granted by the act making the appropriation; so that unless I can say that the repeal of the proviso either repeals the second section of the act of 1842, or satisfies its requirements by an explicit appropriation to pay an extra compensation for an extra service, the defendant has no title to the commission. That the second section of the act of 1842 is not repealed by implication, by the repeal of the proviso, is clear. There is no repugnance between this repeal and the act of 1842. The reasons for repealing the entire proviso may have been that the act of 1842 was broad enough to cover the cases of extra compensation contemplated by the proviso, and so it was not necessary, in so far as its object was to provide for those cases; and in so far as it required the service to be performed by collectors only, that it was inexpedient. But to amount to a compliance with the second section of the act of 1842, it should have superadded to the repeal of the proviso, an explicit declaration that the appropriation was intended as extra compensation to those officers having fixed salaries, who might be selected to render the service.

There are two other views of this subject, either of which would, in my judgment, be sufficient to show that there is no lawful claim to these commissions. The first is, that although Mr. Greely was superintendent of lights within a certain district, extending round the Massachusetts Bay, yet these commissions are charged on disbursements made by him in the purchase, under the orders of the secretary of the treasury, of oil and some other materials for the whole light-house service of the United States. Now the appropriation made is for "superintendents' commissions." If he did not render this service as superintendent, but aside from that employment, acted under the orders of the secretary of the treasury in making large purchases for this service, no appropriation is made for paying him. It was, no doubt, an onerous and responsible duty, imposed upon him because he happened to be at a place favorable for making these purchases, and this may constitute a claim on the equitable consideration of congress, especially if the imposition of this onerous duty on him, instead of distributing it among all, or most of the superintendents of lights, was advantageous to the government. But this is for the consideration of congress. It does not enable me to say an appropriation to pay commissions by way of extra compensation, was actually made. Besides, if the repeal of the proviso in the act of 1848 were held to amount to an explicit declaration that collectors might participate in the commissions of superintendents, by way of extra compensation, the inquiry would still remain, To what extent may they receive such extra compensation? and this seems to me to be answered by the act of May 7, 1822, § 18 (3 Stat. 696): "That no collector, surveyor, or naval officer, shall ever receive more than four hundred dollars annually, exclusive of his compensation as collector, surveyor, or naval officer, and the fines and forfeitures allowed by law, for any services he may perform for the United States in any other office or capacity." In the case of Hoyt v. U. S., 10 How. [51 U. S.] 141, the supreme court considered this section in force, and applied it to the case of a collector who held office from March, 1838, to March, 1841, and I am not aware of its having been since repealed. It was admitted that aside from the charge now in question, Mr. Greely had received extra compensation to the extent of four hundred dollars annually, for services performed for the United States in a capacity other than that of collector. It follows that, for services performed in making these contracts and disbursements, which were not within his duties as collector, he can make no further charge.

What has thus far been said, relates exclusively to the defendant's claims under the act of 1849. The subsequent acts are so much more unfavorable to these claims that I do not deem it necessary to enter into a particular discussion of them. They are the acts of September 30, 1850 (9 Stat. 533), March 3, 1851 (9 Stat. 608), and August 31, 1852 (10 Stat. 86). I have examined these acts, and am satisfied each of them deprives every collector whose compensation exceeds twenty-five hundred dollars, of all participation in these commissions, though they are required to render the service of superintendents of lights or disbursing agents in procuring supplies for them.

The verdict must therefore be taken for the plaintiffs, disallowing in the account the credit claimed for these commissions.

Case No. 14,849.

UNITED STATES v. CONWAY.

[Hempst. 313.] [1]

District Court, D. Arkansas. July, 1843.

EXECUTION—SALE OF PROPERTY UNDER—CONTRACTS—OBLIGATION—REMEDY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. The "Act to regulate the sale of property on execution," approved 23d December, 1840, commonly called the "Valuation Law," is constitutional, according to the doctrine in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311, and its provisions must be followed in executing the final process of the court.

[Cited in Moore v. Fowler, Case No. 9,761.]

2. The obligation of a contract and the remedy to enforce it are distinct things, and whatever belongs to the remedy may be altered according to the will of the state, as to both past and future contracts, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract.

3. The obligation of a contract may be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether, or impaired by burdening the proceedings with new restrictions and conditions so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing; but a law which reserves property from sale one year, if two thirds of the appraised value shall not be offered, is not of that character.

4. A writ of venditioni exponas issued before the expiration of the year is irregular, and will be quashed on motion, and a supersedeas thereto ordered.

[Suit by the United States against James S. Conway.]

Motion to quash a venditioni exponas.

A. Fowler, Dist. Atty, for plaintiff.

Chester Ashley, for defendant.

JOHNSON, District Judge. This is a motion made by the defendant, Conway, to have stayed, set aside, and quashed an execution issued in this case against him, on the 9th day of June, 1843, now in the hands of Thomas W. Newton, the late marshal of this district, on the ground that the same has been irregularly and illegally issued. The only question I deem it material to determine is, whether the execution law of this state, entitled "An act to regulate the sale of property on execution," approved 23d December, 1840 (Acts Ark. 1840, p. 58), providing for the valuation of property taken on execution, and that it shall not be sold unless it brings two thirds of its appraised value, be a valid and constitutional law. If it be a valid law, having been adopted under acts of congress as the law of this court (4 Story's Laws, 2121; 8 Laws [Bior. & D.] 62 [4 Stat. 278]; 10 Laws [Bior. & D.] 244 [5 Stat. 499]; 17th rule of 6th Oct. 1842; Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. [23 U. S.] 20; Bank of U. S. v. Halstead, Id. 51,) it follows that the venditioni exponas has irregularly and erroneously issued, one year not having elapsed since the property was offered for sale under the first execution.

I have looked into the opinion of the supreme court of the United States, in the case of Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. [42 U. S.] 311, and from an attentive and deliberate examination of the doctrine there settled, I can perceive nothing which can justly authorize the inference that that court would declare our state valuation law inoperative and void, as being in conflict with the constitution of the United States. The distinction between the obligation of a contract, and the remedy to enforce it, is clearly stated by the chief justice who delivered the opinion. In their nature they are different and distinct things. The obligation of a contract arises at the time the contract is made, and continues until it be performed or discharged. The remedy to enforce the obligation of the contract does not arise until there is a failure to perform the obligation. They are, then, not identical, but different and distinct things. The constitution prohibits laws impairing the obligation of contracts, and is silent with regard to laws relating to the remedies by which contracts are to be enforced.

In the opinion referred to, the chief justice states the doctrine in the following terms: "If the laws of the state, passed afterwards, had done nothing more than change the remedy upon contracts of this description, they would be liable to no constitutional objection. For, undoubtedly, a state may regulate at pleasure the modes of proceeding in its courts, in relation to past contracts as well as future. And although a new remedy may be deemed less convenient than the old one, and may in some degree render the recovery of debts more tardy and difficult, yet it will not follow that the law is unconstitutional. Whatever belongs merely to the remedy, may be altered according to the will of the state, provided the alteration does not impair the obligation of the contract. But if that effect is produced, it is immaterial whether it is done by acting on the remedy, or directly on the contract itself In either case it is prohibited by the constitution." The chief justice further says: "It is difficult perhaps to draw a line that would be applicable in all cases, between legitimate alterations of the remedy, and provisions which, in the form of remedy, impair the right. But it is manifest that the obligation of the contract, and the rights of a party under it, may, in effect, be destroyed by denying a remedy altogether, or may be seriously impaired by burdening the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions, so as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing. And no one, we presume, would say that there is any substantial difference between a retrospective law, declaring a particular contract or class of contracts to be abrogated and void, and one which took away all remedy to enforce them, or encumbered them with conditions that rendered it useless or impracticable to pursue it."

Now, the question here presented is, does the valuation law of this state come within the rule here laid down by the supreme court of the United States? Does it, in the language of the court, so seriously impair and burden the proceedings with new conditions and restrictions, as to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing? I think not. The valuation law, in the event that the property will not bring two thirds of its appraised value, postpones the collection of the debt for twelve months. This can scarcely be said to make the remedy hardly worth pursuing.

My opinion is, that the valuation law is a valid and constitutional law, and its provisions are to be followed in executing the final process of this court. The venditioni exponas must, therefore, be quashed, and the clerk, on the application of the defendant, is directed to issue a supersedeas thereto. Ordered accordingly.

Case No. 14,850.

UNITED STATES v. CONYNGHAM et al.

[Wall. C. C. 178; 4 Dall. 358.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1801.

EXECUTION—ALLOWING DEBTOR TO RETAIN PROPERTY LEVIED ON—SUBSEQUENT EXECUTION.

Where a creditor having levied on the personal property of his debtor, instead of selling the property as soon as it can reasonably be done, allows the debtor to retain possession of it for an unreasonable length of time, such execution is fraudulent as respects a subsequent one, and the property may be levied on and sold under such subsequent one.

[Cited in The Roslyn, Case No. 12,068.]

This was a question addressed to the court, respecting the priority of two executions, interfering with each other. A case was stated, which was shortly this. John Travis and others having obtained judgment in the supreme court of Pennsylvania, against F. and I. West, laid a fi. fa. on their household goods, and about twenty-eight days afterwards, assigned the judgment bona fide, and for a valuable consideration, to the defendants in this cause. The sheriff, by the consent and approbation of Travis and Conyngham, allowed the goods to remain about thirteen months in the possession of the Wests, when they were levied on by the marshal of this court, by virtue of an execution, at the suit of the United States. The question for the decision of the court was, whether the goods of the Wests, thus circumstanced, were liable to the suit of the United States.

Rawle & Dallas, for the United States, contended, that the defendants having omitted to proceed with their execution till after the levy, and leaving the goods in the possession of the Wests, for so long a time, had lost their lien, and the property had become liable to the execution of the United States. From Twyne's Case [3 Coke, 80], to the present day, a party's being allowed to remain in possession of goods, after title passed to another, has been considered a badge of fraud, and the goods have been held subject to a subsequent execution. The principle of the decision, and policy of the law, applies equally to the case of property seized in execution, and left in possession of the former owner. In both cases indicia of ownership, are separated from the reality of it, and both alike mislead the public and encourage fraud. The cases from the books, put both cases on the same ground. See 1 Ves. Sr. 245; 1 Wils. 44. Rice v. Serjeant, 7 Mod. 37, in point. 10 Vin. Abr. 561, pl. 18; Peake, 65; 1 Salk. 320; Carth. 420; 3 Ves. 38; 1 Ld. Raym. 251; Cowp. 434; Prec. Ch. 285.

The defendant's counsel, Levy & Lewis, denied that the law was settled in England so broadly as the plaintiff's counsel insisted, for in the cases cited of interfering executions, the first execution creditor, after delivering his writ to the sheriff, had forbidden him to proceed, or had by some act or direction prevented him; while in the present case, the defendants had been merely quiescent; the sheriff, to be sure, acted with their approbation and permission, but not by their direction. But farther; all the authorities concur, that leaving the goods in the owner's possession, is but evidence of fraud; it is not a fraud in itself. No actual fraud is alleged. But admitting that the law is in England as it is stated, it is not so in Pennsylvania. A series of cases, and the ancient, general usage of the state, has settled it differently: and with us, a creditor may take goods in execution under a fi. fa. and without proceeding to sale, leave them in possession of the debtor, without losing his lien, provided it be done through indulgence, and not with any actual fraudulent intent. Levy v. Wallis [4 Dall. (4 U. S.) 167], in the supreme court in 1799, was the case of a testatum fi. fa. to Lycoming county, to March, 1799. The sheriff, by virtue of it, "levied upon twelve horses." Upon the return of the fi. fa., Ingersoll, on behalf of A. B. of Lycoming, objected to it, that these same horses had been levied on, twenty or twenty-two months before, under a fi. fa. by his client. Wallis had been allowed to remain in possession the whole time, and had actually sold two of the horses levied on under the first fi. fa. The question was made, whether the first execution creditor had lost his lien. The court was full, and considered the point so settled, that they would not allow an argument. The chief justice said, that it had been the practice ever since he had been at the bar, that an execution creditor leaving the goods in the debtor's possession from motives of humanity, or as an indulgence, and not for an actual fraud, should not be postponed to a subsequent execution. Steinhauer v. Witman [1 Serg. & R. 438,] in the supreme court in 1798, was this. A fi. fa. in the suit of Swift v. Witman [unreported], had been levied on the defendant's goods; but they were allowed to remain in his possession. Afterwards came Steinhauer's fi. fa., and upon the question of priority, the chief justice expressed his displeasure that the point should be raised. Yeates, J., said that the rule in England was, that an execution creditor by allowing the goods to remain in the debtor's possession, lost his lien as against a subsequent execution: yet that such a rule would not do here, that ours was a young country, where money was not easily to be raised on a sudden; and that it would be productive of great inhumanity and distress, to oblige a creditor to sell his debtor's goods immediately; thereby creating a rush of the creditors, and breaking him up, when by a little indulgence, which the creditor might wish to give him, he would be able to discharge the debt. He said that "there was a distinction between an execution creditor leaving goods in the debtor's possession, and a purchase under a bill of sale; the former may, and generally does do it, from motives of humanity; the latter must have a fraudulent motive." These cases do not so much settle the law, as prove that it has been long settled and acted under. It has become the common law of Pennsylvania, and by the laws of the United States—1 Story's Laws, 114 [1 Stat. 142]—this court will observe it. It will be adhered to in the state courts, and infinité inconvenience will be produced if discordant decisions should take place in the different courts.

In reply, it was said that the rule was not so firmly established in Pennsylvania, nor to the extent supposed by the defendant's counsel. Collins v. Earle [unreported] was opposed to it; this case was in the common pleas, in 1791, before President Biddle. Collins levied fi. fa. on Earle's property, but entered an order on the sheriff's docket, that he was not to sell unless another execution came. Johns afterwards levied another execution on the same goods, and they were sold, and the money brought into court. Judge Biddle heard the question argued at large, and then expressed his clear opinion, that the first execution was to be deemed fraudulent in law; and Johns accordingly took the money. Page v. Cook [unreported] was a similar case of interfering executions. It arose before Judge Coxe, and his decision was similar to Judge Biddle's. He said that Rice v. Serjeant, 7 Mod. 37, settled the question in England, and that the law must be the same in Pennsylvania. The counsel of the United States had notes of the cases which they said could be entirely relied on for authenticity and accuracy.

THE COURT remarked that this was an important case, and declined giving an opinion till the following term, when they did so as follows:

[Before TILGHMAN, Chief Judge, and GRIFFITH, Circuit Judge.]

TILGHMAN, Chief Judge. I think it may be taken for granted, that by the principles of the common law (Twyne's Case, 3 Coke, 80b); and by the stat. of 13 Eliz. c. 5, adopted in this state, and practised under, before and since the Revolution, the conduct of the defendants would be considered as attended with those circumstances, which induce a legal presumption of fraud. When I use the word fraud, it is understood that no actual misconduct or immorality is ascribed to Messrs. Conygham, &c., who are gentlemen of fair character, and have acted in this business, in all probability, solely from principles of friendship and humanity. This construction of the common law, and of the stat. 5 Eliz. was not disputed by Mr. Levy, who argued for the defendants, nor has it been questioned by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, whose opinion I very much respect.

That opinion, cited and relied on by the defendant's counsel, is the only circumstance which raised the least doubt in my mind. It is contended, that we are bound by the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, by the 34th section of the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States on the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties, or statutes of the United States provide otherwise. I will not now deliver any opinion, whether the laws of the several states here spoken of, are to be understood to be the acts of the several state assemblies as expounded by their judicial decisions, and not the decisions of the state courts on principles of common law. At all events, it will not be contended that we are bound by the opinions of the state courts on common law points, unless their decisions have been ancient, universal and without variation—so as truly to constitute the law of the land. We have kept this cause under advisement since January last, in order to make inquiry into the decisions of the Pennsylvania state courts. I have inquired, and from the best information I have been able to procure, the point has never been decided in the high court of errors and appeals; nor is it understood as established, in the extent contended for by the defendants' counsel, in the several county courts of Pennsylvania. I am warranted in saying this, by the opinion of the late Judge Biddle, and of the present Judge Coxe, both of the most respectable legal abilities. Indeed, the supreme court themselves, struck with the pernicious consequences, which might result from a general principle, that a plaintiff might suffer goods seized by a fi. fa. to remain in the hands of the defendant as long as he pleased, did in the case of Chancellor v. Phillips, 4 Dall. [4 U. S.] 213, decide, that a bona fide purchase without notice, of a parcel of bricks thus left in the hands of the defendant, should hold them against the plaintiff. This decision appears to me to have shaken the principle contended for by the defendants. It is contended that this principle still continues in force, with respect to household goods; but for what reason are household goods to be distinguished from other things? Are they not equally valuable? Do they not equally hold out to the world, an idea of false credit? Do they not encourage the entering up fraudulent judgments, for the purpose of being protected by a fi. fa. laid on them. It is said that there is no false credit, because it appears from the records of the court, that the goods have been taken in execution. True, it does appear so; but when the goods have remained a long time in the hands of the defendant, without sale, the fair and reasonable presumption is, that the execution has been satisfied, and there is no obligation on either party, to make this satisfaction matter of record, supposing it to have taken place. If the principle contended for prevails, in what situation are we? An execution for a small sum, may protect property to a large amount. If the goods remain, in point of law, in custody of the sheriff of the county of Philadelphia, the marshal of the United States cannot touch them by virtue of process from this court, and thus they may be protected at the pleasure of the plaintiff in the state court. But if it is granted that the goods are not in the custody of the sheriff, I think the point, on the part of the defendant, is abandoned. On the whole, I am of opinion that by the principles of the common law, and the stat. of 5 Eliz., which in fact, was no more than an affirmance of the common law, the property in question was liable to the execution of the United States. And I am also of opinion, that the defendant has not shown such an uniform, consistent, universal train of decisions, in the courts of Pennsylvania, as will warrant this court in departing from the principles of the common law.

GRIFFITH, Circuit Judge. Upon principles of the common law, nothing is more settled, than that a possession of chattels is prima facie evidence of property in the possessor; yet mere possession does not always subject the real owner, who is out of possession, to be deprived of his right by the disposition of the possessor, or the process of law: goods hired, or loaned, or in possession of another by the pledge or mortgage of the owner, or which have come to one as trustee, or by finding, or fraud, or tort—are protected during the continuance of the loan or hiring, the pledge or mortgage, the trust, fraud, or tort against third persons who purchase or take them in execution, or found any claim against the real owner, on the ground of such possession; but in all these cases, it will be perceived, that the possession of the goods in the other is consistent with the ownership of him out of possession; there is nothing which can raise a presumption, when the truth is made known, that the real property is not in him who claims it: but if the real owner permits the goods to remain after the period of the hiring or loan is expired, or the pledge after it is redeemed, or with the trustee, after the trust expired, or with the finder or spoliator after discovery, and neglects an unreasonable time to assert and reclaim his property, third persons, who bona fide purchase, or by process of law seize on such goods, will hold it against the real owner. This is allowed on the broad principles of public policy. What innumerable evils would follow, were it allowed for one man to appear the owner of property transferable by delivery—act as such—receive credit, and draw into confidence the world under such appearances, and when called upon to make good his engagements, to tell those who trusted him that he was all along a pauper, and that what he appeared to be was a mere disguise, a snare laid for the ruin of unsuspecting creditors. To avoid the mischiefs resulting from such contrivances, policy dictates, and the law says, that let a man's intentions be what they may, and be ever so good and meritorious, yet he shall not be allowed to assist another in holding out appearances of property, to the injury of third persons; the only difficulty lies in settling what shall be an unlawful or fraudulent departing with possession by the true owner, so as to give him who comes in under the person in possession a superior or better right. I have before stated, that it is lawful to lend or to hire, and that if property is pledged or mortgaged, the pawnee or mortgagee may hold it securely; and so in the other cases, with this limitation, that if left by the owner in possession of another an unreasonable length of time after his right to reclaim or demand it accrues; and third persons, acting upon a supposition of property in the possessor, purchase or take it in execution, their right shall be preferred. What is a reasonable time, and what circumstances would in such cases give the character of legal fraud to the possession, are questions of law, to be determined as they arise, by a careful application of it to the particular case. There are certain cases perfectly settled, as coming within the description of constructive fraud: for instance, if A. sells goods absolutely to B., and yet B. permits the vendor to remain in possession and use the goods as before, though such sale was bona fide, and a valuable consideration as for money, or the payment of a debt; and afterwards A. sells the goods, or they are taken in execution, such sale or execution will be good against B.; for it is wholly inconsistent with the nature of the transaction, that after an absolute sale from A. to B., that A. should keep the goods, and use them as his own (3 Coke, 80; 2 Bulst. 218; 2 Term R. 585; Id. 594; Id. 587; 3 Esp. 54); the law therefore avoids such sales as fraudulent, preferring the title of him who makes a real purchase or lawful seizure, and takes possession, to his, who, though his purchase was honest, yet did not carry it into effect, but permitted the vendor to hold out the property as his own, and thereby deceive mankind into a belief that they were trusting to something real. The cases decided on this principle are innumerable; nor is it enough that the parties to such a transaction effect a nominal transfer, or color the sale by appearances of acting upon and executing the bargain and sale agreeably to the terms, if in truth and fact no real possession is taken, and no fair and reasonable execution of the sale, or transfer, of whatever nature, or for whatever purposes it may pretend to answer, is designed or effected. It may seem harsh to say, that a bona fide sale shall be deemed fraudulent. In general, where sales are made, and the vendor continues in possession, they are not bona fide, but fraudulent, in fact; that is, designed to cover the property; but the law is the same, where there is a valuable consideration and a good intent, if thereby third persons, as purchasers and creditors, are, or are liable to be drawn in and deceived; this is constructive or legal fraud —not inferred from the intent of the parties, but from the nature and consequences of the act. This principle of the common law, (for the statutes against fraudulent conveyances are merely in affirmance of it,) has been applied to the case of executions and seizures under them. There are cases establishing this position, that if one creditor obtains a judgment and issues execution, and takes the goods of his debtor on the fi. fa., and there voluntarily rests, if another takes out an execution and seizes the same goods, and proceeds to sell them, he shall be preferred who last seized and sold. This is so held upon the most obvious reasons of justice and policy—it is held to be fraudulent in law. A creditor who sues and gets judgment and issues execution against his debtor, acts wholly inconsistently with all his legal rights and his prior conduct, if, after seizing the goods, he suspends, or assents to the suspension of an actual sale for the satisfaction of his debt; his conduct is equally hostile to the debtor, if he takes the goods and keeps them locked up, and to other creditors, if he permits them to remain with the owner, to be used as before; it is plain, that his only object in levying his execution was to gain a preference, without in fact proceeding to execution. This the law will not permit, for many obvious reasons. In the first place, if a creditor may issue his execution, and then hold a preference, without proceeding to a sale, he may thereby completely fetter the property, of whatever amount: he may equally ruin the debtor, and prevent other creditors from obtaining their just rights; for while goods are held under one execution, and while that has a lawful preference, no other execution seizing the same goods can be executed. 4 Term R. 640. Again, if the creditor may, by a mere delivery of his execution first, and seizure, without going further, gain a preference over all subsequent process, this would in effect be giving to the first judgment a priority in case of goods; for where is the difference, whether a second creditor is defeated and delayed by a first execution not executed, or by a judgment on which no execution has been issued. The statute has declared, that in the case of chattels, the first execution shall have priority; but if that execution is not pursued, it is a plain fraud on the act, and ought to have no other preference than the judgment itself: and lastly, if the goods are only seized and left in possession of the debtor, this gives rise to all those consequences, to a certain extent, for which sales are avoided by innocent purchasers and creditors, where the vendee has left the property with the vendor: he uses them as his own—he gains credit, is trusted on that account; and perhaps the prospect of the fund, which apparently belongs to him, may induce the creditor to forego other means of obtaining satisfaction. In short, there seems the utmost wisdom and equity in the common law, which uniformly holds that a second fi. fa. shall be preferred to a first not carried into execution;

but here, as in every other case depending on the common law, great care must be observed to apply it correctly: that whilst the principle is recognised, we are certain the case comes under it. The question is, what is such a delay of execution, or what such a possession of the property by the defendant, as will constitute it fraudulent and void against a later fi. fa? Where the plaintiff manifests a desire to pursue his execution, or where, in other words, the delay, or the allowing the defendant to hold possession of the goods, results from the officer alone, I should be sorry to lay it down, that a later fi. fa., coming to another officer, should for that reason, be preferred; where the executions are in the hands of the same officer, no dispute on this subject—that is of laches in the officer—can often occur, for he will be equally delinquent in regard to all. There may possibly be also other circumstances intervening, which would form a reasonable ground upon which to hold a preference once gained, though some delay on the part of the plaintiff, or the defendant has been left some time in possession: these will be judged of as they arise, making all allowances for the peculiar circumstances of the parties, the state of society, the usages of the country, and the obstructions of a legal kind, retarding or entangling the parties in their pursuit of justice. But there must be no designed or intentional delay of execution: but where an execution is taken out, and the party who issues it either directs it not to be executed till a certain time, or until further orders, or assents to, or approves of the property continuing in the possession of the debtor as before, beyond the time reasonably required for the sale of it; if another execution comes to the same officer, or to another during the orders for suspension, or after the goods have continued more than a reasonable time in the possession of the defendant, with the plaintiff's approbation, I make no hesitation to say, the law is and ought to be, that the second execution gains the preference, and either the same officer or another may go on to execute it and pay the moneys to the second creditor; and so a third may come in and gain the preference over the second. But what is a reasonable time for making execution? This will often vary with circumstances—a week or ten days—or so much as would enable the officer to give sufficient notice of the sale after the seizure, would be allowed; but in general this is the affair of the officer, and though he should give more than was necessary, yet if not with the assent of the plaintiff, a subsequent execution coming in would not prejudice the first creditor's execution: it is where the execution of the writ is procrastinated by the connivance or privity of the party, and in the interim another execution comes, that he loses his preference. Taking these principles for a guide, what doubt can remain in this case? Here the plaintiffs took out a fi. fa., which was levied under their own eyes—the property could have been sold in twenty-four hours; they not only assent but approve of the delay of execution and permit the party to keep the possession as before, for a whole year, and for aught that appears, would never have executed it. In the mean time, the United States issue execution, and seize on these goods in the possession of the defendants. It is clear that this delay was not from the sole act of the officer; no steps were taken to compel the execution; on the contrary, it is expressly stated, that they approved of his suspending execution, and leaving the property, with the defendants in the first action. This then, was an execution, fraudulent in law as against the second. The party who sued it out did not enforce it; it was merely nominal; it did not operate, nor was intended to operate according to its purport: the judgment remained unexecuted, and as much so as if no fi. fa. had issued, and as against the second fi. fa. should have no preference. We have been pressed with the decisions of the state courts. I feel the utmost deference for their great equity and correct principles; but I am not satisfied that the question has been so fully settled as has been represented: no printed case is produced. Some accounts are given of an unsatisfactory kind of opinions, and a general understanding on this head; but I cannot collect from any decision in the supreme court of this state, that it has been solemnly settled as law, that a first creditor may sue out an execution—seize the goods—leave them in possession of the debtor, and consent to and approve of their remaining there an indefinite time. It is to this extent, the law has been stated as understood in Pennsylvania. But that cannot be so; for it goes to establish this monstrous proposition, that the first execution creditor may seize the whole property, and under cover of it hold it for any length of time, locked up against the claims of all others. According to this doctrine, an execution for $1,000 may hold property worth $10,000 for an indefinite time. It is well known, that the sheriff always seizes the whole, and makes an inventory, affixing a small value upon the goods levied on; so that the debtor cannot dispose of any of them, nor can any other creditor satisfy his execution, whilst the first levy subsists. In order, however, to get over this difficulty and its consequences, it was suggested, that in Pennsylvania there was a practice understood to be law, that when a second or later fi. fa. came into the hands of another officer, he might seize the same goods taken on the prior execution or executions, make an inventory, and return them, subject to the prior levy. If he could go no further, it is obvious the difficulty is not removed; for the first creditor may not be hastened by this; but the practise was represented as authorising the officer who levied "subject to the prior execution, to take the goods into his own possession, and to sell them on the second or later writ; and after paying over the moneys due on the first executions, to retain the residue on that under which the goods were sold." This has been denied to be the law of Pennsylvania. Certainly there is no statute which authorizes it; and I make no doubt, if such instances have occurred, they were the result of accommodation, or acquiesced in from mistake of the law—a mere inadvertency; for nothing is clearer to my apprehension, that while the first seizure is in full legal force, that is, as long as the first execution remains upon it, and the property is in the supposed or actual custody of the first officer—any seizure or sale of it by a second officer would be tortious and void. Trover would lie against him, or against a purchaser with notice. It is said by Buller, J., in 4 Term R. 640, that it had been resolved by Holt, C. J., "that goods being once seized and in custody of the law, they could not be seized again by the same or any other sheriff." He cites Holt, 634; 1 Show. 174. The law supposes—so is the command of the writ, and so, if the officer does his duty, is the fact,—that all the goods seized are taken into his immediate and actual custody for sale: he returns them, if not sold "in his hands pro defectu emptorum." They are therefore not liable to any other process so as to be sold by such subsequent process, before the first is executed. The law is, that the officer who seizes must sell, and a venditioni goes to him for that purpose, though there is a method by distringas of compelling a sheriff out of office to assign the goods over to the sheriff in office; but this is for the benefit of the creditor, who has a lien by the seizure.

I admit, that by the delivery of the second fi. fa. the surplus goods are bound to answer that debt, and so all subsequent executions in order of delivery: and after the first is executed, if any goods remain, they, as the debtor's property, may be seized and sold to satisfy the subsequent creditor. But after the first seizure, no other can be made on the same goods, until the first execution is satisfied, or otherwise becomes void by the laches of the party; and then the writ, which was delivered after, may be executed upon the same goods by seizure and sale, if they remain in the actual possession or power of the party. The only question in this case is, whether the first levy or seizure really exists in law, or stands in the way of the second writ, issued by the United States. I am of opinion, from the facts stated in this case, that it does not. The plaintiff assented to and approved of the execution remaining unexecuted, and the goods, with his assent and approbation, were left in the possession of the debtor, as before; and that, too, for many months, without any apparent difficulty, or any necessity for the delay. I am of opinion, that any suspension of the execution, by the voluntary interference, or even voluntary delay of the creditor is a waiver of his priority: he loses the benefit which the law confers on the writ first delivered; and if a second fi. fa. comes in during this suspension, and finds the property in the hands of the debtor, that second writ obtains the preference, and is in law the writ first delivered; inasmuch as the other became fraudulent and void, being merely colorable so far as respected an actual execution.

In the case of Bradley v. Wyndham (Anno, 1743) 1 Wils. 44, the plaintiff got out an execution and a warrant to a bailiff to execute it, who on the 14th of May, did make a seizure, but it appearing that the plaintiff's attorney told him to use defendant kindly, and not to take any of his household goods, in consequence of which the bailiff made a mere nominal seizure, leaving defendant in full possession. On these facts a second fi. fa. which came out six days later, and on which the goods were seized and sold, was supported, the jury holding the first fraudulent, and the court refused to set aside the verdict. In that case the debt was bona fide, and the judgment and execution also; but the plaintiff lost his preference by delaying the execution, and leaving the goods in possession of the debtor. In West v. Skip (Anno, 1749) 1 Ves. Sr. 245, 246, Lord Hardwicke held that an elegit lost its preference, as against the assignees of a bankrupt, the plaintiff having left the goods in the possession of the debtor; his words are, "for the sisters on the elegit do not take possession of the goods, but leave them absolutely with the Harwoods, the question therefore arises, whether by this clause (21 Jac. I., 19,) they are not excluded, being either a plain consent, or great laches:" he then adds, "and it holds more strongly against a creditor by execution than any other, for if a creditor by fi. fa. seizes the goods of the debtor, and suffers them to remain long in the debtor's hands, and another creditor obtains a subsequent judgment and execution, it has been determined often, that it is evidence of fraud in the first creditor, and the goods in the hands of the debtor remain liable." In Smallcomb v. Buckingham, 1 Salk. 320, and in several other books, all the reports agree in the court's laying down this position: If two executions come to a sheriff on same day, he should execute the one first delivered; yet if he execute the second, the sales will be good, and the second creditor will be entitled to the money—but the first creditor may have his action against the sheriff; yet, say the court, this action may be defeated, if the sheriff can show that there were laches, or designed delay on the part of the first execution creditor. In Rice v. Serjeant (1703) 7 Mod. 37, 38, which case has never been denied, the law is put in so many words: "A man has a judgment for a just debt against A. and takes out a fi. fa., and gets the sheriff to seize the goods, but would not let him proceed further: B. who has also a judgment for a just debt against A., takes out a fi. fa. against him, and the question whether he could seize on the same goods, and Per Cur. he may, for the former was a fraudulent execution, and the sheriff might very well return nulla bona on the first execution." The case here puts it, that the first plaintiff would not let the sheriff proceed further: that can only be understood to mean that he voluntarily suspended or stayed proceedings, for it would have been out of the power of the plaintiff to have prevented the sheriff from selling if he had chosen so to do.

There can be no question that the common law is such as is laid down in these cases. In Pennsylvania, no doubt, some relaxation has been indulged, but I believe the law has not been altered, no solemn decision on the very point brought forward in this case has been given. In Chancellor v. Phillips [supra], cited from a note at the bar, it was decided in the supreme court, that leaving the goods with the debtor, was fraudulent as against bona fide purchasers from the debtor, and that such purchasers should be protected against the execution creditor and sheriff. This was going nearly the length of my opinion in this cause. If the creditor by execution, loses his lien by delay, and suffering the property to remain with the debtor, as against a subsequent purchaser from the debtor, I see not why he may retain it under the same circumstances against a bona fide seizure on a second execution; a purchaser of the debtor has equal means of notice of the lien, as the second execution creditor; for the judgment and execution being of record, are as much accessible to the one as the other: and though the subsequent purchaser pays money, it may be that the second execution creditor's debt arose in consequence of trusting to the apparent property of the debtor, and his apparent ability to proceed in business: and though it should happen that the debt of the last execution creditor had arisen before that of the first, still he might have suffered it to rest, or found other means of satisfaction, after the execution of the first creditor was levied, from perceiving the property to remain with the debtor, and therefore supposing either that no seizure existed, or that the debt was satisfied.

In the same case of Chancellor v. Phillips, Mr. Ch. Justice Shippen, is reported to have said, that the usage in favour of the debtor's possession after a fi. fa. had been principally restricted to furniture, from motives of humanity. This was evidently frittering down the usage to a mere nothing;—nor do I perceive the reason of this exception in favour of furniture. But how long may this permission continue? Certainly there must be some limit. In short, I believe the state courts will endeavour to get rid of this inconvenient and irregular usage, as fast as possible. I am sure that the ancient common law is the best, and safest, and plainest rule for us all. It is better for creditor and debtor, for the officer and the public, that judgments and executions should be executed, and that if one creditor delays, the next may come in and be paid.

Upon the whole, I feel satisfied, that while we lay down the rule in this case, we are pronouncing a judgment conformable to law, and which may in its consequences tend much to promote repose and security.

Case No. 14,851.

UNITED STATES v. COOK.

[2 Mason, 22.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Massachusetts. May Term, 1819.

APPEAL—RECORD—ISSUES OF FACT—NUL TIEL RECORD.

1. Where the issue in the district court is nul tiel record, and the court below adjudge, that the plaintiff has not produced the record, there can be no reversal of that judgment, unless the record, if any is produced, is contained in the record brought up on the writ of error to the circuit court.

2. The issue of nul tiel record is an issue of fact, and as such, no writ of error lies from the judgment of the district court, on that fact, to the circuit court, under the judiciary act of September 24, 1789, c. 20, § 22 [1 Stat. 84].

Error from the judgment of the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts. This was an action of debt on bond at common law, commenced before the said district court at the September term, 1817. The bond bore date on the 21st of February, 1815, and was given by the defendants as claimants of a certain brigantine called the Voader, for the agreed value of the same, she being then under a libel at the aforesaid district court, as subject to forfeiture, for the causes set forth in said libel, and the bond was given on the delivery of the vessel to the claimants, upon their petition, in pursuance of the provisions contained in the eighty-ninth section of the act of March 2, 1799 [1 Stat. 627], for "regulating the collection of duties on imports and tonnage." The defendants filed their plea, in bar, setting forth, among other things, as grounds of objection against the demand of the United States, the following facts and circumstances relative to the proceedings under the libel against the Voader. That while said libel was pending, it was agreed between the seizing officer and claimants, that the vessel should be estimated at the value of $1,600; and that a bond should be given for this sum under the before-mentioned section of the act of congress, with condition to abide the final decision of the court upon the libel aforesaid, etc., in common form; said bond being lodged with the proper officer of said court, in the nature of a stipulation, in pursuance of the provisions of the statute herein before referred to. That said libel or information was continued in said court from term to term, until the term thereof holden at Boston on the 12th September, 1815, whence it was no further continued, nor further proceedings had thereon in said court; that afterwards, to wit, at a term of said court, holden in June, 1816, the United States by their attorney, moved the said court in writing, for judgment on said bond, for the aforesaid agreed value of said vessel, and for costs. Whereupon the claimants, in answering said motion and shewing cause, why the same should not be granted, did set forth in substance as follows, viz.: That after the exhibition of said libel or information and claim, and after giving the bond aforesaid, they preferred to the district judge their petition for a summary hearing of the case, to the end that the forfeiture alleged might be remitted by the secretary of the treasury, in pursuance of the statute in such case provided; that a statement of the facts was accordingly afterwards transmitted by the district judge in due form to the secretary of the treasury. And that, on the 11th September, 1815, the said secretary did decide to remit said forfeiture in pursuance of the authority vested in him in such cases, on certain conditions, which were duly complied with by the claimants. That the remittitur was returned in due form, and filed in said district court, and that thereupon the said remission was, by order of said court, entered on the record, and that the said libel was thereafter no further continued in court, nor any further proceedings had thereon. All which the said claimants declared by their said plea or answer, that they were ready to verify, and prayed judgment of the motion of said attorney of the United States, etc.

The replication of the United States attorney to the foregoing plea, was, in substance, as follows, viz.: That before the presentment of the aforesaid petition for a remission of the forfeiture, or any decision thereupon, to wit, at the term of said district court, holden in March, 1815, a final judgment and decree of said court was duly rendered against said vessel and appurtenances as having been forfeited for the causes alleged in the libel, as would appear by the record thereof, and that the same decree was then in full force, etc. Wherefore the said attorney prayed for judgment on the bond, etc., with profert of the record.

The rejoinder of the claimants was, in substance, that before and until the remittitur of the secretary of the treasury was produced and exhibited in said court, and before and until it was entered on the record thereof, the said information or libel, and the claim of the defendants consequent thereon, were continued in said court from term to term, and at the time of said exhibition, and of the said entry were pending in said court; the rejoinder, concluding with a traverse of the fact, of there being any such record of a final judgment or decree, as that set forth in the replication.

Upon this plea of nul tiel record, the issue was joined by the United States attorney, in common form; and thereupon the said motion and proceedings were continued to the then next December term of said district court; when and where the said court did render an order or decree in the cause, in the following words, viz.: "After a full hearing of the cause upon the allegation and proofs, and the arguments of counsel, and due consideration thereof, it is ordered and decreed, that the said motion of the district attorney, for judgment on the bond for the agreed value of the said brigantine Voader be overruled." That thereupon the attorney of the United States claimed and entered an appeal from said judgment or decree to the circuit court then next to be holden in said district; at which said last mentioned court, and by the consideration of the same, the said appeal was dismissed as irregular and void, for want of lawful authority in said court to sustain the same. All which facts and circumstances were fully set forth in the defendants' first plea, to the action on the bond, at the district court, concluding with the usual averments as to identity of party, etc.

To this first plea of the defendants, there was a general demurrer on the part of the United States, and joinder by defendants.

2. The second plea in bar of defendants in this action on the bond, at the district court, was this, in substance, viz.: That before the making of the "writing obligatory, set forth in the writ, the said brigantine Voader had become forfeited to the United States, as set forth in the libel referred to in the first plea, and mentioned in the condition of the bond;" and that always from the time of executing said writing obligatory, the said Nathan Cook did "abide by the decision of the proper court of the United States, touching the said seizure." And after the executing the said writing obligatory, to wit, on the 11th September, 1815, the forfeiture of said brigantine was, upon the petition of the claimants, duly remitted by the secretary of the treasury, in conformity with the statute, etc., upon the payment of costs, etc.; which were duly paid to clerk, etc. Concluding with the parati sunt verificare, in the usual form.

The replication of the United States attorney to this second plea of defendants, was substantially this, viz.: That the said Nathan Cook did not abide by the decision of the proper court of the United States touching the said seizure; but that long before the said 11th September, 1815, when the said forfeiture mentioned in the plea is alleged to have been remitted by the secretary of the treasury, to wit, at a term of said district court, holden in March, 1815, a final judgment and decree of said court, upon said libel, was duly rendered against the said vessel and appurtenances; that the same had become forfeited, prout patet per recordum; and that the said judgment, or decree, was then remaining in full force, etc.

The defendants' rejoinder to this replication, was, "that before, and until the forfeiture of said vessel was remitted by the secretary, and until it was entered on the record of the said court that said forfeiture had been remitted as aforesaid," the said libel, and the claim of said Nathan consequent thereupon, were continued in said court from term to term, and at the time of the said remission, and entry thereof, were pending in said court; concluding with a denial of there being any such record of final judgment or decree, as that referred to in the replication; and with a verification in common form.

Surrejoinder of the United States, affirming the existence of such a record, with profert thereof, in common form; and upon this the defendants joined issue.

Upon these pleadings, the judgment of the district court was rendered in the following terms, to wit:

"And now all, and singular, the premises being seen, and by the court here fully understood, for that it seems to said court, that the plea aforesaid of the said defendants, by them first above pleaded in bar, is good and sufficient in law to bar, and preclude the said United States from having and maintaining their said action against them the said defendants; and for that the said United States have failed to produce the said record of a final judgment or decree, by them above in pleading alleged; therefore it is considered, that the said United States take nothing by their said writ," etc. [Case unreported.]

Mr. Blake, for the United States.

Gallison & Prescott, for defendants.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The only error now assigned at the bar is, that on the issue of nul tiel record the court below ought to have rendered a judgment, that the plaintiffs had perfected the record. There are two objections to this court's entertaining any question on this subject, which are equally fatal to the plaintiffs. In the first place, the judgment of the court below is that the plaintiffs failed to produce the record; and as no record was there produced, and none is contained in the transcript before this court, it is impossible for me to perceive that there was any error in the judgment in this point. If there had been a record produced, which the district court judicially held not to be the record pleaded, the error if any, in its judgment, could not be made apparent here, but by showing it on the record, in a bill of exceptions, or in some other regular manner. In the next place, the issue of nul tiel record was an issue of fact, although it was triable by the court; and the judicial act of 1789 (chapter 20, § 22), declares, that there shall be no reversal upon a writ of error upon the judgment of the district court for any error of fact. Upon both grounds, therefore, the judgment must be affirmed.

Case No. 14,852.

UNITED STATES v. COOK et al.

[1 Spr. 213.] [1]

District Court, D. Massachusetts. Oct., 1853.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—WRECKED GOODS—FORFEITURE—SEIZURE—INDICTMENT FOR RESISTING CUSTOMS OFFICERS.

1. If dutiable goods are wrecked, and strewn upon the shore, by force of the winds and waves, they are liable to duties only upon their value, as they lie upon the shore.

2. If worthless in that condition, they are subject to no duty.

3. To justify an officer in making a seizure of goods as forfeited, there must be reasonable ground to believe that some offence has been committed.

4. To subject a person to an indictment, under the statute of 1799, c. 22, § 71 [1 Stat. 678], for carrying away goods, alleged to be under seizure, a seizure must have been lawfully made, and possession taken and continued by the officer; and the accused must have carried the goods away forcibly, knowing them to be under seizure.

This was an indictment, containing four counts, founded on United States statute, March 2d, 1799, c. 22, § 71 (1 Stat. 678). The defendants were charged with "forcibly resisting, preventing, and impeding," custom-house officers and their assistants, in the execution of their duty. The different counts alleged, that Edwin Young, deputy-collector of Scituate, Tilden Hall, deputy-collector of Marshfield, and one William Young, their assistant, were resisted, prevented, and impeded, in the execution of their duty. It appeared from the evidence, that in March, 1853, the ship Forest Queen was wrecked on Scituate beach, with a foreign cargo, composed, among other articles, of rags in bales. The rags were strewn along the beach for miles, and being mixed with wool, and rock-weed, and other substances, and saturated with linseed oil, were of no value in that state. Many tons were picked up by various persons of Scituate, and being separated, with much labor, from foreign substances, and dried in the fields, were put up into bundles, for sale. Messrs. R. & R. Cook, two of the defendants, purchased large quantities of these rags from many persons, it being understood from Mr. W. P. Allen, the then deputy-collector at Scituate, that no duties were to be demanded for them. Shortly after this, Allen was removed from office, and Edwin Young was appointed in his place, who demanded duties on a parcel of rags belonging to the defendants, and on others stored in their loft. This demand was refused, and the rags, shortly afterwards, and in the daytime, were put on board the schooner Taglioni, a packet plying between Scituate and Boston. There they were seen by Young; and Hall testified that Young seized them, but told nobody of the seizure. The rags were afterwards, and in the absence of Hall and Young, taken from the packet; to this, on their return, they made no objection, and in their presence, the rags were put into wagons, and carried away by the defendants. The two deputy-collectors told nobody that the rags were seized, and Young made no objection to their being carried away. Hall testified, that he forbade their putting the rags into the wagons, but his evidence was not supported.

B. F. Hallett, Dist. Atty.

C. G. Davis and Seth Webb, Jr., for defendants.

SPRAGUE, District Judge, in the course of his charge, laid down the law substantially as follows:

To charge the defendants, the government must make out: 1st. That the officers were obstructed in the lawful discharge of their duty. 2d. That this was done by the defendants, forcibly. 3d. That the acts of force were done knowingly and intentionally. In order to justify the United States officers in seizing goods, probable cause must be shown for seizure. They must have reasonable cause to believe that some violation of the revenue acts has taken place. Salvage goods are liable to duty, if of any value. The rags in question were liable to duty, on the beach, if of value, but otherwise, if worthless. The duties, in such case, are to be assessed upon their value as they lay on the beach, and not on the enhanced value, given by subsequent labor. If these rags were worthless on the beach, and Young knew it, and knew that they were not liable to duty, then there was no probable cause of seizure. And further, in order to maintain this indictment, the government must prove an actual seizure of the rags by Young or Hall, and that the defendants knew of this seizure. They must also prove that the officer took the goods into his custody, and continued to hold them, until forcibly ousted by the defendants. If the seizure was abandoned by the officer, the Messrs. Cook had a right to take the rags. Or if the acts of the officer were such as to induce the defendants to believe, either that no seizure had been made, or, if made, that it had been abandoned; and if the defendants did really so believe, and acted in good faith, in removing the goods, then they were not guilty of the offence charged in this indictment. But, on the other hand, if the goods had been rightfully seized, and were in the custody of the officer, and the defendant, knowing these facts, forcibly and wilfully deprived him of the possession, and carried the goods away, then the indictment is maintained.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty, as to each of the three defendants.

UNITED STATES v. COOK COUNTY NAT. BANK et al.

[9 Biss. 55; 8 Reporter, 198; 25 Int. Rev. Rec. 266; 2 Nat. Bank. Cas. (Browne,) 128; 11 Chi. Leg. News, 344.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. Illinois. June, 1879.[2]

NATIONAL BANKS — INSOLVENCY — PRIORITY OF CLAIMS OF UNITED STATES—NATIONAL BANKING ACT—REPEAL BY IMPLICATION.

1. The United States has a prior lien over other creditors, in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent national bank in charge of a receiver, for the payment of all claims which the government has against such bank.

2. It was not intended that the provisions of the national banking act of 1864 [13 Stat. 99] should, as to banks organized under it, operate as a repeal or modification of the statutes which give the government a priority in the distribution of the estates of its debtors.

3. In the absence of express words of repeal, it is the duty of the court to give effect to the prior statute if it be possible to do so. Unless the repugnancy between the subsequent and prior statutes is so absolute and palpable as to be recognized at once without the aid of argument, it should be assumed that the legislative department intended both statutes to stand.

4. The government has a priority to secure the payment of postal and money order funds on deposit in a national bank when such bank becomes insolvent.

Demurrer to bill to establish priority.

The facts in this case as set up by the bill were, that the defendant bank was duly organized under the national banking laws, and was also designated as a depositary of money and funds of the United States. It became insolvent and suspended, with liabilities largely exceeding its assets. A receiver [Augustus H. Burley] was appointed and entered upon the discharge of his duties. At the time of its suspension the bank had on deposit a large amount of postal and money order funds, which were designated on the books of the bank as "Postal Funds" and "Money Order Funds" of the United States. These deposits had been made by John McArthur, postmaster at Chicago, under directions from the postmaster general. When the bank suspended, the treasury department held United States bonds to the amount of $100,000, deposited by the bank as security for its circulation. The bank having failed to pay its circulation, these bonds, in pursuance of the statute, were declared forfeited to the United States. A portion of them had, when the bill was filed, been sold, and it was the intention of the department to sell the remainder for the purpose of redeeming the circulating notes, and reimbursing the government for advances made on that account, which would leave a balance exceeding $30,000, or a sum sufficient to pay the debts due the United States on account of postal and money order funds deposited, as aforesaid, in the bank, by McArthur. In addition, the treasury department held a sum exceeding $30,000, belonging to the bank and which had been collected upon bills receivable and debts due the bank, in the course of settling up its affairs. A question arose whether the claims of the United States for moneys deposited by Postmaster McArthur were a preferred debt; that is, whether the United States should not distribute the funds and assets in its hands, equally among all the creditors of the bank, including the United States. Thereupon, this bill was filed for the purpose of having an account taken of the amount due the government, and for a decree directing the disposition of the funds belonging to the bank, in the control of the treasury department. On behalf of the bank and its receiver the contention was, that after reimbursing the United States for all sums advanced in redeeming the bank's notes, in excess of the proceeds arising from the sale of United States bonds deposited with the department as security for its circulation, the entire assets of the bank should be distributed pro rata, or equally; among all the creditors of the bank, including the United States.

Monroe, Bisbee & Ball, for defendants.

Before HARLAN, Circuit Justice; DRUMMOND, Circuit Judge; and BLODGETT, District Judge.

HARLAN, Circuit Justice (orally). Very early in the history of the government it was provided by statute, that debts due the United States, should be first satisfied in all cases where any revenue officer, or other person, thereafter becoming indebted to the government, by bond or otherwise, should become insolvent, or where the estate of any deceased person, in the hands of executors or administrators, should be insufficient to pay all the debts due from the deceased. The priority thus established was declared to extend not only to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy should be committed, but to those in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his debts, should make a voluntary assignment thereof, or in which the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor, should be attached by process of law. Act March 3, 1797 (1 Stat. 515). That was an act providing more effectually for the settlement of accounts between the United States and receivers of public money, but it was held to include all debtors to the United States, whatever their character and in whatever mode bound. U. S. v. Fisher, 2 Cranch [6 U. S.] 358; Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware, 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 102. In the act of March 2, 1799, regulating the collection of duties on imports, a like priority was given to the government as to claims upon bonds given for the payment of duties. 1 Stat. 676; Act 1790 (1 Stat. 169). The policy inaugurated by these statutes seems to have been steadily maintained by the government. Their substantial provisions have been preserved in the authorized revision of the statutes. Rev. St. § 3466 et seq.

It is insisted, however, by the defendants, that a different rule must be observed in the distribution of the assets of an insolvent national bank, in charge of a receiver appointed by the comptroller of the currency. They assume that the national banking act of 1864, the provisions of which are preserved in the Revised Statutes, placed all the creditors of a suspended national bank upon an equal footing, except that for any deficiency, in the proceeds of the sale of United States bonds pledged to secure the circulation of such bank, but for no other purpose, the government is given "a first and paramount lien upon all the assets of such association," and to that extent and no farther, is it entitled, in the distribution of assets, to priority above all other creditors. 13 Stat. 114.

This position, it is earnestly claimed, is sustained by section 50 of the act of 1864 (Rev. St. § 5236), which, among other things, provides: "From time to time, after full provision has been first made for refunding to the United States any deficiency in redeeming the notes of such association, the comptroller shall make a ratable dividend of the money so paid over to him by such receiver on all such claims as may have been proved to his satisfaction, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction; and as the proceeds of the assets of such association are paid over to him, he shall make further dividends, on all claims previously proved or adjudicated; and the remainder of the proceeds, if any, shall be paid over to the shareholders of such association, or their legal representatives, in proportion to the stock by them respectively held."

The specific contention is, that these provisions of the national banking act operate as a repeal or modification, pro tanto, of the statutes which give the government a priority in the distribution of the estates of those indebted to it.

We cannot yield our assent to any such construction of the statutes in question. The authorities cited by learned counsel do not justify the conclusion for which they contend. They only announce the general rule, recognized in all the books, "that a subsequent statute which is clearly repugnant to a prior one, necessarily repeals the former, although it does not do so in terms; and, even if a subsequent statute be not repugnant in all its provisions, to a prior one, yet, if the latter statute was clearly intended to prescribe the only rule that should govern in the case provided for, it repeals the former act. 'Leges posteriores, priores contrarias abrogant.'" Davies v. Fairburn, 3 How. [44 U. S.] 636; Wood v. U. S., 16 Pet. [41 U. S.] 362; Sedg. St. Law, 124, 125.

But it is equally well settled that repeals, by implication, are not favored by the courts. It must be presumed that the subsequent statute was passed with accurate knowledge upon the part of congress of the language and scope of previous legislation upon the same subject. If there was an intention to repeal or modify the prior statute, the further presumption must be indulged, that direct terms, for that purpose, would have been employed. In the absence of express words of repeal, it is the duty of the court to give effect to the prior statute, if it be possible to do so. Unless the repugnancy between the subsequent and prior statutes is so absolute and palpable as to be recognized at once, without the aid of ingenious argument, it should be assumed that the legislative department intended both statutes to stand. McCool v. Smith, 1 Black. [66 U. S.] 471; Sedg. St. Law, 127.

In view of these established rules of statutory construction, we are unable to concur in the suggestion that the national banking acts were intended to affect the priority given by previous statutes to the United States in the distribution of the estates of insolvent or deceased persons, or of corporations, indebted to the government. We include corporations because it is the settled construction of the original act of 1797, that corporations are included in the general designation of "persons" in that statute. U. S. v. State Bank, 6 Pet. [31 U. S.] 29. It is admitted by learned counsel that before the passage of the act of 1864, the government had a priority in all the cases specified in the acts of 1797 and 1799, whether the debtors were individuals or corporations. It is also admitted that such priority now exists, except in the cases of national banks for whom receivers have been appointed. But no sound reason has been assigned for a distinction in behalf of the general creditors of national banks, which, counsel concede, is not allowed in behalf of the creditors of other corporations, by whatever authority created, which are indebted to the United States. The words of the statute are broad, that "whenever any person indebted to the United States is insolvent * * * the debts due to the United States shall be first satisfied." The defendant bank is, therefore, embraced by the express language of the statute. The same considerations of public policy which suggested the act of 1797, exist as well now as when the act of 1864 was passed; and there is no such irreconcilable inconsistency between the two acts, or between the several provisions of the Revised Statutes upon the same subject, as requires us to assume that congress intended, by the last statute to surrender the government's priority in any case covered by the prior statute. The two acts may well exist together. The direction in the national banking act, as to a ratable dividend upon all claims against the bank, satisfactorily proven, or adjudicated in a court of competent jurisdiction, should be construed as applicable to all cases of suspended national banks in the hands of receivers, except, and except only, where the United States is a creditor of the bank, and, in such cases, the rule of priority declared in express words, and never directly, or by necessary implication, abrogated by congress, should be enforced. They, the prior and subsequent statutes, may thus be reconciled. We are unwilling, by mere judicial construction, to upset a long established policy of the government in reference to its claims against insolvent debtors, whether individuals or corporations.

Our attention has been called to the case of the National Bank v. Colby, 21 Wall. [88 U. S.] 613, where the supreme court of the United States, referring to the act of 1864, said: "As to the general creditors, the act evidently intends to secure equality among them in the division of the proceeds of the property of the bank." That case, it is clear, does not touch the precise point under consideration. It did not involve any question of priority as between the United States and the general creditors of the bank. The contest in that case was between the receiver, representing the general creditors, and a particular creditor, who had sought through adverse proceedings by attachment in a state court, to obtain a preference or advantage over other creditors. It was in reference to such a contest that the language cited was used.

The court is of opinion that the grounds assigned in support of the demurrer are not well taken—that the application by the United States of the balance on its hands, arising from the sale of bonds held as security for all public moneys deposited in the defendant bank, to the payment, pro tanto, of its claims for postal funds and money order funds, was in accordance with law, and that it may retain, out of any money under its control, belonging to the bank, a sum sufficient to discharge any lawful debt or claim it has against such bank, however it may have originated.

The demurrer is overruled, and unless the defendants present an answer, controverting the allegations of the bill, complainant's counsel may prepare such order as may be consistent with this opinion.

[NOTE. The defendants elected to stand by their demurrer, and from the final decree entered in accordance with the opinion above they took an appeal to the supreme court. The decree was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to sustain the demurrer and to dismiss the bill. 107 U. S. 445, 2 Sup. Ct. 561.]

Case No. 14,854.

UNITED STATES v. COOKE et al.

[4 Ben. 376;[1] 13 Int. Rev. Rec. 4.]

District Court, S. D. New York. Dec., 1870.[2]

COUNTERFEIT TREASURY NOTES—ASSISTANT TREASURER — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE — HONEST BELIEF.

1. The defendants, having presented at the sub-treasury of the United States certain seven-thirty notes of the United States, to be retired under the provisions of the act of April 12th, 1866 (14 Stat. 31), and having received the money therefor, it was afterwards claimed by the government that eighteen of them were counterfeits, and an action of assumpsit was brought by the United States against the defendants, to recover the moneys paid for such alleged counterfeits. Held, that, in order to entitle the United States to recover, it was necessary for them to prove that the eighteen notes were delivered to the United States by the defendants, that the United States paid their money for them, and that they were not issued by the United States under any act of congress.

2. Under the act of April 12th, 1866, the secretary of the treasury had no authority to retire or redeem any notes that were not in fact issued by the United States.

3. Under the provisions of the act of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. 218), the imprint, on the notes, of the signatures of the treasurer of the United States and the register of the treasury, and the statement showing the amount of interest accrued or accruing and the character of the notes, spoken of in the act, are to be taken as evidence of the lawful issue of such notes.

4. A delivery of notes to the assistant treasurer of the United States takes place when the notes are delivered to the proper officer, acting under the authority of the assistant treasurer.

5. As to the application of circumstantial evidence, if the jury should find any one circumstance clearly proved, which was inconsistent with a certain theory, that would be sufficient to destroy the theory entirely.

6. The receipt of the notes as genuine, by the assistant treasurer, would not bind the United States in any manner, if the notes were not in fact genuine.

7. The honest belief of the defendants in the genuineness of the notes would not constitute a defence.

[This was an action of debt by the United States against Jay Cooke, William J. Morehead, H. D. Cooke, H. C. Fahnestock, Edward Dodge, and Pitt Cooke, comprising the firm of Jay Cooke & Co., for money had and received by the defendants to and for the use of the United States, which money was received upon the occasion of their delivery to the plaintiff of certain treasury notes, believed by plaintiff to be valid, whereas they were afterwards discovered to be counterfeit.]

BLATCHFORD, District Judge (charging jury). This case, to which you have given such patient attention for thirteen days, filled, as some parts of it have been, with details not in themselves very interesting, and perhaps rather tedious, is one of the most important cases in which it can be the privilege of any citizen to take part either as judge, prosecuting officer, counsel for the defence, or juror, because it concerns deeply the interests of every man in the community. Every one of us, as a citizen of the United States, has an interest in seeing to it, that this immense mass of debt, which has been created by the government for the protection of our rights, our liberties, and our perpetuity as a nation, shall not be counterfeited, falsely issued, and palmed off upon the community, and even upon the subordinate officers of the government, in redeeming its indebtedness, imposing, in such case, on the government the necessity of resorting to actions, like the present one, for the purpose of recovering what may be its just due. The loss resulting from counterfeit paper of this kind must fall on some one in the community, and almost certainly on some party who is really entirely innocent of any complicity with the spurious issue. So, on the other hand, every citizen dealing, or liable to deal, in spurious articles of this description, is interested that no piece of paper shall be pronounced spurious which is, in reality, genuine. Therefore it is, that this case has been tried with so much care upon the part of the government, with so much patience on the part of the court and jury, and with such assiduous fidelity on the part of the counsel for the defence.

In the remarks which I shall have to make to you, I shall not detain you long. The claim which is made by the government I shall submit to you upon those counts of the declaration, in respect to each one of the eighteen pieces of paper, which are, in substance, to this effect—that, on a certain day named, one thousand dollars, and some additional amount, by way of interest, was obtained by the defendants, Jay Cooke & Co., from the United States, on the occasion of the defendants having delivered to the United States what purported to be a certain obligation of the United States, known as a seven-thirty note, and a coupon attached, for the principal sum of one thousand dollars, and certain interest, to wit, a note bearing seven and thirty one-hundredths per cent. interest per annum, and numbered so and so, of the series of seven-thirty notes issued June 15th, 1865, by the United States, together with an interest coupon, attached to said note, calling for interest to June 15th, 1868, which note, with such coupon attached, was, by the defendants, at the time they delivered it to the officer of the sub-treasury of the United States, professed to be, and by the plaintiffs was, when received by them, supposed to be, a genuine note of the United States, with a genuine coupon attached; and that, by the representations and inducement of the defendants, then and there practiced, the same was received by the United States, and their said officer, as a valid and genuine note, with the coupon attached, at the subtreasury of the United States; whereas, the note and coupon were, in fact, counterfeit, and neither of them had ever been executed or issued by the United States, their officers or agents, but had been forged and falsely made and uttered, and were no obligation whatever of or upon the United States, and were by them, to wit, by their said officer, received, under the belief created by such representations and inducement, that the said note and the coupon attached were good, and formed a valuable and adequate consideration for the money received by the defendants, which was retained from the plaintiffs after the discovery that the said note and coupon were counterfeit, whereof prompt notice was given to the defendants. Then follow the usual averments to constitute what is called, in the law, an action of assumpsit.

You will perceive that this declaration asserts three things, and those three things must every one of them be proven in favor of the United States, to entitle it to recover in this action; for, if any one of the three shall be found by you in favor of the defendants, the defendants will be entitled to your verdict. Those three things are these: First, that these eighteen pieces of paper, marked C, and called, throughout this trial, the C notes, are the ones alluded to in the declaration, and were delivered to the United States by the defendants; second, that the United States paid their money for them; and, third, that they were not issued by the United States under any act of congress.

The law under which these transactions took place, and of which you have heard so much, in the course of this trial, in connection with the redemption, retiring or withdrawal of the notes called seven-thirty notes, is the act of April 12th, 1866 (14 Stat. 31). The words of that act on this subject are very few. It authorizes the secretary of the treasury to dispose of any description of bonds authorized by the prior act of March 3d, 1865, "either in the United States or elsewhere, to such an amount, in such manner, and at such rates, as he may think advisable, for lawful money of the United States, or for any treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been, or which may be, issued under any act of congress, the proceeds thereof to be used only for retiring treasury notes, or other obligations, issued under any act of congress." This is the simple provision under which the retiring of the seven-thirty notes took place. The authority it conferred upon the secretary of the treasury, and the subordinate officers of the treasury department, was solely to retire treasury notes issued under some act of congress. If they were not issued under some act of congress, they were not within the lawful powers delegated to the secretary of the treasury by the act of 1866. The entire matter is regulated by statute; and, if these notes were in fact not issued under an act of congress, there was no authority on the part of the secretary of the treasury or of any other officer, high or low, not even the president of the United States himself, to retire or redeem them. The law-making power is the omnipotent power, in that respect, under the constitution of the United States; and, congress having declared that the only notes which could be retired were those issued under an act of congress, no other notes could be so retired.

There are two other statutes to which I must refer in this connection. The notes in question here, both those marked K, and alleged to be genuine, and those marked C, and alleged to be counterfeit, purport to be issued under an act of congress passed March 3d, 1865 (13 Stat. 468). All of the notes, thirty-six in number, the eighteen marked K and the eighteen marked C, bear date June 15th, 1865, and belong to what is known, in the parlance of dealers in government securities, as the second issue of seven-thirty notes. This act of March 3d, 1865, which was the authority for the issue of these notes, if they be genuine, contains generally these provisions—that the secretary of the treasury is authorized to borrow so much money, and to issue therefor treasury notes, in such form as he may prescribe, redeemable so and so, to be of such and such denominations, interest to be payable semi-annually, the rate, when not payable in coin, not to exceed seven and three-tenths per centum per annum, and the rate and character of the interest to be expressed on such bonds or treasury notes. Then it provides that he may dispose of any of these obligations, as he may think advisable, for coin or other lawful money of the United States, or for treasury notes or other obligations issued under any act of congress, and may issue treasury notes authorized by the act in payment for any requisitions for materials or supplies for the government. The third section of the act provides, that all the provisions of the act of June 30th, 1864 (which was the act under which the first series of seven-thirty notes was issued), in respect to forms, inscriptions, devices, and the printing, attestation, sealing, signing, and counterfeiting thereof, with such others as are applicable, shall apply to the obligations issued under this act of 1865.

This remits us to the third statute to which I shall refer, and that is the act of June 30th, 1864 (13 Stat. 218), in respect to the forms of the notes and the inscriptions and devices on them. This act of 1864 contains the general provision, that the secretary of the treasury may issue these treasury notes, bearing this rate of interest, seven and three-tenths per cent., and that he may dispose of them upon the best terms he can, for lawful money. Then, at the close of the sixth section, occurs a provision, that the treasury notes authorized by the act to be issued by the secretary of the treasury "shall be in such form as the secretary shall direct, and shall bear the written or engraved signatures of the treasurer of the United States and the register of the treasury, and shall have printed upon them such statements, showing the amount of accrued or accruing interest, and the character of the notes, as the secretary of the treasury may prescribe; and shall bear, as a further evidence of lawful issue, the imprint of the seal of the treasury department, to be made under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, as before directed." This provision is made applicable, by the act of 1865, to the sealing and signing of the notes of the second series; and it requires, as a further evidence of the lawful issue of the notes—the genuine notes—those in fact issued—that they shall bear the imprint of the seal of the treasury department, to be made under the direction of the secretary of the treasury. The use of the expression, "as a further evidence of lawful issue," necessarily intends that what has been just prescribed in respect to the imprint of the signatures of the treasury and the register, and to the statement showing the amount of interest accrued or accruing and the character of the notes, shall be taken as evidence of lawful issue.

On the point of the notes having printed upon them statements showing the amount of interest accrued or accruing, you will recollect that each note was issued with five coupons. The principal was payable in three years; and, the interest being payable semi-annually, five coupons were attached to each note, representing five instalments of interest, while the sixth instalment was to be payable without a coupon, when the principal should be payable, on the presentation of the note.

As I have said to you, there are three questions here involved—first, the reception of the notes marked C, by the government, from Jay Cooke & Co.; second, the payment therefor, by the government, to Jay Cooke & Co.; and third, whether the notes, if they were received from Jay Cooke & Co., had been previously issued by the government. The first two questions I shall treat as one, they having been so treated by the counsel; and that is, whether the transaction alleged took place in fact between the officers of the sub-treasury here, and Jay Cooke & Co., in respect to these notes marked C. On that subject I have no instructions to give you, except to say that it is a simple question of fact for your determination. You have heard the evidence and the discussions of counsel upon that branch of the case. There is no question of law involved in it. It is for the government to satisfy you, by preponderating evidence, that these C notes were, as is claimed in the declaration, received at the sub-treasury here, by the proper officer there, from some person representing Jay Cooke & Co., and were paid for by the United States to some person representing Jay Cooke & Co., in money or other valuable consideration that was the property of the United States, representing the face of the notes and the accrued interest thereon. It is simply a question of fact, and on that point I charge you, in accordance with the defendants' request, that, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they must show that the eighteen notes produced on the trial, and marked C 1 to C 18, were the identical notes which were delivered by the defendants to the assistant treasurer of the United States. I charge you, further, that a delivery to the assistant treasurer of the United States takes place, when the notes are delivered to the proper officer acting under the authority of the assistant treasurer.

I am also asked to instruct you, that, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they must also show that the eighteen notes marked C 1 to C 18, were delivered to the assistant treasurer between the 20th of September and the 9th of October, 1867. The counts in the declaration are to the effect, that the first one of these notes, No. 68,446, was delivered on the 21st of September, and the last one on the 8th of October. Therefore, the dates stated in this request are according to the averments in the declaration, if the notes were ever received at all. There is no evidence on the subject as to when they were received, except as to times between the dates named in the request; but, the government must satisfy you that the declaration is proved, and that the C notes were received between those dates.

I am also requested to charge that, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to recover, they must further prove that the money paid to the defendants for the notes was the money of the United States. That is true.

I shall now pass to the other branch of the case, and that is, whether these C notes were issued by the United States; because, if you find that, in point of fact, these C notes were not issued by the United States, then the plaintiffs are entitled to recover, provided you also find that these C notes are the identical notes delivered to the government by Jay Cooke & Co., and for which the government gave to Jay Cooke & Co. the money alleged in the declaration. As has been remarked by the district attorney, the ultimate question in this case is, not whether the C notes are spurious or genuine, or whether the K notes are spurious or genuine. That is a collateral question, and the whole investigation into the question whether the K notes are genuine, and whether the C notes are spurious, has been gone into as bearing upon the question, whether the C notes were ever issued by the United States.

I shall call your attention to some matters in connection with each branch of the question in regard to the issue of the notes. There is a class of evidence on this subject aside from any comparison between the C notes and the K notes. There is also a class of evidence that arises from a comparison of the C notes with the K notes, in reference to the question whether the two sets of notes were or were not printed from the same plates; because, it is an argument in the case, urged by the government, and the challenge is accepted by the defence, that, if the C notes are shown to be spurious, and not to have been printed from any plates which the government of the United States used in printing notes which it issued, the presumption arises that the C notes were never issued by the United States.

There are four points of view from which the genuineness or spuriousness of these notes may be considered. The C notes and the K notes are both of them spurious, or the C notes and the K notes are both of them genuine, or the C notes are genuine and the K notes are spurious, or the K notes are genuine and the C notes are spurious. In considering the question, it undoubtedly is of assistance toward arriving at a determination whether one of two things is spurious, to be satisfied first whether the other of the two is genuine. In other words, it will assist you in determining whether or not the C notes are spurious, if you can determine first whether or not the K notes are genuine; because, you may be entirely satisfied that, if the K notes are genuine, the C notes must be spurious. In other words, if you arrive at the conclusion that the K notes are genuine notes, it may follow in your judgment, as a necessary conclusion, that the C notes are spurious. As I have understood the course of the defence, from the evidence and the summing up, the deduction sought to be drawn from the evidence is, that the C notes are genuine notes, and were issued by the United States; but I have not understood the position to be taken by the defendants, that the K notes are spurious notes. It is, however, for you, on the evidence, to pass upon this question.

As I said before, it may be that, if you are satisfied that the K notes are genuine notes, you will conclude that the C notes also cannot be genuine. On this point you will recollect the testimony of Mr. Casilear, when he was first on the stand, and afterwards when the books were produced, showing the commencement of the printing of the second series of notes on the 5th of March, 1865, two days after the passage of the act authorizing their issue. The effect of his testimony, if it is to be believed, is, that these notes of the second series were printed from three plates of four subjects each, plate 1, plate 2, plate 3, each with four subjects, that is, four notes on each plate. For the purpose of illustrating this matter, I have put into a tabular form what is testified to by one of the witnesses in regard to the check letters which he finds on the C notes and the K notes, it being assumed, for the purposes of this table, that the K notes were printed from three plates of four subjects each. The first plate, or plate 1, I throw entirely out of view, because none of the thirty-six notes appear to have been printed on plate 1. Of the K notes, seventeen appear to have been printed from the second plate, and one on the third plate. All of the C notes appear to have been printed from the second plate. The table shows plate 2 with four notes on it, and plate 3 with only one note on it, and that one the first note at the top of the plate. According to the testimony of the witnesses, the system of check letters adopted and used was this: The first note on the plate was lettered A, the second B, the third C, and the fourth D. But, with three plates of four notes each, each plate having these four letters, and these alone, on its four several subjects, it would be impossible to tell, from the face of a note, upon which one of the three plates a note with a given check letter was printed. Therefore, for the purpose of enabling it to be told on which one of the three plates a given note was printed, a small A was engraved underneath each one of the four several letters A, B, C, D, on the first plate; a small B was engraved underneath each one of the four several letters A, B, C, D, on the second plate; and a small C was engraved underneath each one of the four several letters A, B, C, D, on the third plate. Locating the eighteen K notes and the eighteen C notes according to their large and small check letters, by the arrangement which I have just explained, it appears that seven of the K notes have the check letter A with a small B under it, and were, therefore, printed from the first subject on the second plate. Four of the K notes have the check letter B with a small B under it, and were printed from the second subject on the second plate. Three of the K notes have the check letter C with a small B under it, and were printed from the third subject on the second plate. Three of the K notes have the check letter D with a small B under it, and were printed from the fourth subject on the second plate. One of the K notes has the check letter A with a small C under it, and was printed from the first subject on the third plate.

I turn now to the C notes. Every one of them has either the check letter A with a small B under it, or the check letter B with a small B under it, there being eleven with A and a small B, and seven with B and a small B. The same system of interpretation that was applied to the K notes shows, that the eleven C notes which have A and a small B were printed from the first subject on second plate, and that the seven C notes which have B and a small B were printed from the second subject on a second plate. But there is nothing to indicate that the plate from which the C notes were printed had upon it any but the two subjects. There is, however, incontrovertible evidence that the K notes must have been printed from a second plate of four subjects, because there are notes marked K, with the several check letters A, B, C, and D, and a small B under each of them, such small B indicating a second plate, and the four large letters A, B, C, and D indicating that such plate had upon it four subjects.

There is another view of this matter, which, to your minds, may corroborate the testimony of Mr. Casilear, that, in point of fact, these K notes were printed from plates of four subjects each. You will recollect the testimony as to the notes being numbered consecutively in the treasury department. It is a fact, and is shown by this table, that every one of the K notes which was printed from the first subject on a plate bears an odd number, that is, a number terminating with 1, 3, 5, 7, or 9; that every one of the K notes which was printed from the second subject on the plate bears an even number, that is, a number terminating with 0, 2, or 6; that every one of the K notes which was printed from the third subject on the plate bears an odd number, that is, a number terminating with 5 or 7; and that every one of the K notes which was printed from the fourth subject on the plate bears an even number, that is, a number terminating with 2, 4, or 6. Now, it is quite evident, that, if you have a plate of three subjects only, this uniformity in respect to the notes printed from the first and third subjects on the plate bearing always odd numbers, and those printed from the second subject on the plate bearing always even numbers, could not be preserved, in a system of consecutive numbering; because, you would require for each subject, alternately, even and odd numbers. Thus, beginning with number 1 for the first note printed from the first subject on the plate, the second note printed from that subject would be numbered 4, the third note 7, and so on. The notes printed from the second subject would be numbered 2, 5, 8, and so on; and those printed from the third subject would be numbered 3, 6, 9, and so on. These considerations apply to the question as to whether it is possible that the K notes could have been printed otherwise than from plates of four subjects each.

As to the C notes, every one of them which has the check letter A. and thus purports to be printed from the first subject on a second plate, bears, as do the K notes which have the check letter A, an odd number, that is, a number terminating with 1, 3, 5, 7, or 9; while every one of the C notes which has the check letter B, and thus purports to be printed from the second subject on a second plate, bears, as do the K notes which have the check letter B, an even number, that is, a number terminating with 0, 2, 4, or 6. There is, therefore, this similarity between both sets of notes—every note which has the check letter A bears an odd number, and every note which has the check letted B bears an even number. There are none of the C notes which have a check letter C or a check letter D. This shows that none of them purport to have been printed from the third or the fourth subject on a plate.

I shall allude to but one matter connected with each of the two classes of evidence to which I have referred. I shall first speak of a matter which struck my mind with great force, as the evidence in respect to it was given on the trial, but which has not been alluded to by the counsel in summing up. Mr. Casilear testifies to the fact (and it is readily seen by an inspection of the notes themselves) that, on each one of the four K notes which are printed from the second subject on the second plate, namely, K1, K9, K15, and K18, the loop of the letter p in the word "Spinner"—the engraved signature of the treasurer of the United States, which is required by law to be put on the notes—is brought down in such a manner that the dark line of the loop, as it passes through the border composed of stars, goes through the rays of a star, and divides them into two parts; whereas, on each one of the seven K notes which are printed from the first subject on the second plate, namely, K2, K5, K6, K8, K10, K16, and K17, the loop of the letter p in the word "Spinner" does not cut or divide the rays of a star, but, on the contrary, the whole of such rays are clearly visible within the loop. There is a difference, therefore, in the position of the loop of such letter p, with reference to the rays of the star, between the K notes printed from the first subject on the second plate, and the K notes printed from the second subject on the second plate. Mr. Casilear also states, and it is plainly to be seen, that on every one of the eighteen C notes, whether it has the check letter A or the check letter B, the rays of the star are seen entire inside of the loop of such letter p, and are nowhere cut by the loop. It is for you to say what deductions you will draw from these facts, in respect to the question whether the C notes and the K notes were printed from the same plate or set of plates, irrespective of the question as to which of them are of the genuine issue.

On the class of evidence which is directed to a comparison between the two sets of notes—what is to be seen in making such comparison, and what deductions are to be drawn from what is seen, when the facts are presented in a clear and distinct form and collated—I shall allude to but one point. It is one which was commented upon by the district attorney. It has a bearing on the question, which, as I stated, you may decide to determine before approaching the subject of the issuing of the notes—the question as to whether the K notes are or are not genuine; because, if it is established to your satisfaction that the K notes are genuine, you may, perhaps, be led the more quickly to the solution of the question as to the genuineness of the C notes.

It is testified, and the evidence is not contradicted, that every one of the K notes had appended to it, and forming a part of it, when it was issued by the treasury department, the five coupons to which your attention has been called, and that the coupons on each note were numbered severally 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 (and so numbered that number 1 should be cut off first, and the rest in succession, and number 5 last), and that each coupon was also numbered with the number of the note. The government has produced here, from the files of the department, the K notes which correspond in numbers with the C notes, and, in every case where any K note has not now attached to it coupons which formed an integral part of it when it was issued, the government has produced from the same files certain coupons which, it claims, make up, with the coupon or coupons now attached to the note, all the five coupons which ever belonged to it. One of the K notes has yet attached to it two coupons, others of the K notes have but one coupon attached, and still others have no coupon attached. Here are the notes and here are the coupons so produced—single coupons corresponding in numbers with the K notes and without duplicates; and it is testified that no duplicate coupons could be found, on searching, in the place where these coupons were found. Every one of the C notes produced has upon it the coupon numbered 5, and no one of the C notes has upon it any other coupon. The loose coupons so produced must be applied to the one or the other of these sets of notes, if they belong to the one or the other. Some loose coupons numbered 5 are produced. In every instance where one is produced, it is found that the K note which corresponds in number with the number on such coupon, has not now attached to it any coupon numbered 5. But no one of such loose coupons numbered 5 can be regarded as belonging to any C note, because every C note has now upon it a coupon numbered 5. Therefore, whatever other conclusion you may come to, it is perfectly clear, if there was to each note one and only one coupon numbered 5, that, as each of the C notes has upon it now a coupon numbered 5, the loose coupons numbered 5 which are now produced must have belonged to some other notes than the C notes. When the government produces certain notes which were issued with coupons, and produces also loose coupons found in its possession, and when, if you apply such loose coupons to the K notes, the C notes are left each with only one coupon and with four other coupons unaccounted for, it is for you to say, as bearing on the question of the genuineness of the C notes, what inference you will draw from any failure to account satisfactorily for the four coupons that are missing from the C notes. These considerations apply to the question of the genuineness of the K notes, as bearing, also, upon the question of the genuineness of the C notes.

In this connection you will recollect the testimony of Mr. Gray, who states, that, on all the K notes which have now appended to them a coupon numbered 5, he finds the positions of the seal and of the figure 5 on such coupon, relatively to each other, to be, in all cases, the same, by actual measurement. There is, by measurement, the same distance laterally between the figure 5 on every coupon numbered 5 that is now appended to a K note, and the projected line of the seal on such note. In regard to the C notes, Mr. Gray says, that, in the whole eighteen (each of them having appended to it a coupon numbered 5), there is, by measurement, the same distance laterally between every one of such coupons numbered 5 and the projected line of the seal on the note. But he also says, that the distance between the line of the seal and the figure 5, on the coupon numbered 5 on the K notes, is over one-quarter of an inch greater than the like distance is on the C notes. It is for you to say what conclusions you will draw from these facts. The rule of law in regard to the application of evidence of a circumstantial character, like much of that in the present case, is this: If, in respect to a certain theory, you find any one circumstance clearly proved that is utterly inconsistent with that theory, that fact is sufficient to destroy the theory entirely. If, in respect to any point of evidence that is of a circumstantial character, you are satisfied, by proof, of the existence of any one circumstance that is entirely inconsistent with any theory advanced on either side in regard to either one of these two sets of notes, that theory must necessarily be regarded as unsound. This rule applies to every branch of the case where the evidence is circumstantial.

The government has given certain evidence, by Mr. Meloy and Mr. Irwin, in respect to the sending out from the treasury department of certain notes which it claims were the K notes, with a view to show that such notes were in fact issued by the United States. Mr. Meloy, it is claimed, wrote the receipts and letters which accompanied seven of the notes, and sent out the receipts unsigned with the notes, and received back signed the receipts which are produced. Mr. Irwin, it is claimed, sent out receipts unsigned with all the rest of the notes except one, and received back such receipts signed. The note for which there is no receipt, is, it is said, one which was sent, with others, to a person whose name is given, in exchange for other notes which had inadvertently been issued to his order. The act of issuing the notes was, under the statute, a physical act. The notes may be printed in the department, from the genuine plates, and may be all ready to issue, and yet, if they are not in fact issued, they do not come within the statute. It is for the purpose of showing the physical act of issuing the notes, that the government has given the testimony to which I have referred. The United States are not bound to redeem any notes which were not in fact issued. There is no authority to retire the notes unless they were issued, as a physical fact. In addition to the evidence alluded to, the government has also given evidence in respect to the recording and numbering in a book, of every one of these notes, as it was issued—a book called the numerical register. It has also given evidence that no one of these notes that were issued was ever duplicated in number. Mr. Irwin states, that the whole number of seven-thirty notes of the second series, of the denomination of one thousand dollars, which was issued, was 186,272; that they were numbered consecutively from number 1 to number 180,272, both inclusive; that, as far as he knows, no duplicate number was ever issued; and that no duplicate numbers ever came back to the department except the eighty alleged counterfeits, of which the eighteen in question in this suit constitute a part. In this connection, as bearing upon the question of the genuineness of the K notes (which question, as I stated before, you may deem it proper to approach first, in the consideration of the subject), you will not lose sight of the inquiry which I put to one of the witnesses, when I asked him to examine the numbers on the K notes and see if he could discover any marks of those numbers having been tampered with, effaced, obliterated, or mutilated in any manner, and he said he could not.

I do not consider it necessary to detain you longer. It is for you to say whether any of these C notes were, in fact, passed to the government by the defendants, and paid for by the government with its money; and, if so, whether such notes were ever issued by the United States. In determining the question, as to the issuing of the C notes, a satisfactory conclusion as to whether such notes were printed from genuine plates, gotten up by the government will, undoubtedly, narrow the inquiry very much. A determination that such notes were printed from such genuine plates would lead to the conclusion, prima facie, that, if such notes got into circulation in the community, they were probably issued by the government; and thus the burden of proof would be thrown upon the government to show that they were not issued.

But, after all, the whole case comes back to the question, whether the notes marked C were ever issued by the government. Upon that question, I am requested by the counsel for the defendants to charge you, that "the burden of proving that the eighteen notes in question, marked C 1 to C 18, are not genuine obligations of the United States"—and by that must be understood obligations issued by the United States—"rests upon the plaintiffs, and, if the evidence be insufficient to establish the fact that such notes are not genuine obligations"—that is, obligations issued by the United States—"as aforesaid, the defendants are entitled to a verdict." With the alteration which I have thus made in the wording of the request, I charge you that the proposition is correct.

I am also requested by the counsel for the defendants to charge you, that, "in determining whether the eighteen notes in question are genuine obligations, the jury are entitled to take into consideration the fact, that said notes were received as genuine by the assistant treasurer in New York, and passed through his hands, and the hands of other officials connected with the treasury department." I decline so to charge. The allegation in the declaration is, that the notes were "supposed to be genuine," by the assistant treasurer and his officers. The language of the request assumes a fact which it is not for the court to assert, that is, that the notes were "received as genuine." The averment of the declaration, that the notes were supposed to be genuine, is the extent to which the court has any right to make an assumption as a matter of fact. But, even if the notes were "received as genuine" by the assistant treasurer, that would not bind the government of the United States in any manner, if the notes were, in fact, not genuine. Nevertheless, you have the right to take into consideration the facts proved on this subject, as to the manner in which these notes were received and handled at the subtreasury, and the manipulations they underwent at Washington, upon the question as to whether the C notes are spurious or genuine, as that question may bear upon the other question, as to whether they were or were not issued by the United States. But I decline to charge, as matter of fact, that the notes "were received as genuine;" and, even if it were so, it would not be of the slightest consequence in the case. Everything that took place is undoubtedly legitimate evidence, as bearing upon the question as to whether the C notes are genuine notes, in the sense in which I have used the word "genuine"—that is, printed from the same plates from which notes issued by the United States were printed.

I am also requested by the counsel for the defendants to charge you, that, if the defendants honestly believed the notes in question to be genuine obligations issued by the United States, and, so believing, and in good faith, passed them to the assistant treasurer of the United States, and the latter, under the like belief, and in good faith, received the notes, and paid for them, the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover, although the notes may not have been genuine obligations issued by the United States. I decline so to charge.

If you shall find for the defendants, on any one of the three propositions which I have stated, your verdict will be for the defendants; that is if the government has not satisfied you that the notes came from Jay Cooke & Co., you will find for the defendants; or, if the government has not satisfied you that it paid its money for the notes to Jay Cooke & Co., you will find for the defendants; or, if you shall find that these C notes were issued by the United States, you will find for the defendants. You must find, by a preponderance of evidence, in favor of the plaintiffs, on all three of the propositions, to entitle them to your verdict. If you shall so find, your verdict will be for $23,630.88.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs, for $23,630.88.

George D. Budd and John Clayton, for Jay Cooke & Co.

Before CADWALADER, District Judge.

Charles M. Colton, Asst. Surgeon U. S. Army, placed in the hands of Ira B. M'Vay & Co., bankers of Pittsburgh, a pay roll for collection, which M'Vay & Co. sent to Jay Cooke & Co., at Philadelphia. The latter firm received the money from Paymaster Riche, June 24th, 1863, transmitted it to M'Vay & Co., who paid it over to the supposed Colton. The order attached to the pay roll, and the endorsement were as follows:

"Paymaster Major Taggart, U. S. Army will please pay to Messrs. Ira B. M'Vay & Co., or order, the amount of the within roll. Charles M. Colton, Asst. Surgeon U. S. A.

"Pay to Jay Cooke & Co., or order. Ira B. M'Vay & Co.

"Jay Cooke & Co."

Sometime in the year 1869, it was discovered that the signature of Charles M. Colton was a forgery, and November 6th, 1869, suit was brought against Jay Cooke & Co. by the United States, to recover the amount of the pay roll.

On the trial the learned judge charged the jury that the fact of the forgery was fully established, but that the case did not differ from the familiar one where an individual paid a check on the faith of the signature of the drawer, which subsequently proved to be a forgery. Under the directions of the court the jury rendered a verdict for the defendants.

The counsel for the United States, having moved for a new trial, were heard January 16th, 1872, when the learned judge said that there were several interesting points in the case, which might be discussed, but it was only necessary to say that the delay of more than six years which had elapsed was fatal to the claim of the United States—that all the cases required the utmost diligence on the part of the drawee, a diligence analogous to that required in giving notice of the dishonor of commercial paper. In this case had an individual been the plaintiff, the action would have been barred by the statute of limitations. He therefore refused the motion for a new trial.

UNITED STATES v. COOKENDORFER.

[5 Cranch, C. C. 113.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1837.

RECOGNIZANCE—FORFEITURE—HOW REMITTED.

After the term in which a recognizance has been forfeited, in a criminal case, the court cannot remit the forfeiture; but the president of the United States can, under the act of congress of the 17th of June, 1812 [2 Stat. 752].

Scire facias on a recognizance dated January 12th, 1835, in the sum of $1,000, to be paid if Francis Dixon should not appear on the 13th of January, 1835, or should depart from the court without its leave. The recognizance was respited till March term, 1835, and from that term till November term, 1835, when Dixon was called, and, not appearing, his default, and that of his surety, the defendant [Thomas Cookendorfer], were entered of record, and this scire facias was issued thereon returnable to March term, 1836. A new capias was also issued against Dixon, returnable to the same term, and was returned non est. Neither the scire facias nor the recognizance states the offence with which Dixon was charged, or for which he was arrested; nor does it appear upon the record in this case.

Mr. Dandridge, for defendant, moved the court to discharge the parties, principal and bail, from the obligation of this recognizance; and contended that this court has the same power to remit the forfeiture that the court of exchequer has in England. The ground of the motion is that since the forfeiture, the indictment, for the offences with which Dixon was charged, has been quashed by the court for the reasons stated in U. S.

v. Cooly [Case No. 14,859], at March term, 1836, which fact was conceded by the district attorney.

Mr. Dandridge cited Davidson v. Taylor, 12 Wheat. [25 U. S.] 604; Rex v. Tomb, 10 Mod. 278; Belither v. Gibbs, 4 Burrows, 2118; Rex v. Spencer, 1 Wils. 315; 3 Petersd. Abr. 251, 356; Act Md. 1782, c. 42, § 2; Beers v. Haughton, 9 Pet. [34 U. S.] 358. See, also, 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 300–303.

THE COURT (MORSELL, Circuit Judge, contra) was of opinion that after the term in which a recognizance has been forfeited, in a criminal case, they have no power to remit the forfeiture, and overruled Mr. Dandridge's motion, but recommended the case to the consideration of the president of the United States, who made this indorsement on the petition: "The indictment having been quashed, the recognizance ought not to be enforced. On that sole ground the remission is directed on payment of costs. M. V. B."

[This was an indictment against Cornelius Coolidge and others for forcibly rescuing a prize.]

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The simple question is, whether the circuit court of the United States has jurisdiction to punish offences against the United States, which have not been previously defined, and a specific punishment affixed, by some statute of the United States. I do not think it necessary, to consider the more broad question, whether the United States, as a sovereign power, have entirely adopted the common law. This might lead to very elaborate inquiries, and the present question may well be decided, without entering upon the discussion. I admit in the most explicit terms, that the courts of the United States are courts of limited jurisdiction, and cannot exercise any authorities, which are not confided to them by the constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. But I do contend, that when once an authority is lawfully given, the nature and extent of that authority, and the mode, in which it shall be exercised, must be regulated by the rules of the common law. In my judgment, the whole difficulty and obscurity of the subject has arisen from losing sight of this distinction. Whether the common law of England, in its broadest sense, including equity and admiralty, as well as legal doctrines, be the common law of the United States or not, it can hardly be doubted, that the constitution and laws of the United States are predicated upon the existence of the common law. This has not, as I recollect, been denied by any person, who has maturely weighed the subject, and will abundantly appear upon the slightest examination. The constitution of the United States, for instance, provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." I suppose that no person can doubt, that for the explanation of these terms, and for the mode of conducting trials by jury, recourse must be had to the common law. So the clause, that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution," &c. is inexplicable, without reference to the common law; and the extent of this power must be measured by the powers of courts of law and equity, as exercised and established by that system. Innumerable instances of a like nature may be adduced. I will mention but one more, and that is in the clause providing, that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it. What is the writ of habeas corpus? What is the privilege which it grants? The common law, and that alone, furnishes the true answer. The existence, therefore, of the common law is not only supposed by the constitution, but is appealed to for the construction and interpretation of its powers.

There can be no doubt, that congress may, under the constitution, confide to the circuit court jurisdiction of all offences against the United States. Has it so done? The judicial act of 24th of September, 1789, c. 20, § 11 [1 Stat. 78], provides, that the circuit court "shall have exclusive cognizance of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, except where that act otherwise provides, or the laws of the United States shall otherwise direct, and concurrent jurisdiction with the district courts of the crimes and offences cognizable therein." No subsequent act has narrowed the jurisdiction; it remains therefore in full operation. The jurisdiction is not, as has sometimes been supposed in argument, over all crimes and offences specially created and defined by statute. It is of all crimes and offences "cognizable under the authority of the United States," that is, of all crimes and offences, to which by the constitution of the United States, the judicial power extends. The jurisdiction could not, therefore, have been given in more broad and comprehensive terms.

The court then having complete jurisdiction, the next point will be to ascertain, what are crimes and offences against the United States. And here I contend, that recourse must be had to the principles of the common law, taken in connexion with the constitution, in order to fix the definition, precisely as in other laws of congress, we resort to the rules of the common law to give them an interpretation. For instance, congress has provided for the punishment of murder, manslaughter and perjury, under certain circumstances; but it has no where defined these crimes. Yet no doubt is ever entertained on trials, that the explanation of them must be sought and exclusively governed by the common law; and upon any other supposition, the judicial power of the United States would be left, in its exercise, to the mere arbitrary pleasure of the judges, to an uncontrollable and undefined discretion. Whatever may be the dread of the common law, I presume, that such a despotic power could hardly be deemed more desirable. The necessity and propriety of this principle will be rendered still more apparent upon a further consideration. There are a great variety of cases arising under the laws of the United States, and particularly those which regard the judicial power, in which the legislative will cannot be effectuated, unless by the adoption of the common law. Many cases may be governed by the laws of the respective states; but still whole classes remain, which cannot be thus disposed of. For example, in Massachusetts no courts of equity exist, and consequently no recognition of the principles or practices of equity, as contradistinguished from law. How then shall a suit in equity pending in the circuit court for that district be managed or decided? There is no law of the United States, which provides for the process, the pleadings, or the principles of adjudication. By what rules then shall the court proceed? Certainly all reasoning and all practice pronounce, by the rules of equity recognised and enforced in the equity courts of England. The illustration is yet more decisive, as to causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; for these exclusively belong to the United States, and nothing in the laws or practice of the respective states can regulate the proceedings or the principles of decision. In my judgment, nothing is more clear, than that the interpretation and exercise of the vested jurisdiction of the courts of the United States must, in the absence of positive law, be governed exclusively by the common law.

I would ask then, what are crimes and offences against the United States, under the construction of its limited sovereignty, by the rules of the common law? Without pretending to enumerate them in detail, I will venture to assert generally, that all offences against the sovereignty, the public rights, the public justice, the public peace, the public trade and the public police of the United States, are crimes and offences against the United States From the nature of the sovereignty of the United States, which is limited and circumscribed, it is clear that many common law offences, under each of these heads, will still remain cognizable by the states; but whenever the offence is directed against the sovereignty or powers confided to the United States, it is cognizable under its authority. Upon these principles and independent of any statute, I presume that treasons, and conspiracies to commit treason, embezzlement of the public records, bribery and resistance of the judicial process, riots and misdemeanors on the high seas, frauds and obstructions of the public laws of trade, and robbery and embezzlement of the mail of the United States, would be offences against the United States. At common law, these are clearly public offences, and when directed against the United States, they must upon principle be deemed offences against the United States. If then it be true, that these are offences against the United States, and the circuit court have cognizance thereof, does it not unavoidably follow, that the court must have a right to punish them? In my judgment no proposition of law admits of more perfect demonstration. To suppose a power in a court to try an offence, and not to award any punishment, is to suppose, that the legislature is guilty of the folly of promoting litigation without object, and prohibiting acts, only for the purpose of their being scoffed at in the most solemn manner. If, therefore, it authorize a trial of an offence, it must be deemed to authorize the court to render such a judgment, as the guilt or innocence of the party may require. As to civil actions, the application of the principle has never admitted a doubt; yet in no instance, that I recollect, is the form or the substance of the judgments prescribed by any law. These judgments, however, must unavoidably differ, not only in different actions, but in the same action, according to the nature of the claims and the pleadings of the parties. It is no answer, to say, that the laws of the states will govern in such cases; for these are not always applicable, as suits may be brought in the United States courts, which are not cognizable by state courts; as for instance, equity and admiralty causes. And further, no such general and universal adoption of the practice or laws of the states has been authorized by congress, or sanctioned by the courts of the United States. The invariable usage of these courts has been, in all cases not governed by state laws, to regulate the pleadings and pronounce the judgment of the common law. When I speak here of the common law, I use the word in its largest sense, as including the whole system of English jurisprudence. For the same reason, therefore, that governs in civil causes, I hold that the cognizance of offences includes the power of rendering a judgment of punishment, when the guilt of the party is ascertained by a trial.

But it may be asked, what punishment shall be inflicted? The common law affords the proper answer. It is a settled principle, that where an offence exists, to which no specific punishment is affixed by statute, it is punishable by fine and imprisonment. This is so invariably true, that, in all cases, where the legislature prohibit any act without annexing any punishment, the common law considers it an indictable offence, and attaches to the breach the penalty of fine and imprisonment. Com. Dig. "Indictment," D; 8 Coke, 60b; 2 Inst. 131; Bac. Abr. "Fine," D. I have no difficulty in saying, that the same rule must be held to exist here, for the same reason that it is adopted there. If, therefore, treason had been left without punishment by the act of congress, I have no doubt, that the punishment by fine and imprisonment must have attached to the offence.

Upon what ground the common law can be referred to, and made the rule of decision in criminal trials in the courts of the United States, and not in the judgment or punishment, I am at a loss to conceive. In criminal cases, the right of trial by jury is preserved, but the proceedings are not specifically regulated. The forms of the indictment and pleadings, the definition and extent of the crime, in some cases the right of challenge, and in all the admission and rejection of evidence, are left unprovided for. Upon what ground then do the courts apply in such cases the rules of the common law? I can perceive no correct ground, unless it be, that the legislature have constantly had in view the rules of the common law, and deemed their application in casibus omissis peremptory upon the courts. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is so high and interesting, that it has become a prominent article in the constitution; and the judicial act of the 24th of September, 1789, c. 20, § 14, has authorized the courts of the United States, and the judges thereof, to issue that writ. But if nothing more could be done under it, than the legislature have expressly provided, it would be a mere dead letter for its most important purposes. It is only by engrafting on the authority of the statute the doctrines of the common law, that this writ is made the great bulwark of the citizen against the oppressions of the government. I might enforce the view, which I have already taken of this subject, by an examination in detail of the organization and exercise of the judicial powers of the courts of the United States, with reference to their equity, admiralty, and legal jurisdiction; but it cannot be necessary. If I am right in the positions, which I have already assumed and explained, there is an end of the question, which has been submitted. If I am wrong, the error is so fundamental, that I cannot hope to reach its source by any merely illustrative process.

The result of my opinion is: 1. That the circuit court has cognizance of all offences against the United States. 2. That what those offences are, depends upon the common law applied to the sovereignty and authorities confided to the United States. 3. That the circuit court, having cognizance of all offences against the United States, may punish them by fine and imprisonment, where no punishment is specially provided by statute. I have considered the point, as one open to be discussed, notwithstanding the decision in U. S. v. Hudson (February term, 1812 [7 Cranch (11 U. S.) 32]), which certainly is entitled to the most respectful consideration; but having been made without argument, and by a majority only of the court, I hope that it is not an improper course to bring the subject again in review for a more solemn decision, as it is not a question of mere ordinary import, but vitally affects the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; a jurisdiction which they cannot lawfully enlarge or diminish. I shall submit, with the utmost cheerfulness, to the judgment of my brethren, and if I have hazarded a rash opinion, I have the consolation to know, that their superior learning and ability will save the public from an injury by my error. That decision, however broad in its language, has not, as I conceive, settled the question now before the court, so far as it respects offences of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. The constitution has given to the judicial power of the United States the jurisdiction as "to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction," and this jurisdiction of course comprehends criminal, as well as civil suits. The admiralty is a court of extensive criminal, as well as civil jurisdiction, and has immemorially exercised both. At least no legal doubt of its criminal authority has ever been successfully urged. By the law of the admiralty, offences, for which no punishment is specially prescribed, are punishable by fine and imprisonment (see Clarke, Praxis Adm. tit. 60, sub finem); and as offences of admiralty jurisdiction are exclusively cognizable by the United States, it follows that all such offences are offences against the United States. We have adopted the law of the admiralty in all civil causes cognizable by the admiralty: must it not also be adopted in offences cognizable by the admiralty? It will perhaps be said, that express jurisdiction is given in civil cases of admiralty jurisdiction, but not in criminal cases. This is true in terms; but I contend, that criminal cases are necessarily included in the grant of cognizance of all "crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States;" for crimes and offences within the admiralty jurisdiction are not only cognizable, but cognizable exclusively under the authority of the United States. And congress, in punishing certain offences upon the high seas, which are neither piracies nor felonies, have undoubtedly acted upon the conviction, that such offences were of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. See Act Sept. 24, 1789, c. 20, §§ 12, 13, 16, 17, etc. Whatever room, therefore, there may be for doubt, as to what common law offences are offences against the United States, there can be none as to admiralty offences. If this be true, then the reasoning, which I have before urged, applies in its full force, and I will not take up time in repeating it. On the whole, my judgment is, that all offences within the admiralty jurisdiction are cognizable by the circuit court, and in the absence of positive law are punishable by fine and imprisonment.

DAVIS, District Judge, did not concur, with a view to bring the question solemnly before the supreme court; so it was certified to the supreme court, as upon a division of the judges.

4. In every case of a motion to the court for a cassetur, the facts, on which it is grounded, must be proved by affidavit.

This was an indictment, found at the May term, 1813, for shipping on board of a vessel, called the Moranda, fifty barrels of rye flour, with intent to transport the same to Halifax, during the war, contrary to the second section of the act of 6th of July, 1812, c. 129 [2 Stat. 779]. In the course of the trial, William R. Lee, Jr. who was called as a witness on the part of the government, declined taking the oath usually administered to witnesses, but offered to affirm. When questioned by the court, he stated, that though he was not one of the religious sect usually called Quakers, yet he had conscientious scruples as to the taking of an oath, in consequence of a solemn declaration, which, on some former occasion, he had voluntarily made, not thereafter to take an oath. He was informed by the court, that the permission to affirm was strictly confined to those of the Society of Friends; that the law was peremptory, and that, however unwilling the court might be to adopt so harsh a measure, if he persisted in refusing to be sworn, and the attorney of the United States should not consent to waive his rights, it would become necessary to commit him for a contempt.

The district attorney, after attempting to proceed without Lee's testimony, and finding that, without it, certain papers, material to the prosecution, could not be identified, moved for a commitment.

THE COURT then ordered a process of commitment, which was issued accordingly.[2]

F. Blake, for Coolidge, moved the court to advise the district attorney to a nolle prosequi, on the ground that the trial could not proceed—but THE COURT replied, that it was not their practice in any case to advise or control the district attorney in this respect.

The district attorney then moved the court to discharge the jury, and that the cause should remain for trial at a future day.

F. Blake, opposed this motion. He admitted, that there were extreme cases, in which the court had power to withdraw a juror, and continue the cause; but he contended, that in no case had this ever been done on the motion of the government, when on a criminal trial it was deprived of evidence from some unforeseen accident. Had the tables been turned, and had one of the witnesses on behalf of the accused secretly withdrawn himself, no delay or indulgence could have been granted on this account.

Before STORY, Circuit Justice, and DAVIS, District Judge.

[2] He was again brought into court in the afternoon, and still refusing to testify, was recommitted, but shortly after addressing a letter to the court, in which he declared his readiness to obey the order of the court, he was discharged from custody.

STORY, Circuit Justice.—The question is simply this: A party is on trial before a jury, and a circumstance occurs, which will occasion a total failure of justice if the trial proceed; have the court, in such an emergency, power to withdraw a juror? It has been stated from the bar that, in capital cases, the court have not this power; but in a case in Foster's Crown Law, and in several other cases, it has been held, that they have. In misdemeanors, there is certainly a larger discretion, and until the cases just mentioned, capital trials were generally supposed to be excepted. It is now held, that the discretion exists in all cases, but is to be exercised only in very extraordinary and striking circumstances. Were it otherwise, the most unreasonable consequences would follow. Suppose, that in the course of the trial the accused should be reduced to such a situation, as to be totally incapable of vindicating himself;—shall the trial proceed, and he be condemned? Suppose a juryman taken suddenly ill, and incapable of attending to the cause; shall the prisoner be acquitted? Suppose that this were a capital case, and that, in the course of the investigation, it had clearly appeared, that on Lee's testimony depended a conviction or an acquittal; would it be reasonable that the cause should proceed? Lee may, perhaps, during the term, be willing to testify. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion, that the government is not bound to proceed, but that the case be suspended until the close of the term, that we may see, whether the witness will not consent to an examination.

On a subsequent day of the term, F. Blake moved that the indictment be quashed, because the grand jury, who found the bill, received the testimony of Lee, who was a material witness for the government, without oath, he not being a Quaker; and to prove the fact, on which this motion was grounded, he offered Lee as a witness.

BY THE COURT.—This motion must be supported by affidavit. We cannot receive evidence of matter of fact, in support of a motion to quash, otherwise than in writing, as there would not then appear on record any ground for the exercise of the discretion of the court. Coolidge must also himself make affidavit, that he believes the fact to be as stated.

The affidavits were produced accordingly.

The district attorney read the affidavits of the marshal and his deputy, stating, that they recollected Lee to have been present among the witnesses for the government, at the term at which the indictment was found, and were strongly impressed, that he was sworn; but they could not say positively, that he held up his hand.[3]

[3] This is the usual ceremony of taking an oath in Massachusetts.

BY THE COURT.—Lee's affidavit is direct and positive, as to a fact, of which he could not be ignorant. The counter affidavits are merely of impressions. The court must be governed by the rules of evidence, and the facts must therefore be taken to be as stated by Lee. Of the law arising upon these facts there can be no doubt. The grand jury is the great inquest between the government and the citizen. It is of the highest importance, that this institution be preserved in its purity, and that no citizen be tried, until he has been regularly accused by the proper tribunal. Every indictment is subject to the control of the court, and this indictment, having been found irregularly, and upon the mere statement of a witness without oath, which was not evidence, a cassetur must be entered.[4]

NOTE It was ordered by the court, that in future a record should be kept of every witness sworn to go before the grand jury, and that the foreman should also return a list of the witnesses examined.

Case No. 14,859.

UNITED STATES v. COOLY.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 707.][1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

GAMING—FARO BANK—INDICTMENT.

An indictment, under the penitentiary act for the District of Columbia [4 Stat. 448], for keeping a faro-table, must charge the offence either to be the keeping of a common gaming-table, or must positively charge it to be the keeping of a faro-bank; not "a gaming-table called a faro-bank."

[Cited in U. S. v. Ringgold, Case No. 16,167; Marcus v. U. S., Id. 9,062a.]

The indictment charged that the defendant [Azariah Cooly] "on the first day of April, 1835, with force and arms, at the county aforesaid, did keep a certain gaming-table called a faro-bank, against the form of the statute," &c.

Mr. Dandridge, for the defendant, moved the court to quash the indictment, because it was too uncertain, and did not describe the offence stated in the statute. The first section of the penitentiary act of the 2d of March, 1831 [4 Stat. 448], enacts that every person, who shall be convicted, in any court in the District of Columbia, of any of the offences enumerated, and, among others, of the offence "of keeping a faro-bank or other common gaming-table," shall be sentenced to suffer punishment by imprisonment and labor for the time and times thereinafter described, in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia. And by the twelfth section it is enacted, that every person duly convicted

[4] See Rex v. Bridgewater & T. Canal Co., 7 Barn. & C. 514.

"of keeping a faro-bank or gaming-table, shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment and labor for a period not less than one year, nor more than five years." Thus, the first section refers to the twelfth to ascertain the duration of the punishment of the offence described in the first. The first describes the offence; the twelfth limits the time of imprisonment and labor. In U. S. v. Smith [Case No. 16,328], at November term, 1835, this court decided that the first section describes the offence, and the twelfth ascertains the duration of the punishment, and that both sections must be construed together; and that the punishment mentioned in the twelfth is to be applied to the offence described in the first. The offence described in the first section is the keeping of a "faro-bank or other common gaming-table." The indictment does not charge the keeping of a common gaming-table, nor of keeping a faro-bank; but of keeping "a gaming-table called a faro-bank." All the circumstances named in the statute as constituting the offence must be stated in the indictment. It is not sufficient to charge it as contra formam statuti. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 282; Craven's Case, Russ. & R. 14, where, in an indictment upon the statute against stealing bank-notes, the offence charged was stealing a certain note commonly called a bank-note; and it was held to be insufficient, and was quashed.

Mr. Key, contrà. The twelfth section does not require the word "common;" and the court would instruct the jury, upon a count omitting the word "common," that they must be satisfied by the evidence that it was a common gaming-table. The indictment charges the defendant with keeping a faro-bank, which is clearly within the statute. A thing is what it is commonly called. To say that the defendant kept a gaming-table called a faro-bank, is to say that he kept a faro-bank. It is not necessary to use other words than those of the statute. Com. v. Arnold, 4 Pick. 251; Brown v. Com., 8 Mass. 59; People v. Holbrook, 13 Johns. 90; U. S. v. Bachelder [Case No. 14,490]; s. c., 6 Wheeler, Abr. 34. If there are two statutes in pari materiâ, it is sufficient to take the words of either. So of two sections in the same statute.

Mr. Dandridge, in reply, cited U. S. v. Bachelder, 6 Wheeler, Abr. 35.

THE COURT (nem con.) quashed the indictment, being of opinion that the indictment must charge the offence either to be the keeping of a common gaming-table, or must positively charge it to be the keeping of a faro-bank, not merely a gaming-table called a faro-bank.

THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, suggested that it would be better to charge it as the keeping of a faro-bank, the same being a common gaming-table. In a subsequent case against McCormick, at this term, for keeping "a certain public gaming-table called a faro-bank," the indictment was quashed, on the authority of Cooly's Case.

Case No. 14,860.

UNITED STATES v. COONS.

[1 Bond, 1.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Feb. Term, 1856.

PERJURY—REQUISITES FOR CONVICTION—VARIANCE—AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER OATH—CONFESSIONS—EVIDENCE—RECORD.

1. To convict of the crime of perjury, under section 13 of the act of congress of March 3, 1825 [4 Stat. 118], it must be shown by evidence that the defendant was sworn; that he was sworn in a case, matter, hearing, or other proceeding, where an oath or affirmation is required to be taken or administered under or by any law or laws of the United States, and that he "knowingly and willingly" swore to that which was false.

2. Under an indictment for this offense, the prosecution must stablish, by proof, that the oath was administered to the defendant by the person named in the indictment: that such person had authority to administer the oath, and that the defendant swore, with a wicked and corrupt intent, willfully false in regard to the matters alleged in the indictment to be untrue.

3. The statements of a defendant, which are made the basis of a charge of perjury, must be disproved by two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances.

4. Any discrepancy between what the defendant swore to, and what is set out in the indictment as having been sworn to by him, is fatal.

5. A commissioner for Ohio and Indiana, appointed by the circuit court of the United States in Indiana, to take depositions in a case pending in said court, has authority to administer an oath under the laws of the United States.

6. Confessions of a prisoner should be cautiously received.

7. The proper evidence of the pendency of a suit is the record of the court.

[This was an indictment against Nathan Coons, charging him with the crime of committing perjury in falsely swearing to a deposition.]

John O'Neal, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Thomas Ewing, for defendant.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). The defendant in this case is indicted for perjury, under section 13 of the act of congress, approved March 3, 1825, which reads as follows: "If any person in any case, matter, hearing, or other proceeding, when an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered under or by any law or laws of the United States, shall, upon the taking of such oath or affirmation knowingly and willingly swear or affirm falsely, every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of perjury," etc.

[1] [Reported by Lewis H. Bond, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

The indictment contains one count wherein the defendant is charged with committing perjury on January 18, 1855, at Cincinnati, in the state of Ohio, by swearing to a deposition before Alexander H. McGuffey, a commissioner for Ohio and Indiana, who had been appointed as such on December 29, 1854, by the circuit court of the United States, in the state of Indiana, to take said deposition, to be used in a case then pending in said court, wherein Benjamin A. Earl was plaintiff, and the Madison Insurance Company was defendant. The indictment alleges that the defendant, Nathan Coons, testified in said deposition, among other things, "that Adams Chapin and Lyman Cole, and Filley & Chapin, in the month of December, 1851, and about the first of the month of January, 1852, had only a few sides of sole leather in their store, on Pearl street, in Cincinnati, and that they did not then have a great deal of stock on hand, and that about that time he was all through their said store and manufactory, in said city, and they then had little stock of any kind on hand; that they had a small quantity of red sole leather and sheep-skin, but very little of either; that about December 12, 1851, Filley, one of said firm of Filley & Chapin, told him to fill up two boxes, which were standing in said manufactory, with leather chips; that he did so, and that when they were so filled, the said Filley nailed the lids on them and marked on them "Kip Boots, No. 1," and the letter "C," and "Louisville, Ky.;" that another person had already filled two other boxes with leather chips, and also filled two more at the time he filled the two boxes at Filley's request, and that when he left the store the said Filley was engaged in nailing up the boxes so filled; that about January 1, 1852, he saw all of these boxes put on board the steamboat "Martha Washington," while she was lying at the Cincinnati wharf, prior to her departure on the trip when she was burnt. The indictment also contains the following assignments of perjury: (1) That Filley & Chapin, in the month of December, 1854, and in the month of January, 1852, had a large stock on hand in their store, on Pearl street, in Cincinnati. (2) That the said Coons was not about that time in or through their manufactory or store, on Pearl street, in Cincinnati. (3) The said Filley did not tell said Coons to fill up two boxes with leather chips. (4) That the said Coons did not fill any of said boxes with chips. (5) That the said Filley did not nail the lids on any boxes filled with leather chips. (6) That the said Filley did not mark upon any such box or boxes "Kip Boots, No. 1," or the letter "C," or any other marks. (7) That no other person filled any of the said boxes with leather chips. (8) That the said Coons did not see any boxes so filled with leather chips put on board the said steamboat "Martha Washington."

To justify a verdict of guilty in this case, the jury must be satisfied by the evidence that the defendant was sworn; that he was sworn in a case, matter, hearing, or other proceeding, when an oath or affirmation shall be required to be taken or administered under or by any law or laws of the United States, and that he knowingly and willingly swore to that which was false. It must also appear by the evidence that the oath was administered to him by the person named in the indictment, and that such person had authority to administer the oath. The proper evidence of the pendency of a suit between Benjamin A. Earl and the Madison Insurance Company, in the circuit court of the United States, in the state of Indiana, is the record of the court. During the progress of the case, the question has arisen, was the commissioner, McGuffey, duly authorized to take the defendant's deposition? The circuit court of the United States in Indiana was fully competent to give him such authority. It will be for the jury to say, from the evidence, whether the defendant swore falsely, with a wicked and corrupt intent to falsify in regard to matters alleged in the indictment to be false. The jury will have the defendant's deposition and will compare it with the indictment. There are several distinct assignments of perjury in the indictment, and the defendant can not be convicted except as to matters therein charged. A conviction can not be had on the assignment, respecting the quantity of stock Filley & Chapin had on hand, as the averment of the indictment is, that in December, 1854, and in the month of January, 1852, they had a large amount of stock on hand, while the statement of the defendant, in his deposition, is, that in the month of December, 1851, and about the first of the month of January, 1852, they had but a small amount of stock on hand. Any discrepancy between what the defendant swore to in his deposition, and what is set out in the indictment as having been sworn to by him, is fatal to a conviction. The assignment principally relied on by the prosecution is that respecting the filling up of the boxes with leather chips. Was this statement false? It must, to authorize a conviction, be disproved by two witnesses, or one witness and corroborating circumstances. The facts will be for the jury to determine from the evidence. If they believe the defendant to have sworn willfully false in testifying, as alleged in the indictment, it will be their duty to convict. The prosecution relies upon the testimony of the three Chapins and Earl, and has also proved some confessions of the defendant made by him while in jail. Confessions of an accused person should always be cautiously received. The jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of evidence. It appears from the testimony that the Chapins were implicated in a case arising out of the burning of the steamboat "Martha Washington," and would be affected by evidence which would tend to establish their fraudulent conduct. Earl is a party to a suit against the Madison Insurance Company, seeking to enforce its liability under a policy insuring this property about which the defendant testified in his deposition. Perjury is an odious crime, and the defendant, if guilty, merits the punishment inflicted by the law; but the jury should weigh well the evidence and act with great deliberation.

The jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

UNITED STATES v. COOPER.

[4 Dall. 341.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. 1800.

WITNESSES—PRIVILEGE—MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

[Members of congress are not exempt from compulsory process to require their attendance as witnesses in behalf of one charged with crime.]

The defendant, being indicted for a libel on the president [see Case No. 14,865] applied to the court, for a letter to be addressed by them to several members of congress (congress being in session), requesting their attendance as witnesses on his behalf. In support of the application a variety of similar cases arising under the government of Pennsylvania were referred to.

Before CHASE, Circuit Justice, and PETERS, District Judge.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. The constitution gives to every man, charged with an offence, the benefit of compulsory process, to secure the attendance of his witnesses. I do not know of any privilege to exempt members of congress from the service, or the obligations, of a subpœna, in such cases. I will not sign any letter of the kind proposed. If, upon service of a subpœna, the members of congress do not attend, a different question may arise; and it will then be time enough to decide, whether an attachment ought, or ought not, to issue. It is not a necessary consequence of non-attendance, after the service of a subpœna, that an attachment shall issue. A satisfactory reason may appear to the court to justify or excuse it.

PETERS, District Judge. I know the practice in Pennsylvania to be as it has been stated; for I have received such letters, from the supreme court, while I was speaker of the house of representatives, requesting that members might be permitted to attend as witnesses. In the present case, I should have no objection to acquiesce in the defendant's application, with the concurrence of the presiding judge. Motion refused.

UNITED STATES v. COOPER.

[Hoff. Land Cas. 101.] [1]

District Court, N. D. California. Dec. Term, 1855.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—VALIDITY OF CLAIM—LOCATION.

No objections made to the confirmation of this claim.

Claim [by John B. R. Cooper] for four leagues of land in Sonoma county [the Rancho El Molino], confirmed by the board, and appealed by the United States.

S. W. Inge, U. S. Atty.

Halleck, Peachy & Billings, for appellee.

HOFFMAN, District Judge. The claimant in this case, a naturalized Mexican citizen, obtained in December, 1833, a grant from the governor for the place called Rio Ojotska. This grant was approved by the departmental assembly, and a certificate of its confirmation delivered to the grantee, as appears from the testimony, and the expediente filed in this case. He subsequently applied to the governor for an exchange of the land granted for that now claimed by him. Proceedings on this application were commenced by Governor Figueroa, and the new grant was made, as desired by the petitioner, by Governor Gutierrez on the twenty-fourth of February, 1836. These facts are proved by the testimony of Hartnell and Vallejo, whose evidence is corroborated by the expediente on file in the archives. The genuineness of the grants is fully established. Previously to obtaining the last grant, the claimant had gone into possession of the tract solicited, and had built a house upon it. He also had, as early as 1834, placed a considerable number of cattle upon it, and had commenced the erection of a mill, upon which he expended more than $10,000. He also erected a blacksmith shop, and for two years had employed upon his rancho men to the average number of sixteen, and sometimes thirty or forty Indians. It is clear that the grantee fulfilled the conditions and carried out the objects of the colonization laws to an extent very unusual in the then condition of the country.

With regard to the location of the land, it appears from the testimony of O'Farrell and other witnesses, who are acquainted with the adjacent country, that there is no difficulty in ascertaining its locality by means of the diseño which accompanies the grant. O'Farrell, who had long been a surveyor under the Mexicans, testifies that he has, by means of the grant and the diseño, made a survey of the land, and that it contains, as surveyed by him, only the quantity specified in the grant.

[1] [Reported by Numa Hubert, Esq., and here reprinted by permission.]

This claim was held to be valid by the board. No objections to it are suggested on the part of the United States, and we are of opinion that the decision of the board should be affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. COOPER.

[12 Int. Rev. Rec. 145.]

Circuit Court, E. D. Tennessee. 1870.

VIOLATION OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAWS—ILLICIT DISTILLING—WHO PUNISHABLE.

[A mere employe working in a distillery, but having no interest therein, or in the whisky produced, as a proprietor or partner, is not subject to indictment, even though he knows the special tax has not been paid; nor is it material that he is to be paid for his labor with whisky produced in the distillery.]

The defendant [Wesley Cooper] was indicted for distilling under the act of July 13, 1866 [14 Stat. 98].

G. Y. Durbeck, witness for the government, testified that he was an assistant assessor of internal revenue in Union county, Tennessee, and as such in August, 1868, was instructed to ascertain who was the party liable to be assessed, and for how much, for carrying on a certain distillery near to the house of Albert Mitchell, and which had been seized by Deputy Collector J. M. Sawyers, about the 1st of March preceding. The assessment had been made against Mitchell; but Mitchell claimed that it was erroneous; that the still, and land on which the distillery was situated, had been sold to defendant, Cooper, who was the party liable to said assessment. Witness went to the house of said Mitchell, who, after learning witness's object, sent for defendant Cooper. Defendant Cooper on his arrival stated and made oath to the fact before witness that at the time of seizing the distillery he, defendant, was carrying it on for himself; that he had before that time bought the distillery and the land it was on (one acre) from said Mitchell, and that Mitchell had nothing to do with the distillery. As near as witness could ascertain, the distillery had been running from about the 1st of December, 1867, to the time it was seized; in all some three months.

J. M. Sawyers, next witness for the government, testified that as deputy collector he seized the distillery spoken of, about the last of February, 1868. That C. M. Baker and another person were with him at the time. That they found the distillery in full blast; that the door was shut, and the defendant alone in the still-house; that witness unfastened the door and went in. The defendant told witness he was running the distillery for himself; that he had bought the land (one acre) and distillery from Albert Mitchell; but that some time after this defendant said he and Mitchell were partners in the distillery at the time.

C. M. Baker, next witness, testified that he was present when Sawyers seized the distillery. Heard defendant say at the time that he was making the run then being made for himself, and also thinks he heard defendant say that at some previous time he had been distilling for Mitchell. Still was running and only defendant was in or near to the distillery.

1. The government introduced no further proof.

Lemuel Linn, witness for the defendant, testified that he was brother-in-law of defendant. That defendant lived with witness at the time he was running the distillery in controversy. That witness knows defendant at first was running the distillery for Albert Mitchell to pay for a hog he had got from Mitchell. That after this defendant worked there, as he and Mitchell said, for a one-fourth gallon of the spirits distilled. Witness had been at distillery often; had helped take corn meal from Mitchell's to the still-house on one occasion about Christmas, and had helped take some whiskey from the distillery to Mitchell's on or about the same time. That he had seen Mitchell at the still-house assisting defendant in doing the work. Witness had heard Mitchell and defendant say, when at the still-house, that defendant was working for Mitchell.

Jacob Koontz, next witness for defendant, testified that defendant had married his mother. That he was at the still-house in question every two or three days, and knows that defendant was only working there for Mitchell. That he had heard both defendant and Mitchell while at the distillery say so. Witness does not know whether defendant was to get a part of the spirits made or not; does not know how he was to be satisfied for his labor; that it was about Christmas, 1867, he heard this conversation from defendant and Mitchell. Witness knows that at first defendant was working there to pay for some pork he had bought from Mitchell. Witness knows that Michell owned the land and distillery, but that Mitchell being a man of property and defendant not, it was a sham arrangement between defendant and Mitchell that if they were caught defendant should claim to be the owner of the still and one acre of land, so that they could not get after Mitchell.

Upon the trial the district attorney objected to the defendant's witnesses giving evidence of any conversation had, or statements made, or claims set up by either defendant or Albert Mitchell, upon the ground that as to the statements of defendant they could not be introduced in his own favor; and as to the statements of Mitchell, he was a competent witness now to be introduced to prove any material facts he may know; besides this, it was an effort to prove an immaterial fact. But the court overruled the objection, and permitted any statements either may have made while at the distillery and in the presence of the other to be given in evidence as part of the res gestæ.

This was all the evidence introduced.

Defendant's counsel insisted in argument that under the proof, Mitchell and not defendant was the man; that Mitchell was the principal in the transaction, and that the defendant was only an employee of Mitchell; that whether defendant was working for wages to be paid in money or in a certain part of the whiskey distilled by him, yet in law Mitchell alone and not defendant can be said to be carrying on the business of a distiller, and Mitchell alone would be criminally liable if such business was carried on without the special tax being paid. Also that though defendant did state that he was the principal in the transaction and was running the distillery at the time it was seized for himself, yet it was evident such statement was false, and made only to shield Mitchell, not knowing that the effect thereof, unexplained, would involve him in criminal liability.

The district attorney in argument stated that though the principle of law contended for by defendant's counsel had been in the abstract heretofore given in charge to juries upon different occasions, yet to him it was not sustained by any principle of law, reason, or good judgment; that he hoped, by a reargument, to show the unsoundness of such a position. The district attorney referred to many authorities to show that in such cases the question of guilt is not affected in the least by the fact whether the defendant was the owner of the land or of the distillery, or whether he was merely doing the manual labor for some other person who did own the land or distillery. In either case, the fact of assisting in carrying on the business being admitted, the defendant would be guilty. To establish a different rule, and the one contended for by defendant's counsel, would practically defeat the revenue law itself. The district attorney next insisted that though the court still adhered to its former holding on this point, yet, 1st, as defendant was found in the act of distilling, the law would presume him to be the proprietor, and it would be for defendant to show affirmatively to the contrary; that to do this he should introduce the best available proof, which in this case would be to introduce Albert Mitchell as a witness, and if defendant fails without sufficient reason to do this and resorts to other evidence less certain and unsatisfactory, the jury are authorized to presume that such witness, Mitchell, would not have testified favorably to the defendant; and any doubt the jury may have on this point from the evidence before them will be resolved against the defendant.

2. The district attorney insisted that if the jury believe defendant merely an employee, yet if defendant had full knowledge of the fact that the distillery was being carried on without the special tax being paid, such guilty knowledge, together with a participation by defendant in the distillery, would make him equally guilty as though he was the proprietor.

3. The district attorney next insisted that notwithstanding the position taken by defendant's counsel be sustained, yet, if defendant's own evidence be true, and the defendant, though he did not own the distillery, did by the terms of his employment become entitled to any certain portion of the product of the distillery—any part of the whiskey made—then his interest in and connection with the distillery was such as to make defendant guilty as a principal in the transaction. The district attorney then presented to the court, as embodying the legal propositions he had made, with a request that they be given to the jury by the court in his charge, the following propositions:

The court is asked by the district attorney to charge—

1. That in cases of this kind, being misdemeanors only, all who aid or assist in the distilling or who have an interest in the distillery or the spirits made at the distillery, are equally guilty if such illicit distilling was done with their knowledge and assent.

2. If the jury shall believe from the proof that, though Mitchell was the owner of the still, furnished the grain that was distilled, and that the distilling was done on Mitchell's land, yet if the defendant was working there and was to receive such a part of the spirits made by him or him and Mitchell jointly, and distilling was done, then the defendant would have such an interest in and connection with the distillery and distilling as would make him guilty in contemplation of law.

3. If the proof shows that the defendant was found in the act of distilling, or by defendant's own admissions it is proven he was the person who was doing the distilling, the law will presume him to have been the party in interest who under the law may be said to be carrying on the business of a distillery, and will be guilty as charged unless he shall rebut that presumption by proving to you satisfactorily that he was not the party who was carrying on the business, and that he had no interest whatever in the distilling that was there being done.

4. This proof being in such case upon defendant to make out, the burden of proof is on him, and he should be required to prove the same by the best evidence he can produce and if the jury have any doubt as to this matter and shall believe the defendant had it in his power either by introducing Mitchell as a witness or by other means to remove such doubt, but fails in doing so, but resorts to evidence less direct and satisfactory, the jury will be authorized to presume that such other and more direct and satisfactory testimony which defendant might have introduced, would not have been favorable for him, and the jury will resolve that doubt against the defendant.

5. If the jury shall believe from the proof that although the defendant was merely employed and was not to receive a part of the spirits made as his compensation or interest in the matter, but to be paid otherwise by Mitchell for his labor, and that Mitchell was the proprietor, yet if the jury shall also believe that the defendant had knowledge at the time of the fact that the distillery was being run in violation of the revenue law, and was there, knowingly and willingly, assisting in such unlawful distilling, then he would in law be equally guilty with Mitchell, and it will be your duty to return a verdict of guilty in this case.

6. Under the law any person who distils or manufactures spirits or alcohol, by continuous distillation from grain, who brews or makes mash, wort, or wash for distillation or the production of spirits, is deemed a distiller, under the act of July 15, 1866, under which this offence is charged.

7. If the jury shall find the defendant did distil, or did brew, or did make mash, wort, or wash for distillation, or for the production of spirits, he will be guilty as charged, unless the defendant shall have proven to you that the special tax had at the time been paid.

E. C. Camp, U. S. Dist. Atty.

L. C. Honk and L. A. Gratz, for defendant.

BY THE COURT (charging jury). The charge contained in this indictment is very simple. It is, did this defendant carry on the business of a distiller, and, if he did, did he pay the special tax? If not, he would be guilty. But, gentlemen of the jury, who can it be said "carries on the business of a distiller"? Can it be one who is only employed to do the work? Suppose Samuel Pike, who is a large distiller, and has some two hundred hands employed to do the work, should carry on the business without having paid the special tax. Can it be said that those two hundred men would be guilty of a violation of this law? Can it be said that these two hundred men are carrying on the business of distillers? No, gentlemen of the jury, such a proposition is absurd, is perfectly monstrous—the very statement of the case is ridiculous. Why, if a party other than the principal in the transaction is liable to a criminal prosecution because he works in the distillery, then he is also liable to be assessed and made to pay the special tax and other assessments. This the government does not require. They only look to the owner or proprietor for the special tax, and they alone are liable to a criminal prosecution if they fail to pay it. This court has so held the law to be time and time again. It sees no reason to change its views, and never will hold otherwise, unless some decision shall be made which is binding on this court, and which will require this court to change its ruling. This court does not believe any judge ever intended to decide otherwise; and this court will punish as a contempt hereof any counsel who will again argue this proposition with the earnestness and zeal with which it has been argued on the trial of this cause.

The defendant having been found at work in the distillery, he will be presumed to have been the proprietor, unless he shall rebut that presumption by proof. If from the proof the jury believe defendant was merely employed by Mitchell and was distilling for Mitchell, who was the proprietor, and that defendant had no interest in the distillery, or in the whiskey made, as a partner or proprietor, then they cannot find the defendant guilty, even though defendant may have had knowledge at the time that Mitchell had not paid the special tax.

As to the fact that defendant was to receive a part of the whiskey made, the court leaves it to the jury to say whether, by such a contract, the defendant became interested in the matter as a partner, if so, he would be liable, but if the jury shall believe that the one fourth gallon was paid to defendant by Mitchell merely as a compensation for his labor, then defendant would not be guilty, as the fact of being paid in the whiskey he distilled for Mitchell, would not in law make defendant guilty, any more than if Mitchell had paid him in money. If the jury shall find that the defendant was running the distillery for himself, or had an interest therein as partner or proprietor, and not working there as an employee for wages, then defendant will be guilty, and the jury will so find, as there is no claim set up that any special tax had ever been paid.

The court entirely disregarded the instructions asked for by the district attorney, except as the same may have been embraced in the charge above given.

The jury, after being out two days, being unable to agree, were discharged and a mistrial entered.

Case No. 14,864.

UNITED STATES v. COOPER.

[3 Quart. Law J. 42.]

District Court, W. D. Virginia. Oct. Term, 1857.

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—CONFESSION TO MAGISTRATE—INDUCEMENT—SUBSEQUENT CONFESSIONS—WARNING.

1. Confessions made to a justice of the peace, while officially engaged in the examination of a criminal charge, are inadmissible, if obtained by any inducement held out by the justice.

2. A prisoner having been once induced, by improper influences, o make a confession, no other confessions of a like character, though made at a subsequent time and to different persons, are admissible, even when voluntarily made, unless it be shown that the prior improper influence has been removed, either by an explicit and distinct warning, or some other equally cogent means.

An indictment was found against James Cooper, charging him with abstracting and embezzling certain letters, taken by him out of a mail bag; he being a mail carrier. Plea, not guilty. The prisoner is a boy, fifteen years old.

F. B. Miller, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Floyd, Cook & Brown, for prisoner.

Robert F. Dorton was the first witness called for the prosecution, and he testified, in substance, as follows: "The prisoner was a mail carrier on a route leading through Scott county, and he carried the mail from Pattonsville to Rye Cove, in that county. I am a justice of the peace for Scott county. On the 27th May last, the post-master at Rye Cove came to me, and said that the mail had been robbed, and applied for a warrant against the prisoner. I concluded to go to the post office before issuing a warrant. I did go, and found the prisoner there in custody. I examined the mail and mail bag. There was a hole or opening in the bag; and three or four letters were in a very confused and improper condition, having evidently been opened. I said to the prisoner: 'Mr. Nicholls (the post-master at Pattonsville) never put up the mail in this condition. It is a very plain case. You might as well confess the whole matter. It will not make the case any worse for you.' Thereupon, he said that he had taken the letters out of the mail bag, and that he took them out to get money."

The prisoner's counsel immediately objected to this testimony, and moved the court to exclude from the jury all evidence of confessions obtained under such circumstances. They relied upon Smith's Case, 10 Grat. 734.

Before deciding the question, THE COURT propounded some questions to the witness, from which it appeared uncertain whether the warrant was actually issued before the confessions were made or not; but the boy was in custody. It was also left uncertain whether the prisoner knew that the witness was a justice or not; but the witness distinctly stated that he was acting in his official capacity, and investigating the charge when the confessions were made.

BROCKENBROUGH, District Judge. The rules relative to the admission of confessions in criminal cases are well known to the profession. It has long been held that a free, voluntary confession is the most clear and satisfactory evidence of guilt. But to produce this effect, the confession must be strictly of the character I have mentioned. Such is the infirmity of human nature, in circumstances so distressing as those which often surround a prisoner, that men have been known to make false confessions, under a hope of ultimate escape. It has therefore been wisely and mercifully settled that such evidence is to be received with very great caution. If indeed either by threats of injury, or hopes of benefit, made or held out by others, standing in certain relations towards the prisoner, or the offence, then the confession must be rejected.

Among the rules most carefully elaborated, and strictly enforced is this: that if the confession has been made to a person in authority, in the premises, and has been induced by anything said or done by such person, calculated to excite either hope or fear in the prisoner's mind, then the confession is inadmissible. It has always been understood, without a dissenting voice, that a justice of the peace engaged in the official investigation of a criminal charge, is a person in authority in regard to such charge. In regard to persons bearing that character, too much care cannot be exercised to prevent them from this reprehensible tampering with parties arraigned before them. In this case, certainly the rule ought not to be relaxed, when we look to the prisoner's extreme youth, and the pretty plainly apparent fact that he does not, at any rate, possess more than a very moderate share of intellect. I should have no hesitation in rejecting this testimony if it were not for the hearing of the decision of the court of appeals of Virginia in Smith's Case.

In that case the prisoner made an explicit and important confession to the person to whom he was an apprentice, and that person was also a justice of the peace; but he was not engaged in the investigation of the offence, and had nothing whatever to do with the prosecution. It was contended that both in his character of master and of justice, this person was a person in authority, in the meaning of the rule. He induced the prisoner to make the confession. It was objected to, but the court of appeals decided that the confession was admissible. I cannot concur in the propriety of that decision. I think it goes a bow shot beyond all the former authorities. Moreover, it is to be noticed that the court was divided. It was a decision by three judges against two. If I were a circuit judge of Virginia, I should give the court of appeals an opportunity, if possible, to revise the decision. But in the capacity of a federal judge, I am bound by the decision. By the act of congress under which I derive my powers, the law of the state wherein the court is held is made the rule of its decisions; and it is well settled that the judgment of the supreme judicial tribunal of a state is the authoritative exposition of the law of that state. I would therefore be bound by the decision in Smith's Case [supra] if I did not think the case at bar could be distinguished from that case.

And I do think it is clearly distinguishable. This case contains the important element, wanting in Smith's Case, that here the justice was officially engaged in examining the very charge in relation to which he induced the prisoner to make the confession. He was undoubtedly a person in authority in the premises. I do not consider it material to enquire whether the warrant of arrest had actually emanated before the confession was made. The prisoner was confronted with his judge and his accuser; and his conduct was the subject of a pending enquiry. Nor do I deem it important to enquire into the fact as to his knowledge of Mr. Dorton's official character. At the most, this is an open question, and the prosecution ought to remove all doubt as to the fact, for, before the confession can be received, the United States must show the propriety of its admission. I think I am not only justified in presuming that the prisoner did know that Mr. Dorton was a justice, but that I am bound so to presume in the absence of proof to the contrary. The evidence must be excluded.

Mr. Nottingham, the jailor of Scott county, was introduced, and said: "I know nothing of this case, except from confessions made to me by the prisoner, after he was committed to prison. He was confined in my jail on the 27th day of May last, and remained there till the 6th of September, and during that time he made several different confessions, relative to this matter." The prisoner's counsel objected to the admission of these confessions, until it should appear that full and fair warning had been given to the prisoner as to the effect of his confessions. It is contended that when it has once been shown, that the prisoner has been improperly induced to make a confession, no subsequent confession, though made at other times and to other persons, can be used against him, unless it be shown that his mind has been completely relieved of the improper influences formerly operating upon it. The court enquired of the witness whether he had warned the prisoner of the consequences of his confessions. He answered that he had not, but had only told him "that it was a penitentiary offence." He further stated that the confessions made to him were substantially identical with that made to the examining justice. He could not state the exact time at which the first confession was made; but thought it must have been soon after the prisoner came into custody.

BROCKENBROUGH, District Judge. A good abstract of the law on this point is found in 1 Greenl. Ev. § 221. I there find the rule laid down on satisfactory authority to be, that where improper means have once been used to induce a confession, which has therefore been rejected, a subsequent confession cannot be received, unless it appear that the influence of those improper means has been totally done away with. From lapse of time, or other circumstances and facts, the influence of former inducements may be presumed or proved to have ceased; but in the absence of any such circumstances, the influence of the motives, proved to have been offered, will be presumed to continue, and to have produced the confession, unless the contrary is shown by clear evidence; and the confession will therefore be rejected.

Applying this rule to this case, there can be no doubt as to the result. It is not pretended that any warning was ever given to this boy, after he was imprisoned, which was on the same day that he made his original confession, already rejected. A sufficient period of time had not elapsed to raise any presumption of freedom from improper influences; and this case affords an excellent illustration of the necessity for such a restriction. This boy has been improperly induced to make a confession. He could not know that such an admission could not be given in evidence. He considered his fate sealed by his former declarations, and, in the desperation of his condition, was ready to open his heart to any one who would listen to him. It would be cruel oppression to permit such admissions to go in evidence. Mr. Nottingham must stand aside.

Robert Gibbony, deputy marshall of the district, was called to the stand. He said that on the 6th September he took the prisoner out of Scott jail, and removed him to Wytheville. From Estillville to Abingdon he travelled with the prisoner in a buggy. On the way the prisoner made confessions to him, similar to those spoken of by the other witnesses. The witness gave prisoner no caution, but suffered him to talk as he pleased, using no efforts to extract anything from him, and his statements were voluntary so far as this witness was concerned.

BROCKENBROUGH, District Judge. This evidence falls within the same category as that of the jailor, and must share the same fate.

There being no other evidence, the jury, without leaving the box, found the prisoner not guilty.

Case No. 14,865.

UNITED STATES v. COOPER.

[Whart. St. Tr. 659.]

Circuit Court, D. Pennsylvania. April 30, 1800.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL—INTENT OF PUBLICATION—DEFAMATION OF PRESIDENT—CHARGES IN RELATION TO EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES—STANDING ARMIES.

[1. In a prosecution under the sedition act of July 14, 1798 (1 Stat. 596), for the publication of a libel against the president of the United States, there must clearly appear an intent to defame him, to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and excite against him the hatred of the good people of the United States. If there be no such intent there can be no guilt.]

[2. It is false, within the meaning of the sedition act, to publish that our credit is brought so low that we are obliged to borrow money at 8 per cent. "in time of peace," when, although there has been no declaration of war, there have been actual hostilities, captures of vessels, and a prohibition of intercourse.]

[3. A murder committed on board a British ship of war is committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain, within the meaning of article 27 of the treaty with that power, relating to the extradition of persons charged with murder and forgery.]

[4. The executive is the party upon whom devolves the duty of surrendering a fugitive in case of extradition under the treaty, and, although he makes use of a judge of the United States as an instrument for ascertaining whether there is sufficient evidence of criminality to require the surrender, the court has no jurisdiction of the crime, and the president cannot truthfully be accused, in connection with such a transaction, of attempting to influence or interfere with a court of justice.]

[5. To publish, in respect to the president, that we are threatened, under his auspices, with the existence of a standing army, betrays either the most egregious ignorance or the most wilful intention to deceive the public; for there are but two descriptions of armies in the country, one called the "Western Army," enlisted for five years only, and the other called the "Provisional Army," enlisted during the existence of war with France; and neither of these can with any propriety be called a standing army, especially as the constitution declares that no appropriations shall be made for the support of an army longer than two years.]

The libellous matter complained of was as follows: "Nor do I see any impropriety in making this request of Mr. Adams. At that time he had just entered into office. He was hardly in the infancy of political mistake. Even those who doubted his capacity thought well of his intentions. Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, or threatened, under his auspices, with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace, while the unnecessary violence of official expressions might justly have provoked a war. Mr. Adams had not yet projected his embassies to Prussia, Russia and the Sublime Porte, nor had he yet interfered, as president of the United States, to influence the decisions of a court of justice—a stretch of authority which the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from—an interference without precedent, against law and against mercy. This melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native citizen of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered up, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court-martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country; a case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised, before the election, and they shall be." [1]

April 11, 1800. The bill was found upon the ex officio action of the district attorney, there having been no previous binding over. Some difficulty arose at the outset concerning the right of the defendant to compel the attendance, as witnesses, of several members of congress (congress being then in session), and of the president. An application was made to the court to address a letter to the speaker of the house, requesting him to have process served. This PETERS, Dis-

"To the Public.

"To the Printer—Sir: I should not condescend to answer anonymous slander, but the information on which the falsehoods contained in the following paragraph are grounded, must have been originally derived from the president himself. I cannot believe him capable of such misrepresentation, for I still think well of his intentions, however I may disapprove of his conduct: but the following narrative will show that some of his underlings are capable of anything:

"From the Reading Weekly Advertiser of October 26, 1799:

" 'Communication. Thomas Cooper's address to the readers of the Sunbury and Northumberland Gazette, of which he was editor, having been republished in this state, with an introduction approbatory of the piece, a correspondent wishes to know if it be the same Thomas Cooper, an Englishman, of whom the following anecdote is related? If it is, every paper devoted to truth, honour, and decency, ought to give it a thorough circulation. Not many months ago, it is said, a Mr. Cooper, an Englishman, applied to the president of the United States, to be appointed "agent for settling the respective claims of the citizens and subjects of this country and Great Britain." In his letter, he informs the president, that although he (Thomas Cooper) had been called a Democrat, yet his real political sentiments are such as would be agreeable to the president and government of the United States, or expressions to that effect. This letter was accompanied with another from Dr. Joseph Priestley, who did not fail to assure the president of the pliability of his friend Cooper's Democratic principles. The president, it is said, rejected Cooper's application with disdain, and Priestley's with still stronger marks of surprise, saying, it is said, as he threw the letter on the table, does he think that I would appoint any Englishman to that important office in preference to an American? What was the consequence? When Thomas Cooper found his application for a lucrative office under our president rejected, he writes in revenge the address which appeared in print, and Dr. Priestley exerted his influence in dispersing this very address, which he must know was the offspring of disappointment and revenge! The address is as cunning and insidious a production as ever appeared in the Aurora or the old Chronicle, and as for impudence, it exceeds, or at least equals, Porcupine himself. Priestley and Cooper are both called upon to deny the above narrative. A recourse to the letters themselves, would establish the accuracy of this anecdote, even to a syllable.'

"Yes; I am the Thomas Cooper alluded to—luckily possessed of more accurate information than the malignant writer of that paragraph, from whatever source his intelligence was derived. About the time of the appointment of commissioners under the British treaty, Doctor Ross, who had sedulously brought about an intercourse of civility between Mr. Liston and myself, urged me to permit him to apply on my behalf to that gentleman, for one of the appointments that must then take place. He pressed on me the folly, as he termed it, of my confining myself to Northumberland, his earnest wish to see me settled in Philadelphia, and the duty I owed my family to better my situation by every means in my power. He stated that Mr. Liston, he knew, thought highly of me, and though the post of the fifth commissioner was probably then disposed of, there must be an agent for the British claimants; an office which, from my situation as a barrister in England, and my knowledge of mercantile transactions, I was peculiarly fitted to fill. I replied, that he probably overrated Mr. Liston's opinion and his own influence, and that, at all events, my known political opinions must render it equally improper for Mr. Liston to give, and for me to accept, any office whatever connected with the British interests. That Mr. Liston and I understood each other on this question, and had hitherto avoided all politics whatever. That, being an American, I should not object to any office under this government, if I could fairly obtain it; but that I would never consent to any application to Mr. Liston. Through Mr. Coleman's interest, Mr. Hall of Sunbury was complimented with the offer of being appointed agent of American claims. On mentioning to Dr. Priestley, one night at supper, that Mr. Hall had declined it, Dr. Ross's persuasions occurred to me, and I said that such an office as that would have suited me very well. Dr. Priestley replied, if that was the case, he thought he had some interest with Mr. Adams, with whom he had long been acquainted, and who had always expressed himself in terms of the highest friendship: that, trict Judge, acceded to, as the proper course. It was refused, however, by CHASE, Circuit Justice, who ordered process to issue without such letter, saying, at the same time, that if it was necessary to compel the attendance of the members, the case would be continued until the session was over. The court at the same time refused to permit a subpœna to issue directed to the president of the United States. The cause was then continued to April 19, in order to enable the defendant to procure documentary and other evidence which he considered material.

as he never intended to ask any favour of Mr. Adams for himself, I might as well let him try for once to ask one for me. On my objecting that Mr. Adams' politics and mine were probably very different, Dr. Priestley declared that this, so far from being an objection, might be an inducement in my favour; for if Mr. Adams meant to be the ruler of a nation, instead of the leader of a party, he would be glad of an opportunity to exhibit such an instance of liberal conduct. At length I consented, expressly requesting Dr. Priestley to take care that Mr. Adams should not mistake my politics. In consequence of this conversation, Dr. Priestley wrote the following letter,—not a few months, but above two years ago:

"'August 12, 1797. Dear Sir: It was far from being my intention or wish to trouble you with the request of any favours, though it is now in your power to grant them; and it is not at all probable that I shall ever take a second liberty of the kind. But circumstances have arisen which I think call upon me to do it once, though not for myself, but a friend. The office of agent for American claims was offered, I understand, to Mr. Hall of Sunbury, and he has declined it. If this be the case, and no other person be yet fixed upon, I shall be very happy if I could serve Mr. Cooper, a man I doubt not of equal ability, and possessed of every other qualification for the office, by recommending him. It is true, that both he and myself fall, in the language of our calumniators, under the description of Democrats, who are studiously represented as enemies to what is called government, both in England and here. What I have done to deserve that character, you well know, and Mr. Cooper has done very little more. In fact, we have both been persecuted for being friends to American liberty, and our preference of the government of this country has brought us both hither. However, were the accusations true, I think the appointment of a man of unquestionable ability and fidelity to his trust, for which I would make myself answerable, would be truly such a mark of superiority to popular prejudice as I should expect from you. I, therefore, think it no unfavourable circumstance in the recommendation. That you will act according to your best judgment, I have no doubt, with respect to this and other affairs of infinitely more moment, through which I am persuaded you will bring the country with reputation to yourself, though in circumstances of such uncommon difficulty, perhaps with less ease and satisfaction than I could wish. With my earnest wishes for the honour and tranquillity of your presidency, I am, &c., Joseph Priestley.'

"This letter was accompanied by the following from myself:

"'Sir: On my expressing an inclination for the office which Mr. Hall has declined, Dr. Priestley was so good as to offer his services with you on my behalf. Probably the office will be filled ere this letter can reach you: probably there may be objections to nominating a person not a native of the country: probably the objection mentioned by Dr. Priestley, may reasonably be deemed of weight in my instance. Be all this as it may, I see no impropriety in the present application to be appointed agent of American claims, for it is still possible I may suppose more weight in the objections than they will be found to deserve. If it should so happen that I am nominated to that office, I shall endeavour to merit the character the Doctor has given me, and your esteem. I am, &c., Thomas Cooper.'

"Is this the letter of a man, or not? I do not appeal to the cowardly propagator of anonymous falsehoods, but to the public. What is there in it of vanity or servility? Do not these letters take for granted that I am a Democrat, though not a disturber of all government? and that what I am I shall remain, even though it be deemed a reasonable objection to my appointment? Is this, or is this not, adhering to my principle, whatever becomes of my interest? Nor is it true that my address originated from any motives of revenge. Two years elapsed from the date of those letters, before I wrote anything on the politics of this country. Nor did I recollect them at the time. Nor do I see the objection to taking any fair means of improving my situation. This is a duty incumbent on every prudent man who has a family to raise, and which I have already too much neglected from public motives: nor can any office to which I am eligible in this country, recompense me for the offers I rejected in its favour. But it is not in the power of promises or threats, of wealth or poverty, to extinguish the political enthusiasm which has actuated my conduct for these twenty years. The prudence of middle age and the claims of duty may make me cautious of sacrificing my interest, but they cannot induce me to sacrifice my principle. Nor do I see any impropriety in making this request of Mr. Adams. At that time he had just entered into office. He was hardly in the infancy of political mistake. Even those who doubted his capacity thought well of his intentions. He had not at that time given the public to understand that he would bestow no office but under implicit conformity to his political opinions. He had not declared that 'a republican government may mean anything.' He had not yet sanctioned the abolition of trial by jury in the alien law, or entrenched his public character behind the legal barriers of the sedition law. Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, or threatened under his auspices with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace, while the unnecessary violence of official expressions might justly have provoked a war; nor had the political acrimony which still poisons the pleasures of private society, been fostered by those who call themselves his friends and adherents: nor had the eminent services of Mr. Humphreys at that time received their reward. Mr. Adams had not yet projected his embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Sublime Porte; nor had he yet interfered, as president of the United States, to influence the decisions of a court of justice; a stretch of authority which the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from; an interference without precedent, against law and against mercy! This melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native citizen of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered up, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country. A case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised before the election, and they shall be. Most assuredly, had these transactions taken place in August, 1797, the President Adams would not have been troubled by any request from pears ultimately to have been given under a waiver of the supposed privilege; and after considerable altercation between Judge CHASE and the defendant with regard to the character of the evidence to be produced, the jury was sworn, and Mr. Rawle opened the case to the jury substantially as follows:

The defendant stands charged with attempts which the practice and policy of all civilized nations have thought it right at all times to punish with severity, with having published a false, scandalous and malicious attack on the character of the president of the United States, with an intent to excite the hatred and contempt of the people of this country against the man of their choice. It was much to be lamented that every person who had a tolerable facility at writing should think he had a right to attack and overset those authorities and officers whom the people of this country had thought fit to appoint. Nor was it to be endured that foul and infamous falsehoods should be uttered and published with impunity against the president of the United States, whom the people themselves had placed in that high office, and in which he has acted with so much credit to himself and benefit to them. Thomas Cooper stands charged in the indictment as follows: (Here Mr. Rawle read the indictment.) It was a sense of public duty that called for this prosecution. It was necessary that an example should be made to deter others from misleading the people by such false and defamatory publications. There was a peculiarity in the manner also of this publication: we generally observe that persons who take these liberties endeavour to avoid punishment by sheltering themselves under fictitious signatures, or by concealing their names; but the defendant acted very differently. Being of the profession of the law, a man of education and literature, he availed himself of those advantages for the purpose of disseminating his dangerous productions in a remote part of the country where he had gained influence. Such conduct must have arisen from the basest motives. It would be proved to the jury that, at the time of this publication, the defendant went to a magistrate and acknowledged it to be his production, in the same formal manner as if it had been a deed. A conduct so grossly improper had occurred in no instance within his recollection, and the manner constituted no slight aggravation of the offence. Indeed, it was high time for the law to interfere and restrain the libellous spirit which had been so long permitted to extend itself against the highest and most deserving characters. To abuse the men with whom the public has entrusted the management of their national concerns, to withdraw from them the confidence of the people, so necessary for conducting the public business, was in direct opposition to the duties of a good citizen. Mischiefs of this kind were to be dreaded in proportion as the country around is less informed, and a man of sense and education has it more in his power to extend the mischief which he is inclined to propagate. Government should not encourage the idea, that they would not prosecute such atrocious conduct; for if this conduct was allowed to pass over, the peace of the country would be endangered. Error leads to discontent, discontent to a fancied idea of oppression, and that to insurrection, of which the two instances which had already happened were alarming proofs, and well-known to the jury. That the jury, as citizens, must determine whether, from publications of this kind, the prosperity of the country was not endangered; and whether it was not their duty, when a case of this nature was laid before them and the law was applicable, to bring in such a verdict as the law and the evidence would warrant; and show, that these kinds of attacks on the government of the country were not to be suffered with impunity.

Mr. Rawle, after reading the section of the sedition act applicable to the case on trial, proceeded to call John Buyers, who testified as follows: "I know this paper. Mr. Cooper brought it to me on the evening of the 6th of December, 1799, at my house at Sunbury. He came to me at the door of my house. Asked me to walk in. We walked in. This was between candle-light and day-light. He asked for a candle. He perused this paper which I have in my hand, pointed to his name, and said, 'This is my name, and I am the author of this piece.' There was nothing further passed, only he said, 'This may save you trouble another time.' I knew very well what he meant by it."

Cross-examined by Mr. Cooper: "Had not you and I been in the habit of frequently joking with each other upon political subjects? Ans. O yes—very often."

Mr. Rawle here read that part of the publication which is included in the indictment, for which reason it is omitted here.

Mr. Cooper then addressed the jury as follows:

If it were true, as it is not true, that, in the language of the attorney general of the district, I have been guilty of publishing with the basest motives a foul and infamous libel on the character of the president; of exciting against him the hatred and contempt of the people of this country, by gross and malicious falsehoods—then, indeed, would it be his duty to bring me before this tribunal, it would be yours to convict, and the duty of the court to punish me. But I hope, in the course of this trial, I shall be enabled to prove to your satisfaction, that I have published nothing which truth will not justify. That the assertions for which I am indicted are free from malicious imputation, and that my motives have been honest and fair. You will observe, gentlemen of the jury, that the law requires it to be proved as a necessary part of the charge, that the passages for which I am indicted should be false and scandalous, and published from malicious motives: and before you will be able, consistently with your oaths, to convict upon this indictment, you must be thoroughly satisfied that both these parts of the charge are well founded. Nor does it appear to me that the expression of the act, to bring the president into contempt, can be fulfilled, if the accusation, as in the present instance, related to an examination of his public conduct, and no improper motives are imputed to him. And that I have carefully avoided imputing any impropriety of intention to the president, even in the very paper complained of; that the uniform tenor of my conduct and language has been to attribute honesty of motive even where I have strongly disapproved of the tendency of his measures, I can abundantly show. You, and all who hear me, well know that this country is divided, and almost equally divided, into two grand parties; usually termed, whether properly or improperly, Federalists and Anti-Federalists: and that the governing powers of the country are ranked in public opinion under the former denomination—of these divisions, the one wishes to increase, the other to diminish, the powers of the executive; the one thinks that the people (the democracy of the country) has too much, the other too little, influence on the measures of government: the one is friendly, the other hostile, to a standing army and a permanent navy: the one thinks them necessary to repel invasions and aggressions from without, and commotions within; the other, that a well-organized militia is a sufficient safeguard for all that an army could protect, and that a navy is more dangerous and expensive than any benefit derived from it can compensate; the one thinks the liberties of our country endangered by the licentiousness, the other, by the restrictions of the press. Such are some among the leading features of these notorious divisions of political party. It is evident, gentlemen of the jury, that each will view with a jealous eye the positions of the other, and that there cannot but be a bias among the partisans of the one side, against the principles and doctrines inculcated by the other. In the present instance, I fear it cannot but have its effects; for, without impeaching the integrity of any person directly concerned in the progress of the present trial, I may fairly state that, under the sedition law, a defendant, such as I stand before you, is placed in a situation unknown in any other case. Directly or indirectly, the public, if not the private, character of the president of the United States is involved in the present trial. Who nominates the judges who are to preside, the juries who are to judge of the evidence, the marshal who has the summoning of the jury? The president. Suppose a case of arbitration concerning the property of any one of you, where the adverse party should claim the right of nominating the persons whose legal opinions are to decide the law of the question, and of the very man who shall have the appointment of the arbitrators—what would you say to such a trial? and yet in fact such is mine, and such is the trial of every man who has the misfortune to be indicted under this law. But although I have a right to presume something of political bias against my opinions, from the court who try me, to you who sit there as jurymen, I am still satisfied you will feel that you have some character to support and some character to lose; and whatever your opinions may be on the subjects alluded to in the indictment, you will reverence as you ought the sacred obligation of the oath you have taken. Gentlemen of the jury, I acknowledge, as freely as any of you can, the necessity of a certain degree of confidence in the executive government of the country. But this confidence ought not to be unlimited, and need not be paid up in advance; let it be earned before it be reposed; let it be claimed by the evidence of benefits conferred, of measures that compel approbation, of conduct irreproachable. It cannot be exacted by the guarded provisions of sedition laws, by attacks on the freedom of the press, by prosecutions, pains and penalties on those who boldly express the truth, or who may honestly and innocently err in their political sentiments. Let this required confidence be the meed of desert, and the public will not be backward to pay it. But in the present state of affairs, the press is open to those who will praise, while the threats of the law hang over those who blame the conduct of the men in power. Indiscriminate approbation of the measures of the executive is not only unattacked, but fostered, and received with the utmost avidity; while those who venture to express a sentiment of opposition must do it in fear and trembling, and run the hazard of being dragged like myself before the frowning tribunal, erected by the sedition law. Be it so; but surely this anxiety to protect public character must arise from fear of attack. That conduct which will not bear investigation will naturally shun it; and whether my opinions are right or wrong, as they are stated in the charge, I cannot help thinking they would have been better confuted by evidence and argument than by indictment. Fines and imprisonment will produce conviction neither in the mind of the sufferer nor of the public. Nor do I see how the people can exercise on rational grounds their elective franchise, if perfect freedom of discussion of public characters be not allowed. Electors are bound in conscience to reflect and decide who best deserves their suffrage; but how can they do it, if these prosecutions in terrorem close all the avenues of information, and throw a veil over the grossest misconduct of our periodical rulers? After having offered these preliminary remarks, I shall give an account of the paper on which I am accused, and then proceed to examine the charges of the indictment in the order in which they are laid: much that I intended to have advanced I must relinquish, that I may not trespass too long on your time, or weaken the effect of my own defence by fatiguing your attention. The scored paper now handed to me by the attorney general, suggests an observation which, though trite, is material. Upon the plan usually adopted in these ex officio accusations, a good Christian might easily be proved an arrant atheist. "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God." Take the four last words, and they are atheistical: take the sentence, and it is Scripture. So, take the marked passages in this paper, and they may, perhaps, be forced into something like improper imputation against the president: take the paper itself, and the very first paragraph is a plain and positive approbation of his intention. Though I must acknowledge that, however upright I might formerly have believed his motives of action, I cannot, upon reflection, pay that tribute to his conduct or his motives on the present occasion. The general circumstances that gave rise to the paper I now hold, are these: Dr. Priestley, a man whose name implies a greater combination of learning, science, and ability, of important discovery, of exertion for the benefit of mankind, and of private integrity, than any other man now living can boast—whose conduct towards me, in the instance detailed in this paper, is praise sufficient to bear up my mind against any consequences which the present trial can produce—had long been an acquaintance and an intimate acquaintance of Mr. Adams, in England and in this country. The letters of the latter to Dr. Priestley are full of strong expressions of friendship and esteem. Relying upon this long intercourse of cordiality between them, Dr. Priestley urged me to permit him to write to Mr. Adams on the subject of a vacancy mentioned in this paper, and which, as you will have it before you when you retire, I shall not read at length. This application was from one friend to another; upon the face of it a confidential communication; although containing nothing but what might do credit to all the parties concerned. Mr. Adams, however, did not think it so confidential; and from some disclosure on his part, has been founded the base and cowardly slander which dragged me in the first instance before the public in vindication of my moral and political character, and has at length dragged me before this tribunal, to protect, if I can, my personal liberty and my private fortune, against the legal attack of an ex officio information. Hence, it is evident, gentlemen of the jury, that this is not a voluntary, but an involuntary publication on my part: it has originated, not from motives of turbulence and malice, but from self-defence; not from a desire of attacking the character of the president, but of vindicating my own. And in what way have I done this? My motives, my private character, my public character, were the object of falsehood and calumny, apparently founded on information of high authority. In reply, I give credit to the intentions of the president: I say nothing of his private character; and I attack only the tendency of measures notorious to the world, which, having been known to disapprove publicly, I was charged with being ready, from motives of interest, to approve privately. I think, gentlemen, you cannot help feeling this contrast of behaviour, and if the president is satisfied with his side of the picture, I am mine.

The first article selected for accusation is, that, at the time I allude to, "he was but in the infancy of political mistake." Why this expression should have been fixed on as seditious, I know not, unless it be that "quem deus vult perdere prius dementat"; for have we advanced so far on the road to despotism in this republican country, that we dare not say our president may be mistaken? Is a plain citizen encircled at once by the mysterious attribute of political infallibility the instant he mounts the presidential chair? If so, then indeed may it be seditious to say he is mistaken; but before you can condemn me for this kind of sedition, you must become catholic believers in this new-fangled doctrine of infallibility. I know that in England the king can do no wrong, but I did not know till now that the president of the United States had the same attribute. I have said (and I am accused for saying it) "that even those who doubted his capacity thought well of his intentions." Is it a crime to doubt the capacity of the president? Suppose I had said that there were some who did not give him credit for capacity sufficient for the office he holds, is that a crime? Or if in them, is it a crime in me, who have not said it? Nor can the word "capacity" here be fairly construed into any other than a comparative meaning; for surely no one who has read his defence, as it is called, of the American constitution, or who reflects that he has had abilities enough to raise himself to his present situation, can say that he is devoid either of industry or talents. But those who voted for his opponent must have believed Mr. Adams of inferior capacity to that gentleman. Of that number was I; of that number was at least one-half of the people of the United States. If it be a crime thus to have thought and thus to have spoken, I fear I shall continue in this respect incorrigible. But if of two constructions the one is absurd, improbable and unfavourable, surely it should be rejected in favour of that meaning which was most likely to have occurred, and which in its effects will do least injury to a defendant like myself. This is common, this is legal charity. "Nor had we yet, under his auspices, been saddled with the expense of a permanent navy." Gentlemen, is it true or not that we are saddled with the expense of a permanent navy? Is it necessary that I should enter into a detail of authorities to prove that the sun shines at noon-day? But farther, is it true that we incur this expense under his auspices and sanction? I have before me two publications: the one the Gazette of the United States, published by Mr. Fenno in this city; and another, in a form more portable and convenient, purporting to be a selection of addresses and answers to and from the president during the summer of 1798. Not having been able to procure office copies of the documents I wished to refer to, I must offer in evidence such publications as I can find; that class of publications, upon which in fact the mind of the public is usually made up; and upon whose authority the electors of this country determine the characters whom they honour with their suffrage. Indeed, if the opinion that fell from the court this morning be accurate, that no man should hazard an assertion but upon sufficient and legal evidence, and if documents from the public offices in proof of notorious facts are required as such evidence, then are the mouths of the people completely shut up on every question of public conduct or public character: but I cannot help thinking it a fair and reasonable position, that a defendant in such a case as this should be permitted to offer to the jury any evidence that appears to him a sufficient ground for his assertion, and let them decide on its credibility.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. What is it that you say, sir, fell from the court? They have not yet decided what was or what not proper evidence for you to adduce. The court said, if you thought the public documents at your service, you were mistaken. If you undertake to publish, without having proper evidence before you to justify your assertions, you do it at your own risk. Most assuredly, in common traverses, you could not offer the evidence you mention. But we acknowledge that, in such a case as this, greater latitude may be given. If you say the president did write a letter, you must prove it. We should incline to admit gazettes and acts of public authority and notoriety: you might read the speech of the president to both houses of congress in evidence. If you want to prove that the president advocated a navy, you may read the journals of congress or any authentic public document.

Mr. Cooper. If I am defeated in my endeavours to procure these documents, I must offer such evidence as I can procure; and where there is no reasonable suspicion or assignable motive why the publications I offer should misrepresent the transactions I allude to, the probability is in favour of their accuracy; especially when the printers of them are severely punishable for wilful misrepresentation or gross mistake in detailing the public acts of government.

PETERS, District Judge. I admit a great many things from Mr. Cooper, who is without counsel, which I would not admit from others.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. You may read anything and everything you please.

Mr. Cooper then went on to argue at great length, from a copious collection from the public documents of the day, that the policy of the president had been to saddle upon the country a permanent navy and army, and to keep down the liberties of the citizens by his arbitrary interference in the case of Jonathan Robbins. He then said:

Gentlemen, I have gone through all the charges, and I am satisfied that I have brought in support of my assertions the best evidence the nature of my case would admit of. It is true, by resorting to Danbury for depositions and to Charlestown for records, I might have made the evidence in the last charge more complete; but I did not and do not think them necessary to produce further conviction on your minds than you feel on the subject already. This is an important point under the law in question. If such strictness of testimony is required, there is an end at once of all political conversation in promiscuous society. The time, the labour, the difficulty, the expense, the harassment and fatigue of mind as well as of body, which such doctrine would occasion to every citizen whom a corrupt administration might determine to ruin, would be an engine of oppression of itself sufficiently powerful to establish a perfect despotism over the press; and would be a punishment for innocence before trial, too severe to be inflicted on sedition itself. I think you must feel the truth of these remarks: the proceedings on this trial irresistibly suggest them. Gentlemen, if the assertions I have made are true, whatever the motives of them may be, you cannot find me guilty. But I think it impossible, if you consider the paper altogether, that you can ascribe the publication of it to malice: it is on the face of it not voluntary, but compelled. I have, in the very outset of the paper, spoken well of the president: I have been in the habit of thinking his intentions right, and his public conduct wrong: and that this has been the general tenor of my language and behaviour, I believe I can even now bring proof enough from among my friends and my neighbors.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. This is not necessary: it is your conduct, not your character, that is in question. If this prosecution were for a crime against the United States, you might give evidence to your character, and show that you have always been a good citizen; but this is an indictment for a libel against the president, where your general character is not in question.

Mr. Cooper. I am satisfied. I shall fatigue the jury no longer; but rest my defence here.

Mr. Rawle, in reply, said:

Gentlemen of the jury, the defence you have just heard is one of the most extraordinary and unexampled I ever remember to have witnessed in a court of justice. It is no less than to call into decision whether Thomas Cooper, the defendant, or the president of the United States, to whom this country has thought proper to confide its most important interests, is best qualified to judge whether the measures adopted by our government are calculated to preserve the peace and promote the happiness of America. This, however, does not seem to me the real point which you are to try; and I shall therefore (under direction of the court) proceed to state what I conceive to be the question which you, gentlemen of the jury, are now called upon to determine. Thomas Cooper is charged in the indictment with having published a false, scandalous and malicious libel, with intent to defame the president of the United States, and to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against him the hatred of the good people of this country. In the act which defines this offence and points out the punishment, a liberality of defence is given, unknown, I believe, in any other country where the party is tried for a libel on the government. Here the defendant is allowed, under the third section of that act, to give in evidence the truth of the matters charged as a libel in the publication, and the jury have a right to determine the law and the fact under the direction of the court. The true spirit of the law is that the defendant shall not be found guilty of publishing defamatory writings, unless they be false, nor, although they may be false, shall he be considered as guilty under the law, unless the intent of the publication appear to be malicious. That such publication has proceeded upon a knowledge of the truth, he is permitted to give as matter of evidence; and if true, it must be allowed to go far to satisfy the minds of the jury that the malicious motives imputed to him are not true. In private actions for slander, where a man seeks pecuniary redress for the injury his character has sustained, the defendant is entitled to give in evidence, as a defence to the action, the truth of the words spoken or the written libel; and if the truth of the assertions be proved, it will amount to a justification. There is no difference, then, between the defence that may be set up to an action of slander, or libel on a private person, and that which is permitted under the law whereon this indictment is grounded. The defendant has undertaken to satisfy the mind of the jury that, in this publication, he had no malicious intention against the president of the United States; I join issue with him on the point, and request your particular attention to it. He alleges that he did not impute improper motives to the president, and attempts to substantiate his allegation by referring you to his declaration in the outset, where he says that "I cannot believe him (the president) capable of such gross misrepresentations, for I still think well of his intentions, however I may disapprove of his conduct." But to this I shall add that he goes on and concludes with a paragraph, evincing in the clearest manner a settled design to persuade the public that the president of the United States is not fit for the high office he bears, and of this you must be fully convinced from the whole tenor of the expressions which have been read to you in the indictment. It is very far from my views to press hard upon any part of his long address to you, or to make use against him of any unguarded expression, which, on more deliberate consideration, he might have omitted or corrected; yet, when I cannot but observe, from the whole tenor of his present argument, as well as from his publication, that his object is not so much to convince you, gentlemen of the jury, that his assertions are true, as to cast an unmerited reflection on the general character and conduct of the president, I cannot help suspecting him of the motives he disclaims, and I must do my duty by exposing the design as well as the fallacy of the justification he has set up. The defendant has used a little observation respecting the separating in the indictment the text from the context, as I believe he was pleased to term it; and argued that by this means the most upright intentions and laudable expressions might be perverted from their true and obvious meaning. Such an insinuation, however, is not calculated to influence your minds. In framing an indictment, it is my duty to leave out matters of little importance, and to introduce those circumstances only that are truly and legally reprehensible: and he well knows that he can read, if he pleases, the whole of the publication, and that you will have it with you when you consider of your verdict. You will judge, therefore, whether by this observation, it was his, or whether it is my design to confound and perplex the sense. Whether the reflections he has thrown upon the conduct of government, in so many instances throughout his defence as well as in his publication, evince the regard he professes to entertain for the intentions of the president, is to me, as it will be to you, extremely dubious; nor have those professions been confirmed by the singular manner in which he has cited and selected the passages on which his defence has been grounded. Throughout the quotations he has made, particularly from the addresses to the president, and the answers to them, there has been a series of misrepresentations, which it will be my duty to observe upon when I come to consider that part of the charge and his vindication of it. But it is fair to observe that if, from the perusal of partial extracts and passages selected from various publications, he has thought proper to publish a libel, such as that for which he is indicted, against the character of our president, there is no excuse for his conduct; if, on the other hand, he had the whole of the publications before him, and has extracted from them partially and unfairly, his conduct is still more reprehensible, and there is the less excuse, as it is evident, and as you, gentlemen of the jury, must have observed, that he is a man of talents and letters.

Mr. Rawle then proceeded to consider at great length the several points of justification started by Mr. Cooper, and then said:

Gentlemen, you have attended to the words of this charge in the indictment, and you cannot but be impressed that they convey on the face and in the very tenor of them, a conclusive proof of a mala mens, of a malicious and deliberate intention to injure the character of the president: no man can read them without receiving this impression from the perusal. I have not touched on the article respecting the embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Porte; because I did not think it of importance sufficient to occupy much of your time. Indeed, I believe no embassy was ever sent to Russia. There is enough for your consideration against the defendant, without dwelling on these lesser articles of the indictment. Gentlemen, I have no personal animosity against Mr. Cooper; but I have instituted this prosecution because I thought it my duty so to do, and I must make those remarks which the same duty calls forth. The defendant has endeavoured to show that his publication was without malice; but his conduct with Buyers, and his expressions in that publication, prove otherwise: the nature of his defence, though he has stated his opinion of the good intentions of the president, evidently shows that he meant to justify his own conduct and language throughout. You, gentlemen of the jury, under the direction of the court, will decide whether he has presented to you such a justification as will entitle him to your verdict in his favour.

CHASE, Circuit Justice (charging jury). Gentlemen of the jury: When men are found rash enough to commit an offence such as the traverser is charged with, it becomes the duty of the government to take care that they should not pass with impunity. It is my duty to state to you the law on which this indictment is preferred, and the substance of the accusation and defence. Thomas Cooper, the traverser, stands charged with having published a false, scandalous and malicious libel against the president of the United States, in his official character as president. There is no civilized country that I know of, that does not punish such offences; and it is necessary to the peace and welfare of this country, that these offences should meet with their proper punishment, since ours is a government founded on the opinions and confidence of the people. The representatives and the president are chosen by the people. It is a government made by themselves; and their officers are chosen by themselves; and, therefore, if any improper law is enacted, the people have it in their power to obtain the repeal of such law, or even of the constitution itself, if found defective, since provision is made for its amendment. Our government, therefore, is really republican; the people are truly represented, since all power is derived from them. It is a government of representation and responsibility. All officers of the government are liable to be displaced or removed, or their duration in office limited by elections at fixed periods. There is one department only, the judiciary, which is not subject to such removal; their offices being held "during good behaviour," and therefore they can only be removed for misbehaviour. All governments which I have ever read or heard of punish libels against themselves. If a man attempts to destroy the confidence of the people in their officers, their supreme magistrate, and their legislature, he effectually saps the foundation of the government. A republican government can only be destroyed in two ways; the introduction of luxury, or the licentiousness of the press. This latter is the more slow, but most sure and certain, means of bringing about the destruction of the government. The legislature of this country, knowing this maxim, has thought proper to pass a law to check this licentiousness of the press: by a clause in that law it is enacted. (Judge CHASE here read the second section of the sedition law.) It must, therefore, be observed, gentlemen of the jury, that the intent must be plainly manifest. It is an important word in the law; for if there is no such intent to defame, &c., there is no offence created by that law. Thomas Cooper, then, stands indicted for having published a false, scandalous and malicious libel upon the president of the United States, with intent to defame the president, to bring him into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against him the hatred of the good people of the United States. This is the charge. The traverser has pleaded not guilty, and that he has not published, &c., with these views. He has also pleaded in justification (which the law provides for), that the matters asserted by him are true, and that he will give the same in evidence.

It is incumbent on the part of the prosecution to prove two facts: (1) That the traverser did publish the matters contained in the indictment. (2) That he did publish with intent to defame, &c. For the intent is as much a fact as the other, and must be proved in the same manner as other facts; and must be proved as stated in the law of congress—the mere publication is no offence; and in making up your verdict, though you consider them separately, you must take the whole tenor and import of the publication, since the offence is committed by the two coupled together.

First, then, as to the publication. The fact of writing and publishing is clearly proved; nay, in fact, it is not denied. It is proved to have taken place at Sunbury, a considerable distance from the seat of government. It appears from the evidence that the traverser went to the house of a justice of the peace with this paper, whom, of all others, he ought to have avoided; for he must know that it was the duty of the justice of the peace to deliver it immediately to those who administer the government. He did so. It was indecent to deliver such a paper to a justice of the peace, and the manner in which it was delivered was yet more outrageous—if it was done in joke, as the traverser would wish to imply, it was still very improper—but there was the same solemnity in his expression, "This is my name, and I am the author of this handbill," as if the traverser was going to part with an estate. This conduct showed that he intended to dare and defy the government, and to provoke them, and his subsequent conduct satisfies my mind that such was his disposition. For he justifies the publication in all its parts, and declares it to be founded in truth. It is proved most clearly to be his publication. It is your business to consider the intent as coupled with that, and view the whole together. You must take that publication, and compare it with the indictment. If there are doubts as to the motives of the traverser, he has removed them; for, though he states in his defence that he does not arraign the motives of the president, yet he has boldly avowed that his own motives in this publication were to censure the conduct of the president, which his conduct, as he thought, deserved. Now, gentlemen, the motives of the president, in his official capacity, are not a subject of inquiry with you. Shall we say to the president, you are not fit for the government of this country? It is no apology for a man to say, that he believes the president to be honest, but that he has done acts which prove him unworthy the confidence of the people, incapable of executing the duties of his high station, and unfit for the important office to which the people have elected him: the motives and intent of the traverser, not of the president, are the subject to be inquired into by you.

Now we will consider this libel as published by the defendant, and observe what were his motives. You will find the traverser speaking of the president in the following words: "Even those who doubted his capacity, thought well of his intentions." This the traverser might suppose would be considered as a compliment as to the intentions of the president; but I have no doubt that it was meant to carry a sting with it which should be felt; for it was in substance saying of the president, "You may have good intentions, but I doubt your capacity." He then goes on to say: "Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, nor threatened, under his (the president's) auspices, with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace." Now, gentlemen, if these things were true, can any one doubt what effect they would have on the public mind? If the people believed those things, what would be the consequence? What! the president of the United States saddle us with a permanent navy, encourage a standing army, and borrow money at a large premium? And are we told, too, that this is in time of peace? If you believe this to be true, what opinion can you, gentlemen, form of the president? One observation must strike you, viz.: That these charges are made not only against the president, but against yourselves who elect the house of representatives, for these acts cannot be done without first having been approved of by congress. Can a navy be built, can an army be raised, or money borrowed, without the consent of congress? The president is further charged for that "the unnecessary violence of his official expressions might justly have provoked a war." This is a very serious charge indeed. What, the president, by unnecessary violence, plunge this country into a war! and that a just war? It cannot be—I say, gentlemen, again, if you believe this, what opinion can you form of the president? Certainly the worst you can form: you would certainly consider him totally unfit for the high station which he has so honorably filled, and with such benefit to his country. The traverser states that, under the auspices of the president, "our credit is so low that we are obliged to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace." I cannot suppress my feelings at this gross attack upon the president. Can this be true? Can you believe it? Are we now in time of peace? Is there no war? No hostilities with France? Has she not captured our vessels and plundered us of our property to the amount of millions? Has not the intercourse been prohibited with her? Have we not armed our vessels to defend ourselves, and have we not captured several of her vessels of war? Although no formal declaration of war has been made, is it not notorious that actual hostilities have taken place? And is this, then, a time of peace? The very expense incurred, which rendered a loan necessary, was in consequence of the conduct of France. The traverser, therefore, has published an untruth, knowing it to be an untruth.

The other part of the publication is much more offensive. I do not allude to his assertions relating to the embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Sublime Porte. They are matters of little consequence, and, therefore, I shall pass over them. The part to which I allude is that where the traverser charges the president with having influenced the judiciary department. I know of no charge which can be more injurious to the president than that of an attempt to influence a court of judicature; the judicature of the country is of the greatest consequence to the liberties and existence of a nation. If your constitution was destroyed, so long as the judiciary department remained free and uncontrolled, the liberties of the people would not be endangered. Suffer your courts of judicature to be destroyed; there is an end to your liberties. The traverser says that this interference was a stretch of authority that the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from; an interference without precedent, against law and against mercy. Is not this an attack, and a most serious attack on the character of the president? The traverser goes on thus: "This melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court-martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country,—a case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised before the election, and they shall be." Now, gentlemen, there are circumstances in this publication which greatly aggravate the offence. The traverser does not only tell you that the president interfered to influence a court of justice without precedent, against law and against mercy; but that he so interfered in order to deliver up a native American citizen to be executed by a British court-martial under a mock trial, against law and against mercy. Another circumstance is adduced to complete the picture. He tells you that this Robbins was not only an American, but a native American, forcibly impressed by the British; and yet that the president of the United States, without precedent, against law and against mercy, interfered with a court of justice, and ordered this native American to be delivered up to a mock trial by a British court-martial. I can scarcely conceive a charge can be made against the president of so much consequence, or of a more heinous nature. But, says Mr. Cooper, he has done it. I will show you the case in which he has done it. It is the case of Jonathan Robbins. It appears then that this is a charge on the president, not only false and scandalous, but evidently made with intent to injure his character, and the manner in which it is made is well calculated to operate on the passions of Americans, and I fear such has been the effect. If this charge were true, there is not a man amongst you but would hate the president. I am sure I should hate him myself if I had thought he had done this. Upon the purity and independence of the judges depend the existence of your government and the preservation of your liberties. They should be under no influence—they are only accountable to God and their own consciences —your present judges are in that situation.

There is a little circumstance which the attorney-general, in his observations to you, omitted to state, but which I think it right to recall to your recollection, as it appears with what design the traverser made this publication. In this allusion to Jonathan Robbins he expressly tells you this is "a case too little known, but of which the people ought to be fully apprised before the election, and they shall be." Here, then, the evident design of the traverser was, to arouse the people against the president so as to influence their minds against him on the next election. I think it right to explain this to you, because it proves, that the traverser was actuated by improper motives to make this charge against the president. It is a very heavy charge, and made with intent to bring the president into contempt and disrepute, and excite against him the hatred of the people of the United States. The traverser has read in evidence a report made by the president to the house of representatives, and a letter written by the secretary of state, to show that the president had advised and directed this Robbins to be given up; but subsequent facts could not excuse the traverser for what he had written before. Now, gentlemen, with regard to this delivery of Jonathan Robbins, I am clearly of opinion that the president could not refuse to deliver him up. This same Jonathan Robbins, whose real name appears to have been Nash, was charged with murder committed on board the Hermione, British ship of war. This Nash being discovered in America, the British minister made a requisition to the president that he should be delivered up. Then we must inquire whether the president was obliged to give him up? By the twenty-seventh article of the treaty with Great Britain, it is stipulated, "that either of the contracting parties will deliver up to justice all persons who, being charged with murder or forgery committed within the jurisdiction of either, shall seek an asylum within any of the countries of the other, provided this shall be done only on such evidence of criminality as, according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial, if the offence had been there committed." If the president, therefore, by this treaty, was bound to give this Nash up to justice, he was so bound by law; for the treaty is the law of the land: if so, the charge of interference to influence the decisions of a court of justice, is without foundation. The reason why this article was inserted in the treaty, is evident. Murder is a crime against the laws of God and man, and ought never to be committed with impunity. Forgery is an offence affecting all commercial countries, and should never go unpunished; and therefore every government, especially a commercial one, acts wisely in delivering fugitives guilty of such crimes to justice. Nash was charged with having committed murder on board a British ship of war. Now a dispute has arisen whether murder committed on board such a ship of war, was committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain. I have no doubt as to the point. All vessels, whether public or private, are part of the territory and within the jurisdiction of the nation to which they belong. This is according to the law of nations. All nations have this jurisdiction, and the reason is obvious, for every country carrying on commerce, is answerable to other nations for the conduct of their subjects on the ocean. Were it not so, crimes committed on board vessels of war would go unpunished; for no other country can claim jurisdiction. This person, then, was charged with murder committed on board a British ship of war. I say it was committed within the jurisdiction of Great Britain. By the constitution, (since the treaty is the law of the land,) America was bound to give him up: but who is the person to deliver up a fugitive according to that article in the treaty? The president was the only person to take the proper steps, and to take cognizance of the business. He represents the United States in their concerns with foreign powers. This affair could not be tried before a court of law. No court of justice here has jurisdiction over the crime of murder committed on board a British ship of war. Now, as the requisition was made to the president on the part of the British government to deliver this man up, it became necessary to know whether there was sufficient evidence of his criminality pursuant to the treaty. The judge of the court of Carolina was therefore called upon to inquire into the evidence of his criminality. He was the instrument made use of by the president to ascertain that fact. His delivery was the necessary act of the president, which he was by the treaty and the law of the land, bound to perform; and had he not done so, we should have heard louder complaints from that party who are incessantly opposing and calumniating the government, that the president had grossly neglected his duty by not carrying a solemn treaty into effect. Was this, then, an interference on the part of the president with the judiciary without precedent, against law and against mercy; for doing an act which he was bound by the law of the land to carry into effect, and over which a court of justice had no jurisdiction? Surely not; neither has it merited to be treated in the manner in which the traverser has done in his publication. A defence of greater novelty I never heard before.

Take this publication in all its parts, and it is the boldest attempt I have known to poison the minds of the people. He asserts that Mr. Adams has countenanced a navy, that he has brought forward measures for raising a standing army in the country. The traverser is certainly a scholar, and has shown himself a man of learning, and has read much on the subject of armies. But to assert, as he has done, that we have a standing army in this country, betrays the most egregious ignorance, or the most wilful intentions to deceive the public. We have two descriptions of armies in this country—we have an army which is generally called the Western army, enlisted for five years only—can this be a standing army? Who raises them? Congress. Who pays them? The people. We have also another army, called the provisional army, which is enlisted during the existence of the war with France—neither of these can, with any propriety, be called a standing army. In fact, we cannot have a standing army in this country, the constitution having expressly declared that no appropriation shall be made for the support of an army longer than two years. Therefore, as congress may appropriate money for the support of the army annually, and are obliged to do it only for two years, there can be no standing army in this country until the constitution is first destroyed. There is no subject on which the people of America feel more alarm, than the establishment of a standing army. Once persuade them that the government is attempting to promote such a measure, and you destroy their confidence in the government. Therefore, to say, that under the auspices of the president, we were saddled with a standing army, was directly calculated to bring him into contempt with the people, and excite their hatred against him.

It is too much to press this point on the traverser. But he deserves it. This publication is evidently intended to mislead the ignorant, and inflame their minds against the president, and to influence their votes on the next election. The traverser says, he has proved that the president has advocated a standing army—how has he proved it? There is no standing army; I have before stated, the army is only raised for five years, and during the existing differences—he tells you, Mr. Adams is a friend to the establishment of a navy; I wonder who is not a friend to a navy which is to protect the commerce and power of this country. The traverser has, to prove these points, read to you many extracts from the addresses and answers to the president. He has selected a number of passages, which, he asserts, prove the approbation of the president to the creation of a navy, and forming a standing army. But we are to recollect gentlemen, that when in consequence of the unjust proceedings of France, the great mass of the people thought proper to address the president, expressing in those addresses, sentiments of attachment and confidence in the president, and their determination to resist the oppression of the French government, the president replied to them, in answers which generally were the echo of their sentiments, and in fact, his expressions were as general as the nature of the addresses would permit—therefore, the traverser ought to have blamed the addressers, and not the president. The Marine Society of Boston, as old seamen, address the president in favour of a navy. The president in reply, thinks a navy is the proper defence of the country.

I believe, gentlemen, in the first part of my charge, I made remarks on the assertions of the traverser, that the president had borrowed money at eight per cent. in time of peace. Therefore, it will not be necessary to enlarge on that point. You will please to notice, gentlemen, that the traverser in his defence must prove every charge he has made to be true;

he must prove it to the marrow. If he asserts three things, and proves but one, he fails; if he proves but two, he fails in his defence, for he must prove the whole of his assertions to be true. If he were to prove, that the president had done everything charged against him in the first paragraph of the publication—though he should prove to your satisfaction, that the president had interfered to influence the decisions of a court of justice, that he had delivered up Jonathan Robbins without precedent, against law and against mercy, this would not be sufficient, unless he proved at the same time, that Jonathan Robbins was a native American, and had been forcibly impressed, and compelled to serve on board a British ship of war. If he fails, therefore, gentlemen, in this proof, you must then consider whether his intention in making these charges against the president were malicious or not. It is not necessary for me to go more minutely into an investigation of the defence. You must judge for yourselves —you must find the publication, and judge of the intent with which that publication was made, whether it was malice or not? If you believe that he has published it without malice, or an intent to defame the president of the United States, you must acquit him. If he has proved the truth of the facts asserted by him, you must find him not guilty.

After the jury had returned with a verdict of guilty:

CHASE, Circuit Justice. Mr. Cooper, as the jury have found you guilty, we wish to hear any circumstances you have to offer in point of the mitigation of the fine the court may think proper to impose on you, and also in extenuation of your punishment. We should therefore wish to know your situation in life, in regard to your circumstances. It will be proper for you to consider of this. As you are under recognizance, you will attend the court some time the latter end of the week. (The court appointed Wednesday.)

Proceedings on Wednesday, April 30, 1800.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. Mr. Cooper, have you anything to offer to the court previous to passing sentence?

Mr. Cooper. The court have desired me to offer anything relating to my circumstances in mitigation of the fine, or any observation that occurs to me in extenuation of the offence. I have thought it my duty (not for the purpose of deprecating any punishment which the court may deem it proper to inflict, but) to prevent any accidental or apparent harshness of punishment on part of the court, for want of that information which it is in my power to give. For this reason, therefore, and that the court may not be misled, I think it right to say, that my property in this country is moderate. That some resources I had in England, commercial failures there have lately cut off: that I depend principally on my practice: that practice, imprisonment will annihilate. Be it so. I have been accustomed to make sacrifices to opinion, and I can make this. As to circumstances in extenuation, not being conscious that I have set down aught in malice, I have nothing to extenuate.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. I have heard what you have to say. I am sorry you did not think proper to make an affidavit in regard to your circumstances; you are a perfect stranger to the court, to me at least. I do not know you personally—I know nothing of you, more than having lately heard your name mentioned in some publication. Every person knows the political disputes which have existed amongst us. It is notorious that there are two parties in the country; you have stated this yourself. You have taken one side—we do not pretend to say, that you have not a right to express your sentiments, only taking care not to injure the characters of those to whom you are opposed. Your circumstances ought to have been disclosed, on affidavit, that the court might have judged as to the amount of the offence; nor did we want to hurt you, by this open disclosure.

Mr. Cooper. I have nothing to disclose that I am ashamed of.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. If we were to indulge our own ideas, there is room to suspect that in cases of this kind, where one party is against the government, gentlemen who write for that party would be indemnified against any pecuniary loss; and that the party would pay any fine which might be imposed on the person convicted. You must know, I suppose, before you made any publication of this kind, whether you were to be supported by a party or not, and whether you would not be indemnified against any pecuniary loss. If the fine were only to fall on yourself, I would consider your circumstances; but, if I could believe you were supported by a party inimical to the government, and that they were to pay the fine, not you, I would go to the utmost extent of the power of the court. I understand you have a family, but you have not thought proper to state that to the court. From what I can gather from you, it appears that you depend on your profession for support; we do not wish to impose so rigorous a fine as to be beyond a person's abilities to support, but the government must be secured against these malicious attacks. You say that you are not conscious of having acted from malicious motives. It may be so; saying so, we must believe you; but, the jury have found otherwise. You are a gentleman of the profession, of such capacity and knowledge, as to have it more in your power to mislead the ignorant. I do not want to oppress, but I will restrain, as far as I can, all such licentious attacks on the government of the country.

Mr. Cooper. I have been asked by the court whether, in case of a fine being imposed upon me, I shall be supported by a party. Sir, I solemnly aver, that throughout my life, here and elsewhere, among all the political questions in which I have been concerned, I have never so far demeaned myself as to be a party writer. I never was in the pay or under the support of any party; there is no party in this, or any other country, that can offer me a temptation to prostitute my pen. If there are any persons here who are acquainted with what I have published, they must feel and be satisfied that I have had higher and better motives, than a party could suggest. I have written, to the best of my ability, what I seriously thought would conduce to the general good of mankind. The exertions of my talents, such as they are, have been unbought, and so they shall continue; they have indeed been paid for, but they have been paid for by myself, and by myself only, and sometimes dearly. The public is my debtor, and what I have paid or suffered for them, if my duty should again call upon me to write or to act, I shall again most readily submit to. I do not pretend to have no party opinions, to have no predilection for particular descriptions of men or of measures; but I do not act upon minor considerations; I belong here, as in my former country, to the great party of mankind. With regard to any offers which may have been made to me, to enable me to discharge the fine which may be imposed, I will state candidly to the court what has passed, for I wish not to conceal the truth; I have had no previous communication or promise whatever, I have since had no specific promises of money or anything else. I wrote from my own suggestions. But, many of my friends have, in the expectation of a verdict against me, come forward with general offers of pecuniary assistance; these offers I have, hitherto, neither accepted nor rejected. If the court should impose a fine beyond my ability to pay, I shall accept them without hesitation; but if the fine be within my circumstances to discharge, I shall pay it myself. But the insinuations of the court are ill founded, and if you, sir, from misapprehension or misinformation have been tempted to make them, your mistake should be corrected.

PETERS, District Judge. I think we have nothing to do with parties; we are only to consider the subject before us. I wish you had thought proper to make an affidavit of your property. I have nothing to do, sitting here, to inquire whether a party in whose favour you may be, or you, are to pay the fine. I shall only consider your circumstances, and impose a fine which I think adequate; we ought to avoid any oppression. It appears that you depend chiefly upon your profession for support. Imprisonment for any time would tend to increase the fine, as your family would be deprived of your professional abilities to maintain them.

CHASE, Circuit Justice. We will take time to consider this. Mr. Cooper, you may attend here again.

Thursday, Mr. Cooper attended, and the court sentenced him to pay a fine of four hundred dollars; to be imprisoned for six months, and, at the end of that period, to find surety for his good behaviour, himself in a thousand, and two sureties in five hundred dollars each.

NOTE. Judge Chase's conduct in this case, which was marked with a moderation in strong contrast with the harshness afterwards exhibited in the prosecution of Callender [Case No. 14,709], was ably defended by Mr. Harper, in a speech on the sedition act, in the house of representatives in January, 1801 (Harper's Works, 375), and was not thought sufficiently marked, to entitle it even to a nominal place in the memorable articles of impeachment, of November, 1804. Mr. Cooper's defence, however, so written out by himself as to make up a review of the whole administration, attracted great attention; and his imprisonment for an offence thought so trivial, was a popular subject for electioneering declamation. Mr. Adams himself thought the thing had gone too far, and would have pardoned him, had not Mr. Cooper issued a letter, in which he told him, that, so far from asking for clemency, he would not "accept" it, unless coupled with an acknowledgment by the president of the breach of good faith which the publication of the alleged provocatory letter involved. See Aurora, for May 10, 1700. Of course nothing could be done but let the imprisonment run out. This it did, and the fine was paid. Forty years afterwards, at the same time with that imposed upon Lyon [Case No. 8,646], it was repaid with interest. In Porcupine, Mr. Cooper, as well as Dr. Priestley, were among the principal subjects of ridicule and denunciation; but, perhaps, the most bitter notice taken of them by Cobbett, was a poem called "Prison Eclogue," published by him in London, in 1801, and afterwards incorporated in Porcupine's works. The student will find in the Aurora of May 6, May 9, and May 19, papers of some interest emanating from Mr. Cooper on the subject of the trial in the text.

Mr. Cooper's life, however, is so connected with American history, as to require more than a general notice. He was born in London in 1759, and was educated at Oxford. Intended for the law, he did not confine himself to merely legal studies, but devoted himself with great success to the natural sciences, particularly chemistry, over which he soon obtained a mastery. His professional studies, so far as his history shows, never were very severely conducted: and soon after his advent at the bar, he allowed himself to be carried into another orbit, by accepting an ambassadorship from a democratic club in England, to a democratic club in France. For this both he, himself, and his patron, Mr. Watt, of steam-engine fame, from whom his diplomatic credentials had issued, were assailed in the house of commons by Mr. Burke. This gave Mr. Cooper an opportunity which he but too gladly seized; and at once there issued a pamphlet reply, which made up for the want of vivacity of its style by the excessive inflammation of its temper. "As long as you sell this at a high price," said Sir John Scott, "you can do no harm; but the moment it is turned into a penny slip, that moment I will prosecute you." This kindly caution of course shrunk the circulation of the "reply," and the result was, that Mr. Cooper, abandoning for a time politics, undertook to introduce into practice in Manchester, the important secret of extracting chlorine from common salt, which though afterwards so valuable, he was not then able to bring into successful operation.

Leaving the wreck both of business and of political fortune, Mr. Cooper at last made up his mind to accompany Dr. Priestley to America, not free, it must be admitted,—at least so far as Dr. Priestley is concerned,—from the conviction that, resist it as they might, the young republic would soon press them into the ranks of its law-makers. But this seemed to be a mistake, and the result was, that Mr. Cooper soon went into a violent opposition to Mr. Adams, the then president, not, however, until he had first somewhat circuitously intimated that he might accept the post of commissioner of the British treaty. Of this opposition, the prosecution in the text was the fruit. On coming out of prison, Mr. Cooper found the minority rapidly turning into a majority, and in a short time, the administration which had prosecuted him was overthrown. His untiring industry, his almost universal philosophical attainments, and his courageous temper, but more particularly the sufferings he had undergone in the maintenance of the freedom of the press, placed him high in the esteem of the dominant party. After having been appointed a commissioner to negotiate a settlement of the Luzerne difficulties in Pennsylvania—a duty he discharged with remarkable skill and success—he was nominated by Governor McKean to the president judgeship of a judicial district.

Mr. Cooper's proceedings after he became the wielder of judicial power, form an odd sequel to his experience when he was its subject. Scarcely five years had passed after he was out of prison, before he was on the bench; and scarcely five years more had passed before he was impeached before the senate of Pennsylvania, upon charges, which, were it not that they were gravely preferred and amply supported, might be considered burlesques of those upon which he was instrumental in impeaching Judge Chase, in the senate of the United States. He was charged with pouncing upon delinquent jurors on the first day of the court, with fines and bench warrants, in violation of the venerable Pennsylvania practice, of giving them the quarto die post; with imprisoning a Quaker for not pulling off his hat; with committing three parties for "whispering," an offence for which he declared he would hear no apology; with issuing warrants without previous oath, and then committing the constables who refused to serve them; with insisting in one case in examining under oath, a prisoner charged with crime, as to his own guilt; with sending private notes to juries in criminal cases, tending to extract a verdict of guilty; with carting a Luzerne convict to the Philadelphia prison, a thing not then provided for, which ended in the convict being kept in abeyance by the Philadelphia jailor, who refused to receive him, and the court who refused to take him back, thereby, under his new ambulatory commitment, withdrawing the sheriff from his public duties; and with brow-beating counsel, witnesses and parties, in cases so numerous as to make their recapitulation cover three pages. The Presbyterian and Quaker professions, he was charged with declaring in open court, to be "all damned hypocrisy and nonsense;" and divers specifications were given of illegal interference on his part in the profits of cases before him, and of private speculations in interests which were to pass under his adjudication. On February 21, 1811, these charges having been formally laid before the Pennsylvania house of representatives, were referred to a committee, who two days afterwards reported, that the evidence produced before them sufficiently substantiated the specifications of passionate and oppressive judicial bearing, leaving, however, the accusation of peculation without any further basis than that afforded by an imprudent purchase of certain property, sold at sheriff's sale under process from the court, a transaction which, though clear from any moral stain, the committee thought to be of doubtful propriety and dangerous precedent. They submitted, in conclusion, a resolution, "that a committee be appointed to draft an address to the governor for the removal of Thomas Cooper, Esq., from the office of president judge of the Eighth judicial district of Pennsylvania." Under this resolution, which passed 73 to 20, a committee was appointed which reported an address to the governor, which was carried 59 to 34, in the face of a very powerful protest by Mr. Gibson, now chief justice of Pennsylvania, who took the ground that the offences specified by the committee were misdemeanours, cognizable by impeachment alone. To this was joined a paper, in which the greater portion of the minority joined, declaring, that whatever may have been the peculiarities of manner of Mr. Cooper, there was no evidence which showed judicial misconduct. Under the Pennsylvania constitution, the governor "may," on address from the legislature, remove a judge from office; and, as Governor Snyder on a former occasion, when the attempt had been made to shake off the judges of the supreme court, had declared that "may" sometimes means "won't," a vigorous effort was now made to induce him to give once more the same lenient grammatical construction. The governor, it seems, had been the client of Mr. Cooper in former times, and had lived with him for many years on terms of personal intimacy, but whether from this account he felt a greater delicacy in interfering, or whether, in fact, he thought that the case was one in which he ought not to defeat the legislative will, the only reply he made, was a note through the secretary of the commonwealth, announcing that Mr. Cooper's judicial tenure was closed.

Of this procedure, in everything but its result, a duodecimo of the more solemn trial, which in the senate of the United States Judge Chase was the subject, not the least remarkable feature was, that it was carried on, with a few exceptions, by the very party of which Mr. Cooper had been lately one of the most lively leaders, and for which,—if political persecution by an outgoing administration is to be considered as a calamity,—he was one of the greatest sufferers. It may be that, like Callender, he felt a natural disgust when he found that under Mr. Jefferson, many men were put ahead of him who had not received the honours of martyrdom under Mr. Adams; or it may be that when he got on the bench,—for which, by the way, he had not received the necessary professional training,—he became subject to that nervous debility by which the most plethoric patriotism is sometimes there prostrated; but it is certain that very soon he cooled towards the Democrats, and, as was alleged in the evidence before the house committee, even went so far as to drop, when in court, expressions by no means complimentary to their persons, or their doctrines. This change—though not the overt acts said to have sprung from it—he confesses in an address issued from him at the close of the proceedings, at Lancaster, April 4, 1811. "Nor have I been anxious to conceal," he says, "that during a long course of observation on the conduct of parties in this country, I have not found that the Democrats or Republicans have much reason to boast of more disinterested views, or more tolerant principles, than their opponents. I have long found it impossible for me to go all lengths with the party to which I belonged, and, of course, I have shared the fate of all moderate men; I have influence with no party, and have willingly and deliberately incurred the decided hatred of the most violent and thorough going of my own. I went over to France in 1792, an enthusiast, and I left it in disgust. I came here; and seventeen years experience of a democratic government in this country, has also served to convince me it may have its faults; that it is not quite so perfect in practice, as it is beautiful in theory, and that the speculations of my youth do not receive the full sanction of my maturer age; nor do I find that justice and disinterestedness, wisdom, and tolerance, are the necessary fruits of universal suffrage, as it is exercised in Pennsylvania, for these are not always the qualifications that procure a man to be sent as the representative of the people."

Mr. Cooper's fine chemical acquirements, which, during all the storms of his eventful life, had never been submerged, now gave him a safe retreat. He was first placed in a philosophical professorship in Dickinson College, and afterwards in a highly honourable post in the University of Pennsylvania, which he finally abandoned for the chemical chair in Columbia College, South Carolina, of which he soon became president. In the nullification struggle he took a bold part, issuing documents of the most ultra states' rights tone, and showing that if he had added nothing to the sprightliness, he had lost nothing of the fire, of the pamphleteer of 1795–1800. He died in 1840, when engaged in revising the South Carolina Statutes, a duty charged on him by the legislature, after having published, besides numberless tracts on politics, divinity, and metaphysics, a treatise on the bankrupt laws, a translation of Justinian, a treatise on political economy, a manual of chemistry, as well as a general compendium of useful information.

UNITED STATES v. COPELAND.

[2 Hayw. & H. 402.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. May Term, 1862.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW — DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA — HABEAS CORPUS.

The fugitive slave law of 1850 is as applicable to this District as to any of the states, and as this is a circuit court of the United States its authority to appoint commissioners under that law is clear.

At law. This was a petition of Daniel Breed for a writ of habeas corpus for the discharge of the fugitive [William Copeland].

Before DUNLOP, Chief Judge, and MORSELL and MERRICK, Circuit Judges.

DUNLOP, Chief Judge. It was the duty of the court to decide this matter at once. It is a singular fact that for the first time in sixty years this matter has been contested in this court. The court was established in 1801. Three or four days after, the law of 1793, in regard to fugitive slaves and fugitives from justice, were made applicable to this District. From that time this court has decided all cases, both of fugitive slaves and fugitives from justice escaping from a state into this District, and no contest has heretofore been made. The law is precisely the same in regard to fugitives from justice as in relation to fugitive slaves. Contemporaneous expositions of the law will bear us out in this decision, that the law as applied to states is applicable to this District. Governors of states, including some of the free states, have always put this construction on the law, and made demands upon this court for escaped fugitives. It would be singular if we were required to decide, so as to make this District not only a refuge for all the runaway slaves, but for all the criminals and fugitives from justice of all the states in the Union. Judge Story says that the Union could not have been formed but for the principle which this law allows. This was incorporated into the constitution by a vote of all the states. Maryland and Virginia would not have consented to the Union if this District was to be a refuge for their fugitives. The one gave the whole Northwest Territory to the federal government, and both ceded ten miles of territory in the center of the United States for a federal capital. It would require language overbearing and powerful to cause us to make a decision which would deprive these states of the right to take their fugitives here. It is our duty to conform to the unanimous decision of the supreme court, and insist upon the enforcement of a law which has been enforced for sixty years. The court insisted that not only the spirit but the letter of the law of 1850 [9 Stat. 462] rendered it strictly applicable to this District. The language is such as to place it beyond all dispute that congress intended to embrace the District in the provisions of this act. It would certainly be an objectionable construction of the law that all slaves which we own are to be brought here, and all slaves escaping here shall stay. In regard to the appointment of commissioners, we contend that our right is clear, under the law of congress, which makes this a circuit court of the United States. The first section of the law of 1850 authorizes the appointment of commissioners by any circuit court of the United States. The man Copeland is now in the lawful custody of a lawful officer, for a lawful purpose, and we do not feel authorized to interfere in this case. Therefore the writ of habeas corpus is refused.

Indictment [against William G. Cornell] for the murder of one William Kane in Fort Adams in Newport Harbor, alleged to be a place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

At the trial of the cause, the prisoner having pleaded not guilty, it appeared in evidence, that the prisoner was placed on post at 8 o'clock in the evening of the 4th day of July, 1819, and remained on post until relieved by a guard at 10 p. m. of the same night. He was then returning with another soldier (composing, with himself, the relieved guard) under the direction of a corporal, to his quarters, having his musket in his hand, which was loaded according to the common usage, with a ball and three buck shot. As the relieved guard passed along the quarters of the soldiers, the deceased was standing in the door-way of his quarters leaning against the side of the door-frame and laughing; and when the relieved guard had passed a rod or two beyond him, the deceased stepped out of the door-way about a yard, stooped down and took up a handful of gravel, advanced a yard, and carelessly pitched it (to use the expression of a witness), but not with great violence, at the guard; quarrelsome words immediately ensued, and the corporal, who was a little in advance of the relieved guard, said, "Don't make a noise there, come along;" and as he turned round to see what the matter was, the gun flashed; and upon going up to the spot, he found the deceased mortally wounded; and the prisoner upon being asked if he had shot him, answered, "Yes, by God; I hope I have." He also admitted that he had done the act on purpose. The deceased died in a minute or two; and from the time when the gravel was first thrown, to the firing of the gun was so very short a time, that it seemed almost instantaneous. The prisoner appeared to be in a great passion, and was conveyed to the guard-house, where he expressed himself with considerable rage, and upon being told that he had killed the deceased, said among other things, "I don't care a damn, I hope I have." The soldiers at this time appeared greatly exasperated at him. The size of the gravel which was thrown did not appear, but it was testified that the gravel about the spot where the occurrence took place was from an ounce weight in size, to a very small size. It did not appear that there was any injury to the prisoner by the throwing of it. There was some evidence of a previous quarrel, ten or twelve days before, between the prisoner and the deceased, in which the prisoner threatened to kill the deceased the first chance he could get. But it appeared that the parties were then in a high passion, and were good friends afterwards, living in the same quarters. There was also evidence that the soldiers in the garrison had received an extra gill of rum that day, being the customary allowance on the celebration of Independence. But there was no evidence that they were intoxicated. The prisoner was proved to be illiterate, and badly educated, and to be of an irascible temper.

Rivers & Correns were counsel for the prisoner; and the defence at the trial turned mainly on the following points:

(1) That the place where the offence was committed was not under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and therefore the court had no jurisdiction. The argument on this point is fully stated in the charge of the court.

(2) That the petit jury were not duly returned and impannelled. The ground of this objection was, that sixteen jurymen were summoned from the county of Newport, where the offence was committed, on a day of the term previous to that in which the indictment was found by the grand jury, whereas the counsel contended that the venire for this purpose, under the twenty-ninth section of the judicial act of 1789, c. 20 [1 Stat. 88], should not have been until after the prisoner had pleaded. But the court instantly overruled this objection, as forming no part of the issue on trial before the jury, leaving the objection, which they thought of little weight, to be moved afterwards on a motion for a new trial, if the counsel should think there was any thing in it.

(3) That the trial under the same section of the judicial act of 1789, ought to have been in the county of Newport; but the court overruled this objection also, for a similar reason, and for this further reason, that no application had been made to the court for this purpose, either by the prisoner or the United States.

(4) That the offence committed by the prisoner amounted to manslaughter only—and not to murder, and the counsel argued very much at large on this point, and cited the following authorities: 4 Bl. Comm. 191, 192, 357; Gill, Ev. (Lofft.) 738, 780, 740; 1 Hale, P. C. 455, 456, 499, 465; Foster, Cr. Law, 290, 240, 292; 2 Ld. Raym. 1296, 1492; 1 Hawk. P. C. 192; 5 Burrows, 2796; 1

East, P. C. 236, 244. 760, 87; 1 Hawk. P. C. p. 425, § 36; Co. Litt. 282; 1 Esp. 312; [Respublica v. De Longchamps] 1 Dall. [1 U. S.] 114.

Mr. Robbins, for the United States, contested all the points, and on the last point cited, in addition to the other authorities, 4 Bl. Comm. 195, 198, 199.

STORY, Circuit Justice, in summing up to the jury, said: The first question for the consideration of the jury, is, whether the offence is proved to be committed as alleged in the indictment, in a place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. If so, then the crime falls within the prohibitions of the third or seventh section of the act of 1790, c. 9 [1 Stat. 112], and is clearly cognizable by this court; if otherwise, then the jurisdiction entirely fails, and it is quite immaterial to us, what other court possesses jurisdiction. It is completely proved by the evidence, that Fort Adams, the place in which the offence was committed, is the property of the United States, having been duly purchased by the president more than nineteen years ago, under the authority of an act of congress (as we shall presently see), and ever since exclusively possessed by the United States. Copies of the deeds are now before us, and their sufficiency to pass the fee of the lands is not now disputed. But although the United States may well purchase and hold lands for public purposes, within the territorial limits of a state, this does not of itself oust the jurisdiction of sovereignty of such state over the lands so purchased. It remains until the state has relinquished its authority over the land either expressly or by necessary implication.

The constitution of the United States declares that congress shall have power to exercise "exclusive legislation" in all "cases whatsoever" over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings. When therefore a purchase of land for any of these purposes is made by the national government, and the state legislature has given its consent to the purchase, the land so purchased by the very terms of the constitution ipso facto falls within the exclusive legislation of congress, and the state jurisdiction is completely ousted. This is the necessary result, for exclusive jurisdiction is the attendant upon exclusive legislation; and the consent of the state legislature is by the very terms of the constitution, by which all the states are bound, and to which all are parties, a virtual surrender and cession of its sovereignty over the place. Nor is there anything novel in this construction. It is under the like terms in the same clause of the constitution that exclusive jurisdiction is now exercised by congress in the District of Columbia; for if exclusive jurisdiction and exclusive legislation do not import the same thing, the states could not cede or the United States accept for the purposes enumerated in this clause, any exclusive jurisdiction. And such was manifestly the avowed intention of those wise and great men who framed the constitution.

We are then to consider whether the United States have authorized this purchase, and the legislature of Rhode Island has given its consent to it. By an act of congress of March 20, 1794, c. 9 [1 Stat. 345], several harbors and ports, and among them, that of Newport, were authorized to be fortified under the direction of the president; and he was authorized to receive from any state, in behalf of the United States, a cession of the lands on which any of the fortifications with the necessary buildings might be erected, or be intended to be erected; or where such cessions should not be made, to purchase such lands, not being the property of a state, on behalf of the United States. The legislature of Rhode Island, in furtherance of this object, by an act passed in the same year (Laws R. I. p. 551), authorized any town or person in the state, by and with the consent of the governor of the state, to sell and dispose of to the president, for the use of the United States, all such lands as should be deemed necessary to erect fortifications upon, for the defence of the port and harbor of Newport, and to execute deeds thereof in due form of law. The act contains a proviso that all civil and criminal processes issued under the authority of the state, or any officer thereof, may be executed on the lands so ceded, and within the fortifications which may be erected thereon, in the same way and manner as if such lands had not been ceded as aforesaid. The governor of Rhode Island gave his consent in writing to the purchase of the lands in question in due form, by a certificate on the original deeds. The argument of the prisoner's counsel is, in the first place, that the act of Rhode Island contains no cession of jurisdiction in terms, and the consent of the legislature through the governor to the purchase is not a virtual cession of its sovereignty over the place. That argument has been sufficiently considered already, and stands repudiated by the express terms of the constitution. The counsel for the prisoner next contend that the state has retained a concurrent jurisdiction over the place; and, if so, then the averment in the indictment is not supported in point of fact. This leads us to the consideration of the true intent and effect of the proviso already mentioned. In its terms it certainly does not contain any reservation of concurrent jurisdiction or legislation. It provides only that civil and criminal processes, issued under the authority of the state, which must of course be for acts done within, and cognizable by, the state, may be executed within the ceded lands, notwithstanding the cession.

Not a word is said from which we can infer that it was intended that the state should have a right to punish for acts done within the ceded lands. The whole apparent object is answered by considering the clause as meant to prevent these lands from becoming a sanctuary for fugitives from justice, for acts done within the acknowledged jurisdiction of the state. Now there is nothing incompatible with the exclusive sovereignty or jurisdiction of one state, that it should permit another state, in such cases, to execute its processes within its limits. And a cession, or exclusive jurisdiction, may well be made with a reservation of a right of this nature, which then operates only as a condition annexed to the cession, and as an agreement of the new sovereign to permit its free exercise as quoad hoc his own process. This is the light in which clauses of this nature, (which are very frequent in grants made by the states to the United States,) have been received by this court on various occasions, on which the subject has been heretofore brought before it for consideration; and it is the same light in which it has also been received by a very learned state court. Com. v. Clary, 8 Mass. 72. In our judgment it comports entirely with the apparent intention of the parties, and gives effect to acts which might otherwise perhaps be construed entirely nugatory. For it may well be doubted whether congress are by the terms of the constitution, at liberty to purchase lands for forts, dockyards, &c. with the consent of a state legislature, where such consent is so qualified that it will not justify the "exclusive legislation" of congress there. It may well be doubted if such consent be not utterly void. "Ut res magis valeat quam pereat," we are bound to give the present act a different construction, if it may reasonably be done; and we have not the least hesitation in declaring that the true interpretation of the present proviso leaves the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of Fort Adams in the United States.

As to the law applicable to the merits of the case, although a great variety of cases have been cited, some of which are of great and some of very little authority, yet the doctrine for the deliberate consideration of the jury lies within a narrow compass. It is conceded on all sides that the prisoner's offence, at least, amounts to manslaughter. Whether it amounts to murder depends upon the point whether the act was done "with malice aforethought." Now the legal notion of malice is not confined to cases where the crime has been committed in cool blood, with deliberate cruelty, and in execution of a settled design; as where a person deliberately plans the destruction of another by assassination or poisoning. But it includes also all cases of homicide, however sudden, which are attended with such cruel circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved and malignant spirit, or, (to use the language of Sir Michael Foster,) with such circumstances as carry in them "the plain indications of a heart regardless of social duty, and fatally bent on mischief." Foster, Cr. Law, 257. It is not therefore every trivial provocation which in point of law amounts to an assault, or even a blow that will reduce the crime to manslaughter. If the punishment inflicted by the party killing be outrageous in its nature or continuance, and beyond all proportion to the offence, it is rather to be attributed to the effect of a brutal and diabolical malignity, the genuine malice of the law, than of human frailty; and therefore the crime will amount to murder in such cases, notwithstanding the provocation. 1 East, P. C. 234. Nor is it any legal extenuation of the offence, that the party killing is very irritable and easily excited to the most ungovernable passion by slight provocation. These are the common attendants upon a cruel and revengeful disposition. There must be a reasonable provocation, such as would awaken passion in reasonable men, before the law will hold the party in any degree excused on the score of human infirmity. Such is the case of offering indignity to a man's person, by pulling him violently by the nose.

In cases, too, of homicide upon provocation, much depends upon the instrument employed, and upon the manner of chastisement. If the instrument be such in its nature as is likely to endanger life, as a sword or a musket, and the provocation be slight, and death ensue, the party killing will be guilty of murder. Much more will it be murder, if in such case the party killing shoot at the other with intent to kill. But if the instrument be not of a deadly nature, nor used with brutal violence; but the chastisement may be fairly attributed to an intention to correct and not gratify a cruel and malignant spirit of revenge, the crime will amount only to manslaughter. 1 East, P. C. 235.

These are the material principles of law, which I deem it necessary to bring to the consideration of the jury. If upon weighing the facts they are satisfied that there was not a reasonable provocation in the present case, but that it was slight, and the punishment utterly disproportioned to the offence; if they are satisfied that the party was stimulated by a malignant spirit of revenge, and diabolical fury, and sought the life of the deceased with brutal passion, having received no injury that ought to provoke a reasonable man to such an act, then the prisoner is guilty of murder—if otherwise, then he is guilty of manslaughter only.

Verdict, guilty of murder.

A motion was made for a new trial, and the motion was argued at June term, 1820, at Newport, and the opinion of the court delivered thereon. [The motion was overruled and sentence of death pronounced. Case No. 14,868.]

UNITED STATES v. CORNELL.

[2 Mason, 91.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. Rhode Island. June Term, 1820.

CRIMINAL JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS—MILITARY POSTS—VENUE—DISCRETION OF COURT—SPECIAL CRIMINAL SESSIONS — VENIRE — RIGHT OF PRISONER TO COPY OF INDICTMENT—SETTING ASIDE JURORS—EVIDENCE—HOMICIDE — INTOXICATION—MALICE.

1. The constitution of the United States declares, that congress shall have power to exercise "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," over all places purchased by the consent of the legislature of a state in which the same shall be for the erection of forts, &c. Held, that the right of exclusive legislation carries with it the right of exclusive jurisdiction; and where a murder is committed within a fort so purchased with the consent of a state legislature, the circuit court has jurisdiction over the offence under the act of 1790, c. 9, §§ 3, 7 [1 Stat. 112], although in the cession the state reserved a right to execute the civil and criminal processes issuing under state authority in such places.

[Cited in People v. Kelly, 38 Cal. 151.]

2. The legal meaning of "malice aforethought," in cases of homicide, is not confined to homicide committed in cold blood, with settled design and premeditation, but extends to all cases of homicide, however sudden the occasion, when the act is done with such cruel circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit. As when the punishment inflicted by a party even upon provocation, is outrageous in its nature or continuance, and beyond all proportion to the offence, so that it is rather to be attributed to diabolical malignity and brutality than human infirmity. And much in these cases depends upon the instrument employed, whether dangerous to life or not.

[6. The fifth and twenty-ninth sections of the act of 1789, even if still in full force, contemplate that the prisoner may rightfully be tried at a regular stated session of the court; and that it is in the discretion of the court to appoint a special session upon considerations of inconvenience. The prisoner may be tried at a regular session without an express adjudication by the court that there would be inconvenience in having the trial at a special session, where neither the prisoner nor the United States makes any application to the court upon the subject or any objection to the time or place of trial.]

[8. A motion for a special session comes too late after an indictment found at a general session, and a fortiori when a trial has been had upon such indictment. The right to trial in the county where the offence is committed is a privilege granted to the prisoner. He is not bound to insist upon it, and may waive it, and require an immediate trial. Hence, where an indictment might be tried in the county where the offence was committed by obtaining a continuance until the next stated session of the court, which, by law, is required to be held at a place in that county, but the prisoner fails to move for a continuance, this is a waiver of his right, and the trial of the case out of that county cannot thereafter be insisted upon as invalidating the verdict.]

[This was an indictment against William G. Cornell, for the murder of William Kane. At the trial there was a verdict of guilty of murder. Case No. 14,867. Heard on motion for a new trial.]

This motion for a new trial was made at the last November term, at Providence, and was continued over to this term for argument. It contained the following causes for a new trial: First. That the trial of said indictment was not had in the county of Newport, where the said supposed offence was committed; but in the county of Providence, although said trial might have been had in said county of Newport, without "great inconvenience." Secondly. That the said court did not decide, that it was greatly inconvenient to have said trial in said county of Newport, after first allowing said Cornell an opportunity to be heard upon said question. Thirdly. That the venire or order for summoning the jury who were to try said indictment, was issued and served before the said bill of indictment was found by the grand jury. Fourthly. That said court had no jurisdiction to try said indictment, the place within which said offence was supposed to have been committed, not being proved in said trial to be within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States aforesaid. Fifthly. That said Cornell had not a true copy of said indictment, two full days before his trial; the words, "a true bill," endorsed thereon by the grand jury, not being contained in the copy which was delivered to said Cornell. Sixthly. That jurors from the town of Portsmouth, who were summoned in said cause, were not legally warned to attend said court; being warned by the town clerk of said town, and not by the town sergeant, as by the statute of Rhode-Island it is required; and the jurors from the town of Newport, who also were summoned in said cause, and sat in said trial, were not legally warned to attend said court, being warned by a constable of said town, to whom said summons was directed. Seventhly. That the said court did set aside two jurors who were summoned in said cause, upon said jurors expressing, without being under oath or affirmation, that they had conscientious scruples against sitting as jurors in said cause, and without said jurors being challenged either by the said Cornell or the district attorney. Eighthly. That, at said trial, the said court rejected evidence which was offered by said Cornell, to show the manner of the education of said Cornell, in order to mitigate and extenuate said offence, and to show it was only manslaughter. Ninthly. That after the said Cornell's defence was closed to the jury on Saturday evening, the said court adjourned till Monday morning, and then permitted the district attorney to introduce new and further evidence in said cause: to wit, the testimony of Jonathan Almy, and the records of the town of Newport. And immediately after the introduction of said evidence, the said Cornell offered further evidence to explain the facts in said cause, and to prove his defence, which was not objected to by the district attorney, but rejected by the said court; and the said Cornell prayed to be then further heard by his counsel in said cause, which was denied by said court, except as to the testimony of Jonathan Almy, and said records. The principal witnesses by whom said Cornell expected to prove said further facts, having already been examined in said cause. Tenthly. That said court in their charge to the jury, did not instruct them, that said Cornell being on guard at the time of said transaction, increased the provocation given by the deceased, and although they instructed said jury, that in cases of this kind, much depends upon the instrument or weapon with which the mortal blow is inflicted, said jury were not informed that the weight of this circumstance was lessened in the present case, by the musket being lawfully in said Cornell's hands at the time. Eleventhly. That the said court instructed said jury that the said Cornell being deficient in understanding, or having received a bad, or little, or no education, should have no effect to mitigate, extenuate, or lessen, or in any degree to answer or apologize for said offence, and also did instruct said jury, that they had a right, and it was their duty to weigh the evidence in said cause. Twelfthly. That since said trial, evidence has been discovered, which was before unknown to said Cornell, or his counsel, that Benjamin Raymer, a witness in said cause, who testified to previous threats used by said Cornell towards the deceased, did say, previous to said trial, that "he would do all in his power to hang said Cornell." Thirteenthly. That since said trial, the said Cornell has discovered new and further evidence, to wit: that of Isaac Wilmot, who was summoned by said Cornell to attend said trial, but who was confined by sickness at Newport; and this fact was not known till the said trial had commenced: That said Wilmot, had he been present at said trial, would have testified that the said deceased insulted and threw gravel-stones at said Cornell, while on post, on the night of the said fourth of July; and also that the gravel-stones which were proved to have been thrown by the said deceased, at said Cornell, hit him on his face and back, and were thrown with great violence and anger; and that he expects said Wilmot will testify to said facts, should a new trial be granted. Fourteenthly. That the further evidence mentioned above in said ninth cause, and which may be had at a new trial, should such trial be granted, would show that all the soldiers in said garrison or fort, had as much liquor as they wanted, and many of them, including several of the United States' witnesses, and more especially the said deceased, were intoxicated at the time of said transaction.

Rivers & Correns. for prisoner.
Mr. Robbins, U. S. Dist. Atty.

STORY, Circuit Justice. The motion for a new trial in this case, was filed at the last term of the court, and together with some new grounds now for the first time suggested, has been argued with uncommon diligence by counsel. If I felt any doubt as to the principles of law involved in the discussion, I should take time to consider them. In any case, where a reasonable doubt lingered in my mind, I should pause a long time before I should pronounce judgment. In a capital cause, every motive of humanity and justice, combining with the precepts of the law, would compel me to postpone a decision until all such doubts were dissipated. I never will be instrumental in taking away life, until I am clearly persuaded that the law imposes upon me this painful and melancholy duty. On the present occasion, however, on the most mature reflection, I am constrained to say, that I entertain no doubt as to the law of the case; and, however reluctantly, I am bound to overrule the motion for a new trial. I might indeed postpone judgment to another term; and if I thought that there could be any benefit in such a course, I would cheerfully pursue it. But it would be injustice to the public, and scarcely be mercy to the prisoner, to keep him in a state of apparent suspense, when there was no reasonable hope of coming to a conclusion that must not be unfavourable to him.

I will now proceed to give briefly my reasons for overruling the motion for a new trial, premising that the reasons filed, do not present a fair and just state of the case. I dare say, this was done without any design to misrepresent, but from a desire to present every objection in the manner best adapted to avail for the prisoner. There are many omissions and mistakes in these reasons, which give an untrue colouring to the cause, and do injustice to the court. When any part of a charge is excepted to, it should be stated with accuracy, and with all the qualifications and circumstances which belonged to it, as it was delivered. However, I do not complain: it is sufficient to say, that I enter my protest against its being taken for granted, that the language and doctrines imputed to the court, are accurately stated either in substance or form. I will pursue the order of the causes assigned for a new trial, by the counsel themselves.

1st and 2d. As to the first and second causes. The judicial act of 1789, c. 20, § 11 [1 Stat. 78], gives exclusive cognizance to the circuit courts, "of all crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States," with some exceptions, not material for our present consideration. It is clear that the circuit courts have jurisdiction over the offence of murder, for it is not pretended to be within any exception contemplated by the act; and if this crime be committed in any place under the exclusive authority of the United States, within this district, (as in the present case it was) it follows that this court has jurisdiction to hear and try it; for the statute contains no limitation of places within the district, where the jurisdiction is to be exclusive. The grand jury then, at the last term of this court, at Providence, were fully authorized to inquire into this particular offence, and the indictment found by them against the prisoner, was then and there regularly before the court. This doctrine has not, as far as my knowledge extends, ever been brought into judicial doubt in any of the capital trials which have taken place since the passage of the statute. It has been denied, however, in the present case, plain and incontestable as it seems to be, and that, as I gather, principally with a view to sustain the objection contained in the first and second causes assigned for a new trial. And yet if the doctrine be not well founded, it is extremely difficult to perceive what jurisdiction the circuit court sitting at Newport, could possess over the offence, for no other clause of the statute specifically gives it; and yet the objection itself admits it. The principal objection is founded on another section of the act of 1789. The 5th section of that act declares, "that the circuit courts shall have power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes at any other time at their discretion," than the regular terms prescribed by law. And the 29th section of the same act declares, "that in all cases punishable with death, the trial shall be had in the county where the offence was committed; or where that cannot be done without great inconvenience, twelve petit jurors at least, shall be summoned from thence." The argument is, that this last section is peremptory upon the court, to try the cause in the proper county, unless there be great inconvenience; and that such an adjudication ought to be solemnly made by the court upon argument in behalf of the prisoner, before it can proceed to the trial in any other county.

Now in the first place, it may admit of doubt, whether this clause of the statute was meant to apply to any crimes against the United States, excepting such as should be committed within the body of some county of the state. The place where the crime was committed by the prisoner, was a fort, ceded to and within the exclusive jurisdiction of, the United States. Strictly speaking, it was not within the body of any county of Rhode Island, for the state had no jurisdiction there. It was as to the state as much a foreign territory, as if it had been occupied by a foreign sovereign. I mention this only in passing, not meaning to rely on it, and suggesting it only for further consideration, whenever any case may specially require it.

To proceed with the objection. Every statute must have a reasonable construction: and every clause in it is so to be construed as if possible to avoid any repugnancy, and to give effect to all the provisions. If the indictment was well found by the grand jury, at the term at Providence, and the court there had jurisdiction of it, as in my judgment is beyond the reach of any legal doubt, our first inquiry naturally is in what manner the trial could be removed to the county of Newport, supposing the crime to be committed there. There is no pretence to say, that the statute anywhere authorizes a general stated session of the circuit court to be adjourned to any other place or county, than that in which it is directed to be first holden. If it can be done for one cause pending in the court, it may be done for all; yet it never was imagined, that a circuit court directed to be held at Providence, could at the option of the judges, be adjourned to meet at Newport or Bristol. The statute by naming a particular place, has been always supposed to exclude every other. And in my judgment, there is no ground upon which any other construction can reasonably be given to it. But if it were merely a matter of doubt, the court ought not to direct an adjournment; for the business of a court of justice is too serious and important to run the hazard of having all the proceedings void for want of jurisdiction; if no such right of adjournment should exist, all that should be done on such adjournment, would be coram non judice. In fact, the counsel for the prisoner do not contend that such a power of adjournment of a general stated term does exist.

Then as to a special session to be holden for the trial of criminal causes. This is provided for in the 5th section of the act of 1789, already quoted. It is remarkable, however, that in terms it only authorizes such special courts to be holden at any other time than the general sessions, but contains not one word as to the place where such special sessions are to be holden. And if this section were to be construed by itself, it would be difficult to show that the special sessions were not by necessary implication to be held at such places only as the general sessions enumerated in the preceding part of the section. But with reference to the exigency of the 29th section, it may perhaps be fairly construed to authorize such special sessions in cases punishable with death, in the county where the crime is committed. Vide [U. S. v. Insurgents of Pennsylvania], 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 513. Yet, if at such a special session, an indictment for murder should be found, and the prisoner on his trial be convicted of manslaughter only, it might deserve consideration whether the court could proceed to award judgment upon the verdict. It is also matter of very earnest inquiry, how far these sections have been modified or repealed by the 3d section of the act of 2d of March 1793, c. 22 [1 Stat. 333]. That section declares, that the supreme court, or when it is not sitting, any one of the justices thereof, together with the judge of the district, within which a special session as thereafter authorized shall be holden, may direct special sessions of the circuit courts to be holden for the trial of criminal causes, at any convenient place within the district, nearer to the place where the offences may be said to be committed, than the place or places appointed by law for the ordinary sessions. I do not profess to know the history of this provision, but I cannot but suspect, that it grew out of the very difficulties, which have been above suggested. It embraces "criminal cases" generally, and therefore includes capital cases as well as others. It provides for holding special courts not in the county where the crime is committed, as in the act of 1789, but at any convenient place nearer the place where the offence is said to be committed, than the place appointed for the regular sessions; and it further provides that such special sessions may (not shall) be holden, leaving the appointment of course to the sound discretion of the judges; as indeed it had been left by the former act. It appears to me that this section from its whole scope, was intended to operate as a material modification, and in some respects as a repeal pro tanto of the provisions of the 5th and 29th sections of the act of 1789. The provisions of these acts are not in all respects compatible; and wherever the authority confided by the last act is exercised, it manifestly excludes the exercise of like authority under the first. I have seen and considered the case of U. S. v. Insurgents of Pennsylvania, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 513, on this point; and it has not at all shaken the opinion I had previously formed.

But supposing the clauses in the 5th and 29th sections of the act of 1789, to be in full force in all respects, still they contemplate in the plainest manner that the prisoner may rightfully be tried at a regular stated session of the court; and that it is in the discretion of the court to appoint a special session. This is the positive language of the 5th section, and though the language of the 29th section, as to capital cases, uses the imperative "shall," yet it leaves the case to be judged of in the discretion of the court upon considerations of inconvenience, and has been uniformly so interpreted. [U. S. v. Hamilton] 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 17; [U. S. v. Insurgents of Pennsylvania] Id. 513. It is very true that in the case at bar, the court did not adjudge that there would be any inconvenience in trying the offence at a special session; and this arose from the obvious cause, that neither the United States nor the prisoner, ever applied to the court on the subject. No objection was made by either party to the time or place of trial; and unless upon motion by some party, I do not perceive that the court was bound to order a special session.

But admitting that the court might have ordered a special session in this case ex mero motu, still it seems to me that if it were ordered, unless the indictment were found at such special session, there could be no trial of the prisoner at such special session. He could not be tried upon an indictment found at a regular stated session, because no authority is by law given to remove an indictment found at such session to any special session. It must be tried at a regular stated session and none other. This was manifestly the opinion of the supreme court in the case of U. S. v. Hamilton, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 17, and acted upon in the case of U. S. v. Insurgents of Pennsylvania, Id. 513. The indictment, therefore, found against the prisoner, could not have been removed to any special session; and after such an indictment found at a general session, there seems to me extreme difficulty in admitting that another indictment for the same offence could have been found at any special session, while the former remained undetermined. There are other difficulties in respect to a special session, which are stated in the cases above cited, which it would not be easy to overcome; but that already mentioned is decisive. The indictment being regularly found at a general session, could only be tried at such session; and the court, therefore, if it had been applied to for this purpose, would have been compelled to deny the application. I agree, also, to the soundness of the doctrine in [U. S. v. Insurgents of Pennsylvania] Id. 513, 514, that a motion for a special session comes too late after an indictment found at a general session; and a fortiori it comes too late, when a trial has been had upon such an indictment. For the reasons already suggested, we may safely conclude that no special session could have been properly held after the indictment was found; and if held, the court would have been without competent authority to try this indictment at such special session. And certainly it can be no error in the court not to have exercised a discretion which it was not called upon to exercise.

Still, however, the trial in the present cause, might have been had in the county of Newport, by continuing the cause to the next general session of this court, which by law is required to be at that place. And if any application had been made to the court for this purpose, it would have been most cheerfully acceded to. But no such application was made; the objection was indeed taken after the trial had commenced, but was urged at that time not to procure a continuance, but to procure a verdict of acquittal, upon the ground that the whole proceedings were coram non judice. The right to a trial in the county where the offence is committed, is a privilege granted to the prisoner. He is not bound to insist upon it, unless he chooses. He may waive it, and require an immediate trial. In fact, when a person is in custody on a charge for any offence, if no indictment be found against him, at the next term of the court, he is regularly entitled to be discharged, unless a very special cause be shewn to the court, authorizing a further detention. If an indictment be found, he is entitled to an immediate trial at the same term, unless the most weighty reasons to the contrary exist. The law will not endure that a man shall be kept in confinement for six months after a regular term of the court, when it is uncertain whether he has committed any offence or not. Such confinement would be an extreme hardship, and operate as a punishment upon a man whom a jury may pronounce guiltless. It is, therefore, only under extraordinary circumstances, that courts of justice allow delays in such cases. And when the indictment is for a capital offence, every reason of justice and of convenience, both to the public and to the prisoner, still more forcibly applies. But where neither the government nor the prisoner apply for any delay, where, as in the present case, both parties professed to be ready for a trial, and were earnest for it; where no objection to the course is hinted at from any quarter, it would be an extraordinary use, not to say abuse, of the discretion of a court to compel the parties to undergo the inconveniences of a long delay, whereby they might be in danger of losing part of their testimony, or of having unfavorable impressions excited against them. It appears to me, therefore, that in the present case, the court, when the parties were ready, was bound to proceed to the trial; and as the prisoner neither asked nor wished a trial at Newport, he waived any benefit and avoided any disadvantage to be derived from the provision of the act, (supposing it in force,) addressed to that object. He had the full benefit of a fair trial by impartial men, and sixteen of the panel were summoned from the county of Newport. The court, therefore, followed out in the most liberal manner, the directions of the act. And I may add, never was a criminal convicted upon plainer or more conclusive evidence. Having spoken thus largely on these points, I proceed to the third exception.

3d. As to this little need be said. The jury were summoned from the proper county; and were summoned in the only way known to our laws. Here, a jury is not drawn for a single cause, but the panel is returned to serve in all proper causes, civil as well as criminal, which may be depending at that term before the court. It was apparent, that if an indictment was found against the prisoner, there would be a defect of jurymen, if he exercised the full right of challenge; and the court did only its duty in providing in the speediest manner for this defect according to the known, settled, and universal usage in like cases. This objection is not now insisted upon; and I therefore pass it over without any farther notice. And see U. S. v. Fries, 3 Dall. [3 U. S.] 515.

4th. The fourth exception was fully considered at the trial; and I have pondered upon it deliberately since; and am entirely satisfied that the charge of the court was correct in point of law; and I have nothing further to add to what has been already suggested.

5th. The fifth exception admits of a short reply. The prisoner was asked before his arraignment if he had received a copy of the indictment two entire days before his trial, according to the provisions of the act of 30th of April, 1790, c. 9, § 29. He admitted that he had. And there is no pretence to say, that the omission alluded to, was in the slightest degree prejudicial to him. The right to a copy is a privilege granted by the law for his benefit, and he is at liberty to receive it, if he pleases. By his conduct on this occasion he did waive it, and that too at a time when he had the full benefit and advice of counsel. He might have expressly waived having any copy; and in such a case could it be justly said that there was a mis-trial? In the nature of things, this is a preliminary proceeding, and if not insisted upon before pleading and trial, the objection cannot afterwards be insisted on. Mr. Justice Foster, in commenting on an analogous provision of the statute 7 Wm. III. c. 3, § 1, and 7 Anne, c. 21, § 11, after stating that a copy of the caption of the indictment ought to be delivered, says: "But if the prisoner pleadeth without a copy of the caption, as some of the assassins did, he is too late to make that objection, or indeed any other objection that turneth on a defect in the copy, for by pleading he admitteth that he hath a copy sufficient for the purposes intended by the act." Foster, Cr. Law, Discourse 1, c. 3, § 6, pp. 229, 230. And this doctrine has been recognized as good law ever since. Rockwood's Case, 4 State Tr. 667; 1 East, P. C. c. 2, § 49, p. 113.

6th. The sixth exception turns upon the language of the statute of Rhode-Island respecting jurors, which directs that the jurors drawn to serve at any court, shall be warned to attend by the town sergeant, six days before the court at which they are to serve. Laws R. I. 1798, pp. 182, 183. This is plainly a mere direction to the public officers to prevent a defect of jurors. It has nothing to do with the qualifications of jurors, or with the regularity of their draft. The jurors are not less qualified because they attend without warning; although, if not warned, they certainly are not liable to any penalty for non-attendance. Even in the state courts of Rhode-Island, this exception must be utterly nugatory. If a juror attend the court, for which he is regularly drawn, it is sufficient, and no exception on this account lies to his competency. Assuming, therefore, that the state laws as to these collateral proceedings, are, under the acts of congress (Act Sept. 29, 1789, c. 20, § 29; Act May 13, 1800, c. 61 [2 Stat. 82]), obligatory upon this court, (which is assumed merely for the sake of the argument) there is nothing in the objection. There is another answer equally conclusive. The jurymen from Portsmouth, though returned on the panel, did not sit in the cause, but were put aside for another cause. The prisoner made no challenge to the array or to the polls on this account. Indeed the setting aside of these jurors, and not suffering them to be sworn on the jury, constitutes the next exception in the case, and is entirely repugnant to the present. If the prisoner was tried by lawful jurors, it is after the trial utterly unimportant what were the defects of other jurors, who were summoned and were not sworn.

7th. The seventh exception may be disposed of in a very few words. When the jurors mentioned in this exception, were called to be sworn, they both appeared to be Quakers, and excepted to themselves as disqualified, because they were conscientiously scrupulous of taking away life, and did not think themselves impartial in a capital cause. In point of fact, one of them is now of the sect of Friends or Quakers, and the other professes their tenets, but has latterly been excluded from their meetings. It is well known, that the Quakers entertain peculiar opinions on the subject of capital punishment. They believe men may be rightfully punished with death for the causes set down in the divine law, but for none others; and in point of conscience they will not give a verdict for a conviction where the punishment is death, unless the case be directly within the terms of the divine law. Now it is well known to us all, that our laws annex the punishment of death in several cases where the divine law is silent, and under circumstances different from those expressed in that law. To compel a Quaker to sit as a juror on such cases, is to compel him to decide against his conscience, or to commit a solemn perjury. Each of these alternatives is equally repugnant to the principles of justice and common sense. To insist on a juror's sitting in a cause when he acknowledges himself to be under influences, no matter whether they arise from interest, from prejudices, or from religious opinions, which will prevent him from giving a true verdict according to law and evidence, would be to subvert the objects of a trial by jury, and to bring into disgrace and contempt, the proceedings of courts of justice. We do not sit here to procure the verdicts of partial and prejudiced men; but of men, honest and indifferent in causes. This is the administration of justice which the law requires of us; and I am not bold enough to introduce a practice, which corrupts the very sources of justice. The objection, however, affects to place some reliance upon the fact, that the jurors were not sworn or affirmed to the truth of their statements. But this was surely unnecessary, where no doubt was entertained of their perfect veracity. I agree with the doctrine laid down in the book cited by the prisoner's counsel, that where the jurors challenge themselves, they may be sworn to the truth of their asseverations. 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 443. But when these are undoubted, of what use can it be to make assurance doubly sure? I may add, that in all the courts of New-England, where I have seen practice, the course pursued on this occasion, has been uniformly adopted. I do not deny, that the facts to establish a lawful challenge to the polls may be ascertained by triors according to the course of the common law; all I assert is, that this is not the usual or necessary mode with us; and least of all is it proper, where the facts are not disputed, and the cause of challenge is apparent and admitted, and resolves itself into a mere point of law. Even if a juror had been set aside by the court, for an insufficient cause, I do not know that it is matter of error, if the trial has been by a jury duly sworn and impanelled, and above all exceptions. Neither the prisoner nor the government in such a case have suffered any injury.

8th. I pass over the eighth exception, because it is abandoned by the counsel for the prisoner, with the single remark, that if a bad or low education would in point of law justify or excuse crimes, it would be the most facile mode of avoiding punishment that could be devised; for to this cause is generally to be attributed many of the most shocking crimes and immoralities committed in all countries.

9th. The ninth exception presents a specious, but when the facts are ascertained, a most delusive objection. The trial commenced on Friday, and the whole evidence was gone through on both sides by Saturday noon. The counsel for the prisoner were then indulged with the utmost latitude of discussion, and occupied the attention of the jury for nine hours, and then came voluntarily to a conclusion of their arguments. In the course of the trial, it became necessary to ascertain whether the land, on which the crime was committed, had been granted by the proprietors, as well as ceded by the state, to the United States. Copies were produced from the proper town records, (where, by the laws of the state, all deeds of lands lying in the town are recorded) duly certified; but upon inspection of these copies, it was apparent that the certifying officer, from the great haste in which these copies had been made, had erroneously stated the dates of one or more of them. The real dates were scarcely susceptible of doubt. But under all the circumstances, it was thought advisable to send for the original records, and they were accordingly brought into court, by Mr. Almy, the town-clerk, on Monday morning, (the court having been adjourned from Saturday evening to give the district attorney an opportunity to close the case) and Mr. Almy was then sworn to the single fact, that these were the original records, and upon inspection, the errors in date were immediately detected and admitted by the counsel for the prisoner. Application was then made by the counsel for the prisoner to the court, to permit them again to interrogate the witnesses, who had been produced on the part of the United States, as to a single fact, (the fact stated in the thirteenth exception) to wit: that the soldiers had had more liquor on the day the offence was committed, than usual, and as much as they wanted, so as to raise an inference, that they, or some of them, as well as the prisoner, were intoxicated. Every one of these witnesses had been interrogated by the prisoner's counsel upon their prior examination again and again, as to this fact, and every one gave a distinct decisive answer in general, negativing any notion of intoxication. They stated the quantity of liquor which had been given; and the whole testimony on this point was fully sifted by the prisoner's counsel in their argument. It is to be observed, that the defence of the prisoner did not turn upon any doubt of the testimony as to the principal facts. It was admitted that he killed the deceased; that he did it voluntarily; that the prosecution was truly stated. The principal grounds of defence were, that the provocation was such as legally reduced the crime from murder to manslaughter; that the prisoner was intoxicated at the time, and this was a legal extenuation of the crime, that is to say, that murder committed by a drunken man, is ipso facto reduced to manslaughter; that Cornell was an illiterate man, of gross and furious passions; and that a crime which would be murder in an intelligent moderate man of reasonable discretion, could be but manslaughter in the prisoner, because of his ignorance and his furious passions. The court were of opinion, that under all the circumstances of the case, there was no reasonable ground for entering again upon a re-examination of the testimony, on the point above stated. It was an application to their sound discretion, and should have been granted only when it was manifest that public justice required it. Here, no new witnesses were offered, no new facts were suggested. The witnesses had already deliberately given their testimony on the very point, and it had been deliberately examined. There was nothing but a suggestion of counsel, that they might be able to draw forth contradictory answers from the same witnesses; a thing certainly not to be presumed at such a time, and upon such a trial. And the bearing of the facts upon the merits of the case, in point of law, was so slight, that in the opinion of the court, it was a waste of time to dwell longer upon it. It had the air of pressing a solemn defence against all the principles of law, and of grasping after shadows to postpone a verdict. The court felt that the dignity of the law, and the justice of the country, ought not to be left open to the imputation of being but a solemn trifling.

10th. The tenth exception has been almost abandoned by the counsel. The suggestions of the court, that the nature of the weapon, by which the death is inflicted, is often extremely material in cases of homicide, were made in order to explain the doctrines of the cases cited by the counsel for the prisoner. There was no room for the application of the principle of such cases to the present, for it was proved and admitted, that the prisoner intended to kill, and that his musket was a deadly weapon. Nor could it have been proper for the court, in the prisoner's case, to have stated that his being lawfully possessed of the musket, made any legal difference as to the crime. God forbid that it should ever be supposed to be law, that the lawful possession of a deadly weapon, justifies or excuses any man in the commission of murder. But surely the omission of the court to state a circumstance, which may be material for the prisoner, is not matter of error. In a long and complicated cause, such an omission may and certainly sometimes does occur; but it is always in the power of counsel, by suggesting the omission, to recall the fact to the attention of the court, and then to prevent any injury. If this course had been pursued on the present occasion, the suggestion would have been cheerfully listened to. But it could have been of no avail, unless we are ready to uproot the foundations of the law.

11th. The eleventh exception has been explicitly abandoned, and for the best reasons. There is no pretence to say, that the prisoner is in any legal or accurate sense, "deficient in understanding." It was proved by all the witnesses, by his own witnesses, it was admitted by his counsel, that he was compos mentis, having intelligence to discern what was right and what was wrong. All that was suggested was, that he was more ignorant and somewhat more stupid than common men, of bad education, and bad passions, and bad habits. Now these are precisely the common causes of crimes; but certainly they form no legal excuse or justification for the commission of them. As to the other part of the exception, that the court instructed the jury that "it was their duty to weigh the evidence in the cause," I profess not to be able to comprehend the nature of the objection to it. I had always humbly presumed that such was the duty of every juror in every cause. Juries are not to give a blind verdict, merely because witnesses swear to the existence of certain facts. They are to examine those facts, to consider the credibility of the witnesses, to weigh the force and ascertain the value of the testimony, and to give a verdict according to their oaths and their consciences. Upon any other supposition of duty, juries would be a most fraudulent imposition upon the public, and a mischievous appendage to the administration of justice. Until I can learn a different rule, I shall continue to believe, that to weigh evidence is of the last importance in all judicial tribunals, and is so emphatically the duty of juries, that to abandon it, is to jeopard their consciences and violate their oaths.

These are all the original exceptions filed in the cause. But three additional exceptions are now offered, which I will briefly consider, however irregularly they may have come to my notice.

12th. The twelfth exception turns upon new evidence discovered since the trial. In order to justify the court in granting a new trial for such cause, it should be most manifest that injustice has been done the prisoner, or that the new evidence would materially vary the complexion of the cause. The new evidence as now stated, (for it rests in mere assertion, and there is not even an affidavit to sustain it) goes merely to the credibility of Raymer's testimony. Now it is somewhat remarkable, that the testimony of this witness as to the only fact, to which he singly spoke, the fact of a previous quarrel and threat of revenge by the prisoner, was commented on at large by the court, and the jury were expressly advised to consider that quarrel and threat as merely a sudden ebullition of passion, and affording no proof of any previous deliberate malice in the prisoner. There is not the slightest reason to suppose that the jury did not act upon this advice. As to all the other facts in the case, they were proved by four or five unimpeached and unimpeachable witnesses; and indeed, as has already been remarked, the material facts were admitted by the prisoner's counsel. The verdict was in my judgment most entirely justified by the principles of law and by the evidence. It was as clear and unequivocal a case of murder, as I ever recollect to have tried in a court of justice. Under such circumstances, if the court were to grant a new trial, it would surrender itself to a most unpardonable abuse of the discretion committed to its charge.

13th. The thirteenth exception is abandoned by the counsel, because it cannot be sustained, and I need not comment on it.

14th. The last exception has been in some measure anticipated. If the prisoner was at the time of committing the offence, intoxicated, as his counsel have earnestly contended, I cannot perceive how it can, in point of law, help his case. This is the first time, that I ever remember it to have been contended, that the commission of one crime was an excuse for another. Drunkenness is a gross vice, and in the contemplation of some of our laws is a crime; and I learned in my earlier studies, that so far from its being in law an excuse for murder, it is rather an aggravation of its malignity. 4 Bl. Comm. 25; 1 Inst. 247; 1 Hale, P. C. 32; Plowd. 19. If it be fit, that another rule of law should prevail, it will be for the legislature to prescribe it. It is my duty to administer the law upon its settled principles; and I confess, that I do not well know, how a doctrine more dangerous to the peace and good order of society, could be established than that the vices of men, (as this voluntary madness is,) should constitute an excuse for their crimes.

I have gone over all the causes assigned for a new trial; and I have no hesitation in declaring that they afford not the slightest foundation to sustain it. It would have given me more satisfaction, if I could, consistently with the dictates of my judgment, have come to a different result. If there are any circumstances in the prisoner's case entitling him to mercy, it belongs to another department of the government to administer it. I overrule the motion for a new trial.

Motion overruled, and sentence of death pronounced.

Case No. 14,869.

UNITED STATES v. CORRIE.

[Charleston (S. C.) Daily Courier, April 19, 1860; 1 Brunner, Col. Cas. 686; 23 Law Rep. 145.] [1]

Circuit Court, D. South Carolina. April Term, 1860.

PIRACY — SLAVE TRADE — JURISDICTION — NOLLE PROSEQUI.

[1. Under Act May 15, 1820, §§ 4, 5, declaring certain acts by the master and crew of a vessel, relative to negroes, piracy, and giving jurisdiction of the offense to the federal courts of the state in which the offender is "brought" or "found," the mere landing in a state of negroes with intent to sell them as slaves is not piracy, which would be an offence committed within that state, and therefore triable there (under Const. art. 3, § 2, declaring that the trial of crimes shall be in the state where the crimes were committed; but, when not committed within any state, the trial shall be where congress directs); but it is part of such offense that the crew landed on a foreign shore, and there seized free negroes with intent to make them slaves, and confined them in the vessel, from which they were landed.]

[2. Leave to enter nolle prosequi in a piracy case pending in a federal court will not be granted, the motion of the United States attorney therefor not being made in the exercise of his discretion, or for the purpose of abandoning a prosecution, for any of the causes which suggest that course, but having been made at the direction of the attorney general of the United States, with the sanction of the president, for the purpose of overcoming the judgment of the court in which the case is pending, that it, and not the federal court of another state, has jurisdiction of the case.]

MAGRATH, District Judge. The question raised in this case is of so much importance that I have considered it proper to set forth the reasons which had led me to the conclusion I shall announce. And to the right understanding of the case, it is necessary to give a concise statement of it, from the time when first it was brought before me to the present moment.

The first proceeding in this court against Wm. C. Corrie rested upon an affidavit made by Mr. Ganahl, then the attorney of the United States for the district of Georgia, in which it was charged, from "credible information," that William C. Corrie, master or commander of the vessel called Wanderer, did land in the Southern district of Georgia certain negros not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make them slaves; and that the said William C. Corrie, master or commander of a vessel called the Wanderer, on a foreign shore, did seize, decoy, and forcibly bring, carry and receive on board the said vessel such negros, landed by him as aforesaid in the Southern district of Georgia, with intent to make them slaves, contrary to the fourth and fifth sections of the act of congress of the 15th May, 1820 [3 Stat. 600]. The affidavit, of course, is more full and circumstantial than this synopsis of it. Upon this affidavit a warrant was ordered to issue for the arrest of the said William C. Corrie, to answer the charge so made against him. At the same time an order was asked for his removal to the state of Georgia, there to be tried for the offence with which he was charged. I considered the question, and refused to make the order, because by the express provision of the act of congress of the 15th May, 1820, under which he was charged and arrested, jurisdiction of the offence was in the circuit courts of the state in which the offender was "brought" or "found," and the offender having been "found" in the state of South Carolina. It was at the same time declared that the jurisdiction which thus became vested in the courts of the United States for the state of South Carolina was exclusive of jurisdiction in the courts of any other state; and application having been made in that behalf, he was admitted to bail, and became bound with sureties to appear and answer the charge against him, at the next ensuing term of the circuit court of the United States for the state of South Carolina. After these proceedings had taken place, and before the term of the circuit court of the United States, for the state of South Carolina, to which the accused had been bound to appear; in the district court of the United States for the state of Georgia, a true bill was returned to that court, by the grand jury, against Wm. C. Corrie for piracy, under the act of May 15, 1820. An exemplification of it was laid before me, and the motion renewed for the removal of the accused to the state of Georgia for trial. I refused again to order the removal, but ordered that the amount of the recognizances in which he was bound to answer here should be doubled. During the term of the circuit court of the United States for South Carolina, and before the grand jury had been charged in the case against Wm. C. Corrie, a bench warrant was issued against him, out of the courts of the United States in the state of Georgia, for his arrest to answer to the charge of having violated the act of congress of 1818; and again I was applied to for an order directing his removal for trial to the courts of the United States for Georgia. I again refused for several reasons, one of which was, that it was without precedent to ask a court having before it a criminal accused of a capital offence, and whose case the grand jury were in waiting to consider, to send him to another tribunal, there to be tried for a minor offence. Subsequently to this, the case of the U. S. v. Wm. C. Corrie, charging him with piracy under the act of congress of the 15th May, 1820, was submitted to the grand jury, then in attendance upon the circuit court of the United States for the state of South Carolina; and the charge in the case was delivered to the grand jury by Judge Wayne, the associate judge of the supreme court, assigned to this circuit. The grand jury retired, with the witnesses, and returned into court without having found a bill. The next day the foreman of the grand jury asked that the bill against Wm. C. Corrie should be again committed to it. Judge Wayne thought it should not be; I differed in opinion. The grounds of that difference need not be stated here. I adhere to the opinion I then expressed. The grand jury should have been impeached or allowed to reconsider the case; if they desired to do so; for I see no ground upon which they could be refused the exercise of their privilege, unless they had rendered themselves unfit. The grand jury then retired, and came into court with a presentment, charging Wm. C. Corrie with a violation of the act of congress of the 15th May, 1820, and asking the court to make the necessary orders for his prosecution. The grand jury were then discharged. William C. Corrie, who had been by me admitted to bail, had been ordered to be taken by the marshal into his custody. His sureties of course had been discharged. At the close of the term, through his counsel, he applied again to be admitted to bail. Judge Wayne, who was sitting with me, stated that he felt no obligation to change the position in which I had placed the case,—before the term,—when I had admitted the accused to bail; that he did not feel called upon to dissent or commit himself at all upon the question of bail, and left the matter with me. I admitted the accused again to bail. My opinion as to the nature and extent of the power devolved upon me in such cases, in relation to bail, as also in regard to the obligation which the grant of the power carries with it for its exercise, is set forth in the opinion prepared at that time, and on the files of this court. The accused became, thereupon, bound with his sureties, to appear and answer at the next term of the circuit court of the United States for the state of South Carolina.

At Greenville no proceedings were taken, and the case was postponed to the next term of the circuit court in Columbia. And, at at that term, the attorney for the United States, having read to the court the evidences of all efforts used to obtain the necessary witness, upon his motion, the accused was ordered again to enter into new recognizances to appear and answer at this term of the circuit court of the United States. It is proper to bear in mind that the accused, so far as is known to this court, has never, in the terms of the act of 1820, been "brought" or "found" within the limits of the state of Georgia; it is believed of this there can be no doubt. But he was "found" within the limits of the state of South Carolina. And, as already said, when "found" within the limits of the state of South Carolina, jurisdiction of the offence was vested, by the express provisions of the act of 1820, in the circuit court of the United States for this state. While held subject to the jurisdiction of this court, the grand jury of the United States court in Georgia returned into court a true bill against him for a violation of the same act, which he was here held to answer. In regard to these cases there was a direct conflict of jurisdiction. In the proceedings subsequently adopted against him in the courts of the United States for Georgia, and which related to a violation of an act of 1818 (a minor offence), it never was denied in this court that there was jurisdiction of that offence in the courts of the United States for the state of Georgia.

Nor was it because of a question of jurisdiction that the order for his removal was refused. Two reasons did, however, induce the refusal. The one, stated in the opinion then delivered in this court, already noticed, and which was, that, while held here to answer for a capital offence, he could not be transferred to another court, there to be tried for a misdemeanor. It was in relation to a question similar to that then before the court, but not presented with so many objectionable circumstances, that Chief Justice Marshall said: "Such a thing has never been done; it is contrary to all correct principles." But this sufficient in itself, as it undoubtedly was, did not alone guide me in the decision. I had great reason to believe that the application to remove him, under a charge of having violated the act of 1818, was not intended to secure his presence at the trial of that charge; but that when removed under the charge of having violated the act of 1818, he was to be tried for a violation of the act of 1820—the same offence for which he was held here to answer, and of which it had been decided by this court that it alone had rightful and exclusive jurisdiction. To Judge Wayne all the reasons which led me to refuse the order asked were fully communicated. It is proper to say that Judge Wayne assured me that he had no knowledge of the purpose for which the removal was asked for. In the statement now made to the court, of the proceedings which are to succeed the entry of the nolle prosequi, it is understood the purpose is now, as it was then; to remove to the courts of the United States in Georgia, under an alleged violation of the act of 1818, but to try him for a violation of the act of 1820. I said then that I would not use the power, with which I was vested, to remove a criminal for any such purpose; and I have not since then, changed my determination. It is obvious that there must be a very wide difference in opinion, between the courts of the United States in Georgia and South Carolina, as to the court having jurisdiction of the offence with which the accused is charged, under the act of 15th May, 1820. And it is proper once again to express the opinion that in the circuit courts of the United States for this state is jurisdiction of the offence, and in such courts must the offender be tried. The place at which the trials of all crimes and offences cognizable in the courts of the United States, under the laws thereof, shall be had, is to be determined, in the first place, by the consideration of the place where the crime or offence was committed. By the third article, third section of the constitution, such trial shall be held in the state where the crime has been committed; but if not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as congress may, by law, have directed. And in the 6th article of the amendments it is declared, that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law." It is undoubtedly the duty of a court to suppose that congress, in the exercise of its legislative functions, regards the provisions of the constitution. It is outside of the duty of a court to presume that congress ignorantly or willfully disregards a plain provision of the constitution. It must therefore be conceded that if, in the creation of an offence, congress has declared that the place of its trial shall be such place or places as it was competent to provide for offences only that could be committed outside of the limits of a state, the fact of the designation of such place or places for the trial is equivalent to the declaration that the offences created by the act are only such as may be committed outside of the limits of a state.

In the act of 1820, congress has plainly declared the places in which there shall be jurisdiction of the offences it creates. These places exclude the idea of any of these offences being considered by congress as offences to be committed within the limits of a state. To none other than such offences is the designation of the place of jurisdiction consistent with the constitution. If, then, we regard congress as legislating under the sanction of the constitution, we must consider the offences created by the act of 1820. because of the place or places at which they are to be tried, as offences committed without the limits of a state. If we insist that the offences, any or all, are to be considered as committed within the limits of a state, then did the congress which passed the act of 1820, either not know the article in the constitution and the amendment to which I have referred, or, knowing them, willfully violate their positive command. In the interpretation of a statute, a cardinal rule instructs us to read it so that all its provisions may be consistently preserved. It is enough, according to this rule, to show that by the interpretation of certain words in one sense, other material words must be rejected which by another construction, may be preserved, to command us to adopt that which preserves every provision of the law. In this act of 1820, the place for the trial of offences is plainly and positively expressed. If such offences are regarded as offences not to be considered as committed within the limits of a state, but outside of such limits, then is the designation of the place for the trial thereof constitutional and operative. But if they are considered as to be committed within the limits of a state, the designation of a place or places for the trial thereof is unconstitutional and inoperative. Is there any room for a court, under such circumstances, to entertain a doubt of the construction which it is bound to adopt? If there is an offence under the act of 1820 which is to be held an offence committed within the limits of a state, then that part of the same act which declares the place or places at which jurisdiction shall be exercised of the offences it creates, must be stricken out, because in such a case it would be unconstitutional. I can very well understand in what manner, if any of the offences created by the act of 1820, should or could occur on land, or within the limits of a state, a court would refuse its cognizance of it; because the act in fixing a place for the trial, had so evidently intended to create an offence not to be committed within the limits of a state; but I cannot understand why with that intention of congress so plainly manifested by the designation of a place for trial, exclusively appropriate for offences not committed within the limits of a state, it should be insisted that offences not intended to be included should be included.

To insist that other offences can be tried under the act of 1820, than such as are cognizable, according to the words of the act. in the circuit court of the United States for the state in which the offender is brought or found, is subversive of a fundamental principle in the construction of any criminal law. It has been sometimes contended, but never permitted by a court, that the intention of a law should give a meaning to its words wider than they generally receive. But I have never known before of a case in which the operation of a severe criminal law was claimed to be carried further than the plain meaning of the words, and the equally plain intention of the law maker would suggest. It is, of course, manifest, that as the accused in this case has been "found" in the state of South Carolina, by the terms of the act of 1820, it is in the circuit court of the United States for this state that he must be tried. It is equally manifest, that if tried for this offence under the act of 1820, in the circuit court of the United States for the state of Georgia, within which state he has not been brought nor found, the words of the act which describe the place or places where the trial must be had, are virtually stricken out. We may be benefited by the language of Chief Justice Marshall when a similar proposition was before him. "It would be (says he) carrying construction very far to strike out these words. Their whole effect is to limit the operation which the sentence would have without them, and it is making very free with legislative language to declare them totally useless when they are sensible, and are calculated to have a decided influence on the meaning of the clause." And, in the case from which this extract is taken, we may further learn with what caution Judge Marshall proceeded when he was asked, by construction, to increase the offences which the act of congress then under consideration had enumerated. He admitted the probability of that construction which he was asked to make. "But (said he) probability is not a guide which a court in construing a penal statute can safely take. * * * Congress has not made them punishable, and this court cannot enlarge the statute." In another part of the same opinion, he adds: "The conclusion seems irresistible that congress has not in this section inserted the limitation of place inadvertently, and the distinction which the legislature has taken, must of course be respected by the court." "It is (says he) the legislature, not the court, which is to define a crime and ordain its punishment."

When, therefore, I have claimed that the rightful jurisdiction of the offence with which the accused is charged is in the circuit court of the United States for the state of South Carolina, I do so because the act which creates the offence has so declared it. It was here that he was first arrested. When rightful jurisdiction of the case once vested in the circuit court of the United States for the state of South Carolina, it became exclusive of jurisdiction elsewhere, and the accused could not be transported to a different district for trial. And when, because of offences charged to have been committed in violation of the act of 1820, jurisdiction was claimed by the circuit court of the United States for Georgia of the offence then before this court, and of the offender held to answer here, it could not maintain its claim while in this court there was jurisdiction. And when the right to the exercise of jurisdiction over the offence was claimed by the circuit court of the United States for the state of Georgia, the offence being a violation of the act of 1820, because it was alleged that the offence was committed within the limits of the state of Georgia, the answer is to be derived from the principles laid down by Chief Justice Marshall. No offence committed under the act of 1820 can be within the limits of a state: the place or places appointed for such trials are applicable exclusively to offences committed without the limits of a state. To construe the act as relating to offences within the limits of a state, is to disregard, in its designation of the place or places for trial, "a distinction which the legislature has taken, and must of course be respected by the court." The designation of a place or places for trial, applicable only to offences which could be committed outside of the limits of a state, is equivalent to the words, if used "without the jurisdiction of any state." The creation by congress, therefore, of an offence not cognizable in courts having jurisdiction of offences committed outside of the limits of a state, but cognizable in courts having jurisdiction of offences committed within the limits of a state, is a matter of which the legislature has been silent. "Congress has not made such punishable, and the court cannot enlarge the statute." It seems to me, therefore, that the circumstance relied on to support a claim for the exercise of jurisdiction in this case by the courts of the United States for the state of Georgia, which is that the violation of the act of 1820 occurred within the limits of the state of Georgia, and therefore must be tried in the courts of that state, is the circumstance which conclusively repels the claim so made for jurisdiction, because an act committed within the limits of the state of Georgia, and cognizable therefore, only in the courts of the United States for that state, is not an offence within the terms of the act of 1820, which relates exclusively to offences cognizable in courts exercising jurisdiction under the act of congress over crimes and offences not committed within the jurisdiction of any state. Cognizance of this offence, therefore, by the courts of the United States for the state of Georgia, because alleged to have been committed within the limits of the state of Georgia, and, therefore, cognizable only in the courts of that state, is not consistent with the plain meaning or obvious intention of the act of 1820. It does not respect a distinction which congress has taken; operates to enlarge a penal statute; makes punishable other offences than such as congress has declared; and this no court can do, according to the judgment of the supreme court. And thus, the alleged locality of the offence, under the act of 1820, upon which jurisdiction is claimed, is the circumstance which, if it does exist, would disprove any right to jurisdiction under the act of 1820, because no such offence is declared by that act. It is proper always to bear in mind, that in a question of jurisdiction in a court of the United States, the right to exercise that jurisdiction must, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Ex parte Bollman and Swartwout [4 Cranch (8 U. S.) 75], "be given by the written law." "Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law until some statute shall change their established principles, but courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction."

The great vital principle, that the powers exercised in all or any of the departments, by which the government of the United States is administered, are delegated and specific, applies to the judicial as strongly as to the executive or legislative departments. No court of the United States can take cognizance of a crime or offence, until that charged to be such crime or offence shall have been so declared by the congress of the United States; nor can congress declare it to be a crime or offence, unless authorized by the constitution of the United States so to do? Nor with these sanctions, can a court proceed to the trial of such a crime or offence, unless it shall have been authorized to take cognizance thereof? I have said that the ground upon which jurisdiction is claimed for the courts of the United States in Georgia of itself defeats the claim, because it creates an offence within a locality, inconsistent with the intention and language of congress as they appear in the act of 1820. And I will now proceed to show what are the crimes declared by the act of the 15th May, 1820. This act has been in the statute book for nearly forty years; but as yet no court has been called on to give to it a construction which would show the true nature of the offences which it creates. Whatever hesitancy I might feel in undertaking now to give a construction to this act it is, as it should be, altogether removed by the reflection, that it is proper, nay imperative, as I conceive upon those whose duty it is to expound the law, to declare what this act means.

I consider it, moreover, necessary to do so, because there have been verdicts of acquittal rendered by juries in the case of persons charged with a violation of this act; and such verdicts have been regarded as indicative of a purpose on the part of juries not to enforce its provisions. How far such an opinion has a just foundation, may be seen in the statement which I now make; that no case has been tried in the court of the United States for the state of South Carolina, for alleged violations of the act of 15th May, 1820, in which any other verdict than that which acquitted could have been given consistently with the law and the evidence in such case. I will go farther and say, that had in any of the cases which were tried in the courts of the United States for this state a verdict of guilty been rendered, I do not believe that any judge of the United States would have hesitated in directing a new trial. And this declaration is warranted by the construction which Judge Story, and after him Judge Woodbury, both judges of the supreme court, have given to the criminal intent by the act itself, made an essential part of the crime which the same act has declared. I am now referring to my own opinion, but I have not any reason to suppose, that, in this respect, there was or is any difference between the judges before whom these cases in the courts of the United States, in this state were tried. I have always thought, and the most careful consideration has strengthened the conviction, that there exists a misapprehension of the act of congress of the 15th May, 1820.

It has been said that by this act of congress the slave trade has been declared piracy. I cannot find in this act anything which sustains that construction; while in the act, and in the other acts distinctly passed for the suppression of the slave trade, everything leads us to reject that conclusion. Offences similar to such as are prohibited by the act of congress of 1820, were declared to be; and punished as offences by the British parliament, when the slave trade itself was legalized by that body. I intend to speak from the act itself. The authority to which I refer for the correctness of the opinion I am expressing, is in the words which congress has used in this declaration of its purpose. It is the legislature, not the court, which is to define a crime and ordain its punishment; and the intention of that legislature is to be found in the words they employ. "To determine that a case is within the intention of a statute, its language must authorize us to say so." And this rule, declared by Chief Justice Marshall, has been affirmed in terms equally explicit by Chief Justice Taney. "The law, as it passed, is the will of the majority of both houses; and the only mode in which that will is spoken is in the act itself; and we must gather their intention from the language there used, comparing it when any ambiguity exists with the laws upon the same subject, and looking, if necessary, to the history of the times in which it passed."

The first thing which strikes attention in the consideration of the act of 1820, is that it does not, in its title, nor in any part of the act, either by way of modification, amendment or repeal, refer to the previously existing slave trade laws, or to the slave trade as the object for which its provisions were intended. In every other act passed for the suppression of the slave trade, the purpose is plainly declared in the title and every section of such act In the only portions of this act in which the slave trade is mentioned; to the mention of it are added certain other things; which other things, when committed, constitute the offences which the act prohibits. These offences, referring to them, now only generally, consist of landing on a foreign shore, and there seizing or decoying a negro or mulatto, not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make him a slave. And this offence, commencing on a foreign coast, is followed out, in its several stages, as it affects that negro or mulatto, in forcibly bringing, carrying, or receiving him on board of the vessel; there confining and detaining him, with intent to make him a slave; or transferring him to another vessel on the high seas or tide-water, or from on board landing or delivering him on shore, with intent to sell or having sold him as a slave. From a very early period to 1819, various acts had been passed by the congress of the United States in relation to the slave trade, considering it as a trade. As a trade, it has been prohibited under heavy penalties. But while prohibited as a trade, no act of congress had made the seizure and decoying of negros or mulattos on a foreign coast, with the intent to make them slaves, an offence to be tried and punished in its courts. That the slave trade itself, and such acts of violence and spoliation are distinct, is seen, as already stated, in the fact; that in the 23 Geo. III. c. 31, by which the slave trade was legalized, it is, also, provided, that no commander or master of any ship trading to Africa shall, by force or fraud, take on board or carry away from the coast of Africa any native or negro of said country, or commit, or suffer to be committed, any violence on the natives, to the prejudice of the trade. As far back, then, as 1750, force, fraud, or indirect practices, in obtaining possession of the negro, was held so distinct from the slave trade that it was prohibited and punished as injurious to the trade; while the slave trade itself was permitted and legalized. In 1819, congress passed two acts, now requiring our attention. One additional to such as were then of force in relation to the slave trade, the purpose of which is distinctly set forth in its title and in all of its provisions, to be for the suppression of the slave trade. The other act was in regard to a purpose equally clear in its titles and its provisions; it was to protect the commerce of the United States. In the progress of and towards the conclusion of the South American war, privateering had degenerated into piracy, and the depredations committed had been so numerous and daring that it became necessary to legislate for the protection of the commerce of the United States; hence the act of 1819. But the duration of that act was fixed, and consequently, in 1820, if still necessary, it had to be re-enacted. In the house of representatives it was amended, by what are now the fourth and fifth sections of the act; and in this form became a law. Such is a brief narrative of the circumstances connected with the legislation of congress in the act of the 15th May, 1820. For its meaning, we must refer to its language. I am aware that it has been not unusual to seek for a guide in its interpretation to the report of the committee, which recommended these sections, of the house of representatives. Without any more special reference to this report than in saying that its language is so general as to make it unsafe, if it were legal, to adopt it as a guide, it is necessary to understand that the highest authority compels us to reject it, in the construction of this act. "In expounding (says Chief Justice Taney, in another case) this law, the judgment of the court cannot in any degree be influenced by the construction placed upon it by individual members of congress in the debate which took place on its passage; nor by the reasons assigned by them for supporting or opposing amendments that were offered." And if it shall be said that because the act relates to the offence of seizing or decoying a negro or mulatto, or using such a negro or mulatto in any of the modes prohibited by the act, with the intent to make him or her a slave, that, therefore, it relates to the slave trade, enough has already been said to show that such a proposition involves a confusion in the apprehension of degrees of crime made very manifest in the act of 1820; the slave trade laws of the United States up to the year 1819; the legislation of the British parliament; and the obvious distinction between participation in a trade or traffic, business or commerce, declared unlawful; and acts of force or fraud, spoliation or rapine, in regard to the subject matter of that trade or traffic, business or commerce; which may very well be considered as robbery and piracy. But still more: When congress, in the exercise of a power which it has, if it is pleased to exercise it, shall make the slave trade a piracy, it must do so in terms which refer to it as a trade. To infer that the slave trade is piracy because seizing and decoying on a foreign shore, a negro or mulatto, with intent to make him a slave, is so declared, is not, in my mind, recommended by a rule of reason, or consistent with fact. If we consider now the persons who by the act of 1820 are made liable upon conviction to the punishment it inflicts, we will see, more clearly, how inconsistent it is with the idea of its connection with the slave trade.

No one can be punished under the act of 1820, unless he is of the crew or ship's company. Hence no one on board, although the owner of the negros or mulattos, with which the vessel is laden, can be convicted or punished under its provisions. In all other acts of congress passed for the suppression of the slave trade, all persons are embraced, who by violating these laws, can be made liable for such offences in the courts of the United States. In the act of 1794 the prohibition is directed to a citizen or citizens of the United States, or any other person coming into or residing in the same; and words of the same or like general description in regard to persons who shall be liable to the punishment imposed, will be found in the several acts down to 1819. It may very well be understood, that such acts were intended for the suppression of the slave trade, when they were directed to all persons upon whom the courts could impose punishment, in cases where they were convicted of its violation. But, with what show of reason is it to be urged that an act is intended for the suppression of the slave trade, as a trade or business, which imposes its penalties only on those persons who may be fairly presumed never able to engage in it as a trade or business? Nor can it be said by the severe penalty visited by the act of 1820, upon the crew or ships company, it was intended to destroy the agencies by which the slave trade could be carried on, and in this manner extinguish the trade. For that construction has been given to the intent, by the act made an essential part of the offence, which relieves the crew of the penalty, unless in cases where they claim and exercise over the negros or mulattos, the control of ownership. Without this evidence, they may be guilty of transporting, which is a misdemeanor, punished by fine and imprisonment; but they cannot be held guilty of piracy, and for it punished by death. If then all persons are exempted from the operation of the act of 1820, except the crew or ship's company; and if the crew or ship's company can never have been considered as the persons for whose benefit the slave trade is carried on, or who are able to engage in it as a trade or business; does it not at once appear almost absurd to consider such an act as intended for the suppression of the slave trade? It would suppress the trade by inculpating only those who never could be found guilty of its violations. But, if we will enquire why is it, that the act of 1820 relates exclusively to the crew or ship's company, and no one else, we will understand the crimes which the act declares. It has been seen that if they are persons never engaged in the slave trade as a trade or traffic, the act is meaningless. But if it is remembered that the crew or ship's company were the persons by whom the lawless acts were committed, which in number and daring had, in 1819, called for the protection to commerce which the most stringent penal legislation could impose; that their depredations had been committed in all places and against every flag; that they had braved the municipal laws of the United States; defrauded its revenues by the establishment of depots on its frontier, whence constant violations of its laws were committed; and among these violations was the unlawful introduction of negros,—it may then be seen that the crew or ship's company were the proper objects to which the penalties of the act were directed; because they were the only persons who would commit the offences which it prohibited. The offences so committed were not violations of the slave trade laws, so far as these laws regard that trade, as a trade, business or employment; laws which were then severe, and have not for forty years required an addition to the penalties they then enforced; but those acts of seizing and decoying, of force and fraud, or indirect practices in obtaining possession of free negros and mulattos, and making them slaves; such acts as were, in fact, piracy; which, if committed within the limits of the states having slaves, had been by many, if not all, of those states made felonies; and were by the law of those states, as by those of the United States, punished with death.

A brief reference thus to the act of 1820, its language and some reference to the history of the times in which it was passed, and the only persons upon whom its penalties can be imposed, indicate that line of reasoning, which has led me to the conclusion that it is not a part of the slave trade laws of the United States, using that term as it is generally received; as referring to a trade, traffic, business, or employment, in which sense it is used in all of the acts passed expressly for the suppression of the slave trade. And a brief examination of the intent, a material element in the offence under the act of 1820, confirms this view. The intent which the act prohibits is to make a slave of such negro or mulatto. It is peculiar to the act of 1820. What does it mean? If expressed in language different from such as is used in any other act, and if the words used have in themselves a "plain meaning," that meaning they must have. "Where there is no ambiguity, there is no room for construction." It has been said that it matters not in the consideration of an offence under the act of 1820, what may have been on a foreign coast, the condition of the negro or mulatto, whether he was bond or free. But from such a proposition I dissent altogether. And to me it seems not only a matter of easy demonstration to show that, in regard to the offences created by this act, it is of much consequence under the fourth and fifth sections to determine whether the negro or mulatto was bond or free, but that the act itself plainly teaches by the line of evidence which it prescribes, that the court must have that fact established. It seems to me that a regard to his antecedent condition is indispensably necessary in the consideration of the intent. The intent is to make a slave. Of whom? A negro or mulatto; I omit as unnecessary here all other circumstances; not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States. The negative of this servitude is part of the evidence to sustain the prosecution. But why disprove this servitude? Of a negro or mulatto decoyed or seized on the coast of Africa, why negative a servitude by the laws of either the states or territories of the United States? The explanation seems plain. The intent prohibited is to make a slave. To make implies the creation of that condition. Of one already a slave it could never be said of him who continued his servitude that he had made him a slave. The law may presume a condition of freedom until one of subjection is proved. But no such general presumption could prevail, while in the United States over negros and mulattos there was and is a recognized lawful control and established right of property in them. When, however, that condition of servitude recognized in the United States becomes disproved, then it is competent to proceed upon the presumption that the negro or mulatto charged to have been taken or held in violation of the act of 1820 is free until it is proved that he is not. But if the presumption of freedom, unless it was disproved, might support the charge, and be evidence in the charge of an intent to make that negro or mulatto a slave; so, upon the negation of that presumption, and proof of his servitude at the place from which he was taken, the charge of an intent to make him a slave would be disproved; in the same manner as it would be, in a case where the negro or mulatto was proved to be held in servitude by the laws of a state or territory of the United States. The same reason would in both cases lead to the same conclusion.

Whether the negro or mulatto was held to servitude by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, by the laws of Brazil, of Cuba or of Africa, of him it could not be said that there was proof of an intent to make him a slave, if he was already a slave. To purchase on that foreign coast a slave may be by other laws of the United States, passed for the suppression of the slave trade, an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment; but no law has yet said that it is piracy. Now, the intent being as is said to make a slave,—that is, create a servitude which did not exist until it was imposed by him who was charged with its commission,—it will be seen how consistent is such an intent with the offence which the act creates. The whole scope of the act of 1820 in regard to the 4th and 5th sections is not perceived unless the 3d section of the same act is also considered. The 3d, 4th, and 5th sections embrace all the cases in which robbery may be committed; and whether that robbery relates to the rights of property or the rights of persons. As in the 3rd section, whatever may be the subject of property, if stolen, is declared piracy, for which, upon conviction, the offender shall suffer death; so in the 4th and 5th sections, the right of personal freedom is protected; and he who violates it by force or fraud, in whatever stage of the transaction he is detected, is a pirate, and upon conviction will suffer death. Such crimes are piracies, because robberies. Robberies, because, by force, fraud, or indirect practices they deprive the negro or mulatto of his right to freedom; that right to freedom being a presumption upon which the court is to act, when the servitude recognized by the constitution and laws of the United States are proved not to exist in the particular case. But if that presumption is repelled by proof of antecedent servitude, then the intent to make a slave or rob him of his right to freedom cannot be sustained; for he cannot be robbed of that which he did not possess. And the possession of the negro or mulatto under such circumstances would be a violation, according to the circumstances of some of the laws passed for the suppression of the slave trade; but it is not a piracy nor a violation of the act of 1820.

This exposition of my construction of the act of 1820, and of the true nature of the crimes which it declares, has been given in explanation of the opinion I hold as to the jurisdiction which the act confers. I have not elaborated nor said more than seemed necessary for the apprehension of that view of the law which I have adopted. But it would not be proper to leave it without applying a few tests, which, perhaps, will serve to show how far the construction which I have given is proper. I have said that the object of the law was to protect in his right to freedom, a negro or mulatto, by force or fraud, taken with the intent to make him a slave. And that every one of the offences mentioned in the 4th and 5th sections, which are but successive stages in the same transaction, relate to the negro or mulatto so taken. If this is not so,—if the several offences as set forth in the 4th and 5th sections [2] relate only to a negro or mu-

[2] [The 4th and 5th sections of the act of May 15, 1820 (Act 1820, c. 113; 3 Stat. 600), are as follows:

[Sec. 4. If any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave-trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned in the whole or part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall land, from any such ship or vessel, and, on any foreign shore, seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labor by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall decoy, or forcibly bring, or carry, or shall receive such negro or mulatto on board any such ship or vessel, with intent as aforesaid, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and on conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he may be brought or found, shall suffer death.

[Sec. 5. If any citizen of the United States, being of the crew or ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave-trade, or any person whatever, being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, or navigated for or in behalf of any citizen or citizens of the United States, shall forcibly confine or detain, or aid and abet in forcibly confining or detaining, on board such ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto, not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall, on board any such ship or vessel, offer or attempt to sell, as a slave, any negro or mulatto not held to service as aforesaid, or shall, on the high seas, or anywhere on tide-water, transfer or deliver over, to any other ship or vessel, any negro or mulatto, latto not held to servitude by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, and have no reference to the mode in which the possession of such a negro or mulatto was acquired,—then the master of a vessel who purchases a negro or mulatto in Brazil or Cuba, and lands him upon the shore of the United States, or upon another part of the coast of Brazil or Cuba, with intent to sell him again, is a pirate. If it could be necessary to show that this was not the piracy which the act contemplated, it is but necessary to bear in mind that if a passenger shall land, with intent to sell, one hundred negros or mulattos, purchased by him in Cuba, he is subject to fine and imprisonment. But if the captain of the vessel purchases but one, and lands him with the same intent, he would be considered a pirate and must suffer death. The piracy would then not consist in the wrong done to the negro or mulatto; nor in the landing or selling him; but in the fact that in the latter case it was done by the master or one of the crew of the vessel. Surely the statement of such a consequence would be of itself sufficient to show that the construction which leads to it must be alike irrational and illegal. But the act itself shows that it is not merely landing with intent to sell the negro or mulatto, which is an offence declared by it to be piracy for one of the offences specially described is transferring or delivering over to any other ship or vessel such negro or mulatto, with intent to make him a slave. This, done by the crew or ship's company, or any one or more of them is declared piracy; but it is nowhere declared by the act that anything done on board of the vessel to which the negro or mulatto is transferred is piracy; nor will it do to say that the crime is as much in the vessel to which the negro or mulatto has been transferred, as in that from which he was transferred. The answer is given by Chief Justice Marshall: "It would be dangerous, indeed, to carry the principle that a case which is within the reason or mischief of a statute, is within its provisions, so far as to punish a crime not enumerated in the statute, because it is of equal atrocity or of kindred character with those which are enumerated. If this principle has ever been recognized in expounding criminal law, it has been in cases of considerable imitation, which it would be unsafe to consider as precedents favoring a general rule for other cases." That landing or delivering on shore to which the act of 1820 relates must be connected with the antecedent circumstances of the case; otherwise, as readily seen, it would convert mere misdemeanors into crimes of the darkest hue. Under the act of 1820, it is a landing or delivering on shore "from on board any such ship or vessel." What is "such ship or vessel"? It must first be referred to the preceding part of the 5th section, and then understood as the ship or vessel on board of which is confined or detained a negro or mulatto, not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make him a slave. The same intent which makes, in the 4th section, the seizure or decoy a piracy; the intent to rob of the right to freedom. But this intent, made essential is seen under certain circumstances, in the 5th section which necessarily connect it with the 4th section, and make the two sections comprise all stages and phases of the same transaction. Whence came this negro or mulatto who, on board of this ship or vessel, is confined or detained, or treated in any of the modes described in this section? I cannot doubt that it is the negro or mulatto of whom unlawful or piratical possession was obtained, in the modes described in the 4th section. Landing or delivering on shore, with intent to sell or having sold, a negro or mulatto, not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, is an offence under the laws of the United States, as it is under the laws of many of the states; but it is not the crime of piracy under the act of the 15th May, 1820. The landing or delivering on shore, which is made piracy under the act of 1820, must be of a negro or mulatto, not held to service by the laws of either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to sell or having sold him as a slave; and the ship or vessel from on board of which he is so landed or delivered on shore, is that ship or vessel in which he has been kept forcibly confined and detained with intent to make him a slave: and this intent to make him a slave, is the intent to deprive him of his right of personal liberty, to rob him of his freedom; and such intent can only be affirmed of an antecedent right to freedom. This forcibly confining and detaining on board of such ship or vessel, such negro or mulatto, with such intent, is, although an independent act in itself, yet a stage or condition of the crime, which commenced with the seizure or decoy of the negro or mulatto, on the foreign coast. Landing or delivering on shore, in the 5th section, is connected with antecedent circumstances in the 5th section, all of which are essential in establishing the crimes enumerated in it; and all of which repel the idea of congress, in the creation of these crimes, having intended or considered, that this, or any other of them, was to be regarded as a crime committed within the not held to service as aforesaid, with intent to make such negro or mulatto a slave, or shall land, or deliver on shore, from on board any such ship or vessel, any such negro or mulatto, with intent to make sale of, or having previously sold, such negro or mulatto as a slave, such citizen or person shall be adjudged a pirate; and on conviction thereof before the circuit court of the United States for the district wherein he shall be brought or found, shall suffer death.]

limits of a state; therefore to be tried in the courts of the United States for that state; and therefore inconsistent with and repugnant to the plain meaning and manifest intention of congress, in its declaration of the place or places where jurisdiction should be exercised in cases under this act. Such is my construction of the act of 1820. I consider it wholly distinct from that portion of the legislation of the states passed for the suppression of the slave trade.

If the act of 1820 is a part of the slave trade legislation of the United States, there are many portions of that legislation, with which it is in conflict, and which, therefore, it must repeal. But no principle which governs a repeal by implication, will sanction it here. It is only by assuming that it is a part of the legislation of the United States, passed for the suppression of the slave trade, that you produce an inconsistency between it and the slave trade laws of the United States. Regarding the various acts passed from 1794 to 1819, as intended for the suppression of trade, traffic, business or employment, in slaves; which is not permitted; and the act of 1820 as intended to suppress acts of piracy, consisting in the unlawful possession of negros, with the intent to make slaves of those, by force or fraud, who are entitled to their freedom; no inconsistency is created between any of these acts. If the most complete evidence should be sought of the difference between legislation which makes the slave trade, as a trade, piracy, and the legislation of congress in the act of 1820, it would be found in a comparison of the act of 1820 with the act of the British parliament, the 9th section of 5 Geo. IV. c. 113, in which the slave trade is made piracy. 5 Geo. IV. c. 113, in the 9th section, plainly sets forth the offence; makes all persons who violate it liable to its penalties; and in the 10th section includes and makes subject to the penalties declared in the 9th section, the captain, mate, surgeon and supercargo, if they know that the vessel is employed or intended so to be, in violation of the act. But the 11th section makes the petty officers, seamen, marines or servants, liable only for a misdemeanor. In another circumstance the difference is still more remarkable. While in the United States, by the most forced construction, it is sought to make the act of 1820 apply to the slave trade as a trade, and extend its penalties to those who cannot be brought within its provisions, the British parliament in 1 Vict. c. 91, abolished the punishment of death, which it enacted in 5 Geo. IV., and substituted therefor other punishment. It declared death as the penalty for being engaged in the slave trade in 1824; it repealed that penalty in 1837. I have already shown that if jurisdiction is claimed in the courts of the United States for Georgia, because, as is said, the crime charged against the accused was committed within the limits of that state, that the statement itself would exclude jurisdiction because the act of 1820 creates no crime which could be committed within the limits of the state.

I have now examined the act, for the purpose of showing, from the nature of the crimes it creates, that they are not such as can be committed within the limits of a state. I come now to the consideration of the motion made in this case to enter a nolle prosequi in the proceedings against William C. Corrie. By the act of congress of 1789, it is directed that there shall be appointed in each district, "a meet person learned in the law to act as attorney for the United States in such district, who shall be sworn or affirmed to the faithful execution of his office; whose duty it shall be to prosecute in such district all delinquents for crimes and offences cognizable under the authority of the United States, and all civil actions in which the United States shall be concerned except before the supreme court in the district in which that court shall be holden." And this law continues to be the source from which this officer derives the knowledge of his duties. The prosecution of offenders is thus made the special duty of this officer. His control over and direction of cases thus committed to his charge is exclusive, until they come under the control of the court. In that stage of the case it becomes subject to judicial power, and this is vested in certain courts, according to article 3, § 1, of the constitution. But although the case may have come under the control of the judicial power, yet, practically, the discretion of the district attorney is exercised in relation to it and its discontinuance, until the trial has commenced, as freely as before. This difference is, however, always recognized, that after it has become subject to judicial control, the district attorney then acts with the express assent or tacit acquiescence of the court.

It would be difficult to describe the relation which the court and the prosecuting officer bear to each other with more exactness than was done by Mr. Taney, now the chief justice, when attorney-general for the United States: "This power (said he, referring to the nolle prosequi) over criminal prosecution has been familiarly exercised by the attorneys for the United States, and also by the attorneys for the several states prosecuting in behalf of the public. It is true that in all such cases, they uniformly act, I believe, with the approbation of the court; but this approbation is commonly asked for by the attorney for his own protection. It is not necessary in order to give him the authority, but it is his justification for the manner in which his authority is used, and since he cannot consult his client (the United States) the sanction of the court is regarded as sufficient evidence that he exercised his power honestly and discreetly. Hence he, invariably asks for it. It is defence to the public, if his conduct in that respect should be impeached; for if any doubts rested in the mind of the court of the fairness and propriety of the measure, they would not suffer the entry to be made." Judge Conklin, after stating the most usual causes for which a nolle prosequi is entered, as laid down by Mr. Chitty, adds: "It is supposed the several district attorneys possess this power. Probably before exercising it, they would in general consider it advisable to state the circumstances of the case informally to the court, for the purpose of obtaining its assent, tacit or expressed, to the propriety of the step." Page 417. And Judge McLeans says it is the undoubted right of the prosecuting attorney before the trial is gone into, under leave of the court, to enter a nolle prosequi on any indictment. Although not so declared by any law, it has been regarded as proper, that the president of the United States should, at least in such public prosecutions as affected the domestic tranquility or foreign relations of the United States, be considered as entitled by his suggestion to the prosecuting officer to justify their abandonment. And this upon consideration of public policy. The president has, it is true, the power to pardon and reprieve; but it is not to this source that the practice must be referred. He swears to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed. And this binds him to assist in their execution, by all the modes which he can command. But this power, so to speak of it, in the president, in prosecutions where consideration of public policy lead him to interfere by suggesting or directing their abandonment, is not and cannot be enlarged, or confounded with any right, to interfere with the course of legal proceedings; and least of all to exercise it so that it will directly or indirectly overrule the judgment of a court; or change the place at which the trial of a crime or offence shall be had. And, although no one will regard without great respect any suggestion which may come from the president of the United States; yet whenever that suggestion is presented in a form in which it shall interfere with the exercise of judicial power, except in cases of pardon and reprieve, it should not be heeded. It is easy to understand why in public prosecutions which involve domestic tranquility, or the preservation of foreign relations, the opinion of the president of the United States should be potential, if not conclusive, in directing the conduct of the prosecuting officer. But it is so because of the respect paid to the opinions of one occupying that high position, in relation to matters with which he may be presumed to be intimately acquainted; and, therefore, a prosecuting officer may very properly consider that, in the judgment of the president of the United States, a guide is furnished him which he may safely and properly follow. But this is not because any law of the land so declares it; for if the prosecuting officer shall feel that his duty requires him not to abandon a prosecution, there is no law which forces him to do so; nor would the wish of the president be heard in opposition to his proceeding. After the prosecuting officer had discharged his duty, if conviction followed, the president may reprieve or pardon, remit the forfeiture or release the penalty. The fact that the power of the president to interfere in criminal prosecutions is derived from the obligation to see that the laws are properly executed, and that, in matters which involve internal or external tranquility, his experience may well be regarded as the safest guide, because in these respects of his greater knowledge, shows that, in all cases where there is not involved a question of either internal or external quiet, the reasons which we have seen for such interference with the functions of prosecuting officers wholly cease. Except so far as it may be considered proper, because in all cases, respectful and safe, to give great weight to the suggestions of the president, I doubt the propriety of imposing any higher obligation on the prosecuting officer. For, after all, it is but adding to the prescribed legal duties of that officer, the obligation to obey the directions of the president. Where that direction leads the prosecuting officer to abandon a prosecution, it generally commends itself to our approbation, because it seems an exercise of mercy.

But it should be remembered, that a general power, derived in the manner we have seen, to interfere with public prosecutions, and direct their abandonment, would, in like manner, justify the president in requiring the prosecuting officer to institute and conduct prosecutions, in cases where the judgment of that officer would suggest a contrary course. Such a power existing without the color of law, in derogation of law, so far as it would impose on the prosecuting officer a control unknown to the law, and, by the imposition of that control, extinguish his responsibility to the law, and substitute therefor a dependence on the president, would be in itself so full of mischief, and so much at war with the system of direct responsibility to the country intended to be imposed on all public officers, through the laws which define their duties, that it only requires to be stated, to be fully understood. Of this, however, there can be no doubt. The right of the president to interfere in criminal cases, and cause the abandonment of prosecutions, is exercised only for the purpose of putting an end to such prosecution and discharging the accused. It has never been claimed, never exercised, never permitted, for the purpose of changing the proceedings; still less for the purpose of changing the place of the trial of the accused. So jealous is the law of the United States in this regard, that, as we have seen, it requires the place of trial to have been previously ascertained by law. And no principle is better established than that where a right to exercise jurisdiction has attached in one place, it excludes jurisdiction in every other place. This principle, declared in the case of Ex parte Bollman and Swartwout, by Chief Justice Marshall, has never been questioned. And if a proceeding operating directly to subvert this principle would find no favor with a court, it would have no better recommendation by tending indirectly to accomplish the same result. It is well to remember that the unquestioned exercise of any power in the course of time is claimed as a right; and precedents, however mischievous, acquire the force of laws. That which in the hands of one ruler, considered as the source of danger, would be regarded as imaginary; in the hands of another as a tyranny is felt to be real. For all the purposes of government, I know not any powers, but such as the law confers; and I know not any administration of these powers but such as the law appoints. Convenience; a proper regard for the opinions of those who have superior opportunities for obtaining information; and confidence in the judgment of those whose position entitles them to it, may well and properly lead one to seek in these guides for his conduct or aids to a conclusion. But with all this, where an officer is created by law, and his functions are declared by law, his ultimate responsibility is to the law.

It will be seen with what pertinency I am led to the consideration of the relations of these officers when in the argument it is said that the attorney of the United States for the state of South Carolina may enter a nolle prosequi without leave of the court; but that his discretion in doing so is controlled by the president. I speak of the president because I am bound to suppose that the directions said to have been given by the attorney-general have the sanction of the president. It is true that the court has no power to command the prosecuting officer to proceed in a criminal case if he is unwilling to do so. It is equally true that when the court permits an entry to be made in its minutes of the entry of a nolle prosequi it adopts and justifies that proceeding. If then, the court cannot refuse its leave to the entry of a nolle prosequi, it cannot refuse its assent or withhold its justification to the prosecuting officer, however desirous or even bound it may be to do so. That to answer all the purposes for which a nolle prosequi is intended, it should be entered in the minutes of the court; that it cannot be entered in these minutes without the assent of a judge; would seem to lead to no other conclusion than that a motion to enter it must be addressed to the discretion of the court. In this case I refuse assent to an entry of it. It is not made in the exercise of that discretion of the attorney of the United States, which is necessary, if not indispensable with me, as the evidence of its propriety. It is not made for the purpose either of abandoning a prosecution, for any of the various causes which suggest that course; but to prepare the way for other proceedings, which, in their practical operation, overrule and set aside a judgment of the court. Such a proceeding, operating for such purposes, has nothing to recommend it to me, nor can it have a place in the minutes of this court. I have thus fairly, and I hope plainly, set forth the grounds upon which all of the proceedings in this court have rested. The opinion which I have given as to the true construction of the act of 15th May, 1820, is the same which was by me made known to those who had a right to be informed of it, before this case in which it is now expressed had any existence. When in Columbia, at the term of the United States court, I delivered an opinion upon the general question of the right in congress to declare the slave-trade piracy; it was not intended then to decide that the act of the 15th May, 1820, was the exercise of that right. It was considered proper not at that time, to signify a difference in the court as to the construction of that act. But now the necessity does exist, because the question of jurisdiction involves that of the nature of the offence, and that involves the construction of the act. I think now, as I did then, that congress had the power, but that the power has not been exercised by the act of the 15th May, 1820. If the slave trade, regarding it as a trade or business, is to be declared piracy, the act is yet to be passed by congress. If the power to congress was granted at a time and under circumstances which are so wholly different from the time in which we live and the circumstances which surround us, as to show that the grant of it without restriction was improvident, it is for the states by whom the grant of power was made, to resume it or require modifications of its exercise.

UNITED STATES v. CORWIN et al.

[1 Bond, 149.] [1]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. Oct. Term, 1857.

OFFICIAL BOND—ACTION ON—CREDITS—ACCOUNTING OFFICERS—EVIDENCE—TREASURY TRANSCRIPTS.

1. Treasury transcripts, showing the state of accounts as between the government and a disbursing officer of the United States, are prima facie evidence, and admissible as such in a suit against the officer or his sureties on an official bond.

2. The act of congress provides that in a suit on such bond no item of credit shall be allowed, unless it has previously been submitted to and disallowed by the proper accounting officers.

3. But it is competent for the officer or his sureties to prove that a disputed item of credit claimed had been thus presented and disallowed, although the treasury transcript does not show such presentation and rejection.

4. Where the evidence proves, to the satisfaction of a jury, in a suit on the bond of a disbursing officer, that money, reasonable in amount, was paid by such officer, and services were rendered by him in good faith, in the proper discharge of his official duties, such payment and service, if not prohibited by law, may be allowed as credits.

[Suit by the United States against R. C. Corwin and others to recover a shortage in the account of Henry Harvey, a sub-Indian agent, upon whose bond the defendants were sureties.]

Stanley Matthews, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Corwin & Warden, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge (charging jury). This is a suit against the defendants, as sureties in the official bond of Henry Harvey, a sub-Indian agent of the United States for the Osage Indians. The condition of the bond is, in substance, that Harvey shall faithfully perform all his duties as such sub-Indian agent, and faithfully account for all moneys received by him, and all property which shall come officially into his possession. Transcripts from the books of the treasury department have been offered in evidence, purporting to show the moneys advanced by the United States to the subagent, and showing a nominal balance against him of $13,553. Although, by act of congress, these treasury transcripts are made legal evidence for the government, they are not conclusive as to the amount due, and it is the right of the principal and the sureties, in an official bond, to prove that there are credits which do not appear in the account, and which ought justly to be allowed. And in the present case, it is admitted by the district attorney that the sub-Indian agent is entitled to large items of credit, reducing the actual claim of the government to the sum of $1,545.56, for which he claims a verdict. This, then, is the amount in controversy, and it will be for the jury to decide whether the defendants in this suit are liable for the sum claimed, or any other amount. And the decision of this issue must depend on the evidence in the case For the government, although the party plaintiff, occupies a footing of perfect equality with a citizen as to the admissibility and force and effect of evidence, except in cases where, from considerations of public policy, immunities and privileges may have been specially conferred upon it by law, it has been found necessary, for the prevention of frauds on the treasury, to provide by law, that in any suit by the government for a balance due on an official bond, no credit shall be allowed, unless the items claimed as credits have been previously presented to the proper accounting officer, and have been by him disallowed in whole or in part. The only exceptions in the law are, where the officer claiming the credits was absent in a foreign country, or prevented by some other unavoidable cause from their presentation. But any items of credit, which do not appear in the treasury statement, and which have been presented and disallowed by the accounting officer, may be proved by the party charged; and if just and legal, will be admitted as proper credits. And, with a commendable spirit of liberality, the courts of the United States, in controversies between the government and the sureties in an official bond, have held that where an item of expenditure, or an act of official service, was fairly within the range of the legal duties and obligations of an officer, he and his sureties are entitled to a just allowance. But, in the strictness required by law in passing on the claims of an officer or his sureties, there is a necessity that this limitation should be strictly observed.

It is not proposed to detain the jury by a critical reference to the items of the treasury statements in this case. This document will be with the jury, and, with other evidence adduced, will be considered by them. There are some disputed items in controversy. Without referring to these in detail, it will be sufficient to state the following general rules for the guidance of the jury in forming their verdict: First. Every item of credit claimed by Harvey, as Indian subagent, which has been presented to the accounting officer of the treasury department, and by him rejected, if proved to the satisfaction of the jury to be just and equitable, ought to be allowed. Second. If the credit claimed is for money paid by the subagent, or for a service rendered by him in pursuance of law, or instructions from the proper department sanctioned by law, he and his sureties are entitled to its allowance. Third. If the jury are satisfied that the money paid by the officer, or the service rendered, was in good faith and the charge reasonable in amount, and that the payments or service pertained properly to his official duties, and were not prohibited by law, they may be allowed as credits.

Applying these rules to the disputed items of the defendant's claim, it will be for the jury to say what shall be allowed and what rejected. They will carefully examine and weigh the evidence before them, and return such a verdict as in their judgment shall be just and equitable.

The jury returned a verdict for the United States for the amount claimed as due from the subagent.

UNITED STATES v. CORWINE et al.

[1 Bond, 339;[1] 1 Wkly. Law Gaz. 413.]

Circuit Court, S. D. Ohio. April Term, 1860.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—GOVERNMENT CONTRACT—DISCHARGE OF SURETIES—CHANGE OF CONTRACT.

1. The sureties upon a bond, wherein the principals have obligated themselves to the United States to open a ship canal three hundred feet in width and twenty feet in depth, and keep it open the same width and depth for four and a half years from the time of the acceptance of the work by the secretary of war, are discharged from all liability on the same if the principals do not perform their agreement for opening the channel according to its terms, and the government accepts the work with a channel only eighteen feet in depth instead of twenty, as required by the contract.

2. A surety is not bound beyond the terms of his contract, and his liability can not be extended or enlarged by implication, and any change in terms, unless expressly assented to by him, releases him from his legal responsibility.

[Cited in U S v. Case, Case No. 14,743.]

At law.

Stanley Matthews, for the United States.

R. M. Corwine, for defendants.

LEAVITT, District Judge. This is an action of debt against Richard M. Corwine, John A. Corwine, and Wm. Wiswell, Jr., as the sureties of Waldo Putnam Craig and William Russell Righter. There is a general demurrer to the declaration on which the questions submitted to the court are presented. The declaration avers, that on November 13, 1856, the defendants executed a bond to the United States, in the penalty of $75,000, to avoid on the condition that the said Craig and Righter should faithfully fulfill their written contract of the same date, whereby they agreed to open a straight ship channel at the outlet of the Mississippi river, known as the Pass de l'Outre, to a depth of twenty feet, throughout a well-defined width of three hundred feet, to the deep water of the Gulf of Mexico, and keep the same open to the same width and depth for the period of four and a half years from the time of the completion and acceptance of the work. It is further averred, that by the said contract Craig and Righter were to finish the work within fifteen months from the said November 13, 1856, and that upon its completion to the satisfaction of the secretary of war, the United States was to pay them $125,000. The declaration also avers, that in consideration of the agreement of said Craig and Righter to keep open the said channel as above stated, the United States agreed to pay them $36,000 for the period of four and a half years, and at the same rate for the further time they should keep said channel open, until the appropriation for that purpose should be exhausted. It is also recited as a part of said contract, that in order to determine whether the agreement to keep open the said channel had been complied with, the secretary of war should appoint an officer or officers to examine the work, at such time as he might deem necessary; and that, if the secretary should be satisfied from the report of such examinations that the channel had been constantly maintained of the width and depth before stated, at the expiration of one-third of said period of four and a half years, eighty per cent. of one-third of the amount of the contract to keep said channel open was to be paid to said Craig and Righter, and one-third more at the expiration of two-thirds of the said time, and the balance at the end of said four and a half years. The declaration then avers that Craig and Righter proceeded to execute said contract to open said channel; and that on September 10, 1858, they had opened the same at the width of three hundred feet, and with the depth of eighteen feet, and that on that day the work was accepted by the secretary of war, and the contract price of $125,000 was then paid in full. The breach of the condition of the bond, as assigned, is that Craig and Righter, since the said September 10, 1858, have not kept the said channel open, with a width of three hundred feet, and the depth of eighteen feet, and that thereby an action has accrued against the defendants, as the sureties of Craig and Righter. The second count of the declaration is upon a bond which recites a contract identical with that set forth in the first, with the exception that it refers to the opening of another channel at the mouth of the Mississippi. There is, of course, no occasion for the separate consideration of the two counts.

It is not my purpose to examine all the points of exception to the declaration urged in support of the demurrer. There is one, which, in my judgment, is conclusive as to the plaintiff's right to recover against these defendants on the cause of action set out in the declaration. The point of this exception may be stated thus: That the declaration shows on its face that Craig and Righter did not perform their agreement for opening the channel, according to its terms, and that the government accepted the work with a channel of only eighteen feet in depth, instead of twenty, as required by the contract, without any averment that the defendants had any knowledge of, or assented to such modification. On this ground, it is insisted the sureties in the bond are relieved from all liability and that this action can not be maintained against them. The contract, as has been stated, obligated Craig and Righter to make the channel of a specified width and depth, and to keep it open, of that width and depth, for four and a half years from the time of the acceptance of the work by the secretary of war. The defendants became their sureties in a bond conditioned for the faithful performance of these stipulations. The work was accepted by the secretary of war and paid for in full, as if completed according to the contract. The government had a right to forego the terms of the contract, in regard to the depth of the channel, and to accept one of less depth. In doing this, the obligation of the contract as to the dimensions of the channel was at an end, both as to the principals and the sureties, and the government was estopped from asserting any claim for a violation of that part of the contract. It was, in effect, the substitution of a new contract for that originally entered into by the parties. But it is claimed that the defendants, as sureties, are liable upon the averment in the declaration that Craig and Righter failed to keep open the channel as accepted by the United States. There seems to be an incongruity between the contract set out in the declaration and the averment of its breach. In other words, the declaration avers a breach of a contract, for the performance of which these defendants contracted no obligation as sureties. Their undertaking was, that a channel twenty feet in depth, made in all respects according to the requirement of the contract, should be kept open for a specified time. The United States waived that part of the contract which specified the depth of the channel, and accepted the work with a channel of a less depth. The sureties are in no sense parties to this arrangement, and therefore not bound by it.

There is no principle better settled than that a surety is not bound beyond the terms of his contract, and that his liability can not be extended or enlarged by implication; and any change in its terms, unless expressly assented to by him, releases him from his legal responsibility. This is famaliar law—so long and so well settled that it is not necessary to cite the numerous cases by which it is sustained. Its application to the present case is so apparent, as not to admit of doubt or controversy. As already stated, these defendants as sureties, guarantied that Craig and Righter should maintain a channel of a specified depth. The bond to which they were parties, though executed at the same date of the execution of the contract, could not take effect, so far as it related to keeping the channel open, until the channel was excavated as required by the contract. The averment of the declaration, however, is that such a channel has not been made, and was not insisted on by the government. It follows as an inevitable conclusion, that the condition on which alone the sureties became bound for the maintenance or continuance of the channel, and on which their obligation was to attach, did not occur. There never was a channel of twenty feet depth, and their undertaking to keep it open was never operative, and is of no obligation on them. The contract provided that the work should be inspected by an officer to be appointed by the secretary of war; and if it appeared from his report "that the work has been properly executed, and that a straight channel of the above width and depth actually exists," it was to be paid for; but if it should be found "that the work had not been completed agreeably to the contract," the contractors were to receive no pay for what they had done. It is clear, therefore, that the acceptance of the work by the government before a channel was opened, as required by the contract, left nothing on which the guaranty of the sureties could operate.

This view would seem to be decisive of the question raised on this demurrer, and it is not a material inquiry whether the interference of the government, and its acceptance of the work not executed according to the contract, could affect, injuriously or otherwise, the interests of the sureties. The only ground on which it is claimed that the sureties are liable is, that the acceptance of the work in its incomplete state has not placed them in any worse condition than if the contract had been strictly complied with, and that their liability on their undertaking that the channel should be kept open, continues unaffected by the act of the government. The first reply to this assumption is, that any change in the terms or obligation of a surety, without his consent, releases him from liability. And it is well settled, that this principle applies, even in cases where a modification of the contract is favorable to the sureties. But in this case, if it be conceded that the government had a right to waive a strict performance of this contract on the part of Craig and Righter, and to insist on the continued legal liability of the sureties, for the reason that they were not injured by the act of the government, the facts will not sustain the position. Their obligation was, that the contractors should keep open a channel of the depth of twenty feet. Now, it needs no argument to prove that a channel of only eighteen feet in depth would be much more liable to fill up or become obstructed than if it were twenty feet deep. The pressure of the water being so much greater in the latter case, the probabilities that the channel would fill up would be greatly lessened; in a word, there is a palpable difference in an undertaking to maintain an open channel made to the depth of twenty feet, and one but eighteen feet deep. I will only add, that while, in my judgment, the law of the case is with these defendants, and am clear that this action can not be maintained against them, I am equally clear that no claim of justice is invaded by holding them to be exempt from liability. Under the circumstances of the case, an opposite conclusion would operate inequitably on them. There was a moral obligation on the government, to protect the rights of these sureties as far as practicable, without a sacrifice of its own interest. Under the contract, the government was not bound to pay anything for the work, unless it was completed according to the terms of the contract. If, without consulting the sureties, it was deemed expedient to pay the full contract price for the excavation of a channel but partially made, they are fully justified in asserting their exemption from liability. And it would be a most rigorous application of law that would enforce the payment of the penalty of their bond. But without further discussion of the points presented on this demurrer, I am led unhesitatingly to the conclusion that it must be sustained.

Case No. 14,872.

UNITED STATES v. COTTINGHAM.

[2 Blatchf. 470.] [1]

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. Oct. 20, 1852.

JURY—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES—WHEN ALLOWED—EMBEZZLEMENT FROM MAIL—DECOY LETTER.

1. Peremptory challenges to jurors are not allowed in the courts of the United States in any other than capital cases, even though they are allowed in other cases by the state law.

[Cited in U. S. v. Randall, Case No. 16,118; U. S. v. Coppersmith, 4 Fed. 199.]

2. A decoy-letter, containing money, mailed for the purpose of entrapping a clerk in a post-office, who opens it and takes the money, is within the 21st section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 107).

[Cited in U. S. v. Whittier, Case No. 16,688; U. S. v. Rapp, 30 Fed. 822; U. S. v. Wight, 38 Fed. 109; Walster v. U. S., 42 Fed. 896; U. S. v. Grimm, 50 Fed. 530.]

This was an indictment against [George Cottingham] a clerk in the post office at Albany, New-York, under the 21st section of the act of March 3, 1825 (4 Stat. 107), for opening a letter and stealing money therefrom. The punishment fixed by law for the offence was imprisonment for not less than ten nor more than twenty-one years. On the trial, the counsel for the prisoner claimed the right to challenge peremptorily twenty of the jurors, under the provisions of the 2d section of the state statute (2 Rev. St. 734, § 9), which is as follows: "Every person arraigned and put on trial for any offence punishable with death, or with imprisonment in a state prison ten years or any longer time, shall be entitled to challenge peremptorily twenty of the persons drawn as jurors for such trial, and no more." The letter containing money, which it was proved the prisoner had opened, and from which he had taken the money, was a decoy-letter, prepared and mailed by an officer of the government for the purpose of entrapping the prisoner. The counsel for the prisoner raised the objection that such a letter was not within the act.

James R. Lawrence, U. S. Dist. Atty.
Deodatus Wright, for prisoner.

THE COURT decided that the prisoner had no right to any of the peremptory challenges claimed, because such challenges were not allowed at common law in any other than capital cases. See note to U. S. v. Reed [Case No. 16,134.]

It also charged the jury that the purpose for which the letter from which the money was taken was mailed, was not a question under the act.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE—CAPIAS—TRIAL—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

1. A capias may be issued as the first process against a person for unlawful gaming.

2. The court will not suffer counsel in a criminal prosecution to argue to the jury, a point of law which has been decided by the court.

[Cited in Stettinius v. U. S., Case No. 13,387.]

Indictment for gaming, contrary to the act of Virginia. A capias had issued upon the indictment, as the first process.

Mr. Swann, for defendant, moved to quash it, as being illegal and oppressive. But THE COURT overruled the motion.

Mr. Taylor began to address the jury on the points of law heretofore decided by the court, that the offence was not committed within the jurisdiction of the court, being before the first Monday of December, 1800; and that an indictment is not the proper and legal process in such cases.

THE COURT stopped him, and said they had before prevented Mr. Jones from arguing points of law to the jury, which the court had decided against him, (see Virginia v. Zimmerman [Case No. 16,968]), and they had not altered their opinion on that subject.

Mr. Jones, for defendant, tendered a bill of exceptions.

The assignment of firm property and the property of one only of the partners does not establish insolvency of the firm, which will entitle the United States, a creditor of the firm, to maintain a bill to enforce the priority given it by Act March 2, 1799, § 65, in the estate of an insolvent debtor.]

plied to the payment of such judgment in preference to other creditors.]

The prayer of the bill demanded an account in respect to effects and moneys alleged to have belonged to the late firm of Castro & Henriquez, and that the right of the plaintiff thereto, in preference to others, might be decreed, and the amount applied on outstanding judgments and customhouse bonds in favor of the United States against Castro & Henriquez. The bill presented this state of facts: That Castro and Henriquez, prior to April, 1823, had been in partnership, carrying on the distillery business in this city; and, in connection with that business, imported merchandise, and became indebted to the United States on customhouse bonds to a large amount. On the 20th April, 1823, the firm stopped payment, then being indebted to the United States on duty bonds for over $74,000. Henriquez was at that time in Europe. The business of the concern was managed by Castro, who also had a full power of attorney from Henriquez. On the day of their failure, or the day following, Castro made an assignment of the property of the firm and that of himself to Lewis A. Brunell, and immediately departed from New York, without the knowledge of his creditors. On the same day, proceedings were taken under the state act against Castro & Henriquez, as absconding or absent debtors, by the defendant Couch and his then partner, Stebbins, and others of their creditors. A few days thereafter, Castro returned to the city, and his assignment to Brunell being supposed imperfect, or insufficient in law, he resumed and cancelled it, and executed another, prepared under the advice of counsel, in which he assigned all the partnership estate, and all his individual estate, to Brunell, for the payment of the debts of the partnership, giving preference to the debts due the United States. That prior to the failure, the firm had consigned to Stebbins & Couch large quantities of distilled spirits for sale, some of which had been sold on credit, and some remained unsold on the day of their failure, but has been since sold, and the proceeds realized, which are now held by the defendant Couch, survivor of Stebbins & Couch. That after the assignment, Brunell, the assignee, placed like property, belonging to Castro & Henriquez, in the hands of Stebbins & Couch, the avails of which defendant has received and yet retains; and, also, that Brunell carried on the distillery of Castro & Henriquez, with their stock assigned him, and consigned the liquors to Stebbins & Couch for sale, and that the proceeds of such sale are retained by the defendant. The bill also avers that judgments have been recovered by the United States on the customhouse bonds, and executions thereon have been returned unsatisfied, to the amount of $24,000, which Brunell is unable to satisfy; and it charges that the United States are entitled to have such proceeds (realized by Stebbins & Couch) applied to the satisfaction of the balance. The bill was filed April, 1832. Couch filed his answer January, 1833. The cause was brought to hearing December, 1840.

D. Lord, Jr., for defendant.

Before THOMPSON, Circuit Justice, and BETTS, District Judge.

THE COURT remarked that there might be a serious difficulty, in the present posture of the case, in giving the plaintiff the relief sought, if the merits were beyond all question on that side. The action rests upon the authority of U. S. v. Howland, 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108, and in its institution conformed to that precedent; but has since varied from it, by discharging the assignee from the suit. That the original debtors (Castro & Henriquez), or their assignee, seemed to be indispensable parties to a bill of this description, not only for the purpose of discharging the debtor from his liabilities to those from whom he received the funds, and to authorize the institution of a new cestui que trust in their place; but, also, because an accounting is called for, and the equity of the United States can only intercept what is due the party directly responsible to them, on a just amount taken between such party and his debtor. The assignee ought, therefore, to have been retained a party to the taking of such account, to enable the court to decree definitely upon the rights of all interested in the subject-matter. This formal difficulty might be obviated if the case, as now disclosed, established any right in the United States upon the merits, unless the staleness of the claim and the extraordinary delays in prosecuting it should be regarded as outweighing any equity on the part of the United States to amend the proceedings. The unvaried construction of the 65th section of the act of March 2, 1799, settles this point, that the priority therein given the United States, to be paid out of the estate of an insolvent debtor, takes effect only when the insolvency is established by an assignment of all his property, either by his own act, or by act of law, and when such assignment is carried into execution by the assignee. [U. S. v. Howland] 4 Wheat. [17 U. S.] 108; [Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co.] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386; [Brent v. Bank of Washington] 10 Pet. [35 U. S.] 597; [Beaston v. Farmers' Bank of Delaware] 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 102; [U. S. v. Hove] 3 Cranch [7 U. S.] 73; [Prince v. Bartlett] 8 Cranch [12 U. S.] 431; U. S. v. Mott [Case No. 15,826]; U. S. v. Clark [Id. 14,807]. The evidence on the part of the plaintiff is very faint upon this head, and it is in no respect aided by the answer. There is ground for implication that Brunell took control of the partnership effects as assignee, yet the evidence equally comports with his having acted merely as factor or agent, and it is not a little remarkable that no trace of the assignment among his papers, or proof of his claim under it, could be produced, if that was the only foundation of his powers in respect to the estate and interests of Castro & Henriquez.

But independent of all questions upon the effect of this evidence, the assignment fails to establish the insolvency of the partners, because the individual property of Henriquez was not included in it. As the insolvency of one partner, or the insufficiency of their joint means to pay the partnership debts, does not necessarily prove the insolvency of the other partner, it is clear that the assignment made by Castro does not secure an entire preference or priority to the United States. The rights of the creditors of Henriquez, at least, are not displaced by it. [U. S. v. Hack] 8 Pet. [33 U. S.] 271. This is independent of the doubt that might be raised as to the sufficiency of Castro's assignment of even partnership effects, to supply proof of the insolvency of the firm. Pearpoint v. Graham [Case No. 10,877].

THE COURT further observed that, as it appeared from the answer and proofs, the attachment sued out of the state court was carried no further than the arrest of partnership property, and was discontinued within a few days, without the appointment of trustees, or any order of assignment. This initiatory arrest of property, and holding it in custody of the law to abide the decision of the proper forum, whether it shall pass to assignees, is not the proof of insolvency contemplated by the act of congress. For although it is declared that cases of insolvency mentioned therein shall be deemed to extend to cases in which the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor shall have been attached by process of law (Act March 2, 1799, § 65), yet manifestly the term "attached" must be understood as having relation to the ultimate disposition of the property, and not its simple seizure; because that is often divested immediately, for the want of due grounds for the procedure; but, more especially, because the priority of the United States arises and is enforced, not that the property of their debtor has been taken from his possession, but for the reason that it is invested in some other party (assignee or executor) who has power to distribute and dispose of it. [Beaston v. Farmers' Bank], 12 Pet. [37 U. S.] 136, 137; [Conard v. Atlantic Ins. Co.] 1 Pet. [26 U. S.] 386. The sheriff becomes no such party by serving a process of attachment. He could not be made amenable to the United States, either by means of his possession of the property, or because he had surrendered it to the owner, or transferred it to the assignees. When the property is placed, by means of the attachment, in a situation to be distributed, the priority of the United States comes into existence, and then only, for the act renders the assignee paying any debt previous to those due to the United States answerable in his own person and estate for such debts (section 65); and this liability necessarily imports that the party charged with it had full dominion over the estate and effects of the insolvent, because he is regarded as having committed a devastavit, or misapplied funds, by paying them out in disregard of legal priorities, and not as a debtor to the United States, or subject to their action merely, by having the estate in his possession. The court accordingly ruled that neither the assignment made by Castro, nor the attachment levied on the property of the firm, proved the insolvency of Castro & Henriquez so as to enable the United States to sustain this action. It was therefore ordered that the bill be dismissed.

UNITED STATES v. COULTER.

DISORDERLY HOUSE—SELLING LIQUOR TO NEGROES—SUNDAY SELLING—LICENSE.

The practice of selling spirituous liquors, in a public manner, to negroes and slaves, assembled in considerable numbers, and suffering them to drink the same in and about the house on the Sabbath, constitutes the offence of keeping a disorderly house, although the owner may have a tavern license

[Cited in State v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 733.]

Indictment for keeping a disorderly house.

Mr. Morsell, for the defendant, contended that a disorderly house is only indictable at common law as a common nuisance, and that actual disorder must be proved. Coulter had a license to keep a tavern; he is only prohibited by statute from selling on Sundays; from dealing with slaves, &c.

Mr. Jones, for the United States. A bawdy-house is indictable as a common nuisance, and yet it is not necessary to prove that any one person has been disturbed by it. The tendency to corrupt the morals makes it a common nuisance.

THE COURT. The license does not authorize the defendant to sell to slaves or negroes on a Sunday; it is therefore no justification as to those facts. The practice of selling spirituous liquors in a public manner to negroes and slaves, assembled in considerable numbers, and suffering them to drink the same in and about the house on the Sabbath, constitutes the offence of keeping a disorderly house.

Verdict guilty. Fined $10.

MUNICIPAL BONDS—RIGHT OF JUDGMENT CREDITOR TO MANDAMUS—SPECIAL TAX—PRACTICE.

1. A judgment creditor of a county who has received a warrant on the treasurer which is refused payment, may have a mandamus to enforce the collection of a tax to pay such judgment, and is not bound to wait and take his turn among other warrant-holders.

[Cited in U. S. v. Johnson Co., Case No. 15,489.]

2. When the court will order a special tax against a county to pay a judgment; the practice in such cases stated.

In this case motion was made by respondent at this term to quash the alternative writ which had been issued requiring respondent to levy and cause to be collected a special tax for the payment of the relator's judgment. It seems that upon representation made by the respondent that there was money in the county treasury for the purpose, the court at the last term by mandamus ordered a warrant issued for the amount, but said warrant when presented was not paid. Township organization has been adopted by the county, and May last, the three judges of the county court went out of office and one single judge came into office to continue the court under the new law. The present mandamus was served, as well on the retiring judges as the new judge. The former made return of their departure from office, and the motion to quash was made on behalf of the single judge now constituting the court. The grounds of the motion were: (1) That it was premature, not showing failure in respondent to comply with any demand. (2) That this court has not the power to order a special tax for the purpose. In support of these positions, the township organization law of 1873 was cited by the defendant's counsel, to show the process and machinery therein provided for the management of county affairs and collection of its revenues. And it was urged that the only duty or power of the county court is to levy the tax annually in April, after proper assessment has been made; that said relator, although he has a judgment, must have his warrant endorsed by the treasurer—"no funds"—and take his turn with other creditors in succession in obtaining payment of the warrant; that this court could not create a revenue law and appoint officers and levy special taxes every time a judgment is obtained against a municipality. If this be so, it was argued that every time a physician attends a pauper, and gets a warrant for his services, he can put in motion all the machinery of the law and have a special tax levied and collected for his benefit.

Ewing & Smith, for relator.

C. G. Burton, for respondent.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge, orally rendered decision, in substance saying: We cannot go through all the maze of procedure proposed by counsel for enforcing the judgments of this court against municipal corporations. If we should adopt the views of the defendant's counsel, our judgments would be reduced to a sham and a farce. The practice in these proceedings is largely settled already in this circuit. Our ordinary course is not to require a special assessment, and levy at a special and arbitrary time, but to have the tax levied and collected with the general annual levy. Such special levy can then be made on the books and collected without much additional expense or trouble, and in the exercise of its discretion the court aims to avoid all unnecessary severity and useless costs. Some delay may thereby be occasioned to the creditor, but in theory of law, he is compensated therefor by interest. This is the method we have taken and carried out in all cases.

When we have the right to order a special levy, we do not hesitate to do so, if it becomes necessary; but if the respondent appears and gives satisfactory assurance that the requisite amount will be embraced in the general levy, and that sufficient will be appropriated therefrom by a proper order to pay the particular debt, in such case a special levy may be dispensed with. We are governed by the circumstances of each case.

In the case at bar, McKee recovered a judgment against Vernon county in November, 1874 [Case No. 8,851], whereon execution issued in December and payment was demanded. The execution was returned nulla bona. It was the duty of the county court, after what had been done by the relator, to levy a tax the following April, to pay this debt, but it did not do it. It was represented to us at the last term, that funds therefor were in the treasury, and if warrant were drawn the creditor would have a short road to obtain payment. Having received his warrant he was met with response of "no funds," and he is asked to register this warrant and wait for his turn to get his money in the order that warrants are presented. We hold that he is not required to do so.

The motion to quash is refused, and let order go for a peremptory writ on respondent to levy at the next April term, a special tax, at the time when the general annual levy is made for county purposes, to pay the judgment. The costs of the writ served on persons not officers must be paid by the relators. Ordered accordingly.

UNITED STATES v. COUSINERY et al.

District Court, S. D. New York. April, 1874.

CUSTOMS DUTIES—FINALITY OF COLLECTOR'S DECISION—APPEAL TO SECRETARY—RECOVERY OF DUTIES—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

1. C. & Co. imported, on two occasions, a quantity of olive oil, which they entered as "olive oil, not salad," and on which they paid the estimated duty of twenty-five cents a gallon, under the 5th section of the act of July 14, 1862 (12 Stat. 548), and received the goods. Subsequently the appraiser returned the oil as being "olive oil, salad," and the collector then liquidated the duty at $1 a gallon, under the 11th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 212). On one of the importations the importers protested against the rate of $1 a gallon, and appealed to the secretary of the treasury, who approved the decision of the collector. The United States brought suit against the importers to recover the difference between the estimated and the liquidated duty. On the trial evidence was received, under objection, to show that the oil was "olive oil, not salad," and the jury found that it was such. The defendants then moved for judgment on the verdict: Held, that under the 14th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 214), the decision of the collector is final as to the amount of duty to be paid, in all cases except where there is an appeal to the secretary of the treasury, and suit brought to recover back the duty, as is provided in that section.

2. The words "decision of the collector," in that section, mean the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties in the usual manner by the proper officers.

3. The above construction is not contrary to the provision of the 5th amendment to the constitution.

4. Therefore, the evidence to show the character of the article, as not justifying the collector's decision, was wrongly received, and the defendants were not entitled to judgment upon the verdict.

[This was a suit by the United States against Firmin Cousinery and others to recover the difference between an estimated and a liquidated duty.]

T. Simons and E. H. Smith, for the United States.

J. H. Choate, for defendants.

BLATCHFORD, District Judge. This suit is brought to recover an alleged balance of duties on two importations of olive oil, in casks, made by the defendants in January and February, 1871, respectively. The oil was entered as "olive oil, not salad," and estimated duty was paid on it at the rate of 25 cents per gallon, under section 5 of the act of July 14, 1862 (12 Stat. 548). Subsequently the appraiser returned the oil as "olive oil, salad," and the collector then liquidated the duty at the rate of $1 per gallon, under section 11 of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 212). The duty paid was $506 25. The duty as liquidated is $3,173. This suit is brought to recover the difference between those two sums. The goods passed into the possession of the defendants on the payment of the 25 cents per gallon duty, and before the liquidation. In the case of one of the two importations the defendants protested against the rate of duty at $1 per gallon, and appealed to the secretary of the treasury from the decision of the collector assessing duty at that rate, and the decision of the collector was affirmed by the secretary.

The case was tried before the court and a jury, and, on the trial, after the plaintiffs had made out a prima facie case entitling them to recover, the defendants offered evidence to show that the oil in question was olive oil, not salad, and so not liable to the duty of $1 per gallon. The plaintiffs objected to the admissibility, competency, and relevancy of the evidence, on the ground that, under the act of congress hereafter referred to, the liquidation by the collector was conclusive as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover in this suit the balance of duties claimed; but the court admitted the evidence. The jury, on the evidence, found a special verdict, that the goods in question were "olive oil, not salad." On this verdict, the defendants move that judgment be entered for them in the suit.

The principal question involved and discussed on the motion is as to the operation and effect of the 14th section of the act of June 30, 1864 (13 Stat. 214.) That section is as follows: "On the entry of any vessel, or of any goods, wares or merchandise, the decision of the collector of customs at the port of importation and entry, as to the rate and amount of duties to be paid on the tonnage of such vessel, or on such goods, wares or merchandise, and the dutiable costs and charges thereon, shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the master, commander or consignee of such vessel, in the case of duties levied on tonnage, or the owner, importer, consignee or agent of the merchandise, in the case of duties levied on goods, wares or merchandise, or the costs and charges thereon, shall, within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, as well in cases of merchandise entered in bond as for consumption, give notice in writing to the collector, on each entry, if dissatisfied with his decision, setting forth therein, distinctly and specifically, the grounds of his objection thereto, and shall, within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation, appeal therefrom to the secretary of the treasury, whose decision on such appeal shall be final and conclusive; and such vessel, goods, wares or merchandise, or costs and charges, shall be liable to duty accordingly, any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding, unless suit shall be brought within ninety days after the decision of the secretary of the treasury on such appeal, for any duties which shall have been paid before the date of such decision, on such vessel, or on such goods, wares or merchandise, or costs or charges, or within ninety days after the payment of duties paid after the decision of the secretary. And no suit shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any duties alleged to have been erroneously or illegally exacted, until the decision of the secretary of the treasury shall have been first had on such appeal, unless said decision of the secretary shall be delayed more than ninety days from the date of such appeal, in case of an entry at any port east of the Rocky Mountains, or more than five months in case of entry west of those mountains." It is contended, for the defendants, that this section has relation only to duties which have been paid; that its sole object is to regulate suits to recover back such duties after they have been paid; that it has no application to a suit by the United States to recover unpaid duties; and that it is to be read as if all it said was, that, in case the notice of dissatisfaction is given, and the appeal is taken, and the duties are paid, and the suit is brought, within the time limited, to recover them back, then the decision of the collector and the decision on appeal shall not be final and conclusive, so as to prevent an inquiry, in such suit, into what was the proper rate and amount of duties. But this view ignores the actual structure of the section and the plain meaning of its language. It enacts that the decision of the collector shall be final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the notice of dissatisfaction is given and the appeal is taken. If the notice is not given, or if, the notice being given, the appeal is not taken, then the decision of the collector is final and conclusive. If the notice is given and the appeal is taken, the decision of the secretary is final and conclusive. This finality and conclusiveness are such against all persons interested in the goods. The section then goes on to say what is meant by being "final and conclusive," by saying, that the goods shall be "liable to duty accordingly, any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding"—that is, shall be liable to duty in accordance with the decision of the collector, or, in case of an appeal, in accordance with the decision of the secretary, any act of congress to the contrary notwithstanding, unless suit shall be brought, within the limited times specified, to recover back what shall be paid as duties. This means, that the decision is made the test and standard for the payment of the duties to the government, even if there be an act of congress which appears to prescribe something different from the decision, and that the duties must be paid according to the decision, subject to the proviso, that, if a suit is brought, as permitted, to recover back duties so paid, then such decision is not final or conclusive for the purposes of that suit, but the court which tries such suit may inquire whether, in point of fact, the decision was correct, and whether the duties paid were the proper duties. This entirely excludes from consideration in a suit brought by the United States to enforce payment of the duties, all questions as to whether the decision of the collector or that of the secretary was correct, or as to what duties ought, in the absence of such decision, to have been exacted, and confines the question to be determined in such suit solely to the one, whether the duties claimed to be recovered are those decided by the collector, or by the secretary, on appeal, to be the proper duties. This court, in such a suit, is, therefore, inhibited from inquiring as to what the collector or the secretary ought to have decided, or from reviewing the decision of either officer. That power is reserved for the court in which a suit may be brought against the collector, to recover back the duties, after they shall have been paid.

These provisions of law maintain and enforce a policy which is found to prevail in the enactments of congress in regard to raising revenue. The policy is, that the collection of the revenue shall be enforced through summary provisions, and shall not await the slow processes of litigation as to rates and amounts of taxes and duties. A rate is prescribed, an officer is appointed to determine the proper amount, and then that amount must be paid, leaving open a brief time for an appeal. Suits to stay the collection of taxes and duties are not permitted. The very existence of the government depends on its receiving its revenue. It collects it, and the aggrieved party is left to a suit to recover back any improper exaction.

The decision of the supreme court in the case of Westray v. U. S., 18 Wall. [85 U. S.] 322, is entirely inconsistent with the view that the 14th section of the act of 1864, as to the conclusiveness of the decision of the collector or of the secretary, does not apply to suits brought by the United States. In that case, a suit was brought by the United States on a bond given on the entry of goods for warehousing. One condition of the bond was, that the obligors should pay to the collector the amount of duties to be ascertained, due and owing on the goods in question. The suit was brought to recover the amount of duties unpaid on the goods, as ascertained and liquidated by the collector. The defendants, at the trial, offered evidence to show that the goods were subject to less duty than that which had been ascertained and liquidated by the collector. The court refused to receive the evidence. The supreme court, on the ground that no appeal had been taken from the decision of the collector, held, that, under the 14th section of the act of 1864, the decision of the collector was final and conclusive for the purposes of that suit, and that it was proper to refuse to receive the evidence offered. Whether the suit is brought on a bond conditioned to pay the amount of duties to be ascertained, or is brought to recover the amount of duties as ascertained, can make no difference on the point now under consideration. The evidence offered by the defendants in the present case, and on which the jury found the special verdict, ought not to have been admitted, as the objection to its admission, taken by the plaintiffs, was a valid one.

It is contended, for the defendants, that there was no decision of the collector made in this case, within the meaning of the statute. The evidence at the trial showed that everything was done in this case in respect to the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, which is ever done in any case, to perfect and indicate and record such ascertainment and liquidation. The usage and practice of the collector's office was shown, to which the proceedings in this case conformed. The 14th section of the act of 1864 uses the phrase "decision of the collector of customs," and the phrase "ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs," as synonymous phrases. The decision of the collector is declared to be conclusive, unless the party, if dissatisfied with his decision, gives notice thereof "within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs," and also, "within thirty days after the date of such ascertainment and liquidation," appeals "therefrom" to the secretary of the treasury. Such ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs, that is, the proper officers in the collector's office or department, is the decision of the collector. An appeal from such ascertainment and liquidation is an appeal from the decision of the collector, and an appeal from the decision of the collector is an appeal from such ascertainment and liquidation. Congress must be assumed to have been legislating in reference to a well understood course of business, conducted under the revenue laws, when it speaks of "the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties by the proper officers of the customs," and to have intended that, when the duties were ascertained and liquidated in the usual manner by such officers, and the usual indicia thereof by checks and stamps were placed on the usual papers in the collector's office, such transaction was the decision of the collector of customs in the premises. See Act March 2, 1799, §§ 21, 49 (1 Stat. 642, 664).

The objection is taken, that, if the statute is capable of the construction above given to it, it violates the provision of the 5th amendment to the constitution of the United States, which declares that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law. The view taken is, that, as the article in question is found by the special verdict to have been "olive oil, not salad," the amount sought to be recovered in this suit is not for duties imposed by law, but is for an unlawful charge imposed by the collector. The answer to this view is, that the amount fixed by the collector is, by the statute, made the duty, for the purpose of collecting it as duty.

The motion for judgment on the part of the defendants is denied.

Case No. 14,879.

UNITED STATES v. COVILLAND.

[Hoff. Dec. 52.]

District Court, N. D. California. Feb. 15, 1862.

MEXICAN LAND GRANT—SURVEY—LOCATION WITHIN EXTERIOR BOUNDARIES—RIGHT OF ELECTION.

[When, in locating a given quantity of land granted to a claimant within exterior boundaries containing a much larger quantity, the survey is made on instructions by the government, without any consultation with the claimant, or allowance to him of an opportunity to make an election as to the land to be surveyed, the survey should be set aside.]

HOFFMAN, District Judge. By the decree of the board of commissioners, there was confirmed to the claimants a tract of land of the extent of seven leagues, of which the boundaries were given. A survey having been made of the quantity confirmed, within the exterior boundaries, (which were found to embrace a much larger extent of land), it was, on objections made to the secretary of the interior, set aside, and a new survey made pursuant to his instructions. This last survey has been returned into court, under the provisions of the act of 1860 [12 Stat. 33]. It is an admitted rule, not only of this court, but of the executive department of the government, that, in locating a given quantity of land granted to a claimant within exterior boundaries containing a much larger quantity, the claimant has the right of election as to the land to be surveyed. The election so to be exercised must be reasonable, nor must it be unnecessarily injurious to the adjacent public lands of the United States. If, by the acts of the grantee, such as occupying and cultivating a portion of the land, or selling parts of it to third persons, the election appears to have already been made, he will be estopped to make a new election, or to float the grant to other parts of the tract than those which he has, by his acts and declarations, selected. In this case it appears that the claimant has had no opportunity to make any election whatever. The survey has been made on instructions by the government, as to which he was not consulted. Admitting (which is not intended to be affirmed) that the first survey was improper, for the reason that the land was not surveyed in a sufficiently compact form, it does not appear that the claimant may not elect to have it surveyed in another form, so as to obviate that or any other objection. It cannot, I think, be pretended that the location elected by the executive officers of the government is the only one that can be made consistently with the calls of the grant, and the just exercise of his rights by the claimant. I therefore think that the present survey should be set aside, and a new survey and location made of seven leagues of land, to be taken within the exterior boundaries of the grant, at the election of the claimant, such election to be controlled and governed by the principles and rules applicable to the subjects.

It will be understood that, in setting aside this survey, no opinion is intended to be expressed as to the ultimate location of the land. When the tract shall have been surveyed, at the election of the claimant, the question will properly arise whether he has in any respect gone beyond his exterior boundaries, and whether his election has been properly and legally exercised.

Case No. 14,880.

UNITED STATES v. COWING.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 613.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. Nov. Term, 1835.

PERJURY — MATERIALITY OF FACTS SWORN TO — INDICTMENT—OATH—AUTHORITY TO ADMINISTER.

1. A justice of the peace has authority to administer an oath to an answer in chancery.

2. In an indictment for perjury, the materiality of the facts sworn to, must appear in the indictment, either by averment, or by a statement of facts which show their materiality.

This was an indictment for perjury in the answer to a bill in chancery. The defendant [William Cowing] demurred to the indictment, because it neither averred that the allegations in which the perjury was said to consist, were material, nor did it aver facts showing their materiality.

The plaintiffs in the bill in chancery were merchants; the defendant was their clerk. The bill charged him with embezzlement of the complainants' money and goods. The defendant, in his answer, denied the embezzlement; and in order to account for the fact, charged in the bill, that he had large sums of money deposited in some of the banks to his credit, he stated in his answer a variety of facts and circumstances tending to show that he had honestly acquired the money so deposited. The perjury assigned was in the allegation of those facts and circumstances.

Mr. Semmes, for defendant. The defendant was not bound to answer specially how he obtained the money; nor was his answer to that effect, evidence for him. The indictment does not state that those matters were material, nor do they appear to be so upon the face of the indictment. If the bill would have been bad upon demurrer, perjury cannot be assigned in the answer; for the answer was immaterial and unnecessary. The court dissolved the injunction, (which was to prevent him from withdrawing his funds from the respective banks in which they were deposited, upon the allegation that they were the funds of the complainants,) upon the bill itself without answer; upon the ground that the complainants did not in their bill show a title to the specific funds lodged in the banks; that they had no right to require the defendant to discover the matters charged; and that the matter charged amounted to felony; to which he was not bound to answer. If the court had no jurisdiction, or if the defendant was not bound to answer, he could not commit perjury in the answer. The assignment of the perjury is only upon immaterial allegations in the answer. By thus assigning the perjury upon the immaterial allegations of the answer, they admitted the truth of the material allegations. 2 Russ. Crimes, 519, note 2; Rex v. Dunston, Ryan & M. 109; Abrahams v. Bunn, 4 Burrows, 2255; Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 4 East, 577, note b.

Mr. Jones, on the same side. The gist of the charge, in the bill in chancery, was embezzlement of the money and goods of the complainants. It was not a bill for discovery, as ancillary to an action at law, but an original bill for an account of the embezzlement and for general relief. It is true that the complainants say that they have brought a suit at law, and need the defendant's answer, but they do not say to what facts. If the averments in which the perjury is not assigned are true (and they must be taken to be so,) the others will appear to be immaterial; and it is settled law that either it must appear upon the indictment that the matter, in respect of which the perjury is assigned, was material, or it must be expressly alleged to have been so. 2 Russ. 517, note a, 519, 541, 542; Com. v. Knight, 12 Mass. 274; 2 Chit. Cr. Law, 305, 306. It is also necessary that the indictment should expressly contradict the matter falsely sworn to by the defendant; and the general averment that the defendant falsely swore, &c., upon the whole matter, will not be sufficient; the indictment must proceed, by particular averments, to negative that which is false. 2 Russ. 542; Rex v. Dunston, 1 Ryan & M. 109. But a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction to administer an oath to an answer in chancery. In England it is taken by a master in chancery, or by a commissioner appointed by the court. 4 Com. Dig. tit. "Justice of the Peace," B, 102; 16 Vin. Abr. 315, "Perjury," E.

thority being expressly given by the ninth rule prescribed by the supreme court for the equity practice of the circuit courts.

An answer to a demurrable bill is a waiver of the right to demur. The averment of embezzlement was only an inference from the circumstances stated in the bill. Those circumstances therefore were material; and the facts stated by the defendant to avoid the force of those circumstances, were therefore also material. The case of Rex v. Dunston, cited from Ryan & M. 109, is not supported by Bartlett v. Pickersgill, in 4 East, 577, note b; for in this latter case, the defendant was convicted of perjury in denying a parol agreement void by the statute of frauds. The materiality of the matter is a fact to be ascertained by the jury. Com. v. Weaver [unreported], Judge Lomax's opinion.

Mr. Key, on the same side. The defendant had a right to demur or answer to the bill in chancery; but having answered and put the facts in issue, they became material. The bill charged a trust in the defendant and required an account. The court therefore had jurisdiction. The facts stated by the defendant for the purpose of corroborating his answer are material.

Mr. Jones, in reply. The putting of the facts in issue does not make them material. The materiality of all questions, in a chancery suit, depends upon the purpose for which the suit is instituted; and if it does not appear upon the face of the indictment that the question, upon which the perjury is assigned was material or not, the indictment cannot be supported. Rex v. Bignold, 2 Russ. Crimes, 541, note z.

THE COURT (nem. con.) was of opinion that the indictment was insufficient in not averring the materiality of the facts upon which the perjury was assigned; and in not stating facts which would show their materiality.

Judgment for the defendant on the demurrer.

UNITED STATES v. CRAFTON et al.

CONSPIRACY TO DEFRAUD—REQUISITES OF INDICTMENT—REV. ST. § 5440, CONSTRUED.

Requisites of an indictment for conspiracy to defraud the United States, under section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, considered; and that section held not to extend to a case where the contemplated fraud depends entirely upon the passage of a future act of congress to make it effective.

Demurrer to indictment for conspiracy to defraud the United States. The indictment, in substance, charges: 1. That John D. Crafton, one of the defendants, was, at the time charged, the adjutant-general and acting paymaster-general of the state of Missouri; that John D. Crafton, Jr., was a clerk in his office; that the defendants, George M. Irvin, John C. Bender, and Waller Young, were acting as the agents and attorneys for the collection of a claim and demand alleged to be due the members of a certain company of enrolled Missouri militia, growing out of their alleged services in the war for the suppression of the Rebellion. 2. That, for the purpose of defrauding the United States out of the money alleged to be due for such services, the said defendants conspired together to obtain the payment thereof out of the treasury of the United States. 3. That, to effect the object of said conspiracy, the defendants, Irvin, Bender, and Young, made a false and fictitious muster and pay-roll of said company, and presented the same to the defendant John D. Crafton, as such acting paymaster-general, to audit, approve, and allow the claim contained in said roll. 4. That, to further effect the object of said conspiracy, the defendant John D. Crafton, as acting paymaster-general, did audit, approve, and allow such claim, and issued certificates of indebtedness of the state of Missouri for the amount claimed to be due on said roll, and delivered them to the defendant Young. 5. That, further to effect the object of the conspiracy, all of the defendants transmitted the false and fictitious muster and pay-roll of said company to the third auditor of the treasury of the United States, with the amount on said roll as audited, approved, and allowed, and showing the issue of the certificates of indebtedness therefor, for file by the third auditor of the treasury department of the United States, until such time as congress should thereafter provide for the payment of the fraudulent claim contained in and upon said roll. 6. That, further to effect the object of the conspiracy, the defendants employed Craig and Strong to secure the passage of a bill which had been introduced into the senate of the United States for the payment of said fraudulent claims.

Mr. Mullins, U. S. Dist. Atty.

Mr. Chandler, Mr. Kemp, and Mr. Lay, for defendants.

Before DILLON, Circuit Judge, and KREKEL, District Judge.

DILLON, Circuit Judge. The indictment is founded upon section 5440 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows: "If two or more persons conspire * * to defraud the United States in any manner, or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all the parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of," etc.

The nature of the acts charged against the defendants in the indictment, are more fully seen by reference to the act of the legislature of Missouri, approved March 19th, 1874, entitled "An act to audit and adjust the war debt of the state." Laws 1874, p. 102, § 10 et seq. The claims "of officers and soldiers of the enrolled Missouri militia" were primarily, and, until assumed by congress, exclusively, against the state, and not against the general government. The latter has never assumed their payment. If, at the time that the acts set forth in the indictment were done, the general government had provided for the payment of such claims out of its own treasury, undoubtedly those acts, fraudulent in their nature and object, would have been criminally punishable. It is just at this point that the case stated in the indictment is vulnerable Under the recognized rules of criminal pleading, it is not sufficient to allege generally a conspiracy to defraud; but the nature of the fraud, and, to the required extent, the manner in which, or the means by which, it was to be effected, must be averred. U. S. v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S. 542, 558. In the case at bar, this has been attempted by the pleader, but the difficulty is that, it appears from the averments, the alleged conspiracy to defraud the United States was, under the existing legislation of congress, legally impossible of execution. The fraudulent muster and pay-roll was transmitted to the third auditor to be filed, to await the passage of an act of congress which should provide for the payment of the fraudulent claims contained therein. It was not filed as an existing claim against the United States; on the contrary, the debt to the persons named in the roll was the debt of the state, and would remain such unless congress should assume it. It could not be known that such assumption would ever be made, or, if made, that the said rolls would have any legal significance or value.

However fraudulent in ulterior design, or morally reprehensible the acts charged in the indictment may be, still our judgment is that section 5440 of the Revised Statutes cannot be extended to a case where the fraud which the conspiracy contemplated can only be effected in case an act of congress shall be thereafter passed of a nature to fit the prior conspiracy and give it something to feed upon. The demurrer to the indictment must be sustained. Judgment accordingly.

Case No. 14,883.

UNITED STATES v. CRAIG.

[4 Wash. C. C. 729.] [1]

Circuit Court, E. D. Pennsylvania. Oct. Term, 1827.

COUNTERFEITING — APPLIANCES USED — DECLARATIONS—EVIDENCE—WITNESS.

1. In a prosecution for forgery of bank notes against one, the prosecutor, after laying a foundation by proof for connecting the prisoner with other persons in the general transactions, may give evidence that different parts of the machine employed in the counterfeiting were found in the possession of other persons respectively; but as to the effect of such evidence and the fact, the jury must decide.

2. The declaration of the prisoner, when he was apprehended, that he had never been at the house where he was apprehended till that time, may be given in evidence; not as proof of the fact, but to repel any unfavourable conclusion which his silence might have warranted.

[Cited in State v. Knapp, 45 N. H. 156.]

3. Comparison of hands is not evidence in a criminal case.

4. A paper found in a trunk, with a signature of a person other than the prisoner, and not addressed to him; is not evidence unless it is proved that he was the owner of the trunk, and in some way connected with the paper.

5. A question to a witness which ought not to be answered; for example, to state the contents of a written instrument; the court will not permit to be put to him, or to be answered. But if the question be one which he may answer or not; for example, if it tend to disgrace or criminate himself; it is a legal question, although the witness may decline answering it.

[Cited in Fries v. Brugler, 12 N. J. Law, 81.]

6. A witness is not bound to answer a question which may render him infamous, or may disgrace him.

7. The declaration of the prisoner to the witness, of the purpose for which he was going to the house where he was apprehended amongst counterfeiters, may be given in evidence; but the materiality of the evidence in relation to the innocence of his intentions and acts, will depend upon the accordance of these declarations with his subsequent conduct.

The prisoner [J. W. Craig] was indicted for counterfeiting sundry notes of different denominations, purporting to be notes of the Bank of the United States; and for having in his possession other blank notes, in the similitude of the notes of that bank, with intent, &c.

The following points of evidence were ruled by the court:

1. That the evidence given in the case of U. S. v. Moses [Case No. 15,825], of the press, and the parts fitting it, having been found, the former in the house of the brother of Reuben Moses, and the latter in the house of Reuben Moses, may be given in this case; the evidence being sufficient, in the opinion of the court, so to connect the prisoner with Johnson and Reuben Moses in the several transactions, as to let in the same. That evidence appears in the charge of the court in the case of U. S.

[1] [Originally reported from the MSS. of Hon. Bushrod Washington, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, under the supervision of Richard Peters, Jr., Esq.]

v. Moses [supra]. In counterfeiting bank notes, there are or may be various acts to be performed, and after a foundation is laid by proof of a connection between two or more persons in the general transaction, evidence may be given upon the separate trial of each, that the gravers, for example, were found in the possession of one of the parties, the press in that of another of them, and the ink and paper in that of a third. As to the effect of that evidence, and as to a connection between the parties; which the court assumes merely for the purpose of deciding on the admissibility of the evidence; these are questions proper for the decision of the jury.

2. That the declarations of Johnson and of the prisoner in the room where the notes were discovered; and also upon the examination before the mayor; that the prisoner had never before been at the house of Johnson, and had been there not more than twenty minutes; might be given in evidence; not to prove the truth of these declarations, but to repel any unfavourable conclusion from the silence of the prisoner, and his declining to give some explanation of the situation in which he was found.

3. The two first points of evidence, ruled in the case of U. S. v. Moses, were reargued in this case, and were confirmed by both judges; PETERS, District Judge, having been absent at the trial of that case.

[For hearing on a motion by defendant to show cause why he should not have delivered to him certain bank notes which were on his person at the time of his examination on the charge of forgery, see Case No. 3,321.]

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. It is insisted by the district attorney that by compelling the witness to answer the question "whether B. Johnson had told him that if he would come to his house on a certain day he would have Moses, the prisoner there:" the court departed from the reason and policy of the general rule first laid down; that the witness was not bound to disclose the name of the person from whom the confidential information came which led to the detection and apprehension of the accused. The court think quite otherwise. In the latter case individual security is not sacrificed to public policy, since it never can be material to the defence of the accused that the name of the informer should be disclosed in the trial. But it is quite otherwise in the former case. The situation in which the defendant was found, at the time of his apprehension, warrants the presumption of his guilt; and it may therefore be all important to his defence to repel this presumption by showing that he was at Johnson's by accident, or by the really insidious but apparently friendly invitation of the owner of the house; which latter fact the jury might possibly believe to be made out by the affirmative answer of the witness to this question. If this be so, it is certainly much better that the encouragement of persons to assist in detecting and apprehending those who are suspected of crimes, which the suppression of this evidence is designed to hold out, should be withheld, than that the safety of the accused should be hazarded, by denying to him the benefit of the disclosure. For myself I declare that I never will consent judicially to sacrifice any individual, whether it concerns his life, liberty or property, to notions of public policy, unless I am commanded by positive law to do so.

The district attorney having proved the hand writing of the prisoner, by his acknowledgment that a certain paper exhibited in court was written by him, asked the witness if he believed that another paper, purporting to be an order signed by the prisoner, directing his trunks to be delivered to the bearer, was of the hand writing of the prisoner. The witness answered that he had never seen the prisoner write, nor had he ever received a letter from him or corresponded with him; but that he believed the order to be his hand writing, having compared it with the writing which he acknowledged to be his. The district attorney then offered to read the order, which was objected to by the prisoner's counsel; the evidence being nothing but comparison of hands, which is not evidence in a court, much less in criminal cases. The counsel cited, Martin v. Taylor [Case No. 9,166]; Starkie, Ev. 654. In support of the evidence, were cited the following cases: 10 Serg. & R. 110; Bull. N. P. 232; 1 Bin. 664; 4 Esp. 117, 122; Id. (Day's Ed.) 273, note.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice. I confess for myself, that I never was well satisfied with the reason of the general rule, that comparison of hand writing is not competent evidence to go to the jury; and yet that a paper is such evidence, if the witness has seen the person write, and expresses his belief that the paper so offered is evidence of the hand writing of the person. For it seems to me that the rejected evidence is, in most cases, a much more satisfactory test of the hand writing than that which is admitted. Nevertheless, I consider the rule to have been for a long time so settled in England; and the decision of this court in the case of Martin v. Taylor, proceeded upon that ground. Farmers' Bank of Lancaster v. Whitehill, 10 Serg. & R. 110, decides that in a civil case, and in corroboration of other evidence to prove hand writing, comparison of hands is good evidence by the common law of Pennsylvania. Wherever therefore such a case comes before this court, that case will be respectfully considered. But this being a criminal case, I shall govern myself by what I consider the general rule settled in England, which excludes the evidence. The evidence must be overruled.

The order, and also another were afterwards admitted, on the evidence of a person who had often seen the defendant write. A paper found in a trunk at the half way house between Philadelphia and Trenton, with the signature of E. Gleeson, not addressed to the prisoner, was offered in evidence. The court rejected the evidence until proof should be given that the trunk was the property of the prisoner, or in some way to connect the prisoner with the paper.

A question to a witness, which the law will not permit him to answer, as if he be asked to state the contents of a record; or to an attorney to disclose the secrets of his client; or, as in this case, whether his petition for the benefit of the insolvent law was not refused, and he remanded to jail upon the ground of his fraudulent conduct,—is improper, and the court will not permit it to be put. But if the question be such as if merely answered in one way would disgrace or criminate the witness, the question is proper; because it is the privilege of the witness to refuse to answer it, and not the law which forbids him to do so, as in the former case. But being a privilege merely, he may waive it, or give the answer.

WASHINGTON, Circuit Justice, delivered the charge; and after summing up the evidence, left it to the jury to decide upon the guilt or innocence of the prisoner, as to the several offences charged in the indictments. He stated that the materiality of his declarations to a witness, that he was going to Johnson's house, for the purpose of obtaining bail for his brother-in-law, Gleeson, which, contrary to his first impressions, he was now satisfied was proper evidence for the consideration of the jury (1 Starkie, Ev. 46–48, and cases cited), depended very much, if not entirely, upon the accordance of his subsequent conduct with these declarations. From that conduct the jury were to judge whether the prisoner was sincere in the avowal of his purpose in going, or merely intended to serve a purpose, and to provide testimony in his favour in case of need. If in the opinion of the jury the latter was intended, then the prisoner's declarations of the motive which took him to Johnson's, ought to be entirely disregarded.

The jury found the defendant guilty upon all the indictments.

C. J. Ingersoll, Dist. Atty., and Mr. Sergeant, for the United States.

Randall & Philips, for defendant.

NOTE. The weight of authority seems to be in favour of the doctrine, that a witness is not bound to answer a question which may render him infamous, or disgrace him, although it is not fully settled in England. 1 Starkie, Ev. 137, 145; 3 Starkie, Ev. 1742, note.

UNITED STATES v. CRANDELL.

[2 Cranch, C. C. 373.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. April Term, 1823.

WITNESS—INTEREST—INDICTMENT FOR FORGERY.

The person intended to be injured by a forgery, and the person whose name is forged to a certificate, are competent witnesses to prove the forgery. But, if the witness has paid money upon the forged paper, he is not competent to prove the forgery.

There were three indictments against the defendant [William Crandell] for forgery. In one he was charged with forging a certificate purporting to be signed by one Henry Naylor with intent to defraud one Holmead.

Mr. Key, for defendant, objected to Naylor and Holmead as witnesses for the prosecution.

THE COURT (THRUSTON, Circuit Judge, absent) overruled the objection. Upon another indictment against him for forgery, a witness was sworn who had paid five dollars upon the forged paper. THE COURT instructed the jury that he was not a competent witness (CRANCH, Chief Judge, doubting). Upon a third indictment for forging the name of G. Bomford to a bond, with intent to injure one Digges. Mr. Key, for defendant, objected to Digges as a witness, but the objection was overruled by THE COURT.

UNITED STATES v. CRANDELL.

[4 Cranch, C. C. 683.] [1]

Circuit Court, District of Columbia. March Term, 1836.

SEDITIOUS LIBEL—INTENT—PUBLICATION—WITNESS—MULATTO.

1. Upon an indictment for a seditious libel, it is not competent for the United States, for the purpose of proving the intent of the defendant in publishing the libel charged in the indictment, to give in evidence any papers subsequently published by the defendant, or found in his possession, unpublished by him, which would be libels, and might be substantive subjects of public prosecution, if published.

2. After having given evidence tending to prove a publication of the libel here, evidence may be given that other copies of the same libel were found in the possession of the defendant, with certain other papers or pamphlets, but not of the contents of such other papers or pamphlets, unless they have relation to the libels charged in the indictment, and would not, in themselves, be substantive ground of prosecution.

3. Publication of pamphlets in New York is not evidence of their publication here, in Washington county, so as to fix upon the defendant here such a knowledge of their publication as to make his possession, alone, of other copies of the same, even with the words "read and circulate" written upon them, evidence of the publication of them, by him, here.

4. The United States cannot, in order to show the evil intent with which the defendant published the paper, give, in evidence, other unpublished papers or pamphlets, found in the defendant's possession, unless accompanied by evidence of some acknowledgment or admission, by the defendant, that he knew and approved their contents.

5. Upon the trial, on the plea of not guilty, the court will not prevent the United States from giving evidence in support of a count which might be deemed insufficient, upon a motion in arrest of judgment.

6. The fact that certain papers were found in the possession of the defendant, may be given in evidence, although the papers may have been seized under an illegal warrant.

7. In a prosecution for a libel, the United States may give evidence to the jury that the defendant was found in possession of printed copies of the libel charged in the indictment, if some evidence has been given of the publication of the same libel, in this district.

8. Upon a count for publishing certain libellous pictures, the court will not suffer the pamphlets to which they were attached to be read, in evidence, to the jury, to show the evil intent with which the defendant published the pictures, nothing but the pictures being charged as a libel in that count.

9. The counsel for the prosecution, in opening the argument, may read to the jury any part of the pamphlet given in evidence by the United States, which is pertinent to the issue, although not read in the opening of the evidence.

10. A mulatto, born of a white woman, is a competent witness against a Christian white person.

This was an indictment [against Reuben Crandell], for publishing libels tending to excite sedition among the slaves and free colored persons in this district. It contained five counts.

1st. The first charged the defendant with publishing a libel containing, in one part thereof, these words: "Then we are not to meddle with the subject of slavery in any manner; neither by appeals to patriotism, by exhortations to humanity, by application of the truth to the conscience. Nor, even to propose, in congress, that the seat of our republican government may be purified from this crying abomination, under penalty of a dissolution of the Union." And in another part thereof, in an article entitled, "Reply to Mr. Gurley's Letter, Addressed to the Reverend R. R. Gurley, Secretary of the American Colonization Society, Washington City," signed by Arthur Tappan and others, the following words: "We will not insult your understanding, sir, with any labored attempt to prove to you that the descendants of African parents, born in this country, have as good a claim to a residence in it as the descendants of English, German, Danish, Scotch, or Irish parents. You will not attempt to prove that every native colored person you meet in the streets has not the same right to remain in this, his native land, that you and we have. Assuming this as an incontrovertible truth, we hold it self-evident that they have as good right to deport us to Europe, under pretext that there we shall be prosperous and happy, as we have to deport them to Africa, on a similar plea." And in another part thereof, in the said reply, the following words: "In what language could the unrighteous principles of denying freedom to colored people, in this country, (which amounts to the same thing as demanding the expulsion of those already free,) be more effectually, and yet more plausibly, inculcated, than in those very words of General Harper, you have, with so much approbation, quoted to us." And in another part thereof, in the said reply, the following words: "Against this doctrine of suspending emancipation, upon the contingency or condition of expatriation, we feel bound to protest; because we believe that every man has a right to reside in his native country, if he chooses, and that every man's native country is the country in which he was born; that no man's right to freedom is suspended upon, or taken away by, his desire to remain in his native country; that to make a removal from one's own native country, a sine qua non of setting him free, when held in involuntary bondage, is the climax of moral absurdity." And in another part thereof, in another article entitled, "Three Months' Residence, or Seven Weeks on a Sugar Plantation, by Henry Whitby," containing the most disgusting and shocking details of cruel, inhuman, and immoral treatment of slaves, by the owners and overseers, and attorneys, or agents of proprietors, according to the tenor and effect following, that is to say: "On this and other occasions, I thought it my duty to acquaint the attorney with my observations and feelings in regard to the cruel floggings and severe treatment, generally, which I have witnessed at New Ground. He admitted the facts, but said that plantation work could not be carried on without the cart-whip. He moreover labored hard to convince me that the flogging did not injure the health of the negroes. I also told him of the exceeding immorality and licentiousness which I had witnessed, mentioning, in substance, the facts previously detailed. He replied that that was a thing which they must wink at." "If a man, in manner, so much the gentleman, and in other respects, so estimable, was necessarily led to countenance or wink at the enormities I have feebly attempted to describe, what, I ask, is to be expected from its subordinate administrators, who are continually exposed to the demoralizing influences of slavery? What, indeed, but the frightful wickedness and cruelty which are its actual fruits?" "In contempt of the laws, to the disturbance of the public peace, to the evil example of all others, and against the peace and government of the United States."

2d. The second count charges the publication of another libel, containing, among other things, the following words, namely: "Our plan of emancipation is simply this: To promulgate the doctrine of human rights in high places and low places, and in all places where there are human beings; to whisper it in chimney-corners, and to proclaim it from the house-tops, yea, from the mountain-tops; to pour it out, like water, from the pulpit and the press; to raise it up with all the force of the inner man, from infancy to gray hairs; to give line upon line, precept upon precept, till it forms one of the foundation principles and parts indestructible, of the public soul." And in another part thereof, the following, namely: "I (meaning the said Crandell,) am not unaware that my remarks may be regarded, by many, as dangerous and exceptionable; that I may be regarded as a fanatic for quoting the language of eternal truth; and denounced as an incendiary for maintaining, in the spirit as well as the letter, the doctrines of American Independence. But if such are the consequences of a simple performance of duty, I shall not regard them. If my feeble appeal but reaches the hearts of any who are now slumbering in iniquity; if it shall have power given to it to shake down one stone from that foul temple where the blood of human victims is offered to the Moloch of slavery; if, under Providence, it can break one fetter from off the image of God, and enable one suffering African

'To feel
The weight of human misery less, and glide
Ungroaning to the tomb,'

I shall not have written in vain; my conscience will be satisfied. Far be it from me to cast new bitters into the gall and wormwood waters of sectional prejudice. No, I desire peace; the peace of universal love; of catholic sympathy; the peace of common interest; a common feeling, a common humanity. But so long as slavery is tolerated, no such peace can exist. Liberty and slavery cannot dwell in harmony together. There will be a perpetual war in the members of the political Mezentius; between the living and the dead. God and man have placed between them an everlasting barrier, an eternal separation. No matter under what law or compact their union is attempted, the ordination of Providence has forbidden it, and it cannot stand. Peace! There can be no peace between justice and oppression; between robbery and righteousness, truth and falsehood, freedom and slavery. The slaveholding states are not free. The name of liberty is there, but the spirit is wanting. They do not partake of its invaluable blessings. Wherever slavery exists to any considerable extent, with the exception of some recently-settled portions of the country, and which have not yet felt, in a great degree, the baneful and deteriorating influences of slave labor, we hear, at this moment, the cry of suffering. We are told of grass-grown streets; of crumbling mansions; of beggared planters, and barren plantations; of fear from without, of terror within. The once fertile fields are wasted and tenantless, for the curse of slavery, the improvidence of that laborer whose hire has been kept back by fraud, has been there, poisoning the very earth beyond the reviving influence of the early and the latter rain. A moral mildew mingles with and blasts the economy of nature. It is as if the finger of the everlasting God had written upon the soil of the slaveholder, the language of his displeasure. Let, then, the slaveholding states consult their present interest, by beginning, without delay, the work of emancipation. If they fear not, and mock at, the fiery indignation of Him to whom vengeance belongeth, let temporal interests persuade them. They know, they must know, that the present state of things cannot continue. Mind is the same everywhere, no matter what may be the complexion of the frame which it animates. There is a love of liberty which the scourge cannot eradicate: a hatred of oppression which centuries of degradation cannot extinguish. The slave will become conscious, sooner or later, of his strength; his physical superiority; and will exert it. His torch will be at the threshold, and his knife at the throat of the planter. Horrible and indiscriminate will be the vengeance. Where, then, will be the pride, the beauty, and the chivalry of the South? The smoke of her torment will rise upward, like a thick cloud, visible over the whole earth."

3d. The third count charged the defendant with publishing twelve other libels, in which were represented and exhibited "several disgusting prints and pictures of white men in the act of inflicting, with whips, cruel and inhuman beatings and stripes upon young and helpless and unresisting black children; and inflicting with other instruments, cruel and inhuman violence upon slaves, and in a manner not fit and proper to be seen and represented; calculated and intended to excite the good people of the United States, in said county, to violence against the holders of slaves in said county as aforesaid; and calculated and intended to excite the said slaves, in the said county, to violence and rebellion against their said masters, in said county, in contempt of the laws, to the disturbance of the public peace, to the evil example of all others, and against the peace and government of the United States."

No evidence having been offered upon the fourth and fifth counts, they are omitted.

All these counts contained averments that, at the time of the publication of these libels, the citizens of the United States, residing in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, were lawfully authorized to hold slaves as property, and that many of them did so hold them; and that many free persons of color, also, reside in the district; and that the defendant unlawfully, maliciously, and seditiously contriving and intending to traduce, vilify, and bring into hatred and contempt, among the citizens of the United States, the laws and government of the United States, in the county of Washington, as duly established and in force, and to inflame and excite the people of the United States to resist, and oppose, and disregard the laws and government aforesaid, and the rights of proprietors of slaves in the said county, and to inflame and excite to violence against the said proprietors of the said slaves, not only the ignorant and ill-disposed among the free people of the United States, and the free persons of color in the said county, but also the slaves; and to produce among the said slaves and free persons of color, insubordination, violence, and rebellion, and to stir up war and insurrection between the said slaves and their said masters, published the said libels, containing, among other things, divers false, malicious, and seditious matters of and concerning the laws and government of the United States in the said district, and of and concerning the citizens of the United States holding slaves in the said district, and of and concerning the said slaves and free persons of color, and their labor, services, and treatment, and the state of slavery in the said district. The defendant pleaded not guilty.

Upon the trial, prima facie evidence of the publication by the defendant having been given, THE COURT permitted the pamphlet to be read to the jury, or as much thereof as either party might think proper to be read, and pertinent to the issue.

The district-attorney, Mr. Key, in order to show the evil intent with which the defendant published the libel charged in the first count, offered to prove that the defendant had in his possession other libels of the same tendency.

Mr. Bradley and R. S. Coxe, for the defendant, objected, and cited 1 Russ. 242, and Finnerty v. Tipper, 2 Camp. 72.

Mr. Key, contra, cited Rex v. Amphlit, 4 Barn. & C. 35.

THE COURT was of opinion that the United States could not, for the purpose of proving the intent of the defendant in publishing the libel stated in the first count, give in evidence to the jury any papers subsequently published by the defendant, or found in his possession unpublished by him, which would be libels, and might be substantive subjects of public prosecution, if published.

Mr. Key then offered to prove the publication, by the defendant, of the libels stated in the first, second, and third counts, by proving the following facts, namely: That a large collection of libels, and among them several copies of those charged in those counts, with the words, "read and circulate" written thereon in his handwriting, were found upon the traverser; that he undertook to account for their being in his possession, and gave untrue and contradictory accounts; that he acknowledged that he had brought here those then shown to him, being the same now in court, and that they comprehended all he brought here except about a dozen; and that prior to the traverser's arrest sundry similar publications had been privately sent to various persons in this district by some unknown person or persons in the district. 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 73, § 13. "The having in one's custody a written copy of a libel, publicly known, is an evidence of the publication of it." Rex v. Beare, 1 Ld. Raym. 414; 3 Chit. Cr. Law, 871, 875; 1 Chit. Cr. Law, 568; Maloney v. Bartley, 3 Camp. 210; 1 Russ. 235.

The counsel for defendant objected, and cited Holt, Libel, 291; Rex v. Burdett, 4 Barn. & Ald. 95; Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, pp. 849, 853; 1 Vent. 31; Smith v. Wood, 3 Camp. 323; 12 Vin. Abr. 227, "Evidence," T, 661; Rex v. Fitton, 2 Keb. 502.

THE COURT was of opinion that the attorney of the United States may give evidence of the publication, in this district, of any copies of the libels charged in the first and second counts of the indictment. That if he shall have given any evidence tending to show such a publication here, he will be permitted to show that other copies of the same libels were found in the possession of the defendant. He may then give evidence that a certain number of papers or pamphlets were found in the possession of the defendant, together with the copies of the libels charged, and of the publication of which, in this district, he shall have given evidence; but he will not be permitted to give in evidence to the jury the contents of any of the papers other than those charged as libels in this indictment, unless such other papers have relation to the libels charged in the indictment, and would not, in themselves, be substantive ground of prosecution. He may then give evidence to the jury of any confessions or acknowledgments made by the defendant in relation to any of the matters charged in the indictment.
